> Human Rights Council 44th Session – Item 1: Decisions and Conclusion

Thank you Madame President,

1. I proudly take the floor on behalf a group of Member and Observer States.

2. One of the main themes highlighted during the June sessions of this Council is the situation of human rights of women and girls – and appropriately so. Over the past 100 years, we've witnessed substantial and steady progress towards realizing the full enjoyment of all human rights by women and girls.

3. The positive trend is something the international community should be proud of. For example, 100 years ago…
…the right to vote; the right to work outside of the home and in the field of their own choosing; the right to not be harassed at home and at work; the right to divorce; wear pants; join the military; and own their own property to some degree, in every region of the world, were birthrights predominantly inherited by sons and not daughters. The rights mentioned earlier, and the many more we did not, were also advocated for and championed by men, including some who held organizational or political authority.

4. The job hasn't been easy and remains incomplete. To advance further and support the women and men in this work, the United Nations created the Commission on the Status of Women in 1946, and UN Women celebrated its 10th anniversary last week on July 9, 2020.

5. Unsurprisingly, many more years of labor lie ahead in achieving equitable societies, and all three sessions of the Human Rights Council provide a helpful reminder of how much work the international community still has to do. Empowering women and girls is not enough in accomplishing this shared objective. An often missing tool in the pursuit of gender equality is the growing need for attention and consideration of the challenges that have a disproportionally negative impact on men and boys.

Madame President,
6. Men and boys fully engage as strategic partners and allies for the empowerment of all women and girls, and we must continue to encourage men and boys to fully participate in all actions towards gender equality.

7. What we are bringing to the Council's attention is that there is an absence of energy towards human rights issues where males are at a disadvantaged and an imbalance of champions at all levels which may stall the progress towards equitable societies. Gender equality is not a zero sum game. The quality of life of women and men, girls and boys are interwoven, interrelated and interdependent. The international community must continue to address the impacts of multiple forms of discrimination against women and girls. And in a different manner, within the context of gender quality, begin to grapple with the complex challenges facing men and boys today.

8. Here are five facts far from the public consciousness:

-men and boys are more likely to engage and suffer from violent behavior;
-men and boys constitute the overwhelming majority of the worldwide prison, missing adults, suicides, drug addicts and homelessness populations;
-men and boys can also suffer from negative body image;
-unfavorable biases exist in draft selection; war deaths; veterans issues; divorce proceedings; education; and in the family and criminal court systems;
-lastly, men and boys are more likely to die in all stages of life. For example, while COVID-19 continues to have unique and unreasonable affects on women and girls, men comprise the majority of COVID-19 deaths in every country where data is available and reliable.

Madame President,
9. Some are content with the position that the topic of men and boys have in the gender parity solar system – the role of distant planet Pluto. Rotating on the far-far edges of gender discussions and while it is acknowledged as part of the system, it is misunderstood and even disregarded. This joint statement is no chest-beating exercise.

10. Incorporating a different perspective in the gender parity conversation will by no means turn Pluto into the Sun. Real and substantive parity will benefit both > sides in many ways. The call for more inclusivity is neither an attempt to steal the spotlight or valuable resources away from our shared responsibility of empowering women and girls but an invitation for this Council to play a more complete and comprehensive role in the promotion and protection of all human rights by all human beings for a better complementary world in the next 100 years.

July 28, 2020 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

The young Dutch anti-feminist Ava Brighton (above) has quickly made a name for herself in the MRM. Her website is here. She burst onto the consciousness of MRAs nine months ago with her first video, 'Are Almost All Women CLINICALLY INSANE?' She has since published another 17 videos, the latest being the trailer (11:14) for her forthcoming documentary A VOID.

I hardly need remind MRAs (and their sympathisers) how influential Cassie Jaye's movie The Red Pill was, internationally. It was first screened almost four years ago, and I'm writing this piece to urge MRAs to help fund Ava's documentary project, which is already well underway, A VOID. I believe it has the potential to be even more impactful than The Red Pill, in part because it focuses on the feminists' battle which has surely caused more human suffering than any of their other battles – their battle against the nuclear family, which has had such a devastating impact on men, women and children. This impact has been both direct and indirect, for example the devastating impact of fatherlessness on children – especially boys – an issue so well explored by Warren Farrell in The Boy Crisis, and by William Collins in The Empathy Gap: Male Disadvantages and the Mechanisms of Their Neglect.

The feminist battle against the nuclear family – and against fathers in particular – first came to Ava's attention because her partner Tristan Lonley had suffered such egregious attacks. The two of them spoke at the last Messages 4 Men conference in London, last November. Their talks are on the associated playlist (22 videos).

Ava recently launched a campaign and crowdfunding website for her documentary. From the website:

> What I'm doing.
> In these tumultuous times of change I'm here on Indiegogo, trying to raise funds for my feature documentary 'A VOID'.
> The project started off as a movie to raise awareness for alienated fathers and their children. I saw men being completely destroyed, stripped of their rights and from their children, their possessions, their sanity and, in too many cases, their lives. I wondered why this is happening to hundreds of thousands of men, all around the world. So I wanted to give them a voice, especially when I noticed men don't dare to speak, are not believed and the system is, by default, against them: Men's oblivion, an invisible black hole, most people don't even know exists – until you get near it.

> This became the start of a long and dark journey into the hidden realms behind feminism – if this is even the correct term, as what the female whistle-blowers described sounded a thousand times more savage than the fight for equality.
> Once word got out I was considering making this documentary, female whistle-blowers started to join in, and this is where 'A VOID' took a sharp turn and got sucked past the event horizon of this black hole.
> It made me realize I had to record all the whistle-blowers' interviews prior to announcing the making of this movie. And now, with over 30 hours of the most important footage, 'A VOID' is becoming a movie in which women expose the truth behind the gender warfare. And we'll be needing you to help us explode this evidence across the world.
> What is the film about / what's the story / what's the angle?
>
> In 'A VOID', Ava Brighton takes you on a terrifying journey beyond the event horizon of the black hole behind the feminist movement.
> It's the women who do the exposing: ominous testimonials of former feminists, mothers and academics are the centre point of the film, while at the heart are the voices of victimized men, alienated fathers telling their tragic stories. Ava Brighton doesn't speak, the stories of these women and men are speaking for themselves, collectively providing the answers to the many questions surrounding the gender war and the hidden, worldwide war against men.

Donations have reached an encouraging £2,638 (about US$3,400) in just a few days. Her target is £109,360 (about US$141,000) and with sufficient backing from MRAs, she'll reach the target. Among her interviewees will be Paul Elam, Elizabeth Hobson, party leader at Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them), Deborah Powney, the party's spokeswoman on Domestic Abuse, and myself, party chairman.

J4MB will be making a donation to Ava's crowdfunder shortly, and I urge all MRAs (and their sympathisers) to donate what they can. I repeat my view that Ava's film has the potential to make more of an impact than The Red Pill, and with your support, it WILL. Let's not pass up this rare opportunity to fund another ground-breaking movie. Thank you.

No Gun Ever Killed Anyone

July 31, 2020 | by Mallory Millett | Link | Original Link

In the 1970's I was alarmed to hear that my big sister, Kate Millett, who had serious mental health issues which had agonized my family and her friends for many years, was organizing a group called The Mental Patients' Project in order to claim that the psychiatric community and society were "oppressing" people and "stigmatizing them with labels such as psychotic, bi-polar, schizophrenic, borderline personalities," etc and unconstitutionally imprisoning them in hospitals thereby violating their civil rights. We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate's issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. She was a brutal sadist, a violent bully at whose hands everyone about her suffered. Throughout my childhood I was menaced and immeasurably traumatized, as I'm sure was Elliot Rodger's younger sibling whom he, in fact, intended to murder.

At one point, in 1973, I found myself alone with her in an apartment in Berkeley, California where she did not allow me to sleep for five days as she raged at the world and menaced me physically. I had come to Berkeley at her entreaty to appear in the UCB Auditorium as she screened a film we'd produced together in the summer of 1970 (another horror story too long to recount here) and which was, in part, a biography of my life along with two other women. This movie (Three Lives) was the very first ever produced with not one iota of male presence. Even the people who delivered food to the set had to be female and Kate was touting it as the first all-woman film production in history.

Having had my youth overshadowed by Kate's irrationality I warily traveled West and the moment I spotted her in the airport knew I "was in for it". As she barreled across the airport's expanse it was clear that she was in the throes of her illness and my heart throbbed with the desire to turn and run.

During the speech after the screening she fell apart onstage before a packed assembly of fawning admirers. It was a standing room only audience. In fact, they had had to schedule a second screening at the last minute, as the response had been huge. As I sat next to her lectern during her incoherent ravings I witnessed the pained looks of confusion as they swept across those faces like a small gale whipping up across the top of a sea; at first tiny ripples gliding across the surface. They were polite until the realization took shape that she was making no sense whatsoever. People began glancing at each other, whispering a little then turning to one another with more energy, politeness gone, as some began to get up and leave. Soon many were slipping out and that was followed by a mad dash for the exits. She was babbling and shouting incoherently whilst I nodded and pretended every word made perfect sense. I could not bear to betray her in public. I sat there feeling my heart melting through my chest and draining into my belly with an indescribable sick empathy. Her humiliation was unbearable as the gale whipped up to a force ten and with one last enormous surge we were left in an empty room. The second screening was cancelled.

We returned to her apartment in relative silence. I was trapped with her in an unfamiliar place. I knew not one person in Berkeley. I was afraid to sleep for fear of awakening in a deadly pool of blood with a knife in my back. She stayed awake for five days babbling, ranting and wouldn't allow me to sleep. She was seeing "little green men" and her eyes were literally rolling around in their sockets. Never have I been more alone and terrified. However, love and concern for her and any others she might harm prevented me from leaving. Unable to abandon her, I stayed and whenever possible reached out by phone to other family members/friends in far flung places such as NYC, Minnesota, Nebraska pleading for advice and help. One such conversation was with Yoko Ono, a good friend of hers, who called to check on Kate and from whom I tearfully begged advice.

Kate, herself, has written several books on this part of her life (Flying, The Loony-Bin Trip) chronicling the "oppressive" actions of our family, vilifying us for our deeply worried attempts to aid in her obvious sufferings. So I am telling no "tales out of school" as she herself has documented her own struggles with sanity although she consistently claimed, "mental illness is a myth". "Many healthy people", she said, "are driven to mental illness by society's disapproval of unconventional behavior and by the authoritarian institution of psychiatry." Really? Tell that to the families of the nineteen who suffered and died that Friday in Santa Barbara.....never mind, it's all just an illusion, a myth. Let's examine and "have conversations" about the violation of the civil rights of these nineteen innocent families. She has called me and our other sister, Sally, plus family members, cousins, etc. vicious names, demonized us, and written reams of counterfeit versions of "the truth" concerning these matters. These are published works, which rest in the Library of Congress for all time and which slander our names as people who were petty and malicious and because we "hated her politics" were trying to shut her up and lock her away. By the way, many in our family agree for the most part with her politics and so this accusation is absolutely absurd on it's face. However, she is a famous writer and thus a recipient of the immunity fame seems to bestow.

And, speaking of the affected innocent victims: later, she wrote a book about her lesbian lover at that time. Sita was the title. This woman committed suicide in response to Kate's "homage."

Our elder sister, Sally, eventually came from Nebraska to the rescue, as it was imperative I return to NY to join a European theatrical tour for which I was contracted. She managed to get some temporary care for Kate, which sufficed for the moment. Within time, our mother and a lawyer nephew managed to take Kate to court in Minnesota in order to secure her "commitment." Anyone who knows Kate Millett knows the depth of her shrewdness which she used to bring in a NY lawyer and, in her unglued state, she stood up for herself as only she can and to our great horror prevailed in that courtroom walking out, unrestrained, to spend many more years, lurching about the world to continue her damaging and irrational antics; her genius for chaos. Subsequently, she boarded a plane for Shannon, Ireland and upon arrival locked herself in the Ladies Room preventing anyone from relieving herself for twenty-four hours until the Shannon police broke down the door and committed her to an Irish psychiatric institution. She got word out to some of her Irish feminist loyalists who smuggled her out through a window and she escaped to be on the run making her way back to NYC. Many of her friends in the US were now involved and other interventions were arranged which she also managed to elude, quoting The Constitution to police and ambulance drivers. These efforts were as fruitless as Elliot Rodger's encounter with Santa Barbara police. The police are no good at this. If only they had gone into his room; looked at his weapons and his homemade videos! Who would doubt the word of desperate, caring parents about the condition of their own child?

So when it came to my attention that as a result of these adventures she and a few cohorts had concocted a new "civil rights movement" for mental patients and in her characteristic ruthlessness was determined to "liberate" NY's mental patients I was beyond appalled. God help anyone who gets in the way of Kate and her "righteous indignation" which had already spearheaded the militant Women's Liberation Movement. This was to be called, "The Psychiatric Survivors Movement."

Thus, as a result of Kate's and her pals' agitation back in the seventies psychiatric and mental health institutions were forever changed. This culminated in the depositing on the streets of NYC thousands of confused, terrified and seriously disturbed persons left to fend for themselves in the mean streets of The City. Most people were shocked but the hapless denizens of New York simply shrugged their shoulders and left these poor souls thus deposited to the whims and cruelty of teens, gangs and other bullies. We've all read the accounts of sick and helpless people being kicked about, murdered, robbed and even set on fire. Yet, due to my sister's genius for chaos creation, no one, not even the Police Department can lift a finger of mercy to help these persons because it's a "violation of their civil rights" to do so.

As they say, "As New York City goes, so goes the country." And so it was as most of America followed suit and dissembled their mental health institutions and systems.

When I hear the multiple reports of this catastrophe in Santa Barbara my heart swells with sorrow over the people whose lives have been irrevocably altered by the actions of this very sick young man and when I witness (and how I do identify with) the agony of his family who tried so very hard to obtain help for him; the vivid story of Elliot's mother going to the police passionately begging for help.

DO NOT start the usual vilifying of the NRA and the constant claptrap about guns. Half of the people Elliot Rodger killed last weekend were felled by the knife. What? You want to confiscate all knives? Or make people get permits to own a knife? Most of the people injured were hurt by his car. Shall we outlaw cars? Let's start thinking straight: Do you seriously want to blame the instrument for the actions of the user? We may as well blame the keyboard for the poison pen letter or the telephone for the obscene phone call or death threat!!! Make no mistake about it. It's not guns, not male chauvinism, not white male privilege or male rage. It was the deconstruction of the mental health system in our country achieved in the seventies and eighties by a mad little gang of meddlers led in their mischief by Kate Millett.

Stop saying the warning signs were missed. They were not missed. The Rodger family was begging, pleading for help from therapists, the police; just as did my own family, my mother, my sister, Sally, my cousins, nephews and I intervened our guts out to absolutely no avail. There is no system left in this country to deal with these traumas. This is a mental health issue and no more. We are surrounded by phony bleeding hearts who can coolly step over the sacred bodies of the wretchedly ill lying about our streets and sashay into a shop to eat a sandwich. Shame on all of you and may an huge share of the blame fall upon the shoulders of the perpetrators of this mercilessness, my sister, Kate Millett, and her fawning, ghoulish band of "liberating" acolytes. These people are the ones responsible for this chaos in our world.

Let the blame for these types of crimes lie precisely on the shoulders of persons who commit evil not upon the instruments used to do these atrocities. One properly armed citizen could have stopped Elliot Rodger in his tracks and saved several of those lost lives and limbs.

My purpose in writing this account is to beseech, to beg, to plead with the reader to put your thinking straight about these matters. Stop the hogwash about the instruments used whether they be guns, baseball bats, knives, or blunt instruments. Think straight: Behind each of these outrages is a sick, homicidal person hell-bent on destruction by any means possible. We need to be able to restrain such people. We need an effective commitment process in order to help the mentally sick and to serve those whom they will inevitably kill, harm or maim. God bless these nineteen families and may we all learn what we should have known all along: Something sane must be done with our mental health system!!

Last autumn, Kate Millett was inducted, along with Nancy Pelosi, into the National Women's Hall of Fame.

Step Your Dick Up: Why incels deserve better advice

August 2, 2020 | by William Costello | Link | Original Link

Men who can't get sex are seen as losers

We hear a lot about double standards between female and male sexual behaviour. Women who have a lot of sex are often slut shamed, while men who have lots of sex are seen as 'studs.' What is often ignored however, is how true the exact inverse of this is. Men who cannot get sex are seen as losers and lampooned as members of the most derided group in society…incels.

Meanwhile, perpetually single women are celebrated in society and we lament the lack of good men out there. Examples of this include the 2019 Psychology Today article, 'Are There Not Enough Men Worth Marrying?' and the NY Post article, 'Broke Men Are Hurting American Women's Marriage Prospects'. Not to mention the media love in for 'self partnered' Emma Watson.

However, it may well be true about the mismatch between what women want and what men are offering. This supply and demand problem is of course the difference in the way we perceive the two groups. Choosy women are not involuntary in their 'celibacy'. It seems that women have tough choices… but incels have no choices.

This essay is not so much an exploration of what we say 'about' incels, but rather what we say 'to' incels.

I aim to explore,

- Who are the incels and do they deserve such disdain?
- What is the plight of an incel?
- Why the advice given to incels is useless
- Why we simultaneously hate incels for giving up and for trying to better themselves

Who are the incels?

TOP DEFINITION

aka "involuntarily celibate", a person (usually male) who has a horrible personality and treats women like sexual objects and thinks his lack of a sex life comes from being "ugly" when its really just his blatant sexism and terrible attitude. incels have little to no self awareness; even when they see other "ugly" men with girlfriends, they consider these men to be tricksters who have somehow beat the system and can get women despite being cursed with unattractiveness (in other words, theyre respectful to women and women are attracted to their personalities, but incels cant comprehend such a phenomenon). they believe that women owe them sex, and many of the more extreme incels like to spend time in incel communities on the internet coming up with ways to make women have sex with them (often involving genocide of people of color, genocide of "Chads" (men who have sex), taking rights away from women, raping them, having sex with women's dead bodies, and other horrid, disgusting things. they cant understand that that is PRECISELY why women want nothing to do with them).

I'm pretty sure Ryan is an incel. Yesterday he made a facebook post about how all women are shallow and exist to torture men by "denying" them sex, as if sex is something people "deserve", and not a privilege given by potential sexual partners that should be respected.

This definition of incel is not one I would agree with entirely. It is however, the top definition on Urban Dictionary and highlights the way in which incels are seen in society

It's important we know who we are talking about when we use the term incel. The definition used in the image above is not one I fully subscribe to, although it is the top definition in Urban Dictionary and gives an idea of how incels are seen in society. An incel, or involuntarily celibate, is defined as someone who has not had access to sex for a sustained period of longer than six months. Going by this definition and acknowledging the fact that the number of men not having sex within the last year has increased 3 fold in the last decade, we must conclude that the majority of incels are peaceful and non-violent.

A significant minority of incels derive a sense of community spitting misogynistic vitriol online and rare individual incels have lashed out at society in horrific acts of violent rage. Media and cultural depiction tends to fixate on the latter two groups and uses them to represent all incels as misogynistic. It is important to note that while they might resent their lack of success in what they consider a somewhat superficial sexual selection system, the majority of incels do not hate women. The majority might not even define themselves as incels.

'Be Yourself' and 'Just Lift Bro'

The first incel I ever encountered in real life spoke at the 'Messages for Men' conference I attended in London in 2019. He overcame obvious crippling anxiety to speak and provide insight into his life. The most striking point for me was how he detailed a frustration at the tension between being told to simply, 'be yourself' and 'just lift bro' in order to improve himself by weightlifting.

'Just Lift Bro', I was told, is a common piece of 'magic bullet' style advice provided to incels, particularly from men within the wider 'manosphere'. It seems cruelly insufficient when we consider the number of incels who report to have physical and/or mental disabilities which might serve as significant barriers to weightlifting.

Honest commentators must acknowledge how hollow and unhelpful these platitudes truly are. Telling an incel to simply "be himself" is to gaslight him into thinking there is no problem at all or to imply that his problem is that he is being inauthentic. To tell him to 'just lift bro' might be a little more helpful, in that a lot can potentially be helped through self-development, however, the blaséness and dismissiveness with which incels are told to 'just lift' is demeaning to the significance and complexity of the challenge they face.

The dating economy is increasingly moving online and a recent study of Tinder found that, "the bottom 80% of men (in terms of attractiveness) are competing for the bottom 22% of women and the top 78% of women are competing for the top 20% of men".

Crudely put, the modern dating economy closer resembles polygyny, with the most high-status men having a 'monopoly' on the majority of women. The majority of men are simply not being considered.

Why do we hate incels?

James Bloodworth's insightful article, "Why Incels are the Losers in the age of Tinder", describes the way in which men and women uniquely hold disdain for incels.

> …we still judge people by how much sex they have, or not in this case. We still view men who don't have sex as failures in some way…For men, calling someone an Incel implies something positive — a certain sexual abundance — about one's own existence. For women it has begun to function as a putdown that ruthlessly dismisses unworthy suitors while simultaneously expelling them from the community of the good as misogynistic and creepy.

It's obvious why society hates the misogynistic online abuse and the violence but why do we hate the majority of incels…simply for giving up?

Incels have taken the decision to check out of a mating market in which they see the cost of courtship as being too high, both financially and emotionally. They are increasingly retreating to virtual worlds of pornography and online communities as shelter from what they see as a culture that rejects them. Sociologist Frank Furedi explores how,

> …the status of moral inferiority conferred on men, encourages a defensive and anxious approach towards dealing with women. Feminism and the ascendancy of the #MeToo movement serve as constant reminders of the inferiority of male identity.

When so much of male identity is wrapped up in the idea of competency and agency, the incel admission of incompetence is jarring to us as a society and we find it repugnant.

What do we want incels to do? Keep trying and being rejected…or give up? It seems the answer is neither.

It's not all about looks you know

Every time I discuss incels with any semblance of sympathy, I am met with a chorus of, ''boo hoo, woe is me, poor men, they're not entitled to sex or women you know!".

This is of course true.

I am not and have never at any point suggested that women should be made lower their standards to reduce the plight of the incel.

However, the erosion of societally enforced monogamy coupled with the fact that women are rapidly outpacing men in education, yet still seeking highly educated partners, has significantly exasperated matters on this front.

However, to have sympathy for incels does not equate to advocating women be 'given to them' as their entitlement.

It's important that mainstream society gives incels a more appealing message than we have been giving. To dismiss them runs the risk of resigning them to the basements of internet communities, to fester in resentment and disenfranchisement as potential ticking timebombs.

However, let's look at some of the messages we send to incels.

Incels are often told that 'it's not all about looks' and that some women go for personality. This is despite the fact that statistics show that men's looks matter far more to the fairer sex and far more than they'd care to admit.

Feminist writer, Louise Perry, who is currently engaging in an extremely productive letter exchange exploration of the modern dating economy with aforementioned James Bloodworth, had this to say on the looks vs personality dichotomy,

> The dating market is highly competitive, hierarchical, and often cruel. This fact is uncomfortable for anyone who values egalitarianism, so a more appealing — albeit dishonest — option is to instead blame Incels for their plight by suggesting that their unpleasant personalities must be the problem.

To make the argument that 'it's not all about looks' is to make the assumption that if you don't have good looks, you can simply compensate with a sparkling personality. I'm routinely provided with anecdotal evidence for such a phenomenon. However, what constitutes a sparkling personality can be very much dependent on what a man looks like and there is often a minimum level of attractiveness to be reached before personality and other traits are even considered.

Dr. Francesca Minerva, a bio-ethisist at Warwick University, explores the fascinating ways in which an underexplored type of discrimination, 'Lookism', translates into discrimination in other facets of life. Lookism impacts on areas that we might not intuitively think dependent on physical attractiveness, such as professional success, perception of intelligence and even morality.

Lookism filters out to other facets of life

Bloodworth explores more difficulties encountered by incels in regard to 'it's not all about looks'.

> ...in the world of online dating, which is how 40% of couples in the United States meet, looks, height and social status are usually pre-requisites for matching with someone at all. Offline, many Incels lack the basic social skills required to navigate relations with the opposite sex. According to an internal poll carried out on the website Incels.co, 26% of users of the forum said they had some form of autism. Flirting, which requires an innate understanding of nuanced sub-communications and unspoken sexual tension, does not come naturally to these men.

When I bring this up with friends, I receive a volley of potential qualities that incels could and should conjure up so that they may compete in the mating market. It seems that it is difficult for us to imagine a man who is objectively lacking in every aspect that might be important to a woman when considering a mate. We also neglect to acknowledge how many of these are immutable and difficult or impossible to do anything about.

Keep trying: There’s someone out there for everyone

The next piece of advice given to incels is to ‘keep trying’ and that ‘there’s someone out there for everyone’.

Why do we insist that men must persist in a world where 90% of romantic advances are expected to be made by men. Evolutionary speaking, it can be argued that women are born with inherent value, in that they are likely to one day have children, whereas men need to demonstrate value in order to be sexually selected for.

Why do we want them to continue to run this gauntlet? Why do we want them to continually pick themselves up and try again, only to endure humiliating rejection after rejection after each clumsy attempt?

In a world with antiquated views about who should pay on dates, how much money should a man have to spend fruitlessly on courtship before it's ok to stop?

The notion that 'there's someone out there for everyone' also seems oddly sexist towards women. If you just keep looking there'll be a woman with low enough standards for you.

What do we as a society get out of this ritual that causes so much pain?

I feel that the pain of this ordeal is downplayed by society, despite studies showing that physical pain and social pain (rejection, exclusion, ostracism) activate the same regions of the brain. Modern day progressives will happily tell you that "words are violence" but will most likely scoff at this notion of pain. I feel this dismissiveness is due to how acutely aimed at men most sexual rejection is and an example of an empathy gap. The reason my girlfriend can scoff at this type of pain is because she genuinely can't relate to it. She has literally never been rejected. In terms of romantic options, she lives in a blissfully ignorant state of abundance.

The veil of ignorance

We are all vulnerable romantically and socially. We all face rejection and hurt in romance and relationship. Scorning incels is a projection of our own insecurities and fears. If it wasn't for random luck, we too could be alone. Those of you who are willing to reflect and consider the ways in which we discriminate and have attractiveness privilege, I strongly suggest listening to Jay Shapiro's podcast on 'Lookism' with Dr. Franca Minerva. Shapiro takes the listener through the 'veil of ignorance' thought experiment in the context of attractiveness. The "veil of ignorance" is a method of determining the morality of issues.

It asks a decision-maker to make a choice about a social or moral issue and assumes that they have enough information to know the consequences of their possible decisions for everyone but would not know, or would not take into account, which person they are. The thought experiment illuminates how unfair yet philosophically difficult the conundrum of lookism is.

The veil of ignorance thought experiment can be applied to create empathy to those less attractive/fortunate

Step your dick up

In discussions about this topic with friends, one of the cruellest and most galling pieces of 'advice' that I have heard put to incels is that they should 'step their dick up', i.e. improve themselves to a standard at which women will consider them.

If we can move past the glaring double standard and the fact that an 'unlucky in love' woman would never be told to 'step her pussy up' to earn male attention, how much do we really think can be mitigated through self improvement?

Certain aspects can be improved upon by acquiring skills e.g. fashion sense can be improved upon. Manopshpere fashion blog and Twitter account @WellBuiltStyle is a pragmatic example of practical fashion advice that will help struggling men present themselves in a more favourable light.

Social skills to some extent can be learned, primarily by overcoming shyness to reveal a truly interesting personality. This does require a 'putting yourself out there' that can be gruelling for socially anxious young men and a 'trial and error' learning curve that will lead to all sorts of discomfort for women, who will have to endure many inept attempts at approaching them.

However, we must recognise the uncomfortable and ugly truth of how much of attraction is based on the immutable. One of the most common 'deal breakers' for women is a man's height, which no amount of Cuban heels can mitigate.

Research from the online dating website AYI.com found that, every inch increase in a man's height directly correlated to his likelihood of being contacted by a woman. The study showed that 6ft men were 33% more likely to be contacted than a man of average height (5ft 7in), and 77% more likely to be contacted than a man under 5ft 4in. A different study about height and human mate choice found that, on average, the shortest man a woman would date is 5 feet 9 inches tall (2 inches taller than the average man) and the same study shows that 23% of men compared to only 4% of women would accept a dating relationship where the woman was taller (the average woman is 5ft 3in)

Develop yourself…but not like that

There happens to be a whole 'industry' devoted towards helping men develop themselves to be more successful with women. However, the 'pick up artist' industry, which coaches men how to 'game the system', is sneered at as superficial and sinister. Pick up artists are dismissed as teaching men how to 'trick' women into considering them. I find this criticism quite demeaning to women in that it suggests they are not discerning enough to know when they are being 'tricked' . Most women are of course robust enough to see through many pick-up artist techniques. They are considered trite and cheesy in the modern dating arena.

However, one can imagine the exasperation of an incel who finds himself being held in scorn for his immutable incompetence and simultaneously being scolded for trying to 'game the system'.

Is our distaste for the hollowness of pick up artist pageantry an expression of an internal recognition at how superficial our sexual selection process is? Are we hating the game by resenting the weakest players?

From an evolutionary perspective, it's female sexual selection that has kept this whole show on the road for our evolved history. Do we dare trifle with it?

I say yes.

Primarily because I am not a nihilist. I believe that much can be done to bridge the supply and demand chasm that exists between what women want and what men are offering.

We will need a more sophisticated and likely uncomfortable conversation than we are currently having. That conversation will need to grapple with uncomfortable issues like the tension between women's success in the workplace and hypergamy. We will need to reframe the value of traditional masculinity, which has been culturally demeaned.

The conversation will need men moving beyond defining their self-worth through sexual success expressed as the denigration of 'beta incels'.

It will take women moving past absconding and obvious slogans like 'incels are not entitled to anything' and perhaps even considering coaching hapless but well meaning men on how to better succeed.

Inceldom needs reckoning with and I think we can do a lot better than to continually use the most extreme caricatures to trivialise incels.

It's in all our interests to give better advice to incels than to simply 'be yourself' or 'step your dick up'.

Intersectional Virtue Signaling For Fun And Profit

August 2, 2020 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

> Signs signs
> Everywhere there's signs
> Fucking up the scenery
> Breaking my mind
> - The Five Man Electric Band, 1970

With fan-free sporting events, and bars, movie theaters, and museums closed, entertaining oneself can be a problem these days. Home entertainment is OK up to a point…that point being cabin fever.

A good way to pass the time is to take a walk. I don't mean a stroll around the block with the dog or the toddler, I mean a good 5K+ hike beyond your neighborhood. It's good for you, if not undertaken in the heat of the day, and it's free. They say the best things in life are free! Of course, another adage says you get what you pay for. Go figure.

At any rate, you are definitely getting exercise, and you don't have to pony up for a treadmill or a gym membership. You can enjoy the natural world as well as the manmade world providing kaleidoscopic visual stimuli with every step. Unfortunately, visual pollution is a reality in many urban neighborhoods.

The most widespread irritant in my neighborhood is the yard sign. I don't mean the "FOR SALE" sign or the occasional sign that a contractor puts on a front lawn when a house is getting a new roof or driveway. I refer to the political signs.

One election ends and another campaign begins. It seems as though there's never a time of year totally free of political signs. Aside from the predictable quadrennial blitz of Presidential elections, I see signs for state, county, and city officeholders and wannabes…runoffs, primaries…some are hack politicians of long standing, some are total strangers. Politicians pay big bucks to advertise on TV, so why would anyone grant them free advertising on one's front lawn? Unless of course said politician has done you a favor, and the sign is a form of reciprocity.

The signs used to disappear immediately after elections, but more recently I've noticed some people keep failed candidates' signs up for weeks, even months, as if to say, my candidate should have won and your candidate didn't deserve to win. My candidate is still better than your candidate, and I'm leaving my sign up even though the election is over. So there!

But now there is something new in political advertising on the home front. It's not urging you to vote for any specific candidates in any specific races, but it is about as political as a yard sign can get. The multi-colored sign reads thusly:

> In This House We Believe:
> Black Lives Matter
> Women's Rights Are Human Rights
> No Human Being Is Illegal
> Science is Real > Love Is Love
> Kindness Is Everything

Well, they may have left out a woke cause or two but there's only so much you can fit on a yard sign. As it is, the sign is already bursting with text.

One-stop sloganeering is certainly efficient. And it minimizes your carbon footprint! Why put up six signs when you can convey a composite message on one? Of the aforementioned sentiments (let's call them the Sacred Six-Pack), the only one I've ever seen as a solo sign is "Black Lives Matter." These days that is the definite gold standard among slogan slingers, beloved of activists, politicians, athletes, corporations, Marxists, Hollywood grandstanders, limousine liberals, and sundry other tribes.

The other five slogans are not nearly so widespread as "Black Lives Matter," but all six masquerade as conclusions when they should be talking points. They should be the starting line, not the finish line. In fact, they raise more questions than they answer.

Black Lives Matter – These three words seem to have supplanted "We shall overcome." The phrase has been sanctified by the media to the point where it is now gospel. You've seen the vilification that results when some hapless humanist asserts that all lives matter. Of course, the wokest environmentalists think non-human life is just as precious as human life. So the question you have to ask yourself is…if you saw a man and a polar bear in distress and only had time to save one, which one would you save? Then again, what do we mean by "matter"? In a cosmic sense, everything matters. But what about socially? On George Orwell's Animal Farm, some animals were more equal than others. Can we paraphrase that and say that all races matter but some races matter more than others?

Women's Rights Are Human Rights – Well, we've dealt with this one before on this web site. What are women's rights? How do they differ from men's rights? Do men have rights that women don't? Are men's rights human rights? Are men even human? If so, do they have inhuman rights? At least as many as a polar bear?

No Human Being Is Illegal – If he stays in the country of his birth, I couldn't agree more. Unfortunately, I don't know any country that allows foreigners to just jaywalk across the border (suggested alternate slogan: No Human Being Is Foreign…Even if He Looks, Speaks, and Dresses Funny). Needless to say, illegals are not a problem in countries where no one wants to live. Consequently, it is possibly true that no human being is illegal in Bangladesh.

Science is Real – Science is a process, an abstraction. It is not real in a tangible sense, but many of the things we have learned from the scientific process have had effects on the real world, for better or worse. In the past, science has gotten many things wrong, but if the scientific process is working properly it should be self-correcting as new data accrue. But sometimes the process is corrupted. How? First of all, follow the money. How much is that research grant and who is paying for it? Second, consider how politics now pervades every aspect of society, and ask yourself if science is above the fray. For example, thanks to the scientific process, we know far more than we ever did about the differences between male and female brains, physiology, and psychology…but if you're an honest scientist spreading the news, it's kill-the-messenger time. (Maybe we should update that time-honored phrase to dox the messenger.)

Love Is Love – Gertrude Stein – who famously proclaimed that a rose is a rose is a rose – would doubtless agree. In truth, how could anyone disagree? But why bother to state the obvious? Is "Love Is Love" a mere tautology or is it some sort of philosophical palindrome? No, it's a movement (Google it and read up on it) in favor of every conceivable kind of relationship between consenting adults. If you are a couple of suburban heterosexuals in a monogamous relationship, however, you will probably feel like the loneliest couple since Adam and Eve. Polymorphous perversity, you've come a long way since Freud discovered you.

Kindness Is Everything – No, it isn't everything, but it is something. Certainly preferable to meanness. But what about kindness devoid of intelligence…or discernment…or common sense? More importantly, what do you do when kindness won't cut it? When dealing with swine, do you cast your pearls before them (Jesus, of all people – Mr. Turn the Other Cheek – advised against it), or hit the No More Mr. Nice Guy button?

Given the sermonizing tone of the slogans, one might suspect that this six-fold creed was originally chiseled in stone and some modern-day lawgiver from the Oregon Chapter of the Church of Latter Day Insurrectionists escorted the holy tablets down the slopes of Mt. Hood to enlighten the great unwashed of Portlandia. No burning bush in Portland these days, unless there was some collateral damage after the arsonists did their thing.

I haven't taken a survey, but I have no doubt that Sacred Six-Pack signs are more popular in "progressive" cities like Portland. In less enlightened cities, they would be visible only in "progressive" neighborhoods. I would not characterize my hometown as overly progressive, but it is trendy. If it's trending, sooner or later the locals will climb on the bandwagon with the cool kids.

Numerous long walks in all directions from my house have taken me through various neighborhoods where progressive signage is very much in evidence. In fact, the higher the income level of the neighborhood, the more likely the signs are to appear. One can't help but wonder if they aren't some sort of status symbol… the homeowners' way of saying they have a social conscience to go along with the Lexus and the BMW in the driveway.

I see the highest percentage of Sacred Six-Pack signs in a postwar neighborhood of large ranch homes on large lots, pleasingly graded and shaded, affluent and established. The next most popular venue is a historic district, where the neighborhood was laid out more than 100 years ago. The lots are smaller and the homes are older, but there are no cheap digs anywhere in this neighborhood. You might find a fixer-upper, but by the time you've fixed it up to comply with the historic district codes, you will be out plenty. I suspect some of the homeowners, though they may be sympathizers, hesitate to put a sign on their front lawns because it would clash with the overall vibe of the neighborhood. A Sacred Six-Pack sign in front of a home built during the administration of William Howard Taft just doesn't look right.

On my street of modest middle class houses, the signs are rare. Notably, in the working-class neighborhoods a few blocks away, the Sacred Six-Pack is nowhere to be found. It appears the workers of the world have taken a back seat in the struggle for social justice. What would the Wobblies think?

Oh, it's still acceptable to exhibit some concern for working folks, but it doesn't quite mesh with identity politics since workers come in all ethnicities and both sexes. Under identity politics, blacks, browns, women, immigrants, and the sexually ambiguous/adventurous sit at the front of the bus while the workers sit towards the back…closer to the rear exit should it become necessary to kick them to the curb.

Truth to tell, a lot of working class folks are socially conservative. So it is no surprise that working stiffs do not display the Sacred Six-Pack. To do so would only invite ridicule from their salt-of-the-earthy neighbors. No rainbow flags either! Hard to believe in this enlightened day and age, but in some working class neighborhoods, it's still OK to tell gay jokes!

I couldn't help but wonder what's behind all this mass-produced virtue signaling, and a little internet research has revealed that the Sacred Six-Pack sign was started by one Rose Morin of Albuquerque. She is with the Albuquerque Center for Peace and Justice (or just the P&J for those in the loop). Apparently, this is just one of a number of groups in the social justice matrix in Albuquerque; in the aggregate they are known as PAJOLA (Peace and Justice Organizations Linking Arms). Sounds more like something you'd buy in a health food store, but it is pronounceable, and that's always a plus when it comes to acronyms.

If what I've written about the signs has whetted your appetite, rest assured you can order them on line. They are available at populist – pardon me, popular – prices. Some of the signs offer slightly different text (e.g., Immigrants and Refugees Welcome, or Women Are in Charge of Their Bodies), but they are basically variations on the same themes. Prices range from $4.99 to $39.99. If you prefer, you can get a banner instead of a yard sign. Just Google "In this house we believe," take your pick, and place your order. Personally, if I were manufacturing the signs, I would market not a rectangular but a trapezoidal sign…you know, left-leaning?

Believe it or not, you can get a right-leaning (albeit rectangular) sign that reads: Health Care Is a Choice, All Lives Matter, Fetal Rights Are Human Rights, Immigration Is a Privilege, Real Science Is Never Settled, and God Is Love. Unless you live in one of the more remote realms of flyover country, I do not recommend you buy this sign. Otherwise, it's likely a waste of money. If you put the sign in your front yard, there's a good chance it won't be there long. And if the "Love Is Love" crowd is feeling especially frisky, you could end up with trash dumped on your lawn, slashed tires, or smashed windows.

Actually, this brings into focus the practicality of having a Sacred Six-Pack sign on your property. Hell, it might even save your life one day. Consider the plight of the ancient Hebrews in Egypt.

In the Book of Exodus Egypt was suffering from a series of plagues during Moses' heyday. The tenth plague featured Yahweh going door to door and killing all the first-born sons. The captive Hebrews, however, put a splotch of lamb's blood above their doors so God would pass over them – hence the Jewish holiday on your calendar every spring even unto this day some 3,000 or so years later, and so memorably portrayed in The Ten Commandments by Cecil B. DeMille.

Today a Sacred Six-Pack sign conspicuously displayed on your property could save you some grief in case of an uprising of biblical proportions. In fact, I wouldn't be at all surprised if insurance companies don't start offering reduced premiums to homes and stores that adopt this strategy.

Returning home after a long hike, I must admit that my front yard is pretty blah. I need to do something about that, but the Sacred Six-Pack isn't my cup of tea.

Anybody know where I can get a good deal on some pink flamingos?

Now’s the time to redouble our efforts

August 4, 2020 | by Gary Costanza | Link | Original Link

As you all know, Marc Angelucci was murdered a short time ago by a demented person who also killed one other person, wounded another, then killed himself. We’ve lost such a dedicated and hard-working MRA which makes me feel that we must redouble all of our efforts just to make up for this terrible loss.

Let’s honor him by following in his footsteps and continue the progress of equal rights for all, in particular the fight against male genital mutilation (MGM), aka circumcision.

He was one of the original Bloodstained Men, was on the board of Attorneys for the Rights of the Child, and fought against infant genital cutting on many different fronts.

Recently I got an email about Intaction‘s new initiative called Intact PAC and immediately gave $50. Losing Marc makes it imperative that we all step up our game in this quest for equal human rights, and frankly, stopping MGM is a no-brainer and the lowest hanging fruit.

Some of you – even some MRAs – may not agree with the banning of routine circumcision of babies, but the whole point is IT’S NOT YOUR PENIS.

Reducing or eliminating circumcision will:

- save lives
- retain men’s and their partner’s normal sexual function and pleasure
- eliminate trauma, pain, and disfigurement of normal, healthy babies
- ensure all persons the right to bodily autonomy and protection from unnecessary harm and abuse

Honor Marc by being better, doing better, and winning. Here are some ideas;

- donate to AVFM, NCFM, ARCLAW, Bloodstained Men, Intaction, Intact PAC, Intact America, etc.
- write letters to the editor, call radio stations, write articles and op-eds
- speak out about infant genital cutting (including inter-sexed babies) in your own YouTube videos
- Protest with The Bloodstained Men or on your own with signs out in public and record it for YouTube
- research circumcision and express to family and friends what you know and believe about circumcision

Make Marc proud by continuing his legacy of activism to promote the rights of all.

Feminists desperately wish COVID-19 affected women worse than men

August 4, 2020 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

The following article and video authored by Greta Aurora:

It would be very convenient for feminists if more women died from COVID-19 than men. However, the average gender split is approximately 60% male and 40% female deaths worldwide, according to Global Health 50/50.

Instead of highlighting men's increased risk of death after contracting the virus, journalists and researchers blinded by the feminist ideology believe the real issue is a lack of female academics studying the disease. Although, to be fair, they also focus on other shocking problems, such as mothers spending more time with their children due to lockdown and women finding it hard to stay positive during the pandemic.

Men are generally more susceptible to respiratory illnesses. There are various theories as to why this is the case. For instance, many of the genes on the X chromosome help enhance immune responses, and these genes may be active on both X chromosomes in women. There's also evidence the female sex hormone oestrogen plays a role in the immune response to respiratory illnesses.

Regardless of the exact biological explanation for this phenomenon, it makes sense that women have stronger immune systems from an evolutionary perspective. In the past, women who were more resistant to infectious diseases were at lesser risk of dying during pregnancy and childbirth, and therefore more likely to reproduce.

If the opposite were the case, and, for example, the Y chromosome contained some crucial immune genes, feminists would be blaming the patriarchy and scientists for failing to find a way to boost their natural resistance to viruses. The Guardian would be full of articles proclaiming that biology itself was misogynistic.

Since men are the ones dying in larger numbers due to COVID-19, it's a little more difficult for feminists to play the victim. However, it's clearly not impossible!

International Conference on Men’s Issues (2020) – website and promotional video, your invitation to be a speaker

August 8, 2020 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

We’re very pleased to announce details of ICMI20, a virtual conference. We plan to publish 120 videos between midday 14 November and midday 19 November (International Men’s Day), Sydney time, because the event was planned for Sydney before the COVID-19 pandemic. The videos will be launched on the hour, every hour.

The conference website is here. The confirmed speaker list is here and we’ll be updating it weekly between now and the conference.

Tom Caulfield, our Technical Director, has created a wonderful promotional video (20:11). Don’t miss it.

ICMI20 has two key innovations, in addition to featuring the largest number of speakers of any event in the series. It’s the first “virtual” ICMI, and the first ICMI in which we’re inviting people with an interest in gender matters (other than feminists, obviously) to submit videos. More details of that opportunity here, you’ll need to provide us with some initial details no later than 31 August, little more than three weeks from now. We look forward to hearing from you.

August 10, 2020 | by Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. | Link | Original Link

Back in 1964 Eric Bern, a psychologist, wrote a book called Games People Play, launching a new way of looking at people. The book described an array of methods that people use to manipulate other people in order to get what they want from them—or methods of defending against assumed threats. Berne extended Sigmund Freud's original list of neurotic defense mechanisms and gave the games catchy names.

Over the years, radical feminists have devised their own methods of manipulating men. Below are five of these feminist games.

Oh My God! This game is a variation of guilt-tripping, but to a markedly dramatic level. In this game a feminist reacts to something that a man (or a non-feminist woman) says or does by crying out or screaming out or moaning out, "Oh my God!" in a voice that suggests that this person has just said or done the most evil and dangerous and disgusting and terrifying thing that any human or baboon or grasshopper could ever do in the history of this planet. The feminist may swoon or faint or in other way suggest that her very life is in danger because of this totally evil and threatening behavior.

Example: A man presents a paper at a psychology conference on "The Feminist Myth of Sexual Abuse," criticizing feminist writings for suggesting that there is an epidemic of male sexual abuse of women. In the middle of the presentation, a woman in the audience stands up and begins to cry out very loudly. "Oh my God! I was raped a few years ago and I still have nightmares about it. Don't tell me sexual abuse doesn't exist! I can't believe this! I've had a lived experience! Oh my God! Oh my God!" She falls back in her chair in tears. People come to her aid and the presentation is stopped.

Goal: This game is intended to shut down anybody who says or does anything that a feminist disagrees with, and it usually works, as it did in the above example.

Got You! This is one of Eric Bern's original games, and it is a variation and extension of "Oh My God!" Feminists keep their enemies (straight white males) under scrutiny and are on the lookout to catch them if they say anything politically incorrect. If a man refers to a group of women as "guys," the feminist comes down on this man and in a horrified voice lets him know that he has just insulted all women. Then she goes a step further and demands an apology for this indiscretion. In effect, she has acted out a "Got you, you son of a bitch!" and demanded retribution.

Example: A man uses his Twitter account to tweet that "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl!" in an attempt to express his admiration of a pop singer. This tweet is immediately followed by a storm of offended tweeters who say things like, "What a sexist!" and "How can somebody in this day and age say such a thing?" and "That right, let's all characterize grown women as little girls, that will assuage our inner sexists!" and "He needs to apologize to all women for this disgusting rant." The man quickly tweets his apology and says he didn't mean it at all.

Goal: This game, like all Feminist games, is designed not to resolve the issue or encourage peace and harmony between men and women, but rather to humiliate the man and keep women in the power position.

Mock You! In this game, instead of crying out loud, the feminist mocks a man who says something that she disagrees with. A man may say that "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl!" and all the feminists in the room will roll their eyes and shake their heads and mock the man with nasty tones and laughs. "Bonnie Brown is a hell of a girl, yes she is!" The man will be shamed by the mockery.

Example: A man says in a round-table discussion, that there are not as many women scientists as men scientists. The women in the room all look at each other and begin to laugh. It starts with a moderate laugh but ends up with them almost falling on the floor. Finally, one of the feminists leans over, puts her arm around him as if he is a little boy, and says, "It's all right, we understand how insecure intelligent women must make a little boy like you feel. There, there."

Goal: This game is once again to humiliate the man who committed the infraction. It will not bring unity between men and women, but will instead increase the divide, which is what feminists want.

Feminist Law! This game has developed over the years, as feminists have come up with "divine statistics" or "divine laws". The game is in two parts. In the first part, feminists repeat certain slogans in loud, authoritarian tones of voice so often and in so many places that they seem like they were decreed by a higher authority. A phrase such as "one in five college women are raped" will be stated in solemn and rigid tones by government officials, Senators, UN officials, and college professors (all part of the feminist mob). These authoritarian tones invariably provoke a counterreaction by someone who has studied these statistics and knows they are skewed. This leads the second part of the game. The moment the critic speaks up, the feminist lets him know with words or with a stare, that he is a hopeless sexist who doesn't get it.

Example: A Senator announces a new bill that allows woman to castrate any man of her choosing if she suspects that he wants to rape her, adding, "One in five college women will be raped this year and every year, and we must do something to stop this epidemic!" One timid reporter says, "Shouldn't that statistic be one in 35?" The Senator shakes her head, rolls her eyes, and replies, "That's just the kind of remark a sexist would make."

Goal: This game is to twist statistics around in order to prove that feminists are right and men are wrong and then pounce on anyone who tries to oppose these statistics. The ultimate goal is again to boost women into the power seat.

Bait and Switch. In this game feminists pretend to listen to a man who disagrees with them, only to lure him in and then, at the last minute, zing him. They typically overhear a man say something against feminism and they quickly approach him and, in a super friendly voice, ask him a mild question: "So you think feminists are wrong? That's interesting. Why do you think that?" The man, thinking he has at last met an open-minded woman, gratefully begins to express his critical views of feminism and the feminist pretends to be oh so interested. Then, suddenly, at the last moment, she changes her tone. She speaks to him as though he is a little boy, completely dismissing his comments.

Example: A feminist gives a talk and at the end of it, she asks for comments from the audience. A young white male goes to the microphone and says, “If you don’t mind, I have some criticisms of feminism.” The woman smiles broadly and motions for him to come closer to the stage. “Of course I don’t mind! Step forward and please tell me your criticisms, sir. I really want to know.” The man barely has the courage to quibble for a moment with some little aspect of feminist thought. The feminists smiles brightly and listens carefully. Then, when he is done, she pounces in a condescending voice, as if talking to the most backward man. “It’s amazing to find someone who is till so asleep. I do hope someday you grow up and learn to overcome your fear of strong women.” This is met by raucous applause and the man is thoroughly humiliated.

Goal: The goal is to lure the man in and tease him into thinking that he is going to be listened to with compassion, and then to give him the big knock down, thus terrorizing him and all men.

Losses from circumcision: it removes many critical components of male sexual anatomy

Seldom is heard an encouraging word

You might have noticed that one of the skirmishes in the culture war is being fought at John Wayne Airport (JWA) in Orange County, California. Typically, when one name is erased a more contemporary name is put forth, but in this case, local politicians are pushing to reinstate the original name of Orange County Airport. The current name dates from 1979, the year John Wayne died. He was a longtime resident of Orange County (specifically Newport Beach), docked his boat there, and is buried there.

Also on the chopping block is a 9' foot statue of Wayne in western attire. Situated inside the terminal building, the statue is safe from vandals and iconoclasts as airport cops and TSA personnel would more than likely swoop down on any miscreants before they got very far. An airport is no place for berserkers.

Of course, the John Wayne internet movie database has not changed in the 41 years since his death, but Orange County has. Once a Republican stronghold with a sizable contingent of John Birch Society chapters, changing demographics have now put the county solidly in the Democratic column and the local pols (an apt abbreviation for politicians or poltroons) are flexing their muscles. Wayne's conservative views were never a secret, and some controversial comments he made in a 1971 interview are still raising hackles among the perpetually oppressed and offended.

Erasing John Wayne's presence from the airport in Orange County has obvious political symbolism, but it goes beyond that. Wayne was a major figure in popular culture, particularly in western movies. So by deep-sixing Wayne, the Orange County pols are not just repudiating his politics but also his westerns, and by extension all westerns, a genre near and dear to moviegoers — men more than women – for generations.

The west appealed to the male imagination long before movies were invented. Dime novels, exploiting the west while it was still wild, thrilled throngs of city boys and farm boys. When the movies came along, westerns were a natural. The first narrative film is generally considered to be The Great Train Robbery, a 1903 western. Cowboy stars (Tom Mix, Broncho Billy Anderson, William S. Hart, et al) were an integral part of the silent era. In those days a number of famous westerners were still alive and sometimes played bit parts or served as technical advisers (notably Wyatt Earp, who didn't bite the dust till 1929). Some cowpunchers and rodeo performers found their skills were in demand as stuntmen, bit players, or extras; a few, such as Ben Johnson, went on to bigger and better roles.

When sound came in, audiences were treated to singing cowboys. Serials and low-budget double features were regular western fare at the nation's movie theaters during the 1930s. Wayne himself emerged from B-movie purgatory to star in Stagecoach (1939), a watershed western that boosted oaters (as Variety used to call westerns) a few rungs higher on the ladder of respectability.

Presented with good scripts, A-list directors no longer hesitated to helm westerns, and some (Howard Hawks, John Ford, Anthony Mann) did their best work in the genre. Until recent years, one would be hard-pressed to name a leading man who had never appeared in a western. Around 1960 one even heard the phrase "adult western" tossed around every now and then. The genre was open-ended enough to provide a vehicle for any number of themes, fables, and allegories.

Even movie critics took note, and any number of books were written about the genre, the movies, and the filmmakers. These were not just coffee table picture books but scholarly tomes written by film professors and published by university presses.

Since the United States started on the east coast of North America and spread westward, the western became an unofficial national mythology. Of course, westerns were never intended to be 100% historically accurate but they were historically based. Aside from the occasional film that takes place in the modern west, every western is a period piece. In this regard, the western is a unique genre. Gangster movies and horror movies may or may not be contemporary, romcoms always are, and science fiction extrapolates the future from the present.

While the West was peculiar to America, it clearly struck a nerve in the Old World. To many a foreign audience, the image of America they saw in westerns was America. Some countries, notably Italy, produced their own westerns, mostly in southern Spain, a suitable stand-in for the American Southwest. Westerns were even made in Israel!

B westerns yielded to A westerns at the movie theaters, but during the late 1950s they took over network television. Westerns were so popular on the tube that at one point 30 western series were on prime time in one season. During one ratings period in 1959, eight of the top ten shows were westerns. Juvenile buckaroos with blazing cap pistols moseyed all over suburbia. In fact, I was one of them. I have the faded snapshots to prove it. Sad to admit, but I was all hat and no cattle.

During that stellar year of 1959, one of the shows that debuted was Rawhide, which introduced Clint Eastwood to TV audiences. Of course, he graduated to movie westerns and became a major star and later a director. Yet despite his megastar status in western movies, it's been 28 years since he played a pistolero (The Unforgiven). Kevin Costner has tried his hand at a few, but his last western was Open Range in 2003. I can't remember the last time I saw a western in a theater, and there are no western movie stars today. Sadly, it appears the western has finally been consigned to Boot Hill.

So the possible renaming of John Wayne Airport and the removal of his statute are symbolic of the current cinematic state of affairs. Of course, there are a lot of reasons why westerns present a problem to contemporary audiences. In fact, those reasons match up pretty well with the various complaints coming from the woke wing of the political spectrum. Let's tick them off one by one.

John Wayne was the personification of the alpha male. Unlike a lot of movie actors, he was just as big as he appeared on screen (I met him once and can vouch for his listed height of 6'4"). He generally played loud, opinionated, assertive men. In short, he was too uncomfortably masculine for today's nanny statesmen. Horror of horrors, his airport statue depicts him wearing a holster – with a gun in it! And he probably doesn't have a permit!

Smaller men than Wayne carved out lengthy careers in westerns. The genre is male-oriented because the west was male-oriented. Oh, to be sure, there was a small ladies' auxiliary of petty criminals (Belle Starr was far more formidable in dime novels than in real life) and cowgirls (Annie Oakley). Occasionally, a movie would feature a dominant dame (the baddest queen bee was Barbara Stanwyck, star of Forty Guns, The Maverick Queen, Cattle Queen of Montana, as well as The Big Valley TV series). Johnny Guitar, a 1954 offering starring Joan Crawford and Mercedes McCambridge, has since become notorious for its lesbian subtext, among other quirks. Nevertheless, it has been inducted into the National Film Registry along with The Great Train Robbery, Stagecoach and other classic westerns.

For the most part, the western puts women in two categories: wife or whore (Stagecoach, though an exceptional movie, is no exception in this regard). Woke movie critics would doubtless say the duality is systemic. In truth, it is built into the genre because it is built into history. Men were the trail bosses of westward movement and the women were largely camp followers (pretty much true of nomadic Indian tribes too, come to think of it). But before egalitarianism became a national obsession, western movie lovers never had to apologize for it.

Then there is the matter of violence. You can't have a western without gunplay. Well, you can, e.g., Four Faces West, a 1948 opus in which absolutely no firearms were discharged. No fistfights either. No toxic masculinity or anger management problems whatsoever! It flopped at the box office.

Guns, however, are a problem these days and not just because they fall into the category of things men like. Though firearms have been around for 600 years or so, the very thought of them turns otherwise rational people into jellyfish. God forbid a small boy should point his finger like the barrel of a gun and shout “Bang! Bang!” at recess. Intervention is assured. Boys will not be boys in modern public schools. Of course, if they want to be girls, the administration will be happy to assist them in their transition.

Another thing men like is steak. Of course, to have steaks, we must have cattle. And cattle are a major presence in a lot of westerns, thus indirectly glorifying red meat and the clown-shoe carbon footprints required to produce it. The killing and eating of wild game was also an integral part of life in the west, though I don’t think that’s what people mean today by living off the land. Of course, when the Indians did it, that was OK.

And that brings us to the indigenous people problem. Call them Indians, Amerinds, Native Americans, or whatever, their continent was taken over by the white man. There’s no way to put a happy face on it. The Indians were outnumbered and outgunned. They never had a chance. Call the white man a conqueror or call him a cancer; under his aegis, the Indian way of life was no longer sustainable.

The Indian is not the only dispossessed minority in the western, though he is the most sentimentalized. The case of the Mexican is a little trickier. Some of his dispossession was due to a war of secession (the Texas revolution), some to an old-fashioned declared war (the Mexican War of 1846-1848) and some of to a real estate transaction (the Gadsden Purchase). In truth, the relative ease with which the U.S. acquired the erstwhile Mexican land exemplifies an uncomfortable truth, and I don’t mean big fish eat little fish. Land belongs to people who are capable of holding onto it. Without a critical mass of population in place and a military/paramilitary presence, it’s fair game for anyone else who wants it. Call it realpolitik or call it nature’s way. Diplomacy is irrelevant.

The Mexican is not as “pure” as the Indian since his DNA is European to some degree and he speaks a European language. But for the most part, Mexicans are brown, so by definition that means they are automatically included among the oppressed. Still, it is worth pausing to note that the Mexican and Spanish armies were fighting the Apaches long before the U.S. Cavalry got into the act. It came with the territory.

Moving right along from brown to black…in the western, Black Lives Don’t Matter. It is a fact that there were numerous black cowboys in the West, but you wouldn’t know that from watching movies. Curiously, while lynching is largely associated with black victims, the dearth of black characters in westerns assures that the hangees, often horse thieves or cattle rustlers, are lily white! On the other hand, that pernicious white hat (good)/black hat (evil) meme…racist to the core!

As for homosexuals, the trans-gendered, the hormonally dazed and confused…well, let’s just say the subject never comes up in westerns. There is a longstanding cowboy fetish (remember Midnight Cowboy, Andy Warhol’s Lonesome Cowboys, or the cowboy character in the Village People) in homosexual circles. It never broke through into mainstream westerns, aside from the modern western, Brokeback Mountain. The gay caballero was one stereotype that never caught on.

Then there's the whole law and order thing. Western movies only rarely provide a glimpse of socialism or communism, and then it is usually reserved for otherwise patriarchal religious sects. Authoritarians and anarchists are the major antagonists. Typically, the anarchists might win in the short run, but the authoritarians prevail in the long run. If you could put an antifa goon squad in the WABAC machine and transport them back to the Seattle of, say, 150 years ago, sooner or later federal marshals, the county sheriff, the local police force, the U.S. Army or somebody would take them on and take them out. If they were not killed outright, a mass hanging a la Judge Isaac Parker (the renowned Hanging Judge, who presided over 79 executions) would not be out of the question.

Now I can't say that the leftists in Hollywood are colluding to assure that westerns will never again darken the silver screen. It may well be that the audience just isn't out there anymore. Maybe light sabers have replaced pistols in the hearts of America's youth (gang members excepted). Wide open spaces are more likely to be glimpsed from the window of a spaceship than from a prairie schooner. The western got a head start on the science fiction genre, but the latter caught up quickly. The two coexisted amicably for generations, but now it seems science fiction has prevailed, possibly because it is easier to insert social engineering messages into movies about the future as opposed to those that deal with the past.

At any rate, if the JWA airport code changes to OCA or OCI or something else, few air travelers will notice, but some regular OC air travelers might notice that the John Wayne statue is gone and wonder where it went. I don't think it will stay in storage long. It would certainly make a unique conversation piece for any movie fan who could afford it. More than likely, it will end up in a museum. The John Wayne Birthplace & Museum in Winterset, Iowa would be one possibility.

But what will happen when the forces of wokeness direct their spite towards all the western museums out there…the National Cowboy & Western Heritage Museum in Oklahoma City, the Autry Center in Los Angeles, the various Wells Fargo museums, etc., not to mention the numerous western art museums around the country? It's just a matter of time.

Still, things could be worse. I'd rather Hollywood ignore the western than reimagine it. Hollywood used to remake successful movies; now they reimagine them. Typically, that doesn't entail a burst of creativity but of propaganda: woke wine in old bottles. Based on the movies I've seen that purport to be reimagined, I can only conclude that "reimagined" is a synonym for "fucked up."

Millennials may not mourn the loss of the western…just crusty old narratives as obsolete as the software of yesteryear. The western is at worst a national scandal and at best an irrelevancy in our enlightened progressive 21st Century.

A crazy honey with a gun

Imagine you are a 29-year-old man returning to your hotel room around 11:00 p.m. You stop at the front desk for messages and you discover you have received a note on hotel stationery that reads as follows:

> It is extremely important that I see you as soon as possible. We're not acquainted, but I have something of importance to speak to you about. I think it would be to your advantage to let me explain it to you. As I am leaving the hotel the day after tomorrow, I'd appreciate it greatly if you could see me as soon as possible. My name is Ruth Ann Burns, Room 1279-A. I realize that this is a little out of the ordinary, but as I said, it's rather important. Please come soon. I won't take much of your time, I promise.

Would you crumple the note and throw it in the trash? Or would your curiosity be piqued? Prudently, you call her room before going up there, but the young woman in question says she won't discuss the matter over the phone. She asks you to come up to her room a half hour later.

Then what do you do?

Well, as you have probably figured out, the above is not a hypothetical situation. It really happened to a ballplayer named Eddie Waitkus in 1949.

Now you may not have heard of Eddie Waitkus, but you may have heard of Bernard Malamud, author of The Natural, a 1952 novel that used an Eddie Waitkus-like incident as a narrative springboard. More than likely, you are familiar with the 1984 movie (starring Robert Redford) based on the novel.

In the book and the movie, the woman has already met the ballplayer (Roy Hobbs) and has invited him to her room. The reader/moviegoer has been informed that there is a screwy woman out there who gets her kicks killing athletes and has already offed an Olympian and an All-American football player. She uses .22 caliber silver bullets for the killshots. Unfortunately, Roy Hobbs didn't get the memo about the "woman in black," and he pays a price for it. Fortunately, he eventually recovers from his wound, and we flash forward to his attempt at a comeback at an age when most players are retiring. The Eddie Waitkus story is very different

Edward Stephen Waitkus, the son of Lithuanian immigrants, was born on September 4, 1919 in Cambridge, Massachusetts. An outstanding student and athlete at Cambridge Latin High School, he signed a contract with the Chicago Cubs before the 1939 season. He played four seasons in the minor leagues with only a taste of the big leagues (28 at bats) at the beginning of the 1941 season. His 1942 season with the Los Angeles Angels (then a minor league franchise in the Pacific Coast League) showed he was ready for permanent promotion to the Cubs. He led the league in hits with 235 and batted .336.

Unfortunately, Uncle Sam overruled the Cubs and Waitkus spent 1943 through 1945 in military service. In the Pacific Theater, he earned four bronze stars after experiencing combat in New Guinea, Morotai, Bougainville, and Luzon. His official rookie season was delayed till 1946, but he had successfully dodged Japanese bullets and made it home in one piece.

Unlike most first basemen, Waitkus had never exhibited much power, but he compensated by hitting for a high average; also his fielding skills at first base were outstanding. In 1948 he was good enough to make the National League All-Star team. The same was true in 1949, though he could not play as a result of an injury suffered when he visited the hotel room of the woman who wrote the above note.

On Tuesday, June 14, 1949, Waitkus was playing at Wrigley Field in Chicago. It was, of course, an afternoon game, as Wrigley Field was the lone holdout when it came to installing lights for night baseball. For Waitkus, the game was a ho-hum affair. He went 1 for 4 with a single and scored 2 runs. Two months into the season, Waitkus had been performing pretty much as expected. He was hitting .306 but with just one home run. As for defense, "the Fred Astaire of first basemen" was living up to his reputation. He was leading in the fan balloting for starting National League first baseman for the All-Star Game.

The big difference was Waitkus was no longer with the Cubs. Having been traded before the 1949 season, he was now a member of the Philadelphia Phillies, who defeated the Cubs 9-2 that afternoon in the first contest of a four-game series. So Waitkus was staying with his new teammates at the Edgewater Beach Hotel on Lake Shore Drive.

After the game he had gone to dinner with pitcher Russ Meyer (the winning pitcher that afternoon), Meyer's fiancée, and his family, who were from a small town west of Chicago. The Philadelphia victory had brought the team to within three games of the first-place

Dodgers, so it had been a good day all around…until some violent thunderstorms tore through Chicago upon Waitkus' return to the hotel. An omen?

After Waitkus read the note, he checked with the front desk and found out that Ruth Ann Burns had checked into the hotel after the game that day. Her hotel registration indicated she lived on Portland Street in Cambridge – Eddie's old address.

Camp followers or groupies have long been a part of baseball road trips. Called "queens" in the old days, they were later known as "Baseball Annies" (think of the Susan Sarandon character named Annie in the movie Bull Durham). Waitkus must have wondered if a queen was trying to seduce him. She could be a hottie, or she could be a middle-aged train wreck. On the other hand, he was likely intrigued by the woman's name, as his mentor in Cambridge was a former major league player named Jack Burns. If Ruth Ann was from Cambridge, perhaps she was a relative. There was only one way to find out.

At 11:30 p.m. he went to her room. When she answered the door, he went in and immediately sat down. He must have been pleased to see she was a young, statuesque brunette. Maybe he noticed the drinks she had ordered from room service. When all was said and done, it was a nightcap he would never forget.

After Waitkus sat down, the young woman pulled a .22 rifle from the closet and said, "For two years you've bothered me. Now you're going to die."

At first, Waitkus thought it was some sort of practical joke set up by his teammates, but he quickly learned otherwise when the bullet pierced his lung. Waitkus later observed that she had "the coldest-looking face I ever saw." He slumped to the floor, mumbling over and over, "Oh, baby, why did you do that?" It turned out to be an imperfect murder attempted by a perfect stranger – "a crazy honey with a gun," as Waitkus later characterized her.

It may sound like a scene right out of film noir, but it was for real. The shooting set the stage for a classic "murder followed by suicide" incident, but Ruth Ann Steinhagen (her real name) had second thoughts after Waitkus arrived. Her original scenario was to stab him with a paring knife and shoot herself. Instead, she decided to shoot him and spare her own life. As she observed later during her trial, "In my entire life, I don't think there has ever been one thing that turned out the way I wanted to."

Having attempted murder, she then saved her victim's life. She put away the rifle, knelt on the floor and comforted him, then called the front desk, announcing, "I just shot a man."

She was still there when the doctor and the house detective arrived. Apparently, no one on the floor had heard the shot. She could have walked away scot-free, while the Chicago police tried to track down Ruth Ann Burns of Cambridge, Massachusetts. While in the hospital, Waitkus identified her as his assailant. "Four island invasions in the Pacific and not even a headache," he later mused.

Doctors determined that the bullet had gone through Waitkus' lung and was lodged in muscle tissue near his spine. The .22 bullet had come within a quarter-inch of his pulmonary artery. "A little bullet could make you feel as though six men had slammed you against the wall," he noted. Doctors rated his survival prospects as 50/50. He underwent four operations and spent a month in the hospital before he was discharged. Being young and in good shape tilted the odds in his favor.

19-year-old Ruth Ann, who worked as a typist for the Continental Casualty Company in Chicago, was arrested for attempted murder. Naturally, people assumed the incident was the result of a lovers' quarrel (a similar incident had occurred in Chicago in 1932 when Cubs' shortstop Billy Jurges was shot by an old flame at a hotel near Wrigley Field). But it soon became obvious this was no sex scandal.

Steinhagen, a Chicago resident, had became obsessed with Waitkus during his tenure with the Cubs and often sat near first base at Wrigley Field. After games, she frequently hung around the clubhouse exit with autograph hounds but never interacted with Waitkus.

The average fan may not realize just how vulnerable a player is in these situations. Someone with mayhem on his mind could really do a number on a player. A star athlete, or any other celebrity, is in a weird position in a crowd; as soon as he walks in, everyone knows who he is, but he doesn't know who anybody is. A loon could be lurking just a few feet away.

Though Ruth Ann had never confronted Waitkus before, she had done her homework. She already knew just about everything there was to know about him.

> She knew where he lived.
> She knew who his neighbors were and their addresses.
>
> She knew where he'd grown up.
>
> She had studied the Lithuanian language.
>
> She listened to Lithuanian radio broadcasts (not so hard to do in Chicago, since the city had a large Lithuanian population) and even called in to talk shows to practice her language skills.
>
> She began eating baked beans, a renowned favorite in the Boston area, where Eddie had grown up.
>
> She often set a place for him at her dinner table.
>
> She collected phonograph records released in 1936 because Waitkus wore uniform No. 36 when he was with the Cubs.
>
> Her bedroom was a collage of Eddie Waitkus pictures and press clippings, as well as ticket stubs and scorecards – even on the ceiling. The shrine was dominated by a life-size (4' x 6') poster blown up from a photo.
> Even after the shooting, her prison cell was adorned with a recent picture of Eddie Waitkus in his hospital bed.

Ruth Ann's fixation on Waitkus had not gone unnoticed by her parents, who sent her to psychiatrists to no avail. When Waitkus got traded to Philadelphia, they thought the obsession would peter out. Instead, it went in another direction.

But why Waitkus and not some other player? On the field, the Cubs were no great shakes but there were 25 men on the roster to choose from. (Before Waitkus, she had a non-lethal crush on Cubs' outfielder Peanuts Lowrey.) If she wanted, she could have gone down to Comiskey Park on the South Side and checked out the 25 members of the White Sox (actually, both the Sox and the Cubs were pretty lousy in the late 1940s). Given the fact that visiting teams from both the American and National Leagues played in Chicago (in those days, when there were only eight teams in each league, each visiting team played 11 games in Chicago), she could have singled out any major league player. But Waitkus won the lottery:

> As time went on, I just became nuttier and nuttier about the guy and I knew I would never get to know him in a normal way…And if I can't have him, nobody else can. And I then decided I would kill him.

Apparently, it was the culmination of some sort of pressure that had been building up for a couple of years. One police officer called her a "thrill killer." Today we might call her a stalker. But that doesn't say why she focused on Waitkus.

From my experience as a fan, I have noticed that women who call themselves fans of a team are usually the fans of a specific player or players, and they root for the team by default. Most men care about a player only so long as he is productive and helps the home team win. If he can't hack it, he's a bum. Women, however, tend to bond with an individual player, not a whole team. In a sense, they form a vicarious pair bond with the player. Sometimes it is with the likes of Mickey Mantle, other times it is with a lesser player, occasionally a much lesser player. The female fan cannot join the elite male group better known as a major league baseball team, but in her mind she can bond with an individual player. It is not unlike a teenage girl picking her favorite member of the latest boy band.

At her trial on June 30, 1949, Ruth Ann said she didn't know why she did what she did and that she had been planning on killing him since early May:

> I'm not really sorry. I'm sorry Eddie has to suffer so. I'm sorry it had to be him. But I had to shoot somebody. Only in that way could I receive the nervous tension I've been under the last two years. The shooting has relieved that tension.

No surprise that the jury (an equitable blend of six men and six women) found her not guilty by reason of insanity and sent to the Kankakee State Hospital (founded in less sensitive times, it was originally known as the Illinois Eastern Hospital for the Insane). Fittingly, the institution had already chalked up a couple of footnotes in baseball history. Negro League pioneer Rube Foster spent the last few years of his life there before dying in 1930. Two decades before that, a short-lived minor league franchise, the Kankakee Kays, played at a ballpark across the street. The team's claim to fame was that Casey Stengel launched his professional playing career there. The unofficial team nickname was the Lunatics.

Much to the dismay of Waitkus, Ruth Ann was pronounced cured and released on April 17, 1952, even though she was on record as saying she would kill him if he ever got married (he had tied the knot with a girl he met while doing rehab in Florida). But the doctors said Ruth Ann was no longer a danger to society. As it turned out, the doctors were right. Their prescribed regimen, of electric shock therapy, hydrotherapy, medication, and occupational therapy had worked wonders!

By all appearances, Ruth Ann had enjoyed her fifteen minutes of fame. She posed for numerous pictures in the courtroom, in jail, and in the asylum. Once out of the limelight, she lived out the rest of her days quietly in a modest home on the northwest side of Chicago. When she died of a fall in 2012 at age 83, her profile was so low her death went unnoticed by the news media for months. Apparently, she never married and how she supported herself remained a mystery. The headline of her Chicago Tribune obit declared her a Femme Fatale. Had her aim been just a little bit better, that would have been literally true.

So whatever happened to Eddie Waitkus? Well, you can take your pick from a short-term happy ending or a long-term unhappy ending.

Waitkus spent a month in the hospital and missed the rest of the 1949 season (though he did suit up for Eddie Waitkus Night on August 19 at Shibe Park in Philadelphia). In the off-season, he underwent a grueling rehab under the tutelage of the Phillies' trainer at the team's spring training facility in Clearwater, Florida. As a result, Waitkus played in all 154 games in 1950 (true to his reputation as a contact hitter, he led the National League in singles), His stats were pretty much a continuation of what they were before the shooting. To no one's surprise, he was voted the Comeback Player of the Year award. As a bonus, he got to play in the World Series as one of the elder statesmen of the famed Whiz Kids, as the 1950 Phillies were known.

The succeeding seasons showed a slow decline, which was the case for almost all ballplayers on the far side of 30. He retired after the 1955 season with 1,214 hits and a .285 lifetime batting average. He was 36 years old and few ballplayers lasted beyond that in those days. So one could argue that he had successfully overcome his encounter with Ruth Ann. Or had he? According to a Phillies teammate with the outré name of Putsy Caballero:

> He wasn't the same after. You could put your fist in his back where they had operated to take the bullet out. When the weather changed he had trouble bending over to tie his shoes.

Many years after the incident, Waitkus' son observed:

> He became almost paranoid about meeting new people, and pretty much even stopped going out drinking with his teammates.

Before the shooting, Eddie Waitkus was something of a man about town. And why not?

After all, he was a major league All-Star, a snappy dresser, and a bachelor. He was in a superb position to take advantage of his – dare I say it? – male privilege. Today a man perceived as openly doing that is enough to trigger a response somewhere between snarky to vicious to violent in feminist circles.

In female parlance, he was certainly a good catch…perhaps too good for the likes of Ruth Ann Steinhagen. Hence her love/hate flip-flopping.

We might characterize her behavior as an example of the honeymoon being over. At the beginning of their "relationship," Waitkus was a paragon, a fine physical specimen, a highly skilled professional, a high-status man in a high-profile profession. But, as in a real relationship, she soured on him. Had they been a married couple, she would simply file for divorce. In her schizophrenic situation, the only way out was to kill him. Curiously, a hit song from 1949 was "I'm Gonna Wash That Man Right Outa My Hair" from the musical South Pacific.

Eventually, Waitkus got married and credited his wife (whom he met while undergoing his off-season rehab) for his recovery. When he retired from baseball after the 1955 season, he was a family man and had a good job in marketing and sales with a freight company, yet his life started to come apart. His drinking increased apace. In 1961 divorce and a nervous breakdown ensued. Other jobs in other places followed, but he ended up in his hometown of Cambridge where he lived alone the rest of his life. A summer job as a teacher at the Ted Williams Baseball Camp in the late 1960s provided him some solace, but he was diagnosed with pneumonia and then esophageal cancer. A heavy smoker, he died in 1972 at a V.A. Hospital in Boston. He was only 53, 30 years less than his would-be assassin when she died.

One cannot state with finality that Waitkus' encounter with Ruth Ann Steinhagen shortened his life, but the physical wound and the PTSD certainly didn't help. One suspects that it was particularly irksome that he never really came to grips with the fact that even though he had done nothing wrong he had paid a terrible price. Self-pity is not a productive emotion, but in his case it is perfectly understandable.

Oh, baby, why did you do that?

The eternal question.

Functioning penis should be appreciated as a blessed peacemaker

August 21, 2020 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Men tend to be competitive and often fight with other men in various ways for coveted statuses and positions. Clubs, spears, guns, and missiles are associated with war and death. But a penis isn't like those weapons. Masculinity doesn't fundamentally signify fighting, war, and death. A functioning penis should be appreciated as a blessed peacemaker that helps to create new life.

In our age of cultic belief in toxic masculinity, medieval Latin literature is vitally important for recovering proper appreciation for the penis. Consider the story of "a widowed woman who desired to have an elderly man {mulier vidua quae cupiebat habere virum provecta aetate}." The widow appreciated that a man could provide companionship and help:

> although what is permitted now in this age no longer concerned her, she desired nonetheless a quiet, elderly man for companionship and mutual help in ordinary life, rather than for any other motive, because she believed she should think about the salvation of her soul rather than the gratification of her flesh.
> { se, licet jam de vita hujus saeculi non curaret, cupere tamen virum quietum provecta aetate, societatis potius et communis vitae subsidii, quam alterius rei causa, cum potius de salute animae quam corporis lascivia esset cogitandum } [1]

A neighbor presented to the widow a man with qualities she apparently sought. The man incidentally "was crippled in his masculinity {mancum virilibus esse}." The widow wasn't interested in marrying him. She explained:

> I would never want to be joined to that man. If he lacks a Peacemaker (thus she named the Father of humanity), then when it happens that a serious altercation or dispute with each other arises, what Mediator (she believed she should live peacefully with her husband) among us could restore peace?

In the European Middle Ages, the Holy Spirit was understood to bring peace. Genetrix and Mediatrix — words cognate to Father {Genitorum} and Mediator — were used to venerate Mary, the mother of Jesus. Recognizing that a husband's penis could help to foster peace between spouses rightly puts the penis in exalted company.[3]

Men's competitive concern for the effective functioning of their penises tends to be regarded as ludicrous. Consider the old joke:

> Two men walking on the George Washington Bridge stop to take a piss. While pissing, one says to the other, “The water’s cold!” The other responds, “Yeah, and it’s deep, too!” [4]

In considering arms races or penis jousting, simply disparaging men is facile and unfair. Both sorts of competition arise from societal structures in which women are intimately entangled.

Medieval Latin literature tells the story of a Florentine man defending his beautiful wife. Admirers constantly followed her. Some festively serenaded her nightly with music and lighted torches on the street outside her house. One night their trumpets awakened the husband. He and his wife jumped out of bed and rushed over to the window. On the street below was a raucous and bawdy crowd. The husband called out in a loud voice for them to look in his direction:

> When all eyes were directed toward his voice, he thrust his large, erect penis outside the window. He then told them that their labors were foolish and useless, because they could see that he himself was more fruitfully equipped with that which satisfies a wife than they were. He therefore advised them to refrain from pointlessly pestering them. As a result of this very witty and elegant display, they desisted from further trouble.

The husband’s penis acted as a peacemaker in quelling aggressive sexual competition with other men. Especially when opponents possess trumpets, such competition cannot be easily ignored or merely wished away. Men living within gynocentric society must stand up and show other men that they are better equipped to please women. That’s simply a common reality of men’s lives.

A man’s penis is an organ for making love, not war. Peacemaking depends on men’s penises. Men should be encouraged to use their penises as much as loving possibilities allow.

Here and subsequent quotes include my English translation, drawing upon that of id., but tracking the Latin more closely. The subsequent quote is from id.

[2] Arabic literature from tenth-century Baghdad validates the widow's insight. The eminent scholar Abu 'Ali al-Qali (died 967) wrote:

> Some ill will came between a man and his wife, and they shunned one another for a few days. Then he jumped on top of her and took her. And when he had emptied himself, she said: "Shame on you! Every time there is ill will between us, you bring me an intercessor whom I cannot refuse." And in another tale a woman, mourning the passing of her days and particularly her nights with his "upright judge," said to her aging husband: "The one who used to resolve our disputes has died."

Quoted in Nu'aymī (2009) p. 64. Baghdad in the tenth century was far more developed than any medieval European city.

[3] On the Holy Spirit as Peacemaker, see e.g. Galations 5:22. The ancient Marian hymn Sub tuum praesidium {Under your protection}, when translated into Latin in the eleventh century, invoked Mary with the words Sancta Dei Genetrix {Holy Mother of God}. Mary was regarded as Mediatrix from no later than the fourth century.

Medieval Latin literature helped to foster appreciation for men's sexuality by developing the figure of the erotic Paternoster. That figure first appeared in the anonymous Latin poem Prisciani regula, written about 1200. Ziolkowski (1987) p. 31. About 250 years later, the figure occurs in Poggio, Facetiae 214, "Which is more acceptable to God, he who says, or he who does {Quid sit acceptius deo, dicere aut facere?}." This brief tale concludes: "He who makes a paternoster is more deserving than he who says one {plus meretur qui facit Pater Noster, quam qui dicit}."

Poggio, Facetiae 172, "A Florentine Knight, who made a pretence of going out, and hid himself in the bedroom, unknown to this wife {De equite Florentino qui, fingens se iturum foras, inscia conjuge in cubiculo latuit}, Poggoi (1879) vol. 2, pp. 82-3, presents a more complex figure of peace-making. In that story, a wife proposed to her steward that they first make war by him sticking his spear (penis) in her wound (vagina), and then they make peace by exchanging kisses. The husband, hiding in the bedroom, interrupted to prevent this sexual process of bringing about peace.

[4] This joke has a variety of minor variants. Richard Pryor reportedly used it in standup comedy forty years ago. It occurs in the major 1996 motion picture Sling Blade. For those who don't understand the joke, Yahoo! Answers provides an explanation.

Ogden Nash Rambling

August 25, 2020 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

It's just a matter of time before they come for Ogden Nash. Since his specialty was light verse, not a popular literary format today, his work has probably flown under the radar. Nash was anything but controversial in his day. Of course, the same is true of a lot of people whose writings, interviews, speeches, or statues are targeted for extinction today.

Light verse is something of a lost art. Britannica defines it as "poetry on trivial or playful themes that is written primarily to amuse and entertain and that often involves the use of nonsense and wordplay." In other words, witty and whimsical, adjectives that are totally out of synch with contemporary culture.

Light verse used to be something of a staple in publishing. It was not just the province of poets. Newspaper columnists – even sportswriters – were known to dabble in it. Among elitists, the greatest drawback of light verse was that it resonated with the great unwashed. That was certainly true of Ogden Nash's poetry, which dealt with everyday things…family life, social gatherings, sports, minor annoyances of modern life, etc. The reader did not need a background in literature or the classics to "get" the poem. It was readily understandable to anyone who could read. English lit majors who like to wax windy with interpretations would find few gray areas up for grabs.

Perhaps Nash's greatest sin against elitism was that his verse always rhymed, even if he had to resort to a procrustean mangling of syllables. There was no blank verse or free verse in Nash's light verse. If the culture mavens conceded that Ogden Nash was the champion of light verse, it was like saying he had won a minor league batting title.

Born in 1902, Nash started writing light verse while working as an advertising copywriter in New York. He started selling his poems to magazines and later published collections in book form. He defied the odds by actually earning a living as a poet during the Depression – and in the succeeding decades.

In his heyday, Ogden Nash was about as close to being a household word as a poet gets in America. His primary intent was to entertain, but as is the case with the best humorists and stand-up comics, on occasion he did more than just leave 'em laughing.

One of his recurring themes was the battle of the sexes. In Nash's day it wasn't a life and death struggle fraught with political implications. It was the birthright of every heterosexual male to offer opinions, humorous or otherwise, of the opposite sex (if it's still permissible to use that term). Today, however, Nash's verse would be considered misogynistic, even though it was mostly in good fun. "Fun" and "feminism," however, rarely appear in the same sentence.

The feminist Exhibit A would be "Reflections on Ice-Breaking," perhaps Nash's most famous couplet:

> Candy > is dandy
> But liquor > is quicker.

Positively reeks of rape culture, doesn't it? Actually, in just seven words, Nash evokes the customs of a more refined era falling victim to the emancipated women, suffragettes, and flappers of his young manhood. A terse truism about changing times and tastes, to which one might add:

> Too much candy,
> too much liquor.
> Which of the two > will make you sicker?

Yet another couplet, "Biological Reflection," dealt with the importance of cosmetics in attracting male attention:

> A girl whose cheeks are covered with paint
> Has an advantage with me over one whose ain't.

"What's the Use" is another poem that might have evoked chuckles in its day but would likely raise eyebrows today, as it provides a rejoinder to the age-old question of "Does my butt look too big?" while commenting on the then-unusual sight of women donning trousers:

> Sure, deck, your limbs in pants;
> Yours are the limbs, my sweeting.
> You look divine as you advance –

> Have you seen yourself retreating?

In “I Had No Idea It Was So Late,” he deals with the popular male view that the female of the species is not known for punctuality. For a man:

> How sublime it is > to know what time it is.
>
> Not so for women:
>
> In this sexual conflict in attitude toward time who am I to tip the scales?
> I only know that more males wait for females than females wait for males.

In “I Do, I Will, I Have,” he explores stereotypical sex differences, such as a husband wanting the bedroom window open while his wife wants it shut, and the fact that men forget birthdays while women remember them. Pretty routine stuff…till the closing lines:

> So I hope husbands and wives will continue to debate and > combat over everything debatable and combatable, > Because I believe a little incompatibility is the spice of life, > particularly if he has income and she is pattable.

Much of Ogden’s gender-oriented poetry fits into the old “Can’t live with ‘em, can’t live without ‘em” school of humor, long a staple of comedy in its various manifestations. Nash, however, sometimes ventured beyond that. One of his oft-cited quotes gets to the heart of the matter: “Women would rather be right than reasonable.”

> He expounds on this in “A Word to Husbands”:
> To keep your marriage brimming
> With love in the loving cup,
> Whenever you’re wrong, admit it;
> Whenever you’re right, shut up.

He covers similar terrain in “I Never Even Suggested It,” wherein he asserts many less-than-flattering observations about the sheer unreasonableness of the human female:

> Yes, many the swain who has finally admitted that the earth is flat
> Simply to sidestep a spat,
> Many the masculine Positively or Absolutely which has been diluted > to an If > Simply to avert a tiff,
> Many the two-fisted executive whose domestic conversation is limited > to a tactfully interpolated Yes,
> And then he is amazed to find that he is being raked backwards over > a bed of coals nonetheless.

Nash concludes the poem with this zinger:

> It is my duty, gentlemen, to inform you that women are dictators all, > and I recommend to you this moral:

> In real life it takes only one to make a quarrel.

In “Lines to a Three-Name Lady,” he takes on pretentious, opinionated women and develops this theme even further:

> Your native mental processes
> Imply some secret canker;
> Instead of thoughts, antipathies;
> Instead of reason, rancor.
>
> You three-name women, Mrs. [Hattie Boomer] Spink,
> You puzzle me a lot.
> Do you, I wonder, ever think?
> And if you do, of what?

Perhaps the most trenchant treatment of women in Nash’s poetry occurs in “The Seven Spiritual Ages of Mrs. Marmaduke Moore,” in which he delineates the “progress” of a modern free-thinking woman decade by decade. A healthy, corn-fed country girl, at age 10, at age 20 she marries a sophisticated urbanite:

> Where she soon forgot her childhood piety
> And joined in the orgies of high society.

Unfortunately, the marriage doesn’t last. Finding herself alone at age 30, she seeks solace in religion:

> Then, finding theosophy rather dry,
> Found peace in the sweet Bahai and Bahai.

At age 40 she turns to the secular religion of psychoanalysis and makes a pilgrimage to Vienna:

> She paid a professor a huge emolument
> To demonstrate what his ponderous volume meant.
> Returning she preached to the unemployed
> The gospel according to St. Freud.

By 50 she has become a patroness of the arts:

> Her salon was full of frangipani,
> Roumanian, Russian and Hindustani,
> And she conquered par as well as bogey
> By reading a book and going Yogi.

Then at age 60, she gets religion again:

> Mrs. Moore gave a joyous whoop,
> And immersed herself in the Oxford group.

> [The Oxford Group was a popular Christian – but non-hierarchical and non-dogmatic – movement in the 1930s.]

Finally, at age 70 she is still flirting with various religions, so Nash ends the poem with a knock-out punch:

> Mohammed may be her Lord and master,
> Or Zeus, or Mithros or Zoroaster.
> For when a lady is badly sexed
> God knows what god is coming next.

Wow, read that poem in its entirety aloud in English class and you might be charged with a hate crime! Yesterday's light verse could be too heavy for today's readers.

When he died in 1971, Nash was still "America's Laureate of Light Verse," as he was dubbed by Douglas Parker, the author of a 2005 biography. Nash was done in by a bowel infection after ingesting some tainted coleslaw. Of course, he didn't choose the cause of his demise, but if I were a humorist, I think death by coleslaw would be good for a laugh or two among the readers of my obituary.

If Ogden Nash were around today, could he apply his droll sense of humor to family law courts, affirmative action, gender studies, circumcision, or the MGTOW movement? I suspect the zeitgeist would work against it, but I'd like to see the results.

A strange sort of Patriarchy

August 27, 2020 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Robert Brockway has refreshed an article that he wrote several years ago, adding additional information that was unavailable at the time of original publication –Ed

While feminists have claimed for decades that female rulers are more peaceful, research has turned this on its head. A study conducted by researchers at the University of Chicago and McGill University found that Queens Regnant (Queens that ruled in their own right) were more likely to start wars and to continue the wars of their predecessors. Notably another study conducted at the University of Chicago found that the link between female leaders and armed conflict continues to the present time.

It is now almost universally accepted in western countries that all societies prior to the modern age were patriarchies. It is also often believed, by both men and women, that modern western countries are still patriarchies. This may seem like a reasonable presumption on the surface, after all, men did run all societies in the past didn't they? Not so much. Even a cursory review of history shows that this wasn't true. Female rulers were, in fact, common in many societies. Regarding these societies as patriarchies is, at best, a gross over-simplification. In reality, societies have generally constrained both men and women, forcing them into certain roles to serve the society itself.

A worked example can be found in the British Isles during the 16th century. Queen Elizabeth ruled for what amounts to the second half of the 16th century. She was no figurehead either. She was the absolute ruler of England and Ireland (Britain would not arise as a state until generations later).

While it is true that the English practiced Male-preference primogeniture (preferencing inheritance by the firstborn son over other sons and all daughters) this did not stop many women inheriting and retaining thrones in their own right around this time.

Elizabeth I is well known throughout the English speaking world and is generally remembered as an effective leader who reformed the English state and built up a strong navy in the face of external military threats. Others show that while the early years of her reign were generally prosperous this was not so later on. What all of these sources agree on was that Elizabeth was the queen in her own right. The decisions made were made by her. It should be clear from this that she was the leader of the English and Irish states. She was no figurehead.

What is generally not as well known is that there were several contemporary female monarchs in the British Isles. Immediately proceeding Elizabeth I as Queen of England and Ireland was Queen Mary I, her half-sister. Queen Mary I is also known as Bloody Mary as she had a habit of ordering the death of her subjects (usually by burning at the stake) when they didn't agree with her religious views. Mary I didn't reign for long (thankfully, given her penchant for violence) but was every bit as much in charge of England and Ireland as Elizabeth would be after her. Each effectively changed the national religion

It is worth noting that Mary I's main competition for control of England and Ireland was another woman – Lady Jane Grey. In the end, Mary made sure that Jane's head ended up rolling around in a basket rather than wearing a crown.

When Mary I married the terms of the marriage contract made her and her foreign husband joint rulers of England. He could not act without her consent. It is clear that the English nobility trusted an English woman to rule more than a foreign man. Nationality trumps gender. When Mary died in 1558 the crown did not remain with her foreign husband but rather went to her English half-sister Elizabeth I. Patriarchy indeed.

To the north of England was Scotland, which was ruled by a Queen Regnant from 1542 to 1567. She is generally known as Mary Queen of Scots in English, probably to distinguish her from Mary I who was her contemporary. Her rule of Scotland overlaps that of both Mary I and Elizabeth I. The entirety of the British Isles was ruled over by female monarchs from 1553 to 1567. This period would likely have gone on much longer except that Elizabeth imprisoned and eventually executed Mary Queen of Scots after she fled south seeking Elizabeth's protection. That's right – Elizabeth imprisoned and then executed one of her own relatives who had sought her protection. That's a class act. Elizabeth apparently viewed Mary Queen of Scots as a potential rival since Mary was a close relative – first cousin, once removed. Mary Queen of Scots was fleeing south to England as she was suspected, then and now, of being a tacit accomplice in the brutal murder of her second husband.

Mary Queen of Scots was an absentee monarch during her early life, having spent her youth in France. Scotland was left in the hands of another woman, her mother, Mary of Guise.

So during this period, we had Lady Jane Grey, Mary I, Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots vying for power across the British Isles. It should be clear that this was no patriarchy. These women were no one's puppets – those that were successful ruled over England, Scotland and Ireland as ruthlessly and authoritatively as any male ruler. They also demonstrated that they were quite prepared to order the torture and execution of their enemies or those they perceived as enemies. These historical events and others that occurred in many other parts of the world throughout history demonstrate that these women were not helpless pawns of The Patriarchy. They were powerful monarchs and in a very real sense, they were the law in their respective countries.

Patriarchy means literally rule by fathers but it is generally intended to mean rule by men. Such a society, one in which rule was mandated by men, would not permit female rulers. Women would simply not find their way into positions of power. Even a cursory view of history reveals that female rulers feature across a wide variety of societies and eras. While many rulers were women, it is men, and it has always been men, that have borne the brunt of armed conflict. These so-called patriarchies would dispose of men in wartime and peacetime. As research has shown, when executive authority is held by women we ultimately find more men dying in battle.

This article has been amended to correct the familial relationship between Elizabeth and Mary Queen of Scots per comments -Ed

The Absurdity of Patriarchy

August 30, 2020 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The notion of The Patriarchy espoused by feminists has gone from being a radical fringe view to being mainstream not only among feminists but the wider community. The definition of patriarchy used by feminists differs from that used by anthropologists, sociologists and other researchers as well as differing from the common dictionary definition. These two concepts are entirely distinct and should not be confused. Due to the significant differences in meaning that this term has, anyone using it should clearly define the term before making their argument. Feminism relies heavily on the confusion between these two definitions. American feminist Kate Millett is believed to have been a major driving force behind the development of the feminist idea of The Patriarchy.

It is also recommended to avoid using the term patriarchy theory as this gives the term far too much credence.

A typical feminist definition comes from the London Feminist Network uses the following definition as:

> Patriarchy is the term used to describe the society in which we live today, characterised by current and historic unequal power relations between women and men whereby women are systematically disadvantaged and oppressed. This takes place across almost every sphere of life but is particularly noticeable in women's under-representation in key state institutions, in decision-making positions and in employment and industry. Male violence against women is also a key feature of patriarchy. Women in minority groups face multiple oppressions in this society, as race, class and sexuality intersect with sexism for example.

In contrast, dictionary.com defines patriarchy in this manner:

> pa·tri·arch·y [pey-tree-ahr-kee] Show IPA noun, plural pa·tri·arch·ies.
> # a form of social organization in which the father is the supreme authority in the family, clan, or tribe and descent is reckoned in the male line, with the children belonging to the father's clan or tribe.
> # a society, community, or country based on this social organization.

If the Men's Rights Movement could tear down belief in The Patriarchy it could make huge inroads into getting the wider community to accept the issues facing men and boys.

Feminists differ in their understanding of The Patriarchy. Some believe it has always existed while others believe it appeared a few thousand years ago. Some even believe there was an ancient matriarchy that was defeated by warlike Patriarchal societies. Belief in an ancient matriarchy is usually based on the notion that ancient societies were unaware of the connection between sexual intercourse and pregnancy. The idea that ancient societies (particularly hunger-gatherers) were unaware of this apparently obvious fact first arose among 19th-century European natural philosophers, although many feminists who espouse it are apparently unaware of its origins. Today anthropologists and sociologists consider the idea absurd. There has never been a human society that didn't know where babies come from.

There is a never-the-less general acceptance among feminists that The Patriarchy is based on the systematic oppression of women by men and is a constant of gender relations around the world.

Feminists often tell us that they want to destroy The Patriarchy. Implicit in this desire are two important points:

- The Patriarchy exists
- If it exists, that it can be destroyed

So does The Patriarchy exist? If so, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is unfalsifiable.

The Patriarchy, as defined by feminists, does not exist and never did exist. At best it is indicative of a very simplistic world view. At worst it is indicative of an ideological need to denigrate men and boys.

A belief in The Patriarchy is used by feminists to justify their anti-male activities. They argue that if men have oppressed women through the use of violence for thousands of years, surely it is ok to respond in kind.

Much of the criticism levelled at men by feminists is justified by a belief in The Patriarchy. Mainstream feminism posits that men have an intrinsic advantage in society merely for being men. They call this privilege and constantly entreat people to check it. This is a very binary view of the world, presuming that one gender has an intrinsic advantage over the other. It would be more accurate to say that both men and women have problems specific to their gender. Unfortunately, feminists have shown a consistent trend of ignoring the problems facing men and boys, and much of this occurs because they believe in The Patriarchy.

Does The Patriarchy exist?

Anyone believing in The Patriarchy should try to answer the following questions in concrete terms.

When and where did it start?

If The Patriarchy existed and exists, it must have started somewhere. Be specific in providing information on where and when this occurred.

What written evidence did the purveyors of The Patriarchy in the past leave behind?

If The Patriarchy existed in the past those maintaining the system would likely have had a theoretical basis for their activities and they would probably have written this down. Copies should survive.

The requirement here is for written evidence of the systematic and intended oppression of women. Documents that describe ancient cultural practices are not sufficient. This document would need to explicitly talk about the oppression of women, why it is done and how it is achieved. Transmitting a complex system from father to son generation after generation unchanged would be implausible without written reference documents.

Women who lived under The Patriarchy must have been aware of it. Did they leave any written records explicitly detailing the system used to oppress them?

Did women ever try to rise up and fight it?

Fighting in this context need not mean physical violence. The women of a village (or an entire society), realising their plight, could choose to leave en masse, fleeing their oppressors. Women could also fight the oppression of The Patriarchy by engaging in passive resistance. This would involve the women of a community (or a society) refusing to participate in their own oppression. They could collectively refuse to participate in any form of work that supported the society, and therefore their own oppression.

If this ever occurred it would likely have been a significant event and would be in the written record of that society or a neighbouring society.

It is worth noting that the MGTOW movement explicitly talks about men passively and lawfully resisting contributing to a state system that is hostile to them. If The Patriarchy existed, parallel attitudes should have existed among women.

If so, what was the result?

Did any of these women succeed in shaking off The Patriarchy? For those that did not succeed, what was the punishment? How many women were tortured, killed or exiled by the men of their society for the failed uprising? How many women were punished in other ways? When uprisings are suppressed it is common for the ruling class to publicise the unsuccessful uprising and the punishments meted out so as to dissuade others. Records detailing an event like this should still exist.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit female rulers?

Many societies had a large minority of female rulers. Those who believe in The Patriarchy must explain why a patriarchal system would ever permit any female rulers. Some feminists attempt to explain the rise of women into leadership roles as a result of intersectionality. The principle problem with this argument is that oppressors do not allow any member of an oppressed group into the ruling class regardless of any other characteristics they have. Indeed, any members of the oppressed group that might be possible leaders are often eliminated by their oppressors.

Those arguing for The Patriarchy must also explain why societies around the world allowed women to rule in their own right. Many examples are given here but many more examples exist. Each woman below ruled over a powerful state. Some ruled in their own right and some as regents, but they were all autocrats. These women are listed with the continent(s) in which their power was centred as well as dates of birth and death. In some cases the dates of birth and death are approximate.

- Merneith (Africa, 13th century BCE)
- Hatshepsut (Africa, 1508-1458 BCE)
- Artemisia I of Caria (Asia, 5th century BCE)
- Olympias (Europe, 375-316 BCE)
- Cleopatra Thea (Africa, 164-121 BCE)
- Cleopatra VII (Africa, 69-30 BCE)
- Boudica (Europe, 20-60 CE)
- Zenobia (West Asia, 240-275 CE)
- Empress Suiko (East Asia, 554-628 CE)
- Empress Wu Zetian (East Asia, 625-705 CE)
- Irene of Athens (West Asia, 752-803 CE)
- Theophano (West Asia, 943-969 CE)
- Theophano (Europe, 956-991 CE)
- Margaret of Austria (Europe, 1480-1530 CE)
- Catherine of Austria (Europe, 1507-1578 CE)
- Mary I (Europe, 1516-1558 CE)
- Elizabeth I (Europe, 1533-1603 CE)
- Joan of Austria (Europe, 1535-1573 CE)
- Mary Queen of Scots (Europe, 1542-1587 CE)
- Catherine the Great (Europe, 1729-1796 CE)

Societies from the Americas are lacking from the list above due to lack of historical records. It is likely that ancient societies in the Americas had similar proportions of female rulers. Female rulers, while a minority, were common around the world.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit powerful female figures in mythology?

Goddesses could inspire women to seek power. It follows that a Patriarchial society would suppress the worship of goddesses. And yet Powerful female figures are a mainstay of mythology. Notable examples include:

- Andraste: Brittonic war goddess.
- Athena: Greek goddess of wisdom, war and the law.

- Dhat-Badan: Ethiopian goddess. Public worship of the goddess was prohibited without a priestess present.
- Eingana: Australian aboriginal goddess. Creator of everything.
- Eki: Basque Sun goddess. Protector of humanity.
- Ishtar: Middle Eastern goddess of justice, political power, sex and war. A particularly powerful goddess known for co-opting the domains of other gods and goddesses.
- Isis: Originally Egyptian, Isis came to be worshipped throughout the Greek and Roman worlds before the rise of Christianity. Among other domains, she was a goddess of kingship. During certain periods her domain was considered to include the entire Universe.
- Mbaba Mwana Waresa: Zulu goddess. Is said to have taught her people how to make beer.
- Percunatele: Baltic thunder goddess.
- Tanit: Punic and Phoenician goddess. Chief goddess alongside a male consort, Baal-Hamon.
- Tara: Tibetan Buddhist goddess. She is a female buddha and represents success in work and achievement.
- Wala: Australian aboriginal Sun goddess.

Even a cursory review of the powers and responsibilities assigned various goddesses in mythologies around the world will reveal that these were not societies that sought to oppress women.

If it exists, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

Let's presume for a moment that The Patriarchy is real and that men have systematically oppressed women for thousands of years (or longer) through the use of violence. Where does that lead us?

If this is true then it is either something that is innate to men or it is learnt behaviour – something that men have passed to their sons for hundreds of generations. It is not reasonable to conclude that a system like this could be maintained without it either being innate or being explicitly passed from generation to generation. A system functioning for hundreds or thousands of years will leave a "paper trail".

Much feminist activity today is directed at changing male behaviour to "dismantle" The Patriarchy.

If The Patriarchy is innate then it cannot reasonably be dismantled through modification of male behaviour.

If The Patriarchy is a learnt behaviour then there must be documentary evidence of its existence.

Since we find no documentary evidence of The Patriarchy we must conclude that if it does exist it must be innate.

Therefore, feminist attempts at dismantling The Patriarchy are futile. If The Patriarchy really does exist then it is innate to masculinity and cannot be removed from the nature of men. Continued attempts to modify male behaviour are futile. Women who believe in The Patriarchy should forthwith make plans to completely separate themselves from men. Men, and the women who realise the world is more complex than this, can happily go on without them. Whenever I hear feminists talking about separating from men I always say: “Less talk, more separation!”.

The purpose of this article is to lead people into believing that The Patriarchy does not exist whereas it is actually a super-secret organisation that uses The Illuminati as a cover. The Moon landings were faked to cover up the real conspiracy! The featured image for this article depicts the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron. This is the world headquarters of The Patriarchy.

Forcing feminism down South

September 2, 2020 | by Tito Du Bois | Link | Original Link

International cooperation was created to help poor countries tackle urgent problems like child malnutrition, refugee crises and pandemics. A very powerful ecosystem of institutions arose, channelling funds and implementing programs throughout the least developed world for fighting hunger, stopping aids and other general humanitarian work.

The United Nations (UN), though originally intended for other reasons, has Branches entirely devoted to this, for example the Child's Fund. There are also State Agencies like the U.S. Agency for International Development (USAID), GIZ (Germany's Agency) and others. Today, this apparatus is devoting copious amounts of funds to advancing the radical feminist agenda and forcing poor countries to include gender indoctrination in programs related to other problems like hunger and health. For one nugget, just look at USAID's[1] and the UN's[2] so called "gender approach" websites, and the European Union's approach is even worse.[3]

First a full disclosure, I used to work in this business but always had mixed feelings about it. On one hand I appreciate charity towards poor countries, as I was born in one and I personally always try to lend a helping hand to those less fortunate. On the other, professional charity and making money out of helping others is a deeply flawed and contradictory system.[4]

However, pushing forward feminist propaganda with such a level of aggression is a crime that is causing, and will cause much harm to countries like mine, because it channels much needed resources towards questionable ends instead of more urgent problems. Additionally, the official approach taken by Cooperation Agencies almost feels like a blackmail: if you want money for food you have to pass a law that will privilege women or give most of the funds to them or “educate” males to let them know how wrong they’ve being doing or find another way to empower women.

This cannot and shouldn’t go on. How would you feel if I went to your house and said “Well son. If you want to have that job that you so desperately need, you’re gonna have to teach your kid about all the good things that Princess Diana did for human race and how she was persecuted by male dogs.” Or something like that. That’s what the international cooperation system is doing with all the funds tied to empowering women.

Unfortunately for us poor fucks, because this is supposedly free money, we have no other choice but to accept these conditions if we want to keep on receiving the funds. I hope my country grows stronger in the future and we can kiss your cheeks goodbye, but meanwhile this situation is one more troubling sign of the age: Feminist propaganda being funded with public funds and forced upon the Southern countries. Hey, at least my taxes are not funding this…

Call me naïve, but shouldn’t international cooperation and charity be based on respect on both sides? If you happen to have the money, and you want to help those in need, that’s commendable. But don’t do it on the condition we do as you think right, let us decide what is right for us. Fortunately, some cooperation programs, like Microcredit, do follow that logic. Though still in those cases, they are mostly focused at women.

International cooperation should also be respectful of local culture. I’m writing from South America and I can assure you that Feminism isn’t part of our culture. It shouldn’t be introduced here by a foreign power. Moreover, International cooperation should go back to focus on urgent matters (remember hunger and disease) because resources are very scarce and acute problems are still plentiful. Every penny spent in teaching boys to behave in the new normal proper way, is a penny not invested in feeding malnourished children.

So, why is this happening? As I said earlier, this reflects the times we are living in. Radical feminism has become part of the mainstream promoted by media and subsidized by governments in some countries. I will not dwell further in this, because this website already has plenty of articles that elaborate on this subject. Instead is worth pointing that there are some sectors that have been almost entirely corrupted by the discourse that women are always victims of big bad men. Mainstream is probably the most notorious example; international cooperation and the nonprofit sector are examples as well. This is very worrisome, as these are sectors that have a strong influence over public opinion and governments in the US and, especially in the case of international cooperation for poor countries, abroad. There is no way we can let this roll.

The Tradition in Traditional Masculinity

September 4, 2020 | by Glen Paul Hammond | Link | Original Link

> Hope in heaven, feet on the ground.
> – English Gentleman's motto, from the 17th century.

In the West, traditional masculinity is under attack. Many of the virtues that come under its code of conduct were, at one time, promoted as aspirational virtues for boys, taught and supported by both parents in a household. Increasingly, however, these historically developed traits have been the target of concerted efforts to undermine them. The American Psychological Association (APA) guidelines are the most recent example of this, arguing, among other things, that traditional masculinity limits males' psychological development, increases the likelihood of violence against women, and produces gender role conflict, which manifests itself in such things as restricting a man from both expressing emotion and care for others (3). This article means to examine the tradition in traditional masculinity, to present an understanding of the source and function of that tradition's development, and, through this, to gain insight as to why it has become a target.

When Harvard psychologist, Steven Pinker, was assessing the APA guidelines, he noted that one of the study's major flaws was that it did not acknowledge the evolutionary or biological root causes of male behavior (Edsall). Pinker pointed out, for example, that the word "testosterone" appears nowhere in the report" (Edsall). His critique went on to explain that the APA's skewed lens was driven by a narrative invested in viewing masculine traits negatively, and that, due to its politicized perspective, it failed to observe even the possibility that these same traits were part of "a huge and centuries-long change in Western history" which actually served to civilize male behavior (Edsall). These observations by Pinker are especially important since they point to both the origin and functionality of a code of conduct that became the Western view of masculinity. Such implications assert that, over time, society realized that the biological realities of the male species could be best and most productively served through the attainment and development of specific virtues. These virtues embodied what became known as the gentleman's code.

In his book Tournament, David Crouch explains that one of the earliest ideals of a medieval man was encapsulated in the term preudomme, from the Latin "upstanding fellow" (149). As part of an aristocratic warrior society, a preudomme was expected to be hardy, tough, uncomplaining, and loyal but not subservient; he was valued for his independence, sound judgment, and willingness to speak truth to power (Tournament 149-50). These men had to make their way around "greater men" and so, according to Crouch, they also had to be amiable, confident, and modest (Tournament 150). Preudommes were the knightly class before that class was considered noble. The general respect that the traits of these men elicited from those above them led to their upward mobility in the social order; this progression, however, necessitated the acquisition of a different set of skills that would allow them to successfully negotiate more diverse social settings. As a result, a violent world that depended on the martial qualities of its soldiers now found a motivational means to encourage those same men to channel their energies into behaviors that also served a functional purpose off the battlefield. Since the social milieu they were becoming a part of was populated by both lords and highborn ladies, the practical sensibilities of the preudomme needed to adopt courtly manners, which would become known as courtliness.

Combining the martial world with the courtly world was encapsulated in the concept of chivalry—meaning, "What the horse soldiers did" (Marshal 31). In battle, a horse soldier controlled an instinctually unruly mount to utilize his skills in the art of war; likewise, he employed the same kind of control over his own unruly instincts to best display the courtesies that royal courts demanded. As Crouch puts it, "his aggression and competitiveness was channeled into the tournament and warfare" (the tournament being a training ground for war), but once he put off his armor and sword, "he could lapse into the companionship of the household with ease" (Marshal 43).

A demonstration of such self-control involving these two opposing spheres of action can be seen in one part of The Lancelot-Grail Cycle from the early 13th century, as it illustrates the way in which a knight's martial nature is subordinated to the will of the royal woman to whom his service is dedicated. In the prose piece, Lancelot is dominating the melee of a tournament, throwing "down horses and knights with his sword strokes and the blows of his fist" (Tournament 179). As he pulls men off their mounts, attacking with his limbs and his horse, he delights the audience who view him "as one who is skilled in everything that the best of knights should do" (Tournament 179). However, Queen Guinevere, who watches from the stands, is concerned about the undo attention Lancelot is drawing from the crowd and so sends a message to him through one of her ladies-in-waiting, saying that "from now on he should perform as badly as he has fought well up till now"(Tournament 180). Upon hearing this, Lancelot proceeds to flee from charging knights, to miss his aim and to let another knight knock him off his horse, hurting himself so badly that he has trouble getting up (Tournament 180). Soon, the adoration of the crowd turns to jeers. The next morning, Lancelot again begins the day by dominating the field but, once again, Guinevere sends word for him to fight badly and, so, he immediately performs "as poorly as he knew how" (Tournament 180). This continues until midday, when word is sent once more from the queen, allowing him to do his best. The piece displays both the aggression and competiveness necessary to excel in the art of war but sublimates these traits to the gentilesse that a warrior's devotion to a lady demands.

The knight's service, however, was not limited to the particular lady he promised to serve; his dedication to her was but the flower at the end of a stalk buried deep in an expectation to serve all women. This is the basis of the medieval "damsel in distress" theme and is demonstrated in another Lancelot tale: A woman petitions the Arthurian hero to help her with a knight who has been harassing her on a highway that she travels; appalled by what he calls a shame to the order of knighthood, he confronts the harasser and admonishes him as a false knight before proceeding to split the man's skull open with a blow of his sword (Mallory 65).

As the literary examples above illustrate, devotion to womanhood became an integral part of the masculine knightly tradition. But when and why did this happen?

Co-ed courts demanded a particular behavior that suited both sexes, yet, the almost religious nature of service to a lady that later developed is believed to be rooted in the early 12th century literary convention of the troubadours. In his book, The English Gentleman, Philip Mason argues that this movement constituted a revolution, affecting both literature and the attitudes of men toward women for six centuries (27). The writer, C.S. Lewis believed it to be a shift of such great scale that it dwarfed even the influence of the Renaissance (Mason 28). The highest subject of troubadour poetry was love and, as a result, its concerns were adopted as part of the mandatory repertoire of male members of the court who created a tradition of courtly love to express it.

The inspiration for this literary movement came from the reign (993-1030 AD) of the first known troubadour's grandfather, William the Great, III Count of Poitier (Topsfield 4). His court was famous "for its civilized interest in letters and learning," and, as L.T. Topsfield puts it in his book Troubadours & Love, this "growing interest in the things of the mind" interacted with the powerful presence of the count's remarkable wife, Agnes of Burgundy, who refined its social manners and system of values (4). The poetry of their grandson, William VII Count of Poitou, attests to the influence; he developed a belief in the restorative power of sex and romantic relationships with women; in his IX canzone, for example, the first troubadour proclaims that such love can refresh the heart and renew the flesh, "so that it cannot age" (Bond 35).

The ethos that emerged from this belief system was what the 12th century author, Andreas Capellanus called a kind of "service to the god of love" that went beyond the physical, as chastity itself became a sign of faithfulness to the woman who inspired it (Mason 28). C.S. Lewis, quoting Capellanus from De Arte Honeste Amandi, states that the lover can only hope to win the lady if he proves his devotion both by deeds and eloquent words; he must be "virtuous, a good Catholic, clean of speech, witty, hospitable, ready to return good for evil, above all courteous, and to all ladies"(Mason 29). According to Capellanus, "There is no good thing in the world and no courtesy which is not derived from love as from its fountain" (Mason 29). Consequently, for the knight, the lady and the love she inspired became sovereign.

The woman who is remote and high up on a pedestal is a goddess in the religion of love. This, of course, was not an entirely foreign concept to the knights of Christendom. Long before courtly love emerged as a recognizable thing, the Catholic sensibilities of the West held the best of womanhood in the highest esteem through its representative, Holy Mary. In this way, the religion of love was, at its core, inextricably linked to the woman they viewed as the Queen of Heaven. As a result, embodying the virtues to be worthy of the lady sovereign required the acquisition of all the virtues of a good Christian. This, in turn, suited the purposes of a politically fragmented feudal society whose competing interests had limited means of resolution outside of violence. As David Crouch puts it, an ethical template for a just and moral nobleman, developed by the church in the 8th and 9th century, was absorbed and more practically reinforced by a chivalric code that became an all-encompassing modus operandi (Tournament 152). From this, the knightly class accepted the idea that warlike abilities were "moral when it was used to protect the defenseless, the widow and orphan, and to bring down the wicked and arrogant" (Tournament 152).

This ethic was to be applied at all times, even in the midst of violent confrontation. When in 1189, for example, the army of William Marshall, a man considered to be the very essence of knighthood, set fire to Le Mans, "he and his squires helped an old lady and her daughter drag out their smoking possessions from their burning house" (Tournament 152). Through such a concept of chivalry, the Christian ethic of mercy to the poor and undefended became a noble ethic also. This disposition, what Chaucer alluded to as the "gentle lion," allowed for a broader application of the code, eventually making possible its evolution from the knight as noble warrior to the courtier who was both warlike and gentle.

Whether physical or mental, the good qualities of a courtier, according to Baldesar Castiglione's incredibly influential 16th century treatise on the subject, "must be developed to the fullest extent by training" (Mason 52). The courtier is, Castiglione states, "stern to an enemy" while being "gentle to everyone else;" he is able to wage war but also "acquit himself well in dancing;" he laughs and makes jokes, teasing his friends with good nature, but must always employ self-control (Mason 52). The Elizabethan court was epoch in its expression of courtly love, as it provided a perfect setting: Elizabeth I, also known as Gloriana, was not only the lady sovereign in spirit, but also the actual sovereign and a prime example of the transition from warrior's code to that of a chivalrous gentleman can be seen in the most acclaimed courtier of her reign, Sir Philip Sidney.

Sidney was considered by his contemporaries to be "the president of nobelesse and chevalrie" (Mason 57). His devotion to the Queen was exactly right, expressing both loyalty to a prince and admiration for a woman, blending the two perfectly by, "making no claims, exciting no envy" (Mason 57). It was not anything that Sidney accomplished that inspired admiration from his peers, but rather it was what he embodied that made him heroic. His friend Edmund Spenser stated that he thought always of honor, spoke ill of none and neither intrigued nor fawned nor flattered; he channeled all his energies to self-improvement and became the quintessence of the "Renaissance, soldier, lover, poet, musician, scholar and courtier" (Mason 59). Even the way he died was a testament to this code of conduct: While on campaign, Sidney met one of his companions who was missing leg-armor; as a consequence, he took off his own and gave it to him, receiving a bullet later in that part of his unprotected thigh; afterward, while being carried to his death-bed, he refused a cup of cold water so that a dying soldier near him could have it (Mason 59).

Though it is not a straight line, from Sidney one can trace the evolution in the chivalric code from an emphasis on the martial qualities of a noble and highborn Christian soldier to that of an individual with character. Viewed this way, it illustrates a transition from medieval knight to gentleman in the collective consciousness of masculinity. This social dynamic can be seen in both the history and literature of Europe. From the Arthurian tales, to Chaucer, to the formal analysis of Castiglione and the poetry of Spenser, from the prose of Jane Austen to the literature of the Victorians, the martial qualities of the battlefield were gradually replaced by the athletic qualities of the sportsmen and the knight's sword was substituted for the scholarly gentleman's walking stick. Though the nuances of its behavioral expression changed, the virtues that guided them remained relatively constant.

The gentleman's code was, when all is said and done, a practical one. As Philip Mason puts it, "To be a gentleman was a sub-Christian cult, that is to say, a code of conduct and behavior derived from the ethics, not from the theology, of Christianity" (219). It provided an achievable code of conduct that espoused the virtues of the Christian religion in the adoption of its finer points, but gave room for a man to apply these virtues practically and to utilize the spirit of them in behaviors, like war, that the real world demanded (Mason 182). A gentleman could still have hope in heaven, but he walked with both feet on the ground and, for those without belief in the religion that inspired it, they still had the code and the encouragement to sustain it from the expectations of all those around them. As the aristocracy and the gentry class faltered, the influence of the middle class rose and the majority of the population appropriated the best of the earlier traditions. As a consequence, the gentleman's code remained a socializing tool for boys well into the 20th century, ceasing to be a birthright to live up to and, in a more democratic age, becoming a goal that all were encouraged to achieve.

So why has it been abandoned? This is not an easy question to answer, but tracing out some of the influences of traditional masculinity above reveals three main sources—war, women, and Christianity— and this revelation makes an educated guess possible:

Firstly, War: Since the masculine traits of aggression and competitiveness are viewed as a negative part of a social construct, there is no need to channel their energies to more functional purposes when, as a matter of indoctrination, they can be extinguished. Furthermore, in the utopian world that our culture not only aspires to but believes is possible, war is unnecessary and so the traits needed to wage it are without utility. The negation of the biological reality of men and boys added to a utopian driven societal directive also serves to explain why modern day sports are being neutered of all forms of aggression and competitiveness at the junior levels—controlling and integrating biological realities to productive ends or higher social goals are no longer perceived as character building.

Secondly, Women: The way in which boys were expected and taught to treat the opposite sex were irrevocably changed after the Sexual Revolution of the 1960s and the Feminist Movement of the 1970s. Any behavior that pointed to a difference between men and women was frowned upon and so standard lessons involving such things as modelling to a young boy that a man stands up in order to give his seat to a woman became complicated affairs; this, and something so mundane, yet central to the code, as opening a door for a lady, became totems of inequality and oppression. This second point is particularly ironic since the latest Gillette Ad extols men to harken back to just such a protective tradition, without acknowledging either its history or the cultural forces that brought about its so recent abandonment.

Last and thirdly, Christianity: In his Reflections, Edmund Burke stated that European culture and civilization were the products of an indissoluble union between the spirit of religion and the spirit of a gentleman (65-66). However, the latter part of the 20th century has rejected the institution of Christianity and watered down its ethical norms. Though the manifestation of its moral characteristics are obscurely pointed to in such things as the European Union's constitution and its human rights program, the rich tapestry of its tradition has been discarded and, without its roots, has been reduced to platitudes that have lost much of their ability to influence and inspire.

These three main influences of traditional masculinity also shed light on one other of this article's primary inquires. Namely, why is it under attack? The masculine code described above was a functional response to real world issues and to real world relations between the sexes. Its practicality is affirmed in what appears to be its re-emergence in the collective consciousness, as the Gillette Ad and, perhaps even, the call for increased male involvement in the #MeToo movement attests. This seems ironic, yet, recognizing its irony makes understanding it not only possible but obvious. It is not masculinity that is under attack, otherwise other manifestations of masculinity from other cultures and traditions would be equally or to a greater degree maligned and mistreated. The actual target is the tradition that formed it. If the zeitgeist of the age views the West as a source of evil, then it stands to reason that its architects are its agents. From this perspective, it is the tradition and not the masculinity that is the problem. In other words, for those who would attack it, traditional masculinity goes by another name: Patriarchy is what they call it.

September 6, 2020 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

---

A well written and thought-provoking article by S. G. Cheah has recently been published on the site Evie, which I would like to respond to.

> Many people who have bought into the feminist notions about matrimony like to argue against marriage by saying that it’s “just a piece of paper.”
> But if you were to follow that line of logic, then the American Constitution is also “just a piece of paper.” The truth, however, is that marriage (like the American Constitution) is a powerful institution enacted to protect our rights as women. Despite what we’re told by feminist propaganda, marriage isn’t a form of oppression by the patriarchy. Rather, marriage is a stalwart triumph for womankind.”

Cheah is absolutely right in her estimation of marriage being a “stalwart triumph for womankind”. Gynocentric marriages, which are all too common, centre the needs and wants of wives, with husbands, all too often, reduced to playing a functional rather than fulfilling role and obtaining his sense of identity from his wife’s approval of his acceptable servitude.

> Feminist theory argues that marriage forces the woman into a subservient role to her husband. This is a myth. The fact is, monogamous marriage protects women from being treated as sex objects. In the sexual marketplace, men’s interest normally gravitates towards short-term sexual relationships, whereas women tend to gravitate towards long-term partnerships. This should not come as a surprise. Due to the biological reality of how humans are built, when it comes to sex, the stakes are higher for women than they are for men. The saying “nine minutes for him could mean nine months for her” comes to mind. With the institution of monogamous marriage, a man is legally bound to provide for his one wife and their biological children. Are we really supposed to believe that this is a form of patriarchal oppression?”

There is more truth in this statement – surveys repeatedly show that a majority of women do not find casual sex to be satisfying, and this fact should be commonly acknowledged to help women make good choices for themselves. It should also be acknowledged that a minority of women do in fact find casual sex to be satisfying and they can safely be celebrated too, as they traditionally have been, in art and literature. The worn phrase Cheah repeats "nine minutes for him could mean nine months for her" is an archaic cliché that is no longer relevant with the myriad of reliable contraceptives available for women. A more relevant phrase may be "nine minutes for him could mean 18 years of child support" because, in the sexual marketplace, I believe it to be men who are more significantly at risk from pregnancies they haven't planned on (because women do have so many options for controlling their fertility that men do not share).

> To help you think about this, imagine how different the life of Fantine (from Les Miserables) would have been had she been married to Cosette's father. The good-for-nothing cad would have been held responsible for ensuring the well-being of his daughter Cosette, saving Fantine from her downfall into prostitution, illness, and death.
> Monogamous marriage not only preserves the well-being of children, but it also strongly protects female dignity."

Female dignity is a glorious thing to behold but I reject the idea that only monogamous married women can exemplify the value. Further, a significant proportion of monogamous wives may not actually exemplify dignity at all – abusive women, self-centred women, bossy women… Can be as monogamous and married as they like and still potentially lack dignity.

Marriage is correlated with better outcomes for children – but it's not clear to me that the key is the "piece of paper". Marriage is also correlated with religiosity, and I believe that faithful communities make particularly dedicated families. Separated families, on the other hand, far too often include children without meaningful access to their fathers in modern Western societies.

> Societies that don't have a culture of strong monogamous marriage have several deep-seated issues. In my previous article against polygamy, I cite one of the largest studies on polygamy that shows how in a society where there's a large portion of men who don't get to be paired up in marriage, you'll end up with higher rates of violence, suicide, and social unrest as a result.
> A society with a large portion of unmarried men will end up with higher rates of violence and social unrest.
>
> Monogamous marriage significantly reduces the major social problems of polygamist cultures. As the study stated, "In cultures that permit men to take multiple wives, the intra-sexual competition that occurs causes greater levels of crime, violence, poverty, and gender inequality than in societies that institutionalize and practice monogamous marriage."
> To give you an idea, we can see this playing out in the Middle East where polygamy is legal and common. Not only does a polygamous society lead to the subjugation of women, but it also throws off marriage rates for a large portion of single males, which, in turn, leads to a litany of social ills. Hordes of young men who don't see a future for themselves (as they won't be able to find wives to form a family of their own) will be seduced by radical ideas to join groups like ISIS where they're promised access to conquered enemy women who'll act as sex slaves. We can also observe a version of this problem here in the West today brought on by hookup culture/casual sex promoted by the feminist "sexual liberation" movement for women. In practice, because women decide who their sexual partners will be, only the very few good-looking men will gain access to multiple sexual partners, while a whole cohort of men who aren't as sexually attractive will have problems finding a sexual partner."

This is a convincing argument against polygamy – but it strikes me as a stretch to conflate polygamous Middle-Eastern countries with the modern West.

> These dejected and bitter men often then turn to weird and self-destructive movements like the MGTOWs and the incels, just like their fellow males in the Middle East who went on to join ISIS. Women are consequently de-valued because they're treated as mere members of a harem rather than lifelong partners in a marriage. Again, you can thank feminism for the growth of these anti-women subcultures.

This outrageously offensive conflation suggests to me that Cheah is utterly blind to the experiences of men and boys. MGTOW and incel communities are providing vitally important male-space for men and boys who may have some degree of dejection and bitterness but can find social support and places to speak freely and maybe even some good advice for personal growth and/or preservation within them.

> While the feminist movement has empowered women to act with “sexual freedom”, the flipside of that coin is how they have also empowered men to act like philanderers. With the goal of marriage is now on the backburner, men can primarily look at the women they’re interested in not as the potential love of his life and the mother of his children, but rather if she is willing to sleep with him.
> And the harsh reality is, as I’ve touched on in my other articles about promiscuity and prostitution, as sex has become cheap, women become more replaceable to men. A wife, on the other hand, is not interchangeable to her husband, which is why she is called “his significant other.” And to attain a man’s fidelity, whereby a woman becomes a significant part of a man’s life, she attains this power mostly from marriage.”

It’s fair to say that monogamous marriage confers power for women. I think it’s time that long term relationships conferred equal power on the women and men involved.

Attitudes Towards the Puer: From Jody Miller to Tomi Lahren

September 9, 2020 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

I want to talk for a brief moment about a song that's a childhood favorite of mine entitled "He Walks Like a Man" as performed by country music singer Jody Miller. The lyrics, written by Diane Hilderbrand, are what I want to look into in particular. Take a moment and read the lyrics, or better yet, listen to the song if you have access to it, but again pay attention to the lyrics.

These lyrics, which I have heard are written by Hilderbrand for Jody Miller for her husband Monty Brooks (although I have no solid sources on that), are sung from Jody's perspective about the qualities of her man in the verses, with some descriptions surprisingly flattering and beyond the utilitarian clichés, such as "He schemes like a man and whenever he can, he dreams like a man". Each of these verses is closed with what can be described as a light chorus: "But it's the little boy; It's the little boy in him I love". A bridge within the song speaks of how there is a little boy in every man, and how the little boy shines through every now and then.

An eloquent and simple song which is to this day a favorite of mine. In recent years however I've come to appreciate the fact that lyrically it has a different take on depicting through words a woman's love for her man. We have had our share of songs from plenty of genres describing a woman's love for a man one way or another, thematically from how supportive and caring their men are, how lovable they are despite their "flaws", or even more direct songs about "making love".

However, I think this 1964 hit has a unique take on it that I can't quite find offhand on other female-driven songs. Off the top of my head, it is the only song I can think of that is about loving a man for being himself. I'm not talking about the "be yourself" advice given to men that are struggling with social situations which is not nuanced or enough or truly meaningful in itself. What I mean about loving a man for being himself is valuing a man as an individual in himself.

My Introduction to the Puer Concept

One thing I've come to realize in recent years is what is intrinsic to an individual, that is, the importance of the inner boy in the man, and likewise the inner girl in the woman. What I mean by inner boy and girl, specifically, is the Jungian concepts of puer and puella. To stay on subject with this article I will place focus on the puer, the inner boy. It should be worth noting that "puer" is, in fact, Latin for "boy". I want to make an immediate distinction of context here to avoid confusion: the puer concept, at least in the positive context I hope to exposit on, is distinct from what is referred to as the child archetype in human adult relations in which one assumes the role of child, and the other as the adult with hyperagency, resulting in a situation where the adult child parasites off of the one assuming the adult role through vulnerability and victimhood. The puer archetype, usually symbolised as a boy, represents spontaneity; and the child archetype, symbolised as an infant, represents helplessness.

Psychologists directly speaking about the puer also can be rather uncharitable in their exposition of it, especially when they cynically associate it with Peter Pan Syndrome…and dismiss it simply as a "failure to launch". However, I think there needs to be a focus on puer as a highlight of the inner, unabashed boy that embodies everything that is honest, energetic, pure, innocent and enthusiastic. The childlikeness of earnest joy and uncorrupted excitement, and not the childishness of the petulant brat. The awe-inspiring innocence of wonder, wishes, and curiosity, not the stupid innocence of naiveté and ignorance.

I want to credit Peter Wright of Gynocentrism.com for convincing me of this distinction. Whereas I previously broadly used the "inner child" concept to speak largely of the positive aspects of the child to serve as youthful energy for the kind of grown men that spend time tinkering their automobiles and organizing their various collections, I largely glossed over the destructive aspect of the "inner child" in its manipulative, petulant context. Peter had helped me make more of a contextual distinction between the two and introduced me to the puer and puella concepts.

"He Walks Like a Man", in my mind, speaks to the puer of Jody Miller's man. The little boy in him is not an infant that pines for his mother's care. The little boy in him is not a petulant whiner that goes into a tantrum when he doesn't get his way. If he was in any way these things, the song's lyrics of how admirable the man is as a man will not ring true. Note that in the bridge she mentions that the little boy comes shining through when his man is "happy or blue". The little boy is the honest, unsacrificed self of a man, encased in the tough exterior that he's adopted to function as an adult. When the little boy shines through, it should be a joyful encounter of meeting the honest self of a man with his dreams still intact, his wonder unscathed by cynicism, and a lust for life and all the world has to offer. And dare I even say, far from this being the woman's maternal type of love for this little boy, perhaps it is the inner girl in the woman, the puella, that responds to and loves the little boy in him, the puer.

Cancelling the Inner Boy

I would have spoken about the following subject way earlier but I had been busy scripting up and recording my ICMI20 talk which needed particular attention, and I needed a break afterwards. So although some time has settled since, let's talk briefly about that silly Tomi Lahren rant about how men are trash.

In her rant she specifically states in a snide voice that feigns wit: "This is a PSA for all the men out there, and all the boys who think they're men, but they're actually boys. This is gonna be the summer of canceling boys." She proceeds to admonish men at large for not living up to what are no doubt asinine expectations for men that she and "her friends" imply to uphold. Everything about her rant exposes the shifting of blame upon all men where in fact there had been no self-reflection in which she can find blame in herself for anything that goes wrong in her relationships with men. It is greatly ironic that we find this brattish quasi-valley-girl woman-child with big sunglasses on her head talking about how men are not real men but are instead boys.

Everything about Lahren, coming across as petulant as any princess, reveals something most may overlook: this is perhaps not so much about her having an ideal man. Ideal men no doubt have come and gone from her life with her being the dismissing agent. It is my understanding she broke off an engagement that came with an obscenely priced diamond ring. No, her real issue is that she hates the inner boy within the man. It is hinted early on that she claims to berate men who are actually boys, and want to cancel said boys. I know what some might think: "Well, wasn't Tomi just talking about the petulant sort of men who are irresponsible and giving her and her friends a hard time?" Judging by the fact that men who are "responsible" and relatively "real mannish" to a fault have surrounded and have been rejected by Lahren suggests that no, that is not the sort of boy she is in fact talking about. She can only be talking about the alternative, that is, men with youthful energy and won't break themselves sacrificially to gynocentric society. Why else would she go on a rant? This whole affair comes across as sour grapes from freaking out over "where have the good men gone!" as if she'd just been dumped.

Tomi Lahren paradoxically assumes both the role of a woman who wants a perfect, ideal man that does everything for her, and also the role of an over-controlling mother treating her man like the very "boy" she wants to cancel. She wants a hulk or drone of a man that can make her life as effortless as possible with his puer, that is, his youthful exuberance and positive childlike qualities completely gutted with sheer contempt. At the same time, she treats men like children with a sadistic maternalism that says "if Mommy ain't happy, ain't nobody happy". In her rant, Tomi Lahren assumes roles of both self-victimizing woman-child and authoritarian mother. In both capacities, she mongers war upon the puer.

Lahren doesn't stand out for this uniquely; really, she is just the latest in the line of women embracing "whataboutmeism", that gynocentric demand of male altruism, to the point that they can't bear the existence of the independent puer that wants to pursue his own goals instead of giving his valuable time to the beck and call of entitled women like her. But it should be a wake up call for people who latch onto people like Lahren just for saying they aren't a feminist. The time is long past to recognize that it is not enough. As long as men are valued for only their utility, disposable or otherwise, and not for their own sake as individuals and what they are deep inside manifested in their puer, this gynocentric disdain on the little boy within men will persist.

Discovering Puer and Puella, and the Case for Embracing Them

Here I spoke about two vast contrasts: One – a song in which Jody Miller expresses a true love and appreciation for the puer, the inner boy inside his man, for it is the essence of this man; Two – a rant in which Tomi Lahren admonishes men at large as "boys" as well as expressing hostility to the very idea of a man being in touch with his inner boy, implicitly waging war against the puer.

The enthusiastic context of inner child is something that I'd appreciated for some time, and is not truly new to me. The puer, as distinct from the child archetype, is however certainly new to me. I think that this can serve as a new proper context for me to discern the things in everyday life, be it in interactions with others to things observable in media, to discern what is in embrace of the puer as well as the puella, and what intends to destroy them.

There is certainly more to discover and write about on my part when it comes to these inner children of wonder within us. All this thus far is but an introduction. But if the puer is the childlike source of unfiltered energy of innocence and dreams, maybe embracing that aspect of oneself is the key to bring them back onto their own two feet if ever they are in a situation that they have to.

Any time you see a man excited about immersing themselves in their chosen activity, be it a car, his art and craft, his study, his stage performance, and even with relationships such as among his brothers or his intimate partner, you're seeing his puer aspect. You're seeing the little boy shining through. When a man is broken and his life reduced to drudgery, his puer is either dead or dying. Perhaps a case can be made for embracing our puer, resuscitate it if necessary, and discover that within ourselves and in others we encounter in our lives and value.

Research finds that as a group, only men pay tax

The article below was first published in 2016. Republished to bring it to the attention of newer readers and so older readers can enjoy it again. –Ed.

Legions of feminists will ferociously type smash the patriarchy! at their Internet rallies, calling out for the end of the male supremacy in all spheres of life. Yet, few of them acknowledge the fact that one of these spheres, the government (the institution granting them rights), is entirely funded by male taxpayers. Economically, women cost more to the state than they benefit. The government is literally paying women to be alive. As such, strong independent women are only that way because the state is transferring money from men to them. Feminists are not seriously against being dependent on men, they are just against men having the full control over their money.

Let's explore a fiscal research report in New Zealand.

The real gender gap: the tax gap

While the 77¢ for a dollar wage gap has been under the spotlight for the past years, the 200¢ for a dollar tax gap has, to my knowledge never been mentioned, at least not by our supreme feminist leaders Barack Obama and Justin Trudeau. A quick glimpse at the data reveals a massive difference in taxes paid by men and women.

The first thing that comes to mind is that half of women might be at home raising kids. However, the workforce participation rate gap between men and women doesn't seem to exceed 10% in either age group. (see figure 4 in source)

The second thing that may come to mind as a confounding factor is that women spend more for children in education and health. Nope. No support for that either. Men and women spend approximately the same amount in both education and health (see figure 10 and 11 of the source).

In nearly all age groups, women receive more tax than they give

With the exception of the age group between 45-59 (a 15 year span) years old, women cost more to the state than the tax they provide. In contrast, men generate more tax revenue than they cost between 23 and 65 (a 43 year span). In the brief period in which women generate more or as much tax money than they consume, men outscore them by at least 3 times.

By the end of her life, the average woman will have a negative fiscal impact of $150,000

By large, the cumulative tax money given to women outweighs the tax money generated by women. The short period of positive impact of women between 45 and 59 is countered by 65 other years in which their allocated tax expenditure is more than what they supply the state.

> Men, on the other hand, appear to have a positive cumulative net fiscal impact from approximately 40 until 80 years of age. For these particular taxes and public expenditures, the net fiscal incidence on men is approximately zero when cumulated over all ages. (p. 22)

Overall, the research suggests that male taxpayers are the only ones to ever have a positive contribution in taxes. Based on Figure 17, the closest that the average woman will come to having a positive fiscal incidence is when she is at minus $50,000 around 55 years of age. While feminists are demonizing men for benefiting from all liberties and rights they have constructed, they have oddly remained silent over the fact that anonymous male tax payers are paying women to exist. Read that sentence again.

The fact that feminists want a stronger government is not a coincidence. While historically, women had to choose a wealthy husband for resources, they can now stay single, be lesbians, marry a poor man, or use the sperm bank, and the state will still transfer male taxes to them. Interestingly, within 10 years of women's suffrage, the government doubled their tax revenue and expenditure in the USA.

These findings show just how simplistic the notion of privilege is. While men make more on average, it allows women to have access to education, health, and services. The patriarchy is pretty generous after all.

Going into labor

September 13, 2020 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

When I was fresh out of school and working at my first real job (i.e., one that looks good on a resume and might actually lead to something better…though it didn't), I met a retiree who had worked for the Budd Company, a Philadelphia corporation best known for manufacturing stainless steel railroad cars. The old guy told me that whenever he met somebody and told them how long he had worked on the shop floor, they always said, "Let me see your hands." Why? It was common knowledge that anyone who worked for Budd for any length of time had probably lost one or more fingers.

Well, today we have OSHA but we don't have the Budd Company any more. I don't know who makes railroad cars these days, but it's probably happening in some foreign country, so now there are fewer mangled hands in America. But as is the case with progress, something is always lost. We have heard and read much of the economic losses that occur when manufacturing jobs leave the USA. We don't hear so much about the loss of job satisfaction that comes with working with one's hands.

The tools of the trade change with the trades, which change with the times. I remember going to a movie several years ago (can't remember the name of it) which showed a guy getting fired in the first scene. There was no clue as to what his job was or what type of business his employer was engaged in. But the man had a phone and a computer on his desk. What else do you need to know? What difference would it make if you did know? The world is filled with high-rises, low-rises, office parks, and sprawling corporate campuses rife with rooms or cubicles where everyone has a phone and a computer. Those two essentials are all most people need – and that's why so many people have

Working from an office or at home involves a welter of paperwork. Not so long ago you could at least print out a hard copy of a document you had worked on, but the paperless craze has taken away even that tangible result. It is possible to work all day and literally have nothing to show for it at quitting time. Sure, you have the proverbial indoor job with no heavy lifting, you never break a sweat, and you never get your hands dirty, but something is missing.

Imagine a young man today who likes to work on cars or build things in his spare time. He is also a good student and on track to go to a good college. One day he informs his parents – both professional people – that he enjoys working with his hands and would rather earn his living that way than sitting in a stuffy office all day. The parents would likely do everything in their power to dissuade him from following that path. He would probably meet with less obloquy if he donned a dress, began a regimen of estrogen injections, and started shopping around for estimates on penectomies.

It's not a matter of earning potential. Skilled labor doesn't come cheap – and it isn't hobbled by crippling amounts of college and postgraduate/professional school debt. But blue-collar jobs – across the board – are lower on the status totem pole than white collar jobs even when the pay is good. If mom and dad are at a cocktail party and someone asks how Junior is getting along these days, it's preferable to say he's pre-law and beginning his senior year at Nanny State University than admit he's working as an apprentice plumber. Never mind the fact that we all depend on a reliable supply of running water.

Oh, people still make like Gandhi and pontificate about the dignity of labor (especially when Labor Day weekend rolls around), but they don't really mean it. If labor is so wonderful, why have we invented so many labor-saving devices? Not much work for hewers of wood and drawers of water these days. The ultimate irony: we celebrate Labor Day by taking a day off – by not laboring!

Throughout most of history, the majority of workingmen were mechanics (which used to mean anyone who worked with his hands, not someone who worked on cars). Most men, urban and rural, got dirt on their callused hands. There were, of course, merchants, clergymen, scribes, and professors, but they were few in number. Today those with clean hands – literally if not metaphorically – are much more numerous, and not just because of ubiquitous hand sanitizer.

Now I'm not trying to bromaticize hard work. I remember back when I became old enough to entrust with caring for the yard. That was when our power lawn mower crapped out. For whatever reason we never got another one and hired a lawn care service. Do you think I begged my parents for a power lawn mower so I could go out and cut the grass on hot, humid days? Hell, no. If I ever get around to writing my memoirs, the chapter on my adolescence could be entitled, "I Was a Teenage Slug."

For better or worse, I've worked in offices for almost half a century. And I am no DIY (do-it-yourself) freak. If a job requires skills I don't have and expensive tools I don't possess, I will hire someone who has them. But I can perform unskilled labor. I can cut my own grass, do my own edging, trim my own hedge, rake my own leaves, clean out my own gutters, and pull my own weeds. Recently I've been prepping and painting the window frames and screens on my house. No arcane skills are required to do these things, though even the humblest task can be performed better thanks to on-the-job learning of proper techniques.

Most importantly, you get to see the results of your work because you are working in a physical world, not a virtual world. When you are done your house or yard (actually, your world) no longer looks the same. You have transformed it to some degree. Oh, the results may be ephemeral; before you know, it, the grass will grow taller and the weeds will return, and if there is ever an autumn when the leaves don't fall, we are all in big trouble. But at the end of the day you can survey what you have done. You have made a difference, at least for a while. The results of some tasks (i.e., painting) will last longer. Some will outlast you. Constructing my rock gardens took some heavy lifting, but I will crumble into dust before they do.

None of these tasks is fun, but they do involve exercise (you'd be surprised how much your muscle tone improves from routine labor). Of course, exercise is readily available at your local gym, or you can work out at home. You might transform your body, and if you're a narcissist, you can admire your post-workout self in a full-length mirror. But you haven't done anything to change the world around you.

What would workers of old have thought if you told them that in the future there would be places called health clubs, special places with special machines where people go to exercise? (Is it just me, or has anyone else noticed how modern fitness centers resemble medieval torture chambers?) Sweat and exercise used to be as automatic as breathing. People didn't need workouts; they had work. Through their labors, they literally made their mark on the world, even though they might have been bone-tired at the end of the day. Creature comforts on the job were nonexistent. An employee lounge? Are you kidding?

A couple of months ago the air conditioning went out in our office for a week. Most of the employees were working at home anyway, but the boss gave everyone else permission to leave. I set up a box fan and kept working. Well, I appreciate climate control as much as anybody, but, honestly, it wasn't that bad – certainly not to the point where one might get overheated while performing a sedentary job. I can only imagine what men who labor outdoors every day would think of office workers who evacuate at the slightest breach of room temperature.

Discomfort in the workplace used to be the norm for men. We chopped down trees, we uprooted stumps, we hauled lumber (or rocks) to build shelters and fences. Mechanization has made these and other tasks much easier. At the end of the day you can see more results than ever. But the crane operator or bulldozer driver would have to admit that even though he changed the landscape, his machine did most of the work. But there are long-term benefits.

For a construction worker, the time span erecting a large building may be a matter of years. The day-to-day changes may be minuscule but eventually a structure will result. Long after the worker's labors are over, he can gaze upon the building and remember when it was just a vacant lot. He can drive by it with his kids in the car and say, "I did that." Kids dig Lego so they can appreciate the results. I suppose a CPA could point to a spreadsheet he set up on Excel and say "I did that" to his kids, but even if the wee folk are computer savvy and good at math, I don't think they'll be all that impressed. On the other hand, if he retreats to his man cave to pursue his woodworking hobby and turns out some custom toys for the kiddos, then they might take notice.

We have an abundance of people who want to change the world by making phone calls, soliciting donations, delivering speeches, pamphleteering, or marching in demonstrations. "Peaceful protesters" aside, they have little if any effect on the physical world. The numerous litterbugs who participate in marches don't count because the debris they leave behind was actually made by someone in a factory. The factory worker proposes; the litterbug disposes – improperly. The blue-collar guy in a factory changes the physical world every day simply by churning out stuff.

My humble work in the house and yard has never resulted in a paycheck. But I can see that my actions have had an effect on the physical world. I can't say the same for my office work. I've never gone home at the end of the day with blisters or sore muscles after eight hours of watching pixels dance across my computer screen. With blue collar work, you feel you have worked; with white collar work, you might get fatigued but you're not tired. It's not the same. For one thing, you sleep better when you're physically tired.

Granted, grunt labor requires little in the way of intelligence or skills. If you're working with power tools you do have to pay attention to what you're doing – mindfulness, as they call it today – to ensure you don't end up like an old-time Budd Company employee. On the other hand, routine but less potentially lethal tasks, such as raking leaves or weeding, allow your mind to drift while you work in a way that isn't possible when you're sitting at a keyboard or on the phone. You can work out a lot of things in your head while working in the yard. It's almost as good as sleeping on it. Or, for those religiously inclined, laborare est orare – to labor is to pray.

Today, thanks to our increasingly neo-paganistic worldview, we are entreated to tread lightly when we make our carbon footprint. Mother earth has been sexually harassed if not raped by generations of laborers – horrid men who tear up the world and never stop to think about how their actions disrupt all those fragile fire ant colonies and termite mounds.

Today, on and off the job, we have more and more people spending more and more time staring at a screen. Computers…smart phones…televisions…video games…is there anyone left who can get through the day without resorting to at least one of these electronic devices for work or recreation? The more time you spend with these gadgets, the more likely you will leave nothing behind in the real world after an entire day's waking hours…unless your toilet doesn't flush.

Is it possible that the latest riot du jour is not a result of racial unrest or political divisiveness but because we now have so many people who cannot notice any change in their world at the end of the day. Thanks to the coronavirus lockdowns, it is harder than ever to do anything in the real world. The individual is more ineffectual than ever. The physical world is barely aware of his existence.

Ah, but if one goes on a rampage…arson, looting, graffiti, vandalism…one has surely changed the landscape. One can go home after one's labors satisfied that one has made a tangible, visible difference.

And if the cities don't rebuild (and I'd be surprised if they did), then one day the Antifa/BLM participant can hike with his kids through the streets and neighborhoods he ravaged and point out boarded-up buildings, charred rubble, weed-infested sidewalks, and boast to his offspring:

"I did that!"

In His Own Words: Victimized by victim support advocates

September 17, 2020 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

It's day 24 of Domestic Violence Awareness Month 2014 for Men and Boys, the invisible victims of domestic violence. Today's In His Own Words is an example of the systemic abuse to which men and boys are frequently subjected. It is an egregious example of sexism and misandry. It is also an example of how many women use victimhood (real or imagined) as a form of "street cred" and/or social status.

"My ex-boyfriend cheated on me. Yeah well, my husband beat me and I had cancer. My adopted third world son has soooo many behavioral issues, we have to give him meds that make him morbidly obese, it's soooooo hard on me. That's nothing, I was raped by my college boyfriend. Big deal, I was molested by my father and gang raped by the marching band and have a deadbeat husband."

I have personally witnessed this kind of "victim off" in academic settings, clinical settings and, most recently, at a friend's birthday party — women trying to "out victim" each other. In other words, not in a therapeutic setting. These are women who were superficial acquaintances, colleagues and/or classmates, not intimates. It's disturbing. Healthy individuals don't want to be seen as victims, even if they have, in fact, been legitimately victimized.

"Tim" wanted to give back to his community by volunteering with a victim advocacy support agency. In the end, he became a victim of their bigotry and sexism. If this is how a victims advocacy organization treats male volunteers, just imagine how they treat male victims. Is it any wonder there are precious few services for male victims of domestic violence and sexual assault?

> Victimized by Victim Support Advocates
> In my mid twenties, I was a shy, naïve, introverted, but equally idealistic young man. I had a steady job (careers for INFJs), but I was still finding out who I was and what I wanted out of life. I decided that there was more to me than technology, and I started looking for a more human way to contribute to society than mere economic activity.
> Somehow, I found out about the work done by Victim Support, a volunteer organisation that helps victims of crime to recover from their experiences. They seemed a noble organisation, and volunteering my time to them seemed like a good way to do something positive for those for whom I felt empathy and compassion. So, I wandered down to the central police station (where their offices were co-located) and signed up.
> First, I was interviewed to screen for unsuitable candidates. I was asked questions concerning my motivations and attitude towards crime. Memorably, I was asked whether I would be willing to work with victims of rape. The idea struck me as being singularly inappropriate: a man is likely to be the last person a freshly raped woman would want to talk to and, never having even heard of the red pill, I said so, but also that if that was what a victim wanted, then of course I would do what I could. Their response was that, “Well, men get raped, too”.

A charitable reading of this question and their reply was to check that I didn’t have anything in my past (such as sexual abuse) that dealing with rape victims might trigger though, cynically — especially in retrospect — I wonder if this wasn’t some sort of shibboleth to gauge how ‘rapey’ I was myself.

I was duly accepted into the next intake of basic training seminars, which involved three or four intensive weekend-long, 8 hours a day seminars. Most of it was lecture format with socialisation between sessions, but there were group activities as well. I was by no means the only male there but, at 25, I was certainly the youngest one, and the women outnumbered the men by something like 3:1.

The first sign that something was amiss was when I approached the convenor about the source of a passage that had been handed out the previous day. “Our deepest fear” so caught my attention that I looked it up to find out more and I discovered that, where the convenor had attributed it to Nelson Mandela, the original passage is to be found in Marianne Williamson’s book, “A Return to Love.” (That book and its related work, “A Course in Miracles” is deeply new-agey stuff that is somewhat extreme, even for most new-agers, and is a whole ‘nuther story.)

I felt that Williamson deserved to be correctly attributed, not least so that others whose interest it might catch could find out more, but the convenor wasn’t remotely interested. She certainly didn’t care for what was actually true, and I got the distinct impression that she was more concerned about not losing face in front of her class than accurate course materials (even though I spoke to the convenor privately between sessions rather than draw attention to the error in front of the rest of the class).

Still, ‘not that important,’ I thought, and I dismissed it as just a matter different priorities. Looking back, though, I wonder if there wasn’t something else going through her mind.

One of the group activities was an exercise in exploring our own pasts and, if I wished to be uncharitable, just a hint of a parade of victim credentials. Many of those there described experiences of domestic violence and sexual assault themselves, and I recall feeling ‘outclassed,’ almost as if I didn’t deserve to be there because nothing particularly bad had happened to me. The task was to draw a few symbols representing certain events in our past in each of the four quadrants of a shield-like thing on a piece of flip-chart paper which was then to be pinned up along with everybody else’s. These were then discussed as a group, and then we paired up for further discussion.

It's not that I had no bad things in my past, but my father's stroke and subsequent death (when I was aged 7 and 17 respectively) seemed fairly ordinary and unremarkable compared to some of the horrors described by the other students. What this was all in aid of, I'm unsure (particularly as the point was repeated time and again that support work is emphatically not therapy), but I am certain of the effect: it made me feel extraordinarily vulnerable, it brought unprocessed grief to the surface and tears with it, and I see no reason this would not be true for the other students.

I don't remember much more detail of this except that the guy I paired up with, and who saw my grief, was a middle-aged, softly-spoken Canadian gentleman. I never did quite shake the feeling that we were constantly being evaluated, especially in that particular activity.

I think I got through most or all of the class work, and the next weekend we were scheduled to meet at the hospital for a tour of the areas and procedures we would be expected to know in the course of this work. At about 10:30am one weekday morning, I got a phone call from the softly-spoken Canadian. He said that he had something he needed to discuss with me, and could I meet him at the police station (VS' base, and where the training sessions were held) at noon? Since it was only a 10 minute walk away, I agreed.

Immediately, I knew something was wrong. Why was a fellow student phoning me up and asking to meet at the police station? What was it that he couldn't discuss over the phone? How, indeed, did he get my phone number, private information protected by law?

The softly-spoken Canadian gentleman turned out not to be a student at all, but rather a member of that chapter's management board. He led me into a small room and baldly stated that a complaint had been laid against me by one of the women on the course. He would not say by whom (or even how many complaints), what the complaint was or what I was supposed to have done, only that my presence made the women 'feel unsafe.' I was given two choices: 'voluntarily' sign the provided letter of resignation (in which case the whole matter would be dropped and forgotten about, with no record made), or face official (but unspecified) proceedings, which would inevitably result in my being expelled from the course and other, implied, unspecified consequences.

What is a young man, in a police station, accused of unspecified perversions to do? I had not read Franz Kafka's Der Prozeß (The Trial), but I instinctively knew that I could not win, so I yielded. I intuitively knew that I would stand no chance of getting justice done without a long, expensive and most likely very public legal process, and even then, not necessarily.

Empathy for the suffering of others is, for the INFJ (personality type), second only to their sense of integrity. That integrity was now being besmirched by the most egregious of means, and suspected of unspeakable wrong that anybody with even a passably adequate sense of empathy and compassion for others would not do. In tears, I signed the paper bearing that one, bald line, and I plead to be told what I had done wrong, whether there was anything I could do to make it right, and whether there was any chance of being able to try again at some future date.

I was told that now that I had resigned, the matter was closed and he could not divulge any further information. Reluctantly, though, he did add something about my having followed a female member of the course to her car, but would not elaborate.

I spent months afterwards trying to fathom what he might have been talking about. I could think of only two possibilities: I did, indeed, walk with a middle aged lady to her car, deep in conversation after one of the course days, but it evidently wasn't that, for by chance I met this same lady in the street some time later. She greeted me warmly, and said that she was sorry that I left the course so suddenly, and that she and the other students had "missed my thoughtful contributions".

The other possibility is that I happened to follow another course member along an arterial route in my car a short distance away from the police station after one session because that was the direction I happened to be going in. "Followed to her car" is not the same as "followed in your car," but it's the only thing that makes any sense.

This woman happened to be a feminist and a lawyer who, I think, specialised in indigenous rights.

The story does not end there. I tried to appeal the decision, but was told that the matter was closed. I wrote to the national oversight body, but was told that there was no case, and anyway, their policy was to back up the decision of the chapter's management committee. They did, however, refer me to a counsellor to help me deal with the aftermath (at my own cost, naturally).

This counsellor was a piece of work. In our first meeting he reached over while listening to my story and pulled a piece of tape in its dispenser and stuck it to the knurled edge, but did not tear it off just to see, apparently, how long it would take for me to get annoyed and do it for him. Later, he complained about being a counsellor and said that he was probably going to quit the profession. He also said that he thought I might have Asperger's Syndrome (of which the IT sector has more than its fair share), even though one with this condition would be exceedingly unlikely to volunteer for this work for the reason I did — out of empathy for the victims of crime.

Not only is it a gross breach of professional standards to offer even the suggestion of a diagnosis that he was not qualified to make, this counsellor, it > turned out, was an advisor to the very same Victim Support chapter that perpetrated this sorry mess in the first place, but neither he nor the Victim Support guy who referred me told me this beforehand. If I knew then what I know now, I'd have demanded that this guy be struck from the relevant professional register but, as I said, I was young and naïve.

> It has taken me over a decade of therapy and time to heal these wounds and although the episode doesn't haunt me as once it did, I still feel the shame for something I did not do. To this day, I still do not know what provoked all of this. The only reason to speak publicly is the chance it might help other boys and men. That, and because I can't expect others to be vulnerable and talk about their pain if I'm not prepared to do the same.

Australian men experiencing domestic violence often don't know where to go

Relationships Australia purports to be a major supporter of individuals and families experiencing domestic violence.

So I wondered: how can they help if you are a male experiencing domestic violence? For example, what services can they provide if you are a male experiencing physical abuse, psychological and emotional abuse, coercive control, and financial abuse within your relationship?

To answer my question, I had a look at their page entitled 'What to do if you are a male victim of domestic violence?' found at this link: https://www.relationshipsnsw.org.au/what-to-do-if-you-are-a-male-victim-of-domestic-violence/

On this page, men are encouraged to 'accept and recognize that it is happening to you….and take steps to break the cycle'. But there is no mention of the need for the abusing party to take accountability.

Further on, there is a recommendation that men call a 'male domestic violence support service', yet no specific service is suggested. Instead, there is a generic recommendation that men can seek counselling or speak with the police.

Curiously, the author goes on to mention the following:

> 'While domestic violence of any kind is unacceptable, it is important to highlight that there are support services to help men who are perpetrators such as the Taking Responsibility Program, an 18-week course. The program aims to help men who have been abusive in their relationships and want to change that. It > also provides support and courses for partners and anyone who may be affected by these abusive behaviours.'

At several points throughout the article, the author mentions how men may be reluctant to disclose their experiences of domestic violence, due to shame and the fear of judgement. Keeping this in mind, I was skeptical that the information found on this page would help to break down the barriers perpetuating male silence. Men are being encouraged to speak up and take action to break their unhealthy relationship patterns, but the only tangible service offered is an 18-week course that focuses on remediating mens' problematic relationship behaviours.

The message is clear. Regardless of whether you are a male victim or perpetrator, you are a key part of the problem. There are services available to you, but you will need to do more research on who can help. Your experience of being abused is not important enough for us to provide a tangible list of services available to you, or to offer courses that focus on your experience of being abused or the need for your partner to take accountability. However, if you are a perpetrator of violence, we can rehabilitate you with our 18-week program.

Putting myself in the shoes of men who remain silent about their experience of being abused, I couldn't help but wonder how Relationships Australia could really help. I can imagine that in moments of desperation, men may read this page and walk away with little direction regarding the services that are available to them in their time of need.

The lack of appreciation of male suffering that can be seen on the Relationships Australia website is a reflection of several realities within Australian society. There is little funding and services available for men who experience a wide range of abuse within intimate relationships. The media predominantly focuses on women as victims and men as perpetrators, and this masks the more insidious forms of abuse that men may experience, such as emotional and psychological manipulation, stalking, slapping and kicking, and the imposition of isolation from one's friends and family. The fact that men experience issues such as these to an equal or greater extent than women has been documented in several studies cited on the 1 In 3 Campaign website. This campaign aims to shed light on the often silent experiences of men who are abused within intimate relationships.

The 1 In 3 Campaign website challenges the narrative that is perpetuated by the White Ribbon campaign; namely that domestic violence is a gendered issue, and that only women and children need protection from the potentially violent men in their lives.

More help is needed for Australian men experiencing domestic violence in all its forms. Services that are currently available to men experiencing domestic violence include:

So long, Led Zeppelin. Hello Jade Michael and the FTSU Crew

September 18, 2020 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

You got a belated Christmas present today, and it could not have come at a better time. Jade Michael, artist, professional musician and MRA, founder of Artistry Against Misandry, has taken his talent hammer and given it a mighty swing to our benefit. He has forged, in the fires of his own passion, the new theme song for AVfM Radio, titled Go My Own Way. It is not to be confused with the similarly titled offering from Fleetwood Mac, Go Your Own Way. No, not in the least.

Jade, with his band, Jade Michael and the FTSU Crew, have produced a veritable anthem for the red pill crowd. It is replete with a great, purist rock sound, a touch of humor, attitude, and a ton of gut level, red pill honesty. Pay close attention to the end for the invocation of Thomas James Ball. He also included a separate monologue that kicks so much ass that we will be playing it next Thursday on the radio program, when Go My Own Way will edge out When the Levee Breaks as our official theme song.

On behalf of all of us, Jade, thank you. And keep doing what you do.

You can download the song free, HERE.

September 23, 2020 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

This article may at first appear to be off-topic for A Voice for Men but given the heavy feminist bias in the online encyclopedia that anyone can edit we felt publication of this article was warranted. –Ed

The organization behind Wikipedia is not well known. This organization, the Wikimedia Foundation, holds 501(c)(3) status and is the legal structure that maintains the many wiki projects. The feminist bias in the English Wikipedia is well established, not the least because of its complete disinterest in addressing feminist edit-a-thons. Feminist edit-a-thons are conducted entirely in the open and involve feminists working together to introduce further feminist bias in the English Wikipedia. Some feminist professors have even given credit to students for adding feminist bias to Wikipedia. Meanwhile, the Wikimedia Foundation stands by and does nothing.

At this point, the feminist and leftist bias inherent in the Wikimedia Foundation is there for all to see.

Another Wikimedia Foundation project is Wikiquote. Wikiquote offers a Quote of the Day. At the time of publication the Quote of the Day is from American ~~political commentator~~ entertainer Bruce Springsteen:

> I don't think anybody truly knows where we're going from here yet. It depends on too many unknowns. We don't know where the COVID virus is going to take us. We don't know where Black Lives Matter is going to take us right now. Do we get a real practical conversation going about race and policing and ultimately about the economic inequality that's been a stain on our social contract?
> And of course, nobody knows where our next election is going to take us. I believe that our current president is a threat to our democracy. He simply makes any kind of reform that much harder. I don't know if our democracy could stand another four years of his custodianship. These are all existential threats to our democracy and our American way of life.

There's a lot to be said for being a 501(c)(3) organization. The English Wikipedia notes:

> A 501(c)(3) organization is a corporation, trust, unincorporated association, or other type of organization exempt from federal income tax under section 501(c)(3) of Title 26 of the United States Code.

Exempt from federal income tax. That's a big deal. An organization that didn't have to pay income tax could potentially amass vast wealth. Indeed, Wikipedia has this to say about the organization that maintains it:

> As of 2020, the foundation employs over 300 people, with annual revenues in excess of US$109.9 million.

Yes, vast wealth indeed.

Next time The Wikimedia Foundation runs banner ads on the English Wikipedia asking for money I'm going to go to this page and screen capture it with the ad at the top.

Of course it can't all be about a having a headquarters in a highrise in San Franciso, or jetting around the world to conferences. There are rules. Quite strict rules as it happens. For example the IRS has this to say on the topic of 501(c)(3) organizations:

> Under the Internal Revenue Code, all section 501(c)(3) organizations are absolutely prohibited from directly or indirectly participating in, or intervening in, any political campaign on behalf of (or in opposition to) any candidate for elective public office.

Absolutely prohibited. Directly or indirectly. Sounds pretty broad. And strict.

> Contributions to political campaign funds or public statements of position (verbal or written) made on behalf of the organization in favor of or in opposition to any candidate for public office clearly violate the prohibition against political campaign activity. Violating this prohibition may result in denial or revocation of tax-exempt status and the imposition of certain excise taxes.

At this point it's worth reading Mr Springsteen's quote again, clearly and proudly displayed as a Wikiquote Quote of the Day. And this isn't unique.

Quote of the Day – September 21, 2020

> What fascinates me — mesmerizes me — isn't so much Trump himself as the American government he's crafted: a major world power with no policy, no consistency, and no idea what it's doing. — Stephen King

Quote of the Day – September 20, 2020

> My most fervent wish is that I will not be replaced until a new president is installed. –Ruth Bader Ginsburg

Quote of the Day – September 8, 2020

> Donald Trump is the most dangerous president in the modern history of our country and he must be defeated.

> Tragically, we have a president today who is a pathological liar and who is running a corrupt administration. He clearly does not understand the Constitution of the United States and thinks that he is a president who is above the law. In my view, he is a racist, a sexist, a homophobe, a xenophobe and a religious bigot, and he must be defeated, and I will do everything in my power to make that happen. –Bernie Sanders

Quote of the Day – September 7, 2020

> Donald Trump's hold on history loosened, and may be breaking. In some new way his limitations are being seen and acknowledged, and at a moment when people are worried about the continuance of their country and their own ability to continue within it. He hasn't been equal to the multiple crises. Good news or bad, he rarely makes any situation better. And everyone kind of knows. –Peggy Noonan

Quote of the Day – September 5, 2020

> We cannot allow Donald Trump to redefine the Republican Party. That is what he is doing, as long as we give the impression by our silence that his words are our words and his actions are our actions. We cannot allow that impression to go unchallenged.
> As has been true since our beginning, we Republicans are the party of Lincoln, the party of the Union. We believe in our founding principle. We are proud of our illustrious history. We believe that we are an essential part of present-day American politics. Our country needs a responsibly conservative party. But our party has been corrupted by this hateful man, and it is now in peril. –John Danforth

Quote of the Day – August 29, 2020

> The damage inflicted by President Trump's naiveté, egotism, false equivalence, and sympathy for autocrats is difficult to calculate. … President Trump proved not only unable, but unwilling to stand up to Putin. He and Putin seemed to be speaking from the same script as the president made a conscious choice to defend a tyrant against the fair questions of a free press, and to grant Putin an uncontested platform to spew propaganda and lies to the world. … No prior president has ever abased himself more abjectly before a tyrant. Not only did President Trump fail to speak the truth about an adversary; but speaking for America to the world, our president failed to defend all that makes us who we are — a republic of free people dedicated to the cause of liberty at home and abroad. American presidents must be the champions of that cause if it is to succeed.

> Americans are waiting and hoping for President Trump to embrace that sacred responsibility. One can only hope they are not waiting totally in vain. –John McCain

> I have joined the political arena so that the powerful can no longer beat up on people that cannot defend themselves. Nobody knows the system better than me, which is why I alone can fix it. –Donald Trump

This one is a little different from the others. The person who suggested it made it clear it is intended to hold President Trump accountable for his actions.

In contrast to quotes about President Trump, quotes by and about Joe Biden and Kamala Harris have a much more positive slant:

Quote of the Day – August 21, 2020

> We must rekindle the fire of idealism in our society — for nothing suffocates the promise of America more than unbounded cynicism and indifference. We must reclaim the tradition of community in our society. Only by recognizing that we share a common obligation to one another and to our country can we ever hope to maximize our national or personal potential. We must reassert the oneness of America. America has been and must once again be the seamless web of caring and community. –Joe Biden

Quote of the Day – August 12, 2020

> People in power are trying to convince us that the villain in our American story is each other. But that is not our story. That is not who we are. That's not our America.
> Our United States of America is not about us versus them. It's about We the people!
> And in this moment, we must all speak truth about what's happening.
> Seek truth, speak truth and fight for the truth. –Kamala Harris

I have posted Quotes of the Day only from August 2020 and September 2020 but a very clear bias is evident.

I served on the board of directors of a United States 501(c)(3) charity for four years (2011-2015) and I would have been concerned if a project operating under our fiscal sponsorship had made clear and consistently politically biased remarks such as these. Of course, this is for the IRS to judge. Were they to receive any complaints about this matter I am sure they would investigate.

Gender columnists and sex discrimination

Why do the Washington Post and the New York Times both have "gender columnists"? Should anyone be surprised that they are both women, the Post's Monica Hesse and the Times' Jessica Bennett?

Were any men considered or even eligible for the Post's position? (I think we all know the answer to that question, don't we?) Wouldn't a more accurate description of this role be "female-only-perspective gender columnist"?

Has either woman ever provided a male perspective on "gender issues"? As a lifelong reader of the Post, I can't say that I ever read a column by Hesse that did so. In fact, I offer her 2014 article about the International Conference on Men's Issues, Men's rights activists, gathering to discuss all the ways society has done them wrong, as a premier example of her—and the Post's—gender bias. As documented here, her article was a "hatchet job" against the fair-minded men and women who are only trying to communicate the downside of the male gender role and to address the awful excesses of feminism.

While I'm sure that these two women are both fine people, it has to be asked: If women have, like African Americans, indeed been victims of real discrimination, then why haven't the Post or the Times designated race columnists as well? Hasn't racial discrimination always been a more significant problem than what has been called "sex discrimination"?

Let me be blunt: In American history, how many women have been lynched or otherwise been the victims, because of their gender, of what can only be described as a century-long campaign of terror? More recently, how many women have been, like George Floyd, the deliberate victims of a "21st-century lynching"—same death-by-asphyxiation, just without the noose and tree?

(To those who might reply that women have suffered from a centuries-long campaign of domestic violence terror perpetrated by male oppressors, the truth is that women perpetuate at least 50% of domestic violence. Just ask Johnny Depp. Or read the book When She Was Bad – Violent Women and the Myth of Innocence.)

Let me repeat the question: If the Post and Times have designated gender columnists, for God's sake why don't they also have race columnists?

It's because they and other media organizations have made gender more important than race.

The fact is that feminists have provably misappropriated the term "discrimination" from the racial sense and have disingenuously applied it to the gender arena.

And the Post and the Times have glibly and stupidly facilitated this misappropriation, through decades of thoughtless use of the term and repetition in tens of thousands—or more likely hundreds of thousands—of articles, editorials, opinion pieces, videos, and entire TV shows, with a one-sided, feminist bias.

So how can this misappropriation of the term "discrimination" be proven?

By answering a single, simple question, "What occupation requires no education, no training, and no licensing, where you can literally make billions of dollars—yes, that's a "B", *billions—that is filled exclusively by women, and that requires absolutely no skills at all?

Other than uttering the words "I do?"

The answer, of course, is "wife".

For example, MacKenzie Bezos, former wife of Washington Post owner Jeff Bezos, who in 2019 divorced Bezos, walked away with a 4% stake of Amazon worth nearly $40 billion! The divorce made her one of the 25 richest billionaires on earth.

Here are some other "discriminated-against" women who benefited solely from being female:

- Anna Murdoch-Mann, former wife of Rupert Murdoch, received $1.7 billion when she divorced the media mogul
- Robyn Denise Moore, former wife of Mel Gibson, received $400 million when she divorced the actor
- Juanita Jordan, former wife of Michael Jordon, received $168 million when she divorced the basketball player

This list wouldn't be complete without mentioning Anna Nicole Smith, the gold-digging former Playboy magazine Playmate of the Year, who in 1994 at age 26 married 89-year-old Texas oil billionaire J. Howard Marshall II. Robbing the cradle? What about robbing the grave? Shouldn't there be a law against women taking advantage of (likely) senile old men?

And all this for just saying those two little magic words, "I do!"

Can anyone at the Post name any African American who similarly benefited, who became rich, sometimes beyond-imagination rich, just by virtue of his or her race, in the same way that women generally benefit due to their gender?

Of course not! You see, real discrimination doesn't have an upside, and the so-called "oppressors" don't suffer from a significant downside.

And men sure suffer from a significant downside of being male that should embarrass the millions of men and women—feminist or not— who claim that "women are oppressed by men". From divorce settlements, to who got into Titanic's lifeboats, to who dies in the "death professions" (where men are ten times more likely than women to be killed), to who can be enslaved (a.k.a. "drafted") to die or be maimed in the nation's wars, and in scores or even hundreds of other ways, women benefit from the sacrifices of men.

Why is this important? Because the common, feminist-defined understanding of how women suffered from their gender role tells only half the story, and completely ignores how men have suffered from their gender role.

And for the past several decades, the world's media, including the Post and the Times, have helped perpetuate this dishonest, feminist-driven, one-sided depiction of gender roles.

So, I pose this question to both the Washington Post and the New York Times:

"Will you either eliminate the position of "gender columnist" at your two fine newspapers, or hire race columnists to mirror the gender-based positions?"

Why Men's Rights Activists Should Care About Folklore

October 7, 2020 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

Feminism is ubiquitous in fairy tale studies. Donald Haase edited a book about it: Fairy Tales and Feminism: New Approaches. Nancy Canepa, in Teaching Fairy Tales, called it "groundbreaking" and responsible for "stimulating" conversations within the field. Jack Zipes declared Laura Gonzenbach more important than the Brothers Grimm in his introduction to Beautiful Angiola, because her collection "more genuinely and more candidly" represented "the female if not feminist perspective on life."

Men's rights activists should be concerned about this political appropriation of folklore since the genre is globally popular (e.g., Disney) and has been used for "consciousness-raising and consensus-building in a wide range of social movements," according to Ohio State University's Center for Folklore Studies. This means worldwide pop culture and humanitarianism are being shaped by anti-male prejudices.

The best recourse is to reclaim folktales. Good candidates include "The Cow-Tail Switch," which affirms male life and fatherhood; "Strike but Hear," which champions due process; and "Ara the Fair and Shamiram," which acknowledges male rape victims, as these tales examine men's gendered experiences, and are underdiscussed among folklorists, giving MRAs the opportunity to popularize them and set the standard for how they're interpreted. Text-to-world analysis, which compares real and fictional scenarios, helps the process by allowing MRAs to blend male issues discussion with textual study.

The Cow-Tail Switch

Found in The Cow-Tail Switch and Other West African Stories, this Liberian tale subverts common attitudes about men and their social roles. Ogaloussa goes hunting and disappears. Afterwards, his wife births a son, Puli, who asks where his father is, prompting his brothers to search the forest until they find their father's corpse, and magically reanimate it. Ogaloussa returns home and crafts a cow-tail switch, saying it's for the son most responsible for his rescue. His children argue over who deserves it, with other villagers arguing too, but he gives it to Puli and everyone agrees it's the right choice.

The primary theme is the value of male wellness. Initially, nobody attempted to find Ogaloussa after he disappears, not even his family. This reflects male disposability.

Manifestations of the phenomenon include the Canadian government's exclusion of men and boys from its Inquiry Into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women, lesser assistance given to homeless men in the U.S., and the abandonment of military-aged men during warzone evacuations. However, this tale critiques such attitudes. Puli, unfamiliar with his father, and unaccustomed to the man endangering himself for others' benefit, is rewarded for caring about him by being gifted the titular object. A subtler critique comes from Ogaloussa and Puli being the sole characters with forenames which are generally reserved for important characters. The implication is that men who suffer are important and only those willing to help them deserve recognition.

The secondary theme is the importance of fathers. Puli's older brothers are competent individuals, implied to know combat, navigation, teamwork and tracking, along with their magic. While the text doesn't confirm it, it's reasonable to assume Ogaloussa taught them their survivalist skills given his occupation. Combined with the brothers' willingness to locate their father when Puli asks for him (a loving gesture), the story affirms what clinical research proves: father involvement positively effects educational success and prosocial behavior.

A men's rights perspective also answers to the story's final question: Does Puli, who remembered Ogaloussa and prompted his rescue, deserve more recognition than his brothers, who found and resurrected their father? As a "dilemma tale," the story's outcome is meant to be debatable. But the ending is inevitable considering Puli did the most and thus of anyone: he set a precedent that benefits all men in his community (i.e., valuing male life).

Strike but Hear

A story from Folk-Tales of Bengal that promotes due process rights. Three princes are tasked with patrolling their kingdom and on their first night the youngest son meets a guardian deity who warns him of his father's impending death. The prince beheads the cobra that was going to bite his father, but during the cleanup, he drops blood on his stepmother's breast. He wipes it off as his stepmother (who hates him) awakens, and she tells his father that he tried to rape her. Believing the accusation, the father summons his sons and asks them how he should punish the crime. They tell him to kill the perpetrator but warn him to prove guilt, citing three instances of people being harmed due to unsubstantiated claims. The youngest son then explains what happened and his father believes him.

The rajah's belief in his son's testimony is significant because a feature of real false allegations is that people ignore counterevidence. For instance, Reverend George Burroughs was executed on accusations of witchcraft during the Salem Witch Trials, despite reciting the Lord's Prayer perfectly, which was believed impossible for witches to do. Furthermore, civil rights activist Ida B. Wells noted that "No colored man, no matter what his reputation, is safe from lynching if a white woman, no matter what her standing or motive, cares to charge him with insult or assault." Even when the targets survive their lives are devastated. Consider the three lacrosse players from Duke University, whom were threatened with castration by angry protesters. While they were unharmed, their reputations were ruined and they faced intense hostility and scrutiny from the media and school faculty.

When read from a men's rights perspective, this tale exposes false accusations as timeless and international; prevalent enough to warrant documentation in oral narrative. It also joins a body of narratives that explore the topic: the Greco-Roman myth of Hippolytus and Phaedra and the Egyptian story of Anpu and Bata.

Ara the Fair and Shamiram

Taken from The Heritage of Armenian Literature, this legend highlights male sexual victimization. Queen Semiramis (Shamiram) hears of Ara's beauty and becomes obsessed with him, proposing either marriage or copulation, but the king declines both. The queen retaliates by invading Armenia with the intention of subduing and ravishing Ara. However, during the attack, he's killed and Semiramis fails to magically resurrect him. Armenian troops prepare a counterstrike, intent on avenging their king, but Semiramis convinces them that he's been revived by disguising another man as him, ending the war in her favor.

Ara's rejection of an eager woman is significant. His chastity contradicts perceptions of men as hypersexual – a stereotypes so pervasive it's influenced policies. One example was airlines barring men – but not women – from sitting beside unaccompanied minors; the assumption being that men are potential molesters. Inversely, Semiramis is defined by her predation. Her lasciviousness corresponds with data showing women commit 13% of rapes and 79% of "made to penetrates" against men. Moreover, the queen's use of military power to try to rape Ara reflects cultural and institutional acceptance of sexual violence against men throughout the world. Boys in Afghanistan are sometimes sold by their families as sex slaves to warlords. Israel has a legal definition of rape that excludes male victims. And the U.S. government once forced a survivor of statutory rape to pay child support to the woman who assaulted him.

Looked at from a men's rights angle, this story disrupts contemporary Western attitudes of gender and morality that frame females more positively than men, resulting in preferential treatment of women in various sectors of life. This older narrative shows that the ancients had a nuanced concept of good and evil with relation to the sexes.

Conclusion

In Fairy Tales from Before Fairy Tales, Jan M. Ziolkowski writes, "Being incorrigibly optimistic (if only when it comes to stories), I have faith that people will be inquisitive about ancient and medieval literatures if those literatures can be shown to relate somehow to their present." These literatures do relate to our present since they capture men's gendered experiences. They also belong to a financially lucrative and socially relevant genre that spans the world. Why not utilize that potential to bring attention to the issues and needs of men and boys? Doing so would further human rights progress while adding intellectual diversity to an academic discipline.

Workplace deaths and gender gaps

October 11, 2020 | by Gwenny Eva | Link | Original Link

On February 9th, 2019, 54-year-old Michigan steel manufacturing employee Daniel Hill experienced a particularly agonizing accident on the job. While measuring the solution of a vat of sulfuric acid, he fell in. Fully submerged, Hill suffered severe acid burns, as did his coworkers who struggled to pull him from the vat. The fire department was called, and Hill was rushed to the hospital, where he died later that night. One fire official declared he suffered some of the worst pain imaginable.

Daniel Hill

This horrific occurrence may have been a one-of-its-kind, isolated incident in the case of Daniel and his environment, but the harrowing reality is that dangerous workplace accidents claim the health and lives of men like Daniel Hill every day. It's men who are by far most affected by this disturbing phenomenon. In the instance of virtually every physically demanding, exerting and exhausting profession—from maintenance to machinery, from construction to trucking, from roofing to rigging to mining to logging—it is men who carry the lion's share. These occupations do not simply require manual labor and measurable body strength. They heavily and regularly tax the body and system, and oftentimes result in accidents. Accidents many and varied.

Like the case of Kyle Hancock from Glen Burnie, Maryland, who was at work on a sewer line in Baltimore on June 5th, 2018. A 15-foot trench caved on him, burying him alive. After rescue workers extracted his body from the collapsed trench, his cause of death was determined as asphyxia. He was only 20 years old.

Kyle Hancock's sewer accident

With men in such a majority of these jobs, it's not surprising but logical that the most workplace deaths take the lives of men. But what one may not anticipate is the startlingly high percentage. According to Forbes, 2017 saw a total of 5,147 job fatalities. 4,761 of them were male. This comes out to an equivalent of 92.5 out of 100, rounding up to 93%—an approximate representation of the entire 21st century.

It's understandable that as we've seen, men both younger and older will be vastly represented in these job environments, as they are better suited to these professions and their demands. Women are capable of manual labor, bodybuilding and mass muscle development, assisted by factors like genetics and hormone treatments. But for the majority of women, these pursuits are not prioritized as worthwhile. Women tend to feel that careers in office settings, childcare and domestic maintenance are more suited to their feminine nature. Secondarily, many of them find the male-dominated milieu of manual labor undesirable. Few or none deny that of the 7% of female workplace deaths, these lost lives are as valuable as their male counterparts.

Or are they seen as more so?

Does society see fit to maintain the abundance of men in these positions because they view men as expendable? Are men utterly disposable to us? And if so, is this why the percentage of male workplace deaths is rarely seen by scratching the surface? Does the fact that these dangerous jobs pay so much more than safe employment make us indignant or unhappy, on the behalf of those who work safe, less-paying jobs? Is it all the fault of patriarchy, the universal scapegoat of gender issues?

Nicole Russell wrote astutely about the semi-visible apathy of society vis-à-vis male job mortality, stating that of the #1 most dangerous profession—logging—all the way to #20—mining—men make up anywhere from 85 to 99% of the laborers—and thus deaths. She goes on to briefly explore the motivation of men to fill these occupations—with a little help from Jordan Peterson—as well as the motivation of feminism not to care that overall, men are at risk while women work in more secure, protected environments. Is it accurate to regard women as human and men as lesser forms of life when we let men perform these labors for us at their potential peril, sometimes dying, leaving us with a gender workplace gap the size of the Grand Canyon?

Did you hear the news? White men were not affected by the economic downturn engendered by the pandemic! Readers – at least those of you who belong to the Caucasian caucus – don't you feel fortunate?

How do I know that white men were left untouched by the pandemic? The Texas Rangers baseball team told me so! And Comerica Bank corroborated the assertion! A major league sports team and a bank with assets of more than $85 billion would never lie to us, would they?

You see, the Rangers and Comerica (headquartered in Dallas) teamed up for a program called Rally Back With the Rangers to help "small businesses in our area [North Texas] get back on their feet." Since the program is reserved for minority-owned or woman-owned businesses, that must mean that small business owners deficient in melanin but not testosterone completely sidestepped the pandemic.

All right, I'm being cynical here, but after a while it's second nature. We have arrived at the point where it can be posited, overtly or tacitly, that white men operate under optimum conditions at all places and at all times. Therefore, it is perfectly acceptable to prohibit them from certain types of competition where they might better themselves.

I don't know how many white men nationwide do business with Comerica but I'm sure the bank would be in big trouble if they took their business elsewhere. From attending Ranger games, I can state that the dominant demographic – a plurality if not a majority – is white males. Of course, that was not the case in the season just past, as attendance was nil and true demographic equity reigned supreme.

The Rally Back With the Rangers Grand Prize, if you can call it that, includes:

1. Four social media posts on Rangers social media feeds.
2. Ten 30-second radio spots during 2021 Ranger games.
3. A half-page advertisement in the Rangers 2021 scorecard/magazine.
4. Four tickets to a 2021 game.
5. A private suite night (presumably for entertaining customers/clients).

As you can see, the Rally Back program is small potatoes, a low-budget low-risk public relations gambit. But you have to wonder…why not open the program to all small business owners? Well, that's all well and good, but gosh darn it all, it'll never win any prizes in the corporate wokestakes competition. So the white man is the odd man out. As Samuel Goldwyn, legendary movie producer and purveyor of malaprops, once said, "Include me out." OK, Sam, if you want out, consider yourself out. But thanks for the title of this essay.

The Rally Back With the Rangers competition invited entrants to submit essays (1,000 words or less) or videos (5 minutes or less) expounding on what struggles and obstacles they had overcome to successfully build their businesses and how those businesses support and add value to the community. This narrative accounts for 60% of the score. Originality/Creativity is worth 20% while "connection and experience with the Rangers" accounts for 20%.

The second and third-place winners will get their names mentioned on social media in the final video and four tickets to as 2021 Ranger game. Well, whoop-de-do!

The female video contestant who displays the most pleasant disposition will receive the Miss Congeniality Award. (Just made that up to see if you were paying attention.)

Now the Rangers and Comerica don't come right out and say white men need not apply, but they do say you have to be a woman-owned or minority-owned small business owner. And they want to know if your business has officially been certified as WBE (Women Business Enterprise), MBE (Minority Business Enterprise), as well as the traditional SBE (Small Business Enterprise).

No word at all on transgenderism. I guess if you identify as a female, they will give you the benefit of the doubt. Of course, any number of "female" businesses have a (pardon the expression) titular CEO with a female name, but the real boss is a father, husband or brother. If that's what it takes to get some lucrative contracts for a family business, then that's what it takes.

The official rules of the contest are largely boilerplate, saying you have to be over 18 and you have to live within a 50-mile radius of the Rangers' ballpark, Globe Life Field; in other words, somewhere in the Dallas-Fort Worth area. It is possible to nominate someone other than yourself, but the rules state the nominee must be "currently living." I don't know that I go along with that. The dead need a helping hand, since they cannot nominate themselves. Paradoxically, though they cannot be nominated, the dead have been known to vote in Texas elections. In some squeakers, they can make all the difference.

As I said above, the payoff for winning this contest is certainly rather paltry given the resources of Comerica Bank and the Texas Rangers. As manosphere issues go, the contest is hardly worth mentioning. But, damn it all, it's the principle of the thing. They could have had a contest for all small business owners. After all the contestants had entered, then they could rig the outcome any way they wanted and no one would be the wiser. Still, I guess it saves time to rig the contest up front…not so many entries to sift through. And if no one objects…

Unfortunately, we've come a long way, baby, when it comes to what the public will accept without pushback. Let's take a brief glance backwards.

Believe it or not, kiddies, in the bad old days, it was perfectly acceptable for newspapers – even the most "progressive" of the bunch – to run employment ads saying "female help wanted" or "male help wanted."

Then along came the civil rights revolution. So we had generic help wanted advertisements. As a corollary, we had a change in terminology. No more jobs for cameramen but for camerapersons, for example. No more stewardesses, just flight attendants.

In government and private industry, the call went out – we want "the best and the brightest." Regardless of your "race, color, or creed," a very popular phrase in the old days, but rarely heard today. They hadn't gotten around to adding "or genitalia," but everyone got the idea.

One of the finest things you could have said about some public figure a few decades ago was that he was "color-blind." In other words, he judged people not by the color of their skin but by the content of their character. Now where have I heard that before?

Color-blindness was one of the most marvelous honorifics that could be added to a person's name: You, sir, are a gentleman and a scholar – and color-blind to boot!" Go directly to sainthood, do not pass Go.

Then they came up with affirmative action, which was a policy but not a law. If you didn't follow it, no one could sue you; but if you repudiated it, you were vulnerable in the court of public opinion.

I don't know what policy wonk or think tank came up with the phrase "affirmative action," but it's a corker. After all, if you don't practice affirmative action, you must be practicing negative action. In other words, if you're not part of the solution, you're part of the problem – another popular phrase in decades past. A more modest version of the contemporary "Silence is violence."

Affirmative action was supposed to provide a little nudge to those who were underrepresented in whatever endeavor the policy was applied to. Theoretically, it was supposed to be a tie-breaker. In a given situation, if the minority or female applicant was the equal of a white male applicant, said minority or female would be given preference, supposedly to rectify the wrongs of centuries of past discrimination. But – again, theoretically – it was not supposed to mean that a lesser qualified minority or female applicant would be picked over a better qualified white male applicant.

Proponents of affirmative action were adamant that it was not tantamount to quotas.

Then came demands for equity – in essence, quotas.

Unfortunately, in a contest there can be but one winner. In an objective competition, wherein the scoreboard or leaderboard clearly ranks the contestants on the basis of results, the outcome takes care of itself. But in more subjective competitions, such as the Rally Back campaign, the judges decide who the winner is. By banning white males from the competition, they have already decided who the winner will not be.

White man, you might have the most kick-ass small business in North Texas, you might employ dozens of people – many of them women or minorities – who support families and spend money and pay taxes. Hell, you might have Ranger season tickets and commercial and personal bank accounts at Comerica. For good measure, you might even put up a "Black Lives Matter" sign at your front door. A fat lot of good it will do you when it comes time to hand out the goodies.

Now if this were just a ballclub and a bank going rogue, it wouldn't be such a big deal.

Unfortunately, it's not about going rogue; it's about going mainstream.

When Joe Biden was asked about his choice of a running mate, he stated flat-out he was going to pick a woman of color. A bold statement…true, it eliminates maybe 80% of the people in his party, but remember, we're no longer operating under the "best and brightest" banner. Color-blindness has been cured! The scales have fallen from our eyes! Praise the Lord and raise the rainbow banner high! All hail the Woke WOC Veep!

Well, it wasn't surprising that an old white man like Biden would attempt to appeal to the deep left of his party. And he damn sure did as he promised. Why would he do otherwise? How could he lose? He knew that no male Democrat would raise a voice in protest. No op-ed page or talking head in any of the corporate media would dare criticize his criteria.

Then when Ruth Bader Ginsburg ascended to dwarf heaven, President Trump announced that he was going to name a woman to take her place on the Supreme Court. Now he wasn't as restrictive as Biden. He didn't say it had to be a WOC. Like a horny drunk in a whorehouse…any woman will do. And I'm not surprised that Trump picked a woman. After the Kavangh ordeal, it makes perfect political sense.

But I am surprised that Trump announced in advance that he would pick a woman. According to the corporate media, Trump is a misogynist, right? If that's the case, he sure has a strange way of showing it. The disturbing thing is that he felt there was nothing amiss in announcing his preference for a petticoat justice publicly and in advance. Best and the brightest? Maybe, maybe not. How can you tell if you exclude male judges?

When a President so vilified by feminists announces he is, in effect, offering such a high-profile position to a woman only, you know we're in uncharted (and troubled) waters. When Joe Biden and Donald Trump can both exclude men from their short list of selections for high office, the triumph of identity politics is obvious. And I guess that's why the Rangers/Comerica contest excluding white men attracted no criticism. It just isn't controversial. It just isn't news.

All of the above offers proof, if more proof were needed, that rank-and-file men have no allies among men in high places. Might as well consort with men in low places. You'll never get invited to go yachting, but at least you won't have to put up with virtue-signaling, grandstanding, and moral posturing.

But it's not all bad. At least now we are in a position to pose the greatest Zen kōan since "What is the sound of one hand clapping?" Namely…

How can inclusivity be exclusive?

Who Takes Your Sacrifice? (Part 1)

The 'Value' of Self-Devaluation

Author's note: Before anything, I want to make it absolutely clear that this article is a criticism of the idea of sacrifice as postulated and celebrated in our society as a standard of living and expectation, especially upon men. It is not an admonishment of veterans who have suffered physical loss or have died, people who have elected to save other lives at the cost of their own, nor parents who do everything they can to keep their family alive and together. It is neither a disparagement of charity and love, nor is it a denigration of the disadvantaged, impoverished, and the sick. I realize how this subject, taken for granted in day to day dialogue, is an incredibly delicate one if confronted.

Self-Sacrifice: A Worldwide Lower Common Denominator

Sacrifice – many think it is one of the greatest acts a person can do…in theory especially if it's of themselves by themselves. Or, if you're like me, you think it's something no human being of dignity should have to do, let alone celebrate.

Sacrifice is openly lauded by those who speak of the builders of civilization, soldiers who fight wars, those who give to their families, communities, and country, and in any context toil, die, put themselves in harm's way, and lose up to everything in the name of the "selfless act". It seems like to actually speak against celebrating those kind of things is a blasphemy of the highest order, especially to those who have or are close to those who have performed those acts.

No, I sincerely do not wish to be insensitive to those people, but neither do I intend to censor myself on what I think is a legitimate case against sacrifice as this standard held for people at large, and especially men. Look at the aforementioned examples again: those who laud those things are more specifically lauding the men who did it. Exceptions apply; there are of course women who do these sort of things as well as sacrifices perhaps more specific to women (say, risking their own life in the process of childbirth). However, there appears to be a general understanding that men are at expected to serve any permutation of those functions voluntarily or not; else, they aren't regarded in esteem at all.

If you concur with that last assessment then think about that fact – that they are expected in this capacity. Lauding is different from expectation; lauding is high appraisal of something considered elective, while expectation assumes a standard as a bare minimum. Are the advocates of male sacrifice praising men for that, or do they condemn men who do not sacrifice themselves?

Let's go a bit further and entertain the idea that it is, in fact, lauding they are doing. What for? The fact that these men give to the beneficiaries of these sacrifices, or the fact that they undergo losses?

If you think that's an unfair way of looking at these lovers of others' sacrifices, consider this: would there be as much lauding of an act of giving by an individual that did not have to sacrifice, or worse one in which he gained something for himself in this act of giving? On and on do the complaints go against people who do things for a profit, that is, when there's something in it for them. Those that do things for gain are maligned in favor of those that act out of charity, "the common good", and "unselfish motives".

It's safe to say that most don't think twice about these things and consider them a conventional morality and way of conduct. Selflessness and self-sacrifice are so steeped in the common sensibilities that they become synonymous with giving, compassion, love, and the greater good. It couldn't be an exaggeration that the self is regarded as evil at all times, considering how selflessness (the lack of self) and self-sacrifice (the abnegation of the self) are considered the good at all times.

It has even gotten to the point that even when people advocate for things like "self-care", they make it a point, almost kneejerk, to distance it from "selfishness". "Yes, by all means care for yourself," they would say; "but don't do it selfishly! You still have to put others above yourself." Imagine actually advocating for self-care in which the self is not even a proper end to the this act.

In a world where self-sacrifice is normally advocated and practically an active part of almost any given culture at least ideologically, there are going to be a lot of confusions about sacrifice that need to be exposed. What likewise needs exposing are the kind of people that wish it upon another.

From progressive radicals wishing masculinity (if not males altogether) to be sacrificed so as to be rid of it, to traditional conservatives that demand that men become sacrificial beings in service of society (often a code word for "women") and at the same time profess to be thankful to those dead or broken men, this mindset permeates the public consciousness. Men are put on the spot for the gynocentric altar of sacrifice – from the symbolic in men's day to day actions sacrificing their souls at the behest of women, to the literal…in which males from their infancy on the religious or clinical cutting board to their prime years as targets for killing in battlefields at home and abroad.

The case against sacrifice is not limited to that of men, far from it, but men's sacrifice is normalized to the point that too many traditionists, antifeminists, and even some Men's Rights Activists still appeal on the basis of men's disposability. One wonders who they are trying to please with such an argument – feminists? This is why not only I will hereby make the case against sacrifice, but I will appeal to men's unsacrificed individual spirit with no apologies.

Where does the man who does not wish to sacrifice his spirit turn to, when every culture and mindset on the planet share this lower common denominator of the sacrificial creature as the ideal man?

The Survival of the Sacrifice Ideology

When it comes to preachers of sacrifice, be it in the world of religion, spirituality, politics, activism, and in the academics, the proper question to ask is not for who are its ardent advocates, but for who isn't. Ayn Rand seemed to stand alone in her time in her advocacy against self-sacrifice during her time with her message eloquently depicted in her works, notably The Fountainhead and Atlas Shrugged.

I will define "sacrifice" in my own words in Part 2 of this essay series, but Rand's definition is absolutely worth mentioning. From "The Ethics of Emergencies" in The Virtue of Selfishness: "'Sacrifice' is the surrender of a greater value for the sake of a lesser one or of a nonvalue." From "Galt's Speech" in Atlas Shrugged: "If you exchange a penny for a dollar, it is not a sacrifice; if you exchange a dollar for a penny, it is. If you achieve the career you wanted, after years of struggle, it is not a sacrifice; if you then renounce it for the sake of a rival, it is."

Self-sacrifice and altruism still see wide appraisal with every excuse thrown to bolster it from the left and the right of the political spectrum and from religions and secularists alike advocating for either worship of an exterior force (God or the State) at the expense of the self, to asceticism and denial of experiencing both world and body. Self is defined as its own indulgence, and indulgence is defined as its own over-indulgence. Self-abnegation (often framed as "killing one's own ego") is seen as the good, or the path to enlightenment. Giving is seen as a virtue in itself, and giving is not even properly considered giving if the giver received something substantial in return, or received something in any way on his own terms.

Having taken these things into consideration, I think that those who preach self-sacrifice and yet deny that they are against the self are cognitively dissonant, if not downright lying. They simply cannot get away with “But we’re not anti-self!” after every attempt they’ve made to denigrate the idea of the self while assuming the role of “the others” and “society”.

Then came Jordan Peterson into the spotlight just as politically correct idiocy infiltrated mainstream society more and more from the academic cesspool. The time was right for him to speak out against the lunacy of postmodern thought and reality-denial as well as the media attacks on masculinity and men losing a sense of direction. Peterson brought a lot of much needed sanity and conversation that drew the deserving attention and devotion of many.

There was much value to derive from the myriad of ideas Peterson brought to the zeitgeist, as it were, of intellectual discussion. However I must admit to profound disagreements with his postulates. In particular, a key disagreement I have is his open advocacy of sacrifice in most situations, especially involving men’s role in society.

Peterson stressed the notion that man must choose his sacrifice. The context as I have understood it is that Peterson says man is always faced with a crossroads during his life in which he must make a sacrifice in that given time; the upside, however, is that he gets to pick his sacrifice. We can derive from this that the man would make the sacrifice that is of overall least detriment to him, but he makes it nonetheless, and if he doesn’t make sacrifices then he will go in a bad way.

This has given yet a new context for sacrifice in the world of philosophic discourse, especially for younger men desperate for guidance (or a savior?), and has only bolstered it. Although I have seen no worthwhile evidence that sacrifice has been fading as a moral norm even after all this time, this practical revitalization of the idea of sacrifice serves as more fuel to the fire in making self-sacrifice that much more fashionable – for men to commit it, and for women to uphold it as a standard for the ideal man.

I stand by in my disagreement towards the idea that sacrifice is a crucial requisite to masculinity or an individual’s development in general. To the idea that we get to pick our “damn” sacrifice (Peterson seems to enjoy tacking “damn” into that phrase perhaps to make it sound cool), I offer a response in the form of some questions: must everything in life, if any, really be a sacrifice, and who is collecting said sacrifices (and for what reason)?

If you think I’m exaggerating about whether sacrifice is actually regarded as a requisite, you need only look at those that profess to praise masculinity strictly on the grounds that men have provided, sacrificed and died. If a man has not sacrificed (lost something of himself), or worse, has profited, then he is not given the same praise. Instead, he tends to be maligned.

A word of warning to those that think sacrifice is a proper method to progress through life: if you have to make a sacrifice every time you come to an important decision, then sacrifice will soon become the only way you can respond. Note the Petersonian implication that the more you supposedly sacrifice, the more you supposedly benefit.

What's more, you could run out of yourself to sacrifice, and before that you could end up sacrificing others, perhaps those close to you. A philosophy centered on self-sacrifice sees no qualms with expecting the same sacrifice of others. One cannot think of a single state or tyrannical force that didn't rely on man as a sacrificial animal to fulfill its malicious exploits.

A mindset defaulting to the worship of sacrifice ultimately amounts to the worship of everything that had once been a man's but is now lost, and when his very self is sacrificed then he is seen as a hero. It becomes clear that it isn't about the fact that he gave what he did, benefited what he did, or protected what he did. If he was able to do it without any loss to himself, then this at best won't be a newsworthy story. The fact that he fulfilled true selfish interest and self-investment to his act is never considered, often even by the man himself, and is generally regarded as impossible, as if compassion cannot come from true self-interest. Only through disregard of the self is compassion, charity, reliability, concern, love, and service seen to be operable.

It is the same thing as feminists consistently do, that is, to see man's normal nature as brutal and evil. Horseshoe Theory rings true again – both feminists and tradcons see men's nature as one of depravity, both meeting at the ends to advocate for male altruism and self-sacrifice, albeit for different motives. One side wishes to eliminate men and/or masculinity on this basis; the other uses it to be apologists for feminists as thus: "But men aren't like that! Look at how they die and mutilate themselves to build society for us! Isn't it wonderful? Must we not be grateful?"

The more normalized sacrifice is, the more prettied up and acceptable it is. From a distance, a sacrifice looks as noble as if it is second nature. When a man endures a sacrifice with the mind that it is all for the better and for the greater good, they become indignant when that sacrificial attitude comes into question from fear that what he put himself through was truly all for naught. It is understandably a terrifying idea that one doesn't want to face. I draw a parallel from those adult men who had been circumcised as infants that become indignant and defensive in the face of those that speak the truth that they were cruelly mutilated at their parents' authorization. They fear greatly the fact that they have been victimized as infants, or the fact that their parents not only allowed but fully intended to have his genitalia cut in this way.

Just as they try to justify it by continuing the cycle as they arrange for their own sons' circumcisions (often as "sacrificing one's son to God"; looking at you, Ben Shapiro…you too, Jordan), those that have sacrificed in other ways seem to want the cycle to continue, all in the name of social norms, the common good, culture, tradition, selflessness, and whatever other justification they can scrounge for. To add to that, we praise male sacrifice so much in any given context that one wonders why so many men commit suicide!

Jordan Peterson is a type of individualist thinker that well understands the perils of collectivism. I'm still thankful that such a voice has found the publicity it did. It is precisely that which makes me even more disappointed with his enthusiasm towards the idea of sacrifice. In my opinion, the individual and sacrifice are incompatible, and I don't think that advocating for sacrifice is ultimately the best way to advocate for men's identity and direction, in the capacity that he actually does.

In Peterson's 2017 lecture for his book Maps of Meaning he goes as far as to say "You don't get to not make (a sacrifice). You're sacrificial whether you want to be or not". If you aren't one of the many undergoing the conceited high from aspiring to self-sacrifice as a means to maturity, you'd actually see this message for what it is: damning. Childhood is dismissed as mere potentiality to be sacrificed in order to attain adulthood, ignoring the fact that an adult without a healthy puer to serve as his essential core is only a life of drudgery beholden to society…usually women that Peterson always assumes wants to "grow up" in contrast to presumably childish idiot men who have "failed to launch".

It appears to me that society's confusion when it comes to the idea of sacrifice is has become exacerbated with this new context, and I must disagree as respectfully as I can with Peterson here and try to make it clear what I've discovered to be the actual nature of sacrifice. It's time to expose the truth about your "damn" sacrifice.

October 13, 2020 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

What Sacrifice Is, and What it Isn't

What is Sacrifice?

So apparently I don't get to not make a sacrifice, huh? But a sacrifice always has a collector. Who is this collector, and what does he intend to do with my repeatedly sacrificed selves?

Let me offer my most concise, distilled definition: Sacrifice is an offering to what one has no true interest.

In a lot of fictional or fantasy settings, a common trope is some variant of a village or tribe having to sacrifice one of its own members or goods, usually a virgin girl for a yearly or otherwise regular offering to appease a monster or dragon for either ritual or consumption. Another example lies in Seven Samurai and its American remake The Magnificent Seven in which bandits raid a village of its food and resources or they would destroy everything.

If anything illustrates the idea of "pick your damn sacrifice", it is a command set forth by the monster, the dragon, and the bandit. "I take your virgin girl, I take your food, I take your supplies. That, or you are all dead. Pick your damn sacrifice." The task of picking a sacrifice to make is completely beholden to the would-be collector of spoils that have anything from a weapon to an army to extort that sacrifice. The objective for the sacrifice is to pick the one that is altogether the least worst case scenario.

We can derive from this why sacrifices become consecrated, and the sacrificial ones are praised. Actually, there are two ways this happens – one is the praise of the sacrifice by the collector, for the victim has died or has been surrendered to serve their ends forcibly; the victim is the perpetrator's valued creation. The other is by the surviving victims of the sacrificial party, who because of their chosen sacrifice can survive another day…until next year when they will have to pick a new damn sacrifice. In effect, it's a way to both keep the system going, and to manage to survive the system. Imagine a vicious cycle in which the way to survive a cruel system is to feed the same system. The collector of sacrificial spoils is a vile parasite with inordinate power over its unfortunate host.

If it's not obvious by now, it turns out that sacrifice is not noble in of itself. Just like the promise of virgins in the afterlife, sacrifice is encouraged to further the ends of the powers that be. Sacrifice is not moral in any proactive sense. Sacrifice is an exchange that purposefully results in net loss for the sacrificial party, and for the extortionist's unearned gain. To return to the definition above, what I mean by one's true interest is one of direct aspiration and genuine direction. When you choose to be allowed to live each time while being mugged routinely by a scoundrel, that is not true interest, as no man of real esteem would tolerate the sustenance of that routine in which he has his property stolen and the perpetrator enabled. Sacrifice is a result of a helpless, often tragic, situation.

I can hear this already: if you didn't give the mugger your money, does it mean you prefer they kill you? They get even more creative: would you rather your children stay kidnapped than give the kidnappers the ransom? Funny how we're stuck in these set of rules that savages set for us. It is in fact true that oftentimes you are made to make that sacrifice, but we're talking about a tragic hypothetical situation that shouldn't have to happen.

The picking of the damn sacrifice is never truly elective. It is forced inevitably by forces of nature that we can't control and too often by looters, from the small time muggers to those that extort money in the form of taxation. Besides, what makes you think one day they won't just follow through with their threats even if you did pay the sacrifice? The one you are beholden to is in a special place of usurped power over you, and he sets his arbitrary rules.

You sacrifice to appease, that is, to keep the monster happy in meager hopes that he won't do something worse. You may live another day, but you have not warded off the monster, neither in principle nor in practice. You saved the village today, but you've also sustained the cycle. A true heroic act is an assertive act of living to uphold a value positively. There is nothing heroic about professing to love your enemy, who only values you as a sacrificial means to his end.

It almost feels sacrilegious to even conceive of giving as having a return by design. The act of giving with no expectation of something in return is considered the purest form of giving, and a force of good. But what is the nature of giving something without the expectation of something in return? You had something, and now you've given it to somebody else, end of story. This looks like a loss on your part, as somebody gained.

But you might respond: "It's not that I got nothing from it, I am glad to have given what I did!". Why are you glad for that? Is it merely the fact that the recipient has what you gave him, or is it something more? Perhaps the act of giving was not only not a loss for you, but you wanted the recipient to have it. Perhaps you derive fulfillment from seeing somebody gain something you thought he needed. Perhaps the fulfillment comes from a sense of satisfaction that you were able to do provide it. The bottom line is, you've gained something. Gain is not just money. Gain is not just a personal favor. Gain is also a value and objective fulfilled.

Self-interest is not in contradiction to your values. In fact, there is a direct connection. You want to see your values applied to the world. You want to make the things you want to see in this world happen. When you are able to make that happen out of your own free will, you gain. When you give freely, you aren't taking a loss. You aren't sacrificing, and that is good.

This is not appeasement. Appeasement entails the element of the beholden; the sense of having to serve the world, society, and other people for being other people just because that is the social norm, and people will resent you for not making serving them the top priority in your life. Appeasement is a sacrificial act. There is no joy in merely escaping the scrutiny and judgment by the mob only to be faced with it again as expected.

Giving is not a virtue in itself. Giving is an act towards good or evil acts to yourself and others depending on its practitioners. When you give, give what you will towards what you want to see receive it because it will be a fulfillment to you. Give as a response to your own value system, which does not involve self-abnegation in itself. That's what giving should be. Giving is not in itself sacrifice – let us dispense with this confusion. However, too many give in a sacrificial way, or preach it. Beware of those that do.

Sacrifice is Not Trade

Let us dispense with another confusion, this semblance of an idea that sacrifice is synonymous with an equitable form of trade.

Looking back at the idea of picking one's sacrifice, it can be understandable why a sacrifice can be mentally processed like a sort of trade. You select the least worst sacrifice, to attain what appears to be a desired goal, almost manifesting itself as a exchange of which burden to cut loose.

Considering the confusion that sacrifice is an act of giving still remains, perhaps from this we can derive the notion that one sacrifices an item of theirs in exchange for something. But an incontrovertible aspect about sacrificing is that one gives something they value, that is, something they wouldn't just pass along under normal circumstances. One is compelled to make the sacrifice as a situation is forced upon him.

A real trade, on the other hand, is driven by desire for the exchange. From something small scale like me ordering a glass of whiskey at my favorite bar because I was in the mood for it, to something larger scale like purchasing a synthesizer that has just the right mellotron sound that I want that I can't find in any other instrument, a trade involves the mutual trade of something they are willing to part with for something they value even more, be it spur of the moment or based on long term ambition.

The entire point of trade is profit – on both sides. When a sacrifice masquerades as a trade, it is a scam at best. One side may profit at the complete expense of the other, sacrificial, side. The only equitable trade is one in which both sides profit on their own terms. The only profitable trade is a free trade. The only free trade is one in which both make the trade voluntarily. One voluntarily makes the trade because they are actively interested in the transaction. No sacrifice is involved. Trade is not in itself sacrifice. If you find yourself sacrificing in a trade, get out of it while you can.

Love, for all the energy mankind has spent on the subject, is largely spoken in terms of how it is an act of service, measured by how much is given and applied to the object of love by the lover. Ever present is the context of selflessness by which love is bestowed, as if a true act of love has absolutely nothing to do with one's own interests. For all the due recognition love gets as an act of desire, it is then confused by being touted as an act of self-sacrifice, like a male praying mantis offering its head to the female. Perhaps it's this misguided notion of love as self-sacrifice that causes too many to act self-sacrificially. These men bend over backwards to please a woman that hasn't even accepted them yet, and no matter how much of his resources are drained it's still a crap shoot at best if she returns his affections. But then is it proper for a woman to be considered in love with him? What is it that she loves about this man, the fact that he is now bled dry and is expected to provide her some more? If love is sacrificial, it certainly seems like a one-sided sacrifice.

Fortunately, love is not sacrifice and neither side has to perform that to manifest it. Love is an enthusiastic, innocent value response. It is a resonance of value expressed outwards in the real world. It is the desire to bring something more to life than it already is, made visible through human action. Self-sacrifice?! Far from it. Love is the most selfish thing conceivable.

To those that insist instead that love actually is in fact self-sacrifice and that to commit this act for the one they love is the right thing to do, it's time to look hard at the object of such a version of love, and the beneficiaries of this self-abnegation.

What kind of person wants the sacrificed self of another?

Sacrifice entails loss, damage, and disposal. Sacrifice is a statement as thus: "For you, I hereby cut myself down as a gesture." If an act of love is self-sacrificial, be aware of what is happening. Can desire and care only transpire at the expense of self? Now that you have sacrificed anything from your time, your space, your money, and your dreams for the object of your love, what possible reason could the object of your love be happy that you've subjected yourself to all this?

For simplicity of dialogue, let's assume that the scenario involves a man acting in his idea of love for a woman, though I suspect most would default to this scenario anyway. He professes to sacrifice himself, and in so doing subordinate his time, his space, his money, resources, dreams and visions in the name of the woman of his affections. He would see this delegation, if not downright disposal, of all that he is as a gesture and symbol of love. Now ask the question: what kind of woman would appreciate, or worse, be enamored with the fact that you've destroyed what you did about yourself?

Who is she that finally approves of you if you present a sacrificed version of yourself? Is she not, at worst, a vile and abominable collector of your soul enslaved to her parasitic whims, and at best somebody that simply is not worth it? Who in the entire world is so valuable that you'd not only sacrifice anywhere from a valuable part of yourself to your whole self, or even as shouted in popular parlance, "give the whole world and the moon and the stars" for?

Remember that love in the proper sense is a pure value response. Love is true if it is expressed with the highest honesty and baring of soul, that in no way abnegates itself but instead presents itself unabashedly with no apologies. Likewise, love is true if the object of love is itself unsacrificed, whole, and honest.

In an intimate relationship, love is of an unsacrificed person, by an unsacrificed person. The two are in an intimate relationship because they desire to be, and not to subordinate the other.

When it comes to love in the context of friendship, a true friendship likewise happens due to the desires of the individuals involved. If the friendship takes a turn in which one wants the other to be sacrificial in order to maintain the friendship, then this is toxic. A friendship is freely made, and both sides get something valuable out of it.

Even when it comes to the "love" that a man has of his car or his guitar, we can say the same. The owner of the car is not subordinated to it, but rather, the car is unabashedly a part of his life that he finds fulfillment in. Neither does he try to subordinate the car to himself – rather, he wants the car to be in the best condition as a car, as if it has its own identity. Likewise, the guitarist is not a slave to his instrument, but rather, the guitar is unabashedly a part of his very essence that he finds himself in. It is an extension of himself. Neither does he try to subordinate the guitar to himself.

Men find many such loves in his life. They are happy, mentally healthiest, and masculine with no apologies in this glorious embrace of these loves that are particular to him. This is precisely why must beware of women that profess to love men who have sacrificed those loves and have subordinated to her in the name of "commitment". When she derides these men as "boys who think they are men" in the vein of Tomi Lahren, she makes clear her intent to subordinate a given man to her parasitic whims.

Love is not subordination. In a relationship in which one subordinates the other, the subordinate sacrifices himself for the other. It's bad enough when this sort of toxic relationship is more obvious, but it should be more menacing to realize that this is the same kind of relationship that is often couched in veil of "romance", self-disposability as an upheld aspect of masculinity, gynocentric parasitism off of male altruism, and princesses' fantasies of Happily Ever After…all done with contented smiles.

It's time to make the case for non-sacrificial love more widespread and dislodge the notion that love is sacrifice. Any case made for love that involves the destructive offering of the self towards a twisted reaper of souls must be shown for what it is: despicable. Love is not sacrifice.

October 14, 2020 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Is Sacrifice Inevitable?

Is Sacrifice Ever Good or Necessary?

After all I have stated, I recognize that this is a fair enough question to ask. Allow me to give its due consideration.

Take a hypothetical situation of self defense. Say you are faced with somebody trying to loot your private property or worse, threaten immediate harm to yourself or somebody you value highly, a family member for instance. Whereas this intruder may only have a knife, you have a trusty shotgun ready. He is in no position to win against you. Assuming you haven't shot him already, the best thing he can do is give up. Let's say in his recklessness he doesn't. You shoot him dead. In this completely tragic state of affairs, the intruder has become sacrificed, and it is his own fault. He has in effect arranged for his own sacrifice at your hands to fulfill some foolish wish to misappropriate what is yours. You, your property, and your family are safe, and that is good.

What is the point I am trying to make here? Simply put, a sacrifice sometimes presents itself in inevitable situations. The intruder could have, to invoke Jordan Peterson in a way he may not have necessarily intended, picked his sacrifice and surrendered while he could and be apprehended and taken in by the authorities. It would have been a better sacrifice for him than being put down with no moral qualms, as you and the people and things of your value are rightly more than this creature that tried to destroy any or all of

From your point of view, there is also a choice of sacrifice to be made: you and your family, or him. You'd be a colossal fool to allow yourself and your family to be sacrificed just so this creature, who doesn't value your life in any way in turn, gets what he wants. Don't do the altruistic thing and sacrifice for your enemy.

After the previous two parts I spent reviling sacrifice, I am not saying that sacrifices are something we can always escape in our lives. What I am saying is that sacrifice is not a force of virtue in itself. The hypothetical situation with the looter illustrates a tragedy from every angle. The "good" scenario is rather which that whole situation never had to happen; the looter could have made better choices to earn the things he wants, and not threaten to harm anybody. If the situation where the looter is apprehended or killed is in any way good, then it is only relatively speaking. You are absolutely right to defend and even kill the intruder in this self-defense situation. It is the best case scenario, and your ability to fight back is even virtuous and self-interested, all things considered. Again, the true best case scenario is one in which this never had to happen, no matter how unattainable or realistic that would have been.

As much as I rag on about Jordan Peterson on his view of the "damn" sacrifice, I have to admit that there is truth about this: sacrifices usually presents itself as a choice. Lose this or lose that; pick wisely.

There is absolutely a case for using your value responses, even drawing from your self-interests, to effectively make the sacrifice that is thrust upon you, assuming there isn't a third way out that allows you to come out on top without sacrificing (were it that all situations were this simple!) But this is to be made absolutely clear: sacrifices are typically always thrust upon you. A sacrifice is something you don't ask for. A village doesn't freely ask for the monster to come take its resources and people.

And, you certainly don't have to treat sacrifice as this wonderful thing. That will lead to a whole series of troubles for the one deemed sacrificial.

To Save the One You Love

You don't ask for a debilitating disease to strike somebody you love, but yet you are presented with a choice: to pay for the treatment and cure ("sacrificing" your money, so to speak), or sacrifice the one you love. Chances are, you'll opt for treatment, and you do in fact willingly offer your resources for that. It is the truly better decision to make, and perhaps the only type of sacrifice (this, and situations like the self-defense scenario) in which gratitude for the sacrifice is acceptable.

But even then, this is not cause enough to consider sacrifice, the cost to hold things together, a virtue in itself. This is rather a response to a turn of events even more difficult to control than the village monster. Some call it "God's will", some call it "Mother Nature", and some just call it fate. Try as we might, we are in no position to exact full control over the forces of reality and nature. Sacrifices become inevitable, even though we have the right to be indignant in making them. And if we are to call anything virtuous about the aforementioned situation, let it be the honest unsacrificed love of the one that is willing to let the one he loves remain unsacrificed as possible given the circumstances.

On Family

When it comes to children and actually raising a family, parents are said to sacrifice for their children in any given way to ensure both their survival and development. If everything I have said up to this point has been taken to heart, this can in turn portray the very idea of raising a family and having children to be a consignment to drudgery and toil. But I don't think we have to think this way.

If we are to remain positive about the family in society and advocate for it, here is some advice: let love and care for family be an aspirational value response instead of a sacrificial obligation "for the common good".

I've made it clear in the past that I am the farthest thing from anti-family. However, it has been my observation that too many pro-family advocates continue to push for it in a way that it makes parental subordination to the family a standard, instead of a joy and a self-interested objective to raise children and maintain an environment to love and to teach independence.

Child-rearing can absolutely be an object of self-interest and perhaps is preferable to any sense of duty or obligation that can turn the experience into a joyless ordeal. It is why there can be no mistake: raising children is a gigantic undertaking that needs earnest self-investment. That's obvious, you'd say, but then tell that to those who are resentful of having had children. The responsibility and cost of children should be understood beforehand, and accepted head-on.

In the rush to uphold the family as a foundation of society, I see too many on the pro-family side advocate for rushing into a marriage and having children. I won't get into the myriad of problems involved in the current state of affairs when it comes to marriage for men – others in the Men's Movement are vastly more qualified to speak on that.

This in effect demands that men sacrifice their dreams and delegate their work and income for the near-total devotion of the sustenance of that family. Why do I get the feeling that it's this advocacy of the family in a tribalistic, self-sacrificing context is what ultimately distances people from families?

I've always thought it ironic that traditional conservative "pro-family" women often tout the importance of the existence of fathers being there for their kids and at worst complain that their husbands are never around, while at the same time demanding that he stay out and work hard to earn money and "sacrifice" for her and the family. These women truly seem no different than the feminist in wanting total contentment of womankind as offered sacrificially by men.

Imagine a parent telling you that he has given up his dreams just to raise you, in effect saying that he has been "selfless" in his role as a parent. Why is this a good thing? Why are you feeling anything but sadness to hear that you are the result of drudgery and cold compliant duty? If you are made to feel like an accident, you can't be blamed for feeling that way.

Why can a parent not freely admit self-interested joy at the fact that he is raising his children? As I've stated before, sacrifices are sometimes understandably made, especially when the children get sick or injured, or if they do something bad and the parent has to assume responsibility. But otherwise, should a parent not be in a position to tell his son or daughter, "I wanted to have you, and raise you, and now look at how far you've come! You are my pride and joy!".

If these words sound familiar to you, it's because I am certain that many parents do in fact say this, fortunately. My concern however is that it is often mixed and confused with the elements of self-sacrifice, which I have already made clear is not synonymous with love.

Instead of encouraging men to give up their puer and sacrifice their dreams, why can he not hold onto all that and be a formidable father at the same time? Why can't he be a living example of a man pursuing his visions for his own children and the mother of his children to look up to? By living his own dream, perhaps a father can inspire unabashed dreams of their own children. This is the kind of family I would rather uphold.

On War

Finally, the subject of war. Many soldiers and military men in our time, whether they were drafted or they volunteered, have died or become crippled in the horrors of war that so many, including myself, likely cannot begin to properly imagine. As stated in the very beginning of this series of essays, I have no intention of downplaying the sacrifices they've made…but they are sacrifices, and my definition of it has not changed.

Soldiers are treated as sacrificial. They always have been, it seems. His own side would sacrifice him strategically, while the enemy would sacrifice him to preserve their own side. The more vague the reasons for war over the decades, the less certain what the solider even sacrifices for becomes. We thank them for their service, and then proceed to move on with our lives while too many of them don't seem to get the care and proper treatment they may need. We in effect thank them strictly for their sacrifice, and for too many of them that's all they have left in the eyes of the citizenry.

What kind of dreams did these soldiers have before they were made to fight and die? Who were they as unsacrificed men, as individuals, before they became expected to die for their country? What were their consciences and values like, before they were made to betray them?

Soldiers don't just sacrifice their physical selves in war. It isn't just their lives that they put on the line; oftentimes it's their values. The more sterilized and run-of-the-mill war becomes in today's day and age for those of us in the Western world that are largely shielded from it, the less we resonate with its true horrors, and we thank sacrifices almost as a force of habit. This sacrifice becomes an expectation for soldiers, without a real regard of their value as their own individuals.

Those of us who don't know war keep electing politicians that keep voting for more war. We philosophize about its virtues and watch as the soldiers move across the chessboard. We keep praising these men for being "naturally" selfless because of how they readily put themselves on the line for their fellow solders.

Those that are willing to fight for what they value are to be rightly esteemed. But this can't happen in a way that makes their very purpose in life as a man a sacrificial one. Fighting and self-defense is a valid, virtuous response to situations otherwise beyond our control. But fighting and self-defense is not about becoming expendable.

Let's take the fighter – the warrior, if you will. To hear the horde of people praising warriors for their sacrifice, you'd think that the warrior is a sacrificial profession. But is this really so? Rather, the warrior fights to live, not to die.

If you are a fan of, say, boxing, when you root for the boxer that you do, you aren't asking him to get bloody and beaten. You want him to be the last one standing in the ring but having fought his way to do so, because that's what he does.

What kind of morale boost would a warrior have and make him feel valued than to tell him, not "I want you to die for me", but rather, "I want you to fight for your life"? The warrior ultimately fights to win and survive. If he were fighting to die, his tactics would tragically ensure it much more. If a man desires to protect the object of his value, he must be esteemed so as to live to protect another day, and enjoy the fruits of his protection. Expect him to die, and he may tragically do just that.

Closing Thoughts – The Case for the Unsacrificed Individual

The next time you thank somebody for their sacrifice, think of what it is that you are thanking. Think about what offerings you are collecting. The man who has sacrificed has lost what he shouldn't have, allegedly for your benefit. Consider whether it is morally right to derive benefit from the loss of another. You may be consigning this person to a false sense of societal fulfillment that he is validated as a man and a human being because he has made the sacrifices expected of him.

Then ask yourself, can't he be just as valid and valued for not having sacrificed? Why are we as a society so vehement in our hate against the man who won't live and die for others? Who are we to topple anybody off of their own hierarchy of values and impose ourselves in his place while we call ourselves "the others"?

If sacrifice defines a man, or a woman for that matter, then it's to sanction those that impose it for their own, parasitic ends. An appraisal of sacrifice is a validation of what could be a vicious cycle. Consecration of sacrifice only comes with a misguided notion that the one that negates himself for the good of the whole is a hero, whereas the hero in the form of the unabashed man fighting for his own life and the right to it is downplayed if not ostracized.

It's been brought up to me that we have largely come from the self-sacrifice of our predecessors, as in, if it weren't for self-sacrifice, we wouldn't be where we are now. To that I respond: it should be clear by now that we can live our lives in fulfilling ways without sacrificing ourselves, and we can look back and say that none of this was necessary, and how tragic that they weren't able to live their lives unsacrificed and instead at the behest of the social powers that be that cost them their very selves.

From times when were were in tribes to feudal eras marred by warfare, human value wasn't given the thought we now know was always needed. To hear evolutionary psychologists talk, most certainly men were not valued as such, or their deaths (not their lives) were of value. Perhaps it's time to uphold the unsacrificed self as a standard to replace the broken standard of self-sacrifice, which has long confused too many people on the true nature of giving, love, compassion and value.

I don't deny that sacrifices are something we can't afford to avoid completely, as it does present itself in situations we could have no possible interest but we nonetheless expect and prepare for. I want to again be clear that Jordan Peterson wasn't necessarily wrong on the fact that a sacrifice is something you have to choose if faced with it. What I am opposed rather is the spirit behind his attitude towards sacrifice, in which man is a sacrificial being. There is nothing virtuous in that, and it certainly won't help men or really any individual.

So long as sacrifice is worshipped, we will keep wishing it on self and others instead of finding the true value in an unsacrificed self of a man.

I salute and praise he who is unsacrificed. As for those who have ended up sacrificing in their lifetime, I can only wish the best for him to reattain all that he has lost, but he has to be the first person to stand back up and reach for it.

High profile report demonstrates that its own results are wrong

October 15, 2020 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

As a result of a report released by international professional services organisation KPMG it has been widely reported in Australian media recently that 39% of the so-called gender pay gap in Australia is a result of gender discrimination. Examples include an article from the government-funded Australian Broadcasting Corporation:

> KPMG Australia chairman Alison Kitchen told the ABC's AM program that gender discrimination now accounts for 39 per cent of the gender pay gap.

The same article later reiterates this by listing among the key points:

> The report says gender discrimination now accounts for 39pc of the gender pay gap

The Guardian also talked about this with an article stating:

> Researchers attributed gender discrimination to almost two-fifths (39%) of the gender pay gap and noted its influence on the gap has increased since 2014.

Business Insider Australia stated that:

> The report found gender discrimination accounted for 39% of the gender pay gap in Australia.

These and other news articles are basing their claims on a recently released report by KPMG which was commissioned by the Diversity Council Australia Ltd (DCA), and the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA). The report was released in full and summary versions with the full version referenced here.

The DCA describes itself as the independent not-for-profit peak body leading diversity and inclusion in the workplace. The WGEA is a federal Australian government statutory agency that according to it's own website is charged with promoting and improving gender equality in Australian workplaces. The WGEA has featured in a previous article in which I showed that the WGEA clearly admits that the often-quoted national gender pay gap does not compare like-for-like roles.

Under the section Drivers of the gender pay gap, the KPMG report describes a series of factors contributing to the so-called gender pay gap with their percentage contribution and shows that the total of all of the factors sums to 100%. This means that the report is claiming that gender wage differences in Australia can be entirely quantified with factors presented in the report. Notably the expansive CONSAD Report commissioned by the US Department of Labor in 2009 did not make such a claim.

The factors listed in the report are:

- Gender discrimination
- Years not working due to interruptions
- Occupational segregation
- Industrial segregation
- Part-time employment
- Unpaid care and work (proxied by hours per week on housework)
- Age (years)
- Tenure with current employer
- Working in Government or NGO

This very section is where the report claims that gender discrimination accounts for 39% of the total. It also goes on to state that the proportion that is a result of gender discrimination has actually risen from 29% at the time of the last report in 2014.

What is really interesting is how the report defines gender discrimination. The report released by KPMG and commissioned by the DCA and the WGEA defines gender discrimination on p25:

> Gender discrimination can be understood as the element of the gender pay gap that would remain if men and women had the same levels of the other factors.

The same statement with slightly different wording is repeated on p34.

The other factors referred to here are the other factors listed in the report and stated above.

The full report goes on to note on p26:

> Interpreting the unexplained component of wage decompositions as gender discrimination is an accepted approach in the literature. 65 The unexplained component also includes other variations between men and women that may not be controlled for in the model, any omitted variables and measurement error in the variables used in the model. 66

Thus, the report released by KPMG and commissioned by the DCA and the WGEA states clearly that the unexplained differences in men's and women's wages are simply assigned to the category of gender discrimination, producing the claim that 39% of the so-called gender pay gap in Australia is a result of discrimination. A statement that was then widely reported in the media as if it was fact.

Despite a disclaimer that states that the report is solely the opinion of the authors, both the DCA and the WGEA have openly endorsed this report by publishing key findings from the report on their websites.

Following the release of this article, the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc will be raising this with KPMG, the DCA, the WGEA and Australian politicians.

The Feminist Race to Gender Superiority

October 18, 2020 | by Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. | Link | Original Link

The headline this morning said, "North Carolina girl wrestler dominates boys to become first ever female state champion." She was praised not just for winning the championship, but mainly for winning it against boys. Girls are winning acclaim by beating boys, and this encourages them to compete with men later on. Perhaps soon there will be a Nobel prize for women who can defeat the most men.

It appears that girls are being encouraged to beat boys, not only in wrestling but in everything else. Girls are encouraged to go to college and make something of themselves, whereas it appears that boys—having toxic masculinity—are no longer being encouraged to actualize themselves. At present girls make up 65% of undergraduate programs, while boys are at 35%. Girls are earning higher grades than boys, and boys are showing up in large numbers at college counseling offices to talk about their low motivation.

When 100 new Congresswomen won seats in Congress in the 2016 elections, they were congratulated not just for being elected, but for being women who were elected (and not men). When the U.S. Women's Soccer team won the World Cup, the team was celebrated not just for winning the championship, but for being women who won a championship when U.S. men have failed to do so.

It seems there is now an ongoing competition between males and females. There is a competition to see which sex earns more. There is a competition to see how many women CEOs there are compared to how many men CEOs. There is a competition to see how many women managers there are compared to men managers. There is a competition to see how many women lawyers, doctors, Senators, Presidents and candlestick makers there are compared to men. There is probably even a competition with respect to how many women bank robbers there are compared to men bank robbers. In all aspects of U.S. life women are being encouraged to surpass men. A few years back, women were talking about equality. Now they are talking about empowerment.

For years now, men and boys have been trashed. Little boys now appear to grow up to hear their mothers or female teachers or some woman somewhere telling them that males, particularly white males, are the cause of all the world's problems and that little boys are toxic and born toxic. Parents and teachers condescend to them from birth on. Males go into school and are forced to attend training programs to tame their wild masculinity and to learn how to treat girls and women with respect. Men are told they are "sexists," "Misogynists," and "male chauvinists." If they trash a woman, they can lose their job or even be convicted of a crime. In every way, feminists have tried not just to outdo men, but to eliminate them.

The narrative that one often hears is "men oppressed women for thousands of years, and now it is women's turn to be on top." Nobody ever explains how men oppressed women. It is assumed that because women stayed at home and gave birth to children and raised them, while men went out and got jobs and ran businesses and managed the government, that this constituted the oppression of women. Some have compared women to slaves and used terms like "domestic slavery" to describe women's position in society historically. It is as if women were forced to have children and take care of them against their will, or face a firing squad. Or perhaps each and every husband beat their wives if they failed to take care of the kids or the house or the pet dogs. That is a ridiculous notion, but that's nevertheless how radical feminists think.

The narrative is that men are not only enslavers, not only responsible for all the world's troubles, but also for all the wars throughout history, for systemic racism, for nuclear bombs, for global warming, for the pollution of the ocean, for the bubonic plague, for the government corruption, for deforestation, for the fall of Ancient Greece and Ancient Rome, for the melting of ice cream, and for all the husband-wife conflicts in all the families in all the neighborhoods in all the cities in all the countries in every part of the world.

However, while this race to gender superiority seems to be galloping along like a herd of mindless cattle, trampling anybody who gets in the way, hell bent on making sure no man is left standing, a single question rises up with a desperate need to be answered: When Congress is run by women, when the CIA is run by women, when the Salvation Army is run by women, when all trucks are driven by women, when all football players are women, when all postal workers are women, when all companies are run by women, when the United Nations is run by women, when all fires are put out by women, and when all the skyscrapers in the world are being designed and built by women, who is going to give birth to, nurture, and raise our children?

In the race to gender superiority—in the feminist characterization of motherhood as "domestic slavery"—the job of being a mother has been depreciated. When men and women are competing at every level, how can they achieve the cooperative and complimentary state that is required to be good parents and to raise healthy children? How can they understand the complexities of human behavior? How can they be open-minded enough to seek out the truth with regard to the important issue of gender relations?

When people are caught up in a race, they are no longer thinking of questions like these.

They are driven and goal oriented; they are racing along with blinders that only permit them to see the one goal and not to consider all the ramifications of achieving that goal.

In doing couple's therapy I have come across this same problem, particularly if the woman in the relationship has a feminist bent. Her aim is not to achieve an equal, cooperative, and mutually respectful relationship with her mate, but to control and dominate him, and eventually to surpass him. Such women are disturbed. A disturbed person is not able to do the work entailed in having a healthy relationship; she is not able to be open-minded and cooperative. There is, unfortunately, a large segment of women who need to feel superior become women who want to destroy men and take away their confidence. They are the ones who will benefit from this gender competition with its goal of defeating men.

But society in general, and culture in particular will not benefit from this competition. It will not benefit those who want equal opportunity for all. It will not benefit those who are concerned about the new double standard in parenting that favors girls and disparages boys. It will not benefit those who are concerned about the importance of motherhood and the forming of good mother-child attachments in early childhood.

Years of psychoanalytic research have showed the importance of families that have both a father and a mother, families in which parents are on the same page in raising children, families in which parents cooperate rather than compete. All of this research is now out of the window.

What will the next generation of children be like? Perhaps they are already here. After years of propaganda, feminists have created the society they want. And every day, the divisiveness of our society is increasing and the political unrest is mushrooming and our social problems are worsening. Perhaps things will have to completely fall apart before they get better.

The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism

Civilisation is based on the capacity of human beings to control and manage their instinctual and emotional responses and behave in an intelligent manner. The degree to which that capacity is eroded by lack of self-awareness, lack of cultural wisdom, lack of discipline, fatherlessness and superresponses to superstimuli, is the degree to which civilisation will decline, regress and then implode.

This ancient understanding that natural impulses can be destructive when taken to extremes, was known thousands of years ago. As discussed in Paul Elam and Peter Wright's article, "Slaying the dragon",[1] this understanding was a major foundational element of many religions and is addressed in cultural mythology, such as the seven deadly sins of Christianity and the story of Odysseus resisting the Sirens call. This ancient wisdom was recognised as key not just to the well-being of individuals, but also to the survival of civilisations over history.

It is important to note that fathers have played a major role in teaching children to postpone gratification and regulate their instinctual and emotional impulses, as we have seen from Dr. Warren Farrell's research[2] into the boy crisis. Unsurprisingly and predictably, fatherlessness has been one of the main factors driving the decline of Western civilisation.

There is a distinction between pathological behaviour and instinct. Just because a behaviour is driven by instinct, does not then make the behaviour healthy or biologically optimal to Darwinian fitness. Overeating is driven by instinct and can kill you before you reproduce (and even prevent you from finding a mate in the first place). There is also a distinction between gynocentrism and human instincts. Gynocentrism is not itself an instinct but rather a product of human instinct, emotional impulses and cultural conditioning. Gynocentrism is a set of complex and pathological behaviours that arise from a superresponse to superstimuli associated with sex, neoteny, the parental brain and pair bonding. See the article, "Chasing the dragon"[3] for more information.

Many animals and especially human beings, have a capacity to regulate and control their behavioural responses to instinctual and emotional impulses that come from the lower areas of the brain. We have a well developed prefrontal cortex and other areas of the cerebral cortex, that have been shown in neuroscientific research[4] to keep our behavioural responses to instincts in check. Whilst we may have no control over feeling our primal urges, we do have control over whether we decide to act on them and base decisions on them. We may experience anger, fear and sexual attraction, but we can control whether or not we act on our instincts and impulses. It is a scientific fact we have the capacity to control our behaviour and override our instinctual impulses. It is also the reason why we have a legal system: we recognise people have self-control over their decisions and actions.

People go on hunger strikes and die from it, despite having a hunger instinct and survival instinct. There are numerous other examples of people overriding their survival instinct. Extreme sports, stunts from escape artists and countless acts of bravery in war being such examples. There are numerous examples of people overriding their sexual instincts too. There are heterosexual men that remain celibate their entire lives in the clergy on purpose. There are even in this hypersexualised culture, sizeable communities of people that still practice sexual abstinence before marriage. We have enormous control over our behaviour. People do not see attractive people and then jump their bones and immediately have sex with them in public (we call that rape by the way, which is a crime)!

We have self-control and it is considerable in its power. It is worth considering that in the context of gynocentrism and the underlying superresponse to superstimuli. Whilst the superresponse leading to gynocentrism may indeed be strong, so is our ability to regulate our own behaviour. In fact our ability to control our own behaviour, can be that extreme it can actually kill us. It is also the case that through self-discipline, training and neuroplasticity, we can actually strengthen our neurological capacity to regulate our behaviour even further. Fathers play a key role in developing that neurological capacity in children, through teaching them to postpone gratification. We certainly have the capability to overcome gynocentrism.

The literal interpretation of free will might be an illusion, but self-control does exist and we have parts of the brain dedicated to exercising self-control. The fact that neurological process of self-control may in part lie beyond our conscious awareness, does not negate the fact we can and do regulate our behaviour and suppress our instincts and emotional impulses very often. It is what makes Homo sapiens, “sapien” or wise. Our ability to postpone gratification of our instincts and impulses and control when, where and even if we choose to satisfy them, is one of the major traits responsible for allowing our species to do what no other animal on this planet has done- create civilisation.

The assumption (which is precisely what it is), that gynocentrism is some insurmountable and hardwired instinct and behaviour we are slaves to, is complete and utter nonsense. That is not to say gynocentrism is not difficult to overcome or that it is not a powerful force within society. But it is not an omnipotent force either. It does not matter how many times it is said, there will still be some people that will call you a denier of biology if you dare to make the claim gynocentrism is not an immutable part of human behaviour. All of human behaviour is biological in part. Not just gynocentrism. Stating that gynocentrism is biological, certainly does not then automatically mean that it is immutable and insurmountable.

Gynocentrism is a pathological set of behaviours driven by instincts and emotional impulses, just like overeating and obesity is driven by the hunger instinct. It does not automatically follow that the instincts and emotional processes that are involved in gynocentrism, will invariably and always produce gynocentrism. Just like it does not always follow that the hunger instinct will lead to overeating and obesity, or that the sexual instinct will lead to rape.

Gynocentrism is merely one of many manifestations of the sexual instinct, desire to pair bond, our emotional response to neoteny and our parental brain. The same general emotional response to neoteny drives millions of people daily to dog videos on YouTube. The same parental brain is active when raising children. The reason why gynocentrism is so common in society, is because unlike obesity and other addictive and pathological behaviours like smoking, we do not shame people for it or discourage it or teach people about the harms it will cause. People understand the risks of overeating, obesity and smoking and people are discouraged from doing it by wider society (with the exception of the fat acceptance people). People go to jail if they indiscriminately act on their sexual instincts.

We normalise gynocentrism and actually encourage it. Imagine if we normalised and encouraged smoking again? Gynocentrism is common because we normalise it in the culture. The culture at large reinforces and conditions us from a very early age, to train our instincts and emotional responses to produce gynocentric behaviour. Contrary to the opinion of some armchair evolutionary biologists, gynocentrism does not enhance the capacity of the species to perpetuate itself. Exhibiting indiscriminate deference to addressing the needs and wants of women and girls above everything else (the definition of gynocentrism), actually causes the complete opposite. It leads to extinction.

It is not really hard to imagine how lopsided and imbalanced priorities could lead to dysfunctional and suboptimal outcomes in a complex system like society. The only reason why gynocentrism has not yet caused mass calamity, is because gynocentrism like obesity was kept at bay for most of human history from getting too big of a problem. Thanks to the imperative and focus we had to maintain on our survival as a community and as individuals and the limited means of communication over most of history, conditions simply did not permit gynocentrism to grow to a point where it threatened the survival of society. Only fairly recently over the last few centuries and particularly over the last 50 years, has that changed and these changes have allowed gynocentrism to mushroom.

Once survival became less of an issue and safety, prosperity, nutrition and human health improved by many orders of magnitude and society became mechanised and women gained control over their fertility, the constraints on gynocentrism growing beyond a certain threshold were removed and societal focus began to shift more and more from survival to a gynocentric lens.

Combined with these changes were communication technologies that allowed superstimuli to have an unprecedented mass effect on the population. The printing press, television, computers, smartphones, the internet and so forth, have allowed superstimuli to have much greater effects on conditioning human behaviour and the psychological development of children than ever before. Marketing in particular has made multibillion dollar industries out of exploiting superstimuli.

As a result of these changes, gynocentrism has rapidly grown over the last few centuries and particularly the last 50 years. We now have runaway gynocentrism. Eventually like a runaway train approaching a cliff, runaway gynocentrism will destroy civilisation if society does not find the brakes in time. We have in my estimation about 20 years before we reach that cliff and society runs off the rails into the abyss. It is now a race against the clock to wake as many people up from their hypnotic daze as we can.

We can see right now the fertility rates plummeting in every developed nation, thanks to constantly pandering to the needs and wants of women and girls. Social scientists are calling it the "demographic winter".[5] Pandering to the princess culture and female entitlement mentality (as Australian columnist Miranda Devine calls it),[6] does not produce offspring.

Societies that succumb to runaway gynocentrism die out. Of course there are also long term consequences building from decades of neglect of boys needs in the education system and the epidemic of fatherlessness, that will threaten the social cohesion and economic prosperity of a number of developed nations in the coming decades. Not only will gynocentric societies shrink and then die out, they will descend into poverty, crime and civil unrest before they disappear.

Gynocentrism is widespread because we consider it to be normal and the culture reinforces it as a good thing. Imagine how much more common obesity or gambling addiction would be if the culture normalised and encouraged overeating and gambling? Imagine how much more common overeating and obesity and gambling and gambling addiction would be if you were encouraged to overeat and gamble from birth? Why do we consider gynocentrism to be normal? There are ten reasons or causes for this:

The Influence Of Women

Part of the reason gynocentrism is normal, is because it is encouraged by women. A casino does not want to discourage you from gambling your life savings. Women generally speaking, do not want to discourage men from getting married despite being fully aware of the biased divorce and family court process. There is no incentive for women to discourage men from gynocentrism and every incentive to do the complete opposite – and they do.

The difference between gynocentrism and the casino example, is that women constitute half of society and also raise you from birth and casino's do not. The food industry as powerful as they are, are not half of the population and are not your mother. When you consider the role of women in men's lives as mothers, sisters, wives and girlfriends and the fact women generally are part of the most important and intimate relationships men have in their lives, it is not difficult to see how gynocentrism can be spread and become normalised in society if women promote it.

When women constitute the voting majority and control the majority of consumer spending, it is not hard to see how gynocentrism can become mainstream in the economy and in politics. That is especially true when women exercise an in-group bias, which research studies[7] report is the case. On top of those realities is the fact men can and do white knight for female attention and approval. The enforcement of women's desires on the rest of society, through female control over legions of male simps, politicians and corporations, cannot be overlooked in normalising gynocentrism in the culture.

The Change In Family Structure

The change in family structure over the last fifty years, has also played a major role in the normalisation of gynocentrism. We learn the gynocentric social mode of behaviour to a significant degree from our childhood upbringing in the household. When boys and girls are raised to adopt and expect male chivalry, then it is likely that behaviour will be exhibited by them when they get older. When boys and girls are raised with the message it is never okay to hit a woman, but never told the message it is never okay to hit a man, they internalise that double standard.

Over the last fifty years there has been dramatic changes in family structure. Many children are now being raised in fatherless homes from birth, or have been alienated from their fathers through divorce and family court. The lack of an adult male influence in the home combined with a lack of men in the education system, exacerbates gynocentric double standards being internalised in children and future generations. We also know the important role fathers play in teaching boys and girls to regulate their emotional and instinctual impulses, through teaching them to postpone gratification. We are now starting to see the impact of fathers being removed from the family, in the declining social behaviour of wider society.

We now have groups of young people and political movements fuelled entirely on emotional impulse and the abandonment of reason and evidence (SJW's, university campus feminists, Black Lives Matter, Antifa, the women's marches etc being examples). We are living in a post factual world, where what feels good is more important than what is true. This is what happens in a fatherless society and it will eventually lead to societal collapse as it gets worse.

The Prosperity Of Modern Civilisation

A subtle reason for why we consider gynocentrism to be normal, is because the prosperity of modern civilisation cushions society from the consequences of it in the short term. Our current debt based monetary system and welfare state, combined with major advances in technology, allows society to pass on the costs of ignoring major social problems onto future generations. It takes years, decades and in some cases centuries, before the severe and long-lasting consequences of gynocentrism hit individuals and society. So society does not learn very easily to do draw a link between gynocentric behaviour and the consequences of such behaviour.

You do not immediately feel the consequences of divorce and family court when you marry a female psychopath. Economies do not feel the burden straight away of large numbers of unemployed men arising from decades of inaction on addressing the boy crisis in education. Societies do not feel the consequences of fatherlessness straight away either or the long-term consequences of social witch-hunts like metoo#. Universities do not immediately feel the financial consequences of lawsuits against them from men falsely accused of rape, resulting from university policies enacted from the Dear Colleague letter.

Virtue Signalling

Gynocentrism is also normalised because on the surface it appears to be good behaviour, feels good and is therefore encouraged by the culture. However when considered with more thoughtful and detailed examination, it can be seen that this is not the case. White knighting appears to be a noble act on the surface, but not when we look into the details of what is going on. Human beings are prone to surface thinking, simple heuristic thinking and emotional bias. Marketing is so successful because it takes full advantage of these biases and cognitive shortcuts human perception employs to make sense of the world (see the elaboration likelihood model[8] for more info and check out the central versus peripheral route to persuasion). What may look and feel good and righteous on the surface, is not always the case.

The Proliferation Of Gynocentric Superstimuli And Mass Communication

Of course it is also predictable that gynocentrism will be normalised when our environment is swamped with superstimuli, that trains our brains through conditioning over many years to operate in a gynocentric mode. This consistent exposure has long term effects on the brain through neuroplasticity.

When gynocentric superstimuli is all you are exposed to every waking hour from birth until death and there is so much social pressure on you to conform to gynocentric social norms, it is predictable gynocentrism will be normalised in the society in question. We have a plethora of laws against broadcasting violent ads, shows and movies and against promoting gambling and yet nothing like that for gynocentrism. When you combine gynocentric superstimuli with modern communication in the form of the internet, television, computers and smartphones, you have the perfect delivery system to condition society and normalise gynocentric behaviour.

The Gynocentric Mainstream Media

Following on from the previous section, the mainstream media plays a key role in normalising gynocentrism. The gynocentric vomit coming out daily from major news outlets is constant. We have articles titled, "Why Can't We Hate Men?"[9] from the Washington Post and "The End Of Men"[10] from the Atlantic. Imagine for a moment if we substituted men with Jews in such articles. Such material would not look out of place in Nazi propaganda. Men are being dehumanised by the media and the media are spreading outrageous bigotry that would never be tolerated if the sexes were reversed.

The media has shown time and time again, they are pushing a gynocentric and female supremacist narrative onto society. They have ceased being news outlets and now essentially spread feminist and gynocentric man hating propaganda. The media does shape the attitudes and beliefs of society and also shapes politics and propaganda does work as we have seen from numerous examples throughout history.

We are fortunate now to have alternative media finally rising up against this hatred of men, to challenge it directly. AVFM is one example of this. However the mainstream media has had a multidecade headstart on the alternative media to shape society and still has considerable influence, despite their falling subscriptions and viewers.

Reductionism

There is a reductionist bent in society to not look at the bigger picture. We often fail to see the connection between things and how things are interrelated in society. There is a tendency to assign responsibility or consequence to one thing, person or cause. This feeds not just into normalising gynocentrism, but into letting other problems in society grow too. Society is a system and systems theory would help enormously in understanding and correctly dealing with societal problems, particularly social problems.

Taking a holistic and systems approach to understanding the world, can be far more effective than perceiving the world solely through a reductionist lens. Take school shootings for example. We could prevent such tragedies from occurring if we bothered take a wholistic systems based perspective on the problem. Instead of blaming it all on toxic masculinity, how about we look at fatherlessness and mental health. As society becomes more and more connected, taking a wholistic systems based approach to addressing social problems is going to be more and more relevant.

When we examine the behaviour of men and women in society, it is often solely discussed and framed along gynocentric lines by the media and by the culture. We look at men's behaviour toward women in isolation from women. We do not even consider women are agents in society and we fail to see how the behaviour of men and women toward the opposite sex, feedback on each other. The feminist narrative on domestic violence is one such example of this.

Domestic violence is often reciprocal in nature[11] and yet we do not hear on the reciprocal nature of domestic violence. When we hear about men's violence toward women only, its causes are framed along the lines of power and control by the feminist Duluth model. No other cause or factor is apparently at play in contributing to men's violence. The role of alcohol, substance abuse, poverty, mental illness and abuse during childhood, is all overlooked and ignored.

When society fosters a reductionist perspective on looking at the world and does not consider a wholistic or systems perspective, it encourages gynocentrism to grow and spread. Gynocentrism is by its nature reductionist. Having a one-dimensional perspective of relating everything solely to how they impact women and girls, is much easier to spread and normalise in a society that is highly politically polarised and has a general reductionist mindset to looking at the world that is encouraged by ideologues in the media and academia.

Even in biology and the sciences, we can see how reductionism holds back progress in understanding the natural world. Systems biology[12] is a rapidly developing interdisciplinary field at the forefront of life science research, that aims to go beyond a reductionist perspective, correct this limitation in scientific knowledge and develop a more accurate wholistic systems understanding of biology.

Biology is complex and is composed of multiple systems at multiple levels, from cell signalling pathways all the way up to entire ecosystems. When we examine what is required for evolutionary success and for genes to be successfully passed on from one generation to the next, it is not as simple as saying it is all about reproductive success. Reproduction is essential, but so is survival. An organism must survive to reproduce and its offspring must survive to successfully mate, otherwise it would be as if the offspring were never produced in the first place.

Reproducing once may not be sufficient either and an organism may need to survive long enough to mate multiple times, to ensure they produce enough offspring that survive to sexual maturity and pass on the genes. An organism must develop a strategy in investing energy, resources and time in survival versus reproduction, that is optimised to their environment and biology, to guarantee evolutionary success.

Evolutionary success is far more complex than simply just reproducing. If that were not the case and reproduction was really all that mattered, then the only life that would have evolved on Earth would have been asexual microbial life. There are selective advantages for species that reproduce more slowly, but have a more complex biology that can better adapt to, tolerate, manipulate and extract resources from the local environment. These selective advantages are partly what gave rise to the proliferation of multicellular life.[13]

Think for a moment about the thousands of lineages that have continued their existence today, because of the civilisation and technological advances men have created and been responsible for. Think of the billions of people alive today because of the intrinsic value men have provided to society. There are entire lineages that would have been extinguished long ago and billions of people that would not have been born, without the intrinsic value men have provided in creating the advanced civilisation we enjoy and modern technology.

Simply reproducing, especially for a slowly reproducing species like Humans, is simply not enough to ensure evolutionary success. That is why men have been sexually and naturally selected, to develop traits to enable them to provide, protect, discover, explore, invent, build, maintain, repair and fight for society. It is not as simple as saying one man can reproduce with ten women, therefore men are disposable. Biology is far more complex than that.

Notice no one seems to consider how one man can change the world and lead to an extra couple of hundred million people existing and passing on their genes. Think of the impact a handful of men in society have had on civilisation over the last two centuries and by extension the evolutionary success of the species. Think of how many less people there would be without electricity, machinery, antibiotics, modern medicine and modern agriculture that men were mostly responsible for. How many family genetic lineages have continued existing because of these technological advances by men and have avoided termination as a result?

Successfully passing on the genes is not solely about sexual intercourse. Biology is more complex than that. Many other things have to occur before and after sexual intercourse, to ensure genes are passed on successfully. The value men bring to the survival of the community and to society is unique. Despite what feminists claim, women really cannot do everything a man can do or just as well (Women are not inferior. Men and women just have different strengths.).

Men remain the majority of our leading scientists, thinkers, inventors, political and business thinkers etc, despite all of the feminist social engineering to artificially lift women up. Human adult males are also not immediately replaceable either, especially talented and gifted men. It takes roughly 18 years before they reach physical maturity (25 years if we are talking about the brain) and a great deal of parental investment compared to other animals.

Our failure to recognise that treating men as disposable is to treat civilisation as disposable, will eventually lead to the implosion of civilisation. Even if we consider men as machines, we all recognise what happens when you do not look after your car and do not change the oil. Either we unlearn the cultural belief men are disposable, or we can watch society start falling apart. Adopting a wholistic systems perspective and going beyond a simple reductionist mode of thinking, would help us unlearn the erroneous cultural belief men are disposable.

Gynocentric Authority, Institutions And Herd Mentality

Much of the influence in what shapes social behaviour comes from the top of society and from authorities like the government and institutions like university. Gynocentrism has been normalised in part because we have practiced it for centuries and our key institutions, leaders, celebrities and elite practice it, endorse it and impose it on the rest of us. We even enshrine gynocentrism into law.

There have been a number of psychological studies since WW2 showing how easily people blindly follow authority and rules (the infamous Zimbardo Stanford prison experiment[14] being one such example) and how powerful institutional environments and rules are in shaping group and individual behaviour (that partly explains a lot about how Nazism came to power and how millions of people were exterminated without anyone speaking out against it).

The power of the herd mentality of human beings to follow authority and a minority of individuals, cannot be understated. Many people simply do not think for themselves and this reality allows a minority of people like feminists, to easily control large groups of people once they hold positions of authority in institutions and government.

Slavery was considered normal for centuries by our leaders, authorities and institutions and was widespread, as was barbaric punishment and torture. Only in the last two hundred years or so and after wars and huge political movements and massive legal reform, have slavery and inhumane punishment been mostly abolished and outlawed. People had the same arguments about slavery being natural and inevitable in the past, as people do today about gynocentrism.

Just like back then, the arguments today about gynocentrism being inevitable do not have substance when you examine them more closely. This is the naturalistic fallacy in action. The fact gynocentrism has natural or biological underpinnings, does not then mean it is morally acceptable, desirable, inevitable or a healthy expression of human behaviour.

The education system out of all of the institutions, plays a key role in normalising gynocentrism. Many boys and girls in school can now go through most of their education from kindergarten to postgraduate education, with few male teachers. The influence of feminist ideology is now present at the primary or elementary level and has been present at the university level for years.

The education system has now essentially become a system of feminist indoctrination and gynocentrism. This sort of environment does have impacts on the behaviour of children and the adults they will become. Like the changes in family structure, the feminisaton of the education system has played a major role in spreading and promoting gynocentrism in society.

Former KGB agent and defector Uri Bezmenov, warned in an interview more than 30 years ago,[15] about the feminist and marxist takeover of our institutions and the ideological subversion of Western democracy. He made some very eerie predictions that help explain today's society. Controlling the education system is key. He discusses the four stages of the takeover of society by the far left in the interview (demoralisation, destabilisation, crisis and normalisation).

He explains the first stage which is called demoralisation. This involves indoctrinating multiple generations of students in far left ideology in the education system. From there these people infect the government, academia, corporations and our institutions and then spread far left ideology within these organisations. He explains how the brainwashing occurring in the education system, corrupts people's perception to the point where they cannot make logical sense of information. After years of indoctrination, their thinking is bounded within an ideological framework and they cannot see beyond that framework.

Sound familiar? It should. Uri was explaining what modern Western society would become 30 years ago. Think of all the revelations that have come out on the working environments of employees in the tech sector and in academia and the disruptive and violent protests on university campuses.

Gynocentric Superorganisms

Related to the previous reason behind why gynocentrism is normalised, is the influence of superorganisms on society and how they have succumbed to gynocentrism. MRA blogger Angry Harry, did an excellent series looking at the impact of superorganisms on human behaviour and how powerful they are in shaping it (See Angry Harry's MRA corner on AVFM and check out the 4 part series titled, "Those Who Rules Over Us").[16]

Superorganisms in the social context can be thought of as entities comprised of thousands, sometimes millions and even billions of individuals, that appear to mimic the properties of a living organism and wield enormous influence on society. Religions, governments, corporations, institutions and cities are examples of superorganisms. People in this context can be considered cells of these superorganisms. If we look at human civilisation as a superorganism, the slogan "feminism is cancer" is quite fitting.

Gynocentrism can be thought of in the context of superorganisms, as the underlying germ of a disease of the superorganism. It infects healthy human cells of the superorganism and then spreads throughout the superorganism. Eventually the superorganism succumbs to gynocentrism and then infects other superorganisms. Feminism could be considered a vector of the gynocentric germ that helps it spread, like how a mosquito is a vector of Malaria.

Superorganisms as Angry Harry explained, have enormous influence over our society and the individual behaviour of people. Corporations, governments, religion and institutions shape the way of life for billions of people. Gynocentrism has infested many of these superorganisms and turned them into gynocentric zombies. These infected entities can and have inflicted terrible damage on society.

Think of the impact feminist infested universities have had on society. Think of the impact the gynocentric legal system has had on the nuclear family, fathers and the lives of men. Think of the impact the feminised education system has had on the boy crisis in education. Think of the impact the gynocentric bias of the tech sector has had on the information that the public is exposed to and their censorship and filtering of alternative non-gynocentric viewpoints.

Learned Helplessness And The Self-Fulfilling Prophecy Of Gynocentrism

Men and boys in today's society to a substantial degree, are exhibiting signs of learned helplessness. Many men and boys have essentially been conditioned to accept that gynocentrism is normal and inescapable. Once men and boys internalise that dangerous false belief, they accept their own marginalisation and disposability every day and in doing so enable gynocentrism to have almost complete dominance over society. Learned helplessness has been linked to depression[17] and is no doubt a major factor driving the epidemic of male suicide. Learned helplessness fuels a self-fulfilling prophecy.

If men and boys believe there is no other way to live, then gynocentrism becomes inevitable and this fate then reinforces the belief that gave rise to it. Beliefs can be very destructive things when they go unquestioned, despite leading to highly destructive outcomes.

Men going their own way (MGTOW) is a pathway out of gynocentrism for men. It involves unlearning pathological gynocentric beliefs and daring to believe there is another way to live. Whilst it may not be easy to go against the social current of society, it is possible and once the rewards of going your own way become clear, it becomes easier and easier and easier to go your own way. We are social creatures and part of overcoming learned helplessness for men involves abandoning concern for social ostracism, particularly from women and learning how to identify and manage the risks that a predatory gynocentric society presents, so you can live life in your own way and avoid entrapment and attack.

Men and boys are punished for performing and exhibiting their natural masculine nature and at the same time ridiculed for failing to perform and demonstrate a masculine nature. At the same time that men are told they must live up to the hypergamous expectations of women to earn more money than their female counterparts in order to be worthy of a relationship with women, they are cast as privileged oppressors and blamed for the gender pay gap if they do earn more money than women.

Men are told they are losers if they do not perform and then are told they are privileged oppressors when they do perform. Women will write articles about “where are all the good men” and then write other articles about the gender wage gap and how we need female quotas in upper management and corporate boards because of male privilege. It is a double bind. Men have no escape from social ostracism if they follow external societal pressures and succumb to herd mentality and social pressure to conform. Such men must accept the message from society they are inferior, violent, privileged and evil oppressors.

MGTOW is the healthy alternative. MGTOW involves finding your own way in life, independent of what the culture or society or women expects of you or what they think of you. MGTOW is the only way out for men from the gynocentric prison society has been turned into. To borrow a line from the Shawshank Redemption you either, “get busy living or get busy dying”.

The biases in human perception, thinking and behaviour discussed, combined with the changes in family structure, the proliferation of superstimuli with mass communication and the influence of gynocentric institutions, media and authority figures, keep the silent killer that is gynocentrism from being detected and addressed by civilisation and by individuals.

To fight this, we need to develop greater self-awareness in society and awareness of what gynocentrism is and the harms it can and does cause. We need organised resistance to gynocentrism to emerge at the individual level of men going their own way and at the collective level of a well-funded and well organised men’s movement to tackle institutional and legalised gynocentrism. Either we address gynocentrism, or the harsh forces of natural selection will remove gynocentric behaviour from the human evolutionary lineage, or worse put the entire human race into the fossil record. For the superorganisms of society, they will have to either rid themselves of gynocentrism or look forward to bankruptcy or collapse. For the individual man, you either overcome gynocentrism or you suffer for it and in some cases lose everything, including your life.

It is our choice, we can either do this the easy way or the hard way individually, and as a society. It takes discipline to recondition ourselves out of bad habits and develop the self-awareness to recognise and stop bad behaviours. It does not happen overnight. Websites like AVFM, men’s discussion and support groups and male friendly life coaches and mental health professionals, can help with that process.

MGTOW helps in a big way in overcoming gynocentrism. MGTOW or men going their own way, is grounded on the fundamental principle of self-control. You cannot go your own way without it! MGTOW and its continued growth is direct proof it is possible for men to overcome years of gynocentric programming, instinctual and emotional impulses and take the red pill.

But like I said nothing happens overnight. That goes for individual change and also for societal change. Just because change is slow, does not mean change is impossible or will not eventually lead to profound shifts in people’s lives and the way society functions.

Every journey begins with a single first step. It is time men broke free of their psychological bondage and dared to recognise and accept their true intrinsic value, in the face of a gynocentric society that would prefer they did not.

It is not just biology at play when we are talking about gynocentrism. Social, political, institutional, economic, informational and cultural factors, are also involved in normalising the social pathology we call gynocentrism. We are indeed living in the matrix of gynocentrism. Most people are still asleep in the matrix. We need to stop normalising gynocentrism by addressing the ten causes responsible for its normalisation discussed earlier. MGTOW and a well funded and organised men's movement, would go a long way to achieving that objective.

We are at a critical period in human civilisation where we need to move beyond outmoded gynocentric ways of thinking and behaving if we expect civilisation to survive. Technology cannot be uninvented and we cannot return to a traditionalist path. Simply ending feminism will not be sufficient to advance society either. Gynocentrism has now become an unsustainable problem for society.

Tens of thousands of years ago when we humans transitioned from a hunter-gatherer existence to primitive civilisation, the dynamics between the sexes changed. Now we face a similar challenge to change those dynamics again, as a result of rapid technological change over the last two centuries. Dr. Warren Farrell has in the past described the need for a gender transition movement, to recognise and address this reality.

The Kardashev scale[18] lays out the stage of technological advancement of civilisations. Human civilisation is currently undergoing a transition from a type 0 civilisation, to a type 1 civilisation in which we control all of the energy available on the planet and coming from the parent star (currently we can only make use of a fraction of the energy available). Technologies of a type 1 civilisation include: nuclear fusion and renewable energy on a large scale, the capacity to produce large quantities of antimatter etc. Some of these technologies we have obtained, some we are on the cusp of and other technology is quite a while away.

In several decades if everything goes right, we may have a permanent, sizeable and self-sustaining settlement on Mars. All of this civilisational advancement, requires a society that remains socially stable, free, safe, educated and prosperous enough to permit the required technological progress to occur and to ensure the technology is not used to destroy ourselves.

The relationship between men and women forms the backbone of the family and the family forms the backbone of society. Gynocentrism is now threatening to destroy the backbone of the family and of society. We need to wake up, otherwise the future for humanity is looking bleak. External threats like nuclear weapons appear to be well recognised. The same does not seem to apply for gynocentrism and the scale of the threat it poses for the continued existence of human civilisation. This needs to change.

Helen Reddy, who died in September (1941-2020), has been called the queen of 70s pop. She had three number one hits in the United States (Billboard Hot 100 chart) in 1973 and 15 singles that entered charts in the US top 40. Hits also followed internationally. Her ‘feminist anthem’ titled I Am Woman catapulted Helen Reddy to enduring fame. However, her overall recognition in the 1970s was based on radio airplay of hit songs, and US television primetime variety shows. She performed alongside, or hosted, some of the most famous singers and actors of that era.

Helen Reddy was lauded in many obituaries following her death. From an Australian perspective, she was the first Australian-born artist to get a number one hit on the US Billboard chart. I Am Woman was also the first ‘Australian-penned’ song to win a US Grammy Award. Over the decades, Reddy’s continuing relevance was mainly about feminism, singing her anthemic song, for example at an abortion rally in Washington DC in 1989, and an anti-Trump women’s protest in 2017.

Helen Reddy’s cultural importance is entirely wrapped up in the anthem-song I Am Woman, which in turn is firmly embedded in the so-called ‘second wave’ feminist historical charge.

A deeper investigation of Helen Reddy, her rise to fame, and her feminist credentials, throws up a series of weaknesses and contradictions in the dominant narrative. Both the feminist persona that she cultivated, as well as the meaning of her most famous song, deserve reappraisal. This investigation is particularly important from the perspective of men and women interested in the cultural perception of sexual power that favours a feminist worldview.

A background

Helen Reddy was born into a show-business family and was involved in performance from a young age. In her autobiography from 2005, she identifies a key moment when she had a sense of injustice about women's social portrayal (age 4?!).

In a burlesque comedy performance, a man sitting in an artist studio paints a woman in a bikini:

> "The model asks to see the painting. He turns it around to reveal a blank canvas and tells her that he's not really an artist, he's just a dirty old man… I was really offended by that sketch… Now… I see what offended me was a woman being exploited by a man. It was my first consciousness raising experience and the beginning of my feminism…"

in Helen Reddy, The Woman I Am: A Memoir (2005), preview available in Google Books.

Comedy sketches from the 1940s could easily be seen in the context of their time. Perhaps dated, but not necessarily exploitative. There is a hint in this scenario of Reddy's own emerging prudishness, with an implication that men's sexuality is offensive. In 2010, Reddy complained publicly about modern bras, which suggests a similar view of sexual morality:

> "When I was a girl, we used to complain we were divided into two groups: We were either virgins or we were whores," she says. "And then along came Madonna — and now we're all whores.

Reddy rebelled in her teens against the prospect of continuing the family tradition of an entertainment career and at the age of 20, in 1961, had married a man of 33. Reddy herself gives a very un-feminist explanation of her outlook at this time:

> "I didn't really want to have a career at all, because that was the 1950s and the ideal was to get married and then spend your life cooking and cleaning and living for your man. I had a trunk full of recipes, preparation for being a real woman."

In 1976 (24 years before the 2000 interview), Reddy had already callously admitted that her marriage had been a sham:

> "I knew even before we were married that I didn't like him,"

Reddy separated from her first spouse, before her daughter was born. That former husband died in 1970, at the age of 42. Reddy returned to the performance industry with gusto. She had an ambition to be a successful performer at the highest level, focused on the US market. As Reddy indicated in 1983, in an interview with Dennis Hunt:

> "I would have gotten to the states one way or another. I was very determined to > come here."

Reddy's ambition looked close to being realised in 1966, when she won an Australian singing competition on a television show called Bandstand, hosted by Brian Henderson (semi-final performance of I belong). The prize was a trip to the US, where she expected to immediately sign a record contract. This did not eventuate. Instead, she stayed in the US in increasingly desperate straits, a single mother with a daughter aged three in tow, performing occasionally to small audiences, and lacking the work permit that would allow her to get secure ongoing employment as a performer.

Reddy was on the point of returning to Australia, when she found the basis for success. In 1968, in New York, a fellow Australian (male) held a crowd-funding party for Reddy, to help pay her rent. At this party, Reddy, now 27, met Jeff Wald, several years younger, Jewish, and working in the entertainment industry (alongside David Geffen).

As Reddy apparently admitted, she married Wald within days, "out of desperation over her right to work and live in the United States."

Reddy also made a decision to become Jewish. Did she convert to Judaism as an act of compliance with her husband's religion? Unlikely. She was a neither a servile woman, nor did she have any religious inclinations, except those relating to past life regression. She made this clear in 2000:

> "I don't follow any formal religion, because I think that once a religion becomes organised, it turns into a business."

Reddy's religious conversion would have been useful, as the music industry of the US had influential Jewish entrepreneurs.

Importantly, the marriage in 1968 to Jeff Wald was followed by a hiatus for Reddy. Her husband became a successful talent agent in Hollywood, while she remained relatively idle at home. In this period, she did a course in hypnotherapy in 1969 at UCLA and became a feminist, the basis for her most famous song.

Women's Liberation, or feminism was gaining social prominence in the US, following the 1960s hippy 'free love' era. Radical feminist views and actions became newsworthy. An early example was Valerie Solanas, who in 1967 self-published an overtly man-hating book entitled SCUM (society for cutting up men), in which she advocated for the eradication of men. In 1968 she famously attempted to murder Andy Warhol.

Also in 1968, a feminist protest at a Miss America beauty contest made bra burning notorious. In 1970, Lillian Roxon, an Australian-born, New York based feminist, journalist and acquaintance of Helen Reddy, reported on a landmark street march by women in the city that August. Angry mass protests (the 'roar') were a newsworthy aspect of the growing women's movement.

Relevant to this examination, also in 1970, an obscure Australian left-feminist student, Irena Dunn, quipped that "A woman needs a man, like a fish needs a bicycle." This phrase crossed the ocean to the US and became a popular graffiti on campuses, though attributed to the feminist Gloria Steinem.

Radical feminists argued that men were exploitative and abusive and women should detach themselves romantically, sexually and economically from them.

Crucially, Helen Reddy did nothing of this sort.

Reddy put an ultimatum to her husband, to focus his career on promoting her own career. He accepted and began promoting her with relentless enthusiasm. Thus, in 1971, Reddy had her first hit record, with 'I don't know how to love him'. Although this was a minor hit, it was due to Wald's tireless work in networking, contacting music executives, and phoning radio stations.

In 1976, one journalist, Mary Murphy, observed a pattern in the relationships between superstar women and their husbands, using Helen Reddy as a key example:

> "The successful female star is the center of her own universe and the man [husband] basks in her reflected glow. He is he shadow person, the supporting player, hitched to a star."

Notably, when Reddy's fame started to collapse, the relationship with her husband also collapsed. They separated in 1981, and were involved in a notorious divorce in 1982.

Helen Reddy's husband was one of several men that had been crucial to her survival and eventual rise to multi-millionaire status. Indeed, men were so important to her advancement, that it undermines the feminist narrative woven around her success.

Who inspired I Am Woman

The song I Am Woman accelerated and transformed Helen Reddy's success and is the basis of her enduring fame, while her wider career has sunk into historical obscurity. The contemporary mainstream media (and recent obituaries) have focused on a feminist fairy-tale version of its emergence, promoted by Reddy.

In interviews over many decades, Reddy portrayed writing the song as a moment of 'divine inspiration'. As she recalled in 2003, according to a tightly scripted feminist narrative:

> "I couldn't find any songs that said what I thought being woman was about. I thought about all these strong women in my family who had gotten through the Depression and world wars and drunken, abusive husbands. But there was nothing in music that reflected that.
> "I certainly never thought of myself as a songwriter, but it came down to having to do it."

Sometimes Reddy mentioned a co-writer of the song, in interviews:

> "I knew Ray Burton, an Australian musician, and he had a crack at the music and thus was born the song."

The role of Burton was far more significant than noted by Reddy. This musician had worked with Reddy in Australia. Likewise, he had travelled to the US and continued to work with her. He also had an unusual opportunity to witness the 'consciousness raising' sessions that Reddy initiated in the Hollywood Hills, where she lived. He said women would, "sit around and whine about their boyfriends."

After experiencing the atmosphere of 'consciousness-raising', Burton said:

> "I felt quite out of place among all of these gung ho women's lib females but I could see the commercial potential because these women were SERIOUS! I suggested to Helen that if she felt so strongly about women's rights she should get some words down on paper and I would then take them away and construct a song from them… I guess I wrote some of the lyrics as well."

Subsequent to a bio-movie about Reddy, released in 2020, just before Reddy's death, Burton expressed his annoyance of having been written out of the story. He again cited his recollection of words expressed 50 years ago:

> "Look, if you feel so strongly about Women's liberation Helen, why don't you write something down for me to work on?"

The world's most famous feminist anthem was a man's idea.

I won't sing songs like that, except when I do

Prior to I Am Woman, Helen Reddy had for many years sung cover songs. Likewise, her emerging fame would be based on doing 'easy-listening' cover songs, reheated hits, written by others, that she could sing better. But in 1972, she had a surprise hit, with an empowerment song that had been suggested by her male collaborator, Ray Burton. Reddy then spun a contrived feminist narrative, that would serve her well. Reddy repeatedly claimed that she felt contempt for a music industry that portrayed women in a downtrodden light. In a 1973 interview:

> "I've always rejected songs like 'Take me back, baby, I'm on my knees/Begging you please.'"

In many interviews over decades, Reddy regurgitated a simulated idealism about her musical direction. Reddy's most successful songs were never feminist-inspired or themed. Her hits were chosen for commercial gain, to make money. Therefore, the songs were either about romantic love, or ironically, about women who had gone crazy after being wronged by a man. Key examples: I Don't know how to love him (1971, vaguely servile love song), Delta Dawn (June 1973, woman goes mad over being jilted by a man), Leave Me Alone (October 1973, woman jilted, disturbed, homeless) Angie Baby (October 1974, disturbed girl and her fantasy lovers), Ain't No Way to Treat a Lady (1974, woman tries to leave cheating man). Reddy sang exactly the kind of songs that she said she rejected.

Contemporary propaganda ignores the contradiction between Reddy's self-marketing, and the actual product she supplied for 10 years. However, some television and music critics of the 1970s did recognise the formula for Reddy's success. This TV review is from 1973:

> "In her lyrics, Miss Reddy proclaims: "Yes, I am wise, but it's wisdom born of pain." Her program is burdened with neither much wisdom nor any pain. It is slickly packaged entertainment, with a light and welcome accent on women."

The lyrical theme of many of Reddy's hits contradict her claim that she wanted to sing about strong women. Alice Cooper famously declared that Reddy was 'the queen of housewife rock'. Reddy was aware of the accusation and embraced it, with a positive spin, in 1975:

> "That means I've reached a lot of people in a simplistic manner who would never go to a lecture or read an article on Women's Lib."

Indeed, Reddy had to tread lightly to communicate her feminist ideology to simplistic women, because feminism in the 1970s was still seen as potentially, "angry, man-hating, dangerous".

Reddy's left-feminist political ideology was revealed in interviews, her attendance at pro-abortion rallies and support for left-political causes. However, eight years after Reddy became famous, some writers already expressed cynicism about a wealthy superstar patronising the female masses with formulas for liberation. In 1979, a Tom Buckley NYT review of a Helen Reddy television special, put the boot in:

> "And it just may be that Miss Reddy, whose songs still lament the hard lot and indomitable spirit of her sex, and Miss Fonda, who is also a fervid feminist, will lure legions of careworn women from their washboards, scrubbing brushes and darning needles to the television set, even at the risk of a beating from their beer-sodden husbands."

I Am Woman – selling out in the afterglow

In the 1970s, the image of Helen Reddy had been cultivated, with its soft marketing of feminism. I Am Woman was a song that had a semi-sacred status. Opportunities had arisen to sell this song for commercials, but these were rejected.

From the 1980s onwards, Reddy and her pop hits were no longer in high rotation on radio stations. Feminist solidarity was seemingly low. Reddy even performed a song I Can't Say Goodbye to You at a 1981 Miss World competition. Miss World pageants had made feminists very angry from the 1960s onwards. They had previously staged protests against such 'objectification' of women.

Newspapers kindly explained that Reddy had to pay the rent, having allegedly spent $40 million living the high life in the previous decade, and living on reduced means, following her separation from Jeff Wald.

Selling the iconic I Am Woman songs for commercials also became financially optimal. So Reddy allowed its use for purposes that might have seemed a 'sell-out' in the 1970s. For example, Burger King used a parody of I Am Woman in 2006 to sell hamburgers. The advert included men burning their underwear:

> I am man, hear me roar,
> In numbers too big to ignore,
> And I'm way too hungry to settle for chick food!

Woman who doesn't like man

Helen Reddy had used men (and feminism) to advance her ambitions and career. As the men ceased to be useful, it made sense to move on. Reddy's husband, Jeff Wald, had been instrumental in the Reddy's success, but by the 1980s, he was not able to push her downward facing career further. He also had an admitted major cocaine addiction that contributed to frequently aggressive behaviour.

The eventual divorce in 1982 was famously bitter, due in part to a custody dispute over their son. Wald jokingly claimed in a radio interview, in August 2020 (just months before her death), that only with dementia "She Forgot She Hates Me!". That was more than 30 years after their divorce.

One particular interview with Reddy in 1999 indicates the depth of her hatred for her ex-husband Wald, but also a more disturbing generic contempt for men:

> "If you are going to have children, have one as a single mother because otherwise you will never have him out of your life. Not only will your children always be his children but your grandchildren will be his grandchildren and you will have him in your life until you Die. So I say, go to a sperm bank."

The above statement was made 18 years after her divorce from Wald (she married and divorced another male subsequently). Reddy had harboured an ongoing bile, for decades, packed into a female-centric IVF philosophy. Yet, an even more disturbing attitude was revealed in a subsequent television interview in 2002. Roseanne Barr, who appeared to be very drunk, wiggled a confession from Reddy:

> Barr: "How did you get the guts to get up there and sing a song that would piss all the men off…?"
> Reddy: "I was too pissed off at the time to care… there was a lot of anger at that time… When a person's consciousness is first raised, there's a lot of anger'.
> Reddy: "You are going to be a grandmother too. You are just going to love it… I hope it's a girl." [min 1:28].
>
> Barr: "No it's a boy."
> Reddy: "Oh… Well never mind" [Min 1:36].

Having a female grandchild is cool… Male?… Not so much.

Reddy's attitude towards men developed both in her lived experience and through her ideological indoctrination in the late 1960s, via feminism. Is it possible that her pride only in strong women in her life had an opposite: that she had a contempt for men who were weak, alcoholics, drug addicts, failures? Was her feminism of such a radical variant that it extended to the contempt for all things male? Reddy's sentiment bears a resemblance to that of the radical feminist Valerie Solanas, who suggested in 1967 in The SCUM Manifesto:

> "It is now technically feasible to reproduce without the aid of males (or, for that matter, females) and to produce only females. We must begin immediately to do so. Retaining the male has not even the dubious purpose of reproduction."

The alpha female describes her power

Ultimately the song I Am Woman, seems not about women at all. The vocal roar in the song might emanate from women on the march. But it is more convincing to think of the roar coming from Reddy herself. The roar certainly did not come from the meek, 'downtrodden' housewives that she sought to convert to a higher consciousness.

Reddy came from humble beginnings. She was able to fulfil a searing ambition to succeed. She rose to stardom inside an alleged patriarchal society, with the essential aid and encouragement of supportive men. And her success was not simply musical or financial. She was invited to perform for Presidents. She was invited to the White House of President Nixon and then Ford. She socialised with that ruling elite, while her husband snorted coke in the White House bathroom. She experienced social mobility on an epic scale and grabbed it by the horns.

In a provocative short-lived interview in 2014, just before the onset of her dementia, a journalist, Raymond Gill, sought an elaboration on her achievement of, "rubbing shoulders with the leaders of the military-industrial complex."

Reddy did not answer the journalist's attempted probing questions, because they were both commercially off-topic and subversive. Nevertheless, the journalist had targeted a key issue.

The narrative of Helen Reddy (and of feminism in its entirety) contains an uncomfortable (suppressed) contradiction. Reddy was a powerful woman who was attracted to men that would serve her interests. She had an ambition to be famous and wealthy, and indeed she became a multi-millionaire, mixing with the elite of the world. In other words, she once lived unlike 99.9 percent of all women (and men) on planet earth.

The enduring fame of Helen Reddy is entangled in a mythology, that depends on the facts of modern sexual and social power (and mobility) being suppressed. In the 1970s, journalists still voiced the popular concern that feminism included negative views about males. Such questioning has been eliminated from the mainstream media today.

Exorcising the franchise

October 25, 2020 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Throughout the year 2020 the media have made a big to-do about the 100th anniversary of the 19th Amendment giving women the right to vote. As is always the case when the media look backwards, something that was controversial in its day is no longer controversial. The history is settled. It's been a win-win situation for all of us. How could it be otherwise? Drawbacks? Repercussions? Side effects? Of course not! We're on the right side of history and we're sticking to it! Even to suggest otherwise is…well, some people don't deserve free speech.

Nevertheless, when democracy buffs tut-tut over the fact that so many eligible voters don't bother to show up at the polls (even in the contentious 2016 election, 39% stayed home), is it possible that giving women the right to vote has played a part in voter apathy?

During the Reagan presidency there was talk of a gender gap. 46% of women voted for Reagan, 54% of men. The tacit assumption behind this observation was that if women preferred a candidate, it was the "good" candidate; if men preferred a candidate, it was the "bad" candidate. Then, as now, the media tilted left, so if women went in the same direction, then it was a testament to the superior morality, virtue, and discernment of the fair sex. And if men preferred Reagan or some other troglodyte…well, just be glad women voters are around to save the country from those male mossbacks.

Assuming that a gender gap exists among a couple, married or otherwise, why would they bother to vote? They just cancel out each other's votes. That does neither candidate any good. So why bother to wait in line at the polls? Why bother to bone up on the issues and the candidates? Better to keep peace in the family and just blow it off. Some people characterize voting as a right; others as a privilege. Either way, it's optional.

Ah, but what about all the suffragettes who struggled to get women the vote! Sufferin' suffragettes! (Imagine Daffy Duck or Sylvester the cat saying that.) How can any modern woman stay home after all the struggles her ancestral sisters went through 100 or more years ago! Well, in truth, a lot of the first-time female voters stayed home in 1920.

The 1920 Presidential campaign pitted Democrat James Cox against Republican Warren Harding. By a strange coincidence, both were from Ohio and both owned newspapers (Cox in Dayton, Harding in Marion) before getting into politics.

Thanks to the 19th Amendment, the number of eligible voters in 1920 ballooned to 54,165,000, with men having 27,245,000 and women 26,920,000. When the dust had settled, Harding won in a landslide, 404 to 127 in electoral votes, 16,144,093 to 9,139,661 (or 60.3% to 34.1%) in the popular vote. Post-election pundits assumed that voters wanted "a return to normalcy," as Harding put it. Peace and prosperity – no more foreign wars. In other words, Democrat Woodrow Wilson's international pipe dreams were about as moribund as the man himself (he had suffered a stroke in the fall of 1919), and the taint carried over to James Cox.

17,245,150 men (67% of those eligible) voted, while 9,457,033 women (only 35.1% of those eligible) exercised their newfound franchise. The poor female turnout was attributed to a number of factors, one being that women were new to the game and it would take then time to come around. Of course, not all women were in favor of female suffrage, so it was assumed that they sat this one out. Surprisingly, a number of women stayed away because of their age. It has never been polite to ask a woman to reveal her age, but the county registrar of voters is no gentleman.

Harding got the bulk of the suffragette vote. Until the end of his administration, Woodrow Wilson and the Democrats had not been overly enthusiastic about women voting (probably because of the overlap between the suffragette movement and the women's temperance movement) while Harding and the Republicans had been more upbeat about it. Strange as it may seem today, however, another dynamic was at work: Warren Harding was a sexy beast! Move over, JFK; step aside, Bill Clinton! Warren Harding just might have been the biggest horndog daddy to ever occupy the White House!

Pictures of the mature Harding (he turned 55 on election day) provide no clues as to his appeal. It is hard to see him as a heartthrob, yet he had multiple mistresses and fathered at least one and likely two children out of wedlock. In his younger days, he said, "It's a good thing I'm not a woman. I would always be pregnant. I can't say no." I guess you had to be there.

The few pictures available of Harding as a young man portray him as a much more dapper character. Perhaps even in his maturity he had some sort of Svengali-like hold on distaff voters. Of course, there was no television in 1920 but he was visible in newsreels shown in movie theaters across the country. Silent movies might seem like an unlikely medium for conveying animal magnetism, but about the time Harding was inaugurated women were swooning over Rudolph Valentino.

When Harding died after just two and half years in office, taciturn Vice-President Calvin Coolidge took over. A sexy beast he was not. Famously, in 1933 when writer Dorothy Parker heard Coolidge had died, she wondered, “How can they tell?”

Typically, the Presidential election does not offer candidates with sex appeal. The rise of television, however, made the exceptions stand out. The first TV President was Harry Truman, who ran against Thomas Dewey in 1948. Neither was likely to inspire femme hearts to go pitter-pat. Then we had Dwight Eisenhower vs. Adlai Stevenson twice (1952 and 1956), an old soldier vs. an old egghead.

By 1960 television had penetrated even the most remote corners of the republic. That was the year the Democrats nominated John F. Kennedy to run against Richard Nixon. Kennedy was far more telegenic than Nixon. As was often remarked by politic pundits, there was a split in the ranks as to who won the Nixon-Kennedy debates. Among radio listeners, Nixon was the winner; among TV watchers, it was Kennedy. On the radio, they were just a couple of Irish politicians. But on TV Kennedy was a Celtic Prince Charming, while Nixon looked like a constipated pallbearer.

Of course, that shouldn’t have made any difference when it came time to cast a ballot. But to the young woman voters, Kennedy was a dreamboat, Nixon was a barge. Kennedy whetted the interest of female voters while wetting their panties. Indeed, after Kennedy’s death, his priapic extracurricular activities became part of his legend. Camelot described his administration; came a lot described his sex life. Significantly, he was the youngest man (43) ever elected President.

After Kennedy, it was a long dry spell: Barry Goldwater vs. Lyndon Johnson (1964), Nixon vs. Hubert Humphrey (1968), Nixon vs. George McGovern (1972), Gerald Ford vs. Jimmy Carter (1976), Ronald Reagan vs. Jimmy Carter (1980), Reagan vs. Walter Mondale (1984), and George H.W Bush vs. Michael Dukakis (1988). None of these candidates had sex appeal; in fact, it was debatable if they still had sex lives. In some cases, if not for the presence of offspring, any kind of prior sex life might have been in question.

Over the decades, as the candidates came and went, women were catching up to men. By the 1970s eligible male and female voters were voting at about the same rate. Appealing to the female sex was a must even in the absence of sex appeal.

Then along came Bill Clinton in 1992. Running against two old men, George H.W. Bush and Ross Perot, he made it into the White House with a majority of electoral votes while garnering just 43% of the popular vote. When he took office, he was 46 years old – middle-aged by human years but young for a President (in fact, he was only 32 when he moved into the Governor’s Mansion in Little Rock, Arkansas). Like Kennedy, he had a full head of hair, which never hurts.

A famous photo from 1963 shows a young Bill Clinton (then 16) shaking hands with his idol, John F. Kennedy, in the White House Rose Garden. Did some sort of hot mama mojo transfusion take place at that moment? If so, it probably wasn’t necessary. Growing up in Hot Springs, Arkansas, known for gamblers and gangsters, Clinton was probably no stranger to worldly pleasures.

As it turned out, Clinton's sex life was as active as his idol's, though JFK certainly got classier women. Unfortunately, by the time Clinton was running for President, it was no longer possible to keep "bimbo eruptions" out of the media. Given who he was married to, Clinton's sexual adventures might be understandable. In fact, he might have garnered some pity votes from men.

When Clinton left office, it was back to the bores. George W. Bush v. Gore (2000), then Bush v. John Kerry (2004). Then in 2008 it was John McCain, who was 72 and looked older vs. Barack Obama, who was 47 and looked younger.

It's hard to speculate on why Obama struck a chord with female voters in 2008. He was a relative unknown who had risen quickly not on the basis of achievement (when nominated, he hadn't even completed one term as the Illinois junior senator) but largely on charisma. I actually knew a young woman who took a day off work and used precious air miles to fly out of town for the day just to see him deliver a speech.

So we might say that to score with young female voters, a man must be young, by Presidential standards. 35 is the minimum age but no one under 42 has ever occupied the Oval Office (VP Teddy Roosevelt was that age when he took over for the assassinated William McKinley in 1901). With more and more women entering the fray, it would be intriguing if a bona fide babe got a nomination one day. The minimum age requirement would work against female sex appeal, but a well-preserved supermodel might arouse the attention of male voters.

Whatever age he is, a candidate must always look younger than he is. In short, he must look like a guy who gets laid a lot, even while parading the family around for photo ops. JFK and Clinton looked as though they got laid a lot – and they did. There are a lot of stories out there about Obama getting laid a lot but not by women…though I don't want to go down that rabbit hole in this article.

Sadly, while it helps to look like a player, a candidate cannot openly behave like one. Remember that woman I mentioned a few paragraphs ago…the one who used up air miles just to see Obama in person? Before that, she had been an ardent supporter of John Edwards, who was something of a rising star in the Democratic party (he had been John Kerry's running mate in 2004). Then it was revealed that he was having an affair and had fathered a child while his wife was battling cancer. I'm sure his stand on the issues was not affected by any of the contortions of his personal life, but the point was moot, as women voters hurled themselves off his bandwagon. According to Wikipedia, he is back where he started: chasing ambulances in North Carolina.

One might think that marriage vows would be a hindrance to a man running for public office, but just the opposite is true. Even today, with plummeting marriage rates and the rise of single adults, a bachelor just isn't acceptable in high office. If a candidate isn't married by age 35, he's wasting his time seeking high office. As they do with other men of that age, women would look at such a man and wonder what his flaw was. You know the litany…he can't commit…he's irresponsible…he's selfish…in fact, deep down he might be a misogynist. And there's always the old fallback, he's gay…not that there's anything wrong with that and not that I have anything against gays and some of my best friends are gay and I have a second cousin who's gay and I would never let that affect my vote. I just don't like his stand on the issues.

Today there are more eligible women voters than men and they aren't staying home any longer. It is possible to win an election without getting a majority of the female vote, but impossible if their vote totals sink below a certain percentage. Consequently, women's issues play a key role in every election. Men's issues do not matter because men's votes are not needed to win an election. Still, it's hard to say, since neither side talks about men's issues, probably because the female voters who would be scared away would outnumber the male voters who joined up.

So in the year 2020, with two geezers running for the highest office in the land, let us ponder what the 19th Amendment hath wrought. Has extending the franchise to women given us a better caliber of candidate? Has it given us a better caliber of officeholder? Is our political discourse on a higher level? I'm no scholar regarding pre-1920 elections, but I can't answer any of the above questions in the affirmative. (We might ask the same questions of the 26th Amendment which gave the vote to 18-year-olds.)

Having reservations about democracy, however, is almost as dangerous as bad-mouthing social security. If you're serious about running for public office, forget about it. For the most part "our democracy" is motivated by two types of voters. The idealist votes for what he thinks is best for the country; the pragmatist votes in his own self-interest (after all, by definition, nobody else can do it for him). Then there are the fusion voters who believe that one's self-interest dovetails with the country's best interests. Did I say fusion? Pardon me, I meant delusion.

Speaking of delusion, that brings us back to the women voters. To be sure, some vote for what they perceive to be the best interests of the country, while others vote their self-interest. Then there are other women whose motivations are simply to follow the herd, as they do in so many other pursuits – take fashion, for example.

While knocking around a local shopping mall the other day, I came to a clothing store that had an enormous window display of mannequins – must have been at least two dozen of them – wearing those jeans with pre-cut holes in them (apparently, they're called ripped or distressed jeans). For reasons that I cannot fathom, these items of apparel have become inexplicably popular among women, even those old enough to know better. They are also available in men's jeans but I don't think I've seen more than two or three men wearing them.

Hard to believe, but clothing that a ragpicker would have passed over during the Depression has now become all the rage among fashionistas (but what do I know…by now they may already be on the way out). Why in my day, ripped jeans were no big deal, just part of the natural evolution of new jeans. When they got ripped, usually at the knee, you cut them off and then you had shorts (and women with outstanding legs had short-shorts).

So I was chuckling to myself as I pondered the flock of mannequins in the store window.

There it was, proof positive that you could sell women anything so long as it was acceptable to the herd.

And then I was no longer amused. If you can sell women marked-up rags and call it fashion, there's no telling what sort of seriously flawed political candidate could be deemed fashionable given the right promotion.

The realization that the millions of women who bought ripped jeans were also eligible to vote was a sobering thought…almost enough to make me rend my garment in despair.

Sexual Dimorphism Vs. Monomorphism in Humans

October 27, 2020 | by Greta Aurora | Link | Original Link

Studying Sex Differences

When studying sex differences in animals, biologists divide species into two categories: sexually monomorphic and sexually dimorphic. In monomorphic species, males and females can be difficult to tell apart. In dimorphic animals, on the other hand, the sexes differ considerably in terms of size, colour or other physical characteristics. It's possible to infer a lot of information about the mating behaviour of a species by determining whether it's sexually monomorphic or dimorphic.

Most animals fit clearly into one of these two categories – but humans do not. We possess both monomorphic and dimorphic features. But before I talk more about humans, let's take a closer look at the characteristics of monomorphic and dimorphic species.

Sexual Monomorphism

Sexually monomorphic species

When males and females are roughly the same size, it is safe to assume males don't routinely fight each other to gain access to females. If males actively competed each other physically, a larger size would be an advantage, so they would've evolved to be bigger than the females.

Monomorphic animals are generally monogamous and display long-term pair-bonding. If neither sex is much more colourful than the other, then sexual selection based on physical traits probably doesn't play a huge role in their mating. Behavioural traits are a lot more important, and females prefer to mate with males who have proven they are willing to share parenting responsibilities.

Females expect to be courted by delaying mating, in order to assess potential mate's dedication and paternal instincts. Female birds often act helpless to see how the male reacts.

Twin births are common in monomorphic animals, because the two parents can work together to look after more than one offspring at a time. Also, due to monogamous pair bonds, the majority of males get a chance to reproduce. But females do sometimes abandon their long-term mate and form a bond with another.

Some examples of sexually monomorphic species are wolves, gibbons, beavers, swans, penguins and bald eagles.

Sexual Dimorphism

Sexually dimorphic species

In dimorphic species, two sexes vary physically quite significantly. In many mammals, males are bigger than the females. In some spiders, on the other hand, females are a lot larger than the males. In a lot of birds, males are much more colourful and sing to attract females.

In some species, males have not only evolved to be noticeably larger and stronger than females, but they may also have unique body parts meant to be used as weapons when they fight each other for dominance. These males are also a lot more aggressive than their female counterparts, due to their higher testosterone levels. That’s why these animals are often referred to as tournament species.

In dimorphic species, females are attracted to physical signs of male health and strength. The largest male in the group is often the most desirable partner, because he is able to provide physical protection. These dominant males usually have a number of sexual partners, but they abandon their mates and offspring. Therefore, females tend to be the only parent looking after their young, and therefore they rarely give birth to twins.

Because a minority of dominant males has access to a majority of females, physically weaker males don’t get to reproduce. Wherever polygamy is practiced, there’s going to be a lot of incels.

In these species, the life spans of males and females tend to differ significantly, too, with females living longer than males.

Humans may seem monomorphic in some ways and dimorphic in other ways. Of course, in most cases, it's easy to tell men and women apart. But we don't look as different from one another as, for instance, male and female deer, lions or peacocks do.

Although the average man is larger than the average woman, the difference in size is not as significant as in many dimorphic species. The most noteworthy physical sex difference in humans is in upper body strength: the average man has 75% more arm muscle mass than the average woman. The overlap between male and female distributions of upper body strength is less than 10%. This has some crucial implications in everyday life, especially with regards to physically demanding professions.

Men also tend to have higher bone density, which makes them less vulnerable to injury. This difference may not matter much at an everyday setting, but it could be a matter of life and death in the battlefield.

Muscle mass and bone density are largely influenced by testosterone. This hormone also has a significant effect on behaviour, and men clearly have a lot more of it than women do. This fact alone could possibly tilt the scale towards dimorphism in humans, but it's not quite that simple.

It is true that the average man is more aggressive than the average woman, and testosterone is to blame for this. However, some women are actually more aggressive than the average man, despite having nowhere near the same testosterone levels. It has been established that more testosterone doesn't make a woman more aggressive. In fact, it's not clear what causes aggression in women. There are a few theories, centred mostly on brain function. One of the most likely candidates is the amygdala, but no one knows for sure.

This example illustrates that biological differences don't necessarily make a species dimorphic, because biology doesn't always translate clearly into behaviour.

Let's examine some personality traits to see if we can identify any obvious differences in behaviour! Looking at the Big Five personality traits is a good starting point. These are openness to experience, conscientiousness, extraversion, agreeableness and neuroticism.

The Big Five personality traits

Numerous psychologists have replicated the same results when studying gender differences in these five traits. No one has found any significant differences in conscientiousness. In openness, some differences arise only if we break this trait down into several constituent parts. For example, women tend to score higher on their appreciation for aesthetic experiences, while men are more drawn to intellectual experiences. But the sexes don't differ in their overall levels of openness.

Women tend to score slightly higher on extraversion than men do, but again, this is not a very pronounced difference. Women also score higher on neuroticism, which is the amount of negative emotions experienced. This probably results from women spending all their time with their infants after giving birth. In order to protect a tiny, very vulnerable baby from harm, women have to be incredibly cautious and protective. That's why women generally worry more than men do. To paraphrase Jordan Peterson, the feminine unit is not woman by herself, but woman and child. The female nervous system is that of a mother.

The most significant personality difference between the sexes is in agreeableness. But even here, there is a great overlap, and the differences only become evident at the extremes of the curve. What we see here is that the most agreeable people are likely to be women, and the most disagreeable people are likely to be men. Combined with high testosterone levels, this is the reason most violent criminals are male. But the majority of men and women don't diverge very much in terms of agreeableness.

FIGURE 10 | Overlapping distributions of Agreeableness for men and women. Vertical axis indicates density, or the proportion of the sample in a given area under the curve.

Distributions of agreeableness in the sexes

Those who are following my work will know that I'm fascinated by evolutionary psychology. But the more research we read from this field, the more we're going to find ourselves focusing on the differences between the sexes, especially with regards to mating. Evolutionary psychologists tend to think in terms of extremes: they represent men as highly aggressive and competitive in their pursuit of professional and reproductive success, and desiring not much more than youth and beauty in a woman. And they represent women as desperate to secure a successful partner, despite knowing he won't be faithful. In this hugely simplified world, men and women both want one thing, albeit a different one: men only want sex, and women only want a family.

Although evolutionary psychologists like David M. Buss, Geoffrey Miller and Robert Wright have made significant contributions to our understanding of human nature, they often fail to look at the larger picture. They tend to apply the male competition – female choice model to human mating, which is generally true for sexually dimorphic species. But human mating actually resembles that of monomorphic animals is various ways.

Human males have traditionally been involved in parenting, and they are therefore a lot more selective about their long-term mates than the males of dimorphic species. That's why women make such a great effort to look desirable.

Also, women tend to choose their partner more on the basis of their personality, as well as their ability to provide resources and their inclination to commit long-term. Women still carry the heavier reproductive burden, but they are not necessarily choosier than men are – they just take different considerations into account.

Proponents of sexual dimorphism in humans will point out that women generally live longer than men, and polygamy has been common throughout our history. It is true that men have traditionally died younger, but that used to be mostly due to fighting in wars and working in dangerous environments, such as mines. The life expectancy gap has been consistently narrowing. For example, in the UK between 1991 and 2014, it shrunk from 3.8 to 2.4 years.

As far as polygamy is concerned, it's true that it had been permitted through most of history, in many different cultures. There were times when it was necessary, exactly because so many men had died in war. But, for the most part, monogamous relationships are the norm, even in societies that allow polygamy.

It's important to note that our species is highly adaptable to extreme conditions. For instance, if needed, we can survive on an exclusively carnivorous or herbivorous diet for a long time. Thanks to our creativity, we can survive in a desert, as well as in Antarctica. Therefore, we have every reason to believe that our mating strategies are not carved in stone, either.

We don't have to commit ourselves to being just one thing. We must accept that we have some monomorphic and some dimorphic characteristics, and we can express these in various combinations, depending on the challenges we face.

As neuroscientist Robert Sapolsky said,

> "We are not a classic pair-bonded species. We are not a polygamous, tournament species either… What we are, officially, is a tragically confused species."

We are not necessarily confused, though… We have a lot of potential, and we are the masters and mistresses of adaptation.

The British political party Justice for Men & Boys (J4MB) has a playlist on its YouTube channel, which before the conference will contain only the launch video created by the party's Technical Director, Tom Caulfield. His other promotional videos for the event are here. We would urge you to share them on social media platforms to raise awareness of the conference.

If you subscribe to the YouTube channel – click on both the "Subscribe" and "Notification" buttons – you'll receive an email when each video is published. The J4MB channel also has playlists of the videos of the presentations at all the previous men's issues conferences – here.

Speakers

A list of 113 confirmed speakers and their talk titles, created on 3 November, is here. It will be updated occasionally before the conference. Our target is 120 speakers, so feel free to offer to be a speaker, maybe by way of a Zoom interview.

Paul Elam will be the keynote speaker. His talk title is, "My 2020 vision for the Men's Rights Movement".

Professor Janice Fiamengo's talk will be the final one published, on International Men's Day. Her talk title is, "We Must Stop Anti-Male Indoctrination of Boys".

The speakers at this conference fall into a number of categories which are listed separately in the order below. They are sorted within each list in surname alphabetical order.

1. Guests of Honour
2. Academics
3. Comedians
4. Other speakers

GUESTS OF HONOUR

Rowland Adelagun (ManWomanMyth) "Feminism is the Pursuit of Female Supremacy / On White Sprinters & Female CEOs / Bring Back Our Girls / Introduction to the Female Paedophile", interview with Mike Buchanan

No video maker has done more to educate people around the world about gender matters and feminism than the British vlogger Rowland Adelagun, "ManWomanMyth". The man remains a legend in the Men's Rights Movement.

One day in the summer of 2015 his two YouTube channels – on which he had posted videos for many years – were taken down, and Rowland couldn't be contacted. His disappearance was a complete mystery. Even the late Angry Harry, who Rowland had interviewed many times, didn't know what had happened to him.

Fortunately a number of people had downloaded the files from YouTube – including William Collins, an important British blogger and author of The Empathy Gap: Male Disadvantages and the Mechanisms of Their Neglect (2019) – which explains why there are 128 of Rowland's videos in a dedicated playlist on YouTube.

Many in the Men's Rights Movement came to believe Rowland must have died. No other potential explanations seemed to make sense. But one day in January 2019, Mike Buchanan, leader of the British political party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them), received an email from him, in which Rowland had written simply, "Do we know each other?"

It emerged he'd fallen from a considerable height in 2015, which left him in a wheelchair for over three years. He can still only walk with the greatest difficulty, and has to lean on a helper, but more importantly he suffered a major brain injury which wiped out his memory of anything before the fall, and his short term memory remains poor to this day.

Rowland's new YouTube channel is here. He is much enjoying the exchanges he's having with supporters in the comments streams. He derives a lot of comfort from being reminded daily that his work has been highly influential for so many people over many years.

Rowland, on behalf of the global Men's Rights Movement, we salute you.

Brother K "Infant Circumcision: The Cruelty in the Cradle"

Brother K was born in Miami in 1947 and grew up in New Orleans. He studied journalism at the University of Illinois, where he earned his degree in 1969. He protested against circumcision at the California State Capital in 1980, a protest that the Associated Press and other media reported locally and across the nation. In 1986 he changed his name to Brother K in California Superior Court, an act of protest against his circumcision at birth. He founded Bloodstained Men in 2012 and has protested in cities across the United States. His work has been featured in Brother K: The Uncut Truth and on Tosh.0.

Dr Warren Farrell “Abortion: Women’s ABC Rights. How Feminism is Undermining Women, Men and the Next Generation. MGM.” “Why Knowing How to Explain the Boy Crisis will Help us Empathize with Men.” Two interviews with Elizabeth Hobson and Mike Buchanan.

Warren presented the keynote speech at the first International Conference on Men’s Issues, hosted by Paul Elam near Detroit in 2014.

Warren has been chosen by The Financial Times as one of the world’s top 100 thought leaders. His books are published in over 50 countries, and in 19 languages. They include The New York Times best-seller, Why Men Are the Way They Are, plus the international bestseller, The Myth of Male Power. His most recent is The Boy Crisis (2018, co-authored with John Gray).

Warren chairs the Coalition to Create a White House Council on Boys and Men and has been asked by the White House to do a first draft of a potential presentation for President Trump for Father’s Day 2020 on the importance of dads in preventing the boy crisis.

As the only man ever elected three times to the Board of the National Organization for Women in New York City, and also called by GQ magazine “The Martin Luther King of the men’s movement,” he advocates for gender liberation – freeing both sexes from the rigid roles of their past. He has appeared on over 1,000 TV shows and been interviewed by Oprah, Barbara Walters, Peter Jennings, Katie Couric, Larry King, and Charlie Rose.

He has frequently written for and been featured in The New York Times and publications worldwide.

Warren has two daughters, and lives with his wife in Mill Valley, California, and virtually at www.warrenfarrell.com.

Warren spoke at the following event:

2014, Detroit Keynote speech (introduction by Paul Elam)

Mallory Millett Interview with Elizabeth Hobson, Belinda Brown, and Mike Buchanan

Mallory was the sister of the late Kate Millett, the radical feminist authoress of the highly influential Sexual Politics (1970). Ann Coulter calls Mallory "the single most important commentator on feminism in America." Her articles and interviews can be accessed at her website.

In the 1970's Mallory was deeply involved in Communist activism with Kate and witnessed, first-hand, the founding of the second wave of radical feminism which created NOW, The National Organization of Women, before she bolted to The Right and voted for Ronald Reagan.

Mallory has published nine feature articles, plus a feature in the New York Post titled Mental Health Madness (September 2014). Perhaps her most well-known article, Marxist Feminism's Ruined Lives, was called by Dr. Patrick Fagan, Director of the Institute of Marriage and Family at Catholic University of America, "the single most important reportage of the 20th century." In 2016, the Human Life Alliance reprinted the piece as a brochure and distributed one million copies to colleges and universities throughout America. Mark Tapson's interview with Mallory, My Sister Kate: The Destructive Feminist Legacy of Kate Millett, published by FrontPageMag in 2018, was reprinted in Eagle Forum Magazine (January 2019) and received the highest volume of responses in its history.

She has served as Director of the David Horowitz Freedom Center for over 27 years, and is the longest sitting Director in The Freedom Center's history. She sits on the Board of Regents for the Center for Security Policy and she is the Chief Financial Officer for a number of corporations.

Mallory has addressed many audiences including the Israeli Embassy in New York City, and the New York All-State Conference for Life in 2017. She presented the keynote speech for Phyllis Schlafly's Eagle Forum Annual Conference, in 2019, the keynote speech for Hosea Initiative's "Life Is Beautiful" 2019 Award Gala, presenting their Annual Award to President Donald Trump.

Erin Pizzey “50 Years On And No Further On For Men and Boys” Interview with Elizabeth Hobson and William Collins

In 1971, Erin founded the first battered women’s shelter in the world, in Chiswick, London. She had no idea what would be coming her way for her troubles, including death threats, bomb threats, and multiple incidents of stalking. In her book Prone to Violence (1982) she showed how misguided we are in dealing with Intimate Partner Violence (IPV). She has been refuting lies about IPV for almost 50 years.

Erin spoke at the following events:

2016, London Intergenerational Family Violence v. The Big Lie (keynote)

ACADEMICS

Professor Eric Anderson “Adding Brain Trauma to the Men’s Human Rights Agenda”

Eric is a leading academic authority on masculinities, sexualities, and sport. He has authored 20 books and 75 articles and leads a group of scholars vested in empirical research on males. He recently published the first, non-feminist, academic textbook on gender, Men and Masculinities (2019). Much of his research has focused on changing masculinity behaviours, including the bromance. In the last few years, however, he has turned his attention to saving male brains and lives through highlighting how males are compelled to play brain-damaging school-sports and consequently suffer higher rates of neurodegenerative conditions.

International Conferences on Men's Issues

2018, London – A Non-Feminist Approach to Masculinities

Dr John Barry "We tell men to talk… but is anyone really listening?"

John is a chartered psychologist and co-founder of the UK-based Male Psychology Network and co-editor of the very successful Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology and Mental Health. His new book Perspectives in Male Psychology, co-authored with Louise Liddon, will be published by Wiley around the end of 2020.

Professor Gerard Casey "Rape: A Presumption of Guilt"

Gerard was the author of After #MeToo: Feminism, Patriarchy, Toxic Masculinity and Sundry Cultural Delights (2020). He is Professor emeritus in the School of Philosophy at University College Dublin, Associated Scholar at the Ludwig von Mises Institute (Auburn, Alabama, USA) and Fellow of Mises UK. He was Head of School at UCD from 2000 to 2006. He previously taught at the University of Notre Dame (1980-1981) and at the School of Philosophy in The Catholic University of America (Washington, D.C. (1983-1986).

He serves on the editorial boards of several journals and he has been a member of the Royal Institute of Philosophy; the Association for Political Theory; the American Philosophical Association, The Independent Institute and The Aristotelian Society.

His primary degree in philosophy was taken at University College Cork. This was followed by a Masters and PhD from the University of Notre Dame and the higher doctorate, the DLitt, from the National University of Ireland. His interest in law was marked by the award of the LLB from the University of London and the LLM from University College Dublin.

His research interests include Political Philosophy, with a focus on Libertarianism and Philosophical Anarchism. In this area, he has published a monograph on the doyen of libertarianism, Murray Rothbard, an introduction to libertarianism, Libertarian Anarchy, and a history of political thought from the perspective of liberty, Freedom's Progress?. He is also interested in contemporary social movments, and in this area he has published a short study of free speech and tolerance (ZAP) and a critique of Feminism and its ideological allies, entitled After #MeToo.

Dr Kevin Donnelly "How Schools Are Destroying Virtuous Masculinity"

Kevin is an AM Senior Research Fellow at the Australian Catholic University.

Since first warning about the dangers of political correctness during the early 1990s, he has established a reputation as one of Australia's leading conservative commentators and authors fighting against the cultural-left ideology and groupthink that is poisoning society and stifling free and open debate. He is especially concerned about the way radical feminists are indoctrinating school students with the belief that Western society is misogynist and patriarchal and that all men are violent and sexist.

Political correctness denies the ability to reason and be impartial as knowledge, supposedly, is a social construct and all relationships are based on privilege and power. In opposition, Kevin champions the strengths and benefits of Western civilisation, the Enlightenment and our Judeo-Christian heritage that underpin our political and legal systems and way of life and that are being undermined by a rainbow alliance of neo-Marxist, postmodern theories. He was a secondary school teacher for 18 years and in 2014 he co-chaired the review of the Australian National Curriculum. In 2016 he was made a Member of the Order of Australia for services to education.

Kevin writes for the UK-based website The Conservative Woman and Sydney's Daily Telegraph and appears regularly on Sky News. His most recent book is titled A Politically Correct Dictionary and Guide (available at kevindonnelly.com.au).

Professor Janice Fiamengo "We Must Stop Anti-Male Indoctrination of Boys"

Janice is a writer and the creator of the Fiamengo File YouTube series at Studio Brulé. She is a retired professor of English, and advocate for men's issues, free speech, and western culture. She taught literature for 20 years, latterly at the University of Ottawa, and is the author of The Woman's Page (2007), a study of early Canadian female journalists. She has also published online articles criticizing feminism and political correctness in magazines such as PJ Media and FrontPage Magazine. She lives in New Westminster, British Columbia, with her husband, poet and songwriter David Solway.

Janice is a participant in the weekly video series Regarding Men with Paul Elam and Tom Golden, also speakers at this event.

She was the third guest on the Justice for Men & Boys Gender Matters video series. The playlist of the series is here.

Janice spoke at the following events:

International Conferences on Men's Issues

2016, London – How Feminism is Destroying Higher Education
2018, London – The Demonization of Young Men: Campus Sexual Misconduct Tribunals
2019, Chicago – Why We Need Male-Positive Histories (keynote)

Professor Nicola Graham-Kevan "The Impact of Adversity and Trauma on Males"

Nicola's work in relation to domestic abuse is well-known to many in the Men's Rights Movement. She is the Professor of Criminal Justice Psychology at the University of Central Lancashire, her profile page is here. The start of her profile:

"Nicola is an active researcher in the field of criminal justice and wellbeing and is a member of the Quality of Life Research Group. She is UCLan's lead for Aggression Research within the Criminal Justice Partnership. Nicola has led a number of externally funded research projects and evaluations. She is internationally recognised as an expert on domestic violence and coercive control and is frequently asked to deliver presentations and training nationally and internationally.

Her research interests include the impact of psychological trauma, violence perpetration and victimisation, behaviour change programmes, sexual offending, emotion dysregulation, and adverse childhood experiences."

Nicola was the keynote speaker at the following event:

Domestic Violence is a Men's Issue, Too (National Conference on Men's Issues, 2020)

Coercive Control and Domestic Violence

Professor Dennis Hayes "Education is Worthless Without Freedom of Speech"

Dennis is Professor of Education at the University of Derby and the Director of the influential campaign group Academics For Academic Freedom (AFAF). AFAF is the leading body in the UK defending academic freedom. He is also on the Advisory Board of the Free Speech Union, launched on 26 February 2020.

In 2009 he edited and contributed to a special edition of the British Journal of Educational Studies on Academic Freedom and he writes regularly in the national and international press on free speech and academic freedom. His latest book The Death of Academic Freedom: Free speech and censorship on campus will be published by Routledge in 2020.

Jeffrey is a professor of logic at the University of Warsaw. He has published in mathematical logic & philosophy of mathematics. He is a specialist in axiomatic theories of truth. Before moving to Poland in 2019, he worked at LSE and the Universities of Nottingham, Leeds, Cambridge, Edinburgh, Munich and Oxford.

He gave a talk at ICMI18 and an interview with Honey Badgers Radio, about being domestically abused, sexually assaulted, threatened, harassed & stalked for over two years and falsely accused by a woman he'd known for several years, a woman who followed him to Oxford in 2012, and who tragically committed suicide in Oxford in 2013 when her boyfriend ended their relationship. He was defamed as a "murderer", harassed & witch hunted by militant feminists, who organized a public campaign of false accusations against him and drove him out of his home and job. He was vindicated and reinstated, as reported in The Sunday Times in August 2014. He was then blacklisted and forced out in retaliation.

Articles vilifying him were published in national newspapers in February 2014. Prof Brian Leiter's blog published in March 2014 was a statement about his being smeared, witch hunted and terminated. His reinstatement was published in The Sunday Times in August 2014. He has written accounts in Prof Janice Fiamengo's Sons of Feminism and "Feminist witch hunts in academic philosophy", in The Agonist journal. He has given an interview about domestic violence with the From the Darkness podcast. Links:

Yoav Levin "The Cathar – Manichean Ontology of Gynocentric Supremacism and Feminist Misandry”

Yoav is a long-standing MRA. He is the chairmen of the Israeli Lobby for Men and Boys as well as a member of a director board of two Israeli fathers’ NGO where he manages the research and information department campaigning for the rights of men and boys in the country. Except for his activity in the lobby and the NGOs, Yoav focuses mainly on the academic field and is currently researching feminism, gynocentrism, and misandry as well as female sexual and domestic violence against men. Yoav is also an active lecturer in the field of gender studies for men focusing on critical research of feminism as well as misandry and gynocentrism and has studies group in Israel.

Based on Gnostic Maneachean heritage, Bogomil dualists in the Balkans were intent on spreading their heretical, misandrist and extremely gynocentric teachings world-wide, and this period saw increased contacts with the West including Italy, France, and Germany. The spread of Bogomilism to Aquitaine was thus both likely and possible and appears to have had great success as it created the ideals of courtly love, the phenomenon of the Troubadours, the tenets of modern classic Gynocentrism spread by Troubadours under the royal protection of Queen Eleanor and subsequently modern-day feminism and its misandry.

Dr Rebecca Owens Interview with Elizabeth Hobson and Mike Buchanan

Rebecca (“Becci”) is a lecturer in Psychology at the University of Sunderland, a Senior Fellow of the Higher Education Academy, and a Chartered member of the BPS. She has worked at Sunderland for over ten years, during her PhD as an academic tutor, and gaining a permanent contract on completion of her PhD in 2016.

Her PhD examined competitiveness in men, taking an evolutionary perspective on sex differences in physiology, endocrinology, and how these impact on male psychology. This led to an interest in sex differences generally, with a focus on male psychology specifically.

Becci is interested in distortions in the perceptions of men and women, such as the Gamma bias; the impact of gender roles on mental health and wellbeing, and sex differences in the response to trauma and psychological distress. Other research areas Becci is interested in, separately and in conjunction with male psychology, is body modifications, and mating strategies, sex and relationships.

Dr Tania Reynolds "Gender Bias in the Moral Typecasting of Parental Violence"

Tania received her PhD in Social Psychology at Florida State University. After, she worked as a postdoctoral researcher at the Kinsey Institute, Indiana University. She is an Assistant Professor in the Department of Psychology at the University of New Mexico, her web page is here.

Her research applies an evolutionary lens to examine social behavior and cognition. Her work examines how people compete to attract and retain social and romantic partners, and how these pressures may differ among men and women. Specifically, she has investigated how pressure to attract romantic partners contributes to women's competitive gossip and body dissatisfaction. Her work has examined how men's involvement in ancestral warfare contributes to male anti-gay bias. That is, men may be using one another's sexual orientation as a proxy for the traits advantageous in physical combat.

In work funded by the NSF, Dr. Reynolds examined how women's reproductive hormones (e.g., progesterone) correspond to their social anxiety. This link may suggest the hormone progesterone promotes interpersonal vigilance to prepare socially for the demands of pregnancy. Her work also examines how gender stereotypes of men as perpetrators and women as victims undermine concern for male suffering.

Martin Seager “What is Gamma Bias Theory, and How Could it Help us Understand and Respond to Male Suicide?” Interview with Elizabeth Hobson

Martin is a consultant clinical psychologist and adult psychotherapist, most recently with the addictions charity, CGL (2016-2020). He is a clinician, lecturer, campaigner and author on mental health issues. He studied at Oxford University, Edinburgh University and the Tavistock Clinic.

He worked in the NHS for over 30 years and was head of psychological services in two large mental health Trusts. He had a regular mental health slot on BBC Essex radio from 2003-2007 and BBC Radio Five Live “Up All Night” from 2007-2009. In 2006 he formed a national mental health advisory group for the health secretary at the time, Patricia Hewitt.

In 2010-2011 he worked in the homelessness field with the charity St Mungo’s and also the “Big Issue”. He spent over 10 years as a branch consultant to the Central London Samaritans and was a member of the mental health advisory board for the College of Medicine.

He is now on the clinical advisory board of the Campaign for Living Miserably (CALM). His passion is to promote a psychologically-minded approach to science, public health and human well-being, moving away from treating mental conditions to meeting the psychological needs of the human condition.

He is a specialist on male gender psychology and co-founder of both the Male Psychology Network and the Male Psychology Section of the BPS. He is co-editor of the Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology and Mental Health (2019) which includes a chapter on Gamma Bias theory, which he developed with Dr John Barry.

Dr Seb Zein “Feminism in STEM: Hiring, Bullying, and Bad Evidence from Professional Scientists”

Seb is an American with a PhD in physics. His YouTube channel is Galileo’s Telescope. It covers a broad range of subjects, while being generally concentrated on physics, general science, and pointing out bad scientific and academic practices.

Over the 15 years he spent in academia, he saw numerous feminist professors who were more interested in ensuring students became good feminists, rather than good scientists. He regularly witnessed these highly motivated professors and/or their allies making policy changes and giving talks that would go unquestioned by other scientists, despite breaking every fundamental rule of proper science and data analysis. He created the YouTube series The Little Pink Book, focusing on how feminist groups manipulate data, general dishonest feminist research practices in academia and elsewhere, and how and where these pernicious feminist practices have made their way into policy.

COMEDIANS

Alex Crosbie "World to End: Women Most Affected"

Alex Crosbie is a Glaswegian with a wecam and an opinion. He runs the YouTube channel 6oodfella.

Nicholas De Santo

Nicholas De Santo is a talented Italian-born international comedian based in London. He says he has lived in countries where feminism is fighting imaginary enemies. Nicholas was a New Act of the Year (NATYS) finalist in 2019. He spends his free time studying flags and playing with his little daughter.

Videos of his work can be found here.

Tristan Lonley "THE MACHIAVELLIAN GIRL or: Why Women Don't Quote Nietzsche While Making Love"

Using the protagonist's name of his feminist-halted autobiographic movie about the loss of fathers' rights and the loss of his four-year-old daughter, award-winning pop artist Tristan (a Dutch man) has been active in the field of men's issues which ended his career after releasing his seventh album which was almost exclusively about abortion, false allegations, parental alienation and anti-feminist topics.

Withdrawn from the industry he filled an open slot about parental alienation on the 2019 Messages 4 Men conference in London, approaching the misery that befell his daughter and him with a stand-up kind of satire. It inspired Lonley to coin the term 'MRA Stand Up Comedy.'

Tristan Lonley recently started The Men's Alliance International, using the alias Fonos Andr', again a character's name from his dystopian novel 'The Matriarchy', based on the prognosis of the empowerment of women.

Lonley, at the age of 22, has experienced Beatlemania-like successes in many countries, especially in Japan where his music is being described as 'aristocratic': in Armenia there's a hotel chain named after him. However, the rise of alt left socialism meant the end of his career: Lonley concluded his career with his all anti-feminist farewell album. Tristan Lonley is the partner of Ava Brighton, who is also speaking at this event.

Mike Stephenson ("Doctor Randomercam") "The Cunning Do-Gooder Effect"

Mike Stephenson is a comedian and a guitarist. He's an all-singing, all-dancing adult light entertainer turned videographer from the weird part of the internet. His Youtube channel here has garnered more than twelve million views. One of the organizers' favourite videos of his work relates to the infamous TV interview of Dr Jordan Peterson by Cathy Newman, an intellectually-challenged feminist (but we repeat ourselves) Channel 4 "journalist" and "interviewer" – Jordan Peterson vs Cathy Newman – FIXED (video, 17:30).

Three time speaker at Messages 4 Men and four time attendee at the International Conferences on Men's Issues, Mike is a long-term regular host of Men's Rights podcast

Alexander Adams “Discimination Against Men in Art”

Alex is a British artist and writer. He studied fine art and history of art at Goldsmiths College, London. His art has been exhibited worldwide and is in the collections of the Victoria & Albert Museum (London), National Museum (Cardiff), Walker Art Gallery (Liverpool) and other museums. His art criticism has been published in The Burlington Magazine, The Art Newspaper, Sculpture Journal, The Jackdaw, The British Art Journal, Apollo, Printmaking Today, Print Quarterly and other outlets. His poetry has been published in anthologies, broadsides and single-author volumes in the UK and USA. Addy Agame Imprisoned for Flirting (interview with Elizabeth Hobson and Mike Buchanan)

Adnan Ahmed (aka Addy Agame) went from being a men’s dating coach in Scotland to championing men’s rights activism due to a prejudicial media scandal which led to corrupt legal proceedings involving false allegations and a wrongful conviction. The wrongful conviction was appealed and overturned in the High Court as no actual crime had taken place, resulting in a full acquittal, proven innocence, total vindication and a ‘not guilty’ verdict. Adnan now aims to help men in similar situations in criminal / family courts, who are fighting for justice against gynocentric social justice influenced legal systems in western societies.

Gerry Alexander “The Gender Maturity Gap”

Gerry, an Irishman, studied telecommunications when telephones lived in a box on a street corner. So keeping up with the pace of change in technology and society kept him fully occupied throughout his career in the public and private sectors. His work took him to the Balkans conflict where he met his wife, and where he has settled in his retirement.

The luxury of having more time has allowed him to pursue a fascination with the narratives of feminism, which are contrary to his own observations.

In search of answers to some of these narratives he proposes a counter-argument based on the intersection of vested interests in the consumer society, and the position women occupy there.

He will explain how female attention-seeking behaviour has moved beyond childish affectation and adult dysfunction. Even beyond the spectacle of sexualization, evolving into a strategy for gaming the complex systems, relationships and markets that converge to make up modern society. He argues that this behaviour has become a cultural phenomenon in which women enjoy the benefits of privilege. Privilege that comes at a high cost to them, and to the men who want to love them.

He discusses how attention-seeking behaviour in women has been locked into our consumer economy and our culture, in the process creating a Gender Maturity Gap.

He is a subscriber to the Regarding Men all-men weekly meetings, and credits the group with motivating him to create his talk and video.

Greta Aurora “Debunking Feminist Myths About Misogyny and Rape Culture”

Greta is a writer, poet and YouTuber. Her work focuses on celebrating the differences between men and women, and helping the sexes understand each other better.

A biologist and science communicator by education, with a passion for the arts, her approach is scientific and philosophical. Evolutionary psychology is one of her main interests.

In her first poetry collection The Dying Femme Fatale: A Poetic Exploration of Femininity in a Politically Correct World (2018) she challenged feminism and political correctness. She launched her YouTube channel in April 2020. In her videos, she explores femininity and masculinity through the lens of science and art. She also discusses controversial topics around feminism and gender equality.

Satish Babu “Men’s Rights in Politics: My Experience of Contesting as a Candidate in Elections”

Satish Babu is a software engineer based in Bangalore, India. Since 2017, he has been a prominent member of The Men’s Community Centre of Save Indian Family Foundation, in Bangalore. To promote men's issues, he contested as an independent candidate in the election for the Karnataka state legislature. Karnataka is one of the 29 states in India and Bangalore is its capital. He got the 6th highest votes among 13 candidates. This was the first time a men's rights activist stood in an election in South India.

Jon Baily "From Cambridge to Chicago, All Thanks to Feminist Violence"

Jon is a happily married man, with two children. As a marketing professional, he has worked across a number of industries and specialises in digital communications.

He gained notoriety, of sorts, by attending two talks by the British political party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) – J4MB – at Cambridge University in May, 2019, along with his 16-year-old son. Mike Buchanan, party leader, spoke on Equal Rights for Men and Women (video, 41:05), while Elizabeth Hobson, Director of Communications, spoke on The History of Feminism (video, 45:18).

The noise you can hear in the background was created by a large mob of howling male and female feminists, who tried (and generally succeeded) in intimidating people seeking to enter the lecture building to attend the lectures, and tried (but spectacularly failed) to drown out the talks with chanting (an example being "There are many, many more of us than you!") and banging on saucepans. We have referred to them since as members of the Cambridge University Noisy Twats Society.

The police refused to move the mob on, likewise the university security staff, paid for by J4MB, who limited themselves to stopping the protesters from entering the building. The police refused to attend when a J4MB supporter, Natty Raymond, chased after, apprehended and video recorded the feminist student who had thrown a milkshake at Mike and two supporters. The footage (video, 4:32) also includes the photographer of the incident, who worked for the student online website Varsity. We know the names of the two people but have declined to make them public.

Feminist students, alumni and academics had tried to have the talks cancelled, by sending an open petition to the Vice-Chancellor, full of lies and mis-representations about J4MB. J4MB have posted 40 blog pieces in relation to the day, and the events before it

It was on leaving the event that Jon and his son – who had never been in contact with J4MB before – experienced a life-changing incident, courtesy of the violent feminist protesters outside the venue. J4MB later ran a successful crowdfunder to cover Jon's flight and hotel costs in relation to attending the International Conference on Men's Issues (2019) held in Chicago.

Jon will share his and his son's experience and look at the positive outcome that was a direct result of the feminists' actions.

Jerry Barnett "Too Many Men: Why Sex Dolls Should be a Human Right"

Jerry Barnett is an author and campaigner, who runs the Sex and Censorship YouTube channel, podcast and blog. In addition to his campaigning and writing work he is a photographer, technologist, entrepreneur and parent. He belongs to a large, eccentric, multiracial London family. His book, Porn Panic, was published by Zero Books in August 2016.

He is dedicated to defending personal liberty, free speech and sexual freedom, and makes regular appearances in the media, at university debates, and as a public speaker.

Jerry has written extensively, for a variety of publications, on many political subjects including sexual politics, free speech, science (especially related to sex), identity politics and other issues. Some of his articles are below.

Phil Bass “Sex Dolls – The New Sexual Normal?”

Phil runs one of the most respected sex doll businesses in the world, The-Doll-House – as voted in 2018 at Doll Forum. The business has outlets in:

- The UK
- USA – Florida and Texas
- Mexico
- New Zealand

The business provides Silicone and Thermo-Plastic Elastomer (TPE) dolls to men and women for a variety of purposes. The dolls are usually initially a sex toy, but evolve into something much more in people’s lives, and often fill a void in people’s lives, as we become more disparate societally.

Prior to this, Phil was in the financial IT world, flying around the world to client sites, to implement Operational Risk software in major financial institutions. Five years ago he left the rat race to find himself, while exploring the MGTOW-sphere, and decided that his path to happiness was to work for himself and follow the way of the MGTOW. He has now almost forgotten what the meaning of the word “stress” is.

He finds his current work vocational, as many people tell him after their purchase that the doll has changed their lives, and they are now (sometimes for the first time) happy! He finds this the greatest bonus to his line of work.

Phil and his business are the embodiment of the MGTOW way, but this was merely a happy coincidence. Sometimes life can drop a golden egg into your hands.

He was interviewed by Mike Buchanan, a link to that video and an offer of a £100 discount on your own sex doll here. He was also interviewed by Regarding Men (Paul Elam, Professor Janice Fiamengo, Tom Golden) The Dolls That Love You Long Time.

Mike Bell "From Outrage to Engagement: Focussing Energy on Effective Campaigning"

Mike lives near Cambridge, UK. He was involved in environmental campaigning in the 1980's, worked on political policymaking in the 1990's and taught science in a secondary school in the 2000's.

He now draws on these experiences as a volunteer for two linked initiatives in the UK:

- Equi-law UK, which aims to engage with the political process to try to ensure that UK laws are developed and implemented in a gender-neutral fashion and
- The Equalogist, a monthly digest newsletter of campaigns, books, videos, events etc on men's issues.

Ava is a Dutch professional graphic designer, who wanted to be a Men’s Rights Advocate since 2014, but didn’t know where to start. She stepped into the Men’s Rights Movement with her controversial YouTube video Are Almost All Women Mentally Insane? when picked up by A Voice For Men. YouTube hastened to shadow-ban Ava’s channel to prevent the video from going viral, but continued to give a voice to the men that have none.

By the time she appeared on the 2019 Messages For Men Conference in London she had gathered a group of followers comprising of both men and women and the idea came to Ava to make a documentary about men’s issues. Where she initially wanted to focus on parental alienation, the project turned into a feature documentary when female whistle-blowers volunteered to expose the men and family destroying methods of feminist organizations.

‘A VOID’, Ava’s feature documentary, is a highly controversial project, being viewed as ‘the successor of Cassie Jaye’s The Red Pill ‘. She filmed female whistle-blowers prior to the announcement of the project, to make sure she had the most revealing material secured. ‘A VOID’ was put on hold during the lockdown, but she will officially start production of ‘A VOID’ in the autumn of 2020. A link to the crowdfunder and trailer is here.

Robert Brockway “Theirstory, or How Feminist Revisionists Changed The Past”

Robert is an Australian/Canadian Men’s Rights Activist (MRA) and anti-feminist. He is concerned for the welfare of men and boys in modern society. In particular, he is concerned about the effects of widespread misandry in society and gender biases in addressing domestic violence and intimate partner violence. He advocates for men’s rights for the next generation of men and women.

Robert is the president of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc. and holds positions as a Researcher at A Voice for Men and Chief Editor at Wiki4Men. He was formerly Managing Editor at A Voice for Men.

In 2016 he helped organise the third screening of The Red Pill in Australia. This was the first screening of the documentary in Australia outside of Melbourne. He was on the organising committee of ICMI17, and provided advice and assistance to the organisers of ICMI19. He spoke at the March for Men in Melbourne, Australia, organised by Sydney Watson.

Robert regularly publishes articles on A Voice for Men and has given interviews on behalf of Men's Rights Brisbane, Men's Rights Australia, the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc. and A Voice for Men.

Belinda Brown "New Strategies and Directions for Ending Feminism"

Belinda studied Social Anthropology at the London School of Economics and then lived in Warsaw, Poland, for five years, where she studied the collapse of communism at the Central European University. She identified strong families and the social networks growing from them as playing a crucial role in bringing about the collapse of communism and wrote about this in her book The Private Revolution. It was this insight which has informed her desire to bring an end to feminism, which, by largely destroying the family has left us vulnerable to tyrannies of all sorts.

Belinda has written extensively about feminism in The Conservative Woman. She also writes also for The Daily Mail, Mercatornet and various blogs. She speaks publicly and has contributed to debates on television and radio, some of which can be seen on her YouTube channel.

She has reluctantly recently turned her attention to fighting Relationships and Sex Education. She sees this as profoundly dangerous as it aims to indoctrinate children from the youngest ages and is therefore the final nail in the coffin for the future of our society. And it is feminism which, by destroying the family and strengthening the state, has enabled the education system to have such a grip on our children.

Although Belinda does not like labels she sees herself as a Men's Rights Activist and will be discussing future directions for the Men's Rights Movement.

More of Belinda's writing can be found here.

Mike Buchanan "Buchanan's Laws of Inter-Sexual Competition: Women Fail to Compete Successfully Against Men, and Why They Will Always Fail"

Mike is a British anti-feminist Men's Rights Advocate, author, publisher and the creator of Laughing at Feminists. He hosts a weekly men-only online meeting on behalf of Regarding Men. The latest of his 10 books is Feminism: The Ugly Truth (2016).

In 2012 he launched Campaign for Merit in Business, publicising the evidence of a causal link between increasing gender diversity on corporate boards and declines in financial performance.

Mike was the founder and leader (2013-20) of the political party Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) (J4MB). Launched in 2013, in the English-speaking world J4MB remains the only party campaigning for the human rights of men and boys on many fronts, and the only avowedly anti-feminist party, in the English-speaking world. The J4MB YouTube channel is here, the playlists here. In May 2020 Mike passed the leadership of the party to Elizabeth Hobson, formerly the party's Director of Communications (2018-20).

He hosted the International Conferences on Men's Issues (ICMIs) held at London Excel in 2016 and 2018. He is responsible for future ICMIs in Europe and North America.

Prior to his resignation from J4MB Mike co-hosted the Gender Matters series, along with Elizabeth. Guests to date (September 2020) have included Paul Elam, Professor Janice Fiamengo, Professor Gerard Casey and Tom Golden, all of whom are speaking at this conference. The video playlist of the series is here.

J4MB gave two talks at Cambridge University in May, 2019. Feminist students, alumni and academics had tried to have the talks cancelled, by sending an open petition to the Vice-Chancellor, full of lies and misrepresentations about J4MB. Mike spoke on Equal Rights for Men and Women (video, 41:05), while Elizabeth spoke on The History of Feminism (video, 45:18). The noise you can hear in the background was created by a large mob of howling, aggressive and chanting male and female feminists, who deterred many people from attending the lectures.

A female J4MB supporter, Natty Raymond, chased after, apprehended and recorded on her smartphone the female feminist student who had thrown a milkshake at Mike and two supporters. The footage (video, 4:32) also includes the photographer of the incident, who worked for the student online website Varsity. J4MB knows the names of the two individuals (and a male feminist who also threw a milkshake) but has declined to make them public.

Jon Baily, a local man unknown to J4MB before he attended the talks, was physically assaulted by the mob after the talks, and his 16-year-old son threatened. He is speaking at this conference. The party has posted 40 blog pieces in relation to the day, and the events leading up to it – here.

Introduction

Sally-Anne Burris “Choice, Influencing Real Equality, Changing the United Nations Directives to Include Men and Boys”

Sally-Anne says: ‘It is an illusion to believe that men and boys have equality in this world, it is an illusion to believe that men are privileged, and that society serves them before and above women and girls’.

Five years ago she started a small research project with one question, why are men being excluded from services? After a year of evaluating over 15 acts of law, policies and strategies, she realised men did not have equality in the UK.

In search of best practice she began to look at other countries – Australia, New Zealand, America, Canada, some European countries, some Arab states and some African states. All showed the same systemic neglect of the needs of men and boys.

In the second year of her research she began to create a campaign designed to challenge all 195 UN member states, requesting they review all legislation, policy, strategies and fiscal management to include men and boys or be gender-neutral.

On July 1, 2020, Split the Difference CIC launched by formally notifying all UN member states, the two observer states and 15 observer organisations situated within the United Nations headquarters in New York.

Sally-Anne has worked for 30 years creating and delivering people-facing services in a myriad of settings. This included two organisations – a profit-making company that delivered procured services for local authorities, and a not-for-profit housing organisation.

Believing that education and experience build professional codes of conduct, she is educated in psychotherapy, life coaching, business management, strategic governance and journalism.

Martin Caplan “The Silence of the Gentlemen: How men’s excessive politeness and leniency towards women in the professional world undermines their own standing and contributes to the decline of the West, the importance of snappy talk titles”

Because of Martin’s need to protect his identity, his talk is being read out by David Cann.

Martin is an American adventurer and traveller, currently a teacher in Easter Europe. He has a BA with a major in Education and has spent 35 years living, working and travelling throughout Asia, and elsewhere. His experiences provide the insights and foundations for his work.

He is the author of The Silence of the Gentlemen.

Edward Churchill “Making Sense of the Red Pill Experience”

Edward is a British occasional gender equality activist who works in tech. He has been interested in gender politics and the issues affecting men and boys for several years. He attended the London conferences in 2016 and 2018. He is a contributor to the website of the host of those events, Justice for Men & Boys.

William Collins “Men and Boys: Updated Lowlights”

William, a semi-retired engineer and physicist, blogs on men’s issues on The Illustrated Empathy Gap and is the author of the book The Empathy Gap: Male Disadvantages and the Mechanisms of Their Neglect(2019). He is a Trustee of the Welsh charity FNF-Both Parents Matter Cymru. His talk presents some of the disadvantages and discrimination to which men and boys are subject, including in education, health care, criminal justice, domestic abuse and fathers’ issues.

Philip W Cook and Sean Kullman “The New Global Initiative For Boys and Men – what’s in it for you?”

Philip was the author of Abused Men – The Hidden Side of Domestic Violence (1997, Praeger) and the co-author of When Women Sexually Abuse Men – The Hidden Side of Rape, Stalking, Harassment and Sexual Assault (2013, Praeger) with criminologist Tammy Hodo, PhD. He is the co-author of numerous articles in peer-reviewed journals including The Journal for Human Behavior in the Social Environment, and other such publications.

Prior to becoming a published author, he had a long career as a professional journalist for television and radio stations in Oregon, Texas and Washington State, receiving awards from The Associated Press, The Professional Journalism Society, and others.

He is currently a founding commission member of the Coalition for a White House Council For Boys and Men, and is a board member of the Global Initiative for Boys and Men. His website is Abused Men.

Sean is the President of the non-profit organization Global Initiative for Boys and Men. He is an educator, writer, researcher, fund-raiser, and community engagement organizer. His interest in boys' and men's representation in media, academic, and policy action comes from his many years of teaching in the public and private sectors and research into gender reporting and public policy.

His work includes opinion pieces in the New York Times and many other articles relate to the well-being of boys and men in education, physical and emotional health, parental rights, careers, and the need for a recognized male narrative in the public discourse, particularly in government, academia, and media.

Gary Costanza "Mommy, What's Circumcision?"

Gary, 63, has been a Men's Human Rights Activist for many years. For the last few years he's mostly been seeking to stop the routine circumcision of infants. He does public protests, produces YouTube videos, writes articles, and generally tries to convince people it's not good to mutilate babies' genitals. After all, he says, it's the lowest hanging fruit, the most obviously barbaric and harmful of practices that we actually promote and perform on our own loved ones. He writes for avoiceformen.com and neonatalcutting.org, his YouTube channel is jerrytheother.

[image]Laurie A Couture "Developmental Trauma: The Root of Suicidality and Behavioural, Emotional, and Learning Problems in Boys and Young Men"

Laurie is the author of Instead of Medicating and Punishing and an upcoming book, Nurturing and Empowering Our Sons. She is an expert in child behaviour, learning, attachment and a specialist in treating developmental trauma in children and youths. Through her writing, speaking, workshops, and consulting, she helps families and professionals heal behavioural, emotional, and learning challenges naturally, by restoring the child's natural cycle of homeostasis.

Laurie has 23 years of clinical and professional experience with youths and families as a consultant, Licensed Mental Health Counsellor, and EMDR practitioner, as well as in the fields of foster and adoption social work, juvenile justice, and education.

She was featured in the documentaries, The War On Kids and Class Dismissed and was a researcher for The Red Pill. She has spoken around the country, including at the 2019 American Public Health Association conference. Laurie received New Hampshire's Forty Under 40 honours in 2010.

In September 2017, she tragically lost her beloved 23-year-old son to suicide. She had adopted Brycen from the foster care system when he was 11. He had suffered severe child abuse and neglect and over a dozen foster and group home placements prior to finding his forever family.

The unfathomable loss of Brycen, and of the thousands of other boys and young men lost to suicide each year, impresses upon us the critical need for childhood trauma prevention and attention to the unique stressors and human rights obstacles faced by boys and young men in our society. Her website is here, her YouTube channel here, her Facebook page here.

Raymond Cuttill "From Amoeba to Feminist: Why we are where we are, from an evolutionary perspective"

Raymond is a retired computer engineer living in London, who has studied psychology and various healing modalities and therapies since the 1980s. He plans to continue his studies to PhD level. He became interested in men's issues in the 1990s when he found the feminist explanations for male/female relations lacking, having read Women Against Violence Against Women by Dusty Rhodes and found Neil Lyndon's No More Sex War more perceptive.

He later went on to start Men's Hour, an internet radio programme from 2001-2006, supported Fathers 4 Justice and helped an Equal Parenting Conference in 2006 and 2007. He continues to support campaigns about men's rights including father's rights, MGM and false accusations.

Throughout this he became conscious that more concern is given to women than men, sometimes even children, and this is not simply the result of a political movement for freedom for women. Evolutionary and comparative psychology suggest the situation we have today is more rooted in our deepest biology and psychology than often accepted. With this in mind he is writing a book along the same lines as the talk.

Philip Davies MP Interview with Elizabeth Hobson and Mike Buchanan, followed by a video compilation, "Philip Davies's Greatest Hits"

Philip has been the Conservative MP for Shipley since 2005. He's the only elected politician in the English-speaking world who regularly advocates for the human right s of men and boys.

Examples of his work include revealing the substantial gender differences in prison sentencing, in 2012 – video here. On International Men's Day (2015) he introduced the first parliamentary debate on men's issues – video here. The playlist of videos relating to Philip on the Justice for Men & Boys website is here.

In more recent International Men's debates he has covered a wide range of topics including Domestic Abuse and Male Genital Mutilation. MGM is a crime in the UK under the Offences Against the Person Act (1861), being grievous bodily harm. No exemptions to the law are allowed in the UK for either religious or cultural reasons, yet criminals keep mutilating the genitals of young males with no adverse consequences to themselves, while the state turns a blind eye.

Philip spoke at the following events:

Lori DeBolt "False Accusations Against our Men: The Women Women Hurt"

Lori DeBolt is the Secretary for the Chicago chapter of the National Coalition for Men (NCFM). As part of NCFM National she is leading a women's group, Deborah & Jael's Warriors, which is fighting against False Accusations of Sexual Assault and Abuse. This support and action group meets regularly to share their pain, warn others, and works to change laws and negative stereotypes that destroy the lives of the men they love.

As a child of the 60s, Lori was acculturated to burn her bra, "bring home the bacon and cook it up too (Enjoli)", and look for any job other than a secretarial position. However, after having two sons and seeing the radical turn the feminists have taken, her whole world changed.

Lori has two adult sons born in the 90's who began their educational years with the "Girl Power" and "Zero Tolerance" movements. Her brother was institutionally alienated from his daughter in family court. A special man (privacy remains) has been mentally and physically abused by his wife. Her beloved co-parenting partner tragically lost his battle to suicide leaving the family devastated.

Now, she is fighting for her son who was falsely accused of sexual assault and is, as of this writing, waiting for his sentencing. Her son's accuser has victimized both fathers of her daughters—completely alienating one and now accusing the other of child abuse (it's been over a year since he's seen his daughter).

Today, Lori stands firmly with God, fighting against injustices that our men endure daily!

Alan Dedman and David Cockney

Alan Dedman "But is it Art? A Debunking of the 'New Wisdom' Which Says, if it's not MAN-Made, it MUST be!"

Alan grew up in East Anglia. He studied at Great Yarmouth College of Art & Design, then went to St. Martin's School of Art. Following this he gained entry to the Royal Academy Schools, London. At the time he worked from life (the nude) and is an advocate of this Classical discipline.

At one point Alan supported himself by working for the Doll's House Striptease Revue – in London's famous Soho district. A formative experience. After the Academy Schools he worked as a medical illustrator and kept studios in Vauxhall and Hackney in the capital. Currently Alan is in the West Country of the UK. He took a PGCE at Bath Spa University and continues to work as an artist and educator.

In preparing a video for the ICMI, Alan collaborated with David Cockney. Cockney has very strong views on Art and artists. His style is abrasive and not to everyone's liking, likewise his use of expletives and East End vernacular. However, Mr. Cockney often 'hits the nail on the head' in his tirades against post-modernism. His test video (56 seconds) for this conference is here. It's a rant about Tracey Emin, an infamous pain in the arts. NSFW and please don't watch if you're offended by strong language.

From their website:

Temper is a registered charity focused mainly on working with people whose behaviour in their intimate relationships is a cause for concern. We work closely with violent, aggressive, abusive people to help them understand why they behave in such ways and to help them bring about changes in their behaviours.

Temper was devised in 1994/5 and improvements are continuously being made to the programme in the light of the experience of more than 1,000 clients who have completed the work, both men and women, and the availability of much greater research into what works and what doesn't. This has also brought about an explosion of knowledge through neuroscience.

We work on the basis that in the vast majority of relationships emotions drive behaviour, not a desire for "power and control".

Paul Elam "My 2020 Vision for the Men's Rights Movement" (keynote speech)

Paul is one of the most widely recognized advocates for men and boys worldwide. Coming from a background in the mental health industry in the 1990s, he noticed several areas in which men were effectively discriminated against respective to women. Primary among these was the problem of domestic violence and the exclusion from shelters and support services for male victims.

For the next two decades Paul worked within the system, trying to address this and other disparities in the treatment of men and boys. In advocating for solutions, he often found his efforts frustrated by feminist ideologues and ingrained misandry in the mental health professions.

In 2009, having concluded that working within the mental health system was untenable, he founded A Voice for Men (AVfM), now the undisputed flagship of the men's rights movement online. AVFM has been covered by worldwide media and has been subjected to repeated attacks by the same.

In 2014, Paul founded the International Conference on Men's Issues (ICMI), a series of conferences that launched under threats of death from feminist ideologues but that nonetheless expanded into an iconic event with a worldwide footprint. ICMI has since been hosted on three continents, gathering speakers, thought leaders and attendees from across the planet.

He launched An Ear for Men (AEfM) in 2015.

Paul has authored and co-authored several books on men's issues, including Men. Women. Relationships. Surviving the Plague of Modern Masculinity, Say Goodbye to Crazy, Red Pill Psychology and Go Your Own Way. Understanding MGTOW. His next effort, The Book of Zeta. Masculinity in the Age of Misandry, will be released in the autumn of 2020.

In recent years, Paul's work has turned back to the world of mental health. Through his website at PaulElam.com he provides mental health and life coaching services to men who have been adversely affected by issues unique to the lives of men and boys. This includes individual counselling and counselling groups through internet platforms.

Paul is a participant in two video series – Regarding Men (a weekly series with Professor Janice Fiamengo and Tom Golden, also speakers at this event) and You Can't Make This Shit Up! (an occasional series with Tom Golden).

Paul's videos posted before late April 2020, including Regarding Men, can be found on YouTube. After that he started posting his new videos on BitChute.

He was the first guest on the Justice for Men & Boys Gender Matters video series. The playlist of the series is here.

Paul spoke at the following events:

Zac Fine "Working With the Trauma of Losing Child Access"

Zac is a psychotherapist dedicated to supporting fathers through the trauma of losing contact with their children against their wishes. He came to this work through his own personal experience of estranged fatherhood which included the family court system and the common experience of mental and financial breakdown.

His work supports fathers as they endure the toxic experience of living in a trap of fear, anger, rage and grief in what can feel like a silent void when these emotions are not understood or accepted in the family court system, mainstream 'perpetrator' programs or wider culture.

Zac integrates theories and concepts from neuroscience, family systems and war to support fathers as they try to settle their nervous systems, to understand and manage their trauma responses, to explore the relational dynamics at play with their ex-partners and their role in them, to think strategically and be the best fathers they can be for their children.

He blogs at www.zacfine.co.uk and co-hosts The Other Half, a series of discussions around therapeutic approaches to masculinity, with therapist and author Sue Parker Hall.

She was catapulted through a family experience, as a volunteer, into FASO in 2001, starting as the Secretary and then joining the help line. She uses, in particular, her empathy to support callers in their distress.

As CEO of FASO she addresses parliament and agencies both criminal and family through the medium of consultations and meetings, whilst liaising with academia and like-minded groups. She is concerned about the issue of hidden victims when there have been allegations of abuse – the children and vulnerable family members of the accused person, and advising them on safeguarding issues.

She has begun making presentations about FASO to groups who want to know more about what support might be available, and has spoken to a Men's Domestic Violence academic group in Preston and a newly formed families group in Guernsey. She has been interviewed on both radio and television.

Cardiff Law School presented her with an Unsung Heroes Award during their Innocence Week in 2013.

Derek Gegner "Getting Red-Pilled on the Black Pill"

Derek received his undergraduate degree in Philosophy then began learning about men's issues in 2013, attending the ICMIs in 2014 (near Detroit) and 2019 (Chicago). He co-hosted a podcast called Gaytriarchy with Sam Kehl (also known as Prince of Queens), which focused on gay men's issues from an anti-feminist perspective. He also organized two Red Pill screenings in Minneapolis at the Twin Cities Men's Center and often posts videos on his YouTube channel spacepan.

Paul is a co-chairman of The Paul Lavelle Foundation. From the website:

We are a charity set up in memory of our mate Paul Lavelle who was sadly taken from us in cruel circumstances in May 2017. After Paul's loss a large group of us (we have a network of 50 mates) decided to honour Paul and set up the charity to raise awareness of domestic abuse involving men.

Glass Blind Spot "Canaries in Chicago: Snapshots from ICMI19"

The Glass Blind Spot describes the phenomenon where people consciously or unconsciously ignore information relevant to a conversation or debate about equality because it would significantly undermine or detract from their preferred narrative. We all have our own little biases or blind spots but a 'Glass Blind Spot' is so big that an elephant could hide in it.

The Glass Blind Spot Project has been pointing at those elephants since 2015 and documenting examples of damaging disingenuous dialogue, duplicity and double standards displayed by public figures purporting to champion equality and human rights for all.

Karen Straughan calls it the most criminally undersubscribed channel on You Tube which features a number of acclaimed collections including: 'Gendered Violence' Through the Prism of a Pandemic; Government's Hate Speech; Virtual Abuse; Problems with Men and Talking Sense Not Sensibility.

Brian Blindspot, the man behind the project, has been championing human rights for over two decades and has helped businesses throughout the UK to develop best practice standards aimed at promoting equality of opportunity for all. He started the Glass Blind Spot as a voluntary initiative to help highlight the very obvious disconnect between many current mainstream equality narratives and basic legal and moral principles of equal rights.

Elizabeth Hobson "The Power of Stories"

Justice for Men & Boys (and the women who love them) – J4MB – a British political party, thanks Tom Caulfield, its Technical Director, for the above picture, one of a large number taken in the Patriarchy Council HQ in London in 2019.

In May 2018 J4MB was delighted to announce Elizabeth's appointment as Director of Communications. She was already a well-known and highly respected Men's Rights Activist.

In May 2020 she was appointed the party leader, her first video on becoming leader is here (8:03).

She is the mother of two boys. She calls herself an anti-feminist Gender Equality Activist, and she's worked with Trigger Warning, The Liberty Belles and Ladies for Philip Davies, as well as being a key member of the organising team for the highly successful March for Men / Messages for Men conferences in London in 2017, 2018 and 2019. Video playlists for the conferences are here. She is now solely responsible for the conferences, the next will be held in London on 14 November, 2020.

Her areas of particular interest include the family and fathers' rights, domestic abuse, MGM, feminism and freedom. Elizabeth wants to end the Sex War – artificially constructed by feminists – and pursue a more just society based on classical liberal values such as liberty, equality and meritocracy.

She co-hosts the Gender Matters series, previously with Mike Buchanan, the J4MB party's founder and former leader (2013-20). Guests so far have included Paul Elam. Professor Janice Fiamengo, Professor Gerard Casey and Tom Golden. The video playlist of the series is here.

The J4MB YouTube channel is here, the playlists here.

Oliver Hoffmann "Should Men Help Women in Times of Crisis?"

Oliver Hoffmann was born and raised in Austria. He completed his computer science studies with a specialization in artificial intelligence in Vienna in the 1990s and has worked as a software developer, researcher and project manager in Austria, Australia and Germany. His political engagement has also frequently taken the form of projects, from advocacy for freedom of speech on the internet in the Austrian Liberal Party in the 1990s to founding the Austrian Men's Party in 2000s and the Austrian association for Liberal Men in the 2010s. Currently, his main focus is on artificial intelligence again, as project manager in a startup and as podcast host for promoting AI for Human Growth. He has remained an advocate for Men's Issues over three decades and is now convinced that the future is postfeminist.

Oliver spoke at the following event:

Aastha Jain “Men’s Issues and Media Bias in India”

Aastha goes by the name ‘Equalist Aastha’ on social media. She has been a content creator since 2015. She focuses on speaking about social issues, food for thought opinions, and pop culture in her videos on Facebook and YouTube and as the name suggests, tries to maintain an ‘equal’ and unbiased standpoint. In the last couple of years, she has studied media bias against men and has also published interviews of several men who lost access to their children.

Her hobby and current career path apart from content creation lies in the board gaming industry.

Ken Jolivet “Modern Rape Laws Increase Women’s Sexual Power and Further State-Sanctioned Punitive Misandry!”

Ken, an American, is the author of six books on relationships between men and women. His latest book Society Kills Men: Feminism Loses When Half are Held Back is on Dr. Warren Farrell’s (The Boy Crisis) reading list (April 2020) and has also recently received a glowing review from the Director of PR, Steven Svoboda, at the National Coalition For Men (May 2020).

Ken’s currently working on a seven book box set of children’s books on masculinity for boys. The intent is to improve younger boys’ self-esteem, identities and worth: to make them proud of their maleness while at a young, tender age. You can contact Ken and find all of his work on his website at Society Kills Men.

Ken was raised in the U.S., but has spent most of his adult life in Europe. He’s travelled to dozens of countries and has lived in Brazil, England, Germany, Italy, Turkey, Spain and the U.S. He was married for 21 years and is the father of two grown sons, and a stepdaughter (from his current marriage). He has four academic degrees: a BSc, an MSc, a Masters in Real Estate, and the equivalent of an MA in International Relations (with the U.S. Air Force).

Divorced at 43 and retired at 44 with a military pension, Ken travelled for 10 years to live, learn and experience the world. He remarried, at 54, to a beautiful Persian lady. They split their time living in England and Spain.

Ewan Jones “Feminism, Incels and Extinction: What Happens When a Society Abandons Traditionalism”

Ewan is a sociologist. In his work he takes take a top down view of society. He consider the laws, structures and ideas that will help a society survive and prosper. He also considers the laws, structures and ideas that don’t work, and result in a society falling into chaos. He believes traditionalism is an extremely important ideology. Traditionalism supports families, the local community, and the history and culture of individual nations. Nations are able to use this ideology to fulfil important customs, so they can prosper and survive over time. Societies that promote traditionalism survive, and those that turn their back on this vital ideology die.

Feminism is an attack on traditionalism. The government and other globalist forces have tirelessly promoted this movement as a way of destroying the nuclear family, and the society itself, so they can profit from the collapse. All the dysfunctional archetypes we're seeing in this new feminist society, such as radical feminists, MGTOW, Incels and Femcels do not exist in a healthy traditional society. These archetypes only exist in a warped and dying feminist society.

Pandurang Katti "Men's Activism in India – Insights and Experiences"

"Katti" was one of the early experts on men's issues in India and he was a co-founder of Save Indian Family Foundation (SIFF). He has an Engineering Degree in Computer Science from the Indian Institute of Technology, Bombay, and a Masters degree from a premier Business School, Indian Institute of Management, Kolkata. He has worked in the Tech industry in India, UK, USA and Canada. He is in the senior management of a multinational Tech firm. He has been an active participant in past ICMIs, and has attended four ICMIs.

Katti has mentored hundreds of men's rights activists in India over the past 17 years. He worked to develop media and positioning strategies for the early men's movement in India. He has been invited by India's parliament and Government law commissions several times for his suggestions on various laws related to domestic violence and sexual harassment in the workplace. His personal court case in 2005 at the Top Court of Bangalore is often cited as a a landmark case about misuse of domestic violence laws in India.

Anil Kumar "Woman is a Burden: Why are Men in India Saying This?"

Anil was a co-founder of the Save Indian Family Foundation, an Indian Men's Rights Organisation. He started at a time when there were only 70 men's activists in an online forum in 2004. In the next couple of years, he played a big role in the rapid growth of the men's movement in India. He also contributed to development of the men's rights philosophy with local contexts and its positioning in media.

In the last couple of years, his team has started fielding candidates in state assembly elections in India. Indian media has published more than 10,000 articles about the activities and demands of Anil and his close associates . The government of India has now stopped mandatory arrests in cases of domestic violence, however the domestic violence laws still exclude protection for men.

Anil has a background in the tech industry and he loves traveling in his free time. He has been an attendee or a speaker at all five of the previous ICMIs. He has also organised several conferences on men's human rights in India.

Anil spoke at the following events:

Bernhard Lassahn "The Tragedy of Fatherlessness"

Bernhard is a German writer and songwriter. He has written a number of major novels and many books for children. His recent trilogy is Frau ohne Welt (Women Without World: 1. War On Men. 2. War On Children. 3. War On The Future).

Starting with the misconception of the querelle des femmes in the year 1600 in Venice, he will explore some structural flaws of feminism and focus on matters in Germany from after World War 2 to the post-migrant-crisis playground. His topics will include fatherlessness and the totalitarian state, fascism and socialism in recent history, linguistic therapy (Marcuse), men's rights, fathers' duties, current activities. In short: no peace without liberty, no liberty without truth (Jaspers). He says:

"You cannot avoid making mistakes. It is part of the human condition. It is an indication of a totalitarian system that they never ever admit having made any mistakes. A possible way out of this dilemma is to provide room for criticism, self-reflection, reasoning, mutual understanding – and a sense of humour."

Hans Laven "Unequal Before the Law"

Hans Laven grew up from early childhood in New Zealand where he studied and has now long practised as a clinical psychologist. Like many people he was indoctrinated into supporting feminist ideology but after reading Warren Farrell's 'The Myth of Male Power' his eyes were opened, he looked more widely into gender issues and he became involved in the men's movement. He has given presentations at New Zealand men's issues conferences including on male suicide, men's mental health and partner violence, as well as presenting seminars to colleagues on these topics. He has written hundreds of pieces on men's issues, including 'WHO-based Studies Extend Feminist Propaganda' (a critique of the World Health Organisation's scientifically corrupt studies on partner violence) and 'NZ Homicides of Male Intimate Partners Committed by Women 2009-2010'. He co-authored the report 'The Other Side of Family Violence'.

The talk reproduced here was presented at the New Zealand Menz Summit in July 2020. In this talk Hans discusses numerous laws in New Zealand that discriminate against men or provide special advantage for women, while he could not find a single law that discriminates against women or specially advantages men. Almost certainly, many other countries will show a similar picture.

Rod Lonsdale "The World's Oldest Sport: Gynocentrism and the Annihilation and Enslavement of the Male Soul"

Rod's presentation will be about his experiences and perspectives on the emasculation and vandalising of boys within toxic feminised cultures, historical gynocentrism and modern feminism. He will also discuss the insights he gained into Trans-Exclusionary Radical Feminists (TERFs) at the International Women's Day protest at Speakers' Corner in London, March 2020.

Rod came to London in 1992 to flee the confusion and loss of a chaotic childhood in New Zealand. There are autistic spectrum disorders and mild epilepsy in his family, alongside a long history of family dysfunction on both sides.

His mother left the family home when he was six. He has three sisters. They all spent some time in a children's home. They were in the 'care' of a criminally devious female sociopath when Rod was 12. She had four younger emotionally distressed daughters. They had speech impediments, wet their beds etc.

Rod has suffered a lot of practical problems managing his adult life due to the emotional impact of the extremities of the environments he was raised in. He normally finds it traumatic having to deal with feminist women in his day-to-day life. His early career was destroyed by a gang of radical feminist young women.

His life partner over the past 24 years has been another man, who had a similar start in life.

In 2011 Rod made a call for an anti-feminist men's group in London, and meetings started. There were at the time only a small number of active online/offline men's rights advocates and activists (MRAs) in London. For the past five years he has been one of a group of MRAs been speaking out forthrightly against feminism at Speakers' Corner in London.

Neil Lyndon "The Scottish Family Party: A Ray of Hope At Last"

Neil has been writing and campaigning on men's issues for 30 years.

His 1992 book No More Sex War: The Failures of Feminism (republished in 2014 in the anthology Sexual Impolitics) was the world's first critique of feminism from an egalitarian point of view. He was motivated to launch that head-on assault because, he said, there is no chance that the disadvantages and inequalities which men actually do suffer can be recognised and remedied so long as the whole world unquestioningly believes in the feminist fiction that men are in control and run the world to benefit themselves and to the disadvantage of women.

No More Sex War and its author were treated with more hostility and derision than any book of the last 50 years. Neil lost everything in the aftermath of publication – job, home, friends. He was bankrupted and his only child was abducted to Scotland where the boy's alcoholic mother obtained an order of custody without Lyndon knowing the application was being heard.

Nothing daunted, he has continued to write and speak against feminism. In 2020, he published Epiphanies: Second Thoughts about Feminism for Egalitarians.

In recent years Neil has developed the idea that family interests provide a political focus by which the dominance of feminism can be circumvented. In 2012, he promoted the case for a family union Children, women and men need a Family Union to represent all their interests. In 2020, he became Chairman of the non-feminist Scottish Family Party to help lead the campaign for the Scottish Parliament elections in 2021.

Neil spoke at the following event:

Mos Majorum "Non-Profit Organizations, Companies and the Government : how feminists push their agenda in France"

Mos is a French man. Because of his need to protect his identity, his script will be read out by Alexis Fontana, another French man.

Mos Majorum is the name he gave to a YouTube channel he started almost three years ago, as a dedication to the great men of the past. He is also a casual blog writer for the French MGTOW website. His aim is to critically analyse feminist theories and statistics to understand better the dynamics of men and women relationships in the 21st century. His ambition is to provide an alternative narrative and to help men in France.

Vincent McGovern "The War on Dads and Children"

A leading voice for fathers and shared-parenting in the UK, Vincent has unparalleled experience attacking the institutional malpractice surrounding the family courts. An Irish biker who travels countries with either his fiancée or his dog as pillion, he has had five Ombudsman Investigations in his favour including three Parliamentary ones, two of which were Parliamentary Ombudsman investigations into Cafcass, Children and family court advisory support service.

Vincent twice addressed the European Parliament Petitions Commission on its motion in 2014, Systemic Failings in the UK Family Court System. This was the first time that a member state was investigated as children's matters are deemed 'of national interest only.'

Vincent is also Chair of the Central and North London branches of the shared parenting charity, Families Need Fathers, and in this capacity has assisted over 900 attendees per year.

A Barrister and a former legal advisor to the All Children Parliamentary Group have deemed him dangerous.

Families Need Fathers — The Centre for Social Justice

As Chair of CLB Vincent and committee organised two seminars in 2017/18. 2017 was about Parental Alienation, two groups protested handing out leaflets claiming that the organisers advised fathers to 'kidnap their children, and if the mothers objected, to kill them also.'

Vernon Meigs "In Praise of the Self-Interested, Competitive Male"

Vernon is an American with experience in a range of activities including music performance and composition, art, writing, computer programming, and recently engaging in Men's Rights Advocacy with hopes of promoting an individualist and self-interest based approach to the issue. Born in Japan as a United States citizen born abroad and having experienced a childhood there, he hopes to offer insight into how a culturally collectivist mindset can affect males for the worse, and how an embrace of their sense of individual self-worth can bring out the best in them. After experiencing the remainder of his life in the United States (since roughly a month before the events of 9/11), he had found that the struggle against conformity is not much easier than in the Eastern world in many ways, but had found sources of inspiration here that encouraged him to never apologize for standing his ground. He hopes this spirit of individualism can help men.

In a world where appraisals of malekind tends to amount to how much they've sacrificed, died, and disposed of themselves, Vernon seeks to esteem men for the things they've achieved, created and gained for themselves, and for an unapologetic spirit of competitiveness. He runs a blog V for Vernon where he writes about basically anything that catches his inspiration, but mostly through an individualist lens. Male issues that Vernon pays particular attention to include "value" in male disposability, male genital mutilation, the demonization of male lust, and multimedia portrayal of males.

Sydney MGTOW "Life Is A Ballot Box. Vote In Your Own Best Interests"

Sydney grew up in rural New South Wales before moving to Sydney and starting a life there. His marriage broke down in 2017 and he stumbled across the manosphere. After six months of growing frustrations at increasingly obvious double standards he started on YouTube as an outlet to vent. His first video was entitled "Respect Is Earned, Not Owed". At 10,000 subscribers he was demonetised in one of YouTube's adpocalypses thanks to the Southern Poverty Law Centre but is still creating content.

He has mentored men to rebuild relationships with their estranged kids, helped men to develop a divorce game plan to minimise collateral damage, and saved countless men from suicide, depression and nihilism. His content entertains and educates people on human nature, institutionalised radical feminism, mainstream media and radical university indoctrination, while stressing the importance of putting one's self first.

He has made it his mission to arm everyone he can reach with the tools to take responsibility for their own happiness while simultaneously living prosperous and fulfilling lives of purpose and opportunity.

He is optimistic for the future of men in the long term, and sees big cracks forming in the toxic feminist establishment that attacks anyone in its tracks in its ultimate quest for totalitarian political, economic and academic power, and control of all curricula from cradle to grave for the purposes of indoctrination of the masses, with the end goal being the elimination of all dissent.

Fortunately for everyone else, the cats are already out of the bag and pissing on their carpet.

Steve Moxon "How and Why Partner Violence is Usual Female Behaviour but Aberrational for Males"

Steve is an English independent (non-affiliated) cross-disciplinary researcher/writer of science review papers (and the book, Sex Differences Explained) outlining original theory on the biological roots of human sociality / behaviour / psychology, focusing on sex-difference / dichotomy.

Regularly journal-published for the past decade, he's tackled many topics: the basis of the sexual divide, pair-bonding, partner violence, the dominance hierarchy, competitiveness, the stress response mechanism, the origin of the sexual divide, why culture is biology, and why 'the oppressed' are males who are 'different'. Throughout is a necessary bottom-up approach, excluding all ideology as anti-science: feminism, and 'identity politics' ('PC') generally.

Known initially for his science-cum-polemic book The Woman Racket (2008), he points out the problem isn't some recent 'gynocentrism'. After all, feminism is not concern for women: it's hatred towards men — the core of the Left's backlash against 'the workers' for declining to 'rise up'. Preferencing the female has a deep evolutionary history, stemming from the female being the limiting factor in reproduction, obliging the male to take on the 'genetic filter' function to deal with accumulated gene-replication error by mutually competing for rank as a measure of genetic quality, then for females to select only 'good genes'. Hence male disadvantage and being 'policed' to control sexual access to females. In-built anti-male prejudice has been amplified to pathological levels by the new political hatred.

Johan Nayar Interview with Elizabeth Hobson

Johan is the author of The Creativity Manual, a guide for those who are on the creative path and those who are interested in creating their own reality. His own creative journey started in earnest back in 1998 when he left the UK to travel out east to India, the land of his ancestors. His first moments in India were both shocking and exciting for him, the ordinary boundaries of western life were shattered leaving the feeling that anything was possible. The experiences out there shaped his perceptions of the world and triggered a curiosity in the concepts of creating your own reality.

Upon returning home, everything was different, it was as if he had new eyes to look upon the world and this sparked a journey into creativity both in practice and through the study of psychology. He went to film school and completed his undergraduate degree in Chemistry. He has since made a number of short films in a variety of roles including director, writer, editor, composer and actor. He also undertook a master's in Evolutionary Psychology which is one of the main pillars of his book, and one of the strong foundations of his understanding of the world around him. This evolutionary lens makes some of the claims from the world of academia seem absurd. He now works as a freelance filmmaker, editor and composer in the creative sphere. You can see his work here. A recent radio interview is here.

Earlier this year Johan gave a talk to the Dorset Humanists, Evolutionary Psychology and the Blank Slate. A recent radio interview is here.

Anne O'Regan "Never sit on the fence, even when surrounded by feminists"

Anne is an effective campaigner for men's rights. She believes her passion for equality was ignited at a young age by her father. Following his emigration to South Wales, she has an early recollection of him saying, "Anne, you are as good as the best, and as bad as the rest." She calls it her grounding in equality.

Anne spent 32 years as a nurse in the NHS. She was elected and trained as a Trade Union Equalities Officer.

Eleven year ago, Anne's son and his then wife separated. Following the separation, the whole paternal family became alienated from her three grandchildren. Injustice and inequality in the family court system cut though family life and destroyed what was once a loving relationship. Anne feels the system fails to prioritise the rights of the child and recognise the importance of fathers.

Anne has committed herself to challenging discrimination against both women and men. She is a trustee for Families Need Fathers Both Parents Matter Cymru and a range of other charities.

She has lobbied the Welsh government on several Men's Issues. She successfully challenged The Equality and Human Rights Commission on an issue of discrimination against men. She also challenged the Welsh government on the VAWDASV Bill and has actively publicised the discrimination men experience through the media.

Anne claims to be "no expert", but she does have many experiences in this field. She strives to motivate others to stand united and raise the value of men and boys in society.

Valentina Ortiz "The practical implication of feminist discourse to the detriment of men in Spain and in the world."

Valentina, 24, was born in Argentina, and currently living in Spain. She created her YouTube channel La Entropía de Valen at the age of 19 with the intention of sharing her opinions on topics that she considered unpopular. This is how she started to get involved in the men's rights movement and began her critique of feminism. Over time, she specialized in gender, becoming actively involved in men's rights activism and dedicating her YouTube channel entirely to this.She identfies as an MRA.

Five years after the launch of her video channel, Valentina is one of the few voices in Spain for male problems. Her channel now has more than 150,000 subscribers, she has more than 50,000 followers on TikTok, 13,000 on Twitter, and close to 10,000 on Instagram. She's been running a segment on the national television station El Toro, where she's had the opportunity to make these issues visible.

She has published more than 200 videos related to the defence of men's rights, written various articles, and is currently serving as an ambassador for the #PorCaroAlFinDelMundo case, a case of international parental kidnapping, and she has a documentary in process.

Andrew Pain "Domestic Abuse and Parental Alienation: A Very Common Partnership"

Andrew is a blogger, campaigner, performance coach, TEDx speaker and father to 5 children. His recent TEDx talk, Domestic Abuse – Not a Gender Issue was the first TEDx talk to be given by a male survivor of female-perpetrated violence. Andrew is also passionate about tackling parental alienation and family court injustice following his own experiences in the family courts, first as a non-resident parent, and then later, as a primary carer.

Andrew is currently co-leading a pilot project to support male victims of domestic abuse. Professionally, he is a performance coach for business leaders, helping people to get more done, but without getting busier or burnt out, supporting organisations including the NHS, The Institute of Leadership and Management, The Association of Project Managers and The Chartered Institute of Management Accountants, as well as a variety of mid-sized businesses, lone entrepreneurs, schools and colleges (working at sixth form level).

Sue Parker Hall "Male Shame: How Psychotherapy May be to Blame and Could Improve its Aim!"

Sue is a United Kingdom Council for Psychotherapy registered psychotherapist and a Member of British Association for Counselling and Psychotherapy (Senior Accredited member) therapist in private practice. She was the author of Anger, Rage and Relationship: An Empathic Approach to Anger Management (2008, Routledge), a non-gendered, trauma approach to the issue of rage, and is a national and international trainer in these issues.

Her psychotherapy models were developed consciously as a critique of the Integrated Domestic Abuse Programme which she experienced as shaming and harmful to men as well as unhelpful to relationships; and unconsciously, to have her own childhood and young adult rage more compassionately understood.

In recent years, Sue has been seeking to understand the link between rage and shame, and has developed further psychotherapy models to explore and explain this.

Before the 2015 general election, Sue supported the efforts of the political party Justice for Men & Boys to contest two seats near Nottingham. She was interviewed during the campaign, along with another woman speaking at this conference, Anne O'Regan – here.

Terrence Popp "How Men Fornicate Themselves"

Terrence was born in Paterson, New Jersey, in 1968. He's a retired First Sergeant from the United States Army. He served from 1986 to 2018 with 12 years assigned to the Michigan National Guard. The character of his service was that of a special operations soldier. Popp was an Infantry Soldier, Airborne Ranger, Paratrooper, and a Green Beret. His service covered three formal wars in which he twice almost lost his life; he participated in several operations that will never be printed on the pages of history. Over 30 years, he traversed the circumference of this earth twice by foot while carrying the sum combined weight of a dreadnought battleship upon his back. He was frozen in the Arctic, baked in the hottest deserts, and boiled in the deepest jungles.

Popp has faced some of the darkest evils of our time and lived to talk about it. In between wars, mainly out of boredom, he competed as a professional kickboxer and fought his way up the ranks and earned a light heavyweight world title shot. He has no quit in him, drive has taken him far and will perhaps take him farther still, we shall see.

In 2009 he established Second Class Citizen, a non-profit 501(c)(3) organization which educates and supports non-custodial fathers and mothers, particularly veterans.

Popp has a YouTube channel dedicated to political satire and comedy, and a website, Redonkulas! In 2012 he published his first book, Warrior's Way and the Soldier's Soul, a philosophical manuscript. In 2019 he published his second book, The Killer of Killers, and in 2020 his third book, Showdown. He has two daughters, and now resides in the Detroit Metropolitan area.

Terrence spoke at the following event:

Natty Raymond

The British political party Justice for Men & Boys (J4MB) gave two talks at Cambridge University in May, 2019. Feminist students, alumni and academics had tried to have the talks cancelled, by sending an open petition to the Vice-Chancellor, full of lies and misrepresentations about J4MB. Mike Buchanan, party leader, spoke on Equal Rights for Men and Women (video, 41:05), while Elizabeth Hobson, Director of Communications, spoke on The History of Feminism (video, 45:18). The noise you can hear in the background was created by a large mob of howling, aggressive and chanting male and female feminists, who deterred many people from attending the lectures.

Natty Raymond, a J4MB supporter, chased after, apprehended and recorded on her smartphone the female feminist student who had thrown a milkshake at Mike and two supporters outside a public house a few hours earlier. The footage (video, 4:32) also includes the man who photographed the incident, who worked for the student online website Varsity. J4MB knows the names of the two individuals (and a male feminist who also threw a milkshake) but has declined to make them public.

Peter Ryan "The Fallacy Of The Golden Uterus And The True Origins Of Gynocentrism"

Peter is a writer who discusses the nature of gynocentrism and its impacts on society. He has a background in the molecular life sciences and an interest in the biological, social and cultural forces driving gynocentrism.

He doesn't subscribe to the notion that gynocentrism is an immutable law of nature. Murder, rape, genocide and bigotry – all have a biological component and yet we take measures to reduce these human vices and rise above them as a society.

Gynocentrism is no exception to that reality. We can never completely eliminate bigotry such as gynocentrism, but we can certainly take steps to reduce it, just like we do with racism. That is what our goal should be and that is a goal that we can realistically achieve if we set our minds to it as a society.

The fact human behaviour may have a biological component to it, as all human behaviour does to varying degrees, does not then mean we should accept pathological behaviour as normal or the status quo. We call such rationalisations naturalistic fallacies and they have been used to justify all sorts of abuse by bigots throughout history.

Society should work towards a higher moral standard in tackling gynocentrism, as we have aspired to over the centuries in addressing bigotry in all its forms.

People can find his writings on gynocentrism at Gynocentrism.com under his pseudonym, Peter Ryan. People can also visit his site TheAntiGynocentrist, to read all of his writings.

Sonia Shaljean "Why Lads Need Dads"

Sonia's background in Criminology, counselling, anger management and group-work has led to her working for the past 27 years in offending behaviour, substance misuse, domestic abuse, homelessness, and complex families. Sonia was struck by how males were vastly over-represented in all these fields, and how many had grown up with absent fathers, which led to her founding Queens Award winning Lads Need Dads in 2015 which is situated in North East Essex, England.

Lads Need Dads believe prevention is crucial in reducing the growing number of boys coming from fatherless homes each year who under-achieve at school, struggle with their mental health, are excluded from school or engage in offending behaviour.

Lads Need Dads' unique long-term early intervention programme 'Equip-Engage-Inspire' is based on a group-work and peer support model incorporating outdoor activities, practical life-skill training, and community volunteering using volunteer male mentors. This proven and award-winning model increases boys' emotional intelligence, self-esteem, confidence, resilience, and motivation, leading to a reduction in anger, school exclusions, improved mental health, improved relationships, and enhanced educational outcomes.

Sonia, in her video for ICMI20, outlines the Programme and introduces you to five Lads Need Dads boys.

Sonia has been married for 25 years and is the mother of three sons aged 15, 17 and 20. She hails from the North of England.

Karen Straughan (GirlWritesWhat) "The Epic of Gilgamesh: What Feminist Masculinity 'Experts' Missed."

Karen Straughan is a leading voice in the men's rights movement, and an unapologetic anti-feminist. She's a recurring guest on several talk radio shows in the US, both regional and nationally syndicated, and has presented or panelled at conferences in the US, the UK, Ireland, Norway, Australia and her home country of Canada. She has been involved in all previous ICMIs as a presenter or MC.

The mantra by which she lives is: Anti-feminism is the radical notion that women are adults.

She resides in Edmonton, Alberta, the city of her birth, with two noisy dogs, one giant of a teenage son and a very supportive, tolerant and long-suffering husband. Her two adult children live nearby and keep their yard and kitchen much tidier than she does, probably just to rub her face in it when she visits them.

Her YouTube channel is here, her blog is Owning Your Shit (this is what anti-feminism looks like).

Karen spoke at the following events:

International Conferences on Men's Issues

2014, Detroit – speech
2016, London – Toxic Femininity
2017, Gold Coast, Australia – Evolutionary realities: stumbling blocks on the road to reform

Philipp Tanzer "United4Men – Men Together Strong!"

Scotland-based, German-born Philipp Tanzer's life could be called contradictory. A pacifist soldier. An anti-porn Porn actor. A former gay icon standing for traditional family values. What others might view as inconsistent is, according to Tanzer, a balanced view based on experience. His goal: Fighting for a society in which opposing perspectives are being recognized and represented.

Noticing a clear imbalance in regards to "gender equality" and our treatment of women and men led to Philipp becoming a strong advocate for Men's Rights and Issues.

Due to his unusual and sensationalizable past, he was featured as a Men's Rights Activist in an article by Vice Magazin and a documentary by the BBC titled, I am a Men's Rights Activist.

He is currently working on an online platform focussed on making help and information for men easier to access, easier to find, and more interconnected.

Ian was a computer engineer (1983-2003) before becoming a separated father. His experiences in the family court and fighting for custody of his son led him to retrain as a family law Solicitor and to gain custody of his son. He then helped other separated fathers cope with the system both by supporting them in and out of court, by running the local Families Need Fathers group, and with his legal knowledge and experience to represent them in proceedings. He is now retired but still providing occasional legal advice and support to Justice for Men & Boys and others fighting institutionalised anti-male discrimination in the UK.

Lucian Vâlsan “The Inflection Point in the Narrative Curve”

Lucian is a Romanian non-leftist and non-feminist thinker.

With a background in technology, he’s been involved in multiple political and social projects at the community level in Romania since the early 2000s. He started producing content in English once he joined A Voice for Men in 2012 where he also assumed the role of European News Director.

In 2015 he founded the Freedom Alternative Network – a transnational group focusing on the study and practice of agitation, subversion and narrative shifting.

Starting from the experience gathered as a journalist and as a researcher for AVfM, Lucian has worked tirelessly to create generalized frameworks and blueprints on how to advance previously unpopular positions – such as non-feminism, men’s rights, individual liberty, abolishing affirmative action or the right to bear arms in Europe.

His public courses (such as those in Budapest or Ljubljana) as well as the private ones offered as a consultant have slowly become the standard working procedure for political parties and activist groups in more than 20 countries as diverse as Germany or Sweden to places like Mozambique, Uganda or Ukraine.

Most recently he went to Sweden in the middle of the Wuhan Virus pandemic in order to prove that inherently totalitarian approaches such as “lockdown”-style policies to address the Chinese Virus are unnecessary and based on fear mongering and mythology, rather than science.

At ICMI2016 he focused on introducing the non-feminist community to agitprop and this time around he’ll be explaining where on the narrative curve is the non-feminist messaging located and what can be done to keep on climbing.

Videos of his work can be found here.

Chris Votey “A Call To Action: Doing More in the Movement”

Chris, an American, runs the website Boys’ and Men’s Issues.

His video will be about how people can set out to do more for the movement. While protests and YT videos are important, he believes we need people to go out and do special projects, such as writing books, hosting groups, creating documentaries, calendars, etc. He will include some of the things he’s done personally by way of example, and stresses that it isn’t always about money in order to help, but using our skills to take the message of Men’s Issues to the uninformed people of the world, to help bring about change.

Chris first started in 2013 after suffered a life-changing injury that left him disabled. He had a brief time with the Honey Badgers Brigade before striking out on his own creating videos about news and Men’s Issues. In 2016 he met Modern Medusa and did the BDSM show as a team for a number of years, then The Macho Show. Together they created the Lovely Ladies for Men’s Issues Calendar in 2018 and 2020. He also hosted a screening of The Red Pill in Philadelphia. At the request of a friend, he wrote How to Destroy A Woman Now, a satire of the controversial book, How to Destroy A Man Now. He is currently working on The Boys’ & Men’s Issues Handbook and the accompanying factbook.

Robert S Wells "My Experiences of Domestic Abuse as a Police Officer and Survivor"

Robert will cover specific details of his abuse, how it affected him, and how he was treated by his employer, police officers, and courts. He will explain how this led to his suicide attempt, and how gender stereotyping and societal abuse compound the issues faced by male victims of domestic abuse.

He is a former Military Police Officer and security professional. He is a published author, speaker, domestic abuse survivor, campaigner and the Director at Domestic Abuse Business Support Ltd (DABS), the home of the "Bridging the Gap Project."

Robert was targeted at work by his abuser and launched DABS to help support and protect employees (regardless of gender, ability, sexuality, ethnicity or social and workplace position) and the businesses that they work for, against the very real threat of domestic abuse in the workplace. He travels the UK giving talks on the subject of domestic abuse against men and domestic abuse in the workplace, as well as running the DABS workplace training courses and assisting companies to implement robust domestic abuse policies.

He has delivered talks to representatives of domestic abuse frontline agencies, councils, the Army, Navy, Royal Air Force and Marines, the Police, Ministry of Defence and the NHS. His story has also been featured in a number of national and internationally distributed newspapers and magazines. He is available nationally and internationally for conference speeches, business consultation and support, and media interviews on domestic abuse.

James, a retired Merchant Navy officer, is a writer and explorer of the human condition.

He started getting involved in men's rights issues in 2004, joining Fathers 4 Justice (F4J) later that year. After a time his role was to provide counselling for those who needed it, at F4J protests. He subsequently joined Families Need Fathers.

James was elected as a councillor in Portsmouth (2008-12) and established the radio program Men's Matters (2008-14) at a local radio station, Express FM.

Whilst working in the Merchant Navy he became aware that his extra-curricular activities were taking their toll on his life, including being passed over for promotions. His research into why things are the way they are led to stress and chronic sleep disruption which seriously undermined his general health. He was forced to retire in 2017. Since then he has been writing a series of philosophical mini-books and plans to publish all eight of them over the course of 2021.

Barry Worrall "Family Law – A Degenerate Regime / Getting Back to Fundamentals"

Barry Worrall was born in 1947, educated at the universities of Newcastle upon Tyne and Southampton, initially in science, later in computer science. His career commenced as a software developer with computer manufacturers and users, then for 26 years as a lecturer in computing at Northumbria University in Newcastle upon Tyne. He is now retired.

Since 1990 he has been progressively involved in the father's and men's rights movement. On the National Council of Families Need Fathers for 5 years, he was editor of their newsletter for two of those years. In 1994 he attended the inaugural meeting of The Cheltenham Group, a men's rights organisation concerned with family law.

Involved with several publications on the subject of father's and men's rights, his principal publications have been the Cheltenham Group website, a major survey on family law treatment of men, The Emperor's New Clothes (1996) available here, and his own book, a critique of UK family law Without Authority (2006), is available in a paperback edition from Amazon UK, and in a Kindle edition from all Amazon websites.

What Freud Said About Feminism

November 5, 2020 | by Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. | Link | Original Link

Sigmund Freud, the Austrian psychoanalyst, was the first male authority figure feminists attacked. They began their attack on him at the beginning of the 20th Century and continued it up until the present. They then proceeded to attack practically all male authority figures, from George Washington to William Shakespeare and from Thomas Edison to John Wayne.

The attacks on Freud began early in the 20th Century and continued throughout that century. What feminists primarily focused on was Freud's theories about women. Feminists absolutely could not stand his theories about women and so began the trend of name-calling which modern liberals (radicals) now commonly follow.

One the chief things that bothered feminists was that fact that Freud called attention to the biological difference between males and females; that is, to the fact that males have penises and women do not. This difference in sexual anatomy led, Freud theorized, to differences in male and female personalities. It was also the source of the sexual animosity between males and females.

At the core of Freud theory about women was the concept of "penis envy." In the 1920s, Freud wrote about this theory in several papers. Both boys and girls developed a castration complex at about the age of three, at which point they discovered the difference in sexual anatomy. A three- or four-year-old boy might run up to his mother, after fondling his penis and observing that it becomes erect, and shout, "Mommy, look how strong my pee-pee gets!" Often times such a boy will not get a positive response from his mother, and he will thus develop negative feelings about his masculinity and a castration complex.

When a little girl discovers that her brother or other little boys have a part of the anatomy they do not have, they feel shocked and cheated. They may run to their mothers and cry out, "Mommy, where's your pee-pee? Where's my pee-pee?" If their mother cannot give them an adequate explanation for this, they become depressed and angry about this fact, and it can affect them the rest of their lives. They also develop a castration complex.

According to Freud, when boys discover that they have penises and little girls do not, boys react with guilt about having something that their sisters do not have, and they become fearful that their penises will be taken away from them—a fear Freud referred to as "castration fear," which is the male castration complex. Unconscious castration far can cause men to have a fear of women all their lives and to be submissive to them. When little girls discover boys have penises and they do not have them, it seems to them that boys have everything and they have nothing. They then develop what Freud called, "penis envy," the female castration complex.

"From the analyses of many neurotic women we have learned that women go through an early phase in which they envy their brothers the token of maleness and feel themselves handicapped and ill-treated on account of it," Freud wrote. This initial wound, delivered at the beginning of life, is for many little girls, fatal. They can never really accept that their brothers were born with a body part that they lack, and even though they later come to realize they also have a body part that boys do not have, in their primitive minds they feel that what they have and what boys have aren't equal. And hence, many girls grow up to be women who still, on some unconscious level, want to have a penis. The quest for equality is a quest for a penis.

Later, Freud connected penis envy with feminism. "Now upon this penis envy follows that hostile embitterment displayed by women against men, never entirely absent in the relations between the sexes, the clearest indication of which are to be found in the writings and ambitions of 'emancipated' women," Freud wrote. Sentences such as this were the ones that were the most upsetting to feminists. As the old saying goes, "The truth hurts."

Feminists did not just disagree with Freud, they demeaned him and dismissed him. Horney, a female psychoanalyst, termed "penis envy" in a 1926 paper, "a male concept," and said that Freud was blinded by a "male bias." Thompson, another female psychoanalyst, wrote in 1943 that penis envy was a "male conceit," stemming from Freud's "phallic narcissism." Kanefield, a more contemporary female psychoanalyst, spoke for many in 1985 when she said, "Freud's view of women as castrated men, reconciled to inferiority due to their biological lack, is misogynous…deeply sexist and unfounded."

After a century of these kind of attacks, which got worse and worse over the years, one of the greatest and wisest men who have ever lived, became relegated to the dark cellar of "evil men" that feminists have warned us never to even mention.

For many years I taught Introduction to Psychology at a community college in Manhattan. I found that when I taught Freud, I usually got a hostile reaction. Most professors in colleges today are feminists and many of them no longer teach Freud's theories. If they do, they only teach them to criticize them and dismiss them. Many of my female students, without having read a sentence of Freud, would simply state, "He was a woman hater," when I asked them for their opinion of Freud. One student even stuck out her tongue at me—probably because I was a white male professor who was teaching evil.

Freud noticed the feminist attacks, which were going strong even in his day. He advocated his fellow psychoanalysts not to be deterred from looking objectively at female psychology by angry protests. "We must not allow ourselves to be deflected from such conclusions about the anatomical distinctions between the sexes and their psychological outcomes by the denials of feminists."

Unfortunately, Freud's strong stand against feminist hysteria could not be defended by subsequent psychoanalysts. In the 1970s, feminism took over psychoanalysis just as it had taken over everything else, and today there is hardly any psychoanalyst around who subscribes to Freud's theories. All of them have been cowed by feminism and by the power-mad, politically correct mob.

Fortunately, there are still a few of us holding the fort, so that classical psychoanalytic thinking can be preserved for future generations. I believe Freud's theories about women are still as relevant today as they were in his day.

Millennial Manifesto: The Dissolution of Monogamy

Hello, I'm a millennial, you know that blizzard of snowflakes threatening to bury western culture under twenty feet of frigid, vacuous, postmodern-induced nihilism. The group which intends to erode every institution of the western world into an unrecognizable putty of existential self-annihilation. Though it is worth noting the next generation is shaping up to be worse. If mine is the snowflake generation, gen-z are a hailstorm threatening to smash the windshield of your car in the driveway. Don't believe me? Just look at Tik-Tok. Or if you've never heard of Tik-Tok, or don't want to download the app, grab a shot glass from the kitchen cupboard, go to the garage, and do twelve shots of gasoline. You'll get the general idea of its aesthetic.

But I'm not here to bash generation-z. This is a piece which I'm hoping will once and for all make anyone left who still wonders as to men's declining motivation to participate in the dating and marriage markets to understand definitively why so many men are checking out. Perhaps I'm only venting, perhaps this is nothing but a torrential screed of frustration. To some extent, I know I'm preaching to the choir.

Let's begin by stating the obvious. The social contract between the sexes has been a negotiation between Feminism and the state for the last sixty years. The result—the entirely predictable and unsurprising result—is a female-centric rag straight out of Jezebel's cooch that a growing contingent of men wouldn't touch with a hazmat suit, even if they had terminal cancer.

Let's give a rundown of the social contract's content. Keep in mind, every single way society used to compel women to contribute to men's lives has been rebranded 'Patriarchal Oppression' in one form or another, and resultingly there is no certainty of any form of reciprocity contained.

She may or may not cook. She may or may not clean. In fact, all of the amenities of domestic life have an asterisk of uncertainty next to them. She may or may not have sex. She may or may not have sex with you. She may or may not have children, as one has no say regarding abortion. Too, those children, if you have them, may or may not be yours. There is still no protection against, discussion of, or even cultural recognition of paternity fraud.

Asterisks beside all of the above, the one certainty—the one absolute culturally sanctioned, state enforced guarantee—is men's compelled labor to contribute to her life…whether or not she wants you in her life, as she may always have the man surgically removed from her life and still compel contributions to it.

How any women in the world are still confused at all, despite their sweeping claims to empathy, emotional intelligence, social perception and intuition, and still be unable to detect any legitimacy to men's reluctance to accept this arrangement is an indictment of women's intelligence. Still, part of me suspects women are aware of the poisonous state of marriage, but the usual formula of self-infantilization and shaming men for the world's woes, is easier than the humiliation of women having to acknowledge the damage they've done to these institutions, not to mention the responsibility of having to solve the problems women have caused.

It is also worth noting that monogamy itself, the very sexual selection paradigm upon which the highest functioning marriages are built, has also been rebranded as oppressive to women. This, coupled with women's sexual liberation, has collapsed a once high functioning monogamous culture into a dysfunctional, polygynous one.

At least insofar as monogamy was a form of existential socialism, turning childbearing years into an egalitarian institution of responsibility, has instead dissolved into a paradigm wherein childbearing years are a competitive resource. This gives women latitude to place a draconian price on their sexuality, while squandering their most valuable childbearing years building careers instead of families, obsessively fixating on such a tiny percentage of the male population that we now have a dichotomous distribution of childbaring capacity among men. With one group of men having such abundant access to them, they've lost any incentive to take responsibility for them as there is little to no urgency to do so, and the rest of men's access to childbearing years is so miniscule, there's very little if anything for which to take responsibility at all.

The polygynous paradigm of sexual selection, being so lopsided, has created a vacuum of unfulfilled male sexual interest, which is now being filled by industries attempting to atomize human intimacy. To put it simply, if we do not reproduce monogamy culturally, it is clear we will produce it technologically instead.

Pornography, hook up apps, dating websites, sex dolls, sex robots, artificial lover simulation games, girlfriend simulations , Onlyfans, cam modeling, virtual reality, etc. The world is not in an ambiguous state in this regard. The rebranding of monogamy as oppressive to women is wreaking havoc on the pair bond between the sexes, and stimulating this confederation of multi-billion dollar industries all in heated competition to once and for all erase human courtship, converging on a future in which men and women share their romances with industries more than with each other. We've already reached the point where many men and women have more loyalty to their favorite gaming console and makeup brand than with the opposite sex. Just picture this further developing another thirty years. Fifty. 100? Do we even want to know what this is becoming?

I'm more than prepared to say that women's sexual liberation is a failed idea, or at least the paradigms resulting from it are disastrously poisonous for any reasonable standard of social cohesion and the consummation of the discipline required to collapse the subjective dissonance between men and women required to facilitate a functioning family structure and raise children. I know this is a taboo observation to make, but it must be made. At the very least for there to be some small record somewhere, someplace that at least minority in the western world was aware of its committing suicide. All of this because it loves its women to a surreptitiously toxic, deleterious, and ultimately intergenerationally ruinous fault, refusing to scrutinize or intelligently criticize any of their dysfunction.

Doubling the labor market, halting wage growth, the elimination of the single income family, the collapse of monogamy into polygyny, and even women's economic contributions which amount to little more than a pipeline for corporate domination due to women's near compulsive consumer spending. The paradigms of sexual freedom have produced very few positive results, and several damning ones.

The female centric era of the twenty-first century is an era of institutional cannibalism, where a petulant, raging entitlement seeks to consume the benefits of western ingenuity, without maintaining the behavioral discipline required for those institutions to survive. When all is consumed, what remains? What hope do future generations have to not enter into a downward spiral of dysfunction? Anthropologists find polygynous communities in island dwelling cannibal tribes. The societies that burn effigies every full moon and make thumb necklaces . The downard potential of the west's trajectory is as far down as down goes, and the culprit is clear: humanity's higher moral faculties, specifically its gynocentric affection.

In the meantime, despite the doom and the gloom, I find solace in knowing that at least men's happiness seems to be on the rise. I can adopt the childish live-in-the-moment mentality so rife through millennialism, and enjoy the fact I'm living in the era of Xbox and legalized marijuana, resting comfortably knowing the most strident form of persecution I might face for my refusal to pursue engagement with the circus which surrounds me is the shrill, banshee wailing of women shaming me (or men shaming me as women's proxy).

I wish I could see a solution. Or at least I wish the dating pool available for my generation of men contained a larger percentage of proper, thinking adults. Unforuntately we instead must contend with a level of daddy's-little-princesshood which can peel paint, or convert an atheist to radical Islam. There is a level of self-infantilizing narcissism that has men switching from beer to Liquid Plumr. So much so that for many men my age, relationships with women have become a form of self-harm, and I’m not a masochist.

ICMI20 speakers list, timetable, link to “Miss Matthews And Her Naughty Young Ladies” video

November 14, 2020 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

ICMI20 is due to start in less than 17 hours’ time, at 01:00 GMT/UTC. The first video to be released on the J4MB video channel will be an interview of Paul Elam by Elizabeth Hobson and myself, recorded yesterday. The latest list of speakers and talk titles is here, the latest timetable (with three time zones including GMT/UTC) here.

Yesterday Elizabeth and I also interviewed Miss (Clara) Matthews, 44, and we confidently predict the final video will attract more views than any video in the history of ICMIs – maybe more than all of them combined. The title of the interview is, “My 25 Wonderful Years as a Sex Worker”. The woman is delightful and at times hilarious, too. It would be an understatement to say she’s brought more joy and happiness to the world than all the feminists who have ever lived, collectively.

The ICMI speakers page is here. A fetching photograph of Clara taken two days ago for the conference website, and her website links, can be found about 70 per cent of the way down the page. The video will be published tomorrow (Saturday) at 13:00 GMT/UTC, but in the meantime, you can watch her video (NSFW) Miss Matthews And Her Naughty Young Ladies (8:56). Our thanks to Clare for giving us the video file to promote her work and the conference. Enjoy!

My own ICMI presentation video (“Buchanan’s Laws of Inter-Sexual Competition: Women Fail to Compete Successfully Against Men, and Why They Will Always Fail”) will be published at 08:00 GMT/UTC tomorrow, Elizabeth’s video (“The Power of Stories”) at 23:00 GMT/UTC on the final day, International Men’s Day, 19 November.

We hope you’ll enjoy the conference as much as we’ve enjoyed organizing it.

PayPal De-platforms A Voice for Men

November 17, 2020 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Since its inception in 2009, avoiceformen.com (under the umbrella of Red Pill Solutions, LLC) has been funded by reader contributions and subscriptions on the PayPal platform.

On November 3, 2020, in the midst of the still disputed American presidential election, PayPal informed us that they would no longer do business with Red Pill Solutions, LLC. In severing ties, they told us that we had violated their "Acceptable Use Policy" but refused to tell us precisely which provisions of that policy we violated.

Of course, we know which policies we violated, namely the prohibition on antifeminism. There is nothing in their terms of service about the alleged offense, but trust me it's there, in the unwritten clauses of cancel culture and feminist governance.

In one repressive act, PayPal has terminated every bit of funding that has allowed avoiceformen.com to remain standing as the undisputed flagship of the online men's movement. The intent, as it always is with the fascist left, was to silence us; to put a gag on men speaking honestly about their lived experience and about the world they live in. They want to force us to bow to their will and to live under the pressure of their knees on our necks.

To hell with that, to hell with PayPal and to hell with the leftist pigs who orchestrated this campaign to silence us and to silence you. By the way, this attack happened even as scores of other attempts have been made with hosting providers to shut down avoiceformen.com and to silence us all.

They have all failed. And they will continue to fail at every turn, just as they have failed for the past 10 years. A Voice for Men, and the men's movement in general, aren't going anywhere. We've never bowed to the hateful will of fucked up ideologues and we are not going to start now.

While they have been calling us haters and trying desperately to silence our voices, we've been reaching out to men in trouble across the globe and providing them thoughtful commentary, peer support and the one thing feminists worldwide loathe more than anything: respect for men and masculinity. All this from the foundation that avoiceformen.com built. All of it a thorn in the side of the feminist establishment.

This recent hiccup in our operations is already being corrected. For that we've selected SubscribeStar, a payment processing service dedicated to free speech. It's like PayPal, only without the bullies, idiots and censorious bigots.

If you've been one of the many men and women who've supported AVFM with monthly subscriptions, your payments have been officially terminated by PayPal. Accordingly, we invite you to follow the link below to SubscribeStar so you can continue that support when we need it the most.

And if you've never supported our work there but would like to, we invite you to become a new subscriber right now. Just follow the link and pick the level of support you'd like to offer.

AVFM needs about $3,000 a year to keep us on a platform from which we won't be cancelled, to pay image fees and other assorted costs; to remain the online flagship of the men's movement and a permanent source of frustration for those who would snuff out the sound of truth being spoken to power. It's a small price to pay for what we've been bringing to men for over a decade, and for what we will be bringing them in the years to come.

Censorship in academia in real-time

November 22, 2020 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Recently an article was published in the open-access journal Nature Communications. This article, entitled The association between early career informal mentorship in academic collaborations and junior author performance suggests that less experienced female scientists benefit more from mentorship by more experienced male scientists than more experienced female scientists.

Of course, feminists are demanding that the article be retracted, with some of them specifically citing hurt feelings in a thread on Twitter. This is another example of a phenomenon I have often noted. Feminists will go nuts any time anyone suggests that women benefit from interacting with men.

Nature Communications is taking feminist complaints seriously of course. They couldn't just ignore a bunch of screaming harpies now, could they?

"Toxic misogyny in Academia", oh lordy. Exactly how pro-woman would she like academia to get? Don't answer that, I already know.

Strawman anyone?

Hurtful I tell you!

Offensive!

Damage!

This gentleman even claims the results are unethical. I'd love to see his working.

Feelz before realz!

An academic system that is biased against women? She must mean how tertiary enrolment rates for men have been sliding for decades, or how women have a 2:1 hiring advantage in their favour in STEM.

Two of the three authors are women. Must be more of that internalised misogyny we keep hearing so much about.

At least there are a few people still willing to express the voice of reason.

I can't speak to the strength of the paper, but the correct way to address it is to challenge it in the marketplace of ideas, as I suggested to Nature Communications.

Censorship in academia continues apace. They can't or won't argue with the contents of the article, they merely wish to see it banished.

In case the original article is taken down by Nature Communications, an archived copy can be found here.

The Aeneid and the horrors of a blue pill existence

December 2, 2020 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

Virgil's epic poem the Aeneid tells the story of Aeneas and his people, the Trojans, as they flee from their destroyed home of Troy (the Trojan War is recounted in Homer's Iliad) and venture to Italy to build a new home; the descendants of Aeneas himself (Romulus and Remus) are destined to become the founders of Rome. The first half of the poem recounts the Trojans' journey to Italy, while the second half recounts the war that breaks out between the Trojans and the Italians, a war kicked off thanks to petty divine intervention by Juno, wife of Jupiter and queen of the gods.

The character arc of Aeneas – the protagonist of the poem who is, "famous for his piety," (page 3) – provides an arguably excellent example of what occurs as a result of living a blue pill life as a man. We should begin by noting the importance of Aeneas', "piety," as it is his defining characteristic and one of the four virtues inscribed on the shield of Augustus (the first Roman emperor and the one during whose reign Virgil wrote the poem); the Latin term for this is pietas, which refers not only to religious devotion, but also to loyalty to one's family and one's compatriots and thus selflessness.

The enforced adherence to pietas occurs in a manner that is reminiscent of the blue pill existence by demanding numerous sacrifices from Aeneas in the service of a seemingly noble yet distant and nebulous ideal. In Book II of the Aeneid, Aeneas tells the story of the fall of Troy, which resulted in the death of his wife, Creusa. While Aeneas is running through the burning city, trying to find her – he lost track of her while initially escaping – he encounters her ghost, who tells him that her death would not have happened, "without the approval of the gods," (as a ghost, she has been to the underworld and can thus see the future) also instructing him to wipe, “away the tears you are shedding for Creusa whom you loved,” (page 47) because they will change nothing. Aeneas notes that he was left, “there in tears and longing to reply,” to her and yet was unable to do so.

The loss of Creusa is arguably the first major sacrifice demanded by the gods – specifically, as Creusa notes, it is the, “Great Mother of the Gods,” (page 47) referring to Juno – from Aeneas, and yet it is a sacrifice made without consent (it occurs because destiny has it that Aeneas will marry another woman named Lavinia, with whom he will give birth to the ancestors of Romulus and Remus). Aeneas is simply forced to accept this tragedy, and its justification is that it serves a higher purpose; even though Aeneas is committed to serving said higher purpose, the death of his wife still takes an understandable toll on him.

The second major sacrifice demanded of him is the severing of his relationship with Dido, the queen of Carthage, in Book IV. Aeneas and Dido fall in love after the Trojans land in Carthage – and have sex for the first time thanks to cynical divine intervention from Juno – but Jupiter (king of the gods) sends his messenger Mercury down to order Aeneas to leave Dido and resume his journey to Italy.

Jupiter questions – in an arguably paternalistic fashion, as if he knows what is better for Aeneas than Aeneas himself – whether, “the glory of such a destiny [becoming a venerated figure in Roman legend] does not fire his heart.” (page 76) When Dido eventually catches Aeneas trying to leave Carthage secretly, Aeneas makes this juxtaposition between what he desires and what the gods demand of him explicit when he states that, “It is not by my own will that I search for Italy.” (page 79) West, the translator, points out in the introduction that the, “weakness and misery,” that Aeneas shows upon being confronted by Dido are signs of, “Virgil’s human understanding,” (page xix) and a contribution to the contrast between the humanity of those on the ground and the wilful apathy of those above.

It is arguably the case that blue pill men live a life characterised by an internal conflict between what they consider to be their duty to the blue pill world around them and the women in their lives on one side, and their own personal desires on the other. Such a life involves the subjugation of the latter to the former in the name of being a ‘good man‘ or a ‘male ally‘, ideals of masculinity which we red pill men know are meaningless. The one distinction I would draw between the average blue pill man and Aeneas, however, is that this process involves more consent from the blue pill man than it does from Aeneas; such men must fully submit to the loss of their individuality and make the necessary sacrifices to do so, while Aeneas genuinely has far less control over this process.

We must also analyse the conclusion of the Aeneid to get a picture of the final destination to which blue pill thinking inevitably leads men. In the final lines of Book XII, Aeneas slays Turnus, prince of the Rutulians (one of the Italian tribes that are at war with the Trojans), the justification for which has been debated by many scholars. The killing of Turnus is certainly at odds with pietas (it has nothing to do with devotion to either the gods or anybody), and it goes directly against another one of the aforementioned four virtues – clementia, which means ‘mercy’ (it’s where we get the word ‘clemency’ from). By the time that Aeneas kills him, Turnus is lying on the ground and begging for mercy, after Aeneas’ spear strikes him in, “the middle of the thigh,” (page 290) and cripples him; Turnus also has his strength sapped from his body thanks to divine intervention from Jupiter, ensuring that he had no chance of winning the duel.

Virgil applies the adjective furiis to Aeneas’ emotional state as he is about to kill Turnus, an adjective that is related to the Latin term furor, which can mean ‘frenzy’ or ‘rage’ or ‘madness’. Furor is significant in that it is depicted as being the opposite of pietas, Aeneas’ defining characteristic; furor connotes letting one’s emotions control one’s actions (instead of one’s devotion to the gods or to others) and being excessively (or, as the Romans would argue, immorally) selfish, being at odds with the selflessness associated with pietas. Aeneas adopting the characteristic of furor is like Jesus succumbing to the temptations of Satan, or Michael Kimmel starting to respect men; it’s completely against his nature. So why does he do it?

My argument as to why Aeneas disregards the ethical code outlined on the shield of Augustus is because he sees no value in adhering to it by the end of the poem. Fulfilling his destiny is a task that has involved many sacrifices for him – namely the deaths of Creusa, Dido, his father Anchises (Book III), and the loyal son Pallas of his ally King Evander (Book X), all losses over which Aeneas grieves humanely – and yet Aeneas has not been justly compensated for these sacrifices, as his understandable human troubles have been ignored and only viewed as obstacles by Jupiter to the accomplishment of this goal. The promise of glory does not fully satisfy Aeneas – this is the type of promise, by the way, that contributes to the male disposability that characterises wars – and it is entirely understandable as to why.

The killing of Turnus lacks a clear moral justification because Aeneas does not believe that one is necessary when those who have been forcing him to abide by that code evidently do not care at all for his wellbeing. This killing is like the existential implosion of a man who has just realised the shallowness of his own value structure, carried out with a nihilistic and Cain-esque fury reminiscent of men who murder their wives over unjust divorces. It is no wonder that such is the case, given that the structure of the idea of fate/destiny – where there is a predetermined end at which one will arrive, by whatever means necessary – resembles that of a lie (because when you lie, you choose an end ahead of time at which you want to arrive, and manipulate everyone and everything around you as much as is necessary to get there).

By the end of the poem, Aeneas has little to nothing of value to call his own, and so he curses Jupiter and destiny – or, in other words, the world around him – for stealing from him what he once loved, and the loss of faith in the proposition that existence is worthwhile is almost always accompanied by undeserved and futile (in the sense that existence can never be destroyed by acts of revenge committed against it) death.

The core lesson that we red pill men can learn from the Aeneid, brilliantly written as it was by Virgil, is that the subjugation of our will to external moral obligations that society expects us to adopt unquestioningly only contributes to the, "modern genocide on the male soul," that Paul Elam describes in his video 'Servant, Slave and Scapegoat' as being mercilessly conducted by the blue pill world. No matter what the dictates of those whom men perceive to be their gods may be, you must understand that your will is your own and that it can only be broken with your consent.

Bias against men’s issues within the United Nations and the World Health Organization: A content analysis

The Warrior & The Fishwife – Female Archetypes in Virgil's Aeneid

December 7, 2020 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

EDITOR'S NOTE: Following on from his previous exploration of male archetypes in The Aeneid and the horrors of a blue pill existence, Andrew Exeter investigates the same work in search of female archetypes, with particular emphasis on the goddess Juno who embodies feminist attitudes. Juno, as many here will be familiar, is the Roman version of the Greek goddess Hera who was previously explored in these pages as a representation of feminism and feminists. For anyone interested in learning more about Hera/Juno and her pivotal influence on fomenting gender discord, I further recommend the video channel of Greta Aurora, a learned archetypalist who will be delivering a series on the Hera archetype and its associated impact on men, boys and 'non-Hera' women. — PW.

Juno and Aeolus – detail from the Aeneid

There are female archetypes in Virgil's Aeneid that are worth analysing to gain an understanding of what women can do when they are either mature and competent leaders or immature and petty children who are hellbent on producing nothing but undeserved suffering in the lives of others. The warrior Camilla is Virgil's key example of the former type of woman in the poem, while the goddess Juno is the key example of the latter type of woman.

Camilla is the leader of the Volsci, an Italian tribe that aids Turnus and the Rutulians in the war against the Trojans. Even though she has little influence over the progress of the story, her character serves as a noteworthy female ideal, given her strength and competence in the battlefield. Her backstory is outlined in Book XI, where the goddess Diana recounts how Camilla was raised by her father, Metabus, who aligned her with the Roman goddess of hunters when she was a baby (here, we can see a link to the Amazons and thus Wonder Woman). Throughout her life, "she preserved a constant love for her weapons [her javelin and bow and arrow] and her chastity," (page 254) having never gotten married, which is arguably evidence of her fierce loyalty to the worship of Diana, the representation of an ideal which Camilla likely seeks to embody in her own life.

When she is introduced in the poem at the end of Book VII – as the war with the Trojans commences – Virgil describes how, "mothers came thronging," (page 164) to see her head off into battle, which implies that she serves as a role model for the women of Italy; her speed is her unique feature, as Virgil also notes that she has, "a fleetness of foot to race the winds." (page 164) Between lines 664 and 724 of the Latin text of Book XI, Camilla slaughters many enemy Trojans and Etruscans (an ally of the Trojans), with Virgil comparing her to a, "sacred falcon," chasing a dove, "high in the clouds," (page 258) due to her agility and ruthlessness; her taunting of two soldiers (in the second case, she is responding to another taunt) is no different from the kind of taunting that we would expect from the male soldiers.

I am stressing this point about Camilla's competence because hand-to-hand combat is a domain where the physical differences between the sexes are definitively put to the test; the physically weak or untrained will die quickly in the battlefield of swords, shields, javelins, spears, arrows, and chariots, as opposed to in the air-conditioned office of the average white-collar worker. Camilla's intensive combat training – begun when she was a mere, "infant," (page 254) – has improved her competence to the point of rendering sex an irrelevant difference between her and the soldiers whom she slays.

If one was somewhat literal in their interpretation of how Camilla is characterised, one could argue that she is like the modern career woman who forgoes the creation of a family and instead spends almost all of her adult years in the office. However, her characteristics still remain admirable from a red pill perspective; she willingly adopts the responsibility of defending Latium from the incoming, "cavalry," and, "horsemen," (page 252) of the Trojans and Etruscans, and the Latin phrase that Virgil uses to describe her death is the same phrase used to describe Turnus' death – vitaque cum gemitu fugit indignata sub umbras ("as her life left her with a groan and fled in anger down to the shades" – page 261).

This may be Virgil's way of aligning the two as brave warriors whose deaths were ultimately undeserved. There are no contemptible or immoral aspects of her behaviour that would render her unworthy of respect – most importantly, she does not use her strength to tyrannise others – and thus she stands as a unique female ideal in the Aeneid.

On the other hand, we have the goddess Juno, who most prominently features in Books VII, X and XII. Juno's motivations for her continued opposition to Aeneas are twofold – firstly, she wants to protect the Carthaginians, who are destined to be wiped out by the future Romans (this is Virgil's allusion to the Punic Wars, a series of wars which Rome won), because they are her most devoted worshippers. Secondly, she has a personal vendetta against the Trojans because she was not given the prized Golden Apple of Discord at the Judgement of Paris (Paris was a Trojan), one of the events that led to the beginning of the Trojan War. Straight off the bat, we can see that the motivations for her behaviour throughout the poem are entirely self-centred.

The war between the Trojans and Italians commences in Book VII purely because of Juno's callous divine intervention. After noticing the Trojans celebrating their safe landing in Italy, she begrudgingly accepts that, "the decree of the Fates will stand," (she cannot change fate) but insists on raising as much hell as possible before Aeneas marries Lavinia. She proclaims her desire for Lavinia's, "dowry," to be, "the blood of Rutulians and Trojans," after her actions, "cut the subjects," of Aeneas and Turnus, "to pieces." (page 150) She then begins to raise that hell by commanding Alecto – one of the Furies, female beings from the underworld who are used to tormenting men who do not deserve to be tormented – the, "bringer of grief," to instigate the war, which she does successfully.

Most importantly, Juno does not care that the fulfilment of her vindictive desires will lead to the loss of innocent lives, in the same way that a petty wife will use the family court system to financially and psychologically torture her ex-husband and not give a damn about the impact of parental alienation on the children.

In Book XII, Jupiter successfully persuades Juno to cease her ultimately futile divine intervention by promising her that, "no other race," will equal the future Romans, "in paying you honour," which prompts her to nod, "in assent," (page 287) and depart from the scene. Jupiter knows that Juno's primary concern is about her worshippers – being as insecure as a teenage girl in depending on external validation for a sense of identity – and reassures her that the Romans will essentially replace the Carthaginians as said worshippers. When Jupiter urges his wife to, "lay aside this fury that arose in vain," (page 287) Virgil uses the term furorem (a grammatical variation of furor) to describe this, "fury," underscoring the purely emotionally driven nature of Juno's childish selfishness.

Interestingly enough, Juno also seems to display the attitudes of a conservative traditionalist when she insists that the Latins – the people of Latium, the region of Italy within which Lavinia resides – "are men." (page 287) She says this because she fears that they will become feminised (West discusses this, "repeated slur of effeminacy," used against the Trojans on page xli) if they, "become Trojans," and adopt the Trojan way of life. This concern prompts Jupiter to assure her that the Latins will remain the dominant ethnic group even when they and the Trojans intermarry; Juno is likely trying to cloak her resentment of the Trojans with a justification of being benevolent towards the Italians (this slur is spoken before Jupiter promises that the future Romans will be devoted to her, so she is not even speaking about people whom she thinks are going to worship her).

Even in Book X, Juno is, "wild with [totally disingenuous] rage," (page 213) after hearing Venus – Aeneas' mother and Jupiter's daughter – argue that the Trojans do not deserve the losses that they have suffered in the war with the Italians; Juno then lies about her role in instigating the war in the first place in Book VII. West, the translator, notes that Juno's response to Venus offers, "two lies for every one by Venus," and creates, "half-a-dozen new ones of her own." (page xxxiii) In describing the Italians as a heretofore, "peaceful people," and Aeneas as being motivated by, "dishonesty," (page 213) she portrays the Italians as victims of Trojan aggression and, in acting as a sympathetic spokeswoman for this allegedly oppressed group, she gets to co-opt that victim status for herself.

Throughout the Aeneid, Juno treats Aeneas like she is his overbearing mother, a mother who does not want her son to become independent, because if he did, that would leave her with no role to play in his life, and experiencing that purposelessness is hell for such a mother. Now, despite the fact that a red pill analysis of the fate that compels Aeneas to do what he does reveals the cruel and corrupt nature of that fate, Juno is not resisting this fate out of a benevolent desire to take care of Aeneas. Let us not forget that Book I of the poem depicts the Trojans sailing through a storm conjured up at Juno's behest; she saw nothing wrong with the possibility of killing Aeneas in doing so.

Juno is the archetypal evil woman – the epitome of the negative feminine, Erin Pizzey's, "emotional terrorist", the female antichrist, the, "greatest liar in the Aeneid," (page xl) the puta of every Regarding Men episode – hellbent on ruining the lives of others, no matter how innocent they are, through eternally pointless conflicts, and who can do so almost endlessly with the power that she has, but which she certainly does not deserve. She does not have a reason to moderate her abuse of her power because she will never suffer any personal consequences for such abuse.

It is in these ways that Juno is the near opposite of Camilla, a respectable and skilled fighter whose behaviours are motivated by loyalty (to Diana, to the Volsci and to her father) and courage rather than the inconstant and self-serving whims of an emotionally unstable child stuck in an adult female's body. The former kind of woman is arguably optimal for us red pill men to pursue if we are interested in a long-term relationship, but – and more importantly – we must keep the latter kind of woman out of our personal lives at all costs.

December 9, 2020 | by Greta Aurora | Link | Original Link

Since I started making videos about feminism and men's issues, I've had a lot of comments from men proclaiming all women are the same. I understand these men have a reason for feeling the way they do, and I don't blame them for resenting the women who have caused them a lot of pain and misery. When you keep coming across the same type of woman over and over again, it's understandable that, after a while, you draw the conclusion all women are exactly the same, wanting the same things and playing the same games.

However, just because life has repeatedly dealt you the same cards, it doesn't mean those are the only cards out there. It's true that power-hungry, jealous and cynical women are all around us, but they are just one type out of many – albeit, a common type. They are ubiquitous, but far from the only manifestation of womanhood. In fact, they cause just as much trouble and harm to other types of women as they do to men.

Studying archetypes can help us come to terms with the various colours and shades of personality and behaviour. In this video, I'm focusing on two specific female archetypes to illustrate my point. Thousands of years before the rise of modern psychology, the ancient Greeks had identified the most important forces driving people's choices and actions. Their gods and goddesses were beautifully poetic representations of the various elements of human nature.

Aphrodite is a lot more than the personification of sex and beauty: she's a symbol of sensuality, passion and desire, as well as the freedom necessary for the unhindered expression of all these aspects of human nature. Her realm is a vast and colourful world filled with charm, grace, pleasure and joy. She's only one of countless deities, but she's one of the most powerful ones.

Tellingly, Hera is the goddess of marriage, but not of love. She is the termagant wife of Zeus, king of the gods, who cheats on her at every opportunity. She's vengeful, calculating and manipulative. It's no wonder Peter Wright considers her the goddess of feminism.

These two goddesses represent two female archetypes, which are in stark contrast to each other. You have probably guessed which one is more common…

Eton’s playing fields are only fit for netball now

December 12, 2020 | by Kevin Donnelly | Link | Original Link

This article has been reproduced from The Conservative Woman with the permission of the author. –Ed

THE Duke of Wellington, celebrated for defeating Napoleon at the Battle of Waterloo, is often said to have declared that ‘the battle was won on the playing fields of Eton’. A privileged, elitist school serving the sons of the British aristocracy and wealthy, and responsible for educating 20 Prime Ministers.

If true, Wellington would be forced to recant now that under the current headmaster Simon Henderson, instead of masculine courage and valour Eton has gained the reputation as one of the most politically correct and woke institutions in England.

As well as promoting his school as vibrant, progressive and willing to innovate, ‘Trendy Hendy’ recently sacked a teacher for refusing to delete a YouTube lecture in which he criticises feminist misconceptions about masculinity and manhood.

While radical feminists argue that masculinity is a social construct enforced by a patriarchal, unjust society, Will Knowland commits the grievous thoughtcrime of arguing that compared with women men are physically stronger, have a higher body weight and are programmed to be husbands and fathers.

Instead of endorsing the way boys and men are attacked as misogynist and sexist, he also puts a positive case where masculinity is acknowledged and celebrated. Throughout history men have acted as warriors, defenders of home and hearth and undertaken the most demanding and dangerous physical jobs.

In opposition to transgender theory where neo-Marxist inspired activists argue that sexuality is fluid and dynamic, and that men who self-identify as women must be allowed to participate in women’s sports, Knowland puts the opposite case.

Like the American feminist Camille Paglia and the tennis champion Martina Navratilova, he argues that a man’s superior physical strength and body mass is such that any contest would be unfair and dangerous to women.

The Eton affair epitomises how cancel culture now dominates and infects public and private debate and how anyone who transgresses is soon victimised, punished and silenced. Western liberal societies such as the United Kingdom, America, New Zealand, Canada and Australia are no longer places of free speech and open disagreement and debate.

Under totalitarian regimes throughout history, doctrinaire and oppressive mind control and groupthink dominate. Recent events in Australia offer numerous examples. Tennis great Margaret Court and rugby’s Israel Folau are condemned for advocating their Christian beliefs. The Barry Humphries award is no longer given at the Melbourne Comedy Festival because the comedian questions transgenderism. Commentator Bettina Arndt is no-platformed for defending masculinity.

Even worse, academics such as Queensland's Peter Ridd are sacked for questioning the effect of climate change on the Great Barrier Reef and universities now have safe spaces, trigger warnings and diversity guidelines enforcing cultural-Left ideology and group think.

As demonstrated by the sacking of Will Knowland, anyone who presents a positive view of masculinity is especially targeted as for years now radical feminists have controlled what happens in schools and enforced their myopic and dangerous agenda.

Australia's Safe Schools gender fluidity and Respectful Relationships programmes champion an ideology where masculine characteristics are always defined as deficits to be overcome. Boys and men are stereotyped as sexist and misogynist, with activists arguing they need to be more in touch with their feminine side. Boys are also taught it is OK to be transgender because sexuality is simply yet another social construct.

The curriculum, especially in primary schools, has been feminised in subjects like English and mathematics to discriminate in favour of girls and there are even cases of schools banning boys wearing hero costumes and engaging in rough, physical play in the playground.

As a son who watched his mother being physically abused and hit by his father, I'm the first to admit men are capable of violence against women and that the evil crimes of domestic abuse and rape are all too common. It's also true historically women suffered disadvantage and inequality as society was dominated by men.

At the same time, women's equality has been largely achieved in Western societies like Australia where all can vote and be politically active, there is equal pay for equal work and in business and education women enjoy positive discrimination.

In her book Free Women Free Men, Camille Paglia argues against identity politics where women are portrayed as permanent victims. Paglia, like the teacher sacked from Eton College, also puts a positive view of manhood and goes as far as suggesting 'men have every right to claim credit for the vast achievements in conceiving and constructing the entire framework of civilisation'.

The Hero’s Journey: How Feminism Forces Men To Glorify Their Own Ordeal

The labours of Heracles are the perfect metaphor for the exploitation of men for the sake of women. He has no choice but to do what’s required of him: fight, suffer and die. He’s on an eternal quest to redeem himself for his original sin of being born out of an extramarital affair, and for his further sins, bestowed upon him by Hera. He’s a mere toy of the goddess: she pushes him to fall from grace again and again, and then prescribes tasks for him to regain his grace and please her.

Isn’t this the perfect description of how feminism treats men? The original sin is toxic masculinity, and men must fight to the death to rid themselves of their toxicity. The difference is that, in the Gospel of Feminism, there’s no potential for redemption: the labours are innumerable, and they can never be completed. Male feminists live their whole lives toiling for Hera’s glory, and yet, remain unable to truly redeem themselves.

Women, Relationships and Victim Mentality

See also the work of Ernest B. Bax on what he refers to as "aggressive victimhood" and "aggressive weakness." Example Bax quotes follow:

"Weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive." E.B. Bax

> I instanced the Tooting tramway incident as an act of commendable pluck on the part of those concerned in it to boldly challenge the attempt of woman's righters to "jump the claim" to chivalry as a special right of the sex they champion. But there is another point Feminists conveniently overlook. It is this: That granting the "weakness" argument, this very weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive. Aggressive weakness deserves no quarter – à la guerre, comme à la guerre.
> Women's Privileges and "Rights", Social Democrat, Vol.13 no.9, September (1909).
>
> In the present article I have only dealt briefly with one aspect of this question. I may point out in conclusion that the existing state of public opinion on the subject registers the fact that sex-conscious women have exploited the muscular weakness of their sex and have succeeded in forging a weapon of tyranny called "chivalry" which enables them to ride rough-shod over every principle of justice and fair play, Men are cowed by it, and fail to distinguish between simple weakness per se which should command every consideration, and that of aggressive weakness which trades upon "chivalry" and deserves no quarter.
> 'Feminism and Female Suffrage' in New Age, (1910)

> "Even taking the matter on the conventional ground of weakness and granting, for the sake of argument, the relative muscular weakness of the female as ground for her being allowed the immunity claimed by Modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive. Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength. Woman at the present day has been > encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration."

When Boys Become Men

January 5, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I recently watched an Australian film, Breath, which is based upon the best-selling novel by Tim Winton.

I enjoyed the film. It was very evocative and contained some beautifully shot surfing scenes and a very believable friendship between two young teenage boys.

As the story unfolded, the boys develop a relationship with a former surfing champion, a shaggy haired man in his late twenties. He has an American wife who for much of the first half of the film lurks in the background with a petulant, disdainful expression on her face.

When the man, Sando, decides to chase big waves in Indonesia, he takes one of the young boys with him, the other has to remain at home, as he is still attending school.

He drops by one morning, as yet, not knowing his hero and best mate have departed. Sando's wife emerges from the house and invites him inside as it is raining heavily.

I didn't see it coming, but moments later she suggests he slip out of his wet jumper and slip into something more comfortable.

No way.

He had just turned fourteen years of age. She was in her mid-twenties.

As he attempts to remove his damp jumper she says,

"No, let me do it."

Yep. It's going to happen.

She pulls off his jumper and he stands there, his upper body naked.

She places her hands upon his chest and gently moves them all over his upper body. He stands there, frozen. She leans forward and kisses his neck and face.

She turns and walks to the bedroom and begins to disrobe.

He follows her and soon they are both lying naked and making love.
He visits her every day and they make love every day.

One day she introduces a new concept to her young boyfriend.

> Erotic asphyxiation.
> Erotic asphyxiation (variously called asphyxiophilia, hypoxyphilia or breath control play) is the intentional restriction of oxygen to the brain for the purposes of sexual arousal. The term autoerotic asphyxiation is used when the act is done by a person to themselves.

The young boy is initially horrified by the idea, but when his older lover answers his why with this response:

"Because when I do it I cum like a freight train."

He reluctantly agrees to help her, and places the plastic bag over her head and watches fearfully as she falls into unconsciousness.

The lovemaking continues. One morning, after a passionate sex session, the young boy declares his love for his American woman.

She scoffs. Her one request is he be kind to her and promise not to brag about his "conquest."

He promises he would never do such a thing.

She sexually abuses an under-aged minor and makes him promise he will never do what so many disgusting boys do-brag about his sex with his mates. Now, that would be the true crime.

By this stage of the film, I am angry. I am trying to enjoy the story as it unfolds while another part of me is thumping my fist on an imaginary table and expressing my outrage over the endless double standards men must battle in our society.

There is not one moment where the woman expresses the merest hint of guilt over the fact, she has been fucking a fourteen-year-old boy or betraying her husband.

No- her one request is that the boy not do that typically nasty male thing of bragging about his sexual exploits.

She is pregnant. The young boy notices. Is it his? She won't say.

The denouement of the film is not relevant. I had seen enough. It set me thinking about the culture we have in our entertainment world when it comes to the seduction of young boys by older women.

We can all recall the humorous scenes in The Graduate as Dustin Hoffman, the young "graduate" is seduced by the much older Mrs Robinson. It is a funny film and Hoffman does at least appear to be of legal age. Would it be quite so cute were the roles reversed and a young female graduate was being seduced by a predatory forty-five-year-old man?

Nope.

The Summer of 42 was a blockbuster hit of a film back in the early seventies.

Again, a young fifteen-year-old boy finds himself comforting a woman who has just been informed that her boyfriend has been killed in action.

Of course, she was just seeking comfort in a moment of grief. No doubt, a twenty-five-year-old man would be forgiven had he had intercourse with a fifteen-year-old girl after losing his beloved wife. Don't we all reach out for young teenagers when we are grieving?

I was recently caught up in the comments section underneath yet another article about a female school teacher who had sexual intercourse with her thirteen-year-old student.

As predictable as sunrise, the vast majority of comments were by men saying they were jealous of the kid and lamenting the fact that he had so much good luck in being fucked by his hot teacher.

I made a futile attempt to open their eyes to the ignorance and stupidity of their comments.

It's remarkable how savage men become when others attempt to puncture their macho bullshit with some commonsense.

When I suggested that a thirteen-year-old boy can be psychologically damaged by sexual abuse and even become suicidal I was mocked and my sexual orientation was questioned by some.

Others said it was clear I didn't have a daughter if I thought a young boy having sex with an older woman was in any way comparable to a young girl having sex with an older man.

I agreed that a girl faces the added complication of an unwanted pregnancy and that is certainly a serious matter. So, in an attempt to level the playing field and find out exactly what it was about an older man seducing a young teenage girl that was so disgusting as opposed to the laughter and knowing winks when a young boy is abused by an older woman, I offered up this scenario:

Just say the older man was gentle and tender with the girl and a condom was used whenever sex took place?

Nope.

It's just different mate, and if you can't understand that you are a bloody moron.

It is truly a hopeless task. It is this common attitude of men which ultimately destroys any real hope one could hold for true equity in our society and legal system when it comes to the matter of sex.

It pervades everything. Our film and music industries have made the abuse and seduction of boys by older women a thing of beauty. They call such films "coming of age" movies.

You get the idea…a young boy becomes a man one steamy night.

Have you ever heard the sentimental classic by Bobby Goldsboro

Summer? (The First Time)

It is a beautifully constructed song. As so many people say in the comments below the You Tube clip, you can feel the heat and hear the waves breaking on the shore. The musical composition evokes the haziness of an older man's memory of one hot summer day when he encountered an older woman.

Here are a few excerpts to give you an idea of how the song plays out

> When I looked in her eye
> And I swore, it was winking
> She was 31 and I was 17
> I knew nothing about love
> She knew everything
>
> The sweat trickled down the > Front of her gown
> And I thought it would melt her
> She threw back her hair
> Like I wasn't there

> And she sipped on a julep
> Her shoulders were bare
> And I tried not to stare
> When I looked at her two lips
>
> And when she looked at me
> I heard her softly say
> I know you're young
> You don't know what to do or say
> But stay with me until
> The sun has gone away
> And I will chase the boy in you away

Now, I'm no prude. I can imagine the young man may have thoroughly enjoyed his education that summer's night and walked away happy and wiser for the experience.

That's not the point.

It's the two-tiered application of the law and the two-tiered societal attitude to the act depending upon the gender of the roles involved which makes me incensed.

I perused the comment section beneath the clip and was not surprised by what I found there. Let me offer you a sampling.

There were many more.

It gives one a slight insight into just how many women have on many occasions by the definition of the law, sexually violated underaged boys and escaped any form of censure let alone justice in a court of law.

In New Zealand, an eleven-year-old boy fathered the child of his thirty-six-year-old teacher prompting the judge presiding over the case to suggest New Zealand's rape laws must be changed as currently a woman cannot be charged with rape.

> The schoolboy and the baby are now both believed to be in care and Justice Minister Judith Collins has said she will look into present legislation which makes it impossible for a woman to be accused of rape.
> She said the case raised an 'important point', adding: 'I will seek advice from officials on whether or not a law change is required,' The Weekend Herald has reported.
> The current law states that only a man can be accused of rape when they force sex. Women who have sex without consent can be charged with sexual violation. Both carry a maximum sentence of 20 years.

I have no doubt that even as people continue to express their rage over male pedophiles being released back into society there are hundreds of women who fit the bill who have been able to get away with their crimes for two simple reasons.

The still commonly held belief that women just aren't interested in doing anything as sexually disgusting as abuse a young child and the fact that on the rare occasions they are exposed, our courts appear to echo that sentiment and the penalties imposed are often no more than a good scolding.

I remember reading a book by Nancy Friday on men and women's sexual fantasies. I was struck by the number of men who openly confessed that some of their most erotic memories involve bath-time with their nanny or babysitter. They were not fictional stories as they were simply an introduction to what planted the seeds for what had become a current day fantasy as a mature man.

Men wrote of the babysitters' hands lingering for much longer over their genitals as they washed them to the point when they got erections. This could so easily happen innocently enough, hence the women who do derive sexual excitement from such acts can enjoy them without any threat of discovery or accusations of abuse.

Any man whose hand lingered anywhere near a young girl's genitals, sadly even if it was his own daughter, is risking a great deal no matter how innocent his intentions.

There were other more graphic descriptions of girls next door and nannies telling them not to tell mummy and daddy about their secret fun.

The very fact that almost all babysitters are female is due to the suspicion which hangs over every man. Women see no eyebrows raised when they babysit or work in childcare. They have, so to speak, a free hit. People simply find the notion of women sexually abusing children unimaginably ridiculous and absurd.

When men do speak of such abuse, they too, often do so in a manner which suggests it was perfectly okay for a nanny to touch their private parts.

I think these two comments from reviews of the film which prompted me to write this piece are the perfect way to finish. The reviews are written in an age where the #Me-too movement is flourishing. Note how the two reviewers describe the illegal sexual abuse of a fourteen-year-old boy by a woman.

> These later developments are well-handled but don't play as organically as the first hour of "Breath," which is straightforward and simple in the best, purest sense. Part of the problem is that newcomer Coulter isn't quite actor enough yet to convey the more complex emotions the script demands of him. (Spence, also presumably chosen as a natural surfer — both young boys conspicuously toe their own boards — has an easier time playing a character who's all externalized id.) Plus, the sexual initiation feels a tad formulaic in narrative terms, even if Winton labors a bit too hard to avoid cliche, introducing a kinky aspect to Eva's neediness that perhaps introduces more grown-up mess than this story really needs.

The film takes a risqué, confronting turn when Pikelet's lovelorn fascination with Sando's American wife Eva leads to a particularly adult encounter.

We are truly shoveling shit up that proverbial hill my friends.

The Feminist Attack on Sherlock Holmes and the Case of Toxic Femininity and Feminist Misandry

January 9, 2021 | by Yoav Levin | Link | Original Link

Yoav Levin is responding to a feminist article in which feminist concepts like toxic masculinity are applied to the fictional private detective Sherlock Holmes. Readers can read an archived copy of the article here safe in the knowledge they're not giving any clicks to a misandrist publication –Ed

Let's start before going into details by highlighting a few hallmarks of toxic femininity which the writer of this hit piece exhibits: being a drama queen, thinking she's the center of attention, knowing what's better than everyone else, especially men, the manipulation of those men, gaslighting, mental projection as well as the hypocrisy of telling others how to behave, especially in being a real man, but denying the same attitude everyone else.

There are many levels of deception here in this article so let's try to untangle them one by one. First, as we'll see there's nothing toxic in Holmes's behavior but even if there was it isn't a gender-related issue but something different that we'll explain immediately. Holmes as a figure is described as genius and that goes often with quirky behavior, many times dominant introverts, self-centered or eccentric which is misinterpreted as abusive, violent, rude, etc. This is typical for a feminist misandrist, a typical man-hater as Ashley Morgan, the writer, with her toxic femininity.

Those traits of quirkiness, self-centeredness, sometimes psychopathology are related to genius, are valid for both genders and it isn't described as veneration of male behavior, especially toxic, but a given trait of genius. Genius might be more of a male trait but the traits of genius are not a trait of the average man and masculinity. This Leitmotiv comes often in books and movies and very often in the context of criminal characters distinguishing from the positive ones. On the other hand, Toxic femininity, as demonstrated by Ashley Morgan, uses manipulation to distort this truth to demonize men and masculinity itself.

Furthermore, this hit piece also ignores other types of traditional men and masculinities. Those are men that, for instance, were the founding fathers of psychology and not the founding mothers, being adept at feelings and not only mind. Thus, there's no one certain traditional masculinity but many. In spiritual terms, to give only one example, it was the Buddha, a man with leadership qualities (that toxic feminist hate) who created a spiritual path based on the eradication of suffering teaching both ultimate wisdom as well as being adept at altruistic love, compassion and insurmountable insight in the world of emotions and feelings. Toxic masculinity, if it exists, is the result of toxic femininity that conditions it. And toxic femininity is both lying about those truths as well as the mental projections used to hide it

Furthermore, the results of modern research imply that creativity and psychopathology as well as madness, as we will see, are intimately connected. The answer here is affirmative. It’s not a trait of masculinity as such but that one of genius. As Holmes is depicted as a genius and his work requires a lot of creativity among others, the traits mentioned in this article that also describe him in the books are not tantamount to men but that of genius people. Some of them, like Holmes himself, channeling it positively (while others may use it negatively).

As is described in one psychology website: “In general, creativity requires the cognitive ability and the dispositional willingness to “think outside the box”; to explore novel, unconventional, and even odd possibilities; to be open to serendipitous events and fortuitous results, and to imagine the implausible or consider the unlikely. From this requirement arises the need for creators to have such traits as defocused attention, divergent thinking, openness to experience, independence, and nonconformity. Let us call this complex configuration of traits the “creativity cluster.” The higher the level of creativity displayed”, the higher the likelihood that the individual manifests this cluster”.

“Besides”, it continues, “some domains require this cluster more than others do. For instance, scientific creativity tends to be more constrained by logic and fact than artistic creativity. Accordingly, this creativity cluster of attributes will be more apparent in artists than in scientists (Simonton, 2004). However, there will be some differences even with each of these general domains. For example, artists operating informal, classical, or academic styles will operate under more constraints than artists working in more expressive, subjective, or romantic styles (Ludwig, 1998). The extent to which they exhibit the creativity cluster will reflect this stylistic contrast”. Because some psychopathological symptoms correlate with several of the characteristics making up the creativity cluster, moderate amounts of these symptoms will be positively associated with creative behavior. Moreover, more creative individuals will display these traits to a higher degree. Creators operating in less-constrained domains will also exhibit these symptoms to a greater extent”.

We then further read, “The theoretical interpretation just provided holds that creativity and psychopathology share a common set of traits. As a consequence, creators will commonly exhibit symptoms often associated with mental illness. The frequency and intensity of these symptoms will vary according to the magnitude and domain of creative achievement. At the same time, these symptoms are not equivalent to out-and-out psychopathology. Besides the fact that characteristics are normally at subclinical levels, their effects are tempered by positive attributes, such as high ego strength and exceptional intellect. Moreover, many of the relevant components can be nurtured by environmental factors that lessen their dependence on any psycho-pathological inclinations. Taken altogether, this means that creativity is not incompatible with mental and emotional health. This affirmation is reinforced by the existence of numerous creative individuals who display little or no symptoms beyond normal baselines.

Furthermore, Eccentricity (also called quirkiness) is unusual or odd behavior on the part of an individual. This behavior would typically be perceived as unusual or unnecessary, without being demonstrably maladaptive. Eccentricity is contrasted with normal behavior, the nearly universal means by which individuals in society solve given problems and pursue certain priorities in everyday life. People who consistently display benignly eccentric behavior are labeled as “eccentrics.” Eccentricity is often associated with genius, intellectual giftedness, or creativity. People may perceive the individual’s eccentric behavior as the outward expression of their unique intelligence or creative impulse.

In this vein, the eccentric’s habits are incomprehensible not because they are illogical or the result of madness, but because they stem from a mind so original that it cannot conform to societal norms. English utilitarian thinker John Stuart Mill (b. 1806) wrote that “the amount of eccentricity in a society has generally been proportional to the amount of genius, mental vigor, and moral courage which it contained,” and mourned a lack of eccentricity as “the chief danger of the time”.Edith Sitwell (b. 1887) wrote that eccentricity is “often a kind of innocent pride”, also saying that geniuses and aristocrats are called eccentrics because “they are entirely unafraid of and uninfluenced by the opinions and vagaries of the crowd”.Eccentricity is also associated with great wealth. What would be considered signs of insanity in a poor person, some may accept as eccentricity in wealthy people.

Psychologist David Weeks believes people with a mental illness “suffer” from their behavior while eccentrics are quite happy. He even states eccentrics are less prone to mental illness than everyone else. According to Weeks’ study, several distinctive characteristics often differentiate a healthy eccentric person from a regular person or someone who has a mental illness. The first five characteristics on Weeks’ list are found in most people regarded as eccentric:

- Enduring non-conformity
- Creative
- Strongly motivated by an exceedingly powerful curiosity and related exploratory behavior
- An enduring and distinct feeling of differentness from others
- Idealism in the sense of wanting to make the world a better place and the people in it happier
- Usually uninterested in the company, and uninterested in opinions of, other people
- Have one or more hobbies they are happily obsessed with
- Outspoken and opinionated
- Usually single
- Usually are the only child or the eldest child
- Have unusual eating habits, and have unusual living arrangements
- Interested in and have a mischievous type of humor
- Are non-competitive, and don’t need reassurance from society or other people
- They can be quirky, bizarre, cranky, and erratic.

To sum it up, such people as described here or those who are depicted through the Archetype of Holmes are also the ones that we idolize but can’t understand and that’s what stands as the basis of this figure. Holmes as an archetype for genius is a call for action to channel those energies in a positive and not negative or toxic way and the greater good of society. Feminists, however, aren't interested in that or other types of masculinity even if it's a positive role model. Feminists aim at the destruction of masculinity as a whole and that's what this pseudo gender science with this article and book is advancing. Toxic femininity lumps everything in one category and incites against all types of traditional masculinity. Feminists and their toxic femininity equal misandry. Therefore, this is not a question of toxic masculinity but toxic femininity trying to emasculate men and effeminate them into emotional drama queens, hysterical cowards, and brainless idiots.

When The World Changed

"Turning and turning in the widening gyre

The falcon cannot hear the falconer;

Things fall apart; the centre cannot hold;

Mere anarchy is loosed upon the world,

The blood-dimmed tide is loosed, and everywhere

The ceremony of innocence is drowned;

The best lack all conviction, while the worst

Are full of passionate intensity."

-William Butler Yeats, The Second Coming[1]

The last 12 months have been historic by any measure. Western civilisation has reached an inflection point and the world will change and has changed. The social division seen in the United States on January 6th 2021 is not endemic to the United States, it is across many Western countries at various levels of development. Whilst the mainstream media scrambles to make use of the tragic events that unfolded on January 6th to spread a narrative to justify the silencing and demonisation of roughly half the population who did not vote for their preferred candidate, the division grows more and more.

For months and months we have seen the mainstream media, academia and politicians of the left wing political spectrum, normalise and attempt to justify violent riots against private property, innocent people and government buildings in the name of combating racism. Then suddenly we are expected to act surprised when riots occur in the Capitol building? For years and years we were told by the mainstream media that Russia rigged the 2016 US election. We had years of investigation and constant news coverage about

Russian interference and now apparently the public is expected by that same mainstream media to instantly accept the numerous irregularities of the 2020 election without any substantive investigation? The mainstream media normalised all of this.

For decades and decades we have seen the mainstream media, academia and politicians of the left-wing political spectrum fuel social division with identity politics and woke ideology. Again we are then suddenly expected to act surprised when riots occur in the Capitol building? These events do not occur in a vacuum and are linked to each other. What happened on January 6th was normalised by the mainstream media and the far-left mob they have enabled for years. Hatred begets hatred, bigotry begets bigotry and violence begets violence. The violence of the far-left has now led to violence on the far-right and so the cycle goes on and on and on.

What happened on January 6th should not have happened and is not justifiable, but let us not excuse the role of the far-left and the mainstream media in fuelling the social division we saw on January 6th. The condescension of the far-left and the mainstream media toward the other half of the population and their attempts to silence and attack dissenting opinion no matter how reasonable and civil it has been delivered, has been nothing short of disgraceful. Ironically it has been that very incendiary behaviour from the far-left and the mainstream media and them consistently talking down to people and ignoring the needs and concerns of vast swathes of the population, that got Trump elected in the first place (like labelling people they disagree with deplorables and Nazi's). So there is no moral high ground to be gained from the events of January 6th for either the left or the right, let us get that straight.

This destructive cycle must be stopped or it will eventually tear society apart. This is not a warning, it is a perfectly predictable outcome to decades of hyperpartisan indoctrination and identity politics from media and academia in particular. If society continues to tread this hyperpartisan path, then expect more riots, more violence and more hatred and division. If there was one thing I could suggest to people, it would be this- Turn off the tv or the phone, stop watching the mainstream media and being a slave to social media and stop letting people fill your head with hyperpartisan ideology. Don't feed the beast. The same goes with academia, stop enrolling in courses that indoctrinate you into identity politics and ideologies that foster resentment and social division.

Whether you love him or hate him, Ted Cruz's speech[2] in Congress was right on point. It was a short but brilliant speech that will stand the test of time. Both the left and right needed to adopt a higher moral standard than their own interests. A standard that puts the needs of the country before the needs of their party and their convictions about the result of the election. That is what Cruz spoke about. I am in no doubt that historians will be citing that speech decades from now, as an historic time capsule of where the country was at and a great opportunity to unite and heal the country that was missed. Despite the result of January 6th and the events of that day, it does not mean that the United States or the West cannot look to aspire to that higher moral standard that Cruz alluded to every day from now on. What happened last week, does not have to be what we resign

I write about men's issues and gynocentrism, because I correctly recognise that the strength of the relationship men and women have with each other is a major contributing factor to the strength and prosperity of society. Dividing men and women against each other with patriarchy theory and having a one-dimensional lens of looking at the world and history as one of female oppression and male privilege, is fundamentally divisive and also fundamentally untrue. It ignores the issues men face and have faced and it is also ignores the reality that men and women live together, share the same blood and have children.

The intent of my writing is simply to bring greater balance to the narratives we have about men and women and the issues they face. Balance is key to maintaining a strong relationship between any group. Aside from there being a need to speak the truth about men and the issues men face, there is also a need to confront the gynocentric bigotry preventing the truth from being discussed. If we are not prepared as a society to face the truth on issues like men's issues and gynocentrism, then there will be no balance in our society. Without balance, you end up getting the ever-escalating social division we are currently witnessing in society.

The vast majority of people want to live in a peaceful, prosperous and lawful society and go about their daily lives in peace. I am one of those people. However there are authoritarians on the extreme fringes of our society that are highly involved politically and wish to impose their one-sided worldview on all of us. To them the ends always justify the means. They don't play by any principles aside from the principle of acquiring more power at any cost they can get away with. A major strategy these authoritarians have employed to garner more political and social power, is by fuelling the social division we are seeing unfold.

Turning women against men, black people against white people and left against right like they are mortal enemies, with one-sided and heavily skewed social narratives and stirring up emotions of hatred, jealously and resentment is their modus operandi. It is psychological warfare being waged on the population by power hungry authoritarian ideologues in the media, big tech, politics and academia etc. When the inevitable violence comes to the surface these people throw petrol on the fire they lit. Then when just a small fraction of their opposition steps out of line, that is then used to make justifications on why all of our rights and freedoms should be curtailed in the name of safety and security. See how that works? It is a trap. It is a strategy to use fear and division to grab authoritarian power. Divide and rule.

What is the solution? Don't play their game. The authoritarians want violence, they want chaos. The violence and chaos they help encourage, is the excuse authoritarians need to do what they love doing- acquiring more power. What I would suggest people do instead of rioting is don't feed the beast- don't watch hyperpartisan mainstream media, don't enrol in courses that teach identity politics. Instead smell the roses and live your life and have as little to do with identity politics and left or right wing hyperpartisan politics as possible. It is fine to be politically and socially engaged, but not to the point where you are “ideologically possessed” as Jordan Peterson coined. Too many people are caught up in a storm of ideological possession, unable to live without their chosen ideology or see beyond it.

With that said, not having any political interest at all can be just as dangerous but for other reasons. For the silent majority my advice is that now more than ever is the time for you to become actively politically engaged, before you become the silent minority. The authoritarians responsible for this chaos do not stop. I repeat they do not stop. There is no end point for them and the power they acquire will never be enough, they will always seek more and more. Part of the reason this current societal mess exists, is because for far too long too many people have not paid attention to the health of their institutions or their political system. It should not be surprising that so many politicians now seem to be disconnected from the reality of main street, when there has been so much apathy to politics for so long by so many in society. This has allowed extreme fringe groups and special interest groups that often have an authoritarian leaning, to have far too much influence over our society, whilst the interests of the majority are ignored. When the silent majority remain silent for too long, they become the silent minority under the boot heel of authoritarians.

Most people whether they are on the left or the right, are in the centre of the political spectrum and just want to go about their lives in peace. For what it is worth, whilst I don’t hold to a political ideology and just go where the facts are, I do lean centre-left. I have far more in common with people on the centre-right, then I do on the far-left. Far more in common! I think it is worth people like me saying that right now who are centre-left. That’s what authoritarians don’t want people figuring out- That they have more in common with other people in the centre on the other side of the political spectrum, than they do with hyperpartisan ideologues on the far-left and far-right extremes. Note how unpopular it is right now in the mainstream media to express an opinion in the middle? That is intentional, it is by design. That mentality is what we must wholeheartedly reject as a society and discourage.

One of the reasons censorship by big tech is being instigated, is to remove avenues for dialogue so there can be no middle ground reached and to entrench the social division in society even further. It is a strategy of divide and rule, so they can gain influence at the expense of society. The censorship of a President is not normal in a democracy, let alone the United States. Whatever you think of Donald Trump, it should be of grave concern to everyone that values their freedom, that the supposed “leader of the free world” is currently not free to speak on major social media platforms.

Censorship has not just been restricted to the President either. Censorship of major news coverage[3] by big tech that did not fit their preferred narrative, was happening well before January 6th. Big tech is even going as far now as deplatforming other social media companies like Parler[4], to control the political narrative and to silence any dissenting views it disagrees with. There is no excuse they can hide behind for that. Censorship promotes division and it promotes violence. Dialogue promotes unity and it promotes peace. It is in the interests of everyone to make sure that freedom of speech is protected.

I support women's rights as much as I do men's rights because we are all fundamentally human. I don't support feminism because it promotes hatred at its core. Mainstream media articles like, "Why Can't We Hate Men?"[5], do not come from a movement that genuinely fights for gender equality. However I will never agree to the censorship of such hateful feminist rhetoric. That is not a solution. A more compelling narrative is the solution to such hatred and it's not hard to develop one. Consider that hateful article for a moment and pose the question to someone- Which world do people want to live in, a world where we demonise half the population for being male or a world where the sexes work and live together to maximise human potential and humanities future?

It is not rocket science to debunk hatred and it is not difficult to challenge bad ideas. There is no need for censorship, all censorship does in the long term is give validity to the censored. There is only one way to tackle bad ideas in the long run and that is to come up with better ideas. Time is a great teacher. People eventually will abandon bad ideas for good ideas out of self-interest if nothing else and because it eventually becomes conspicuously self-evident why they should adopt good ideas over bad ideas given enough time.

Patience is the key. Do not silence anyone, instead step away from the emotionally charged narratives surrounding race, sex and political ideology that breed hatred and resentment and just pause for a moment. Is this really what you want? Open a history book and you will find a plethora of examples of this type of thinking leading nowhere good. All people have to do is step away from the ideologies they emotionally cling to and look at the mess society is in with fresh eyes and independent thought and free of ideological possession.

United we rise and divided we will fall. If we want to restore faith in our institutions then the silent majority needs to become the vocal majority. Centre-left and centre-right can work together, men and women can work together and black and white people can work together to achieve this. There is very little authoritarians can do against a society that is united against them, supportive of each other and absolutely determined to uphold the law. It keeps authoritarians up at night. Spreading division is the only tool authoritarians have to keep society at bay. Ignore their divisive rhetoric and challenge them with narratives that promote unity. This may take time and patience, but genuine positive change is not going to come from shouting at people, censoring them, cancelling them or demonising them. Real positive transformational change comes from mutual understanding, mutual respect, balance and dialogue. Pride has to take a backseat and humility and an open enquiring mind must surface.

A strong and united centre will hold, with all of the best united and speaking with the greatest conviction to our better natures. The downward spiral of society will then come to an end.

The Fallacy Of The Golden Uterus And The True Origins Of Gynocentrism (Part One)

January 15, 2021 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

This is a two part article. In part one (this part) I will provide the complete speech that I wrote, which was kindly presented by Robert Brockway on my behalf at the International Men's Conference in 2020. A link to the speech spoken by Robert is here[1], the complete speech in writing is a little bit longer than what was presented and is provided below. Part two of this article will elaborate on certain points that I have discussed in the speech, which address particular gynocentric traps I have noted that people fall into when discussing the topics I wrote about in the speech.

For a full reading of my writings addressing the fallacy of the golden uterus and why male disposability based on females being the rate limiting factor in reproduction does not have a leg to stand on, please consult this two part article and the articles numbered 8-11 and 14-20 of my Gynocentrism lecture series on the webpage linked here[2] on Gynocentrism.com. This two part article, will conclude my discussion on this particular topic. The extent of my writing on it reflects the extent to which I believe this justification functions as an excuse to normalise gynocentrism in our culture.

Science has in many respects replaced religion as the unquestioned orthodoxy of our time, despite the scientific method being an open source of enquiry. Science is not meant to be treated as an unquestioned orthodoxy, but unfortunately ideology does appear to be to some extent subverting how science is communicated to the public. So naturally using explanations that appear to rely on science has increasingly become the go-to strategy of gynocentric elements of our culture, to justify bigotry toward men and why we should just shrug our shoulders and accept it.

Science is not dogma and does not have all of the answers to every question and as I discuss in the speech and in my writings on Gynocentrism.com, what we do know from science does not support the argument women are more valuable and men are disposable, simply because women have a uterus and give birth. That is an argument of sophistry, not science. I do have a past scientific background researching, working and studying in the molecular life sciences and so this argument has been of particular interest to me to soundly and comprehensively debunk and provide my own unique contribution to knowledge in the manosphere.

The Fallacy Of The Golden Uterus And The True Origins Of Gynocentrism

By Peter Ryan

I will begin this speech quoting Mark Twain, “It ain’t what you don’t know that gets you into trouble, it’s what you know for sure that just ain’t so”.

For many years there has been an unquestioned assumption in the manosphere and in our wider gynocentric culture that because women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction, women are more valuable than men and men are disposable. It is perhaps one of the biggest blue pill myths there is and a sacred cow belief of our gynocentric culture. This core assumption underpins so many of the rationalisations given for justifying gynocentric bigotry toward men, that unless it is addressed and exposed for the distorted and factually wrong interpretation of biology that it is, nothing much is going to change for men. The glorification of the female role in reproduction is an old idea and widely held. However like what we have seen with obsolete ideas such as the Earth being flat and the Earth being the center of the universe, just because an idea is old and widely held as the truth, does not then make it right.

Let me get something straightened out right off the bat. Women do not create life, men and women create life. This should be an obvious fact and yet the line “women create life” is mentioned frequently enough in our gynocentric culture to be mindlessly accepted and repeated like it is common knowledge. To put it bluntly, functioning as an incubator does not make a woman a real mother, let alone a more valuable human being or the sole creator of life. The narcissism surrounding the role of women in reproduction, needs to be confronted in our culture and put down a peg, if we are to address the serious matters surrounding the epidemic of fatherlessness in our society. Fatherlessness is not just a legal issue, it is a social and cultural issue now in the West as well. A real mother respects fatherhood.

With that opening statement, I will now embark on dismantling the pseudoscientific dogma surrounding the golden uterus in a number of topics during this talk. The golden uterus is not just used to elevate motherhood undeservedly over fatherhood, it is also used to argue why women are more valuable human beings.

The Tale Of Two Tribes Scenario

You have probably heard the tale of two tribe's scenario a million times before, a community of 1 man and 999 women is far better off than a community of 999 men and 1 woman. We are told the community with more women will replace itself and the community with a single woman will perish. It is certainly true that in such an extreme example, the community with just one single woman is likely to perish. However it is also likely, although perhaps less likely, for the community with a single man to also perish in such a scenario. Genetic diversity may not be sufficient for the community to recover, or there may not be the manpower available to ensure there is sufficient resources, shelter and protection for the community. The lone male may not even be fertile enough to ensure sufficient numbers of offspring are produced. It could even be that some sort of mixture of all three factors, may result in the community with a single male perishing.

There is a bigger issue though with the tale of two tribes. It is misleading. What may be correct at one population size with certain sex ratios, may not apply at another population size with different sex ratios. For example, what if there were 900 men and 100 women? Or 99000 men and 1000 women? Or 600 men and 400 women? Will they still perish? In such instances the communities may shrink temporarily but not perish and are likely to recover in a few generations. The reproductive fitness outcomes that apply at one scale of population size and sex ratio, may not apply at another. So taking such extreme examples of 1 man and 999 women or 999 men and 1 woman and then formulating a universal law that says women are more valuable than men, is both misleading and factually incorrect.

Having such skewed numbers as 999 men and 1 woman or 999 women and 1 man, represent very extreme scenarios. The likelihood of them arising is very rare in the actual historic or prehistoric past and may not have even happened at all. It is much more likely that for most of human history and prehistory, sex ratios between men and women in communities have been much more even. Indeed we are biologically predisposed to have a roughly 1:1 sex ratio at birth, which is explained by an evolutionary concept called Fisher's principle. It has hardly been the norm that communities have had prolonged periods where there have been such heavily skewed sex ratios that women make up only 0.1% of the population, such as in the two tribes scenario with 1 woman and 999 men. Although there may have been periods where there were a few more men or more women in communities, such periods have been temporary and the sex ratios whilst a little imbalanced, would rarely if ever have reached the extremes of 1 woman to 999 men or vice versa.

population as a whole, the overall sex ratio of men and women eventually gravitates back to 1:1. As explained by Fisher's principle, if one sex becomes scarce, then there is a selective pressure for there to be greater parental investment in producing the minority sex in future generations until the sex ratios reach 1:1. Thus sex ratio imbalances that do arise are eventually gone in a generation or two and simply cannot be used to explain any protective bias toward women. I will explain this evolutionary principle in further detail later on in this speech.

I point all of this out to drive home the ridiculousness of the tale of two tribe's scenario in arguing that such scenarios explain why society has evolved a bias to protect women over men. Such an explanation is only plausible if we assume that the two tribe's scenario represents the demographics of human societies over a prolonged period of time, in which natural selection had the opportunity to select for a psychological bias to protect women over men on this basis. If it was the case that human societies often had only the bare minimum number of women to ensure their continuation for thousands of years, then it would follow humans would have a evolved a trait to protect women over men simply due to women being the rate limiting factor reproduction and being in such consistently short supply.

However human societies for most of human history and prehistory, have likely had a surplus number of women that was significantly beyond the bare minimum required, to ensure the continuation of the community. A community of 150 men and 150 women for example, may only require 10 of the women not to perish. It takes a very extreme scenario indeed for a community to reach a point where the loss of one more woman, leads the community to die out. Even if we go to low numbers of 100 people, with 60 men and 40 women for instance, just a fraction of those women may be the bare minimum required to ensure the community produces enough offspring to continue its existence.

Over just a generation or two, the community population size can eventually recover from extreme shocks if large numbers of the women in a society and the population as a whole are lost, as the young replace those people. Human societies can recover from population bottlenecks with only low numbers of men and women, as long as the numbers of each sex don't drop below the bare minimum required to produce the minimum level of offspring to perpetuate society.

The Fixation On Reproduction And Life History Theory

A key reason why the tale of two tribe's scenario gains traction, is because of the simplicity of it. Simple ideas might be appealing, but as we see with the feminist gender wage gap, they are misleading! The two tribe's scenario masks the very complicated process of ensuring a lineage, a community and a species continues. Reproduction whilst important to the continuation of a lineage and community etc, is not the only factor that is essential. Individuals must survive and develop well enough to live to sexual maturity, attract mates, reproduce at an optimal rate and care for the resulting offspring. Those offspring in turn must also survive and develop to sexual maturity. Reproduction is a dead-end if the offspring die before they reproduce and reproduction cannot even occur if people do not survive long enough to mate. There must also be a certain level of genetic diversity in the population to ensure offspring are healthy enough to reproduce healthy offspring of their own. It is not enough to simply breed offspring. The offspring and their parents have to be healthy, fertile and survive.

In actual biological reality, reproduction is just one component in a chain of activities required to propagate the genome. Life history theory in evolutionary biology, explains the numerous balances and trade-offs that organisms make in their survival, development and reproductive activities across their lifespan to optimise their reproductive success (or evolutionary success). Human beings reproduce at relatively low rates compared to other species and have a very long developmental period, precisely because there is more to evolutionary success than just maximising reproduction. Unlike microbial life, humans are organisms with a slow life history strategy, that places a lower priority on the rate of reproduction. Having high numbers of women in a community to maximise the rate of reproduction of a community, is not the be all and end all to evolutionary success that it is made out to be.

In reality the role of women in reproduction is just one component in a much bigger and far more complex life history equation. The fixation on women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction, blinds people to the bigger picture- The reproductive success of human communities is the result of many factors working together in a complex interdependent system and is not just determined by how many uteri you have. Think of all of the activities that have to occur in a human community aside from reproduction and gestation that are related to survival, to ensure healthy fertile offspring are born and properly develop and the community and their resultant offspring survive. Think of the role of men in ensuring those activities are adequately performed, particularly when women are pregnant or preoccupied with looking after small infants. Think of the extreme survival challenges our ancestors faced in environments across the world before modern civilisation and the role of men in such a context. Even today our societies are utterly dependent on men to keep them running.

Whilst some may argue technology may eventually make men’s role in community survival redundant, the same can be said for women and their role in reproduction with the eventual development of artificial uteri. However it is worth noting such developments for either sex are a long way off and in many respects it will be harder to replace men given the greater multitude of tasks men perform, including repairing the very robots and machines that supposedly will replace them!

With deeper reflection, we can see that simply making the claim that women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction makes them more valuable, assumes that there are not a multitude of other factors that are just as essential to ensuring the future of a community. Let us consider this with some detail in relation to the evolutionary environment humans have lived in for most of their history and prehistory.

1. Any community is going to require a minimum number of men and women to reproduce.

2. Any community will also require a minimum number of men and women to ensure sufficient levels of genetic diversity.

3. A certain minimum amount of investment in survival will also be required to ensure the community has adequate food, water, resources, shelter and protection to keep everyone alive.

4. The surrounding environment must have the carrying capacity or resources available to support the population.

As can be seen with that simple description, we discover that it is not just about having enough women to reproduce. A certain number of men are also going to be required. The exact minimum number of men and women required to ensure a community does not perish, may actually require more men in some instances. It is also the case that a certain minimum amount of resources or habitat carrying capacity, will be required to support the population. Simply focusing on maximising reproduction is almost doomed to fail, because the resulting population growth will eventually collapse the food chain and ecosystem and the community will perish. Reproduction has to be maintained at a level that can be sustained by the carrying capacity of the habitat the community finds itself in.

Not all environments are lush jungles with a high carrying capacity, easy access to food and water, no predators and plenty of available shelter. Many environments on this planet have a low carrying capacity, food and water is hard to collect or grow and shelter is difficult to find or construct. Many habitats like the African savanna have dangerous predators lurking around and the weather and geological conditions are harsh. Think of Siberia and the numerous deserts. Not all habitats are paradise and humans have had to adapt to all of them and survive.

Whilst women may be the rate limiting factor of reproduction, men do play a disproportionate role in undertaking risky and physically demanding work required for community survival. Of course there is overlap between the sexes in these domains, but there is a substantial difference on average when considering the relative contributions of each sex as a whole in these areas.

If women are the rate limiting factor of reproduction, then men are the rate limiting factor of survival. When you consider pregnant women and women raising small infants in a prehistoric context, or even as early as one hundred and fifty years ago and the harsh living conditions that human communities faced across different environments, it does not take a rocket scientist to understand the importance of men in undertaking physically challenging and dangerous tasks related to community survival. The reality is that raising small infants and simply gathering food with relatively little physical effort compared to hunting, is not enough to survive in many environments throughout the world. It is also a fact that in many places throughout the world, the carrying capacity of the environment may not be able to support large population growth and low rates of reproduction may actually be advantageous.

In some environment’s reproduction may be less critical to the future of the community and it may actually be pressures related to survival that matter more. In such contexts a higher minimum amount of men than women may actually be required. In other contexts more women may be advantageous. It does not always follow that more women are needed than men, because golden uterus!

We must also consider that there is a difference between the minimum number of men and women required to perpetuate a community and the optimal number of men and women required for a community to thrive. A community may indeed continue to eke out an existence with only 10 men and 990 women, but that does not mean it will thrive and not suffer great costs. Having more men may allow such communities to thrive to a point where they become resistant to the very shocks that threaten to wipe out the community in the first place. As with the minimum numbers of men and women required to sustain a community, different environments, demographics and living conditions, may mean in some instances greater numbers of men are more important to a community thriving and in other instances women may be more important. Natural selection does not favour just what is required at a minimum, it also preferentially selects what is optimal. A community of 500 men and 500 women that thrives over a community of 10 men and 990 women, will consequently be favoured under selection pressures.

None of any of this detail is considered if we assume the number of uteri in a community, is the sole determinant of reproductive success and biological value. None of the complexity of what it takes for a community to continue its existence is considered. This is what reproductive reductionism omits.

Fisher’s Principle And The Biological System Of Males And Females

The fundamental truth which is consistently ignored by reproductive reductionists despite it being well established within the field of evolutionary biology, is that biology does not value or favour the existence of one sex over the other in our species. This reality is reflected in the equal parental investment in producing males and females. Fisher’s principle is an evolutionary concept that explains why the sex ratio of many sexually reproducing species including humans, is roughly 1:1 and why parental investment in male and female offspring is equal.

Fisher’s principle can be illustrated as follows:

1. Assume there are less males than females in a given population.

2. The males will have a higher rate of reproduction per individual than individual females, as the total reproductive output of each sex is equal but distributed among fewer numbers of males.

3. Consequently parents that produce males are at an evolutionary advantage, as their offspring will be more reproductively successful per individual than if they had of produced females.

4. As a result, over time parents will produce more male offspring as it is selectively advantageous.

5. Greater parental investment in male offspring will continue until the number of males and females in the population equalises and the reproductive advantage male offspring enjoy reduces to zero.

Fisher's principle describes a form of equilibrium where parental investment in males and females will be equal. The core reason for this equality is because the total reproductive output of men and women as a whole is exactly equal. Neither sex as a whole can produce a greater number of offspring than the other sex and get a leg up. It is mathematically impossible! For every child that is conceived there has to be one male parent and one female parent. The result is that the male and female sex have the same biological value in evolutionary terms, as total reproductive success for each sex as a whole is equal. There is no long-term evolutionary advantage to producing female offspring over male offspring or vice versa.

Some will no doubt point out that human beings have a sex ratio at birth of roughly 1.05 males to 1 female. This does not invalidate Fisher's principle, but is actually supported by it. Geneticist Ronald Fisher the author of Fisher's principle, explained the slight deviation from the 1:1 sex ratio as a compensatory mechanism for the higher rate of male infant mortality. The higher rate of male infant mortality drives larger numbers of males to be born to ensure equal parental expenditure in producing male and female offspring that actually reach sexual maturity. There is no grand gynocentric conspiracy by nature to favour females over males. Nature does not have a favourite!

There is equal biological investment in producing each sex, because each sex has the same overall reproductive success. The distribution of that reproductive success between individuals may differ by sex, but not the total output. Fewer men may reproduce, but each of those men that do reproduce will do so at a higher frequency than any individual woman. That is the part which is left out when people discuss fewer men reproducing than women. There is no argument to be made that women are somehow more important than men, because more women reproduced. Such arguments can simply be countered by pointing to the higher reproductive success of the individual men that do reproduce. Genghis Khan anyone?

We have had half of the population chromosomal XX female and the other half XY male in our lineage for at least 160 million years, since our current sex-determination system came into being. That is 160 million years of natural selection tolerating half the population not directly giving birth to offspring. Supercontinents have broken up and major geological and extinction level events have occurred in that period of time, including the extinction of the dinosaurs. There has been plenty of time for natural selection to alter the reproductive paradigm at some point with our evolutionary predecessors, so that all of the members of our species give birth, if that was all that mattered and it was so crucial. Our evolutionary predecessors could have evolved back to asexual reproduction or become hermaphrodites in that period of time. 160 million years is not a trivial timespan, even when we consider the slow process of evolution. 160 million years is a very long block of time to have stuck with a maladaptive strategy of wasting half the genome, especially when we consider the extinction events that have occurred over that period of time. Species have emerged and then vanished in much smaller time scales than 160 million years!

Despite all of the time that has passed, our lineage settled on an evolutionary track where only half the population internally gestates the offspring for nine months. This reproductive strategy is the result of millions of years of natural selection and not an accident. It is a strategy that does not maximise reproduction and yet it has actually been favoured by natural selection in our evolutionary branch. Why? It is not reproduction alone that determines evolutionary success, but rather the right combination of investment in survival, development and reproduction that determines evolutionary success. There is a selective advantage in having only one sex give birth to offspring and having the other half of the population available and sexually selected to focus their efforts on other activities related to survival. It allows for a broader, more sophisticated and more robust strategy in adapting to the environment to maximise evolutionary success.

The biological roles of each sex support each other in an interdependent system. This allows activities related to survival and reproduction to be enhanced to produce outputs beyond what would otherwise be possible. In systems theory this is called synergy and emergence. The sum becomes greater than the individual parts on their own and new properties emerge when the components work together as a whole. This is what reproductive reductionists miss, when they just focus on women and reproduction. Human civilisation is arguably one emergent property of the foundational sociobiological system that has evolved around the specialised roles of men and women. It is the overall end result of men and women working together that matters, not the golden uterus!

The Fallacy Of Male Biological Disposability

The concept of men being biologically disposable is just as ludicrous, as the concept that women are more valuable because they have a uterus. Our gynocentric culture may indeed treat men as if they are disposable, but that does not then mean that in biological terms they actually are disposable. The mere existence of bigoted beliefs and behaviours that promote a premise that one group of people is “disposable”, does not then translate to such beliefs and behaviours having a justifiable basis in reality. 6 million Jews were considered disposable based on nothing more than outright hatred. All sorts of pseudoscientific justifications were given to assert they were subhuman. The claim men are biologically disposable is a lie embedded within gynocentric elements of our culture to exploit men. It is a lie the manosphere should reject and expose for the rubbish that it is.

Any society that wants to survive and thrive, has the best the chance of doing so when it has large numbers of healthy men to provide the manpower to support it. Losing men costs society. Even in war it makes little sense to lose men in battle if it can be avoided. Those armies that win battles with the least amount of men lost, win the wars. The loss of men, means loss of available manpower and all of the value to society and armies that comes with that manpower. Disposability implies indifference toward the loss of male life and any society that exercises such indifference, jeopardises its own future and eventually is replaced by societies that do not demonstrate such indifference. Natural selection does not favour men that lose their lives in war or from performing dangerous tasks, it favours men that survive such challenges. Men are no more disposable in performing their roles in society, than women are in dying during childbirth. Both are costs that functional societies and natural selection seek to reduce.

The reason men go off to war and are encouraged to do the risky and dangerous tasks for society, is not because society considers them less valuable than women, it is because men are better equipped to undertake those tasks. Men have evolved strengths to perform these tasks more so than women. Just think of how sex differences play out in the special forces of our militaries for example.

There has been considerable loss of male life throughout history, but that is not automatically a reflection of society being indifferent toward the loss of men. We have Anzac Day, Remembrance Day and Memorial Day for a reason, because society does care when men lose their lives and understands the societal cost. If we were completely indifferent toward men's lives, no such days would exist. That is the dysfunctional society, feminists and the gynocentric traditionalists before them have been driving us toward. A society where men can be exploited with complete societal indifference or even ridiculed for their sacrifice. Misandry in society definitely exists, but we need to delineate the bigotry based on hatred and sophistry, from actual biological reality.

Female Neoteny, Male Competition And The Gender Empathy Gap

Some point to the sex difference in neoteny and the gender empathy gap as proof that females are more valuable than males. I would argue instead that neoteny is at least partly the result of sex differences in reproductive strategies and mating preferences, rather than a difference in biological value. Men sexually select for neoteny in women because that signals youth which is a marker for fertility and women select for less neoteny in men because that signals strength. The male sex gains more from intrasexual competition and a lower degree of neoteny is advantageous in the contexts in which men compete.

The greater intrasexual competition of the male sex is not the result of men having a lower biological value, but is instead an example of male biological value manifesting itself. Competition for men is one way they make use of their talents and men can gain far more reproductively from successful competition than women can, because men can produce many more offspring from the status they acquire. Competition between men has literally built civilisation and has driven enormous levels of innovation and advances. The greater intrasexual competition of men is not proof of male inferiority, but simply a reflection of the greater returns in reproductive fitness that men acquire from investing in such competition and a means of generating survival value which in turn boosts reproductive fitness. It bears repeating that the acts directly related to reproduction like gestation, are not the only form of deriving biological value.

The gender empathy gap is real and I am certainly not denying its existence. I am also fairly certain that there is at the very least some biological predisposition at an emotional level to have a greater concern for female well-being. However this gender empathy gap does not result from women being more biologically valuable than men, because they are the rate limiting factor of reproduction. Over millions of years of evolution, women and their female primate ancestors have developed physical, psychological and social traits to elicit greater social support from their peers. Men have not developed these traits to the same degree that women have. Why is that so? The reason is not because women more valuable than men, it is because women and men have different strategies for maximising reproductive success and different forms of biological value.

As I have discussed earlier, men benefit considerably more from intrasexual competition than women as they can produce far more offspring from doing so. Men also have greater availability to engage in activities that are not directly related to reproduction that enhance the survival of the community and offspring, as they do not have to gestate offspring. This survival value that men generate, allows them to acquire status and influence within a community and access to potential mates. It can also be utilised to improve the health of their offspring and related kin and the wider community they belong to.

Just like the case with intrasexual competition, these activities can all boost men's reproductive success in ways it cannot for women, because men can father hundreds of offspring from the status they derive from these activities and can also better perform these activities without the added burden of pregnancy. Many of the activity's men engage in to provide survival value involve risks, competition and are labour intensive. The risk and costs can be high, but the reproductive payoff can be huge. The competitive, risky and demanding activities men engage in to harness their intrinsic value and inherent abilities to generate survival value for the community, related kin and offspring, requires a high level of self-reliance and independence. Being reliant on eliciting social support, is to at least some degree less compatible with the means through which men maximise reproductive success in comparison to what the case is for women.

In contrast women during pregnancy and immediately after childbirth, are less able to provide for themselves. They are also very preoccupied with raising small infants and breastfeeding them after giving birth. This was a physical reality that had be factored into how society was structured for thousands of years, until birth control and modern technological advancements. Before birth control, women may have faced multiple periods of pregnancy during their life under very harsh conditions caring for multiple offspring. In such contexts there would have been unique advantages for women in being able to garner social support from the community to boost female reproductive success. It is predictable they would have evolved strengths to elicit that support.

It is the asymmetry in how each sex maximises their reproductive success, that leads to the sex differences underpinning the empathy gap. Empathy from society is more advantageous to female reproductive success than it is for male reproductive success. This difference may also be the other major factor driving the sex difference that we see in neoteny. It is certainly the case that each sex benefits from eliciting social support from other people and there is certainly overlap. We are not talking about a black and white dichotomy. However there is a greater advantage for women in receiving social support and a greater advantage for men in being self-reliant in terms of reproductive fitness. This leads to sex differences developing where women have greater physical and psychological traits to elicit social support from society than men.

What Are The Biological Origins Of Gynocentrism?

The biological origins of gynocentrism do not lie in a difference in overall biological value between men and women. The root of gynocentrism lies in the difference between male and female reproductive strategies and the conflict that can arise when those two strategies oppose each other. Gynocentrism is an example of what is called sexual conflict in evolutionary biology. Sexual conflict is a phenomenon in which one sex deploys an antagonistic strategy to gain a reproductive fitness advantage at the expense of the other sex. The sexual cannibalism of the male spider being eaten by the female spider, is one example of sexual conflict in the animal kingdom. The sexual coercion or rape of females seen in many species and not just humans, is another example of sexual conflict.

Although it is important to acknowledge that there is a considerable degree of intersexual cooperation in our species, there is also to a certain extent a literal biological battle of the sexes underway in our society. Slogans like, “The Future Is Female” and articles like “Why Can’t We Hate Men?” say it all.

Gynocentrism primarily results from a pathological overexpression of the greater emotional predisposition society has to feel empathy for women relative to men. There are certainly other factors at play, but the overarching force at the core of gynocentrism is the gender empathy gap. Whilst the predisposition to feel greater empathy for women exists, this biological predisposition is not a biological inevitability on its own. Humans can and do have the capacity to control and override their emotional impulses. Impulse control centers in the brain such as the prefrontal cortex, allow people to act on their impulses and emotional drives in an intelligent and strategic way in respect of their social environment. Healthy people are not slaves to their impulses, only addicts are.

With that said, our underlying emotional biases can still make us vulnerable to well-executed social manipulation by others and can be exploited. Gynocentrism is the end result of the weaponisation of female hypoagency by specific and well-organised coalitions of women. Yes it is true, not all women are like that, but there are specific groups of women that have been and continue to be the architects and cheerleaders of gynocentrism. Like men, some women are good people and some women are bad people. The coalitions of women I am talking about, generally come in two flavours- Gynocentric Traditionalists and Feminists. Together with their male lackey’s, they have gradually undermined the relations between the sexes over the centuries and recent decades to the dysfunctional state we see today.

The emotional bias we have to care for women and protect them, has been exploited by these groups of women to manipulate society and specifically men over many centuries, to elevate women over men. Karen Straughan called it, “The Tyranny Of Female Hypoagency”. This antagonistic female sexual conflict strategy has over the course of many centuries, subverted our culture. Traditional gynocentric social narratives like romantic chivalry in past centuries and feminist narratives like patriarchy theory in the modern era, have been developed by these women whilst they have been in positions of authority, wealth and privilege. These women have used their positions of influence in the upper classes of society, in academia, the legal system, journalism and elsewhere, to spread these gynocentric narratives through our governments, courts, institutions, media and wider society.

The narratives promote an exaggerated image of female vulnerability and have been designed to exploit our emotional bias to feel empathy for women to further an agenda. These narratives have been deployed to gradually transform our culture over the decades and centuries, into the gynocentric culture we have today. It has been an ongoing process of cultural subversion from generation to generation, under the camouflage of female vulnerability. Our laws, our institutions, our social norms, our societal attitudes toward men and women and the account of our own history and knowledge of the sexes, have all been gradually warped and rewritten by these powerful gynocentric social narratives. Narratives that exploit our emotional bias to perceive women as helpless and as victims, in need of support and rescue from men and society.

The end goal of the underlying agenda is clear, once the crocodile tears are wiped away and the mask of female vulnerability and hypoagency is removed. Gynocentrism leads to a dysfunctional sexual feudal system, where women hold a privileged position in society in relation to men and eventually the complete dehumanisation of men. Gynocentrism is in essence female supremacy under the disguise of female vulnerability.

Nature abhors a vacuum. As with any imbalance, sooner or later it comes to an end. Gynocentrism or any form of sexual conflict for that matter, that grows to a point where it negatively impacts the overall reproductive fitness of a population, will be selected against. The mismatch between the marginalisation of men in gynocentric societies and female hypergamy, is a major factor causing the fertility rates of many countries to fall below replacement levels. There is no middle ground with gynocentrism and it inevitably grows to a point where it undermines the foundations of society. Gynocentrism is essentially a snake that eventually eats its own tail. It is a long process over many centuries of initial growth and then decline, but eventually gynocentric cultures destroy themselves. It is important to note that while the potential for sexual conflict in our species does exist, so does the potential to adopt a strategy of intersexual cooperation. Eventually functionally adaptive strategies for the species win out and any population that adopts the more optimal cooperative strategy and does not marginalise men, will eventually end up replacing the declining gynocentric societies around them.

There are many other forces at work that play into this gynocentric social manipulation and amplify its effect by orders of magnitude and I cannot address them all in this speech. I will be discussing the origins of gynocentrism further and what is driving it, in further detail in my future articles and also presenting possible solutions. People can learn more about the many flaws of reproductive reductionism and the myth of the golden uterus, by reading my articles on the subject on my website Theantigynocentrist.wordpress.com and in my lecture series on Gynocentrism.com, where I have gone into even greater detail on these topics than in this speech.

Humans are no more a gynocentric species, than we are a murderous species and a tribalistic and genocidal species. All behaviour and I do mean all behaviour, including murder, rape, tribalism and genocide, has a biological component and humans do have a biological predisposition for violence. We don't make biologically determinist justifications for murder, rape, racism, genocide or violence and we should not do so for gynocentrism either. Whilst we are hardly perfect beings, we do have some capacity to rise above the darker side of human nature and behave as better people.

The line women are more valuable because of their golden uterus and the line men are biologically disposable, are all lies. Lies that have been crafted and promoted in our culture to rationalise the exploitation of men and convince men to see themselves and other men as human doings with zero intrinsic worth, so they will accept their own exploitation. The red pill is subject to so much censorship and attacks by feminists and our gynocentric establishment, because it is the antidote to the gynocentric social narratives that pervade our society. They know the great threat the red pill poses to our gynocentric culture. The red pill disrupts the capacity of gynocentric social narratives to act as effective tools to socially manipulate the behaviour of men and society, by exposing them for what they are- Lies, well-crafted lies. So keep spreading the word and red pilling society!

I will finish this speech with a quote from Esther Vilar the author of The Manipulated Man, "What an advantage a man would have if only he realized the cold, clear thoughts running through a woman's head while her eyes are brimming with tears!"

Once manipulation is exposed for what it is, like a magic trick exposed, it loses its power. That is the power of the red pill. The power of the truth- Men are human beings, not human doings!

Of men…and frogs!

January 15, 2021 | by Dick Talos | Link | Original Link

The temperature goes up a few more degrees, but all is well in the world.

The bias in the laws of the United Kingdom, at a time of supposed sex equality, becomes more blatant by the day, but nobody seems to care. We see these laws affecting relationships, we see them affecting marriage, we see them affecting healthcare, we see them affecting almost everything else. It goes on. And will go on. It will go on forever…or, until one half of society has everything, and the other half has nothing. Or, until somebody steps up to the table and puts a stop to this constant appeasement. And stops governments giving in, and giving in, and giving in… In the name of God, go! Where have we heard that before?

As someone has said, women have now been weaponized. Laws are biased in their favor to such an extent that being involved with them at all for men is now positively dangerous. One would expect this in laws that were effectively written by feminist activists, and which, moreover, seem not to have been given sufficient scrutiny before being passed – something for which a male MP was vilified for demanding a short while back. "Unwanted or uninvited verbal contact or engagement…" How does a man know a verbal approach is going to be unwanted? "Considered to be by the subject, or observed by another party…" So, the subject might not wish to take matters further, but a feminist activist is free to punish the man on her behalf.

Marriage law has been gradually re-written over the past thirty years or so, to the point where only a wife has privileges and entitlements, and a husband only has obligations. If anything goes wrong, it is her comfort that comes first, even if it is she who has caused the breakdown. It is the husband who has to leave the home, even if he has paid for it. And the recent divorce law – brought in by a Conservative home secretary, of all people, and against public opinion – has given him even less time to find a new place. If a wife isn't happy with the great power successive governments have given her, she can allege domestic abuse. There is no risk in it for her if she is found to have lied at a later date; nothing at all will be done to her. The husband, meanwhile, will be removed from the home immediately, and be charged with a criminal offense if he tries to return. And, whereas she has cut him loose, and wants nothing more to do with him, his financial obligations to her remain.

I shall never forget watching Jess Phillips tell Philip Davies that he could have his "men's day" when women got equality in the house. It was good of her to admit it is she who decides what parliament allows, a fact borne out by the trembling male politicians in the room. They looked like Soviet apparatchiks at a Stalin speech day. At any moment, I expected one of them to clap. The problem with that was the others would have had to follow. And the problem with that would have been that none of them would have wanted to be seen to be the first to stop. So, it would have gone on for some time. Phillips, like her sisters, blames past male British cabinets for problems of the past. But previous British male cabinets did treat women rather well. They may have looked after their own landed interests first, but they didn't put women far behind. Every law they introduced had clauses to ensure women were not disadvantaged by it. The group they treated least well was the other males of the realm. The law banning women from working down mines was not to protect men's jobs but to prevent women from getting lung disease and being killed in roof falls. But we need coal! Okay, let men take the risk. And that is just one example of how most men came last.

British justice too has been eroded by a constant pandering by successive governments to feminist demands. The re-writing of the sex offenses act by Harman and her friends to ensure by any traditional definition of the word females cannot be charged with rape of males, is one such case. Next, was the removal of anonymity of males accused of rape. It is a potentially life-destroying allegation that can never be entirely lived down. But that was not enough. Next, the victim (actually accuser – this is an egregious example of feminist word-creep), was thought to find being seen in court so stressful that rules were changed to allow her to remain behind a screen. But that turned out to be too stressful too, so now it is planned to allow her to record her testimony. Will that be the end? No, of course, it won't. Nor will whatever arrangement follows. Governments have simply not woken up.

The latest – at least I think it is the latest – of these feminist-inspired laws – they are coming thick and fast right now – will protect just one half of the population, it seems. The misogyny law will protect women victims only. As regarding demands that this law should be gender-neutral, and protect both sexes, the Law Commission said, "T*here was little evidence to suggest that criminal targeting against men based on hostility or prejudice towards their gender is prevalent or causes additional harm."* I thought the call was "kill all men!" Not, "kill all women!" So, that's it, is it? The Law Commission has spoken. (How do they know, by the way? Was there a survey? If there was, I missed it.) Which, of course, is the same as saying there is little evidence that male breast cancer is prevalent, and so we should ignore it, and, presumably, not treat it. In any case, how would making this law gender-neutral and giving our men and boys the same protection as women and girls reduce the protection the Law Commission thinks the latter needs? It wouldn't, of course. What it would do is give our men and boys equal rights with women and girls – not a feminist aim – and possibly put the occasional hateful feminist at risk of arrest. That won't do, will it?

And how is the general male part of the population responding to this gradual erosion of their status, their safety and their rights? With equanimity, it seems. If it is aware of what is going on at all. Whilst only several hundred appear to be viewing the recent series of videos published by *J4MB (*The Justice for Men and Boys website*),* which cover the above issues at length, millions will pull up the sports results, and tens of thousands more will view the latest Drachinifels video, and engage in lengthy discussions about subjects of import such as the muzzle velocity of the Japanese eighteen-inch naval gun of World War Two.

The temperature of the water goes up, up, and up, and all is well in the world of frogs.

The Fallacy Of The Golden Uterus And The True Origins Of Gynocentrism (Part Two)

January 16, 2021 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

This is part two of a two part article, please see part one first before reading part two.

Some Further Remarks On Sexual Conflict

I do want to expand on a few points from my ICMI speech. Often people cite the sexual cannibalism of the female spider eating the male spider after mating as being evolutionary advantageous, as the male is described as a source of energy for the female and their offspring. This explanation is often used in the media with a combination of humour and derision directed at men, to set a frame in which sexual conflict can be seen as "natural" or justified when it is directed at the male of a species, with the unspoken implication that such a principle applies as well to human males.

There is an assumption buried within that explanation, that all of what is natural, must have been selected for by evolution in some way and thus be optimal or beneficial or have some evolutionary purpose for a species. Just because a trait or behaviour occurs in nature does not mean that it was selected for under natural selection and is biologically optimal or beneficial to the species or serves some function. Huntington's disease[3] is a classic example of a condition that occurs naturally in humans and is suboptimal under natural selection. Despite this Huntington's disease remains in the population after numerous generations, because enough people that carry the mutated variant of the huntingtin gene survive to reproduce. Just because sexual cannibalism occurs in nature, does not make it an optimal or beneficial strategy that is favoured by evolution. As Paul Elam and Peter Wright have discussed in Chasing The Dragon[4] and Slaying The Dragon[5], biology can express itself beyond its own evolutionary purpose and do so in a suboptimal way. Remember that the biology of any organism does not have to be perfect for their genes to be passed on, just good enough.

There are costs to sexual cannibalism such as reduced genetic variation in the population from fewer males and lowered probability of females finding a mate, especially in larger habitats. The males that are eaten, also incur a high cost from the elimination of all future mating prospects. This cost is also indirectly applicable as well to the female parent spiders of the males that are eaten. It does not automatically follow that sexual cannibalism is the optimal strategy in all instances or that eating males provides any net benefit to the species. In many instances the males and the species as a whole may be better off if males are not eaten from an evolutionary standpoint and natural selection may result in the males of the species developing adaptations to counter sexual cannibalism. In many instances a cooperative mating strategy may dominate, with sexual cannibalism confined to the fringes of the population.

I am not suggesting that the explanation that sexual cannibalism of males in various species of spider is always suboptimal, but conversely I don't think it follows that we should just automatically assume such phenomenon provide an evolutionary benefit simply because they occur in nature. Think of how much biological dysfunction exists in nature like cancer and how much of it has obviously no evolutionary benefit. Evolution is not intelligent design, biology is not perfect. Sometimes people go down a rabbit hole of looking for evolutionary justifications for why certain traits or aspects of biology exist, where there is no actual evolutionary benefit to find.

Another inconvenient fact often left out when discussing sexual cannibalism through a gynocentric lens, is the fact there are actually examples[6] of spiders where the males eat females and also numerous examples in the animal kingdom of sexual conflict where males are the aggressor. Instances of sexual conflict against males is no more of what "nature intended", than sexual conflict against females.

Like I discussed, it does not even hold that sexual cannibalism in spiders serves any special evolutionary purpose. Sexual cannibalism may actually be a by-product of extreme environmental conditions where female spiders are driven purely out of hunger and scarcity of resources to eat their mates. Even in humans under extreme enough conditions, there have been examples of cannibalism. No one would argue that cannibalism in humans is a specific evolved trait. It is merely an extreme manifestation of the survival instinct!

The existence of cannibalism in humans is incidental to the survival instinct and not something that natural selection has specifically selected for. The same may indeed be the case with female spiders eating their mates and vice versa. Whilst evolutionary explanations may be true, they are also difficult prove and may be wrong. Sexual cannibalism in spiders is hardly a phenomenon where scientists have actually proven beyond doubt, that it exists because of some evolutionary advantage in eating males to provide energy to the female spider and resulting offspring. Multiple explanations have been proposed on why sexual cannibalism takes place in certain species. It still all very much remains speculation at this stage.

Of course the gynocentric narrative on sexual cannibalism in spiders, leaves out the part that there are enormous differences between spiders and humans. The sexual size dimorphism which is at the root of sexual cannibalism in spiders, is reversed in humans where the male is bigger. Such facts are inconvenient to the gynocentric narrative you see, so it is not discussed in that way.

It is notable that we don't see such explanations like what we see with sexual cannibalism of male spiders being celebrated in our culture, when females are the victims of sexual conflict. Dominant males in an animal community that sexual coerce or rape their female mates, is also a form of sexual conflict. Despite arguments to the contrary, it could be argued using the same logic as the spider analogy, that there is an evolutionary benefit to such sexual coercion. I am not supporting or in any way condoning this, I am just walking people through the gynocentric logic of the spider analogy with the sexes reversed, so people can contrast the gynocentric bias at work when our culture appeals to biology for explanations on things.

So here is the logic in reverse- Dominant males that rise to the top of the male dominance hierarchy from intense male intrasexual competition, are very often the strongest and the fittest males and so have the highest genetic quality. Therefore whilst females may incur some cost from the sexual coercion of dominant males, the genetic benefit of females giving birth to the offspring of dominant males (which share the dominant male's high genetic quality) exceeds the cost. Perhaps this explains the popularity of 50 Shades Of Grey among women and the reported female sexual interest in male dominance![7]

Now if you find that logic questionable and the conclusions drawn offensive (again I am not supporting or condoning the logic), then I would ask you why it is that when this dynamic is reversed and we talk about female sexual antagonism directed at men (like the spider analogy), that there is no scrutiny or offense taken to the armchair evolutionary explanations given? That discrepancy is the gender empathy gap in action, that I was alluding to in the speech. We have one standard of concern for females and a lower standard of concern for males. In fact it has been shown[8] even in the relatively objective field of scientific research, that there is a clear bias against men when reporting sex differences that favour men in contrast to those that favour women. Only women it seems are allowed to have any biological advantage, for men it is taboo to report any male advantage no matter how trivial it might be.

Appealing to nature to justify behaviour as good or acceptable is what we call the naturalistic fallacy[9]. As I mentioned in the speech, murder, rape and genocide are all natural, that does not make them optimal for society or justifiable. Likewise running civilisation in such a way that we treat men as disposable and exploit them for women's benefit and appealing to nature to justify it, does not make it optimal or acceptable for society. In fact we can see the negative effects[10] already of what rampant gynocentrism is doing to our societies and it will only get worse as the consequences continue to accumulate at an ever-increasing rate. These societies are not replacing themselves and are rife with social problems as a result of marginalising men. Gynocentric societies are on a declining trajectory where they are on the track to eventually die out.

Some Further Remarks On Hunter-gatherer Societies And Survival

Another point that I wanted to address are claims suggesting that the survival of children is more contingent on women than on men in hunter-gatherer cultures. Such claims (and related claims) are questionable due to the simple reality we cannot directly observe what occurred in prehistoric times and as previously cited there is a gynocentric bias present unfortunately in the field of scientific research surrounding sex.

We cannot necessarily infer that modern hunter-gatherer communities adequately represent their prehistoric counterparts either, given the fact that one set of communities eventually developed into urbanised civilisation, while modern hunter-gatherer communities clearly did not. I am not making a judgement on any community being superior to another, I am simply pointing out there may be basic differences between prehistoric communities that transitioned into urbanised civilisation and modern-day hunter-gatherer communities that did not and that those differences may undermine making inferences that modern hunter-gatherer communities are a mirror of all past prehistoric communities. It is also worth considering that modern day hunter-gatherer communities undoubtedly have had their own cultural evolution over the last 12,000 years and may not necessarily resemble a mirror image of even their own past. I am not suggesting studies of current hunter-gatherer societies have no merit, I am suggesting caution in assuming what we observe in present hunter-gatherer societies in the modern day, perfectly translate to our prehistoric past.

With all of that said though, let us assume for a moment that the claim the survival of children in hunter-gather communities is more dependent on women is actually true. Is the survival of women not at least in part to some extent dependent on men? It is definitely the case that the survival of any community in prehistoric times is to a significant and substantive degree dependent on men. We know this by examining the evidence acquired from the remains of past human settlements and human bones. Tom Golden in his 2020 ICMI speech[11], discussed inter-tribal conflict and the role of men in protecting their communities.

In evolutionary scientist David Geary's book "Male, Female The Evolution Of Human Sex Differences"[12], he describes a mass grave found in South Dakota (A US state) of men, women and children from a tribe that was was wiped out whilst the village fortifications were being reconstructed. The construction of such fortifications would have been a physically demanding task and primarily a male role, along with the actual physical defence of the village from attack.

Once the male defenders of the village were wiped out and the defences were overwhelmed, most of the village was massacred and the few survivors that were spared which were primarily younger women, were taken for spoils. This is not an example of gynocentrism, the women that were spared were taken as captives to do whatever bidding their male captors decided. Women were also found in the mass grave with men and children. Presumably these were women that may have resisted the male attackers, or been unwanted and disposed of by the attackers. The males of the village were eliminated not because they were less valuable, but because they were a threat. As David Geary noted in the book, the capture of women and the murder of male rivals had nothing to do with female mate choice and is simply an example of male competition at its most intense.

The male role in protection is something that has being going on for as long as humans have been around. The remains of this settlement were dated around 1325 AD before Christopher Columbus arrived and there was any contact with civilisation. Some like to argue that hunter-gatherer communities were always peaceful and war came from male patriarchal civilisation, but there is a plethora of evidence suggesting otherwise.

Hunter-gather communities fought each other in our prehistoric past, long before civilisation and there is plenty of evidence to show this and the role men played in protecting their communities. Resources were scarce at times and fighting over access to water, food and territory was a frequent occurrence. We also see the same patterns of territorial aggression in primates and a wide range of animals. War and combat are simply organised human manifestations of the territorial aggression seen in all animals and in both males and females. Aggression of course is not the sole domain of men and Geary does go on in the book to describe female aggression in humans, which is far less physical and much more relational in nature.

There are plenty of other examples in our prehistoric record and from current hunter-gatherer communities, showing how dependent communities are on men to survive. Karen Straughan discussed in one of her videos the Inuit[13] and the importance that men have in those communities to hunt on the ice and keep everyone fed and alive. Karen also discussed more generally in the linked video in great detail, the biological evidence pointing to men's substantive role in community survival and in provision and protection in prehistoric times.

Whilst we cannot perfectly describe past hunter-gatherer societies, we can draw some basic conclusions from the anthropological record of human remains and settlements we have found and also by examining the evolved sexual dimorphism of our species. Men have played a significant and substantive role in the survival of their community and through that they have enhanced the survival of women and by extension have then indirectly contributed to the survival of children. Basic sex differences in size, physical strength and physical fitness and psychological sex differences such as greater male risk-taking behaviour, would have had implications for the survival of prehistoric communities, especially in harsh environments.

The reality is that while women did hunt and did significantly contribute to the food supply in certain environmental contexts, it is predominantly men that are better suited to undertaking tasks that require high levels of physical strength. It is also a fact that men by virtue of not directly caring for infants or becoming pregnant, are more available to undertake physically strenuous tasks like hunting. These are physical realities that become much more apparent in hunter-gatherer communities without the benefits of mechanisation, no matter how hard the social constructionists would wish otherwise. The harsher the environment, the more relevant the physical sexual dimorphism favouring men becomes to the survival of the community.

So whilst it may be apparent to some people in a direct sense that the survival of children may be more dependent on women than on men (and that is a highly questionable claim), if there is any truth to the claim it may only be true to a certain degree in specific environmental settings and only in a direct sense. If we consider all of the environmental settings humans have lived in across the planet and we consider the indirect role men have on the survival of children through their support of their community and the women in that community, the picture becomes a lot more equal than certain gynocentric elements within the field of sex difference research wish to accept.

Even if we ignore all of the evidence and the points that I have made and just automatically assume the survival of children is more dependent on women in a hunter-gatherer setting in all instances and in an overall sense, such claims do not scale to civilisation or the overall health of children in a modern setting. The statistics on the prospects of children without a father in our current modern societies, show just how important fathers are to raising healthy children in our modern social environment. There is a difference between just surviving and offspring surviving to become mentally and physically healthy and capable adults that reach their potential. There is also a big difference between the requirements on offspring to develop in a hunter-gatherer environment in comparison to that of modern society. Such consideration does not fit the gynocentric narrative. Instead we are meant to take seriously the argument by certain feminist ideologues, that having no father has little or no impact on children. We are meant to ignore all of the evidence[14] suggesting otherwise, while we watch the effects of fatherlessness play out in the society around us.

I want people to consider this next point very seriously and the implications it has for our Western societies. There has not been one advanced and fully developed civilisation or country on this planet that exists today or in the past, that has lasted centuries with widespread fatherlessness and marginalised men providing little or no contribution to the continuation of their communities. Not one. That should tell people something about how important men are. It has only been through harnessing the value that men provide, that civilisation has even emerged in the first place. It still remains a reality today that if men collectively walked off the job, our modern society would literally fall apart and descend into perpetual darkness (aside from the fires blazing everywhere at night). The statistics[15] bare out just how essential men are to keep our modern civilisation running and how dire the situation would be if men left civilisation entirely to women and walked away from it.

In Conclusion

None of what I have written in the speech or in these additional remarks or past writings, is intended to argue that men are superior to women or that all women are evil beings attempting to manipulate men every hour of the day. However we do now live in a gynocentric society that promotes the narrative that men have no value, are naturally inferior and disposable and that women are not capable of doing anything wrong or committing any violence, harm or evil in this world. We are living in a world filled with gynocentric delusions, which will eventually be our own underdoing as a society, because reality can and will eventually assert itself when everything eventually comes crashing down.

There needs to be some balance restored to our culture regarding how we consider men and women. Men do have value, enormous value and a great deal of that value is beyond just men's role in community survival. Women also have value and a great deal of that value has nothing to do with having a uterus. There is a darker side to men's nature and also a good side, but there is a darker side to women's nature as well as their good side. I think society can accept the reality both sexes have value and both sexes are human and are capable of doing bad things, without having a nervous breakdown!

Interview with Peter Wright on traditional vs. feminist gynocentrisms (and other topics)

◉VM: Hey Peter, thanks for agreeing to the interview.

◉VM: You are well known, as far as I can see, within the MRM for your advocacy against gynocentrism. You point out the aspects of society and the cultures of the world, historically and in the present day, that enable and promote gynocentrism in one way or another, and you run Gynocentrism.com which talks extensively on the subject and is basically the go-to source of content exposing gynocentrism. While you may not be the only one that talks critically of gynocentrism, you are among the very few that I can see that calls out that out on the traditionalist as well as the SJW side with the same vigor, and for the right reasons. Can you reflect on your experiences having confronted gynocentrism on both those fronts, and how have you have been received in the MRM for it?

►PW: In some ways confronting the feminist version of gynocentrism is easier than confronting its traditional counterpart, because feminists are more likely to admit to their plan of increasing the power of women — female empowerment as they like to call it.

Many traditionalists on the other hand tend to disguise their desire to grant women inflated status, but they work toward securing forms of gynocentric power no less than do feminists. In the traditionalist language that power is referred to as men 'putting her on a pedestal' – a phrase known by all, and an aim widely aspired to by traditionalists.

Both progressive and traditional gynocentrism aims to privilege women over men. Both are reliant on the damsel-in-distress narrative to harness chivalric supply, and the only thing that separates them is the typical list of privileges they aim to institute – ie.

typically a pampered housewife for the traditionalist, or have-it-all lifestyle for the progressive feminist.

These two gynocentrisms are essentially at war with each other over who deserves priority access to male chivalry, that magic ingredient needed for realizing gynocentric power. To that end, traditional and progressive gynocentrists have cultivated different dog-whistles to provoke chivalric behaviour from males: the traditional woman plays the demure, weak damsel in need of saving by a knight in shining armour, while the feminist plays the same victim role but is far more aggressive in her demand for chivalric redress. We could say that the same 'white knight' caters to these two variants of damsel – the demure damsel, and the aggressive damsel respectively.

These two gynocentrisms have their taproots in the codified gender roles of medieval Europe, in which, to quote philosopher Julia Kristeva, "Roles were assigned to woman and man: suzerain and vassal, with the lady offering up a 'distress' and the man offering a 'service.' "

So despite feminism positioning itself as a progressive new movement, its motive is remarkably traditional.

My rejection of gynocentrism as a default path has been met with resentment from both feminists and traditionalists, both of whom have counselled men to embrace more chivalry for the benefit of women. Fortunately, there's a segment of the men's movement that reasonably doubts, or outright rejects gynocentrism as a healthy basis for relationships between men and women, and likewise any appeals to chivalry are met with a reasonable scepticism by the same segment of men.

◉VM: You've had a few collaborations with Paul Elam – in particular the Chasing the Dragon talk, its follow-up Slaying the Dragon, and you are co-writers of Red Pill Psychology – Psychology for men in a gynocentric world and Chivalry – A Gynocentric Tradition. How did you come to know Paul and what brought about those collaborations?

►PW: Paul and I first exchanged in around 2007 while he was working at Men's News Daily, a popular news site for men, and I was working on expanding International Men's Day to reach a more global audience. We were discussing collaboration of some kind, but due to our busy schedules we let it slide.

A few years later, I think it was around the beginning of 2010, I joined as a contributor at A Voice for Men and soon after became an editor at the site. During the early years we had many discussions about men's issues and about the future of the men's movement, and it was clear then that Paul and I held similar perspectives on many issues – like chivalry, the problem of gynocentrism, and the need to create a new psychology for men. Our first collaborative articles explored those themes and seemed to come effortlessly, so much so that we continued co-writing and proof reading each other's articles until recent times when we've both taken a hiatus from writing generally. This has been a personal highlight in my men's advocacy work, and I'm pleased to see many of these collaborative pieces now collected in the two volumes you cited, which are proving popular with the red-pill audience.

◉VM: You and I are non-feminist, or anti-feminist, because we know feminism for what it is – a female supremacy ideology that is but one symptom of gynocentrism, not the be-all end-all of it. There have been some anti-feminists, however, that argue against it for blatantly gynocentric motives of their own that they aren't even trying to hide, such as something along the lines of: "Before feminism, we had it all and men provided for us like servants, and now we women have to work like men do, woe is me! Let's go back to the good old days and make things easy for us women!" What do you make of this variety of antifeminists? Is it traditionalism, or is it something different and possibly worse?

►PW: It is one kind of traditionalism, yes, but not the only kind. More specifically we might call this one 'gynocentric traditionalism' – a designation that acknowledges the existence of a non-gynocentric traditionalism.

The gynocentric traditionalist is at war with feminists because she realizes that chivalry is a finite resource, and if men are pouring out their assistance, protection, finances, pampering, and general deference to feminists, then the traditional gynocentric woman is likely to receive a far smaller serving of the available resource. It's a jealousy with a valid rationale.

Unlike traditionally unemployed and pedestalized "home-maker" wives, who appeared en-masse after the industrial revolution, I think it's important to acknowledge there were less gynocentric, or non-gynocentric women in pre-industrial societies throughout global history. Such women were more likely to be family-centered than self-centered, and they would labour alongside men as field workers, brewers, butchers, bakers and candle-stick makers, along with sharing a great deal of the care of children with other family members, including fathers, as contrasted to the more modern practice of mothers keeping children all to themselves, like chattel or bargaining chips, as post-industrial society has succeeded in establishing.

This last point of women's exaggerated control over children is blamed on contemporary feminist policies, whereas it was, in fact, equally the case for traditional families a century ago in both America and Britain, as we read in the writings of Ernest B. Bax… and I'd like to quote him on this point:

> "It has always in England been laid down as a fundamental law based on public policy, that the custody of children and their education is a duty incumbent on the father. It is said to be so fundamental that he is not permitted to waive his exercise of the right by pre-nuptial contract.
> Nevertheless, fundamental and necessary as the rule may be, the pro-feminist magistrates and judges of England are bent apparently on ignoring it with a light heart. They have not merely retained the old rule that the custody of infants of tender years remains with the mother until the child attains the age of seven. But they go much further than that. As a matter of course, and without considering in the least the interests of the child, or of society at large, they hand over the custody and education of all the children to the litigant wife, whenever she establishes –an easy thing to do– a flimsy and often farcical case of technical

> "cruelty."
>
> The victim husband has the privilege of maintaining the children as well as herself out of his property or earnings, and has the added consolation of knowing that they will brought up to detest him.
> Even in the extreme case where a deserting wife takes with her the children of the marriage, there is practically no redress for the husband. The police courts will not interfere. The divorce court, as already stated, is expensive to the point of prohibition. In any case the husband has to face a tribunal already prejudiced in favour of the female, and the attendant scandal of a process will probably have no other result than to injure his children and their future prospects in life. [The Legal Subjection of Men – published 1896].

This quote provides an example of what I mean by gynocentric traditionalism, the widespread practice of the privileging of women and disadvantaging men, which was taking place well before the popular rise of feminism. Advocates of traditionalism, of course, remain silent on these 'traditional' abuses of men.

◉VM: On a similar note, another argument for men's issues that I see a little too often for my taste is "men's issues affect women, too!" That's irked me – as if women and their dear white knights are supposed to respond, "Oh! I haven't cared about men's issues before but it affects women?? Now I ought to care!" To me that sounds every bit as gynocentric as anything else out there in the world – do you have any thoughts on that?

►PW: I think you hit the nail on the head, this is nothing more than a He-For-She reflex by people unlikely to ever care about the concept of He-For-He. If helping men is not somehow exploitable for the benefit of women, then these same people generally don't care.

People are more likely to care about men becoming disabled, getting cancer, losing a job, or getting killed at war because these things will affect women – as Hillary Clinton famously quipped when she said that women were "the primary casualties of war." But if a single, unmarried man becomes disabled, gets cancer, becomes unemployed or dies – then who gives a damn? No one.

Addressing the gender empathy gap is the big issue of our time and it requires all hands on deck, all genuine advocates of human decency, to bring attention to the problem.

◉VM: MGTOW is a varied umbrella with men whom I'd like to think come from various walks of life and different perspectives on why they are going their own way and what it means to them. Among those permutations, is there a precedent for a man going his own way to have an intimate relationship with a woman (or a man, if they are so inclined)? Also, is there a precedent for a woman going her own way as distinct from the feminist idea of the "independent woman who don't need no man", and if yes, what might that look like?

►PW: This is a good question, one that gets silenced in some MGTOW communities. I've never been good at conformity to orthodoxies however, and prefer to make up my own mind about what MGTOW stands for and to whom it might apply.

In its most basic definition MGTOW means male self-determination, nothing more, and nothing less. I, as a man going his own way, choose what I want to do with my life in preference to having my goals conferred or dictated by others, whether by the State, by women, or anyone else. In this sense MGTOW overlaps with libertarian principles.

Can a man in an intimate relationship with a woman 'go his own way'? I say yes, he certainly can, and I know many men who have been in relationships with the same woman for decades who've consistently done their 'own thing,' while being mindful that a relationship is by necessity a dynamic requiring some reasonable compromises on both sides – which these men choose to accept based on their own freewill and on their desire to be in a relationship. These same men would not hesitate to abandon the relationship if their partner's respect for his self-determination were lacking.

Married and single men can and often do have their self-determination thwarted in a number of ways. For example the married man might have his life upended in divorce court, and the single man might have his life legally upended by a false rape charge. In both cases, self-determination is stolen. So I tend to place some emphasis on the beliefs and convictions of the man in question to determine if he is striving to go his own way, and not only on his relationship status…. though I hasten to add that marriage in the modern age is an extremely risky undertaking.

Can a woman go her own way? Yes of course she can, though it would look different to the phoney "feminist" version you alluded to in your question. Some years ago I researched the phrases "go his own way" and "go her own way" through the last 200 years of literature. There were many instances of men going their own way, and likewise there were many descriptions of women who went their own way without undue reliance on men to make it happen for her. I know some women who fit that picture today, including (for example) Elizabeth Hobson of Justice for Men and Boys, who validly refers to herself as a woman going her own way.

Some MGTOW are possessive of the concept of 'going your own way,' claiming that women are trying to usurp a concept created by men. While I completely understand their fear of male initiatives being co-opted, they fail to realize this phrase has been in use for hundreds of years and belongs rather to the English language as a designation referring to anyone displaying self-determined behaviour.

Feminist overtures about women living self-determined lives doesn't pass the litmus test. Their pretentious displays of independence are too strongly reliant on the support of male labour, male deference and male servitude to provide the agency they crave, whereas true self-determination is more self-reliant in my reading of it.

◉VM: You are the one who directly introduced to me with the concept of the Puer archetype in describing my idea of the "inner boy" in a man, that which serves as the core and essence of what makes a man as well as his source of youthful energy and optimism. You've helped me distinguish that concept from the "inner child" concept in which one partner assumes the role of the helpless and often petulant child and the other assumes the parent role that becomes self-sacrificial. So, on the Puer – what is your take on the importance of the concept for men (and perhaps the equivalent Puella for women)?

That youthful, spontaneous potential is an essential ingredient of human happiness that we carry from cradle to grave, yes even in old men and old women. So it pains me to see this it disparaged in men as "Peter Pan Syndrome" or as a "failure to launch" just because men might like sport, or to play video games or other fun pastimes instead of being chained to the serious business of "growing up" ie. that path of ordered responsibility and of being in service to women and society. If you are not enslaved to serious responsibilities six-and-a-half days per week, say those critics of fun, with perhaps a half day allotted on Saturdays to watching sports on a TV screen, then you are little more than a "pathetic man baby" who needs to "man up" and start providing a lifestyle for a deserving female partner.

If I had the choice to get rid of just one phrase from the discourse about men, even from the most famous men's advocates, it would be 'failure to launch.' Launch into what, into slavery to others? Loss of self, and misery? No thanks. My advice for men and women is to enjoy some youthful spontaneity and playfulness till your dying day, and don't let wagging fingers and shaming language throw you off. Even in its more extreme forms, a failure to launch might represent a healthy response to an increasingly toxic world.

There are plenty of women showcasing the puella trait, the female-equivalent for the male puer. These are women, flirtatious and playful, who can laugh at themselves and at others, and who generally walk lightly through life with an air of 'Don't fence me in.'

But going back to the other archetype, that of the child – the needy, dependent, vulnerable child – I would say that unlike the puer impulse, it deserves to be constrained within adult relationships because it tends to become a drain on the other partner. Who wants to be in an adult relationship with a needy, petulant child? It's no secret that in marriages one partner often tends to play the needy child, and the other partner plays the responsible parent. And its women who have traditionally been encouraged to play the vulnerable, pampered child more than men – though I hasten to add some men get caught by this archetype too.

Esther Vilar writes masterfully about women's gravitation toward enacting the child archetype within marriage, a truth for which she became persecuted after daring to articulate it. Her book is titled 'The Manipulated Man' – written I think in 1971, and it remains as relevant today as when it was written.

◉VM: Narcissism is a big subject that comes when one critiques gynocentrism, and rightly so because of the vampiric, parasitic behaviour that is enabled and encouraged by any given gynocentric mindset. You are also strong in defense of the individual, celebrating the differences of masculine expression as well as praising the individualism of men and women. Do you have an idea of what are the key differences between individualism and narcissism?

►PW: This is a big subject and I'm no expert on the numerous variations of individualist philosophy. What I have noticed is that critics of the individualist path – whether it's based for example in libertarian thinking, Objectivism or Nietzschean philosophy – make the charge that individualism is synonymous with narcissism. That's a false equivalence, but they are correct in the sense that there's a potential for individualism to degrade into pathological narcissism, or alternatively for pathological narcissism to disguise itself behind an ethic of reasonable individualism.

Gynocentrism is one example pretending to represent individualism. It's a gendered version of narcissism that lacks respect for the individual sovereignty of others, particularly male others, and sets up its own individualism as exclusive – and it does so by actively excluding the individualism of others.

Narcissism of any kind operates as a social monologue, not a social dialogue. Narcissism lacks empathy for others, its inherently exploitative, and is demonstrated by an unrealistic sense of grandiosity that isn't based on commensurate achievements or merit. Individualism isn't necessarily any of those things.

So we can't claim that individualism and narcissism are equivalent. At best someone might mount an argument that narcissism is a pathological variant of individualism, a claim worthy of exploring. But it will never be correct to represent as 'narcissists' the majority of those who follow individualist philosophies.

◉VM: To what extent can we see gynocentrism mitigated in our human history to come? What would that look like, and is it something we have to constantly be vigilant about lest gynocentrism comes back around again?

►PW: There's obviously a biological component to gynocentrism, but I've always maintained that the gynocentric impulse has been wildly exaggerated, supersized by cultural forces that have exploited our biological tendencies. The cultural gynocentrism we have today has vastly overrun whatever evolutionary purposes it may once have had – it's now a runaway freight train leaving human destruction in its path.

On that basis I think there will be a correction. It has already begun. Based on the extreme gynocentrism we currently see at play, I expect to see an increase in bachelor movements such as those of Japan's Herbivore men, and more recently in the rise of 'men going their own way.' But while these movements ensure men's safety away from toxic human entanglements, which is an absolutely necessary short-term response, such bachelor and celibacy movements solve little in terms how to enjoy relationships that we humans are hardwired to participate in. What we need are some new 'maps of meaning,' as Jordan Peterson would phrase it, at least in the area of forming viable, long-term

Rather than appeals to traditionalism with its goal to pedestalise women, or on the other hand calls to embrace progressive feminism which also pedestalises women, we might in future discover new relationship models (or perhaps much older, pre-industrial revolution ones) that can lead us out of the impasse.

The certainty is that men and women will continue to form relationships, but they might gravitate more toward equitable relationships as contrasted with the faux equality proposed by feminists. This move would involve equality of value between men and women, based on libertarian-style principles. Those principles emphasize individual choice for each person of the relationship, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, and negotiated labour-sharing arrangements & agreements between partners. In a nutshell; freedom to choose, instead of conferred roles or duties.

This is precisely what Warren Farrell proposed when he talked of moving away from survival roles of the past, which he referred to as ‘Stage 1’ relationships, and moving instead toward what he called ‘Stage 2’ relationships which entail men and women sharing equal responsibility to earn money, clean house, enjoy time with children and so on, instead of being imprisoned in socially prescribed or conferred roles. It goes without saying that such roles are completely voluntary and the details negotiable. I agree with Farrell on this proposition, which offers a way out of the impasse and out of the destructive gender war that has raged on for too long unchecked.

Human societies are like fragile ecosystems where if one animal or plant becomes too dominant it can send the entire system into chaos and disintegration. Imbalances will always appear in human societies and we can only hope that if the current imbalance of extreme gynocentrism is downsized in the near future, perhaps as a result from men’s withdrawal of chivalry, our vigilance will ensure that it takes a long rest. Humans however are great at forgetting prior lessons, which allows any number of past maladies to come back and terrorise us.

Diagnosing Gynocentrism

When we discuss men's issues in the manosphere, the term "gynocentrism" is often attributed as the primary causal factor driving the marginalisation of men and boys in society. Understanding the nature of the force men are fighting, is a critically important step in developing effective strategies and possible solutions to the numerous issues men and boys are facing in society. Peter Wright at Gynocentrism.com[1], defines and describes gynocentrism and discusses its cultural origins and biological underpinnings on his website.

Gynocentrism manifests itself in relationships and the culture in many ways. However, this is not always obvious. One of the powerful characteristics of gynocentrism is how subtle it is and how easily gynocentric bigotry can be disguised and hidden from our perception. Society is complex and often there are a multitude of variables involved in any activity, practice or set of behaviours etc. Gynocentrism can blend in with these other variables and the complexity of society can help push it into the background of our perception.

The biological drivers of gynocentrism[2], also play a role in masking it from our perception. Gynocentrism is the product of superresponses to sexual and emotional superstimuli and these responses undoubtedly filter our perception, as well as produce the behaviours that give rise to gynocentrism. Intense cultural conditioning also plays a major role from cradle to grave, in training the brain to filter information through a gynocentric lens (the blue pill perspective). The gynocentric mobius strip is a readily observable social phenomenon.

As a result of these factors, there are examples in society where gynocentrism is obvious to many people (like radical feminism) and there are many examples where gynocentrism is not so obvious. There are also examples where an activity can be mistaken to be non-gynocentric and vice versa. It can often take years to train perception in adults to a point where gynocentrism can be readily identified (taking the red pill) and overcome the years of cultural conditioning and the acquired biological short circuits (the superresponses and positive feedback loops) that drive gynocentrism.

Gynocentrism is a slippery beast and defining it has been the subject of discussion in the manosphere (please see Paul Elam and Alison Tieman's talk on this subject linked here[3]). If we are to slay the gynocentric dragon, then we must first develop a refined definition of gynocentrism and diagnostic criteria for identifying it in society and relationships. It is important to define problems as precisely as possible, so we can develop effective targeted solutions. This article will be the first in a series of articles exploring the nature of gynocentrism.

In this article I will present a refined definition of gynocentrism and provide a simple set of diagnostic criteria for identifying it in society and relationships. I will provide practical examples of the operation of this definition and criteria, then discuss whether certain aspects of the culture are gynocentric and then describe a model of measuring the intensity of gynocentrism in the culture. It is my hope that this article and the following series of articles, will assist people in the manosphere in explaining what gynocentrism is to people unfamiliar with the concept and in relation to men's issues. Solving a social problem requires spreading an awareness of the problem and this in turn requires properly identifying what it is.

What Is Gynocentrism?

I define gynocentrism as the following: The set of elements of society and relationships that are directed by the intent to prioritise female well-being over male well-being, based solely or partly on the sex of the intended beneficiary(ies) being female and for which there are no equivalent efforts made to provide corresponding commensurate benefits to males.

I define well-being as the quality of the overall condition of the life of an individual or group, that is based on taking their mental and physical health and life satisfaction into consideration.

The diagnostic criteria that must be met for an element of society or relationships to be considered gynocentric are the following:

1. The element must be driven by the intent to prioritise female well-being over male well-being.
2. This intent must be solely or partly based on the sex of the intended beneficiary(ies) being female.
3. There must be no equivalent efforts made to provide commensurate benefits to males for instances where female well-being is prioritised over male well-being.

Evaluating an element of society or relationships against these three criteria, requires some investigation to confirm the intent driving it and whether that intent is based on the sex of the group or individual that is meant to benefit from it. Quite often this information is overtly virtue signalled (like policies advocating female hiring quotas or domestic violence campaigns). On other occasions it is not and gynocentrism has to be identified through careful observation of the element in question and through a process of elimination.

The core belief that gynocentrism is associated with is female superiority. It is also associated with female entitlement mentality[4]. Gynocentrism is a form of bigotry based on sex and is not a morally justifiable aspect of society or relationships. For those people that have doubts, please substitute "male" with black people and "female" with white people in the definition of gynocentrism, or simply reverse the sexes. Those individuals that appeal to nature to justify gynocentrism, should look up what a naturalistic fallacy is. We can appeal to nature to justify rape and that does not morally justify it or mean that we should accept it. Gynocentrism is not defensible and should not be normalised in the culture.

I called myself “theantigynocentrist” for this very reason and because I wanted to make it abundantly clear exactly what I am fighting against. Feminism is the political manifestation of gynocentrism and is just the tip of the iceberg of the problem I am standing up against. There are those that would prefer men just stop at feminism and not question anything beyond that. Heaven forbid men get the idea in their heads that they deserve to be treated fairly (The scene from Oliver Twist asking for more comes to mind. How dare men ask to be treated fairly! The horror.). Some so-called “antifeminists” are worried the gravy train of exploiting men might stop if men look beyond feminism and go to the root of the problem.

Armed with this refined definition of gynocentrism and the diagnostic criteria described earlier, it becomes possible to identify gynocentrism in society and relationships in a tangible way. What gynocentrism is and is not, can be illustrated with the following examples:

Example 1.

A man and a woman are both involved in a car accident. The woman is critically injured and at risk of death without immediate medical treatment and the man is walking around conscious with a few scratches and is in a stable condition. The woman is treated first.

This is not an example of gynocentrism. The paramedics prioritise the woman’s well-being over the man’s well-being, as the woman is objectively in greater need of immediate medical assistance and the man is not.

Example 2.

A man and a woman are both involved in a car accident. The man is critically injured and at risk of death without immediate medical treatment and the woman is walking around conscious with a few scratches and is in a stable condition. The woman is treated first, as the paramedics mutter women and children first.

This is gynocentrism. The paramedics prioritise the woman’s well-being over the man’s well-being, even though the man is objectively in greater need of immediate medical assistance.

Example 3.

A family celebrates Mother’s Day and then celebrates Father’s Day later in the same year.

This is not gynocentrism. There is a corresponding day for male parents.

Example 4.

An organisation celebrates International Women’s Day and does not celebrate International Men’s Day.

This is gynocentrism. There is no corresponding day of celebration for men at this organisation.

Example 5.

A company decides to implement a female hiring quota for their board that requires 50% of positions to be given to female candidates. The number of applicants is 90% male.

This is gynocentric. Female candidates are prioritised over male candidates and this is because they are female.

Example 6.

A company decides to implement a female hiring quota for their board that requires 50% of positions to be given to female candidates and 50% of positions to be given to male candidates. The number of applicants is 90% male.

This is gynocentric. Whilst men are given a corresponding benefit, this benefit is not commensurate with the benefit given to women. 90% of the applicants are male and yet only half of the positions are available to those men.

Example 7.

A company decides to implement a multifaceted policy to boost gender diversity on their board. The company develops a mentoring network for senior female managers to mentor younger women and offers them secondment opportunities in higher positions. An equivalent mentoring network is set up for men and the same secondment opportunities are offered. The company makes changes to provide equal amounts of maternity and paternity leave to male and female employees. Flexible work hours, subsidised childcare located at the workplace and the option to work remotely from home three days of the week, is provided to both male and female employees.

Whilst there might be other problems with the feasibility of this policy, it is not gynocentric. The intent driving this policy does not prioritise female well-being over male-wellbeing. The benefits given to women and men are balanced and the aim to prioritise gender diversity is not skewed in favour of either sex. However, the initiatives in this policy may increase female representation at senior managerial levels and have a flow on effect at board level.

Example 8.

A man and a woman with equal salary go out for dinner on a date. During the date the woman repeatedly makes it known they expect chivalry from the man. Despite desiring to pay half the bill, the man pays the entire bill to gain female approval and bows to the pressure to conform.

This is gynocentric. The woman’s well-being is prioritised over the man’s well-being because she is female.

Example 9.

A man and a woman with equal salary go out for dinner on a date. During the date the woman and the man chat and have a great relaxing time. The man has a generous character and enjoys giving gifts to people. Out of his own personal desire and generosity, he pays the entire bill. He feels very happy about this and suffers no detriment to his health and does not put his finances in jeopardy. The benefit to his well-being in his individual case, is commensurate with the benefit to the woman’s well-being.

This is not gynocentric. In this case the man is acting in an authentic manner that makes him happy and improves his well-being and his well-being is not given a secondary priority. Not all men will react the same way to the same situation. What may decrease one man's well-being, may actually increase another man's well-being. Men must be their authentic selves (provided they do not harm others, including themselves, unless in self-defence).

Example 10.

A man and a woman with equal salary go out for dinner on a date. During the date the woman and the man chat and have a great relaxing time. The man has a generous character and enjoys giving gifts to people. Out of his own personal desire and generosity he pays the entire bill. They go out on further dates to expensive restaurants and the man continues to pay the whole bill on each occasion. He also buys his date expensive jewellery every month. The man starts to fall into debt and starts to default on payments. He becomes stressed and depressed.

This is gynocentric. In this case the man may be getting some short-term satisfaction out of being so generous, but in general his life satisfaction and mental health are declining because of the growing debt he is accumulating. The net result is that his well-being (or the quality of the overall condition of his life) is in decline.

There is nuance to life and these examples demonstrate that there is nuance to gynocentrism. What may appear healthy on the surface may actually be unhealthy and what may appear an unhealthy behaviour to some people, may be actually healthy for that particular person. These examples illustrate why it becomes important to define concepts along lines that reflect what they are intended to describe. The central recurring principle driving the discussion facing men's issues is fairness.

Is it fair that men receive far lower funding for their health than women and yet have significantly shorter lifespans and generally have a higher disease burden? Is it fair that we have engineered our entire education systems to cater to the needs of girls over the needs of boys? Is it fair that women receive considerably shorter and more lenient sentences for committing exactly the same crimes as men, even after controlling for other variables? In many respects, men are simply demanding to be treated fairly and not to be treated in a discriminatory fashion simply for being male. Men are demanding an end to gynocentrism.

Is Chivalry Gynocentric?

As has been discussed on many occasions in the manosphere, gynocentrism has been around longer than modern feminism. Romantic chivalry[5] is often cited as an example of historical gynocentrism and indeed it is. But why? It is not the actions alone that pedestalise women, that make chivalry gynocentric. It is the fact that chivalry is also a series of socially enforced expectations that men are expected to live up to, whether they want to or not. Chivalry is a code of behaviour that is still part of our culture and enforced to some degree, even today.

What individual men personally desire to do is not taken into consideration and therefore their well-being is treated as secondary to female well-being. If some men desire on their own accord without social pressure, to do things like pay a bill for a dinner and if this makes them happy to a degree that their well-being benefits to the same degree as their female counterpart (provided it is not pathological like in example 10), then that is not gynocentric. What might make some men unhappy, may make other men happy and vice versa. This is a critically important distinction to make.

Chivalry is gynocentric because it puts men's wishes and their well-being secondary to women's. It is not the respectful and generous actions directed toward women on their own that define chivalry. It is theoretically possible for a small fraction of men to be generous toward women in relationships because they are women, with no reciprocal generosity shown by the women and yet objectively increase their own well-being to the same degree as their female counterpart. It is not likely, but it is possible (perhaps an example could be men into female domination, whatever floats their boat). One man's trash is another man's treasure. Who am I or anyone for that matter, to tell a man what is in his best interests unless I have clear objective factual evidence to the contrary? With that said, men should certainly decide for themselves, but not lie to themselves like in example 10.

To clarify this point further, if a man decides to be generous exclusively toward women and this selective behaviour extends beyond the relationship, then that is gynocentric even if his well-being objectively benefits to the same degree as the woman. He is placing the well-being of women above the well-being of men in his social sphere, because they are women and he is making no equivalent effort to provide commensurate generosity toward men. Even if he derives happiness from being exclusively generous toward women simply because they are female, the overall effect of his behaviour in society, is that women's well-being in his social sphere is elevated above men. He is contributing to gynocentrism, reinforcing gynocentric double standards and causing social harm.

Is Benevolent Sexism Gynocentric?

Feminists are often quick to rebut instances where supposed sexism benefits women and instead claim they actually hurt women. It is correct to point out that elements of society and relationships can bring both benefits and costs to women's well-being. Indeed, this was an important point in the discussion Paul Elam and Alison Tieman had about the nature of gynocentrism. To determine whether something is gynocentric, we must consider the impact on well-being in a holistic sense. That is why I defined well-being in an overall context. We also have to consider the intent behind the element of society or relationships in question, rather than just considering the outcome. That is why intent forms part of the refined definition of gynocentrism.

One could make a valid argument that female hiring quota's actually reduce female well-being[6] inevitably over the long term, or that protecting women at the cost of their freedom hurts women. However, the intent of such policies and practices is clearly to prioritise female well-being over male well-being. Intent matters. To borrow a line from feminists and flip it-Gynocentrism hurts women too.

Similarly, one could make the argument that taking only women off a sinking ship against their will because they are women (there actually were some women[7] that would not leave their husbands on the Titanic, even as officers tried to force them to do so), is an example of benevolent sexism. Whilst women may indeed experience great emotional distress from such practices, there is no question that the intent is to prioritise female well-being in an overall sense over male well-being and in this case save as many women as possible.

Are Traditional Relationships Gynocentric?

Like romantic chivalry, traditional relationships can be gynocentric. But are they always? If a man and a woman have a traditional division of labour and traditional roles and both the man and the woman's well-being are given equal priority and are both enhanced by the relationship to the same degree, then that is not gynocentric. If however the woman's well-being is prioritised over the man's well-being, then that is a gynocentric relationship. Traditional relationships can certainly be gynocentric, but not just simply because they are traditional. It is because they can be lopsided to elevate the well-being of women above the well-being of men. Please see this classic MGTOW video[8] on the subject of gynocentrism and traditional relationships and commensurate benefits by Barbarossa.

Can traditional relationships be balanced to benefit both male and female well-being? Yes. Provided men have the self-respect to demand it and women have the integrity and level of respect for men to accept nothing less. It is worth noting that a relationship does not have to be traditional to be gynocentric. Relationships where the female is the breadwinner, or where both partners work full-time, can be just as gynocentric and often even more so.

Is Male Disposability Always The Result Of Gynocentrism?

In different contexts in our society, male life and well-being is treated as disposable and in many instances gyoncentrism plays a role in diminishing the societal concern for male suffering. However, it is not the only factor that contributes to male disposability in society. Greed and the psychopathy of numerous tyrants and regimes can attest to that. Sometimes historical accounts of invading armies killing all of the men in a community and raping all of the women, is given as an example of gynocentrism.

Remember that intent matters. Are the actions of the invading armies driven by the intent to prioritise female well-being over male well-being, solely or partly on the basis of a group being female rather than male? In some instances that may indeed be the case and in other instances that may not be the case. An invading army may kill all of the men in a community because they want to remove the military threat of a counterattack, rather than simply because they are not female or because they want to prioritise female well-being. Female well-being may not be the priority they have in mind that is inspiring their actions, when they spare the women and then rape them. Human evil comes in

Gynocentrism is just one expression of evil, but it is not the only form of evil. Yes, real sexism against women and girls does exist. Female infanticide does happen in some societies on a significant scale and genocides of both men and women do occur. Some companies do carelessly produce products that leach endocrine disruptors that impair the health, development and onset of puberty, of not just boys, but girls as well.

The Gynocentrism Index

So far we have looked at gynocentrism at the micro level. The same definition of gynocentrism is also applicable at the macro level of society and entire nations. However, it is also useful at the macro level to develop metrics that quantify such concepts so we can measure and analyse them. We often hear about the so-called "gender inequality index"[9]. In this article I would like to propose a basic model for a gynocentrism index, that could be measured for each country or a given population just like the gender inequality index.

In our society gynocentrism manifests itself along five major dimensions between the sexes. These include the following:

The empathy gap– More concern is shown for females than for males[10]. Female interests, needs, wants, perspectives, happiness, safety, health, wealth and welfare etc is prioritised over the males. Entire government departments are set up to address these matters and billions of dollars spent on them. Even in education where women and girls are thriving relative to men and boys that are struggling, virtually all of the initiatives and policies in education are focused on supporting female learning and academic achievement.

The accountability gap– Females are held to a lower standard of accountability than males[11]. The sentencing gap between males and females[12] that commit the same crimes and after controlling for other variables, is six times greater[13] than the sentencing gap between black people and white people (yes you read that correctly). This lack of female accountability, is particularly pronounced when it comes to their behaviour toward males. Whilst there is a great social taboo toward males committing acts of physical and sexual violence against females, female physical and sexual violence against male victims is either dismissed or excused. A woman cutting off a man's penis[14] is even laughed about on national TV.

The reward for merit gap– Females receive more reward than men for the same merit or the same reward for less merit. A number of businesses and government organisations are implementing, or have implemented female hiring quotas and introduced lower entry standards exclusively for female applicants. Some businesses actually now pay women more superannuation[15], simply because they are women (yes you read that correctly- more super for women because they are female). Contrary to popular opinion, there is also evidence of discrimination in hiring favouring women in a number of instances[16], even in STEM fields[17].

The women are wonderful effect– Mainstream media, entertainment, ads, academia, schooling and politics, are constantly saturated with messages promoting female superiority and overt misandry[18]. Books and news articles like, "The End of Men: And The Rise of Women"[19] are abundant and are a daily feature in society. Boys in school are having particularly bad experiences with this phenomenon and I would encourage people to read this article[20] and watch this video[21] of the accounts of two boys experiencing this in school. This has been going on a long time. The women are wonderful effect is systemic in our society, culture and relationships and has profound impacts on how we perceive men and women and boys and girls and how we treat them.

Greater female in-group bias– Research has demonstrated[22] that women have an in-group bias that is 4.5 times stronger than men. Women show a bias favouring other women over men and men also show a deference to women. Men are "othered" in our gynocentric society. The female in-group bias is why millions of women will go on a "Women's march" on the street for 2 years in a row, simply because someone with a vagina did not become US President. It is also one of the key reasons why feminism has become such a powerful force in society. You may have heard the phrase, "Because I am a woman" given as some justification for gynocentric double standards and outright bigotry. You may have heard the phrase or come across the mentality, "Believe the woman" from the female metoo# mob and their white knights, that want to dispense with due process and the rule of law. That is gynocentrism and female in-group bias talking.

In gynocentric societies women are treated with more empathy, have less accountability, receive more reward for their efforts (if they put any effort in at all), are treated and spoken about with reverence as men's superiors or betters and women display a substantially stronger in-group bias than men do. These gaps are most likely correlated with each other. If women are treated with more empathy in a given society, then they will also be treated with less accountability, receive greater reward for their efforts and the women are wonderful effect and female in-group bias will be stronger.

These five dimensions can be measured. For example, we could measure the empathy gap by comparing the disparity in funding for men's health versus women's health after accounting for the death rate and disease burden. The accountability gap can be measured by looking at the sentencing gap between men and women, after controlling for relevant variables. The reward for effort gap could be measured by counting the number of affirmative action hiring programs that target female applicants to meet female hiring quotas. The women are wonderful effect could be measured by examining the number of instances in mainstream media and entertainment material that women are portrayed as or implied to be superior to men. The relative size of the female in-group bias, could be measured through existing psychological tools. These examples are by no means an exhaustive list. Numerous other sources of data could be added to this list and used in the analysis to calculate a gynocentrism index.

Once a proper and agreed upon scientific methodology, formula and model is developed to calculate a gynocentrism index from the data and a comprehensive amount of data is collected, then studies could be conducted. I have little doubt such studies would produce fascinating results if they were done. This is the sort of conceptual framework and analysis that is inevitably is going to be required to solve the huge problems facing men and boys. It would interesting to plot such a gynocentrism index against national IQ, national sex ratios (particularly the operational sex ratios), age and cultural demographics, population density, education levels, rates of fatherlessness, crime rate, GDP per capita, over time and even the gender inequality index.

As long as gynocentrism remains unanalysed and masked from society, then society will continue to rush towards the gynocentric abyss and an inevitable fempocalypse[23]. The first step in the process of solving a problem, is identifying that there is a problem and the second step is understanding precisely what that problem is. Gynocentrism is in many ways like a virus. The immune system of society has to be trained to identify the pathogen that is destroying it. Developing an effective vaccine requires identifying the antigens of the virus that trigger an immune response.

Developing a refined definition of gynocentrism, diagnostic criteria to screen for it and analytical methods of measuring and examining gynocentrism, are the first few steps in that process. The scientific method should form the basis of any research into this social phenomenon, if we are to develop an accurate model of the problem and design an effective solution from that model. Feminist ideology has given us numerous examples of what happens when facts, evidence and science are ignored. We should consider those examples as a warning of what not to do.

If any serious investigation and academic research is going to be made into gynocentrism, the scientific method will need to be restored in the social sciences at the universities (particularly in the psychological sciences) and the feminist ideological bloc that has taken them over will need to be removed. Substantial political, media and financial pressure will need to be applied on our universities to achieve this. So much of government policy, law, journalism, education, employment and industrial relations policies etc, is based on faulty feminist research coming from the social sciences of the universities. If the decay of academic research is not resolved, then society will need to collapse before it can return to a sustainable paradigm.

Men and boys are not an inferior group of people and are equally deserving of respect, empathy and love. Societies that do not accept that, do not deserve them.[24]

Where are the vigils?

January 26, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

Australia: Mother Katie Perinovic brutally murdered her children last week

Do you hear it? Quiet now. Listen. Surely there is a gnashing of teeth and loud voices are shouting the names of the departed as they gather, candles held aloft, to pay tribute to the innocent victims of a woman's violence?

Are they not condemning the actions of yet another woman whose rage or mood swings has led to the slaughter of society's most precious and vulnerable commodity?

No?

Open the newspaper. Has Clementine not been roused to take up her pen in righteous rage and wield it like a weapon as she eviscerates the culture which enables so many women to use violence as an answer to their problems?

Has Rosie wandered out onto her front porch to provide a comment on this latest atrocity?

No?

Are there no marches or vigils planned in the coming days? Is our community coming together and speaking out with one united voice, asking when our children will be safe from the violent proclivities of their mothers?

No?

I have noted the recent murders of children, men and women at the hands of females in recent weeks. I have also noted, not for the first time, the incredibly different tone our media uses when covering these horrific crimes.

We live in a lie.

I am tired of pretending there is any semblance of justice in our world.

Having witnessed the carnival of lies, hoaxes, censorship, propaganda, poisonous bigotry and rage which passes for politics in America and learning yet again that the truth is irrelevant when power is up for grabs, I turn to our own backyard and must acknowledge that things are no different down under.

I have made a conscious decision in recent weeks to pull back from the mainstream media. They lie and twist the truth on such a regular basis I will no longer watch the weather girl let alone their political commentary or coverage of violence in our community.

I will focus upon my beautiful wife, my children and grandchildren. I will read and listen to music. I will write. I will wander the streets when my prosthesis is ready and take photographs which please me.

I will breathe.

Talk with likeminded friends.

It is too hard to attempt to open the eyes of those who will not see. It is a hopeless task. Men and women simmering in a sickly stew of double standards and two-tiered justice. People are entirely ignorant about the utter contempt our society displays when the subject of men's pain, mistreatment and injustice is politely and ever so quietly raised by the few brave enough or stupid enough to point it out and say:

"Don't these people matter?"

"Why don't we care?"

Yet another woman murdered her three children in Melbourne this week. She then took her own life. A few weeks prior to this shocking event a woman burned a young married couple and their baby alive.

Last year three women burned their husbands alive but no one in Australia appears to know about these murders. They all occurred before the horrific murder of three children and their mother by the husband who then took his own life.

That incident was covered in numerous articles. Many bemoaned the suggestion that this was in any way an act of a mentally ill person.

Annie Blatchford is tired of these excuses when men explode into a violent rage.

She writes:

Again, as is often the way, the story was framed as an individual's battle with mental health rather than family violence.

Photographs of the victims were posted on an almost daily basis in all of our major newspapers and television hosts struggled to contain their breathless glee, aroused and excited by the fact that they had been handed another opportunity to defecate all over the men and boys of Australia.

Tom Meagher's fiancée was brutally murdered by a man as she walked alone down a Melbourne Street late one night. He wrote:

> "The monster myth perpetuates a comforting lack of self-awareness … we can > only move past violence when we recognise how it is enabled; by attributing it to the mental illness of a singular human being, we ignore its prevalence, its root causes, and the self-examination required to end the cycle."

Yet Tom does not seem concerned by the knee jerk response to female violence whether it is visited upon children or men. She (the killer) is immediately cast in the role of good woman overwhelmed. The woman in the preceding linked article who recently murdered five children before killing herself, used those very words to explain away her coldly calculated butchery. It wasn't her fault. Her selfish husband gave her no choice.

Good woman stretched to her limits.

Good woman pushed over the edge.

I've no doubt the response by many when and if they heard about the three men burned alive by their female partners a year ago was to turn to their friends and wonder what those men had done to push their women to such extreme action.

Once again, we are confronted with the astounding double standards in our media's reporting and our societal attitude to acts of violence by men as opposed to violence perpetrated by women.

The blanket of collective guilt is never thrown over all women. An individual woman commits a heinous crime and that is where it begins and ends, aside from a demand for more resources to support overwhelmed, mentally ill women.

When one man commits a crime, all men must pay the price. Always. We are abused and maligned from tv soap boxes, billboards, advertisements and by governments. We are told each one of us must take responsibility for the crime of one man.

Women nod in solemn, sisterly understanding. Men are the problem. Masculinity is a disease.

That is the unwritten law in Australia and every other western culture. We men bend over and take it more often than not.

I was out with a group of mates last week when a story broke. A mother and her three children found dead. The father is helping with enquiries.

I will be honest. My first response to such news these days is not to feel a wave of horror and then deep empathy and compassion for the murdered victims. It is usually a muttered expletive:

"Oh fuck me! Here we go again!"

It sounds selfish and callous. Perhaps it is, but I know who made me become that person. It is our filthy, manipulative, bigoted media which has simply been a tool of the left and feminists for years who carries responsibility for my blunted compassion.

I turned to a mate and said, "Brace yourself. This will be as much your responsibility as it is the bloke who did it." He rolled his eyes and nodded in silent agreement.

One early article in the major newspaper, The Australian, went in early with their framing of the husband. They said he was removed in handcuffs (Utterly false) and that he was helping the police with their inquiries (usually coded language for confessing to the crime.)

The following morning revealed the truth. The mother, in fact, had killed her three children before killing herself. The father was inconsolable and almost mute with grief.

You could see the salivating mob, moist and rabid, ready to hit those keyboards and organize the street marches, order boxes of candles, contact the usual suspects for their venomous take on this latest example of male toxicity and entitlement, suddenly being made aware that a woman had in fact done the deed.

I would have paid good money to have been a fly on the wall of Clementine Ford's hovel or Lisa Wilkinson's office. Rosie would have been warming up the vocal cords and practicing her best pained and disgusted expressions in the bathroom mirror.

Alas. Another woman! Goddam! Silence is the best response. Yes. Let's put it behind us, bury this inconvenient truth as quickly as possible.

It was fascinating to watch the way in which the story was presented and see how quickly it vanished from our newspapers and television screens.

There have been multiple murders of children and husbands by women in the past few years here in Australia. Too many to count.

Think of all of the rabidly righteous feminists who rush out their front door in a frenzy of man hating rage to condemn an entire gender for the deeds of one, often unbalanced, mentally sick individual.

Oh, the poor, innocent children! They wring their hands and bow their heads. The poor innocent children. Butchered as if they were the property of the man, something he owned and felt entitled to take with him. So typical of a privileged, arrogant man.

How disgusting.

But they are sick, twisted individuals. Every one of them. What kind of person only expresses their pain and grief over the murder of children when it is carried out by a man? What kind of demented creep measures the worth of a child's life by asking whether it was choked out, stabbed or burned alive by a person with male genitals?

What kind of demented individual has a very conditional sense of compassion?

I will tell you. Lisa Wilkinson. Rosie Batty. Clementine Ford.

There are many more, but these three damaged individuals lead the rage filled, poisonous mob.

An article did emerge a few days after this latest mother's blood thirsty rampage.

This article purported to be a balanced analysis of filicide.

It was nothing of the sort.

It was simply another hit piece which further tainted and diminished men while excusing and explaining with great sensitivity why some women hack , stab, burn and beat their helpless children.

Bettina summed it up well with her headline.

Men are bad, women are mad.

A woman commits the heinous crime of filicide because she has lost her mind. She is no longer the person she was. In a sense, the mother is still innocent of the bloodshed. Something took over and replaced the kind, friendly, generous soul we all knew and she cannot be held to account. She needs our help. Our compassion and love is required, not hate and condemnation.

Men, on the other hand kill out of spite. Men are in control of their faculties and simply want to hurt their partner. Men are vindictive and evil. Men are monsters.The statistics may suggest mothers kill their children at around the same if not at a higher rate than men, but don't be deceived. There is a chasm between the two modes of murder.

One is a cry for help or the action of an overwhelmed female, the other, the hideous, entitled, vicious brutality so frequently exhibited by angry men. Is there any other kind?

Women are never vindictive.

Women are never cruel.

Women don't hold grudges.

Women don't seek revenge.

Women are not violent.

Women are not spiteful.

I struggled to get through this disgusting attempt to somehow demonise men who kill their children whilst explaining away the same act by mothers. Here's a taste of the excrement you will be forced to swallow should you choose to read it.

On social media, some commentators on this latest case involving Katie Perinovic have been quick to criticise what is perceived as more sympathetic media coverage of women who kill their children. And for some, the fact women and men commit filicide in roughly equal numbers suggests that family violence has no gender.

How dare anyone suggest family violence is a human problem!

She is blatantly inferring that women do not partake in family violence by writing in a quite disgusted tone that some commentators have dared to suggest that women can and do commit family violence. There is nothing misguided, misleading, inaccurate or deceptive about this statement, yet this woman takes issue with it.

Perhaps the three men who were burned alive by their wives did bloody well deserve it!

This bloke was definitely asking for it. It said he and his wife had been involved in a petty argument a short time before his wife set him alight.

Why was the article on filicide published at this particular time?

Clearly, the feminist lobby is fully aware of the alarming frequency of mothers murdering their children and partners in our country. The last five years have been truly shocking. Mothers hacking, burning and drowning their beautiful children on an alarmingly regular basis.

Simply off the top of my head I can think of five or six cases where multiple groups of children have been murdered by their mums.

Bear in mind all of these murders have taken place in the last seven years and it is by no means a complete list. Yet still, we have domestic violence advertisements branding men the only threat to women and their children!

They had to spin the truth. Even if no-one was saying out loud what I am writing at this moment, one senses the community is not blind to what has been going on.

Let’s explain the difference between murder by a dad as opposed to murder by a mum, they say.

Yes.

Sure, the blood splattered walls and dismembered bodies look very much the same. The blade cuts painfully deep whether wielded by a man or woman. The flames cause the same excruciating agony regardless of the killer's gender. But the child should rest in peace knowing mummy plunged the dagger or lit that flame without malicious intent.

Here is yet another article demanding all men take responsibility for the violence of a tiny few. The author also repeats two demonstrable lies.

1. Men are overwhelmingly the perpetrators of violence against children.
2. Men perpetrate the violence experienced by 95% of all survivors of violence.

Read it for yourselves.

The fact is that men are overwhelmingly the perpetrators of violence against women, children and other men. Around 95 per cent of all survivors of violence report experiencing threats or physical and sexual assault from a male perpetrator.

Do these sick individuals literally pull these statistics from their backsides?

We had Australian Rules Footballers leading the charge to end male violence against children by painting their fingernails. Reflect on this for a moment.

This marketing tool has been created to end male violence against children.

Only male violence against children.

Imagine how the many dads who are still struggling to go on without their murdered children feel when they hear a charity condemning the violence men inflict on children. Such blatant hypocrisy and willful blindness is so absurd it can only be described as sheer madness.

I would love to ask the founder of this charity what he would have to say to the dads who now occupy homes devoid of their children's laughter, dads who enter an empty shell of a house when they return home from work each evening.

Would a man who began to campaign for an end to violence committed by redheaded amputees be any less insane?

It is an unfathomably loathsome, bigoted, deceitful, manipulative, bigoted and hateful attack on men. Given the plethora of cases of mothers slaughtering, abandoning and neglecting their children the people behind this shameful stunt cannot claim ignorance of the facts.

What is more disturbing is the endless queue of willing male idiots who step up, no questions asked, no personal research performed, no basic questions asked and gleefully join in the head kicking of their fellow man.

I said I had lost any of the final shreds of faith I once had in our institutions of power during the past four years. I won't elaborate for we are not meant to be political.

The truth is whatever the MSM chooses to tell you today and if they tell you the very opposite tomorrow then you just open up your gob and swallow it.

FBI. CIA. Supreme Court. The Vatican. The government. The media. The education System. Big Tech.

Lies, myths, censorship, cancellation, threats, violence, intimidation, mockery, calculated destruction of reputations. It is happening every day and many applaud it.

Feminism has led the way.

They created a two-tiered system of reporting long ago. They are the reason for our two-tiered justice system. Double standards? Yep.

And what are you going to do about it?

Feminism and our media are inextricably linked. They work together promoting big lies about masculinity and female oppression. They censor and stifle any attempt to speak the truth and always use the same tactics. Smear, threaten with violence, censor and cancel all opposition.

Just look at what Paul Elam and Bettina Arndt have endured. My dear friend Jasmin Newman was forced to leave her home because she dared to speak the truth about female violence. How ironic that the rabid feminists who tried to destroy her used the very threats of violence and intimidation Jas used to write about.

So, rest easy. The next time you hear of a mother who slaughters her family, be it eight, four or three children, her violence was female. She is not to be held to account. The children and the community should let that fact wash over them.

Perhaps that is why the candles were not lit, the human circles of solidarity, arms linked in a united protest not formed, the poised, poisonous pens placed back on the desktop, unused.

Female violence is not a thing to be decried or lamented.

It's simply different and no more needs to be said.

The Radical Feminist Deconstruction of Men

January 27, 2021 | by Gerald Schoenewolf, Ph.D. | Link | Original Link

Over the years, feminism has portrayed itself as a political moment that is working toward the goal of equality between men and women. But this is just its public relations angle. When you study feminist history for the last hundred years, you discover a trend not towards equality but towards inequality: putting down men and idealizing women.

There has always been an aspect of feminism, even in 19th Century Europe, of man-hatred. In 1949, Simone de Beauvoir, a French feminist, wrote about how women are subjected to "domestic slavery," by men. That phrase has echoed down to the present day, along with many others. Over time, there has been a concerted attempt to depict males and masculinity in a most unsavory way.

At the beginning of the second wave of feminism which began in the 1960s, feminists came up with new names for men. They were said to be sexists, male chauvinists and misogynists. Men were accused of being prejudiced against women, but women, according to these radical feminists, were not prejudiced against men. Feminists also began accusing men of terrorizing women by raping them, battering them and sexually abusing women and children, and they came up with statistics that seemed to prove there was an epidemic of male sex abuse. But when those statistics were checked out by objective sources they were shown to be gross exaggerations.

Next, feminists went a step further and insisted that males were born that way—that is, they were all innately toxic toward women. It was called "toxic masculinity." These accusations against men were combined with fierce emotional attacks on any man who attempted to defend men or to argue against such charges. Women would attack any man who tried to speak out, in any public forum, with strident, self-righteous anger, telling such a man that he was just a sexist who couldn't tolerate strong women. No man or woman was allowed to present another side without being severely punished.

From the 1960s until the present feminists have pressed Western governments to pass more than a hundred new laws favoring women and disfavoring men. These included, for example, the Hate Crimes Prevention Act of 2010, which stated that if a man killed a woman and it was determined that he hated women, his punishment would be greater than the punishment administered if a woman killed a man, for her hatred of men would be viewed as justified by male sexism against women.

In the meantime, the feminist movement was changing. In the beginning of the 20th Century most feminists were straight, white women. However, as the years passed, more and more lesbians joined the movement and eventually took over the National Organization of Women. By the turn of the century (2000), NOW was comprised of lesbian, transgender and black women. At this point the target of their anger became exclusively straight white males, and the influence of these women was so great that almost all of Western culture was now following their dictates.

Corporations such as Google required strict allegiance to feminist ideology and employees were asked to do training programs on how to be sensitive to women. Those who spoke out against this requirement, as James Damore did in 2017, were fired. Damore wrote an interoffice memo, calling the culture at Google an "ideological echo chamber", and stating that while discrimination exists, it is extreme to ascribe all disparities to oppression, and it is authoritarian to try to correct disparities through "reverse discrimination." His words were considered an abomination by Google. Even though feminism is almost totally prejudiced against men, no one is ever allowed to consider whether feminists or women are sexist. Indeed, over the last 100 years men have been substantially sensitized as to women's feelings and needs, and in actuality it is women who need to be trained to be more sensitive toward men.

As a psychoanalyst, I am interested in the psychodynamics of feminist politics. Freud wrote volumes about how the unconscious mind influences behavior, but in feminism one cannot find anything about the unconscious except in feminist analyses of white males, who are said to engage in microaggressions against women without being aware of it. Freud wrote that women develop unconscious envy of men, after discovering, as little girls, that males have a body part that they lack. In a paper in 1925, he said, "Now upon this penis envy follows that hostile embitterment displayed by women against men, never entirely absent in the relations between the sexes, the clearest indication of which are to be found in the writings and ambitions of 'emancipated' women."

Lesbians are the most prone to penis envy, due to an unresolved hated of their fathers, which is transferred to all men. One can see signs of this envy in their attempt to downgrade men and blame all the evils of humanity on masculinity. Phyllis Chesler codified this view in her book, Women and Madness (1972). At the bottom of this attempt is a competition with men; feminists want to be "the man," and they want to alienate all heterosexual men from the competition and take all nubile young women for themselves.

Over the years, feminism has become more radical. It calls itself "liberal" and "progressive," but in fact it has become fascist. We now live in a dystopian world that some have compared to the society described in the novel 1984, a world where not big brother but bit sister is watching. Basic freedoms, such as freedom of speech, that are essential to a healthy society have now been lost. Just as in all tyrannical societies, scientists are no longer allowed to look for the truth if that truth veers away from the accepted ideology.

Feminists continue to portray women as innocents who need to be protected from men, and unfortunately most people buy into that. This is the theme that has permeated most cultures since the beginning of history and it is deeply ingrained in the human psyche, and it might have been true at one time. However, today nothing could be further from the truth. Today, society needs to be protected from the relentless aggression of feminism.

I, along with many others, have attempted to warn about this problem for years, but to no avail. My most recent book, The Rise of Feminism: A Psychoanalyst Probes the Meaning of a Movement, has sold about 57 copies to date. By now, most everybody has been scared off of reading anything that diverges from the accepted view of feminists as saviors of female virtue and sanctity. They have been scared off of reading Freud, why should they read anything I write?

The terrorism of radical feminism has produced an automatic reflex by almost everybody to avoid taking in any information that goes counter to feminist ideology. Indeed, as they read this article, many readers will likely feel fear or revulsion and will want to ignore it or perhaps even silence the author as someone whose thinking is dangerous.

In reality, feminists are not saviors. Feminism is perhaps the most harmful political movement that has ever plagued American society, and feminists are the most disturbed human beings ever to inhabit it. Most people who are disturbed go into therapy to work through the misconceptions that prevent them from actualizing themselves. Radical feminists—and particularly radical lesbians—have instead projected their inner disturbance and taken it out on society.

The Maternal Preference

Contrary to popular belief, there was never a time in American history when courts treated children as the "property" of their fathers so that mothers had to wage a decades-long Equal Rights campaign to win the right to have the custody of their own children. As explained in my book, The History of Custody Law, whatever the case may have been in other countries, American judges were applying the "best interests of children" standard to decide custody as early as 1804.

Sometimes an early nineteenth century judge even went so far as to chastise an attorney who tried to put forward a "father's rights" argument instead of a "best interests" argument. The truth is that America began by deciding custody on the basis of morality and marital fault. The movement that occurred in the nineteenth century was from that to a near-absolute preference for placing children in the sole custody of their mothers. That judicial predilection has come to be known as the maternal preference doctrine.

The maternal preference that was established in the nineteenth century continued to be the principal standard of decision in custody cases throughout most of the twentieth century.

"It is universally recognized that the mother is the natural custodian of her young. Accordingly, the mother is ordinarily awarded the custody of children of tender age, especially girls, unless it is clearly shown that she is not a fit and proper person."[1] Some jurisdictions codified it.[2] In others, courts applied a judicially-created presumption that maternal sole custody is in every child's best interests.

In all states, it was a firmly established rule of law throughout most of the twentieth century that the mother was entitled to custody of the children in a divorce or separation unless she was proven to be unfit to parent. “The mother of an illegitimate child is entitled to its custody unless she be unfit therefore. And the same rule as to custody of legitimate children is applied to the custody of illegitimate children, and the courts are controlled and actuated by the same considerations.”[3] As late as 1976, American Law Reports reported that “the vast majority of the jurisdictions continue to follow” the maternal preference, viewing the mother as the “natural custodian of her young” because “her love for her child is irreplaceable.”[4] Judges believed fathers either had no love for their children or whatever love they had was replaceable.

Prior to the 1980’s, judges simply assumed that mothers were imbued with a natural instinct for child-rearing, and that this instinct was lacking in fathers. Courts explained their refusal to grant custody to fathers this way: “To deprive [a] child of the society, companionship and the instinctive and natural maternal love of her mother … would hardly be to the interests of the child.”[5]

Sometimes courts characterized the mother-child bond as “sacred.” [6] The father-child bond was not. As the Wisconsin Supreme Court explained:

> [No father’s love] can be an adequate substitute for mother love – for that constant ministration required during the period of nurture that only a mother can give because in her alone is duty swallowed up in desire; in her alone is service expressed in terms of love.[7]

In 1972 the Maryland Court of Appeals candidly expressed its bias in favor of mothers in the following terms:

> The maternal tie is so primordial that it should not be lightly severed or attenuated. The appreciation of the visceral bond between mother and child will always be placed upon the balance scales, and all else being equal or nearly so, will tilt them.[8]

From article of faith to rule of reason

In 1973, Joseph Goldstein and Albert Solnit teamed up with Sigmund Freud’s daughter, Anna Freud, to publish a book called Beyond the Best Interests of the Child.[9] It espoused a psychoanalytic approach to determining what is in a child’s best interests, one that relied heavily on Sigmund Freud’s psychoanalytic theories and John Bowlby’s attachment theory, which also was grounded in Freudian theory.

Freud and her colleagues observed that an infant develops a psychological attachment to an adult who is personally and emotionally involved with him. They theorized that the attachment consisted of the baby’s superimposition of its libidinal interests on the events of bodily care (feeding and diaper-changing, for example.) They postulated that because of this early attachment, it is vitally important to a child’s psychological well-being for this first bond to remain uninterrupted.

> Such primitive and tenuous first attachments form the base from which any further relationships develop. What the child brings to them next are no longer only his needs for body comfort and gratification but his emotional demands for affection, companionship, and stimulating intimacy. Where these are answered reliably and regularly, the child-parent relationship becomes firm, with immensely productive effects on the child's intellectual and social development.[10]

"Unlike adults, who are generally capable of maintaining positive emotional ties with a number of different individuals," they asserted, "Children lack the capacity to do so."[11] Since mothers are the ones who are biologically equipped to nurse their babies, it is easy to see how Freud's theoretical framework could have been thought to support a preference for making awards of sole custody to mothers.

The fly in the ointment of course, is that it is not necessarily true that the mother is the one upon whom the child superimposes its libido in every case. If a particular father does a greater share of the feeding, diapering and comforting of the baby than the mother, then the theory would support a preference for making an award of sole custody to the father rather than the mother. The theory is not sufficient, by itself, to support a maternal preference or presumption specifically in favor of mothers.

Moreover, there was no basis for Freud's assumptions that children are incapable of forming psychological attachments to more than one person, much less that multiple attachments are detrimental to a developing child's psychological health. In fact, available empirical evidence contradicted those assumptions. For example, researchers H. Rudolph Schaffer and Peggy E. Emerson found that from birth to three months of age, babies respond and attach equally to any caregiver; between four and nine months, a baby tends to have a primary attachment to one person, but also maintains secondary attachments to others; and that by nine months babies form multiple attachments. In addition, they found that attachment correlates closely with the person who responds most accurately to the baby's needs and desires, not the person who spends the most time with the baby. Further, they reported that at eighteen months, a child's main attachment figure was the mother for only about half of the children studied, and the father was the main attachment figure for nearly all of the rest. Finally – and contrary to Freud's libidinal-superimposition theory — they found that the most important factor in forming attachments is not who feeds and diapers a child, but who plays and communicates with her.[12]

Nevertheless, late-twentieth century judges, custody evaluators, and family law policy-makers increasingly cited Freud's theory, as expounded in Beyond the Best Interests of the Child, as the justification for their preference for maternal sole custody, and for permitting children to have only very brief periods of visitation with their fathers.[13] By the end of the century, Freudian attachment theory had supplanted both God and maternal instinct as the doctrinal basis for the judicial preference for mothers.

The maternal preference was never absolute. A father could rebut the presumption that custody should be awarded to the mother by proving that she was unfit to be a parent. Courts construed the concept of parental unfitness very narrowly when considering the fitness of a mother to parent, though. The double standard they had developed in this respect in the nineteenth century continued into the twentieth.

A father's insolvency or poverty was sufficient to support a finding of his unfitness for custody. In Bryant v. Dukehart,[14] the mother died and the trial court, instead of leaving the children in the custody of their father, awarded them to the guardian the mother had appointed in her will. Acknowledging that the surviving parent normally has a right to custody of the couple's children when one of the parents dies, the appellate court nevertheless affirmed the award of custody to the guardian rather than the father. In support of its decision, the court cited the fact that the father had entered into a lump-sum child support settlement at the time of the parties' divorce. The court held that a father's attempt to enter into a one-time lump-sum settlement of his child support obligation at the time of the divorce evidenced an intention to evade the obligation of a father to support women and children financially with periodic payments of money throughout their lives. That intention, the court declared, rendered him unfit to be a parent.

A mother's insolvency or poverty, by contrast, was deemed irrelevant to her fitness to parent. If a woman was not able to support her child, the courts reasoned that her financial difficulties could be ameliorated by ordering the father to pay alimony and child support to her. So long as she was not habitually drunk, did not suffer from a serious mental illness, and was not guilty of severe physical child abuse, a mother would be considered sufficiently fit for child-raising.[15]

In most states, a mother's commission of adultery would not support a finding the she was unfit to parent. A few states did treat adultery or other marital misconduct as evidence of parental unfitness.[16] Even in these states, though, a mother's termination of the adulterous relationship sufficed to restore her to full fitness.[17]

Other courts applied a more general double standard. These courts treated a father's commission of adultery, desertion or other marital misconduct as conclusive evidence of his unfitness to parent, but held that a mother's commission of these kinds of things did not necessarily render her unfit to parent, especially if the custody of a daughter, a disabled or unhealthy child, or a young child, was at stake. To these courts, the tender years doctrine overrode the presumption of parental unfitness that otherwise would arise upon proof of marital fault.

In most states, the fact that the mother was the one who was at fault for the divorce did not prevent a court from awarding her custody of the children, no matter how egregious her behavior had been. In Crabtree v. Crabtree,[18] the wife had cut a five-inch slit in her husband's throat with a razor blade, intending to kill him, and then chased him down and stabbed him again as he was running away. Upon his release from the hospital, he petitioned for divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty. The court found that the wife's attempt to kill him was not justified, her reason apparently having been simply her displeasure with his “sullen” attitude, and her anger at him for trying to get away from her. The court found that he had not been guilty of any wrongdoing, so he was indeed entitled to a divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty. The court then proceeded to award custody of the children to the wife because she was their mother.

Have you noticed everyone attempting to nail down the one true definition of masculinity? Its a bit like arguing which is the One True God. Likewise, with every earnestly researched and precisely crafted definition of masculinity, a broad acceptance of any single definition seems out of reach.

If you have an hour to waste on the internet you can discover hundreds of competing definitions of masculinity, each one vastly different, which raises the question of why we can’t agree on a singular, universal statement. Why the ongoing lack of agreement, even within the men’s movement which sets out to champion that very topic of “men” and “masculinity”?

There’s no doubting that underlying physiological structures are shared among all males, the base unity of masculine potentials: a Y chromosome, androgens, muscles and penises. But this tells us little about how individual men will behave in the real world – and behave individually, and variably, they certainly do.

Defining masculinity appears doomed because we tend to rely on singular expressions of it – and singular definitions likewise follow; “masculinity is to be interested in things, not faces” “masculinity is striving for status,” “masculinity is to be more rational and less emotional” (etc.). Are some men like this? sure. Are all men like that? Hell no – far from it. And, naturally, in response to such monocentric definitions the disagreements come lightening fast, with detractors claiming that masculinity is something far more, or something other, than the reductive definition offered.

When we seek singular stereotypes (whether they be based on some example of a traditional male social role, or on some author's view such as "the way of men," on singular evopsyche fantasies, or on singular fixations on testosterone as the whole picture) – in such mono-models we will never feel settled on the question of masculinity because there are too many outliers from whatever singular definition we've chosen.

Obviously masculinity is more than one thing – more than testosterone, more than intelligence, more than muscle mass, more than status-seeking, and more than a powerful urge to have sex and reproduce. Its more than the sum total of these things, and individual men's expression of them will widely vary. On that basis a plural understanding of masculinity appears to be the only way to save the concept, though I don't for a second subscribe to feminist ideas of 'masculinities' with their convoluted and unscientific hierarchies of "good" and "bad" instances of masculinity.

Viewing masculinity as plural can be as simple as returning to ancient Greek culture, or to any other classical culture, or even Bible-based cultures for that matter in which varieties of masculine styles are showcased. The Greeks for example had many gods, each expressing a different archetypal face of masculinity. Those expressions ranged from effeminate Dionysus to macho Ares, from instinctual Pan to the ordered and intellectual God Apollo. There is Zeus and his concerns for leadership and hierarchy, and Hephaestus with his labor consciousness, and so on and so forth.

Instances of masculinity, never all seen together in one character, each god or man tending to specialise in one way or another.

It might be argued that because feminists have seized the term masculinities and subsequently twisted the concept into perverted, misandric typologies, that we should shy away from plurality and stick instead with the traditional idea of a masculine singularity – a kind of Vitruvian man who displays all masculine behaviours at once. That'll teach those femmos!

But this defensive retreat from feminist dominance over the gender discussion is a needless one that throws out the baby with the bathwater. That retreat avoids forthright celebration of male plurality and leads not to better understanding of various masculine dimensions of behaviour, but rather to singular and often reductive definitions that few men can relate to. Furthermore, insisting (as some have) that many expressions of masculinity can be accounted for within a singular definition of masculinity hasn't helped to provide an agreed definition thus far, so why would we believe it can do so in future? Fighting over the One True Definition rages on.

Nailing down a singular definition of masculinity that everyone will agree with reminds increasingly of Sisyphus rolling his boulder up a hill, only to have it roll back down to the bottom before he starts rolling a new definition up the hill – over and over ad infinitum. Isn't the definition of insanity that of repeating the same process over and over but expecting a different outcome?

This is why personally I'm an advocate of classical models over modern monocentric ones – people relate to them, and tend to agree with them.

Feminists can never own the concept of masculine variety, even if they have seized on the plural masculinities. Ironically, their attacks on masculinity tend to be one-dimensional caricatures, and when they do get around to exploring plurality of male expression, they tend to make value hierarchies out of the different masculinities, dividing them into good and evil according to arbitrary misandric criteria. For example the more typically effeminate male = good, and the less typically effeminate = bad. This is why their attempt at a plurality of masculinities is junk science and why we men are turned off from celebrating our very real diversity – ie. even though its a fact of life, it has been poisoned with needless ideology.

The word masculinities has been around for at least a few hundred years, referring in the 1800s to any behaviors deemed a departure from the narrowly assigned gender roles of the day, or alternatively to any male behaviors considered inappropriate for polite society. Feminist activists from the gender studies world revived the word during the 1980s and 1990s, basically reaffirming the practice of deeming some masculinities toxic (eg. "hegemonic masculinities" – R. Connell)[1] and others as non-toxic.

One academic, Eric Anderson, who was embedded in the scene during that period of "problematizing" masculinity, broke ranks with the obsessive pathologizing narratives and emphasised rather that men of different styles can and are forming what he calls "inclusive masculinities."[2] This approach admits that men are more accepting, or at minimum more tolerant of differences than we were led to believe by the misandric character assassins Robert Connell, Michael Messner or Michael Kimmel et.al who portrayed the vast majority of men as ruthlessly intolerant.

This approach, celebrating masculine variety, is not new to readers here. In fact A Voice for Men has honoured the very plurality I'm describing, and it has done so consistently for over a decade. Men, strong and weak, stoic or sensitive, physical or intellectual, gay, straight or transgender….. we've demonstrated inclusive masculinity from the outset. This article serves as a reminder of the importance of those values, while introducing the concept of masculine variety to new readers.

When it comes to terminology, we need not rest only on the loaded term masculinities. Well before Connell and his henchpersons began to discriminate and denigrate so many examples of masculinity, the Jungian and archetypal psychologists already viewed men in terms of masculine variety, and they didn't apply any of the familiar pathologizing narratives – they simply referred to them as male archetypes. For example, the Archetypal Psychologist Adolf Guggenbuhl-Craig wrote the following statement in the year 1976, which is long before sociology got onboard with its plurality of masculinities:

> "It should be clear that there is not only one masculine archetype and one feminine archetype. There are dozens, if not hundreds, of feminine and masculine archetypes. Certainly there are many more of them than we usually imagine. But not all archetypes are dominant at a particular period in the life of an individual. Moreover, every historical epoch has its dominant masculine and feminine archetypes. Women and men are determined in their sexual identities > and behavior by only a select number of archetypes.

> Behavior is determined only by those patterns that are momentarily dominant in the collective psyche. This leads to a grotesque but understandable error: the archetypes that dominate masculine and feminine behavior in a particular time come to be understood as the masculine and feminine archetypes. And from this limited number of archetypes it is decided what "masculinity" and "femininity" are. This misunderstanding has led, for example, to the assumption in Jungian psychology that masculinity is identical with Logos, and femininity with Eros. It is assumed that the essence of femininity is personal, related to one's fellow man, passive, masochistic, and that the essence of masculinity is abstract, intellectual, aggressive, sadistic, active, etc. This naïve assertion could have been made only because the masculine and feminine archetypes that were dominant at that time and in that culture were understood as the only valid ones."[3]

A contrast between feminist and archetypalist views is that the latter admits that archetypal styles arise from biology even if they are socially manipulated; that they are not socially conferred onto 'blank slates' by society, as some sociologists might view it. Our biology-based archetypes may lay dormant if not facilitated by culture, or they may arise at certain stages and phases of life, and of course we are each born with our peculiar masculine predilections, or style, that may not be the lot of the next man. Despite that complexity, biology remains a fundamental factor in the theory of archetypes – and yes, environment remains important too.

While the mythopoetry movement of the 1980-90s emphasised singular masculine archetypes, such as Robert Bly's Wild Man,[4] the movement also tended to follow the Jungian tradition of honouring a variety of male archetypes and expressions. For those who are new to the men's movement, it might be worth studying this aspect of the mythopoetic tradition to help you avoid the pitfalls of an overly singular view of masculinity.

So to finish this article, let me leave you with a playful overview of male archetypes in Greek Myth, compiled by archetypalist Greta Aurora. While her descriptions of various male archetypes are not the last word on any of the characters mentioned, they do provide an example of seeing males in their individuality.

Ultimately its a personal choice whether to see masculinity as one or many, or as both, but in my experience an overemphasis on 'the one' tends always to swallow the many, and in the process we lose too much.

My son doesn’t want to be a man

February 28, 2021 | by Ruth Nyhus | Link | Original Link

If you’d told me three years ago I’d be writing about estrogen and castration, I would have called you crazy. This was never something on my radar. My son was a typical kid, for the most part. He played with Legos, Pokémon and Minecraft. He played three different sports per year; he went camping, backpacking and fishing. He was a regular, outdoorsy kind of boy.

Nor was there anything unusual about my family. My husband is the breadwinner. He’s a present father figure, and always has been. His relationship with my son is very close, just like mine. Everyone admired how hands-on a father he was, completely engaged with everything my son was doing. We worked really hard to create a functional family, and we did.

Sex changes were things that other people did. Guys who were always different in some way. Guys who had a traumatic childhood. Guys who were super-feminine. My son enjoyed being a boy, and I never once thought he might be gay. And he isn’t gay: in fact, he has a girlfriend. There were never any signs of anything unusual about the way he saw himself. The whole thing came out of nowhere.

As soon as he started high school, he stopped hanging out with his friend group from middle school, and would not tell us why. That was when he started to withdraw. He became defiant towards both of us. He wouldn’t explain what was going on for him, or why he’d gotten so angry and disrespectful. We chalked it up to being a teenager.

Then came the announcement. He said he was really a girl. He wanted to take puberty blockers and estrogen immediately. He wanted breasts rather than a normal male chest. And he wanted a vagina. None of it made any sense. My husband and I were both in shock. Why would such a regular boy, from such a regular family, want to do that to himself?

It didn't take long to answer that question. As soon as we got to the gender clinic we were referred to, I realized that the kids in my son's generation are being pushed into thinking of themselves as transgender, even if there's no basis to it at all. I thought that they would assess him, and talk him out of it. But it was a one-way street. As soon as a boy says he thinks he's a girl, he's on the path to transition.

It wasn't just the clinic. The more I looked into it, the more I learned that his school was obsessed with talking about gender, and celebrating boys who say that they're girls, even though they're clearly not. As soon as a kid comes out as trans, there's nothing but affirmation. They get attention. They're told how brave they are. No one ever questions the absurdity of it. These children are teenagers, or even younger.

Then there was the internet. We were careful parents. All the other parents were giving their kids cell phones in elementary or middle school. We waited until our son was in high school. We weren't the kind of family who used the computer as a babysitter. But it turned out that adults on the internet were grooming vulnerable kids. All it took was a Google search, and he was surrounded by voices telling him he was really a girl. None of them had even met him.

I started to research transgenderism, so I could figure out what was going on in my son's head. But by the time I'd worked out how clinics and schools were operating, and how the internet was making it impossible for him to change his mind, it was too late. He was so convinced that the only path forward was hormones, and that we were failing to support him by withholding them.

A couple of years later, I now understand what got my son to this place. Puberty made him uncomfortable with his body. But it wasn't just that: it was that he was such a smart, nerdy kid. And boys who are nerdy — even if they're masculine — are told every day that they might actually be girls. Everything has changed. If you're not G.I. Joe, you're in trouble. These boys don't understand that there are all types of men. They think if they're not the stereotypical male, then they're not male at all.

What my son is trying to do is opt out of manhood. He doesn't really want to be a woman. He just can't see himself as a man in this world. When I was growing up, boys had role models who were smart and creative: architects, engineers and lawyers. Nowadays, gender activists go into schools and tell young men they can be either sex. The quirky, gifted kids are the most vulnerable to this. They already know they're different: but then, they're told lies about how they're different. And they believe these lies.

So far, you've only read my story. But since this all started, I've been in touch with almost a hundred other parents of boys, on online forums and support groups. My son's story is typical of these kids. The mothers and fathers I meet also have smart sons who can't find a place for themselves in modern society. Like my son, these boys are being led astray. Their parents don't know what to do. We don't know how to fight this ideology.

A lot of the young men calling themselves transgender have autism, ADHD, OCD or Asperger syndrome. Parents have sometimes known about these conditions for many years. But gender clinics aren't interested in pursuing therapies which might actually help these kids understand why they feel the way they do. It's the only field of medicine where you're not allowed to talk about comorbidities or other treatments. This is the medical scandal of the century.

People reading this might know that this is also going on with girls. In fact, the number of girls going through this is so high that some people think that only girls are involved. And that's often how it's presented in the media. That means it can be even harder for the many parents of boys: it's as though we don't exist. It's always easier to see young women as victims of a system. The young men just get written off as freaks. But it's our culture which is the freak.

I have spent all of the lockdown researching transgenderism, and I'm more certain than ever that there's nothing wrong with my son. I'm angry with society. I'm angry with the media. I'm angry with politicians. I'm angry with Big Pharma. I'm angry with his girlfriend for convincing him that he can be a 'lesbian.' He can't. He's just a vulnerable boy who's lost his way.

I'm writing this to make people aware that this is really happening, all over America and beyond, from big cities to small towns. This isn't just some Hollywood trend. We need your help. We need you to get the word out. We need you to help us save our sons.

I am a mother of two and a self-employed graphic designer. I have only recently started to write, since my son announced he was trans. In the last two years, I've done extensive research on transgenderism, and started actively campaigning to get the truth out. 'Ruth Nyhus' is a pseudonym which I am using to protect my family's identity.

Philando Castile, Justine Damond, and the automatic in-group bias toward women

February 28, 2021 | by Jewel Eldora | Link | Original Link

Author's note: This article is deadly serious. If you are a white woman in Minneapolis, this short test could save your life. Information at the bottom of this article could also save the lives of countless Australian Children. Disclaimer: I make some somewhat funny or shocking statements and occasionally use inappropriate language, to make important information digestible. The lives of women and children are at risk. Please read and share.

This article is difficult. It ends a series that began a month ago because I wanted to explain the phenomena of Minnesota-generated and spread worldwide moral panics. I've observed these my entire life. I was noticing the same kind of behavior in response to the Red Pill Movie in Australia.

What started out with me asking the question, What the heck is going on in Australia?", turned into Malcolm Turnbull asking Donald Trump, "What the fuck is going on in Minneapolis?"

I can't take shortcuts with this article. There's also no way I can do this without offending. The answers are uncomfortable. And people are in danger.

The death of Justine Damond was predictable and avoidable. Mr. Turnbull, if you want to get to the bottom of what killed her, you must understand the phenomenon known as Minnesota Nice, the Group-Think Tank at the University Minnesota, and the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce.

When I started this series, I couldn't possibly know Justine Damond, a beautiful Australian, would be dead today, but I have been predicting that a white woman would be unintentionally killed by Minneapolis Police for the last five years. That it was in South Minneapolis, by a black Muslim officer, was not a surprise, nor was the fact that she was a foreigner who didn't speak the the local language.

All Lives Matter is Somehow a Deeply Offensive Racist Slur

Why is a white woman in South Minneapolis running up to a police car in a dark alley, in the middle of the night? The answer, Mr. Turnbull, is ignorance. This does not mean she was necessarily at fault, it just means no one wanted her to be warned of the danger she was in.

Where Australian cities such as Melbourne, are famous the world over for public safety messages, the City of Minneapolis seems to be actively complicit in the cockblocking of those who might have informed white women in Minneapolis of the dangers they face.

Additionally, Justine Damond was blinded by U.S. media, who are paid by advertisers to send her soothing messages that police homicides are someone else's problem.

Women direct over 80% of the consumer spending in the United States, and much of the messaging is designed to make them feel safe, so they can continue spending. The company's product is guaranteed to make her life less complex.

White women are particularly targeted.

White women in the United States are conditioned to think that little black girls in pink bows are more at risk than their white husbands or sons to police homicide, and the biggest risk they themselves might encounter is being bitten on the face by a boa constrictor.

Black women know this is bullshit. Poor white women know this is bullshit. This doesn't stop little girls of all ages and genders, however, from jumping in on the hype and bullying people into correct-think.

White women are seduced into a very comfortable fallacy that the men in their families have some special bullet dodging privilege because of the color of their skin. An uncomfortable fact is 95% of US. Police homicide victims are men, the majority of which are white.

Justine never knew the danger she was in. Reality is not good for business in the United States. In South Minneapolis, where the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce and an army of little black girls, white women, and university students all steeped in Minnesota Nice reign, this reality is even more distorted.

These white women and university students also happened to be the ones throwing rocks at police, and burning shit down in North Minneapolis during the 4th Precinct Takeover. The mainstream media never turned the cameras away from the black organizers to show you who was terrorizing police.

Minnesota Nice Killed Justine Damond

This cartoon illustrates Minnesota Nice, perfectly. It's a type of manipulative abuse where the abuser lies and obstructs to get what they want. Gaslighting and DARVO (Deny Attack Reverse Victim and Offender) are examples of Minnesota Nice.

TRUTH IN POSTMODERNISM

An AVFM reader recently described DARVO as being like a fart in church. It's more accurately described as the emotional version of pouring pig shit and boogers on someone, poking their eye out, and then claiming your own victimhood.

The University of Minnesota Group-Think Tank receives millions and millions of dollars in government-funded non-repayable student loans to teach people these destructive techniques to abuse, derogate, gender shame, race bully, shitweasel, and Quisling themselves into power.

They do this at the state level too, of course, all the way to the Governor's mansion. But the City Government of Minneapolis, man, those people got this shit down.

Their hivemind has stopped any contrary discourse, they control the local news, and some have even blocked access to federally protected, publicly funded, supreme court guaranteed, public media access.

How the Racist, the Bully, the Shit Weasel, and the Fox took over the Free Speech Zone

Mayor Hodges, there is a man, a nationally recognized civil rights historian and independent journalist, that could very well have saved Justine Damond's life.

You know it, I know it, and the Democratic City Council knows it. The Democratic Governor's Office and Attorney General's office were also informed, but no one did anything when the man who could have saved Justine Damond's life was cockblocked by a black lesbian pick up artist, a famous black social justice filmmaker, and a black "non-profit expert" at the Minneapolis Television Network

This particular public access media producer couldn't warn Justine Damond about what was really going on in Minneapolis, because it violated the acceptable boundaries of what a black man should say publicly to the citizens of Minneapolis.

The Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce and the Mindhive of Greater Minnesota

To the Trump and Turnbull administrations: You have your work cut out for you with trying get to the bottom of this clusterfuck. Drain the swamp is a particularly good metaphor, here in Minnesota.

If history is any indicator, Justine Damond is the least of your worries with the Mindhive of Greater Minnesota. The world is in for a shit storm of witch hunts, which will destroy the lives of countless women and children if you can not stop the 2017 Minnesota State Fair, get rid of all the mosquitos, and remove the Group-Think tank from the U of M.

That should be easy. You have 3 weeks.

U.S. Presidential Candidate Dwayne "The Rock" Johnson could probably do all three of those in an hour and a half, or maybe, like, an hour. I know this because I watched him in "San Andreas," and he demonstrated that he is an incredible, emotionally strong, and capable man, who is able to handle complex situations under fire. He is willing to risk himself to save women and children.

If you think greater than zero people in the US would be happy to let Dwayne "The Rock" Johnson grab them by their pussy, there might just be a flaw in all men that is putting the lives of millions of women and children, worldwide, in danger…right now.

I know that was an odd statement, but I need you to think a little bit differently just for a few minutes. Please, this is important. The messaging is light and conversational for white women in South Minneapolis to more easily digest it, but the message is deadly serious.

White women and children are at risk.

We may be seeing some echoes of the 1980 Election of "hard-right-fascist-nuclear-holocausting" president, Ronald Reagan, who won in a landslide, and was also an "accused Nazi sympathizer." Sound familiar?

During his presidency, and into the 90's, the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce and the Mindhive of Greater Minnesota exported a steady stream of silent death and destruction worldwide, just like the 1918 flu. And if history is any guide, if we can't stop the 2017 Minnesota State Fair, 2018 will see another worldwide moral plague.

This is not a joke.

Gynocentrism killed Justine Damond, Mr Turnbull, and it may be getting ready to kill white women near you. Children will also die if this is not stopped.

Minnesota Nice and the Land of 10,000 Gynocentric Moral Panics

Minnesota is known for a lot of things: Prince, the Minnesota Twins, the Mall of America and the death of Jacob Wetterling. Two of those created worldwide gynocentric moral panics. Gynocentrism, in this respect, doesn't necessarily mean "woman-centric" but "woman/child" centric.

We like women. We like children. Put them in a group, and we evoke radical empathy in all humans. If given the opportunity, overwhelming stress will drive us to do or say against out-group women and children in the name of empathy toward in-group women and children.

Stress can come from anywhere: politics, economics, education, or a long line at Starbucks. But there's a visceral type of stress that comes from mice, lice, and undesirable male behavior. This is parasite stress.

Since the major frog population collapse in the 1930's, the Greater Minnesota Mindhive gets a little stressed 12 trillion-billion-zillion times a day, all summer long.

This stress is caused by the Unofficial Minnesota State Bird.

Fuck these fucking fuckers.

These blood suckers create a stress, not unlike the 2016/17 mouse plague in Southern Australia. It's just that ours is a cumulative phenomena, caused by 11,000 beautiful lakes, while yours is caused by 80 year record rains.

There have been reports of them carrying off small children and spreading disease throughout the state. The resulting stress combines with pig's shit and food on a stick, every Labor Day Weekend, right in the center of this fucking Mindhive.

The MN State Fair, the Great Minnesota Get Together, attracts almost two million people every year. This year will likely bring record numbers, yet again.

Families and their friends spend the day talking about life, people watching, screaming at police, and eating food on a stick, all while surrounded by a bunch of animal shit and looking at butter sculptures in hot, humid weather.

Then everyone goes home and exports the next deadly gynocentric moral panic to the world.

Here are some examples of what comes from Minnesota Nice:

1. Prince – The Echo-Chamber's most famous moral panic was that of a certain purple local black pop musician who was accused in the early 80's of salaciously endangering children and seducing young white women into perverted dance parties in Downtown Minneapolis in the early 1980's. Notably, he had difficulty in his early days getting regular gigs at First Avenue, the downtown Minneapolis nightclub he eventually made world famous in his 1984 major motion picture Purple Rain.His song Darling Nikki was the number one song on the PMRC's Filthy Fifteen songs, which were going to teach children that masturbation was normal and acceptable human behavior. Prince's race and dress were used by wife of Southern Democratic Vice President, Al Gore, who exploited Prince's race and gender ambiguity to raise their credibility amongst their conservative constituents in an attempt to stifle free speech. Moral panics lead governments to infringe human rights. Prince died April 21, 2016, in between the shootings of Jamar Clark and Philando Castile. In 2017, Minnesota politicians are still mourning, but in the early 1980's, they used Prince to terrify parents nationally because of his sexuality, which was perceived by some to be even more provocative than Elvis Presley.

2. The Duluth Model – During the Post-Vietnam Domestic Violence Moral Panic of the early 1970's, Minnesota infected the world with the Duluth Model of Gynocentric Abuse. This is the deadliest moral panic in the history of human civilization. It is the leading cause of the suicide epidemic sweeping the United States. The Duluth Model was created in Duluth, Minnesota in 1980 by two little girls who "didn't understand anything about therapy" but were correctly-educated in widely accepted Marxist gender theory by a Group-Think Tank in Duluth.The Duluth Model "influenced the way law enforcement, social service and advocacy organizations handled domestic violence." The death and misery caused by this Minnesota export cannot be overstated. The Duluth Model has killed or heinously endangered more children than disease or accidents. If a woman with Borderline Personality Disorder has a child, she can remove the father's influence through gaslighting and DARVO. The Duluth Model actively encourages this behavior, which exploits a dangerous known social bias, and group-think tanks the world wide train these women on exactly how to exploit these systems to harm their children. Some of these women are seriously mentally ill, and fathers are powerless to save their children. The Duluth Model is one of the main reasons men are 80% of suicides. This leaves millions of wives, sisters, mothers and daughters grieving every year. Widely accepted Marxist gender theory states that men are always the oppressors and women are always the victims. The problem of domestic violence, say Duluth Model practitioners, can only be solved by re-educating men to better serve women for their own good. The sadistic perverts who make a living doing this often court ordered re-education programs, should be tried for crimes against humanity for the devastation they have wrought on the world. You can start with the Minneapolis Men's Center, who has been operating this re-education racket since the first moral panic, beginning with the returning Vietnam Vets in 1973. A more accurate replacement model is based on observations of natural behavior that describes men as human-doings who manage complexity and maintain boundaries for their families, and domestic violence is what happens when stress gets too high. The Duluth Model is an abuse model whose practitioners prefer Marxist Theory and actively deny that biology or biochemistry plays a role in anything, or that men are full human beings; particularly white men. Talk to the man in charge of re-education for the Minneapolis Men's Center about his philosophy regarding heterosexual behavioral dynamics, and you will understand why white male suicide is exploding around the country, while the hivemind guffaws at the losses faced by the women and children they leave

3. Day Care Sex Abuse – Minnesota is also famous for starting the 1980's Day Care Sex Abuse Mass Hysteria, which destroyed countless lives, worldwide. Jordan, Minnesota prosecutor R. Kathleen Morris and court appointed experts agreed that "children couldn't possibly be coerced into lying about their neighbors, teachers or relatives sexually abusing them."It turns out, anyone who has ever met an actual child knows this is insanity but the people in the Mindhive believed it, because it's consistent with the Duluth Model, and sounds like something everyone already kind of believes. The taboo nature of the topic means that men can't and women don't speak out for fear of reprisal. In Australia, this will likely spur some memories amongst Boomers and GenX'ers who lived in Perth, Melbourne and New South Wales who were infected by this and the next taboo driven Gynocentric Moral Panic exported from the Minnesota Group-Think Mindhive.
4. Satanic Ritual Sex Abuse – The Satanic Ritual Sex Abuse Moral Panic also has its roots in Minnesota. Again with outbreaks in Perth, Melbourne and New South Wales.Two Lutheran ministers, from St. Paul, Minnesota's capitol city, exploited a widely known cognitive bias known as Paradolia to make people believe, through the power of suggestion, that nonsense sounded like strings of warped, other-worldly words. It also excites parasite stress because it sounds unsettling. Like the Duluth Model, the Ministers "found what they were looking for" and proceeded to make a fortune travelling the world, claiming to be "experts" in Satanic-Backward-Recordology, exploiting a known cognitive bias on radio shows and churches, and freaking out Conservative Christians. An inconvenient truth Mr. Gore should consider, is how much his career benefited at the expense of the Memphis Three via the tireless work of his wife.
5. Stranger Danger – The murders of Jacob Wetterling and Jon Benet Ramsey led to a generation of fungus people. The generational phenomena known as Millennials has it's roots in the Mindhive of Greater Minnesota, just outside the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber, near St. Cloud, Minnesota. According to NYU social psychologist Jonathan Haight, who specializes in moral psychology, after these high profile deaths, kids didn't go to the park without a parent who they could appeal to when conflicts between kids inevitably occurred. These children then grew into adults without developing the conflict resolution skills held by earlier generations. This makes these children extremely vulnerable, especially when exposed to Minnesota Nice. It makes them cry bullies, susceptible to the influence of little black lesbian pickup artists with bullhorns. This entire generation, who are bad at resolving interpersonal conflicts, are willing to sacrifice the civil liberties of anyone who will not provide them the necessary safe spaces they demand. If you're a single mom in America, finding it hard to find good men to come anywhere within a 1,000 feet of you and your children, you can thank the The Removal of Civil Liberties, Presumption of Guilt, and Lifelong Shaming and Dehumanization Acts that passed with worldwide unanimous bipartisan support in the last 20 years. Millennials as a generation are an expression of what you get when children are deprived of normal social interactions with men. They are the the second generation of children who have been robbed of the benefits of being exposed to social masculinity. You can directly link this to the Mindhive and Echo-Chamber that is Minnesota, in direct partnership with the Group-Think Tank of the U of M. While this has served to terrify parents, it's done nothing to protect children. Instead, the systematic removal of men from the lives of children has had devastating consequences worldwide.

6. The MN State Fair – Food on a Stick is another world wide phenomena spread from Echo-Chamber. Last year 1,943,719 people came to Great Minnesota Get Together and ate shitty, greasy food, around a bunch of livestock, in the most densely populated places in the world over Labor Day Weekend. The fairgrounds are right next to the University of Minnesota's Agriculture Farm and will likely be the source of some protests, disgust propaganda, pig's shit, mosquitos, Minnesota Nice, and so much greasy food that it'll be the big the lead story of every news outlet in the state. ABC, NBC, CBS, Minneapolis Public Radio, and Buzzfeed's Minneapolis Office, along with every city newspaper in the state, will broadcast hourly reports from the Fairgrounds. Mmmm, pig shit, corn dogs, and parasite stress. What could possibly go wrong?

White Women and Black Lives Matter

One problem with Black Lives Matter" says the producer whose supreme court protected access was blocked from the Minneapolis Television Network, "Is that it makes white women feel too safe around police. Another thing is that when white women start selling black pain, there are two things you can expect more of, white women making a lot of money and the other, of course, is more black pain."

Where Were You When Jamar Clark was still standing?

The 4th Precinct Takeover was basically black girls with bullhorns inciting university students and white women against police. Many national news agencies were blocked when trying to get access to the riots. This public access producer has footage from several days that show Black Lives Matter in Minneapolis as a mostly white female phenomena.

The pictures the local media ran with were focused on the black organizers, but the burning and the rock throwing, that was mostly white women and university students.

This is not a popular lens for local government.

When this producer tried to create and release the footage which could have started an honest, yet ugly, conversation (and possibly saved Justine Damond's life) he was blocked by a famous black social justice filmmaker and a black lesbian pickup artist who race-bullied everyone to stop his message from reaching the community, including Justine Damond.

I'd argue that she might just be alive today, if Minneapolis government weren't so susceptible to this kind of intimidation, and actually gave a shit about first amendment rights.

Minneapolis also passed a law while wrapped in another moral panic of alleged hate crimes this was to protect university students or people in Muslim neighborhoods from hearing controversial views. A police hotline was set up to report the alleged hate speech. It's unclear whether this has stopped people from spreading hurtful rhetoric amongst marginalized groups. It is clear that inciting hate at Minneapolis police officers is still legal.

The Group-Think Tank at the University of Minnesota, the Hivemind of Greater Minnesota, and the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce have the messaging pretty well under control here in Minneapolis.

And now, it's killing white women.

How the Group-Think Tank Controls Speech for Political Purposes and How that puts White Women at Risk

St. Paul has a Twin Cities newspaper and Minneapolis has a Minneapolis City paper who works tirelessly with the City's Communication Department to make sure that everyone is correctly-educated about events in the city.

The deaths of Jamar Clark, Philando Castile, and Justine Damond (who is referred to not by name, but more often as the "Australian woman killed by Officer Mohamed Noor") have been covered by every television station and newspaper, all blasting stories into the Mindhive, but with remarkably, disturbingly different reporting strategies.

When a black man in Minneapolis gets shot. we get inundated with the mugshot, a list of drugs he was known to ingest, and why he was probably deserving of this demise. The police officer remains unnamed for a few days, on paid administrative leave, until they finally come forward and explain the circumstances which made them fear for their life, thereby justifying the homicide of a citizen they are sworn to protect. No charges are brought against them.

The Philando Castile story was a little different, as he was, by most accounts, an upstanding citizen whom they had trouble digging up a shady past on. But, they found what they could (most involving the use of marijuana) and moved forward with the standard narrative.

Enter Justine Damond, the Australian-born, spiritual leader, white lady, yoga instructor. We know her life, how incredible she was, how loved she was by family and friends. We know she loved her community and helping others. We also know the officer who killed her in the street, like a common criminal, is a black man of Somali descent, who refuses to give his testimony of the circumstances yet. I don't know if Justine had a record, what kind of drugs she may or may not have been taking, let alone selling in that dark alley, or whether or not her questionable past justifies the use of deadly force against her.

I do know that this time, "we" need to take back the community. "We" need to do something about this violence in our streets. "We" need to express our outrage of one of our own being gunned down after calling 911, of her own volition, reporting a possible rape in the alley.

Justine should have known better, but she didn't because of the Group-Think Tank and the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce.

The Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce

From Fast, Fun, and Friendly to Best Company Ever.

"How can I bring these lessons back to my team?" asked a Target team leader after the well-attended Diversity Action Committee's 2017 Privilege Walk.

Target's VP of Diversity and Inclusion/Corporate Social Responsibility, Caroline Wanga, describes herself as a "social architect." She is quoted as saying, "You can see this problem being played out today – with certain racial/ethnic and immigrant communities being viewed as less than whole." It's unclear whether or not she views men, or white men as full humans as they seem remarkably absent from Target's Diversity initiative, as is any talk of diversity among political viewpoints.

She must be extraordinarily competent and effective at correctly-educating the community living near the Target Northern Campus on their privilege. She has rapidly advanced her way from Manager to VP between the killing of two American-born African Americans, Trayvon Martin and Philando Castile. Quite a career.

The Privilege Walk at the Target Northern Campus placed people in lines and sorted them by their collective privilege, dividing people based on their race, ethnicity, parentage, property ownership, right handedness, and sexuality.

This left all of the white, middle class people, with two parents, who owned property, or who had ever taken a family vacation, standing out in front of their colleagues whom they are presumably oppressing. It is unclear where Caroline Wanga, a Kenyan born black woman, stood in this lineup, but she has made a clear commitment to "living what she asks others to do."

Gender privilege was omitted from the public shaming on the Privilege Walk, likely as it exacerbates Tazerdronophobia, which appears to be a predominately white male phenomena.

Tazerdronophobia among male technology workers is a major economic problem within the Twin Cities Echo-Chamber of Commerce. Target prides itself on its commitment to diversity by outsourcing call center jobs overseas and by sponsoring an army of Indian Information Technology Contractors. This increases fear that white male technology workers might not be able to feed their families.

Target Stores were founded in Minnesota by the family of Governor Mark Dayton, heir to this enormous fortune.

"Yeah, they really ran a number on us" said Larry Gilpin former Target Sr. VP of Human Resources and Guest Relations referring to the Daytons Family.

"Australia would have been a perfect international market, due to it's proximity to Asia, but the Dayton's set up a parallel operation there in the 70's, using our talent and vendor infrastructure. The best international move we have now is Canada. Canada's going to take years and it'll be a nightmare. Those people don't want us there."

Mr. Gilpin clearly did not like the idea of a Canadian expansion, "Australia would have been cash cow." Many early US investors in Target might find it interesting that there's a completely unrelated, similarly branded, $3.5 billion store with the same name and logo in Australia.

It's unclear whether Governor Mark Dayton, who currently oversees the Mindhive, directly benefitted from the successful Australian shadow company.

Gilpin left Target shortly after this interview. Larry breathed the Fast, Fun and Friendly culture of Target and cared deeply for Team Members, Investors, and the Communities they served.

You might remember Mr. Gilpin from his friendly picture on comment cards in the 1990s and early 2000s.

Unfortunately, while the Dayton family still held significant shares in Target Corporation, the former Democratic Mayor, Sharon Sayles Belton, offered tax increment financing to build a Target Store in North Minneapolis, displacing some family owned businesses and serving up the Community of North Minneapolis to the Minnesota-State-Correctional-Meatgrinder.

This created stable, well-paying jobs in outstate Minnesota but was a devastating cancer to the family and community in North Minneapolis.

Target's own projected sales and loss data metrics allegedly showed this store would not be profitable. They took the city financing, in part, because the store would provide ample training for Asset Protection Team Members on new equipment and tactics used there.

Many civil liberties activists will be surprised to know that Asset Protection Team Members handcuff suspects to brightly painted red benches while awaiting the police.

Broadway Target closed as soon Target could escape the contract they were essentially race-bullied into taking.

Would you like to apply for a Red Card Today?

Of course, Minneapolis wasn't the only place the retailer hurt families.

"Low income people nationwide were given their first credit cards in a test" said a former Target Collection Department Supervisor, who asked not to be named. "They started a small test in a couple of cities, and before the test was done, they pushed it out nationwide. They pushed those cards to anyone with a pulse because they were making so much money on late fees, they just didn't even care."

The result of this of course were many, many low income families having their credit destroyed by this practice.

"We did a mass hire of bill collectors, I felt badly for the people we hired. Call centers of hundreds of people in dead end jobs. They were being told there was opportunity, but no matter how talented, if you didn't have a degree, or weren't "correctly-educated" you were not getting promoted. Of course, we never told them they had no chance of moving ahead or they would have left. The family health benefits were good, but the pay was shit, people just got screamed at all day, week after week, year after year. A couple of guys even blew their brains out." It was tough, thankless work upsetting people across the country day after day without hope of promotion.

Target Headquarters has an unwritten, unspoken, widely known secret policy that no entry level employees can advance without being properly-educated at University.

Target Store (T0001) is within walking distance of where Philando Castile's last minutes were livestreamed to the world.

Women Power is in the Mindhive

In 2017, Senator Karin Housley, authored and helped pass a bill outlawing female genital mutilation in the state after a statewide epidemic was discovered. No known cause for the upswing in this barbaric practice can be discussed in the City of Minneapolis, lest it break local speech ordinance.

Housley, now a senior senator, is married to former St. Paul Vulcans hockey player, Phil Housley, who is fucking awesome!

Minnesota residents who want to mutilate their infant sons, can rest easy.

Boys have a Supreme Court protected right to have their penises mutilated without their consent. In Minnesota, boys have their arms and legs strapped down while the most sensitive part of their penis is slit with a scalpel and torn away while they scream like little baby pigs.

This service is available at Minnesota Children's Hospital and the world famous Mayo Clinic. Whose website basically says, yeah, there's no real medical reason for everyone to get it, it's tradition, and you know, chicks dig it.

The Group-Think Tank at the University of MN – Department of Ad Hominem Attacks

University of Minnesota professors were among the first to discover the medical condition known as homophobia. Homophobia is an irrational fear that gay men might have sex with boys, or might touch or spread poop.

Other departments soon discovered the medical condition known as Islamophobia. Islamophobia is an irrational fear that Islamic Muslims want to kill gay people or subjugate women.

Corporateharemophobia is being Studied by UM Richfield where irrational conspiracy theorists have come to believe there's a connection between the former CEO of Best Buy having an affair with the Leadership Institute Coordinator, the current CEO who changed the terms of a long standing Employee Stock Purchase Program, was then given permission to cash out stock to pay for his own high profile divorce, and now encourages Best Buy's army of women executives to recruit more and more executive women. Clearly, there's no connection, this is strictly business. Women are less likely to negotiate for higher wages. These conspiracy theorists obviously have an irrational fear.

Tazerdronophobia, the irrational fear of tazerdrones, is being studied in a multimillion dollar partnership with the DHS Fusion Center, near the Target Northern Campus. Fear of tazerdrones is troubling to law enforcement because it's not rational to think we'll ever be able to develop or afford this type of technology in the United States.

Tazerdronophobia in the United States reached epidemic levels in 2016, in response to one Hillary Clinton Superpac, which spent over a million dollars giving opportunity to little girls to crybully, gender shame, and otherwise "correct" Bernie Sander's supporters.

The moral of all of these stories? When a tragedy happens in Minnesota, it spreads panic, terror, and death around the world.

Philando Castille was killed by a bad cop with bad training. Justine Damond was killed by a bad cop with bad training. One walked. The jury made a decision based on the evidence, how they felt about the officer, and how they felt about the victim. In the case of Justine Damond, it's widely reported that she was yoga teacher and a beacon of light. Officer Noor is a black man, accused of harming a white woman.

Both victims have the same lawyer. Assuming they will arrive at the same cash settlement, the Minnesota Mindhive has achieved its two primary goals, equality and equity.

Both families have lost a loved one and both are going to get a bullshit cash award in return.

Check Your Parasite Stress

Anyone who's read my other articles will be happy to know that I am finally ready to get to the fucking point.

1. Everyone has biases. When we're dealing with too much complexity and stress we make shortcuts. Those shortcuts are sometimes deadly.
2. People are messy and gross. We can't work these things out with pretty, clean, correct words. We need to get messy together respectfully and work it out. Silencing and shaming people for universal natural human behavior is getting us nowhere.
3. Using disgust derogation to dehumanize and otherize the people we disagree with is spiraling us into a global catastrophe.
4. As stress increases we are more willing to let the human rights of "others" fall wayside.

No matter what anyone thinks or says, Men are Human Beings. The trial of Mohamed Noor is going to put the U.S. Criminal Justice System on Trial. If there is one thing a system hates, it's being put on trial. Mohamed Noor deserves a fair trial even if it pops the comfortable bubble that protects the feelers of white women in the United States.

The results from the 2004 APA Study used throughout this series has been neither retracted or contradicted by any other reproducible, larger-scale study. Even in the unlikely event that the claim of 100% of Women and 0% of Men having automatic in-group bias scales to the entire population, the fact that males are generally less social and appear to be less capable of automatically accepting other men as in-group members is evident. It is far too easy for both men and women to view men as subhuman.

Men and women have both made habit of the perpetual out-group derogation of men and boys. For some, it is even part of their jobs, including judges, police, prison guards, parents, teachers, social workers, etc. Men, it seems, are less likely to signal empathy toward men than are women.

The dangerous ways in which men and boys respond to derogation are hard to ignore. (Suicide, murder, terrorism, etc.) Additionally, the lengths men will go to in order to avoid derogation from their in-group become more severe as societal stress increases. While every genocide in history began with the systematic derogation of men and boys, it usually doesn't stop there.

Men are the overwhelming majority of the perpetrators of this systemic violence, but women and children quickly become victims. In this, the second to last article in our series, we'll explore the 50 year rise in stress relating to technology and explain why women are the only hope we have to be saved from what appears to be impending destruction.

In order to understand why men may be incapable of fixing this problem, we must first explore some of the study's hypothesis for why men may not be able to see other men as part of an automatic in-group and therefore, see them as subhumans.

The study cites 5 possible Hypotheses:

1) Male Aggression
2) Possible Competitor
3) Emotional Conditioning
4) Cognitive Balance
5) Sex Positivity

Male Aggression

In animals, where dominance hierarchies have been observed, the more dominant the in-group, the greater the preponderance of in-group bias. This is observed in humans when the local Sportsball Team wins the big game and fans line up en masse to support them at the World Sportsball Championship.

One would expect and reasonably deduce, that men, being the most dominant group, would be involved in a global fraternity, collectively celebrating their dominance, but as it turns out, this may not be the case.

Possible Competitor

Keeping the out-group down is a way to improve in-group standing. Resources may be rare and there is no reason to make life easier for the out-group.

Emotional Conditioning

In a Weak Case for the Humanity of Men, I discuss the stereotypes of men and boys. It is easy to imagine how some men might easily abuse their power to derogate other men. Minority groups adopt similar attitudes for themselves that are held by predominant groups and sometimes members even strive to conform to the stereotypes. Our collective stereotype of men as a group must be considered if we are considering grossness as a human value.

This grossness may simply make men an undesirable group of assholes with which to automatically identify.

The last two hypotheses are pretty self-explanatory.

Cognitive Balance

This is expressed as the belief, “I am a member of this group, and I am good, therefore, all members of this group are good.” Men seemingly lack this conceptual thinking and therefore do not apply their own attributes to “all men.”

Sex Positivity

Men like sex. Some of them like to have sex with women. It turns out, the more they like to have sex with women, the more they tend to like women as a group. Sex positive men will pretty much always like women better than other men.

Regardless of the reasons, the study’s findings clearly demonstrate that to one degree or another, men simply don’t exist as an in-group. For practical purposes, men exist only as an automatic out-group.

Likely because of this phenomena, it may be all too easy to exploit men and boys to derogate men of another race, class, sexual preference, social class, or religion. In-group/out-group dynamics can be demonstrated among even the most trivial of differences, and men, in turn, are targets for derogation from men of other groups. This is true amongst women as well.

It appears that evolution may have played an interesting trick on our species. These behaviors seem to be linked to an increase of general stress, as well as parasite and pathogen stress, and compel us all, as a species, to derogate men and to view men as subhumans.

Based on the numbers of men derogated in the last 47 years, we may be seeing the beginnings of the worst holocaust in human history. In the 47 years since Future Shock was published, historical stress levels and interconnected social technologies have risen, right alongside prison populations and homelessness. Both overwhelmingly male phenomena. During this period we've also seen the declining mental health of children, increased unhappiness among women, and a male suicide rate that has become alarming to professionals who study those phenomena.

The War on Drugs, Parasite Stress and Rise of Interconnected Technologies

Drugs have been framed as an epidemic and thereby subtly linked to pathogen and parasite stress to increase our willingness to derogate "other" men. This has reached national crisis levels and incarceration in this country has grown at alarming rates right under our noses, in part, because we don't see 94% of the prisoners as full humans. If your family has been blissfully unaffected by having a father, son, brother, or uncle derogated to prison, you likely view this apocalypse as a type of academic problem for "other" families.

Our stress and parasite stress is increasing and this has an established link to authoritarian catastrophes. Only women will be heard, and only the brave ones will speak against the herd. It is a powerful herd who will throw their shit when they are made aware of their own out-group biases against men and boys. Early testing shows that women predict that men have 40-60% parity in automatic, in-group bias, where there actually seems to be little to none.

In short, your baby boy, son, teenaged boy, brother, uncle, father, grandfather, boyfriend, and/or husband live in a world where others will abuse them, often times in an attempt to treat the abusers own mental illness (see Chemical Rewards). This could have disastrous effects for you and your family.

What Can Women Do?

Given the risk of exposure and increased risk to actual pathogens and parasites, it is no wonder girls are trained from a very young age to reinforce boundaries with men and boys, and to keep the others around them in line with correct, appropriate, and safe practices.

The wrinkling of noses, fake gagging, looks and shrieks of horror, as well as mocked arm distancing are long established and well understood indicators of social grossness and disgust derogation. Women, who report a greater disgust sensitivity, play a vital part in alerting others to the discovery of pathogens and parasites.

Unfortunately, boys and men, like Carrie in the Stephen King book, do not always realize that behavioral corrections are important for the protection of the species.

Carrie, who was perhaps less socially intelligent or sophisticated than her cohorts, didn't realize that the gentle locker room hazing was really just a good hearted attempt at getting her to understand that she wasn't dying from her period, and that she just needed to take reasonable steps to protect the herd.

Disgust derogation has been used time immemorial, across cultures, to create and perpetuate hostility toward out-groups. Many movements, political and religious, have abused pathogen and parasite stress to great effect in getting in-group members to accept terrible behavior against the out-group. In-group members stand by helplessly lest they be derogated by proxy. This frustrating cycle of silence in the face of derogation gets people to believe irrational things.

What can Men Do?

Discuss this article respectfully with women. Women acutely feel the injustice of a Men's Rights issue, especially when it affects them personally or they see how these issues affect women and children, i.e. suicide, military and job related deaths, even transgender issues.

Fight the urge to talk about the issues, or the statistics; talk about the people. Women are just as affected by non-custodial child support issues, visitation, or child safety/neglect issues. They've struggled getting their sons the services he needs, fear the stigma of a false rape allegation, or being shipped a loaded body bag.

Women care more about people and the effects on people than statistics. Stories are sticker than statistics.

When women experience men's issues through one of the men in their lives, they understand it in a way that men never can. They understand how other women will be affected by the same issue. She sees this issue as an issue for any other woman in her situation. Men suck at that. As it turns out, virtually no men identify as men.

Be less of a dick to other men and boys. Be less of an asshole to other men and boys. Stop being such a fucker to other men and boys. Stop getting your shit all over other men and boys. Of course, if you're doing to it women and girls, you should stop doing that as as well. But recognize, society accepts and even encourages you to derogate men and boys.

Where are We Headed?

Perhaps as a response to concerns about the rise of socially connected, cost effective hive technologies, or perhaps as a result of the rise of active derogation, through the War on Drugs, divorce, Ritalin abuse, and some vocal seemingly anti-male political movements, the last 40 years has spawned out-group concern about a certain variety of flying parasites. I'm referring to a type of out-group terror I will refer to as "Tazerdronophobia."

There seems to be an entire internet subculture, again, mostly white men in the tech industry, fixated on armed drones or other technologies being weaponized against them.

While Dronophobia has been reported in areas where actual drones have killed actual people, the concern seems irrationally high in the US where there is, as of yet, not been a single tazerdrone to enter the marketplace. (UPDATE: Tazerdrone Prototype Spotted In Russia)

In the unlikely event that tazerdrones actually become available in the US, the relative low cost could have severe derogation consequences for out-groups. For instance, the U.S. Federal Government's >widely publicized plan to build a $65B wall across the southern United States to keep out "Bad Hombres." With a similar spend, the US Government could buy and operate 6.5 million solar powered tazerdrones.

A tazerdrone mindhive would likely be a cost effective way to silence dissent and keep gross people very nicely contained. If they are men, particularly white men, all indicators are that not much fuss will be raised.

This out-group fear of subjugation through hive technology seems to have come with a sensitivity to out-group statements (you're a racist, sexist, nationalist…) and a sudden inability to see the humor in harmless jokes and innocent comments.

The uproar over a simple hashtag #killallmen, and its variant #killallwhitemen as being somehow actually offensive was silly. Men, as the more dominant group, should not feel threatened by the statements of disadvantaged groups.

This over-sensitivity is often referred to as male fragility and has been widely reported upon.

This may also explain the connection between parasite and pathogen stress and the rise of populist, authoritarian strongmen (Trump, Hitler, Dwayne "the Rock" Johnson). When humans are distressed, they will beg for protection from those they deem as "enemies." they also want simple solutions to very complex problems.

Because of the ease of derogating men and boys, they are typically the first slated for removal.

Brave women must begin speaking against the systematic derogation of men and boys. There is a very loud voice amongst the elite screaming for the rise of their favorite type of totalitarian government, or pleading requests for martial law. Very few authoritarian governments actually deliver on what they promise, but all of them will derogate "undesirables."

Very few women, and virtually zero men, are willing to speak up about the derogation of men and boys for fear they may be shunned for appearing to be pro-man or anti-woman and children. Those who do stick up for the out-group often do so at the risk of getting shit hurled at them.

In the Stephen King Movie Carrie, the only survivor of Carrie's reaction, is the one girl who spoke up for Carrie's humanity and dignity. Perhaps that is the lesson we are meant to take away from all of this.

If we allow grossness to be the measure of human worth, the war waged against men and boys will only continue to ramp up as stress increases, and more and more of them will be removed. Women and girls follow soon after.

THE END.

A weak case for the humanity of men

February 28, 2021 | by Jewel Eldora | Link | Original Link

Warning:

This article deals with extremely delicate subject matter, the grossest of human behaviors including rape, murder, pedophilia, all explored alongside common disgust inducers: poop, shit, blood, brains, foreskins, piss, ball sacks and boogers, as well as in-group/out-group behaviors. Women and conservatives may be particularly offended. If you find the title offensive, please keep reading, you are exactly the type of person we are trying to reach. We'll be exploring the biologic and sociologic reasons for why some people implicitly and explicitly reject the humanity of men.

Additional warning, this article contains links to a disturbingly in depth analysis of ass-hair.

You have been warned.

Men are Gross

In order to discuss human grossness, we do well to start with men. Men, for the purposes of brevity, are defined loosely as adult human males, distinct from boys, girls, and women. When you subtract prisoners, the homeless, and the mentally ill, the remainder of integrated men account for roughly 20% of the population. This group, aka "The Good Guys", are the least gross group of men, but yet still manage to create 80-100% of the human generated grossness, according to informal surveys of gender theory professionals.

It should also be noted that a disproportionate of the 1% are also men.

Let Us Not Talk Falsely Now…

Any kidding aside, men, as a group, are gross. In addition to pooping (biologic), shitting (behavioral), pissing, sneezing, and picking boogers like everyone else, they also have foreskins, scrotum, and a greater preponderance of ass hair.

While none of these are necessarily reflections of character, they certainly color how men are viewed as a group. Ass-hair preponderance cannot be ignored, as ass-hairs are potential parasite and pathogen carriers, and human shit is gross to everyone, except maybe Coprophiliacs.

The term "Toxic Masculinity" will be explored briefly as toxicity is a common attribute of grossness. A complete exploration is neither necessary or possible, suffice it to say, for the purposes of reporting on the general grossness of men as a group. Many of the grossest of human behaviors are attributed exclusively, or overwhelmingly to men.

Men, as an out-group, commit nearly all of the rapes, pedophilia, and a massively disproportionate amount of the violent crimes and murders. In war, they kill more than any other group. Men appear, more than any other group, willing to imprison, abuse, torture, execute men, women and children.

Cannibalism, male homosexuality, pederasty, and coprophiliac acts are overwhelmingly performed by men. Yet, some men, and even a small minority of women, still complain that men may feel pain, or are in some way disadvantaged. Often they will include boys, male homosexuals, or the gender dysphoric in their statistics, in an attempt to illicit some sympathy.

Anyone who attempts to deny the fact that men, as a group, are disproportionately responsible for the above activities is being intellectually dishonest.

Men's Rights Activists often use crude humor, inflated statistics, or show men's issues dramatically out of a broader context in an attempt to bolster their arguments that some of our systems favor women, or create a narrative that men are somehow victims of society.

Some arguments typical of the MRA's are shown below without percentages, so as to remain value neutral in their analysis and to avoid legitimizing or validating any of the arguments or claims of derogation. Links are provided for purposes of completeness.

Examples of these weak arguments:

- Greater than 0% of rape allegations made are false
- Greater than 0% of parents are victims of paternity fraud
- Greater than 0% of those convicted and executed are innocent
- They have a greater than 0% chance of being incarcerated victims of the War on Drugs
- They than have a greater than 0% likelihood of suicide
- They have a shorter life expectancy by at least 0 years
- They get the same money for the same work
- Have a greater likelihood of dying on the job
- They are greater than 0% more likely to be uninsured in the US
- They are greater than 0% more likely to be homeless in the US
- They have a greater than 0% greater likelihood to be killed by police homicides; greater than any racial disparity.

- Greater than 0% are victims of legal, non-consensual, genital mutilation, for strictly aesthetic reasons (vs. Religious or Medical Reasons.)
- Greater than 0% live with untreated or undiagnosed mental health illness
- Greater than 0% lose their children in harmful or even deadly custody situations
- All have a greater propensity for ass-hair [Citation Needed]

If you found any of these value neutral arguments insulting, false, misleading, or feel they demonstrate a failure to show the context of the relative suffering of women and children; If you feel that this specific aggregation of information was offensive, or, if you merely observe that men are, in fact, the actual cause of most these problems… you may be one of the 85 – 100% of people who do not automatically self-identify as men, according to one 2004 study published in the APA.

If you have an understanding of out-group social biases and behaviors you will understand the paragraph above demonstrates automatic out-group bias and derogation, (Group Homogeneity, Just World Hypothesis, System Justification Theory, Stereotype Threat) against men. You were more likely than not, in some way, agitated by value neutral arguments about an out-group's experience. If you are a man, you likely received a testosterone spike as if you were facing the "Bad Guys from Across the River" by the implication someone might be sticking up for men.

We are Individuals; They are a Group

According to the APA study, men may lack the mechanism for automatic in-group bias. This trait appeared among all of the men tested, across several tests based on four separate hypotheses: Sex positivity, a feeling that men are threats, competition, or that individuals represent the stereotype of men.

Men appear to be just as likely to derogate men as women are.

In short, if you are one of the 85-100% of humans who do not view men with automatic in-group bias, it may surprise you that regardless of your age or gender, or sexual orientation, you are likely to automatically view men as a subhuman out-group.

All humans view out-groups as subhuman, deserving of derogation or dehumanization. Out-groups are perceived as homogenous stereotypes of the group's members worst behaviors. (see the list above)

They are also perceived as the architects of their own misfortune. As an automatic out-group, men are automatically subject to nearly every social bias human beings exhibit. All human beings exhibit out-group bias. Some groups try to veil human nature with political correctness but it's always there.

Building the Stereotype

The general population's violent and gross stereotype of men is made up of facts that are true for the group (some are rapists, murderers, pedophiles etc.) The general stereotype of men as a group includes that. Your personal stereotype includes that, combined with whatever negative experiences you've personally had with men.

Whether you are a woman or a man, you view men as a part of a stereotype, until they prove themselves otherwise and maintain their position. As soon as men fail to meet your expectations, your view of them through the stereotype sets in. Because we believe that subhumans in the out-group deserve whatever they get and were probably the cause of their own misfortune, the derogation of men seems both natural and acceptable.

In fact, some of you may even be abusing men to increase your in-group esteem, and to possibly relieve your own depression via chemical reward which you receive directly from actively derogating men. All the while, thinking you're behaving reasonably and in the best interest of the tribe. Congratulations, you're an asshole. Unfortunately, it turns out that everyone is kind of an asshole.

Your View of How the Other Half Lives, is not How the Other Half Lives

While commonly accepted gender theories view issues through a lens of oppression, men's issues are clearly issues of derogation (to detract, disparage, or belittle, to take away or remove, so as to impair the whole, to degenerate or debase.) This happens in relationships as well as institutions. Law enforcement, social workers, judges, teachers, and parents are subject to the same drive to systematically derogate boys and men. It seems parasite stress is a protective, biologic imperative to do so.

Men's own willingness to dehumanize other men seems to be a feature of humanity, rather than a bug.

Comparing derogation to oppression seems to create even greater confusion and frustration. While women may be exposed to greater subjugation or dominance, the force in men's lives comes from the near constant reminders that they need to keep their shit together or they will be degraded or removed, often with the full force of the law.

Parasite Stress in Mate Selection

Given the risks and costs associated with sex, pregnancy, childbirth, and an increased susceptibility to disease, it should be no surprise that women's mate choice would be more complex, sophisticated, and discerning. Selection choice, while complex, is functionally measured in esteem and value, as measured against a man's ability to "keep his shit together" at an age appropriate level. In other words, men are suitable when they have the resources and capabilities to manage the complexity of life within your acceptable boundaries. They become less suitable when the complexity of life slips through and perhaps some of it gets on you.

This simplified animation describes some of the most common traits of mate selection. While traits can vary widely from culture to culture, or woman to woman, one trait that is nearly universal is a "willingness to sacrifice your resources or yourself for the needs of women and children." Men and boys who do not meet the age appropriate minimum levels of desired skills, attributes, and values to maintain their suitability, are derogated.

Strong social skills and emotional strength are also very common selection traits.

It may not be surprising that "funniness" or "sense of humor" is also a widely reported desirable male selection trait, as it may be a mechanism to diffuse the stress related to systemic derogation.

We appear to measure the value of a human life based on the level of biologic and behavioral disgust response, yet we understand very little about how it affects us emotionally and behaviorally. Given the disproportionate levels of grossness among men as a group, it's no wonder we often refer to men and boys using parasite, parasite carrier, or parasite containment metaphors, using labels like, "louse, rat, piece of shit, shit-bag, or even the occasional douche/bag, who can't keep his shit together and thinks his shit doesn't stink."

Additionally, humans will use mental illness metaphors to indicate parasites or pathogens: crazy, retarded, schizophrenic, hyper, or narcissist. These labels are more likely to cause derogation among men.

Of all the people in all of the world, none but the most radical of feminists actually hate men, but to one degree or another, most everyone will think of men as homogeneous stereotypes and view them with some level of contempt, disgust, and distrust. Only by dealing with their shit, hiding their shit, covering their shit up, etc. can a man be considered "One of the Good Ones" or "One of Ours" rather than "One of the Bad Guys from Across the River." And unfortunately, in order to keep their in-group status with women (and avoid derogation) many men engage in a wide mix of shitty, destructive, and self-destructive behavior. They will accept and join in on the systematic derogation of other men willingly, in order to keep their esteem with the in-group. The recipients of this systemic bullshit will be your brothers, fathers, uncles, boyfriends, and husbands, and they will go to extreme lengths, including the ultimate, irreversible form of self-destruction, in order to keep you from knowing that they can't contain it or let any get on you.

In the next article, "Oh Fuck; We're Doomed and Only Women Can Save the Day" we'll further explore this trait which human males forgot to develop, and discuss what women might do to save humanity from an authoritarian dystopian hellscape.

Grossness as a human value indicator

Regardless of how one feels about Cassie Jaye's movie about men's rights activists, "The Red Pill," there's no disputing the documentary has received widely varied reactions from different audiences. These vary from intensely supportive to overtly hostile.

In a series of articles, we'll explore the visceral reaction some people have to the topic of men's human rights and explore how some people are inclined to believe men and boys are a subspecies.

To better understand this, we'll explore the science of grossness, parasite and pathogen stress, some attributes of human mate selection, human in-group and out-group dynamics, including the Just-world hypothesis and System Justification Theory, grossness as a measure of human value, and the phenomena of human derogation during an era of proliferation of social technologies.

In order to fully explore grossness in the human experience and men's role as homogeneous human subspecies, we'll also discuss men's apparent inability to automatically recognize other men as humans.

Warning:

These articles cover topics such as poop, shit, blood, brains, foreskins, piss, ball sacks, boogers, implicit and explicit bias, and automatic human in-group/out-group behavior. These are of the grossest topics human beings can conceive, and some may need to take extra care, particularly women and conservatives.

Women and conservatives both report experiencing greater disgust sensitivity than their counterparts. Looking at human social dynamics through the lens of disgust (parasite and pathogen stress) is disturbing and might reveal a darker view into the experience of humanity as a whole.

While disgust is a deeply ingrained, useful, emotional response that has served our species very well, some of the darkest, most tragic, historical events have been directly linked to it. While disgusting things have always been a problem for our species, it seems the stresses created by disgust may be even more dangerous. Grossness is an emotional response and can supersede logic and subvert reason.

Increased parasite stress leads to greater maltreatment of children, violence, murder, and the rise of totalitarian regimes, both left and right. Disgust is inextricably woven into of our social and political fabric. Grossness is used to describe and evaluate humans, human bodies, and human behavior, as well, to demonstrate group status.

Appearing grossed out by the "right" things can improve ingroup standing. Logic, reason and ethics can all be overridden when disgust sensitivity is exploited. In the last century, this may have led to more and bloodier violence, and related deaths, than any other known period. Exploiting disgust sensitivity via disgust derogation is dangerous but the rewards can be great for despots.

Between 1914-1918, 70 million people were exposed to unparalleled gore and violence. World War I caused over 16 million deaths. Some survivors came home carrying the 1918 Flu which was responsible for more deaths than the war itself; Between 20 and 50 million by most estimates.

It should be noted, these were particularly gruesome deaths, of mostly robust, healthy children and young adults causing unparalleled societal stress. An argument could be made that the world was "grossed into" World War II.

In Alvin Toffler's 1970 book, "Future Shock" he explores technology stress and the concept of "too much change in too short a period of time". The rise of interconnected, inter-networked, pervasive technologies seems to have correlated directly with the rise to record high stress levels.

The story of humans, interwoven with parasites, pathogens, their carriers, and related stress, is an unusually unpleasant tale and is difficult and often too socially taboo to discuss.

Be forewarned, these articles are NSFW. There will be foul language, grossness, and disgusting human behavior, mixed with mild attempts at humor. I will try and keep it as inoffensive as possible because its message may be vitally important. Understanding why some percentage of people are incapable of or unwilling to see men as human beings, may just stop us from racing toward a global catastrophe.

You have been warned.

Why are Some People Squeamish or Angry about Men as a Human Rights Demographic?

The suggestion that men are humans, while seemingly logical on the surface, may make some people indignant, uncomfortable, or literally disgusted. Others, by contrast, might take active offense immediately and intuitively. If you are one of those, this article is for you.

This paper explores the underlying biologic and sociological impulses explaining why some people have this visceral, gut level reaction; some frightening implications, and perhaps, some hope that a few good women will eventually save the day.

First Exploration of a Theory of Universal human Grossness

Humans are gross. We emerge from sacks of placenta, end up as corpses, and in between, we, fart, poop, pee, pick our noses, and vomit. Sometimes all at the same time. Sometimes on ourselves, sometimes on others. We're not always able to de-gross ourselves to our own satisfaction, let alone to the satisfaction of others. Men, women, boys and girls all exhibit grossness. We all experience it.

Both biologic and behavioral traits can be measured in grossness. Many gross words describe behaviors and people (i.e. being a shit, acting shitty, slimebag, greaseball, or being an asshole) This is the functional language of social grossness. Grossness is often used to derogate out-groups.

Disgust derogation is a conflation process where people become gross, either through contact with actual pathogens and parasites, their carriers, or through association by exhibiting contrary behaviors or beliefs, as defined by the in-group. Grossness can also be transferred through accusations.

Humans often retaliate when grossness is thrust upon them. People hate being labeled as gross, or conflated with grossness. It stirs exaggerated, often violent, escalated reactions. Stress, in the US has been rising for 40 years during which time there have been increases in human derogation via increased prison populations and homelessness.

Social grossness was explored to great effect in Stephen King's first novel, "Carrie". In the 1977 movie adaptation, Vinnie Barbarino's in-group conspires to dump pig's blood, a parasite and pathogen carrier, onto a Coal Miner's Daughter. Her response to the derogation is to use the Force to mutilate and burn everyone involved, except the heroic girl who was brave enough to speak up against the group.

People also resent the implication that they, or their in-group, may be susceptible to the abuse of disgust propaganda or derogation. Whether the abuse is biologic grossness (boogers, poop, etc.) or attitude, behavior, or belief grossness.

People often exhibit an escalated response to being called Racist, Sexist, Anti-Semitic. These are among modern societies most damning insults, right after pedophile or murderer, and it's akin to being accused of being perennially and viciously stupid.

This may be in part, because racists, sexists, and anti-semites have historically been incited by disgust derogation which has been linked to violent or asocial behavior. The implication that someone is a racist, sexist, or Anti-Semite implies that person possesses a certain, dangerous gullibility.

When in-groups engage in out-group disgust derogation, they are exploiting parasite or pathogen stress to demonstrate the superiority of their group's social position, while lowering the out-group's relative humanity. Subhumans are not seen as individuals, but as stereotypes of the out-group.

Resistance to the Abuse of Disgust Propaganda

The potential spread of pathogens and parasites is serious business. Humans find it deeply disturbing to discover disgust derogation being used to increase in-group favoritism or promote out-group derogation, especially when it invariably goes beyond acceptable parameters.

For many reasons, human beings resent being manipulated by disgust, and become enraged when people are discovered using disgust derogation to harm members of an out-group.

The Kathy Griffin Effect

If a group were looking to convert or motivate women or conservatives using disgust derogation they might want to think twice.

Abusers of disgust derogation can unwittingly create sympathy for the out-group when the abuse of derogation is discovered. The in-group loses reputation, and are sometimes shamed out of existence.

No two examples illustrate this more clearly than Nazi propaganda, which framed Jews as both vermin and lice, and American anti-black propaganda, which framed black men as rapists, inherently inferior, or willing to harm women, or harm children or neglect the needs of children. These people are pissed about this and have every right to be.

Attributing these behaviors to men of any subgroup is a powerful manipulation, as these are universally understood to be undesirable mate selection traits. This links that group's stereotype directly to parasites and pathogens. Men who are unacceptable are gross and subhuman.

Within certain boundaries, the abuse of parasite stress in propaganda is extremely effective, in-group members can believe, at a gut level, that the out-group are all the same, and that they deserve whatever they get, because, generally speaking, they're to blame for their own misfortune. In-groups are subject to nearly every social bias against out-group members.

Disgust derogation conflates disease, disease carrying agents, or behaviors that the in-group finds disgusting and dumps them on the out-group. The out-group is then subject to dehumanization and derogation. As mentioned, people are offended at the mere suggestion, that they themselves could be influenced or persuaded by such obvious manipulation.

While this type of propaganda is effective in encouraging out-group derogation or removal, it also boosts in-group esteem. Although it does appear to become counter-effectual when we witness levels of out-group abuse getting out of control, or breaching accepted boundaries.

The Nazi brand is forever associated with the Auschwitz/Dachau documentary footage; footage so disgusting, it was ultimately abandoned by director Alfred Hitchcock.

American anti-black racism is linked in our collective imagination with images of Emmett Till.

Nearly all of us felt revulsion when anti-white, anti-Trump bigotry manifested in violence in the 2017 kidnap and torture of a young autistic man, exposed to violence, humiliation, and possibly parasites/pathogens. Similarly. we all felt uncomfortable with the recent shooting of Congressman Scalise.

These tragedies entered the public consciousness and will not likely leave it soon. Similarly, if you are less outraged by either of these, you may be one of the 85-100% of people who may not recognize men as human beings.

We may not be equally disgusted by these things, of course; but we are trained against the beliefs, movement, or group that manipulated us, or others, in such a way as to corrupt acceptable boundaries for the treatment of others. Disgust is inherently about the violation of boundaries and the protections those boundaries afford.

Spreading parasite stress among the tribe, via social exchanges, facial expressions, body language or propaganda, has been a very effective way to elicit social change, but it appears it may even be more disastrous than spreading actual parasites.

Child Maltreatment, Murder, and the rise of Authoritarian Governments have all been linked to an increase in parasite stress. Spreading of parasite stress to advance a political agenda is a dangerous practice which we should should no longer tolerate. It will come back to bite any group, or ideology that uses it.

In the next article, we'll make a Weak Case for the Humanity of Men. Stay Tuned.

Have Women Ever Been Oppressed in the United States?

March 3, 2021 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

GAB TV:

Related to Tom Golden's video above, the historical quotes below help to shed light on the question of whether women in America were ever truly "oppressed." I think we all know the answer.

In 1856, author of Putnam's Monthly Magazine published the following summary of relations between men and women in America:

> "Long before the cry of woman's rights was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined. Usage superseded law, and trampled it under foot. Sentiment put logical consistency at defiance, and the American husband has thus become a legal monster, a logical impossibility, required to fly without wings, and to run without feet.
> "While the wife is thus rendered to a great extent independent of her husband, he, by a strange inconsistency is still held, both by law and public opinion, just as responsible for her as before. The old and reasonable maxim that 'he who dances must pay the piper,' does not apply to wives—they dance, and the husband pays. To such an extent is this carried, that if the wife beats her husband, and he, having no authority to punish her in kind, applies to the criminal courts for redress, she will be fined for assault and battery, which fine he must pay, even thought she has plenty of money of her own. or, in default of paying, go to jail! Such cases are by no means of unprecedented occurrence in our criminal courts.

In 1903 culture critic Max O'Rell observed the following about gynocentrism in the USA:

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country."

Price Collier observed in 1909:

> In England the establishment is, as a rule, at any rate from a man's point of view, more comfortable than the American home. Americans staying any time in England, whether men or women, are impressed by the fact that it is the country of men. Likewise the English, both men and women, who visit America are impressed by the fact that America is the country of women.

Irishman George A. Birmingham wrote in 1914:

> "There are people in the world who believe that we are born again and again, > rising or sinking in the scale of living things at each successive incarnation according as we behave ourselves well or badly in our present state. If this creed were true, I should try very hard to be good, because I should want, next time I am born, to be an American woman. She seems to me to have a better kind of life than the women of any other nation, or, indeed, than anybody else, man or woman… American social life seems to me — the word is one to apologize for — gynocentric. It is arranged with a view to the convenience and delight of women. Men come in where and how they can…. The American woman is certainly more her own mistress than the Englishwoman, just because America does its best for women and only its second-best for men. The tendency among American humourists is to dwell a little on the greed of the Englishman, who is represented as incapable of earning money for himself. The English jester lays more stress on the American woman's desire to be called "my lady," and pokes sly fun at the true Democrat's fondness for titles. The American man is reverent toward women. It is not the homage of the strong toward the weak, but the obeisance of the inferior in the presence of a superior. This difference of spirit underlies the whole relationship of men to women in England and America. The English feminist is up against chivalry and wants equality. The American woman, though she may claim rights, has no inducement to destroy reverence.

Albert Einstein observed in 1921:

> Above all things are the women who as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in the most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is in the vogue, and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

The Child Archetype as Responsible for Woke Dystopia

March 12, 2021 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Voices around the world are announcing a rapid decay of culture forms and a descent into dystopia. On a grass roots level, much of that decay is driven by the rise of infantile narcissism centered on 'me and my vulnerabilities' along with 'me and my demands,' a pathological focus that channels its energy into topics like racial or gender-diversity tribalisms.

The force of such tribalism tends to take as prisoner all remaining citizens who don't identify themselves with the child archetype, creating a two-class society of childlike adults who set out to pull on the heartstrings of more matured, responsible adults within the same society.

The result is a society operating not so much on a division between races, genders, income or sexual orientations, but divided instead by those with a psychological attitude of children vs those with an adult perspective.

Using biological language, what we are witnessing is a hacking of the parental brain of society, garnering its collective sympathies with the bait of dramatized neoteny. When our biological operating system is hacked in this way, and the hack is taught as cultural operating practice within government institutions, universities and in popular culture, there is little way to circumvent its omnipotent demands.

The only way to circumvent the 'aggressive vulnerability' of the child archetype is for a portion of society to say NO when faced with its demands, which appear as an insistence for redress of female victimhood, race victimhood, "marginalized" sexuality, and so on — the masks of the child archetype.

Biologists, neurologists, evolutionary psychologists, and ethologists have long recognized parent and child instincts in the form of parents' urge to caretake and protect juveniles, and conversely of juveniles having an impulse to announce their vulnerability to signal their need to be cared for. This biological fact was independently discovered and understood by archetypal psychologists (parent & child archetypes), object relations psychologists (parent & child objects), and by other schools of psychology dealing with the 'inner child' and its need for caretaking. Object relations psychology goes so far as claiming the sexual libido is subservient to the evolutionary imperative of parent~child bonding, making this dyad the strongest motivator in human affairs.

As an interesting point of distinction, Jungians differentiate between the child archetype and what they alternatively refer to as the 'puer archetype' which can be represented respectively by the images of a toddler (child archetype) and an older child/teen (puer archetype). The puer archetype is perfectly represented by the figure of Peter Pan – youthful, loving of new experiences, playful, spontaneous, optimistic, adventurous and independent.

Contrary to the phenomenology of child archetype, the puer archetype is not represented as a small vulnerable child in need of coddling and protecting, he's an independent child or youth and an archetypal imperative vital to the psychological health of all men and women.

This Jungian differentiation between the motives of infantile child archetype, and youthful puer archetype respectively, is why I reject admonishments of the puer impulse as "Peter Pan syndrome" or as "failure to launch," which essentially brands men as "pathetic man babies" and shames them into assuming one-sided, and indeed one-dimensional posture of adult responsibility. "Failure to launch" applies more properly to an overidentification with the child archetype, which deserves challenging when it reaches the status of personal or cultural dominance.

While the above video provides only half of the full speech given by Hillman on the child archetype, it does impart a good overview of the topic. Hillman touches there on Jung's description of the child archetype as including vulnerability, a sense of futurity (that life will begin in the future), innocence, and also a feeling of "hermaphroditism." This sexual orientation of the child archetype (hermaphroditism) is also confirmed in Freud's idea that toddlers are "polymorphous perverse" and haven't yet formed what he understood as an appropriate genital identity.

Perhaps those early observations by Jung and Freud make sense when you consider the concerns of the 'marginalized' wokists today who champion multiple genders, non-binarism, bisexuality, transgenderism etc. and aggressively demand to be taken care of.

Despite a huge body of scientific evidence showing that men are victimised at similar, or slightly higher rates, as women, male victims have been dismissed and ignored for decades. Taken from two large international surveys, here are the voices of men from the UK that have been subjected to domestic abuse and coercive control from their female partner.

Masculine Enchantments: Fairy Tales and Men's Rights

March 14, 2021 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

The Men's Rights Movement exists to recognize and ameliorate problems, institutional or social, that predominantly or exclusively harm boys and men. To that end, activists have adopted strategies ranging from filmmaking to legal action. Media analysis has also been done (Allemano, 2012) but with folktales largely ignored. This is unfortunate since folklore in its various forms has practical functions: entertaining, justifying institutions, enforcing cultural norms, educating, and providing escapism (Bascom, 1954). Thus, MRAs could harness the power and versatility of folktales to influence the culture. "The Four Artful Brothers" (Manheim, 1977) is a strong foundation since it complies with pro-male values in several ways.

The story tells of siblings who leave home to find jobs when they're father is unable to provide for them. Becoming a thief, a hunter, an astronomer, and a tailor, they return home, demonstrate their skills to their approving father. A dragon attacks days later and the boys combine their talents to rescue the princess, resulting in them getting awarded their own principalities.

Folklorists have argued that this tale and its variants have remained popular partly because it focuses on educating sons (Zipes, 2000). This theme is relevant for contemporary advocates because male literacy and academic achievement lags behind that of girls (Autor & Wasserman, 2013) and has since 1870 (Tyack & Hansot, 1988). But this tale doesn't just dramatize anxieties regarding male education, it alleviates them. "The Fourt Artful Brothers" is a multi-genre narrative that includes action, fantasy, and real-world problems, which are the kinds of texts boys prefer and which they aren't usually given (Boys Literacy Teacher Inquiry Project, 2008). To wit: the siblings battle a dragon and survive a shipwreck, satisfying the action requirement. The presence of a dragon, an omniscient telescope, and a magical needle-and-thread place the text within fantasy. And the premise of the story – leaving home to find gainful employment – is a realistic goal and concern for many young adults. Altogether, these elements fulfill the multi-genre requirement.

Combined with that is a nuanced depiction of masculinity. For instance, the story is about young men mastering skills and courageously facing mortal peril. These two traits – mastery and courage – are considered bedrocks of traditional manhood (Donovan, 2012). Yet, the tale is inclusive of men who deviate from norms. Consider the mentors: their role as teachers is people-oriented, which contrasts with men's general preference for object-oriented work (Rong et al., 2009). The main family also deviates from norms; the boys have no mother, implying that childrearing and housekeeping were done by their father and themselves since the birth of the youngest. The youngest himself does tailoring – a subset of textile work like sewing, knitting, and weaving – which has traditionally been a feminine craft (Barber, 1998). Notably, the king says that each of the brothers have an equal right to marry his daughter, metaphorically saying that all men are worthy of respect and recognition, regardless of their gender expression.

Another point in the tale's favor is its multilayered subversion of male disposability. While the boys do endanger themselves for a woman they've never met, their primary motive is to prove the usefulness of their skills. Their secondary motive is economic, since they came from poverty and are unemployed at the time. Another challenge to the disposability of men comes from the king. Unlike real-world leaders who conscript men to war (Watson, 2014) or citizens who sacrifice men for women's benefit (FeldmanHall et al., 2016), the king offers an incentive to save the princess and the boys are the only men to go her rescue.

Marina Warner, a prominent mythographer, once declared, "I decided that it was crucial not to leave the territory of the imagination to those history has taught us to recognize as dangerous" (The University of Sheffield, 2017). Hers is an attitude that men's rights activist should embrace wholeheartedly, especially because those who pose a threat to male wellness already have a head start.

Another Male Mea Culpa

March 15, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

Paul Jennings is a very successful children's author, particularly in his homeland, Australia. I recently bought his autobiography, Untwisted. My enjoyment of the book was sullied by the endless references to female oppression, misogyny and the selfishness of men. Paul was quite blunt in his appraisal of his father as a cold, narcissistic man who did not like his son.

I felt Paul's own words often contradicted his incessant references to female disadvantage as well as his depiction of his dad as the cause of all the family woes and his mother the kind, self-sacrificing martyr.

I recently wrote him a twelve-page letter.

Dear Paul,

I don't believe this letter will ever be read by you but I'm willing to write it even if there is the slightest chance, I could be proven wrong.

I recently bought your wonderful book. Untwisted, the Story of my Life and I loved it. Your honesty, self-deprecation and willingness to expose your weaknesses and failings was truly courageous and such revelations will surely open up the hearts of others to perhaps be more vulnerable and open about their own struggles and fears when they engage with the people in their lives.

I'd like to thank you as a recently retired primary school teacher, for the hours of joy, laughter and escapism you provided so many of the kids I taught over a number of decades. What an incredible legacy.

I want to comment on something I perceived as a repeating undercurrent in your story: that being the lot of the girls and women in your life. You constantly presented them as being somehow oppressed and disaffected because of our misogynistic culture.

There were constant references to your sister's dreams being dashed when your own hopes of matriculating were shattered by your dad's decision to end your schooling before you could matriculate.

Why was her failure to matriculate (due to your dad's decision) somehow more tragic or unfair than what was done to you?

You referred to your dad as having a 'narcissistic personality" so I am confused by some of your anecdotes.

You wrote:

"My father's chance to become employed at the top level in a big factory finally presented itself. His application was successful-he rushed over and bought a home for us in Glenelg."

"My mother didn't even get to see the house. She had already made the big move from England." (so had your dad and it wasn't his fault your grandma had a bad dream and decided to desert her daughter and beloved grandchildren. This clearly led to the feelings of isolation and grief your mum experienced yet you bear your grandma no ill will and only talk of your deep affection for her. Was she not selfish?).

It seems you frame every situation with your mum as the victim and your dad the bully. I am sure he was hoping to be able to offer a better standard of living for his family by securing a higher paying, higher status job yet you seem to infer his sole motivation was to pump up his own considerable ego.

Later in your story you praise your mum- in- law for her high achievement in the work force and her climb from poverty to a middle-class status and openly admire her "for calling things the way they were and being the dominant force in her marriage." Perhaps she was just a bullying narcissist too.

Back in Adelaide where your dad has begun his new job you write: "her (your mum's) unhappiness wore him down but it increased my feelings of love and concern for her.

I would never make a woman I love live somewhere she didn't want to–

You write as though making your mum unhappy was the motivation behind your dad's decision to move to Adelaide. Surely thousands of families have moved house to follow the breadwinner's best job prospects. It's never easy and often heartbreaking but families weigh up what they think is the best long-term decision.

This passage stunned me, given your description of your dad as a domineering narcissist:

My dad only lasted four months. He couldn't take my mother's dark depression. (and I assume her silent treatment and probable absence of any physical intimacy).

Rather than frame your dad's decision to turn his back on a job he had fought hard to secure because your mum was depressed, as a sacrificial act (which it assuredly was given what he knew he would be facing on his return) you use the word "lasted" so as to present it as yet another flaw in a deeply flawed man. It was simply a sign of his weakness. He was so weak he couldn't even endure coming home to a silent, angry wife every night after a hard day's work.

So pathetic. That seems to be your summing up of his actions.

How is it possible that a domineering narcissist would so quickly throw away a job he had desperately sought and return to his previous workplace in a position of drastically reduced status because his wife was unhappy?

The silent treatment seems to be a recurring theme where your mum is concerned.

"My mother is hiding her feelings with silence. I can see that she doesn't like Helen."

And then we have the day your mum and dad were hanging wallpaper and your mum grew fed up with your dad's constant complaining and criticizing.

"She threw a wet brush at him and stalked off. She didn't talk to him for a month. Not a word."

Again. You seemed to be in awe of your mother's feat of silence.

If you go on any domestic violence sight it is listed as one of the many forms of abuse used as a weapon in relationships.

Have you ever had a mate or woman in your life give you even a small dose of "the silent treatment"? It is a truly devastating experience. You become invisible. You lose your sense of self. It is humiliating. It is demeaning. It is soul destroying. Each day you hope you will see a smile or hear a kind word, an apology, feel a gentle touch. And you say this went on for a month? Unimaginable. Clearly, again, no touch or intimacy either.

This is an excerpt from an article by a relationships expert.

Identifying Silent Treatment

In general, the silent treatment is a manipulation tactic that can leave important issues in a relationship unresolved. It also can leave the partner on the receiving end feeling worthless, unloved, hurt, confused, frustrated, angry, and unimportant.

When one or both partners sulk, pout, or refuse to talk, they are exerting a cruel type of power in the relationship that not only shuts out their partner but also communicates that they do not care enough to try to communicate or collaborate.

When silence, or, rather, the refusal to engage in a conversation, is used as a control tactic to exert power in a relationship, then it becomes "the silent treatment," which is toxic, unhealthy, and abusive.

Let's flip the roles for one moment.

Imagine your dad thought your mum nagged him too much, so he hurled a wet paintbrush in her face and then refused to speak to her or touch her for a month. I wonder how that story would have been framed?

You noted the fact that only boys were beaten every day in the classroom while the girls were spoken to with respect. You didn't make any observations about society's twisted double standards regarding the way to discipline girls and boys. Was this sexist? Unjust?

I was strapped by the Christian brothers when I attended school. My sisters never had a hair on their heads touched. Males were just so privileged.

Perhaps girls would not have been so quick to demand equal treatment in our education system if it meant having to endure what you suffered so horrendously under Mr. Brown's rule. You were tortured on a daily basis. No girl suffered such treatment. Now that is privilege!

I just missed out on the privilege of being conscripted to fight in the jungles of Vietnam, just another privilege the girls missed out on due to the chauvinism of our society. Many other boys were not so lucky.

No girl ever lived under the threat of being dragged from their home and sent away to kill or be killed.

When your marriage fell apart, you wrote:

"All I wanted, apart from my lecturing job was "mum, dad and the kids" trips to the beach and snow fields, camping, reading stories to the littlies, dressing up as santa, ten weeks holiday every year. And of course, being head of the family and getting all the attention.

Bliss.

For the man."

The many pages preceding this passage make a mockery of your words. Your life was in no way at any stage, privileged or easier than your wife's. You wrote:

"I ran off into the bedroom and got into the wardrobe, closed the door and squatted down in the foetal position with my head between my knees."

So empowered. So blissful.

You both suffered heartache, frustration, broken hopes and dreams, financial struggle and exhaustion. Why do you attempt to present the whole situation as being in any way related to gender?

As for the line about "of course being the head of the family and getting all the attention" – I don't believe for one moment that you were the "head of the family" or that you "got all the attention." You wrote it to add power to your assertion that women were somehow oppressed and disadvantaged.

The fact of the matter is most dads were never the head of the family inside the household and most definitely they were not the centre of attention.

I think back to my childhood in the 60's and there is no doubt in my mind that the majority of homes were ruled by the mum and the dad was in the background both literally and when it came to decisions about the household or attention from the kids. This was partly because the dad was away from the home from early morning to late in the evening. Today women control 80% of the household spending.

This isn't a good or bad thing. The men worked and earned the money and the mum's took care of the home front.

You played the gender card again when you wrote:

"I can see that my mother did die spiritually when, in addition to living a life like the one I described above, she left her home, her mother and her sister to live in another culture in another land."

I know you didn't like your dad but he left his homeland behind too. He left his dad and mum and perhaps a brother or two and had to adapt to living in another culture, another land.

Your mum's mother left her, yet you find nothing to condemn in her actions.

You write about a woman being trapped in a man's world, unable to pursue her dreams or goals. But you don't for one moment acknowledge that the very same thing can and has happened to men who marry a dominant partner. I have a couple of mates who endured hell in their marriages at the hands of bullying narcissists who just happened to be female.

You say an extrovert and introvert can get on well together- but not if the man's world takes precedence. Why would you write that? Why didn't you write, but not if either partner's world takes precedence?

You say you were horrified to hear yourself dominating the conversation with a friend of your wife on a tape recording as though that is all that needs to be said about all male/female interactions. Perhaps you were 'mansplaining". I have known and engaged with countless women who dominate the conversation in their home and the man is the quiet, subservient partner.

Why do so many men do what you do this in this day and age? I am so tired of people almost apologizing for being male. Why didn't you approach these issues from a human perspective? Do you really believe one gender inherently possesses all of the negative characteristics you refer to?

You say back then, the whole culture was a woman's enemy if they wanted a full and balanced life.

What does this mean? What is a full and balanced life? My brother was the boss of a bricklaying company. He died two years ago at the age of 57. He worked his fingers to the bone. He died just as he was contemplating retirement. He was up at 5:00 am every morning.

His wife didn't work, because she didn't want to. Men in our society don't have that choice. Many women do. She lived in a lovely home with a sauna, swimming pool and all the money she needed to buy whatever she felt the desire to buy.

They loved each other and raised three beautiful daughters. Tell me which partner had the full and balanced life?

Back in the "bad old days" you refer to, I saw my dad work his heart out to look after and support his family. He adored us and we adored him. He wanted nothing more than to be with us yet society demanded he work long hours for 45 years. He was robbed of so much. My mum worked hard too, but she had the joy of seeing us grow and the friendships of all the other mums in the neighbourhood. They played in badminton competitions and went to calisthenic classes while my dad and their husbands worked. It was hardly hell on earth for women.

Some of these mums may have yearned for more and been unable to achieve their dreams due to having children. But just as many dads had to let go of their dreams and take on mindless, back breaking, often dangerous and dirty jobs in order to provide for their family.

They saw little of their kids.

Were their lives full and balanced? I truly cannot fathom this endless focus on women's needs and women's wants as though men haven't endured the same in a different but just as frustrating and heartbreaking way.

Where is this imaginary world of male privilege and life satisfaction?

For every woman who yearned for a career there was a man yearning for more time with his kids. There were also many women who loved being a home body and housewife and found it fulfilling and enjoyable. There were men who found their career satisfying and exciting.

How can you split humanity so neatly and write as if men lived in some pristine world where they were able to achieve their dreams and have whatever they wanted while women were oppressed and lost?

You write about your selfishness in initially not allowing your wife more time with her visiting rights. Again, you speak of your male selfishness and your sister (it took a woman to set you straight) opening your eyes to that selfishness without mentioning the fact that it is overwhelmingly men who are denied access to their kids by cruel selfish women and a biased court system.

It seems beyond argument that our legal system is determined to prevent men from experiencing a full and balanced life.

I've already mentioned the beatings boys copped and the conscription in the seventies. That's not nothing.

Any statistic used to measure health and wellbeing shows men as the overwhelmingly disadvantaged demographic.

Boys and men are still killing themselves at four times the rate of females yet glass ceilings and mansplaining get more media coverage than this horrific statistic.

Perhaps men's lives may not be quite as full and balanced as so many seem to think. Boys are failing in our schools; men are having their children torn from them even when they have done nothing wrong and their lives destroyed by the biased Family Court. 96% of workplace deaths are male. 75% of those living hard on the streets are men.

I know you didn't intend to write a book about women's rights. It was a fascinating, beautifully written account of one man's life. But you chose to hammer the issue of women's "oppression" throughout your story so I think my long letter is relevant.

As I was reading a review of your book on an ABC site an advertisement for another article popped up. The article was titled

"Call for cultural change around stay at home dads"

A father who features in the article had his comments quoted beneath the title.

"Melbourne dad, Michael Wilson, says making it easier for fathers to stay at home with their kids is important for workplace equality for women!

Father's Day sparks calls for cultural change around stay-at-home dads – ABC News

It seemed to tie in neatly with your approach to the issue of gender in our society. Rather than view the increase of stay-at-home fathers as a wonderful thing for men who at long last are able to break free of the shackles of decades of fulltime grind in the workplace and have an opportunity to be with their kids, it is all about women's equality in the workplace.

Do those women intend working for the next forty years while hubby stays home long after the kids have left school? I doubt it. In this privileged male world, I can promise you it is the wife who allows her hubby to take some time to be a stay-at-home dad and it will be the wife who lets him know when it’s time for him to return to his breadwinner role.

I’m an opinionated little bastard aren’t I?

I was touched by your final pages where you wrote about the death of your dad and wondered if perhaps you had been too harsh in your depiction of him.

I think you are a kind, compassionate, empathetic man who I would love to sit with and talk for hours over a cuppa. I loved your book. I was swept up from the opening page and enjoyed the journey.

I have a deep passion for people but in recent years a particularly strong concern and compassion for men. It seems most of the major institutions in our society deem men a problem to be dealt with, a creature requiring improvement and a toxic poison if not handled carefully.

Our education system and universities are often hostile places for males. The entertainment industry continues to create dramas in which men are abusive selfish monsters and the women good, generous, innocent victims. This has been happening for five decades. You can literally say you hate men in a book title, newspaper article or morning tv program and face zero backlash. I have read many such articles by Clementine Ford and she held her position at The Age for years. How long do you think a male journalist would keep his job if his byline was “Kill all women”.

If a male presenter dared say anything construed as criticism of women as a collective (no matter how mild or true) he would most likely have the angry feminist mob demanding he be sacked and in most cases this would be the outcome. This is not idle chatter. It is the truth.

What does that tell us about who holds the real power in our society?

A wise person once said: Ask yourself this simple question. Who am I not able to criticize in my society? When you give your answer, you will know who holds the power.

This is why I felt let down by your attitude. It’s nice to escape the endless berating of masculinity yet there it was again, just when I thought I was escaping into a fascinating story.

Thanks for reading my long letter (if you’ve got this far). Thanks for your many wonderful stories and the joy you have given to so many.

Take care, Paul.

Kind regards,

Mark Dent

What Your Butt Says About You As a Man

March 22, 2021 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Honeybadger team Brian and Alison look at an article from Mel Magazine entitled “A NEW CRACK OPENS IN THE MANOSPHERE” where the topic of discussion appears to be something akin to “real alphas tickle the prostates of other alphas”… or something.

Mel Magazine is a masculinities/feminism-inspired rag “for men” that is founded & funded by Dollar Shave Club and, as you will see, is no better than the famously wokefied shave company Gillette.

The Feminine Protest – Not What You Think

March 24, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

A funny thing happened to one of Alfred Adler's theories on the way to the psychology textbook. It underwent a sex change – long before it was fashionable to do so.

Adler was one of the pioneers of psychiatry. Born in 1870, appropriately enough, in Vienna, where Freud hung out his shingle. In fact, Adler was a disciple of the older man (Freud was born in 1856). As often happens with disciples, they later go their own way, not entirely in opposition to the master but veering away from the dogma to an extent that they are often considered apostates. Like Carl Jung, Adler used Freudian psychology as a springboard for his own theories. He was successful enough that in subsequent years Adlerian, like Freudian and Jungian, became an adjective.

In effect, Adler's own life was an example of his theories. A sickly child, he later posited that every person is born with a sense of inferiority. One's success in life to a large degree depends on how one deals with this inborn trait. If the sense of inferiority remains rooted in the personality, one develops an inferiority complex. "Everyone's goal is one of superiority," he noted, "but in the case of those who lose their courage and self-confidence, it is diverted from the useful to the useless side of life." "Useful" folks respond by striving to outshine their peers. Of course, how one defines his peers depends on the society one is born into as well as one's class within that society.

Astonishing achievements may result from someone with exceptional talent, but even lesser individuals can be goal-directed. The overriding theme is moving from inferiority to superiority, from the minus side of the ledger to the plus, to get a raise, a promotion, or some sort of recognition that indicates a rise in status. In Adler's own words, "whatever name we give it, we shall always find in human beings this great line of activity – the struggle to rise from an inferior position to a superior position, from defeat to victory, from below to above." (emphasis in original text).

Adler's work focuses on individualism and ambition, not the collective. According to Adler, those who embrace a victim mentality are wrong-headed. Obviously, if he were still walking the earth, Adler would likely be a candidate for cancellation. His books would disappear from Amazon, demonstrators would haunt his public appearances, and if he had a web site, it would probably be subject to trolling. Indeed, science screenwriter Robert Ardrey once wrote that "his psychology brought shudders more and more severe to those students increasingly enchanted by the equalitarian ideal." Bear in mind that Ardrey wrote those words more than 50 years ago. Equity-obsessed academics are hardly new, though they had better manners in the old days. Then again, who didn't?

Adler theorized about a human aggressive instinct, but not necessarily a destructive one. It entailed not violence and destruction but self-actualization. Unlike today's self-esteem movements, it was based on actual achievements; self-esteem was something people had to earn; it was not a birthright. It could result from a higher income, a trophy, another stripe on the chevron, advanced degrees, or stunning artistic or intellectual achievements.

So what does this have to do with sex changes? All right, bear with me a little longer. Before we get that far, we need to explore Adler just a little more.

A corollary of Adler's theory was the masculine protest. In his day it was usually applied to young men who were overly assertive or arrogant as a means of compensating for inferiority. The juvenile delinquent of the 1950s is a superb example. A typical JD is callow and shallow, a know-it-all, a loudmouthed lout who bristles at the mere hint of authority (think of the punks in movies like The Blackboard Jungle or The Wild One). Needless to say, seven decades later, their like still dwell among us, though another explanation may be proffered: toxic masculinity, with re-education camps preferred over reform school.

Nevertheless, somewhere along the way, perhaps during the first wave of feminism, the term masculine protest began to be applied to females. Of course, shrews, termagants, harpies, harridans – call them what you will – are nothing new. But the application of the masculine protest to them implied an inborn female inferiority. As women began to compete in a yang world, their yin was a handicap. In moving to the yang side they often overcompensated. Hence the theory of the masculine protest came to be applied to women more than to men. Thus the sex change I mentioned at the outset of this article.

But now the times, they are-a-changin' once more. So I herewith offer the feminine protest. No, it has nothing to do with old-style bra burning, slut walks, the blue hair brigades, or women with more piercings than pores. Now it's all about transsexuals.

Though a tiny part of the population, transsexuals exercise influence way beyond their numbers. Woe betide the public figure who inadvertently offends them. Of course, transvestites are nothing new. I suspect they go back to the dawn of civilization. Such characters used to be the stuff of comedy, a staple of Shakespeare, vaudeville, burlesque, and movies (e.g., Some Like It Hot). A guy in drag was always good for a cheap laugh. But slowly it took a turn for the serious.

By 1982 Tootsie offered us Dustin Hoffman in drag, but not entirely for comedic purposes. During the film there were a number of laments about the tough lot of women. That same year we got Victor/Victoria, which offered us a female singer masquerading as a female impersonator to get a job, then finishes off by outing himself/herself as a man and…well, it gets confusing. Then there was Bosom Buddies, an early 80s sitcom with Tom Hanks in drag. Hard to believe that he was able to overcome that and transform his image into an American everyman. Even so, the emphasis was more on comedy that social commentary.

Today gender fluidity has overflowed its banks and joined the mainstream. No longer is the male in female attire the subject of ridicule. Even as late as 1985 (e.g., Just One of the Guys) you could still play up the "fish out of water" aspect of cross-dressing, as a teenage girl masquerades as a boy. Today there is no shortage of comic potential in the topic of former men/current women competing against female athletes but no one would dare attempt to make fun of the situation. Somewhere along the line, that sort of thing stopped being funny. The narrative has changed: now it's not about a fish out of water, but about a fish learning to swim not in a different body of water, but in a different body.

Of course, the old-fashioned cross-dressers existed at a time when patriarchy was merely a description of certain societies, not a curse word. Now it is bundled with such dreaded concepts as toxic masculinity and male privilege and good old boy networks. Masculinity has always varied from society to society but the concept itself was never vilified. Till now.

What's a young man to do these days? He looks around and sees females not just competing with him but being kicked upstairs while he remains on the ground floor. His upward mobility is stunted, his status is declining, his sex is anathematized at every turn. It appears s there is no way out. But if he's willing to undergo hormone injections and invest in a new wardrobe…

Well, if women became masculine to gain an advantage in competitive circles, then doesn't it make sense for a man to become feminine to gain an advantage in a matriarchal/affirmative action/equity-driven welfare state? Of course, he can always maintain his male body and behave effeminately. But why go halfway? Why not become a female?

Now I'm not saying that men who cross over are consciously seeking out a higher status. Rather, I think the concept has been absorbed by the subconscious of contemporary males, so when they come of age and are expected to function in society, they realize it is simply not possible to do so as anything close to a traditional male. But there is an escape hatch: by becoming a female all that masculinity can been shed like snakeskin. Or, if you're a sentimentalist, it is like the caterpillar transforming itself into a butterfly. It is a big step to take, but if one is looking for a privileged position in society, it's a gimme. Consider the case of someone who went in the opposite direction:

Your manosphere reading list may include Norah Vincent's Self-Made Man, her account of passing as a man for a year and a half (the transition was abetted by her lesbianism, not of the lipstick genre) for almost a year. She went from being a masculine woman, as her friends described her, to an effeminate man, as her bowling buddies described him.

Well, much to the consternation of feminists everywhere, she wrote, "I can't help believing…that we live in parallel worlds, that there is at bottom really no such thing as that mystical unifying creature we call a human being, but only male human beings and female human beings, as separate as sects."

Separate but certainly not equal! What about that much-vaunted male privilege? According to Vincent, the reward for manhood is "You get to be what's expected of you." Well, whoop-de-do!

As an illustration of that maxim, I offer a scene in a movie I recently viewed for the first time since it came out in 1998. Saving Private Ryan famously begins with a gruelling recreation of the D-Day invasion. In a sense, the footage is gratuitous, since it is not fundamental to the plot, but it makes for an unforgettably harrowing "you are there" experience. Just when it seems the carnage will go on forever, there is a jump cut to a capacious typing pool manned (if that's the word) by women. To be sure, they are engaged in the war effort, but it is conducted in perfect, climate-controlled safety. No need to count casualties in this theater of operations. And no need to grouse about male privilege.

When Norah Vincent's 18-month masquerade was over, her takeaway was "I really like being a woman. … I like it more now because I think it's more of a privilege." She added, "Being the second sex imprisoned us, but it came with at least one sizable benefit. We didn't have to carry the world on our shoulders."

If going from female to male is to assume the Atlas position, going the opposite direction allows Atlas to shrug without shaming. Going from male to female is a bit like volunteering to go back to the minor leagues. Sure, you're still being evaluated, they're still keeping stats on you, but they don't expect as much so the pressure to perform is much less. Stress levels decline along with testosterone levels.

In days of old the hermaphroditic individual was likely to be some poor soul with fucked-up hormones; today the poor soul deliberately fucks up his hormones. But it seems to be a reliable way to attain female privilege in modern society.

The basic mammalian template is female. Although sex is determined at conception, the fetus remains physiologically undifferentiated for roughly the first quarter of pregnancy. Thenceforth maleness is a matter of breaking away from the female template. To revert to being female is to go backwards towards the blissful security of those early months in the womb, the time before the long trek to manhood began.

Consider the case of Rachel (nee Richard) Levine, formerly Health Secretary for the Commonwealth of Pennsylvania, and currently a nominee for Assistant Secretary for Health in the Biden administration. Levine was a pediatrician who made his transition in 2011 at age 53. Though he was married and the father of two children (which would certainly seem to indicate the doctor got his gender correct when he was born), he experienced some sort of midlife epiphany about his sexuality. To paraphrase an old advertising slogan, "If I have only one life to live, let me live it as a woman ['a blonde' in the old ad for hair coloring]." I can only imagine what goes through the minds of the parents who entrusted their children to Levine when they see him on the evening news now.

Had Levine remained a man, he would have remained obscure. But as the first trans woman to be appointed to a cabinet-level position, he/she/it immediately made history. If you happened to come across this person on TV, your first reaction would be something like "That is one ugly broad." Yet even an ugly broad is still privileged, though not to the extent a hot babe is. An ugly broad would still get a seat on a lifeboat before a man would.

Ironically, the trans woman may still be the object of the male gaze but out of disbelief rather than lust. Of course, it's impolite to stare, but even a man well-schooled in etiquette can't help but indulge in a few WTF double-takes when face-to-face with the likes of Levine. Thus the trans woman gets more attention that she ever did as a man.

People are far more attentive to her feelings than ever before. Criticism or ridicule is strictly behind closed doors.

Unlike his fellow Jews, Levine was not happy that God made him a man (Orthodox Jewish men have a prayer that includes "Blessed are you, LORD our God, Ruler of the Universe, who has not made me a woman.") In Old Testament days Levine's fate would not have been so rosy. Guess his rabbi passed over the Book of Leviticus in Hebrew School.

To be sure, the Bible says that to lie with a man as with a woman is an abomination. But what about a man becoming a woman? The Old Testament – the mother lode of patriarchy – does not address this possibility. Perhaps it could have been addressed in an 11th Commandment, but Yahweh chose to sidestep the issue. Oh, the old "male and female created He them" from Genesis still applies, but now it's not understood to mean one sex per individual but both sexes per individual – a biological/theological twofer!

At any rate, it appears that from now on, we're going to have to put up with shemales being described as brave, amazing, and stunning. Not like those icky-poo men who are content with their maleness.

Of course, it has always taken guts to be a man, but today it takes more guts than ever for a man to hang in there when delusional becomes the new normal.

Then again, in some circles today the very concept of guts reeks of toxic masculinity!

They Never Let A Good Tragedy Go To Waste

March 27, 2021 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

Sarah Everard, 33, vanished as she walked home in Clapham on 3rd March 2021. Her body was found a week later, in woodland in Kent. No cause of death has yet been reported but PC Wayne Couzens has been charged with her kidnap and murder. According to the latest Office for National Statistics briefing, there are 506 men murdered annually, each of which is more or less tragic, all of which together receive but a fraction of the attention that this one woman victim has. This is not only a sex empathy gap in evidence, of course. The fact that the suspect is an officer of the law makes this case particularly disturbing. We all raise our children to seek out police if they're in trouble. We internalise the message that they will protect us. This case turns our faith in them on its head. And our imaginations are running wild – did he use his position to lull her into a false sense of security? Was she led to follow him because of his badge? Would we? Would our children?

And now, feminists are doing what feminists do best and capitalising on the tragedy. Sarah Everard has become something other than a human being, brutally taken from her family and friends by a vile predator. Sarah Everard is now an avatar for all womens' suffering at the hands of men. Regardless of the fact that at the last ONS count, the rate of women murdered was falling significantly, our mainstream news is filled with anguish over the scourge of femicide, Jess Phillips MP makes an annual display (11th March, this year) during the House of Commons' International Women's Day debate of reading a list of women murdered (were a man has been charged or convicted) and a widespread "debate" about how intolerable life is for women in our society – because they must share it with men – rages through a gynonormative country.

I'm not going to argue that women in Britain always feel safe – or should – I am yet to meet a man who can tell me that he always feels safe, or should. People are at risk of victimisation. People take precautions, sometimes even the best precautions are rendered not good enough. This is a sad fact – and I do believe that there are ways to mitigate the rates at which people harm other people – but stoking a Sex War is no way to mitigate harm!

Naturally, feminists are aware however that if they concentrate on the most heinous crimes perpetrated by men against women, at some point people will cotton on that this is a problem in steady decline and that it's exceptionally difficult to convince people that women are disproportionately victims of crimes that they're actually disproportionately less likely to be victims of! So, feminists lean on an invented spectrum of male aggression towards women – from 'microagressions' to rape and murder.

Usefully, for feminists, on 8th March YouGov released a survey showing the incidence of sexual harassment experienced by women in Europe. Of the sample, 19% of British women said they'd been sexually harassed in the last year, 52% over the course of their lives so far. There is no distinction made that the perpetrators of these actions were men, although all coverage since has assumed so. There is no comparative investigation into the experiences of men. Regardless, neither 19% nor 52% has been the soundbite from this survey – but rather "almost all" British women have been sexually harassed according to the rhetoric. A 'figure' arrived at by adding together all the positive answers to a question asking whether women had experienced a list of forms of 'sexual harassment'. A list that includes, someone:

- Commented on your attractiveness directly to you
- Wolf whistled at you
- Looked at your breasts
- Winked at you
- Directed a sexual joke at you
- Asked you out for a drink

Women are strong, women are amazing, women can cope with the hurly burly of public life as well as any man – or perhaps, if they can't, they really should retire back to the kitchen… In truth, the ever-broadening sweep of behaviours that are being classified as sexual harassment constitute friendly displays of human warmth and interest to many women. What feminists are pushing for is for our Nanny State to coddle women in-order-to protect the weakest, most fragile and easily offended of us from the merest slight; even if that means that the majority must suffer inhibited interactions day to day that steal colour from our lives.

And what feminists are pushing for is on its way, with 'hate crimes' believed to have been motivated by misogyny to be recorded by police as such from this Autumn. An experiment crucial to understanding hate crime and how to tackle it, according to Baroness Williams of Trafford. The concept of hate crimes is an affront to justice in a free, pluralistic liberal society. The contents of people's souls is not practically knowable to police or courts. Nor is it morally any of their business. The implementation is absurdly dystopian, with the only 'evidence' required being the perception of the victim – or a witness – and police are warned that if they are perceived to not take the complaint seriously enough, this may well count as secondary victimisation for which there will be consequences. So forget it, if you're hoping for sensible responses by sensible officers! And feminists will continue to conflate criticism of their ideology with misogyny et voila, the social protection from criticism that feminists enjoy will be backed by the law. I wonder if this is what Sarah would have wanted, censorship and misery?

While rolling my empty hand trolley on the way to Aldi, a grocery store, I happened across a dead or dying woman, “she/her”, on the sidewalk. It was Saturday morning, March 20th, at about 9 am. She/her was motionless, lying on she/her left side, curled in the fetal position as if asleep. An empty wheelchair was inches away. We were alone, just across the street from the Baylor hospital emergency room entrance. The often busy street was quiet, as was the nearby fountain a few meters ahead, and the waterfall a few meters back.

My first instinct as a man was to render some sort of chivalric succor to this damsel in distress but the epoch of chivalry is now gone, replaced by the epoch of wokeness, and thus, I knew it was incumbent upon me to check my privilege before acting.

Could I try to rouse she/her by asking she/her if she/her was okay? Under feminism, that would be catcalling, especially since we were on a sidewalk. Catcalling is a crime under woke rules, so I remained silent.

If I couldn’t speak to she/her, could I at least look to evaluate she/her’s plight? Again, I had to check my privilege – during chivalry, I would have examined her for life signs and injury but feminism has taught me to quickly avert my eyes to minimize the chance of harm to she/her from my toxic male gaze.

How about touching or shaking her slightly to try to return her to consciousness? Also a negative – touching a woman without her enthusiastic, ongoing, and explicit consent is a big no-no under wokeness. If I dared to give her CPR, that would be a clear sex crime since she/her was a she/her and not a man. Ironically, touching a white or Asian man even more forcefully than is common with CPR is totally cool under wokeness.

How about telephoning 911 for help? A group known as BLM (“Black Lives Matter”) teaches that summoning authorities puts minorities under heightened risk and I was unsure if she/her was a minority. In any case, calling the cops was passé.

Finally, I hit upon a plan – I would cross the street to the E.R. and ask for help. But then I remembered – she/her was not wearing a mask, and wokeness requires masks be worn in public.

There was nothing I could do.

After this momentary consideration, I continued on my way to the store, wistful at leaving she/her to find she/her full potential in this new world of equity. After completing my grocery run, I passed back by that way about 90 minutes later. Four policemen were milling about wrapping things up. I slowed as I walked through the scene but I did not ask about she/her’s fate since that would violate she/her’s privacy.

My trolley was now overflowing with goodies; one policeman remarked about my Reese’s Peanut Butter Cups and my Dallas Blonde beer as I passed by. I quipped, “yes, I am a man of excellent taste.”

We all had a good laugh at that.

My son doesn’t want to be a man (part 2)

March 30, 2021 | by Ruth Nyhus | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks ago, I published this piece about my son, who doesn’t want to be a man. I didn’t expect so many people to read it, and discuss it so thoughtfully. I was blown away by that. And so many of the people who did comment on it had taken the time to ask me more about my situation. So I thought I should answer some of your questions, and help you understand what I have learned about this new form of transgenderism in young men. Bear with me as I go through these questions: I still don’t have all the answers.

How did my son get here? He is 17 and decided he was trans two years ago. He has not taken any hormones because we have told him we will not support that for health reasons. But at 18, he can legally get hormones. As parents, we don’t want him to harm himself. His girlfriend is now calling herself trans. Her parents are worried too. We are hoping we can work together to give them better advice. He has a friend who started hormones six months ago, so he only sees the fairy tale version of this.

Thankfully, since we still have a good relationship, he doesn’t hate us and we are hoping we will win his trust over the other voices in his life. It will be no easy task. It’d be a lot easier to let my son transition. He would be happy, at least to begin. I would be praised and complimented for what a wonderful parent I am. I would not have to sneak around in hidden support groups and be vilified to the general public as a terrible parent for not transing him, but I cannot lie to my son. I cannot pretend my son is something he is not. How would it help him to become a successful adult if everyone around him pretended he was something he wasn’t? What would happen to him? How would he hold a job and become part of society? People would never see past his new identity. No one else will be there to pick up the pieces but me.

Sometimes he was a difficult child, and he did cause a lot of angst for us as parents. He was constantly in trouble at school for being too rough or too active. But I adored this beautiful boy and everything about him. This boy’s first word was asshole. After watching a mommy and me movie called Meet the Fockers, the baby in the movie kept saying asshole. My son was only nine months old, so I didn’t think anything of it. When we left the movie theater, he kept saying asshole, over and over. He was always going to be unique, and I always loved that.

I knew that this brilliant boy was going to do great things. He was so enthusiastic as a child. He loved life and was so adventurous. People would always say to me that he had difficult qualities for a child but they will become great qualities as an adult. Now I fear that this trans identity will prevent these qualities from emerging. As the doctor pulled him out of my womb, and I got to see him for the first time, the look on his face was: here I come world, and I’m going to do great things. I can still picture that face of determination. Has the trans community taken this from me? Over my dead body.

Since he is attracted to girls, and has never shown any sexual interest in boys at all, he believes he's a lesbian. We wouldn't care if he were gay, anyhow, but it makes no sense for a male to be a lesbian. He uses all the trans lingo like dead naming, decided his favorite color was purple (although he owns nothing purple), calls me a terf and says I'm transphobic. He also told me everyone sees him as transgender and I am the only one who doesn't see it. I see my six-foot-tall masculine son. He also complains about toxic masculinity, but I think he's actually jealous of the boys who don't think as deeply as he does. It would be easier for him to fit in, and get girls, if he wasn't the kind of boy who over-thought everything. As things are, he has to pretend to be a girl to get a girl interested.

The truth is that this whole thing came from the exterior, not from within him. He'd never have gone down this road if he hadn't seen so much about trans on the internet. That's what makes this generation of online kids so vulnerable to adult grooming. It's not innate, it's socially learned.

And then there's college. They give out hormones like candy. I never thought I would be afraid to send such a smart young man to college. I knew he would excel in college after his awkward high school years, just like I did. In fact, all my friends like that always blossomed later. Everyone in my family always went to college. I can't imagine a world where you need to talk them out of college to save them. The other option is pushing him into community college or taking a gap year so he might grow up a little. College was one of the best experiences of my life. I don't want to deny him that – but then again, I'm trying to save his life. I'm terrified that he may be even more psychologically harmed if he takes hormones when he realizes he has made a mistake. Talking to detransitioners helped me realize how often that happens.

For now, I have had to give up all my hopes and dreams for his success. He had such potential since he is so brilliant and creative, but now I have to resign myself to the hope that he doesn't harm his body and destroy his nature. Are boys opting out of manhood because the future seems so bleak? As a parent of a teen who sees himself as trans, college is the worst place. He'll be surrounded by other woke, gender-obsessed people. Being just a straight white male also doesn't help in today's climate.

I have always been liberal but I now find myself politically homeless because I have been failed so profoundly. I feel betrayed. It makes me really question politics and my views. I no longer have trust in our institutions or any government who would let this happen, and even promote this ideology to our children. I feel like a failure as a parent. I feel judged by the friends who I've told about this situation with my son. They think it was my parenting, and can't yet see that this is a social contagion. This judgment hurts because I know I was never a bad parent.

I'm in a group for parents whose boys describe themselves as trans, and I'm also on a support forum with thousands of parents trying to get advice on how to save their children. It never escapes me that when they write stuff about their children, I could have written the exact same thing myself. Our stories are all very similar. You're reading mine, so you're reading theirs, too. I'm not sure I would have made it without the support from these once-strangers since I have no help from my family and friends. In fact, I suspect they think I'm a terrible parent for not transing my son.

I do not know how much porn has affected my son, because it's a hard thing for a mother to ask. But I did ask, and he admitted that he watched it a little bit in middle school and then stopped. He thought it was degrading to women, and that he didn't like men like that. We put into place restrictions so he can't access any porn on his devices, but kids are smart and can work around the software if they want to. And even if porn is playing a bigger role than he admits, why him, and not every other boy in his class? They've probably watched porn at least as much as he has.

Boys who identify as trans are assumed to be autogynephiles (AGP). But my son looked up Ray Blanchard's work on AGP himself, and told me that he wasn't like that at all. He sees his trans identity as something that isn't sexual. I can't even find a definition of AGP that everyone agrees on. And I don't think that all young males who call themselves trans are AGP. What a world we live in.

I wonder about addiction issues. Are kids who are prone to addiction more likely to be trans? The average boy today only wants to play online. Even if he goes over to a friend's house, they'll still play online together. These games all have avatars, which makes kids think they can change their identity, just like that. Kids also love anime, which seems innocent, but I have learned it is at the epicenter of this new, trans world. My son loved Dungeons and Dragons and started a DD club at school. At day camp and at boy scouts, he played Magic: The Gathering. I thought all these were safe games, not games pushing the trans agenda.

I don't think teens are capable of making such grave decisions when their new identities have suddenly been brought on by insecurities. If it were just dressing differently and experimenting with identity, there would be no harm done, but adding medication before really knowing who they are is very dangerous for society.

My son is very immature for his age. Boys really seem to think that if they take hormones they will actually change sex. This is how naïve they are. I wonder if he's on the autism spectrum but was never diagnosed. I think he was lonely, and isolated himself, spent too much time online and was always socially awkward. We worked with him as a child because I saw he had trouble making friends. He took social skills classes and did other physical activities, and loved all of them. He seemed to have grown out of his social issues and left elementary school with a lot of friends. As a parent I wasn't blind to what he was going through.

I don't push back on trans ideology with him because it makes him dig in deeper. I just express my concern about the hormones; he says he cares about his health, but that somehow this is different. These boys don't understand the risks. They don't know what they are doing. His online friend decided he was trans after seeing a meme but somehow the medical industry thinks that's normal and not a contagion. My son said he would not take hormones if I accepted him as female. I said that I cannot lie to him and that female is a sex that is determined by chromosomes and he will never have those. Should I have lied to him to stop him from harming himself?

I just want to be the person in his life telling him the truth since everyone else is deceiving him. It’s no different than a child who throws a tantrum in the store that they want a toy. Do you give into the tantrum and buy the toy? No: you don’t buy the toy, knowing that they’ll realize they didn’t need it anyway. They’d have played with it once and then never picked it up again. It’s a battle of wills: the kid just wants to know he has power, and it’s the parent’s job to hold the line.

Parenting is a long haul. It’s easier to give in, and I don’t blame the parents who gave in and let their kids take hormones. Why would they not believe the medical industry, right? I hope to extract my son from the grip of this evil ideology, but it might take years and I have to be strong. I can’t lie to him to make him happy in the moment. I have to consider his future; his 25-year-old self; his 30-year-old self. I don’t know how to parent any other way.

Apparently my kid is expendable to the transgender cause. He’s not expendable to me. And it seems from your reactions that he’s not expendable to you, either. It has really given me hope to see the heartfelt discussions my article provoked, and to know that so many people are on my side, even when we feel the world is against us.

The Untold Police Bias

INTRODUCTION

People are now rightly horrified about the Tuskegee experiments, where blacks with syphilis were left untreated. Of course, one could hardly miss the current coverage about blacks killed by police. What goes unmentioned, is that all of the victims of the Tuskegee experiment were men. Nor is there concern that the great majority of those killed by the police are male.

On the Titanic, it was the women and children first, not the white people first. Is there evidence that concern for men has increased from that time of the Titanic? In the 2009 "Miracle on the Hudson" emergency plane landing, it was still women and children first. In fact, I can recall no media discussion of this life and death sexism in the exiting of the plane. So, while we have made considerable progress regarding the safety of blacks, the same cannot be said for men

POLICING AND MEN

For the year 2020, the data shows 432 white people were shot by police and 226 blacks. Clearly, the chances of a black person being killed by police is far higher than that of whites. I hesitate to give an actual percentage by population, until the 2020 census data is revealed. As for sex, 961 of those killed were male, while 38 were female, or 25x more male than female fatalities. From the table on the next page, one can observe that by far, the variable that most correlates with being killed by police, is being male. While blacks are killed 2.4 times more than whites, men are 19 times more likely to be victims of being killed by police than women.

Unquestionably, male deaths by police are being minimized by the media. For instance, the September 15th broadcast of the PBS program, "The News Hour", writer Hannah Drake gave her reasons why the tragic killing of Breonna Taylor by police had not received proper attention. She noted: "I have always said that Breonna Taylor had two things working against her. She's black and she's a woman." While many other have said similar things, it has no basis in fact.

A more plausible reason for hearing less about black females than black males is found on the chart. It shows that from 2013 and 2018, black men were 26 times more likely to be killed by the police than black women. In reality, the shooting of Taylor does not meet the criteria of the cases of black men killed by police highlighted by the media. Rather than an unarmed individual being bullied by the police, Breonna Taylor was shot by the police responding to a gun shot. Still, her family was awarded the highest monetary settlement ever paid by the city of Louisville Kentucky.

Lifetime risk of being killed by the police

Between 2013 and 2018, about 51.7 in 100,000 men and 2.7 in 100,000 women were killed by police in the U.S.

Breakdown by race:

	Men	Women
Black	96.0	3.7
American Indian/Alaska Native	54.7	4.2
Latinx	52.7	2.2
White	39.1	2.7
Asian	14.4	0.6

The data in the chart is from 2013 to 2018, a time when male deaths from police were a mere 19 times that of females. I selected it because the data is a more complete listing of racial groups than one usually finds. Asians are usually categorized under other. The "Washington Post" has the most complete data on people killed by police. Their data starting in 2015, found men are 21.5 times more likely to be killed by police. So most likely, the table somewhat underestimated the gender difference in those killed by police.

Despite the fact that the chart shows that it is men who are by far the most likely to be killed, the article is titled, "Police Are More Likely to Kill Men and Women of Color." In other words, MALE DEATH BY ITSELF IS NOT WORTH TALKING ABOUT. The Washington Post data is presented similarly. The heading under race is titled, "Black Americans are killed at a much higher rate than White Americans." In the body of the text, they note that blacks are killed over twice the rate of whites. The heading under gender reads: "Most victims are young males," In the text they give a more accurate description. They explain: "An overwhelming majority of people shot and killed by police are male over-95%." Donald Trump, received a lot of negative feedback for saying whites are more likely to be killed by police than blacks, while omitting the higher percentage of black people being killed. Why then, is distorting the much higher percentage of men being killed than women, not only okay, but ubiquitous?

The September 4th Washington Post article, "Nearly 250 Women Have Been Fatally Shot By Police", notes the far lower percent of those killed being female (they state "about 4%" are female). The three-page article was placed in the most prestigious place in the newspaper, the front page, right side, above the fold. It then went on to discuss why more attention needed to be given to the killings of black women and claimed bias against women by police. Despite their data that about 96% of those killed by police were male, it was predictably not of concern in the article.

One of the gems of the article, was the statement that: "About 31 percent or 77 of the 247 women shot by police since 2015 had mental health issues, compared to 22 percent of the 5,362 men." Notice the number of men with mental issues killed was unstated. The article then went on to explain how anti-female bias led to the higher likelihood of females with mental health issue killed by police. However, 22 percent of 5,362 men, adds up to 1,180 men with mental health issues being killed, or over 15 times more than women killed with such issues. Neither the three people who collaborated on the article, nor any editor, stopped this ridiculous reasoning from being seen in print. Why though didn't a reader write in to correct it, you might ask? In fact, I did write in and received no response.

INTERLUDE, WHAT ABOUT THE DANGER FOR THE POLICE?

With all the attention given to violence by police, the safety of police has been given short shrift by the mainstream press. Obviously, this includes male, female differences. I have heard both male and female officers observe that men are placed in the most dangerous police work. The numbers seem to bear this out. According to 2019 statistics, 12.8 percent of full-time officers were female. As far as those killed on duty, in 2019 there were 45 men and 3 women killed during felonious assaults, or 6 .25 percent being female.

In reality, with most women having less running speed and strength than men, under similar circumstances, women should be more likely to be killed. These physical differences are augmented by many police department having lower physical requirements for women.

We are also ignoring the behavior of criminals. I remember a television debate on the show "Firing Line", which included William Buckley and Michael Kinsley. Buckley cited a criminal who had shot a male police officer and said if the officer was a woman, he might not have fired the gun. So perhaps, anti-male sexism of criminals needs to be factored into the data. Regardless, the death while on duty gap persists and its lack of discussion once again shows the lack of concern for men compared to women.

CORRELATIONS, CRIME AND GENDER

While blacks are more likely to killed by police, controlling for violent crime they are actually less likely to be victims of police killings than whites. Gender differences are a different story. Based on the self-reports of victims of violence, women account for about 14% of violent offenders", or 1/6 that of men (Women Offenders – Bureau of Justice Statistics 2000). While the statistic sounds somewhat dated. I chose it because it's a self-report by victims. I think this is considerably more accurate gauge of crime than arrests. The data strongly suggests the gender gap in crimes committed has narrowed from the year 2000. According to "Wikipedia Sex Differences in Crime" from 2003 to 2012, the arrest rate for women went up and that of men went down. As far as total arrests for violent crime, men were 80.4% of those arrested in 2014, the most recent data listed in the Wikipedia site mentioned above. So, despite the narrowing of the arrest rate, the arrests of men in 2014, is over 30% greater than the rate of the victims of crimes committed by women in the year 2000.

Based on the 21.5x greater killing of men by police, one could conclude gender discrimination against men to be greater than what I believe it is. I think to accurately assess how much bias exists, would take a great deal of writing space, time and research. Instead, I will attempt a more inductive approach in why one would expect anti-male bias.

MEN AS VICTIM

Research found black people receive a 10 percent greater sentence than whites for the same crime. Certainly, this is justifiably a reason for concern. However, the same researcher found that men serve a 63 percent greater sentence than women for the same offense. Meaning being male, leads to more than 6 times longer sentences that being black (Estimating gender differences in Federal Crimes, Sonya Starr).

I am not contending that people do not care about men being killed. More accurately, it Is that people are routinely less concerned about the welfare of men than women. In addition, people accept that it is the way things are supposed to be. The following examples, are a few of many that typify this less empathy given to men, that I believe leads to among other things, unnecessary greater aggressiveness to men by police.

- A while back, NCFM member Francis Baumli, wrote about talking to a police officer who bemoaned the fact that 5 out 6 people killed by a perpetrator were women. (“Feminism and Chivalry” Aladdin’s Window Issue #12). Baumli noted the officer expressed these sentiments, “In an offhand way.” Imagine the equivalent. A black police officer feeling it clear enough that white people being killed was worse than that of black people, that he offhandedly mentioned it to another black person.
- We hear a lot about subconscious bias against blacks. But imagine a poll where people said it was worse to commit violence against whites, than against blacks. As far as males and females, we don’t have to imagine. A department of justice poll found: “Americans rated a wife stabbing her husband to death as 41% percent less severe than a husband stabbing his wife to death (The Myth of Male Power, Dr. Warren Farrell, page 214 Simon and Shuster 1993).
- Farrell noted, that even some hired killers will not kill a woman. (ibid, page 279). Are we to believe police are less chivalrous in this regard than hit men?
- While we hear all the time about the issue of bias against black men receiving the death penalty, the gender question has been, should any women ever again receive the death penalty? In 1988, the public answer became affirmative, when Kaye Faye Tucker was executed. Still people remain unconcerned about the bias against men regarding the death penalty and many even believe it is the way things should be.
- At the end of the last century, “Time” magazine named “The Simpsons” the best television program of the twentieth century (and there wasn't much good TV in the 19th century). They noted: "The Simpsons have surpassed the humor, topicality and, yes, humanity of past tv greats (The Best of the Century-Time, Dec 31 1999)." By the year 2000, among many other incidents of physical suffering by male characters, Homer Simpson had choked his son Bart in episodes on numerous occasions. I believe that if some of the chokings happened in real life, they easily could have been lethal. Imagine a show where a female child had been choked numerous times, being called humane. Yes, even a cartoon.

- Andrea Yates, who killed her five children, was "found not guilty by reason of insanity" in 2006. Years earlier, writer Anna Quinlan seemed to suggest instead, that's Yates was understandably overreacting to the typical stresses of motherhood. Quinlan observed: Every mother I've asked about the Yates case has the same reaction. She's appalled; she's aghast. And then she gets this look. And the look says that at some forbidden level she understands (Playing God on No Sleep, Newsweek July 1 2001)." These comments are not even mentioned in Quinlan's Wikipedia biography. Compare that to sportswriter Bob Ryan, who suggested a woman should be smacked, based on her insensitivity to her child. He was suspended for a month without pay. In this case, it was included in his Wikipedia biography. Or, imagine a husband slaps his wife one time. A male columnist responds, "every man I've asked says I don't condone it but I understand."

CONCLUSION

Knowing little to anything about the perpetrator, the media immediately presumed George Floyd's killing was due to racism. Even with more information now available, there is still not enough information to definitively understand all the reasons that lead to the tragedy. However, I do not find it difficult to imagine a white man being treated with the brutality in the way Floyd appeared to be treated, with people watching on. I do find it difficult to believe a woman would be treated that way. Can you? Could gender be the most influential variable. Does anybody care?

“Stop being boys, be human”

April 6, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I am writing a lot of letters lately. This is my fourth, being around 13 pages in length. It’s exhausting but I can’t sleep unless I feel I have at least tried to open the eyes of yet another person steeped in wrongheaded views of men, women, society and history.

This one will be mailed to Mason Black, the hero who made the speech which preceded the boys being told to stand and apologise for rape. His speech contained the words, “Don’t be boys, be human.”

Dear Mason,

I am writing in response to the speech you made recently on the subject of sexual assault.

Your speech has brought you great acclaim and international recognition. You have been hailed as a hero and an example of how all men and boys should think and speak on the issue of gender relationships.

Your words have been read or heard by thousands of young men and women.

You are, undoubtedly, enjoying the accolades and tributes which have come your way. It’s only natural for anyone who is suddenly thrust into the public eye and held up as a model citizen and example of how all boys should think, speak and behave, to feel a glow of warm well- being.

I think your immediate response to what I have written on the following pages will be to reject my comments out of hand. That too, is only natural for a young man raised in a world where men and boys have been demeaned, demonized and denigrated by our most powerful institutions for nigh on five decades.

My only hope is, that as you grow, experience more of life, and begin to see that humanity is complex and no one gender is more moral, compassionate and decent than the other, that my words may resonate and cause you to reflect on the damage I believe you have done (albeit unintentionally) to thousands of young boys and men with your ill-chosen and thoughtless words.

Let’s begin with your belief in the evil notion of collective guilt.

If the principal of Brisbane Boy’s College had called an assembly and given a speech in which he held all of the boys who followed the Islamic faith responsible for the countless acts of terror carried out by Muslim extremists, I have no doubt as to what your immediate response would have been.

You would have called such a statement an outrageous act of bigotry and you would have been right to do so.

If an item was stolen from your teacher’s desk, and rather than search for the culprit, your teacher decided to cane every boy in the room for contributing to a climate where theft was seen as an acceptable form of behaviour, you would be disgusted and I've no doubt would voice your disapproval of such an unjust approach to a criminal action committed by an individual.

Yet when it comes to a crime committed by a tiny (yes tiny) minority of boys, you have no qualms about holding every boy accountable, regardless of the fact that almost none of them have ever sexually assaulted another person.

How do you justify supporting such an outrageous, illogical and unjust belief? To hold any group or demographic responsible for the actions of a minority who happen to share their immutable characteristics is simply evil.

You used the term 'rape culture" a number of times in your speech. Again, Mason, upon what evidence do you dare to suggest we live in a culture which supports or condones rape? It is a demonstrable lie.

Men have been hanged, electrocuted, shot, burned and beaten to death for centuries for the crime of rape. Western society has never done anything other than revile any man or boy who rapes a woman or evenly sexually abuses someone.

> From the classical antiquity of Greece and Rome into the Colonial period, rape along with arson, treason and murder was a capital offense. "Those committing rape were subject to a wide range of capital punishments that were seemingly brutal, frequently bloody, and at times spectacular." In the 12th century, kinsmen of the victim were given the option of executing the punishment themselves. "In England in the early fourteenth century, a victim of rape might be expected to gouge out the eyes and/or sever the offender's testicles herself."

Men have lost their lives on a mere accusation of rape. This has happened on hundreds of occasions and is still happening now. During the time of Jim Crow, hundreds of black men were lynched by mobs on the word of white women. Many of these men were entirely innocent.

The lyrics of this Billie Holiday song say it all.

Strange Fruit

Billie Holiday

Southern trees bear a strange fruit
Blood on the leaves and blood at the root
Black bodies swingin' in the Southern breeze
Strange fruit hangin' from the poplar trees

Pastoral scene of the gallant South
The bulgin' eyes and the twisted mouth
Scent of magnolias sweet and fresh
Then the sudden smell of burnin' flesh

Here is a fruit for the crows to pluck
For the rain to gather

For the wind to suck
For the sun to rot
For the tree to drop
Here is a strange and bitter crop

How dare you use the term ‘rape culture” when our society has done all in its power to protect women and punish those who harm them.

Name an institution or any person in power who has ever condoned or supported rape. Men have their lives and careers destroyed for simply speaking inappropriately to a woman yet you say we live in a “rape culture.” That is a truly disgraceful allegation without foundation or any basis in truth.

When I heard these words, I felt physically ill.

‘Don’t be boys, be human.”

You are literally dehumanizing boys with that quite sick statement. As a recently retired teacher, I find it appalling to think you were permitted to read those words out loud.

You are clearly inferring that when boys behave in the natural way boys do, they are less than human. How could you write that, reflect upon it, and still believe those words were okay to speak out loud to the boys who sat before you?

I cried when I heard your speech. I cried for my beautiful grandson, my son and all of the wonderful boys and young men I know and have taught who are constantly subjected to this endless demonization.

We have government funded advertisements depicting boys and only boys as likely to bully and torment their sisters or girls in their school when we all know how malicious and vicious some girls can be.

We have men being openly disparaged and blamed whenever one individual male commits a crime, yet this notion of collective guilt is never applied to women and girls.

More children have been murdered by their mothers in the past decade than by the men in their lives but you would never know this fact would you, Mason? The worst mass murder of children in a family violence incident was carried out by a woman a couple of years ago. She hacked eight children to death. Since them mothers have drowned, stabbed or beaten many more children. Most recently a mother stabbed her three kids to death. I will provide some articles with all of this information linked in case you think I am inventing these stories.

Not once, did any media outlet or police representative lay the blame for these horrendous crimes at the feet of all women. Yet time and again, men and boys are blamed for something they have not done.

Hundreds of female teachers have been found guilty of raping and sexually abusing the boys in their care. Female prison guards have also been found to rape and abuse the boys in juvenile detention centres at a higher rate than male guards. These facts don't see the light of day because they destroy the narrative

>
> A new federal study spotted by Pro Publica flips the usual expectations in regard to the sexual abuse of vulnerable youth by authority figures. In this case, it's female guards at juvenile detention facilities preying on young males who have been locked up. The new study by the Justice Department shows the problem is more widespread than you might think—it estimates that 8% of male teens in custody have been abused by female staff, a figure that has held steady for three years.
>
> "When you have an extreme power differential and absolute unchecked power, bad things start happening," says the leader of the nonprofit Just Detention International. "When you combine this with a culture where sex abuse by females on males isn't taken seriously, then you have the perfect set-up for women with all this power to get away with it."
>
> The Justice Department first discovered the startling form of abuse in 2010, when it surveyed more than 9,000 youngsters living in juvenile halls and group homes. More than 10 percent of the respondents said they'd been sexually abused by staff and 92 percent said their abuser was female.
>
> In the last three years, the numbers haven't changed much.
>
> The Justice Department released its second reportlast month, and this time researchers surveyed more than 8,700 juveniles housed in 326 facilities across the country. In all, the facilities house more than 18,000 juveniles, representing about one quarter of the nation's total number of youngsters living in detention centers.
> Drawing on their sample, Justice Department researchers estimate that 1,390 juveniles in the facilities they examined have experienced sex abuse at the > hands of the staff supervising them, a rate of nearly 8 percent. Twenty percent who said they were victimized by staff said it happened on more than 10 occasions. Nine out of 10 victims were males abused by female staff.

>
> Nearly two-thirds of the abused youngsters said that the officials lured them into sexual relationships by giving them special treatment, treating them like a favorite, giving gifts and pictures.
>
> Twenty-one percent said staff gave them drugs or alcohol in exchange for sex.
>
> Stannow said that the rate of abuse perpetrated by female guards on male victims is the result of a "dangerous combination" of cultural and institutional problems, not the least of which is the fact that women forcing males into sex does not comport with society's conventional definition of rape.

Let me repeat a line which leapt out at me:

"When you combine this with a culture in which sex abuse by females on males isn't taken seriously, then you have the perfect set up for women with all this power to get away with it."

You, Mason, are one of the people who promotes the myth that all abuse comes from males and is perpetrated upon females.

By doing this, you are condemning countless boys and young men to silent suffering as nobody would take seriously the notion they are being sexually abused by a woman. You are imprisoning male victims of sex abuse just as the family violence industry deliberately ignores male victims of family violence.

It is shameful.

My best friend was sexually abused by his mother. He hid this painful secret from me for years, conceding that it was simply too shameful to discuss given the veneration of mothers in our society as nurturing, loving, perfect beings as opposed to dads who are regularly portrayed as wife beaters and child abusers.

He felt there must be something terribly wrong with him for his mother to do such (what he believed) was a rare and repulsive act.

Your attitude creates this suffocating climate for boys and men who are victims of female abuse. It is far more common than our media and governments would ever dare to suggest.

When female teachers rape their male students the reaction from most (including other men and boys, is to laugh and say "half their luck.")

A recent American study on non-consensual sex found the following.

> The sexual victimization of men in America: new data challenge old assumptions – PubMed (nih.gov)
> We assessed 12-month prevalence and incidence data on sexual victimization in 5 federal surveys that the Bureau of Justice Statistics, the Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, and the Federal Bureau of Investigation conducted > independently in 2010 through 2012. We used these data to examine the prevailing assumption that men rarely experience sexual victimization. We concluded that federal surveys detect a high prevalence of sexual victimization among men-in many circumstances similar to the prevalence found among women. We identified factors that perpetuate misperceptions about men's sexual victimization: reliance on traditional gender stereotypes, outdated and inconsistent definitions, and methodological sampling biases that exclude inmates. We recommend changes that move beyond regressive gender assumptions, which can harm both women and men.

> IN 2011 the CDC reported results from the NISVS Sexual violence survey one of the most comprehensive surveys of sexual victimization in the USA to date.
>
> The survey found that men and women had a similar prevalence of non consensual sex in the previous 12 months 1.270 million women and 1.267 million men. This remarkable finding challenges stereotypical assumptions about the gender of victims of sexual violence.
>
> The CDC publications and the media coverage which followed instead chose to highlight female sexual vicitmisation, reinforcing public perceptions that sexual vicitmisation is primarily a women's issue.

How interesting to discover that the media chose to ignore the shocking data on the abuse of boys because it didn't fit their narrative.

Another interesting aspect of this phenomenon of blaming all men or boys for the misdeeds of an individual who shares their gender is the fact that the same idea is never applied when men do good deeds which of course, men do with incredible regularity.

A couple of years ago, a woman was raped and murdered in a Melbourne Park. There were candlelight vigils. They only have those when a woman or child dies at the hands of a man-never when children are hacked to death by their mum or a man is burned alive by his female partner as happened three times in Australia last year.

Why is that, Mason?

The media went on their usual frenzied rampage, culminating with Lisa Wilkinson (host of The Project) demanding that all fathers teach their sons not to rape and all men talk with their friends about the fact that rape is not acceptable. She looked down the camera lens and told the men of Australia they need to be taught not to rape. The male hosts beside her bowed their heads in shame as though they were responsible for the young woman's death.

Mason, can you imagine the reaction if a male host, let's say, Andrew Bolt, looked down the camera lens when yet another mother hacked her kids to death and demanded all mums teach their daughters not to kill their own children?

It's impossible to imagine because it would never happen. Yet hateful, rage filled women (and men) routinely do this to men and they are warmly congratulated for reinforcing the notion of collective guilt, toxic masculinity and demonizing males, yet again.

During this time a group of schoolchildren were trapped in caves in Thailand. Hundreds of men and only men worked around the clock to save them. One man died while trying. Not one media outlet stepped back and recognized that it was males doing all of the risk taking, nurturing of the kids once they found them or even the genius of these men in planning the rescue.

The mysterious invisibility of men's good deeds – A Voice for Men

Terms like rescuers, workers, paramedics were used but the word men was in scant use.

Hundreds of men do a good deed saving multiple lives and there is no thank you to men as a collective for all of the life- saving, life risking and dangerous tasks they undertake on a daily basis.

One man commits a crime-all man are responsible. Hundreds of men do a good deed-men are not in any way thanked or recognized for the goodness carried out by so many of the male gender.

Countless male sporting teams and organizations raise millions in funding for women specific diseases every year. No female groups reciprocate this generosity. Has it ever crossed your mind to praise the boys and men of this country who do so much to protect and improve the health of the girls and women in our nation?

I checked out the survey on sexual assault and harassment which apparently horrified you. I was horrified for a different reason.

All of the claims are simply anonymous allegations. None of them have been substantiated. As the surveys I cited earlier show, boys are just as likely to have unwanted, non-consensual sex and touching but no-one gives a stuff about that fact. Many of the girls claimed to have been heavily inebriated. That is on them. Nobody forced alcohol down their throats. I'll guarantee many of the boys were equally inebriated. Why is it the responsibility of the boys to somehow be in control of their faculties and make the right decision?

Many young men have sex with women when they are drunk. They are taken advantage of in the same way as some girls are. Is this rape?

The double standards are disgusting.

You said:

"If you have ever objectified a woman based on her looks, talked about females in a misogynistic way or taken advantage without consent, you are part of the problem."

Wow.

So, you are suggesting that women and girls don't objectify men and boys based on their looks? Girls and women don't talk about men and boys in a misandric way and females have never taken advantage without consent?

Have you ever watched Gogglebox? An innocuous show where we watch people watching weekly television shows. The women on this program do nothing but comment on men's appearance and the size of their genitals. Last week they watched an episode featuring black, male strippers. Here are some of the comments.

disgusting.

“Show me some cock!”

“Oh, that would choke me”

“Look at it swing!”

The men on the show never speak in such sexualized, demeaning ways about women. There has never been any complaint about this regular and vulgar objectification of men and their bodies. The double standards are stark and previous episodes have featured the women making derogatory comments about Donald Trump’s penis when an entire segment of CNN was devoted to an interview with a woman who had slept with Trump and described his penis in lurid detail. I’ll repeat that. A national news show discussed and derided the President of America’s penis and no-one had one word of criticism.

No-one called it body shaming or an example of our society’s hatred of men.

Yet young men like you would scream from the hilltops that women in politics have to endure misogyny. What a farce. No female politician would ever have the appearance of her breasts or genitals discussed on a mainstream news network or any other form of news. But when it’s a man, it’s hilarious and just what he deserves.

Have you never heard of female groupies who stalk and harass male singers and celebrities and try to grope them or get them in bed? What about hens’ nights where the women behave in a far more violent and sexually abusive manner than men would ever do when a female is stripping?

Girls send sex texts as frequently as boys a recent study revealed yet boys and only boys are condemned for their propensity for sending dick pics to their girlfriends. Girls send “tit pics” to their boyfriends just as frequently but we blame the boys for that too because they apparently pressured the girls into sending them. Girls never request a dick pic. How bigoted can we be? Girls are never held to account for their actions, yet boys are constantly blamed for things they never did.

You write as if women and girls are in some way morally superior to men and boys. This is utter nonsense. Human beings of both genders have their strengths and weaknesses. The ridiculous mantra, “Believe All Women” is one of the most inane examples of this sick, twisted kind of thinking.

Who would believe an entire demographic simply because they shared certain immutable characteristics? You’d laugh if we started a hashtag, “Believe all Italians” or “Believe all redheads”. Why is “Believe all women” any less insane? Yet countless men and women wore shirts bearing this mantra and posted it on their Facebook page with pride. They chanted it outside courts in their thousands with no sense of embarrassment or shame even though they all know females who lie and cheat.

This is a result of decades of man hating and sanctifying females.

Women lie. Men lie too. So, we have courts and we demand evidence. Anecdotes and anonymous testimonies don’t cut it, Mason.

Perhaps one day you will understand how important the rule of law is-innocent until proven guilty. I hope for your sake you don't ever suffer a false accusation in our man hating climate.

When Sharon Osbourne hosted The Talk, a nationally viewed talk show, she celebrated the genital mutilation of a young man whose angry wife hacked off his penis while he slept and shredded it in a waste disposal outlet.

(8) Sharon Osborne laughs about male genital mutilation – YouTube

Is Genital Mutilation Something to Laugh at? Let's "Talk". – Yonkers Voice

Listen to the women howling, cackling and cheering about the vicious mutilation of a man's genitals.

The many female hosts laughed hysterically as did the all-female audience and it was called "fabulous and wonderful". The show and Osbourne faced no pushback, no consequences, no loss of sponsorship, after all, she was only mocking a young man whose life had been destroyed. Yet men who dare to say something as mild as, "women aren't as strong as men" face vicious backlash and often lose their job.

You are a part of the reason for this horrible climate of male hatred, Mason.

Our society already prioritizes woman and girls over men and boys and you act as if females are treated like second class citizens.

Look at the cold facts.

It is males killing themselves at nearly four times the rate of females.

It is males who make up 95% of all workplace deaths.

It is males who make up nearly 80% of those sleeping rough on our streets.

It is males who have no reproductive rights.

It is males failing in our schools and whose numbers when it comes to enrolling in universities have been plummeting for years.

It is males who receive 63% longer jail terms for committing the same crime as a woman.

It is males who still die years earlier yet our government spends four times as much on women's health and men continue to fund raise for women's health-not their own.

Male victims of family violence receive zero support and funding whereas billions of dollars are spent on the safety and protection of women. Men make up one third of family violence victims as recognized by the ABS yet they are invisible. Mothers are more likely to kill their children yet every family violence campaign uses this mantra:

We must protect our women and their children from violence.

Australia says no to violence against women.

Violence against men doesn't bother us! That's obvious.

Mason, if these statistics showed women were overwhelmingly the gender disadvantaged and suffering in the range of issues I listed, you would be standing at your podium quoting them as evidence of the lack of value and respect our society has for women. But once again, it is men who are overwhelmingly the most damaged and affected gender, so we hear nothing about these stark facts.

Lies about gender wage gaps and glass ceilings receive wall to wall coverage while literal issues of life and death concerning men get zero coverage.

Who holds the power? Who is the truly respected and privileged gender?

Mason, I will leave you with a comment which was written by a boy after seeing your speech and hearing about the school which ordered all of the boys to stand and apologise for something they had never done. Read his words. Excuse the punctuation and spelling errors. The raw words are just as he wrote them.

> This reminds me alot of the white ribbon ceremonys in school. When I was in Yr 12 the female teachers asked all the boys to pledge to never be violent towards a female. now I was at the time experiencing a domestic violent relationship with my mother and my sister which I was sleeping in the local botanic gardens to get away from. so I said I didn't want to participate because I felt that it should be non violence against all not a single gender. I was belittled by the female staff and made out to be a terrible individual because I didn't want to take part and that what happened to me didn't matter. I was still forced to go to the White ribbon day event. When I arrived I walked up to the women handing out flyers for those seeking help and asked them if there was anything they could give to me. She was surprised and said that there wouldn't be any hotline to help me for Another 5 weeks. I was in hospital due to having my wrist smashed with a sledge hammer 3 weeks before an organisation could have been able to be contacted and provide assistance. To this day I've always thought about how there's very little help for men being abused by men or women, which I've never really understood. I understood and surported the importance of a victim having the ability to get assistance from an organisation. I always understood the importance of teaching the younger generations the signs and prevention measures to keep others safe. What I've never understood is how gender effects the way you receive or wheather you even deserve to be given said assistance (apologies half of this is more emotional than logical so my opinion is probably not the best one to take into consideration but I'd like to ask if you contacted domestic violence or sexual assault helplines. How many turn you away if you're a man. Because 5 years ago every single hotline in Australia did

There are hundreds of Ryan Flack's in Australia. Men and boys who are ignored, belittled, laughed at or silenced when they try to speak of their abuse at the hands of women. I know some men personally who have been in abusive relationships, gone to the police and been sent on their way and told to "man up".

What do boys and men do in this situation? If they lay a finger on their abuser in retaliation, it is they who will be arrested and jailed. If they tell others the usual response is laughter or derision because they are being abused by a woman or girl. There are no safe houses, no financial assistance or hotlines for males who are being abused to contact. Nothing.

You have helped create this world, Mason.

> Exactly. When married I was slapped in my face on a number of occasions when my wife was drunk. Back in the 90s in Australia when I was severely depressed there was zero help for men but so much for women. In desperation, I once rang a menopause clinic to seek advice but they just laughed into the phone. Nowadays more men die of prostate cancer than women die of breast cancer (as my dear mother did), yet we only hear about assisting with the latter. Men are constantly abused and treated like second class citizens, especially by the Family Court.

Enjoy your fame and all the plaudits sent your way by the gender bigots who believe your dehumanizing words, “Don’t be boys, be human” were inspirational.

I want you to reflect upon my words in your quieter moments, Mason.

You have taken the course of Stalin, Mao and Hitler in demonizing an entire demographic and denouncing masculinity as something less than human.

Martin Luther King dreamed of the day we would judge people by the contents of their heart rather than their immutable characteristics. Perhaps you could listen to his famous speech and reconsider the path you have chosen to follow. It’s never too late to be educated and make amends, Mason.

There is so much more I could write but this is already more like a book and less like a letter.

Good luck in all you do, Mason. I hope you have a happy, successful life.

I also hope you come to understand just how misguided and damaging your speech was, (however well intended) and you stop judging people by anything other than their personal words and actions.

Kind regards,

The Power Of Stories

April 9, 2021 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

*The following speech was delivered at the 2020 digital ICMI.

We inhabit a world of things – literally observable objects and facts, and, for the MRA, literally measurable evidence of male disadvantage. And we MRAs collectively do a good and necessary job of measuring and cataloguing such disadvantages. It escapes none of us however, though our evidence is required (and should be), that feminists are not held to the same standards.

That feminists can assert the most outrageous untruths, without challenge. That baseless feminist conspiracy theories, fantasies, lies, delusions and myths are simply believed. The reason for this is simple: as much as a world of things, we live in a world of stories (Peterson, 2018).

Mythologies, archetypes and expectations help us to organise information. We can't expect to be able to rationally sift through each piece of data that we're exposed to, so we categorise constantly: of interest/not of interest, in line with what we would expect/anomalous (Sowell, 1987).[1] And feminism has been uniquely deft at creating compelling stories that people can internalise, which act as shields against further investigation of their claims.

If this sounds malevolent: that's because it is. Feminists misuse the power of stories to circumvent the logical appraisal that should accompany policy lobbying and establishment. Feminists misuse the power of stories to breed resentment instead of love between men and women. Feminists misuse the power of stories to justify hate-filled and supremacist intentions as recompense for centuries of "sex-based oppression". And the fact is that feminism has advantages in the story-weaving game. Our species' innate gynocentrism, our gender empathy gap and our evolutionary perceptions of men (the genetic filter, to be policed) and women (the limiting factor in reproduction, to be protected) allows us to zero-in on female disadvantage and to ignore male disadvantage, to view the world through blinkered eyes through the lens of the female experience, to believe in an innate badness in men!

But… We MRAs have advantages also… We can share stories that enrich the psyches of our audiences with gratitude and love for men, and respect for women. We can share stories that are exponentially closer to the truth than those sordid webs that feminists create. Stories backed by facts, but stories that can be internalised by a significant proportion of the public; and weaponised so that no longer will feminist rhetoric be taken at face value. So that the playing field will be levelled and the standards of evidence that we accept as the bare minimum required for MRAs to advocate – will also apply to feminists.

This is why I believe in the power of stories to deliver justice for men and boys (and the women who love them).

Feminist myths

The dominant feminist story we must dismiss and provide a counter-narrative to is the religious doctrine of patriarchy. There are a number of approaches that we can take in the dismissal. The coolest among us may wish to simply reject their hypothesis: "I'm sorry, as an atheist, I simply don't accept theories based on faith" or "patriarchy is not a scientific theory, it's a political fashion" for example (I'm sure that some of you hip cats can come up with snappier retorts than that, too).

There is a power and style in this approach that make it a necessary element in the destruction of the pernicious patriarchal conspiracy theory.

For those of among us more like me, who like to over-explain whenever possible, there is a myriad of evidence and rationally constructed thoughtways that can also dismiss either or both ideas that our history can be best described as patriarchal or that our present societies can be described as patriarchal. Evolutionary psychology tells us that human sociality is about males competing with each other for access to females, not oppressing females. They do this through dominance hierarchies that allow them to excel in their field and be noticed by women who then choose the men who show the qualities they most desire.

Men act as the genetic filter, with only the most successful having the opportunity to reproduce while less successful combinations of genes are excluded from contributing to the gene pool for further generations (and in this way a positive evolution is driven). Women, being the limiting factor in reproduction (only capable of producing an average of one baby every couple of years, as compared to men's boundless ability to impregnate), are a protected 'class'. D.N.A. analysis in 2004 by Jason Wilder, Zahra Mobasher and Michael Hammer reveals that ancestrally the majority of women (80%) reproduced whereas only a minority (40%) of men did. The dynamic does not disadvantage women, it disadvantages most men, relative to the winners- whilst at the same time driving artistic, technological, thought… advances of all kinds that enrich all of our lives, via these dominance hierarchies.

History is a story of cooperation between men and women to improve their standards of living. Henry Fawcett was one of the first champions (of either sex) of the cause of women's suffrage, equal access to further education and employment. He was committed to supporting the work of his wife Millicent in her campaigns and her writing with enthusiasm and money; and, alongside John Stuart Mill (author of 'On the Subjection of Women'), was among the male MPs who presented the Women's Suffrage Petition to Parliament in 1866 which marked the start of organised campaigning for votes for women. He came to the struggle before he met his wife and was undoubtedly attracted by her revolutionary zeal and intellect.

It is a myth that "women fought for the right to vote" inasmuch as women and men fought for the right for women to vote. It is another myth that Victorian gentlemen liked their women to be seen and not heard. Middle and upper class families (and even some working class families, to the extent that they could) took pains to guarantee that their daughters were as well educated and well rounded as possible and many men took pains to select engaging women who would be their equals in the private sphere, if not in the public sphere.

In the Hull of 1968, three trawlers were lost at sea and 58 men were killed. A campaign for better safety at sea was launched by the wives, sisters and daughters of trawlermen, led by Lillian 'Big Lil' Bilocca whose father, husband and son all made their living at sea. It came to be known as 'The Headscarf Campaign' after the distinctive scarves popular with working women of the time.

The campaigners met with trawler owners and government ministers to discuss better safety and fairer working conditions in the fishing industry, and picketed the dock to make sure that no ships left without a radio operator. Big Lil' even met Prime Minister Harold Wilson at No. 10 Downing Street. Support for the campaign grew and spread from the families of Hessle Road to other fishing communities as well as to the rest of the country who were enthralled by the exploits of the folk heroes played out in national newspapers.

Eventually it brought about changes which drastically improved the safety of British fishermen. Not only is this a tale of love with the Headscarf Campaign showing theirs in their committed action to protect the men in their lives, but it shows the power and influence women had to instigate political change. What kind of patriarchy is it that ignores the safety of men until it is highlighted by women?

The hijab was made compulsory for women to wear in government offices in Iran 24 days after the 1979 Islamic revolution was declared victorious. Days later, on March 8th, International Women's Day, more than 100,000 women and men marched on the capital city Tehran to protest against the law and other planned assaults on women's rights.

By 1984 the hijab was compulsory in all public spaces. In April 2007, the Tehran police began the most fierce crackdown on what is known as "bad hijab" (dress exposing anything other than the hands and face) in more than a decade. Thousands of Iranian women were cautioned in the capital city over their bad hijab and several hundred arrested. In the intervening years thousands more have been cautioned, fined, imprisoned or received lashes for their dress.

In 2016, besides the customary uniformed morality police, 7,000 undercover agents were reportedly also on the case- then news of a new wave of protests began to circulate, with men taking to social media with pictures of themselves wearing veils in solidarity with their wives and female friends and relatives who wish they didn't have to. Although these men are not breaking the law, the fact that women in bad hijab have been targeted with acid attacks with increasing regularity recently suggests that their stance is not without personal risk. An unnamed participant who photographed himself wearing a hijab with his niece in the protest told Heather Saul at The Independent "I can't be indifferent to the violation of freedoms of half of my people."

Women have lacked rights in the past (those in Islamic countries particularly often still do) but they've also enjoyed significant privileges. Men have had some privileges but also considerable responsibilities. The balance has generally reflected social conditions at various times, sensible divisions of labour which facilitated the very survival of the species.

Technological advances have rendered the old ways all but obsolete but our political and social structure has been (and is being) developed collaboratively by men and women working side by side, hand in hand. To believe anything else is to believe that men are pathological sociopaths- and that doesn't stand up to scrutiny.

The fact that feminism has ignored or even obfuscated the beautiful truth about sex relations is disgraceful. They've robbed society of the trust we once had between the sexes- to the extent that they've been able to, harming individuals and societies as a whole.

Patriarchy theory is blatantly misandric. It's also misogynistic, asserting that until feminism arrived on the scene women allowed themselves to be 'treated like chattel' by the men in their lives. It is one that has been present in feminism since the Seneca Falls Convention declared "The history of mankind is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations on the part of man toward woman, having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over her", and is still prevalent in feminism today.

Egregiously, it's a theory that now finds itself written into British law with the Preventing and Combating Violence Against Women and Domestic Violence (Ratification of Convention) Act 2017 (or Istanbul Convention) which states "that violence against women is a manifestation of historically unequal power relations between women and men, which have led to domination over, and discrimination against, women by men and to the prevention of the full advancement of women…and… is one of the crucial social mechanisms by which women are forced into a subordinate position compared with men…".

In response to valid criticism of the mythological feminist idea of patriarchy, the feminist response presently is to double down on the conspiracy theory and dolefully inform us that patriarchy hurts men too. According to Richard Herring in his unbearably condescending book 'The Problem with Men':

"In some ways, men actually need to overthrow the patriarchy more urgently than women do. Masculinity is in a crisis of its own making, and toxic masculinity and ludicrous overconfidence in our own ability is harming men, too."

It's so decent of Herring and his feminist cohort to concern themselves with men's wellbeing but they are sorely misguided in their approach. While feminists are busy berating men to take collective responsibility for any and only bad things done by any man at any point in history and pathologising perfectly healthy attributes and very normal behaviour in men and boys; Martin Seager and John Barry, when researching for 'The Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology and Mental Health', found that positive attitudes to masculinity are beneficial to the mental health of men and boys and may even provide a barrier against suicidality.

To put it more plainly, feminist misandry is killing men and boys. The feminist story goes: "our patriarchal societies are run by men for the benefit of men but the burden of maintaining traditional masculine personas is dangerous for men and boys".

Our retort: we reject the hypothesis that we live in patriarchal societies. In fact, the idea that serious adults would entertain such a silly idea based on data entirely lacking in nuance and without any semblance of rational and appropriate analysis is quite bizarre. Men are good and the attributes common to them are archetypal in nature and therefore, to help men, we must accept them and meet them where they are. Feminism is malevolent and cannot be tolerated threatening the mental wellbeing of our beloved fathers, husbands, brothers, sons, friends.

In 'Women and Power – a manifesto', Mary Beard confides that she would like to explain "just how deeply embedded in Western culture are the mechanisms that silence women, that refuse to take them seriously, and that sever them (sometimes quite literally) from the centres of power… When it comes to silencing women," Beard writes, "Western culture has had thousands of years of practice."

It may surprise some listeners that I don't entirely disagree with Beard's claim. Women have been silenced, for many years. Take The Peterloo Massacre in Manchester in 1918: women were well represented, energised by the Female Reform Societies that had recently sprung up to campaign for Parliamentary reform (including suffrage for all men) and the repeal of the Corn Laws (trade tariffs that kept the price of grain artificially high for British consumers).

Magistrates sent cavalry into the crowd and 4 women were killed on St Peter's Field, aside from an unknown number who must have died from injuries later on. 4 women, killed in cold blood for exercising their inviolable right to protest: 4 women, 13 men – and one 2 year old boy, William Fildes, the first casualty of the day- who was knocked from his mothers' arms and trampled by a horse. 18 people killed – and none because of their sex! Killed because they were working class and threatened to inspire a popular movement to make the state more representative and to encourage policies that would benefit the working family rather than the wealthy mercantilist class.

When it comes to women, as compared to men generally, Western culture has had hundreds, if not thousands, of years of practice of prioritising women's voices. Beard recounts an episode from Homer's Odyssey wherein Penelope is told by her son, Telemachus, "Mother, go back to your quarters, and take up your own work, the loom and the distaff… speech will be the business of men…", and it is true that few archaic societies welcomed many women in public life – but women had an immense power in the private sphere and influenced men in the public realm.

Take Potiphar's wife, in the biblical book of Genesis, who was spurned by Joseph so made a false allegation of rape against him, which resulted in his imprisonment. The Ancient Greece where Beard finds her literary evidence of women's political subordination, gave us democracy and every free man there could vote, but later incarnations of democracy were far more limited.

Prior to the 1918 Representation of the People Act in the U.K., only 56% of men could vote – and that was significantly improved from the First Reform Act 1832 that entitled around 20% of men to vote (up from less than 6% beforehand). The First Reform Act was also the act that formally excluded British women from voting in General Elections. Prior to that, women had voted in General Elections – and women had been taking an active part in Local Elections for at least 100 years.

Women were active in political movements – as we saw in Peterloo – and in electioneering; and voting men were expected to vote on behalf of their families, with women expected to take an interest in politics and advise the men in their lives.

In the late Middle Ages, Eleanor of Aquitaine spearheaded the establishment and popularisation of chivalric love in which men were expected to defer to the whims of women – who were presented as men's moral superiors, and which C.S. Lewis would later refer to as "the feudalisation of love". Eleanor, portrayed in context as a selfish and domineering woman, is reputed to have had much political influence over her husband, King Louis VI and persuaded him repeatedly to engage in warfare – to restore Toulouse to her Grandmother in 1141 and to invade Champagne and lay waste to the region in a vengeful defence of Eleanor's sisters' marriage to an already married man in 1143! In 1147, she accompanied Louis on the Crusade to defend the Holy Land. An official political title, Eleanor lacked, but a political voice? I think not.

Ernest Belfort Bax meticulously documented women's legal privileges in his 1896 book 'The Legal Subjection of Men', in areas such as child custody, divorce, alimony and criminal sentencing. Even then, 'believe women' ruled the day – unless a man being prosecuted was of a higher class than the woman accusing him.

In her book, Beard circles back to the modern day, bemoaning the abuse allegedly Tweeted at political women in the public eye. However, evidence shows that men in Parliament receive significantly more abuse, as standard, as compared to women.

So: the feminist story goes that women have been silenced throughout history and continue to be so. The more nuanced and realistic MRA story that I suggest is that, politically, as William Collins would have it, “there have been centuries of oppression” – but they were class based, not sex based. Men and women, as compared to one another as classes, have both suffered historically from disadvantages and benefitted from privileges, had varying degrees of authority, in different areas.

Men and women historically, though, generally worked together to support each other – like we saw at Peterloo – and pooled their advantages to best serve their families and communities. In the words of Jordan Peterson, “It looks to me like the so-called oppression of the Patriarchy was instead an imperfect collective attempt by men and women stretching over millennia to free each other from privation, disease and drudgery.”

Today, women are welcomed into politics – they’re just as likely to be elected as men (unless they’re in one of the U.K. Labour Party’s all-women-shortlists!) and the idea that they’re subjected to more abuse when they are is a delusion. However, feminist insistence that women are excluded and abused if they do make office can only hold back any women who believe it and justify the forcible holding back of men.

Another cute feminist story is that men are responsible for the destruction of the planet and environmental degradation – and that, were women in charge, the planet would be a healthy and happy utopia. As Janice Fiamengo said, and I quote:

“We’ve been informed of “5 Women Environmental Leaders You Should Know” and invited to “Meet 4 Inspirational Women Working in Environmental Science Today.” Articles that profile such scientists abound, almost always including a discussion of the (allegedly unique) “challenges” the women faced in a male-dominated field, with exhortations about how such challenges can be overcome, almost always through state and global initiatives that benefit women by providing them with money and opportunities not available to their male colleagues.

The alleged distinctiveness of women’s scientific perspective is a never-challenged assumption in many policy documents and political proclamations. An article outlining why “[w]e need to build more networks of women in science” predictably informs readers that women are “far more nuanced in [their] approach to just about anything, including science,” which is why “environmental science can only become stronger if we have more women in research, because [women] often bring the human angle into the science.” The male angle, apparently, is somewhat less than human.”

The evidence supports none of this. Women are privileged in science, and this is a rejection of the meritocratic and sex-blind approach to progress that we should be taking, morally and for the purpose of efficiency. If feminists want women to save the environment they may want to forget the positive discrimination in environmental science and encourage women, who drive 70-80% of consumer spending, to make more responsible consumer choices.

Men and women have worked together throughout history to escape privation and disease and misery. Men and women must continue to work together if we want to nurture the planet on which we're flourishing. Throughout history our sex roles have been rigid out of necessity. Today there are disparities in occupational sex-demographics based primarily on choice and this is something we need to accept if we are to tackle the scientific challenges that face us and await us. We need the best people for the job – even when they're men – if we are to continue on our onwards and upwards trajectory of increasing the standards of living in our societies.

The prevailing gender narrative around domestic abuse, a narrative utterly monopolised by radical feminists, is a narrative that presents domestic abuse as a gendered crime. Furthermore, it's a narrative with an ever-expanding definition of domestic abuse that can indict men and boys for increasingly reasonable behaviour – and will consistently indict men and boys who are in fact responding to abuse from female partners that is uncontestable as abuse to anyone bar the most wretchedly ideological feminist.

What is unfortunate is that the sectors who are responsible for dealing with domestic abuse are either totally pervaded by or trained by the most wretchedly ideological feminists. What is also unfortunate is that in the social sphere while the behaviour of men and boys within relationships has been critiqued to the point of abject absurdity over the last half century in particular. The behaviour of women and girls within relationships has not been subjected to the same scrutiny (or any scrutiny at all, not outside of the fringes of society where weirdos like us live) and in fact feminist advocacy and gynonormative attitudes more widely repeatedly justify, excuse, and make light of their abuse. Clearly our responses to abuse suck – but the most damaging aspect of the whole social picture is the disparity. If we took either of those approaches to domestic abuse, it would be a mistake, but to differentiate based on sex.

To neuter men and boys and their ability and will to defend their boundaries on one hand and to "empower" women and girls to be abusive on the other is beyond dysfunctional. It is vital that we teach men and boys to value themselves and to respect their needs and boundaries and to protect the same. It is vital that we criticise abusive behaviour and the women and girls who perpetrate it (as well as men and boys).

And it is vital that every single time a damn feminist raises his or her head to tell us that domestic abuse is a gendered problem we pop our heads up and repeat Erin Pizzey's mantra that abuse is not a gendered problem, but a generational one. We need to expose the feminist domestic abuse racket as a racket and as a system that repeatedly fails women and girls as well as men and boys.

This International Conference on Men's Issues 2020 is packed full of commentary on domestic abuse and the work that is being carried out by the speakers we have is so important – look out in particular for the Male Coercive Control survey being published by Deborah Powney and Nicola Graham-Kevan this International Men's Day. Furthermore, people instinctively recognise that domestic abuse is a generational problem, they only need to have it pointed out to them.

I'd also like to point out that November 2021 will see the half century anniversary of Erin Pizzey opening her Chiswick refuge so the coming year is really an opportune moment to push progressive perspectives on domestic abuse which will surely eventually leave feminist domination of domestic abuse response services untenable because the public simply will not accept it.

Rape culture hysteria is terrifying many people. Sex positive activists including feminists like Camille Paglia and Katie Roiphe (author of the excellent book 'The Morning After') report "winning the argument" that had returned in the 1990s with their messages about personal choice and personal responsibility… But right now mainstream feminism is dominated by prudish and hysterical fainting couch feminists who tell us that rape is on an ever expanding spectrum that includes more and more "survivors" everyday, too many of whom do reappraise their experiences and take on neurosies about traumas that didn't exist till feminists informed them that they had been violated.

The cruelty is contemptible and goes to prove that feminism is not about women, it's about power. Traumatising vulnerable women is acceptable collateral damage if feminists can then dictate legislation, policy and the minutiae of interpersonal interactions between men and women. Rape culture is not a feature of mainstream society though. It's our job to empower people by reassuring them that rape is not common and that it's not necesarily an insurmountable trauma if it does happen to them.

Human beings are anti-fragile and most of us grow from most of the trauma we will experience. We do need to gender neutralise laws in many societies to protect victim men and boys and to serve justice to women and girls who perpetrate rape – but we also need to very clearly differentiate our messages from the messages of feminists who seek not to protect the vulnerable but to weaponise the pain and fear of the vulnerable.

Our story here is one of presenting truths that expose feminist lies but it must also be a strengthening one to combat the panic that feminist obsession with creating victims and then weaponising their newfound distress is causing.

Feminism's most ascendant story element involves intersections of privilege and oppression based on sex as just one factor, with an infinite number of other factors contributing to where people find themselves in given hierarchies – such as race, class, ability, sexuality, etc.

This naked attempt to usurp the catalogue of social justice issues is designed to compensate for feminism's increasingly blatant irrelevance in the modern West. It has the benefit of a truthful component – it's significantly more appropriate and less clumsy to take different factors into account in addition to the traditional male/female duality. In practice, it is also, however, an utterly depressing and divisive approach to rating human beings and to ascertaining their right to speak and be heard.

To this, we (borrow from Peterson and) stress that the highest level of resolution that can be achieved – and must be achieved to really understand individual experiences – is, indeed, the individual. We value individuals. And individuals, human beings, are born with an inalienable right to hold opinions on anything and everything. I must say that the Men's Human Rights Movement already embodies this ideal, the diversity of opinion that can be found here is exceptional – as is our collective enthusiasm for disagreeing with passion and respect and ability to love each other despite and sometimes even because of our moral, political and philosophical differences. Never let that go because that spirit attracts and holds hearts and minds.

Feelings don't care about your facts

Stories frequently succeed in arousing strong feelings, like when we read a novel and become moved to tears or anger, or when we see scenes in a movie which make our skin crawl, give goose bumps, or make our hair stand on its proverbial end. Such strong feelings, and the stories that generate them, seem to put a lie to the popular phrase "Facts Don't Care About Your Feelings". The reverse seems more likely in evidence, even when we know that a fantasy novel or movie is not factually real – our feelings remain dominant.

This is why old-world mythologies, complete with kooky beliefs, have flourished and sustained large civilizations – civilizations which thrived and expanded under the guiding influence of those same unfactual stories. Even when the stories promote a geocentric universe with a flat earth, or mythical gods requiring human sacrifices, deadly wars or violence over the divinely mandated length of men's beards, or whether a woman's mandated head covering is pleasing to the divine powers. You would think these things would cause a civilization to collapse and die out, however it appears that those more rational civilizations who deconstruct myths have birth rates plummeting whilst cultures based in fanciful stories enjoy explosive birth rates.

Perhaps it's time to consider the painful possibility that feelings don't always care about our facts. That's certainly the case in many cultures, and it may indeed be a default setting of human beings generally – we are story creatures, and facts are often seen as an affront that offends both the stories we believe in and feelings associated with them.

Writing in the year 1984,[3] professor emeritus of communication Walter R. Fisher explored these two approaches to reality – the approaches of both story and rationality – and named them 1. 'the narrative paradigm' and 2. 'the rational world paradigm.'

Fisher describes the narrative paradigm in much the same way as I am in this talk; as a reflection of the fact that we use stories to communicate with each other, and to provide a shared map of meaning among a group of people.

Stories help by gathering the scattered bric-a-brac of everyday existence and combining it into a coherent whole, or what we might refer to as a template, that we use to orient ourselves and our goals in harmony with the shared orientation and goals of others. In short stories provide us with a shareable world.

As we have seen, religious stories and folk tales, can be both benevolent by way of organizing the masses into a harmonious moral unit, or they can be destructive as we see in stories promoting warfare against innocent nations, and even those stories which, today, promote gender wars.

What Fisher refers to alternatively as the 'rational world paradigm' consists in five presuppositions, which I can paraphrase as: 1. That humans are essentially rational beings, 2. That human decision-making and communication is a form of argument depending on clear-cut inferential and implicative structure, 3. That the conduct of such argument is ruled by legal, scientific and legislative dictates (etc), 4. That rationality is determined by subject matter knowledge, argumentative ability, and skill in employing the rules of advocacy in given fields, and finally, 5. The world is a set of logical puzzles which can be resolved through logical analysis and application of reason conceived as an argumentative construct.

Fisher notes the frequent failure of the rational world paradigm in the modern context, and goes on to conclude that:

> This failure suggests to me that the problem in restoring rationality to everyday argument may be the assumption that the reaffirmation of the rational world paradigm is the only solution. The position I am taking is that another paradigm may offer a better solution, one that will provide substance not only for public moral argument, but also all other forms of argument, for human communication in general. My answer to the second question then, is: "Yes I think so."
> Adoption of the narrative paradigm, I hasten to repeat, does not mean rejection of all the good work that has been done; it means a rethinking of it and investigating new moves that can be made to enrich our understanding of communicative interaction..[3]

What Fisher refers to as "Investigating new moves" is something the men's issues community might also take on board – specifically that stories and the feelings they evoke can be used as a form of communication to address the wrongs of gynocentrism and misandry we have been working so hard on, with limited successes, via the rational mode of argumentation and data recitations.

The narrative communication paradigm, or more simply the use of stories, has been criticised from a rational perspective when applied to scientific or legal issues, with the charge being that there is no way to make a choice between two equally coherent narratives. This is a valid complaint, but not one that practitioners of the rational world paradigm completely escape – this due to their frequent preferencing of one set of data over another, of placing the accent on one set of findings while neglecting others – a tendency that renders "rationalist" conclusions more subjective than they might like to admit – just like those of the story tellers.

Ultimately the rational and narrative approaches need to work in tandem if we wish to provide strong results, but at present the men's movement has been wary of narrative approaches due to their tendency to subjectivity and corruption. Unfortunately, storytelling remains the preferred mode of communication and decision-making of the human species, therefore we can't simply wish it away as irrelevant because that would be to deny the fact that humans have evolved to be narrative creatures – Homo Narrans – who preference communication via stories. It is a biological and evolutionary fact, so it isn't going away, and hating it will do little to change its biological necessity.

If story is here to stay, then we need to enter the fray. We need to get down into the alphabet soup and wrestle with those destructive narratives perpetuated by feminists and others who would reduce men and boys to a tiny fraction of their lived experience. This can be done by challenging any element of the dominant gender narratives currently circulating – by amending the stories to conclude the male hero is “good” rather than “toxic,” or by crafting new stories altogether that incorporate the positive experiences of men and boys.

That is my challenge to you all today: not to do away with rational or data-based approaches, but to broaden them by offering new endings to the destructive stories currently on offer, re-narrating them, or by telling new stories in ways so compelling and emotionally moving that they displace the destructive ones currently on offer.

The Problematic Basic Taco

April 11, 2021 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

For a restaurant, being woke means more than just putting a urinal in the ladies' room (to signify the inclusion of trans womxn as well as cancel any TERFs from the property). Even the most modest hot dog cart should display a mindfulness of the ways structural patriarchy, unconscious racism, and yellow mustard oppress underserved, over-policed, and fat-positive communities.

First, a bit of background. I am an ultra-woke, super-straight cis male of whiteness who is too despicable to deserve pronouns. I am fully committed to the woke creed that it is better for white men to live on their knees than assert their racial privilege. My favorite sandwich shop had just closed for two months for remodeling, and until their lady urinal is installed, I have to replace over half my weekly caloric load lest I lose my solidarity with those victimized for being fat.

As Marx would have it, a new taco stand, "Basic Taco", opened right next door to the gulag where I supervise the reeducation of free speech liberals about the violent harms of their incessant hate speech. Basic Taco is located at 2901 Commerce Street, Deep Ellum, Texas 75226. Their full menu can be viewed at their website but as you will see, this should be avoided.

Upon discovering Basic Taco, I would have felt a utopian glee were I not so completely concerned with securing reparations for people of color – after all, commissar Alexandria Ocasio Cortez began her career waitressing in a taco stand. Was Basic Taco a sign from Chairman Biden that I am destined to help lead the Green New Deal revolution? If white men were worthy of hope, I would so hope.

Just as Grammy Award-winning womxn of color Cardi B taught us justly that womxn should be judged primarily on their WAPs, so too a taco stand in the Epoch of Woke should be judged on the hate speech in their menu. The tastiness of their food, their affordability, their healthiness, their friendliness, and their convenience no longer matter as those factors do not further the revolution.

To my great disappointment, the menu of Basic Taco is filled with so much problematic harm that the arch villain Jordan Peterson would go red-skulled with envy at the power of their evil. I was able to document a few of their right-wing talking points before they shattered my emotional stability and I had to use coloring books and plushy toys to drag myself back to sanity. Thank, you know, the thing, that Biden had already confiscated my assault rifles and gifted them to the brave human traffickers of the Latinx cartels where they belong.

It is here that I must issue a massive TRIGGER WARNING: what follows is so horrible only white and Asian men have the institutional racism and structural sexism necessary to survive reading it. All other races and genders should go sniff the blue hair of college feminists or something.

You have been trigger warned.

The first section of the Basic Taco menu contains references to “Asada, Al Pastor, … Carnitas, Barbacoa, … chicharron.” These are words from a Latinx language known as Spanish, and their inclusion in an Anglx menu smacks of colonialism as well as cultural appropriation. Perhaps Basic Taco’s intention was to try to be inclusive to Latinxes but good intentions do not matter when one considers the massive harms done to people of color.

The second section of the Basic Taco menu contains the menu item, “Dad Bod”, a type of taco. When I saw this I raised my face to the heavens and screamed in pain. It was overwhelming – “Dad Bod” is patriarchal, misogynistic, and fat-phobic. It is racist because it attacks Black Lives Matter’s goal of dissolving the nuclear family. It is sexist because it tries to erase mothxrs. It is transphobic because it emphasizes sexual reproduction over gender identity. Only the n-word exceeds the nastiness of “Dad Bod”.

In rage and disbelief I noted other problematic food item names too terrifying to deconstruct – the “All Inclusive”. The “Food Coma”. The “Gym Selfie”. And then, at last, they snuffed “The Rooster”.

At this point I was reeling. Feebly I searched for a “mom” menu item to counterbalance this nightmare, and then, in the Quesadilla section, I found the “Dad Joke”, a large quesadilla. Basic Taco had doubled down!

I crawled away to the nearest safe space. Wildly I wondered what Basic Taco’s food was like.

But the only taste in my mouth was fascism.

The Biological Origins of Damseling

April 13, 2021 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Damseling is a biologically-based behavior that's as old as the human race. Technically speaking, the behaviour we refer to as damseling refers to any human being who announces its vulnerability to others – to husband, family, friend, stranger or to one's tribe.

The announcement of vulnerability stimulates a neurological system in the brain of observers, thereby eliciting reflexes of protection, caretaking and nurturance typically reserved for vulnerable children and infants., thereby eliciting reflexes of protection, caretaking and nurturance typically extended to vulnerable children and infants.

Curiously, the same neurological system can be exploited by adults who find themselves in a vulnerable situation, or by adults feigning vulnerability in order to acquire resources of protection, provision or comfort – essentially a hacking of the human operating system.

While such vulnerability can be displayed by any human, whether a child or adult of either sex, when we use the word damseling it refers especially to adult women who engage in theatrical versions of these behaviours.

The word damsel derives from the French demoiselle, meaning "young lady", and the phrase "damsel in distress" in turn is a translation of the French demoiselle en détresse. The behaviour of the damsel in distress; her screams, her fear, her appeals for relief in the face of immanent danger, are captured in the words of Julia Kristeva who says of life in the Middle Ages, "Roles were assigned to woman and man: suzerain and vassal, the lady offering up a 'distress' and the man offering a 'service.' "

Ancient mythologies around the world have captured the theme of damseling, and also the 'parental brain' state of the heroes who set out to rescue vulnerable maidens. While these tales are numerous, the practice of damseling did not become the centrepiece of any culture until a catering to women's vulnerability was codified as a social expectation for men in the Middle Ages – a codification whereby men were asked to specialize as servicing agents in the role of alleviating women's distresses. Giving birth to this idea, chivalry, courtly love, and a new sexual relations contract coalesced that placed women's safety and comfort at the top of the hierarchy of social customs.

This gendered social development is perhaps nowhere better exemplified than in the "Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady" a chivalric order founded by French knight and military leader Jean Le Maingre and twelve knights in 1399, committing themselves for the duration of five years to the protecting of all damsels in distress:

> Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honor, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies, including widows.
> According to his Livre des faits, in 1399 Jean Le Maingre, tired of receiving complaints from ladies, maidens, and widows oppressed by powerful men bent > on depriving them of the lands and honours, and finding no knight of squire willing to defend their just cause, out of compassion and charity founded an order of twelve knights sworn to carry "a shield of gold enamelled with green and a white lady inside" (une targe d'or esmaillé de verd & tout une dame blanche dedans). The twelve knights, after swearing this oath, affirmed a long letter explaining their purpose and disseminated it widely in France and beyond her borders.

> The letter explained that any lady young or old finding herself the victim of injustice could petition one or more or the knights of the 'Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady' for redress and that knight would respond promptly and leave whatever other task he was performing to fight the lady's oppressor personally.

During this period, men saving damsels was referred to euphemistically as love service, which saw male lovers referred to as homo ligius (the woman's liegeman, or 'my man') who pledged honor, and servitium (service) to the lady via a posture of feudal homage. This growth of gynocentric specialization would later allow Modesta Pozzo to write the following:

> "Don't we see that men's rightful task is to go out to work and wear themselves out trying to accumulate wealth, as though they were our factors or stewards, so that we can remain at home like the lady of the house directing their work and enjoying the profit of their labors? That, if you like, is the reason why men are naturally stronger and more robust than us—they need to be, so they can put up with the hard labor they must endure in our service." (Pozzo – 1590 AD)

Such is the social ascendency of women and their ever-increasing cries of distress. Today we have a different dilemma in that damseling has evolved into a victim cult extending well beyond women. The damseling attitude now blankets much of the world with aggressive demands for redress, with social movements arising from the trope that are fomenting violence and decay within human societies. Exploiting primal reflexes, particularly those designed for parenting vulnerable juveniles, has become a runaway train with little to stop it. We can only hope that the current destruction will serve as the moment of reflection and restraint toward the damsel's demands.

Two Modes of Damseling

E.B. Bax outlined two forms of damseling, one appearing as "simple weakness," and the other as "aggressive weakness." In his view simple weakness deserves consideration on its merits, whereas aggressive weakness deserves no assistance.

> "For modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when > this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration that might be extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive. Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength.

> Woman at the present day has been encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration." Chapter 5: The "Chivalry" Fake, in The Fraud of Feminism (1913)

Whether real or purely fabricated, these displays of vulnerability represent the two main faces or modes of enacting the damsel-in-distress archetype. Both begin their display with an announcement of vulnerability and powerlessness, but their ways of enlisting assistance differ considerably. The simple damsel invites assistance by displaying utter helplessness, imparting a sense of inadequacy, impotence and a complete lack of agency to deal with the situation responsible for her distress. The aggressive damsel, on the other hand, angrily denounces the forces assailing her, and demands redress with bitter and vindictive calls for the world to exact revenge on her behalf.

Unlike the simple damsel, the aggressive damsel feels unable to attract chivalric reinforcements via the simple act of broadcasting her helplessness. Thus, she loudly seeks the attention of men and governments, demanding they provide chivalric redress for whatever 'distress' is assailing her. This kind of damsel relies particularly on governments to address her grievances, and she is likely the kind of woman that John Stuart Mill, an advocate of feminism, had in mind when he wrote the following;

> "From the moral influence exercised by women arose the spirit of chivalry … a special submission and worship directed towards women, who were distinguished from the other defenceless classes by the high rewards which they had it in their power voluntarily to bestow on those who endeavoured to earn their favour, instead of extorting their subjection.
>
> Chivalry left without legal check all those forms of wrong which reigned unpunished throughout society; it only encouraged a few to do right in preference to wrong, by the direction it gave to the instruments of praise and admiration. But the real dependence of morality must always be upon its penal sanctions – its power to deter from evil… The beauties and graces of the chivalrous character are still what they were, but the rights of the weak, and the general comfort of human life, now rest on a far surer and steadier support."
> [John Stuart Mill, The Subjection of Women 1869]

Many readers will recognise Bax's simple weakness in the behaviour of traditional gynocentric women, and likewise will recognize aggressive weakness in the behaviours of feminist women. However, contrary to Bax's trusting view of non-aggressive displays of weakness, readers might recognize that these too can amount to manufactured displays of weakness every bit as manipulative and undeserving of assistance as that of aggressive weakness.

To labor this theme a little further, we also find these two modes of enacting the damsel within classical mythology, long before our modern world learned to exploit the victim routine for personal advancement. The two goddesses who best represent these positions are Persephone, the simple damsel who was abducted and victimised by Hades without ever showing personal agency of her own, and yet her helplessness alone provoked widespread efforts to save her, and secondly the goddess Hera, wife of Zeus who was forever seething in a sense of victimhood and grievance, while seeking cosmic vengeance toward those who wronged her. For more on these classical archetypes I recommend the YouTube channel of Greta Aurora who has made a series of videos exploring the victim complexes of these goddesses, along with explorations of many other archetypal figures.

Damseling in the Political Sphere

In 2019 a study was carried out in the Council of the European Union[1] to assess how gender roles might affect the behavior of diplomats within the context of international negotiations. The study discovered that damseling by women provided an advantage in the political realm because the male targets reacted with displays chivalric deference to whatever bargaining requests were sought by female diplomats. The study concluded as follows:

> In a survey experiment in the Council of the European Union, we find that female representatives behaving stereotypically weak and vulnerable may trigger a chivalry reaction among male representatives, increasing the likelihood that the men will agree to support a bargaining proposal from the women.

Many of the female diplomats working within the Council of The European Union would be quick to state their feminist credentials, including a belief in the strength, independence and competence of women in positions of power. Nevertheless when working in the political negotiating field many of these women are quick to fall back on the medieval practice of damseling, with advantageous outcomes.

The following video by Janice Fiamengo provides further evidence of damseling as it appears in the political sphere today.

Suffice to say that damseling remains with us and indeed appears to be growing stronger with every new year of feminist influence. This fact has not been lost on feminists themselves, many of whom have cited the victim complex that sits at the core of feminist thought, and of the wider society it has influenced.

Damseling and Feminism

Most observers today, including feminist observers like Christina Hoff-Sommers, Camille

Paglia, Rene Denfeld, Katie Roiphe and others agree that feminism comes close, if not all the way, to being a cult of victimhood.

The phenomenon has variously been referred to as grievance feminism, victim feminism, safe space feminism, and even fainting-couch feminism – with Christina Hoff-Sommers portraying its mythos as "a battle between fragile maidens and evil predators." [2]

Feminist icon Naomi Wolf tells that victim feminism evolved out of "old habits of ladylike behavior that were cloaked in the guise of radicalism," [2] and laments that a substantial segment of modern feminism is devoted to its cause.

Denfeld writes that current feminists "promote a new status for women: that of the victim," and adds:

> "This is victim mythology. From rape redefinitions to feminist theory on the "patriarchy," victimization has become the subtext of the movement, the moral to be found in every feminist story. Together these stories form a feminist mythology in which a singular female subject is created: woman as a helpless, violated, and oppressed victim. Victim mythology says that men will always be predators and women will always be their prey. It is a small place to live, a place that tells women that there is really no way out.
> "Like other mythologies, victim mythology reduces the complexity of human interaction to grossly oversimplified mythical tales, a one-note song, where the message of the story becomes so important that fiction not only triumphs over fact but the realities of women's experiences are dismissed and derided when they conflict with the accepted female image.[4]

While Denfeld does a good job of describing feminism's victim mentality, she labors under a myth of her own by characterizing it as a "new" fetish among feminists. Anyone reading through the history of feminist literature can see it appealed to by literally every feminist writer.

In all of these accounts the behavior being described is damseling, a practice feminists have been at the forefront of preserving from the medieval canon. Evoked in conjunction with claims of male brutality, rapiness, depravity and insensitivity, the ultimate purpose of damseling is to draw chivalric responses from men, a routine Wolf makes clear in her remark that "victim feminism casts women as sexually pure and mystically nurturing, and stresses the evil done to these 'good' women as a way to petition for their rights."[3]

A famous example of feminist damseling, both literal and figurative, is Anita Sarkeesian. Sarkeesian is known for raising concerns that video-games are misogynistic – like most everything else found in the feminist worldview. Her primary concern was that female game characters are often portrayed as damsels-in-distress saved by male heroes, which promotes, she says, sexual objectification and a range of other problems. To address that issue in video games she moved to launch a study project to raise awareness.

Sarkeesian established a fundraiser for $6,000.00 for her project, but after receiving some initial trolling by trolls on social media she damseled herself to potential donors by saying she was under grave threat, swooning with such finesse that she was showered with 158K in donations from fellow feminists and white knights. Over a thousand people donated after hearing of her “plight.”

With that financial success, Sarkeesian subsequently replayed the scenario over and again particularly in the context of further fundraising efforts and public speaking; swooning about online attacks directed against her or over female gamers enduring abject sexism, female video-game characters being cast in degrading and/or humiliating roles, and about young impressionable girls being robbed of agency after being subjected to the damsel trope in games.

Sarkeesian’s case is particularly poignant because, from the many subjects she could have highlighted to damsel herself for attention, she chose to damsel herself over the very existence of damsels. This demonstrates that even when disavowing the medieval pageant of damsels in distress, feminists continue to enact it even while obfuscating their complicity in the tradition.

Feminism would have died out long ago if it were not for the power of this ancient ruse, and whilst damseling continues to draw rewards from a public primed to cater to it, the planet will increasingly come to resemble a tower full of imprisoned, vulnerable Disney Princesses.

A License to Defame?

April 21, 2021 | by Robert Franklin | Link | Original Link

A hearing is underway in a Vancouver, British Columbia courtroom that has far-reaching implications for the ability of the wrongly accused to find justice in Canadian civil courts.

Steven Galloway was an internationally-acclaimed author and professor of creative writing at the University of British Columbia. He had a two-year sexual affair with one of his female students, known only as "MC," who already had a Master's degree and is five years his senior.

In 2015, four years after the affair was over, a former creative writing student and self-described narcissist named Chelsea Rooney, acting as MC's mouthpiece, publicly stated that Galloway had violently raped MC and that Rooney knew of 19 other women who would level charges of sexual abuse against him.

The campus witch trial began immediately. Within one business day, UBC suspended Galloway from his post as professor and relieved him of the chairmanship of his department, apparently the only time in the history of the school that a professor had been disciplined without any investigation.

Galloway never denied the affair with MC, but has always said the sex was consensual, and hundreds of emails from her to him during the affair bear him out. Still, prior to any investigation, the university sided with his accuser, and faculty, administrators and students joined in the public shaming and demands for Galloway's dismissal. Soon, former friends and colleagues at the school took to social media with a dual message – (1) the allegations against him were true and (2) anyone who dared call for caution or even due process was a rape apologist. The mainstream Canadian press piled on.

Amazingly, UBC then appointed none other than Chelsea Rooney, Galloway's chief accuser, to solicit, with the imprimatur of the university, others who may have had a grievance against him. In addition to being suspended, at the insistence of unidentified UBC sources, Galloway, in Ohio for a speaking engagement, was arrested by police, strip searched and confined to a psychiatric facility for 72 hours. For the full horror of what Galloway faced, go here.

None of the allegations against Galloway were ever presented to the police, but eventually UBC decided someone with investigative experience should look into them. So it hired the former Chief Justice of the British Columbia Supreme Court, Mary Ellen Boyd, to do so. Despite Rooney's best efforts, she found nothing with which to tar Galloway, but about Rooney said this: "Suffice it to say that I found AC5 [Rooney] a biased witness, who has perceived every minor incident here through her own tainted lens. I am unable to place much, if any, weight on her evidence."

And what of those 19 other women with accusations against Galloway, so much ballyhooed by Rooney? There were none. What Rooney actually produced were herself and seven of her friends, not one of whom even alleged sexual misconduct by Galloway.

For example, one “complainant” had this to say: “I acknowledge that [Galloway] never behaved in a disrespectful manner toward me,” and “I did not feel either threatened, or unsafe, or vulnerable vis-à-vis Galloway.”

Such was the “case” against the star novelist.

But no matter, seven months after Rooney’s original accusations, UBC fired him anyway, citing an undefined “breach of trust.” In short, a major figure in Canadian literature was cashiered by the university for which he’d worked for over 15 years on the basis of little-to-no evidence and after a process that’s best compared to Kafka’s The Trial.

Unsurprisingly, Galloway sued the university and won damages of over $200,000 Canadian for its injury to his reputation. But Galloway didn’t stop there. He’s now sued 24 individual accusers, presumably including Rooney (the defendants are anonymous), professors and others.

The hearing that’s taking place now is part of that lawsuit – by far the most important part. Why? Because the judge will rule on 11 defendants’ motion to dismiss Galloway’s suit against them claiming that a 2019 British Columbia law shields them from civil liability in the matter.

They do so despite having publicly accused him of criminal wrongdoing, accusations that were investigated and found to be without merit. Anywhere else in the English-speaking world, that could give rise to liability for libel, slander and/or defamation of character.

What then is the hearing about? Why not just proceed to trial and let a judge or jury decide the issues of liability, if any, and damages, if any?

The Protection of Public Participation Act relied on by defendants was intended to discourage SLAPP suits by powerful corporations against individual whistle-blowers, the idea being that, if a matter is in the “public interest,” individuals should have the freedom to discuss it publicly without fear of being litigated to death by large businesses or other entities with far greater resources. The law promotes free speech by encouraging speaking out without fear of reprisal. Needless to say, the issues surrounding sexual assault are well within the public interest conceived of by the statute.

But it was never intended to do what the Galloway defendants claim – give a free pass to libel, slander and defamation. The law is intended to promote public awareness of important issues, not public lying and the destruction of hard-won reputations. Truth telling is encouraged, lying is not. But the defendants want to turn the law on its head. They seek a license to lie, to smear. They want to walk away from their outrageous conduct untouched and free to destroy the reputation of the next person who dares to do something – anything – of which they disapprove. In short, they seek to wield unprecedented and unaccountable power. And they seek to let others know that they can too.

World Day of The Boy Child

May 16, 2021 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

International Men's Day – on the 19th November – was founded in 1999 by Dr Jerome Teelucksingh, a history lecturer at University of the West Indies in Trinidad and Tabago. That day has never been recognised by the United Nations (who in fact recognise the 19th November as World Toilet Day). They have recognised International Women's Day on the 8th March since 1911 and from 2012 have recognised the 11th October as International Day of the Girl Child.

In 2018, Dr Teelucksingh sent a letter to government leaders and non-governmental organisations calling for the inaugural observance of the International Day of the Boy Child (more commonly known as International Boys' Day) on the 16th May. Dr Teelucksingh is of mixed acclaim in the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) – while International Men's Day in particular and International Boys' Day increasingly are celebrated by the community, Teelucksingh's commitment to patriarchy theory (widely contested by the MHRM) creates an intellectual gulf that appears in practice to be a barrier to communication that the MHRM is only slightly less bound by than Teelucksingh himself.

However, his efforts to draw attention to the "many boys and teenagers who are marginalized, alienated and left behind", issues such as educational underperformance and neglect and abuse, and his apt observance that "We cannot ignore that without a focus on both the boy child and the girl child, gender equality is not a reality" are laudable. And, gratitude should be extended to the man for founding these days of observance that can be so useful in uniting people concerned about men and boys and elevating the issues faced by men and boys in the public conversation, at least once – or twice – a year.

Boys in the U.K., who are reasonably typical of boys across the Western World today, do progressively worse in education than girls, with attainment gaps widening throughout primary, secondary and tertiary education. Some theorise that reasons include:

- Girls changing ambitions in a modern society – including career and pushing back family,
- Feminism "which has lead to raising the expectations and self-esteem of girls",
- Gender-stereotypical parenting that socialises girls into studious habits and excuse lack of discipline in boys.

Sue Sharp's 1970s and 1990s 'Just Like a Girl' studies did indeed show that over those decades, girls ambitions have changed (from 'love, marriage, husbands and career' to 'job, career and being able to support themselves') – which could feasibly account for more commitment and diligence being applied by girls in educational settings. In 1983, Dan Kiley published his book 'Peter Pan Syndrome – Men Who Have Never Grown Up' which argues that there is a prevalent issue with irresponsibility in men who behave childishly and need help to reach emotional maturity. The theory caught on and has hung around, with The Good Men Project explaining that:

> "Boys have had a new style of living handed to them; one of having all their needs taken care of, and of being able to enter fantasy worlds with little to no hassle. They have little conflict, little problem, little to drive them. Now, I do understand that so many kids are hassled, one way or another, and have to fight it out. I completely respect that. I'm suggesting that many of these boys may not have the drive to push them "to the next level." They aren't developing ambition."

It is interesting to note that while feminism (which is relentlessly full of praise for the female of the species and sympathy for the struggles we apparently face) is acclaimed for raising expectations and self-esteem in girls; the attitude taken to boys who are underperforming is to belittle their struggles and to suggest that their biggest problem is their entertainment. If we are worried about self esteem however, we may want to try to mitigate teacher biases against boys that have been proven – and shown to impact on boys' performance. We may want to reassess the "milieu if disapproval" that Christina Hoff Sommers diagnosed in her book, 'The War Against Boys' (2000), who quoted Martin Spafford, a London secondary school teacher, as reporting that:

> "Boys feel continually attacked for who they are. We have created a sense in school that masculinity is something bad. Boys feel blamed for history, and a school culture has grown up which is suspicious and frightened of boys."

Whereas the people who know and love boys best – their parents – can be blamed for tolerating boisterousness in boys which translates into disruptiveness in schools; an alternative idea may be that it is schools who should expect a reasonable level of boisterousness from (mainly male) students. Perhaps, schools should even accommodate it – through increasing breaktimes (that have decreased over decades) and accepting that some rough and tumble is a natural and healthy part of typical boys' play styles that helps them to learn to regulate their behaviour and emotions while also enhancing cognitive and language development.

Boys are almost twice as likely to be victims of violent crime than girls and yet the U.K. (which is again, typical of the Western world) has only a Strategy to End Violence Against Women and Girls. As William Collins pointed out, in 'The Empathy Gap' (2019):

> "The dominant gender narrative will generally react to these observations with unconcern, citying (correctly) that men and boys are also the majority of the perpetrators of these offences. The implications seems to be that this observation somehow neutralises any need for concern or compassion for the victims. This is about as clear an example of victim blaming as one could have".

Boy victims deserve both concern and compassion. Boy perpetrators – more likely to:

- Have been taken into care,
- Have experienced child abuse,
- Have seen violence in their home,
- Regularly play truant from school, been expelled or excluded from school,
- Have suffered from all manner of mental illnesses (including addiction) and to have attempted suicide,
- Been raised 'dad deprived'.

Boys are significantly more likely to commit suicide than girls despite being less likely to be diagnosed with a mental disorder. In The Samaritans 'Men, Suicide and Society' (2012) report, Amy Chandler put forward the view that "suicide might be related to the failure of hegemonic masculinity" – another example of victim blaming that pits the ideals and aspirations of men and boys against their own self-interest.

In 'The Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology' (2019) however, Martin Seager and co took aim at the idea of gender as a purely social construction, which they branded a 'political fashion' rather than a scientific theory and suggested that viewing masculine characteristics as archetypes rather than stereotypes can help us to achieve 'more scientific and humane' responses to men in distress. As the American Psychological Association proved beyond doubt in their 'GUIDELINES for Psychological Practice with Boys and Men', the psychological community conventionally pathologises masculinity rather than adapting to the needs of boys and men.

Taking just these problems into consideration – which is to overlook many other critical issues for boys, such as fatherlessness, the anti-male dominant feminist narratives in wider society, and male genital mutilation – it is really amazing that most of our boys are alright. A testament to their willfulness, stoicism, and the creative energy that drives them, this International Boys' Day we should honour them, their characters and their passions. So many boys are rejecting the misinformation that malevolent elements are attempting to indoctrinate them with.

Within the two years before the 2021 publication of 'Men Who Hate Women', Laura Bates had seen boys responses to her ideological conditioning changing with them no longer accepting her claims. She called them 'angry, resistant' and I salute them! And, in Hope Not Hate's 2020 'State of Hate' report, Owen Jones reported a similar phenomenon, including an anecdote wherein:

> "at a school in Norfolk I saw a small group of boys hound a teacher for "hating men". The teacher was rather bemused as to why she was being accused of this, so the boys explained. In a previous lesson she had mentioned that she believed in gender equality and would consider herself to be a feminist. They explained to her that feminists hate men, want to oppress men and it was appalling that the school would allow "someone like her" to teach".

Meanwhile, Jordan Peterson is reaching 3.7 million subscribers just on his personal YouTube channel (YouTube being a platform whose users are more likely to be both young and male) and nearly all boys are gaming – an activity that promotes:

- Improved decision making,
- Hand-eye coordination,
- Accelerated analytical ability,
- Stress relief,
- Team building,
- Boosts creativity,
- Aids reading ability and other educational skills,

As well as:

- Strengthening memory and attention,
- Train you to multitask,
- Enhance brain speed and flexibility
- And encourages sociability.

So, let's teach our boys well – and in turn be taught by them. And, hey, give them an extra hour with their games today!

Thank you, A Voice for Men readers, for reading this piece – which is also my inaugural post on the Messages for Men site blog. Much remains under construction on my beautiful new website but please bookmark the address to return to!

Giving Gates the Gate

May 17, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Some decades ago, I remember my cousin's son saying that when he grew up he wanted to be like Bill Gates. I don't remember how old the kid was at the time, but I don't think he meant he wanted to be a software developer. In fact, I don't think he was old enough to know what a software developer does. He just wanted to be rich. I understood perfectly. When I was his age, I was fascinated with Scrooge McDuck, the Disney comic book character who used to dive into his money bin and do the backstroke around a capacious pool filled to the brim with cash and coins. As I recall, there was no shallow end in his pool.

Today I don't know that anyone would want to be Bill Gates. Over the years there have been any number of allegations pertaining to a possible dark side of his global do-gooding, but now, in the wake of his divorce proceedings, all sorts of revelations about the dark side of his sexual life are coming out.

Now we read about his visits to the Combat Zone, Boston's once-notorious tenderloin, during his years at Harvard. And let's not forget the pool parties with naked strippers at his Seattle mansion. Turns out that even though Gates looked like a divinity student, he was as horny as the next guy, and for a while the next guy was Jeffrey Epstein. I don't want to invite sympathy for the devil, but a lesser man could get his freak on without worrying about it attaining "trending now" status.

Several years ago, I wrote about his wife Melinda ("The Power and the Reflected Glory" posted on May 14, 2017) on this web site. In essence, it was a Cinderella story about a young woman marrying into money, status, and power, much like a commoner marrying into a royal family. She had everything to gain and nothing to lose by marrying him.

Of course, despite the titillating revelations about Bill's sexual peccadilloes, Melinda could stay married to Bill. I'm sure they could afford a house with separate bedrooms…I was going to say two master bedrooms but that might be perceived poorly by those who suffer from OCD in regard to gender issues. On the other hand, referring to the master bedroom and the mistress bedroom could be misconstrued.

I don't know what kind of divorce settlement Bill and Melinda will work up, but there's no doubt she will be a multi-billionaire (Bill's net worth was $145.8 billion as of May 8). At age 56, Melinda can just goof off the rest of her life or continue channeling Eleanor Roosevelt and keep on playing the global busybody role.

Instead of the Bill and Melinda Gates Foundation, will we now have the Bill Gates Foundation and the Melinda Gates Foundation? No more BMGF but now BGF and MGF. If she reverts to her maiden name – French – it will be the MFF. Equity, y'know. His and hers, like bathroom towels.

But enough of Melinda. The question I never asked in my original piece was what was Bill thinking? Bill Gates was 38 years old – in other words, old enough to know what he was getting into – when he got married. Not to sound too cynical, but he could afford all the mistresses, call girls, female flunkeys, and maids he wanted. Hell, he could buy up an apartment complex and stash all his women there if he were of a mind. So why did he do the monogamy thing?

I suspect it was because he wanted children. Rare is the man who wouldn't like to see at least one of his sperm cells fulfill the purpose for which it was intended. In a sense, every child is a genetic experiment and perhaps intellectual curiosity got the better of Bill. Alas, fathering three – count 'em, three! – children likely sullied his reputation among the carbon footprint critics. One suspects he spent some sleepless nights worrying about kidnappers.

Given his connections with biotech companies, he probably could have done some groundbreaking experimentation and mixed his human DNA with that of various animal species. Shades of Dr. Moreau! (Ironic fun fact: his father, a wealthy Seattle attorney, was once the President of the local Planned Parenthood Chapter.)

Experimentation is all well and good, but there is indeed something primal about just keeping the bloodline going – even in an era of below-replacement birth rates. True, middle class family life has gotten too pricey for the middle class, but that was never an issue for Gates. He could have spread his seed like Genghis Khan (it is estimated that 1 of every 200 men in the world carries Khan's DNA). He would have no problem finding surrogate mothers willing to carry his children. Think of the book deal an aspiring authoress could get for Birthing Bill's Baby!

So I repeat the question: why would Bill resort to marriage? His wealth gave him options most single men never dream of; by getting married, he saddled himself with legal responsibilities that hobble all married men to one degree or another.

Of course, Bill's financial status does shield him from a lot of the misery. The readers of this web site don't need to be reminded of the horrors of divorce lawyers and family law courts. Still, even if you can afford world-class divorce lawyers that doesn't mean it's a walk in the park on a spring day. Even for the well-heeled, Splitsville is not a resort town!

Unlike Bill, the average Joe doesn't have much choice if he wants an heir. If he doesn't do the conventional marriage bit and simply partners up for any length of time, there is still the specter of common law marriage looming over him. And for those men who could care less about an heir, the most sobering thought of all is the realization that a man is just one orgasm away from child support payments. Not a problem for Bill, by the way, as none of his kids is a minor.

Rich and powerful man like Gates often have a mistress. Indeed, such men are almost expected to have one. It's on the checklist with the yacht, the private plane, the philanthropic foundation, the antique car collection, the multi-million dollar donations to hospitals and universities, and the pricy works of art adorning the mansion.

If a man could afford more than one mistress, they were often referred to as concubines, a word we don't hear much these days. But in more tolerant times, a concubine was something more than a mistress but something less than a wife.

Needless to say, in our feminized, democratized era, such domestic arrangements are frowned upon, though I wouldn't say they are flat-out illegal like bigamy. Granted, if you get invited to state dinners, as Gates does, it could make for some awkwardness in the receiving line… "Pleased to meet you, Mr. President. Let me introduce Roxie, my concubine."

The fact is if you want people to take you seriously as a public figure, being a bachelor is a drawback. Hugh Heffner could pull it off (for grins and giggles – and maybe guffaws – Google "Hugh Hefner Girl Friends List) but swinging bachelorhood was his persona. As for other prominent bachelors, all sorts of rumors start to circulate. In days of old, there might be whispers of homosexuality. Today that stigma is greatly reduced, but there are others to replace it. A commitmentphobe? Married to his work? Peter Pan syndrome? Ah, probably a misogynist!

Of course, a man in Gates's position can easily refute the misogynist label by surrounding himself with a harem of female VPs, but even that doesn't compensate for failure to launch, matrimonially speaking.

One wonders if Gates ever had second thoughts about naming his company Microsoft. Why? Just Google Bill Gates Jokes and note how many involve a play on words with his company's name and his manhood. Could it be that those jokes inspired him to, well, prove his manhood? Well, no better response to the jokers than a wife and kids.

But it has to be the real deal. Trotting out your surrogate-mothered offspring just won't do. So you have to take the married with children route. It's a bit like the royal family. A pseudo-king, like Gates, must have a pseudo-royal family to complete the image.

Maybe a good thing for Melinda that she was fertile. Consider the case of Henry VIII, who lusted for a male heir. If one woman won't present you with a son, get rid of her and get another. If the church disapproves, get rid of the church and get another. It's good to be the king. At least it was before the days of the 24-hour news cycle, back when the lord of the realm could lord it over the plebes. Given today's media, there would never be a slow news day while Henry VIII was on the throne. He was not one to care about the optics of his deeds.

Bill Gates, however, could have gone Henry one better. Travel was difficult in Henry's day but a man like Bill Gates can visit every country in every continent without running out of time or money. His globe-trotting provides him with ample opportunity for sex tourism…with an expense account that doesn't have to be approved! And once he breaks free of Melinda, anything is possible.

Bill, you can be as kinky as you wannabe and the only tongue-lashing you'll ever get is if you request oral from your sex partner du jour. You can be a veritable James Bond villain of debauchery. You can rewrite the sexual feats of the Guinness Book of World Records. It's all yours for the taking if you want it!

One thing for sure. Bill Gates will not be just another DWM in the Personal ads.

A Simple Man’s Observations of a Gynocentric Universe

May 20, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, I wrote an article in which I made reference to the character, David Vincent who starred in a television series titled The Invaders.

David has witnessed aliens landing upon the earth and has seen with his own eyes that they are taking human form and living among us with the sole intention of destroying humanity and ultimately taking the planet earth from us and using it to meet the needs of the aliens.

Mr. Vincent spends each episode trying to open people’s eyes to the truth but few listen to him and those who do turn away convinced he is a crazed conspiracy theorist. Some try to humour him but treat him as they would an imbecile who would be better suited to an asylum.

Vincent knows there is a tiny flaw in the human bodies the aliens assume in order to mix with people and infiltrate our schools, clubs, workplaces and homes. The little finger on one hand is always slightly deformed.

But who is going to take a man who screams about deformed little fingers and a world takeover seriously?

I wrote that I have often felt a deep empathy for David Vincent for I believe his circumstances mirror our own in many ways.

For years I have seen feminism infest our schools, Judicial system, entertainment industry, media and government. It has spread its tentacles into every powerful institution in the western world.

When I first began to call out the bigotry and hatred which was already such a fundamental feature of this vile ideology, I was either brushed aside, politely and rather contemptuously and dismissed as a fool who had some kind of an agenda when it came to females or someone who was grossly overstating the power and influence of these feminists who simply wanted women to get a fair go and be given “equality” after decades of oppression and abuse.

Others were simply bored by any discussion of men’s needs or the suggestion that there was anything to be feared or anxious about with regard to the feminist movement. There was football to watch, beers to drink and women to pursue.

That sense of frustration and impotence has remained an ever-present reality for me during the past thirty years. I am forever grateful to have a wife who is my best friend and staunchest ally in my quest to open people’s eyes to the reality of the feminist infestation which has wormed its way to the top echelons of every institution that matters in our society.

Without Maggie and AVFM I think I may have lost my mind a long time ago.

As true as Orwell’s statement may be:

> ‘Being in a minority, even in a minority of one, did not make you mad. There was truth and there was untruth, and if you clung to the truth even against the whole world, you were not mad.’

I don’t think I could have clung steadfastly to my rage about the daily injustices meted out to men and boys without her support. I think perhaps I may have crumbled at some point and either stopped speaking out or worse, become convinced that the endless lies spewed by feminists were perhaps true after all and I was the one who couldn’t see the light.

You know- two plus two equals five.

In the end Winston Smith didn’t just say it did to make the bad guys stop torturing him. He really believed it. And that final submission and willingness to believe brought him a release of some kind. He was no longer fighting against Big Brother and all of the society who loved and believed the lies he spoke every day.

He swum with the current. He ran with the flock. He raged with the mob.

So much easier. Give up the fight and cheer the latest propaganda with enthusiasm.

It makes for far more enjoyable dinners with friends and comfortable conversations in the workplace. No more angst, ulcers, heartache or tears.

But Maggie and AVFM has kept me sane.

I know we tell the truth even if it is inside our insular bubble. Someone, somewhere may read our words, watch our videos, hear our podcasts and begin to think and question. Just that alone would make it all worthwhile. To open the eyes of people willing to think and weigh up the arguments is no small thing.

Let me write about the past few weeks. I have been meaning to do so for some time but felt exhausted by the idea of pulling up and the revisiting the issues which disturbed me and made me gnash my teeth. For each time I write on any issue regarding feminism it is an emotionally draining trial.

Let me begin by telling you that the principal of Brauer College wrote a response to my twelve-page letter expressing my disgust with regard to her demand that every boy in her school stand up and apologise for all for the sexual abuse and rape carried out by men who share their gender.

Here is what Jane Boyle wrote,

> Dear Mark
>
> Thank you very much for writing and explaining the concerns you have about a whole school assembly that was held at Brauer College some time ago. I also read that you have a number of other concerns. I would like to assure you that the assembly was conceived with the best of intentions.
>
> Yours faithfully,
>
> Jane Boyle
> Principal

That's it. I was surprised to receive anything but her words were truly as non-responsive as a collection of words could be. The fact that she could believe the public humiliation of hundreds of young boys could in any way be defended as being well intentioned simply demonstrates how truly misandric this woman and her staff must be.

Of course, I had already written that in my letter to her.

A couple of weeks after her outrageous attack on boys another college in Melbourne welcomed a guest speaker who told the white boys sitting in front of her they were oppressors.

I have no doubt variations on this theme are happening in schools all over Australia, Britain, Canada and America.

Yet that letter from Ms. Boyle was a minor irritant in comparison to other issues which caught my attention recently.

On the 25th of April, Australians once again, set aside a few minutes to think about the enormous sacrifices of our fallen soldiers and those who returned either wounded or psychologically damaged and traumatized so that generations who followed them could enjoy the freedoms and rights we so often take for granted.

Of course, this is another issue I have written about before. Despite the fact that tens of thousands of Australian men gave their lives fighting for our country, every newspaper article, television program or radio announcement parroted the same words time and again.

We give thanks for the sacrifices made by the brave men and women in our military.

Yes, the words burned and enraged me but it was something else related to the tributes to our military on this special day which tipped me over the edge.

A talented artist by the name of Cam Scale decided to paint three towering wheat silos in the Australian country side to thank and honour our fallen heroes.

Please look closely at the images which adorn the huge silos. They feature two women. One is medic and the other a nurse. These are the true heroes. These are the people who made our way of life possible.

Now there were of course male medics, doctors and stretcher bearers who often went out onto the battlefields to give aide to wounded and dying men. So, if making sure we don't forget the wonderful work of our war time medics was the goal of this artist, couldn't one of them have been a male?

You really have to step back and think when you observe something like this. Sadly, most Aussies would have glanced at the artwork which appeared in a much read newspaper, admired the artists obvious talent and then turned the page without a moment's consideration.

Sixty thousand young Australian men died on battlefields fighting for our country or under its flag.

Not only do we now have to give equal standing, gratitude and acknowledgement to both males and females on this day dedicated to the memory of our fallen, but in actual fact, place women at the forefront of our memorials.

The fact that (as far as I am aware) I am the only person to have been genuinely outraged by this artist's decision is the most demoralizing aspect of the whole issue.

Sixty thousand men die. Two towering silos are adorned with images of women as a sign of our deepest thanks and admiration for all they did during the war.

Now let me add, that after these two colossal images were completed, Mr. Scale did paint an image of an Aussie soldier (male) on a much smaller silo.

If Mr. Scale had been commissioned to paint two gigantic images to represent the many people who have died in a domestic violence incident and he'd painted two males, one elderly, the other a teenage boy as the face of all victims, what pray tell do you think would have happened?

Absolutely apoplectic outrage on a scale not seen before in this country is the correct answer. Yet (and here's the kicker) many males both young and old have in fact been killed or badly hurt in domestic violence incidents.

Such an action would be branded insulting and disgusting. Rosie would call it an insult to the memory of all of the women and girls who have died at the hands of toxic males and it scares me to say, I think most Australians would share their view.

To my knowledge, a tiny fraction of serving nurses have been killed but none while actually working on the battlefield. Most of the seventy-eight who died in World War One died as a result of illness or accidents.

I admire any person male or female who is willing to go to a war zone and care for soldiers in what would have often been horrendous conditions. I am not for one moment belittling or denigrating our nurses and medics, I am demanding some perspective and balance.

If we are going to move the focus away from the men who did all of the bleeding and dying why not honour military chaplains who faced withering artillery fire and blazing guns to administer the last rites to any young man who was facing his last moments in the mud and blood of the battlefield.? Perhaps they'll get a mention next year. But Christianity is seen to be as toxic as masculinity in these current times, so this is not likely to happen.

People may wonder at my obsession with the way in which women now share centre stage with men on ANZAC Day. I will not apologise. It is a truly deliberate attempt to swing the spotlight onto women on a day which once, long ago was one of the very few times our society gave men and men alone some recognition and thanks.

When you watch the military personnel in the crowd attending the traditional ANZAC Day football match, you would have seen a number of middle-aged women with medals adorning their khaki jackets. One woman I saw seemed in danger of toppling over such were the number of medals she wore.

She looked very much like an elderly librarian or junior school teacher. I would love to have heard her stories about the storming of enemy foxholes or the way she carried wounded mates on her back while under heavy fire from the enemy. Sadly, I will never get to hear any of the incredible war stories she has to tell.

Continuing for a moment longer with my military theme, if you ever want an example of double think then read this article. It proudly proclaims that women can be just as violent and aggressive as men. Fascinating. Hasn't this always been the way feminism operates?

Dare lay a finger on a female in your workplace or speak an angry word to a woman in parliament and they will be calling for the fainting couch. You will be reviled as something beneath contempt for daring to raise a hand or voice to the weaker sex.

Yet when a feminist argues for women being as capable as men when it comes to combat, they proudly state that they can be just as aggressive and violent as men, so just watch your step buddy!

Oh, the delicious mental gymnastics feminists perform on a daily basis without the slightest blush of the cheek.

ANZAC Day passed once more and my heart rate resumed its regular rhythm.

Let me introduce you to Australia's treasurer, Josh Frydenberg. Yet another politician in a line which stretches back many decades who demonstrates his utter contempt and disregard for his fellow man.

My son texted me a page from the newspaper he was reading. It was a breakdown of the latest Federal budget.

One whole column of spending initiatives came under the heading, Women.

There was no column for spending initiatives for men. There was in fact, not a single initiative which targeted men.

A very dedicated blogger who goes by the pseudonym Prawn of the Patriarchy wrote the following in response to the budget's release.

> Last night the Australian Treasurer, the Hon Josh Frydenberg MP presented his Budget speech 2021-22. Nothing has changed. Women were handed some substantial allocations, whilst men and boys essentially got nothing (in terms of dedicated gender-specific grants).
>
> Sure enough, in his lengthy speech Josh mentioned the word 'women' 17 times. He mentioned the word 'men' once. In condemnation.
>
> "On average women retire with less superannuation than men."
>
> According to various commentators the 2021 budget contained the following allocations for women & girls. Here are some excerpts:
>
> "As Morrison seeks to repair his image with women, there is a range of measures on women's safety, economic security, health and wellbeing totaling $3.4 billion.

> This includes $1.7 billion for changes to child care, $351.6 million for women's health, and $1.1 billion for women's safety.
> "We will help more women break into non-traditional trades, with training support for 5,000 places," he said
>
> There will be 2,700 places in Indigenous girls academies to help them finish school and enter the workforce.
>
> More STEM scholarships will be provided for women. Another 5,000 places are being made available in higher education short courses." (Source)
>
> Other related sources
>
> 2021 Women's Budget Statement 2021-labor-womens-budget-statement.pdf (alp.org.au)
> Budget 2021: Women's safety measures beefed up by $1.1b (afr.com) (11 May 2021)

Note the one reference to men is a derogatory one. You see, he rightly says men receive more superannuation than women. But he says it in accusatory tones, as if men have somehow colluded to gain this financial advantage over the women in their lives. It is, Mr. Frydenberg believes, another example of the inequality women must endure and the government must address this inequity.

Men receive more super for one simple reason-they work many more years than women do. Regardless of the reasons for this fact, it is no less than men deserve for their years of labour. If women choose to have babies or would rather work part-time for a healthy work/life balance then jolly good for them. Yet now we have all kinds of ideas being suggested so we can redress this imbalance.

One of the key reasons women are demanding more super is the fact that they live longer than men and therefore have to rely on finances that will help them to go the distance with comfort and security.

How dare men die years earlier than women. Typical!

Once again, what was the response to this blatantly bigoted governmental policy? There were many observations, both positive and negative with regards to the likelihood of the budget improving the economy but not one word was written or spoken about the billions devoted to women's needs and the fat sum of zero dollars to any initiatives specifically designed to improve the lives of men.

Mr. Morrrison and Mr. Frydenberg could not consider spending money on further investigations into the factors leading men to commit suicide at over three times the rate of women?

No money spent in an effort to halt the alarming slide in male enrolment in our tertiary institutions and perhaps provide incentives to young boys who are turning away from further education when they leave secondary school.

No money directed toward providing shelter and support for male victims of family violence? These men exist. They are not a fanciful invention created by fringe dwelling MRA's.

No money devoted to extra places for indigenous boys' academies?

No five thousand extra training places for men wanting to start working in non- traditional professions?

No money for scholarships for boys wanting to pursue a career in STEM?

This is a disgrace.

How do women can look at that budget and not cringe is truly beyond me. Yet you know the biggest complaints about this latest spending spree on our women and girls will come from feminists who will demand far more and use the same threat they have used to get their way with men since Adam was a boy.

More women and their children will die if you don't give us billions more.

Isn't it astonishing given the alarming rate of mothers killing their kids in recent years that we still see our government dutifully linking the words women and their children? Their fucking children?

A dear friend of mine told me some time ago that my use of expletives beginning with f drew attention away from the substance of my arguments but I find it a particularly appropriate word to use in such circumstances. What other word could possibly help to convey my bewilderment and shock at the way in which our institutions work hand in glove promoting the same lies and distortions?

Are they not the father's children too?

And the linking is done to infer that women and their children are all victims of the one big bad bogey man- dad.

Imagine the screeches if the line men and their children appeared on government documentation?

Only a few days after digesting this bigoted budget a large envelope arrived in our letter box. It was all about the latest Red Shield Appeal which raises funds for the homeless.

This image was on the front page and there were more on the following two pages. The whole letter was devoted to women's stories of fleeing a violent husband.

Again, the majority of all people living rough on the streets are men. Men are also on the streets as a result of violence in their home or due to the fact they have endured an abusive life beginning in childhood. But stories about men, even young ones, don't generate the empathy and pull on the heartstrings which loosen the purse strings. So once again, it's all about the women.

Just like ANZAC Day, the girls take centre stage despite the fact they are a minority group when it comes to who the real victims are.

The Salvation Army does good work for homeless men, but that is not the issue. There is far more funding devoted to meeting homeless women's needs and the fact that they resort to the "scared women clutching the even more frightened child to her bosom" cliché is a disgrace. Shame on us if the image of a bloke who is down and out, perhaps sleeping on the footpath (most "homeless women have accommodation) isn't considered shocking enough to draw a response and bring in the big bucks they are chasing.

It is another indictment on our society.

The final straw was a more personal one. I was having a lovely meal at a gathering of my siblings and partners. I asked one of my family members how her daughter was coping as a teacher. Being a former chalkie, I was keen to hear about her progress.

"Oh she's had enough of the full time teaching. She thinks she might just do casual relief work." I smiled, nodded and continued to eat. Inwardly I was exploding.

The girl in question is someone I love, but I was so shocked once again by the sheer sense of entitlement so many females possess in our western culture.

She is not pregnant. She is able bodied and healthy. She is simply tired of the "politics in the staffroom". Wow. Her husband is a house painter. I wondered quietly (and on my way home in the car with Maggie) how things would have gone down had her husband announced that he was stepping out of his fulltime work to pursue a less physically taxing two to three day working week.

The fact that so many women do this without demonstrating the slightest sense of awareness with regard to their privilege is stunning. This privilege is all due to the simple fact that they possess a vagina.

I have never seen a hint of gratitude from most women for the self-sacrifice of their partner who silently and without ever being acknowledged or thanked for it goes about his daily work for forty to fifty years while being told he is a privileged male who has never faced true oppression and hardship like the women in his life do.

She is not the first in my extended family to take the "I've had enough" option very early in their career and I am sure she will not be the last.

This issue is in fact one I think we need to focus upon more. Most men shrug their shoulders and accept this 'right' females believe they possess and simply soldier on. Perhaps if a few more blokes stopped and asked their partner why she believes she can simply step out of the workforce on a whim this phenomenon might at least be less common.

But therein lies the problem. Most men have been brought up to believe in all of the old gender constructs feminists claim they have eliminated. The man provides for his wife and kids. Fair enough-if the wife is pregnant or raising the kids at home. But this is not how it works. Women with no children are choosing the parttime option or no work at all and husbands continue to accept it as a woman's prerogative.

Then of course there are the new advertising campaigns for the army and CIA in America which promote girl power and the smashing of gender social constructs which restrict girls and prevent them from reaching their full potential. Watch one. You won't believe they are real, but sadly, they are.

David Vincent, please give me the strength and persistence you displayed as you fought to expose the aliens amongst us, despite the overwhelming odds and days of desperate despair. Like you, I have to believe one day, we shall open the eyes of our brothers and sisters to the poisonous pull of gynocentrism.

A response to Jennifer Duke on superannuation

May 21, 2021 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Australia runs a nearly universal superannuation system in which virtually all employees are paid an additional 9.5% over their wage or salary. This money locally called super is put away for retirement with few avenues to access the money before then. This enforced savings has made Australians among the wealthiest people in the world.

Some people though, still aren't happy. Jennifer Duke has penned a piece in the Sydney Morning Herald discussing how much extra superannuation men have over women. This is a topic we often see mentioned by Australia's misandric mainstream media, alongside so-called gender wage gap. They claim that 39% of this gender wage gap is a result of discrimination but last year I demonstrated that was a lie.

To see the misandry in full view we need only look at the way Cassie Jaye was treated when we brought her out to Australia for ICMI17. The male host in this video is none other than Andrew O'Keefe. O'Keefe is currently facing charges in relation to an alleged domestic violence incident. The newspaper The Australian has noted:

> Ex-Channel 7 star Andrew O'Keefe's lawyer has indicated the sacked game show host will plead guilty to allegations he assaulted his partner if the charge is not dismissed under mental health.

In any case, Jennifer Duke starts off strong in her article:

> Data showing men's retirement balances are almost twice the size of women's in some electorates has given ammunition to groups pushing for super contributions to be paid on parental leave.

And by strong I mean weak. What she says may be true but it's not the whole story. What if we were to look at superannuation balances 10 or 15 years after retirement? If we did that we'd find many of these women had inherited the superannuation funds of their male spouses and were just fine.

Yes, some women didn't settle down with a man. Others did settle down with a man and then took him to the cleaners. In the end each of us is responsible for our own financial future. If a woman is going it alone then it is incumbent on her to take steps to secure her own financial future.

Duke's article discussed various federal government divisions in Australia comparing the relative superannuation men have over women. She noted certain divisions have little variation:

> "The smallest gap in the state was in Chisholm, at 5 per cent, followed by Scullin at 9 per cent."

Notably, both are working-class areas full of two-income families. Not a great surprise that the gap would be small then.

> Gaps above 33 per cent were recorded in NSW's Macarthur, Cunningham, Parkes, Dobell, Macquarie, Mackellar, Hume and Bradfield.

And these are wealthier and rural areas. Could it be that in wealthier and rural areas we're more likely to see one-income families? This would of course result in a superannuation gap.

> Overall, the gender gap between men and women's median balances is 22 per cent in NSW and 23 per cent in Victoria, which Industry Super says translates to tens of thousands of dollars by retirement.

That much is true, I'm sure. And how do we fix it? Empty platitudes and pointlessly complicating of an already complicated system of course!

> "Treasury's Retirement Income Review, released in November, shows paying a median female earner super during an average period of employer-paid parental leave boosts her balance by 0.8 per cent by retirement. This equates to 0.14 per cent more income. Paying super on top of government parental leave pay would provide a 0.17 per cent boost in retirement income at a cost to taxpayers of $200 million a year."

That's negligible.

> "Removing the $450-a-month threshold would also make a small change in terms of retirement income but help improve equity, it said."

The difference won't be small, it will be insignificant as we saw above.

The money will just come out of wages in the future and further stall wage growth.

Superannuation on parental leave won't help much either as parental leave is short.

Taking time out to be a mother is often blamed for women's superannuation woes but the truth is that the average woman in Australia is now having 1.74 children. How long is that really going to keep a woman out of the workforce? I'm being generous if I suggest five years, or perhaps 10. Mothers could have long and well-paid careers if they so chose. A typical Australian man might go into the workforce at age 20 and retire at 60. That's a 40-year working life. Even if we assume that women take 5-10 years out of full-time work to raise children they should still have plenty of time to accrue superannuation across a 30-35 year working life. If they make the right choices along the way, that is.

If we really want to understand why women retire with less superannuation we need to look at the choices people make. Choices going right back to high school point men and women (on average) in different directions. Choices include but are not limited to:

- What to study at highschool
- Whether to consider a trade or some other tertiary alternative to university
- If going to university, what degree(s) to get

- Whether to work full-time or part-time
- Whether to take a higher paying job or a more interesting job
- Whether to take a higher paying job or a job with a shorter commute

For each of these questions there is a clear gender divide in how people answer. These and many other choices lead to a clear gender divide in superannuation. It’s super obvious really.

21 Visions for A Feminist Future ’21 – Misandry in Practice

May 27, 2021 | by Chris "mad_cat" Votey | Link | Original Link

I had the opportunity to attend 21 Visions for a Feminist Future ’21 (21 for 21) conference on May 18th and took a recording of it. Now understand that this article is not a hit piece, and I am not trying to demonize Feminists from having a conference. If anything, I promote their right to do it, as we in the Men’s Movement should have the same right. Of course, if you ask Feminists about ICMI, they will quickly demonize us.

Overall, I will say that the conference was fairly poor. The way it was organized and presented, and not even talking about the presenters themselves, but in how they lined it all up. It is supposed to be 21 Visions, but they had 26 presentations (and snuck a few more in with other presentations) and 3 musical breaks. This was a conference about the future of Feminism, and all it really accomplished was what women hope happens in the future without any guidance on what needs to be done to achieve it. Personally, I don’t feel they accomplished their goal of spelling out the future of Feminism. This conference was more complaining about how things are now or set an unrealistic expectation for the future.

As far as the presenters themselves, it was underwhelming. Now yes, I am biased, but if you get between 5 – 10 minutes to talk on a platform, you should really use that time to try to make a difference. Yet, it felt that people just wanted to speak and not really get into the depths of why things are the way they are or the full context of their thoughts and ideas. And not just that I disagree with their points, but it was more “X is true because I say it is”. Accept their claim and not question anything.

You might be asking: Why is this important? To make positive change for men and women in this world, we need to know where the Feminist mindset is at, and in knowing that, we can circumvent them to effect positive change. Feminism holds power and greatly influences policymakers, but if this conference is any indication, then the movement is on its way out.

You can watch the video on Youtube, but it is 150 minutes long, so below is a list of the speakers and what they talked about.

For each speaker, I mention the Misandrist Moment (some lacked this so I left it out). I understand this is a conference by women for women, but this is the same movement that claims to not hate men. Yet, they do a lot to show their contempt for men and their idealized future seems to have no place for men whatsoever. I note (direct or indirect) where they show much of their true colors for males.

I also include attendee chats that stand out for each speaker. Not every speaker got a chat response to, which is a bit sad for them. For what is an inclusive movement, it seems some are more worthy of attention than others.

TL;DR – The problem with this conference is almost everything is about race. Some presenters discuss sexuality and gender, but they bring race into it any chance they can. Many speakers talk about issues that affect both men and women, but they make it a gendered issue. The few times males are brought into the conversation, it is either to blame them for all problems (especially white males) or they need to do more for women.

THE CONFERENCE

Starting off, we get an introduction video reading quotes and suggesting we shake up society. Fairly good video, excellent graphics, and decent music. Though this is probably the best part of the entire conference, and it goes downhill from here.

Chat: Femininity Flows.

We start off with the host telling us about women's recent achievements, from staging protests to getting people to vote and helping other organizations protest. I mean, if that is what you list as an achievement, I would say aim higher than that.

Speaker 1

Hafsat Abiola
President of Women in Africa Initiative
First, I will say she mentioned her father being arrested for his politics and her mother assassinated. Both are very tragic. Despite her upbringing, her key focus is only on women. "COVID showed the world what women can do" is the first real thing she said. Basically, women are doing more to change the lives of the world. She states that she had to develop the skills to be an activist independently; she didn't have anyone to help her.

MISANDRY MOMENT

She states that the world sees men as having potential (even if they lack any necessary skills), and the world gives them an opportunity. However, women must demand to be given a chance. "That instead of thinking we (women) must be perfect to do the role, that we can become perfect as we do the role."

Conclusions

Her basic message is that women have to work harder to do the same as men. I don't know how things are in Africa, but you try to do anything in the other major countries, and you are demonized for being a man and rewarded for being a woman, and doubly so if you're trans. She comments that she had to stand up as a woman to voice her opinion, even though she'd mentioned her father being arrested for standing up. She didn't face jail time, so which one is more privileged? And in all honesty, no one told me how to be an activist, and I went from 10 views per YT video to now organizing ICMI. This isn't a gendered problem, and no one handed me the keys because of my penis.

Chat: Progress not perfection.

Speaker 2

Yume Morimoto
They have segments between speakers who say quick things. Not sure if they're part of the 21 visions, but I include them in. Yume talks about the binary thinking of gender in Japan. Basically, non-binary are oppressed in Japan.

No chat response.

Speaker 3

Reshma Saujani
Founder of Girls Who Code and Marshall Plan for Moms
& Dr. Silvia Federici
This is about paying mothers for their unpaid labor of raising their children during the pandemic in which women had to give up their careers since children weren't in schools. Their basic point is that to share domestic housework, you must transform the workplace to accommodate women who work or take maternity leave. Should a woman have domestic duties, the government should pay her. To those who argue that motherhood is a choice, according to Dr. Federici, it's blackmail.

MISANDRY MOMENT

They keep pushing that women who raise children do so for free but don't acknowledge any contribution men make at home; instead that they do nothing. Furthermore, while they recognize that domestic chores are not biology, they don't discuss stay-at-home Fathers and whether they should get paid.

Conclusion

It appears Feminists are divided on this, that many "traditional" Feminists want to focus solely on the workforce. The idea of getting paid for being a mother might sound good on paper (to idiots), but the logistics don't seem to come into play of where this money is coming from. Look at the challenge of giving American's $2000 during the pandemic and the challenge that created, how do you think this can be done at all, much less what do you propose to be cut from government spending to pay women a competitive wage to stay home?

I fear if such a thing were done, like the Welfare system, women would have children just so they could get paid more from the state and the quality of life for children would decrease. The Feminist solution here would be to give more money to mothers.

Chat: Homework & Children. No less than, & 75,000.00 per year.
Chat: 100% of these issues were pre-existing. COVID exposed what was already there.

Speaker 4

Andreaea Lavant
President and Chief Inclusion Officer of Lavant Consulting
This is about disabilities and how the world doesn't recognize the needs of disabled people. I (article author) am a disabled person, and I have had many challenges along the way; however, I wouldn't say this is a gendered issue. Her Feminist future sees a genuinely inclusive society of people being their most authentic selves without fear of negative consequences or repercussions. "It means having confidence that our opinions will be valued, that our ideas will be implemented, and that our needs will be met." Apparently, 1 in 4 American's identify as disabled. I am disabled but don't identify as it.

MISANDRY MOMENT

She wants her opinions to be valued solely on the basis that she's a black woman who is disabled, and that's her Feminist future. Of course, her vision of a truly inclusive society sounds nice until you get to the fine print that if you choose to identify as a male, none of this applies to you. Or at least, if you identify as a male, you must do so as they see fit, which takes away from a "truly" inclusive society.

Conclusion

What if you have a terrible idea… should that be implemented? What if people have conflicting ideas… should we do both? Her estimation of what a future society is incredibly stupid and simplistic. It could never work. It's the idea that the more oppression points you have, the more correct you are. It doesn't matter what an idea is, it just matters who said it.
Chat: Preach my friend. Why did it take shoots and killings for folks to wake up? Why???

Speaker 5

Delanna Studi

Talks about Cherokee being Matriarchal and women were always sacred (not noticing that today women are still sacred). She talks about how the British met with her people, and they noted that the British didn't bring their women and that the Cherokee couldn't trust them as "they only thought with half their brains".

Her future is where Feminists think with all their brains. She quotes: "A nation is not conquered until the hearts of its women are on the ground, no matter how brave its warriors or strong its weapons." Only women have a full brain and men are expendable.

Chat: It took too long for this to be properly addressed. I'm just glad it is being now.

Speaker 6

Joy Buolamwini
Poet of Code and Founder of Algorithmic Justice League
One of her main goals is to create a just and equitable artificial intelligence. She also wants to fight the "coded gaze". Much like the male gaze, those with code gaze can shape technologies and societies. Programmers are highly biased, which they place into AI coding such as facial recognition that Joy proclaims is racist as it has difficulty distinguishing a black female as male or female. Essentially, AI is racist and sexist. She then proceeds to recite a poem about the problem of AI.

MISANDRY MOMENT

She does mention how one black man was mistaken for another due to facial recognition and got arrested. Beyond that, she goes through a list of famous black women that facial recognition misidentifies as male.

Conclusion

We hear from Feminists that there is no difference between men and women, that gender is just a social construct. This holds true for Feminists until women are mistaken for men, and thus there is now sexism. Can't have it both ways. This also goes into the trans issue as a man becomes a woman; we're required to automatically associate her face as a woman even though it was initially a male. How long will it be before these companies are sued for misidentifying a woman as a man because they are trans? Rather than acknowledging that the technology is not yet in place for this to be effective and things need to improve. Instead, Joy presumes the problem is white programmers who are racist.

Rumaitha Al Busaidi
Founder of WOMEX
Climate change activist who views it through a gendered lens. Starts off about the abuse of oceans and how powerful governments tend to ignore their importance and are not aware of the dangers they're causing. How conservationists focus on land vs. sea is similar in the gender conversation of men vs. women. She states that men and women are not affected by climate change in the same way, as women have it worse as they represent the largest percentage of those in poverty.

MISANDRY MOMENT

While she mentions more women are impoverished than men, she doesn't go into the homeless issue that affects men more than women. Additionally, US women who receive alimony/child support don't have those payments reflected on their annual income and can be considered impoverish while also getting money from an ex-spouse. She also states, "Climate change is a man-made problem with a Feminist solution." How many hairspray canisters did women use in the name of female empowerment?

Conclusion

Her point is basically this, women are more likely to be poor, poor people have trouble with climate; thus, women are more affected by climate change than men. There are many flaws in her argument, and she doesn't take any other consideration, at least not in this speech. This is another attempt to say that women are the victims of everything, and men are the cause of all the problems, or Men Bad; Women Good.

Eileen Huang
Political Educator Founder, WeChat Project
Talks about the violence against Asians and that the issue is racialized and gendered. She also takes issue with Asians being fetishized.

MISANDRY MOMENT

Identifying Asian Hate as a gendered issue is basically saying that Male Asians don't matter.

Conclusion

It is funny how so many discuss Asian Hate in the last few months but forget it was Feminists a year ago who were bashing Asians as having White Privilege. Or how much of the Asian Hate comes from Blacks, such as the Black Male who beat up an old Asian Woman. Or how universities discriminated against Asians in favor of Affirmative Action for Blacks. Yet now, the conversation is how the world hates Asians and Feminism is the solution. Moreover, black males and Latinas are quite often fetishized, but we don't hear anything about Feminism helping with that.

Hillary Clinton

Apparently, 1-in-4 Asians in America have experienced some form of hate. Twice as many women as men. This group insinuates that race and gender are pretty much one in the same. For any minority woman, anything terrible happens to her; it is both racism and sexism. They also want Asian-American history in school and train teachers and government leaders on how to teach it.

MISANDRY MOMENT

Of course, tying race and gender together leave men out of the conversation, especially Asian men.

Conclusion

Why have Hillary talk about this? She's not Asian. Isn't this whitewashing their struggle? Again, this is another race issue for the future of Feminism. I'm all for the inclusion of history being taught, but people forget that a school year is finite, and there is only such much that can be taught. Yet, these groups demand their history take precedence.

Basically, she states that women must become more impatient for there to be change in this world. Then tells a story about a woman who channeled her anger and impatience into change.

Conclusion

Paul Elam has made similar assessments that the best way to get noticed is to piss people off. Yet, he gets criticized for saying this, but this woman says it is necessary and is celebrated. Ironically, she discusses a country with actual Patriarchy, which is always left out of the conversation about dismantling the Patriarchy. She was careful not to use the word Patriarchy, which seems that she is protecting the men of her country while also chastising them.

Shantell Martin
Artist
This is an interesting talk about being a proud dyslexic (???) and the problem of font. Apparently, the most common fonts make it harder for those with dyslexia to read. She states that Comic Sans is easier for her to read, and thus she has created her own font called Shantell Sans, and it is open source. She says that she wants the future of art to have 3 things: Accountability, Transparency, and Responsibility. She indirectly suggests that art should be free for everyone to enjoy, so she released her font as open source.

MISANDRY MOMENT

She showed a series of pictures of people, but it was 99% female, only one black male I saw.

Conclusion

What does the future of art have to do with Feminism? Seems like she's presenting a solution to people with dyslexia and yet channels it with a Feminist lens. In fact, if she's right, she could start her own book printing company to release books in her unique font to help those with dyslexia be able to read. That's a billion-dollar idea; someone please use this idea. If it helps people, why not?

Maryangel Garcia Ramos Guadiana
Founder Mexicans Con Discapacidad
The future of Feminism is to remember that some Feminists are disabled. She feels that women with disabilities are the most discriminated group, and even Feminists leave them out of the conversation. She states that disabled women receive 10% more violence than abled-bodied women.

MISANDRY MOMENT

Only wants women with disabilities to be included in the future, no concern of males who are also disabled.

Conclusion

It sounds like her anger should be directed at Feminists for leaving disabled Feminists out of the conversation. However, she's not angry with them, instead just asking them to think about those with disabilities.

Roxane Gay
Writer

Her future is where “women don’t have to spend so much emotional energy on the realities of negotiating a misogynistic world”. She then ties this into being black and how black women are more oppressed, and the future would mean that they aren’t oppressed. According to her, black women are meant to save the world. She also doesn’t have a concept of a Feminist future, but maybe she would write a cookbook.

Conclusion

She basically says that women have gotten everything they felt they needed for equality and still complains. Honestly, I feel like she said nothing, that she just complained about a bunch of stuff and said the future wouldn’t have what she complained about. In a way, it’s like she’s saying that in a Feminist future, there wouldn’t be a need for Feminism, that life would be freed up for women to do other things.

Brittany Packnett Cunningham
(Host of Undistracted, MSNBC Contributor)
Travon Free
(Writer, Director, and Comedian)
Brittany starts off by saying that for gender equity, everyone needs to be on board, which includes men (the first nice thing said about men). “Feminism is not just about how we raise girls, but how we redefine masculinity.” Redefining masculinity will allow men to be free, apparently. And no one is free until everyone is free.

Travon’s movie is about a black man in a groundhog’s day type movie who keeps getting killed by a white cop. Travon’s motive for this movie is that Blacks are being gaslighted by white society, that Black people could have done something different and they wouldn’t get shot. He calls bullshit, stating that there is nothing Blacks can do to not get killed by police. His solution is to recognize that the system is broken but doesn’t have anything beyond that.

Travon identifies as Feminist, wanting to push for the equality of Females everywhere. He cites the difference between working in an all-male environment vs. an all-female environment, such as Full Frontal with Samantha Bee, and felt better with women. In a male space, you have to perform for other men, but you don’t have to perform in an all-female environment. He also mentions how some define equality for women as the hindrance of men, which he compares to giving to blacks as a hindrance to whites. He believes it is possible to give to women and not hinder men or give to blacks and not hinder whites.

He states that to change the world is to throw out the script that boys are required to follow. Your son comes to you in tears, and you don't tell him to wipe away the tears. "Masculinity is not tied to your strength; it is a poison in the well."

Of course, the conversation goes into sexuality. He discusses how he can debunk what straightness is with his bisexuality.

Then they talk about the difference between White Masculinity vs. Black Masculinity, suggesting that Black Masculinity originates from the slave culture of their ancestors. Blacks cannot appear weak in front of Whites, according to him.

MISANDRY MOMENT

This whole presentation is just about misandry, about attacking males for not conforming to how Feminism dictates. He talks about how men are told not to cry and to man up. He fails to mention that women tell men not to show their emotions instead of instigating that toxic masculinity is destroying boys.

Conclusion

Basically, there won't be a Feminist future until boys and men act like women. This was nothing but an attack on males, suggesting they are free to choose, but in truth, they are free so long as they choose what Feminism wants. Travon says for young men to do what is true for them, to follow what they feel inside, which he suggests that males' truth is to not act like males of the past but the way he acts now.

Ilana Glazer
Creator
For her, success is someone else's failure, and that the goal shouldn't be to succeed as that means other people must lose. And the American Dream of succeeding is just that, a dream meant for those living in poverty that they "might" succeed. She doesn't want to wish anyone success.

She then pivots the conversation to failure. She encourages people to live in failure, live in a place being denied possession, find themselves in a dark place, and learn to be content there. She hopes that women are never victims and have no power over anyone. Should you fail and be in pain and find yourself in darkness, you remember that darkness is your country, your home, your existence.

MISANDRY MOMENT

She claims that this dark place of failure is foreign to women, as women are aliens to the male-dominated society that demands how women should live. She'd rather women live in a place of failure outside the realm of men's need to succeed. Men and women need to be separated for the Feminist Future, i.e., Feminist Utopia.

Conclusion

She is insane. She paints that the need to succeed is a male trait, and yet women are just as competitive as men, if not more so. She's trying to indicate that failure is a place where women can be free, that the task of trying to succeed is bad for society. Out of every speech here, this is the most damaging of all that women shouldn't try. Instead, women should give up and embrace nihilism.

Meena Harris
Lawyer, Founder of Phenomenal
She lists 10 things for the Mother/Daughter Manifesto:

1. Teach your children about activism from an early age
2. Reframe the language and barriers around female leadership
3. Stop using plastic straws
4. Bring men into the conversation
5. Let's talk about Maternity Leave
6. Equal access to maternity care
7. More children's books that feature people of color
8. Reframe the conversation about women's work
9. Celebrate difference
10. Be an Activist

MISANDRIST MOMENT

#4 is about men, but only for men to do what they can to elevate women—no need for men and boys to be elevated whatsoever.

Conclusion

1. Basically, brag to your children about what you do and guilt them to be activists themselves.

2. Language police yourself around your children. When children are bad, you put a positive spin on it, so she's not discouraged later. She also complains that her children can be noisy when she wants to sleep, so it's OK for her to ask her children to be quiet. If anyone else does (i.e., a man), it might prevent a girl from being a leader someday. If a girl is dismayed at someone being negative to them, even for legitimate reasons, then she'll never be a true leader.
3. She's virtue signaling within her virtue signaling. This has nothing to do with anything yet includes it in, not unlike the New Green Deal.
4. See Misandrist Moment.
5. Maternity leave in the US is company-specific, not a government mandate. No mention that men should also get paternity leave.
6. Apparently, women of color don't receive access to health care.
7. Much like straws, this has nothing to do with Mother/Daughters so much as that Feminism is more about race than gender. She states that having people of color books will teach empathy, that I guess white people lack empathy.
8. Apparently, Mrs. Claus is a CEO. Men cannot have achievement unless women have greater achievement, or men have none and women have it all.
9. Unless you're a man and don't beholden yourself to Feminist indoctrination. I agree with her to help people see their own value and beauty.
10. She wants everyone to speak out for women everywhere, whether they want to or not.

In all honesty, if she called this a Feminist Manifesto, it would make more sense, but listing this for Mothers and Daughters, most of this has nothing to do with that dynamic but rather a declaration of how people as a whole conduct themselves.

Sage Dolan-Sandrino
Artist, Public Speaker
She wants to live in a world where when she feels 100% confident she'll return home each day. Transkids live in fear every day that they may not survive today due to all the hate they receive.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

Indirectly, she implies that only Transkids live in this fear. Everyone does, especially men who are more likely to be assaulted than any other group. We live in more fear that something terrible can happen to us, but the Future of Feminism should only be concerned with trans kids.

Conclusion

This is a short video, but it's absurd on the basis that everyone experiences fear, but somehow trans people need more than anyone else without consideration for how anyone else lives in fear. Hell, this disregards women who live in fear.

Tragically, she suffered an amputation early in life after a car hit her and she had to learn to walk on a prosthetic leg. This is about immigration, or rather illegal immigration (though she makes it sound quite noble). She seeks to claim America as an illegal alien, that American should accept her even though her being here was done through an unlawful means. She argues that citizenship is mandated by whiteness and is oppressive towards non-whites. That non-whites haven't been properly recognized in the US (I guess she doesn't know we had a Black President).

Conclusion

I am all for immigration, so long as it is done correctly. Trying to get into America illegally is bad. It simply is. If it were good, it wouldn't be called illegal immigration. Yet, she wants to proclaim it as a really good thing.

Speaker 19

Phill Picardi
Host of Unholier Than Thou
Second male speaker, wanting to reclaim religion to help build a Feminist future. Religion is a vehicle of the Patriarchy. As a gay male who grew up Catholic, he despised religion but is now going to divinity school to "learn" the proper way to practice Catholicism. Feminism taught him how to be a better man and taught him about his soul. He then has a series of other people to help prove his point. I won't identify each individual, but the basic idea that Patriarchy is a new concept and that to look properly at ancient texts, you must do so through a Feminist lens.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

He states that religion was pure before men ruined it. It was men's involvement in religion that made it into a bad thing, that religion was initially Feminist.

Conclusion

I'm an Atheist, and I have my issues with religion, but they're discussing the change of religion to facilitate their politics, that they want to have their cake and eat it too. They change things to how they want so there are no contradictions in their mind, but if you can just change whatever you want for a political gain, then where is the line that says if you cross it, you've gone too far? This is no different than the Female Ghostbusters or Female Thor, and the same argument I have I'll use here, if you're not happy with how things are, then create your own thing rather than changing established concepts.

She wishes to end the incarceration of women and girls. She became a defense attorney for women but committed wire fraud and chose to hide it. She got sentenced (no indication if she turned herself in or not) and served 2 years. She now works to free women from prison through Feminism.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

Her concern for prison reform is only for women and not prison reform for all.

Conclusion

I could almost agree with this woman if not for the fact that she has made this a gendered issue, and her only concern is for women. I want to see prison reform in this country and for the system to be built on alternate solutions for rehabilitation rather than the industrial prison complex making money on the number of people incarcerated. However, she's only concerned for women. She would rather no woman serve in prison, even though men constitute more than 80% of those incarcerated.

Chat: Yes!!! End incarceration!!!!!!

Speaker 22

Sabah Khodir
Writer and Activist

She states that women in Egypt are faced with rape, FGM, child marriages, honor killings, and domestic violence. Her vision for the Feminist future is women can one day sit down and talk about anything other than Feminism and no longer live in fear.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

She acts like only women live with this fear. In the US, boys are raped, and few recognize that women can do that. They also suffer MGM. And men have more fear of violence than women, but that's never discussed despite the statistics that confirm that. Her vision is just for women, not for men.

Conclusion

Another case of Feminist Utopia where nothing bad will ever happen to women. Many places in the middle east are pretty bad for men and women alike, but the problem is that mainstream Feminism takes a blind eye to and focuses on things like men spreading their legs or air conditioning. If anything, she should be angrier at Feminism for their lack of concern in her region of the world.

Paola is interviewing Francia Marquez, who is running for President of Columbia. This is entirely in Spanish. She is apparently a freedom fighter who is against the poor conditions of her country.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

She is more concerned for women than men, even though she says large portions of her country are affected by the lack of development.

Conclusion

I know nothing of Columbia and have no idea if her perception is accurate or that of a Feminist bias. However, as her concerns are just for women, I call to question what kind of leader she can be. If things are as bad as she claims, then focusing on half of her constituents won't solve any problem; it just makes things worse. A leader has to be for all the people, and she has expressed herself as only being for women.

Speaker 24

Alexis McGill Johnson
President and CEO of Planned Parenthood

She justifies Margaret Sanger as a racist and downplays that she created Planned Parenthood to control the black population. She cites that at the time, it was normal to have views of blacks in this way, and this shouldn't detract from the work today. She then spends the rest of the time saying that American is going towards anti-abortion and the future is the means to keep it.

MISANDRIST MOMENT

Focused on women's reproductive rights but of course that we don't need to be focused on men's whatsoever.

Conclusion

She is technically correct but is also a contradiction of Feminism. I agree that we cannot hold people to today's moral standards from yesteryear, as most people throughout history would fail. But Feminism and SJWs have continuously held people in contempt for the things they did at a time when it wasn't a big deal. This is a means to justify what the founder did and say, "Just forget about it and move on."

A Tale of Ball-Breaking And Blisters

May 28, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

We live under a two-tiered justice system every bit as evil and bigoted as apartheid or the era of Jim Crow laws.

In some sense it is more insidious than either of those two criminal systems. The overt, blatant nature of the discrimination in South Africa and America ensured that people of conscience would respond to the horrific injustices being perpetrated upon black people and a back lash, a day of reckoning was almost a certainty.

People marched in their tens of thousands in America, demanding an end to the racial violence and segregation which had existed in America for so long and especially in the southern states.

South Africa was condemned by nations around the world. Boycotts and sanctions were imposed in an effort to pressure the South African government to change their apartheid system. Sporting teams refused to play games in South Africa and any athlete or sportsman/team who chose to go there was condemned and treated as a pariah and supporter of that system.

The protests, marches and boycotts were successful and both of these manifestly unjust systems were dismantled.

No such actions will be taken by anyone with regard to another system of two-tiered justice.

Men are inarguably treated as second class citizens by our legal system. They are the demographic who is imprisoned at a much higher rate than women for commission of the same crime. When both men and women are incarcerated, studies have found men receive a 63% longer prison term than their female counterparts. Again, this is after comparing cases and making sure they are like for like and the prisoner has a similar history of offenses.

When this study was first published, I don't believe it caused a ripple of outrage within the judicial system, our governments or the media. Most people would be entirely ignorant about this shocking sentencing and imprisonment gap.

Yet even though we now know how disadvantaged men are, there have been endless cries, particularly in Great Britain to demolish women's prisons and find other ways to penalize them when they commit a crime. Women should not be forced to spend a day in prison they argue-that's something we should reserve for men.

You would think I am simply pulling these ideas out of my backside but sadly it is all well documented and very public. The fact that this idea is even discussed and debated on television and radio and raised by politicians is horrific enough, but don't be surprised if very soon, a government adopts this idea as a new policy in order to protect our women from enduring something as appalling as a jail cell.

This morning two articles appeared in the morning newspaper, the Herald Sun. Both of them focused on the sentencing of two women, both found guilty of horrendous acts of violence.

The first thing to catch my eye was the humorous (nudge, nudge, wink wink) tone of the headlines above the articles.

One declared:

Ball Breaker: Drug Dealer Turns Violent

Get it? Hilarious. She crushed his testicles. Ballbreaker!

I think Titcrusher or Melon Mauler would be another cute eyecatcher the next time some bloke gropes and squeezes the breasts of a woman in a night club.

Another clever headline related to a wife pouring a pot of boiling water on her sleeping husband's head was:

Wife Faces Court After Marriage Boilover

What is it about the infliction of violence on men by women which invariably induces laughter and inspires headlines like the ones I have presented?

Let's examine the details of the Ballbreaker case and see how it all panned out when the time for sentencing arrived.

A Reservoir woman viciously attacked a man, squeezing his testicles and biting him, before she was caught with a large drug stash.

Shonte Mould 21 (below) was sentenced to a 12 month community corrections order before Heidelberg Magistrates' Court on Friday having pleaded guilty to charges including trafficking ice, GHB and Xanax, and assault.

Shonte has the exact look Paul Elam described on an episode of Regarding Men as a face which all men should take to be a warning sign that this woman is mentally unbalanced and dangerous. Note the botox pumped lips and meticulously shaped eyebrows. As well as being a violent, abusive creep and drug trafficker I would suggest narcissism would be another of her fine qualities.

Mould was at her mum's Korumburra home on February 25th 2020 when she got into an argument with a family friend-an older man-and began screaming at him.

The man stopped Mould punching him before she bit his forearm, breaking his skin, then grabbed hold of his testicles and squeezed hard.

When interviewed by police, Mould admitted "I have bitten him quite viciously and then grabbed hold of his testicles and squeezed hard."

The court heard Mould was found to be dealing drugs after police raided her Reservoir home on October 21, 2020.

Magistrate Meagan Keogh said she had considered jail time but gave Mould the community corrections order after Mould said she wanted to develop "More awareness about why I did those things."

Let me repeat that final sentence. The Magistrate decided against giving this violent thug and drug trafficker any jail time because: Mould said she wanted to develop,

"more awareness about why I did those things."

Surely a period of time in jail would have given Mould ample time to reflect on her sins. Is it not possible to become more aware of the reasons for your violent temperament while sitting alone in prison cell?

On the very same morning in the very same paper, the outcome of a second case was reported on.

Magistrate Meagan Keogh

A husband informed his wife of 28 years he wanted to separate. That same night he decided he would sleep in a separate bedroom. He said she could sleep in the master bedroom.

A woman who poured boiling water over her husband's face as he slept because he told her he wanted to leave the marriage has walked out of court after promising to be of good behaviour.

Maria Doris Axiak, 58, disconnected the landline and hid her husband's keys and phone to prevent him getting help after her revenge attack.

She was convicted in the County Court of Victoria of recklessly and intentionally causing serious injury in circumstances of gross violence and sentenced on Friday to a three-year community corrections order.

She spent 37 days in pre-sentence detention.

Maria Doris Axiak walked out of the County Court on Friday after being sentenced to a community corrections order.

Axiak hugged her lawyer Nola Karapanagiotidis after she learned she would not spend any more time behind bars.

She left the building flanked by supporters.

Can you imagine the response if a man who had hurled boiling water into the face of his wife for saying she wanted to separate, left court flanked by a throng of jubilant supporters?

On September 22, 2018, Axiak threw a pot of boiling water over her husband of 28 years as he slept.

It perforated his eardrum and burned his head, right arm, shoulder and torso.

The time line of the night's events was described as follows:

Axiak called her daughter crying hysterically.

Then she smoked a cigarette, disconnected the landline and put a pot of water to boil on the stove.

About 7.30pm she went into the spare room and poured the water over him while he slept.

"She then drove out of the house, taking the (victim's) mobile phone and car keys with her," a police summary of facts reads.

The victim had to go to a neighbour's house to call for help.

He was put into an induced coma in hospital and underwent skin grafts, with burns covering 12 per cent of his body.

Meanwhile, Axiak had arrived at her daughter's house, where the mother told her, "he deserves it".

"Out of 20 years of misery, I want him to look in the mirror every day …" she said.

"I took his keys and phone and I don't give a fk."

She later texted her daughter with 'thumbs up' and 'clapping hands' emojis and wrote, "I hope they keep him there (in hospital) for at least a month".

Axiak later told police she was sick of him "spoiling her weekends" and of his drinking.

"When he looks in the mirror he can see I've been hurt too," she said, telling police she wanted him to have blisters and bubbles on his skin.

She moved from Malta to Australia at age 18 with her first husband, with the "unhappy" marriage ending after 10 years.

The court heard she "felt abused and controlled" by her second husband, her victim.

Judge Claire Quin said Axiak had told the court both her parents were alcoholics and her mother was abusive.

Interesting. This violent dangerous woman was herself abused by a woman-her mother.

Judge Clair Quin

She has major depression, bipolar, and PTSD, having undergone treatments including electroconvulsive therapy and had multiple voluntary and involuntary hospital admissions for mental health, the court heard.

"I am satisfied on the balance of probabilities that your impaired mental functioning from PTSD is causally linked to the commission of the offence and that it substantially and materially reduces your culpability," Judge Quin said.

Axiak has no prior convictions and no history of alcohol or drug abuse, Judge Quin said.

I would like to ask the magistrate a question.

How can a person who is in a state of substantially impaired mental functioning manage to think her way through her plans to inflict unimaginable pain and scarring on her husband in such a clinical manner?

She put the pot onto the stove to boil the water, cut the landline, stole his mobile phone and car keys in order to prevent him from getting help. She waited until he was asleep before assaulting him.

This sounds to me like the careful, calculated forward thinking action of a hitman rather than an act of compulsion by a seriously intellectually impaired woman.

There is no helpline called the "Don't Be That Woman" helpline. Nothing to even imply that a woman could be inclined to harm her child or partner.

And this information comes at the end of an article detailing in vivid language the coldly calculated act of vicious, disfiguring violence carried out by a woman on a sleeping man.

The man was placed in an induced coma.

He had to endure skin grafts and terrible pain and disfigurement. You could not have clearer evidence of the fact that this was not an action carried out in the red mist of mindless passion.

Am I permitted to ask the judge what kind of violent assault may have resulted in this woman being jailed?

These cases are happening every week in our judicial system. Women are repeatedly given lenient sentences for acts of horrific violence which, if enacted by a man would be on the front page of our newspapers and the subject of endless editorializing on news programs and women's talk shows. We would see women and men expressing their outrage in the streets and outside the court.

But note too, that the woman who poured boiling water over her sleeping husband's face was flanked by supporters when she left the court.

This is a perfect example of the way women respond when a female is charged with a heinous crime. She is very quickly presented as the victim. Note the standard defense used by Maria Axiak?

She felt abused and controlled.

She didn't say I was abused and controlled and provide evidence to support her claim. She felt it.

May I ask why an abusive, controlling man would inform his victim that he wished to leave the relationship and then kindly offer her the master bedroom to sleep in while he retired to the spare room for the night? This is not the behaviour of a controlling, abusive husband.

Given the regularity of female violence perpetrated on both children and their male partners it is astonishing to think there are still politicians advocating that female prisons should become a draconian relic of our past. They believe we must find another way to deal with females who transgress because they are not deserving of the same consequences our men are expected to face.

Women's prisons are filled with people who should not be there: not just abuse survivors, but those with serious mental health and addiction issues who have never been able to get the help they need and have found their way into the prison system via repeated minor offences. More than three in five are serving sentences of less than six months. And the deepest injustice of all is the impact on children. We live in a society where mothers are still overwhelmingly the primary carers; women still represent the bulk of single parents. The vast majority of children get uprooted from their homes when their mother goes to prison: either taken into care, or sent to live with relatives.

Are there not prisons overflowing with men who have committed drug related and nonviolent crimes?

Are our men's prisons not filled with men who have serious mental health and addiction issues? Are there not countless men in prison who experienced sexual abuse as a youth?

Are men not the major provider of for their family?

Why the desperate examination of every second of a criminal woman's life in order to unearth the "real" reason for her aberrant behaviour while male criminals are considered nothing but evil, brutal, irredeemable scum. No amount of abuse or addiction can mitigate a man's wrongdoing.

Charities that work with female offenders have been left scratching their heads. I wonder if ministers, in their rush to see people as people, not protected characteristics, simply forgot that female offenders are so very different to their male counterparts.

Female offenders are so very different to their male counterparts.

So different.

Perhaps she means the women tend to hold the axe or knife in a different way to the average male killer. The burning, strangling, drowning and shooting carried out by women must also have a female style that separates it from the male methods used.

The arguments seem to be that we can't jail mums no matter what their crime may have been because they are the primary child carers. Yet the very same argument is used in a slightly different way to defend women who kill and abuse their children.

Talk about having all bases covered.

When you say: "Women are actually more likely to kill, abuse and neglect their children, an oft used response (and defense) is that women spend more time with children, so of course they are going to be more likely to bash, strangle, burn, drown and torture them. I mean, seriously, what do you expect?

And they actually believe this is a slam dunk, end of the discussion, winning argument.

But we are constantly told women are nurturers and innately more compassionate and caring than men. Every domestic violence ad features men and boys perpetrating all of the violence. So, which is it?

Women are inclined to kill and abuse children when exposed to them for too long.

or

Women are gentle, protective nurturers and the last line of defense for their children under threat from a toxic male?

We live in a world which reviles masculinity and punishes male indiscretions with great severity. That same society reveres women and gently admonishes them when they bash and kill.

Sadly, I don't believe we will ever see the day when tens of thousands of people march to voice their anger over a legal system which is corrupt and infested with a poisonous ideology, no less hateful than those we have witnessed in the past when a certain demographic was depicted as vermin and the cause of all of society's woes.

Our legal system operates under a simple premise.

Men, relationships and hate sex

May 29, 2021 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

*Revised from 2017. -eds.

Hate sex. Those two words appearing together come across as awkward, even oxymoronic, for who in their right mind hates sex? Its true that we might hate sex with the wrong person according to our criteria of what's hot, but very few people in this world hate sex altogether.

The phrase hate sex however isn't intended to suggest a person hates sex, but rather that they desire it with a person they are currently fighting with or alienated from.

Other variations on the phrase include rage sex, grudge sex, and angry sex, each offering slightly different meanings but often tied together in the act of having sex with someone you don't feel so good about.

Sex of this kind is widely believed to be more intense than normal sex, and for that reason "We love having make-up sex" is a common euphemism for angry grinding.

The begging question is why would a couple want to have sex if they are experiencing serious resentment or alienation?

One school of psychology provides some answers.

British Object Relations psychologists claim that if relationship bonds are constantly rendered insecure then the desire for sex is harnessed as a way to reinstate vanishing relationship security. When relationships become fragmented, weak or broken, we desire to be more in synch again, more loved, more on the same page. We want to reaffirm that our future together is secure, that we can still walk into the sunset hand in hand, worldview intact.

Instead of that security, we feel the relationship has become tenuous, hanging by a thread, on the verge of dissolving into….. the unknown. Insecurity and anxiety reign. In this scenario hate sex is utilized in the service of fixing weak intimate bonds, an instinctual attempt to repair those bonds through the complex release of hormones that ultimately serve to re-establish love and connection.

The theory that sex repairs a failing relationship bond was first proposed back in 1941 by psychologist Ronald Fairbairn, who announced a deviation from the traditional Freudian formula that humans are primarily pleasure-seekers. For Fairbairn we are first and foremost "object seekers" by which phrase he means seekers of other people to have relationships with:

> "Freud spoke of libidinal aims and defined these aims in terms of erotogenic zones – as oral aims, anal aims and so on. What he described however are not really aims but modes of dealing with objects; and the zones in question should properly be regarded, not as the dictators of aims, but as the servants of aims… The real libidinal aim is the establishment of satisfactory relationships with > objects; and it is, accordingly, the object that constitutes the true libidinal goal."[1]

Fairbairn's position is summarized, in the words of GoodTherapy.org, by stating that the primary motivational factors in one's life are based on human relationships, rather than sexual or aggressive triggers. Object relations is a variation of psychoanalytic theory which diverges from Freud's belief that we are pleasure seeking beings; instead it suggests that humans seek relationships.

The Object Relations theorists view hate-sex as a way to potentially relieve tension over failed or failing relationships, and also as a vehicle by which that relationship might be re-established. The theory is summarized perfectly by Fairbairn who says, "Explicit pleasure-seeking is thus not a means of achieving libidinal aims, but a means of mitigating the failure of these aims."

"Pleasure-seeking is not a means of achieving libidinal aims, but a means of mitigating failure of these aims."

Is it true that sexual pleasure is a way to mitigate and repair failing relationships? The urgency of hate-fucking as it arises on top of a fierce argument appears to support this hypothesis, and if we accept it we are faced with a revision to the goals of our pleasure-seeking culture – no longer is sex an act of pleasure alone but a psychobiological reflex intended to repair relationship damage and foster attachment.

That such damage is rife in modern relationships is undeniable. The misandry, misogyny, gynocentrism and the growth of cultural narcissism are enough to make any intimate bond unravel, including those of biological family. As mentioned in another article the toying with relationship bonds to extract compliance from a partner is a particular cause for weakness.

As cruel as it sounds, withholding affection, sex, approval and love have become part of women's repertoire employed to coerce men into compliance and servitude (eg. "If you don't earn more money, I'll stop loving you") – a coercion that men often acquiesce to in order to salvage what feels like an increasingly fragile relationship bond. Indeed, one of the core strategies of romantic love is to keep the relationship bond in the realm of tantalizing denial, a formula that emulates the techniques of animal behaviorism, but instead of the model being learned from Skinner or Pavlov, it is taught by grassroots dating culture; the message being to keep your man in a position of uncertainty. Aside from other relationship tensions, this approach to relationships is one that potentially elicits the insecure grudge fuck.

The obsession some men have with sex, porn, prostitutes, sexbots, sex toys etc. raises a question of whether the intensity is partly driven by frustrated opportunities for human attachment, with hate-sex themes arising from unconscious aims of mitigating relationship frustrations. Whatever the case, it's an open question as to why some men indulge in hate fucking and fantasizing about same. More broadly, we might ask why any securely-attached couple would bother nursing regular grudges and hate in the first place? The answer is, securely attached couples probably wouldn't!

Next time you hear someone talk about hate sex as if it were fun, just a little "make up" sex as they like to call it, consider how much fun is really involved in a big picture of that relationship. If hate sex is an attempt to repair relationships damaged by emotional manipulation, alienation and abuse — especially if happening on a regular basis — then it's about as far away from fun as you can possibly get.

The Scourge of Fatherlessness and the Death of God

May 29, 2021 | by David Solway | Link | Original Link

If God is dead, all things are permitted.

—Ivan Karamazov in The Brothers Karamazov

There is a father absence crisis in society, observes the National Fatherhood Initiative. "According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 18.3 million children, 1 in 4, live without a biological, step, or adoptive father in the home," it reports. This is generating a cascade of social ills: poverty, depression, drug abuse, social maladjustment, school dropout and criminal behaviour. An assessment by the academic journal PubMedCentral supports these findings, citing as well an effect on adult mental health. "The psychological harms of father absence experienced during childhood," the authors write, "persist throughout the life course." The study makes it clear that this is not only an American phenomenon. It is a societal curse across the national board and is especially notable in developed nations where, comparatively speaking, missed opportunities abound for personal growth and economic advancement.

Closeness to the father during childhood brings social and economic advantages, including better education and work opportunities as well as reduced risk of imprisonment and early pregnancy. (Source of all images: Shutterstock)

The Fatherhood Project has accumulated the essential data on the problem of fatherless households, relying on studies in Psychology Today and on the 2007 UNICEF report on the well-being of children in economically advantaged nations. Children in Canada, the U.S. and the UK, UNICEF finds, "rank extremely low in regard to social and emotional well-being." The data show that children who feel a closeness to their father are "twice as likely as those who do not to enter college or find stable employment after high school, 75% less likely to have a teen birth [and] 80% less likely to spend time in jail."

A number of reasons have been proposed to account for the current fatherhood crisis. In the U.S., mid-1960s President Lyndon Johnson's "War on Poverty" and the highly interventionist Economic Opportunity Act led to an explosion of out-of-wedlock households. “When the War on Poverty began in 1964,” observes The Sentinel-Record, “only 7 percent of children were born to unmarried women. Now, that figure is closer to 60 percent.”

While the social ills have not been as extreme in Canada – or at least not as apparent – federal and provincial government policies have created equally grotesque behavioural incentives and the overall trend, although slower than in the U.S., has been sadly in the same direction. As this C2C Journal story discussed, the majority of Canadians no longer consider marriage particularly important, with only 65 percent of Canadian couples being married and 28 percent of households headed by a single parent as of 2016. Other research, the article noted, has found that marital status – in particular, being divorced or never-married – are two of the top predictors of mortality in adults, while married couples, the article noted, “enjoy longer lives, less stress, better sex and happier children.” The last being particularly on point here. Stable families with married parents are good for children.

As The Heritage Foundation comments regarding the collapse of marriage, “More than two-thirds of all poor families with children in the U.S. are headed by single parents.” The overwhelming majority of these are women. R. Claire Friend, writing in the L.A. Times’ Daily Pilot, does not mince words. “This single piece of public policy has…turned traditional America into a culture of fatherlessness.”

Beautiful idea: The 60s-era “War on Poverty” was meant to eradicate social ills, but accelerated widespread family breakdown among the urban poor.

Kate Millett, whose 1969 Sexual Politics was considered the bible of the women’s movement, despised the traditional family because of its primary role in “the socialization of the young.” The very characteristic that normal folk through the ages have considered the family’s most laudatory role was, to her, an evil to be extinguished. Like other feminists, Millett advocated a new arrangement in order that socialization and even reproduction itself could take place outside the family to achieve revolutionary and utopian goals. As Belinda Brown writes in The Conservative Woman, “Feminists set out to destroy marriage, to rip men out of families, to render men impotent, to set men and women apart." Feminism has gone a long way to quite literally unman the cultures where it flourishes.

"The bible of the women's movement": Feminist Kate Millett's Sexual Politics.

Feminism is but one manifestation of the secular Left's war against Judeo-Christian Western civilization. In his Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right, Karl Marx famously declared that "religion is the opiate of the people" and that "the criticism of Heaven turns into the criticism of Earth." God in his mind was a human artifact and had to be dethroned from what was nothing less than a monarchical delusion. Moreover, Marx regarded marriage and the presumably godlike authority of the breadwinning husband as an opiate equally addictive. In the Communist Manifesto and The German Ideology, he defined marriage as legalized prostitution and a form of female slavery.

Similarly, in The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State, Marx's collaborator and patron Friedrich Engels made the left's ultraist agenda absolutely clear, referring to "the pairing family and inoculated monogamy" as a community of "leaden ennui" that had to be dismantled. These doctrines were later embraced and vigorously put in practice by a feminist sorority asserting its cultural dominance. But here we have to go back a little further – beyond government policy and modern leftism – to discern where this doctrinal parti pris ultimately comes from.

Karl Marx (left) and Friedrich Engels (right) did not merely aim to subvert capitalism, they were gunning to destroy the traditional family, which they despised.

There is a third factor of overarching significance which likely clarifies the cultural and civilizational malaise we are experiencing, and for which there may be no evident and certainly no immediate solution. The vast and catastrophic social effects of fatherlessness arise from an even vaster scourge of which the current affliction is merely a cameo expression. This is the eschatological patricide that has gradually but inexorably befallen the West, the death of the biblical God. The precise moment of the tragic execution cannot be forensically determined; incorporeal lividity is measured in centuries. The scholarly consensus taps the heliocentric revolution of the 16th Century and the Enlightenment of the 18-19th centuries as the historically etiological moments.

God the Father was no longer considered necessary. Copernicus displaced Earth from the center of the divine Creation and Darwin substituted the jungle for the Garden. As Friedrich Nietzsche wrote in The Gay Science, articulating one of the most shattering of theo-philosophical statements, Gott is tot, "God is dead." He meant something other than the fabrications of the clergy but the basic and accepted truth of religion itself – that is, in Danish thinker Soren Kierkegaard's terms from Either/Or, the truth of Christianity, not the constructions of Christendom. As a result, the moral structure governing the civilization of the Christian West, which depended on divine law and heavenly warrant, was dismissed as obsolete, if not nonexistent.

Marx regarded marriage and the presumably godlike authority of the breadwinning husband as an opiate equally addictive to religion. In the 'Communist Manifesto' and 'The German Ideology', he defined marriage as legalized prostitution and a form of female slavery.

For Nietzsche this was, as we say, both a good thing and a bad thing: a good thing since, once bereft of the divine claim upon his conduct, man was free to create his own values and meaning, to become the Übermensch, the "Overman," who rejoices in a new dawn and whose "spirit now wills his own will," as he put it in Thus Spake Zarathustra; a bad thing because men are weak, desiring comfort, caution and security above all, settling into a hedonistic and philistine life, unable or unwilling to struggle for the heights, thus becoming that "most contemptible thing – the last man," whose will is "a will to nothingness."

The idea of the Overman is the origin of the 20th century philosophy of existentialism, in which man assumes priority over the divine and becomes responsible for creating his own "transvaluation of values" in a disenfranchised world. We see its literary sources in Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment (though here redemption ensues), André Gide's Lafcadio's Adventures (aka The Vatican Cellars), and Albert Camus' The Stranger and The Myth of Sisyphus with their dual themes of motiveless violence and personal autonomy. Each theme reveals the primacy of pure will in a world empty of spiritual consequences. Man makes his own morality and becomes his own father in a world without communal reciprocity or spiritual transcendence.

Of course, Nietzsche did not presume to mean that God was actually dead, but that the idea of God had begun to leech from the Western psyche, leaving only sporadic traces: "There may still be caves for thousands of years where his shadow will be revealed." This amounted only to the tenebrous remnant of faith. Our situation was increasingly precarious. "For some time now our whole European civilization has been moving as toward a catastrophe," toward nihilism and anomie, he prophesied in Twilight of the Idols. A master of void detection, Nietzsche feared that man might not be capable of enacting a "transvaluation of all values" and that the latter option of acedia (listlessness or torpor) and rootlessness would prevail.

The children have grown up in a single-parent household, minus the guiding influence of a stern and loving father. In consequence, they have become wayward, uncontrolled, incapable of governing their impulses, and grandly self-infatuated. Devoid of a supervening moral code, they roam a world largely empty of meaning and purpose, their own lack of humility and spiritual governance further sucking it dry.

The curse of fatherlessness has percolated down to the domestic household in which the mother has acquired pre-eminence. Nature has triumphed over God, Pachamama over Jehovah. The father languishes in a state of bankruptcy and institutional disdain now that, in the psyche of the West, the androcentric universe has been abolished and replaced by a matricentric social cosmos. Obviously, peace and harmony were never guaranteed under any parental dispensation. The fallen realm could never be what the early Christians called a praetum felicitatis, a blessed and fruitful haven of peace immune to the ravages of a dark and unhouseled world. The world was always, so to speak, a crepuscular dimension. But from the perspective of faith and tradition, there were patches of sunlight rather than only caves of Nietzschean shadows.

We might say that once God the Father had impregnated Mother Nature, He was no longer needed. The mother was sufficient to care for her children, with the father displaced and consigned to a tenement somewhere in the shambles of an anarchic and nihilistic civilizational barrio.

Once the concept of fatherhood was discredited, once the father was transformed into a pariah, in heaven and then on earth, the disintegration of even relative order, in the individual spirit as well as the domestic milieu, followed in the West. Our civilization would be at war with itself. As Joseph Ratzinger, Pope Benedict XVI, wrote in The Spirit of Liturgy, we are living in a culture that has lost its "vital principle," that is, the binding element of sustainable relationships under God. Rather, the curse of dispossession and fratricidal conflict was foreordained. Life in a fatherless household and a derelict social world reproduces in little the experience of life in a Fatherless universe, a declension inexorably "evolving" over the centuries.

In his great essay Psychology & Religion, Carl Jung developed the notion he called the "Law of Correspondence," predicated on the legendary Emerald Tablet of Hermes Trismegistus with its famous maxim, "As above, so below." That is, as in the macrocosm, so in the microcosm. Jung believed in the fundamental unity of ordinary life, dream life and spiritual life under the arc of history – what he termed the mysterium coniunctionis.

Of course, Jung (like Nietzsche, a pastor's son) was a quasi-mystical psychiatrist/magus who thought of himself as a healer of souls rather than a theologian or professional historian, but the Law of Correspondence is not without foundation, not only from an occult but a historical standpoint – as Nietzsche also understood. What happens in the historical orbit around a theological centre also happens in the individual soul. The esoteric maxim “As above, so below,” expressing the idea that the human world is related to the divine or celestial regions, would apply in the domestic domain as well. When the Creating Father is deposed from his seat, so in the course of time is the terrestrial father evicted from his hearth. And the children are adrift in time, without heritage and endowment.

As we have seen, public policy and gender ideology are not the whole story, not by a long shot. The larger story has to do with the idea of the logos (Greek: reason), the Stoic belief in a spiritual principle permeating the whole of reality, reinterpreted centuries later in the Gospel of John as “the Word” – a theme popularly explored today by Jordan Peterson in his lectures and works. In the Hebrew Torah, the logos is consistent with the notion of “the Law” (torah or mitzvah in Hebrew, nomos in Greek).

However we look at it, whether as logos, nomos, torah or mitzvah, the idea is the same: the teaching of a parent, involving the attributes of discipline, strength and encouragement, the estate of the caring and lawgiving Father. It is the deep intuition of a transcendent and didactic authority that has gone missing in the life of the West, leading to the exile of the father and the dispossession of the children, and to a debilitating condition of moral equivalence and amoral relativism.

We may very likely find ourselves living in the grim time foretold by Nietzsche. ‘The earth has become small,’ he wrote, ‘and on it hops the Last Man, who makes everything small. His species is ineradicable as the flea; the Last Man lives longest.

Tweet

In the words of Archbishop Carlo Maria Viganó, “If God is rejected as Father, there must no longer be paternity even in the natural order, because natural fatherhood is a mirror of divine paternity.” Put differently, if our civilization does not awaken to its vital and conceptual origins in first principles, by which I don’t mean the Big Bang but a higher, governing, encompassing and life-giving power, however mysterious, however negotiated in the major faiths that underpin the Judeo-Christian civilization of the West, there can be no pulling back from the precipice before us. For a religious temperament like Viganó, and for many in the Western theological and philosophical tradition, there can be no father without the Father, and without the father the process of cultural continuance is undermined and eventually broken.

Catholic Jungians? Both Pope Benedict XVI (left) and Archbishop Carlo Maria Viganó (right) have lamented how a Fatherless universe is soon reflected in fatherless families and households.

It stands to reason, then, that the earthly father will not be reinstated to his position of customary authority in the home until the spirit of the West is reunited with the supervening Creative principle – should it descend once again into history. Failing which, we may very likely find ourselves living in the grim time foretold by Nietzsche. “The earth has become small,” he wrote, “and on it hops the Last Man, who makes everything small. His species is ineradicable as the flea; the Last Man lives longest.”

Nietzsche was right, in more ways than he could have known.

At any time

May 30, 2021 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Famous science fiction author Robert Heinlein wrote about the crazy years. This was a period of history in his stories in which technology rapidly advanced while society broke down. In 1941 Heinlein wrote:

> Considerable technical advance during this period, accompinied (sic) by a gradual deterioration of mores, orientation and social institutions, terminating in mass psychoses in the sixth decade and the Interregnum.

In his stories, this period covered the late 20th century and early 21st century. A growing number of people are now regarding this as prescient.

Growing up in a western country it was common to hear someone say which part of no don't you understand? The message was clear. When a woman said no she meant it! In any case, no means no is the past. The future is yes means yes or as it is now often called affirmative consent.

In an affirmative consent jurisdiction, a woman engaging in sex with a man need not notify the man when she withdraws consent. Rather it is presumed that the man needs to take note of her affirmation of consent (verbally or otherwise) and cease sexual activity if he does not observe it. This shifts the onus of proof to a man accused of sexual assault as it is now up to the man to establish that the woman did not withdraw consent.

Consider now that consent can be withdrawn at any time. This is a fundamental legal principle now established in law throughout the West and in most other nations as well. Since consent can be withdrawn at any time affirmative consent has to be continuous to have any value.

Even a short delay between a woman withdrawing consent and a man ceasing sexual activity can result in criminal charges and jail. We have seen this with Kevin Ibbs who continued sexual intercourse for a short period after consent was withdrawn. He became known as the 30 second rapist and was imprisoned in Australia for four years. In contrast Maouloud Baby denied having continued intercourse with a woman after she withdrew consent. Despite her assertion that he had continued for only 5-10 seconds he was convicted of first-degree rape in Maryland and was sentenced to 15 years imprisonment with all but five suspended. Both of these cases occurred without the additional risk of affirmative consent.

A man seeking to defend himself against an allegation of sexual assault in an affirmative consent jurisdiction would need to establish to the court that the woman had consented to sex continuously. It is unrealistic to presume that a man could offer sufficient evidence to establish continuous consent. It follows then that in an affirmative consent jurisdiction the only safe course of action is for men to not have sex with women.

A growing number of jurisdictions define rape as sexual assault without consent, in accordance with the Istanbul Convention. This however stops short of affirmative consent.

In 2018 Sweden introduced two new offences: negligent rape and negligent sexual assault. Convictions for either requires that the offender did not properly establish consent to sexual activity. Not surprisingly for readers of this site, conviction rates for rape and sexual assault rose by 75% in the two years after the introduction of these laws.

Opinions differ on whether Sweden is truly an affirmative consent jurisdiction as the prosecution reportedly still has the burden of proof to establish that consent was not granted. Even the Deputy Prime Minister of Sweden, Isabella Lovin, reportedly claimed that the legislative changes would reverse the burden of proof before backtracking on these comments.

The Australian state of New South Wales (NSW) is another matter, however. It is very clear that NSW intends to introduce affirmative consent laws. This is despite concerns from the NSW Law Society and the NSW Council for Civil Liberties.

Many jurisdictions have no statute of limitations on criminal matters. Combined with affirmative consent a man could be at risk of a complaint of sexual assault against him at any future time. Any man that has sex with a woman in such an affirmative consent jurisdiction is allowing her to point a gun at his head – permanently.

Some commentators have noted that a man accused of sexual assault or rape by a woman in an affirmative consent jurisdiction could immediately just make the same complaint against her. Each party would then have the burden of proving their own innocence.

As if all this wasn't bad enough, there is a variant of affirmative consent called enthusiastic consent. As the name suggests, now consent has to be given enthusiastically. So far no jurisdiction has gone this far but feminists continue to push for it.

Note that the entire discussion to this point revolves around women's consent. While these laws are written in a gender-neutral manner they are always applied in an entirely gendered manner. And the gender that gets to go to jail is the male gender.

Affirmative consent laws have the potential to cause irreparable damage to our society. I believe these laws will be revoked or more likely pared away in the future. By then it may be too late. The damage will have been done. Damage to human relationships and thus ultimately damage to the family structure. A society that harms the family structure will ultimately fall to one that does not.

Love and Friendship

June 4, 2021 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

“It is not a lack of love, but a lack of friendship that makes unhappy marriages.”
Friedrich Nietzsche
Feminism promotes a neurotic vision of what constitutes true love. It takes its model directly from the Age of Feudalism which saw vassals bowing down and kissing the hands of Lords. In the 12th century that model served as the basis for a new kind of love in which men were to play the role of vassal to women who played the role of an idealized Lord. C.S. Lewis, back in the middle of the 20th Century, referred to this historical revolution as “the feudalisation of love,” and stated that it has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched. “Compared with this revolution,” states Lewis, “the Renaissance is a mere ripple on the surface of literature.” [1]
Not only has this feudalistic notion of love permeated almost every corner of the globe today, it continues to be vigorously promoted by both feminists and traditionalists alike. The love we are referring to is what Hollywood, romance novels, and other media refer to as “romantic love,” the fantasy to which every modern man and woman pledges blind obeisance. Here are two descriptions of romantic love from modern scholars:
C.S. Lewis:

> “Everyone has heard of courtly love, and everyone knows it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century at Languedoc. The sentiment, of course, is love, but love of a highly specialized sort, whose characteristics may be enumerated as Humility, Courtesy, and the Religion of Love. The lover is always abject. Obedience to his lady’s lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. Here is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady’s ‘man’. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not ‘my lady’ but ‘my lord’. The whole attitude has been rightly described as ‘a feudalisation of love’. This solemn amatory ritual is felt to be part and parcel of the courtly life.”[2]

C.S. Lewis wrote that many decades ago; I’m not sure “everyone” knows it today. We ought to remember his words, because in the long sweep of human history, what we think has been with us forever is something people only a few generations ago knew to be mostly an artificial, idealized notion.
Slavoj Zizek:

> “The knight’s relationship to the Lady is thus the relationship of the subject-bondsman, the vassal, to his feudal Master-Sovereign who > subjects him to senseless, outrageous, impossible, arbitrary, capricious ordeals. It is precisely in order to emphasize the non-spiritual nature of these ordeals that Lacan quotes a poem about a Lady who demanded that her servant literally lick her arse: the poem consists of the poet's complaints about the bad smells that await him down there (one knows the sad state of personal hygiene in the Middle Ages), and about the imminent danger that, as he is fulfilling his 'duty', the Lady will urinate on his head." [3]

Feminism's mission today is largely the promulgation of this "love," and it is right that men and women learn to reject it, as Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), Women Against Feminism (WAF), and Men's Human Rights Advocates (MHRAs) are doing. It is a "love" that dehumanizes males by turning them into masochistic servants, while simultaneously dehumanizing women by idealizing them to the extent that their humanity is obliterated and replaced with an image of divinity. It's a recipe for disaster on both sides; the occasional lucky couple for whom this works is about as rare as a lightning strike, with no evidence that even that lucky few are really happier or more productive than anyone else.

When I consider this disastrous state of affairs that has lead men to boycott relationships, a few questions arise; are we being too rash in our rush from love, and if yes is there a better model, a new model, or perhaps an older model for relationships that we have forgot?

The field of attachment science concludes that an absence of close and consistent human attachment causes children to literally wither and die, refusing to thrive despite being provided with clothing, food and an adequate number of toys. Likewise adults literally commit suicide to escape feelings of isolation and loneliness, especially after a relationship separation. Even if we don't end up suiciding from loneliness we have to ask ourselves if the absence of an intimate relationship in our lives leaves us limping, or somehow unfulfilled? Some would suggest we can fill our intimacy void with friendships, but this leads to a further question of whether there is an adequate formulation of friendship that can satisfy our needs – a relationship that doesn't rely on the usual vassal and lord model at the core of romantic love.

In ancient cultures friendship was a more lofty aspiration than it is today. It was synonymous with love and it often involved sexual intimacy. In Ancient Greek, the same word was used for friend and lover. In our culture we have succeeded in separating friendship from the category we call love, and excised all trace of sex from friendships. Today when we say, "They are just good friends" or "she's only a friend" we are indicating the absence of both intimate love and sex.

According to the American Heritage Dictionary:
'A friend is a lover, literally. The relationship between Latin amicus "friend" and amo "I love" is clear, as is the relationship between Greek philos "friend" and phileo, "I love." In English, though, we have to go back a millennium before we see the verb related to friend. At that time, freond, the Old English word for "friend," was simply the present participle of the verb freon, "to love." The Germanic root behind this verb is fri-, "to like, love, be friendly to." (2006)

To older classical cultures, friendship seemed the happiest and most fully human of the different kinds of loves, and for that reason I wonder whether it's worth reintroducing it here as a guide to relationships between red-pill men and women?
Suppose that rather than running from intimacy we were to demote our idea of "romantic" love from its pedestal, and elevate friendship-love in its place. Suppose also that we steal back sexual attraction and sexual intercourse from the neurotic clutches of "romantic" love, and allow it once again to be part and parcel of friendship if and when relationships call for it.
Before we consider elevating friendship as a replacement for romantic love we need first to detail precisely what it is and how it looks in lived experience, and to that end here are three salient points of definition.

Friendship is based on shared interests

Friendship is based entirely on things people have in common, like some shared insight, interest or taste. It might be cooking, sport, religion, politics, sex, or gardening, and in the best friendships there occurs a handsome combination of these. No friendship can arise without shared interests, because there would be nothing for the friendship to be about. Furthermore, that "something" is generally located outside oneself and one's relationship – at the football stadium, church, chess-board, or stamp collection. Friendship differs in this respect markedly from "romantic" love in which couples perpetually focus on each other and talk to each other about their love.
Friends hardly ever talk about their friendship. C.S. Lewis captures this with his remark that friends stand side-by-side rather than face-to-face:

> "Friends are not primarily absorbed in each other. It is when we are doing things together that friendship springs up – painting, sailing ships, praying, philosophizing, fighting shoulder to shoulder. Friends look in the same direction. Lovers look at each other – that is, in opposite directions."[1]

This kind of friendship, this love, is not something we can have with anyone we meet. We can no more choose in advance who we are going to be close friends with than we can choose what sort of skin colour we are going to be born with. Friendship arises organically when we discover that a previously casual acquaintance, or perhaps a new person we meet, shares significant interests with us; "What? You too? I thought I was the only one!" The pleasure derived from cooperation in that shared interest, and of getting to know them through that activity, provides an avenue for deep bonding and human attachment.

Friendship is based in personal authenticity

Friendship is based on true identities and interests, not on some narrow and dehumanising role we might play. Friendship invites you to speak out about your interests in order to find potential areas of commonality. This is not allowed in so-called "romantic" love lest your interests threaten the narrow feudalistic fantasy. In "romantic" love the main "shared interest" is that script which insists the man play the role of masochistic utility, and the woman an idealised goddess. It is an objectification of both parties.

Friendship is not based on the feudal model: not vassals and overlords, but partners in crime.

Friendship is highly compatible with sex

Sex does not belong to romantic love – it belongs anywhere you want it to belong. Modern culture has begrudgingly allowed for this possibility under the risqué concept of "friends with benefits," but to the ancients it was not daring at all, it was perfectly normal. Friendship also allows for a kind of quasi-romance–or dare I say, a possibly more authentic romance? Have you not had a good friend give you a gift, take you out for a meal, or to the movies? Sex and romantic gestures need not remain colonised by feudalistic notions of romantic love alone.

Sexual attraction and desire also need to be put in their place. They may generate some chemistry and may be the first thing that attracts you to a person, but like the shiny trinket that catches your eye at the shopping mall, you will first stare at it in wonder, maybe have a feel, and then decide whether you really want to take that thing home and share your life with it. Friendship is much the same, and if a person you meet has little in common you will be inclined to leave them on the shelf and move on, despite their sexual attractiveness.

Romantic-love and friendship-love are clearly opposed relationships with opposing motives. A woman might say: "I don't want to be friends with my husband because it will take all the drama and intensity out of our marriage." That is true enough, friendship does take some of the neurotic drama and intensity out of a relationship. But it also takes away the masochism and narcissism, and replaces that sickness with something human and real.

One of the worst-kept secrets about married couples is that they often treat their friends with more kindness, compassion and generosity than they ever do for each other. When best friends are together they are charming, engaging, helpful and courteous, but when they return home to their spouses they appear resentful, angry and uncooperative with each other. Hardly ever do we see this pattern reversed, where people are horrible to friends and at their best with their long term romantic love partners.

Friendship-love not only existed throughout the world before "romantic" love was invented, but it remains active in some pockets of culture today – for instance in China and India. Author Robert Johnson, for instance, writes about the presence of friendship between couples in India, recounting a Hindu marriage rite in which the bride and groom make the solemn but hopeful statement, "You will be my best friend."

Johnson goes further, telling that "In a traditional Hindu marriage, a man's commitment to his wife does not depend on his staying 'in love' with her. Since he was never 'in love' in the first place, there is no way he can fall 'out of love'. His relationship to his wife is based on loving her, not on being 'in love' with the ideal he projects onto her. His relationship is not going to collapse because one day he falls 'out of love,' or because he meets another woman who catches his projection. He is committed to a woman and a family, not to a projection." [4] version of love is full of narcissism, corruption, entitlement and despair, where dreams collapse and lives are shattered. On the other hand go ask the happily married octogenarian couple who their best friend is – they will look at each other and smile knowing the answer has been beside them for sixty years. Our lives, loves and families fare much better when we base them on this very human kind of love called friendship. With freindship, men and women have an opportunity to truly go their own way while keeping the option of healthy intimate relationships with either sex alive. Having your cake and eating it too. That would be my suggestion of how we might cure the malaise.

Friendship-love appeared long before "romantic" love and it worked. The "romantic"

I once again note that the breakdown in relations between men and women has been painful, and men have suffered the most in this I would think; in the current socio-political climate, marriage and even cohabitation is like jumping out of an aeroplane with a chute you're not even sure is going to open. And all change can't simply be political. Still, if we are ever to look forward to a cultural change that might make for a new era of improved relations between the sexes, ditching these feudalistic attitudes about "romantic love," and restoring the ancient tradition of seeing intimate friendship being the highest ideal for a relationship, would probably by a major step in the right direction culturally. This will require a shift in the attitudes of men and women alike, but the evidence for this being possible is strong; we've done it before, and we still see it in some cultures today. It's not impossible for human beings to think and act this way. So can we return to a culture where that's the more normal way of thinking? I'd like to believe that possible for us today, or at least in the future.

Arawelo: The Somalian Legend that Endorses Men's Rights

June 11, 2021 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

Queen Arawelo is among the best-known folktale characters. Originally an obscure figure outside of Somalia, her legend has reached international audiences due to English-language media: a graphic novel (Mohamed, 2014), an article in biographies of women in history (Porath, 2016), and a theatrical production in London. There's even a website for diasporic Somalian women named in her honor. Gender politics underlies this popularity since her story, in its many forms, is among the few about explicit sex discrimination. While most artists and scholars focus on the topic of women's rights and feminism, the legend's content also captures important aspects of contemporary men's rights activism.

A starting point is that male resistance is a fundamental theme. In all versions of the tale, the queen is assassinated by her grandson. His motives include an implied desire to avenge the eunuchs after he meets and speaks with them (Drake-Brockman, 1912) a desire for revenge after being blinded (Rayne, 1935), or a desire for revenge after the queen attempts to castrate him (Hanghe, 1988). The boy receives guidance from either his father or grandfather, who serve as strategists, and he nearly always receives help from the eunuchs. This theme extends into real life: Somalian men have been known to throw stones at a mound that allegedly marks Arawelo's grave (Mukhtar, 2003).

Combined with that is a subversion of stereotyping and gynocentrism. The castration element of the legend comes from a cultural belief that "if man loses his testicles he cannot escape, think or help himself." Yet, the eunuchs challenge this notion by having agency in Arawelo's downfall. Depending on the variant, they leave her unguarded (Shafi, 2006), provide backup during the queen's assassination (Drake-Brockman, 1912) or shelter her archenemy until he impregnates her daughter and leads their son against her (Hanghe, 1988). Moreover, Arawelo's prominence in Somalian folklore may stem from the country's matrilineal past. Certain subclans were founded by women, as reflected in their names and Majeerteen sultans being selected from the maternal line (Mukhtar, 2003). The queen's murder and reinstitution of male authority constitute a critique of these norms.

This critique is clearest in portrayals of Arawelo. Her justifications for castrating men echo feminist beliefs. In one version, she gets raped and decides to castrate men to avenge herself and other women. A related motive is that she castrates men for battering their wives (Zabus, 2007). These sentiments resemble the claims that men use rape to instill fear in women (Brownmiller, 1993) or that domestic violence is an expression of patriarchal control (Hooks, 2000). In another version, Arawelo grew up in a war-torn Somalia and concluded that male leadership was to blame, so she and the other women stole men's weapons to prevent more conflict. This idea of the gentle female and the aggressive male is expressed in early twentieth century writings: "The woman's outlook on life is to save, to care for, to help. Men make wounds and women bind them up"

(McClung, 1915). The negative depictions of Arawelo, in most variants, because of these beliefs and her willingness to act on them, is an indictment of feminism and misandry.

Feminists have attempted to undermine the traditional narrative and its implicit messages with propaganda. They say the queen brought “peace and prosperity” to Somalia and that the tyrannical portrayals of Arawelo are misrepresentations by male storytellers (Chait, 2011). This is contradicted by research into the historical origins of the legend. It is believed that the figure known as Arawelo was not a Somalian monarch but a distorted memory of an Abyssinian queen. This queen, alternatively named Judith, Yodit, or Goudit, was noted for her efforts to eradicate Christendom (Ismail, 2014). Thus, violent interpretations of Arawelo match historical reality.

The legend of Arawelo is about male liberation. It is a story that acknowledges discrimination against boys and men. It is a story that encourages men to fight individuals and systems that would harm them for an accident of birth. It is a story that all men’s rights activists should know since it is their story.

Lessons to Learn from The Folly of Herod Antipas

June 19, 2021 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

Verses 3 to 11 of Chapter 14 of the Gospel of Matthew contain one of the accounts of the beheading of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee at the time, a story from which red pill men can learn some important lessons where it concerns what their own consciences tell them about the whims of manipulative women. Before we begin this analysis, a quick review of this story is in order.

The head of John the Baptist

Herod Antipas – one of the sons of Herod the Great, who tried but failed to kill Jesus Christ in Chapter 2 – has John the Baptist imprisoned, "for Herodias' sake;" (14:3) John had insisted that it was, "not lawful," (14:4) for Antipas to have married Herodias, because Antipas had divorced his first wife to do this and because Herodias had done the same with her first husband, Herod II. Herod II – also called Herod Philip I – is also the half-brother of Antipas (same father, different mother).

On one of Antipas' birthdays, Salome – the biological daughter of Herodias and Herod II, and thus the stepdaughter of Antipas – "danced before them, and pleased Herod," (14:6) to the point where Antipas, "promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask." (14:7) Unfortunately for Antipas, Salome – at the instruction of her mother – demands, "John Baptist's head in a charger," (14:8) and the reluctant Antipas ultimately gives her want she wants and has John beheaded in prison.

Herodias and Salome

Biblical commentator Albert Barnes notes the significance of Antipas feeling, "sorry," (14:9) at the prospect of killing John, arguing that there are three likely reasons for this. Antipas felt a great respect for John – considering him, "a just man and an holy," as recorded in Mark 6:20 – he, "feared the multitude," who, "counted him as a prophet," (14:5) and Antipas had the sense that beheading John was, as Barnes argues, "so manifestly wicked," as to make Antipas' conscience object to the request. Barnes also contends that Antipas can see the shallowness of this request, which is made solely to, "gratify the malice of a wicked woman," referring to Herodias' hatred of John for his criticism of her marriage to Antipas.

Antipas has the power to deny Salome's request and preserve the life of John, but he beheads John both because of the oath he swore to give Salome whatever she wanted (made before he knew what exactly she wanted) and because of, "them which sat with him at meat." (14:9) Barnes argues that this is essentially a description of Antipas succumbing to peer pressure and being, "afraid of the charge of cowardice and want of spirit;" he gave Salome what she wanted and failed to have the courage to obey his conscience.

It is also worth noting the style of Salome's dance, dubbed the Dance of the Seven Veils; Barnes argues (as do cinematic depictions of the dance in 1953 and 1961) that this was a, “lascivious and wanton,” act performed by a, “dissolute,” girl, and the fact that Salome was Antipas’ stepdaughter adds an incestuous element to the dance. One arguably does not even need to hold the conservative views on sexuality that Barnes does to see the disturbing nature of this performance by Salome.

Antipas and his mistake

It is ultimately Antipas’ folly and personal cowardice – that is, cowardice in being reluctant to do that which he personally knows to be right – that leads to the death of John the Baptist, who arguably acts as a symbol for Antipas’ conscience. The first two verses of Chapter 14 recount Antipas’ belief that – after hearing of, “the fame of Jesus,” (14:1) fame which grew due to Christ’s performance of miracles for the people – John has somehow, “risen from the dead.” (14:2)

Barnes argues that Antipas mistook Christ for John because of his guilty conscience; Antipas knew that executing John was wrong from the beginning, and later feared that John had somehow miraculously returned, as Antipas’ conscience would never let him forget his fatal failure to do what needed to be done when it needed to be done. Antipas still bears ultimate responsibility for John’s execution, but even Jordan Peterson would argue that the provocative and likely neotenic Salome was, “deeply complicit,” in contributing to this mistake.

Knowing when you’re being manipulated

Red pill men recognise that their biology – by itself – will not serve them well when it comes to interacting with women, and Antipas was negligent to ignore the incestuous and thus highly questionable nature of Salome’s dance. Like the average blue pill man, he swore an oath to give a woman whose character he knew little to nothing about whatever she wanted purely because she visually, “pleased,” (14:6) him.

Hence the second point made by Paul Elam in his video ‘Six Subtle Gateways To Borderline Hell‘, in which he argues that if a woman becomes highly sexual with you early on in the relationship, this is a sign that she is weaponizing her sexuality to your detriment. Salome’s sexual manipulation is like that of the Greek goddess Hera – as discussed previously on this website by Peter Wright – in that it serves a purely selfish end; this is made even more unsettling by the collusion of her mother Herodias, who would have presumably been quite satisfied with the sight of John’s head after Salome, “brought it to her mother.” (14:11)

To reiterate, sexual manipulation is one of the easiest ways that a woman can get a man of her choosing to do whatever she likes, given how visual men are when it comes to sexual selection. It is this kind of manipulation that red pill men must be able to perceive for what it is – especially when it is coming from women about whom we know very little, or nothing at all – and they must value what their conscience tells them over what their hormones tell them when dealing with a Salome in their own lives.

An existential take on the view of women as children

June 26, 2021 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

One of the most commonly made arguments in the manosphere concerning female socialisation in the West is that women are most often raised to behave like children and remain in an eternal state of emotional and psychological childhood throughout their lives. The blue pill world facilitates this process by treating women like delicate princesses when they are young, encouraging them to use makeup and cosmetics to maintain their neotenous appearances, blaming either 'the system' or a conveniently located man for their heinous criminal activity, ensuring their safety through male adherence to the dictates of chivalry, pumping feminist dogma into their young minds about their permanent victimhood at the hands of evil men (which ironically leads their subjective wellbeing to be less than that of such men) and so on.

In this essay, I would like to articulate an existentialist interpretation of the motivation that seems to lead women to gleefully both accept and become complicit in this process of socialisation, focusing particularly on the concept of death anxiety. I would also like to point out that the content of this essay is going to be highly speculative, especially where I discuss the unconscious mind.

Death anxiety and how we tend to cope with it

In 1980, American psychiatrist Irvin D. Yalom published a text titled Existential Psychotherapy, one intended to provide instructions for how mental health professionals can practice this eponymous brand of psychotherapy, a brand concerned with concepts such as free will, responsibility, meaning, and others and how they relate to the development of psychopathology. In this text, Yalom focuses on what he contends are the four, "ultimate concerns," (page 8) of existence (and thus the four main areas of concern for existentially inclined therapists) – death, freedom, isolation, and meaninglessness. Yalom's discussion of the first of these four concerns centres heavily around death anxiety, which can be defined as the fear of death, and thus of anything that one perceives as posing a threat to one's existence.

Yalom argues that death anxiety is a key cause of psychopathology and is thus a kind of anxiety that an existentially inclined therapist must be trained to address to ensure that his or her patients have any chance of overcoming the illnesses that plague them. He additionally notes that even though, "all human beings," must contend with death anxiety at some point during their lives – because, ultimately, we will all die – "some are unable to cope with it," (page 13) because they either neglected or were unable to develop solid defence mechanisms during their younger years; it is the latter group of people who go on to develop mental illnesses in their adult lives that are rooted in death anxiety.

In Chapter 4 of this text, Yalom discusses the two defence mechanisms that are most often used to tackle death anxiety – one's belief in one's specialness, and one's belief in an ultimate rescuer. It is the latter of these mechanisms that is most relevant to the argument that modern female behaviour resembles that of children.

Someone who uses the latter of these two mechanisms believes that there is a, "personal omnipotent intercessor," controlling the world or universe who, "eternally observes, loves, and protects," (page 129) one from the prospect of death (put simply, this being can be relied upon to rescue one from death). This being need not be a supernatural one; he or she may also be, "a leader," or, "some higher cause," (page 129) to which one devotes oneself zealously. Believing in the existence of this ultimate rescuer leads one to fail to adopt full responsibility for one's destiny; after all, one will not do this if one believes that one's life is being controlled or influenced by an external force who can be relied upon as a provider of safety.

It is also worth mentioning that a concrete action that one can undertake to assuage one's death anxiety is that of reproduction; doing so comforts one with the belief that even after death, one will continue to exist in both the memories and the genetic code of one's children. You could even argue that death anxiety underscores much of the angst that single women begin to experience once they hit their thirties and realise that they have no men in their lives with whom they can reproduce.

The all-powerful 'daddy'

Women generally seek to reproduce with men whom they perceive as having the capacity for dominance and aggression, but who can also protect them and provide for them; women's instincts lead them to seek out men whom they can depend on to provide them with a degree of security in their lives. In essence, women seek out men who can play a role for them that resembles that of the ultimate rescuer – the being who stands between them and the threat of death or anything that resembles it – and evidence in the form of men laying down their lives to protect women from the prospect of harm seems to suggest that men largely seem to believe that doing so is an obligation of theirs.

We can even link this idea of man as woman's ultimate rescuer to the phenomenon of women using the term 'daddy' as a sexual compliment for their boyfriends/husbands. Even though this term is normally used in the innocent context of young children addressing their fathers, women's use of it in reference to their boyfriends/husbands arguably suggests an unconscious association between the roles that these two men play during pivotal periods of their lives.

By using this term in a sexual context, women are associating the dominance and control exhibited by the men whom they call 'daddy' with the dominance and control that fathers typically exhibit when treating their daughters like princesses. Just as their fathers shielded them from harm when they were both legally and physically childlike, their boyfriends/husbands will do the same for them even when they are only capable of pretending to be physically childlike.

Man, the devoted protector of woman

By unconsciously arguing to themselves that they still have a 'daddy' who will watch over and protect them – even during adulthood – women can maintain the illusion that they have an ultimate rescuer in their lives who will protect them from both death and anything that threatens them (such as, in the case of the modern woman, responsibility). Due to men's willingness to play this role in women's lives, woman is consequently permitted to be – to quote Esther Vilar in The Manipulated Man – "a human being who does not work" (page 10); in this context, she does not need to work to embrace and thus transcend her death anxiety. Why prepare yourself to confront an enemy that you almost never need to face?

One of the patients discussed by Yalom in his text, a 40-year-old woman named Karen, acts as a prime (albeit extreme) example of this kind of female mindset. He reports that she entered therapy for several reasons – most notably her, "masochistic sexual propensities" – and that she quickly, "devoted herself to the project of eliciting care and concern," from Yalom, eager to paint him as her larger-than-life ultimate rescuer (page 135). He also writes that her, "masturbatory fantasies," consisted of her being afflicted with some kind of illness and him, "feeding and cradling her," (page 135) as if she was a baby. Whenever Yalom was, "stern," with her or, "expressed any irritation," towards her, she experienced, "sexual excitation," (page 135) as a result, evidently taking pleasure in Yalom's attempts to act authoritatively towards a disobedient patient.

Yalom summarises the essence of Karen's belief in him as her ultimate rescuer by describing how her, "sexuality joined in the pursuit for safety and deliverance," and that to be, "punished was to be protected," because punishment was a sign that, "limits were being set," by her ultimate rescuer (page 135). It is worth noting that Karen only began to, "work truly effectively in therapy," (page 137) once Yalom refused to continue to treat her, and thus forced her to become independent in a manner to which she was not accustomed.

As women grow into adulthood, they begin to experience a form of death anxiety that is associated with their awareness of both their desire to reproduce and their aging. By continuing to act in a childlike manner with the use of neoteny, the avoidance of responsibility, appeals to men's undying desire to be sexually validated by women, and more, women are thus able to reinforce their own belief in the presence of an ultimate rescuer in their lives – a man who will both provide them with an easier life and protect them from harm, even at the cost of his own life, just as their fathers would have happily done. To conclude with yet another passage from The Manipulated Man (page 18):

> Woman's greatest ideal is a life without work or responsibility – yet who needs such a life but a child? A child with appealing eyes, a funny little body with dimples and sweet layers of baby fat and clear, taut skin – that darling miniature of an adult. It is a child that woman imitates – its easy laugh, its helplessness, its need for protection. A child must be cared for; it cannot look after itself. And what species does not, by natural instinct, look after its offspring? It must – or the species will die out.

White Supremacy: A Euphemism For White Women Worship

June 29, 2021 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

So why is white male+female supremacy a euphemism for white women worship? Because men's part in the much touted "supremacy" culture is geared largely to the role of servicing white women, a role otherwise known as chivalry or benevolent sexism.

Whether men traditionally called her ma'am, m'lady, madam or some other highfalutin title, the sexual dynamic was always one that positions woman as dominatrix, and the man as submissive liegemen – i.e., it closely resembles sadomasochism. That same sadomasochism has been the centrepiece of the women's movement in which, for example, early feminists looked down sneeringly on their ebony lessers, claiming as Susan B. Anthony did, "I will cut off this right arm of mine before I will ever work or demand the ballot for the Negro and not the woman," and which we see continued in the spa and nail shops which have exclusively women of color carving the toejam out of pampered and 'empowered' white women's nails.

In her blog post Three Cheers for White Men, medievalist Rachel Fulton Brown waxes poetic about men's having aided and abetted a culture of worshipping white women — a worship that we know has led to the three evils of misandry, racism, and (white) female narcissism. Here is her post:

> 1. When white women (see Marie de France and Eleanor of Aquitaine) invented chivalry and courtly love, white men agreed that it was better for knights to spend their time protecting women rather than raping them, and even agreed to write songs for them rather than expecting them to want to have sex > with them without being forced.

>
> 2. When white men who were celibate (see the canon lawyers and theologians of the twelfth century and thereafter) argued that marriage was a sacrament valid only if both the man and the woman consented, white men exerted themselves to become good husbands rather than expecting women to live as their slaves.
> 3. When white women (see Christine de Pizan, Mary Wollstonecraft, and the suffragettes) invented feminism, white men supported them (see John Stuart Mill) and even went so far as to vote (because only men could vote at the time) to let them vote, not to mention hiring them as workers and supporting their education.

Fulton Brown copped a lot of flack for praising white men's chivalry and women's associated pedestalization. But she was right, even if I would radically differ with her in response to this history — ie. my reaction is one of disgust and rejection of the narcissism and sadomasochism embedded in the heart of the same construct.

Alison Phipps, a Professor of Gender Studies at Sussex University, recently published an essay titled White tears, white rage: Victimhood and (as) violence in mainstream feminism, and more recently a book titled Me, Not You: The Trouble With Mainstream Feminism.

There is much detail in her feminism-inspired corpus that I am at odds with, and no doubt much in my work that she too would be at odds with. However, I find her thesis readable in parts where describing the power of white women's tears (a tradition I refer to as damseling), along with white men's symbiotic enmeshment with those tears in the form of "chivalric" protection frequently involving warrantless, exaggerated violence, especially in colonial settings. This compact is aptly referred to by Phipps as "a circuit" between white women's perceived vulnerabilities and white men's reactivity on their behalf.

Phipps' essay is the first from a feminist perspective that positions males and females as conspiring together as a circuitous dyad, a position contrasted with that of most other feminist authors who prefer to lump all power and evil with men, and all goodness with women. Phipps describes the sexual relations contract of white European descendants as malignant and exploitative, and while I do agree with her in certain key respects I find her thesis too reductive and totalising in its demonization.

The following are a few excerpts from her essay on White Women's Tears:

> "Using #MeToo as a starting point, this paper argues that the cultural power of mainstream white feminism partly derives from the cultural power of white tears. This in turn depends on the dehumanisation of people of colour, who were constructed in colonial 'race science' as incapable of complex feeling (Schuller 2018). Colonialism also created a circuit between bourgeois white women's tears and white men's rage, often activated by allegations of rape, which operated in > the service of economic extraction and exploitation. This circuit endures, abetting the criminal punishment system and the weaponisation of ‘women’s safety’ by the various border regimes of the right. It has especially been utilised by reactionary forms of feminism, which set themselves against sex workers and trans people.

> “In an article on #MeToo, Jamilah Lemieux (2017) commented: ‘white women know how to be victims. They know just how to bleed and weep in the public square, they fundamentally understand that they are entitled to sympathy’. Lemieux was not claiming the disclosures of #MeToo were not genuine; she was highlighting the power brought to mainstream feminism by the power of white women’s tears. White-lady tears, to use Cooper’s phrase: bourgeois white women’s tears are the ultimate symbol of femininity, evoking the damsel in distress and the mourning, lamenting women of myth (Phipps 2020, p71)… the power of bourgeois white women’s tears was solidified in the modern colonial period, as ‘women’s protection’ became key to the deadly disciplinary power that maintained racialised and classed regimes of extraction and exploitation.

> “Structurally, bourgeois white women’s tears support what Sharpe (2016, p16) calls ‘reappearances of the slave ship’: ‘protecting (white) women’ fuels the necropolitics of criminal punishment and the border regimes of Fortress Europe, North America and other parts of the world. These tears enter a world in which marginalised people are disposable, whether they are Black people killed by police, migrants left to starve or drown (Sharpe 2016, pp43-44, 54), or trans people and sex workers (many of them people of colour) disproportionately left to survive outside bourgeois families, communities and the law. The circuit between white women’s tears and white men’s rage means that because we cry, marginalised people can die. As some forms of reactionary feminism exploit this circuit in their engagements with the far right, their narratives of victimhood can themselves be understood as violence. The ship, then, stays afloat: captained by white men, but suspended in a pool of white women’s tears.

After reading Phipps essay I’m immediately reminded of Emmett Till, a 14-year-old African American who was lynched in Mississippi in 1955 after being falsely accused of offending a white woman. White men bashed him for offending a white women’s fragile sensibilities (which it turns out was fabricated by the woman) and proceeded to showcase their “chivalry” via the act of torturing and brutally bashing the boy to death. In this one image is captured the scenario painted by Phipps – the compact that would keep white women (and their white male protectors) at the top of the food chain.

While I won’t join Phipps in her general malignment of white men, the question remains have certain men throughout history showcased white supremacy, sometimes brutally? Yes they have – but to what ends? I’m going to finish with an unpopular conclusion: that white male supremacy, if and when it has existed, has been driven partly, and perhaps even largely, by a desire to protect a culture of white female supremacy. Keep in mind that this conclusion is becoming recognized not only in the rarefied writings of feminists and MRAs, but also among the everyday populace which has in recent times immortalized the 'Karen' figure as an example of racist, misandrist, and narcissistic entitlement.

SLANG DICTIONARY

Karen

[kair-in]

WHAT DOES KAREN MEAN?

Karen is a pejorative slang term for an obnoxious, angry, entitled, and often racist middle-aged white woman who uses her privilege to get her way or police other people's behaviors.

In a time when anti-white racism and critical race theory are gaining momentum, something I do not wish to fuel, keep in mind that some white women are not like that, even if many are. It still pays to follow the dictum of Martin Luther King who encouraged us to look at content of character before color of skin, and by that route we avoid the fallacy of exaggerated class guilt.

Sports and title IX. A bureaucratic nightmare posing as female empowerment?

August 23, 2021 | by Ted Manning | Link | Original Link

Some might contend we just can't create miracles like we use to. I mean how many times has the Red Sea parted recently? But if you pay attention to the media, there are many miracles that are happening all the time regarding social issues. The discussion of Title IX and its effect on college sports generally correspond with this paradigm. If something is good, credit Title IX as bringing about equality in college sports. If something is bad, don't mention Title IX's role. Two news stories I recently inadvertently came across, illustrate this point. One is from "Fox News", the other, "The Washington Post". Expect more during the Summer Olympics. For instance, as I am writing this with the television tuned to the PBS program "The News Hour" on June 19th", sportswriter Christine Brennan is crediting Title IX for there being more women than men on the 2021 U.S Olympic team.
The reality is that Title IX requires athletic teams to be proportional to the number of students at a school. The inconvenient fact is that males are more interested in participating in college sports. Also relevant, is that the fact that men performing at a higher level in these sports is a reason for the greater interest in these sports.

It also should be noted, that sports are one of the few areas regarding academic institutions were more males than females want to participate. Not coincidently, it is the one that is the focus of feminists and therefore the media. For the record, I am for female sports participation. What I am interested in addressing, is the consistent intellectual dishonesty regarding the topic. Also, I believe both male and female athletes would benefit if the current rules were revised.

The segment on "Fox News" hosted by Chris Wallace, dealt with what he described as the "controversy" about transgender issues in sports. Featured on the show was women's sports activist Donna de Varona, a winner of a gold medal in swimming in 1964. Wallace mentioned that de Varona was now being accused of discrimination due to her views on transgender women in sports. To me, her views seemed to be pretty balanced. In contrast, de Varona's previous statements regarding Title IX and women's sports were treated as completely laudatory and accurate.

Without the ability to get a college sports scholarship, de Varona retired from swimming competition at age 17. She credited Title IX with not just women's current involvement in sports, but their winning more medals in the last Summer Olympics than men. This begs the question if you want the United States to earn a lot of medals, why is this such a good thing? After all, each sex's medals count the same.

Obviously, things have changed in society and sports in the intervening 57 years from when de Varona earned her gold medal. Most significantly, while college sports participants still qualify as amateurs, Olympic sports are no longer restricted to amateur athletes. It would be reverse feminism to put too much blame on Title IX being behind men’s lower Summer Olympic medal count. In the 1992 Winter Olympics, women won all of the United States gold medals. Four were in skating and one in skiing. It is quite unlikely that Title IX had anything to do with their success. Of course, Title IX was credited nevertheless (The 1992 Winter Olympics: When Women Ruled The Games).

A few weeks after Wallace’s program, I came across an article in the Washington Post by Liz Clarke, who was covering the Wimbledon tennis tournament. She credited the lack of top black male tennis players partly to the lack of male college participants in the sport. Clarke observed: “The dwindling number of NCAA men’s tennis teams compounds the challenge as athletic departments slash spending and divert revenue to football and men’s basketball in a post-covid world (Liz Clarke. “The last black finalist was in 1996. What will it take for another?”, “The Washington Post”, July 3, 2021).
In reality, successful basketball and football programs, often fund the rest of college athletics. Clarke also doesn’t explain why only male tennis teams were cut and not female ones. The proportionality requirement of Title IX is the real culprit.

An example, from Jessica Gavora’s book “Tilting the Playing Field”, illuminates how such things come about. Providence College had more female students than males, but not the corresponding number of athletic teams. To meet the numbers quota, the school eliminated the men’s baseball team, plus men’s tennis and golf. The Providence baseball coach wanted to raise funds to keep his baseball team, but since the school would have to add another female sport, this became financially untenable. The baseball team went on to win the Big East championship team and win their most games ever. Still, they were unable to save baseball at the school (Jessica Gavora, “Tilting the Playing Field”, pages 44-46, Encounter books, 2002). This happened in 1998. Currently, in 2021, the school is still without a men’s baseball, golf or tennis team. All three are Olympic sports in 2021.

Football, not Title IX, is usually cited as the culprit for eliminating male sports programs. This is misleading. For instance, Providence College did not have a football team and still had to make the cuts described above. While football is a factor in cutting a lot of men’s teams, it is complying with gender proportionally that is the issue. The only way to comply and still have a football team is to cut male sports, add female ones, or some combination of the two.

There are significantly more women competing in college sports that are also part of the Olympics. Complying with Title IX, where schools have a football team, is a major reason. An example is the University of Nebraska in Lincoln, where football is huge. Wrestling is now an Olympic sport for both sexes. Nebraska has a male wrestling team, a sport many colleges had to cut to comply with Title IX. It does not have a women’s wrestling team. The 2021 Olympic sports that are exclusively female at the University are swimming and diving, tennis, rifling, track and field, volleyball, and beach volleyball. But then how could a landlocked state like Nebraska, not have a women’s beach volleyball team?

Both sexes participate together in many sports outside of college teams. But with schools having to cut male teams to comply with Title IX, coed sports such as tennis, bowling, etc. are largely impractical. This could not be more contrary to the wishes of former female tennis star and women's sports activist Billy Jean King. She co-founded World Team Tennis and she was: "envisioning a world in which men and women compete together on a team with both genders making equal contribution to the result (https://www.billiejeanking.com/tennis/world-).

Many of these sports could become coed with little or no cost. For instance, in tennis, golf, bowling and others sports, players can supply their own equipment and most away competition is done by bus travel. Is there any place less compatible with King's vision than sports under regulation Title IX? Not international sports. In the Summer Olympics this year, there will be 18 coed sports (Olympics Shift: IOC Doubles Number Of Mixed-Gender Events ...). But what of soccer? The sport where we have been consistently been told that Title IX is behind women's world championship success. What does not get much mentioned in the far greater ability women have to get scholarships in college soccer. There are 333 Division I women's college soccer teams, (ncsasports.org women's-soccer) compared to 205 men's teams (ncsasports.org men's-soccer). In addition, women's teams can give out a total of partial and full scholarships adding up to 14, while men have a 9.9. scholarship limit (https://www.collegescholarships.org › scholarships › sports).

So if Title IX is the reason for women's success, how can it not be the reason for men not doing better in World Cup competition? Accepting this could lead to a great overhaul of the system with women's sports being the target. But this is the mainstream media on gender, for God's sake. I believe the press has significantly overstated the role Title IX has played in the success of the women's team. Still, it is hard to argue that more college scholarships don't have any effect. For instance, it is common for un-touted high school players to become stars in college sports. Fewer males are getting scholarships and fewer are playing college soccer, meaning fewer players with untapped potential will get a chance in college sports.

What about the idea of equal pay for men's and women's World Cup teams? One would think that the relative lack of success in men's soccer is a reason to put in more resources, not less. That is what happened in Olympic basketball when the American team was defeated. The Dream Team being part of that solution. Of course, the same logic could be used with other countries being more competitive with the American women's soccer team. Here though is my question. Is there any place in sports in this country, where any group gets equal pay, without equal performance besides women's sports? Or for that matter, equal pay for less work, which happens in major tennis championships? If you have an example, please write in and let me know.

PUA – Thy Frame is Lame

Late-Stage Feminism and the Rise of the PUA

August 28, 2021 | by Jack Masterson | Link | Original Link

This is a response to Paul Elam's recent discussion about Pick Up Artists (PUAs). [1] Paul did a great job of explaining why the sophomoric theories and schemes of PUAs are not appreciated by self-respecting men. Paul also briefly discussed MGTOW, but much more can be said about the societal conditions that led to MGTOW and ultimately to the rise of the PUA.

We can think of MGTOW and PUAs as two different strategies that men have used to survive in a hyper-feminized culture and legal system. I would say that the first two to three decades of feminism led to MGTOW, a situation where men have dropped out of the dating culture, and in some cases they have dropped out of the overall culture all together. But MGTOW is just one domino in a series of events that were triggered when the society became fully feminized. The dating vacuum left behind by MGTOW has created new sociological and psychological problems. Manipulators, opportunists and predators are rewarded for their behavior in this environment. In a normal society, such rejects and undesirables would be weeded out by natural selection. But natural selection fails in the unnatural feminized culture. In other words, feminism has indirectly led to a thriving PUA culture.

Approximately 20 years ago, I was walking down the street in a small American city and as I passed by a small group of twenty-somethings, I overheard one of the women casually, and with a noticeable air of frustration, ask her friend, "How come guys don't ask girls out anymore?" I only glanced at her (she was quite cute) and I kept walking. That was some time around the year 2000. But at least a few women were aware of this societal problem years earlier than that.

In 1993, a Canadian woman named Alana who had never had a boyfriend, let alone sex, even though she had always wanted to date, started a movement to unite people who wanted a sex life but never succeeded in finding one. Her movement [2], of course, was quickly rebranded by the media as a misogynist movement of angry, sexually frustrated males. But it was actually started by a woman. Alana's website from 1993, which was taken down years ago, proves that women have known for about 30 years that the dating culture has collapsed.

Because of the ways girls and women are cultured to think, they invent their own convenient explanations for why men never ask them out. Many of these explanations are propagated by the media. We've all heard these absurdities many times. Men are afraid of rejection. All men are assholes. Men are intimidated by smart women. Men are intimidated by attractive women. Men were spoiled by their mothers. Men have no balls. [3] Women complain about their dearth of boyfriends, but they never see it as a problem they have the ability, or even the responsibility, to solve.

That brings up a question that has become a joke on many men's forums: Where are all the good men? Men find humor in that question because the good men never went anywhere. Women are surrounded by good men. They are the guys that women notice in the supermarkets, at a pub enjoying a fine malted beverage, driving in their cars, jogging on trails, lifting weights at the gym, etc. Occasionally, a woman might build up the courage to send one of those men an awkward smile from across a room, or that bewildered female gaze. But the men rarely ask the women out anymore.

The reasons that so few men ask women out have been written about extensively. Legalized abortion empowers women to terminate the life of a man's child without his consent. Child custody and child support laws empower women to separate children from their fathers, often for no other reason than vindictiveness, and they can even profit from doing it. Divorce and alimony laws encourage women to loot from their own marriages. The MeToo movement essentially legalized false accusations, making any contact with a woman a potential felony. And those are just some of the problems caused by the feminized legal system. The culture itself demonizes men as toxic, misogynist, inept and angry. It doesn't feel socially acceptable, or even legal, to exist as a male anymore. So the trade-offs for participating in the dating culture are not worth it for most men. The risks outweigh any potential rewards.

Women know all of this, but they don't organize movements to remove any of those legal weapons from their arsenal. Instead, individual women promise not to use any of the cultural and legal tools at their disposal to destroy a man's life. Women fail, or refuse, to realize that their promises are worthless in today's dating culture. Statements made outside of courtrooms are not legally binding, including sexual consent. It seems suspicious that an entire society of women would need laws in place that almost all of them swear they would never use, and most men are not buying it anymore. Until actual laws and the culture change, all those good men will remain on the sidelines, watching and waiting.

Where does this leave women? If women don't want to start asking men out, which most of them don't feel comfortable doing anyway, then the men who are still willing to ask women out will be the only men that women have to choose from. Over the last several decades, a large and growing percentage of available men have been PUAs. They are the classic narcissists who fancy themselves to be alpha males (if such a thing even exists in humans) and they use their grandiose self-image as a defense mechanism to suppress their own feelings of inadequacy. In order to prevent the resurfacing of their personal insecurities, they convince themselves that every woman wants them and every man envies them. In his discussion, Paul pointed out that everything a PUA thinks is governed by his dick. I would go one step further than that. PUAs use sex to gauge their own standing in the social hierarchy. In that sense, a PUA becomes the personification of his own penis. Whereas he reduces women to nothing more than ass (not even a whole ass, but just a piece of ass), he also reduces himself to nothing more than a dick. These men make us all look bad, hence women's false belief that all men are assholes. It isn't that all men are assholes; it's just that all (or most) of the men who still ask women out are assholes. The quantity and quality of men available to women are diminishing.

PUAs use the ambiguously defined concept of frame control to educate other men on how they too can reduce themselves to nothing more than a dick, assuming that all men are aspiring PUAs. Frame control is just another term for plain old interpersonal politics. Women play the frame game too, but they do it in more passive and covert ways. These games have escalated into something that seems more like war, with women claiming collective victimhood in order to persuade legislators to arm them with more powerful weapons they can use to destroy men's lives.

When relations between men and women turn to war, the nicest guys refuse to fight. They walk off the battlefield, deserters, MGTOW. With the nice guys conveniently out of the way, pathological men crawl out from the psychotic underworld to exploit the blighted dating culture. Like pathogens that invade a malnourished body, PUAs are symptoms of a severely diseased and malignant society. These men would never be able to compete in a healthy dating culture. But in a diseased culture, they flourish.

We are several generations into this now. Like Afghanistan, where the last two or three generations of people have never witnessed peace, the last two or three generations of Americans have never witnessed a healthy dating culture. Whereas Afghanistan has been called the Graveyard of Empires, the US could be called the Graveyard of Relationships.

Paul made another significant point in his discussion. Most good men who have gone their own way for the duration of this unhealthy period in our culture's history do intend, or at least hope, to live long enough to see a dating culture that they might feel comfortable participating in again. MGTOW is a temporary situation for most of them. While the PUAs seem to think that random sex for the sake of sex is a huge leap in human evolution, I'm sure the vast majority of men would prefer deeper relationships with women than just sex, but it would have to be free from legal threats and cultural condescension.

If you want more sex and better sex, you'll seek a long term relationship with a mature, intelligent and psychologically stable woman, if you can still find one of those in this society. If you combine all of that great sex with real romance, an emotional and intellectual connection and all that comes with it, you'll have the best of all worlds. You won't find that by gravitating toward the hookup chicks, the so-called Tinderellas or the women who entice men with exhibitionism. But it will take major changes to our legal system, culture and politics before the American dating culture returns to any semblance of normalcy, and women will need to make an effort if we are to achieve that goal. There are anti-feminist women out there, but there aren't many counter-feminist women. In other words, plenty of women are willing to denounce feminism for the problems it has caused in their own lives, but not many women are willing to actively fight against it. In order to actually solve these cultural problems, women would have to organize to change the legal and institutional problems that feminism has caused. Only women can change those things; men have been too discredited and marginalized to make a difference anymore. The fact that women are finally admitting that the status quo is not going to be sustainable for them much longer [4] is a step in the right direction. But statements and promises will not be enough. Actions speak louder than words.

Southern Oscillation

August 30, 2021 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The phrase Southern Oscillation may not be familiar to many, especially those outside Australia. The Southern Oscillation is an atmospheric phenomenon in the South Pacific Ocean connected to the better-known El Niño. When the El Niño-Southern Oscillation is occurring Australia gets dryer while South America gets wetter. Both areas often suffer natural disasters – drought and severe bushfires in Australia, floods in South America.

Australia recently experienced a Southern oscillation the weather bureau wasn't expecting. As is widely known, Lauren Southern now resides in Australia. After retiring from public life in 2019 she re-emerged in 2020. On 16 August 2021 Southern had this to say on Twitter:

> Can't stand most of the manosphere. Why? Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt and got to know the community, and it's rotten inside and out.
> Get out while you can. Save yourselves young men – criticizing feminism is perfectly fine. You can do that without hating women.

While it is true that she said most of the manosphere she also said it's rotten inside and out. As Peter Wright has noted "The Free Dictionary" defines this phrase to mean:

> Thoroughly; down to the last detail.

Sydney Watson went on to respond:

> Yep. This about sums it up.
>
> It's on the same level as radical feminism.

And then Daisy Cousens followed up with:

> Agree entirely with you both. I went to war with the manosphere a couple of years ago; they are the most virulently vile, deluded, bitter people I have ever come across. Right up there with contemporary feminists, plus rape threats.

I find this personally disappointing because I spoke at an event organised by Watson, the March for Men in Melbourne, Australia on 25 August 2018 and Cousens attended ICMI17.

While I'm disappointed I can't say I'm surprised. This has been a long time coming.

Many people looking in from the outside fail to appreciate the breadth of views and outlooks that are under the umbrella of anti-feminism. Anti-feminism covers from the men's rights movement to traditional gynocentrism and everything in between. As such anti-feminists may all agree on the problems with feminism but not much else. In particular there are widely varying views about the direction a post-feminist society should take.

Traditonal gynocentrists generally want to return to what they described as a traditional lifestyle. The lifestyle they seek seems to so often involve lunch with the girls, a spot of tennis and some housework if the maid can't make it that week. This was not, in fact, a tradional lifestyle as most people would have recognised it in the past. Historically most women worked. So did most men and most children. The alternative was starvation or destitution. Only recently has society become wealthy enough to allow for many people to not work. In the 19th century children began leaving the workforce. Then women began to leave the workforce. Men never had that opportunity, and among poorer families women generally continued to work as well. The traditional lifestyle desired by these tradgyns was largely the privilege of women of the upper middle class and the wealthy in Western society.

Most MRAs don't wan't the future of the feminists or a return to the idealised past of the tradgyns. We want a new way forward. A future where we see true social and legal equality for men and women. A future where all adults bear the cost of protecting their society should it become necessary. The future that many feminists always claimed they wanted, but didn't really.

For years a tentative alliance between men's rights and the tradgyns held. There is a well known but ancient proverb: The enemy of my enemy is my friend. Most people on both sides probably saw it as a temporarily alliance of convenience. And it served its purpose. But for a few years now it has been clear that it was coming to an end. It is natural that as feminism continues to decline the differences between men's rights and traditional gynocentrism would become more apparent.

Southern, Watson and Cousens must be sufficiently well informed to understand the correct meaning of manosphere. The manosphere is a term applied to a variety of movements involving men or focussed on men's issues. In general participants in the various movements agree on the problems facing men and boys but disagree on how (or even if) they should be addressed.

We cannot just assume that Southern, Watson and Cousens were painting with too broad a brush. It is clear that they knew what they were saying.

It must then be clear that to speak of the manosphere in the manner that they did is to besmirching a huge number of people who just want a better future for themselves and for society.

Every movement has its extremists. The real test is how movements deal with them. We push our extremists to the side while far too many movements allow theirs to take centre stage.

Rather than hating women we have many women within the men's rights movement. You can see women in leadership positions and featuring among speakers at ICMIs. I personally invited Watson and Cousens to speak at both ICMI20 and ICMI21. I didn't get so much as a response from either of them. Vile indeed.

Every Southern Oscillation passes with time. The future is bright for men's rights as we slowly but surely chip away at the monolith of gynocentrism. I repredict a very different future for those that would throw us under a bus today. Beauty fades and with it attention. In the end only ideas survive.

By now most readers of AVfM will have watched Vernon Meig's video on the topic. Vernon invited me to participate in his video. I want to thank Vernon for inviting me to participate. Alas circumstances did not allow, so an article will have to do.

Letter to Washington Post on ‘The Wage Gap’

September 3, 2021 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

A Letter to Washington Post Work Advice Columnist Karla L. Miller
About Recent Columns About “Underpaid Female Lifeguard”

I sent the following open letter to Ms. Miller to allow for her to respond before I submitted this to A Voice for Men. Not totally surprising, she didn’t reply.

Dear Ms. Miller,

I often read your Work Advice column in the Washington Post, and I respect and normally agree with the excellent advice you give your readers.

However, I take exception to the two recent columns about a female lifeguard who claims that she was being paid less than male lifeguards (“Female teen lifeguard questions why male teen guards are being paid more for the same job”, July 29, and “Female teen lifeguard protesting unequal pay finds support”, August 5).

As many readers submitted comments about their own “wage gap” experiences, please allow me to share one of mine.

I was also a lifeguard, and in the mid-1970’s was promoted to manage a pool in Northern Virginia, along with a female, who was hired as my assistant manager. As a manager, I was to be paid more, although our hours and responsibilities were to be “essentially the same”.

I felt that the pay difference was unfair and asked the pool company to split the difference between my co-manager and myself. I was told that I was “being naïve” and that their system couldn’t handle this change. I reluctantly accepted this answer and received the higher pay.

But it soon dawned upon me that I had indeed been naïve, that the difference in pay was justified. That difference was based on a higher level of responsibility. I was ultimately responsible for daily operations at the pool; my co-manager was only responsible on my day off. I was responsible for maintaining the pool's filtering and chlorination systems. My co-manager never worked on these systems – she admitted that she "didn't understand them" and was more than happy to let me handle them.

Perhaps the male lifeguards in your article had more responsibility, like my experience? Could other factors be involved? The EEOC attorney from the first article said that the legal case couldn't be determined without knowing all the details. To your credit, you even wrote that "…maybe it had nothing to do with bias" and pointed out that perhaps the boys, who were hired later, got the higher wage as a bid by the company to attract more candidates.

But despite your acknowledgement that other factors could be at play, the underlying theme of these two articles is that a gender wage gap exists and is often – or even usually – responsible for differences in pay between men and women.

I would appreciate your taking time to reexamine your belief in – and continued propagation of – the existence of the gender wage gap. At best, this wage gap is provably a calculated misrepresentation of basic facts; at worst, it is a bald-faced lie, a gender-partisan generated fiction that proves the old adage that "figures don't lie, but liars figure". Please consider the following:

- In 2009 the U.S. Department of Labor produced a report, An Analysis of the Reasons for the Disparity in Wages Between Men and Women – Final Report which said,

"… the raw wage gap [between men and women] continues to be used in misleading ways [emphasis added] to advance public policy agendas without fully explaining the reasons behind the gap."

Isn't the phrase "u*sed in misleading ways*" just a polite way of saying "they're lying"?

- A head-turning example of the wage gap misrepresentation can be found on State of the Gender Pay Gap in 2021 web page of the online salary, benefits, and compensation company, PayScale. This page presents information about two wage gaps!
    - An "uncontrolled gender pay gap that takes the ratio of the median earnings of women to men without controlling for various compensable factors (emphasis added) … In 2021, women make only $0.82 for every dollar a man makes…".

This is the misleading wage gap that we've all been led to believe is true.

    - A "controlled gender pay gap that controls for job title, years of > experience, education, industry, location, and other compensable factors (emphasis added), measures equal pay for equal work. … Women in the controlled group make $0.98 for every $1.00 a man makes (emphasis added)."

This is the wage gap that gender partisans want to pretend doesn't exist.

- Please review – or better yet, take the time to read! – a well-researched book by Warren Farrell, a former board member of the New York City chapter of the National Organization for Women. His book, "Why Men Earn More: The Startling Truth Behind the Pay Gap—and What Women Can Do About It" provides a detailed analysis and thorough explanation about the real reasons for the wage gap. A huge part of it is the choices that women make! Farrell argues that:

"…bias-based unequal pay for women is largely a myth, and that women are most often paid less than men not because they are discriminated against, but because they have made lifestyle choices that affect their ability to earn. … [and] while discrimination sometimes plays a part, both men and women unconsciously make trade-offs that affect how much they earn. [He] defines 25 different workplace choices that affect women's and men's incomes – including putting in more hours at work, taking riskier jobs or more hazardous assignments, being willing to change location, and training for technical jobs that involve less people contact."

- Megan Rapinoe and U.S. women's soccer team's claim of "wage discrimination" is a case that proves Farrell's argument that the choices that women make impacts their income.

Although they wish to ignore it, the women's soccer team is potentially paid less because the team deliberately chose a different pay structure, one that forgoes bonuses for benefits! U.S. District Judge R. Gary Klausner dismissed the women players' pay discrimination lawsuit because they had rejected being paid using the same structure as the men's team:

"The WNT [Women's National Team] was willing to forgo higher bonuses for benefits, such as greater base compensation and the guarantee of a higher number of contracted players," Klausner wrote in his ruling. "Accordingly, plaintiffs cannot now retroactively deem their CBA (collective bargaining agreement) worse than the MNT (men's national team) CBA by reference to what they would have made had they been paid under the MNT's pay-to-play terms structure when they themselves rejected such a structure."

If the WNT truly wants full pay equity, why don't they instead sue for the end all sex discrimination in the sport by establishing a single national team comprised of the best male and female players? Although they'd be loath to admit it, they know it's because the mixed-sex team would most assuredly be almost 100% male.

And this recognition is ultimately why the men are usually paid more: they're bigger, stronger, and faster than the women players. They're far better at the sport, and this in turn is why many more people watch men's soccer than women's. Also, many more men than women like to watch sports of all types.

But even more galling about the WNT suing over wage discrimination is the fact that the women's team actually earns more than the men's team! According to this article,

"…the Women's National Team earned approximately $24 million overall; the Men's National Team earned only $18 million. The average take per game was $220,747 for the women's team, compared to $212,639 for the men's team. And while the individual female plaintiffs made an average of $11,356 to $17,416 per game, the four highest-paid male players made an average of $10,360 to $13,964 per game."

This, then, is the power of the wage gap myth: even when women actually earn more than men, they are so completely convinced that they're victims of wage discrimination, they completely blind themselves to the inconvenient facts that prove otherwise. As the article says in conclusion: "But don't let Megan Rapinoe fool you: A victim of sex discrimination, she is not."

- Finally, these women are being gender-biased hypocrites when they complain about women being paid less but are completely blind to situations where men are paid less – sometimes FAR less!

The most egregious example is the huge pay disparity between male and female models in the fashion industry. According to this article on the Time website,

"The [modeling] industry's pay gap has been documented before, with Fortune reporting that the top female models bring home millions more dollars than men. For instance, Gisele Bündchen, the highest earning female model, brought home $42 million in 2013, per Forbes, while the top earning male model, Sean O'Pry, only took home $1.5 million that year."

So, the top female model takes home a whopping $40.5 MILLION more than the top male model. This is 28 times as much! Why aren't women complaining about this wage gap?

Kind of makes Megan Rapinoe and her teammates' "wage discrimination" pale in comparison, doesn't it?

If the wage gap had been an issue back in the 1970s when I asked for "equal pay", I don't believe that I had heard of it, so my request to share the differences in pay was only for "basic fairness" and had nothing to do with the fact that my co-manager was female.

In the same spirit of "basic fairness", Ms. Miller, I ask that you accept this letter with an open mind, review the facts, and help to set the record straight. You could start with a column that admits the truth about the myth of the wage gap.

Do you have the courage to write such a column?

The Old Goose And Gander Routine

September 5, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

> "When a man falls in love, it is a completely new experience, but for a woman it is an additional experience to those she has already had.
> F. Scott Fitzgerald

I am always amused by egalitarians who decry double standards whenever some sort of standard is upheld for one sex but not the other. You know what they say: What's good for the goose is good for the gander. I know that two sexes/two standards sounds incredibly passé, but throughout history almost all cultures have upheld that duality. Only modern, progressive cultures think they have evolved beyond such antediluvian nonsense.

Predictably, when a 2016 University of Utah study dealt with whether or not the number of premarital sex partners had any effect on the divorce rate, the researchers had to tread carefully when interpreting the results.

In a nutshell, the data showed that the least likely women to get divorced were those whose only partner was their husband. Women with more than 10 partners were the most likely. Of course, the slut-shaming stigma reared its ugly head; good modern academics that they are, the researchers remained officially nonjudgmental. During the so-called sexual revolution, one of the selling points of sex before marriage was that it would make for more stable marriages, much like a job applicant with experience is superior to a novice. In other words, sexual overachievement wasn't mere hedonism or self-indulgence, it was the relationship equivalent of a training bra!

Keeping in mind the Fitzgerald quote above, let's take a look at a hypothetical modern woman who has had ten sex partners before finally embarking on marriage. For the sake of argument, let's assume that the guy she has finally cast her lot with is the equivalent of a Solid B student. In other words, more plus than minus in all areas but not outstanding in any one area. Such a partner would seem likely to meet with the approval of most women…or would he? As a package deal, he may be better than any of his predecessors, but that doesn't mean he's in like Flynn. Paraphrasing Orwell in Animal Farm, all significant others are equal but some are more equal – in other words, more significant – that others.

Let's assume that Boyfriend No. 1 (BF1) was a crush, a cute boy-band sort of guy. Due to inexperience, he was no great shakes in the sack, but he was the object of her adolescent hormone spike, so he will never be forgotten. He was not "the one" but he was the first one so he occupies a unique niche. And they called it puppy love.

Next was BF2, a high school football star: an athlete as well as a sexual athlete. His testosterone level was off the charts so the sex was plentiful even though predictable. He was always ready for sex but not really interested in exploring his or her sexuality. BF2 was a meat-and-potatoes kind of guy.

A stark contrast, BF3 was an "intellectual" who introduced her to all sorts of progressive, new ideas…not to mention all sorts of kinky sex acts, not all of which she felt comfortable with. She'd never heard of a blumpkin before, and after she found out what it was, she never wanted to hear of it again. Clearly, BF3's sexual appetites went well beyond meat and potatoes.

BF4 was an artist. He was no poseur, he had real talent. One glance at his portfolio was evidence of that. He was imaginative, perceptive, and sensitive. He opened her eyes to the everyday aesthetics of life. Just one problem: He never had any money.

BF5 was a working-class guy, a more recent iteration of Stanley Kowalski. He was crude and boorish, but in order to show solidarity with the working class she felt she couldn't refuse his advances. Also, there was something about that troglodytic demeanor that attracted her in spite of her better judgment. No doubt BF5 gave her the best pounding of her life…but when he wasn't pounding away, he left a lot to be desired.

After BF5, she was ready for a change of pace, so she hooked up with BF6, an MBA student. He was ambitious, he was going places. It was exciting to be with him because he felt the sky was the limit. He was a go-getter, he had real drive, he was a take-charge kinda guy. Much to her surprise, she enjoyed having a man make decisions for her. She knew it went against all her feminist training, but she had never felt less stressed.

BF7 was a bit of a dandy, always impeccably groomed and his apartment looked like something out of Architectural Digest. Then she found out he was a bisexual – not that there's anything wrong with that – but for some strange reason they seemed to drift apart after she witnessed him engaging in oral copulation with the creative director of the advertising agency where she was employed.

BF8 was a mature man – some fifteen years her senior – but he was well established in his profession and had a healthy income and an impressive investment portfolio. He was middle aged and he spent long hours at work, so the sex wasn't as frequent or as passionate as in her previous relationships, but there was no question that he was a finished product, set in his ways but no full-blown fuddy-duddy. The big plus was he offered more financial security than any of her previous BFs.

BF9 was a single dad. He never said anything bad about his ex and he was admirably devoted to his kids. He made the most of every moment he spent with them. This attentiveness was admirable, but it didn't leave much time for her on weekends. Not that she begrudged his kids the time he spent with them, but there was no question who came first.

BF10's idea of a good time was spending an afternoon at Home Depot. It was certainly nice to have a boyfriend who knew how to do repairs and remodeling projects. Those were certainly good skills for a prospective husband but she wasn't sure if BF10 had anything else going for him. Not only was his garage overflowing with power tools, his house looked like a hardware store. Better to hire him than marry him.

Well, we could throw in a few more BFs, but you get the idea. Besides we have now reached double digits and I'm fresh out of stereotypes.

So our heroine, just as she's about to hit the wall, has decided to tie the knot with an age-appropriate man, the aforementioned B student, with a background similar to hers (just for grins and giggles, let's call them Barbie and Ken). Yes, at long last, Barbie's settling down but she's not really settling…or is she? Barbie is well aware that this could be her last dance. If Ken doesn't work out, she may be too old to attract any more partners…unless Mattel wants to market a "Cougar Barbie" to the kiddos.

So Ken makes an honest woman (don't even think about uttering that phrase today) out of Barbie. At first all goes well, but inevitably the honeymoon comes to an end. Barbie can't help but compare Ken to her former beaus. Sadly, he is found wanting in many areas.

Of course, BF1 could never be duplicated any more than she could return to her newby nubile teen years. Like they say, you never forget your first. By definition, Ken can't compete with that so she doesn't hold that against him…but she can't help but wonder what BF1 is like now that he's grown up.

In terms of sheer physical fitness, BF2 was the best of the bunch. He was undoubtedly the most physically masculine (though she hated to use that word) man she had known. Ken is no fitness buff but he hasn't exactly let himself go. Nevertheless, she thinks she has detected an incipient paunch, and it wouldn't hurt him to get a gym membership.

BF3 was a good conversationalist, though he was something of a know-it-all. Maybe he knew what he was talking about, maybe he didn't. He was a poli sci major so he kept up with current issues and had opinions on all of them. Ken isn't stupid but he just doesn't keep up with the news and has no interest in intellectual pursuits. She wouldn't go so far as to call him a Philistine but…

She didn't blame Ken because, unlike BF4, he had no artistic talent. You either have it or you don't. But there was more to it than that. Ken didn't seem to have any appreciation for the arts. In fact, during one argument, he even belittled her art history degree. He had apologized for that, but she didn't know if she could ever forgive much less forget. What was so wonderful about that engineering degree Ken earned? I mean, aside from the fact that it all but guaranteed him employment and a decent paycheck.

BF5 had a rare sort of animal magnetism that went beyond the physical. His mere presence sent a jolt through her nervous system. It was a combination of fear and attraction, approach and avoidance. She always had to tread lightly because anything might set him off and he seemed capable of anything. She was always on edge in his presence but that frisson held an odd appeal for her. Ken was nowhere near as volatile, but she didn't feel that tingle in his presence.

BF6 was incredibly ambitious and long after they broke up, she can't help but wonder if he realized his ambitions. Ken was hardly a slacker, but he just didn't have that same drive. Truth to tell, he was a bit of a plodder, the sort of guy who might get the occasional promotion at work but will never rise to the top of the heap. Mid-level management at best. She hated to admit it, but she had classified him as a beta male…but hadn't she told herself she wasn't settling?

Barbie always loved going shopping with BF7. His fashion sense was spot on and he always took pride in his appearance. She wouldn't go so far as to call Ken a slob, but he just didn't seem to care what he wore, though he always dressed appropriately. He had zero interest in fashion; he just bought items off the rack without even trying them on to see how they looked. And as for the house…he didn't seem to care about the furniture so long as it was comfortable. He cared not at all for the color or pattern of the living room carpet or the wall hangings. As long as the floors and walls weren't bare, he was content.

Barbie had always felt safe with BF8. He was solid. Life with him would have been secure and serene. Ken wasn't terribly different personality-wise, but he hadn't had as much time to establish himself in his profession. In fact, paying back his college loans still took up a sizable chunk of Ken's net income. BF8 was long past that. She realized that if she had married BF8 and he died suddenly, she would be well taken care of. She couldn't say the same for Ken.

BF9 clearly loved kids. She wasn't sure about Ken. He seemed to get along OK with her nephews and nieces, but she wasn't sure how he felt about having children of his own. He never said he didn't want children but he didn't seem overly enthusiastic about it either. They say that men change after they become fathers, but she couldn't help but wonder if Ken might be an exception.

BF10 had his shortcomings, but he was certainly a handy guy to have around. By contrast, Ken didn't take much interest in her ideas for remodeling. She suspected that he could have lived in a cave and been happy. Whenever she suggested some sort of project around the house, the only thing he wanted to know was how much it would cost.

So now you can readily appreciate Ken's no-win situation. The more old boyfriends a woman has, the more her current partner – solid B student that he is – has to compete with. Granted, a lot of her previous boyfriends got gentlemen's C's in most areas and some even earned an F in others…but there was always one trait where each of them earned an A, something that Ken has never done. He may be a thoroughly functional adult male, but there are categories where he doesn't measure up to her previous partners.

But what about Ken and his previous girlfriends? He wasn't living in a monastery before he met Barbie. This relationship isn't his first rodeo. Yessiree, this buckaroo's been in the saddle before. So does he compare Barbie to his old flames and find her wanting in some areas?

Maybe, maybe not. But he doesn't second-guess himself. Thinking back over old girlfriends he has some fond memories but that's all they are. He doesn't fantasize about what life would be like if he had married one of them. Unlike Barbie, he doesn't pose the "what if" question vis-à-vis his former flames. Like Barbie, he remembers his first. She was the class pig, however, so he doesn't have any fond memories of her. Any orifice in a hormone storm.

Ken certainly remembers which one was the best lay…seemed to verify the maxim that the best screwing you'll ever get is with a girl who has a few screws loose. But no way you'd want to put up with a screwball for the rest of your life.

Then there was the small-town girl, the semi-feminist, the bohemian babe, Xena (his nickname) the social justice warrior, and a few others who'd come and gone…but that was then, Barbie is now. He doesn't regret ending any of his previous relationships. In some areas Barbie may not be a match for her predecessors but she'll do. (Truth to tell, he misses good old whatshername – was she GF5 or GF6?—who was a helluva good cook.) At any rate, Ken isn't lying awake nights thinking about it all.

Of course, a man has the luxury of not being criticized for marrying beneath himself. That thought haunts almost every married woman above the level of working class. After pondering the issue, she may conclude that she deserves better and may come to resent the man she married because she didn't do better. It's called entitlement.

A man may offer an opinion on which restaurant has the best pizza/BarBQ/TexMex in town, but a hungry man eats the meal that has been set before him. Unless he is a restaurant critic, he doesn't compare it to every other meal he has eaten. In Fitzgerald's words, each man's meal (relationship) is a completely new experience, whole in and of itself, not just the latest in a series.

A woman on the verge of hitting the wall must live with the knowledge that the latest man in her life may well be the last man. Would BF No. 5 have been the better choice? Or BF8? Or none of the above – the old maid option…though she never liked that term. She had once toyed with the idea of single motherhood via a sperm donor. Maybe she should have followed through with that.

Obviously, the one-man woman isn't burdened with these self-doubts. She doesn't know what she's missing, so she has no basis for comparison. Of course, those bad old traditional patriarchal cultures "oppress" women by safeguarding their virginity. Somehow, without any guidance from sociology or anthropology Ph.D.s, they figured out that the stability of their society depends on the stability of their families. Yes, somewhere back in the ancient mists of prehistory, tribes figured out that the emancipation of women would result in family instability, which would result in tribal instability, and eventuate in tribal suicide. Of course, our ancient forebears had one big advantage over us: They weren't hobbled by concepts of romance or equity. They were motivated by survival.

Fitzgerald's comment on the goose/gander controversy was quoted towards the end of his life. He was only married once and his wife Zelda – a real nutter – was only 19 when they wed, so she likely had no previous partners to compare to her husband. So Fitzgerald's maxim must be based on observation not personal experience.

These days, however, the average age of first marriage keeps going up while the average age of first sexual experience keeps going down, creating more and more opportunities for all sorts of sexual relationships before marriage. So it behooves the potential bridegroom to carefully consider the sexual career of his betrothed. None of that don't ask, don't tell stuff. Find out all you can! If she plays coy, hire a detective.

In other words, take a gander before you commit lest your goose be cooked.

Please Help Regarding Men become XYCrew!

September 10, 2021 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Regarding Men, which was once a discussion about men, is becoming XY Crew, a service for men. We are now serving hundreds of men, making live, online peer support available 24/7. This is an important first for the Red Pill community. Never before has this kind of live, ongoing support been available to men suffering the effects of parental alienation, acrimonious divorce (and the corrupt family courts that come with it), false accusations, the abusiveness of personality disordered women, or even the isolation that comes with Red Pill awareness and thinking.

From time to time, someone wanders in here and says something like, “All this information is good, but what are you actually doing for men?”

Well, this is the very definition of “doing.” And it is something great. Something real. There’s magic that happens when men gather to share their lived experience, strength, and hope in a supportive, shame-free zone. Healing happens, and forward progress. We’re seeing it every day of the week at XY Crew.

Please consider being a part of this great effort by pitching in a few dollars to our GoFundMe for needed graphics and web development plans. We want to reach as many men as possible, and you can help us with a donation, no matter how small.

Make a real, positive difference in the lives of men right now by following this link to the GoFundMe Page and making your contribution.

When Momma Ain’t Happy

September 14, 2021 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The following is a transcript of my recent talk on YouTube. The video version is embedded below. PE

We’ve all heard it before. When Momma ain’t happy, ain’t nobody happy. It’s an interesting observation that says a lot about the world of men and women, a term undoubtedly coined for its accuracy. And it speaks to one amazingly simple but very dark reality. When women are upset, society considers it normal for them to make the people around them suffer. Take exception to me for saying that if you please. I’ll just refer you back to the term that our society coined. You can argue with it if you want to.

In the closer look, and we like closer looks around here, “When momma ain’t happy, ain’t nobody happy,” implies that the unhappiness will be visited on the family. We are talking about mothers here, the female authority in the family. And when the authorities aren’t happy, their wrath isn’t limited to the man of the house. The children are often also in the line of fire.

And it is not just that we recognize the problem in woman as mothers. “Happy wife, happy life,” ring a bell? Of course, it does. You’ve heard countless blue pill simps utter these words like there was a pull cord in the back of their neck, almost always when there’s a woman in earshot. Once again, I put the term’s literal meaning into non coined verbiage that says the same thing. Happy wife, happy life, implies that any unhappiness a woman experiences in life will result in punishment for her husband or boyfriend. It will result in his life being an unhappy one. Not because he is disturbed by seeing her unhappy, but because his woman sees her bad feelings in life as a license to turn him into her personal emotional garbage can. It would be enough to make you angry at women if you weren’t so aware that these are the values our society instills in them from birth.

This is just part of the social contract that the western world drafted for men and women eons ago. Like it or not, these are rules implied by default in all human pair bonding. If you want that to be different in your life, it most likely means you have to pretty much create a new contract from scratch, and then teach any possible love interests to read Greek.

Meanwhile, this blue pill arrangement forms a baseline condition of constant, unaddressed relationship stress. It’s a lifestyle for many men of swallowed pride, stuffed anger and walking on eggshells. These men, which I argue are most men in monogamous relationships, maintain a hypervigilant existence, constantly monitoring their woman’s moods, which can swing like Duke Ellington. They are driven to live in and accept this kind of relationship hell because their whole lives they’ve been told the same thing women have; that this is normal. It just comes with the territory. Better to keep her happy, even if it doesn’t appear possible. Happy wife, happy life! Sheesh. Is it any wonder women outlive us?

Just take a moment to consider these guidelines, these dysfunctional expectations, which are so commonly accepted we coin terms about them.

And as I see things through my personal red pill lens, the only thing worse than these perverted rules are the men who abide by them religiously. They turn personal humiliation into a source of pride. Perhaps it's the only way they can live with themselves. By leaning into the pathetic delusion. They preen and boast of their subservience. They speak at once with the tone of quislings seeking the approval of their betters, and as though they possess some form of special wisdom reserved for men just like them. No woman of theirs, by god, will ever be uncomfortable for a moment, no sir. That's their ethos and they are giddy with self-approval over it. In some sick corner of their twisted little minds, they believe that failure to make a woman happy should, at the very least, result in emotional and psychological abuse. It's a strange, and I think disturbing thing to brag about, especially when watching these men model this vomit-worthy simping in front of their children.

And to me, this is, to the very core what being red pilled is about, at least as red pills apply to relationships. Red pills are the rejection of toxic femininity and all the dysfunctional mandates that come with it. It may sound simple, but it's a subject so dangerous to discuss that the only way most people can cope with it is to treat it with humor.

They laugh instead of crying, and instead of pushing back, and instead of challenging mothers to expect better of themselves than to abuse the very people whom they claim to love most. They laugh because dealing with the problem honestly would prompt more of what they fear most: women's abusive wrath.

So, they opt to handle all toxically feminine characteristics the same way. By going full on simp, or by putting their heads in the sand. And as funny as they look in that position, they don't seem to notice that their asses are exposed.

I've referred here to mothers here as authority figures in the family. I wasn't implying that they were THE authority figures, but even in families with extraordinarily strong male figures, women still have a great deal of authority in the home as mother's and/or spouses. It would be of great benefit to a lot more families if they wielded that authority less recklessly. Getting there, however, is a formidable challenge in a society that values toxicity in wives and mothers and never holds them to any meaningful moral restraint. That doesn't just embolden bad women, it convinces them their abuses are righteous.

Most men will never raise their voice about that, though. They are too busy walking on eggshells and sticking their heads in the sand. When they get the ass-plowing they're inviting into their lives, they just shove their heads in deeper, muffling their cries of anguish; a limp, tears in the pillow buttfuck in front of the entire world.

Then, when it all comes crashing down, some of them email me with a story I've heard 10,000 times, demanding I drop everything I am doing and dedicate my life to fighting for their case. I digress a bit with that, but it still speaks to the point. It is the weakness of men that enables this bullshit.

All this goes on, day after day, decade after decade, because men value women more than they value themselves. Scratch that. More than they value anything and everything. And because so many women are more than content to enjoy that kind of tyrannical power in life.

I find it amusing, in a twisted kind of way, that we have such a robust, widely accepted narrative of women as powerless; as oppressed, as victims. That narrative is a complete lie, of course, joining the ranks of all the other lies that the masses accept as truth about women.

Women wield enormous power, especially in the family. Power over men. Power over children. And I am not even talking about the undue power the state gives them. Women have, directly because of the interpersonal power men put in their hands, the sole ability to make or break most any relationship. The fact that they lean so hard toward using that power destructively is the topic for another talk.

Suffice it to say for now though, that the onus on this, as it always does, comes back to men. Why? Because men have great power, too. Expansive, sweeping power. Power that eclipses the power of exploitive, blue pill femininity a thousand-fold. They've just been trained to abstain from using it. Or shamed, rather, to use the correct verb.

And this is where our two terms pointing to women's abusive control of relationships can serve a larger purpose. Viewed through the red pill lens, these are not just cutesy figures of speech designed to elicit knowing, acquiescent chuckles from a society that pedestalizes abusive women. These two terms, and the inferences we can be drawn from them, are a sterling opportunity for screening out female losers quickly and efficiently.

If you are one of the scores of red pill men out there still interested some form of long-term relationships, this is an area of great opportunity. For in the end, isn't it true that you'd prefer a woman who is able to not only see the sickness these terms represent in affairs between the sexes, but one who is disinclined to embrace that sickness? Or, and I should make no bones about saying this, a woman who can be trained to reject the mentality that accepts such a twisted social contract?

I submit to you, dear listener, that her inclination to get on the same page as you about this matter can be sorted out in short order. Ask her what she thinks about the terms when momma ain't happy ain't nobody happy, and happy wife, happy life. Listen to what she says, carefully, and then let her know that you see this as evidence of a society that normalizes female abusiveness, and then listen to her again, even more carefully. Press her for thoughtful answers, politely challenge her thinking where indicated. And again, listen to her. Listen, listen, listen. She will, whether she knows it or not, be telling you everything about her you need to know.

Importantly, inform her that you see these things as the sick rules they are, and that when it comes to living by them you are not that guy. Heck, have her listen to this talk. Indeed, I heartily suggest, with a complete lack of humility, that my work is the definitive screening tool for whether a woman may be worth investing in to begin with. Start with the Red Pill movie and then send her to my talks.

And of course, this kind screening will weed out 95+% of your candidates, or roughly the same percentage of women not worth any investment anyway. I don't think that's a coincidence.

The point is that if you're red pill, and you want a relationship with a woman, then there is no way to avoid putting these topics on the table for full examination. You have the choice, though, to get it all on the table early, and have it present itself in measured, thoughtful conversation, or later on when it comes out behaviorally, which I do not suggest is a productive path.

Here's the rub. It is undeniable that this you go girl society enables, condones and encourages abusive female control. It is as obvious as stretch marks at slut walk. Yet because of gynocentrism, 95+% of women, and men for that matter, won't be able to see it, ever, no matter what you do. The remaining 5% will only be able to grasp the truth with the help of a mentor.

Your mission, should you choose to accept it, isn't just to be that mentor but to first figure out whether the woman you're interested in is teachable. You just have to be aware enough to discern that and based enough to gleefully 86 all non-hackers.

And that part is easy, too, even if your dick tells you it's a bad idea. Women who passionately, emotionally object to my material are women you can never trust. They are women who want to live by these destructive, sick, terminally dysfunctional rules.

It is easy for me to picture it happening. You settle into the sofa with the woman of your interest to hear some red pill content, and shortly thereafter she is on her feet, informing you that if you buy all this hatred of women when there is, of course, none there, well then, you can just forget about her.

Listen up, men. This isn't a good woman, offended by actual misogyny. She's just another woman on the hostile defensive because she has been called out on her own bullshit. Her ultimatum is informing you that she has no use for a man she can't punish into subservience, just like the world has told her all her life that she can do.

And of course, if you know that and choose to stick around, be my guest. I never pretend to tell another man how to live his life. Just don't hit my inbox with the expectation that it will matter to me when she turns your life upside down. It won't.

I mean, seriously, if we, as men, don't own this shit in life, it will own us. And it does own most men. As for me, I rather like my life rejecting these rules with extreme prejudice. For some odd reason, it makes me like what I see in the mirror a lot more than I did when I used to worry about what made mama unhappy.

And that is it for this talk, gents. As always, I hope you've enjoyed, even if you haven't, and we'll see you next time.

Alive! See A man Shrinking Before Your Very Eyes

September 18, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Long before CGI, humans being menaced by giant creatures they had previously dwarfed had great cinematic allure. In particular, the 1950's were rife with science fiction films involving tiny creatures grown gigantic. To wit:

YEAR	CREATURE(S)	TITLE
1954	Ant	Them!
1956	Tarantula	Tarantula
1957	Scorpion	The Black Scorpion
1957	Grasshopper	Beginning of the End
1957	Praying mantis	The Deadly Mantis
1958	Spider	Earth vs. the Spider
1958	Wasp	Monster From Green Hell
1959	Leech	Attack of the Giant Leeches

Since human disgust with creepy-crawlies appears to be instinctive (consider the Insect Fear Film Festival held every year since 1984 on the campus of the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign), it is only logical that giant creepy-crawlies would send the fear factor into overdrive, thus assuring a B movie bonanza.

Obviously, the aforementioned movies are hardly the stuff of Oscar nominations. But one such movie has achieved a rare status – and it has great implications for the manosphere, even though it came out long before anyone ever heard of the manosphere. In fact, it is a pop cultural touchstone from that dreaded decade of patriarchy – the 1950's!

Perhaps the best known scene in The Incredible Shrinking Man is a battle between the shrunken protagonist and a normal size tarantula; in effect, a giant tarantula. Given its title, the film would certainly look fitting on the marquee of a drive-in theater in 1957, the year of its release. In fact, it could have been offered up in a double feature with a number of other lurid 1957 titles (e.g., I Was a Teenage Werewolf, Attack of the Crab Monsters, The Amazing Colossal Man, and, believe it or not, a proto-female empowerment tale, The Saga of the Viking Women and Their Voyage to the Waters of the Great Sea Serpent).

Despite its title, The Incredible Shrinking Man went from B-movie stigma to A-list status. In 2009 it was inducted into the National Film Registry, a repository for "culturally, historically, or aesthetically" distinguished movies.

Based on "The Shrinking Man," a 1956 story idea by Richard Matheson (who also wrote a novel based on the screenplay, which he co-authored), the film has a deceptively simple concept: Scott Carey (Grant Williams), a normal-sized adult male starts growing smaller. While shrinkage is a longstanding male fear, it is usually restricted to the genitalia. The protagonist of this film grows smaller but his body remains in proportion.

Shrinking humans was not an entirely new cinematic concept (e.g., The Bride of Frankenstein in 1935 and Dr. Cyclops in 1940). After 1957, the shrinking of humans continued in Honey, I Shrunk the Kids (1989) and Downsizing (2017). But once the subjects had shrunk to a certain size, the process stopped. Not so with the 1957 shrinking man. Scott Carey continues shrinking away to…microbe size? Virus size? Molecule size? Atom size? Subatomic particle size?

While atomic radiation was the usual explanation offered for gross size disparities in 50's films, Shrinking Man wisely bypasses this cliché. Rather, Scott Carey starts to get smaller after an encounter with a mysterious fogbank and it is determined that his molecular structure has been rearranged. Actually, the cause really isn't important. It's just a springboard for the plot of the movie, filled with challenges and perils that Scott must face as he grows smaller – not to mention ample opportunities for trick photography.

Scott first notices that his clothing has become baggy – an experience any dieter might welcome – but Scott hasn't been trying to lose weight. He shrinks to the size of a midget, then to the size of a dollhouse occupant, and finally down to the size of a fly, at which point he encounters the predatory tarantula. (Fun fact: Director Jack Arnold had directed Tarantula the year before, so he is likely the only director in cinema history with two movies featuring a giant tarantula!)

Much like The Invasion of the Body Snatchers, another 50's science fiction classic that was inducted into the National Film Registry, the film invites a number of interpretations, and those interpretations may change depending on the era when the viewer sees the film. Consequently, the film has a resonance today that it didn't have when it was first released.

In 1957 contemporaneous interpretations might have been the loss of autonomy in a mass society. Possibly a "shrinking" of rights and freedoms in a society growing more and more oppressive, whether capitalist, fascist, or communist. 1957 was also the year of Sputnik, so the beginning of space exploration might have drawn attention to man's undeniably puny presence in the universe. Then as now, it could be interpreted as a man wasting away while battling a disease with no hope for a cure. One topic that was not hot back then was feminism.

In 1957 Betty Friedan began working on a project that resulted in The Feminine Mystique, eventually published in 1963. So when Shrinking Man arrived on motion picture screens, the second wave of feminism was gestating, but the pregnancy hadn't started to show. It was still OK for a man to be a man, however you interpret that. It may have been a nod to the sacrifices made by World War II vets, or perhaps a realization that prosecuting the cold war necessitated the maintenance of traditional masculinity. At any rate, men and masculinity, in reality or as concepts, were not under siege.

Of course, that started to change during the 1960's. Then it became possible to interpret the shrinking man of the movie as a loss of status vis-à-vis his wife (who becomes relatively larger simply by remaining the same size). Scott's presence in his household shrinks along with his body – as do his place in society and in the world.

Today, as manhood is mocked, as testosterone levels plummet, as calls for equity grow louder and louder, The Incredible Shrinking Man achieves more and more significance. It's not too much of a stretch to add race to the mixture, since Scott, though portrayed as an everyman, is undeniably WASPy.

Oddly enough, this science fiction movie about a man wasting away to nothing could be a nod to existentialism. Sartre's seminal work, Being and Nothingness, could almost be a subtitle for The Incredible Shrinking Man. So could No Exit, a play by the same author. It is entirely possible that Richard Matheson (born in 1926) was familiar with the aforementioned works, as they were written in the early 1940's.

With no hope offered for stopping or reversing the shrinking, the film could have ended on a decidedly downbeat note. Normally, when offered a sympathetic protagonist, viewers expect to see him triumph. Instead, we are given a soliloquy worthy of Hamlet:

> I was continuing to shrink, to become…what? The infinitesimal? What was I? Still a human being? … So close, the infinitesimal and the infinite. But suddenly I knew they were really the two ends of the same concept. The unbelievably small and the unbelievably vast eventually meet, like the closing of a gigantic circle. I > looked up, as if somehow I would grasp the heavens, the universe, worlds beyond number. God's silver tapestry spread across the night. And in that moment I knew the answer to the riddle of the infinite. I had thought in terms of Man's own limited dimension. I had presumed upon Nature. That existence begins and ends is Man's conception, not Nature's. And I felt my body dwindling, melting, becoming nothing. My fears melted away and in their place came acceptance. All this vast majesty of creation, it had to mean something. And then I meant something too. Yes, smaller than the smallest, I meant something too. To God, there is no zero. I still exist.

Well, you can imagine moviegoers at drive-ins scratching their heads in confusion after returning the in-car speaker to its post and driving out of the theater. The usual mainstream movie ends with a restoration of order, no matter how much chaos is portrayed in the film.

A conventional ending for Shrinking Man would have restored Scott to his original size (indeed, such an ending was under serious consideration) yet with having changed for the better after surviving his ordeal. The ending as it stands is a curious one. Scott Carey has survived all the ordeals he faced, but so what? His quasi-religious awakening may offer solace but it won't stop the process. So what's the meaning of the ending for men today?

Let's assume that men are not going to be restored to their rightful place in society any more than the Scott is going to stop shrinking and grow larger. Do men have to accept their situation as inevitable, as Scott does in the final scene? Scott no longer has a place in society but that doesn't mean his life is meaningless. It's not that Scott goes MGTOW – he has no choice. Given the reality of his situation, he might as well commit suicide by tarantula. Yet his will to live has not shrunk. In fact, the smaller he gets, the more gets in touch with his primal instincts, the drive to live, the drive to triumph over adversity. Arguably, he is more alive than he was in his "normal" existence.

So the lesson for men is this: If you don't have a place at the table in society, you still have one at the table of life. And your table setting is secure no matter how big or small you are. So even if you've been dismissed as a misogynistic patriarchal troglodyte – even if you are unvaxxed! – you are still alive.

If you think these are dark days for men, perhaps you can take heart from The Incredible Shrinking Man. No matter what the academics, the mass media, and the government say, as long as you draw breath, you still count for something.

Southern Discomfort

The following is a transcript from my latest video talk. You can view it here. PE

Hey guys, once again it is time for one of our talks. And per the suggestion of one of my patrons, I am going to start addressing an item or items in the current news cycle before this and each of my future talks. I may have a lot to say about some news stories, or less than a lot to say, but I will find something to include each time.

And unless you've been under a rock the past month, you know that the most recent news cycle has been totally dominated by the disappearance and killing of Gabby Petito. Note: this is where I am supposed to chime in with my righteous indignation about what happened to her, virtue signaling till I give myself a hernia; letting my disdain for her killer and my profound sorrow for her family drip off every word I dare to utter. I should wind up and do my best Nancy Grace, cartoonishly waving her journalistic sword as though she was doing anything but playing to her audience with how fabulously moral and compassionate they are.

Sorry, but as much as I would like to, it's hard for me to care. Sure, it's a tragic story, and indeed I do have sympathy for Petito and her family. But it's hard for me to forget that it's always tragic, as long as we're talking about the fate of a pretty, little, blond, white girl. Meanwhile, there's a ton of other suffering in the world, most of it endured by men and boys of all shapes, sizes and colors. And the media, as well as Nancy Grace's fabulously moral and compassionate audience, couldn't care less. Not that I particularly blame them. The media and its consumers, are, after all, just a window into the values of a society. And for all the social justice bravado and inclusivity that this society loves to put on ostentatious display, it's still pretty, little, blond white girls, and only pretty, little, blond white girls, who matter.

And by the way, gents, your red pill community isn't at all immune from any of this. Indeed, all this sappy gushing over a single woman, even if it's old news to the manosphere, provides an appropriate segue into today's talk. Because in the end analysis, even in so-called red pill community, men lose their fucking minds when a pretty, little, blond white girl shows up. Or a brunette, for that matter. Or even a ginger. And she doesn't even have to be pretty, or even, I suppose, little. Because I've seen what happens when women show up in the vicinity of the manosphere, uttering even the most superficial defense of men.

Allegedly red pill men swarm in, gushing validation and admiration as blindly and effusively as any blue pill step and fetch. It's why you're probably familiar with the notion that most red pill men are one blowjob away from being a cuck. And I am here to tell you that it doesn't even take a blow job for most of these guys. The wishful thinking is enough to turn them. That and the purely delusional idea that being an antifeminist is the same thing as being an ally to men and boys. Jesus, how I wish that the bloody thick-skulled among us would figure that one out.

Case in point is Lauren Southern, erstwhile antifeminist warrior who, for a short time, did a lot of high-profile shit-stirring and poking of the feminist beehive. And at that she did a good job, at least until the going got tough. But if you want to find out how she really feels about men, just take a look at how she treats many of them who so fervently supported her work.

Southern recently reflected on her experience with the manosphere when she got on Twitter and lashed out, and I quote, "Can't stand most of the manosphere. Why?" she pretended to ask herself, "Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt and got to know the community, and it's rotten inside and out."

Unsatisfied with simply throwing a blanket of condemnation over an entire community, she goes on to promote a phony threat narrative that would make any feminist proud, advising young men to, and again I quote, "Get out while you can."

"Save yourselves, young men," she pleads, undoubtedly all eaten up with concern about young men. And she adds, in the instructive parlance of an irate librarian, "Criticizing feminism is fine. You can do that without hating women."

Then, as if on cue, Sydney Watson, another antifeminist who is often confused for an ally of men, chimes in, "Yep," she agrees, "this about sums it up. It's on the same level as radical feminism."

"Agree entirely with you both," adds Daisy Cousens, a relative wannabe in the world of privileged, misandric antifeminists. To her credit, Cousens goes where Southern and Watson would like to, but won't. She claims rape threats came with an alleged war she had with the manosphere. That it was a war I never heard of with rape threats she never produced evidence of goes without saying. One more false allegation, Daisy, and you get a GoFundMe, amiright?

With female support like this, who needs Big Red, eh?

Jesus, how to respond to all this nonsense? Well, I will take a shot at it. It's what I do. Links to support that in the description area.

Let me start by saying that if you connect the dots on Southern's squawking about the manosphere, you see that her little mean girl fit was inspired by the idea that most of the men of the manosphere, inside and out according to Southern, hate women. It's a narrative clearly supported by Watson and Cousens as well. I will address that before I am done here, but first I want to give Southern the credit for something she righteously deserves.

Note, once again from her statement, "Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt."

You hear that, guys? She gave you the benefit of the doubt. She set aside the feminist narrative about you that she actually believes, and gave you the chance to redeem yourself in her eyes. You failed. You could have had her approval; the approval of a pretty little, blond, white girl, and you fucked it up. She will never be this magnanimous again. Nor will, I suppose, Watson or Cousens. I'm afraid you've badly disappointed, not once, but thrice.

Congratulations are in order, I suppose, but I have to wonder where I've seen this kind of self-deluding, one way conversation before? Oh yeah, that's right, I've seen it women who create histrionics around a breakup. For that matter, you could replace the word manosphere in Southern's tweet with Bruce or Chad and it would still read pretty much the same. In its fundamental essence, that is all this is. A breakup of sorts. A woman scorned, expressing her dissatisfaction with a public display of rejection, punctuated by a manufactured threat narrative.

And that, dear listeners, is the point of all three tweets. To reject you as unfit, and to paint you as a threat to women.

Allies to men, are they?

Let's take the closer look at what in all likelihood happened. Indeed, I can say that I am 100% convinced that I know exactly what happened. These three women, like all the women whose work and lives overlap at some point with the manosphere, ran into heaps of approval and adoration. The prettier they are, the more approval and adoration they got. In other words, it was pretty much life as usual for pretty little blond white girls where it comes to men.

All that is great, but eventually they also noticed that along with the heaps of approval and adoration from men who approve of and adore pretty much anything female, they also ran into some angry men; men who weren't so approving or adoring. Men who wouldn't hold their tongues. Men who said harsh things and who made no apology for saying harsh things.

Just who were these awful men who weren't approving and adoring? Why were these men spoiling the fun of pretty, little, blond, white girls?

Well, I happen to know who they were. The manosphere is comprised chiefly of men who share common experiences; like being the target of false allegations; like parental alienation and ruinous divorces; men who've had their reputations destroyed and finances eviscerated. Men who have been shackled with real iron and seen their educational future evaporate before their eyes. Men who've had the state plow through their lives like loose topsoil, shredding everything of value. Men with children whose minds have been poisoned against them. Men who have been treated with a level of injustice that would make Kafka cringe.

And sure, almost all this destruction was done by the state. And of course, not all women are like that. But one central, unavoidable truth remains. At the very heart of each one of these stories, some of them every bit as tragic as Gabby Petito, is a woman with a gun in her hand. They state may have put it the gun there under the direction of feminists, but it was in the hands of a woman and she pulled the trigger. At the core of each nightmare was a woman who had the power to destroy a man and used it while women as far as the eye can see cheered her on.

Call me crazy, but my decidedly male brain informs me that these facts might result in men who have some things to talk about, even if it makes women, or anyone else for that matter, uncomfortable. That same male brain also informs me that what they have to say won't always be pleasant. They won't be issuing the approval and adulation their critics so obviously crave.

And when these guys sometimes erupt in their agony, when they become so pressurized from stress that it is vent or explode, the arrogant, privileged likes of Southern, et al, are there to push the knife in a little deeper. For in the final analysis, their reaction to seeing the pain of abused men on full display isn't to try to understand, but to shame and ridicule the disaffected back into silence. You see, dear listener, they don't have to understand anything. That's on you, and it's your goddam job is to candy coat the wreckage of your life so that pretty, little, blond, white girls don't have to show a shred of real humanity.

The gynocentric privilege that drives the likes of Southern, Watson and Cousens is the same gynocentric privilege that drives every garden variety feminist shitbird I ever encountered. In the end, the only thing that separates the now butthurt Southern and your average feminist is 70 pounds and a bottle of pink hair dye, and we'll soon see what the wall does to that equation.

As I often remind you, there are no victims, just volunteers. The fact that these phonies meet with such easy, unearned approval from the manosphere is a much bigger problem than the trivial bullshit they are complaining about from our more damaged members.

If any of them had even an inkling of men's issues, or any real compassion under all that makeup, they'd point to the vocal, angry minority of red pill men and tell the world the truth; that vocal, angry men are what we create when we treat them like garbage. Instead of whining about men who act out some of their pain on a keyboard, they'd be telling the world that when you treat men like monsters, that is exactly what some of them will become.

In other words, they'd have to actually have the capacity to see a bigger picture than their butthurt of the day.

Fat chance.

Instead, they'll default react like children, publicly damseling straight out of the feminist playbook. Watson couldn't be more wrong than if she were leading a slutwalk. She's the one chiming in on a misandric, manufactured threat narrative. The only difference is that feminists are more honest about their indifference to men's pain.

And of course, gynocentrism in the Red Pill community plays the biggest role in this. To understand what I mean, linked below is a critique I did of Christina Hoff Sommers, another so called antifeminist with female privilege issues. Everything I said about Sommers was demonstrably true, including the feminist narrative she furthers that erases men who live below the poverty line, yet check the comments. You'll find enough white knights in there to make a cuck army. It was disappointing but not unexpected.

You know, I do think quite a bit about some of the women who are involved in the men's movement. There are a small handful of very good advocates. I've sometimes put myself in their shoes and wondered how they do it. They experience the same, angry, vocal men that we all see at times on social media.

The answer to that is pretty self-explanatory. Those men's advocates, who I can absolutely count on one hand, see men for what they often are. Men in pain. Men who are frustrated, angry and sometimes desperate. Men on the edge of losing their sanity and indeed their lives.

Because they actually give a shit, knowing that helps them to not take it all personally. They also get the benefit of seeing red pill men after they finally detox from blue pill life and start moving toward self-actualized lives, but that's a subject for another talk.

Look, I don't even know if there is a lesson in this other than the obvious. Being a pretty little blond white girl who gets approval and adoration that borders on worship because she took on the intellectual child's play of challenging feminists doesn't make her a friend to men. In the end, it doesn't even prove she's not an enemy.

And of course the rest is on us, men. White knights gonna white knight. Cucks gonna cuck. Privileged little, pretty blond, white girls gonna privilege. Nothing I say here or that you do there is going to change any of that. But I do think that when the prima donnas out themselves in such spectacular fashion, we ought to be kind enough to point out what a good job they did, hopefully without our fellows rushing in to put a pillow under their privileged asses. To that end, I hope my part is done.

As always, I hope you enjoyed today's talk, even if you didn't, and we'll see you next time.

Alex Phillips: Today, we need to talk about men

Reno, NV: Splitsville, U.S.A.

October 2, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Right from the start, Nevada was something of an outlier among the states of the union. Though Nevada Territory had nowhere near the 60,000 inhabitants supposedly required for statehood in 1864, the Union stronghold was hurriedly admitted on October 31, 1864 so two more electoral votes (the 16,420 popular votes cast were the fewest in the union; even minuscule Delaware had more voters) could be tallied for President Lincoln, whose reelection was in doubt.

Silver mining brought Nevada to the nation's attention, but before the end of the 19th Century, another lucrative industry developed. Unlike mining, this industry was decidedly gynocentric, as many American men found out to their detriment.

In Nevada, as in the states previously admitted, the rules of marriage and divorce were a state matter. Notably, Nevada did not require a lengthy residence period to qualify for a divorce petition. Another interesting facet of Nevada was its de facto no-fault divorce laws. Technically, divorces were not available for the asking. On paper, a petitioner still needed grounds. "Extreme cruelty" was the most popular.

While "extreme cruelty" might evoke images of "enhanced interrogation" at Guantanamo or a medieval torture dungeon, in truth the courts had a much lower standard. As one magazine writer put it, "Spend a few days in a Reno divorce court and you will have enough novel definitions of 'extreme cruelty' to fill a page in the dictionary."

One only had to reside in Nevada for six months to be a legal resident. Upon being divorced, the born-again bachelorette had to aver her intention to remain a resident of Nevada. Obviously, most of the newly divorced women headed home as soon as possible. A speedy evacuation after a divorce was a nudge-nudge, wink-wink infraction.

Some of the women, however, stuck around long enough to get hitched again. Another of Nevada's peculiarities was the lack of a waiting period to get remarried. A number of women had a new man waiting in the wings. It was not unusual for a woman to get divorced in the morning and remarried in the afternoon.

While other states were not happy about the Reno divorce mill, there was nothing they could do about it. The Full Faith and Credit clause of the Constitution required that other states honor the decrees of the Nevada courts. (A lot of these issues came up again in Obergefell v. Hodges, the 2015 Supreme Court decision sanctioning homosexual marriage nationwide at a time when some states permitted it and others prohibited it.)

Not all Nevadans were happy with their state's reputation as a divorce mill. So in 1913 a reform movement succeeded in doubling the residency period to one year. Predictably, legal fees dwindled, as did local occupancy rates at hotels and resorts. So in 1915 the six-month residency period was restored. In 1927 the residency requirement was slashed to three months. When the Depression cut into business in 1931, the period was slashed to a mere six weeks. Statewide legalized gambling also sweetened the pot that year. Consequently, Reno survived the Depression better than most cities.

Given the size of Nevada (100,577 square miles), Reno was the only realistic destination for divorcees in training, as it was the largest city in the state and railroad access was good. (Reno was on the route of the Central Pacific in the building of the first transcontinental railroad, commemorated by the famous Golden Spike ceremony in Utah in 1869). Located in the foothills of the Sierra Nevadas, Reno was near the Comstock silver mines, Lake Tahoe, and Carson City, the state capital. In 1870, Reno had but 1,035 people, yet it was the largest city in the state (a mere 42,491 according to the U.S. census).

By the 1890's the prominence of the "home-breaking industry" in Reno was obvious to anyone visiting the town. Leon Ray Livingston, a celebrity hobo popularly known as A No. 1, visited the town in 1894 with Jack London, then just 18 years old and becoming acquainted with life on the road:

> A telling majority of the seekers for divorce were women. Back home the grounds they had to advance for an application of separation from their life's mate either was too scandalous for an airing in a public court or would not stand the test of the local laws. A few months of legal residence was all the state of Nevada required to grease the slide into single-blessedness and, at the same time, the pocket-books of the lawyers and others financially interested in the flourishing of the divorce enterprise.

> There was one outstanding feature which most impressed Jack London and I while we were sightseeing in town. This was the unusual number of lap dogs and other nasty creatures taken out for an airing by members of the Reno divorce colony or their maids. Precious few of the women, all of whom were attired in the most expensive creations of Parisian fashion, were encumbered with babies.

Remember, this was long before female emancipation was a given. Suffragettes were stalking the land but the 19th Amendment giving women the vote was 25 years away and stigma was still attached to divorce. Thanks to the relative rarity of divorce in other states, Reno became synonymous with divorce. If a woman announced she was taking a trip to Reno, it was understood that she was not talking about a vacation.

The Reno experience was largely the province of well-to-do women. The average disenchanted housewife could hardly afford train fare to Reno, much less pay for lodging for the requisite amount of time – particularly after the Panic of 1893.

Consequently, the roster of women granted divorces in Reno is something of a who's who. Socialites, heiresses, and movie stars were abundant. Among the Hollywood migrants casting off their spouses were Tallulah Bankhead, Constance Bennett, Paulette Goddard, Jane Greer, Rita Hayworth, Miriam Hopkins, Carole Lombard, Myrna Loy, Ida Lupino, Maureen O'Hara, Mary Pickford, Lillian Roth, and Lana Turner. So many well-to-do women migrated to Reno that the outlying dude ranches that catered to them were popularly known as divorce ranches. The cowboys who worked on those ranches were surely full of titillating anecdotes.

If Reno was the city where marriages went to die, Niagara Falls, a popular honeymoon destination, was where matrimonial relationships were nurtured. Most young couples went through Buffalo, the gateway city to Niagara Falls, because it was easy to reach via train. The two upstate New York cities intersected in the popular ditty "Shuffle Off to Buffalo," written by Al Dubin and Harry Warren. The song was introduced in 42nd Street, a 1933Warner Brothers musical with classic Busby Berkeley choreography.

The song begins with a young couple planning their honeymoon:

> I'll go home and get my panties,
> You go home and get your scanties
> And away we'll go
> Whoa-oh-oh
> Off we're gonna shuffle
> Shuffle off to Buffalo
>
> To Niagara in a sleeper
> There's no honeymoon that's cheaper
> And the train goes slow
> Whoa-oh-oh
> Off we're gonna shuffle
> Shuffle off to Buffalo

All well and good. The young couple radiates bliss, joy and optimism. But a couple of verses later, a jilted, jaded woman chimes in:

> Matrimony is baloney
> She'll be wanting alimony
> In a year or so
> Whoa-oh-oh

> Still they go and shuffle
> Shuffle off to Buffal0
>
> When she knows as much as we know
> She'll be on her way to Reno
> While he still has dough
> Whoa-oh-on
> She'll give him the shuffle
> When they're back from Buffalo

So the American man was screwed coming and going. He got fleeced paying for a honeymoon in Niagara Falls and later got fleeced by the divorce courts in Reno, dubbed "The Biggest Little City in the World" (thanks to a slogan contest) in 1929. Holy matrimony, Batman!

In its heyday, Reno had no serious competition for divorcees, as Las Vegas was just a dot on the map and was harder to get to. Legalized gambling also aided Las Vegas, however, and as lodging and entertainment options grew in southern Nevada, they took away some of the Reno divorce trade.

Las Vegas surpassed Reno as the state's largest city in the 1950's, but the divorce rate went down in the 50's, and by the time it started going up again, the liberal reforms in other states rendered the Nevada divorce pilgrimage unnecessary Much the same is true of casino gambling, but the glitzy shows and sumptuous resorts of Sin City remain unmatched by more pedestrian locales.

Now with 260,000+ people, it is arguable whether Reno is still "The Biggest Little City in the World" but it is no longer the Divorce Capital of America. Still, with more than 425,000 people in metro Reno, there are enough locals to keep a fair number of Washoe County divorce lawyers employed.

Looking back over the Reno phenomenon, one can only wonder how many men's bank accounts were pumped dry by shysters. In addition, how many hoteliers, ranchers, restaurateurs and others in Reno were enriched by shearing men from other states? Fittingly, sheep farms, thanks largely to Basque immigrants, were a big part of the Nevada landscape in the old days.

Unlike divorce courts today, the judges and lawyers who manned the Reno divorce mills were just that – men. One wonders if any of them ever stopped to ponder what they were doing to their fellow men. I'd like to think that Nevada lawyers and judges had misgivings about their profession and maybe a few of them repented and found other means of making a living.

Then again, I'd like to believe Area 51 houses space aliens from the Roswell UFO crash.

Eating while MGTOW: Buck buck chicken

October 4, 2021 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

Today we're republishing an amusing and practical article written several years ago by AVfM's own August Løvenskiolds. A man's gotta eat, right? –Ed

The MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) lifestyle, ideally, involves both a real-world withdrawal of men from women and a reduction in the large excess of productivity by men necessary to support the pampering of women through the state's taxation of men's natural high productivity.

Men like me who choose this path may experience a decline in disposable income as we no longer strive to be the stripper pole of cash climbed by needy, seductive succubi eager to harvest us for our resources. But this doesn't mean that MGTOW should be denied the gastronomic pleasures of preparing our own easy, affordable, and low-cost meals.

I go shopping for food once every two weeks or so. I eat out less than once a month – twice in calendar 2015 so far, and a woman paid for one of those meals.

Beef is quite expensive as I write this but chicken is cheap and in Dallas, I can buy a "family pack" (heh) of 7-9 boned (heh), skinless chicken breasts (heh) for less than 10-12 dollars US. I break them up into individual plastic freezer bags, carefully bleeding out as much air as possible before freezing them. I then have a fortnight's worth of protein for the price of buying some crazy feminist harpy two sour apple martinis.

Now, the basic preparation of one of these frozen breasts is easy: remove from freezer and wrapping, plop onto a pan and place into a 450 degree Fahrenheit (about 230 Celsius) oven for about an hour or less.

While you are waiting, get on Twitter and give hell to any feminists you can find.

At the end of an hour you will find a beautiful, tasty (if a little dry) roasted chicken breast. Pair that with your favorite dipping sauce (teriyaki and chili paste for me), some veggie dish and a glass of cheap wine, and you are eating in a way Caesar would envy two thousand years ago.

Now, after a while, you can get more elaborate with seasonings, dipping sauces and side dishes but the basic idea is the same: low-cost, low work, and good, sensible food to keep you going on your latest online adventure.

I just polished off my latest variation on this dish. It is much more elaborate but adds a variety necessary to keep gastronomic things interesting.

First, before I removed it from the bag, I thawed the chicken breast. I picked a large breast because I intended to stuff it with butter and herbs.

I force-thawed the still-bagged chicken breast in a small container under a leaky faucet dripping slowly on top of it. It took about 50 minutes to thaw. Two twitter feminists screamed and blocked me while I was waiting. I then preheated the oven to 400 degrees (about 205 Celsius).

As I held the thawed breast gently, my knife made a small incision on the thickest side of it. I enlarged the incision with the blunt plastic handle of a small spatula until there was a tight canyon/cul-de-sac in the breast as far as I could force the probe without rupturing the other side of the breast.

I stuffed the resulting cavern in the breast with one smashed clove of garlic, several shards of frozen butter, and a fresh leaf of sage. Oregano, rosemary, or really, any herb you like can be used here.

I placed the stuffed breast in a 10-inch (25 cm) heavy aluminum pie pan with some frozen whole-kernel sweet corn. I put some pats of real butter, hot sauce, pepper and salt over the whole mess and baked them for about 40-55 minutes while I abused some more online feminists with logic.

And voilà. A feast of buttery baked chicken and sweet corn. Life is GOOD.

You can stuff the chicken with whatever you like before baking: ham & cheese, bleu cheese, leeks, olives (green and/or black), horseradish & apple – endless choices. No affirmative consent is needed. Ever.

A cheap, delicious meal – costing two to four bucks – and a nightmare for feminists.

Living well is sweet revenge.

More on Jordan Peterson’s Misgivings about MGM

Author’s introduction: Consider this a follow-up video to “Confronting the Intellectual Dark Web On Infant MGM”. Here I provide new commentary on some things I covered on that video plus a lot of things from the original source video (JBP’s Biblical Series IX Sodom and Gomorrah) plus a great deal I initially failed to cover. In this video I take on what I think are some of Dr. Peterson’s more egregious conclusions about MGM.

A Word on Our Betters, the Woke

October 7, 2021 | by Robert Franklin | Link | Original Link

Originally published on Robert Franklin's blog, The Word of Damocles.

Last time, in discussing the subculture of the "woke," I mentioned that the very concept of wokeness and the woke themselves remind us greatly of times supposedly gone by, of the monied classes and their disdain for the peasantry.

> Inevitably, that sense of their own moral rectitude produces an attitude in the "woke" somewhere between condescension and disdain. The very term itself connotes a higher level of awareness meant to contrast dramatically with that of the degraded state of the rest of us. In so doing, it echoes class antagonisms that are neither recent in origin nor woke.

The antics of the woke bring unbidden to mind that ancient human relationship – haves and have-nots. There, the haves invariably conclude that they know better what's good, not just for them, but for the have-nots as well. In mid-19th century Great Britain, Viscount Palmerston made the point succinctly to William Gladstone:

> You lay down the Doctrine of Universal Suffrage, which I can never accept. I entirely deny that every sane and not disqualified man has a moral right to vote. What every man and woman too have a Right to, is to be well governed and under just laws…

See? According to the good Viscount, those who decide what constitutes good government and just laws are, coincidentally, people like him. That the poor might have different thoughts on that subject, different interests, than the wealthy seems no more to have occurred to him than the concept that no government can be considered good if it denies a stake in its doings to 90% of the people it governs.

Which brings us to the woke today. Their message: we know what's best for all of us; if you disagree, you're at best misinformed and at worst an enemy of the Greater Good; follow us without question and all will be well. Like the working classes of Great Britain in Lord Palmerston's day, most of us now find ourselves being looked down upon by those who not only consider themselves our betters but to whom it never occurs that our needs, our voices, our values, our arguments matter.

But, let us not pretend that it's only attitudes that the woke seek to control. Quite the contrary. Consider this article from the UK that points out all too clearly the economic consequences of woke climate policies on the working class.

> Climate alarmism is inherently opposed to the interests of working-class people, and more and more people are starting to clock this. Bans on petrol and diesel cars might mean little if getting around for you means cycling around Stroud. But it means a hell of a lot if you drive for a living and rely on your car to get the kids > to school. Fantasising about the end of the world is a luxury most people do not have. As the gilets jaunes used to say, the elites care about the end of the world, while everyone else worries about the end of the month.

Just so. Rising prices on fuel, vehicles, electric power, etc. bear disproportionately on those least able to absorb them. And, just in case we of the Great Unwashed missed the message, the woke happily remind us.

> Plus, the seemingly never-ending stories of green hypocrisy make clear that eco-austerity is only really for the plebs. The more that energy and travel are made more expensive, in an attempt to stem our movement and consumption, the more the good things in life will become the sole preserve of the wealthy, who will always be able to pay more…

Indeed. The latest Davos conference on climate issues didn't see many attendees arriving exhausted on bicycles or simply tuning in remotely. Private jets were more the order of the day.

Much the same holds true among the woke beyond climate politics. When Harvard, Yale, etc. offer enormous privileges to black applicants, others suffer. That's the nut of the lawsuit against Harvard by Asian applicants who rightly claim that they've been discriminated against on account of their race. In the process, perfectly qualified Asian and white students find themselves attending less prestigious institutions than they would have absent affirmative action.

Before the term "woke" was even coined, Charles Murray reported the phenomenon of a growing class divide in his book "Coming Apart."

> But along with the continuing individual American success stories, is a growing majority of the people who run the institutions of America who do share tastes, preferences and culture. They increasingly constitute a class.
> They are also increasingly isolated. … This growing isolation has been accompanied by growing ignorance about the country over which they have so much power.

A significant part of the great divide Murray identified consists of education. What Murray called the "Narrow Elite" tends strongly to attend, not just college, but elite colleges. And what happens at those elite institutions? Students are force-fed woke-ism, often from the first day they step on campus. Young men are taught that to be male is to be toxic, a danger to themselves and others. Students generally are taught that white people are privileged racists.

After college, those elites tend strongly to live together, work together, read the same newspapers and books, worship together, etc. And they almost never meet or talk to anyone else in any meaningful way. The unsurprising result being that the narrow elite has come to resemble an echo chamber, whose ever-repeated messages go unchallenged and whose members apparently never question the idea that they're both qualified and entitled to govern and instruct the rest of us.

Lord Palmerston would understand completely.

An Inconvenient Truth

October 7, 2021 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

In a time of endless lies, propaganda and deceit a brief glimpse of the truth is indeed a moment to celebrate.

There have been whispers about sexual abuse and grooming in our AFLW competition for sometime but they have remained whispers due to the reluctance of our media to investigate the claims and expose the truth. But why would our media be so reluctant to break such a sensational story?

The W is the key here.

The women's AFL competition is branded the AFLW.

Does it contradict a narrative which has been rammed down our throats for years?

Masculinity is toxic.

Where men gather in numbers you will find abuse and deviant behaviour.

Women are always victims of male deviancy and violence.

Women do not sexually abuse or rape.

Women do not bully or groom young victims.

Women do not lie?

The AFLW story is yet to be published or alluded to by any media outlet.

But yesterday another story about rampant grooming and abuse exploded and was presented in one of our biggest newspapers.

The Matildas are Australia's women's national soccer team. What did the headline on the front page of the Herald Sun scream?

Star claims Abuse, Bullying Rife in Toxic Women's Soccer!

The article begins:

Australian women's football stars have revealed a toxic culture within the sport that includes allegations of indecent assault, sexual harassment, bullying and grooming.

Among the claims are an incident in which Matilda's legend Lisa De Vanna alleges a teammate pulled her down from behind and she was dry humped.

Lisa De Vanna

"There needs to be consequences," DeVanna told the Herald Sun.

"There needs to be accountability."

"Have I been sexually harassed? Yes. Have I been bullied? Yes. Ostracised? Yes. Have I seen things which made me uncomfortable? Yes."

Former Matilda Elissia Carnavas witnessed what De Vanna endured.

"They targeted Lisa," Carnavas said.

"It was a big joke. They were trying to provoke her by sexually harassing her and making her feel uncomfortable."

"In any sporting organization and in any environment, grooming, preying and unprofessional behaviour makes me sick."

De Vanna also highlighted another inappropriate moment away from the sporting field.

"There was a time I was asked to join two girls in the shower rubbing soap on each other. I told them to fuck off and they laughed and said, "You know you want to join us."

The recently retired, 150 cap veteran took to social media at the weekend to respond to a tweet from US soccer superstar Megan Rapinoe who was commenting on allegations of sexual harassment in the NWSL.

Rapinoe had tweeted: "Men protecting men who abuse women."

De Vanna tweeted back:

" I agree @mPinoe but I have witnessed W my eyes:

-Women protecting women who abuse players

-Players protecting senior players who abuse younger players.

-Organisations protecting coaches/players who abuse players.

Abuse is abuse. Poor behaviour is poor across all boards!"

This story has a particularly intoxicating aroma and it is especially uplifting in today's world in which the stench of the rotting carcass of truth pollutes the very air we breathe.

Someone has dared to lift the veil for a brief time and allowed us to glimpse reality.

De Vanna said, "I was pulled down from behind and dry humped by a few of my teammates. I fought my way off the floor kicking and screaming. They thought it was funny," she said. "I was just a young kid from Perth. I didn't know any different. I lost my shit and wanted to punch them."

Former W-League star Rhali Dobson has also claimed she was a target of predatory behaviour.

Dobson who played for Melbourne City, NewCastle Jets, the Young Matildas and Matildas during a 13 year career, said the pressure off the field outweighed the pressure on it.

"Initially why I made myself so feminine was because I was trying to keep people away from me," Dobson said. "I know what it was like when I was younger. I didn't want to even have a shower after the game. I'd wait until I got back to my room. There were a couple of us young ones in the same boat.

A lot of it is pushed under the rug. It was a case of grooming when I first came on the scene because I was asked, "Do I prefer boys or girls?"

I said I liked boys and remember just looking down at the ground and all of the laughter and being told, "We'll change that soon enough.

As you get higher up in the levels when it comes to the national circuit. If you don't fit in with the crowd you won't make it. It's a world that's very much still going on, in the world at the top levels, and until you start addressing this nothing is going to change."

Former head of corporate affairs and football whistle blower Bonita Mersiades called on FA to conduct a fresh probe into De Vanna's claims.

"They cannot, and should not be ignored-and nor should they be examined in isolation of issues that are happening elsewhere, such as the USA and Canada," she said in a letter from Women in Sport.

We therefore urge you to establish an independent external inquiry into the culture of women's football in Australia to ensure that the environment is safe and happy for all girls and women."

I find it quite astonishing that the endless lies about family violence and sexual abuse have been so artfully presented as abuse exclusively perpetrated by males.

Anyone with the most basic intelligence would know this is an absurd proposition simply based upon their lived experience. I see almost daily clips of "Karens" exploding in rage because somebody took their parking space or a retailer failed to provide them with an item they desired. I have seen "Karens" blatantly and hysterically scream that they are the victim in situations where they are the obvious perpetrator. I have seen "Karens" use the threat of the allegation of rape in order to avoid paying a taxi fare.

These are not isolated incidents. There are hundreds of such examples on film. This is clearly the tip of a very deep iceberg. How can any person with an average IQ not quickly surmise that the chances that these violent psychopaths who exhibit their rage and violence in public while being filmed would be very likely to be exhibiting this same psychopathic behaviour behind closed doors with their partners and children?

But women are never cited as perpetrators of child murder and abuse and they never lie even as we read of yet another child who has been strangled, stabbed or drowned by their mummy.

Yet we continue to see advertisements and campaigns depicting men (and only men) raging and threatening women over the most minor issue- an undercooked dinner or untidy house. From the endless hours of footage of women going on racist rants on public transport to women destroying property or assaulting people in burger shops one must begin to believe women are far more likely to erupt and explode over very minor irritations.

We live in a lie.

Every day.

Revelations of sexual harassment, grooming and sexual assault in all female environments does not shock or surprise anyone with intelligence. The only shock one feels is the fact that one journalist chose to report on the issue when so many others have deliberately covered up the truth.

Every news story seems to be presented with one aim. That aim is supporting whatever the narrative may be at any given time. It is always an anti-male narrative. It simply takes different forms at different times.

The fact that men and women in positions of power and authority can use the words toxic masculinity with impunity is proof enough of the bigotry and hatred our mainstream media, governments and education system has for men and boys.

We remain the only demographic to be singled out as poisonous and dangerous due to our immutable characteristics- the very essence of what makes us who we are.

It is evil. Shameful.

Stories like this one simply confirm what thinking human beings have always known. No gender has a monopoly on evil behaviour any more than one gender has cornered the market on honesty, compassion and generosity.

Yet we know, despite the facts readily available to anyone who claims to be interested in the victims of family violence or partner abuse, that the lies will continue to be promoted by our government, education system and media.

I have long known that lesbian relationships are the most likely to be violent and abusive but this fact has for some reason never been discussed or given prominence in any discussion of family/partner violence. Why? The narrative my dear readers! The narrative.

Isn’t it a revelation to discover that placing two women together and allowing them to live with each other in a confined space will lead to a high level of violent abuse, far higher than when two men (those who purportedly have toxic masculinity oozing through their veins) choose to co-habitate.

This is not logical if one believes the current zeitgeist.

Truth is irrelevant. Truth is unnecessary. Truth is expendable in the world we live in today. Technology allows the Lie to be spewed into the mouths of countless babes who willingly swallow it and chirp for more.

Read the truth for yourself. It’s been out there for a long time.

What is lesbian partner violence?

Partner violence in lesbian (and gay) relationships recently has been identified as an important social problem. Partner or domestic violence among lesbians has been defined as including physical, sexual and psychological abuse, although researchers have most often studied physical violence.

How common is lesbian partner violence?

About 17-45% of lesbians report having been the victim of a least one act of physical violence perpetrated by a lesbian partner (1,5,6,13). Types of physical abuse named by more than 10% of participants in one study included:

- Disrupting other’s eating or sleeping habits
- Pushing or shoving, driving recklessly to punish, and slapping, kicking, hitting, or biting (11).
- Sexual abuse by a woman partner has been reported by up to 50% of lesbians (12).*
- Psychological abuse has been reported as occurring at least one time by 24% to 90% of lesbians (1,5,6,11,14).

The research usually has been done with mostly white, middle-class lesbians who are sufficiently open about their sexual orientation to have met researchers seeking participants in the lesbian community. Subsequently, these findings may not apply to women who are less open, less educated, or of other ethnic backgrounds.

Why would a lesbian batter another woman?

Lesbians who abuse other women may do so for reasons similar to those that motivate heterosexual male batterers. Lesbians abuse their partners to gain and maintain control (9). Lesbian batterers are motivated to avoid feelings of loss and abandonment. Therefore, many violent incidents occur during threatened separations. Many lesbian batterers grew up in violent households and were physically, sexually, or verbally abused and/or witnessed their mothers being abused by fathers or stepfathers (6,7,14).

How is lesbian partner violence different from heterosexual partner violence?

There are several similarities between lesbian and heterosexual partner violence. Violence appears to be about as common among lesbian couples as among heterosexual couples (1,5). In addition, the cycle of violence occurs in both types of relationships. However, there also are several differences.

In lesbian relationships, the “butch” (physically stronger, more masculine or wage-earning) member of the couple may be as likely to be the victim as the batterer, whereas in heterosexual relationships, the male partner (usually the stronger, more masculine, and wage-earning member) is most often the batterer (4). Some lesbians in abusive relationships report fighting back in their relationship (6,8).

Intimate partner violence in lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, intersex and queer communities: Key issues | Child Family Community Australia (aifs.gov.au)

People who identify as lesbian, gay, bisexual, trans, intersex or queer (LGBTIQ) experience intimate partner violence at similar rates as those who identify as heterosexual.

There has been an invisibility of LGBTIQ relationships in policy and practice responses and a lack of acknowledgement that intimate partner violence exists in these communities.

Lesbian women were more likely than gay men to report having been in an abusive same-sex relationship (41% and 28% respectively);

26% of respondents had experienced sexual assault within a same-sex relationship (Leonard et al., 2008).

Rate of Domestic Violence Highest in Lesbian Relationships | The Wentworth Report

Rate of Domestic Violence Highest in Lesbian Relationships*. It's a PC myth that domestic violence is all about men hurting women in heterosexual relationships. It's not. Women dish out a lot of violence too, including against kids. Despite convincing studies for decades now, this still seems to surprise people — once again demonstrating the willingness and power of the media to propagate a PC agenda. Keep an eye out for how the domestic violence meme is used — such as to put down straight men.*

Domestic violence has become a "silent epidemic" in the gay and lesbian community despite being the subject of increasing scrutiny in heterosexual relationships, according to the AIDS Council of NSW.

by JD Glass.

The National Violence Against Women survey found that 21.5 percent of men and 35.4 percent of women living with a same-sex partner experienced intimate-partner physical violence in their lifetimes, compared with 7.1 percent and 20.4 percent for men and women, respectively, with a history of only opposite-sex cohabitation. Transgender respondents had an incidence of 34.6 percent over a lifetime according to a Massachusetts survey. …

These studies refute the myths that only straight women get battered, that men are never victims, and that women never batter …

"*Abuse is not about violence; it's about control," says Beth Leventhal, executive director of The Network/La Red in Boston. "You can be just as controlling of someone if you are small — as if you're large. It's about using violence or any other means of gaining and maintaining control."*

I have long since given up on the idea that the tsunami of bullshit which tumbles out of the mouths of feminists in positions of great power and privilege can ever be halted. The best I can do is know the truth for myself and the handful of people who seek it.

If we each do our best to tell the truth to those we love and those we encounter at work or socially, we have done all we can be expected to do and that means we can rest our heads upon our pillows each night and look into a mirror without feeling a wave of revulsion envelope our soul.

One more time. Read the truth.

These studies refute the myths that only straight women get battered, that men are never victims, and that women never batter …

A Tale Of Two Interviews

October 9, 2021 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: Elizabeth Hobson was recently interviewed by feminist Colette Fountain of 'Screenshot Media' (no, we've never heard of the website either), who proceeded to misrepresent both Elizabeth and the Honey Badgers in a train-wreck of an article titled, 'Inside the anti-feminist world of Honey Badgers, where women put men's rights before their own.' For the sake of accuracy we are publishing the full, previously unpublished interview with Elizabeth below.

* * *

Colette Fountain: I guess to start with it would be interesting to know how you came to be involved with Men's Rights Activism and then how this led to your position with J4MB? Were there particular studies you read that changed your views on gender or anything like that or was it just gradual?

Elizabeth Hobson: How long have you got? Gosh… I'll give you a lot of information and you can edit as you like (but can I please publish Q's and A's in full on WokeFather?).

I was raised pro-feminist (as is standard). I remember turning to my Mum when I was new in high school and gushing over a Germaine Greer comment from Newsnight or somewhere where she said "When people say I'm not a feminist, I say 'Well, what are you?'" – which I thought tremendously cool. Germaine Greer, as an aside, I have a respect for. I think she's misguided in many respects but there are times when she is startlingly right. She has a real skill for listening to women. Changes her mind quite appropriately sometimes. Let Neil Lyndon quote her when all of her crazy sisters said no and made a new father bingerewrite scores of direct quotations into paraphrase…

I went to an all girls school, we had good times, but we were taught half truths and full fictions about our British Suffragettes. Feminist indoctrination. Still pro-feminist not fully fledged at this point in my life.

Then my partner and I discovered that we were having a baby. Now, we had been party people… But the whole pregnancy thing was magical and we just wanted to be together. So we're at home not out and I get into… Stories about natures mothers… And feminism. Which I imagined was about equality and sisterhood.

It quickly became clear it wasn't. It was equality when it suits and they're total cliquey bitches, almost to a feminist (male and female).

Then I'm just totally puzzled online and I start bumping into anti-feminists and MRAs and THEY are about equality! THEY are about truth, and sex peace, and comradeship! And this diverse community is so supportive. We all go through stuff in life and I could not have a better bunch of people who all have my back, and I hope they feel the same about me too!

I practised debating and writing for a few years and then I noticed a post on the J4MB blog looking for a volunteer to do communications work. I applied. We chatted, and it was very engaging, and then he asked what experience I have with that work and I told him that I had absolutely none. He said that “That’s more than anyone else who’s applied so far, you’re hired!” Mike is a really warm and funny, totally idiosyncratic, work horse of a man. A really good friend. I stepped down from the party after I’d been working very intensively in the care sector for a few months and realised that I just couldn’t commit regular enough time to be able to contribute appropriately to the party. But Mike and I have shared some awesome interview hosting duties recently, a British politician and lioness – Ann Widdecombe, Don Lofendale, a retired lawyer who has some incredible insights into the abortion situation. And more! They’ll be aired as part of The International Conference on Men’s Issues 2021, online.

I’m now working for a living and writing for a great site called Woke Father. Pulling together information for my ICMI speech which is provisionally called Sins of Eve and is about how women’s misbehaviour is like totally whitewashed and goes relatively unpunished for various interesting reasons (including anti-male sexism). Plus a very exciting project that a dear friend and a mentor of highest regard to me is founding that will become clear before too long…

Colette Fountain: Looking at the manifesto for J4MB, quite a few areas are covered so if you could expand on where your own beliefs lie that would be great because from my research, Men’s Rights Activism seems to cover everything from men’s mental health to people opposed to women having the right to vote so it would be helpful to know where you lie on that scale and which issues you feel need to be tackled first?

Elizabeth Hobson: Jesus Colette, kudos for the great questions but I’m gonna be here all night!

OK. I call myself an anti-feminist gender equality activist but I’m also:

- A passionate classical liberal who values freedom
- A pragmatist who wants to work out answers that work for as many people as possible
- A non-gynocentrist who refuses to accept the fact that so many boys – beautiful, magical, innocent boys – look set to grow up into a world that values them less because of their sex, who have fewer choices because of their sex, who are more harshly treated in many arenas because of their sex
- An individualist who smiles wryly whenever someone points out that the smallest minority is an individual. I don’t go in for radical identity politics. That’s why I stopped self identifying as an MRA and started calling myself a gender equality activist. I am naturally interested in gender politics, maybe it’s not natural maybe it’s accidental! But I am interested and I am utterly concerned about women as much as men. But… The the correction of the host of disparities that disproportionately disadvantage men (and boys) in our society would be a rising tide lifting all boats.
- A libertarian who is very live and let live, loves tolerance and peace – non aggression principle, hell yeah!

- A WGTOW – like a MGTOW but W.

Kids' relationships with their fathers post separation I want fixed right now. That is the most messed up shit. Dads need kids, kids need dads.

I would like babies protected – both in the womb and from unnecessary surgical procedures on their genitals.

I would like an end to the Sex War based on the fact that the truth, as history shows, is that men and women have loved each other, struggled together, been partners in every positive development in ever! We need gratitude to them; and hope and trust shared by us as sexes.

Colette Fountain: How would you say the majority of activists get involved with / discover the movement. I've seen several Reddit threads, as well as on sites like twitter or do you find most people congregate on places like A Voice For Men, or at the conferences you have organised? Have you noticed a difference in US and UK based groups?

Elizabeth Hobson: Another great question. I'll have to think… It's a real mix you know. You have women like Karen Straughan who NEVER fell for the bullshit. Women who fell hook line and sinker and really resent it! (Usually) older men (and often their female family members too), where there has been state sanctioned abuse – parental alienation, false accusations, lack of support escaping abuse – against him. Younger men who are just plugged in and switched on.

I found my tribe on Twitter. It's all over the internet though. If anyone has a natural curiosity or a puzzling experience that doesn't accord with prevailing feminist narratives, they'll stumble across one or another of us. Into the rabbit hole.

I don't know that I do see a difference between UK/US actually. In fact when I look for something in my mind I come across similarities. There's a lot of patriotic Americans for their part. And a lot of admiration for our brethren living in the only country ever founded on philosophy (how gorgeous is that?). I have two copies of The Constitution and Bill of Rights. I'm sitting in front of a Dali painting based on the birth of America. There's a book actually… Naomi Wolf, terrible feminist but, great on matters of liberty and conscience. It's called 'End of America, Letter of warning to a young patriot'. She wrote it during the presidency of George Bush Jr. She was seeing things happening – Guantanamo (she's been there), suppression of the free speech… – and, being of Jewish descent, she says that she just kept thinking "They did this in Germany" to herself. And that prompted an exploration into the steps that would-be dictators take when closing down an open society. She returned to the subject under Obama (it got worse) and now with our Covid-busting-civil liberties-busting thing that we have going on, it's worse again. They always invoke a terrifying internal threat – all the better if it is genuine but can be hyped… Anyway, it's important work and I hope that you can excuse my detour! I suppose perhaps what I'd like you to take from that is that being in this community has encouraged me to be open minded. I don't open a book by a feministt hoping to hate it. I liked Black Widow. And Ladykiller by Lush. I rate various feminists – Greer in her way, Paglia, Patai/Koertge, Roiphe, Sylvia Pankhurst (to go back in time considerably). We are like that. We have a culture of genuinely listening and arguing in good faith with good evidence. It's super cool. UK/US have different interesting projects happening of course, but I don't think there's a huge difference in character.

Colette Fountain: Obviously Men's Rights Activism is often seen to be in direct opposition to feminism, something which has led to many supporters calling themselves anti-feminist, yourself included – what do you feel is the reasoning behind this? Why is there such hatred for feminists, especially within the female members of the Men's Rights Activist community? Do you not feel that supporting Men's Rights is in opposition to your own rights? How do you feel about the elements of the community which are perhaps more violent towards women, particularly within more extreme groups like incels with the recent Plymouth shooting – do tragedies like these affect your belief system at all or change how you feel about the group as a whole?

Elizabeth Hobson: I reject your hypothesis – speaking personally, I don't "hate feminists", I hate feminism. Around a decade ago I identified as a feminist and I don't hate myself for that. It was the most reasonable course of action based on the information that I had to hand! The information was bad, and I hope that my understanding of gender politics has improved with my knowledge, and I hope that in some small way I can contribute to other people's journeys out of feminism. Maybe that's part of why I specify that I'm anti-feminist publicly. I do find that people often hear that and react. They may have their interest or their anger peaked – but either way it can start a good conversation! Another part of why is my truth-addiction! I was fiery as a girl but I had a major depressive episode after a miscarriage in the early twenties and I shut off from communicating completely. I was like a mute, except for my eldest son who was toddling at the time. I crawled out with the aid of honesty. I started talking to people, and it helped. And I got absolutely addicted to telling the truth. It's a great feeling!

Regarding rights – I'll define a couple of things in a personal way to make sense of what I will say to you. The kinds of inalienable rights that I believe in – that essentially boil down to being protected from predation and being free to live your life however you want to as long as nobody else is hurt – are absolutely strengthened by the concept of sex-blind justice. The kinds of rights that women have in practice (which I would call privileges): choices (reproductive, financial, professional), to be treated with compassion within services, an unlimited veto over father involvement in our children's lives… My ideas are in opposition to them, yes. "Equality would be a step down for women" – but also lift us up to contribute to society more positively and protect the men & boys who we love.

We are a peaceful movement. Or a collection of peaceful movements who respect each other and therefore do collaborate. We largely seem to have very similar analyses of the problems between men and women today. We do have different ideas about how to solve them and I doubt that any of the prevailing narratives within any of our brethren movements are entirely right or wrong. Portsmouth was an absolute tragedy. So awful. I'm waiting to hear more before I draw conclusions about what potential motives and triggers may have driven Jake Davison to do what he did. Those events didn't change my perspective at all though, no, I absolutely question the claim that he was radicalised in incel forums and I firmly believe that incel communities do more good than harm. They're messy. They are messy. But they're supporting each other and I hope a lot of them are growing as a result.

Colette Fountain: Finally it would be interesting to know what you hope for the future of activism and gender equality – what would an equal future look like in your ideal world and how do you think this can be achieved?

Elizabeth Hobson: I'm really impressed that you asked that question. I think it is fundamentally wrong to engage in any kind of activism or advocacy without a clear idea of what it is that you want! It's a question I've asked to many feminists and not really got a proper answer. What I want is something like this:

When there is an assumption of 50/50 shared parenting in the Family Courts.

When there is an equitable amount of money and effort expended researching cures for 'male' illnesses and 'female' illnesses. When there are male contraceptives.

Paternity fraud – prevented with compulsory paternity tests and punished proportionally if discovered later (pay costs plus therapy eg)

When men are valued by society, and we see as much virtue signalling about that as we do regarding women's inherent value- and as little misandry as we see misogyny.

When we have equitable services for male victims of DV.

When men and women receive equal sentences for equivalent crimes.

When we get rid of affirmative action quotas and let people succeed on the basis of their merits.

When the Women's and Equalities Committee drops the 'Women's' from their title and the UN Women's department is either dropped or equal led with one for men.

When we embark on concerted efforts to make the world safer for men, as well as women.

When each sex is protected from infant genital mutilation.

When 'forced to penetrate' is classified as 'rape' in the criminal justice system.

When men have a right to opt out of fatherhood and the legal responsibilities.

When the non-feminist sector is given a representative voice in politics, academia and the media.

When feminist ideology is no longer written into law and public policy

Something like that! I just want for men and women to have equal rights, opportunities, choices and treatment. And I think we could really have a good time if we did. Onwards and upwards!

Robert Brockway speaks at the March for Men

This is a transcript of Robert Brockway's speech at the March for Men. Due to time constraints imposed by police on the basis of security concerns most speeches, including this one, were shortened on the day. We present here the original speech that would have been given had time constraints permitted.

Misandry

- Mansplaining
- Manspreading
- Manterrupting
- Manslamming
- Bropriating
- Manflu
- Male Immune System is weaker
- Man-child, and it's variation man-baby
- Toxic masculinity
- The End of Men
- Men are obsolete
- A curfew for men
- Dead beat dads
- Men are genetically inferior
- Men have a lower pain threshold
- Men are linear thinkers
- Men can't multitask
- Men lack the capacity to maintain concentration for long periods
- Men think about sex every few seconds
- Masculinity so fragile
- Fragile male ego
- Male privilege
- Patriarchy
- Men won't ask for directions
- Special person's day rather than father's day
- Men should man up and grow some balls
- A woman needs a man like a fish needs bicycle
- Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them

During this talk I sometimes reference issues men and boys are facing in other countries. Where one wealthy anglosphere country goes the others soon follow. In any case, we're all in this together. Whether we're talking about Australia, the US, Canada, Haiti or Venezuela, misandry and the attacks on men and masculinity must stop.

We live in a society that marginalises men and their problems, that routinely ridicules men and boys. We hear about mansplaining in which men are presumed to routinely talk down to women and explain topics to them that they already understand. The concept, but not the term, was first discussed by author Rebecca Solnit after a man apparently explained a book to her, not knowing that she had written it. That terrible man, being unable to read her mind.

And then there are some less well-known examples. Manterruption in which it is alleged men interrupt women when speaking more than the other way around. Some fairly dubious research has been used to try to justify that one.

Most people probably haven't heard of manslamming, which claims that men seek to dominate footpaths and simply slam into women while walking around. A young woman tried to popularise this by walking around and slamming into men.

The End of Men is an article, subsequently a book, by Hanna Rosin. Rosin covers some of the issues facing men and boys but goes on to argue that these problems have their basis in fundamental problems with being male.

Meanwhile, the Munk Debates in Canada, which are broadcast around the world, had an episode called Men are Obsolete in which four women (but no men) debated whether or not men are obsolete.

Here in Australia we've recently had calls for a curfew for men including a newspaper article titled, A curfew for men? What a great idea by Melinda Houston that appeared in various major Australian newspapers including the Sydney Morning Herald. Setting aside for a moment what a ridiculous and impractical idea this is, it clearly shows that the actions of a few men are reflected on men as a whole. I'm fairly certain Ms Houston wasn't serious but it doesn't matter. The damage is done. Gender relations in Australia have further deteriorated.

Deadbeat dads? Let's spare a thought for the dads that haven't seen their kids in years because of a dysfunctional family court system.

Returning recently was a chestnut that has done the rounds for many years. That men are genetically inferior to women.

These claims usually come about as suggesting that the Y chromosome is somehow defective and is ultimately doomed. These claim can occur because the Y chromosome is smaller than the X chromosome, contains fewer genes. These sorts of simplistic claims show a fundamental misunderstanding of genetics.

Every difference between men and women comes, directly or indirectly, from the Y chromosome. To claim that the Y chromosome is a disadvantage for men is to reject everything it is to be male and to reject all of the achievements of men, now and in the past.

We've even reached the point where well-known columnist Polly Dunning stated in an article in the Sydney Morning Herald:

> There were dark moments in the middle of the night (when all those dark thoughts come), when I felt sick at the thought of something male growing inside me.

In the article, Dunning explained her change of heart following the birth of her son but her comments are still truly disturbing.

Men and boys are often portrayed as stupid. The TV formula so often seen in sitcoms of a stupid or inept (but often well-meaning) man married to a super-woman who can solve all of his problems for him by the end of the episode is so common it is a cliche. The mass media is full of negative portrayals of men. The news media is constantly telling us about negative aspects of masculinity. This has led to a general perception of men as people to be feared and suspected.

This had led many airlines to maintain a policy of never seating unaccompanied minors next to men. The implicit assumption here seems to be that the men cannot be trusted next to a child. Many men report feeling uneasy around children, fearful that they will be accused of some terrible act. This is a major cause of men avoiding certain industries, such as childcare and teaching.

A series of t-shirts and other products produced in the United States a few years ago suggested that "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them." These t-shirts can also be found in Australia. The manufacturers took no regard for the impact their products would have on young minds.

Here I discuss some of the issues facing men and boys. There are many more.

Selected Issues

Reproductive Choice

Women in most nations have the right to choose not to be a parent. This right exists through the option to have an abortion, through the use of adoption or through the use of safe haven drop off points. Many jurisdictions allow the mother to use any of these options against the wishes of the father. In contrast, for men consent to sex is consent to parenthood.

Today men actually lack reproductive rights. Unlike women, in many western countries, men cannot choose not to be a father. In the United States, there have been many cases in which a boy has been raped by an adult woman. The boy was not legally able to consent to the sexual activity and yet when the woman became pregnant the boy was required to pay child support (including back payments) on reaching the age of 18.

Many men have been ordered by courts to continue supporting a child that is not theirs, even after they present conclusive evidence (such as the results of a DNA test) showing that they are not the biological father of the child, and in some cases had no relationship with the child at all.

We want men to have the same reproductive choice that women currently enjoy.

Bodily Autonomy

In most nations, today women gain the right to genital integrity at birth. In an increasing number of nations, this right is actively enforced for girls. Boys eventually gain this right too but the exact age at which this occurs isn't clear. We do know that boys in the United States still do not have this right at the age of five.

Female genital mutilation is now illegal in many countries, and international organisations work to reduce this practice. These same societies often refuse to grant boys the same bodily autonomy that they grant girls the right to be protected from unnecessary medical procedures. We object to male genital mutilation (also known as circumcision) on the same grounds as female genital mutilation. Both violate the human rights of the person being mutilated and both should be illegal. In many countries today all people have protection from unnecessary medical procedures except for infant boys.

Many do not know that the foreskins of infant boys are not destroyed as medical waste but are rather put to a variety of uses. While it is true a few are used for medical research the majority go to cosmetic companies. In some countries, the sale of foreskins by hospitals is a lucrative business.

We want boys to have the same rights to bodily integrity that girls currently enjoy.

Parentage

Women have always known that they are the mother of the child they birthed. Only recently have men had the chance to truly know that they are the parent of a particular newborn. In some countries, such as France, paternity testing is illegal unless permitted by a court of law.

We want men to have the same certainty of parenthood that women currently enjoy. This could be achieved through mandatory paternity testing at birth.

Presumption of Innocence

The #MeToo movement has seen countless men tried in the court of public opinion without so much as a cursory investigation into the allegations against them.

We also see serious issues with police ignoring exculpatory evidence in sexual assault investigations in the UK and elsewhere. We might see this here soon too. Perhaps it is happening already.

The affirmative consent and enthusiastic consent laws now being enacted around Australia shift the burden of proof and leave men who have sex with women at the mercy of those women and the judicial system. If a complaint is made against a man he is now left trying to establish that the woman consented.

Disposability

Male disposability is the tendency for societies to be more willing to sacrifice men than women. It does not mean that society will wantonly throw away the lives of men. Rather it means that if it must choose between sacrificing a man or sacrificing a woman society will generally choose to sacrifice a man.

This manifests in a variety of ways. Societies throughout history have expected men to give up their lives for women and children even when they are not related to them or even know them. When someone is in trouble, societies expect men to be the ones to step up and risk their lives and safety to help people they don't know. This is still very common although largely invisible. While Australia was talking about 'toxic masculinity' and 'a curfew for men' every single person risking their lives in that cave in Thailand was a man. It would have been the same if it was a girl's team rather than a boy's team in danger. Recently two men in South America spent days in the wilderness to find a western woman that had become lost. This was not 'big news'. There isn't even any evidence that anyone said thank you. Boko Haram killed boys for years but no one cared. They kidnapped girls and it was global news.

Male disposability, however, is not just about men dying. Many societies consider men's time to be their resource to dispose of. In most countries with conscription, only men serve, even today. This is despite the fact that most military roles are not combat roles. Even if a nation decided not to send women in to combat there are many military roles in which conscripted women could serve. Israel conscripts women into non-combat roles. Israeli women may volunteer for combat roles while men may be forced in to combat. Eritrea is a rare example of a country that conscripts women into combat roles alongside men.

There is an expectation for men to risk their lives and safety to help others, even people they do not know. Even in the last few years, we've seen many media reports in which men were criticised for not risking their lives or safety to rescue others.

We have no problem if a man (or woman) chooses to risk their life or safety to help others but they should not be criticised for not doing so.

Men routinely choose to do the dangerous and dirty jobs in society. Many of these industries try to actively recruit women but have largely failed. To a large degree, both men and women view women's lives as more valuable than men's.

Men are significantly more likely to be victims of violence in public but little is said about this in the public sphere. Here in Australia, the government has programs to reduce violence against the gender that is already least likely to experience violence.

We even see widespread violence against men in the media. Men are killed in droves in modern TV shows with nary a mention.

We reject male disposability in the modern world. While it may have made sense for a society in the past to be prepared to sacrifice its men for the survival of the society, we hold that this is no longer necessary. With a population exceeding 7.5 billion that might reach 10 or 11 billion in a few decades, we no longer need the ability to quickly recover numbers and so the original reasons for male disposability no longer apply.

Food distribution following disasters

A very concerning problem relates to the distribution of food following disasters. The world's largest humanitarian organisation, the World Food Programme, which is part of the United Nations, excludes men and boys from food distribution centres on the basis of gender alone. Men and boys may not enter the food distribution centres. Women are permitted to enter and are then expected to distribute the food to their relatives. These organisations claim that special provision is made for families with no female members but they are light on details.

This has happened in Haiti in the past and appears it may be happening among Venezualean refugees in Colombia.

Domestic Violence

The prevailing position taken by organisations like White Ribbon Australia and our own government towards domestic violence and intimate partner violence ignores available research.

Domestic violence between people who are in an intimate relationship is today known as intimate partner violence, or IPV.

Reciprocal IPV involves intimate partner violence in which each person in the relationship is both a perpetrator and victim of IPV. The Partner Abuse State of Knowledge (PASK) Project, the largest meta-analysis of DV/IPV research ever undertaken, shows that more than half of all IPV is reciprocal.

The National Longitudinal Study of Adolescent Health also found that about half of all IPV is reciprocal IPV. The study examined differences in injury rates between reciprocal and non-reciprocal IPV and found that injury rates are higher in reciprocal IPV than non-reciprocal IPV.

The Duluth Model which is originated in the US but widely influential here treats IPV as something men do to women. Without accepting the true nature of IPV we can never hope to significantly reduce it.

We object to all domestic violence regardless of the gender of the people involved.

Health

Men and boys have higher mortality rates at every age. The difference in life expectancy for men and women in western countries actually widened during most of the 20th century, peaking in the 1990s. One significant contributor to this is the priority that is given to women's health in research funding.

Judicial Discrimination

Even when the evidence against men and women and prior criminal histories are the same, men are more likely to be arrested for an offence, more likely to be charged with an offence, more likely to be convicted of an offence, more likely to receive a custodial sentence, and the sentence will on average be significantly longer. Some states openly advocate on this basis. A UK government commission recently advocated the abolition of all women's prisons. One of the advantages, they argued, was that these prisons could then be used to incarcerate more men.

Laws that are written in a gender-neutral way are often not applied that way, and this is most often is to the detriment of men.

We want fairness in judicial outcomes and sentencing.

Violence

Men experience high levels of violence in society and there is very little recognition of this. Men are close to twice as likely to experience violence as women.

Female-on-male violence is an often ignored problem. Some women, having been taught that violence is gendered, simultaneously object to violence against women but feel that violence against men is inconsequential. One often-repeated myth is that a woman cannot physically harm a man. The many men injured and killed by women are a testament to the erroneous nature of this belief.

Society and the government both ignore and marginalise male victims of violence.

Men are good

Much has been made of negative qualities ascribed to men. These characteristics are often grouped under the heading of Toxic Masculinity and ultimately lead to ridiculous claims like a curfew for men.

There is another side to all of this. The many positive qualities that men bring to societies, their communities and their families.

Men are far more likely to help women, even women they don't know than to ever harm a woman.

Fathers

Now when we talk about a father here, we might be talking about the biological father or a stepfather or perhaps another father figure.

Not everyone can have an involved father of course but that doesn't take away from the fact that many children would benefit from an involved father figure in their lives and that by extension the involvement of men in their children's lives benefits society as a whole.

Children with involved fathers benefit in a number of ways. This list is not intended to be exhaustive.

Children with involved fathers commit fewer crimes than those without. This is also true for violent crimes. Children with involved fathers also commit less bullying.

They are also less likely to experience depression and anxiety. Partly because of this they are less likely to engage in illicit drug use.

Women who grew up with involved fathers showed lower incidence of teen pregnancy as well as better and more stable relationships with men later in life. Research also found that women with involved fathers tended to be less likely to be derogatory towards men and boys.

Presence of fathers in the lives of their children even improve physical and mental health. Children with a dad in their lives are more likely to graduate from high school and overall do better academically.

Men

Men play so many important roles in society.

A lot is made about financial independence these days but the truth is most of us are only independent within the narrow constraints of an industrialised society that keeps us safe and well fed. Few people are truly independent.

There are many jobs in our society that are almost exclusively done by men. Without these jobs our industrialised society would not function. Many of these jobs are unglamerous and some of them pay better than others. What they all have in common is that they are almost exclusively performed by men. We sometimes call these invisible jobs as the majority of people, safe and secure in air conditions apartments and offices can easily forget any of this is going on.

Invisible jobs include:

- High rise window washers
- Miners
- Road crews
- Garbage collectors
- Deep sea fishermen

- Electrical linesmen
- Roofers
- Heating mechanics
- Air conditioning mechanics
- Refrigeration mechanics

Each of us should think about this the next time someone says that men are obsolete or that there should be a curfew for men.

A call to action

We need help. Only a small minority of our supporters ever become active. Some are afraid of the repercussions of involvement but the reality is that there are many jobs that need to be done out of the limelight and every little bit helps.

There are many groups that agree on the problems facing men and boys. Feminists like Christina Hoff Sommers and Camille Paglia, conservatives, liberals, movements like MGTOW and the men's rights movement all broadly agree on the problems facing men and boys. Where we differ is in what to do about the problems.

The men's rights movement, despite claims often made by our opponents, is not intrinsically right wing. In fact, the men's rights movement does not easily fit into a left-right paradigm. With a strong emphasis on equality before the law and the rights of the individual the men's rights movement can initially appear to be similar to Libertarianism but even that is a superficial appraisal. I offer these objectives for the men's rights movement:

- To engage in reasoned peaceful advocacy.
- To eliminate gynocentrism and male disposability.
- To resolve certain issues facing men and boys.
- To achieve equality of opportunity for all.
- To oppose enforcement of traditional gender roles.

It's this last point that I want to focus on today. It's often claimed by our opponents that we want to wind back the clock and put women back in the kitchen. This could not be further from the truth. Many MRAs refer to enforcing gender roles as telling men to get back on the plantation. That alone should give a good indication of how the men's rights movement views gender roles. But our movement is all about choice and that is why we will not discourage a couple if they prefer to maintain traditional gender roles in their relationship. That is a matter for themselves.

It's important to mention Barry Williams and the Lone Fathers Association of Australia. Barry and the Lone Fathers association have been campaigning for court reform for decades.

The Eeny Meeny Miney Mo Foundation Founded by Amanda Sillars seeks to reduce the prevalence and impact of parental alienation in the Australian community.

The Parental Alienation… Family Violence Lost in the FOG conference will be held in Hobart from October 17-19, 2018.

The Australian Brotherhood of Fathers, founded by Leith Erikson, has been campaigning for reform in the family courts for several years. The ABF was also involved in establishing EndAllDv House on the Gold Coast.

Before concluding up I'd like to finish up with a brief story. Back in 1137 the castle of Weinsberg in Germany had endured a long siege. Finally, a surrender of the castle was negotiated. All of the women would be permitted to leave the castle while the men, remaining inside, would be executed. The women would be permitted to take out as much as they could carry on their backs.

Soon after the castle gate opened and each woman stepped out, labouring under the weight on her back, for each woman was carrying her husband. King Konrad who was leading the army besieging the castle was impressed by this clever deception and let the women pass unimpeded.

The misandry so common in society today devalues men and boys. It focuses on the negatives only. Rather we need widespread recognition that we're all in this together and that women won't be better off in a society where men have failed.

It's time to stop the shaming of men and boys. It's time to stop the name calling. It's time for the entire community to come together and end misandry.

The resistance to woke ideology and tactics continues to gain momentum. Two different professors at two different universities have been attacked and canceled by the woke mob for the same offense – standing up for equality. To their great credit, they're fighting back.

In Los Angeles, Management professor Gordon Klein received an email from a "non-black" student containing an odd request – that, in the upcoming exam, black students be graded more leniently than everyone else.

> We are writing to express our tremendous concern about the impact that this final exam and project will have on the mental and physical health of our Black classmates," the student wrote. The unjust murders of Ahmaud Arbery, Breonna Taylor and George Floyd, the life-threatening actions of Amy Cooper and the violent conduct of the [University of California Police Department] have led to fear and anxiety which is further compounded by the disproportionate effect of COVID-19 on the Black community. As we approach finals week, we recognize that these conditions place Black students at an unfair academic disadvantage due to traumatic circumstances out of their control.

How any of that, particularly Amy Cooper's neurotic behavior, can possibly be construed as placing "Black students at an unfair academic disadvantage" is anyone's guess. I suppose the writer considered the matter self-evident.

Klein responded, telling the student that all those taking the exam would be graded according to uniform standards. Naturally, that ignited a firestorm of indignation.

Within two days, a petition calling for Klein's firing garnered 20,000 signatures, the university suspended him from his teaching duties and police were guarding his house. He was also subjected to the type of astonishingly offensive and semi-literate anti-Semitic messages that are becoming de rigueur with the extremist Left.

Alas for the woke, the university soon decided that Klein had done nothing wrong and could not be disciplined. But the Dean of the School of Management, Antonio Bernardo wasn't having it. Apparently on his own initiative, he re-suspended Klein and banned him from campus.

That decision was reversed by the university, again recognizing that Klein had committed no offense.

So, all's well that ends well, right?

Not quite. It seems that Klein earned the majority of his income, not from teaching at UCLA, but from consulting on management issues with law firms and corporations some of which ceased doing business with him. After all, who wants to associate with a "racist." Due to that loss of income, Klein is suing the university.

Meanwhile, at the University of Chicago, professor of geophysical sciences, Dorian Abbot found himself attacked and canceled for, in his words,

> I recorded some short YouTube videos in which I argued for the importance of treating each person as an individual worthy of dignity and respect. In an academic context, that means giving everyone a fair and equal opportunity when they apply for a position as well as allowing them to express their opinions openly, even if you disagree with them.

On U.S. college campuses, such an anathema could not long go uncondemned and Abbot was duly targeted by the woke mob. Fortunately, the University of Chicago is one of the few academic institutions that seems to still place value on free speech and diversity of ideas. The president of UC quashed the uprising and the situation calmed … for a time.

But then Abbot and other colleagues penned an op-ed for Newsweek essentially recommitting the same crime. For admission to college, they proposed, > an alternative framework called Merit, Fairness, and Equality (MFE) whereby university applicants are treated as individuals and evaluated through a rigorous and unbiased process based on their merit and qualifications alone.

What a concept. Needless to say, the mob attacked again, but, having been earlier thwarted by UC, changed tactics.

> They argued on Twitter that I should not be invited to give science seminars at other universities and coordinated replacement speakers. This is an effective and increasingly common way to ratchet up the cost of dissenting because disseminating new work to colleagues is an important part of the scientific endeavor.

It worked. Honored to deliver the prestigious Carlson Lecture at MIT, Abbot was summarily disinvited and MIT canceled this year's lecture altogether rather that court the outrage of the mob.

Back in the 60s, leftists were alert for what they called "consciousness-raising" events. The slaying of four students at Kent State University by national guard troops was such an event because, to the leftists, it demonstrated the lengths to which the power structure would go to stifle dissent over its Viet Nam War policies, and those previously lacking "consciousness" would take notice. What then was "consciousness" is now "woke-ness," but today it's the woke who are the oppressors. Reading the articles by Klein and Abbot, it's impossible to ignore their "raised consciousness" at the hands of, ironically, the leftist woke. Here's Abbot's description of his attitude before his cancelation:

> I mostly just wanted to do my science and not have anyone yell at me, and I thought that if I kept my mouth shut the problem would eventually go away. I > knew that speaking out would likely bring serious reputational and professional consequences. And for a number of years I just didn't think it was worth it.

And here it is afterward:

> I view this episode as an example as well as a striking illustration of the threat woke ideology poses to our culture, our institutions and to our freedoms. I have consistently maintained that woke ideology is essentially totalitarian in nature: it attempts to corral the entirety of human existence into one narrow ideological viewpoint and to silence anyone who disagrees. I believe that these features ultimately derive from the ideology's abandonment of the principle of the inherent dignity of each human being. It is only possible to instrumentalize the individual in order to engineer group-based outcomes within a philosophical framework that has rejected this principle. Similarly, it is easy to justify silencing a dissenter if your ideology denies her individual dignity. Clearly, wokeism has not reached a terrible nadir of destruction yet, but the lesson of history is that we need to name and confront totalitarianisms before they cause disaster, while it is still possible to do so.

What a difference a few months can make.

The more the woke cancel the innocent (do they cancel anyone else?), the more they sow the seeds of the destruction of their disgraceful ideology. Two professors, with a lot to lose, have stood up to the mob. The more cancelations there are, the more resistance the mob will encounter. Expect more Gordon Kleins and Dorian Abbots in the future.

Virginians Tell the Children 'No'

November 5, 2021 | by Robert Franklin | Link | Original Link

It's a year until the mid-term elections of 2022. Will Democrats learn? This past Tuesday, voters in Virginia, New Jersey and Minneapolis sent them a very clear message. Are they listening? We'll know soon enough. After all, Democrats in Congress are still fighting among themselves over infrastructure and reconciliation. So far, that fight has seen progressives wield impressive power, forcing embarrassing retrenchment by Speaker Pelosi on at least two occasions.

But Tuesday's outcomes were a blunt rebuke by voters to Democratic progressivism. Just a few weeks ago, the Virginia governor's race looked like a slam-dunk win for Terry McAuliffe, but the state that went to Biden in 2020 by 10 percentage points dumped the Democrat. Into the bargain, it elected as Lieutenant Governor Winsome Sears, a black Republican female Jamaican immigrant and former Marine. The Republican candidate for governor in New Jersey lost, but only by a hairsbreadth and that in a state with a Democratic incumbent and one million more registered Democrats than Republicans. In Minneapolis, the ballot initiative to replace the entire police department with some vaguely-imagined successor went down in flames, 56% – 44%.

In all that, progressivism was the elephant in the room. Famously, McAuliffe's campaign crashed in large part because of his disdain for parents. "I don't think parents should be telling schools what they should teach" turned out to be an imperfect electoral strategy. Virginia's parents voted for Republican, Glenn Youngkin, by a 15%-point margin. McAuliffe's remark was ridiculously tone deaf, but politicians make those sorts of mistakes all the time and voters forgive them. It's hard to lose a major election on the basis of 12 words spoken extemporaneously, but McAuliffe managed the feat.

His gaff sank him because it so perfectly aligned with the progressive narrative. As the Black Lives Matter website told us, parents and families are outmoded relics of oppression that need replacing by, I suppose, a village. Loudon County, VA parents who protested the teaching of Critical Race Theory were branded as, yes, terrorists by the Biden Justice Department. The Liberty Project chipped in on McAuliffe's behalf with a race-baiting dirty tricks operation that received national attention from CNN. All that and far more occurred within a steady drumbeat of progressive messages to the effect that anyone voting for Youngkin was, of course, a racist.

On PBS Tuesday night, longtime Democratic strategist James Carville summed up the matter nicely referring to "woke stupidity" and adding,

> "I mean, this 'defund the police' lunacy, this 'take Abraham Lincoln's name off of schools,' . . . People see that."

Indeed we do. The question is "will Democratic progressives do the same?" Will they see that they're the main reason for McAuliffe's debacle? If the past is prologue, the answer is "no." For at least a couple of decades now the progressive response to every rejection of their politics and worldview has been, not mature reflection on what went wrong, but to heap opprobrium on voters who reject the woke narrative. Those, they consider to be, at best, witless dupes of right-wing news media and at worst (what else?) racist white supremacists. Thomas Frank's 2004 book, "What's the Matter with Kansas?" called the tune that, as of Wednesday morning, was still being sung by the progressive Twitterati. Virginia voters, you see, are racists, at least the majority who voted for Youngkin.

Surely the measure of that lunacy is the fact that, at the same time they were sending Terry McAuliffe out the back door, those "racist" voters were electing to the lieutenant governorship a black woman who, in her acceptance speech, rightly called her election her own realization of the American Dream. While progressives were slandering Virginia voters as white supremacists, Sears was leading her constituents in a deafening chant of "USA! USA!" Of the two, which sounds like the better appeal to voters, the more upbeat view of a nation and its future?

However you answer, one thing looks clear. The progressive/woke narrative was born and nurtured on college campuses where it received no real pushback. It spilled out of the academy and into the Democratic Party, the leftist media and much of corporate America, but nowhere did it meet serious resistance. Until Tuesday, no one had told the children "No!" But on Election Day, woke progressivism met the real world of electoral politics and fell on its face. Carville is right. We the People do see what the woke are up to and are not amused. You can call a fine, upstanding black woman a racist if you want, but don't expect us to vote for you if you do.

There is a name for this: Democracy in Action. What happened last Tuesday is what democracy has always been about – the takedown of self-appointed elites by everyday folks. It's why we're no longer ruled by monarchs. I don't mean to make more of this than is warranted. Monarchy has merely been replaced by oligarchy, but what that oligarchy learned is that the people can limit its power. The struggle between elites and the rest of us is everlasting.

In the shorter term, what matters is whether progressives demonstrate the ability to grow up and do the things necessary to earn the respect of American voters. The age-old political conundrum – to be ideologically pure or pragmatic – is one progressives have never sorted out, but they tend strongly to prefer purity to success. In the Moderates vs. Progressives fight for power within the Democratic Party, that's been underway for decades and that sees an ascendant progressive minority, that's music to Republican ears.

The coming year and the mid-term elections will tell the tale. We'll see what progressives in Congress do and how President Biden, once a hapless moderate, now a hapless progressive, responds. The short-term fate of the Democratic Party hangs in the balance.

A 1975 Deep Dive

November 10, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

The wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald was immortalized in a song, reminiscent of an old sea shanty, written and performed by Canadian folk singer Gordon Lightfoot. He based his song on "The Cruelest Month," an article in Newsweek magazine that appeared soon after the November 10, 1975 disaster, and recorded the song in December. A number one hit in both the USA and Canada, the lyrics tell the tale, albeit with some poetic license, of the ship's demise, but there's more to the story than the song can encompass…so let's explore this popular ballad of doomed men.

The Wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald

©1976 by Gordon Lightfoot and Moose Music, Ltd.

The legend lives on from the Chippewa on down
Of the big lake they call "Gitche Gumee."
The lake, it is said, never gives up her dead
When the skies of November turn gloomy.
With a load of iron ore, 26,000 tons more
Than the Edmund Fitzgerald weighed empty,
That good ship and true was a bone to be chewed
When the gales of November gave early.

Gitche Gumee was the Chippewa name for Lake Superior, the largest lake in the world in terms of surface area. Generations past of American schoolchildren would have been aware of the name Gitchee Gumee from the opening lines of Henry Wadsworth Longfellow's epic poem, The Song of Hiawatha: "On the shore of Gitche Gumee/Of the shining Big-Sea Water." This cultural touchstone is all but defunct, however, as Hiawatha has been dispatched to the happy hunting ground along with the Washington Redskins and the Cleveland Indians.

When Lightfoot sings that the lake "never gives up her dead," that is literally true. Floating is caused by bloating: the decaying bacteria of a dead body inflate it with gas, causing it to rise to the surface. The extremely cold water of Lake Superior inhibits bacterial growth so dead bodies remain on the bottom.

Built by the Great Lakes Engineering Works, the Edmund Fitzgerald was a bulk carrier launched on June 8, 1958, at River Rouge, Michigan. Built at a cost of $8,000,000, the ship was named after the President and Chairman of the Board of Northwestern Mutual Insurance, which had commissioned the ship. Despite Fitzgerald's profession, he hailed from a family long involved in the shipping industry. He undoubtedly took pride in the fact that his namesake ship was, until 1971, the biggest on the Great Lakes. At 729 feet long (it was one foot less than the legally mandated limit for Great Lakes ships at the time), it could have transported the Statue of Liberty in one piece. Empty, it weighed 13,632 gross tons.

The launching, however, could have been construed as a bad omen. Elizabeth Fitzgerald, Edmund's wife, needed three tries to crack the champagne bottle over the ship's bow. A half hour elapsed before the ship finally slid into the water (sideways, not bow-first). The ship then pitched and rolled, slamming into the dock and drenching spectators, one of whom died of a heart attack.

Once launched, however," Big Fitz" easily broke existing tonnage records. The 26,116 tons of cargo it carried on its last voyage were marble-sized taconite pellets (processed iron ore). The ore had likely been mined from the iron ranges of northeastern Minnesota.

The weather on the Great Lakes traditionally took a turn for the worse in November as the shipping season drew to a close. Experienced seamen referred to Lake Superior as "Old Treacherous."

The ship was the pride of the American side
Coming back from some mill in Wisconsin.
As the big freighters go, it was bigger than most
With a crew and good captain well seasoned,
Concluding some terms with a couple of steel firms
When they left fully loaded for Cleveland.
And later that night when the ship's bell rang,
Could it be the north wind they'd been feelin'?

"Some mill in Wisconsin" was the town of Superior, a port at the western end of Lake Superior just across from Duluth, Minnesota. The ship actually picked up the cargo at the Burlington & Northern docks in Superior, not at a mill. The loading of the ore carrier was key to the stability of the vessel. An uneven load could spell doom in rough seas. At the outset of the two-day trip, however, the sea was calm.

The Captain, Ernest M. McSorley, had 44 years of experience as a mariner. He had served as captain on Great Lakes ships since 1951. He was 63 years old, and with his wife was in a nursing home after suffering a stroke, he was planning on retiring after one last run.

The Captain's immediate subordinates were also "well seasoned." First Mate John H. McCarthy, a longtime associate of the Captain, was 62. Like the Captain, Wheelsman John D. Simmons, 62, was also planning to retire after the voyage. Chief Engineer George Hall was 60. Wheelsman John J. Poviach, the baby of the group, was a mere 59. The rest of the crew was comprised of men in all age groups. If you're wondering, the youngest was watchman Karl Peckol, who was only 20.

When Lightfoot says the ship was bound for Cleveland, he's not wrong, but he's leaving out the fact that the ship was initially headed for Zug Island on the Detroit River (the cargo was headed for a steel mill; the output was likely earmarked for an automobile factory), after which it would continue down the Detroit River to Lake Erie and then eastward to Cleveland, where it was to lay over for the winter.

The ringing of the ship's bell was likely no surprise to anyone within earshot as gale warnings had been issued on the evening of November 9. Even a colossus like the Edmund Fitzgerald would feel the effects.

The wind in the wires made a tattle-tale sound.
When a wave broke over the railing.
And ev'ry man knew, as the captain did too
'Twas the witch of November come stealin'.
The dawn came late and the breakfast had to wait
When the Gales of November came slashin'
When afternoon came it was freezin' rain
In the face of a hurricane west wind.

The "witch of November" was a regional nautical term for the strong winds and towering waves that resulted from the collision of cold air coming down from the north with warm air coming up from the south. At that time of year freezing rain, sleet, and snow were not unusual on Lake Superior, the northernmost Great Lake. Thunder Bay, a port on the Canadian side of the Lake, typically gets its first frost soon after Labor Day.

The gale warning was upgraded to a storm warning in the early morning hours of November 10. Hoping to avoid the worst effects of the storm, Captain McSorley, a renowned "heavy-weather" captain, took a northern route across the lake, thinking that the highlands along the Ontario shoreline might afford the ship some protection.

To compare the storm to a hurricane is not an exaggeration, as Category 1 wind speeds (74-95 mph) were not unheard of on the Great Lakes. With 80 mph winds gusting up to 100 mph, the November 10 storm qualified as a "freshwater hurricane."

When suppertime came the old cook came on deck sayin'
"Fellas, it's too rough t'feed ya."
At 7 P.M. a main hatchway caved in; he said
Fellas, it's been good t'know ya!
The captain wired in he had water comin' in
And the good ship and crew was in peril.
And later that night when his lights went outta sight
Came the wreck of the Edmund Fitzgerald.

The old cook was likely Robert C. Rafferty (age 62), who had not been scheduled to make the run but was filling in for another cook who had taken ill. Like Captain McSorley and Wheelsman Simmons, Rafferty figured this would be his last run before retirement. There were no survivors to corroborate the cook's last words, so Lightfoot is putting words in his mouth. Given the sudden demise of the ship (one expert opined that it could have happened in ten seconds), the cook likely had no time to bid farewell to any of his mates.

One suspects that countless sailors, whose doom was more slow-motion than fast-forward, have said "Fellas, it's been good t'know ya" or words to that effect in many languages over the centuries.

Captain McSorley was in radio contact with Captain Bernie Cooper of the Arthur M. Anderson, another cargo ship following the same route 10-20 miles behind. At 3:30 p.m. Captain McSorley related that he was taking on water and the ship was listing to the starboard side. At 4:10 p.m. the storm knocked out the radar on the Edmund Fitzgerald, so Cooper assisted McSorley by relaying radar reports to him. Cooper had maintained visible contact with the Edmund Fitzgerald but when the storm worsened, that was no longer possible. When the precipitation let up after dark, Captain Cooper scanned the horizon for the lights of the Edmund Fitzgerald but saw only darkness – hence the "lights went outta sight," and the ship disappeared from the radar screen. The Coast Guard confirmed that the Edmund Fitzgerald was lost. The Arthur M. Anderson – at no small risk, given that the storm was still raging – deviated from the route and began searching for survivors. Consequently, the Arthur M. Anderson is a bit of living history, as it is still in service 46 years after it was entered into the record as the last ship to be in contact with the Edmund Fitzgerald.

Immediately after the wreck, speculation focused on faulty hatches that allowed water flowing over the deck to pour into the hold. Captain McSorley had communicated that his pumps were working hard to expel the water but it was coming in as quickly as it was going out. In his last radio message to the Arthur M. Anderson at 7:10 p.m., the Captain insisted "we are holding our own." In fact, no S.O.S. was ever sent out, indicating that things went south in a hurry.

Subsequent investigations went beyond the hatches and turned up alternative explanations. Captain Cooper, for example, speculated that the underside of the ship's hull had been ripped by the infamous Six Fathom Shoals, which were close to the route the ships were following. The seawater and cargo shifting belowdecks as the ship rode the 25-foot waves was another possible explanation. So in his live performances Lightfoot abandoned the hatchway causation. He changed the second line of the above stanza to "At 7 p.m., it grew dark, it was then he said…"

Does anyone know where the love of God goes
When the waves turn the minutes to hours?
The searchers all say they'd have made Whitefish Bay
If they'd put fifteen more miles behind her.
They might have split up or they might have capsized;
They may have broke deep and took water.
And all that remains is the faces and the names
Of the wives and the sons and the daughters.

Whitefish Bay (not to be confused with a Milwaukee suburb of the same name) refers to a body of water on Michigan's Upper Peninsula adjacent to the bi-national city of Saulte Ste. Marie (popularly known as the Soo), where ships go through locks to access Lake Huron. The relative safety of Whitefish Bay was the ideal place for the Edmund Fitzgerald to ride out the storm before going through the locks and continuing southward to Port Huron, Michigan, then down the St. Clair River, across Lake St. Clair, and down the Detroit River to Zug Island.

"Putting fifteen more miles behind her" might have made all the difference in the fate of the ship, but why Lightfoot settled on fifteen and not, say, fourteen or thirteen, is anybody's guess. Of course, at sea there's no safe place in a storm, but some places are safer than others. Indeed, the Arthur M. Anderson, following the same route, survived the storm, as did ships sailing in the opposite direction.

Lightfoot's assertion that she ship "might have split up" was borne out by subsequent searches. Sonar surveys indicated two large pieces of wreckage on the bottom. A robot submersible with a video camera verified the split in 1976. Three mini-submarine inspections (in 1989, 1994, and 1995) conducted by the Great Lakes Shipwreck Historical Society took a closer look at the remains (the front section was rightside-up, the rear was upside-down) and noted the spread of iron ore on the bottom. The remains suggested the ship likely nosedived (i.e., the bow of the ship had crested over a large wave and then plunged straight down). The vessel might have split up due to the stress of the roller-coaster waves and the cargo and water shifting in the hold. Twenty minutes before the Edmund Fitzgerald disappeared from the radar screen, Captain Cooper, then ten miles behind, had ridden out two such waves (he estimated them at 35 feet) and almost suffered a similar fate. Lucky for him, the Arthur M. Anderson was still watertight and at 647 feet (the ship has since been elongated) it was 82 feet shorter than the Edmund Fitzgerald, which should have lessened the stress amidships.

Lake Huron rolls, Superior sings
In the rooms of her ice-water mansion.;
Old Michigan steams like a young man's dreams;
The islands and bays are for sportsmen.
And farther below Lake Ontario
Takes in what Lake Erie can send her,
And the iron boats go as the mariners all know
With the gales of November remembered.

In this stanza it seems Lightfoot feels duty bound to invoke all five Great Lakes, lest listeners assume that Lake Superior is an egregious exception. Created by glaciers during the ice age, the Great Lakes are often referred to as inland seas, and oceangoing vessels (known as "salties") are also at home on the Great Lakes. Each lake has a lengthy roster of shipwrecks. All totaled, the Great Lakes have experienced approximately 7,500 shipwrecks with 30,000 victims.

In a musty old hall in Detroit they prayed
In the "Maritime Sailors' Cathedral."
The church bell chimed till it rang 29 times
For each man on the Edmund Fitzgerald.
The legend lives on from the Chippewa on down
Of the big lake they call "Gitche Gumee."
"Superior," they said, "never gives up her dead
When the gales of November come early."

The Maritime Sailors' Cathedral was an informal name for the Mariners' Church of Detroit built in 1849. Indeed, immediately after the disaster "the brotherhood bell" was rung 29 times. More recently, services were conducted and the bell again was rung 29 on November 10, 2020, to commemorate the 45th anniversary of the wreck.

In later years a veteran seaman protested to Lightfoot that despite the age of the old hall, it was not musty, so Lightfoot changed “musty” to “rustic” in his live performances.

The ship’s 200 lb. bronze bell was recovered during the 1995 mini-submarine expedition and replaced with a new bell engraved with the names of the victims. The original bell is now exhibited in the Great Lakes Shipwreck Museum in Paradise, Michigan. Not surprisingly, an assortment of merch is available in the museum gift shop. In addition to caps, coffee cups, books and DVDs, an Edmund Fitzgerald Lego kit is available.

The ship’s bow anchor was recovered and is on display at the Dossin Great Lakes Museum on Belle Isle in Detroit. The remains of the ship lie at a depth of 535feet, 17 miles north-northwest of Whitefish Point, Michigan, but there’s nothing to see here, folks. Sitting within Canadian waters, the Canadian government officially declared the area a gravesite, hence off limits to divers. Alarm buoys have been deployed to alert the Canadian Coast Guard to any violators.

So much for Gordon Lightfoot’s ballad. The wealth of books, articles, and documentaries on the Edmund Fitzgerald evinces the ghoulish fascination of the subject for mariners and landlubbers alike , but after 46 years, does it have any meaning for the contemporary manosphere?

It’s no surprise that the sinking of the Edmund Fitzgerald was headline news in its day. This was understandable, as it was – and still is – the largest ship ever to sink on the Great lakes. The wreck could have been interpreted as the comeuppance of hubris: man was not made to build ships this big! Nature has the last word on all seagoing vessels, from rowboats to behemoths. Then again, it could be simply fate – nautical noir! At sea as on land, if you’re in the wrong place at the wrong time…

Like the Titanic, the sheer size of the Edmund Fitzgerald boggled the mind. The ship was something of a celebrity, as crowds would gather at the Soo locks whenever the ship was present. Naturally, the ship’s demise drew more attention than the sinking of a lesser freighter would have attracted. The disaster was a reminder that despite an experienced crew and modern technology, sailing was still hazardous – not as perilous as when Odysseus and his contemporaries set sail, but still dangerous.

One might wonder why there has never been a feature film about the Edmund Fitzgerald. After all, filmmakers love to flash “Based on a true story” at the beginning of a movie, and given the capabilities of CGI today, it would seem to be a story just waiting to be told. Of course, the loss of life on the Edmund Fitzgerald was much less than on the Titanic, but that’s not the only reason we don’t have a feature film about it.

For one thing we know what did in the Titanic. Surviving passengers saw the iceberg sideswipe the ship. Despite an exhaustive investigation, no official explanation was ever put forth as to why the Edmund Fitzgerald went down. A feature film that left that question unanswered would not satisfy an audience. You can’t just offer clues; you have to come to a conclusion.

More than that, however, is the relative unimportance of the crew members. The Titanic had a surfeit of elites on board. Also, it's a period piece (the waning days of the Edwardian Era, to be exact), with lavish costumes and décor. More to the point, there were women on board, so that evokes the chivalrous "women and children first" response when it comes time to queue up for the lifeboats. The men on the Edmund Fitzgerald didn't have enough time to man the lifeboats. Aside from the few men on the bridge, the rest were confined to quarters and likely died there. That finality eliminates any drama as to who will survive and who won't. (In one of the mini-sub voyages a dead body was observed on the bottom near the wreckage but it was never identified; at least, the name was never made public.)

The Edmund Fitzgerald, impressive though it was (albeit, 154 feet shorter than the Titanic) , was, after all, a working vessel, not a luxury liner. As amenities go on cargo ships, the Edmund Fitzgerald was as good as it got in 1975, but there was no ship's orchestra, no champagne, no haute cuisine, no formal attire, no deckchairs, no shuffleboard, no glamor, no glitz. The ship transported cargo, not passengers, and no one will shed a tear over the loss of iron ore, no matter how many tons of it sink to the bottom.

Ah, but there were people on board the Edmund Fitzgerald, 29of them. There's your human interest, right? Well, not quite. There were no women on board the Edmund Fitzgerald. In some quarters today the loss of 29 men might evoke a response of "Good riddance." Given the likelihood (as near as I can determine) that they were all white men, some might say "Double good riddance." Of course, the mothers, wives, sisters, and other female relatives of the men likely missed them, but that's not enough to hang a story on. Even today a news report headlined "Edmund Fitzgerald Sinks in Storm, Women Most Affected" is difficult to imagine.

Supposedly, James Cameron, director of Titanic, was pondering a script about the Edmund Fitzgerald. Given his clout in the industry, he certainly could get such a project started if he wanted to, but I think I know why he didn't. Cameron's films are big on female empowerment (in addition to Titanic, the Terminator series, the Avatar series, the Abyss, and Aliens) and it would take some heavy-duty "reimagining" to work that theme into the storyline.

The Edmund Fitzgerald story hearkens back to a time when heavy industry ruled the economic roost. No one uttered the phrase "post-industrial," much less "the information age," or "the digital age." Today the swath of port cities on the shores of the Great Lakes is often referred to as the Rust Belt. Former industrial powerhouses like Detroit and Cleveland are now the butt of jokes. (The best of the bunch: When asked to describe what his hometown of Detroit was really like, famed writer Elmore Leonard responded it was like Cleveland without the glitter.)

In 1975, however, the factories were humming. Port cities were thriving. Raw materials came and went, finished products came and went, either by ship, rail, or truck. There were plenty of good-paying jobs, most of them held by men.

Today with longshoremen and truckers in short supply and empty shelves becoming the new normal, the key role of men engaged in shepherding the raw materials of nature to the needful (and not so needful) things in retail outlets is now obvious. The process is largely invisible to end product users. As far as the average consumer is concerned, goodies are spun out of thin air and elves stock the shelves after the stores close. The employee operating the scanner in the check-out line is the only worker visible in the entire process. And with more and more home delivery, stuff just shows up on your front porch as if by teleportation.

Of course, there are still freighters plying the Great Lakes and there are still men working on them. There's no mystique to these jobs; it's just a matter of moving stuff – albeit lots of stuff – from Point A to Point B. Such male-dominated employment is not in fashion today. One suspects, however, that even the shipping industry is subject to affirmative action policies. Admittedly, it is hard to imagine a masculine-presenting transgendered individual sailing on a cargo ship or unloading one. There is no Good Ship Lollipop on the Great Lakes.

I don't know if women aboard ship is still considered back luck, but ships have always been in touch with their feminine side. In fact, if ships had the gift of speech, they would not need to announce that they preferred "she" and "her" as pronouns. Through the ages, sailors have typically referred to their ships with female pronouns. They often speak fondly of their vessels, past and present, just as one might of old girlfriends.

Explanations for this nominal gynocentrism abound. One is that a ship was like a mother, sheltering the men from harm. Another relates to the ancient Greeks invoking the protection of goddesses and sometimes portraying them on figureheads. More recently we have the tradition of women christening ships with bottles of champagne. Freud theorized that the inner space below the deck was analogous to a womb. An intriguing concept, but I don't think there's a gynecologist alive brave enough to refer to a patient's uterus as a cargo hold.

The longstanding gynecic traditions involving ships will likely prove difficult to uproot, but never fear, they're working on it. Speaking on behalf of unfairly gendered ships worldwide, the Associated Press and the New York Times style books both recommend 'it" and "its" over "she" and "her." What? No, ze, zir, or zem?

Curiously, like other ships named after men, the Edmund Fitzgerald was not immune from female pronouns. A progressive pundit might conveniently conclude that the gender fluidity of the Edmund Fitzgerald was ahead of its time and is worthy of imitation by humans. To which, one might respond that perhaps the fate of the Edmund Fitzgerald is the ultimate result of such sophistry.

Can't help but wonder…if the fed guv keeps pushing the genda-benda agenda, will a trans troubadour one day chronicle the sinking of the ship of state?

A Letter to Washington Post About The Gender Empathy Gap

November 14, 2021 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

I sent the following open letter to Washington Post Columnist Janay Kingsberry to allow for her to respond before I submitted this to A Voice for Men. Unsurprisingly, she didn't reply.

Dear Ms. Kingsberry,

I respectfully ask that you take the time to read this letter in its entirety and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

As a lifelong reader of the Washington Post, I've long noticed that the Post has a clear bias in favor of women. This bias is self-evident by the Post's gender columnist who only champions the female perspective, and by a repulsive 2018 article published by the paper, Why Can't We Hate Men?

Your recent article on the Post's "The Lily" web site[i], U.S. women are largely dissatisfied with how they're treated. Most men don't see a problem, and The Lily site itself (devoted to millennial women) are both additional examples of this bias.

I'm writing to Post columnists to get them to recognize and to correct this gender bias.

As the father of two millennial daughters, I'm not insensitive to issues of gender equality. However, please allow me to share a personal story that I hope provides you a completely different perspective.

When my youngest was in the 8th grade, I went with her as a parent chaperone on a field trip to Washington DC. The class had been given a list of questions for them to answer about each place they visited that day.

For the Vietnam Veterans Memorial, the question was "How many female names are on the memorial wall?" When I politely asked my daughter's teachers why there was no question about the number of male names on the wall, they just stared at me dumbfounded.

Do you know the answer to the question posed to these 8th graders? It's eight! All were nurses.

Do you know the answer to the unasked question? As of May 2021, there were 58,273 male names, each one representing a man killed in the Vietnam war – many of them dying horrible deaths.

That's nearly 7,300 times more male names than female names!

This is but one of a limitless number of examples of what is known as the "gender empathy gap". You, like most Americans, have likely never heard of it. This empathy gap is "… the striking and disturbing indifference of our culture to the suffering of men and boys in stark contrast to our evident concern for the suffering of girls and women."[ii]

The empathy gap:

Is why my daughter's teachers would disrespect the sacrifice of more than 58,000 men by asking only about the number of female names on the wall.

Is why a presidential candidate, Hillary Clinton, once declared that "Women have always been the primary victims of war". If you don't think this is a completely preposterous claim, please read this article, which articulates why Clinton's statement "…isn't a different perspective. It's a lie".

The empathy gap is why thousands of articles just like yours focus only on women, completely oblivious to men's far greater suffering, despite easily obtainable facts.

Males:

- live six years less than women
- suffer 94% of workplace deaths
- are 80% of the homeless
- are 80% of deaths by suicide
- are 76% of homicide victims
- are more likely than women to be charged with crimes, receive 63% longer sentences on average, while women are twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted [iii]
- form the only group who, via the Forced Labour Convention of 1930, is still subject to a type of slavery (aka "military conscription" – the law exempts "able-bodied males between ages 18 and 45 from the ban on slavery and forced labor")
- finally, males are at least 50% of the victims of domestic violence (just ask Johnny Depp or golfer Tiger Woods, or comedian Christopher Titus, or model Lewis Burton, or baseball player Chuck Findley, or John Bobbitt) and yet are nearly 100% ineligible from receiving assistance from taxpayer-funded DV shelters. If you don't believe that women perpetuate at least 50% of DV, please read this law review article, written by a woman.

Despite these well-documented male disadvantages, feminists have convinced many that men instead have "male privilege". If you believe that men are privileged, please view this video.

But the gender empathy gap is even more insidious and widespread than just these undeniable facts, and this gap has always been, quite literally, right in front of us. As the late men's rights activist Marc Angelucci once wrote,

"We simply don't care much about men. In fact, the devaluation of male lives is so entrenched in our psyches and endemic to our system that we refuse to see it — even when it's smack in our face."[iv]

An example that proves Mr. Angelucci's point is the way that mainstream news sources report on the injury or death of men and boys versus the way that they report on that of women and girls. When men are injured or killed, they are often referred to as “workers”, “soldiers” or even “people”. When women are injured or killed, they are usually referred to as “female” or “women”, and their gender becomes central to the story.

A prime example of this gender gap in the media is when the Boko Haram terrorist group kidnapped more than 200 girls a few years ago. There was international condemnation and a global “Bring Back Our Girls” campaign started. First Lady Michelle Obama was photographed holding a “#BringBackOurGirls” sign.

But there was scarcely a trickle of media attention when Boko Haram killed hundreds of boys – many burned alive – months before the girls’ kidnapping. Please view this video about the shameful neglect of these boys’ deaths – because they were male.

In closing, allow me to provide a quote by Supreme Court justice – and three times-wounded Civil War veteran – Oliver Wendell Holmes:

“All societies rest on the death of men”.

If you really think about it, he was right, don’t you think?

Ms. Kingsberry, I respectfully ask that you help to set the record straight. You could start with a column that admits the truth about how it is men who are most mistreated by society, and not women.

Do you have the courage to write such a column? Do you have the courage to tell the truth?

PS. I’m cc’ing other Post columnists to whom I’ve previously sent letters about their own gender-biased columns.

Karla Miller, Work Advice Columnist; a letter about the purported gender wage gap

A NOTE TO READERS:

This is the second open letter of many more that I plan to write to Washington Post columnists who write gender-biased articles. Unsurprisingly, neither columnist to whom I sent letters bothered to respond.

In order to increase our leverage and to let these biased writers know that there are many who object to their slanted reporting, please consider sending Ms. Kingsberry a polite email to let her know that you agree with the contents of this article. Please keep it civil and respectful. Like my wife and two daughters – who I’ve so far been unable to convince of the excesses of feminism – Ms. Kingsberry is not a monster, she’s only misguided.

If you hear back from her, please add a comment to let us know.

Evie Magazine vs. Men Who Refuse to Live and Die for Women

November 18, 2021 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Back in September this year, my colleague Peter Wright showed me this article by Evie Magazine entitled "5 Signs You're Dating a Man-Child." It was apt that he did. Both of us know what is meant by "man-child": any human adult male who wants to enjoy life instead of consigning himself to gynocentric sacrificial living.

Through citing rather extreme examples from her own past dating choices (which may say more about her than the men she admonishes), the author of this article makes the case to shame men, who are likely nowhere near as extreme in immaturity as she makes out, as "Peter Pans." As with any attack on "Peter Pan," the prescribed antidote amounts to a blue pill for men in the name of living on their knees in service to women.

Some may accuse me of being too harsh. They say that immature men do exist, that maybe the article is about those who on occasion fit the description of men who are bad for women relationship-wise. To this, I respond: What is the solution then, and what does the fixed or alternative man that is good for the woman look like?

If this solution has nothing to do with overcoming immaturity then we can assume the subject of admonishment is not an immature man in any real sense. If it resembles attitudes such as "be sure he is loaded or drop him like a used cigarette," "be sure he treats you like a princess," and "be sure he is a devoted family man," then this is not a simple matter of getting a man to be accountable and act like an adult, assuming he ever needs to. All of the above attitudes can be read as "He must be devoted to you selflessly in every way."

Even the title which addresses the prospective reader telling her "You, yes you, may be dating a Man-Child" doesn't feel like it's blaming her, instead implying "everything's wrong with him, and he is everything wrong with the relationship." Am I right in these assumptions? Let's dive into "5 Signs You're Dating a Man-Child" and look through these five signs one by one, and see what is really being said.

Before we do, I note that author Lena Henley prefaces her piece with, "Have you ever dated a man child? Today a lot of guys in their late twenties and early thirties, and heck, even late thirties or early forties, look like adults on the outside, but think and act like a child."

I'm wondering what exactly a "grown man" looks like to the author. Would he be enjoying his life without some gynocentric nag who deems herself mentally infallible defining what it means to be an adult? She proceeds to accuse the "man child" of seeming fun and responsible at first, but he really doesn't have his life together and he "doesn't want to". What would she think of a man who really does have his life together, and actually is fun-loving and laid back, but is also devoted to himself and the things he loves instead of to a woman? Is a man a 'real man'™ only if a woman is involved that he must make the center of his universe?

#1. He Is Unrealistic.

Henley starts rattling off some attributes of the “man-child,” mostly about his dreams, fantasies and desires of fame at first, and then how he is really low maintenance in terms of living conditions. Ironically, although her complaint is that her “man-child” is being unrealistic, she also complains that his apartment is “crappy” and his car is “broken down.” I wonder if “crappy apartment” means not fancy and expensive, and if a “broken down” car just means a budget vehicle. If he’s smart about not blowing money on something fancier so he can get by and conserve, then there is some semblance of realism at work.

But the part that is really jarring is the implied solution to the unrealistic “man-child” problem: the notion that a man must sacrifice his dreams in order to move ahead in life.

Without dreams, however, a man is nothing in terms of vitality. Some of the details can be silly, such as Henley’s own example of “He wants to go on Joe Rogan to smoke weed,” but the solution to fanciful dreaming is simple: a man should care about the goal in mind and discipline himself towards that goal. Goals can end up being refined, as can dreams themselves. The purpose of adulthood is to fulfill the most important promises to himself as well as the most important dreams, and to bring these self-interests into reality. The purpose of imagination is to be introduced to the real world with adherence to the constraints of reality, and then to potentially improve reality through his own acts. The key here is to advise men to make the most of his imagination, and not to kill it altogether.

Henley’s accusation about the dreaming man not being “focused on the right things” and without “reasonable expectations about what he can do with his life” bears a remarkable resemblance to politically correct gynocentric modes of public schooling, in which boys are being admonished for being boys and are essentially being treated like defective girls. Whereas traditional conservative women love to admonish feminists for promoting this sort of behavior, these traditionalists are no less complicit. Lena Henley definitely would fit the profile of a public school teacher trying to make boys behave like girls, coupled with the hypocrisy of wanting a “real man” romantically.

#2. He Can’t Keep a Job

Henley starts off with a rather bizarre scenario in which her “man-child” always plans but never acts, actively refuses job offers or quitting jobs on a whim, and doesn’t understand the importance of an income (no doubt, what she imagines as her income he has to earn). She is blatantly scraping the bottom of the barrel to have some sensationalist content for trad girl power, it seems. She mocks his supposed long term dreams and then accuses him of not committing to anything long-term, in a strange contradiction.

“He won’t do anything unglamorous or self-sacrificial.”

Yep, she blatantly admits it here. The man who works to dispose and undermine himself is her take on standards for men.

“Self-sacrificial” has been taken throughout history to mean “compassionate and helpful.” However, this is not a simple matter of a semantics disagreement. The end goal of this expectation has been to see one become sacrificed, particularly for men. The desire of this sort of woman, to see men service, toil and literally die for womankind, exposes the hypocrisy of Evie Magazine and the audience it caters to. These women profess “feminine power” and still demand the use and “value” of men as means to those ends.

Once again, the case for horseshoe theory becomes that much stronger: trad women and feminist women profess their own version of independence and power, which only amounts to the use of men towards women’s ends.

Henley is apparently not privy to the notion that the greater a job is, the more competitive it can be to maintain it. For example, some of today’s best and well-known programmers freely admit to having gone from job to job, some of it due to being fired for one reason or another. It is often said that men are risk takers, and that they often climb whatever hierarchy they are a part of, in this case, in their career. There is a chance that in that attempt to climb it, they can fall. This is what is meant by taking risks; this expectation (and I admit, sometimes a necessity) for a man to take a risk in this way is in direct odds with Henley’s demand that men be “realistic”.

The real test of a man in this context is to balance risk-taking with a way to stand back up in the best way that he can. Men everywhere lose jobs, sometimes due to their own fault (but he will learn his lessons and do better the next time), sometimes because of forces he can’t control such as layoffs, for instance, and sometimes as an act of asserting control over himself, such as thinking about his career because his current job atrophies some skills he wants to improve. These men can be competent at what they do, but still learn that the idea of job security is very often a myth.

Henley’s use of the lowest common denominator as an example shows that there was really no point to this article except making snide women like herself feel better by having something to admonish; an act of lowering the bar to appear high above. The motive to write this sort of ramble is not to rectify a rare if not completely fantastical problem, but rather provide a given woman with an excuse to take any quality that doesn’t meet her unrealistic standards and then slap a “man-child” label on it.

If it isn’t clear by now, this article is not about immature men wasting their life, but rather a faulty-premise accusation of such against men that don’t fit the author’s vision of a Prince Charming on a white horse and shining armor.

Moving on, Henley proceeds to reference Suzanne Venker’s Step #6 from her 12 Step Program to Getting Hitched (And Staying Hitched), “Date the accountant, not the artist.” Or should this read: “Date the broken man with a day in day out life of drudgery, not the man with his intact dreams that keep him vital and going?” It’s a clear indication that men are wanted as just a money-generating pig. Many hard-earning professionals out there are hobbyists and artists as well, and even have happy families. But of course, this is a contingency not thought of when the task at hand is to shame fun-loving men as a sort of genetic dead end.

Henley tries to save face by saying that most women aren't gold diggers and "they just want a man to be realistic about the fact that he'll need to make money if she gets pregnant and has a child…" I am assuming this also means the absurd child support payments she will be expecting from him once she separates from him. I will take a chance that the author is the type of person who would also lob the "man-child" title to a practitioner of the MGTOW philosophy who is likely in no way intent on impregnating a woman, whether he is the type that lets women into his life or not.

Furthermore, the author should be asking why she is the one risking accidentally having a child with her fantastical "man-child." Then again, I'm not sensing any desire to emphasize female accountability here.

"But a man child is himself a child," continues Henley; "why would he think about what it takes to raise a child when he's busy being one himself?" It seems to me that she is the type that would make a mockery out of men who still want some kind of affection and attention from his own wife or partner, understandably so, now that she's devoting the grand majority to their new child. What, then, is the criteria in which the man is not being a child? Probably someone distant enough to not involve himself in family bonding, who just shuts up, never complains, only earns money and protects and sustains the family as needed. Oh wait, this contradicts efforts to actually get fathers involved with their children's upbringing. Remind me what is the difference between the narratives of feminism and Evie Magazine again?

#3. He Has the Wrong Priorities

Read: "His priority isn't us women."

Henley starts off talking about how he dated a "man-child" and how he'd have money for music festivals (but not to take her out to dinner). Then she says about taking "flexing mirror selfies at the gym, but he didn't have time to work a job or do his budget".

First off, if he doesn't know how to manage finances, how can he have money for music festivals? Also, a music festival sounds more worthwhile than taking Princess out to dinner in a ridiculously priced restaurant only to have her complain about how there's something minutely wrong with the order. So I disagree, I think he has the right priorities there. Second, don't gyms cost money? If he doesn't have time to work, or do his budget, how can he manage this?

"He had time to scroll through social media, but not to clean his neglected kitchen". All of us scroll through social media, as it is one of the easier things to do in this day and age. And if she's such a traditional woman, why isn't she the solution to the kitchen problem? Oh right, she's basically promoting the gynotrad femininity of her being the value-in-of-itself in the relationship and not actually help around the house. Is that a hot take on my part? Maybe, but it's insignificant compared to Henley's vast generalizations throughout her piece.

"He'd have time to do drugs with his buddies, but was too busy to help me set up an air conditioner in my new rental." This probably translates to "he was too busy to set up the air conditioner for me," and the drugs are probably something he's driven to do to get away from all the nagging. Forgive my sardonic attitude, but I'm still not sure what is the value offered by the author in any given relationship she is in.

"A man child has all the wrong priorities," she says. "He puts fun, leisure, and himself before anything difficult or unglamorous." Putting yourself first is one of the most difficult, challenging, and often unglamorous things to do in a world that demands men sell their bodies and souls for the right to exist. A man putting himself first is not only a moral right that he has, but at this point it's a necessity lest he gets swept up by shaming tactics that coerce him into dedicating his life to a woman. As for the fun and leisure, a man owes so much of that to himself at this point, and it probably doesn't come for free anyway.

"He doesn't want to make any sacrifices for other people." When people say "for other people," they usually mean "for me." It is bad enough that, as stated before, the end goal is to see the man become sacrificed. However, the collector of the sacrifice becomes ever clear: a woman that wants to "have it all" and wants it served by a man.

"A man child is very self-involved and narcissistic – he doesn't think about anyone except himself." Such is the cry of the real narcissist, the real parasite in these matters. Men must beware of those that accuse them of narcissism and conflate it with self-involvement as if the latter is a bad thing. The accusation is code for "he won't pay attention to me." Beware of the woman that admonishes you for not sacrificing. She intends to see you sacrificed.

#4. He's Not Protective.

This is just another way of saying "He's not brave enough die for me. How sad."

Read the examples Henley gives in her article at this point. These are as warped as an example of a man can get, and it's getting clearer that she's the one that actually needs fixing. Why would she bother staying with such a man if the motive wasn't a nefarious one of trying to manipulate and change a man to her vision?

Her examples actually are admonitions for her man to be stupid and actually walk into danger as if a moth to a flame. But what she seems to want is protective behavior, as per the usual gynotrad narrative. What we're seeing here is something of a damned if you do, damned if you don't attitude towards a man throwing himself into danger. If he does stupidly court danger, she accuses him of endangering her in the process (throwing her under the bus at the first sign of trouble, in her terms). If he avoids it, he will no doubt look less attractive for actually getting her away from danger instead of fighting. Note in either case the lack of concern for the man's well-being.

#5. He Can't Make Decisions

I hate to do the "read: what she really means" routine so many times in a row but it's impossible to avoid it. This can be read, "he can't make decisions I don't approve of."

In gynocentric norms of society, what's taken for granted and often joked about is the fact that women seem to make plenty if not all the rules and decisions that a family (certainly the husband) abides by. Henley's so-called "man children" never needed to exist for this implicit expectation of gynocracy at these local levels of relationships and families to be real. Whoever the men are that she accuses of being unable to make decisions are likely just playing along the same expectations of their roles without the pretense of actually being the leader.

Henley closes the article by accusing these men of being "Peter Pan" and that he "will likely never grow up." Once again, it's time to defend Peter Pan. If a man is being accused of having "Peter Pan Syndrome," it is because he has his puer, his inner boy quality, intact and alive. Anybody who knows the archetypal essence of young boys knows that a boy relishes adventure and desires to be out on his own. He is independent, but also often looking up to his opposite, the senex or wise male elder.

It is in contrast to the hero archetype which is perpetually preoccupied with being a mama's boy and meeting the approval of the great mother archetype. Tell me, who is the immature one here in these matters? The case against Peter Pan is not that he is immature and actually refuses to grow up as such (the Peter Pan man is not that.) Rather, it is resentment of the fact that the Peter Pan man has his own life which the accuser is not the main focus of. Look at any attack on puer men, called anything from "Peter Pans" to "man children", and you can see that resentment. The snide narrative of "failure to launch," normally attached to these ridicules, is condescension that says "you aren't successful enough to please narcissistic women."

I'm almost tempted to say that one should not bother reading Evie Magazine for any worthwhile insight into men and women's relationships. The truth of the matter is, however, that we should read material from this website every so often to let these gynotrad women tell in their own words what is the criteria for the broken men they consistently expect and want as examples of masculine virtue. The material in this website make for an interesting case study as to how the chivalry-peddling traditional gynocentrist and the typical feminist bear a remarkable resemblance. Remember also that the magazine's official Twitter account clearly tweeted: "Normalize slapping men in the face when they've crossed the line."

I can deduce with confidence that this article was not a warning against the rare trainwreck type of men, because we can guess easily what the author's solutions are by looking at exactly what she complains about. Any given quality that doesn't serve her over himself is derided as "man child" behavior. Her only real attempt at sounding realistic is when she brings up the subject of child rearing, but even that argument collapses easy if you consider that child rearing is the leverage put against male victims of paternity fraud, the grounds for bank-breaking child support payments, and just another attempt at "think of the children!"

Not once have I gotten an indication that the author can even love and respect a man for having his own life goals; instead, her standards disapprove of a man's "me first" as attained peacefully by himself, and advocates her own "me first" as potentially provided by a man. This is the sign of an attempt to manipulate and control a man by declaring any bit of non-gynocentric behavior as indication of a fundamental toxicity. One might as well re-title this article "5 Ways to Manipulate a Man Through Admonition", or "5 Ways to Shame Men Into Living for Women.”

In closing, I want to end on a more cheerful note with some encouragement to the men who need it. You don’t have to stop dreaming. In fact, if you don’t dream you may as well be dead. Dream big, if you’d like. But find the discipline to make the most meaningful dreams become real. Take control of the way you work and find work but be sure that it is in your own best interests. Enjoy your music festivals, your crafts, your entertainment, and your hobbies – they are clearly meaningful to you. If you are aiming to have children, remind yourself that the best fathers all have their puer intact and will be lifelong examples for your own children to look up to. If someone calls you Peter Pan, own it. Go your own way, your own way.

Limit to gender justice: lessons of ancient & medieval sumptuary laws

November 21, 2021 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Men historically have carried a highly disparate gender burden of working to provide money for women. Women seeking from men expensive goods (dinners at fine restaurants, diamond rings, fancy dresses, etc.) contributes to this structural gender oppression of men. One distraught man recently described gender-typical difficulties in his relationship with his wife:

> She came from a family where she got everything she wanted. I've been working for years trying to give her the same kinds of things but I just cannot do it, I lost one of my two jobs and have had to give a lot up. … I see husbands buying their wives Lexus and Mercedes cars and I can't even dream of doing that.

More than 2200 years ago, the Roman Republic passed Lex Oppia to limit women's acquisition of gold and women's display of privilege of riding in carriages pulled by multiple horses. Lex Oppia thus constrained men's gift-giving to women. Medieval Italian cities similarly passed sumptuary laws on women that limited material demands on men. While reflecting relatively sophisticated understanding of gender relations, such laws typically had little enduring effects. The fourteenth-century Florentine merchant, public official, and literary writer Franco Sacchetti in his Trecentonovelle brilliantly narrated how sumptuary laws on women cannot get beyond a prevalent limit to gender justice.

Many blue-collar men labor at their jobs with little awareness of structural gender oppression. So it was in medieval Italy. Yet Greek and Roman classics were more widely read in medieval Italy than even among all university professors today. To those who encountered their eternal truths, the classics were alive in medieval Italy to an extant scarcely conceivable today. Sacchetti in his Trecentonovelle presented the classical insight of the fourteenth-century Florentine Coppo di Borghese:

> There was once a citizen of Florence, wise and very well-to-do, whose name was Coppo di Borghese. He lived across from where the Leoni are now, and he was having his house worked on. Reading one Saturday afternoon in Livy, he came upon a story of how the Roman women, because a law had been made recently against their fancy dress, had run to the Capitol, asking and pleading that the law be lifted. Coppo, although wise, was also haughty and a little weird. He began to fly into a rage, as if the events were happening in front of him. He banged the book and his hand on the table, and sometimes stuck the book with his hand, saying: "Alas, Romans, you will suffer this, you who have suffered that no king or emperor be greater than you?"
> { Fu un cittadino già in Firenze, e savio, e in istato assai il cui nome fu Coppo di Borghese, e stava dirimpetto dove stanno al presente i Leoni, il quale faceva murare nelle sue case; e leggendo un sabato dopo nona nel Titolivio, si venne abbattuto a una storia; come le donne romane, essendo stata fatta contra loro ornamenti legge di poco tempo, erano corse al Campidoglio, volendo e addomandando che quella legge si dirogasse. Coppo, come che savio fosse, essendo sdegnoso, e in parte bizzarro, cominciò in sé medesimo muoversi ad ira, come il caso in quella dinanzi a lui intervenisse; e percuote e 'l libro e le mani in su la tavola, e talora percuote l'una con l'altra mano, dicendo: "Oimè, Romani, sofferrete voi questo, che non avete sofferto che re o imperadore sia maggior di voi?" } [1]

Coppo had good reason to be distraught. Like the Romans, the Florentines were struggling to constrain women acquiring and displaying luxury goods.[2] The masons working on Coppo's house entered and found him enraged. These men hadn't been taught about structural gender oppression. They didn't understand Coppo's concern for social justice. They simply wanted to be paid for their hard, dirty brick-work.

Coppo's mind was on matters far bigger than these men's hard, dirty brick-work. Coppo told them that he didn't care if his whole house collapsed. He scornfully ignored their request for fair payment for their work:

> Eh, go with God today in the name of the devil. I gladly would have never been born in this world, having to think that those brazen ones, those whores, those weeping women, have so much daring that they ran to the Capitol to get back their fancy dress. What will the Romans do with this? For Coppo, who is here, cannot make peace. If I could, I would burn them all, so that whoever remained would always remember. Go away, and leave me alone.
>
> { Deh, andatevi con Dio oggi al nome del diavolo, ch'io vorrei volentieri non > esser mai stato al mondo, pensando che quelle sfacciate, quelle puttane, quelle dolorose, abbiano aúto tanto ardire ch'elle sieno corse al Campidoglio per rivolere gli ornamenti. Che faranno li Romani di questo? ché Coppo, che è qui, non se ne puote dar pace: e se io potessi, tutte le farei ardere, acciò che sempre chi rimanesse se ne ricordasse: andatevene, e lasciatemi stare. }

The working men had no understanding of what had enraged Coppo. One thought that with the word "Romans" Coppo was referring to a stadera, a kind of scale, or perhaps a stadium, a measure of length. Another figured that Coppo's wife had cuckolded him. A third understood Coppo's word for "Capitol {Campidoglio}" to mean "I complain of my headache {de capo mi doglio}." Another thought that the house owner had spilled "a cup of oil {un coppo d'oglio}."[3] Men's concerns for gender justice have long been badly understood.

Florence established an Official of Women {Ufficiale delle donne} in the 1330s. Offices for women now exist within most local, state, and national governments. But in medieval Florence, the officials for women didn't merely seek to promote women's interests. The medieval Florentine officials for women were concerned for gender equality. They sought to advance gender equality by limiting women's competition to obtain and display fancy clothes.[4]

The Florentine Ufficiale delle donne was scarcely able to constrain Florentine women. In 1384, Messer Amerigo degli Amerighi of Pesaro was appointed Ufficiale delle donne. Messer Amerigo brought with him a notary and six assistants to staff his office. These sub-officials were all highly competent professionals. Moreover, since they were from a different city, they had some protection against Florentine women's personal and political power. Nonetheless, the Ufficiale delle donne Messer Amerigo soon declared to the Florentine city leaders:

> My lords, I have studied all my life to learn law. Now, when I thought that I knew something, I find that I know nothing. Obeying the orders that you gave me, I went out to seek the forbidden fancy dress of your women. They met me with arguments the like of which are not to be found in any law book. Some of these I will repeat to you. A woman comes with the peak of her hood fringed out and twisted around her head. My notary says, "Tell me your name, for you have a peak with fringes." The good woman takes this peak, which is fastened round her head with a pin, and holding it in her hand, she declares that it is a wreath. Then going further, he finds one wearing many buttons in front of her dress. He says to her, "You are not allowed to wear those buttons." But she answers, "Yes, Messer, but I may for these are not buttons but studs, and if you do not believe me, look, they have no loops, and moreover there are no buttonholes." Then the notary goes to another who is wearing ermine and says, "Now what can she say to this?" And he prepares to write down her name. But the woman answers, "Do not write me down, for this is not ermine, it is the fur of lattizzo." Says the notary, "What is this lattizzo?" and the woman replies, "It is an animal." Thus my notary

> { Signori miei, io ho tutto il tempo della vita mia studiato per apparar ragione, e ora, quando io credea sapere qualche cosa, io truovo che io so nulla, però che cercando degli ornamenti divietati alle vostre donne per gli ordini che m'avete dati, sí fatti argomenti non trovai mai in alcuna legge, come sono quelli ch'elle fanno; e fra gli altri ve ne voglio nominare alcuni. E' si truova una donna col becchetto frastagliato avvolto sopra il cappuccio; il notaio mio dice: "Ditemi il nome vostro; però che avete il becchetto intagliato"; la buona donna piglia questo becchetto che è appiccato al cappuccio con uno spillo, e recaselo in mano, e dice ch'egli è una ghirlanda. Or va piú oltre, truova molti bottoni portare dinanzi; dicesi a quella che è trovata: "Questi bottoni voi non potete portare"; e quella risponde: "Messer sí, posso, ché questi non sono bottoni, ma sono coppelle, e se non mi credete, guardate, e' non hanno picciuolo, e ancora non c'è niuno occhiello". Va il notaio all'altra che porta gli ermellini, e dice: "Che potrà apporre costei?" "Voi portate gli ermellini"; e la vuole scrivere; la donna dice: "Non iscrivete, no, ché questi non sono ermellini, anzi sono lattizzi"; dice il notaio: "Che cosa è questo lattizzo?" e la donna risponde: "È una bestia". E 'l notaio mio come bestia. } [5]

The Florentine city leaders understood Coppo di Borghese's rage at the Roman leaders surrendering to women. Yet those city leaders also understood women's power in gynocentric society. They told Messer Amerigo and his staff to do only what was feasible in seeking to constrain women according to city law. The men of the medieval Florentine Office of Women understood what that meant:

> After this, hardly any officer carried out his orders or gave himself any trouble, but allowed the peaks to pass for wreaths and meddled not with the false buttons and the lattizzo's fur and the belts. And so goes a Friulan saying: "What woman wants, God wants, and what God wants, will be."
> { E questo fu detto in tal ora, e in tal punto, che quasi d'allora in qua nessuno officiale quasi ha fatto officio, o datosene fatica; lasciando correre le ghirlande per becchetti, e le coppelle e i lattizzi, e' cinciglioni. E però dice il Friolano: "Ciò che vuole dunna, vuol signò; e ciò che vuol signò, tirli in birli". }

The Florentine Ufficiale delle donne effectively couldn't do anything that women disliked. That office thus faced the limit on gender justice that most government bodies face today.

Men deserve equal blame with women for the failure of sumptuary laws on women's dress. Writing about the year 1315, an authority in Venice observed:

> Sometimes the man follows too much the will of the woman in buying her fancy dress, and this gives rise to much evil and excessive expenditure. The woman is more than ever filled with pride, and for vainglory desires still more to go out and show herself. … If the custom of the city in this respect is extravagant, it should > be regulated by laws after the manner of the Romans.

> { El segondo si è ke alguna fiada l' omo seve tropo la voluntade de la femna en comprarli ornamenti, ke de çò nasce multi mali, sopercle spensarie, e la femena d' è plù soperba et ella per vanagloria vol plu andar e plu mostrarse. … E se la çitade de çò è tropo larga, sovra de çò se de' far statuti, sì co fese li Romani } [6]

Men purchased luxury goods for women. Men helped women to evade the sumptuary laws. In addition, men were subject to and paid the fines for women violating sumptuary laws.[7] Some women were so willing to have their men incur fines that they regarded sumptuary laws as merely luxury taxes. The phrase "pay the luxury tax {pagar le pompe}" became a common expression for describing women's behavioral response to sumptuary laws.[8]

Given the economic importance of restraining women's demand for luxuries, cites made extraordinary efforts to make such laws effective. Florentine city officials were ordered to read the sumptuary laws of 1322-5 publicly at least once a month. Moreover, priests were required to read those laws in their churches. Priests were also required to report any violations to city officials.[9] Just as universities now do in the U.S. for sexual offenses, cities in medieval Italy set up means for making secret denunciations of persons who allegedly violated sumptuary laws. Anonymous denunciation boxes, called tamburi, were common in Florence by the fifteenth century.[10]

Nonetheless, city officials' frustration and despair over women's power is readily apparent. Florentine city magistrates in 1433 elected new officials in charge of enforcing laws on women's fancy dress. The magistrates commended the new officials' character, but highlighted with extreme language the difficulty of their assignment:

> In great measure these officials of women's fancy dress have an honest desire to restrain the barbarous and irrepressible bestiality of women. Not mindful of the weakness of their nature, forgetting that they are subject to their husbands, and transforming their perverse sense into a reprobate and diabolical nature, they force their husbands with their honeyed poison to submit to them.
> { maxime quare cupiditatem honestam magnum in modum habuerunt ad refrenandum barbaram et indomitam feminarum bestialitatem que, non memores sue nature fragilitatis et quod viris subdite sint eorum pravum mutantes sensum in reprobam et diabolicam naturam, ipsos viros cogunt, mellifluis venenis, ipsis subiecte } [11]

Throughout history, few men have been strong enough to stand up to women rather than submit to them. As the magistrates recognized, not constraining men's weakness for giving women luxurious gifts prompts men to avoid marriage:

> It is not in conformity with nature for women to dress themselves with such fancy dress when men, because of this, avoid the bond of matrimony because of the unbearable expense.

> { non est nature conforme ut tantis sumptuosis ornamentis se hornent cum ipsi homines propter hoc desstant a matrimonii copula propter incomportabiles sumptus }

Florentine officials were concerned that if men avoid marriage, women are less likely to have children, and the city population would decline. City officials evidently weren't willing to encourage immigration into the city. Today, men avoid marriage because police, without any due process of law, will throw men out of their homes on the adverse word of a cohabiting woman. Men also face huge anti-men sex discrimination in family courts. Yet women's demands for luxury goods still remain a significant deterrent to marriage.

Medieval officials incurred the wrath of women for prohibiting luxurious dresses. In 1279, Cardinal Latino Malabranca, the papal legate for Lombardy, Tuscany, and Romagna, attempted to constrain woman's fancy dress:

> He enraged all women with the law he made. It restrained women to wear shorter dress — long enough to touch the ground or longer only by the measure of one palm. Previously women had dragged on the ground behind them dress-trains of an arm-and-a-half's length. Of which Patecchio said: "And dresses so long, they drag the dirt." And he had this law preached in churches and imposed on women as a religous requirement: no priest could grant absolution to them until they complied. To the women, this law was all the more bitter than death. A certain woman friend told me that her dress train was dearer to her than the total of all the other clothes that she wore.
> { turbavit mulieres omnes cum quadam constituione, quam fecit; in qua continebatur, quod mulieres haberent vestimenta curta usque ad terram et tantum plus, quanta est unius palme mensura. Trahebant enim prius caudas vestimentorum per terram longas per brachium et dimidium. De quibus dicit Patecclus: "Et trappi longhi, ke la polver menna." Et fecit hoc per ecclesias predicari et imposuit mulieribus sub precepto, et quod nullus sacerdos posset eas absolvere, nisi ita facerent; quod fuit mulieribus amarius omni morte. Nam quedam mulier familiariter dixit michi, quod plus erat ei kara illa cauda quam totum aliud vestimentum, quo induebatur. } [12]

Some women in the U.S. today wear short-shorts so short that their butt-cheeks show.

Fashions change, but the way in which women are oppressed remains. Cardinal Latino even imposed additional hardships on women:

> In the above law Cardinal Latinus also ruled that every woman — not just young women and young ladies, but even married women and widows and elderly women — must wear a veil on her head. To them, that was burdensome and horrible.
> { Insuper cardinalis Latinus precepit in illa constitutione, quod omnes mulieres, tam iuvencule sive domicelle quam maritate et vidue et matrone, in capitibus vela portarent. Quod grave horribiliter fuit eis. }

Women in Islamic cultures have commonly wore veils on their heads. Like women in Islamic cultures, women in medieval Italy turned veils to their advantage:

> They soon came upon a remedy for this tribulation, although they could do very little about their dress trains. They began construct their veils of linen and silk, interwoven with gold. That made them appear ten times better and more greatly attracted lascivious, gazing eyes.
> { isti tribulationi remedium invenerunt, quod minime potuerunt caudis. Nam vela faciebant fieri de bisso et serico, auro intexta, cum quibus in decuplum melius apparebant et magis ad lasciviam videntium oculos attrahebant. }

Many men at this time were peasant laborers, barely earning food, clothing, and shelter by working hard, dirty jobs such as plowing, carting, and brick-laying. In addition, men had to endure these highly privileged women's sexual harassment of them. As has been commonly the case, law did relatively little to help men.

The limit to gender justice in the ancient Roman Republic has changed little to our day. Men today can imagine a dinner party in which Fortunata, who had as husband Timalchio, entered to greet her friend Scintilla, who had as husband Habinnas. Fortunata sat with Scintilla, kissed her, and held her hand. Their encounter progressed to exchanging intimacies:

> Fortunata tugged the bracelets off her extremely fat arms and displayed them to the admiring Scintilla. Finally she even removed her anklets and her golden hairnet, which she said was of pure gold. Trimalchio observed this encounter, and ordered that all the jewelry be brought to him. "You see," he said, "these are women's fetters. This is how we foolish milksops are robbed. She must have six and half pounds of them…." Scintilla was no better. From her neck she removed a little gold locket that she called her happy box. From it she produced twin earings and handed each in turn to Fortunata to examine, saying: "Thanks to my husband's kindness, no one has a better pair."
> { Fortunata armillas suas crassissimis detraheret lacertis Scintillaeque miranti ostenderet. Vltimo etiam periscelides resolvit et reticulum aureum, quem ex obrussa esse dicebat. Notavit haec Trimalchio iussitque afferri omnia et: "Videtis, > inquit, mulieris compedes: sic nos barcalae despoliamur. Sex pondo et selibram debet habere. Et ipse nihilo minus habeo decem pondo armillam ex millesimis Mercurii factam." Vltimo etiam, ne mentiri videretur, stateram iussit afferri et circulatum approbari pondus. Nec melior Scintilla, quae de cervice sua capsellam detraxit aureolam, quam Felicionem appellabat. Inde duo crotalia protulit et Fortunatae invicem consideranda dedit et: "Domini, inquit, mei beneficio nemo habet meliora." } [13]

Scintilla's husband Habinnas responded scornfully to his wife's masculinity-demeaning compliment:

> You really emptied me out, just so I could buy you a glass bead. I tell you straight, if I had a daughter, I'd cut her little ears off. If there were no women in the world, we could live dirt-cheap. But as things stand, what we drink down for our own basic needs is less than we piss away, burning in love.
> { excatarissasti me, ut tibi emerem fabam vitream. Plane si filiam haberem, auriculas illi praeciderem. Mulieres si non essent, omnia pro luto haberemus; nunc hoc est caldum meiere et frigidum potare. }

As husbands, men experience themselves being dessicated. As fathers, despite their great love for their daughters, men cannot protect their daughters from the pernicious gynocentric teachings that pour into their daughters' ears.

The limit to gender justice is what women want. Sumptuary laws benefit women by constraining competition among women in dress. Sumptuary laws benefit men by limiting competition among men to provide women with the most expensive dress. But neither Lex Oppia in the Roman Republic 2200 years ago nor sumptuary laws in medieval Italian cities effectively endured. Such laws enraged women in their immediate, narrow interests. Those laws were thus either repealed or not effectively enforced. In today's workplace, men are commonly prohibited from wearing shorts, but women are allowed to wear less-than-knee-length dresses. Read Livy and medieval history, and you will understand.

Coppo di Borghese Domenichi held important Florentine city offices between 1308 and the early 1340s. Boccoccio, among other prominent figures, held Coppo in high regard. Cornish (2010) p. 18. See, e.g. Decameron 5.9.4. Here's some analysis of Boccaccio's story of the falcon.

Coppo was reading about the Roman women's rebellion against Lex Oppia. That rebellion is described in Livy, Ab Urbe Condita Libri (History of Rome) 34.1-8, freely available online in the English translation of Roberts (1905). Livy's account includes a still-relevant speech by Cato the Elder. Coppo apparently sponsored an Aeneid compendium in Italian that Andrea Lancia made from a Latin compendium about 1316. Cornish (2010) p. 18. Cornish astutely observed that it's "highly unlikely" that Coppo was reading Livy in the original Latin. Id. p. 19.

Franco Sacchetti, who lived from about 1330 to 1400, was from an old Floretine family of the Guelf faction. In addition to being a merchant and public official, Sacchetti wrote poetry with themes of love, politics, and comedy. He also wrote moralistic pieces similar to sermons. Sacchetti's Trecentonovelle {Three Hundred Short Novels} is regarded as an early masterpiece of prose writing. He wrote Trecentonovelle between 1392 and 1397. That work regrettably has survived only in part in a sixteenth-century transcription. For English translations of some of the novelles in Trecentonovelle, Steegmann (1908) and Roscoe (1825) vol. 1, pp. 82-93.

[2] The first Florentine sumptuary laws probably were enacted about the 1260s. A comprehensive package of laws regulating women's fancy dress was established in Florence from 1322 to 1325. Rainey (1985) pp. 44, 50-67. For a freely available overview of sumptuary law in medieval Italy, Facelle (2009).

Women's political power readily overcame Florentine sumptuary laws. Charles, Duke of Calabria, became ruling lord of Florence in 1325 to lead the city's defenses against the threatening army of Castruccio Castracani. Florentine women then attacked through Charles's wife, the Duchess of Calabria. She pursuaded her husband to revoke the prohibition on luxurious silk tresses that Florentine women wore over their (perhaps thinning) hair. Rainey (1985) p. 68.

Having experienced this political reversal first-hand, the eminent Florentine Giovanni Villani lamented that women didn't even have to use reason to persuade men. What women want trumps any reason men might recognize: "the inordinate appetite of women conquers the reason and good sense of men {il disordinato appetito delle donne vince la ragione e il senno degli uomini}." Villani, Nuovo Cronica (c. 1348) 10.11. Villani's own wife Monna and other women pursuaded the Duke of Calabria to order that sumptuary charges against them be reviewed. Rainey (1985) p. 69-70. With respect to his wife Monna's spending on luxurious clothing and incurring fines for violating sumptuary law, Giovanni Villani, like other men, was in a lose-lose position.

[3] For insightul discussion of this wordplay in relation to levels of linguistic understanding, Cornish (2010) p. 16f.

[4] Writing in northern France about 1115, Guibert of Nogent complained of women's extravagant dress:

> The way they dress is completely different from the simplicity of old: sleeves spread wide open, their tunics worn tight, curled toes on shoes from Cordoba, you might see the surrender of all modesty proclaimed everywhere.
>
> { Vestium qualitates in tantum sunt ab illa veteri frugalitate dissimiles, ut dilatatio manicarum, tunicarum angustia, calceorum de Corduba rostra torticia, > totius ubique jacturam videas clamare pudoris. }

Guibert, Monodiae {Songs of Self} 1.12, Latin text from Bourgin (1907), English trans. from McAlhany & Rubenstein (2011). In ancient Rome, women wore expensive, revealing silk clothes. See note [1] in my post on the silk trade between ancient Rome and China. Both Seneca the Younger in the first century GC (Epistulae morales ad Lucilium {Letters on Behavior to Lucilius} 90.16-20, 45) and Jerome in the fourth century (Life of Paul the Hermit 17) contrasted luxurious clothes of their times with earlier, simpler clothes. Similarly Dante, Commedia, Paradiso 15.97-120.

[5] Franco Sacchetti, Il Trecentenovelle 137, Italian text from Faccioli (1970), my English translation, benefiting from that of Steegmann (1908). The subsequent quote is similarly from this novelle.

One Florentine official recognized the ancient Roman failure and the rage of Coppo di Borghese Domenichi:

> I would have you know that the Romans, who conquered the whole world, could do nothing against their women. And these women, in order to lift the rules on their fancy dress, ran to the Capitol and conquered the Romans, obtaining what they wanted to such an extent that when Coppo di Borghese read this story in a book written by Livy, he almost went insane.
>
> { Io vo' che voi sappiate ch'e' Romani non potero contro le loro donne, che vinsono tutto il mondo; ed elle per levar gli ordini sopra gli ornamenti loro, corsono al Campidoglio, e vinsono e' Romani, avendo quello che voleano; per tal segnale che Coppo del Borghese in una novella di questo libro leggendo in Tito Livio la detta istoria, ne fu per impazzare. }

Il Trecentenovelle 137, cited as above.

This novelle isn't merely fiction. Florentine city records indicate that Amerigo of Pesara served as the Ufficiale delle donne from March to September 1384. Sacchetti at that time was a member of Florence's ruling council. He probably heard directly from Amerigo about women evading the sumptuary laws. Rainey (1985) p. 233.

Under details of the the sumptuary laws in effect in Florence in 1384, ermine fur was forbidden, but lattizzo fur wasn't. The latter type of fur is fairly obscure:

> According to some dictionaries a lattizzo referred to a weasel-like animal similar to ermine but with milky white fur, whence its name.

Killerby (2002) p. 123, n. 43.

[6] Paolino da Venezia (Paolino Minorita), Trattato de regimine rectoris 53, Italian (Venetian dialect) text from Mussafia (1868) p. 75, English translation (adapted slightly) from Zanda (2010) p. 149, n. 104. Paolino da Venezia was a city official, Catholic bishop, and writer.

[7] Killerby stated:

> Of the clothing laws which were targeted primarily at women, the male members of the household were held responsible for payment of the fine, as was customary Killerby (1994) p. 103. Similarly, Izbicki (2009) p. 45.

[8] Killerby (2002) p. 123, which observes:

> In Venice the term 'pagar le pompe', or 'to pay the luxury fine', became such a common expression that it is found in dialectical dictionaries.

Salimbene's quote about dresses dragging in the dirt is "Not Patecchio, but Ugo di Perso's second answer to Patecchio, l. 65." Id. p. 674, n. 56. Salimbene later repeated the central political concern about Cardinal Latino Malabranca's laws: "This legate enraged women with his laws {Iste legatus turbavit mulieres cum constitutionibus suis}." Similarly from Holder-Egger (1905) p. 436, Baird, Baglivi & Kane (1986) p. 443.

Cardinal Latino Malabranca's laws are titled De habitu mulierum {On women's dress}. For their social and political context, Izbicki (2009). Id., Appendix 3.1 provides an English translation of the laws. According to De habitu mulierum:

> No woman exceeding twelve years of age will appear publicly in the city in a gown in which the front part is open.
> { Nulla mulier ex quo duodecim annum aetatis exegerit in veste quae ab anteriori parte aperta sit publice per civitatem excedunt procedere }

Rittenhouse, Woke Madness, the Good Sense of the Jury

---

Just last week I posted a piece whose thesis was that, contrary to the beliefs of elites over the millennia, non-elites often behave more responsibly than those who appoint themselves our betters. The outcome of the elections of November 2nd demonstrated the point. From Seattle to Virginia, We the People rejected the woke narrative that all white people are racists, that the fewer the police the safer the community and that kids need to learn early to divide themselves into warring tribes.

The Kyle Rittenhouse verdict is more of the same.

For over a year now, much of the MSM and countless others have peddled a false narrative of the Rittenhouse case in which two men were killed and another injured in the context of the riots occurring in Kenosha, Wisconsin. That narrative held that Rittenhouse is a white supremacist who was bent on murder from the moment he decided to travel from his home in Illinois to the scene of the riots. There he stirred up conflict in order to kill people who were peacefully protesting the shooting of a black man by police.

The reality was entirely different. As videotape and witness testimony demonstrated, the riots were anything but peaceful and Rittenhouse was there to protect property that was in danger of damage or destruction. He began his stay by removing graffiti from the wall of a store and, that night, was pursued, violently attacked and only discharged his rifle to defend his own life.

A week or so into the trial, experienced defense lawyers were taking to the airwaves and the pages of national newspapers to opine that the only proper verdict would be acquittal on all counts. That came after the prosecution's own witnesses testified against the state's (and the leftist media's) theory of the case. That the defendant had acted using reasonable means to protect his own life was apparent to all with a balanced view of the facts. The state's case had collapsed.

But that didn't deter the woke. Before, during and after the trial, leftist commentators shouted their standard claims of racism and white supremacy on the part of Rittenhouse, the judge, the jury and anyone else who posed a threat to their desire for vengeance.

Meanwhile, outside the courthouse, protesters tried to intimidate the jurors.

But the jurors refused to be swayed by the threats they knew about or the ones they could surely guess at. After all, they'd seen what happened during the Derek Chauvin trial when thinly-veiled threats of mayhem emanated from everyone from the president on down. So they could reasonably have anticipated a violent response by the mob to evenhanded justice.

Still, that's exactly what they delivered. The state got nowhere close to proving guilt beyond a reasonable doubt and the jury delivered the only verdict possible. It was a clear-cut victory for the notion of impartial justice delivered by 12 everyday people and should be celebrated by all. As in the Chauvin case, the jury got it right, delivering a verdict based on the evidence and the applicable law.

But, while the jurors did their jobs responsibly and even courageously, those on the outside continued to bay like a pack of demented Beagles, demanding conviction, irrespective of the fact that the defendant had committed no legal wrong. The difference between the demands of the woke and a lynching had worn uncomfortably thin, but everyone from demonstrators in the streets to California Governor Gavin Newsom, seemed entirely unaware of the barbarism with which they so thoughtlessly made common cause.

As if to prove their own distance from reality, the woke have always imagined Rittenhouse's actions as race-based wrongdoing. Somehow, the killing of two white men by another white man is both a racial incident and an anti-black one. To the woke mind, the killing of two white men by another white man, is an act of white supremacy. The stupidity runs that deep.

Well before the Rittenhouse verdict, journalist and commentator Glenn Greenwald pointed out what he saw as contradictory messages coming from the woke mob. One held that reform of the criminal justice system is urgently needed, that the police need to be defunded, policing reformed and sentencing made more lenient. But now we hear the opposite, that defendants like Kyle Rittenhouse be denied basic due process rights and spend their lives behind bars – just because.

I fully understand Greenwald's point, but must cavil. I think the woke are being consistent in exactly the way a three-year-old is: they want what they want and they want it now. White males who injure others must go to prison or the guillotine, regardless. Anything else is racism.

For the woke, "equity" is a demand that outcomes change. Whether the process by which those outcomes are achieved is fair, just or even legal is irrelevant. So, if there aren't enough black students attending a certain school, to the woke, the only thing to do is add black students, whether or not they qualify for admission and regardless of what other better-qualified applicants suffer as a result.

Much the same is going on in legal proceedings. The woke wanted Kyle Rittenhouse's head and threw a tantrum when they didn't get it. That the procedure to get to the result was fair and legal is irrelevant to them. Only one outcome was acceptable – a white man's blood. This, you understand, is "equity."

Fortunately, everyday people, like the ones that voted two weeks ago and who sat on the Rittenhouse jury, see more clearly and act more responsibly. May it continue.

Briffault: Rules for the Rational Simp

November 24, 2021 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

Hey guys. From time to time I have the pleasure of collaborating on a piece with Peter Wright of Gynocentrism.com. Though it is written in first person, this is one of those pieces. My sincere thanks to Peter.

* * *

"The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place."

Or so said Robert Briffault, an English surgeon, anthropologist, and novelist back in the day. And sure enough, if you listen to all corners of the manosphere, there's no shortage of agreeance with this so-called, "Briffault's Law."

"Them there's the rules," you'll hear, with absolute conviction and certitude, "and their ain't nothin' you can do about it."

That outlook is roughly confirmed in a small poll taken by Peter Wright, offering four different interpretations of what Briffault's Law actually means. One, that it is 100% true as written. Two, that it applies to only nonhuman animals. Three, that the law is accurate, but that it applies equally if the sexes are reversed. And four, you don't much care about Briffault or his law to begin with.

The results were pretty clear. As you can see, 61, or 91% of those who responded see Briffault's law, down to the last dotted i and crossed t, as 100% accurate about the female of the human species. By any measure that is an impressive amount of unanimity.

And we certainly see backup for this mentality from the more prominent MGTOW voices out there on the interwebz.

Stardusk titles a remarkably unremarkable talk, linked below, with, “Briffault’s Law – The Most Important Thing You Can Know as a Man”

Sandman opines in more personal fashion in one of his talks, linked, with the following. “I know from my own personal experience that I have two modes of operation with regards to my life,” he says, “Either I’m waiting for a woman to choose me to have a relationship, or I typically don’t care for them – like I do now.”

Finally, we have Colttaine, who expands the definition of Briffault’s Law with the same practiced acumen a feminist employs to expand the definition of rape, linked below “From where I’m sitting,” he asserts, “the problem with Briffault’s Law is that Robert Briffault didn’t go far enough with his definition. Women don’t just determine all the conditions of the animal family, they determine ‘all the conditions’ – period!”

Setting aside my desire to shame these public displays of learned helplessness, well, ok, partially setting aside that desire, I still want to focus on what these guys are saying and why I think it’s a learning opportunity for red pill men.

I know the online red pill community pretty well by now. And one thing is for sure, that community is above average in intelligence. Way above, in my opinion, which makes the 91% who subscribe to an obvious fiction with such religious fervour all the more perplexing.

At this point, some qualifying is necessary, though I wish it weren’t. Saying I disagree with a single prevalent MGTOW belief isn’t the same thing as disagreeing with the idea or practice of men going their own way, which I do support wholeheartedly. If you’re too obtuse to see that and appreciate the difference, this is my piss off in advance. Feel free to leave your butthurt in the comments.

That said, let’s start the conversation with a little common sense. I know, they grow ‘em big and dumb in Texas, but we do learn the difference between shit and Shinola early on in life. That predisposition, that stubborn Texas insistence to get 4 when adding 2 and 2 leads me to one inescapable conclusion about the idea of perception of benefit, a perception on which Briffault’s Law is totally reliant.

I don’t blow my nose, or even scratch it for that matter, without a perceived benefit. I don’t take a leak, put on socks, or do, literally anything you can think of, without perceived benefit. That’s true for the smallest, least significant things I do, or that I can even imagine doing. As human beings, acting on perceived benefit is pretty much all we do. By the time we’re talking about intersexual selection and pair bonding, there’s wheelbarrows full of perceived benefit on both sides. Anyone who can’t see it could perceive some benefit from eyeglasses.

And I know what some of you may be thinking. That we are socially conditioned to see the perceived benefit of the woman as what really matters. And that the weight of that social conditioning means that Briffault was right, “The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family."

And to be fair, just pointing to the obvious fact that human behaviour, generally speaking, is driven by perceived benefit, isn't a thorough enough rebuttal to Briffault's widespread acceptance across the manosphere.

Before we dig into precisely the meaning of Briffault's claims, let's take a moment to consider Briffault the man. What do we know about him? Well, we know that he was raised by a strict, fundamentalist mother from the age of eleven after his father's untimely death.

In short, Briffault was the product of an abusive, single-mother home. From accounts of biographers, we know that Briffault resented his mother's controlling nature, but nevertheless went on to write about mothers at enormous length and extolling their superior status in the human scheme.

That alone is undoubtedly prima facie evidence of learned simpery, but let's go on.

In his most famous book The Mothers, Briffault argues for the importance of mothers over and against fathers. The editor of the same book introduces him as a man without a loving bond with his mother, but with loving and fond memories of his deceased father. About Briffault from the intro, we read:

> "It is not unreasonable, when a man has devoted seven years of strenuous work to arguing the importance of mothers as against fathers, to ask whether he betrayed any marked attitudes towards his own parents. Mrs Herma Briffault informs me that he had little apparent attachment to his mother, but often spoke of his father. (He seems, nevertheless, to have had a picture of his mother in his room in the last decade of his life). His mother was evidently a reserved, 'canny' Scots-woman, of strict views, whose capacity for personal warmth seems to have been limited, and perhaps he felt, as an infant, denied the acceptance he desired. He certainly rejected violently his mother's strong religious beliefs and teaching. Clearly there was strong ambivalence here, and the attacks — which suggest narcoleptic stupors — which assailed him at the time of his mother's last illness seem consistent with the idea of a powerful love-hate relationship."

The biographer then goes on to conclude;

> "It is not difficult to see how natural such attitudes were to one whose outlook had been conditioned by the experiences just described. I have observed elsewhere that, when a child has one parent who is easy-going and affectionate and another who is severe and apparently unloving, it identifies itself with the former and is preoccupied throughout life with its relationship with the latter… when it is the mother who is unloving, this leads the male child to a preoccupation with women and with incest. This was certainly the case in Briffault's great contemporary, Havelock Ellis, for instance. It seems to have been equally true of Briffault."

If we take this as true, the influences that led Briffault to his gynocentric conclusions, as well as his personal weakness with women, come into clear focus. Inadequate, abusive mothers and absent fathers. The results of that toxic combination are now sprawled across the cultural landscape in form of legions of young men who become obsequious lapdogs whenever in the presence of women.

It's that instilled powerlessness that leads many, even if indirectly, to seek solutions in PUA, MGTOW and other red pill venues. And I argue that we still see the remnants of that same learned victimhood in the widespread acceptance of Briffault's Law.

Moreover, it appears that many have taken hold of Briffault's Law and applied it exclusively to human relationships in a way that Briffault didn't even intend. Briffault applied his Law toward non-human animals, and the chapter in which he announces his Law is titled 'The Herd and the Family Amongst Animals' under this subheading 'The Female in the Animal Group.'

The chapter is five pages long. In it he mentions tigers, elks, lions, zebras, gazelles, buffaloes, deer, monkeys, beavers, lions, birds and other animals, and only references humans briefly in order to contrast human behavioural patterns from those of animals.

Although Briffault appears to have intended his Law for animals, he also presented human sexual relations with the same exaggerated gynocentric framing, demonstrated throughout his book 'The Mothers The Matriarchal Theory Of Social Origins' which is chock full of cringeworthy claims of female superiority and male inferiority.

Whatever the merits of his observations, it is only fair to say that he was writing a century ago and his speculations were a product of the thinking of his day, and perhaps the personal pathology of his life. His work is replete with the flattery of and deference toward, women. It's possible his thinking was even shaped by ideology of first wave feminism, which was running rampant in the culture during the time of Briffault's writing.

Fast forward to contemporary research and we have a wealth of information to test, and quite frankly dismiss, Briffault's hypotheses.

Steve Stewart-Williams, PhD in psychology and philosophy, wrote a now famous paper distilling the literature of evolutionary psychology on questions of intersexual human dynamics. Notably, he reiterates findings from the field of Evolutionary Psychology that males are also very choosy in selecting mates, which debunks the view that Briffault's assumption concludes that only females choose. Williams states, and I quote;

> "According to a common understanding of sexual selection theory, females in most species invest more than males in their offspring, and as a result, males compete for as many mates as possible, whereas females choose from among the competing males. The males-compete/females-choose model applies to many species but is misleading when applied to human beings. This is because males in our species commonly contribute to the rearing of the young, which reduces the sex difference in parental investment. Consequently, sex differences in our species are relatively modest. Rather than males competing and females choosing, humans have a system of mutual courtship: Both sexes are choosy > about long-term mates, and both sexes compete for desirable mates. We call this the mutual mate choice (MMC) model." [1]

Pygmalion creates Galatea

Stewart-Williams goes on to conclude that men, throughout our evolutionary history, have crafted women into the creatures we want – Pygmalion style. In other words, modern woman, in all her inglorious splendour, is, like it or not, the Stepford Wife that men actually chose to build. How's that for patriarchal choosiness?

He states, for example, that "human males have a number of well-documented, species-typical mate preferences. These include preferences for physical traits such as a low waist-to-hip ratio, facial and bodily symmetry, neoteny, and youthfulness. They also include preferences for psychological traits such as intelligence, emotional stability, and sexual fidelity." [1]

Imagine that – males throughout evolutionary history having a preference for intelligence and emotional stability. It's almost as though he's saying that men are exercising a personal choice, not only about whether to pair bond, but also about the type of woman they choose.

Not only does this bitch slap common manospherian ideas of Briffault as human gospel, it also destroys the cliché that 'all men want is sex' and will take anything that moves – providing the female "selects" them. It's also worth noting that male mate preferences have left their mark on female physical morphology – again quoting Stewart-Williams:

> "In some domains, women are more sexually selected than men; one… example can be found in the domain of physical attractiveness. Women are typically rated as better looking than men, by both men and women (Darwin, 1871; Feingold & Mazzella, 1998; Ford & Beach, 1951). The difference is plausibly a consequence of the fact that, although both sexes care about good looks in a mate, on average, men care somewhat more (Buss, 1989; Lippa, 2007).
> This means that, since this sex difference first evolved, there has been a somewhat stronger selection pressure on women than men for physical > attractiveness—the opposite of what we find in peacocks. To take a more specific example, the fact that adult human females have permanently enlarged breasts is plausibly a consequence of male choice. Contrary to popular opinion, enlarged mammary glands appear not to be necessary for milk delivery. The vast majority of mammals deliver milk without them, and there is little correlation between the size of a woman's breasts and her capacity to produce milk (Miller, 2000). What, then, are breasts for? A rather obvious clue can be found in the fact that most men find youthful-looking breasts sexually attractive. This has led to the suggestion that the primary evolutionary function of breasts relates to mate choice (Dixson, Grimshaw, Linklater, & Dixson, 2011).

> The most widely accepted suggestion is that they are honest signals of good genes, youthfulness, and nutritional status (Jasienska, Ziomkiewicz, Ellison, Lipson, & Thune, 2004; Marlowe, 1998; Singh, 1995; for an alternative hypothesis, see Low, Alexander, & Noonan, 1987). If so, women's breasts tell us something important about ourselves, namely, that we are not the kind of species in which males only ever pursue sex indiscriminately and females alone exert mate choice. Breasts are evidence of male mate choice operating over many thousands of generations (Cant, 1981). The same is true of other secondary sexual features found in human females, including facial neoteny (e.g., large eyes, small noses and chins); gluteofemoral fat deposits and the hourglass figure; and lighter, smoother, less hairy skin." [1]

"Of course," Stewart-Williams concludes, "no one is surprised that men have mate preferences; it is such a familiar fact of life that we take it for granted. From a comparative perspective, though, we should be surprised. The existence of these preferences makes our species atypical among mammals and is inconsistent with the idea that we are an MCFC species." [1]

Considering these widely available scientific facts, we must wonder if men upholding Briffault's Law are simply brainwashed by the prevailing gynocentric narratives, or whether they too suffer from "male mother need" as Briffault himself did? When, for example, Turd-Flinging Monkey dismisses all women as THOTS but then goes on to talk for a decade about said thots stealing men's authority, is that not akin to Briffault's obsession with female self-interest?

Who knows? Perhaps an examination of TFMs relationship with his mother would be revealing.

For me, the red pill is, in its purist form, a dedication to living in the truth. It's red pill 101 that women should not be viewed as an omnipotent power in the lives of men. That, dear listeners, is one of the very first liberating truths of men's red pill existence. That women largely have only the power we give them, and that we have the power to keep them in check. In the earlier days of red pill, we called it veto power, the ultimate trump card for men. And we still have that power in spades unless we insist on immersing ourselves in the victim narrative.

So how then, do we have red pill commentators proclaiming aloud, and I quote again, “Either I’m waiting for a woman to choose me to have a relationship, or I typically don’t care for them – like I do now”?

Word for word, that could have been uttered by any defeated blue pill simp you’ve ever met in your life. Get mad if you want to, you know it’s true.

And to be clear, I am not saying a thing in contempt of men who look at all the facts and choose to avoid women based on the risk, effort, expense and unfairness that often comes with the so-called fairer sex.

Indeed, I think it’s important to point out that we’re talking largely about two distinct groups of men. There are those who have stared reality directly in the face, weighed all the facts and dispassionately concluded that women are not worth the effort; that the juice isn’t worth the squeeze, as it were, and veto power is at the core of their very identity. If you’re in that group, this talk is for you, but it isn’t really

The other group are men who have looked at the challenges of attracting and pair bonding with women and decided that they are just not up to the job. These are generally men whose spine has never survived contact with a woman. Their frame cracks, splits and ultimately shatters at the hint of female influence. You can hear it in their endless droning about how a man can never win, how women make all the rules and that the rules are unfair. They make sweeping declarations of personal powerlessness. To wit, “Women don’t just determine all the conditions of the animal family, they determine ‘all the conditions’ – period!”

Men like this appear incapable governing their own lives if women are involved. They can’t choose mates, not because women have unbridled personal power, but because those men don’t have the personal strength, values and integrity to remain in control of their lives.

They are just men who can’t hold on to their interests, their friends, their values, or self-respect because women make all the rules and they have no choice but to follow them. Because that’s the way things are, and Briffault’s Law is the so-called truth they wallow in to prove it.

If that’s your idea of red pill, you might want to skip the refills.

Whatever the motivations, I can safely say that a blind belief in Briffault’s Law is relegating many men’s personal progress to the dumpster, because if men have no choice about the conditions of their life, what possible agency can they have?

What form of personal autonomy is it that you can’t practice in the presence of a female? What kind of poorly constructed frame won’t bear the weight of a woman’s whims? Ya know, if you have to hide from anyone to assert your, uh hum, agency in life, you might hear Inigo Montoya, whispering in your ear, “You keep using that word. I don’t think it means what you think it means.”

Personally, I’d rather try to pull an AR15 out of Kyle Rittenhouse’s hands than surrender to this weak bullshit.

Finally, I'd like to propose a different set of axioms for red pilled men: First, as a human male you are the most magnificent living entity ever known to exist. Men built civilization and conquered all manner of frontiers. If I were to try to list all the accomplishments of men, you'd grow old before I got finished.

Whatever your decisions about allowing women into your life, seeing yourself as a loser who can't win is a self-fulfilling prophesy, with all the lameness that implies. If you want sex, companionship or even a relationship based on red pill principles, don't let some youtuber's mommy issues hold you back. Don't lock yourself into the black pill prison of learned helplessness and nihilistic defeatism. Well, unless that is what you want to do. If that's the case, just make sure that when you're staring into that black, optionless void, you know it's just a mirror of your own making.

Meanwhile, red pill men will enjoy the byproduct of personal agency, accountability and practiced wisdom; a solid frame that doesn't crumble when a woman enters the room. A frame that doesn't crumble for anyone.

Briffault's Law: A Classic Example Of Reductionist Categorical Thinking

November 26, 2021 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

This article is in response to Paul Elam and Peter Wright's excellent recent critique[1] of Briffault's Law. I have also critiqued Briffault's law in my article linked here[2]. The manosphere has to have a mechanism of addressing and identifying bad ideas. Bad ideas that are not only factually incorrect, but also hold men back and negatively impact their well-being. These are ideas that must be confronted and challenged, as I have done extensively in my writings debunking the golden uterus mythology and sophistry[3]. In this article I will expand on my past critique of Briffault's law.

Briffault's Law is no law at all, like the medieval practice of alchemy it belongs in the bin. The research papers Paul and Peter cited (linked here[4], here[5] and here[6]) on mutual mate choice, sexual dimorphism and sexual selection, are seminal pieces of work. We may have evolved from a species with relatively high to moderate levels of sexual dimorphism many millions of years ago, but we have been on an evolutionary track over the last 500,000-1,000,000 years to evolve into a species with relatively low levels of sexual dimorphism compared to most primates and other animals.

As the evidence discussed in the papers Paul and Peter cite, we are a species where there is mutual mate choice (both sexes choose mates), competition for mates by both sexes, substantial parental investment by both sexes and widespread monogamy, long term mating and pair bonding. These characteristics have been largely the result of the requirements of our increasing brain size over evolutionary time and the longer and longer developmental period of human offspring from infancy to adulthood that has evolved over the past 500,000-1,000,000 years.

High levels of sexual dimorphism, polygyny, lack of dual parental investment, high levels of male intrasexual competition and relatively little female competition etc- modern traces of these patterns are declining artifacts of our evolution that we have been moving away from over the last 500,000-1,000,000 years. Remnants of our old evolutionary baggage are still there in our biology and behaviour, but they are a shadow of their past selves and do not hold the primacy or grip over our behaviour like they once did. New evolutionary baggage in the form of mutual mate choice, dual parental investment and competition, monogamy and long-term mating have moved into the void left behind by the decline of these old traits over the last 500,000-1,000,000 years.

Briffault's law when applied to humans, relies on biological assumptions that we are a highly sexually dimorphic species in which only one sex competes for mates and only one sex chooses mates and that our old evolutionary baggage is still what primarily governs our behaviour in the present day. These assumptions are completely wrong and incredibly easy to disprove. Yet staunch advocates of Briffault's law would have us believe that only men compete, only women choose and sexual selection only operates on men.

They would seriously have us ignore 500,000 to 1,000,000 years of evolution, large chunks of scientific research and evidence demonstrating mutual mate choice, dual parental investment and competition, sexual selection on both sexes (not just men), monogamy and pair bonding. They would try to convince us humans are highly sexually dimorphic and still behave like our primitive ancestors did millions of years ago, as if that was a biologically inevitable law of nature (you know the same primates that led to our cousins still living in the jungle and not walking on the moon).

The only people denying biology here are the people that are prepared to turn a blind eye to the clear evidence we are a pair bonding species, with mutual mate choice, dual parental investment, intrasexual competition and sexual selection for both sexes and relatively low levels of sexual dimorphism compared to many animals and many of our primate counterparts.

Briffault's law is a form of what behavioural biologist Prof. Robert Sapolsky from Stanford university, in his excellent lecture series on human behaviour calls categorical thinking[7]. To a degree we have to think in categories when we analyse information to make sense of the world, but when dealing with complex biological systems this reductive thinking has its limits. When we become fixated on categories and make absolutist statements like Briffault's law, we get trapped in categorical thinking and cannot see the forest for the trees.

Sapolsky warned in his lecture with numerous examples, the horrific consequences of such thinking throughout history. If you have not watched his lecture series, please watch it. Take it from me, it is an excellent set of lectures and also entertaining. Yes the sexes are different, but not so different that only one sex competes for mates, only one sex invests in offspring, only one sex chooses mates, only one sex faces sexual selection and only short-term mating dominates. That is fiction and not scientific fact.

In his lecture series Prof. Sapolsky quite clearly describes how we are a middle of the road species[8]. That is a species that does exhibit some level of sexual dimorphism, but that does not have the type of high sexual dimorphism like a pure tournament species does where only males compete, only women invest in offspring, only one sex chooses mates and where there is only short-term mating etc. Monogamy, dual parental investment and competition and mutual mate choice in our species, caught on so quickly precisely because it was extremely adaptive to our biology (i.e. long periods of development in our offspring demanding it).

Even in societies that are regarded as polygynous, Sapolsky states in his lecture on behavioural evolution[8], that such so-called "polygynous societies" are in reality only mildly polygynous. The majority of people in these societies are actually not polygamous at all, they are instead in monogamous long-term relationships and pair bonded. Polygyny only occurs to a limited extent in polygynous societies, sometimes for demographic reasons and other times for economic reasons as Sapolsky explains. Many of the proponents of Briffault's law will gloss over these facts, just as they will gloss over evidence of male mate choice and the clear evidence of sexual selection pressures on females by males and female intrasexual competition for mates.

Now at this point I can almost hear the wailing about how humans are not purely monogamous either in a monogamous setting (i.e there is cheating, short term flings and serial long term relationships throughout life). That is correct, we are not absolutely monogamous. However on a scale with long term relationships, pair-bonding and monogamy on one end and short-term tournament mating and polygamy on the other end, humans are much closer to long term relationships, pair-bonding and monogamy. What we see with humans is the newer evolutionary baggage of mutual mate choice, dual parental investment, both sexes competing and monogamy etc dominating our behaviour and the older remnants of the evolutionary baggage of short-term tournament mating and polygamy playing a more minor role. That is a good thing because it has allowed civilisation to form and stopped societies from tearing themselves apart.

As the papers in the reference section below from Assoc Prof. Steve Stewart-Williams explains (cited by Paul and Peter), humans are at this point in our evolutionary journey closer to the few primate cousins who show very little or virtually no sexual dimorphism, than our cousins at the other extreme that are tournament species. We are not even intermediate in sexual dimorphism, we are somewhere between intermediate and very little sexual dimorphism in a relative sense when comparing humans to many other animals and primates. Our greatest sex differences are mainly as one would expect physical in nature, with height being one of the more obvious physical sex differences beyond basic differences in primary and secondary sex characteristics.

Many of the largest psychological sex differences as the papers from Assoc Prof. Stewart-Williams explains, are far smaller than the sex difference in height. The human sex difference in body size itself is relatively small when compared to the sex difference in body size seen in many other animals and primates. That is not to say sex differences have no significance in humans, it is just that much of the highest levels of significance of sex differences plays out more at the extremes of the distributions of traits in humans and to only a relatively minor extent in the middle. This is true to a substantial extent for physical sex differences (with a significant number of notable exceptions such as the sex difference in upper body strength) and to a very great extent for psychological sex differences.

Of greater significance is how much alike the sexes are in relation to each other overall. In many psychological traits, there is a great deal of overlap in the distributions of many traits between the sexes (see links here[9], here[10] and here[11]) and that also has practical implications. Of course there are also exceptions to the rule, but even then as explained, the larger psychological sex differences are relatively small in comparison to physical sex differences like that observed with height. Even with physical sex differences such as the sex difference in height, there is substantial overlap and we can observe this in everyday life! This is the nuance and complexity that ideas like Briffault's law do not account for.

Even if we made the incorrect observation that humans are a purely tournament species with high levels of sexual dimorphism and where there is strictly only high levels of male intrasexual competition, and female intrasexual competition is either absent or relatively low, it does not follow that females in such species are freely choosing their own mates and dictating the conditions of their social environment. Firstly, females just like their male counterparts, are restricted by the physical environment itself and secondly, the dominant males exercise a tremendous influence over the females in many tournament species and over the system of mating and social relations in a group. Females are hardly some omnipotent force that bend nature and the males around them to their will. Where is the Briffault's law in common situations like that in the animal kingdom?

Whilst there are many criticisms that can be made of feminism, it is certainly true that women do have legitimate issues facing them and do face oppression and violence in certain parts of the world. Where is the Briffault's law there? Where is the female omnipotence? This is what happens with categorical thinking, people start dismissing aspects of reality that don't fit their dogma just like many feminist ideologues do. Staunch followers of Briffault's law have more in common with feminist ideologues than they think!

The reality is we don't get civilisation without paternal investment in offspring by males and monogamy. These changes ensure that society remains stable enough and there is sufficient investment by both sexes in their offspring, to foster the development of civilisation. We could not develop civilisation if we were a tournament species. This is one reason why enforced fatherlessness from feminist social engineering attacking fatherhood at an institutional level and the feminist corruption of our legal system to alienate children from their fathers, is so dangerous. You can read the statistics[12] on fatherlessness and its effects on society. It is not a pretty picture.

Once you switch to monogamy, dual parental investment and long term mating, mutual mate choice occurs and sexual selection and intrasexual competition is observed in both sexes and that is exactly what we observe in human society. The reality is that Briffault's law assumes that males are not choosey, which is based on a deeply flawed assumption all forms of mating with females are short term flings and only involve the exchange of gametes. As mentioned earlier, the scientific evidence reported by Assoc Prof. Stewart-Williams shows this not to be the case at all in humans. Males do choose mates as well and females do compete with each other for mates just as men do.

We have whole swathes of men now distancing themselves from marriage and certain types of women, precisely because men are assessing the situation and choosing not to marry or be around certain women. That is male choice in the dating world right there. We have whole swathes of women complaining about this situation and about where all the good men went as a result. It does not take much of an observation to debunk Briffault's law and this twisted view of women being omnipotent. Men walking away from the modern corrupt form of marriage, divorce and family court is just one example of where Briffault's law fails, but I can cite many more examples.

In many ways Briffault's law is the manospherian equivalent of patriarchy theory and the feminist notion men have all the power. Both are held up as an unquestioned dogma by their relevant followers and have an almost religious following that is impervious to reason and facts. Both are completely wrong. Both sexes have power and influence in this society, both sexes can and do take advantage of the other and both sexes do cooperate with each other. We need to foster greater intersexual cooperation to the fullest extent possible. If not for the sake of men's interests or women's interests, for the sake of our children, future generations and for a society that is becoming more and more divided by the day. We don't go anywhere but backwards as men, as women and as a society, if we let half-baked ideas like Briffault's law and patriarchy theory spread as some sacred cow belief system. Such beliefs blind us from seeing the bigger picture and divide us.

Yes gynocentrism is a powerful and destructive force in society, but it is not an unassailable omnipotent force like what Briffault's law would have people believe. There are also other powerful forces as well at work in society that can and do override gynocentrism. That even applies to our Western culture which is significantly gynocentric. It is obvious just looking at society with a cursory glance, that women (even ranting and raving feminists) do not always get their way and conditions in society are not determined solely by women. Briffault's law speaks of female omnipotence in absolutes and so does its ardent followers, just like feminists do with patriarchy theory and male privilege. This is at odds with reality and with science.

In closing, I can think of nothing more gynocentric than a belief like Briffault's law that women control all of the conditions of social interaction and men are merely their pawns. Briffault's law is a self-defeating belief that is not only factually incorrect, it holds men back, just as patriarchy theory does with women. It is an absolutist worldview that when followed to its logical conclusion, leads to men giving up on themselves and society, especially when it comes to their interactions with women. Any solid and healthy philosophy to assist men has to be based on the premise that men should base their beliefs on facts, not on fiction, and develop a worldview to maximise their well-being instead of fostering a mindset of learned helplessness.

Briffault's law is a self-fulfilling prophecy that only leads to the death of the male self and eventually by extension, if it causes enough social damage to men, the death of society. There is nothing red pill about it, it is a gynocentric black pill of death.

Going rogue with Royko

December 13, 2021 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

The wisecracking, street-smart newspaperman was something of a stock character in old movies (notably The Front Page in 1931). Such movies often portrayed aggressive, ambitious reporters competing against one another for stories while working for morally-challenged editors and publishers seeking to boost circulation by any means necessary.

For the most part, journalism was a rough-and-tumble man's world. To be sure, the "Women's Pages," gossip columns, and the Society section were largely a distaff province, but the hard news rooster club was only occasionally disrupted by a news hen.

Today when newspaper circulation is declining and many papers are close to going belly up, the very idea of print journalism may seem quaint. Daily newspapers offer less and less in the way of content at inflated cover prices (pocket change used to be sufficient to buy a paper; now a lot of big city dailies go for $3.00).

Sure, it was more than a century ago, but newspapers were the media before the 1920s (Chicago, for example, had nine dailies at the turn of the 20th Century), but after radio swept the nation, the demand for newspapers decreased and some went out of business. The same thing occurred with television in the 1950s. The TV evening news basically killed off afternoon papers, but most morning newspapers have somehow managed to hang on. Today with the internet and a 24-hour news cycle, even they are on borrowed time.

In order to survive, print newspapers must re-invent themselves. There are no indications this is happening, as a cursory glance at any big-city daily reveals. The quantity and quality of the writing leave a lot to be desired. Most of the news items derive from wire services available to all media, and the same syndicated op-ed columnists pontificate within predictably narrow limits.

Any large metro area has plenty of good writers, but the corporate honchos don't want to rock the boat with any articles or opinions that might upset some segment of the readership. Yet there was a time when a star reporter or columnist was given a long leash because he motivated readers to buy papers.

Perhaps the last of the classic big-time, big-city columnists was Mike Royko, who was a one-man institution in Chicago journalism. A lifelong resident of the city, he knew all the ins and outs of Chicago politics and he called 'em as he saw 'em. Chicago politics had a long tradition of corruption, yet the mantra remained "Chicago ain't ready for reform yet," so Royko was never at a loss for topics. If you follow the news coming out of Chicago these days, nothing has changed for the better in the Second City (actually, Chicago is now the Third City, having been surpassed in population by Los Angeles).

Royko once said, "Being the smartest alderman [city councilman] in Chicago is something like being the tallest midget in the circus." Did he ruffle feathers when he made statements like that? Of course, but three Chicago papers were happy to publish him.

Royko started with the Daily News in 1959 and was awarded his own column in 1964. After the Daily News closed, he moved on to the Sun-Times in 1978, but when Rupert Murdoch bought the paper in 1984, he went to work for the Tribune. People wanted to read what he had to say no matter which paper published his column. Does any newspaper columnist today wield that sort of influence?

Born in Chicago on September 19, 1932, Royko was the spawn of a Ukrainian father (a bartender) and a Polish mother. He embodied the white working class ethos in a city that was renowned for its vast quilt of ethnic neighborhoods.

Royko started out writing for an Air Force base newspaper, then went on to the City News Bureau of Chicago, and finally to the Lerner Papers, Chicago weeklies published in an assortment of neighborhood editions. His apprenticeship served him, well, so when he hooked on with the Daily News in 1959, he was ready for the daily grind of a big-city newspaper.

In his columns, Royko was typically an advocate for the little guy (the fictional Slats Grobnik, a working stiff, was a recurring character in his columns) who was being oppressed by the powers that be in the city of Chicago, Cook County, Springfield (the Illinois state capital), or Washington. Royko was no fan of big business either.

Royko's Chicago was one of ethnic neighborhoods, modest bungalows and apartment houses. He was a shot-and-a-beer (sometimes known as a boilermaker) kind of guy, as was everybody else in his circle.

Given his background, it's no surprise that he was no fan of the feminization of men. He invented a fictional character called High-Rise Man, which was more or less the answer to the question, "What sort of man reads Playboy?" (another Chicago institution).

High-Rise Man went to singles bars and discos, jogged and roller-bladed, and got his hair styled. He was highly brand-conscious and almost obsessed with the latest consumer gadgets. Shallow and trendy – maybe even faggy – were fitting adjectives for him. In Royko's world, High-Rise Man was not a suitable male role model. So who was?

In his June 13, 1979 column ("John Wayne's True Grit"), Royko expounded on his love for the Duke – not his politics, but the characters he portrayed in the movies. "He shot people in the heart, and drank whisky, and treated his horse like a horse," wrote Royko. "In fact, he treated women like he treated his horse. He seemed real because he reminded me of the men in my neighborhood."

Well, it's rather difficult to imagine something like that appearing in a newspaper today. But that was just Royko being Royko. Readers ate it up.

In a subsequent column ("Hogging the Jogging Path," August 3, 1979) he vented his distaste for High-Rise Men who complained about having to dodge road apples when they jogged on bridle paths. Reminiscing about the old days, Royko evoked an era when "The only people who ran in public were thieves and the coppers chasing them." And then to really put things in perspective, he stated, "This country did not become great by jogging. Men on horses pioneered it. Name me one movie in which John Wayne was shown in a tailored jogging suit and Adidas shoes."

In "Bottoms Up, L.A.!" a December 16, 1979 column, he commented on the trend of California men undergoing plastic surgery to have more shapely rear ends: "I find it shameful and alarming. I think it is a definite indication of the decline of this country's virility and moral standards. In a crisis, how could we put together a real army with men who are concerned about the pert shape of their rear ends?"

Feminism was not on the front burner when Royko's career began, but it provided him with plenty of material for columns from the late 60s onward . A classic example is his August 28, 1979 column, "A Leery Survey," dealing with a survey of female state employees who were polled to determine if they were being leered at by male state employees:

> Of course women will say that men leer. Even women who are never leered at will say they are. Pride.
>
> Some female persons will become angry at me for saying this, but there are times when a male person can be provoked into leering, as well as smirking, gawking, and gaping.
>
> If women persist in wearing slit skirts, skin-tight jeans, see-through blouses, and other immodest garments, there are bound to be men who are too weak to fight off the urge to leer, smirk, gawk, etc.
>
> If government is going to step in and outlaw leering, it must also take a stand on swiveling, slinking, wriggling, and waggling.

Of course, today such statements would evoke the predictable responses of "blaming the victim," "toxic masculinity" and maybe even "hate speech."

During the Vietnam War, Royko was no fan of the draft. More specifically, he felt there should be no exemptions for college men. In a January 25, 1980 column ("No 'Selective' Service"), while espousing equality, he left himself open to charges of misogyny by stating, "Why should someone spend his time squeezing coeds' bottoms because he happened to be born into a family that could pay his tuition?"

Royko was hardly a bigot but he often said things that could be interpreted as such today. For example, in a June 3, 1980 column ("A Poll Cut on the Bias") denouncing nativism, he managed to work in some ethnic jokes that would never appear in a newspaper today no matter what the context – not even with a trigger warning! To wit:

> Did you hear about the two Polaks who hijacked a submarine? They asked for a million dollars and two parachutes.
>
> Do you know why Irish wakes last three days? So they can make sure the guy is dead and not just drunk.
>
> Do you know how a Lithuanian pilot navigates an airplane? By reading street sighs.
>
> You know why a Puerto Rican can't use a checkbook? Because it's too small for > him to spray his name on.

Imagine submitting a column with the likes of the above to an editor today. Yet in 1979 newspaper readers (and editors) were a heartier breed. Today you wouldn't tell such a joke to anyone – even a trusted friend – without looking over your shoulder. Even if the coast was clear you would probably speak in hushed tones.

It's a rare bird indeed who can denounce prejudice while passing along ethnic jokes. As Walt Whitman once said, "Do I contradict myself? Very well, then I contradict myself. I am large, I contain multitudes." Royko was also large. At the peak of his popularity, his column was syndicated in more than 600 newspapers. He was never in any danger of losing his job. Sure, he made enemies, but more people liked him than disliked him. And he was making money for his employers, who weren't as woke then as they are now.

A hot topic Royko took on in the 1970s was the Equal Rights Amendment, which had been working its way through state legislatures in the 1970s. It had stalled out at the end of the decade largely due to women's concerns about being drafted – a thorny issue to this day. On February 19, 1980, Royko proposed a female special forces regiment of "very tough broads" to compete with the Green Berets. But in his column ("Hopes Fade for the Green Bras") he noticed women's lack of enthusiasm for military service. He had met many women who asserted they would dodge the draft by getting pregnant. Nevertheless, he offered a suggestion on how to pass the ERA in Illinois: "by bribing the state legislature like everyone else does."

By the 1990s, however, political correctness was becoming a force in journalism. In his June 1, 1990 column ("A Nose Rub of Sorts for Ditzy Word Jocks") he pondered the recommendations of the Multicultural Management Program at the University of Missouri School of Journalism. The nabobs of the program had decreed that certain words, formerly acceptable, were now taboo. Royko inveighed against the "dizzy new-age journalistic airheads."

He related a list of 23 words and phrases (e.g., airhead, burly, buxom, dingbat, gyp, lazy, petite, sweetie), which could be interpreted as offensive to women or minorities and so should be avoided. Just as revealing were the words not included on the list, noted Royko. "They don't include 'honky,' which many blacks call whites, or dago, wop, heeb, kike, mick, herring-choker, frog, kraut, bohunk, or polack. Ain't us honkies got feelings, too?" (If you're wondering, a herring-choker is a Scandinavian – that was a new one on me – so Royko's columns were also educational.)

Even during the 1990s the term "illegal alien" was coming under fire. It worked for Royko, however. "Why not 'illegal alien'? It's specific. It means an alien who is here in violation of our immigration laws." Today among those who wield the blue pencil in the legacy media "migrant" or "immigrant" would be subbed. ("Undocumented worker" had its day but seems to have gone out of fashion.)

On July 12, 1990, Royko probably dropped a few jaws with his opinion expressed in a column ("Message on AIDS Gets Lost in Poster") pertaining to a controversial Chicago Transit Authority poster that depicted two men kissing. The basic theme of the public service campaign was that “love doesn’t kill.”

Royko admitted, “I’m a bit puzzled by the statement that love doesn’t cause AIDS. Love isn’t an issue at all, unless you define love as having anal sex with a stranger in a bathhouse, which would be kind of stretching love’s definition.”

It was the height of insensitivity, yet there it was in black and white and read all over Chicago and anywhere else Royko’s column was syndicated. To be sure, the column met with a fair share of opprobrium, but Royko never apologized. It’s hard to imagine a writer getting away with that today, but Royko’s readers were legion. He had more leverage than his critics and he knew it. They probably realized it also.

Royko’s book publishing history largely consisted of collections of his columns. Yet Boss: Richard J. Daley of Chicago, his 1971 book on the longtime Chicago mayor, proved he was capable of lengthier efforts. For the most part, however, he stuck to being a columnist, or an essayist, as he might have been characterized in previous generations. In that capacity he stayed busy. His lifetime output consisted of 7,500 columns.

Royko soldiered on till died of an aneurysm on April 29, 1997. His obit headline in the New York Times dubbed him “the Voice of the Working Class.” Nevertheless, it was probably an appropriate time to clock out, as the internet was starting to steal the thunder from print journalism.

Though Royko was only 64 when he died, his passing was probably not a complete surprise to those who knew him well. True to the image of the hard-drinking newspaperman, he was probably done in by too much booze (he was also a heavy smoker). Royko had the unique ability to consume large amount s of alcohol (he was a regular patron at Chicago’s legendary Billy Goat Tavern) without suffering hangovers. This might sound like a highly desirable trait, but without the ill effects of hangovers, he had no motivation to curb his consumption. Meanwhile, his body was paying the price in other ways.

If he were still around today, he would certainly not be lacking in topics. I think I know what he would say about a lot of them, but I’m sure his views would never be printed in a newspaper. And it’s hard to imagine big tech letting him post his honest opinions on the matters of the day. In his heyday he would have been classified as a liberal; today he would probably be vilified as a homophobe, a misogynist, and maybe even a white supremacist. If there were a statue of Royko in Chicago, it would have been toppled by now – or at least defaced.

In 1972, however, Royko was riding high when he won a Pulitzer Prize for commentary. In 2011 he joined such luminaries as Saul Bellow, Theodore Dreiser, Ernest Hemingway, Carl Sandburg, Upton Sinclair, Thornton Wilder, and Richard Wright when he was posthumously inducted into the Chicago Literary Hall of Fame.

In one of his last columns, “Arrrgh! Disney Walks the Plank for Politically Correct,” published on January 10, 1997, he remarked, “Sometimes life in these strange times is just one can of worms after another.”

Almost a quarter of a century past his death, it is obvious that there are no heirs to the throne he left vacant, no one to wield a journalistic can opener, inspect the contents, and crack wise.

And that may be yet another big reason why newspapers are dying.

A Letter to Washington Post Columnist Kate Cohen

December 22, 2021 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

A Letter to Washington Post Columnist Kate Cohen

Dear Ms. Cohen,

I respectfully ask that you take the time to read this admittedly long letter in its entirety and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

As a lifelong reader of the Washington Post, I've long noticed that the Post has a clear bias in favor of women. This bias is self-evident: the Post has a gender columnist who only champions the female perspective, and in 2018 it published a repulsive article, Why Can't We Hate Men? Unbelievably, despite an overwhelmingly negative response from thousands of posted comments, at year-end the article was still selected as one of The Post's favorite op-eds of 2018!

I'm writing to Post columnists to get them to recognize and to correct this gender bias, this gender prejudice.

I'm sorry to say that your two recent Opinion pieces in the Post, about college guys committing sexual assaults and abolishing college fraternities, are additional examples of this prejudice.

Ms. Cohen, on your web page, you describe yourself as a "post holocaust, non-believing Jew". Your first book told the stories of your Jewish relatives in Italy who suffered under the Nazis. As such, and with utmost respect, please allow me to ask you some possibly sensitive questions.

Before I do, please know that I'm a former contributing member of the Anti-Defamation League. Although I was brought up Christian, I joined the ADL because "it was the right thing to do against hate". However, I stopped donating to the ADL and other similar organizations because of their silence to the anti-male prejudice that has for decades flowed so freely throughout the world.

An appalling example of this prejudice is the aforementioned "Why Can't We Hate Men?" article.

Do you think that it was appropriate for an American newspaper whose slogan is "Democracy Dies in Darkness" to print it?

Do you, as a (non-believing) Jew whose own relatives suffered from hate, think that the article echoes anything from the ugly history of Europe in the middle of the 20th century?

Do you think, as some of the article's more than 3,300 (vastly negative) commenters responded, "just change 'men' to 'Jews'", is a fair summarization of this hateful article?

What about "the patriarchy" that the author references at the end? Do you think that in the same way that the Nazi's use of a "Jewish conspiracy" aided in perpetuating hate and violence against Europe's Jews, the use of the term "the patriarchy" aids in perpetuating hate and violence against men? Why else would the gender bigot who wrote this article include the hashtag #BecausePatriarchy in her ugly, #MeToo-inspired screed?

If you think the comparison is exaggerated, then how do you reconcile Mona Eltahawy, an Egyptian-American feminist published in the Post who, in a 2019 radio interview, called for the use of "justifiable violence" against men and imagines "… a scenario in which we kill a certain number of men every week" to "dismantle the patriarchy"? Or ultra-radical Valerie Solanas, author of the SCUM Manifesto – the Society for Cutting Up Men – who called for not only destruction of the patriarchy, but also the complete elimination of the male sex?[i] These are not the only women calling for male genocide.[ii]

Isn't this the same thing the Nazis wanted for Jews?

Do you think that the article's author also hates your sons, now both young men? Or do you think she makes exceptions for the sons of feminist writers?

One of your articles tells us that both of your sons are attending college. Are you at all concerned that the article's author, Suzanna Danuta Walters, is still allowed to teach and to serve as the director of women's studies at Northeastern University?

Would you want your sons to be taught by this hate-filled woman? If so, what message are you sending them?

Are you at all concerned that they might be falsely accused of sexual assault while attending college? I would guess not, because you think they're "some of the good guys":

> My own sons are, I think, some of the good guys. They're heading back to college this fall with respect for sexual boundaries, a supply of condoms from our bathroom cabinet and the opinion that "Baby, It's Cold Outside" is "a little rapey."[iii]

Well guess what? Unless you insist that they wear shirts emblazoned with "This is What a Feminist's Son Looks Like",

> YOUR SONS HAVE THE SAME CHANCES OF BEING FALSELY ACCUSED OF SEXUAL ASSAULT AS ANY OTHER YOUNG MAN ON CAMPUS AND BEING "GOOD GUYS" WON'T HELP THEM.

How do I know? Because "sending them off with a supply of condoms" means that they will, with your presumed blessing, likely have sex with women (unless of course they're gay), and ANY woman who has sex with one of your sons may later regret it and falsely accuse him of rape, the next day, the next month or even years later.[iv]

Just like the three young men from the Duke University lacrosse team who in 2006 were falsely accused of rape by stripper Crystal Gail Mangum. You may recall that Mangum was later convicted of the 2nd degree murder of her boyfriend.

Or like the members of the University of Virginia fraternity who in Rolling Stone's infamous 2014 article A Rape on Campus: A Brutal Assault and Struggle for Justice at UVA, were accused of a horrifying gang rape. The article was ultimately debunked and the accuser, UVA student Jackie Coakley, was eventually forced to admit that she made up the entire story.

Don't you think that the parents of these young men would also have described their sons as "some of the good guys"?

And then there are the hundreds or perhaps thousands of students – almost all males – who have been accused of rape or sexual assault under the Kafkaesque guidelines issued by the US Department of Education's Office of Civil Rights (OCR) "Dear Colleague Letter" (DCL) issued in April of 2011.

I have little doubt that you're aware that this letter vastly changed and undermined the due process rights of students – 98% male [v] – who have been accused of sexual assault at the nation's colleges and universities. Among other changes, this "guidance" [vi]:

- required colleges to use a "preponderance of evidence" standard (> 50% certainty of guilt) instead of "beyond a reasonable doubt" that is the standard for all criminal proceedings
- violated the constitutionally-specified prohibition against double jeopardy by allowing both sides – including the accuser – to appeal a sexual misconduct decision, subjecting the accused to a theoretically-unlimited number of additional hearings
- eliminated the accused's right to legal counsel
- severely limited cross examination (as being "too stressful" for the accuser)
- bypassed rules of evidence, obviating the guarantee that all evidence – even exculpatory evidence – would be shared with both parties; however, hearsay and other irrelevant "evidence" are allowed
- didn't require placing the parties under oath, leaving consequences for lying generally nonexistent
- didn't require schools to record hearings or explain how they came to final decisions.[vii]

(Although these changes were rescinded in 2017 by Education Secretary Betsy DeVos, it appears that DOE may reinstitute them as Catherine Lhamon – who as head of DOE's OCR oversaw the abuse of students accused of sexual assault – was reappointed to again head the OCR in October.)

Ms. Cohen, God forbid, if one of your sons were accused of rape, would you want him to face such an unfair Title IX process? If YOU were ever arrested for a crime, wouldn't you be alarmed if these same unjust standards were used in YOUR trial?

Can you not see that this denial of male students' civil rights is morally comparable to the same denial of Jews' civil rights in the 1930's, before the Holocaust?

Finally, I also know that your own sons are at risk of being falsely accused of sexual assault because writers like you continue, through biased, one-sided articles, to contribute to a provably false[viii] message about the prevalence of sexual assault at the nation's colleges and universities, thus providing fertile ground for an often crazy, circus-like atmosphere of false accusations against many innocent young men. (Remember Columbia University's "mattress girl" Emma Sulkowicz, who dragged a mattress around Columbia University, even after the accused was exonerated by the school? Perhaps "insane" would be a better description?)

Considered alone, your two articles might not seem to cause any untoward danger to men; they are but two short essays that are only "about the safety of women at college campuses", right?

Wrong.

Monstrously wrong.

Your articles are only two of many, many thousands of similarly biased, one-sided, anti-male articles written and published over the past four or five decades in the world's media that collectively can only be considered "gender propaganda", propaganda that adheres to the description given in 1933 by Joseph Goebbels, the Nazi Germany Minister of Propaganda:

> "The best propaganda is that which, as it were, works invisibly, penetrates the whole of life without the public having any knowledge of the propagandistic initiative." [ix]

Isn't the Post publishing the "Why Can't We Hate Men?" article some 85 years after Goebbels spoke the above words proof that feminist-inspired prejudice has succeeded, even beyond Goebbels' wildest dreams, in spreading hate, not against Jews, but this time against men, without the public – or the Washington Post itself – even aware of feminists' decades-long propagandistic initiative?

And ironically publishing it under a pithy platitude, "Democracy Dies in Darkness"!

Isn't it amazing that, even after those horrible cases of false rape accusations at Duke and UVA, an informed, well-educated woman – and the mother of two sons – would still write articles years later that are animated by the same anti-male gender prejudice as shown at Duke and UVA?

What's equally amazing is that you seem to be completely unaware of their underlying feminist propagandistic purpose. How else can one explain how the mother of two sons would write such biased and one-sided articles?

Your articles share four telltale characteristics of propaganda also found in thousands of similar feminism-inspired articles written over the past 40-plus years:

1. Identify one enemy for special vilification:

> In your two articles, the "one enemy" – even if you don't realize it – is male college students.
>
> In the larger context the enemy is males, both men and boys, who have been vilified for decades, almost always without comment or outcry. "#killallmen", "Male chauvinist pig", "toxic masculinity", "mansplaining", "manspreading", images of battered wives with no mention of equal numbers of battered husbands are just a few examples. It's gotten so bad that even young boys are > considered fair game: this past March a school in Australia vilified boys by making them apologize to girls for being male.

2. Appeal to the emotions:

> Your articles leverage fears about a supposed atmosphere of campus sexual assault that is hugely exaggerated by feminist statistics. At best, these statistics are provably a calculated misrepresentation of basic facts[x]; at worst, they are a bald-faced lie, a gender-partisan generated fiction that proves the adage that "figures don't lie, but liars figure".
>
> For example, you wrote that "… more than an estimated quarter [25%] of all undergraduate women will experience nonconsensual sexual contact while in college." A frightful statistic indeed.
>
> However, other sources – notably President Obama and Joe Biden – have repeatedly cited a different statistic, 1 in 5 (20%) estimate. So, which is it? This not-insignificant difference is a strong indicator that "the numbers are being fudged".
>
> However, it appears that female students who are the alleged victims aren't really frightened by the statistics. Either of them.
>
> Not if you consider the way that they behave.
>
> If female students were truly worried about becoming a "1-in-whatever-feminists-claim-it-is" statistic, then why do so many of them drink to excess, where both their common sense and their aversion to sex diminish with each drink?
>
> If female students were truly worried about becoming rape victims of male students, why in the world would they ever agree to live in co-ed dorms?
>
> If female students really believe that a campus rape culture exists, then why do they continue to dress so provocatively? (And before asserting the "blaming the victim" defense, please view the video The Politics of Cleavage, by men's rights activist Bettina Arndt. At least one woman hasn't totally lost her mind!)
>
> And if female students were truly worried about being raped by male students, why would they even associate—let alone go out on dates—with these monstrous males at all?
>
> Because, deep down, both they and feminists know the campus rape culture is a lie. It is false rape accusations writ large.
>
> In the larger context, thousands of articles like yours prey both on females' emotional fears of rape and violence as well as of males' emotional instinct to protect women and girls. (Remember the Titanic?) These emotional fears are one reason why feminists have lied about domestic violence being about "men beating up women" without admitting to the fact that at least 50% of domestic violence is perpetuated by women. (A second reason is the massive funding for DV programs.)

> If you don't believe that women perpetuate at least 50% of DV, please take the time to read a law review article Disabusing the Definition of Domestic Violence: How Women Batter Men and the Role of the Feminist State (written by a woman), or my article about the hypocrisy of the #MeToo movement, particularly the section on "Women's Contribution to Domestic Violence".
> Or you could just ask Johnny Depp.

3. Employ constant repetition of just a few ideas, using stereotyped phrases:

> "The patriarchy", "domestic violence", "rape culture", and "gender wage gap" are all stereotyped – i.e., "prejudiced" – phrases that have been blindly repeated, ad nauseum, in news segments and articles just like yours with little regard for the facts, the truth, or their underlying anti-male bigotry.

4. Put forth only one side of the argument:

> Your article about abolishing college fraternities is a classic example. Why did you focus only on male fraternities? Why didn't you also consider female sororities? A few simple Google searches[xi] would have provided plenty of proof that sororities should have been included in your analysis. That you focused only on fraternities is also indicative of your own misandry – hatred of men.
>
> In the larger context, how many times has the Post published articles that examined only one side of the scourge of domestic violence without telling the truth about women's violence against men? In the past 40 years I've only seen two that specifically exposed this ugly truth.
>
> Or how often has the Post published articles or commentary that affirmed the alleged gender wage gap and yet failed to report[xii] on a 2009 U.S. Department of Labor report, An Analysis of the Reasons for the Disparity in Wages Between Men and Women – Final Report which concluded, "… the raw wage gap [between men and women] continues to be used in misleading ways [emphasis added] to advance public policy agendas without fully explaining the reasons behind the gap."
>
> (Isn't the phrase "u*sed in misleading ways*" just a polite way of saying "they're lying"?) [xiii]

These four telltale characteristics, or principles, of propaganda just described are straight from the pages of Adolf Hitler's Mein Kampf!

As documented in a 2012 study, Propaganda and Persuasion,

> Throughout the Nazi period, Hitler and Goebbels stuck rigidly to these principles, and the world witnessed a mature, cultured people—the Germans—accepting one of the most onerous dictatorships in history, which precipitated a prolonged war and eventually instituted as policy the most heinous of all crimes, genocide.

Ms. Cohen, I once read that "history repeats itself, only not exactly". From what I've described in this letter, wouldn't you agree, particularly as a Jewish woman, that there are parallels between what the Nazis did and what feminists and their intelligent, but unwitting accomplices – including both you and the Washington Post – have been doing for years?

I can only hope that you've read this far. If so, I thank you. I pray that I've opened your mind to the dark turn that feminism took a long time ago.

If I have, please help me to convince reporters, columnists, and management at the Post that they need to reconsider their entire coverage of gender-related issues to eliminate their hateful, feminist-inspired, anti-male gender bias.

Do it for the same reason that I once contributed to the ADL: "it's the right thing to do against hate".

Do it in memory of the men of the Titanic, who willingly gave up their lives so women and children could live; do it for the more than one million American men[xiv] who have died in wars protecting us at home; do it for the 4,140 male 9/11 first responders (85% of total)[xv] who died that day; do it for the thousands of nameless men who are injured or killed on the job every year to support their families – 94% of workplace fatalities. Finally, do it for the tens of millions of men who, despite being assailed by feminist hate for decades, continue to support, care for, and love women.

But most of all, do it for your sons.

If Abortion Rights, then the Right of Parental Surrender

January 4, 2022 | by Robert Franklin | Link | Original Link

For the past 49 years, abortion rights in the U.S. have been solely a creature of constitutional law. The right of privacy created by Supreme Court precedents that, in turn, created the right to an abortion, applied, of course, only to women. Men naturally had no right to privacy as it applied to pregnancy and abortion rights.

Therefore, an overturning of the Court's abortion precedents, if it happens, would remove the issue from its constitutional framework and place it in a statutory one to be decided by state legislatures. That could allow the parallel issue of men's right to avoid the consequences of conception, for the first time, to enter the public debate and possibly receive a serious hearing. I'm not holding my breath, but the demise of Roe and the constitutional regime governing abortion rights could conceivably open the door to the concept of parental surrender.

When asked by researchers, including those at Planned Parenthood's Guttmacher Institute, women overwhelmingly cite reasons of practicality for having an abortion. In survey after survey, reasons like their own age and immaturity, lack of financial wherewithal, lack of a sufficient relationship with the father and the like are given as their reasons for terminating a pregnancy in 89% – 95% of cases.

Given that, it's hard not to notice that men face the same issues. Men too may be short of money, too young to become a parent, not have completed their education or not have a secure relationship with the mother. So if a woman can avoid the consequences of conception via abortion, shouldn't men have the same right?

True, those consequences are greater for women than for men. Contrary to certain loony beliefs currently in vogue, men can't become pregnant, carry a child to term or give birth. But what's just as true is that, when a woman has an abortion, she doesn't just avoid the consequences of pregnancy and childbirth, she also avoids 18 or more years of child care, support, sleepless nights, medical worries, college funds, heartache, etc. So, if women can avoid all those years of the consequences of conception, shouldn't men be able to do so as well?

More specifically, shouldn't state legislatures grant to men the right to sign a state-approved form saying, in essence, that they're aware that a certain woman is pregnant, that the signer believes himself to be the father and that he knowingly and willingly waives all his parental rights to the child forever? If so, state law would then prohibit the mother and the state from enforcing parental obligations against him. Such a document, properly executed, would mean that he could never assert parental rights to the child and could never be required to pay support for it. It would mean that the mother could never demand support from him or be subjected to his demands for custody or parenting time.

First and foremost, a man's right of parental surrender is a matter of equality between the sexes. If one sex has the legal right to avoid the consequences of conception that's conferred on women by abortion rights, the other sex should have a parallel right. Those who trumpet their support for gender equality seldom also support the right of parental surrender, but without it, the sexes can never be equal before the law.

But parental surrender is about more than equality, important as that is; it's about fundamental fairness too. As things stand now and have for far longer than Roe has been in effect, women generally exercise considerable control over men's reproductive rights. Particularly with abortion rights, a woman can literally decide whether a man becomes a father or not. Does he passionately desire to have a child? He may, but the issue is not his to decide, a policy position with which I enthusiastically agree. Is he one of those men who, like the millions of women who have abortions, is not ready to be a parent but who learns that his girlfriend is pregnant with his child? Again, whether he's saddled with 18 years of support is simply not his to decide. Her decision, his obligations. To exist at all, gender equality must go both ways (that's what equality means) and at present men's fundamental right to decide whether to have a child or not is placed squarely, not in his hands, but in hers.

Assuming no medical issues, there is not a single argument against parental surrender that's not also an argument against abortion rights. If you support abortion rights, you must, as a matter of intellectual honesty also support the right of parental surrender. In those fairly rare instances in which a woman has an abortion for medical reasons, the consequences of that abortion extend far beyond those medical issues. They include the 18+ years of caring for a child that burden both the mother and the father.

Now, do I seriously believe that state legislatures will, any time soon, even consider the concept of parental surrender? I do not. They should, but they won't. That's because even a casual glance at all the issues regarding children, parents, child custody, fertility and the rights and duties related thereto unequivocally tell us one thing – that society is perfectly content with women maintaining effective control over men's fertility, and rights and access to their children.

I'll say more about that next time.

Of hats, heads and hegemony

January 10, 2022 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

If you are in the habit of watching old movies, it's hard to avoid comparisons between fashions in years past and today.

Obviously, the costumes in period pieces often look more bizarre (dig that ruffled collar on Queen Elizabeth…check out that hoopskirt on Scarlett O'Hara) than the attire of the future in science fiction films. It is easier to relate to movies that take place from the 1920's to the 1950's because the clothes shown in those films are the direct antecedents of what we wear today. In particular, consider the hat.

Today the baseball cap is the headwear of choice for men and women – Muslim women excepted. Also excepted are Mennonite women and Catholic women attending Mass. The same used to hold for Protestant women attending church. I don't know if this is still the case. I suspect that baseball caps would be considered gauche if not taboo. For sure, a woman attending church in Boston should never wear a New York Yankees cap.

If you're big on diversity, take a look at women's hats on display in old movies. The range of styles is astounding. Anarchy rules – anything goes! Some hats are sensible (e.g., the cloche hats popular in the 1920s) while others reek of frippery and frivolity. Indeed, women's hats used to be a reliable source of male amusement if not amazement. Even small towns had millinery (hat) stores and old hat boxes gathered dust in grandma's attic. Has anyone under age 60 ever seen a millinery store? Or a hatbox?

But this venue is A Voice for Men, and we don't want to spend too much time on the sopranos. So let's shift to baritones and look at male headgear.

The hat serves several purposes. For men and women a hat keeps the sun off one's head in the summer and provides warmth in winter. But men go bald and women do not. So the danger of sunburn (or skin cancer) is worse in the summer for men; as is the ability to keep the head warm in the winter. It used to be said that 90% of your body heat was lost through the head; that turned out to be a turban legend. Even so, if you go out on a cold winter morning with a bare bald head, you will be sorry.

To be sure, a beret is still occasionally seen on a man who frequents bohemian haunts and if you go to Irish/Scottish/British/Celtic fests, the Irish flat cap is much in evidence. The cowboy hat, practical for working cowboys, is still worn in western states. Admittedly, "all hat and no cattle" applies to most wearers.

If you hang out anywhere hipsters congregate, you will often see hats reminiscent of something a burlesque comedian would have worn. That look went out with Pinky Lee. Unless you're a bottomless fount of smutty jokes, such a hat looks ridiculous.

Let's not forget the shaved-head look. Some men are under the impression that it makes them look like bad asses and display their depilated domes proudly, much as weight-lifters and guys with sleeve tattoos always wear short-sleeve shirts. I'm not sure if they impress anyone other than each other.

Then there's the young man – often a thrasher – who always wears a wool cap, even on the hottest day of the year. Still can't figure that out. Keep in mind that no man is required to wear a hat unless it is part of a uniform.

Notice that mature men who maintain a healthy head of hair (even if it has turned, white, silver, or gray) often eschew hats. If you look through old photographs of President Kennedy, rarely if ever will you see him wearing a hat. Unlike the family patriarch, Joe Kennedy, JFK had overachieving follicles right up till that fatal day in Dallas in 1963 when Oswald acted alone…or not.

Kennedy appearing hatless when he made his inaugural speech on a cold day in January 1961 sealed the deal. Subsequently, whenever he appeared in public, he was almost always hatless. He is often credited with killing off the male hat market in the 1960s, even for men without hirsute noggins. Since then Presidential heads, no matter how devious, dense, or muddled, have almost always been hatless. The notable exception was Lyndon Johnson, hardly a working cowboy, who was often photographed wearing a Stetson at his ranch.

As the 1960s progressed, the male baby boomers coming of age were more than happy to display long locks. Remember, the musical Hair debuted in 1968…and they weren't referring to armpits or pubic areas. Of course, some holdouts kept the long hair look on the sides and in the back even as their bald spots spread on top. As their fathers and grandfathers had learned, a hat is preferable to a combover.

Today, of course, bald spots are usually covered by baseball caps. Bald spots are rarely a problem for ballplayers, who tend to be young. Nevertheless, the ballcap is eminently practical for ballplayers. The brim can be pulled low to block the sun so a fielder can track batted balls without getting hit in the head. And the cap is usually made of light enough material to keep the fielders from getting heatstroke on a hot day and to allow for airflow.

The real mystery is why are so many people who have never heard of the infield fly rule or sabermetrics wearing baseball caps? In attempting to answer this question, let's start by going back a century.

During the era under consideration in this essay (1920's through 1950's), there were 16 major league teams. Each team had 25 roster spots, so at any given time there were only 400 active major leaguers. Consequently, being a big-league ballplayer was a high-status profession. When little boys wore baseball caps with the logo of their local team, it was understandable. It indicated their aspirations. In a sense, pretending to be a major leaguer was not unlike playing policeman or fireman, though probably not as much fun as playing doctor.

Unless they were coaches, adult men rarely wore baseball caps. Check out historic photos of crowds at baseball games. First of all, you notice the crowds are overwhelmingly men. Second, none of them is wearing a baseball cap. It's mostly derbies, homburgs, and the occasional top hat. In warmer weather, straw boaters (popularly known as skimmers – perhaps the inspiration for the Frisbee) are ubiquitous.

Now look at a contemporary crowd. Almost everyone is wearing a baseball cap… moms and dads, grandfathers and grandmothers, boys and girls. A cap that used to be an integral part of boyhood has now become a staple of adulthood, and not just at the ballpark.

Much like the T-shirt or the bumper sticker, the ballcap displays a message, not necessarily allegiance to a team. It could be a testimonial to a favorite product (John Deere) or candidate (MAGA), the sartorial equivalent of a commercial.

Inexplicably, one modern fashion statement involving baseball caps has become more and more prominent. I refer to the wearing of the baseball cap backwards. When I see adult men wearing a cap this way I can only shake my head and ask why. The brim was designed to keep the sun out of your eyes, and it can be readily adjusted as the sun moves or the wearer moves. Unless you are a catcher and have to turn the cap around to accommodate your mask, or you have eyes in the back of your head, there is no point in wearing a cap backwards. Until recently, the only non-catchers who wore the cap in this manner were little boys and adolescents…the Little Rascals, the Dead End Kids. So when a grown man wears his cap that way, he is infantilizing himself. He may think he looks like one cool dude. Men of previous generations would beg to differ. Consider the hats they wore.

The top hat used to be an indication of status. Tallness is associated with dominance, and by adding a few inches of height, the top hat enhanced male dominance. Admittedly, the stovepipe hat took this to extremes, and bordered on the comical. Abraham Lincoln, standing 6’4”, hardly needed height enhancement, so the stovepipe hat made him look gawky. It didn’t work particularly well for short men either (imagine Peter Dinklage in a stovepipe hat). Only the Cat in the Hat wore it well.

In later decades the top hat became not the hat of daily wear but of formal wear. It was donned for a night on the town…think top hat and tails and Fred Astaire. Or it was the headwear of solemn occasions, worn by participants at inaugurations, coronations, or royal weddings…or by undertakers. Today I don’t know if one could even find a top hat at a men’s store. If you did find one and wore it in public, you would only invite snickers.

There is one male hat of old worthy of a comeback, however. I speak of the fedora.

Look at old movies from the 1920s through the 1950s. Clearly, the hat of choice for men was the fedora. It was worn by gangsters, reporters, politicians, businessmen, blue collar men, all sorts of men – even losers (e.g., Elisha Cook in The Maltese Falcon).

Why did it remain in fashion for so long with men in all walks of life? Let’s just say it was manly. While women’s hats strayed all over the map, the ubiquitous fedora indicated that men were staying the course. Women changed their minds as frequently as their fashions, but a man who wore a fedora was a rock of stolidity.

The fedora worked well with almost any male attire. You could wear it with a bomber jacket, overalls, an overcoat or a suit. Best of all was the pinstriped double-breasted suit. Being vertical, pinstripes tended to emphasize height, enhancing male stature . Though the New York Yankees were not the first baseball team to wear pinstripes, they were the first to standardize the style (rumor has it that the Yankees introduced pinstripes to their home uniforms to minimize Babe Ruth's girth in his mature years). Opponents perceived the Yankees as being taller (i.e., more dominant) than they already were.

Even without pinstripes, the double-breasted suit is an intriguing piece of attire. On its face it would seem to be impractical, since the overlapping closure requires more material than a single-breasted suit. And what's with all those useless extra buttons? The wearer must be buttoned-up; with a single-breasted suit, you can button up or not without attracting undue attention. In old movies, the double-breasted jacket often had padded shoulders, which added heft or gravitas to the wearer.

The perception of a man clad in a padded, pinstriped double-breasted suit and a fedora was not unlike that of a linebacker in full uniform. Compare that image to the contemporary hatless man in a skinny hipster suit (the one that looks like the wearer has outgrown it but can't afford to buy another one). The impression given is that of an adolescent – when growth hormone went into overdrive – the awkward age, it used to be called. A full-grown man has clothing that fits.

For sure, the image of men in old movies is an improvement over today's casual male with his ballcap and his T-shirt (untucked, of course, thanks to the fashion trend started by obese men). And let's not forget the droopy-drawer teenagers whose trousers defy gravity and whose underwear comes dangerously close to revealing skid marks. How could such attire invite any response but snickers? There was a time when male adolescents looked to the future and tried to dress like men. Today they look to the past and try to dress like boys.

Now I'm hardly an exponent of sartorial elegance, and if you could see me at my keyboard, you would surely agree. I prefer substance to style, and I've always felt a slavish devotion to fashion is a waste of time and money and arguably downright decadent. I must admit, however, that style often indicates a presence or lack of substance, and I believe the fedora tilts towards substance. When worn properly the fedora, perched atop a squinting or glowering countenance, conveys that you are not a man to be trifled with. It worked for men in the past. It could work for men in the future.

Consider the real-life example of the four members (Red Stromwall, Max Herman, Ed Benson, and Harry Crowder) of the Hat Squad, an elite unit of the Robbery Division of the Los Angeles PD in the 1950's. All of them were tall and they all wore snap-brimmed fedoras. The optics were overwhelming. Collectively, they struck fear in the hearts of SoCal miscreants, who usually wilted in their presence. The third degree was rarely necessary.

So given a fedora worn at the proper angle, there is no need to snarl, rant, or even raise your voice. Without uttering a word, you convey "None of your lip, sister," to any females in the vicinity, thus precluding the need to deploy one's pimp hand.

Yes, gentlemen, if the fedora makes a comeback, it could conceivably diminish violence! It's a win-win situation for both sexes!

Changing Times at AVFM

January 21, 2022 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Fourteen years ago, I dedicated my life to fomenting a more honest dialogue about men and men's issues and pushing that dialogue into mainstream consciousness. Thus, A Voice for Men was born. And today I can say in all honesty, and thanks to more people than I can count, that my dream has been fully realized. A Voice for Men kicked in the door on that dialogue wearing combat boots. Within 5 years we were attracting men to gather in person from all over the world. The website became a juggernaut with tens of millions of visitors. Mainstream news outlets across the planet attacked us as more dangerous than COVID. We exploited their attempts to silence the dialogue we started and used it to reach even more men.

As most of you know, it was A Voice for Men that captured the attention of a young feminist filmmaker named Cassie Jaye. Thanks to her skill, and ultimately to her integrity, The Red Pill Movie reached millions more people with what that dialogue should look like. To her credit, Jaye also showed the world an unblinking picture of how ugly and corrupt the resistance to that dialogue is.

All good things must pass. Ultimately, Google choked off most of our traffic. In that sense, we were one of the first targets of cancel culture. The mainstream news outlets went on to pursue other manufactured boogeymen, but to this day they feel compelled to occasionally remind their readers how dangerous we are. And it is one of many reasons it is important that A Voice for Men remain a permanent fixture on the landscape. Because fuck them. They never silenced us and never will.

Their failure has paid dividends. A Voice for Men, alongside a handful of other content creators, forced Red Pill thinking into the collective cultural consciousness. And while most men will remain hopelessly locked into servile, blue pill life, we made sure that untold millions of men are aware they have an option if they have the courage to take it.

If this sounds like a goodbye letter, it is of sorts. As of this posting, I am handing over full ownership and control, including all intellectual property associated with A Voice for Men and the avoiceformen.com website, to Robert Brockway, a longtime managing editor and tech savior around here. Like most of the Australian men I've encountered in this movement, Rob isn't one to call attention to himself or seek accolades. Nonetheless, he's been solid as Roman concrete behind the scenes for years now. His uncompromising passion for furthering men's issues is evident in everything he does. Rob's also a mature, levelheaded and openminded thinker, the absolute right choice to take the reins.

My life's mission has changed, but it is no doubt an extension of the original plan. Five years ago, through my Patreon account, I started doing weekly online video conferencing with patrons. It was just a gathering of like-minded men who decided they rather liked having conversations where they could talk openly and honestly about their lived experience without being shamed or attacked.

I realized quickly that these meetings were an amazing place for men to fine tune the Red Pill discussion and to help each other put what they've learned into practice. Watching that has been nothing short of amazing. So amazing, if fact, that it deserves an organizing body of its own. Thus, the birth of XY Crew, and the tagline "Men Building Men," which is exactly what we see happening there every day.

Today, and again with the help of many, XY Crew is hosting meetings seven days a week and running an online video cybershed that is open 24/7. We are planning our first real world event for October of this year. This is what I'll do with the rest of my life, folks.

I want A Voice for Men to remain intact, and with new leadership that can give the platform what it needs, and I am confident that is going to happen thanks to Rob and others. Though I depart AVFM with mixed feelings of pride, sorrow, relief, satisfaction, and perhaps a little angst, I am certain that the site is in great hands, and that important, amazing things are certain to come in the future.

Best wishes, and please remember that you are the prize.

What is a ‘Modwife’?

January 26, 2022 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

The following is another entry from the Wiki4Men series for your interest and discussion. – Eds.*

A Modwife (noun), refers to women who have embraced multi-option lives over more traditional roles, and who accept or encourage multi-option lives for their male partners. While containing the syllable ‘wife,’ the term applies equally to non-married women who follow or advocate the principles outlined in this article.

The term was coined in response to the popular trend in Tradwives – ie. wives who enact or advocate a traditional gender role based on Western middle-class femininity of the mid twentieth century. Both the tradwife and modwife eschew feminist prescriptions for relationships, which are geared toward female domination and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor, value and devotion (for more about the feminist relationships model, see Gynowife). A distaste for feminism, however, is where the similarities between tradwife and modwife end.

Philosophical outlook

The unlikelihood that modern women will embrace ‘Tradwife’ roles of yesteryear with genuine commitment underpins attraction to the modwife option. Thus for best-case scenario, today’s multi-option women can invite their men to do same – to embrace multi-option lives. The modwife’s modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her.

Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women’s ‘liberation’ while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty for both men and women in relationships — some of them will be recognized among the supporters of the men’s rights movement.

That libetarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, and free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements. In a word; freedom.

Wiki4men: Sexual Feudalism

Sexual feudalism refers to the sex-relations model of gynocentric culture, whereby men are expected to serve women who in turn are viewed as men's moral and social superiors. The model is based on the dominant social system in medieval Europe in which the nobility held lands from the Crown in exchange for military service, with vassals being tenants in service to the nobles, and peasants (villeins or serfs) obliged to live on their lord's land and give him homage, labour, and a share of their produce.

Historical antecedents [edit]

Historical antecedents of the phrase 'sexual feudalism' appear in literature, each referring to a power imbalance between the sexes:

Camille Paglia (1990):

> "…a sexual feudalism of master-slave relationships."[1]

Marjolijn Februari (2011):

> "Actually it's arguing for a dictatorship, the dictatorship of the vagina, a kind of sexual feudalism which you wouldn't want our international relations to be governed by in the future… those women aren't the least concerned about war and peace as a matter of principle; all they're concerned about is securing their own interests."[2]

Adam Kostakis (2011):

> "It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they aim to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass, the accomplishment of which will be the first step towards the extermination of men." "But what are the women's rights advocated today? The right to confiscate men's money, the right to commit parental alienation, the right to commit paternity fraud, the right to equal pay for less work, the right to pay a lower tax rate, the right to mutilate men, the right to confiscate sperm, the right to murder children, the right to not be disagreed with, the right to reproductive choice and the right to make that choice for men as well. In an interesting legal paradox, some have advocated – with success – that women should have the right to not be punished for crimes at all. The eventual outcome of this is a kind of sexual feudalism, where women rule arbitrarily, and men are held in bondage, with fewer rights and far more obligations."[3]

In men's rights discourse [edit]

Peter Wright has expanded on the phrase as relevant to men's human rights discourse, describing the practice of 'sexual feudalism' as rooted in chivalry and courtly love; practices which structured relations between men and women along the lines of a feudal relationship between a Lord and his attending vassals and peasants.[4] Evidence shows that within the emergent medieval practices of romantic chivalry and courtly love, aristocratic women came to be addressed as Midons (literally 'my lord') by men who acted as both liegemen and humble servants. Over a period of centuries the practice of sexual feudalism, encoded in the conventions of chivalry and romantic love culture, spread initially from aristocratic circles to infuse mass culture, affecting all class strata.

As evidence of the development of this model, Wright[5] has cited the following scholarly sources:

■ "In the eleventh century the worship of the Virgin Mary became widely popular; the reverence bestowed upon the Virgin was extended to the female sex in general, and as a vassal owed obedience to his feudal overlord, so did he owe service and devotion to his lady… Thus there was a service of love as there was a service of vassalage, and the lover stood to his lady in a position analogous to that of the vassal to his overlord. He attained this position only by stages; "there are four stages in love: the first is that of aspirant (fegnedor), the second that of suppliant (precador), the third that of recognised suitor (entendedor) and the fourth that of accepted lover (drut)." The lover was formally installed as such by the lady, took an oath of fidelity to her and received a kiss to seal it, a ring or some other personal possession."[6]

■ “The Aristocracy and Church developed the doctrine of the superiority of women, that adoration which gathered round both the persons both of the Virgin in heaven and the lady upon earth, and which handed down to the modern world the ideal of chivalry. The cult of the Virgin and the cult of chivalry grew together, and continually reacted upon one another… The cult of the lady was the mundane counterpart of the cult of the Virgin and it was the invention of the medieval aristocracy. In chivalry the romantic worship of a woman was as necessary a quality of the perfect knight as was the worship of God… It is obvious that the theory which regarded the worship of a lady as next to that of God and conceived of her as the mainspring of brave deeds, a creature half romantic, half divine, must have done something to counterbalance the dogma of subjection. The process of placing women upon a pedestal had begun, and whatever we may think of the ultimate value of such an elevation (for few human beings are suited to the part of Stylites, whether ascetic or romantic) it was at least better than placing them, as the Fathers of the Church had inclined to do, in the bottomless pit.”[7]

■ “Everyone has heard of courtly love, and everyone knows it appeared quite suddenly at the end of the eleventh century at Languedoc. The sentiment, of course, is love, but love of a highly specialized sort, whose characteristics may be enumerated as Humility, Courtesy, and the Religion of Love. The lover is always abject. Obedience to his lady’s lightest wish, however whimsical, and silent acquiescence in her rebukes, however unjust, are the only virtues he dares to claim. Here is a service of love closely modelled on the service which a feudal vassal owes to his lord. The lover is the lady’s ‘man’. He addresses her as midons, which etymologically represents not ‘my lady’ but ‘my lord’. The whole attitude has been rightly described as ‘a feudalisation of love’. This solemn amatory ritual is felt to be part and parcel of the courtly life.” [8]

■ “Medieval courtly love, closely bound to the dominant values of feudalism and the Church, allowed in a special way for the expression of sexual love by women… if courtly love were to define itself as a noble phenomenon, it had to attribute an essential freedom to the relation between lovers. Hence, it metaphorically extended the social relation of vassalage to the love relationship, a “conceit” that Maurice Valency rightly called “the shaping principle of the Decapriowhole design” of courtly love… Thus, in Medieval romances, a parley typically followed a declaration of love until love freely proffered was freely returned. A kiss (like the kiss of homage) sealed the pledge, rings were exchanged, and the knight entered the love service of his lady. Representing love along the lines of vassalage had several liberating implications for aristocratic women. Most fundamental, ideas of homage and mutuality entered the notion of heterosexual relations along with the idea of freedom. As symbolized on shields and other illustrations that place the knight in the ritual attitude of commendation, kneeling before his lady with his hands folded between hers, homage signified male service, not domination or subordination of the lady, and it signified fidelity, constancy in that service.”[9]

■ “William IX calls his lady midons, which I have translated as ‘my Lord’. This midons is, as Pound said, ‘inexplicable’: it is used by the troubadours, of their ladies, and in the later troubadours we find it everywhere–Bernart de Ventadorn used it twenty-three times. Its etymology is (?mi-) dominus, ‘my master, lord’, but since it is used only of women – its pronoun is ‘she’ – glossarists have difficulty assigning it a gender. Though Mary Hackett has shown that it was not felt to mean on the primary level ‘my quasi-feudal lord’ by the troubadours who used it, these men knew their Latin and must have been aware of its origins and peculiarity; in fact it was clearly their collective emotions and expectations that drew what amounts to a metaphor from the area of lordship, just as it is the collective metaphor-making process that establishes ‘baby’ as a term for a girlfriend and that creates and transforms language constantly. In the same way, knowing that Dominus was the standard term for God, and that don, ‘lord’, was also used for God, they must also have felt some connection with religious adoration. William IX echoes the scriptures when he says

> Every joy must bow down before her > and every pride obey Midons…
> No one can find a finer lady, > nor eyes see, nor mouth speak of…

The incantatory fifth stanza of this song enumerates powers that were evoked every day in the Virgin and the saints. William IX is, metaphorically, his lady’s feudal vassal as well as her worshipper. So that there are three structures in parallel: the feudal, the courtly-love, and the religious; the psychological structure of each followed that of the others, so that it was difficult to think of any of them without transferring the feelings that belonged to the others. The lady was to lover as God to man, and as feudal lord to vassal; and feudal lord to vassal was as God to man. Our socio-economically minded age would say that the forms of feudal society must have shaped relationships in the other two spheres, and it is as likely that aesthetics and ethics moulded economics and vice versa. Of course, courtly love was not ‘religious’ in the sense of being part of any Christian ethic; it was a religion in its psychology. The courtly lover did not think of his lady as the Church thought of her, but as the Church thought of God.”[10]

■ “Since the social structure of the Middle Ages was mainly feudal and hierarchical, men were expected to serve their lords while women were required to show fidelity. In courtly love this was transformed into meaning that the lover would serve his lady and that she would be faithful to him. Courtly love is often said to have placed women on a pedestal and to have made men into knights whose heroic lives would henceforth belong to elevated ladies. The idea arises from the fact that men frequently used the language of chivalry to express their servile relationship to whatever woman they loved, and sometimes they described her as a divinity toward which they might aspire but could never hope to equal… that he must prove himself worthy of her and so advance upward, step by step, toward a culminating union at her level; that everything noble and virtuous, everything that makes life worth living, proceeds from women, who are even described as the source of goodness itself. But though the lady now discourses with her lover, the men frequently cast themselves into the typical posture of fin’amors. On their knees, hands clasped, they beg the beloved to accept their love, their life, their service, and to do with them as she pleases."[11]

■ "The extent of the penetration of feudal thought into the conception and expression of courtly love has been apparent to all modern investigators: the poet-lover portrays himself as a vassel (om), the lady is treated as a feudal lord and often addressed in masculine form (midons/sidons), and contracts (conven), reward (guizardon), and other aspects of loyal and humble service are constantly under discussion. In a profound sense, courtly love is quintessentially feudal (Riquer 77-96), for it imitates the primary hierarchical principles increasingly employed to control as well as to justify hegemonic desire in the second feudal age."[12]

■ "The troubadours lived and functioned within a society based on feudalism. Certain ones were themselves feudal lords; others were liegemen dependent on such lords for their sustinence. The troubadours who were members of the clergy were also actively involved in this feudal society. It is only natural that their literature reflect some traits of the age in which it was created. Scholars soon saw striking parallels between feudalistic practices and certain tenets of Courtly Love. The comparisons lie in certain resemblances shared by vassalage and the courtly "love service." Fundamental to both was the concept of obedience. As a vassal, the liegeman swore obedience to his lord. As a courtly lover, the poet chose a lady to whom he was required to swear obedience. Humility and obedience were two concepts familiar to medieval man, active components of his Weltanschauung. Critics, such as Erich Kohler, have found them exhibited in both the life and literature of that time.

The entire concept of love-service was patterned after the vassal's oath to serve his lord with loyalty, tenacity, and courage. These same virtues were demanded of the poet. Like the liegeman vis-a-vis his sovereign, the poet approached his lady with fear and respect. Submitted to her, obedient to her will, he awaited a fief or honor as did the vassal. His compensation took many forms: the pleasure of his lady's company in her chamber or in the garden; an avowal of her love; a secret meeting; a kiss or even le surplus, complete unity. Like the lord, the woman who was venerated and served was expected to reward her faithful and humble servant. Her failure to do so was considered a breach of "contract." Most critics who support the theory that the courtly-love-service was formed by assimilation to the feudal service inherent in vassalage, credit Guillaume IX with its creation. However, the universality of these parallels cannot be doubted:

> The posture of the true lover is so familiar that we have come to accept it as the hallmark. A seal attributed to Cononde Bethune represents it perfectly. This depicts in an oval cartouche, an armed knight on his knees before a lady. His body is shrouded in a mail hauberk. His head is completely concealed in his helmet. He wears spurs but no sword. The lady stands at arms length, chastely robed, her regular nonedescript features framed in long braids, presumably blonde, and between her outstretched palms the knight's hands are placed in the formal gesture of homage. Within the cartouche, in the space above the helmet of the kneeling knight is inscribed a single word: MERCI.

The similarities between courtly service and vassalage are indeed striking. Although of a more refined character than an ordinary vassal, the poet-lover is portrayed as his lady's liegeman, involved in the ceremony of homage and pictured at the moment of the immixtio manuum. His reward for faithful service will doubtlessly include the osculum.

The influence of feudalism upon courtly love was, in my opinion, twofold: it provided the poets with a well-organized system of service after which they might pattern their own; it furnished them with a highly developed vocabulary centered around the service owed by a vassal to a lord. Feudalistic vocabulary was comprised of certain basic terminology indicative of the ties which legally bound a man to his lord in times of peace and war.[13]

Love service [edit]

The male role within the structure of sexual feudalism is sometimes referred to as 'love service' which is described as a ritualized form of male love-devotion toward women, especially noble women, that was popularized in the Middle Ages.[14][15][16]

The practice of love service appeared first in Medieval Europe and was modeled on a combination of feudalistic class distinctions, courtly love tenets, and gendered aspects of the chivalric class code regarding 'respectful' treatment of women.[17][18]

Love service had certain resemblances with vassalage, especially the concept of obedience. According to Sandra R Alfonsi the entire concept of love-service was patterned after the vassal's oath to serve his Lord with loyalty, tenacity, and courage. These same virtues were demanded of the male supplicant. Like the liegeman vis-a-vis his sovereign, the male approached his lady with fear and respect, submitted obediently to her and awaited a fief or in this case an honor of reception as did the vassal.[19]

The vocabulary of love service borrowed some terminology from the vocabulary of feudalism indicative of the ties between a man to his Lord. Examples are servitium(service), dominus (denoting the feudal Lord, or Lady), homo ligius (addressing the Lord's liegeman or 'my man'), homage (duty toward Lord), and honor (honoring gestures). The men were sometimes referred to as domnei or donnoi, meaning an attitude of chivalrous devotion of a knight to his Lady based in servitude and duty.[20]

Wiki4men: Zeta Male

Zeta male

Zeta male refers to a perspective and way of being male that positions itself outside of the usual hierarchical model of masculinity based on Alpha male (top), Beta male (second) and Omega male (lowest). Unlike the foregoing, the Zeta Male's orientation is not based on a hierarchical classification of men as valued by women.[1][2][3][4]

- 2 History
- 3 Social withdrawal / social engagement
- 4 References

Description [edit]

According to most sources the Zeta male:

a. Refuses to identify with alpha/beta male stereotypes
b. Rejects gynocentric expectations
b. Says no to unreasonable aspects of traditionalism
c. Champions male self-determination
d. Refuses to be shamed, seduced or intimidated into submission
e. Involves creative social engagement in contrast nihilistic withdrawal [5][6][7][8][9][10][11]

History [edit]

The term was coined by men's rights advocate Paul Elam in March 2010:

> "As previously noted, the men's movement is a unique and literally unprecedented phenomena. It will bring with it some other firsts. One of them is > the socio-sexual warrior, and I refer to him for the purpose of this discourse as the zeta male. The tag remains faithful to the Greek alphabet classification of the other three types of men, but there is more purpose to the label. I took it from the star Zeta Persei. I liked the navigational metaphor of the star as it is applicable in the context of the lost generation. But I was also intrigued to learn that Persei is a variation of Perseus, the first of the Greek mythological heroes…

>
> [The Zeta male] has no allegiance to tradition or nostalgia for the past, and in fact is charged with plotting a new course. He cannot be shamed into control or intimidated into silence or seduced into capitulation. He doesn't fit in the classic hierarchy, and would gladly bring it down in the name of his cause. When someone says he needs to act like a real man, he smiles and says, "No, thank you."
> He cares about those lost young men who were ambushed coming out of the womb. And he will strive to make himself an example, living proof that there are other roads to take than the ones that lead to self-hatred and self-destruction."[12][13]

The similar concepts 'Zeta male' and 'Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW)' are often compared on the basis that they both promote male self-determination,[14] however they differ in their promotion of social withdrawal (MGTOW) vs social engagement (Zeta male), and also in regard to the value of male hierarchical categories of Alpha, Beta and Omega which Zeta philosophy explicitly rejects.[15]

Social withdrawal / social engagement [edit]

Zeta males and MGTOW champion non-gynocentric masculinities and male self-determination. However, MGTOW has evolved to become associated with a rejection of intimate relationships with women (including marriage), and a permanent retreat and disengagement from society and its expectations. Critics of the MGTOW tendency toward disengagement claim it promotes a higher potential for isolation, nihilism, depression and suicide.[16][17]

Founder of the concept Paul Elam qualifies Zeta in the following way:

> "I've seen many people in the last decade read it (Zeta) as meaning detachment and indifference. And all along it was just the opposite.[18]

Unlike MGTOW, the Zeta male concept is not based on social withdrawal, nor on the status of being married or not married, or on being in a relationship with women, and is based solely on the refusal to self-identify with the Alpha, Beta and Omega male categories, and the decision to engage with the world on that basis.[19][20]

The Road Ahead

I want to start by thanking Paul Elam again for everything he has done for Men's Rights, Men's Issues and Anti-feminism. Paul kicked in the door and huge numbers of people, myself included, poured through. I appreciate the confidence that Paul is showing in me by handing over a site he founded and built over 14 years. A Voice for Men remains the flagship site of the Men's Rights Movement. It will continue to keep the torch burning and remain a place that people can come together to speak the truth without being silenced or shamed by purveyors of gynocentric narratives. We do this today so that the world can have a better tomorrow.

Over the last 10 years there's been a shift online from self-hosted sites to centralisation and out-sourcing. Where in the past people would have run mailing lists or forums they now run Facebook groups or subs on Reddit. This has put a huge amount of power in the hands of Big Tech. This is not only a problem for the global community as a whole but for people involved in men's rights it's completely untenable. Big Tech has shown itself to be all too willing to ban A Voice for Men or well known figures like Paul Elam for daring to speak the truth while allowing feminists like Mona Eltahawy to openly promote violence against men. The Internet gives us the tools to express ourselves freely but the global community has largely walked away from them in the last decade. Fortunately everything we need to maintain our independence is still available and will continue to be available.

The first step will be changes in publication. We'll be posting smaller articles more frequently. This is inline with changing community trends over the last few years. Having said that, you can still expect to see long form articles here from time to time.

Further changes are planned down the road.

A Voice for Men endorses the work of Paul and many others at XY Crew.

50th anniversary of domestic violence charity Refuge

January 30, 2022 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

A little over 50 years ago Erin Pizzey founded Chiswick Women's Aid to assist women who were victims of intimate partner violence. Erin started documenting their experiences and quickly realised that a high proportion of intimate partner violence was reciprocal in nature. This is something that is widely recognised among MRAs but generally still rejected by the wider community and feminist biased mainstream media. Before long Erin was forced out of the organisation that she founded. 50 years later and the organisation is still going, today called Refuge. The our history page of Refuge neglects to mention it's founder. If you look carefully though you can actually see that they do mention Erin on their website, albeit in an obscure place. They done slipped up!

There were not one but two events held for Refuge's 50th. An official event in which the well paid leaders of Refuge hobnobbed with Priti Patel the British Home Secretary, Camilla, Duchess of Cornwall and some woman named Zara McDermott. It was high profile enough that the Daily Mail ran an article on it. One small problem – Erin wasn't invited.

Fortunately MRAs and others ran a separate event to celebrate the founding of Chiswick Women's Aid 50 years ago. Erin was of course the guest of honour. Please enjoy the video below.

The Meaning of Man's 'Meaning of Life'

January 30, 2022 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

It has been said that there needs to be a restoration of a sense of meaning in men's lives. In a world where man is attacked as a people and as an archetype, there is no objection to this fact. The crisis is existential when the worth of a male individual is under extreme duress, that is, when it makes being a male something to be questioned and too often hated.

I want to expand more on this premise and say that what is really needed is a restoration of a self-discovered narrative for men. Rather than men having no meaning in their lives, it is perhaps more accurate to say that the world is overrun with negative meanings for men. Two variants come to mind.

The first as we know is the narrative metastasizing to this day in the mainstream consciousness since the advent of feminism. Malekind is declared as the fundamental historic culprit against femalekind as well as every conceivable problem in the world big and small. Even when men's issues come close to being brought to light, men again are fundamentally to blame ("The patriarchy hurts men too.") This is the feminist "Original Sin" credo, based on false premises as it is, in which men are sinful by nature and can atone through two virtues: servitude and self-sabotage. Male feminists decry their own sex, vow on their knees to be less of a man, and still profess to "protect and defend" women in Pavlovian fashion. As we see, there is no absence of meaning; the meaning prescribed by feminists is that of self-diagnosis (the male sex as a disease) and self-sterilization.

The second variant, the neotraditionalist gynocentric narrative for men, serves as a reaction against the first, with strong appeals to "the way things used to be." On the basis of traditional gender roles, this narrative professes to be of benefit to men. The idea of the chivalric knight in service towards women and towards the expense of self, however, is no less present here than in the feminist narrative for men. It is just manifested differently. Man is not a disease, but rather a useful tool; a means to an end. That endpoint, ironically, is for women's benefit. The emphasis of fathers and intact families are rightly brought up, but curiously offset by the expectation of men to be physically away from the family to provide for the wife and children, and to die not only in wars, but at a moments notice in the name of protecting a woman. The wife in this arrangement would play victim if the husband doesn't earn or work hard enough, and would do the same on the other hand for being away and not spending time with her and the kids. I believe we've seen enough of both as examples of grounds of divorce and the ultimate ruin of a given man.

Both narratives place men in a rat's maze in which he as a male is punished, and he is likewise punished if he is not their standard of "man enough".

The worthwhile narrative for men to be discovered is the one he does by himself, for himself. The positive meaning in men's life must be attained by leaving the tribe. What is meant by this is that a man must be encouraged to find his own meaning in life as an unabashed man and not what society wants men to be. This is not to say that masculinity has no standard nor counter-definition to femininity, but that only in a man's liberty in his body and soul can he discover his own natural expression of his masculinity.

We know we've had enough of the narrative that says that man is an aberration defined against the more wholesome, "fairer sex". We also should know by now the prescribed narratives in which man can only feel good as a man if he is a sacrificial animal, as a tool and a means to another's end, and worst of all it is only virtuous if he is bestowed with the divine approval of, you guessed it, the "fairer sex". Now it is time to look to the alternative to both of those, towards the meaning of life of an unbeholden, unsacrificed man with intact body and intact spirit.

There will be more to say on such a man in the coming years. Stay tuned.

Rebutting Colttaine's Nonsense and Thinking Beyond Notions of Female Omnipotence

This is a response to a video[1] by Colttaine regarding Briffault's law. I would encourage people to watch Paul Elam and Peter Wright's video[2] on this subject and then watch the response video from Colttaine. People can also read my previous articles here[3] and here[4] on Briffault's law as well. I don't have an issue with Colttaine personally, what I have an issue with is ideological dogma posing as science and the arrogant narrow-minded thinking behind it. With my past scientific background, I cannot just sit back and say nothing on this subject and surrender to the groupthink surrounding Briffault's law.

Absolutism And Categorical Thinking

This is how Briffault's law is written when it is discussed in the manosphere:

> "The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place." [5,6]

Firstly it is not a logical fallacy to argue that Briffault's law is inconsistent with genuine red pill philosophy and men going their own way. Briffault's law is written in absolute terms. Females we are told[5,6], control all the conditions of the animal family. Not some of the conditions, not in general and not on average. As if this absolute meaning was not clear enough, Colttaine has said Briffault did not go far enough and that "women control all the conditions period"[7]. People can watch his entire video where he said that, it was not taken by Paul and Peter out of context. His commentary on Briffault's law is about as absolute as you can get.

Briffault's law is routinely presented from pockets of the manosphere that promote it as an absolute law of nature. It is not written or conveyed with any exceptions or limitations, just with extensions describing female opportunism. Female omnipotence is written into the very basis of this so-called law of nature and it is reasonable from how the law is written and presented, for someone to form the view that this law is to be taken as an absolute rule.

It has taken Paul and Peter Wright's video for Colttaine to make a response video and explicitly state that Briffault's law should not be taken as an absolute law of nature. If we all agree on that, then the law itself needs to be either dismissed, reworded or elaborated on because it is written in absolute terms without any further clarification. More importantly it should have never been conveyed to men in such absolute terms in the first place and the people questioning the absolute nature of the wording of the law should not be derided for it.

Briffault's "law" was, in any case, aimed explicitly at non-human animals as confirmed by Briffault in the same passage, saying "There is, in fact, no analogy between the animal family and the patriarchal human family. The former is entirely the product of the female's instincts, and she, not the male, is the head." -citation, The Mothers[6]. How about we consider the context of what Briffault was actually saying, instead of spinning it to mean something else.

Even the generalisation Briffault assigns exclusively to animals is highly questionable, given the numerous examples in the animal kingdom of male social dominance and its influence on animal behaviour and evolution. We should also consider monogamous species where both sexes invest in offspring like humans do and other species where the sex roles are reversed and it is the males primarily investing in offspring and selecting mates while the females put in the bulk of mating effort. Life is extremely diverse and applying generalisations about animal behaviour can have limited application.

The reality is that you cannot on the one hand argue that men can go their own way and rise above our gynocentric culture and on the other hand argue women control all the conditions of society. By definition women would control the very psychological condition of all males absolutely, if Briffault's law was operating as it is written and conveyed. Briffault's law leaves no room for male choice or for men to exercise any power over their own lives. The only logical fallacy here is the delusion Briffault's law is red pill knowledge and not just an overly simplistic and outdated statement referring to animals from a book saturated with gynocentric bias and written almost a century ago when biology and psychology were still in their infancy as scientific disciplines!

Colttaine at least has the intelligence to concede that Briffault's law is not an actual scientific law of nature. Excellent! Then we should stop calling it a law. It is absolutely ridiculous to compare the universal acknowledgment of the law of gravity with the acceptance of Briffault's law. We have centuries of scientific theory and empirical evidence for gravity.

Briffault's law is not even close to the standard of proof we have for gravity. Gravity is also the weakest of the fundamental forces and our basic equations for gravity recognise that it is not an absolute force and it has a quantifiable strength. In contrast, Briffault's law acknowledges no limitation to the degree of female influence in society and its adherents instead double down and tell us the law does not go far enough in conveying the degree of female social omnipotence.

Just as the force of gravity at the center of a black hole does not resemble the force of gravity across the entire universe, neither does the claim of women controlling all the conditions of society accurately reflect reality. Anyone with a functioning brain that is not infected with ideology and dogma, can conclude that we live in a complex world where neither sex alone really has complete control over all or even most of the conditions of society.

Not even as a general rule is it the case that women or men on average control the conditions of society. As gynocentric as our culture is, society is not some monolithic matriarchy where women call all of the shots. When we consider history and the third world, the lack of female omnipotence is even more stark and more apparent.

Feminist patriarchy theory makes exactly the same mistakes as Briffault's law when making broad generalisations of civilisation and history. These sorts of simplistic descriptions of society tend to breakdown when you look at society and history in detail. Just as patriarchy theory is presented like it is an actual testable scientific theory (which it is not), Briffault's law has a false cloak of legitimacy embedded in its name with the use of the word "law". Both ideas frame society in fairly black and white categorical terms. This is what Prof. Sapolsky called in his first lecture on behavioural biology, "categorical thinking"[8].

Adherents of both sets of ideas suffer from serious confirmation bias and selectively rely upon facts and evidence they think support their perspectives and omit inconvenient facts and evidence that do not. They make bold leaps and interpretations of the evidence and facts they present and then confuse their interpretations as the actual evidence itself. Their twisted interpretation of science is not evidence, it is sophistry warping legitimate research to convey nonsense.

Contrary to Colttaine's opinion, we can't just simply ignore the gynocentric bias of Briffault and his upbringing, because this bias may have impacted what sort of research and arguments he put forward and what he omitted. Sapolsky went through numerous examples in his first lecture on how the ideological leanings and biases of certain prominent scientists, led to the propagation of half-baked theories throughout the early 20th century in Briffault's time. Many of these theories have subsequently been disproven and had terrible outcomes.

Colttaine has argued[9] men are mentally and physically superior to women. Perhaps he should read anthropologist Ashley Montagu's book, The Natural Superiority Of Women[10] and the one-sided reporting of the scientific research Montagu cites, if as per his video Colttaine truly thinks we should just focus on the validity of the arguments, facts and evidence people present and not give any consideration to the biases or prejudices of a scientist and consequently not be alerted to look for the research and evidence they may omit in their work.

I don't think we should just ignore the clear gynocentric bias evident in Briffault's work or his mother issues. The lives and upbringing of people affect how they think, how they conduct research and report information and the conclusions they draw about the world. That includes scientists and especially applies to scientists like Briffault from the early 20th century that were working in disciplines still in their infancy!

There is a reason there are often conflict of interest statements in scientific papers. Unfortunately the evidence in studies and the conclusions that are derived from the evidence collected, can be distorted by bias and prejudice. Evidence or studies can be omitted from papers and literature reviews, or even rigged or fabricated. There have been plenty of examples of that in science throughout history and also in the present day. Even entire fields can ignore legitimate science because of deeply engrained biases in that area of research.

For the record neither sex is in an overall sense superior, both sexes have their own sets of evolved strengths and weaknesses. That reality has not stopped people with a strong prejudice doing selective reviews of the scientific literature and arguing otherwise though. Female supremacists will argue women are superior citing women's greater immune system, lower susceptibility to X-linked chromosomal diseases and higher academic achievement and ignore or dismiss everything else. Male supremacists will cite men's greater physical strength, aerobic fitness and the IQ literature reporting a higher average male IQ and ignore or dismiss everything else.

Neither group dispassionately reviews the whole picture, which clearly shows a mixture of the two extremes with neither sex really being superior in an overall sense to the other. Claims of one sex being superior to the other, are classical examples of what categorical thinking leads to. Science is only as scientific as the level of impartiality of scientists will permit. Sometimes unfortunately what we get as a result of bias and prejudice from researchers, is junk science rather than actual science.

You have to really sit back and wonder about the mindset of someone arguing men are mentally and physically superior to women in one video and then arguing in other videos how something as gynocentric and female supremacist as Briffault's law is generally valid and a useful explanation for male and female behaviour!

I had planned to cite a plethora of research debunking this ridiculous notion that we should regard females in our society as omnipotent. Whilst I have cited some of the research I had originally planned to discuss in this article which I will get to later, I gave it further thought and realised the futility of spending weeks writing a much larger article and going through all of the research I actually have.

I cannot convince people that have made up their mind and subscribed to dogma. I cannot convince people who religiously believe those with a pussy make all of the rules that this is not the case, any more than I can convince someone who believes in flat Earth that the Earth is indeed round. All I can do is appeal to the basic reason and commonsense of those people that still have an open mind on the subject.

The reality is that men set the boundaries they will accept and if men start with the belief that women essentially control all the conditions of society, then the logical result of that absolute belief is learned helplessness. That is not an opinion, it is just basic logic and what would be expected to occur in a social environment where Briffault's law is perceived to operate. What other eventual conclusion could men reach with such an absolute statement?

Unfortunately some men do, to a degree, develop a form of learned helplessness from such beliefs, just as many feminists develop a mentality of perpetual victimhood from patriarchy theory. Could it be perhaps that the truth might be somewhere in the middle between Briffault's law and patriarchy theory? No that is heresy to the ideologues!

Not adhering to Briffault's law does not mean you deny gynocentrism exists. Gynocentrism is indeed a powerful force, but it is not absolute and it is not unassailable. I have been quite emphatic about that fact in my writing (again see links here[3] and here[4]). Other forces in our society can and do influence the direction of society and the actions of governments, corporations and the behaviour of the public. Gynocentrism often has very little relevance to decision making in a number of domains and there are numerous examples of this.

It is hardly the case that women control all of the conditions of our society, or men as a group for that matter! It is also the case that gynocentrism itself is often used for purposes other than women's interests. Corporations have enjoyed enormous financial gain from funding feminism and ensuring both sexes are working like rats on a treadmill and consuming. Was that funding all because corporations were genuinely concerned for women, or was it because they wanted to drive female consumer spending and virtue signal ultimately for financial interests? Let us get real here.

Some societies in different places of the world and at different times in history are very gynocentric and some have relatively little or no gynocentrism. Even in very gynocentric societies, there are often pockets of such societies which are devoid of gynocentrism. Gynocentrism can also be overridden by more powerful forces, and there are plenty of examples of that also. One example out of the many I could cite, has been the recent feminist and traditionalist temper tantrums over the establishment endorsements of transwomen participating in women's sports, and the crackdown on gynocentric transphobia.

Despite these gynocentric protests, the advance of transwomen into women's spaces, along with the deplatforming and silencing of transphobic feminists holding a gynocentric agenda continues. Gynocentrism is a powerful force in society, but let us not emulate the feminist fantasy that the social influence of the opposite sex is the sole or primary determinant for the current state of our society!

Not even as some generalisation or average is Briffault's law even remotely correct of human societies. The state of society and the conditions within society, are far more complicated than a simplistic concept like Briffault's law or patriarchy theory can accurately predict. At the end of this article, I will propose an alternative principle to Briffault's law which I think is far more accurate and useful for men.

Male Mate Choice Is Not Trivial

Not a single scientist cites Briffault's law as a valid theory or a law of nature. That also includes the prominent scientists Colttaine refers to with pictures of them in his video. It is widely recognized[11] in the scientific community that male mate choice exists and plays a substantial role in human behaviour. Contrary to what Colttaine suggests, male mate choice is not just exercised primarily by a handful of the top men in a tribe. Most hunter-gatherer societies as I will discuss later, are only mildly polygynous and most of the women in these societies are actually in monogamous relationships with men. Most men in general exercise some substantive level of male mate choice and place some significant level of sexual selection pressure on women.

Whilst we can argue about the relative degree of choosiness of mates by men and women, the reality is that male mate choice does impact the social dynamics between the sexes. Female intrasexual competition in our species exists, so does female jealousy with respect to mates and so does the sexual selection of females by males. We can measure the effects of male mate choice on social behaviour and observe the signs of its influence on female biology and psychology. Often we underestimate rather than overestimate these effects because they are different from what we see in males. The more covert form of relational aggression between women vs the more overt physical aggression between men is one example of this.

The influence of male mate choice is not trivial or something that is dwarfed by female mate choice. The evidence of its impact is of high significance to explaining female behaviour and biology. It is certainly the case that when we look at short-term mating females are more choosey than males, although that difference is quite small relative to the sex difference in height. However, male mate choice increases dramatically when we start talking about long-term mating dynamics and relationships, where males become a lot more choosey than they are with casual sex.

The papers by Prof. Steve Stewart-Williams (linked here[12], here[13] and here[14]) which Colttaine flippantly dismisses, are hardly obscure articles. They have been cited many times and the papers themselves cite numerous studies from the fields of evolutionary psychology, anthropology and the wider life sciences. The papers are not referring to a single study or to a single set of evidence, and that is clear if you actually read them. The author has more than adequately addressed criticism of his original paper in his follow up article[13].

Essentially as Stewart-Williams successfully argues, there is no actual disagreement with his original paper and the wider literature on the significance of sex differences (which is what most of the criticism was directed at). Just because the psychological sex differences in humans are relatively small compared to our physical sex differences and the sexual dimorphism of other animals, does not then mean they have no importance and Stewart-Williams never argued otherwise.

Aside from that, the popularity of a paper or an area of research does not make it any less accurate. There was a time not long ago, when most people in the scientific community did not believe in plate tectonics or even the theory of evolution. Our scientific understanding is constantly evolving and our present understanding of biology should not be taken as unquestioned dogma. I would have thought this would have been learnt from the pandemic and how off the mark some of our early modelling was.

Hyper Female Hypergamy And Hookup Culture

Online dating websites and the skew we see in finding a match on some of those sites between males vs females, is not just purely a function of female hypergamy. Modernity and the access we now have thanks to social media, has had the effect of amplifying many underlying psychological drives. That would also include the pattern of hypergamy we see in women. What we are observing to a degree, is a form of hyper female hypergamy.

On top of that, we have an education system and a work environment that discriminates against men and boys and preferences women and girls. The logical end result of that is fewer men meeting the same levels of income and employment relative to women than they did decades ago. Women want men to earn more money than them and then at the same time demand we close the gender wage gap and implement quotas in the workplace for women. The point I am making, is that the mate choice mismatch we are observing is not exactly entirely a result of innate female hypergamy.

Our modern environment is behind a lot of it. Just consider the effect of birth control alone on female sexual behaviour and the long run effect that has on female mate choice and dating. We are way beyond talking about just natural levels of female hypergamy being able to explain the disparity between men and women on dating sites where it concerns the level of choosiness of mates.

One has to also point out the reality as well that quite a few of these dating websites are just used by people to garner attention and have casual sex, rather than make serious attempts to find an actual person for a relationship. We know the relative choosiness of the sexes is considerably more similar where it concerns long-term mate selection for relationships.

Many men looking for relationships and that have actual standards, are not using the websites Colttaine refers to in his video. The pool of men using those sites and arguably the pool of women also, are not necessarily representative of the wider population. Many men are not even looking anymore for a relationship and have pulled out of dating entirely because what is on offer from women is simply not good enough.

That leaves a skewed pool of men with lower standards still looking on these sites, many of whom are not attractive to women for the same reasons their standards for women are so low. Often the men are just looking for a casual fling on these sites, not an actual relationship and so are less choosey.

In contrast many of the women using these sites are doing so primarily for attention and often overvalue themselves without ever realising that is why they are single and on these sites in the first place. I would exercise some caution in just automatically assuming we can generalise data from these dating websites onto the general population.

Many young men are actually single now by choice. They want to be single when they look at what is on offer and many of them do not even know MGTOW exists. Men are figuring it all out without even knowing about MGTOW. For every incel there are 10 men opting out of dating and enjoying the bachelor lifestyle. Then women complain in the media about where all the good men went.

All the modern hookup culture and hyper female hypergamy does in the long run, is concentrate the power in the dating market into the hands of alpha male Chads. Women chase these men and expect them to enter into a relationship with them and eventually marry them. The alpha Chads have no interest in this and have their casual fling with them and then go onto the next woman.

Sure, it can certainly backfire for these alpha Chads and I certainly would not recommend having a rotating buffet of female partners with all of the risks involved. However for women chasing these men, they waste all of their time chasing them in their twenties, then want to settle down with them in their thirties and get to their forties and then wonder why they are still single. Meanwhile the alpha Chads are out with their younger female counterparts! See how that works? They reap what they sow. Tom Leykis laughs and talks about this pattern all of the time.

Our Ancestral Heritage

As for the genetic research Colttaine cites allegedly claiming twice as many women passed on their genes compared to men in our prehistoric past and the implied assertion that this automatically means female mate choice was fierce, male competition for mates was high and on average only 1 man reproduced for every 2 women (or at times 17 women for every 1 man), modelling can be wrong. We have seen how wrong modelling can be during the pandemic and from past research claiming the Y chromosome was going to eventually disappear. Much to the ire of radical feminists, the claim that the Y chromosome was disappearing was later shown to be wrong[15,16], and I would encourage people to do their own research on the claims about how lethal COVID was at the start of the pandemic and what it actually turned out to be.

This sort of analysis that Colttaine cites of our prehistoric past is tentative at best and needs to be regarded with at least some level of caution. Modelling our ancestral past from 10,000s of years ago with genetic data is difficult and fraught with issues. We cannot go back in a time machine and verify the results of the modelling. What we can directly observe though is modern hunter-gather communities, specifically the marriage practices in those cultures and also in societies around the world both in the present day and throughout history, and our relative levels of sexual dimorphism. We can also consider other genetic research which has been done which appears to be more consistent with actual field observations.

I notice Colttaine had a picture of Sapolsky in his video. I would suggest people watch Sapolsky's second lecture[17] on behavioural evolution from 1:19:00-1:36.14. He clearly states our current knowledge on where humans fall on the spectrum of sexual dimorphism and mating when it comes to monogamy and pair bonding vs polygamy and tournament mating- "We're right in the middle".

As Sapolsky explains, even in polygynous cultures there is only mild polygamy going on and the majority of people are in monogamous relationships. In modern monogamous societies many of us usually have more than one partner over the course of our lives and lifelong monogamy where a person has only one sexual partner is fairly rare. However we normally only have one partner at a time in such societies. Yes of course there is some level of cheating, but it is generally not something most men or women will socially accept, and neither will many cultures accept such behaviour without exacting punishments, often leading all the way to death.

As Sapolsky clearly explains in the lecture, whilst we are not purely a monogamous species, we are not a tournament species like Baboons either where only a handful of males mate with the majority of females. That is a good thing too, civilisation would not have formed with that level of male intrasexual aggression.

Other genetic analysis (the research is linked here[18] and here[33])of our prehistoric ancestors, suggests that the numbers of ancestral females to males breeding was indeed somewhat skewed in favour of females, but generally at the lower end of estimates from other research. It was found that the breeding ratios of ancestral females to males from different regions of the world, were still within the range of monogamous societies and do overlap with polygynous societies as well to an extent[18]. Humans are a bit of a mixture, but we are not strongly polygynous.

As the scientist's papers discuss, based on all of the available evidence and the body of scientific literature, humans are quote, "mildly polygynous or monogamous with polygynous tendencies"[18, 33]. The findings from the researcher's genetic analysis, was in agreement with the wider literature that humans are indeed mildly polygynous. The authors go on to explain a range of demographic factors that can affect estimates of the breeding ratio of females to males other than just the levels of polygyny, such as sex biased migration, sex differences in generation time and also population bottlenecks[18].

Less than 20% of males in 87% of 190 surveyed hunter-gatherer societies existing in the present day, have been reported to be married polygynously[19,20]. Similar observations have been recorded from previous anthropological studies, with less than 5% of men in half of societies identified as polygynous having more than one spouse[21,22]. Even in polygynous societies the reproductive variance of males and females can be very similar and this is in part due to the reality that most marriages in polygynous societies are actually monogamous[21,22].

One detailed analysis[23]of 36 hunter-gather communities, reported a mean average across all 36 societies of 20% of married women being in polygynous marriages with 12% of the married men, approximately 80% of marriages being monogamous and 11% of men being single. The median figures for polygyny from the communities observed in the study was even less than these mean averages and there was also considerable variation in the levels of polygyny observed.

The bottom line is that based on direct observation of present day hunter-gatherer communities that most likely resemble our prehistoric ancestors, the claim that only 1 man reproduced for every 2 women is not what we observe on average in such communities and furthermore such generalisations ignore the considerable variation we see in the levels of polygyny.

If we compare the relatively low levels of sexual dimorphism in humans to the sexual dimorphism of primates that are tournament species, where only a handful of males reproduce with the majority of females, the difference in sexual dimorphism is quite stark. Humans do not show the typical level of sexual dimorphism we see in primates that exhibit a tournament form of mating.

The high levels of sexual dimorphism observed in such species are not just restricted to specific traits like muscle mass or levels of body fat, they are found in broad overall differences in overall physical form like body weight. The body size sexual dimorphism in humans by body weight just to cite one example is only 1.15 (human males are 15% heavier than females on average), compared to 2 or more for our far more polygynous Gorilla counterparts[24]. The sexual dimorphism of humans in body size is closer to monogamous Gibbons whom are at 1.07 in body size sexual dimorphism[24].

The conclusion that only a handful of men reproduced with the majority of women over our evolutionary history, is at odds with the hard physical evidence of our relatively modest levels of sexual dimorphism, other genetic analysis and our direct observations of hunter-gatherer communities and traditional societies in the present day.

It is certainly still possible though, that the model allegedly supporting the claim we are descended from twice as many women as men is correct. Even if that is the case, overall each sex as a group has contributed exactly the same share of DNA to our present genome. The female share may come from more ancestral females, but the males had a higher contribution to our current genome per individual ancestral male than any ancestral female did individually.

It could be that there are other explanations other than the implied assertion males were socially excluded from mating by choosey women. An assertion that the research Colttaine cites does not entirely make, if at all. As alluded to earlier, demographic factors such as war and disease, sex differences in lifespan and speed of sexual maturity, the migration of primarily men into new environments, or conversely the movement of primarily women, could even at modest levels over long time spans of tens of thousands of years, result in a large skew in the numbers of female vs male ancestors passing on their genes to the present day. Just think of how even modest levels of compound interest can result in a large increase in debt after a sufficient period of time.

There could be genetic factors at play as well that explain the relatively lower numbers of male ancestors. The genes on the Y chromosome are highly conserved because even a minor mutation can result in infertility. It might be that over tens of thousands of years only a handful of Y chromosome lineages made it to the present without incurring a mutation resulting in infertility. It could also be the case that Y chromosomes facilitating more fertile sperm production, began to dominate the gene pool and displace other less fertile Y chromosome lineages over such a long evolutionary timescale.

What I have just suggested has in fact been put forward[25] as one key explanation for why relatively less ancestral male DNA has made it to the present and why the Y chromosome has reduced genetic diversity. Deleterious mutations that make some males infertile, leading to high levels of purifying selection on the Y chromosome and beneficial mutations that increase fertility in other males, may explain the pattern we observe. Over long evolutionary timescales of tens of thousands of years, high levels of selection on the Y chromosome combined with demographic forces, may result in a handful of male ancestors dominating the future gene pool. Rather than simply more females mating than males due mate choosiness, genetic and demographic forces may be at work.

Unfortunately because such explanations proposed by the scientific community do not generate the same level of gynocentric hype of claims that 1 man reproduced for every 17 women at some point thousands of years ago, they do not get as much media attention. Consequently they do not pop up on the radar of people like Colttaine. People read from such research what they want to think, even when the research does not support what they are thinking it supports. Research that generates headlines gets reported and more plausible explanations get ignored. That pattern is especially the case if the research validates the gynocentric bias of our mainstream media.

I could keep going with more alternative explanations that may explain why we have more female ancestors, but the reality is the conclusions we form about our prehistoric past are mostly conjecture. We just don't know with any real certainty and we can't go back in a time machine and find out. Even if only one male was reproducing for every two females, that does not automatically mean that women were calling the shots and female mate choice was the dominant force in prehistoric communities. Generally in a tournament species the alpha male is socially dominant over the harem of females he mates with, as are the males competing with each other for the alpha male's position relative to the females in the group.

We have numerous observations of male social dominance in our primate counterparts that have a tournament mating pattern. Female mate choice is not the exclusive force driving mate selection in such instances. Male competition, itself independent of female influence, has a considerable sway in deciding which male reproduces. The males compete to become the alpha male and the alpha male then mates when and with whomever he wants. That is a generalisation of course, but an accurate description of what tournament mating in our primate counterparts looks like.

We see this in humans too where polygyny is practiced and male social dominance is often quite apparent. Polygyny is not exactly by default a predictor of gynocentrism. Extremely patriarchal societies can practice polygyny and the harems of women in such cultures are treated not far above being chattel. The feminist fiction of course is that such a dynamic then represents all of human civilisation in general throughout history and in the present day and that all men have known is privilege and not their own extreme hardships and injustices.

Arranged marriage was common place for most of human history in many cultures and still is prevalent in many traditional cultures today. Arranged marriage has been observed to be the dominant form of marriage in hunter-gather communities. A comprehensive anthropological survey, found that arranged marriage was the dominant form of marriage in approximately 85% of a sample of 190 hunter-gatherer societies around the world and only mild levels of polygyny were observed in most of those cultures[19,20]. The high frequency of arranged marriage in the majority of hunter-gather communities in the present day, in past societies over thousands of years of history and in present day traditional cultures, has prompted scientists to undertake genetic analysis of our ancestors to reconstruct marital systems.

Based on phylogenetic analysis[19] using data from present day hunter-gatherers and mitochondrial DNA, it was concluded that arranged marriage has had a substantive prevalence and impact in these communities since the migration of humans out of Africa at least 50,000 years ago. The analysis also found that low levels of polygyny was most likely the state of ancestral marriage in past hunter-gatherer communities. It has been shown[20] as well with arranged marriage, that parental control on selecting a partner for marriage is particularly strong for parents of daughters and that fathers have a greater influence than mothers in choosing a suitable partner.

This same paper which again looked at 190 hunter-gatherer communities, also stated that we may be overestimating female mate choice on sexual selection and underestimating the influence of parental mate choice on human evolution during our prehistory[20]. The study reports that whilst parents consult with their offspring, consent from their sons and daughters is usually not required and they usually comply with their parent's choice[20,26]. Furthermore, virtually all reproduction in these communities was found to occur whilst a woman is married[20].

We can see numerous examples of patriarchal influence by fathers in arranged marriage practices across many cultures throughout history. It is not just limited to modern hunter-gatherer communities. Another study[27] examining arranged marriage across 543 different ethnographies around the world, found that parents and their offspring in all areas of the world were very frequently in vast disagreement on the choice of partner and on the relevant traits of the right partner. The parental choice of mate often strongly disagreed with the offspring's choice of mate. The authors note that sometimes extreme methods were used to enforce the choice of mate.

These realities are part of the truths behind the half-truth of feminist patriarchy theory. Female mate choice has not been some dominant force exclusively dictating the social structure of society. The jokes about fathers with their baseball bats sizing up their daughters' partners, comes from a long history of parents and particularly fathers regulating who their daughters mate with.

Of course it would be correct to point out that male mate choice has also been curtailed to a somewhat lesser degree by the same system of arranged marriage. Before the advent of modernity and the luxury of modern technology, what was good for the prospects of families has often been regarded as more important than the wishes of the bride and groom. Marriage was used to form alliances and this no doubt had a direct benefit on social cohesion, resource sharing and ultimately the propagation of genes for familial lineages over multiple generations and for multiple kin.

Briffault's Warning

I could keep going debunking the dogmatic rubbish of Briffault's law, but what I have written in this article and in previous articles (see this link[3] and this link[4]) should be sufficient for people to at least question Briffault's law and whether the arguments put forward allegedly supporting it have any merit. There is so much research I could have kept going through.

Human behaviour is incredibly complex and anyone that puts the actual effort in to review the scientific literature, can see the obvious fallacy in prescribing a universal absolute law of behaviour like Briffault's law to human beings. Even applying basic commonsense and everyday observation of the world exposes the falsity of Briffault's law. There is an arrogance to the type of dogmatic thinking supporting Briffault's law and a lack of humility in acknowledging the obvious limitations in making such a bold statement about human behaviour.

Here is an alternative principle for Colttaine and like-minded individuals to consider:

Briffault's warning-

"In a gynocentric social dynamic, the female not the male primarily influences the conditions governing the social interactions between the sexes. Where the female can derive no benefit from associating with the male, no such association exists."[5,6]

That to me whilst a bit wordier than Briffault's law, seems far more accurate than suggesting females universally control all of the conditions of humans and animals on average or absolutely. As Paul has pointed out, men have the power to set personal boundaries with women and avoid such a gynocentric social environment. Men can and are removing themselves from gynocentric social environments and institutions like modern marriage. Men are filtering out women who want a one-sided gynocentric relationship where they are pedestalised. Men are in a substantial number of instances deciding to opt out of dating entirely because of our gynocentric culture. The activities of numerous bachelor movements over centuries and millennia are a testament to men setting boundaries and asserting their preferences[28,29,30,31,32].

Briffault's warning is not a universal law of human behaviour. It is a warning to men that if you are prepared to accept a gynocentric social dynamic in your interactions with the opposite sex, then these are the consequences. Men and society are in this position because they made concessions on their personal boundaries and the principles that made our society thrive, and chose instead to pedestalise women. Now we are paying the price for that.

Beliefs like Briffault's law serve only to push men in a direction away from taking responsibility for enforcing personal boundaries with women. It is time to wake up and throw out the trash. Notions of female omnipotence have no place in a red pill environment. Women are flawed creatures just like men and men pedestalise women at their peril.

Now I could keep going on ad infinitum back and forth in response to Colttaine after this article, but I am not going to do that. It would be a waste of my time to respond to any further Gish gallop from Colttaine. At a certain point you just have to accept that you can lead a horse to water, but you can make them drink it. The research I have gone through in this article is just the tip of the iceberg on what I can cite to support the arguments I have put forward. Reductive categorical thinking has its value to a degree, but it also stops people from seeing the forest for the trees!

Male gaze

February 2, 2022 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

The following is another Wiki4men entry:

Male gaze

The male gaze is a special power possessed by men. When a man looks at a woman manrays emanate from his eyes causing the woman to lose all agency. Feminists have become aware of this male super power[1] and now wear tinfoil hats for protection.

The following Oxford Reference Dictionary definition represents the usual view of the male gaze, or at least the one widely promoted by feminist analysis of the phenomenon:

> Male Gaze 1. A manner of treating women's bodies as objects to be surveyed, which is associated by feminists with hegemonic masculinity, both in everyday social interaction and in relation to their representation in visual media: [see also objectification].[2]

The related phrase 'gaze harvesting' refers to the behaviour of the vast majority of women in their varied attempts to attract male attentions.

A Letter to Washington Post Regarding “Abuse Surging During The Pandemic”

February 5, 2022 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

The following is a letter to Washington Post columnist Miriam Berger regarding recent columns about “Abuse Surging During the Pandemic”

Dear Ms. Berger,

I respectfully ask that you take the time to read this letter in its entirety and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

As a lifelong reader of the Washington Post, I’ve long noticed that the Post has a clear gender bias. This bias is self-evident: the Post has a gender columnist who only champions the female perspective, and in 2018 it published a repulsive article, Why Can’t We Hate Men? Unbelievably, despite an overwhelmingly negative response from thousands of posted comments, at year-end the article was still selected as one of The Post’s favorite op-eds of 2018!

I’m writing to Post columnists to get them to recognize and to correct this gender bias, this gender prejudice.

I’m sorry to say that your recent articles in the Post about domestic violence and gender-based online abuse surging during the pandemic are both additional examples of this bias.

Your two articles join thousands of similar ones published or broadcast for more than 40 years by the Post and virtually all other media outlets, articles that have perpetuated an extremely biased, one-sided, and provably wrong perspective about domestic or gender-based violence where women are the victims and where men are only very rarely battered by their wives or intimate partners.

While there is near-universal sympathy for “Umm Zeid”, the battered Jordanian woman you describe in your first article, and other female victims of domestic violence, there’s one group of “missing persons” who receive almost no sympathy – men:

“Men have been shot, stabbed, beaten with objects, and been subjected to verbal assaults and humiliations. Nonetheless, I do not believe these are the ‘horrors’ of violence toward men. The real horror is the continued status of battered men as the ‘missing persons’ of the domestic violence problem.”

This observation was made by Richard J. Gelles in a 1999 article, The Missing Persons in Domestic Violence: Battered Men. Gelles, along with coresearchers Murray A. Straus and Suzanne K. Steinmetz, are widely recognized as some of the earliest and preeminent researchers in the field of domestic violence. Together they performed three landmark studies on the issue, the National Family Violence Surveys. Among other findings, these surveys concluded:

> Women are at least as violent as men in intimate relationships.

Consider the case of "Mahesh", a male victim of his wife, as described in Domestic violence against men in India:

> Mahesh was beaten and tortured by his wife daily in front of his son. … But, there was nothing he could do. One day when Mahesh's wife and son were not present at home, Mahesh hanged himself from the ceiling fan because he was done with the never-ending violence. [i]

(I'm most familiar with domestic violence against men in the Anglosphere, so in preparation to write this letter, I did a few quick Google searches. It only took me a very few minutes to find the link above and thousands of other studies or articles that confirm that men are battered by women, not only in Jordan, but throughout the world. You too could have Googled and found the following examples:

- A qualitative study to investigate male victims' experiences of female-perpetrated domestic abuse in Jordan
- A Cross-Cultural Comparison of Marital Abuse
- Domestic Violence against Men: Balancing the Gender Issues in Nigeria)

Still don't believe that women batter men?

Just ask Johnny Depp.

Or Carl Friedan, the husband of Betty Friedan, the "mother of modern feminism", who in her memoir publicly accused Carl of beating her. In response Carl set up a website that contradicted his wife's account, saying that Betty was "…the most violent person I have ever known" and that his own face was "scarred by deep gouges" inflicted by her.[ii] At least two books confirmed Mr. Friedan's account.[iii]

Or ask golfer Tiger Woods, or comedian Christopher Titus, or model Lewis Burton, or baseball player Chuck Findley, or John Bobbitt, or even presidents Abraham Lincoln and Bill Clinton!

Or you could ask Texas dentist David Lynn Harris, or comedian Phil Hartman, or American salesman Travis Alexander, or Susan Smith's two children, or Caylee Anthony.

But you can't actually ask any of these last victims. They're all dead, killed by wives, girlfriends, or monstrously selfish mothers.

Or, finally, you could sit back in the comfort of your living room and watch a few seasons of the Investigation Discovery channel's Deadly Women TV series. It'll send chills up your spine.

You see, Ms. Berger, the key to recognizing that women are equally violent is understanding that domestic violence is not a matter of gender, but of human will. Self-described feminist Patricia Pearson, in her 1998 book When She Was Bad – Violent

Women and the Myth of Innocence, challenges the stereotype of men as the aggressors and women as merely innocent victims:

> "The idea that domestic violence refers exclusively to wife abuse or to violence against women is so deeply ingrained in Western consciousness that it is impossible to grapple with [stories of male victims of DV] without first unraveling some potent conventional wisdom. … At the heart of the matter lies human will. Which partner – by dint of temperament, personality, life history – has the will to harm the other? By now it should be clear that such a will is not the exclusive province of men."

But beyond battered men, Pearson's book shatters the myth of innocent, non-violent women. It observed:

> "Women commit the majority of child homicides in the United States, a greater share of physical child abuse, an equal rate of sibling violence and assaults on the elderly, about a quarter of child sexual abuse, an overwhelming share of the killings of newborns, and a fair preponderance of spousal assaults."

(For more women who have spoken out about male victims of domestic violence, read the "Women's Contribution to Domestic Violence" section in my online article about the hypocrisy of the #MeToo movement.)

It's bad enough that feminists have, to a remarkable degree and with the assistance of a gullible media – including the Washington Post – foisted on the public an unfair, one-sided depiction of the problem of domestic violence. But for decades feminists have compounded this portrayal with disinformation campaigns during major events or natural disasters to continually flog their prejudiced version of domestic violence, thus causing unjustified alarm among women – and generating more gender-biased laws and more funding for female-only domestic violence shelters.

Both of your articles follow this vile practice.

An early example was the 1993 "Super Bowl Hoax", described by Christina Hoff Sommers in her book Who Stole Feminism? How Women Have Betrayed Women. Feminists falsely claimed that Super Bowl Sunday was "the biggest day of the year for violence against women" with increases in violence as high as 40 percent. Sommers demolished this myth, clearly confronting each fake claim and demonstrating how feminists lie and distort the truth to further perpetuate their false, unbalanced depiction of domestic violence. [iv]

More recently, in 2019 an Australian feminist named Sherele Moody used that country's bushfire crisis to spread a particularly loathsome lie, claiming that male firefighters – who, by the way, were risking their lives to put out these fires – often return home and beat their female partners:

> "After a cataclysmic event like this, domestic violence peaks. Women become extremely unsafe, when generally the men return home from the fires and subject them to domestic violence …. But what happens after some heroes go > home? What happens when domestic violence perpetrators finish their work on the frontline of a major crisis? They abuse the women in their lives – harder than they ever have." [v]

Moody justified these claims by saying they were "backed by research", but the researcher who performed the referenced study said that it never made any specific findings about firefighters. Fortunately, in this case, the public recognized and spoke out loudly about this smear against these brave firefighters: a Google search shows that this feminist received a torrent of online condemnation.

Stories like yours about pandemic-related increases in domestic violence may contain more truth than the Super Bowl or violent firefighter hoaxes, but are all still examples of these disinformation campaigns because they exploit a horrible worldwide pandemic to further spread a one-sided lie, breathlessly spreading the alarm about how "women are at increased risk", but completely failing to recognize an obvious and provable fact:

Men who are stuck at home with their violent female partners must also be equally victimized.

For you to compose articles like these provides clear evidence that you write with prejudiced and preconceived notions about domestic and gender-based violence, notions that with just a few minutes of online research – just Google "domestic violence men" – would reveal your perspective to be, at best, a one-sided version of the truth, at worst, an epic lie.

In closing, let me include a quote from a book by journalist Sue Ellen Browder, Subverted: How I Helped the Sexual Revolution Hijack the Women's Movement. Browder is a former writer for Cosmopolitan magazine who tells how she "… told lie upon lie to sell the casual-sex lifestyle to millions of single, working women". I feel it is applicable to both you and the thousands of others in the media who blindly push such a one-sided view of domestic violence:

> "Unfortunately, the free press is only as free as the minds of those journalists, editors, and writers who work in the field. I had already become that strange paradox of mankind that's especially commonplace among journalists: I had become both the deceiver and the deceived."

Ms. Berger, with all due respect, when it comes to writing about domestic and gender-based violence, you and your fellow journalists have abused the free press and have become both deceivers and deceived.

I can only hope that you've read this far. If so, I thank you. I pray that I've opened your mind to the dark turn that feminism took a long time ago.

If I have, please help me to convince reporters, columnists, and management at the Post that they need to reconsider their entire coverage of gender-related issues – most importantly about domestic violence – to eliminate their hateful, feminist-inspired, anti-male gender bias.

i This report also included the following statistics: "In a study of 1000 married men among the various age groups from 21-49 years of age in the rural villages of Haryana, 52.4% of males experience gender-based violence in India. 51.5% of males have experienced some sort of torture or violence at the hands of their wives or their intimate partners in their lifetime. 10.5% of males have experienced gender-based violence at the hands of their wives or intimate partners in the last 12 months."

ii In fairness, it must be noted that the Post published an editorial Abuse Reports That Smack of Unfairness that exposed the media's unfair treatment of Carl Friedan. While Betty's accusation was widely reported, "… with a couple of exceptions, reporters made little attempt to reach Carl Friedan, who says the allegations are flatly untrue".

iii Betty Friedan: Her Life and The Sisterhood, The Inside Story of the Women's Movement and the Leaders Who Made It Happen ("Those two deserved each other was a comment I heard more than once.") iv Again, in fairness, the Post's Ken Ringle was one of the few journalists to bother to check the sources behind the stories. He wrote an article, Debunking the 'Day of Dread' for Women, detailing his findings.

Gender segregation

February 8, 2022 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

A high proportion of human societies have chosen some form of gender segregation and it is one of the biggest criticisms westerners often level at non-western societies. In recent years there is evidence that western civilisation may be adopting increased gender segregation. A lot of gender segregation in western countries is being driven by feminists who state that they often feel threatened by men, sometimes merely by their presence.

Examples

Cemeteries

There is a Lesbian-only cemetery in Germany.

Domestic Violence Shelters

Throughout the world, domestic violence shelters are nearly universally available only to women.

Gyms

Women-only gyms are common throughout the west and widely known about.

Hotels

There are now many women-only hotel floors and hotels. This is a growing trend.

There are a few hotels around the world that advertise as men-only although it is unlikely that this is enforced in western nations.

Markets

A women-only market has recently opened in London.

Music Concerts

Sweden recently had a music concert that was non-men. The festival was found to be in violation of the country's discrimination laws.

Parking Spaces & Roads

Australia, China, Kuwait, Malaysia, Indonesia, Austria, Italy, and South Korea now have women-only parking spaces in some areas.

This practice is even more widespread in Germany. The town of Triberg in Germany created male-only and female-only parking spaces, allocating the more difficult parking spaces to men. It is unclear if the town had to backtrack under feminist pressure.

An insurance company in the UK has seriously suggested road lanes exclusively for female drivers.

Police Stations

There are women-only police stations in Brazil, Argentina, Guatemala, Peru and India. Australian academics have been studying the Argentinian model with a view to the introduction of women-only police stations in Australia.

Private Clubs

Many women-only private clubs thrive will men-only clubs are forced to open their doors to women.

Public Spaces

Some public spaces in Australia have women-only seating.

Public Transportation

Jessica Valenti, a well known feminist blogger, has explicitly proposed gender segregation on public transport. Some countries are already doing this. There are women-only bus seats in Switzerland and India. There are women-only train carriages in Malaysia, Germany and other countries. There has even been a proposal for women-only seating sections on aircraft.

Men are not permitted to travel on trains during certain hours in Chennai, India.

Restaurants

Women only restaurants are becoming common.

Swimming Pools

The city of Hamilton New Zealand seriously considered banning men from a ”public” swimming pool during certain times, creating women-only swimming sessions.

Taxis & Ride Sharing

New York City has a women-only taxi service. Although they have apparently had trouble finding sufficient female drivers. A similar service has been proposed for Melbourne, Australia and is in use elsewhere.

Women-only ride sharing service operate in several large Australian cities and in US states such as California.

University Classes

US universities have female only education sessions.

Working Spaces

The US has a growing number of female-only co-working spaces.http://theweek.com/articles/759527/rise-womenonly-coworking-spaces

Origins

This raises the interesting question about whether it was women who drove segregation in other societies. This would be interesting considering that gender segregation in non-western countries today is often claimed as principally disadvantaging women.

Conclusions

It may be reasonable for a society to permit gender segregation, but it must be on just and equal terms. Thus a society should permit both men-only and women-only organisations only if they are available on equal terms. A society should allow both or it should allow neither. Currently women in the west continue to enjoy uninterrupted access to women-only spaces and organisations while men are today largely prohibited from having men-only spaces and organisations.

Male Doctors Hate Female Patients

February 9, 2022 | by Chris "mad_cat" Votey | Link | Original Link

A very recent study has been released that feminists are treating as the smoking gun; proof of not only systemic misogyny, but that the medical system doesn't care about women's needs. This study is the proof they need to show that everything else they say is correct, because if one thing is proven true, then everything else by proxy of them saying it must also be true.

"Association of Surgeon-Patient Sex Concordance With Postoperative Outcomes (2022)" looks at the outcomes of patients and their surgeons based on gender, and whether or not there was any post-surgery complication. What is quoted from this study is that when women are treated by a male surgeon, there is 15% more complication than if a male or female surgeon treated a male patient.

Some on social media confound this as "Men's health is taken more seriously and female health is not". We all know that is bullshit.

In this article, I am going to look at the study in greater detail and demonstrate some of its flaws, and more to the point that this isn't the revelation that feminists have been hoping for and in fact does more for the Men's Movement.

Flaw #1 – Location

Location is everything, and when it comes to studies, the location is important to know. Certainly, taking a small sample of the Earth can still inform us of those around the world, but it shouldn't be seen as a fact of life. Rather, more studies should be done to determine if the results remain true.

Of course, that's common sense. You'll look at this and say, "duh!" Yet, the feminists are taking this study (done in Ontario, CA from 2007 to 2019) as a representation of the entire world. At best, the result of this study shows what healthcare looks like in Ontario. Now, yes, it could be a representation of the world, but it may also not be. Compared to the United States of America, Canada is seen as socialist healthcare. This study focused on the Ontario Health Insurance Plan, which is a single government payer.

Flaw #2 – Procedure Process

When it comes to surgery, there are a lot of steps before and after the procedure. Yet, this study focuses on one part of that process. It could arguably be the most important, with a close second being recovery, and third being pre-surgery preparation. No matter how good the operation was, problems can still occur from non-surgeons that are still linked to the surgery.

Now this is a flaw that the study noted:

> "Third, we are unable to account for the potential influence of residents, nurses, and other physicians apart from the primary billing surgeon of record on patients' outcomes. This represents a valuable avenue of future work to understand how these additional members of the health care team may either strengthen or impair the patient-surgeon relationship. We noted a consistent association of sex discordance across academic and community hospitals, suggesting that resident teams are unlikely to dissipate this effect."

They're aware that their study is limited in this way, not that feminists or the media point that out. Even then, they are quick to twist it around and state that they don't think the additional staff makes a difference to their findings. It would seem to suggest that the primary surgeon is the only person important to the process.

Flaw #3 – Cases

While starting with 1,870,221 procedures during the timeframe, they limited the study to first-time surgeries and removed non-surgical doctors, patients under 18, non-Ontario residents, multiple surgeries on the same day, gender-specific surgeries, and those whose full medical data was not able to be properly linked. The remaining cases totaled 1,320,108.

This was divided into 2 categories: Sex Cordant (same sex doctor and patient) and Sex Discordant (different sex doctor and patient). This divided the cases into four subcategories:

- Male Surgeon, Female Patient (667,279)
- Male Surgeon, Male Patient (509,634)
- Female Surgeon, Female Patient (92,926)
- Female Surgeon, Male Patient (50,269)

One thing to notice right away is that male surgeons saw 89% of the patients in this study, with female surgeons seeing only 11%. We are talking about thousands of cases, but this is a ratio of 8:1, or for every 8 surgeries done by men, 1 was done by a woman. Or, men performed 821% more surgeries than women.

I'm sure someone will point out that an adjusted odds ratio (AOR) was used, which is basically taking the female surgeon sample size and calculating to what it would probably would look like if there were as many surgeries as men performed. That is a normal procedure done for studies. Understand, however, that this is a prediction. Nothing wrong with predictions, but we are talking a sizeable difference of 1,033,718 surgeries. Yet, this is treated as absolute fact by the feminists.

Let me demonstrate this another way. Below are three pictures. The first is a 10×10 picture (100 pixels). I then increased that to 31×31 (961 pixels). This is about 10 times more. Using the same font, I made a third picture at 31×31 and we see the difference between the two. In order for the first image to be upscaled to the second, the software had to create 861 new pixels to maintain the shape, but as we see, it is quite blurry. Now we can understand it is an M, but we see that it is just a prediction by the software and far from accurate of what it should look like. There are of course software out there that can make a better prediction of what it should look like, but the more extreme the difference is between initial size and the resize, the less accurate it will be overall.

As I said, AOR is a standard done in studies and often times we have to use predictive algorithms to discern what to expect along a logical path, but this shouldn't be taken as absolute fact. I argue though that the greater distance between the numbers, the more skeptical we should be, and a 1 million number difference makes me extremely skeptical. In my opinion, this gap is too wide for this to be discerned as fact and more of a case of further study.

Flaw #4 – Specializations

Like the wage gap that took all earnings and compared men versus women, this study looks at all specialties as one. As we know, when we look at specific industries for the wage gap study, there are many that are female dominated with women earning more than male counterparts, and when we adjust for variables, such as work history and education, the wage gap disappears.

Surgical specializations included in this study were: Cardiothoracic, General, Neurosurgery, Orthopedic, Otolaryngology, Plastic, Thoracic, Urology, and Vascular. All of these fields are male dominated, with female dominated fields being Pediatrics and Obstetrics/Gynecology (two fields not included). Of the patient cases shown in this study, female surgeons are more represented in General surgery (21% female) and Orthopedic surgery (4% female). I'm sure a feminist will state that these are boys' clubs and women aren't allowed, but if that was true, then how are there so many patients with female surgeons?

The significance of this is risk.

Flaw #5 – No Measure of Risk

More women are in general surgery than all other paths in this study. Let’s dive a bit deeper. The mean age for male surgeon is 41–56, versus women who are 37-49. Men spend 7–22 years practicing and women 4–17. This tells us that men are more likely to make surgery a lifelong career versus women, or at least stay in the field longer. Adding to that, male surgeons can take on 15 times more cases than female surgeons do.

While the study believes that men don’t necessarily take on more riskier procedures than women, I would disagree. Men stay in longer, take on more cases, dominate in non-gendered specialty fields, and also do surgery on older patients (52-73 vs 39-70).

Let’s flip this around: female surgeons stay in surgery for a short time, tend to stay in fields that are female specific or less specialized, and work with younger patients.

The one thing this study doesn’t assess is what was the risk prior to surgery. The closest that they do show is comorbidity, which can tell us what kind of problems a patient had including the reason they go into surgery. Male surgeons tend to have patients with higher number of comorbidity than female surgeons.

I won’t say that any surgery is easy. Going under the knife can lead to all sorts of complications. Certainly, there is a difference between walking on a curb and not falling and walking on a tightrope and not falling. You understand that tightrope walking carries greater risk. Not understanding the level of risk prior to a procedure doesn’t give us the full picture. Did male surgeons take on riskier procedures than females? The signs seem to point to yes.

Flaw #6 – Male Patient Standard

This isn't exactly a flaw of the study but rather a flaw in the interpretation of the study. The big finding is that women are 15% more likely to have complications from surgeries if their surgeon is a man. I saw a feminist who thought that this meant that the medical system didn't take female medical issues seriously and that males were the standard. Obviously ignoring female specific medical departments and no medical department dedicated to men. They ask, "If the study is wrong, then why don't men have complications from male surgeons?"

The answer is: they do.

This study sets male surgeons with male patients' complications at a value of 1, then looks at female patients' complications and reports the increase, in this case 1.15 overall. In the case of death, it was 1.32 or 32% greater. They did the same thing with male patients, treating male surgeons as one and looked at female surgeons. Overall it was .99, and for deaths .87. This means that males did 1% better with female surgeons and were 13% more likely not to die compared to male surgeons.

This of course is a very small percentage and that's why it's not mentioned to the public, but the study does fail to report that males also have complications and not just female patients.

Conclusion

Understand that I don't think the medical system is perfect. In fact, I believe that it is in need of serious reform and perhaps even be rebuilt from the ground up. There is too much corruption, outdated thinking, insurance made to deny people help, specialists who seem incompetent, and the list goes on and on.

I firmly believe the worst aspect to the system is not even the medical staffing, but the non-medical staffing. It’s basically the same as HR, and is likewise overwhelmingly staffed by women. I think a lot of people avoid the doctor because they get sick of dealing with the staff that doesn’t seem to know how to do their jobs, expect you make sacrifices for them, mess up the billing, and if you are even 5 minutes late they chastise you even if the doctor is running an hour behind. And they always want you to come in 30 minutes early. How about you set my appointment for when you want me to come in. Of all the problems of the medical system, that is definitely in the top five.

In regards to this study, in using the adjusted odds ratio I will say they manipulated their findings or rather ignored key components to make the adjusted prediction to their liking. They focused on one city, had a million-patient gap, didn’t access risks, didn’t take age and experience into consideration, didn’t consider amount of workload, and didn’t look at other responsible parties.

Is there an issue of female patients having lower standard of care with male doctors? Maybe, but this study did a poor job in trying to represent it. Other studies they used do seem to show this as a problem. For instance, there is a problem of self-reporting to male surgeons. Studies show that female patients report less problems to a male surgeon than a female one. Female surgeons are better at picking up more issues from female patients than even male doctors are from male patients. If a surgeon doesn’t know everything going in, that is likely to lead to complications. Had the surgeon known about it, they might have done something about it.

This study was narrowly focused on correlation and passing it off as causation. They admit their limitations on this, but they are quick to throw out anything that could really explain the problems such as greater risk involved or the influence of other parties.

For me, this study demonstrates that male surgeons tend to work harder and longer than their female counterparts as a whole. There might be special exceptions, but this showed that women tend to take a more risk-avoidant path than men, focusing in general areas, younger patients, and less casework. This further tells me that when we think of the wage/earnings gap, this study shows that men take on more work in harder fields and thus disproves that men are paid more for having a penis.

Opposing Shared Parenting: The Feminist Track Record

February 10, 2022 | by Prentice Reid | Link | Original Link

When questions of why we oppose the feminist movement and why we are men's rights activists comes up one of the issues frequently overlooked is the fact that the largest feminist organization in America has consistently opposed shared parenting bills. These bills are designed to ensure that fathers by default have an equal amount of time with their children and remain a permanent fixture in their lives. Father's rights groups have had to fight feminist organizations like The National Organization for Women (NOW) since at least 1986 for the right to shared custody. In 1986 newspapers reported that Noreen Connell, President of the New York State chapter of the NOW as opposing shared parenting.

http://issuu.com/prenticereid/docs/feminist_and_women_s_groups_oppose_/1
In 2001 feminist groups in Canada refused to even sit at the same table as men during a consultation on changes to divorce laws due to shared parenting proposals being made by father's rights groups. They also demanded a woman-only discussion on the issue. The National Post reported on this incident:

> Women's groups who boycotted nationwide government consultations on changes to divorce law because they refused to sit at the same table as men could get the female-only hearing they have demanded. Although the consultations ended last month, the Justice Department and its provincial partners are considering a special session for "women's equality-seeking organizations" that are fighting proposed changes to the federal Divorce Act. Those changes would give separated and divorced parents an equal say in raising their children under a new concept called shared parenting. The women's groups are urging governments "not to cave into a father's rights groups agenda.

http://issuu.com/prenticereid/docs/feminist_groups_oppose_shared_paren/1
In 2005 NOW stated their reasons for opposing shared parenting so let's take a look at the reasoning behind their opposition:

> "Shared Parenting" is defined as "the award of custody to both parties so that both parties share equally the legal responsibility and control of such child and share equally the living experience in time and physical care of assure frequent and continuing contact with both parties, as the court deems to be in the best interests of the child, taking into consideration the location and circumstances of each party." The assertion that "shared parenting is in the best interests of minor children" is on its face untrue… The following facts continue to be true with > respect to mandatory joint custody of the children: * To arbitrarily reassign a child's primary caregiver, or disrupt a child's attachment to a primary caregiver creates an unstable, even traumatic situation for the children. * Increased father involvement does not necessarily result in positive outcomes for children."

Their claim that increased father involvement does not result in positive outcomes for child is a bold faced lie. The Baltimore Sun informs us of the detrimental effects on children raised by one parent: "The negative impact on our children is dramatic. For instance, according to the U.S. Centers for Disease Control and Prevention, the U.S. Department of Justice and the U.S. Census Bureau, children raised by single parents account for:

- 63 percent of teen suicides,
- 70 percent of juveniles in state-operated institutions,
- 71 percent of high school dropouts,
- 75 percent of children in chemical abuse centers,
- 85 percent of those in prison,
- 85 percent of children who exhibit behavioral disorders
- And 90 percent of homeless and runaway children."

The effect of fatherlessness on girls is detrimental just as it is with boys and if NOW really cared about the female gender it would be interested in ensuring that fathers remained in the lives of their daughters to prevent effects such as the well-known increase in teen pregnancy associated with girls experiencing fatherlessness. NOW in their opposition statement also claimed that the bill imposed mandatory shared custody regardless of whether it was best for the child or not but the actual bill they were opposing never actually stated this as their purpose in the text of the bill. The actual bill laid out it's goals: Establishes the presumption in matrimonial proceedings for awarding shared parenting of minor children in the absence of an allegation that shared parenting would be detrimental to the best interests of the child… PURPOSE: To create a statutory presumption of joint custody for all minor children whose parents are no longer married, so that both parents can continue to share in the responsibilities and duties of the children`s upbringing… The burden of proof that shared parenting would be detrimental is placed upon the parent requesting sole custody…. The first preference is for joint custody to be awarded by the court. If the court opts not to award joint custody it must state its reasons for denial. The order of joint custody may be amended by the court if it is shown that it would be in the best interests of the child. In 2009 NOW opposed shared parenting bill A00330 and lied about the bill making default shared custody mandatory AGAIN. The bill actually said that it's goal was to created a presumption of default shared custody IF there was no valid evidence that doing so would be against the child's best interest. NOW admitted that they are biased in favor of the mother having primary custody after divorce in their opposition statement.

> As court-ordered arrangements imposed upon…embattled and > embittered parents … [joint custody] can only enhance family chaos…. The National Organization for Women-New York State has always favored a primary caregiver (usually the mother) presumption to ensure stability and continuity of care for children…. Father's rights groups are in the forefront of the push for legislation establishing a presumption in favor of joint custody…. Joint custody over the wishes of one parent facilitates using the children to maintain access and control over the other parent's life.

Let's take a look at the actual stated goal of the bill they were opposing: AN ACT to amend the domestic relations law, in relation to establishing a presumption of shared parenting of minor children in matrimonial proceedings The provisions of this act establish a presumption, affecting the burden of proof, that shared parenting is in the best interests of minor children…. the court, on due consideration, [may] SHALL award the natural guardianship, charge and custody of such child to [either parent] BOTH PARENTS, IN THE ABSENCE OF AN ALLEGATION THAT SUCH SHARED PARENTING WOULD BE DETRIMENTAL So as you can see from the text of the actual bill, NOW was lying through their teeth about the bill not considering all other factors before awarding shared custody. But this is just the tip of the iceberg concerning the feminist movement and NOW's anti-family activity. They also opposed bills that would give families the option of mediation in the event of a divorce so that they would not have to deal with a nasty courtroom dispute that could result in grudges that could emotionally hurt the children in the family. Here is NOW's statement on their opposition to the mediation bill and notice that they expressly state that one of the reasons they oppose it is because it often results in shared parenting:

> Mediation is a closed-door, non-appealable, non-enforceable system with no power to order disclosure of assets or hire experts, but instead relies on "trust." Women's access to the courts and enforcement of their rights should be expanded rather than denying them due process by mandating mediation in child custody and child support cases in the name of reforming the legal system….Almost all mediated agreements provide for joint custody or "shared parenting" without consideration of the best interest of the children.

The National Organization for Women is the largest, most powerful, feminist organization in the United States, the pressure they place on politicians makes a huge impact on what bills are passed and which bills are not passed. When debating about the evils the feminist movement have wrought, feminists need to be held accountable for depriving countless numbers of children from having fathers in their lives and by extension they need to be held, at least partly accountable, for the psychological mayhem that results from children not having adequate time with their dads.

Update*: Here, in PDF form, is further documentation of NOW and other feminist groups's

Now for Some Light Relief

February 12, 2022 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I was watching a BBC series called Unforgotten tonight. It's a very well written series with some outstanding acting which centres around an unsolved murder.

In a brief scene in the most recent episode my wife and I watched, the main protagonist (a female detective) comes home and unexpectedly finds her adult son has dropped in after a few weeks' absence. She is delighted.

She sits down and watches him fry some bacon. As he stands at the stove flipping the rashers, a conversation begins. Mum wants to know what has been happening in her boy's life and is seeking some relief from her intense and stressful occupation.

The young man relates a story about his mate who made a negative observation about his girlfriend's backside. She smashed his jaw with the handle of a ping pong bat. The man relating the story smiles as he imparts this information.

He goes on to explain his friend lost eight teeth as a result of this blow.

Mum grins and asks him to keep chatting as she is enjoying simply hearing his voice.

End scene.

And there we see the utter hopelessness of our attempt to bring some awareness to our society with regard to the complete absence of any compassion, empathy or outrage when men are sexually abused, emotionally abused or violently assaulted.

Imagine any other demographic being the subject of that brief interaction.

"What's been happening love?" asks mum.

The young man smiles and says, "Oh, my mate's girlfriend told him he had bad breath so he smashed her in the face with the handle of his ping pong bat and knocked out eight of her teeth."

Mum grins.

"Tell me more. I love listening to your stories."

Fade to black.

Let's say a gay man gets his teeth knocked out for making a flippant remark. I feel alarmed just contemplating it. Perhaps a Muslim, African American, disabled or trans person is the victim. Would the scene get beyond the cutting room floor if presented in the same way, that is, as a mildly diverting source of amusement for a tired detective?

In what world would a writer and director have both participants in the conversation smiling broadly as the information is imparted if the subject of the assault was anyone other than a young, presumably white male?

There is no universe in which this would happen.

What can we deduce from this?

Men, in particular, white men, are the most despised, disposable demographic in our western society.

Such shocking examples of this hatred of men are plentiful. I see them every day. They are so ubiquitous you can understand why so many people are entirely blind to the quite stunning bigotry which is paraded before us each day. Decades of government, media and our education system promoting hateful lies and propaganda eventually seeps through to the strongest of minds.

What is to be done?

Remind yourself that the sun will rise tomorrow and do some deep breathing.

From the glossary – identity politics

February 12, 2022 | by Wiki4Men | Link | Original Link

Identity politics is a broad movement in which people are categorized on the basis of characteristics that are often readily identifiable. Characteristics often include gender, race, gender identity or sexuality. While identity politics often uses terminology such as diversity it is really talking about a coarse form of diversity based on physical characteristics and ignores important forms of diversity such as diversity of thought.

One of the greatest misunderstandings about the men's rights movement and anti-feminism is that they in any way involve identity politics. Merely seeking to address the problems faced by a particular group does not imply identity politics.

Feminism is increasingly tied to identity politics and post modernism.

The Oxford Dictionary defines identity politics as:

> A tendency for people of a particular religion, race, social background, etc., to form exclusive political alliances, moving away from traditional broad-based party politics.

Identity politics is inherently exclusionary even as it uses the language of inclusion. The men's rights movement accepts anyone who wants to help us regardless of their gender, ethnicity, sexuality or any other characteristic they might have. Every major men's rights organisation has had women in leadership roles. This is because those women were willing and able to fill those positions. Anyone who wants to help MRAs address the problems facing men and boys is welcome.

Compare to feminist groups. Many exclude men from leadership roles and some exclude men entirely – calling them allies. Some don't even want male allies. That's identity politics.

‘White Day’ – Gynocentrism Comes a Month Later in Japan

February 14, 2022 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

If you thought Valentine’s Day in the Western world was absurd enough, get a load of this. First, a bit of context.

As we know in the Western world, Valentine’s Day is really just like any other day for the romantically-minded in which men on their knees practice female-worship and altruistically shower gifts on women to earn their approval, only on this occasion they do it more so. Twenty times the affirmations, twenty times the gifts, twenty times the money spent by the man. It doesn’t take much to conclude that women by and large love this holiday particularly for those reasons. I haven’t even seen romantically involved men show much enthusiasm for this holiday.

The romantic insanity hasn’t been so different in the Eastern world, in particular in Japan. However Valentine’s Day manifested itself in a sufficiently different way. Not unlike the strangeness of having a Kentucky Fried Chicken dinner as a Japanese Christmas tradition (yes, really), the Japanese quirk regarding Valentine’s Day is that girls give the gifts (usually chocolates) to the boys.

A common explanation is that this is the result of a translation error when Valentine’s Day commercially initiated in Japan, but I know of no definite evidence of this. In any case, it is well understood that girls (by which I mean the females in general here) come up with chocolates for not only those who are the object of their affection, but for their classmates or office-mates as applicable. For the romantic target, chocolate is often homemade or expensively purchased. Other guys receive what is referred to as “giri-choco”, literally “obligatory chocolates”.

If you think that this is a dandy arrangement for the guys, read further and think again.

Now to talk about ‘White Day.’ Although it has more recent popularity spread in places like China and South Korea, for purposes of this article I’ll focus on Japan as its origin.

The first White Day took place in March 14th, 1978, a month after the Valentine’s Day of that year. The idea of this holiday is that the men pay back the women for the chocolates they got for them. Not only that, but the general rule of thumb turns out to be that the gift the guy pays back should be worth roughly three times the value. Just like with the original Valentine’s Day as it happened in Japan, this was of course marketed and driven by confectionery corporations for it to blossom in full cultural force.

We can sit on our asses and blame corporations until our faces are white as the chocolates, marshmallows, and lingerie these women may receive back in droves, but it wouldn’t have happened without the social motivation driven by a sense of gross chivalry, no less present in the Eastern world as in the West, and the vulgar narrative that women are precious, deserving creatures and men must pay dearly by design.

Where men are the primary givers on Valentine's Day, no thought of reciprocity, at least none of substance, would be considered (I can already hear the cries of "That would be unfair to the women!"). However if men don't reciprocate where expected, they would no doubt be shunned and deemed pathetic. To put this more simply, men should give gifts and earn women's approval. If women give gifts to men, men can't get away with just receiving the gifts.

White Day is said to be called so for various reasons including the color of marshmallows, a symbol of purity, or white chocolates, but personally I'd say the white comes from "white knight." It's as good an explanation as anything, right?

But not even the existence of something like White Day can prevent the modern woman from complaining, it seems. There are Japanese women who engage in a form of damseling as they complain about the pressure to spend loads of money for all that chocolate to buy for Valentine's Day, as they allege fear of workplace harassment by others they may potentially offend by not giving them chocolates. As with all matters in our gynocentric world, it appears to be all about the women. These women could just complain about the unsustainable gift-giving culture in collectivist Japan and protest on that basis, but my guess is that these women don't want to miss out on all the gifts they receive from men, which it would be culturally catastrophic if they stopped getting them, right?

I'm assuming any complaints by the men for the 'threefold reciprocity' they have to cough up, if they are the unfortunate targets of affection by the women, fall on deaf or condescending ears most of the time.

Any attempts to explain the popularity decline of Valentine's and White Day are charged with a gynocentric motive. BBC.com's 2019 article "White Day: Japan's Reverse Valentine's Day" can't resist in indulging in a white knight's joust regarding changing gender norms:

'In those days, it was not common that women declare their love to men, but Valentine's Day was the day of being allowed to do so,' says Mayumi Nagase." Oh, those poor girls. "Hidaka says that it was designed to give women the chance to show their feelings. 'In a macho, male-dominated era, I guess that made sense,' she says". Oh, these terrible men, their male-dominating selves are to blame. I'd have to give the article some credit however, for the following bit: "'Return gifts that are more expensive than chocolate [received from women on Valentine's Day] are expected, so it is a troublesome day for males as they have to decide what to give back,' (Mou Soejima) says. 'White Day is incomprehensible – have you ever seen marshmallows more expensive than chocolate?'" At least someone is giving some thought to the dudes.

On the whole, perhaps there is some good to come out of the commercial decline of both Valentine's Day and White Day in Japan, though one's neck can hurt from shaking it every time one sees another explanation for this to be centered primarily around women's alleged problems. In any case, may that decline follow suit in the Western world.

I will close off with a friendly reminder that just because cultural gender norms may have subtle differences in Asia compared to the Western world, that doesn't mean in any way whatever that it is a non-gynocentric alternative. Get that through to your head. Gynocentrism is a global vice, just manifested in different ways across the world.

Chin up, David!

---

David Futrelle has revealed that his blog, We Hunted the Mammoth, is in financial trouble. He advises that he might have to reduce posting frequency or close the blog entirely. Don't do it David!

As I've often said in the past, the most powerful words we have are feminist's own words. I often call feminists the marketting department since their ramblings so often bring visitors to our sites. A proportion of these visitors agree with what we say. A proportion of the visitors who agree with us stay to help.

That's how I got involved. I first heard about men's rights from feminists. I investigated. For the first time I found people who saw the problems I saw. Many of them had dug deeper than I had though. I read and read for six months before saying a word. A decade or so later here we are.

Their rage against us is so all consuming that I can explain all of this and it won't make any difference. On they will rage.

This is why we will ultimately win. If they could somehow remain silent, we win. If they rage against us, we win faster.

So keep on keeping on David. Please continue to rush to judgement, jump to conclusions, stretch the truth and by all means continue to pick cherries. After all, exercise is good for you.

Lady Castelloza Speaks Out Against Sexual Feudalism & Gender Inequality

February 24, 2022 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

> Good lady, you may burn or hang him > or do anything you happen to desire, > for there's nothing that he can refuse you,
> as such you have him without any limits.
>
> { Bona domna, ardre.l podetz o pendre, > o far tot so que.us vengua a talen, > que res non es qu'el vos puesca defendre, > aysi l'avetz ses tot retenemen. } [1]

Men have long been sexually disadvantaged. While men's structural disadvantages are scarcely acknowledged within gynocentric society, a small number of medieval women writers courageously advocated for men. In Occitania early in the thirteenth century, the extraordinary trobairitz Lady Castelloza spoke out boldly against gender inequality in love and men having the status of serfs in sexual feudalism.

> And if she tells you a high mountain is a plain, > agree with her,
> and be content with both the good and ill she sends;
> that way you'll be loved.
>
> { e s'ela.us ditz d'aut puoig que sia landa, > vos l’an crezatz,

> e plassa vos lo bes e.l mals q’il manda, > c’aissi seretz amatz. } [2]

Just as is the case for many women today, many medieval women didn’t adequately support and defend men. When Giraut de Bornelh asked his lovely friend Alamanda about his love difficulties, she advised him to be totally subservient to his lady. Alamanda was a maiden to that lady. Lord Giraut apparently had lost his lady’s love by seeking sex with a woman who was not her equal, probably none other than her maiden Alamanda. But what had that lady done to him? She had lied to him at least five times before! When women speak, men should not just listen and believe. Unwillingness to question a woman led a Harvard Law professor to personal disaster. Men should not act as doormats for women or as women’s kitchen servants.

The trobairitz Maria de Ventadorn insisted to Gui d’Ussel that a woman should retain her superior position even in a love relationship with a man. Gui felt that men and women in love should be equals. But Maria wanted men to fulfill all the pleas and commands of their lady-lovers. That’s the pernicious doctrine of yes-dearism. Just say no to female supremacists!

> Lady {Maria de Ventadorn}, among us they say > that when a lady wants to love, > she should honor her love on equal terms > because they are equally in love.
> Gui d’Ussel, at the beginning lovers > say no such thing;
> instead, each one, when he wants to court,
> says, with hands joined and on his knees:
> “Lady, permit me to serve you honestly > as your servant man” and that’s the way she takes him.
> I rightly consider him a traitor if, having given > himself as a servant, he makes himself an equal.
>
> { Dompna, sai dizon de mest nos
> Que, pois que dompna vol amar,
> Engalmen deu son drut onrar,
> Pois engalmen son amoros!
> Gui d’Uissel, ges d’aitals razos
> Non son li drut al comenssar,
> Anz ditz chascus, qan vol prejar,
> Mans jointas e de genolos:
> Dompna, voillatz qe-us serva franchamen
> Cum lo vostr’om! et ella enaissi-l pren!

> Eu vo-l jutge per dreich a trahitor
> Si-s rend pariers e-s det per servidor. } [3]

Because of their great love for women, men are reluctant to demand that women treat them with equal human respect and dignity. Men tend toward gyno-idolatry. The man on his knees before a woman, with his hands clasped, is making a gesture of faithful subordination. She then puts her hands around his hands to complete this feudal gesture known as the immixtio mannum {intermingling of hands}. A man today who goes down on his knee to ask a woman for her hand in marriage is preparing to be a vassal to his woman-lord midons. That's folly. That's fine preparation for a sexless marriage. From studying Ovid the great teacher of love to modern empirical work on sexual selection, men should know that self-abasement is a losing love strategy.

> Oh Love, what shall I do?
> Shall we two live in strife?
> The griefs that must ensue > would surely end my life.
> Unless my Lady might > receive me in that place
> she lies in, to embrace > and press against me tight > her body, smooth and white.
> Good Lady, thank you for > your love so true and fine;
> I swear I love you more > than all past loves of mine.

> I bow and join my hands
> yielding myself to you;
> the one thing you might do > is give me one sweet glance > if sometime you've the chance.
>
> { Amors, e que.m farai?
> Si garrai ja ab te?
> Ara cuit qu'e.n morrai
> Del dezirer que.m ve,
> Si.lh bela lai on jai
> No m'aizis pres de se,
> Qu'eu la manei e bai
> Et estrenha vas me
> So cors blanc, gras e le.
> ...
> Bona domna, merce
> Del vostre fin aman!
> Qu'e.us pliu per bona fe
> C'anc re non amei tan.
> Mas jonchas, ab col cle,
> Vos m'autrei e.m coman;
> E si locs s'esdeve,
> Vos me fatz bel semblan,
> Que molt n'ai gran talan! } [4]

The medieval trobairitz Castelloza sympathized with men's subordination in love. She loved a man who didn't love her. A woman today in such a situation might open a dating app and enjoy a huge number of solicitations from men. Then, if necessary to boost her self-esteem, she might go for sexual flings with a few, or at least exploit traditional anti-men gender dating roles to get some free dinners. With a keen sense for social justice, Castelloza refused to live according to such female privilege:

> I certainly know that it pleases me, > even though people say it's not right > for a lady to plead her own cause with a knight, > and make long speeches all the time to him.
> But whoever says this doesn't know > that I want to implore before dying, > since in imploring I find sweet healing, > so I plead to him who gives me grave trouble.
>
> { Eu sai ben qu'a mi esta gen,
> Si ben dison tuig que mout descove

> Que dompna prec ja cavalier de se,
> Ni que l tenga totz temps tam lonc pressic,
> Mas cil c'o diz non sap gez ben chausir.
> Qu'ieu vueil preiar ennanz que.m lais morir,
> Qu'el preiar ai maing douz revenimen,
> Can prec sellui don ai greu pessamen. } [5]

Castelloza recognized that, in pleading with a man for love, she was transgressing the norms of men-oppressing courtly love. When women treat men merely as dogs, women don't experience the full gift of men's tonic masculinity. The master dehumanizes herself in dehumanizing her man-slaves. Castelloza, in contrast, understood that a man's love can ennoble a woman. She understood that a man can offer much to even the most privileged woman.

> I'm setting a bad pattern > for other loving women, > since it's usually men who send > messages of well-chosen words.
> Yet I consider myself cured, > friend, when I implore you.
> for keeping faith is how I woo.
> A noble women would grow richer > if you graced her with the gift > of your embrace or your kiss.
>
> { Mout aurei mes mal usatge
> A las autras amairitz,
> C'hom sol trametre mesatge,
> E motz triaz e chauzitz.
> Es ieu tenc me per gerida,
> Amics, a la mia fe,
> Can vos prec — c'aissi.m conve;
> Que plus pros n'es enriquida
> S'a de vos calqu'aondansa
> De baisar o de coindansa. } [6]

Men's lack of imagination and unwillingness to protest helps to keep them in their gender prison of gynocentrism. Men rightly appreciate, admire, and love courageous, transgressive women like the trobairitz Castelloza. But men must take responsibility for winning their own liberation. A man showing loving concern about his close friend getting married isn't enough. Men should be more daring and, like Matheolus, raise stirring voices of men's sexed protest. Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs) struggled against misandry and castration culture even in the Middle Ages, and they continue to do so today. MGTOW is merely prudent personal action. To dismantle gynocentric oppression, men must recover, create, and disseminate protest poetry as potent as the medieval troubadours' feudal songs of men's love serfdom.

> Peire, if spanning two or three years
> the world were run as would please me,
> I'll tell you how with women it would be:
> they would never be courted with tears, > rather, they would suffer such love-fears > that they would honor us, > and court us, rather than we, them.
>
> { Peire, si fos dos ans o tres
> Lo segles faihz al meu plazer,
> De domnas vos dic eu lo ver:
> Non foran mais preyadas ges,
> Ans sostengran tan greu pena
> Qu'elas nos feiran tan d'onor
> C'ans nos prejaran que nos lor. } [7]

Here's some meta-data about this trobairitz song. It's a debate poem (tenso). The currently best critical edition of trobairitz / troubadour tensos is Harvey, Paterson & Radaelli (2010), but it's expensive and not widely available. For analysis of the genre of tenso, McQueen (2015).

Men's abasement in sexual feudalism is pervasive in trobairitz song. Men engage in gyno-idolatry and imagine that they will die without a woman's love:

> I bow down to you, whom I love and adore, > and I am your liegeman and your household servant.
> I yield myself up to you, who are the noblest > and the best being that was ever born of a mother.

> And since I cannot help but love you, > for mercy's sake, I beg you, don't let me die.
>
> { Sopley vas vos, cuy yeu am et azor,
> E suy vostres liges e domesgiers.
> A vos m'autrey, qar etz la genser res
> E la mielhers qu'anc de maire nasques.
> E, quar no.m puesc de vos amar suffrir,
> Per merce.us prec que no.m layssetz morir. }

Peire Bremont Ricas Novas, "Us covinens gentils cors plazentiers," 3.3-8, Occitan text and English translation (modified) from Kay (1999) p. 217. Peire Bremont Ricas Novas was active in Province from about 1230 to 1241.

[5] Na {Lady} Castelloza, "Amics, s'ie.us trobes avinen" ll. 17-24 (stanza 3), Occitan text from Paden (1981), English trans. (modified) from Paden & Paden (2007). Bruckner, Shepard & White (1995) provides a slightly different Occitan text and English translation of all of Castelloza's songs. Butterfly Crossings provides an online Occitan text and English translation of the full song, with commentary. Her commentary puts forward orthodox myth in service of gynocentrism:

> by virtue of being a woman she is below him socially, thus rendering her statement simultaneously true and drawing attention to the place of women in society as opposed to the artificial pedestal they sit upon in traditional Troubadour poems. Regardless of her title, class, or wealth, in love, much like in life, the woman is beneath the man and must beg his favor like Castelloza here does.

Yup, so Anne of France was beneath day-laboring men gathering stones in fields.

Much influential recent scholarship on trobairitz has been based on dominant gender delusions. A relevant critique:

> Gravdal's argument here is based on her assumption that, for the men, powerlessness is a pose, a rhetorical strategy; the male speaker adopts an abased position only to use it as a springboard to higher status and sociopolitical clout. That Castelloza's speaker does this as well is frequently overlooked, because it is assumed that for the women, powerlessness is a reality. This assumption is not supported by the evidence for noblewomen's sociopolitical situation in Occitania during the time of the trobairitz.

Langdon (2001) p. 40.

[6] Castelloza, "Mout avetz faich lonc estatge" ll. 21-30 (stanza 3), Occitan text from Paden (1981), English trans. (modified) from Paden & Paden (2007). Butterfly Crossings again offers the full song, along with commentary. The commentary shows orthodox academic failure of self-consciousness:

> Almost smirkingly Castelloza acknowledges that her behavior sets a terrible > example for all other female lovers while synchronously encouraging them to do the same. She is not apologizing as much as drawing attention to the solidarity between women who will now partake in this perhaps liberating behavior and act upon their desires as opposed to remaining within the confined roles of passive love interests.

Women unite in liberating behavior: ask men out and buy men dinner!

In Castelloza's songs, the man she loves has neither voice nor activity. Siskin & Storme (1989) pp. 119-20. Self-centeredness is a common characteristic of women's writing, particularly in the last few decades of literary scholarship.

[7] Peire d'Alvrnha (possibly) and Bernart de Ventadorn, "Amics Bernartz de Ventadorn," stanza 4, Occitan text from Trobar, my English translation benefiting from that of Rosenberg, Switten & Le Vot (1998). James H. Donalson provides an online Occitan text and English translation for the full song.

Bernart de Ventadorn was one of the greatest troubadour love poets. His desire for women to experience men's subordinate position in love is coupled with appreciation for gender equality and reciprocity in love:

> The love of two good lovers lies > in pleasing and in yearning's thrill > from which no good thing will arise > unless they match each other's will.
> The man was born an imbecile > who scolds her for her preference > or bids her do what she resents.
>
> { En agradar et en voler > es l'amors de dos fi̲ns amants; > nulha res no·i pòt pro̲n tener > se·l volontatz non es egals.
> E cell es be̲n fols naturals > qui de çò que vòl la reprend > e·ilh lauza çò qu no·ilh es gent }

"Chantars no pot gaire valer," Occitan text and English trans. (modified insubstantially) from A.Z. Foreman. For an alternate English translation, Paden & Paden (2007) pp. 74-5. While Bernart here unequally criticizes men, in an earlier stanza her criticized women whoring in loving men.

Ukraine: As in times past, men are forced into conflict and separated from their family

Ukrainian father says goodbye to his daughter, possibly forever, as he and all males aged 18 to 60 are banned from leaving, and are forced to stay behind and fight against Russia.

Has Chivalry Fled? (Article, May 1912)

February 26, 2022 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following article provides an example of a 'threat narrative' – i.e., in this case the threat that chivalry is departed or dying, thus putting women in danger in a myriad ways.

The 'Chivalry Is Dead' trope has been wheeled out by every newspaper and media outlet for the last two centuries, on a weekly basis. If romantic chivalry is taking hundreds of years to die then it must be the slowest death on earth!

However the intent of such articles appears not to report accurately on chivalry's demise (which doesn't appear to be happening to any significant degree), but to reinforce protection of chivalry as an article of dogmatic faith; i.e., the more one feels chivalry is under threat, the more one protects and upholds the institution.

To be sure there have occurred alterations in the way gynocentric chivalry is acted out on the contemporary scene, but the basic convention is still very much alive.

The following article appeared in the Evening Post LXXIII, Issue 112, 11 May, 1912:

Comments on the Russian invasion of Ukraine

February 27, 2022 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

---

Robert Brockway is the owner and publisher of A Voice for Men however he's made it clear that he is expressing his personal opinions in this video –Ed

Text of the video

Russia has invaded Ukraine. I condemn this wanton act of aggression on the part of Russia against the, per capita, poorest country in Europe.

Some Westerners are arguing that Russia is simply responding to the advance of NATO. Eastern European states, and the Baltic States in particular, joined NATO because they are terrified of Russia.

In an interview in 2014 Mikhail Gorbachev made it clear that there was never any agreement not to move NATO eastward. He made two relevant points:

(1) There was an agreement not to place NATO infrastructure in East Germany.

He indicated that NATO had complied with this up to the time of the interview. It appears that this is still the case.

and

(2) He felt that moving NATO eastward was a breach of the spirit of the statements and assurances made to the USSR in 1990.

That may well be true, but breaching the spirit of statements and assurances is no basis for war.

Vladimir Putin, President of Russia, has made it clear for years that he wants to bring areas with large ethnic Russian populations in to the Russian Federation. It is also likely that he aims for Russia to recover or closely dominate all of the land that the USSR lost in the early 1990s.

NATO's expansion east is a convenient excuse but it is clear to me that he would have invaded Ukraine regardless.

While I don't believe that comparisons of Putin to Adolf Hitler are accurate a situation in which Russia seeks to annex territory with large numbers of ethnic Russians is very similar to Europe in the period immediately before WW2.

Russia dominates many former soviet states through the Commonwealth of Independent States. Ukraine, the Baltic States and some others have so far escaped Russia's grasp. I fear that Putin will actively try to take back each of these states hoping that NATO won't respond. This is despite Article 5 of the North Atlantic Treaty requiring signatories to consider an attack against one to be an attack against all. I believe that when the chips are down Putin thinks that NATO will fold.

If Putin moves on NATO states like the Baltic Republics then we're very likely looking at WW3. If that happens Putin will be reviled alongside Hitler by future generations. To be clear I do not believe that WW3 will mean the end of civilisation. Far from it – billions of people will survive to regret the choices of one Vladimir Putin.

Many Russians are opposing the invasion of Ukraine. Putin has responded by arresting demonstrators and restricting some social media platforms. Clearly his arguments are so weak that they cannot withstand any opposition.

The West has treated men abominably for decades. Don't think that men are better off in Russia or Ukraine. In both of these countries the life expectancy difference between men and women is about 10 years, significantly more than in the West.

The problems facing men are bigger than the West. Gynocentrism is a widespread problem. We see this with the Ukrainian government barring men 18-60 from leaving Ukraine. If the state must be protected then it's necessary for both men and women to share the burden equally. Some men, such as single fathers, may need to leave with their children. As we've seen, many Ukrainian women are willing to stay and resist the Russian invasion. Many military roles are not front line combat roles and there are a variety of ways that both men and women can serve.

When we object to men being barred from leaving we hear from feminists that it is men that are sending men to war. Historical research on Europe shows that female leaders are more likely to start and continue wars. Regardless of the gender of the leaders it is men that do the bulk of fighting and dying.

The men's rights movement rejects violence as a tool of political change. This means you too Russia.

I've said it before and I'll say it again. If there is a nuclear exchange between the US and Russia then Russian will be a dead language in 100 years. Russia has struggled to maintain its population even in good times in recent decades. The West will be hurt in such a war but it, and the English language, will go on.

At the time of publication Ukraine is doing better than most people in the outside world thought it would. Anything less than complete defeat of Ukraine is a loss for Vladimir Putin. Ukrainians remember the Holodomor, or Ukrainian famine, in which Joseph Stalin's policies resulted in the death of around 13% of the Ukrainian population.

If Ukraine can do well enough against Russia it may well discourage further aggression and save us from a wider war.

Ukrainians have a long history of guerrilla warfare too. All I suggest is that the responsibility to defend their land be borne equally by men and women.

No feminists in a foxhole

February 28, 2022 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I've heard it said many times before, but it bears repeating.

Feminism can only exist in times of peace and plenty. In other words, when all of the back breaking, heavy lifting, life risking work has been done by men and the work environment is comfortable and carpeted with air conditioning (sexist though it may be) or qualifications have been lowered in order to facilitate a large quota of undeserving females' easy entry into professions men had to gain entry into by proving themselves worthy- feminism flourishes.

In times of peace and prosperity women make endless demands while denouncing and denigrating men. They question male usefulness and wonder if they are really a necessary component in our modern world where buttons are pushed, remote controls pointed, laptops flipped open revealing all you need to see and know. Mobile phones are deemed more valuable and indispensable than anyone with a penis.

Feminists preach loudly and incessantly the mantra- women are not simply the equal of men, they are their moral and physical superior.

We recall the line about Ginger Rogers doing everything Astaire did in high heels!

We watch women beating up large brutish men in cop shows, spy films and superhero flicks. Girls and women appear in every advertisement outdoing the men in fields men once dominated. Girls kick footballs, fight fires, arrest criminals without male assistance. Army and airforce recruitment advertisements feature women in almost every scene.

Men are depicted as brutish, stupid, clumsy and violent in films and ads. Boys are presented as the only children who bully and abuse their male and female peers.

None of this propaganda represents the real world.

All women know this- even the most rabid feminist. But it matters not, for men support and promote this charade. If there is no-one with the courage of the boy who saw the naked emperor's bare arse and declared the King was naked, what does it matter?

The lie lives on. Perhaps the next generation of boys raised on this relentless diet of deceit will come to believe it is true in spite of their daily experiences in the real world.

Bill Burr, the American comedian did a routine a few years ago when he pinpointed the utter hypocrisy of the cake and eat it brigade known as feminists.

He suggested that the most virulent man hating feminist with her head shaved would twirl her remaining stands of hair and put on her cutest helpless face if she was standing on the deck of the Titanic and unashamedly play the little damsel in distress.

He was right.

What prompted this little essay?

Russia invaded the Ukraine this week.

An edict was declared today. No man between the ages of 18 and 60 can leave the country. Martial law has been declared. I assume any male caught attempting to escape the death and destruction will be arrested. Perhaps he will face a firing squad.

I've no doubt there are many feminists in Ukraine.

Where are the angry protests? Such a blatant insult cannot be tolerated. Surely women are incensed by the implications of this edict! Have women not been kicking male arse for decades on our screens? Are women not capable of doing what any man can do? In this day and age of pulling triggers and pushing buttons to fire missiles and drop bombs, a feminine finger could wreak as much havoc as a masculine one.

But there have been no protests since this overtly sexist proclamation. Yet again, even in our modern world of gender equality, it is men and boys who will do the fighting and dying and men and boys who will also be blamed for all the fighting and dying.

I noted this article which explained that Ukraine was expecting women to register for military conscription due to the growing threat from Russia, yet despite the feisty rhetoric in this piece, nothing has changed.

Where are all these women? Why were they not ordered to remain in Ukraine alongside the men? Yet again, when the shit hits the fan, it is people with penises who are covered in excrement.

Apollo – God of Incels

March 3, 2022 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

There are many characters from Greek mythology who displayed involuntary celibacy, but perhaps none more famous than Apollo, the god of rational thought.

Jungian psychologists view Greek gods and goddesses as archetypes – themes that appear not only in mythology but also psychologically and behaviorally in the lives of men and women. Apollo was the god of many things, including music, education, knowledge, and other intellectual pursuits.

The Apollo archetype personifies the aspect of the personality that wants clear definitions, is drawn to master a skill, values order and harmony. The Apollo archetype as it appears in the behavior of men (or women) favors thinking over feeling, distance over closeness, objective assessment over subjective intuition.

Apollo can be viewed a metaphorical 'incel' figure. The following from psychiatrist Jean Shinoda-Bolen's book Gods in Everyman describes this aspect of Apollo or the 'Apollo man' :

> Apollo was the most handsome of gods, as well as responsible and dependable: the sun always came up, rose and set when it was supposed to. He emphasized virtue and had precepts to live by carved on his temple walls. Yet he was unsuccessful in love, rejected by Cassandra, Sybil, Daphne, and Marpessa. The women Apollo the god wanted to have, and was rejected by, were the kind of women who also may reject an Apollo man.
>
> The woman who rejects a handsome, virtuous, dependable Apollo man usually does so because he lacks qualities that are essential for her, such as depth and intensity, or emotional closeness, or sexual spontaneity. Apollo men are rejected > by women who want a deeper bond, with more intensity and emotional expressiveness, than he can provide.

>
> The integrity in which an Apollo man may live out his precepts or live up to his agreements draw admiration and respect, rather than love or passion. Women who are aware of these priorities will not choose him to begin with, or, on discovering what is lacking, may reject him as a lover later. [1]

She further tells:

> Individuals who resemble Apollo have difficulties that are related to emotional distance, such as communication problems, and the inability to be intimate… Rapport with another person is hard for the Apollo man. He prefers to access (or judge) the situation or the person from a distance, not knowing that he must "get close up" – be vulnerable and empathic – in order to truly know someone else…. But if the woman wants a deeper, more personal relationship, then there are difficulties… she may become increasingly irrational or hysterical.[1]

When considering the idea of using Greek deities as descriptors, I'm reminded of a statement by C.G. Jung who wrote, "To serve a mania [a modern psych label] is detestable and undignified, but to serve a God is full of meaning."

If we translate Jung's statement into one that speaks to our present topic it would say this: To be a devotee of Apollo amounts to a life filled with meaning, but to be labelled an incel is detestable and undignified.

Said differently, a focus on the many positives of a man's life provides a more dignified estimation than focusing only on the negative of how he falls short of a petty, gynocentric value system.

With so much negative and maligning discourse around the topic of incels, perhaps its time we looked at the life of an involuntary celibate as every bit worthy as any other life. If we use Apollo as a model, we might even call parts of that life divine.

Eight Traits of the Bio-Gynocentrist

March 6, 2022 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Are you a bio-gynocentrist? Do you think the purpose of manhood is to service womanhood because that's how you've managed to interpret human biology? Do you think that women are more important than men because "we evolved that way"? Look for these eight traits and see if they apply to you. Included are some insights and advice for alternative ways of thinking for you.

1. You lack imagination. You cannot think of other ways you can live your own life as a man aside from being a white knight. You've probably mulled over the purpose of your existence as a male living on Earth in the present day and probably wondered why so many men were made disposable in war and other situations. Instead of coming to the sensible conclusion of "this was never just, I won't be a part of this", you process that as men's ultimate purpose – to live and die in service. Think instead of what you could be on your own terms, not in contradiction to your expression of masculinity but fully in tandem with it.

2. You're not terribly different from a feminist. The objectives of the bio-gynocentrist and the feminist are essentially the same with different details. The feminists focus on the mitigation if not the total elimination of the masculine in order to benefit their vision of womankind. The bio-gynocentrists see the male's evolutionary purpose as a means to the female end, but useful and important to that end nonetheless. If you're relieved at this fact, that at least you have a purpose, maybe you should re-examine your values and wonder why you're so glad to have purpose prescribed to you by women towards their ends. What they have in common is that they hold males as a subordinate subset of the human species.

3. You probably love to brag about how hard-wired you are. Free will and human volition be damned! According to you, men can't help doing things for women, including all the self-damaging things. It's out of your control, and out of all men's control. All of this is the argument for mindlessness and should be dismissed in favor of arguing for the free-willed man. The argument from hard-wiring is incredibly tempting because it implies non-accountability and non-responsibility for one's own actions. Besides, who are you trying to please with this? Feminists? "Love us, feminists! We can't help but do things that make us expendable. We do this for you!" Take a values-oriented and voluntaryist approach instead, that instead crafts a narrative in which men embrace their interests by their own will.

4. Your interpretation of biology is way off kilter. The evolution of humanity is about how it became a species of conscious individuals, and not about he is fundamentally not different from other animals and how allegedly there is a self-sacrificial mechanism built within us. Human beings are the species that can consciously recognize that men and women are equally valuable as sexes. And more important than that, we are the species that can consciously recognize that individuals have their own equal worth. All of this is something we have to put in voluntary effort into, however. We can think, or choose not to. The bio-gynocentrist says that man can't choose (he is helpless and hardwired, remember?), and then uses that as the pretext for choosing not to think.

5. You essentially don't hold women accountable. This will be your undoing, as it always has been for men. You look at the past with rose colored glasses and think we can go back to the good old days. It was a scam then, it is a scam now. If you treat women as royalty (with adorations such as "the fairer sex", and others), women will in fact reward you…by treating you accordingly as a vassal. Female non-accountability is the blood and circulatory system of gynocentrism, no matter the form it takes. You think at least women will be expected to respect you back? Think of this this way: only accountable women with a full sense of their selves as individuals with agency will be able to respect you as a man. The prospect of royalty giving full respect to a vassal is an otherworldly fantasy.

6. You may be a collectivist. Masculinity is at its best expressed individualistically, and yet you're preoccupied with a preordained purpose for males. You assess the male's role in reproduction and in society, and judge men as not men if they stray from any derived notion from that assessment. You deem men as the disposable sex, and concur with scrutinizing women you're trying to "win over" in courtship that a non-disposable man must be no man at all. You then commit the collectivistic sin of offering a singular "way of man." Note that when I speak about individualistic masculinity, I don't mean by a long shot "no masculine standards" nor "gender is whatever you want it to be". I also most certainly don't preclude the idea of brotherhood among men, quite the contrary! No, your maleness will be fundamentally a part of you, but the way it consistently operates in this world is myriad. Masculinity has a vast spectrum from the warrior archetype, to the athletic man, to the artist, to the guitarist, to the violinist, to the crafter of intricate plastic models, to the man working on his car, and so much more.

7. You might enjoy being on your knees. It's where a knight belongs…especially in front of a woman. You're probably the kind of guy who knows no alternative to spending a fortune on an engagement ring and go down on the floor in front of an audience as your prospective mate looks down upon you. You may find it hard to live life off of your own knees. It takes effort. Selling your soul is the easiest thing anyone can do. Try not selling your soul. Try getting off your knees. Nobody respects anyone looked down upon.

8. Your primary argument against these points is that it's "biology denial" in the style of feminists. Wrong. It isn't biology denial to say that societal conventions very much factor into human history, and the vulgarity of gynocentrism is always something that's enforced and browbeaten. Gynocentrism is an issue of the mind, not something built into us that we are helpless against. What healthy interpretation of human biology says that males are the inferior counterpart to the females that are by design the most valuable along with their golden uteruses? What purpose do these evo-psychs have to preach this narrative except to try and win women's favor? And, is it no wonder that plenty of women approve of this narrative of the biological purpose of man?

Some final thoughts to close on: humanity evolved to transcend the patterns of its pre-human condition. Humanity evolved to finally ask the existential question: “What is my purpose on this planet, where the existence of my being is limited?” It would serve the men’s movement well to make sure that men can answer this question without making the error of the gynocentric conclusion. Bio-gynocentrism, the attempt to portray men as biological serfs in the name of science and biology, can only serve as an obstacle.

Descriptions of Gynocentrism

This article is drawn from the gynocentrism article on Wiki4Men –Ed

In her 1988 paper, feminist Iris M. Young underlines the gynocentric principle of "superiority" of female values over male values. Young states;

> "Gynocentric feminism… argues for the superiority of the values embodied in traditionally female experience and rejects the values it finds in traditionally male dominated institutions… Gynocentric feminism finds in women's bodies and traditionally feminine activity the source of positive values. Women's reproductive processes keep us linked with nature and the promotion of life to a greater degree than men's. Female eroticism is more fluid, diffuse, and loving than violence-prone male sexuality. Our feminine socialization and traditional roles as mothers give us the capacity to nurture and a sense of social cooperation that may be the only salvation of the planet… within traditional femininity lie the values that we should promote for a better society."
> –Iris Marion Young, Humanism, gynocentrism and feminist politics. Women's Studies International Forum. Vol. 8. No. 3. Pergamon, 1985

Since the turn of the millennium new research into the nature and dynamics of gynocentrism – from male-inclusive, and humanist points of view – has provided a more detailed understanding of gynocentrism. The following presents a synopsis from authors and researchers Alison Tieman, Paul Elam, Paul Nathanson & Katherine Young, Adam Kostakis, Peter Wright, Dennis Gouws, Peter Ryan, and Elizabeth Hobson.

Alison Tieman

> "In my opinion – and this is just from observing the social systems as they play out – I would say that gynocentrism prioritizes women's protection and provision."
> –Paul Elam and Alison Tieman, Discussing Gynocentrism | HBR Debate 7 | Youtube (March 2018)

Paul Elam

> "For me gynocentrism is simply the ingrained human tendency to prioritize the needs and wants of women over the needs and wants of men. In its development culturally its not near that simple, and its development biologically its not near that simple. But as it manifests itself in the realm of sexual politics I do call it the tendency in human beings to prioritize the needs and wants of women over the needs and wants of men… The reason I like to frame it in terms of needs and > wants is because in this gynocentric milieu, the gynocentric landscape in which we live, its not just protection and provision that women have the demand of the culture around them, it is everything. Its protection, its provision, its privilege, its power, its believe the woman, its, ynow, if I say something I don't want to be questioned; this goes way beyond protection and provision.

> –Paul Elam and Alison Tieman, Discussing Gynocentrism | HBR Debate 7 | Youtube (March 2018)

> "How did chivalry go from being a military code to being a codified standard for men to meet in their protective treatment of women? The answer to that is a matter of historical record; it was through manipulation of the gynocentric instinct. In the twelfth century Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie de Champagne engaged in an intensive campaign to popularize the idea of courtly or romantic love… Eleanor, a woman of serious means and influence, sort of like a supersized Betty Friedan of the high Middle Ages saw an opportunity in this to promote a connection between men and women inspired by passion and infatuation and driven by a model of service – particularly of service to women. She and her daughter commissioned troubadours who borrowed from the ethics of military chivalry to write books and songs that carried this message to all the European courts. Even though the message was meant primarily for the aristocracy it eventually filtered down into the general population and quickly grew in popularity… The advent of romantic chivalrous love took the naturally occurring tendency in men to take care of women and made the first great leap toward a gynocentric society that would tolerate and indeed encourage all manner of insanity in the name of putting women first."
> –Paul Elam, Gynocentrism: The Root of Feminism, speech delivered to International Conference on Men's Issues, London (2016)

Paul Nathanson & Katherine Young

> "Gynocentrism is a form of essentialism – as distinct from scholarship or political activity on behalf of women – to the extent that it focuses on the innate virtues of women. But this worldview is explicitly misandric too, because it not only ignores the needs and problems of men but also attacks men. Misandry is a form of dualism that focuses on the innate vices of men. In this moral or even ontological hierarchy , women are at the top and men are at the bottom."
> –Katherine K. Young and Paul Nathanson, Sanctifying Misandry, [p. 58] (2010)

Adam Kostakis

> "The traditional idea under discussion is male sacrifice for the benefit of women, which we term Gynocentrism. This is the historical norm, and it was the way of > the world long before anything called ‘feminism’ made itself known. There is an enormous amount of continuity between the chivalric class code which arose in the Middle Ages and modern feminism, for instance. That the two are distinguishable is clear enough, but the latter is simply a progressive extension of the former over several centuries, having retained its essence over a long period of transition. One could say that they are the same entity, which now exists in a more mature form – certainly, we are not dealing with two separate creatures.

> –Adam Kostakis, Lecture 2: The Same Old Gynocentric Story, Gynocentrism theory Lectures (2011)

> “And what is the logical outcome – say, if tomorrow, feminists got everything they are advocating for today? We would be plunged immediately into a two-tier system of rights and obligations, where men and women form distinct castes of citizen, the former weighed down by the obligations that enable the latter to luxuriate in their total autonomy. Life for women would be a literal lawlessness, while men’s every move would be dictated from above, geared to the purpose of providing for all female needs and wants. It would not be inappropriate to call such a system sexual feudalism, and every time I read a feminist article, this is the impression that I get: that they aim to construct a new aristocracy, comprised only of women, while men stand at the gate, till in the fields, fight in their armies, and grovel at their feet for starvation wages. All feminist innovation and legislation creates new rights for women and new duties for men; thus it tends towards the creation of a male underclass.
> –Adam Kostakis, Lecture 11. The Eventual Outcome of Feminism, Part II, Gynocentrism theory Lectures (2011)

> “So, here is the definition I offer up: feminism is the most recent, and presently the most culturally dominant form of Gynocentrism. It is a victim ideology which explicitly advocates female supremacy, at every facet of life in which men and women meet; it does so in accordance with its universalizing tendency, and so it does so in each sphere of life, including but extending beyond the political, social, cultural, personal, emotional, sexual, spiritual, economic, governmental and legal. By female supremacy, I refer to the notion that women should possess superiority of status, power and protection relative to men. It is the dominant cultural paradigm in the Western world and beyond. It is morally indefensible, although its adherents ensure that their hegemony goes unchallenged through the domination of societal institutions and the use of state violence.”
> –Adam Kostakis, Lecture 2. Pig Latin, Gynocentrism theory Lectures (2011)

Peter Wright

> “Gynocentric chivalry is alluded to by alternative terms such as benevolent sexism, romantic love, gentlemanliness, courtesy, gallantry, heroism, or simply > chivalry. The practice has roots in what some scholars have referred to as ‘love service,’ (Bennett, 2013) a ritualized form of devotion by men toward women popularized by troubadours in the Middle Ages. The earliest conceptualization of love service borrowed from the vocabulary of medieval feudalism, mimicking ties between a liegeman and his overlord; i.e., the male lover is referred to as homo ligius (the woman’s liegeman, or ‘my man’) who pledged honor, and servitium (service) to the lady via a posture of feudal homage. The lady was addressed as midons (literally ‘my lord’), and also by dominus (denoting the feudal Lady) (Alfonsi, 1986). These practices form the ideological taproot of modern romantic chivalry.

>
> The conventions and indeed the lived practices of romantic chivalry celebrated first among the upper classes made their way by degrees eventually to the middle classes and finally to the lower classes – or rather they broke class structure altogether in the sense that all Western peoples became inheritors of the customs regardless of their social station. Today chivalry is a norm observed across the majority of global cultures, an explicitly gynocentric norm aimed to increase the comfort, safety and power of women, while affording men a sense of purpose and occasional heroism in addressing that same task.
>
> C.S. Lewis referred to the growth of romantic chivalry as “the feudalisation of love,” (Lewis, 2013, p. 2) making the observation that it has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched. He observed that European society has moved essentially from a social feudalism, involving a contractual arrangement between a feudal lord and his vassal, to a sexual feudalism involving a comparable contract between men and women as symbolized in the act of a man going down on one knee to propose marriage.
> — Peter Wright, Bastardized Chivalry: From Concern for Weakness to Sexual Exploitation, New Male Studies Journal, December 2018
>
> “The dominant features of gender relations today come from old Europe in the forms of damseling, chivalry and courtly-love. Together they form the customs, in fact the essence, of modern gynocentric culture.
> –Peter Wright, Damseling, chivalry and courtly love (part one), (2016) (Gynocentrism.com)]

Dennis Gouws

> “This conservative approach to chivalry, one whose paternalism has surely outlived its usefulness in the twenty-first century, offers men little and confines them to a life of gynocentric pleasing and male disposability in the service of gynocentric chivalry. What this approach has in common with gender feminism is the way it suggests gynocentrism is essential and congruent with society—its natural and normal protocol—rather than being one philosophy among many. The second approach placed the onus on changing chivalry on women and their > expectations. Ashley suggested that “It is women who need to figure out what roles they would have men perpetuate, and encourage those over the less-preferred actions.” This approach completely objectifies men and empowers women to dictate what they want men to do to please women. It is gynocentric, strategic, and impersonal; it is a gender-feminist approach. As much of this chapter has suggested, it is harmful to men and women who seek gender equity.

>
> “Michael Kimmel (Kalish & Kimmel, 2010) popularized the concept of aggrieved entitlement which can succinctly be defined as “a gendered emotion, a fusion of that humiliating loss of manhood and the moral obligation and entitlement to get it back” (p. 454). Because Kimmel’s sympathies lie with gender feminism, he is uninterested in how this concept might apply to women’s behavior. Women might express aggrieved entitlement when they experience what they perceive to be a humiliating loss of the gynocentric privilege to which gynocentric chivalry, gender feminism, and hegemonic gynarchy have entitled them. Self-righteous, angry expressions of personal offense and even violent acts might result from their perceived moral obligation to regain their sense of gynocentric privilege. A cursory internet search of gender-feminist responses to men’s-issues speakers on campus and to the establishing men’s groups or other male-positive spaces on campus will provide examples of this aggrieved entitlement.”

Peter Ryan

> I define gynocentrism as the following: The set of elements of society and relationships that are directed by the intent to prioritise female well-being over male well-being, based solely or partly on the sex of the intended beneficiary(ies) being female and for which there are no equivalent efforts made to provide corresponding commensurate benefits to males.
>
> I define well-being as the quality of the overall condition of the life of an individual or group, that is based on taking their mental and physical health and life satisfaction into consideration.
>
> The diagnostic criteria that must be met for an element of society or relationships to be considered gynocentric are the following: 1. The element must be driven by the intent to prioritise female well-being over male well-being. 2. This intent must be solely or partly based on the sex of the intended beneficiary(ies) being female. 3. There must be no equivalent efforts made to provide commensurate benefits to males for instances where female well-being is prioritised over male well-being.”

> –Peter Ryan, Diagnosing Gynocentrism (2018)(gynocentrism.com).

Elizabeth Hobson

> Gynocentrism arose in the late Middle Ages. Queen consort of France and England, Eleanor of Acquitaine spearheaded a movement within her court to subvert the chivalric code (which had traditionally governed relations between knights and lords) to regulate the behaviour of men towards women. These women initiated a system of romantic feudalism wherein noble men were under irresistible pressure to identify a lady as midons (my lord) and to submit to her will and delicately accept any scorn that her midons saw fit to extend to him. Eleanor established "Courts of Love" in which she and her noble women would administer "justice" in romantic disputes. Not only may many men in particular recognise this state of gender relations, but the modus operandi that Eleanor and company used to achieve their supremacy is entirely familiar: generalizations about all men based on the poor behaviour of a minority, asserting that women need protection from men's violations, and a narrative of women's moral superiority justifying their dictatorship. Within 200 years, Eleanors' ideas had spread and saturated throughout Europe and throughout the class system.

Bio-gynocentrism: Turning Science Into Goddess Worship

March 13, 2022 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

The Rationalisation Of Bigotry

Bio-gynocentrism was first coined by Vernon Meigs in his article The Eight Traits Of A Bio-gynocentrist[1], to describe people that resort to twisted interpretations of human biology and evolution to justify the practice of male chivalry and the pedestalisation of women in our gynocentric culture. Bio-gynocentrism attempts to rationalise gynocentrism as what nature intended and therefore an ideal to aspire to. Bio-gynocentrism is an example of the naturalistic fallacy and the fallacy of appealing to nature[2].

Bio-gynocentrism is based on the underlying assumption that because something that favours women is perceived to have a biological basis to it and be good for women, it must therefore be good for society and what is optimal for society. This is despite numerous examples where traits and behaviours that have a biological or evolutionary basis to them, actually produce dysfunctional and also evolutionary maladaptive outcomes. The instinctual forces driving addiction and obesity in the modern world and our superresponses to supernormal stimuli[3], are such examples where our evolved biology can express itself in exaggerated and maladaptive ways. The psychology of gynocentrism itself shares a great degree of similarity with addiction and is one example of a dysfunctional superresponse to superstimuli[4].

Expanding on Vernon Meigs article, I would define bio-gynocentrism more broadly as the selective interpretation of scientific research in the biological sciences through a gynocentric lens that favours women, omits information to the contrary and consequently is disconnected from broader reality. Bio-gynocentrism is in essence the women are wonderful effect[5] expressing itself in the interpretation and dissemination of scientific research on human biology and evolution.

Bio-gynocentrism is quite prolific not just from the commentary of scientific research in the mainstream media and social media, but also within academia itself. Gynocentrism is fundamentally a bias in human perception and behavior that favours women over men. Bio-gynocentrism is one of the ways gynocentrism manifests itself in skewing our perception of reality and is a form of gamma bias[6]. Bio-gynocentrism can be observed[7] when looking at how people respond to research on sex differences and can be identified and critiqued even when examining work[8] within the supposedly objective scientific community itself. Bio-gynocentrism is also reflected in the general attitudes held in society about men and women[9] and their perceived strengths.

There are two main examples of bio-gynocentrism and they overlap considerably.

1. Arguments put forward by female supremacists that women are inherently biologically superior to men[10]. They often cherry-pick and spin facts about sex differences in genetics and scholastic achievement for example to convey a narrative that supports their conclusion that women are superior and then casually omit or downplay the vast quantity of information that does not support their preconceived conclusion of female superiority.

A classic example of this can be seen from an excellent critique by one learned reviewer[11] of a book[12] making the absurdly broad generalisation that women are genetically superior to men. Books like this from bio-gynocentrists in academia are common. They are examples of the women are wonderful effect in academia undermining the objectivity of scientific research.

The male sex that produced the works of Einstein, Newton, Shakespeare and Beethoven, invented the aeroplane, discovered and harnessed electricity, split the atom and landed on the moon, is regarded as inferior by bio-gynocentrists. Like horses with blinders on, bio-gynocentrists are incapable of objectively assessing human biology without becoming fixated on satisfying their desire to pedestalise women and developing tunnel vision.

Beliefs in the supposed inherent superiority of women, are often based on extreme and simplistic generalisations like other forms of bigotry. Briffault's law is another example of such a generalisation, which is based on the implied assumption of female social omnipotence (see articles where I debunk that myth here[13] and here[14]).

2. Arguments put forward by female supremacists and gynocentric traditionalists, that women are more valuable than men because women are supposedly more important to the continuation of the community as a result of being the rate limiting factor of reproduction. These arguments are collectively called the golden uterus dogma.

Reducing The Complexity Of Human Biology Down To Goddess Worship

On the surface these simplistic biogynocentric arguments appear to make logical sense. However, on closer examination the arguments are actually highly reductive and omit many important facts as a consequence of the selective cherry-picking of scientific information and the skewed evaluation of the information that is reported. Like the feminist position on the gender wage gap, bio-gynocentrism dramatically simplifies complex multivariate aspects of biology and evolution and in the process grossly mischaracterises them.

For example, whilst the female role in reproduction is important, the golden uterus argument fails to adequately consider the importance of the male role in ensuring the continued survival of the community so that people can reproduce in the first place and also raise any resultant offspring to sexual maturity. Such a reductive overemphasis on reproduction, also ignores the limited carrying capacity of the environment to sustain high rates of reproduction and the reality that our species has a slow rate of reproduction in comparison to other forms of life and did not evolve to place enormous importance on reproduction.

Adherents of the golden uterus dogma will argue that a population that loses most of its women will struggle to replace itself, but then fail to differentiate such an extreme reality from the more common reality that populations generally have a surplus number of women beyond the critical minimum amount required and can actually tolerate a significant loss of women. These sycophants of the golden uterus, also fail to consider that a population that loses most of its men will struggle to survive and may not live long enough to even have a chance at replacing itself or ensure enough offspring live to adulthood.

The golden uterus argument for gynocentrism, also begs the question why do we protect women over 40 whom have limited or zero prospects of giving birth to healthy live offspring? The reality is the golden uterus dogma is not just a weak rationalisation for gynocentrism, it is also a weak explanation for its pervasiveness in society.

There many other factors and details beyond what I have raised here which the golden uterus argument omits (please refer to this article[15] for more information). Unsurprisingly, it is the enormous level of detail and nuance in human biology and evolution that bio-gynocentrism fails to take into consideration, which ultimately undermines its validity in a way that is fatal and unrecoverable.

As I have discussed before in previous articles, bio-gynocentrism is an example of categorical thinking[16] which Prof. Sapolsky described in his first lecture on behavioural biology citing numerous horrific examples of it involving prominent scientists in the 20th century. When we oversimplify and overgeneralise complex biological systems like human biology, we can make horrific mistakes. When we don't recognise what led to our mistakes, we are destined to repeat those mistakes.

We should stop and pause on the implications of applying a biogynocentric perspective on human behaviour and biology and the consequences that will flow from it. The same thinking behind bio-gynocentrism, is the same type of lazy thinking behind the scientific racism and eugenics observed in the early 20th century. Bio-gynocentrism is just a different flavour of the same backward thinking.

Bio-gynocentrism fails to account for the fact that human males and females are part of one biological system that replicates itself. Both the human male and human female are equally essential components to that system. The male and the female have coevolved to perform different, but complementary and equally important roles in the propagation of the genome.

We cannot consider the relative strengths of women or men, without considering how they are interlinked with the strengths of the other sex. Neither sex alone can perform their biological role in a way that leads to the propagation of the genome and the continuation of the community, without the other sex adequately performing their biological role.

The evolutionary dynamics of Fishers principle[17] generates an equal parental investment in producing male and female offspring and this focuses the forces of natural selection and sexual selection to drive a sexually interdependent coevolution in which both males and females share equal importance toward the propagation of the genome. There is a selective pressure to select against imbalances where the propagation of the genome is more dependent on one sex than the other and where the dynamics of Fishers principle operates and drives equal parental investment in the production of male and female offspring.

Over many tens of millions of years of evolution within the constraints of Fishers principle, our lineage has produced a male and female sex that are both equally valuable to the propagation of the genome. It cannot be any other way when there is a natural force driving equal parental investment in male and female offspring and a distinct evolutionary disadvantage in relying too heavily on one sex, especially over timescales of tens of millions of years.

Consider the reasoning behind diversifying a market portfolio to minimise risk, or the old adage to not put all your eggs in one basket. Being overly reliant on one half of the population to continue the community and propagate the genome from an evolutionary perspective, represents a significant risk and a cost that over long timescales of tens of millions of years would have been selected against under evolutionary pressures.

Natural selection and sexual selection would have favoured males that contributed equally to the burden of supporting the community and the propagation of the genome. That is precisely what we see when we examine male traits and observe male behaviour in our species and the multitude of ways men have kept the community and their children alive both directly and indirectly in prehistoric times and right up until the modern day.

If men walked off the job for one day today, many people would die. If men walked away from their tribe many tens of thousands of years ago for one day, there may not have been a tribe left to return to. These are the realities our gynocentric culture and bio-gynocentrists will never acknowledge or fully appreciate.

The reality is that if the female role in reproduction truly had the level of importance bio-gynocentrists place in it, then all life on this planet would reproduce asexually. If bio-gynocentrists were right, producing males and sexually reproducing would be too costly and wasteful. If bio-gynocentrists were right, then where sexual reproduction did emerge, any species would strictly be comprised of hermaphrodites since having half the population unable to give birth to offspring would again be too costly and wasteful.

Bio-gynocentrism does not leave any room to consider the biological value the male sex might provide to the continuation of a population and a species. It does not permit any consideration of how a male biological role might actually be extremely adaptive and drive evolution to favour a sex that does not give birth and instead contributes to the propagation of a species in other ways. Socially contributing to community survival may actually have greater value than simply gestating offspring and lactating and feeding small infants, especially in harsh climates and scarce habitats.

One has to simply ask why women do more than just gestate and feed offspring when supporting their community, to see the short sightedness in overemphasising the female role in pregnancy and looking after infants. These are certainly important activities for a community to perpetuate its existence, but so are many of the activities related to community survival that men predominantly do. The golden uterus is simply not as important as bio-gynocentrists assert it is and that reality is glaringly obvious when considering hunter-gatherer communities in harsh environments, past civilisations and the challenges they faced and also modern civilisation.

Pedestalising Women Is Not For The Greater Good Of Society Or Science

The greater good of the community is also often conflated with prioritising what is best for women thanks to bio-gynocentrism. This is despite ample evidence that when a society prioritises the female sex over other interests, it routinely neglects to address matters of great importance and also the well-being of the very men civilisation is dependent on to sustain itself.

The reality is that when a society puts men down to lift women up, fertility rates plummet as a result of courtship, relationships, marriage and family formation being undermined. When a society puts men down to lift women up, fatherlessness becomes widespread and so does the serious social and economic consequences that flow from that. When a society puts men down to lift women up, it undermines its economic productivity and its primary source of innovation because it is predominantly men driving essential sectors supporting GDP and consumer spending, inventing new technology and making major discoveries and contributing the bulk of tax revenue.

When a society puts men down to lift women up, it compromises its own national security and safety, as crime goes up and civil unrest becomes more frequent from directionless young men and external threats become harder to challenge from a weakened society that has marginalised and disincentivised it's male protectors and armed forces.

Gynocentric cultures are cultures of death and not cultures of life. They do not replace themselves and they do not socially, economically or militarily sustain themselves. Karen Straughan called the process of decline from gynocentrism the Fempocalypse[18]. The long process of decline and the slow gradual collapse of society from gynocentrism in tandem with other destructive forces in our culture, has already begun. Gynocentric cultures of death rely on endless debt and migration to stave off their inevitable decline, but eventually they socially and economically implode from within and are overtaken by cultures that do have a functional non-gynocentric social balance between the sexes.

Bio-gynocentrism reduces our understanding of human biology and evolution by selectively omitting facts, evidence and perspectives that do not support a position that females are inherently superior or more valuable than males. Bio-gynocentrism hijacks legitimate biological science and research and converts them into gynocentric dogma that has more in common with a new age religion of female worship than actual science. Pedestalising women is not for the greater good of society or science.

They Really Do Hate Us

March 15, 2022 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

Recently I listened to a radio interview. Bettina Arndt was being interviewed by Merrick Watts. Bettina was trying to draw attention to the fact that Scott Morrison had appointed a woman to be the first National Suicide Prevention Adviser.

Bettina was angry because suicide is an issue overwhelmingly affecting men. She asked Merrick to imagine the outrage if a man was appointed National Adviser on Family Violence. There would be a rage filled protest regardless of the fact that men make up one third of all family violence victims.

Yet women are only one fourth (and sometimes less) of suicide victims and the issues which lead men and women to take their lives are very different.

Bettina was alarmed by the fact that Ms. Christine Morgan works in the field of mental health and was already claiming this was the major cause of male suicide.

Bettina explained that recent studies clearly show that mental health is not the major driver of male suicide-it is relationship break ups and all of the related complications which ensue.

We know how the family court treats men. It ruthlessly rips their children from their lives regardless of who was at fault.

If there is violence perpetrated upon the man, either physical or emotional, he has nowhere to turn for support. Society finds such men unimpressive and unworthy of any compassion or support. In fact, they are often derided and mocked or considered hopeless failures when they find themselves living in poverty or on the street.

She also pointed to the high rates of suicide in rural communities where financial crises and loneliness are major factors behind the high rate of suicide by male farmers.

During the rather fiery interview, Merrick proved to be a pathetic feminist cuck as are all men who work in the media.

Bettina pointed out the rather pertinent point that the word men did not appear in any of the government's official documentation on suicide prevention.

This fact was of no interest to Merrick.

I have written about this ubiquitous ploy in the past. It is truly a stunning revelation. One would think it would be impossible to write pages on the subject of suicide and not once mention the demographic which makes up 75-80% of all victims.

But our government manages to do just that on a regular basis.

This male invisibility when the subject of suicide is raised prompted me to revisit some other societal issues which overwhelmingly affect men but receive absolutely no gender orientated media coverage.

When I say "affect" I mean kill, cripple and wound.

Men make up around 94% of all victims of workplace injury and death. I want you to read this article on workplace death in Australia which appeared on the channel nine website two years ago.

Data reveals 157 Aussies left for work in 2019 and never came home

How do you like the headline? Men become “Aussies” Why don’t we refer to women killed in domestic violence incidents as Aussies?

Read it for yourself.

Where are the feminists demanding gender equity in most of these ten high paying professions? Diversity is wonderful for any workplace they tell us. In fact, it is crucial to have all demographics in our society reflected in the workplace.

Why so silent and invisible on these woefully male centric occupations?

Where are the quotas and affirmative action? Where are the breathless talk show hosts addressing this calamity?

> The 2019 fatality statistics obtained by nine.com.au reveal worker deaths rose slightly last year compared to 2018, when 144 people were fatally injured at work. Is it not breathtaking?

The word men does not appear in this article.

Yes. I must keep repeating it.

Can you begin to imagine how this article would be framed if 94% of all workplace deaths were female?

The word women would be in the headline and repeated at least ten times in the column.

It would also carry a paragraph telling us how this shocking imbalance is an indication of the lack of value we place on women's lives and a disgraceful reflection on our society's attitudes. It would demand change and prompt many editorials and head shaking speeches from politicians and tv hosts.

But it is men being crushed, crippled, blinded, amputated, burned and drowned. Therefore, we do not refer to their gender and we do not use any emotive language demanding a change to this imbalance and a call for gender equity in these deadly industries.

There are no editorials. No impassioned pleas for this carnage to end.

Nothing.

It can roll on forever as far as our society is concerned. Men die quietly and rarely complain about their life changing permanent injuries. They know their place. They understand they are not worthy of our tears and empathy.

Fifty-five women killed a year in family violence (and twenty to thirty men some years, but that is of no relevance) is called an epidemic. One hundred and fifty men dying at work has no name. Nobody has bothered to invent one to describe the loss of countless male lives.

I suppose it comes under the heading, “Shit Happens”

I located the government site on workplace death and injury to see whether men were given even a passing mention.

No.

At the end of pages of all kinds of categories and statistics with no reference to men, I came across this table for those who wished to request information on this matter.

No reference to fatalities by gender. None.

It is truly beyond belief.

Let us move on to another issue overwhelmingly involving men. Homelessness.

The first website I visited was the Homelessness Week 2021. Here is what I read.

> Launched by Minister Sukkar, Minister for Housing and Homelessness and hosted by the ABC's Patricia Karvelas, Dr Angela Jackson, Lead Economist, Equity Economics will talk about her report commissioned by the Everybody's Home campaign: Nowhere to go: the benefits of providing long term social housing to women who have experienced domestic and family violence. Angela will outline the impact of lack of access to social housing on women fleeing violence, and the economic benefits to women and the community of providing safe affordable homes, so women can rebuild their lives
> This will be followed by a panel discussion including including Jason Clare, Shadow Housing and Homelessness Minister, Senator Mehreen Faruqi, Greens spokesperson on housing and homelessness and Angela Jackson

So once again, when discussing an issue where 75 to 80% of all of the people living rough on the streets each night are men, we have a number of mainly female politicians urging us to do more to provide long term housing for, yes, you guessed correctly -women!

Most of the women classified as homeless are not living rough on the streets. They are in government funded accommodation. Because they do not own the accommodation they are listed as homeless. Yet men who are sleeping on concrete footpaths or on park benches and often in freezing, life threatening conditions are not even valued enough to be mentioned.

But the worst was yet to come.

It was as I perused a human rights website that I came across the most stunning confirmation of the hatred and contempt our government, media and society feel for males.

The following information was tables on the Australian Human Rights Commission website

I looked at the table of contents. It was quite long.

I drew a deep breath when I saw the reference 5.2 in the contents.

Women are significantly affected by homelessness

It explained that women make up 42% of the homeless

(but not those living rough on the streets. Another sleight of hand trick these sick creeps use)

Let me quote:

> Statistics suggest that as much as 42% of the homeless population in Australia is female. However, homeless women are often less visible than men and the extent to which homelessness affects women is often underestimated.[11] Homeless women tend to remain out of sight, away from areas where homeless people congregate, for fear of violence, rape or other abuse.[12]
>
> The major causes of homelessness amongst women include domestic violence, sexual assault and family breakdown. These experiences force women from their home, along with their children, in search of a safer place to live. Women in these situations may find they are unable to care for their children and may be forced to place them in the care of family, friends or social services. Some women do not identify themselves as homeless, but rather as targets of abuse, unable to return to their homes.[13]
>
> Women who are homeless or at risk of becoming homeless often lack control over their lives because they are dependent on others to provide accommodation. They may be pressured to enter into and remain in relationships that offer shelter, even if this places them at risk of harm, in order to meet their immediate needs and the needs of their families.[14]
>
> Women with disability are particularly vulnerable to homelessness. This is because they are more likely to face the causes of homelessness than men with disability and the general population. For example, women with disability have greater levels of unemployment, earn lower incomes and are at greater risk of physical and sexual abuse.[66]
>
> Women experiencing homelessness require specialised support services to cater for their particular needs. Such services include sexual assault and domestic violence counselling, pregnancy services, protection of physical safety, income support, and assistance with legal issues, such as parental rights.
>
> For more information on human rights issues facing women, see our webpage on Sex

Contents

It doesn't explain why disabled women are more vulnerable than disabled men or more likely to experience abuse.

It provides us with no insight into why far more of our men and boys are out on the streets. Perhaps they don't care enough to ask a few of them.

Here is the entire table of contents.

- 1. Homelessness is about human rights
- 2. What is homelessness?
- 3. What are some of the causes of homelessness?
- 4. How many people are affected by homelessness?
- 5. Who is affected by homelessness?
    - 5.1 Indigenous people are disproportionately affected by homelessness
    - 5.2 Women are significantly affected by homelessness
    - 5.3 Children and young people are disproportionately affected by homelessness
    - 5.4 People with mental illness are disproportionately affected by homelessness
    - 5.5 Refugees and asylum seekers are disproportionately affected by homelessness
- 6. How does homelessness impact on the enjoyment of human rights?
    - 6.1 Homelessness is a breach of the right to adequate housing
    - 6.2 Homelessness impacts on the right to health
    - 6.3 Homelessness impacts on the right to personal safety
    - 6.4 Homelessness impacts on the right to privacy
    - 6.5 Homelessness impacts on the right to an education
    - 6.6 Homelessness impacts on the right to work
    - 6.7 Homelessness impacts on the right to non-discrimination
    - 6.8 Homelessness impacts on the right to social security
    - 6.9 Homelessness impacts on the right to vote
    - 6.10 Homelessness impacts on the right to freedom of movement and freedom of association
    - 6.11 Homelessness impacts on the right to freedom of expression
    - 6.12 Homelessness impacts on the right to freedom from cruel, inhuman or degrading treatment or punishment
- 7. How does a human rights approach help address homelessness?
- 8. Useful links and resources

Men are not mentioned once. Using a simple subtraction equation we can see that men must make up at least 58% of the homeless according to their statistics on women's homelessness. It is of course far higher than that but I will settle for 58%.

How could any organization with integrity and genuine compassion deliberately remove the most badly affected demographic from sight on a website devoted to the problem which afflicts them?

The page informs us that:

> The release of the draft National Plan builds on the Morrison Government's commitment to a future free of gender violence, which is supported by the more than $2 billion investment in women's safety since 2013.
>
> The draft National Plan was informed by the National Summit on Women's Safety, the Parliamentary Inquiry into family, domestic and sexual violence, the Respect@Work report, the Wiyi Yani U Thangani (Women's Voices) report, and with expert guidance and advice from the National Plan Advisory Group and the Aboriginal and Torres Strait Islander Advisory Council on family, domestic and sexual violence.

How could it be possible that not one member of the committee or organization purporting to care about the issue of homelessness questioned the absence of the group we call men in the multiple pages of text in their documents?

It is inhuman and bigoted

It is toxic.

It is unimaginably cruel, cold and heartless.

These sick bastards truly hate men. They despise them.

This truth could not have been revealed any more emphatically than it was in that table of contents.

Imagine writing an article about the moon landing without mentioning Buzz Aldrin or Neil Armstrong.

Perhaps someone could write an article about the Holocaust without mentioning Jews.

Maybe a savvy sage could write an article about Waterloo without mentioning Napoleon.

None of the three suggested articles above should be considered any less unthinkable than the ones I have presented on suicide, family violence and work place death and injury.

I could weep when I think of the viciousness of this cancerous societal disease we are fighting.

It frightens me to be honest.

Before I finish let's have a look at the way our government presents data on Family Violence.

Perhaps I am mistaken. Perhaps they have reverted to gender neutrality for all social issues.

Let's see.

> National Plan to End Violence Against Women and Children 2022-32 draft released for public comment

The word women appeared eight times in the first two pages as well as in the title.

The second significant difference to the reporting on men's issues aside from not naming the demographic most affected was the powerful, emotive language used.

"It is a national shame!"

"Sadly, the rates of family, domestic and sexual violence remain persistently high."

"Shifting the dial on women's safety requires a national effort."

If you wish to see some truth on a page devoted to the invisible victims of family violence here is an excellent one.

There is no clearer, indisputably malignant proof of society's contempt and hatred for men as a collective than this appalling vanishing trick used by feminists every day.

One final observation.

I saw a headline today which informed me that eighty-one people were executed on last Saturday afternoon in Saudi Arabia .

Once again, the word men does not appear but a little further research proved my gut feeling to be one hundred percent true.

"Surprise surprise!

All of those heads were hacked off the shoulders of men. Every single one.

Colour me stunned.

Women being banned from driving until recently has garnered far more world-wide attention that the rather humdrum slaughter of men in Middle Eastern countries. A human rights organization said many had not committed crimes which are capital offenses and should never have been executed.

Tough luck.

They say Boko Haram kidnapped those schoolgirls because of their exasperation over the lack of any response in our western media and governments to their murder of hundreds of boys in Nigeria.

It does not matter what part of the world men are suffering- you can rest assured contempt for males and the utter lack of compassion shown when they are hurt or killed is a global phenomenon.

Corporate America Owns Feminism

March 24, 2022 | by Steve Brulé | Link | Original Link

I had not thought about this before but Hitler could not have gotten very far without supplies from the rest of the world, and top American Companies made a fortune selling to Germany during WWII. This book has the details and points out that American executives were never charged with war crimes because they have influence in the White House.

Wall Street tycoons also made a fortune running the global financial system like a giant pyramid scheme. They brought the world to its knees in 2008, and destroyed the lives of millions of ordinary people in the process. Caught red-handed they were far from contrite – they practically bragged about it – and were rewarded with even more money in the form of a government bailout. They immediately gave themselves bonuses and thumbed their noses at the "little people." Once again none of them were charged with any sort of crime because they control the White House.

The afore mentioned article points out that Hitler would not have gotten very far without the support of Corporate America, but neither would have Feminism. These same companies, with help from the White House, have been funding feminism around the world for over forty years. And you can bet that Corporate America does not spend 10 cents without expecting a return — a huge return in this case: a new form of slavery, and this time it's global Feminism is owned by Corporate America, and serves their interests. If that ever changes you can bet that the flow of money would stop within 15 minutes, since absolutely nothing but profit, which means power, concerns Corporate America. They make profit off men's (and women's) labor; they profit from divorce; they profit from men's early death because that means lower losses due to pension costs; they profit from men's early removal from the workforce because eliminating the old makes room for fresh, cheap young laborers.

They also profit from men's imprisonment, which is why they love private prisons, tougher sentences, and prison sentences for non-payment of Child Support. That's also why they continue to promote the discredited domestic violence statistics that support The Violence Against Women Act (VAWA). More prisoners means more profit. More prisoners means more slave prison-labor at 25 cents an hour. Even judges get in on the action by imprisoning kids for cash kickbacks from the private prisons. Corporate America will try to spread private prisons around the world because prisons mean profit and profit means power.

Feminists use corporate and government money to fund studies that use corrupt methodologies and falsified statistics in order to justify calls for increasingly harsh new laws and public policy against males. They have successfully created a false rape crisis and an imagined "rape culture," and have used this paranoia to expel male students from university without due process. They have successfully imprisoned men for child support and at the same time replaced women's prisons with sorority houses for female criminals, all while advocating for legalized husband-murder.

At every turn, feminists seek to reduce the opportunities available to males while expanding female privilege, and America applauds. Men who desperately seek female approval also applaud and see male-bashing as an opportunity to strut around as a knight in shining armor in a pathetic attempt to appear "alpha-like." Men's Rights Activists have identified these men as "White Knights."

There's nothing new about the business of inciting female dissatisfaction in order to control male behavior. DeBeers, for example, single-handedly popularized the diamond engagement ring by appealing to the competitive female ego, insisting that a woman should settle for nothing less than a diamond worth three months salary.

The British "White Feather campaign" during WWI was so successful at shaming men into enlisting that it also led to a spike in suicides among men who could not enlist. Returning disabled veterans who could not work were ridiculed for being a burden to their wives, and single disabled veterans were considered damaged goods and disqualified for marriage by the very women who shamed them into going to war.

It matters little to Corporate America whether men are herded into the divorce industry, the prison industry, an early grave, or chained to unending and inescapable debt. All roads lead to profit through lower wages and increased consumerism: he divorce industry transfers money to women, the top consumers; the prison industry is profitable and holds the slave-labor force; an early grave makes room for cheaper labor; and debt keeps a man chained to his job no matter how horrible the conditions.

What Corporate America fears most is a fiscally-responsible populace composed of families who value their own self-determined, financially-independent freedom over mindless consumption, greed, and ego. Hence they promote a culture obsessed with consumption, where greed is a virtue, and ego-centrism is celebrated as an achievement in our i-Everything world. After all, it's all about you, isn't it?

No, it’s not. It’s all about profit. The manipulation is so blatant that it’s embarrassing that it works. And it works because, yes, you are important. You are so important that it is imperative that you resist this shameful seduction.

Corporate America is not run by stupid people; these are dangerous, powerful people, and many of them are psychopaths and sociopaths. They see the rest of us as nothing more than “human capital” or “human resources,” on the same level as mineral resources, forestry resources, oil resources, and livestock resources. They love you like a farmer loves his cattle and they believe that they can count on the majority of people to sleepwalk straight into the killing pens.

The only way to stop them is to recognize that Corporate America is not serving our needs, it is herding us into the work-camps, work-prisons and the killing pens of a globalized world where only the elite will be free global-citizens. Social movements like BLM, Antifa and, especially, Feminism, are not “grass-roots” but are fully-funded and controlled by the same corporations that now control the government, and they are all in the business of eliminating our freedom. Some of the practical ways that we can counter their efforts include:

- Do not vote for anyone associated with the legacy political parties
- Support local small businesses whenever possible
- Do not support big “grass roots” social movements like feminism
- Support and promote men’s issues. It is ordinary men who invent, build, and maintain the entire world.
- Protect freedom of speech
- Protect the principle of presumption of innocence
- Break the Big Tech monopolies

We need to re-affirm and strengthen the central importance of the individual over the fantasy of “the greater good” because any and every restriction on personal freedom can be rationalized by an appeal to “the greater good.” which is the governing principle behind all collectivism be it socialism, fascism, corporatism or globalism.

But collectives don’t suffer, only individuals suffer. Collectives don’t help one another, individuals help one another. Collectives don’t experience hunger or have preferences, desires, dreams or fears.

The individual is the center of every experience, and no matter how many people you may lump into a group, there is still no collective identity that can ever justify actions to silence, punish or restrict the behavior of an innocent person seeking his own fulfillment. But placing “the greater good” over the individual always results in the elite leaders of the community lording their power over everyone else who then lose their freedom to seek their own fulfillment.

Trusting one another with the freedom of self-determination will lead to greater fulfillment and a more robust society than governments, institutions, and corporations and their “social movements” can or will ever bestow upon us.

The Slap

March 30, 2022 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

It was a nasty slap.

It spun the head of the victim sideways such was its force.

The assailant strode back to his seat amongst the bejeweled women with the calm confidence of a man who knows he is untouchable.

Some suggest his celebrity status was his iron clad armour.

His fame was what prevented security from rushing to the stage and pushing him to the ground with violent aggression as he was cuffed and dragged away from public view.

Others suggest it was the complexion of his skin which provided him with his comfortable certainty as he settled back into his seat and bellowed more threats at the man he had abused.

But they are wrong.

Had Will Smith performed the very same vicious assault upon Chris Rock but for an entirely different reason, his celebrity status, skin colour and woke credentials would never have spared him the ridicule and criticism which would have been spewed online and in the very room where the assault took place.

Let's imagine Will was outraged by a Chris Rock barb aimed at his acting ability or his ears which do stick out in rather Shrek like fashion.

Perhaps a joke about a mate's stature or bald dome could cause Will to stand in rage and issue the same retribution.

It would ultimately lead to ridicule and accusations of thin skin, oversensitivity and overreaction even from the pathetic hypocrites who had gathered for another afternoon of narcissism and mutual masturbation.

But Mr. Smith rose from his seat and strode purposefully up onto the stage with the righteous bearing of a man exacting a most just retribution. A revenge no civilized, thinking person could ever consider anything other than just and appropriate.

Mr. Rock had made a very mild joke about a woman.

The woman was Mr. Smith's wife.

Compare Rock's joke to this one spoken only a month earlier by a female host of an award show.

Earlier this month, when he missed the BAFTAs to stay in Los Angeles for the Critics Choice Awards, host Rebel Wilson quipped that his "best performance in the past year was being OK with all his wife's boyfriends".

Rebel Wilson calls out his wife's promiscuity — no outrage regarding this very personal barb. But a comment about his wife's hair. That demands a good physical assault.

Smith's woman is renowned for teaching her compliant husband that it is her right to fuck whoever takes her fancy whenever she feels the desire and it is his duty as her husband to support her stated needs unquestioningly.

Now, Smith's wife has alopecia. For some, it is a rather disconcerting affliction which can cause embarrassment and self-consciousness for sufferers. I draw the line at the oft repeated observation that it is far more devastating for a woman or girl than for a man or boy.

This game is a very tired one.

Females are apparently more badly affected by:
Natural disasters.
War.
Starvation.
Poverty.
Climate change.
Homelessness.
Violence.
Jokes about their appearance.
Alopecia.

You see the thinking is women are not used to the idea of losing their hair and it is not a common occurrence for females particularly at a young age, whereas young men have endured this affliction since Adam was a boy.

Yet nobody explains why this makes it any easier for a teenage boy or man in his early twenties to watch his hair slowly recede or indeed quickly reveal his bald skull and always to the great amusement of his friends, work colleagues, sport teammates and the media.

The fact that hair replacement therapy, spray on remedies and wigs are all a part of this multi-billion-dollar hair restoration industry gives a thinking person a clue as to how much this hair loss impacts a man's self-esteem, self-consciousness and sense of worth.

The only difference is society's attitude.

Men must accept the jokes and insults and at times simply cruel comments from both men and women with a smile and good grace. They have no choice. To display the slightest sign of embarrassment or hurt will only lead to an increase in the frequency of the cutting observations and cruel comments.

This is just another form of male privilege of which women have no earthly comprehension.

To even think about passing a comment on a woman's thinning or patchy hair would be sheer insanity in any social circle. The joker would be attacked as a cruel, unthinking, callous brute and made to understand in no uncertain terms that he (or she) is in fact the one who deserves to be mocked and shunned for stooping so low.

Men, as in most things, must grin and bear it.

Whether alopecia or inherited genes, the result is still the same.
Perhaps the only arena where a woman might be a target would be when a comedian is at work.

There is an implicit understanding when one sits before a comedian that he or she will say awkward and embarrassing things about people in general and even about people who may be sitting in front of them.
Some truly cutting remarks have been made by both male and female comedians over the years.

Chris Rock's comment about Mr. Smith's wife's buzz cut ranks as one of the least spiteful words to ever pass from a comic's lips at an award show.

In this day and age many women (as do many men) attempt to tackle nature head on at the first sign of a thinning thatch. They take a razor to their hair and shave it.

Some men and women get away with this look. In fact, some men and women look very stylish with a shaved head if they have the right shaped skull.

Jada Smith happens to be one of those people.

She knows she looks cool and that is why she chooses to appear in public with her shaved skull on show. Women with her wealth can wear the very best and most expensive wigs which are impossible to detect as fake.

Many famous women wear extensions all of the time.

Clearly, she is very happy with her look.

For her to claim to be deeply insulted by Chris Rock's reference to GI Jane is laughable.

He did not say she looked stupid or ugly. He said she looked like the actress in GI Jane. She does. There was no malice.

In the scheme of Oscar jokes it was one of the mildest, least offensive to be uttered.

Mel Gibson was called an alcoholic and anti-semite by Ricky Gervais yet when he walked on stage he smiled and embraced Gervais. Was he happy? Nope.

The slap delivered by Will Smith was all about female privilege.

Almost every women who was asked about the blow defended Smith's actions by suggesting mean comments about a man's wife demand a response. In fact, a real man and a real husband would do nothing less than violently assault the man who dared poke fun at his wife.

There was no suggestion from any woman that such a response would be just as appropriate had a man been eviscerated by a comedian's words.

This blow took place amongst women who loudly and proudly proclaim at every opportunity that they are in the business of being and promoting, strong, independent women. Is there any other kind in Hollywood?

Why was Jada incapable of speaking up for herself if she felt deeply wounded? What did she say to Will? What look did she give him that prompted such a quick change in attitude?

All of the strong, independent women were standing and applauding- dewy eyed and perhaps a little moist in another region as the batterer stood and accepted his Oscar while continuing to defend his assault on a much smaller man who had his hands behind his back when he was attacked.

He did it for his woman. And for all women. He's the man!

This is the very same attitude Hollywood would call toxic and a sign a man thinks he possesses or owns his woman if the action had been performed by a non-actor from the amongst the great unwashed.

Whether left or right in their political world view, the general consensus was that Smith's assault was perfectly understandable though not perhaps the best way to respond. Piers Morgan made this sickening observation and suggested he may have done the same.

Even when some conceded it may have been an over the top reaction there was much smirking, laughter and barely concealed joy on show amidst those who made comments about men standing up for their woman being a good thing to see.

Watching that mob of sycophants cheering and applauding an unhinged psychopath who forty-three minutes earlier viciously assaulted another man for making a mild joke about his wife, one could see the sheer impossibility of fighting to have violence against men taken seriously.

Had Smith slapped a woman, no matter how vicious and cutting her words, he would never work in Hollywood again. Mind you, it was an open-handed slap. There were many women in that room who are bigger and possibly stronger than Chris Rock who would have survived a slap just as Rock did.

Yet even a lesser slap on the cheek of a woman, or even the simple grab of a shoulder or angry finger in her face would end Hollywood careers.

Why? Why is the sting of a woman's cheek so much more offensive, immoral and shocking than the sting of a small, innocent man's face?

I've often argued that the argument about not hitting a woman being based upon size and strength differentials is a lie.

Tiny men can be beaten by huge men and nobody expresses the slightest concern about size and strength disparity. Such a disparity existed at the Oscars the other night.

That was perfectly acceptable.

We have created a culture where women are considered higher beings-morally, spiritually and physically.

If a white actor had struck Rock we might have another issue too. That is certain. But the overriding, unmistakable message being sent out to all who watched that moment is that there are many justifiable reasons to hit another man but none when it comes to any form of violence against a woman.

I felt despair as I watched news hosts and celebrities, including conservative John Voight voice their support for that abominable assault on Chris Rock.

And Rock let men down by deciding not to bring charges. This is not admirable. It is a gutless, weak response from a man who is scared he will be attacked a second time for calling out his abuse at the hands of a psychotic cuckold.

Read the following statement from a retired LAPD deputy Chief and just imagine him saying these same words had Will Smith slapped a woman. There is a sickening two-tiered justice system in the west which is far more pronounced than the skin colour justice gap we hear so much about.

> Stephen Downing, a retired LAPD deputy chief, said a case could be brought. But he said it was reasonable not to waste resources when Rock apparently wasn't injured or ruffled enough to file a complaint.
> "Rock carried on as if nothing happened to him," Downing said. "He didn't even put a hand to his cheek. There didn't appear to be an injury. If he had knocked him to the floor and rendered him unconscious, I think action would have been taken."

So, because Rock accepted the nasty slap with grace and dignity there is no case to answer. This is beyond disgusting.

Again. The law is as sexist as Hollywood. Would Mr. Downing say the same of a woman who had been slapped? I believe charges are pressed by the police even when the female victim refuses to bring them and begs the police to drop them.

Chris Rock's head was spun by the power of the blow but because he didn't fall to the ground there is nothing to see here?

Think of the endless lectures from the scum that gather for these awards. Lectures about the poisonous, vile nature of a certain politician. Think of the hideous comments made about him, his wife and children. Nobody said they were offensive and disgusting. Not one person called them out as highly inappropriate. They laughed and cheered every vile word and threat of violence, be it spoken by demented De Niro, the killer Baldwin, Cher or Bette Midler.

Hollywood must die. It is an idea passed its used by date. Its narcissism, stark hypocrisy, sexual corruption and vile violent politics are a shit stain on the soul of America.

Men Made This

I remember reading when I was younger a biography of the artist Jean Cocteau, how on his first plane trip he remarked how wonderful man was, enraptured by the technological marvel that was carrying him across the sky. Of course, by “man” he likely meant “humanity.” Years later I note how I have spent much of my time gazing on man’s works: his buildings, his art, his machinery. I can look at dock cranes or the engine of a vintage Bentley for hours. But unlike Cocteau, my awe is inspired in part because although I recognize the beauty of these things, I know that it is not man who is responsible, but men.

My favorite building is the Roman Pantheon. It contains the world’s largest unreinforced concrete dome which inscribes a perfect sphere 142 feet high. It has stood without collapsing for almost one thousand, nine hundred years. There is only one reason this building still stands aside from the engineering genius that built it: it’s indescribable beauty. As the barbarians sacked Rome they destroyed temples, villas, art. They burned it all or pulled it to the ground. But when they saw the Pantheon they were stopped dead in their tracks. They couldn’t bare to touch it. I recounted this tale to a younger man I knew, a rather self-conscious metrosexual who had actually seen and stood within the dome. He said that he had felt nothing. The Pantheon was nothing special.

What was it that those violent, masculine “barbarians” could see that my friend could not? I don’t have a complete answer for this, yet. Like so many young men I’ve known he was preoccupied with chivalry. He was heavily whipped and complained bitterly that his girlfriend had no understanding of him and no real interest. I wanted to shake him and tell him that with his beauty and strength the world was his. All he had to do was reach out and take it. But I doubt he ever will. Feminized, as at the Pantheon he looks at himself and does not see.

Men do not see the world like women do. The gaze of men projects outward into it; they see it, they take what they need from it, and they remake it anew. The gaze of women falls inward. The world becomes them, it exists for them. And thus, women do not build; they consume. It is not the vicissitudes of society or the education system that makes women like this. It is their nature. And, I hazard a guess that few others have made, that because of the consumptive nature of women and of men’s desire to give them every comfort and convenience that we are eating ourselves alive.

I wonder, if the genius of men were fully recognized where would we be now? The ancient Greeks developed the steam engine some two thousand years ago but saw it as no more than an amusing toy. Another kind of engine, a mechanical computer called a difference engine, was conceived by Charles Babbage nearly two hundred years ago, but a lack of vision in the general public meant Babbage could never acquire the funds to build it.

Those societies, the ancient Greek and the Victorian, are perceived by history to be patriarchal and every advantage given to the men who lived in them. But both societies had large populations of slaves and most men were anything but their own masters. What will we be able to do, what wonders will we be able to build, when men are finally, for the first time in human history, truly free?

The trouble with testosterone: Will boys just be boys?

April 4, 2022 | by Dr. Robert Sapolsky | Link | Original Link

Face it, we all do it. We all believe certain stereotypes about certain minorities. The stereotypes are typically pejorative and usually false. But every now and then, they are true. I write apologetically as a member of a minority about which the stereotypes are indeed true. I am male. We males account for less than 50 percent of the population, yet we generate a disproportionate percentage of the violence. Whether it is something as primal as having an ax fight in an Amazonian clearing or as detached as using a computer-guided aircraft to strafe a village, something as condemned as assaulting a cripple or as glorified as killing someone wearing the wrong uniform, if it is violent, males excel at it.

Why should that be? We all think we know the answer. A dozen millennia ago or so, an adventurous soul managed to lop off a surly bull's testicles and thus invented behavioral endocrinology. It is unclear from the historical records whether this individual received either a grant or tenure as a result of the experiment, but it certainly generated an influential finding–something or other comes out of the testes that helps to make males such aggressive pains in the ass.

That something or other is testosterone.[1] The hormone binds to specialized receptors in muscles and causes those cells to enlarge. It binds to similar receptors in laryngeal cells and gives rise to operatic basses. It causes other secondary sexual characteristics, makes for relatively unhealthy blood vessels, alters biochemical events in the liver too dizzying to even contemplate, has a profound impact, no doubt, on the workings of cells in big toes. And it seeps into the brain, where it binds to those same "androgen" receptors and influences behavior in a way highly relevant to understanding aggression.

What evidence links testosterone with aggression? Some pretty obvious stuff. Males tend to have higher testosterone levels in their circulation than do females (one wild exception will be discussed later) and tend to be more aggressive. Times of life when males are swimming in testosterone (for example, after reaching puberty) correspond to when aggression peaks. Among numerous species, testes are mothballed most of the year, kicking into action and pouring out testosterone only during a very circumscribed mating season- precisely the time when male aggression soars.

Impressive, but these are only correlative data, testosterone repeatedly being on the scene with no alibi when some aggression has occurred. The proof comes with the knife, the performance of what is euphemistically known as a “subtraction” experiment. Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet. Reinstate normal testosterone levels afterward with injections of synthetic testosterone, and aggression returns.

To an endocrinologist, the subtraction and replacement paradigm represents pretty damning proof: this hormone is involved. “Normal testosterone levels appear to be a prerequisite for normative levels of aggressive behavior” is the sort of catchy, hummable phrase that the textbooks would use. That probably explains why you shouldn’t mess with a bull moose during rutting season. But that’s not why a lot of people want to understand this sliver of science. Does the action of this hormone tell us anything about individual differences in levels of aggression, anything about why some males, some human males, are exceptionally violent? Among an array of males –human or otherwise- are the highest testosterone levels found in the most aggressive individuals?

Generate some extreme differences and that is precisely what you see. Castrate some of the well-paid study subjects, inject others with enough testosterone to quadruple the normal human levels, and the high-testosterone males are overwhelmingly likely to be the more aggressive ones. However, that doesn’t tell us much about the real world. Now do something more subtle by studying the normative variability in testosterone-–in other words, don’t manipulate anything, just see what everyone’s natural levels are like–and high levels of testosterone and high levels of aggression still tend to go together. This would seem to seal the case-–interindividual differences in levels of aggression among normal individuals are probably driven by differences in levels of testosterone. But this turns out to be wrong.

Okay, suppose you note a correlation between levels of aggression and levels of testosterone among these normal males. This could be because (a) testosterone elevates aggression; (b) aggression elevates testosterone secretion; (c) neither causes the other. There’s a huge bias to assume option a, while b is the answer! Study after study has shown that when you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive. The subsequent behavioral differences drive the hormonal changes, rather than the other way around.

When you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive.

Because of a strong bias among certain scientists, it has taken forever to convince them of this point. Behavioral endocrinologists study what behavior and hormones have to do with each other. How do you study behavior? You get yourself a notebook and a stopwatch and a pair of binoculars. How do you measure the hormones? You need a gazillion-dollar machine, you muck around with radiation and chemicals, wear a lab coat, maybe even goggles- the whole nine yards. Which toys would you rather get for Christmas? Which facet of science are you going to believe in more? Because the endocrine aspects of the business are more high-tech, more reductive, there is a bias to think that it is somehow more scientific, more powerful. This is a classic case of what is often called physics envy, the disease among scientists where the behavioral biologists fear their discipline lacks the rigor of physiology, the physiologists wish for the techniques of the biochemists, the biochemists covet the clarity of the answers revealed by molecular biologists, all the way down until you get to the physicists, who confer only with God. Hormones seem to many to be more real, more substantive, than the ephemera of behavior, so when a correlation occurs, it must be because hormones regulate behavior, not the other way around.

As I said, it takes a lot of work to cure people of that physics envy, and to see that interindividual differences in testosterone levels don't predict subsequent differences in aggressive behavior among individuals. Similarly, fluctuations in testosterone levels within one individual over time do not predict subsequent changes in the levels of aggression in that one individual – get a hiccup in testosterone secretion one afternoon and that's not when the guy goes postal.

Look at our confusing state: normal levels of testosterone are a prerequisite for normal levels of aggression, yet changing the amount of testosterone in someone's bloodstream within the normal range doesn't alter his subsequent levels of aggressive behavior. This is where, like clockwork, the students suddenly start coming to office hours in a panic, asking whether they missed something in their lecture notes.

Yes, its going to be on the final exam, and its one of the more subtle points in endocrinology- what is referred to as a hormone having a "permissive effect". Remove someone's testes and, as noted, the frequency of aggressive behavior is likely to plummet. Reinstate precastration levels of testosterone by injecting that hormone, and precastration levels of aggression typically return. Fair enough. Now this time, castrate an individual and restore testosterone levels to only 20 percent of normal and … amazingly, normal precastration levels of aggression come back. Castrate and now generate twice the testosterone levels from before castration- and the same level of aggressive behavior returns. You need some testosterone around for normal aggressive behavior – zero levels after castration, and down it usually goes; quadruple it (the sort of range generated in weight lifters abusing anabolic steroids), and aggression typically increases. But anywhere from roughly 20 percent of normal to twice normal and it's all the same; the brain can’t distinguish among this wide range of basically normal values.

We seem to have figured out a couple of things by now. First, knowing the differences in the levels of testosterone in the circulation of a bunch of males will not help you much in figuring out who is going to be aggressive. Second, the subtraction and reinstatement data seem to indicate that, nevertheless, in a broad sort of way, testosterone causes aggressive behavior. But that turns out not to be true either, and the implications of this are lost on most people the first thirty times you tell them about it. Which is why you’d better tell them about it thirty-one times, because it is the most important point of this piece.

Round up some male monkeys. Put them in a group together, and give them plenty of time to sort out where they stand with each other- affiliative friendships, grudges, and dislikes. Give them enough time to form a dominance hierarchy, a linear ranking system of numbers 1 through 5. This is the hierarchical sort of system where number 3 monkey, for example, can pass his day throwing around his weight with numbers 4 and 5, ripping off their monkey chow, forcing them to relinquish the best spots to sit in, but, at the same time, remembering to deal with numbers 1 and 2 with shit-eating obsequiousness.

Hierarchy in place, it’s time to do your experiment. Take that third ranking monkey and give him some testosterone. None of this within-the-normal-range stuff. Inject a ton of it into him, way higher than what you normally see in a rhesus monkey; give him enough testosterone to grow antlers and a beard on every neuron in his brain. And, no surprise, when you then check the behavioral data, it turns out that he will probably be participating in more aggressive interactions than before.

So even though small fluctuations in the levels of the hormone don’t seem to matter much, testosterone still causes aggression. But that would be a wrong conclusion. Check out number 3 more closely. Is he now raining aggressive terror on any and all in the group, frothing in an androgenic glaze of indiscriminate violence? Not at all. He’s still judiciously kowtowing to numbers 1 and 2, but has simply become a total bastard to numbers 4 and 5. This is critical: testosterone isn’t causing aggression, it’s exaggerating the aggression that’s already there.

Another example just to show we’re serious. There’s a part of your brain that probably has lots to do with aggression, a region called the amygdala.[2] Sitting right near it is the Grand Central Station of emotion-related activity in your brain, the hypothalamus. The amygdala communicates with the hypothalamus by way of a cable of neuronal connections called stria terminalis. No more jargon, I promise. The amygdala has its influence on aggression via that pathway, with bursts of electrical excitation called action potentials that ripple down the stria terminalis, putting the hypothalamus in a pissy mood.

Once again, do your hormonal intervention; flood the area with testosterone. You can do that by injecting the hormone into the bloodstream, where it eventually makes its way to this part of the brain. Or you can be elegant and surgically microinject the stuff directly into this brain region. Six of one, half a dozen of the other. The key thing is what doesn’t happen next. Does testosterone now cause there to be action potentials surging down the stria terminalis? Does it turn on that pathway? Not at all! If and only if the amygdala is already sending an aggression-provoking volley of action potentials down the stria terminalis, testosterone increases the rate of such action potentials by shortening the resting time between them. It's not turning on the pathway, it's increasing the volume of signaling if it is already turned on. It's not causing aggression, it's exaggerating the preexisting pattern of it, exaggerating the response to environmental triggers of aggression.

This transcends issues of testosterone and aggression. In every generation, it is the duty of behavioral biologists to try to teach this critical point, one that seems a maddening cliché once you get it. You take that hoary old dichotomy between nature and nurture , between biological influences and environmental influences, between intrinsic factors and extrinsic ones, and, the vast majority of the time, regardless of which behavior you are thinking about and what underlying biology you are studying, the dichotomy is a sham. No biology. No environment. Just the interaction between the two.

Do you want to know how important environment and experience are in understanding testosterone and aggression? Look back at how the effects of castration were discussed earlier. There were statements like "Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet." Not "Remove the source … and aggression always goes to zero." On average it declines, but rarely to zero, and not at all in some individuals. And the more social experience an individual had being aggressive prior to castration, the more likely that behavior persists sans cojones. Social conditioning can more than make up for the hormone.

Another example, one from one of the stranger corners of the animal kingdom: If you want your assumptions about the nature of boy beasts and girl beasts challenged, check out the spotted hyena. These animals are fast becoming the darlings of endocrinologists, sociobiologists, gynecologists, and tabloid writers. Why? Because they have a wild sex-reversal system- females are more muscular and more aggressive than males and are socially dominant over them, rare traits in the mammalian world. And get this: females secrete more of certain testosterone-related hormones than males do, producing the muscles, the aggression (and, as a reason for much of the gawking interest in these animals, wildly masculinized private parts that make it supremely difficult to tell the sex of the hyena). So this appears to be a strong vote for the causative powers of high androgen levels in aggression and social dominance. But that's not the whole answer. High up in the hills above the University of California at Berkley is the world's largest colony of spotted hyenas, massive bone-crunching beasts who fight with each other for the chance to have their ears scratched by Laurence Frank, the zoologist who brought them over as infants from Kenya. Various scientists are studying their sex-reversal system. The female hyenas are bigger and more muscular than the males and have the same weirdo genitals ands elevated androgen levels that their female cousins do back in the savannah. Everything is in place except … the social system is completely different from that in the wild. Despite being stoked on androgens, there is a very significant delay in the time it takes for the females to begin socially dominating the males- they're growing up without the established social system to learn from.

When people first grasp the extent to which biology has something to do with behavior, even subtle, complex, human behavior, there is often an initial evangelical enthusiasm of the convert, a massive placing of faith in the biological components of the story. And this enthusiasm is typically of a fairly reductive type–because of physics envy, because reductionism is so impressive, because it would be so nice if there were a single gene or hormone or neurotransmitter or part of the brain that was it, the cause, the explanation of everything. And the trouble with testosterone is that people tend to think this way in an arena that really matters.

This is no mere academic concern. We are a fine species with some potential. Yet we are racked with sickening amounts of violence. Unless we are hermits, we feel the threat of it, often as a daily shadow. And regardless of where we hide, should our leaders push the button, we will all be lost in a final global violence. But as we try to understand and wrestle with this feature of our sociality, it is critical to remember the limits of biology. Testosterone is never going to tell us much about the suburban teenager who, in his after-school chess club, has developed a particularly aggressive style with his bishops. And it certainly isn't going to tell us much about the teenager in some inner—city hellhole who has taken to mugging people. "Testosterone equals aggression" is inadequate for those who would offer a simple excuse: Boys will be boys and certain things in nature are inevitable. Violence is more complex than a single hormone. This is endocrinology for the bleeding heart liberal – our behavioral biology is usually meaningless outside the context of social factors and environment in which is occurs.

Notes:

[1] Testosterone is one of a family of related hormones, collectively known as "androgens" or "anabolic steroids." They all are secreted by the testes or are the result of a modification of testosterone, they all have similar chemical structure, and they all do roughly similar things. Nonetheless, androgen mavens spend entire careers studying the important differences in the actions of different androgens. I am going to throw that subtlety to the wind and, for the sake of simplification that will horrify many, will refer throughout to all of these related hormones as "testosterone."

[2] And no one has shown that differences in the size or shape of the amygdala, or differences in the numbers of neurons in it, can begin to predict differences in normal levels of aggression. Same punch line as with testosterone.

Crews, eds., Behavioral Endocrinology (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1992), 261. This also has an overview of the hyena social system, as Glickman heads the study of the Berkley hyenas. I have emphasized that while testosterone levels in the normal range do not have much to do with aggression, a massive elevation of exposure, as would be seen in anabolic steroid abusers, does usually increase aggression. For a recent study in which even elevating into that range (approximately five times normal level) still had no effect on mood or behavior, see S. Bhasin, T. Storer, N. Berman, and colleagues, “The Effects of Supra-physiologic Doses of Testosterone on Muscle Size and Strength in Normal Men,” New England Journal of Medicine 335 (1996): 127.

The study showing that raising testosterone levels in the middle-ranking monkey exaggerates preexisting patterns of aggression can be found in A. Dixon and J. Herbert, “Testosterone, Aggressive Behavior and Dominance Rank in Captive Adult Male Talapoin Monkeys (Miopithecus talapoin), ” Physiology and Behavior 18 (1977): 539. Toil and Trouble – Thoughts on Two Gynocentric Demands on Men

April 5, 2022 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Although what you are about to read is not actually an analysis of the Three Witches of Shakespeare's MacBeth, the general meaning of a part of their famous incantation "Double double, toil and trouble" is just as it sounds: the intent to cause toils and troubles for humankind for the sake of causing them. Perhaps it is apt to use the Three Witches as an analogy for those that demand and expect toil and trouble…in particular for malekind. It is worth seriously contemplating whether women of gynocentric society wish to see more trouble in the form of men's chivalric self-abnegating behavior, and toil for men as a way of life. Here are some thoughts on these two kinds of demands on men.

"I Would Die For You": The Male Expendability Kink

Whenever we see men in the business of saving lives, the praises of these men tend to have a common denominator: hooray for men risking their lives and well-being. These men, sometimes even boys, end up damaged in the process of performing their given heroic act. More than enough of them die. News of such occurrences make women who profess to long for the gender roles of old gush and fawn for these men willing to offer their lives. Men who invest a lot in what women think of them follow suit by saying this is what manhood is about and declares "not men" those who would dare to complain about this role they are placed in.

Just as a thought experiment, what if a man devised a way to save more and more lives while rendering the necessity of risk to the rescuer negligible or completely obsolete? Call me crazy, but I'll bet that the fawning will subside. In fact, I would dare say that it is not the wonderful act of saving a life that these women are grateful for, or these ever-chivalrous men want to measure up to. What they profess to be grateful for is rather the willingness for the man to be of service and self-expense for the good of our gynocentric society. When a man is expended or put in a position where he may be expended, it is a sensation for those who believe in the so-called traditional gender roles. If a man doesn't, it doesn't matter then if he did engage in a life-saving act; self-preservation is seen as cowardly and unmasculine. Whether it is a neotraditional or a feminist society, the standard for men and masculinity is based on the altruism of men on women's behalf. I will note that altruism is not compassion, but the act of living for the sake of the designated others. For some reason, this is seen as virtuous.

Whereas a feminist society upholds abnegation of masculinity as an end in itself in practice, gynocentric neo-traditionalism claims to esteem masculinity only where men are prepared to die in service towards the feminine ends. Women in the latter category appear to behave as though this the chief sexual and relational appeal of men, often more so than the well-known attraction to "loaded" financially successful men. In fact, if these two masculine "virtues" are combined, then ultimately it means she inherits the money of the dead husband, and she is all set.

How many times have we heard stories in which a woman or girl fantasizes about a crush, love interest, or ideal partner and the magic phrase uttered by the man to express his love to her is “I would die for you” or something to that effect? Preparedness to die is presented as a criteria for a male object of romance, it seems.

Why is a woman enamored with the idea of a man wanting to die for her? Granted, it is dangerous enough for the man to profess to live for her as that is a gynocentric folly in itself, but that’s beside the point here. In human history, we have not appropriately questioned the societal romanticizing of self-sacrifice and the worship of death, especially that of men. Women act consistently as if they are attracted to the male act of self-destruction, as it serves their ends. Why are women appreciative that someone dies for them? Why is anyone thankful instead of horrified?

Anti-Automation: For Male Jobs, or Male Toil?

Now, to switch gears quite a bit, let’s talk about automation and men’s work.

Everything mentioned thus far can apply to the idea of male toil and labor as well. How many times have we heard that automation is killing men’s jobs, as is the advent of artificial intelligence? Are those that profess to be on the side of men really expressing concern about men’s income, or are they after something else?

Well perhaps the women may have some investment in men’s income, especially since men’s income too often becomes women’s income if the man isn’t smart enough. What I really want to address here however is the fear of automation, and how some allege that automation is a men’s issue.

Automation is all about the development and usage of technology to aid in life so we can earn the space and time to self-actualize. Automation is devised largely by men; this means that to attack automation is to attack the hard work of these men in the information age. Automation can liberate men from unnecessary toil and allow men to accomplish tasks more efficiently; this means that it is of great value to men as they can do tasks better, and save room for whatever the next frontier might be. To attack automation is to want men to toil; it is to want men to set aside any desire to self-actualize and instead labor for the sake of laboring. Sadly, too many men can’t seem to define themselves as men without this canned distinction brought to you by the “fairer sex.”

Oh, I’m not saying that the abuse of automation and artificial intelligence by the powers-that-be isn’t a genuine issue. I’m not saying you should take technology for granted and not be cautious. However, that is a discussion for another time and is certainly not specific to men’s issues.

When automation is presented as a problem (leading to the destruction of men’s jobs, and so forth), what can the response be except for calling for a return to labor with decreased level of technology and tools, thereby ensuring more toil? These doomsayers forget that automation actually creates jobs, perhaps way more than it destroys. That is what is meant by the next frontier. Or should they just admit that all they want to do is to make men go back to their vision of “traditional” masculinity again, in which they are simply a laboring class?

And on top of all this, what’s more masculine than tools and gadgetry?? What’s so unmasculine about a sense of tinkering to make something creative that actually lightens the load and speeds things up? Invention is what I wholeheartedly call a masculine virtue. It ironically smashes traditions, though it can set the stage for new ones, until they get smashed! Also, I doubt automation will keep us from wanting to enjoy the great outdoors and play sports if we desire to, so no need to fear and bellyache about that in my opinion.

Women have vastly benefitted from automation as well. I suspect that some of the women fearmongering about automation don’t expect the convenience of their own lives to decrease if all that nice automation would be reverted somehow. I guess we all know who picks up the slack here.

Furthermore, if you think harder on the subject of male toil, you would also realize that this just as well has to do with the idea of the female disgust for the “idle man”: a male, who in the female’s eyes, isn’t doing anything. The solution, according to her amounts to “Men: work, work, work!” The fear of automation is the fear of the non-toiling man.

What Do You Really Want Out of Men?

This has been a set of premises put together in one stream of thought that asks the question of what do the women and men of gynocentric society actually love about men, and what do they even think their place is. I hate to sound cynical, but it does seem to me that these women have a fetish for the male intent on disposing himself, or else working and laboring, all for her as the woman, that royal class. I think we could stand to be a bit disturbed by this. It all resembles a desire on the part of the women of gynocentric society to just see men perform for their amusement. And who are the classic collective archetype of those that want to cause all this toil and trouble for their enjoyment? The Weird Sisters, or the Three Witches.

I think it would be an interesting experiment to see in action, to respond appropriately to gynocentrists who fawn over men’s physical damage and those that voice disapproval of men they refer to as idle, that is, not toiling and getting into life-threatening trouble. Just imagine these neo-traditionalists chanting “Double double, toil and trouble” and giving a shrill cackle of amusement.

In closing, I dare say that it has even got to the point that so many of us don’t know what love and appreciation for men for being men even looks like, and we can’t even describe it without resorting to the tired buzzwords such as labor, service, protect, provide, self-sacrifice and others that speak only of men’s utility and not as an entity to be valued in himself. So what do women really want out of men anyway, after all is said and done? Are men lovable because they’d die for these women? Are they valuable because they’d work to the ends of the earth do whatever Princess wants? Do the scars on a man’s body and face make him more sexy and exciting for women? The implications are worse than anyone can imagine if the answers are “Yes.”

The inflated definition of misogyny

April 8, 2022 | by Zerbu | Link | Original Link

Feminists are very quick to scream when they see or hear something they consider to be discrimination against women. According to feminists, misogyny is still rampant in society, and women are treated badly and unfairly. Really, though, what do they consider to be sexist?

The issues most feminists today complain about, are normal issues that happen to many people and are not gender based. Mainstream misogyny is very rare in today's society, and if it ever occurs, people will know about it, report it immediately and it will be gotten rid of as soon as possible.

So, what are some examples of what feminists consider misogyny?

- If a man is chosen over a woman for a job, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl doesn't get taken seriously, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is not given complete control over her choices in life, it's considered misogyny;
- If violence is inflicted against a woman or girl, it's considered misogyny;
- If a female boss is not respected properly, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is falling behind in a class, it's considered misogyny on the part of the education system;
- If a woman or girl is not given proper health care, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is poor or suffering financial stress, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl gets in trouble for a reason she disagrees with, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl in general is suffering, it's considered misogyny.

Now, despite what feminists claim, these issues are not misogyny, because they are not gender issues. These issues happen to everyone, not just women and girls. Men and boys suffer from them as much, a lot of the time even more so. It has nothing to do with gender discrimination.

- People get chosen for jobs over other people;
- People don't always get taken as seriously as they should;
- People aren't always given complete control over their choices in life, and may be restricted for financial, health and/or other reasons;

- People suffer violence;
- Bosses and people in power are not always respected the way they should be, regardless of gender;
- People often fall behind in classes;
- People are not always given the proper health care they need or deserve;
- People suffer financial problems;
- People get in trouble for improper reasons, or at least what they consider improper;
- People in general suffer.

…but if one of those people are female, feminists immediately blame it on discrimination. Most of the problems feminists call misogyny are simple human issues that effect both genders. As has been demonstrated, feminists are not after equality. What they really want, by making these claims, is to change it so that only men ever suffer from these normal issues.

An example of this is how feminists continuously try to classify domestic violence (and in some cases, even violence in general) as a form of gender discrimination. Men can be victims of domestic violence too, so domestic violence is a violence issue, not a gender issue.

To demonstrate further the way situations are so easily labelled misogyny, here is a detailed example of a fictional situation:

> A student at a school has just been accused of misbehaving. This student believes they have done nothing wrong, and is annoyed by the false accusation and is determined to have something done about it. The student complains to one of the teachers, but doesn't use proper manners and instead uses shouting and foul language. The teacher disciplines the student for it, and the student has to do extra work after class.

The short story above does not mention the gender of the teacher and student. So let's say, both the student and the teacher are male. It would be considered a normal dispute. Change the gender of both of them to female, and it's still a normal dispute. However, make one of them male and the other female, and bang… it's gender discrimination! The male in the situation is a chauvinist, and the female is being discriminated against, despite the argument having nothing to do with gender. It could also be noted that in situations like these, the male is the one who gets blamed the majority of the time, and the female is always considered the victim.

That, folks, is the inflated definition of misogyny. For something that is done by a man (or boy) to be considered discrimination against women (or girls), the woman or girl just has to disagree with it. Whether or not the problem actually has anything to do with gender makes no difference in what feminists decide to call it.

A men’s rights activist’s response to a woman’s take on the men’s rights movement

April 9, 2022 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

Hi, Hannah Cox. I’m Hannah Wallen. We haven’t met and you’ve probably never heard of me, but no worries. I’m not all that familiar with you either, and you really only ended up on my radar after someone sent me a link to your FEE stories post, “A Woman’s Take On the Men’s Rights Movement.”

As you can see I suck at introductions, so let’s get right to the point.

I strongly disagree with your characterization of the men’s rights movement as having been co-opted by men with hateful, oppressive attitudes and interests, as your use of listing such allegations together with the labels for other men’s groups as a way of disparaging them without offering any real criticism. The movement you have described is not the men’s movement that I know and love, and have been involved with since I found a community on reddit while looking for information to help a falsely accused friend several years ago.

I’m not surprised by what you’ve said about us, because “Hey men! You’re advocating for yourselves wrong! Let feminists tell you how to do it!” is one of several commonly repeated feminist tropes and tactics used to try to undermine male control of the men’s issues dialogue. This is far from the first time I’ve heard it. In 2013 I wrote a response to a much shorter version of it by left-wing Boston Globe writer and “nice” feminist Cathy Young. Hers was titled “The broken dialogue on men’s rights,” and she said everything in her article that you have said in yours, only with less compartmentalizing, less expounding on the validity of the issues addressed by the advocacy she was disparaging as unnecessary, and a more succinct manner of trying to shame men into subjugating their interests to women’s sensibilities.

Aside from that, let’s consider your first sentence, defining True Feminism™ as the belief that all people should have equal rights, equal opportunity, and equal command of their own destiny. I noticed you did not cite a source for that claim, nor offer any other evidence to support it. It is presented instead as if it is a self-evident fact which, combined with the rest of that paragraph, sets the moral tone of the article as one that recognizes the movement’s female victim narrative without having to admit to the logical implications of the male oppressor narrative that is always used to support it, all to create an image to contrast against the Bad Activist, No Compassion narrative you reserved for nonfeminist men’s advocates.

What flowery, toplofty language you used to dismiss the entire history of feminist political agitation for laws that discriminate against men on women’s behalf, the universal academic fraud that has been used to support such agitation, and the profoundly misandric dogma communicated the overwhelming majority of feminist writing. How convenient it must be to be able to use platitudes about the True Feminism™ you'd rather talk about vs the ugly feminism that informs law, policy, institutional standards, and societal norms all over the western world… to thickly gloss over the fact that the movement's foundational dogma, Patriarchy Theory, is simply the belief that everything bad about every human culture is the way it is because men were/are in charge of its governing institutions. I cannot overstate the depth of my disgust at such a dishonest representation of the movement that used white feathers to label young men cowards for refusing to be treated as their society's disposable cannon fodder during WWI while simultaneously demanding voting rights for which most of those men were not eligible. What an incomplete picture of the ideology that produced the claim that, "The history of mankind is a history of repeated injuries and usurpations on the part of man toward woman, having in direct object the establishment of an absolute tyranny over her."

Not familiar?

It's from the Declaration of Sentiments, from the Seneca Falls Convention, 1848. The writers went on to support this claim by framing coverture, a system of law designed to make men fully accountable for the welfare of the women in their families while exempting the women themselves from it at men's expense, as a male-perpetrated attack on women's humanity. Their reasoning relied on only considering the restrictions women faced under these laws, which were in place to facilitate men's ability to meet the obligations and operate within the restrictions those same laws imposed on them. While feminists spent the next 200 years campaigning for women's release from their restrictions, they were very careful to avoid bringing about men's release from their obligations and restrictions as a result. In fact, they have fought to add to men's obligations and restrictions throughout that time.

That pattern of political activism and its influence on law and policymakers is the main cause of the discrimination men face today under criminal and family law, as well as an incredibly disproportionate burden on male taxpayers for the equally disproportionate financial benefit gained by female users of government programs and recipients of government-funded financial aid. Even in the private sector feminist influence has resulted in discrimination against male workers for the benefit of their female colleagues. This is not just true in regard to hiring and promotion, but also in the feminist domination of the area of human resources, which has become the primary arbiter of workplace social culture and made men's job status and security subject to their employer's deference to female sensitivity.

Therefore, if you're going to tell me that real feminism has anything to do with promoting "equal rights, equal opportunity, and equal command of their own destiny" for all people, you're on the hook for evidence. What legislative change, lobbied for by any feminist organization and passed by any governing body, achieved that goal. Don't cite laws giving women the voting franchise in any nation influenced by English Common Law, because in none of those nations did women have to do everything men did to get those rights, or to maintain them.

Hannah Cox, if you are reading this, I'll bet you're recoiling in denial of that description of the feminist movement. That's only to be expected given your panegyric description of it. Likely, if you felt like responding to a critic with such a dramatically different opinion, you would start by asking me which feminist groups I've engaged with or observed to learn about what feminism really means, and what feminists really do. You would probably be surprised to learn that list would include reading the documented history of the original suffragettes in the United Kingdom as well as those in the United States and Canada, and observing the legislative influence of not just individual feminists like Caroline Norton, creator of the Tender Years Doctrine, but also the biggest and most powerful feminist groups in the United States, like the National Organization for Women, which has spent decades opposing custody law reform that would end legislative guidance that encourages judicial discrimination against fathers.

That is why, when I read your description of what the men's rights movement is like, one thing really stood out to me. You limited your observation of the entire, worldwide century-old movement to giving slight consideration to just part of a statement on what men's rights groups believe (not the activities) of one of a multitude of groups within the greater men's issues discussion (not all of whom can be rightfully classified or would classify themselves as men's rights activists.) After that drive-by, you sped on to cite progressive and feminist opinion pieces for your long-form mudslinging. It seems you were unable to find any documentation of men's rights groups' actions that merited your claims about us, and chose not to consider why.

Don't like that characterization? Prove me wrong. Show me where you posted any interview with or documentation of your observation of the activities of any administrator from the National Coalition for Men, an organization that has successfully lobbied for legislative change, used civil suits to challenge discriminatory law and policy, and offered support to men not just since 2012, but for decades. Show me the way you have engaged with Warren Farrell, often cited (and rightfully so) as the father of the modern men's movement. He has written about every men's issue you included in the main body of your article, some extensively. He's known outside of the movement, having been interviewed on major media outlets and having spoken on these topics in academic settings for decades. You should not be afraid to talk to him. He's one of the most amiable, earnest, and rational people you'll ever meet and I guarantee that if your intentions are neutral or better, it will be a pleasant and enlightening conversation.

How many avoiceformen.com articles have you read without first prejudicing yourself with feminist source's characterizations of them first? What about UK groups like Justice for Men and Boys? Indian groups like the Save Indian Family Foundation? Did you maybe take a short cut and watch The Red Pill documentary, or Martyrs of Marriage? Have you maybe visited the Men's RIghts subreddit, an international hub of men's interest communication and advocacy? That forum is a great source of links to other men's issues forums where you could hear about men's issues advocacy from the people who are actually involved. Maybe you have listened to any videos on men's issues by any of the large number of creators who are part of groups like the one I'm in?

By the way, guess what: Some of us are women.

Actually, many of us are women. Maybe you could explain to us how our views are misogynistic, hateful, and oppressive… if you actually know what our views are.

If you did check out any of our work, why didn't you include any citation of any men's movement sources on the men's movement in your paragraph about how co-opted by very bad wrongthink boogeymen it has become? Do you find it distasteful to engage with the movement you are disparaging as you gloss over decades of our advocacy on the legitimate issues you used for the main body your article? Is that why, in discussing those issues, you also did not link to a single source from any men's group?

If you have never checked out any actual men's rights advocacy (besides part of an about statement from a group whose activities you didn't even bother to highlight) or any of our media, why haven't you?
With a wealth of information on men's issues hosted publicly online by actual men's interest groups describing our actual intentions, beliefs, activities, and impact, it can't be because you couldn't find us. To miss that big of a body of evidence, one would have to actively strive to avoid it.

But why would a person writing about us want to do that? Was it out of an arrogant but apparently quite wrongful assumption that you already knew what you would find, or maybe fear that you'd find evidence to contradict your opening mud-slinging session? Was it something else? Does your True Feminism™ lack space to let men's groups advocate for men's human and civil rights interests without feminist women's supervision or control? If so, exactly how does that attitude fit into the context of advocating "that all people should have equal rights, equal opportunity, and equal command of their own destiny?"

I'd really love to hear the answer to those questions, if you are willing and able to have that conversation.

Is circumcision legal? Does it matter?

April 10, 2022 | by Gary Costanza | Link | Original Link

Does the law protect the right of every adult, child, or infant to bodily integrity?

There is mounting evidence that this is so, has been argued by Mike Buchanan of Justice for Men and Boys, and now also by Peter Adler's "Is Circumcision Legal?"

To answer the question, I'll discuss Adler's work and also discuss aspects of the well-known Chase Heronimus lawsuit to prevent the forced circumcision of 4 yr. old Chase against his mother's will.

First, an excerpt from "Is Circumcision Legal?," italics mine:

> Origins of circumcision
> Almost all mammals have foreskins. The male and female genitalia, which are identical in early gestation, have evolved to function together during sexual intercourse over sixty-five to one hundred million years. Male and female circumcisions have been practiced for thousands of years, usually for religious, cultural, and personal reasons. Male circumcision has been performed as a religious ritual, a painful obligatory rite of passage, to mark or brand slaves and members of religious or tribal groups, and to suppress sexuality. American physicians introduced the practice in the late 1800s in an unsuccessful effort to prevent masturbation. For the following century, American physicians claimed that circumcision prevented or cured a long list of diseases such as epilepsy, paralysis, hip-joint disease, bad digestion, inflammation of the bladder, and tuberculosis; in fact, an uncircumcised penis was "seen as the cause of most human diseases and socially unacceptable behaviours."
>
> Legal Issues
> The fact that circumcision is commonplace, asserted by proponents of circumcision in legal briefs, is not in and of itself a valid legal argument. Slavery was once commonplace, as was drilling holes in the brain to cure epilepsy and mental disorders, the use of leeches to remove blood, and the use of unsterile instruments in surgery. In addition, even if circumcision has potential or actual medical benefits (which is debated), it does not necessarily follow that it is a legal practice. Removing any body part, if removed to prevent it from becoming diseased, would be medically beneficial, yet this would not justify amputating a leg, for example, to prevent an infection that could be treated with antibiotics. Physicians do not routinely remove healthy body parts from children other than the male foreskin. The fact that there is legislation against cutting girls' genitals but not boys' genitals also does not resolve whether or not male circumcision is legal.

> Circumcision raises one principal issue for its opponents: do boys, like girls, have a right to genital integrity, and, if so, where is the right found? The surgery raises many troublesome legal issues for proponents. Is invasive surgery on boys' genitals legal when cutting girls' genitals is a federal crime? How can it be legal to remove boys' foreskins to reduce the risk of penile cancer, but not girls' breasts, which are many times more likely to become cancerous? Can physicians lawfully endanger and harm boys without benefiting most of them? Do physicians have the right to operate on healthy boys, against their own recommendation, at the request of parents for reasons having nothing to do with medicine, usually without fully informing parents of the risks? Is it lawful to circumcise healthy boys when intact men rarely choose it for themselves? Do parents have the right to make the circumcision decision for religious reasons or any reason?

Wow. Here we get to the heart of the matter:

> Do Boys Have a Right to Genital Integrity?
>
> The question should be stated more broadly: does every American citizen – whether young or old, male or female – have a right to personal security or bodily integrity and hence to genital integrity? If boys do not, adults and girls do not, either. Congress stated in banning non-therapeutic female genital cutting that it "infringes upon the guarantees of rights secured by Federal and State law, both statutory and constitutional."
>
> What are those laws?
>
> The Common Law
>
> In 1791, the United States passed a constitutional amendment that adopted British common law. The first chapter of Blackstone's Commentaries, "Of the Absolute Rights of Persons," states that the rights of the people are to be preserved inviolate.
>
> a. The Right to Personal Security
>
> The principal purpose of the law, Blackstone wrote, is to protect the right of all people to personal security:
>
> 1. The right of personal security consists in a person's legal and uninterrupted enjoyment of his life, his limbs, his body, his health… 2. [Man's rights] include a prohibition not only of killing, and maiming, but also of torturing… and… no man shall be forejudged of life or limb contrary to… the law of the land…. 3. [A man's] person or body is also entitled, by the same natural right, to security from the corporal insults of menaces, assaults, beating, and wounding; though such insults amount not to destruction of life or member. 4. The preservation of a man's health from such practices as may prejudice or annoy it."

From “Constitutional Law:”

> The Bill of Rights to the United States Constitution was adopted to protect individuals. As the Supreme Court has stated, “[c]onstitutional rights do not mature and come into being magically only when one attains the state-defined age of majority. Minors, as well as adults, are protected by the Constitution and possess constitutional rights.” Constitutional rights are “fundamental” and “may not be submitted to vote.” Accordingly, legislation that violates constitutional rights is legally invalid. Since Congress found non-therapeutic female genital cutting to violate girls’ federal and state constitutional rights, what are the rights to which the Supreme Court was referring? It should be asked first, though, whether boys have a right to the same protection against genital cutting as girls?

Which brings us to “The Right to Equal Protection:”

> Shea Lita Bond addressed this issue in her 1999 article, State Laws Criminalizing Female Circumcision: A Violation of the Equal Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment. Congress and sixteen states have banned female genital cutting except when medically necessary. The American Academy of Pediatrics briefly recommended that its physicians perform a ritual pinprick of a girl’s genitals if that might prevent more harmful genital cutting, even though this would have violated federal law. This ignited a storm of protest, and the policy was quickly retired. Thus, even a pinprick of girls’ genitals is a federal crime. Physicians likewise cannot cut adults’ genitals without their consent (an adult subjected to this could use force in self-defense, call the police, or successfully bring suit).
> The Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution prohibits states from enforcing laws that “deny to any person… equal protection of the laws”. State constitutions also contain equal protection clauses. Bond concluded in her article that state statutes protecting females but not males from genital cutting violate the constitutional guarantee that similarly situated males and females should be treated equally before the law

The essence of these legal protections, whether in the Constitution or Common Law, is that by law, the state protects bodily integrity from involuntary injury by others such as stabbing, shooting, assault, or amputation, and if those rights are granted to infant girls, they must also be granted to infant boys.

> Parents Have a Legal Duty to Protect Their Children From Harm
>
> Parents Have No Religious or Other Right to Order Circumcision
>
> Parents Can Only Consent to Medical Care
>
> Just as physicians cannot perform unnecessary surgery on children, parents cannot consent to it. In 1979, a Texas appeals court considered whether parents could consent to remove and transplant a kidney from a daughter to a son to save his life, and held that they could not.
>
> Is It Lawful to Use Medicaid to Pay For Circumcision?
>
> Is It Lawful For Companies to Buy and Sell Boys' Foreskins?

So, what can be done, and what are our goals? Under "Remedies", we see:

> Rights
>
> As shown, circumcision violates the rules of medical ethics and numerous provisions of law. Boys and men are entitled to full redress. First, as the American Medical Association has stated, regulatory agencies are required to take allegations of unethical conduct very seriously. Unnecessary surgery on children is a serious ethical violation. Physicians who circumcise should lose their licenses to practice medicine. Second, the federal and state child abuse statutes protecting children from harm and the criminal assault laws must be enforced. The penalty for violating these laws is imprisonment. Third, the federal and state statutes protecting girls from non-therapeutic circumcision must be extended to boys.

> Reality
> The reality is that regulatory, criminal, administrative, and legislative remedies have not been forthcoming for properly performed circumcision. Newborn boys cannot speak or vote, while physicians' associations and religious organizations can (and do) lobby legislators, contribute to campaigns, and put pressure on Medicaid officials.
> CONCLUSION
> This article has addressed whether circumcision is legal, and has shown that it is not. To summarize the law, boys, like girls and adults, have absolute rights under the common law to personal security and bodily integrity, and to freedom or the autonomy to make important and irreversible decisions about their bodies that can be delayed, like circumcision, for themselves. It is unconstitutional to protect girls from unnecessary genital cutting without extending equal protection of the law to boys. In addition, boys and girls are protected from circumcision by the criminal child abuse statutes, tort law, and human rights law.
> One therefore does not reach the argument that physicians have the right to circumcise boys for religious, cultural, or personal reason, but if one did, it does not pass the blush test. A physician's legal duty is to provide competent medical care to pediatric patients independent of their parents' desires. Thus, physicians cannot take orders from parents to operate on children for reasons having nothing to do with medicine.

A famous case of forced circumcision involved 4 yr. old Chase Hironimus whose father sought to have him circumcised against the wishes of his mother and himself. Tragically, he was eventually circumcised by a foreign doctor.

The lawsuit to prevent this forced circumcision highlights all the human rights that are involved and how they apply to baby boys. I've included portions of the lawsuit to show how the case was built to protect Chase and other infants like him. These excerpts are rich in legal, physical, and ethical reasons not to circumcise:

> 10. C.R.N.H. was born on October 31, 2010 and is now approximately 4 ½ years old.
> 12. C.R.N.H. expressed that he does not want circumcision.
> 13. C.R.N.H. expressed that he is afraid of circumcision.
> 14. C.R.N.H. is in constant fear of circumcision being forced upon him pursuant to the court's order.
> 15. C.R.N.H. does not have any medical condition that would make circumcision medically necessary.
> 16. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is not medically necessary.
> 17. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is non-therapeutic, elective, cosmetic surgery.

18. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is invasive, irreversible, painful, and will cause C.R.N.H physical and psychological harm.
19. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision results in permanent physical alteration of one of C.R.N.H.'s most private body parts at an age when C.R.N.H. is aware of what his body looks like and will be traumatized by it.
20. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age results in the loss and/or disfigurement of a normal, healthy, functional, valuable body part.
21. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age will result in severe and permanent psychological damage.
22. Circumcision at C.R.N.H.'s age does not provide medical benefits.

26. Under the circumstances of this case, circumcision is not "medical treatment" because there is no diagnosis of any condition which would make it medically necessary.

34. There is no compelling, important, or legitimate reason why the procedure cannot be postponed until C.R.N.H. reaches the age of 18 and can seek to have it performed upon himself if he so desires at that time.

38. The American Academy of Pediatrics' Bioethics Committee has declared that a minor's input into surgical decisions must be heard and considered.

43. Under the circumstances of this case, forcing circumcision on C.R.N.H. constitutes assault, aggravated assault, battery, aggravated battery, and/or child abuse under Florida law.

56. Title 42 of the United States Code provides:
Every person who, under color of any statute, ordinance, regulation, custom, or usage, of any State or Territory or the District of Columbia, subjects, or causes to be subjected, any citizen of the United States or other person within the jurisdiction thereof to the deprivation of any rights, privileges, or immunities secured by the Constitution and laws, shall be liable to the party injured in an action at law, suit in equity, or other proper proceeding for redress…

59. Defendants' application of Florida law to impose unnecessary, elective, cosmetic circumcision upon C.R.N.H. at the age of 4 ½ years old for no religious reason violates C.R.N.H.'s fundamental right to privacy and bodily integrity secured by the Due Process Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment to the United States Constitution.

> 60. Defendants' application of Florida law to impose unnecessary, elective, cosmetic > circumcision upon C.R.N.H. at the age of 4 ½ years old for no religious reason violates the Equal > Protection Clause of the Fourteenth Amendment of the United States Constitution, in that it sets > out impermissible classifications. First, Title 18 United States Code section 116 prohibits female > circumcision and C.R.N.H. has been impermissibly denied equal protection under this law > because of his age and gender.
>
> 63. Defendants have conspired to deprive C.R.N.H. of equal protection of the laws > and equal privileges and immunities guaranteed by the Constitution and laws of the United States > by force, intimidation and threats.

As thorough and legally sound as this is, this lawsuit failed, as do many seemingly open-and-shut cases of obvious human rights violations. Why?

Some things are slow to change because they are so ingrained in us and the law that they have powerful opponents, like abortion, legalizing pot, men's reproductive rights, circumcision, and drafting women. "No-brainers" such as civil rights and anti-FGM were more easily won.

As in the tale "The Emperor's New Clothes," it seems that we ultimately say and do what others are doing without regard for the law, ethics, or common sense. Just as "The Milgram Experiment" found, people generally go along with what authority or those with 'white coats' do and say.

You may say 'so what if it's illegal, no one seems to care,' and you'd be right.

Unless a precedent-setting legal case makes clear that circumcision is illegal, it doesn't seem to matter to doctors, hospitals and anyone else what the Constitution and human rights law say about it – this still goes on.

So, if the law won't stop it, it's up to intactivists and the public to talk about the elephant in the room.

Join an intactivist group and protest.

Tell friends and family about the human right to genital integrity and ask if they'd have a baby girl cut.

Phrase questions to expectant parents something like "will you keep your son intact?"

Sorry, but politeness and avoiding uncomfortable conversation is trumped by protecting the life and human rights of vulnerable infants.

In closing, here's part of Adler's conclusion that sums up our dilemma:

> Circumcision, one of the most common surgeries in American hospitals, will continue until public opinion has turned completely against it, or until courts rule, as in Germany, that circumcision is unlawful. The constitutional right of access to the courts guarantees every American speedy, adequate, effective, and meaningful judicial remedies. Judges are sworn to uphold the Constitution and to grant those remedies. The 2012 German decision, this article, and those it cites, provide a blueprint for courts to hold physicians, hospitals, and parents liable to men for properly performed circumcisions.

Stop aggressive women and avoid domestic violence

April 11, 2022 | by Tim Patten | Link | Original Link

Clinical Psychologist's and researchers have identified the poisonous behavior of aggressive women who resort to verbal assault through gossip, innuendo and character assassination used against other female friends and coworkers. But when women become verbally aggressive against the man, she is falling in love with or dating, the cultural equation is toppled and the relationship reels towards becoming dysfunctional. Female aggression can cause long-lasting harm and even lead to death to you and other young men, regardless of race, background or position on the gender binary.

In fact, when the toxicity of female aggression interacts with healthy masculinity, it often triggers an explosive reaction that can undermine your search for romance and love, especially if you have not learned how to overcome it. As Phillip Calvin McGraw, popularly known as Dr. Phil, the well-known American television personality, author and psychologist recommends; if you do not elevate your relationship out of this situation, you may eventually spiral into darkness and despair, and even have your life placed in jeopardy.

The fact is, while most men have at least some familiarity with physical altercations, including punching, slugging, and other such threats, few have been trained to fight back against the weapons used by women's aggression and their verbal assaults. But men can learn.

Unfortunately, if any man were to so much as mention female aggression, in the politically correct world we live in, it usually gets mangled and misconstrued. It is not viewed as something that needs sorting but is viewed as a criticism and an attack on women. More often than not, your efforts to cope with the widely recognized threat of female belligerence will be labeled as misogyny, and as blatantly sexist.

This is not a great cultural value. If you said, for example, that soldiers should not be taught certain ways of defending themselves because some of these tactics might be discriminatory, most reasonable people would probably be responding by saying, you are being ridiculous. But when it comes to helping men deal with the bad behavior exhibited by members of the opposite sex, an altogether different logic applies. Society is apathetic.

In other words, even though research – like that featured at the British Psychological Society's Division of Forensic Psychology annual conference in Glasgow – demonstrates that women are more likely to be verbally aggressive toward their partners than men, any effort to address this issue is dismissed as sexist. Because of this, men are left dangerously vulnerable and unable to navigate such situations.

But a growing number of individuals, including clinical psychologist Dr. Jordan Peterson, are increasingly willing to speak out, despite attempts to keep the issue under wraps. In a video interview with Anne McElvoy, Senior Editor at The Economist, Dr. Peterson went into great detail about the nonphysical but nevertheless aggressive actions that women regularly engage in. With the cover of political correctness blown away, Ms. McElvoy was visibly shaken by the realities he brought to light.

Like many people in our anti-male world, Ms. McElvoy might also have been shocked to learn about the extent to which females exhibit dangerous behavior towards men. According to The Centers for Disease Control and Prevention (CDC), women are to blame in 55% of homicides stemming from intimate partner violence and a Harvard study said that 70% of domestic violence is initiated by women. Despite this, feminist organizations and society at large tend to focus almost exclusively on men as the aggressor of domestic violence, ignoring or discriminating against victims of verbal female aggression who happen to be male.

Modern Romance

If you are like most young men, you've probably been attracted by the outer appearance of women– flashy painted faces, false eyelashes, and glossy hair extensions. At some point – and maybe even recently – you have spent or are spending a considerable amount of time and money seeking female friendship. Sooner or later, though, friendships become mesmerized by her manipulations and you begin to feel helplessly in love. You date her and yes, you encounter the ecstatic physical intimacy. Eventually, you are in a monogamous relationship, in what might seem like a dream at first.

Then one day, something shocking happens. Suddenly, she starts ranting, hurling abuse in your direction. She screams, "I can't believe you did this to me! You call yourself a man! You're just a child! I hate you! I'm done!" As a man, you've been taught – or, perhaps, learned the hard way – that you can't say a word back, or else you'll find her ratcheting up the volume and attacking you with a slew of morally righteous arguments, such as "You don't know how to treat a woman!"

At that point, you realize that she is no longer the person you fell in love with – she is unrecognizable. You go silent and breathlessly consider every word you said or everything you did that day or sometime earlier that might have initiated this fit of rage. Your pulse races, wondering what you should do now. You cannot simply treat her like a man – you know if you fight back as you should, you will suffer any number of consequences, and you will invariably be seen by all as the bad oppressive and violent male.

If you are like a great many men, you will feel like you have little choice but to succumb and accept your lot in life. You hunch your shoulders and become a prisoner, a drone worker to her the all-powerful "queen bee." She has relegated you to "disposable" status, knowing full well that others are lining up to take your spot. Not surprisingly, you feel vulnerable as well. You realize that anything you say will be used against you and that you are destined to lose any argument you might have with her. Your heart stops and you draw your limbs in like a frightened puppy who only wants to escape. Finally, you simply do your best to get through it, hoping that the hostilities end and your feelings of anxiety and dread will go away.

Possible Result of Female Aggression

Unfortunately, this kind of aggressive behavior is probably indicating a rocky roadmap for any relationship moving forward, including if it leads to marriage and children that come along. Heed this “red flag” as a call to action to avoid violence that may lay ahead. Female aggression will not just lead to your own emotional or health-related problems. Based on FBI statistics, nearly 500 husbands are killed by their wives each year, while over 4,000 infants annually suffer a similar fate.

Research suggests that these nonphysical assaults often set the stage for physical violence. Dr. Penny A. Leisring, a clinical psychologist, has found that nonstop haranguing can push a man to the breaking point. You may become violent and suffer societies consequences.

Furthermore, should you marry her and have children, but the marriage ends in a split-up; surveys show us that nearly 20,000 divorced fathers commit suicide each year.

Take Responsibility

To avoid such a fate, you need to be responsible, take a leadership role and make a change. Whether you are already in a committed relationship with her or risk being in one soon, you need to step back and consider where things may be heading. Female aggression represents a crucial life moment and the choices you make at this point will have consequences for your future for a very long time. It is true that her outburst will end, and sex is likely to return to the relationship, but male biology and the promise of what can only be described as a sexual addiction cannot be your only guide.

Instead, it is time to reach deep inside and harness your natural masculinity to make a plan that leads you away from this harmful relationship. Seek safety and freedom. You must place your hands firmly on the steering wheel and guide your life towards autonomy and healthy relationships.

To begin with, you must draw boundaries that aggressive women can never disrespect again and eradicate any thoughts of winning back the love and trust of someone who has abused you. You should ignore the natural urge to comfort her injured emotions. You must move firmly forward – by getting away.

To reach a better place, and to experience freedom and genuine joy, you must sever all ties with such toxic individuals. You must build walls and completely block this person from being part of your life, in the flesh or online, directly or indirectly. Unless you end all contact and interactions with her, you risk having her destroy your life.

Conclusion

Life has never been better for men and to make the most of your opportunities, you need to straighten your spine and critically evaluate your relationships with women. There is no hurry to marry so be all that symbolizes good and fully engage with life, meeting others. Integrate the lessons you learn from each person you meet in order to shape your future with the virtues of masculinity you inherited from your ancestors, which is responsibility, strength, willpower, and action. Over the centuries, these attributes have lifted millions out of poverty, created great civilizations, and inspired mind-boggling innovations.

After a short break from women – and, perhaps, discussions with those who can guide you along the way, including a life coach or those you'll find at Men Going Their Own Way discussion sites. Men have no political or advanced education support but can straightforwardly learn from each other. Make your journey an adventure, explore the world and discover what makes you 'tick'. Soon you will look forward to finding a great life teammate. There are women in this world that you can definitely partner with. Understand that there is someone who you will love and they will love you in return.

However, to choose correctly, you will need to make sure you remain fully cognizant of your vulnerabilities and the potentially deadly allure of the merely physical, sexual attraction and making poor choices. Only by knowing the person you with, can you shape the life you truly deserve.

Feminine Flames

April 12, 2022 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

I have taken a few days to gather the emotional energy to write this article.

You would think after a decade of submitting work for AVFM that a person would be immune to the highly emotional content they write about but it's a skill I have never possessed.

My son in law was speaking to me about my emotional response to yet another blatant example of the media's sympathetic coverage of the killing of children by their mums. He rightly said it was not healthy for me to be so personally invested in the issue and that it was not helping me or anyone else when I was so personally affronted by the lies and double standards.

He is right, but sadly for me, I cannot control my gut reaction to injustice and cold-blooded lies.

So, I have postponed the writing of this piece for days.
I think I am as focused and detached as I can possibly be, so let me begin.

Last week, while taking a brief holiday in the beautiful Victorian country town of Daylesford I heard the dramatic voice over for the upcoming news of the evening.

"Today, tributes pour in for a mum and her two angels."

I had heard the story of a mother who burned herself and two daughters alive in Cranbourne (in my home state) in her car the day before and was right to assume this was the mum and two angels mentioned in the emotive promotional clip.

My heart was thumping as it usually does when this disgusting approach to child murder by mothers is in play with our media.

The whole approach to this story of the murder/suicide was one of "isn't this so tragic for all involved!" It is presented as something that just happened to all three of the occupants of that fiery inferno which was previously the family car.

We heard endless tributes to the mother from those who knew her and the story ended with some advice for those struggling with mental health issues to seek support.

It was only when I googled the story on my phone to learn more details that I discovered the fact that a mum in Perth had also driven to a secluded location and burned herself and her two girls alive the day before!

There was yet another triple murder committed by a mum in the Melbourne suburb of Tullamarine last year which I was unaware of until it popped up in my research of the current murders.

To be fair, at least the article above focuses on the suffering of the grieving dad.

I have cancelled all of my newspaper subscriptions a couple of years ago because of the endless feminist ideology they promoted on a daily basis so at times I miss important stories.

The Perth tragedy was given the same treatment. Poor mum was clearly overwrought and struggling. If only we had known or could have offered more support.

The husbands in both stories were mentioned as being inconsolable, but the main focus in the news coverage was on the wonderful people both mums were and the sadness that such tragedies create.

There was not even a hint of a whisper in any of the coverage regarding the fact that mums killing their kids seems to becoming an all too frequent event.

Three months ago, a Melbourne mum placed her infant on a train track and lay down beside her. The baby was killed but the mother survived. The traumatized train driver said when he realized his attempt to apply the brakes would not succeed, he closed his eyes on impact.

That mum walked free from court yesterday with a three-year good behaviour bond. She is already back at work as a veterinary nurse and doing well.

Right at this very time, when women have murdered five children in three separate incidents, our biggest selling newspaper ran an article by two white ribbon ambassadors with the following headline.

'Tackling Violence Needs Every Bloke on Board'

The Co-authors of the article (Melissa Perry and Allan Ball are a part of the executive at White Ribbon. I also believe they are married. Imagine attending a dinner at their home.)

The article was replete with all of the usual propaganda and lies we have been swallowing for decades.

I will give you a few quotes just so you understand the flavour of the piece but the most shocking aspect of this utterly sickening attack on men as a collective was the fact that there was not one reference to the spate of child murders carried out by mothers.

The two authors are beneath contempt. How can anyone claiming to care deeply about victims of family violence deliberately ignore the multiple murders of children committed by women and rest their heads on their pillow each night with a clear conscience?

The timing of this utterly sickening hit piece was not an accident.
I have seen this reaction to spates of female domestic violence before. It is almost as though there is panic among the gender bigots at White Ribbon and I can almost hear them say," It's time for another man-bashing piece to distract from these rather inconvenient murders by mums!"
The article begins:

> At the time of this writing Australia is waking to the murder of another woman at the hands of a male partner.
> 14 women in total met violent deaths since jan 1st we also saw 5 children and adolescents murdered by Australian men in January alone.

Four children were murdered in two days at the hands of women but that didn't cause you any distress? And how many of those fourteen women were murdered by men? I know how often this sleight of hand is used by the feminists who imply and infer so we simply assume men did all of the killing.

I have no doubt men have died at the hands of female partners during that same period but that is never regarded as being newsworthy or particularly tragic.

The article continues:

> As a society we've allowed the underlying drivers of violence and disrespect to take root and become normalized. That slightly sexist joke, that banter between blokes about a female colleague, talking over the top of a woman just because you can or to use the opportunities for career advancement, they have all contributed to making Australia an unsafe community for women.

This blatant lie and deliberate misrepresentation of the factors most likely to lead to family violence was debunked quite brilliantly by an Australian senator a few years ago but sadly only those who have seen the clip of You Tube would have any idea of the deceitful nature of this billion-dollar government funded campaign which has been relentlessly rammed down our throats for years.

Here is the clip of his devastating questioning of the women in charge of the department responsible for promoting this deceitful, manipulative campaign.

Back to the hit piece smearing all men and holding all men responsible for any violence a woman may experience.

- Australian men hold some of the most misogynistic views in the western world.

What a contemptible statement.

- Indeed 30% believed women who say they were abused often make up or exaggerate claims of rape.

Imagine that! Thirty percent of men believe women often make up or exaggerate when they claim they were sexually abused or raped.

What is being suggested here? It is misogynistic for any man to doubt the word of a woman who makes allegations? Are the authors suggesting we should believe all allegations made by any woman simply because she is a woman? Are the authors denying the fact that we know many allegations of rape and sexual assault have been exposed as lies?

Here's a recent one.

Even after she was exposed as an evil liar, this woman faced no charges despite the pleas of her ex-husband. Surprised?

Are the authors suggesting that men who claim they did not commit the abuse or rape in question should never be believed and all good people should simply take their guilt for granted?

- Australia was second only to Malaysia when asked if it was okay to use misogynistic language online. 14% said it was okay. The global average is 8%.

What constitutes misogynistic language? I know there is nothing a woman cannot say about men. They can openly celebrate the genital mutilation of a man by his partner on a popular radio station (Chrissie Swan on Nova 100 was the culprit) during drive time and face no consequences. So, anything is permissible when the target of your venom and hatred is a man.

Can you begin to comprehend the notion that these truly sick human beings are telling us the women of Australia (perhaps the most privileged and pampered demographic on the planet) are enduring a daily hell as they navigate the deadly dangerous misogynists lurking on every street, office and home in this brutal, woman hating continent?

- We must end a culture that tolerates disrespect, sexual harassment, assault and rigid gender standards and power structures.
- We must rethink our attitudes to abuse and violence and acknowledge gender violence exists and males continue to gain from it.

I would like to have the authors explain to me how men as a collective gain from the violence inflicted on a tiny minority of women. What does that ridiculous statement mean?

Do women gain from the violence other women inflict on their children and partners?

- The short-term game to end violence clearly isn't working.

What is the short-term game?

- We need to invest in the front end of the problem and set the agenda on how we engage men and boys using a long-term primary prevention approach.

The piece finishes with a call for more early intervention. In other words, let's continue to teach the boys in our schools about the toxic masculinity that bubbles and simmers in their genes and demand they respect anyone with female genitalia.

There will be no such demands made on the girls in our education system and of course no girl will ever be called upon to stand and apologize for the far too common murder of children by their mums.

May I return to the mum who lay her infant on the train track?

Melissa Arbuckle was as much a victim as the butchered baby in the eyes of Justice Dixon.

Arbuckle in happier times.

> Arbuckle pleaded guilty to one count of infanticide, which in Victoria carries a maximum five-year prison sentence.
>
> During sentencing, Justice Dixon agreed with the defence submission that Arbuckle's was a case that 'needed to be tempered with mercy'.
>
> 'I agree that you have done everything you possibly could possibly be expected of to attempt to expedite the offence before the court and to recover psychiatrically,' she said.
>
> 'Your bright prospects for rehabilitation were not challenged by the Crown. '
>
> Justice Dixon further accepted Arbuckle had suffered both physical injuries after surviving her murder-suicide attempt, as well as mental injuries from the associated trauma.
>
> Justice Dixon noted she was 'acutely aware' that it was beyond the power of the > court to repair the suffering and loss flowing from Arbuckle's actions.

>
> 'I accept your counsel's submission that you are deeply remorseful for the suffering caused to Lily's father and to all who loved her,' she said.
>
> 'You also regret the impact on the driver of the train that struck Lily, and you. Your life and the lives of others has been forever changed.'
> 'I also accept that you feel that, because of your own actions, you are under a life sentence. At times you have believed that you deserve any suffering you have experienced since the commission of the offence, as punishment for your actions.'
>
> The court heard Arbuckle was back working as a vet and had entered an agreement with the Veterinary Registration Board placing conditions on her practice and to the supply of treatment reports to its board as required.

It's so reassuring to know that Melissa is back at work with puppies and kittens and getting her life back on track while her husband says,

- 'Some days he finds himself unable to go to work or to carry on. He says that the worst thing that could possibly happen to him has already happened and that seeing Lily at the hospital broke his heart.'

There are too many fathers to contemplate out there in our communities who have had their children torn from their lives either by the corrupt family court or the murderous hands of their mothers, yet not one of them has ever been nominated as a potential Australian of the Year as Rosie Batty was. No-a child must die at the hands of its father before it can be considered a victim of domestic violence.

How must these broken men feel as they see and hear the advertising campaigns demanding men do more to stop their fellow males from harming or killing our children?

How do they manage to control the rage which must well up within them as they see yet another White Ribbon article laying the blame for all violence in the home at the feet of men and only men?

How must they feel when the annual vigils held by White Ribbon read out the names of victims of murder at the hands of men whilst those burned, strangled, stabbed and bashed by their mothers remain forever unacknowledged and invisible?

The past couple of weeks have never made the hatred and demonization of the male population more starkly visible. The contrast in approach and sentiment to the vile, violent actions of females is quite shocking in its unapologetic hypocrisy and ruthless disregard for the victims of their brutality.

Surely any person who kills their own children is mentally unstable or broken? This is not the issue. We don't doubt that most who commit such heinous acts are damaged in some way but such understanding is rarely, if ever, offered to men who snap.

And for those who are yet to understand the bigger issue-no matter how many women kill our most vulnerable-the evil blanket of collective blame is never thrown over the women of our society.

That is an unforgivably evil action reserved solely for men.

20 studies show how women do not support other women

April 13, 2022 | by Nikita Coulombe | Link | Original Link

I collected these studies in one place because women talk a lot about supporting other women but when it comes down to it, women often undermine each other in insidious ways.

That women in general cannot seem to get along with other women in the long-term has been one of the great disappointments of my life, and I do wonder if it's possible to better support each other, have more productive relationships with men, and better serve our communities if we have a better understanding around our own behavior and motivations.

Without further ado:

1. Women damage rivals' reputations but do not report explicitly disliking them: Competitive reputation manipulation: Women strategically transmit social information about romantic rivals.

2. Women report experiencing more incivility from other women in the workplace than from men: Further understanding incivility in the workplace: The effects of gender, agency, and communion.

3. Regardless of their own promiscuity, all female participants viewed sexually permissive women more negatively: Birds of a feather? Not when it comes to sexual permissiveness.

4. Women are more likely than men to respond to threats of social exclusion with exclusion: Under threat of social exclusion, females exclude more than males.

5. Females relationally victimizing each other has been observed even in elementary school: Relational and physical forms of peer victimization in preschool.

6. Adolescent girls have a poorer record of same-sex friendships than boys: The greater fragility of females' versus males' closest same-sex friendships.

7. While direct physical aggression is greater in males, indirect aggression is greater in females: Does sexual selection explain human sex differences in aggression?

8. The lifetime prevalence of violence by an intimate partner is 43.8% for lesbians vs 16.4% for gay men: The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey.

9. Mommy Wars: working mothers and stay-at-home mothers argue over who are better parents: "Welcome to the Mommy Wars, Ladies": Making Sense of the Ideology of Combative Mothering in Mommy Blogs.

10. Women react more negatively than men do when outperformed by their same-sex peers: Sex differences in reactions to outperforming same-sex friends.

11. Even in elementary school, girls are less comfortable competing against their same-sex peers: Greater Discomfort as a Proximate Cause of Sex Differences in Competition.

12. Women are slower than men to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers: Human males appear more prepared than females to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers.

13. Women are irritated by sexy female peers: Intolerance of sexy peers: intrasexual competition among women.

14. Indirect aggression from women towards other women is about self-promotion and derogation of sexual rivals: Do human females use indirect aggression as an intrasexual competition strategy?

15. Female groups engage in social ostracism more than male groups: Human Sexual Differences in the Use of Social Ostracism as a Competitive Tactic.

16. Queen Bees: women are less likely than men to develop lower status same-sex peers: High status males invest more than high status females in lower status same-sex collaborators.

17. Women may think other women are good managers, but don't want to work for them: An exploration of unspoken bias: women who work for women.

18. In the workplace, women often see highly qualified female candidates as "competitive threats" that might be preferred and lower qualified female candidates as "collective threats" that could reinforce negative stereotypes about women and do not support either as work group peers: Female tokens in high-prestige work groups: Catalysts or inhibitors of group diversification?

19. The majority of women said their relationship with their female in-law caused them long-term unhappiness and stress: In-law tensions hit women hardest.

20. In a study of "misogynistic" Tweets, roughly half were sent from women about other women: The Use of Misogynistic Terms on Twitter.

Digging deep on diamonds

April 14, 2022 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

One score and 19 years ago, I was working at a large advertising agency. Among the accounts I was assigned to work on was a jewelry chain store. Just one problem: I knew nothing about jewelry. In fact, I had never been in a jewelry store.

Not to worry. The ad agency had an in-house library filled with books, magazines, and journals related to the accounts they served, so I was able to get up to speed pretty quickly on the diamond industry. What I learned was sobering.

Like the average dolt, I figured diamonds were rare and hence valuable. Obviously, they were something of a status symbol for females; showing off a ring to one's girl friends is a female rite of passage, and a big "rock" enhances a femme's place in the pecking order. A woman's desirability is in proportion to the size of the rock on the ring. Of course, having no ring at all consigns a woman to the lowest caste, though no feminist would ever admit that. A woman needs a wedding ring like a fish needs a bicycle, don't ya know.

While wedding rings (or bands) have a long history, most of the time the purpose was not to indicate social status but to mark one's territory. In a sense, the presence of a ring indicates "hands off" my woman. As a symbol of marriage, a ring need not be expensive. The addition of diamonds to the rings, however, transforms them into status symbols.

Diamonds weren't a big deal until 1870, when large diamond mines were discovered in South Africa. The enormous output flooded the market, so how to keep the prices up? Those sparkly little baubles were attractive but how to make them precious, and hence more valuable?

There were, of course, industrial uses for diamonds, but that sort of demand is pretty well fixed. You can't create a demand for industrial-strength diamonds, though obviously the market for them will be better during economic upturns when manufacturing is on the rise. Creating a consumer demand for diamonds has greatly expanded the market. But how did that happen? Well, it started with a cartel.

In 1888 DeBeers Consolidated Mines was formed. This corporation oversaw all aspects of the diamond trade. Over the years, a number of their memes have become widespread. Even people who know next to nothing about diamonds have heard of the famous 4Cs (cut, color, clarity, carats) pertaining to diamonds.

Somewhat less renowned is the story of how diamonds and wedding rings became inseparable. In 1938 Harry Oppenheimer, son of the DeBeers founder, had a meeting with N.W. Ayer & Son, a legacy American advertising agency dating back to 1869. Any number of slogans (e.g., When it rains it pours, I'd walk a mile for a Camel, Reach out and touch someone, and Be all you can be) have emanated from this institution.

That 1938 meeting was called because the price of diamonds was falling worldwide. The Depression certainly played a part, but the real problem was that diamonds had not caught on in Europe. To be sure, the upper crust were into conspicuous adornment, but there were not enough of them to keep prices high, and the masses were not interested in diamonds. Americans were buying diamonds for engagement rings but even that market was depressed, and the diamonds they purchased were the low end of the stock. What to do? The supply was ample, so how to increase demand?

The plan was to interweave diamonds with love and marriage. Sure, a low-cost engagement ring serves the symbolic purpose, but if you really love that woman, get her an expensive ring to show you just how much you love her. And if you're a woman, the more expensive your engagement ring, the more your man loves you. Thanks to gynocentrism, both sexes fell right into line. It should have been no surprise.

In my advertising days, I read a number of works on motivational psychology. Gynocentrism wasn't a term back then, but it was always lurking in the background. It has always been thus; gynocentrism is to motivational psychology as the deep state is to government. They've always been there but until recently nobody ever talked about them.

At any rate, a multi-front advertising campaign was launched. In the dominant media of the time (movies, radio, magazines, newspapers) diamonds took center stage, thus enhancing their desirability.

Well, merging diamonds with love has proved to be a marriage made in heaven. The phrase "a diamond is forever" (and by implication so is love, despite ample evidence to the contrary) dates back to an advertising campaign that began in 1947. By 1956, even James Bond was on board when Ian Fleming published Diamonds Are Forever.

At any rate, the very notion of getting married without a diamond ring became unthinkable in America. Eventually, foreign ad agencies were brought in to sell the concept in other countries. In Brazil, for example, men and women wore a simple band on the right hand after engagement and simply switched it to the left hand after the ceremony. A perfect wedding of simplicity and symbolism! But not terribly profitable.

Now think about engagement rings. These also date back to ancient times, but like wedding rings, they were simpler. It could have been a gold band, or it might have been a ring, a bracelet, or an anklet made of braided grass. That might have been all right in its day, but now we've got all those diamonds available. Let's not let those rocks go to waste!

Another market waiting to be created and exploited was male wedding rings. They are common today but that has not always been the case. My father (born 1914) never had one, and I don't recall my grandfather (born 1896) ever wearing one. Wedding rings for men did not catch on till the second half of the 20th Century. Now they are essential. A man who refuses a wedding ring today would be suspect. If a man has one and doesn't wear it, he must be on the prowl for extracurricular action.

The fusion of love and diamonds was a success, but why stop there? Unfortunately, since diamonds were forever, i.e., indestructible, they do not need to be replaced. Even worse, they were often passed on as heirlooms. Some men even recycle their mother's rings and offer them to their prospective brides.

Thanks to the permanence of diamonds and their reliable supply, the resale market is not robust and not likely to improve. If dead women are sometimes buried with their rings on, it really doesn't make much difference to the market in the long run. A growing population could keep demand high but with the stagnation of wages over the past several decades, people might decide that diamonds, albeit forever, are not for them, and jewelry would revert to being adornments of the wealthy.

The diamond mines in South Africa are far from tapped out, but the discovery of diamond mines in Siberia threatened to flood the market and depress prices. So DeBeers had a tete-a-tete with the erstwhile Soviet Union and brought them into the cartel.

Now if you're convinced that diamonds are for suckers, what are the chances that you could convince a young woman to accept a diamond-free band for an engagement and/or wedding ring today? Probably not good. If you're going to ask a girl to marry you, you better get down on one knee and whip out a ring with a rock when you pop the question.

Buying a diamond ring makes no economic sense, but if you don't do it, you are a tightwad, and a man who does not spend his money on his woman is no better than a man with no money to spend – at least before marriage. After marriage, the man's assets are easier to attach.

In 2015 the average cost of a wedding ring was $6,113. In 2016 the average price of an engagement ring was $4,758. That's almost $11,000 per relationship. Oh, wait, let's not forget men's wedding rings. They averaged all of $468 in 2015. Gender equality, anyone?

Just imagine how much money has been thrown away on these trinkets since the cartel and the ad agency folks went to work. No matter how you calculate it, the amount would be staggering. In fact, one has to wonder how many desires have been implanted in clueless gynocentric men's heads thanks to ad campaigns. Diamonds certainly don't qualify as a need, any more than cologne, hip attire, sports cars, or any of the other goodies modern men waste money on; none is a need, but without advertising, would they even qualify as a want?

What will the diamond industry do if the marriage rate continues to plummet? As effective as ad agencies are, I seriously doubt that they can ever find a way to sell modern marriage to growing numbers of red-pill men. Come to think of it, anyone working as a wedding planner or earning a living in family law courts may have to seek out other work in the future.

I suspect some totally different advertising campaign will arise to keep diamond demand up. I wouldn't be surprised to see ad agencies come up with campaigns to persuade women to buy their own jewelry and leave men out of the equation altogether. Maybe the target demographic will be the growing number of women who have hit the wall without a mate. Ladies, you can fill the void in your life with something shiny and overpriced. Show the world you don't need no man to buy you jewelry.

The ad agencies know what makes women tick. I think they can convince them to buy their own bling. Hell, if you can sell torn blue jeans, tattoos, and purple hair dye to women, you can probably sell them anything.

Woman bishop wants to castrate God and free women in the name of gender equality

April 16, 2022 | by Jules Gomes | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: While A Voice for Men takes no stand on the question of religious faith or lack of faith, we are pleased to publish the following piece by 'Rebel Priest' Jules Gomes, who provides an example of anti-male bias currently infiltrating the Christian Church. As with all histories, philosophies and religions, feminist deconstruction of all things male is seeping into the every institution.

Rachel Treweek, Bishop of Gloucester, is a über-feminist. In 2018, she called for the God of the Bible to undergo Gender Reassignment Surgery. "I don't want young girls or young boys to hear us constantly refer to God as he," she told The Telegraph.

Jesus, the Son of God, called God his Father. Treweek grew up praying the Lord's Prayer and calling God "Our Father". But now, as the most senior female bishop in the Church of England and a member of the House of Lords, our Rachel has inside information that God wishes to transition to a non-gendered being.

The "mind your language" bishop, oddly enough, hasn't yet objected to the masculine nomenclature of the House of "Lords" or to the masculine form of "bishop" – she threw her mitre at me after I called her a "bishopess". Of course, she believes bubble-gum popping tweens and teens will come flooding into the Church of England if we stopped calling God by his preferred choice of pronoun.

Once Treweek gets rids of God the Father's toxic masculinity, her next project will be to persuade God the Son to put his name on the NHS waiting list for Hormone Therapy. Jesus can have a second incarnation as a woman and Treweek can re-brand Jesus Christ as Jessie Christa.

"I am very hot about saying can we always look at what we are communicating," she says. Treweek is also very hot on setting prisoners free – she intends to implement the Nazareth manifesto from Luke's gospel, where Jesus, reading from the prophet Isaiah, announces that God has called him "to proclaim liberty to the captives, and the opening of the prison to those who are bound".

Now that Treweek is Bishop for Women's Prisons she's flagged off her campaign for prison reform in the House of Lords last week. Surely that's not a bad thing? But before you raise a toast and sing She's a jolly good fellow (sexist, eh?) to this reincarnation of Elizabeth Fry, take a deep breath and listen to the whole story.

Treweek doesn't want all prisoners to go free. There are around 4,000 female prisoners in Her Majesty's Prisons and her heart bleeds for these victims of the patriarchal society, which is, no doubt, to blame for women committing crimes. Treweek wants only the guilty women to be let loose. The male prisoners can rot in Wormwood Scrubs for all she cares (unless they self-identify as women).

After all, she's a feminist. But isn't feminism all about equal rights for women? My dictionary defines "feminism" as "the advocacy of women's rights on the ground of the equality of the sexes." So Rachel, by your own standards, women and men are equal. Men and women are equal before God – in creation and salvation (which is why Treweek was one of the pioneering campaigners for women's ordination).

If Treweek wants us to treat women as equal to men, why is she launching a campaign that is predicated entirely on special pleading for women? Is she taking us back to the dreadful days of patriarchal hegemony where women were considered the weaker sex? If women can fight in commando units like the SAS in Her Majesty's Army, surely they aren't complaining just because they have to do "equal time for equal crime" as the men in Her Majesty's Prisons?

So why is Bishop Rachel calling for a change to the way women are sentenced? Why is she calling for a review of short prison sentences and asking for consideration of community-based orders and rehabilitation for women with less serious offences? Why is she calling for women offenders to be given more lenient sentences?

Her first reason is that "these women present a distinct set of needs and their imprisonment has a significant impact on communities and society as a whole". Well, don't men have an equally distinct set of needs? Doesn't throwing them behind bars also have a significant impact particularly on the family? What if the man of the family is the only breadwinner? What if he is an activist who is not around to protect them from rape squad threats as reportedly happened in the case of Tommy Robinson's wife and two small children?

We know that a pregnant woman presents a distinct set of needs. But what if this is used as a get-out card as in the case of Natalie Williams from Darlington, County Durham, who after she was arrested, deliberately got pregnant with a new boyfriend – to stay out of prison?

Treweek talks about "the vulnerabilities and challenges of women in prison" but does not name them. Yes, some women, like some men, would certainly be more vulnerable and face more challenges than others. But, surely, to label an entire group on the basis of their gender as "vulnerable" is the most offensive kind of gender stereotyping, isn't it, Rachel?

At the recent Fourth International Conference for Men's Rights, where I was invited as a speaker, I heard the testimony of boxer and physical trainer Ramon Sosa, a US citizen from Puerto Rico. Using photographs and FBI reports, Sosa narrated how a stunningly beautiful Mexican illegal immigrant lured him into marriage and used him to legalise her immigration status. When the couple were on the verge of divorce, she got his best friend to hire a hit man to kill him for $12,000 so she could inherit his business. The FBI staged his death and arrested his wife. She escaped a life sentence and is doing 20 years in jail.

Bishop Rachel, I do wish you would send Mrs Sosa a bottle of Chanel, a bouquet of flowers and a "Get Out Soon" card.

What is Treweek's justification for privileging women offenders over their men counterparts? ABUSE! Yes! "Unfortunately, the majority of women offenders have experienced some sort of abuse, whether from a partner or a family member," she laments in her speech to the House of Lords.

Feminist Cassie Jaye discovered that men were the real victims of discrimination when filming "The Red Pill"

Treweek cites Women in Prison, who typically blame "abuse, marginalisation and poverty" as "the root of so much of women's offending". She parrots their statistics:

“53% of women in jail report having experienced physical, emotional or sexual abuse during childhood; 46% report having suffered domestic violence; and over 30% spent time in local authority care as a child.”

But does “abuse” justify criminal behaviour? Also, would Bishop Rachel support lighter sentences for male offenders if they were abused or orphaned?

Alan Dershowitz, leading criminal lawyer, Harvard Law School professor, and a staunch liberal, lambasts what he calls “the abuse excuse”. In his book The Abuse Excuse and other Cop-Outs, Sob Stories and Evasions of Responsibility, Dershowitz argues that excuses that are gender-specific, send a “dangerous double message of irresponsibility, especially about women. After all, if women who have been abused are not responsible for their violence, then does it not follow that such women are irresponsible and thus untrustworthy?”

Unlike Treweek, Dershowitz really believes in women’s equality. He contends that the kind of “generalization” perpetuated by Treweek and Women in Prison, “if accepted – would contribute a major setback for abused women, and for women in general. It would confirm the sexist stereotype of the woman out of control. Such a generalisation would also be an insult to the thousands of abused women who obey the law – who have not engaged in violence,” because “the truth is that the vast majority of women (and men) who have been abused are entirely capable of controlling their behaviour and complying with the law”.

Perhaps the next time Treweek calls for women to be admitted to so-called Women’s centres rather than prison for their crimes, she could buttress her case by throwing in the premenstrual syndrome defence. Orthopaedic surgeon Geraldine Richter got away with drunken driving and assaultive behaviour after arguing it was premenstrual syndrome, not drunkenness, which caused her crime. This stigmatizes all women with PMS who do not drive drunk or engage in physical violence during the pre-menstrual part of their cycle.

What would Treweek do with 24-year-old Lorena Bobbit who took a knife and cut of her husband John’s penis when he was fast asleep, took the penis and fled in her car, tossing it out on the highway. “He always have orgasm, and he doesn’t wait for me to have orgasm,” the Ecuadorian-born Lorena complained. “He’s selfish.” Lorena also claimed that John raped her. A jury of nine women and three men acquitted John. Searching for his penis, though, was like looking for a needle in a haystack. It was finally found and reattached to John.

Treweek needs to take a red pill before she puts her feminist Nazareth manifesto into operation. The red pill, a popular cultural meme, derived from The Matrix, represents the brutal truths of reality. In 2016, celebrity journalist Cassie Jaye produced a documentary called The Red Pill. Jaye, a feminist, set out to debunk men’s rights movements. Jaye was red pilled by her investigations: men, not women, are the real victims of discrimination in the West, she concluded.
