This article is a very basic introduction to a single concept that most people will instantly reject on a visceral level: That feminist policies breed Domestic Violence while pretending to prevent it. I'm not going to quote lots of statistics and studies, or variables and technicalities. I will however, state that the Duluth Model* of domestic violence, on which virtually all DV policy and "education" is based, has been thoroughly debunked – it represents as common, the very least common type of Intimate Partner Violence (brutal male/innocent female.)

I am highlighting a causal relationship between feminist policy and domestic violence. To see this principle in action, go to any courthouse and sit through a day or two of family court. And while you're there, remember that the feminist-sponsored Violence Against Women Act pays for the "advocates" who coach women on how to present their cases, while the men are advised by their lawyers to "plead to a lesser charge." Remember that VAWA pays the cost of housing the men in jail while they await their hearings.

VAWA also funds prosecution of cases of "violence against women." Everybody in that courtroom, except the accused male, has income (and power) to gain by painting him as a monster, including his own counsel. In theory they could railroad women in the same way because technically, abuse by women is still illegal, but it's a lot easier to convince the public that hundreds of men in any given community are abusers, as opposed to hundreds of women. We notice when women are accused of crimes. Men, on the other hand? Well, men are pigs, right? Abuse is what we've been trained to expect from them.

80% of all victims of violence are men, yet we have the Violence Against Women Act, ostensibly to protect women from (primarily domestic/relationship) violence. How did this happen? Why is violence against women presumed to be worse than violence against men? Because women are weak and vulnerable? Because nobody takes women seriously? Whatever the appeal, it worked; even though violence against women was already illegal, the thought of violence committed against the "helpless," offends us so deeply that we decided it was perfectly reasonable to spare no expense and overlook no preventive measure, if it would reduce the number of victims. Random violence is relatively rare and tough to manage, but domestic violence is so, well, curable, right?

Who doesn't want to stop Domestic Violence?

Professional feminists, that's who. Without DV victims, feminists would have no rallying cry, and they would lose political power. Here's how it works:

Thanks primarily to the Violence Against Women Act, DV has become a multi-billion dollar industry. This industry employs many thousands of people throughout the nation, paying them with federal VAWA grant money. And those thousands of people have made relatively little headway in achieving their "goal" of reducing DV. Indeed they perpetuate it. This is by design; if DV went away, so would their jobs. There are many, many factors involved in DV, and it's no coincidence that feminist policies aggravate nearly all of them, but for the sake of clarity I'm going to address only a simplified but significant few of them here.

Who commits a substantial proportion of DV? Past victims or witnesses of DV. Who committed the DV that they experienced or witnessed? In too many cases to count, it is women. Women commit far more than half of all DV. Among the vast majority of violent couples, the violence is mutual. Additionally, women commit the majority of child abuse. Yes, women are responsible for most DV.

Next point, what often triggers DV? Stress. What causes women lots of stress? The constant obligations of child rearing. What causes even more child rearing stress? Not having a father in the family. How are so many fathers removed from their families? They are accused of Domestic Violence, whether it happened or not, and whether it's mutual or not. Disagreements are exaggerated, violence is "invented" or men are blamed for any real violence that does occur.

The result is that fathers, often the most stable influence in the family, are kicked to the curb and financially bled dry, while mothers are protected and are excused for their "missteps;" this is the unstable – and all too often abusive – environment in which their children are raised. Toss in a few more variables like substance abuse, a string of violent boyfriends, and a bit of poverty, and this process is guaranteed to produce future domestic abusers. And this is the process that VAWA has institutionalized. It no longer happens "once in a while;" it is SOP. Was this the intent of VAWA? Who cares? That's the result.

Thanks to VAWA, once a father is accused of DV, his chances of keeping his family (or his assets, his reputation, his friends, often even his job) are almost nil. Conversely, most mothers have to commit "front page news" crimes to lose custody of their children. VAWA provides billions of dollars for programs that "protect women from their abusers." Yet it provides virtually nothing to help men or children escape their abusers, if those abusers are women. VAWA addresses less that half of the DV it encounters. Instead of working to reduce Domestic Violence, VAWA works to ensure that millions of children will continue to suffer abuse, and will likely grow up to become abusers themselves.

I am currently reading AVFM Editor-at-Large Erin Pizzey's memoir, "This Way to the Revolution." Forty years ago, long before VAWA, she founded the first battered women's shelter in the UK, and she immediately discovered that many of her "victims" were at least as violent as their “abusers.” She was harassed, threatened and demonized by powerful feminists for saying so out loud. For decades. This understanding of Domestic Violence is not new. However sharing this knowledge with the general population, could completely obliterate feminist control of the family courts.

And it should.

Question: Why on earth would anyone try to suppress the undeniable fact that “we’re doing it wrong?” Answer: A lot of women’s careers depend on “doing it wrong.”. These women have no qualms about throwing children, men, and other women under the bus to keep their jobs. Feminism doesn’t care about children (VAWA doesn’t even count them as victims.) It doesn’t care about families (broken families are its bread and butter.) It doesn’t care about women’s safety (resources wasted on imagined abuse, are channeled away from victims of real abuse.)

Feminism cares about controlling, dominating, destroying and extorting the men who pay Feminism’s bills. Everything else is window dressing. Don’t believe me? Follow the money. Oh, but you can’t; there doesn’t seem to be a paper trail; no readily available accounting of how and where VAWA money is distributed. One might think some people are conspiring to keep the rest of us in the dark…

Leveling up to the red pill

January 24, 2023 | by Hopeland Cash | Link | Original Link

There are as many red pill stories as there are Men's Human Rights Activits (MHRAs), Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs), Honey Badgers (women who support the men's movement), and anti-feminists. There is no single way, and the discovery of greater awareness is rarely a quick process, often a lonely journey, and by its very nature can't come without a dose of pain and confusion.

For some men, the red pill can only be found after a profound trauma, a terrible abuse that plants a seed of skepticism and draws them out into the light of truth. For others, it is found in the mounting realization that society isn't delivering on its promises. For me, there was no single event. Instead of a red pill moment, I had a red pill progression. I am an MHRA because I know it is a right and just cause, and I am compelled to activism by the ever-growing library of truth and facts I discover and the visceral need to combat all the hate and lies that oppose their illumination. I know that now, but it was a slow, grating march toward truth that challenged the world as I had been raised to see it.

Like most MHRAs, as a young man I needed a red pill in the worst possible way (though I didn't know it then). I was raised in a liberal feminist family, but that handicap was offset somewhat, I think, by my sisters. Don't get me wrong, my sisters aren't bad siblings, but thanks to them I never harbored any delusions of female purity or innate virtue; I always knew girls were people, not snowflakes, and my upbringing was more egalitarian than most. That's why I've never been a skirt-chaser or a full-blown white knight. I was taught the feminist narrative and believed it, though. My mother isn't a raving rad-fem, and I have a good relationship with my father, but I believed in "chivalry" and opposed "sexism" and all that. There never seemed any reason to question those things, but then something happened that started me down my path to the MHRM: I became a gamer.

First it was video games like Skies of Arcadia and Knights of the Old Republic, then after high school I got into tabletop role-playing games, specifically Dungeons and Dragons (Edition 3.5, thank you very much). As far as my feminism was concerned, that was the beginning of the end. Strange, I know, and there was no reason to suspect any such thing would happen; I started playing DnD on a whim, and it wasn't the gaming itself that did it, but the creativity it inspired that liberated my mind and eventually let me slay the beast of my own feminism and loot that wonderful red pill.

Dungeons and Dragons is a brilliant platform for interactive storytelling. I don't play anymore, but I still believe that. I immediately took to the role of game-mastering, and I was the type who loved to do home-brew (creating original content from scratch). I invented complex worlds, new species, classes, and abilities, etc. It was a fantastic creative experience, but my favorite part was inventing societies. I was probably inspired by my love of Star Trek and its exploration of speculative cultures, so I did the same in Dungeons and Dragons, writing whole explanations of cultures, their customs, dress, sport, rituals, religions. I even wrote pieces of short fiction exploring a "day in the life" of a citizen of these societies, and through this I explored a wide breadth of concepts as creative exercises.

There was one of my creations in particular that proved the most impactful on my life even long after I put away the dice. It was a culture of elves (yeah, like Lord of the Rings, but less Orlando Bloom), a society at war with a neighboring state. I toyed with ideas of what kind of people they might be, and then, inspired by elves' androgyny, I decided to do a gender flip. They're at war, but what if women were the soldiers?

What followed was the thought experiment that changed my life and made me an MHRA. I figured, if the women were the soldiers, then the men would take on the women's roles and duties, and by extension their problems. Wouldn't it be interesting, said my young, unformed brain, if men were the oppressed sex? You know, hypothetically (wink, wink). So I ran some Google searches. It's been far too long, so I don't remember what exactly I searched for, but I came across some highly unexpected Wikipedia pages. They talked of bizarre concepts like male under-representation in education and the bias of divorce courts.

I'd never heard such ideas. Men suffering from systemic socially ingrained biases and misconceptions leading to mistreatment and a lack of recognition for their pain?

It can't be!

But it was, and only more and more so as I read further. Fathers' rights became of particular interest to me, and I was becoming ever more astounded by the depths of abuse leveled on fathers and children. I remember sharing these horror stories with friends and family and feeling genuinely aghast. Even more horrifying, I would soon realize, was the sheer ignorance surrounding these issues.

Getting back to Dungeons and Dragons, I continued to explore these social issues in my own private way as part of my gaming. I created more gender-flipped societies, and in my naiveté I even wrote up one with two social castes of women, one of which practiced the radical feminism I was becoming increasingly aware of in the real world and the other that stuck to "good feminism."

Ah, youth.

Eventually I stopped playing Dungeons and Dragons, but I still game here and there, and enjoy science-fiction more than anything. My eyes had been opened, however, and though I hadn't yet realized it there was no turning back. I kept reading about men's issues, and as I began writing fiction I integrated these issues into my stories. A month didn't seem to go by where I didn't come upon yet another social ill facing men. Healthcare, life expectancy, suicide, general legal bias, lack of reproductive rights. The list grew, and grows still, like the endless chains of quests and bosses to be faced in an RPG. I knew I couldn't fix these problems, but it would've been comforting if at least they'd stopped spawning!

Through all this, I continually came back to a single core fact: ignorance is the greatest enemy of men's rights. I was kept ignorant, through no malice of my parents, for years, and when I discovered men's issues I was perpetually shocked not just by the terrible severity of these social wrongs, but also by the very fact that I hadn't heard of them. How could men be suffering so much without anyone talking about it?

I wanted to be one of the people who would talk about it. I toyed with the ideas in my role-playing, I touched on the issues in my fiction, I began blogging about portrayals of men in the media, and eventually, after a chance click-through from an article on the National Parents Organization, I found A Voice for Men. Within a year I had published my first article here.

And I will continue to do so because these issues matter, and because people still aren't talking about it. Some men only find out after their lives are ruined in the military, divorce court, or by a rape accusation; many women have to see the pain of their brothers, sons, husband, or father to realize what is wrong; if I hadn't asked that simple question, What if women were the soldiers?, I might have never found out. I could've kept swallowing the blue pill, gone neck-deep into student debt, married the first Mary Sue to come along just to get people to stop asking if I'm gay, and be waiting for my turn on the gallows of manhood before I saw through all the lies.

I got lucky. I asked questions. I was stubborn enough to not back down. Things like role-playing and science-fiction are male-dominated, maybe because they look past how reality is and wonder how it could be. That is a powerful lens through which to discover new ideas, but also to see the truth of the world around us. More men need to ask those tough questions because the answers are out there if they look.

That is how the MHRM will grow, through the process of discovery. We don't indoctrinate with ego-stroking and victim narratives; we illuminate with facts, with the stories of real people. When enough men and women learn the truth, it will begin to spread even faster, and someday men won't have to suffer those brutal scars or stumble on the truth by accident; it will be freely available to be assessed just like every other philosophy, rejected or accepted by each individual.

Even more than that, I look forward to the day A Voice for Men is graced by an author who can honestly say, "I didn't have a red pill moment" because he or she was raised right, was taught the truth by mother and father, and never had to overcome the handicap of indoctrination and misinformation. That will be the generation that doesn't just advocate men's rights but lives them. That is our endgame.

Anti-Gynocentrism is the Only Anti-Feminism That Matters

January 26, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Men's Rights Advocates have often watched with bemusement as newcomers arrive declaring support for men, with a resume saying just one thing: "I'm an antifeminist," as if that were all we needed to know.

Because antifeminism and men's rights activism is synonymous, right? That's literally what they assume.

With the resume tabled they quickly move to promote a gynocentric tradition that gushes about males saving women from floods, fires, bullets, or sparing them from minor inconveniences in life – like discomfort, dirt, criticism or employment. Feminine women, they say, are best preserved as home-makers; each woman as precious as the fingers of a concert pianist which must never be put under strain. Men, they say, are heroes, put on this earth to lift heavy things as Jordan Peterson would say, and lift them specifically for the fragile, and of course pregnant, womenfolk.

"Life back then was as close as we can get to perfect" they foam, "it was an arrangement that saw feminine women give compliments to men for ongoing sacrifices — an arrangement far superior to the feminist approach which goes out of its way to denigrate men while expecting those very same sacrifices to continue."

It is superior because massaging a man's ego in exchange for expected sacrifice is somehow less denigrating than saying, as the feminists do, "we hate you." But is such gratitude really better when both feminist and traditionalist women continue to expect male servitude – when they both reduce men to the role of 'do things for me'?

That is the essence of the deal: a little ego-stroking in exchange for a man destroying himself. She inflates his ego like a helium balloon, at least in the area of saving, serving and pedestalizing her, and he signs up for a smorgasbord of self-destructive sacrifices and an earlier death.

We could be forgiven for interpreting the traditionalist woman's complimenting of male sacrifice as superficial gushing, offered up with all the sincerity of a Miss World candidate saying she wants to bring about world peace, while watching the corpses pile up around her.

That appears to be the gynocentric tradition that most anti-feminists are peddling, the one they would substitute in place of feminist models. Here I should add that not all traditionalists are like that – at least not for the tiny minority of red pill men and women who seek to preserve the otherwise valuable, non-gynocentric aspects of tradition.

Some readers might protest that we should be grateful for those charging forward to destroy progressive gynocentrism (feminism) in order to substitute traditional gynocentrism in its place. But for this old timer that program reads like a rejection of Judas, in order to take sides with Iscariot.

I'm sure you all get the point.

As Paul Elam once summarized, 'anti-gynocentrism is the only anti-feminism that matters.'

Compare the traditional gynocentrist as described above with women who are neither feminist nor traditional gynocentrist; women like Janice Fiamengo, Suzanne McCarley, Elizabeth Hobson, Alison Tieman, Hanna Wallen and countless others who are as quick to question the unbalanced privileges of traditional women as they are the privileges held by feminists. The difference in perspective between these two kinds of women couldn't be more stark.

The rest unfortunately are frauds, women masquerading as allies while inviting men to adopt a women-serving scam with the bait of a 1950s smock and a demure look, women who are today unwilling to match men with reciprocal gestures or labor, nor the shouldering of life's stresses. When traditional gynocentric women are featured in media interviews, gushing praise for the usefulness of "masculinity" and "real men" who save women from house fires, one can't help but notice there's an absence of discussion of what's in it for the men, as if its not a relevant concern.

Perhaps praising is a form of respect for men, but respect for what? On face value it looks like that of a narcissist who "respects" others as food to satisfy his/her impersonal gluttony for special treatment.

Perhaps I could be more generous and say that rather than trying to enslave men, the I'm-Not-A-Feminist Gynocentrists are simply behind the times, believing that they are championing the lesser of the only two evils on offer. They view it as the lesser of the two evils because, under traditional gynocentrism, men were at least complimented for their labor, and given medals after their deaths – a thing denied under the feminist vision which sees men and women as competitors for narcissistic turf in which only women receive compliments. Not men, but women alone are the 'Stunning and the Brave.'

Sadly, the traditional contract under which that situation worked, the one that limited men's and women's options in favor of narrow set roles, can no longer work in a culture that refuses to encourage and support that same contract. Wave after wave of feminist activity has seen the toothpaste squeezed completely out of the tube. Women will never go back to the "role" of baby-making, apple-pie cooking wives, because any attempt to reduce women's "multi-option" life will be met with resentment, if not interpreted as abuse. Therefore any attempts to enact that traditional role today will amount to little more than cosplay.

Swapping progressive gynocentrism for traditional gynocentrism is going nowhere. We can no more turn back the clock on 'Women's Liberation' than we should ignore the fact that's Men's Liberation now is due – men who no longer need to be tied to the traditionalist role of He-for-She.

Before bringing this article to a close I want to come back to the question of what, if anything, is the value of anti-feminism for the men's rights movement. To that, two of the more obvious answers come to mind.

Firstly, antifeminist work pushes back against efforts to create more He-For-She demands, e.g. for men's supposed responsibility to stop partner violence; for men's responsibility to address the 'wage gap'; for men to assist in promoting affirmative action policies; to do more household chores; for taking up too much female space on public transport, or for not setting the office air conditioning to women's desired temperature. These and many more 'patrarchy-do' lists amount to little more than collective female nagging, which anti-feminists are helping to call out in the public domain.

Secondly, anti-feminists fight the widespread censorship of men's issues by feminists. The problem of feminist-driven deplatforming and censorship was even apparent in Ernest B. Baxs' day, which he described in the year 1913; "[Feminists] seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known." In response there has always existed people within the MRM who push back against feminist-driven censorship of men's issues, and indeed censorship from other sources, and this needs to continue with full force.

To put these two concerns in context, pushing back against feminist demands on men, and feminist censorship, have never been the only goal of the men's movement despite claims by some that the MRM is synonymous with 'antifeminist backlash.' To suggest equivalence is to confuse purely antifeminist movements with the much broader portfolio of the men's human rights movement.

A survey of the last 100 years reveals that the MRM is concerned more directly with issues impacting men and boys such as alimony, genital mutilation of male infants, homelessness, mental illness, false accusations, family court bias, suicide, child custody, low funding for male health issues, legal discrimination, educational performance, and misandry in mainstream culture just to name a few. And just as important, a pressing issue today is fostering of more life choices for men: Its time for men to embrace whatever options exist beyond the narrowly prescribed role of serving women – just as women long ago rejected narrow roles and responsibilities toward men.

The time for the multi-option man is now.

Despite the myths we hear about Middle Eastern women being utterly oppressed, anyone who looks at the situation experienced by many women and men in this area tells a different story. Take Zara Faris, for example:

Indeed, she makes a strong case for why women are strongly advantaged overall in her religion. The question we'd ask her is: Are men advantaged in any particular way? From what we can detect, it sounds like they aren't, even if sensationalist Western media wants us to think differently.

Myth vs. reality: Universal suffrage in the UK

January 28, 2023 | by William Collins | Link | Original Link

The popular belief is that the suffragettes won the vote for women and before that men already had the vote. Both these beliefs are false.

What follows is a story that almost no one knows about the true history of universal suffrage in the UK. I have pieced it together partly by reading the parliamentary records from 1917 (these records are known as Hansard).

The true history of universal suffrage in the UK is the history of the working-class struggle, not a gendered issue at all.

The property-based right to vote goes back at least to King Henry VI in 1432, when it was established that only people owning property worth 40 shillings or more could vote. Since this sum remained unchanged over centuries, the natural effect of inflation was to increase the size of the electorate. But even by the eighteenth century, the electorate was still only about 1% or 2% of the population (though virtually all men).

During the Victorian era, there were three reform acts that together increased the proportion of men eligible to vote to about 50%. As an illustration of the unreliable, partisan commentary you will find on websites on the issue of the franchise, consider this quote from Ref. 1:

> Political changes were very slow in coming from 1750 to 1900. Those that did come in 1832 and 1867 were seen as not changing a great deal especially as neither gave women the right to vote.

This fatuous remark dismisses the reform acts as unimportant on the grounds that they did not give the vote to women. But these acts increased the male franchise from almost nothing to half the adult male population, hardly an insignificant matter. And hardly insignificant even if your whole focus is on women because, without men pioneering a broader franchise, the ground would not have been prepared for women to do so later. It is a fine illustration of how a gynocentric mindset fails to appreciate that the fates of men and women are interwoven.

The years immediately before the First World War (WWI) were the most active period for the suffragists campaigning for the vote for women. But throughout WWI only about half of men aged 21 and over had the vote. Most of the men killed or maimed in that war did not have the vote.

The popular version of the story of how women got the vote is summarised in Ref. 2:

> The standard version of the story of the fight for female suffrage sees it as a straight contest between the suffragettes and a chauvinistic male establishment, headed – not to say embodied – by the prime minister, Asquith, and encompassing blinkered politicians, burly policemen and brutal prison warders. This [traditional] version has the merit of simplicity, with obvious heroes and > villains, which makes it well suited to general public consumption; unfortunately it ignores some of the important paradoxes of the story.

That is an understatement. The standard version of the story is completely incorrect.

The principal misunderstanding that I wish to expose is that before WWI the main barrier to women being granted the vote was not the absence of support for the idea among (male) politicians. On the contrary, there was widespread support within the Liberal and Labour parties. Ref. 2 tells us:

> On the whole male politicians were by no means opposed to some form of female suffrage. The Labour Party supported it, and leading figures like Keir Hardie and George Lansbury were deeply involved in the issue, Lansbury to such an extent that he voluntarily, though unsuccessfully, put himself up for re-election in his Bow and Bromley constituency on a female suffrage platform. A substantial section of the Liberal Party, quite possibly the majority, supported it, as did many leading Liberals, including Churchill, Lloyd George and Sir Edward Grey.

In view of such widespread support for their cause, why did the suffragists fail to win the vote earlier? The answer is, with delicious irony, their sexism.

They campaigned for “Votes for Women,” but they should have campaigned for “Votes for All.” They failed to understand the nature of the obstacle to their enfranchisement. It was not lack of male politicians’ support. The obstacle was that working-class men did not have the vote, and it was politically essential for working-class men to get the vote before it became possible for women.

Prior to WWI, there were many attempts to pass bills to permit limited female enfranchisement. All failed. They had to fail for a very simple, purely party-political, reason. Because only men from the upper half of society had the vote, the best that could be offered to women was to give the vote to upper-class women. But the support for female enfranchisement lay in the Labour and Liberal parties. Giving the vote only to upper-class women was perceived as introducing a few million extra Conservative voters into the electorate. So how could the Labour and Liberal parties support it? It would have been electoral suicide. So, those men who were inclined to favour female suffrage nevertheless had to vote it down, while the Conservatives were against it on principle.

So, you see, votes for women were an impossibility unless and until working-class men got the vote—to break the above political deadlock.

By 1916 the British Government realized it had a problem. The electoral process had been shot to pieces by the war. The electoral register had become a nonsense, with the most important voters being away fighting in France and elsewhere, and huge numbers of people in the UK had moved around the country to do essential war work. This led to a fundamental re-think of the franchise.

The extraordinarily egalitarian recommendations of the 1918 Representation of the People Act were summarised by a near contemporaneous US source thus:

> The old practice of defining franchises in terms of relationship to property would have to be discontinued, and that in lieu thereof it would be necessary to adopt the principle that suffrage is a personal right inherent in the individual.

This proposal, to extend the franchise to all adult men, enjoyed overwhelming majority support across all parties and in both Houses of Parliament. It was recognised that anything less would be insupportable after the horrors of the trenches. This is absolutely clear from reading the many debates on the act in 1917 as recorded in Hansard. The Home Secretary, George Cave (Conservative) introduced the act as follows:

> War by all classes of our countrymen has brought us nearer together, has opened men's eyes, and removed misunderstandings on all sides. It has made it, I think, impossible that ever again, at all events in the lifetime of the present generation, there should be a revival of the old class feeling which was responsible for so much, and, among other things, for the exclusion for a period, of so many of our population from the class of electors. I think I need say no more to justify this extension of the franchise.

So there we have it. The principle purpose for the 1918 act was the need to dissolve the previous class-based franchise—and the specific motivation was the recognition that "If they are fit to fight they are fit to vote"—an actual quote from Hansard. The primary motivation was men.

Women got the vote as a virtually automatic collateral consequence of working-class men finally getting the vote. WW1 broke the previous political deadlock.

If the new mood to recognise the rights of working-class men was the result of the slaughter going on in the trenches—and it was—then this perspective suggests that the vote for women was bought with men's lives. This reality will not be popular in some quarters. It stands in stark and hideous contrast with feminist orthodoxy.

That women got the vote owes more to the Kaiser than to the Pankhursts.

The graph that heads this article tells the true story. With a suitable historical perspective, the bulk of men and women achieved the vote at much the same time. On an historical timescale, the enfranchisement of men hardly preceded that of women significantly.

During WWI most suffragettes suspended their campaigning activities. Many, including Emmeline and Christabel Pankhurst, took to speaking at recruiting drives for the war. The potential recruits would be largely from the working classes and hence would not have the vote. What staggering hypocrisy. The Pankhursts were insistent on their own right to have the vote while remaining safely at home, but at the same time they were happy to send to their deaths men and boys whose right to vote they did not recognise as significant. This must surely rank as one of the most flagrant pieces of amoral, political hypocrisy of all time.

The true history of women's suffrage is the working-class struggle. The correct perspective is gender-neutral. The historical Big Picture is that the enfranchisement of men and women was a single process. The suffragette movement did not bring about the enfranchisement of women. The suffragists failed to realise that their enfranchisement was a political impossibility unless working-class men were also enfranchised. This Big Snag was unsnagged by WWI, not by political protest.

While the suffragettes' perspective was the gender-specific "votes for women," this was only because they did not recognise the equal rights of working-class men who were also disenfranchised. The irony is that universal suffrage was ultimately achieved thanks to the slaughter of these same working-class men in the trenches. For this motivated the enfranchisement of working-class men, which had been the barrier to women's enfranchisement.

Monstrously, the one action of the suffragettes that really did assist with gaining votes for women was their involvement in sending men away to war. Present-day feminists are culpable because—even with the leisure to put the history into proper focus—they still insist on regarding the suffragettes as triumphing over the hegemony of men. The orthodox feminist narrative is not only inaccurate but disguises a horrible, if unintentional, truth. The "woman good, man bad" worldview is not only false but, in this context, also flagrantly heartless.

A Response to a Review of the Book “Men Without Work”

January 29, 2023 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

“Men Without Work” by Nicholas Eberstadt

The Washington Post recently published a review of a book Men Without Work: America’s Invisible Crisis by contributing columnist, former Indiana governor, and recent Purdue president Mitch Daniels.[i] The book “…depicts in deeply documented fashion the ‘invisible crisis’ that is the ‘decimation’ of the adult male workforce in America.”

Much of Mr. Daniel’s article discusses the book’s “Dissenting Points of View”, where the book’s author, Nicholas Eberstadt, included a section in the book that allowed critiques of his findings by two other scholars.

In that same dissenting spirit, I will offer a third view here that will show that both Daniels and Eberstadt missed a clear contributing factor to this crisis.

To begin, please note that I’m a proud longtime reader of the Post, who nevertheless has long noticed the paper’s gender bias, most notably its imbalanced coverage of domestic violence.

Two articles published by the Post in 2018 provide undeniable proof of this bias:

- Why can’t we hate men? This #MeToo inspired rant was written by a women’s studies professor who had the gall to publicly share her hatred of men to a worldwide audience.[ii]
- Amber Heard: I spoke up against sexual violence – and faced our culture’s wrath. That has to change. This is the op-ed that triggered the lawsuit that ultimately proved that Amber Heard abused Johnny Depp and that men can also be victims of domestic violence.

In response, I've been sending letters to Post columnists who have written articles that perpetuate the paper's biased, one-sided coverage of gender.

Although Daniel's article isn't in itself another example of the Post's gender bias, it is, I believe, another example of the success of some 50 years of feminist political and cultural indoctrination that drives the Post's bias. Neither Daniels nor Eberstadt has recognized or acknowledged the feminist pink elephant in the room:

The unbridled, obsessed, man-hating feminism that has run rampant, almost completely unchallenged, throughout the world for the past half century.

If one doubts the accuracy of this last statement, how can we reconcile the aforementioned 2018 Washington Post article "Why can't we hate men?" that provided a platform for a deranged feminist professor to openly and shamelessly express a Nazi-like hatred for men in a major American newspaper?

No analysis of the causes of the twin problems of the "collapse of work for American men" or the "decades-long retreat of men from higher ed" can be considered complete without including discussion of the negative, lifelong effects on men and boys of this man-hating feminism.

For example, Daniel's article briefly mentions the drop in male college participation and provides a few related statistics, but fails to describe the anti-male culture that has thrived for decades in America's colleges and universities, a culture that without a doubt contributes to the reduced number of young men in college.

I'm sure that most readers are aware of the 2006 Duke Lacrosse Rape Hoax and the 2014 Rolling Stone magazine libelous article A Rape on Campus, about a false gang rape accusation at a University of Virginia fraternity.

And as president of Purdue University from 2013 to 2022, I'm sure that Daniels is well acquainted with the U.S. Department of Education's "Dear Colleague Letter" issued to American colleges and universities under the presumed authority of Title IX.

The letter directed these schools, under penalty of losing all federal funding, to institute draconian changes to the way sexual assault accusations were to be handled.

The result of these changes is summarized in a book, The Campus Rape Frenzy — The Attack on Due Process at America's Universities:

"… the federal government, joined by virtually all colleges and universities, has mounted a systematic attack on bedrock American principles including the presumption of innocence, access to exculpatory evidence, the right to cross-examine one's accuser, and due process."

Stated more succinctly, the federal government, via the U.S. Department of Education, is complicit in undermining male college students' civil rights.

Is it any wonder why so many young men aren't going to college?

And for men who don't go to college, or even men who manage to graduate, the hateful excesses of feminism continue to negatively affect them not only in the workplace, but in marriage, in fatherhood and family courts, and in virtually every aspect of their lives.

This fact is summarized by a book written by Helen Smith, a forensic psychologist from Tennessee, Men on Strike: Why Men Are Boycotting Marriage, Fatherhood, and the American Dream – and Why It Matters:

"American society has become anti-male. Men are sensing the backlash and are responding. They're dropping out of college, leaving the workforce, and avoiding marriage and fatherhood at alarming rates. The trend is so pronounced that a number of books have been written about this man-child phenomenon, concluding that men have taken a vacation from responsibility. But why should men participate in a system that seems to be increasingly stacked against them? [emphasis added]"

As Men on Strike demonstrates, men aren't dropping out because they are stuck in arrested development; they are acting rationally in response to the lack of incentives society offers them to be responsible fathers, husbands, and providers. In addition, men are going on strike, either consciously or unconsciously, because they do not want to be injured by the myriad of laws, attitudes, and hostility against them for the crime of happening to be male in the 21st century. Men are starting to fight back. Men on Strike explains their battle cry."

In her book, Ms. Smith describes how more and more men are "Going John Galt", a term borrowed from Ayn Rand's Atlas Shrugged:

"… the basic theme is that John Galt and his allies take actions that include withdrawing their talents and "stopping the motor of the world" while leading the "strikers" (those who refused to be exploited) against the "looters" (the exploiters, backed by the government).

In some sense, men today feel very much like Rand's characters in Atlas Shrugged, knowing that they can be exploited for their sense of duty, production and just for being male at any time. The state transfers men's production to women and children through child support, alimony, divorce laws, and government entitlements that are mainly for women … or welfare payments to single mothers. It is not only in family relationships that men are screwed, but also in many areas of modern society. Men are portrayed as the bad guys, ready to rape, pillage, beat or abuse women and children at the drop of a hat. From rape laws that protect women but not the men they may accuse falsely to the lack of due process in sexual harassment cases on college campuses to airlines that will not allow men (possible perverts!) to sit next to a child, our society is at war with men and men know it full well. [emphasis added]"

By now it should be clear that until the hateful excesses of feminism described above are addressed, the problem documented by Men Without Work simply cannot be resolved.

There are just too many men who will continue to "Go John Galt".

i Daniels served as the 49th governor of Indiana from 2005 to 2013, and president of Purdue University from 2013 until the end of 2022. Notably, he also served as director of the Office of Management and Budget (2001-03) and White House Director of Political and Intergovernmental Affairs (1985-87)

ii Described by Eberstadt's fellow American Enterprise Institute analyst Mark Perry as "…the most hateful, venomous, vitriolic, malicious, misguided, despicable, vindictive, unpersuasive and reprehensible op-ed in the history of the Washington Post, and possibly in the history of modern journalism for a mainstream media publication."

Bird watching

February 1, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

I used to go bird watching when I was young but I haven't done it in a long time. I was thinking of getting back in to it. I thought I'd just discuss some of the birds I've watched over the years as some of you might like to take it up too. It can be a very rewarding hobby.

I love watching tits through binoculars while hiding in the woods. There aren't any tits where I live in Australia, though. I've only been able to see tits when travelling overseas. I think the tits in mainland Europe look great.

In contrast you can find boobies in Australia, but only on the coast. Over the years I've whiled away many hours sitting on the beach watching boobies.

Like myself I know a lot of you will enjoy watching a screamer but you'll generally have to go to South America to see them in the wild.

Some people like looking at cocks but that was never for me. While I've always left the cocks alone I never had a problem picking up chicks.

I've found too, that some people really hate getting woken up by cocks. But if you're going to live with one you just have to accept it. Cocks will be up early in the morning and there's nothing you can do about it.

There was one time I really wanted a shag but I couldn't get one. You can only get them in Europe. Besides, the government would object to me trying to bring one home.

I hope this short discussion on bird watching has sparked some interest.

Anyone interested in this topic may wish to visit the anti-feminist Facebook group Make Birding Great Again which people may find is a little more serious than this article.

Lyrics:

It says in Coronet Magazine
June nineteen-fifty six, page ten
That married women are not as happy
As women who have no men

Married women are cranky
Frustrated and disgusted
While single women are bright and gay
Creative and well adjusted

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When we need to move the piano
Otherwise they can stay at home
And read about the White Sox

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Manhattan

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When they have tickets for the symphony
Otherwise they can stay at home
And play a game of pinochle

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Wisconsin

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

The can come to see us
When they’re feeling pleasant and agreeable
Otherwise they can stay at home
And holler at the TV programs

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Madagascar

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When they’re all dressed up with a suit on
Otherwise they can stay at home
[Spoken]: And drop towels in their own bathroom

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Tierra del Fuego

Why gay men don’t need feminism – Part 1 challenging assumptions

February 2, 2023 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

Introduction

‘Why Gay Men Don’t Need Feminism’ is a four-part series of articles adapted from a speech that was intended to be presented at the Second International Conference on Men’s Issues in 2015 by the author, Matthew Lye (a.k.a. Andy Bob). The four parts are:
Part 1: Challenging Assumptions
Part 2: The Takeover
Part 3: Gay Bashing
Part 4: Brotherhood

As these articles are written from the perspective of a Men’s Human Rights Activist (MHRA), they focus on the dysfunctional relationship between feminism and gay men. Feminism has had an entirely different relationship with lesbians which is irrelevant to this topic, and has been examined in detail elsewhere.

Why Gay Men Don’t Need Feminism – Part 1: Challenging Assumptions

Gloria Steinem

In April, 2012, Gloria Steinem repeated one of modern feminism’s most durable and self-serving myths when she reaffirmed the unity between feminism and gay rights. She claimed that they were “completely the same thing”.[1] Predictably, no prominent media pundit publicly contradicted her. This is due in part to the fact that St Gloria is a feminist, which means she gets a pass from the mainstream media to spew whatever offensive nonsense pops into her head without it ever being challenged, and partly because no-one is entirely sure if she’s still chummy with the CIA. However, the main reason is that feminists like her have succeeded wildly in hoodwinking people who ought to know better – including hordes of gullible gay men – that it's true.

To be fair, Steinem called it 'women's rights', but she meant 'feminism', in the same way that feminists refer to something called 'the patriarchy' when they're really just talking about 'men'. It's always amusing how often feminists think they're fooling anyone by conflating these terms whenever it suits them. Like many gay men, my response to Steinem's baseless assumption that feminism and gay rights are completely the same thing is: "Not so fast, Gloria".

While there is a large number of gay people, often involved in LGBT activism, who – through a combination of fear, political convenience or just plain old ignorance – are content to huddle obediently on the coattails of feminism as it stomps its destructive path through our social, political, legal, educational and media institutions, there is also a significant number gay men who are under no illusions about the true nature of feminism and are outraged that their own rights movement is so closely, consistently and publicly associated with it.

One of the many gay men who weren't buying what Steinem was selling had this to say in the comments section of the website that conducted the original interview:

"Women have had equal rights for years. Modern day feminists are seeking female supremacy. It's really quite disgusting that an allegedly gay-oriented site would compare a legitimate civil rights movement to the nonsensical, insane ideology that is feminism. They're not the same thing, not in any sense. Feminists are some of the worst enemies gay men will ever encounter."[1]

To be completely blunt, it never fails to astound me whenever I come across any man, regardless of their sexual orientation, who doesn't know that feminists, to put it mildly, really don't like them. This is an ideology that has spent many decades loudly and aggressively blaming men for every single problem the world has ever known. It has demonized all non-approved manifestations of natural masculinity as inherently toxic aberrations that need to be either corrected, eliminated or punished.

It has pathologised male sexuality to the extent that all sexual activity involving men is interpreted as some form of violent sexual abuse – leading some prominent feminists to conclude that sex between consenting male adults is a re-enactment of heterosexual rape.[2] The absurdly perverse view that all intimate relations involving men is an expression of so-called rape culture is so tightly woven through feminist ideology, that feminists have succeeded in convincing governments to fund nation-wide campaigns and compulsory seminars and workshops in educational institutions, the military and the workplace in order to teach men and boys not to rape.

Whether or not governments really believe that men and boys won't realize that rape is wrong unless some Gender Studies graduate tells them so, or are simply hoping to avoid being branded misogynists for not giving in to the increasingly outrageous demands of feminist lobbyists, academics and media pundits, is ultimately irrelevant. What is relevant is the fact that governments have no place colluding with feminists to promote the assumption of the inherent criminality, violence and sexual deviancy of half of their constituents, and their sons. It is an open and direct assault on the dignity of men and boys that serves absolutely no purpose other than to validate feminist threat narratives and impose them on to the whole of society.

Feminists believe that men and boys are naturally evil, and our governing institutions agree with them – so, apparently, does LGBT, because allying with feminism can only mean that they support this kind of hateful, anti-male propaganda. Perhaps they see it as anti-straight male propaganda, which somehow makes it OK. If that's the case, then LGBT has forfeited whatever credibility it may have had to lecture anybody about the sins of bigotry, prejudice and discrimination.

The goals of feminism and the gay rights movement may look identical to Gloria Steinem, but to keen observers of what feminists actually say and do – as opposed to the thumbnail definition in whatever dictionary they insist on waving in the faces of unbelievers[3] – their goals and interests could not possibly be more diametrically opposed. One would have thought that the fact that feminists loathe men to the point where they will stand back in silence whenever one of their own suggests, culling, exterminating or genetically modifying the male population in order to solve what they call 'the man problem' would have alerted gay men who identify as feminists to the fact that feminist ideology is not their friend.[4]

As LGBT's continued public support of feminism proves, gay men can be as clueless about the true nature of feminism as anyone else, and feminists like Gloria Steinem are only happy to ensure that they stay that way in order to exploit the political benefits of their allegiance.[5]

Feminism has been relentless in promoting false and misleading assumptions about the MHRM. Many may wonder why they are not referred to here as accusations rather than assumptions. While they are usually asserted in the unmistakable tone of accusation, they are invariably based on assumptions which are sometimes genuine, but are usually fabricated. Apart from Steinem's glib assumption that feminism and gay rights are the same thing, there are three other significant assumptions about the MHRM that are particularly relevant to the topic of Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism, and need to be addressed before moving on to examine how feminism bullied gay men into an alliance with man-hating bigots who openly despise them.

Assumption One: The MHRM ignores issues relevant to gay men

It must be understood that the author of this series of articles does not represent the Gay Division of the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) for the simple reason that there isn't one. Nor is there a Ladies' Auxiliary Committee full of Honey Badgers tenaciously organizing bake sales to raise money to help fund The Patriarchy's evil plan to restore its privileges, silence women and promote rape culture.[6]

The MHRM doesn't have a Gay Division, or a Non-white Division, an Other-abled Division or, mercifully, a Feminist Division. This is because the MHRM is not about division. It is about unity – unity among men, and the women who love them, to address issues that impact the rights and welfare of men and boys, regardless of their race, religion,

This is not to say that the MHRM doesn't recognize the fact that many men and women experience adversity, particularly in the form of political and social discrimination, as a result of their various identities, it is simply that there are already well-established, well-organized and well-funded advocacy groups dedicated to addressing issues specific to those identities.

The MHRM has a well-documented history of wishing these groups well in their pursuit of their goals, providing of course, that those goals are geared towards fighting genuine injustice, and that they do not engage in promoting dishonesty or bigotry, or endorse bullying, censorship or violence in order to achieve them. With such limited resources, organizations like A Voice for Men, cannot offer much in the way of meaningful assistance to these already well-funded groups. This is the principal reason why A Voice for Men limits its focus to those issues which can impact the lives of all men and boys.

In many ways, this is a relief, and something of a blessing. Leaving these various identities at the door, so to speak, enables MHRAs to completely side-step the utterly pointless and indulgent game of comparing what feminists call 'points of intersectionality'. The number of points you manage to accrue establishes your victim-cred and determines where you sit in the Hierarchy of Oppression, and who gets to have the loudest voice.[8] White, middle-class, able-bodied women feminists obviously cheat when playing this game as they invariably hog the top rung of this hierarchy every time they play. Then again, it's their game, so they believe that they get to make the rules as much as they believe that they get to create and control the narratives regarding all issues.

The MHRM is not interested in playing feminist games involving identity politics which achieve nothing and create division and suspicion where there should be agreement and resolve. The MHRM encourages open and honest discussion which has inevitably resulted in the debunking of false feminist narratives and conclusively invalidated their most hitherto reliable myths, tropes and memes.

I participate in the MHRM, not as a gay man, but as a person, with a deep conviction that men and boys matter as much as everybody else. As such, I have always been accepted in this movement as a man who is concerned that men and boys are confronting urgent issues that deserve to be addressed honestly and openly, without being constantly derailed, marginalized, ridiculed, demonized and misrepresented by feminists and their enablers.

The sexual orientation of MHRAs, like their sex, race, religion and ethnicity is ultimately irrelevant to the credibility of their perspectives. Being gay does not give a MHRA any special insight into the devastating impact that feminism has wrought onto the gay rights movement. Anyone who can read and conduct research can reach similar conclusions to mine. Being gay simply makes this particular issue more personal – nothing more. The fact that feminists have gained such complete control over the political wing of the gay rights movement – and uses organizations like LGBT to attack its ideological opponents, like the MHRM – makes it an issue worth addressing.[9]

Assumption Two: MHRAs believes that feminism created men's problems

This ridiculous, and frequently-touted, assumption is typical of how feminists try to cope with being called on their bigotry, hypocrisy and deceit: they attempt to cover up their obvious lies with more lies that are even more unfounded and absurd.[10] No MHRA has ever blamed feminism for creating the issues addressed by the MHRM because that would be as foolish and impossible to support as believing in the existence of the so-called patriarchy.

Domestic violence, workplace deaths, suicide, homelessness, anti-father bias in family courts, genital integrity, chivalry justice, the assumption of male disposability, indifference to male pain and lack of reproductive rights were around long before feminism reared its ugly head to claim a monopoly on the public discourse on addressing these issues – and by addressing these issues, I really mean ignoring, marginalizing, minimizing and ridiculing them, as well as the men and boys whose lives they affect.

Feminists have certainly exacerbated these problems by lobbying for anti-male legislation and social policy, and by promoting a social and political climate so hostile to men and boys that the idea of addressing our issues honestly, compassionately and effectively is widely dismissed, thus ensuring that society now cares less about men and boys than it ever did. However, feminists did not actually create the issues themselves.[11] Feminists will continue to make this claim because they know that the mainstream media will continue to report it without bothering to find out whether or not it's actually true.[12]

I don't know what they teach in journalism courses these days, but it obviously doesn't include instructions on how to use Google, send emails or make the necessary phone calls to discover what MHRAs do, or do not, believe.

Assumption Three: MHRAs don't understand feminism

This is one of feminism's most condescending assumptions about MHRAs and it deserves to be vigorously challenged. Feminists never tire of claiming that feminism is not a monolith. We are constantly reassured that not all feminists are like that – NAFALT for short. Apparently, only radical separatist feminists hate men. The rest of them care about men and have, in fact, always been working tirelessly on our issues.

Some feminists even claim to have male family members and friends that they care about, despite them being cis-gendered patriarchs wallowing in male privilege they are too ignorant to check. Anyone who identifies as a feminist accepts both the existence of 'the patriarchy' and the idea that we live in a 'rape culture' – and are convinced that even their most beloved male relatives and friends collude in it, however unwittingly.

In other words, feminist believe that men are toxic beasts who have oppressed all women throughout all history and need to be taught not to rape. This caricature of reality is so foundational to feminist ideology that rejecting it would be akin to a self-identified Christian rejecting the divinity of Jesus Christ. Many feminists struggle to reconcile the anti-male bigotry inherent in their chosen ideology's dogma with their own personal relationships with the men in their lives, but that's their problem, not ours. Unless a feminist has actively engaged in publicly refuting the anti-male bigotry of feminist ideology, then they have no right to claim that they are not 'like that'.

Only a few feminists have earned the right to make the claim that they are not 'like that', and they deserve to be mentioned. These feminists, all women, embody the egalitarian principles that NAFALTs like to pretend they possess. Their innate integrity has never allowed these women to step away from the truth, but to speak to it boldly and eloquently, often at great personal and professional cost. Their rarity proves the rule about the monolithic nature of feminism.

The late, Karen DeCrow, friend and colleague of renowned MHRA, Dr. Warren Farrell, was an avid supporter of shared parenting. This former president of The National Organization for Women declared, "I've become a persona non grata because I've always been in favor of joint custody."[13] Consider how much independence of thought, genuine belief in equality and raw courage it must have taken for the president of N.O.W. to make the following statement about male reproductive rights:

"Justice therefore dictates that if a woman makes a unilateral decision to bring pregnancy to term, and the biological father does not, and cannot, share in this decision, he should not be liable for 21 years of support. Or, put another way, autonomous women making independent decisions about their lives should not expect men to finance their choice."[14]

Dr Warren Farrell eulogized his friend with these words: "With Karen's death passes a feminist who, were her leadership allowed to be the guiding light, would have allowed millions of children to have a dad to guide and love them."[15] Unfortunately for those children and their fathers, feminism could never be sustained under wise and benevolent leadership – it would be disbanded. Karen DeCrow was marginalized within the feminist movement because her egalitarian instincts were at odds with its misandric dogma. She stood by her instincts until the end of her life, ensuring that her memory will be always be honoured by those who share them.

Christina Hoff Sommers identifies as a feminist in the belief that feminism could be miraculously redeemed if feminists developed self-awareness and stopped hating men and boys. This demonstrates a kind of pie-eyed optimism that is oddly endearing. I say "oddly" because one would have thought that the author of The War on Men and Boys and Who Stole Feminism?, which are both intensively-researched studies of feminist corruption and its devastating impact, would have known better than anyone just how far feminism is from the possibility of redemption.

Christina Hoff Sommers has made the following observations: "We must have moral education in the schools, anti-bullying programs, but this does not mean programs to feminize boys."[16] She also stated: "I'm concerned that boys have become politically incorrect, that we are a society in the process of turning against its male children."[16]

Sommers blames feminism for undermining the rights and welfare of boys, which explains the vitriolic response she receives whenever she accepts speaking engagements at universities to share her concerns about these destructive developments.[17] Few people have defended the dignity of boys more passionately than Christina Hoff Sommers.

No summary of feminists who aren't 'like that' would be complete without including the fearless Camille Paglia. This brilliant woman has never hesitated to employ her robust wit to give feminists and their kin the kind of verbal spanking they deserve. I wonder how many trigger-prone feminists had to be bundled into hug boxes[18] when she made this comment: "Let's get rid of Infirmary Feminism, with its bedlam of bellyachers, anorexics, bulimics, depressives, rape victims, and incest survivors. Feminism has become a catch-all vegetable drawer where bunches of clingy sob sisters can store their moldy neuroses."[19]

Anyone familiar with the self-infatuated hypochondriacs who enjoy flaunting their endless array of physical and psychological ailments with total strangers on feminist websites like We Hunted the Mammoth will require no further explanation.[20]

Paglia challenges some of feminism's most cherished myths, like the one about male sexuality being a weapon used to oppress women: "Men are run ragged by female sexuality all their lives. From the beginning of his life, to the end, no man ever fully commands any woman. It's an illusion. Men are pussy whipped. And they know it.[19] Paglia usually puts 'patriarchal society' in scare quotes, which indicates that we should probably put 'feminist' in scare quotes when describing this admirable woman.

Feminists like to assert that MHRAs discuss feminism as a monolith due to our ignorance about feminism, whereas the truth is that MHRAs usually know more about feminism than most people who identify as feminists. It is important to celebrate these very rare feminists who really aren't 'like that' in order to emphasize the glaring differences between these genuine egalitarians and the rest of the individuals involved in the feminist movement – a movement which is failing more miserably than ever to disguise its vehemently anti-male premises and precepts behind predictably disingenuous sham rhetoric about equality.

How on earth did such a deeply misandric ideology like feminism manage to glob onto a human rights movement as heavily populated with men as the gay rights movement – and why have so many gay men not only tolerated this, but continue to avidly supported it? In order to examine these questions, it is necessary to pinpoint the moment when feminism took over the gay rights movement. Fortunately, this can be done without detailing the entire history of gay liberation. So, with all due respect to the Gay Liberation Front, the Gay Activists Alliance, the Mattachine Society and the Daughters of Bilitis, we can cruise right onto feminism's Second Wave.

In Part 2: The Takeover, we will go back to when the parasite that is feminism bullied and manipulated the gay rights movement into playing host, and demanded, as it still does, that gay men be grateful for it. This enterprise has been so successful, that many gay men today can only nod in ignorant agreement when someone like Gloria Steinem asserts that feminism and gay rights are sibling movements with complimentary goals. As we shall see, nothing could be further from the truth.

Heroes and Whores

A Costume Parade Down Your Avenue.

Don't Forget To Put Up Your Hands!

No, it's not time for Mardi Gras. You can put away your beads and be-dazzlers. And yes, the bottle of bourbon, too. This is somewhat less entertaining and a little less fun, but there are flashy costumes to look at. So how's about a peek.

No doubt the title is a little striking. If it's not Mardi Gras time just what the hell are these two words doing parked side by side. Seems a contradiction in terms, verging on shock value that might put an expression on your face stiff enough to make you realize there's just no comfortable response for this incomplete sentence. It might feel a little like a fresh botox injection, you want to form an expression but the skin just isn't moving. That's called a blank stare. It's really just a collision of neurotransmitters in the brain competing for the same destination, a complete thought. And while the botox crowd may strenuously struggle to achieve the blank stare of mindlessness with every injection, that's not the point here. You'll get no cheap tricks of that calibre from me, and thinking doesn't result in the production of neurotoxins, at least not for everyone.

You can relax now. Yes, you read it right. Heroes and Whores, just like up and down; in and out and the ubiquitous good and evil; different locations in the same continuum.

Kinda like a melodic progression on a slide guitar. Sounds great doesn't it? Nice flow, a little change up here and there. It makes you want to tap your toes, doesn't it? Maybe even hum a few bars. It's the kinda thing better not to think about, just let it flow – in and out, up and down, one and two and three and four and on and off and good and…Men.

Right out of the middle of nowhere the melody ends unexpectedly, replaced by this nerve cracking squeal in the middle of your head. It makes you wonder when the chalk board was installed. Your standing there contorted and ready to swallow your face and begging for it to stop and it just won't.

Gimme the botox please, into the right frontal lobe. Make sure you hit the language center. Just let us get back to normal.

That's how it is whenever I put these two words together. Hero whore, and whore hero. That's the way it is today. Pick up a paper and read the latest piece on justice or crime. Check the header at the top. Yeah, I'm still on the same planet but what the hell is going on? Seems like sanity has left the planet and I'm in the middle of The Rocky Horror Picture Show.

Speaking of whores, is it me or do you feel like you're in the middle of a religious inquisition and moral turpitude has been pre-assigned? Guilt by genitalia seems to be the course of events, like every institute has taken up the cause against the masculine. Feminists are describing it, women are accusing it, cops are arresting it, courts are prosecuting it and governments are funding it. Everyone wants to be a hero and get that guy.

It seems like heroes running to the rescue to save female innocence[sic], the damsel in distress, has actually become big business. Those days are every day and every hour. It's amazing what you can do with statistics when you vibrate them …on high speed. If you listen close you can hear the orgasmic wave coming from the feminist misanthropes. Ah, Ah AH, domestic violence. Oh,Oh,OH, misogyny. Ooh, ooh, OOH, rape, and of course eeh, eeh, EEH, funding.

What's left for you is argh, argh, ARGH, unemployment. Make no mistake about what you are reading and witnessing in main stream media. It is the stuff of career making and the corruption is right in your face. When we see crime policies based on ZERO TOLERANCE we must now ask, towards whom?

Obviously in the case of rape allegations there is no hesitation to charge and release information to the media to begin an immediate smear campaign. It's done to enhance the careers of prosecutors and law enforcement. It is apparent to any thinking person that a media campaign to smear a suspect serves only to glorify the efforts of bureaucrats. When the door swings the other way and allegations prove to be false, just what is it we see of the ZERO TOLERANCE policies?

If you don't know, just ask Julian Assange. Quoting the feminist fatale Naomi Wolfe, "these women did not make charges against him.".

Well if they didn't file charges, what the fuck and who the fuck is the law serving?

What's incredibly sad is women have been so hypnotised by their own personal vagina monologue that they ms the big picture. They are destroying their relationship to the masculine and continue the effort by supporting rabid social policies and laws that rightly belong on a parker brother's game board. The bureaucrats continue the effort, with the realization that this is the greatest thing since take out terrorism. They are definitely running with it, to an extent that gives credence and justification to all things spending and career related.

The laws have been completely rewritten in Dudley Do-right legal ease with only one determination: get to the railroad tracks and release that woman from her velvet Velcro restraints.

I've always been impressed by people who can provide answers when no questions have been asked. Or file charges when no complaint has been issued. But hey, who says you can't reshape society with just a liberal arts degree and a lisp. It would seem that saving the feminine from all things….well from all things, has become the policy of the western world. But just who is being saved here? Bureaucratic whores come running with predetermined policy to ignore reality and to apply their particular brand of ideological heroism. I mean, come on, shouldn't we be having some kind of socialist Oscar Awards here?

We can legitimately ask if charges for false allegations will provide the same career enhancements, and the answer is NO.

So what we are seeing is the absolute worst of government corruption; the effort to charge and convict anyone who can be sold as a villain to the voters. Since main stream media is in lock step with selling themselves to the public we have a media that will not question the integrity of the process. What we have without accountability is bureaucrats running afoul with legal privilege to squash anyone they point their finger at and the money to do it; your money.

It is a conflict of interest that is obvious and not obscured. The payoff is tenured income and a jet fuelled boost to a career. Fundamentally, it is why it serves no purpose to charge for false accusations. The real purpose is career.

It is a perfect scenario for zealous and heroic bureaucrats to whore themselves and the public. Men who have become the primary target in this society will feel hostility and anger for their female accusers, railing against feminist fear mongering dogma. But the real culprits are self-serving prosecutors and lick spittle police painting a career of effectiveness that does not exist, while angling for a bigger budget and legislators purchasing votes regardless of the cost or collateral damage. It cannot be understood any other way when we realize that it is not for the purpose of justice that a policy so clearly stated as ZERO TOLERANCE in fact has a caveat, and that caveat serves to withhold justice.

We have “primary aggressor” laws that tell us whoever possesses the most body mass must be guilty. When that doesn’t work we move to whoever possesses the most testosterone. In one wave of the pen we have discredited our own civilisation and base our judgements on primal notions of animal aggression. We have nothing to teach our children when we direct our judgments in this way. Civilisation against such methods of judgement has been deemed to be a hoax and charade. In these kinds of judgements we can only be animals, the largest preying on the smallest; the strongest preying on the weakest. Literature, art, education and law, all a hoax.

These things do not civilise us.

With laws such as the “primary aggressor” law we are all animals and thugs.

Overwhelmingly, and on a daily basis, we see a justice system not serving the public or the victim, but serving the whore of their very own special interests by glorifying their efforts and seeking more of your tax dollars. It would be no surprise to discover that the truth behind not charging a false accuser is simply because they were prompted by circumstance with no supporting evidence and the culpability of a prosecutor and or the police would be exposed. It requires no more than these questions to justify taking these bureaucrats to task for the integrity of their office and the methods by which that integrity is served to the public. It has become abundantly obvious in these offices of justice that celebrating the discovery of innocence cannot be held up as a standard to evidence an integrity they are attempting to sell to us all.

It has always laboured in my mind to consider what remains of justice when the hero whores have left the scene of a crime. What is left when the feeding frenzy of the media and the bureaucrats have consumed their portion of self-righteous popularity. They fuel their careers by “gaming” us with the misery of their cause and devour more tax dollars for their own privilege. Just what is left when they are finished saving us? Broken homes, family members in crisis, compromised employment, shattered reputations, flamed futures and poverty knocking at the door.

This is not governance, it’s just corruption.

It is not hard to see and to know that in any circumstance of real crime the victims do not seek popularity at the very time of their vulnerability. From this understanding came laws to protect victims, such as rape shield laws and privacy laws to protect our youth and children. We have become so gluttonous for the main stream media’s warped perception of “political game” that as viewers we fuel this social weather and the storms it brings. We are simply feeding a layer of people to protect us while they take our money and our taxes and feed us lies to fuel our fears.

It is not hard to understand that to fight our worst fears and to protect our communities, our families, our children and our futures we must be there in the middle of it. Only from there can we know the truth and respond to it justly. We must be our own heroes. We must stop paying for and relying on whores. These corrupt breast feeding bureaucrats really need to understand that the milk is gone and that it is time to move on to solid food.

The Proverbial Red Pill

February 5, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Monarchy may be on the ropes in the 21st Century, but that doesn't abrogate the principle that it's good to be the king. Consider the case of King Solomon, whose name is almost synonymous with wisdom.

Solomon was the son of David, slayer of Goliath, and King of the Israelites roughly 1,000 years B.C. David hand-picked Solomon as his successor even though he was not the first-born son. This was controversial enough, never mind the fact that Solomon's mother was Bathsheba, who had been raped/seduced/porked (take your pick) by David, who ordered her husband, Uriah the Hittite, into the front line of battle where he was killed. Thus David passed into history as a forceful if flawed leader; as for Uriah, if you had to come up with a poster boy for great cuckolds of history, he would be the ideal candidate.

At any rate, Solomon's 40-year reign was legendary. Israel enjoyed peace and prosperity and Solomon did pretty well also. According to the Bible, he had 700 wives and 300 concubines. If they had tabloids in those days, just imagine what a field day the Jerusalem Daily News would have had with Solomon!

Obviously, after 3,000 years it would be hard to verify the numbers of his sex partners, but even if only 10% of it were true (i.e., 70 wives and 30 concubines), it would still be impressive. (I select 10% because the Bible also says that Methuselah lived to age 969; I'll accept 10% of that, so I use that percentage as my yardstick.)

Surprisingly, or maybe not, a good deal of Solomonic wisdom encompasses women, and a lot of his animadversions appear in the Book of Proverbs, sort of an ancient self-help book.

To a large degree Solomon's pronouncements are binary. He excoriates the harlots and praises the NAWALTs. The following quotations are from the King James Bible. Let's start with the harlots:

> For her house inclineth unto death, and her paths unto the dead.
> None that go under her return again, neither take they hold of the paths of life.
> 5:3-5:5
> For the lips of a strange woman drop as an honeycomb, and her mouth is smoother than oil.
> But her end is bitter as wormwood, sharp as a two-edged sword.
> Her feet go down to death; her steps take hold on hell.
> 6:25
> Lust not after her beauty in thine heart; neither let her take thee with her eyelids.
> 6:27-6:28
> Can a man take fire in his bosom, and his clothes not be burned?

> Can one go upon hot coals, and his feet not be burned?
> But whoso committeth adultery with a woman lacketh understanding: he that doeth it destroyeth his own soul.
> He goeth after her straightaway, as an ox goeth to the slaughter, or as a fool to the correction of the stocks;
> Till a dart strike through his liver; as a bird hasteth to the snare, and knoweth not that it is for his life.
> 7:26-7:27
> For she hath cast down many wounded: yea, many strong men have been slain by her.
> Her house is the way to hell, going down to the chambers of death.
> The mouth of strange women is a deep pit: he that is abhorred of the LORD shall fall therein.
> 23:27
> For a whore is a deep ditch; and a strange woman is a narrow pit.
> Such is the way of an adulterous woman; she eateth, and wipeth her mouth, and saith, I have done no wickedness.

Such eloquent slut-shaming! Eat your heart out, Sandman! Granted, some of Solomon's verses might reflect regrets about his dalliance with the Queen of Sheba. Given all those wives and concubines, his plate was already full. A side dish was the last thing he needed.

Of course, the Old Testament warned us about women right from the start. Remember Eve? Another woman, Lilith, was scratched from the Book of Genesis. Why? Well, let's just say she was Adam's first wife and she was bad news – worse than Eve. She didn't need a serpent to induce her to misbehave.

You might think Solomon sounds like an old school version of Jordan Peterson….or maybe Jordan Peterson is a contemporary version of Solomon. In truth, Peterson does have a sort of Old Testament elder vibe. Of course, he attracts more flak than Solomon because the New Testament has offered us a kinder, gentler God – a non-judgmental, all-forgiving deity, your BFF – and I do mean Forever. This makes the Old Testament God – a real FAFO deity – appear cruel and vindictive.

Unfortunately, Solomon's admonishments about harlots appeared too late to help Samson, whose betrayal by Delilah in the Book of Judges has given us perhaps western culture's greatest fable of female treachery – not to mention a classic Cecil B. DeMille Biblical epic (Samson and Delilah, 1947).

Solomon, however, shamed more than sluts. He did not suffer airheads gladly:

> 9:13
> A foolish woman is clamorous: she is simple, and knoweth nothing.

And he wasn't too crazy about harpies:

> 27:15
> A continual dropping in a very rainy day and a contentious woman are alike.
> It is better to dwell in a corner of the housetop, than with a brawling woman in a wide house.

As the above quote shows, Solomon anticipated the man cave. In fact, he was so taken with this concept he doubled down by repeating the above quote almost word-for-word just a few chapters later. Or maybe he was just having a senior moment and forgot he had already said it:

> 25:24
> It is better to dwell in the corner of the housetop, than with a brawling woman and in a wide house.

It's a shame Bible reading is no longer allowed in public schools. Imagine how amusing it would be to read passages like those above and await the reaction from the technicolor-hair brigade.

Solomon, however, was not a woman-hater. In fact, he exalted the NAWALT. Apparently, this mythical creature existed in ancient times. No question she is extinct today, but three millennia ago, Solomon sang her praises:

> Let her be as the loving hind and pleasant roe; let her breasts satisfy thee at all times; and be thou ravished always with her love.
> 11:16
> A gracious woman retaineth honour: and strong men retain riches.
> 12:4
> A virtuous woman is a crown to her husband: but she that maketh ashamed is as rottenness in his bones.
> 14:1
> EVERY wise woman buildeth her house: but the foolish plucketh it down with her hands.
> Who can find a virtuous woman? For her price is far above rubies.
> 31:13
> She seeketh wool, and flax, and worketh willingly with her hands.

> 31:15
> She riseth also while it is yet night, and giveth meat to her household, and a portion to her maidens.
> 31:16
> She considereth a field, and buyeth it: with the fruit of her hands she planteth a vineyard.
> 31:19
> She layeth her hands to the spindle, and her hands hold the distaff.
> 31:27
> She looketh well to the ways of her household, and eateth not the bread of idleness.
> Favour is deceitful, and beauty is vain: but a woman that feareth the LORD, she shall be praised.

God-fearing men are often praised in the Old Testament, but Solomon in his inclusive wisdom offers praise for the God-fearing woman. Yes, a woman can be a great benefit to a man if she knows her place. Sounds reasonable to me but I wouldn't say that in public without first checking to see where the nearest emergency exit is.

One of the more interesting pronoun quirks of the ancient world was the gendering of the abstract concept of wisdom (she/her/hers). The Greek name Sophia, for example, is synonymous with wisdom (philosophy, therefore, is a love of wisdom).

Like the ancient Greeks, Solomon personified wisdom as a female. In fact, wisdom and the NAWALT have a lot in common. According to Solomon:

> 3:15-3:18
> She is more precious than rubies;: and all the things thou canst desire are not to be compared unto her.
> Length of days is in her right hand; and in her left hand riches and honour.
> Her ways are ways of pleasantness, and all her paths are peace.
> She is a tree of life to them that lay hold upon her: and happy is every one that retaineth her.
> 4:8-4:9
> Exalt her, and she shall promote thee: she shall bring thee to honour, when thou dost embrace her.
> She shall give to thine head an ornament of grace: a crown of glory shall she deliver to thee.
> Say unto wisdom, Thou art my sister; and call understanding thy kinswoman:
> 9:1-9:3
> Wisdom hath builded her house, she hath hewn out her seven pillars: FUN FACT:

> The Seven Pillars of Wisdom is a book by T.E. Lawrence, on which the film Lawrence of Arabia is based.

Exactly why the ancients feminized the concept of wisdom is a mystery. After all, how many female ancient philosophers can you name? In western art, the female is used to personify wisdom in paintings and statues (she is literally on a pedestal). The muse of the artist is also assumed to be female, yet great female artists are few and far between. Ironically, many great philosophers and artists were MGTOW before MGTOW was a thing.

Speaking of MGTOW, notice that there is just one letter of difference between Solomon and Solo Man. Something to think about.

MGTOW or not, Solomonic wisdom is worthy of reconsideration in our secular world. Granted, reading the King James Bible may not be as entertaining as listening to a Turd Flinging Monkey podcast, but the messaging is similar.

There is something to be said for old wine in old bottles.

Editor's note: AVfM takes no stand on religion or lack of religion, and avoids publishing articles whose aim is either to proselytize or to denigrate religious belief. The above article however provides red pill wisdom from Solomon which applies regardless of one's belief or lack thereof, and for that we are happy to publish it.

Female power, influence, and privileges: 1835

February 7, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Editorial note: "Female Power, Influence, and Privileges" is Chapter One from a book few have heard of: Woman: As She Is, And As She Should Be, published 1835 by Cochrane & Co. The author was Mrs. Elizabeth Sandford. It should be noted that this is a genuinely shocking book for a lot of reasons; written after the death of Mary Wollstonecraft and before the famed Seneca Falls Convention, it is an extensive look that is already questioning the idea of women as oppressed and lacking in power. The article has been available in non-searchable image form, and is reprinted here in text form for the first time on the internet, so far as we are aware. While we may not accept the author's ideas on how women "should" be, the observations of this nearly 200 year old text are likely to challenge simplistic assumptions about women of the past.—PW.*

> O ye men; it is not the great king, nor the multitude of men, neither is it wine that excelleth: who is it then that ruleth them, or hath the lordship over them? – Are they not women? By this also ye must know that women have dominion over you. Do ye not labour, and toil, and give, and bring all to the woman? Yea! many there be that have run out of their wits for women, and become servants for their sakes. Many also have perished, and erred, and sinned, for women.—ESDRAS. "

§ 1.–The supremacy of the weak over the strong is a very remarkable phenomenon, and it is as mischievous as it is it is remarkable. Whatever nature or law may have denied women, art and secret sway give them all: they are influential to a degree perfectly unguessed, and men are possessed by, not possessors of them.

"Woman was made of the man, and for the man:" this is the language of Scripture. Yet, though "expressly given to man for a comforter, for a companion, not for a counsellor," Woman has managed to overstep her sphere – she has usurped the dominion of the head, when she should have aimed but at the subjection of the heart; and the hand which ought to be held out to the man, only to sustain and cheer him on his journey, now checks his steps, and points out the way he is to go! From moment to moment his purposes are thwarted and broken in upon by a capricious influence, which he scarcely dares to question, yet makes it his pride to indulge. Of this mighty evil it is that we are desirous to give a plain and unbiased view.

There is, perhaps, no country on earth where women enjoy such, and so great privileges, as in our own. The phenomenon has never passed unobserved by foreigners; and smartly enough it has been said, that were a bridge thrown across our Channel, the whole sex would be seen running to the British shores. In many countries women are slaves; in some they hold the rank of mistresses; in others they are (what they should be everywhere) companions; but in England they are queens!

It was remarked by Steele, even in his time, that "by the gallantry of our nation, the women were the most powerful part of our people;" and assuredly, female influence, far from finding its becoming level, has been on the growth among us ever since. It is now in its "high and palmy state," and the star of Woman was perhaps never more in the ascendant than at this present writing.[1] "The influence of Englishwomen," as a contemporary observes, "of attractive women" (and a large portion of our countrywomen are attractive) "is vast indeed: be they slaves or companions, sensual toys or reasoning friends, that influence is all but boundless."

§ 2.–Female influence necessarily exists by sufferance: it can only be by man's verdict that it exists at all. And herein is the unaccountable part of the whole matter: there is actually something "stronger than strength," —

> And mighty hearts are held in slender chains."

In the moral philosophy of Paley, there is a remark, so profoundly true, bearing upon our subject, that we cannot consent to hide it in a note. "Could we regard mankind," says that writer, "with the same sort of observation with which we read the natural history, or remark the manners of any other animal, there is nothing in the human character which would more surprise us, than the almost-universal subjugation of strength to weakness. Among men (in the complete use and exercise of their personal faculties) you see the ninety-and-nine toiling and scraping together a heap of superfluities for one, and this one, too, oftentimes the feeblest and worst of the whole set–a child, a Woman, a madman, or a fool."

And thus does Man (too often a creature of passion, but never so much or completely so, as when Woman is its object) yield himself an unthinking victim: a most willing bond-slave here, he suffers his head to become the dupe of his passions. How (perhaps many a man asks himself) should he look for harm, where he has garnered up his heart, and where his earliest, latest wishes centre? And yet we may love, like Othello, "not wisely, but too well;" we make unto ourselves idols of the heart, that shall wean us (as they weaned the wisest of old) from sobriety and duty. If the enthusiasm of devotion has sometimes stooped to borrow the language of love, far more often has the madness of love dared to borrow the language of devotion. Like the father in Parnell, our affections may become criminal, and "erring fondness" of this kind, amiable though it be, has to abide its consequences. Providence never fails to avenge any trespass on its own designs.

Led away "by a captive face," "disturbed by a smile, or undone by a kiss;" a look sufficing to persuade, and a sigh to convince him: this is man's position!

> All they shall need, is to protest and swear,
> Breathe a soft sigh, and drop a tender tear." – Pope

Beauty has but to lecture through her tears, and with Dido of old, "ire iterim in lacrymas, iterum tentare precando," and resolution is no longer a manly virtue. We resist, and resist, and resist again, –but at length turn suddenly round, and passionately embrace the enchantress.

Few are to be found who do not assume themselves with a toy of some kind during every stage of life, and Woman (though perhaps as little enduring in outward charm as any other, and one that, if critically eyed, would not retain its divinity long), is the most common and most fondled toy of all. How many, calling themselves men, are fooled by those who ought to be their comforters–preyed upon by harpies in the form of angels! The hypocrite affects attachment; the coquette trifles with feeling; the prude strikes at judgment; while the less principled reprobate lays out her traps for heedless passion.

In their most trifling pursuits do women somehow manage to create an almost-universal interest; in all their ordinary doings, in their 'whereabouts,'–"leurs brouilleries leurs indiscretions, leurs repugnances, leurs penchans, leurs jalousies, leurs piques;" — They have, in fine, continues the author Montesquieu we are quoting, "cet art qu'on les petites ames d'interesser les grandes." Nor are those mere "women's fools" –the refuse of the other sex–who are led away blindfold thus: many of its chiefest ornaments are among their "following." The great and small seem equally content to shape their desires to female foolishness, and with one false tear a pretty woman can undo at a moment what the best and wisest of men have been labouring for years to establish.

> What is it Woman cannot do?
> She'll make a statesman quite forget his cunning,
> And trust his dearest secrets to her breast,
> Where fops have daily entrance."

Where (apart from outward attractions) this especial fascination which belongs to woman lies, it is difficult to determine; wearing, as it does, the garb of secret and speculative influence, it becomes too vague to submit to a definition–and thus bases itself on a foundation as difficult to examine as to shake. We cannot look into the heart; and where women are concerned, the heart is more especially an enigma.

Thus much, however, may safely be concluded: were women really strong, the contact or the occasional superiority might alarm pride; but, as the truth is, this "mortal omnipotence" is at last but an insect in the breeze; and though a creature which by its will, its wit, or its caprices, is sometimes able to shake us, soul and body, it nevertheless, from instant to instant, is dependent upon ourselves for the minutest succour.

§ 3.–Let us consider female influence under the several aspects in which it presents itself;– and first, as acting upon society at large. The supremacy of women is quite as much general and public, as it is domestic and individual: it spreads along the innumerable lines of social intercourse,–exerting itself, not merely over manners, but, which is often to be regretted, over modes of thinking. We see around the sex an almost-Chinese prostration–of mind as well as body: their approval it is that stamps social reputation–their favour, and their favour alone, that is supposed to confer happiness. Nothing, forsooth, is right, but that which bears their approbation; and theirs alone is the great catholic creed of manners, any deviation from which is heresy. And women have no merit or qualifications then such as they themselves please to dictate,–having been early taught to feel their own consequence, more than what is due to their creature, Man.

§ 4.–But in the connubial state do women exercise the most unlimited power. Female influence, in its action merely over manners and conventionalisms, might seem somewhat on the surface; but such is by no means its narrow bounds: mediately, if not directly, it is an agent in every possible direction. The wife controls her husband, and he acts upon others, and upon the state at large, according to his sphere in life.

Within the whole circle of deception, there is perhaps no creature so completely beguiled as many a modern husband;–we can all, in our private circles, point to a score of instances. Such a being is but an appendage to another–nothing of himself; he is a slave, and a slave of the worst kind–fooled by the bent of another's will. Free agency is a thing quite gone from him, and, if mere confinement makes not captivity, he suffers a loss of liberty at his own hearth. He is under a charm–loving, as Shakespeare phrases it, with an "enraged affection." Let the dear enchantress cry for the moon, she should have it from its sphere, were it possible. He would have the world from its axis, to give it her: no one can be richer than she in his promises: she, who but she, the cream of all his care!

Women there are affectionate enough–it may be, devoted–in their character as wives; but then, it is at their husbands' peril to be happy by other means than such as in their wisdom they please to subscribe. Regents of the heart, they take care to govern it most absolutely: and thus it happens (as Phaedrus said long ago) that "men are sure to be losers by the women, as well when they are objects of their love, as when they lie under their displeasure!"

In right of marriage, Englishwomen become endowed with many and great privileges,–privileges that are growing in number and importance every day. Claims, greater than were ever before awarded, are now allowed them in Law and in Equity: over pecuniary matters they have no small control, and are always at full liberty to plunge into wanton expenditure, leaving their husbands the responsible parties.

In short, the ceremony of wedlock, with its present obligations, more than restores any natural inequality between the sexes. No longer are women cyphers beyond the sphere of domestic life: they are parceners of our power. They are not, it is true, suffered as yet to dispute the prizes of ambition, but they partake largely of its reward; they have the lion's share–they divide, where they do not monopolise the spoil!

Were it not for difference of dress and person, one might almost mistake the wife for the husband in this country. Her will is not carried in His pocket, as is wisely arranged elsewhere:– "he pays the bills indeed, but my lady gives the treat." And while she is spending money with both hands, and with a zeal that would lighten the bags of a loan-monger, he has to sell his woods and lands, borrow, or beg!

Slyly and unperceived does the foot of female authority slip itself in: the wedge is easily driven home. This is a species of power that never exists long without favouring itself;–let an ascendancy be once gained (and the collar of command is soon slipped!)–let a system of unsinuation once transfer the authority of wedlock,–and, afterwards, every act, be it of large or small import–what must be done, what is to be said,–becomes not the act of the Man, but of the Woman. It is not planned, it is determined; and where the lady cannot give her reason, she gives her resolution.

> Hoc volo, sic jubeo; sit pro ratione voluntas:
> Imperat ergo viro!”

This is “Gynocracy” with a vengeance! as Lord Byron was pleased, on some occasion, to denominate petticoat-sway. This very peculiar and distinct species of government (partaking in its nature not so much of mild despotism, as of a pure unmixed tyranny) has now grown so common among us, that (albeit laid down neither in Plato nor Aristotle) it well deserves, as it has obtained, a definite and scientific denomination.

We have all seen the ivy twining around the oak, but behold a novelty–the oak twining itself about the ivy! The man who suffers himself to be led away blindfold thus, can only be likened to the fool “that rejoiceth when he goeth to the correction of the stocks.”–“Give not thy soul to a woman, to set her foot upon thy substance.” To submit thus is contrary to the first law of nature–it is a direct spurning of Revelation:-

> Was she thy God, that thou didst obey?
> Or was she made they guide,
> Superior, or but equal–that to her
> Thou didst resign thy manhood?” — MILTON, P.L.

Let us presume to offer one word of advice to the sex that, in truth, most needs it. Men should let their love be at least manly; it is always possible to be affectionate without being over-fond;–to copy the gentleness, without the amorousness, of the dove. It is in itself a folly to allow those we love to perceive the vehemence of our affection; for such is human nature,–and such especially is female nature, that where it can control, it is nearly sure to become indifferent about pleasing, and at last despotic. Persecution may appear in many shapes, at home as well as abroad; it may address us in the voice of mildness as well as of imperious command; and the soft and playful creatures of our idle hours may cause us misery for years: Nothing is to be disregarded, however seemingly powerless! Though the capacities of Woman are comprised within a narrow sphere, these act within the circle of vigour and uniformity. It is often by seeming to despise power, that women secure it to satiety! A love of power would seem almost part and parcel of Woman’s composition;–for to this end they early learn to enlist every art they are mistresses of;–

> In men we various ruling passions find.
> In women two almost divide the kind;
> These only fix’d, they first or last obey–
> The love of pleasure, and the love of sway. — POPE

§ 5.–Nor is the political influence belonging to women of contemptible amount. There is an old and true maxim, that though kings may reign, women virtually govern: ’tis they who hold the strings of all intrigues, great or small. “There are perhaps few instances,” says an elegant writer, “in which the sex is not one o the secret springs that regulate the most important movements of private or public transactions.”

Not merely over the fanciful regions of fashion does the female empire extend itself; it dictates to the senate, as well as legislates for the ball-room. Women make no laws, it is true; they abrogate none: in so far Law shakes hands with Divinity; but they have an influence beyond any law: “Ce que femme veut, Dieu le veut?” Nothing resists them! What follows, though it be poetry, is too true a picture.

> What trivial influences hold dominion
> O’er wise men’s counsels and the fate of empire!
> The greatest schemes that human wit can forge,
> Or bold ambition dares to put into practice,
> Depend upon our husbanding a moment,
> And the light lasting of a Woman’s will!” — ROWE

Nor are women without civil and political power of the direct kind. They are vested with many important trusts, and enjoy most of those privileges which accompany property. They vote for many public functionaries, and their sweet voices are made admissible in electing directors for the government for thirty or forty millions of souls of British India.

And where their influence is but indirect, it is little less powerful on that account. In our public elections ’tis they who are the actual constituency,–they, after all, who virtually elect; for which is the vote that they do not influence? The system of female canvassing has of late years become a traffic quite notorious.

The lady in Hudibras, did not exceed the truth when she asserted the vast powers and privileges of her sex:–

> We manage things of greatest weight
> In all the world’s affairs of state;
> We make and execute all laws > can judge the judges and the cause;
> We rule in every public meeting
> And make men do what we judge fitting;
> We are magistrates in all great towns
> Where men do nothing but wear gowns!
> We are your guardians, that increase,
> Or waste, your fortunes as we please;
> And, as you humour us, can deal
> In all your matters, ill or well.”

Notes:

[1] “A low estimate of female pretensions is certainly not the fault of the present day. Women are, perhaps, sometimes in danger of being spoilt, but they cannot complain that they are too little valued. Their powers are too highly rated: their natural defects are overlooked, and the consideration in which they are held, the influence they possess, and the confidence placed in their judgment, are in some instances disproportionate with their real claims." — Mrs. Sandford

The value of male sexuality

February 8, 2023 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

Quick. What's the usual script we have playing in the back of our minds regarding hookup culture? You know, that awful symptom of the cultural degradation of women by men exploiting female sexuality for a cheap thrill?

It probably goes something like this.

Woman: "I'm a precious flower of womanhood who just happens to be hanging out in a bar in a bikini top completely by accident; I just floated in on the breeze."

Man: "Hark, precious flower of womanhood, let me crush your innocent and beautiful spirit with my filthy sexual arsenal! Ka-POW!"

Woman: "Oh, I am despoiled! Truly hookup culture is an exploitation of me and my pure-as-the-driven-snow sisters!"

We have this attitude toward hookup culture because we are convinced that male sexuality has no value. Not even no value, we think male sexuality has negative value.

Men sow their seed hither and yon; women guard their vaginas like Fort Knox.

But is this true?

Let's think about it logically. With each act of sex a male ejaculates semen into the female. This is an investment of physical resources that takes time for the male to replenish. So male animals are limited in how often they can have reproductively viable sex. Female animals, on the other hand, are not. The sex act has zero cost to them.

Now, the reason this obvious truth is invisible to us is because we lump in the cost of carrying young with the cost of sex. Yes, carrying young is high female investment but the sex act itself is higher male investment.

For humans who are often trying to avoid the hassle of pregnancy, this makes some sense. For female animals, it makes no sense. The whole purpose for a female animal, in going into heat, is to get pregnant. Because that's her instinctive imperative, the hassle of pregnancy is irrelevant to her cost of sex.

In fact, for female mammals, the real risk is investing resources in sub-par offspring. Because of this it's in their best interest to have sex with as many males in as short a time as possible. Multiple male partners improve both her chance of conception and the quality of the conception via sperm competition. This is why the majority of female mammals are polyandrous—they mate with multiple males.

It is not, however, in the best interest of the male animal to mate with as many females as possible.

Why? Because, quite simply, his sperm is in limited supply. He wants to prioritize delivery of sperm to a.) high quality females and b.) less mated females.

Our 'common knowledge' about so-called male promiscuity is better termed common stupidity.

Further, the relative costs of sex and the priorities of both males and females explain why a male mammal might evolve to pair bond.

A pair-bonding male has maximized his access to a less mated female. He does trade off in terms of access to a higher quality female than himself—higher quality in terms of status and fertility—but he is less likely to obtain this higher quality female and, overall, he's better off as a pair bonder then a promiscuous breeder.

What's less understandable is why a female animal would evolve to seek a pair-bond. She gains nothing at all from restricting her sexual choices.

To see why a female mammal might pair bond let's take a closer look at human sexuality. Human males are unique in the animal kingdom in that they retain an interest in sex throughout the female's cycle.

Some biologists conjecture that the human mating pattern—retaining an interest in sex outside of fertile times—is a way for pair-bonding to become more attractive to the male.

But what if it's the reverse? What if male human sexuality is designed this way to keep sexually carnivorous females interested in just one male?

Human women are rather poor breeders over all. It takes a lot of 'tries' for a woman to get pregnant. Compare this to female animals that have one day of receptivity and most of them are pregnant by the end of that day.

What's happening with women is that they are conceiving, nearly every month, but the conception is usually flushed out due to chromosomal errors. Estimates put the number of blighted ovum at 80% of all conceptions.

This may be due to a lack of sperm competition; instead of filtering out the bad through sperm competition, the bad is transferred to conception resulting in a high rate of malformed zygotes.

But why would this wasteful system have developed in the first place?

Well, for starters it requires human women to secure access to sperm at least once a month twelve to eight times a year to achieve one viable conception. At that point developing an ongoing relationship with someone who can provide her access to sex is looking pretty damn attractive to our female hominid ancestor.

And then we add in the fact that human males are so goddamn finicky. When our female hominid ancestor finds one that's actually responsive to her—remember, we didn't evolve with porn, Viagra or tremendous social shaming to create artificially inflated male sexual receptivity—she's likely inclined to keep a tight hold because of the scarceness of the sexual resource he's providing her. Which she's suddenly evolved to need a lot of over an extended period of time to get pregnant.

Bada-bing-bada-boom. Pair bonded female.

However that pair bonded human female probably still has urges to get her monkey on.

Ironically when we look at hookup culture through the lens of human sexuality – which female mammals actually have, as opposed to the absurdly idealized Common Stupidity that fantasizes that only men do — it becomes quickly apparent that it's HOG HEAVEN for a woman's inner-ape.

Hook up culture gives the chimp-within every woman the impression she has unlimited access to sperm from males who are higher status and higher fertility then herself.

By contrast a male mammal preferentially wants to breed with a). higher status females and b.) less mated females, to get the best bang for his genetic buck.

Remember that stereotypical hook up scenario presented in the beginning? The predatory male inflicting his horrible sexuality on the pure and virtuous female? In the average hook up culture scenario reality is the exact opposite.

Women are exercising their animalistic desires while men are suppressing theirs.

Let's strip away the Common Stupidity and listen in on the reality of the hook up scenario.

Woman: Hi, I stink of numerous other men's intimate attention and I'm about half as attractive as you. Shall we go through a social dance in which you pretend that you're getting something worth having from me?

Man: My natural instincts tell me to hold on to my sexual resources for high status, unmated females, but you're granting me access to the one thing I've been trained all my life to respond to like a performing monkey. Do you mind if a part of me weeps silently while we have sex?

Woman: Whatever. As long as I get my ape on, I couldn't care less.

The Many Boons of Transmaxxing

February 9, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: Transwomen shine a light on feminist debates about gender privilege; ie. if males have all the privilege then why are so many males transitioning and feeling more empowered with the results? MtF's accessing traditional female privileges is becoming deeply unsettling for feminists and their phony narratives about males holding all the power, and with the rise of a phenomenon called 'transmaxxing' that fear is likely to escalate further. – PW

Transmaxxing is a relatively new term referring to men who transition gender (MtF) in order to obtain personal, social and legal benefits associated with being female. Said differently, the transmaxxer transitions to female status, and not to recognizing a sense of female selfhood as is the case with transwomen.

The phenomenon appeared many years before the term was coined, and while it has recently gained some interest in the incel community, its application is far broader than that. It involves a decision to identify as a female regardless of this being contrary to one's usual sense-of-self.

The Urban Dictionary defines transmaxxing simply as, "Transitioning from male to female for personal gain."

Based on this broad definition we will conclude the following: 1. that transmaxxing cannot be reduced to an incel activity, nor to a proclivity of gay men as some have proposed, nor to any other single demographic. 2. It never or rarely applies to cases of female-to-male transition which are considered to involve minimal gain. 3. Transmaxxing isn't based on the clichéd explanation that the individual is "a female trapped inside a man's body," nor that he "has always felt like a woman." 4. The only premise of transmaxxing is the undergoing of a MtF transition for the sake of securing a range of benefits associated with female identification. So lets look at some of those benefits. Some recent online discussions have cited the following benefits belonging exclusively to the female sex, and also by legal extension to transmaxxers:

SAMPLE OF BENEFITS

- Get cheaper car and life insurance
- No registering with selective service
- Enter men's & women's locker rooms/restrooms whenever you want
- People will treat you better
- Whine all you want and people will listen
- Receive special considerations and child-custody in family court
- Earlier retirement and associated pension grant
- Free legal aid
- Services for victims of domestic violence
- Free or subsidized accommodation for the low income women
- Female only scholarships
- Female employment quotas
- Affirmative action hires
- Being able to sue for sexism
- Lighter prison sentences
- More leisure time, less work
- Receive greater empathy and sympathy
- Greater social support
- More narcissistic gratification for achievements
- To be believed regardless of lack of evidence
- Use public transport & parking spaces reserved for women
- Receive higher pass marks for the same school work

PRAXIS Transmaxxers don't need to wear lipstick, put on a dress or engage in other performative gestures we might typically associate with transwomen (although some may choose to take these extra steps). Further, transmaxxer identification doesnt even require a renunciation of traits referred to as masculine. At minimum, all it requires is a technical change of gender either on a legal paper, or in some countries by verbal statement, and all the boons of female privilege become available for the transmaxxer's enjoyment. While the change of gender may appear cynical or inauthentic, we can say that transmaxxers may genuinely identify with an internal sense of privilege, esteem, status, deservingness, dignity, worth, purity, beauty and social value that we euphemistically call "feminine." The degree to which a transmaxxer genuinely identifies with these “feminine” things, such femininity is integral to his sense of self. I personally won’t be transmaxxing anytime soon, but I take some solace in the fact that feminist smugness is being rapidly undermined by this growing trend.

Addendum: The primary difference between a transwoman and transmaxxer needs to be differentiated, as there seems to be some confusion on this point. Transwomen organically feel & desire female identification, with negligeable desire to identify as male. Whereas MtF transmaxxers tend to identify as male or gender dysphoric, without an organic desire to identify as a woman. This can be summarized as follows:

- Transwoman is an autonomous desire and identification of the self as female
- Transmaxxing is a decision, rather than an autonomous desire, to identify as female gender contrary to one’s usual sense-of-self. The transmaxxer can be said to legitimately “transition” to female status, rather than female selfhood.

Think again: The war on masculinity as a precursor to totalitarian subversion

February 10, 2023 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

In the world of instant content where 500 characters "articles" are TL;DR, 20 second videos are already too long and anything older than 3 years is the equivalent of Late Cretaceous, it is perhaps a bit quaint to put a nod of approval in the title to Foreign Policy magazine's section Think Again (initiated in 2005 and abolished in 2013-14). That section was not intended to be an arbiter of truth necessarily, but to expand the reader's perspective upon the issue being critiqued.

Such is the purpose of this dispatch in relation to Ms. Hobson's article The War on Masculinity is a precursor to the totalitarian subversion of Western Civilisation published a few weeks ago, which, in Internet time, is somewhere in Late Quaternary. With that said, it is wise to reflect more in general, but particularly when making pronouncements that can lead one to despair.

One gripe yours truly has always had with most of the notes coming from the non-feminist sector over the last 15 years is that too often they suffer from two severe but otherwise self-imposed perspective limits: terminally online and rigidly Anglo-centric. More often than not, and this is true of Ms. Hobson's article as well, it is purported to present a Western perspective but then that isn't delivered.

With the risk of stepping on some toes, it is worth reminding that the Anglosphere is not the World. It's not even the West – given that there are such thing as distinctly non-Western English-speaking places and distinctly Western places where nobody knows a single word in English. Regardless of one's consideration of what constitutes "West" and what constitutes "the Rest", roughly speaking, the West is no more than 9% of the World yet it continues to act as if the rules of basic human nature don't apply to it. Here's an example. Ms. Hobson says:

> But I failed to acknowledge that the deliberate destruction of our men could be being perpetrated by our own elites, not just out of foolishness and political expediency but, as method of disarming and dislocating our populations by design, to make us easier to reengineer to serve their ends. It's not clear to me the degree to which the War on Men has been consciously informed by this goal, but I'm not sure how much that matters anyway.

None of this is necessarily wrong. It may very well be that some of our elites (though certainly not all – since we all can name members of the elite whose wisdom is far from stellar) are indeed engaged in a war on men (for lack of a better term) with at least a vague intention of disarming and dislocating our populations to make us easier to reengineer to serve their needs. But is this complete? A quick glance of the World and at the patterns of human nature, clarifies things.

Totalitarian societies from the recent past or even contemporaneous with us have been created and upheld for decades (and some are still around – see the CCP) without the need for a convoluted long game specifically against the male population.

Elites are still formed by people. Usually people extraordinary in some way, shape or form, but humans nonetheless. This applies to both elites considered benevolent or beneficial but also to those considered malevolent or evil. And humans, since time immemorial, have consistently taken the path of least resistance and innovated in such a way to achieve the goal(s) by fighting the least.

So why would the Western elite choose to deviate so much from the historical norm and basic human nature in order to achieve what can be achieved without so much work? Occam's Razor posits that they wouldn't. Not for this purpose, anyway, for the purpose of achieving a totalitarian society can be (and is being) achieved much easier.

The picture in the featured image was taken in Bishkek, Kyrgyzstan and it depicts the heroes of Socialist labor as the place acceded to the USSR as a Union Republic with full rights (to the extent that one can talk about rights under Stalin). If you notice, the men are quite manly, the woman is quite womanly and the division of labour is observed even in this propaganda monument which suggests that undermining men (or women, for that matter) wasn't even an afterthought even for the Soviet apparatchiks tasked to erect such propaganda in the Kyrgyz capital.

Russia had managed to thin the number of Kyrgyz people without any complex ideological construct (see Ürkün). The Kyrgyz saw Lenin as a saviour by comparison, even though Soviet Russia finished the job – by colonizing the lands emptied by the Tsar with ethnic Russians. At the fall of the USSR, only 22% of the people living in the Kyrgyz capital were indeed Kyrgyz. And, to this day, sufficient numbers of Kyrgyz people are convinced that that was a good thing. All while the Soviet authorities denied it was happening until they acknowledged it was happening and it was a good thing. Sound familiar?

All of that was possible without any war on men or really without any complex ideological structure.

The experts have been sounding the alarm over the fact that the People's Republic of China has too many sons and, the experts argued, just like Ms. Hobson, they may revolt and burn the village to feel its warmth so to speak. The argument has been going for over 15 years now that those men will not be able to get married and thus this will be a problem for the Communist regime. So what did China do? Become more liberal, to allow men to leave? No, not really.

Did China started a program to make its young men more effeminate in order to mitigate the risk? If anyone would be capable of such thing in a coordinated fashion, it's probably China. But no, China did no such thing. In fact, for 7 years now, China is in an aggressive race to find more male teachers so they can make their boys men.

In fact, China today is more totalitarian and more stable than it was 15 years ago when the experts warned that their excess of sons will burn the place down. Xi Jinping turns out to be a far more repressive leader than Hu Jintao had been when the issue was first mentioned.

Kyrgyzstan in the past and China in the present day show that totalitarian subversion and population displacement can be done at will, and cheaper than a supposed long game to which Ms. Hobson alludes to.

Ms. Hobson is nostalgic for 2016 a year in which we rocked the establishment she says, in an article that's supposed to be about the Western civilization, rather than a regular presidential election in the USA and a referendum in the UK. Sure, the Brexit referendum was important, but so was the 2014 Scottish referendum. That one prevented a catastrophe too.

Meanwhile, other places have had their 2016 moment too (with mixed results, just like in the UK and USA). Italy had its 2016 moment in 2022 – and with a woman too! This year is likely a 2016 moment for Spain as it's increasingly likely that PSOE (the same PSOE that nearly got annihilated for being feminist in public, wrote here about it 10 years ago) will get shellacked and be replaced by a coalition that includes VOX, a party that has some of its roots right here, on this very website and the 2016 ICMI in London. Also, 2024 looks up to be a "2016 moment" for the EU itself (not to mention Austria and Romania).

Let us also not forget South Korea which in 2022 voted in an explicitly anti-feminist president that ran on a men's rights platform. And, shockingly, he also started delivering. President Yoon Suk-yeol abolished the "gender equality ministry", abolished all women's quotas in all state institutions and is now working hard to increase penalties for false sexual allegations and to make it a crime to treat men as "potential sex criminals" (his words, not mine).

Ms. Hobson correctly identifies in her article the subtle differences between men and women at a population level (though over-reliance on Jungian theory has its limitations) but looks at trends from an excessively pessimistic perspective and awards excessive importance to phenomena that is real but not quite as potent, while awarding no consideration to phenomena that is equally real but trends in the opposite direction.

Speaking of disarming, just yesterday a federal court in the USA ruled that one cannot be stripped from his Second Amendment rights just because there is a domestic violence restraining order (which is, as everyone knows, an ex-parte piece of paper issued without any evidence seriously assessed). In other words, it is now the law once again that the mere word of an alleged victim is simply not enough to suspend the Constitutional rights of legally innocent people. The case is US v Rahimi.

These things are far more important than, say, Agenda 2030. Yes, Agenda2030 is a real thing too, but it also comes from the UN, an organization which has an impeccable trackrecord of being a glorified debate society at its best, and an annoying grift in the rest of the time.

That's not to say terrible, illiberal and indeed dangerous ideas don't come from there. They do. All debate societies produce terrible ideas as a matter of routine. But just because the UN says something doesn't mean it has to happen. And it's certainly wrong to lower one's spirit by inducing the idea that it will happen. Heck, the Regime bets on people submitting to such helplessness.

The precursor of Agenda2030 was called Agenda21 and is 31 years old. It was signed in 1992, when the shtick with the child crying for the environment was pulled before Greta was even a love letter. Nobody remembers the name Severn Cullis-Suzuki today just like nobody will remember the name Greta Thunberg by 2030.

Agenda21's best product was the book itself with the wishlist. And other than a few bike lanes leading to nowhere and tons of paper consumed as various mayors virtue signaled as they signed the paperwork and subscribed to the mailing list of an NGO… nothing really happened.

> I tend to doubt that we will be able to arrest the trajectory, never-mind claw back freedoms already lost, in the near-term.

This kind of mentality is what the Regime wants.

In my backyard, the pandemic project was great for increasing liberty. We got the Constitutional Court to recognize the inherent illegality no matter what of all mandates, we got the High Court to recognize that individual bureaucrats are also at fault if they follow a pandemic order (and thus liable and can't hide behind the institution) and one of the formerly top Branch Covidians who would ban anyone from her show if not properly QR-coded is now talking openly about individual freedom and ways to expand the legal recourse of individuals against both bureaucrats and the State.

How did we do that? Well, for starters, we didn't doubt. We knew we were right and acted as such. Yes, it was masculinity that led, mentor and gave courage (here I am confirming that part of Ms. Hobson's thesis) but it was also femininity that delivered the message.

People like me wrote the message, argued in court and physically struggled with the Police and the MPs personally. Men like me also kept the crazies out, but it was also courageous women who stood their ground, also knowing they were (taught) right.

In the end, if you want freedom, you have to take it. In my backyard, this is implicitly understood (with the exception of Ceaușescu, he didn't understand). Maybe other yards should understand it too?

One thing is certain though: Self-doubt, learned helplessness and distractions are the best tools the Regime has on all of us. It's highly convenient for the Regime that plebs argue about Agenda2030 rather than practical ways of seizing back their fundamental rights.

Think again: We can (and indeed might) have totalitarianism anyway, and the war on men is, at best, tangential.

The World is a big place. And continues to spin. Nothing is inevitable and nothing is permanent in politics.

What’s in a suffix? taking a closer look at the meaning of gyno–centrism

February 10, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

There appear to be some confused understandings of the word gynocentrism, so this piece will explore a little discussed part of the term: -centrism. This suffix makes a restrictive demand that women are most important interest we might hold.

The Cambridge dictionary describes centrism the following way:

> The fact of having a particular type of person, place, or thing as your most important interest; the quality of being seen from the point of view of a particular type of person, place, or thing:
> - The Academy has been accused of Eurocentrism and gender bias.
> - The artist’s newest ventures embody his commitment to ecocentrism

Gynocentrism implies that our focus on the needs and wants of woman is the most important consideration; whether such focus be contained to a brief moment in time, or as applied to the entire duration of human relationships.

For example, when we celebrate Mother’s Day we can legitimately name this brief, isolated act as gyno-centric. Or for a more dramatic illustration of a brief gynocentric event, consider the scenario of a man taking on a knife-wielding maniac who is threatening to hurt his pregnant wife, while the wife retreats and does not help the husband during the fight; in this case the actions of both husband (protecting his wife) and wife (protecting herself) are rightly defined as gyno-centric.

Alternatively if we consider the overall relationship between the same husband and wife we might ask a new question – is the entire relationship a gyno-centric one? If that husband and wife take turns supporting each other across the duration of their relationship, then the relationship might be rightly referred to as “couple centered” — because by definition a gyno-centric relationship centers exclusively around the woman and her needs and wants. As soon as you have genuine reciprocity in a relationship, one that involves a couple-centric dynamic based on commensurate importance, the relationship can no longer be considered gynocentric.

Employing the word gynocentrism to discuss reciprocal exchanges between men and women, where women are occasional beneficiaries in certain ways, and men are beneficiaries in certain ways, is an erroneous use of the term because such exchanges, strictly speaking, do not constitute a gender centrism across the duration of the relationship – ie. its not a gyno-centric relationship.

While there can be gynocentric elements in relationships, they are historically balanced out by other elements like family-centrism, andro-centrism or tribe-centrism. The theory that human relationships are evolutionarily gyno-centric is an exaggeration and a piece of sappy modern propaganda that even some men’s advocates fall prey to.

I’ve never understood how seemingly intelligent people can champion the dissonant theory of “Gynocentrism is the evolutionary norm for relationships – Let’s stop gynocentrism!” With such a ideology as guide you may as well pack up and go home, because you won’t beat biology. Alternatively, those same women-firsters might try understanding gynocentrism not as an evolutionary norm for all human relationships, but rather as a collection of distortive supernormal stimuli that have arisen in recent centuries…. then the pieces might fall into place that humans need not ascribe to a permanent gynocentric mindset.

Here’s what happened to Esther Vilar after she angered feminists

When Esther Vilar published her book The Manipulated Man she was beaten up by four young women in the toilet of the Munich State Library who were angry about her perspectives.[1]

According to her own statement, her emigration from Germany goes back to this. The following account detailing her ongoing experience of violence by feminists was published in the San Rafael Daily Independent Journal Newspaper in 1973.[2]

When sexual predators are a bonus

February 14, 2023 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

As I was riding to work with a workmate, not a folding one a talking one, we got onto the subject of sex between a female teacher and a student. My friend took the position that she was doing him a favor and I have to say I was really intrigued by his opinion. I really couldn't understand how anyone could view this as a favor and at the same time be in any way thoughtful about the event. I really wanted to understand where he was coming from. I asked him how he arrived at that outlook. His response was "well the kid got laid, bonus for him".

I really had to ask in response: Are you telling me that you believe that sex was the only thing that took place and that there could not have been any other exchange? Well like what he said? How about conversation, how about coercion, how about manipulation? Really when you think about it, if it is that acceptable why are there laws that prohibit it? Have you considered the possibility that a fourteen year old boy may in fact have feelings and can be affected by such an encounter?

The crime is against boys, vulnerable to their own inability to protect themselves, to understand the emotional and sexual coercion, the betrayal and condemnation.[/quote] Let me ask you, how many men do you know that have been divorced and lost the relationship with a partner? "Quite a few actually," he responded. Can you think of one of them that was not deeply hurt and affected by the loss of that relationship? "I see what you mean," he said. Excuse me for blathering on but your default to such behavior being okay is a bit of a concern. I'm quite sure when your wife goes off on you it's something you don't enjoy, it may even effect you for days depending on the incident. Some men get depressed when served a constant meal of negativity from a partner.

My point is that men as much as women depend on their partner for validation and affirmation that contributes to their self-esteem. I'm sure you've heard the term "if momma ain't happy, ain't nobody happy." Your partner's ability to contribute to your emotional equilibrium is a real power that she possesses to influence you and your state of mind and you're a full grown mature man of 55.

To the extent that you can be affected by your partner as an adult male, are you seriously going to ask me to believe that a 14 year old child is not going to feel any effects on his self-esteem, or self-image from a single sexual encounter with a 40 year old woman? These are the most critical years for young men, they transition into manhood and are trying to figure out their place in the world. At a time when a young man is challenged to fulfill the power over his own life, plot a course and make choices that affect his life, he is being manipulated emotionally by someone who dramatically outranks his life experience.

As a young man, I grew up in foster care and in my teen years I resided in a "boy's home." The home was run by a middle aged couple that I initially thought were pretty cool, after a time of settling I discovered different. It became apparent to me that the woman/wife a 46 year old was fucking some of the guys. In retrospect, I realize that the normal routines I began to question were in fact a process of grooming. At 14 I was allowed to drink alcohol, in fact all the other guys over 14 were allowed to drink. The restriction was one 26oz bottle per week. At fourteen against what anyone believes, this practice just builds and reinforces alcoholism.

These heroes of male orphans would hold parties that were described as opportunities for the guys to open up and learn to socialize. The problem I found was that only adults attended, except for the 6 resident guys. These were people none of the guys knew. Wives slow dancing with young boys while their husbands sat and watched. The awkwardness of the setting was obvious and the guys preferred not to participate and found it to be very twisted. Unfortunately there was nowhere to go except for another drink.

The woman that ran the “home” liked to have a social night out once a week and go to her 38 year old sister’s house and take a couple of the guys with her. It was an evening of drinking along with some card play but I realized the card play was a distraction to promote drinking. The card play would end about 8:30 at which time her and her sister would put on music and dance with the guys she had brought. Not long after it started it would change to slow dancing, all of it in an intoxicated state. Of course the grinding hips, roaming hands and passing caresses these ladies offered were described by them as the guys trying to take advantage.

For those who may be confused let me describe the peripheral effects that go beyond the alcohol, the coercion and the sex. In a group of male youths you have what is perceived as informers. Bluntly, you’re fucking the wife, you can’t be trusted and any attempt to impose your presence in the group will result in violence and you will be subjected to group violence. You’re an idiot and you’re on your own. Even the guys not fucking the wife understood the danger of violence lurking, given that her husband had played semi-pro football. The environment is no longer safe, it's a battleground laced with land mines.

The effect of this kind of tribalism is pure violence.

I call it tribalism because the tribe grows and shrinks based on infraction, accusation and identifiable trust. The crime is against boys, vulnerable to their own inability to protect themselves, to understand the emotional and sexual coercion, the betrayal and condemnation. The extreme result is death, death by heroin overdose, death by methamphetamine overdose, death by intentionally stepping in front of a tractor trailer while drunk. Of course an outcome less extreme is prison, for firing a 22 caliber rifle from a balcony at someone exiting a bus. Lesser yet is the outcome of being accused and then assaulted with a brick, repeatedly.

Was the sex that bad? Wasn't it really just a bonus for a young guy? No. In case you've never noticed sex doesn't start and stop at the end of your dick. Once you violate the unspoken constraints of a family construct, what most feminists describe as an oppressive patriarchy, you descend into tribalism. You will pay the price for deconstructing the safety of others and you will learn that you are an unwelcome part of that tribe. Unfortunately in such circumstances your victimization is unseen and you become the perpetrator. In the environment of a "boys home" your death will be attributed to the fucked up family that you came from rather than the inability of an institution to protect you.

But hey……at least she got back at her husband for not paying enough attention to her and the squeeze of some young skin and however many orgasms she was able to achieve. After all doesn't the outcome of such behavior really reside with a 14 year old male child rather than a 45 year old woman? What credibility does he have compared to her or the institution that supports her, the Children's Aid Society. The social workers charged with overseeing his safety will even get a raise for dealing so effectively with such a troubled youth. Another file closed, one less problem and less expense to the system. Isn't it better = more comfortable – to believe that some young guy is just going for his bonus?

It astounded me that a 50 year old emotional gorilla was willing to dismiss her family and children to pursue a sexual relationship with a 16 year boy.[/quote] After the end of my first marriage I decided to rent a room as a border and give myself some time to recover, rather than take on the burden of living alone. During the interview with the homeowner, a 50 something woman, and negotiating a price and privileges I was introduced to a 16 year old guy that was described as a foster child. All seemed fine to me and I moved into the room she had for rent. I discovered after moving in that in fact she had left her husband and 3 children to live with and continue a sexual relationship with her foster son. I discovered this from the boy, not the woman.

I was very concerned for him, and told him so. Do you realize that you exist in this relationship for no other reason than her sexual pleasure? You're 16 years old, what about your future, where are you going with this? You have left school at a time in your life when you're just beginning to discover your abilities and skills, what will happen to them? His response was, "She will take care of me, I'm like a house husband." "Really and how do you socialize, with her friends or yours"? "We don't," he replied.

I offered him a job, thinking that he would be best served by stepping into the real world and out of the isolation of the relationship. I discovered that his perception of his social status was skewed and twisted by his intimate exposure to a woman 3 times his age. I needed to inform him with a detailed explanation of why he was not my equal and the difference emotionally between a 16 year old and a 45 year old. It was difficult for him to understand that being the sexual pet of a 50 year old woman did not equal emotional maturity. He needed to consider his own interests, his own well-being and his personal development in context to his age. There is no 50 year old privilege for a 16 year old boy.

He waffled and stumbled with the outcome, resorting back to the dependency of his lover. His real place in the order of things did not become clear to him until his lover openly solicited sex from me, in front of him and offered to include him if that would please me. I gave him a look as if to say, is there anything you do not understand here? I could see the humiliation of betrayal on his face and the absolute arrogance on hers. I appreciated her request for no other reason than she had exposed herself to him. He saw the value she had assigned him and the harm that awaited. The rest was up to him and he successfully broke away and pursued his own life and his own interests. Apparently she was not pleased and it was time for me to move on.

It astounded me that a 50 year old emotional gorilla was willing to dismiss her family and children to pursue a sexual relationship with a 16 year boy. It astounded me that she could legally pull this off, that there was no challenge to her from the very institution that was charged with his safety, his education and his emotional well-being. It astounded me that she would sell out his future and his normal evolution in the face of legal retribution. What astounded me more than anything else was that there was no law of retribution for this boy, no social contract, no accountability of the community.

On Washington Post's "A Woman on the Moon" Article

February 15, 2023 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

The Washington Post recently published an article by their gender columnist, Monica Hesse, A woman on the moon: How has one small step taken so long?

I respectfully ask that you, the reader, take the time to read this admittedly long critique of Hesse's article, and to thoughtfully consider what I say here.

To begin, please note that I'm a proud lifelong reader of the Post, who nevertheless has long noticed the paper's gender bias, most notably its imbalanced coverage of domestic violence.

But my pride in the Post turned to quiet outrage after the paper published two undeniably gender-biased articles in 2018: Why can't we hate men? and Amber Heard's infamous op-ed that ultimately embarrassed the Post[1], cost Heard millions, and proved beyond doubt that men can be victims of violent women.

Hesse's article is another example of the Post's gender bias. In her enthusiasm to hail a first woman on the moon, she conveniently ignored or misrepresented many important parts of the story.

Please don't misunderstand. As a lifelong supporter of expanding opportunities for women, I was inspired by Sally Ride's historic space flight and look forward to having a woman and an astronaut of color walk on the moon.

But with that said, here's why I say that Hesse's article provided an unbalanced perspective:

First, the article opened with a misandrist anecdote that mocked NASA's male engineers in charge of equipment who were helpfully trying to determine how many tampons they should provide in case Sally Ride had her period while in space.

Note that these men were engineers, not doctors. They were also men. Is it reasonable to expect "half the population" (to borrow a phrase Hesse uses in her article) who, never having had a period themselves, to know everything about the monthly menstrual cycle? Does Hesse know everything about being a man?

One may say that it's merely a humorous story and that I should "lighten up". But what if I started an article about the Titanic sinking with the following riddle:

"What's the definition of a feminist?"

Answer: "She's the one in the lifeboat complaining that she can't hear the band playing."

I believe that Hesse's opening anecdote is meant to mock men and masculinity. That it took the first fifth of the article (yes, I calculated it) that otherwise celebrates putting a woman on the moon seems to confirm its real purpose.

Next, Hesse wrote that it was reasonable that the first astronauts "… should be drawn from a pool of military test pilots …", but because women couldn't be test pilots, she said that this requirement "… eliminated half the population". (As one commenter wrote, the requirement "…eliminated approximately 99.9999999% of the population" … why focus only on women?)

But what her article conveniently overlooked is the underlying reason why this female half of the population wasn't considered: for all of human history women have been protected from many of the burdens and extreme dangers placed only on men.

In particular, women have long been safe from hazardous military service that ultimately produced NASA's male-only military test pilots.

Women, with very few exceptions, have also been completely exempt from military conscription, whereas men for all of history have been conscripted, often unwillingly and even under the threat of death, to risk their lives in war. (The conscription of Russian men to fight in Ukraine provides a ghastly current example.[2])

Finally, women have never been expected to work in dangerous coal mines or in most of the "death professions", where men are many times more likely than women to be killed.

I imagine that this massively unequal sharing of life's risks between the genders is what John Glenn was alluding to in his statement that Hesse quoted: "The fact that women are not in this field is a fact of our social order".

In both war and work, women have always been the protected sex.

I believe that Supreme Court justice and three times-wounded Civil War veteran Oliver Wendell Holmes best summarized this inequality between the sexes in a single sentence:

"All societies rest on the death of men".

If one really thinks about it, he was right, don't you think?

Why can't Hesse and other feminists see the enormous hypocrisy when women, who have never been expected to share the same burdens as men, then self-righteously claim, almost as a birthright, to be included in the glory of space exploration?

Or the hypocrisy of being accepted to the nation's military academies without the same draft cards required of the other "half of the population"?

Or the hypocrisy to be the recipients of a feminist-driven "preferential equality" in the nation's colleges and universities via a twisted Title IX, where male students' civil rights are being annulled in campus kangaroo courts in the name of "equal educational opportunity"?

Or the hypocrisy not to insist on having equal numbers of both men and women working in coal mines?

Why haven't feminists demanded a "Title IX for Coal Mines" or an affirmative action program for equality in the death professions, where the male-to-female occupational death gap is 13 to 1?

The answer is “feminist hypocrisy”.

Hesse was so focused on the unfairness that women weren’t eligible to become astronauts, she and other self-righteous women, both then and now, have blinded themselves to an obvious fact:

The early space program was no place for novices or women without test flight experience.

Two near-disasters in space that were averted only by Neil Armstrong’s many years of test flight experience clearly show why:

As described in How Landing the First Man on the Moon Cost Dozens of Lives, Armstrong’s first trip to space nearly ended catastrophically:

“Armstrong himself encountered near-disaster during his first space mission, Gemini 8. After a critical onboard failure, Armstrong and pilot David Scott began spinning out of control in space. After struggling to resist blacking out, Armstrong eventually regained control and landed safely.”

This YouTube video vividly shows just how Armstrong’s skills avoided disaster.

What if it had been two women without test pilot experience flying in Gemini 8?

We would have had two dead women floating in orbit around the earth.

How many people are aware of the harrowing first landing on the moon as Armstrong manually took over the controls of the lunar module Eagle as he struggled with multiple simultaneous problems that occurred during the final descent to the moon’s surface?

This scary landing is vividly described in a space.com article, Apollo 11’s Scariest Moments: Perils of the 1st Manned Moon Landing. A small excerpt conveys only a portion of the sheer terror of the landing – and the cool-headed flying skills of Neil Armstrong:

> “‘Give us a reading on that program alarm,’ Armstrong said. He sounded tense, but no more so than during the simulations. It was hard to grasp that a life-or-death struggle was playing out 240,000 miles (386,000 kilometers) from Earth, in a small, fragile machine descending rapidly to the moon. Communications were spotty; the computer was threatening to quit, and Gene Kranz, the flight director for this first lunar landing, felt Mission Control slip a bit further behind the power curve.”

What if it had been two women without test pilot experience landing on the moon?

We would have had the corpses of two women still sitting on the moon some fifty years later.

Finally, her article describes NASA physician William Lovelace’s own independent, privately-funded program where he gave 13 selected women the same physical and psychological tests administered to the male Mercury astronauts; how none were admitted into NASA’s official program; and how the Russians were first to put a woman into space.

Unfortunately, Hesse's account leaves out some really interesting details.

First, the Russians put the first woman in space only because they became aware of Dr. Lovelace's renegade program.

This is described in an Atlantic magazine article, The Soviet Space Program Was Not Woke:

> "The effort to bring women into the Soviet astronaut corps began when Nikolai Kamanin, the head of cosmonaut training, heard [about Dr. Lovelace's wayward program].
> "We cannot allow that the first woman in space will be American," Kamanin wrote in his journal. "This would be an insult to the patriotic feelings of Soviet women." A search began shortly thereafter, and the first female astronaut candidates reported for training in 1962.
> "Kamanin couldn't have said it any more plainly. The impetus was nationalistic—any [gender] egalitarian impulse was in service of that primary motivation. Soviet women would fly to space for one of the same reasons that the rockets carrying them did: to beat their Cold War enemy."

So, despite Hesse's insinuation otherwise, the Russian's weren't "blazing trails for gender equality" any more than the Americans were.

Second, she omitted the real motivation for Dr. Lovelace's wayward program – it wasn't for gender equality!

The real reason is described in another Atlantic article, Why Women Weren't Allowed to Be Astronauts

> "[Dr.] Lovelace may sound progressive for his time, but his reasoning for including women wasn't. Lovelace imagined a future full of space stations circling Earth, carrying people busy at work. 'He was thinking that if you're going to have dozens of people on space stations, then you're going to need secretaries, you're going to need telephone operators, you're going to need lab assistants—and that means you need women,' … 'So he's thinking about the women for very much traditional, pink-collared, gendered jobs.'"

So, despite her insinuation, Dr. Lovelace wasn't "blazing trails for gender equality" any more than John Glenn was.

Third, Hesse wrote that Valentina Tereshkova, the Soviet's first woman in space "… hadn't been a test pilot either", which strongly suggested that the "test pilot" requirement of the U.S. program was too restrictive against women.

However, this implication ignores a crucial difference between the Soviet and U.S. space programs. As described on this NASA website page,

> "Although piloting was not a requirement for the female candidates (the Vostok spaceship was more or less automated), parachuting was, especially because > after reentry Vostok cosmonauts ejected from the capsule and parachuted to the ground separately."

So, Tereshkova not having test pilot experience was irrelevant. She was chosen because of her skydiving experience.

I know that Hesse's position as a "gender columnist" at The Washington Post really means a "female perspective gender columnist", but she seems to forget that there are two sexes. In the interest of true – and fair – gender equality, we can only pray that she considers and starts writing about the other "half of the population" and the burdens and extreme dangers placed only on men?

You know…the ones that feminists don't want to acknowledge.

Notes:

Especially with articles like this online:

1. "A publication with any semblance of ethics might have asked Depp for comment about the sexual violence claims before running with the allegations — then subsequently spiked the op-ed or sicced its reporters on the case for more fact-finding. But not The Washington Post.

"That paper, which loves to blather in its self-important tone about how "democracy dies in darkness," didn't bother to turn the lights in the direction of Heard's claims. Instead, it gave her a free pass to air her dirty laundry against her ex-husband and consequently enabled her to paint herself both as a victim and a crusader of the Me Too era."

Why I’m Opting Out of Suicide

February 16, 2023 | by Travis Scott | Link | Original Link

My name is Travis Scott. You don’t know who I am, but I’m here to tell you I’ve suffered from suicidal ideation almost my entire life. (For those who don’t know, this means I’ve suffered from thoughts of killing myself).

I’ve kept my suicidal ideation under the rug for many, many years. Never in my life have I ever told a single soul about it until recently.

I’d decided to refrain from telling anyone when I was a kid. And for all those years, a portion of me thought that I was going to live a long life (though it might be a struggle), and die of natural causes whilst taking all of these thoughts with me to the grave. To me, I thought I would achieve something if none were the wiser. Because who needs to know what I can keep under control?

To those who do know me, or know of me, this admission would most certainly come as a shock. I’ve gone through large portions of my life experiencing suicidal thoughts, and no one has ever once suspected me of it. Or if they did, they never said anything. Not passive observers, associates, or even close friends or family members

After having sat through many talks at school or my vocation about suicide, and signs of suicide, never has anyone come up to me after these to check up on me regarding my mental state in person, or over the phone. Because none of them see it.

This is because I hide these thoughts very well. Again, nobody suspects me. I’ve been described as strong willed, charismatic, as having a great smile, as being wise, having an abnormal amount of emotional control over myself, and one of the better ears to listen and shoulders to cry on. There’s a reason this is the way I am, and it is not because I was born with these qualities.

In my life I’ve collected a string of accomplishments that, if someone were to look at, they might describe me as a person whose moderately successful in his own domain, and perhaps has “drive” and “ambition”.

I am not telling you any of this to brag. I am telling you this to let you know that even though its true, absolutely none of it matters. You could have a healthy body and achievements, and still feel or think these things. Take that into consideration when you’re looking out for others- because it’s not always obvious who has bad thoughts, and who doesn’t.

I’m reminded of a poem my high school English teacher shared with my class, called “Richard Cory” by Edwin Burlington Robinson. The entirety of the poem is about a man who is dressed nice, and well-mannered. He has a track-star career, and money in the bank. The final line of that poem involves him committing suicide. My English teacher told me that it was the first poem she ever read, and it stuck with her throughout her life. The same thing happened to me when I heard it.

Why I Was Silent

I was eleven or twelve when I made the decision not to talk about my suicidal ideation, and it was for two reasons. The first being that I believed from a young age that they were completely normal. I heard them from family members in my life from a very young age on a regular basis.

After a lot of thought, I've made the choice to rescind that decision I made in my childhood. This comes with elements of risk to it. But I believe that talking about what I've gone through could yield far more benefits to others, than to do what I originally planned and keep everything to myself.

Because of how I was raised, when I listened to talks given about suicide awareness, sometimes I would say to myself "everyone thinks this," or "most people think this stuff," or "if not most, a great many do." I suspected more people thought about suicide then even the suicide-awareness people let on, or were capable of comprehending. Yet even thought I thought everyone felt this way, for some reason, it was taboo for any one person to say out loud.

I read a quote somewhere that went something like this: the way modern society works is that it makes a great many people unhappy. But instead of fixing the way society is run, they've invented drugs to displace that unhappiness. Therefore society can keep being broken, while it makes the right people the money they want as they continue to sedate everyone else.

This leads to my second reason for hiding my ideation. I figured the reason so many people felt this way was because the system was broken; So why would I trust the broken society that fostered these ill thoughts with healing me?

I often I perceived that when society tried to help people with mental illness, often the "help" could hardly be described as 'humane'. I'd heard terrible stories of people with minor mental issues get thrown into a "mental healthcare system" that does not differentiate well between the extremely disturbed from the hardly ill. Where what might have been a temporary mental sickness became a prolongated problem due to some misdiagnosis or bad treatment.

I saw that there were doctors and methods out their that I did not trust with my life or well being. I said to myself that I'd be better off finding my own way to live and make myself better. There are good doctors, and there are ill ones. I have no way of immediately differentiating between the two. There are many doctors (how many, I don't know) who think they need people to be broken to make a living. A healed patient, of course, is a lost source of income.

This is a jaded view, but I know I am not the only one who is skeptical of treatments or being treated. I have seen select therapists and such throughout my life, but haven't disclosed such thoughts before.

A Change of Direction

I know one day, all our scars will disappear, like the stars at dawn and all of our pain, will fade away when morning comes and on that day when we look backwards we will see, that everything is changed and all of our trials, will be as milestones on the way and as long as we live, every scar is a bridge to someone's broken heart

-For Miles, Thrice

I want to relate this to the time I came out over my Facebook about being molested as a child. My molestation had been masquerading for years in my memory as something else entirely. Most perpetrators of the crime mask this behavior with language, creating word associations that are related with games, rather than what it actually is: a sexual crime. So when you remember the act, you don't remember for what it is.

When I had come to realize that I had actually been molested, I spent years being mad at God an everyone for what I'd gone through. Even when I had explained my anger away, deep down, it didn't go away.

I had thought of writing about it for many months. I'd avoided the task for many reasons. Yet when I came out about this to my friends, hundreds of people I'd grown up with through grade school, or been to dance competitions with, or knew threw family/religious associations, all read it. I don't know what I was expecting, but I'd been blown away by the responses I got.

I felt like I just had something to get off my chest. But I had people coming up to me saying that "the same thing happened to me, but I didn't realize it until I read what you wrote." I'd gotten dozens of thank-yous and personal messages from people I hadn't considered it would effect.

There were also other people who contacted me. People who I had known a long time but hadn't spoken to in months. People who helped me write books, or been through hard times with me.

Often, I'd felt like I was the only one who reached out to people to check and see if they were all OK. It was hardly the other way around. All of a sudden they wanted to reach out and talk to me out of desperation and see how my mental state was. I wish it didn't take a confession for that to happen.

But aside from that, I'm here to tell you that something strange happened. The pain of what I'd felt related to the molestation had all but disappeared. And in the years since sharing that pain, I'd lost interest in the aftermath of the tragedy. More and more I stopped considering thoughts like "life could have been so different if that never happened," and woes faded more and more into the back ground.

I plan on doing the same thing with this. Whether or not this heals me more is irrelevant. What matters is if it heals someone else. I'm going to go over all the rationalizations I made in my head (however distorted). Then I will go over some solutions that I've applied to myself, and could be applied to others.

This will take a while. Admitting I've had suicidal ideation is one step. There are other things I'd like to talk about, like why I have it, how I deal with it, and maybe what it means to society. But those will take a minute.

For years, I've always said "no" to suicide just because. Sometimes I have reasons, other times, I say “the waves eventually go away”. They do, but they inevitably return for a list of reasons down the road. Over the years I’ve come more and more to believe that life is bigger than I thought it could be, it’s most definitely worth living, and I have a greater variety of tools to fight these thoughts then I did in the past. Later, I plan on giving them all to you.

I imagine that if I write all this down, somebody somewhere will get something out of it. That is all I care about. Per chance, the more I write down, the more people it will help.

Very few people who have suicidal ideation talk about it, and many people never bring it up because they either think help doesn’t exist, they don’t need or want it, or the “help” will make things worse. From my point of view, society at large has failed to care about many of you people out there.

I’m writing this in an informal manner, and not for a medical publication of some kind. In doing so, I’m taking a giant step over all these institutions and feel-good awareness clubs. I’m not against the idea of speaking at a conference or discussion table hosted by one of these organizations in the future. But to be honest, my distrust of the healthcare system is most of the reason I have been silent all these years.

These organizations are not all irrelevant, but more often then one would like, they fail. Like all institutions, they are human at their core. For “mental health” guilds and facilities, machine-like bureaucratic elements have been created to minimize human error during the application of treatment. Ironically, this often crushes the compassionate-creative element that real attentive healing requires.

I did call a crisis hot-line before I wrote this. That type of stuff might actually help you, so don’t discount it. They did not help me very much. I got the same response I often get if I talk to professionals about this: “You seem 10 steps ahead of most the people I talk to,” says the operator.

Uh-huh. Still here, though. So here goes nothing.

My beloved friend has died, but his spirit lives on February 19, 2023 | by Aine Hee von Sax | Link | Original Link

This is a republication of an article originally published in 2016. –Ed

Someone I have come to dearly love has passed away from this world, this morning, the morning of me sitting here and typing this down. The pain is unbearable, but another friend suggested to me to write about him, to share my grief, as it is not just a personal loss, but also reaches out and touches the wider issues we these days face as humanity together.

When I moved here, it was once again a new country for me, a new environment, new people. Despite this being a very slim populated area, still there are other humans around, and I was scared of what reception I would receive, whether I would be accepted or rejected and whether I would be able to cope with everything ahead of me, the practical as well as the emotional. It was a time of a great turmoil and many worries for me, as new beginnings tend to be, even though I had chosen it just this way.

The first time I met my neighbour, he puttered up the dirt road with his old worn and beaten little tractor, and I was worried, as usually not many find their way up to where I live, and I feared it may be someone not happy with a stranger having moved into the area. I walked over to the tractor, after it had pulled into my yard, and found a thin man with a truly weathered face at its wheel, white hair and a straw hat. He told me his name, then began almost to batter me with warnings, most of which I could not even understand, as he spoke fast and with a thick and to me back then still alien accent. I was quite taken aback, as I didn't know this man at all, and he seemed very forceful and opinionated. I was also groaning inside, as I thought I had ended in some neighbour's war or what not, not fully able to make sense of everything he spoke to me in that frightful insistence of his.

When he finally decided to leave, I felt relief and just hoped I'd never meet him again. Not able to judge what he was about, mainly having felt quite intimidated. Of course, he was a neighbour, and even if being neighbours here can mean more distance than in a city or town, it was clear and inevitable that I would meet him again, many more times in fact, and what a blessing for my life, what a gift, that I did!

Many an evening since that scary first encounter, he and I came to laugh about my first impression of him. During those evenings where we would sit next to his roaring fireplace, in his old traditional cottage, where the bare stones were showing on the wall and all those many little ornaments he had collected and loved so much, were listening to our ramblings. There wasn't a free space anywhere on the shelves, even the ceiling held hooks from which cups and ornaments hang, and he always had a pot of stew brewing, next by that fire, and everyone walking into his home would be offered a meal, and many of us walked in and out of his home, because it was a warm and welcoming place. That frightening man had in fact grown to become one of the best friends of my life.

My neighbour had not known a good marriage; he and his ex-wife had parted on very bad terms, and I also still remember those evenings when he told me about all the things which had hurt him, silent tears running over his weathered cheeks, which he defiantly tried to wipe away. He was no angel, he had his flaws, sometimes he was moody, often stubborn, and I am sure he had not always been easy to live with either, but he was overall a wonderful human being, and I would reach for his hand and hold it gently. Usually, he'd come to finish with saying that it was no use to look back, but rather to focus on the present and future, and on the wonderful friends he had, and I felt honoured beyond measure that life had allowed me to be one of them. His main saying was 'giving is living, and grabbing is dying'. I can not count how often he spoke it, but he also loved to say 'oh bollocks,' or 'what a shite', and when I close my eyes, I see his smirk and his wink. He was always full of mischief, but also smart and full of stories about his childhood and life overall.

Christmas before last (Christmas gone, he was already in the hospital), he wanted to know what I would like him to buy me. I told him I did not wish anything bought, but that I'd much prefer for him to make me something, and this he came to do, he made me a hiking stick. From cutting the wood to cleaning it, carving and polishing it, it was all his work, but he felt embarrassed that it was not posh, not fanciful, had not cost any money.. until I told him I thought it was one of the most amazing gifts I had ever received, and he saw the truth of this in how my eyes and my face had lit up, while holding his precious gift tight and close. We both felt the greatest joy, and that stick remains with me, and shall do so for as long as I shall still live in this world.

My workshop is still not set up, it is in the planning as lots of other stuff had priority, so I could not make him what I had wanted to make for him, but whenever I was out and about, and I saw something I knew would make him smile, I bought it for him. Little things, not expensive stuff, just little tiny things that can say 'I have thought of you, and I love you'.

Now death has taken this wonderful beloved friend from me and others. A man who had worked hard all his life (he was in his late sixties) who could build a house from scratch, always knew a solution to a problem, never shied wind nor rain, and whose honesty and integrity have been a shining light in this often so sad and insane world. As individuals, he and his wife had been ill suited to each other, from all I could gather, and much hurt had come from it, as it can happen among humans, but the man I came to know, enriched my life beyond all measures. He was male, very much a so, sometimes a giggling boy, sometimes a philosopher, sometimes a man who could grunt and swear, but never a rapist and never an oppressor, instead always worth knowing, even at his worst.

There are those out there, who will reject others purely due to whether they were born a male or a female, and those who have lost all ability to meet and greet another human being with respect, warmth and care. They try to teach us to see gender and based on this to determine another's worth or another's inner nature. But even those who are not that extreme, often these days find their lives ruled by misgivings, only ever considering their own hurt, their own point of view. Many certainly in this world do not seem able any more to understand that giving indeed means living a life full of joy, where we see lit up eyes and faces, while grabbing kills warmth and kindness, and leads us to live in a cold empty world, filled with things that stand for nothing beyond their price tag, while leaving us bereft of all which truly matters.

On my friend's behalf, I wish to remind everyone that life is not endless. We are only given a certain amount of time, and once the seconds have ticked away, it is too late to go back. I doubt his wife ever understood how much hurt she had truly caused him. I am certain he did cause her hurts too. Human interactions can be like that, but because men usually do not show their pains as open, because they do not cry out loud as women do, instead battling to hold it in until they can no longer hold it, and it comes to flow as silent tears from their eyes during an evening by the fireplace.. we often don't think they can hurt as deeply as women do. It is this misunderstanding of men's endurance, an endurance they get taught early by our societies, which leaves them so vulnerable to abuse, as no one cares, as no one sees their pains in the open.

My friend's former wife came to his bedside in these last days; I was told that she did, and I can only hope that she held his hand and stroked it gently, after more than two decades where they had clung to their hurts and resulting hate. I hope she remembered all that he had given to her, from the house I know he had built for her with his own hands (and whose kitchen she felt he had made too small) to the money he had brought home so they could eat and heat.

While he was lying there, battling for the little bit of life he had left, I hope she realized he needed love and warmth from her, not more accusations and lists of where he could have done better, and I truly hope she found ways to show him that needed love and caring warmth.

While I sit here crying, struggling to type, blinded by my own tears, looking ahead and knowing I will miss him so very much. I also think of how time truly knows equality, as it is ticking away for men and women indiscriminately, and it does not wait for us to learn our lessons before it is too late.

Giving is living while still alive, and grabbing is dying long before our last breath. We know what hurt can do to us, and thus we should not ever carelessly bring hurt to others, as well as that we need to realize women don't suffer more, just because they often find it easier to show suffering, but that men deserve hands reaching for theirs just the same, while scared and in agony. Just because men are taught to be strong for us, should never mean that we forget that deep inside they feel just as we do.

My friend enriched the lives of those of us here beyond what I could ever press into words, and his passing lets us all feel the deepest of loss, but I hope his story can still help others out there, to learn before it is too late.

I know he'd love that, to still give to others, even after his leaving this world. He was just that special, that beautiful, that precious a human and a man, who had shelves full of little ornaments, right next to his chainsaws and tools, and while he knew how to dust the ornaments with greatest of caution and care, he also knew how to wield those tools with the utmost strength and life-long experience.

A place in our midst has been left empty, and the world as a whole is poorer for it, because of you my friend, having left it…

Man vs Woman vs Wild: Battle of the sexes in the Aussie outback | 60 Minutes Australia

Below is a video produced by 60 Minutes Australia. This plays on public television.

Summary – TD;DR

The men did better in the challenges than the women did.

The women got lost a couple of times.

All observers agreed the men were exhibiting less signs of stress.

The researcher states that her testing suggests that the women were under less stress than the men. The interviewer and the researcher herself, both women, admit to being surprised by this. We're surprised to and wonder if there isn't some deficiency in the testing.

The researcher puts the difference down to women externalising their stress. We're sceptical whether this could make a significant difference.

The men arrived at the finish line first. They waited for the women. There was a plan for everyone to cross at once. Then the women double-crossed the men and stepped across first. Very disappointing behaviour on the part of the women. If you make a deal, stick to it.

“Strong Men Create Good Times”

February 21, 2023 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

I’m sure you’ve seen or heard the following quote a few times in one form or another:

> “Hard times create strong men. Strong men create good times. Good times create weak men. And, weak men create hard times.”

I’m also sure you’ve noticed that the ones who love to repeat this phrase are usually conservative traditionalist types.

According to Goodreads, the quote is apparently attributed to a G. Michael Hopf who is a novelist of post-apocalyptic fiction; specifically, the quote is stated to come from his 2016 work Those Who Remain. I know absolutely nothing about Mr. Hopf, his works, nor his precise intent and context of this phrase. I’m not here to talk about him at all. Instead, this essay will serve as my reaction to the use of this phrase by conservatives in this woke era.

If common usage of that saying is not intended as a reaction to things like the woke phenomenon, modern society with its comforts, and the “decline and collapse of Western civilization”, then I don’t know what the intent is. The following is what is likely in the minds of these traditionalist conservatives as they chant the slogan:

Men are supposed to need these “hard times” to become strong. Because we have these hardened “strong” men of service, our lives and our civilization is prosperous. But lo and behold, our civilization is so prosperous and value is so abundant that life isn’t hard enough for men to be whipped into shape! And because of these men who are clearly slacking and not sacrificing enough, they are to blame for the hard times we currently face!

Does that sound about right?

Some no doubt find some sort of inspiration in this slogan. What form this inspiration takes, I have not the slightest idea. Instead, I find only two things: sheer futility, and another excuse to blame men for any given problem in the world.

One would think that the futile nature of this slogan would be obvious enough that it would be more discouraging and a cause for pessimism than any inspiration in a positive sense. It is even more futile and pessimistic than the occasional talk about “the pendulum swing” in societal attitudes.

Here is what I mean: when somebody speaks about the liberation and mainstreaming of Social Issue X, which then leans to aberrant behavior that results in reactionary backlash, what they commonly would add is that “the pendulum has swung too far.” There is supposedly a pendulum that is swinging, implying that society is doomed to hopelessly alternate between states of collective attitudes. Nobody learns a lesson. For every supposed virtue, there is an extreme it goes to that necessitates the swing the other way. Then, the cycle repeats. This is an expression of no moral certainty; I would almost say it is comparable to moral relativism.

The “Hard Times Create Strong Men” Loop should be recognized as at least as despairing due to the very fact that it is a loop. For all the hard work of the “strong men” created by hard times, it all is meaningless: it comes crashing down to hard times. None of the praises of strong men mattered because they end up creating the very thing, the hard times, that they were trying to save mankind from.

Consider the following illogicality: If hard times create strong men, then hard times are good, because strong men are good. It follows then that the good times are bad, because they create weak men, who are bad. But then weak men create the hard times – are weak men good or bad for doing this? Is this not a desirable situation, since they create good strong men? But then if strong men create the thing that creates the weak men, why is anyone complaining about the weak men? What’s more, they lead to the good thing that makes thing strong!

I could go on, but suffice to say that I’ve given this more thought than anyone who just want to throw around a loopy quote to sound sophisticated.

Let’s talk about my second point, about blaming men:

“Hard Times Create Strong Men” – Men are tasked with getting society (once again, by society I mean “mostly women”) out of the hard times. They are useless unless they risk their lives all for the sake of others who don’t – others who aren’t admonished like these men are.

“Strong Men Create Good Times” – Men, having already been tasked to eliminate the hard times often at their own expense, must make things better and produce a plethora of goodness. Create the good times, or you (men) are useless.

“Good Times Create Weak Men” – Society changes its mind. Men, having been asked to build the good times, are facing attack on two fronts: for becoming “weak” because things are much simpler and there is less strife and thus more reason to enjoy the fruits of unsacrificed life, and secondly for creating the thing that ushered in these “weak” men. Talk about biting the hand that feeds.

“Weak Men Create Hard Times” – Life begins to suck, people (mostly women) freak out, and instead of any self-awareness of the fact that they asked for all this, focus on blaming men because they got us out of the “good times” as strong men, and because they created the “hard times” as weak men. Man almost realizes that he can’t win, but opts for compliance and pleasing the women anyway.

“Hard Times Create Strong Men: The Next Generation” – As men are tasked once again with getting society out of the hard times, they are reminded of how much they are to blame.

Do you think I am being too hyperbolic with these scenarios? Frankly, with such a clever-sounding yet actually stupid causality loop, I can’t help but be so hyperbolic; it is necessary to illustrate the moronic take that it is.

If you think this is just praise for men and crediting them for it, you should realize it is a backhanded and false praise. You're being set up for a Catch-22. Damned if you do, and damned if you don't. It doesn't matter if the cycle makes it futile, for that is what your life's worth is defined by. If anything, the futility is necessary, so that the man need not know that anything outside the cycle, outside the pendulum swing, is even possible,

With such a mindset that charges men with the task of holding up society, and the blame for not holding it perfectly enough, we can make further assumptions. Nothing wrong that happens is women's fault. Either women don't have the obligation to contribute to making the good times, or they do merely by existing. And, if those God-darn males would please stop screwing things up then we won't fall into hard times again! Such is the mindset behind the culture of male toil and disposable usage.

In light of all this, what is a strong or weak man anyway? As we know, strength has multiple contexts.

In terms of physical strength, it is well-taken that the more technology progresses, the less manual labor men have to perform in certain areas due to automation. But the existence of facilities to work out in, from our more modernized gyms to the very outdoors where we can walk and run, proves that there is always every opportunity to actually make oneself stronger or at least fit no matter how advanced the technology is.

In terms of strength of character, there could be much more potential for confusion. It is of course the height of irony for a gynocentrist to be preaching about a man's strong character considering that gynocentrism requires weak male character. Because nothing says "strong man" like going on one's knees to propose marriage to a woman and acting as if they were pathetic unworthy creatures requiring the kindness of the iteration of The Great Mother; nothing says "strong man" like someone at the beck and call of their wife or their mother, because you know what they say about happy wives and unhappy mamas.

I will offer a thought: a proper masculine strength of character involves the willingness to set boundaries and one's own standards. It is the willingness to embrace what has been always denied him: the right to exist on his own terms.

Lastly in terms of spiritual strength, I have to say there is even more potential for confusion. The particulars of spirituality are subject to debate, and they should be in this world of philosophical vibrance and multiple points of view and backgrounds. But much of the "spiritual" argument for the "strong man" has manifested in terms of breaking men. Mortification of flesh, physical mutilation and psychological self-torture has often been taken up as rites of passage for boys to become men, even though the fact that these particular acts are man-breaking is not cloaked.

The most egregious form of male torture as a marker of "on the path to manhood" is one we're most familiar with: male genital mutilation. Different from those who think the procedure is painless and results in no harm, instead the traditional conservative is fully aware of the pain, some of the damage, and the fact that the infant could die – to them, the pain is "good for the boy," "it will make them men," and "it is a covenant with God". The refusal to see the cruelty of inflicting it on infant boys will always be cloaked in the veneer of a sacrificial take on masculinity by it's gurus and salesmen: the likes of Matt Walsh and Jordan Peterson. Such is their version of spiritual "strength". Such is the pressure to be a "strong man" so unreasonably high that they must presume to ensure it at the earliest days of Year Zero of the male.

Regarding genuine spiritual strength, I would offer similar advice about strength of character. The particulars of your spirituality are yours to decide, but make no mistake: they are yours to decide. Be absolutely sure that your spiritual strength comes from the how whole you feel, and how uncompromised you are. Recognize when your spirituality and sense of wholeness is injured, especially when it has happened at infancy, and find that strength to heal.

With these recontextualizations of strong men, could we bring some meaning to the slogan at hand? Frankly, it is not worth it. Remember, it is a futile cycle anyway. If strength for men is to actually mean anything, it should serve to reject such oversimplistic catchphrases, not for consign men to it.

What I can do is offer an alternative narrative, that actually has a purpose and endpoint. A goal post, if you will. Consider the following:

Good times do not lead to hard times, certainly not by virtue of being good times. Hard times are caused by complacency. Complacency is the direct result of not realizing we have choices to make. We do, in fact, have a choice to make at each given moment during the good times. We are not doomed to fall into hard times because good times make us inevitably weak. It is not inevitable.

Oftentimes we hear words of doom spoken regarding the rise and fall of civilizations in human history. Of course, the fall of a civilization is as inevitable as our own deaths as human beings. However, it is a mistake to think a civilization has to go that way at any point. So long as human beings can make the choice to stand up against those that seek to bring the hard times and act accordingly, civilization will not die. Good times aren't doomed to lead to bad times. Quite the contrary, good times exist to fight the hard times.

If men are in trouble, and they are, hard times are the cause, not good times. If men find themselves weakened in any meaningful sense of the word, the causes are found in the hard times. It's time to stop this preoccupation with bromides that are feedback loops glorifying pointlessness. We should instead find guidelines that make for a lasting vision for men's greatness that values them for their own sake, not as scapegoats.

The real reason why geeky men offend the church of feminism

February 22, 2023 | by Rachael Lefler | Link | Original Link

> "I never forgot it, confusing as it was, no fun with no guilt feelings."
> – Alanis Morisette, 'Forgiven'

When I say "bad boys", what you might be inclined to picture is a man in a leather jacket with tattoos, hair gel, chain necklaces, and a motorcycle. The kind of guy with an irresistible "not giving a fuck" attitude that women go nuts for. But the digital era has created a new kind of "bad boy", in terms of what the Church of Progressive Feminist Capitalism defines as "bad":– the geeky guy.

Outside the fact that we spend money on toys, cosplay, and collections, us geeks are bad consumers. We still define ourselves by what we consume, but we don't mass consume what everyone else is consuming. Our money gives more power to small "ma and pa" businesses and small niche content creators on the internet than it does to the huge corporations. Corporations are trying two strategies to fight their losing revenue. For one, make their same idiotic blockbusters they've always made to impress the masses, but get a 'geek culture' franchise label. This is what Marvel does. This is what the Star Wars and Star Trek movies are now. Even Doctor Who has lost its way somewhat. This is why journalists said gamers are no longer the target of game companies. Games are now for the dull-brained masses.

The mega-corporations have one other strategy against us; women. Whether you watch Ready Player One, Big Bang Theory, Atypical, I.T. Crowd, or anything featuring a male character who is geeky or autistic, that character will invariably be defined by their success or lack thereof in dating, and the fictional stories about geeky and autistic men you're likely to see on TV or in the mainstream movies are all about sex and dating. This is not by accident, but by design. The dateless male geek nullifies the threat that geek men might just enjoy existing without women. The message is clear: good men want pussy, and good women will work hard, like Penny in Big Bang Theory, to tame geeky men who redeem themselves by giving up what they want for what women want.

Why is that so important to pop culture? Well, pop culture is not, for the most part, what is organically created by independent creative thinkers. It's planned by what amount to think tanks of newly hatched English major graduates. It's a carefully thought-out product, and a huge team effort, with the result engineered much like a car or a building. So no part of say, a Marvel movie or an episode of a best-selling sitcom is accidental. And the primary purpose is to make money through ad deals.

To make money through ad deals, your show has to encourage a consumerist cultural mindset. These people writing this crap will claim to be progressive or Marxist even, but they really aren't. Being Marxist means you want to dismantle capitalism. The people don’t want that and never will. They want to perpetuate everything that sucks about capitalism (the idea that you should define yourself by the junk you buy, and keep buying and buying, like a hamster on a wheel) and diminish everything that’s great about capitalism (freedom of expression, individuality).

But why sex? Well, sex sells. Even sells crappy cultural ideas. But what they’re not selling men is sexual freedom. I often roll my eyes when I see another reminder that the sexual revolution is just something that women got. Men are still pushed into the traditional role; breadwinner and faithful to one woman, even if she sleeps around. It’s also the only thing the geeky male appears to lack. It’s inconceivable to someone steeped in our juvenile, sex-obsessed celebrity culture that some people are happy and just fine without its endless pursuit.

The sexless geek is seen as similar to a drug addict, a poor unfortunate soul needing rehabilitation. It also makes sense from a narrative perspective; as stories need conflict, and geeks don’t run into as much conflict that’s fun for an audience of lay people anywhere but in the realm of dating. But I also hear the message when I put on my “They Live” glasses and watch something like the first episode of Atypical:– REPRODUCE! Don’t go your own way! Your own way means you won’t be financially obligated to support a woman and children. So we will control you less. And we hate that.

I’m not a man. But I am a lifelong geek. And as a bisexual who is very much attracted to the female body, I sexually experience the world the way a man would – I like Ivy’s tits in Soul Calibur, and I don’t want to be shamed for it. But what I’m finding is that men are shamed for liking breasts, while women are not shamed for wanting to show their bodies off for strangers to see. So there’s been this awkward culture of fear around sex created by, like I said, the fact that the sexual revolution has freed women but not men to such an extent.

Feminists like to claim they’re fighting for men and that men don’t need their own movement. But if feminists fought for men 20-40 years ago as much as they did for women, why is it that it’s considered normal for a 16 year-old girl to be on birth control, and weird, creepy, perverted, and wrong for a man to have a collection of sexy anime dolls? Either sexuality is cool or it isn’t. Enough with double standards that victimize men. It’s all about getting you to repent for the sin of seeking happiness independently from the control of women. Don’t be a good consumer. Don’t go gentle. Go your own way.

I would like to praise Liz Hodgkinson for her article in the Daily Mail today entitled 'We Fought for Equality. So Why Do Greedy Wives Still Sponge Off Their Ex-Husbands?'

It's a question I've often wondered about, in spite of my own experiences. You see, when my father left my mother back in 1995, with three children to support and a mortgage to pay, he withdrew every single penny from the family savings, meaning my mother could not pay our mortgage, meaning we eventually had to move into corporation housing.

Not content with this level of douche-baggery, he dropped completely out of sight, and changed his name to avoid paying child-support. My mother never saw a penny of support from him because no-one could pin him down – he moved like quicksilver.

Now you would have thought seeing my own mother struggle for years, I would be up on my chair, screaming 'YOU GO GIRL' every time someone screwed a huge settlement out of their ex-husband.

Wrong.

I think it's disgusting. Because I'm a sensible human being who realises no other man has to be punished for my father's behaviour. Whats more, I feel that there is a significant moral degradation present in anyone who takes more than what they are actually entitled to. I'm talking about those 'I'm entitled to a percentage of your future earnings FOREVER AND EVER' women.

That's right – forever and ever. Even if you had nothing to do with setting up his successful business enterprise. Even if you didn't work a goddamn day to help him make that money for 25 years.

You are entitled to earn off his future earnings. Even if you are no longer together? Even if you don't have children?

How can those women look at themselves in the mirror in the morning? What's more how is this possible by law?

I told my own husband just the other evening during a debate on this very issue:

'Even if there was a point where I hated you so much that I could barely bear to look at you, if I took more than I'd put in, more than was actually mine, I would consider that I had failed as a human being.

And how on earth could I justify grabbing at your future earnings? In that situation, if I didn't want you, I wouldn't want your money either.'

And I mean it.

'These men are just giving us what they owe us – you take what you can get'. Oh do me a favour – is this equality we're talking about?

Because it seems like damned greed to me.

And it's nothing to be proud of.

Here is Liz Hodgkinson's article in full. It's worth a read. Here is an archived copy of the page.

Petty Despotism and Petticoats

Miracles do happen. As evidence, I offer the statue of John Adams in Quincy, Massachusetts. Against all odds, it has escaped desecration. So why would John Adams be in Dutch with the iconoclasts?

John Adams was a member in good standing of the founding fathers and served as the first Vice-President and second President of the United States. Born on October 30, 1735, Adams's fingerprints are all over the waning decades of the American colonies and the early decades of the American nation. The first half of his life covers the pre-Constitutional era; the second half coincides with the early years of the republic after the Constitution was ratified in 1788. Nevertheless, Adams is not as iconic as many of his peers.

To an extent, this is understandable. When it comes to Presidents, George Washington is a tough act to follow. Not only that, Adams was followed by Thomas Jefferson. So both Adams's predecessor and successor are depicted on Mount Rushmore, and the Washington Monument and the Jefferson Memorial are major attractions in the nation's capital. Adams was no lightweight, but he had the misfortune of being sandwiched between two heavyweights. I suppose we could call Adams a light heavyweight. He was the first President to be voted out after just one term, and "One-Term President" is not a stigma to be borne lightly.

I'm not going to go into a detailed recreation of Adams's life, as this has already been done by numerous historians. Online articles, encyclopedia entries, and biographies are legion. It didn't hurt Adams's legacy when his son, John Quincy Adams, also became President (No. 6) and later descendants enjoyed prominence in other areas (e.g., historian Henry Adams and philosopher Brooks Adams). Keeping the family name alive today is the Samuel Adams (revolutionary leader and second cousin of John Adams) brewery in Boston. Actually, it would have been more appropriate to name the brewery after John's two sons, Thomas and Charles, who did not become Presidents. Both were alcoholics.

So it is altogether fitting that John Adams has a statue in his hometown of Quincy, Massachusetts. Yet, as I mentioned at the outset of this article, it is miraculous that it has not been subject to iconoclasm. Why do I say that? Unlike many of the other founding fathers, Adams never owned any slaves and his family had no connection with the slave trade. I don't think he ever slighted anyone on the LGBTQ spectrum, not because he was a paragon of tolerance but because the subject never came up. His attitude towards women, however, was rather condescending – not inaccurate, mind you – and he recognized gynocentrism when he saw it.

In 1776 Adams was in Philadelphia while his wife Abigail, who was born into a prominent Massachusetts family (shhhhh…they were slave-owners), was back in Massachusetts tending to the family farm. In a famous letter, dated March 31, 1776, she wrote the following (words that appear to be capitalized for no reason or misspelled are in the original text):

> I long to hear that you have declared an independency – and by the way in the new Code of Laws which I suppose it will be necessary for you to make I desire you would Remember the Ladies, and be more generous and favourable to them than your ancestors. Do not put such unlimited power into the hands of the Husbands. Remember all Men would be tyrants if they could. If particular care and attention is not paid to the Ladies we are determined to foment a Rebelion, and will not hold ourselves bound by any Laws in which we have no voice, or Representation.
> That your Sex are Naturally Tyrannical is a Truth so thoroughly established as to admit of no dispute, but such of you as wish to be happy willingly give up the harsh title of Master for the more tender and endearing one of Friend. Why then, not put it out of the power of the vicious and the Lawless to use us with cruelty and indignity with impunity. Men of Sense in all Ages abhor those customs which treat us only as the vassals of your Sex. Regard us then as Beings placed by providence under your protection and in imitation of the Supreem Being make use of the that power only for our happiness.

Well, that's more eloquent than most of the feminist screeds (or should I say screeeeeeeds?) of recent years, but the message is the same. I am woman, hear my roar…my plea for equity…my narcissism. Adams, much to his credit, responded with equal eloquence in his reply of April 14, 1776 (again, spelling and capital letters are as in the original text):

> As to your extraordinary Code of Laws, I cannot but laugh. We have been told that our Struggle has loosened the bands of Government every where. That Children and Apprentices were disobedient – that schools and Colledges were grown turbulent – that Indians slighted their Guardians and Negroes grew insolent to their Masters. But your Letter was the first Intimation that another Tribe more numerous and powerful than all the rest were grown discontented – This is rather too coarse a Compliment but you are so saucy; I won't blot it out.
> Depend upon it, We know better than to repeal our Masculine systems. Altho they are in full Force, you know they are little more than Theory. We dare not exert our Power in its full Latitude. We are obliged to go fair, and softly, and in Practice you know We are the subjects. We have only the Name of Masters, and rather than give up this, which would completely subject Us to the Despotism of the Peticoat, I hope General Washington, and all our brave Heroes would fight.

Recalling the old maxim that the pen is mightier than the sword, we might add that it is also stronger than any pimp hand.

How is Adams's reply offensive to female sensibilities? Let me count the ways:

First of all, he “cannot but laugh.” Dismissing women’s lived experience? Screeeeeeech!

The word “saucy” is also problematic, as it often appears in conjunction with the dreaded noun “wench.” Also it is too close to sassy, an equally problematical word. Perhaps worst of all, it rhymes with bossy. Screeeeeech!

And that phrase “Despotism of the Peticoat”…sheer patriarchal bluster and blather! Screeeeech! But what can you expect from a founding father?

On top of all that, Adams has the gall to assert that men are the “subjects” – that their power is in name only! Why, he even has the gall to assert that men are more oppressed than women! Screeeeeee (pause to inhale) eeeeeeeeeeeeech!

In short, Adams’s sin was talking back to his wife! To make it worse, unlike a sitcom husband, he got away with it! Admittedly, this is easier to do at a distance and in writing rather than in person. Perhaps absence makes the heart grow bolder as well as fonder. One wonders how Abigail responded when she received hubby’s letter. Imagine the uproar that would occur today if Adams’s correspondence were electronic and Abigail went public with it on Twitter.

But getting back to that John Adams statue and the mystery of why it hasn’t been pulled down yet. Remember, it’s in the Boston metro area and New England is chock full of feministas, college students, academics, and other assorted parasites. FUN FACT: “Boston marriage” is a slang term for a lesbian relationship.

In fact, it’s a bit surprising that Massachusetts Senator Elizabeth Warren isn’t on the warpath about John Adams. After all, she identifies as a Native American and Adams not only slighted women, he made that remark about Indians and their Guardians (ironically, the Cleveland Indians are now known as the Cleveland Guardians.) And let’s not forget what Adams said about Negroes talking back to their Masters (also, in his defense of the British soldiers responsible for the Boston Massacre, he was less than reverential in regard to Crispus Attucks, the famous mixed-race victim). Statues have been toppled for less than that in recent years.

If they do deep-six that statue in Quincy, there are others out there less at risk. One is in, of all places, Bilbao, Spain. How did that happen? It seems Adams passed some time in northern Spain during his diplomatic days and was favorably impressed by some aspects of Basque culture. I think it’s safe to say this statue is in little danger of desecration, but just to be safe, don’t tell the Basque women about John’s correspondence with Abigail.

There is a third statute of Adams but that is also in little danger even though it is in America. It is located in Rapid City, South Dakota, where a statute of every former American President through Obama appears downtown. It’s something of a consolation prize for the all those Presidents who didn’t get their mugs chiseled into nearby Mount Rushmore. Of course, some of those chief executives were better at chiseling than any sculptor. How do you think they got elected?

Any attempt to topple statutes in Rapid City would likely be met with resistance, as such an act would be a threat to tourism. Besides, if you let everyone with an axe to grind strike a blow, those Presidential statues would topple like dominoes.

A statue of John Adams may one day appear in Washington, D.C. The Adams Memorial Foundation was established in 2001 to build a monument to Adams and his family. So when will it appear? Maybe never if word gets out about Adams's epistolary transgressions.

Abigail, by the way, has two statues in Quincy (for good measure, a state park in nearby Weymouth is named after her). One statue is of her alone, the other is with a young John Quincy Adams. Maybe hubby didn't put her on a pedestal, but a couple of sculptors did!

Since Abigail spoke up for women and spoke out against slavery, her statues will get a pass from the perpetually aggrieved. Her reputation has grown to a point where her advocates assert that her advice was crucial to John's success, so much so that we might not have a country if she hadn't been so outspoken and opinionated.

Of course, there have been more than a few saucy First Ladies, but the phrase "despotism of the peticoats" doesn't necessarily apply to them. Hillary Clinton, arguably the worst, never wore petticoats, but a despotism of the pantsuit was a clear and present danger. MORE FUN FACTS: "Wellesley marriage" has the same meaning as "Boston marriage," and Hillary Clinton is a proud alumna of Wellesley College!

As is often the case, Abigail thought she got in the last word in her correspondence with her husband. Indeed, she was somewhat prophetic. In a letter dated May 7, 1776, she wrote (again, with questionable spelling and capitalization):

> I can not say I think you very generous to the Ladies, for whilst you are proclaiming peace and good will to Men, Emancipating all Nations, you insist upon retaining an absolute power over Wives. But you must remember that Arbitary power is like most other things which are very hard, very liable to be broken – and notwithstanding all your wise Laws and Maxims we have it in our power not only to free ourselves but to subdue our Masters, and without voilence throw both your natural and legal authority at our feet—
> "Charm by accepting, by submitting sway
> Yet have our Humour most when we obey."

Well, the velvet glove strategy outlined in that couplet would not work for the charm school dropouts who comprise contemporary American womanhood. But when Abigail says it was within women's power to subdue their Masters…well, just look around you. John Adams wouldn't recognize the joint.

Perhaps we can take heart in one of John Adams's quotations, uttered during the Boston Massacre trial:

> Facts are stubborn things; and whatever may be our wishes, our inclinations, or the dictates of our passions, they cannot alter the state of facts and evidence.

Granted, that sort of attitude goes against the wishy-washy, when-you-wish-upon-a-star mentality of today, but Adams was a based dude. In modern parlance Adams is saying,

“It is what it is.”

“Except when it isn’t!” is the postmodern riposte.

Or is the postmodern period over? I’m usually one era behind the times.

Lessons to Learn from The Folly of Herod Antipas

February 28, 2023 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

Verses 3 to 11 of Chapter 14 of the Gospel of Matthew contain one of the accounts of the beheading of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee at the time, a story from which red pill men can learn some important lessons where it concerns what their own consciences tell them about the whims of manipulative women. Before we begin this analysis, a quick review of this story is in order.

The head of John the Baptist

Herod Antipas – one of the sons of Herod the Great, who tried but failed to kill Jesus Christ in Chapter 2 – has John the Baptist imprisoned, "for Herodias' sake;" (14:3) John had insisted that it was, "not lawful," (14:4) for Antipas to have married Herodias, because Antipas had divorced his first wife to do this and because Herodias had done the same with her first husband, Herod II. Herod II – also called Herod Philip I – is also the half-brother of Antipas (same father, different mother).

On one of Antipas' birthdays, Salome – the biological daughter of Herodias and Herod II, and thus the stepdaughter of Antipas – "danced before them, and pleased Herod," (14:6) to the point where Antipas, "promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask." (14:7) Unfortunately for Antipas, Salome – at the instruction of her mother – demands, "John Baptist's head in a charger," (14:8) and the reluctant Antipas ultimately gives her want she wants and has John beheaded in prison.

Herodias and Salome

Biblical commentator Albert Barnes notes the significance of Antipas feeling, "sorry," (14:9) at the prospect of killing John, arguing that there are three likely reasons for this. Antipas felt a great respect for John – considering him, "a just man and an holy," as recorded in Mark 6:20 – he, "feared the multitude," who, "counted him as a prophet," (14:5) and Antipas had the sense that beheading John was, as Barnes argues, "so manifestly wicked," as to make Antipas' conscience object to the request. Barnes also contends that Antipas can see the shallowness of this request, which is made solely to, "gratify the malice of a wicked woman," referring to Herodias' hatred of John for his criticism of her marriage to Antipas.

Antipas has the power to deny Salome's request and preserve the life of John, but he beheads John both because of the oath he swore to give Salome whatever she wanted (made before he knew what exactly she wanted) and because of, "them which sat with him at meat." (14:9) Barnes argues that this is essentially a description of Antipas succumbing to peer pressure and being, "afraid of the charge of cowardice and want of spirit;" he gave Salome what she wanted and failed to have the courage to obey his conscience.

It is also worth noting the style of Salome's dance, dubbed the Dance of the Seven Veils; Barnes argues (as do cinematic depictions of the dance in 1953 and 1961) that this was a, “lascivious and wanton,” act performed by a, “dissolute,” girl, and the fact that Salome was Antipas’ stepdaughter adds an incestuous element to the dance. One arguably does not even need to hold the conservative views on sexuality that Barnes does to see the disturbing nature of this performance by Salome.

It is ultimately Antipas’ folly and personal cowardice – that is, cowardice in being reluctant to do that which he personally knows to be right – that leads to the death of John the Baptist, who arguably acts as a symbol for Antipas’ conscience. The first two verses of Chapter 14 recount Antipas’ belief that – after hearing of, “the fame of Jesus,” (14:1) fame which grew due to Christ’s performance of miracles for the people – John has somehow, “risen from the dead.” (14:2)

Barnes argues that Antipas mistook Christ for John because of his guilty conscience; Antipas knew that executing John was wrong from the beginning, and later feared that John had somehow miraculously returned, as Antipas’ conscience would never let him forget his fatal failure to do what needed to be done when it needed to be done. Antipas still bears ultimate responsibility for John’s execution, but even Jordan Peterson would argue that the provocative and likely neotenic Salome was, “deeply complicit,” in contributing to this mistake.

Knowing when you’re being manipulated

Red pill men recognise that their biology – by itself – will not serve them well when it comes to interacting with women, and Antipas was negligent to ignore the incestuous and thus highly questionable nature of Salome’s dance. Like the average blue pill man, he swore an oath to give a woman whose character he knew little to nothing about whatever she wanted purely because she visually, “pleased,” (14:6) him.

Hence the second point made by Paul Elam in his video ‘Six Subtle Gateways To Borderline Hell‘, in which he argues that if a woman becomes highly sexual with you early on in the relationship, this is a sign that she is weaponizing her sexuality to your detriment. Salome’s sexual manipulation is like that of the Greek goddess Hera – as discussed previously on this website by Peter Wright – in that it serves a purely selfish end; this is made even more unsettling by the collusion of her mother Herodias, who would have presumably been quite satisfied with the sight of John’s head after Salome, “brought it to her mother.” (14:11)

To reiterate, sexual manipulation is one of the easiest ways that a woman can get a man of her choosing to do whatever she likes, given how visual men are when it comes to sexual selection. It is this kind of manipulation that red pill men must be able to perceive for what it is – especially when it is coming from women about whom we know very little, or nothing at all – and they must value what their conscience tells them over what their hormones tell them when dealing with a Salome in their own lives.

We have to talk about “male violence.” | An HBR production

March 1, 2023 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

During the media coverage of the very public defamation suit between Johnny Depp and Amber Heard over her allegations of domestic violence, men’s advocates watched many people wake up to the fact that the subject is not a set of neat and tidy narratives, tied up in a little dogma, polarized and unchanging for the public to view as a single problem, whose solution entails a single approach. We saw Depp supporters discuss the case in terms we’ve been explaining for years, many for decades… and Heard supporters respond with allegations of misogyny that did nothing at all to silence them. It looked like maybe, just maybe, public perception of the issue was advancing to recognize the wider spectrum of problems surrounding it.

Maybe it has, but the phenomenon is definitely not universal. When the writers of the piece I am critiquing today created it, I’m sure they thought it was profound, and brilliant. They had no idea it was just evidence of a sickness from which our society still has a long road to recovery.

Feminists have a lot to say about “male violence.” They’ve written thousands of articles and hundreds books about it, created whole genres of carefully gatekept research and academic study around it, done speaking tours on the topic, held massive protests, lobbied congress, and even developed educational initiatives to grift over it. They discuss it from on high in their lofty academic buzzard’s nests as the evil root of all gender issues, from directly related topics like intimate partner and sexual violence, to barely related ideas like gender imbalances in prestigious jobs, which they angrily accuse men of gatekeeping by creating hostile and intimidating work environments that somehow only affect women. Look at those poor, helpless, maligned and abused totally equal and not at all inferior women who are kept from reaching their full potential by you big beefy brutes whose ability to dominate surely comes from no form of superiority at all!

This is clearly a big deal to women in general, though nonfeminist women’s attitudes and beliefs regarding male violence are more subtly expressed than those of the cult. They don’t stand on street corners shouting about it, but if you ask around, most women will tell you that violence is a male behavior, and they’ll use the same terminology as feminists. Most will refer to it as toxic, scary, and evil. They will even go so far as to condemn rough-and-tumble play among boys as such, without differentiating between that, and aggressive conflict involving malice. Many, if not most, don’t understand men’s experience of violence as an ever-present factor to which one must remain alert, and which one must be consistently prepared to avoid or, if unavoidable, to confront. Ask them and they will tell you they fear it. They hate it. They’re offended by it. They don’t understand why you don't just stop it. They'll discuss it as if it is an alien concept to women, as if women never engage in it themselves, and most certainly never initiate it. Violence, women will tell you, is why everything wrong in the world is your fault as men. If women ran everything, it wouldn't be like that.

They will denounce so-called "male violence" to the ends of the earth… with one of their two faces.

What about women's other face?

She waits in the truck.

Wait in the Truck is a new country & western song with a video that was dropped on Youtube about 5 months ago by musical artist Hardy, featuring Lainey Wilson, with lyrics written by a team; Hardy, Hunter Phelps, Jordan Schmidt, and Renee Blair. The song tells the story of man who, while driving his truck in a storm, encounters a woman on the road whose injuries indicate that she has been beaten.

Does he drive the injured woman to a hospital?
No.

Does he take her to a police station to report the assault he assumes she has experienced?
No.

Does he take her to a battered women's shelter so she can start the process of extracting herself from what viewers are apparently supposed to conclude from this scant information is an abusive relationship?

Nope.

He asks where to find the person who hurt her, then drives to her alleged assailant's home. Telling the complete rando he just picked up to wait in the truck, he gets out with a gun, then goes and knocks on the door of the man she has accused. When there's no answer, he significantly escalates the violence by kicking the door in, attacking his target, and ultimately, murdering him. In the video, there's barely a moment of wrestling; the protagonist throws the unknown man, stereotypically dressed in the kind of white tank-top colloquially known as a wife-beater, to the floor, and unceremoniously executes him with a shot to the back of the head.

This vigilante attack on an accused man in response to the tears of a complete stranger is celebrated in the song as "justice," and "worth it," despite the fact that it lands the vigilante himself in prison.

Apparently, youtube does not consider this depiction, which clearly glorifies vigilante violence, to be promotion of violence. But what do people think of it? The women commenting were enchanted. Some actually thanked the artist for the portrayal, which resonated with them. Completely forgetting that since the mid-20th century, women's organizations have operated a network of publicly-funded agencies and institutions designed to provide women with nonviolent assistance under such circumstances, they praised the narrative as someone "finally getting it." Despite frequent campaigns by women's groups publicly condemning male violence, the conversation ranged from normalizing this instance of it to outright lauding it as honorable.

Did anyone give it a more thoughtful analysis?

Yes, but it was only marginally better.

In a video titled, "FIRST TIME LISTEN: 'Wait In The Truck' Controversy EXPLAINED," Michael Knowles first admitted that he does not listen to much modern country, which he characterized as a "sappy, saccharine, sentimental kind of music." He contrasted this song to the usual country fare by labeling it "the highest form of folk music and country music telling." He went on to compare it to the Homeric tradition, or ancient troubadour ballads, and described it as raising a moral question, because the protagonist doesn't run from the cops. The moral question he thinks it raises?

Is vigilantism acceptable?

Wait, what? The writers described a scenario in which the violence was over, but then had their protagonist take the stupidest and most unnecessarily violent action he could have chosen under the circumstances. This promotes not just vigilantism, but frivolous vigilantism, and a male obligation to engage in frivolous vigilantism on women's behalf. The vigilante in the story is not correcting a systemic failure, nor engaging in urgent defense in the heat of a moment. The story uses the emotional appeal of a woman's tears to suggest that her suffering in and of itself somehow excuses the expectation that a man will commit a completely pointless violent act that would otherwise be inexcusable, where other actions would bring better results.

What kind of message does this send? Violence is always bad, except when a sobbing damsel yanks your heartstrings around like a wretched marionettist?

You know what else that promotes? Exploitation!

Women rarely think about what violence entails for a man. They certainly don't recognize that it is a form of labor. Yes, just calling it labor over-simplifies it to a degree, but not much. It's a use of your body, your physical strength, physical endurance, exertion of emotional energy and the experience of psychological stress, and strain on your tolerance for pain and injury. The consequences make it high risk, obviously, with considerations including injury to the laborer, injury to the target, emotional, psychological, and reputational damage to both, potential retaliation or escalation, and penalty imposed by the state for inappropriate use.

It rarely, if ever, occurs to women that engaging in violence puts men at risk of facing violence, forces upon you the memory of violence, and exposes you to high cost, from injury to fines and job loss, to total loss of your freedom, and in extreme cases, your life. The protagonist in this story took another man's life, and lost his freedom for quite possibly the rest of his. What did his sacrifice gain him, or even the woman on whose behalf he made it, that could not have been gained through less extreme action? And why is he obligated to do anything at all?

I'm not going to promote the feminist canard of total equality. It wouldn't be prudent even if I believed it, since many women's advocates conveniently forget it when discussing the topic of partner violence, for reasons both valid and dishonest. Women are not physically equal to men. You are, on average, bigger, stronger, faster, tougher, and smarter, especially when it comes to exerting physical force. Denying this is stupid and useless. It would be to everyone's benefit if women and women's advocates would stop doing that.

That's not to say we can't do harm, or handle ourselves. We have our own capacity for violence, and for defensive response to violence. I've talked about mine more than a few times on the HBR Talk and HBR News livestreams. I've even pointed out how fighting was so normalized among girls where I grew up that I actually once avoided further conflict in a fight with girls from another community because my friend told them where I came from, and they all ran away. What I learned from growing up in that environment is that yes, I fear violence, and I hate it. I hate my memories of being targeted with it, and even more, my memories of dishing it out, or of being the reason one of my male loved ones felt compelled to risk it or dish it out. I have nightmares about ways that can go and has gone horribly wrong, and because women can handle ourselves, I've taken lessons from it.

1) Don't borrow trouble.
2) Don't expect a man to pay off your borrowed trouble debt.
3) If one does, be grateful, not entitled, and use the experience to strengthen lesson 1.

I've learned to recognize that right or wrong, in general, men protect the women around them. Right or wrong, that means a woman's risk generally constitutes a risk to the men around her. It's not a phenomenon I can just make not happen by denying that men owe me that, though that denial is technically correct. That perceived debt is not entirely natural, either. Yes, there's some instinct. Men are naturally protective of their loved ones, for instance, but more powerful than that, is the history of cultural and family traditions and norms, morality, and deeply compelling social pressures that fuels this particular gynocentric form of chivalry. Men are socially programmed to view an obligation to accommodate and protect women as part of their gender identity.

Knowing that, I view it as my social obligation to not borrow trouble, because I'm not just borrowing on my dime. I've made that mistake and seen men I'd never even met before put themselves at risk of paying off that debt with their bodies, even their lives, to cover for my thoughtlessness.

I've come to understand that my self-defense awareness, even though it is heightened for a woman, is egregiously out of shape, because of how much risk I'm generally exempt from as a feature of my sex, and an unconscious appropriation from yours. For his own protection, a man should know that many, if not most of the ways in which he protects the women around him are invisible to those women, and that's why we seem so careless. A woman ought to know that when she borrows trouble, she is pulling levers and strings that are attached to men's hearts, their souls, and their safety, and she should not knowingly and willfully abuse that phenomenon.

Men must be aware – many women do know that, and they do willfully abuse it. Some just don't care, but many get an ego boost from it. This is why some women stir shit and then sit back and watch while the men they influence go to war with each other, so they can gloat as the effects of their feminine potency unfold. They do it to feel attractive, important, cherished… powerful. This is many women's fantasy, regular fare in the kinds of stories written to tantalize and titillate in the genres of light romance and women's erotica. To many, it is intoxicating and fantastic that a man will deem their regard more important than his own welfare. It doesn't occur to them to reciprocate with anything even close to that level of consideration and dedication, even if he is a friend, family member, or partner, but it especially doesn't if he is a stranger. Far too many just eat that shit right up, like false gods commandeering human sacrifices to feed their narcissism, and their gynocentric cult. Women have even forgotten how to have their husbands' backs.

Waiting in the truck should be devastatingly painful. Women should be invested enough in the welfare of our fellow human beings to want to avoid manipulating anyone into conflict on our behalf, especially knowing the harm that can come from it. The idea that a man might be hurt, suffer loss, or die because one of us took an action or created a circumstance that made him feel obligated to take unplanned risks should cause enough dismay to urge us to greater mindfulness. It should compel us to steer clear of that situation. We should feel charged to watch out for ourselves, because we know we can… before we set you up to feel like you have to, because we know we can.

Maybe we don't have the same capacity as a bigger, stronger man to fight off a criminal assailant. Well, men take measures to avoid becoming targets. They maintain an awareness of their environment and do their best to mitigate their risks. Because men love women, they have built entire systems to do that for us; not just law enforcement and shelter systems, but our cultural norms, even the very design of our living environment. Forget whether vigilantism is immoral. Isn't it immoral for a woman to reject those systems and then wantonly exploit a man's capacity for violence in their stead?

Just as stupid is the way women's advocates have simultaneously ignored, condemned, and exploited this phenomenon. They have demanded that men "leave women alone," proclaimed men's noble sacrifice to be stifling, restrictive, and intrusive to women, and declared women fully independent, a luxury they forget is facilitated by a full spectrum of masculinity-fueled conditions that operate well beneath women's notice. "Toxic masculinity!" they cry, shaming your faithful guardianship as oppressive sexism… yet when any story or video of an unaided damsel in distress goes viral on social media, do they celebrate her independence? Maybe castigate her incompetence, if she fails to overcome her adverse experience?
Nope.
They fill the comments with variations on the lament, "WHY HASN'T THIS WOMAN BEEN RESCUED? WHERE ARE ALL THE MEN?"
Ladies, you told them all to fuck off. Why are you even asking that question?

If men want women to be adults who you can trust enough to be able to love, you would be well advised to exercise tough love. Chivalry is not a natural debt that you simply owe us because of differences between the sexes. It is a generous benefaction that, through a system of men's repetition, positive social reinforcement, women's escalating fetish for it, and cultural evolution around it, has become a social imperative. That's not an ethical or moral debt, but an artificial constraint upon your choices based on an understanding that can no longer even convincingly pretend to be valid.

Most women have forgotten their end of the deal you're upholding when you protect us; that your vigilance and care at your peril makes women the stewards of a significant chunk of peace and goodwill between men. We are failing to uphold our social obligation when we abandon conscientious personal discretion to make men's jeopardy, rivalry, and culpability the material of our primary safety net.

This malfeasance gets men killed. It is not at all unreasonable for men to object to women's dereliction of our duty to avoid doing that. In fact, such heartless exploitation of men's altruism – an altruism our society treats as compulsory – should earn stigma and blame, not the social elevation it seems to elicit today.

All things considered, yes… violence is definitely labor, and engaging in it is extremely hazardous work. It's as much of a demand on you as any dangerous profession that uses hazard pay to incentivize workers to accept it as their job, such as police work, repairing power lines, or driving especially large vehicles with difficult maneuverability and complicated controls. When told you owe anyone the use of your capacity for violence, you have every right to say no, shout no, sing it from the rooftops, and follow it up with a resounding "and fuck you for suggesting as much."

Any demand that you engage in violence on another's behalf or at another's behest is a pretty damned big ask. Why should women feel entitled to exploit men's violence as a free and widely available resource, especially when they don't even feel obligated carefully steward it in order to avoid abusing the men they're expecting to provide it? Women are actively encouraged to maintain that sense of entitlement, and this is not something we can just blame on feminists. Parents teach their children this narrative, and it is enforced through media like this song, coming from many different political and apolitical outlooks. It's portrayed as romantic for a man to sacrifice his peace and his safety to avenge a woman's honor after another man has offended her sensibilities, comedic or just when the offending man is injured or killed, and unfortunate but unavoidable collateral damage when the sacrificial vigilante also experiences consequences for his actions.

The moral question this video raises is not whether vigilante violence is acceptable behavior. Knowles got that wrong, just as he got it wrong when he stated that this man exchanged prisons with the woman he supposedly rescued. What prison held her? She was outside, away from her alleged assailant, who, according to the video, wasn't even pursuing her. She got into the protagonist's truck when asked. He could have driven her anywhere besides back where she came from. A mindful steward of peace and goodwill among men, when accepting his kind assistance, would have asked wiser things of him, rather than allow him to exchange his freedom for… what? Her emotional labor? Suffering she had experience, but no longer need endure? That's not a rescue or an exchange. That's revenge. Why the hell are we romanticizing that?

So what is the real moral question?
How about this: Are men human enough for their communities to care more about them than to treat them as a free source of proxy violence that women can fire at other men, like living cannons?
Talk about objectification! Are women adult enough to care? Can they give an honest answer to this question? How many will admit they exploit men's compassion for women as the fuse on a weapon against their chosen targets? How many would instead come up with 1000 excuses for why expecting this from men is somehow not abuse… not slavery?

With one face, femininity calls you toxic because your capacity for violence involves greater preparedness, competence, capability, prowess, and fortitude than women's similar capacity. Shame on you if you think you need to be big and strong, fast, tough, or otherwise prepared to handle yourself well when confronted with any danger. How dare you exist as part of a gender demographic that includes people whose use of violence in a careless or malicious way gets noticed? As a member of club "everyman," you are completely at fault and it's your responsibility to make it all stop! Most of all, shame on you for thinking you have to be better at it than women. After all, you've been told that expecting women to need your protection means you are infected with isms and phobias. Who are you trying to impress?

The other face, femininity can't even keep straight. While irrationally claiming to be totally independent of you and castigating you for caring, she demands your exercise of violence at the drop of an insult, as a sign of your fealty to Her Majesty, Queen Femininity of Humankind… and shame on you if you're not prepared to be better at it than women, so you can protect them from other men, even when there are other means of managing their risk.

"Worry not, fair maiden! I have witnessed the overflow of thy tear ducts, thy lamentation of thy dire experience with some guy! I shall go and destroy that guy, along with my own entire future, to avenge thy shedding of a bit of saline across thy conjunctiva, so that never again shall the fluids of thine eyes spill over, and thy mascara be smeared in this other dude's name!"

Like I've said, far too many women eat that shit right up.

The same women's advocates who tell you that a woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle, also run social campaigns with titles like "Don't Be That Guy," suggesting that it's every "good" man's responsibility to become an impromptu bodyguard any time a woman might be in danger, or even if she might be insulted or inconvenienced. You're told women don't need you, but it's your job as a man to step in and correct the choices of men who do things women's advocates consider inappropriate, like speaking to women in public places, because god forbid women should handle their own personal boundary enforcement. Princess Butthurt is just fine on her own, no thank you very much, but why should she have to tell the guy she's been batting her eyelashes at that she's not interested in any real interaction, when she can rely on one of you filthy plebs to do her dirty work for her? Why should she use the extensive, powerful system that women's advocates have spent over 50 years lobbying into place so she can escape an abusive relationship, when she can just sacrifice one man's life and another man's future, and walk away from the wreckage of their existence like it never even mattered?

The same screeching harpies who tell you that women are not a monolith and women who support women's lobbying organizations are not responsible for the outcomes you face from anti-father and anti-due process laws they've informed, demand that you take responsibility for other men's behavior, and all women's welfare, and you exert yourself using violence that will cost you your safety, security, and freedom, to pay for their safety, security, and freedom. They expect you to be ready to bleed for them on command, regardless of your interest in the matter or your relationship to the woman, or whether she even asked. According to these sniveling harridans, you're an evil patriarch directly involved in the oppression of women if you don't. And don't worry. Your sacrifice will go completely unappreciated. If she doesn't outright condemn you for usurping her female independence, the woman you give up everything for might say thank you. Even then, she'll demonstrate no more gratitude toward you than she has for any of the steps she skips down on her way out of the courtroom where you're condemned for solving her problem.

Knowles formulated his answer to the vigilante question on the idea that it's civil authority which has the right to engage in violent correction of criminal behavior, not individual men. This is another shortfall in his logic. Vigilantism isn't wrong because civil authority is higher than individual authority. It's wrong because the civil system exists as a collective attempt at ensuring fairness in conflict resolution between individuals in a civilized society. Vigilantism bypasses the rest of a team created to avoid emotion-driven mistakes and limit conflict-driven injury and death.

We use law enforcement and court systems to de-personalize and standardize the community response to crime and other conflict so that knee-jerk-reactions like the one portrayed in the video won't lead to wrongful action taken against accused or accuser. We use a civil system so that societal exploitation of the human capacity for violence can be reduced to a smaller subset of community members who volunteer to make that part of their jobs, and who are compensated for taking on that responsibility, so the rest of the community may be exempt from it. There are cops, prosecutors, and judges specifically so that you don't have to do their jobs unless you choose to become one of them. Vigilantism is the wrong answer because it is a thoughtless reaction to circumstances that require analysis and prudence in order to determine what actions would be ethical and effective… and because it is not your job and you shouldn't have to engage in it. Does our society have the capacity to care enough about men to recognize that?

What if the song ended with a courtroom revelation that, as with about ⅔ or more of domestic violence in heterosexual relationships, the beating went both ways? What if, as research has found to be the most common scenario, she hit him first? What if she cornered him, berating him, haranguing him, slapping and punching him until she wore out his control over his fight or flight reaction and then ran out into the rain when his self-defense was too unrestrained for her to handle.

What if her injuries were caused by his defense of their child from her violence?
What if our sacrificial vigilante had kicked down that door, only to discover "that guy" was the sobbing damsel's wife?

These are things that happen in real domestic violence cases, but it can get even worse than that.What if the song ended with the court revealing that the man Hardy shot was just plain falsely accused? The video showed little confrontation. We hear the shooter's narrative. We hear the accuser's narrative. We hear nothing from the accused. How would the character portrayed in the video know that the accused man did what was only described to him by a random woman he found walking in the road during a storm? What if she pulled a mini Gone Girl scenario, and this was the result?

What would be your moral question then?

How about the question of women's sin of two faces: One scoffing in blanket condemnation, as she deems violence a frivolous, sexist, male-only vice and a male-only taboo, the other sneering with duper's delight as she demands it as a male-only debt; that men must violently sacrifice themselves and each other on the alter of women's tears?

Can we ever become civilized enough to confront that question?

Hera, Ancient Greek goddess of…. feminism?

March 1, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The Greek goddess Hera was the patroness of marriage, status, and social power, and as I hope to demonstrate here, a goddess appropriate to feminism too. By analyzing the character of a goddess we follow the late psychologist James Hillman's suggestion that "Mythology is psychology in ancient dress," – ie. it gives us insight into human nature, and more specifically into the nature of feminism.

No other goddess in the Greek pantheon comes close to capturing the activities we associate with feminism – not the warlike independence of the Amazons, not the esteemed motherhood of Demeter, and not the allure of Aphrodite. These are merely peripheral topics taken up by a feminism that is concerned with securing multiple varieties of power, and Hera is the goddess I'm going to finger for that role.

Marriage

Hera was first and foremost a goddess of marriage, or rather the goddess of marriage. Under her sign marriage tamed men to great advantage of the Greek State – and the State in turn extended honors to her cult. In parts of Greece men could not be recognized as citizens until the day of their marriage, thus enticing men to marry and providing a means for Greek cities to continue reproducing the citizen-estate – not to mention securing a ready supply of laborers, taxes and military personnel to boot. James Hillman writes,

> Marriage belongs to the state; it belongs to society, to the community. Zeus and Hera are social stability; they are the state in a way, so we can be married by a Justice of the Peace at City Hall, because marriage is also secular. We recognize that by having both church weddings and legal weddings. Our tax code, our inheritance laws acknowledge that a fundamental structure of the organization of society is marriage. Therefore some can claim it has nothing in particular to do with the persons who are engaged; it hasn't anything to do with God; it hasn't anything to do with symbolic representations. It is a fundamental structure of society belonging to the polis or the city or the community.[1]

While the marriage of Hera and Zeus is mythological, life in this instance had a way of imitating art. In the marriage month (Gamelion) the mythical marriage of Hera and Zeus was reenacted and celebrated with public festivities, a time when many couples would get married in imitation of the divine couple. On these occasions prayers and offerings were given to Hera, and the bride would pledge fidelity to extending Hera's dominion on earth. One can only surmise that the riches, status, and influence of the divine couple became a model to which each couple would hope to aspire.

Another facet of Hera's cult was the focus on buildings, and her temples were usually the biggest and most lavish in all Greece. Women would carve small houses, or make them out of clay and give as offerings to the Goddess. Remarking on this practice, Hillman states that our modern obsession with houses and real estate, one of the bedrocks of our economy, may also arise from a Hera-like sentiment;

> If you think back to all the times you play house as a child, or had a dollhouse, or made little houses out of cartons and boxes, this is an archetypal move going on. We forget that the house is not just something made by an architect and sold you by a developer… What one does for the house, to the house, with the house, is taking care of Hera. Housekeeping is a Hera activity. Our culture recognizes this. Think of the enormous quantity of house magazines: House and Garden, House Beautiful, Home Decorating, Architectural Digest, World of Interiors, the home section of newspapers, home improvement on TV, supposedly a best-selling TV show or one of the most watched, "This Old House."
> "I know a woman who decorates people's houses. You pick out the furniture and the fabrics – > then she'll lay out the paintings you should have, what repros you should have on the wall, and the bric-a-brac and what colors the walls should be and so on. She told me that in every one of the cases that she works with (of married couples), the woman picks out everything in the house and the entire house belongs to her except for the husband's desk and his playroom and maybe the garage. He has his little area and the rest of the house is hers. He makes no decisions about what color the upholstery should be or the kinds of window shades.
> "Often when you go to people's houses the wife shows off the house while the husbands talk shop. "Come, let me show you my house; I want to show you the house." She's showing a part of her Hera nature.
> "There are these old sayings (whether you go with the gender of them or not): a woman likes a man who can do things around the house, and she hates it that she always has to pick up after him and he leaves things in a mess. By desecrating the house that way, he insults Hera. And a man likes a woman who's a good housekeeper. These are Hera statements. Another one: She loves the house more than me. And the jokes: A man is making love to a whore and she says, "You're the greatest;" and when he's making love to his mistress, she says, "I love you so much." But when he's making love to his wife, she says: "I wonder what color we should paint the ceiling." Now, that is a nasty gender joke, but it isn't! She really loves the house. That's crucial and shouldn't be treated as just a kind of obsession. Her obsession with the house equals his obsession with sex.[1]

In a telling newspaper cartoon some years ago, two women were conversing. The first said she was getting a divorce, to which her friend replied it must be an awful thing to go through. "Not really" the woman replied, "it's actually a dream come true; I get the house, the furniture, the artworks and the kids. I've been planning this divorce since I was a little girl!" In this cruel cartoon we get a sense that the husband was merely a backdrop to securing the larger vision of a house, renovations, furnishings and the children. But especially the house.

Taming Men

Hera was nicknamed 'The Tamer.' She tamed horses, men and heroes and in some places was recognized as the tamer of the seasons, of nature, and even the universe itself.

Her goal was to limit wildness and freedom by placing all creatures in her service. Her tools-for-taming were the entrapment of men and women in marriage, the use of her own sexuality as an enticement for conformity, shaming, and aggressive punishment of any rebellious behaviours. Even her lordly husband Zeus did not escape her control: "Hera's cruel rage tamed him."[2]

Hera was worshipped as 'Goddess of the yoke,' an enslaving device symbolizing her desire to create utilities of beasts and men. She yoked obedient men to wives, and yoked heroes to an inevitable death through their performance of labours that bring betterment to women and society.

In the Iliad Hera is said to tame heroes through death, not marriage. Death through service to others was considered -and is still considered- something appropriate for males and for their own good. In The Myth of Male Power Warren Farrell recounts a Greek story which illustrates the fact:

> The Hero As Slave:
> Once upon a time, a mother who wanted to see the beautiful statue of Hera had no oxes or horses to carry her there. But she did have two sons. And the sons wanted more than anything to make their mother's wish come true. They volunteered to yoke themselves to a cart and take her over the mountains in the scorching heat to the faraway village of Argos, the home of the statue of Hera (the wife of Zeus). Upon their arrival in Argos, the sons were cheered and statues (that can be found to this day) were built in their honor. Their mother prayed that Hera give her sons the best gift in her power. Hera did that. The boys died. The traditional interpretation? The best thing that can happen to a man is to die at the height of his glory and power. Yet had this been a myth of two daughters who had substituted themselves for oxen to carry their father somewhere, would we > have interpreted the daughters' deaths as proof that the best thing that can happen to a woman is to die at the height of her glory and power? The statues and cheers can be seen as bribes for the sons to value their lives less than their mother's request to view a statue. The fact that the statue was of Hera, the queen of the Olympian gods and protector of married women is symbolic. The sons' sacrifice symbolized the mandate for men to become strong enough to serve the needs of mothers and marriage, and to be willing to call it glory if they died in the process. Which is why the name Hercules means "for the glory of Hera".[3]

Sexual manipulation was another of Hera's strategems to gain what she wanted. In one popular tale, for instance, she asked if she could borrow Aphrodite's magic girdle to help her woo the King of the gods. By borrowing Aphrodite's natural charms (the girdle) Hera imitated the goddess of love and sex and thereby seduced Zeus. As we read in Homer's Iliad, the magical girdle of Aphrodite had the power to create subservience in the target;

> Hera was divided in purpose as to how she could beguile the brain in Zeus of the aigis. And to her mind this thing appeared to be the best counsel, to array herself in loveliness, and go down to Ida, and perhaps he might be taken with desire to lie in love with her next her skin, and she might be able to drift an innocent warm sleep across his eyelids, and seal his crafty perceptions…
> Now, when she had clothed her body in all this loveliness, she went out from the chamber, and called aside Aphrodite to come away from the rest of the gods, and spoke a word to her: 'Would you do something for me, dear child… Give me loveliness and desirability, graces with which you overwhelm mortal men, and all the immortals…

> Then in turn Aphrodite the laughing (philomeides) answered her: 'I cannot, and I must not deny this thing that you ask for, you, who lies in the arms of Zeus, since he is our greatest.' She spoke, and from her breasts unbound the elaborate, pattern-pierced zone (himas), and on it are figured all beguilement (philotes), and loveliness is figured upon it, and passion of sex (himeros) is there, and the whispered endearment (oaristos) that steals the heart away even from the thoughtful. She put this in Hera's hands, and called her by name and spoke to her: 'Take this zone, and hide it away in the fold of your bosom. It is elaborate, all things are figured therein. And I think whatever is your heart's desire shall not go unaccomplished.' So she spoke, and the ox-eyed lady Hera smiled on her and smiling hid the zone away in the fold of her bosom.[4]

Hera employed sexual manipulativeness as an artifice to purchase the power and influence she so desperately craved. Today we would call this behavior "Love bombing," which has the ability to tame a man to schemes he might otherwise have never dreamed of following.

Binding Hera's rage

When Hera didn't get her desired measure of power, when her status didn't reach high enough, or worse, when she lost status or power, things went very badly for the world around her. Epithets of spitefulness, jealousy, vengefulness, vindictiveness, cruelty and rage belong to the scorned goddess, and from a reading of the myths it seems she felt scorned much of the time.

We turn for example to the priestess Medea who murdered her children as revenge against her husband's transgressions. Her husband, Jason of Argonauts fame, decided to leave her after the marriage went stale. He found a new bride and Medea devised to make them suffer for their happiness. Much like the goddess Hera to whom Medea was priestess, she carried out a scorched-earth policy in the face of frustrated power urges, saying;

> Sorry, kids, but your dad's a douche

> I will send them with gifts in their hands, carrying them unto the bride a robe of finest woof and a chaplet of gold. And if these ornaments she take and put them on, miserably shall she die, and likewise everyone who touches her; with such fell poisons will I smear my gifts. And here I quit this theme; but I shudder at the deed I must do next; for I will slay the children I have borne… and when I have utterly confounded Jason's house I will leave the land, escaping punishment for my dear children's murder, after my most unholy deed… so help me God, Never shall he see again alive the children I bore to him, nor from his new bride shall he beget issue, for she must die a hideous death, slain by my drugs. Let no one deem me a poor weak woman who sits with folded hands, but of another mould, dangerous to foes and well-disposed to friends.[5]

After killing Jason's bride with a poison-smeared robe, murdering her own children, and then setting fire to the palace, Medea fled to Athens where she married the mighty King Aegeus, thereby securing a place of notoriety in the mythological scheme of Greece.

Mythologist Karl Kerenyi asks, "What should we make of it that Medea, a barbaric representative of the Hera world, and her gloomy cult, found acceptance in the sacred precinct of Zeus' spouse?"[6] Kerenyi was struck by the fact that Hera remained associated with Medea's barbarism and surrounded her with the sanctity of her own world. Our thoughts on this question might extend to a similar comparison of moderate feminism and how it remains associated with radical feminism's relational and cultural terrorism.

The Greeks understood better than we moderns, however, that impulses of the psychopathic mind needed to be restrained by a civil society.

To that end the Greeks developed a religious ritual that involved winding a rope tightly around a statue or effigy of the Goddess Hera, particularly during what they imagined to be her 'unfulfilled' moments. That hog-tying symbolized containment of destructive energies resulting from loss of status or power. Participants understood the binding was of the proverbial 'woman scorned,' a ritual teaching how to deal with such behavior in the lives of mortals.

In contrast to her fulfilled behavior within marriage, when the Queen of Heaven lost her marital station and status, she would tear the social fabric into black confetti. Hera then became monstrous or in some stories started giving birth to monstrous creatures who did her bidding. Jungian psychologist Murray Stein talks to this monstrous side of the goddess;

> This compounding of evil upon evil is an image of Hera in her Iuno inferna aspect and energized by a full-blown animus rage and destruction, running amuck through the world, devouring whomever she can lay her hands on. Hera is in this development a veritable epidemic of pathology.
> The ancient cults of Hera showed great foresight and wisdom in "binding" her image during the dangerous periods of her cycle. This was prophylactic against the potentiation of the she-dragon. But what could they have done to prevent > this potentiation in the face of the Typhaonian spirit energizing it? Hera's reaction to her experience with Zeus bursts all fetters, for without a full experience of the Teleia [fulfillment] aspect of the cycle the bindings on the infernal aspect of it cannot possibly hold. Thus we find in the Homeric and classical image of her a Hera Unbound, whose boundlessness knows no limit to destruction. The rhythm inherent in the archetype has been disturbed, and we get a sort of symphony whose rhythm is one long downbeat. The restoration of Hera Teleia is an individual and cultural historical project that is still being worked on in our time.[7]

Feminism

The comparisons of Hera and Medea with feminism are unmistakable. The male shaming, intimidation, manipulation, and power-seeking are all there – as are the destructiveness and scorched-earth policy accompanying frustrated goals.

It's no surprise that a Google search for Hera + feminist returns over 80,000 results, and Medea + feminist over 100,000, and the number of feminist orgs, initiatives and editorials paints its own picture; The Hera Women's Cancer Foundation; Hera Entrepreneurs Against Trafficking; Hera Hub: female-focused co working space and entrepreneurship; The Hera Herald; Hera Society; Hera Health, Empowerment and Rights for Women; Hera Communications: Empowerment, Enrichment, Enlightenment; Women's Club Hera (etc.).

Along with Hera, Medea is universally recognized as a feminist heroine. As an example of feminist websites promoting her we read, "There is, however, one other role that we twenty-first-century audiences are able to recognize in Medea: that of the feminist pioneer. And the fact that this precursor of the suffragettes is a mythic character dramatized nearly 2,500 years ago by a man is quite astonishing."[8]

The Wikipedia entry for Medea reads, "Medea is widely read as a proto-feminist text to the extent that it sympathetically explores the disadvantages of being a woman in a patriarchal society," – to which characterization is implied (by feminists) that we dare not read her as anything but a hapless victim, as one Jungian analyst Cheryl Fuller was to discover.

Fuller, a feminist, gives a revealing account of what happened when she attempted to shine a light on the dark side of Medea, and by extension of women. She writes;

> Eight years ago as I searched for a dissertation advisor, I ran into a wall with the feminist scholars on the faculty of my university. As soon as I explained that I wanted to write about Medea came the assumption: of course, they said, you will be looking at the patriarchy as the issue in her behavior. And when I replied that indeed I was not going to be looking in that direction, but rather at Medea herself and at the meaning intrinsic to her acts and her story, interest in my work evaporated and they declined to serve on my committee. Though long a feminist myself, I had been absent from developments in academic feminism. It had escaped my attention that there were "right" ways and "wrong" ways to study > women, both real and mythological, and clearly considering Medea as anything other than a victim of the patriarchy was the "wrong" way.

> I persisted, found an advisor who could accept my apparently heretical viewpoint and happily explored the character of Medea and developed a description of a Medea complex. But the resistance to considering that Medea could be anything other than a hapless victim of the patriarchy continued to intrigue me and set me to wondering about the meaning of excluding this dark and troubling aspect of her, and by extension all of us, from our understanding of what it is to be human and more specifically a woman. It is this wondering which is the subject of my paper.[9]

In summary, the traditional binding of Hera has failed and her destructive energies are loosed upon the world – to devastating effect. Her bindings began to unravel in the Middle Ages with the advent of an indiscriminate chivalry that saw men worshiping women as pure and infallable vessels, while failing to recognize and bind their destructive potentials with reasonable forms of social constraint.

While we continue on our current path the scorched earth policy too will continue… compliments of a vengeful, and power-craving Hera.

What is feminism?

March 1, 2023 | by Adam Kostakis | Link | Original Link

There are countless definitions of what 'feminism' is, with feminists themselves pointing to glib dictionary definitions, and antifeminists preferring to define it as a female supremacy movement. A hundred other definitions could easily be offered, but the more important question is what (if anything) do all these different definitions hold in common?

Below, Adam Kostakis answers this question in the affirmative with an elegant definition that most would agree with. – PW

Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common. So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious. That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

The Transwoman Boogeyman: A Social Observation On A Truly Weird Male Behaviour

March 5, 2023 | by Bryan Scandrett | Link | Original Link

Why would red pill men, non-feminist men, support the political power of misandric gynocentrists?

Want to know what's waaaaaaaaaaaaaaay weirder than a man in a dress with coloured hair and lip gloss? Weirder even than a man telling women who apparently don't know what a woman is, what a woman is?

You!

You behaving as a grown arse child, pretending to be an alpha male, believing stories of bogeymen.

> The Bogeyman is a type of mythic creature used by adults to frighten children into good behavior. Bogeymen have no specific appearance and conceptions, vary drastically by household and culture, but they are most commonly depicted as masculine or androgynous monsters that punish children for misbehavior.[Bogeyman]

Why would you support the political power of misandric gynocentrists by doing their bidding and believing AND ACTING on their threat narratives? Why do you denigrate, derogate and demean trans-women?

So called Red Pill men, MRA, MGTOW, et al, white knighting for fat, ugly misandric, segregationist terfs, the worst of the gynocentric cesspool. Antiwoke antifeminists, white knighting in direct support of radical feminism.

The so called deeply religious conservative right, white knighting for the worst of the extremist left wing. And these so called intellectual, talking head content creators are trying to weaponize woke arguments, like cultural appropriation, pretending theirs are the sharpest mind who have the right of it.

Watch Dave Rubin, a supposed founding member of the "intellectual dark web," and his guests, doing exactly that.

Am I losing you yet, ya weirdo?

If you are getting lost then take this test.

If a woman ran for office on a platform of destroying the proposition that trans-women should be treated as women, would you vote for her?

Most of you would. Most of you have. But here's the rub. You're doing exactly the stupidest thing you've always done. You think you're supporting normality and sanity but really you're blind to the 3d chess of politics and are simply supporting feminist political power by believing in their Bogeymen.

You're snatching defeat from the buffet of victory, supplicating to your masters, without cause. You are bending the knee to your enemy as the conquered man you are. You're feeding the same misandric legislators that you've always voted for that got us to the situation we're in.

The same man hating women who gave us the same laws that raped your life, took your assets, allowed the alienation of your children, excused female on male violence, and ignored those family members and friends who suicided.

The same women who left you contemplating the point of your own survival.
A question still to be answered in my view.

You're bending the broken knee to the same fag hags and hand bags who took over the men only Gay Rights Movement back in the early 70's, reducing the GRM to mascots to the feminist cause and who turned it into the rainbow people, GLBT, bringing trannies into the fold, as they were called back in prehistory.

By 74 it was LGBT, with the loud, large land whales in charge. And you have been voting for these male sacrificing misandrists ever since!

Now you insist you don't want to eat a Hershey bar!

You're so weird man.
A sad, sick puppy.

Let me unpack it for you intellectuals.

There's a key difference between following your own reference to normal, which is the correct path in normal circumstances and supports your own identity, and keeping up with the bizarre world of political power struggles in the gender war.

As natural as it may seem to call a man a man and a woman a woman, to do so in this political power struggle is to white knight for the worst of radical feminists.

You are throwing men under the bus.

While standing on a mountain of dead men, KIA, that we intentionally don't count properly.

That supposedly red pilled men don't see what the political implications of their misplaced support has on the suicide tally is the real shocker here. Not to mention the remainder of the blizzard of men's issues.

It's the old chestnut of same and different: Heads they win, tails we lose. Women claim to be equal when they want to shame you for concessions that benefit them, but claim to be different and weaker when they want you to do the heavy lifting for their benefit.

Why would you support the political power of misandric gynocentrists?

For years now the woke mind virus has foisted the idea on us that gender is a social construct and a tool of patriarchal oppression, crushing the two spirit, furry minorities with 72 genders, a result of "… 'me and my vulnerabilities' along with 'me and my demands,' a pathological focus that channels its energy into topics like racial or gender-diversity tribalisms." [The Child Archetype as Responsible for Woke Dystopia]

The usual men bad, women sainted angels, incapable of doing wrong.

Misandric Derangement Syndrome.

Until men started to do that shit too and accessed female privileges via the trans route (See Peter Wright here and here).

Among the plethora of hypocrisies in The Blizzard Gynocentrism, one that attracts no attention what so ever, is that Transmen, female-to-male, are entirely ignored by the sisterhood as they don't bother the privileges of the Loud, Large and Incharge at all.

It's only when men stepped into female territory, on an equal footing, did the sisterhood put her collective foot down and begin screaming misogyny. As she is want to do. It's called Aggrieved Gynocentric Entitlement. Now she's different from men.

To be accurate, terfs have been around since the 70's, as some women recognised the problem of a man flying the signals, flags and pennants of female privilege the very first time they noticed it.

Men identifying as women gives the gynocentric power base a mortal wound. You are protecting them from that wound without any clue of political situational awareness.

And the wound is this.

Either gender is a social construct, or it isn't.
Either gender identity wins or sexual identity does.

Either men and women are equal and anyone can be anyone, or a man identifying as a woman can crack a woman's skull in the ring?

So is it biology or gender?

Truth or lie?

The entire edifice of gynocentric man hatred currently stands upon this gender lie. Either men have rights as humans or we don't. Either women rule and men serve or we are fully legal human being too. Either women have a right to enter the Boy Scouts or the name has a legally significant meaning.

If it's a lie, and women can't have it both ways, then the last seventy years of bullshit needs to be wound back.

At the political level.

This is exactly the question coming before the Australian Supreme Court soon. The hearing is set for April.

Read the girls over at feminist legal doing their mental gymnastics to blame men for the monster they created, circling back to bite them on the arse.

> "In the early days of the Giggle app, Sall was faced with the decision to make the app for women as a sex or women as a gender. After a sustained campaign of abuse and harassment by people calling themselves 'transwomen', Sall decided to make the app exclusively for females, including trans-identifying females or 'transmen'. On Giggle, it would be the possession of female body, regardless of identity, that puts you in the 'in' crowd."

Equality when they want power, speshul treatment when it doesn't serve their power. If it wasn't for double standards, feminists wouldn't have any.

Unfortunately the feminist political activists who legislated the Human Rights and Equal Opportunity Commission (HREOC) into existence, to drag men in front of, for perceived masculinity, has teeth and one raison detre: To stamp out inequality.

Oops! (The author chortles in toxic masculinity.)

The question before the Supreme Court of Australia is, at it's core, is gynocentrism inequality? Do women have to share the power with men or not?

When your enemy is making a mistake, don't interrupt them.
When your enemy is drowning, don't try to save them.

Instead of a life preserver, throw them an anvil, a millstone, throw a chain net over them. But don't white knight for them just because they're damseling.

Screw women's sports.
Screw women's toilets.
Men in women's toilets will make them safer and cleaner.

Everyone knows how filthy and dirty women are in there – just ask a cleaner.

Sending some hairy chested swinging dicks in to hold them accountable will be a good thing.

Men in women's spaces is an improvement.

Female paedophiles are bullet proof when it comes to accountability. Some men in women's environs will make our children safer.

Transwomen aren't killing anyone. They have around the same offender rate as the general population.

Worried about male rapists transing their way into women's prisons? Don't forget that female inmates rape other female inmates too.

Feminism Inc is the worst corruption known to man since the city of Uruk was built and writing was invented.

Why would your support their political power?

Sure transwomen might look a little weird but nowhere as weird as the collective male shooting himself in the face, politically, repeatedly.

But wait, there's more weird!

You say you're red pilled, bad to the bone, toxically masculine, alpha male and proud of it, but,… really,… just how tough are you big boy?

Do you have what it takes to do what it takes?

Will you step into the ring?
Will you stand next to your brother in the fight?
Take your place in the shield wall?
Defend the Mountain of Uncounted Dead Brothers as sacred ground?

Would you fly the signals, flags and pennants of Female Privilege in the real war?

Or will you revert to simping for the women starving for female validation?

If donning the amour of the battle dress and applying the makeup of war paint was the only way to kill the gynoinsanity and establish lasting equality, once and for all, are you really real man enough to strap up?

Big question isn't it?

May I humbly suggest you inspect your own standards and values, with a loupe and calipers.

Before you next hold court as a denigrator of transwomen.

Check out the header image above and do some research on the Winged Hussars saving Europe. Sometimes men in weird dress are the best warriors by far.

Because those guys are better at tearing gynocentrism a new one, than the last 100 years of red pilled MGTOW, MRA, and general manospherians. That includes Andrew Tate, and Andrew Tate's Dad (Paul Elam), not to mention the rest of us. And in honour of the men whose shoulders I stand upon, whose leadership I follow, it's not for want of trying.

Just don't white knight for the misandrists bro.
That's way too weird.

DARVO: Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender

March 6, 2023 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

Have you ever marveled at how your abusive wife, girlfriend or ex is able to do and say the most hurtful, underhanded and contemptible things and then portray herself as the innocent victim? Have you ever wondered how she is able to convincingly accuse others, usually her victims, of the abusive behaviors and attitudes of which she is actually guilty? Wonder no more, the answer may be DARVO.

Dr Jennifer J. Freyd, PhD of the University of Oregon identified DARVO in the 1990s at the tail end of the repressed sexual abuse memories hysteria. In spite of its dubious origins, DARVO is a helpful concept with broader applications than Dr Freyd seems to have originally intended. Freyd writes about DARVO in conjunction with her work on betrayal trauma, which I discuss on the original Shrink4Men blog. According to Dr Freyd's webpage:

> "DARVO refers to a reaction that perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behavior. The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behavior, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility or even blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation."

DARVO seems to be a combination of projection, denial, lying, blame shifting and gaslighting. Dr Freyd notes that other observers have identified the same phenomena using different terms. My male clients experience this behavior when they try to hold the abusive women in their lives accountable. It also seems to be common behavior in most predators, bullies, high-conflict individuals and/or abusive personality-disordered individuals. DARVO especially seems to occur in high-conflict divorce and/or custody cases.

Of course, not everyone who denies wrong doing is engaging in DARVO. Many partners and exes of abusive women are accused of things they didn't do or of things that never happened. Naturally, when this happens, you deny the accusation and perhaps feel a little (or a lot) bewildered. How do you know if an individual's denial is the truth or an instance of DARVO? Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) proposes:

> "It is important to distinguish types of denial, for an innocent person will probably deny a false accusation. Thus denial is not evidence of guilt. However, I propose that a certain kind of indignant self-righteousness, and overly stated denial, may in fact relate to guilt.

> I hypothesize that if an accusation is true, and the accused person is abusive, the denial is more indignant, self-righteous and manipulative, as compared with denial in other cases. Similarly, I have observed that actual abusers threaten, bully and make a nightmare for anyone who holds them accountable or asks them to change their abusive behavior. This attack, intended to chill and terrify, typically includes threats of lawsuits, overt and covert attacks, on the whistle-blower's credibility and so on.
> The attack will often take the form of focusing on ridiculing the person who attempts to hold the offender accountable. The attack will also likely focus on ad hominem instead of intellectual/evidential issues. Finally, I propose that the offender rapidly creates the impression that the abuser is the wronged one, while the victim or concerned observer is the offender. Figure and ground are completely reversed. The more the offender is held accountable, the more wronged the offender claims to be."

This is similar to how William Eddy, LCSW, Esq describes the persuasive blaming tactics of high-conflict individuals."Persuasive Blamers persuade others that their internal problems are external, caused by something else or someone else. Once others are persuaded to get the problem backward, the dispute escalates into a long-term, high-conflict situation. One that few people other than persuasive blamers can tolerate" (Eddy, 2006, p. 29). Getting the problem backward is precisely what happens when DARVO occurs. Figure and ground are completely reversed.

"It's only the Persuasive Blamers of Cluster B who keep high-conflict disputes going. They are persuasive, and to keep the focus off their own behavior (the major source of the problem), they get others to join in the blaming" (Eddy, 2006, p. 30). This is why many Narcissists, Borderlines, Histrionics and Antisocials effectively employ smear campaign and mobbing tactics when they target someone—be it a spouse, attorney, court evaluator or therapist. By blaming others for everything that's wrong in their lives they keep the focus off the real problem; themselves. This seems to be the exact denial-attack-reverse victim and offender behavior Freyd describes.

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) states:

> "The offender is on the offense and the person attempting to hold the offender accountable is on the defense. 'Deny, Attack and Reverse Victim and Offender' work best together. How can someone be on the attack so viciously and be in the victim role? Future research may investigate the hypothesis that the offender rapidly goes back and forth between attack and reverse victim and offender."

This behavior is crazy-making if you are the target of it. You know you're being attacked while your partner/ex plays the victim role for all she's worth, insisting on her distorted version of un-reality. Worse yet, many people believe her; their reasoning being, "She's so upset it must be true." Even some of my male clients who know their wives'accusations and lies aren't true, sometimes doubt themselves and what they know to be reality. I believe that many women and men who engage in DARVO come to believe their own lies after they repeat them enough times. I call it the "O.J. Simpson Effect."

Abusers typically employ different types of denial. Perhaps you're familiar with some of the following ones:

- Outright denial or gaslighting. "That never happened."
- Minimization. "It wasn't that bad."
- Amnesia. "I don't remember doing that."
- Redefinition. "I have a bad temper, so you shouldn't upset me."
- Projection. "You're abusive and controlling. You hurt me."
- Conversion. "I did wrong, but I'm a changed person and won't do it again."

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) concludes:

"The offender takes advantage of the confusion we have in our culture over the relationship between public provability and reality (and a legal system that has a certain history in this regard) in redefining reality. Future research may test the hypothesis that the offender may well come to believe in [her] innocence via this logic: if no one can be sure [she] is guilty then logically [she] is not guilty no matter what really occurred. The reality is thus defined by public proof, not by personal lived experience."

It may be difficult to sort out who is telling the truth in these cases. However, I've found that high-conflict individuals who engage in this behavior often can't substantiate their claims or, if they just make up more lies to try to substantiate their claims, they're inconsistent over time, so pay close attention and document their lies. This may help you hang her with a rope of her own making, if and when you need to prove your version of events as opposed to her ever evolving versions of the truth.

If she is threatening to call the police and make false allegations against you and/or you're considering divorce, it's extremely important that you document the abuse you're experiencing in a journal, a digital recorder or some other medium. Abusive, persuasive blamers rely on the force of their emotions to sell their lies, half-truths and distortions. Since most people are suckers for drama, especially in the form of a tearful, self-righteous woman, you'll need proof if you want to be believed. Think of it as making yourself DARVO-proof.

Emotionally underdeveloped husbands

March 7, 2023 | by Tim Patten | Link | Original Link

Mr Tim Patten has sadly passed away. His articles live on at A Voice for Men –Ed

Society has decided that males are terrible communicators who are not in touch with their emotions. In fact, psychologists often maintain that emotions frighten men, and many don't know what or how they are feeling.[i] The perception that males are emotionally "stunted" often leads females to be upset with them or to pressure them to be more open about what is on their mind. "He just won't talk," frustrated wives complain,[ii] while others take a more assertive tack— "Share yourself!" they say. If he doesn't come around, it means there is something wrong with him.[iii]

Experts point to the fact that little boys are discouraged from crying or opening up about their feelings as some sort of proof that men are toxic, emotionless and without passion. This theme is pervasive in the media and the arts, at colleges and in other educational settings, and in the discussions and interactions that punctuate daily life, but men have been wrongly stereotyped. The fact is that men and women both have feelings, but they exhibit and express them in different ways.

Men are not dispassionate and unloving; they love deeply and enjoy the tingling textures of the world around them. Internal emotions inform and navigate their behavioral decisions, choices, and rational judgments. Like women, they experience pain in relationships, joy, and everyday thrills, and can connect with other people on many levels. However, men do not process certain aspects and interactions, including intimate relationships, in the same way as women do. This primarily reflects social conditions and a framework embedded in 400,000 years of human DNA.[iv]

And yet, women can't help but complain about it. They want their male partners to emote or, perhaps, to cry more. Since many of them express their feelings in this way, they believe men should do so, too. But there is something fundamentally wrong with such assertions. Males are being evaluated based on a female-oriented sensitivity meter, which means the yardstick for emotional responsiveness is inherently biased. Because men are deemed inadequate according to this standard, they are assumed to be severely lacking.

But this is not fair or accurate. Men and women are not equal. There is a broad range of social and physiological differences between them. That doesn't only mean the obvious differences between males and females; research has shown that the brains of each sex are hard-wired in contrary neuro pathways. In other words, men and women process emotions by way of different behaviors, patterns, at different times and circumstances.[v] They also communicate emotions differently.[vi]

A Common Complaint about Husbands

It is not uncommon to hear a stay-at-home wife or mother complain about a husband who comes home from a long day at work, heaves a sigh of relief, flops his ass down, and zones out in front of a computer screen.[vii] Invariably, female insecurities bubble to the surface. She is disgusted by his escape into video games.[viii] Her inferiority complex kicks into high gear. She wonders if he has fallen out of love and begins to question their relationship. Because they—or she—expected marriage would make things better, they end up arguing—on average, seven times every day.[ix][x]

Why some men escape to the computer. Since the beginning of time, men have been conditioned to avoid causing emotional distress to women and to protect their feelings. At the same time, females have groomed males to lie whenever necessary. Regardless of how he might feel, a man must tell his woman that she is beautiful, pretty and skinny and that he loves her unconditionally. He must tell her lies each and every day, or else she will experience severe emotional pain.

If a man speaks the truth— "Life has exhausted me." "I hate my boss and job." "The pressure is too much." "I wish I could quit, but we need the paycheck." "Your bickering is damaging me further."—he understands that it will cause her serious emotional harm, leading to escalating arguments and the perception that she is unloved. If that happens, he knows the rest of his life will be hell. It is better to suppress what could be seen as an emotional assault on the woman he loves.

Wives Complain about Husbands

Although times have changed, many couples continue to see their relationship in traditional terms. For her part, a stay-at-home wife or mother will focus on maintaining the family's accommodations. She decorates and structures the living space to ensure no harm comes to the children. She also implements rules and regulations that tightly control the nest and all of those inside. Under the circumstances, if hubby comes home from work, reaches for a beer, sits in front of the TV and clams up, instead of doing what she asks, it isn't long before they enter the relationship battle zone.

Why some men escape with beer and TV. Profit-making enterprises invariably harness and monitor an employee's efforts and abilities by way of rules and the overarching threat that those who don't go along will not be employed long. Unless a man works for the government or a university, he is usually overseen and pressured by an owner, manager or director. Once at home, he needs time to breathe and allow the pressures from work to seep into the cosmic ether. He needs an escape.

What often happens, however, is that when he walks through the door, he is confronted by the expectations of the boss of the domestic empire. After succumbing to the demands of overseers at his job, he is pressured into taking on the duties and obligations imposed by his wife. To many men, this is simply more work. If a man is burdened on the job and at home, he will often escape through alcohol and other substance use.

Without freedom, men become hampered and suppress their genuine selves. Many cherish liberty and independence; once they leave work, they must refresh their souls with a drink of the tasty sovereignty juice. They savor it and let it quench their thirst, replenishing natural virtues. Not all men escape in the same way, of course. Some seek solace through fishing and hunting, reminding them of their place on our planet.

Academia's Attacks on Men

The pressures men face don't just come from home and work. Authors of women's and gender studies textbooks, for example, spend a tremendous amount of time blaming males for all sorts of problems. In Chapter 12, "How Men Silence Women in Marital Relationships,"[xi] of Language and Gender,[xii] which examines the differences in communication between the sexes, Victoria Leto DeFrancisco details a social experiment that "proved" husbands dominate wives through everyday conversations. Her research involved placing recorders inside married couples' homes and later analyzing what they said. Below is one such conversation, between "Clair" and "Bob":

> Clair: I went to Safeway food market today.
> Bob: Ah-ha.
> Clair: I ran into your mother.
> Bob: Ran into who?
> Clair: Your mother—she didn't recognize me or know who I was.
> Bob: Ahhh.
> Clair: She was at the meat counter and I looked right at her.
> Bob: I'll be right back, I need a cigarette.
> Clair: (When Bob returns.) So I followed her up an aisle. She never looked back.
> Bob: Well, my mom has tunnel vision.
> Clair: And I talked to Duane today, for my dental appointment.
> Bob: Let me go feed the dogs.

According to Dr. DeFrancisco, the wives she studied felt patronized and "put down," and believed their husbands were "fake listening." Her conclusion was that women try to talk but that men stubbornly dominate them with patronizing behavior and by ignoring what they say.

An alternative explanation for what happened between Clair and Bob. Family and social drama disturbs many men but seems to turn on no small number of women. Regardless, in the conversation detailed above, it is just as likely that something else was going on. Perhaps Bob didn't enjoy discussing the fragile relationship between his mother and his wife. He knows there is friction and that there is no remedy to this particular situation. Since a man's brain is hardwired to solve problems, he sees no point in confronting his mother. Over time, Bob has become acutely sensitive to his wife's emotional issues with his mother and is tired of arguing about it.

In reality, it is unfair for Clair to expect Bob to straighten out his mother's problems or to put up with endless family relationship drama. Unfortunately, while the latter can easily disgust many men, they can't simply tell their wives to "shut up!" If they do, they will likely end up spending a week sleeping on the couch. In the end, they decide to keep quiet about the all-to-common drama involving a wife and other members of the extended families. Such struggles might be interesting fodder for television, but they can also lead men to snap.

Like many other women's studies authors, Dr. DeFrancisco has cast unfair aspersions on all males. These so-called academics appear wholly ignorant of the biological differences between the sexes and the workings of the brain.

Conclusion

For the most part, wives, therapists, and academics continue to have a serious misunderstanding about men, masculinity, and the emotional male. Like the women at a coffee klatch who keep telling old wives tails about defective hubby failures, there are plenty of people who still don't get how men communicate and operate. Little boys do cry and men are emotionally sensitive. When a man falls in love, the feeling is so overwhelming that he is often imbued with the urge to care for his lover forever. Men shouldn't be faulted because they aren't like women. Ignorant and damaging stereotypes should be disregarded, and men should be appreciated for who they are.

Throughout history, men have willingly sacrificed their lives for others, demonstrating deep loyalty, affection, and respect for their fellow humans—male or female. Men have built our civilizations and have passionately reached for the stars. Some men set their aspirations on mastering unsurmountable obstacles, seeking cures, and innovations that benefit all humankind. Others choose an alternative course. Regardless, for those who are seeking freedom from the entanglements of destructive relationships, there is an option worth considering: Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW). Around the world, men are finding mentorship into a new lifestyle of single-man happiness that is financially and emotionally nourishing and amazing.

Why I Do Not Celebrate International Women's Day

March 8, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

International Women's Day is upon us once again. March 8th is the day we are exhorted to turn our attention to women: to their achievements and struggles, their courage and their suffering, their indispensable roles in our societies—and to what more can be done, mostly with men's tax dollars, to promote and advantage them. When I say "turn our attention," I am speaking only metaphorically, of course. Our attention is always turned toward women, perpetually and ceaselessly: in praise, in awe, in defense; with outrage and indignation.

This year, as the International Women's Day (IWD) website informs us, we are to focus on the concept of "equity," accepting that "equal opportunities aren't enough" and that "equal isn't always fair." After 40 years of affirmative action hiring for women, special legal status, targeted promotions, and ceaseless affirmation—and at a time when women are already faring far better than men in education and employment—the promoters of IWD demand yet more women-only opportunities, special benefits, set-asides, hiring targets, start-up monies, government grants, and other gender perquisites in addition to all the accompanying pro-female hoopla. To add a dollop of ludicrous dolor, the IWD website announces "sadly" that "Gender parity won't be attained for well over a century."

To say that I do not celebrate International Women's Day is to put it too mildly. I not only object to it but believe that the day—and all of its nauseous ideological, political, legal, and economic baggage—should be immediately retired and blotted from the calendar.

International Women's Day exacerbates the combined self-glorification and self-pity too many women already exhibit when they think of themselves as women. Though the 1960s was supposed to free women from regarding themselves first and foremost as "the Other," in Simone De Beauvoir's words, IWD instead heightens the constant dreary self-regard, telegraphing that women's experiences, sorrows, and triumphs—simply because they are women's—deserve special recognition and massive wealth transfers. The rigged game is revealed by the fact that International Men's Day (November 19th) has at best a nominal existence, passing every year in near-complete oblivion.

The Marxist theorist, writer, and labor activist Clara Zetkin, who is generally credited with inaugurating IWD in 1910, at least made clear that women would necessarily work in concert with men to achieve "the social emancipation of labor." In her 1909 essay "German Socialist Women's Movement," she explicitly opposed "the bourgeois women righters' credo" that women should join with other women to "strive exclusively for women's rights." Zetkin favored a "class-war of all the exploited, without difference of sex, against all who exploit, without difference of sex." That she also favored special meetings and measures to advance women suggests a contradiction in her ideology, but at least her platform did not depict all women as all men's victims.

Today, any emphasis on cooperation and shared endeavor, any recognition of men's humanity, achievements, and needs (aside from their need to overcome "toxic masculinity" and defer more perfectly to women)—is strikingly absent from IWD pronouncements, which continually equate "gender equality" (or "equity") solely with advancing women.

In this, IWD is, of course, merely a microcosm of our culture generally. Whether the issue is suicide or drug addiction, employment or incarceration, homelessness or homicide, our societies always emphasize the impact on women, even when men are the vast majority of suicides, drug overdoses, workplace fatalities, prison inmates, homeless, or homicide victims. The IWD website speaks continually of "gender parity" without once mentioning that in education, employment, health, and longevity, women have been doing better than their male peers for decades.

This is rank prejudice, and no civilized country should endorse it. IWD should be labelled a relic of an outmoded era in which women's humanity was wrongly valued above men's. School children should be taught that countries where IWD is still observed are strange and dangerous places for men and children because of their antiquated, irrational, and unjust practices.

Along with the cancellation of IWD should come a concerted effort to challenge and, ultimately, stamp out related manifestations of female supremacism and feminist bigotry. Expressions of preference for female humanity, such as "The Future is Female," should be held up to ridicule and contumely. Indications of anti-male animus, now an all-too common currency in our elite and public cultures, should become as unacceptable as statements of anti-Semitism and anti-black racism. All people of good will should loudly boo any such statements when they occur. Anyone who lobs around statistics about female victimization should have lobbed back at them, with force, the multitudinous evidence of male disadvantage.

In place of International Women's Day, a new day might be instituted to stress intersexual cooperation and harmony rather than division and animosity. It could be called International Men and Women's Day. Men could pledge their support for women, and women could pledge their support for men—only the latter would be anything new or unusual. Politicians could speak of men's and women's distinctive needs and contributions. In particular, women could come forward to celebrate the men in their lives, enumerating the satisfaction and joy of giving back to men and loving them.

Dignitaries at the United Nations as well as in various non-governmental organizations would make speeches about the importance of amity, trust, and cooperation between men and women. School children could do projects about how each sex can better understand the other, and could learn about how men and women have cooperated and depended upon each other throughout history. Advertising and popular culture could be mobilized to spread a positive message about the new day.

For too long, International Women's Day has been open and unabashed about its sex-based exclusions, actively channeling energy, resources, and compassion away from men towards women with a raft of false claims to support its chauvinism. Anyone genuinely interested in social flourishing should reject it without apology.

Pro-Choice Anti-Feminist

March 10, 2023 | by Dennis Michaels | Link | Original Link

Contrary to the fiction circulated by feminists, not all MRAs are vehemently opposed to abortion. Pardon me for being so jaded, but I think most MRAs would be just fine with feminists reproducing as little as possible. The one thing MRAs do have in common on this topic is the demand for equal reproductive rights in the form of legal paternal surrender.

Until I stumbled upon the MHRM, I felt I was the only person in the world who is strongly pro-choice but doesn't see it as women's rights issue. In fact, I think framing abortion as woman's right to choose is counterproductive and rather disingenuous.

If abortion is nothing more than a manifestation of a woman's right to choose what happens inside her body, then consider the following thought experiment. New technology is developed, an artificial womb. Where a woman previously could perform an abortion, instead the fetus would be transferred to the artificial womb and carried to term there. Upon completing the gestation period, the 'newborn' baby is delivered to the overjoyed father, while the mother is saddled with the financial responsibility for the child she didn't want. Would feminists find this an acceptable compromise? Well, at the current rate of technological progress we won't have to wait long to call their bluff.

Reality check – abortions do not spontaneously happen in happy, healthy families that are looking forward to the child and are well capable of providing the child with a happy and fulfilling life[i]. I subscribe to the theory – apparently rejected by most feminists – that rights and responsibilities are two sides of the same coin. I believe that anyone who brings a child into this world has an obligation to provide for that child. Abortion is the flipside of that responsibility. When parents can provide for the child little more than a life of perpetual misery and abuse, abortion does seem like the lesser of two evils.

Abortion is not the woman's right to choose what happens to her body for nine months. It is the woman's right to choose what happens for many years after that; the right currently denied to men. And when I say it is denied to men, I don't just mean after the fact of pregnancy. Even reproductive coercion against men is not a defense against responsibility for the unwanted child.

While feminists are harping on about reproductive coercion against women, the Center for Disease Control reports that it is perpetrated more often against men. I don't know why this profound observation even required a study. It is not difficult to figure out that supply of men eager to sign up for 18 years of financial slavery is much smaller than demand. The law offers no protection for the men. In Canada, a man can be convicted of sexual assault for using a sabotaged condom with the intention of impregnating his wife. I am yet to hear of a single woman convicted of sexual assault for lying that she is taking oral contraceptives.

Even abstaining from coitus altogether will not protect a man from the responsibilities of fatherhood. In the UK, a woman can forge paperwork to fraudulently obtain a man's deposit from the sperm bank and perform IVF. Not only is she not prosecuted for fraud, but she also gets to collect child support payments from her victim. In a similar story, it turns out the famed tennis player Boris Becker is not only a great athlete himself. Apparently, his sperm is so potent he can impregnate a woman through a blowjob.

Meanwhile, framing abortion as women's rights issue is a major obstacle to the recognition of fetal rights. Some recognition of fetal rights is not inherently contradictory to abortion rights. In many jurisdictions, unborn children can be named as inheritors on a will or beneficiaries of the insurance policy. The fetus does not have the right to a mother that cares about the child's health. Feminist organizations routinely oppose any recognition of fetal rights on the ground that it will be used to undermine Roe v. Wade. American Civil Liberties Union is not far behind in denying civil liberties of an unborn child.

In Canada or UK, a child has no right to redress prenatal injuries caused by an irresponsible mother. I reiterate, I do not view such rights as contradictory to abortion. On the contrary, I see the mother as responsible for the damages she causes to the child she chooses to have, and abortion is what gives her a choice.

Fetal rights and men's rights are locked in a zero-sum game against the feminist lobby. For as long as abortion is seen as a women's issue there will be no recognition of male reproductive rights or fetal rights. This conflict can be resolved by viewing parenthood not as a right, but as a responsibility that should not be taken lightly and abortion rights as the flipside of that responsibility. This concept is not far-fetched, seeing how fatherhood is already regarded as a responsibility that comes with a heavy burden. Now we just need feminists to see motherhood the same way. That should be easy; they are big proponents of gender equality, right?

Tucker Carlson: Battle of Sexes is Over – Men Are Winning!

Neil Lyndon's call for 'No more sex war' may finally be getting realized. As Tucker Carlson states, transwomen are succeeding in colonizing women's spaces, competitions, awards and particularly women's special status, with the side-effect of weakening women's exclusive privileges and making those same privileges available for men and boys.

Men are dogs: important truth in disparaging men

March 12, 2023 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Declaring that men are dogs is a common sort of disparagement of men today. Such disparagement has a long history. It's typically associated with condemning men's strong, independent sexuality. For example, the late-twelfth-century Latin text De amore (On love) declares:

> Even after they have reflected long on a woman or have enjoyed her rewards, as soon as they see another they long for her embraces, becoming forgetful of and ungrateful for the services obtained from their former lover. Such men as these wish to indulge their lust with every woman they see. Their love is like that of a shameless dog, or rather they are, I think, to be compared with donkeys, for they are affected solely by that natural urge which puts men on a level with the rest of the animal kingdom. [1]

Thinkers throughout history have declared that "reason" distinguishes humans from all other animals.[2] Many animals have a large, complex repertoire of behaviors. They pursue easily understandable interests (food, security, reproduction) in ways that rapidly adapt to specific circumstances. Do animals reason? Describing the distinctiveness of (human) reason has been a highly successful job-creation scheme for philosophers. In today's common-sense reality of human-created artifacts (intricately cooked meals, movies, airplanes, spaceships, etc.), humans are obviously very special animals.

Although very special animals, humans are animals. Lack of appreciation for that reality has been pervasive in elite thought throughout history. For example, De amore declares:

> Who could doubt that he who chose the consolation of the upper part is to be preferred to him who chose the lower? So far as the consolations of the lower part is concerned, we are in no sense separated from the brute animals, nature herself having joined us to them in this respect. But the consolations of the upper part have been granted particularly to human nature and denied to all other animals by nature herself. So he who chose the lower part should be rejected from love as unworthy, like a dog, and the one who chose the upper part should be accepted, as embracing his nature. [3]

Humans can forgo sexual activity. Humans can also fast for a time, eat limited portions of healthful food, or gorge themselves on junk food and become grotesquely obese. None of these facts change the reality of human nature. Separating a man's head from his genitals destroys his life. Much more terrible than men being dogs are men's dismembered, bleeding body parts.

[1] Andreas Capellanus, De amore 1.5.7-8, from Latin trans. Walsh (1982) p. 41. Reference to a dog as a man's best friend occurs in twelfth-century Latin literature. Understanding of a dog as man's best friend seems unrelated to the claim that men are dogs. At least in medieval European understanding, referring to men as dogs would be less disparaging than referring to men as cats. Any symbolic relation between dog and Doug is purely coincidental.

Infantile Controversy

March 13, 2023 | by J Galt | Link | Original Link

Many who express themselves in the main stream media and in fact all over the internet seem to be infatuated with speaking in the third person. They offer all kinds of advice and insights into making this shithole of existence a better place. It seems that so many of us are lacking in self-esteem we are quite willing to sacrifice others to our own cause of self-righteousness. My personal opinion is that most people are not willing to risk their credibility to stand up for an issue and speak from their own beliefs, that they remove themselves from the commitment. Instead they engage in finger pointing and finger wagging, it's safer for them.

It was not so long ago that tele-evangelists along with the Catholic Church were given a taste of their own hypocrisy and left to marinade in it. I call it taming the alter-ego.

Would you buy a used religion from this man?

The world is full of wheelers, dealers and healers. It all hinges on what you choose to believe and in this culture stroking down your dollar is the way you express your beliefs. Most popular beliefs as far as I am concerned are the ones with money behind them. It doesn't make them right it just makes them popular by economic repetition. Just ask anyone in Iraq that is hiding all those kitchen appliances of mass destruction. In as much as it may sound absurd, do you think if we had taken all the money that has been spent on that war and just handed to the Iraqi's we might have gotten more than we wanted. Call it a bribe, call it whatever you want, just give me the results I'm after. Where ever the money goes is where we point our nose and sniff, smells good eh, shit ya, blow the fuckers up and don't forget to support the troops.

Is it any wonder that so many people engage in feminist rhetoric, it's where the money is, for NOW. We aren't people, we're cattle grazing at the money river. What's particularly hilarious is they tax our money, tell us what to think and give it back to us when we comply. HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA, HA. I like to call it shake and bake reality. There is no right or wrong – only money. Does that sound pathological to anyone out there. This is third person pathology, a mindless frenzy for money. Anybody remember the tire commercials with the baby sitting in the tire? Bet you went out and got new tires.

I got a phone call from a charity fighting against internet child pornography. He said the money was to fund more investigators. I told him most people have porn on their computers and aren't even aware of it. I said if he gave me 30 minutes on his computer I could probably find some. I told him I felt it was unethical to prosecute anyone for an unintended crime. He told me that I must support child pornography if I was unwilling to donate.

This is the kind of ethics supported by people like Josh Jasper and the organisation he represents. It's not about being responsible or ethical, it's not even about the problem it's about money. For people like this, they will sell anything and anybody to fill their wallet, and inflate their prestige.

I have two children from my first marriage, when they were young the issue of swearing came up. My daughter commented that people often swear and why couldn't she. I explained to her that everyone swears but they use discretion and that swearing was not appropriate anytime or anywhere. I explained that different cultures had different approaches to swearing. The French will often swear by insulting the church, "Tabernac". I explained that swearing is based on cultural values and in some cases personal values. I told her that I did not believe that words such as fuck, shit, piss were offensive. What I find much more offensive is words such as stupid, idiot, dummy, these are words that attack esteem and it is wrong to attack someone's self-esteem. I was respectful in the delivery of my personal beliefs she gave it some thought and agreed with me. After twenty five years I can honestly say I have never heard her use those words.

I find the message of the video produced by the Riverview Centre sensationally irresponsible. I would never choose to view my children this way, I think your message to a developing mind is indicative of a desire and willingness to damage their esteem. What is equally disturbing is that you remove the personal responsibility of violence from the individual by assigning the responsibility to nurturers. Your message clearly states that a rapist does not suffer from a pathology, but rather suffers from the influence of a wider community pathology.
It suggests that rapists don't exist, but communities that condone and promote rape do. What you have done with your video is condone rape, by stating that everyone else is responsible for it, that it is a nurtured behaviour. You make a good argument for rapists being victims of social influence. The next legitimate question is should rapists even be jailed, or should they undergo rehabilitation in the community? I'm just following your logic.
With a genuine moment of reflection consider the message offered to a child when you say these words: "never hit a girl!"
What you have just told that child is that you expect them to hit, that violence is OK, but that violence is conditional. It's simply an incomplete message about violence that ultimately condones it. Once you make violence conditional you promote its use. But unfortunately it does not give you exclusive control over it. What we often fail to see is that the meaning of a message can be much more diverse than intended.
Football is a good example.
Imagine that little piece of leather everyone is fighting over symbolizes masculinity and to get it and make it profitable by scoring points, you have to kick the shit out of anyone that gets in your way. That's how you bring home the bacon for your family.
The football, puck and basketball are all violent definitions of masculinity. The more you score the more you're paid. It's violence for profit, the war in Iraq, violence for profit, Hollywood and cinema, violence for profit. But what we really need to be concerned about is an eight month old baby. You know so the message isn't confused. Josh Jasper, ex-marine, football player, cop? How the fuck do you get more violent than that without being prosecuted. This guy has a message? There really is no need for a PI. Exposing this guy is easy, ask him how much he is paid, self-serving greed speaks for itself. Better yet ask the Riverview Centre to publish the earnings of its staff. Wanna bet they refuse?
Beyond the violence for profit, you know acceptable and state sanctioned violence, those that play by the violent rules can also gain fame and hero worship. Maybe not from everyone, but enough fame to satisfy their lust for self-importance. Ask any Hollywood action hero they'll tell you. Ever wonder why kids walk into schools and indiscriminately murder there piers? They're not married so they don't need the money. Maybe it's fame, maybe not from everybody, but enough to satisfy their lust for self-importance. Once you have killed 3 million whatever's on your game console isn't it just a reflex.

It's disappointing that the malignancy that is the media teaches us to over dramatize our lives and our own definition. It's part of our consciousness now. Super bowl flesh trade and domestic violence, the urban myths are never questioned. The question should always relate to the money, how much funding was spent to police the event and how many arrests were made. If you arrest fifty people and it cost you half a million that's ten thousand bucks a head. For that kind of money why wait for the super bowl , just put a bounty on their heads and the flood will never end. Wanna bet the next Democratic convention, won't be policed to protect the victims of the skin trade? What did you say? Politicians don't buy sex! Bill Clinton and Monica Lewd-insky…need I say more Hillary? This mentality is an extension of the war on terrorism mentality. Fear for sale, buy your safety with a donation. For anyone paying attention, you may have noticed that financial terrorism doesn't qualify, just violence. The banks can screw you for a couple of trillion, guaranteeing your children will live in bondage, but the real threat is still sitting in a cave somewhere watching the Disney channel.
Wanna know what a real feminist looks like, they're staring at your wallet with their hand out, selling morality by the pound, shilling and pence. Sometimes unknowingly you marry one.
Hey Josh, instead of pointing fingers why don't you tell us in your own words why you don't rape women? Try You Tube!

Are 1 in 5 Women Raped at College?

Is it true that 1 in 5 women are raped on America's college campuses? If so, what does that say about our universities and the people who run them? If not, how did that statistic get into the mainstream? Caroline Kitchens, a Senior Research Associate at the American Enterprise Institute, looks at the data and explains the very significant results.

Harvesting the male gaze

March 15, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

We all know about the male gaze and the resultant sexualization of the female body that it creates. The standard accusation is that we men are scanning our environment for passive women to perv on, an act that reduces women from otherwise complex human beings to mere sex objects for our sexual pleasure. The following Oxford Reference Dictionary definition represents the usual view of the male gaze, or at least the one widely promoted by feminist analysis of the phenomenon:

> Male Gaze
> 1. A manner of treating women's bodies as objects to be surveyed, which is associated by feminists with hegemonic masculinity, both in everyday social interaction and in relation to their representation in visual media: [see also objectification].

What stands out in all definitions of the gaze is men's agency: men "treat" women's bodies, "survey" women's bodies, and enact "hegemony" over women's bodies. It's a travesty that deprives women of agency according to the feminist film critic credited with first coining "the male gaze."[1]

But is it so… are women always passive victims of rapey stares, or are they playing their part in eliciting it from men? Might it be – shock, horror – that they are agent provocateurs in a game they initiate and to a large extent control? I think most people, at least those not in denial, know the answer to that question is a big yes.

The hours and years spent trying on different clothing, and the rehearsing of postures, or gestures of the hands in front of the mirror; touching her face, placing her hands on her hips, or lightly above her breasts; or the practicing of facial gestures; and the smiles, pursed lips, head-tilts, hair flicks, and glances of the eyes, all designed to harvest the gaze from unsuspecting male targets.

Could it be that through that highly cultivated repertoire of gestures women possess enormous agency, and males serve as passive targets with little agency other than unprocessed reactivity?

Whatever the case we first need to rid ourselves of the myth that women are victims in this age-old game, to which end I will give a few gaze-harvesting techniques employed by women below, a list that can easily be expanded by adding your own observations of harvesting tricks.

Here are some of the techniques women habitually use to set a gaze reaction in motion, each of which involves a woman actively – and sometimes aggressively – placing herself within your sensory range with one of the following:

The Twisty Twirl

The best way to describe this is a gentle swaying or twisting the body from side to side, often with hands clasped at front, to impart a childish exuberance much like little girls do. While this might seem appropriate behavior of a 5 year old girl, the twisty-twirl is not something the gaze harvesting woman ever relinquishes – she employs it to interrupt men's field of vision with sudden movement, a gesture sufficient to gain his attention.

The Blockade

This happens when you are the target of a woman who wants to slow you down and make you absorb her presence. She will stand in the doorway, middle of the footpath, or in the shopping center aisle sometimes aided by a shopping trolley which she leaves strategically placed across the aisle. If done well, this forces an interaction: "Excuse me, I'll just move your trolley so I can get past," to which she replies "Oh, I'm so sorry," while flashing her most attractive features at you – her favorite dress, beautifully shampoo'd hair, or that smile she was famed for in high school.

The Color Assault

The practice of wearing eye-seizing colors is a favorite, with the unmistakable message being YOU WILL LOOK AT ME AND SEE ME! Gone are the soft pastel designs of yesteryear, and in are the garish fluoros or otherwise bold colors designed to snatch the attention of everyone who enters the room or walks the street. And not just the clothes – the practice extends to colored hair, hats, shawls and scarfs which have become equally loud, with the wearers settling for nothing less than complete molestation from every set of eyes in the immediate vicinity.

The Exclamation

The exclamation is timed just as the male target comes into earshot, and is often delivered in the form of a small shock or surprise; "Oh, I nearly fell over!" states the woman into the thin air, or "My goodness its so hot today" in the hopes a perfect stranger will begin gazing in the direction of the voice and, with luck, take up her topic of self-discussion.

The Exclamation can also appear as a muttering about something at just the right moment. This is a favorite and is normally delivered in the form of a question or statement in need of an answer, such as when she is in earshot of the right man in the shopping aisle and frustratedly mutters, supposedly to herself, “I can’t find the cans of spaghetti I wonder if they’ve moved them?” or “I hope they are getting some fresh bread in today!” that the passing male might hear and feel compelled to respond.

Look At Me Strut:

Strutting gorgeously, exuding self-sufficiency with an I-don’t-need-a-man look, the strutter has mastered the art of appearing disinterested in attention, while making a distracting physical display of swinging arms, loudly clopping heels, eye catching attire, and a chin-in-the-air look that begs a second glance from the target males. This routine is generally pulled in central business district where she assiduously scans shopfront windows to capture all those reflected male gazes that her empowered strutting dreams of capturing. Her skill at using shopfront windows to look at both herself and the reflected faces of those gazing at her rises up to an artform that allows her to look sideways and yet not trip over when having little focus on the road ahead.

Exhibit A.

The Volume Increase

This gaze-puller happens when you are walking toward a woman who happens to be with one or more of her girlfriends and, desiring your gaze to be directed on her like the lazer of a sniper, she suddenly turns up the volume of the conversation she is having, or laughs very loudly, often to the astonishment of her female companion who has not seen its purpose. As ridiculous as she may appear to her friend, she has nevertheless succeeded in attracting those dirty male eyes – even if by a guy simply wondering what that sudden blast of noise was about.

The Accessory

Women utilize accessories to draw attentions – a dog, a handbag, a child, or whatever else is handy. The handbag can be swung around or rummaged through in such a way as to capture the attention of the most sight impaired person in the room. Likewise children can be fawned over, or chastised, just as a target male walks by, where mother will say “Don’t let that nice man see you eating candy” or “Don’t get in the way of the nice man or you might get hurt.” This is not to say that every woman and child who interacts with strangers is seeking the male gaze – many are simply engaging in polite public interaction. But a significant portion of them, perhaps especially single mothers, are soliciting further attentions.

Some women claim the best way to meet a man is to buy a dog and take it for a walk, where you’ll meet a handsome man either walking his own dog, or perhaps just walking alone. If it’s timed right, she knows her dog will follow the irresistible temptation to interact with the dog belonging to Mr. Handsome, and as a bonus the leashes might become entangled. In this scene she gains his eyes, and hopefully his conversation… will they get married?

Gesturing and Gesticulating

Women seem particularly adept at using physical movements to gain the male gaze. The many movements and postures of the arms, the hand placed strategically on chest, thigh, tummy, and the fingertips extended to touch various parts of the body or face – the chin, lips, cleavage. Or consider the tossing, sweeping, or twirling of the hair, and the flutters, glances or stares of the eyes, all designed to force an interaction from the harvestee.

The Lean In

What Sheryl Sandberg failed to admit was that women have been leaning in for millennia – with their cleavage. They do this for precisely the same reasons as Sandberg states – to get a rise, promotion, more money, status, and marriage. Perhaps that's what Sandberg unconsciously understood by that decidedly peculiar body-posture phrase Lean In – the old trick of bamboozaling with boobs. Why else would a woman need to "lean" "in"?

However it doesn't only happen in the board room or in the hiring room in front of the Human Resources officer. It happens equally at the bar, the gym, the music concert and the shopping center, places where women can get an equally good rise without even asking for one, at least not verbally. All she need to is lean in to get the attention she wants.

Did you notice something about these techniques? They are the same ones used by salespeople, like the ones you see selling wares in shopping malls who bounce a balloon up and down, twiddle a pen, or dance as the unsuspecting shopper walks in their direction only to be assaulted by a sideshow of color and movement. But rather than sell a product, the gaze-harvesting woman wants you to undress her with your eyes, a sign that her techniques have wielded power over you for her own narcissistic or material gain.

Next time you find yourself in one of these situations, try grasping some true agency by turning your eyes away from the female harvester, and enjoying the comedy when she becomes pissed at your refusal and 'ups the anti' – becoming louder, brighter, faster, and more obstructive as she attempts to salvage her failing effort.

You see, the real lack of agency appears when a man's senses are raped by an uninvited inrush of sensory stimuli, a bombardment arising from someone's selfish designs over where you should be gazing.

New Life for Men on College Campuses

March 16, 2023 | by Miles Groth Ph. D. | Link | Original Link

The lives of most boys and men are now more unfulfilling than ever before in postmodern America. It is situation the beginnings of which arguably can be traced back to the post-World War II generation of men. That is an important history to be told. In general, misandry—typically dressed down in the media in the tatters of bad jokes—has by now produced two generations of males born since 1975 who feel less than welcome at home, in the workplace, and especially at school.

This state of affairs is slowly coming into focus in our public collective sensibility even while the slack water of a turning tide has made it seem that things are at a standstill for men and boys. They are not. A movement is underway that is proactive. It is taking hold in colleges and universities, even as the enrollment of young men in college nationwide (now at about 39%, an all-time small proportion of male post-secondary students) continues to decrease. Significant spaces are opening up: men's centers where small groups of young males can meet informally to talk about what is important to them, their doubts and concerns, their hopes and aspirations.

Men's centers on college campuses are the place to work most effectively for boys and men. The students are at risk, but with our support they will lead us forward to a new generation of males, as exemplars and as fathers. They will be the next partners and friends, and will speak for men who have been silent for so long. Their influence on sons and young boys will help change the dismal literacy situation and emotional state in which so many of these young males currently find themselves.

This is a first report on such centers. Only four years ago the Men's Center for Leadership and Service was formed at St. John's University, in Minnesota, by Gar Kellom. Subsequently, with his steady guidance, a grant was secured from the Lily Endowment to sponsor two-year funded pilot projects at 14 colleges and universities. The results of these projects which focused on vocational discernment were published this summer in Engaging College Men: Discovering What Works and Why, edited by Kellom and Miles Groth, and published by the Men's Studies Press. This fall, Wagner College, one of the pilot project schools, opened a men's center on its campus on Staten Island, New York. It now serves as the model for such centers across the nation.

Within eight weeks of opening, the Wagner center gained the support of a benefactor. A designated gift has made possible the Theuer Men's Center at Wagner College. Thirty other schools are now considering implementing the Wagner model. The formula for establishing such a center is follows:

A faculty member identifies himself as a mentor for the college men at his institution. There is at least one such person on every campus just waiting to step out of the shadows and sponsor a men's center.

The faculty mentor gains the support of a visionary president.

A small core group of students known individually to the mentor are brought together. These boys invite other young men to sit in on the center's discussion group, which usually meets weekly. One of them takes on the role of managing the schedule of meetings. The faculty mentor meets individually with members of the cohort, but the group itself provides its own essential leadership. That is crucial.

In the second phase of establishing a men's center, the mentor works with the school's development and alumni relations offices to identify alumni/ae who would likely be in a position to fund the center for a two-year start-up period. The center is named after the benefactor. There will always be alumni with a son of college age or younger who are concerned about the deteriorating situation for men on college campuses: lack of a vital and engaging academic and co-curricular life, often a feeling of being unwelcome on campus. A target amount for a two-year period is $4,000 per academic year for a core group of 10-12.

Featuring the initiative in the institution's alumni/ae quarterly bulletin is effective in reaching out for further support. Coverage by the local newspaper brings attention to the college and to the situation college males now face. The biggest surprise is that most people are simply not aware of the situation as it is.

Let this be a call to readers to take part in helping establish a men's center on the college campus where you once studied or have a son in residence. The tide is rolling in for boys and men, and that means we are finally beginning to learn, not more about what males have done, but about their experience. Contrary to the standard view, this is unknown territory.

If you have not been in contact with your alma mater for a while, call or write to the officers in alumni relations and tell them that you would like to support a men's center on campus on the Wagner model. If you know a faculty member there who once made a difference in your life, contact him and invite him to be a mentor. Ask about the ratio of males to female now enrolled there.

If you have a son or grandson at college, ask him about his life there. He will have stories to tell about feelings of disengagement, even alienation from campus life. He may be among the few males on campus who are still engaged, but most of his friends are not. Ask him to identify a faculty member who is willing to work to establish a men's center. He will know such a person. These teachers stand out as being male-positive in their classes and on campus.

If you are on the faculty or staff at a college or university, bring this idea to your colleagues' attention. Many have been wading in the slack water, knowing what it coming to pass and waiting for news of others' interest in how boys and men are faring. In every case, it will be a challenging and rewarding experience. A lot is at stake here.

Next in this series, a description of the activities of a college men's center.

Godwin’s Law

March 17, 2023 | by Catreece Macleod | Link | Original Link

That’s right, we touch on it now and then, but no one wants to go all the way, so let’s just get it over with so we don’t have to deal with Nazi analogies ever again, okay?

Godwin’s Law

> From Wikipedia: Godwin’s law (or Godwin’s Rule of Nazi Analogies) is an Internet adage asserting that “As an online discussion grows longer, the probability of a comparison involving Nazis or Hitler approaches 1” — that is, if an online discussion (regardless of topic or scope) goes on long enough, sooner or later someone will compare someone or something to Hitler or Nazism.

Yes, we’re going there today. We’re going to compare feminism with Nazism and how this is both good and bad.

So let’s start with a simplified history lesson on these two movements, as they actually had somewhat comparable roots. It’s amazing how hate movements start off eerily similar to one another.

The Early Days

In the beginning, there was World War I, and thusly followed the Bitchslap of Versailles—a treaty to end the war that was basically one big clusterfuck of various treaties. Everyone was allied with everyone else, one tiny country’s dictator died—Archduke Franz Ferdinand—because he was a fuckwit who was assassinated and was sewn into his uniform that his doctor was afraid to cut open to perform surgery, so yeah … great starting point.

At Versailles, the French were pissy about the whole thing and tried to lay pretty much all the responsibility on Germany. Surprisingly, US President Woodrow Wilson was the voice of reason here. He basically said, “Whooooa, slow down, guys, what the fuck? No, seriously. What. The. Fuck. You don’t really want to do this, do you? This is going to fuck Germany over hardcore … you’re going to make a lot of innocent people suffer on petty vengeance, and it’s going to bite you in the ass.”

France’s reply was pretty much: “Non, ve simply vhant to slap zhem vith zhe velvet glove … filled with a brick” (except they did the overly cheesy French accent better than I can in text).

English Prime Minister David Lloyd George essentially said, “Oh, right-o thar, ol’ chap, can’t do, sorry, election year. The voters want blood and I want to be re-elected. You’re totally right, ol’ boy, but what can you do?” and went along with the bullshit anyway.

And yea, thusly, so did the Great Depression fuck over Germany even worse than everyone else. The currency at the time was literally falling so fast that a law was passed to pay workers twice a day in cash because the money wouldn’t be worth half as much by the next day. People had to cart out wheelbarrows full of money to buy bread because the paper the money was printed on was worth more than the money itself. Note that was wheelbarrow*s*, plural. Shit was crazy, yo.

And this is the environment out of which Nazism was born—one of excessive weakness, hatred, and fear. The government was falling apart, and political parties turned more into gangs than anything else … and the Nazis were one of the biggest gangs out there. Their methodology of getting elected was simply to have their political opponents "have mysterious accidents." Great guys, really. We know how it goes.

When they were the only stabilizing force around, people figured, "Hell, why not, may as well vote for them, they're the only assholes left."

With this the Nazis gained a great deal of political power, their violent streak, and a massive sense of entitlement à la "We deserve better than this bullshit. No, the world owes us better than this bullshit." These were the seeds of destruction, as we'll see in a moment.

So what happened with feminism? Where are its early roots? Didn't it just magically pop up in the 1970s?

No, no, it's been around a lot longer than that, I'm afraid. Closer to 150 years, actually, but there's a starting point here that's important—when it got its first big head of steam. Let's go back to 1914. World War I and the White Feather Campaign, overseen by one Mrs. Humphrey Ward, a well-known author at the time.

The White Feather Campaign took root in England and involved women attaching white feathers to men not in uniform in order to shame them into going off to die in the ditches of trench warfare. The women had no fear of being drafted, and shame was a wonderful tool to get the men to go off to war.

This was one of the first bits of entitlement that the movement displayed: the capacity for women to tell men what to do when they were at zero risk themselves. The men really were shamed, and did enlist, showing that women had the power to send men to their deaths with just a word and a feather. Women have no power? Women need no power—they had men to do shit for them.

In 1917, in the US, about 900,000 men were drafted for World War I, some as young as 18 years of age. They challenged it, said it was unconstitutional, and on January 17, 1918, the Supreme Court basically said, "Fuck you, you get to vote, so you have to fight. This is how this shit works"—despite the fact that the actual drafting age was lower than the age to vote, meaning boys who couldn't vote could get drafted because they could vote … except they couldn't. Right …

On June 4, 1920, women were given the right to vote too … sans the mandatory draft. Huh? So the only reason men are allowed to vote was because they could be killed off on a whim, but women are allowed to vote because … tits?

Seriously, American men could be sent to war at age 18 but could not vote until age 21, regardless that that was the excuse for why they were allowed to vote. It wasn't until June 22, 1970, that men finally got the right to vote at the same age they could be told to go kill themselves. Fun fun fun.

These were the seeds of entitlement from which the earliest branches of feminism sprung. Women's suffrage was based on the idea that women deserved to vote because they were women, but men deserved to vote because they paid for it in blood, except for the fact that men still paid with their blood without the right to vote, so it was kind of

Trust me, I'm all for women being able to vote. I rather like being able to vote myself, and without that movement, I couldn't. Except … I also stress that the reasoning for why women could vote, while men aged 18 to 21 couldn't, was absolute, total bullshit. Either everyone should have had the right to vote without being drafted or no one who couldn't be drafted should have had the right to vote.
Even today, men can still be drafted, and women can't, but men "pay" for their right to vote with the draft, and women "pay" for their right to vote with … erm … being female? Huh? Interdastingsk. Funny how feminism has no problems with that, and in fact, when men bring up that fact, they're told to shut the fuck up because it's not a real problem, despite being blatantly sexist.
Regardless, in both cases, both Nazism and feminism began from similar roots: violence toward others and a huge-assed entitlement complex.

Foothold

Getting a foothold is the crucial step for a hate movement. To garner any support, you have to provide something relevant to people. Something that makes them like you. Something that lets them point to all the good you've done, and to ignore the bad.
The Nazis pulled the German economy out of the shitter, built new roads, set up a powerful infrastructure, rebuilt Germany itself, held the Olympics, and sparked a sense of national pride with the whole Aryan race dealie by telling normal citizens that everyone was just jelly of the German master race, which is why they were trying to beat them down.
People just loooove to be told how awesome they are, and even more, they love scapegoats. Mmm, scapegoats … what better way to make people agree with you than to give them a common enemy, tell them they themselves are awesome, and hand them free stuff? It even lets people ignore that the Nazis got into power in the first place by murdering their political opponents! SWEET!
Hey … that sounds familiar …
Oh, right, because that's what feminism did, pretty much one for one. Even the murder. See, in the 1960s and 1970s, feminism wasn't exactly liked all that much. It was too radical, too violent, and too filled with hatred, and the normal average person could see that. It was pretty fucked-up shit, to be perfectly blunt. Even women didn't want anything to do with it for the most part.
And then Erin Pizzey started the first domestic violence shelter in the world. She realized quickly on that the women going there were often as violent as the men they were fleeing from, and she quickly traced the root back to violent family history. If you have violent parents, you're probably going to be violent too and seek out a violent partner. Who would'a thunk?
Well, obviously the feminists wouldn't'a thunk that at all. They were absolutely certain that it was only men who could be evil and vile or violent because … well, they were a hate movement. It's kind of their schtick.
Within a few short years, feminists realized that they needed some good PR, a common enemy, a way to tell women how awesome they were, and some example they could use to show they were being a benefit to society instead of a menace.

Oh, hey, that'sssss a nice domestic violence shelter system you have going there, Erin … it'd be a shame if anything were to … happen to it, if ya get my drift.
Yeah, they kicked Erin Pizzey out, and were violent as hell. They constantly harassed her, sent her death threats, and eventually assassinated her dog. The fuck? Yes, you heard me right. They murdered her dog as a warning to her to get the fuck outta Dodge. Nice people, those feminists. Friendly, loving, non-violent, especially toward their fellow woman!
And in return, they were rewarded with being able to lie to people by telling them that only men are violent (scapegoat), that women are angels who are oppressed (they're the only ones in need of domestic violence shelters), and that they're being useful to society (protecting those poor, battered women, ignoring the men in need entirely—after all, if we refuse to build shelters for them, we can point to how there are no men's shelters, so obviously they don't need them! Sweet deal, huh?).
Thus, the hate movement of feminism got its foot in the door, using pretty much the same core tactics as the Nazis had used—except that their scapegoat was men rather than Jews, and their good deed (although stolen) was domestic violence shelters instead of the Autobahn, and they instilled gender pride instead of racial or national pride.
Even from the start, feminism was about hatred toward men. This was a well-known fact at the time, and it wasn't until feminism applied coercion that it became well liked.
Silence
Your average German didn't know what was going on with the Nazis. They thought they were fighting back against people who had attacked them first. They thought that the Jews were simply being deported. They thought that they were fighting a just war, and that they were winning. They knew the average Nazi: they were friends and family, really nice, ordinary, regular people.
The thing is, management were total assholes.
There were only a few hundred Nazis who fucked the whole thing up for everyone. Keep that fact in mind. A few people at the top who put the orders in and a few assholes on the ground level who went along with it and were given the power to make anyone else back down the moment they questioned it. A small number who were corrupt and malicious to the core and who were absolutely certain that they were in the right and would change the face of the world.
They slipped their people into the higher ranks of the military and the government, quietly converted children throughout the schools and their youth group, and ousted any teachers who wouldn't teach their propaganda.
And in the end, it worked.
This is where feminism is right now. It's right behind the curtain, just barely out of earshot. The average feminist is a really nice, ordinary, regular person—your friends and family. They think they're fighting the good fight against tyranny and injustice.
The thing is, management are still total assholes.
There are only a few hundred to maybe a few thousand feminists who are truly rotten to the core, much like the Nazis, except that they're the ones calling the shots, also like the Nazis. They're the ones making the laws, publishing the horribly mangled studies, teaching bigotry in schools, and converting our youth to their cause, quietly slipping their own people into the upper echelons of society.

Much like the Nazis, feminists have removed teachers who don't agree with their narrative; most teachers in schools are women, and most of those are feminists now, especially in universities and colleges, and even more so in the human resources departments that handle disputes between students or faculty.
The average feminist is a good person fighting for what they believe is a good cause, but they've been lied to by a powerful propaganda machine. Any time they support feminism, they support those who create malicious laws, who break down the judicial system and due process, who reinforce bigotry and hatred.
"Not all feminists are like that." But enough of them are, and they're the ones in power.
"Of course they aren't." Not all Nazis were like that either. But enough of them were, and they were the ones in power.
The problem isn't that "Not All Feminists Are Like That" by any means—it's a silly notion. The problem is that the funding goes toward projects of hatred. The problem is that support goes toward vile acts and cruel deeds. The problem is that every time someone stands up for the average feminist, they're supporting the actions of the ones who are malicious by not holding them under scrutiny.
Right now, feminism is preparing for its concentration camps. It hasn't set them up yet, but it would absolutely love to, and is putting the pieces into place to make it a reality. And all the while, no one is able to say, "Wait, this is bullshit. What the fuck?" because, after all, Not All Feminists Are Like That.
Just the ones who matter are.

The Choir of Hate

You can't fight a war without soldiers. You can't have a hate movement unless it's supported by the general populace. You can't create acts of vast malice without complacency …
To the feminists who are reading this, take a look at what you've been supporting and tell me this is what you really want. These are the ones in charge, who make the laws, who power the movement, and who spend the money you support them with. Is this really who you want speaking for you?

The End

You may notice that these are big names are big—they’re senators, education administrators, authors, congresswomen, and bigots one and all.

You may wonder if the quotes are simply taken out of context; in their actual context, they’re actually far, far worse.

These are the people in power; these are the people who are the rotten 1% of feminism. They’re the only 1% who needs to be rotten because they’re the 1% who has both the power and the desire to abuse that power, and every claim of “Not All Feminists Are Like That” gives them another layer of immunity to criticism.

This is how a hate movement is formed. No one questions it, everyone makes excuses for the ones in power, and everyone feels they’re doing the “right thing” by traveling down the slippery slope in the name of justice and to help the underdog.

Remember, Nazi Germany was the underdog. They were the ones who were crippled and weak, and they used that to leverage their people into backing them with the promise of a better future.

Feminism has taken the same road, using the same tactics to cover up that it’s a hate movement at its core.

Godwin’s law only applies if there isn’t an actual direct correlation.

We let the Nazi war machine free because no one would stop it. No one would decry it. No one would stand up and say, “This is fucking bullshit, what the fuck!?” They were silenced with shame, by overt removal, or simply “disappeared.”

The first two of these are already in place: mansplaining and removing people from college and university campuses. We’re not too far away from the third—they just need to erode due process a little more on the rape laws and then they’ll be able to disappear any man they want to on a whim. No questions asked, no answers given, merely an accusation is all that will be required. If you think that’s impossible, check the laws—we’re almost there already.

I’ve already covered how feminism hurts women in other articles, but this is more important than how it affects me personally. This is how it affects everyone, both men and women together.

Remember, the average German, hell, even the average Nazi, was a pretty good person. They believed in what they thought was a just cause, following along blindly as the wool of propaganda was pulled over their eyes time and again. They knew that the hatred was there, lurking at the corners of their vision, but they let it slide.

The average woman and the average feminist are still good people who honestly believe they’ve been supporting a just cause. We simply can’t afford to ignore the hatred we see now, skulking in the shadows, in our peripheral vision. We need to direct the spotlight of criticism harshly upon it so it can wither and die in the light rather than make excuses for the vileness and protect that malice with a wall of average feminist human shields.

If we don't put an end to this now, and embrace actual egalitarianism fast rather than feed this hate group … well, there's a poem that describes this all too well. You may have even heard it before.

Feminism: The Political Wing of Female Narcissism

March 19, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Middle Ages Europe is widely considered the birthplace of 'protofeminism' – the forerunner to modern feminism. At that time a chaplain named Andreas Capellanus, whom we might consider the first antifeminist and 'MGTOW' of the period, wrote a book describing the escalating problem of female avarice, manipulativeness, narcissism, underserved sense of entitlement, and hypergamy. Interestingly, Andreas links all these problems with the birth of courtly love – the subject of his book – and recommends all men learn to reject romantic relationships with women and "trample under your foot all of its rules."

While the piece is written in anger at the emerging gynocentric culture, it contains truths that echo much of what MGTOW are reacting to today – in particular the world's encouragement, protection and enforcement of female hypergamy. The following is an excerpt from Capellanus' amazing work. PW

The Art of Courtly Love
By Andreas Capellanus (1174)

The mutual love which you seek in women you cannot find, for no woman ever loved a man or could bind herself to a lover in the mutual bonds of love. For a woman's desire is to get rich through love, but not to give her lover the solaces that please him. Nobody ought to wonder at this, because it is natural. According to the nature of their sex all women are spotted with the vice of a grasping and avaricious disposition, and they are always alert and devoted to the search for money or profit. I have travelled through a great many parts of the world, and although I made careful inquiries I could never find a man who would say that he had discovered a woman who, if a thing was not offered to her, would not demand it insistently and would not hold off from falling in love unless she got rich gifts in one way or another. But even though you have given a woman innumerable presents, if she discovers that you are less attentive about giving her things than you used to be, or if she learns that you have lost your money, she will treat like a perfect stranger who has come from some other country, and everything you do will bore her or annoy her. You cannot find a woman who will love you so much or be so constant to you that if somebody else comes to her and offers her presents she will be faithful to her love.

Women have so much avarice that generous gifts break down all the barriers of their virtue. If you come with open hands, no women will let you go away without that which you seek; while if you don't promise to give them a great deal, you needn't come to them and ask for anything. Even if you are distinguished by royal honors, but bring no gifts with you, you will get absolutely nothing from them; you will be turned away from their doors in shame. Because of their avarice all women are thieves, and we say they carry purses. You cannot find a woman of such lofty station or blessed with such honor or wealth that an offer of money will not break down her virtue, and there is no man, no matter how disgraced and low-born he is, who cannot seduce her if he has great wealth. This is so because no woman ever has enough money – just as no drunkard ever thinks he has had enough to drink. Even if the whole earth and sea were turned to gold, they could hardly satisfy that avarice of a woman.

Furthermore, not only is every woman by nature a miser, but she is also envious and a slanderer of other women, greedy, a slave to her belly, inconstant, fickle in her speech, disobedient and impatient of restraint, spotted with the sin of pride and desirous of vainglory, a liar, a drunkard, a babbler, no keeper of secrets, too much given to wantonness, prone to every evil, and never loving any man in her heart.

Now woman is a miser, because there isn't a wickedness in the world that men can think of that she will not boldly indulge in for the sake of money, and, even if she has an abundance she will not help anyone who is in need. You can more easily scratch a diamond with your fingernail than you can by any human ingenuity get a woman to consent to giving you any of her savings. Just as Epicurus believed that the highest good lay in serving the belly, so a woman thinks that the only things worth while in this world are riches and holding on to what she has. You can't find any woman so simple and foolish that she is unable to look out for her own property with a greedy tenacity, and with great mental subtlety get hold of the possessions of someone else. Indeed, even a simple woman is more careful about selling a single hen than the wisest lawyer is in deeding away a great castle. Furthermore, no woman is ever so violently in love with a man that she will not devote all her efforts to using up his property. You will find that this rule never fails and admits of no exceptions.

That every woman is envious is also found to be a general rule, because a woman is always consumed with jealousy over another woman's beauty, and she loses all her pleasure in what she has. Even if she knows that it is the beauty of her own daughter that is being praised, she can hardly avoid being tortured by hidden envy. Even the neediness and the great poverty of the neighbour women seem to her abundant in wealth and riches, so that we think of the old proverb which says, "the crop in the neighbour's field is always more fertile, and your neighbour's cow has a larger udder," seems to refer to the female sex without question. It can hardly come to pass that one woman will praise the good character or the beauty of another, and if she should happen to do so, the next minute she adds some qualification that undoes all she has said in her praise.

And so it follows that woman is a slanderer, because slander can only spring from envy and hate. That is a rule that women do not want to break; she prefers to keep it unbroken. It is not easy to find a woman whose tongue can ever spare anybody or who can keep from words of detraction. Every woman thinks that by running down others she adds to her own praise and increases her own reputation – a fact which shows very clearly to everybody that women have very little sense. For all men agree to hold it as a general rule that words of dispraise only hurt the person who utters them, and they detract from the esteem in which he is held; but no woman on this account keeps from speaking evil and attacking the reputation of good people, and so I think we can insist that no woman is really wise. Qualities that a wise man has are wholly foreign to a woman, because she believes, without thinking, everything she hears, and she is very free about insisting on being praised, and she does a great many other unwise things which it would be tedious for me to enumerate.

The feminine sex is also commonly tainted by arrogance, for a woman, when incited by that, cannot keep her keep her tongue or her hands from crimes or abuse, but in her anger she commits all sorts of outrages. Moreover, if anybody tries to restrain an angry woman, he will tire himself out with a vain labor, for you cannot keep her from her evil designs or soften her arrogance of soul. Any woman is incited to wrath by a mild enough remark of little significance and indeed at times by nothing at all; and her arrogance grows to tremendous proportions; and as far as I can recall no one ever saw a woman who could restrain it.

Furthermore every woman seems to despise all other women – a thing which we know comes from pride. No person could despise another unless he looked down upon him because of pride. Besides, every woman, not only a young one but even the old and decrepit, strives with all her might to exalt her own beauty; this can come only from pride, as the wise man said very clearly when he said, “There is arrogance in everybody and pride follows beauty.” Therefore it is perfectly clear that women can never have perfectly good characters, because, as they say, “A remarkable character is soiled by an admixture of pride.”

Every woman is also loud-mouthed, since no one of them can keep her tongue from abuses, and even if she loses a single egg she will keep up a clamor all day like a barking dog, and she will disturb the whole neighbourhood over a trifle. When she is with other women, no one of them will give the others a chance to speak, but each always tries to be the one to say whatever is to be said and to keep on talking longer than the rest; and neither her tongue nor her spirit ever gets tired of talking. A woman will boldly contradict everything you say, and she can never agree with anything, but she always tries to give her opinion on every subject.

No woman is attached to her lover or bound to her husband with such pure devotion that she will not accept another lover, especially if a rich one comes along, which shows the wantonness as well as the great avarice of a woman. There isn’t a woman in this world so constant and so bound by pledges that, if a lover of pleasures comes along and with skill and persistence invites her to the joys of love, she will reject his entreaties – at any rate if he does a good deal of urging. No woman is an exception to this rule either. So you can see what we ought to think of a woman who is in fortunate circumstances and is blessed with an honourable lover or the finest of husbands, and yet lusts after some other man.

But that is precisely what women do who are too much troubled with wantonness.

Indeed, a woman does not love a man with her whole heart, because there is not one of them who keeps faith with her husband or her lover; when another man comes along, you will find that her faithfulness wavers. For a woman cannot refuse gold or silver or any other gifts that are offered her, nor can she on that account deny the solaces of her body when they are asked for. But since the woman knows that nothing so distresses her lover as to have her grant these to some other man, you can see how much affection she has for a man when, out of greed for gold or silver, she will give herself to a stranger or a foreigner and has no shame about upsetting her lover so completely and shattering the jewel of her own good faith. Moreover, no woman has such strong bond of affection for a lover that if he ceases to woo her with presents she will not become luke-warm about her customary solaces and quickly become like a stranger to him.

Avoid love and trample under foot all of its rules:

It doesn't seem proper, therefore, for any prudent man to fall in love with any woman, because she never keeps faith with any man. Everybody knows that she ought to be spurned for the innumerable weighty reasons already given. Therefore it is not advisable, my respected friend, for you to waste your days on love, which for all the reasons already given we agree ought to be condemned. For if it deprives you of the grace of the Heavenly King, and costs you every real friend, and it takes away all the honors of this world as well as every breath of praiseworthy reputation, and greedily swallows up all your wealth, and is followed by every sort of evil. As has already been said, why should you, like a fool, seek for love, or what good can you get from it that will repay you for all these disadvantages? That which above all you seek in love – the joy of having your love returned – you can never obtain, as we have already shown, no matter how hard you try, because no woman ever returns a man's love. Therefore if you will examine carefully all the things that go to make up love, you will see clearly that there are conclusive reasons why a man is bound to avoid it with all his might and to trample under foot all its rules.

If you will study carefully this little treatise of ours and understand it completely and practice what it teaches, you will see clearly that no man ought to mis-spend his days in the pleasures of love. If you abstain from it, the Heavenly King will be more favorably disposed toward you in every respect, and you will be worthy to have all prosperous success in this world and to fulfill all praiseworthy deeds and the honorable desires of your heart, and in the world to come to have glory and life everlasting.

The Art of Courtly Love, by Andreas Capellanus, written in 1174, Translated by John Parry in 1941; Excerpt is from pp. 200-211

? Image at top of this article shows a golden casket from the Middle Ages depicting scenes of servile male behaviour typical of the emerging culture of courtly love. Such objects were given to women as gifts by men seeking to impress. (Note the woman standing with hands on hips in a position of authority, and the man in blue being led

Waking to woke

March 20, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Woke is a widely-used adjective and is generally understood to involve supporting or believing in various notions that are widely accepted among social justice warriors. People who consider themselves woke generally:

- Consider themselves to be left-wing
- Support identity politics
- Support feminism
- Believe in rape culture
- Believe in male privilege
- Believe that street harassment is a serious problem
- Believe in cultural appropriation
- Favour strong limitations on free speech
- Favour diversity over merit

Contrast this to dictionary Definitions:

Oxford English Dictionary

> woke, adjective: Originally: well-informed, up-to-date. Now chiefly: alert to racial or social discrimination and injustice; frequently in stay woke > aware of and actively attentive to important societal facts and issues (especially issues of racial and social justice)

Other Definitions

Crikey, an Australian web site now supportive of woke, offers definitions used by those that support and those that oppose it:

Support

> "[T]o be informed, educated on and aware of social injustices".

Oppose

> "[T]o be overly politically correct and to police other's words".

The Ptolemys – a soap opera

March 21, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Almost everyone has heard of Cleopatra and Marc Antony. They fought against Octavian for control of what would soon be the Roman Empire after the death of Julius Caesar. They lost to Octavian. Shakespeare wrote a play about it.

But there is so much more to the story. Cleopatra was a descendent of Ptolemy I, one of Alexander the Great's generals. Ptolemy was left in charge of Egypt by Alexander and eventually founded a dynasty that ruled over the land for 275 years. The Ptolemys weren't very inventive when it came to names. The names Ptolemy, Benenice, Arsinoe and Cleopatra feature prominently among family members.

At the time of the conflict with Octavian Cleopatra was Pharaoh of Egypt. The preceding three decades was a story worthy of popular TV series Game of Thrones. I like to call it The Ptolomys – A Soap Opera.

Ptolemy XII was deposed by the Egyptian people and fled to Rome. His eldest daughter Berenice IV then seized the throne. I'm sure the Egyptians didn't rise up to replace one member of the Ptolemaic dynasty with another. With Roman assistance Ptolemy XII was able to return to Egypt and retake the throne. He then had his daughter Berenice executed. Ptolemy XII then named his young son Ptolemy XIII and another daughter Cleopatra VII as joint heirs to the throne of Egypt. Cleopatra VII is of course the woman known today simply by the mononym Cleopatra. Young Ptolemy was married to his sister Cleopatra as was the custom among pharaohs. Gradually Cleopatra's power grew over that of Ptolemy, with her face appearing on coins and his being omitted from official documents. Ptolemy and his supporters ultimately decided to dispose of his rival. They managed to get Cleopatra to flee the country.

At this point another of Ptolemy's sisters, Arsinoe IV, asserted a claim on the throne of Egypt. Julius Caesar arrived in Egypt as a result of events occurring in the Roman Civil War going on at the time. Cleopatra returned to Egypt and was famously able to have herself carried in to Caesar's room in a rolled up carpet. The carpet was unfurled and Cleopatra appeared – or so the legend goes. This scene is of course so dramatic that it's virtually always represented in recreations of the story. Caesar and Cleopatra entered in to a relationship around this time and she would later bear him a son, Caesarion.

At this point Ptolemy allied with Arsinoe against Cleopatra and Julius Caesar. The two sides fought over the Egyptian capital of Alexandria, seriously damaging the city. Ultimately the arrival of Roman reinforcements turned the tide. Ptolemy fled but history records that he ignominious drowned in the Nile. Arsinoe was exiled to live out her days in a religious temple after Caesar was pressured to keep her alive by power figures in Rome.

It wasn't to be though. After the death of Julius Caesar, Cleopatra took up with Marc Antony. Antony later had Arsinoe murdered at the request of Cleopatra.

Marc Antony and Cleopatra then went on to fight Octavian in yet another Roman civil war. They lost. It was a naval battle and, notably, Cleopatra fled with her fleet. Antony, on his flagship, saw her leave. History claims he jumped overboard, swam to a smaller, faster ship and followed her. With Antony and Cleopatra gone their remaining forces capitulated. Octavian had won.

Antony took his own life while Cleopatra was captured by Octavian. She also later took her own life.

What we see here is typical of history. Powerful men and women in an aristocratic family fighting other families and amongst themselves. Hardly the story feminists tell us of the perpetual oppression of women throughout history. Feminists will try to claim that the occasional woman could cut through the Patriarchy and rise in to a position of power, but they weren't occasional. Powerful women feature prominently throughout the historical record. What history shows is that social class and wealth mattered a lot more than gender when it came to power and influence.

Raising free sons and their sisters

Recognizing a problem is only the first step; second is finding a solution. Across nations and demographics, men and boys are suffering and finding the support they need sadly lacking. That is the problem the Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is working to resolve, and there are solutions already within our grasp. More fundamentally important, however, is changing the core fabric of behavior that has given rise to the problems faced by men. That will start with men embracing their human rights and casting off the shackles of expectations that for generations have driven them to self-destruction.

It is a frightening prospect, embracing a new and different future, and one that for many will have to begin in childhood. It is a parent's duty to prepare their children for adulthood, and now we have to begin raising our sons to believe in themselves as something more than a utility. It is a challenge every right-minded parent must face: how to raise your son free of the restraints of traditional gynocentric masculinity, proud of himself as a male and ready to live as an equal to all his peers. In other words, to raise him to naturally be the man every (male) MHRA strives to be.

At present, these traits, when adopted, serve as defense against society's misandry, ways for men to remain strong and confident under the pressure heaped upon them, but one day they will be the new normal when a healthier worldview of masculinity is at last entered into the mainstream. Until then, boys raised to be free and happy will serve as the vanguard, changing the boundaries of what is expected of men and of what men will tolerate being done to them.

Becoming capable of and able to raise free sons will be one of the core outcomes of the MHRM, but that alone will not achieve the equality so dearly hoped for. If nothing else changes, new generations of free men will have no recourse except to become Men Going Their Own Way. They will respect themselves, but if women and society do not, then they will find no comfort in joining that society. Stepping away will be the only sane option. Society, though, is the product of its members' beliefs, and raising sons to respect themselves is only half the battle. The greater challenge will be raising their sisters to support them. MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way) as social comment and protest is a vital part of the MRHM, and for many men it will be their lifelong path, but the final goal must be to get men to a place where they feel safe and empowered to have functional relationships and to build lasting families.

Doing so will require a new breed of woman. Our free sons need partners, and it is up to the parents of today to start raising them, women who love and respect men as human beings and take real responsibility for their actions and desires. A large part of parenting is instinct, and making conscious decisions about it is never easy, but in this case it is an even greater challenge. Much of the modern male-female dynamic is dictated by ancient, deeply ingrained beliefs and habits. These were often necessary for survival in bygone ages but are now obsolete. For many people this will mean raising their sons and daughters to act in ways they themselves do not.

In some ways the raising of a new generation of daughters will be more important to our sons than the raising of the sons themselves. Pending the creation of an artificial womb, women will continue to be the gatekeepers of reproduction by virtue of biology, so men will continue to conform, to varying degrees, to women's expectations in order to mate. It is those expectations that must be changed, or ideally removed altogether so men are free to live as they see fit and still find love and affection from, and not just for, the women around them.

There is a term popular among MGTOWs: NAWALT, meaning Not All Women Are Like That. Originally a strawman defense used by anti-MHRAs, the word NAWALT is now used by itself to refer to the hypothetical "good woman." In reality it is true that not all women are like that, but such status needs to leave the company of unicorns and leprechaun gold. It needs to become common, even normal, so new generations of self-actualized men will have partners to stand beside them. Just as if men had en masse resisted feminism, women have more than enough clout to staunchly stall the MHRM, but MGTOWs are making the statement that that won't be enough; men will drop out entirely rather than put up with any more of society's hatred. Eventually something will have to give.

The ball, then, is in women's court, but they don't need to be activists and they don't need to change themselves. Hell, the current generation (women and men alike) might be incapable of truly realizing equality, but in the future, in the next generation or the one after, girls can be raised to expect as much of themselves as of men and to truly be not like that. Men are ready to cast off their burdens, but they need to know there will still be love waiting for them when they do. If equality is to last, they need to know that if such burdens ever need to be carried again they won't be doing so alone this time. That's not the case now, but if the MHRM has any legacy, it will be the education of a generation where it is.

So raise your sons well. Mothers and fathers, raise your sons to be free and strong, and raise your daughters to love them for it.

Alive! See A man Shrinking Before Your Very Eyes

March 23, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Long before CGI, humans being menaced by giant creatures they had previously dwarfed had great cinematic allure. In particular, the 1950's were rife with science fiction films involving tiny creatures grown gigantic. To wit:

YEAR	CREATURE(S)	TITLE
1954	Ant	Them!
1956	Tarantula	Tarantula
1957	Scorpion	The Black Scorpion
1957	Grasshopper	Beginning of the End
1957	Praying mantis	The Deadly Mantis
1958	Spider	Earth vs. the Spider
1958	Wasp	Monster From Green Hell
1959	Leech	Attack of the Giant Leeches

Since human disgust with creepy-crawlies appears to be instinctive (consider the Insect Fear Film Festival held every year since 1984 on the campus of the University of Illinois at Urbana-Champaign), it is only logical that giant creepy-crawlies would send the fear factor into overdrive, thus assuring a B movie bonanza.

Obviously, the aforementioned movies are hardly the stuff of Oscar nominations. But one such movie has achieved a rare status – and it has great implications for the manosphere, even though it came out long before anyone ever heard of the manosphere. In fact, it is a pop cultural touchstone from that dreaded decade of patriarchy – the 1950's!

Perhaps the best known scene in The Incredible Shrinking Man is a battle between the shrunken protagonist and a normal size tarantula; in effect, a giant tarantula. Given its title, the film would certainly look fitting on the marquee of a drive-in theater in 1957, the year of its release. In fact, it could have been offered up in a double feature with a number of other lurid 1957 titles (e.g., I Was a Teenage Werewolf, Attack of the Crab Monsters, The Amazing Colossal Man, and, believe it or not, a proto-female empowerment tale, The Saga of the Viking Women and Their Voyage to the Waters of the Great Sea Serpent).

Despite its title, The Incredible Shrinking Man went from B-movie stigma to A-list status. In 2009 it was inducted into the National Film Registry, a repository for "culturally, historically, or aesthetically" distinguished movies.

Based on "The Shrinking Man," a 1956 story idea by Richard Matheson (who also wrote a novel based on the screenplay, which he co-authored), the film has a deceptively simple concept: Scott Carey (Grant Williams), a normal-sized adult male starts growing smaller. While shrinkage is a longstanding male fear, it is usually restricted to the genitalia. The protagonist of this film grows smaller but his body remains in proportion.

Shrinking humans was not an entirely new cinematic concept (e.g., The Bride of Frankenstein in 1935 and Dr. Cyclops in 1940). After 1957, the shrinking of humans continued in Honey, I Shrunk the Kids (1989) and Downsizing (2017). But once the subjects had shrunk to a certain size, the process stopped. Not so with the 1957 shrinking man. Scott Carey continues shrinking away to…microbe size? Virus size? Molecule size? Atom size? Subatomic particle size?

While atomic radiation was the usual explanation offered for gross size disparities in 50's films, Shrinking Man wisely bypasses this cliché. Rather, Scott Carey starts to get smaller after an encounter with a mysterious fogbank and it is determined that his molecular structure has been rearranged. Actually, the cause really isn't important. It's just a springboard for the plot of the movie, filled with challenges and perils that Scott must face as he grows smaller – not to mention ample opportunities for trick photography.

Scott first notices that his clothing has become baggy – an experience any dieter might welcome – but Scott hasn't been trying to lose weight. He shrinks to the size of a midget, then to the size of a dollhouse occupant, and finally down to the size of a fly, at which point he encounters the predatory tarantula. (Fun fact: Director Jack Arnold had directed Tarantula the year before, so he is likely the only director in cinema history with two movies featuring a giant tarantula!)

Much like The Invasion of the Body Snatchers, another 50's science fiction classic that was inducted into the National Film Registry, the film invites a number of interpretations, and those interpretations may change depending on the era when the viewer sees the film. Consequently, the film has a resonance today that it didn't have when it was first released.

In 1957 contemporaneous interpretations might have been the loss of autonomy in a mass society. Possibly a "shrinking" of rights and freedoms in a society growing more and more oppressive, whether capitalist, fascist, or communist. 1957 was also the year of Sputnik, so the beginning of space exploration might have drawn attention to man's undeniably puny presence in the universe. Then as now, it could be interpreted as a man wasting away while battling a disease with no hope for a cure. One topic that was not hot back then was feminism.

In 1957 Betty Friedan began working on a project that resulted in The Feminine Mystique, eventually published in 1963. So when Shrinking Man arrived on motion picture screens, the second wave of feminism was gestating, but the pregnancy hadn't started to show. It was still OK for a man to be a man, however you interpret that. It may have been a nod to the sacrifices made by World War II vets, or perhaps a realization that prosecuting the cold war necessitated the maintenance of traditional masculinity. At any rate, men and masculinity, in reality or as concepts, were not under siege.

Of course, that started to change during the 1960's. Then it became possible to interpret the shrinking man of the movie as a loss of status vis-à-vis his wife (who becomes relatively larger simply by remaining the same size). Scott's presence in his household shrinks along with his body – as do his place in society and in the world.

Today, as manhood is mocked, as testosterone levels plummet, as calls for equity grow louder and louder, The Incredible Shrinking Man achieves more and more significance. It's not too much of a stretch to add race to the mixture, since Scott, though portrayed as an everyman, is undeniably WASPy.

Oddly enough, this science fiction movie about a man wasting away to nothing could be a nod to existentialism. Sartre's seminal work, Being and Nothingness, could almost be a subtitle for The Incredible Shrinking Man. So could No Exit, a play by the same author. It is entirely possible that Richard Matheson (born in 1926) was familiar with the aforementioned works, as they were written in the early 1940's.

With no hope offered for stopping or reversing the shrinking, the film could have ended on a decidedly downbeat note. Normally, when offered a sympathetic protagonist, viewers expect to see him triumph. Instead, we are given a soliloquy worthy of Hamlet:

> I was continuing to shrink, to become…what? The infinitesimal? What was I? Still a human being? … So close, the infinitesimal and the infinite. But suddenly I knew they were really the two ends of the same concept. The unbelievably small and the unbelievably vast eventually meet, like the closing of a gigantic circle. I > looked up, as if somehow I would grasp the heavens, the universe, worlds beyond number. God's silver tapestry spread across the night. And in that moment I knew the answer to the riddle of the infinite. I had thought in terms of Man's own limited dimension. I had presumed upon Nature. That existence begins and ends is Man's conception, not Nature's. And I felt my body dwindling, melting, becoming nothing. My fears melted away and in their place came acceptance. All this vast majesty of creation, it had to mean something. And then I meant something too. Yes, smaller than the smallest, I meant something too. To God, there is no zero. I still exist.

Well, you can imagine moviegoers at drive-ins scratching their heads in confusion after returning the in-car speaker to its post and driving out of the theater. The usual mainstream movie ends with a restoration of order, no matter how much chaos is portrayed in the film.

A conventional ending for Shrinking Man would have restored Scott to his original size (indeed, such an ending was under serious consideration) yet with having changed for the better after surviving his ordeal. The ending as it stands is a curious one. Scott Carey has survived all the ordeals he faced, but so what? His quasi-religious awakening may offer solace but it won't stop the process. So what's the meaning of the ending for men today?

Let's assume that men are not going to be restored to their rightful place in society any more than the Scott is going to stop shrinking and grow larger. Do men have to accept their situation as inevitable, as Scott does in the final scene? Scott no longer has a place in society but that doesn't mean his life is meaningless. It's not that Scott goes MGTOW – he has no choice. Given the reality of his situation, he might as well commit suicide by tarantula. Yet his will to live has not shrunk. In fact, the smaller he gets, the more gets in touch with his primal instincts, the drive to live, the drive to triumph over adversity. Arguably, he is more alive than he was in his "normal" existence.

So the lesson for men is this: If you don't have a place at the table in society, you still have one at the table of life. And your table setting is secure no matter how big or small you are. So even if you've been dismissed as a misogynistic patriarchal troglodyte – even if you are unvaxxed! – you are still alive.

If you think these are dark days for men, perhaps you can take heart from The Incredible Shrinking Man. No matter what the academics, the mass media, and the government say, as long as you draw breath, you still count for something.

Seven Brides For ~~Seven~~ Eight Brothers

March 25, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

The recent referendum (albeit, non-binding) about admitting trans women to Wellesley College ended predictably. To put it bluntly, the voters overwhelmingly approved admitting chicks with dicks. Paula Johnson, the President of the college, demurred, upholding the school's official status as a woman's college. Since she identifies as a black woman (you might doubt it if you Google her and look at her picture), she probably won't face calls to resign.

Well, playing the parlor game of whataboutism, one can imagine the outcry if some administrator at a men's college doubled-down on its policy of admitting only "those assigned male at birth." In truth, chances are slight that anything would happen. That's because aside from a few religious colleges the four-year men's college is all but extinct. Only four are left, and realistically only two.

Saint John's University in Collegeville, Minnesota bills itself as a men's college but it has a cozy relationship with a sister school, the college of St. Benedict. How cozy is it? The students are referred to as Johnnies and Bennies.

Morehouse College has a similar relationship with Spelman College. Both are in Atlanta and both are HBCUs, or Historically Black Colleges and Universities. Much to my surprise, I discovered that the acronym HWCU stands for Historically White Colleges and Universities. Obviously, this could be a source of confusion for anyone who assumes it means Historically Women's Colleges and Universities.

If you are looking for a real old-school men's college, you are limited to two: Wabash College in Crawfordsville, Indiana, or Hampden-Sydney College in Hampden Sydney (the college is hyphenated, the town is not…go figure),Virginia. At any rate, these two institutions account for less than 2,000 men out of more than 6,000,000 college men enrolled in college in the United States.

Hard to believe, but once upon a time, colleges and universities were strictly single-sex. The first school that was coed from its founding was Oberlin College, in the town of the same name, in Ohio in 1834. Over time more and more male-only schools began to admit women. Still, as late as the 1960's, there was an ample supply of all-male schools for men who preferred such – and they were not all religious or military-related. In fact, some of them were at the top of the academic food chain.

For example, if you were an elite male student and wanted to apply to an Ivy League school, you could go to a men's school (Brown, Columbia, Dartmouth, Harvard, Princeton, Yale) or a coeducational school (Cornell or Penn). Brown, Columbia, and Harvard deserve an asterisk, however, as they had working relationships with adjacent female colleges (Pembroke, Barnard, and Radcliffe, respectively) and women could sign up for classes at their respective male counterpart schools.

If you were an elite female student and wanted to attend a women's college, you could apply to one or more of the Seven Sisters (Barnard, Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, Radcliffe, Smith, Vassar, or Wellesley) colleges, all of which are in the northeast, pretty much within the same geographic footprint as the Ivy League schools. Though the school colors varied, bluestockings were prevalent at all Seven Sisters.

I'm not sure why Pembroke was never considered one of the Seven Sisters. It was all but part of Brown and there are eight Ivy League schools so it would seem only natural to select eight women's schools as complements. Maybe it was just some manifestation of the Mean Girls syndrome on an institutional level. Or maybe they just miscounted. Rumor has it girls aren't good at math. In a way it's appropriate, as the battle of the sexes has always been asymmetrical warfare.

Both the Seven Sisters and the Ivy League had much in common, drawing their students from upper-crust private schools as well as the upper echelons of public and parochial schools. While Ivy League boys might have deigned to date and even marry girls from lesser colleges (or no college at all!), elite women would settle for nothing less than elite men. Hypergamy dictated that no Seven Sisters girl would be caught dead dating some sod from Stumpjump State A&M!

At male schools weekend road trips to girls' colleges were something of a rite of passage for many a male collegian. Remember the movie Animal House? One of the funniest scenes in the movie is when Otter (Richard Matheson), Boon (Peter Riegert), Pinto (Thomas Hulce), and Dorfman (Stephen Furst) make a road trip to a fictional girl's school named Emily Dickinson University, likely modeled after her alma mater, Mount Holyoke, a favorite Dartmouth destination back in the day.

Advising his mates on the best way to pick up liberal New England college girls, Otter advises, "Just mention modern art, civil rights, or folk music and you're in like Flynn." Of course, that was a few generations ago. Today DEI, trans rights, and climate change might be the hot topics.

The point is probably moot, as I suspect that road trips have gone the way of the raccoon coat and the freshman beanie. Since masculinity is unpopular on coed campuses, I shudder to think of the atmosphere on women's campuses. Remember, Animal House took place in 1962. That era is as dead as JFK's New Frontier. Nevertheless, the film has been placed in the Library of Congress's National Film Registry for "culturally, historically, or aesthetically significant" motion pictures. Who would have foreseen that when the film was released in 1978?

FUN FACTS: Donald Sutherland, who plays an English teacher in the film, was paid $50,000 for two days of work. Good money even today, yet if he had taken the percentage offered him instead of a salary, he would have made $17,000,000. Filmed for $3,000,000, Animal House grossed more than $141,000,000. It was the most profitable comedy in film history till Ghostbusters came along in 1984.

The Animal House screenwriters drew heavily upon their college experiences. In fact, if you want a real eye-opening read, look for The Real Animal House by Dartmouth alum Chris Miller (Class of 1963), one of the scriptwriters, the original Pinto at Alpha Delta Phi.

Dartmouth students were once known as the “Animals of the Ivy League,” and the escapades in the movie are tame indeed compared to what’s in the book! Yet a decade after the movie takes place, Dartmouth went coed. Recently the powers that be at Dartmouth announced that they had named Sian Leah Beilock the school’s first-ever female President! What would Bluto (John Belushi) say?

What Bluto didn’t know in 1962 was that the second wave of feminism was about to wash over the nation. As a result, the cracks started to appear in the foundation of male-only institutions. One by one, the academic man caves caved in. Harvard absorbed Radcliffe, Brown absorbed Pembroke. In a sense, they were just making it legal since the couples had been shacked up for decades. But when Yale and Princeton started to admit women in 1969, it was obvious the situation was serious.

Colleges and universities were much more “masculine” before second-wave feminism. Women going to college was acceptable, in some circles even desirable, but not mandatory. It was widely assumed that the main benefit of a woman going to college was to meet desirable men. In fact, there was a phrase for it: getting a Mrs. Degree. Of course, that was when the prime marriage age for women was much lower than today – and since men outnumbered women on campus, the women could be choosy.

After World War II, thousands of veterans, taking advantage of the G.I. Bill, flooded colleges and universities. As for college men who were too young to participate in World War II, there was a military draft. Given Korea, Vietnam, and the possibility of American intervention in other trouble spots, a student deferment was reason enough for a young man to enroll in college even if he had no particular course of study in mind. As the old joke goes”

> Q. What did you take up in college?
> A. Space.

College tuition and interest rates on student loans were relatively affordable in those days so the financial burden was much lighter and well worth a four-year postponement of draft eligibility. But the admission of G.I. bill students and high school grads interested only in a draft deferment had placed a strain on the higher educational system.

As the demand for a college education was outstripping the supply, high school slackers were warned about the “closing college door.” At the same time a college education became more important. In truth, a high school diploma didn’t mean what it used to in the days when many students dropped out after eighth grade and entered the job market.

The G.I. Bill students eventually finished their studies and entered the job market. In 1973 the draft was abolished. If draft-avoidance was a man’s sole reason for going to college, that reason no longer existed. So a drop in male participation was to be expected.

Another game-changer came along in 1960 when the birth control pill was introduced. Once women started taking the pill, a future birth dearth was assured, affecting the number of prospective college students in the next generation. Long before the effects of the pill were felt, administrators of men's colleges could see that it was in their self-interest to go coeducational. If the number of boys in high schools went down, the number of men in the pipeline to college would go down. Consequently, elite schools would be hard-pressed to maintain both enrollment rates and high standards. Having expanded their institutions to accommodate greater demand in the post-war environment, it was foreseeable that the pool of applicants would decrease in the near future.

Much like professional sports teams or movie theater chains, colleges have to put butts in seats if they are going to survive. The men's colleges had three options:

1. Lower standards and admit lesser applicants to maintain class size.
2. Admit fewer but better applicants and bear the loss of tuition revenue.
3. Widen the pool of applicants by accepting women.

Only Option 3 assured that academic standards and class sizes would be maintained. Of course, going coed presented logistical challenges, such as dormitory space and restrooms. Since Title IX was enacted in 1972 it has been a recurring headache, causing some schools to cancel men's sports teams so they don't outstrip the number of women's sports teams. These were not existential threats, however. Declining enrollment and plummeting standards certainly were.

Exhibit A is Columbia University. In the early 1980's, right about the time that the lowered birth rate would have shown up in the volume of college applications, the administrators at Columbia noticed that the quality of the applicant pool for the undergraduate college was lagging behind the other Ivy League Schools. Also, New York City's decline in the late 1970's likely discouraged applicants.

Well, even in the Ivy League there is a pecking order. No Ivy League school wants to be stigmatized as minor league Ivy League, so Columbia College began admitting women in 1983 – the last Ivy League school to do so officially. I say officially because Barnard College and Columbia College were already living in sin. If I understand it right, today a young woman can apply to either Columbia College or Barnard and sign up for the same courses of study. Sounds like duplicative bureaucracy to me, but administrative efficiency and higher education are usually at loggerheads.

Well, given the hoopla around the Ivy League schools going coed, one might suppose that the Seven Sisters would reciprocate. Actually, with Radcliffe thoroughly absorbed into Harvard, that left only Six Sisters. Of that number, only one went fully coed.

That outlier was Vassar College. Apparently a "marriage" with Yale was broached in the late 60's, but for whatever reason (perhaps logistics, as Vassar is in Poughkeepsie, New York, and Yale is in New Haven, Connecticut), the proposal was rebuffed and Vassar decided to go coed in 1969. Today approximately 44% of Vassar students are men – higher than most coed liberal arts colleges today. One wonders what inspired the initial contingent of men to cast their lot with Vassar. Academics aside, an active social life was there for the taking, as the sex ratio was in their favor. Perhaps they were inspired by Dorothy Parker's famous quip, "If all the Vassar girls attending the Yale prom were laid end to end, I wouldn't be a bit surprised." Since the founder, Matthew Vassar, was a brewer, one might suspect that tippling was never discouraged at his namesake college.

So that leaves Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, Smith, and Wellesley as women's colleges, though defining a woman is not as easy as it used to be, even for Supreme Court nominees. Unlike Wellesley, Bryn Mawr, Mount Holyoke, and Smith are all on-board with trans-women. Mount Holyoke, for example, has entertained transgender and nonbinary applicants since 2014. The school characterizes itself as "a woman's college that is gender-diverse." And if that doubletalk intrigues you, you can enroll at Mount Holyoke for just $56,518/year. Whoops! I take that back. Assuming you are a biological male with no doubts about his sexual orientation, you need not apply. Since all-male spaces are unacceptable and all-female spaces are kosher, there is no pressure on women's colleges to admit men.

Would it be conceivable for any coed college to reverse course and announce it is admitting men only? Highly improbable, likely impossible. Any school that takes federal money could never get away with it. I'm not even sure if someone attempting to charter a new men's college would be accredited even if they took no federal funds. Still, if Vassar decided to revert to a women's college, I can't help but believe that no one would object.

The demise of the male-only colleges is yet another case of following the money. As detailed above, it was in the Ivy League's best interest to admit tuition-paying females. As a bonus, the administrators could boast that they were doing the right thing. You know the drill…diversity, equity, female empowerment, girl power or whatever. Typically, the more virtue-signaling you hear, the more you can be assured that it is really about self-interest.

There is another aspect to the "follow the money" rule. The Ivy League is all about big bucks. Check out the endowments of the Ivy League schools:

School	(Endowment in billions)
Harvard	$38.3
Yale	$29.35
Princeton	$25.92
Columbia	$14.35
Penn	$13.78
Cornell	$10
Dartmouth	$ 5.49
Brown	$ 4.7

Of course, Harvard has had a long time (since 1636) to build up that endowment. Yale is a distant second (1701). The other schools, save for Cornell, all date to colonial days. They are, in effect, older than the Constitution…older than the Declaration of Independence. That patina of antiquity is something that more modern schools, no matter how elite, cannot match.

Now let's look at the endowments of the Six Sisters remaining:

School	(Endowment in billions)
Wellesley	$3.23
Smith	$2.56
Vassar	$1.38
Bryn Mawr	$1.18
Mount Holyoke	$1.07
Barnard	$0.46

As you can readily see, the best endowed of the Seven Sisters colleges is below the least endowed of the Ivy League colleges (there's a sex joke in there somewhere). Also, none of the Sisters dates back to colonial days. Only Cornell is younger than Mount Holyoke, the oldest (1837) of the bunch.

By admitting women, the Ivy League schools allowed women to tap into their financial resources, sort of like marriage in a community property state. Other than Vassar, the women's colleges have not reciprocated, but even if they did, they couldn't offer men the same advantages as an Ivy League school. As the distinguished alumnae list of the Seven Sisters shows, it is not necessary to go to Harvard, Yale, or Princeton to be a world-changer. But if you're looking for BDE, the Ivy League, not the Seven Sisters, is the way to go – even in the soyboy era. Surely female applicants realize this even if they wouldn't admit to it.

In truth, given the preponderance of women at colleges today (around 60-61%, as I understand it), one would not be far wrong if one asserted that now all colleges are women's colleges. The Ivy League now has six female Presidents. The first was Judith Rodin at Penn in 1994 (she has been succeeded by two more females, Amy Gutmann and Elizabeth Magill). The most recent is Harvard with Claudine Gay. The Sisters, though they have had male Presidents in the past, have none at present and likely never will again. It is no longer politically feasible.

It will be interesting to see how the fracas at Wellesley plays out. I suspect sooner or later they will give in. After all, Hillary Clinton, arguably their best known alumna, is on record as saying she hopes that the prohibition against drag queens "goes the way of the dinosaur."

In the meantime you can still watch Animal House. Even when it came out it was portraying a world that was vanishing. Dean Wormer (John Vernon) might have been a prick but at least he had a backbone. He wasn't mealy-mouthed and he didn't give a damn if he offended anyone.

I don’t know how Animal House would be received at a college screening today. Would the usual suspects try to shut it down? Would they demand a safe space to recover from the screening? Would history or social sciences professors be empaneled to interpret the narrative before or after the screening?

One thing for sure: I wouldn’t count on toga parties making a comeback.

In Her Own Words: My mother abused my father and me

“Marian” shares her story of horrific abuse at the hands of her mother. Marian wasn’t her mother’s only victim. Her mother also brutalized her father.

If I could draw my mother on a paper, would I split her into two people. One would be happy, joyful, and kind, while the other would be angry, harsh, and cruel, with the figure rotating at a mere minutes’ notice.

When I was five years of age, I had a bad habit of slamming the car door hard . Mom would tell me from time to time to stop until one day she made me stick out my hand for her. She slapped it so hard that it was red for about ten minutes afterward.

At age eight, I developed a case of the chicken pox. My mother insisted on taking me with her for errands. She actually stuck me in the daycare center at the YMCA, despite my having a contagious disease! I told the daycare worker that I was sick with chicken pox, and my mother had to come retrieve me. She yelled at me in the car for not keeping quiet about it until we arrived at the mall. While there, we bumped into my grandmother. My grandmother, outraged, threatened to take full custody of me on the spot if my mother did not take me home to rest.

During my seventeenth year, my mother’s parents and brother passed away, and her temper, as a result, worsened. When I couldn’t find a date for prom, she called me a fat loser, and slapped me so hard that she split my lip. My father told me not to tell my grandparents about it, despite the fact that I nearly broke down in front of my grandmother over it. Mom would notice my lip from time to time while I was applying makeup, and comment on it, asking me what I did to “mess up my face.”

She was hard on me in terms of my academics, and the fact that I struggled with a difficult math-based course did not help. When I was carrying a B-minus in the course, and she slapped me six times across the face, and kicked me across the floor for “not taking the course seriously” despite the fact that I consistently sought help with the teacher after class. Dad managed to grab her after the first three swings, but she later re-entered the room. Dad, fearful of the repercussions of attempting to stop her again, took out his frustration by punching a nearby door.

I was also a cheerleader for the entirety of my high school career, and as a result, learned several tumbling techniques. During a week in which I was consistently botching a tumbling pass due to a mental block, and falling on the mat, she became violent once more. While our pickup truck sat in an empty parking lot, she smacked me several times. The hardest smack dislodged and broke my glasses. When the salesperson at the store inquired as to how the pair had come to be so damaged, Mom replied, “Oh, my daughter broke them. She’s so clumsy.”

Unfortunately, I was not the only victim of her anger. Several nights during the age of three, I hear my parents scream at each other, with my mom usually screaming louder, followed by slapping noises, and the sound of household objects breaking. My father never hit; it was against his upbringing, and considering his size and stature, the result of college bodybuilding, he would probably have done serious damage to her if he did.

Mom always said the reason why I never had a sibling was because we couldn't have afforded one. It wasn't until this year that Dad told me the whole story: she kicked him so hard in the testicles that it sterilized him. She also liked to threaten to throw him out of the house, and would call me into the room to say, "See her now? You'll NEVER see her again!" The thing Mom didn't count on, though, was the fact that I would cry and run to my father, not wanting him to go. During my freshman year in high school, I even fell to my knees before her, and begged her not to throw my father out.

I never did go to anyone for help when I was a minor for a few reasons. The first was the fact that my idea of child and spousal abuse was inaccurate. Child abuse, by my juvenile depiction, was children being knocked unconscious or living in squalor, while spousal abuse was (usually a female) victim crawling away from a hovering tormentor. Added to this inaccuracy was the fact that Mom used to say, "My mother did far worse to me!"

I never wanted to break up my family. Again, she was two people in one body; the same person that hit and spat venom cheered for me on the side lines, surprised my father with gifts and celebrations in his honor, and cared for both of us with a gentle voice when we were ill. For that, I just internalized the abuse like a coward, never calling the police, or getting help. This was despite the fact that her favorite go-to threats were "I brought you into this world, and I can take you out," and "I'll chop your goddamn head off if you don't shut the fuck up!"

My freshman year of college was when I realized that I was being abused. Far from the grasp of her influence, and effectively burying myself in task of writing a novel (an idea she used to scoff at and dissuade me from doing in high school) allowed me to examine my life with a different lens. What I saw thoroughly disgusted me. While I did not confront her about it yet, as I was still unsure of it (not to mention she had threatened three times that year alone to pull me out of college), she took notice of my altered body language told her, declaring that college had messed me up even worse than high school had. Exhibit A: When I caught the flu, and called her for tips on how to handle it, she, assuming morning sickness off the bat, immediately accused me of carrying my boyfriend's child.

In the long run, it all came to naught; my parents divorced anyway during my sophomore year. The two told me, point blank, in my dorm room that they were through. My mother accused me of smirking during the proclamation; in reality, I was holding my face hard in order not to cry. I had lost, and lost dearly, internalizing it all for nothing.

I spent that summer blaming myself for allowing her to hit and berate my father and me. She was still under our roof that summer, the separation not finalized until that August. She and Dad were at each other's throats at least once a week, as were she and I, only twice a week. I had previously arranged to move in with my grandmother that summer, but my father put a stop to the plan, saying that we needed to be a family. Without an effective financial leg to stand on (my fault), I had no choice.

What family was this, when she flung any insult she could think of at me, berating me for my hair, my body (she especially loved that one), my choice in friends, my singular status, my virginity (when she wasn't pulling the accusation of "whore" out of the air), and anything else she could possibly think of? Dad fell to justifying her, his common phrase being, "She's your mother."

That came to a head one late July night. Mom was moving to her new apartment, and Dad volunteered me to help her. I had accidentally given the manager where I worked the wrong day off for the affair. As a result, my mother spent fifteen minutes on the way home (Dad never allowed me to drive due to insurance rates) slamming on the brakes in order for her to scream in my face how useless, stupid, spoiled, ignorant, selfish, and pathetic I was. She also threatened to never allow me to see my grandmother again (which was baseless at that point).

Turning in my seat, I yelled, "You are selfish, abusive, and emotionally manipulative!" Slapping me across the mouth, she yelled at me to get out of the car, and drove off.

When Dad picked me up, he was furious. He forced us to sit down at the dinner table to speak to one another civilly, and I immediately told him her threat to not allow me to see his mother again. The look on Mom's face was akin to deer in the headlights when Dad rounded on her, and she fell to taunting me to distract him. "You could never hit me, you little shit!" She yelled.

Standing bolt upright, I poised my hand in the air to slap her. Dad grabbed me from behind, and held me in a bear hug as I kicked the air, screaming. Mom left the room, taunting, "Oh you could never do it! I'll kick your ass if you do!"

When Dad let me down, he asked, "Are you crazy? Do you realize what you could have done?" Only now do I realize the extent of his words; she could have called the police on me for that.

My mother is gone from my home now, and to that I say good riddance. Still, it does not change the fact that she was abusive toward my father and me, and we both allowed it to happen to us, just because we were so enchanted by the kinder side of her persona. I have since told my aunt and my grandmother (as well as a few close friends and their parents) of the abuse, and all reactions were the approximate same; each person told was outraged by my mother's abuse of my father and me. Each person expressed the desire to have stopped her from hurting us in the past, had they known of the extent. My aunt has rendered her home a safe zone for us, telling me that she will not welcome my mother's presence. My friends and loved ones were also shocked as to the extent of my mother's violence, and feared that she might very well have seen to the end of my father and me, if she had been so inclined.

It will be a long time before I heal from what my mother did, if at all. She still shamelessly parades the fact that she is my mother (as well as parades around the clothing that she took from my closet without my permission) as if nothing is wrong. I once did want children, but I now want to break this cycle; my theoretical child will not internalize any theoretical abuse from me. For that also, I have driven a knife into the second dream of finding the love of my life. Even if marriage laws did change overnight to the point where marriage would no longer be a man placing a proverbial noose about his neck, and hoping his wife won't open the trapdoor beneath him, I still can't go through with it. I just can't live with the fact that my mother hurt my father, and that I have the same capacity to be cruel.

If there is any advice men and boys, could take from my story, I beg, hear this: it is not worth the abuse to see someone's kind side. If someone truly loves you, that person would not justify hurting you in any way, shape, or form. TELL SOMEONE if you are being hurt by someone else, even if it is a loved one. I cannot emphasize this enough! Do not allow someone the power of your silence. Lastly, please understand that abuse can take any form; it does not have to be the carnival-type version of abuse that is shown to us on television and posters.

Thank you, Marian, for sharing your story. I hope you and your father are in a much better place.

Your Feelings, and Why They Don’t Matter

March 27, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Standard Dr. Paul disclaimer: This advice is not intend for all women. So if it does not apply to you do not be offended by it. If you are offended on behalf of all women, then please stick around. Grandiosity is treatable.

Dear ladies,

Let’s talk feelings. Actually, forget that. I’ll talk feelings, because if you talk feelings, I won’t get to talk at all.

I know, that sounded insensitive. Well, it was insensitive, and quite intentionally so. But keep reading, there is a method to my malice, and a message that you really need to hear. I don’t want you to miss out on it because you’re in a huff over the fact that I regard your feelings at best, as obstructive, and at worst, the primary and overarching cause of failure in your love life. And worse yet, as a source of abusive control for anyone crazy enough to get close to you.

As ironic as it may sound to you, if you want a good love life, the first step is to get your feelings out of the way, or at least quit using them as a weapon. So let’s get out of Oprah mode and just use our brains long enough to sort this thing out.

It starts, like most of your problems, in childhood. That’s the cute and annoyingly whiney phase of life that boys, unlike you, are forced to outgrow. You don’t get all the blame for that, but if you really want a meaningful relationship, you’d better start taking some responsibility for correcting it.

Babies, whether blue or pink, are pretty much alike. When a child gets hungry or dirty or tired or sick or lonely or scared, they tend to react by screeching until someone does something about it. It makes sense. Babies, after all, can’t take care of themselves.

But not too far along in life the paths of boys and girls, emotionally speaking, fork into two very different directions. By the time both have some measure of language and cognitive skills the reaction to all that caterwauling changes, and not so subtly.

Pretty early in a boys life, about the time he can speak in complete sentences, tolerance for remaining a baby wears thin. His wailing is met with everything from ridicule to threats. If “big boys don’t cry,” doesn’t work, then, “I’ll give you something to cry about,” usually does, especially after a few rounds of following through.

Psychologists will tell you that this is where we harm boys, that we dissociate them from their feelings and shut down their emotional selves. They even call it emotional abuse.

But in most cases, unless taken too far, it doesn’t abuse boys feelings as much as it teaches them to start mastering them. That kind of self control is a pretty good skill that comes in handy for a lot of things, like, say, being an adult. You see, before the psychologists came along to tell us what rotten parents we were, we had a different name for the effect we had on boys, although not so catchy and marketable.

We called it growing up. It was all the rage.

We knew, even without a Ph.D. in conjecture, that not maturing was a bad thing. It resulted in all sorts of problems, like permanent childhood and self centeredness.

And women.

That's because while we were insisting that boys learn real life skills, girls got a different message. Actually, they got the same message that they'd been getting since birth. Namely that squawking loud enough will get you what you want. And that is why that while boys your age grew into manhood, you just got older, hairier and more irritating.

And more vulnerable to being exploited.

The self help gurus have zeroed in on that one like chicken hawks and turned your feelings about your feelings into a cash cow. For a fee, they tell you to express your feelings, write them down, trust them, affirm them, discuss them in groups, put them in a journal, confront people with them, list them, learn more words for them, read about them, mouth them through a sock puppet like a neurotic ventriloquist and above all, get them validated as something sacred by all in your life.

That have led you to attend the Church of Emotionalism, where your tears are holy and Kleenex are passed right along with the collection plate. Can I get an amen?

But they aren't telling you anything really different than the same bullshit you have been told your whole life, and that you now tell yourself. When you have pain, or even a sense of slight annoyance, someone else is supposed to by God fix it.

And so you remain, born again baby that you are, stuck in self delusion until you get some things straight.

Despite what your therapist told you, or what you saw on Oprah, your feelings don't have any inherent value compared to say, facts, logic or a good cheeseburger. Most of the feelings you think are so important are as transient as campaign promises and worth just about as much attention.

What you feel right now won't be the same thing you feel in a few hours, or, if you are like a lot of women, in a few minutes. So expecting your man to stand constantly at the ready, as though his purpose in life is to validate and honor every fleeting emotion you have at each and every point of their temporary existence is a non starter. If that is what you expect, you don't need a relationship, you just need a better therapist.

And the same for taking your relationship straight into turmoil because you use your feelings to undermine communications every time a logical solution undermines your agenda.

You know exactly what I am talking about. The more reason and logic point to your being wrong, the more unreasonable and illogical you become. It is calculated and intentional. It's the tried and true plan of "If being reasonable doesn't get me what I want, I will just be increasingly unreasonable till I get it anyway." Nothing like frustrating someone into compliance.

And in a really twisted, perverted way, it makes sense. Heck, you're a slave to your feelings, why shouldn't everyone else be?

For a while, in many cases, it even seems to work. But it ultimately blows up in your face because all this nonsense is just a recipe for him to eventually cook up a great big casserole dish full of fuck-this-crazy-bitch.

Are you feeling me?

Ladies, the only real purpose for your feelings is to tell you there is a problem you need to fix. After that, continuing to dwell on them, or childishly forcing your partner to obsess on them with you, only keeps you from finding solutions.

It may annoy him into fixing things for you, as surely as you were still laying in a crib, but at this point in your life that is only to shut you up, and leaves you less respected, and less respectable, every time it happens. And so when your man gives in to this, he isn't meeting your emotional needs, and you certainly aren't meeting his. All you have accomplished is pressuring him into changing your diaper.

If you think that is the path to a healthy relationship, think again. Jerking people around on an emotional leash is only good thing if you are a psychopath.

Hostility will always be the natural result for people who use emotions not to connect or to create intimacy, but as a weapon to control and manipulate. It is hostility well deserved.

Now, there has been a long running misconception about men and women that has been around about as long as igneous rock. That is that women are somehow more gifted in the emotional department than men.

Of course, that's more bullshit. Training half the population to be childish, emotional puppeteers in ways that ultimately sabotage their own emotional fulfillment is hardly a gift. It is more like a cruel joke. And it may seem funny with you are 20. But it may seem much different at 45 when you are rapidly graying, cooking for one, and wondering why so many men get tired of listening to you in about 5 minutes.

With that in mind, if you want to see evidence of real emotional acumen, consider the following names:

Shakespeare, Keats, Hemmingway, Steinbeck, Gibran, Kipling, Blake, Wordsworth, Byron and Shelly. Or even the great contemporary songwriters, Simon, King, Kristofferson, Dylan, Hiatt, Lovett and Henley. This list is a drop in the bucket, and if we added to it till we covered every genius in world history in the realm of the human heart, we would have to address 95% of them as mister.

In fact, truth be known, most of the men in your life who you have dismissed as emotional zeros more likely belong on that list than you do. You just never knew it because you are such an emotional mess.

Feminists would tell you that this is sexism, and perhaps they are right, though as usual for the wrong reasons.

It may well be sexist to the core to raise half the population, your half, to be emotional cripples while telling them they are emotional giants.

The sacred cow of maternity

March 29, 2023 | by Hopeland Cash | Link | Original Link

My article about paper abortion has led to some interesting discussion, online and off. What I've been brewing on since, however, isn't the topic of abortions or paper abortions themselves, but a question that will occur to anyone who dares try to discuss them: Why is men's right to paper abortions so fiercely opposed? In almost any venue, anger at the specter of "infringement" of women's right borders on the rabid and irrational. I saw this within my own family and it appears in the media whenever paper abortions are discussed. Why is that?

I come from a liberal family and have three sisters of varying ages and a not-so-varying stance on my status as a Men's Right Activist. I wrote the article about paper abortion knowing full well (and maybe hoping just a little) how controversial it would be among the general population and my own family. I knew my sisters wouldn't agree with any argument in favor of paper abortions, nor would any left-of-center woman. Hell, far-right women would probably say I'm encouraging "deadbeat" behavior.

But that's the point that kept coming to mind for me. Why is abortion and paper abortion such a hot-button topic? Few things get people so worked up. Abortion (non-paper) has come to be seen as a "basic right", but how can any right be "basic" if it is only granted to half the population? After all, only a little over 10% of abortions are for health/safety reasons. For the rest, it is effectively a 'morning-after-the-morning-after' solution, emergency birth control. Handy, definitely, so why so much opposition to giving men a legal equivalent?

I think it's not really about abortion at all, and what made me realize this was a conversation I had while making breakfast. It was shortly after the publication of my article and I was discussing it with some family members. Not female family members, though. My father and teenage brother. Both of them are well aware of the many issues faced by men, but neither is as much of an MRA as me (Red Pills for Christmas?). We were discussing the article, and by extension abortion and paper abortion and men's responsibility and women's rights and all the other bullshit feminists try to block paper abortion with. The usual (and irrational) argument is that men don't give birth, can't understand it, don't bear the same burdens, and so can't be given the same rights of choice. In essence I argued back that childbirth is nothing special and so there's no reason for women to have exclusive access to abortions. I admit, I was a little worked up; it happens easily when discussing men's rights. Eventually, to make my point, a bit hyperbolically, I said:

> Giving birth is no different than taking a piss.

Now, remember, these were two men I was talking to, both moderately well informed about the MRM, and yet their response was down right chilly. They weren't hostile but both were perhaps just a bit short of shocked. Even for me, this was apparently an extreme stance.

But I kept arguing the point logically.

- Giving birth is a biological function.
- Women evolved to give birth.
- Almost every mammal on the planet does it.
- There's nothing special about the act of childbirth.

But no, it seemed I had sinned. The discussion quickly died away and I was left with the distinct feeling I had violated a taboo.

If I ever drop that line on one of my sisters, I'm bringing a flak jacket.

All that is anecdotal, yes, but it is illustrative of how a larger social construct filters its way down into our thoughts and our daily lives. Our society is suffering from a Maternity Cult. I don't mean a literal cult, but a cultural complex which mythologizes and even deifies childbearing. This is nothing new, of course. Fertility goddesses and reverence for childbearing date well into pre-history. It is likely humans were worshiping childbirth before they'd figured out men were involved. (Probably still footing the bill back then, though)

But even today? Yes, even today, even in the developed, secular world. Women's status as incubators grants them most if not all of their social privilege. They are viewed as the creators of life, hence women and children first and the tendency (policy) of the mainstream media to always paint female deaths in war zones as far more tragic than those of men. Throughout the ages, women have been considered more reproductively valuable, despite most societies being monogamous. The whole mystique of women as nurturing, caring, delicate beings deserving protection and special consideration stems, I think, from their childbearing function. Biologically, it is the only unique feature of the sex. They're smaller, yes, but short men receive no such special treatment. Motherhood is the driving force behind female privilege, and therefore a driving force behind feminism, which seeks to enhance female privilege while avoiding any social responsibility.

Hence the bloody war over abortion, paper and medical. Women's ability to bear children is worshiped, and therefore they are granted total control over the children they miraculously, mercifully, beautifully bring into the world. Child custody imbalance, maternal gatekeeping, international kidnapping, abusive behavior during birth, murderous behavior after birth. All tolerated, not just because the child belongs to the woman, which it effectively does in today's world, but because society wants us to act like she did us a favor by giving birth so we shouldn't question her in any way regarding the child. Mother knows best.

I'm not saying pregnant women shouldn't be given consideration. Like anyone in an altered state of health, their diminished physical capacities should be taken into account. But let's be realistic and practical and still treat these women as adults. Adults undergoing a draining physical experience, but still adults. It was their choice, after all.

The extreme opposition to paper abortion is just one part of this cultural mindset of mommy-worship. To grant men any control/influence over how/when/if a child is raised would be to infringe on woman's divine status as Chalice of Life. It's not even up for discussion if a woman should have exclusive control of any given power over 'her' child. Automatic yes. To suggest otherwise, whether by calling for paper abortions or simply agitating for equality in family law, is seen as an affront to womanhood itself, the purest form of misogyny, a violation of their god-given rights of motherhood.

Now, let me be clear. I am pro-choice (or anti-life, your call); I think women should have the right to abortions. But it is time to cut all the crap worship of childbearing as if it is a magical, mystical, rainbow-infused super-power granted unto them by almighty Mother Earth over which men have no rights.

Giving birth is a biological function that evolved over millions of years, in humans as well as in just about every other female with hair/fur on the planet. But people still seem to think childbearing is some sort of sacred endeavor. A common argument is that it is so "dangerous" to give birth. Well, maybe it was a century ago, but not so much today. In the U.S., less than a thousand women die during childbirth each year. That makes the odds less than one in one-hundred-and-fifty-thousand. That makes it about as dangerous as being a truck driver. And truck drivers are over 90% male. We're even.

No, I won't worship women for giving birth. There is nothing special or sacred about the event. It is a natural biological mechanism. We praise small children when they successfully relieve themselves, but after a certain age successfully carrying out your body's automatic functions should lose its sense of wonder. Men are often ridiculed for being comically obsessed with biological functions like farting, belching and urinating, but women obsess over their periods and pregnancies and then receive special privilege for it.

Who is it that never grows up?

Giving birth is not the most important achievement. However, what is special, what does set humans apart of other animals on Earth, is what comes after.

Parenting. That is the miracle. What has made humans great and allowed us to build a civilization out of the dust is our ability to communicate and to teach our children, to pass on our knowledge. Any rabbit can give birth to a litter, but only humans can bond, nurture and teach in the way we do. Only we pass stories down through the generations, leave legacies for our offspring and build a world that will be better for them.

And men do it too. Pregnancy and childbirth is a biological function, a side-effect of intercourse. It's not sacred, but what we do with the result can be. The modern maternity cult blinds people to the contribution of fathers, allows for the abuse of children by unfit mothers, and strangles society with the demands of privilege for the supposedly incredible act of childbearing.

If we stop worshiping women for giving birth, we can focus on what really matters: the needs of the children that come from it. They're the miracle. Mothers and fathers both make them happen, but the real work only begins after the first nine months.

Respect

March 29, 2023 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

It's important to respect "_____" <—— insert whatever identity group, ideology, or opinion here.

I've always questioned the validity of this old sentiment even when it was taught to me as a child. Mostly because the sentiment doesn't make any sense. Respect is, in my opinion, one of the most valuable rewards one person can grant to another. I say reward because that's what it is in a free society. Let the current state of places like North Korea or Saudi Arabia settle over your mind for a moment where in one country the populace has been forced to worship and respect its leaders as if they were Herculean style demigods and in the other the populace is forced to respect its leaders will because its leaders are quite literally, royalty. Failure to show the proper respect to these figures could and often times has resulted in the deaths of those who refuse to submit.

There is another commonly held belief regarding the concept of respect that I very much prefer; respect isn't given, it is earned. I say it is a commonly held belief but one could easily be fooled into dismissing this fact simply because there are two opposing ideologies surrounding the word respect.

Respect your elders. Respect other cultures. Respect women. Respect (random person's) opinion.

Everyone, from everyday people to celebrities and the super rich constantly contradict themselves when uttering this word and the concept behind it. Why? Because most people are self-centered. Even those who go out of their way to help groups and individuals they consider to be disadvantaged or persecuted.

This piece is not a call for the masses to immediately adopt my philosophy on respect. It is basically just an outline of what that philosophy is and an opinion as to why most people or at least most people I have seen and encountered, tend to confuse the concept of respect with another widely known phrase; common courtesy.

The showing of politeness to others. This is the expectation most have for citizens in civil society. Don't be rude. Don't insult someone for no reason. If you disagree with someone, express your disagreement without pointless heavy handed or vulgar language.

While there is nothing wrong with this sentiment in my opinion, politeness is not respect. Yes I know that the word respect is in the above definition as a synonym. But here is the definition for respect.

> A feeling of deep admiration for someone elicited by their abilities, qualities, or achievements.

Personally, I believe the inclusion of qualities in the definition is the most important. This is, in my opinion the most common reason why one person will choose to respect another. Why? Well if your respect for someone is based solely off of their abilities then it is usually someone you don't actually know. Take sports celebrities for example. Dwyane Wade is my favorite basketball player, even though I don't regularly watch basketball anymore. I know that if I were to step onto the court with him I would most likely lose. So I wouldn't make any serious attempt to challenge D-Wade to a game unless I have put myself through the proper training and exercise because I respect his ability to play the game. But I don't know anything about him personally. We don't hang out at the club or the gym. He is not my friend. I met him once as his security escort a few jobs ago. So it is factual for me to say I know nothing of his qualities.

Back when I was in the army, it was hammered into us (especially in basic training) that we are most likely going to dislike our leaders. In fact that was the goal in basic. Can you follow someone you hate? Someone who for months has made your life a living hell? Well it turns out you can if you learn to disassociate the person, in this case the Drill Sergeant, from their rank. There are plenty of incompetent leaders in the military but the rank of commissioned and non-commissioned officers is supposed to be a signifier of their ability. As a private I was instructed to respect the rank of those appointed over me, not the person. Meaning if one of my leaders told me to do something stupid I was legally bound to do it and any grievances I held would have to be taken up with someone in the chain of command ranked higher than the person giving the order.

This is one of the most important and valuable mandates within the military and would vastly improve interactions between people within the civilian population if more people put it into practice. Why? Take a look at modern day interactions between common people. There is countless video footage of violent encounters between people over extremely trivial arguments.

"Why you talking shit?"

"Why you disrespecting me?"

Statements like this are why we would hear WORLDSTARRRRRR five minutes later while two or more people are beating the crap out of each other.

But it gets worse.

"Do you know who I am?"

That's another one that can often lead to a physical confrontation. There are two main reasons that I think are the main cause for this nonsense. One; people feel that to be respectful, one has to follow a certain etiquette, which is really the etiquette of courtesy but I already explained that. The other is that people feel they are owed these common courtesies from everyone. Even people they have never met. Now I am not saying it is wrong to want everyone to be polite, to wait their turn, to not cut someone off on the road, to not let a door slam in the face of the person behind you and so on. But it is wrong to demand someone act in a certain way to satisfy your idea of what respectful is. You might think holding the door open for a woman is the polite and respectful thing to do. What if that woman is a feminist and thinks you are in actuality disrespecting her by holding open that door? What if she demands you change your behavior from then on or you will be disrespecting women every time you hold open a door for one? Maybe you feel holding open the door for both women and men is being polite and respectful but that one feminist will not change her mind (and she should have no obligation to) that you are disrespecting women and will try and let everyone know and condemn you.

What are the dangers of holding an attitude like this? Well if you happen to get into an argument with someone and end up calling them something insulting then that insult, if viewed or heard by people who consider themselves a part of said person's identity group, will then be interpreted and propagandized as your base opinion for everyone in that group instead of just being an insult flung at some random person in an argument.

Don't like identity politics in your films or comic books? Then you are a sexist, racist, homophobe etc. You just might not care what the race or sexual orientation of a character is but if you are turned off by and voice a complaint about how a political ideology is being pushed and that narrative push is hurting the story of the film or comic it doesn't matter. You are a bigot because you don't respect whatever person that belongs to or is portraying that group. This is dangerous because people are being hit with twitter mobs that uncover their personal information such as their place of employment and they are having their abilities to put food on the table stripped from them because they aren't showing the proper "respect" certain people of certain groups are supposedly owed.

Respect is earned not owed.

Respect, in my opinion, is one of the most important concepts ever created. More important than its creation, it's the fact that you decide who receives it from you and for what reason. I can count the people that I genuinely respect on one hand. Not because the majority of people I know are bad people but because only a few people have displayed actions and ideas (mostly actions) that have earned my respect. We all know that feeling we get when someone we know does something or says something on a consistent basis that gives us a small swell of pride to be associated with that person. We begin to take their word on certain subjects that we may have a moderate level of ignorance on. We are more willing to consider their advice when faced with difficult tasks. We all know who these people are in our lives.

Now consider extending that same level of trust to some random person sitting next to you in a bar or restaurant. Crazy right? But that's not what everyone means when they say that everyone deserves respect. I know. But here's the thing.

No one deserves respect.

As I stated at the start of this piece; replace respect with courtesy when making that statement and the statement will make a lot more sense. I'm all for not being a jerk to people for no reason. But some (alot actually) people are just jerks. Because they don't know you. They don't feel they owe you anything and they are right.

Think of the phrase "good person" for a moment. What makes a person good? If you know the definitive answer then you are God. There is no definitive answer. What is good to one person is an annoyance or bad to another person. When someone says "he is a good man” or “she’s a good woman” they are giving their opinion of that person based on their interactions. That person is behaving in the way that someone else deems worthy of being labeled good. The moment that person stops behaving in that specific way then they won’t be considered a “good” person anymore. But they might gain that title from someone else in their life.

If being good can be subjective then there cannot be a set standard for being respectful. This is why the phrase “respect is earned” is a more true statement than “everyone deserves respect” in my opinion.

There are literally billions of people that I don’t respect but each and every one of them has the ability to earn my respect. That is the power I hold as a free individual in arguably one of the greatest societies in existence today.

You hold that power too.

Don’t cheapen it.

The primary victim of “equality” is not your daughter

March 30, 2023 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

In December of 2015 Defense Secretary Ashton Carter made the decision to integrate women into every area of military services. This has resulted in a variety of responses, including a bill by two representatives intended to force debate on Capital Hill over women’s role in the military. The bill, titled “Draft America’s Daughters,” would extend to women the requirement for Selective Service registration which currently mandates that men age 18-26 register for a potential draft.

Some have touted this as a step toward equality. Many, however, seem outraged at the idea of imposing mandatory military service on women during wartime, and in a more visceral way than folks are outraged when it is imposed on men.

The Blaze: I Will Not Allow My Daughter To Be A Victim Of Gender Equality

Blaze writer Matt Walsh, in his objection to imposing selective service registration on women, stated complaints which aren’t any less valid when applied to drafting men from the general population.

Yes, the Marine study Walsh mentioned found that on average, women lack in areas which would make them less capable soldiers, and a draft would not differentiate between weaker women and those who are strong, efficient, and tough. Well, guess what: Selective service does no different than that when drafting men.

There’s no algorithm added to the draft to weed out all men but the strongest, most efficient, and toughest. Oh, some men can be declared unfit for military service, but this generally entails an actual medical condition, not a lover’s loophole or poet’s prerogative. Standards for fitness for enrollment in the military often end up being relative to the military’s need for warm bodies. During a draft, they’re more likely to be relaxed. During the Vietnam war, young men who never in their lives could have been truly prepared for battle were sent overseas to die, some by a military that wouldn’t have accepted their enrollment had they volunteered a year prior.

This is not to say that forced military service is right; only that if women forced into it can be considered victims, the same applies to men.

When men are drafted, there’s no concern or consideration for whether their lifestyle has disposed them toward capable military service. They don’t get to decide they cannot handle the requirements of the job. They are expected to man up as they’re whipped into shape by a training regimen designed to fast track them from day one at boot camp to active duty. In fact, their lives depend on both their ability to do this and the ability of their fellow draftees to do the same. Their superiors are not gentle or tactful about making that clear because failure to understand and act on that knowledge can be deadly. It's anticipated that men faced with such a situation will rise to the occasion, not because all men are physically equal, but because that's just what men do.

Though Walsh's generalization may be unfair, he has one point: The women he describes as "egregiously unfit recruits culled from sorority houses and Justin Bieber concerts" certainly don't appear to meet that standard. The question is, why? If he were merely describing women as weak, he wouldn't have had to mention sororities or concerts. He'd have used a more physical description. After all, frat boys and fanboys would be among male draftees, and nobody thinks that should exempt men from the expectations involved in military service.

What Mr. Walsh was referring to is society's indulgence of the whims and interests of women and girls. Between the lines of that paragraph is the unwritten admission that among the general female population there is a disproportionate number of entitled princesses whose lives have left them emotionally unequipped to handle the rigors of military training. More than that, many young American women are accustomed to never having to put anyone else's interests before their own. They're used to always being entitled to choose whether or not to meet a challenge, always entitled to recourse when affronted, to remedy when they're hurt, and to refuse that to which they're averse.

What happens when someone historically so entitled to focus on herself and her own interests gets force-fitted into a job that depends on toughness and teamwork? What happens, not just to her, but to her team? Who does it affect when she can't or won't do the whole job?

The military is a more strict example of an expectation of men that exists in other physically demanding professions. Men can be disqualified from taking certain high risk or labor-intensive jobs, such as firefighter jobs, for failing to meet physical criteria such as lifting and carrying capacity, the speed at covering distance, and the ability to endure sustained physical stress.

Thanks to feminism, the same is not necessarily true for women.

FDNY drops physical test requirement amid low female hiring rate

Feminists call it discrimination when a woman is not given a gender-based exemption from a standard that has been used to determine men's eligibility for a job. Nothing is said about the many men who may have been disqualified from the position for failing to meet the same standard; it's only a problem when women can't get what they want.

Sometimes, it's also a problem when they do.

FDNY recruit failed her way into $81,000 desk job

Firefighter who flunked physical injured ten days into job

Choeurlyne Doirin-Holder received preferential treatment as part of an initiative to hire more women into the New York City fire department. She didn't just get preferential consideration. She was exempted from physical requirements she could not meet and given a desk job while attempting to train for and pass her specially nerfed physical after her previous failures.

Then, she suffered an on-the-job injury which indicates a failure to be mindful of her environment.

Fortunately for the New York public and her fellow firefighters, the special snowflake was not injured during an actual emergency. She lost her footing during a routine equipment check and fractured her foot. Had such an injury occurred inside a burning structure while attempting to rescue residents, it could have had deadly consequences.

Some might think that the military is not at risk for incidents like this. Certainly, feminists would have less success in influencing military regulations than they have at influencing standards for civil service positions. There's a huge difference between military administration and the administrations of other professions, right? Toughness is an integral part of the job, right?

The groundwork for change is already being laid. Prior to integration, fitness standards for men and women differed. Arguments are being made to keep it that way.

Gender equality? A double standard for women in the military

Pressure grows on Marines to consider lowering combat standards for women

Once again, standards which have affected men's military careers for years have suddenly become a problem because they're affecting women's careers. No concern is being expressed over the men whose career prospects were determined by which standards they could meet. No group is proposing to re-enlist men disqualified from service because they could not lift or carry enough weight, run fast enough or far enough, or endure rough enough conditions. Only women merit such consideration, even when they're striving to qualify for elite positions.

What does this say about the value of male soldiers, who are still subject and whose careers are still vulnerable to those standards? Are they less worthy of an effort to foster their careers than women are? Why is the double standard not considered discrimination against them? And if it's not, how do proponents of it expect it to affect their morale or their perception of their female colleagues?

This is also extremely dangerous, not just to the women being integrated into combat positions, but also to the men with whom they'll be training and, if activated, fighting. Relaxed standards for women could not only leave them less capable of handling themselves in conflict, but also less capable of fulfilling their duties as part of their team. They could become their comrades' worst vulnerability. If combat integration and an integrated draft are combined with unequal fitness standards, at the very least, male soldiers will be forced to pick up female soldiers' slack. For instance, would female draftees unable to fulfill the more demanding roles in the military, be granted safer, easier jobs? If so, wouldn't they be pushing men out of those jobs? And if, as opponents of including women in the draft argue, women are less capable, wouldn't this be a significantly impacting factor on the outcome of a man's experience of being drafted, making him more likely to be forced into a more dangerous, more physically demanding job? At worst, combining integration with lower standards for women will place them in combat positions with stronger, more qualified men. Those men will be forced to depend on support from, or even compelled to protect less competent allies.

Under such a circumstance, a male draftee sent to the front lines would not only be a victim of forced service, but also a victim of forced reliance on a comrade in arms who won't have his back. Why does a push by a minority among women merit thrusting unwilling men into this position?

Feminists and progressives are trying to have it both ways. The push to open all areas of the military to women is based on the assertion that women's capability is equal to that of men; the claim that anything men can do, women can also do. However, the push for lower standards for women directly contradicts that, especially when the claim is made that equal physical standards discriminate against female soldiers. It's an admission that men can do things women can't.

The two assertions are not compatible. Either women are as physically capable as men, can meet the same physical standards, and should be equally subject to them, or they're not, and the riskier and physically demanding areas of military service should be segregated. Subjecting men to a double standard is discrimination. To do so while demanding they serve with the beneficiaries of that double standard is worse; a slap in the face to men judged by those standards, and a continual risk to those who live up to them.

The battle for feminism’s soul

March 31, 2023 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

The title of today’s talk is, the Battle for Feminism’s Soul.

So . . . What is feminism? What ISN’T feminism? These are vital questions, and controversy has swirled around them for years. This controversy is no storm in a teacup, for I can assure you that much rides upon the outcome.

When a non-feminist encounters a feminist, the mood is sooner or later bound to get testy. To state that another way, each party carries a psychic atmosphere of her own, and these atmospheres are bound to clash. The encompassing social ambience will not accomodate both of them; one or the other must yield. As they say in the old western movies, “this town ain’t big enough for both of us.”

The unspoken tension between feminist and non-feminist will eventually come to a head and show itself openly. This regularly happens in a small way, in the social microcosm. It has not yet happened in a grand, conclusive way, in the societal macrocosm, although it is our job to accelerate the arrival of that day. But on whatever scale it occurs, the confrontation rides upon a mutual assessment between these two parties or, if you will, between these two principles.

Hence the typical pattern of interchange between a feminist and a non-feminist. The non-feminist will make known her feelings about feminism and the feminist will, mildly or otherwise, “get defensive”. So what is happening in these discussions? Clearly, the talkers are talking past each other because they are talking about two different things. The feminist’s “feminism” is NOT the same thing as the non-feminist’s “feminism”. Each conversant has a different mental picture of what the word feminism signifies in real world terms.

The non-feminist looks upon feminism as the less desirable option; that is what makes him not a feminist. Meanwhile, the feminist looks upon feminism as something sacred, and for that reason looks upon the non-feminist standpoint as akin to sacrilege. Please bear these points in mind.

Again I put it to you: what is feminism, and what ISN’T feminism? We need to address that pesky little question with exactitude in order to reach any over-arching conclusion about feminism’s desirability or lack of it. Therefore feminism, the object under examination, must be pinned down, immobilized, and forced to become a definite something; only in that way does it become examinable and susceptible to evaluation. So answers need to arrive, and they need to arrive from authoritative sources. Consequently, the question of authority itself comes to the fore, as does the question of questioning authority.

Briefly then, who has authority to tell the world what feminism is or is not? Does the feminist have such authority? Does the non-feminist have such authority? Or do they each in their own way have such authority?

In the present talk, my contention is that any person at all may at least presume to speak with authority on the question of what is or isn't feminism. Anybody may set up shop in this trade, and there are no licensing requirements. Self-declared participation in feminism itself is no prerequisite for this. If that word (feminism) points to any discoverable object at all, we must allow that the pathways of discovery are manifold and not subject to any monopoly. Anybody may compete in this market, although success will vary according to the governing criteria. So, it is the governing criteria which are now under consideration.

"But wait!", I hear some feminist interject. "Only a feminist has any true authority to say what feminism is or is not, because only a feminist has participated in feminism and truly LIVED feminism. No outsider has any authority to tell ME what feminism is or is not!"

I would reply, that your communal experience among self-styled feminists grants you no authority but to speak of what you and others underwent in your time together, and what you felt and concluded from this. Your particular viewpoint and your especial path of knowledge are in no sense privileged. Neither is it taken on faith that you would evaluate your position honestly. Hence, your authority is merely clubbish, a compound of social memories mingled with selective awareness and possibly wishful thinking. And while these club memories might constitute authority of a parochial sort, there are other forms of authority, from other sources, which must not be neglected. Do not forget that others can view your club from an outward aspect—does that count for nothing?

"But wait!", I hear that feminist interject again. "I have studied feminism for years, and I have read all the books, and I have earned a degree in women's studies. Don't tell me your authority equals mine, mister!"

I would reply, that if in addition to hanging out with supposed feminists, you boast of a scholastic or intellectual authority, you must remember that you aren't the only one who can read books and think about things. Others, very different from you, are avid readers and thinkers also—and they do not have the same emotional filters that you have. So they are free to follow their own unblinkered genius, to quaff from fountains of knowledge that would not occur to you, to generalize, to factor-analyze, to string the dots together and formulate conclusions that might differ markedly from your own.

"But wait!", our feminist chimes in for a third time. "I am a WOMAN! How dare you tell me what feminism is or is not!"

I would reply: "Quite right, you are a woman. And I am a Sagittarius."

And I repeat: ANYBODY may presume to say what feminism is, or what feminism is not. It adds no weight to your claim to merely call yourself a feminist. It gives you no head start in the game. After all, anybody can say "I am a feminist". Talk is cheap, and whether you call yourself a feminist, or call yourself a two-headed Patagonian, has no bearing on your claim to expertise.

And again I say, that a lot rides upon the outcome of this controversy. We must eventually decide in very exact terms what feminism is or is not, and the question is so important that I have given it a special name which hints at the magnitude of it. I call this question the battle for feminism's soul, and I wish to make known why I do so. And as I have already suggested, we seek not only to discover what feminism IS . .. but to determine whether it is right or wrong, desirable or undesirable, noble or ignoble.

Up until now, the feminists have claimed a monopoly of discourse in this realm, thought-policing the avenues of conversation leading into it or out of it and transforming the world of respectable mainstream opinion into an echo chamber where only feminist questions are permitted to be raised, and only feminist answers permitted to be formulated. Not surprisingly, the feminists have concluded that feminism is desirable and honorable. However, they have consistently shrouded in fog the plain and simple definition of feminism, making available so many so-called "answers", and such inadequate ones, that there is effectively no answer at all. And that, I submit, is the weak point where we as counter-feminist seekers of truth must conduct our drilling operations.

Which indeed we have done. And after years of work, we have concluded this: that the "nice" parts of feminism are not feminism's soul, because they do not quintessentially belong to feminism. Rather, they belong to the world at large, and to the realm of liberal humanist bromide. They belong to the generally received body of traditional opinions about fair play, common decency and the like, and if they were broken loose from feminism they could just as well sail under their own flag. Certainly, they do not require a new-fangled monikker like "feminism". And yet, they serve feminism as a masking device because they obscure the vital presence of that OTHER feminism, the not-nice kind whose sole purpose is to boost the female-supremacist agenda.

Yes, we have concluded that female supremacism is feminism's soul. For it is indeed, by any measure, more significant, interesting, original and consequential than liberal platitudes—and politically more profound in its implications, by an order of magnitude

Already, I can hear a howl of protest. "No! That's NOT what feminism really is!"

And I would reply: "Bad luck! You've had YEARS to tell the world what feminism really is. Now it is the world's turn to tell feminism what feminism really is!"

The battle for feminism's soul, is the battle to define feminism's core minima in both a moral and practical sense and, by so doing, gain effective control over feminism's narrative in pragmatic, real-world terms. It is the world's turn to tell feminism what feminism is, and this will come about by shifting the center of narrative authority away from feminism itself. If you are a self-declared feminist, your supposed "inside" knowledge of feminism is worth no more than the "outside" knowledge which others are able to bring forward—THEIR knowledge can be as quintessentially revelatory or determinative as any other.

Accordingly, the nasty bits which outsiders may remark about feminism are not regrettable, accidental, outlying features. They are as much a part of "real" feminism as anything your friendly neighborhood Earnest Feminist would urge you to believe. If these things are feminism's "excrescence", it is because they have been excreted, or forced out from the center, which makes the center their point of origin. Accordingly, our task as counter-feminist propagators of knowledge is to factor feminism's excrescence into its essence. Or as certain wits and wags will be quick to say: to feed feminism its own shit!

Yes. The world has long been an object of the feminist gaze, so it is time to flip the script, and make feminism an object for the world. They have been gazing into the abyss long enough; now the abyss is gazing into them.

Such is the battle for feminism’s soul.

Do Feminists Suffer From Penis Envy?

April 1, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

I recently came across an article about Sigmund Freud's theory of female psycho-sexual development, in which Taylor Kubota described penis envy as follows: "Women become envious of penises at a young age, when they realize boys derive more sexual pleasure from their penises than girls do from their own sexual organs. Freud said this penis envy grows over time." This idea, which I had long disregarded and which didn't correspond to my own experience (as a child I never saw or thought of boys' penises; as a young woman I had no sense of lack) makes sense now in light of feminism's decades-long attack on male sexuality. The attack is based, as feminists' own words and policies indicate, on a febrile mix of resentment, envy, and projection in which the belief that men enjoy sex more than women (and that the enjoyment hurts women, in the typical zero-sum thinking of feminism) has fueled ever-more frenzied attempts at male neutering.

Serious psychotherapists or students of Freud should probably stop reading right now, as I am not attempting a genuine psychoanalytic analysis of feminism or indeed of penis envy, which has been widely dismissed as sexist or justified as women's accurate recognition of men's power. My theory—if it deserves that name—stems from the recognition that anti-sex feminism, involving the continual projection onto men of female sexual anxieties and discontents, has a far more extensive pedigree than most people realize, and that much feminist discussion and activism today take for granted that law and public policy are rightly directed towards "equalizing" not only rights or opportunities but also sexual experience itself, by prioritizing female pleasure and diminishing male.

It's no revelation that many feminist-influenced women are hyper-alert to male advantage while being willfully blind to male disadvantage. In the arena of sexuality, where male and female most intimately and yet mysteriously interact, the irrational ferocity of feminist grievance-mongering reveals itself tellingly. Unwilling and unable to extend sympathetic understanding to male sexual difference, feminist ideology authorizes an envy-fueled anger that far surpasses legitimate caution.

A word about that legitimate caution. Throughout history, well-functioning societies have recognized the threat to civil order—and to women's safety in particular—of male lust, and have passed laws and constructed codes of behavior to contain and direct it. Fathers and husbands have always been interested in protecting their womenfolk from sexual violence. Feminists, however, while exalting female sexuality as benign and beautiful, have repeatedly refused to recognize any manifestation of male sexuality as good. A mere glance at prominent feminist claims and policy initiatives highlights their continual misrepresentations.

Coming to prominence in the 1970s, feminist fury at male sexual violence always went far beyond its ostensible target, smearing all men as harmful. Prominent feminist journalist Susan Brownmiller made the outrageous claim in her 1975 blockbuster Against

Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape, that "[Rape] is nothing more or less than a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear" (p. 15). Note her emphasis on the word conscious. Brownmiller was claiming that rapists purposefully act on behalf of their brother men to create terror so that men in general can more easily control women. Brownmiller drove the point home in a later chapter by comparing rapists to the Myrmidons of Greek legend, the "hired henchmen" who served their master Achilles in battle. Rapists did the "dirty work," as she called it, to "benefit" all men (p. 209). Brownmiller's completely undefended assumption—for which she was lavishly praised by book reviewers, though she offered not one jot of proof in the form of studies or surveys—was that the majority of men prefer to live in a world in which women are kept "in a constant state of intimidation" (p. 209). Many men found it nearly impossible to defend themselves against the assertion that all men vicariously participate in and approve of rape.

Brownmiller's position was soon taken further to suggest that most sex was, from the woman's point of view, not easy to distinguish from criminal sexual assault. In 1989, law professor Catherine MacKinnon summed up the radical viewpoint by declaring, in her article "Sexuality, Pornography, and Method: Pleasure under Patriarchy," that "The major distinction between intercourse (normal) and rape (abnormal) is that the normal happens so often that one cannot get anyone to see anything wrong with it" (p. 336-337). Far from disavowing this absurd piece of hyperbole, feminist activists focused for decades on convincing women to see the "wrong" in "normal," in part by dramatically expanding conceptions of sexual assault to include even harmless touching (such as patting or kissing) and introducing doctrines such as "affirmative consent" and "rape culture" to whip up paranoia.

What was it all for? Surely it was not to improve the average woman's life by encouraging her to fear and dislike men, by telling her that the men she worked with and dated were admirers of rapists who exulted in the thought of a woman's sexual terror, as Brownmiller alleged. How was it helpful to explain to women that dissatisfaction with their sex lives was due to male contempt, objectification, and exploitation, as MacKinnon asserted? Such ideas were designed not to help women live fuller lives but to create angry foot soldiers for feminism—and did.

Anger spread out into an ever-widening sphere of sex-grievance and resentment. Accelerating with the #MeToo movement, it extended to what feminists dubbed sexual harassment and coercion, as for example in the highly publicized case of Harvey Weinstein, in which hundreds of women, over the years, had agreed to sex with the movie mogul—whether enthusiastically or reluctantly, certainly knowingly—in exchange for coveted roles in Weinstein's films, or merely to be close to the center of Hollywood power. Years later, with Weinstein no longer useful to them and their own sexual power on the wane, they were given permission to expend fury on a man they not only testified against but sought to sexually humiliate as thoroughly as possible, describing his deformed penis and disgusting body in gratuitous detail.

Because feminists had been so successful in equating male sexuality with harm to women, Weinstein's guilt was overdetermined: he was powerful, he sought out many women, and he traded movie roles and other favors for sex. To the non-feminist observer, it seemed clear that the women had used Weinstein as much as he had used them, seeing him as little more than a career opportunity. But because their sexual need and satisfaction seemed to have been far less than his, they were victims according to the feminist paradigm, in which only male sexual desire causes harm. That Weinstein might not have experienced much pleasure from the encounters—that he was himself in any manner helpless in the thrall of his own dysfunctions and vulnerabilities—was impossible to consider.

With #MeToo, it became impossible to separate the male pursuit of sexual gratification from the exploitation of women, and outrage often extended to scenarios in which the man had no power and in which there was no force and no sex, but in which there was (at least an allegation of) desire: an awkward attempt to request a date, an unwanted compliment, an "inappropriate" joke, a somebody who stood too close or looked too intently or lingered too long at the water cooler. This man too, the shy nerd, the pale mouth-breather, the self-effacing friend, was targeted with fury—why, because he had desired a woman who had not desired him. It was not enough to reject him: he must be publicly exposed, reported to HR, forced to undergo re-education training, or (preferably) fired in disgrace. Male desire in itself, no matter how innocuously expressed, had been thoroughly contaminated by ideas of harm.

In cyberspace, feminists were furious too, hating that there was a manosphere in which men discussed women: the Pick-up Artists as well as the MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way), the so-called incels as well as Top-G Andrew Tate. Here were men who wanted to have sex with women and men who had had enough of sex with women; men who complained about not getting laid and men who boasted they could always get laid. Any discussion of sex and women outside the feminist framework was seen as a potential prelude to violence.

While male sexual desire in any manifestation was being thoroughly demonized, female sexual desire (or lack thereof) began to receive concerned feminist attention. It turned out that, notwithstanding Gloria Steinem's confident prediction ("As we discover our free will and strength, we are also more likely to discover our own initiative and pleasure in sex," Outrageous Acts and Everyday Rebellions, p. 249), sexual freedom had not made women happy . A new group of feminist critics began to complain about the sexual revolution, which had failed to deliver on its promise of equality, and had primarily been of benefit to men, who were allegedly more suited to sexual liberalism than women were.

These critics, led by conservative feminists such as Louise Perry and Mary Eberstadt, proposed a halt to its excesses, which saw women forced (or not exactly forced—but in some way propelled) by politeness or indecision or lack of confidence into having sex they didn't want with men they didn't care for. Notable in many of these discussions was the implication that something had been done to women that required redress from others, particularly men, who needed to be summoned from their mindless rutting to protect women from yet another patriarchal last-laugh. Jessica Bennett, the gender editor at The New York Times, wrote a famous op/ed in late 2017 (not coincidentally at the height of #MeToo) called “When Saying Yes is Easier Than Saying No,” ostensibly to suggest that women still lacked the power to consent fully, but in which what was most remarkable were the many varieties of unhappy, unsatisfying, even grossly unappealing sex the modern woman was alleged to be enduring.

Some of these counter-sexual revolution feminists now declared marriage the answer, extolling commitment and monogamy. Security and caring, it turned out, along with the sacrosanct nature of sex within marriage, were more important for women than freedom. But sex within marriage has been the focus of complaint too, with some feminists detailing the woes of male sexual expectations. One anonymous woman narrated in a Vox article the “impossible to discuss” indignity she endured and forced her husband to share in their marital bed, where she “read a book to distract [herself] for as long as [she] could while he did the thing he needed to do.” She explained that marriage, far from being a refuge from the brutality of casual encounters, was actually brutality’s culmination: “The institution of marriage […] gives a man years to accomplish the emotional manipulation that men on dates must squeeze into an evening. How can we consider such a persistent campaign for a woman’s compliance anything but assault?” The source of her furious dissatisfaction—and the contempt and lack of empathy for the rejected husband—were never satisfactorily explained.

Even feminist scholars of law have taken up the cause, with one, Robin L. West, professor of law and philosophy, writing a substantial treatise about the harms to women of what she has called “unwelcome” but consensual sex—sex consented to but not desired—which she compared, using a Marxist framework, to alienated labor. Though she stopped short of suggesting that unwelcome (consensual) sex should be criminalized, she concluded that far more public discussion and awareness were needed of the many forms of female sexual unhappiness.

Well into feminism’s Fourth Wave, when women are no longer shamed but instead celebrated for their sexual choices—with their Slut Walks and Pussyhats, their baring of breasts and shouting of abortions—we have the insistence by many feminist theorists and women’s advocates that women are deeply angry, unhappy, and disillusioned with every possible facet of female sexual experience; and always with the sneaking suspicion, or the outright declaration, that the only ones having a good time (as always) are men.

The idea that men take more pleasure than women from sex rankles deeply, I have come to believe, with women already conditioned, by nature and feminist culture, to believe themselves destined for the short end of the stick (no pun intended). Feminist ideology has taught women to be deeply offended by men’s interest in sex and pursuit of it, even when the interest doesn’t go beyond looking (now potentially a criminal offence). Some women are peeved by the unselfconscious manner in which men hold their bodies and move in space (ludicrously targeted in campaigns against “manspreading” and the like). Many even begrudge sexless men their longing for sex, which is at least authentic and owned by the men (at times in anguished and ugly terms), in distinction from women’s subterranean, often unconscious or repressed, desires and power machinations.

In the sexual arena, women's desires are often tinged with fantasies of submission and the erotics of violence (think of the hordes of women who write love letters to convicted killers), a reality colliding awkwardly with public declarations of women's preference for equality and respect. The difficulty of securing women's sexual pleasure continues to roil public conversations. In contrast, men have little trouble knowing what they want and taking pleasure in what they get, and many feminist women, it seems, can't forgive them for it.

Ever since women began agitating for women's rights long ago, the now-familiar carping about male sexuality has been fundamental. Mid-19th century social reformer Josephine Butler was so angry about the fact of prostitution—in which she saw women unvaryingly as powerless victims of male lust—that she publicly denounced all men in Great Britain for tolerating "a wholly different standard of sexual purity from that existing generally among women" (Annual Address to the Ladies' National Association [1871], p. 32). Suffragette leader Christabel Pankhurst claimed in The Great Scourge and How to End It (1913) that up to 75% of British households were infected by syphilis or gonorrhea because of a "perverted and corrupted" male sexuality unsatisfied by "intercourse with virtuous women" and instead seeking "lewdness and obscenity" (p. 204).

The outrage at men became so widespread during these years that moderate feminist Wilma Meikle complained in Towards a Sane Feminism (1917) that too many of her fellow campaigners were driven by an obsessive repugnance towards sex that saw all men as depraved and "conscious and wilful oppressors" (p. 84).

Denunciations of male sexual depravity in the nineteenth century were often coupled with the assertion of female moral superiority. Author Frances Swiney, one of the leading prophets of a future female ascendency, commended women for their superiority to men in "self-denial" (The Awakening of Women; Or, Woman's Part in Evolution [1899], p. 32) and their ability to keep "bodily appetites […] in abeyance" (p. 38).

But it seems that such conviction of superiority—though frequently attested by both women and men, then and now—was ultimately a rather hollow boast. It is all very well to pat one's sex on the back for dangerous pleasures foregone, but when one has little appetite for or familiarity with the pleasure to begin with, one is apt to resent that anyone should indulge it. Our era's ever-multiplying policies, prohibitions and public denunciations of male sexuality often seem to represent little more than bitter revenge against the male potential for sexual satisfaction.

Penis envy is a metaphor for the manifold ways that feminist women envy men and make them stand-ins for their disgruntlement. In particular, such women have come to hate—through deliberate misunderstanding and misrepresentation—men's sexual interest in women's bodies and desire for sexual touch. Such women may not be conscious of the root of their boundless rage (and Freud had a thing or two to say about the unconscious), but once that root is glimpsed, it reveals itself with unnerving persistence.

J4MB will continue to operate as before, but no longer as a political party

April 1, 2023 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

Following lengthy consideration, we've decided that operating as a political party is no longer an asset for our work, and we have therefore decided to de-register the party. The Electoral Commission has been informed accordingly, and we expect to receive their formal notice of de-registration very shortly.

The show will, however, go on. We'll continue operating under the J4MB 'banner'. We remain as committed as we've always been, since we launched J4MB as a political party in 2013 (how time flies!)

De-registering as a political party will do little to reduce our operating costs. One change that will affect donors is that future donations (and subscriptions) should be made to Mike Buchanan's company, MRA International Ltd., rather than the bank or PayPal accounts of J4MB. You can make a donation through the button below, fuller details (including bank account details) on the donations page.

Thank you for your support of J4MB as a political party, I hope you'll continue to support us in our new form.

Feel free to contact me (mike@j4mb.org.uk / 07967 026163) on this or any other matter.

Got dick? Wave it in their faces

April 2, 2023 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

I wanted to do an issue of MenZ once, dedicated entirely to the demonization of male sexuality. Only I couldn't come up with enough quality content on the subject to fill a pamphlet, let alone magazine. And I have to admit, that surprised me a lot given the far reaching effects of this phenomenon. Maybe I'm making connections that don't exist. Perhaps I'm the sane one, and the rest of the world is crazy. Or the fallacy of FalseCompromise is actually true, and the truth lies somewhere in the middle.

I'm a 'big picture' guy, and don't deal well with minutia, so I refuse (generally) to research much by way of links. Take this as a "Here's something to ponder," if my presentation doesn't mesh exactly with your experience (ie, don't fuckin nitpick if you can help it).

It's no secret that male sexuality does not enjoy a good reputation these days. In fact, the mere accusation of actually HAVING a sexuality is enough to force congressmen to resign – even toppling international figures, and the average man faces accusations of being 'creepy' or only caring about 'one thing' if the subject is ever broached. We have made an about-face from Victorian times – sort of. Men still face all the obligations they were saddled with in the 19th century, along with all the social restrictions women faced in the 19th century. Of course, the corrillary is that women enjoy the benefits of both former roles, and none of the obligations.

I should point out that this is one area in which I will use the general term 'women,' precisely because I mean women. This fits all of them closely enough to render exceptions truly…er…exceptional. Women have gleefully engaged in these practices, recognizing the social power it gives them, with or without regard to the males around them they supposedly care about.

Furthermore, I will pre-emptively state that any woman who declares themselves guilt-free in this instance to be an out and out liar. This is not a judgment of character (per se) so much as an indication of how pervasive and acceptable the denigration of male sexuality is.

Now, you may be asking just what I mean when I say "demonization of male sexuality." Truthfully, the practice is so widespread it sort of defies easy definition. I would posit "Humiliation and ostracization due to natural biological desires, based solely on the sex of the person so regarded"…but that's pretty wordy and not a very catchy idea. Let's let that one stew for a bit.

How does this demonization manifest in our lives, as men? That's perhaps the next place we should look for a definition. Maybe we can name the beast by describing its nature.

The obvious first place to look is male genital mutilation. Nothing says "I'm afraid of horny men" quite like lopping off most of their erogenous zones and turning them into face cream for rich old white chicks. There are few areas of social concern which so blatantly flaunt sexist double standards upheld by fear of male sexuality quite so clearly as in this instance.

Nearly all fine-touch receptors are removed (the foreskin itself), along with most or all of the frenulum (similar in function to the female clitoris), and the only remaining sensitive area is left to keratinize over time. This barbaric practice was pushed by Dr. Kellogg as a means of stifling the urge to masturbate, and specifically to curb the sexual desires of men. He was not the first, nor the last medical "professional" to recommend mutilation of babies in order to curb sexual desire.

This attitude carries through to today, with mothers convincing themselves it's a simple "useless flap of skin," as Barbara Kay put it in the National Post. Many women claim they like the looks of a 'cut' penis better, and incredibly enough, think that justifies the mutilation of their sons. It shows just how common this form of hatred for male sexuality is.

Male sexuality is also a huge part of Sexual Harassment Law. Without the innate distrust, or even hatred of men that are successful with women, and jealousy of women not chosen, Sexual Harassment as a concept would not exist.

This "crime" was constructed out of whole cloth, to punish those men daring enough to believe themselves worthy of asking a woman out. Never mind the boss chasing the Secretary around the desk stereotypes. Those women flirting with the boss typically were working there to find a husband. No, Sexual Harassment Law even flat out admits what it's really about….

Sexual Harrassment is : Unwelcome sexual advances, requests for sexual favors, and other verbal or physical conduct of a sexual nature that tends to create a hostile or offensive work environment.

Keyword: Unwelcome

If she wants you to, well then it's OK. And no, there's no way to find out beforehand if you're going to lose your job, or get a girlfriend. Why would you lose your job? Because you are inflicting your unwelcome male sexuality on a woman who doesn't like you.

Rules only apply to the ugly or socially awkward.

In fact, this maxim applies in general society as well. Women routinely wield such epithets as "creep" and "loser," for men guilty of being undesirable to that particular woman.

And don't think for a minute that she is unaware of how much it hurts you. You simply deserve the pain for having the audacity to pursue her when she wanted the other guy. For wanting her, he is a nice catch. For wanting her and showing it in the same exact way, you are a physical threat and a legal liability.

As for rape? Well, men are such pigs that they should be denied the presumption of innocence. Because we all know they're all rapists underneath (at least, according to Amanda Marcotte).

Think this doesn't affect you? The disappearance of manufacturing jobs can be traced directly to policies to make the workplace more woman-friendly. Sexual harassment law has contributed greatly to the decline of the North American economy. And this law is nothing more than petty jealousy of those not selected by the "right" men, enforced by Law.

Even once in a relationship, male sexuality must be tightly controlled, apparently, lest we get a swelled head. Men must EARN the right to have sex. To think otherwise would be to place male and female sexuality on the same plane. And everyone knows men are icky.

This pay to play mentality is also the main impetus behind the injustice in Family Court. If a child results from sex, even if the man didn't want a child and was denied the right to choose, he must still pay to play. Essentially, the family court system has decided that all women are whores, and when they get pregnant, a man must be made to pay. Sure they couch this in 'best interests of the children', but that phrase is no more true in this instance than it was when the NAZIs used it.

And we all know, via Lorena Bobbitt, what women REALLY think of male sexuality. Who could have watched all the women gleefully joking about the mutilation of a man in his sleep, that still thinks women have compassion for men, let alone any kind of regard resembling "love?"

As for the Legal issues men face regarding sex, like Reproductive rights, women take the traditional pay to play (or "women are all whores, really") approach on a massive scale. Men being able to walk away with no consequences for sex? Horrendous! Never mind the consequences were 100% her choice…he must be pilloried, else other cads take liberties with the women.

And fathers wanting better Parental rights? They're just mad they can't rape the mother anymore.

Hatred of male sexuality runs throughout Feminism, and progressive ideologies like the Mekong River during rainy season. This is hardly a subject that needs further exploration, save to say Feminism is currently the fount from which all the hatred emerges.

Men are afraid to help small children for fear of being called a pedophile now, thanks to feminist "awareness" on the issue that paints all pedophiles as men (when women are in fact the majority). Fear and distrust of male sexuality made this an easy sell. Men are forced out of all sorts of career paths, face diminished opportunity in many others, and face an increasingly bleak outlook, because it's "common knowledge" men are perverts and abusers. Just look at all the non-profit group's posters on the wall saying so.

But the biggest haters, the ones with the most visceral contempt for men who admit they like to fuck, are the White Knights. Hatred of male sexuality is the core of the White Knight mentality, usually because they view themselves above those base men that women seem to like so much. This is why White Knights and Feminists have such a cozy relationship.

They both aim to reduce the sexual competition by demonizing male sexuality.

One method employed, usually by the “sensitive new age guy” (SNAG) types, is through “concern.” They are “concerned” for the safety of women and children, especially those in relationships with “unenlightened” men, afraid they might be abused….and usually sexually.

Another method is the “cad haters,” that justify their jealousy of sexually successful men by essentially calling them rapists. Utilizing the “rape culture” meme installed by feminists, these White Knights paint any man with a potential hard-on as a rapist, hoping to scare the women of his desire into his “safe, moral arms.”

Pardon the repeated use of scare quotes. The level of bullshit in the language of all these actors demands it.

Anyhow, white knights use chivalry as their guide, and let their sense of moral superiority justify their hatred, and continued abuse, of their fellow man, for the good of society. For them it’s not so much that an umarried man isn’t producing for a woman (although that offends as well), it’s that too many unmarried (and thus sexually aggressive) men result in a much higher probability his S/O will stray. Or, it will be that much harder to attract one in the first place.

Male sexuality is blamed for every social malady, in some way or form. That is one of the many things MRAs are fighting to correct. Building public distrust and fear, even disgust, at male sexuality, has both been a key strategy, and enabling device for further attack, since perceptions can only worsen with each myth.

This is the fulcrum issue, this is the means by which you, and I, and every other man is controlled, by social pressure in our day to day interactions. The key to our struggles lies in this area somewhere, I’m convinced of it. We may not be able to define it, but we can fight it. Furthermore, I’m of the mind that all men, whether they can agree with MRA goals or not, would benefit society and themselves greatly of they do but one simple thing.

Refuse to apologize for being male, and liking sex.

Putting Faces on Victims – Stories of child abuse and domestic violence: When the political becomes personal

April 3, 2023 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

For 13 years I worked as a case manager and investigator handling child abuse cases for one of the largest child welfare agencies in the U.S.. During that time I saw the results of some of the most horrific violence and abuse imaginable.

I saw the striped scars from shoulder to heal on the back and legs of a 9 year old boy who had been beaten by his mother with an extension cord on multiple occasions. I listened to his mother after she had undergone parent training and counseling tell me in no uncertain terms that if he needed it, she would do it again. I sat with my jaw dropped in horror as I hung up the phone after learning that the judge in the case had sent the boy home to live with her against my recommendations. I often wonder what became of him.

I saw the bruising around the lips of a 10 year old girl. It had been caused by her own tongue as she incessantly licked them, unable to stop due to emotional problems after suffering physical and sexual abuse from her father and grandmother who also made her, her older brothers, and younger sister compete with the dog for food by throwing leftovers onto the back porch. The children weren't permitted in the house. They were kept in the garage and given a 5-gallon plastic bucket to use for a toilet.

I saw the tears on the face of a 12 year old boy who had been cowering in the corner, curled into a little ball crying from the fear that his new social worker would be a woman and the tentative smile on his face when he saw that I was a man. The boy wouldn't speak. His father told me that he had requested the case be re-assigned to a male because his son was afraid of women after having been molested by his mother and her girlfriend who had also forced him to have sex with his younger sister and had videotaped everything. The sister was institutionalized.

I sat and listened while a 6 year old girl told me she hated her father for what he had done to her, all the while calling him horrible names. Then, when asked about what her father had done, she described playing with him in the park, being taken to Disneyland , and going to movies. When asked whether he had ever hurt her, she said "no." She eventually said that she hated him because her mother had told her to hate him. Her mother wasn't nearly as shy about it. In between a string of expletives that would have made any sailor proud, I gathered that this guy was a cross between Ed Gein, Jeffery Dahmer, and Charles Manson.

I can go on. I can tell you about the couple whose 5 children were up for adoption because they wouldn't stop fighting each other. I can tell you that the children's father showed me two scars, one on his back, the other on his thigh, both the result of being stabbed by his wife. The two of them joked about it as though it were no big deal. He deserved it. He provoked it. He would flirt with other women until she would beat him senseless.

He did it because the makeup sex was incredible. Meanwhile, it cost them their children who they claimed to love more than anything.

I can tell you about the two little girls who witnessed their mother shoot their father as he slept, once in the groin and once in the head. It was shortly after the Lorena Bobbitt case and she claimed that the father had been sexually abusing the children. There was no evidence of it. The girls denied it. There were no reports to law enforcement or children's services. She couldn't even produce a single witness to testify that she had told anyone prior to killing the man. At her trial, she plead guilty to some lesser charge and got off with time served, a year in the county jail.

And the mother who shot and killed her husband while her daughters looked on? Her case was back in the system several years later.This time she had been sentenced to 25 years to life for the murder of her mother over money and having her new husband dispose of the body. He's serving 12-25 while the two girls and a new half-brother are in foster care.

What does each of these cases have in common aside from being some of the most horrific cases I had to deal with during my years of service?

In two words: domestic violence.

Domestic violence is frequently categorized as man beating woman. Only men commit this atrocity, only women are its victims. If women are violent, it must be because she is defending herself or her children. That's what many in the industry will tell you. What I will tell you is that not one of these cases was like that. I handled some that were, but most were not. In most cases that I handled that involved DV, the DV was mutual. In some it was the woman abusing the man.

In the first case of the boy beaten with the extension cord the boy's father was in jail, having been convicted of hitting the mother. I read the police report. I read the court testimony. I might as well have been reading an Orwellian novel. The mother was beating the boy, again. She was high on methamphetamines. The father intervened to try and stop it. She then hit him, with the cord. He finally punched, knocking her out. He called the police who then arrested him, not her.

The boy was striped from head to tow and removed from her care. She was never charged.

The case of the girl with the bruised lips is the worst case I have ever seen. The two parents had eight children. The first four grew to adulthood before they had the second four. They had abused all eight. According to one of the adult daughters, her mother would beat them and their father. The sexual abuse happened on nights when their mother would kick their father out of the bedroom, usually after being quite violent.

The girls would try to take care of him, often having to stop some bleeding. To quote her "Things would get romantic after that." The father once told me that he had been molested by his own mother beginning at the age of twelve. In fact, he fathered his own sister at the age of fifteen.

In the case of the boy who was afraid of women, he was in his father's custody at the time I received the case as a result of the sexual abuse. But prior to that, custody had been awarded to his mother in the divorce. In family court the parents had each accused the other of DV, the judge chose to believe her in spite of the child's testimony that it was his mother who was violent. The father was awarded monitored visitation to take place at his expense in a therapist's office. He wasn't permitted to even ask about the mother's treatment of the children.

The girl who hated her father hated him so badly that during one of my visits to his home while she was present, she curled up in his lap and went to sleep. Her mother was the violent one. She used to throw things at the father and destroy his property, once having intentionally burned his stamp collection worth several thousand dollars. All of which was verified by the girl before she went to sleep and away from the presence of either parent. Although she did, I didn't need the girl to tell me this. Her actions spoke much louder than her words. When I interviewed her at her mother's house, she refused to allow her mother to hold her and, during my interview when we were supposed to be alone, she kept checking to make sure her mother couldn't hear what she was telling me.

Each and every one of the abusive parents in these cases had been abused as a child, whether it was physical, sexual, emotional, or neglect. This isn't to say that all abuse victims grow up to become abusers. In fact, research suggests that it's only a small percentage. But it is to say that a high percentage of abusers have been victims of abuse themselves.

This includes both domestic violence and child abuse. It also demonstrates that women can be just as abusive as men and points to flaws in our current system that neglect this fact, allowing and even perpetuating this "other abuse" that is said not to exist. We will not end (or even begin to address) the problems of domestic violence and child abuse until we learn to recognize that these are not gender specific problems and we address all perpetrators and treat all victims regardless of whether they are male or female.

Mass Hysteria, Madness and Feminism

April 5, 2023 | by Jan Deichmohle | Link | Original Link

History of Mass Hysteria

An early occurrence of a new form of irrationality was surfacing in the age of ‚enlightenment', when a mob was yelling (rather unenlightened) "Hang to the lanterns, who has a handkerchief!", and "Hang to the lanterns, who hasn't got horny skin!".[i] The people who had soft skin, faced the danger to get lynched.[ii] On the picture above, women lead an armed march of revolutionaries.

Symbol of the French Revolution was an allegorical Marianne, portrayed swinging the tricolour during street fighting. When women and children, the whole family are involved in ideologies, this results in radicalisation. What had been rather a peripheral matter and aberration before, was transformed into a principle, the foundation of a systematically spread hysteria, and was spread along with ideological world views, closed in itself.

Suffragettes attacking the House of Commons

The first wave transformed hysteria into a principle of life, and to assume as a privileged group to be disadvantaged, to flock together as an angry sisterhood, whose attitude towards life was militant full of hatred and fighting, hysterical screaming because of completely imaginary disadvantages, and to fight against human nature and culture. Such screeching hysteria staged itself by a new political aesthetics they invented, which was later on taken over by fascism and is today regarded as typically fascist. That has been proven in my book Critique of Feminist Ideology. This ideology is not only linked to stubborn ideological militance, but also to victimhood. In self-referred navel view, they lamented about invented troubles and imaginary disadvantages. They believed, the world would be unjust to them. Today, when they get criticised, they redraw insulted to ‘safe rooms’.

I want the vote! (~1900-1913, while most men didn’t have it either)

In this cartoon of the first wave 1900-1913 we can already recognize snow flakes of today.

Political hysteria of feminists was mentioned ~ 1910 in a debate of the British parliament as a characteristic attribute and danger, should society give in to feminist demands. The speech was quoted and analysed in my book on the first wave.

All of the predictions in that speech have been fulfilled. Additionally, later waves caused destructions much worse than the worst expectations of the speaker. Quotes and pictures of the book about the first wave show by historical sources, that this hysteria was not only linked to imaginary disadvantages and victimhood, but also to misandry.

Suffragists on the War Path. “Jump on him, he is only a mere man.”

After the First World War, feminism and its methods were accredited and integrated into society, after their demands were fulfilled. As a result, we had a disrooted generation of youth in the 1920s, disrooted and having trouble in matters of sexuality and sex roles; boyish women (flappers and vamps) and effeminate men were part of the phenomenon as well as massive difficulties of both sexes: confused women and men, whose money had been squeezed out by wives or ex-wives, boys, which girls didn't accept as good enough any more. This has been proven using historical sources of the time in my book "Critique of feminist ideology".

Angry screaming became a method of the political fringes: On the streets, supporters of the red front an Stalin were parading, later on supporters of the brown front and Hitler. Young women were screaming excited, or even fainted: After each outburst of feminist irrationality follows a phase of confusion or disarray: Women try to regain lost triggers of female instincts, on which the love towards men and society are based. As human nature is damaged, and time-tested culture lost, this is done in a distorted – and dangerous – way. That may result in hysterical admiration of a Stalin or Hitler, or screeching and fainting at the concert of a boy group, or throwing teddies to welcome demographical intruders, applauding and welcoming demographical conquerors replacing native men, who get degraded to incels or losers. Those native men had before been fought by screaming hate-filled feminists.

Like feminists, both communists and fascists perceived themselves to be persecuted, while in reality it was the other way round: They were persecuting those of different believes. Thus their perception was contrary to reality. Fascists believed in a 'Zionist world conspiracy', communists in a 'capitalist' and 'imperialist' 'enemy of their class', blaming them for every screw, which wouldn't fit. Feminists blamed subjective feelings and dissatisfaction with an invented 'patriarchal structure', as absurd a conspiration theory as the fascist version. They were never able to give any proof for the existence of such a structure. To the contrary, it can be proven that the course of their discontent were bad decisions of the feminists themselves, and the results of previous feminist waves.

Association of German girls, The Hitler Youth, screaming

Irrationality generally broke out in world war and mass murder; after the ideology creating such actions was gutted, the causes remained: The breakdown of natural structures, of a cultural complement of both sexes and their relationships, through which feelings can develop and mature naturally. Feminism, in the delusion of knowing everything better and improving the world with an ideology, which is at war with human nature, and interpreting nature the wrong way round, made sure that the damage done by previous waves could never heal, but instead additionally new damage was done.

Therefore the problems persisted. Not only women were dissatisfied. Young people, especially boys, struggled to find a place in society. Women lacked something that could no longer develop naturally and culturally, after feminism damaged natural culture, eventually destroying it. There was therefore a lack of young men who seemed worthy of female admiration. Men were lacking, what could give them such feminine feelings. In particular, there was a lack of maturation which could give rise to mature, civilized love. Instead, dangerous animal instincts ran wild. Today, alpha males get preferred to betas and incels.

Beatlemania, mostly female fans screaming

In 1964 they screeched longing for rock musicians. In 1968, when the second wave broke out, they screamed aggressively, hateful protesting against ‘white heterosexual manliness’ and an imaginary ‘patriarchy’, a perversion of the longing for impressive males a few years back. Today they choose illegally admitted immigrants from Islamist or other problematic countries, because they unconsciously want victorious conquerors (like Hitler, Stalin, Duce, Mao, Che …). That’s a political perversion, too, resulting from the collapse of cultural bonds and structures.

Such animal instincts are very volatile and tip over quickly. A few years after girls screamed to adore young men, and some fainted because young men of high standing had already disappeared from normal society, the screeching discontent of daughters of the feminist era was already turning back into the hatred of men, with which trouble once had started.

> «I was a target for abuse. Anywhere I spoke there was a contingent of screaming, heckling feminists waiting for me. … Abusive telephone calls to my home, death threats and bomb scares, became a way of living for me and for my family.»[v] (Erin Pizzey)

When it comes to feminism, media has been biased since the first feminist wave. Voices critical of feminism where either ignored, or reports were defamatory. As documented in my books, as early as 1913 Ernest Bax described the bias of media and the feminist pressure on media, not to publish voices opposing feminism. One reason for this biased negative attitude is the sentiment of women influenced by feminism. They didn't want to tolerate free speech, which was a habit in previously male groups, as they existed in traditional cultures. Men talked among themselves without ‚political correctness'. However, when ladies were present, men tactfully avoided topics ladies could dislike. When women mingled into once male groups, they expected the same refraining from disliked topics or opinions. As a result, men had no place left where to talk unrestricted.

Our media didn't report about such matters. They were biased since the first feminist wave, even more so since 1968. When it came to emotic issues like the critique of feminism or emancipation, press wasn't free and either didn't report on it at all, or with a strong feminist bias. Even though there are enough historical sources and contemporary witnesses, it's not easy to find pictures of screaming feminists. Most reports are favouring them. When Erin Pizzey, who started women's shelters and soon realized, that men would need such shelters as much as women, was touring England to promote her book "Prone to Violence", she was threatened by hateful screeching feminists and needed police protection. Many had similar experiences.

They got naked in front of passers-by and then screamed angrily en masse [vi] (daily-mail.co.uk)

This continues until today's third wave. A pathological trait has been added: To smear themselves red like blood; in at least one demonstration, participants also scratched themselves with razor blades to stain with their own blood.

Blood-smeared or red-painted feminists screeching

> A group of women plays the attackers, wrestles down her colleagues for minutes, who are shouting slogans. Wheeze, screech, roar. "Always in sync," Inna tells the activists. [vii] (Bild)

The hysterical perversion also continues to admit and adore more aggressive intruders instead of their own men who are ravaged. Because of the cultural destruction caused by earlier feminist waves, strong men from a cultivated cultural elite are missing. That is why, as a substitute, the most inadequate and harmful ones are hailed and screamed at in admiration. The same happened for Hitler, Duce, Stalin, Mao, Che Guevara. A comparatively harmless variant was the Beatlemania, when girls overran police barriers or rushed into a hotel to get closer to the Beatles or the Rolling Stones. Today, suicidal for all of us, they welcome a millionfold surplus of men immigrating from zones of war, crises and the world's most problematic areas. Famous murderers on death row also receive baskets of female fan mail or even get married behind bars, or waiting for execution. Similar anti-social blenders get their attention. Such negative selection spoils our gene pool with harmful traits chosen for procreation.

Screaming feminists

> In 2015 I was stunned to see a particularly large number of women screaming at the 'refugees' like at an Elvis concert. For my part, I see my assumption confirmed – they sniffed pheromones and are on a testosterone trip. There are > also more and more mixed couples… hooray… until one cries….

> They are trained to bite off competition, to step on rape victims again – because the stupid pig has only indicated it because of xenophobia. They don't come up with the idea of who is really the most primitive – like when you're on a panting hormone trip yourself. Everything is reduced to your own pleasure, there is no space for anything else.
> And you can immediately recognize them by the fact that they are incapable of a rational conversation and instead yell everyone down with hysterical stone age noise – here there is pure emotion … and nothing else.»[viii] (Alexandra Bader)

The inadequate and fanatic welcome corresponds to the same hysterical feminist perversion as hating their own 'white heterosexual' men. The same holds for their anger at an imaginary 'disadvantage' of actually privileged women. Only by prescribing their utopic ideology as a result to be achieved, they construct female 'disadvantage' where there is privilege and always has been. Again, same perversion in their self-pity towards imaginary sufferings, while excluding local men from empathy and ignoring their real problems.

At the same time they fight their own local men with revolutionary attitude, screaming hate. These men share their culture, are mostly adequate and educated to local standards, yet they get broken and oppressed by feminist agenda. Such perversion has been a driving force of all feminist waves. This perversion resulted in feminist distortion of science, utopical ideology contradicting human nature. Instincts ran wild. There's no grain of truth in the nonsense they produced.

Feminists attack Argentinian cathedral. Aggressive feminist women, ready to use violence

Since the first wave, hysteria is a driving force of political ideologies and consecutive feminist waves. Following generations have a vague feeling, that something is missing, without any clear indication, what is missing. So they are susceptible for political or religious ideologies and new feminist waves. They hate, what they need. They destroy, what could help them: the culture they and previous waves have destroyed. Their fanaticism made them attack human universals.

Angrily screaming feminists presenting a giant vagina sculpture

Political hysteria, misandry and the described perversion of sexuality are driving forces of a new form of irrationality. The first feminist wave brought it up and made it acceptable in society. Such political hysteria and irrationality have been adapted by many extremist groups since, along with the methods. As feminist emancipation disrooted many, they became susceptible.

The first feminist wave had invented a self-presentation, which was later on adopted by fascists and is today known as “aesthetics of fascism”. Already the first wave was intolerant to opposing opinions. The second wave was screaming hatefully, burning bras and spreading hatred against opponents and different views. The first wave was known for militancy and terrorist attacks on men and artworks. They sliced pictures; the Taliban blew up Buddhas. During the second wave, female terrorism resurfaced as phenomenon; this time, however, in left wing groups such as the RAF in Germany. Most however were quickly established in media, politics, at universities and in society.

Already 1968, professor Goldberg from the University of New York could hardly publish his study about a human universal – differences of both sexes and their roles found all over the world in different societies. Since the 1970s, it was next to impossible to publish a deep-rooted non-feminist argument. Erin Pizzey told in an interview, that she knew many smart men, who could never publish their non-feminist book. In the very rare cases it was published, they would get threatened, as she herself. Even Esther Vilar, whose book was published 1971, had difficulties finding a publisher. All German publishers except one had already rejected her book, she told, when the last publisher finally accepted. Yet she was attacked and threatened by feminists and was forced to exile.

Today, hysterical screaming in fear of CO2 works the same way it did during feminist waves. An inversion to enthusiastic reverence for leaders is displayed by extremist movements, may they be right wing, left wing or religious. Screeching tips over from anger, hate and protest to sexual desire or to leader cult, and the other way round.

Beatles fans cheered and screamed. Women long for admirable famous men, whether at a pop concert or in a dictatorship.

Third wave demonstrators may dress in pussy hats.

Welcome to Germany

Even though the last picture was not examined, whether it's photoshopped, the components are real and stem from the same movement. As such, it describes reality. Today, even the difference between good satire and reality has become fluid.

Madness and Feminism

Biographies of many leading feminists contain (often hidden) evidence of mental illnesses, that not only shaped the lives of activists introducing new ideas, but also first appeared during a feminist wave.

> Medical researchers have long puzzled over schizophrenia's late emergence (it was first diagnosed in 1911, in Switzerland) and its prevalence in the industrial world, where the illness is degenerative and permanent. (In "primitive" societies, when it exists at all, it is typically a passing malady.) In 2005, when Jean-Paul Selten and Elizabeth Cantor-Graae, experts on the epidemiology of > schizophrenia, reviewed various risk factors—foremost among them migration, racism, and urban upbringing—they found that the factors all involved chronic isolation and loneliness, a condition that they called “social defeat.” (New Yorker Magazine)

At that time, at the height of the first feminist wave, the last remnants of Western culture complementing of the sexes began to crumble, and with it the bond between the sexes on the one hand, and the sexual-social identity. It’s not surprising, when new mental illnesses emerge at the same time, which also play a role in the lives of leading feminists. This combination of psychosis with the feminist movement spreads these problems. This is paradoxic and tragical: Feminists are unconsciously missing something, feel an unexplainable suffering, then irrationally blame and accuse a ‘patriarchy’, used as a conspiracy theory. In reality, the culture they attack would have been key to overcome their suffering, giving them, what was already missing. Their suffering was created by themselves, their feminist agenda and previous feminist movements. In spite of it they use this suffering as a driving force to pursue their work of further destruction, and to instigate an angry cultural revolution against the last cultural remains. Thus they create the suffering from which they claim to save. Their psychosis is the result of the breakdown of natural and cultural relationships, which, if intact, would prevent isolation, loneliness and loss of identity.

Several leading feminist founders were in psychiatric treatment, in a mental hospital.

> «It’s unclear when the first symptoms of schizophrenia surfaced … Neighbours were complaining that Firestone was screaming in the night and that she had left the taps running until the floorboards gave way. Laya flew to New York and found Shulamith emaciated and panhandling, carrying a bag holding a hammer and an unopened can of food. In the roman à clef, Firestone wrote that she had not eaten for a month—fearing that her food had been poisoned—and “looked like something out of Dostoevsky (which actually helped her beggar’s earnings).” The next day, Laya took the action for which, she said, “Shulie never forgave me,” and brought her to the Payne Whitney Clinic for evaluation. Her condition was diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenia, and she was involuntarily transferred to a residential facility in White Plains.»[x] (a.a.O.)

Beside Firestone also Kate Millet was affected. A lot of psychotic traits were described by her family, who suffered from her characteristics such as: “brutal sadist” and “violent bully”.

> «In the 1970’s I was alarmed to hear that my big sister, Kate Millett, who had serious mental health issues which had agonized my family and her friends for many years, was organizing a group called The Mental Patients’ Project in order > to claim that the psychiatric community and society were "oppressing" people and "stigmatizing them with labels such as psychotic, bi-polar, schizophrenic, borderline personalities," etc and unconstitutionally imprisoning them in hospitals thereby violating their civil rights. We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate's issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. She was a brutal sadist, a violent bully at whose hands everyone about her suffered.»[xi] (Frontpage Mag)

As if in derision, all facts were turned upside down in psychiatric treatment, too: It was not the "brutally sadist" and "violent bully" that was the perpetrator, no, she considered herself to be the 'innocent victim' of a 'repressive psychiatry' that wrongly assumed all kinds of illnesses, just as she felt victim of a 'patriarchy', which she probably ascribed to be the 'sadist' and 'bully' she in fact was herself. By the way, the psychiatric agenda was harmful, too. Articles tell that many who needed treatment ended broken on the streets instead; some of them committed crimes as murder. Her rebellion against psychiatry cost lives, too. Just as many male suicides where the result of feminism.

The same trick she used in psychiatry and as a feminist, whether she blamed the psychiatric system, or men, society and the alleged 'patriarchy'. It's astonishing, that scientists, psychiatrists and the elite of her time either didn't see or didn't explain these absurdities, to stop a mass psychosis from spreading, which is at the core of feminism.

Jill Johnston, whose book "Lesbian Nation" is considered a breakthrough in lesbian feminism, also suffered from schizophrenia.

> «Hospitalized twice for schizophrenia, Johnston»[xii] (encyclopedia)

A list of important feminists having psychic disorders, stemming from feminists themselves, begins during the first wave at the end of the 19th century. It would be interesting to know, if non-feminist voices did observe more such cases.

> «The Politics of Women's Madness Narratives is a study of autobiographical writing by women who were diagnosed with psychiatric conditions. The book explores the psychiatric pathologizing of women and the ways in which women have used autobiographical writing to rebel against forced treatment and incarceration. It also outlines the history of psychiatric treatment in the United States and examines the connection between larger social movements and reforms in the care of women mental patients. Among the American women whose narratives are discussed in the book are Elizabeth Packard, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Mary Jane Ward, Joanne Greenberg, Jill Johnston, Kate Millett, and Susanna Kaysen.»[xiii]

A Who's who of early feminism would resemble the list above. Already Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797), a precursor of feminism, had some sexual disorientation, according to modern feminist sources, who claim to continue her cause in modern unscientific gender subjects.

This should be a concern and field of research for scientists. As they fell silent in these matters, I'm compiling information so that it won't get lost.

Contemporaries used to observe a lot of absurdities, contradictions and harmful consequences of the feminist wave they experienced. Usually they assume, previous waves would have been justified, whereas the then current wave would have lost reason and entered the realm of absurdity. The reason is, that people tend to consider as normal what they experienced during their childhood and adolescence. Thus, they accepted previous waves, without reflecting, that they had rightly appeared just as absurd and harmful to their ancestors. No progress can be made, before they realize, that they are not the first generation exposed to it, and that previous generation were justified to be as sceptical as they get today.

> «Last fall, as I interviewed New York's founding radical feminists, the stories of "social defeat" mounted: painful solitude, poverty, infirmity, mental illness, and even homelessness. In a 1998 essay, "The Feminist Time Forgot," Kate Millett lamented the lengthening list of her sisters who had "disappeared to struggle alone in makeshift oblivion or vanished into asylums and have yet to return to tell the tale," or who fell into "despairs that could only end in death." She noted the suicides of Ellen Frankfort, the author of "Vaginal Politics," and Elizabeth Fisher, the founder of Aphra, the first feminist literary journal.»[xiv] (New Yorker)

Except those two central founding leaders of feminism, many other activists of their avantgarde group were affected, as Kate Millet herself claimed, and other activists confirmed.

> While Warhol was on the phone, Solanas fired at him three times. Her first two shots missed, but the third went through both lungs, his spleen, stomach, liver, and oesophagus. She then shot art critic Mario Amaya in the hip. She tried to shoot Fred Hughes, Warhol's manager, in the head, but her gun jammed.»[xv] (Wikipedia)

Valerie Solanas was suffering of paranoid schizophrenia.[xvi] Ti-Grace Atkinson described self-destructive forces, too.

> «In a 1970 address, titled "Divisiveness and Self-Destruction in the Women's Movement: A Letter of Resignation," which was delivered to the Congress to Unite Women, in New York City, she warned that women's "rage, masquerading as a pseudo-egalitarian radicalism under the 'pro-woman' banner," was turning into "frighteningly vicious anti-intellectual fascism of the left." After hearing about the speech, several women, including Freeman, met and vowed to fight the problem. "Instead, each of us slipped back into our own isolation,"

> Freeman said. “The result was that most of the women at that meeting dropped out, as I had done. Two ended up in the hospital with nervous breakdowns.” After Ti-Grace Atkinson resigned from the Feminists, a group she had founded in New York, she declared, “Sisterhood is powerful. It kills. Mostly sisters.”»[xvii]

We should not overlook the fact, that Freeman also identified isolation as a major problem, experienced something similar to Ti-Grace Atkinson, and experienced the destructive power of the sectarian feminist replacement community. Incidentially, Erin Pizzey, who was the first to fight domestic violence, recognized the same high percentage of female perpetrators and violent tendencies of problem-laden women, which is why feminists were hostile towards her. They stole her idea and turned it into a one-sided war against men. Erin Pizzey, who became a deserving voice against feminism, had grown up in Asia with large families and more cultural structures; in an interview she described the unusual loneliness in the small family of the West and the twisted reaction of the feminists to this problem.

Such isolation is understandably a problem when time-tested human relationships and communities we’re used to break down. Additionally, the relationships of the sexes were once linked by exchange, both providing different contributions. That also faded away.

The loss of these natural bonds and efforts for each other makes us lonely. We are mostly concerned with the family, which was once an extended family or clan full of life, connections, roles and lifestyles. That was increasingly reduced to the core family, which was eventually also destroyed by feminism. Socially, that process was an impoverishment. Obviously, this creates loneliness and isolation, plus confusion of identity – exactly what triggered feminism, caused the suffering, which caused feminists to rise up, unfortunately in the most harmful way possible: to break families and culture. Causes, damage and suffering were increased and imposed on the rest of society and the world.

So far this was based on common sense, understandable for reasonable people. This isn’t sufficient, though. We have to dig a little deeper to see the whole truth, step back from our habits, from what seems normal in our epoch, what we learned in childhood and life. We have to heed what ethnologist learn, enabling to understand foreign cultures as well as past eras of our own: We have to be prepared to give up everything we are used to, to shed contemporary values and ideas. Only then we can recognize the extent of damage done by feminism.

Only by digital differences of sound, like labial / non-labial, dental / non dental and so on, phonemes can evolve, enabling words, meaning and language. Grammar rules are also required for language to exist. Now the same happens for cultural structure and division of labour, whose origin was the division of labour between both sexes. If both do something different, they complement each other, and exchange evolves. That has been explained in detail in my first book “Culture and sex”. Doing something for each other creates bonds. These are important for our development. Feminists chose to fight and destroy them as ‘gender stereotypes’. Since then, the misunderstanding of both sexes grows. Not astonishingly, except for those who fell for feminist propaganda.

Both, the ability to learn language and to pick up the local culture are inborn. It's like a pre-coded learning program used by small children, who are not smart enough yet to learn language by rules as adults. Yet they outdo adults, learning much faster. They have an inborn ability and need to learn language at a very young age. The same holds for learning cultural sex roles and structure. This is obvious from the fact, that children pick up sex difference as early as language, or even earlier. The earlier it is, the deeper rooted it is in our biology.

Culture is a human universal, existing in all cultures of all times worldwide. The cultural structure is just as elementary as linguistic structure. Both are pronounced from early infancy onwards, is a specifically human ability. Conservatives only see the family, maybe a few more considerations of the tribe or nation, but nothing more. For this reason, it's not enough to defend only the family, eventually nation or tribe. Many believe, all would be fine, if only the family will be restored. That is a mistake. Culture is much more than just a few family ties and habits. Western culture has been impoverished for centuries. While the family initially remained stable, the structures complementing both sexes and creating bonds between both, fell apart. At the same time, massive misandry and one-sided glorification of women have grown over centuries (see Kucklick, "The immoral sex"). A misperception of women as 'oppressed' and 'suffering', and increasing privileges of women resulted.

As both culture and family were reduced to a minimal core, dissatisfaction and loneliness grew. That was the real reason for evolving irrationality, including feminist waves. Feminism worsens the problem which creates feminism in the first place. Thus it's part of a doom loop making things worse constantly.

> «genital differences between human beings would no longer matter culturally … children would be born to both sexes equally, or independently of. … either, however one chooses to look at it; the dependence of the child on the mother (and vice versa) would give way to a greatly shortened dependence on a small group of others in general … The tyranny of the biological family would be broken.»[xviii] (Shulamith Firestone, clinically insane, The Dialectic of Sex, 1970)

According to biologists, anthropologists or Émile Durkheim, one of the founders of sociology, which at the time was not yet fallen prey to ideology, all division of labour goes back to a division of labour between both sexes, that has become increasingly refined and expanded to include social subgroups. That is central to culture and enabled it. Culture was originally describing, how members cooperate and do things for each other, harmoniously combining the different characteristics and needs of both sexes, an exchange that connects and obliges.

Those who grew up before the second feminist wave and paid enough attention to such things might still have experienced the social respect and love that was expressed by sex differences. We lack such warmth; we have become a bit more lonely, superfluous, uprooted, are more easily lost than before in anonymous masses. That intimacy resulting from exchange and togetherness is no longer. It was the charm of ancient cultures. We are missing something that we have to constantly seek, without in most cases ever finding, because these structures no longer exist.

It was a weird, ideological misinterpretation, that women should have everything that men work on. Feminism bereaved men of their contribution to society, making them less needed. Feminists spitefully enjoyed making them tendentially superfluous. On top of it, they felt envy and greed and made girls and women do and obtain themselves, what men do to win the sexual selection exerted by women and men. The result was increasing pressure on men and a growing number of incels and losers. Additionally, forcing men to reward women with alimony when kicking them out, and refused custody became another business model.

It is logically a serious mistake to demand the gift of the other side for yourself in an exchange system, because there is nothing left to exchange afterwards. There can only be an exchange if both sides contribute something of their own that the other side does not have. That's the only way a cultural structure, complementing them in an exchange of contributions for each other can exist. I am doing this for you because you are doing that for me. Mature feelings and sympathy for each other arise from such an exchange of care and contributions. Such tender and compassionate feelings were logically lost when the exchange faded away. We became an isolated crowd of egocentrics.

> «Growing up in seriously dysfunctional families seems to be a common denominator with radical feminists. It seems that if they don't have "daddy issues," they've got "mommy issues," and the predictable attempt to blame all their "issues" on male oppression is often at odds with the available evidence. … Uwe and Sheila Kitzinger sound like a perfect parody of the type of progressives who are so open-minded they believe in everything simultaneously. That three of their daughters turned out to be radical lesbian feminists doesn't seem particularly surprising. … This was circa 1974. Celia was plagued by "feelings of extreme isolation [that] led to a suicide attempt and subsequent hospitalization": Three months in a mental hospital, … So, naturally, she became a professor of psychology. Celia Kitzinger considers therapy harmful for women because women's problems are not personal, in her view, but rather political. Everything must ultimately be blamed on the patriarchy, of course. It is impossible for any feminist to to say otherwise. They have spent so many decades blaming every misfortune on the all-purpose scapegoat of male supremacy that one imagines the radical feminist who stubs her toe screaming in pain: "Damn the patriarchy!"
> Feminism is not a political philosophy; it's an idée fixe, the obsession of deranged minds. Male supremacy is to feminists what windmills were to Don Quixote or what Jews were to Hitler. This has been true since the Women's Liberation movement began, even before anyone realized that Shulamith Firestone was clinically insane.»[xix]

The clinically insane firestone predicted the end of cultural bisexuality: A core problem that conservative forces overlook, because they confine themselves to defending family and morality. They don't realize other crucial losses like subconscious cultural structures. An ethnologist I quoted in my books wrote, that the central features of a culture are not noticed by consciousness.

Envy has been established by feminism as basic moral principle of society and as a 'natural right'. Whatever men worked hard to gain, often to be accepted by society and women, women demanded for themselves, leaving those men without means to earn the admiration, women would waste on the unworthy. This closed our consciousness, so that we could not realize the losses involved.

Today's sentiments are shaped by competition. The interests and needs of both sexes conflict, whereas in a culture they match and both gain by the contributions of the opposite sex. Now that they compete, they tend to watch jealously, afraid to get 'disadvantaged'. Some angrily demand an exactly equal devision (while gladly taking much more than half or everything for women). They force the outcome they like, even though most women don't even want it. The more feminist influenced a society, the stronger both sexes differ in their attitudes and job preferences. This contemporary strive is a logical continuation of the struggle against human nature that feminism has been since its earliest waves. There is another source beside feminism to that mistake, though. As Kucklick has shown in his book, misandrist stereotypes were already fundamental to western philosophy of the enlightenment era. In that respect, it was rather unenlightened.

Justifications of feminism that we learn in childhood, school, education, the media and at universities, are institutionalized propaganda, turning facts upside down. This holds for past waves as much as for current ones. Women were never disadvantaged. Instead, they were always preferred. Under natural conditions, it did not make any sense for them to support feminist goals. Culture was offering them more. Men were carrying much heavier burdens. Only when modern technology lessened male burdens, and cultural structures were fading away, feminist envy could spread.

Man was always more burdened with duties and demands. Among animals and humans, the female sex dominates biologically. Females are fertile, limit procreation and exert sexual selection. Because of this, female life was protected more than male. Females were easily allowed to procreate, whereas many men in history never rose high enough in earnings or rank to be considered worthy enough. This is another male burden. Classic male strengths were a necessary counterweight. It's always harder to be a man that a woman. A woman just needs to be woman and fertile to get accepted and desired. That is a female dominance force. Men have to work much harder to get accepted by society and women, and many don't even succeed, even if they work hard. Feminism was gross nonsense right from the start.

Their feeling of being 'oppressed' or 'disadvantaged' was irrational hysteria contradicting the facts of biology and life. Society should never have listened to such irrational hysteria.

Even the first wave of feminism was militant, radical, destructive and characterized by contempt for men. To make 'role models' out of these yesterday's militants, indeed to be 'holy figures', is falsification of history. Feminist victors have rewritten history to mislead generations to come. Previous feminism was as hysterical, destructive and insane as today. As long as this is not understood, things won't get better and we remain vulnerable to radical ideologies.

> «Yesterday's mental illness is today's social policy.» (Kathy Shaidle, "Feminism's Rotting Corpse", 2012)

Others also describe feminist madness as the cause and drive to invent a conspiracy theory of 'patriarchal power', to attribute to it their pathological conditions and suffering, whose origin is within themselves. Feminist arguments follow the same line: All guilt was attributed to others; they were unable to recognize their own fault. This is a pivotal mechanism, not just a minor human weakness.

> «That is to say, while feminists believe that the patriarchy makes women crazy, the rest of us suspect that crazy women made the patriarchy — inventing this imaginary conspiracy of "male supremacy" as the phantom menace of their paranoid minds, a fantasy bogeyman, a rationalization of their own unhappiness and misfortunes.
> Here is where the meaning of the famous feminist dictum "the personal is political" exposes the real truth of their ideology. Rather than looking at feminism as a political movement to redress legitimate grievances shared generally by all women, we must understand feminism as a personal movement, concerned with the specific grievances … And most feminists are profoundly miserable.»[xx]

Other feminists also described their own suffering from mental disorders, such as Ms. Johnson, who like many of her quarrelsome sisters, was able to establish herself as a professor at universities.

> «In 2010, Professor Johnson published a book about her struggles with borderline personality disorder — "a serious mental illness," according to the National Institutes for Mental Health. In her book, Girl in Need of a Tourniquet: Memoir of a Borderline Personality, Professor Johnson describes herself as a "psycho girlfriend" with a history of dysfunctional relationships with both men and women. Her book describes "what amounts to a nervous breakdown as the result of an affair with a married lesbian colleague." Professor Johnson in 2010 described herself as a "newlywed lesbian" whose partner was apparently her former student»[xxi]

Kate Millet burdened others with her suffering, but vehemently refused to accept the necessary medical help. Instead, she preferred to work spreading her suffering around the world.

> «We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate's issues, many times > attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. …

> She was babbling and shouting incoherently whilst I nodded and pretended every word made perfect sense. …
> She stayed awake for five days babbling, ranting and wouldn't allow me to sleep. She was seeing "little green men" and her eyes were literally rolling around in their sockets. Never have I been more alone and terrified.»[xxii]

The mental illness seems to have broken out in childhood or adolescence, as her family describes it so impressively. Later, in her feminist days, employees suffered.

> «At one point, in 1973, I found myself alone with her in an apartment in Berkeley, California where she did not allow me to sleep for five days as she raged at the world and menaced me physically. … This movie (Three Lives) was the very first ever produced with not one iota of male presence. Even the people who delivered food to the set had to be female and Kate was touting it as the first all-woman film production in history.
> Having had my youth overshadowed by Kate's irrationality I warily traveled West and the moment I spotted her in the airport knew I "was in for it". As she barreled across the airport's expanse it was clear that she was in the throes of her illness and my heart throbbed with the desire to turn and run.
> During the speech after the screening she fell apart onstage before a packed assembly of fawning admirers.»[xxiii]

Threats, torture caused by deprivation of sleep – the founding feminist did worse to women than even feminist black propaganda has accused men of. It should not be overlooked that her lesbian lover committed suicide because of her 'homage book'. Insanity had wreaked havoc beyond all the damage feminism caused, many cruelties to men and children, destroyed lives and families. Even society was broken and culture destroyed. We lost tradition and experience gathered in centuries. Children grew up with damaged souls and uprooted as stray individuals. Under the pressure of Kate Millet's propaganda, helpless mentally ill people in the United States were released from care, ended up on the streets, where they either became easy prey and victims themselves, or committed crimes and murders. The peace of society was also damaged by making cities a less livable place. The mass migration welcomed by feminist states and Mrs. Merkel later had a similar effect.

> «Kate, herself, has written several books on this part of her life (Flying, The Loony-Bin Trip) chronicling the "oppressive" actions of our family, vilifying us for our deeply worried attempts to aid in her obvious sufferings. So I am telling no "tales out of school" as she herself has documented her own struggles with sanity although she consistently claimed, "mental illness is a myth". "Many healthy people", she said, "are driven to mental illness by society's disapproval of unconventional behavior and by the authoritarian institution of psychiatry."

> Really? Tell that to the families of the nineteen who suffered and died that Friday in Santa Barbara. … And, speaking of the affected innocent victims: later, she wrote a book about her lesbian lover at that time. Sita was the title. This woman committed suicide in response to Kate's "homage." …
> So when it came to my attention that as a result of these adventures she and a few cohorts had concocted a new "civil rights movement" for mental patients and in her characteristic ruthlessness was determined to 'liberate' NY's mental patients I was beyond appalled. God help anyone who gets in the way of Kate and her "righteous indignation" which had already spearheaded the militant Women's Liberation Movement. This was to be called, "The Psychiatric Survivors Movement."»[xxiv]

Kate's family describes their mental illness and the behavior they suffered from, but they justify themselves not to reveal any secrets, because Kate described everything herself, but had disparaged her. It can therefore be assumed that families of some other founding feminists – especially if they have not been slandered in an autobiographical book – refrained from going public with their knowledge. The number of unidentified psychological problems among leading feminists will therefore be higher.

Feminists themselves described their suffering, which they spread all over the world with the missionary zeal of the sufferer. They elevated the causes of their suffering to basic principles, laying them down in laws and constitutions and enforcing them with state constraints in all areas of life and society. Now we all suffer to some extent of the troubles they spread:

> «She could not read. She could not write. . . . She sometimes recognized on the faces of others joy and ambition and other emotions she could recall having had once, long ago. But her life was ruined, and she had no salvage plan.» (Self-description of Firestone in the third person, "Airless Spaces" (1998), "Emotional Paralysis")

A systematic search would find clear signs of psychosis in even more of the leading feminist voices. Camille Paglia, who herself came from the feminist spectrum, wrote:

> «The anti-porn crusader Andrea Dworkin (who died a decade ago) was a rabid fanatic, a self-destructive woman so consumed by her hatred of men that she tottered on the edge of psychosis.»[xxv] (Camille Paglia)

Media ignored this, courting destructive ideologists of feminist waves. Instead of describing the actual delusion of many feminist leaders, critics were wrongly blamed of an imaginary delusion, according to the motto: Anyone who is seriously against feminism cannot be healthy. Everything was turned the wrong way round.

The connection between feminism and disorders, which were then mostly called "hysteria", was common knowledge already at the end of the 19th century.

> «By the 1880s in England, it had become customary for the term "hysterical" to > be linked with feminist protest in the newspapers and in the rhetoric of antisuffragists. As Lisa Tickner notes in her study of the British suffrage movement, “for half a century and more, feminism and hysteria were readily mapped on to each other as forms of irregularity, disorder, and excess, and the claim that the women’s movement was made up of hysterical females was one of the principal means by which it was popularly discredited.”»[xxvi] (Elaine Showalter, Hysterie, Feminismus und Gender)

After the triumph of feminism, this was forgotten and became invisible, as the loss of identity had become the new role model. Contemporaries can only notice what contradicts their habits and the remaining rest of unconsciously descending culture.

Today’s feminists consider this absurd and get upset, when such a view is mentioned. Yet the ‘snowflakes’ and ‘SJW’ of today proof it right, as they are as known for psychotic and hysterical reactions ressembling those of the suffragettes at the end of the 19th century. They cannot stand if someone disagrees, someone like Trump or Orbán is elected president, or in Germany, when despite wild daily defamation of the opposition party, it is elected to parliament. In kinder‘garten style they uphold political correctness, silencing different views.

Feminists of today are not ‘crazier’ or ‘more intolerant’ than previous ones – we have changed. We grew up in a society that has absorbed earlier feminist waves and therefore considers those past waves as normal, even though they were just as psychotic, irrational, self-centered, ideological and destructive as today’s. But almost all people judge by what they are used to. They condemn what is different from their habits. That is why the truth often asserts itself very slowly; in the long run, however, the truth cannot be denied.

> «In France, the femme nouvelle was blamed for the declining birthrate; new divisions of labor seemed to threaten the stability of the family and the state.» (ibid)

History has proven this claim to be correct. The birthrate sank to a record low; we don’t know, whether the north European type of people will still exist in a few generations.

For all feminist waves, a connection with loss of identity and exchange structures between men and women can be demonstrated. This loss was always painful. Healthy people suffered from increasing loneliness, loss of meaning, dissolving relationships, families and disappearing cultural forms. Sick people also suffered from it, but reacted in a pathological manner; they then attacked precisely those humanly universal forms that exist in all cultures, including matriarchies, across all epochs, which already had become too weak for us to be functional. They rebelled blindly and psychotically, shifted their inner suffering and inner conflicts into an activist struggle outside against an imaginary ‘patriarchy’ and against exactly those cultural bonds, fathers and role models, from whose absence they suffered. So they worsened the problem for the whole society. That way, they attempted to reduce their pressure of suffering by political action and acceptance by their supporters. It is not surprising that they could never be satisfied with what they had achieved, however great it was, because their driving forces were irrational, psychotic.

> Hysteria has taken many strange turnings in its long career, but one of the most surprising is the modern marriage of hysteria and feminism, the fascination among feminist intellectuals, literary critics, and artists with what Mary Kelly calls "the continuing romance of hysteria. Feminist understanding of hysteria has been influenced by work in semiotics and discourse theory, seeing hysteria as a specifically feminine protolanguage, communicating through the body messages that cannot be verbalized. For some writers, hysteria has been claimed as the first step on the road to feminism …
> As the French novelist and theorist Hé1ène Cixous melodramatically inquires, "What woman is not Dora?"» (ibid)

That rhetorical question also reveals the mass impact of feminist ways of thinking that shapes the lives of entire generations to come. Contrary to what is believed in feminist self-reflection, the marriage of psychoses and feminism is ancient, already proven for the first wave.

> «But as Mark Micale notes, "No line of evolution within the historiography of hysteria is more complicated than the feminist one." The feminist romance with hysteria began in the wake of the women's liberation movement of the late 1960s and the French événements of May 1968, when a young generation of feminist intellectuals, writers, and critics in Europe and the United States began to look to Freudian and Lacanian psychoanalysis for a theory of femininity, sexuality, and sexual difference.» (ibid)

The latter claim is false, as we have already seen. A strong connection with hysteria has already been demonstrated for feminism in the 1880s and 1890s. There was also a relationship with schizophrenia, which first appeared at the time. In literary terms, mental illness was already expressed in feminist works such as Gilman's "Yellow Wallpaper".

> «Thus Jane Gallop writes, "Freud links hysteria to bisexuality; the hysteric identifies with members of both sexes, cannot choose one sexual identity. … If feminism is the calling into question of constraining sexual identities, then the hysteric may be a protofeminist." Similarly, Claire Kahane defines "hysterical questions" as questions about bisexuality and sexual identity: "Am I a man? Am I a woman? How is sexual identity assumed? How represented?"» (ibid)

A remark made by feminists is, that feminism is to question sexual identities. That was true even before the first wave, for example with Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797).

Feminist consensus confirms my claim in this case; only the interpretation differs fundamentally: feminism denies the existence of two natural sexes. In particular, it denies any completement of the sexes, any exchange and any cultural language that results from forms of exchange or division of labour between men and women. This attitude is demonstrably wrong because it is in blatant contradiction to human nature. It is not just about the fact that there are clear differences of both sexes, especially in the psyche, reproduction and life strategies. Such statements are true, but trivial, commonplace, truism. Irrespective of physical or mental differences, social exchange, reciprocity, relationships and structures are just as vital as human language, which is also a kind of social structure based on innate ability and a basic need.

If this natural relationship between both sexes ceases to exist, their exchange and connection breaks down, so does the sexual and social identity, the human frame of reference of life, which triggers uncertainty, confusion and suffering. Feminism has also misinterpreted this, made a principle out of the cause of her suffering, and forced both on the rest of the world. It is not only children who need boundaries so that they do not lose themselves. The whole self-discovery rhetoric of feminist emancies since the 1970s was based on precisely this loss of their natural identity and the resulting uncertainty. Today entire peoples are abolished because of this feminist misunderstanding of boundaries, differences, identity and the connections between different identities.

There's evidence that not only hysteria is a strong and widespread driving force for all feminist waves. The same also applies to schizophrenia, which first appeared at the same time as the spread of the first wave. In earlier epochs, and in other cultures, schizophrenia seems to be unknown as a permanent disease. Its appearance at the same time as the first feminist wave, even among several leading representatives, does not look like a coincidence.

Eating disorders and self-harm have also increased significantly; in the former case it is argued that the increased female choice overwhelms girls and young women. Because all women are instinctively interested in the same 20 percent men, they create a secondary social choice of the 20 percent coveted men, who make up only a fraction of the women. As a result, not every woman can get one of the few coveted men. So women create massive pressure for themselves through sexual discrimination against men. Since women attract men through beauty and body, they no longer feel good and slim enough, they want to be 'starving'. This is not due to a 'patriarchy', as feminists assume, but on the contrary to feminism, which destroyed helpful cultural forms that not only alleviated the selection pressure on men, but also strengthened the complacency of young girls. Eating disorders are still rare in Asia's extended families.

> «But when he talks about what he terms "successful hysterics," people who in their adult lives seemed to outgrow their adolescent hysteria, or transformed what had been hysterical symptoms into social causes, Israel mentions only women, such as Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science, and Bertha Pappenheim, or Anna O., who became a German feminist leader. He sees > their dedication as an evolutionary form of feminine hysteria itself, an obsessive desire to become the maître rather than submit to him, an acting out of fantasies of devotion. Thus female activism becomes merely a constructive pathology, and feminism only a healthier form of hysteria. …

> The same metaphor is used by Olive Schreiner, herself an example of the New Woman who overcame hysterical disorders to lead an important career as a feminist and writer. Schreiner imagined that if sex and reproduction could be separated … For Schreiner, the hysteric is thus a member of the sexual avant-garde. …
> Women were just as irritated by isolation and enforced idleness as men. Mitchell's patients indeed included many of the leading feminist intellectuals, activists, and writers of the period, including Jane Addams, Winifred Howells, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, and Edith Wharton. »[xxvii] (ibid)

In a similar manner, Greta Thunberg has been preaching hysterical anxiety regarding CO2 to overcome her psychotic symptoms. Even her father admitted that her activism was part of a self-therapy. That way irrational agenda has been spread to the world, so that the activist could keep their mental illness in check. Thus, the world got more sick.

Schizophrenics and hysterics thus shaped the ideology of feminism, which is based on misinterpreting facts, considering preferred women as disadvantaged, whereas men, discriminated against by women over sexual selection, as 'dominant' and 'oppressors'. Quite regularly it is the other way around. No, men and women are not equally affected. Feminists don't get off that cheap. It has been proven that men are sexually discriminated against, many are excluded from reproduction, and are therefore suppressed in key questions of life. The opposite of feminism is true! The destroyed culture has to be rebuilt, more precisely: a stronger, more balanced culture with no preference for women, no discrimination against men, which cannot be easily eradicated by feminist hysterics.

There could be a connection, but unfortunately, it was interpreted the wrong way round, as is their habit. Erin Pizzey has confirmed it for loneliness: The breakdown of extended families and cultural structures made people lonely; this loneliness was a powerful driving force behind second wave feminism. Just like isolation, the disintegration of the complementing of man and woman, took away identity, dissolved relationships and connections, and thus also feelings. Feminists claim they were 'oppressed', but as always, it's an exact reversal of the facts. Women were the dominant and privileged sex, discriminated against men as "filters for genes" with sexual selection, and taught game rules useful for women. Feminists complained of overwork, demanded less work, and then found out that 'society does not demand enough of them'. (Betty Friedan) While feminists complained loudly about female work demanding its reduction, they actually suffered from boredom and lack of purpose. Her ambition was discontent with easy life, which was in fact a privilege and had been demanded by their predecessors, or even themselves. “Whom God wants to punish, he fulfills his wishes.”

While they were upset about the presence of men or families, it was actually isolation at home that they suffered from. On the contrary, with unsightly regularity everything was turned into the opposite and made worse. Incidentally it shows, that although men were just as irritated, feminist women became hysterical and reacted with irrational ideology. With more justification, masculist men could have protested, especially since they are actually discriminated as “filters for genes” in evolution and life. But they didn’t.

The roles were not oppressive or too narrow, but much weaker and softer than in other advanced cultures. They were not constrained, but confused, shaken in identity and self-confidence, because they already had to little female roles and tasks. In prehistoric times, almost all work was divided between men and women; thus there was an abundance of tasks. The roles had never been so little as in contemporary West, when technical aids and devices began to make housewives superfluous. It was their increasing redundancy that made them dissatisfied. A healthy reaction would have been a new, sensible and balanced redistribution; they rioted hysterically, destroyed humanly universal foundations.

> «In The Newly-Born Woman (1975), Cixous took the position that hysteria was the “nuclear example of women’s power to protest,” and that Dora belonged to the pantheon of feminist history» (a.a.O.)

In the quote from a feminist’s hand, hysteria is seen as the core of female power; whether ‘nuclear’ contains an additional allusion is undecided.

> «This romanticization and appropriation of the hysteric nostalgically assumes that she is a heroine of the past. “Où sont-elles passées les hystériques de jadis,” asked Jacques Lacan in 1977, “ces femmes merveilleuses, les Anna O., les Emmy von N.? . . . Qu’est-ce qui remplace aujourd’hui les symptômes hystériques d’autrefois?” We might answer that the despised hysterics of yesteryear have been replaced by the feminist radicals of today, by contemporary women artists and poets, and by gay activists.» (ibid)

Let us note the instinctless aberration of praising serious problems as ‘wonderful’, and the replacement of hysteria by radical activism observed in feminist writings itself – even in subsequent generations. The contemporary “artists and poets” mentioned will be presented later.

The book quoted is biased; neither hysteria nor feminism are seen in a negative way; even critical voices are often part of a feminist society and its world view. They are caught inside a cage of feminist ideas. It needs a philosophical approach as provided by my books to get out of this cage.

> «In the popular mind, the pejorative association of feminism with hysteria and morbidity has not died yet.In 1983, for example, a controversy erupted in the Times Literary Supplement over the use of “hysterical” as a critical term for the poetry of Sylvia Plath and other “man-hating” feminist poets. Defending her position, Anne Stevenson wrote, “Hysteria is the very stuff of revolutions” … Moreover, those revolutions connected to gender and race continue to seem more “hysterical” than others… What had been hysterical hooliganism in the suffrage campaigns was now attributed to other groups.» (ibid)

These sources also see the connection and similarity of hysterical waves with feminism from then and now, as well as with hatred of men. Hysteria is even called the raw material of revolutions. The cases of famous feminists with psychological problems presented here, whether hysteria, schizophrenia or others, are therefore not ‘weird inventions’ on my part, but a connection that is manifested both by today’s feminists and their literature, and by historical evidence from the time of the first wave. Even if people had not yet reached our level of science at the time and therefore their reasoning often no longer convinces, we should take them seriously. They weren’t stupider than we are; their society was less disturbed than ours. They often sensed intuitively when a fate appeared. But because gender culture is unconscious and protected by taboos, they were unable to rationally justify it by today’s standards. While their attempts to justify something that has grown naturally may be outdated today, the culture they defend is timeless and as valid today as it was then.

> In 1985 she was a founding member of the Black Germans and Blacks Initiative in Germany. She made contacts with representatives of the international black women’s movement such as Audre Lorde. … May Ayim suffered from psychotic episodes since the early 90s, which is why she voluntarily went to closed psychiatric clinics several times. … she plunged from a high-rise to death on August 9, 1996.»[xxviii] (Wikipedia)

Rose S. Garston was under psychological care for ‘PTSD’, when she ignored medical advice to organize a collective hunt for all anti-feminist sites with the aim of getting them deleted. They celebrated every deletion in public. (Evidence in my book: Fulminantes Finale, Volume 1, page 170 ff.)

> «“The yellow wallpaper” is an autobiographical short story by the American writer and women’s rights activist Charlotte Perkins Gilman, which was first published in New England Magazine in January 1892. The short story is considered an important work of early American feminism; it is about a young woman who is not cured by the treatment of her depression, but goes mad. In the course of the story, the increasingly confused and delusional observations that the protagonist makes about the pattern of yellow wallpaper in her hospital room become an image of her deteriorating mental state. …

> The short story shows strong parallels to the life of the author. … After the birth of her daughter Katherine, Gilman suffered from depression, although in retrospect it is not clear whether it was postpartum depression or another type of mental illness. Gilman's mental health did not improve, and after three years of illness, Gilman decided to seek medical treatment.»[xxix] (Wikipedia de, 2016)

It is typical of Gilman and later feminists, that they seek healing in activism; they try to heal themselves by imposing ideas and methods to the world, that are rooted in their illness. Later the world experiences similar problems and therefore appreciates, that the 'pioneer' expresses their feelings and problems, they wouldn't have without her. That's another paradoxon of feminism.

Silvia Plath is celebrated in a similar way:

> «This study examines mental illness in literature, with a focus on Charlotte Perkins Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" and Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar, the primary texts of the research, and develops similarities and personal connections between the authors and their mentally unstable main characters. The study investigates the biographical aspects and mental health of the deceased women … Both women committed suicide … Plath began to develop mental illness at a younger age.»[xxx] (unt.edu)

A strongly feminist article clearly states:

> «Voices of Feminism and Schizophrenia in Plath's Poetry
> Clarissa LEE Ai Ling
> … Whilst struggling with the ardent feminist within her … Many of Plath's later poems are related to her battle with mental illness, despair, sense of betrayal and suicidal thoughts.»[xxxi] (utoronto.ca)

As in the pre-feminist and the first wave, so in the second and third.

> «Enter Polly Dunning. She is a third generation feminist (her mother is the feminist commentator Jane Caro). In a column for the Sydney Morning Herald she writes of how conflicted she felt when she learned that she was carrying a boy child rather than a girl: …
> "There were dark moments in the middle of the night (when all those dark thoughts come), when I felt sick at the thought of something male growing inside me."»[xxxii] (ozconservative)

What neither psychopaths nor feminists understand: It is not the male being who grows in her as her son who is sick, but she herself is mentally ill, if she sees her own child as a disease in an attitude hostile to men. Feminism is the disturbance that projects itself into the world. Feminism destroys everything, from which healthy sympathy and love for men can grow and mature. Feminism replaces a culture, in which men and women act and feel for each other, by a hostile chaos of conflict.

> They have created a social movement, a political ideology and a mental illness all in one place!
> Funny you should note this. I was in a bookshop yesterday and saw a copy of Clementine Ford's book. I read about five pages of it and had to put it down – I couldn't take any more of it. It was like reading the innermost thoughts of someone trying to convince themselves that they were not mentally unwell. Every paragraph read much the same: "Men hate us, want to kill us and rape us, the whole system leaves us unable to function, on the verge of breakdown, but when we complain about this we are told that we are being dramatic/paranoid, but we're not crazy, it's the world that makes us like this."
> Later that day I looked through some reviews and discovered that Clementine Ford has, in fact, battled with mental ill health.
> And yet these are the types of women published in leading newspapers as representatives of their sex.»[xxxiii] (ozconservative)

She has a background typical of leading feminists of the first and second wave.

> «Clementine Ford (born 1981) is an Australian feminist writer, broadcaster and public speaker. She has a regular column for Daily Life …
> Ford spent the remainder of her teenage years growing up in Adelaide, South Australia. As a teenager, Ford struggled with body image, body dysmorphia and an eating disorder. … She studied at the University of Adelaide, where she took a gender studies course; she describes this as a personal catalyst for her decision to become a women's rights activist.»[xxxiv] (Wikipedia, 2016, 2020)

Here we see what havoc gender studies do: They indoctrinate entire generations with the opposite of the truth, persuade the privileged group (women) to be disadvantaged, call for the complete destruction of human culture and nature, whereupon future generations grow up disrooted and harmed. The victims of their deception believe, that all their suffering is not due to feminism, the destruction of natural identity and culture, but to a 'patriarchy', which is such a mysterious conspiracy theory, that even leading feminists cannot explain what it should consist of.

Feminist psychopaths do not look for the cause in themselves, but project everything outwards, spread their suffering through feminist means in society as a whole, so that future generations, who lack natural identity and culture, are fraught with problems like those feminists, who had invented such ideology. They are proclaimers, prophets and missionaries of their own suffering, misfortune, their own disturbance. They make the whole world sick, because they don't want to face their own illness. This is how feminism of all waves and epochs worked.

> over
> By Clementine Ford, May 19, 2016
> About six weeks ago, after a period of relative peace and harmony, the anxiety that's plagued me on and off for more than 20 years returned to me in full force. With its reappearance, I experienced some dark moments; moments where I was frightened not only by the despair I was feeling but also by the ferocity with which I was feeling it. I found myself plagued by obsessive thoughts and terrified by my inability to get myself out of the cycle of them. Anxiety is oppressive, both physically and mentally and even the threat of it can be exhausting.
> But I have practice in dealing with this particular demon»[xxxv] (smh.com.au)

Incidentally, she involuntarily reveals why feminist founders really felt oppressed: the cause was in them themselves, neither in men nor in a 'patriarchy' based on conspiracy theory. In a typically feminist way, ideologically bored people see the cause of their disturbance everywhere, except not within themselves and their ideology.

> «Clementine Ford: 'There's something really toxic with the way men bond in Australia'»[xxxvi] (Guardian)

Feminism is a distortion of all facts to the contrary, just as sexually discriminated men become supposed oppressors, so their own suffering is projected into the outside world. Any culture that could help them, which is there to prevent such suffering, is destroyed. In other words, they destroy exactly what should and can prevent such suffering, which plunges entire generations and epochs into suffering similar to that which characterized them. All because they didn't want to be helped; instead, they broke the world. Such psychopaths and feminist ideology wiped out mutual love, a culture of two sexes complementing and helping each other. They destroyed female empathy for male losers, when those needed it most.

> «Why women's mental illness deserves more attention
> Clementine Ford, April 22, 2016
> I was 12 years old the first time I experienced significant struggles with anxiety.»[xxxvii] (dailylife)

The more appropriate headline would be: Why psychosis, projections and false assumptions by feminists deserve more attention.

Their suffering is rooted within them, more precisely in their confusion of identity, which prevents them from developing a trusting symbiosis with the male sex and sympathetic love for men in general. They project their psychotic disorder onto men and a supposed 'patriarchy', which is an irrational conspiracy theory. Their perception is wrong because they make the wrong assumption, that biologically and culturally privileged women would be 'oppressed' and that biologically and evolutionarily discriminated men would be dominant. Originally an evolutionary protection mechanism for children and mothers, innate biased perception is radicalized with a feminist perspective. Similarly, male losers get excluded from sympathy, because according to the evolutionary principle, that males serve as filter for good or bad genes, they shouldn't procreate, thus get no empathy. As a result, we instinctively mock male losers complaining. Widespread incel and MRA bashing is part of it. To be able to complain and get help is another privilege of children and women. This was exacerbated by feminism, too. So an innate preference for women in perception is militantly exaggerated, in the delusion of persecution, that they consider themselves disadvantaged or even haunted by an imaginary 'oppressive structural patriarchy'. Because of this ideology, the entire cultural complementary structure is destroyed, whereupon subsequent generations can no longer mature healthily, but grow into problems created and spread by feminism.

Many writers celebrated by the women's movement were marked and driven by such problems.

> The writer Virginia Wolf often is placed into categories like 'insane' or 'feminist'. She was much more than that. Above all, she revolutionized writing …
> You can often see them pigeonholed, one is that of feminism, which led to an increased Virginia Woolf reading wave in the 1970s and 1980s. It is also not wrong to see her as a great feminist who she was, but it narrows her eyes. The famous essay "A Room of One's Own" is of course one of the milestones in feminist literature.
> … your commitment to sex-independent equal opportunities goes hand in hand with your artistic emancipation. In the pseudobiographical novel "Orlando", a humorous declaration of love to the friend, Vita Sackville-West, who was sometimes beloved – Virginia Woolf was attracted to women, the marriage to Leonard was more platonic in nature – the androgynous hero not only travels through several centuries, he / she also changes from one sex to another.»[xxxviii] (msn)

Such "revolutionizing of writing" spreads contentual, methodical and in life the suffering and problems from which it arose. Describing books as "rejected children" says a lot in an era when motherhood gets neglected, love for children and mother devalued, the peoples affected can't even reproduce themselves sufficiently.

> "My books are all rejected children"
> "I never write about something else than own experiences. All of my protagonists are a part of me, a kind of split off personality." …
> The culmination of this rebellion was her novel 'The Wall' [title and content based on: 'The Yellow Wallpaper' by Gilman], which appeared in 1963 and most > radically describes a woman's departure from the world. … It wasn't until twenty years later, after the 1983 edition of the book, that the author became an icon of the women's movement.» (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise)

The reference to an "insanely" strong depression, which makes her hopeless, is also clear.

> «For decades, Marlen Haushofer periodically keeps a diary, but only keeps these records for a certain time and burns them doubtfully: "Actually, I can only live if I write and write. since I am not writing at the moment I feel swamped u. disgusting. Will make children's book, better than nothing. See that the stories are insanely depressed and hopeless, written in a reasonably good time."» (Jutta Rosenkranz, line by line my paradise)

Her writing is self-therapy, just as feminist activism was invented as self-therapy. One can feel sorry for the children who get to read the children's books created in this way, because they are lured early onto a wrong track that damages them. She shared such suffering subjectivity with the later upheaval of the women's movement in the 1970s.

> «Such statements and the limited world that appears in Haushofer's texts have seduced readers to dismiss her prose as typically subjectivist women's literature … A way of reading Haushofer's texts identifying them with the new women's literature of the 1970s and their demands for radical subjectivity … falls short of her.» (Franziska Frei Gerlach, Scripture and Gender: Feminist Designs and Readings…)

Such radical subjectivity has torn apart the last remnants of cultural connections between the two sexes, and thus the basis of healthy relationships. Because only what women and men do specifically for each other and exchange, creates a reliable relationship, gives them identity, and lets feelings mature. Without such a connection, compassion breaks down into self-centered or women-related sentiments and demands, as the women's movement has done. That is the psychological and emotional core of the matter.

Feminism emerged as the denial and destruction of all connecting forces and forms between the two sexes. The feeling of paralysis of those affected was due to the crumbling of cultural complementing of both sexes, which increasingly narrowed the cultural field of life and thus deprived the sexes of meaning. The lack of importance and attention as a woman, which they state to have experienced, was due to the already too low importance that femininity and masculinity now had in modern times, shaped by technology. As technology is sex-neutral, its effect on human behaviour enables to more easily conflict human universals of all times and cultures. As always, feminism interpreted everything in the wrong way, found the worst possible turn, not only aggravated the problems, but made them a principle.

> «In her diary, she describes this book, which was created for the first time without being interrupted by an illness, as "a study of madness and suicide".»

> (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise, about Virginia Woolf)

Psychiatrists of that time before feminism overran and turned our consciousness, were astonishingly silent in the face of visibly psychotic features of the movement. Scientific studies can only be easily found in individual cases:

> «Images in Psychiatry, Virginia Woolf (1882–1941) …
> From the age of 13, Woolf had symptoms that today would be diagnosed as bipolar disorder; she experienced mood swings from severe depression to manic excitement and episodes of psychosis… she comitted suicide …
> At times Woolf railed against her illness, felt frustrated and impeded by it, and at other times, she felt that it was essential to her.»[xxxix] (Katherine Dalsimer, Ph.D., AmJ Psychiatry 161:5, Mai 2004)

Thrusts of a mental illness shaped her feminist revolution of writing; sometimes she felt handicapped by her suffering, but otherwise she felt that it was "essential to her". To put it plainly: Her ideas and methods would not have arisen without illness; psychotic relapses are the driving force.

Incidentally, this should not only be typical of the feminist scene, but also its environment. In the early 1970s, young dropouts in London told me that their lifestyle was not intentional; they were not able to live differently, so they could not cope with it. Feminist writing and struggling was apparently the only way of life to get their suffering under control. The rest of the world pays for it, because this is how the cause of their suffering spreads all over the world: fanatically they force others on the confusion of identity and roles, which is the reason for their unsatisfactory existence. Because there was already far too little that both sexes do for each other. That is why the housewife existence was devoid of meaning, and also the male existence, by the way – only that men mostly reacted less psychotically.

Feminists broke exactly what would be necessary to enable happiness and recovery. Instead, they let their illness break out openly, become political. They wanted to make the symptoms controllable through living out in 'self-treatment'. So they were rooted in society. Most youth of later generations was turned to some degree into a suffering feminist, who fights the last remnants of natural gender relationships, in order to get his own suffering under control, while creating greater suffering for everyone. The same model applies to CO2-anxiety and other hysterias of today.

> … Sarah Kane gave information about herself in conversations. Then she talks about the depression she had when writing "Phaedra", about her unconditional search for truth… "I do not necessarily consider depression to be unhealthy. For me, this expresses a completely realistic perception of the environment. (laughs) You probably have to dull your sensibility to a certain extent. Otherwise you are chronically healthy in a sick society. Antonin Artaud is one such example: either > you go crazy and die, or you work and you are sick. Which is the real madness."

> Her role model and mentor Edward Bond says there is something emblematic about her death.»[xl] (Tagesspiegel)

What such performers think is 'truth' is a distortion that arises from their suffering; in their artistic or political activism they describe preoccupation with herself, which is lived out bringing harm to society as a whole. Thereby they try to keep their own pressure under control and consider this as self-therapy.

The psychotic core of feminism arises from the destruction of something, that is just as much innate, a need and ability for people, as language: The complementing of the sexes, that creates a connection by culturally pronounced mutual gifts. Exchange creates a social language that provides identity, empathizes and matures responsibility. Technical modernity had reduced this to a barely functional minimum in the 1950s, which resulted in a feeling of suffering. However, the suffering from a lack of mutual contributions for each other, the lack of cultural forms, took a morbid outbreak: Instead of standing up for developing a fulfilling, satisfying human culture again, limiting destructive influences of the technical environment on life, instead of creating forms and models worth living in, they accomplished destruction. They spread the causes of their suffering and their misery in the world as an artist or activist, while at the same time getting themselves under control by acting out. So they completely shred the remains of natural culture, leaving a pile of rubble.

It doesn't matter whether Kane was a feminist or not, because she did the same destructive work as feminists of all waves.

After such deep damage, a return to the lost experience of compensation mechanisms that have matured over thousands of years has become almost impossible. What can save us is a reconstruction of the primeval sex division of labor to complement and exchange, so that a new culture is created, in which we do things for each other, not merely for ourselves only. Such a division of labor would be broader and stronger than European tradition. Feminism is like a boomerang. Actually, people try to head this way on their own: The stronger feminist influence has been, the more job preferences of men and women differ.

The chapter Madness and Feminism would not be complete without naming psychotic disorders that were invented and spread epidemically by feminism using methods similar to medieval heretic hunting.

> Prior to 1973's best-selling book, "Sybil," about a woman who had 16 different personalities, M.P.D. had been one of the rarest of mental disorders, but afterwards, M.P.D. exploded. Between 1985 and 1995 there were almost 40,000 > new cases – mostly women – and the disease acquired a valid standing in the field of psychoanalysis. M.P.D. patients are susceptable to therapists' suggestions because they are given strong medications and are highly hypnotizable. Both M.P.D. and recovered memory are in large part feminist movements: female "victims" confronting their abusers. In fact, the M.P.D. craze was probably a side effect of feminism; it provided working-class women with a strong support network. M.P.D. is part of a history of hysteria, which has always been regarded as a women's syndrome – a manifestation of women's inherent moral weakness. It can be traced back 4,000 years, but in the late 19th century it acquired a new importance, in part as a reaction to the new women's rights movement.. During the hysteria fad, M.P.D. began to receive attention, as a subtype of hysteria. Soon, however, hysteria and M.P.D. died out . The return of M.P.D. began with the child-protection movement in the '70s, hich was then joined by the feminists. Out of this collaboration came the recovered-memory (R.M.) movement, which persuaded hundreds of thousands of women that they were part of a worldwide collection of sex-abuse victims, and many of these women began suing their alleged abusers. The single most important cause of the epidemic was the culture wars of the '80s and '90s, which caused both liberals and conservatives to embrace M.P.D. and R.M. Those who questioned the validity of the movement were accused of protecting sex criminals. This zealous fervor made the movement vulnerable to the thing that would finally undo it: the satanic-ritual-abuse, or S.R.A., craze.»[xlii] (New Yorker)

It is noteworthy that the feminist hysteria of false 'rediscovered' memories, the invention of non-existent diseases based on suggestion, auto-suggestion and hysterical campaigns, which had an almost hypnotic mass effect, was supported by all forces of society, by leftists and conservatives. Nobody wanted to stand back or catch a bad reputation. All parties embraced a movement that persuaded people to suffer from an invented problem that they created in large numbers. The real victims of real hysteria have been neglected, feminism critics have been insulted or ignored for criticizing false allegations. The movement fueled by feminism was victorious, did not end by itself. It was only when it went one step too far, expanded its methodology to include an alleged 'satanic ritual abuse', other groups such as Christian fundamentalists took part, that there was resistance, were falseness and absurdity of the allegations and methodology detected. Inborn preference for women and feminist ideology prevailed and allowed no contradiction. Hysterical delusion is only seen through when other groups are involved that are not preferred by innate, evolutionary forces.

A similar effect we experienced, after feminists had promoted mass immigration in their fight against the 'white heterosexual man'. Their allegations were just as baseless, irrational in the mud fights against local men, and were also based on suggestive persuasion of almost hypnotic effect. Here too, feminism critics have been ignored for decades and given malice. Only when women themselves were affected and women were no longer privileged, rather victimized by a different privileged group during mass immigration, did the absurdity of the method begin to attract attention. Again, we see the boomerang effect of feminism: They claimed to fight an imaginary 'victimization' of women, only to create a real one. They had shared their female privilege with masses of immigrants from incompatible backgrounds, effectively destroying their own privilege.

> Predictably, the moderates walked out, extremism swamped the field, and the movement started to fizzle. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation was founded to help families confront their accusers, and soon the media reversed its supportive stance and began to criticize the movements; and criticism within the profession was also mounting at a furious pace. But the most dramatic change took place in the courts, as the wave of R.M. suits (patients suing abusers) gave way to malpractice suits (patients suing therapists). M.P.D. supporters started backpedalling, changing the name of the disorder, and even backing away from the central treatments – hypnosis, abreactions, alter-probing. The number of reported M.P.D. cases has significantly declined since the mid-'90s. Ultimately, the cause M.P.D. most damaged was feminism» (New Yorker, ibid)

Inventing and spreading psychotic disorders is itself pathological and deserves the name hysteria. For decades, feminists with hysterical energies assumed diseases, that were invented and later recognized as non-existent and discredited. Since large parts of society, the media and the public were infected, we are not only dealing with an almost exclusively invented illness MPD, false RM memories and non-existent satanic ritual abuse that were constructed by an RM movement to the detriment of those affected, but also with a real psychosis, namely the invention and imagination of nonexistent diseases, combined with an aggressive, suggestive assumption of such diseases, a virulent accusation and suspicion of large parts of society that is infected.

The procedure for mud fights against men in the feminist waves was the same. Feminist campaigns that assumed men to abuse, oppress, disadvantage, exploit, or the like, were a pandemic that worked with the same methods and psychological drives, spreading emotionally and ideologically contagious, like suggestively awakened false memories in the RM movement that 'Recovered Memories', i.e. supposedly 'found' false memories with their (auto) suggestions. Feminism of all waves is such a suggestion and auto-suggestion with an almost hypnotic mass effect, which is achieved through massive indoctrination and gendering from kindergarten.

It was therefore entirely justified to perceive feminism at the end of the 19th century as associated with a mental illness which at that time was given the name hysteria that has been used since ancient times. But regardless of name and diagnosis, they were right about their feelings and rejection. It would be wrong to dismiss the invention of non-existent diseases like the R.M. movement by saying that those “rediscovered memories” are now discredited. No, it’s not just about not recognizing a non-existent disease. That’s only the first step. It’s much more important to recognize the real disease that breaks out with those irrational forces, that suggestively and fanatically persuade many people of false perceptions, false memories or false claims, which manifests itself in the form of the R.M. movement or feminist waves. Anyone who speaks of ‘mass psychosis’ in fascism must also do so in feminism, which as irrationally and systematically accuses innocents. By the way, feminism is older than fascism, invented the self-staging that was later taken over by fascists and is today considered characteristic for them.

Feminist waves always generate new false, irrational, but highly effective, suggestive and contagious suspicions with which they damage society as a whole – not just once, but again in every wave. We are already so pre-damaged by feminism that we no longer notice the consequences of earlier waves, because they have become part of Western identity. This damage is the cause of our weakness, which is why we are overrun by less damaged civilizations from Africa and Orient.

The first feminist wave invented political hysteria based on psychosis, depression and irrational imaginations and made it socially acceptable. Since then, this method has been used by all feminist waves, as well as by right, left and religious extremists and dictatorships, as well as by Greens and gender confusers. (‘Gender madness’) Climate hysteria, CO2- and diesel fear are of the same psychotic type today.

«”I want you to feel the fear I feel everyday!”» (Greta Thunberg,in spite of Asperger’s syndrome built up by ideological currents from feminist roots and compliant media as ‘climate saint’)

Offenbar ist Greta Thunberg ernsthaft krank. Statt etwas gegen ihre Panikattacken zu unternehmen, wird sie medienwirksam als Klimawandel-Prophetin herumgereicht. Ganz arm.

«"Act as if your house would be on fire, demands Greta Thunberg" "Obviously, Greta Thunberg is seriously ill. Instead of doing something about her panic attacks, she is passed around as a climate change prophetess in an effective way. Very bad."» Already the first feminist wave has politically exploited a congenital distortion of perception of women as needy and suffering, of a majority of male losers as not worthy of compassion. This was further exacerbated by some mentally ill politicizing their suffering, creating a new principle of political hysteria. During the first wave, schizophrenia emerged as a new disease that was probably caused by "social failure", triggered by the breakdown of traditional structures, extended families and cultural exchange systems between men and women. A disproportionately large number of founding feminists were affected by such diseases. They rationalized their illness, in a way tried to treat themselves by reshaping the whole world according to their ideology. Tragically, however, their ideology was based on error and exacerbated the very breakdown of sex complementing, extended families and cultural structures, which was the cause of the new emergence of suffering and previously unknown mental illnesses such as schizophrenia. To put it plainly: Feminists massively spread the causes of their suffering, made the whole world suffer from what had driven them into rebellion. Very similar mechanisms now also work for climate hysterics. Let us remember that we are in a geologically short warm interglacial period of a long ice age, so that in the long term the global warming hysteria is not only nonsensical, but is probably the opposite of reality, namely that a great cold period endangers human life. The sun still decides our climate much more than humans.

> «At the same time, however, Greta Thunberg is a 16-year-old in need of protection who suffers from Asperger's syndrome and a number of other mental illnesses. …
> Artist mother, who was once plagued by eating disorders and depressive episodes, is not entirely satisfied with the course of her music career. She subconsciously compensates for this by concentrating on the long-term therapy of her behavior-sensitive children. In the end, the mother believes that the cold-hearted materialism that is destroying the global climate has also damaged her soul and the souls of her children.»[xliii] (Handelsblatt)

Similarly, founding feminists of all waves have suggested an irrational and false conspiracy theory that a 'patriarchy' would be to blame for their suffering. In fact, the opposite has been proven several times from autobiographies and other testimonies; a missing or too weak father, not the maliciously insinuated tyrannical. Feminists have often tried to 'treat' their social isolation, a real cause of their dissatisfaction and suffering, in feminist fighting groups of quarrelsome sisters. Thus, feminism of all waves was already a crazy self-therapy that fantasized together male power and patriarchy as absurdly as fascist anti-Semites a "Jewish world conspiracy" that would be to blame for everything that is not going well in the world. Incidentally, Hitler also came from a family with several severely mentally ill members.

Instrumentalization of mental disease has haunted us since the feminist waves, from the first to the present. Greta clairvoyantly said of herself, without Asperger (and other psychological problems) "this would not have been possible here". Feminist waves that invented political hysteria and made it socially acceptable were similarly radical and intertwined with psychological problems.

> «April 30, 2019, 1:02 p.m.
> Thunberg book
> "She is the child, we are the emperor" [her family exploits her!]

> … “Our daughter disappeared into a kind of darkness and practically stopped working,” the mother writes. Greta fell silent, stopped playing the piano, or laughing. The doctors diagnosed Asperger and related mutism, which means that Greta only spoke to the closest family members. After she refused to eat, the parents decided on a radical break: An end to her solo career, and the daughter’s recovery is the focus from now on. …
> The basic problem with the content of this book is, that Malena Ernman causally mixes one with the other, interpreting (family) illness as a sensitive symptom of the state of the world. Greta Thunberg may be right when she keeps saying in interviews: “If I hadn’t had an Asperger, it wouldn’t have been possible here.” …
> Me too, feminism, symbolism of illness and dogma of performance, in places everything is mixed with the climate crisis into a somewhat confusing overall scenario.»[xliv] (Süddeutsche Zeitung)

Feminists have harmed their souls, as have those of the men they mistreated, and especially those of their children, who were too small and dependent to defend themselves against maternal indoctrination and inappropriate upbringing.

The Greta Thunberg case is a contemporary lesson in how feminist forces of all waves ignored inconvenient truth, instead constructing convenient lies out of nothing. The opponent of feminism Ernest Belfort Bax described this as early as 1913. Feminists tried to censor opponents already in 1913, put pressure on editors, not to publish inconvenient views. During the second wave, schizophrenic or otherwise mentally ill founding feminists were revered as initiators and leading voices. Their condition was simply ignored. At the same time, as early as 1968, it was almost impossible for professor Goldberg of the New York University, to publish his book, which demonstrated the human universality of sex roles: scientific truth was already ignored 1968. The same thing happened to my books and arguments for decades, whereas any dirty feminist campaign based on error or subjective misinterpretation, partly disturbed feminists, was immediately built up to a media sensation. Such fundamental media imbalance has been driving the process for generations. It would be fatal to think that only today’s campaigns have got lost or that the media have only now become blatantly one-sided. Rather, it has been a systematic error for well over 100 years.

> «Greta’s younger sister Beata, who campaigns for feminism, also had major problems. The doctors diagnosed the 14-year-old with ADHD as well as with Greta Asperger, as well as an obsessive-compulsive disorder.»[xlv] (Augsburger Allgemeine)

Press reports documented that not only Greta, but also her sister and mother suffer from psychological conditions such as ADHD, which the whole family reinterprets in response to fear of (presumably imaginary) man-made global warming. However, her sister lives out her problems as a feminist. This is analogous to the belief of founding feminists that an imaginary ‘patriarchy’ is to blame for their suffering, even though a missing or too weak father shaped their childhood, the isolation of women because of disintegration of extended families and cultural relationships between men and women are the cause of the increase of mental suffering and schizophrenia. Feminists then tragically fought families and the complementary structures of the sexes, exacerbating the actual causes of their suffering. They themselves pointed the wrong way round, believing their struggle against 'patriarchy' and 'female disadvantage' – although women were always privileged, while men were sexually discriminated and faced with specific burdens – would be a fight against the causes of their suffering. It could be similar with the global warming hysteria, because in fact the sun is the strongest force influencing climate. More likely we live near the end of a warm interglacial period, before the ice age returns and will actually be a danger to mankind – through cooling, the opposite of warming. Only in many millions of years, when the sun runs out of hydrogen, will it heat up and thus make the earth uninhabitable – but that is not human fault, but the natural end of a star the size of a sun.

Greta's family stages psychological suffering as political hysteria – just like feminists of all waves. As long as we do not completely overcome feminism and rebuild a functioning culture with completement of both sexes and male prestige, the sequence of such irrational political hysteria, which also includes green and other extremisms, might be infinite. Even the screeching at Duce, Hitler, Mao, the enthusiasm for Stalin, Pol Pot had, at least in part, similar causes.

A few days before the publication of Greta's mother's book, a Swedish activist who worked in the same radical environmental organizations as her father, began to build up Greta skillfully and vigorously. This continued on the day of the appearance. This is too much for a coincidence, especially since her father's organization with Greta has collected millions of Swedish kronor. Greta read aloud in front of an almost empty room. Compliant media cut out the empty rows of chairs, turned everything into hype and sensation. A Deichmohle with substantial arguments has been icy ignored or met with hostility for decades; her hysteria of man-made global warming, while the return of an ice age is more likely and more dangerous, is being worshiped; the disturbed girl has even been compared to Jesus.

> «Research by critical media has shown, however, that its success is largely due to the Swedish PR expert Ingmar Rentzhog, who has good contacts with several propaganda organizations. Four days after Greta started her climate strike, her mother Malena Ernman's book was presented. The same day, Rentzhog posted a photo of Greta on Instagram and wrote a long article on Facebook … Greta's mother Malena Ernman, a well-known soprano, then confirmed on Facebook that environmentalist Bo Thorén had recruited her daughter. Thorén is a member of the board of the environmental association Fossilfritt Dalsland and is a well-known representative of the international environmental movement Extinction Rebellion, which has also been active in Sweden since last autumn.
> This radical leftist group, "Extinction Rebellion" also operates very openly with WeDontHaveTime … Gretas Papa Svante is the managing director of both

> Ernman Produktion AB and Northern Grace AB … The shares of both companies have seen an immense increase since Greta's first appearance … Gretas Father cooperates with the foundation "WeDontHaveTime".»[xlvi] (Weltwoche.ch)

The idea, that a chain of happy coincidences granted the founders and managing directors millions unintentionally, is made unplausible by a report, that shows an acquaintance of the PR professional with Greta's mother.

> It is also understandable in media reports, that her mother apparently knows the PR consultant Ingmar Rentzhog. Among other things both have already written an article on climate protection for the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter. Rentzhog is no stranger to Sweden, he sold his financial communications company and founded the platform "We don't have time"»[xlvii] (Meedia)

Mr. Mere Coincidence was very busy, as it seems.

Opinion media create a sensation from an empty hall, whereas genuine critique of feminism has been stifled by ignoring it for generations.

> «Greta apparently turned to the crème de la crème of climate policy gathered in the room. But a short video clip shown on television the following day revealed that Greta was actually speaking in an almost empty room.»[xlviii] (connectiv)

Those who speak the truth are hushed up or insulted. On the other hand, those who are mentally disturbed are raised to 'saints' of feminist hysteria and compared to a Messiah.

> «Berlin's Catholic Bishop Heiner Koch compared the exemplary effect of the Swedish climate protection activist Greta Thunberg with that of Jesus Christ.»[xlix] (evangelisch)

This series of books presents many independent evidence. Doubts about a document, argument or topic do not affect the validity of others.

Boys Alone

April 6, 2023 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I didn't want to do it. I enjoyed scouts only ever because I had friends in my troop. I did not enjoy swimming. I learned early in life, however, never to question authority. Therefore, when the presiding authorities over my early life sent me to a Boy Scout swim meet, I went. Reluctantly. Very.

Due to humanity's inability to do much of anything without categorizing ourselves, those responsible for this particular meet put us into groups according to how well we could swim. At the top, where the jock boys live and thrive, were The Sharks. (West Side Story, anyone?) I was a Minnow. How many 12-to-13-year-old young men like to be called "Minnows"? Do you know the exact number? I do. Zero.

I didn't want to grab the paddle, kick my legs to the other side of the fucking pool, and lose. I wanted to go home. I was totally unprepared for this. I stank. Then I sank.

Some dude with a mustache and lots of naturally developed, manly muscle, wearing a flannel shirt and jeans (I will never forget this.), jumped in and pulled me out. I wept. My friends in the troop (none of whom were Minnows) did their boyish best to tell me that it was okay. I had great friends. I had idiotic authority figures.

I didn't cry because I was scared. Well, that wasn't the main reason I was crying. I was crying because I felt stupid for being the poor fool who forced a grown man to get himself all wet. That nice man who saved my life never said a word to me. I felt totally inadequate in his presence. A boy unworthy of being one. That was the biggest reason to cry. I never told my friends that part. I never told anyone, in fact, until now.

I tell you now because this was not an isolated incident for me, nor am I the only one who has experienced such a disappointment. It has only gotten worse. Not for me; for the generations that have followed. Fewer men are teaching boys how to be boys, and it seems that even fewer men are interested in teaching young men how to enter in. I believe that much of this has to do with the boredom that empire naturally produces, but not all of it. The American Empire was built high over ignorance of manhood and the idea that men are disposable. Let me try a little sports analogy: To me, corporate sports are a hell-of-a-lot less interesting than truly manmade sports.

Let's look at one unique and perhaps embarrassing way in which men are stifled in their relationships with boys. An article at TampaBay.com from 2007 about what ought to have been a simple exchange between trusting strangers reveals a poisonous societal belief that, while humorously discussed, degenerates these crucial relationships in a very serious way.

Roy Peter Clark, the author, had the opportunity to help a small boy with his zipper when they were both in the men's room. The tale has a happy ending, and Clark makes a funny situation that much funnier with the manner in which he writes about it:

"The stall door swings open, and out comes a boy – maybe 8 years old – all dressed up in his Sunday suit: white shirt and tie, dark blue slacks and jacket, a right proper little lad. But he has a problem. For this young man has clearly outgrown this outfit, so that his pants barely contain his lower frame. 'Mister, I can't pull up my zipper. Can you help me?'

"I'm in a Catholic church, in the middle of the greatest sexual scandal in the history of Catholicism, in the men's room, with a boy who wants me to help him with his zipper.

"What would you do?"

At some point, Clark has to go so far as to enlist the "aid" of an unwitting old man who enters the bathroom during the dilemma, by shouting loud enough that at least one witness can hear:

"'Okay, here's what I'm going to do. I'm going to grab your belt and your zipper. Then I'm going to count to three, and you're going to pull in your stomach. Okay? One, two, three…'"

I can just see the kid in my mind. When an adult does this, a boy's mind is far more likely to first misunderstand why the strange man has decided to talk so loudly, but the rest of his mind probably says, "He must know what he's doing. Just follow through. Boy, this is awful." What a heartfelt story. Just wonderful. Amusing, entertaining, poignant, and ultimately disturbing. (Read what some of the other men said they would do.)

I will not dispute Clark's words, his attitude, or the manner in which he dealt with this unfortunately tricky situation. There is, in my mind, nothing to dispute. My reaction would have been much the same. This article mentions one important aspect of the sex war in which we find ourselves enmeshed. Men, the owners of penises, are forbidden, in their own minds, based on what they perceive in the culture that surrounds them, from helping boys, the owners of lesser penises, with something as simple as the zipper that zips up in front of it. This is in spite of the fact that men, by and large, do not molest children. Clark admits, "What if someone comes in and I'm holding this kid's zipper? What if it's a priest? What if it's the kid's brother – or his beefy father? Am I willing to take a beating to help junior with his pants?" Can we all agree that such a question should never even enter a man's mind? How is it possible not to see the enormity of what is being said?

To give it some perspective, imagine being a black man, and being lectured by the culture at large that you have greater potential for being a violent criminal. This lecture goes on ad infinitum, ad nauseam. "We all know that black men have a greater propensity for theft and murder. Now this black guy might be nice, and yes, we shouldn't judge, but on the other hand…"

Making matters worse, most boys are curious about men, and you know what I mean. I am not now advocating nor will I ever advocate anything that could be deemed sexually prurient as a teaching tool with boys and pubescent men. I also do not think that other boys were nearly as curious as I was. In fact, at the time, I sensed a difference when I noticed other boys discussing how and when that sort of curiosity was healthily satisfied. Therefore, this is not an effort at arousing or provoking anybody who disagrees. The way

I see it, however, is that it is virtually a father's job to show his son, as Rose Nylund put it in an episode of "The Golden Girls," what makes a bull a bull:

Rose: "That's how my mother taught me!"

Blanche: "Honey, didn't that give you a false impression about… what a man would look like?"

Rose: "It sure did! Can you imagine my surprise on my wedding night with Charlie? …Boy, that bull would've been jealous!"

Kidding aside, it is difficult to write about, because of what I know about manhood. The reader must understand that I feel almost as if I am discussing something that most men simply wish to think about and silently communicate when the time comes, if ever. You're hiking, you have to piss: teaching moment. You go for a swim, and no one has swim trunks: teaching moment. You go to the community gym and change in the locker room: teaching moment. Need I go on? I didn't think so. Talking is unnecessary in such a situation, and can easily get awkward. For most men, it is sufficient to silently do something together, and wait for the relating to follow.

I propose that men are far more likely to do rather than talk. Try going on a fishing trip sometime. There will be quite a lot of doing and very little talking. Men usually open up to one another after doing. I'll give you an example:

When I took a job at college during the summer months in a dishroom at a dorm, there were both men and women who had also started work there at the same time. On the first day, no one spoke. We were all strangers. By the end of the day, the women no longer were.

Women communicate largely through verbal means. Men only do this after the process of doing, for the most part. If they can't do, they talk about the doing. We were all certainly doing many things when we sent the dishes through the big, beautiful machine that some man built after figuring it out (probably while leaning forward on his knees, sitting back down after a piss break). But the men stayed quiet, week after week. The women, by the second day, were talking about all of their friends. They were friends instantly. We men didn't make friends. We did the dishes silently, alongside a gaggle of gabbing gals.

One weekend, the women went to a special conference "For Women Only." (There was no comparable conference for the men.) There were only guys in the dishroom, so it was dead quiet. We didn't even look at each other. (Well, not at the same time.) Suddenly there was a lull in lunch traffic, and we were all left standing and staring at the conveyor belt some man had devised.

One of the particularly bored men took a fork, laid it down face up, put a knife criss-cross over the bend in the fork's neck, put a spoon on the end closest to him, slammed down the other end of the knife with his manly hand, and sent the spoon flying into the dirty silverware tray. Huh-huh. That was cool.

Every man started grinning, including me. Ah, I thought, this is what men do; this is how we communicate. Now we're getting somewhere. He flipped another, then another piece of silverware into the tray. So did another guy. Then another. Huh-huh. Dude…

Not being good at sports in general, I just watched. Then I grabbed a bowl, took another bowl, and placed it upside down on top. A third bowl sat on top of that, and the fourth bowl, like the second, was upside down on top of that. I can't remember how many I did, but pretty soon, the fat guy, the skinny guy, the little dude, the regular Joe, the cute college prep, were all looking at my tower. Huh-huh. Then another guy started building. Then another. We were all grinning.

We never said much. I never knew a single man's name. They went off and graduated, I'm assuming, having intercourse, having kids, making some money, losing some, fighting with their women, crying, thinking about God, planning, succeeding, doing up their kids' zippers, failing in life, and some of them failing miserably. They're all about 35 or 40 now.

The point is these simple, unspoken rituals of manhood are slowly dying. Boys who grow into manhood with their curiosity about men unsatisfied, however intense or mild it may be, are deficient in their understanding of the world. Some of them are given badges, honors, and guns by the state. The lack from before is filled with something that has the potential to become that much more sinister. Simultaneously, present-day culture puts all men under suspicion.

Gone are the days of apprenticeships, where boys would learn how to perform tasks in a useful trade. You could depend on these boys learning how to read, count, and apply their physical bodies in the act of creation alongside a watchful man with a vested interest. Now they are lectured, usually by women, about how those days are long gone, and wasn't that an interesting, quaint way to live? Finally, when one of these boys needs to leave the feminized classroom so that he can unzip and pee, he has to ask permission. Since children seldom leave the classroom except for lunch or urination, everybody knows, since it isn't lunchtime, what little Fred has to do with his wiener. Lovely.

This same little Fred goes to church on Sunday and finds the dilemma with his zipper has grown worse. A simple, masculine exchange of a non-sexual nature, but which carries with it the unspoken enjoyment of a shared masculine sexual potential, with just a little pride, is laden with problems and emotional upset, all because boys and men can no longer relate, unless it's pre-approved, corporate-sponsored, thoroughly vetted, and after school.

Men who are brave enough to create little men are inundated with parenting books written by vetted "experts." I propose to you that men who know how to be men, who remember being boys with total honesty about the pain as well as the joy, don't need any stupid books. The affection remains bottled until they have found the safety required to express it.

I watched a family friend a few years back with his daughter, who couldn't have been a day over 12. She was a typical sapling: tall but gawky, too slender to be womanly, blonde, and obviously someone who would turn heads in about two more years. It was summer, so she was wearing shorts. I don't know what the problem was, or whether it was even a problem that sparked the whispering I was somehow privileged to hear, but since I was in the room, I watched and listened with rapt attention.

He stroked her thigh in a loving fashion that bordered on a romantic gesture. She sat perfectly still with her arm around his neck. I have no idea what they said, but everything that came out of his mouth was soft and intimate. He knew another grown man was in the room and watching. He didn't care. Neither did she. Good for them. That young lady is probably married now. I have no doubt that she desperately wants her husband (the lucky bum) to do much the same thing. I know for a fact that the father was not a boy alone when he grew up.

What would a hysterical soccer mom who didn't know those two think? Who gives a damn? By the look on the girl's face, he clearly isn't finished. Leave them alone. If you don't understand the vast chasm between incest and fatherly affection, this article isn't going to convince you. It will simply run right over you if it convinces any number of men reading it, so go back to your Women's Studies thing.

I had a thought while watching Walt Disney's final masterpiece, "Sleeping Beauty" the other day. The artwork, especially in the forest scenes, is incomparable. So is Tchaikovsky's soundtrack.

The story and dialogue, though, are forgettable and laughable. In the middle of the movie, we finally discover that the Three Good Fairies are almost entirely useless, as they have been raising the princess in the forest for 16 years, yet they still haven't figured out how to make a dress or bake a damn cake. Now, real women, in anticipation of a particularly auspicious birthday, would undoubtedly be able to handle it in spades.

However, I found myself thinking, "What would three blue-collar men – husky, heavy, and hairy (No, those are not their names.) – do if they encountered a foundling baby girl in the forest? What could she expect on her sixteenth birthday?" The answer is clear to me: She would probably have an entirely new set of bedroom furniture, a vanity complete with carved flowers and curly-cues, one hell-of-a massive cake, ribs broiled to perfection, every pastel color you can imagine hanging from the walls, and the knowledge that behind her, for the rest of her life, is a wall of muscular protection should she ever require it. No doubt they would have helped her countless times to put her tiny panties on when she was littler. If a misandrist interrupted one such tender and ordinary moment, I would suggest that whatever the accusation, the reply should start with two words: Shove off.

Telesphorus tortured & killed for witty criticism of Arsinoe

April 7, 2023 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Just as it is today, men criticizing women in the ancient world was dangerous. Whether it was the foolish lad Ascalabus criticizing the goddess Demeter for boozing, or the high official Telesphorus criticizing King Lysimachus's wife Arsinoe for vomiting, the results were the same: disaster for the man.

The goddess Demeter threw her drink onto Ascalabus's face when he criticized her. She had come thirsty to his mother's house. His mother generously gave her a potent drink. Ascalabus laughed at Demeter for drinking so eagerly. He may have called her greedy. He may have sarcastically offered to give her a full cask to drink. Whatever words he said, she got offended and threw her drink into his face. The results were cataclysmic:

> His skin, absorbing it, became spotted, and where he had once had arms, he now had legs. A tail was added to his altered limbs, and he shrank to a little shape, so that he has no great power to harm. He is like a lesser lizard, a newt, of tiny size. [1]

Ascalabus's mother wept as her son, turned into lizard, scampered away. Mothers must teach their sons that a man's life matters no more than a tiny newt when a woman gets offended.

Telesphorus was tortured and killed for witty criticism of King Lysimachus's wife Arsinoe. At a party, Arsinoe was forcing herself to vomit so that she could drink more. Telesphorus made fun of Arsinoe with a quip to the persons who came with her:

> You are causing trouble by bringing in this vomiting woman [2]

That line adapted the first line from Euripides's couplet:

> You are causing trouble by bringing in this Muse, > idle, lover of wine, careless of money.

Telesphorus didn't explicitly call Arsinoe a boozer or a drunkard, even though that's what she apparently was. Lysimachus responded brutally to Telesphorus's witty words:

> He mutilated his own friend, Telesphorus the Rhodian, cutting off his nose and ears. He kept him for a long while in a den, like some new and strange animal, after which the hideousness of his hacked and disfigured face, assisted by starvation and the squalid filth of a body left to wallow in its own dung, made him no longer appear to be human! Besides this, his hands and knees, which the narrowness of his abode forced him to use instead of his feet, became hard and callous, while his sides were covered with sores by rubbing against the walls. His appearance was no less shocking than frightful. His punishment turned him into > so monstrous a creature that he was not even pitied. [3]

Historically, men who consensually "got a woman pregnant" were castrated for their loving effort. If not outright violence against men, men's criticism of women tends to produce quickly defenses of women and apologies to women.

In addition to being a drunkard, Arsinoe was a violent, vicious woman who bedded her brother. She reportedly killed a step-son of King Lysimachus in order to ensure that her children would inherit the throne. When Lysimachus died, she married her half-brother. That marriage failed after she conspired against him. She then fled to the household of her full brother, Ptolemy II, in Egypt. There she instigated the exile of her brother's wife and then married her brother. The poet Sotades warned Ptolemy II:

> You're thrusting your poker into an unholy slot [4]

For that frank warning, Ptolemy had one of his generals administer an early form of cement shoes to Sotades:

> {the general} stuck his feet in a jar full of lead, took him out to sea, and drowned him.

A caring friend might consider warning a man against his plans to marrry. But even warning a man about marrying his vicious, alcoholic sister can be dangerous.

Given the realities of gynocentric society, Arsinoe was soon deified. She was worshiped in cult shrines from Alexandria to Athens. Her face was imprinted on gold coins issued over 2200 years ago. Ptolemy II named various streets in Alexandria with her name and honorary epithets for her, such as "the Queen," "the Consoler," "of Victory," "the Saving One," and "she who brings things to completion." Arsinoe, of course, in recent writing has been rapturously celebrated as a powerful woman ruler.[5]

Men's deaths matter relatively little in gynocentric society. Men should squarely recognize that reality before they dare to criticize women.

Notes:

[1] Ovid, Metamorphoses 5.438-461, from Latin trans. A.S. Kline. Antoninus Liberalis recorded:

> Demeter in anger poured over him what was left of her drink. He was changed bodily into a multi-coloured gecko {askalabos} which is hated by gods and mankind. He passes his life along ditches. Whoever kills him is cherished by Demeter.

From Greek trans. Celoria (1992) p. 83. For other ancient references to this story, Overduin (2015) Appendix 2, pp. 543-6.

[2] Athenaeus, The Learned Banqueters 14.616c, from Greek trans. Olson (2010) p. 101. The subsequent couplet is from Euripides's Antiope, from Greek trans. Milanezi (2000) p. 410. Here's more on Arsinoe (ancient references), who would be more fastidiously referenced as Arsinoë II.

[3] Seneca, On Anger 3.27, from Latin trans. Stewart (1889). The powerful tend to seek to suppress verbal “abuse”:

> Those who love insulting jokes are dangerous perhaps because they often unveil truths that must be kept covered for the sake of kings, rulers, politicians and rich individuals.

Milanezi (2000) p. 410. The most fundamental aspect of the dominant social order is gynocentrism. Mockery and sarcasm are threats to gynocentrism. Thus those who engage in such verbal expression are labeled “the incarnation of disorder.” Id. p. 411. For another example, Stratonicus the Athenian, as described in Athenaeus, Learned Banqueters 8.352.

[4] Athenaeus, Learned Banqueters 14.621a, trans. Olson (2010) p. 139. The subsequent quote is from id. Theocritus provides an instructive counterpoint to Sotades’s courageous truth-telling. Functioning as today’s apparatchik journalists, Theocritus wrote a panegyric of Ptolemy II and praised Arsinoe:

> his fine noble spouse, who makes him a better wife than ever clasped bridegroom under any roof, seeing that she loves with her whole heart brother and husband in one.

Theocritus, Idyll 17, from Greek trans. J.M. Edmonds (1912) for the Loeb Classical Library. I’ve modernized the English.

[5] Here are documentary references to the cult of Arsinoe. Carney (2013) provides a less unbalanced evaluation of Arsinoe. See esp. id. pp. 143-4.

Patriarchy and Toxic Relationships

April 7, 2023 | by Tim Patten | Link | Original Link

Those of us who are intent on meeting a mate, pair-bonding with a partner, or marrying the love of our lives will face numerous obstacles in our efforts to find happiness in this way.

For one thing, many of us will be forced to abandon hope of having an equal relationship, particularly in a time when, as Gloria Steinem noted, "society…encourages women to be victims every way."[i] Notions like this, including descriptions of women as chattel, are actively promoted by the media and on college campuses, strongly influenced by women's and gender studies programs that characterize our primordial patriarchy as an institutionalized and socially acceptable framework for male domination over women.[ii] Men are, in essence, encouraged to debase women with objectification, power, and authority.

Under the circumstances, it is not hard to see why many women develop anger, resentment and contempt towards men, which can provoke desires and fantasies—as well as acts–of revenge. The relationship between the sexes has become a power play, where interactions are viewed in a harsh, zero-sum light. If women beat men by a wide margin on the playing field, the response is not "great job!" Instead, there are hostile taunts, such as "girls rule and boys drool!" Female empowerment has metamorphosed into an ugly vision of females overpowering males. Talk of "girl power" simply means pushing back against male authority.

Authority Figures

To be sure, people have butted heads with those in positions of authority throughout history. Indeed, author J.K. Rowling once remarked, "authority figures attract trouble,"[iii] while businessman Vivek Wadhwa noted that a "k*ey ingredient to innovation is the ability to challenge authority and break rules.*"[iv] Not surprisingly, the assertion that men are patriarchal overlords has nourished thoughts of retaliation among women, fostering a mentality where males and females are combatants rather than comrades. Scarier still, it has inspired violent imagery of women dominating their men. For many of us, the playing field of love and marriage has been transformed into a cage match of gendered adversaries, where equality is rare.

Hell Hath No Fury

Admittedly, there are some who believe that patriarchy is an illusion; others, meanwhile, have no doubt that the widespread oppression of women is evidence of its existence. The fact that those on the very upper reaches of the economic ladder own or control the vast majority of the world's assets, businesses and employees suggests there is no place or part in society that is not subordinate in some way to this particular structure—aside from a few matriarchal villages in Africa, perhaps, everything is patriarchy.

Whether accurate or not, something has clearly played havoc with the relationship between the sexes. While some women have embraced our differences and are incredible mates, others have established fulcrums of male antipathy, moving them freely along a continuum that begins with caution and distrust, passes through resentment, and ends at hatred. Indeed, those of us who are in love can easily find ourselves in danger; we must develop a gendered lens so we can objectively evaluate current and future companions. We must also be careful about our own actions. If we are controlling, aggressive or violent toward women, we must find ways to calm down and understand the source of our anger.

Truth

Still, even if we manage to keep matters in check, the question of whether this will result in a win-win situation remains open. The truth is, the patriarchal system–or, perhaps, the belief in it–has likely damaged many prospective partners, who may view us, consciously or subconsciously, with distrust, disgust or begrudging hate. Hopefully, we notice the signs of a problematic partner early on: she crosses her arms over her chest and prevents us from gaining the conversational upper hand; she demands the last word in an argument; or she waves our ideas away, spins around in a huff, and stomps up the stairs.

If such behavior occurs, that doesn't mean we should respond in kind. While choosing the wrong partner–or at the least, someone who is unwilling to alter their destructive behavior–can destroy our lives and futures, it is worth bearing in mind that there are alternatives to simply lashing out. By acknowledging the role that primordial patriarchy may have played in fostering resentment and antipathy within our significant other, we are in the driver's seat: we decide whether and how to deal with her wrath.

Men Have Options

Among the paths we might choose are:

A negotiated relationship. Even though divorce rates are sky-high at 40-50%,[v] and four out of every ten couples who stay married say they are unhappy,[vi] there are some who manage to work through their gender-power issues. Premarital counseling can be a perfect solution for those who are serious about and intent on having a wonderful future together.

The wealth solution. The resources that billionaires have at their disposal can keep wives comfortably ensconced in a life of luxury while business, social and other demands can mean that the two partners don't see enough of each other to wage endless conflict. Sadly, this option is not available to most of us.

Succumb to her will: If we breach one of the thousands of bulwarks against male oppression that have built up inside of her, we will receive an angry tongue-lashing–or worse. Some of us willingly give in, never fighting back as we try hard to be respectful, considerate, and responsive to her every need. We accept endless bickering and nagging. We walk on eggshells, allowing her to continually test our love. We ensure that we tell her she is pretty, has beautiful hair, is not fat and smells good. Unfortunately, studies show that suppressing our needs and wants and sustaining years of such negativity can cause mental and physical health illnesses.[vii]

Stand up for ourselves. Every time we talk over her or otherwise try to gain the upper hand, her sliding scale of mistrust moves closer to hatred. Like many women, she may actively count the times we wounded her and, at some point, retaliate. Soon, we will find ourselves destined for vengeance that only a woman can unleash. The divorce will likely be a living hell—one that has led to depression and suicide in no small number of men.[viii]

Go our own way. Perhaps the only real answer is to join an ever-growing movement that believes the modern world can and will be incredible for us men. A hurricane of men's liberation awareness–MGTOW, Red Pill and Herbivore Men–is circling the planet, and it is unleashing freedom and empowering us to define and follow our own unique, and uniquely masculine, paths.

The Modern Men's Liberation Movement

It is a new day for men: knowledge and freedom are at our fingertips. We now have the opportunity to design the kind of passionate life that we might once have only dreamed about. The first step, of course, is to move beyond patriarchal expectations regarding relationships and marriage and forge a life of purpose designed with ourselves, our community and those we love most in mind. When we go our own way, we will discover who we truly are and wish to be, and realize the satisfying life that we were destined for.

Why gay men don’t need feminism – Part 2: The takeover

April 8, 2023 | by andybob | Link | Original Link

Introduction

‘Why Gay Men Don’t Need Feminism’ is a four-part series of articles adapted from a speech that was intended to be presented at the Second International Conference on Men’s Issues in 2015 by the author, Matthew Lye (a.k.a. Andy Bob). The four parts are:
Part 1: Challenging Assumptions
Part 2: The Takeover
Part 3: Gay Bashing
Part 4: Brotherhood

As these articles are written from the perspective of a Men’s Human Rights Activist (MHRA), they focus on the dysfunctional relationship between feminism and gay men. Feminism has had an entirely different relationship with lesbians which is irrelevant to this topic, and has been examined in detail elsewhere.

Once upon a time, there was an emerging affiliation of hetero-abnormative persons known as GLBT that was just starting to gain some influence in the playground of gender politics. Unfortunately, L had long been overrun by a surly cabal of mean-girl bullies known as feminists. Betty Friedan, getting it right for once, referred to these lesbian feminists as ‘The Lavender Menace’ and tried to warn anyone who would listen, especially heterosexual feminists, that this gang was bad news. [1] When a querulous rat-bag like Betty Friedan warns against fraternizing with a group of women on the basis that they don’t work well with others, you just know that it would be ill-advised to give them anything other than an extremely wide berth.

Perhaps if G had paid closer attention to this warning, it may have been better prepared to handle the moment when L told G to check its privilege and remove its limp-wristed self from the front of the queue – L didn’t particularly care where G went, so long as it didn’t stray too far away from its monitoring glare. For reasons that some people, especially many gay men, struggle to understand, G meekly obeyed, and allowed itself to be relegated to second-class status within its own movement – a position which it retains to this very day.

When GLBT became LGBT, there was no longer any doubt that feminists had commandeered the Rainbow Float, and G – along with B, T and eventually, I, P, both Qs and even a confused-looking question mark that didn’t seem to know why it was there – quickly learned that it was expected to do as it was told. [2] Worse still, L managed to convince this ragtag gaggle of the orientationally-aggrieved that they all owed something to its dominant ideology: feminism.

Gay men have even been publicly rebuked by straight, feminist celebrities, like Patricia Arquette and Rose McGowan, for being insufficiently grateful to feminism. In what one can only assume was some kind of post-Oscar daze, Arquette declared that it “was time for all… the gay people and people of color that we’ve all fought for to fight for us now.” [3] One less than grateful gay media pundit of colour responded with: “Dear Patricia Arquette: Blacks and gays owe white women nothing”, [4] and proceeded to call her a “fool”.

Carol Hanisch: “[G]ay liberation carries contempt for women to the ultimate: total segregation.”

Wrong. Arquette is not a fool. She is just a feminist who couldn’t resist exploiting an internationally-televised event to regurgitate Feminist Sacred Babble about wage gaps, the oppression of white women, the plight of Third World women who, according to feminists, are the only people in Third World regions who suffer human rights abuses and deprivation – apparently, the men and children are doing just great – and peevish lamentations about the ingratitude of minorities upon whom feminists claim to have lavished decades of love and support.

Spreading lies and misinformation at every opportunity is what feminists do, and Arquette is a feminist. The only surprise is that she didn’t conclude her speech by making a plaintive cry about where all the good men had gone. Perhaps she’s saving it for when she hands out the Best Supporting Actor award at the 2016 Oscars. No doubt, the talented-but-feminist Meryl Streep will be there to offer an embarrassment of inappropriately shrill support.

Rose McGowan attempted to rally support for feminism among gay men by opting for the infinitely more bizarre approach of hurling a barrage of all-too-familiar Code Black Shaming Language [5] at them: “Gay men are as misogynistic as straight men, if not more so,” she said. “I have an indictment of the gay community right now, I’m actually really upset with them.” With this one statement, McGowan reminded gay men that the accusation that they are ‘as bad as straight men’ – the most scathing insult in the entire feminist arsenal – is a fundamental tenet of feminist ideology. [6] Gay men are no better than straight men. Got it?

Rose McGowan: Gay men are just “people who have basically fought for the right to stand on top of a float wearing an orange speedo and take molly [MDMA].”
McGowan even threw in a comment about gay men being “delusional idiots” just in case her charge of misogyny wasn’t enough to inspire gay men to rally around the feminist cause. Perhaps the most alarming of all was McGowan’s claim that she has been a long-time supporter of gay men and their rights, thus offering an insight into the rather curious approach that feminists tend to adopt toward their supposed allies.

Predictably, the mainstream media defended McGowan by suggesting that she was only being criticized for her comments because she was a woman: “As a woman and a Hollywood actress, McGowan is seen as fair game for scrutiny.” [7] Fortunately, this wheezy old feminist meme is not working as effectively as it used to, and many gay men indignantly dismissed it with the contempt it deserves. Some even took the opportunity to give feminism itself a dressing down in a manner which must have alarmed those who were hoping that McGowan’s comments would succeed in whipping gay men back into line. One gay man observed that it was:

> .. not inaccurate to say that McGowan is using guilt and illogical appeals to our emotions in an attempt to chain gay men directly to our oppressors. Was that hyperbolic? Not in any way that even compares to what McGowan has said. Feminists are big on a story of oppression always being valid if someone feels oppressed, right? Well, I feel strongly that feminism has been oppressive to gay men, to all other men, to anyone with any masculine traits, and, in many ways, even to women (sometimes especially to women). Casual and accepted deference to feminism no longer works for me, and it shouldn’t work for McGowan.” [8]

A note to Rose McGowan: being informed by an alleged celebrity that, quite frankly, most gay men like me had never heard of, that she is “really upset” about our lack of enthusiasm for her bigoted, anti-male ideology that regards gay men as, at best, token lackeys who ought to be ashamed of our misogynistic ‘rejection’ of women, is not something that will interrupt my sleep any time soon. The fact that she assumes that it will, speaks more to her narcissism, her staggering sense of entitlement and the supremacist leanings of her chosen ideology than it does about the gay men she has publicly, and rather ironically, condemned as “delusional”.

Public attacks like these have the benefit of alerting many gay men to the fact that feminism is one belligerent, foot-stomping Diva they would be well-advised to step as far away from as possible, and proceed to expose her true nature to the world at large. Feminism will just have to find some other BFF to fetch its morning lattes, because all except the most self-loathing gay man would choose to continue being its compliant doormat. Another more important benefit of such attacks is that they leave many gay men somewhat bewildered as to what exactly feminism has done for them. This is a rather important detail which feminists like McGowan and Arquette always leave suspiciously vague, if indeed, they ever get around to expanding on it at all.

From Everyday Feminism:
“The gay rights movement has won rights and recognition that largely serve the interests of white, wealthy cisgender gay men to the detriment of poor queers and queer people of color, and to the detriment of racial and economic justice more generally.”

Like many gay men, the only thing I can discern that feminism has ever done for me is to commandeer my own human rights movement under the guise of a purported alliance, and using it as a vehicle to promote an anti-male hate movement hell-bent on undermining the rights and welfare of men and boys – a demographic that includes me – attempting to rope me into helping it to demonize my own masculine identity and, if that weren’t enough, brainwashing the more suggestible of my gay brethren into accusing our straight brothers of being responsible for every problem and injustice the world has ever known.

By allowing themselves to be so publicly allied to such a blatantly corrupt and destructive ideology as feminism, the gay men of LGBT have sold themselves out. They have betrayed whatever egalitarian principles they may have once had by participating in organized feminism's relentless campaign to demonize, demoralize and criminalize straight men – especially those of the white, cis-gendered variety – in what has become a concerted global ritual of perpetual condemnation.

Call me a purist, but that is not something in which any credible human rights activist, organization or movement should be participating.

It is little wonder that as early as 1976, renowned gay rights activist, John Lauritson, was already lamenting the fact that feminists had bullied their way into the gay rights movement, effectively marginalizing the gay men within it, and turning the gay rights movement into what he called "the fag end of feminism." [9] John Lauriston ought to know because he was there when it happened. As a primary source for this phenomenon, it is imperative that his experiences and observations be presented in detail. Here is an excerpt from a speech he gave at the 4th Gay Academic Union Conference in the city of New York back in 1976:

> I remember a number of such [disruptions] in the early days of the Gay Liberation Front, in the fall of 1969. Women we had never seen before would come in and deliver tirades against the GLF men; they would say that not only were gay men more sexist or more male chauvinist than straight men, but men in GLF were among the worst of all. These charges were unfair and untrue [and] had a certain demoralizing effect. Some of the men felt that rather than acting against our oppressors… we should turn our attention inward to confront the enemy which was: Ourselves!"

At the first gay conference at Rutgers in 1970, the major panel on the last day was disrupted by a group of women who demanded that all proceedings come to a halt. They charged that the panel was "elitist" and "sexist" (although half of the panelists were women); their main ostensible grievance was that on a table in the hall, provided for leaflets and free literature, were copies of Gay newspaper, in which they had found a reproduction of a beautiful, lush, reclining female nude, painted in the style of classic romanticism. This, they charged, was designed to titillate men, and was degrading to women. Overlooked was the fact that the picture illustrated an article written by a lesbian.

The conference organizers were cruelly attacked, apparently for the sin of not having policed and censored the free literature table. It was a senseless, abusive, and thuggish disruption. For the most specious of reasons, a beautiful and mellow gay conference – one of the very first – had been turned into a nightmare.

One could go on and on. I imagine most of the people in this room [at the 4th Gay Academic Union Conference] have witnessed or read accounts of similar disruptions. There was the first international gay liberation conference in Edinburgh, where women discovered evidence of "sexism" and demanded that the conference change its focus from legislative reform to "confronting sexism".

Laws, they argued, only affected men, and therefore it was sexist to concentrate upon things like repealing sodomy statutes. A majority of the men went along with this demand, and that was the end of an internationally coordinated campaign to change the laws. It's amazing it should be considered trivial that after two millennia, homosexual men are still criminals.

A certain pattern emerges. The people in power do not like movements for social change. When such movements are in their infancy, they will try to destroy or divert them. When movements have grown large and viable, then they will try to render them innocuous through co-optation." [9]

Sounds familiar, doesn't it? Co-opting movements after they have already been set-up, organized and funded by others is a well-established feminist strategy. Feminists are parasites who are notorious for appropriating other people's issues and resources. [10] Neither are they shy about intimidating, labeling, censoring and threatening those who dare to object to their methods, their motives or the gaping logical, factual, ethical and moral flaws in their ideology. [11]

Lauritson's experiences will have a painfully familiar ring to the legendary domestic violence activist and researcher, Erin Pizzey, Editor at Large at A Voice for Men, because that is exactly what radical lesbian feminists did to the battered women's shelter movement that she established in Great Britain in 1971. This is how Erin Pizzey remembers the co-optation of the movement that she pioneered:

> I went to work in the Women's Liberation Work Shop in Newport Street, off Shaftesbury Avenue. I also attended the first women's conferences and I was struck by the hundreds and hundreds of women claiming to be radical militant lesbians. The first women's conferences were destroyed by violent fisticuffs between these women and most of us were very afraid of them. As far as I was concerned these women did not speak for my gay friends any more than the radical feminists spoke for all women in our country who were very happy at home with their husbands and their children.
> In reality, this was a very minor group of women who were only able to hurl abuse at heterosexual women and their families because they were white, middle class and had media jobs. Before very long they were employing each other and 'marginalizing' the men who tried to work alongside them. Men, intimidated by their brutal, violent behavior, moved on and out of many jobs. According to these women all women were victims of men's violent behavior, any attempt for men to fight back met with behind-scenes maneuvering and men LET IT HAPPEN." [12]

In fact, Ms Pizzey's evidence-based research was identified as such a threat to derailing what was to become one of feminism's most lucrative gravy trains – the Domestic Violence Industry – that they targeted her with terrorist threats that forced her to flee to The United States, and ensured that her findings could not be published in her own country for nearly a quarter of a century. [13] It deserves to be noted that, unlike gay men and her fellow domestic violence activists, Erin Pizzey fought back, and continues to do so well into her seventies – as a celebrated Men's Human Rights Activist.

Video game enthusiasts also fought back against an attempted ideological takeover by feminists, like Anita Sarkeesian, who aimed to impose strict feminist-approved standards and censorship upon their entire industry. [14] The only perceivable interest Sarkeesian seems to have ever had in video games are the opportunities they have provided for her to score the feminist trifecta of damseling for dollars, creating false threat narratives and supervising other people's pastimes.

This may explain why, despite failing to vanquish her Gamergate opponents, she still manages to look perpetually pleased with herself. Sarkeesian re-affirmed to feminists everywhere that posturing as perpetual victims continues to be extremely rewarding, even when they are openly denounced as a bunch of deceitful and avaricious busybodies. [15] Gamergate has inspired many by demonstrating that it is possible to unite in opposition to feminists who seek to impose their virulently crude and joyless ideology upon all aspects of life, even those as innocuous as personal hobbies.

It was a rude awakening for many feminists. Sadly, it wasn't rude enough to dissuade them from punishing the dissenting perspectives of The Honey Badgers, who dared to display a Gamergate poster in their booth at the 2015 Comic Expo in Calgary. [16]. The Honey Badgers included the graphic animation designer and prominent MHRA, Alison Tieman (a.k.a. Typhon Blue), and the celebrated anti-feminist videographer Karen Straughan (a.k.a. GirlWritesWhat).

Their ousting from the Comic Expo was, essentially, an intentionally brutal assault on Alison Tieman for daring to exercise her independent intellect and freedom of speech rights by expressing her well-supported rationale for rejecting feminism and its methods, despite being granted permission from the feminists in charge to do so. The lack of scruples displayed by the feminists in their treatment of Ms. Tieman and her associates only highlighted the validity of her position – and revealed that feminists could only respond to it by giving vent to their notoriously totalitarian instincts. The integrity of The Honey Badgers has also been an inspiration for many people hitherto fearful of incurring feminist displeasure.

It is interesting to note that Lauritson believes that one of the main reasons why feminists got away with co-opting the gay rights movement all those years ago, and have enjoyed virtual immunity from criticism for doing so, is because – like Erin Pizzey and her associates – most of the gay men were afraid of them. [9] In their defense, most men are afraid of feminists, and for good reason. Feminists routinely accuse men of misogyny for the most facile of reasons. These can include any alleged transgression from wearing a colourful shirt [17], pointing out the many positive attributes of men and masculinity [18], or simply organizing, supporting and participating in international conferences addressing men's issues. [19]

These accusations can destroy lives and careers, as Larry Summers discovered when he was forced to step down as president of Harvard University in 2005 for challenging feminist dogma by suggesting that men and women had innate differences. [20] “I just couldn’t breathe because this kind of bias makes me physically ill,” said strong, independent professor, Dr. Nancy Hopkins through her oxygen mask as she lay prostrate on what must be her very heavily-utilized fainting couch. “Let’s not forget that people used to say that women couldn’t drive an automobile,” she added for no discernible reason. Feminist accusations of misogyny don’t have to actually make any sense to achieve their desired results – they just have to be made.

Feminists like to make examples of men like Larry Summers to serve as warnings to other men, and sometimes other women [16], simply because they can. It is an expression of tyrannical triumphalism of a powerful and well-connected political orthodoxy with the soul of an over-indulged child with a taste for retribution. Summers’ fate was sealed when Hopkins stated that she found his comments “deeply concerning.” [21] This is popular code-speak deployed by feminists to describe the thoughts and actions of any non-compliant person whom feminists would publicly hang from a butcher’s hook if they thought they could possibly get away with it, which, metaphorically-speaking, is exactly what feminists did to Larry Summers.
For gay men, the most damaging result of the feminist takeover of the gay rights movement was the imposition of feminist theory onto how gay men should perceive and define themselves. It seems almost custom-designed to instill self-loathing and guilt. [22] In a nutshell, it is built on one achingly familiar reductionist feminist maxim: Lesbians Good, Gay Men Bad – very bad. I told you it was familiar. No-one has ever explained this fundamental feminist maxim with more damning eloquence than John Lauritson:

> According to this [feminist] ideology, lesbians are doubly oppressed – both as homosexuals and as women – where homosexual males are merely singly oppressed. Gay men still enjoy a “male privilege” because, according to a central dictum of radical feminism: ALL MEN BENEFIT FROM THE OPPRESSION OF ALL WOMEN. So it would seem that gay men are not really so badly off, and perhaps it would be better if they did not devote their energies to repealing sodomy statutes and fighting discrimination, because these goals if realized would simply give them equality with straight men, thus objectively increasing the oppression of women. Instead, gay men should spend their time “dealing with sexism”, which they acquired from having been born male and in learning how to “give up their male privilege”.
> According to this ideology, the best thing that gay men can so is act as [the] “men’s auxiliary” for women’s liberation, taking their cues from feminists. And since men are the enemy, gay men should be willing to enlist as agents in the fight against males and against maleness.” [9]

These are prophetic words indeed, especially in light of how the Canadian Association for Equality (CAFE) was treated by Gay Pride Toronto. [23] The feminists who obviously control this LGBT organization revoked CAFE's permission to march in the 2014 Toronto Pride parade the moment they got wind of the fact that CAFE is an organization focused on offering support to men in crisis.

Pride Toronto, an organization whose concerns supposedly include the rights and welfare of men who happen to be gay, bisexual and transgender, stood by silently and allowed feminists to do it. As gay men are no less likely to require support in times of crisis, there can be no more glaring evidence of feminists bullying gay men into acting against their own interests than this.

The gay men of Pride Toronto fell into lock-step formation behind the man-hating feminist bigots who obviously call the shots within their organization. Spinelessly acquiescing to feminist demands is nothing to be proud of, and exposes whatever claims its members like to make about standing for tolerance and equality as nothing more than a pretentious sham.

The fact that the organizers used CAFE's alleged but nonexistant affiliation with A Voice for Men – which they labeled as misogynistic on the grounds that it focuses on the rights and welfare of men and boys who are, get out the holy water, straight [24] – as their rationale for banning CAFE for all eternity from marching in their parade should have been shocking. Unfortunately, it wasn't.

As Lauritson chillingly predicted, feminists did indeed "enlist gay men as agents in the fight against males and maleness" – especially straight males. None of this has anything to do with gay rights, but everything to do with fulfilling feminist agendas which they have never been shy about expressing and promoting. It is always an added bonus for feminists if they can create division between men of different sexual orientations by manipulating us into adversarial positions and pitting us against each other. It works to everyone's advantage but our own.

One of the greatest threats to feminism is tolerance and understanding among men. It is even more of a perceived danger than tolerance and understanding between men and women. One of the reasons for feminists' rabidly negative response to A Voice for Men is that it provides opportunities for men to explore their shared experiences as men, creating a cohesive unity of purpose and mutual respect that feminists have always actively sought to undermine.

As Lauritson observed nearly forty years ago, feminists do not want gay men to achieve equality with straight men. Feminists prefer gay men, like women, to perceive themselves as perpetual victims, and to cast straight men as the villains who are responsible for everything they hate about their lives and the world they in which they live. Feminists even constructed an entire field of study called Queer Theory in order to provide gay men with their very own binary model of systemic oppression. Straight men get to be the bad guys all over again, only they are referred to as the 'Institution of Hetero-normativity' (no, really) rather than 'the Patriarchy'. There is no need to go too deeply into Queer Theory here – it's just feminism in a thong, only loopier. [22]

Perhaps the real purpose of creating Queer Theory was to divert the attention of gay men away from feminist rhetoric in the hope that they wouldn't notice the staggering homophobia of feminism's most prominent and influential theorists. When gay men identify as feminists, you can be certain that they have never read much feminist theory, because if they had, they would never embrace an ideology that relentlessly denigrates them in a manner that would make a placard-wielding Westboro Baptist homophobe cringe. [25]

The feminist take on gay men ranks as among the most offensive, deranged and spectacularly stupid of all feminist theories. The most important take-away for gay men who read it is that there is no counter-theory from prominent feminists that refutes any of the relentlessly hateful drivel that has been offered by the vanguards of feminism over the past five decades – and it is much too late to for them to attempt to do so now. They cannot hide it, deny it or justify why none of them have ever even tried to defend the gay men at whom they feel entitled to wag censorious fingers for failing to be sufficiently dutiful allies.

In Part 3 of Why Gay Men Don't Need Feminism, we shall examine what prominent and influential feminists really think about gay men. Suffice to say that it is not very complimentary, or a particularly big secret – except perhaps to the gay men of Gay Pride Toronto, who may want to rethink allowing feminists to continue poisoning their ranks, providing, of course, that they ever get around to reading it. Part 3 is appropriately entitled, Gay Bashing.

A reformed feminism still sees men as accessories to women

Mary Harrington, author of the just-published Feminism Against Progress, is one of a number of women (Louise Perry is another) criticizing feminism from the inside. In particular, Harrington has taken aim at birth control technology—the pill—as an aspect of what she dubs cyborg feminism, the bio-medical upgrading of the body in the service of a false conception of female freedom. She is calling for the revaluing of marriage not as a guarantee of individual happiness but as the foundation of social stability and caring. She thinks that abortion has been a net-negative for women. She recognizes trans ideology—particularly its emphasis on creating oneself as one desires—as a logical extension of cyborg feminism. And she is even willing to hold feminism (indirectly and partially) responsible for some male misery and resentment. Overall, Harrison's arguments, explored in a substantial interview with Konstantin Kisin and Francis Foster on Triggernometry (her book is not yet available in North America), provide a welcome opportunity to consider the possibilities and limitations of a feminist critique of feminism.

Nothing says "Women are wonderful" quite like the applause in conservative and non-feminist circles that greets a feminist who makes even the mildest criticisms of feminism, and Harrington's criticisms are not minor. If I understand her correctly, she sees much of what followed the 1960s as a terrible miscalculation, in which insistence on sexual and other freedoms eviscerated women's affiliation with caregiving and home. In her willingness to cast a jaundiced eye on the downstream effects of women's so-called liberation, Harrington is both the answer to many men's advocates' hopes and the stuff of our continuing unease. On the plus side, she is an intelligent, quirky woman who is advocating a major pushback against feminist assumptions in order to improve the lives of women (and perhaps men). On the minus side, Harrington seems to be, like the vast majority of feminists, unable to think outside a framework in which women's interests vastly override those of men or even children. Here are a few examples, based mainly on the Triggernometry interview (also one at UnHerd), and therefore necessarily partial.

Front and center, Harrington proclaims the folly for women of pretending that biological sex is trivial. She points out that elite women tend to be pro-trans because trans ideology supports their belief that there are no significant differences between men and women that cannot be "flattened" through bio-medical interventions like abortion and sex-change. That idea may work for them in their corner-office environment, but it is disastrous for women in other spheres of life, where some men are "violent and volatile."

Perhaps understandably, Harrington's main concern in this regard is the convicted rapist who claims a female identity in order to be placed in a women's prison. But there are many other areas of human interaction in which sex differences also matter, perhaps somewhat less urgently but no less significantly, and it's not clear that Harrington is prepared to take them on too. In the workplace, for example, as researcher Daphne Patai has shown, male well-being and job security have been under attack through a decades-long feminist campaign to protect and promote women at men's expense: this has occurred through affirmative action hiring and the insistence on transforming workplace culture to make it welcoming of women (and hostile to men). Restrictions on men's speech, jokes, behaviors, and preferences have all been a part of this successful campaign in which the salient differences between men and women have less to do with men's (formerly denied, now widely admitted) superior strength, more to do with women's higher rates of anxiety and men's higher work-related drive and ambition. The refusal to see such differences has meant decades-long unfairness—often legally enforced—to shoe-horn women into elite jobs they didn't earn and to support their oft-unreasonable demands for accommodation, up to and including the firing of men deemed to have caused female discomfort.

It's not clear if Harrington is willing to consider whether men have any rights to the work spaces they pioneered—not if their right threatens the advantages seized by women over the past 50 years.

Marriage is another arena in which Harrington's residual feminist blind spot looms large. One of her concerns is the need to bring back marriage as the foundation of social stability. Harrington even goes so far as to say that marriage needs to be reinstated as a covenant rather than a mere contract, a vehicle for the support of the family rather than for personal fulfillment. But she has nary a word to say about how the divorce industry has been destroying husbands and fathers for decades, as Stephen Baskerville has shown, ruining them financially, psychologically, and socially in the name of protecting women's freedom and financial security. How is marriage to be reformed so that it might be, once again, a viable institution for men? How is a man's right to father his own children to be protected from a feminist family court and social service system?

It's hard to believe that Harrington has not heard of the hell that divorce has become for many men; and she must know that it is women who choose divorce in the vast majority of cases. Her attitude toward men and marriage seems little different from the classic position that men should "man up" and accept their responsibilities, even if that means risking everything that matters. If women are justified, as Harrington concedes they are, to act in their class interests—even when those interests create problem for other women, as in the case of trans ideology—then shouldn't men be expected to act in their interests (or at least not to act directly against them)? The shallowness in Harrington's thinking about men is particularly evident on this score.

Harrington's focus is on the ways that women have been "freed" by feminism into various new forms of subjugation, or at least unhappiness. When sex became a private matter thanks to the birth control pill, she explains, it also became a commodity to be exploited. She expresses particular concern about women harmed in the pornography industry, in prostitution, and also through new forms of reproductive technology. She mentions, for example, the case of women who have rendered themselves infertile by selling their ova. But aren't these examples of self-commodification that women have freely chosen for economic gain? Harrington notes that if one talks to women who have worked in pornography, there is more coercion than might at first appear. This is anecdotal at best, and is an argument applicable to many spheres of human activity, including the horrific and dehumanizing work that vast numbers of men have had little choice but to perform—and continue to have little choice but to perform—all over the world and throughout human history. Are we really expected to believe that a woman who makes hundreds of thousands of dollars with an Onlyfans account—exploiting male sexual desire—is deserving of a social concern we routinely deny to male sewer workers? The answer, it seems, is yes.

That's why when it comes to Harrington's recommendations for reforming feminism, her marked lack of attention to men's lives is so off-putting. Harrington advocates new social movements (rejecting the pill, valuing motherhood, and valuing women's caring work) that will be led by women. She seems to side-step the obvious problem that the prior social movements she objects to were also to a large extent led by women: women acting in their own interests and capitalizing on their personal, sexual, and state-supported power over men. Why not suggest that the new movements be (at least) co-led by men, whose interests are also at stake and whose voices and perspectives have been sidelined as a result of feminism's anti-male impetus? Why should men take part at all in movements led by women when women have shown themselves so spectacularly ill-suited to ensure women's happiness or even to care about the well-being of others? If Harrington intends that men should be given the green light to lead their own distinctive spheres of society, she doesn't mention how.

To her credit, Harrington does express awareness of the many men left behind by feminism, the working-class, socially undesirable, and disenfranchised men whose sources of meaning and status have been gutted by the drive to equalize public spaces and re-engineer male behavior. She recognizes the importance for men of their own single-sex spaces, male sheds and the like (though she draws the line at male-only pubs!), where they can engage in "male sociality" and where young men can be disciplined and formed by older men. She recognizes that men do more to civilize other men than women can do (I'll pass over her frivolous conception of what men allegedly do in these spaces). Yet after decades of discrimination in law, hiring, government funding, healthcare, and higher education, the reinstating of male spaces is not likely to be enough to counter feminists' all-out war on men.

Moreover, Harrington admits that restoring same-sex spaces to men is part of a necessary trade-off in order to convince men to aid women resisting the entry into their spaces by trans women; at least she is honest about the self-interest. But there are many other measures necessary if feminists are to begin to assure men that they're serious about a sex-war ceasefire.

At the very least, such measures should include an immediate end to affirmative action hiring, promotion, equity targets, diversity mandates, and elaborate harassment protocols; the restoration of the full range of legal defenses for men accused of sexual assault; the public repudiation of the #MeToo movement, with a renewed insistence not on "believing women" but on presuming innocence for the male accused; an end to all special scholarships, set-asides, and opportunities for women in post-secondary schooling along with the resurrection of the merit principle in education and the job market; the permanent retiring of female chauvinism in academia, Hollywood, journalism, advertising, and public culture generally; and the restoration of equal protections under law for men's free speech and free action. Harrington, of course, cannot control such macro-level problems, but it would be nice to hear her recognize and denounce harms to men.

She is energetic in deploring incel misogyny—a thoroughly marginal phenomenon—but she has next to nothing to say about mainstream expressions of anti-male hatred ("Why Can't We Hate Men?") that are commonly engaged in by feminist celebrities, politicians, pundits, and community leaders. If Harrington's assertion that women will occasionally have to let men alone to do their thing represents the extent of her pro-male advocacy, she is truly at the baby-steps stage of reform.

I can already hear the voices raised in Harrington's defense: yes, these may be baby-steps, but they are steps in the right direction, and she should be applauded for her perspicacity and courage in making them. Very well. I applaud Harrington for her perspicacity and courage, and I look forward to reading her book. But I look forward with a sinking heart.

There was once a time when it was possible to talk about society's best interests and to include men—as well as children—in the equation. Now all discussion must focus on women's best interests. Men (and the women who love them) must content themselves with hoping that what is deemed in women's interests may also moderately benefit men, or at least may halt the societal machinery that has been for so long working to demonize and exclude them. I'm delighted to see women like Mary Harrington realizing that women's "liberation" has had unintended consequences for its alleged recipients. I'd be even happier if she could also consider men and boys in their own right, as vulnerable human beings with needs and interests that are just as legitimate as women's and just as deserving of care and concern. That would be truly revolutionary.

Single-Sex Spaces for Me, But Not for Thee

IMAGE: Woman enters male changeroom space

There has been a good deal of talk lately about women's spaces being invaded by biologically male persons identifying as women. Some women's campaigners claim that the trans phenomenon constitutes an attack on womanhood itself, an attempt to "erase" women and replace them with men who perform womanhood. Some even call it a new form of patriarchy.

But well before women had their single-sex spaces threatened, something similar had already happened to men. Beginning in the 1970s, men's spaces were usurped, their maleness was denigrated, and policies and laws forced changes in male behavior that turned many workplaces into feminized fiefdoms in which men held their jobs only so long as women allowed them to. The very idea of an exclusively male workspace or club—especially if it was a space for socializing (not so much if it was a sewer, oil field, or shop floor in which men did unpleasant, dangerous work)—came to be seen as dangerous. In light of the recent furor over single-sex spaces for women, it is useful to consider the source of some men's justifiable apathy and resentment.

At my new academic job in the late 1990s, a woman who had been the first female historian hired into her department used to tell a story she'd had passed on to her from a male colleague. After the decision had been made to hire her, one of the historians said to another somewhat dolefully, "I guess that's the end of our meetings in the urinal." The joke ruefully acknowledged, and good-naturedly accepted, the end of their all-male work environment.

Though this woman didn't have any trouble with her male colleagues, who welcomed her civilly, she told the story with an edge of contempt. Even thoroughly modern men, the story suggested, held a foolish nostalgia for pre-feminist days.

But was it foolish—or did the men recognize something real?

No one thought seriously, then, about the disappearance of men's single-sex spaces. The idea that men and boys need places where they can be with other men (defended, for example, in Jack Donovan's The Way of Men) would have been cause, amongst the women I knew, for scornful laughter. In 2018, anti-male assumptions had become so deeply entrenched that the female author of a Guardian article titled "Men-only clubs and menace: how the establishment maintains male power" simply could not believe that any decent man could legitimately seek out male-only company.

The story of women's appropriation of male space has almost always been presented as an unqualified good. Implicit in the story is the assumption that male spaces did not offer anything positive: on the contrary, they were alleged to be harmful by their nature to both women and men, though especially to women. If men's needs were mentioned, which they usually weren't, it was alleged that men would only benefit through contact with women's much-touted superior empathy, team-building, and communication skills.

An article from Sports History Weekly showcases the stark clarity of the standard narrative. In 2018, an article titled "Locker Rooms Open Up to Female Journalists" told of the victory achieved 40 years previously when, in 1978, "a federal judge ruled that women reporters could not be barred from interviewing [professional sports] players inside the locker room." The history of female reporters' entry into men's change rooms was framed as the triumph of women's professional dedication over male chauvinism. One of the first two journalists to interview hockey players in the post-game locker room (in 1975), is said to have asserted, admirably if a trifle insincerely, "I'm not the story, the game is the story."

Indeed, the picture chosen to accompany the story shows the reporter, Robin Herman, bent over her note pad, unselfconsciously focused on recording "the story." Close by her side, a man scantily clad in his briefs is just getting to his feet, but the reporter's attention does not waver. The message of the picture seemed undeniable: skilled female professionals posed no (sexual or other) threat to male players, so only an old prude or a sexist boor would deny women access.

Prudish was the image presented of Bowie Kuhn, Major League Baseball's Commissioner, who had tried unsuccessfully to stem the tide of progress. When he prevented individual baseball teams from allowing women to report inside players' dressing rooms, one of the reporters, Melissa Ludtke, took him to court and won. The article presents Kuhn's view as decidedly retrograde, telling readers that "At the heart [of the court case] was Ludtke's fundamental right to pursue her profession as a woman, which otherwise granted men an unfair advantage. Kuhn's argument was that his decision was necessary 'to protect the image of baseball as a family sport' and 'preserve traditional notions of decency and propriety.'"

By the late 1970s, "traditional notions of decency and propriety," under concerted attack for years, didn't count for much in a liberated world.

If any men were made uncomfortable by the presence of women in their change rooms, their concerns were not even entertained. No women's group or feminist advocate seems to have objected either. In the pre-trans 1970s, most women were unfazed by the prospect of being the lone woman amidst high-testosterone near-naked men, and feminist activists saw no disadvantage to women in minimizing the fact of sex difference.

The locker room triumph became a paradigm for the equality movement of the 1970s and '80s, as male bastions fell one by one. The idea that men might claim any space as their own came to seem, almost overnight, an ugly relic of bygone times, as states and cities in quick succession took steps to prohibit male-only businesses or clubs. The coup de grace came in 1987 when, in response to a lawsuit by the Rotary Club of California, the U.S. Supreme Court ruled that it was perfectly constitutional to ban sex-discrimination in business-oriented private clubs, making clear that women's interests outweighed men's.

Finding that the Rotary Club's evidence "fails to demonstrate that admitting women will affect in any significant way the existing members' ability to carry out [club] activities," the Supreme Court judgement went further to clarify that "Even if the [Unruh] Act does work some slight infringement of members' rights, that infringement is justified by the State's compelling interests in eliminating discrimination against women and in assuring them equal access to public accommodations. The latter interest extends to the acquisition of leadership skills and business contacts." By the late 1980s, "eliminating discrimination" had been broadened in law to mean equal access by women to anything positive men had made that women now wanted, including the networking opportunities and associations men had built over decades.

Shortly after the ruling, the New York Athletic Club, founded over a century earlier to offer athletic facilities as well as meeting places for men such as restaurants and lounges, was also forced to admit women.

As male-only spaces were being equalized, affirmative action and equity hiring initiatives saw women's numbers swelling in formerly male-majority domains such as newsrooms, courthouses, legislatures, boardrooms, government offices, and university classrooms. By the 1980s, female university students were already at par with (and soon to surpass) their male colleagues , while female lawyers, doctors, and business owners were flooding into once-majority male fields. The two decades demonstrated the relative ease with which women were establishing a dominant presence in a formerly man's world.

It had been male because men had built it. In North America, men had, within living communal memory, hewn civilization out of the wilderness, building roads, bridges, mills, farms, centers of trade, industries, sewer lines, and the electrical grid; establishing law, a police force, a judiciary, a military, markets, hospitals, food processing plants, and centers of learning. They had invented labor-saving technologies and had built highly complex city-systems. They had done it because that's what men do—not as an act of exclusion but because, as Roy Baumeister argues persuasively, "system-building and empire-building appeal to the male mind" (Is There Anything Good About Men? p. 155). Women had been laboring too, of course, bringing children into the world and managing household economies. Until the late nineteenth century and later—and only then in urban centers—it had hardly been possible for women to work alongside men in significant numbers.

It's not clear that men were under any moral obligation to admit women to the spaces they had made theirs—many men have never felt at home in feminine domestic spaces—and if men had wanted to, they could have resisted women's call for equal access; for the most part, however, men welcomed and supported women's professional and business advancement.

The women's movement, however, not content with measurable gains, was unable to rest until every vestige of the old order had been destroyed. Feminists' next step was to discover that workplaces were not always perfectly welcoming. Some women didn't like their bosses or the men they worked with; some felt uncomfortable with men's sense of humor or manners. With the help of policy-makers and legislators, feminists created an arsenal of rules designed to empower working women under the guise of protecting them from harassment and hostile environments.

But the legislation was always about more than that. The very style of work-life was forced to change under the new dispensation. In particular, every interaction between men and women, including even such minutia as eye contact, gestures, and compliments, was placed under the regulatory and oft-punitive regime of anti-harassment legislation, which Daphne Patai has chronicled as "the quixotic pursuit of a sanitized environment in which the beast of male sexuality [would] at long last be vanquished" (11). Any man who fell afoul of the (elastic and subjective) rules, or was merely claimed to have done so, could see his reputation and career destroyed.

Such policy and legislation changes—many of them undermining commitments to due process and the presumption of innocence—could never have been implemented were it not for the bedrock belief that male spaces were associated (as in "locker room talk") with sexual menace, the degradation of women, and men's corruption of one another. This belief is at least as old as the feminist movement itself, having galvanized such activists as radical suffragette Christabel Pankhurst, who called for "Votes for Women" and "Chastity for Men!" Women, of course—allegedly lacking power and the killer instinct—never needed to be monitored or restrained, never encouraged one another in bad behavior, and would never abuse the destructive license harassment legislation had given them.

It wasn't surprising that even the Boy Scouts of America, once the byword of decency, modesty, and rectitude, could not be allowed to stand. The most famous feminist organization in the United States, the National Organization for Women (NOW), pulled out all the feminist stops in a 2017 press release that charged the Boy Scouts with failing in its duty to American children and championed the demand for admission of 15-year-old Sydney Ireland: “I cannot change my gender to fit the Boy Scouts’ standards,” Ireland alleged, “but the Boy Scouts can change their standards to include me.” Lest there be any doubt about the seriousness of their attack, NOW called on the federal government “to prohibit any federal support for the Boy Scouts until the organization ends its discriminatory ban against girls.” Naturally, NOW did not lobby the Girl Scouts to let boys in, with the result that there are now two scouting associations in the country, one that boasts of equal access, and one that touts the special advantages to girls of a female-only space.

Interviewed about whether the Girl Scouts of America had changed in the wake of the opening of Boy Scouts, the CEO of the Girl Scouts expressed her conviction that “There are very few opportunities for girls to be in a single-gender space where they can rely on one another, build relationships with one another, be themselves, not have to compete for space, not have to show off in any kind of different way.” It is difficult to avoid incredulity that so few in our culture seem able to understand that single-sex spaces might be just as necessary for boys or even more necessary in a feminized culture that actively dislikes boys and seeks to make them subordinate to their female peers.

Many men, happy in the company of women and fortunate (at least for the time being) in their circumstances, have adjusted to the feminist new normal. For other men, however, the erosion of male space has left them uneasy and justifiably angry. Now, after years of forced accommodation to feminine norms and requirements, men are expected to rise up in defense of female spaces—allegedly against a renewed patriarchy. The gall of the women who demand this male support, regardless of the willingness of many men to give it, seems boundless.

Men’s Rights and Poverty

> Did you ever think what those sleepers are that underlie the railroad? Each one is a man, an Irishman, or a Yankee man. The rails are laid on them, and they are covered with sand, and the cars run smoothly over them.
> – Henry David Thoreau, Walden

Today’s culture of misandry could be considered the greatest complex of oppression and abuse seen in the modern age. Over three-billion men and boys are routinely exploited, overlooked and abused, with it all rationalized as necessary, as fair, or as simply not happening. This system of inequality is likely the largest (by head count) oppression of a single distinguishable demographic of the last century, if not of all history.

However, there exists another structured inequality that is even more far reaching: poverty. For centuries the greater masses have been exploited by the wealthy to further grow their riches and to wage war between houses, kingdoms and nations at the whim of the plutocrats. Make no mistake, the mass poverty we experience to this day is enforced with the sole intent of sustaining the status quo; it is no accident, but a requisite of the current system.

Together, these two cultural complexes, misandry and poverty, oppress and abuse the vast majority of humanity. Poverty consumes the working class, unemployed and homeless, and even the middle-class man is not spared mistreatment due to his gender. Alone, each seems a nearly insurmountable hurdle to overcome in the fight for an egalitarian society, and together they form the greater mass of the world’s injustice and abuse.

However, misandry and poverty are not truly separate and they do not need to be combated individually. Born from the evolution of ancient cultures, both are now tools of the world’s corrupt controllers, carefully considered and cultivated for the benefit of the powerful. Misandry and poverty support one another, feed on each other, and in reality the fight against one is the fight against both. Men are the fodder ground down and consumed by the modern economic system, but that is only possible as long as men do not fight back. Were so many men not trapped in poverty, such vitriol against their sex would not be tolerated. Without the repressions of a misandristic culture, men would not tolerate so many of their brothers being condemned to live with almost nothing.

The fight for Men’s Rights is the fight against wealth inequality. Out of the systems of misandry and male disposability sprout the weed of poverty, using the fear and low self-esteem of men to enrich the wealthy. Winning men their rights will be a blow against global poverty, not because men are more important or their financial well-being of greater impact, but because cutting away the injustices and abuses of men and boys will strike at the roots of the cultural complex that facilitates mass poverty. The oppressed men of the world are the fuel for exploitation and freeing them will help free us all.

One of the front lines of the fight for Men's Rights is Father's Rights, striving for reform in family law and changes to how society perceives and treats fathers. Modern family law was born from seemingly well-intentioned legal agitation in the mid-twentieth century, but it has come to contribute in profound and long-lasting ways to poverty. Not as a conspiracy, but as a cultural gestalt that drives people to compete for resources where collaboration would better serve everyone's interests. It is the Men's Rights Movement that will make for that collaboration.

The current landscape of family structure in the west continues to put the greater burden of financial earning on the husband/father. This imbalance discourages women from contributing fully to family economy and puts all the proverbial eggs in a single basket, leaving many families destitute in the event of the husband losing employment, as happened en masse during the Great Recession. Increasing men's work-life balance will encourage married couples to better balance their earning, insulating them against the ravages of a fickle economy.

However, things are far worse and far more complex when divorce enters the equation. Upon separation an even more rigid relationship of provider-dependent is enforced. Alimony does little to encourage female participation in the workforce and leaves men suffocating under crushing fiscal demands. This drains his own wealth, and keeps the woman from building hers, thereby contributing to the poverty of both and limiting upward mobility. Serial marriage-divorces compound the problem, creating a downward spiral of debt.

With children the problem becomes even more pronounced. Child support doubles down on the burden of alimony. Blatantly unbalanced custody orders leave mothers un- or underemployed and fathers financially and emotionally trapped under the heel of the family court and vulnerable to the whim of their ex-wife. All this weakens the family economy, draining parents' resources and dooming many children of divorce to a life in poverty.

Improving father's rights will balance parenting time, improving the quality of life for everyone involved. Separated fathers with meaningful relationships with their children are happier, healthier and contribute more to the economy of the children. Children with regular access to their fathers grow up healthier as well, and less likely to themselves become impoverished as adults. More balanced custody allows mothers to work and earn more, providing for their children and their own (now independent) retirement.

Greater father's rights will further boost the economic well-being of families by (a) reducing the number of needless divorces spurred on by the current system, and (b) stopping the extortive flow of money into the overfull coffers of family law attorneys. Father's Rights is a cornerstone of the fight for Men's Rights, and one that will help raise many broken families out of the clutches of poverty.

Deeper than abuse of fathers, however, and perhaps a core cause of it, is the larger cultural view of men as cattle. Cattle to be driven to work and strain until they die seven years younger. Cattle to be forced onto the front line of war, disaster and danger because it’s their “duty”. Cattle to suffer in silence and “take it like a man” so others can be given life-saving aid. All this has been trained and beaten into men for millennia until even men themselves don’t question their own martyr complex, their self-valuation based on utility.

This is why misandry thrives. Men are conditioned to not speak up and to internalize the hate they encounter everyday, and hate it is, even the so-called “noble” ideals of self-sacrificing manhood. To teach a boy that his life is less valuable than his sister’s is to teach him to hate himself. This also contributes to global poverty by teaching men to accept being an exploitable utility without wanting anything in return. Men have always been the backbone of the economy, whether as serfs or salarymen, doing the lion’s share of labor, paying the majority of income tax and putting in more hours at paid work. Where men go, the economy follows, except that the men themselves do not control the flow of wealth they produce. This allows the rich to feed off the working class, draining resources for their own self-serving desires.

Liberating men from their cultural shackles will free them to build wealth for themselves and those they choose to care about, not for the anointed few or whomever society decides to force upon them as dependents. Men should not be shamed and pressured into working themselves into early graves. Let every adult contribute equally and then share in what is earned, because we will all be wealthier for it.

The fear must also be stopped. Men are cowed into their role of utility by imposed, irrational fears leveled to control and exploit them. “Performance culture” drives men to disregard their own well-being for the sake of impressing others, fearing being rejected as sub-standard. The gynocentric structure of relationships burdens and drains men as little more than gift cards; spend and discard. Any man who dares speak out against the practice is shamed and punished, so wealth continues to be siphoned away to products and industries men don’t even care about, leaving them with little but their bread and pay-per-view circuses.

Men must strike out, not violently against their oppressors, but boldly onto a new trail. Men are half the population, and the greater bulk of the world’s production force. The economy is in their hands, if they will take hold and demand that, for once, it do something for them. Not out of selfishness or greed, but because the system as it stands exploits them and their families and only the men themselves can make it better.

Don’t waste money on shows of wealth; cars, suits, property and trophy girlfriends give only a false sense of worth. Your money will just feed into the pockets of corporations who don’t give a damn about you.

Stop letting others drain your hard earned wealth; pay your taxes, donate to your favorite charity, but don’t let anyone tell you how to spend your money. Every dollar is a piece of your life and it is yours. Don’t be an ATM for anyone else’s bad habits.

Refuse to participate in the scalping-fest of family court; no sane man should expose himself to the risk of divorce. It is little more than self-accepted human bondage.

Corporations can’t do a damn or earn a cent without you, so don’t settle for that cubicle job just because you’ve got alimony due and your new date likes expensive wine. Work should be fulfilling, not soul crushing, and if you cut off all the fiscal leeches you will have much greater options in jobs.

Men will never be given rights. Rights have to be demanded, taken, and defended. When men free themselves from their shackles, the industrial machine will have lost its sheepish workforce, and men will become the force working for their own good, the good of their brothers and of those they love. The gross injustices of male homelessness, unemployment and early death are all ignored by the leisure class because they facilitate our culture of unsustainable spending, but it is time to stop tolerating the abuse of our fathers and brothers and sons.

There is enough to go around if we don't let the select few hoard resources. It is shame and fear of rejection that keeps men working and dying for strangers, rather than finding their own definition of self-worth and working to enrich their lives, not someone else's bank account. Stand up and refuse to be anyone's utility; that is when the cycle of bloodstained consumerism will be stopped. Men carry the economy, but they don't have to be crushed by it.

Title IX and College Rape: A Series of Injustice

April 12, 2023 | by Jessica Denis | Link | Original Link

Title IX has been brought to the spotlight due to sexual assault survivors stepping up to tell their horror stories of not only rape but also a secondary rape of sorts. Many of these victims have to face their rapists every day due to the failing of universities and their complete inability to adjudicate these rape cases properly. How is it possible that this amount of life altering power has been handed to untrained university administrators?

The stories from college rape victims are absolutely heart-wrenching, and they are stories we all need to hear. However, there is another side to complaints that you may not have heard of. The other side is rarely spoken about because it implies that a woman may have lied about being raped.

According to some, just the mention of these cases causes victim shaming. The other side of facts can be a double-edged sword that could silence the next victim from coming forward to report the attack. The other side of facts and evidence will actually show you that sometimes the wrong person is accused, incidents can be filed without the knowledge of either party involved, sometimes complaints are filed out of vengeance, some are filed because “all drunk sex is rape,” and occasionally, a false report is made.

When any injustice occurs, a victim is created. This series will tell you stories you may not have heard about, or may not have known that these victims even existed. Please keep in mind, that is not the basis for this series. This series is intended to show readers how incredibly inept colleges and universities are when it comes to rape complaints on their campuses. Also, hopefully sharing these stories will bring enough light to the severity of the issue, that a change might be inspired.

Title IX and Rape. I am sure there are some people reading this who had no idea it was even an issue. I mean Title IX is supposed to ensure that sexual discrimination is prohibited in any federally funded education program or activity, right? Why is the word rape even associated with Title IV? In 2011, The Office for Civil Rights put into place a “Dear Colleague Letter“ which explains that discrimination includes the following, “Sexual harassment of students, which includes acts of sexual violence, is a form of sex discrimination prohibited by Title IX.” The letter also states:

> Police investigations may be useful for fact-gathering; but because the standards for criminal investigations are different, police investigations or reports are not determinative of whether sexual harassment or violence violates Title IX. Conduct may constitute unlawful sexual harassment under Title IX even if the police do not have sufficient evidence of a criminal violation. In addition, a criminal investigation into allegations of sexual violence does not relieve the school of its duty under Title IX to resolve complaints promptly and equitably. A school should notify a complainant of the right to file a criminal complaint, and should not dissuade a victim from doing so either during or after the school’s > internal Title IX investigation. For instance, if a complainant wants to file a police report, the school should not tell the complainant that it is working toward a solution and instruct, or ask, the complainant to wait to file the report. Schools should not wait for the conclusion of a criminal investigation or criminal proceeding to begin their own Title IX investigation and, if needed, must take immediate steps to protect the student in the educational setting.

What this says in short form is that non-campus police don't matter to the university. Non-campus police evidence or lack thereof is irrelevant to a college or university because the standard of proof of guilt is not "beyond a reasonable doubt" instead by a "preponderance of truth." The standard of proof is lower because they aren't finding individuals guilty or not guilty of rape with criminal consequences. Due Process is a thing of the past thanks to the "Dear Colleague" letter. The university has a lower standard of proof because what they are adjudicating isn't actually impeding on anyone's actual freedom. That is what we are told. Until you dig deeper.

Take for instance the Title IX case of John Doe v. Boston College. The incident is described and documented in a Complaint filed in Massachusetts District Court. The Title IX case came to fruition after Boston College students were on a casino boat event for the school in 2012. According to the complaint, security guards on the boat detained him until they got to the pier. At that time, state police arrested him on the spot and placed him in handcuffs with bags on hands to preserve any evidence. He was arrested and put in jail for the weekend, and later released on bail. He was charged with indecent assault and battery and pleaded not guilty. A female student on the boat accused him of walking by and lifting her skirt, and putting two fingers in her anus.

His parents hired an attorney and a private investigator. It was forensically proven through both surveillance and DNA, as well as a polygraph, that he was innocent. (It was allegedly another man who was walking directly in front of him). All charges criminally were dropped against John Doe and also erased from his record.

However, at the school level, he was immediately suspended and kicked off campus. According to the complaint, no real investigation was done. No one was allowed to testify on his behalf, the school would not take his statement, allow the private investigator or attorney to speak or introduce the evidence. He had been suspended from school pending the outcome at the same time his due process rights were stripped. He had no way to prove his innocence without the facts of the case being presented.

The school found him responsible for sexual misconduct. He appealed and was denied. He was suspended from school for TWO years. His official transcript stated "Suspended for Sexual Misconduct," he had no option but to wait out the imposed sanctions, as no other school would admit him with the branded record.

He went back to Boston College and graduated after serving his sanctions. At graduation, his father spoke with college officials, (also noted in the complaint) who stated they would do a re-examination of the case. That promise was not held up, and John Doe was branded a sexual predator, which every possible employer sees when they ask for his transcripts.

His life has forever been altered because of the inability of the college to follow through effectively or accurately. While technically he still has his “freedom,” his reputation and future employability are absolutely tarnished with a sexual misconduct brand; when according to actual evidence, he did nothing wrong.

Let me state again, I found 140 cases like the one above. The accused had his or her life ripped apart and destroyed by college administrators due to their mandate that has proven to be a complete sham. There are cases and cases of wrongful sexual misconduct brands on accused individuals that will follow them for life printed on their college transcripts, “Suspended for sexual misconduct” or “Expelled for Sexual Assault.”

One Title IX Complaint filed says that after the accuser admitted to filing a false incident report because she was “pissed off” when she realized that John Doe had rebuffed her, and because she thought John Doe was “just another douchey frat dude.” The school continued to prosecute John Doe. He was suspended for three terms for sexual misconduct and had to sue to the school under Title IX to attain any sort of fair resolve. His case was eventually settled out of court.

Lawsuit after lawsuit shows that women’s rape allegations are rarely actually investigated by colleges. Lawsuit after lawsuit also shows that when they are investigated, more harm is done than good. The harm of course first is to the victims. The majority of reporting statistics show that universities only pursue 1 in 12 cases of rape allegations. The victim’s cases that aren’t pursued are beyond appalling. However, that data isn’t readily available, because either the incidents aren’t reported to the university or the university drops the ball completely.

One experienced attorney stated to me, “Title IX needs to be repealed in its entirety because the Department of Education had twisted its reach far beyond its limited legislative intent. In the meantime, these due-process cases need to be pursued.”

This blog is part one in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication and clear lack thereof. These stories are very important to clarifying the extreme injustices happening on our college campuses. I hope you will continue to read the series.

We got your self-esteem here

April 13, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Let me tell you what I'd do if I liked money more than self-respect. I'd go to the local shoppers club and buy a hundred gross of small brown paper bags. Then I'd drive out-of-town to the nearest auction barn and pay them a fair price to let me go into the stalls and fill every bag with an even pound of cow crap.

Then I'd slap on some shiny pink labels with "Bag-O-Women's-Self-Esteem," printed on them in a distinctly womanish font, add a five, no, ten-dollar price sticker, and tie 'em closed with couple of nice frou frou ribbons. Next, I'd set up a kick back arrangement with Dr. Phil in exchange for an endorsement and take out an ad in Cosmo or Redbook.

Then I would head down to Belize and sit on the beach, throw back cocktails and check the bank account on my Droid 8 or 10 times a day. After about a week I'd buy the beach I was sitting on, and maybe that cute little senorita that was fetching my drinks. The word expatriate would start sounding pretty good.

And I'd be doing myself and you ladies a big favor. It would be perfect synergy. I like money, and you like buying bullshit.

You've been doing it for as long as I can remember. Fake self-esteem, like 98% of everything else that is marketed just to females, has become the psycho-porn of the western woman, with profits that would put a twinkle in Bill Gates eyes. How much profit exactly is anyone's guess.

What I do know is that the self-esteem racket comes in a lot of guises. I will deal with the two major ones here because that is all I have time for.

First, the plastic surgery route. With 8 year olds getting bikini waxes and high school juniors getting fitted for an instant C cup, it is a growing industry for the grrls. For the supposed grown ups it is a monster. Plastic surgeons know how much better you will feel about yourself if your tits draw some more stares and your lips look a little more blow job ready.

This is what they pass off as self-esteem, and they use it as an advertising come on in the same way beer companies use girls in bikinis. Since you are the consumer, it sells like cheap crack in a bad neighborhood. And so now you and your sisters are lined up like schoolgirls for tickets to see Pink, to get cut and stretched, injected and inflated, and to have your fat asses suctioned down to bubbles of perfection.

But, there is one ever so slight problem. Actually, it's a big one.

You see, vanity isn't self-esteem. Neither is narcissism. Not the real deal, anyway. If you think self-esteem and self obsession are the same thing, then go buy those plastic titties. They will match your character and personality just fine, and they might go a long way toward a career as a porn star or topless dancer if the scars don't show too much. After all, it's common knowledge that self esteem abounds for women who can squat down and pick up folded dollar bills off the floor with the crack of their ass while a room full of drunks howl at them.

Then you can attract more men and join the millions of other women that spend their time bitching about how those men won‘t look at them from the neck up. It’s a small price to pay for all that self-worth.

Tell you what -today only- two bags of cow crap for the price of one.

Now, if you are not on an elective surgery budget, you needn’t feel left out. There is a whole world of cheaper but equally fake assistance with your problem. It’s the Stuart Smalley route of the self-esteem simpleton. And it is for sale in the wacky world of mental health. The purveyors, usually women who don’t have any more self-esteem than you do, are scattered across the world-wide web, thicker than Henry Kissinger’s accent. For a mere hundred or so per hour, they will give you the stalwart advice to look in the mirror -each and every day- and say really affirming things like “I am unique. I am special. I am the only ‘me’ there is!” They will advise you to smile while saying it, but I dare you to simply keep a straight face.

They will tell you there are lots of reasons you don’t have self-esteem. The most common one being men that don’t see just how special you really are, or don’t tell you as much every 15 minutes. Those are the relationships where you lose your self-esteem. Yes, ladies, you can have it and then lose it, like there was a big hole in your pocket and it fell through and rolled under the sofa.

Actually, they will make it look a little more sinister. It’s like this: You get into a relationship and at first he is all roses and chocolates. After time though, he starts saying things that are not really bad, but just a little cutting, like “I’m going fishing with my friends,”

After some more time passes, it gets worse. When his fishing trips don’t stop simply because you tell him how important it is for him to give them up for you, what started as “I’m going fishing with my friends,” ends up being “Get off my back you insufferable fucking control freak.”

Self esteem into the drink, right then and there.

Seriously though, ladies, disinformation about your self-esteem aside, the self-help gurus aren’t any better at it than the cutters. And they miss the most important thing about self-esteem, just like you do.

The cold truth is that if you have self-esteem, nobody can take it from you. And if you can surrender it to someone, even an asshole that says he loves you, then you never had it to begin with.

That is partly because there is no such thing as self-esteem. It is just a made up word; a marketing tool to get to your purse, or through you, your man’s wallet. There is, however, self-respect. And self-respect, since it must be earned, is rarely sacrificed.

When you have it, respect from others is a given. But you can’t have respect from others or yourself if what you keep chasing is scripted adoration and unearned preeminence. And if you are the average woman in today’s world, you don’t have a damned clue as to the difference. It makes selling you bags of bullshit all the easier. In fact, as long as you insist on hanging on to the idea that your being special is a demand you can put on anyone else, or obtain by making an ass of yourself in a mirror, it makes selling you anything but bullshit impossible.

Unlike what any plastic surgeon or psychobabble spouting huckster will tell you, you have to get off your ass and earn the way people see and treat you, and the way you see and treat yourself.

You do this through the development of your character, not as a princess or little girl or the self designated center of someone else's universe, but as a grown human being with more focus on your responsibilities than your entitlements. Ante up like a big girl and see how quickly the world, and men, treat you like one.

And if you are taking shit, stop it.

If you don't stand up, and I mean immediately, to any mistreatment from any other human being, and put an end to it, then don't whine about being a door mat. You volunteered for it the second you laid down.

But the real trick here is for you to understand that people, particularly men, failing to meet unrealistic expectations isn't robbing you of anything. They aren't respecting you by catering to your childishness, they are just giving in to it, and, in the mother of all ironies, disrespecting themselves.

Now you can take this advice, which is totally free, and start applying it today. You can start growing up this very minute. Before you know it other people, men included, will be looking at you in a way you have likely never seen before. With genuine admiration. I know, it's a poor substitute for adulation, but in the real world it has to do.

Or, if you just can't wrap your mind around the idea that the onus is on you to get the job done; that self-respect is a by-product of maturity and humility, I have another form of self-esteem, right here, by the bag full.

Operators are standing by.

A Red Pill Message to a Blue Pill World

April 13, 2023 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

I don't expect you to understand all of what I do, and what I stand for, all in one sitting. There's too much to think about, and too many departures from what you've been taught all your life, for things to be that easy. As with nearly everything in life, there's much more to things than it seems on the surface. At this point, all I ask of you is that you keep an open mind, and try to understand things from my perspective.

I am what is called an MRA (Men's Rights Activist). You may have heard a few things about us already, and again, I ask that you hear me out before passing judgment. A lot of people think of us as basically the mirror image of Feminism, only for men. Some people like to say that we are simply a group bent on bringing back the 1950's. Others, that we hate women, and want to oppress them.

Of course, all of these are at best simplistic descriptions, if not outright lies.

Essentially an MRA is someone that is concerned with the state of men due to various laws and social customs. MRAs are trying to change some of those things because we see a lot of pain and injustice. We want a better future, and a saner society, for ourselves and our children.

That's not going to happen if we don't take a much more honest look at things.

For example, did you know that suicide is the second leading cause of death for young men? Teenage boys are 5 times more likely to kill themselves than teenage girls. You might be tempted to put this down to just being male, but in the 1940's, men and women were roughly equal in terms of suicides. The rate for men increased sharply in the early 1970's, and has increased steadily since then.

Then there is Education, where boys graduate much less often than girls. Only 40% of University students are male right now. And like suicide, the numbers are worsening as time goes by. Given the need for a degree to secure a good income, things aren't looking good for a large majority of men.

This brings us to employment, where men have a higher unemployment rate than women. And in the younger age groups, women without children make more than young men. Again, this trend is increasing with time, so in a few years men will on average make substantially less than women.

This topic gets discussed every once in a while… crying over the lack of 'good providers' for women. People are marrying later, in fewer numbers. And women-as-higher-earner couples split up far more often.

This leads us to divorce, which isn't really all that bad if you're female since women get primary residence 4 out of 5 times and benefit from continued financial support from the ex. So in a way, it's like he's still there. Generally, her life won't change much. She'll keep the house, the kids, and the paycheck.

The suicide rate for men after Divorce is 9 times that of women. It's pretty easy to see why. The more difficult thing to see is that in this age of targeted support for 'disadvantaged groups' or those most in need, men as a group are yet to be supported for anything. The "male demographic essentially does not exist. And because 'men' are killing themselves more than the 'designated victim group' known as "women," nothing gets done.

Moreover, no one cares if it does.

Like Education, and Employment, and Family Law, 'men' as a demographic can't specifically be helped, because 'men' are the designated scapegoat for nearly every social program and custom we currently hold dear in our society. Men, and boys, have been dehumanized to allow ruthless exploitation without guilt. How then, can we care about them as a group?

The answer: we don't.

At least the elite don't. And they hold the reins of power. They have the support of the masses too, right now. It's called tyranny of the majority, and it's exactly what things like Constitutions were invented to prevent. Our society has gotten around this by applying a thing called 'doublespeak', coined by George Orwell in his novel 1984, and known today as political correctness – and Voila!, the Constitution becomes "A Living Document," thereby allowing much tampering with.

In 1984, people were disappeared for having dangerous thoughts, and the 'thought police' did brisk business in the darkest hours of the night. In real life, people just get their careers destroyed, or get sent to jail for life on a false rape accusation. It happens with frightening regularity, but this isn't the place for facts and figures. I'm just making some assertions here, inviting you to look into this, and see if I'm full of it, and quietly betting that if you're honest you'll be awfully shocked at what you find.

So, with all this shocking injustice so rampant in our society, how come no one has said or done anything about it? If this is all such a big deal, why the deafening silence and hordes of people leaping into inaction?

Well, that's where you start to get into what I say is the 'masculist' aspect of the Men's Movement. I apologize for throwing in some more terms, but I'm going to do it a few more times.

Basically, the Men's Movement (hereafter MM) is a grouping of several trains of thought. MRAs concern themselves primarily with legal/political issues facing men. Masculists are the other half of the coin feminism is on, in that they study the social forces boys and men face.

Masculists contend our society has been conditioned to view 'men' as 'the enemy'. Everything from Domestic Violence awareness campaigns to Anti-Poverty activism has a distinctly female face. Anti-rape activists have been painting all men as rapists, and teaching women and girls to fear and hate men, for decades. Canada has known DV is equally perpetrated by men and women since the 1970's, but has yet to produce a campaign that says as much. Even Advertising has a distinctly anti-male flavor. Probably because mainstream media like the TV networks have largely given up on men, and tailor nearly all of their shows to a female audience.

Added all together, men have been on the receiving end of what amounts to a massive propaganda hate campaign for the better part of half a century, building upon (and distorting) the natural male inclination to protect the female. Up against that, I think it's amazing we aren't in much worse shape than we are.

That said, if we don't smarten the fuck up real fast, we're in for a world of hurt.

The question still hangs over the whole thing though. How the Hell did we allow things to get this bad? How did it become so acceptable to treat men and boys like disposable robots that exist only to please women, and produce and pay taxes? Who said men have no humanity?

Feminists, that's who.

At the core of all feminism is this insane assertion that women were disadvantaged in the past, oppressed even, by all men everywhere – and on purpose. The idea is that if only women were given free reign they would have matched the great accomplishments of the men of History; that The Patriarchy held women down; that all women are victims; that all men are oppressors, indeed that men derived sexual pleasure from hurting women.

This mode of thinking pervades every single form of feminism, and this mode of thinking is nothing less than the codification of misandry. It is the Official Version, and all the reason one needs to commence with injustices. The only difference between flavors of feminism is the degree to which they hate, and blame, men.

Moreover, the greatest obstacle in the way of needed change is feminist ideology, followed closely by its Siamese Twin – Chivalry. Both modes of thinking require the believer to see themselves as superior to the man in question. Feminists are, at heart, nearly all female supremacists – especially given the reputation of feminism. Chivalrists hope the women they 'protect' notice how well they can provide, and how they can beat down their competition.

Basically, female feminists tend to view themselves as victims deserving of special rights based strictly on their sex (as reparations for someone else's 'suffering'), and Chivalrists view themselves as "real" or "good" men, and thus better mating choices.

Speaking of mating, there's another subgroup in the Manosphere (see there I go dropping more terms – basically the Manosphere can be referred to as 'male social consciousness' as expressed online) known as PUAs (or Pick Up Artists) that center their social analysis around the dating and mating Game.

Remember that wage gap I referred to earlier? I'm sure more than a few of you indignantly thought "I've dated men that make less than me before. Hell, some of my best boyfriends were broke." And I don't doubt for a second that this is true.

Those were the guys that had what is referred to in PUA circles as 'Game'. And all that means, is the guy understands women, what turns them on, and makes them keep wanting more. And as every woman reading this knows, what women say they want, and what they really want, are frequently miles apart.

PUAs teach men what fathers used to teach their sons in many respects, providing men with the tools they need to navigate todays dating world at least somewhat successfully.

The problem is, it's far too easy to lose your job, or even freedom, if the wrong woman crosses your path. Crystal Gayle Magnum accused some Duke University students a while back, and it made the news for over a year. But it happens all the time to men and boys with less money, or notoriety. Only those guys end up being quietly thrown into jail. Often for life.

And no one cares, since all men are really rapists at heart as far as the public is concerned. The legal system is so anti-male that it is now legal precedent that hiring a hitman to kill your husband, or killing him even when other options are available, is defensible with a claim of DV.

The dead guy doesn't get a chance to defend himself, and the killer walks.

And the Chivalrists (otherwise known as White Knights) openly congratulate themselves for making the world safe for female murderers.

This has caused a lot of men to throw up their hands in disgust, vowing to withdraw as far from society as possible. They call themselves Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW), and another way to describe their ethos is they have 'gone John Galt'. They limit their interactions with women to only that which is necessary, refusing to socialize with or befriend women in some cases, simply never putting themselves in a position where they need to trust a woman, or be vulnerable to one.

At the heart of this movement is the desire to limit the risks of interaction as much as possible. While each individual woman encountered might not be the falsely accusin' kind, she might be…and who wants to take that kind of chance?

Many of these men have taken a long hard look at women, sex, relationships, and the whole expected progression (date, marry, have children, retire, die) and found it to be of far higher cost than it's worth. They have said 'no thanks,' and taken up video gaming.

Frankly, when it's so bad that men will ignore women out of self-preservation, you've got impending disaster on your hands.

As to why we do nothing about it? Well, all I can say is this wouldn't be the first time the cultural elite said 'let them eat cake'.

But why would the elite want this? Who came up with the idea for all this stuff, and what was their goal? Was this all accidental?

Well, no actually. There's this thing called Eugenics, which is a philosophy following the Darwinian principle of 'survival of the fittest'. Actually, Darwin was a Eugenicist himself…which really isn't all that surprising. So was Adolf Hitler, and Margaret Sanger, the founder of Planned Parenthood and feminist icon. Eugenic thinking runs throughout feminist dogma.

This should give you a hint as to why those with the power see no problem at all with running the average guy through the wringer. He only exists to give the elite pawns with which to to generate more power.

But what about Feminism? How did feminism become the vehicle for this destructive principle, and was it always so? The answer is yes, it was always so, since female supremacy and social 'deconstruction' is at the very heart of feminism. In point of fact, Feminist writers openly stated their plan to 'deconstruct' (Orwellian doublespeak for 'destroy') society in the 60's and 70's. They also openly advocated for Gendercide (some feminist musicians still do), the internment of men for purposes of slavery and breeding, and other means of 'smashing the Patriarchy' and installing women in the seats of power.

Think I'm exaggerating? Go back a bit and read the bits about the issues facing men and boys again.

Feminism has succeeded in breaking the institution of marriage, and atomizing the nuclear family, the very basis for society. The Marriage rates in much of what we call the Political West are currently setting records for the lowest in history. And even then, about half of them will end in Divorce.

With marriage and nuclear families becoming so rare (nearly half of all US children are born into single mother households, and in the UK they banned Father's Day from schools because so many kids hadn't ever seen one), Big Daddy Government is playing an increasingly important role in family life. And the birth rate is FAR below replacement levels…a Eugenicist's wet dream.

And the more power Government has, the more power the cultural elite has. It's really a no brainer; discord sown via feminism increases need for government, which is more than happy to oblige, for a pound of flesh. As a bonus, the economic chaos caused by such an unstable society allows real earnings to free fall, again, only for those not in the elite, who do as well as ever.

It's a lot to digest, I know. But look into it before you shout crackpot, you'll see these issues are real.

And the only thing standing up to all this right now, is a bunch of broke guys with an internet connection.

So can you do me a favor?

Wish us luck?

Something of a Life

April 14, 2023 | by John Elliot | Link | Original Link

It was 1955, and the sun shone on the houses that were our homes. I played outside and enjoyed the world of a five-year-old.

From a few doors away, a girl of thirteen started coming to our house, presumably out of a teenager's fascination with small children. I can't remember what we did, but one day I put my hand up her skirt from behind. She stiffened and then relaxed as the frisson of pleasure took over her body. After that we engaged in rudimentary sexual activity regularly, in the back garden, in a den that we had made.

I was too young to have proper intercourse. She was frustrated with my pathetic efforts and, accordingly, one day she calmly got up and went to the back door of our house. My mother came to the door and the girl complained that I had sexually interfered with her. In the background, I hopped up and down, thinking that now I was in big trouble. My mother didn't understand, or pretended not to, and the girl went off down the garden path, defeated. My mother took me into the house and told me not to do it again, wiping my hands with a wet rag. It was one of the few good things she did for me.

That day I learned something I became conscious of in later life:

- Fearful girls, damaged women, and feminists lie brazenly about sexual matters
- They believe that sex is something bad that males do to females
- They believe that they are absolved from all complicity in such matters. It doesn't matter that they took part willingly. It was the male's fault.

Much later, when Feminism came along, I understood instinctively what motivated them.

The years passed, and I suffered from child abuse. I was frequently beaten by my father. I was terrorised every day. I spent the whole of my childhood in fear. My mother displayed the typical damaged female characteristic of passivity. When I tried to talk to her about it she just defended my father. Such women frequently defend abusive men. Males suffer more violence than females, mainly from other men of the nasty variety. This is enshrined in the figures obtained from the Home Office. Girls suffer nowhere near as much physical violence as boys. The wrong kind of father loves to beat his boys.

I remember, above all, pleading with my parents to stop terrorising me. It was making me ill. "Listen to him." My parents would say. "He is terrorising us and would have it that we are terrorising him!" The more I begged them to desist the more oppressive they got.

When I grew up I was exhausted. I couldn't do my schoolwork, and couldn't work at a job. I just wanted a big rest in life. When you suffer child abuse, you don't grow up to become Rudolph Valentino. Your ability to make friends and have girlfriends is all but destroyed. And so I was given a bad time by a percentage of women who didn't want to hear that I was not feeling well. They wanted me to sweep them off their feet. They couldn't have behaved more nastily towards me.

What's more, my attempts at seeking recompense and delivering my father and mother to justice came too late. They only give you three years between being abused and bringing a case against the perpetrators. Those three years, and many more further down the line, are likely to be spent in confusion, in the belief that this is what life is like anyway, that abuse is normal. The abused person doesn't have the wherewithal to understand how much they've been exploited until much later in life. So it was that my parents completely escaped the sanction of the law and my hardship was nowhere acknowledged, no compensation paid and I ended up living in dreadful poverty. (Moreover, many years later during the Labour Government of Tony Blair, legal aid for cases of physical and emotional violence against children was silently brought to an end, without a word of objection from the Media, while it was kept for cases of sexual abuse.)

In 1972 I was in Oxford. Not at college but just living in the usual, single person's accommodation which was enough to make you sob. The loneliness was unbearable and the students of the Far Left were accommodating. I fell in with them and used to go round their houses. I didn't take part in their political activities but just went round for the sake of someone to talk to. It was there that they plotted the kind of society that we are today labouring under. The Feminists, Marxists, Anarchists and Progressives in general were all talking garbage. They didn't have a single jot of personal experience in life, the likes of which I had had, and were grabbing onto ideologies in order to give their life some purpose, direction and meaning. They didn't seem to get it from their studies either. It was my first meeting with Feminism and I disliked it thoroughly. Since when had women had a more difficult life than the one I'd had!?

One day I tried talking to these ideologues about what life is really like. They became so incensed that one of their leaders, a young anarchist man who used to go round dressed in a fireman's coat, grabbed me behind both arms (a favourite trick of a certain type of "activist," beware) and threw me out of the house. Not to worry, they had fulfilled their part in my life. I had kept my head above water knowing them. They had provided me with a year and a bit of contact with people. As for them, I learned to know their type intimately. Now, the TV bleats out the ideas I listened to back then in an unremitting way and the whole of society is repeating their rhetoric.

You will notice, of course, that while back then these groups were calling for "Free Speech" and to "Make Love Not War," they now censor speech everywhere, especially in the media and are very much more interested in making war on groups who are opposed to them. This is the way of every change or revolution in society. First they are the 'opressed,' then they become the oppressors.

> "The most radical revolutionary will become a conservative on the day after the revolution" – Hannah Arendt.
> "The anti-fascist of today will be the fascist of the future." – Unknown.

But more than that, every group that comes into power, whether oppressed or not, will become violent towards every other group that does not agree with it, even to the point of exterminating them. This has been evident in many societies, such as Germany, Cuba,

Rwanda etc. … Too many feminists of today are secretly longing for a time when men will be liquidated together with non-progressives.

The years passed, and I was getting nowhere with anything. I approached Social Services telling them that I lacked self-esteem as a result of the abuse in my childhood, and could they help me with it, so that I could have some sort of social life? They took me on and gave me 'social skills' therapy in order to help me with my low self-confidence. The idea is that if you learn the right way of approaching women, you will gain self assurance. It didn't do me any good. I already knew social skills. I was just too shy to put them into effect. The child abuse of my youth had had a definitive effect.

One of the social workers said, "I'm a feminist and a very angry one!" At that point I should have picked up on this warning and fled from there, but I stayed because I needed help. One day, at one of the sessions, I had had enough. I told them that I was sick and tired at the way their feminism kept interfering with my therapy on an ongoing basis. I told them I wanted it to stop. For my pains they immediately terminated my sessions.

A few months later I received a letter from the Psychological Forensic Service. Psychiatric hospitals have forensic psychology departments which help people who have broken the law. I hadn't broken the law, however, and was referred maliciously to the service by the feminists. This is the kind of thing that has been happening to men in silence. This example is a subsection of the false sexual allegation by women of men such as in false allegations of rape. I was falsely accused of being anti-women. Following receipt of this letter I suffered from headaches for a whole year. I thought, this couldn't be happening to me.

Abuse of men by feminists occurs in the Health System and not just in the family and criminal courts. Men are in fear of talking about these kind of matters openly for fear of being seen as guilty of the allegations made against them.

The feminists had referred me, behind my back, saying that I was anti-women. I saw the letter they sent. Eventually, I went to the meeting at the Forensic Service and explained the situation to the psychologist. Luckily he understood, and said I wasn't in need of therapy. I was relieved of that weight. I left.

I then went to County Hall to look at my Social Worker records. They had written, on one page, that at the "next" session I'd "wanted a woman to f..k." I couldn't believe what I read. This had never happened. Nothing I'd ever said could have been construed in this way. I was devastated and felt a sexual feeling rise in my groin at what they had done to me. I felt shame, as if this was some sort of rape impulse or some other perversity, rather than a pretty normal reaction to someone who has just shamed your sexual identity.

The thing is if you have something really horrendous done to you, which is a lie and is designed to get you into the worst trouble, you will likely have a reaction such as a sexual feeling arising in your body. It happens because you realise that someone or some people have tried, most blatantly, to destroy you, and this triggers a fear and shame reaction especially if it's tied to sex. This attests to an area of suffering by men which is not allowed to be talked about. This is probably the kind of thing that happens to men when they are sentenced to death.

I left and went to a solicitor. The solicitor wrote to County Hall. Their reply came back, and they didn't admit anything. The oppression was total. I was screwed. Down through the years this caused me great anguish.

But I knew what was in feminists' minds for certain.

More time passed and I was living alone and broken in unpleasant accommodation. I suffered from anxiety and depression and was medicated for it. Life was a terrible struggle. Thatcher came and went, and then a huge liberal onslaught started. The media were attacking men, day in day out, year in year out. Television is a staple diet of the lonely, and I had to put up with these insults every time I switched the thing on.

I started writing letters to people in power. I wrote to the television companies, to their complaints agencies, to my member of Parliament, to the Equality and Human Rights Commission, to the Home Office, to the heads of the political parties and many, many others which I can't remember. The result was always the same. They would quash my complaints. I never, ever, received a reasonable reply. I came to the conclusion that I had tried talking with these people and they weren't prepared to talk. I was dealing with people who didn't believe in freedom of speech. They didn't believe in letting men have a right of reply on the media. They were either indoctrinated or they were pandering to the population and their votes. They were the fascist left. They were the oppressive State. Now, even the right is feminised.

All that I did, and all that I went through, I went through by myself with no-one to rely on for help. There was no-one to turn to. All the anxiety that I underwent was done on my own. All the nightmares that I have every night. So many years, so much pain. Now, I'm in my twilight years, friendless, and having achieved nothing in life. I haven't had a career or family. The biggest sadness in my life is that I never had children. Let this article attest to the kind of horrendous life men can have such that they owe nothing to Feminists and their stories of woe.

Finally, I would like to finish off this article with the conclusions that I have come to as a result of the above formative experiences. I have come to the understanding that the problems of this life are caused by the following two sections of society:

The males who are violent and beat up other men on the street. They beat up their male offspring. As children, they beat up other male children in school. They rape and beat up women. These control the streets. A similar kind, who use intellectual oppression rather than physical, are frequently found in power and are responsible for the state of affairs by which five per cent of the population own ninety five per cent of the wealth. They send other men to war. They give power to Feminists. These males are psychopaths.

The second group is that of psychopathic women. These associate with the violent men of the street and with the men who run society. They keep normal men subdued by making false allegations of rape against them. They protect male abusers. They seek to establish a core of powerful and unpleasant Feminists at the top of society to accompany the core of powerful and unpleasant men that is already there. They want to be equally represented in Government and Media. They have a pathological hatred of normal sexuality.

We currently live under a system of terror maintained by psychopathic men and psychopathic women. Rich men opress the poor. Feminists persecute men. Throughout history this kind of terror has raised its head regularly. Power must, at all costs, be taken from these two subsections of society. Their psychopathy must be described and measures taken to incarcerate their strain of being.

An open media must be established in which freedom of speech is entrenched so that psychopaths can never again take over society as they have done at the time of writing.

Shameful anti-male bigotry in the study of honor-based killings

April 15, 2023 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Study of honor-based killings and abuse is replicating the shameful anti-men bigotry prevalent in discussions of domestic violence and rape.

Honor killings make for sensational stories of sex and violence. Those stories are powerful weapons for demonizing men, promoting brutal suspension of civilized due process of law, and expanding the number of persons forceful held behind bars. That treatment of honor killings completely fails to provide an inspiring, alternate model of honor, decency, and humane tolerance.

A recent, book-length study of honor killings in Germany provides a rare window into the extent of anti-men bigotry in the treatment of honor killings. The study explained:

> We define honour killings as intentionally committed or attempted homicides that are carried out predominantly by males against females in the context of patriarchal families or societies in order to restore, from the perspective of the perpetrator, their family's or personal honour. [1]

The term "patriarchal families or societies" covers almost all circumstances under the dominant, hateful social construction of patriarchy. To ensure a sexist definition of honor killing, the scholars defined "honour killing in the strict sense":

> An honour killing in the strict sense is the killing of a girl or young woman by their blood relatives to restore collective family honour.

Under that definition, men cannot die in an honor killing. Alexander Hamilton's death in his duel with Aaron Burr thus wasn't an honor killing. The whole sordid history of men dueling is conceptually effaced with this definition of honor killing. The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) standard definition of rape from 1927 to 2012 was "the carnal knowledge of a female, forcibly and against her will." The FBI explained that, under its definition, rape "included only forcible male penile penetration of a female vagina." This sexist and hetero-sexist definition of rape obscured the reality that rape of men is about as prevalent as rape of women. Study of honor killings is perpetrating similar ignorance.

The German study's definition of "honour killing in the strict sense" helped to obscure a remarkable finding. With extensive research, the study found 78 honor killing in Germany from 1996 to 2005. Of the persons killed, 43% were male.[2] Male victims of honor killings are nearly invisible in public discussion of honor killings. These dead men are not victims of "honour killing in the strict sense." In the U.S., about four times more men than women suffer violent deaths. That gender disparity gets almost no attention. In contrast, elites make the ludicrous claim that "violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world." Men's lives count remarkably little relative to women's lives in countries strongly affirming ideals of gender equality. That's shameful.

While criminal justice systems construct men as the perpetrators of honor killings, that's not socially realistic. A recent study of cases of honor-based abuse in Britain found:

> there was overwhelming evidence of abhorrent behaviours by mothers towards children in inflicting violence, condoning violence, deceiving and denigrating daughters, ostracising them from kin, bartering to sell them, wishing them "dead," threatening to kill them or throw them downstairs. [3]

In ten cases of honor-based abuse associated with pregnancy outside of marriage, direct violence by a mother seeking to induce her daughter to have an abortion was observed in two cases.[4] Honor-based killings are associated with family concerns. Historically, men have been predominately assigned the role of killing others. Women incite men to kill others and support the killing.

Criminal justice systems predominately assign men criminal responsibility for honor killings. Just as police engage in gender profiling men for arrest for domestic violence, police stereotype men as the perpetrators of honor-based killings and abuse:

> Despite police incident reports directly implicating mothers in violence (solely or with others), uniformed officers did not place mothers as perpetrators on police computer systems (PPI) or within formalised crime reports in 12% of cases. Instead fathers were often logged as perpetrators and/or arrested, sometimes based on little to no evidence. In one case despite only the mother being implicated in the violence by throwing shoes and chairs at the victim, surprisingly only the father is named as key perpetrator in the crime report. [5]

One of the starkest gender inequalities is the vastly disproportionate imprisonment of men relative to women. That anti-men gender disparity arises from sex discrimination against men from the definition of crimes and the assignment of responsibility to anti-men gender disparities in sentencing to incarceration. Study and persecution of honor-based killings shows shameful criminal justice sexism in action.

Within the full scope of violent death, "honour killing in the strict sense" is a relatively infrequent occurrences in countries historically associated with western European culture. In Germany from 1996 to 2005, about 8 honor killings occurred per year. For comparison, about 700 homicides occur annually in Germany. The number of honor killings per year in the U.S. isn't known, but it is surely only a small fraction of total homicides.[6] Honor killings have their greatest social significance in raising publicly the meaning of honor. Study and prosecution of honor killings and honor-based abused have shameful failed to uphold a humane, civilized, and enlightened understanding of honor.[7]

Mothers also used household objects to assault daughters with, such as a hoover pipe, the metal frame of a bed; mothers threw "chairs and shoes" or slapped children on the head with slippers. In one case a 14-year-old child was tied to a chair and systematically assaulted, having her hair cut off by both mother and grandmother because she went missing from home and was found in the park.

> Honor crimes are brutal acts of violence against women, committed by male relatives who seek to avenge their family's honor when the male perceives that the female engaged in a dishonorable act.

Id. p. 294, repeated at p. 297. With no sense of irony, Shapiro declares, "courts must comprehend the full meaning and context of honor killings." With another sensational, stereotyped story, she concludes, "this flawed perception of honor has once again caused society an immense and incomprehensible loss." Id. pp. 314-5. Such shamefully bigoted scholarship helps produce an immense loss in civilized, enlightened society. Underscoring the extent of the problem, the American Bar Association's Commission on Domestic Violence awarded Shapiro's article first prize in the 2009 Annual Law Student Writing Competition on Domestic Violence and the Law. Gender disparity in criminal court

April 16, 2023 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

A study by Sonja Starr, an assistant law professor at the University of Michigan found that within the United States' justice system, women generally receive much more lenient treatment over the same crimes.

> This study finds dramatic unexplained gender gaps in federal criminal cases. Conditional on arrest offense, criminal history, and other pre-charge observables, men receive 63% longer sentences on average than women do. Women are also significantly likelier to avoid charges and convictions, and twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted. There are large unexplained gaps across the sentence distribution, and across a wide variety of specifications, subsamples, and estimation strategies. The data cannot disentangle all possible causes of these gaps, but they do suggest that certain factors (such as childcare and offense roles) are partial but not complete explanations, even combined.

Other research has confirmed Starr's findings. Jill K Donner stated in her report, Explaining the Gender Gap in Sentencing Outcomes: An Investigation of Differential Treatment in U.S. Federal Courts

> Overall, the findings of the current study are consistent with those of past research on gender and sentencing in dictating that female defendants are sentenced to less severe sentence outcomes than similarly situated male defendants, even after controlling for legal, extralegal, and contextual factors. In addition, the current study found that gender weighed differently across offense type, type of sentencing departure, and racial/ethnic category. Also, extralegal factors were found to influence defendants differently when the sample was partitioned into individual gender groups.

In the course of investigating explanations previously offered to justify the disparity, Starr found that even combined, the factors described couldn't account for the majority of the difference. She noted that the most prevalent arguments weren't solid, and even treating them as such, each only accounted for small percentages of cases, and each had exclusions.

She looked at criminal reports, including the use of specific criminal codes and officer descriptions. Her research showed that unobserved differences in severity, while not completely ruled out, aren't supported by evidence as a major cause for the disparity.

She found that criminal history, attitude, and cooperativeness couldn't explain the gap, citing a 2004 study which found that "other factors equal, reported crimes with female offenders are substantially less likely to lead to arrests, results that they interpret to show police leniency toward women."

Challenges to culpability on the basis that women were charged as accessories to male crimes also couldn't explain away a significant portion of the gap, and Starr noted that the "girlfriend argument" explains nothing about single-perpetrator crimes.

Looking into the argument of family hardship, she found evidence of gender-discrimination that favors women, and harms men.

> In short, the family status-gender interaction appears to be more substantial than the one formal legal mechanism for accommodating family hardship can explain. Prosecutors and/or judges seem to use their discretion to accommodate family circumstances in sub rosa ways—but not for male defendants. Among single men, conditional on observables, having children significantly increases sentences, and among married men, children make no significant difference.

She also looked at arguments citing life circumstances such as addiction, mental illness, or abusive environments.

> Together, all such cited bases for departures explain only between 1 and 2% of the otherwise-unexplained gap in sentence length; they are too rare too explain more. If prosecutors or judges take such factors into account in informal ways (as they seem to with family hardship, above), it would be unobservable.

If factors related to crimes and their perpetrators are not the main causes of the gender gap in sentencing, why does it exist? One clue to this is in Starr's explanation for differences between her study, and studies which showed a narrower gap. She wrote in her report that previous studies may not have shown such a sharp difference because they had not looked at the role of plea bargains and other pre-sentencing steps in the criminal justice system. The difference this makes is in the role of prosecutorial influence.

> The United States in effect has a system of negotiated justice, and prosecutors hold most of the chips. They have broad discretion to choose charges from numerous overlapping criminal statutes, and then to determine the terms of plea deals. Plea-bargaining does not necessarily focus mainly on dropping of charges—indeed, the lead charge was dropped only 17% of the time in this study's sample. The parties also often negotiate stipulations to key "sentencing facts"—for instance, the quantity of drugs trafficked or the defendant's major or minor role in a conspiracy. The prosecutor also may make non-binding sentencing recommendations or request special leniency to reward cooperators.

She also points out that prosecutors' gender bias can stem from the importance of public relations.

> Prosecutors have a variety of incentives to balance, including career > incentives that push toward maximizing sentences and resource constraints that discourage going to trial (see, for example, Baker and Mezzetti 2001; Easterbrook 1983). In addition, prosecutors may be affected by sympathy or a sense of fairness. Schulhofer and Nagel (1997) review federal prosecutors' case files and find evidence of deliberate charge manipulation to avoid excessive sentences. Prosecutorial discretion is often described as the power not to seek to maximize punishment—to be selectively lenient (see Stith 2008). Although there may be good policy reasons for allowing such discretion, it is a potential source of unwarranted disparity if it is influenced by legally irrelevant factors such as gender.

To put it simply, putting a woman on trial can be a public relations nightmare for a prosecutor, who is faced with a defendant who may damsel for both jury and public sympathy, painting herself as a victim of prosecutorial bullying. Not only can prosecuting a vulnerable seeming woman backfire by leading to acquittal due to sympathy, it can also come back to haunt the prosecutor during an election.

Why would only prosecuting female criminals create bad PR and not male criminals? Doesn't the public want to be protected regardless of with whom the criminal activity originates?

That depends on which public you're asking.

The National Organization for Women has actively promoted some of the myths surrounding gender disparity in sentencing, as shown in in this summer 2001 blog post about population increases in women's prisons. The article mixes description of real issues (prison rape) with claims that women commit crimes only as accessories to male criminals, and uses an anecdotal description to suggest that female criminal behavior is a result of abuse by a man. The article goes on to lament that incarceration separates mothers from their children, a concern NOW hasn't shown for imprisoned fathers in their advocacy for increases in prosecution of men unable to keep up with child support obligations, and against shared custody proposals made by fathers' rights groups. Feminist logic: female drug dealers are good and valuable parents, but fathers are disposable… except for their wallets.

Guidelines handed down in the UK in 2010 admonished judges to go easier on female offenders. In 2011 a UK Women's Justice Task Force report offered the suggestion that women's prisons in the UK be replaced with community service and mental health treatment. While the research done by the group making the suggestion is of interest, there is nothing in it to suggest that it is applicable only to women… yet the suggestion has not been extended to apply to male offenders.

In contrast, feminist activism in the U.S. led to the enactment of the Violence Against Women act, a law written to address a gender-neutral problem as if women were the only victims, and men the only perpetrators. VAWA contains federal financial incentives for policies to promote mandatory arrest, prosecution, conviction, sentencing, and sentence enforcement. The same group that thinks punitive imprisonment for female offenders is unfair and cruel has no problem with a law that incentivize false accusations against men, and places them at risk for wrongful conviction and false imprisonment.

Feminists claim that an anti-discrimination clause added in 2012 makes the law gender-neutral despite its overwhelming prevalence of female-specific language for victims, and male-specific language for perpetrators. However, from 1994 through 2012, the wording and the law's enforcement followed a male-perpetrator, female victim model that led to greatly increased arrests and incarceration of men without demonstrably affecting the prevalence of partner violence in the United States. In addition, the theory that the non-discrimination clause applies to enforcement and not just services has yet to be demonstrated.

If, as feminists argue, harsh, long sentences for men are right because the point of the penal system is to protect the public by deterring would-be criminals and containing those who are not deterred, what does the gender disparity say about female criminals and their victims?

Are experiences of crime victims less important if their perpetrators are women?

Does society think women less possessed of the self-control necessary to keep their behavior within the bounds of the law? Isn't women having less culpability an indication of less capability?

If that's what it means, but it isn't right, why aren't feminists actively lobbying for reform? Where is the letter-writing campaign demanding more lenient handling of male criminals, or more harsh handling of female criminals? Where is the massive, heavily attended perp-walk to protest unequal treatment by law enforcement, prosecutors, judges, and juries?

Given that feminist advocates have argued for lenient treatment for female convicts, it's unlikely that they'll also advocate that all convicts should be treated equally if it means women would face the same heavy sentences as men.

If, as feminists argue, harsh, long sentences for women are wrong because they're cruel punishment that is undeserved and doesn't achieve rehabilitation, what does this gender disparity say about the way we treat male criminals?

Are they less valuable than women… so much that society can accept treating them like trash when women who do the same things are considered redeemable?

Is it that men are considered so much smarter, more reliable, and generally better than women that society must hold them to a higher standard, and require greater retribution when they fall from it?

If criminal sentencing is a human rights issue when dealing with female convicts, why can't the same be recognized when the convicts are men?

Are some humans more human than others?

April 16, 2023 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I didn't want to do it. I enjoyed scouts only ever because I had friends in my troop. I did not enjoy swimming. I learned early in life, however, never to question authority. Therefore, when the presiding authorities over my early life sent me to a Boy Scout swim meet, I went. Reluctantly. Very.

Due to humanity's inability to do much of anything without categorizing ourselves, those responsible for this particular meet put us into groups according to how well we could swim. At the top, where the jock boys live and thrive, were The Sharks. (West Side Story, anyone?) I was a Minnow. How many 12-to-13-year-old young men like to be called "Minnows"? Do you know the exact number? I do. Zero.

I didn't want to grab the paddle, kick my legs to the other side of the fucking pool, and lose. I wanted to go home. I was totally unprepared for this. I stank. Then I sank.

Some dude with a mustache and lots of naturally developed, manly muscle, wearing a flannel shirt and jeans (I will never forget this.), jumped in and pulled me out. I wept. My friends in the troop (none of whom were Minnows) did their boyish best to tell me that it was okay. I had great friends. I had idiotic authority figures.

I didn't cry because I was scared. Well, that wasn't the main reason I was crying. I was crying because I felt stupid for being the poor fool who forced a grown man to get himself all wet. That nice man who saved my life never said a word to me. I felt totally inadequate in his presence. A boy unworthy of being one. That was the biggest reason to cry. I never told my friends that part. I never told anyone, in fact, until now.

I tell you now because this was not an isolated incident for me, nor am I the only one who has experienced such a disappointment. It has only gotten worse. Not for me; for the generations that have followed. Fewer men are teaching boys how to be boys, and it seems that even fewer men are interested in teaching young men how to enter in. I believe that much of this has to do with the boredom that empire naturally produces, but not all of it. The American Empire was built high over ignorance of manhood and the idea that men are disposable. Let me try a little sports analogy: To me, corporate sports are a hell-of-a-lot less interesting than truly manmade sports.

Let's look at one unique and perhaps embarrassing way in which men are stifled in their relationships with boys. An article at TampaBay.com from 2007 about what ought to have been a simple exchange between trusting strangers reveals a poisonous societal belief that, while humorously discussed, degenerates these crucial relationships in a very serious way.

Roy Peter Clark, the author, had the opportunity to help a small boy with his zipper when they were both in the men's room. The tale has a happy ending, and Clark makes a funny situation that much funnier with the manner in which he writes about it:

"The stall door swings open, and out comes a boy – maybe 8 years old – all dressed up in his Sunday suit: white shirt and tie, dark blue slacks and jacket, a right proper little lad. But he has a problem. For this young man has clearly outgrown this outfit, so that his pants barely contain his lower frame. 'Mister, I can't pull up my zipper. Can you help me?'

"I'm in a Catholic church, in the middle of the greatest sexual scandal in the history of Catholicism, in the men's room, with a boy who wants me to help him with his zipper.

"What would you do?"

At some point, Clark has to go so far as to enlist the "aid" of an unwitting old man who enters the bathroom during the dilemma, by shouting loud enough that at least one witness can hear:

"'Okay, here's what I'm going to do. I'm going to grab your belt and your zipper. Then I'm going to count to three, and you're going to pull in your stomach. Okay? One, two, three…'"

I can just see the kid in my mind. When an adult does this, a boy's mind is far more likely to first misunderstand why the strange man has decided to talk so loudly, but the rest of his mind probably says, "He must know what he's doing. Just follow through. Boy, this is awful." What a heartfelt story. Just wonderful. Amusing, entertaining, poignant, and ultimately disturbing. (Read what some of the other men said they would do.)

I will not dispute Clark's words, his attitude, or the manner in which he dealt with this unfortunately tricky situation. There is, in my mind, nothing to dispute. My reaction would have been much the same. This article mentions one important aspect of the sex war in which we find ourselves enmeshed. Men, the owners of penises, are forbidden, in their own minds, based on what they perceive in the culture that surrounds them, from helping boys, the owners of lesser penises, with something as simple as the zipper that zips up in front of it. This is in spite of the fact that men, by and large, do not molest children. Clark admits, "What if someone comes in and I'm holding this kid's zipper? What if it's a priest? What if it's the kid's brother – or his beefy father? Am I willing to take a beating to help junior with his pants?" Can we all agree that such a question should never even enter a man's mind? How is it possible not to see the enormity of what is being said?

To give it some perspective, imagine being a black man, and being lectured by the culture at large that you have greater potential for being a violent criminal. This lecture goes on ad infinitum, ad nauseam. "We all know that black men have a greater propensity for theft and murder. Now this black guy might be nice, and yes, we shouldn't judge, but on the other hand…"

Making matters worse, most boys are curious about men, and you know what I mean. I am not now advocating nor will I ever advocate anything that could be deemed sexually prurient as a teaching tool with boys and pubescent men. I also do not think that other boys were nearly as curious as I was. In fact, at the time, I sensed a difference when I noticed other boys discussing how and when that sort of curiosity was healthily satisfied. Therefore, this is not an effort at arousing or provoking anybody who disagrees. The way

I see it, however, is that it is virtually a father's job to show his son, as Rose Nylund put it in of "The Golden Girls," what makes a bull a bull:

Rose: "That's how my mother taught me!"

Blanche: "Honey, didn't that give you a false impression about… what a man would look like?"

Rose: "It sure did! Can you imagine my surprise on my wedding night with Charlie? …Boy, that bull would've been jealous!"

Kidding aside, it is difficult to write about, because of what I know about manhood. The reader must understand that I feel almost as if I am discussing something that most men simply wish to think about and silently communicate when the time comes, if ever. You're hiking, you have to piss: teaching moment. You go for a swim, and no one has swim trunks: teaching moment. You go to the community gym and change in the locker room: teaching moment. Need I go on? I didn't think so. Talking is unnecessary in such a situation, and can easily get awkward. For most men, it is sufficient to silently do something together, and wait for the relating to follow.

I propose that men are far more likely to do rather than talk. Try going on a fishing trip sometime. There will be quite a lot of doing and very little talking. Men usually open up to one another after doing. I'll give you an example:

When I took a job at college during the summer months in a dishroom at a dorm, there were both men and women who had also started work there at the same time. On the first day, no one spoke. We were all strangers. By the end of the day, the women no longer were.

Women communicate largely through verbal means. Men only do this after the process of doing, for the most part. If they can't do, they talk about the doing. We were all certainly doing many things when we sent the dishes through the big, beautiful machine that some man built after figuring it out (probably while leaning forward on his knees, sitting back down after a piss break). But the men stayed quiet, week after week. The women, by the second day, were talking about all of their friends. They were friends instantly. We men didn't make friends. We did the dishes silently, alongside a gaggle of gabbing gals.

One weekend, the women went to a special conference "For Women Only." (There was no comparable conference for the men.) There were only guys in the dishroom, so it was dead quiet. We didn't even look at each other. (Well, not at the same time.) Suddenly there was a lull in lunch traffic, and we were all left standing and staring at the conveyor belt some man had devised.

One of the particularly bored men took a fork, laid it down face up, put a knife criss-cross over the bend in the fork's neck, put a spoon on the end closest to him, slammed down the other end of the knife with his manly hand, and sent the spoon flying into the dirty silverware tray. Huh-huh. That was cool.

Every man started grinning, including me. Ah, I thought, this is what men do; this is how we communicate. Now we're getting somewhere. He flipped another, then another piece of silverware into the tray. So did another guy. Then another. Huh-huh. Dude…

Not being good at sports in general, I just watched. Then I grabbed a bowl, took another bowl, and placed it upside down on top. A third bowl sat on top of that, and the fourth bowl, like the second, was upside down on top of that. I can't remember how many I did, but pretty soon, the fat guy, the skinny guy, the little dude, the regular Joe, the cute college prep, were all looking at my tower. Huh-huh. Then another guy started building. Then another. We were all grinning.

We never said much. I never knew a single man's name. They went off and graduated, I'm assuming, having intercourse, having kids, making some money, losing some, fighting with their women, crying, thinking about God, planning, succeeding, doing up their kids' zippers, failing in life, and some of them failing miserably. They're all about 35 or 40 now.

The point is these simple, unspoken rituals of manhood are slowly dying. Boys who grow into manhood with their curiosity about men unsatisfied, however intense or mild it may be, are deficient in their understanding of the world. Some of them are given badges, honors, and guns by the state. The lack from before is filled with something that has the potential to become that much more sinister. Simultaneously, present-day culture puts all men under suspicion.

Gone are the days of apprenticeships, where boys would learn how to perform tasks in a useful trade. You could depend on these boys learning how to read, count, and apply their physical bodies in the act of creation alongside a watchful man with a vested interest. Now they are lectured, usually by women, about how those days are long gone, and wasn't that an interesting, quaint way to live? Finally, when one of these boys needs to leave the feminized classroom so that he can unzip and pee, he has to ask permission. Since children seldom leave the classroom except for lunch or urination, everybody knows, since it isn't lunchtime, what little Fred has to do with his wiener. Lovely.

This same little Fred goes to church on Sunday and finds the dilemma with his zipper has grown worse. A simple, masculine exchange of a non-sexual nature, but which carries with it the unspoken enjoyment of a shared masculine sexual potential, with just a little pride, is laden with problems and emotional upset, all because boys and men can no longer relate, unless it's pre-approved, corporate-sponsored, thoroughly vetted, and after school.

Men who are brave enough to create little men are inundated with parenting books written by vetted "experts." I propose to you that men who know how to be men, who remember being boys with total honesty about the pain as well as the joy, don't need any stupid books. The affection remains bottled until they have found the safety required to express it.

I watched a family friend a few years back with his daughter, who couldn't have been a day over 12. She was a typical sapling: tall but gawky, too slender to be womanly, blonde, and obviously someone who would turn heads in about two more years. It was summer, so she was wearing shorts. I don't know what the problem was, or whether it was even a problem that sparked the whispering I was somehow privileged to hear, but since I was in the room, I watched and listened with rapt attention.

He stroked her thigh in a loving fashion that bordered on a romantic gesture. She sat perfectly still with her arm around his neck. I have no idea what they said, but everything that came out of his mouth was soft and intimate. He knew another grown man was in the room and watching. He didn't care. Neither did she. Good for them. That young lady is probably married now. I have no doubt that she desperately wants her husband (the lucky bum) to do much the same thing. I know for a fact that the father was not a boy alone when he grew up.

What would a hysterical soccer mom who didn't know those two think? Who gives a damn? By the look on the girl's face, he clearly isn't finished. Leave them alone. If you don't understand the vast chasm between incest and fatherly affection, this article isn't going to convince you. It will simply run right over you if it convinces any number of men reading it, so go back to your Women's Studies thing.

I had a thought while watching Walt Disney's final masterpiece, "Sleeping Beauty" the other day. The artwork, especially in the forest scenes, is incomparable. So is Tchaikovsky's soundtrack.

The story and dialogue, though, are forgettable and laughable. In the middle of the movie, we finally discover that the Three Good Fairies are almost entirely useless, as they have been raising the princess in the forest for 16 years, yet they still haven't figured out how to make a dress or bake a damn cake. Now, real women, in anticipation of a particularly auspicious birthday, would undoubtedly be able to handle it in spades.

However, I found myself thinking, "What would three blue-collar men – husky, heavy, and hairy (No, those are not their names.) – do if they encountered a foundling baby girl in the forest? What could she expect on her sixteenth birthday?" The answer is clear to me: She would probably have an entirely new set of bedroom furniture, a vanity complete with carved flowers and curly-cues, one hell-of-a massive cake, ribs broiled to perfection, every pastel color you can imagine hanging from the walls, and the knowledge that behind her, for the rest of her life, is a wall of muscular protection should she ever require it. No doubt they would have helped her countless times to put her tiny panties on when she was littler. If a misandrist interrupted one such tender and ordinary moment, I would suggest that whatever the accusation, the reply should start with two words: Shove off.

NOW claims credit for healing the sick, raising the dead, and inventing the cappuccino

NOW claims credit for healing the sick, raising the dead, and inventing the cappuccino.

This is the most dishonest thing I have ever read. As others have said, Joseph Goebbels would be proud.

LGBT rights are women's and men's rights

Feminist have been no friend to gay and transsexual men. Sorry, I watched them applaud as gay men were arrested here in Australia. Seriously, do you know nothing of the history of feminism?? Transmen and women have been vilified as gender traitors and psuedo-women. They were banned from meetings.

From The New Yorker, August 4, 2014:

Robin Morgan, the keynote speaker, said:
I will not call a male "she"; thirty-two years of suffering in this androcentric society, and of surviving, have earned me the title "woman"; one walk down the street by a male transvestite, five minutes of his being hassled (which he may enjoy), and then he dares, he dares to think he understands our pain? No, in our mothers' names and in our own, we must not call him sister.

When feminist groups changed the norms of sexual behavior

In some parallel universe? In this one, medical scientists working on the pill and hippies who had nothing to do with feminism were responsible. Meanwhile, feminists argue that women who have sex with men are gender traitors, and have done since the 1960s. c.f. "The Feminist Initiative" for an example, or anything by Dworkin et al.

Feminism has fought against sexual violence, including sexual violence against men.

Oh yes, Mary P. Koss fought very hard to make sure women who raped men could be prosecuted… what's that? She did the opposite? Deliberately? How shocking! And feminists fought for immunity to rape charges in Israel and India? No! How can it be? It's not like the Duluth Model defines violence as masculine!

Oh wait, it does. And NOW is it's biggest fan.

Feminism fought for an end to gendered segregation at work and in school… boys and girls have equal access to education.

Absolute nonsense; it's fought hard to deny men the ability to teach at schools on the grounds they are all secret paedophiles (all the while ignoring the torrent of female teachers diddling their pupils).

Men used to teach school everywhere. Feminists pushed them out and now male teachers are becoming as rare as hen's teeth.

And feminists constantly call for quotas for women and scholarships for women, and male education plummets. Fewer and fewer men can get a degree now.

Feminists want men to do jobs, of course – the dirty, dangerous jobs – but nothing else. You'll never see a quota for women working in sewage, up power lines, down mine pits or clearing mine fields.

Men are useful apes to them – nothing more.

VAWA protects male victims of domestic violence

Rubbish. It does the opposite. Primary Aggressor laws mean that a man who calls for help had better have a recording of the violence against him or he will be the one arrested.

In Australia, thanks to VAWA exporting it's model world wide, women have a helpline to call for help from DV – and men get a line to confess they have hurt a woman. You need help? Go to hell, male scum.

Feminists have long fought for economic justice for both women and men

Rubbish. The Feminist Initiative fights for special male-only taxes, Feminists fight for tax exemptions to female only goods, they fight for scholarships for women and claim men are overpaid by as much as 30 cents in the dollar – despite the repeated testimony from economists to the contrary.

They have no interest in justice. Justice is paying men more because they work harder, they work longer hours, they do more dangerous jobs that result in a death rate an order of magnitude higher in the workplace.

Feminists don't think that's just; they want women to be paid the same but have cushy, safe jobs?

How will that work? They don't seem interested in pushing women into those nasty jobs.

NOW, I know you love lies – but do you have to be this obvious? Why not paint MRAs as being responsible for school shootings, or claim economists are part of the global conspiracy against you? Stick to fear and hate; it's what you are best at.

Who Takes Your Sacrifice? (Part 1)

The ‘Value’ of Self-Devaluation

Author’s note: Before anything, I want to make it absolutely clear that this article is a criticism of the idea of sacrifice as postulated and celebrated in our society as a standard of living and expectation, especially upon men. It is not an admonishment of veterans who have suffered physical loss or have died, people who have elected to save other lives at the cost of their own, nor parents who do everything they can to keep their family alive and together. It is neither a disparagement of charity and love, nor is it a denigration of the disadvantaged, impoverished, and the sick. I realize how this subject, taken for granted in day to day dialogue, is an incredibly delicate one if confronted.

Self-Sacrifice: A Worldwide Lower Common Denominator

Sacrifice – many think it is one of the greatest acts a person can do…in theory especially if it’s of themselves by themselves. Or, if you’re like me, you think it’s something no human being of dignity should have to do, let alone celebrate.

Sacrifice is openly lauded by those who speak of the builders of civilization, soldiers who fight wars, those who give to their families, communities, and country, and in any context toil, die, put themselves in harm's way, and lose up to everything in the name of the "selfless act". It seems like to actually speak against celebrating those kind of things is a blasphemy of the highest order, especially to those who have or are close to those who have performed those acts.

No, I sincerely do not wish to be insensitive to those people, but neither do I intend to censor myself on what I think is a legitimate case against sacrifice as this standard held for people at large, and especially men. Look at the aforementioned examples again: those who laud those things are more specifically lauding the men who did it. Exceptions apply; there are of course women who do these sort of things as well as sacrifices perhaps more specific to women (say, risking their own life in the process of childbirth). However, there appears to be a general understanding that men are at expected to serve any permutation of those functions voluntarily or not; else, they aren't regarded in esteem at all.

If you concur with that last assessment then think about that fact – that they are expected in this capacity. Lauding is different from expectation; lauding is high appraisal of something considered elective, while expectation assumes a standard as a bare minimum. Are the advocates of male sacrifice praising men for that, or do they condemn men who do not sacrifice themselves?

Let's go a bit further and entertain the idea that it is, in fact, lauding they are doing. What for? The fact that these men give to the beneficiaries of these sacrifices, or the fact that they undergo losses?

If you think that's an unfair way of looking at these lovers of others' sacrifices, consider this: would there be as much lauding of an act of giving by an individual that did not have to sacrifice, or worse one in which he gained something for himself in this act of giving? On and on do the complaints go against people who do things for a profit, that is, when there's something in it for them. Those that do things for gain are maligned in favor of those that act out of charity, "the common good", and "unselfish motives".

It's safe to say that most don't think twice about these things and consider them a conventional morality and way of conduct. Selflessness and self-sacrifice are so steeped in the common sensibilities that they become synonymous with giving, compassion, love, and the greater good. It couldn't be an exaggeration that the self is regarded as evil at all times, considering how selflessness (the lack of self) and self-sacrifice (the abnegation of the self) are considered the good at all times.

It has even gotten to the point that even when people advocate for things like "self-care", they make it a point, almost kneejerk, to distance it from "selfishness". "Yes, by all means care for yourself," they would say; "but don't do it selfishly! You still have to put others above yourself." Imagine actually advocating for self-care in which the self is not even a proper end to the this act.

In a world where self-sacrifice is normally advocated and practically an active part of almost any given culture at least ideologically, there are going to be a lot of confusions about sacrifice that need to be exposed. What likewise needs exposing are the kind of people that wish it upon another.

From progressive radicals wishing masculinity (if not males altogether) to be sacrificed so as to be rid of it, to traditional conservatives that demand that men become sacrificial beings in service of society (often a code word for "women") and at the same time profess to be thankful to those dead or broken men, this mindset permeates the public consciousness. Men are put on the spot for the gynocentric altar of sacrifice – from the symbolic in men's day to day actions sacrificing their souls at the behest of women, to the literal…in which males from their infancy on the religious or clinical cutting board to their prime years as targets for killing in battlefields at home and abroad.

The case against sacrifice is not limited to that of men, far from it, but men's sacrifice is normalized to the point that too many traditionists, antifeminists, and even some Men's Rights Activists still appeal on the basis of men's disposability. One wonders who they are trying to please with such an argument – feminists? This is why not only I will hereby make the case against sacrifice, but I will appeal to men's unsacrificed individual spirit with no apologies.

Where does the man who does not wish to sacrifice his spirit turn to, when every culture and mindset on the planet share this lower common denominator of the sacrificial creature as the ideal man?

The Survival of the Sacrifice Ideology

When it comes to preachers of sacrifice, be it in the world of religion, spirituality, politics, activism, and in the academics, the proper question to ask is not for who are its ardent advocates, but for who isn't. Ayn Rand seemed to stand alone in her time in her advocacy against self-sacrifice during her time with her message eloquently depicted in her works, notably The Fountainhead and Atlas Shrugged.

I will define "sacrifice" in my own words in Part 2 of this essay series, but Rand's definition is absolutely worth mentioning. From "The Ethics of Emergencies" in The Virtue of Selfishness: "'Sacrifice' is the surrender of a greater value for the sake of a lesser one or of a nonvalue." From "Galt's Speech" in Atlas Shrugged: "If you exchange a penny for a dollar, it is not a sacrifice; if you exchange a dollar for a penny, it is. If you achieve the career you wanted, after years of struggle, it is not a sacrifice; if you then renounce it for the sake of a rival, it is."

Self-sacrifice and altruism still see wide appraisal with every excuse thrown to bolster it from the left and the right of the political spectrum and from religions and secularists alike advocating for either worship of an exterior force (God or the State) at the expense of the self, to asceticism and denial of experiencing both world and body. Self is defined as its own indulgence, and indulgence is defined as its own over-indulgence. Self-abnegation (often framed as "killing one's own ego") is seen as the good, or the path to enlightenment. Giving is seen as a virtue in itself, and giving is not even properly considered giving if the giver received something substantial in return, or received something in any way on his own terms.

Having taken these things into consideration, I think that those who preach self-sacrifice and yet deny that they are against the self are cognitively dissonant, if not downright lying. They simply cannot get away with “But we’re not anti-self!” after every attempt they’ve made to denigrate the idea of the self while assuming the role of “the others” and “society”.

Then came Jordan Peterson into the spotlight just as politically correct idiocy infiltrated mainstream society more and more from the academic cesspool. The time was right for him to speak out against the lunacy of postmodern thought and reality-denial as well as the media attacks on masculinity and men losing a sense of direction. Peterson brought a lot of much needed sanity and conversation that drew the deserving attention and devotion of many.

There was much value to derive from the myriad of ideas Peterson brought to the zeitgeist, as it were, of intellectual discussion. However I must admit to profound disagreements with his postulates. In particular, a key disagreement I have is his open advocacy of sacrifice in most situations, especially involving men’s role in society.

Peterson stressed the notion that man must choose his sacrifice. The context as I have understood it is that Peterson says man is always faced with a crossroads during his life in which he must make a sacrifice in that given time; the upside, however, is that he gets to pick his sacrifice. We can derive from this that the man would make the sacrifice that is of overall least detriment to him, but he makes it nonetheless, and if he doesn’t make sacrifices then he will go in a bad way.

This has given yet a new context for sacrifice in the world of philosophic discourse, especially for younger men desperate for guidance (or a savior?), and has only bolstered it. Although I have seen no worthwhile evidence that sacrifice has been fading as a moral norm even after all this time, this practical revitalization of the idea of sacrifice serves as more fuel to the fire in making self-sacrifice that much more fashionable – for men to commit it, and for women to uphold it as a standard for the ideal man.

I stand by in my disagreement towards the idea that sacrifice is a crucial requisite to masculinity or an individual’s development in general. To the idea that we get to pick our “damn” sacrifice (Peterson seems to enjoy tacking “damn” into that phrase perhaps to make it sound cool), I offer a response in the form of some questions: must everything in life, if any, really be a sacrifice, and who is collecting said sacrifices (and for what reason)?

If you think I’m exaggerating about whether sacrifice is actually regarded as a requisite, you need only look at those that profess to praise masculinity strictly on the grounds that men have provided, sacrificed and died. If a man has not sacrificed (lost something of himself), or worse, has profited, then he is not given the same praise. Instead, he tends to be maligned.

A word of warning to those that think sacrifice is a proper method to progress through life: if you have to make a sacrifice every time you come to an important decision, then sacrifice will soon become the only way you can respond. Note the Petersonian implication that the more you supposedly sacrifice, the more you supposedly benefit.

What's more, you could run out of yourself to sacrifice, and before that you could end up sacrificing others, perhaps those close to you. A philosophy centered on self-sacrifice sees no qualms with expecting the same sacrifice of others. One cannot think of a single state or tyrannical force that didn't rely on man as a sacrificial animal to fulfill its malicious exploits.

A mindset defaulting to the worship of sacrifice ultimately amounts to the worship of everything that had once been a man's but is now lost, and when his very self is sacrificed then he is seen as a hero. It becomes clear that it isn't about the fact that he gave what he did, benefited what he did, or protected what he did. If he was able to do it without any loss to himself, then this at best won't be a newsworthy story. The fact that he fulfilled true selfish interest and self-investment to his act is never considered, often even by the man himself, and is generally regarded as impossible, as if compassion cannot come from true self-interest. Only through disregard of the self is compassion, charity, reliability, concern, love, and service seen to be operable.

It is the same thing as feminists consistently do, that is, to see man's normal nature as brutal and evil. Horseshoe Theory rings true again – both feminists and tradcons see men's nature as one of depravity, both meeting at the ends to advocate for male altruism and self-sacrifice, albeit for different motives. One side wishes to eliminate men and/or masculinity on this basis; the other uses it to be apologists for feminists as thus: "But men aren't like that! Look at how they die and mutilate themselves to build society for us! Isn't it wonderful? Must we not be grateful?"

The more normalized sacrifice is, the more prettied up and acceptable it is. From a distance, a sacrifice looks as noble as if it is second nature. When a man endures a sacrifice with the mind that it is all for the better and for the greater good, they become indignant when that sacrificial attitude comes into question from fear that what he put himself through was truly all for naught. It is understandably a terrifying idea that one doesn't want to face. I draw a parallel from those adult men who had been circumcised as infants that become indignant and defensive in the face of those that speak the truth that they were cruelly mutilated at their parents' authorization. They fear greatly the fact that they have been victimized as infants, or the fact that their parents not only allowed but fully intended to have his genitalia cut in this way.

Just as they try to justify it by continuing the cycle as they arrange for their own sons' circumcisions (often as "sacrificing one's son to God"; looking at you, Ben Shapiro…you too, Jordan), those that have sacrificed in other ways seem to want the cycle to continue, all in the name of social norms, the common good, culture, tradition, selflessness, and whatever other justification they can scrounge for. To add to that, we praise male sacrifice so much in any given context that one wonders why so many men commit suicide!

Jordan Peterson is a type of individualist thinker that well understands the perils of collectivism. I'm still thankful that such a voice has found the publicity it did. It is precisely that which makes me even more disappointed with his enthusiasm towards the idea of sacrifice. In my opinion, the individual and sacrifice are incompatible, and I don't think that advocating for sacrifice is ultimately the best way to advocate for men's identity and direction, in the capacity that he actually does.

In Peterson's 2017 lecture for his book Maps of Meaning he goes as far as to say "You don't get to not make (a sacrifice). You're sacrificial whether you want to be or not". If you aren't one of the many undergoing the conceited high from aspiring to self-sacrifice as a means to maturity, you'd actually see this message for what it is: damning. Childhood is dismissed as mere potentiality to be sacrificed in order to attain adulthood, ignoring the fact that an adult without a healthy puer to serve as his essential core is only a life of drudgery beholden to society…usually women that Peterson always assumes wants to "grow up" in contrast to presumably childish idiot men who have "failed to launch".

It appears to me that society's confusion when it comes to the idea of sacrifice is has become exacerbated with this new context, and I must disagree as respectfully as I can with Peterson here and try to make it clear what I've discovered to be the actual nature of sacrifice. It's time to expose the truth about your "damn" sacrifice.

The number of victims on campus continues to rise as not much is actually done about it. There is a pool of knowledge around the topic of Title IX and campus rape, but no one is really providing any actions. Victims of sexual assault are courageously speaking up; the Vice President has provided verbal support for one particular rape victim, yet no one is moving closer to action. No one is even discussing reforming the power to prosecute or not prosecute given to college administrators. The consequences are sexual predators remaining on college campuses, and lives of those who haven't done anything wrong absolutely destroyed.

Please keep in mind, this series is not to showcase "his word against hers," this series is not about rape victims, nor is it about other people who pay the price when colleges fail. This series is intended to bring light to a different fact base. Colleges are ruining the futures of young adults through their mandated responsibility, but a total lack of ability to adjudicate campus sexual assault cases.

In Part One of this series, I told you about a case from Boston College. A young man's life was ripped apart, even after being proven 100% without a doubt innocent, because campuses simply do not have the capability to do what the "Dear Colleague Letter" mandates them to do. Part two of this series takes us to a case atThe University of Kentucky.

From Court Documents:

> "Student A was never the complainant in the administrative proceeding with the University. In fact, after the incident in question, Mr. Doe and Student A continued to socialize, and she subsequently invited him to spend another night with her. Weeks later, an unidentified third party unilaterally reported the matter, and the University began to investigate."

Let that sink in.

Weeks later, someone anonymously filed a sexual assault complaint. Student A never considered what happened to be sexual misconduct. John Doe never considered the events to be sexual misconduct. They both admitted to drinking and they both engaged in sexual intercourse. Someone else decided that all drunken sex is rape, therefore it must be reported. The school decided regardless of what the two college students thought, and regardless of them both engaging in the same activities, John Doe needed to be punished.

John Doe was immediately suspended from campus pending the conclusion of this case. He lost his scholarship, and all pre-paid tuition, and his college transcripts are branded with the black mark of "Suspended for Sexual Misconduct" which will likely disallow him from enrolling in another school.

TWO YEARS of litigation. The University has conducted hearings, and John Doe has appealed. It was taken to federal court, and the University of Kentucky attempted to schedule another hearing on the matter. John Doe's attorneys filed legal action to stop them from having additional hearings. Student A filed her own Title IX complaint with the OCR against the University for the way it mishandled this case. This case still has not concluded; neither party has resolve, and no one can move forward completely.

Two lives ruined directly, families hurt, friendships burdened because someone else decided Student A was raped. At that moment, the person filing the complaint changed other people's life courses to serve their agendas and beliefs over those of the two individuals involved.

In a case against University of California San Diego, Jane Roe accused John Doe of sexual misconduct. In this case, she admitted that she did not object in any way to the sexual contact, and continued a sexual relationship with John Doe later in the same evening. A San Diego County Superior Court Judge found that the University conducted a hearing that violated the due process rights of John Doe. With those violations, the university missed vital evidence of Mr. Doe's innocence. It was determined that "that substantial evidence does not support the finding of non-consensual sexual activity," as well as "What the evidence does show is Ms. Roe's personal regret for engaging in sexual activity beyond her boundaries."

> "The Court finds the university abused its discretion in increasing sanctions after appeal without explanation. Petitioner's initial sanctions were the following: "(1) suspension for one quarter, (2) permanent no contact order, due to the potential for ongoing harm to the complaining witness, (3) a two hour sex offense/sexual harassment training with OPHD, and (4) counseling assessment with CAPS. When Petitioner appealed the decision of the Panel, Dean increased Petitioner's suspension time to one year, which would cause Petitioner to reapply to the University to be readmitted, placed Petitioner on non-academic probation, required Petitioner to attend ethics workshops, all in addition to the original sanctions given. Nowhere in Dean Mallory's email to Petitioner does she indicate the reasoning behind the increased sanctions. Petitioner then appealed to the Council of Provosts, who affirmed the decision made by Dean Mallory and the Panel. The Council of Provosts also increased Petitioner's suspension time to one year and a quarter, allowing Petitioner to return to the University in the Spring of 2016. The Council of Provosts also did not provide any reasoning behind the increased sanctions. Given the lack of rationale by both Dean Mallory and the Council of Provosts for the increased sanctions, it appears the increased sanctions are punitive towards Petitioner for appealing the decision of the Panel."

Further, the Court Ordered:

> "The Court finds that the hearing was unfair and that evidence did not support the findings. The Court GRANTS the Petition for Writ of Mandamus and orders > Respondent to set aside its findings and sanctions issued against petitioner."

I asked attorney Michael J. Cox what changes we could begin to make for this situation to get better. His response was, "Nothing in the case law prohibits the (public) schools from granting full due-process rights to the accused, including particularly the right to cross-examination, but as I have observed in a brief, the colleges simply decide they are better off stiffing the accused than facing the potential wrath of the Office of Civil Rights by not finding the "correct" way." He also suggested if Kentucky State Universities were to apply KRS Chapter 13B(Kentucky's Administrators Procedures Law) with regards to the rules for administrate hearings, he believes due-process would remain intact.

I have heard numbers of 150 to well over 300 cases like these. Once the accused has been formally disciplined, yet prior to a hearing, the schools have a vested interested in finding that person "guilty" or as most put it "responsible" for the accused crime. The universities are mandated to take immediate steps to ensure the safety of the reporting individual. According to my own research, I've found the vast majority put the accused on immediate suspension pending the investigation and hearing. It is at that point that all hell breaks loose. These are not trained investigators. These are not judges or attorneys, and most schools limit attorney involvement to just simply being present. They are not allowed to have meaningful representation. At a minimum, suspension causes loss of tuition, missing classes, and branded with being a sexual predator; all before anything is investigated by anyone with true authority.

It is time to make a change. It is time to put all students on the same level. That is what Title IX is all about. It is time to start establishing a fair and impartial way to discern between rape victims and regret or drunken activities. The pendulum went from one far side to the other extreme far side, and now is the time to bring it back to center.

This blog is part two in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication and clear lack thereof. These stories are very important to clarifying the extreme injustices happening on our college campuses. I hope you will continue to read the series.

If you have a story to add or input you would like included, please feel free to contact me.

Ape study shows anxiety and depression are inherited

April 19, 2023 | by Paul Hamaker | Link | Original Link

The expression of symptoms and the underlying chemical causes of anxiety and depression are inherited. Dr. Ned Kalin, chair of psychiatry at the University of Wisconsin at Madison School of Medicine and Public Health and colleagues were the first to prove that anxiety and depression are inherited. The study was reported in the July 6, 2015 edition of the journal Proceedings of the National Academy of Sciences.

The researchers observed the behavior of 600 young rhesus monkeys from family groups that had a history of anxiety. Over 35 percent of the animals displayed excessive anxiety when confronted with a perceived threat. All of the behavior that represented anxiety could be related to family members that demonstrated the same behavior.

The researchers examined the brains of all the monkeys with functional magnetic resonance imaging and positron emission tomography. The anxiety behavior was found to be related to different regions of the brain located in the brain stem. The brain stem is considered the most primitive part of the brain. The amygdala, the limbic brain fear center; and the prefrontal cortex showed the highest levels of activity associated with anxiety.

The researchers note that the development of anxiety may have an evolutionary advantage for monkeys and humans in producing a higher state of awareness of threats.

The study was the first to definitely prove that anxiety and depression are inherited. The function of the brain structures associated with anxiety and depression were the key to problems with excessive anxiety and depression and not the size of the region of the brain. This discovery may lead to the genetic cause of excessive anxiety and depression in humans.

Patriarchy Defense League Alert: Rogue member issuing unauthorized edicts!

---

Attention all Patriarchs! This is a Red Alert! Token Division Agent 14-9-775-18, code name Alzael, has gone rogue. Repeat, Alzael has gone rogue, apparently attempting a coup by promoting himself without authorization to Overlord status, and openly revealing seemingly unobjectionable instructions to inferior females, but is blatantly revealing specific document numbers and the existence of secret departments such as B.I.M.B.O. As is well known, the first rule of B.I.M.B.O. is that you never talk about B.I.M.B.O. and you certainly do not reveal the contents of top secret training materials by their identification code or even that such training materials exist.

Below is the proof of his treason to the Penis World Order:

Do not be fooled by his seemingly disarming demeanor. He is clearly engaging in Unauthorized Patriarchal Activities, revealing classified documents, and threatening the stability of all that Men of Good Faith hold dear. He is also obviously armed with a butterknife, likely Model #ZQ13, code-named “NutellaNuke.”

Do not approach under any circumstances. Agent Orange has been dispatched to terminate this threat. However, all Patriarchs are authorized to observe the rogue menace from a safe distance.

It should not have to be said, but no females are authorized to view this material.

Shouldn’t everything be free? For women, I mean?

April 22, 2023 | by Jane Anderson | Link | Original Link

The other day, I saw references to an article asking for free tampons. I figured this was a parody, a Swiftian piece intended to illustrate the absurdity of demands that insurers provide contraception at no out-of-pocket cost for reasons of “fairness” by making other “fairness” demands, so I didn’t pay much attention to it.

But apparently it’s not.

Here’s the Slate piece that made it clear that this is serious, and here’s the original article in The Guardian by Jessica Valenti.

The key paragraphs:

> In the United States, access to tampons and pads for low-income women is a real problem, too: food stamps don’t cover feminine hygiene products, so some women resort to selling their food stamps in order to pay for “luxuries” like tampons. Women in prison often don’t have access to sanitary products at all, and the high cost of a product that half the population needs multiple times a day, every month for approximately 30 years, is simply, well, bullshit.

> Women in the UK are fighting to axe the 5% tax on tampons (it used to be taxed at 17.5%!), which are considered “luxuries” while men’s razors, for some baffling reason, are not. And in the US, though breast pumps, vasectomies and artificial teeth are sales tax-exempt and tax-deductible medical care, tampons are not even exempted from sales tax in some states (including California and New York, two of the most populous states).

> But this is less an issue of costliness than it is of principle: menstrual care is health care, and should be treated as such. But much in the same way insurance coverage or subsidies for birth control are mocked or met with outrage, the idea of women even getting small tax breaks for menstrual products provokes incredulousness because some people lack an incredible amount of empathy … and because it has something to do with vaginas. Affordable access to sanitary products is rarely talked about outside of NGOs – and when it is, it’s with shame or derision.

Now, I’m not going to address the reasoning behind the UK tax treatment (does that mean that razors are not taxed? that is admittedly odd), and I certainly can’t address the cost of tampons in the UK—I suppose there could be some strange price support on wood products that artificially increases tampon cost there, but that seems unlikely. But on the whole, tampons just aren’t that expensive.

But “menstrual care is health care” and, hence, should be free?

Of course the poor have trouble paying for their basic needs. That’s what it means to be poor. And there are all kinds of items that fall into the category of “basic needs” that aren’t covered by food stamps: TP. Soap. Toothpaste. Sunscreen. Over-the-counter medications. Or, more big-ticket items: clothing, housing, transit expenses. Or, per the news out of Detroit, water bills.

A philosophy that says, “The government should pay for every basic need, for everyone” (via vouchers designated for the purpose? free product?) simply makes no sense. That’s not the government’s job—unless you want to go back to advocating for the “basic income” idea, I suppose—though our welfare system and the mix of in-kind and cash benefits the American government provides the poor certainly could stand to be rationalized.

Yes, of course, the situation in developing countries is potentially a serious one, with girls leaving school in Africa due to the lack of sanitary products. But Valenti doesn’t stay there—she moves to the travails of middle-class women.

Do tampons have a special status because only women use them? Doesn’t this just seem inherently foolish, to insist on sex-specific free stuff? How far do you go? Should women get free bras? Couldn’t men get into this game, too? Men are, on average, larger, and need more calories, for instance.

But it’s ironic that the illustration I had always thought of as the counter-example to demonstrate that women don’t need free contraception for fairness’ sake is being used in precisely the opposite way.

Do they even know what “equality” and “fairness” mean?

The myth of the “strong, independent woman”

April 22, 2023 | by John Ribner | Link | Original Link

“Men can’t handle a strong, independent woman like me!”

How many times have you heard that one from the perpetually single women out there? It’s bandied about quite a bit these days, especially when ladies over 40 are complaining about the dating scene and their collective inability to be successful in it. To wit, here’s a comment pulled from the blogoshere on a post discussing love after 40:

> I hear all the time about people trying to help women who are 40+ find a partner, in fact I was talking about this just last night to one. Through this conversation I found out: Women feel like they have to find someone because everyone keeps mentioning it. They tend to put up with partners that aren’t a good match, just to prove a point that they’re trying. Men in this age range tend to prefer younger women, which annoys and discourages the 40+ year old women. Correct me if I’m wrong, but men are usually wanting to support, protect and care for women, and this is harder for them to envision with a strong, busy, independent woman.

I’ll spare the unfortunate blogger’s name because she isn’t the only one who believes this tripe. Much of society—men and women—willingly buy into the myth that the “strong, independent woman” (SIW) is somehow the unfortunate victim of a dating world that devalues these catches. Sadly, it’s this kind of enabling that allows these repugnant, combative women to once again project their problems onto men. (The dark legacy of feminism rears its ugly head again!) It’s high time this SIW mythology was deconstructed and exposed for what it really is. And who better to do it than a man who’s dated his fair share of SIWs.

First, let’s look at the term itself. Proponents of this self-ascribed moniker use it to describe a woman who is not going to be any man’s doormat. An SIW, according to them, is loud and proud, and she freely speaks her mind whenever the dreaded sin of patriarchy and/or male privilege rears its ugly head. In other words, these women enjoy being combative with men and they seek out every opportunity to argue, berate, and belittle men. What’s worse, they truly believe that this obstinate behavior is a “right” and “duty” of all women, and anyone who doesn’t agree with it or understand it is just a controlling, patriarchal knuckle-dragger who is living in the Dark Ages. SIWs are on a crusade to show dominance over the male gender, and they take no prisoners and grant no quarter. In other words, the term strong, independent woman is simply a code phrase for a stubborn, entitled, selfish, and uncompromising bitch.

Take a certain SIW from my past. Long story short, my former beloved decided to take a male co-worker with her to her grandfather’s birthday party, only informing me of this after returning from said party. When I expressed my discomfort with her decision, she hopped up on her high horse and had it trample me underfoot, loudly proclaiming that a “strong, independent woman” doesn’t need anyone’s permission to have a male friend.

“Okay,” I said. “What would you say if I took [name of an exceptionally hot female co-worker] to my friend’s cabin up north?” Within seconds, my SIW’s eyes became lit with the fires of righteous indignation as she declared, “You better not!” I broke up with her on the spot and ironically, eight years later, this particular 39-year-old SIW continues to live alone … not counting her six cats, of course!

Have you ever listened to a woman use the SIW excuse for being alone? I mean, really sat down and listened to her? If you do, you’ll soon realize she’s really saying it to convince herself and you’re nothing more than a surrogate audience. SIWs prefer to blame their situation on external forces rather than look within themselves to find the true source of their problems. Saying that “men can’t handle a strong, independent woman” shifts the blame onto the male gender of men (as per usual), thus sparing these miserable wretches the arduous task of indulging in even the slightest modicum of self-examination. And there is an army of like-minded SIWs out there willing to enable their sisters in their times of suffering, further perpetuating this mythology.

Given their definition of SIW, it’s no wonder why most men avoid SIWs like the plague. These women are too busy being exactly what they say they are— independent—and that’s the polar opposite of what relationships are all about. Humans are pack animals by nature, and we expect our relationships to be a partnership where both members love, respect, and above all compromise with each other for the betterment of the union. SIWs are oblivious to this concept because they’re too busy trying to prove how “strong” and “independent” they are, usually by picking fights with the men in their lives over every matter, big and small. They believe offering men love, respect, and compromise is being weak on their part, even though they demand these very same things from the men in their lives. They’re still women after all, and they better damn well be treated as such … or else!

Perhaps the saddest thing about today’s SIWs is that they have no clue about what true strength really is. All they know is the false bravado of the self-righteous. True strength comes from a willingness to be vulnerable enough to tell your partner that you are much better person with them in your life, and that you love and appreciate them for it. But then again, I’m a man, so what do I know? Maybe everything in this column is a complete fallacy. Perhaps all the SIWs out there should just ignore these words and simply continue doing what they’ve always done and hope to achieve different results.

What’s the definition of insanity again?

The Normalisation Of Gynocentrism

April 23, 2023 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

Civilisation is based on the capacity of human beings to control and manage their instinctual and emotional responses and behave in an intelligent manner. The degree to which that capacity is eroded by lack of self-awareness, lack of cultural wisdom, lack of discipline, fatherlessness and superresponses to superstimuli, is the degree to which civilisation will decline, regress and then implode.

This ancient understanding that natural impulses can be destructive when taken to extremes, was known thousands of years ago. As discussed in Paul Elam and Peter Wright's article, "Slaying the dragon",[1] this understanding was a major foundational element of many religions and is addressed in cultural mythology, such as the seven deadly sins of Christianity and the story of Odysseus resisting the Sirens call. This ancient wisdom was recognised as key not just to the well-being of individuals, but also to the survival of civilisations over history.

It is important to note that fathers have played a major role in teaching children to postpone gratification and regulate their instinctual and emotional impulses, as we have seen from Dr. Warren Farrell's research[2] into the boy crisis. Unsurprisingly and predictably, fatherlessness has been one of the main factors driving the decline of Western civilisation.

There is a distinction between pathological behaviour and instinct. Just because a behaviour is driven by instinct, does not then make the behaviour healthy or biologically optimal to Darwinian fitness. Overeating is driven by instinct and can kill you before you reproduce (and even prevent you from finding a mate in the first place). There is also a distinction between gynocentrism and human instincts. Gynocentrism is not itself an instinct but rather a product of human instinct, emotional impulses and cultural conditioning. Gynocentrism is a set of complex and pathological behaviours that arise from a superresponse to superstimuli associated with sex, neoteny, the parental brain and pair bonding. See the article, "Chasing the dragon"[3] for more information.

Many animals and especially human beings, have a capacity to regulate and control their behavioural responses to instinctual and emotional impulses that come from the lower areas of the brain. We have a well developed prefrontal cortex and other areas of the cerebral cortex, that have been shown in neuroscientific research[4] to keep our behavioural responses to instincts in check. Whilst we may have no control over feeling our primal urges, we do have control over whether we decide to act on them and base decisions on them. We may experience anger, fear and sexual attraction, but we can control whether or not we act on our instincts and impulses. It is a scientific fact we have the capacity to control our behaviour and override our instinctual impulses. It is also the reason why we have a legal system: we recognise people have self-control over their decisions and actions.

People go on hunger strikes and die from it, despite having a hunger instinct and survival instinct. There are numerous other examples of people overriding their survival instinct. Extreme sports, stunts from escape artists and countless acts of bravery in war being such examples. There are numerous examples of people overriding their sexual instincts too. There are heterosexual men that remain celibate their entire lives in the clergy on purpose. There are even in this hypersexualised culture, sizeable communities of people that still practice sexual abstinence before marriage. We have enormous control over our behaviour. People do not see attractive people and then jump their bones and immediately have sex with them in public (we call that rape by the way, which is a crime)!

We have self-control and it is considerable in its power. It is worth considering that in the context of gynocentrism and the underlying superresponse to superstimuli. Whilst the superresponse leading to gynocentrism may indeed be strong, so is our ability to regulate our own behaviour. In fact our ability to control our own behaviour, can be that extreme it can actually kill us. It is also the case that through self-discipline, training and neuroplasticity, we can actually strengthen our neurological capacity to regulate our behaviour even further. Fathers play a key role in developing that neurological capacity in children, through teaching them to postpone gratification. We certainly have the capability to overcome gynocentrism.

The literal interpretation of free will might be an illusion, but self-control does exist and we have parts of the brain dedicated to exercising self-control. The fact that neurological process of self-control may in part lie beyond our conscious awareness, does not negate the fact we can and do regulate our behaviour and suppress our instincts and emotional impulses very often. It is what makes Homo sapiens, “sapien” or wise. Our ability to postpone gratification of our instincts and impulses and control when, where and even if we choose to satisfy them, is one of the major traits responsible for allowing our species to do what no other animal on this planet has done- create civilisation.

The assumption (which is precisely what it is), that gynocentrism is some insurmountable and hardwired instinct and behaviour we are slaves to, is complete and utter nonsense. That is not to say gynocentrism is not difficult to overcome or that it is not a powerful force within society. But it is not an omnipotent force either. It does not matter how many times it is said, there will still be some people that will call you a denier of biology if you dare to make the claim gynocentrism is not an immutable part of human behaviour. All of human behaviour is biological in part. Not just gynocentrism. Stating that gynocentrism is biological, certainly does not then automatically mean that it is immutable and insurmountable.

Gynocentrism is a pathological set of behaviours driven by instincts and emotional impulses, just like overeating and obesity is driven by the hunger instinct. It does not automatically follow that the instincts and emotional processes that are involved in gynocentrism, will invariably and always produce gynocentrism. Just like it does not always follow that the hunger instinct will lead to overeating and obesity, or that the sexual instinct will lead to rape.

Gynocentrism is merely one of many manifestations of the sexual instinct, desire to pair bond, our emotional response to neoteny and our parental brain. The same general emotional response to neoteny drives millions of people daily to dog videos on YouTube. The same parental brain is active when raising children. The reason why gynocentrism is so common in society, is because unlike obesity and other addictive and pathological behaviours like smoking, we do not shame people for it or discourage it or teach people about the harms it will cause. People understand the risks of overeating, obesity and smoking and people are discouraged from doing it by wider society (with the exception of the fat acceptance people). People go to jail if they indiscriminately act on their sexual instincts.

We normalise gynocentrism and actually encourage it. Imagine if we normalised and encouraged smoking again? Gynocentrism is common because we normalise it in the culture. The culture at large reinforces and conditions us from a very early age, to train our instincts and emotional responses to produce gynocentric behaviour. Contrary to the opinion of some armchair evolutionary biologists, gynocentrism does not enhance the capacity of the species to perpetuate itself. Exhibiting indiscriminate deference to addressing the needs and wants of women and girls above everything else (the definition of gynocentrism), actually causes the complete opposite. It leads to extinction.

It is not really hard to imagine how lopsided and imbalanced priorities could lead to dysfunctional and suboptimal outcomes in a complex system like society. The only reason why gynocentrism has not yet caused mass calamity, is because gynocentrism like obesity was kept at bay for most of human history from getting too big of a problem. Thanks to the imperative and focus we had to maintain on our survival as a community and as individuals and the limited means of communication over most of history, conditions simply did not permit gynocentrism to grow to a point where it threatened the survival of society. Only fairly recently over the last few centuries and particularly over the last 50 years, has that changed and these changes have allowed gynocentrism to mushroom.

Once survival became less of an issue and safety, prosperity, nutrition and human health improved by many orders of magnitude and society became mechanised and women gained control over their fertility, the constraints on gynocentrism growing beyond a certain threshold were removed and societal focus began to shift more and more from survival to a gynocentric lens.

Combined with these changes were communication technologies that allowed superstimuli to have an unprecedented mass effect on the population. The printing press, television, computers, smartphones, the internet and so forth, have allowed superstimuli to have much greater effects on conditioning human behaviour and the psychological development of children than ever before. Marketing in particular has made multibillion dollar industries out of exploiting superstimuli.

As a result of these changes, gynocentrism has rapidly grown over the last few centuries and particularly the last 50 years. We now have runaway gynocentrism. Eventually like a runaway train approaching a cliff, runaway gynocentrism will destroy civilisation if society does not find the brakes in time. We have in my estimation about 20 years before we reach that cliff and society runs off the rails into the abyss. It is now a race against the clock to wake as many people up from their hypnotic daze as we can.

We can see right now the fertility rates plummeting in every developed nation, thanks to constantly pandering to the needs and wants of women and girls. Social scientists are calling it the "demographic winter".[5] Pandering to the princess culture and female entitlement mentality (as Australian columnist Miranda Devine calls it),[6] does not produce offspring.

Societies that succumb to runaway gynocentrism die out. Of course there are also long term consequences building from decades of neglect of boys needs in the education system and the epidemic of fatherlessness, that will threaten the social cohesion and economic prosperity of a number of developed nations in the coming decades. Not only will gynocentric societies shrink and then die out, they will descend into poverty, crime and civil unrest before they disappear.

Gynocentrism is widespread because we consider it to be normal and the culture reinforces it as a good thing. Imagine how much more common obesity or gambling addiction would be if the culture normalised and encouraged overeating and gambling? Imagine how much more common overeating and obesity and gambling and gambling addiction would be if you were encouraged to overeat and gamble from birth? Why do we consider gynocentrism to be normal? There are ten reasons or causes for this:

The Influence Of Women

Part of the reason gynocentrism is normal, is because it is encouraged by women. A casino does not want to discourage you from gambling your life savings. Women generally speaking, do not want to discourage men from getting married despite being fully aware of the biased divorce and family court process. There is no incentive for women to discourage men from gynocentrism and every incentive to do the complete opposite – and they do.

The difference between gynocentrism and the casino example, is that women constitute half of society and also raise you from birth and casino's do not. The food industry as powerful as they are, are not half of the population and are not your mother. When you consider the role of women in men's lives as mothers, sisters, wives and girlfriends and the fact women generally are part of the most important and intimate relationships men have in their lives, it is not difficult to see how gynocentrism can be spread and become normalised in society if women promote it.

When women constitute the voting majority and control the majority of consumer spending, it is not hard to see how gynocentrism can become mainstream in the economy and in politics. That is especially true when women exercise an in-group bias, which research studies[7] report is the case. On top of those realities is the fact men can and do white knight for female attention and approval. The enforcement of women's desires on the rest of society, through female control over legions of male simps, politicians and corporations, cannot be overlooked in normalising gynocentrism in the culture.

The Change In Family Structure

The change in family structure over the last fifty years, has also played a major role in the normalisation of gynocentrism. We learn the gynocentric social mode of behaviour to a significant degree from our childhood upbringing in the household. When boys and girls are raised to adopt and expect male chivalry, then it is likely that behaviour will be exhibited by them when they get older. When boys and girls are raised with the message it is never okay to hit a woman, but never told the message it is never okay to hit a man, they internalise that double standard.

Over the last fifty years there has been dramatic changes in family structure. Many children are now being raised in fatherless homes from birth, or have been alienated from their fathers through divorce and family court. The lack of an adult male influence in the home combined with a lack of men in the education system, exacerbates gynocentric double standards being internalised in children and future generations. We also know the important role fathers play in teaching boys and girls to regulate their emotional and instinctual impulses, through teaching them to postpone gratification. We are now starting to see the impact of fathers being removed from the family, in the declining social behaviour of wider society.

We now have groups of young people and political movements fuelled entirely on emotional impulse and the abandonment of reason and evidence (SJW's, university campus feminists, Black Lives Matter, Antifa, the women's marches etc being examples). We are living in a post factual world, where what feels good is more important than what is true. This is what happens in a fatherless society and it will eventually lead to societal collapse as it gets worse.

The Prosperity Of Modern Civilisation

A subtle reason for why we consider gynocentrism to be normal, is because the prosperity of modern civilisation cushions society from the consequences of it in the short term. Our current debt based monetary system and welfare state, combined with major advances in technology, allows society to pass on the costs of ignoring major social problems onto future generations. It takes years, decades and in some cases centuries, before the severe and long-lasting consequences of gynocentrism hit individuals and society. So society does not learn very easily to do draw a link between gynocentric behaviour and the consequences of such behaviour.

You do not immediately feel the consequences of divorce and family court when you marry a female psychopath. Economies do not feel the burden straight away of large numbers of unemployed men arising from decades of inaction on addressing the boy crisis in education. Societies do not feel the consequences of fatherlessness straight away either or the long-term consequences of social witch-hunts like metoo#. Universities do not immediately feel the financial consequences of lawsuits against them from men falsely accused of rape, resulting from university policies enacted from the Dear Colleague letter.

Virtue Signalling

Gynocentrism is also normalised because on the surface it appears to be good behaviour, feels good and is therefore encouraged by the culture. However when considered with more thoughtful and detailed examination, it can be seen that this is not the case. White knighting appears to be a noble act on the surface, but not when we look into the details of what is going on. Human beings are prone to surface thinking, simple heuristic thinking and emotional bias. Marketing is so successful because it takes full advantage of these biases and cognitive shortcuts human perception employs to make sense of the world (see the elaboration likelihood model[8] for more info and check out the central versus peripheral route to persuasion). What may look and feel good and righteous on the surface, is not always the case.

The Proliferation Of Gynocentric Superstimuli And Mass Communication

Of course it is also predictable that gynocentrism will be normalised when our environment is swamped with superstimuli, that trains our brains through conditioning over many years to operate in a gynocentric mode. This consistent exposure has long term effects on the brain through neuroplasticity.

When gynocentric superstimuli is all you are exposed to every waking hour from birth until death and there is so much social pressure on you to conform to gynocentric social norms, it is predictable gynocentrism will be normalised in the society in question. We have a plethora of laws against broadcasting violent ads, shows and movies and against promoting gambling and yet nothing like that for gynocentrism. When you combine gynocentric superstimuli with modern communication in the form of the internet, television, computers and smartphones, you have the perfect delivery system to condition society and normalise gynocentric behaviour.

The Gynocentric Mainstream Media

Following on from the previous section, the mainstream media plays a key role in normalising gynocentrism. The gynocentric vomit coming out daily from major news outlets is constant. We have articles titled, "Why Can't We Hate Men?"[9] from the Washington Post and "The End Of Men"[10] from the Atlantic. Imagine for a moment if we substituted men with Jews in such articles. Such material would not look out of place in Nazi propaganda. Men are being dehumanised by the media and the media are spreading outrageous bigotry that would never be tolerated if the sexes were reversed.

The media has shown time and time again, they are pushing a gynocentric and female supremacist narrative onto society. They have ceased being news outlets and now essentially spread feminist and gynocentric man hating propaganda. The media does shape the attitudes and beliefs of society and also shapes politics and propaganda does work as we have seen from numerous examples throughout history.

We are fortunate now to have alternative media finally rising up against this hatred of men, to challenge it directly. AVFM is one example of this. However the mainstream media has had a multidecade headstart on the alternative media to shape society and still has considerable influence, despite their falling subscriptions and viewers.

Reductionism

There is a reductionist bent in society to not look at the bigger picture. We often fail to see the connection between things and how things are interrelated in society. There is a tendency to assign responsibility or consequence to one thing, person or cause. This feeds not just into normalising gynocentrism, but into letting other problems in society grow too. Society is a system and systems theory would help enormously in understanding and correctly dealing with societal problems, particularly social problems.

Taking a holistic and systems approach to understanding the world, can be far more effective than perceiving the world solely through a reductionist lens. Take school shootings for example. We could prevent such tragedies from occurring if we bothered take a wholistic systems based perspective on the problem. Instead of blaming it all on toxic masculinity, how about we look at fatherlessness and mental health. As society becomes more and more connected, taking a wholistic systems based approach to addressing social problems is going to be more and more relevant.

When we examine the behaviour of men and women in society, it is often solely discussed and framed along gynocentric lines by the media and by the culture. We look at men's behaviour toward women in isolation from women. We do not even consider women are agents in society and we fail to see how the behaviour of men and women toward the opposite sex, feedback on each other. The feminist narrative on domestic violence is one such example of this.

Domestic violence is often reciprocal in nature[11] and yet we do not hear on the reciprocal nature of domestic violence. When we hear about men's violence toward women only, its causes are framed along the lines of power and control by the feminist Duluth model. No other cause or factor is apparently at play in contributing to men's violence. The role of alcohol, substance abuse, poverty, mental illness and abuse during childhood, is all overlooked and ignored.

When society fosters a reductionist perspective on looking at the world and does not consider a wholistic or systems perspective, it encourages gynocentrism to grow and spread. Gynocentrism is by its nature reductionist. Having a one-dimensional perspective of relating everything solely to how they impact women and girls, is much easier to spread and normalise in a society that is highly politically polarised and has a general reductionist mindset to looking at the world that is encouraged by ideologues in the media and academia.

Even in biology and the sciences, we can see how reductionism holds back progress in understanding the natural world. Systems biology[12] is a rapidly developing interdisciplinary field at the forefront of life science research, that aims to go beyond a reductionist perspective, correct this limitation in scientific knowledge and develop a more accurate wholistic systems understanding of biology.

Biology is complex and is composed of multiple systems at multiple levels, from cell signalling pathways all the way up to entire ecosystems. When we examine what is required for evolutionary success and for genes to be successfully passed on from one generation to the next, it is not as simple as saying it is all about reproductive success. Reproduction is essential, but so is survival. An organism must survive to reproduce and its offspring must survive to successfully mate, otherwise it would be as if the offspring were never produced in the first place.

Reproducing once may not be sufficient either and an organism may need to survive long enough to mate multiple times, to ensure they produce enough offspring that survive to sexual maturity and pass on the genes. An organism must develop a strategy in investing energy, resources and time in survival versus reproduction, that is optimised to their environment and biology, to guarantee evolutionary success.

Evolutionary success is far more complex than simply just reproducing. If that were not the case and reproduction was really all that mattered, then the only life that would have evolved on Earth would have been asexual microbial life. There are selective advantages for species that reproduce more slowly, but have a more complex biology that can better adapt to, tolerate, manipulate and extract resources from the local environment. These selective advantages are partly what gave rise to the proliferation of multicellular life.[13]

Think for a moment about the thousands of lineages that have continued their existence today, because of the civilisation and technological advances men have created and been responsible for. Think of the billions of people alive today because of the intrinsic value men have provided to society. There are entire lineages that would have been extinguished long ago and billions of people that would not have been born, without the intrinsic value men have provided in creating the advanced civilisation we enjoy and modern technology.

Simply reproducing, especially for a slowly reproducing species like Humans, is simply not enough to ensure evolutionary success. That is why men have been sexually and naturally selected, to develop traits to enable them to provide, protect, discover, explore, invent, build, maintain, repair and fight for society. It is not as simple as saying one man can reproduce with ten women, therefore men are disposable. Biology is far more complex than that.

Notice no one seems to consider how one man can change the world and lead to an extra couple of hundred million people existing and passing on their genes. Think of the impact a handful of men in society have had on civilisation over the last two centuries and by extension the evolutionary success of the species. Think of how many less people there would be without electricity, machinery, antibiotics, modern medicine and modern agriculture that men were mostly responsible for. How many family genetic lineages have continued existing because of these technological advances by men and have avoided termination as a result?

Successfully passing on the genes is not solely about sexual intercourse. Biology is more complex than that. Many other things have to occur before and after sexual intercourse, to ensure genes are passed on successfully. The value men bring to the survival of the community and to society is unique. Despite what feminists claim, women really cannot do everything a man can do or just as well (Women are not inferior. Men and women just have different strengths.).

Men remain the majority of our leading scientists, thinkers, inventors, political and business thinkers etc, despite all of the feminist social engineering to artificially lift women up. Human adult males are also not immediately replaceable either, especially talented and gifted men. It takes roughly 18 years before they reach physical maturity (25 years if we are talking about the brain) and a great deal of parental investment compared to other animals.

Our failure to recognise that treating men as disposable is to treat civilisation as disposable, will eventually lead to the implosion of civilisation. Even if we consider men as machines, we all recognise what happens when you do not look after your car and do not change the oil. Either we unlearn the cultural belief men are disposable, or we can watch society start falling apart. Adopting a wholistic systems perspective and going beyond a simple reductionist mode of thinking, would help us unlearn the erroneous cultural belief men are disposable.

Gynocentric Authority, Institutions And Herd Mentality

Much of the influence in what shapes social behaviour comes from the top of society and from authorities like the government and institutions like university. Gynocentrism has been normalised in part because we have practiced it for centuries and our key institutions, leaders, celebrities and elite practice it, endorse it and impose it on the rest of us. We even enshrine gynocentrism into law.

There have been a number of psychological studies since WW2 showing how easily people blindly follow authority and rules (the infamous Zimbardo Stanford prison experiment[14] being one such example) and how powerful institutional environments and rules are in shaping group and individual behaviour (that partly explains a lot about how Nazism came to power and how millions of people were exterminated without anyone speaking out against it).

The power of the herd mentality of human beings to follow authority and a minority of individuals, cannot be understated. Many people simply do not think for themselves and this reality allows a minority of people like feminists, to easily control large groups of people once they hold positions of authority in institutions and government.

Slavery was considered normal for centuries by our leaders, authorities and institutions and was widespread, as was barbaric punishment and torture. Only in the last two hundred years or so and after wars and huge political movements and massive legal reform, have slavery and inhumane punishment been mostly abolished and outlawed. People had the same arguments about slavery being natural and inevitable in the past, as people do today about gynocentrism.

Just like back then, the arguments today about gynocentrism being inevitable do not have substance when you examine them more closely. This is the naturalistic fallacy in action. The fact gynocentrism has natural or biological underpinnings, does not then mean it is morally acceptable, desirable, inevitable or a healthy expression of human behaviour.

The education system out of all of the institutions, plays a key role in normalising gynocentrism. Many boys and girls in school can now go through most of their education from kindergarten to postgraduate education, with few male teachers. The influence of feminist ideology is now present at the primary or elementary level and has been present at the university level for years.

The education system has now essentially become a system of feminist indoctrination and gynocentrism. This sort of environment does have impacts on the behaviour of children and the adults they will become. Like the changes in family structure, the feminisaton of the education system has played a major role in spreading and promoting gynocentrism in society.

Former KGB agent and defector Uri Bezmenov, warned in an interview more than 30 years ago,[15] about the feminist and marxist takeover of our institutions and the ideological subversion of Western democracy. He made some very eerie predictions that help explain today's society. Controlling the education system is key. He discusses the four stages of the takeover of society by the far left in the interview (demoralisation, destabilisation, crisis and normalisation).

He explains the first stage which is called demoralisation. This involves indoctrinating multiple generations of students in far left ideology in the education system. From there these people infect the government, academia, corporations and our institutions and then spread far left ideology within these organisations. He explains how the brainwashing occurring in the education system, corrupts people's perception to the point where they cannot make logical sense of information. After years of indoctrination, their thinking is bounded within an ideological framework and they cannot see beyond that framework.

Sound familiar? It should. Uri was explaining what modern Western society would become 30 years ago. Think of all the revelations that have come out on the working environments of employees in the tech sector and in academia and the disruptive and violent protests on university campuses.

Gynocentric Superorganisms

Related to the previous reason behind why gynocentrism is normalised, is the influence of superorganisms on society and how they have succumbed to gynocentrism. MRA blogger Angry Harry, did an excellent series looking at the impact of superorganisms on human behaviour and how powerful they are in shaping it (See Angry Harry's MRA corner on AVFM and check out the 4 part series titled, "Those Who Rules Over Us").[16]

Superorganisms in the social context can be thought of as entities comprised of thousands, sometimes millions and even billions of individuals, that appear to mimic the properties of a living organism and wield enormous influence on society. Religions, governments, corporations, institutions and cities are examples of superorganisms. People in this context can be considered cells of these superorganisms. If we look at human civilisation as a superorganism, the slogan "feminism is cancer" is quite fitting.

Gynocentrism can be thought of in the context of superorganisms, as the underlying germ of a disease of the superorganism. It infects healthy human cells of the superorganism and then spreads throughout the superorganism. Eventually the superorganism succumbs to gynocentrism and then infects other superorganisms. Feminism could be considered a vector of the gynocentric germ that helps it spread, like how a mosquito is a vector of Malaria.

Superorganisms as Angry Harry explained, have enormous influence over our society and the individual behaviour of people. Corporations, governments, religion and institutions shape the way of life for billions of people. Gynocentrism has infested many of these superorganisms and turned them into gynocentric zombies. These infected entities can and have inflicted terrible damage on society.

Think of the impact feminist infested universities have had on society. Think of the impact the gynocentric legal system has had on the nuclear family, fathers and the lives of men. Think of the impact the feminised education system has had on the boy crisis in education. Think of the impact the gynocentric bias of the tech sector has had on the information that the public is exposed to and their censorship and filtering of alternative non-gynocentric viewpoints.

Learned Helplessness And The Self-Fulfilling Prophecy Of Gynocentrism

Men and boys in today's society to a substantial degree, are exhibiting signs of learned helplessness. Many men and boys have essentially been conditioned to accept that gynocentrism is normal and inescapable. Once men and boys internalise that dangerous false belief, they accept their own marginalisation and disposability every day and in doing so enable gynocentrism to have almost complete dominance over society. Learned helplessness has been linked to depression[17] and is no doubt a major factor driving the epidemic of male suicide. Learned helplessness fuels a self-fulfilling prophecy.

If men and boys believe there is no other way to live, then gynocentrism becomes inevitable and this fate then reinforces the belief that gave rise to it. Beliefs can be very destructive things when they go unquestioned, despite leading to highly destructive outcomes.

Men going their own way (MGTOW) is a pathway out of gynocentrism for men. It involves unlearning pathological gynocentric beliefs and daring to believe there is another way to live. Whilst it may not be easy to go against the social current of society, it is possible and once the rewards of going your own way become clear, it becomes easier and easier and easier to go your own way. We are social creatures and part of overcoming learned helplessness for men involves abandoning concern for social ostracism, particularly from women and learning how to identify and manage the risks that a predatory gynocentric society presents, so you can live life in your own way and avoid entrapment and attack.

Men and boys are punished for performing and exhibiting their natural masculine nature and at the same time ridiculed for failing to perform and demonstrate a masculine nature. At the same time that men are told they must live up to the hypergamous expectations of women to earn more money than their female counterparts in order to be worthy of a relationship with women, they are cast as privileged oppressors and blamed for the gender pay gap if they do earn more money than women.

Men are told they are losers if they do not perform and then are told they are privileged oppressors when they do perform. Women will write articles about “where are all the good men” and then write other articles about the gender wage gap and how we need female quotas in upper management and corporate boards because of male privilege. It is a double bind. Men have no escape from social ostracism if they follow external societal pressures and succumb to herd mentality and social pressure to conform. Such men must accept the message from society they are inferior, violent, privileged and evil oppressors.

MGTOW is the healthy alternative. MGTOW involves finding your own way in life, independent of what the culture or society or women expects of you or what they think of you. MGTOW is the only way out for men from the gynocentric prison society has been turned into. To borrow a line from the Shawshank Redemption you either, “get busy living or get busy dying”.

The biases in human perception, thinking and behaviour discussed, combined with the changes in family structure, the proliferation of superstimuli with mass communication and the influence of gynocentric institutions, media and authority figures, keep the silent killer that is gynocentrism from being detected and addressed by civilisation and by individuals.

To fight this, we need to develop greater self-awareness in society and awareness of what gynocentrism is and the harms it can and does cause. We need organised resistance to gynocentrism to emerge at the individual level of men going their own way and at the collective level of a well-funded and well organised men’s movement to tackle institutional and legalised gynocentrism. Either we address gynocentrism, or the harsh forces of natural selection will remove gynocentric behaviour from the human evolutionary lineage, or worse put the entire human race into the fossil record. For the superorganisms of society, they will have to either rid themselves of gynocentrism or look forward to bankruptcy or collapse. For the individual man, you either overcome gynocentrism or you suffer for it and in some cases lose everything, including your life.

It is our choice, we can either do this the easy way or the hard way individually, and as a society. It takes discipline to recondition ourselves out of bad habits and develop the self-awareness to recognise and stop bad behaviours. It does not happen overnight. Websites like AVFM, men’s discussion and support groups and male friendly life coaches and mental health professionals, can help with that process.

MGTOW helps in a big way in overcoming gynocentrism. MGTOW or men going their own way, is grounded on the fundamental principle of self-control. You cannot go your own way without it! MGTOW and its continued growth is direct proof it is possible for men to overcome years of gynocentric programming, instinctual and emotional impulses and take the red pill.

But like I said nothing happens overnight. That goes for individual change and also for societal change. Just because change is slow, does not mean change is impossible or will not eventually lead to profound shifts in people’s lives and the way society functions.

Every journey begins with a single first step. It is time men broke free of their psychological bondage and dared to recognise and accept their true intrinsic value, in the face of a gynocentric society that would prefer they did not.

It is not just biology at play when we are talking about gynocentrism. Social, political, institutional, economic, informational and cultural factors, are also involved in normalising the social pathology we call gynocentrism. We are indeed living in the matrix of gynocentrism. Most people are still asleep in the matrix. We need to stop normalising gynocentrism by addressing the ten causes responsible for its normalisation discussed earlier. MGTOW and a well funded and organised men's movement, would go a long way to achieving that objective.

We are at a critical period in human civilisation where we need to move beyond outmoded gynocentric ways of thinking and behaving if we expect civilisation to survive. Technology cannot be uninvented and we cannot return to a traditionalist path. Simply ending feminism will not be sufficient to advance society either. Gynocentrism has now become an unsustainable problem for society.

Tens of thousands of years ago when we humans transitioned from a hunter-gatherer existence to primitive civilisation, the dynamics between the sexes changed. Now we face a similar challenge to change those dynamics again, as a result of rapid technological change over the last two centuries. Dr. Warren Farrell has in the past described the need for a gender transition movement, to recognise and address this reality.

The Kardashev scale[18] lays out the stage of technological advancement of civilisations. Human civilisation is currently undergoing a transition from a type 0 civilisation, to a type 1 civilisation in which we control all of the energy available on the planet and coming from the parent star (currently we can only make use of a fraction of the energy available). Technologies of a type 1 civilisation include: nuclear fusion and renewable energy on a large scale, the capacity to produce large quantities of antimatter etc. Some of these technologies we have obtained, some we are on the cusp of and other technology is quite a while away.

In several decades if everything goes right, we may have a permanent, sizeable and self-sustaining settlement on Mars. All of this civilisational advancement, requires a society that remains socially stable, free, safe, educated and prosperous enough to permit the required technological progress to occur and to ensure the technology is not used to destroy ourselves.

The relationship between men and women forms the backbone of the family and the family forms the backbone of society. Gynocentrism is now threatening to destroy the backbone of the family and of society. We need to wake up, otherwise the future for humanity is looking bleak. External threats like nuclear weapons appear to be well recognised. The same does not seem to apply for gynocentrism and the scale of the threat it poses for the continued existence of human civilisation. This needs to change.

Treating anxiety with a new narrative

April 23, 2023 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Anxiety may be the most pervasive "psychiatric" problem in the world. All the more interesting, then, that it is a problem with so little general attention in the media and the medical establishment.

The symptoms can be a mildly annoying, with the occasional and temporary sense of unrest and unease. The reasons for it happening maybe quite obvious at the time. Then again, it can appear to come straight out of the blue. It can come or go without visible "triggers," like high-stress events.

In more extreme, but very common incidents of the disorder, the symptoms can be life-diminshing, horrific experiences. Full blown anxiety attacks, commonly known as "panic attacks" include tachycardia (rapid, runaway pulse), sweating palms, frightening disorientation, an overwhelming sense of impending death or doom and crippling levels of fear that last anywhere from minutes to hours.

Even when the sufferer knows the events are not lethal; even after experiencing them hundreds of times, it does not put the sufferer at ease during an attack. Each one is as bad as the last. It can become a living hell in which the sufferer feels like a ticking time bomb in between debilitating attacks.

The Latin root of anxiety is angere which means to choke, squeeze or compress tightly. That's what happens to our bodies when anxiety hits – our chest muscles seize up and breathing tightens. Our neck constricts and creates a lump in the throat. We choke on the words, can't get them out. Lips, face, hands, legs stiffen and make it hard to move, and our blood vessels constrict to create tension headaches. It's as if we are caught by a giant who squashes us in his fist.

Anxiety disorders are the most common of all psychiatric complaints, appearing at twice the rate of mood disorders such as depression and bipolar illness.[1] Anxiety is characterized by:

a. bodily symptoms of tension, racing heart, shakiness or sweating.

b. state of uneasiness, nervousness, dread, distress, fear, panic and in extreme cases terror.

c. apprehension about failure, misfortune or danger.[2]

Anxiety also colors the way we think, feel and act. "It is a petty monster," writes author Daniel Smith "able to work such humdrum tricks as paralyzing you over your salad, convincing you that a choice between blue cheese and vinaigrette is as dire as that between life and death."[3]

Numerous forms exist, including generalized anxiety disorder (GAD), social anxiety disorder, separation anxiety disorder, performance anxiety, stranger anxiety, agoraphobia, post-traumatic stress disorder, obsessive–compulsive disorder, situational anxiety, phobias and panic disorder to name but a few. Each has its own peculiarities and triggers (though they may be very difficult to identify), and each requires a different approach to understand and manage it.

With so many anxiety disorders, we will limit ourselves to a category affecting men, one that you won't find mentioned in the textbooks on therapists desks.

The anxiety disorder with no name

In the past, psychologists have spoken of 'performance anxiety' and 'castration anxiety' as ways to understand men, but these terms do not go near far enough. Men's anxieties are born of far broader concerns than having a metaphorical (or real) penis chopped off.

The cause of men's anxiety, in this case, is the the entire misandric culture they must daily rise from bed to face. Most men will be unaware of this, as facing and dealing with misandric pressures is socially forbidden and often sequestered behind a wall of denial. It's the culture itself that demands they perform, be in service, be under constant scrutiny and suspicion for wrongdoings, and one that will penalize them if they step out of line.

In that sense, men's denial of that anxiety is a survival mechanism.

As a man in this world, if you are NOT anxious then there is either something terribly wrong with you or you are one of the lucky few who has unlocked the answers to this problem.

All men (and boys) are under assault from social forces and the resultant anxiety is a natural response. These forces berate you every minute about your supposed violent tendencies, about rape culture, child maintenance, alimony and manning up for women. All of this punishes you with the stress of failure or the stress of disobedience. The whole society you live in colludes to keep you silent about all of it.

So let's talk about it. In fact, lets also give it a name – Misandric Culture Anxiety (MCA). To be perfectly blunt, we are asserting that the modern male gender role and the unattainable demands it places on boys and men in misandric culture causes mental illness in men.

Among the many causes of anxiety, MCA is one of the big ones. And if you happen to have another underlying anxiety disorder, MCA will exacerbate it. If you have social phobias, MCA will make you even more nervous about mixing with other people.

If you take Valium or alprazolam (Xanax) for generalized anxiety disorder, the added load of MCA will tempt you to unilaterally increase your dose. This is highly dangerous in terms of tolerance and addiction. Both Valium and Xanax are benzodiazepines which can have bad synergistic side effects with alcohol and which can both result in dangerous withdrawal symptoms from high doses over a prolonged period of time. Actually, withdrawal from these drugs can possibly kill you.

The other problem, even aside from MCA, is that of tolerance. Like most other drugs, tolerance develops and higher doses are needed for the same therapeutic benefit. While they may provide short term solutions, these psychoactive drugs are a treatment that can easily become worse than the problem they are treating.

While anxiety attacks may have very obscure triggers, reducing the overall exposure and impact of MCA on our lives can reduce the stress and anxiety that comes with it. Before touching on ways to do that, lets first have a look at the way men have traditionally dealt with it – by self-medicating, often destructively, as a way of reducing the choke-hold of anxiety.

Is it any wonder men drink more alcohol?

How many times are cocktails after work to "de-stress" actually just a form of self-medication for anxiety? How much of that becomes problem drinking because of tolerance? How many other drugs, particularly benzodiazepines, are combined with alcohol or otherwise abused to provide more synergistic effect on the anxiety?

Anxiety can be difficult to treat. There are no magic cures and the many manifestations of anxiety require varied responses. However, there are general strategies that can, for many men, reduce anxiety and with it the need to self-medicate. The first thing to investigate is potential or known triggers, a no-brainer, but in this model it is done in conjunction with assessing the self-narratives that might be needlessly, pointlessly placing you in front of those triggers. If for instance your anxiety is triggered by a desire to provide for a woman, creating anxiety lest you fall short or fail in your "duty," then you need to rewrite that narrative with one that changes your behavior and attitudes.

If you can't pinpoint the triggers, or they are ones you can't avoid, there are still ways to reduce the intensity of your anxiety. Neurofeedback treatments, along with efforts to monitor your body's emotional arousal will help you better detect anxiety levels and apply strategies to regulate their intensity. But first you have to agree to pay attention to your own needs and well-being – something many men have a hard time doing.

Meditation, breathing control, exercise, reducing caffeine (and other stimulants) can also help. Even some forms of cannibis are now demonstrating anxiolytic effects, though regarding that as a singular approach is something we deem to be unwise. Drugs that mask problems, even non addictive ones, do not ultimately lead to addressing the root causes of the problem.

In some people, anxiety can be more or less "cured," yet in others its symptoms can be made much more manageable. As always, the dedication and determination of the sufferer will have the greatest impact on results.

It is a complicated subject which we will be handling in a series of articles in the future which are focused on solutions.

One thing is certain, at least in our opinion. Any efforts to address anxiety issues in men without an intense focus on narrative reconstruction are substandard. If you want to reduce anxiety, you must change the expectations you place on yourself which produce it in the first place. You will also need to withdraw permission from the people in your circles, and society at large, to burden you with their expectations.

Snockered with Knockers

April 25, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Imagine my shock and horror when I came across an article entitled "Women are drinking more than men to cope with coronavirus due to 'psychological distress' and the presence of children in the home during the pandemic" on a web site (www.stationgossip.com). As if there weren't enough systemic injustice in this world, now we have this to deal with!

In a nutshell, the article states that coronavirus stay-at-home orders have forced many women into being stay-at-home mothers! As a result, more and more women are turning to booze for self-medication – resulting in a 16% rise in the number of alcoholic drinks consumed by women. Yes, America's mothers are starting to imitate the gaits of their toddlers! The difference is when they faw down, they don't get up so quickly.

Of course, the very idea of children at home is appalling. Just because families are smaller than ever and middle class houses have more square footage than ever doesn't mean the little buggers don't get underfoot any more. Where to stash the kids has always been a problem.

But there are some commonsensical solutions to the problem. First of all, if mothers would share their alcohol and spike their kids' drinks, they'd probably get more stress relief than by consuming all the booze themselves. Dump an ounce or two of vodka into junior's sippy cup and every meal becomes a happy meal! Who says adult beverages are for adults only?

To be sure, men are drinking more too these days, but the imbibing has increased more for women than men. In other words, women are more affected, so it is time to take action in the name of equity.

One possibility is inducing men to drink more. Usually, this is easily achieved by offering drinks on the house but with the bars closed, this is no longer feasible. Some bars and restaurants, however, are now offering beer, wine, and mixed drinks to go. And, of course, supermarkets and big box stores still have alcoholic beverages for sale. So the federal government could issue special stimulus vouchers to be used only for purchase of alcoholic beverages by men so they can catch up to women. Even teetotalers would benefit, as a brisk secondary market in vouchers would likely ensue.

On the other hand, I can already hear critics bellowing that giving men free booze promotes patriarchy rather than subverts it. Such a program would be a tough sell to the local wokels. Rather, let's consider…

Free booze for women! Why? Because of their special needs! In these stressful times booze is like mother's milk to mothers. But what's a mother to do when her need for liquor outstrips her resources?

Remember the "End Period Poverty" movement to provide women with free sanitary napkins? Since men have no need for sanitary napkins, charging women for them was prima facie discrimination! So when women's need for alcohol surpasses men's, the government should step in and do the right thing. Free alcohol for women, or at the very least, some sort of government assistance program to augment women's alcohol budget to alleviate their stay-at-home ordeal.

Well, every prospective law needs a good nickname. You can't just call it H.R.292, or whatever, and expect the public to pay attention. So how about Hooch for Kooches? A good slogan is also helpful. How about, "A woman needs alcohol like a fish needs water"?

Few females, even those who declare they are not feminists, are going to argue with free booze. Oh, the Women's Christian Temperance Union is still out there, even though you don't hear much from these days. I hate to think how they will react when they get the news about that 16% uptick in women drinking. After all, how can women convince men to take the pledge while they're getting plastered in record numbers?

So let's take a serious look at alcohol as a special female need, like sanitary napkins. Alcohol is a proven coping strategy, just another one of mother's little helpers. And, frankly, I think it's a matter of public health. After all, if alcohol-based hand-sanitizing is being encouraged to stop the spread of covid-19, doesn't it make sense to promote consumption of alcoholic beverages to sanitize one's innards?

Imagine a national ID card for every female American…sort of like a voter's registration card. Or maybe we could work it like World War II where every adult female is given a book of ration stamps. Take your stamps and your ration book to the retail outlet and take home a free six-pack…fifth…quart…half gallon…we can work out the details later.

Then again, the simplest approach might be to just expand the current food stamp program to include alcoholic beverages. I know, this sounds counter-productive, but alcoholic beverages are plant-based products and aren't dietary do-gooders exhorting everyone to ditch meat in favor of a plant-based diet?

And the benefits just keep on coming. Surely the nation's supermarkets, chain stores, and liquor stores will appreciate this shot in the arm. All the farmers growing corn, rye, barley, and other grains that are key ingredients in alcoholic beverages will surely be on board with it. Brewers, vintners, distillers – I think I know where they would stand on this issue.

Now, men, don't feel resentful because you have to buy your own booze while women get it free (so what else is new, you might be thinking). You see, in today's gender-fluid world, once you declare yourself a female, you too would be eligible to get free booze. Just out yourself as a dame, sign an affidavit that says you're a woman, get a note from your gynecologist, and apply for your free booze. Only a fascist would dare to complain you aren't what you claim to be.

Of course, there's no getting around those government warnings on the bottle.

1. According to the Surgeon General, women should not drink alcoholic beverages during pregnancy because of the risk of birth defects.

The sturgeon general! That fish-faced SOB is such a wet blanket! True, there is a risk to the unborn child when pregnant women drink alcoholic beverages. The last thing an already stressed-out woman needs is to give birth to a baby with fetal alcohol syndrome…but how to alleviate the stress of pregnancy if one cannot drink?

Here is where the classic feminist call for abortion on demand is crucial. Why should a woman have to give up the delights of alcohol consumption just because she's pregnant? Once the doctor makes a diagnosis of FAS, abort the little freeloader as quickly as possible. As is the case with most procedures, however, the woman would have to do without alcohol for 24 hours before the abortion. But once the little souse is evicted, let the good times roll! Of course, there's always the chance that FAS may not be diagnosed till after the baby is born. Well, in a more enlightened society, infanticide on demand would also be an option. Attitudes are changing, so perhaps one day defective children will be dumped on the ash heap of history.

Then there is that second warning on the bottle:

2. Consumption of alcoholic beverages impairs your inability to drive a car or operate machinery, and may cause health problems.

No doubt those killjoys at Mothers Against Drunk Driving will weigh in against giving free booze to women. Undeniably, such a government program would increase the likelihood of women being arrested for drunk driving. But that is easily remedied by labeling it as just another form of discrimination…you know, DWF…driving while female. Once you establish that being stopped by cops is the latest front in the war against women, you can weave back and forth from one lane to another all day long and no law enforcement officer will dare stop you and risk a civil rights lawsuit. Besides, in many traditional societies, weaving is a predominantly female activity.

As for operating machinery…geez, I don't see that as a big problem because I never see women doing that, and hardly a day goes by that I don't witness construction crews, road gangs, or utility workers on the job. Nevertheless, I bow to the possibility that there are such women out there. Frankly, operating a bulldozer with a beer buzz sounds like a hoot! Better than any ride at Six Flags and you don't have to stand in line! Who am I to deny women such pleasure if they are in a position to experience it?

Now some people may think free booze is just another attempt to pacify women, to keep them from getting too uppity. I think not. Surely, we have seen women who get more uppity the more they drink, so I think they would cancel out the passive ones who sit there as cool as a Cheshire cat lapping up a mint julep.

Of course, it is difficult to refute the assertion that such a giveaway program only adds to an already bloated federal deficit. Admittedly, in most circumstances, I would be against anything that increases federal spending.

In this case, however, call me a Keynesian!

Who Takes Your Sacrifice? (Part 2)

April 25, 2023 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

What Sacrifice Is, and What it Isn't

What is Sacrifice?

So apparently I don't get to not make a sacrifice, huh? But a sacrifice always has a collector. Who is this collector, and what does he intend to do with my repeatedly sacrificed selves?

Let me offer my most concise, distilled definition: Sacrifice is an offering to what one has no true interest.

In a lot of fictional or fantasy settings, a common trope is some variant of a village or tribe having to sacrifice one of its own members or goods, usually a virgin girl for a yearly or otherwise regular offering to appease a monster or dragon for either ritual or consumption. Another example lies in Seven Samurai and its American remake The Magnificent Seven in which bandits raid a village of its food and resources or they would destroy everything.

If anything illustrates the idea of "pick your damn sacrifice", it is a command set forth by the monster, the dragon, and the bandit. "I take your virgin girl, I take your food, I take your supplies. That, or you are all dead. Pick your damn sacrifice." The task of picking a sacrifice to make is completely beholden to the would-be collector of spoils that have anything from a weapon to an army to extort that sacrifice. The objective for the sacrifice is to pick the one that is altogether the least worst case scenario.

We can derive from this why sacrifices become consecrated, and the sacrificial ones are praised. Actually, there are two ways this happens – one is the praise of the sacrifice by the collector, for the victim has died or has been surrendered to serve their ends forcibly; the victim is the perpetrator's valued creation. The other is by the surviving victims of the sacrificial party, who because of their chosen sacrifice can survive another day…until next year when they will have to pick a new damn sacrifice. In effect, it's a way to both keep the system going, and to manage to survive the system. Imagine a vicious cycle in which the way to survive a cruel system is to feed the same system. The collector of sacrificial spoils is a vile parasite with inordinate power over its unfortunate host.

If it's not obvious by now, it turns out that sacrifice is not noble in of itself. Just like the promise of virgins in the afterlife, sacrifice is encouraged to further the ends of the powers that be. Sacrifice is not moral in any proactive sense. Sacrifice is an exchange that purposefully results in net loss for the sacrificial party, and for the extortionist's unearned gain. To return to the definition above, what I mean by one's true interest is one of direct aspiration and genuine direction. When you choose to be allowed to live each time while being mugged routinely by a scoundrel, that is not true interest, as no man of real esteem would tolerate the sustenance of that routine in which he has his property stolen and the perpetrator enabled. Sacrifice is a result of a helpless, often tragic, situation.

I can hear this already: if you didn't give the mugger your money, does it mean you prefer they kill you? They get even more creative: would you rather your children stay kidnapped than give the kidnappers the ransom? Funny how we're stuck in these set of rules that savages set for us. It is in fact true that oftentimes you are made to make that sacrifice, but we're talking about a tragic hypothetical situation that shouldn't have to happen.

The picking of the damn sacrifice is never truly elective. It is forced inevitably by forces of nature that we can't control and too often by looters, from the small time muggers to those that extort money in the form of taxation. Besides, what makes you think one day they won't just follow through with their threats even if you did pay the sacrifice? The one you are beholden to is in a special place of usurped power over you, and he sets his arbitrary rules.

You sacrifice to appease, that is, to keep the monster happy in meager hopes that he won't do something worse. You may live another day, but you have not warded off the monster, neither in principle nor in practice. You saved the village today, but you've also sustained the cycle. A true heroic act is an assertive act of living to uphold a value positively. There is nothing heroic about professing to love your enemy, who only values you as a sacrificial means to his end.

Sacrifice is Not Giving

It almost feels sacrilegious to even conceive of giving as having a return by design. The act of giving with no expectation of something in return is considered the purest form of giving, and a force of good. But what is the nature of giving something without the expectation of something in return? You had something, and now you've given it to somebody else, end of story. This looks like a loss on your part, as somebody gained.

But you might respond: "It's not that I got nothing from it, I am glad to have given what I did!". Why are you glad for that? Is it merely the fact that the recipient has what you gave him, or is it something more? Perhaps the act of giving was not only not a loss for you, but you wanted the recipient to have it. Perhaps you derive fulfillment from seeing somebody gain something you thought he needed. Perhaps the fulfillment comes from a sense of satisfaction that you were able to do provide it. The bottom line is, you've gained something. Gain is not just money. Gain is not just a personal favor. Gain is also a value and objective fulfilled.

Self-interest is not in contradiction to your values. In fact, there is a direct connection. You want to see your values applied to the world. You want to make the things you want to see in this world happen. When you are able to make that happen out of your own free will, you gain. When you give freely, you aren't taking a loss. You aren't sacrificing, and that is good.

This is not appeasement. Appeasement entails the element of the beholden; the sense of having to serve the world, society, and other people for being other people just because that is the social norm, and people will resent you for not making serving them the top priority in your life. Appeasement is a sacrificial act. There is no joy in merely escaping the scrutiny and judgment by the mob only to be faced with it again as expected.

Giving is not a virtue in itself. Giving is an act towards good or evil acts to yourself and others depending on its practitioners. When you give, give what you will towards what you want to see receive it because it will be a fulfillment to you. Give as a response to your own value system, which does not involve self-abnegation in itself. That's what giving should be. Giving is not in itself sacrifice – let us dispense with this confusion. However, too many give in a sacrificial way, or preach it. Beware of those that do.

Sacrifice is Not Trade

Let us dispense with another confusion, this semblance of an idea that sacrifice is synonymous with an equitable form of trade.

Looking back at the idea of picking one's sacrifice, it can be understandable why a sacrifice can be mentally processed like a sort of trade. You select the least worst sacrifice, to attain what appears to be a desired goal, almost manifesting itself as a exchange of which burden to cut loose.

Considering the confusion that sacrifice is an act of giving still remains, perhaps from this we can derive the notion that one sacrifices an item of theirs in exchange for something. But an incontrovertible aspect about sacrificing is that one gives something they value, that is, something they wouldn't just pass along under normal circumstances. One is compelled to make the sacrifice as a situation is forced upon him.

A real trade, on the other hand, is driven by desire for the exchange. From something small scale like me ordering a glass of whiskey at my favorite bar because I was in the mood for it, to something larger scale like purchasing a synthesizer that has just the right mellotron sound that I want that I can't find in any other instrument, a trade involves the mutual trade of something they are willing to part with for something they value even more, be it spur of the moment or based on long term ambition.

The entire point of trade is profit – on both sides. When a sacrifice masquerades as a trade, it is a scam at best. One side may profit at the complete expense of the other, sacrificial, side. The only equitable trade is one in which both sides profit on their own terms. The only profitable trade is a free trade. The only free trade is one in which both make the trade voluntarily. One voluntarily makes the trade because they are actively interested in the transaction. No sacrifice is involved. Trade is not in itself sacrifice. If you find yourself sacrificing in a trade, get out of it while you can.

Sacrifice is Not Love

Love, for all the energy mankind has spent on the subject, is largely spoken in terms of how it is an act of service, measured by how much is given and applied to the object of love by the lover. Ever present is the context of selflessness by which love is bestowed, as if a true act of love has absolutely nothing to do with one's own interests. For all the due recognition love gets as an act of desire, it is then confused by being touted as an act of self-sacrifice, like a male praying mantis offering its head to the female. Perhaps it's this misguided notion of love as self-sacrifice that causes too many to act self-sacrificially. These men bend over backwards to please a woman that hasn't even accepted them yet, and no matter how much of his resources are drained it's still a crap shoot at best if she returns his affections. But then is it proper for a woman to be considered in love with him? What is it that she loves about this man, the fact that he is now bled dry and is expected to provide her some more? If love is sacrificial, it certainly seems like a one-sided sacrifice.

Fortunately, love is not sacrifice and neither side has to perform that to manifest it. Love is an enthusiastic, innocent value response. It is a resonance of value expressed outwards in the real world. It is the desire to bring something more to life than it already is, made visible through human action. Self-sacrifice?! Far from it. Love is the most selfish thing conceivable.

To those that insist instead that love actually is in fact self-sacrifice and that to commit this act for the one they love is the right thing to do, it's time to look hard at the object of such a version of love, and the beneficiaries of this self-abnegation.

What kind of person wants the sacrificed self of another?

Sacrifice entails loss, damage, and disposal. Sacrifice is a statement as thus: "For you, I hereby cut myself down as a gesture." If an act of love is self-sacrificial, be aware of what is happening. Can desire and care only transpire at the expense of self? Now that you have sacrificed anything from your time, your space, your money, and your dreams for the object of your love, what possible reason could the object of your love be happy that you've subjected yourself to all this?

For simplicity of dialogue, let's assume that the scenario involves a man acting in his idea of love for a woman, though I suspect most would default to this scenario anyway. He professes to sacrifice himself, and in so doing subordinate his time, his space, his money, resources, dreams and visions in the name of the woman of his affections. He would see this delegation, if not downright disposal, of all that he is as a gesture and symbol of love. Now ask the question: what kind of woman would appreciate, or worse, be enamored with the fact that you've destroyed what you did about yourself?

Who is she that finally approves of you if you present a sacrificed version of yourself? Is she not, at worst, a vile and abominable collector of your soul enslaved to her parasitic whims, and at best somebody that simply is not worth it? Who in the entire world is so valuable that you'd not only sacrifice anywhere from a valuable part of yourself to your whole self, or even as shouted in popular parlance, "give the whole world and the moon and the stars" for?

Remember that love in the proper sense is a pure value response. Love is true if it is expressed with the highest honesty and baring of soul, that in no way abnegates itself but instead presents itself unabashedly with no apologies. Likewise, love is true if the object of love is itself unsacrificed, whole, and honest.

In an intimate relationship, love is of an unsacrificed person, by an unsacrificed person. The two are in an intimate relationship because they desire to be, and not to subordinate the other.

When it comes to love in the context of friendship, a true friendship likewise happens due to the desires of the individuals involved. If the friendship takes a turn in which one wants the other to be sacrificial in order to maintain the friendship, then this is toxic. A friendship is freely made, and both sides get something valuable out of it.

Even when it comes to the "love" that a man has of his car or his guitar, we can say the same. The owner of the car is not subordinated to it, but rather, the car is unabashedly a part of his life that he finds fulfillment in. Neither does he try to subordinate the car to himself – rather, he wants the car to be in the best condition as a car, as if it has its own identity. Likewise, the guitarist is not a slave to his instrument, but rather, the guitar is unabashedly a part of his very essence that he finds himself in. It is an extension of himself. Neither does he try to subordinate the guitar to himself.

Men find many such loves in his life. They are happy, mentally healthiest, and masculine with no apologies in this glorious embrace of these loves that are particular to him. This is precisely why must beware of women that profess to love men who have sacrificed those loves and have subordinated to her in the name of "commitment". When she derides these men as "boys who think they are men" in the vein of Tomi Lahren, she makes clear her intent to subordinate a given man to her parasitic whims.

Love is not subordination. In a relationship in which one subordinates the other, the subordinate sacrifices himself for the other. It's bad enough when this sort of toxic relationship is more obvious, but it should be more menacing to realize that this is the same kind of relationship that is often couched in veil of "romance", self-disposability as an upheld aspect of masculinity, gynocentric parasitism off of male altruism, and princesses' fantasies of Happily Ever After…all done with contented smiles.

It's time to make the case for non-sacrificial love more widespread and dislodge the notion that love is sacrifice. Any case made for love that involves the destructive offering of the self towards a twisted reaper of souls must be shown for what it is: despicable. Love is not sacrifice.

Title IX and college rape: a series of injustice part 3

April 26, 2023 | by Jessica Denis | Link | Original Link

This is Part 3 in a series outlining the horror stories caused by campus adjudication of sexual assault cases, the clear lack of due process as well as discrimination and civil rights issues. In Part 1, a wrongfully accused man proved his innocence, yet the college imposed sanctions that damaged his life anyway. In Part 2, a young dating couple's lives were disrupted for more than two years after someone else decided that she was raped and the university continued to harass them even after she filed her own Title IX action.

Betrayed by a school and crushed by the experience, John Doe is now living back at home trying to put together pieces of his life. He should be with his friends at San Diego State University, but after the unthinkable happened, that's just not the reality he is living in today.

During his freshman year, John Doe became close with a young woman on campus. According to court documents, in the spring of 2015 Jane Roe filed a complaint with the campus Title IX coordinator alleging that John Doe sexually assaulted her. She claimed she was too incapacitated to give consent after consuming edible marijuana. Four months went past between the date of the alleged incident and the date John Doe received a notice imposing his immediate suspension. At that time, just like established patterns in other cases described in the first two parts of this series, due process took a back seat. He was barred from campus, which included housing, and he lost all credit for courses as well as prepaid tuition. Jane Roe was never given any punishment for (also according to court documents) bringing her own marijuana to John Doe's room.

John Doe was notified about his disciplinary hearing, to determine if he sexually assaulted a woman, 14 days prior to the hearing. The hearing was grossly biased, and testimony that proved John Doe's innocence was tarnished by "severely prejudicial conduct," further described as:

> "Dr. Rovner presented a report from Petitioner's polygraph examination, revealing that Petitioner answered relevant questions truthfully, that Ms. Roe never said she needed a break from sex, and she never said she needed to pause or wanted to stop. Mr. Britt testified that the edible marijuana ingested by Ms. Roe could not begin to even take effect until 30 to 45 minutes after ingested, undermining her claim that she was incapacitated. During the hearing, however, Dr. [Lee] Mintz [director of the Center for Student Rights and Responsibilities at SDSU, who served as investigator and prosecutor] engaged in severely prejudicial conduct; she spent several minutes accusing Petitioner of impropriety, violating FERPA, and re-victimizing Ms. Roe — all before the hearing officer. Petitioner advised SDSU's counsel of Dr. Mintz's misbehavior and inappropriate conduct; however, it is unclear whether SDSU undertook any ameliorative actions."

John Doe was found “responsible” with no information on how to appeal or what his options were, only to find out later that “only a complainant has the right to an appeal.” He was not only permanently expelled, but also banned from any California state school.

He has since filed to have the expulsion removed from his record so that he can attend another school, hoping to move forward.

Edward was one of the “lucky” ones. He explained to me his experience after a young woman he had been dating felt that he may have cheated on her. She accused him of harassment and sexual assault.

Neither the police nor the school found any preponderance of guilt or responsibility, but that didn’t change the fact that a drawn-out three-month process took place. “It was the darkest time in my life,” he told me, saying the entire campus knew about the allegations. He said the looks he received from other students were devastating. He filed a complaint with the school against the woman for filing a false complaint, but instead of the school investigating, it told him he needed to just worry about graduating and put this all behind him. In 2014, he filed a Title IX complaint against the school. His complaint has been accepted by the Office for Civil Rights and he is still waiting for a determination from them. He has since graduated and is thinking about going to law school. He also lobbies Congress for change. He believes the 2011 “Dear Colleague” letter should be rescinded.

I also spoke with one mother who described to me the hell her son was put through after being another one of the “lucky” ones found not responsible. Post-traumatic stress disorder, anxiety, depression, and a 20-month wait on the OCR to respond to the complaint. Once the OCR finally did respond, the answer was “you are too late.”

On July 1, a letter was sent by 31 senators to the Department of Education and the Department of Justice describing the absolute fundamental breakdown of follow-through on behalf of colleges. The letter states that out of nearly 11,600 colleges nationwide, in 2014 only 9 percent reported any occurrences of sexual assault. How can 91 percent colleges claim that zero instances of sexual assault happened when we see every single day the number of Title IX complaints with an originating incident of sexual assault going up? To further that, how many actual Title IX lawsuits have been filed due to the absolute failing of the system? Due process has been stripped, unfair sanctions have been imposed that alter people’s lives, and many people are living with the side effects of the colleges’ misguided actions.

Who knows where the numbers actually are. How are we supposed to decipher the information through all of the bureaucracy dressed up as concern for our kids? As the senators wrote:

> “These directly conflict with the DOJ and CDC data on sexual assault, and strongly suggest that schools are either not taking the reporting obligation seriously or are not creating an environment where students feel comfortable coming forward to report and are vastly underreporting these crimes.”

Who do the colleges think they are fooling by reporting zero incidents of sexual assault

when the legal documents exist? The reports have been made to the OCR and lawsuits have been filed. The president and vice president say they “won’t visit any school who isn’t reporting properly.” So what? Instead, they might cut federal funding for such schools. That would get their attention.

Allowing colleges to adjudicate these cases — without any formal process that ensures everyone’s rights, or procedures to make sure due process is left intact — makes no sense. Colleges should be stopped from inflicting so much pain on students and their families.

We’re the radicals now

April 26, 2023 | by Andy Thomas | Link | Original Link

I groan inwardly whenever somebody pushes a book at me, and insists: “You must read this!”

The thing is, after reading Steve Moxon’s “The Woman Racket”, I was smashed as a going human concern. It isn’t healthy to keep focusing on “the problem” without sight of “the solution”, and I now feel a little reluctant to expose myself to further crushing analysis of how bad “the problem” is.

With that in mind, I’d like to introduce a particular book, and urge you to read this! But trust me; this one speaks of the “the solution”, rather than “the problem”.

Rules for Radicals, by Saul D. Alinsky, was first published in 1972. Having been extensively used as activist handbook by various left-wing and environmental groups, the impact of this book has been far reaching, although many outside political and PR circles may not have heard of it. Unsurprisingly, perhaps, the sheer bloody effectiveness of Alinsky’s counsel has made him an unpopular figure to those on the Right.

Alinsky began his professional life as an organiser for the Congress of Industrial Relations in the US. What he learned about union strategies in industrial disputes, he applied later in his work as a community organiser in the black ghettoes of Chicago and Oakland. Shortly before his death in 1972, he distilled his experiences and insights into a relatively short and accessible book. While not quite a step-by-step instruction manual, Rules for Radicals provides inspiration and, more usefully, strategy and tactics for anyone involved in direct, but non-violent, activism.

The opening page of the book begins…

> “What follows is for those who want to change the world from what it is to what they believe it should be.”

Alinsky goes on to present a distinctly Marxist approach that is rooted in a world-view of perpetual conflict between the “Haves” and the “Have-Nots” of life. The book’s overriding purpose is to empower the Have-Nots, and when I first read it, I was struck by its potential applicability to our own struggle. For example, when contemplating injustice and the often perplexing lack of male response to egregious attacks upon their identity and human worth, I am often reminded of some of Alinsky’s observations, including these two:

> “…if people feel they don’t have power to change a bad situation, then they do not think about it.”

And:

For anyone who has attempted to communicate the male human rights issue to those who prefer to turn away, these sentiments must feel rather apt.

I grew up in a working town in the time of its transition from a centre of coal mining and manufacturing to one of unemployment and welfare dependency. My father was a union representative who stood in picket lines as they were charged by police (or as he claims, by soldiers in police uniforms without identity numbers). While my early memories of politics were coloured by TV news of "Militant", the extreme wing of the labour party in the 1980s, I sometimes wonder if I had been a young man in the early 20th century, would I have been an active member in the British Labour Movement back then? I also contemplate the parallel between that thought and the here and now of the early 21st century — a time in which I have somehow found myself to be a member of the Men's Human Rights Movement. It seems that I have always been a bit of a radical, and somewhat unfashionable.

This is the thing — the landscape in which we live out our lives has always been in flux. Our universe is one of perpetual change and conflict between opposing forces. Perhaps the single attribute that has made Marxism so enduring is that, by teaching its followers to view life through a prism of eternal conflict, it embraces change.

As described by Alinsky, the Haves of life fear change because they have nowhere to go but down. Whereas life's Have-Nots, with nowhere to go but up, have no such fear. If we see his words in the context of own movement as being a harbinger of change, I think he describes our experiences rather well:

> "Religious, economic, social, political, and legal tracts endlessly attack all revolutionary ideas and action for change as immoral, fallacious and against God, country, and mother. These literary sedations by the status quo include the threat that, since all such movements are unpatriotic, subversive, spawned in hell and reptilian in their creeping insidiousness, dire punishments will be meted out to their supporters. All great revolutions, including Christianity, the various reformations, democracy, capitalism, and socialism, have suffered these epithets in the times of their birth."

Today's feminist revolutionaries may think they are radical, but they are nothing of the sort — they are simply fashionable. They represent more of the same; it is we who represent meaningful change.

Because effective organisation of people is essential to bring about change, the key player in Rules for Radicals is what Alinsky refers to as "the organiser". An organiser is not so much a local leader, but more a creative thinker who's initial task is to "stir up dissatisfaction and discontent", and to "provide a channel into which the people can angrily pour their frustrations." The organiser's job description does not, in fact, appear to be a particularly appealing one, especially in the early days, as Alinsky explains:

> "In the early days the organizer moves out front in any situation of risk > where the power of the establishment can get someone's job, call in an overdue payment, or any other form of retaliation, partly because these dangers would cause many local people to back off from conflict. Here the organizer serves as a protective shield: if anything goes wrong it is all his fault, he has the responsibility. If they are successful all credit goes to the local people."

And:

> "The job of the organizer is to maneuver and bait the establishment so that it will publicly attack him as a "dangerous enemy."

Nevertheless, reward comes if the organiser is successful…

> "The organizer's job is to begin to build confidence and hope in the idea of organization and thus in the people themselves: to win limited victories, each which will build confidence and the feeling that 'if we can do so much with what we have now just think what we will be able to do when we get big and strong.'"

However, I do wonder if Alinsky saw the construction of mass power organisations more of an end in its own right, rather than simply a means to advance a just cause. He, himself, says:

> "One of the great problems in the beginning of an organization is, often, that the people do not know what they want."

Thus, one of the key roles of the organiser is help the people to know what they want by identifying the "enemy" for them. Or, as he puts things:

> "Before men can act an issue must be polarized. Men will act only when they are convinced that their cause is 100 per cent on the side of the angels and that the opposition are 100 per cent on the side of the devil."

Many of us in the Men's Human Rights Movement, myself included, have no previous background in activism, protest or social politics. Most of us have started out from nowhere and are here simply because we have woken up to the tide of injustice that threatens to engulf us. But what to do? How often have we seen wounded men on forums complain bitterly of injustice, as if simply talking about the problem is actually doing something about the problem? Nobody is going to read their comments, recognise their plight, and put things right for them.

Nobody is coming to save them.

Endless rhetorical debate about "the problem", without reference to "the solution", is nothing other than emotional masturbation. What I am suggesting to anyone who might consider themselves an activist is that a good place to go for inspiration would be Alinsky specifically because he counsels on how to be a “realistic radical”, rather than a “rhetorical one”.

I warn, however, that with Rules for Radicals there also comes a sickening awareness of how its tactics have been deployed against the men and boys from the 1960s onwards, and I found the sheer bloody cynicism of it all overwhelming. As I turned its pages, it dawned on me that the entire male gender had, in effect, been identified as “the enemy” in order to “polarize the issue” and, thus, create conflict were none existed previously.

You see, back in the 1960s, those subscribing to Marxist ideology had a problem — the lives of the working classes were being transformed by higher wages and property ownership, and the old Marxist model of an oppressed proletariat and a wealthy bourgeoisie was in danger of breaking down. A possible solution, at least to some women on the left, was to re-purpose Marxist theory in the context of a gender war rather than a conflict between social classes defined by property ownership. The players were thus changed, but game went on. In fact, patriarchy theory was never anything other than a pseudo-scientific construct manufactured by Kate Millet and her ilk to give a veneer of credibility to the idea that men and women were, and have always been, at war with each other.

In the hour when I first understood, the sense of betrayal was profound.

Nevertheless, it proves nothing if not how Marxist thinking embraces change. The irony now, of course, is that it is men and boys who are the Have-Nots of western society, both in terms of social empowerment and wealth ownership. However, I’m not so sure that I would go as far as to claim that all women represent the Haves. Instead, I would argue that feminism has not universally benefited women at all, especially when you start to consider the hidden implications for them (a modest home in the UK now requires two full-time incomes to pay the mortgage). However, there are a subset of women with disproportionate influence who have been feminism’s prime benefactors — they are the feminist academics and public sector elite — the bourgeoisie of our age.

Times have changed since Alinsky’s penned his influential work, and some of the more hands-on tactics he suggests may not be so appropriate today. For example, one particularly delightful tactic is, what he lovingly refers to as, a “shit-in” (as opposed to a “sit-in”). This is where a handful of protesters occupy all available toilet cubicles at crowded public event and absolutely refuse to come out. The resulting distress of the crowd is a great cause of mayhem, apparently.

The sky turns darker, however, when Alinksy tackles ethics and how “the end justifies the use of almost any means.” On this issue, I can’t help but wonder whether his use of the word “almost” was a conscious addition to keep his book on the right-side of the line that separates riot from direct action. I doubt he cared that much for the distinction himself and, because of this, I think that we in the Men’s Human Rights Movement would do well to remember the following instead:

> “He who fights with monsters might take care lest he thereby become a monster.”* – Friedrich Nietzsche

I recommend Alinsky, not for ethical guidance, but for pragmatic inspiration. His book is, after all, mostly about communication, strategy and tactics. It's also a book about change — not only how to effect change, but how to live with and thrive in a climate of change. In the end, we must follow our own moral compass. It is our prerogative to take from Rules for Radicals what we find useful, and disregard what we find unacceptable.

Human society has rested on the back of male disposability ever since the time of *Lucy, and what we in the Men's Human Rights Movement represent is the beginning of the end of that and the start of a new era for our species. We are not just radical, we are in every sense the most radical thinking movement in the history of human society.

Notes. Summary of Alinsky's Tactics

- Power is not only what you have, but what the enemy thinks you have;
- Never go outside the expertise of your people;
- Whenever possible, go outside the expertise of the enemy;
- Make the enemy live up to its own book of rules;
- Ridicule is man's most potent weapon;
- A good tactic is one your people enjoy;
- A tactic that drags on too long becomes a drag;
- Keep the pressure on. Never let up;
- The threat is usually more terrifying than the thing itself;
- The major premise for tactics is the development of operations that will maintain a constant pressure upon the opposition;
- If you push a negative hard enough, it will push through and become a positive;
- The price of a successful attack is a constructive alternative;
- Pick the target, freeze it, personalize it, and polarize it.

Feminism and the collapsing middle class

April 27, 2023 | by Kalan Chinuck | Link | Original Link

Elizabeth Warren is an outspoken Democratic Senator from Massachusetts formerly occupied teaching and researching commercial law and bankruptcy. In a 2007 lecture entitled The Coming Collapse of the Middle Class, Warren provided a detailed look at the newly dysfunctional reality of life for those who comprise the meat in America's class sandwich. Today's social, political and economic landscape reflects the trends she presciently identified which continue to bear their bitter fruit, that of a downward financial and aspirational spiral for families, for America, and in all likelihood for much of Western civilization.

Warren herself avoided any serious discussion of root causes, largely limiting her discussion to economic and class issues, but the interrelated impacts of feminism, no-fault (read male-fault) divorce and the steady move by women into the work force are obvious throughout her narrative.

The image of heavily indebted consumers racking up their credit cards with unpayable debt while splurging foolishly on iPads, Nikes and Cadillacs is a popular one, but inaccurate, according to Warren. Her research, using inflation-adjusted figures, compared costs for a traditional family (mom, dad, two kids) in 1971 to that same family in 2003.

Surprisingly, food, appliances, baby food, clothing, cigarettes, furniture and per-car expenses dropped, some by significant amounts, when considered as a proportion of household income. Electronics, dog food and liquor went up, but not significantly. The real increase in costs for families occurred in the five largest areas of consumer spending, items which are mandatory fixed costs for any family. These are housing (the McMansion effect was not a factor), health, child care, taxes (due to high marginal rates on the second income) and cars (costs per car decreased, but the number of cars per family increased out of necessity).

These fixed costs rose from 50% of household income in 1971 to 75% in 2003. The modern family also had much greater (almost double) income volatility due to greatly increased odds of job loss, catastrophically expensive health issues, and divorce.

With respect to bankruptcy and the subsequent slide into the lower class, a single male with no children was least likely to go belly up, followed closely by childless single females and married couples – all hover around the 7 per 1000 rate. When children were involved, married couples faced double that rate, while single moms bankrupted at a rate of 23 per 1000 (there weren't enough single dads in her data to form a statistically valid sample). Fifty percent of bankrupts have endured two of the big three predictors (job loss, health issue, divorce), and 20% have experienced all three.

Warren also provides significant data which shows that the costs for parents of launching their own descendants into the middle class have increased significantly through erosion of the safety net and through the transfer of costs. For example, 12 years of taxpayer-funded schooling formerly was sufficient, while at present a college degree and pre-school are mandatory, meaning 1/3 of the necessary educational cost (for those aspiring to the middle class) is a new financial responsibility for parents. Ditto the health care system, which, in addition to shifting costs away from taxpayers onto immediate family, has also become a generator of reduced income.

It's important to note that the greatest impacts of the above shifts have been on the traditional married two-parent two-child family. Other forms of the family and individuals have experienced these shifts as well, but to a lesser extent.

In his lecture on The Collapse of Complex Societies, Dr. Joseph Tainter describes the process whereby societies solve problems through complex solutions (because it works), until the point is reached where the cumulative expense of maintaining all extant solutions overwhelms the nation's ability to pay for them. This mechanism includes the diminishing returns on research (i.e., the ability to devise and implement new solutions) which become prevalent as the low-hanging fruit is plucked, as well as the ever-increasing military costs and currency devaluations which accompany the need to maintain the empire and pay for more and more solutions.

Sevareid's Law, which states that "the chief source of problems is solutions" encapsulates Tainter's work in a pithy nutshell. Senator Warren's research provides an inadvertent glimpse into this virtuous spiral – 'solving' the problems of feminists through female 'empowerment' and the break-down of the family has helped create greater problems which necessitate more complex and less effective solutions which in turn will create further problems and an outcry for yet more solutions. Such a cycle involves ever-escalating complexity and cost, and reiterates up to the point of societal break-down. The explosion of government 'services' such as VAWA, ObamaCare and SNAP, not to mention America's military budget, currently provide classic examples, and there will undoubtedly be more to come.

Perhaps the most important comment offered by Dr. Tainter is that efforts to solve problems, while ultimately leading to destruction, often are ethical and desirable. He points out that the Roman Empire would have collapsed much sooner had its rulers (most notably Diocletian) not taken steps to create complex solutions. (An interesting aside here: the only examples of sustainable, stable societies seem to be prehistoric, so, is a sustainable complex society possible?)

In that sense, it is clear a genuine concern for the well-being of women and a desire to solve their problems, real or not, provided an impetus for some of the solutions currently in place, and will almost certainly profoundly influence the next cycle of solutions. It's worth wondering what those solutions will be, but even more so to contemplate what problems they might bring.

American woman and her dutiful husband — Observations by Max O'Rell 1903

The following essay on the status of American women was published in the year 1903 by culture critic Max O'Rell. – PW

THE AMERICAN WOMAN—I

A new coat-of-arms for America—The American woman—Her ways—The liberty she enjoys—'Oh, please make me an American woman!'

If I were asked to suggest a new coat-of-arms for the United States of America, I would propose a beautiful, bright, intelligent-looking woman, under the protection of an eagle spreading its wings over her, with the motto: Place aux Dames—'Honour to the Ladies'; or, if you prefer a freer translation, 'Make room for the Women.'

The Government of the American people is not a republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country.

It has often been said that a wife is what a husband makes her. I believe that the women of a nation are what the men of that nation make them. Therefore, honour to the men of the United States for having produced that modern national ideal — the American woman.

I have been six times all over the United States. I have spent about three years of my life in America, travelling from New York to San Francisco, from British Columbia to Louisiana. If there is an impression that becomes a deeper and deeper conviction every time that I return to that country, it is that the most interesting woman in the world is the American woman.

Now, let us compare her with the women of Europe. The English woman, when beautiful, is an ideal symphony, an incomparable statue, but too often a statue. The French woman is the embodiment of suppleness and gracefulness, more fascinating by her manner than by either her face or figure.

The Roman woman, with her gorgeous development, suggests the descendant of the proud mother of the Gracchi. The American woman is a combination, an ensemble.

I have never seen in America an absolutely, helplessly plain woman. She is always in the possession of a redeeming 'something' which saves her. She may be ever so homely (as the Americans say), she looks intelligent, a creature that has been allowed to think for herself, that has never been sat upon. And I know no sight more pleasing than an elderly American woman, with her white hair, that makes her look like a Louis XV. marquise, and an expression which reflects the respect she has inspired during a well and usefully spent life.

When women were born, a fairy attended the birth of every one of them. Each woman received a special gift. The American woman arriving late, the fairies gathered together and decided to make her a present of part of all the attributes conferred on all the other women. The result is that she has the smartness and the bright look of a French woman, and the shapely, sculptural lines of an English woman. Ah! but, added to that, she has a characteristic trait peculiarly her own, an utter absence of affectation, a naturalness of bearing which makes her unique, a national type. There is not in the world a woman to match her in a drawing-room. There she stands, among the women of all nationalities, a silhouette bien découpée, herself, a queen.

Allowed from the tenderest age almost every liberty, accustomed to take the others, she is free, easy, perfectly natural, with the consciousness of her influence, her power; able by her intelligence and education to enjoy all the intellectual pleasures of life, and by her keen powers of observation and her native adaptability to fit herself for all the conditions of life; an exquisite mixture of a coquette without affectation and a blue-stocking without spectacles or priggishness; the only woman, however beautiful and learned she may be, with whom man feels perfectly at his ease—a sort of fascinating good fellow, retaining all the best attributes of womanhood.

Now, if this should sound like an outburst of enthusiasm, please excuse me. I owe to American women such pleasant, never-to-be-forgotten hours that on merely hearing the mention of the American woman I take off my hat.

Of all the women in the world, the American woman is the one who receives the best attentions at the hands of men. The Frenchman, it is true, is the slave of his womankind, but he expects her to be his thorough partner—I mean, to share with him his labours as well as his pleasures. The American man is the most devoted and hard-working husband in the world. The poor, dear fellow! He works, and he works, and he works, and the beads of perspiration from his brow crystallize in the shape of diamonds all over the ears, the fingers and the neck of his interesting womankind.

He invites her to share his pleasures, but he saves her the trouble of sharing his anxieties. The burden of life from seven in the morning till seven in the evening rests on his shoulders alone.

Yet, in spite of all this, I have seldom discovered in American women the slightest trace of gratitude to men. The American woman expects a triumphal arch to be erected over each doorway through which she has to pass—and she gets it.

Well, she deserves it.

Almost throughout the length and breadth of the United States, you hear of women seeking to extend the sphere of their influence, women dissatisfied with their lot. But there is no satisfying spoiled children. If they see the moon reflected in a pail of water, they must have it.

I am perfectly convinced that the American woman has secured for herself the best, the softest berth that it was possible to secure in this world.

Let me finish by repeating an exclamation I uttered after my first visit to the United States, twelve years ago: ‘If I could choose my sex and my birthplace, I would shout to the Almighty at the top of my voice: “Oh, please make me an American woman!”’

THE AMERICAN WOMAN—II

She walks first, Jonathan behind her—The educational system of America explains the idiosyncrasies of the American woman.

The first time that I was in America, some twelve years ago, I one day mentioned to a newspaper reporter that I could not find a cup of tea to please me anywhere in America. The next day a paragraph about me appeared in the paper, headed, ‘Max is going to abuse everything in America.’

A few days later I had an opportunity to mention to another reporter that, however bad meals were in some hotels in the small cities, I could everywhere get a cup of coffee quite as good as in France, if not even better. The next day a paragraph appeared headed: ‘Max wants our dollars.’

I have many times lectured in the United States on women, including a sketch on American women. After the lecture I have generally been introduced to some ladies of the audience, who kindly expressed the desire of shaking hands with me.

Almost every time one or two have taken me aside, and said: ‘I have read in your books and your magazine articles and heard in your lectures all you have to say about American women; but now, tell me, what do you really think of them?’

My dear ladies, there are some men who do occasionally speak the truth, or what they believe to be the truth, and who do say what they mean, and mean what they say.

The English, long ago, warned me that I would not be able to do in America what I had successfully done in England, because the Americans, they said to me, were much more susceptible and sensitive than the English. They were mistaken.

No doubt the Americans had resented, and justly, too, the criticisms of Trollope and Dickens (the latter had to write a permanent apology in the preface of ‘Martin Chuzzlewit’). Criticism that never offends, and praises that never flatter, are, I believe, everywhere acceptable when they are taken in the spirit of fairness and good-humour in which they are expressed. I believe, and firmly believe, the American women to be the most interesting and the most brilliant women in the world, and I do not see why I could not proclaim it from the house-tops if I like, even in America.

They are picturesque, vivacious, natural, stylish, smart, clever, unconventional, and the best educated. They are typical, perfectly labelled.

Take me to a drawing-room in Paris or in London, and, without being introduced to anyone, I think I should be able to pick out all the American women in the room.

Once, after a lecture in England, I received the card of a young American lady who wished to speak to me. She came and brought in her mother, and also a man, who all the time stood in the rear. When we parted, she left, followed by her mother. Then I discovered the man, who said to me most meekly, ‘I’m the father.’ Poor dear man! he looked so small as he emerged from the background!

I cannot help thinking that there exists in some American women a little mild contempt for that poor creature that is called a man.

And how is that in a country where the women receive such delightful, and, for that matter, well-deserved attentions at the hands of the men, and that throughout the length and breadth of the country?

Well, I think the educational system of America explains the phenomenon.

In Europe the sexes are kept apart in youth—I mean at school, and, in France especially, young boys and young girls entertain for one another very strange feelings, most of them founded on ignorance.

In Europe even now the education received by girls cannot be compared to the education received by boys. That's being changed now—some say improved. H'm! we shall see.

It was not a long time ago that, in England and in France, when a girl could read, write, add, and subtract, name the capitals of Europe, and play 'The Maiden's Prayer' on the piano, her education was finished; she was prepared for the world and ready for her husband—and her neighbours.

Very often I have been invited to be present at the distribution of prizes in large English public schools and colleges. When I was in a girls' school, I never once failed to hear those poor girls told, and by men, too, that practically the only thing they should think about was to prepare to become one day good wives and good mothers.

I have been many times present at the distribution of prizes in boys' schools in England, and I know that I never heard those boys told that now and then they might think of preparing to become one day decent fathers and tolerable husbands.

In America things are different. In every grade of educational life, among the masses of the people, boys and girls are educated together, side by side; on each bench a boy, a girl, a boy, a girl.

Now, the official statistics of the Education Department declare that in every State of the Union the number of diplomas and certificates obtained by girls is larger than the number obtained by boys.

When I heard that statement, I said this to myself (kindly follow my little argument): 'Is it not just possible that the young American boys, when they saw what those girls next to them could do, said to themselves, "Heaven! who would have thought so?"'

Is it not also possible that the young American girls, when they saw what those boys next to them could do, exclaimed, 'Good gracious! is that all?'

Does not that, to a certain extent, explain to you the respect that young boys acquire at school for young girls, and perhaps, also, that little mild absence of respect that girls get for boys? I believe there is something in it.

Ah, my dear European men, who clamour at the top of your voices for the higher education of women, be careful! You will be found out, and, like your fellow-men of America, by-and-by you will have to take the back-seat.

THE AMERICAN WOMAN—III

Opinions and impressions — An answer to criticism.

Whenever I read a testimonial given to a candidate for some vacant post, I invariably take it for granted that the candidate does not possess the virtues, attainments, or qualities which are not mentioned in that testimonial.

This must have evidently been what that clever American writer, Mrs. Winifred Black, thought when she read an article of mine on American women which appeared in the Editorial section of the New York Sunday Journal some time ago. My admiration for American women is, I think, pretty well known to the public, but more particularly to my most intimate friends. In that article I said: ‘I firmly believe the American women to be the most fascinating, the most interesting, and the most brilliant women in the world; and I do not see why I could not proclaim it from the housetops, if I like, even in America.’ And after mentioning the respect which woman inspires in American men of all classes, the liberty she enjoys, the attentions that are lavished upon her, I concluded the article by exclaiming: ‘If I could choose again my sex and my birthplace, I would shout to the Almighty at the top of my voice: “Oh, please make me an American woman!”‘

‘Now,’ exclaims Mrs. Winifred Black, ‘look between the words of that cleverly constructed sentence, and he who runs may read that Max O’Rell means to say in the still small voice of his innermost convictions: “Make me anything on earth except an American man!”‘

‘And,’ she goes on, ‘our friend is covering himself with well-earned glory, telling us all about the American woman. “She is beautiful, clever, adored, a queen”; but he does not mention that she is good, honest, true, unselfish, loving. Not a syllable about her heart and her soul. Do you know why? Because Max O’Rell thinks that the American woman has neither heart nor soul.’

Oh, oh! my dear lady, how quickly you set to work and jump at conclusions!

Mrs. Winifred Black evidently believes that when I propose the toast, ‘The American ladies—God bless them!’ I whisper under my breath all the time: ‘The gentlemen—God help them!’

Now, madam, let me tell you that this is witty, smart, but not fair criticism. If I ever should have the honour of being introduced to you, I would say to you: ‘When a foreigner attempts to describe the character of the people he visits, he either receives impressions, if he keeps his eyes fairly well open, or he forms opinions, if he resides in that country for a long time or happens to be a born conceited idiot. Impressions are not opinions. Impressions mean nothing more than this: how a nation strikes a foreigner who pays a short visit to it. You see a town for a day, you meet a person for ten minutes. That town, that person, has left an impression on you, but you hold no opinion on either.

I know a charming little book on Denmark, honestly entitled by its author, ‘A Week in Denmark.’ Now, surely you would not expect to find in such a book a study of the institutions of Denmark or opinions on the idiosyncrasies of the Danish people. You would not expect the writer to tell you whether the Danish women have or have not a heart and a soul. No, you would expect to find an impression such as the following, which I find in that delightful, chatty, and unpretentious little volume: ‘The Danish women wear the national colours of France—blue eyes, white complexion, and red lips.’ I have been six times in the United States. I have seen the whole continent from New York to San Francisco, from British Columbia to Louisiana, but all the time I have been on the move, seldom spending two days in the same town. How could I form opinions worth repeating?

The qualities which, for instance, I may have discovered in American women are superficial ones—I mean outward ones, those that would be noticed by the casual visitor—brilliancy, conversational power, beautiful figures, attractive, intelligent faces, smartness in dress, gait, and carriage. To get at their hearts and their souls, I should have to settle in the country, and for years and years live among the people.

THE HUSBAND OF THE AMERICAN WOMAN

The telephone and the ticker—The most useful of domestic animals—Money-making—Loneliness of the women—A reminiscence of Chicago.

On the whole, I believe that there is no country where men and women go through life together on such equal terms as in France. The wife follows her husband everywhere; she is the companion of his pleasures as well as of his hardships. She works with him, takes her vacation with him, and when they have amassed a little fortune that insures independence, they knock off work together and enjoy life quietly for the rest of their days. In business, the wife is the clerk of her husband, often his cashier, always his partner. She is consulted by him in the investment of their savings. It is a little firm—Monsieur, Madame and Co.

In England, the wife does not share the hardships of her husband, and not always his pleasures. She is seldom consulted in important matters.

What often astonishes us in Europe is to see a crowd of handsome and clever women, whom America sends to brighten up society, and who reappear in London and Paris every year with the regularity of the swallows. The London season, from the beginning of May to July 25, the Paris season, from the beginning of April to June 10, are absolutely run by them. You meet them everywhere, at dinner-parties, ‘At Homes,’ and the play. You conclude that they must be married, because they are styled Mrs. and not Miss, but whether they are wives, widows, or divorcées, you rarely think of inquiring, and you go on enjoying their society, even their friendship, year after year, without knowing whether there exists, somewhere in America, a Mr. So-and-so or not.

It was in America only, on calling on my lady friends whose acquaintance I had made in Europe, that I discovered the existence of their husbands. I found them very much alive, having for the companions of their joys and sorrows the telephone and the ticker.

Now, an impression (not an opinion, much less a conviction) to be formed from all this is that the American woman, with all her physical beauty and intellectual attainments, is not always a woman whose characteristic traits are devotion, unselfishness, and self-sacrifice. But it is not her fault if this should be the case, and I have no reason to suppose that it is. In a community, woman is what man makes her. So long as men’s first consideration is business and money-making, so long as they consider clubs the proper place to seek relief in from the pursuits and hardships of everyday life, so long as wives are practically left to themselves to make the best of the long leisures of the day, the women will study how best they can arrange for themselves a life of comfort, ease and pleasure.

Is there any other country where you will find women able to enjoy life without the companionship of men? They have come to an understanding among themselves. They will have lunch, dinner-parties, where no male guest will be seen, and they will have a grand time. They try to please each other, and an American woman will use as much coquetry to win a woman as a French woman will use to win a man. Is there any other country where you see so many women's clubs?

Women's clubs? The idea!

Yet that American woman has male friends. She is a delightful chum and good fellow, the only woman in the world who can have such male friends, 'pals' without the least misconstruction, the least objectionable whisperings on the subject. She calls those male friends by their Christian names in speaking of them, although she invariably mentions her husband as Mr. John B. Smith.

The American men are the most devoted of husbands, but they are not under the influence of their women. They indulge them in all their whims and luxuries, but their status in life is to be their women's husbands—I will not say upper servants, but domestic animals, not pets, of undeniable usefulness, who work at the sweat of their brows to keep in luxury the most lovely, interesting and expensive womankind in the world.

Some years ago, I was spending a Sunday afternoon in the house of a young married man in Chicago who, I was told, possessed twenty millions. The poor fellow! It was the twenty millions which possessed him. He had a most beautiful and interesting wife, and the loveliest little girl of three or four years of age that I ever set my eyes on. That lovely little girl was kind enough to take to me at once—there's no accounting for taste! We had a little flirtation in the distance at first. By-and-by, she came toward me, nearer and nearer, then she stopped in front of me, and looked at me, hesitating, with her finger in her pretty little mouth. I knew what she wanted, and I said to her: 'That's all right; come on.' She jumped on my knees, settled herself comfortably and asked me to tell her stories. I started at once. Now, you understand, I was not allowed to stop; but I took breath, and I said to her:

'Does not your papa tell you long stories on Sundays?'

That lovely little round face grew sad and quite long.

'Oh no,' she said; 'papa is too tired on Sundays.'

A few weeks after I left Chicago that man was taken ill with a disease not uncommon in America, a disease that starts at the top of your head and takes two or three years to kill you in a lunatic asylum, among drivelling idiots and imbeciles.

A couple of years later, being in Chicago again, I made inquiries and learned that the poor fellow was expected to exist a few weeks, perhaps a few months longer.

What a pity, I thought, that beautiful woman had not enough influence over that good man to stop him!

Do not offer me twenty millions at that price. No twenty millions can cure the disease which afflicted that American.

Put a little girl of three on my knees on Sundays, and I will tell her stories from sunrise and go on till sunset, even if I thus run the risk of being prosecuted by the Lord’s Day Observance Society.

Are men at fault for childless women?

The Daily Mail is forwarding the narrative in its ”Femail” section that it is somehow the fault of men that some women end up being childless while women just get to that state through no fault of their own.

Feminism and Romance Literature

April 29, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

According to a recent poll only 18% of U.S. people consider themselves feminist.[1] On that account we can expect readers of romance novels to comprise not more than 18% feminists, and likely far less due to the fact that feminists disparage traditional approaches to romance.... at least according to their rhetoric.

A more generous National Geographic/Ipsos survey[2] of more than 1,000 American women found that 29% of respondents identified as feminists. From the study its worth noting, as an aside, the political spread among feminist women, with Republicans scoring low in feminist self-identification, Democrats scoring high, and Independents somewhere in the middle:

In line with these surveys, we can assume that women who identify as feminist represent less than one third of all women in the USA. With this fact in mind, imagine my surprise when I recently discovered that a whopping 60% of readers of romance novels are feminist, which means that almost two thirds of romantic love enthusiasts are…. feminists! This finding is from a survey of 800 people, which discovered the following details about the average romance reader:[3]

Author of the survey summarised the question and answers in the following way:

> "In the survey of romance readers, I asked if one identified as feminist, believed in equality but wouldn't use the term feminist – or, not at all. 61% of respondents replied in the affirmative to the first option. While many commentators expressed their ire at the believe-in-equality-but-wouldn't-use-the-term-feminist option, 35% selected this. Just 3% said not at all ("The third option makes me cry," one self declared feminist wrote).
> The more I read from both sides, the more I realized that we're more alike than we let on. Whether you call it chivalry or manners, we all want someone to open the door for us."[3]

Her last sentence proposes a rationale of (the high number of) feminist readers of romance novels: that they still want doors opened for them, whether actual doors, or doors into better jobs, boardrooms and other kinds of feminist power that are gifted to them by the actions of chivalric men. This point about feminist rationale was confirmed in a study by Gul & Kupfer[4] which discovered that feminists felt the positive sides of benevolent sexism outweighed the negatives even if they believed it was somewhat patronising.

Many feminists believe that romantic love is a subversive trope, a positive one that works to increase the power of women relative to men. Elizabeth Reid Boyd, of the School of Psychology and Social Science at Edith Cowan University, and Director of the Centre for Research for Women in Western Australia with more than a decade as a feminist researcher and teacher of women's studies, tells:

> "I muse upon arguments that romance is a form of feminism. Going back to its history in the Middle Ages and its invention by noblewomen who created the notion of courtly love, examining its contemporary popular explosion and the concurrent rise of popular romance studies in the academy that has emerged in the wake of women's studies, and positing an empowering female future for the genre, I propose that reading and writing romantic fiction is not only personal escapism, but also political activism.
> Romance has a feminist past that belies its ostensible frivolity. Romance, as most true romantics know, began in medieval times. The word originally referred to the language romanz, linked to the French, Italian and Spanish languages in which love stories, songs and ballads were written. Stories, poems and songs written in this language were called romances to separate them from more serious literature – a distinction we still have today. Romances were popular and fashionable. Love songs and stories, like those of Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, were soon on the lips of troubadours and minstrels all over Europe. Romance spread rapidly. It has been called the first form of feminism (Putnam 1970).[4]

Readers of my writings are familiar with the idea that romantic love and feminism constitute a seamless tradition of gynocentrism that first began in the royal courts of Europe.[5] There have occurred transformations in the campaign strategies of feminists throughout the ensuing centuries, but the primary impulse remains consistent through each new generation of feminist activity: to increase the power of women via the institution of a 'sexual feudalism' – ie. the proposition that men should act as a quasi serving-class for women.

The following examples of romantic love in Victorian literature are excerpted from the book Male Masochism by Carol Siegal [6]. Notice the thematic continuity of this literature with the earlier sexual-relations contract first invented in Medieval Europe:

> "A great deal of what [Victorian] women's literary works had to say about gender relations may have been as disquieting as feminist political manifestos, and ironically so, in that the novels seem most anti-male in the very places where they most affirm a traditionally male vision of love. While women's lyric poetry tended to reverse the conventional gender roles in love by representing the female speaker as the lover instead of the object of love, women's fiction most frequently reproduced the images, so common in prior texts by men, of the self-abasing male lover and his exacting mistress.
> For example, in Wuthering Heights, Heathcliff declares himself Cathy's slave; in Jane Eyre, Rochester's desire for Jane is first inspired and then intensified by his physically dependent position; in Middlemarch, Will Ladislaw silently vows that Dorothea will always have him as her slave, his only claim to her love lies in how much he has suffered for her. In several Victorian novels by women, men must undergo quasi-ritualized humiliation or punishment before being judged deserving of their lady's attention. For instance, in Olive Schreiner's Story of an African Farm, the fair Lyndall condescends to treat her admirers tenderly after one has been horsewhipped and the other has dressed himself in women's clothes to wait on her. Although Victorian women's novels do explore the emotional insecurities of the heroines, their apparent self-possession is also stressed, in marked contrast to their lovers' displays of agony, desperation, and wounds."

The author goes on to say that male masochism and the dominatrix-like behavior of women in much literature is continuous with courtly love literature from the Middle Ages. And whilst some men self-consciously chose their lowly position in relation to women, the men described in Victorian women's novels lacked such volition and were helplessly controlled by the power of love and beauty:

> "These texts also insist that the true measure of male love is lack of volition. While the heroines make choices that define them morally, the heroes are helplessly compelled by love, and not judged to love unless they are helpless. In this respect Victorian women's fiction recovers the ethos so often expressed in medieval courtly romance that love must be "suffered as a destiny to be submitted to and not denied." It also departs from the conventions of medieval romance in describing the helpless submission to love as an attribute of true manliness, and thus Victorian women's fiction directly attacks the degeneration of chivalry into the self-conscious and controlled "gallantry" of eighteenth century libertines."

Just like their forebears, feminists constitute an army of women working to preserve and extend the tradition of elevated womanhood that has been championed over the last millennium, making the feminist project a remarkably traditional enterprise while putting a lie to its claim to be a forward looking, progressive movement.

The only question left to ask is how, exactly, can this tradition be most accurately characterised? Is it a philosophy, an ideology, human nature, or the slow cultural build-up of behaviorist techniques applied to heterosexual relationships? Its probably a little of all these things, but I'm going to follow the European tradition at the root of romantic love, which saw it primarily as a religion complete with its own guiding Goddess. Her name, as spoken in medieval Germany and through the centuries was Frau Minne.

I have published details about this Goddess before, so rather than rewriting the details I invite the reader to visit the article[7] and look further into the essential religiosity at the heart of our gynocentric cult. Furthermore, as recently stated by Alison Tieman, divinity has today become associated with every human woman, imparting to her the power of "I am a Goddess" in much the same way as once done to pharaohs or emperors, or divinised mortals, who became God-men in ancient times and received religious devotion due of a God. That is, half the human population has undergone an apotheosis, while the other half stand in awe and service.

The differences between a god-complex arising variously from a psychotic episode, in cases of extreme narcissism, or in a society that has seen fit to elevate an individual/s to God status is perhaps moot. These things more often appear together, in combinations. Whatever the causes, we are safe to conclude that feminism amounts today to a global religion, one as powerful as any that have gone before it, with women collectively representing the Godhead to an enthralled male audience.

A man presenting Frau Minne with his heart which has been stabbed by three arrows. (painted wood, Southern Germany, 1320-1330 ca.)

Questions for Feminists

April 30, 2023 | by Jason Sinclair | Link | Original Link

Winston Churchill said "Those who fail to learn from history are doomed to repeat it."

The human race has some very dark history. Certain groups have destroyed other groups for whatever ideological reason they can come up with. We lived in a world that saw slavery, murder, hatred because of a physical difference, a difference in the god or gods we may have believed in.

I was taught about a lot of these as a child in school. I was taught about fountains that were relegated to a person with a certain skin colour, or how hate allowed a nation to somehow allow the Genocide of a people who were set aside only by their beliefs. How a government decided that their were thoughts that were inappropriate for people to have and decided to burn any piece of literature on topics not approved.

I was taught these things because of that quote. When I learned about these things as a kid in school I couldn't believe people were ever so ignorant and hateful. I was a kid, I didn't understand how hate and fear can motivate people to do crazy and stupid things. How awful hateful things come from small acts that build over time.

Recently I have seen some disturbing reincarnations of the fear and hate. It's not genocide or murder. It is however a frightful and disturbing trend.

Feminists…

Have you ever worried about becoming the embodiment of what you hate? That you would end up being exclusionary and intolerant?

I ask you to look at your fellow feminists and the direction feminism is going. Take a look at the Feminists who decided it was a good idea to burn a book that didn't agree with their ideology, or the feminist who while shouting down a dissenting viewpoint held a sign that said 'I am expressing my right to free speech.' Or a group of feminists who decided that while they were completely justified in protesting and exercising that freedom of association, freedom of expression and the right to express their opinion on a topic in a public forum, while simultaneously excluding people who's only difference was biology. It didn't matter if they held the same opinion or not, They were not going to be tolerated simply due to a biological condition beyond their control.

Feminists, do you see the pattern? Do you see what you are becoming? I know many of you are saying "They aren't real feminists, they are misguided" If you truly believe that we are all equal then your beliefs and mine are aligned and all else aside we can have a meaningful dialogue and maybe, eventually come to an agreement. If you think the things above are a good way to get a message across to the world then I ask you to seriously take a look at our history. If you believe it was only because of men that these things ever happened at all, then I ask you to look at feminism in it's current state and think again.

So What is a Zeta Male Anyway?

May 2, 2023 | by Zeta Male | Link | Original Link

By now I am assuming you have all seen Paul's video on the basic premise of a "zeta male". Paul's video is vague, but a good foundation. Still, you can't help but ask – what the fuck is a Zeta Male?

Well, the term comes the designations in the male hierarchy; labels like alpha male and beta male. The interesting thing is that one does not essentially choose whether to be an alpha or a beta, but you do get the luxury to choose to be a zeta.

The idea of the alpha and beta male are based on observations of leaders and followers in society; who are the best of providers, and who come in second. You grow up through your life being taught what to do; who you provide for and how you accomplish that. You protect and practice chivalry, and the social constructs and institutional ideas of what men should be are handed to you without reason or explanation.

Before you realize it you have been molded into the man you are told to be, and you fall into a category. You may be caught somewhere in between, but on the odds you still lean more towards one designation or the other. In the end, from a critical eye, and an institutional one, you will be branded whether you like it or not. You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.

The problem with the idea of alpha and beta males is that the traits are partially based on superiority/inferiority and they are actually rather constricting and come with the standard restrictions of manhood (the inability to show emotions, you must raise a family, and be the breadwinner, etc). You are given a code of conduct, and how well you do determines your worth as a man, and as a human being. Traditionally speaking, you either played the game or you forfeit by default. There weren't many options, and even alpha males were stuck in their role.

> You have been given a status, for better or worse, based on how you adapted to your upbringing, and a bit of luck.

But no matter where you are, there is always a desire for freedom and change. Sometimes when there are few options, people tend to be happier, as they don't have the abundance of options, and never have to look back thinking, "I should have done X,Y, and Z instead…." But often, when there are no choices at all it brings a great deal of pain.

Especially when you see the alternative freedoms other people have. One of the few things feminism got right was the abundance of options that it gave to women. Now that men are starting to analyse all this more objectively, many are coming to a completely different view of their roles. When looking in comparison men have started to decide that how much life sucks as a man. Now, a growing number of men want options, too.

And so the Zeta Male begins to rise from the rubble of the shattered romatacizing of traditional masculinity. Zeta masculinity is more self taught and defiant toward traditional social structures.

Zeta theory tends to be the option of “abstain” from the game. You don’t forfeit, but you also aren’t playing. Zeta males have no intention of bending to the will of society for gender based purposes, and opt instead for self preservation. This is not an absence of morality or ethics, but rather breaking out.

> For the zeta, when he is told to do something because he is “the man,” his answer is a simple “No.”

Social expectations of both alphas and betas (being providers, chivalry, etc) are tossed aside, and we refuse to see ourselves as inferior because of it. We are doing what we want, taking our lives into our own hands. The traditional, institutional notions of masculinity will be at our mercy.

The traditional ideals of masculinity are going to be clay in our hands. Zeta male theory lets us mold the social institutions to our will. But first we have a different goal: to take it down. Or, if you prefer, to watch it collapse and fall under its own weight doing nothing to stop it.

Despite public opinion, gender roles are still highly institutionalized in society, and within all institutions that are created. They can also be taken apart, and in the long run, that is what the goal is. It is not simply to step aside and run on a different path, but to open up all the paths to everyone available. Zeta males have every intention of breaking apart society, and building it right back up how we see fit.

> How do we see the new masculinity in its most ideal form? In one word – Freedom.

The freedom to be who you are without shame, to take a professional career and family life of your choosing without being seen as lesser man.

In fact you might not even want to be seen as a man, and that is fine too. As long as you are who you want to be and can keep your head up high with pride you fit into the new design. For better or for worse, there is no shame in who you have decided to be as long as you are happy with it.

We don’t change ourselves for women, especially when it comes to relationships. If you don’t want to be with us for who we are, then you have no respect for us, and we don’t want to be with you. My time may be split to be with you, but my passions will not die for you.

It’s not just woman that we stick it to. Men are guilty of trapping others in the gender role. We will help pull you out of the pit, but we aren’t going to let you pull us back in. We aren’t going to contribute to the system that results in the fact that 80% of suicides are male. We want you to escape with us. Our hands are stretched out are you going to grab ahold of them or are you going to stay where you are?

And if anyone, man, woman, or child protests? Shut up, and get out of our fucking way. We are Zeta Males, and we aren’t going anywhere. You are.

Toward a Deeper Understanding of What Feminism Is

May 2, 2023 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

In an earlier article, I spoke of something called non-feminist target consensus, and why we should move toward such consensus if we would effectively move against feminism in massed formation:

In that article, I posted a numbered list called the "Seven Points of Understanding". The list was meant to suggest a working agreement on what "feminism" really is. It was composed loosely because it was meant to channel our thoughts in a loosely calculated direction, as the first stage in a deeper convergence of understanding.

Granted, many people will never get to that deeper convergence. They will only skim through the seven points, nod their general agreement and give no further thought to it.

So be it. We can live with that. (Have we got any choice?)

But for those who mean to go further, I offer the following as a kind of second-degree initiation. Does that sound like a plan? All right, let's converge upon it.

For a start, let's mothball the conspiracy theories. Powerful interest groups may have given feminism a leg up, but they never invented it. Most seemingly conspiratorial patterns are better explained by what I call moral confluence – the tendency for like-minded humans to form spontaneous systems of cooperation. "Birds of a feather flock together", as folk wisdom informs us, and we need no conspiracy theory to account for this. In principle, it is nothing more mysterious than two people walking side by side on the same road and falling into step with each other.

Mind you, we don't rule out bonafide conspiratorial projects in the general mix – of varying sizes, with varying actors, changing through time. But we don't saddle ourselves with over-arching conspiracy narratives, nor do we bother with smaller ones unless easy evidence makes them "too good to ignore."

Next, we should agree that feminism was never extruded into the world from start to finish as a seamless connection of ideas – it was, and is, a patchwork rife with contradictions. It did not grow from a point source, but from a range of sources: organically, holistically, and morphogenetically. After that, moral confluence took over.

Feminism is more than just ideology. It is a set of practices in the objective world, and the ramifications of those practices. Effectively, feminism is a moral confluence manifested as a social super organism. It has fuzzy boundaries, but you can map it by the light of two cardinal principles, and in order to see how feminism operates you must bear those principles in mind. Once you've got that sorted out, everything settles into place.

Firstly: feminism is the project to increase the power of women both individually and collectively, and this project is a zero sum, infinite game with no clearly stated upper limit or endpoint.

Secondly: feminism is held together and boosted along its trajectory by a bottomless disaffection toward all things male. Despite what the average feminist will tell you, feminism is very much indeed “about hating men”.

These two principles illuminate each other. Furthermore, they cycle in and out of each other in a chicken-and-egg dynamic: it is not clear which comes first, so it is hard to know where to start explaining.

However, let’s start with the first principle because it’s easier that way. After all, nearly any feminist will give you a hairy argument if you insist that feminism is about hating men, but I doubt you’ll find a feminist anywhere who would argue that feminism is not about empowering women.

So to increase the power of women, as to increase the power of anything, demands a rationale. Feminism rationalizes its project by suggesting that women need more power because they haven’t got enough in the first place.

That being said, the question becomes “how much power for women is enough?” How must we quantify this? How must we configure this? If feminism can furnish no answer here, we must suppose that none can be had, and that the feminist project is to empower women infinitely.

We have seen no official statement which says “accomplish the following, and feminism will disband itself.” Furthermore, if there is any such document on earth, we insist that we have no duty to hunt for it. On the contrary, we insist that feminism’s supporters bear the onus to make this information clear to non-feminist men and women, in a manner that is widely known and unmistakable. We await that day.

Very well. Feminism is literally nothing if not the project to increase the power of women. It must be this if it is anything at all, and whatever you might add to this it remains this at the very least. That is a consensus nearly all would share, a crossroad of understanding that puts everybody on the same map.

Now, to increase the power of women could only mean to grow it by comparison to some other power. After all, we can hardly quantify this if we fail to establish a baseline measurement.

So let us think further: would not the feminist project be meaningless if female power didn’t grow specifically by comparison to MALE power? If both men’s and women’s power grew by comparison to some third power, it would be undifferentiated HUMAN power which had augmented itself, yes? But in that case, the limiting term “women” would be inappropriate and misleading. Nor would the term “feminism” be applicable.

So we conclude that the core of the feminist project is to grow female power by comparison to male power in particular, and for want of contrary evidence we also conclude that this project has no proposed endpoint.

Such being given, it follows that women’s power would sooner or later surpass men’s, issuing in a state of female supremacy. Only a non-feminist intervention could block that outcome.

We may define female supremacy as a condition where the governing power in most areas of life is either directly or indirectly a female power. We are entitled to wonder if that would be a good thing, or a bad thing.

Our answer rides upon the question of moral constraint. Absolute power would be arbitrary power, and being absolute, would corrupt absolutely – meaning that no morality would constrain it. True female supremacy could be nothing short of absolute power unconstrained by morality. Anything less would only be a stage along the road to supremacy, but not quite supremacy itself.

In the final tally, any limit to the growth of female power would limit women's power to treat men arbitrarily. This in turn would be a moral constraint because arbitrary power is nothing if not the power to disregard morality. So the feminist project would stall out if it was bound by the requirement to treat men morally, and this would set a limit on how far the project could extend itself.

If one were determined to push the feminist project forward at all cost one would need either to abandon all pretense of morality, or to make oneself the master of such pretense.

In passing, we should note that feminists love to rattle on about something called "equality", yet their notion of equality, for some reason, does not involve abrogating any historical perquisites that women have enjoyed. So, putting it simply, the feminist campaign for so-called equality is a drive to maximize female advantage. This comes to the same thing as increasing female power with no limit.

Now let us consider the second cardinal principle. The project to increase women's power does not positively require disaffection toward men in order to get started, but without it, the project would face a practical limit. However, if you sweep that limit aside, you can pave the road of depredation as far as any lack of scruples might carry you. This is where disaffection toward men comes in handy, and the project to increase female power hits no glass ceiling of any kind.

We conclude that "feminism" minus anti-male feeling would be self-limiting, would lack vitality, and would eventually fizzle out.

Let us reiterate the two cardinal principles: that feminism is a drive to increase female power with no clearly stated endpoint, and that feminism is impelled by a bottomless disaffection toward all things male. Taken together, these principles compose a revelatory lens, and one may pan that lens across the range of conditions. You can put this to work in your own analysis.

Nowadays there is a great controversy in the activated non-feminist sector – on the one side, the strict anti-feminists who wish to engage feminism narrowly and politically, and on the other, those who say "never mind feminism, attack gynocentric traditionalism!"

However, we find it generally pointless to differentiate feminism from so-called traditionalism because we see those things on a continuum. We prefer to take a unified field approach in our quest for understanding.

Yes, we recognize that "gynocentrism" was a feature of traditional (or so-called "patriarchal") culture long before modern feminism came along. But we also see that feminism and traditional culture are like Siamese twins, with gynocentrism as a connective tissue binding them together.

Gynocentrism advantages women over men, and for that reason is fundamentally anti-male. Feminism did not invent gynocentrism, but capitalized on it as it does upon any established anti-male tendency. Anything hateful of maleness, or harmful to it, or merely tilted against it in some way, finds a place in the feminist project.

We have a saying: “Every anti-male stream feeds the feminist river.” Even as the Mississippi pulls its waters from across the continent, so too feminism draws from a far-flung cultural watershed. One way or another, all of it supplements the feministical operations complex (for short, the FEMPLEX).

This metaphor of the watershed hints at the workings of feminism as a social super organism, and puts us in a shared space of heuristic understanding. The full reach of feminism spreads well beyond any conventional understanding of the term. For that reason, the ongoing anti-male evolution in society, over time, is the signature pattern which gives away the feminist game. Plenty of social indicators are trending in an anti-male direction, and that is how we know “where it’s at”.

It should be clear, to all who are politically awake, that the world is becoming a more poisonous place in which to be male. We say this not in the spirit of “men’s rights”, but rather to spotlight a dangerous condition which ought to concern everybody. After all, injustice toward half the human race is bound to have negative consequences right way across the social ecology.

We should add that a lot of feminists show a pattern of moral confluence in creating, sustaining, or rationalizing these anti-male tendencies. When you point this out, a typical response is the infamous NAFALT: “Not All Feminists Are Like That.”

There are many variations on the NAFALT response, yet it is unclear why any of it should be deemed a compelling argument, or what it even pretends to argue in the first place. The sentiment itself is vacuous and trite, for you may pick any kind of feminist you please and it will generally be true that “not all feminists are like that.” So why do they use this line of talk so commonly?

The answer is that they want to get feminism off the hook by changing the subject. They are deflecting attention away from the feminists who are indeed “like that”– and the fact that such feminists really do exist, and really do play a powerful role in shaping the world.

Yes, the anti-male factor is feminism’s most potent driver because it gives the feminist project a wide open frontier of development. The proverbial man-hating feminists represent feminism’s core truth because, frankly, they are what makes feminism exist in the first place. They are not a bug; they are a feature. Lacking their restless energy and continual innovation, feminism would sputter and roll to a stop like a car running out of gas.

The only way to rationalize the endless growth of female power is to gin up never-ending excuses to take away male power – and if you hate men in the first place, your innovation along that line will be morally unencumbered. Accordingly, those who raise questions about the ethical treatment of men or about women's moral accountability in general, are death to the feminist project because they sabotage the one force which can fuel that project's growth into the indefinite future.

The NAFALT excuse ultimately fails not only because it is intellectually vacuous, but because it misses the point. For in the end, the question is not whether all feminists are a certain way, but whether all feminism is a certain way.

More precisely, all feminists – irrespective of individual difference – are implicated in the feminist project. That is what makes them feminist in the first place. Verily, all feminists are "like that" as regards their participation in feminism. This is the point which ought to command our interest.

The less repellent feminists have the option to put those discreditable ones under siege, and isolate them, and starve them of moral support. Yes, they could choose to do this, but instead they choose the opposite tack: they urge you to IGNORE such feminists, and if possible, forget about their existence altogether.

Thus, the feminist who puts you off with NAFALT rhetoric is squatting on your mental real estate by imposing a trivial distraction – and by that I mean a distraction from what is significant, essential, or urgent. This feminist would have you occupy your thoughts with matters that can only throw you off the scent. In this way, the core truths and defining operations of the feminist project will escape detection.

In conclusion: it can be laborious to parse out the finer filaments of understanding, but the reward can be worth it. The burden, be it known, falls as much upon the writer as upon the reader. That said, I trust that any reader who has gotten to the end of this article, in the same plodding footsteps which the writer took first, has been sufficiently compensated for the journey.

Title IX and college rape: a series of injustice, part 4

May 3, 2023 | by Jessica Denis | Link | Original Link

This is Part 4 in a series outlining the effects of college adjudication of alleged sexual assault cases. In Part 1, a wrongfully accused man proved his innocence, yet the college imposed sanctions that damaged his life anyway. In Part 2, a young dating couple's lives were disrupted for more than two years after someone else decided that she was raped. Part 3 featured a young man who has had to sue his school to remove the "responsible" mark on his transcripts after "severely prejudicial conduct" by the school's investigator.

Some may feel as though talking about this systematic failure leads to the shaming of those who have been raped. This series is not about that. One rape is too many. These stories are only meant to bring to light the lives that have been turned upside-down when a college campus adjudicates an allegation of sexual assault.

Imagine you were blackout drunk. Not just incapacitated and unable to clearly give affirmative consent, but intoxicated to the point of absolutely no memory. Envision yourself then hearing about what happened the night before via text messages and campus chatter, and discovering that oral sex was performed on you while you were blacked out. Then imagine, two years later, being expelled from school with a giant black mark on your future.

Wait, what? Why would the victim of sexual assault be expelled?

Because being impaired is "never an excuse." Because the "victim" of the sexual assault was a young man who later became the accused.

John Doe was a student at Amherst College in Massachusetts. After a night of drinking, a female student named as Sandra Jones helped Doe back to his room. Once they arrived, she proceeded to perform oral sex on him and left when she was done. According to court documents, nearly two years later, at the urging of an on-campus victims advocate, Jones filed her sexual misconduct complaint with the school.

Missing evidence, false statements, and a faulty investigation produced the result of Doe being found responsible for violating the sexual misconduct policy at the pseudo hearing at Amherst. The decision indicated that the hearing board found it "credible" that Doe was "blacked out" but that "[b]eing intoxicated or impaired by drugs or alcohol is never an excuse for sexual misconduct and does not excuse one from the responsibility to obtain consent."
What about his right to give consent? In court documents (Page 18), Jones describes an entirely different account of what happened in text messages to a friend:

> "Sandra Jones: Ohmygod I just did something so f—ig stupid
> DR: What did you do
> Sandra Jones: F—ed [John Doe]. . . . F—
> DR: No you didn't . . . .

> Sandra Jones: official story is he puked and I took care of him but yes. Yes I did. F—
> DR: [Sandra] what are you doing????????
> Sandra Jones: Oh and apparently [another student] is coming over so nothing happened everything's fine …"

None of those texts was allowed in the "hearing" the college conducted. Doe was held responsible based solely on a story that was made up and refuted by evidence that was never allowed to be presented. He was kicked off campus, and an email was sent to the entire student body stating he was found responsible and not allowed on campus. While the email did not state his name, it was very clear by campus chatter who he was. He was stripped of his rights with no recourse.

"Control the Controllables." That is what Grant Neal's grandmother tells him on the days he is not strong enough to keep going. A very strong support system that fills in the gaps is the inspiration for him to not give up the fight. He is trying to get back to college after a bold black mark was placed on his transcripts. That black mark? Title IX disciplinary action.

Grant Neal's case is one that you may have heard of and is now poised to be a landmark case as he is the first to take on the Office for Civil Rights, the Department of Education and the Obama administration.

Neal's case is different. There is no grey area. He took a young woman out on a date. They proceeded to have intercourse. The next day someone noticed a hickey on the woman's neck and reported a violent rape occurred. According to court documents, the presumption of rape was made by a third party due to Neal's "status as a high profile football player."

After a faulty process, accusations of conflict of interest on the part of Colorado State University, Pueblo, and changes in testimony — and despite the fact that Jane Doe has since day one insisted she was not raped — Neal was found responsible. He was removed from campus, he lost his football and wrestling scholarships, and no other college will admit him with the black mark on his transcripts.

During my conversation with Neal, he said, "I am not afraid to stand up and fight for this issue. There are so many who either don't have the ability or the strength to go through this process. I will fight for them too."

Before this, Neal had a 3.67 GPA and was pursuing a pre-med degree. He was excelling in all of his classes and handling the twists and turns of college life exceptionally.

Now he has a job and is doing what he can while he waits for the call that the wheels of justice have finally gotten out of the mud and decided to turn. Neal is keeping himself in shape in the hopes that he will be able to rejoin his teammates playing the sports he loves

As I start to conclude this series, I feel as though I should address some feedback I have received.

The most commonly asked question is, "Why are you doing this? Do you have a son or someone personally affected?" The answer is no. I actually have two daughters, ages 20 and 15.

I decided to write this series after reading 160 case files of situations like those mentioned in each part of the series. I spoke with these young men and their attorneys, much more than I could ever write about in this forum. The pain that they have been through is real. Depression, suicide, PTSD, anxiety — these are the result of being put through the process, and no one person's pain is less or more than another's. We should not be silent about this. It is clearly a systematic failure on the part of colleges because they simply are not equipped to deal with this much power over young people's lives. As I have stated before, while they might not hold students' actual freedom in their hands, they do hold their futures in their hands.

In some colleges, the Title IX coordinator has only eight hours of training. I was contacted by a student at the University of Minnesota with his concerns that these cases on his campus will be adjudicated by a panel of three students. This is not a mock trial. This is real life. Students and officials trained for eight hours do not have the capacity to collect evidence, conduct investigations and cross-examine. I would bet that the majority have never even read the Constitution in its entirety. How can they be the ones determining these young people's futures?

~~Bathing~~ Drowning In Male Tears

May 4, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

According to the feminist sacred texts, the most despised decade of the 20th Century was the fecund 50's. The birth rate was high, stay-at-home moms were the norm, and domesticity was exalted. Thanks to lingering postwar affluence, shoe sales skyrocketed, as women were pregnant but not barefoot.

In latter decades the birth rate plummeted and feminists spread the trope "I bathe in male tears," a slogan emblazoned on T-shirts, sweatshirts, and hoodies, as well as on coffee cups. Ironically, women in the 1950's could have filled up the Great Lakes with tears cried by male vocalists. Pop music-wise, it was the most lachrymose of decades.

Shedding of tears was nothing new in popular songs but it was generally the province of females. The greatest example of this was a female specialty, the torch song, which had nothing to do with the Statue of Liberty. The genre was defined by the phrase "to carry a torch" for a former lover, in other words to refuse to let the light of love go out, to hope that a former lover would one day return. Such songs tended to be mawkish and maudlin.

A classic example is "Cry Me a River," written in 1953 and most famously recorded by Julie London in 1955. The gist of the song is contained in the opening verse:

Now you say you're lonely

You cry the whole night through

Well, you can cry me a river

Cry me a river

I cried a river over you

As is the case with a number of popular songs, it can easily be flipped for male singers (e.g., Matt Forbes, Joe Cocker, Michael Bublé, Harry Connick, Jr.) without any change in the lyrics. (Justin Timberlake's "Cry Me a River" has nothing in common with the original other than the title.) Any singer can take on this song. You can be Old Man River or Old Woman River or Old Non-Binary River.

At the same time "Cry Me a River" was on its way to becoming a pop standard, torch singing was spreading to male vocalists. Men not only had balls, they had bawls! And no, I don't mean after the old man got a switch or a strap and uttered the immortal words, "I'll give you something to cry about!" Young men were crying over young women!

Such singers were appealing more to females than to males. A nubile woman reducing a young man to a blubbering blob of silly putty is a testimony to the magic spell the female can cast over the male. Heartbreaker sisterhood is powerful! As proof of this creepy-weepy side of men, I offer popular songs of the 1950's, when male tear ducts were oozing like open sores.

I'm So Lonesome I Could Cry

Technically this song was released late in 1949, but it was on the hit parade well into 1950. This is one of Hank Williams' signature tunes and for the most part is a wistful song of existential melancholy fueled by insomnia. But it all falls apart in the end when we hear:

And as I wonder where you are

I'm so lonesome I could cry

So there we have it. It was all about a woman after all. Forget all the previous lyrics about the "lonesome whippoorwill" and the weeping robin who's "lost the will to live," and the midnight train "whining low." If this were a contemporary tune, the songwriter would be a candidate for suicide watch. Someone would be called in to talk him down from the ledge.

Crying in the Chapel

Elvis Presley's 1960 rendition of this remains the most popular version today, yet it was first recorded by Darrell Glenn in 1953 when Elvis was just a regional phenom who had yet to make the acquaintance of Colonel Tom Parker:

You saw me crying in the chapel

The tears I shed were tears of joy

Tears of joy? Well, that's a change of pace. Not only that, the singer is not crying over a woman but over his relationship with God.

I know the meaning of contentment

I am happy with the Lord

Given the decline in church attendance since 1953, I'm pretty sure fewer and fewer men would be found shedding tears in a chapel today. If a man were to embark on a crying jag in a mainline Protestant church today he would probably encounter a lesbian or trans pastor willing to congratulate him for his stunning and brave display of vulnerability.

In the meantime, don't hold your breath waiting for the heavy metal version of "Crying in the Chapel."

Heartbreak Hotel

Elvis did originate this song in 1956 and it was one of his biggest hits. In fact, it's kind of surprising that Memphis or Las Vegas hasn't come up with a hotel so named. As described in the song, however, it doesn't sound like any place I'd care to stay:

Although it's always crowded

But you still can find some room

For broken hearted lovers

To cry there in their gloom…

The dingiest Motel 6 is a bastion of good cheer compared to this dump. On the other hand, if you're determined to wallow in self-pity, you might as well rack up some frequent-guest points at the Heartbreak Hotel. But please don't take a swan dive off the rooftop sundeck or drown yourself in the hotel pool. Housekeeping will leave a Petite Pity Party mint on your pillow to alleviate your suffering.

Now the bellhop's tears keep flowin'

And the desk clerk's dressed in black

There was a time when you could ask a bellhop to send up a woman to keep you company, but this one's too busy emoting to make himself useful. I don't think it would be prudent to make such a request today anyway…could be a vice squad sting operation or you might be linked to some sort of sex trafficking ring or you might get a dose of the clap. That'll bring tears to your eyes every time you go to the bathroom.

I doubt the black-clad desk clerk will ask you how you enjoyed your stay when you check out. For certain, this man in black ain't no Johnny Cash. As near as I can recall, that pillar of stoicism never cried in any of his songs. Oh, there are plenty of depressing situations (breakups, incarcerations, hangovers) in his songs (and in his life) that might induce tears, yet Johnny Cash manfully shouldered his burdens. On the other hand, A Boy Named Sue might bear closer scrutiny in today's environment.

Smoke Gets in Your Eyes

This 1933 show tune was dormant till the Platters brought it back in 1959. It remains the most popular rendering of the song. The theme is that when the fire of a relationship is extinguished, the result is smoke. It gets in your eyes, producing tears. So if you start tearing up, you can say it's a physiological, not an emotional, reaction and save face. It's literally a smokescreen:

Now laughing heads deride

Tears I cannot hide, hide

So I smile and say, when a lovely flame dies (ahh)

Smoke gets in your eyes

Don't try this strategy in your home unless you take the smoke detector offline. In my humble opinion, if you need to make an excuse for tearing up, it's easier to say you got something in your eye, or the ragweed count is off the charts, or you just returned from East Palestine, Ohio.

Tears on My Pillow

This was a big hit in 1958 for Little Anthony and the Imperials. Crying oneself to sleep would have been laughable for anyone named Big Tony, but it was sound strategy for Little Anthony:

If we could start anew, I wouldn't hesitate

I'd gladly take you back, and tempt the hand of fate

Tears on my pillow, pain in my heart, caused by you

I suppose if you have insomnia, crying yourself to sleep is one remedy. Personally, I prefer melatonin or valerian root…or a strong IPA.

Like a lot of the aforementioned songs, the lyrics of "Tears on My Pillow" serve for a man or a woman – even a homosexual, come to think of it. It's not much of a stretch to imagine a pillow-biter shedding tears on his pillow. Come to think of it, "Hurt So Bad" was a later hit for Little Anthony.

It’s Time to Cry

This tune, introduced in 1959 by Paul Anka was fairly typical of his oeuvre at the time. Initially, he was your basic teen idol, but over time he became a force in the music industry, not just behind the microphone but also behind the scenes:

When somebody leaves you

That’s the time to cry

When you know you’re lonely

You’re not the one and only who will cry

When your heart is broken

That’s the time to cry

When you know she’s left you

You’ll know that she has left you

So you can cry

That shows you how foreign the crying experience is to men. Paul Anka has to tell them when to cry. In all of recorded history no one has ever had to tell women when to cry. With them, it comes with the territory. Just Google the subject of tear ducts and sex differences and see for yourself.

Puppy Love

Paul Anka strikes again with another hit, technically a 60’s artifact (released on February 13, 1960) but really a relic of the 50’s:

I cry each night

My tears for you

My tears are all in vain

In those days crying and teen angst went together like pimples and Stridex. Not so much these days, however. Modern teens have discovered that shooting up schools is more cathartic than a good cry.

I don’t know if the phrase “puppy love” has any currency with anyone today aside from SPCA volunteers. It used to mean, more or less, a teenage crush. Swap out “pubescent” for “puppy” and the phrase makes more sense. Today puppy love might be confused with bestiality or some kind of furry fetish.

Actually, I don’t think puppies cry. They whimper but they don’t cry. For sure, if you don’t keep an eye on them, they’ll chew your blue suede shoes.

Lonely Teardrops

In real life, singer Jackie Wilson was a sexual athlete (check out his bio on Wikipedia). It is highly unlikely that he ever shed any tears over a woman, but you’d never know that from “Lonely Teardrops,” a 1958 hit:

My heart is crying, crying

Lonely teardrops

My pillows never dry of lonely teardrops

Come home, come home

Just say you will, say you will…

My heart is crying, crying

There's that tears-on-the-pillow trope again. Personally, I would recommend skipping the bedroom and going straight to the bathroom. Just blubber into your "HIS" towel and save the "HERS" towel for blowing your nose…or for absorbing any other bodily fluids, precious or otherwise, that are petitioning you for release.

A Teenager in Love

This song, performed by Dion & the Belmonts, rose to No. 25 on the Hot 100 list for 1959. Basically, it's puppy love redux:

I cried a tear for nobody but you

I'll be a lonely one if you should say we're through

Well if you want to make me cry

That won't be so hard to do

If you should say goodbye

I'd still go on loving you

This sort of pantywaist drivel didn't happen when fathers took their sons to a whorehouse for a sexual initiation. See, kid, this is all there is to it. No reason to get all bent out of shape over it. You ain't cherry no more, so now get on with your life.

Given the absence of fathers today, that sort of patriarchal wisdom is not passed on as much as it used to be. Today groomers and cougars are the most likely candidates to show a young man the ropes…bondage, anyone?

I Cried a Tear

A songbird called LaVern Baker did this in 1958. A year later, Ernest Tubb, of all people, covered it and it rose to No. 12 on the country and western hit list:

I cried a tear because of you

I cried a tear because we're through

I cried a tear, what could I do?

But cry inside for love of you…

I cried a tear because of you

I cried a tear because we're through

Please make my dreams of you come true

Don't make me cry a tear for you

In 1941 Tubb recorded "Walkin' the Floor Over You," which described a man pacing back and forth due to woman trouble. That was an acceptably masculine way to deal with an achy, breaky heart in those days. Yet 18 years later Tubb has resorted to weeping. Inappropriate behavior for a guy who performs in a cowboy hat and boots.

Only the Lonely

After all that dammed-up weepiness broke loose in the 50's, it was inevitable that it would overflow into the early 60's. This 1960 hit by Roy Orbison was a good example:

But only the lonely

Know why

I cry

Only the lonely…

Only the lonely (dum-dum-dum-dumdy-doo-wah)

Know the heartaches I've been through (ooh-yay-yay-yay-yeah)

Only the lonely (dum-dum-dum-dumdy-doo-wah)

Know I cry and cry for you (dum-dum-dum-dumdy-doo-wah)

OK, Roy, we get the message, your heart is broken, you're down in the dumps. But it's hard to feel sorry for you. Crying over a woman is pretty dumb-dumb-dumb-dumbdy – hoo-hah!

Crying

"Only the Lonely" was Orbison's first big hit, at one point rising to No. 2 on Billboard magazine's Hot 100. He took the hint and followed up with "Crying" in 1961:

…That I'd been crying over you

Crying over you

Then you said, "So long"

Left me standing all alone

Alone and crying

Crying

Crying

Crying

It's hard to understand

Bu the touch of your hand

Can start me crying…

Crying over you

Crying over you

Yes, now you're gone

And from this moment on

I'll be crying

Crying

Crying

Crying

Yeah, crying

Crying

Over You

Alone and crying…hmmm. If a woman starts bawling in public, people tend to approach and offer assistance or consolation. When a man cries, he cries alone, even if he's in the waiting room at Grand Central Station.

Anyway, we hear you loud and clear, Roy. You might as well have a sign on your back that says "Cuck Me." He never took to heart that old saying about spilt milk. As late as 1964 he was still at it in Oh, Pretty Woman. This one could be the incel national anthem:

Pretty woman don't walk on by

Pretty woman don't make me cry

Stop the presses! I think I finally figured out why Roy Orbison always wore those dark glasses – to hide his crying eyes! Or at least to make the audience think he was weeping while he was crooning his tunes.

So there we have it, pop culture fans. Long before second-wave feminism was a thing, the aforementioned hairy-chested, antediluvian, patriarchal brutes were crying their eyes out. Maybe "Big Girls Don't Cry" (the Four Seasons. 1962) but big boys do!

Today, of course, young men, biological or otherwise, are so much more emotionally intelligent. Go ahead, young man, turn on the waterworks and let it all out.

Unless you live in California. They have a severe water shortage there.

Women: Where are all the good men?

May 4, 2023 | by Tim Patten | Link | Original Link

Mr Patten passed away some time ago. We contunue to republish his articles for a new audience. –Ed

Right now, all over the world, millions of women are searching for a "good man." Even after decades of effort on the part of the women's liberation movement to empower women with the mantra, "I do not need a man," they continue on this seemingly endless quest.

The process to find a good man begins early by assuring little girls that they'll "meet a good partner one day". Indeed, they seem to intuitively understand that someone, someday, will take care of them for the rest of their lives. They are told, "When you're married, you'll be happy," as they bask in dreams of a fancy wedding and a life with a perfect soul mate. He'll be masculine, he'll work hard and he'll earn enough money to care for his woman and for her children. He will be strong, intelligent, healthy and courageous – all the while being by her side for protection and support.

For men, however, it is a different story. We don't ask for much. We like our women to be attractive. We like them to enjoy sex, and we like them to provide us with companionship. What we don't want is for them to try to change us.

It is these dichotic extremes that lie at the root of the modern global gender liberation phenomenon. A dichotomy where women are driving good men away.

Women and Society

The fact is that women and society at large have systematically stacked mountains of needs, obstacles and expectations in front of us men, challenging us to measure up to impossible standards of masculinity at every stage of our lives. Boys fend off schoolyard bullies, teenage males strut their stuff, and men feel compelled to protect females from even the slightest random belligerence. We are like cub scouts consigned to, among other things, helping little old ladies cross the street to earn our "real man" badge.

For the most part, women's studies, gender studies and society at large skirt around male suicide and other related issues. But this must stop. It is time to zero in on who – and what – is corralling men into the destructive confines of hegemonic masculinity.

One obvious question is this: Where is the relentless demand for the "good man" coming from? In truth, this gender "policing" abomination is perpetrated by everyone, whether they are aware of it or not. It reflects a gynocentric society rife with the crumbling artifacts of institutionalized patriarchy. But that is not the whole story. Most of the time, those we love most – especially the women many of us spend our lives chasing – place this straightjacket of idealized masculinity on us. They are a favorite object of love and desire and in return, they expect stereotypical masculine perfection. Many hold dear those things that will elevate partners to "good man" status. Our girlfriends, wives and significant others wield this power over us like a sword, or they leave us with hurdle after hurdle to jump over.

Relationships Between Men and Women

One day every young girl grows up and finds her true love, a good man, and an exclusive relationship ensues. The couple becomes entangled and sometimes will marry. Suddenly the man's responsibilities and demands skyrocket. Some men undoubtedly love the challenges of manhood and they experience a certain male pride when they assume responsibility for looking after a woman for the rest of her life. But for others, the burden of living up to an idealized version of manhood often leads to great stress and intense feelings of shame, anxiety, depression, and in extreme cases, suicide. These marital burdens have created an escape phenomena for many men.

Women often try to control their man by slapping, hitting, and throwing him out of their homes. Oddly, society and even many men seem to approve of this abuse. In fact, some of us do not seem to care if loving a woman is dangerous. It seems that for many females, the fear of male domination echoes incessantly inside their heads. To dodge male authority, women go on the offensive and begin subjugating and manipulating men to ensure that they won't be oppressed.

They also try to hammer us into submission with their words. They'll say things like, "He's a little boy who needs to grow up and act like a man." They make us feel guilty and shame us with ridicule. Another common refrain is, "If you were a real man, you'd…", along with other self-serving diatribes like, "If you love me you'd man-up, earn more and help me at home".

The woman's weapon of choice is a sharp tongue. While the things they say might smack of moral authority and loving concern, they often cut deeper than physical violence. The intent is to strike at our inherent male core. Many women are experts at inflicting pain through words alone while others rely on tactics like bickering and nagging to stoke our insecurity even more. This has the potential to force even the most independent and self-assured of us to cower—or worse. As an example of how critical this issue has become, a 2014 study found that verbal abuse was often a catalyst for husband suicides.

Male Fear

Our worst fear is being seen as something other than male. We can be humiliated and devastated by any suggestion that, because of passivity or effeminacy, we might be like a woman. We live in perpetual anxiety about being considered weak, gay, unfit or "unmanly"; it is our Achilles' heel. When women demand that we be a "real man," our adrenaline spikes; when they shout, "Man-up!" we become agitated. When they undermine our masculinity, our pride is destroyed.

And yet, women are the ones who are often afraid. They are so frightened by our powerful maleness that they command us to submit. But many women don't seem to grasp the emasculating impact that their abuse can have. Lacking our biology, they cannot understand our emotions at their most primal level. They only see that we react and comply. They have no real understanding of the damage their reckless behavior can cause.

The Role of the Women's Movement

We should not have to succumb to the shackles placed on us by the women's rights and social justice movements either. In theory, these hugely successful campaigns were intended to level the playing field between men and women. In reality however, many have been hijacked by extremists and then misinformed for nefarious purposes. While these hardline activists try to make their mission sound noble, their words often betray then, as evidenced by the popular media battle cries below:

"R.E.S.P.E.C.T."…"I am woman"…"Hear me roar"…"Ladies first"…"This is a woman's world"…"Nobody can hold us down"…"She dominates all access"… "You don't own me"…"We run this mutha"… "If you like it, put a ring on it"…"Who runs the world? GIRLS!"

Over time, the drive for equality has been transformed into a crusade for female advantage and a strategy for imposing their worldview on men. Women have been given special rights and they've signed misguided legislation into law – legislation that benefits them at our male expense. Many of these so-called women's movements have devolved into full-fledged man-hating struggles for gender supremacy, inspiring a significant backlash.

The Role of Sex

Unfortunately, our biological imperatives make things complicated and difficult. Even when women's demands are entirely unreasonable, most of us will comply because we are motivated by powerful and instinctual urges, most notable of which is our male sex drive. It is still not clear why society views this as an acceptable form of coercion and something used for the purpose of harnessing masculinity's unruly nature.

Once our male sexual appetite is triggered, we kowtow into submission, potentially sacrificing our long-term health and financial wellbeing by clinging to the false belief that physical intimacy is our reward for being "good." We are not just compelled to 'save the women and children first'. In many respects, we have become "vagina beggars". Like lemmings, we follow a dangerous and potentially disastrous course. We have become imprisoned, and women hold the key.

Liberation and Discovering Happiness

As Bob Dylan once wrote, the times they are a-changin'. Years of submission to abusive treatment and acquiescing to unrealistic expectations have taken their toll, and many of us are starting to ask some very pointed questions. Do we deserve to be treated like workhorses? Are we supposed to sit back and become totally marginalized, similar to how males in certain matriarchal African villages were relegated by the female leadership to the lowest rungs of the social ladder? Will we become nothing more than "manginas," capriciously and carelessly manipulated at the whims of our female overlords?

For millions of us, the answer to those questions is a resounding "no!" Good men around the world have decided to go their own way, and like us, they understand that there is nothing wrong with men or masculinity. They understand that they do not need to be schooled by women nor do they need to be enslaved to the family with little reward. A tsunami of male sovereignty is sweeping across our planet and we are grabbing the sword of opportunity to enlighten ourselves.

This growing movement of masculine awareness goes by many names – MGTOW, the Red Pill and Herbivore men. This new paradigm is helping us to understand our true selves, our unique assets and the techniques we can employ to end our toxic entanglements with women. We're learning how to liberate ourselves from a primitive and self-destructive social order. We're speaking out and helping to empower others to break free from the bonds of the biased relationship expectations of love, marriage and myopic monogamy – expectations that are enforced with female violence.

A New World

Gloria Steinman recently asked on Real Time with Bill Maher, "What's wrong with people using their talents and doing what they want?" As men, we want that liberation as well. For many of us, this is a new and exciting environment, and it's quickly changing for the better. It is a world where we can finally do what we want and work at the things that we love.

It doesn't matter whether we enjoy tinkering with automobiles, flying kites, dancing in a ballet, playing sports or prepping ourselves so that we may, by choice rather than compulsion, become leaders, inventors and creators. We seek to express and enjoy our innermost interests and talents, rather than toil endlessly in the pursuit of a life of inequality and lopsided relationships. We are realizing our right to define who we are, and we are choosing our higher purpose.

As men, we are amazing; we have the qualities and drive to change the world. Only now, it is our own decision to make. No longer condemned to live a life dictated by women and their obsolete restrictions, we can shed the debilitating confines of social expectation and truly relish the fruits of our labors. It is time to unleash the full potential of men in our society. A life of freedom and happiness awaits us!

Post-structuralism and men’s liberation/rights

May 5, 2023 | by Eva Barb | Link | Original Link

Post-structuralism is an interesting theory to consider as the academic field of men’s studies slowly emerges into coherence because it is the very theory that has provided premises for feminism to unravel into second and third waves. Only now—after feminism, queer theory, and trans studies—is men and masculinity studies (barely) a feasible academic discipline. Perhaps this progression of gender discourses says enough about the social erasure of the disenfranchisement of men in contemporary society. After all, can we really be so vain as to think that men are banal creatures unworthy of discourse?

To only scarcely begin peeling away one of the many thick layers suffocating this question, I identify the basic formation of post-structuralism as well as how it has been mis-appropriated within socio-politics. I use Michael Messner’s analysis on the formation and progression of the men’s liberation movement (“The Limits of the ‘Male Sex Role'”) because his essay provides insight into how this movement was overshadowed, partitioned, and discombobulated by feminism.

The structuralist tenet of Saussurrean signification proposes that a sign consists of two psychological parts: a sound pattern (signal) and a concept (signification). Hence, the word man can be linguistically dissected into the English sound: \’man\; and the signification of man is defined by cultural associations with what a man is or represents.

Two significant details of Saussure’s signification model are that language is both innately arbitrary and a unique social institution in that society’s “natural inertia exercises a conservative influence upon it.”[1] Therefore, the main structuralist query is: How does language define and therein monitor our paradigms and the ways in which we experience the world around us?

Take, for example, the modern phenomenon of a “queer” vocabulary: agender, non-binary, trans, intersex, androgyne, pangender, gender-fluid, etc. Language is the very scope that brings these non-traditional genders into visibility. The “natural inertia” of society within the past century as well as the acute wave of (trans)gender activism in the 1990s has ultimately influenced the creation of a Wikipedia entry titled, “Gender-neutral language,”[2] which accounts for some of the aforementioned words.

The undoing of society’s visible gender spectrum through a gradual evolution of language from sex to gender, from hermaphrodite to intersex, from androgynous to bi-gender (and so on), corresponds with changing notions on the signification of these words; thus, reconfiguring linguistic paradigms in order to fit the normative of social majorities. Ironically, this progression of marginalized and minority communities into the mainstream sphere innately Others what society considers to be the privileged oppressor(s) of said groups. Namely, straight white men.

Derridean deconstruction (generally referred to as post-structuralism)—drawing from, and challenging, Saussure’s theory on language—asserts that a sign is more than just its signal and signification; a sign can also be taken apart by the dualities, or binary pairs, that sustain its meaning. Language is no more than a clusterfuck of dichotomies; these dichotomies are the very mechanisms that give a word meaning, so that true meaning is elusive and in a constant state of deferment. Similar to Karl Marx's notion of the "abstract, reflected anti-thesis,"[3] each side of a binary pair reflects and gives meaning to the other—transgender/cisgender, black/white, straight/gay, queer/normative, proletarian/bourgeois, liberal/conservative, etc. Despite all of these binary pairs that our society, driven by language, can be divided into, one resounds above all, for it was perhaps the birth of the modern "gender zeitgeist:" man/woman, which feminism subverted into: woman/man.

One of the main issues with feminism—and the identity politics it has helped foster—is the faulty appropriation of post-structuralism upon civil rights issues. In establishing positions of 'us v. them,' these movements abstract human beings by using language to victimize/blame, resulting in the reduction of the intrinsic complexity of both language and people. Modern civil rights movements consequently Other and demonize masculinity and maleness because man has culturally evolved into signifying the inverse of any form of disenfranchisement. One need only consider (as Messner does)[4] the poor white man to demystify the damnation of a universalized and privileged man.

In tracking the men's liberation movement of the 1970s (and so forth), Messner examines the varying discourses of men's liberation/rights and its use of male/female role ideologies to pioneer pro-feminism, anti-feminism, and the middle ground: Warren Farrell-ism. Messner provides a rather comprehensive timeline of these three overlapping—yet diverging—sects of the men's liberation movement.

Early men's liberation activists provided equilateral weight to the oppression of men and women, while mediating the tensions between male privilege/male victimization. As a result of feminist criticism, by the mid 1970s MLAs had begun focusing on how men are inherently oppressive. Thus, the male feminist was born.[5]

Messner also discusses the opposing side of the aforementioned phenomenon (i.e. anti-feminism):

"It is instructive to examine the slippage in the discourse from the symmetrical mid-1970s men's liberation language of 'equal oppressions' faced by women and men to an angry anti-feminist men's rights language of male victimization in the late 1970s and 1980s."[6]

Messner implies that this "slippage" from symmetrical examinations of social gender roles into "angry" criticism of matriarchy is a result of the paradox that institutionalized patriarchy presented to men's liberationists. He suggests that the catalyst for anti-feminism was when some MLAs realized that feminism was not the cherry-topped, pro-humanist ice-cream sundae they thought it to be; indeed, it was explicitly anti-male and critical of any suggestion that men could be victims.

Though Messner's essay is quite dated, he manages to account for how the men's liberation movement split into the binary: pro-feminist/anti-feminist, and how this incited the contemporary movement of men's rights activism.

Men's rights, as both a civil cause and an academic discipline, has perhaps undergone such deferment because of an unconscious insistence on the validity of binary models. In subverting a presumptuous patriarchal gender binary, feminism forced (and is forcing) maleness and masculinity into subaltern positions of muteness, which is reinforced by discourses such as post-colonialism and queer theory that consider hetero, white maleness as their antithetical. All the while, these academic discourses are premised by the arbitrariness of binary systems. Lacking self-awareness, it seems, academia is a playground for the active exclusion of man. How, if at all, do we begin digging maleness out of the anachronistic hole it's been placed in?

False accusations and the denial of men’s emotional pain

May 7, 2023 | by Tom Golden | Link | Original Link

I keep hearing that false accusations of rape make it harder on real victims of rape. Really? There may be a kernel of truth in this idea but it completely ignores the trauma and pain of the man who is falsely accused. The knee jerk reaction of most people is to worry over the woman and ignore the pain of the man.

This pattern to focus on females in emotional pain and offer help whil e ignoring the emotional pain of men and boys is the default in the United States. This not only leaves our men and boys without help, it also leaves us with an ignorance about their emotional pain.

To get a sense of the emotional pain of the falsely accused listen to the words of a young man falsely accused of rape via an article on slate.com:

“My girlfriend was raped several years ago. I was falsely accused of rape less than a year ago. I contacted her (I had known her before her incident) because I was desperate for someone to talk to who would understand what I was going through. To my great relief, it turned out that we understood each other very well. From the initial stages of suicidal thoughts and not being able to function to the long-term fear, mistrust, and guilt that are facts of our lives, it turns out that her experience of being raped and mine of being falsely accused of rape were very similar. …”

He touches on some of the hallmarks of a false accusation which he and his girlfriend realized were very similar to her reaction to having been raped. The loss of functioning, the suicidal thoughts, the long-term fear and mistrust along with the potent guilt are a few of their similar reactions.

It often starts out innocently enough. He hears that she has accused him of something he didn’t do. He is not so worried, at least not at first. He knows he did nothing wrong and figures that when people get the facts that this will blow over like a dark cloud that never rains a drop. But, to his shock, he starts seeing that even when he speaks the truth about what actually happened he is still considered a criminal.

But our young falsely accused man goes a step farther in his descriptions of his situation. Listen to what he says:

“One important difference, though, is that when she was violated, she received a great deal of help (medical, legal, psychological). Apart from family and friends, I was on my own. My legal and psychological problems had to be dealt with by me at a time when I couldn’t eat, sleep, or think (except, of course, about killing myself).”

He sees very clearly that very few believe him while nearly everyone believes the woman. The system and our culture are failing him. His pain is invisible while hers is treated with reverence, even though she is lying.

He must be shocked by the amount of coddling and care that she gets from friends, family, the university, the authorities, and so many others. He is likely shocked again when he compares this to the reaction he receives. Almost no support, but plenty of negatives.

In most instances the woman is believed no matter what. The police ignore his side and treat him like a rapist, the media is more than happy to paint him as if convicted and throw his name around willy nilly with at least the inference that he is a rapist. Rape centers make demands that all those claiming to have been raped should be believed no matter what. While it might be a good idea to put your trust in someone in crisis it quickly turns to crap if you put your trust in someone who is lying. The rape centers refuse to admit there are liars out there and they will go to great lengths to shame the police, the hospital, the media, the public or anyone who might even ask a question about the veracity of her claims. This sets us up for a real mess. By giving the liars a pass you set up the falsely accused for chaos.

As time goes on he realizes that he is basically alone in his knowledge of the truth. No one believes him. Even his friends are wondering. He starts to feel way out on a limb and also very shocked. It is just hard to believe that your entire universe of friends, teachers, adults are looking at you sideways due to the lies of a woman. It's hard to believe that a system of "justice" has gotten things so wrong and is intentionally and wrongly painting you as a criminal. The world which not long ago seemed safe and predictable has now become unsafe and very unpredictable. This promotes confusion and the devastating isolation that is so common for the falsely accused along with the potent fears of the world being a big unpredictable booby trap. They feel isolated, profoundly judged and labelled, unsafe and alone and in a world that has gone mad.

This is a billboard that says double standard. While the emotional plight of the young woman is given support at every step by friends, family, the police, courts, the media and others the emotional state of the young falsely accused male is ignored and denied. He is viewed as the problem. She is automatically seen as a victim simply because she accuses him, he is seen as a pariah simply for being accused. He is in great pain and turmoil but no one lifts a finger to be of assistance. The sad fact is he is presumed guilty prior to trial. He is now seen as an object, not as a human being. He is profoundly objectified. The double standard could not be more stark.

The larger problem is that this pattern of catering to the emotional pain of females and ignoring the emotional pain of males is not exclusive to false accusations. You see this same pattern most everyplace you look. In my work with traumatized men over the past 30 years I have seen it repeatedly. Time and again I would see that in a traumatized family the men's wives would be the focus of help and the man's pain would be ignored. Often times people would approach the father and rather than ask about his situation they would say, "How's your wife holding up?" The woman gets the support, the man, gets asked about his wife.

This same pattern is seen when our culture, media, and academia all focus on female victims of domestic violence and ignore the male victims. They do this even though research shows that men are about 1/2 of the victims. Congress sets up a billion dollar service for women and men get ignored or even blamed.

We see the same ignoring of men's emotional pain when we see that males are 80% of completed suicide but there are no services specifically for males who are suicidal. There is also not much research looking into why men are 80% of completed suicides. It seems it is much easier to get funding to study women, the men get left out. And of course, the media fails to inform the public of men in pain. Dead silence. Same thing with workplace deaths where men are 93% of the dead. People simply don't care. If these deaths were female or even some minority the media would be screaming loudly. But when men are the victims, we get silence.

Our culture is now and always has been very gynocentric. (for more information see http://gynocentrism.com) One definition of gynocentrism found on that site is "any culture instituting rules for gender relationships that benefit females at the expense of males across a broad range of measures." When it comes to emotional needs it is clear in our culture that a woman's emotional pain is a call to action while a man's emotional pain is ignored. Some try to cover this profound bias by claiming men are cold and don't want to deal with their emotions. But this has simply been a cover to excuse oneself from even needing to pay the slightest attention to the man's emotional pain. Epic fail.

The contrast is great between the cultural response to female and male emotional pain. One gets compassion and the other gets ignored, shamed, or both. This contrast is so great that it behooves the label of bigotry. Just as we saw whites create a system where whites automatically got services superior to that of blacks today we see our government and charities developing services where women get care and compassion far superior to that of men and no one even notices. No one. Reminds me of a bigoted 1950's southern town that didn't think its action were in any way a problem. In today's world, the status quo, that is nearly everyone, are guilty of bigotry by not having compassion for the emotional pain of men. Which side of the fence do you stand on? Are you a bigot who has little compassion for boys and men?

Perhaps someday we will look back on this era and see its bigotry just as we now look back on the racism of the 1950's. I do hope that day comes quickly.

Hey Kate, how often do you beat your husband?

May 7, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

The trend to make female movie characters tough and abrasive has been proceeding for some time. We can all predict that the new partner in the police procedural, let's say a petite black woman whose entrance surprises (and thus reveals the bigotry of) the white man she'll be working with, will turn out to be the biggest badass on the force. She'll almost certainly save her partner's life—and unearth a crime-solving detail he'd overlooked—before the first episode is over. At the same time, viewers will be treated to her sneering refusal of the partner's banter, her steely gaze, and her fearless embrace of outrider status. She's a woman with wise-cracking disdain for men as a group who takes quick revenge for even the smallest hint of sexism, benevolent or otherwise, from her fellow officers. And she quickly earns not only their respect but also their unwilling awe.

Whether police officers, first responders, detectives, firefighters, FBI—or, for that matter, nurses, ER doctors, politicians, or lawyers—the message is clear: these women are at least as capable and fearsome as any man: tough-minded, smart as a whip, and street-wise. Even in this era of agitation about the trans peril to women's sports, the fictional females are as physically strong and combat-ready as any male, their fists and kicks aimed with staggering accuracy . Even tiny Lucy Tara on NCIS Hawai'i comes to the rescue of her far-larger male colleagues in impressive physical struggles with suspects.

But physical characteristics, the notable fearlessness and strength, are to some extent less striking than the women's personalities and demeanor. An entire character transformation has been taking place, as traditionally feminine characteristics have been decisively minimized and masculine bravura brought to the fore. These women are, seemingly without effort, brusque, foul-mouthed, and contemptuous, particularly of male authority—and we're to love them for it. They're often beautiful, but they never try to be. With hair pulled back and aggressive booted stride, they are independent, uninterested in male approval, and largely indifferent to men as romantic partners, unless they are shown pursuing their occasionally voracious sexual needs, at which times their approach is direct and unsentimental. After an evening of bronco-riding athleticism, they wake up in a tousled bed with a slight grimace and duck out of the lover's offer of breakfast. They're not interested in commitment or any continued intimacy. A call comes in on their cell phone, they pull on their clothes nonchalantly, and walk out of the man's life. They've already forgotten him as they prepare to conquer evil once again.

A popular new Netflix series, The Diplomat, takes these now-standard elements to the next level, profiling an ambitious, sexy, oft-frowning, brilliant, and explosively hot-tempered woman, Kate Wyler, who engages in uncontrolled physical and verbal abuse of her husband without remorse or narrative comeuppance. Though one might expect that a portrait of reckless physical violence by one spouse against another would be evidence at least of a serious character flaw—if not criminality (as it certainly would be if the male spouse were delivering the blows)—it is not at all clear in this case that the character's actions deserve any condemnation. Her violence is simply the most extreme manifestation of her (rather admirable and plucky) unconventionality in breaking the rules of propriety in order to save the liberal world order.

The Diplomat is, in general, a thinly-veiled apologia for the progressive Deep State, assuring viewers that, whatever buffoons happen to be in power (in this case, two more or less useless white men in addition to the great evil at Russia's helm), we can rest assured that a white woman and her multi-ethnic colleagues (with the addition of a winsome non-binary staffer) are maneuvering behind the scenes to keep things sane and to exonerate a wrongly-maligned Iran. Progressivist certainties saturate the script: Brexit was "a self-inflicted wound," according to the British Foreign Secretary; and later, in another context, the Proud Boys are mentioned as an American parallel to the Wagner Unit. A Biden-esque president is the jovial if somewhat too-folksy American leader whose uncertain grasp of political nuance is kept in check by more knowledgeable advisors. There is a brief reference to an earlier, more potentially destructive, leader (obviously Trump) whose whimsical and megalomaniacal directives were as a matter of course contravened. The British Prime Minister is an odious bully whose mindless belligerence—war seems his only hope for political relevance—must be skillfully countered.

The stakes for the diplomat hero, Kate, couldn't be higher, especially since an appointment as U.S. Vice-President is in the offing. Following a deadly explosion on a British aircraft carrier in the Persian Gulf, she is appointed U.S. ambassador to Great Britain in order to deal with the potential fallout. With an expression always halfway between constipation and chagrin, she personifies an aggressive, warts-and-all competence as the series follows her navigation of political tensions surrounding the attack.

Despite her track record in conflict zones, Wyler is, to say the least, not particularly diplomatic in her conduct. She curses frequently—hardly a sentence is uttered without an obligatory 'fuck;' snaps at a female staffer and then complains that women apologize too much; screams at her husband in a meeting room so loudly that everyone in the outer office cannot help but hear, develops an uncontrollable case of the giggles after an Iranian diplomat drops dead at a secret meeting, and lusts after the British Foreign Secretary. All of these are, it seems, to be regarded as humanizing rather than fatal flaws. Above all, anger and impatience, even hatred, of her husband—himself a career diplomat with a reputation damaged by his unpredictability—are a near-constant feature. She does not hesitate to convey her contempt for him to those around her, and eventually they commiserate. In one of the final scenes, she has managed to convince her new love interest that her waffling about her divorce was owing to her unusual decency and generosity.

The unprecedented scene in the third episode depicts her sustained physical attack on the husband, Hal, whose transgression—not having told her about the behind-the-scenes plan to have her replace the sitting Vice-President—does not, by any stretch of the imagination, seem to justify her rage. Leading up to the attack are various moments in which we witness her unaccountable, chest-heaving fury building, always far in excess of what reason would seem to dictate. It appears that Kate is triggered by the thought that accepting the VP position would mean that she and her husband will not, after all, be able to carry through on a planned divorce, though why that should be—and why some sort of politically expedient compromise could not be worked out—is never made clear.

The attack itself, which takes place in a small copse of trees on the grounds of the American embassy, involves repeated punching with closed fists at her husband's face as she squats on his chest; she even attempts to beat him with a large fallen branch. It goes on and on while she shouts "This marriage is killing me!" She is interrupted by an aide, who tells her that the President of the United States needs to speak with her. Covered in leaf mold and panting from her exertions, she hurries back to the embassy, where, undaunted, she convinces the President not to provoke Iran by sending American ships to the Gulf.

The next morning, we see the husband sitting a bit glumly at the embassy breakfast table, where he acknowledges his black eye to the deputy chief of mission, who brushes it aside. Kate enters the room, snatches some morsels of toast (one of the signs of her single-minded dedication is that she never seems to eat a meal, mainly grabbing bits of food with her fingers and stuffing them absently into her mouth as she contemplates the day's tasks). She barely glances at her husband and evinces no consciousness or remorse. Various twists and turns over the following episodes complicate the political tensions, but the beating is never acknowledged. Hal, for his part, accepts it and is eager to keep the marriage going, making repeated pitches for their alliance and delighted to oblige when his wife wants sex.

When I first wrote on Twitter about my disgust at the beating scene, a number of people chided me for over-reaction. She is a complex, flawed character, said one, reminding me, Weren't you an English teacher? Another found it a good thing that the female capacity for violence and emotional incontinence were starkly on display.

To be clear, I don't object to complexity of character, and I am the last person to demand that women be presented as angels. (I also happen to believe that much minor domestic violence—where it does not cause bodily harm—should be decriminalized.) But that is not what is going on here. This is the affirmation of Kate's volatility as a marker of her liberation from female stereotypes. Just as we do not object when the male hero beats up bad guys, we are not to lament Kate's cursing or beating of her husband. If that's what she needs, so be it. The double standards that once characterized political discourse about women and men—that women are less able than men to control their emotions—have been brought to life again, but now in order to support a hagiographical portrait of a woman whose lack of self-control is evidence of her bold authenticity.

What is the purpose of the "physical altercation," as more than one gushing reviewer called it? It's quite possible that writers simply don't know how else to portray a strong woman except to have her embody stereotypically masculine qualities. The point is obviously not to highlight women's capacity for domestic violence. We won't be hearing anything about shelters for abused men or the danger such women represent to their families. On the contrary, this seems an unabashed celebration of all things female, including even those qualities that feminists have told us for decades characterized male behavior near-exclusively and were antithetical to female being. It is the normalization of female abuse in service of the liberation narrative.

I don't expect there will be much outcry, if any. Most people, men and women, don't care about domestic violence against men, which may be the least popular of all unpopular men's issues. The thought seems to be that because men allegedly abused women for centuries with impunity, a little fictional abuse now is nothing. The fact that we know that women are fully capable of violence and that the celebration of violence as empowerment is a dangerous inducement to more violence will get no traction.

But I would think that a few thoughtful people might be disturbed by the general trend to encourage female badassery. Most men have a deeply ingrained horror of hitting women back, but even the best among them might be provoked past endurance. Encouraging women to seek fulfillment through abusive behavior, especially in thinking themselves men's physical equals, is likely to endanger some women as well as men. Most feminists will take satisfaction in being able to report yet more "male violence," and their complicity in tolerating domestic abuse when it's a man being abused is yet more reason to reject their claims that empowered women will save the world.

Rise of the shield hero: anime men’s issues

May 9, 2023 | by Chris "mad_cat" Votey | Link | Original Link

It’s fair to say that I don’t like anime. I’m not saying they’re bad, and there are some I’ve enjoyed, but for the most part, I have difficulty getting into them. Some of the things people seem to enjoy about them are elements that I tend to dislike. What I have seen of anime tends to be highly gynocentric, a focus on uplifting female characters to the nth degree that they are somehow super powerful or the key to some great legend, and the only characters deserving of character depth.

Very recently, we learned that Amber Heard was the actual abuser in her relationship with Johnny Depp. We know about this because Depp released audio recordings of her gaslighting him that she can’t hurt him, so it’s not abuse, and that no one would believe that she as a woman could be abusive.

I was watching TheQuartering about Amber Heard, and he mentioned Feminist outrage to an anime, “The Rise of the Shield Hero.” Feminist outrage over an anime? This I had to see. I did some research, and apparently, it dealt with the issue of false rape accusations and a male that had to help save the world despite being hated by everyone. I had to see this anime.

Be forewarned; my review will have spoilers. Before I do so, I will give my overall impressions. It’s good, very good. I give 4 out of 5 stars. If it didn’t have the annoying stuff I dislike in anime, I would have given it 5 stars, so if you really like anime, then you might well give it 5 stars.

Rise of the Shield Hero explores what men go through when falsely accused of rape. It also highlights the great benefits that men can give to society, with values of duty and honor, despite having no motivation whatsoever to help anyone.

Of course, showing a male being a victim of a false accusation of rape really angered SJW’s. So much so, Anime Feminist refused to review the show after watching the first episode.

> “I watched the episode, and it was worse than I had imagined. I have never seen a series with such a deeply held, misanthropic victim mentality. I contemplated how to approach the review. I thought about pretending to review it from an incel point-of-view, but that felt a little too close to the truth. I thought about writing with vitriol and rage, but that honestly felt pointless. Our readers know why a series hinging on a false rape accusation and slavery apologism is wrong; going into hysterics over it would only bring greater attention to it and give our detractors vindictive glee.”

Then Anime Feminist gave a list of Rape prevention resources. Yes, it is so wrong to give attention to how a false accusation can actually hurt men and even make it harder for actual victims to be taken seriously. Because why would any woman ever lie about being raped? It just doesn’t happen. You can see how people reacted on twitter here

(https://twitter.com/AnimeFeminist/status/1082395009205321729).

S1E1 gave the show a D+, and focused on pretty much the same thing:

> "While I found a lot of the episode to be entertaining, it makes some epic-level stumbles that cost it the majority of any good will it builds. As is unfortunately common, its biggest stumbling block boils down to gender relations. Myne's betrayal of Naofumi involves her falsely accusing him of rape and planting false evidence to support her claim. There's a strong suggestion that Kitamura, one of the other heroes who seems to attract various women, put Myne up to the task, but it's Myne who's framed by the narrative as being both responsible for the lie and cunning enough to fool everyone else. There's a lot to unpack here, and none of it is good. The first and most important thing worth mentioning is that false rape accusations of this nature aren't really a thing (think about the social consequences for women even when their accusations are extremely credible; people don't do this kind of thing for fun). It's as if Myne's actions sprung fully-formed out of a misinformed, misanthropic incel fantasy; Kitamura is even depicted as some kind of an alpha male who gains women's attractions unearned. I feel like Myne's betrayal could have come in any number of different forms and not been half as problematic; unfortunately this choice reads to me as having been made with particular intent.
> The consequence of this is that it positions Naofumi to harden his emotions, come into his anger, and embody the type of toxic masculine traits that just make him into an unlikable protagonist. He begins to violently hassle shopkeepers and threaten people by confronting them with the low-level biting monsters he keeps hidden beneath his cape. He turns into the kind of world-reviling jerk that goes on to commit mass violence, inspired by the type of event these sorts fantasize as a common truth. It's dangerous and vile."

"…false rape accusations of this nature aren't really a thing…" Wow! So false rape accusations do happen, but not of this nature. Hell, despite being in a fantasy realm, I found it incredibly realistic. And his reaction of hardening his emotions is the embodiment of Toxic Masculinity!? According to SJW, any behavior done by a male is Toxic Masculinity. However, Naofumi did use violence at first to get what he needed, but that was because he was being ripped off by merchants because they wanted to screw him over. Certainly not moral of him, but then this world did kidnap him and forced him into this role… so that's debatable.

And yes, it does have a scene where a character is purchased as a slave. Yes, slavery and human trafficking are wrong, but this is a different world and a different time, and in this culture, it seems more of a gray area that's tolerated. Naofumi wouldn't have purchased a slave had he not been accused of rape, and his doing so ultimately helped him out later in his journey, on more than one occasion.

Despite the reviews by Feminist biased sources, the Fandom site (https://shield-hero.fandom.com/wiki/The_Rising_of_the_Shield_Hero_Wiki) for this anime poll reveals that 92% really enjoy the anime. Crunchyroll has announced there will be a 2nd and 3rd season.

That said, here is my spoiler review.

The story starts with our hero, Naofumi Iwatani, a university student who's obsessed with otaku (but not a gamer). Upon going to a library, he finds a book that transports him to another world where he is deemed the Shield Hero. The other heroes (sword, spear, and bow) came into the world much like him, but they believe this is a VR MMO game, and as such, they understand how to survive in this world much better than Naofumi. They also state that Shield class from their perspective worlds (they all come different Earth dimensions) is the weakest class.

The world is like a JRPG, except the game mechanics are part of everyday life in this world. People can talk about leveling up and gaining experience, much like we would talk about the importance of omega-3 in our diet. The four heroes were summoned to this world to stop waves of monsters that appear once every few months, getting worse with each wave.

Upon meeting the King, the four heroes are each given a party, but those members volunteer who they get to be with, and no one wants to be with Naofumi, because again, Shield class sucks. Then one woman, Myne, volunteers to go with him, and you can see where this is going. She insists on him buying her everything she wants (money the King gave him), and he reasons (since he can't use a sword, his shield won't let him) that if she's more powerful, then he'll level up faster.

That night, they're in a pub, and she keeps trying to get him to drink alcohol. He refuses and then goes to bed. He wakes up with all of his money and possession gone. The guards show up and arrest him. He is brought before the King, where the accusation is revealed that he got drunk that night and raped Myne. Upon asking for proof, the guards hold up a negligee stating it was found in Naofumi's room, which he does deny.

This is a matriarchal society (the true ruler is the Queen, but the King rules while she is away) and raping a woman is punishable by death, but since he's one of the four heroes, he won't be killed but told that everyone knows what he did and won't help him. The three other heroes also believe him to do it, with the princess warming up to the Spear Hero. Spear Hero is the classic Alpha Male, the kind of man that throws other men under the bus to appease women (which Paul described in his book as actual Toxic Masculinity).

Naofumi can't fight, he's defense only. So he must resort to buying a slave with what little money he has left, and he buys a very young demi-human. Owning of demi-humans is legal, but owning a human is illegal. Her name is Raphtalia, a sickly girl he uses to help him fight. She has a slave crest on her chest that causes her great pain if she disobeys anything he demands of her (this becomes important later).

They do a bit of fighting and level up. He's closed off emotionally, or so it seems as Naofumi treats her very well, even giving her all the food she desires and even gives her a ball that she sees other children playing with. He pushes her to do more than she's capable of, and even put his life on the line for her when she couldn't handle herself, which did inspire her to protect him instead.

Naofumi unlocks great power in his shield, and Raphtalia ages overnight to a teenage girl (and eventually a young adult). The first wave comes, and they help protect a village. At the celebration for stopping the wave, Spear Hero declares that Naofumi is evil because he has a slave and challenges him to a duel to free her (despite Raphtalia stating she wants to remain with him). Naofumi refuses, but the King demands he must take part.

Long story short, he loses the duel, much to the Myne's cheating. Had she not, Naofumi would have won. The King declares Spear Hero the winner, and it's revealed the Myne is his daughter. Naofumi pieces it all together. From the very beginning, it had been a setup. The rape accusation was used to get the entire kingdom to turn against Naofumi, and the King was in on it. In fact the duel was a way to take away the shield hero's ability to level up so he couldn't fight off the waves.

Raphtalia is set free. She then punches Spear Hero and rushes to Naofumi, stating that even as a slave, she chose to be his sword. All of this anger unlocks a curse shield ability. Later in the series, this power corrupts him, but his party (all females) breaks him out of, which I feel is a reflection of his character. His actions in helping them become stronger individuals become instrumental in helping him find his humanity.

Skipping ahead, there is a part where Spear Hero accuses Naofumi of brainwashing his party, because why else would they be with such a monster. I thought this was a great reflection of our world. Feminists are great at denying Female MRA's and Non-Feminists their agency, accusing them of having internalized misogyny or doing it just for male attention. Why else would someone make the decision they do, dismissing women from having a valid reason.

Much later in the story, the Queen shows up and puts the King and Princess on trial and uses the slave seal on her daughter so that every time she lies, she gets hurt. This is a lovely touch, as the idea of a woman being required to face the consequences of her lies is controversial today. Feminists argue that if we prosecute women of false allegations, then actual victims of rape won't come forward. The Queen also broadcasts this throughout the kingdom, clearing Naofumi's name. The Princess lies and is hurt every time she does. The Queen determines they lied about Naofumi and other actions as a means to grab at power, and their treasonist actions put the citizens in jeopardy. And so, she sentences them to death.

Upon being in the guillotine, Naofumi stops it and says that death is too good for them. He wants them to suffer as he had, to be publicly shamed by all citizens. He also says that the King's new name should be Trash, and the Princess's name should be Bitch, and her adventure name is Slut. So from then on, when anyone talks to her or about her, they call her Bitch. It's so funny. That is so wonderful.

This anime is fantastic. It's done so beautifully at showing how a false accusation destroys a man's life and how sadistic and cruel women can be. It also shows that men can contribute so much as well, even though he tries to turn his heart off, he still cares.

Whether you like anime or not, I recommend watching this. My hope is that this is another sign that the work we do in the Men’s Movement is making a difference, showing the struggles of men and how seriously fucked up our world is. And as a cherry on top, that it angers Feminists and SJW’s who can’t stand something disrupts their narrative.

There is a lot I left out, and beyond what it does for Men’s Issues, it is a great story.

Raphtalia: You could have lived in the capital.

Naofumi: Yeah, but it would only be a matter of time before I ran into Trash and Bitch.

What’s Wrong with Netflix’s “Mercury 13”?

May 10, 2023 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

This past November NASA launched Artemis 1, the first mission of the Artemis moon exploration program. Of note, a main objective of the Artemis program is to include a woman on the next crew that walks on the moon.

In recognition of this first Artemis launch, and in anticipation of the first woman on the moon, Netflix recently re-released its 2018 Mercury 13 film, a feminist-slanted documentary about 13 American women pilots who participated in a privately-funded program not affiliated with NASA to test women for space flight.

As should be expected after 50 years of feminist political and cultural indoctrination, the film presents these 13 women as victims of rampant sex discrimination that prevented them from sharing the glory of space flight with men, completely ignoring important facts about the early history of manned space flight.

The film’s gender bias is evident from Netflix’s tagline for the movie:

After rigorous testing in 1961, a small group of skilled female pilots are asked to step aside when only men are selected for spaceflight.

And here’s the Critic’s Consensus on Rotten Tomatoes review of the film:

Mercury 13 offers yet another sobering example of how institutionalized sexism has thwarted countless dreams — and held nations back from their full potential.

Normally, I would have ignored this film and its feminist-inspired perspective as just another of thousands of similar films, newspaper columns, magazine articles, and TV segments that have effectively served as feminist propaganda for decades.

However, as part of my primary goal to challenge The Washington Post’s longstanding gender bias, I’ve been writing letters to Post columnists who have written gender-biased articles. In doing some research in preparation to write a letter to the Post’s gender columnist, Monica Hesse, I learned a lot about the Mercury 13 program.

And it completely demolishes the feminist-slanted story told by the Mercury 13 film. Here’s a short summary of the points made in my letter to Hesse:

1. What both the movie and Hesse’s article overlooked

NASA’s requirement that the original astronauts have test pilot experience removed all 13 female candidates from consideration. It wasn’t sex discrimination that blocked these women, it was a requirement made necessary by the nature of very early space flight: the astronauts would need to be able to “pilot” what were essentially hazardous experiments in spacecraft design.

But what both the movie and article conveniently overlooked is the underlying reason why these 13 women didn’t have test pilot experience: for all of human history women have been protected from many of the burdens and extreme dangers placed only on men.

In particular, women have long been safe from hazardous military service that ultimately produced NASA's male-only military test pilots.

2. The early space program was no place for novices or women without test flight experience.

Two near-disasters in space that were averted only by Neil Armstrong's many years of test flight experience clearly show why these women were rightfully excluded from the Mercury program:

Armstrong's first trip to space nearly ended catastrophically:

> "Armstrong himself encountered near-disaster during his first space mission, Gemini 8. After a critical onboard failure, Armstrong and pilot David Scott began spinning out of control in space. After struggling to resist blacking out, Armstrong eventually regained control and landed safely."

What if it had been two women without test pilot experience flying in Gemini 8?

> We would have had two dead women floating in orbit around the earth.

Armstrong had to manually land the lunar module Eagle during the final descent to the moon's surface:

> "'Give us a reading on that program alarm,' Armstrong said. He sounded tense, but no more so than during the simulations. It was hard to grasp that a life-or-death struggle was playing out 240,000 miles (386,000 kilometers) from Earth, in a small, fragile machine descending rapidly to the moon. Communications were spotty; the computer was threatening to quit, and Gene Kranz, the flight director for this first lunar landing, felt Mission Control slip a bit further behind the power curve."

What if it had been two women without test pilot experience landing on the moon?

> We would have had the corpses of two women still sitting on the moon some fifty years later.

3. Both the movie and Hesse's article omit some really interesting details.

First, as described in an Atlantic magazine article, The Soviet Space Program Was Not Woke, the Russians put the first woman in space only because they became aware of the renegade Mercury 13 program.

> "The effort to bring women into the Soviet astronaut corps began when Nikolai Kamanin, the head of cosmonaut training, heard [about the wayward Mercury 13 program].
> "We cannot allow that the first woman in space will be American," Kamanin wrote in his journal. "This would be an insult to the patriotic feelings of Soviet women."
> …
> "Kamanin couldn't have said it any more plainly. The impetus was > nationalistic—any [gender] egalitarian impulse was in service of that primary motivation. Soviet women would fly to space for one of the same reasons that the rockets carrying them did: to beat their Cold War enemy."

Second, both the film and article omitted the real motivation for the wayward Mercury 13 program—it wasn't for gender equality!

The real reason is described in another Atlantic article, Why Women Weren't Allowed to Be Astronauts:

> "[Dr. William Lovelace, the founder of the Mercury 13 program] may sound progressive for his time, but his reasoning for including women wasn't. Lovelace imagined a future full of space stations circling Earth, carrying people busy at work. 'He was thinking that if you're going to have dozens of people on space stations, then you're going to need secretaries, you're going to need telephone operators, you're going to need lab assistants—and that means you need women,' … 'So he's thinking about the women for very much traditional, pink-collared, gendered jobs.'"

4. The movie exposes the hypocrisy of feminism

Why can't people see the enormous hypocrisy when women, who have never been expected to share the same burdens as men, then self-righteously claim, almost as a birthright, to be included in the glory of space exploration?

Or the hypocrisy of being accepted to the nation's military academies without the same draft cards required of the other "half of the population"?

Or the hypocrisy to be the recipients of a feminist-driven "preferential equality" in the nation's colleges and universities via a twisted Title IX, where male students' civil rights are being annulled in campus kangaroo courts in the name of "equal educational opportunity"?

Or the hypocrisy not to insist on having equal numbers of both men and women working in coal mines?

If women aren't ever part of THIS team:

Why should they expect to be included on THIS team?

This fundamental feminist hypocrisy is what's wrong with Netflix's Mercury 13 movie.

Title IX and college rape: A series of injustice, the conclusion

May 10, 2023 | by Jessica Denis | Link | Original Link

This series started in an effort to bring awareness to the issue of colleges attempting to adjudicate accusations of sexual assault on their campuses. Part 1 discussed two separate cases: Both men were clearly not responsible for what they were accused of; however, both had life-altering consequences. Part 2 discussed a case in which both the male and the female said it was not rape, and both parties filed their own Title IX lawsuits after the school refused to drop the case. Part 3 not only outlined an additional innocent man, but also brought the effects of a few of the "lucky" young men who were accused and found not responsible and the lingering effects of the accusation. In Part 4, a young man who was actually a victim of sexual assault was later held responsible regardless of the facts presented.

Stop Abusive and Violent Environments is one of the resources available to those who find themselves accused. SAVE released a detailed report on this topic. The 261 lawsuits reviewed included 207 separate universities. If that is not considered a systematic failure, I don't know what is.

One judge involved in the case of Dez Wells v. Xavier University said:

> "Moreover, it appears to the Court that the [University Conduct Board] here, a body well-equipped to adjudicate questions of cheating, may have been in over its head with relation to an alleged false accusation of sexual assault. Such conclusion is strongly bolstered by the fact that the County Prosecutor allegedly investigated, found nothing, and encouraged Defendant Father [Michael] Graham to drop the matter."

Another judge, this one involved in John Doe v. Brandeis, said on page 12 of his ruling:

> "Whether someone is a 'victim' is a conclusion to be reached at the end of a fair process, not an assumption to be made at the beginning. Each case must be decided on its own merits, according to its own facts."

Case after case in this analysis shows the repeated lack of due process, shifted burdens of proof, a presumption of guilt, negligence, breach of contract and erroneous outcomes that cause major damage to people's lives. These cases continue to be filed, not only by the accused but many times by the accusers because their cases were mishandled so badly.

So how do we change it? I have written story after story in this series that has now gone on for nearly two months, along with hundreds of hours of research before I started writing. What good is describing a problem if you don't also propose a solution?

I am not involved in politics and can only offer my suggested changes that extend across the board.

First and foremost is dismantling the “one in five” theory — the oft-repeated claim that one in five women on college campuses has been sexually assaulted. President Obama and other politicians have repeated this statistic, which has been thoroughly debunked.

Having your butt grabbed on the dance floor is unwanted sexual contact. It is NOT the same thing as sexual assault or rape. There is a difference. By denying that fact, all we are doing is lessening the value of respect given to an actual rape victim. There is a difference between someone who had their butt grabbed at a party and someone who was thrown to the grown, held down and penetrated against her will. While the black and white definition of such shows that both are sexual assault, we all know it is simply not the same thing. Having someone yell “Hey sexy thing” is not equivalent to sexual assault or rape.National standardized definitions need to be put in place that clarifies where the lines are crossed from sexual harassment to sexual assault to rape. By lumping “any unwanted sexual contact” into the same group, yes, one in five women will have experienced something under that broad definition. That does not mean one in five women was raped. Standardized definitions are needed so that punishments can fit the crime in a similar fashion to how criminal homicide is handled, with Murder 1, Murder 2, Manslaughter, Involuntary Manslaughter, etc.

One of the first things I did in this process was email a survey to more than 50 attorneys who have been named in Title IX cases that originate from sexual assault. Twenty of them responded that they agreed 100 percent with national standard definitions, along with a new study to be done based on those definitions to determine exactly how many women are truly raped on campus.

The other thing I found interesting is that 20 attorneys also told me these cases should NOT all be turned over to local police. Many rape victims will not go to local police, and forcing legal and criminal action would deter many victims from stepping forward.

I trust their opinions. They are the ones in the trenches dealing with this every day. My suggestion would be if these cases have to be adjudicated at the college level, there needs to be someone who specializes in law overseeing them. If a legal and criminal justice department is available on campus, that would be the first place to go — attorneys, retired investigators, etc., not the dean of students, who has no idea how to handle an accusation of rape.

There should be a national standard of practice imposed in addition to the “Dear Colleague” letter outlining what the procedure will be, based on the definitions as stated above. This outline should also outline what acceptable investigation is, as well as require that all of these investigations and administrative hearings be reported from start to finish. All students’ constitutional and due process rights should be upheld. There should not be an allowance for any student to be punished prior to the determination at the end hearing. If any student feels threatened by any other student, he or she should look into a restraining order or a no contact order. An accused student should never be punished or have temporary sanctions simply for being accused. If any of these are not followed, the college should be sanctioned immediately. Someone needs to hold universities accountable, and if that requires a specific department within the government, then it needs to happen.

I also spoke with Dr. Warren Farrell, the author of The Myth of Male Power and formerly on the board of the National Organization for Women in New York. I asked what his solution would be for college students falsely accused of rape. His response:

> First, since the university's primary role is to educate, its first step should be to sponsor confidential communication counseling to help the young man and woman hear each other's perspectives. Only if that fails should the University then hand it over to the non-university police with their guarantee of due process. Why? The university has too much of an incentive to support only the girl as victim, and deny due process to the boy, for fear of undermining public relations, angering donors, and being punished by the federal government.
> In the meantime, the best the young man can do is:
> - Do everything possible to hear the woman's perspective ASAP by doing nine things: listen, listen, listen; empathize, empathize, empathize; and apologize, apologize, apologize. Once he's empathized and taken responsibility, he can let her know his best intent without subtracting from his empathy and apology. His attitude: he must care about her, not just about saving his ass. His goal: for him and her to both be on the same team.
> - If he cannot access the woman, get to the university president. Explain that the most important way of reducing the girl's psychological damage is for her to be empathized with and apologized to. Ask the president to sponsor a private, confidential meeting, with the best interests of the girl in mind.The system makes these efforts very challenging, which is why the system needs changing. In the meantime, the best defense is an alliance.

I would like to add that if you are a male or female who has been wrongly accused of sexual assault, you are not alone. I cannot say that enough. There are resources available to you and hundreds of people who have stood where you are standing. Here are a few resources you might not know are available:

I want to thank all of the John Does and their families who were willing to talk to me, their attorneys for putting me in contact and FACE for helping to spread the word about this series.

The second-most-common question I have been asked is, "Why are they John Doe?" The answer to that is simple. They or their family members asked me not to publish their names. In many cases, the simple accusation means automatic guilt. Moving forward becomes difficult when your name has been dragged through the mud over and over again, especially in our world of social media. They just wanted to tell their stories. I gladly let them have their anonymity.

ERA: Gaining equal rights for men

May 11, 2023 | by David Ault | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: Ratifying the Equal Rights Amendment has long been discussed in the men's movement, but there was none more passionate about the project than men's rights activist David Ault, who established the Equal Rights Amendment Project of Men's Rights and actively lobbied for its ratification from the 1970s onward. The following article by Ault was published in MEN Magazine in 1996, and in honour of his memory we are pleased to republish it at AVfM. –Ed.

The notion that men need equal rights with women is almost as politically incorrect today as it was in 1978, when I began actively working in Virginia for ratification of the Equal Rights Amendment to the U.S. Constitution. Even today, the ERA is often referred to as the "women's rights amendment." This limited interpretation is difficult to understand given its wording: Equality of rights under the law shall not be denied or abridged by the United States or any State on account of sex.

During the late 1970s and early 1980s, I distributed pamphlets that explained why women deserve to have equal rights with men. As Vice Chair of the Virginia Equal Rights Amendment Ratification Council, I often passed out our organization's pamphlet entitled Women of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied.

We did not have a corresponding pamphlet Men of Virginia, Rights You Are Denied. In fact, men's rights were so excluded from the ERA ratification process that, despite repeated requests by several knowledgeable men, no men were invited to testify on men's equal rights issues before the U.S. Congressional hearings on ERA ratification.

Harris and Gallup polls informed us then that nearly 60 percent of all Americans favored ERA ratification. Although men were ignored as potential beneficiaries of a ratified ERA, younger men favored the ERA at nearly the same percentage as women. Many older men also supported it.

Despite this majority of women and men in its favor, the ten-year ratification period expired in June 1982 with only 35 of the required 38 states approving its ratification. I recall that some people blamed the ERA's defeat on men who wanted to keep women "in their place" by denying women equal rights. Particularly targeted for blame were those male legislators from nonratifying states who voted against it.

Upon reflection, perhaps some men are to “blame” for the ERA’s failure to be ratified, but not for the reasons I heard in 1982. During that period of time, I was one of very few men who donated large amounts of their time and money to support ERA ratification. I also voted for political candidates by giving heavy weight to their stand on the ERA. At ERA meetings and workshops, I was often outnumbered by the women present by 10 or 20 to 1. My level of passion in support of the ERA was typical of many American women.

Although many American men supported ERA ratification, their support was more from their heads. Men often explained to me that they supported the ERA for their wife, sister, daughter, or mother. However, they did not donate significant time or money to support its ratification. Judging from the phone calls that I made polling households for ERA support, many men did not vote for pro-ERA candidates as a top priority.

I submit that it was not the men (and women) who opposed the ERA that defeated it. Instead, those men who are largely to “blame” are the majority of men who favored its ratification and yet failed to give it sufficient importance in their lives to see that it passed.

Winning men’s active support for the ERA may be easier today. During recent years, men’s consciousness about their own issues has been raised substantially and the momentum is upward. Men are growing aware of how the narrow gender-role conditioning they receive during society’s indoctrination of them to become protectors and providers negatively affects both their emotional and physical health. They learn that, on average, men not only live 7 years less than women, but men’s quality of life is reduced in trying to live up to this restrictive gender role.

Men are grieving, publicly and privately, for the loss of their fathers and their distance from their own children. They are learning how welfare rules and our father-negative “family” courts separate caring fathers from their children. They are dismayed by the contribution that fatherless families have to the increase in homeless and runaway children, and to teenage suicide, academic failure, drug abuse, violence, and unwed pregnancy.

At the same time that women have control over their parenthood through abortion or adoption, men’s reproductive rights are either ignored or condescendingly dismissed. Men lack the “right to choose” legal fatherhood, but have the responsibility of financial support. Further, men have no corresponding right to either custody or noncustodial access to their children.

Although outlawing female genital mutilation gets national media and Congressional attention, over 60% of American male babies still undergo medically unnecessary, involuntary, and painful infant circumcision.

Men realize that only they have the responsibility to register for selective service and may subsequently face the military draft. Further, as women gain the option of volunteering for combat positions, men are still assigned to combat.

Men see programs instituted to help women, while men’s similar concerns go unacknowledged and unfunded. Examples of neglected areas include male academic difficulties at all educational levels, lack of support for “men’s programs” in higher education, failure to acknowledge and support male victims of domestic violence, lack of affirmative action for men to enter predominately female professions, low levels of government support to homeless men, unequal privacy provisions in public restrooms and dressing rooms, failure to recognize and combat female modes of sexual harassment of men, and more stringent employee dress codes for men.

Men are hurting from 30 years of being the object of unwarranted blame, male-bashing, and negative sex-role stereotyping. As their consciousness increases, men will be more receptive to understanding both the harm done to them by continued pressure to conform to rigid role models and the legal injustices still visited upon them. Men will see how unjustified blame and their traditional stoic conditioning have combined to repress any remedy to their equality issues.

However, when men understand how gender-inclusive application of the ERA will benefit them, their pain, anger, and desire for justice will propel them into action to support ERA ratification. Together with women supporters, they will work to successfully win ERA passage in the U.S. Congress and by the necessary three-quarters of the states.

To make this happen, men’s equality issues must be included in the debate over ERA ratification. The first step within each state is to continue to research and document the areas where men are discriminated against by local, state, and federal law. This includes not only laws written in a gender-biased way, but laws that, although gender-neutral in wording, result in bias against men in practice. Sometimes the remedy will not require changing the law; instead, changing public opinion will result in an equitable application of existing law. In other cases, the law will require modification or elimination.

The second step is to bring men’s equality issues and the ERA remedies to the attention of the public and our legislative bodies. Men might begin by asking each state legislature to memorialize the ERA again, as Washington State did in 1983. Memorialization means that the state legislature passes a resolution asking the U.S. Congress to pass the ERA and to send it out to the states for ratification. However, the reasons expressed this time by each state legislature for memorializing the ERA must include the need for men’s equal rights.

The third step is to secure an invitation for knowledgeable men to testify for the first time before the U.S. Congress when hearings are held again on the ERA. This will have three important benefits. First, it will help to bring the issue of discrimination against men before the entire country. Second, it will increase American men’s identification of ERA ratification with ending this discrimination. Third, it will create an official record of Congress’s intent to include equal rights for men in its justification for the ERA.

This Congressional record will be vital to men after the ERA is ratified, because judges often consider legislative intent in deciding how to apply the law to a specific case. After the Congress records its support for men’s rights, men will find it much easier to use the ERA to right legal injustices against them.

Finally, prepared with our research and buoyed by state and federal recognition of men's need for the ERA, men must continue to educate the public and join with women in the ERA ratification process. With women and men working together for a gender-inclusive ERA, to quote Susan B. Anthony, "Failure is impossible."

Natural Gynocentrism Fallacy

May 12, 2023 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

This expanded article from Wiki4men outlines 'the natural gynocentrism fallacy,' a concept coined by Hanna Wallen. – Ed.

The Natural gynocentrism fallacy refers to the belief that sexually mature women are the most important unit of the human species due to the role they play in reproduction – ie. it is a belief in which women are assumed to be more valuable to human society and to human relationships than are men and children. A corollary assumption is that women's lives and wants should be prioritized over those of men and children. Natural gynocentrism involves a denial of the fact that all adult humans, including women, are child-centric, gene-centric, and utilitarian toward that end, and a denial that women's evolutionary value is thus as an instrument of the child's creation and protection and not because her gender is valued per se outside this utilitarian function.

Successful pregnancies, the proposed motive for a lifelong prioritization of women, typically occupied around 5% of a woman's life in recent history, and less than 2% of lifespan today if women choose to have any children.[1] When breast feeding and infant care are added to the equation these percentages can be extended marginally, however in the context of traditional extended families who share care of older children this still leaves the majority of women's life-span without rationale for gynocentric prioritizing or pedestalizing. Even in the short female life-spans of women during paleolithic and neolithic periods a significant percentage of these women did live into old age and beyond reproductive usefulness (NB. averaging out infant deaths with deaths in old age gives a misleading impression that all women died at 30 years of age).[2]

Individuals perpetuating the argument that human culture "can't overcome natural gynocentrism" have failed to see that women's role in reproduction is actually the opposite of gynocentrism, and that women's evolutionary role involves treating women like men – ie. that women are only important because of what they can (and/or are expected to) do as utensils for perpetuation of the species.

Hannah Wallen, who coined the phrase natural gynocentrism, illustrates the fallacy with the following example:

> An example that demonstrates this is in a disaster movie where a family is on the mountainside of a volcano that is erupting, and they're trying to escape down the mountain. They take a boat through a waterway only to discover it's acidic. They've lost their ability to propel the boat and the liquid is eating through it. Grandma sacrifices herself to save the rest of the family, and she can because she's done having babies, while the other adults in the boat are actively involved in raising children. So-called "natural gynocentrism" is about children and does not contribute to or make inevitable the irrational gynocentrism we see in modern culture.[3]

Wallen summarises that gynocentrism is not a naturally occurring phenomenon, is not inevitable, and is something that can be corrected. She states that historical gynocentric attitudes that have been been treated as natural and as the reason why gynocentrism could never be eliminated are false, and the reality is that women (and men) have child-centric & gene-centric attitudes.[4]

It’s A Whole New Ball Game…. Not!

May 14, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Yogi Berra, baseball’s master of malapropisms, once uttered the immortal words, “It’s like déjà vu all over again.” If Yogi were still among the living, he would probably say the same about the big ballyhoo over women in baseball.

Last year I posted an article on Kelsie Whitmore (see “Kelsie Whitmore Proves Less Is More” posted on August 13, 2022), who had signed a professional contract with the minor league Staten Island Ferry Hawks. If you don’t want to read the article, the bottom line was she played rarely and without distinction, which would have meant a total lack of media interest if she were male.

Kelsie Whitmore was a media darling for…well, you know the drill: Being a pioneer, making history, being stunning and brave, etc.

Inexplicably, given her 2022 performance, Kelsie Whitmore is back with the Ferry Hawks in 2023. Perhaps they took a look at the talent on hand and figured they didn’t have a chance to compete for the Atlantic League championship (as in 2022, they are at the bottom of their division), so why not reserve a roster spot for Kelsie Whitmore? Again, her playing time is limited (as of May 11th, she has come to bat just three times and is still looking for her first hit in pro ball). The media attention has tailed off, but not to worry. The media have a new darling: Olivia Pichardo.

As was the case with Kelsie Whitmore, a team going nowhere chose to add a female to the roster to get some good public relations. This time around, it is a collegiate team: the Brown University Bears of Providence, Rhode Island. Freshman Olivia Pichardo showed up at a fall tryout and made the team. Head coach Grant Achilles said, “Olivia put together the most complete walk-on tryout I have ever seen from a player since becoming a head coach [2015].” Since only one other player tried out for him in the fall of 2022, I can only wonder how many players he’s auditioned.

As an Ivy League school, Brown is forbidden to dole out athletic scholarships – at least not officially. I’m sure that the needs-based scholarship committee considers athletic participation when they peruse the extracurricular activities of applicants.

Nevertheless, high school baseball studs are likely to look elsewhere when shopping for colleges. A ballplayer with an outstanding academic record can apply to elite warm-weather schools (e.g., Rice, Stanford, or Vanderbilt) and possibly get an athletic scholarship. That limits the talent pool for the Ivies. Consequently, Ivy League grads in major league ball are rare. The last Brown alum was shortstop Bill Almon. He was a real outlier, as he was also the No. 1 amateur draft pick in 1974 and made his debut after just 39 games in the minors. He went on to play 15 seasons.

Curiously, Ivy League baseball teams are classified as Division I (out of three divisions) by the NCAA. Typically, they schedule fewer games than other D-1 schools. Brown, for example, played 38 games in 2023. D-I teams usually schedule around 55 games.

Despite the asterisk that should accompany Ivy League baseball, the media have made a big deal about Olivia Pichardo playing Division I ball. This makes it seem as though she is playing at the highest level of college competition, which is technically true but not the truth.

Since it is difficult for ballplayers to perform in freezing temperatures (and few fans would show up if they did), the Ivy League schools typically start the season in tournaments at warmer climes and schedule away games with southern schools.

This year Brown, for example, played ten games below the Mason-Dixon Line before they played at their home park, Attanasio (named after the alum who currently owns the Milwaukee Brewers) Family Field at Murray Stadium. The Bears' home opener was on March 17, roughly a month before the average last frost in Providence. Opening day was damp and chilly, and only 115 fans were on hand to see baseball history. This was the day Olivia Pichardo made her debut as the first-ever female player in Division I history.

It was not a particularly memorable appearance. Sent up to pinch-hit in the 9th inning with the Bears losing 10-1 to the Bryant University Bulldogs, she swung at the first pitch and grounded out to the first baseman. Having entered the history books, she did not play the rest of the season. Since the Bears finished the season with a 12-26 record (the NCAA ranked them 280 out of 305 D-1 schools), there were surely other low-risk opportunities to put her into a game. In fairness, playing time for freshmen is usually minimal unless they are exceptional (in days of old, freshmen had separate teams).

So who is this bench-warmer who made sports headlines nationwide?

Pichardo stands 5'7" and weighs 155, pretty good size for a freshman female but only an inch taller than the Houston Astros' Jose Altuve, the smallest man in major league ball today. She is listed as a utility player in the roster posted on the Brown web site.

Now I'm not going to give you all the details of her background. If you're curious, you can consult her web site, oliviabaseball.com, and read all about her baseball odyssey. It's a comprehensive résumé that goes back to her Little League days. She says nothing remotely controversial and claims her biggest kick is being an inspiration to younger female ballplayers (at least she doesn't drag out the tired old "if they see it they can be it" trope), but if I read between the lines accurately, it seems she's angling for a future front office job (she's majoring in business at Brown) after she graduates. If the whole thing strikes you as self-centered, maybe even narcissistic, remember: This is a woman's space. A young woman's space.

During her freshman year, Brown Bears baseball attracted far more media attention than the team warranted. The entire university basks in the reflected glory. After all, any university can have a trans male on a women's sports team but Brown has a biological female on a men's sports team! Now that's progressive! And on top of all that, she's a Latina! Wow! She's really making history…admittedly at a time when history no longer means the chronology, description, and analysis of eras and events, but a woman boldly going where no woman has gone before…though thousands of men have been there and done that.

Once the 2023 Brown season was over, the media's focus on Pichardo didn't stop. But this time there was a major hiccup, the kind that is accompanied with acid reflux.

On May 3rd, before the Red Sox-Blue Jays game at Fenway Park in Boston, Olivia Pichardo was invited to throw out the first ball.

Now throwing out the first pitch is not reserved for men only. It's not unusual for a woman or even a child to be selected for this honor. But never before in baseball history had a female D-I college baseball player been accorded this honor. So attention must be paid! And it was.

Actually, Pichardo had performed the same duty for the New York Mets (her hometown team, as she hails from Queens) on their first-ever Women's Day on August 10, 2022. At the time she was not yet a Brown student but a summer intern in the Mets front office. Apparently, that first-pitch episode went off without a hitch. That was not the case at Fenway Park.

All she had to do was lob the ball from the pitcher's mound to the Red Sox player behind home plate. Not even remotely challenging for a Division I college player, right?

Wrong-o, friend-o!

Pichardo wound up and let loose, uncorking a wild pitch way out of the reach of her batterymate. "You throw like a girl" might have been the first thought to pop into one's head, but that would not be accurate. Most girls wouldn't have missed the mark as badly as Pichardo did. Too much Brownian motion on that pitch, maybe?

Granted, Olivia Pichardo, despite all the media attention, was not used to performing in front of large crowds. When she threw out that first pitch in New York last summer, she had not begun her college career so she was a relative unknown. Now her public profile was much higher, so she might have had a case of stage fright…Even so, a drunken knuckleball pitcher in a windstorm could have done better.

It was an object lesson in how quickly a carefully crafted narrative can unravel. After all that media hoopla about breaking barriers and making history, she flopped when the cameras were on her. It was not so much that she embarrassed herself, but that she embarrassed the media talking heads and typists who had been praising her for months. Was the media's narrative all wrong? If so, what about some of their other narratives? Hmmmmmm.

There was a time when such an embarrassment could be kept under wraps. Newspaper editors could spike the story. Newsreels could judiciously edit the footage. A radio broadcaster could make like Bob Uecker in the movie Major League and describe the pitch as "Juuuuust a bit outside." Those days are long gone.

Red Sox games are broadcast on NESN (New England Sports Network) so Red Sox Nation got an eyeful. Once seen, Pichardo's gaffe could not be unseen. NESN and numerous fans with smart phones video recorded the event for posterity. Naturally, comments were posted at Twitter and a lot of them were, let's say, less than complimentary. So what did NESN do?

They shut down the Twitter comments!

Turning off the comments section is often recommended to content creators with thin skins. Typically, negative comments in response to any sort of female empowerment video would be dismissed as the work of trolls at best, or misogynists at worst.

Now there are plenty of videos of men – even high-status men – embarrassing themselves with errant first-pitches bouncing in the dirt, sailing over the catcher and hitting the backstop, or whatever. No comment turn-offs for you guys.

When a man makes an ass of himself, he must face the music. Not so for the likes of Olivia Pichardo. But keep in mind that she didn't shut off the comments section, NESN did. And I'm betting that the decision to do that was probably made by a man. If so, it goes to show that chivalry is not dead.

Well, I don't know what the future holds for Olivia Pichardo. Given her freshman stats, I don't think she has to worry about a sophomore slump. Brown cannot squeeze much more PR mojo out of her presence. It is questionable if she deserves a roster spot if better players, presumably men, show up for the tryout next year. I would not want to be in the coach's shoes (or is it spikes?) in the event he decides to drop her from the roster.

Actually, I don't think Olivia Pichardo will garner much media attention after this year. The media will find another darling. Maybe Dylan Mulvaney will sign with a team in the WNBA. Maybe the NFL will hire a female to hold the ball for field goal kickers. Maybe the NHL will hire a figure skater. Maybe a female rugby player (Brown actually has a women's team) will suit up for a men's team. Gang bang! Gang bang!

Now there is the possibility that one day she may follow the Kelsie Whitmore career curve and sign with an independent minor league team. Or she might find a job as a coach. Like I said earlier, I think she's on the lookout for a front office job.

Personally, I would like to see the Chicago Cubs hire Olivia Pichardo after she completes her studies at Brown. They could use a she-Bear to serve as den mother and give all the Cubbies a big Bear hug.

Whoops! Did I just engage in sex role stereotyping?

A thousand pardons.

Narcissism Exaggerates Baseline Hypergamy

May 16, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many in the men's issues community have observed pronounced hypergamous behaviors among women. While some commenters pose reasonable evolutionary hypotheses for the behavior, there may be another cause at work – narcissism.

Society's encouragement of the sexes into quasi social classes, with men as chivalric class and women as freewheeling nobles, has generated a certain kind of narcissism among women in recent times. Acquired Situational Narcissism is a psychological state arising with acquired status, as in the examples of academic experts, politicians, pop singers, actors … and in this case women who, in modern society, are taught that they possess high worth, dignity, value, purity, status, esteem and reputation – simply for being women. This psychological disposition seeks to multiply the effect of hypergamy above what evolutionary models would require.

Among high narcissistic individuals, studies have found higher incidence of hypergamous behaviors, indicating that hypergamy may not be unleashed by a culture of sexual liberation alone; it may also be the result of an acquired social class narcissism that says "I deserve."

Excerpts from narcissism studies:

> A third strand of evidence concerns narcissists' relationship choices. Because humans are a social species, relationship choices are an important feature of situation selection. Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation. For example, narcissists are keener on gaining new partners than on establishing close relationships with existing ones (Wurst et al., 2017). They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends (Jonason & Schmitt, 2012) and trophy partners (Campbell, 1999), perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people. In sum, narcissists are more likely to select social environments that allow them to display their performances publicly, ideally in competition with others. These settings are potentially more accepting and reinforcing of narcissistic status strivings.
> [Source: The "Why" and "How" of Narcissism: A Process Model of Narcissistic Status Pursuit]

> Consistent with the self-orientation model, Study 5 provided an empirical demonstration of the mediational role of self enhancement in narcissists' preference for perfect rather than caring romantic partners. Furthermore, these potential romantic partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance (i.e., social status). Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation. Narcissists also were > attracted to self-oriented romantic partners to the extent that these others were viewed as similar. The mediational roles of self-enhancement and similarity were independent. That is, narcissists' romantic preferences were driven both by a desire to gain self-esteem and a desire to associate with similar others.

> Narcissism has been linked with the materialistic pursuit of wealth and symbols that convey high status (Kasser, 2002; Rose, 2007). This quest for status extends to relationship partners. Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty) (Campbell, 1999; Tanchotsrinon, Maneesri, & Campbell, 2007)

Dozens more quotations could be added, however the point is obvious: self-enhancement strategies of both narcissism and hypergamy share overlapping features, a fact that does not need to be labored further.

The rise of narcissistic behavior in women is receiving increased attention by academia in recent years, particularly with the addition of new variants to the lexicon such as communal narcissism, and vulnerable narcissism, which are considered female dominated modes of expressing narcissism.

Note: A more in-depth survey of narcissism variants among women, and their implications, will be published in the forthcoming New Male Studies mid-year (2023).

Alpha Males and Alpha Females

Alpha Males

The term "alpha male" comes from studies of animals. The dominant male animal in a particular group is called the alpha male. Alpha males are able to compete with other males and rise to the top of a tribe. They can then have just about any female they want, and because of their position of power, they can exploit these females. Recently the term has been applied to humans, and the human alpha male, like the alpha males of lower animals, tend to use their positions of power to exploit women.

No doubt alpha males have existed throughout human history and have often been viewed as heroes. One thinks of Genghis Khan, who in addition to conquering Mongolia in the 1100s, was also one of history's greatest ladies men. One also thinks of Achilles, William Wallace, Napoleon, and John F. Kennedy, all known for their dominance of men and having their way with women. Are such men born that way, or do they become that way as the result of environmental factors? Usually it is a combination: they are born with the biological makeup such as an athletic build to dominate, but they are also brought up in an environment that fosters such dominance. Famous gangsters grew up in the mafia, which extolled brutality of all forms, including rape.

One could argue that alpha male sexuality is not something a man chooses, but which is to an extent instinctual to him. But there are many people, mostly women, who would disagree with this notion. The recent rash of accusations of inappropriate sexual behavior, sexual harassment and sexual abuse by males in high places may be in reality an attack on alpha males, an attempt to criminalize what is actually normal behavior by such males.

For the past few months alpha males have been accused of sexual misdeeds. One of the recent celebrities to be accused was Charlie Rose, a television personality known for his gentlemanly interviews. Nine women have come forward and described various improper behaviors on his part. The Washington Post first reported on eight women had charged him with "unwanted sexual advances toward them, including lewd phone calls, walking around naked in their presence, or groping their breasts, buttocks or genital areas." Rose apologized for his conduct, saying he didn't realize his behavior was harassment. He was immediately fired by CBS and PBS and almost everybody assumed he was guilty without a trial, without a verdict, without a sentencing by a judge.

The focus in each case is on the man or men. It suddenly appears that women all over the media are expressing criticism about and suspicion of men. The spate of accusations makes it seem that men in general are sexual predators that can't be trusted. They make it seem that all men in high places, men with positions of power, need to be monitored. Indeed there have been some notions that have been floated around that men are innately sexists and that white men are particularly sexist as well as racist.

Although feminists have contended from the inception that their goal is equality between men and women, their emphasis at present is entirely on the feminist interpretation of equality. For example, the present outcropping of accusations of noted men by women has been almost always reported from the women's side. It is assumed by most that each of the men is guilty, whether he denies it or not, and there is a rush to judgment about the men. Often, like Charlie Rose, the men lose both their reputations and their jobs. One of the slogans of feminism is that "women should be believed" when they report sexual abuse. Hence there is a tendency by people, both male and female, to accept the accuser's version of the events they describe without question and to shut down anybody who expresses an opinion that is different from theirs.

This occurred when Geraldo Rivera took to Twitter to complain that "News is a flirty business & it seems like [the] current epidemic of #SexHarassmentAllegations may be criminalizing courtship & conflating it [with] predation." Rivera's employer, Fox News, made him apologize for his tweet, and indeed we have had a plethora of apologies over the last few weeks by men.

Alpha Females

In studies of tribal animals, the highest ranking individual is sometimes designated as the alpha. However, according to Wikipedia both males and females can be alphas, depending on the species. Where one male and one female fulfill this role together, they are sometimes referred to as the alpha pair. Other animals in the same social group or tribe will be submissive towards the alpha or alphas. Alpha animals usually gain preferential access to food and other desirable items or activities, though the extent of this varies widely between species. Male or female alphas may gain preferential access to sex or mates; in some species, only alphas or an alpha pair reproduce.

However, just as there are alpha human males, there are also alpha females. Males are not the only ones who get into power positions and use their power to exploit the opposite sex. Women also engage in inappropriate conduct, harassment and sexual abuse of men. However, while male sexual misconduct and abuse has to do with exploiting women's sexuality, more often than not alpha females use their power to not only to exploit males sexually, but also to psychologically castrate men, which means they dominate men by taking away what feminists call their "cock privileges."

In fact, the ways in which alpha females castrate men can be seen in the manner such women have recently gone after male sexuality. There seems to be a lynch-mob mentality among such women, an "off with their heads" attitude. Alpha females are unable to make distinctions and they classify men who come on to women in a clumsy way ("misconduct") in the same category as men who rape women. Misconduct is not a crime while rape is, and among alpha females and the men and women who follow them the distinction between sexual misconduct and rape is lost.

Garrison Keillor, the elderly humorist who for years distributed a folksy show called, "A Prairie Home Companion," was fired after a woman accused him of inappropriate behavior. Minnesota Public Radio didn't explain (which has been the case with many of the recent firings), but Keillor addressed the incident by immediately saying, “I put my hand on a woman’s bare back,” he wrote. “I meant to pat her back after she told me about her unhappiness and her shirt was open and my hand went up it about six inches. She recoiled. I apologized. I sent her an email of apology later and she replied that she had forgiven me and not to think about it. We were friends. We continued to be friendly right up until her lawyer called.”

This may be a kind of mass hysteria, which throws out the baby with the bathwater, and is in itself an abusive kind of behavior. The tyranny that shuts down and punishes men like Rivera who have an alternate opinion of events (rather than a political correct opinion) is another form of abuse. It is easy for women to point the finger at men, but it is not easy to point the finger at themselves. Sexual misconduct, harassment and abuse is not just about men. After 40 years of being a psychotherapist, I can say that there is an equal amount of men who hate women as women who hate men. Neither sex is entirely guilty or innocent. A slew of female high school teachers have in recent years been caught having sex with teen-aged boys. This has become public. But many day-to-day abuses of men by women are never reported because men don’t report them.

I’m talking about women who lead on and then reject men; alpha females who put down men’s sexuality as an innate kind of sexism without any empathy for the difference in men’s and women’s sexuality; women who have taken over many parts of our culture, such as the educational system from nursery school to college. Almost all elementary school teachers today are women, and they may be presenting, wittingly or unwittingly, a biased attitude toward boys, which may be the reason why today two-thirds of college undergrads are women.

A Case in Point

Recently I became acquainted with a case involving a professor who had taught at a college in Manhattan for about 15 years. During that period many students had challenged him, as students are apt to do, but one case stands out in particular.

During the second class of his Introduction to Psychology course a young woman came up to him and said she would like to talk with him in his office. Since professors are required to put aside an hour of time for students who had problems with particular assignments, he agreed to see her. They met later in the office assigned to Adjunct Professors and before he knew it she had started talking about her problems. He had been a licensed psychoanalyst in private practice for many years, and he had made this fact known during the first class, while introducing the course. This student, a young woman of about twenty, apparently decided that he was therefore available to do therapy with students.

She spoke in a very soft voice and, even though it wasn’t his job to do therapy with students, he decided to hear her out. She talked for about twenty minutes about her problems with men. She said she was always seeing men on the street, on the subway, in the parks, and finding them attractive. But once she noticed that the men looked at her, she was immediately disgusted by them. She particularly felt angry and envious of men in positions of authority, and would think to herself, “Who does he think he is?” She said at times she hated men so much she only dated women. At other time she hated men her own age and limited herself to dating women and older men. She spoke in a very soft and fast and circular way, and at times it was hard to understand her. At one point she said she had seen a church counselor but had stopped after five sessions.

It was then that the professor broke in and said he thought she should return to the church counselor or to some other counselor. He pointed out that free counseling for students was available at the college. He closed by saying, “I think you still have some things to figure out in therapy, such as why you’re so angry at men, why you are so attracted and then nauseated as soon as a man looks at you. You need to figure out why sometimes you’re only interested in dating women and sometimes you only date older men.”

At that point she suddenly laughed at him and said, “I never said I was interested in older men.” She laughed at him with contempt, and it occurred to him that she had found what she was looking for. She found a reason to have contempt for him, taking his words out of context and giving them a different meaning. To her it was as though he were asking her if she was interested in older men. She quickly got up and left the office, backing out as if he had done something inappropriate.

He pondered about what to do. It was a delicate situation. Women all over the country were accusing men of sexual misconduct, and they were always believed. He suspected that if he brought this to the attention of his superiors at the college, who were all women, it might not go well. He questioned whether they would believe him or her. It was apparent to him, from what she had said, that she probably suffered from a histrionic personality disorder. She was angry and particularly envious of men in authority and he was a teacher, a man in authority. It may have been that she found him attractive and then disgusting and wanted to find a way to knock me down.

He decided not to do anything about it, to just go back to teaching the class. But she started acting out in class, sleeping during several classes, talking to the woman who sat beside her for long stretches of time, texting on her cell phone during class and asking him disrespectful questions during class. He gave students a class participation grade, and at one point he called her up after class and informed her that her class participation grade was a C and that whether it went higher or lower was up to her. She sort of smirked at him and walked shaking her head. The next class he found out that she had gotten vengeance by telling students he had come on to her in her office by asking her if she was interested in older men.

Two students who had formerly liked this professor now played a game with him one day when he entered the class. The teacher who taught before him was just finishing his class, and the two women students began making a big deal over how young this teacher was. “Oh, you’re such a young professor. What do you teach? You don’t even look like a professor. Oh, my, I think I want to sign up for your class.” They were being inappropriately seductive to this young professor, and their professor could tell the young man was confused. Their game was meant for his ears. When he put my briefcase down on desk desk, one of the women asked, “Are you all right professor?”

These women had immediately believed this woman (the result of the well-known feminist demand that women be believed) and concluded that their professor was a pervert. He was anything but a pervert. He had tried to help this young woman with her problems, and she had jumped in and twisted what he had said to suit her purposes. He thought about confronting this student in the next class, but since there were only a few classes left in the semester, he decided to let it go. However, one of the two women who had at first liked him now dropped the class. Another woman, who had planned to do a research project with him stopped speaking to him.

This case shows the power that women now have over men and particularly how an alpha female can use the present anti-male atmosphere—in which all women who make charges against men must be believed—to her advantage.

An Equal, Loving Relationship between the Sexes

We need to have a truly equal relationship between the genders in which there is a real dialogue between them and a real agreement on how to accomplish the resolution of the divide between males and females. Ordinary men and women, not alpha males and alpha females, need to be in charge of this dialogue.

An interesting study on stress bears on this discussion. Robert Sapolsky, a psychologist, studied stress in a baboon tribe in Africa, which he documented in a famous video called, Stress: Portrait of a Killer. Sapolsky was interested in stress levels of the tribe, so he took the blood of each baboon in the tribe, measuring the degree of stress hormones in their bodies. He found that the alpha male and the alpha female had the least amount of stress hormones in their bodies. They were able to dominate all the males and females under them. Meanwhile, the baboons who were at the bottom of the hierarchy, the so-called “runt of the litter,” whether male or female, carried the most stress hormones. These were the baboons who were picked on the most and least able to fight back.

Sapolsky learned many new things about stress, and he also learned about the antidote to stress. This happened by a random happening during the years he covered this tribe. At one point the tribe discovered a garbage dump. The alpha males and females got first dibs on the food in the garbage dump, keeping all others away. They were the only ones to eat the food, which had gone bad. All who ate the food from the dump died, which meant that all the alpha males and females died. Those who were left in the tribe were the more healthy and loving members of the tribe. The males weren’t into bullying other males or exploiting women, and the women were also not those who were into bullying other women and playing games with men. As the result the tribe enjoyed a peaceful and loving existence. When Sapolsky later took the blood of the survivors of this tribe, all of them had fewer stress hormones in their blood.

Love, according to Sapolsky, is the antidote to stress. In order for males and females—whether baboons or humans—to form a loving and peaceful relationship, they have to be able to love each other. In order to love each other, they must respect each other. They must reach agreements through love and respect, not through battles for domination and control.

Feminism is basically a club for alpha females, which is attempting to force its values on the rest of us. Those of us who are sane must resist the feminist misrepresentation of all males as perpetrators of sexual harassment and abuse against females.

Dealing with the silent treatment

May 17, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Women have a lot of weapons in their emotional arsenal. One of the biggies is so common that we coined a term for it: The Silent Treatment. This is what women use in relationships to manipulate or punish. In this article, I will be discussing that silence and make some suggestions on what you can do about it.

Of course, I can't even start this article without suggesting that you sit down and ask yourself what you are doing with this kind of woman to begin with. We deal in some pretty harsh reality around here and the reality is that the silent treatment is a weapon of the personality disordered, in this case, most commonly with narcissists. If you find that hard to believe, please consult Google with a query on the silent treatment. You will find that some of what you're about to read isn't particularly new, even if my suggestions on how to handle it are.

If you have watched An Ear for Men YouTube channel for any length of time you know I don't make recommendations to do anything else with personality disorders other than to put them in your rear view mirror. Kick them to the curb. Say hasta la vista, baby. Show yourself that you have some standards and 86 her silent ass so she can go manipulate someone else. After all, if you don't have standards, you have no right to expectations. If you lay down like a doormat then it's unseemly to complain about a woman wiping her shoes on you.

That being said, we are not done talking about the silent treatment. What I have to say here is not about curing her of that kind of behavior, but I do acknowledge that a lot of men are from Missouri on everything to do with women. For those of you who don't know, Missouri is the Show Me State. And where it concerns women, many men have to be shown, sometimes a few dozen times.

If you follow my suggestions here, what you will be shown is that a woman who chronically uses the silent treatment is an emotional pathogen, willing to go out of her way to show you that you don't exist, to punish you by erasing you till she hears what she wants to hear, or gets you to do what she wants you to do. In the realm of moral poverty, she is sleeping under a bridge. But I am also going to point out that women who weaponize their silence aren't really deviating from the norm that much in the long run.

If you are familiar with my work, you know I talk frequently about how women control men by doling out attention and approval in sparing amounts. I mentioned in one how the word tantalizing is taken from the story of Tantalus, who was sentenced by the gods to unbearable thirst and hunger with fruit and water ever just out of reach. And that is how women train men, by tantalizing them, with sex, with approval, even with communication. And they do it because it works.

Even if this is the first article of mine you have read, you already know about this. You've seen it in women's code of conduct with men that put males in the role of pursuer. It's why women expect you to be the one to call, the one to take initiative for dates, the one to pay, the one to work hardest and the one to take the physical and emotional risks. And they don't just expect to be serviced, they expect to be impressed. For your efforts, you are either rewarded with her presence and attention — or rejected. That makes women sound pretty shitty till you consider how easily, even eagerly, most men are trained using those very techniques.

Blaming women and pointing fingers at them for the way they control men, whether it is with the silent treatment or something else, is like blaming a hawk for swooping down and snatching up a careless, inattentive field mouse. The silent treatment is just exaggerated femininity. The only difference between it and everything else she does to control is that the punishment aspect is more intense and overt. And it is a more direct betrayal of whatever loyalty she pretends to have to a relationship.

Like I said at the start, you have a number of ways that you can choose to deal with this, all of which should include her passing through the door marked exit, but for the sake of staying true to the intent of this article, I will pick three ways of coping that fulfill your need to see proof.

The first is what I call the Shives Shuffle. Figure out what she is pissed about and start apologizing. Remember, at her level of operation, groveling is good. You do, however, want to figure out what she is really mad about. If you gush apologetic about how your music collection doesn't have enough female artists, but she's really pissed about how you used a questionable pronoun at a party in front of her friends, then you will just be giving her another reminder of how little she thinks of you. A little more grist for the mill.

However, if you are unclear about the reason for her silent tantrum du jour, the best policy is to roll the dice on your best guess. Remember, she is giving you the silent treatment, so you can't ask. Since you are willing to try to solve problems with someone treating you like dirt, then just bear with it. But please make sure you are positioned physically lower than her, your knees are handy for that. Station yourself so that it makes it easy for her to look down her nose at you. Then start your begging with something extra servile like, "I'm just a man. I screw up so much that I have a hard time knowing when my faults have hurt you. Just know I am deeply sorry for however I offended and I apologize for being too stupid and clueless to even know what I did." After all, if you have no self-respect, no point in holding back, right?

If you need further tips on this, I suggest subbing to Steve Shives' channel and start emulating what you see. The proof you will get from doing the shuffle is that you will see her gloat over how successful she is in making you crawl and whine like a puppy for her forgiveness, whether you did anything wrong or not. If that is not proof that you are with the wrong person, then you need a lot more than this article.

The second possibility for how to handle this may be with what I call the Tat-for-Tits. This one is simple, even if it is a little stupid. Just cross your arms, stick your lower lip out a little and turn your head away from her with your nose slightly in the air. Feel the room fill with dead silence. Now, know this. While you are mirroring her narcissistic game playing, two things are happening. One, you are desperately hoping that your silence will have the same negative effect on her that her silence is having on you. And two, you are desperately hoping for that in vain.

Remember, we live in a world where women can get attention and approval without so much as lifting a finger. Men have to work for it. Those who don't know any better, work too hard. She knows, perhaps much better than you ever will, that your attempt to out-silence her is just another pathetic try at getting her to pay attention to you. It is a game she had the skills to outplay you at before she was five. She knows you are not ignoring her. In fact, she knows fully well that you are obsessing on her much more than you were before she went silent. The Tat-for-Tits puts her just as large and in charge as the Shives Shuffle.

Both the Shives Shuffle and Tat-for-Tits are humiliating options, but if you start with Tat-for-Tits you may end up having to resort to the Shives Shuffle when you figure out it isn't working. Wham! Double humiliation! On the bright side, that double dose of rubbing your own nose into the pile of poop on the carpet will give any Missouri resident all they need to say, "OK, you showed me." And if you need more proof than a woman who drinks your personal humiliation like fine wine….

Well, don't say I didn't warn you.

And so, as you expect, there is a third option. It is the most difficult and least likely of options for men in relationships because of the internal forces that lead so many men to the Shives Shuffle and Tat-for-Tits. In fact, to explain why option three makes sense I have to go back to something I have said over and over again in my videos and articles. If you want to coexist with a woman in a way that does not result in making you miserable or crazy, you have to either (A) Find a unicorn (best of luck to you) or (B) Be prepared to choose your self-respect over her childishness any day of the week. In fact, you need to be prepared to choose your self-respect over your respect for her, which should be easy if she is shutting you out to get her way. At any rate, I call this third and final option by a simple name: The values-based approach.

Now, let me ask you something. What do your values say about your being in a relationship with someone that is not in a relationship with you? What do your values say about loyalty and work and communication that resides on a one-way street? Now, I am not asking what you would like to believe your values are. I am asking you what they really are, in practice. Because I have news for you. If you have a history of the Shives Shuffle, Tat-for-Tits or all the variables in-between, then your self-respect isn't any more of a real value to you than the level of respect she shows you when she refuses to even acknowledge you exist.

To be clear, I am not saying that you have to exit the relationship to have or hold on to your values. But I am saying that stepping up and taking care of what you can do for yourself is probably going to send her packing.

Don't worry, you'll thank me later.

The point here is that the moment a woman goes into silent mode, she is telling you that she has effectively checked out of the relationship. There is no communication and no willingness. So, there is, at least for the moment, no real relationship. In my mind, that means any obligations you have to her are off the table. All of them. She has cast aside her obligations to you, and you are not morally bound to keep up your end of the deal. In fact, if self-respect is a guiding value in your life, you are morally obligated to focus all of your attention on yourself and to drop the dead weight in your life. Obviously, if you have children, you still have obligations to them, but you don't owe anything to anyone who has just exited your relationship. You don't owe it to them to tell them where you are going, or even that you are going somewhere. In short, you don't own them shit.

This, of course, is where it gets tricky. Just blowing out in a huff can be just a really elaborate expression of the Tat-for-Tits maneuver. You could find yourself at your favorite fishing hole or other select recreational spot, feeling completely miserable. You can do that in your own living room. The trick here is in understanding the sometimes very fine line between asserting your values and just playing tit for tat in the abandonment game. But it is an incredibly important distinction to make.

Generally speaking, the abandonment game is one you can't win. On the flip side of that is the reality that the values game is one you can't lose unless you shoot yourself in the foot by forsaking your values. It all comes down to the same basic crossroads that I will have to address every time I get a request for a video in how to handle this problem or that problem that Crazy Bitches bring to relationships with men. Your only hope is in your willingness to open the door and say, "Stop that nonsense or get out." Which is to say the answers should be in your hands, not hers.

Sorry, I don't have easy answers and don't believe they exist, which is why I stress in almost every video I make that values-based living requires your willingness to let her go. If you are like most men, you will experience pangs of distress and a desire, sometimes overwhelming, to take the initiative to restore balance to your relationship.

Hear this. Anything you do has the opposite effect of bringing balance. You can Shives or Tat your way into the illusion of balance, but that is all it is, an illusion. And underneath it is the reality that you have once again tossed your self-respect under the bus and caved into her manipulation. So take my advice and take the pain.

You see, the silent treatment's only purpose is to inflict sufficient emotional harm on you in order to bring compliance. Matter of fact, I think I will say that again. The silent treatment's only purpose is to inflict sufficient emotional harm on you to bring compliance. Everything else is bullshit. If she tells you she was too upset to talk, it's bullshit. If she says she was too afraid to talk, and she will almost certainly pull something like that, it's bullshit.

Everyone understands the need here and there to take a few minutes to compose yourself or to settle down before trying to resolve a dispute. That can be a healthy part of addressing problems in a relationship. But when it stretches past the point a person reasonably needs to regroup, then it ain't nothing but a ploy. Don't make the mistake of treating it like anything else.

Now, provided she does not pack her bags, you will be presented an opportunity to put your actions into words, with her listening. She will be the one to create that opportunity right about the time that she figures out that the silent treatment is resulting in recreation for you rather than remorse. And I want you to note the importance of this crossroad for her. This is where she may, and I say may very carefully, be showing you that she wants to resolve the problem or she shows you that she won't live with anything less than a lapdog. In the case of the latter, she is doing you a favor. If she opts for the former, you may have an opportunity.

Here's what you say when she opens the door to conversation again. "When you go silent, you are checking out. That is when I will check out, too. Every obligation I have to you is off the table. This isn't negotiable." Then shut up. I mean seriously, shut up. Don't explain it further. Don't defend it and don't argue with her when she lies and says you don't understand. Or when she says that she was too angry, afraid or whatever other bullshit excuse she has for not talking to you. No matter where she tries to stray the conversation and take you off balance, and she will try valiantly to do just that, just quietly stand on what you have already said.

If she leaves, you win. If she stays and starts owning her shit, you win that round. If she stays and manages to put you back into a corner, it is only because you threw your values under the bus, and is, in that case, your own fault.

Hopefully, you get the picture here. Winning conflicts with a manipulative loser of a woman isn't about developing a strategy and then seeing if it works. It's just about you not being a doormat. If you are not a doormat, then you won before she ever opened her mouth, or before she went silent as the case may be.

An exercise in hostile framing

May 17, 2023 | by Paul Taylor | Link | Original Link

I am going to ask the reader's patience—just for a moment. What we are going to examine is best understood with an example first. Thus, it is best to keep the "cat in the bag" initially.

Imagine if you heard or read the following as a health alert, or a public service announcement.

"There is a condition that is the greatest source of death in the world. This condition is chronic, progressive and uniformly fatal.

This condition is killing people all over the world—and most of us don't even think of it as a problem."

So far, so good? Sound pretty familiar? Let's continue.

"It is chronic: once you have it, it keeps going.
It is progressive: it is characterized by a set of symptoms that worsen over time.
It is uniformly fatal: all who contract this condition die. There is currently no cure. The fatality rate is 100%."

At this point, the announcement would probably have your attention—but something else is happening. There is an alarm going off in your head, and an inner voice that tells you "this is starting to sound like nonsense." Good. Keep that alarm plugged in.

"All who contract this condition die. By the way—everyone contracts it. It is called Life. Please donate to the Prevent Life campaign today."

And now the "cat" is out of the "bag."

So, what did we just demonstrate here?

That anything—anything—can be framed negatively.

Remember this the next time someone –researchers, "experts," film commentators, anyone– starts to talk to you about problematic masculinity. Remember—anything can be framed negatively.

One classic way to frame something negatively is to tinker with the accepted definition. Remember when masculinity meant things like willingness to protect and defend, willingness to take risks, and willingness to act on goals and values. You will no doubt have noticed that the "recipe ingredients" have been altered: now masculinity allegedly is characterized by "aggression" and "the wish to dominate."

By the way, there is a name for this kind of hostile, manipulative framing. It is called "propaganda," and it is as old as the human race. The ancient Greeks preferred the term "sophistry." The Greek philosopher Plato was openly critical of sophistry; the true goal of philosophy, said Plato, was the pursuit of the truth, while the goal of sophistry was simply to apply what appears to be logic in order to convince or persuade.

What you will notice is that propaganda is not limited by logic or facts—because it uses them: every statement you just read is factual and the conclusion is logical (given the facts). Yet, once you reach the conclusion, you immediately know the conclusion is absurd. The key is which facts you select, and how you present them.

A prime example of such manipulation is one we see during every election year from the mouths of the candidates. This is not to say that politicians don't lie—they most certainly do. It is simply to say they don't need to lie. They can (and do) distort the truth by selectively telling the truth.

There is a logical approach, however, that can be used to test manipulative arguments. The traditional name (and one that is still used in logic and math classes) is "reductio ad absurdum." According to this logical approach, if a set of assumptions can be shown to lead to an absurd conclusion, then the assumptions are proven absurd as well. The above demonstration fits this format (although somewhat colorfully).

So, I would argue that men are entitled to apply this reasoning to feminist arguments. Let's do a little inventory, shall we?

One of feminism's chief assumptions is that there are no meaningful biological differences between men and women—that these differences are either insignificant and/or they are a product of social scripting. Hence, boys are only boys because they are taught to be, and the same for girls (or at least, again, in any way that is significant). A chief conclusion of feminism is that we live under a system of essentially universal male rule, called "patriarchy", that constructs social rules that benefit men and limit/restrain women. Now, let's take these assumptions forward logically to see what conclusions they generate.

If women are essentially indistinguishable from men, then there should be a minimum of difference in their motivations and goals. If there is no meaningful difference in motivations and goals, then there is no point in establishing a system of male rule because it would make no difference. Also, if men and women are so indistinguishable from each other, it should be difficult for one group to even conceive of the other as worth dominating—after all, in all ways that matter they are basically the same already. Therefore, if the premise that men and women are not meaningfully different is true, it should lead to the conclusion that no one has a reason to dominate any one. Yet, we are told that men are powerfully motivated to dominate women. The conclusion and the assumptions, presented together, create an absurdity.

Let's try another one.

There is another branch of feminism, generally called Radical Feminism, that starts with a different assumption: that men and women are, indeed, basically different, and that specifically male traits are predictably negative, disruptive to society, and dangerous to individual women. Let's take these assumptions forward logically and see what happens.

If men are basically motivated at a natural level to dominate women, then our world history should reflect this pattern. Feminists of this vein like to cite historical points such as the delay in achieving the female right to vote or the delay in achieving abortion rights. Yet, if we begin with the assumption than men are motivated to dominate, and that men currently (and historically) have political power over women, then men should be using this political power to prevent any change that would weaken that power. Yet, both the female right to vote and abortion rights were achieved at times when men overwhelmingly held political power. Indeed, virtually all specifically female rights have been bestowed by male judges and lawmakers. If men hold the power, and if men are fundamentally motivated to dominate women, this could not happen. When the conclusion and the assumptions are viewed together, we get another absurdity.

Let's proceed by using this approach in a slightly different way. If feminism can be shown to resemble another oppressive line of thought, that has already been rendered absurd, then feminism is at least logically suspect (if not actually proven absurd). One very valid point that anti-racist thinkers have made is that our nation's prior racist ideas about African-Americans were internally contradictory, and thus illogical. (These ideas were also proven illegitimate by observation/research.)

If you examine this nation's history of racist ideas about African-Americans, you find a set of statements that are –when aligned—glaringly contradictory, but which white people of this nation long held as true. As an example:

"Black people are not very intelligent."

"Black people are clever liars."

It doesn't take much examination of these two statements to see the contradiction. Yet it is not uncommon to hear these kinds of assertions from racist thinkers (often in the same conversation). Why does this go unnoticed? Because both statements agree with something else: the speaker's feelings about the topic. When two differing assertions both trigger the same feeling in the speaker/listener, the logical inconsistency can go unnoticed.

Does this occur in feminist thought about men? Let's see.

Here are two assertions I have heard repeatedly from feminists about men:

"Men don't know their own feelings."

"Men use anger to intimidate and control women."

If men are largely unaware of their own feelings, then they should be essentially ineffective at either recognizing or utilizing a feeling. But we are told men routinely (and presumably effectively) employ anger to control women. This is not very different from the kind of inconsistencies that were once spoken about African Americans.

Thus, feminist thought about men is disturbingly similar to racist America's historical thoughts about African-Americans.

Are there any lines of thought that are even more irrational that feminism also resembles? Let's see.

Hitler: "Why does the world shed crocodile's tears over the richly merited fate of a small Jewish minority? …"

Feminism: "I bathe in male tears."

Hitler: “Don’t be misled into thinking you can fight a disease without killing the carrier, without destroying the bacillus. Don’t think you can fight racial tuberculosis without taking care to rid the nation of the carrier of that racial tuberculosis.”

Feminism: “The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race.” Sally Miller Gearhart, in The Future – If There Is One – Is Female.

Or.

Feminism: “If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males.” Mary Daly

Hitler: “From the rostrum of the Reichstag, I prophesied to Jewry that, in the event of war’s proving inevitable, the Jew would disappear from Europe. That race of criminals has on its conscience the two million dead of the First World War, and now already hundreds and thousands more. Let nobody tell me that all the same we can’t park them in the marshy parts of Russia! Who’s worrying about our troops? It’s not a bad idea, by the way, that public rumor attributes to us a plan to exterminate the Jews. Terror is a salutary thing.” (quoted in John Toland, *Adolf Hitle*r. London: Book Club Associates, 1977, p.702-3).

Feminism: “I feel that ‘man-hating’ is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them.” Robin Morgan, Ms. Magazine Editor.

I think the reader will see the pattern of similarity. I also think feminists—radical or otherwise—should pause and consider their path.

So what do the sophists, Nazi’s and feminists have in common? In summary: logical manipulation, hostile intent and extremism.

Let me close with a quote on this kind of manipulative extremism from a very old source.

“When a man is unanimously condemned to death, you must release him at once. Reflect on this.”

Talmud (as cited by Samuel Paul Veissiere, PhD in Psychology Today, 2/16/2018)

(An offered interpretation of the above quote: when a group gives you uniformity of opinion about anything, it is time to consider whether this uniformity is due to the facts or to social/political pressure within the group to conform.)

Well, alright—one more comment to close on a lighter note:

A vociferous thing is the Radical,
Who insists that men are so badical.
Her opinions get jawed,
Though her logic is flawed,
And her conscience seems on sabbatical.

Insane utterances delivered in dulcet tones

May 18, 2023 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

Barack Obama has always made me feel instinctively uneasy and skeptical from the moment I first heard him speak in public. Everything about his slick, articulate and "too cool for school" persona set off alarm bells. I get the same feeling whenever I walk into a car yard and the approaching salesman displays a well-practiced smile and uses my name in every sentence he utters after our handshake.

Fake. Transparent. Insincere. Liar. Poser. Egotist.

When even Australians were falling at the feet of this new messiah in adoration, I was quietly suggesting they may want to wait a little while before granting him sainthood.

Everything the man has done since he won the presidency in 2008, has vindicated my gut reaction.

I always believed the general population was less gullible than many believe. I thought that phoniness was very easy to detect and that such insincerity is soon revealed when the action of such bullshit artists fails to match their words.

I was wrong.

It seems a seems a suave, charismatic manner and a smooth, eloquent delivery in speeches is all most people require in their president. It is apparently…presidential.

I won't list the many examples of this hypocrite's presidency which undermine everything he claimed he stood for. Astonishingly, many people don't see the enormous ego possessed by this narcissist. Ego and narcissism are generally associated with Trump. I think Obama's ego puts Trump's in the shade. Obama just displays his in a far more palatable package wrapped up in false self-deprecation, brilliantly delivered auto cue speeches, a handsome face and easy smile.

Some love Trump others detest him, but few people doubt that he believes in most if not all that he advocates. I don't believe one silky word that flows from Obama's lips. He is constantly attuned to the needs and desires of his audience at any given moment.

He is the kind of man I have encountered in many different environments. They are constantly saying words and making statements they think people want to hear. Nothing they say is authentic or comes from a deeply felt passion or belief.

These men are often very willing to dismiss and denigrate other men in order to bathe in the temporary yet seductive glow of being considered a good and insightful man, one of the very few in existence.

Obama mastered this method to excellent effect during his presidency and continues to do so with the same positive results.

Is it the colour of his skin which provides Obama with some kind of a protective shield from any pushback or consequences for his demonstrably bigoted and false statements? Are people afraid they will be branded a racist for daring to question the chosen one?

I cannot fathom the idea that there is not a single person in the mainstream media I am aware of who has called out his shameless gender bigotry.

It is the old Emperor's New Clothes situation which has never been more apparent than in these troubled times where daring to tell the truth will end your career or social life and could possibly see you facing criminal charges.

When he stood at the rostrum on Father's Day and began to denigrate and admonish fathers for being absent and lazy, where were the dissenting voices? Not only did he attack fathers for failing to do their duty and take on the responsibility of fatherhood, he sang the praises of single mothers, thanking them for their tireless work and commitment to their children in the absence of any support from the fathers. All this on a day which was created to honor fathers and the role they play in their children's lives.

Listen to the applause and vocal affirmation as he glorifies America's single mums on a day set aside for the affirmation of our dads.

What a sycophantic sleazebag.

He did not mention the fact that many of these single mums have children to four different partners. He didn't mention the fact that these women often choose to keep the father/s away from their flesh and blood and do so with the willing assistance of the courts and government. He didn't mention the thousands of dads who are financially supporting children who do not possess their DNA or the mothers who lie to them.

He didn't mention the fact that the government has become a substitute provider to these children, relishing the fact that many women are seduced by and hooked on the welfare system which so many of them use and abuse.

What insane demographic would dare to bite the hand that feeds them?

And this masterful orator (when the teleprompter is working smoothly) has continually sounded the alarm about the existential threat facing humanity-climate change.

Seas will rise! We are all doomed I tell you. We must act now! This speech was delivered many years ago. Yet, what is this? The Obamas purchased a multi-million dollar ocean front mansion! If you don't laugh you will cry. The man is shameless. You can be assured that he and Michelle will continue to preach the climate catastrophe gospel without even blushing as they return home and drift off to sleep to the sound of rolling ocean waves.

But it is his constant and well documented method of winning the approval and support of women which sticks most painfully in my gut.

Who can forget Obama's signing of a bill regarding equal pay, surrounded by a group of women who nodded solemnly at every lie he spoke?

Just read his words and try to believe he thinks they are true.

> During the course of her career, a working woman with a college degree will earn on average, hundreds of thousands of dollars less than a man doing the same work.
> Now that's wrong!

> Anyone who says seventy-seven cents on the dollar is pretty close to equal, I say your math is bad!
> No man would work a day without pay! (Apparently women do.)

Can anyone look me in the eye and tell me that this intelligent man does not understand how this gap arises? The United States Department of Labor rape crisis in American University Campuses.

In one clip he tells the males of America,

> "Real men do not hurt women! Being a man means recognizing sexual violence and being outraged by it and doing your part to stop it"

Just imagine an American President saying:

"Real women don't bash, abuse and murder their babies," as though many women believe that such behavior is perfectly acceptable.

That is the hidden (and often blatant) message insinuated in every comment Obama makes on gender issues.

You ignorant, brutish masses require my guidance and expertise in the field of gender relations. Without good people like me at the helm, what hope do women have?

So why have I written this retrospective piece on a man who is no longer in the spotlight? Well, Obama caught my attention with some comments he made during a visit to Singapore.

Obama spoke what I consider to be some of the most asinine, mind-numbing, demonstrably stupid and bigoted words a politician could utter.

Speaking at a leadership event in Singapore on Monday, former President Barack Obama said there would be "significant improvement across the board" if countries were led by women, and that "old men" needed to get "out of the way."

> "Now women, I just want you to know; you are not perfect, but what I can say pretty indisputably is that you're better than us [men]," the 44th President said, according to the BBC. "I'm absolutely confident that for two years, if every nation on Earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement across the board on just about everything … living standards and outcomes."

I try to imagine I am a woman sitting in that female dominated audience. How would I feel when I heard these words?

Patronized? Belittled? Taken for a fool?

Yet most of his female audience seem to lap this shit up.

I don't get it. His comments about women are so childish and transparent. He may as well chant the old playground rhyme used by females in primary school:

Girls are the best! Chuck out the rest!

Or simply echo the words of his wife, Michelle who once told a large female audience:

"Women are smarter than men."

Why are these silly, petty people so revered in America?

Obama has dealt with many female leaders at various levels of government. Without resorting to a trip through history one can readily acquaint themselves with countless examples of female ineptitude in government. Does Obama really believe that possession of a vagina is a guarantee of good leadership?

Maggie Thatcher remains one of the most hated and divisive political figures in British history. Angela Merkel oversaw the collapse of Germany's economic power and her open border policy led to many serious problems during her tenure. Julia Gillard was an abysmal failure here in Australia despite the enormous wave of goodwill she rode into office after backstabbing her colleague, Kevin Rudd.

Catherine the Great and Elizabeth the First were warmongers and a match for any of their male predecessors or those who followed after them. History buffs could produce an impressively lengthy list of monstrous female rulers. Our modern-day experiences reveal that females are just as flawed, incompetent, corrupt and ego driven as their male counterparts.

Women are indisputably better leaders.

What a sickeningly absurd notion. How is it any less absurd than suggesting redheads or amputees make naturally better leaders due to the color of their hair or absence of limbs?

Does having a penis ensure a man possesses any particular quality or aptitude? We seem to cover an enormous range of possibilities and we have seen them all played out throughout the centuries. Old white men seem to be the target of Obama's ire, yet it seems these ancient buggers have done a more than adequate job in setting up our civilization and the countless institutions we take for granted.

And this is where the confusion sets in. Is Obama suggesting there are fundamental differences between the genders? Is he suggesting that all potential female leaders possess the same skill sets and ideological views? Has he not experienced female leadership in our education system? Do we not see countless examples of disharmony in female led staffrooms and outright bullying from the female principal and female staff? I have experienced this during my career in education. Surely this alone would lead one to understand that it is individual temperament and integrity which leads to good leadership rather than one's genitals.

If Obama truly believed what he was saying he would have stepped aside and let the far more experienced Hillary Clinton sit in the White House. Barack didn't do that. He fought tooth and nail to keep her out and ensure that yet another man was Commander in Chief. Himself!

You will find that most men who advocate for more females on boards or in political parties mean other men should be sacrificed in order to ensure this madness is brought to fruition.

Hillary's disastrous campaign in 2016 seems to have been more than enough for the American voters to decide they did not want this particular female leader as their President. Obama is certain she would have delivered a better world for all.

The man is beneath contempt. His pandering to females is cringeworthy and very damaging to both men and women in America. He continues to poison women and young girls' minds with the lie they are treated as second class citizens in their country. Feeding female victim mentality serves a short-term purpose but ultimately creates further injustice for men and boys (as seen by his disgraceful guidelines for adjudication of campus sexual assault) and another generation of angry, self-entitled women who believe the world owes them a free ride.

I wish that just one of Obama's many lies could turn out to be true and we could watch the ocean rise and swallow up the house occupied by two of the most hypocritical, dishonest, virtue signaling con artists in American politics.

The death of love, marriage, & community, in Black America: Requiem for a heavyweight

May 19, 2023 | by Mumia Ali | Link | Original Link

> "Love's in need of love today."
> —Stevie Wonder

Some years ago, I received the following email from my good friend Mr. Paul Carrick Brunson, as I'm a subscriber to his newsletter:

> Hi There,
>
> I wanted to share with you briefly my thoughts on a subject that has me impassioned.
> It's inspired by an interview I did earlier this week. I was asked to appear on Good Morning America to discuss my thoughts on the latest reality show, Married at First Sight. It's an extreme, so-called social experiment where total strangers meet and marry blindly. The couples must then live together for a month before deciding whether they'll stay married or get a divorce. The creators of the show claim it's an experiment to determine which people make the best romantic partners.
> Needless to say, it's a controversial project that has many people talking. But to me, the show is just as far-fetched as it sounds. I'd even dare to say it's dangerous.
> Now, I'm all for blind dates. I think they have the potential to expand one's network and social circle, allowing you to meet and interact with interesting people you may have never had the chance to before. If the date doesn't work out, there's nothing "lost." Only experience gained.
> But Married at First Sight toys with a union that I—and so many others—hold sacred. This reality show dilutes the gravity of marriage by combining two people unstrategically with no shared values or compatibility.
>
> And what if the blind marriage between the participants doesn't work out?
> Perhaps the worst part of this show is that it makes a mockery of marriage further by offering what appears to be a clear-cut solution to an unsuccessful union—divorce.
>
> Social experiments typically contribute to the greater good of society. But this one? I simply don't see how it will be beneficial to furthering our understanding of love and marriage. What I do see, though, is how it would benefit show creators, producers and the television network's bottom line financially. Nothing makes more money than reality television drama and disasters. This will be no different.
> It's yet another great example of TV (and the profit motive) attempting to > destroy a sacred union.

One week later, I got the following local story in my daily news feed:

> PHILADELPHIA (CBS)—Authorities are investigating the cause of death of an elderly couple whose bodies were discovered inside their Strawberry Mansion home early Thursday morning.
> Police say the only daughter of the couple found them dead in the living room of their row home in the 2500 block of North Spangler Street shortly before 1 a.m. Neighbors who heard her screams called 9-1-1.
> Firefighters also responding to the call vented the home, suspecting carbon monoxide, but instruments detected no levels of the deadly gas.
>
> Investigators say they were no signs of forced entry into the home and no visible injuries to either the man or the woman.
> Family members identified the couple as Rufus and Algladys Perry.

What does Brunson's freely admitted rant of righteous indignation and the death of an elderly couple in one of Philly's historically Black neighborhoods have in common, you ask?

Well, I think that what they have in common is not just the degree to which marriage (and by extension, relationships) has been cheapened overall in American life but also the extent to which its cheapening, death even, has profoundly impacted Black American life—in ways that even now we are barely able to fully understand.

For those who may be other than Black (read: in the main, White), let me say this: Without question, the themes that I'll be writing about in this article have had a profound impact on the whole of American society, not just the Black part of it; hardly anyone reading this will be able to say, with a straight face, that they've been untouched by it, either directly or indirectly. But it can also be said that no part of the American family has been so directly hit as hard on these fronts as the African-American section—and it has also been proven that Black America is a kind of bellwether as to what is to come from the rest of the country as a whole. So, stick around—even though the article may not be talking about you directly, it is definitely something that concerns you.

While "PCB," as I refer to Brunson, may be in a position that precludes him from "cutting loose," I'm a bit more fortunate in that regard, so let's keep it 100: the major cultural, social, political, and economic changes that have come down the pike over roughly the past half a century, along the lines that are being discussed in this article, have done a job on Black America that several centuries of slavery, and another century of Jim Crow, couldn't do to Black America—which was not only to break it apart spatially, economically, and politically but also to break its spirit.

Let me repeat that: What PCB is talking about above is the culmination of a multi-decades assault on the very foundations of what makes a family, a community, a nation, who and what it is. And that when it comes to Black America in particular, that multi-decades assault has achieved something that slavery, Jim Crow, and the Ku Klux Klan combined—over the course of three and half centuries(!)—couldn't do—which was not only to break us apart physically but also to break our spirit.

By now, you don't even have to be an American to know the most basic of facts and history on this score, but for the record it's good to go over them for the sake of the argument being made in this piece. According to the excellent research of Harvard African American historian Professor Louis "Skip" Gates, Blacks, immediately coming out from under slavery, got married in droves and were eager to build families and communities. In fact, marriage was such a norm in Black America that by 1950 MORE Black Women were married than White Women—this at the height of the Jim Crow era.

By the year 2000, however—only a half-century later—marital rates in Black America not only plummeted but also were at all-time low levels. Blacks, even when controlling for education and incomes, divorce and break up at a rate much higher than Whites of the same education and income levels. To be sure, and some would point out, not without reason, that racism would play a role in that. After all, another fellow Harvard academic, Professor Alvin Poussaint, has rightly noted the ways in which merely being Black can and does have an impact on just living in the United States day to day.

Still, one has to wonder how it was possible for so many Black Americans to forge families—and by extension communities—against what must have seemed to be intractable odds.

In 1950, at a time when out-of-wedlock births and "baby mamas" was something to be scandalized, the Black rate was less than 30%—the current figure of the White OOW birthrate. By the time the 21st century rolled around, that number was tipping 70% nationally; today, it is creeping towards 80%.

Something else that one must point out is the rates of infidelity, STD infection, and domestic violence—all three of which are easily a magnitude higher in Black America circa 2014 than they ever were in 1950. Not only that, but there's enough blame to go around on both sides of the gender aisle: for example, Black women have a herpes infection rate to the tune of 50%, and Black women are just as likely to go upside their mate's head and/or cheat on their mate as the other way around. Indeed, the term "Jumpoff" has become part of the Black American lexicon—which translated simply means "mistress." Jumpoffs have now, as a result of the aforementioned changes, been elevated to the same level as wives, be that de jure or de facto (since common law arrangements were always a strong part of Black American life). Mate poaching—stealing someone else's mate—is not just something Black men engage in; it's something that Black women too have had way more than their fair share of involvement with. Speaking of "reality" TV shows and the like, much of what is on offer to Black American audiences in this regard very much centers on these themes—easily seen in highly popular "reality" shows like Love & Hip Hop Atlanta, Real Housewives of Atlanta, and Basketball Wives. What perhaps makes matters even worse is that quite a few of the ladies featured in these shows are not always married or would even be recognized as steady, long-term mates in previous eras. They seem opportunistic in their outlook and mindset, always ready to pounce on a better chance or to vanquish a perceived "threat" in the form of another lady.

As you might guess, all of the above makes it pretty hard to build, to say nothing of sustain, communities. In the past, Jim Crow and the Klan used intimidation, violence, mob rule, and illegal measures to keep Black Americans from participating in all of the franchises of American life that made life worth living. Though they had some early victories and inflicted real damage on us, they never broke our spirit because we still had strong communities, which came from strong families. Today, however, we have very little of that—and of those who have managed to do these things, the sad truth is that there simply is not enough of them to carry the load.

The eminent scholar and public intellectual Thomas Sowell once famously said that there are no solutions—only tradeoffs—and he was referring to the idea that we, as a society, can craft quick-fix and often times feel-good "solutions" to supposedly dire conditions—not taking into account that there are inherent tradeoffs to anything we do. No-fault divorce, abortion on demand, cheap and effective birth control, big daddy government, and a "Imma do me, you do you" ethos have pervaded our society over the past half century and have created as many "problems" as they sought to solve. Even a passing-through perusal of Black America is a testament to this fact—"communities" that are such in name only and barely at that; atomized individuals, not connected to each other in any meaningful sense; feral children and young people running amok, in fatherless, manless environments where baby mamas are the norm; where recrimination and acrimony are the order of the day instead of love, support, and mutual understanding; where Black men are truly the walking wounded; and where Black spaces and places that were proud examples of the best we could be are little more than graveyards today— literal war zones where a Hobbesian all-against-all bloodletting occurs at a frighteningly frenzied pace.

So, is it really any wonder or surprise that "reality" TV shows now cash in on the mockery that marriage in our time has truly become? Indeed, if anything, one has to stand in awe of the fact that it has taken TV execs this long to capitalize on the trend in such an overt, direct fashion.

And as for the unfortunate passing of the Black elderly couple in Strawberry Mansion: the real mourning is for the fact that there are precious few couples like that of any age there. "Black love" in our time really means "Black sex," in chaotic, random hit-and-miss fashion, where you're here today, gone tomorrow, a seemingly never-ending carousel of "lovers" in and out of each other's lives, and that of others, kids from the various unions in the undertow. Again, as I've noted above, the numbers—STDs, infidelity, plummeting marital rates, sky-high out-of-wedlock birthrates, you name it—bear it out.

I think the TV show PCB discusses actually can and has done some real good—because it has forced all of us to take a good, long, hard look at not just what marriage has become but also what we have become—and to ask ourselves if we're okay with what we see. Because if we are, great, the band plays on. But if we're not—as I suspect many more of us than we're willing to admit aren't—then it opens the door to a long-overdue conversation as to where we go next.

If there is going to be a (re)building of "community," it has to start with a (re)building of the relationships between men and women, and to reaffirm the truth of our existence, as propounded by people much wiser than any of us, down through the ages.

And now if you'll excuse me, I have a bit of work to do.

Christina Hoff Sommers: Men's Rights is 'Taking it a Bit Far'

May 20, 2023 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

It took two months exactly to finally come up with a response to Christina Hoff Sommers and her co-host for their Femsplainers episode "I Was Falsely Accused of Rape" simply because like anybody trying to be productive, I keep busy and otherwise I had been trying to figure out how to articulate it. Here is my video uploaded on Bitchute entitled: "A Rebuttal to Femsplainers Regarding Erin Pizzey and Men's Rights".

Yes, I know in the clips I used for commentary they say Erin Pizzey is "taking things a bit far" and I keep on using the word "going too far" as if I was quoting them. My mistake, but the idea is the same.

Actually, I did in fact write them a lengthy letter regarding my concerns the week that episode of theirs aired. To this day I don't believe they've responded, be it directly or on their listener reaction. Not surprised, actually. I had considered making it an open letter, but there's really nothing in it that I didn't address in my video.

Even after two months I think it's a very revealing segment where Christina Hoff Sommers professes to praise esteemed activist Erin Pizzey for her early involvement in the women's movement, and at the same time proceed to both ignore her likewise early involvement with men's issues (that got basically no support by comparison back in the day) and outright dismisses her current involvement in Men's Rights.

A few years back, Paul Elam of A Voice For Men posted a video on youtube calling out Christina Hoff Sommers, which I think was a well-deserved and refreshing take. Predictably, perhaps, he received a lot of reaction that bemoaned the fact that he was attacking a "potential ally" and that he ought to build bridges instead of burning them, to paraphrase their general message.

As I say in my own video, perhaps somebody ought to tell Miss Sommers and her circle of gossiping equity feminists just that. Instead she seems more interested in taking shots at those involved in the Men's Movement in earnest just for a few laughs, and it is clear enough to me that she is thoroughly uninterested reaching out and having a civil discussion with anybody in that world.

Let us not let the dialogue regarding men's issues be dominated by those meagre feminists who decry any Men’s Rights Advocate for being “angry” and insist that only feminists talk about the issue for some bogus notion of “balance”, the same kind of feminists that have no problem with the mutilation of baby boys’ genitalia because of “cultural tradition”, the same kind of feminists that talk up traditionalist roles expecting the gynocentrism of male altruism.

“Equity feminism” sounds nice and dainty and safe, but in turn one must consider what Jordan Peterson clarified many times about equity: it is “equality” of outcome, which has nothing to do with equality of opportunity nor the equality of responsibility, which feminists have done their best to ignore where it benefited them.

The primary caregiver fraud

Imagine a society in which when a couple separates or divorces, it is always the father who receives custody of the children. No matter how caring the mother is, no matter how much she wants to remain part of the children's lives and no matter how much the children want the same thing, she is cut off from them–except to whatever degree the father is willing to let her see them. All this happens, that is, unless the father is utterly dissolute–in which case the courts will then give custody to the mother.

What a terrible place such a society would be! How cruel to women! How cruel to children! What a blessing we don't live in such a society! Actually, up until sometime in the 19th century, that was the pattern in our society. The immediate reason for this system was economic: the best financial interests of the children were seen as being served by leaving them with the parent who had the financial resources–and that was the father. We might give this judicial doctrine a name. We might call it the "Father-Breadwinner" test for determining which parent gets custody of the children.

Then, gradually, things changed. In part, they changed because the injustice and cruelty to mothers began to be recognised. Then, by early in the twentieth century, the situation had been completely reversed: women were always given custody of the children when a couple separated or divorced. This happened, that is, unless the mother was found to be "unfit", in which unusual case the father was awarded custody by the courts. After all, mothers are the natural nurturers, are they not? And fathers are the natural providers, are they not? So just give her the kids and have him give her the money to meet their financial needs. We could also give this doctrine a name. We might call it the "Mother-Caregiver" test for assigning custody of the children.

Then, things changed again. Partly because technology kept eroding away the rigid sex roles, people began to see the injustice of automatically cutting fathers off from their children in this fashion. After all, men are not all alike, women are not all alike. Men, too, can and do nurture; women, too, can and do provide financially. The laws were changed so that either parent could get custody of the children. But the judges didn't change very much. Overwhelmingly, they continued awarding custody to mothers, in spite of the law. We might label their motivating doctrine in this the "Covert Mother-Caregiver" test for deciding custody awards. This regime still exists. Under it, sociological research has found, the large majority of divorces are initiated by women–after all, they are the ones who stand, under this system, to come out of divorce with everything they want.

Out of all of this injustice was born the divorced fathers' movement. It developed largely because, by this point in history, there had come to be so many divorces: far more individuals were suffering the effects of the Covert Mother-Caregiver doctrine than had done so under the earlier doctrines. So, do the activists in this movement want a return to father preference? Interestingly, they do not. A few ideologues on the fringes argue for a return to "patriarchy"; but overwhelmingly, what the fathers' rights activists argue for is a new concept designed to be fair to both parents and to the children: shared parenting after divorce.

The Shared Parenting Ideal

The shared parenting concept is comprised of two parts. First, joint legal stewardship of the children. This involves each parent making important decisions for the children's lives, especially during the separate times when they are residing with that parent. It can be called "joint legal custody"–though as such phrases are standardly interpreted today, far too little decision-making power is given to one of the parents. Second, shared residency, sometimes labeled "joint physical custody". Ideally, this means spending about equal amounts of time with each parent–although in practice, variations from the ideal are often warranted. Some of the experts who have studied the matter urge that at least 30% of the time be spent with each parent. At last, a system which does not rip one of the parents and the children away from each other. Everyone wins–including the children.

During the period of overt and covert mother-preference, modern feminism was born. This movement professes equality between the sexes, focusing on traditional discriminations against women. It professes rejection of gender stereotypes about how men and women behave, recognising that many of the choices the two sexes make merely reflect conditioning into societal roles. How would they respond to traditional discriminations against men, then, including mother-preference in divorce?

Many feminists–let us call them "egalitarian feminists"–have replied that equality means just what it says; hence, they were willing to share their former advantages with men, just as they expected men to do with them. Consequently, the egalitarian feminists embraced shared parenting. Indeed, they could point out, equality in parenting is merely the other side of equality in paid employment. For just as women were traditionally kept out of the paid workforce so they would stay home and care for children personally, men were pressured out of the home and into the paid workforce so they would provide for children financially. In fact, the egalitarians have pointed out, eliminating mother-preference through shared parenting promotes equality for women as well: mothers whose ex-husbands do around half of the childcare will be freer to take their place in the paid workforce. In the US, the National Organization for Women officially endorsed a judicial presumption of joint custody.

Unfortunately, only in the early years was the feminist establishment controlled by the egalitarians. Feminist organizations and government agencies have long since been dominated by the sexist feminists: though they continue using the rhetoric of equality, their actual motive is promotion of women's self-interest (as they perceive it), not justice. Not only have they worked hard to retain traditional discriminations against men, they have often fought to increase them. On the matter of parenting in particular, they have opposed elimination of mother-preference with every weapon they can muster. No flaming male chauvinists could have been more reactionary in defending their traditional privileges than the sexist feminists have been.

One especially revealing Canadian example lies in the efforts the feminist establishment made, a few years back, to retain the governmental parental-leave benefits which had previously been limited to women. To understand this situation, we must be clear that under Canada's system of national health insurance, there are no grounds for having a separate category of leave for pregnancy and giving birth; these can be treated the same as any other type of medical leave, on the instruction of a doctor. What parental leave should be for, then, is childcare–and child*care*, unlike pregnancy and child*birth*, can be performed by either parent. So, then: did Canada's feminists say to Canada's government: "Make whatever money can be spared for this purpose equally available to men and women"? After all, given current societal patterns, equal opportunity for parental leave would still be taken advantage of, to a strong degree, mostly by women. Or did the feminist establishment, committed as it has long been to "affirmative action" in the workplace, say anything like "Set up quotas for parental-leave funding, so we can be sure enough men will take advantage of it"? Not on your Nelly, McClung. "We won't give up a penny of what we've had in the past!", they raged at the federal government. And, of course, the feds caved in, giving fathers a pittance they hoped would satisfy those few in the judiciary who actually think equality means equality.

An American example reveals the sexist-feminist agenda more broadly. Remember Marcia Clark, the O. J. Simpson prosecutor? She needed to put in more time on the job. So did she propose to have her ex-husband, who had much more time available, spend more time taking care of the children? Not on your Emily, Murphy. She applied to get more child support money from her ex-husband, so she could park the kids in daycare and have strangers look after them. When her ex objected to this gross injustice by applying for custody himself, the feminist establishment rose up as one woman and screamed outrage. So there you have it. Sexist feminists, in the familiar phrase, "want to have it all", the children and the money. It follows that they want fathers to have nothing, other than what individual mothers deign to allow them.

De Facto Discrimination

Sexist feminists are not always this blatant in their bias. Sometimes they are much more subtle. To introduce a key example of this, let me review the difference between de jure discrimination and de facto discrimination. Suppose they passed a law which decreed that descendants of slaves could not vote. Now, this would not be de jure discriminatory toward black people. After all, it doesn't even mention race or skin color. And besides, some whites are also descendants of slaves, and so they could not vote either; and some blacks are not descendants of slaves and so they could vote. But of course, the great majority of persons thus prevented from voting would be black. Such a law would discriminate de jure against descendants of slaves–it would treat those persons differently from everyone else, and would do so without any morally legitimate reason. But in addition, it would discriminate de facto against black people, for they would be disproportionately harmed by this unjust law.

Similarly, the old custody laws discriminated de jure against mothers, and later against fathers. Today, the law is de jure gender-neutral. Yet overwhelmingly, it is fathers who lose custody in divorce. Does this mean there is some kind of unjust discrimination against men? Not automatically. For all that statistical fact all by itself can tell us, there might be some legitimate reasons for women getting custody much more often. Other evidence reveals that the judges are in fact strongly biased, overall, against fathers. But that is a subject for another time. Today I want to discuss a criterion for deciding custody which many judges employ, regarding it as not discriminatory toward fathers. Now, at present they have no authorization under Canada's law to use this criterion. But many in the feminist establishment support them in doing so–indeed, they have been pressing for years to have it enshrined in law.

I speak of the "primary caregiver" doctrine: the claim that sole custody–or else "primary control"–should be awarded, and should be given to the parent who has provided the most care to the children during the marriage. De jure, the criterion is gender-neutral; it explicitly mentions neither mother nor father. But is it wrongfully discriminatory de facto? After all, it seemingly would guarantee, in present societal conditions, that mothers would get custody far more often. Is it fair? Or have the sexist feminists and the sexist chivalrists merely discovered a more subtle way of treating fathers unjustly? Let us see.

Cheating Interpretations

To begin, it is worth remarking how specific proposals for determining who is the "primary caregiver" often reveal their authors' ulterior sexist motives. For in telling how to add up the time to compute which parent is the primary caregiver, they often exclude activities which "give care" to a child–that is, which promote the child's wellbeing–and which fathers tend to engage in much more frequently. For example, guidelines for computing caregiving time commonly include that spent shopping for the child–as if shopping counts as "child care" whereas making the money required to do the shopping does not. And they standardly include housecleaning, but not repairs and maintenance on the house, yard and car which benefit the child similarly.

This kind of cheating is not crucial to the issue before us, however. For even if the explication of "primary caregiver" should be limited to direct, hands-on nurturing, the criterion is still sexist. "How could that be?", one may ask. "Not only does the presumption not explicitly mention either sex, but childcaring activities are something which either gender can perform. If fathers have performed them less often, that has been their own choice, not someone else's biased treatment of them." Here again the hypocrisy behind the criterion shows through. For just recall how strongly Canadian feminists objected to fathers getting an equal opportunity for childcare leave paid for by the government. It's a cozy racket: first prevent men from spending as much time with the children, then punish them for not having spent as much time with the children.

The problem goes far deeper than the specific matter of childcare leave, however. For well over a century, social forces have pressured and conditioned fathers to leave the hands-on childcare to mothers–just as they once pressured and conditioned mothers to stay at home out of paid employment. The “choices” men and women have made in this regard have been very far from free choices, even when explicit rules have not coerced them. Recognizing this in the case of women, feminists have not blamed women for failing to “do their share” on the paid-labor front. Instead they have demanded, and gotten, hundreds of millions of dollars for programs to encourage women into, and guide them through, the careers once held mostly by men. But no such efforts have gone into helping men become more socially free to provide, and more capable in providing, hands-on childcare. We don’t hear demands for government programs to get fathers more involved in primary caregiving–just threats to deprive them of their children if they do not.

This point about “affirmative action” programs (to get women into jobs formerly held just by men) leads to another hypocrisy of the “primary caregiver” doctrine. Among the main targets of these job-programs have been women who have already been out of the paid workforce to raise children. Are these women told that their earlier choice is now cast in stone? On the contrary, former primary caregivers are given special help and encouragement to adopt a new role. In stark contrast, the whole point of the “primary caregiver” doctrine is to tell erstwhile breadwinner fathers in divorce that they are NOT now allowed a new role–not allowed to be more of a hands-on caregiver. The message “You made your choice, and you may not change it with changing circumstances” is to be given only to men. (Recall that the mother is to put the kids in daycare, rather than let them be with their own father, during the time when she is at her new job. Also note that in many marriages, the primary caregiver is the daycare!)

Yet a further point can be made about the fraudulence of the “primary caregiver” doctrine. In almost no marriages does the father spend no time at all with the children; in most, surveys have indicated, his direct interaction-time with them is fairly close to that of the mother–and certainly up to that 30% time-level mentioned earlier. (Hence those lists of “childcare” activities that are loaded against male-typical ones.) But the proponents of the doctrine don’t believe in partial credit; to them it’s all or nothing. If you didn’t make it up to that 50% level, you lose custody. This is what logicians speak of as black-and-white thinking. It is the defining characteristic of extremism: not seeing the world in all its shades of gray, just the two extremes. But once we do take account of matters of degree, then even by the “primary caregiver” proponents’ own basic assumptions, an appreciable degree of shared stewardship follows–in flat contradiction of the “primary caregiver” doctrine as they promote it.

The Fundamental Injustice

Even all this fraudulence on the part of “primary caregiver” proponents, however, is not the most basic problem with the concept; it is discriminatory at its very core. The fundamental problem is the criterion’s assumption that men and women must behave just alike, in the caregiving respect, in order to be treated equally in regard to child custody. To begin to see why this is wrong, let us reflect on a parallel idea, one which I label the “primary breadwinner” presumption.

Under this doctrine, upon divorce or separation, all of the monetary assets and property of the couple would go to the parent who has contributed the most financially during their time together. Think about it. Would the feminist establishment consider this non-discriminatory? Not on your Irene, Murdoch. But this time, they would be right. The reason: marriage is supposed to be an equal partnership. In a traditional marriage, the mother's staying at home with the children left the father free to pursue financial gain; hence she has indirectly contributed to that gain as well, and by all rights, it also belongs to her. By the very same token, however, the father's going off to work has left the mother free to care directly for the children; hence he likewise has an equal moral right to the fruits of her labors. The two contributions to the children do not have to be the same in kind in order to be equal in value for the children. (If I were inclined toward irony, I'd call this the "parental pay equity" principle.)

Now we can state more clearly than ever the crass hypocrisy of the feminist establishment in this matter. In divorce and separation, they don't want the mother to wind up with the fruits of her direct labors and the father to wind up with the fruits of his direct labors. They want the mother to get them both: the children, and the money earned for them by the father. As noted earlier, they want her to "have it all". But as has now been revealed, "having it all" means having it both ways.

One final point. In this talk, I have focused on gender equality. That is not the most important issue in custody issues, however; the wellbeing and rights of the children are. Though this is a subject for another speech–at least–one important point can be made here. It is that from focusing on the children, the same conclusions follow: children possess a moral right to have both parents as stewards of their wellbeing. The ultimate fraud of the "primary caregiver" doctrine is its violation of that right.

My 77 cents

There is a debate between Thomas Sowell and Harriet Pilpel where the issue of a wage gap between men and women is discussed at length. If you are not familiar with either of those names, Harriet Pilpel is (or better, was) an attorney and feminist activist. Thomas Sowell is an economist and Ivy League professor. Here's a summary of the debate:

Harriet Pilpel's position: Women earn 77 cents for every dollar that a man earns.

Thomas Sowell's position: Using the Department of Labor's figures, along with existing data, when the earnings of all women, versus all men are compared, the sum of all earnings by women is less than that of men. When 1 woman is compared to 1 man and they have the same education, same time in that industry and position and are working for organizations with comparable earnings, women earn more.

When did this fascinating televised debate take place, must have been recent, right? This is a recent issue after all. Ten years ago, if you believe feminist propaganda, women were barely permitted in the workforce. Twenty years ago they had to ask a man permission to urinate or breathe.

The debate took place in 1981.

More than three decades ago feminists were throwing that 77 cent figure out there and they've never stopped.

Even as women have come to dominate the educational landscape, completing undergraduate and graduate degree programs at a rate of 2 to 1 over men, even as the number of female Executive Officers has steadily risen, even as women have taken, year after year, a greater role in politics, business and academia, even as we are approaching the day when a female President will take office, the one thing that has never changed is this dubious 77 cents.

Isn't that amazing! It never dipped down to 71 cents, never rose a little, creeping up to 79 cents. Nope – 77 cents. Ask a feminist, 77 cents. In more than 30 years, regardless of all of the changes to the world in which we live, the wage disparity claimed by feminists has never moved so much as a penny.

Forget gender issues. Forget your search for the Loch Ness Monster. If there was ever a mystery to be solved, this statistical anomaly – the mere fact that as billions of people have shuffled in and out of the workforce, male to female income disparity never fluctuated so much as a penny – this is the most incredible event in human history.

You would sooner traipse through a prairie filled with four leaf clovers than magically come to a situation where year after year, by chance, women were paid 77 cents to every man's dollar. Some invisible hand must have been at work to make this so.

We like to compare the market's force to an invisible hand, so perhaps the monster is there? Somewhere, in some massive conference room, the Patriarchy has gathered and from there they review every single employment offer letter, every paycheck and with great care and tireless effort, they make certain year after year that women are paid exactly 77 cents for every man's dollar.

Honestly, that's the only way this happened. Or, feminists are full of it and they're pulling that 77 cents out of their backsides. I won't say which of those scenarios I believe, but the former is very unlikely. The Patriarchy of which feminists speak – judging by the way feminists describe them – would be working to turn that 77 cents into 50 cents, 10 cents and then nothing. What do they have to gain by never seeing the number adjust?

Time and time again, this wage gap myth is shown to be so much bunk. Women, as a whole, do earn less in the marketplace. They also, as a whole, work fewer hours. They also, as a whole, gravitate towards positions which the market values less and, they do this other funny thing. They have children (I know, I know, men have children too) and tend to move away from the market as a result.

Let's move on to the big question of the day. Why, if it is so likely that feminists are pulling that 77 cent figure out of their backsides, have they continued to do so for more than three decades? Why does feminist brigade after feminist brigade cry out this specific number, even though anyone with more than ten years of workplace experience knows it is so much cow manure? And, why aren't more people calling them on it? People in very high places like to spout that figure even when they know it is ridiculous.

Words are powerful things. They're seeds, really, idea seeds. You plant the right words in the right person and watch ideas and images and as a result, new behaviors blossom.

This 77 cents is a seed and nothing more. It is a seed that feminists, a highly organized political group, have sown in women's minds for nearly half a century. The idea that blossoms in the minds of young women, who I am certain are intelligent enough to realize that a figure like that couldn't happen by chance, is that men in the workplace secretly conspire to cheat women. You see, if a feminist came out and said "the market is cheating women. They're out to get you!" women might question that. When they cry out, "77 cents!" time and again, they bypass one's natural reluctance to question paranoia.

Just think of all the things to be gained from this idea seed – the belief that the market is out to cheat women:

1. It gives women the impression that men in the workplace are against them. In other words, it creates an enemy of men and automatic allies of women.
2. It is a narcissistic seed as well. What can be more narcissistic than to believe than millions of people are conspiring against you? In other words, it gives women this impression that they are secret targets, unwanted interlopers who must struggle against a terrible, unseen, foe. Quite a boost to one's self esteem isn't it? That you could be so critical to others based solely on your gender. You must be important if they have to work so hard to cheat you.
3. It creates competition where there is none and drives women to produce. "Pay me less, I'll show you what I'm worth!" This idea that women are targets permits them to be more aggressive, even unprofessional. Why wouldn't it? The market must not be very professional if it exists solely to cheat women.

All of this amounts to the final idea – the great oak that springs from this seed.

Work is something other than work!

That's it. The goal of this lie – the unwavering 77 cent figure – is that work (at least for women) is something other than work.

If you listen to a feminist, work for a woman is a crusade! It's a swashbuckling adventure where every day you fight an all-powerful organization of men. These men run around like savage apes with one hand grasping their cock and balls and the other hand trying to get at your slender feminine throats.

Every promotion is a magical thing.

To even get a job in this terrible environment is amazing. Hell, throw in the other myths, you know, the ones that claim that no woman escaped their kitchen labor-prisons before 1965, and the claim that male work just isn't as taxing or laborious as their work… the excuses just pile up.

If feminists truly cared for women and if they didn't outright hate men, they might tell you the truth. Work is work. The marketplace isn't fair and equitable. Women earn less after having children because they tend to figure this all out after having children. That's the day when so many women realize how little of this world is about them and their swashbuckling crusade against the invisible men out to cheat (and rape and kill) them. Strangely enough, men tend to earn more after having children for the exact same reason. Be honest – if business owners could really get away with paying women 77 cents on the dollar for the exact same outcome, men simply wouldn't get hired.

If feminists truly cared for women, they might tell you what virtually everyone with some time in the workplace knows about pay rates. I like women. I'll tell you.

Take the amount of money that you generate for an organization and divide it by 3. If you are an average employee, that's the most you can earn. There ya go! That's it! There are no evil men in a hidden room. Everyone isn't against you. Thirty percent is the cap. The reason is strictly a matter of numbers. You get 30%. Another 30% goes to overheads, benefits and taxes and the company gets the rest. It's that simple.

If you can't figure out what you earn for a company (say as a contract administrator in the corporate office), your pay is based purely on the market and how long you've been with the organization. Same goes for a janitor or someone working on a production line. Add in some additional skills and you become more valuable.

People who can monetize their exact worth to an organization tend to make more. People who can't, make less.

Another tidbit – every organization in the world will pay you less if they can, but they'll pay you more if you know your worth to them.

There are no monsters here. No one is scrutinizing every paycheck ever written to make certain that women only get 77 cents to a man's dollar. Once you figure this out, you'll start earning more (if you want) very quickly. Once you figure this out, you may even decide to earn less and enjoy life more. Imagine that? It was a choice all along.

But – and this is a big BUT – once you peek through the curtain and get a glimpse at reality you'll have to live with the fact that work is work. It's something that you have to do every day, even when there aren't any shadowy mythical monsters striving to destroy you.

When you realize that work is work boys and girls; every day becomes a struggle not with others, but with yourself. A struggle with your own narcissism and ego, your own overblown sense of yourself in a world of billions. It becomes a struggle to mitigate and understand your actual value to others. Your mom may love you, but if your only skill is talking and not delivering, get ready to be kicked in the ass for a few years. If you listen to feminists, that ass kicking is because of men hiding out in a room, plotting against you. If you look at the reality, the ass kicking is just the market's way of saying – I can't make anything off of you, produce or go home.

If you can't figure out how to work with others, how to motivate others, what value could you have when anything big and profitable requires more than one person?

When you compare the achievements of some Chief Executive Officers with the achievements of some janitors, the CEO lost. A Vice President at one company can earn less than an associate at another. These are the realities of the workplace. Work is work. Your vagina or your cock doesn't make it anything else, though feminists will sell you that if it helps them. What does it do for you?

Does that idea help you to grow?

Does it help you to become a true adult that sees actual living breathing people all around and not just enemies, allies, and means to an end? That's how psychopaths and paranoid-schizophrenics see the world and they live in perpetual hell. Feminists, through their hate, their disgust with actual equality and growth, plant these seeds. And for six decades women have bought it to their own detriment. The result is today and it is ugly.

And another man gone, and another man gone

May 22, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

Last month, three men in media lost high-profile positions over a single weekend: on April 23rd and 24th, it was announced that Jeff Shell was out at NBCUniversal, Don Lemon at CNN, and Tucker Carlson at Fox. The reasons for Lemon's and Carlson's dismissals have not been released, but transgressions against gender propriety seem to have played a role in all three. Even a glance at their stories highlights the vulnerability of all men today to complaints of sexism—and the relish with which accusing women pursue and applaud men's professional destruction.

Only Jeff Shell, CEO of the media giant NBCUniversal, was fired for sexual misconduct; according to reports, his affair with a woman at the company (though not hers with him—more on this later) contravened the company's "safe and respectful workplace" policies. TV personalities Don Lemon and Tucker Carlson, however, have also been in the news for their purported sexism: Lemon for having the temerity to say that women are not considered to be "in their prime" after their 20s, 30s, and possibly 40s, a statement that caused outrage to various female pundits and politicians (with opinion-maker Megyn Kelly beside herself with annoyance); and Carlson for alleged sexist misdemeanors, including referring to a female guest by an offensive epithet, displaying a photoshopped picture of a buxom, swim-suited Nancy Pelosi in his Fox production office, and polling staffers on which candidate for Michigan governor was sexiest.

None of the above seem (at least to my leathery sensibilities) anywhere close to firing offences, or even to be newsworthy at a time when crude language and sexual adventures are taken-for-granted markers of freedom. But that hasn't stopped naysayers—the vast majority women—from expressing satisfaction, even jubilation, at the men's punishments.

For Megyn Kelly, Lemon's termination was the answer to her repeated demand that "women's offence" be recognized (see her aggressive feminist rant here). Republican presidential candidate Nikki Haley was even more gleeful, tweeting that Lemon's firing was a "great day for women everywhere," with an image of two cans of lemonade with captions saying "Past My Prime?" and "Hold My Beer."

The arrogance of Haley's statement—with its assumption that every woman is as sensitive as she to the perceived slight—is as tiresome as the undisguised schadenfreude. She followed this up with "Now let's get men out of women's sports," suggesting that getting men like Lemon out of media was a legitimate pro-feminist political objective.

Reaction to Carlson's firing had similar self-congratulatory feminist overtones. Amidst what Rolling Stone claimed was "pure joy" by Fox staffers generally, a disgruntled former employee, Abby Grossberg, who is suing Fox network over sexism, went even further than Haley by proclaiming Carlson's firing to be "great for America!" The fact that millions of Americans were shocked and disappointed by what seemed an act of state censorship did not dampen her conviction. She too was focused on the particular injuries he had caused not only as a bad American but as a bad man, claiming that the firing was a "step towards accountability […] for the abuse and harassment" (the Pelosi poster and so on) allegedly rife at Carlson's show. Congresswoman Alexandria Ocasio-Cortez joined in the celebration, saying that Carlson's firing "couldn't have happened to a better guy" because of his "vicious targeting [of] women, people of color, and the LGBTQ+ community." Her message was clear: anyone who offends women (or other favored constituencies) deserves dismissal.

The many purges of the past years suggest that no man is too valuable to be jettisoned and that few escape career-damaging sexism allegations. As Politico reported back in 2020, Carlson was one of many high-profile Fox associates to be dogged by civil suits and complaints. For Politico, the sheer number of accused men seemed to confirm the complaints' legitimacy, though it more likely shows the risk-free ease with which complaints can be made. According to Politico, a single reporter, Cathy Areu, had accused four Fox hosts, including Sean Hannity and Carlson, of "sexual harassment and gender discrimination." Host Ed Henry was fired following assault and harassment allegations by former producer Jennifer Eckhart. Former Fox CEO and Chairman Roger Ailes resigned in 2016 amidst allegations of sexual misconduct (and died the following year), while Bill O'Reilly, whose popular 8 pm slot had been taken over by Carlson, had also been forced from his position by women's complaints. More recently, Carlson's executive producer Justin Wells, named in the Grossberg lawsuit, was also fired. And Fox is by no means unusual in this regard.

To read about Jeff Shell's termination is to enter the murky world of feminist-compliant evasion and indirection. A substantial article in Variety magazine reports that Shell was dismissed "with cause" over allegations by Hadley Gamble, a CNBC news anchor stationed in Abu Dhabi. (One of Gamble's most famous moments was a flirtatious interview with pre-invasion Vladimir Putin, which caused many news outlets to charge Putin with sexism for criticizing what he saw as Gamble's deliberate misinterpretations of his answers.) Investigation into emails between Shell and Gamble apparently "corroborated the [harassment] allegations," thus sealing Shell's fate. The Variety story notes that Shell "joined a recent list of studio chiefs felled by sexual misconduct allegations, including Leslie Moonves, Kevin Tsujihara and Ron Meyer, the latter fired by Shell himself at a time when he was allegedly carrying on with Gamble."

Wait. Was Shell "carrying on with Gamble" or was he preying sexually on an unwilling colleague? The phrasing is deliberately ambiguous. Though an unnamed source is reported to be "disgusted by Shell's double standard [in firing others for what he was doing] and astonished by his lack of judgement," no one mentions the evident double standard at the heart of his case. Shell's "harassment" of Gamble was, as far as can be discerned from the article, a near-decade-long consensual affair that ran from 2012 to 2021, during which long period Gamble registered not a word of objection to company bosses. It was only after Gamble learned that her contract with the network would not be renewed (a contract over which Shell had no influence) that she "lodged a complaint naming Shell”—as if determined to take him down while garnering for herself a lucrative settlement package. The inequitable result is glaring: the man is fired and financially penalized (Shell will lose over 43 million dollars in stock options), while the woman is protected and financially compensated. Lest anyone be tempted to pity Shell, the article reminds us that he also fired NBC news host Matt Lauer and former Universal marketing head Josh Goldstine (later compensated for wrongful dismissal) over alleged sexual harassment.

At least two things are striking in all of this. Not least is the wide spectrum of styles of sexual misconduct, which range from the simply crude to the traditionally immoral, from the commonplace to the romantic—and everything in between. These are, of course, gendered crimes, in that it is almost exclusively men who can be found guilty of them. More serious, perhaps is how normal the disappearing acts have become, how easily our notions of natural justice or equality before the law have been set aside. Gay or straight, black or white, young or old, conservative or progressive, any man can be taken down.

It is now part of the cost of doing business for companies to dismiss men in response to credible (i.e. not manifestly preposterous) allegations. Companies do so to avoid liability, knowing they can be sued if they fail to act promptly. In How to Destroy A Man Now (DAMN): A Handbook (highly recommended), the pseudonymous author provides a partial list of prominent men in the media, political, and entertainment worlds taken out in the Fall, 2017 lightning purge, the official kickoff to the MeToo movement. They were pundits, politicians, comedians, actors, fashion photographers, directors, producers, and celebrity chefs, almost all disgraced and sacked through accusation alone, without any criminal investigation or trial. In the years since then, no one has attempted an accounting of all the men “damned” in this manner.

Feminist ideologues pushed sexual harassment policies by saying that they were about equality, the right to work without fear or coercion. But in practice, the policies created fear and coercion for men, and have had nothing to do with equality, as shown by the fact that accused female harassers tend to be treated far more leniently than are male accused, while women’s sexual power (in everything from provocative dress or undress, to the ability to initiate sexual relationships without reprisal) is left unacknowledged. In the case of Shell, for example, his accuser’s attorney expressed indignation that her “client’s name has been released and her privacy violated.” Merely by revealing a sexual affair in which she seems to have been a full participant, the accuser secures her status as an injured innocent whose job security and even privacy become sacrosanct. It goes without saying that sexual harassment legislation has made it extremely difficult for companies to fire women without opening themselves to allegations of sexism.

Whatever real problem sexual harassment legislation may once have been designed to address (Stephen Baskerville, in The New Politics of Sex, argues that already-existing legal and civil prohibitions on assault, blackmail, lewdness, etc. were sufficient to cover the abuses feminists described [p. 157]), the power to destroy a man’s reputation and career has proved irresistible to a considerable number of women. Not all women, of course, are interested in wielding victim-power to retaliate for an ill-advised flirtation or illicit affair, but every woman today knows she has that power. As in the case of a loaded gun that only one party can use with impunity, the convenience of a sexism allegation will inevitably be widely abused. Jeff Shell, Don Lemon, and Tucker Carlson are wealthy, well-connected men who can land, if bruised, on their feet; but many other men, without privilege, savings, or connections, will spend years reflecting on the unintended offence or outright lie that deprived them of their good name and livelihood.

It seems unlikely that sexual harassment legislation—saturated with feminist assumptions about male power and predatory sexuality—can ever be reformed. It needs to be dismantled altogether, leaving men and women to work out their conflicts and relationships like mature adults. Feminists long assured us that this was all their movement demanded.

On Going To War With Women

May 24, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The following is a transcript of parts 1 & 2 of 'Going To War With Women' – first delivered as video talks back in 2011.

PART 1

I have to apologize for what will be a long and circuitous two-part talk; I'm going to wander a bit here but I hope it does not prove to be too distracting. And a word of thanks also here to a subscriber H.H Fleury who made a comment to my recent video 'Time To Abort Fatherhood At Will' (which if you have not watched yet you should in order to get a better understanding of this talk). The point he made was an important one – that we should not just throw up our arms and accept that there is nothing we can do about the feminist culture we live in.

In that I'm assuming he was regarding my call for reproductive rights for men as a defeatist's response to women's domination over human reproduction, which is now a mainstay of the gynocracy. And that is a good point to raise because in the still-developing men's movement we continue to sort out whether we want to embrace traditional masculinity, or would choose to redefine manhood in a way that reflects different values in accordance with a new socio-sexual world order.

The fact is – and by fact I mean my opinion – that whether or not you want to return to traditional values, or prefer to redefine masculinity in a new age, the path to get there is more or less the same. Men must face off with women on a very personal level and fight back in the gender war, and the only logical way to do that is to allow women to feel the full weight of equality in all its ugliness. It's kind of like opening the door so a feminazi can walk into the gas chamber she built for you. And we do that by recognizing that hanging on to the past alone is not a movement – it's just an unrewarded status quo at best, and at worst a stagnation that results in ridiculous vulnerabilities that have been addressed by MRAs as long as there's been a movement.

So I would offer that any movement for men – by the very definition of the word – involves men changing and drastically. The question is what are we going to change and how will we get there? You may have heard me say several times that if we want to see if women really want equality the best way to do that is to give it to them. Let me rephrase that in a little bit of a different way; the best way to prove that most women cannot handle the weight and responsibility of equality is to give it to them.

What we do currently is play a completely disingenuous game. We watch most women and more than a few men make a lot of noise about how they embrace equality between the sexes, and then we watch the same people put social ideals, government programs, and draconian laws that demonstrate that women as a group can't cut it without men giving them a leg up.

The problem is that society, your society, is used to denying all of this. And so to me the real job of the MRA is to expose this lie in a way that people feel on a highly personal level. Case in point many years ago I met a woman through a mutual friend we talked on the phone a few times and decided that we would go out to dinner on a date. It turned out to be an experience typical for the times. Within a few minutes of being seated in the restaurant she told me in at least two different ways that her going out with me didn't mean that we were going to have sex. The next 45 minutes she spent bashing her exes and telling me that she didn't need a man for anything.

It was nothing new. It was a standard female shit-test designed to see if she could put me in a lower status and to give her deference and control. I just nodded my head a lot and smiled and played the game. Toward the end of the dinner she had loosened up quite a bit and was actually laughing and having a pretty good time then I told the waiter to bring us separate checks. She was fucking outraged – and I'm not exaggerating she actually got so loud that heads were turning at tables around us, and of course I just reminded her that she didn't need me and that I was supporting her stated independence by insisting we go Dutch, and after all I had not asked her out we had decided to go out mutually.

Now the kicker to this, and the really funny part was that she didn't have the money to cover her bill. So she had to call a friend to come out and bail her out of the jam she had gotten herself into. In other words she had me sit through dinner listening to her lie about her independence knowing she didn't even have the money to pay her way. And she fully expected that I would listen to all that and then pick up the tab anyway. I was actually kind of surprised at myself for doing what I did. But it was the first lesson for me with women that demonstrates the point I'm making here. Not only was this woman unprepared to carry her weight equally, she was actually outraged at the idea that anyone would expect her to. And the whole time she was beating me up with how equal she was.

Now just imagine a world full of men who had asked for separate checks. Even more realistically, just imagine enough men that would do it so that women in general would no longer feel comfortable with assuming that men would pay. What do you think would happen to all the "I don't need a man" bullshit rhetoric that men have grown accustomed to listening to from women. And let's take that out a little bit further, what would happen to the rate of unwanted pregnancies and abortions if men could and would simply walk away if they didn't want to be a father. How many lives do you imagine might be saved. How many women would begin to view the reproductive role with a little more respect and humility versus it being a way to gather a man's sperm and his finances at the same time.

We can apply this thinking to a lot of areas. Take the death penalty for instance. I'm personally against it or at least I'm against it until we figure out a way to know that we're killing the right person. And we're far from that. But what do you imagine would happen to the death penalty if we started giving the needle to women anywhere near as often as they deserve it. The death chambers would shut down overnight.

What would happen to all the hubbub of women in the military if half the flag-draped coffins coming back from the Middle East had a woman's disfigured body in it. What would happen to our willingness to go to war for the wrong reasons. What would happen to women's sense of entitlement if say 30 percent of men refused to engage in any form of chivalry. If men refuse to do anything for women at all simply because they were women. I think you'd see a collective change in attitude in women that you couldn't possibly imagine.

The point here is that if you want this stuff to change, the most efficient way to do it is to force women to carry the weight they already claim to be carrying but aren't – the weight that should have come with their modern rights but didn't.

Now realistically speaking we're still not in a place that this will happen anytime soon far too many simps, sellout chivalrists, alpha enablers and beta lap dogs. But the fact is that our numbers are growing and theirs are shrinking as time goes by. And as the numbers of men who won't just take whatever bullshit is handed to them from the feminazi Zeitgeist gets increasingly larger, we will see a couple of interesting things happen – actually we already are.

"Feminist" has become a more and more unwelcome label in female circles. Also, we're hearing more and more women wax nostalgic about when men used to be men. I can't prove it but I bet you that the phony I had dinner with was more careful with her mouth the next time she went out. Something about actually having to ante up for your words and deeds have a decidedly maturing effect, even when you don't want it to.

Whether any of this happens on a large scale anytime soon, the practice of treating women like absolute equals can bring really good things into the lives of any man who does it. I have not taken financial responsibility for a woman in a long long time – actually since that date. It does not stop me from getting laid or cut me out of female companionship if and when I want it. The result is that I don't ever feel like a woman is a financial anchor around my neck. I won't let them be.

There are women who will carry their weight financially, you just have to call them out from the majority of leeches to get to them, but they are there. And for a little trade secret here, just in terms of getting sexual satisfaction, there are plenty of women who will date men who pay the way and lavish them with gifts, but will then drop them like a lead brick and go crawl between the sheets with a guy who won't spend a nickel on them because he's the guy whose indifference to her princess bullshit gets her dripping wet.

Let me illustrate this further. Many years ago after a divorce I was at a crossroads in my life even after a healthy period of grieving I felt awkward about dating, was pretty unsure of myself when it came to women. And it suddenly occurred to me at 36 years old that I didn't want to do things with women like I'd ever done them before. Like any normal man I wanted a connection with a woman, wanted sex, but I had realized that following my natural instincts about that had always led to a lot of difficulties and a lot of drama.

So I started asking myself for the first time in my life what is it about some men that set them aside when it came to women. Why did some guys, even ones without money or looks, always seem to have women around them. Why did other guys – guys with good jobs, good looking guys, whatever guys that were very chivalrous always seemed to end up standing there with a bunch of flowers wilting in their hand while the woman of their desire hopped on to ride bitch on a Harley behind some guy who acted like he didn't give a if she came or went.

And of course the answer was right there in front of me. The answer was, despite my logic screaming that it wasn't so, that the guy on the Harley didn't give a shit. And it was his indifference that made the difference. So with nothing to lose and a newfound determination to change my life I set about going after that difference and I ended up kicking myself for not having done it 20 years earlier.

In a nutshell here's what I did, I joined a social club. Which one doesn't matter, there are thousands of them. The point is that these people met to party and do other things on a regular basis. This time, rather than scan the group for a woman I was interested in and look to grab her attention, I simply went there and interacted with people as though they were all men. Yes you heard that right: I treated the women more or less the same way I treated men. I showed no sexual interest in them at all, even the slightest bit. I arrived at events late and left early I carried myself with absolute confidence even when I didn't feel that way.

I made it a point many times when talking to women to let something else, other than another woman, get my attention and then to say excuse me and go off to involve myself in whatever else it was – as long as it didn't involve them. I also carried an air of preoccupation as though there was always somewhere else I wanted to be. To cement this I checked my watch as though concerned about the time pretty regularly. After just a few weeks of this a woman who I actually did have my eye on secretly stopped me on my way out of an event. We were in a loud club so she had to lean in and talk into my ear and clearly pushed her tits into my chest as she did: "So you're always leaving" she said, and I knew right then and there that I had her.

I made up some shit about being busy but told her that I would see her the next time, putting my hand on her ass as I spoke. Well the next time she went home with me, and what followed was even more amazing. From that point on the women in that particular group were lining up not to date me, but to fuck me. I even had one approach me at another event and ask me "when is it my turn?"

Now guys, this is not bragging about exploits. There is something very valuable here for men and for MRAs. By simply removing myself from seeking women's attention I got it. But much more importantly I changed the dynamics of power between myself and women. Instead of me picking a woman and trying to figure out how to get her attention, the whole goddamn lot of them were picking me and trying to get mine. And that my friends is about a whole lot more than getting pussy.

It's about understanding that for eons men have played the mating game by acting like trained seals, balancing balls on their noses and clapping their flippers in hopes of being tossed a piece of fish. And once they get that fish they do everything they can to keep it coming from the same source. This is ultimately the power of women in our feminist society; for if men were not ever in search of that scrap of dead fish, if their baskets were full without having to work for it, none of this bullshit we fight against in the men's rights movement would even be happening.

Feminists had it totally right in their approach to gaining power: all politics are personal. It is the mainstay of their movement and why shame is such an effective tool to keep men's mouth shut as they go about undermining everything in sight. On the front page of my website it says in bold letters "Suppose they had a gender war and men showed up." Well truth be told there is no more powerful way for men to show up than in reversing the power flow that goes to women, and directing it toward men.

How society is letting modern feminism run wild – why protecting men’s rights is Important

An anonymous letter from a mom

May 25, 2023 | by Suzanne McCarley | Link | Original Link

A letter to a future daughter-in-law, possibly my own:

A few years from now you're probably going to want to marry my son. Perhaps you already do; he's kind of hot (if I'm allowed to notice) and his potential is quite obvious, if I do say so myself. He's only twenty, handsome and well built, and when he lets is hair grow long it's thick and wavy. He has his father's beautiful eyes, and my dimples look much better on him than they ever looked on me. Also, he's in the military; he has finished his deployment and doesn't expect to go overseas again, so he's now preparing to start earning college credits. I don't hover so I'm not certain, but he's probably going to major in engineering. Or possibly actuarial science. He surfs, rides a motorcycle and a mountain bike, and he maintains a classic car. He's essentially a decent guy; pretty much everyone likes him or loves him, and respects him. Girls hit on him regularly.

I'll be surprised if he ever marries though. You see, his plan is to wait until he's at least thirty, and therefore he will spend the next decade meeting, dating, working with, and probably sleeping with, the product of sixty years of American feminism. I'm pretty sure he won't find many women worth considering for marriage.

How about we look at it from his perspective, m'kay? Here's what he sees:

Half of you have been raised without your fathers, yet only a few of your fathers deserved to be kicked out of your lives. You were raised by the women who kicked your fathers out, and perhaps by a string of step-dads and "uncles." Those women, your mothers, taught you their values by example. Not an auspicious start. Most of the rest of you were raised by fathers who knew damn well that if they displeased your mothers, they too could be kicked out of your lives according to your mothers' whims. They knew full well who had the real power in the family; they quietly accepted that "mother knows best."

You were raised in a culture that permits, even encourages, women and girls to always push for more; not necessarily to do more or earn more, but to demand more and to expect more. You were punished far less severely for your transgressions than were your male peers. Indeed your female peers egged you on to be even naughtier, and to be defiant about it. It's Grrrl Power, after all! The boys of your acquaintance were expected to give in to your shenanigans and your shit tests, and those who didn't were labelled "problem children" and medicated. Usually, a boy's best bet was to shut up and grovel, and maybe win your approval. They weren't allowed to go around offending the Special Snowflakes, were they?

You were raised in a Disney Princess Culture, where every girl is entitled to her Prince Charming. And if she can't find one, she has the Grrrl Power to kiss any old frog and transform him into a Prince. You were raised to be a slut, at least through your twenties. Go to college. Establish a career. Don't get married until your late twenties or early thirties, but DO NOT under any circumstances, repress your sexuality. Your foremothers fought hard for your right to be promiscuous with no consequences; don't you dare let their efforts go to waste.

And since you're not looking for a husband, there's no need to sleep with only "good" men, is there? Cuz badboyz r hawt! And nice guys are boring. And hell, you have plenty of time to ride the best cocks you can find – thanks to modern medicine, you can get pregnant after menopause if you want, so there's no hurry. You are expected to waste your youth and your beauty on hot guys who treat you like shit, then give your leftovers to the guy you'll promise to love, honor and cherish for the rest of your life. Wow! How lucky is he!

My son looks around and he sees bitchy, arrogant, malicious women. He sees spoiled greedy women. He sees financially irresponsible women. He sees lazy, undisciplined women. (Yes, even in the military; they had to lower the standards so more women could "serve.") He sees overweight women wearing unflattering clothes that display muffin tops and rolls of fat, who drool over his biceps while telling him that "looks shouldn't matter."

He sees slutty women who dress to attract men, sleep with the hot ones, and denigrate the less attractive ones by calling them "creepy." He sees "competitive" professional women whose primary tools for getting ahead are affirmative action and the unspoken threat of sexual harassment lawsuits. He sees demanding women who expect men to bow and scrape for the privilege of a smile. He sees utterly irrational women whose "self esteem" is obscenely disproportionate to their proven worth. He sees entitled women who expect romantic dates and expensive gifts, yet have absolutely nothing of value to contribute to a relationship. He sees women who flirt with their hopeful, geeky JustFriends, juuuust barely enough to keep them on a string while simultaneously panting after Alpha Hotteies, then run crying back to those JustFriends after being pumped and dumped by said Hotties. "Oh, why can't more men be nice like you?" (Answer: if they were, no woman would fuck them.)

Look around you, ladies. You see the very same women, don't you? Many of you are these women. You think this is normal and acceptable because "everybody does it." It's not.

There's something you should know about my son and his peers. They're not gay, they're not lazy, they're not stupid, they're not unambitious, and they're not weak. They've merely figured you out. They know that you don't give a rat's ass about them, and that you see them as nothing but providers and fantasy sex objects. They are wise to the game and they're done playing by your rules.

They have the same job titles as you and they take home the same pay, but they work longer hours and they do harder work; they know that their productivity is why employers can afford to hire you to sit a desk and shuffle papers. They know that if two drunk people have sex and both regret it the next morning, only one of them is a rapist. They know that "My Body/My Choice" actually means "My/Body/My Choice/Your Wallet." They know that the minute they sign a marriage license, everything they own is yours, but nothing you own is theirs (except your debts) and you can walk away with cash and prizes, at any time, for any reason. Or for no reason at all.

They're calling Bullshit.

A few years from now, you'll begin asking yourself, "Where have all the good men gone?" You'll look down your noses at all those guys playing video games and living like frat boys in cheap apartments, and you'll just know that they could be "doing so much better for themselves," if only they would "Man Up." You'll shake your heads in wonder at their "immaturity," or their "wasted potential." Here's a little secret. Yes, a few men are immature or weak; they've had the masculinity abused or medicated out of them, mostly by their single mothers and grandmothers. But most of them?

They no longer give a rat's ass about you.

That's right. They don't need to work hard and earn a good living. They have no intention of fathering and supporting any children, and no desire whatsoever to earn your approval. You go buy your own four-bedroom colonial in just the right subdivision. That's what your Grrrl Power is for, isn't it? So you don't need a man? Many of these men will even go so far as to quit their jobs as soon as they begin to "earn a good living." They don't want to make enough money to pay taxes. They don't want to pay the salaries of millions of useless (and mostly female) government employees, and they don't want to finance the personal choices of "Empowered Women."

Those Empowered Women can buy their own damn birth control. These men refuse to feed your Beast. And you, and your government, and your church, can't cajole them or shame them into giving a shit. Men are dropping out, ladies. Chivalry has died of blunt force trauma, in a beatdown administered by Grrrl Power. Your mothers, your grandmothers, your schools, your family courts, your sociology professors, have spent the last two generations telling men that the are unnecessary and unwelcome. And now they're leaving. (Although they'll be glad to fuck you while you're young and hot, since you're offering. Aaaaand then they'll move on to younger and hotter sluts. Why the hell not? It's free.)

This is the gift that feminism has given to you: Independence. Scary, lonely, bitter, potentially impoverished Independence. For yourselves and any children you may have. Most of you won't blame feminism though; you'll blame Male Privilege (which doesn't exist.) You'll blame The Patriarchy (which always gave women a better deal than it gave men.) You will stamp your feet, flip your hair, and blame anything except the single cultural force that has devoted itself to suppressing and controlling masculinity. And you'll go home alone every night to your cats, your Facebook Friends, and your vibrators. I sure hope that's what you want.

Sincerely,

A Mom.

Author's Note:

This piece is not about my son. In real life, he is a multi-faceted individual living his own life. In this article, “My Son” is a cardboard cutout of any ordinary, intelligent young man who is considering his future. Sarcasm is my friend, so no, I’m not a bitter aging helicopter mom with Oedipal issues, who believes no woman will ever be good enough for Mr. Perfect.

And yes, NAWALT, I know…

Don’t just do something, SIT THERE

“To be or not to be- that is the question.”
Shakespeare

Being is vital to the health of everyman but is rarely given the consideration it deserves: Being at a cafe, being in nature, being with a friend, being at home, being at peace. Smelling the roses. If allowed, these things have potential to replace some of the incessant doing that drives men’s existence too early into the coffin.

We’ve all heard the phrase Women are human beings and men are human doings.[1] It’s one of those catchy, hummable lines that everyone agrees with before it slips again from conscious awareness – even as it remains in front of our eyes and in our daily behavior. Even as it slips from awareness the fact remains that doing without being, and being without doing, bespeak unbalanced lives, ones that can and do lead to pathology.

The question we need to ask is what are we doing about it? I don’t mean what are we doing about it as a movement, but what are we, each of us, doing about it in our own personal lives. While some men are already addressing the balance, others may still be searching for the right balance, and for a better understanding of what’s at stake.

Pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott contends that not only is being more important than doing in regards to psychological health, but that being must precede doing in order for doing to have significance:

> “Being is at the centre of any subsequent experience in life. In fact if the individual has not had the opportunity to simply be, his future does not augur well in terms of the emotional quality of his life. The likelihood is that this individual will feel empty.”
> “Now I want to say: ‘After being, is doing and being done to. But first, being.”
> “The ability to do, therefore, is based on the capacity to be. The search and discovery of the sense of self, in the context of therapy, is all to do with finding an identity.”
> “It cannot be overemphasized that being is the beginning of everything, without which doing and being done to have no significance.”[2]

Being, according to Winnicott, is more important to mental health, and is ironically the thing males are most encouraged to forego in favor of doing. You’d better not relax and simply be – there is work to be done!

The trend of separating boys and girls along these lines starts early. The boy gets a dump truck and a Bob the Builder toolkit, and the girl receives a Be Yourself Barbie™. Through the person of Barbie girls learn the experience of 'being' in a doll's house, and being relaxed, being pretty, being ugly, being among friends, being at a cafe, being married, or being happy, sad, jealous or vain. That's the psychological cloth little girls are cut from.

The first question we ask a boy is "What sport do you play," or "What kind of work do you want to do when you grow up?" Men are taught to be action figures who work, do the wage earning, do the repairs, or do their girlfriend. As long as they are doing something, we assume they are in their rightful place.

But doing can only return value if the person first exists. If he doesn't feel like he exists on a basic level, all efforts in doing have no meaning because there is no 'me' doing the doings. In that instance all doing becomes futile because it never leads to a sense of me-ness. Or, if doing does provide a momentary illusion of me-ness, it all vanishes the moment activity stops. When all is still, with no future plans, many men are swallowed by an existential void.

With the modern mandate that men do and women be, there's a dearth of male models for how to be. So for the purpose of this article lets revive a classical source illustrating what men have lost and why we would do well to rediscover it. For our purpose let's consult the 2,600 yr old sage Lao Tzu, who cultivated a philosophy of non-doing (Wu wei), defined as follows:

> Wu wei (Chinese: 無爲) is an important concept in Taoism that literally means non-action or non-doing. In the Tao te Ching, Lao Tzu explains that beings (or phenomena) that are wholly in harmony with the Tao behave in a completely natural, uncontrived way. The goal is, according to Lao Tzu, the attainment of this purely natural way of behaving, as when the planets revolve around the sun. The planets effortlessly do this revolving without any sort of control, force, or attempt to revolve themselves, instead engaging in effortless and spontaneous movement.[3]

Being aware of the importance of the doing/being dichotomy, one of the first books I gave my son, at the tender age of 10, was a children's version of the Tao Te Ching by Lao Tzu. We read it together and enjoyed some interesting discussion about the wise old sage, especially about his contention that the wise man "Acts without doing" — What did it mean? I'm not entirely sure if we got the meaning right, but we decided it meant to 'act' in the way you want to act, without 'doing' what others demand or expect from you.

Lao Tzu book for 7-10 yr old boys

"Therefore the wise one acts without doing"

In another translation the old sage says, Act without doing; work without effort. In each of these phrases he seems to be saying let it come naturally, let it arise out of being, and not from pressures from the outside world.

None of this is to suggest that boys and men shouldn't be active in the world. The good news for men seeking that greater balance is that you don't have to sacrifice doing in the process. Most men really MUST do in order to be healthy. But there is a distinction to be made here between healthy and unhealthy doing.

It's one thing to act from a spontaneous sense of self – a being self – and yet another to operate from compliance with the wishes of others because you were raised on a narrative of utility. Those living the narrative of utility must first become conscious of that before giving themselves over to an exploration of being, and if that consciousness is not first achieved then it's guaranteed that your attempts at being will be interrupted by internal guilt or by shaming from those who have most to lose from you walking off the plantation.

As per Lao Tzu we don't stop doing but rather become more conscious of our motives so that doing can emerge from a different center – not gynocentric duty, but conscious choice grounded in the ability to be.

One of Lao Tzu's main disciples Chuang Tzu elaborates the topic:

> Heaven does nothing: its non-doing is its serenity.
> Earth does nothing: its non-doing is its rest.
> From the union of these two non-doings
> All actions proceed,

> All things are made.
> How vast, how invisible
> This coming-to-be!
> All things come from nowhere!
> How vast, how invisible-
> No way to explain it!
> All beings in their perfection
> Are born of non-doing.
> Hence it is said:
> "Heaven and earth do nothing
> Yet there is nothing they do not do."
>
> Where is the man who can attain
> To this non-doing?[4]

Remaining with our fictional character Lao Tzu a little longer, let's consider the traditional tea-making ceremony legend says he helped to found. Just as Barbie is famed for her tea parties in which she teaches girls the arts of being among friends, Lao Tzu is credited with the first Chinese tea ceremony, a ritual centered in the experience of stillness and presence.

We may be reluctant to talk about a 'Tao of Barbie,' with her narcissistic overtones, but the tea drinking ceremonies of the Chinese and Japanese cultures deserve a nod to the noble Tao of Lao Tzu.

Taoism, like most ancient religions, talks about the balance between work and repose. By way of contrast, while Barbie also teaches girls that a work/life balance is possible, it's not certain that Barbie takes the work part of that equation very seriously.

To summarize, a common element running through all narratives about men is doing. We hear it in phrases like "All work, no play," "Don't just sit there, do something!," and "No rest for the wicked." Men slave for gynocentric culture as its saviors, fix-it men, martyrs, protectors, laborers, office-workers, and heroes – all narratives based on doing. But there's good reason for men to break from the cycle of servitude to enjoy some moments of being – being for themselves.

It's time we stopped for a cup of tea: ritually made, mindfully sipped, with or without friends, and without a need to watch the clock for the next round of work.

Another look at the dark side of femininity

May 27, 2023 | by Elder Swami | Link | Original Link

Hypergamous Detachment Mechanism

I first became conscious of the darker feminine attributes when I was about 18, while having a man to man talk with my good friend Jack. Jack had just broken up with his girlfriend and was not dealing with it very well. In fact, he was a mess. The break up had been far less than pleasant, his girlfriend had cheated on him and she made sure that he saw her with her new lover while he was on a group outing. Jack was perplexed at how a woman who once seemed so soft and loving could so quickly turn into someone so cold, spiteful and calculated. After all, he had done everything that he was told would make him the perfect boyfriend, like taking dancing class, playing guitar for her and many other things manginas pride themselves in.

I reflected on my own experiences and was also shocked to find that women were quite different from the perfectly gentle, caring creatures I had been constantly told they were. Since then I have spent a great deal of energy trying to understand why the sex that are supposed to be the loving nurtures can also at times be the most spiteful and unfeeling.

What I found is quite intriguing, studies show that both males and females are instinctively non monogamous. That means that both men and women have the natural instinct to find multiple mates, however the way in which they act on this instinct is quite different. As we are all constantly reminded through the media, men are equipped with the biological mechanisms that influence them to chase several mates at once. However what we are not told is that females are also equipped with a biological mechanism that allows them to act on their instincts as well. Females are not only polyandrous but are also hypergamous, in that they shift from one mate to the next, always looking for the opportunity to move on to a more powerful and/or resource rich partner[1]. This was because prehistorically women where constantly pregnant or nursing infants and her first instinct was to ensure their survival. For this reason she is equipped with an instinct (or mechanism) that allows her to objectively choose a mate and move between mates according to their ability to protect and provide her (and her offspring) with resources [1].

I´m sure we are all aware of the very shallow and materialistic reasons many women choose their mates, but what I think is the most important discovery here is the shallow and materialistic reasons they leave their mates, and their instinctive ability to do so.

As you would imagine, when moving from one partner to another, emotional attachment will only be an impediment. Therefore a part of the female mating instinct is a mechanism that allows her to leave her partner for another without compunction, or, in other words, detach herself emotionally.

Emotional detachment is a typical human behaviour during certain periods of life, such as during the teenage years, while others are born with it permanently. For teens its purpose is to force them away from his/her parents so that they can gain full independence[2]. For women the symptoms and purpose are almost identical, in that they wish to detach themselves from something and are able to totally disregard the feelings that would prohibit them from doing so. The symptoms of the psychopathic syndrome linked with emotional detachment are described as “an egocentric, narcissistic and deceitful interpersonal style, expression of callous and unemotional affect” [3]

Does this sound…familiar?

Often women go a step further than just emotionally detaching themselves from the feelings of the previous mate but can replace her love for him with hate. With these feelings of hate and resent she may also take acts of revenge or extract resources from him during the separation process [1].This is the underlying cause of the disproportionate amount of female initiated divorce rates and the terrible and unscrupulous treatment of their ex husbands during and after the fact.

The purpose of this essay is not to demonise women, as I have pointed out both sexes have potentially harmful traits and many women can be very loving and supportive. However, the problem is that our culture is in complete denial of the female hypergamous detachment mechanism, (or in other words a woman´s ability to leave her partner and take advantage of him materially with little emotion or inhibition). Along with being denied, this primitive behaviour is enabled and even encouraged through the divorce courts resulting in terrible consequences for all involved.

I believe it is our responsibility to inform this generation of young men of this problem, because I’m sure we have all ignorantly walked into this situation once ourselves, just like Jack.

A Matter Of Anatomy

May 28, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

The current brouhaha about bathrooms and genders reminds me of an experience I had with same many decades ago. Oh, it has nothing to do with trans people or gender dysphoria, but it is relevant to the discussion.

When I was in college I had a summer job at a hotel in a major city. Among the tasks I was assigned to perform was collecting dimes from the pay toilets (like I said, this was decades ago) in the public restrooms. This was easily the least favorite of my duties.

Once a month I would bravely set out with a heavy canvas bag sufficient to support the weight of all the dimes. I donned a white lab coat with the hotel logo sewn on the breast. Supposedly, this made me look official while I made my rounds.

Within the hotel itself, my task was not terribly daunting. The hotel guests had their own rooms so the public facilities in the banquet rooms, meeting halls, and lobby were not busy unless there was some sort of event going on. It was easy enough to knock on the door of a women's restroom to ascertain if anyone was in there. If so, one waited outside. If not, one opened the door, propped it open, collected the dimes, and went on one's merry way.

Unfortunately, the hotel was connected to the terminal of a busy network of commuter trains. I'm not sure why, but the hotel was responsible for the public restrooms in the terminal. Because there were so many people coming and going, there was never a time when the place was empty or even close to being empty. So I just went in and went to work.

Scooping dimes out of a receptacle on a stall door is not something that can be done quietly and discreetly. Even in the men's room it was a distasteful chore. No real man would want to be disturbed during this most private of moments when he is posed like the Thinker and contemplating the Zen koan of whether one is making a deposit or a withdrawal when dropping a deuce.

Of course, it was even worse in the ladies' room. Imagine a woman in a stall quietly taking care of business when she hears the stall rattling while I'm cleaning out the dime box. She looks down and sees a man's shoes and trousers underneath the stall door. Reeeeeeeeeee!

Now I wouldn't have blamed women for demanding a female attendant to collect the dimes from the distaff crappers. And I certainly don't blame contemporary women for complaining about wannabe females penetrating their private spaces (har har). I realize that women have made countless inroads into male spaces, but I have no desire to return the favor. Admittedly, it is tempting to assert that trans men will leave the women's bathroom when women sportswriters leave male locker rooms. But I suspect that ultimatum would fall on deaf rears…uh, ears.

In truth, the act of excreting is a private but vulnerable moment regardless of one's sex.

It is not a situation where one can react quickly in the event of an invasion. Literally, one is caught with one's pants down.

Excretion is not a spectator sport. Even in your home, you close the bathroom door, unless you live alone. It's meant to be a private performance (guess we could call it water closet drama). Note that "privy" is a longtime synonym for bathroom. Surveillance cameras are everywhere these days but they are still taboo in public restrooms…I think.

And it's not just an opposite sex thing. If you've ever been in a latrine or a public restroom with a row of toilets but no stalls, you know what I mean. Single-sex or unisex, it's just wrong.

I am reminded, however, that President Lyndon Baines Johnson was given to holding meetings while he was in the act of defecation. Yes, LBJ was into multi-tasking before that was a thing. You have to hand it to him. Any politician can talk out of both sides of his mouth, but LBJ could express himself from two orifices simultaneously. Surely that deserves a shout-out in Ripley's Believe It or Not.

But there are even worse possibilities. A quick Google search reveals there is a term called "copro toilet voyeur." That might be a bridge too far even for OnlyFans.

Should the unisex bathroom become the way of the future, let's take a hint from the Buc-ee's chain of convenience stores. Their squeaky-clean bathroom policy is one of the key reasons that the Buc-ee's is so popular. People on the road actually go out of their way to make pit stops at Buc-ee's. Naturally, while they're there, they will probably buy a drink, a snack, or a souvenir, and maybe gas up the car. Pretty smart marketing – and I'll bet it didn't require a team of MBAs to come up with it.

But there's more to it than that. The bathroom stalls at Buc-ee's seal the occupant off from the outside world. Even the most rip-roaring performance is completely private. The occupier of a stall could have trans people on either side and never know it.

Whether or not public restrooms of the future will be unisex is anyone's guess. Once upon a time, separate but equal was acceptable, but that concept doesn't have many advocates these days. Equality has even come to mean installing sanitary napkin dispensers in men's restrooms. No urinals in women's restrooms…not yet.

The sticking point is gender identity. Restroom signs typically say "Men" and "Women" or "Gentlemen" and "Ladies." There are cuter variations: "Guys" and "Gals," "Dudes" and "Dudettes," "Roosters" and "Hens," or whatever. These, however, do not go to the root of the problem, as they are just variations on the more conventional signs.

So we need to avoid gender and be more specific. Instead, how about "Convex" and "Concave"? Or "Persons Born With Penises" and "Persons Born With Vaginas"? How about a Freudian twist: Persons With a Penis; Persons With Penis Envy? Don't care what you identify as. Don't care what clothing you wear. Don't care what hormones you take. It's a strictly anatomical distinction. Take it or leave it – no dickering!

Rather than consolidate all public bathrooms, why not subdivide them further, from two to four? In hipster hangouts, for example, we could have not just cats and chicks, but cats with pussies and chicks with dicks.

Even so, grey areas abound. Is a biological female clutching a dildo or wearing a strap-on a chick with a dick? My guess is you could probably find a shyster who would be glad to argue that…for a price.

Now if you are a trans woman who has been so bold as to undergo a penectomy, whether by a board-certified surgeon or a Lorena Bobbitt copycat, I will concede that you are qualified to enter the vagina restroom. Once you've lost the ability to write your name in the snow, you have crossed the Rubicon.

And if you are a trans man with some sort of artificial appendage, circumcised or otherwise, you deserve access to the penis restroom. Welcome to the sausage fest! Bone appetit!

Of course, no matter what sort of solution one offers, someone somewhere will be offended. If you don't like the traditional "men" an "women" setup and you think my suggestions are lacking in merit, I have one final suggestion, and this is my last word on the subject:

Go shit in your hat.

The new male archetypes: Servant, Slave and Scapegoat

May 29, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

> "The modern hero, the modern individual who dares to heed the call and seek the mansion of that presence with whom it is our whole destiny to be atoned, cannot, indeed must not, wait for his community to cast off its slough of pride, fear, rationalized avarice, and sanctified misunderstanding. 'Live,' Nietzsche says, 'as though the day were here.' It is not society that is to guide and save the creative hero, but precisely the reverse. And so every one of us shares the supreme ordeal––carries the cross of the redeemer––not in the bright moments of his tribe's great victories, but in the silences of his personal despair." Joseph Campbell ~ The Hero with a Thousand Faces

Anyone suggesting they have ideas that will actually help men, psychologically speaking, has an obligation to place their philosophy, their rationale, front and center for men to see. I also understand that most practitioners don't really do that, especially in what I loosely define as the "mental health" industry.

Usually what you get is a short and sputtering list of platitudes about "wholeness," finding your "inner this" or "inner that," accompanied by an obscure definition of the practitioner's approach. It is either that or you get nothing but the bill.

Sometimes, often actually, they will inform you that they subscribe to feminist theory, which is an admission of their philosophy, except to the extent that it should be viewed cautiously, regardless of your sex.

Perseus

This writing is intended to explain exactly what An Ear for Men is about in regard to assisting men, specifically in their more modern struggle for identity and an understanding of where they fit in the world. This is particularly important as the lack of those things may well result in some serious problems. Among them are family dysfunction, substance abuse, suicide, violence, anxiety, depression, shame and a lack of self-respect that often crosses the line into self-hatred.

It is not that the current crisis of male identity is the sole cause of these problems. It certainly isn't. For example, family dysfunction is a self-perpetuating malady passed down from parents to children. In and of itself it has little to do with modern masculinity. Alcoholism is not a "male problem," nor is violence or other forms of abuse, though those practicing under a feminist shingle may send that very message.

When assessing problems, it can be very difficult to tell the difference between cause and symptom, between a problem and its source. Does family dysfunction cause substance abuse or is substance abuse the cause of the dysfunction? Is violence at the root of relationship problems or do relationship problems fuel and promote the violence? Do communication problems cause hostility or does hostility cause communication problems?

Are all these problems symbiotic, just a teeter-totter interaction of various pathologies feeding each other? If so, can we ameliorate one problem by successfully intervening on another?

I suggest that there may be some truth answering those last two questions in the affirmative. There are, however, workarounds, back doors if you will, to what may well form part of the root structure of an array of problems with no readily visible connection. The good news about that is that you don't need to see the connection initially in order to do something about it.

The philosophy here is that solutions begin with a recognition that there is indeed a crisis in male identity and male self-respect. It affects all of us, gay or straight, black or white or other race, regardless of religion or socioeconomic status.

Fifty years of gender politics have thrust all men into a new paradigm of sexual politics with no rule book. We are now three generations of men who have been pummeled with messages of who we are, almost all of them wrong, and who we are supposed to be, almost all of them destructive in one way or another. Our mental health industry is one of the prime proponents of these misguided ideas. They are espoused, for profit, at the expense of our men and boys.

The Old School Archetypes

The classic, historical masculine archetypes of Hero, Villain, Ruler, Warrior, Creator, Sage, Rebel and Explorer, all of which either defined what men chose or what they were driven to be. They provided men a model of what they chose not to be as well. They gifted men with a sense of identity and purpose, a rudder for their navigation of life. To a great degree (with some downsides) they worked. Jungian analysts, in the days before the ideological corruption of the field of psychology would likely tell you that these archetypes are rooted in our biology.[1]

It is also important to note that all these archetypes are anthropomorphic projections of the human male experience. They took root in our earliest mythologies because they were already in play in human life. Strangely, "mythology" told the real story of our lives.

Every epic battle, great journey, tragedy and triumph of mythical figures mirrored the internal and external experience of real human beings in some way or another.

And so it went from epoch to epoch.

All that has been supplanted with a new and toxic narrative. To simplify it, we now live in a Zeitgeist where all male archetypes have been reduced to that of Villain, with the expectation that they will assume the role of Hero when needed…and directed. The ongoing expectations of men to protect, provide, sacrifice and endure have not changed. The change in narrative, however, demands that recognition and honoring of those things ceases in favor of persistent demonization.

Hera

Similar changes have happened in the lives of women. The Manipulator, the Bitch, the Saboteur, the Queen and the Damsel in Distress have usurped the timeless archetypes of mother (Demeter), daughter (Persephone), lover (Aphrodite), civic life and learning (Athena), etc.. While all these and other female archetypes are on full social display, the spectrum of those archetypes has begun to degrade into a vacillation between two roles based on immediate perception. Women are universally seen as the Queen, unless they are in distress or claim to be in distress. Once the perception of female distress registers, social consciousness reverts them to being the original Damsel in Distress. It is as though they live in a perpetual state of flux between empowered and helpless, depending on which is more advantageous, just as we see play out today across the geopolitical landscape.

That, too, is ultimately heading for a crisis of identity in women, though for the purpose of this discussion we need not explore that further.

The denial of all this, and the assumption that it has not had a tremendous impact on the psyches of men, has left them in an emotional and social wasteland that produces more of the psychosocial problems already identified in this writing.

This leads to an inescapable conclusion. While men do need assistance with specific problems, they are also suffering in a famine of functional archetypes. Failing to recognize this, even if we seek in earnest to help them with problems symptomatic of that deficit, is putting a Band-Aid on potentially mortal wounds.

If we are to help men, it requires us to enable them to nurture a new narrative of themselves and their lives. They need new archetypes that foster a new sense of identity if they are going to thrive in a new age.

So what exactly is an archetype?

The Greek root words are archein, meaning “original or old,” and typos, meaning “Model or type.” Archetype: Original Model. Archetypes are the old, original models on which men, in the unconscious recesses of their biology, shape and mold their lives.

Perhaps in the days when there were payoffs, e.g. honor, appreciation, respect and status, men’s unconscious movement toward one archetype or another made more sense.

We do not live in those times any more, and we haven’t for most or all of your lifetime. What remains for most men in modern life is a world of expectation without reward, burden without honor and service without self.

Most men know on some level that this is true, but many have a very hard time facing it out of fear. Fear of the loss of social approval, the loss of love and the loss of what they imagine is the only space the world grants them.

Some of the fear is at least superficially warranted. Facing these issues means reaching a level of consciousness sufficient to make you a bad fit in the world of the walking blind. It means a new mythology with new archetypes born of a newer and more accurate picture of the world.

Medea

The daunting challenge is that men can no longer afford the luxury of allowing biology alone to write their story. Technology and ideology have rendered that too dangerous.

The old model makes men far too easy to manipulate and far too willing to comply with the manipulation to their own detriment. You can find this same story throughout classic mythology so it is nothing new. Those, however, were cautionary tales, the moral lesson from which has been erased from the cultural consciousness. Most dare not speak honestly of Hera and Medea in the modern age.

The results of that resembles a modern genocide of the male soul.

Fortunately, that which has been forgotten can be learned again. And that which has been learned in error can be corrected. The fruits of that effort are the restoration and "wholeness" so easily promised and seldom delivered.

The risks of embracing this on a personal level is actually an illusion. Once you walk the newer path you will most probably find you don't particularly want to return to the old one. The feigned approval of others loses its luster when the vision clears.

Despite appearances, all of this is really not so arcane. It is actually quite simple. You can start with most any problem in life; relationship and family issues are a good start. Map the mythology that got you there, that determined your actions and reactions. Were you playing the role of the Hero? The Warrior? Were you surrendering to the Siren's Song? Was the Damsel in Distress a façade with something more sinister behind the surface impression?

Did a faulty narrative of your place and worth in this world lead you directly into a painful wall? And if that is true, do you have the fortitude to face it and change the story?

Imagine the consciously constructed mythology that would lead you to a better place with better people. Imagine the story of you being written by your own hand.

The solutions are not always easy, but they are made much more accessible when you make the decision to clear your own path; when you are at the helm, navigating your own way, when the stars in the sky are arranged according to your own dreams and desires.

How many miserable professional men out there can remember a time when they aspired to be artisans, writers or artists, only to watch those dreams buckle beneath the oppressive weight of a story that they did not write?

How many desperate men are clinging to the role of provider and protector, having become automatons in loveless, abusive marriages that have ground their self-respect into the dust?

How many men have stories that end with a bottle of scotch and a handgun because they cannot breathe and do not know where to find free air?

Men need an alternative to the new mythology's archetypes of Servant, Slave and Scapegoat. The only thing preventing that from happening is being trapped in or clinging to a narrative they did not produce and which has never served them.

We have seen the results of men living in a world that is devoid of any honoring of men's roles or even of men's being. How can men cope in this sort of world? How can therapists or anyone else facilitate a man moving from this restrictive, prison-like consciousness into a more truly masculine path that embraces his well-being, self-interest and happiness?

Feminism’s mythology of rape culture

May 29, 2023 | by Elly Tams | Link | Original Link

This is a slightly updated version of an article Dr. Tams had published elsewhere, before she decided to abandon feminism entirely. It has mysteriously disappeared from its original location. –Ed.

I didn’t enjoy being stalked by my ex-boyfriend, and then having him break into my house, threaten to kill me and then assault me. I didn’t enjoy it at all. Sometimes I call that night, over ten years ago now, as “the day I became a feminist.” (I’ve since come to change my mind about that, though this issue was part of that, see Leaving the sisterhood for more.)

I was already a feminist. My Mum and her Mum were feminists. I was born into it. So I never really had to think too much until he stood over me, his hands round my neck, squeezing, telling me what a bitch I was. I never had to think what “being a woman” or “being a feminist” meant. I will give him that. He and his violence really got me thinking.

After my assault, and my lonely journey through the legal procedure that followed, I naively thought I might be able to share some sisterhood and solidarity with other women who’d suffered violent attacks, including domestic violence and rape. But when I have tried to connect with women who campaign on “violence against women,” I repeatedly get told that because I have not been raped, I have no right to talk on this issue or to try and empathize with women who have. Rape seems to hold a special symbolic position in the minds of these feminists and is treated as worse — but also somehow better — than all other violent crimes.

The term used to demonstrate the privileged position rape holds in feminist discourse is “rape culture.” According to Melissa McEwan:

> Rape culture is the myriad ways in which rape is tacitly and overtly abetted and encouraged having saturated every corner of our culture so thoroughly that people can’t easily wrap their heads around what the rape culture actually is.

Far more important than my own feeling of exclusion from feminist campaigns and groupings around gender violence is the countless number of other people who get attacked and killed in our society, who are not acknowledged by the concept of “rape culture.” Have you ever heard a feminist say that we live in transphobic assault culture? Or murder of young black men culture? Or homophobia culture? Or even domestic violence culture? I haven’t. Incidentally domestic violence is far more common than rape, and can also include rape. But it just doesn’t seem to impress the feminists who believe in rape culture. They are welcome to their victim top trumps, but I am not playing anymore.

When I say rape is privileged in feminist discourse, I don’t mean that it benefits anybody. I believe that by focusing on the centrality of rape in our culture, feminists are actually making it more difficult for all of us to campaign against all forms of gendered violence in society.

Trying to work out why these feminists do this is difficult. My instinct is that holding onto special victim status has some pay-offs for feminists. They can continue to present gender politics as a binary opposition between men (potential rapists) and women (perpetual potential victims of rape). Basically, the concept of rape culture is misandrist, and it does not allow for the fact that women are sometimes perpetrators of sexual assault, and men are sometimes on the receiving end.
I'd like to quote somebody who left a comment on a previous essay of mine about this topic. This woman is a survivor of rape, so the rad-fems won't be able to dismiss her critique of rape culture the way they do mine:

> This mythologizing of rape is still rooted in the whole "pedestal" complex, IMHO, and thus rapists are EVIL and women who get raped are spiritually/psychologically disfigured for LIFE and blah blah blah. The "rape culture" paradigm, while clearly meant as helpful critique and containing valuable cultural insight, seems to carry on that tradition.

The term "rapist" is one I am not comfortable with using at all, if I can help it. I know I am in a tiny minority, as I see the word splashed across the newspapers on a regular basis, and I hear it being used widely in conversations about rape. The reason I don't like the word "rapist" is that I think it serves to undermine our attempts to tackle rape and sexual violence. This is because it pathologizes people who commit rape, portraying them in our culture as monsters and hate figures. This leads to a situation where we place rapists pretty near the top of a hierarchy of evil characters (maybe just behind pedophiles), so that in fact, it is actually very difficult to prosecute for rape. If rapists are these inhuman monstrous characters, it is not surprising that courts up and down the country are reluctant to convict the thousands of people (not men, people) who commit rape each year.
I have received criticism for my view, particularly from feminists who argue that survivors of sexual violence need the term rapist to enable them to name their attacker, proceed with seeking justice and ultimately to get over their ordeal. But I believe that just as we have changed our terminology from talking about victims to survivors of rape, we also need to change how we label perpetrators. When I hear the word "rapist" I think of a man, and not a man who is capable of change, of reflection. We have to speak about and talk to men who commit sexual assault as if they are able to change, and we also must acknowledge men are not the only perpetrators, if we want to reduce sexual and intimate partner violence in society.
Rape culture is a myth. I reject it outright.
In fact, it's part of why I now am no longer a feminist.

Roosters Behaving Badly, Hens Cheeping Loudly

May 31, 2023 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

This guy named Meredith Wilson wrote a musical called "The Music Man," a show about a huckster who falls in love with a sensible woman, and she in love with him, in spite of his many faults. He eventually repents of his dishonesty, when love and volition are allowed to peacefully intercede. A man who doesn't need to be browbeaten or shamed to change for the better. Amazing.

At one point in the theatrical proceedings, the town's chattering class (all female) gossip around the conman. The gossip quickly turns into a song (This is a musical, after all.), as the ladies sing:

Pick a little, talk a little
Pick a little, talk a little Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!
Talk a lot
Pick a little more

Pick a little, talk a little
Pick a little, talk a little Cheep! Cheep! Cheep! Cheep! CHEEP! Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!…

This is Wilson's clever way of setting the ladies' gossip to music, by making a reference to hens, for some reason… It'll come to me.

Anyway, the reason I bring up "The Music Man" is because it reminds me of something trivial I bothered to read at The Huffington Post. You've heard of the Huffington Post, haven't you?

Huff a little, puff a little
Huff a little, puff a little Bitch! Bitch! Bitch!
Puff a lot
Huff a little more

I'm sure you've also heard of Marlo Thomas, otherwise known as Mrs. Donahue. Thomas has something to pick at, due to a handful of politicians and alpha males who got caught, or merely accused, during this past month of various sexual, financial, and political shenanigans. You can be certain that Thomas is having a field day with it. She can afford to. In the long run, the culture upon which Thomas, you, and I have come to depend, cannot.

Thomas's article was on a page with a link to the following: "Hot or Not? Why Women Shouldn't Pick Attractive Husbands." In this article, we learn that "[a]ttractive men don't make the best husbands, according to researchers." Of course, the author, one Vicki Larson ("Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!"), never bothers to define "attractive," nor did the “researchers” ever prove objective attractiveness. I myself find regular guys quite attractive, much more than male models and the shaved Greek gods of mainstream porn. I’m not sure that I care to know what Ms. Larson or the researchers think is attractive. I have a sinking feeling it comes with a detachable penis.

The computers at which these two women pick and talk were designed, built, and shipped to their doors by men. Furthermore, those computers are connected to the Internet, a cybernetic phenomenon that comes as close as any material thing can come to existing in the abstract; and it was also designed by men. The materials used to make computers and the Internet come out of the earth, dug into by men. (Oddly, even though there are few impediments left, to this day the women still don’t feel like digging. “Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!”)

The good news is: I think I’ve stumbled upon a female Internet writer who understands a lot of what I see. I now visit Lenore Skenazy’s website, “Free Range Kids,” on a regular basis. (Not a single “Cheep!” from her.) I already got one article out of it, and it won’t be the last. Mrs. Skenazy, sadly, is a dying breed of woman. Like my own mother, she does not feel the need to know every second exactly where her boys are. She caused an uproar for letting one of her sons take the New York subway by himself. Strangely, no men molested him during the ordeal. Mrs. Skenazy caught flak anyway. Stranger still, she stood up for herself, and gave the world a cornucopia of statist insanity with her wonderful website. Stay tuned for more profanity-laden diatribes written by yours truly, based on this woman’s work. (Love the glasses!)

Here’s a post about one mother’s legal struggle to help her son Ricky. (Thus, Skenazy is on the exact same page as Mr. Elam.) As a recap, this young man followed his bodily instincts and had sex with a young woman he thought was only one year younger than he. Unfortunately, like arbitrary speed limits, her age did not equal the arbitrary number the sclerotic, puritanical, feminized state came up with for “consensual sex,” and Ricky’s family was sent on a four-year spiral, including his tenacious mother’s sudden blindness, before a teenaged male could be considered innocent (sort of) by the state that ostensibly exists to protect him. From terrorists! The mother’s fight paid off for Ricky at least partially, and I’m sure he will never forget it. Now her fight goes on for other innocent young men and their mothers:

“The moms called Mary [Ricky’s mom] for strength. She listened, offered some bracing words, maybe snorted with gallows humor and told them to call her again anytime. ‘That mom who was suicidal? She’s finally coming out of it,’ said Mary, sounding damn pleased. ‘She’s getting ready to fight.’”

Sadly, Mary is now in a coma. That’s one less fighting mom in a culture run by horrid women like Marlo Thomas, whose snotty sermon barely contains her glee over a month of “salacious spring scandals,” including the foregone conclusion that the head of the IMF is already guilty of attempted rape, even though he has not been convicted in a court of law, and even though both Thomas and her husband, Mr. Thomas, allegedly believe that we are all innocent until proven guilty. (Of course, that point will be moot with the Thomases if Mr. IMF is "proven" guilty.)

The Internet is a marvel of a communication tool, one that wouldn't have happened without the rapid advancement of technology in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries, all on the backs of men. This permanent transformation of our planetary existence would most likely never have occurred if it hadn't been for Enlightenment principles, trumpeted to the world by male philosophers, including one who was almost executed for speaking his mind. After all this effort — groaning, sporadic, unpredictable, astounding — all that women supposedly have to offer, according to the writings of prominent feminists like Thomas, is "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!"

Why not pick at this? (My thanks to Chris Floyd for that link, a man rightly concerned with empire and war, and the far more legitimate concerns of suffering women whom Thomas hasn't mentioned yet):

"As you may know the oppressors in Bahrain are targeting professional women arresting [sic] from their places of work or study. Many have disappeared into military style prisons and have not had access to lawyers or their families. The few who have been released report sexual attacks, verbal and physical insults and threats and other forms of torture… You will note that one of those arrested is a pregnant woman who happens to be the wife of an activist. Many others are young women in their early 20s. One of these young ladies is a poet and a student teacher who was arrested after four of her brothers were threatened at gunpoint to turn their sister in. No other Arabic regime has used torture and arrest against women to crush protests in this systematic and brutal manner. Yet media outlets in the west and Al Jazeera Arabic are largely silent on these abuses in stark and shameful contrast to the coverage given to other protests [emphasis mine, since Thomas didn't even bother]."

Too hellish? Well, then, perhaps Thomas can rally her feminist friends in the aid of a truly inspiring woman like Sharon Secor, who is in a slightly less nightmarish position. Ms. Secor is one of the assistant editors at Strike The Root (for which I also write), a homeschooling mom, and a one-of-a-kind, formerly single mother by choice. That's right. She didn't stick any man that impregnated her with any baggage, though. She understands freedom and consequences. You can chide her all you like for consciously choosing to raise children without a father (although she is married now), but she simply wants to be left alone with her little family.

Unfortunately, the Free-and-Nanny State of Texas, perched on top of abysmal schools where mostly women teach, can't bear the idea of women (the kind that don't suffer from The Patriarchy) raising kids who think for themselves. They keep reminding us it's the National Organization for Women, not of Women; therefore, since Secor is a woman, go for it.

…We're waiting. When will you be finished with the picking and the talking?

If women who suffer at the hands of the state aren't to your taste, what about acknowledging that the "bad behavior" of men is not that much different from women? Here's a woman allegedly doing something similar to the IMF dude, to a 10-year-old girl and 18-year-old woman:

"When interviewed by investigators, reports state that Pagoria [the alleged dominatrix] explained that she used to spank the girls, but 'the spankings had not improved their behavior.'

"She switched to the table and handcuffs after 'she decided she needed to do something that would embarrass them so they would learn not to break the rules again,' the report states." Yes, spanking is a wonderful idea.

Will Thomas be speaking out about this? Will she post pictures of girls and young women between the ages of 10 and 18 angrily protesting outside the courthouse before this woman has her day in court? Can I use this in a rant against our misandric culture, or is it all the boyfriend's fault?

"After the whippings, Pagoria explained that the girls were forced to stand naked in the corner 'so that they could reflect on what they had done wrong,' according to the report." Bradley Manning, anyone?

Oops. That's a guy. Sorry. How about this one, about a woman who refused to feed her teenaged son for 12 hours a day? Just a quickie, I promise: "Weed testified that Alfred believed her son to be possessed by Satan." Well, then, allow me to supplicate our Lord on his behalf: Jesus H. Christ!

The reader should keep in mind that I remain, to this day, an unrepentant lazy-ass doofus who does very little research. Imagine what I could come up with if I actually made an effort. Will Mrs. Non-Donahue Thomas, a woman who apparently does even less research, concede on any one of these?

The cycle of abuse repeats and repeats and repeats, like a bad meal, because the culture vaunts silly-headed women who can "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!" with the best of them, and ignores a truly intelligent woman like Alice Miller, who pointed all of this out time and time again, and was apparently ignored by the Thomases running the show.

If Marlo Donathomas truly cared about women who were raped; or "victims" of an online flashing; or "victims" of some rich-hunk-of-a-famous-dude writhing around on top of them, his perfect musculature moving in synchronicity as a reminder of The Patriarchy's true power; she would spend roughly five minutes investigating root causes of why humans — not men — occasionally behave badly. She would also take careful note of the differences that are oftentimes expressed through masculine bad behavior vs. feminine bad behavior.

I'm supposed to be concerned about your "gorgeous" husband? Why? I'm supposed to be outraged over women "victimized" by horny politicians? How so? I'm supposed to condemn a man before attempted rape has been proven because Western culture, according to Thomas, has programmed women to be silent? Really?

Then please explain to me how E.M. Forster, a guy, was able to write "A Passage to India" in 1924. If you haven't read the book or seen the brilliant film, an entire community of British settlers in India (a community run and maintained largely by men) rallies around a young woman who, due to some sort of heat sickness, mistakenly believes that her kindly Indian companion tried to rape her. Granted, this is fiction, but how was a writer like E.M. Forster able to conceive of a community's extraordinarily charitable reaction to a young woman's plight with such ease, and be understood by readers at that time? Yet Thomas asserts: "Historically, women who have been victimized by men — whether by a sexually harassing boss or a philandering husband — were trained to hit the mute button." Perhaps that should read: "…were trained to hit the mute button, except in British India."

You can thank this rhetoric — relentless, hyperbolic, shrill, and heavily televised — for teenaged young men being labeled for life. The more of them that feel sidelined, the more of them will be brought up without fathers. The more of them fatherless, the more the state will step in, especially when surrounding women start shrieking. Then we will see more posts from Mrs. Skenazy like the following, concerning kids who cannot play outside legally without the presence of at least one parent: "The officer said that kids under ten, by law, are not allowed outside, unsupervised except in their parents' yard." British India it ain't. Somebody tell Marlo. She and Mr. Thomas-Donahue will get right on it.

It used to be that Dad made the rules, and if he said you couldn't be outside unsupervised, chances are you lived in a really lousy neighborhood. Everything the state does is a bastardization at best of normal human relationships. This is why it's a mistake to involve the state's particularly pernicious form of coercion into any aspect of existence: marriage, divorce, custody, sex, rape, molestation, pornography, prostitution, drugs, finances, the workplace, education, justice, restitution, and everything else. These are matters to be taken care of in private. The state never really knew what privacy was, and now that the culture no longer seems to care, the state cares even less.

If "the personal" becomes "the political," there is no end to the pointing of guns, and it's only a matter of time before aggrieved individuals who are victimized by feminist/statist influence grab the same governmental guns and point them somewhere else. Feminists that don't need men will need the state, which is run by the worst sorts of men and women imaginable. Now the state is our father, and what a rotten dad he is. You can thank idiotic women like Thomas, and the alpha males who see the prize to be won inside the body of humanity. The natural power that men had within their own homes is gone, replaced by mindless pop culture, female hysteria unchecked, and a state that has a harder time convincing any thinking person of its actual necessity.

It's long past time for men and women everywhere to tell the gossiping hens to shut the cluck up. Meredith Wilson, unfortunately, was spot-on. Thus, while the women go on with "Cheep! Cheep! Cheep!", four men, forming a barbershop quartet, sing the following:

Good night, ladies.
Good night, ladies.
Good night, ladies.
We're going to leave you now.

Good advice, from a man who knew a huckster when he saw one.

Exposing feminism’s rotten core

May 31, 2023 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

The all-seeing eye of the non-feminist revolution is everywhere — especially in enemy territory — and there is no telling what it will turn up next! And by now you’ll have heard about Agent Orange, our man behind the scene who has done such stellar work exposing the rotten core of female supremacism to the disinfecting sunlight. Agent Orange has seen much indeed, behind the scene, and his summary of the scenery gets to the point: “When you see what feminism really is, you cannot unsee.”

In late 2011, AVfM ran some articles exposing a radical feminist writer, Vliet Tiptree, and a very disturbing post which she published on a blog called Radfem Hub. In her blog post, Vliet Tiptree muses upon the worthlessness and ultimate disposability of the male sex, and seems to insinuate that male genocide, or at least a radical eugenic engineering program, might be in the cards.

Various pro-male partisans conducted a search of the public record, and discovered that “Vliet Tiptree” was in fact Pamela O’Shaughnessy, a prominent California lawyer and bestselling novelist who has been published by Simon & Schuster and reviewed by the New York Times. Yes — a person living a double life; a public figure with a valuable reputation to lose!

Pamela O., being a lawyer by profession, knows very well how to choose her words. And in her article she lays out her theme in such circumspect language that we cannot pin her down conclusively as recommending male genocide. Still, it seems clear that she wants to plant this idea, in the minds of her readers, as something worth thinking about. In the comment thread that follows the article, readers are quick to oblige, and their manner of expression is less guarded.

All of this is old news, but it sets the stage for our present story. Briefly then, the enterprising Agent Orange accessed a members-only discussion forum attached to the Radfem Hub website. (Yes, this is a war, and in war, espionnage happens. Deal!) The name of the forum is “Women’s Lives Matter/Women’s Life Matters”, and it is populated by the most extreme radical lesbian separatists you can imagine. We shall abbreviate the cumbersome title as WLM. Agent Orange, in his investigation, studied the forum encyclopedically from end to end and downloaded the entire content — dubbed the Agent Orange Files — for the enlightenment of non-feminist men and women. Pamela O. enters into this, and I’ll get back to her. But first things first.

This is what you get when you boil down feminism to its unadulterated essence. It is the sticky, foul-smelling residue at the bottom of the pan. Contrary to what feminists will tell you, it is indeed “really” feminism — as real as feminism gets. And whoever informs you otherwise, is directing your attention away from “the little womyn behind the curtain.”

All right. Here we have a group of feminists who hate men so violently that they choose to talk in secret amongst themselves — they cannot let the outside world hear. Even other feminists, who perhaps hate men only one half or one quarter as much as these ones do, cannot be admitted to the inner sanctum.

Huddled in a self-referential intellectual masturbation circle, out of the sight of non-feminist men and women, their sickness is plainly apparent. They go through life looking for validation, seeing only what they need to see, ignoring anything that might guide their understanding toward a different conclusion.They are blocking, filtering, maneuvering and cherry-picking, or in a word, rationalizing. And why? Well at a guess, I'd say it's because they'd rather not discover the truth about themselves. Isn't that just good old fashioned human nature?

Theirs is the frustration of spoiled children who cannot always get their way. The world — or as they would say, the patriarchy — always outmaneuvers and defeats them. And why wouldn't it? The world is so much bigger than they are. In the end, that word "patriarchy" is little more than a placeholder for "anything of a plausibly male origin which frustrates me".

In classic feminist form, they cannot separate the personal from the political. Men have hurt them? Goodness, haven't they noticed that people hurt each other all the time in this hurtful world? They must learn to deal with this — it's called growing up. Yes, it is true that men have hurt women. It is also true that women have hurt men. Oh, and men have hurt other men, and women have hurt other women. So the traffic runs in four different channels. As I say, people hurt each other all the time — they do this every which-way from Friday. So if the radfems are hell bent upon revenge, why don't they just hunt down all the men who have hurt them — one at a time! — and hurt them right back? That seems like the way to do it, if you want my opinion. But I should be very, very careful of what I say here, or they will be hunting for me too. Poor dears.

These feminists make no bones about stating that "men are the problem". They are not bashful upon that subject; they lay it on the line just as pretty as you please:

Mangetout says:

"Males are the problem. They refuse to see that they are the problem."

Maggie H. says:

"Womyn, having to put up with men's shit, place the onus onto themselves to stop a bad situation from happening, while it is men who need a thorough discipline forced upon them."

White Tiger says:

"..men have the same designation, in my view, of annoying rodents."

Journey Mistress says:

". .men are assholes. That last part bears repeating; men are assholes."

rjeenah says:

". . men are self-centered assholes who expect you to cater to their every whim . ."

Dawnsister says:

"I'll take any revolution I can get. Any revolution that removes most of the males will do just fine."

I could go on and on with these samples, but you get the idea. And no, putting them back in their context will not improve them. They are every bit as bad as they sound, and the people who wrote them are ten times worse. For it is a mark of narcissism when you cannot admit that you are wrong at least some of the time. And it is a mark of female narcissism in particular, when you cannot admit that women are wrong at least some of the time. And the people cited above are guilty on both counts. How quickly the personal becomes the political, yes?

My own observation has been, that the stereotypically destructive qualities which certain folklore ascribes to women in general, cluster more thickly around feminist women. For indeed there is a stratum of women which has always given the female population a bad name, and these people have been called different things at different times. In recent times, they've gotten politically organized, and yes, "feminism" is the name they have given to their gig.

The hatred of men and things male, so patently displayed in the WLM forum, also appears among mainstream feminists when they converse or otherwise express themselves. However, you will not often find it so concentrated; normally, the misandry occurs in subtle flashes and fleeting innuendos. It will be heavily watered down, as a pervading moral undertow, seeping through the culture like tainted outflow from a sewage treatment plant. Almost never is it so crudely vitriolic and sustained as what we are now revealing to the world. Here, we learn what feminists say to each other when they think the world isn't listening.

We should lay to rest the silly notion that such feminists as these are only "fringe radicals" or "extremists", and that we mustn't judge the entire movement by them. My question is, why shouldn't we judge the entire movement by them? Compared to them, what do the moderate feminists really add up to? Anything much? What does a heap of feathers amount to, compared to a cannon ball? What really fuels feminism, anyway? Is it driven relentlessly forward by mellowness and grooviness — by fun, fluffy, happy feelings? Or does it run, let us say, on pure hate, pure spite, pure malevolence, pure malignancy? Well, you get the idea: darker emotions?

Well? Do you reckon the earnest feminists with their philanthropic "gynergy" got this big thing rolling fifty years ago, and have been the central driving force ever since? And do you suppose that a few disaffected souls gravitated after the fact to this fine, humanistic social movement, and decided to lurk around the fringe just to confuse us about the truly wholesome nature of it all?

Say what you will, but I am partial to the old maxim that happy people don't make history. And which is more, I've got some experience with feminists; I have studied them, as chaps like me will do, and I have logged a few years in this trade. And I can attest that feminists are all alike. Monolithic, you might say. They vary in superficialities, but under all those sheathing layers lies the high-conductive cable core on which the feminist message travels. It is the same message every time. Every feminist I have ever personally encountered, or been informed of, differs from the radfems we are now studying only in the strength of the underlying signal. One way or another, let them veil it ever so artfully, the message never skips a beat: “Men are the problem. . . men are the problem . . . men are the problem.”

The elaborately braided radfem “story” about men, patriarchy, and all the rest, is the core of the entire feminist narrative. As such, it is the core of the entire feminist enterprise. And these radicals represent the frontier toward which all of feminism, by the law of its nature, is forever trending. True, these ones are ahead of the curve — and yet they point the way. The future of liberal feminism is always radical, and if it is not, then it has no future at all.

Speaking of the future, the WLM feminists are forthcoming about how they’d like to address the man problem, and have floated a number of lively proposals:

Daughter of the Stars says:

“Actually, they [men] should be put on a leash, put in a cage, or put to sleep, just like they do to any animal which causes them any problem.”
yba wife says: :”…we have a [similar idiot] group here in the UK Fathers for Justice . . . who love nothing better that telling women they ‘have too much power’ and they have had enough . . . . even swift bullets are too good for this wankering lot.”

Maggie H. says:

“Men can all fuck off and die as far as I’m concerned.”

WhiteTiger says:

“I think it’s a great idea to produce sperm in a la-BOR-a-tory. That way, men will be completely redundant.”

MGO says:

“That is how wewill win. Not birthing males. Convincing vast numbers of females not to birth males. We have the absolute power over reproduction (and teh menz know it). So that is our weapon.”

Bonobobabe says:

“Actually, now that I think about it, a better source of animal glue (and leather, for that matter) would be from the bodies of men who have committed any crime against a woman. They should be put to death, skinned, and then their carcasses can be boiled for glue.”

Bonobobabe continues:

“Although, I think we would be overrun and probably wouldn’t have the resources to deal with all the bodies.”

Luckynkl says:

“A 12″ cast iron skillet to the back of the head speaks far louder than words and allows him to take your point with crystal clarity. Men don't want women taking up their valuable time, so clarity is appreciated."

Mangetout says:"….kill off all the alpha-males, all the aggressive males, and retrain the remaining more compliant males."

Bonobobabe says:

"Ah, Lorena Bobbitt. That takes me back. I remember the reactions were distinctly split by sex. …and even if the women expressed sympathy for Mr. Bobbitt. . . when they were in mixed company, as soon as no men were around, the women admitted they thought it was cool what she did."

"Radfem attitude is a spiritual aquifer that feminist-leaning women can dip into whenever the mood strikes them. We too have lowered a bucket into this deep, dark well — and behold the sample we have hauled up! We do this because we wish to show what is hidden from the world's gaze. Certain women haul this spirit up because they wish to fortify themselves."

And that goes double for the radical feminists. Whoever carries this radfem ideology as a mental backdrop can go almost anywhere and arbitrarily stir up trouble. They will be equipped with a bag of tricks and a way of working, and can work their game independently of right or wrong, of true or false. For almost any human scenario has a grain of ambiguity somewhere about it, and a skilled manipulator can make this grow and turn it to unethical advantage. In the end, feminism is all about stirring up trouble in this way and blaming it on others, especially if those others are male.

Let me be very, very clear. I do not doubt that many of these radfem women have endured genuinely bad, even traumatic experience at the hands of one man or another, and that these male actors were indeed the malefactors. But I believe that such experience, in many cases, warped their keels so that they could no longer navigate correctly, and that subsequent experience suffered from this warpage, which in turn compounded it. The warpage is what concerns me — I don't want it to spread to the rest of the world. But the radfem project, seemingly, is to make that very thing happen.

Radical feminism — and especially the brand we see here — is a kind of think-tank or test laboratory for ideas that will be gradually drip-fed into the general culture. Almost everything you hear such womyn talking about eventually percolates into the collective mind, melds with the zeitgeist, and makes itself familiar. However, you will sense only the broad flavor of it, as it ripples around the buzz-o-sphere. It will have no evident point-source; it will seem to precipitate from everywhere like a fog and you will not be able to nail it down. Another way of expressing this would be to say, that pieces of a conceptual jigsaw puzzle had been scattered randomly into the world, each transmitting its particular message and resonating uncannily with the others. In time, people would naturally fit the pieces together and draw the ordained conclusion, likely believing they had thought of it themselves, and unaware that their understanding had been primed and seeded. And in this way, the world at large crystallizes more and more along a feminist pattern.

Consider a mainstream feminist such as Jessica Valenti. I doubt she would fit in with the WLM crew and its “way-out” ideas. Jessica markets herself mainly to teenaged girls and hip, twenty-something yupsters, and once admitted having no interest in “herstory” and suchlike notions. And yet, Jessica Valenti harbors a seething core of anti-male bigotry which her glossy, pop-feminist personna only barely holds in check — and not always. She sees nothing morally amiss about informing the world, on no particular authority, that Gerald Loughner’s murderous rampage was a problem stemming from masculinity. Yes, you heard that right: Gerald Loughner was “expressing masculinity”. Jessica Valenti thinks she is entitled to say such things. But wait, it gets worse. On another occasion, Jessica Valenti implied that men accused of rape should forfeit the presumption of innocence and bear the burden of proof when they go on trial. In other words, Jessica does not believe in equal protection of the law for men. So far as Jessica Valenti is concerned, men are second-class citizens and innocent men can jolly well get their lives destroyed and suck it up. Jessica figures that’s okay. That’s the kind of history she wants to be making.

So who the hell is Jessica Valenti anyway, and what the hell gives her the moral license to say such unspeakably vile, vulgar, filthy things? And why the hell is Jessica Valenti not getting morally bitch-slapped, within an inch of her psychological life, from every press room and pulpit in the land? Eh? Bonobobabe, Luckynkl, and all that crowd are a bit worse than Jessica Valenti . . but only a bit. So Jessica Valenti, consider yourself bitch-slapped, Fidelbogen style! Yes, you DO deserve this.

Next consider Amanda Marcotte, another mainstream feminist who is Jessica Valenti’s spiritual twin sister. I constantly get those two mixed up; I can hardly tell them apart. Amanda shares Jessica’s hatred of men as reflected in her stance toward false rape allegation. She has made it clear that she doesn’t think women lie about rape, and she will brook no disagreement on this subject. Consider the following:

Think about what Amanda Marcotte is saying here. She is saying that if you are a man who cares about the lives of innocent men and cares about living in a just and free world, then you are motivated by a desire to commit rape. Yes, that is truly what Amanda Marcotte appears to be saying. I took Amanda severely to task for this, here. Some time afterward, as I was informed, Amanda’s commment (which I had preserved in the screen capture) disappeared from the comment thread in question. Too late Amanda, it will haunt you forever!

In a separate incident, Amanda Marcotte made it clear that, in her opinion, people who defend falsely rape-accused men are “rape-loving scum.” Those are Amanda Marcotte’s very words. If you think there is something horribly wrong about accusing innocent men of rape, then according to Amanda Marcotte you are “rape-loving scum.” I wish I was making this up.

So who the hell is Amanda Marcotte anyway, and what the hell gives her the moral license to say such unspeakably vile, vulgar, filthy things? And why the hell is Amanda Marcotte not getting morally bitch-slapped, within an inch of her psychological life, from every press room and pulpit in the land? Eh? Bonobobabe, Luckynkl, and all that crowd are a bit worse than Amanda Marcotte . . but only a bit. So Amanda Marcotte, consider yourself bitch-slapped, Fidelbogen style! Yes, you DO deserve this.

Jessica Valenti and Amanda Marcotte are both popular feminist morons, and they haven't got the name of being radfems at all. In fact, they are considered cute, sassy, classy, photogenic and perfectly respectable. Heaven help us all, but people like Jessica and Amanda can walk around and talk their vulgar trash in broad daylight, and get handsomely paid for it. Dear God, what the hell is this world coming to, anyway?

The radfems at WLM are simply impatient. The full-blown feminist future they wish for isn't happening fast enough for them, and they are champing at the bit. Yet they ought to be dancing a victory jig in their private forum, since the world as a whole is drifting steadily along a path which ought to delight them. The progress of anti-male legislation has been dramatic. Men are being undermined on many fronts. Man-hating is a persistent underlying theme which surfaces everywhere, in more forms than I can begin to describe. Why, the cult of Valerie Solanas is certainly a hardy perennial, with Valerie's fan club going strong nearly a quarter-century after her death. Yes, the Solanas cult is a powerful organ in the worldwide feminist body — let none tell you otherwise! Still, most of the misandry is subtle, understated, and not always recognized as such either by the people who spread it, or the people who hear it.

All right, I will speak once more of Pamela O'Shaughnessy, or Vliet Tiptree as she calls herself when she wants to be incognito. I said I would come back to this, didn't I?

Pamela O. is a true feminist in that she occupies her mind very deeply on the thought that "men are the problem". This maxim is central to feminism in every way, so much that whoever would allow that men are only HALF the problem cannot possibly be a feminist at all. Mainstream feminists will play word games, and talk around it or past it, but if you "torture-test" their worldview, you will find it consistent with no other precept but that men or maleness are to blame for nearly all of what's wrong with the world. Well isn't it great when the assholes identify themselves forthrightly? I am talking about the WLM crowd here, and although they think they are conversing in secret, they at least admit their true opinion to themselves and to each other — which is more than some people do.

So we know that Pamela O., in her Radfem Hub article, has tiptoed lead-footedly around the subject of male genocide. Certainly, to reduce male numbers or genetically engineer the evil out of men, would strike the root of the Man Problem very radically indeed, yes?. Pamela O. was keen to talk about this, and sought an audience, and for that reason broached the subject on the affiliated WLM forum where she was certain of a receptive public.

On 2 April, 2011, Pamela O., under the username "Karma", nailed her thesis to the door:

"First, the ground of the Problem (that is, male oppression and coercion of women) is male aggression. And second, male aggression is not limited to human beings. It is biologically-based and not particularly subject to eradication by social engineering. . . . .That seems to lead inescapably to an answer to the Problem: male oppression must be clearly defined and understood to be pathological (one writer calls its manifestations in humans an “encapsulated psychosis”). It needs to be recognized as a deviation from the norm (the aggression levels of females) that may be correctly called a mental illness. Call it the “Y Syndrome”, maybe. Then, it must be cured, and we are very close to having the cure: a genetic modification that will cure the deficiencies of the Y Syndrome which lead to over-expression of male hormones (putting it very simplistically ATM). Which leads to the primary objection: there’s no way to administer such a cure. Such a cure will never be voluntary, just as treating other severely mentally ill people cannot always be voluntary. People who are dangerous to themselves and others have little insight into their condition and may have to be restrained and treated without their consent in many cases. It is impossible for male humans to have the needed insight. My thought in response to that objection is: due to the historic circumstances, the cure will have to be administered”.

Sure enough, other forum members took the bait with gusto — Pamela knew her public, all right! So. . the talk went on for a while, Pamela pondered this and that, and six months later — on 4 Oct, 2011 — she published her now infamous guest post on Radfem Hub. And you know the rest of the story.

Now, I would not have you think there is anything new about the ideology Pamela O. has laid out. This is classic radfem fare which we’ve known in various shapes for many years — although it is indeed, if you will, the most radical of radicalisms! But still, stuff like this is not generally known, and to find such a great sample all bunched up in one place is a mighty windfall. In fact, it is a golden opportunity for those (such as the present writer) who want to make the world see what feminism really amounts to at its rotten core.

There is furthermore, the disquieting hint that these radical wimmin are not merely TALKING about these things. That is, they are not just speculating in their armchairs. The passionate seriousness of their tone is not to be mistaken: Pamela O. herself hints at global groups and networks, and our own investigations (spearheaded by Agent Orange) have uncovered an intriguing web of connections — an international rabbit hole that goes deeper and deeper, with passageways reaching into sites of power and influence that would surprise you.

The release of the Agent Orange files in the near future will throw a shaft of sunlight into places little known, and permit people to form their conclusions.

It remains to ask, whether I think the implied scenarios ever would or could become real? My answer is, no, probably not. It is seriously to be doubted that radfem male-genocidalists will ever get the future they dream of, or anything close to it. So my present motivation is twofold: firstly, to have a care about the havoc these people might wreak in merely trying to get their way, and secondly, to awaken the general public to the presence of such people on the same planet with themselves, and to make that same public ponder the implications of such a thing.

What is perverse and dangerous about these people — and really, all feminists — is that they consider themselves literally more infallible than the patriarchal Pope of Rome himself! What monstrously swollen egos they have! Men are mentally ill, cannot grasp objective reality, and must therefore be engaged by methods of deceit — such is their conclusion. They know for a lead-pipe fact, at least in their own minds, that they are dead right and the rest of the world is dead wrong.

That is disturbing to think about, but if you think carefully, it is a tremendous gift which greatly simplifies our lives. In a nutshell, it means that they will never engage us in good faith, and by not doing so, they release us from any obligation to engage THEM in good faith. That's a head-spinner, don't you think so? Chew on the implications of this; grind it small in your mind. It means that this entire business is naught but realpolitik, a pure game of power and very little else. That is how they play it, and that is how we too are entitled to play it.

But for some of us, this is old news. We've known it for years.

Following the trial and conviction of Brittany Zamora her lawyer, Belen Olmedo Guerra held a press conference in which she clearly blamed the 13 year old boy who was sexually abused by Brittany Zamora.

Guerra declined to answer any questions. As she leaves a male reporter says “Are you honestly saying Brittany was the victim?”

The Washington Post’s Disrespect for Male Veterans

June 4, 2023 | by Stephen Bond | Link | Original Link

As a short introduction, I’m a proud lifelong reader of the Post who nevertheless has long noticed the paper’s gender bias, most notably its imbalanced coverage of domestic violence, as described in a February 2023 report by The Coalition to End Domestic Violence.[1]

But my pride in the Post turned to quiet outrage in 2018 after the paper published two undeniably gender-biased articles: Why can’t we hate men? and Amber Heard’s shameful op-ed. Since then, I’ve been sending letters to Post columnists who have written articles that perpetuate this gender bias.

The Memorial Day cartoon by Washington Post political cartoonist Ann Telnaes is another example of the Post’s gender bias:

Particularly in light of the decades-long disrespect of men (e.g., decades of a feminist-inspired anti-male gender bias), I object to the hypocrisy of the Post using an image of military graves on Memorial Day to make a point about how these dead soldiers — essentially all male — fought a war against “authoritarianism” and two feminist-inspired injustices, “sexism and loss of bodily autonomy”, without the Post also acknowledging or even understanding how today’s feminism perpetuates these same injustices:

Authoritarianism

Feminism is as authoritarian a movement as has ever existed, but most people don’t recognize it because they’ve been bamboozled by a 50-plus year campaign of feminist political and cultural indoctrination, ostensibly about “equality”, but driven by hatred of men and female chauvinism, and enabled by a groveling male chivalry.

Two of literally thousands of easily-found examples of feminist authoritarianism include:

- Early second-wave feminist Simone de Beauvoir's statement about women raising their own children: "No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should be authorized to stay at home to bring up her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one. It is a way of forcing women in a certain direction [emphasis added]."
- Famed feminist Kate Millet, author of the book Sexual Politics, a Marxist who advocated the destruction of the family, was particularly exercised about the failure of the Bolsheviks in the Soviet Union to abolish the family. Millet's twisted, authoritarian thinking was revealed in a chilling article by her sister Mallory, Marxist Feminism's Ruined Lives that proved feminism was never really about equality.

Sexism

- The aforementioned "Why can't we hate men?" op-ed published by the Post in 2018, should be self-evident proof of not only feminism's rampant sexism, but of how feminism has morphed into a hate movement. How in the world could The Washington Post be so completely oblivious to the anti-male sexism of this article, printing something that by its very title can only be considered hate speech?
- "[Feminists] seem unable to understand that their allegation of sexism is in its very essence, sexist. They criticize their critics' behavior, whilst engaging in the very thing they accuse others of doing, which is the hypocrisy of totalitarianism." — "Their Angry Creed"

Loss of Bodily Autonomy

The "loss of bodily autonomy" is, of course, a code phrase for abortion, which feminists have portrayed as a special (i.e., female) human rights issue — but only for the mother, ignoring the human rights of the fetus.

It is also an extreme example of the blind hypocrisy of a chauvinistic, feminist worldview that complains only about how women are victimized by their gender role, without a thought about how men are often more severely victimized by their gender role.

Feminists and the mainstream media are completely oblivious and silent to the "loss of bodily autonomy" — and often loss of life — of men who are socially coerced or often conscripted against their will, to fight and die in wars that they often don't support or all too often don't even understand.

If men can be forced to serve and kill, why can't women be forced to protect life?

In addition to being a lifelong reader of the Post, I've also been a lifelong supporter of equal rights for women. Well before Betty Friedan and second wave feminism, even as a child, I supported equality for women because I recognized that my own mother would have been happier not being limited by her gender role.

But for a long, long time, I've gradually had my eyes opened to the ugly truth that feminism, like most other "social justice" movements, has long since lost its way.

If one doubts this observation, they need to read a book by English author Herbert Purdy, Their Angry Creed: The shocking history of feminism, and how it is destroying our way of life. The book methodically describes the dark, seamy underbelly of feminism that the world's media has kept hidden for more than 100 years.

Had Ms. Telnaes not been confused by feminism's gender siren song, here's how her cartoon might have appeared:

In closing, let me repeat the ending I included for my recent Memorial Day posting, Unequal Military Sacrifices:

Women, by the blessing of gender, have never been asked or required to die defending their country, and yet today they show nothing but disrespect for the millions of American men who have served and the more than one and one-third million who have given their lives for their country.

---

[1] The report concludes, "The Coalition to End Domestic Violence calls on the Washington Post, in a timely manner, to run an editorial acknowledging its biased coverage of the domestic abuse issue, and to publish articles that focus on the plight of male victims of domestic violence."

“Woman and Her Right to Kill” – 1922

Robert St. Estephe–Gonzo Historian–is dedicated to uncovering the forgotten past of marginalizing men. “Gonzo journalism” is characterized as tending “to favor style over fact to achieve accuracy.” Yet history – especially “social history” – is written by ideologues who distort and bury facts in order to achieve an agenda. “Gonzo” writing is seen as unorthodox and surprising. Yet, in the 21st century subjectivity, distortion and outright lying in non-fiction writing is the norm. Fraud is the new orthodoxy. Consequently, integrity is the new “transgressive.”
Welcome to the disruptive world of facts, the world of Gonzo History.
DAILY EDITORIAL DIGEST APRIL 19, 1922

[FULL TEXT]: Whether it is not wasting the money of the taxpayers trying women for murder in cases where the so-called unwritten law can be evoked is the subject of comment throughout the country. The discussion centers upon the recent acquittal of Miss Olivia Stone, the Cincinnati nurse, who shot a former corporation counsel of that city because she alleged he had failed to keep his promise to marry her.

“If women who commit crimes of passion are always to go free,” suggests the NEW YORK WORLD, “why bother to try them? Why not provide an immunity procedure, based on the unwritten law and including recognition of the tender susceptibilities of sympathetic jurors, whereby the process of exculpation may be shortened and cheapened? The plan would do away with considerable hypocrisy and humbug in the name of justice,” which leads the Syracuse, N. Y. HERALD, to remark:—”Why not? Why should the money of taxpayers be wasted in the prosecution of women who kill their comrades in illicit relationship?

If the law making deliberate murder a capital offense is to be suspended in the discretion of juries, when the assassin is a woman, it would be better for the cause of justice, and it would make law more respectable, specifically to exempt from any punishment women who murder their paramours. Such travesties of justice as this help to give fresh impetus to the crime wave."

It is pointed out by the BROOKLYN EAGLE that "we no longer stage a purely judicial proceeding for the trial of a woman accused of murdering a man from whom she has suffered real or fancied wrong. Instead we stage a melodrama, with the defendant as the persecuted heroine and the dead men as the villain." The EAGLE points out that while the judge may try to hold the scales of justice even, acquittal is certain, and adds:—"Perhaps one of the earmarks of our civilization is our frank recognition of the fact that law can be made to mean one thing for a man and an entirely different thing for a woman," Which brings from the Worcester TELEGRAM the suggestion that "juries of normally hardboiled males continue to view crimes through a glamor of romance, chivalry and sympathy, set the seal of their approval upon homicidal endeavor and bid the law, instead of the defendant, go hang," while the Columbus, Ohio, STATE JOURNAL, sarcastically remarks that "the acquittal is in strict accordance with the exact terms of the unwritten law and we trust will give added impetus to the movement among our girls in their pursuit of happiness to arrange to be deceived and then shoot."

The fact that the verdict, like all of its kind was, after all, "against society," is pointed out by the Pittsburgh, Pa., GAZETTE TIMES, which feels convinced that "Americans do not believe in the unwritten law, as commonly defined; they do not believe in private vengeance, the forgiveness of which by a jury amounts to usurpation of authority by twelve men whose sole duty is to determine the facts of a case. Justice for society demands that the criminal courts function legitimately." And in this specific case, the Danville, Va., REGISTER, points nut. there was no evidence only by Miss Stone herself that she had been wronged by Kinkead and adds: "even if he had deceived the woman as she claims, does that justify her in shooting him down?" And acquittals of this character naturally will have the effect of encouraging women to slay the Lafayette, Ind., JOURNAL-COURIER believes, and "thus is murder in a "love nest given a place among the favorite indoor "ports of the day."

The jurors may have had some justification for their verdict in the opinion of the Richmond, Va., TIMES DISPATCH, which points out that "the evidence in this case had revealed to them a defenseless young woman, her betrayal and subsequent relentless hounding by a man who led a Jekyll-Hyde existence, her humiliation and desperation—then the fatal meeting.

That was the picture impressed upon the minds of the jurors, and, right or wrong, the verdict they gave is the verdict we may expect to continue hearing in eases of this sort."

Which prompts the Savannah, Ga., NEWS to suggest that in view of the imposition of a seven and a half years imprisonment on Gussia Human in a New York court for perjury at her lover's trial for murder and the acquittal of Miss Stone "the truth may be that the greater the crime the less likelihood of punishing, the woman in the case." And the Richmond, Ind., ITEM, feels convinced that "it has got to a point where almost any woman can be sure of acquittal for killing a man. All she has to do is to throw hysterics and shed tears in court and her conviction is seemingly impossible."

The Port Huron, Mich., TIMES HERALD, feel that "one may have unlimited sympathy for the wife who kills the woman who steals) her husband, and may find plenty of excuses for the man who shoots his friend for violating the honor of his wife, but (here is considerable question whether it is a wise method of administering justice, although too often the punishment may ho well deserved."

The economic phase of the situation furnishes a strong appeal to the editor of the Worcester, Mass., GAZETTE, who sarcastically declares that "taxes are high; government is expensive, let's save hundreds of dollars and much nerve force. When a lady pulls her trusty gat and perforates her sweetheart don't arrest her. Save time and money and wear and tear. Besides, this plan would enable the killer to get on the stage or in the movies within a day or two after the killing." The very fact that there are so few, by comparison, killings by women leads the Cleveland NEWS to call attention to the fact that "it may be said the nature of American women is demonstrated as being generally and notably kind, patient and peaceable by the fact that murderesses are not more numerous in a country where it always is an open season for man hunting by women."

Other women’s money

June 7, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

In 2013 Martin Scorsese made a movie called The Wolf of Wall Street. As was the case with his gangster movies, the film portrayed men behaving badly and enjoying every minute of it…until they received their comeuppance in the last act.

It would be interesting to know what Sallie Lee Krawcheck thought about the movie. Who is Sallie Lee Krawcheck? “The most senior woman on Wall Street” is a financial guru with an appropriately impressive resume, including top management gigs at Merrill Lynch, Smith Barney, Citigroup, and Bank of America. Her experience, however, left her with a dim view of the Wall Street “boys club.” In fact, she was so disgusted she started Ellevest, an investing platform of women, by women, and for women. Since “elle” is French for “she,” I guess we could dub Krawcheck the She-Wolf of Wall Street.

Now there is nothing wrong with setting up a service that focuses on women. Any number of businesses do that. Some products or services are more likely to be of interest to women than men. Besides, as has been often noted, women control the purse strings, accounting for the lion’s (the lioness’s?) share of purchases in America. Krawcheck, however, feels that, “The biggest money mistake that women tend to make is that we are not investing as much as men are.”

Another way to say that is that women spend too much and have nothing left for investing, but woman as shopaholic spendthrift is a terribly unflattering stereotype. Stating that investing is good and men are more likely to do it is tantamount to admitting that men are doing something right and women are doing something wrong. One has to tread carefully in that regard.

Krawcheck says that good investing can make a bigger dent in your net worth than pay raises. On average, for all its volatility, the stock market has gone up 9.5% every year since the 1920s. Chances are your paycheck hasn't kept pace. Something both women and men should keep in mind.

Also, women's life spans and earning curves differ from men's. Did you know that salaries peak at age 40 for women, and at age 55 for men? (Curse you, gender pay gap!) At any rate, since women tend to live longer than men, that dictates a different investment strategy. Of course, any good financial advisor will take into account your financial vitals…your age, your income, your debts, your family status…and make recommendations accordingly. So why not your sex?

Sounds reasonable enough, and given the myriad of investment funds out there with different goals and missions, a fund for women doesn't sound too far out…until you look at Krawcheck's Ellevest web site. You can't help but come away with the idea that Occupy Wall Street has morphed into Infiltrate Wall Street. The recurring term "Disrupt Money" is an umbrella phrase for such topics as:

What Can Companies Do to Move Forward in Gender Equality?
4 Ways to Raise Our Children to Be Financial Feminists.
Stand up for paid family leave
Help your company close its own gender pay gap.
Finding women-owned and women-run companies.

Naturally, there are investment funds out there to facilitate the above. Consider the Pax Ellevate Global Women's Leadership Fund and the SPDR SSGA Gender Diversity ETF (exchange-traded fund).

"Closing the Gender Investing Gap" is the official mission of Ellevest, yet investors are also given helpful hints on “Closing the Unpaid Labor Gap” and “Closing the Gender Pricing Gap.” Mission creep, anyone?

Krawcheck invites visitors to her web site to “Invest like a woman.” This sounds like a straight line in search of a punchline, but I’ll leave it to you to fill in the blank.

She also informs us that “86% of Investment Advisors Are Men, With an Average Age of 50+”…to which one might want to reply, “So what?” But you can’t utter those two words in response to any of the grievances of the protected classes lest you be vilified as a fascist at worst or insensitive at best.

When it comes to equity in financial matters, Krawcheck conveniently overlooks a few things. Of course, you’ve heard of the wage gap, and no matter how many debunkers drive stakes through its heart, it refuses to die. A few men’s groups have responded by pointing out the tax gap, the difference between what men and women pay in taxes and the difference in what they get out of those tax payments. But what about the inheritance gap?

I’m neither a statistician nor a demographer, but I think I can safely say that there is a yawning inheritance gap. In other words, the amount of money inherited by women outstrips the money inherited by men. Let’s follow the money – the big money.

The Forbes list of the 400 Richest Americans in 2019 is overwhelmingly male. The list, overwhelmingly male, is headed by the usual suspects…Jeff Bezos,. Bill Gates, Warren Buffett, Mark Zuckerberg. The first woman on the list is No. 11, Alice Walton with $51.4 billion. In the “Sources of wealth” column (in Wikipedia, but not Forbes) it says “Walmart, inherited.” Admittedly, the same is true of her brothers, Jim Walton and S. Robson Walton, who are neck and neck with her on the list. According to Forbes, she is more interested in art (she is chairwoman of the board of the impressive Crystal Bridges Museum in Walmart’s hometown of Bentonville, Arkansas) than the family business. (All rather ironic for those of us who remember The Waltons, an old TV series about a poor but honest family in the Blue Ridge Mountains during the Depression.)

Now let’s go down the megabucks list to Julia Koch in No. 13 with $41 billion. Where did her wealth come from? “Koch Industries, inherited.” OK, so the two richest women in America inherited their fortunes…mere coincidence? Let’s keep going.

No. 15 is MacKenzie Bezos. Her Wikipedia bio calls her an “American novelist and philanthropist.” Who knew there were big bucks in those two pursuits? She is not an heiress, but her divorce settlement from Amazon’s Jeff Bezos (who is No. 1 on the list at $114 billion) amounted to $35 billion. Not a bad reward for 26 years of marriage (it works out to $1.35 billion per year). Of course, she might have gotten more if she’d just waited for hubby to croak, but there’s always the chance he might outlive her. Better to bail out early and go with the sure thing.

The next woman on the list is Jacqueline Mars, No. 18 with $23.5 billion, the result of her being born into the Mars candy family. That’s a lot of Milky Ways, M&Ms, Skittles, Snickers, and Twix, probably enough to induce a diabetic coma in the entire population of a medium-sized American city. Again, to be fair, she was not alone, as her brother John Mars, also benefited from America's sweet tooth.

Next we come to Laurene Powell Jobs & family with $21.3 billion. Jobs, eh? You don't suppose she was married to…that's right, Steve Jobs. She inherited billions of bucks of Apple and Disney stock from him!

Next with a paltry $14 billion is Abigail Johnson, CEO of Fidelity Investments. I've no doubt she is financially savvy, but she took over from her father as CEO, and her grandfather founded the firm. Not quite an inheritance, but I wouldn't call her a self-made woman.

Worth a mere $8.5 billion is Christy Walton in 58th place (right behind George Soros and Jimmy Jones). There's that name Walton again. This time around, however, it's a case of marrying money. She was the wife of John Walton at the time he died of a plane crash in 2005, and hence an in-law of the aforementioned Waltons.

Rounding out the top 100, we find more people with the surnames Walton and Mars. Also, a number of women's names appear alongside their family's name or their husband's names, and there is the occasional widow who runs the show – often capably – after her husband's demise. I'm sure eventually there must be a woman on the list who was not dependent on a man in some form or fashion to jump-start her wealth, but by now I think my point is obvious. Women spend lots of money, and on occasion excel at managing money, but the creation of wealth is overwhelmingly male. Given a typical bell curve distribution, this should not be surprising, since men appear at the extremes more frequently than women. Also, typical male traits come into play…the role of being a good provider, objectivity, ambition – every one of them reeking of toxic masculinity…unless you stand to benefit from the wealth they amass.

Now very few women are fortunate enough to marry billionaires or to be born into the families of same. But many women do inherit money from mere millionaires or from men with lesser assets. Remember, women live longer, so they are more likely to inherit money than to bequeath it. The same can be said of life insurance. Women are far more likely to get a payout from that than their husbands. And let's not forget Social Security. Countless widows, even if they were stay-at-home moms, have received benefits checks courtesy of their late husband's payments into the system. So women really don't have anything to whine about…but squeaky wheels tend to get addicted to grease.

There's nothing illegal about inherited wealth or windfalls, but in leftist circles there is tinge of shame to them, as they raise the issue of unearned privilege. Of course, Ellevest conveniently sidesteps these sources of income – even though they provide ample fodder for investments – because, goshdarnit, they just don't fit the female injustice/inequity paradigm they're pushing.

No matter how woke the Ellevest folks purport to be, to survive they must make money for their clients. If Ellevest fails to attract male clients, it is severely restricting potential funds. I seriously doubt there are that many "woke" men out there looking for a female-friendly social justice investment vehicle. In fact, I suspect the majority of women investors are mainly concerned with making a buck, not with social change. There may be a niche market of woke women out there but probably not not enough to keep the likes of Ellevest afloat. In that case, Krawcheck has an escape hatch: Ellevest's failure (or at least underperformance) will be men's fault for choosing to invest in "socially irresponsible" funds.

Krawcheck herself, however, is not totally bulletproof in the SJ skirmishes. To a large degree, her target audience is affluent women, who, like herself, are far more likely to be white. She can't come right out and say that, but if you're going fishing, you go where the fish are. After all, women who live paycheck to paycheck don't have discretionary funds for investment, so there's no sense in making a pitch to them. Consequently, WOCs (women of color) are largely underserved. And let's not forget trans women! They have special needs too…but don't call them special needs people.

Ah, but comes the revolution and all women will be empowered and gender equity will be manifest in all walks of life…or will it?

Remember, you can lead a woman to the stock exchange but you can't make her invest.

Feminism: Saving the world from evil

June 8, 2023 | by Kevin Weinberg | Link | Original Link

Debbie Irontwat took a deep breath as she prepared to storm the White House with her brave she-warriors. After years of rereading Jane Austen novels and taking elective classes in Fem Lit at her local community college, she now had enough experience and expertise to tell the president how to run the country. All she needed to do was have the White House spokesperson pass on her ideas—which he'd already agreed to do.

It was time to kick some gender-neutral butt.

Debbie marched into the White House, her fellow feminists at her side. A man greeted her at the door. "May I help you ladies?"

Wow, they're insulting me right off the bat, Debbie thought.

"If by 'ladies', you mean vagina-bearing persons of the x-chromosome—or just vbpotxcs—then yes. I was invited to speak with the White House spokesperson after my petition on Feminismistheonlywaytoequality.com gained enough signatures."

"Right this way please, ma'am."

"Ugh, excuse you, sir."

"Hmm?"

"You just called me ma'am."

"Okay?"

"That's sexist."

"It is?"

"Of course!"

"Sorry, I didn't know that."

"Also, why are there 10 paintings on the wall behind you of men and only 1 of a woman?"

"I don't know."

"Ugh," Debbie grunted. "Typical male chauvinism. Okay, lead the way, peasant."

The peasant led Debbie through the White House, though in all honesty, it shouldn't have been called the "White House" but instead "the house of sexism and misogyny," as literally everything about it was filled to the brim with overt hatred of women, such as the bathrooms they passed: the Men's bathroom was on the left, and the Women's bathroom was on the right. What exactly where they trying to suggest here by doing that, huh? Debbie didn't know, but it was definitely sexist. Just like every video game.

After a brief walk, they entered a small office. Debbie's she-warriors were forced to wait outside, as this would be a one-on-one meeting. The man—of course it was a man, go figure!—she was meeting was named Steve Oberman, and Debbie knew right away she didn't like him: he was tall, handsome, and had good teeth. That's totally sexist. But not as sexist as what he did the moment she entered.

Without any regard for the fact that she was a human being deserving of respect and fair treatment, the man, Steve, pulled out her chair for her. What was he going to do next? Slap her in the face and rape her? Seriously. He pulled out her fucking chair!

“Umm, excuse me, sir,” she growled. “Do I look like I don’t have arms?”

“No, Miss Irontwat.”

“Then why did you pull out my chair?”

“Because … when a—” He stopped as if catching himself.

“When a what?” Debbie demanded. “When a woman? Is that what you were about to say?”

“I guess.”

“Typical chauvinist pig. Well?”

“Well what?”

“Aren’t you going to pull out my chair for me?”

“But you said…”

Debbie sighed. “Seriously? You’re confused?”

“A little.”

“And this, Mister Oberman, is why Violence Against Women is at an all-time high. Because you just don’t get it.”

“What don’t I get?”

“Of course I want you to pull out my chair for me. But I want you to do it while making remarks about how equal I am and that the reason you’re pulling out my chair is because I’m a person and not a woman.”

“Ah, understood.” Steve pulled out her chair and said, “I recognize your equality, and this gesture of chair-out-pulling holds no significance in relation to your gender.”

Good. Maybe he can learn after all. Now, it’s time to change the world and save women everywhere.

Steve took his own seat. Then, in a disgusting act of hatred against women, his eyes immediately met hers—as if he was going out of his way not to stare at her breasts. That was sexist. What, should she be ashamed of the fact that she had breasts? She was a *fem*inist! They were there because they were meant to be looked at. And here he was pretending they didn’t even exist like she should be ashamed she had them at all. How sexist!

A second later, he quickly stole a peek at her breasts.

How sexist! What, was she some kind of object for his amusement? Was he going to jump over the table next and throw her down and do butt things? There were always butt things when you dealt with people like this.

“Well, I’m glad you could come.”

“You’re glad?” Debbie asked. “Ugh! Ingrained Jane Austen societal micro chauvinistic sexism right there!”

“I see … so anyway, it’s a pleasure to finally meet you.”

“A pleasure to … finally meet me?” Debbie resisted the urge to throw something at him. How many things was he going to say that were sexist and discriminatory until he’d finally had enough?

“Let me just get right to the point,” Debbie said. “Women in America are suffering: they aren’t being paid equally, they are harassed at the workplace, and they don’t always have the same opportunities.”

“I agree,” Steve said excitedly. “Very much so. In fact, my wife went through much of that.”

“Your wife?” Debbie asked. “What, is she your property or something? Jane Austen, motherfucker! I READ HER BOOKS!”

“I see … so anyway, yes, I agree. These are serious issues in desperate need of change.”

“And that’s why I’ve come,” Debbie said. “Because you’re not attempting to fix things the proper way: the feminist way.”

“What do you mean?”

“Well, you’re trying to introduce new laws that force women to be paid the same amount of money and to give them the same opportunities while making workplace harassment illegal.”

“Yes, and?”

“And!” Debbie snapped. “That’s not going to fix the problem.”

“Then what is?”

Debbie grinned. “I’m glad you asked. In order to make women receive equal pay, the answer is not to pass a law requiring them to receive equal pay, but to ban the color pink from being sold in little girls’ toys.”

“Wait, what?”

“Also,” Debbie continued. “Little boys must play with dolls, while little girls must play with toy guns. Even though they might hate it and cry, that will fix everything. Secondly, all video games must be banned unless they portray a female character as the hero.”

“I’m not following.”

“Of course you’re not, but listen anyway. And the reason you’re not following is because of ingrained, societal, Jane Austen, cultural, society, sexism ingrained culture society preexisting gender stereotypes conformity.”

“I see…”

Debbie shook with anger as she continued. “Today I was watching a commercial. They were selling a hair product. And every actor in the commercial was female. And the bottle was pink! It’s almost like they’re trying to get us raped … on purpose!”

“I don’t understand.”

“How do you not understand? You see, it’s simple. By allowing pink things to be targeted to women, and by allowing little girls to play with toys that little girls tend to enjoy, you’re making it so that men will want to commit violent acts against us. The only way to stop the violence is to market products and services to demographics who aren’t interested in them. Duh!”

“How come?”

“Because of DNA and RNA and shit and whatever. Try to keep up, Mister Oberman!”

“So … you want to ban these things?”

“Yes.”

“And you want to ban sexualized women in video games by making them not attractive?”

“No, no, no!” Debbie shouted. “Do I look like an extremist feminist to you?”

“No comment.”

Debbie ignored his rude remark. “What I want, Mister Oberman, is to have females made even more attractive since their bodies are nothing to be ashamed of. But what we need to do is hook up special devices to males that prevent them from getting aroused at the sight of the female form, as to do so is sexist and makes them hate women.”

“I’m sorry, Miss Irontwat, but I’m just not understanding your logic here.”

“Of course you don’t! Do you even know the definition of prejudice, Mister Oberman? Prejudice is when you make a judgment on someone before you even know them. And as a feminist, we believe that, because of ingrained sexism in our society, all men are at least a little prejudiced. All of them. Even you. You might not seem like it at first, but even though I don’t know you, I’m sure if I did get to know you I’d be able to find your hidden ingrained societal given Jane Austen Fem Lit making the world a better place sexism Gender Conformity equal rights!”

“I … I guess I’ll pass on your feedback. Thanks for coming, I suppose.”

“One more thing!”

“Yes, Miss Irontwat?”

“People have this crazy idea that feminism isn’t about equal rights anymore. So I always make it a point to show them the dictionary definition of feminism before I conclude any conversation with a man. As you can see here”—she removed a pocket dictionary and showed it to him—“Feminism is only, and I repeat, only about securing equal rights for women.”

She patted her legs and stood up. “Now that that’s out of the way, I do hope that, by next week, the color pink is banned, every commercial has at least one female character in it, and Jane Austen’s words will replace the United States Constitution.”

Before waiting for him to respond, Debbie spun around and soared out of the room. Hopefully, her message would get through, and she could make the world a better place for women everywhere. Because feminism was about fighting for equality the only way that made sense: the annihilation of certain colors on the visible spectrum of light, and changing the way children played with toys.

The End.

How feminists corrupt DV research

Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence

Graham-Kevan's paper fully documents overwhelming evidence that the "patriarchal dominance" theory of partner violence (PV from here on) explains only a small part of PV. Moreover, more such evidence is rapidly emerging. To take just one recent example, analyses of data from 32 nations in the International Dating Violence Study (Straus 2007; Straus and International Dating Violence Research Consortium 2004) found about equal perpetration rates and a predominance of mutual violence in all 32 samples, including non-Western nations.

Moreover, data from that study also show that, within a couple relationship, domination and control by women occurs as often as by men and are as strongly associated with perpetration of PV by women as by men (Straus 2007). Graham-Kevan also documents the absence of evidence indicating that the patriarchal dominance approach to prevention and treatment has been effective. In my opinion, it would be even more appropriate to say that what success has been achieved in preventing and treating PV has been achieved despite the handicaps imposed by focusing exclusively on eliminating male-dominance and misogyny, important as that is as an end in itself.

Graham-Kevan's paper raises the question of how an explanatory theory and treatment modality could have persisted for 30 years and still persists, despite hundreds of studies which provide evidence that PV has many causes, not just male-dominance. The answer is that it emerged from a convergence of a number of different historical and social factors. One of these is that gender symmetry in perpetration of partner violence is inconsistent with male predominance in almost all other crimes, especially violent crimes. Another is the greater injury rate suffered by female victims of PV brings female victimization to public attention much more often.

Although there are many causes of the persistence of the patriarchal dominance focus, I believe that the predominant cause has been the efforts of feminists to conceal, deny, and distort the evidence. Moreover, these efforts include intimidation and threats, and have been carried out not only by feminist advocates and service providers, but also by feminist researchers who have let their ideological commitments overrule their scientific commitments.

At the same time, it is important to recognize the tremendous contribution to human relationships and crime control made by feminist efforts to end violence against women. This effort has brought public attention to the fact that PV may be the most prevalent form of interpersonal violence, created a world-wide determination to cease ignoring PV, and take steps to combat PV. It has brought the rule of law to one of the last spheres of life where ‘self-help’ justice (Black 1983) prevails by changing the legal status of domestic assaults, by changing police and court practices from one of ignoring and minimization PV to one of compelling the criminal justice system to attend and intervene.

In addition, feminists have created two important new social institutions: shelters for battered women and treatment programs for male perpetrators. However, the exclusive focus on male perpetrators and the exclusive focus on just one of the many causes has stymied this extension of the rule of law and the effort to end domestic violence. Ironically, it has also handicapped efforts to protect women from PV and end PV by men (Feld and Straus 1989; Medeiros and Straus 2006; Straus 2007; Straus and Scott, in press). Consequently, information on how this could have occurred can be helpful in bringing about a change. This commentary identifies seven of the methods.

Methods Used to Conceal and Distort Evidence on Symmetry in Partner Violence

Method 1. Suppress Evidence

Researchers who have an ideological commitment to the idea that men are almost always the sole perpetrator often conceal evidence that contradicts this belief. Among researchers not committed to that ideology, many (including me and some of my colleagues) have withheld results showing gender symmetry to avoid becoming victims of vitriolic denunciations and ostracism (see Method 7 below). Thus, many researchers have published only the data on male perpetrators or female victims, deliberately omitting data on female perpetrators and male victims.

This practice started with one of the first general population surveys on family violence. The survey done for the Kentucky Commission on the Status of Women obtained data on both men and women, but only the data on male perpetration was published (Schulman 1979). Among the many other examples of respected researchers publishing only the data on assaults by men are Kennedy and Dutton (1989); Lackey and Williams (1995); Johnson and Leone (2005); and Kaufman Kantor and Straus (1987).

Method 2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent with the Patriarchal Dominance Theory

In survey research, this method of concealment asks female participants about attacks by their male partners and avoids asking them if they had hit their male partner. The Canadian Violence against Women survey (Johnson and Sacco 1995), for example, used what can be called a feminist version of the Conflict Tactics Scales to measure PV. This version omitted the questions on perpetration by the female participants in the study. For the US National Violence against Women Survey (Tjaden and Thoennes 2000), the US Department of Justice originally planned the same strategy. Fortunately, the US Centers for Disease Control added a sample of men to the project. But when Johnson and Leone (Johnson and Leone 2005) investigated the prevalence of “intimate terrorists” among the participants in that study, they guaranteed there would be no female intimate terrorists by using only the data on male perpetrators.

For a lecture in Montreal, I examined 12 Canadian studies. Ten of the 12 reported only assaults by men. The most recent example occurred in the spring of 2006 when a colleague approached the director of a university survey center about conducting a survey of partner violence if a recently submitted grant was awarded. A faculty member at that university objected to including questions on female perpetration, and the center director said he was not likely to do the survey if the funds were awarded.

Method 3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration

I could list a large number of journal articles showing selective citation, but instead I will illustrate the process with official document examples to show that this method of concealment and distortion is institutionalized in publications of governments, the United Nations, and the World Health Organization. For example, US Dept. of Justice publications almost always cite only the National Crime Victimization study, which shows male predominance (Durose et al. 2005). They ignore the Department of Justice published critiques, which led to a revision of the survey to correct that bias. However, the revision was only partly successful (Straus 1999), yet they continue to cite it and ignore other more accurate studies they have sponsored which show gender symmetry.

After delaying release of the results of the National Violence against Women for almost two years, the press releases issued by the Department of Justice provided only the "life-time prevalence" data and ignored the "past-year prevalence" data, because the lifetime data showed predominantly male perpetration, whereas the more accurate past-year data showed that women perpetrated 40% of the partner assaults.

The widely acclaimed and influential World Health Organization report on domestic violence (Krug et al. 2002) reports that "Where violence by women occurs it is more likely to be in the form of self-defense. (32, 37, 38)." This is selective citation because almost all studies that have compared men and women find about equal rates of self-defense. Moreover, it also illustrates Method 4 (conclusions that contradict the results) because reference 32 (Saunders 1986) reports that 70% of the minor violence and 60% of the sever violence was not in self-defense. Reference 37 (Dekeseredy, Saunders, Schwartz et al. 1977) used a similar method, and got similar results: 37% of the minor violence and 43% of the severe violence was initiated by women. In addition neither of these studies had data on self-defense by men, so neither provides a basis for concluding that violence by women differs from violence by men.

Method 4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not

The studies cited above, in addition to illustrating selective citation, are also examples of the ability of ideological commitment to lead researchers to misinterpret the results of their own research. A study by Kernsmith (2005), for example, states that "Males and females were found to differ in their motivations for using violence in relationships" and that "female violence may be more related to maintaining personal liberty in a relationship than gaining power" (p. 180). However, although Kernsmith's Table 2 shows that women had higher scores on the "striking back" factor, only one question in this factor is about self-defense.

The other questions in the factor are about being angry and coercing the partner. So, despite naming the factor as “striking back” it is mostly about anger and coercion. Therefore, the one significantly different factor shows that women more than men are motivated by anger at the partner and by efforts to coerce the partner. In addition, Kernsmith’s conclusion ignores the fact that the scores for men and women were approximately equal in respect to two of the three factors (“exerting power” and “disciplining partner”). Thus, Kernsmith’s study found the opposite of what was stated as the finding.

Method 5. Create “Evidence” by Citation

The Kernsmith study, the World Health Organization report, and the pattern of selective citation show how ideology can be converted into what can be called “evidence by citation” or what Gelles (1980) calls the “woozle effect.” A woozle effect occurs when frequent citation of previous publications that lack evidence mislead us into thinking there is evidence. For example, subsequent to the World Health Organization study and the Kernsmith study, papers discussing gender differences in motivation will cite them to show that female violence is predominantly in self-defense, which is the opposite of what the research actually shows. But because these are citations of an article in a scientific journal and a respected international organization, readers of the subsequent article will accept it as a fact. Thus, fiction is converted into scientific evidence that will be cited over and over.

Another example is the claim that the Conflict Tactics Scales (Straus et al. 1996) does not provide an adequate measure of PV because it measures only conflict-related violence. Although the theoretical basis of the CTS is conflict theory, the introductory explanation to participants specifically asks participants to report expressive and malicious violence. It asks respondents about the times when they and their partner “[…]disagree, get annoyed with the other person, want different things from each other, or just have spats or fights because they are in a bad mood, are tired or for some other reason.”

Despite repeating this criticism for 25 years in perhaps a hundred publications, none of those publications has provided empirical evidence showing that only conflict-related violence is reported. In fact, where there are both CTS data and qualitative data, as in Giles-Sims (1983), it shows that the CTS elicits malicious violence as well as conflict-related violence. Nevertheless, because there are at least a hundred articles with this statement in peer-reviewed journals, it seems to establish as a scientific fact what is only an attempt to blame the messenger for the bad news about gender symmetry in PV.

Method 6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research That Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is the Cause of PV

I have documentation for only one case of publication being blocked, but I think this has often happened. The more frequent pattern is self-censorship by authors fearing that it will happen or that publication of such a study will undermine their reputation, and, in the case of graduate students, the ability to obtain a job.

An example of denying funding to research that might contradict the idea that PV is a male-only crime is the call for proposals to investigate partner violence issued in December 2005 by the National Institute of Justice. The announcement stated that proposals to investigate male victimization would not be eligible. Another example is the objection by a reviewer to a proposal a colleague and I submitted because of our "[…] naming violence in a relationship as a 'human' problem of aggression not a gender-based problem." When priority scores by the reviewers are averaged, it takes only one extremely low score to place the proposal below the fundable level. Others have encountered similar blocks; for example Holtzworth-Munroe (2005). Eugen Lupri, a pioneer Canadian family violence researcher, has also documented examples of the resistance to funding and publishing research on female-perpetrated violence (Lupri 2004).

Method 7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs

Suzanne Steinmetz made the mistake of publishing a book and articles (Steinmetz 1977, 1977-1978) which clearly showed about equal rates of perpetration by males and females. Anger over this resulted in a bomb threat at her daughter's wedding, and she was the object of a letter writing campaign to deny her promotion and tenure at the University of Delaware. Twenty years later the same processes resulted in a lecturer at the University of Manitoba whose dissertation found gender symmetry in PV being denied promotion and tenure.

My own experiences have included having one of my graduate students being warned at a conference that she will never get a job if she does her PhD research with me. At the University of Massachusetts, I was prevented from speaking by shouts and stomping. The chairperson of the Canadian Commission on Violence against Women stated at two hearings held by the commission that nothing that Straus publishes can be believed because he is a wife-beater and sexually exploits students, according to a Toronto Magazine article. When I was elected President of the Society for the Study of Social Problems and rose to give the presidential address, a group of members occupying the first few rows of the room stood up and walked out.

Concluding Comments

The seven methods described above have created a climate of fear that has inhibited research and publication on gender symmetry in PV and largely explain why an ideology and treatment modality has persisted for 30 years, despite hundreds of studies which provide evidence on the multiplicity of risk factors for PV, of which patriarchy is only one. Because of space limitations and because I am a researcher not a service provider, I have not covered the even greater denial, distortion and coercion in prevention and treatment efforts. An example is the director of a battered women's shelter who was terminated because she wanted to ask the residents whether they had hit their partner and the context in which that occurred. An example of governmental coercion of treatment is the legislation in a number of US states, and policies and funding restrictions in almost all US states that prohibit couple therapy for PV.

Finally, it was painful for me as a feminist to write this commentary. I have done so for two reasons. First, I am also a scientist and, for this issue, my scientific commitments override my feminist commitments. Perhaps even more important, I believe that the safety and well-being of women requires efforts to end violence by women and the option to treat partner violence in some cases as a problem of psychopathology, or in the great majority of cases, as a family system problem (Straus and Scott, in press; Hamel and Nicholls 2006).

The fight for father’s rights in the UK

June 9, 2023 | by Gary Quell | Link | Original Link

Within the United Kingdom there remains a silent boundary for every male that either has, or will have a child to call his own. A steel sky, painted and portrayed to look like the real thing which can reduce a man’s role as father to a title which exists in name only, and secures none of the accolades that should naturally come with fatherhood itself.

The issue here is a legal term simply referred to as Parental Responsibility (PR). One might assume upon hearing the term that this is a set of unwritten, non-tangible obligations that each person bestows upon themselves when they make the decision to become a parent. In many ways you’re right, however in the UK you’d be horribly wrong.

Parental Responsibility, in it’s fullest, broadest legal definition is described as the following, by the UK government:

“If you have parental responsibility, your most important roles are to:

· provide a home for the child

· protect and maintain the child”

The above is taken directly from the UK’s .Gov website, and goes on to elaborate other benefits of having Parental Responsibility (PR):

“You’re also responsible for:

· disciplining the child

· choosing and providing for the child’s education

· agreeing to the child’s medical treatment

· naming the child and agreeing to any change of name

· looking after the child’s property”

Interestingly (and interjected as a side note), they also state that having PR does not entitle any individual to contact with the child, but does entitle them to maintenance payments.

Yes, you heard that right. By law, anyone who has been granted Parental Responsibility is not guaranteed contact with the child/children in question, but is expected to pay maintenance, contact or not.

However, the loose guarantees provided by possessing PR is not the issue. As flippant and unaccommodating as it is to have PR, the real problem is what is involved in acquiring it in the first place. If you’re male, that is.

By law any woman that gives birth to a child is automatically granted Parental Responsibility. No paper work, no positive action to be taken – By virtue of giving birth, the mother of the child will instantly be recognized by the state as possessing PR. A perfectly reasonable and logical system at this point.

The father however is not recognized as having PR when his child is born. In order to acquire it he can do one of two things, detailed again by the UK's government website:

"A father usually has parental responsibility if he is:

· married to the child's mother

· listed on the birth certificate (after a certain date, depending on which part of the UK the child was born in)"

A further option is to sign a Parental Responsibility application form, which can only be completed with the mothers consent. To date, these remain the only three methods of acquiring PR amicably.

What do I mean by "amicably?" Well, all of these options rely on the cooperation of the mother. Whereas she will gain PR without anyone else's permission, a father's main options are heavily reliant on an amicable relationship with the mother of his child. If things are not amicable between then, no consideration is spared for why this may be, or who may have been responsible for the break up – The mother, in every instance no matter her character, will have the power to influence. If neither of these options are viable the remaining option is to apply via the court system for PR of your own child, which involves the following, again provided by the UK Government website:

"If you want parental responsibility but can't agree on arrangements with the mother, you can apply for a court order.

A court order costs £215."

£215, roughly translated to about $331 is the exact price of fatherhood in the UK today. However what the state fails to mention here is that this is an initial cost, one which can inflate should there be objection by the mother of the child. A scenario like this will then result in a court case for parental rights with legal fees applying only to the party that has a full time job, in the UK people who are unemployed receive free legal aid.

Now, if you haven't joined the dots and you're still wondering what's wrong with all this, I'll explain further.

At the most base level this is an equality issue. Here we have, backed and supported by government, a legislation that grants unique rights and responsibilities to one half of the population, yet requires the other half to take positive action and receive the blessing of someone else in order to obtain it. That is not equality, it's the exact opposite.

In no other situation would that be deemed appropriate. Further to this, the current system is increasingly open to abuse by the vengeful, unreasonable ex partners of men. By no means is that a statement which aims to label all women as vengeful and unreasonable. Not at all, but there's no denying that such women do exist.

In such cases where a man is (or is about to become) a father to a child he will share with such a woman, he finds himself in a position of complete submission – A role of utter subordination where another individual (of no comparative, legitimate, credible authority) maintains power over exactly how much responsibility he can have for his child.

All it takes in situations like this to completely negate a man's involvement with his own children, is to simply fail to inform him of when the birth registration is taking place. He cannot arrange it himself, as he has no responsibilities until it is signed and short of camping outside the registration office perpetually until he see's his ex partner arrive to sign the paperwork, he will have no way of knowing when registration is taking place and will then fail to sign the one document that would grant him equality with the mother of his offspring.

Once a birth certificate is produced without a father's signature, as far as the state is aware that child simply just does not have a father. The man in question here also has no legal responsibilities to the child and as such does not have to be involved in any decision making about the child's name, medical treatment, education or anything else relevant in it's life.

Currently within the UK there are 2 million "lone parent" families, with women making up 90% of those. These are children which don't live with their fathers and whose mother is no longer in a relationship with him. It's unknown how many of these fathers have contact with their children, but each one of these men have the potential of having their rights abused by this lopsided legislation. Custody battles and family courts are notoriously difficult to go through, especially for men, and not being recognized as your child's responsible parent in the eyes of the state is certainly not helping an already difficult situation, severely disadvantaging all fathers from the beginning.

As with anything of this nature, the first step toward change is awareness. This is not the first time this issue has been highlighted, local governments and political factions have been contacted long before now about the glaring inequality legislation like this establishes, however it is now that a concentrated effort is being made to gain widespread exposure for this vile defamation of basic parental rights.

To help, we would like to ask all of you to assist in spreading awareness, and to start by adding your support here:

https://www.change.org/p/departmental-solicitors-office-grant-fathers-automatic-parental-responsibility-in-northern-ireland

Generally speaking an online petition is not the 'go to' method of achieving things via activism. However this petition provides grounds with which to further argue the case in ongoing discussions with local government and policy makers in all major political parties. To date we have official acknowledgements from most major political groups, as well as from the head office of the countries First Minister – Pending detailed, specific replies from all. A strong signature base for this petition would strengthen our position in all of these talks, and highlight this issue as something that a vast number of people really do care about.

While this petition is solely focused on legislation within Northern Ireland, it's worth noting that NI is part of the UK and is subject to their laws. Any change in legislation here would lend itself directly toward the same change in the UK and would strike a victory for fathers the world over, working as an example of what the reality should be in other countries.

Finally, every time a signature is added, the relevant government department responsible for changing this gets an email. If we can push the boundaries of this campaign and reach signature numbers in the thousands, that equates to thousands of individual emails sent directly to those in power and creates a vivid picture of support for fathers in the UK.

Pathetic stupidity of cucks described in medieval Latin literature

June 10, 2023 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Men are concerned about women's sexual fidelity for good evolutionary reasons. Associated with that evolutionary psychology is millennia of world literature expressing men's justified concern about being cuckolded. Medieval Latin literature, which provided men with a relatively good opportunities to express their interests and protest against gynocentric oppression, depicted cuckolds as pathetic, stupid men.

Egbert of Liège's early-eleventh-century schoolbook for young boys provided the basics. In easily memorized Latin hexameters, Egbert drilled into boys contempt for cuckolds:

> A cuckold burns devotedly for an adulterous wife. He excuses her when she's under suspicion and forgives her stumblings in advance.
> { Zelotipam curruca suam devinctius ardet, > suspectam excusat, prior offensacula donat. } [1]

Women have long been privileged in formal criminal justice systems. Yet a man need not personally uphold such female privilege. If he doesn't want to risk paying "child support" for children that aren't his biological children, he must have the courage to stand up and confront his wife or girlfriend. That tends to be quite difficult for most men. Good education of boys can help them to develop into strong, courageous, no-nonsense men.

Medieval Latin literature depicted cuckolds as men so ignorant that they don't understand the obvious. For example, a man knocked loudly at the door of a woman's house. Imitating her husband's stuttering voice, he called out to be admitted. Then:

> The stupid husband, who was at home, hearing that voice, said to his wife, "Giovanna, open the door, Giovanna, let him in, for he seems to be me."
> { Vir autem stolidus, domi existens, audita illius voce: "Joanna, aperi, Joanna, introduc illum," inquit: "nam videtur idem, qui ego, esse." } [2]

In another case, a wife named Petruccia asked her husband to buy her new shoes. Like most husband do, he fulfilled his wife's request. But when he was out of the house and his wife saw a young man passing by, she signaled to him to come in. She went upstairs with the young man and in her haste lay down right near the stairs. That place could be seen from the doorway. Then she did what literary scholars today would regard as rape if a man did it:

> Pulling the youth down upon her, embracing his buttocks with her legs and feet, she focused on the work of her desire.
> { Superimposito autem juvene, clunes ejus cruribus ac pedibus amplexa, concupito operi intendebat. } [3]

Her husband brought a friend home for lunch. The husband entered the house first:

> seeing near the stairs his wife vigorously waving her feet above a young man, he said, “Hey, Petruccia! By the ass of a donkey (their favorite oath), if that’s the way you walk about, you’ll never wear out those new shoes!”
> { visaque apud scalas uxore supra juvenem pedes commovente: “Ohe! Petrucia,” inquit, “per culum asini!” (ut mos es illis jurandi) “si hoc mode ambulaveris, nunquam istos calceos consumes.” }

It’s one thing to imagine that your wife walks upon the clouds. But if your wife’s back is on the ground, another man is on top of her, and her feet are waving in the air, you should have sufficient mental functioning to suspect that you’re being cuckolded.

Being a cuckold is a miserable way to live. When she saw her husband about to enter their house, one wife hid her lover under the bed. She then accused her husband of wanting to be thrown into prison. She said that the sheriff’s officers were looking for him to imprison him for debt. Trembling with fear, the husband begged his wife for advice. She told him to climb up into their pigeon house. She would then lock the door and remove the ladder so that no one would suspect that he was there. The husband followed his wife’s advice. After he was securely locked up in the pigeon house, she brought her lover out from under the bed. The wife and her lover then pretended that the Sheriff’s officers had returned. The lover took the role of the sheriff, and the wife pretended to defend vigorously her husband. Hiding in the pigeon house, the husband shook with fear. After the wife and her lover had finished that act:

> both went to bed and devoted their night to the work of Venus; meanwhile the husband was withdrawn in hiding among the pigeons and their feces.
> { ambo in lectu profecti ea nocte Veneri operam dederunt; vir delituit inter stercora et columbos. } [4]

Cuckolds spend their nights with sub-human birds. They live immersed in shit. Don’t let that happen to you.

Men must learn practical means to avoid being cuckolded. Delusions that women are naturally much less evil than men don’t help. Men must be wary of gynocentric and demonic advice. For example, in fifteenth-century Rome, Francesco Filelfo dreamed that a demon told him:

> “Take this ring,” he said, “and finger it diligently on your finger. So long as it is held there, your wife will never, without your knowledge, have sex with another.”
> { “Cape hunc,” ille inquit, “annulum et diligenter in digito serva. Nam dum in eo gestaveris hunc, nunquam uxor, te inscio, cum alio concumbet. } [5]

Such technology would be even more helpful than DNA paternity testing. But Filelfo soon realized that he was in an unsustainable position:

> Joyfully he awoke from sleep and perceived that he had his finger in his wife’s > cunt.

> { Prae gaudio excitatus a somno, sensit se digitum habere in uxoris cunno. }

Scholars will soon better recognize that Ovid's ring poem (Amores 2.15) is associated with the supernatural.[6] The progression from Ovid's ring poem to the medieval Latin De pulice indicates the mundane devaluation of men's sexuality under gynocentrism. Men cannot count on demons and the supernatural to save them from cuckolding.

In the Byzantine Empire, both physical statues and sophisticated literary romances addressed men's risk of being cuckolded. In the highly developed societies of today, men are disparaged even for being concerned about being cuckolded. Yet men aren't necessarily destined to be pathetic, stupid cuckolds. With study of literature, particularly medieval Latin literature, men can find enlightenment and be more sophisticated men.

Southern Discomfort

With Lauren Southern recently placing herself in the spotlight by doing a hit piece on her ex husband, while lauding her own purity, we thought it would be a good time to republish this item from 2021. – Eds.

The following is a transcript from my above video talk. – PE

Hey guys, once again it is time for one of our talks. And per the suggestion of one of my patrons, I am going to start addressing an item or items in the current news cycle before this and each of my future talks. I may have a lot to say about some news stories, or less than a lot to say, but I will find something to include each time.

And unless you've been under a rock the past month, you know that the most recent news cycle has been totally dominated by the disappearance and killing of Gabby Petito. Note: this is where I am supposed to chime in with my righteous indignation about what happened to her, virtue signaling till I give myself a hernia; letting my disdain for her killer and my profound sorrow for her family drip off every word I dare to utter. I should wind up and do my best Nancy Grace, cartoonishly waving her journalistic sword as though she was doing anything but playing to her audience with how fabulously moral and compassionate they are.

Sorry, but as much as I would like to, it's hard for me to care. Sure, it's a tragic story, and indeed I do have sympathy for Petito and her family. But it's hard for me to forget that it's always tragic, as long as we're talking about the fate of a pretty, little, blond, white girl. Meanwhile, there's a ton of other suffering in the world, most of it endured by men and boys of all shapes, sizes and colors. And the media, as well as Nancy Grace's fabulously moral and compassionate audience, couldn't care less. Not that I particularly blame them. The media and its consumers, are, after all, just a window into the values of a society. And for all the social justice bravado and inclusivity that this society loves to put on ostentatious display, it's still pretty, little, blond white girls, and only pretty, little, blond white girls, who matter.

And by the way, gents, your red pill community isn't at all immune from any of this. Indeed, all this sappy gushing over a single woman, even if it's old news to the manosphere, provides an appropriate segue into today's talk. Because in the end analysis, even in so-called red pill community, men lose their fucking minds when a pretty, little, blond white girl shows up. Or a brunette, for that matter. Or even a ginger. And she doesn't even have to be pretty, or even, I suppose, little. Because I've seen what happens when women show up in the vicinity of the manosphere, uttering even the most superficial defense of men.

Allegedly red pill men swarm in, gushing validation and admiration as blindly and effusively as any blue pill step and fetch. It's why you're probably familiar with the notion that most red pill men are one blowjob away from being a cuck. And I am here to tell you that it doesn't even take a blow job for most of these guys. The wishful thinking is enough to turn them. That and the purely delusional idea that being an antifeminist is the same thing as being an ally to men and boys. Jesus, how I wish that the bloody thick-skulled among us would figure that one out.

Case in point is Lauren Southern, erstwhile antifeminist warrior who, for a short time, did a lot of high-profile shit-stirring and poking of the feminist beehive. And at that she did a good job, at least until the going got tough. But if you want to find out how she really feels about men, just take a look at how she treats many of them who so fervently supported her work.

Southern recently reflected on her experience with the manosphere when she got on Twitter and lashed out, and I quote, "Can't stand most of the manosphere. Why?" she pretended to ask herself, "Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt and got to know the community, and it's rotten inside and out."

Unsatisfied with simply throwing a blanket of condemnation over an entire community, she goes on to promote a phony threat narrative that would make any feminist proud, advising young men to, and again I quote, "Get out while you can."

"Save yourselves, young men," she pleads, undoubtedly all eaten up with concern about young men. And she adds, in the instructive parlance of an irate librarian, "Criticizing feminism is fine. You can do that without hating women."

Then, as if on cue, Sydney Watson, another antifeminist who is often confused for an ally of men, chimes in, "Yep," she agrees, "this about sums it up. It's on the same level as radical feminism."

"Agree entirely with you both," adds Daisy Cousens, a relative wannabe in the world of privileged, misandric antifeminists. To her credit, Cousens goes where Southern and Watson would like to, but won't. She claims rape threats came with an alleged war she had with the manosphere. That it was a war I never heard of with rape threats she never produced evidence of goes without saying. One more false allegation, Daisy, and you get a GoFundMe, amiright?

With female support like this, who needs Big Red, eh?

Jesus, how to respond to all this nonsense? Well, I will take a shot at it. It's what I do. Links to support that in the description area.

Let me start by saying that if you connect the dots on Southern's squawking about the manosphere, you see that her little mean girl fit was inspired by the idea that most of the men of the manosphere, inside and out according to Southern, hate women. It's a narrative clearly supported by Watson and Cousens as well. I will address that before I am done here, but first I want to give Southern the credit for something she righteously deserves.

Note, once again from her statement, "Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt."

You hear that, guys? She gave you the benefit of the doubt. She set aside the feminist narrative about you that she actually believes, and gave you the chance to redeem yourself in her eyes. You failed. You could have had her approval; the approval of a pretty little, blond, white girl, and you fucked it up. She will never be this magnanimous again. Nor will, I suppose, Watson or Cousens. I'm afraid you've badly disappointed, not once, but thrice.

Congratulations are in order, I suppose, but I have to wonder where I've seen this kind of self-deluding, one way conversation before? Oh yeah, that's right, I've seen it women who create histrionics around a breakup. For that matter, you could replace the word manosphere in Southern's tweet with Bruce or Chad and it would still read pretty much the same. In its fundamental essence, that is all this is. A breakup of sorts. A woman scorned, expressing her dissatisfaction with a public display of rejection, punctuated by a manufactured threat narrative.

And that, dear listeners, is the point of all three tweets. To reject you as unfit, and to paint you as a threat to women.

Allies to men, are they?

Let's take the closer look at what in all likelihood happened. Indeed, I can say that I am 100% convinced that I know exactly what happened. These three women, like all the women whose work and lives overlap at some point with the manosphere, ran into heaps of approval and adoration. The prettier they are, the more approval and adoration they got. In other words, it was pretty much life as usual for pretty little blond white girls where it comes to men.

All that is great, but eventually they also noticed that along with the heaps of approval and adoration from men who approve of and adore pretty much anything female, they also ran into some angry men; men who weren't so approving or adoring. Men who wouldn't hold their tongues. Men who said harsh things and who made no apology for saying harsh things.

Just who were these awful men who weren't approving and adoring? Why were these men spoiling the fun of pretty, little, blond, white girls?

Well, I happen to know who they were. The manosphere is comprised chiefly of men who share common experiences; like being the target of false allegations; like parental alienation and ruinous divorces; men who've had their reputations destroyed and finances eviscerated. Men who have been shackled with real iron and seen their educational future evaporate before their eyes. Men who've had the state plow through their lives like loose topsoil, shredding everything of value. Men with children whose minds have been poisoned against them. Men who have been treated with a level of injustice that would make Kafka cringe.

And sure, almost all this destruction was done by the state. And of course, not all women are like that. But one central, unavoidable truth remains. At the very heart of each one of these stories, some of them every bit as tragic as Gabby Petito, is a woman with a gun in her hand. They state may have put it the gun there under the direction of feminists, but it was in the hands of a woman and she pulled the trigger. At the core of each nightmare was a woman who had the power to destroy a man and used it while women as far as the eye can see cheered her on.

Call me crazy, but my decidedly male brain informs me that these facts might result in men who have some things to talk about, even if it makes women, or anyone else for that matter, uncomfortable. That same male brain also informs me that what they have to say won't always be pleasant. They won't be issuing the approval and adulation their critics so obviously crave.

And when these guys sometimes erupt in their agony, when they become so pressurized from stress that it is vent or explode, the arrogant, privileged likes of Southern, et al, are there to push the knife in a little deeper. For in the final analysis, their reaction to seeing the pain of abused men on full display isn't to try to understand, but to shame and ridicule the disaffected back into silence. You see, dear listener, they don't have to understand anything. That's on you, and it's your goddam job is to candy coat the wreckage of your life so that pretty, little, blond, white girls don't have to show a shred of real humanity.

The gynocentric privilege that drives the likes of Southern, Watson and Cousens is the same gynocentric privilege that drives every garden variety feminist shitbird I ever encountered. In the end, the only thing that separates the now butthurt Southern and your average feminist is 70 pounds and a bottle of pink hair dye, and we'll soon see what the wall does to that equation.

As I often remind you, there are no victims, just volunteers. The fact that these phonies meet with such easy, unearned approval from the manosphere is a much bigger problem than the trivial bullshit they are complaining about from our more damaged members.

If any of them had even an inkling of men's issues, or any real compassion under all that makeup, they'd point to the vocal, angry minority of red pill men and tell the world the truth; that vocal, angry men are what we create when we treat them like garbage. Instead of whining about men who act out some of their pain on a keyboard, they'd be telling the world that when you treat men like monsters, that is exactly what some of them will become.

In other words, they'd have to actually have the capacity to see a bigger picture than their butthurt of the day.

Fat chance.

Instead, they'll default react like children, publicly damseling straight out of the feminist playbook. Watson couldn't be more wrong than if she were leading a slutwalk. She's the one chiming in on a misandric, manufactured threat narrative. The only difference is that feminists are more honest about their indifference to men's pain.

And of course, gynocentrism in the Red Pill community plays the biggest role in this. To understand what I mean, linked below is a critique I did of Christina Hoff Sommers, another so called antifeminist with female privilege issues. Everything I said about Sommers was demonstrably true, including the feminist narrative she furthers that erases men who live below the poverty line, yet check the comments. You'll find enough white knights in there to make a cuck army. It was disappointing but not unexpected.

You know, I do think quite a bit about some of the women who are involved in the men's movement. There are a small handful of very good advocates. I've sometimes put myself in their shoes and wondered how they do it. They experience the same, angry, vocal men that we all see at times on social media.

The answer to that is pretty self-explanatory. Those men's advocates, who I can absolutely count on one hand, see men for what they often are. Men in pain. Men who are frustrated, angry and sometimes desperate. Men on the edge of losing their sanity and indeed their lives.

Because they actually give a shit, knowing that helps them to not take it all personally. They also get the benefit of seeing red pill men after they finally detox from blue pill life and start moving toward self-actualized lives, but that's a subject for another talk.

Look, I don't even know if there is a lesson in this other than the obvious. Being a pretty little blond white girl who gets approval and adoration that borders on worship because she took on the intellectual child's play of challenging feminists doesn't make her a friend to men. In the end, it doesn't even prove she's not an enemy.

And of course the rest is on us, men. White knights gonna white knight. Cucks gonna cuck. Privileged little, pretty blond, white girls gonna privilege. Nothing I say here or that you do there is going to change any of that. But I do think that when the prima donnas out themselves in such spectacular fashion, we ought to be kind enough to point out what a good job they did, hopefully without our fellows rushing in to put a pillow under their privileged asses. To that end, I hope my part is done.

As always, I hope you enjoyed today's talk, even if you didn't, and we'll see you next time.

How research is used to promote male hatred

June 11, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

A book titled The Death of White Sociology, edited by Howard University professor Joyce Ladner, ostensibly focuses on the birth of "black" sociology and also the death of what is called "white" sociology. It describes a shift in worldview from the traditional Euro viewpoint to the black sociological point of view, written about African Americans by African Americans.

Ladner examines the ways that our culture, media, and academia fostered potent, misleading messages about blacks that were intended for ingestion by both white and black culture. It observes the period after slavery and convincingly maps out the different ways that "common sense lies" about blacks were spread and maintained. And it details the negative impact of these lies on cultural consciousness.

It is an unsettling story of the power of mainstream thought as expressed by "most" people, the power of the media to reflect, mold and perpetuate that thought through news and entertainment, and the power of our academic institutions, who captured the essence of the erroneous assumptions and fed them back to the public as "proven science," starting the cycle anew.

Ladner has convincingly dissected and exposed the schemata for adding mortar and brick to the wall of social bigotry, in this case asserting white superiority over blacks.

She also, though I am sure it wasn't her intent, provided a complete and compelling roadmap of cultural misandry and how the same techniques are currently being used toward the end of asserting women's superiority over men.

So what are these artifacts of the previous generation, now used to further a similar path of hatred and the social marginalization of men? Take a look at them, which I have labeled as bricks, as they are summarized directly from the book. As you read, simply replace the word "blacks" with the word "men," and the word "whites" with the word "women. "

Brick #1. Blacks are defined as the perpetrators and creators of social pathology and not as its victims.

By linking blacks as being perpetrators and creators of social pathology the culture was able to devalue blacks and paint them as inferior to whites.

When blacks were shown to be the victims of a hateful culture people turned a blind eye. The predominant meme was that blacks were the creators and perpetrators of social pathology and anything varying from that was ignored. Even in research when blacks were seen as victims this was all too often ignored.

Anyone even vaguely familiar with the issues of men in today's world will immediately see the connection here.

The modern cultural zeitgeist has been methodically and intentionally founded on the assumption that men are the problem. We see this most brazenly furthered by ideological organizations like the National Organization of Men Against Sexism (NOMAS), the American Men's Studies Association (AMSA) and the Society for the Psychological Study of Men and Masculinity (SPSMM) aka Division 51 of the American Psychological Association. Even a cursory glance through any of their websites reveals a harshly anti-male stance, with repetitive characterizations of men as oppressively violent and women as powerless victims.

They claim to be scholars, supported by valid research, but commit themselves openly to agreement with feminist orthodoxy, not scientific empiricism.

Murray Straus, a leading authority on domestic violence, exposed the depth and scope of this kind of academic corruption in a paper he wrote, Processes Explaining the Concealment and Distortion of Evidence on Gender Symmetry in Partner Violence.

The paper is recommended reading, but the seven techniques Straus identified to perpetuate falsehoods and conceal valid research, particularly in the area of domestic violence, are as follows:

1. Suppress Evidence
2. Avoid Obtaining Data Inconsistent with the Patriarchal Dominance Theory
3. Cite Only Studies That Show Male Perpetration
4. Conclude That Results Support Feminist Beliefs When They Do Not
5. Create "Evidence" by Citation
6. Obstruct Publication of Articles and Obstruct Funding Research That Might Contradict the Idea that Male Dominance Is the Cause of PV
7. Harass, Threaten, and Penalize Researchers Who Produce Evidence That Contradicts Feminist Beliefs

Again, for the detailed support for these talking points, I refer you to Straus (who actually knows how to support his assertions). His information is not a historical review; it is a well-documented exposé about intentional, current and ongoing corruption in the broader academic establishment. That points directly to organizations like NOMAS, AMSA and SPSMM, who are the primary beneficiaries of the fraud, but is far more widespread than just these easily identifiable radical ideologues.

You can see the results of the disinformation, even in lies furthered by the current presidential administration, and in legislation supported in bi-partisan fashion like VAWA, which assumes male violence and female perpetration as the default.

It has been enormously effective. What at one time was a mechanism to keep blacks in their place has now begun to falter as a tool of racial control. But the harness is now firmly around the necks of the men, including black men and other minorities, across western culture.

Brick #2. Blacks are better if they seek to emulate whites.

In the early to mid-20th century one of the tactics the researchers used in painting blacks as inferior was to do research on Blacks, Whites and Mulattos. The conclusions were almost always the same. The more White influence in your blood the better you were. If you were light skinned you were automatically seen as better. They took this a step further and would write about Blacks being more cultured when they had more time being around whites. It was as if, the "white is right" mentality rubbed off simply by contact. When Blacks did poorly it was often assumed that they simply didn't have the good influence of white people. This meme disdained blacks and glorified whites as being the truly cultured ones.

It's easy to see how this transposes in today's culture. Now it is men who are deemed "better" if only they would act more like women. Men who are not around women are seen as suspect. Men who don't emote like women are assumed to be emotionally deficient or stunted, and in need of feminine influence to measure up on a human scale. This meme now glorifies the female way as being the default and shames men for not living up to this.

You can see this idea repeated and reinforced throughout the entire culture, from feminist academe to the media to your living room, if you are cohabitating with the average western woman.

It has also become a monetized aspect of pop psychology, not just in the works of TV hucksters like Dr. Phil, but in the works of sexist ideologues like Michael Kimmel and Christopher Kilmartin. It moves a step further in demagoguery such as that offered up by the even more blatantly misandric and sexist "Conscious Men," Gay Hendricks and Arjuna Ardaugh.

Consider the repetitive themes throughout the mainstay of "wisdom" offered by men beholden to feminist ideology. You will see many references to concepts like "new" or "enlightened" masculinity, all of it meant to embrace a feminized reinterpretation. And you will see the redundant vilification of manhood with concepts like "toxic" and "hegemonic" masculinity.

These men are the direct corollaries to the "good" blacks, who, through the emulation of "white traits and speech," found patronizing acceptance from some parts of a white culture that was intentionally conditioned to see them as inferior. They are advocating for a more accepetable, "light-skinned" masculinity.

In short, the intent of their work is the social breeding of male house niggers for women of all colors.

Brick #3. Research showing ways that blacks were superior to whites was deep-sixed.

When the early researchers would do studies where blacks were seen to be better than whites in some respect the researchers would consistently deep six that aspect of their work. It simply wouldn't see the light of day. In this way whites continued to be seen as always superior.

This is addressed in Straus's paper, but the results from it can also been seen routinely in the culture around you.

In today's climate when men do better than women it is seen not as the strength of men but as discrimination against women, or as an artifact of undue power granted men at birth by an oppressive patriarchy.

When men excelled over women in mathematics or hard science, it was because women were historically excluded from education. When women were fully included in education, indeed given enough special incentives that they ended up more educated than the average man, but still lagged behind in math and hard science, it was because women were socially discouraged from pursuing male dominated fields. When women were given special empowerment programs, special grants and scholarships and received far reaching encouragement to major in math and hard sciences, and they still lagged behind men, it was because hard sciences relied on phallocentric concepts of logic and empiricism that put women at another disadvantage at the hands of men.

When the obvious truth was finally spoken publicly by Larry Summers, president of Harvard, that women did not possess the same aptitude for math and sciences as men, he was fired.

Brick #4. Aversion of whites toward blacks proves their inferiority.

The aversion of the whites towards blacks was used as proof that blacks were inferior in the 20th century. Why else would whites look down on them?

Women's aversion and disdain of men is now used as proof that men are inferior. Just think of some of the catch phrases we have heard in our culture. "Only men can prevent rape." "Man hating is honorable." "Men are Pigs." "Boys are stupid, throw rocks at them."

Furthermore, this is taken to even more extremes of aversion with political antics like "Take Back the Night," rallies, geared to create the impression that men are creatures of the dark and that the aversion to them needs to be taken to the level of clearing them out of the night itself.

We have seen similar protests from other organizations. SlutWalks are now ongoing to establish rules that prevent men from speaking their mind with women.

What's more, there appears to be a balancing effect being established in the pursuit of feminist governance, designed to allow women to push men out at will, wherever it serves them, but allows them to usurp male resources, again, whenever it serves them.

It's called keeping your slave out of sight unless you need him for something.

While men are now routinely reviled as social pariah, and are being drummed out of the workforce and education, legislation in the form of family law and public assistance that strips men of resources and passes it on to women, moves on.

Sound familiar?

Brick #5. The psychological research of the day in the early to mid-20th century was not geared to help blacks but to blame them and chronicle how they need to change.

Articles that were written and placed their focus on blacks tended to feature issues that showed blacks to be at fault for problems and stayed intent on how they needed to change. This of course ignored the needs of blacks.

We see the same pattern in today's research on men. We visit back to Division 51 of the American Psychological Association, whose stated allegiance to feminist approved outcome makes them some of the more skilled masons building this wall.

If you look at the offerings that Division 51 makes to the Good Men Project Magazine, you will see the recurring theme of inherent male defectiveness with the not so subtle inference of feminized ideals as an ameliorative answer.

Division 51 was the same organization that upon the shooting tragedy at Virginia Tech by an obviously psychotic madman, published an article on the event, tying the shooters actions to "toxic" masculinity.

Remember, Division 51 isn't (assumedly) just another gang of sexist hacks like AMSA and NOMAS. They carry the prestigious name of the American Psychological Association with them, affording them the appearance of forward thinking and scholarly integrity.

That is very, very dangerous credibility in the hands of a bunch of bigots.

Their work is not geared to be of help to men, but rather to blame them for social problems. Men who are perpetrators of domestic violence, men who need to stop violence against women, men who commit sexual assault and harassment; the list goes on and on.

Now visit our page at the top labeled "The Facts," and then go over to Division 51 of the American Psychological Association. Compare that list of the multitude of issues facing men in our culture and see what, if anything, Division 51 is doing to address the problems.

Hint: You won't need to have pen and paper to make a list. They are not directly addressing a single issue faced by men or boys on that list.

Not a single one.

Brick #6. Blacks are just animals and criminals

Without the influence and control of whites it was assumed that blacks were simply animalistic/primitive and constantly focused on sex. The fear was of black men raping white women; Black men murdering and stealing, etc… The source of criminality was blackness itself. The two were perennially linked and in so doing blacks were saddled with being the core of the problem, not the victim of it.

Now this same projection is focused on men. Take a trip to The Good Men Project, an artifact of the new sexist sociology, and find out why violence is a "men's issue." Consider the implications of a Violence Against Women Act in a culture where adult women are the least frequent victims of domestic or any other kind of violence. Ask yourself why we now have the successful coining of the term "rape culture," codespeak for male culture, and why it paints a broad stroke of sexist stereotyping on every man and boy in the western world.

It is safe to assume that the old memes about blacks were being propagated unconsciously, but foolish to think of that lack of consciousness as an excuse. Most people were not intentionally hateful and judging towards blacks, they were simply swept up in the tide of social consciousness that was prevalent at the time.

But the damage was done, just as it is being done now.

The “common sense” that is the cultural expression of all hateful meme’s is propagated as common knowledge, and it had the impact of not only condemning blacks as inferior, it was also integral to justifying poor treatment and poor conditions.

It is obvious that these sorts of memes were very damaging to blacks. It doesn’t take much imagination to conceive of the hurtful impact of being seen as inferior or criminal or generally a bane to “decent” society. The cumulative effects of this were devastating and a new consciousness was needed in order to begin the process of abandoning the old programming.

In the 1950’s men, generally speaking, were held in relatively high esteem, especially if they were providing for and protecting women and children. This esteem held true even in respectively segregated populations. In other words, white men were held in high regard in white society; the same for black men, as men, within their own culture.

Then from 1960 onward things started to change. Blacks began shedding their cultural burden while women, generally speaking, were expanding their sex roles and getting good press as model human beings and consummate victims. The culture began to see and portray women in a most positive light, establishing cultural taboo’s on speech, and even thought, to the contrary.

Today all men, regardless of ethnicity, are suffering because of this sort of cultural scheme. Like the early 20th century no one notices that they are carrying and expressing the bigotry, even most of the victims.

Brick #7. The group in power is always likely to use every means at its disposal to create the impression that it deserves to be where it is. And it is not above suggesting that those who have been excluded have only themselves to blame.

This is the rub, is it not? By furthering misinformation, through dubious social findings, fraudulent research and the unrestrained use of political power, feminist governance was established, and is being maintained, on the same exact model used to continue the oppression of blacks after slavery ended.

If you are an MRA, you are not unfamiliar with feminist ideologues suggesting that you are to blame for the lack of available of services for male victims of DV. “If men need shelters, why aren’t they building them?” they ask, in utter condescension. Of course they are oblivious to the fact that feminists didn’t build DV shelters, they only used the government to take over them after they were built; a government that is as complicit in the misandric zeitgeist as academe, and which steadfastly refuses to recognize male victims or female perpetrators.

But that is just a microcosm of the problem. It speaks to minutia; trivial detail.

Feminists have, with the complicity and cooperation of traditionalists, built a social model of female superiority that is building toward equivalence with that of the Godlike power of whites over blacks in the Antebellum South.

For White men it is a new experience. For black men it will be nothing less than a return to their early post-African roots. For Black men, feminism is the end of their civil rights movement.

Feminist ideologues and their henchmen don't care about the color of men. In the postmodern era we are all to blame. All men have been the oppressors who had held women back for centuries. All men have to pay for it. All wars are caused by men. All men are destructive, to the environment and to the economy. All men are rapists. All men are violent.

Your status in respect to color is only that of what color pig you were born.

And all men are now getting the cultural shadow projections. It was after the advent of gender feminism in the 1960's when young men started killing themselves nearly six times as often as similarly aged young girls. We now have men experiencing more academic struggle and failure than ever before. Boys are dropping out and failing to attend college at unprecedented rates. They are similarly falling from the ranks of the employed, and employable.

And they are being incarcerated at rates that far outpace the rest of the industrialized world.

State incentive to collect child support : bigger piece of federal funds pie

June 14, 2023 | by Laura Lynn | Link | Original Link

This item is reprinted with permission from Examiner.com. –Ed

Here is a link to the Social Security Administration website that explains how money is divided up between the states to add incentive to collect child support.
It reads:

INCENTIVE PAYMENTS TO STATES

Sec. 458. [42 U.S.C. 658a] (a) In General.—In addition to any other payment under this part, the Secretary shall, subject to subsection (f), make an incentive payment to each State for each fiscal year in an amount determined under subsection (b).

(b) Amount of Incentive Payment.—

(1) In general.—The incentive payment for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the incentive payment pool for the fiscal year, multiplied by the State incentive payment share for the fiscal year.

(2) Incentive payment pool.—

(A) In general.—In paragraph (1), the term "incentive payment pool" means—

> (i) $422,000,000 for > fiscal year 2000;
> (ii) $429,000,000
> for fiscal year 2001;
> (iii) $450,000,000
> for fiscal year 2002;
> (iv) $461,000,000
> for fiscal year 2003;
> (v) $454,000,000 for > fiscal year 2004;
> (vi) $446,000,000
> for fiscal year 2005;
> (vii) $458,000,000
> for fiscal year 2006;
> (viii) $471,000,000
> for fiscal year 2007;

> for fiscal year 2008; and
> (x) for any succeeding fiscal year, the amount of the incentive payment pool for the fiscal year that precedes such succeeding fiscal year, multiplied by the percentage (if any) by which the CPI for such preceding fiscal year exceeds the CPI for the second preceding fiscal year.

(B) CPI.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the CPI for a fiscal year is the average of the Consumer Price Index for the 12-month period ending on September 30 of the fiscal year. As used in the preceding sentence, the term “Consumer Price Index” means the last Consumer Price Index for all-urban consumers published by the Department of Labor.

(3) State incentive payment share.—In paragraph (1), the term “State incentive payment share” means, with respect to a fiscal year—

(A) the incentive base amount for the State for the fiscal year; divided by

(B) the sum of the incentive base amounts for all of the States for the fiscal year.

(4) Incentive base amount.—In paragraph (3), the term “incentive base amount” means, with respect to a State and a fiscal year, the sum of the applicable percentages (determined in accordance with paragraph (6)) multiplied by the corresponding maximum incentive base amounts for the State for the fiscal year, with respect to each of the following measures of State performance for the fiscal year:

(A) The paternity establishment performance level.

(B) The support order performance level.

(C) The current payment performance level.

(D) The arrearage payment performance level.

(E) The cost–effectiveness performance level.

(5) Maximum incentive base amount.—

(A) In general.—For purposes of paragraph (4), the maximum incentive base amount for a State for a fiscal year is—

(i) with respect to the performance measures described in subparagraphs (A), (B), and (C) of paragraph (4), the State collections base for the fiscal year; and

(ii) with respect to the performance measures described in subparagraphs (D) and (E) of paragraph (4), 75 percent of the State collections base for the fiscal year.

(B) Data required to be complete and reliable.—Notwithstanding subparagraph (A), the maximum incentive base amount for a State for a fiscal year with respect to a performance measure described in paragraph (4) is zero, unless the Secretary determines, on the basis of an audit performed under section 452(a)(4)(C)(i), that the data which the State submitted pursuant to section 454(15)(B) for the fiscal year and which is used to determine the performance level involved is complete and reliable.

(C) State collections base.—For purposes of subparagraph (A), the State collections base for a fiscal year is equal to the sum of—

(i) 2 times the sum of—

(I) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in cases in which the support obligation involved is required to be assigned to the State pursuant to part A or E of this title or title XIX; and

(II) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in cases in which the support obligation involved was so assigned but, at the time of collection, is not required to be so assigned; and

(ii) the total amount of support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part in all other cases.

(6) Determination of applicable percentages based on performance levels.—

(A) Paternity establishment.—

(i) Determination of paternity establishment performance level.—The paternity establishment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is, at the option of the State, the IV-D paternity establishment percentage determined under section 452(g)(2)(A) or the statewide paternity establishment percentage determined under section 452(g)(2)(B).

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's paternity establishment performance level is as follows:

If the paternity establishment performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:

51%	52%	61
0%	50%	0.

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the paternity establishment performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 50 percent but exceeds by at least 10 percentage points the paternity establishment performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's paternity establishment performance level is 50 percent.

(B) Establishment of child support orders.—

(i) Determination of support order performance level.—The support order performance level for a State for a fiscal year is the percentage of the total number of cases under the State plan approved under this part in which there is a support order during the fiscal year.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's support order performance level is as follows:

If the support order performance level is:		The applicable percentage is:

Notwithstanding the preceding sentence, if the support order performance level of a State for a fiscal year is less than 50 percent but exceeds by at least 5 percentage points the support order performance level of the State for the immediately preceding fiscal year, then the applicable percentage with respect to the State's support order performance level is 50 percent.

(C) Collections on current child support due.—

(i) Determination of current payment performance level.—The current payment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total amount of current support collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part divided by the total amount of current support owed during the fiscal year in all cases under the State plan, expressed as a percentage.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's current payment performance level is as follows:

(D) Collections on child support arrearages.—

(i) Determination of arrearage payment performance level.—The arrearage payment performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total number of cases under the State plan approved under this part in which payments of past–due child support were received during the fiscal year and part or all of the payments were distributed to the family to whom the past–due child support was owed (or, if all past–due child support owed to the family was, at the time of receipt, subject to an assignment to the State, part or all of the payments were retained by the State) divided by the total number of cases under the State plan in which there is past–due child support, expressed as a percentage.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's arrearage payment performance level is as follows:

(E) Cost–effectiveness.—

(i) Determination of cost-effectiveness performance level.—The cost-effectiveness performance level for a State for a fiscal year is equal to the total amount collected during the fiscal year under the State plan approved under this part divided by the total amount expended during the fiscal year under the State plan, expressed as a ratio.

(ii) Determination of applicable percentage.—The applicable percentage with respect to a State's cost-effectiveness performance level is as follows:

(d) Administrative Provisions.—The amounts of the incentive payments to be made to the States under this section for a fiscal year shall be estimated by the Secretary at/or before the beginning of the fiscal year on the basis of the best information available. The Secretary shall make the payments for the fiscal year, on a quarterly basis (with each quarterly payment being made no later than the beginning of the quarter involved), in the amounts so estimated, reduced or increased to the extent of any overpayments or underpayments which the Secretary determines were made under this section to the States involved for prior periods and with respect to which adjustment has not already been made under this subsection. Upon the making of any estimate by the Secretary under the preceding sentence, any appropriations available for payments under this section are deemed obligated.

(e) Regulations.—The Secretary shall prescribe such regulations as may be necessary governing the calculation of incentive payments under this section, including directions for excluding from the calculations certain closed cases and cases over which the States do not have jurisdiction.

(2) for any activity (including cost-effective contracts with local agencies) approved by the Secretary, whether or not the expenditures for the activity are eligible for reimbursement under this part, which may contribute to improving the effectiveness or efficiency of the State program operated under this part.

Southern Oscillation

June 14, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

With Lauren Southern recently placing herself in the spotlight by doing a hit piece on her ex husband, while lauding her own purity, we have another item to publish from 2021. –Ed.

The phrase Southern Oscillation may not be familiar to many, especially those outside Australia. The Southern Oscillation is an atmospheric phenomenon in the South Pacific Ocean connected to the better-known El Niño. When the El Niño-Southern Oscillation is occurring Australia gets dryer while South America gets wetter. Both areas often suffer natural disasters – drought and severe bushfires in Australia, floods in South America.

Australia recently experienced a Southern oscillation the weather bureau wasn't expecting. As is widely known, Lauren Southern now resides in Australia. After retiring from public life in 2019 she re-emerged in 2020. On 16 August 2021 Southern had this to say on Twitter:

> Can't stand most of the manosphere. Why? Because I gave them the benefit of the doubt and got to know the community, and it's rotten inside and out.
> Get out while you can. Save yourselves young men – criticizing feminism is perfectly fine. You can do that without hating women.

While it is true that she said most of the manosphere she also said it's rotten inside and out. As Peter Wright has noted "The Free Dictionary" defines this phrase to mean:

> Thoroughly; down to the last detail.

Sydney Watson went on to respond:

> Yep. This about sums it up.
> It's on the same level as radical feminism.

And then Daisy Cousens followed up with:

> Agree entirely with you both. I went to war with the manosphere a couple of years ago; they are the most virulently vile, deluded, bitter people I have ever come across. Right up there with contemporary feminists, plus rape threats.

I find this personally disappointing because I spoke at an event organised by Watson, the March for Men in Melbourne, Australia on 25 August 2018 and Cousens attended ICMI17.

While I'm disappointed I can't say I'm surprised. This has been a long time coming.

Many people looking in from the outside fail to appreciate the breadth of views and outlooks that are under the umbrella of anti-feminism. Anti-feminism covers from the men's rights movement to traditional gynocentrism and everything in between. As such anti-feminists may all agree on the problems with feminism but not much else. In particular there are widely varying views about the direction a post-feminist society should take.

Traditional gynocentrists generally want to return to what they described as a traditional lifestyle. The lifestyle they seek seems to so often involve lunch with the girls, a spot of tennis and some housework if the maid can't make it that week. This was not, in fact, a traditional lifestyle as most people would have recognised it in the past. Historically most women worked. So did most men and most children. The alternative was starvation or destitution. Only recently has society become wealthy enough to allow for many people to not work. In the 19th century children began leaving the workforce. Then women began to leave the workforce. Men never had that opportunity, and among poorer families women generally continued to work as well. The traditional lifestyle desired by these tradgyns was largely the privilege of women of the upper middle class and the wealthy in Western society.

Most MRAs don't wan't the future of the feminists or a return to the idealised past of the tradgyns. We want a new way forward. A future where we see true social and legal equality for men and women. A future where all adults bear the cost of protecting their society should it become necessary. The future that many feminists always claimed they wanted, but didn't really.

For years a tentative alliance between men's rights and the tradgyns held. There is a well known but ancient proverb: The enemy of my enemy is my friend. Most people on both sides probably saw it as a temporarily alliance of convenience. And it served its purpose. But for a few years now it has been clear that it was coming to an end. It is natural that as feminism continues to decline the differences between men's rights and traditional gynocentrism would become more apparent.

Southern, Watson and Cousens must be sufficiently well informed to understand the correct meaning of manosphere. The manosphere is a term applied to a variety of movements involving men or focussed on men's issues. In general participants in the various movements agree on the problems facing men and boys but disagree on how (or even if) they should be addressed.

We cannot just assume that Southern, Watson and Cousens were painting with too broad a brush. It is clear that they knew what they were saying.

It must then be clear that to speak of the manosphere in the manner that they did is to besmirching a huge number of people who just want a better future for themselves and for society.

Every movement has its extremists. The real test is how movements deal with them. We push our extremists to the side while far too many movements allow theirs to take centre stage.

Rather than hating women we have many women within the men's rights movement. You can see women in leadership positions and featuring among speakers at ICMIs. I personally invited Watson and Cousens to speak at both ICMI20 and ICMI21. I didn't get so much as a response from either of them. Vile indeed.

Every Southern Oscillation passes with time. The future is bright for men's rights as we slowly but surely chip away at the monolith of gynocentrism. I predict a very different future for those that would throw us under a bus today. Beauty fades and with it attention. In the end only ideas survive.

By now most readers of AVfM will have watched Vernon Meig's video on the topic. Vernon invited me to participate in his video. I want to thank Vernon for inviting me to participate. Alas circumstances did not allow, so an article will have to do.

Workplace Inequality: When One Side Has an Escape Hatch

> No woman should be authorised to stay at home to bring up her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one.
> —Simone de Beauvoir (In "A Dialogue with Simone de Beauvoir" [1])

The other day as I was walking in the sunshine, pedestrians suffered the inconvenience of having to step off the footpath and onto the road because a team of sweaty, singlet-clad workmen with dirt and dust sticking to their skin were digging a trench. Shovelling spades of dirt alongside the trench with the precision of surgeons wielding scalpels, the workers hardly raised any dust into the path of pedestrians. They were all men, of course, and I could fairly confidently conclude that they weren't digging the trench for the joy of it. Between the trench and the road, a number of well-dressed women holding designer handbags in their manicured hands were waiting at the bus stop, scowling at having to contend with the little bit of wind-blown dust that our spade-wielding surgeons could not avoid. Oh, the inconvenience.

I wish I had had a camera. There could be no more compelling example of the dynamic between slave and entitled. No doubt some of the women were off to work at jobs that they would not be in were it not for affirmative action policies, to account for all those millennia of oppression of women by men. So what was the likelihood that any of the women standing at the bus stop would trade places with any of the men digging the trench?

A Natural Law of the Universe

Simone de Beauvoir understood the nature of the problem. Her above-referenced comment to Betty Friedan, while coming from a woman's perspective, was ultimately an expression of a fundamental law for all life throughout the universe. Namely, every living organism is inclined to choose the path of least resistance, least pain, greatest reward. All organisms are pain-averse and reward-seeking; if they weren't, they would die and life itself would not be possible. Neither ecosystems nor free markets can exist without this principle. Yes, even free markets: between two items identical in every way but bearing different pricetags, a sane person will always choose the cheaper.

Likewise, consider choosing between a life committed to a STEM trajectory that typically promises high stress, long hours and working in a demanding environment versus staying in a comfortable home and being provided for by someone who is committed to said high-stress, high-performance treadmill. To someone for whom both options are culturally sanctioned, the preferred choice should be obvious. The options become even more pronounced when said provider is a miner or construction worker. No woman needs to be oppressed by any patriarchy, nor anyone else for that matter, in order to choose the most comfortable option. The great law of the universe cuts across all living organisms, all persons across all cultures, all lifestyles and both sexes. Women instinctively realize where the better deal lies. No women's studies major is required to understand this, though if they must … Simone de Beauvoir.

Now, it is true that it is often difficult to see how the other side experiences their world. While we might expect that some women will perceive the grass to be greener on the provider side, a free market based on equal opportunity will test a woman's resolve and the question will, with a bit of serious introspection, be laid to rest. It must also be said that the questions are not always unreasonable—old-boy networks have their own history of privilege and entitlement, and challenging these is to the benefit of both men and women. But these kinds of questions have little part to play in the contemporary feminist agenda.

An Escape Hatch Changes Perceived Risk and Motivation

So how do we resolve the issue of gender inequality in the workplace? The only way to approximate true gender equality in the workplace is to remove the stay-at-home option that is available to women. Exactly as de Beauvoir suggests. The question is: How do we accomplish this in any meaningful way?

De Beauvoir understood that women are raised in this world with an escape hatch. This ever-present soft option wires women's brains (relates to the topic of neural plasticity [2]). For example, Haier et al. (2005) [3] found that men's and women's brains differ in the distribution of white (glial) and gray (neural) matter, with intelligence tests showing that on average, men used 6.5 times as much gray matter as women did, but that women used 9 times as much white matter as men did. Soft and hard options wire brains differently.

Women have permission to leave if the going gets too tough, or even not to consider going there if it looks too much like hard work. The reason that so few women do STEM courses is that they don't have to. It's the reason why so few women work in mines or construction sites, or sweep roads or dig trenches—they don't have to. This has nothing to do with The Patriarchy oppressing women. What woman would choose to work in demanding, stressful situations or dirty, life-threatening situations if they didn't have to? Does one really need a women's studies degree to answer this question?

And once we realize that stay-at-home women don't work because they don't have to, a whole slew of other don't-have-tos falls neatly into place. For example:

- Women don't rob banks because … they don't have to.
- Women don't get into violent confrontations because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pursue stressful career paths because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pursue dangerous career paths because … they don't have to.
- Women don't pay for their share of the expenses on a date because … they don't have to.

- Women are less likely than men to be homeless because … they don't have to (provide for themselves).
- Women are less likely to be imprisoned because … they don't have to (take the same risks as men).
- Women don't fight in wars because … you guessed it, they don't have to.

These are all different ways of saying pussy-pass. Of course "because they don't have to" comes with subtexts; for example, "because they have men doing it for them" or "because they can."

- Women work in air-conditioned offices instead of dusty, dangerous mines because … they can.
- Women stay at home because … they can.
- Women (prostitutes) accept payment for selling their bodies because … they can.
- Women rely on men to take the initiative because … they can.
- Women rely on men to do the heavy lifting because … they can.
- Women cry because … they can.
- Women play the helpless victim because … they can.
- Women have a rationalization hamster because … they can.

Nobody is being oppressed. Women do these things because they can.
The subtexts that women enjoy as entitlements become the subtexts that men actualize as obligations.

- Men work because … they must (they have no choice).
- Men work in dusty, dangerous mines instead of air-conditioned offices because … they must (nobody is going to provide for them).
- Men pursue stressful career paths because … they must (they know what has to be done to secure their place in the hierarchy).
- Men pursue dangerous career paths because … they must (they know that a provider raising a family has responsibilities).
- Men get into violent confrontations because … they must (sometimes their survival depends on it, and sometimes wars require it).
- Men pay the expenses on a date because … they must (it's just what providers do, and women will look elsewhere if said date does not deliver on his obligations).
- Men pay for sex because … they desire (men are never desired for anything other than what they can provide).
- Men take the initiative because … they must (they would finish up with nothing if they did not).
- Men do the heavy lifting because … they must (they would receive no reward if they did not).
- Men don't play the helpless victim because … they must not (they receive no reward for it other than a cardboard box and homelessness).
- Men don't have a rationalization hamster [4] because … they don't have that luxury

(their assumptions are constantly being tested and revised in accordance with the penalties exacted for wrong choices).

Let us take a closer look at this rationalization hamster phenomenon because it kind of wraps up our point about the relationship between experience and character and how this relates directly to how brains are wired. [5] Women's solipsism and impulsiveness rely on the fact that they don't need to have their perspective of the world tested. Their rationalization hamster is at liberty to scamper hither and thither, rarely having to contend with consequences or having to take responsibility for bad choices. Again, it is their ever-present soft option—the option to stay at home—that colors their risks and becomes habituated and wires their brains.

This is all another way of expressing the point that Alison Tieman makes in her video [6] describing gender roles in the context of actor and acted upon. When we talk about equality in the workplace, we are talking about changing the relationship between actor and acted upon … and we are ultimately talking about changing biology.

De Beauvoir's observation makes perfect sense. But where her reasoning falls down is in the assumption that you can somehow manipulate women's motivations through propaganda and the force of law. Nothing could be further from the truth because the mere availability of the soft option, whether or not it is taken, colors all choices and the risks associated with it. The same option, to a woman or a man, is the difference between suck-it-and-see and do-or-die. A woman can entertain the idea of being a fireperson as a dare, maybe for a joke or for a laugh, and affirmative action will enable her to actualize her whimsical flight of fancy. She is at liberty to suck-it-and-see and then have a laugh if it does not work out. A fireman, by contrast, is unlikely to perceive his role in quite the same way. For him, it's a career choice, an identity, a way of life, a statement of something that he stands for.

The Solution

The only solution that might bring us in any meaningful way closer to true equality in the workplace is to close the escape hatch; bolt it down, lock it up and throw away the key. More specifically, permanently sterilize all females before they reach reproductive age. Only this step can stand any realistic chance of removing the stay-at-home option from women's choices. Only this step might make redundant the primary nurturer role that justifies the stay-at-home option for women. Only this step can stand any chance of rewiring the brains of men and women so as to make women more competitive with men in the workplace. Why? Because it is the only way, ideally, that both women and men will see every option with the same shade of do-or-die or suck-it-and-see.

So are we prepared to accomplish de Beauvoir's vision by removing women's soft option? Will we make these sorts of changes in the interests of equal opportunity in the workplace? If not, then we are stuck in a division of labour based on gender roles. This division of labour has nothing to do with patriarchal oppression and everything to do with biology. If we want to establish true equality in the workplace, then the only way to do it is to change biology, thereby changing the cultural options that depend on it. And we do this by making the sterilization of girls a compulsory rite of passage always performed before they are able to reproduce. Like their mothers before them and their grandmothers before them.

True, there are some minor glitches in this strategy that need to be ironed out, but at least it is more realistic than the current trashing of men's rights in the interests of an "equality" that never was—an "equality" that relies on denying men their rights and disregarding the complex web of risks, demands and complexities that color men's options.

The sex robots are here and they are all you will ever need

June 17, 2023 | by Jon Joy | Link | Original Link

There will always be naysayers. Blue-pill thinkers insist that men[1] can only find satisfaction through a living, breathing, flesh-and-blood woman. Meanwhile, science fiction prophets have painted a future full of robotic dream girls, perfectly indistinguishable from their human templates. Here on Earth, demand is soaring: companies are pouring R&D dollars into the problem; artificial intelligence is improving daily; and robot brothels are opening to meet a swell of demand from curious men.

Some men look at the current models and see the glass as half-empty (not life-like at all), while others see it as half-full (all of the holes work). Both of these responses are fair, but there is one category of man who has become lost. He is enthralled by the idea of these robots. He sees them as a game-changer, and the solution to his problems. He tells himself that he is almost ready to quit women. All he needs first is an electronic one.

The cyber-dolls we see in fiction are a metaphor for men gaining the power to quench their thirst without women; for being freed from the deprivation that biology has imposed on us, and that stands as a gauntlet that each man individually struggles with throughout his life. In that metaphorical sense, the robots are already here. A man can already have a perfectly happy and fulfilling sex life without ever coming into contact with a woman. The fact that so many self-identified red-pill men have become lost in the metaphor demonstrates how subtly blue-pill ideas can disguise themselves.

Women have no such fixations on us. Their sex toys are not full male forms, but simple, utilitarian tools, designed to hit the right nerve endings, which they do with super-human prowess. The story of a man going head-to-head (so to speak) with a Hitachi Magic Wand would end like John Henry's encounter with the steam engine.

Henry Ford is famously quoted, "If I had asked people what they wanted, they would have said faster horses." An even better analogy is the history of inventing the airplane. Designers struggled without success to create, in effect, mechanical birds. The breakthrough did not come until the Wright brothers set aside imitating nature, and used every advantage available to mechanical objects. Not propulsion by flapping wings, but by a propeller, a technology that is impossible for a living thing.

Every man's primary sex partner, throughout life, is himself. This is true whether the man has a fifty-year marriage or is a life-long celibate. For decades, sex educators have encouraged women to take ownership of their bodies, explore them, and figure out how they work. Men have not received this message, presumably on the assumption that naughty boys cannot keep their hands off themselves, anyway. Sex robots are not a pinnacle that, once reached, will solve everything. They are merely one peak within a mountain range of techniques, toys, and activities for personal satisfaction. Just like no bird can fly as high or as fast as a Boeing 747, these options present men with variety, feeling, and sensations that women cannot provide, all to be indulged in selfishly and at will. Hoping for life-like sex robots should not distract from what is available today, including pornography, erotica, toys, internet chats, and much more.

So why is that seemingly red-pilled men fixate on the dream of artificial women to soothe their cravings, while leaving unmentioned the banquet table of options already spread out before them? Gynocentrism is a factor, of course. By fixing our gaze on the female form, men avoid ever having to overcome our natural but immature disgust and fear of our own bodies and sexuality. Homophobia, which is perhaps gynocentrism's greatest invention, plays a role too. God forbid that a man would allow others to understand his sexual energies as directed at anything other than a hot chick, even in this case a plastic one.

For men unable or unwilling to clear this mental hurdle, the fight was lost before it began. Such men must realize: you are attached to women in a way that women are not attached to you, and you will have to pay the price. If the female form is your idol, sooner or later you will worship. And if a billion men, all stuck in the same trap, cannot even talk about it without centering the female form because we are too squicked out by male bodies and sexuality and are afraid of sounding gay, then we are in no position to complain about a ladies-first world.

Nobody should be ashamed to own a sex robot or any other toy, but it is misguided to see robots as the single answer, rather than just one piece of the puzzle. Men with robot fixations are over women like Noman Bates is over his mother. In a commercial for doll vendor, "The-Doll-House," robotic spokesdoll Celestina cleverly challenges the idea of dolls as creepy and unappealing by asking the plaintive, pouty question, "Do you think I look creepy? Don't you think I look real?" It is genuinely funny, but the idea of designing robotic women to be passive aggressive also recalls the scene from Psycho when Norman receives an imagined dressing down from his mother's desiccated skeleton.[2]

One major lesson of the red pill is how society binds men through shame. The manosphere helps individuals fight back by naming shaming tactics for what they are and standing up against them. Our societal narrative for sexual shame says that that it comes only from religion, or conservative upbringings. This creates a blind spot that prevents many of us from recognizing it within ourselves. The safe, comfortable path is to leave the shame alone, to deny its very existence, to tell ourselves that we feel no shame, but that we are just healthy, "normal" men, and all we need is a woman—or, if that has been ruled out, a robot. The red pill helps men rise beyond shame, and represents the only path available in today's climate for men to live in fully actualized self-acceptance.

The options available to men today for self-stimulation dwarf what they were at any time before in human history, and they are increasing with each passing day. Metaphorically, the sex robots are already here. Nobody should waste a moment waiting for the rubber-and-silicone ones to catch up.

A Brief Commentary On Jankowiak & Fischer's Misreading Of Romantic Love

June 18, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following elaborates on a common misrepresentation of what romantic love is. – PW

It's amazing to observe how many academics have adopted a flawed idea of what romantic love is – all because Jankowiak & Fischer[1] claimed to both define, and then find evidence of romantic love in 166 cultures. However their definition does not match the romantic love construct from Europe which rested squarely on a feudal template of men serving elevated ladies – a template that is missing from Jankowiak & Fischer's definition. As the most popular kind of love in the world today, this is no small oversight.

Romantic love is, in fact, different from the more generic love they describe.

Even the great Steve Stewart-Williams uncritically accepts Jankowiak & Fischer's romantic love construct which omits the feudal template (ie. man as vassal, woman as lord), an omission that results in their construct not being romantic love at all because it is lacking its most definitive element.

Jankowiak & Fischer defined romantic love as based on intimacy, passion, commitment, idealization, limerence, and so on, and omitted the central relevance of the feudal template. But no feudal metaphor = no romantic love. Academics relying on such misinformation overlook the novelty of romantic love as does Stewart-Williams in his otherwise wonderful book on evolutionary psychology titled 'The Ape Who Understood The Universe.' There he writes:

> The question all these findings raise is a straightforward one: If romantic love is an invention of Western culture, why is it found in every geographical region, historical period, and ethnic group? The simplest and most plausible answer is that romantic love is not an invention of Western culture. Instead, the idea that romantic love is an invention of Western culture is itself an invention of Western culture, and a rather implausible one at that. Human beings were falling in and out of love for hundreds of thousands of years before we ever had Hollywood blockbusters or knights in shining armor. We're just that kind of animal – the kind that falls in love from time to time.

Its clear that some academics are attempting to universalize a medieval phenomenon that is not, in fact, universal. And many subsequent academics are simply quoting, without checking, the robustness of the earlier study by Jankowiak & Fischer. Have they never read pre-medieval European literature, or perhaps Chinese history for alternative descriptions of love?

For example, the following quote is from the book Love and Women in Early Chinese Fiction By Daniel Hsieh (2009),[2] which describes an absence of the European template in China:

> The idea of a purely romantic hero, a man as both an amorous and exemplar figure, is almost unknown. Most modern readers would react to the Chinese romances with sentiments akin to E. D. Edwards who declared, "Of all characteristics of Chinese fiction which are foreign to European ideas none is more striking than the inadequacy of the hero of love stories. The nominal hero is generally a quite unheroic person….". Given the norms of the culture this was inevitable. Romance ordinarily had little place in the life of a wenren, and any attempt to raise its position is problematic. A "real" man was not a lover. Earlier we saw an example from the Shishou xinyu where an individual was laughed at for his excessive devotion to his wife. In "Diao Wei Wudi wen", Lu Ji (261–303) writes, "As for entangling one's emotions on extraneous objects or setting one's thoughts on women (gui fang), these are things that a wise and outstanding man had best avoid." In a Confucian world, feelings for the opposite sex were sublimated. It is not that women were necessarily seen as "evil." Rather, having little place in moral and philosophical realms, they threatened to hinder a person from higher pursuits. One's "passion" should be for ruler and state, and very early there evolved the model of the wenren official assuming the role of lover with the ruler being the object of his devotion. Some of the most passionate poetry in the tradition – Qu Yuan's verse in Chu ci – is based on this idea. As Arthur Waley noted when discussing the "Li sao" (Encountering Sorrow), "In this poem, sex and politics are curiously interwoven, as we need not doubt they were in Chu Yuan's own mind. He affords a striking example of the way in which abnormal mentality imposes itself." In the West there occurred an interesting reversal of this notion. The rise of courtly love involved a kind of "feudalisation of love" in which man devoted himself to a lady in the way a vassal devoted himself to his lord.

It's revealing to contrast the Chinese position that, quote "a REAL man was not a lover" with the opposite convention coming out of 12th century Europe: "Here the truest lovers are now the best knights."[3]

This error of claiming romantic love as universal is akin to saying all four-legged animals are horses because horses have four legs. This kind of logic is relevant to hippophiles, but it isn't science……. even if horses do, in fact, have four legs. Same with romantic love – it needs to be differentiated from more generic love constructs and not blurred together.

C.S. Lewis rightly defined courtly & romantic love as "a feudalisation of love." Again, if there's no feudal template (eg. is absent in many other cultures' version of love), there's no romantic love. So-called research that omits this point is an attempt to universalize a novel social construct. The 'feudal factor' permeates the phenomenon of romantic love, and must be included as a guiding factor in any attempts at a cross-cultural study on love. However, this factor was omitted by Jankowiak & Fischer thus rendering their study useless if we consider that the Europe-derived model has become the dominant format in many cultures today; if we are going to use the exact phrase romantic love it deserves a more detailed description.

The kind of love that Jankowiak & Fischer do end up describing and then sampling in 166 cultures is more accurately phrased as pairbonding love, which does indeed exist in all cultures. To (mis)use the European phrase romantic love leads to confusion and their definition of this phrase is historically inaccurate; so I would recommend they, and all researchers who have followed them, consider making this terminology change.

The feudal metaphor is symbolised in this image of a man going down on one knee in a pledge of lifelong service to a woman considered elevated. This is a continuation of the commendation ceremony of the Middle Ages.

AVfM Classics: the myth of women's oppression

June 18, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Forty some odd years ago, feminists bellowed their way into mainstream attention, launching a major offensive on what they called a patriarchal system that had oppressed women for centuries. Painting women as downtrodden and powerless, they railed against men with the missionary zeal of abolitionists and with largely the same message. In short, women were slaves and men were their masters. They demanded liberation and have been making demands every since.

They did a magnificent job of pitching all this. That could be a testament to the inherent truth in their ideas. Or it might be something else, like the fact that they already had so much power that few were willing to question anything they said in the first place. You can put your money on the latter, because even a remotely objective examination of the facts leads to a far more reasonable conclusion. Women were never oppressed to begin with. Not even close.

I'm no historian, but I did attend some history classes before I finished middle school. So, by the time I was 13, I knew what oppression was. And lucky for me I was 13 in a time when people still knew what it wasn't.

Oppression has some pretty obvious tell tale signs. Like torture and death; like bullwhips and chains; gas chambers and death camps. Oppression is a roadmap of scars on the back of a field hand that was purchased at an auction. It is the rope that gets strung over a tree branch in broad daylight and used to choke the life out of someone convicted of being the wrong color.

It is an indelible stain on humanity, void of compassion, dehumanizing to both the oppressed and the oppressor. And the evidence of it is so offensive to modern sensibilities that we preserve proof of it as lessons for the coming generations.

Now, when we compare those things to the historical world of women, which was largely one of being protected and provided for, we get an entirely different picture. It is a portrait not of the oppressed, but of the privileged. And it begs a good many questions that need to be answered.

For instance, how many times in history did we have slaves with the first rights to a seat in the lifeboat? Which slave masters were compelled to go off to war to protect the lives of their slaves? How many oppressors tore their own bodies down with brutal labor so that they could provide food and shelter for those they oppressed?

Zero sounds like a good answer.

It also makes one wonder, or should, how many slave masters had to get on their knees before their prospective slaves, bearing gold and jewels to ask permission to be their master? How many slaves could say "no" and wait for a better deal?

How about another goose egg?

It’s not coincidental that feminists pointed to marriage as an oppressive institution. Pointing at nothing and making a lot of noise has worked pretty well for them. And so, in a collective fit of neurotic activism they attacked the one institution that had served as the source of more support and protection for women than any other in history. They became obsessed with depicting a walk down the wedding isle as the path to oppression; each woman’s personal Trail of Tears. You couldn’t buy this kind of crazy if you were Bill Gates.

“Hey!” some feminists are shrieking by now, “What about voting rights? Women were not allowed to vote! That’s oppression!” Well, no, it’s not. And all we need to do is look at the history of voting in America to prove it.

In the beginning, almost no one could vote. It was a right reserved for a few older white males who owned land, which left almost all men and a lot of other people out of the picture. This doesn’t say anything particularly special about women. So if this constituted oppression, then it meant that nearly everyone was oppressed. Maybe the early Americans didn’t catch on to that one because they were too busy celebrating their new found freedom.

Anyway, as time passed, because men of good values wrote an amazing constitution, voting rights were expanded to other groups. First to the men who didn‘t own land, then later to other ethnic groups, then still later to (white) women. Further down the road, black women and men were finally guaranteed the vote in 1965. Even further down the road the voting age was lowered bringing another large group of people into the fold. And today we are debating the voting rights of illegal aliens. Formerly oppressed hamsters may be next.

And we should consider that there was something of a tradeoff for women regarding the vote. Like exclusion from combat and men compelled to turn over the fruit of their labors and to die for them at the drop of a hat. Perhaps it wasn’t a fair tradeoff, mainly to the men. But proof of women’s oppression? Comedians pay for material that isn’t nearly this funny.

The same was true for owning land. Plenty of women weren’t allowed to…for a while, anyway. It probably had something to do with the fact that it was men who had to have land on which to build women homes, or perhaps they figured that men who were expected to face bullets in order to protect that land might be better, more deserving keepers of it. Who knows what insanity plagued us before feminism restored us to reason?

Whatever the reasons, those rules weren’t long lived. Besides, not being able to own land was pretty much softened by the fact that women could choose men to provide it for them through that oppressive institution of marriage, and the phallocentric, linear thinking alleged tyrants that they married.

I am old enough to remember well the older rules for men. Work hard and take care of your woman. Be prepared to lay down your life for her. Watch your mouth in the presence of a lady. Offer her your seat, even if she is a stranger. The same for opening doors and lighting smokes. Disrespect her and risk a beating. Touch her in the wrong way and you're a dead man.

This isn't the way oppressed people are treated. But we do have another word for those fortunate enough to benefit from these kinds of standards. Royalty. We didn't coin the term "princess" for women without a good reason.

With a few trivial exceptions, this has always been the gold standard for the treatment of women. The fact that this is beginning to change, that men are starting to put the brakes on doing a lot of things out of chivalry, is just another example of feminism shooting women in the foot. Accidents happen, especially self inflicted wounds, to people that play with guns when they don't know what they're doing.

Still, I have to hand it to feminists in their capacity to spin a wild yarn. Taking a privileged class of people and convincing the world that they were picked on was a masterful piece of skullduggery. But it was only successful because the mandate for men in western culture has always been to give women whatever they want without much question. Otherwise, the plethora of feminist ideas would have buckled under the oppressive weight of unchecked dishonesty.

Nonetheless, our unhealthy enabling of them set the stage for women to pass up men in every aspect of life. Women are now more educated than men and they also have most of the jobs. Nothing suggests this is going to do anything but favor women even more in the future. All that from an ideology that resides a house of cards that only remains standing because the wind itself has been scared out of blowing it down.

I would offer the feminists my kudos for shrewd work and a job well done, but winning a race is easy when you start with one foot already across the finish line, and everyone else pretends not to notice.

On Father's Day, Can We Please Stop Lecturing Dads?

June 19, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

The year-round war on masculinity becomes particularly acute near Father's Day, the lead-up to which is often filled (quite unlike for Mother's Day) with politically correct exhortations about what a father should and shouldn't be. In particular, we're told that traditional notions of dad as the provider, the disciplinarian, the roughhouser, and the law-giver are no longer relevant, and must be replaced by a more inclusive, feminine figure who spells off Mom, is in touch with his feelings, and pulls his weight at home. This version turns out to be not very inclusive—and often risibly incoherent.

Let's grant right off that not all fathers are alike. My dad, a somewhat shy and laconic man, never raised his voice in our house and left most decisions to my mom. At 5'8" and 155 lbs., he was hardly macho (though he was tough and stoic, a commercial fisherman who lost his brother to the sea). Some dads are more demonstrative than others, some more comfortable in the kitchen. Some, of course, aren't role models at all. But please, let's stop pretending that fathers are meant to be a watered-down version of mom, often a work-in progress needing coaching in their adjunct role. This is a rank untruth intended to emphasize that fathers, existing mainly to "support," are ultimately secondary and dispensable.

This year, we're being taught about the new and improved dad by Glenlivet, a maker of Scotch whisky that seems to have decided to follow in the footsteps of Gillette's "toxic masculinity" campaign from a few years back. A slick 4-minute video, "What Does it Mean to Be a Dad Today?" presents four father-son/father-daughter pairs. Each pair reads an (allegedly) AI-generated script about fatherhood that all agree is lame and "stereotypical." The script tells of a father who takes his son camping to teach him survival skills like building a fire with nothing but twigs and stones. The daughters are infuriated that the script assumed a male child and are contemptuous of the activities described. All scoff at a dad who wants to teach his son to handle himself in difficult situations.

As if on cue, one son opines that the AI script shows an “anxious” masculinity, one “trying to live up to what it means to be a man”—allegedly evidence of our culture’s paucity of good “inputs” about fathers. Everybody agrees that modern dads are a heck of a lot more various and relevant than the stereotype who takes his son fishing to toughen him up. The whole fake production—and I don’t believe for a minute that AI generated that script—is softer than Gillette’s attack ad, but no less doctrinaire.

What is the modern fatherhood the Glenlivet actors propose instead? That’s the problem. When asked to talk about what their dads have been to them, the opinionated group falls back on clichés. One of the daughters waxes rhapsodic that her dad’s rugged exterior hides a “marshmallow” inside; it’s affectionate, maybe, but not much of an endorsement. The other daughter praises her father for teaching her “empathy” and “self-confidence,” though in the production these look more like preening self-love.

The sons have even less to say about what their father has taught them. They certainly don’t mention any typically masculine attributes like pushing limits or resilience: nothing about how to impress an employer, stand up for themselves, or (please no!) win a fight, and no techniques for wooing girls either. They rely on inanities about how their fathers were “there for them.” One son pays tribute to his dad’s “positive masculinity,” which apparently means that he “doesn’t shy away from his feelings.” The general message is to deny anything distinctive in what men offer their children. Fathers are fine, the ad insists, but at best they replicate mom at a lower level.

Common-sense experience and published academic studies tell an entirely different story about dads, detailing, as in a 2016 clinical report by the American Academy of Pediatrics, how fathers’ “unique, dynamic” styles of play and distinctive interactions “decreased […] behavior problems and enhanced social competence” in their children. The report concludes that “fathers do not parent like mothers, nor are they a replacement for mothers.” A 2018 meta-study involving 37,000 participants confirmed that fathers raise children quite differently from mothers, helping children prepare for the realities of life through dads’ higher expectations, more realistic assessments, and more active monitoring of children’s behavior. “To be truly pro-child,” the researcher in charge of the study concluded “is to be pro-father.”

So why does our modern culture work so hard to convince us that the classic dad-ideal has outlived its usefulness? From radical feminist Kate Millett in Sexual Politics (1970) to contemporary family abolitionist Sophie Lewis, the revolutionary desire to smash gender roles and remake society requires the destruction of strong men and father-led families. Millett was clear that “The chief contribution of the family in patriarchy is the socialization of the young […] into patriarchal ideology’s attitudes” (p. 35). Contempt for fathers—and the demand that they cede authority to their wives and children—is a long-standing feature of such utopian projects and the corporate entities that now promote them.

In that sense, there's nothing new about the Glenlivet ad's father, and there have been worse portrayals in the past. Thirty years ago, on June 18, 1993, pundit and member of the (feminist) White Ribbon Campaign Michael Kaufman published an op/ed in the Toronto Star titled "From Patriarch to Caregiver: The rediscovery of fatherhood." At first, the article sounded themes similar to the Glenlivet ad, telling us that the distant father, devoted to his career, was at last being replaced by the involved father who took an equal role in "childcare and domestic responsibilities." Not enough fathers were yet doing their bit, but at least the ideal was being more widely promoted. What was coming, Kaufman insisted, was nothing less than "a revolution in what it means to be a father."

The rediscovery of fatherhood

From patriarch to caregiver

Then the article took a darker turn, scolding men for their failures. There were programs at workplaces to enable men to have paternity leave, but men didn't take advantage of them. Some men shirked their responsibility for birth-control or ignored child-support payments. Worst of all, "male violence" against women and the abuse of children were still "staggering problems." Though Kaufman assured readers that White Ribbon opposed all forms of violence (including "men's violence against men" and "the violence of adults against children"—no mention, significantly, of women as perpetrators), the decision to choose Father's Day spoke for itself.

"From Patriarch to Caregiver" was far less interested, it turned out, in childcare and domestic responsibilities than in recruiting men to become self-hating supporters of feminism. Kaufman lectured his male readers to "make sure this Father's Day, and the days ahead, are free of violence" and exhorted them "not to commit, condone, or remain silent about emotional or physical violence against women, as well as children or other men" (note the tell-tale other). Goaded into action by an alleged mass failure of masculinity, men were to confront their fellow men, shaming and castigating them.

That ending violence isn't a job for "marshmallows," for fathers indistinguishable from mothers, folding nappies and getting out the vacuum cleaner, never seems to bother the ideologues. Men are to be nurturing, soft, and empathetic, happy to wage war against dust bunnies and not afraid to cry in front of their sons—except when they're needed for the dangerous roles that nobody expects a mom to take on. Then they're to be as tough and aggressive as necessary to stop "male violence." Singled out for blame through the decades, they are also singled out to sacrifice even as the expectation of sacrifice is denied. It's an impossibly self-contradictory message, and it comes not from an outdated culture of "anxious" masculinity, but from deep within the feminist-compliant propaganda.

My dad, like most of his friends, was too busy providing for his family and volunteering in the community to give a damn about the shrill cries and smug condescension of feminist advocates, for whom he felt nothing but mystified contempt. The vast majority of dads already know that raising children requires all their tenderness and all their toughness. They already know what a heartbreaking, energizing burden it is, one that is rarely socially rewarded and too often, as we see above, demeaned or even excoriated. For divorced dads who've had to fight for years even to see their children, the dismissive jocularity and censoriousness have an added sting.

That's our culture today. Perhaps the Glenlivet executives who approved "What Does It Mean to be a Dad Today?" were confident that mocking traditional dads was far less risky than promoting a trans influencer or apologizing to women for sexist beer commercials, or even telling them their razor-stubble is toxic. Men are used to the insult by now, and it doesn't stop them from forging ahead on their own terms. It might stop them, though, from drinking Glenlivet.

Radical Red Stockings

June 20, 2023 | by Jim Doyle | Link | Original Link

Here's a remedy for some of the generalized feminism-bashing and accusations that feminists as a hive-mind are misandrist. Feminists quite correctly insist that there are many feminisms. It's a request for a little more attention to detail, and it's more than reasonable. So let's look at what is misandrist about radical feminism and see if that is foundational to any other kind of feminism, if other feminists use its terminology, formulations and theoretical assumptions.

When it comes to rebutting the accusation of misandry, counter-feminist and master of rhetorical discipline Fidelbogen has a simple solution – one can simply renounce and abjure the explicitly man-hating aspects of other people's feminism.

Let's see how wide and deep the distinction between radical feminists and other feminists really is. Let's focus on a early founding group. The Redstockings were a radical feminist group formed in New York in 1969. (There was also another independent Redstockings group in San Francisco.) The full text of the manifesto is below at the bottom of the post.

Can we agree that it is a fair statement of the radical feminist position?

If so, can we then also agree that the way to distinguish one's position and one's feminism from those angry man-hating radical feminists is to reject their misandrist positions?

And what are those misandrist positions? Let's lift them from the text of the Redstockings Manifesto[1] itself:

> 1. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives. We are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants, and cheap labor. We are considered inferior beings, whose only purpose is to enhance men's lives. Our humanity is denied.

By describing women's oppression and ignoring men's exactly identical oppression, this formulation erases it, and that is misandrist. That the value of men in this society is based solely on our utility to women is not only so general that it is easy to demonstrate, but also so general that it fades into the background and becomes invisible.

> 2. All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women….
> ….. We call on all men to give up their male privilege

Martha Nussbaum identified denial of autonomy as an indicator of objectification. Borgification of men and women into classes is both misandrist and misogynist. The notion of male privilege proceeds from this borgification of men and is inseparable from it.

> 3. To blame institutions implies that men and women are equally victimized, > obscures the fact that men benefit from the subordination of women, and gives men the excuse that they are forced to be oppressors.... We also reject the idea that women consent to or are to blame for their own oppression.

Here the manifesto denies that men are constrained by society and insists that women are. This is not only objectification of women in the form of inertia, the denial of agency, but it is a blatantly discriminatory double standard. The only discernible basis for this discrimination is that men are objects without rights or any claim to judgment under the same standard, rather than human beings.

> 4. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men.

The authority to change others is a claim of ownership. Martha Nussbaum identifies ownership as an indicator of objectification.

> 5. The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men.

Again, Martha Nussbaum identifies violability and denial of subjectivity as indicators of objectification. Denying that women can and do oppress men and boys, harming us in institutional and structural ways, is to excuse the violence and harm that women do men based on the violability of men. And when men come forward and recount how they have been harmed and continue to be harmed, any attempt to deny that or to silence them is a denial of subjectivity.

To summarize, here's a list of what is misandrist in the Redstockings Manifesto:

1. Objectification of men (and women) by means of reductionist class analysis.
2. Demonization of men as the oppressor class.
3. Denial of harms to men as merited to members of an oppressor class.
4. Double standards in analysis biased against men.

So the question is how often do we see this kind of terminolgy and discourse in non-radical feminst spaces, or hear it from one of the "That's Not My Feminism" feminists?

Fidelbogen drew up an oath of abjuration for feminists who did not want to be considered misandrist. I offer my own, which is more detailed. If a feminist doesn't care whether he or she is considered misandrist, that is fine, that is a personal choice. But it is their choice and they can accept the consequences of it.

Oath of Rejection of Misandry

1. I renounce and reject any analysis that objectifies or dehumanizes either men or women by crudely and reductionistically lumping them into classes and that denies their individuality or individual agency.

2. I therefore renounce and reject any analysis that identifies all men as oppressors and all women as victims, or that denies that men can be victims or that women can be oppressors, or that denies that these power differences can be based on gender roles alone.

3. I also renounce and reject formulations or slogans based on accusing men of being oppressors as a class such as “male privilege”, and “men can stop rape”, in the absence of female equivalents or formulations that include male victims on the same basis as female victims.

4. I renounce and reject gender-based discrimination. I reject analysis that uses false equivalencies to minimize harms to men, such as: equating rape of women to murder of men or insults to women’s faithfulness with paternity fraud against men; that seek to explain away harms to men as insignificant because they are done by other men; that seek to exculpate women for blaming men for the violence that women do to them or their children. I condemn any gender-based discrimination before the law, whether intentional or simply resulting in disparate impact – the female sentencing discount, gendered disparities in scholarships, institutional support groups or quality of instruction and educational outcomes in government-run education, disparities in the family court system resulting in disparate rates of child custody and disparate treatment of parental misconduct, and all other forms of governmental and institutional gender discrimination. I condemn gender-based infringements on due process and other Constitutional rights.

5. I renounce and reject the demonization of human sexuality, either as dangerous and creepy or as sluttish and dirty, or as perverted or unnatural. I reject notions such as “rape culture” and “male gaze”.

6. I renounce and reject any social or political project that treats one gender as morally inferior to another. I reject calls from women to “fix” men and attempts by women, or their male enablers, to define or decree what constitutes a “good man” a “real man” or masculinity.

So there’s the oath a feminist can take before witnesses to remove any doubt she or he is misandrist. Just swear off “male privilege”, “male gaze”, “rape culture” and all special pleading for either gender. It’s simple egalitarianism.

Notes:

[1] REDSTOCKINGS MANIFESTO[FULL TEXT]

I. After centuries of individual and preliminary political struggle, women are uniting to achieve their final liberation from male supremacy. Redstockings is dedicated to building this unity and winning our freedom.

II. Women are an oppressed class. Our oppression is total, affecting every facet of our lives. We are exploited as sex objects, breeders, domestic servants, and cheap labor. We are considered inferior beings, whose only purpose is to enhance men’s lives. Our humanity is denied. Our prescribed behavior is enforced by the threat of physical violence.

Because we have lived so intimately with our oppressors, in isolation from each other, we have been kept from seeing our personal suffering as a political condition. This creates the illusion that a woman’s relationship with her man is a matter of interplay between two unique personalities, and can be worked out individually. In reality, every such relationship is a class relationship, and the conflicts between individual men and women are political conflicts that can only be solved collectively.

III. We identify the agents of our oppression as men. Male supremacy is the oldest, most basic form of domination. All other forms of exploitation and oppression (racism, capitalism, imperialism, etc.) are extensions of male supremacy: men dominate women, a few men dominate the rest. All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force. They have used their power to keep women in an inferior position. All men receive economic, sexual, and psychological benefits from male supremacy. All men have oppressed women.

IV. Attempts have been made to shift the burden of responsibility from men to institutions or to women themselves. We condemn these arguments as evasions. Institutions alone do not oppress; they are merely tools of the oppressor. To blame institutions implies that men and women are equally victimized, obscures the fact that men benefit from the subordination of women, and gives men the excuse that they are forced to be oppressors. On the contrary, any man is free to renounce his superior position, provided that he is willing to be treated like a woman by other men.

We also reject the idea that women consent to or are to blame for their own oppression. Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men.

The most slanderous evasion of all is that women can oppress men. The basis for this illusion is the isolation of individual relationships from their political context and the tendency of men to see any legitimate challenge to their privileges as persecution.

V. We regard our personal experience, and our feelings about that experience, as the basis for an analysis of our common situation. We cannot rely on existing ideologies as they are all products of male supremacist culture. We question every generalization and accept none that are not confirmed by our experience.

Our chief task at present is to develop female class consciousness through sharing experience and publicly exposing the sexist foundation of all our institutions. Consciousness-raising is not "therapy," which implies the existence of individual solutions and falsely assumes that the male-female relationship is purely personal, but the only method by which we can ensure that our program for liberation is based on the concrete realities of our lives.

The first requirement for raising class consciousness is honesty, in private and in public, with ourselves and other women.

VI. We identify with all women. We define our best interest as that of the poorest, most brutally exploited woman.

We repudiate all economic, racial, educational or status privileges that divide us from other women. We are determined to recognize and eliminate any prejudices we may hold against other women.

We are committed to achieving internal democracy. We will do whatever is necessary to ensure that every woman in our movement has an equal chance to participate, assume responsibility, and develop her political potential.
VII. We call on all our sisters to unite with us in struggle.

We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own.

In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women.

The time for individual skirmishes has passed. This time we are going all the way.

Child Murder: It Must Be the Husbands Fault

June 20, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

"Ju know, they say eet was the hoosbands fault," announced the thirty something Mexican immigrant who was cutting my hair that day, two months before 9/11 changed the world. The big story of the moment was not about terrorists or toppled buildings, but about Andrea Yates, the Houston area mother of five that snuffed the life out of all of her children a mere half hour from where I live. And my stylist, using up every word of almost English in her repertoire, was attempting to 'splain to me how the whole mess could rightly be hung on the man.

"Oh, yeah?" I asked, unsurprised at the stupid remark, but too far into the haircut to get up and walk. "Who are they?" I was instantly pissed and made no effort to hide it.

She looked a bit nonplussed, then shrugged and said, "Somebody say eet on the noose." She sounded less self assured; feebly attempting to distance herself from the remark. Apparently, the language barrier didn't prevent her from picking up the tone in my voice.

I didn't bother trying to educate her. It was clear she had been in America for a short time, just long enough to learn how to cut hair and trash men in a second language, but she was already beyond redemption. The absence of a tip and my repeat business would have to serve as my first and last retort.

I am sure by now she can rattle off misandric invectives in impeccable English. After all, she has the entire western world for a classroom.

Canada made some additions to the lesson plan.

Ontario's Elaine Campione was really mad at her estranged husband, so she murdered their two daughters, Serena 3, and Sophia, 19 months, by drowning them both in the bathtub. It was reminiscent of the Yates case, only the attempts to issue this woman a pussy pass were significantly less veiled, and, so far, less successful.

In The Canadian Press's coverage of the trial, which resulted in two convictions for first degree murder, the first three words of the article were, "An abusive husband."

We can at least credit them for cutting to the chase. Before telling us about the crime, the accused, the verdict or the sentencing, The Canadian Press wanted to make sure that we knew who the guilty party really was. I mean, surely it wasn't the woman who held the heads of those two little girls under water till their tiny lungs filled with water and the life slipped from them forever. No, never. Not in Houston and not in Canada.

"You know, they say it was the husbands fault, eh!"

The judge in the case was apparently offended in equal proportion to The Canadian Press. Justice Alfred Stong was quoted as saying, after the verdict was read, "It is more than disconcerting to think that if Ms. Campione had not been so abused, so used and discarded as a person, her two daughters could still be alive."

There was, however, a peculiar reality that seemed to escape both reporters and Justice Stong. The "abuse" of Campione by her husband was only alleged. There was no proof offered the court that he ever laid a hand on her, not that it would have justified her actions if he used her for a daily punching bag. But that is a really big if. Unlike her killing her own children, the allegations about Mr. Campione amounted to nothing more than finger pointing by a murdering lunatic. The only proven abuse in the case at all was that of the murders, committed and admitted by the mother, who was diagnosed with Borderline Personality Traits. (Quick, call Dr. Palmatier, she'll be shocked to know a borderline did something evil.)

Unfortunately for the press and the Canadian legal system, the jury in the case annoyingly listened to the evidence and voted for a conviction in accordance with the law. Pesky thing, the law. One might think that Canada will do something about that as soon as possible. After all, how can that father, who didn't murder anyone, who wasn't even charged with a crime, just be allowed to walk free?

I mean, aside from his dead children, he is probably laughing it up right now.

Oh, were this the isolated case. But it is not.

It was pretty much the same with murdering Canadian mother Penny Boudreau, who strangled her daughter to death and half stripped her when dumping her body to make it look like a sex crime.

The headline from Mail Online?

'Mummy, don't': Woman kills her only daughter, 12, after boyfriend says, 'It's the child or me'

As far as going to disgusting levels in search of a pussy pass, this one takes the cake. Lots of people with step children or who date people with children come to stand off's in the relationship regarding the kids. Be careful what you say though, guys. If she kills them you are likely to end up in a headline with blood dripping from your name.

Your vilification will be a lot more important to the press, and perhaps even the courts, than in finding truth or justice.

It's one more reason to steer clear of single mothers.

But the more overarching problem here can be summed up in two words.

Dead children.

What we excuse, we enable. And what we enable, we get, in ever increasing amounts. When enabling women to excuse, rationalize, justify and shift blame, even over their most heinous acts, we will pay for it. Sometimes the dues are paltry. Sometimes payment comes in little caskets.

Read the news story on the Campione case. What you will find is a press and a judge doing everything in their power to coddle and pity a murderess. You will read statements by politicians pledging to investigate in the aftermath of this tragedy. There will be reports on the Canadian mental health system. There will be cries for even more attention and support for "abused" women, if that is even possible. There will be the expected and obligatory condemnations of abusive men.

And the kids will keep dying.

Until our justice system starts considering what this means, it should be impossible to listen to anyone in government who talks about "the best interest of the child," without laughing directly in their face.

Or perhaps spitting in it.

Much of the trial information, even as related in the highly biased Canadian news story, points to the distinct possibility that Campiones real motive for killing her children was because her husband was going after custody. He may well have been doing everything in his power to protect them from a mother with a history of presenting a danger to her children.

If so, he would appear to be the only person in Canada that ever had an interest in that at all.

Where was this man's help? Where is the outrage that he has lost his children? Where is anyone who even gives a shit?

We don't have time to give a shit. We are too busy babysitting and holding the hands that killed two innocent children.

And we are too busy pretending that we are actually doing something else.

They’re right, I DON’T understand feminism

June 22, 2023 | by Ron Collins | Link | Original Link

This is a republication of an article published when Women Against Feminism was being widely discussed on Twitter –Ed.

For anyone following the #womenagainstfeminism hashtag on Twitter, or the other online venues where this is trending, one will readily observe just how often the charge is made (or is it a defense?) that WAF and friends simply “don’t understand” feminism.

Actually, I think they’re right. After a lifetime of being told, going back to the 1960s, that my kind (the dreaded White Man) were responsible for pretty much everything bad that ever happened to anyone else not like us, I decided to check it out myself.

I read Brownmiller, Ehrenreich, Friedan, and Caldicott, to name but a few. I hung out with, worked with, listened to, and attended public events with self-identifying feminists for years. I saw women in the 1980s wearing running shoes to work, to “Take Back the Night,” and went on to wonder if they had, as heels got higher and higher until anatomically self-immolating footwear had become the new symbol of “empowerment.”

I married a feminist with a feminist mother. I watched my more intellectual, urbane male friends, one after another, go from being interesting, funny, and spontaneous young men to being diaper-bag-toting stepnfetchits who could barely begin a sentence without the words “Let me check with …”. I worked with redneck manly men whose wives actually (wait for it) MADE THEM SANDWICHES, and who also in absolute seriousness called the little lady The Boss and meant it.

And all this time, in college towns and tourist towns, as well as cow towns, I kept thinking that, sooner or later, I would run into this Patriarchy that had all these gals stirred up. Ol’ Pat must have done something REAL bad to these women, ’cause they just never seemed to stop looking for him behind every corner and in every action, thought, attitude, or perceived slight on the part of men.

And still, I guess I just didn’t “understand” feminism, hard as I’d tried. I remember the first time I got wind that things were changing between guys and gals when at about age nine or ten, still in the bygone era of “full-service” gas stations, I saw my first woman out pumping gas, checking oil, and wiping windshields. Soon after that I started hearing about new roles assigned to men, such as attending childbirths, being emotionally available, involving ourselves more with children, and being more understanding of women’s health. I added two and two and figured, Not such a bad trade: men do more stuff women do, and women do more stuff men do. I can work with that, I was thinking as I prepared for manhood.

In the early 1980s I worked with women and men both, on a fire crew and in livery stables where I spent some summers, and it seemed okay. I kinda overlooked how the men would do all the heavy lifting, and never thought once about the inequity of my spending three days picking swollen ticks off horses’ bellies to drown them in diesel while three girls would wander by and say, “Ey-ewww, that is SO gross …” or the all-day rides I would guide while the ladies took all the cushy one- and two-hour ones that had them home for lunch.

When I entered residential homebuilding I just assumed there would be women coming along. (Cue crickets.) I saw a grand total of ONE female electrician, which is a high-paying profession with almost endless employability requiring only on-the-job training, and ONE lady carpenter, who prided herself on her volunteer work at the women’s shelter and had no issues with my carrying her materials for her (but a lot of issues with being a real carpenter, sorry to say). And that’s it, in more than 35 years in the trades. Women were never discriminated against or excluded, they just never showed up at all.

Meanwhile, my son was abducted by his mother in a long-planned action scripted by her mother with the MSW and a new law called the “Violence Against Women Act” that she and her colleagues used to crucify me in court without evidence; I experienced repeated instances of police officers going on alert in courthouses when the tone of my (male) voice became suspect while one woman expert after another were scarlet-lettering me with their guesswork and their social theories; one male judge, lawyer, or police officer after another submissively awaiting a female diagnosis of my disturbing maleness before deciding what to do with me or whether I could be unsupervised with my son (all of this with no evidence whatever being presented at any point).

Then years after this kangaroo-court farce I began to look back into gender politics issues. I found women demanding seats on corporate boards that they had not earned, women accusing men of domestic violence without ever being troubled to prove anything had happened to them at all, women who were the electoral majority in one election after another castigating me and all men over why “they haven’t elected a female president,” women being astonishingly rude, dismissive, crass, and vulgar toward male coworkers in non-construction workplaces where I worked at various times, women dominating every aspect of what was supposed to be a dialogue about “gender” and openly guffawing at the idea that any man had anything to contribute to the discourse …

Women being shamelessly passive-aggressive toward their spouses and boyfriends, openly rude in public places, defiantly fraudulent toward programs and benefits they applied for, matronizingly dismissive of the very concept of male grievance, THIS is what I think of when I think about “feminism.” And feminism has been such an apparent success that a woman now doesn’t have to know half of what I know about feminist theory or history to get away with plain rude and hurtful behavior whenever she decides to indulge in them.

So, the bashers of #womenagainstfeminism are right on the mark: try as I have, flexible as I’ve been on the idea, hard as I’ve worked (I even enrolled in “Gender Studies 101” at a community college once in the late 1980s, which I and two other men were basically badgered by students and instructor alike into dropping after the first day) …

No, I don’t understand feminism. Not at all. I understand what it might have been, what is was marketed as being, what some adherents believed it was supposed to be.

But what feminism’s actions and results have shown, as a popular philosophy or as a policymaking doctrine?

Guilty as charged: I absolutely do not understand.

‘Biological Gynocentrism’ : Falling Into The Feminist Trap?

June 26, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Lester F. Ward (1841-1913), a scholar of biological and sociological disciplines, was a passionate advocate for first wave feminism and “women’s liberation.” Just like today’s difference feminists he spoke about biological differences between the sexes, and theorized that women were the more superior sex due to evolutionary and reproductive value.

Sound familiar? It should, the same gynocentrism theory is promoted in the manosphere.

Ward is celebrated as a pioneering male feminist by historian Ann Taylor Allen,[1] and Michael Kimmel classifies him as a feminist sociologist.[2] And its not only today’s feminists who celebrate his theory: All three waves championed his, or similar gynocentric theories as a triumph of scientific truth and of women’s deserved special treatment.

Protestors may say that feminists have never believed in biology, that they’ve always championed the blank slate theory. Feminists, however, have consistently proven to be opportunists who sometimes deny biology, and then very often appeal to it. For example feminists love to bring attention to biological facts like women’s vulnerability due to smaller size, pregnancy, lactation, menstruation, etc. – not to mention many of the first feminists championed biological gynocentrism (actually using that word) as an appeal for men to pedestalize them.

Lester Ward delivered his famous “Gynæcocentrism Theory” speech to an enthusiastic group of 1st wave feminists in the year 1888 – including Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Phoebe Couzins, and many others well known.[3] The title of the speech was Our Better Halves, and consisted of an elaborate claim that women were biologically superior to males due to their evolutionary and reproductive roles, and thus women were more important than males who were described as mere helpers in the evolutionary scheme. First wave feminist Charlotte Perkins-Gilman (1860 – 1935) claimed that Ward’s theory of gynocentrism was the most important contribution to ‘the woman question’ ever made.[4,5] Commenting on Ward’s theory to doubters, Gilman wrote “You’ll have to swallow it. The female is the race type; the male is her assistant. It is established beyond peradventure.”[6] While continuing to laud Ward’s gynocentrism theory as a brilliant contribution, she expanded on it by suggesting that women were more evolutionarily advanced than men, and that women were continuing to advance at a faster rate than men.[5]

In his 1903 book Pure Sociology,[7] Ward published a more lengthy chapter explaining his gynæcocentric theory. His theory travelled around the world and fomented feverish debates, as can be seen from this sample of articles published at the time:

- – ‘Gynæcocentricity’ Poem from the London Punch (1903)

- – The Evolution of Sex According to Lester F. Ward (1909)
- – The Future of Women – by D. M. N. (1909)
- – Ernest B. Bax Responds to Lester Ward's 'Gynocentric Theory' (1909)
- – "The Evolution of Sex" – A Protest Against Ward's Gynæcocentric Theory (1909)
- – The Book of Women's Power – edited by Ida M. Tarbell (1911)
- – Woman and Gynæcocentric Social Progress – by S. Nearing (1912)
- – Ernest B. Bax: Examines Lester Ward's 'Gynœcocentric Theory' Fallacy (1913)
- – Some Biological Aspects of Feminism – by R.E. Ryan (1914)
- – Race Motherhood: Is Woman The Original Human Race? – by D. Montefiore (1920)
- – Book Review of D. Montefiore's 'Race Motherhood' by D. M. N (1920)
- – 'Gynocentric Theory' in Colleges and Popular Culture, by M. M. Knight et.al (1920)
- – The Lure of Superiority: 'Gynæcocentric Feminism' by W.F. Vaughan (1928)

After pinning down the origin of this theory, a question arises; Do we really want to keep promoting these feminist-inspired theories today? Whatever the merits of Ward's biological basis for gynocentrism (well there's no merit, actually), it has since flourished both in feminist circles and, sometimes, in men's activist conceptions of the way human evolution works: we are a hopelessly gynocentric species and we need to get used to it.

Feminists probably like this 135 year old narrative, and they of course have led the way to its institutionalization in the canon of modern ideas. From my observations, those most invested in a gynocentric lifestyle, whether they be men or women, are likely to be the strongest champions of this pseudo-theory today.

For anyone wanting to check the scientific veracity of biological-gynocentrism theories, I can think of no better corpus than that of Peter Ryan; a researcher educated in molecular biology who has debunked all of the usual "scientific" appeals to gynocentrism as amounting to pseudoscience. You can read his article on Ward's gynocentrism theory here, and his entire series of articles here.

While human relationships and the wider culture can indeed be tilted in a gynocentric direction, this need not be understood as a necessary evolutionary norm. The gynocentrism we witness today can be understood as a maladaptive behaviour resulting from novel cultural forces playing on our biological potentials. Those novel forces act in a similar way to a cellphone in a plane which is why we switch phones to flight mode – nobody wants a corrupted flight program nor any of the novel reactions that would come with it. The plane is definitely not programmed to do spinning cartwheels due to someone's cellphone interfering, but the existing program has potential to be corrupted to produce that outcome. So likewise, the claim that gynocentrism is hardwired in us as a "natural instinct" may be better understood as a corrupting set of forces playing on our biological mechanisms to generate pathological, maladaptive reactions.

This problem has been succinctly summarized by Hanna Wallen's concept of the 'Natural Gynocentrism Fallacy,' which refers to the belief that sexually mature women are the most important unit within the human species due to the role they play in reproduction – ie. it is a belief in which women are assumed to be more valuable to human society, and to human relationships, than are men, children and even the perpetuation of one's genes. A corollary assumption is that women's lives and wants should be prioritized over those of men and children.

The natural gynocentrism fallacy, according to Wallen, involves a denial of the fact that all adult humans, including women, are child-centric, gene-centric, and utilitarian toward that end. Thus the hypothesis that humans are a 'gynocentric species' amounts to a denial of women's evolutionary value as an instrument of the child's creation and protection, i.e., not because her gender is valued per se outside this utilitarian function. Wallen summarizes that gynocentrism is not a naturally occurring phenomenon, is not inevitable, and is something that can be corrected. She states that historical gynocentric attitudes that have been treated as "natural," and thus as the reason why gynocentrism could never be eliminated, are false.

With the knowledge that biological theories of gynocentrism began with first wave feminists, this should at least prompt us to review the assumptions we've picked up regarding humans being a gynocentric species. We can at least question the validity of this longstanding feminist dogma, no matter which side of the equation we ultimately fall.

A Blue Pill Story

June 28, 2023 | by Christian Chiasson | Link | Original Link

Our story begins with a young man in his teens. His sexual desires are just beginning to bloom as he enters biological manhood. He confuses this with a desire to be publicly pair bonded with a young woman because all of his life up to this point he's been told to be a nice guy, to respect girls and to treat them nice. And so he does. He's been so deeply indoctrinated with the idea that mistreating girls, and only girls, comes with a punishment far worse than that of murder, and the idea that viewing women from a sexual viewpoint is wrong no matter what the situation. He is completely unprepared for what awaits him.

Our young man is in the 10th grade. He has several dating prospects around him. Day in and day out he hangs out with young women his age, trying to be noticed as more than just another teenage boy in school. He wants to be seen as a sexual being, as worthy of female attention. He develops a more mature sense of humour, he studies hard because he wants to match women intellectually, he wears all of his best clothes, his best pair of shoes, he engages these young women in thought-provoking conversation. He does all this because he's been told this is how to attract women. Little does he know he's been lied to.

Fast forward 5 months, about half way through the school year. He's been unsuccessful in securing a mate. He begins to become confused, but doesn't question the instructions he's been given. He presses on with the unfounded belief that soon he will succeed.

Fast forward once again to the beginning of 11th grade. He was not successful the previous year and he walks in with what appears to be a new-found sense of confidence, despite him actually being more confused now than he ever was. He is still not questioning the validity of the instructions given to him since birth. A small pinch of desperation begins to set in as he tells himself "This is the year. I will succeed". He, of course, is lying to himself.

2 months, 4 months, 8 months in and no success. He struggles to keep the desperation and depression hidden. He begins to question himself. Maybe he isn't worthy. Maybe he's not good enough. He questions himself, but still will not question the instructions he was given. He calls himself a male feminist, a true blue pill teenager. He tries to appeal to women by expressing his belief that they are more than he is. He accepts the lie that is transference of guilt. He accepts the lie that marriage and the nuclear family were forms of oppression, rather than a necessity for survival. He accepts the lie that men working in a coal mine for 14 hours a day, breathing in coal dust, was a privilege rather than a responsibility and a sacrifice. He truly believes this. It isn't just a tactic to appeal to women. He truly, and wholeheartedly believes he is less than a woman. He is still unsuccessful and depression takes hold by the end of the school year.

The following year, grade 12, he walks in with his head hanging low. He's given up. He is 17, going on 18 in a few short months. He decides he will finish school, go to college, and start his career before trying to find love again.

This is foiled by the fact that when he was 4, he was struck by a taxi cab, operated by a young 16-year-old who stole it from his father in order to make some cash for the weekend. The result of this event was 1 night in the hospital and a small 8,000 dollar settlement, placed in a trust fund, which would accrue interest until he turned 18 when it would be turned over into his possession. He continues with his life at school for the next few months, patiently awaiting his 18th birthday. He plans to spoil himself a little bit in the hopes that material possessions will cure his depression. He has no idea how naive he is.

Winter holiday comes quickly, and he has 2 weeks off school. He is expected to be back to school shortly before his 18th birthday but he plans the day off anyways. He's eyeing a brand new laptop and MP3 player, and with the trust fund soon to be his, he can afford it. But little does he know that something is about to happen that will confuse him more than any of his failings with women.

The day he turns 18, he makes his way to the bank to find just over 16,000 dollars has been turned over into his bank account. A smile appears on his face as he takes his access card back and buses to the nearest future shop. He's going to buy that laptop right away. He's always had an interest in computer technologies and finally he will have one of his own to tinker with. His hope is to get into IT, and he's been teaching himself about computers since he was 11. He's familiar with the inner workings of a desktop by this point, even doing his co-op education program at the IT department for the local University. He shows great promise in the field, and with an IQ of 141, he is quite good as solving issues accurately and timely. He just needs experience with the smaller and more compact laptop technologies.

The following day he shows up to school sporting his brand new laptop at his side. He has plans to type his school notes, rather than hand write them, from that point forward. This catches the attention of the young women at school, and immediately they know he has money. He tells them about the taxi cab and the trust fund, and that he had received it the previous day.

From this point women seem to flock to him but he is still far too naive at this point to put 2 and 2 together. He doesn't know they want his money, and he doesn't really question it despite being unable to find anything else about him that has changed to make him more appealing to the opposite sex. He simply accepts his new-found appeal and presses on.

Over the next few months he has a few short relationships, but none of them lead to anything physical beyond hand holding and cheek kissing. He is 18 years old and still a virgin. A secret he tries hard to keep as the idea of a male being 18 and still a virgin is shameful to him. He does not want anyone to know but he doesn't know how to approach the topic either. He's under the impression that the very mention of sex turns women off and he's afraid of losing the little bit of female attention he has. That is until he meets a young woman in a nearby city.

They both begin dating and she challenges everything he's learned up to this point. She initiates sex on the first date. He initially lies to her about his sexual past, or lack of one to be accurate, and tells her he isn't a virgin. He doesn't go big with the lie though. He tells her he has had a few encounters but nothing to brag about. The relationship lasts until his trust fund dries up and he is still too naive to realize where his sudden appeal came from. 18, broke and again single he seeks other relationships locally. He finds none and will remain single until he is 22.

By this time he's regretting how he frivolously spent his entire trust fund on others instead of investing. Women became a distraction and as a result his grades plummeted and he could no longer get into any good University or College. His choices were to repeat the 12th grade, or acquire his GED and enter the workforce. With increasing pressure from his parents he chose the latter.

He began working for a call centre company that handles tech support for the Xbox 360 console and Xbox live service. Making only minimum wage, but punching in enough overtime, he was able to make enough money to move out into his own place, with a roommate of course. His roommate was a coworker who had been falsely accused of rape. He signed off as a surety to get him out of jail but at this point he is still too blue pill to know that false rape accusations occur any more than 2% of the time. He signs reluctantly, partially believing the accusation is actually genuine. The 10 months living with his coworker quickly become toxic as the belief that the accusation is genuine starts to creep into the forefront of his mind. He starts believing he's helping a rapist escape punishment and this begins to eat away at his conscience.

During this time a new tenant moves into the apartment upstairs. A very attractive, independent woman who catches our young man's eye. They begin talking and things begin to evolve. She tells him about her abusive ex boyfriend and he quickly develops a sense of empathy and compassion for her. He feels bad that she was treated this way. The relationship only lasts a few months when he finds out she cheated on him with the very same ex she claimed was abusive. Shortly after she leaves our young man and gets back with her ex.

After 10 months, the trial was over and his coworker, and roommate, has been found guilty. His mind spirals into a state of guilt as he believes he has betrayed the very women he was raised to protect. The fact that the evidence for the guilty verdict was flaky or non-existent does nothing to diminish this state of mind. Within days he quickly pulls surety and sends his roommate back to jail before the sentencing date. His roommate is forced to get his new girlfriend to sign. Our young man moves back in with his parents and carries with him a feeling that he's failed and betrayed women everywhere. He does not feel like a man.

As the years pass, our young man tries desperately to figure out why he has such bad luck with women. He's a nice guy. He's compassionate, he's empathetic, he carries a torch for women's rights and he defers to the women around him for direction. He's completely unaware that the very women he defers to see him as a directionless loser.

He believes he’s doing the right thing, but is completely unaware that his unmasculine, feminine, behaviour is self sabotaging.

4 years pass before he meets who he believes in the woman of his dreams. He falls head over heels in love quickly. They begin a relationship and initially things are amazing. He’s never been so happy. She’s the perfect woman, and the very sight of her face lights his heart on fire. Her touch sends him into a state of bliss. He just wants to be around her. A few months pass and he begins to notice she is spending less and less time with him. Not just that but often also forgetting plans they make together. He finds himself going to her place to do nothing more than dog sit while she goes out with friends. The depression begins to develop as the idea that he’s simply being used as a means for her to neglect her responsibilities. He is still far too naive to accept this truth, but begins expressing annoyance and frustration. They begin fighting and he tries tirelessly to shift the blame on anything but her. She can’t be using him. She’s perfect and he loves her. He is completely blind.

He goes over to her place one day, as they have plans, but once again finds she “forgot” about them. He spends the entire day, and most of the night alone in her apartment as she spends her time partying and getting drunk. He goes to bed, only to be woken up at about 2 in the morning to a heavily intoxicated and angry girlfriend. She screams at him, kicks him out of her apartment, and pushes her deep freezer up against the door. He returns home for the night.

The next day he returns to find the door has been blocked by the deep freezer, but the door isn’t locked. He manages to push his way into the apartment. She is on the couch, still passed out and a plate of food has been knocked over onto the carpet. The dog was not taken out, and as a result defecated and urinated on the floor. He waits patiently for her to wake up.

When she finally regains consciousness she finds him sitting opposite to her, the food on the carpet, the deep freezer out-of-place and the shit and piss on the floor. She asks our young man what happened, and he tells her with tears beginning to stream down his face. The events of the night before, coupled with the events of his past have left such a scar that he cannot hide it any longer. He’s breaking, and the cracks can’t be contained much longer.

She apologizes profusely and explains this is a pattern of hers. This isn’t the first time she’s done this and our young man is not her first victim. He accepts her apology on the condition that she begin attending AA meetings. She agrees.

They call for local AA meeting times and decide the next day, a Wednesday, would be a good time to start. He goes with her, right at her side, to show support. Little did he know that she was not taking this seriously.

The following week, when she was supposed to go to her second meeting, she skipped out. A week later, she skipped out again. She wasn’t hiding her inability to take responsibility very well, but he was still very much blind to it.

During the next few months he continued to shift blame on anything and anyone but her until they decided to move in together. They found a place across town, a new neighbourhood and to him a new beginning. Things were good for a week. She began exhibiting the same behaviour as before, but she grew in toxicity. She began blaming her toxic behaviour and neglect on him. Several times removing his keys for days, or weeks, at a time so he could not go anywhere. He was 26, and his girlfriend was essentially grounding him for her own behaviour.

What's more is that she began demanding that he not talk to family or friends about certain things. Any breach of this resulted in her threatening to end the relationship, and again grounding him by relinquishing his keys. She also began controlling his finances. Where he couldn't spend a dime on himself, she would shop all day. Buying useless items that most of the time remained unopened and unused for weeks or sometimes months.

Soon she met another man and was spending large amounts of time with him. Our young man wouldn't dare tell her not to spend time with this other man but soon things got to be too much. She began making plans with our young man, only to cancel them because the other man wanted to hang out. It got to the point where she would make plans with our young man, only to call the other man on the phone just minutes after and make plans with him instead, right in front of our young man. He was beginning to feel unwanted. He tried incredibly hard to find ways to bring back the feelings they shared in the early days of the relationship, but failed time and time.

She began to intentionally try to frustrate and anger our young man each week, to the point where he felt he had to leave for the weekends, freeing up hers. While he was recovering from the week before, she was partying and enjoying herself.

It all came to blows one day when our young man finally reached his breaking point. Almost a decade of lies, betrayal, and selfish, toxic women had finally broken what little spirit he had left.

One morning, 14 months into the relationship, the man and his psychologically abusive spouse made plans to spend the day together. It was one last chance for the woman to prove she actually cared about him. After a quick lunch at the coffee shop, and a trip to the nearby grocery store, he discovered that one of the woman's friends had been waiting outside for the couple to return home. During the walk home the man listened in as their plans were once again, and for the final time, cancelled. He realized she cared nothing for him and was simply looking for excuses to spend as little time as possible. He walked ahead, quickly, and left the two women to walk back alone.

When she and her friend returned, she found our young man on the balcony having a cigarette and trying to calm down before deciding how to deal with his new-found epiphany. She opened the door, and began interrogating him. As calmly as he could, he told her that he knew their plans are shot, that she was going to spend the day with her friend instead and that they would talk about it when she returned. The woman's friend spoke up, telling the man not to talk to her that way. Not to be disrespected in a place that he calls home, he bluntly told the friend to shut the fuck and stay out of it. An argument ensued when the friend told the man she thinks he should move out.

The man asked the friend multiple times to leave his home, but she refused. He exercised his right and forcefully removed her from the apartment. The argument between the couple continued, until she told him that he had fucked up worse than ever before. She relinquished his keys, went to her friend's house and they both called the police. The man was arrested under a false domestic abuse allegation and removed from the home.

He had experienced first hand how easy it is for a false accusation to be treated as genuine, if the accuser is a woman. And how easy it is for a woman to make a false accusation without guilt for what she puts another person through.

On that day, an MRA was born.

Our young man now thinks back to his former roommate, and he was falsely accused. He is filled with guilt once again, but this time for betraying his friend. He knows he doesn't deserve forgiveness, but he hopes his friend can forgive him someday.

Our young man is forever changed. His eyes wide open to the truth. A giant red pill shoved down his throat in the form of his own false accusation story. He's become the uncaring jerk he always tried so hard not to be. He is shamed by women for becoming the very thing those women molded him into through his experiences with them. Yet he feels no shame at all. Not anymore. He is reborn, living for himself, defining himself and rejecting any and all external definitions of himself.

Once a blue pill beta, now forever a red pill zeta.

A note from my future: Thanks for the meme-ories

Things are bad, brothers.

The war drags on, digital and analog. My daily upgrades have been blocked for a month now on the basis of my "insufficient commitment to gynocentrism", so I'm not sure how much time I have left to get this message out, so here goes…

Although I am an old man now and badly in need of an upgrade and reboot, I still remember back in the early twenty-teens when, regardless of your sympathies in gender-based conflicts, entering the gender war meant that one was treated to an alphabetic stew of terms like MRM, MHRM, TWRA, PIV, CAMAB, CAFAB, MGTOW, Blue/Purple/Red Piller, Alpha/Beta/Omega/Zeta man/woman, Mangina, Mansplainer, White Knight, Trigger Warning, Rape Apologist, Gender Feminist, Gender Queer…if you know all these buzzwords, then congratulations, my brothers, this article is for you, AND, you know a lot more than I do even now, so many decades later.

Using a time machine of my own poor construction (which has damaged both my verbal skills and my grasp on reality), I have managed leap forward (backward?) and obtain the merest glimpse into the upcoming long-past terminology of this war, and from the tiny shreds I salvaged, I've compiled a few of the relevant future (past? crap, language wasn't built to handle this time flux I'm caught up in) terms and definitions and I'm trying to share this knowledge with you, my beloved younger brothers, before innate temporal paradoxes and feminist droogies ban my dying electronic brains from mAk!g co7ernt w0rs…

Ma'amsplaining – explanations and rhetoric from TWRA's (traditional women's rights activists) detailing why both feminists and men's right's activists suck: because women are entitled to lives of luxury at the expense of both male service and male disposability. Example: "Woman, from birth, are entitled to a man's deference and servitude."

Ma'ambo – After "Limbo", the storage area for censored speech and related data that is considered to be insufficiently worshipful of women.

Mizsplaining – also, Ms Splaining: unoriginal and widespread feminist talking points (such as "wage gap", "rape culture", "patriarchy", "1 in 4", "gendered domestic violence", etc.) that, despite being throughly debunked and ignorant of the massive sacrifices of men's lives necessary to sustain such brutal lies, have become so entrenched that MHRA regulars have to spend their scant remaining resources repeatedly re-debunking them.

Min – after the term "rapesticks" fell into disfavor, feminists changed the terms "Man" and "Men" into "Min" and "Minz", respectively, but not respectfully. This reduced the cumbersome "trigger warnings" to more minigible levels. I still have trouble with these, which is why my upgrades are still in ma'ambo.

Vaginohedonic – also, Vagodonic, the sexual ideology that all vaginally-related sexual pleasure and activities are morally and legally acceptable (including the rape of underage girls by feminists) only whenever feminists decree that they are, and then, only for women, and only if the women don't change their minds at any point ex post facto. Example: "Heather's vaginohedonic bliss with Raoul was dispelled the next day when she discovered lifts in his shoes, and so enraged, she filed rape-by-deception charges against him 30 months after he dumped her."

Femitheist – any feminist who seeks a massive, worldwide, act of Goddess slaughter of men, often while denying that she is, in fact, a feminist.

Victim Cred – the ultimately self-defeating power and influence that women (and rarely, men) gain from publicizing, exaggerating and even cynically manufacturing their status as aggrieved victims of some real or imagined slight. Whereas real victims seek to overcome and grow beyond their temporary plight, the victim cred set become voluntarily mired in their victim narrative in perpetuity.

Slutspamming – the process of annoying society and promoting the power-grabbing through victimization by organizing massive rallies of scantily clad women to protest against men who seek to protect said women from being raped.

Grape-rape – using a bout of consensual drunken sex to extort a monetary benefit from a privileged man. Example: "Score! Not only did Jessica enjoy having drunken sex with David, but later that week she grape-raped him for a cool 200 grand."

Anti-tokenism – resistance from feminism to the successful advancement of feminists into positions of power, under the theory that such advancements undermine the victim cred of other feminists. The near defeat of President Rodham in the elections of 2016 was credited to anti-tokenism.

Challengaging – a derisive term for the process wherein some people (men, predominantly) grow in strength and competence through engaging in open conflicts, whereas others (woman, predominantly) are deeply emotionally damaged by the expectation that they prove themselves worthy of further advancement by engaging in the same tests of character as men are expected to do.

AtheismPuss – see also Tokyo Rose, Benedict Arnold, Judas, Rebecca Watson– the short-lived effort in the early decades of the 21st century by feminists to destroy the otherwise rapidly growing, loosely knit groups espousing rationalism, skepticism, agnosticism, and atheism, by imposing the ideological doctrines of feminism and victim cred on a largely oblivious but still keenly intellectual, anti-supernatural cohort. The infighting and starvation that drove AtheismPuss to extinction are still studied as models of other primate extinctions, of which the decline of the Neandertals is the most noteworthy.

The VAWAnkers Rebellion – a violent slave revolt of 2028 wherein the incarcerated 38% of the male college-age population ~~reBE!!!~~d JOSFSOFPs…

Damn – the time machine is overheating, blushing and oozing feminist ejaculate. I'll try to repair it as time and my failing health permits, and if interest in these revelations warrants such efforts.

Until our liberation sets us all free, I remain your humble mgtowai, lost in time.

The argument for a principled approach

July 1, 2023 | by James Huff | Link | Original Link

There are some questions that lie ahead of us that may seem easy to answer at first, but we need to understand the implications of everything we have done so far and what it has already spelled out for our future. Turning this behemoth of misandrist culture around is not going to be easy, I dare say not even possible without the type of wanton destruction it will cause itself as it collapses under its own weight. The fact of the matter is that every culture in every time has depended on the idea of male disposability for the "greater good"… and that "greater good" has often destroyed itself in the process of demanding too much from the individual to sustain the greater whole. It is a cyclical event, and the rise and fall of nation-states, or, at least, the bloody and horrific revolutions that occasionally visit them happen with such regularity that we barely bat an eyelid anymore.

The fact that these cyclical events can be evidenced over a period of 5000 years of human history does not mean that our futures have to remain so however. Within the Men's Right's Movement, I recognize the seeds of something far greater than anything that has come previously. I see a New Renaissance, a revitalization of individual freedoms and liberties, an unshackling of the chains of the destructive cycles of humanity, and the movement of humans toward a New Age.

Do not take the above paragraph for the idea that I envision some Utopian world. I see something far from it. Our struggles define who we are, but the question remains whether or not we should be struggling with ourselves, or with new innovations and becoming masters of the universe around us. I see all the wasted effort of hundreds of millions of lives in a struggle to control groups of humans, most of whom simply want peaceful lives for their loved ones. I am talking about changing the scope of our struggle from the predominantly Human Vs. the human paradigm we now have to a new one: Human vs. Environment.

"James, you are jumping the gun on this!"… and yes, I know that I am, and have done so with a purpose. The artist unveils the painting before explaining the creative process that brought him to it and the meaning behind it. It is the "What the fuck is that?" moment when looking at the canvas that unlocks something in the human psyche, and the artist can then explain the meaning as clear as fresh air.

Now pay attention to this next part.

Most humans are blinded by all the extraneous thought placed within political group-think. The moral questions of the day are framed in simple matters of right and wrong when dealing with the individual but seem ever so complicated when applied to the needs of a group of people, or how one group of people interact with another group of people. We get bogged down in old prejudice, financial matters, and resource allocation and everyone wants a slice of whatever is being served up next from their political masters.

Group W supports Politician X because they get Product D, never mind that Group M was forced at the point of a gun to give up their Product D by Politician X. Besides, that Group M has plenty of Product D, and not sharing it – never mind they were actually robbed of it – would be morally reprehensible. This type of thing happens every day, all day, seven days a week, 365 days a year.

Meanwhile, all those from Group M see that all their Product D is being "liberated" – I mean taken– from them so they naturally say "Why the fuck should we produce any more Product D if the guys holding all the guns are just going to take it from us and give it to a Group W, who can get it themselves. If they want it that bad, then they should get it on their own merit." This inevitably leads to bad feelings all around as Group W feels slighted because they have just been called lazy and have heard for years that having as much Product D as they want is a Right. Of course, they heard that from Politician X, who promises them as much Product D as they need – I mean want – as long as they support him.

Eventually some people in Group M feel as if they should be in Group W, and stop producing Product D. Some people in Group M don't want to be in Group W because they don't want to be seen as the lazy layabouts they think Group W is, so they form a new group called Group A and decide to produce Product R, which is intentionally of no value to Group W. This new product serves Group A's and Group M's purposes just fine. This pisses off Group W, who now get less Product D because there are not enough people making it, and they demand from Politician X that Group A be disbanded because the production of product R threatens their free access to Product D.

Meanwhile, those remaining in Group M feel disenfranchised by the whole affair and decrease the production of Product D even further to the point where they can only sustain themselves, keeping Group W from getting hardly any Product D at all! Some of Group W decide to get some Product D for themselves by working for it, but the majority of Group W have been told it is their Right to have Product D on demand so they stay within the group and threaten Politician X that if more Product D is not forthcoming, that Politician X will quickly find votes against him in favor of Politician B – who promises to not only make sure plenty of Product D is forthcoming but a New and Improved Product D+ as well!

Politician X, not wanting to sign books on the failure of his policies for the rest of his life forces Group A to disband on the threat of imprisonment or death and eventually tells everyone in Group M that if they do not begin producing Product D in surplus at once, and make some new and improved Product D+ as well, that he will be forced to bring people with guns to make sure they do it. The story is old… timeless even. We have the current atmosphere, or blank canvas if you will, and a couple of colors of paint to choose from. We can make new colors from those we have, but we have to think outside the palette.

As we can see, the simplified problem above can contain ever so much more complexity, and the arguments can even be turned on their heads entirely (just turn the canvas upside down). Maybe Group M really is full of mean spirited asses that put Politician X in power to create a dependent Group W just to keep their economic power. Maybe Group W has become lazy layabouts because the idea of Rights as espoused by Politician X was hopelessly flawed and Politician X was just looking for easy votes – or, at least, a stifling of revolutionaries by controlling Group W with empty promises. Maybe…just maybe….Group A really did say "fuck-it-all," we are going to make everyone suffer from an overproduction of Product R, which could supply Groups A and M but would totally screw over all those ass-hats in Group W and make them crawl on their knees and beg for the production of Product D again. "That would teach Group W to think so high and mighty of themselves!"

This simply proves the point of how hopeless political ideologies are today, and so too the base individuals that drive those ideologies off the cliff of human reason and straight into bloody conflicts, ruined lives, suffering children, and inter-species relationships between cats and dogs. Those cat-dogs are the true abominations most politicians tell us.

We need to regulate how cats and dogs love each other because the children of those unions are actually the cause of all those bloody conflicts, ruined lives, and suffering children. Never mind the fact we hold guns to peoples' heads to enact our failed policies to begin with.

Obfuscation of the real reasons as to why the State continually fails on every level is the order of the day….I mean of the decade….I mean of the century….fuck it. What I really mean to say is the phrase "Throughout All of the History of Every State."

Now we can add our paint to this canvas we have been provided. That paint takes the form, not of a new political ideology or religion, or anything most people are familiar with. That paint is a moral philosophy called First Principles, and its practice and application to every human being (Universality) is known as Universally Preferred Behavior. This is not a totalitarian approach from some top-down power but an approach from the individual to the outside world.

The Five Principles:

1) Personal Accountability
2) Personal Responsibility
3) Characterization by Merit
4) Non-Aggression, Non-Violence
5) Respect for Personal Property

These are the colors we want to work with. There are several reasons why.

Almost all of the social issues we deal with every day can be broken down by using the First Principles Approach. Affirmative Action fails Number One and Number Three. Alimony fails Number Four and Number Five from the perspective of the courts, and Numbers One and Two from the perspective of the ex-"insert spousal type" receiving the alimony. Quotas for boardrooms fail Numbers One, Two, and Three from the perspective of the company, and Numbers Four and Five from the perspective of the government enforcement of these laws. These are just a few ideas of how we can break these issues down and argue them. This is how we attack misandry no matter where it is in our society. Any refutation of a single portion of the five principles also results in the entirety of the First Principles collapsing.

1) Personal Accountability – An internal measurement of Merit. This is defined through self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion, and the willingness to face natural consequences for your decisions. It is primarily used as an honest form of self-assessment. It keeps unrealistic expectations and narcissism in check.

2) Personal Responsibility – The measure of external actions that can also be seen and judged by others. This one has a twofold process, one of which is redundant to personal accountability, but creates a tie between the self and the world outside of the self. This is the physical manifestation of personal accountability as judged by others in both deed and word, and the barometer of basic relationships with other people.

3) Characterization by Merit–The ability to judge others based upon their personal responsibility. This means other people should be judged by whether or not they are moving toward self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion and whether they demonstrate a measure of personal accountability by facing the natural consequences of their actions. This is true regardless of external features of the individual being judged.

4) Non-Aggression/Non-Violence – Simply put…… Thou shalt not enforce thy will upon others through the use of threat of the loss of life or liberty, or by injury, or through the threat of loss of personal property (or by making good on said threats and simply taking what you want). This can be altered only in the scope of upholding contractual law in which consequences for breaking the contract are fully understood between both parties, or in defense of personal property rights.

5) Respect for Personal Property Rights – By which the fruits of all time and labor by an individual gained through self-sufficiency in any environment, or property gained through contractual agreements with other individuals is solely the possession of that individual and is not to be removed by any form of force or coercion. Another way to put it is the actual body of the individual, and anything created by the body (the tool of consciousness) is the exclusive property of that individual unless contractual agreements are signed between parties for the exchange of goods and services.

The key to understanding how to deconstruct all of our issues rests upon these five principles. It nullifies the idea of a social (socialized and statist) contract because contracts must be recognized and entered into by individuals, creates Universality of expectations of behavior between individuals, destroys cronyism in all its forms by creating a meritocracy, creates competition based on true supply and demand, generally allows self-interest and personal liberties to be followed without infringing upon the life and property of others, removes violence and coercion from a society that teaches these principles to their youngest, and increases the level of volunteerism in society to correct problems that cannot be solved through contractual agreements.

Apply these principles to individuals, and allow the influence of those principles to be seen in society, and you have a powerful force that is capable of pointing out misandry, true inequality of opportunity, and actual infringements upon individual rights no matter where it rests. This also becomes our most powerful tool on positing solutions to the myriad problems that boys and men face in today's society. No doubt these principles can be carried into every sphere of human interaction. My hope is that these ideas – these principles – are adopted by individuals in the MRM in order to paint a brighter future for you.

Why a feminist takeover of Hollywood is a problem and why it’s happening

July 2, 2023 | by Rachael Lefler | Link | Original Link

I know right now the MRM has bigger fish to fry. Talking about the media is a trivial tactic used by feminists for them to cover up that in the western world, there is extremely little to no oppression of women, while the oppression of men persists like a difficult weed problem. But, what I’m personally more qualified to talk about, more than the Canadian legal issues that are the cause of Dan Perrins’s courageous hunger strike, or about the Calgary Expo’s hostility to the Honey Badger brigade and their upcoming legal battle, is art.

Normally, I dislike talking about art as if it were only the product of its social context. This came out of the cultural Marxist thinking, still prevalent in academia, that all cultural products were only worthy of study for what they could tell us about the intellectual climate of their time periods, or about those time periods’ power hierarchies. There is some value in this. But now, the ability to produce art itself has become mass produced, taking power and social oppression more and more out of the equation when it comes to “figuring out” art, and it has become more and more about the individual psychological expressions of the artists, with the art functioning as personal statements but not so often political ones.

However, if something is being created for commercial purposes, the more expensive to make something is, the more power dynamics in society shape how it’s made. This was true of big monumental sculptures in the Renaissance and remains true of Hollywood films today.

When the audience of the art is the masses, and the art is expensive to produce, the richest and most powerful people will always keep a close eye on it to make sure that the message it sends promotes their ideology. Going back to the Renaissance sculpture idea; though the artists of that period were Catholic, too, it was the power of the Catholic church that ensured that, while classically influenced, their works would convey a Christian message.

Who has the power over Hollywood movies today? The audiences, but specifically, the segments of the audience more prone to bitching about movies on Twitter and other social media sites.

The entertainment review media also has a lot of power over what directors do and don’t do in a digital age, where movie makers are taking feedback and criticisms seriously and seeking to improve. As the film critic who goes by the alias The Nostalgia Critic points out, there is a lot of reason to consider this shift a good thing. After all, before movie makers could get feedback so directly about their movies, they were fumbling in the dark trying to generate successful ideas, and this led to a lot more movies that sucked.

But, I can see the writing on the wall here. When it comes to feminism, they don’t genuinely care if a movie is good or bad, entertaining and charming or dull and lifeless. They only care about the extent to which the female characters in the story are whatever they decide makes a character empowered at the time. And, this taste is shifting constantly and there is never consensus, and nothing is ever agreeable enough to please them: as professional victims, they can't give up the power of their victim status too readily, so they have to find a nit to pick to complain about even the strongest and best female characters Hollywood can dream up.

And they're totally fine with a movie that perpetuates negative stereotypes about men, since we all know men are just dumb oppressive shitlords who can't keep their rape-sticks in their pants for five minutes. So you get movies like Brave, with strong female characters and a good story about mother-daughter bonding but where all the male characters are cretins, and only bowing to the whims of the mother and daughter makes the father character acceptable.

They had what I would call feminist strong female protagonists in Disney movies in the late 90's and early 00's that I remember fondly as a kid. Ariel in The Little Mermaid, although criticized for being crazy due to falling in love, is strong enough to challenge her father and assert her independence. Jasmine in Aladdin is a princess who wants to take a stand against the expectations society places on her as such. Belle in Beauty and the Beast is a badass bookworm who challenges traditional expectations for women and patriarchal attitudes in her society. Even Nala, from The Lion King, is a badass female character. But feminists on Tumblr have picked apart and attacked these fictional characters, who should be, by many of their standards, strong female characters.

But until all fictional women are perfect goddesses whose every action is strong and every word is an authoritative command, they cannot be satisfied. This is not likely to be challenged.

The mainstream entertainment news basically just repeats feminist tweets as authoritative golden scrolls handed down from on high. Feminists will never be satisfied by any work of fiction, no matter how in line it is with feminist principles. They can always demand more, and they always will. Their whole idea of "activism" is to cry about how they are being oppressed by the latest blockbuster and to angrily denounce the next one on Twitter.

Since they now claim to speak for all minority ethnic groups, they want more representation of them in the media. But this is ignoring that these minority ethnic groups have their own medias, made by and for them, and that the mainstream movies are made for everyone in the United States, which is a majority white country. For them, a token black person is insulting and not enough. Having a protagonist who's a strong, assertive, independent woman who does not get hitched is still a bad thing if she has the nerve to be white, for her story to take place in a European culture, to be thin, and to be able-bodied. I'm not even kidding here.

The fact is, this maddening obsession with a distorted concept of egalitarianism and fairness is never going to end, the media is never going to wake up to it and realize that they are pandering to a crazy minority within a minority of feminists, and Hollywood will keep trying to make films that meet their demands which are never able to be met, because the feminists will still find shit to complain about. This in turn will only drive good writers, directors and other content creators away, the people who want to make good movies, regardless of their value to social justice idiots.

This vacuum will be filled with shitty feminist movies, which will be made by activists who care nothing for the entertainment value or philosophical interest or artistry of their works but only about hijacking the fame-power of Hollywood studios to turn them into produce works which fit into their radical leftist agendas. Hollywood is experiencing a peak that will be short-lived before it gets taken over by people who do not care about movies and who only want to suck the fun out of everything in order to fight the nonexistent patriarchy, to make themselves feel important. They want to ruin everything fun by injecting their paranoid misandry into it.

Don't believe me? They've already got the friggin' ACLU on their leash. You would think the American Civil Liberties Union would have more important issues to tackle than a "dearth of female directors in Hollywood". You would also think that an organization based on libertarian principles would not be demanding that the iron fist of the state be brought down upon the private affairs of an entire industry just because a few women whined about… fewer women than men choosing to become directors?.. but you would be wrong. Enjoy the fact that the next decade is going to see the video game and film industries taken over by radical man-hating professional victims, which is already happening, while no one says or does anything.

Natural Gynocentrism (or, the Appeal to Utter Mindlessness)

July 3, 2023 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Those who allegedly care about men and their issues just as often feel the need to appeal to gynocentrism by saying how natural it is, so the need arises to eviscerate that notion once again. It's time to remind everybody in the friendliest way I can of the following: you can't fight gynocentrism by defending it, you can't call gynocentrism a problem and a fundamental human feature at the same time, and you certainly shouldn't be demanding to be "thanked" for claiming we are a gynocentric species if you want society to be rid of it. It's time once again to get your priorities straight.

Let's first start by reminding ourselves why we are even a part of the movement discussing and concerning ourselves with men's issues. We have taken a good look at the cruelty, the violence, the hypocrisy, the double standards, the disrespect, disregard, derision, and all-around unfair treatment towards men and boys, and we wish for a fairer world for malekind. Plenty of us have been on the receiving end of any and all of those behaviors.

We recognize what the problem is, which is of course gynocentrism. We recognize how gynocentric society regards men – as disposable, good only for serving women (and otherwise useless), that they must live and die to that end, and anything wrong that happens to the society is to be blamed on men. We recognize how gynocentric society expects men to act – in deference to women, on their knees for women and looked down on by them, and to take on accountability in women's stead.

Needless to say, gynocentrism is a longstanding social pathology. We are fighting it for a reason, in the hopes of attaining the goal of a fair world for men and boys. We are fighting it to rescue and advocate for men's whole, intact spirit and body.

Imagine, then, those who say that they are pro-men and care about their issues but also turn around and say that gynocentrism is natural.

Mind you, to say something is natural is to say it is there for a fundamental reason. It is to say that it is right. It is to say it is crucial to existence then and now. And ultimately, it is to say that it is anywhere from futile to evil to wish to fight and eradicate gynocentrism.

Again, imagine "pro-men" people arguing for natural gynocentrism. Imagine the defense of the disposal of males, the double standards, and the lack of accountability on the part of women. Imagine justifying the throwing of men into wars to die senselessly, the practical hatred towards fathers, the disregard of boys' welfare compared to girls, and everything else that is part and parcel to gynocentrism. Imagine all of this, "because biology, because evolution."

With men's advocates like this, who needs feminists?

For a closer look at natural gynocentrism fallacy look here and read. A related phenomenon, possibly synonymous with natural gynocentrism, is bio-gynocentrism. Long story short, those with natural-gynocentric or bio-gynocentric thought processes advocate that a deification of women is natural, reasonable, moral, and scientific. The deification of women entails the breaking of men, or at the least keeping them at lower tier.

I'll reiterate: they think that treating men like unworthy garbage and women like untouchable goddesses is proper.

If I were a feminist, I'd be jealous of the natural gynocentrist's capacity for misandry. We're looking at a complete tradcon version of the He For She campaign, only more effective; it actually dupes enough men into advocating for it while allowing them to think that they're doing masculinity and malekind a favor. Why didn't Emma Watson think of that?

Drawing heavily on arguments from biology and evolution, and just like any blue pill evolutionary psychology peddler, the natural-gynocentrist argues from innateness and instinct. More clearly, they posit that regarding women as holy treasures and their reproductive organs as gold is something men can't help because it is "hardwired" into men to do so. It is an innate tendency they cannot escape.

The argument from innateness basically amounts to the following: not only is it innate when you experience a gynocentric thought, it is innate that you act on it. In other words, this parallels the thought processes of the likes of Sam Harris who say that free will is an illusion. But aside from bordering on utter nihilism, the only motive one has for making the case that free will is an illusion is to make people believe in its absence and thus quashing any expectation of real human freedom. The case to be made, ultimately, is materialism; that we are nothing but a collection of atoms and nerve impulses firing. One way or another, we'll always be slaves to something.

The argument for natural gynocentrism is the appeal to the notion of complete and utter mindlessness of the male of the species. It argues that not only are males stupid, but they are terminally and helplessly stupid. We should be deeply concerned that anybody in our own movement would insist on such a position.

In effect, the natural gynocentrism fallacy is a materialist argument. It is most certainly not a moral argument as morality deals with the realms of volition and intellect. Innateness is not a moral argument. In fact, innateness is an illusion. By this I mean: the notion that you are inborn with self-destructive habits due to evolutionary outcomes is a flat lie. It is, instead, a social habit. This is what is properly referred to as programming. As with any programming, it can be unlearned, de-programmed.

And that is the real story of humanity: rising above programming, and being more than just atoms and nerve impulses. Humanity evolved into an existential being, and with it came a means of life beyond mere instinct.

But that is a key problem with the argument for natural gynocentrism. It largely ignores, if not downright dismisses, the volitional aspect and moral burdens that come with humanity.

For comparison, the evolutionary psychologist's obsession with the notion of sexual dimorphism as applied to homo sapiens is such that the similarities between the sexes, if acknowledged at all, are sufficiently downplayed.

This is despite the fact that the human male and female are way more monomorphic than they are dimorphic. The monomorphism is enough that men and women have the same capacity of volition and agency as individuals. Why are men obliged to then be vassals to the women who are in turn non-accountable? The answer should be obvious: social conditioning. This was never natural; to say it was a cruel trick is a vast understatement.

And just like turning a blind eye to the vast indication of monomorphism and zeroing in on the less prominent dimorphism of the human sexes (relative to other mammals), the natural-gynocentrists blindfold themselves from the aspect of free will in humankind and instead focus on the biological impulses that all men and women have the capacity to exert a good degree of will over to self-govern.

This is not an argument that all people actually do this; goodness knows it's only too easy to not control your life than to control your life. But to just say "Oh, it's biology you can't help it" is no more right than to give females a disproportionate pass for committing wrongs. More to the point, if we recognize that humanity is not helpless to impulses and instinct, at least more than we do today, we can be better masters over ourselves. And in this goal the mongers of natural gynocentrism and the apologists of our ancestral disposers of malekind are not helping matters in any way.

Advocacy for men is best taken the form of appealing towards the spirit of men and boys, and towards their free will, which feminists and traditional gynocentrists are hellbent on quashing in practice. Advocating against men's free will does men no favors as it directly appeals to the notions of male hopelessness, futility, and resignation to the disposability we thought they were protesting.

I can already hear the counterargument. "But, men used to be thanked and honored for their disposability! We just need to return to thanking men for servicing women!"

Tell me something…why is male disposability right? Who is sick enough to be so gratified that men die or become broken? What about men are you concerned about which led you to a movement advocating for them? Are you concerned that they don't get cheers and a slap in the back before they get screwed over in family courts? That nobody asks them "are you all right?" while being murdered by vigilantes over a false accusation?

Perhaps, with the injustices in your life courtesy of gynocentric society, you are coping in the wrong way. Instead of admitting that none of this was right and this never had to be, you are wanting justification that it ever happened at all. You sound like an American who can't bring himself to admit that he was violated at age zero with a knife and had his foreskin sliced off and instead you wish to continue the tradition on your own son "because it's always been done".

In closing, it's pretty easy to see that the vast majority of women who allege to be concerned about men and their issues to fall into natural gynocentrism fallacy. Clearly, the benefits to women in the natural-gynocentric and evopsych scenarios are abundant.

Too often, their appraisal of men is in the form of being grateful for their sacrifices. They seem to be thrilled with the notion that men dispose themselves for them. It takes a strong moral mind with dauntless concern about men as ends in themselves to be a female advocate for men, and at this point I can perhaps count them on one hand.

Why do the men fall into natural gynocentrism fallacy? The answer is the same as I've given in my writings about bio-gynocentrism. It's the attempt to romanticize male toil and death to heroically become a lowly benefactor for their precious goddesses. It's the attempt to get on the good sides of non-accountable women to discover the canned answer to "What is a good man?" Ultimately, I think it's a man giving into his sense of hopelessness, going nihilistic black-pill and saying "Yeah, I'm a disposable man. Please thank me!"

What they refuse to acknowledge is that they aren't saying it for themselves, at least not only. If they indulge in the notion of male disposability, it is liable to affect other men going forward and make them disposable too. They are no asset to the men's movement, but the opposite.

As someone most eloquently put it, anti-gynocentrism is the only anti-feminism that matters. If you aren't anti-gynocentrist, perhaps you're a natural-gynocentrist. You can't be both. Go impress feminists and out-He-For-She them somewhere else, but not here.

Women, Wallets and Waste

July 4, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Author's note; If you are happily married or in any other mode of human bonding that puts you in the role of primary breadwinner, please feel free to ignore this piece. It is written solely for those men who have chosen a different path.

More specifically, it is written for men who are going their own way, but who do not want to totally cut themselves off from sex and occasional female companionship.

For you old timers here, think of this as a comment from "Dr. Paul" for men. PE

If all you want is periodic sex and companionship with a woman, then smile real big. You owe that to yourself. Well, unless you are using your wallet to get there.

If that is the case, you are throwing away good money and putting yourself in the role of a John. If that floats your boat, well enough. But you might want to keep reading anyway.

We will start with some uncomfortable basics.

Inconvenient fact #1

Women decide in the first five minutes (or seconds) of meeting you whether they want to bed down with you.

That is a fact that I will wager 90+% of men never get through their skulls.

Those five minutes, or seconds as the case may be, are the only moments ever that you have sway over which way she goes with her decision, and your biggest hope for her deciding your way is not to give a damn what she decides.

I don't create the rules. I just observe them.

That is not to say that money can't play a role in that time. A guy head to toe in Armani and Italian leather will stand out for sure, and will attract more women. He will also attract the very kind of woman who wants to take all that shit from him the second she can get her claws in.

Inconvenient fact #2

Some guys get laid a lot more often. Whether it is money, movie star looks, a porn star cock and the skills to back it or a very serious (often innate) understanding of female psychology, some men just have an edge. Adjust your expectations accordingly. It is much easier to do that when you learn to aggressively manage that pathetic pining to get laid. And in almost ironic fashion, learning to not be pathetic about women with your wallet or anything else is one of the few things you can do to increase your sexual opportunities.

So even if more sex is your motive, the path to get there is a daily dose of IDGAF pills.

Inconvenient fact #3

Using your wallet in a "dating scene" is better described as saying that you are actually paying a string of prostitutes in the hopes that one of them will deliver service.

Talk about inconvenient. This one takes the cake. Take an honest prostitute. She will go away when you are done and won't tell you that she doesn't like your shirt or that your friends drink too much.

Thankfully, there are also some decidedly convenient facts. Remembering them can help you think of your wallet as something other than where you used to keep money when you had it.

Convenient fact #1

There are women who don't mind paying their own way. Sure, they are not falling out of trees. They are out there, though. And you can encounter them if you are the kind of man uninterested in any other kind of woman.

That means projecting your values to the people who know you, without compromise (and without a lot of fanfare).

You can even do a reasonable amount of advertising in your own social circles that you only do the Dutch thing; that if you were a multi-millionaire you would not pay a woman to spend time with you. Feel free to let people quietly know that if you wanted an escort service you have the Yellow Pages.

If you don't make too much of a production of it; if you are not too ostentatious (and if you don't have leprosy or body odor) that will likely result in a woman expressing interest in you who may not have otherwise done so.

It will also turn off every goldbricking skeezer in the group. If you have been chasing tail with your wallet, you know just the kind of woman I am talking about. She already has some of your cash. Maybe a lot of it.

Convenient fact #2

Looks depreciate. Money appreciates. Two realities of life are at play here. Looking at them honestly can be a little chilling. One, a woman's looks depreciate with time. I am not just talking about time in the sense of crow's feet and sagging boobs. I am talking about the basic reality that you could be with the most beautiful woman in the world, a wild, incredible lover, and over a period of time she would lose her luster.

Well, in your eyes anyway. It is no different for her. Man or woman, you have sex with the same person enough times and the passion fades. There may be some exceptions, but I am wagering not many.

The longer men and women stay together, the less emphasis and value they put on sex.

On the other hand, your money (aside from inflation) will be just as good in five years as it is right now.

When you chase women with your wallet, her looks and your money both dry up on you. So put your freaking wallet up and just open your mind to a woman who fits your lifestyle. You will be in much better shape when and if it is over.

Convenient fact #3

You are in charge of all of this. You can either see yourself as someone just playing the cards they were dealt, or you can become the dealer.

You can live with the reality that money attracts whores, or you can enjoy the delusion that if you spend enough you will be wanted and loved.

Or, should you decide to take a different path, you can become hooker kryptonite and learn to better attract lower maintenance women, regardless of how much time you actually want to spend with them.

Step Your Dick Up: Why incels deserve better advice

July 5, 2023 | by William Costello | Link | Original Link

Men who can't get sex are seen as losers

We hear a lot about double standards between female and male sexual behaviour. Women who have a lot of sex are often slut shamed, while men who have lots of sex are seen as 'studs.' What is often ignored however, is how true the exact inverse of this is. Men who cannot get sex are seen as losers and lampooned as members of the most derided group in society…incels.

Meanwhile, perpetually single women are celebrated in society and we lament the lack of good men out there. Examples of this include the 2019 Psychology Today article, 'Are There Not Enough Men Worth Marrying?' and the NY Post article, 'Broke Men Are Hurting American Women's Marriage Prospects'. Not to mention the media love in for 'self partnered' Emma Watson.

However, it may well be true about the mismatch between what women want and what men are offering. This supply and demand problem is of course the difference in the way we perceive the two groups. Choosy women are not involuntary in their 'celibacy'. It seems that women have tough choices… but incels have no choices.

This essay is not so much an exploration of what we say 'about' incels, but rather what we say 'to' incels.

I aim to explore,

- Who are the incels and do they deserve such disdain?
- What is the plight of an incel?
- Why the advice given to incels is useless
- Why we simultaneously hate incels for giving up and for trying to better themselves

---

Who are the incels?

TOP DEFINITION

aka "involuntarily celibate", a person (usually male) who has a horrible personality and treats women like sexual objects and thinks his lack of a sex life comes from being "ugly" when its really just his blatant sexism and terrible attitude. incels have little to no self awareness; even when they see other "ugly" men with girlfriends, they consider these men to be tricksters who have somehow beat the system and can get women despite being cursed with unattractiveness (in other words, theyre respectful to women and women are attracted to their personalities, but incels cant comprehend such a phenomenon). they believe that women owe them sex, and many of the more extreme incels like to spend time in incel communities on the internet coming up with ways to make women have sex with them (often involving genocide of people of color, genocide of "Chads" (men who have sex), taking rights away from women, raping them, having sex with women's dead bodies, and other horrid, disgusting things. they cant understand that that is PRECISELY why women want nothing to do with them).

I'm pretty sure Ryan is an incel. Yesterday he made a facebook post about how all women are shallow and exist to torture men by "denying" them sex, as if sex is something people "deserve", and not a privilege given by potential sexual partners that should be respected.

This definition of incel is not one I would agree with entirely. It is however, the top definition on Urban Dictionary and highlights the way in which incels are seen in society

It's important we know who we are talking about when we use the term incel. The definition used in the image above is not one I fully subscribe to, although it is the top definition in Urban Dictionary and gives an idea of how incels are seen in society. An incel, or involuntarily celibate, is defined as someone who has not had access to sex for a sustained period of longer than six months. Going by this definition and acknowledging the fact that the number of men not having sex within the last year has increased 3 fold in the last decade, we must conclude that the majority of incels are peaceful and non-violent.

A significant minority of incels derive a sense of community spitting misogynistic vitriol online and rare individual incels have lashed out at society in horrific acts of violent rage. Media and cultural depiction tends to fixate on the latter two groups and uses them to represent all incels as misogynistic. It is important to note that while they might resent their lack of success in what they consider a somewhat superficial sexual selection system, the majority of incels do not hate women. The majority might not even define themselves as incels.

'Be Yourself' and 'Just Lift Bro'

The first incel I ever encountered in real life spoke at the 'Messages for Men' conference I attended in London in 2019. He overcame obvious crippling anxiety to speak and provide insight into his life. The most striking point for me was how he detailed a frustration at the tension between being told to simply, 'be yourself' and 'just lift bro' in order to improve himself by weightlifting.

'Just Lift Bro', I was told, is a common piece of 'magic bullet' style advice provided to incels, particularly from men within the wider 'manosphere'. It seems cruelly insufficient when we consider the number of incels who report to have physical and/or mental disabilities which might serve as significant barriers to weightlifting.

Honest commentators must acknowledge how hollow and unhelpful these platitudes truly are. Telling an incel to simply "be himself" is to gaslight him into thinking there is no problem at all or to imply that his problem is that he is being inauthentic. To tell him to 'just lift bro' might be a little more helpful, in that a lot can potentially be helped through self-development, however, the blaséness and dismissiveness with which incels are told to 'just lift' is demeaning to the significance and complexity of the challenge they face.

Study on how couples meet 1940–2020

The dating economy is increasingly moving online and a recent study of Tinder found that, "the bottom 80% of men (in terms of attractiveness) are competing for the bottom 22% of women and the top 78% of women are competing for the top 20% of men".

Crudely put, the modern dating economy closer resembles polygyny, with the most high-status men having a 'monopoly' on the majority of women. The majority of men are simply not being considered.

Why do we hate incels?

James Bloodworth's insightful article, "Why Incels are the Losers in the age of Tinder", describes the way in which men and women uniquely hold disdain for incels.

> …we still judge people by how much sex they have, or not in this case. We still view men who don't have sex as failures in some way…For men, calling someone an Incel implies something positive — a certain sexual abundance — about one's own existence. For women it has begun to function as a putdown that ruthlessly dismisses unworthy suitors while simultaneously expelling them from the community of the good as misogynistic and creepy.

It's obvious why society hates the misogynistic online abuse and the violence but why do we hate the majority of incels…simply for giving up?

Incels have taken the decision to check out of a mating market in which they see the cost of courtship as being too high, both financially and emotionally. They are increasingly retreating to virtual worlds of pornography and online communities as shelter from what they see as a culture that rejects them. Sociologist Frank Furedi explores how,

> …the status of moral inferiority conferred on men, encourages a defensive and anxious approach towards dealing with women. Feminism and the ascendancy of the #MeToo movement serve as constant reminders of the inferiority of male identity.

When so much of male identity is wrapped up in the idea of competency and agency, the incel admission of incompetence is jarring to us as a society and we find it repugnant.

What do we want incels to do? Keep trying and being rejected…or give up? It seems the answer is neither.

It's not all about looks you know

Every time I discuss incels with any semblance of sympathy, I am met with a chorus of, ''boo hoo, woe is me, poor men, they're not entitled to sex or women you know!".

This is of course true.

I am not and have never at any point suggested that women should be made lower their standards to reduce the plight of the incel.

However, the erosion of societally enforced monogamy coupled with the fact that women are rapidly outpacing men in education, yet still seeking highly educated partners, has significantly exasperated matters on this front.

However, to have sympathy for incels does not equate to advocating women be 'given to them' as their entitlement.

It's important that mainstream society gives incels a more appealing message than we have been giving. To dismiss them runs the risk of resigning them to the basements of internet communities, to fester in resentment and disenfranchisement as potential ticking timebombs.

However, let's look at some of the messages we send to incels.

Incels are often told that 'it's not all about looks' and that some women go for personality. This is despite the fact that statistics show that men's looks matter far more to the fairer sex and far more than they'd care to admit.

Feminist writer, Louise Perry, who is currently engaging in an extremely productive letter exchange exploration of the modern dating economy with aforementioned James Bloodworth, had this to say on the looks vs personality dichotomy,

> The dating market is highly competitive, hierarchical, and often cruel. This fact is uncomfortable for anyone who values egalitarianism, so a more appealing — albeit dishonest — option is to instead blame Incels for their plight by suggesting that their unpleasant personalities must be the problem.

To make the argument that 'it's not all about looks' is to make the assumption that if you don't have good looks, you can simply compensate with a sparkling personality. I'm routinely provided with anecdotal evidence for such a phenomenon. However, what constitutes a sparkling personality can be very much dependent on what a man looks like and there is often a minimum level of attractiveness to be reached before personality and other traits are even considered.

Dr. Francesca Minerva, a bio-ethisist at Warwick University, explores the fascinating ways in which an underexplored type of discrimination, 'Lookism', translates into discrimination in other facets of life. Lookism impacts on areas that we might not intuitively think dependent on physical attractiveness, such as professional success, perception of intelligence and even morality.

Lookism filters out to other facets of life

Bloodworth explores more difficulties encountered by incels in regard to 'it's not all about looks'.

> ...in the world of online dating, which is how 40% of couples in the United States meet, looks, height and social status are usually pre-requisites for matching with someone at all. Offline, many Incels lack the basic social skills required to navigate relations with the opposite sex. According to an internal poll carried out on the website Incels.co, 26% of users of the forum said they had some form of autism. Flirting, which requires an innate understanding of nuanced sub-communications and unspoken sexual tension, does not come naturally to these men.

When I bring this up with friends, I receive a volley of potential qualities that incels could and should conjure up so that they may compete in the mating market. It seems that it is difficult for us to imagine a man who is objectively lacking in every aspect that might be important to a woman when considering a mate. We also neglect to acknowledge how many of these are immutable and difficult or impossible to do anything about.

Keep trying: There’s someone out there for everyone

The next piece of advice given to incels is to ‘keep trying’ and that ‘there’s someone out there for everyone’.

Why do we insist that men must persist in a world where 90% of romantic advances are expected to be made by men. Evolutionary speaking, it can be argued that women are born with inherent value, in that they are likely to one day have children, whereas men need to demonstrate value in order to be sexually selected for.

Why do we want them to continue to run this gauntlet? Why do we want them to continually pick themselves up and try again, only to endure humiliating rejection after rejection after each clumsy attempt?

In a world with antiquated views about who should pay on dates, how much money should a man have to spend fruitlessly on courtship before it's ok to stop?

The notion that 'there's someone out there for everyone' also seems oddly sexist towards women. If you just keep looking there'll be a woman with low enough standards for you.

What do we as a society get out of this ritual that causes so much pain?

I feel that the pain of this ordeal is downplayed by society, despite studies showing that physical pain and social pain (rejection, exclusion, ostracism) activate the same regions of the brain. Modern day progressives will happily tell you that "words are violence" but will most likely scoff at this notion of pain. I feel this dismissiveness is due to how acutely aimed at men most sexual rejection is and an example of an empathy gap. The reason my girlfriend can scoff at this type of pain is because she genuinely can't relate to it. She has literally never been rejected. In terms of romantic options, she lives in a blissfully ignorant state of abundance.

The veil of ignorance

We are all vulnerable romantically and socially. We all face rejection and hurt in romance and relationship. Scorning incels is a projection of our own insecurities and fears. If it wasn't for random luck, we too could be alone. Those of you who are willing to reflect and consider the ways in which we discriminate and have attractiveness privilege, I strongly suggest listening to Jay Shapiro's podcast on 'Lookism' with Dr. Franca Minerva. Shapiro takes the listener through the 'veil of ignorance' thought experiment in the context of attractiveness. The "veil of ignorance" is a method of determining the morality of issues.

It asks a decision-maker to make a choice about a social or moral issue and assumes that they have enough information to know the consequences of their possible decisions for everyone but would not know, or would not take into account, which person they are. The thought experiment illuminates how unfair yet philosophically difficult the conundrum of lookism is.

The veil of ignorance thought experiment can be applied to create empathy to those less attractive/fortunate

Step your dick up

In discussions about this topic with friends, one of the cruellest and most galling pieces of 'advice' that I have heard put to incels is that they should 'step their dick up', i.e. improve themselves to a standard at which women will consider them.

If we can move past the glaring double standard and the fact that an 'unlucky in love' woman would never be told to 'step her pussy up' to earn male attention, how much do we really think can be mitigated through self improvement?

Certain aspects can be improved upon by acquiring skills e.g. fashion sense can be improved upon. Manopshpere fashion blog and Twitter account @WellBuiltStyle is a pragmatic example of practical fashion advice that will help struggling men present themselves in a more favourable light.

Social skills to some extent can be learned, primarily by overcoming shyness to reveal a truly interesting personality. This does require a 'putting yourself out there' that can be gruelling for socially anxious young men and a 'trial and error' learning curve that will lead to all sorts of discomfort for women, who will have to endure many inept attempts at approaching them.

However, we must recognise the uncomfortable and ugly truth of how much of attraction is based on the immutable. One of the most common 'deal breakers' for women is a man's height, which no amount of Cuban heels can mitigate.

Research from the online dating website AYI.com found that, every inch increase in a man's height directly correlated to his likelihood of being contacted by a woman. The study showed that 6ft men were 33% more likely to be contacted than a man of average height (5ft 7in), and 77% more likely to be contacted than a man under 5ft 4in. A different study about height and human mate choice found that, on average, the shortest man a woman would date is 5 feet 9 inches tall (2 inches taller than the average man) and the same study shows that 23% of men compared to only 4% of women would accept a dating relationship where the woman was taller (the average woman is 5ft 3in)

Develop yourself…but not like that

There happens to be a whole 'industry' devoted towards helping men develop themselves to be more successful with women. However, the 'pick up artist' industry, which coaches men how to 'game the system', is sneered at as superficial and sinister. Pick up artists are dismissed as teaching men how to 'trick' women into considering them. I find this criticism quite demeaning to women in that it suggests they are not discerning enough to know when they are being 'tricked' . Most women are of course robust enough to see through many pick-up artist techniques. They are considered trite and cheesy in the modern dating arena.

However, one can imagine the exasperation of an incel who finds himself being held in scorn for his immutable incompetence and simultaneously being scolded for trying to 'game the system'.

Is our distaste for the hollowness of pick up artist pageantry an expression of an internal recognition at how superficial our sexual selection process is? Are we hating the game by resenting the weakest players?

From an evolutionary perspective, it's female sexual selection that has kept this whole show on the road for our evolved history. Do we dare trifle with it?

I say yes.

Primarily because I am not a nihilist. I believe that much can be done to bridge the supply and demand chasm that exists between what women want and what men are offering.

We will need a more sophisticated and likely uncomfortable conversation than we are currently having. That conversation will need to grapple with uncomfortable issues like the tension between women's success in the workplace and hypergamy. We will need to reframe the value of traditional masculinity, which has been culturally demeaned.

The conversation will need men moving beyond defining their self-worth through sexual success expressed as the denigration of 'beta incels'.

It will take women moving past absconding and obvious slogans like 'incels are not entitled to anything' and perhaps even considering coaching hapless but well meaning men on how to better succeed.

Inceldom needs reckoning with and I think we can do a lot better than to continually use the most extreme caricatures to trivialise incels.

It's in all our interests to give better advice to incels than to simply 'be yourself' or 'step your dick up'.

Defining Misandry

July 9, 2023 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

What is Misandry? The Dictionary definition is simple: hatred of men. Another definition offered up is similarly straightforward: an extreme dislike of males, frequently based upon unhappy experience or upbringing. What I want to put forward is a more pervasive, and reality-based definition of the word.

Misandry: dehumanization of the male sex. The view of males as non-human, not of intrinsic worth.

Men in our society are valued predominantly on their utility to others.

This is as true today as it was 5000 years ago. It's true in general society (employer to employee), as well as in personal relationships (women love a 'good provider'). Men are the protectors, the producers, the creators of society – precisely because without producing, protecting, or creating those same men would be considered a drag on society; a cost, not a benefit.

And society does not like supporting men. Ask the homeless about income supports and social housing. All for 'young familes' (read: single mothers). Ask the domestic violence shelters (if they admit male victims exist) about services for men. Ask your local University about support for boys wanting a better life through education.

The answer throughout society to men falling behind is always the same, from Kay Hymowitz to Rush Limbaugh:

"Pull up your socks, you lazy slackers".

More misandry.

The world we live in is truly unforgiving to the man who 'falls through the cracks.' Nevermind the child support victims and the men who have lost it all in divorce. There are vast swaths of men who have had neither happen to them, and they still find themselves scraping from paycheque to paycheque for decades on end. They still find there are no helping hands available.

They still find that the taxes they have to pay still go towards ever more programs for women. Scratch that…I meant 'young families' (read: single mothers). It's like the Government doesn't know about all the struggling men. Of course, we know different, but when you view men as non-human cannon fodder, the Darwinian way government treats disadvantaged men becomes much more understandable.

The media is a major culprit of this mindset, reducing men to mere statistics, or job descriptions. When a bunch of miners are trapped underground, it's always "The workers are trapped", or "24 Miners were killed today". Never do they say "The 24 men were underground for 3 days before they were rescued" – their sex is carefully excised from all reports. But should a slaughter in some village happen, for example, it's "52 people dead so far, including women and children".

See that? We're supposed to really care, because it's not just men that are killed. Women and children are involved too. Men have no value except as filler. It's the women and children you are meant to care about.

Misandry shows up in our daily lives far more often than even we MRA's care to admit.

Every time someone holds a man to a different standard than women, that's Misandry. Refusing to listen to complaints because it's "sad" when men complain is also Misandry ('Real Men' don't complain is a veryconcise definition of Misandry). Believing that no matter what forces are against a man, his success (or lack thereof) is entirely his 'fault' is also Misandry.

Essentially, refusing to believe there are social forces arrayed against the average man succeeding is a manifestation of Misandry, since it is an expression of the "Real Men can handle anything" strain of the definition – with the implied "if you can't handle it, you're not a Real Man, and therefore not worth a toss."

So how exactly does one know when they are in the presence of a man-hater?

Simply ask that person their opinions on such things as social supports for men (make sure to say this will reduce the funds available for women). If they are unable to see value in reducing services to women, in order to provide ANY services to men…well, you have a man hater in your face. In point of fact, you have a 'that issue is important to get to once all this other stuff is accomplished' type feminist, in all likelihood.

Alternatively, you could just listen to what they say. Most man-haters will let their opinions be known fairly easily, in some cases even being proud of their hatred. Any woman that demands a man 'treat her like a woman should be' is demanding servitude and beast-of-burden status from men. That is a misandrist. So are the folks who demand men 'shut up and take it.' In common parlance, "Man Up."

Someone who feels that all of the issues facing men couldn't possibly be affecting men as a whole, the "Don't let it bother you, and pull up your socks" crowd, are also Misandrists, in that they refuse to recognize the humanity of men, preferring to view them as machines capable of anything regardless of circumstance.

Demanding men live up to impossible standards is Misandry. Refusing to see men in need, as men, is Misandry. Seeing men as beasts of burden, as a means of production, rather than human beings with feelings and hopes, is Misandry. Seeing men as a Class, rather than people, is Misandry.

More discussion is needed on this subject, but I believe it is time that we as a movement started to define a few terms on our own. So again, here's my definition:

Misandry: dehumanization of the male sex. The view of males as non-human, not of intrinsic worth.

Ernest Belfort Bax: Feminists Inconsistent On The Question Of Women Being Same Or Different To Men (1887 – 1913)

July 11, 2023 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

Ernest B. Bax describes (below) how feminists argued for women's rights on the basis of difference between the sexes, while on other occasions argued for rights on the basis that men and women were identical. The difference narrative was especially exploited, proving that sentimental appeals to sex-difference gained women the most power because differences, especially those implying weakness and vulnerability, evoked chivalry. – PW.

> Modern Feminism would fain achieve the feat of eating its cake and having it too. When political and economic rights are in question, such as involve gain and social standing, the assumption of inferiority magically disappears before the strident assertion of the dogma of the equality of woman with man – her mental and moral equality certainly! When, however, the question is of a different character – for example, for the relieving of some vile female criminal of the penalty of her misdeeds-then Sentimental Feminism comes into play, then the whole plaidoyer is based on the chivalric sentiment of deference and consideration for poor, weak woman." [Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake, in The Fraud of Feminism 1913]
>
> Feminists only claim equality with men in so far as it has agreeable consequences for women. And this applies all along the line… I would advise woman's-righters to choose the one side or the other. If they stick to the weakness of woman physically as ground for woman's privileges and immunities, let them give up prating of equality otherwise. If they contend for equality let it at least be an even equality all round. ['Female Suffrage' – in Social Democrat, Vol.8, no.9, pp.533-545 1904].
> The bulk of the advocates of woman's rights are simply working, not for equality, but for female ascendency. It is all very well to say they repudiate chivalry. They are ready enough to invoke it politically when they want to get a law passed in their favour – while socially, to my certain knowledge, many of them claim it as a right every whit as much as ordinary women. ['No Misogyny But True Equality' – in To-day, pp.115-121 1887]

A response from the Australian Workplace Gender Equality Agency

July 11, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The mainstream media and even governments often talk about a gender pay gap or gender wage gap and imply that this exists as a result of systematic discrimination against women. The reality though is that we have a gender earnings gap and the reasons are well established. Studies by governments and private researchers have shown time and time again that men and women make a variety of different choices when choosing what to study, in what field to work, and various factors concerning how they work. These choices lead to differences in earnings. The largest such study is probably the CONSAD report commissioned by the US Department of Labor. The CONSAD Report naturally pertains only to the US labour market but its results are broadly applicable outside of the US and also agree with research from other countries. In particular the CONSAD report noted:

> There are observable differences in the attributes of men and women that account for most of the wage gap. Statistical analysis that includes those variables has produced results that collectively account for between 65.1 and 76.4 percent of a raw gender wage gap of 20.4 percent, and thereby leave an adjusted gender wage gap that is between 4.8 and 7.1 percent.

This simply means that after adjusting for known factors a small gender earnings gap remains. The fact that such an earnings gap exists does not imply discrimination on the basis of gender. It merely shows that not all factors that impact earnings have so far been quantified. Future research may be able to further reduce this apparent earnings gap.

There have been quite a few high profile cases of companies initiating pay scale audits only to find little difference in earnings between men and women at the same level. For example, The Deloitte UK 2018 Gender Pay Gap Report in which Deloitte assessed its own gender pay gap states that:

> Our analysis shows that the average mean gender pay gap within grade pools is around 2.2%

Despite this, when reporting on Deloitte's results, mainstream news sources focus on the 43% difference found when comparing all men and all women at Deloitte.

Some recent research suggests that gender differences in personality traits may explain some of this remaining difference, making any possible difference due to discrimination smaller still.

Proponents of the gender pay gap also often ignore research which shows that young childless women in large US cities are out-earning men.

An ongoing problem when discussing the gender earnings gap is the propensity for those arguing for a gender pay gap to conflate different alleged problems. We often see different problems discussed together, while they are actually entirely distinct. These problems often include:

> Claims of gender discrimination in a like-for-like comparison.
> Claims that women are shepherded in to lower paying roles.
> Claims that traditionally female roles are paid less.

The latter two claims, while initially appearing to be similar, are quite distinct. If proponents of a gender pay gap believe the latter two are genuine concerns they need to make it clear that there is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in a like-for-like comparison.

Previously I wrote an email to the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) in my role as the president of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA). The WGEA is a a federal Australian government statutory agency that is charged with promoting and improving gender equality in Australian workplaces.

A few days later I received the following response from the WGEA. The response arrived as a Microsoft Word file attached to a reply email. The original is held on the AMRA Inc. website and is quoted here. Comments are interspersed.

Response from the WGEA

> Response to Robert Brockway, President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc
> The national gender pay gap figure calculated by the Agency is the difference between women's and men's average full-time base salary earning, expressed as a percentage of men's earnings. It is a measure of women's overall position in the paid workforce and does not compare like-for-like roles.

Well, there you have it. WGEA clearly states that the often-quoted national gender pay gap does not compare like-for-like roles.

As of February 2019 the WGEA is reporting the national gender pay gap as 14.1%.

This should not be confused with the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) which is the difference between men's and women's total remuneration, expressed as a percentage of men's total remuneration.

The Gender Equality Score Card for November 2017 puts the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) at 22.4%.

> This explanation was included on page 8 of the Agency's 2016-17 gender equality scorecard released in November 2017 and in the accompanying media release.
> However, the Agency's work with employers shows that when they conduct a gender pay gap analysis, they can uncover like-for-like pay gaps between women and men working in the same or comparable roles.

This has never been at issue. Such as in the case of Deloitte mentioned earlier most audits find a small difference in gender earnings in a like-for-like comparison. Actual like-for-like differences still don't indicate the presence of gender discrimination.

> These analyses can also reveal an organisation-wide pay gap. This is the difference between the average remuneration of women and the average remuneration of men across an entire organisation or department. This gap usually reflects the lack of women in senior management and high-paying roles in an organisation, especially leadership, technical and specialist roles, and the over-representation of women in lower-paid roles.
> Although Australian women have had the legal right of equal pay for work of equal value since 1969, evidence suggests that women are sometimes not paid the same amount as men for doing the same or comparable jobs.

> When the beer brewer Lion undertook a gender pay gap analysis, for example, their leadership team was surprised when it revealed their company was paying men on average 3.2% more than women working in the same or similar roles. They moved quickly to close the gap for like-for-like roles by giving more than 1600 employees (950 women as well as 700 men, who had been paid slightly less than their female counterparts) a pay rise worth $6 million.

The example provided by the WGEA here shows a 3.2% gender earnings gap in a like-for-like comparison – very different to the gender pay gap of 14.1% or the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) of 22.4%. In addition, in this example, nearly as many men received pay raises as women.

What the WGEA has written here, of a small gender earnings gap, is not what they, the mainstream media or even government officials talk about when they make public statements concerning a gender pay gap. Rather the main talking point concerns earnings differences between men and women as a whole. This leads to a very distorted view of the gender earnings gap among the general population. By focussing on the national gender pay gap and the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) rather than like-for-like comparisons the WGEA is contributing to this widespread confusion among the populace.

> Another company that closed its like-for-like gender pay gap was Energy Australia. In March this year, the company announced that it would spend $1.2 million so that women and men with equivalent skills and experience would receive the same pay for doing the same job. Around 350 women had their pay increased through a salary review and, in some cases, a one-off adjustment. About 80 men also had their pay adjusted following a review of Energy Australia's employees who were not on enterprise bargaining agreements.

In a similar case the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) engaged an external agency to assess pay equity. The results of this independent audit of pay rates resulted in more men than women receiving pay raises.

I call on the WGEA, the mainstream media in Australia, and the Australian government to make it clear, in plain language, that:

> There is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in Australia.

The reasons for the gender earnings gap are well understood today as a result of research conducted in Australia and elsewhere.
The gender earnings gap is largely a result of choices that men and women make.

My email to the WGEA and their response letter were produced in full here, with the exception of some personal details that were redacted.

What’s a Mother to Do?

July 14, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

I gave up on my local newspaper a long time ago. The column inches have shrunk even as the price of the daily paper has crept up to $1.50 daily and $3.00 Sunday. The local fishwrap now costs more than a fish taco at Long John Silver’s. I say go with the fish taco.

My avoidance of the local press is also a matter of principle, as paying for mainstream news is tantamount to sleeping – well, maybe catnapping – with the enemy. On the other hand, when someone leaves behind a free Sunday paper for me to browse through while I’m eating lunch…well, if I’m in the mood, I might deign to scan the contents.

A recent lunchtime perusal of the “free press” revealed a syndicated story by one Shirley Leung, a scribbler for the Boston Globe. Her article was entitled “Let’s Be Honest About the Double Standard for Working Moms.” By all means, let’s be honest. Wouldn’t have it any other way, Shirley baby.

Leung recounts the story of a 34-year-old lawyer who went back to work four days after giving birth even though her firm had a three-month maternity leave policy.

Then the author offers another example, namely Marissa Mayer, Yahoo CEO, who returned to work a few weeks after giving birth and asserted she would be doing the same after her next pregnancy, involving twins by the way.

Speaking of twins, we are also offered the example of a former Massachusetts governor, Jane Swift, who gave birth to twins one month after taking office in 2001.

Then there is the story of another beleaguered lawyer, a 39-year-old partner at a Boston firm. She had three months of leave coming to her after giving birth to her third child, but she decided to go back to work after 10 days. Her husband wasn’t happy about it for obvious reasons. Her female colleagues didn’t approve because they thought it sent a message to younger female lawyers that they were slackers if they took their full maternity leave. Worst of all, her sister – and you know how powerful sisterhood is – criticized her decision.

Egad, what a burden to bear! I don’t know how the poor dear can stand it. After all, everyone knows how shy, sensitive and unassertive those Boston law firm partners are.

Finally, Leung provides the clincher, yet another marriage in Boston (can’t use the term “Boston marriage” since that’s a euphemism for a lesbian couple) involving one Bettina Hein, founder and CEO of Pixabilitiy, who went back to work just three weeks after giving birth yet continued to nurse her son for 14 months!

Now Bettina Hein wasn’t charging back and forth from the office to her home to nurse the kid, or risking carpal tunnel syndrome by churning away on a breast pump. You see, “The nanny often takes the kids into the office….[Hein] had a nursery added to her office at Yahoo.”

What a simple yet elegant solution! Can’t understand why secretaries, receptionists, and all the other female factotums in her office don’t follow that advice when they have babies.

Let’s pause and review what we’ve learned to this point.

These women wanted high-powered careers.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

These women wanted to be mothers.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

These women wanted maternity leave built into corporate policy.

Check. They asked for it, they got it.

So what’s the problem?

Well, it seems some people don’t approve of the decisions these women have made. Some people think they’re short-shrifting their children; other people think they’re short-shrifting their jobs. In other words, people are being judgmental! Of course that happens only to strong, independent women and rarely to their lesser sisters – and never to men!

As Shirley Leung says, “Let’s all be honest about what this is: a double standard by any measure. . .. New fathers routinely return to work immediately after the birth of their children, but women who choose to do the same catch flak.”

Well, I suspect few men would give a damn about a choice made by some other man’s wife. But there are a number of reasons why women might look askance at these decisions made by alpha females. I’m guessing it’s largely because most women want to bond with that little bundle of protoplasm they’ve been carrying around for nine months and they can’t help but wonder about a woman who feels otherwise. That female herd instinct tends to work against mavericks.

Then there’s the whole nursing thing. Many feminists assert that men suck, but even they would have to admit that men do not give suck. Sticking a male nipple in an infant’s mouth is not likely to result in pacification. Said infant would likely react like a wildcatter who realizes he’s been working a dry hole.

Frankly, I could care less if the above women go full-time mom, hire a baby-sitter, drop the kid at a day-care center, dump the kid at grandma’s place, or give it up for adoption. I would draw the line at infanticide, but that’s just me being judgmental.

Even for the Boston elite, life is filled with dilemmas. They have far more options than their less affluent peers, but the poor darlings can’t find anyone to give them a pat on the back.

It takes a lot of hubris to expect everyone to support you in whatever decision you make. Remember that old maxim about it being a woman’s prerogative to change her mind? Gotta make sure the response is always “You go, girl.” Change your mind, go in the opposite direction, “You go, girl.” Go up, go down, go left, go right, go north, go south, go east, go west. The only acceptable response is, “You go, girl.”

Now if you’re a man and you not only had the freedom to do as you chose and you had your choice subsidized by your employer and the state, wouldn’t that be enough? Would you really give a damn whether or not anyone else supported your decision? It's like winning a contest where the prize is a chauffeur-driven limousine ferrying you and a guest to the most expensive restaurant in town for a couple of free meals and then bitching because the deal doesn't cover the tip.

Leung asserts, "A little less judgment and a little more support would go a long way." With this one assertion, she shows what a waste of time it is to attempt to satisfy women. Even with the gynocentrism express highballing it through every metropolis and whistlestop of society, the mantra remains, "We have a long way to go." But the timetable doesn't reveal a final destination. It's a runaway train!

Even if we could banish judgmentalism, the Boston blue bloods would find some other peccadillo to complain about. I can't help but recall my late mother's customary response to my childish complaints: "What do you want? An egg in your beer?"

At any rate, sure glad I didn't pay $3.00 for that newspaper. Articles like Shirley Leung's remind me of why I gave up on the press. I detest whining even when it's in print and I can turn the page.

The article does offer confirmation of the oft-made observation that feminism is largely the province of the well-to-do. As F. Scott Fitzgerald remarked, the rich are different, though few would respond with vive la différence.

But I do feel their pain to some extent. How could I remain indifferent to the plight of high-powered women forced to interview candidates for nannies?

Good help is so hard to find.

Ernest Belfort Bax Describes “Aggressive Weakness” Of Feminists

July 15, 2023 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

“Weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive.” E.B. Bax

> I instanced the Tooting tramway incident as an act of commendable pluck on the part of those concerned in it to boldly challenge the attempt of woman’s righters to “jump the claim” to chivalry as a special right of the sex they champion. But there is another point Feminists conveniently overlook. It is this: That granting the “weakness” argument, this very weakness, to whose claim chivalry may per se be granted, forfeits its claim when it presumes upon that claim and becomes aggressive. Aggressive weakness deserves no quarter – à la guerre, comme à la guerre.
> Social Democrat, Vol.13 no.9, September (1909).

> In the present article I have only dealt briefly with one aspect of this question. I may point out in conclusion that the existing state of public opinion on the subject registers the fact that sex-conscious women have exploited the muscular weakness of their sex and have succeeded in forging a weapon of tyranny called > “chivalry” which enables them to ride rough-shod over every principle of justice and fair play, Men are cowed by it, and fail to distinguish between simple weakness per se which should command every consideration, and that of aggressive weakness which trades upon “chivalry” and deserves no quarter.

> ‘Feminism and Female Suffrage’ in New Age, (1910)

> “Even taking the matter on the conventional ground of weakness and granting, for the sake of argument, the relative muscular weakness of the female as ground for her being allowed the immunity claimed by Modern Feminists of the sentimental school, the distinction is altogether lost sight of between weakness as such and aggressive weakness. Now I submit there is a very considerable difference between what is due to weakness that is harmless and unprovocative, and weakness that is aggressive, still more when this aggressive weakness presumes on itself as weakness, and on the consideration extended to it, in order to become tyrannical and oppressive. Weakness as such assuredly deserves all consideration, but aggressive weakness deserves none save to be crushed beneath the iron heel of strength. Woman at the present day has been encouraged by a Feminist public opinion to become meanly aggressive under the protection of her weakness. She has been encouraged to forge her gift of weakness into a weapon of tyranny against man, unwitting that in so doing she has deprived her weakness of all just claim to consideration or even to toleration.”

The argument for a principled approach

There are some questions that lie ahead of us that may seem easy to answer at first, but we need to understand the implications of everything we have done so far and what it has already spelled out for our future. Turning this behemoth of misandrist culture around is not going to be easy, I dare say not even possible without the type of wanton destruction it will cause itself as it collapses under its own weight. The fact of the matter is that every culture in every time has depended on the idea of male disposability for the "greater good"… and that "greater good" has often destroyed itself in the process of demanding too much from the individual to sustain the greater whole. It is a cyclical event, and the rise and fall of nation-states, or, at least, the bloody and horrific revolutions that occasionally visit them happen with such regularity that we barely bat an eyelid anymore.

The fact that these cyclical events can be evidenced over a period of 5000 years of human history does not mean that our futures have to remain so however. Within the Men's Right's Movement, I recognize the seeds of something far greater than anything that has come previously. I see a New Renaissance, a revitalization of individual freedoms and liberties, an unshackling of the chains of the destructive cycles of humanity, and the movement of humans toward a New Age.

Do not take the above paragraph for the idea that I envision some Utopian world. I see something far from it. Our struggles define who we are, but the question remains whether or not we should be struggling with ourselves, or with new innovations and becoming masters of the universe around us. I see all the wasted effort of hundreds of millions of lives in a struggle to control groups of humans, most of whom simply want peaceful lives for their loved ones. I am talking about changing the scope of our struggle from the predominantly Human Vs. the human paradigm we now have to a new one: Human vs. Environment.

"James, you are jumping the gun on this!"… and yes, I know that I am, and have done so with a purpose. The artist unveils the painting before explaining the creative process that brought him to it and the meaning behind it. It is the "What the fuck is that?" moment when looking at the canvas that unlocks something in the human psyche, and the artist can then explain the meaning as clear as fresh air.

Now pay attention to this next part.

Most humans are blinded by all the extraneous thought placed within political group-think. The moral questions of the day are framed in simple matters of right and wrong when dealing with the individual but seem ever so complicated when applied to the needs of a group of people, or how one group of people interact with another group of people. We get bogged down in old prejudice, financial matters, and resource allocation and everyone wants a slice of whatever is being served up next from their political masters.

Group W supports Politician X because they get Product D, never mind that Group M was forced at the point of a gun to give up their Product D by Politician X. Besides, that Group M has plenty of Product D, and not sharing it – never mind they were actually robbed of it – would be morally reprehensible. This type of thing happens every day, all day, seven days a week, 365 days a year.

Meanwhile, all those from Group M see that all their Product D is being "liberated" – I mean taken– from them so they naturally say "Why the fuck should we produce any more Product D if the guys holding all the guns are just going to take it from us and give it to a Group W, who can get it themselves. If they want it that bad, then they should get it on their own merit." This inevitably leads to bad feelings all around as Group W feels slighted because they have just been called lazy and have heard for years that having as much Product D as they want is a Right. Of course, they heard that from Politician X, who promises them as much Product D as they need – I mean want – as long as they support him.

Eventually some people in Group M feel as if they should be in Group W, and stop producing Product D. Some people in Group M don't want to be in Group W because they don't want to be seen as the lazy layabouts they think Group W is, so they form a new group called Group A and decide to produce Product R, which is intentionally of no value to Group W. This new product serves Group A's and Group M's purposes just fine. This pisses off Group W, who now get less Product D because there are not enough people making it, and they demand from Politician X that Group A be disbanded because the production of product R threatens their free access to Product D.

Meanwhile, those remaining in Group M feel disenfranchised by the whole affair and decrease the production of Product D even further to the point where they can only sustain themselves, keeping Group W from getting hardly any Product D at all! Some of Group W decide to get some Product D for themselves by working for it, but the majority of Group W have been told it is their Right to have Product D on demand so they stay within the group and threaten Politician X that if more Product D is not forthcoming, that Politician X will quickly find votes against him in favor of Politician B – who promises to not only make sure plenty of Product D is forthcoming but a New and Improved Product D+ as well!

Politician X, not wanting to sign books on the failure of his policies for the rest of his life forces Group A to disband on the threat of imprisonment or death and eventually tells everyone in Group M that if they do not begin producing Product D in surplus at once, and make some new and improved Product D+ as well, that he will be forced to bring people with guns to make sure they do it. The story is old… timeless even. We have the current atmosphere, or blank canvas if you will, and a couple of colors of paint to choose from. We can make new colors from those we have, but we have to think outside the palette.

As we can see, the simplified problem above can contain ever so much more complexity, and the arguments can even be turned on their heads entirely (just turn the canvas upside down). Maybe Group M really is full of mean spirited asses that put Politician X in power to create a dependent Group W just to keep their economic power. Maybe Group W has become lazy layabouts because the idea of Rights as espoused by Politician X was hopelessly flawed and Politician X was just looking for easy votes – or, at least, a stifling of revolutionaries by controlling Group W with empty promises. Maybe…just maybe….Group A really did say "fuck-it-all," we are going to make everyone suffer from an overproduction of Product R, which could supply Groups A and M but would totally screw over all those ass-hats in Group W and make them crawl on their knees and beg for the production of Product D again. "That would teach Group W to think so high and mighty of themselves!"

This simply proves the point of how hopeless political ideologies are today, and so too the base individuals that drive those ideologies off the cliff of human reason and straight into bloody conflicts, ruined lives, suffering children, and inter-species relationships between cats and dogs. Those cat-dogs are the true abominations most politicians tell us.

We need to regulate how cats and dogs love each other because the children of those unions are actually the cause of all those bloody conflicts, ruined lives, and suffering children. Never mind the fact we hold guns to peoples' heads to enact our failed policies to begin with.

Obfuscation of the real reasons as to why the State continually fails on every level is the order of the day….I mean of the decade….I mean of the century….fuck it. What I really mean to say is the phrase "Throughout All of the History of Every State."

Now we can add our paint to this canvas we have been provided. That paint takes the form, not of a new political ideology or religion, or anything most people are familiar with. That paint is a moral philosophy called First Principles, and its practice and application to every human being (Universality) is known as Universally Preferred Behavior. This is not a totalitarian approach from some top-down power but an approach from the individual to the outside world.

The Five Principles:

1) Personal Accountability
2) Personal Responsibility
3) Characterization by Merit
4) Non-Aggression, Non-Violence
5) Respect for Personal Property

These are the colors we want to work with. There are several reasons why.

Almost all of the social issues we deal with every day can be broken down by using the First Principles Approach. Affirmative Action fails Number One and Number Three. Alimony fails Number Four and Number Five from the perspective of the courts, and Numbers One and Two from the perspective of the ex-"insert spousal type" receiving the alimony. Quotas for boardrooms fail Numbers One, Two, and Three from the perspective of the company, and Numbers Four and Five from the perspective of the government enforcement of these laws. These are just a few ideas of how we can break these issues down and argue them. This is how we attack misandry no matter where it is in our society. Any refutation of a single portion of the five principles also results in the entirety of the First Principles collapsing.

1) Personal Accountability – An internal measurement of Merit. This is defined through self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion, and the willingness to face natural consequences for your decisions. It is primarily used as an honest form of self-assessment. It keeps unrealistic expectations and narcissism in check.

2) Personal Responsibility – The measure of external actions that can also be seen and judged by others. This one has a twofold process, one of which is redundant to personal accountability, but creates a tie between the self and the world outside of the self. This is the physical manifestation of personal accountability as judged by others in both deed and word, and the barometer of basic relationships with other people.

3) Characterization by Merit–The ability to judge others based upon their personal responsibility. This means other people should be judged by whether or not they are moving toward self-sufficiency without resorting to violence and coercion and whether they demonstrate a measure of personal accountability by facing the natural consequences of their actions. This is true regardless of external features of the individual being judged.

4) Non-Aggression/Non-Violence – Simply put…… Thou shalt not enforce thy will upon others through the use of threat of the loss of life or liberty, or by injury, or through the threat of loss of personal property (or by making good on said threats and simply taking what you want). This can be altered only in the scope of upholding contractual law in which consequences for breaking the contract are fully understood between both parties, or in defense of personal property rights.

5) Respect for Personal Property Rights – By which the fruits of all time and labor by an individual gained through self-sufficiency in any environment, or property gained through contractual agreements with other individuals is solely the possession of that individual and is not to be removed by any form of force or coercion. Another way to put it is the actual body of the individual, and anything created by the body (the tool of consciousness) is the exclusive property of that individual unless contractual agreements are signed between parties for the exchange of goods and services.

The key to understanding how to deconstruct all of our issues rests upon these five principles. It nullifies the idea of a social (socialized and statist) contract because contracts must be recognized and entered into by individuals, creates Universality of expectations of behavior between individuals, destroys cronyism in all its forms by creating a meritocracy, creates competition based on true supply and demand, generally allows self-interest and personal liberties to be followed without infringing upon the life and property of others, removes violence and coercion from a society that teaches these principles to their youngest, and increases the level of volunteerism in society to correct problems that cannot be solved through contractual agreements.

Apply these principles to individuals, and allow the influence of those principles to be seen in society, and you have a powerful force that is capable of pointing out misandry, true inequality of opportunity, and actual infringements upon individual rights no matter where it rests. This also becomes our most powerful tool on positing solutions to the myriad problems that boys and men face in today's society. No doubt these principles can be carried into every sphere of human interaction. My hope is that these ideas – these principles – are adopted by individuals in the MRM in order to paint a brighter future for you.

Ernest Belfort Bax on ‘Sentimental Feminism’ vs. ‘Political Feminism’

July 18, 2023 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

In the following quotes Bax describes ‘Sentimental Feminism’ and ‘Political Feminism’, a distinction having striking similarities to Naomi Wolf’s ‘Victim Feminism’ and ‘Power Feminism’ (coined 80 years after Bax). The main difference is that where Wolf sees Power Feminism as positive and Victim Feminism as negative, Bax described, convincingly, that both polarities of feminism acted corruptly.

> “Modern Feminism rose slowly above the horizon. Modern Feminism has two distinct sides to it: (1) an articulate political and economic side embracing demands for so-called rights; and (2) a sentimental side which insists in an accentuation of the privileges and immunities which have grown up, not articulately or as the result of definite demands, but as the consequence of sentimental pleading in particular cases. In this way, however, a public opinion became established, finding expression in a sex favouritism in the law and even still more in its administration, in favour of women as against men.
> These two sides of Modern Feminism are not necessarily combined in the same person. One may, for example, find opponents of female suffrage who are strong advocates of sentimental favouritism towards women in matters of law and its administration. On the other hand you may find, though this is more rare, strong advocates of political and other rights for the female sex, who sincerely deprecate the present inequality of the law in favour of women. As a rule, however, the two sides go together, the vast bulk of the advocates of “Women’s > Rights" being equally keen on the retention and extension of women's privileges. Indeed, it would seem as though the main object of the bulk of the advocates of the "Woman's Movement" was to convert the female sex into the position of a dominant sexe noblesse. The two sides of Feminism have advanced hand in hand for the last two generations, though it was the purely sentimental side that first appeared as a factor in public opinion."

> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter I: Historical (1913)

> "Up to this time (the close of the eighteenth century) no advance whatever had been made by legislation in recognising the modern theory of sex quality. The claims of women and their apologists for entering upon the functions of men, political, social or otherwise, although put forward from time to time by isolated individuals, received little countenance from public opinion, and still less from the law. What I have called, however, the sentimental aspect of Modern Feminism undoubtedly did make some headway in public opinion by the end of the eighteenth century, and grew in volume during the early years of the nineteenth century. It effectuated in the Act passed in 1820 by the English Parliament abolishing the punishment of flogging for female criminals. This was the first beginning of the differentiation of the sexes in the matter of the criminal law. The parliamentary debate on the Bill in question shows clearly enough the power that Sentimental [1] Feminism had acquired in public opinion in the course of a generation, for no proposal was made at the same time to abolish the punishment of flogging so far as men were concerned. Up to this time the criminal law of England, as of other countries, made no distinction whatever between the sexes in the matter of crime and punishment, or at least no distinction based on the principle or sentiment of sex privilege. (A slight exception might be made, perhaps, in the crime of "petty treason," which distinguished the murder of a husband by his wife from other cases of homicide.) But from this time forward, legislation and administration have diverged farther and farther from the principle of sex equality in this connection in favour of female immunity, the result being that at the present day, assuming the punishment meted out to the woman for a given crime to represent a normal penalty, the man receives an additional increment over and above that accorded to the crime, for the offence of having been born a man and not a woman….
> [1] I should explain that I attach a distinct meaning to the word sentimental; as used by me it does not signify, as it does with most people, an excess of sentiment over and above what I feel myself, but a sentiment unequally distributed. As used in this sense, the repulsion to the flogging of women while no repulsion is felt to the flogging of men is sentimentalism pure and simple. On the other hand the objection to flogging altogether as punishment for men or women could not be described as sentimentalism, whatever else it might be. In the same way the anti-vivisectionist's aversion to "physiological" experiments on > animals, if confined to household pets and not extended to other animals, might be justly described as sentimentalism; but one who objected to such experiments on all animals, no matter whether one agreed with his point of view or not, could not be justly charged with sentimentalism (or at least, not unless, while objecting to vivisection, he or she were prepared to condone other acts involving an equal amount of cruelty to animals)."

> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter I: Historical (1913)

> "The basis of this side of Feminism is a sentimentalism – i.e. an unequally distributed sentiment in favour of women, traditional and acquired. It is seldom even attempted to base this sentimental claim for women on argument at all. The utmost attempts in this direction amount to vague references to physical weakness, and to the claim for special consideration deriving from the old theory of the mental and moral weakness of the female sex, so strenuously combated as out of date, when the first side of Modern Feminism is being contended for. The more or less inchoate assumptions of the second or sentimental side of the modern "Woman's Movement" amounts practically, as already stated, to a claim for women to be allowed to commit crimes without incurring the penalties imposed by the law for similar crimes when committed by men. It should be noted that in practice the most strenuous advocates of the positive and articulate side of Feminism are also the sincerest upholders of the unsubstantial and inarticulate assumptions of the sentimental side of the same creed. This is noticeable whenever a woman is found guilty of a particularly atrocious crime. It is somewhat rare for women to be convicted of such crimes at all, since the influence of sentimental Feminism with judges and juries is sufficient to procure an acquittal, no matter how conclusive the evidence to the contrary."
> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter II: The Main Dogma of Modern Feminism

> "WE have already pointed out that Modern Feminism has two sides or aspects. The first formulates definite political, juridical and economic demands on the grounds of justice, equity, equality and so forth, as general principles; the second does not formulate in so many words definite demands as general principles, but seems to exploit the traditional notions of chivalry based on male sex sentiment, in favour of according women special privileges on the ground of their sex, in the law, and still more in the administration of the law. For the sake of brevity we call the first Political Feminism, for, although its demands are not confined to the political sphere, it is first and foremost a political movement, and its typical claim at the present time, the Franchise, is a purely political one; and the second Sentimental Feminism, inasmuch as it commonly does not profess to be based on any general principle whatever, whether of equity or otherwise, but relies exclusively on the traditional and conventional sex sentiment of Man towards Woman. It may be here premised that most Political Feminists, however much they may refuse to admit it, are at heart also Sentimental Feminists. Sentimental > Feminists, on the other hand, are not invariably Political Feminists, although the majority of them undoubtedly are so to a greater or lesser extent. Logically, as we shall have occasion to insist upon later on, the principles professedly at the root of Political Feminism are in flagrant contradiction with any that can justify Sentimental Feminism."

> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter III: The Anti-Man Crusade

> "WHILE what we have termed Political Feminism vehemently asserts its favourite dogma, the intellectual and moral equality of the sexes – that the woman is as good as the man if not better – Sentimental Feminism as vehemently seeks to exonerate every female criminal, and protests against any punishment being meted out to her approaching in severity that which would be awarded a man in a similar case. It does so on grounds which presuppose the old theory of the immeasurable inferiority, mental and moral, of woman, which are so indignantly spurned by every Political Feminist – i.e. in his or her capacity as such. We might suppose, therefore, that Political Feminism, with its theory of sex equality based on the assumption of equal sex capacity, would be in strong opposition in this matter with Sentimental Feminism, which seeks, as its name implies, to attenuate female responsibility on grounds which are not distinguishable from the old-fashioned assumption of inferiority. But does Political Feminism consistently adopt this logical position? Not one whit. It is quite true that some Feminists, when hard pressed, may grudgingly concede the untenability on rational grounds of the Sentimental Feminists' claims. But taken as a whole, and in their practical dealings, the Political Feminists are in accord with the Sentimental Feminists in claiming female immunity on the ground of sex. This is shown in every case where a female criminal receives more than a nominal sentence."
> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter IV: Always the "Injured Innocent"!

> "Chivalry to-day means the woman, right or wrong, just as patriotism to-day means "my country right or wrong." In other words, chivalry to-day is only another name for Sentimental Feminism. Every outrageous pretension Of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, "manliness." It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of "manliness." The plucky Welshmen at Llandystwmdwy in their dealings with the suffragette rowdies on memorable occasion showed themselves capable of doing this. In fact one good effect generally of militant suffragetteism seems to be the weakening of the notion of chivalry – i.e. in its modern sense of Sentimental Feminism – amongst the populace of this country.

> The combination of Sentimental Feminism with its invocation of the old-world sentiment of chivalry which was based essentially on the assumption of the mental, moral and physical inferiority of woman to man, for its justification, with the pretensions of modern Political Feminism, is simply grotesque in its inconsistent absurdity. In this way Modern Feminism would fain achieve the feat of eating its cake and having it too. When political and economic rights are in question, bien entendu, such as involve gain and social standing, the assumption of inferiority magically disappears before the strident assertion of the dogma of the equality of woman with man – her mental and moral equality certainly! When, however, the question is of a different character – for example, for the relieving of some vile female criminal of the penalty of her misdeeds-then Sentimental Feminism comes into play, then the whole plaidoyer is based on the chivalric sentiment of deference and consideration for poor, weak woman."
> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake

> "Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of' "What! Hit a woman!"
> Why not, if she molests you?
> "Treat a woman in this way!" "Shame!" responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender."

> The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement

> "In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.
> As for Political Feminism, we have shown that this largely has its root in a fallacious application of the notion of democracy, partaking largely of the logical fallacy known technically as a dicto secundum quid ad dictum simpliciter. This logical fallacy of Political Feminism is, of course, reinforced and urged forward by Sentimental Feminism. As coming under the head of the psychology of the movement, we have also called attention to some curious phenomena of logical imbecility, noticeable in the utterances of educated women in the suffragette agitation."

The Scourge of Fatherlessness and the Death of God

July 19, 2023 | by David Solway | Link | Original Link

If God is dead, all things are permitted.

—Ivan Karamazov in The Brothers Karamazov

There is a father absence crisis in society, observes the National Fatherhood Initiative. "According to the U.S. Census Bureau, 18.3 million children, 1 in 4, live without a biological, step, or adoptive father in the home," it reports. This is generating a cascade of social ills: poverty, depression, drug abuse, social maladjustment, school dropout and criminal behaviour. An assessment by the academic journal PubMedCentral supports these findings, citing as well an effect on adult mental health. "The psychological harms of father absence experienced during childhood," the authors write, "persist throughout the life course." The study makes it clear that this is not only an American phenomenon. It is a societal curse across the national board and is especially notable in developed nations where, comparatively speaking, missed opportunities abound for personal growth and economic advancement.

Closeness to the father during childhood brings social and economic advantages, including better education and work opportunities as well as reduced risk of imprisonment and early pregnancy. (Source of all images: Shutterstock)

The Fatherhood Project has accumulated the essential data on the problem of fatherless households, relying on studies in Psychology Today and on the 2007 UNICEF report on the well-being of children in economically advantaged nations. Children in Canada, the U.S. and the UK, UNICEF finds, "rank extremely low in regard to social and emotional well-being." The data show that children who feel a closeness to their father are "twice as likely as those who do not to enter college or find stable employment after high school, 75% less likely to have a teen birth [and] 80% less likely to spend time in jail."

A number of reasons have been proposed to account for the current fatherhood crisis. In the U.S., mid-1960s President Lyndon Johnson's "War on Poverty" and the highly interventionist Economic Opportunity Act led to an explosion of out-of-wedlock households. “When the War on Poverty began in 1964,” observes The Sentinel-Record, “only 7 percent of children were born to unmarried women. Now, that figure is closer to 60 percent.”

While the social ills have not been as extreme in Canada – or at least not as apparent – federal and provincial government policies have created equally grotesque behavioural incentives and the overall trend, although slower than in the U.S., has been sadly in the same direction. As this C2C Journal story discussed, the majority of Canadians no longer consider marriage particularly important, with only 65 percent of Canadian couples being married and 28 percent of households headed by a single parent as of 2016. Other research, the article noted, has found that marital status – in particular, being divorced or never-married – are two of the top predictors of mortality in adults, while married couples, the article noted, “enjoy longer lives, less stress, better sex and happier children.” The last being particularly on point here. Stable families with married parents are good for children.

As The Heritage Foundation comments regarding the collapse of marriage, “More than two-thirds of all poor families with children in the U.S. are headed by single parents.” The overwhelming majority of these are women. R. Claire Friend, writing in the L.A. Times’ Daily Pilot, does not mince words. “This single piece of public policy has…turned traditional America into a culture of fatherlessness.”

Beautiful idea: The 60s-era “War on Poverty” was meant to eradicate social ills, but accelerated widespread family breakdown among the urban poor.

Kate Millett, whose 1969 Sexual Politics was considered the bible of the women’s movement, despised the traditional family because of its primary role in “the socialization of the young.” The very characteristic that normal folk through the ages have considered the family’s most laudatory role was, to her, an evil to be extinguished. Like other feminists, Millett advocated a new arrangement in order that socialization and even reproduction itself could take place outside the family to achieve revolutionary and utopian goals. As Belinda Brown writes in The Conservative Woman, “Feminists set out to destroy marriage, to rip men out of families, to render men impotent, to set men and women apart." Feminism has gone a long way to quite literally unman the cultures where it flourishes.

"The bible of the women's movement": Feminist Kate Millett's Sexual Politics.

Feminism is but one manifestation of the secular Left's war against Judeo-Christian Western civilization. In his Critique of Hegel's Philosophy of Right, Karl Marx famously declared that "religion is the opiate of the people" and that "the criticism of Heaven turns into the criticism of Earth." God in his mind was a human artifact and had to be dethroned from what was nothing less than a monarchical delusion. Moreover, Marx regarded marriage and the presumably godlike authority of the breadwinning husband as an opiate equally addictive. In the Communist Manifesto and The German Ideology, he defined marriage as legalized prostitution and a form of female slavery.

Similarly, in The Origin of the Family, Private Property and the State, Marx's collaborator and patron Friedrich Engels made the left's ultraist agenda absolutely clear, referring to "the pairing family and inoculated monogamy" as a community of "leaden ennui" that had to be dismantled. These doctrines were later embraced and vigorously put in practice by a feminist sorority asserting its cultural dominance. But here we have to go back a little further – beyond government policy and modern leftism – to discern where this doctrinal parti pris ultimately comes from.

Karl Marx (left) and Friedrich Engels (right) did not merely aim to subvert capitalism, they were gunning to destroy the traditional family, which they despised.

There is a third factor of overarching significance which likely clarifies the cultural and civilizational malaise we are experiencing, and for which there may be no evident and certainly no immediate solution. The vast and catastrophic social effects of fatherlessness arise from an even vaster scourge of which the current affliction is merely a cameo expression. This is the eschatological patricide that has gradually but inexorably befallen the West, the death of the biblical God. The precise moment of the tragic execution cannot be forensically determined; incorporeal lividity is measured in centuries. The scholarly consensus taps the heliocentric revolution of the 16th Century and the Enlightenment of the 18-19th centuries as the historically etiological moments.

God the Father was no longer considered necessary. Copernicus displaced Earth from the center of the divine Creation and Darwin substituted the jungle for the Garden. As Friedrich Nietzsche wrote in The Gay Science, articulating one of the most shattering of theo-philosophical statements, Gott is tot, "God is dead." He meant something other than the fabrications of the clergy but the basic and accepted truth of religion itself – that is, in Danish thinker Soren Kierkegaard's terms from Either/Or, the truth of Christianity, not the constructions of Christendom. As a result, the moral structure governing the civilization of the Christian West, which depended on divine law and heavenly warrant, was dismissed as obsolete, if not nonexistent.

Marx regarded marriage and the presumably godlike authority of the breadwinning husband as an opiate equally addictive to religion. In the 'Communist Manifesto' and 'The German Ideology', he defined marriage as legalized prostitution and a form of female slavery.

For Nietzsche this was, as we say, both a good thing and a bad thing: a good thing since, once bereft of the divine claim upon his conduct, man was free to create his own values and meaning, to become the Übermensch, the "Overman," who rejoices in a new dawn and whose "spirit now wills his own will," as he put it in Thus Spake Zarathustra; a bad thing because men are weak, desiring comfort, caution and security above all, settling into a hedonistic and philistine life, unable or unwilling to struggle for the heights, thus becoming that "most contemptible thing – the last man," whose will is "a will to nothingness."

The idea of the Overman is the origin of the 20th century philosophy of existentialism, in which man assumes priority over the divine and becomes responsible for creating his own "transvaluation of values" in a disenfranchised world. We see its literary sources in Dostoevsky's Crime and Punishment (though here redemption ensues), André Gide's Lafcadio's Adventures (aka The Vatican Cellars), and Albert Camus' The Stranger and The Myth of Sisyphus with their dual themes of motiveless violence and personal autonomy. Each theme reveals the primacy of pure will in a world empty of spiritual consequences. Man makes his own morality and becomes his own father in a world without communal reciprocity or spiritual transcendence.

Of course, Nietzsche did not presume to mean that God was actually dead, but that the idea of God had begun to leech from the Western psyche, leaving only sporadic traces: "There may still be caves for thousands of years where his shadow will be revealed." This amounted only to the tenebrous remnant of faith. Our situation was increasingly precarious. "For some time now our whole European civilization has been moving as toward a catastrophe," toward nihilism and anomie, he prophesied in Twilight of the Idols. A master of void detection, Nietzsche feared that man might not be capable of enacting a "transvaluation of all values" and that the latter option of acedia (listlessness or torpor) and rootlessness would prevail.

The children have grown up in a single-parent household, minus the guiding influence of a stern and loving father. In consequence, they have become wayward, uncontrolled, incapable of governing their impulses, and grandly self-infatuated. Devoid of a supervening moral code, they roam a world largely empty of meaning and purpose, their own lack of humility and spiritual governance further sucking it dry.

The curse of fatherlessness has percolated down to the domestic household in which the mother has acquired pre-eminence. Nature has triumphed over God, Pachamama over Jehovah. The father languishes in a state of bankruptcy and institutional disdain now that, in the psyche of the West, the androcentric universe has been abolished and replaced by a matricentric social cosmos. Obviously, peace and harmony were never guaranteed under any parental dispensation. The fallen realm could never be what the early Christians called a praetum felicitatis, a blessed and fruitful haven of peace immune to the ravages of a dark and unhouseled world. The world was always, so to speak, a crepuscular dimension. But from the perspective of faith and tradition, there were patches of sunlight rather than only caves of Nietzschean shadows.

We might say that once God the Father had impregnated Mother Nature, He was no longer needed. The mother was sufficient to care for her children, with the father displaced and consigned to a tenement somewhere in the shambles of an anarchic and nihilistic civilizational barrio.

Once the concept of fatherhood was discredited, once the father was transformed into a pariah, in heaven and then on earth, the disintegration of even relative order, in the individual spirit as well as the domestic milieu, followed in the West. Our civilization would be at war with itself. As Joseph Ratzinger, Pope Benedict XVI, wrote in The Spirit of Liturgy, we are living in a culture that has lost its "vital principle," that is, the binding element of sustainable relationships under God. Rather, the curse of dispossession and fratricidal conflict was foreordained. Life in a fatherless household and a derelict social world reproduces in little the experience of life in a Fatherless universe, a declension inexorably "evolving" over the centuries.

In his great essay Psychology & Religion, Carl Jung developed the notion he called the "Law of Correspondence," predicated on the legendary Emerald Tablet of Hermes Trismegistus with its famous maxim, "As above, so below." That is, as in the macrocosm, so in the microcosm. Jung believed in the fundamental unity of ordinary life, dream life and spiritual life under the arc of history – what he termed the mysterium coniunctionis.

Of course, Jung (like Nietzsche, a pastor's son) was a quasi-mystical psychiatrist/magus who thought of himself as a healer of souls rather than a theologian or professional historian, but the Law of Correspondence is not without foundation, not only from an occult but a historical standpoint – as Nietzsche also understood. What happens in the historical orbit around a theological centre also happens in the individual soul. The esoteric maxim “As above, so below,” expressing the idea that the human world is related to the divine or celestial regions, would apply in the domestic domain as well. When the Creating Father is deposed from his seat, so in the course of time is the terrestrial father evicted from his hearth. And the children are adrift in time, without heritage and endowment.

As we have seen, public policy and gender ideology are not the whole story, not by a long shot. The larger story has to do with the idea of the logos (Greek: reason), the Stoic belief in a spiritual principle permeating the whole of reality, reinterpreted centuries later in the Gospel of John as “the Word” – a theme popularly explored today by Jordan Peterson in his lectures and works. In the Hebrew Torah, the logos is consistent with the notion of “the Law” (torah or mitzvah in Hebrew, nomos in Greek).

However we look at it, whether as logos, nomos, torah or mitzvah, the idea is the same: the teaching of a parent, involving the attributes of discipline, strength and encouragement, the estate of the caring and lawgiving Father. It is the deep intuition of a transcendent and didactic authority that has gone missing in the life of the West, leading to the exile of the father and the dispossession of the children, and to a debilitating condition of moral equivalence and amoral relativism.

We may very likely find ourselves living in the grim time foretold by Nietzsche. ‘The earth has become small,’ he wrote, ‘and on it hops the Last Man, who makes everything small. His species is ineradicable as the flea; the Last Man lives longest.

Tweet

In the words of Archbishop Carlo Maria Viganó, “If God is rejected as Father, there must no longer be paternity even in the natural order, because natural fatherhood is a mirror of divine paternity.” Put differently, if our civilization does not awaken to its vital and conceptual origins in first principles, by which I don’t mean the Big Bang but a higher, governing, encompassing and life-giving power, however mysterious, however negotiated in the major faiths that underpin the Judeo-Christian civilization of the West, there can be no pulling back from the precipice before us. For a religious temperament like Viganó, and for many in the Western theological and philosophical tradition, there can be no father without the Father, and without the father the process of cultural continuance is undermined and eventually broken.

Catholic Jungians? Both Pope Benedict XVI (left) and Archbishop Carlo Maria Viganó (right) have lamented how a Fatherless universe is soon reflected in fatherless families and households.

It stands to reason, then, that the earthly father will not be reinstated to his position of customary authority in the home until the spirit of the West is reunited with the supervening Creative principle – should it descend once again into history. Failing which, we may very likely find ourselves living in the grim time foretold by Nietzsche. “The earth has become small,” he wrote, “and on it hops the Last Man, who makes everything small. His species is ineradicable as the flea; the Last Man lives longest.”

Nietzsche was right, in more ways than he could have known.

1913: Pressure placed on publishers and editors by the Feminist sisterhood was well known

> "When, however, the bluff is exposed… then the apostles of feminism, male and female, being unable to make even a plausible case out in reply, with one consent resort to the boycott, and by ignoring what they cannot answer, seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known." [The Fraud of Feminism, (1913) pp.1-2]

> "The task of Feminism is to paint a privileged sex in the colours of an oppressed one. Naturally this difficult task can only be accomplished by a game of "bluff" of the most impudent kind and by the wholesale "hocussing" of public opinion by falsehoods, and at the same time by the most strenuous attempts to prevent the light of fact being let in.
> Of the latter there has been evidence only recently within the SDP in the demand of Mr. Herbert Burrows at the Conference that the pamphlet 'The Legal Subjection of Men' – in which the present state of the law and its administration between the sexes is given – should be suppressed, and also in the representations made to the Editor from a "Women's Committee" of the body that I should be muzzled and any statement of mine adverse to Feminism be excluded from the party organs." Women's Privileges and "Rights", Social Democrat, Vol.13 no.9, September 1909, pp.385-391

> "All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one > point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression. Editors of newspapers, keen to scent out every drift of public fancy with the object of regaling their “constant readers” with what is tickling to their palates, will greedily print, in prominent positions and in large type letters expressive of the view in question, whilst they will boycott or, at best, publish in obscure corners any communication that ventures to criticise the popular theory or that adduces facts that tell against it.

> Were I to pen an impassioned diatribe, tending to prove the villainy of man towards woman, and painting in glowing terms the poor, weak victim of his despotism, my description would be received with sympathetic approval. Oppenheimer

July 23, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

I don't go to the cinema much. I concluded decades ago that Hollywood would only change if they were starved of funds. That was before they went really woke of course. At the time I just wanted them to put out better content. Since then the movies produced by Hollywood have become significantly worse. The last movie I recall paying for was District 9 in 2009. I did see Wreck-It Ralph with my family in 2012 but we won those tickets. Thus it would be fair to say I've lived by my credo of trying to starve the Hollywood beast.

I nearly didn't see Oppenheimer. Some comments by Robert Downey Jr. caused me to suspect the movie might be woke. While working on the movie Downey commented:

> "Men start wars and the entire planet should be a matriarchy. But I've never changed position on that. This [the movie] was just a triple confirmation."

Downey's comments go directly against what we know about female rulers, who are more likely to start and continue wars than male rulers.

Ultimately I concluded that his comments didn't reflect on the movie itself and that making a movie like this woke would be quite a feat.

This article contains minimal spoilers, such as they would be. Perhaps there wouldn't be many spoilers with such well documented events.

J. Robert Oppenheimer was a theoretical physicist and is often called the father of the atomic bomb.

As a history and science nerd I'm familiar with the story and also the physics underlying the atomic bomb. Despite essentially being a biopic the movie is very fast paced and I suspect that people who do not have familiarity with the subject matter would struggle to understand some parts of the film. There is often very little exposition in the dialogue.

A good example of this is the difference between the types of weapons that Oppenheimer was working on, which use nuclear fission, and hydrogen bombs. Apart from one line about a small fission weapon being needed to start the fusion process of a hydrogen bomb there is nothing in the dialogue that explains the difference. It is assumed that viewers will simply know this.

Similarly, the fact that two designs were being worked on in parallel is evident from the story but not pointed out. The bombs shipped off to be used in war are never named in the movie either.

There were also a number of scenes where clues are dropped about an impending reveal. I recognised these due to my familiarity with the story but I don't believe that the narrative would be harmed if someone missed them.

Niels Bohr and Werner Heisenberg appear briefly which is a treat for any physics geeks that know their important contributions.

Two figures prominent in the historical events, General Groves and Edward Teller, were both regarded as very prickly characters. Difficult to get along with. I suspect some of their contemporaries might have described them as assholes. The movie somewhat plays this down in both cases. Yes they are shown as being difficult but the historical record seems to suggest they were significantly worse.

I judge that the movie was, unusually for Hollywood in the 2020s, not woke. This is with the possible exception of one scene. Oppenheimer's wife Kitty is being interviewed during a small closed-door inquiry. The inquiry had interviewed many men, leaving them all twisted in knots from the questioning. Kitty deftly handles all of the questions put to her and leaves everyone listening in no doubt that she won the verbal exchange.

It's notable that two of the three women Oppenheimer is shown to be romantically involved with were professionally trained. Kitty was a biologist but had traded the lab for diapers. His on-again off-again girlfriend, Jean Tatlock, was a clinical psychiatrist and thus a qualified medical doctor. Tell me again how women didn't work until second-wave feminism came along. I talk extensively about women's involvement in historical societies in my upcoming book, The Victorian Fallacy. Hint: the feminists are lying to you.

They make it clear that Kitty is an alcoholic and violent towards Robert Oppenheimer. They don't dwell on this though. She isn't shown hitting him but she does throw a small bottle at him during a drunken rage. I'd call this intimate partner violence but perhaps the writers and producers didn't. In any case the movie is nearly three hours long and delving further in to this would have made it longer still. I don't blame them for moving the story on.

Going in I was wondering if the movie would take a position on the use of the atomic bombs on Hiroshima and Nagasaki. Ultimately the movie took a nuanced approach to this which would have been closer to the positions of people alive at the time. Although it was not named the movie talked briefly about Operation Downfall, the planned land invasion of Japan by the allies. Planners projected a land invasion would result in many millions of human deaths, mostly Japanese.

Towards the end of the movie Oppenheimer laments dropping the bombs on an enemy which was nearly defeated. I suspect this is somewhat anachronistic. The world was at the end of a conflagration that had killed tens of millions of people. Contemporary news reports often spoke casually about the death and destruction happening around the world at the time. I believe that this is representative of how desensitised people were after years of war. The contemporary position in allied leadership was that the Japanese government and people were prepared to fight on and Operation Downfall would have likely proceeded had it not been for the atomic bombs. The decision ultimately fell to President Truman. He made his choice and the world has debated it ever since.

I actually think the movie could have been successfully released as two parts, or expanded further with more exposition and made in to a trilogy. In any case it was a fine movie and I'm glad I saw it.

What Defines a Real MGTOW?

July 25, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

This article was originally published in 2014. – Eds.

In this piece I'll be looking at the opposite of MGTOW, at what MGTOW isn't, in order to throw MGTOW into sharp relief against impostors. Naturally, this is my own take, one of numerous that abound on the Internet and one that comes with no special authority and no assumption that I speak for others.

By now many are familiar with the concept of male self-determination as a basic working definition for MGTOW. Self-determination is the practice whereby a man makes choices and decisions based on his own preferences and interests, monitors and regulates his own actions, and is generally self-directing.

Simple enough.

That leads to a consideration of the opposite of male self-determination, i.e., determination of self by other (DOSBO). Determination of self by other limits the definition of MGTOW and in one stroke negates the claim that MGTOW can mean anything a person wants it to mean. By applying the DOSBO rule, no person can qualify as a MGHOW if he hands over a significant amount of his sovereignty to another entity. Here are some examples illustrating DOSBO in action.

Example 1: Pro-feminist men

On the face of it, we might assume pro-feminist men are self-determined for having made a choice to be led by the spirit and letter of feminism. It hardly needs saying that this amounts to a false assumption.

The only self-determined decision such men make is an initial one to give up self-determination altogether in favor of determination of self by other—which is, of course, the antithesis of self-determination and thereby disqualifies MGTOW status for such men according to the DOSBO yardstick.

Example 2: Married men

This example is a bit trickier because it raises the question of whether the DOSBO factor is actual or merely potential for a particular married man.

The question to ask about such a man is this: Is he entering the marriage to willfully participate in a gynocentric charade? Sadly, the vast majority of men are doing precisely that, which indicates that the DOSBO factor is actual—such a man cannot qualify as MGTOW under this definition because he is ceding his self-determination to the will of women and the state.

Alternatively, if a man undertakes to symbolize his love through the ritual of marriage while at the same time assuming he's rejecting the gynocentric aspect imposed by the state, can that man call himself a MGHOW while the DOSBO factor looms in potential due to his wife's latent legal power? Is this man, rare as he may be, a MGHOW?

This is where I stop short of saying he absolutely cannot be—although I would certainly call him foolhardy if he entered a marriage while knowing the enormous risks involved. He is actually a MGHOW in behavior because he is temporarily "doing his own thing" with his wife's momentary blessing, but he is potentially a man whose life can be determined by his wife and the government if she so chooses. While I look at what is actual instead of what is potential, I'm forced to conclude that he retains some semblance of a MGHOW.

Example 3: Traditionalists

Like marriage, traditionalism needs defining because not all traditionalism is the same—it is not all gynocentric. Traditionalism is a big basket of historical practices that may or may not be limiting of male self-determination. To simply say "All tradition is bad for men" is a blunt instrument that begs debunking. A better approach might be to ask, Which aspects of traditionalism are limiting to male freedoms?

"Traditional gender roles" is a more precise name for the problem, although it too suffers from lack of discrimination. Is it some traditional gender roles, most traditional gender roles, or all traditional gender roles that are bad? Was it bad for men to have the freedom to enjoy male-only fraternal organizations such as the Elks, Masons, Golden Fleece, and others,[1] or was it oppressive for men to have male-only drinking saloons, pool halls, or sporting clubs? These too were the result of traditional gender divisions.

To use a more controversial example, was it limiting of male self-determination for a woman to stay home during the first two years after giving birth (not beyond!) to breast-feed while the husband worked? Or to take this further, is it limiting for a couple of today to employ the same traditional role division, but reversed, whereby the father stays at home and bottle-feeds a baby while the woman works full-time?

Are not some aspects of role-division benign?

While I leave the answer to these questions open, I'm going to suggest that a much more precise term than either "traditionalism" or "traditional gender roles" would be traditional gynocentrism. Gynocentrism is the main perpetrator in limiting male freedom, and for that reason it is more precise to finger the gynocentric thread of traditionalism.

Moving beyond subjectivism

As a limiting principle, DOSBO delivers MGTOW from the meaninglessness of subjectivism, delivers it from the claim that MGTOW has no inherent meaning, or that it can mean whatever the hell a person wants it to mean. It gives a precise meaning with real meta ideological commitments. Whether or not DOSBO proves of wider value is not important, but it will hopefully stimulate discussion about what precisely are the things that all MGTOW hold in common.

Notes

[1] Edward Ward, The Secret History of Clubs, published 1709. [This is one of hundreds of titles detailing traditional male clubs, guilds, and fraternities. The examples given show that the clubs were riotous places of laughter, male bonding, drinking, inventing and collaborating on various projects, and above all were places to enjoy a little self-chosen freedom. Married and bachelor men alike participated, and in the majority of clubs no women were allowed to set foot].

Southern Poverty Law Center removed A Voice for Men as a hate group in 2022

July 26, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC) quietly removed A Voice for Men as an active hate group in the United States in 2022. Their justification? That it's being run "out of Australia" by me. Here it is in their own words:

> The number of male supremacist groups remained stagnant in 2022. A Voice for Men is no longer listed as an active hate group in the United States because it is now being operated out of Australia by Robert Brockway. However, a new group, XY Crew, was added. Paul Elam announced the creation of this new Men's Rights Activist group in January 2022 while he explained his departure from A Voice for Men.

The wording is interesting:

> A Voice for Men is no longer listed as an active hate group in the United States because it is now being operated out of Australia by Robert Brockway.

The word active and the phrase in the United States seem to have been quietly slipped in. Note how they are absent from the original announcement that A Voice for Men had been added as a hate group:

> Also, for the first time, the SPLC added two male supremacy groups to the hate group list: A Voice for Men, based in Houston, and Return of Kings, based in Washington, D.C. The vilification of women by these groups makes them no different than other groups that demean entire populations, such as the LGBT community, Muslims or Jews, based on their inherent characteristics.

When I first saw this I suspected that they had used the change in management as an excuse to remove A Voice for Men from their list of hate groups because they realised it should never have been there in the first place. But for one thing…

XY Crew was added as a hate group at the same time that A Voice for Men was removed. While the arguments for adding A Voice for Men are specious, it seems difficult to imagine there are any arguments for adding XY Crew. SPLC, you've done it again.

I want to make it very clear to SPLC that we're as focused on issues facing men and boys in the United States as we ever were. A Voice for Men speaks to men around the world.

Given that SPLC no longer considers A Voice for Men to be a hate group we're going to appeal bans on Facebook and elsewhere. Let's have some fun.

Unlike the person in the cover image SPLC has no shortage of funds. For the financial year ending on 31 October 2021 SPLC reported assets of more than $801 million including nearly $770 million in investments. They also reported income of nearly $133 million for the same financial year. Pretty well to do for a 501(c)(3) nonprofit organisation with poverty in the name. You can read about it yourself on their IRS Form 990.

Ernest Belfort Bax on Rights and Responsibilities (1887 – 1913)

July 27, 2023 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

Ernest Belfort Bax reported that early feminists had little understanding of rights and responsibilities – PW.

> "These dogmas of "advanced" faith in the Woman Question are… namely, that women ought to have all the rights of intellectual capacity with all the privileges of physical weakness, otherwise expressed, all the rights of men, and none of the duties or hardships of men. For it is a significant and amusing fact that no mention is ever made by the advocate of women's claims of the privileges which have always been accorded the "weaker sex." These privileges are quietly pocketed as a matter of course, without any sort of acknowledgment, much less any suggestion of surrender."Some Heterodox Notes on the Women Question (1887)

> "Now in order to maintain this position it is necessary to assume the complete intellectual and moral equality of women with men, while judiciously conceding their physical inferiority. A desire, conscious or unconscious, on the part of these Socialists, as of other advocates of Feminism, is to make out a claim for women to all that is honourable and agreeable in the functions of human life, while safeguarding them from any obligation to accept rough or dangerous duties. Thus Bebel, in his "Frau und der Sozialismus," while maintaining that no social function filled by men ought to be inaccessible to women, since any seeming unfitness in the latter is only the result of certain cruel oppression at the hands of vile man, yet is careful to guard his fair clients from the danger of being called upon for military purposes, even of defence."Feminism in Extremis (1902)

> "What does the woman's-rights movement demand? Female privilege, and when possible, female domination. It asks that women shall have all the rights of men with privileges thrown in (but no disagreeable duties, oh dear no!), and apparently be subject to no discipline but that of their own arbitrary wills. To exclude women on the ground of incapacity from any honourable, lucrative, or agreeable social function whatever, is a hideous injustice to be fulminated against from platform and in press – to treat them on the same footing as men in the matter of subordination to organised control or discipline is not to be thought of – is ungentlemanly ungallant, unchivalrous! … Advanced women and their male supporters in demanding all that is lucrative, honourable, and agreeable in the position of men take their stand on the dogma of sex-equality. No sooner, however, is the question one of disagreeable duties than "equality" goes by the > board and they slink behind the old sex-immunity.”The “Monstrous Regiment” of Womanhood (1907)

> “From all we have said, it will now be evident, one would think, to the most prejudiced reader that modern English Law, following obsequiously a deluded or apathetic stage of public opinion, has solved the problem of the division of rights and duties between the sexes, by conceding to woman all rights, and imposing on man all duties.”The Legal Subjection of Men, Chapter IX: A Sex Noblesse (1908)

> “This public opinion regards it as axiomatic that women are capable of everything men are capable of, that they ought to have full responsibility in all honourable and lucrative functions and callings. There is only one thing for which unlimited allowance ought to be made on the ground of their otherwise non-existent womanly inferiority, and that is their own criminal or tortious acts! In a word, they are not to be held responsible, in the sense that men are, for their own actions when these entail unpleasant consequences for themselves. On the contrary, the obloquy and, where possible, the penalty for the wrong-doing is to be shifted on to the nearest wretched man with whom they have consorted.”Why I Am an Anti-Suffragist (1909)

> “From being part of a general code of manners enjoined upon a particular guild or profession it has been degraded to mean the exclusive right in one sex guaranteed by law and custom to certain advantages and exemptions with- out any corresponding responsibility.”The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter V: The “Chivalry” Fake (1913)

> “Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking.”The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

Fish And Bicycles! The Truth At Last!

July 30, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Breathes there a reader of this web site who has never heard the famed maxim, “A woman needs a man like a fish needs a bicycle”? Or “A woman without a man is like a fish without a bicycle,” or some variation thereof.

This utterance is inextricably associated with feminist icon Gloria Steinem, who will be a nodding nonagenarian if she makes it to March 25th of next year. The phrase has been repeated and reprinted countless times over the last half-century. I suspect she never voiced this opinion to the men she was waiting on back in 1963 when she was working as a Playboy bunny.

Like any number of slogans that attain widespread currency, this one was cribbed. As is often the case when something new comes into the world, it is not the originator who gets the credit so much as the person who disseminates it.

The web site writingexplained.org offers some background on the fish-bicycle idiom. Apparently, Steinem picked it up from an Australian author named Irina Dunn. Now, you might wonder (maybe not if you’re from Australia), who was Irina Dunn? Well, there’s no point in dwelling on her because it turns out she admits she was just passing the phrase along. Apparently, it was a catch-phrase in feminist circles ini the late 1960’s, which doesn’t help us in explaining where it came from.

That brings us to Charles S. Harris. Who, you might wonder, was Charles S. Harris? Oddly enough, with a little Googling and enough leisure time, we can learn a few things about him.

Harris was a junior at Swarthmore College in 1958. A psychology major, he also wrote a humor column called “Quote” for the school newspaper, The Phoenix. He used the pen name Roccatorso, which is a reference to an annual campus musical revue in which he was a participant. In his April 7, 1958 column, he wrote, “A man without faith is like a fish without a bicycle.” That was it. No context, just a stand-alone snippet in a series of “jokes.”

Animal House aside, campus humor rarely induces guffaws. Here are a couple of other examples from Harris’s column that day:

> The Beat Generation is the generation that didn’t beat Haverford [a nearby men’s college].
> Whatsmore College, an institution for small coeds.
> It is strange. The last I remember, I was at home studying Margaret Mead.
> Oh, are you a grad student, too?
> Oh, no, I am married to Margaret Mead.

Real knee-slappers, eh? Actually, the funniest thing in the whole newspaper was a front-page article about someone who had just returned from Cuba and described Fidel Castro, who was still months away from taking over the island, as a "typical, responsible, middle-class person." A lot of words, pro and con, were employed to describe Castro in the ensuing years, but bourgeois was not one of them!

Even in the 1950's Swarthmore tilted left so a lecture on the Cuban revolution would surely pack 'em in. I grew up a few miles from the campus and the common image of Swarthmore was as a haven of beatniks and eggheads in an affluent suburban cocoon. It had an impeccable academic reputation…but was it the sort of place you wanted to send your kids? If you were a US Out of UN type, definitely not. On the other hand, if you were a Ban the Bomb type, you'd be thrilled if your kid got in. Maybe not so much today as the tuition is pushing $60,000. Of course, the Bomb is still with us and I can't remember the last time I heard of a Ban the Bomb demonstration. Guess we've all learned to stop worrying and love the bomb.

If Swarthmore is an unlikely source of humor, keep in mind it was founded by Quakers, who are not given to rolling in the aisles in their meeting houses. At any rate, as it turns out, Charles S. Harris did not originate the phrase. I'm not saying he stole it. Perhaps he heard it in his childhood and it lay dormant in his memory for years. If so, he might have heard it from a bona fide funny man.

At some point during his career, the bibulous W.C. Fields said, "Scotch needs water like a fish needs a bicycle." I can't pinpoint when Fields said this, but since he died in 1946 that would put a cap on it.

Now if this saying can be traced back to Fields it would be a delicious irony, as he would certainly be classified as a misogynist today. The evidence is out there in quotations that have lingered long after he took his place among the ascended masters of comedy:

> A man without a woman is like a neck without a pain.
> Show me a great actress, and you've seen the devil.
>
> Never try to impress a woman, because if you do she'll expect you to keep up the standard for the rest of your life.
>
> The nation needs to return to the colonial way of life, when a wife was judged by the amount of wood she could split.
>
> Yes, I do like children…girl children…about eighteen to twenty.
> I was married once – in San Francisco. I haven't seen her for many years. The great earthquake and fire in 1906 destroyed the marriage certificate. There's no legal proof. Which proves that earthquakes aren't all bad.
> I've never hit a woman in my life. Not even my own mother.
> I'd rather have two girls at 21 each than one girl at 42.
> Buried my wife the other day. Had to, she died.

I once wrote about him ("W.C. Fields: A MGTOW for All Seasons," May 7, 2016) on this web site, so if you want to know more about him or read some more memorable quotations, just click on that link.

I wish I could credit Fields with coining the phrase, I can't quite do it. I might be able to credit him with the fish, however. A number of Fields's jokes have to do with avoiding water, the bane of any serious drinking man. Since fish live in water, they too are suspect. Famously, he once said he never drank water because "fish fuck in it." This is sometimes cleaned up as "fish do disgusting things in it," which may be even better, since it implies more than mere coitus.

But if we can give credit to Fields for the fish, why can't we do the same for the bicycle? Because we have another quote that is even older. Consider an article by one W.L. Alden in the December 31, 1898 issue of the Hartford Courant . While reminiscing about his duties as American consul at a town in southern Spain, he described the sleepy pueblo by saying "The place didn't need an American consul any more than a cow needs a bicycle."

It may or may not be true that W.L. Alden originated that phrase. He might have heard it from someone else. But it is true that the bicycle became widely popular in the last decade of the 19th Century, so I think it would be a fool's errand to seek a quote any older than his.

So there you have it. Mystery solved…sort of.

Given the fact that it's been a half-century since Gloria Steinem popularized this slogan, isn't it about time it was updated? How about…a woman needs a man like a fish needs an electric scooter. Of course, the saying is easy to invert: "A man needs a woman like a fish needs a bicycle." But that's too easy. We can do better.

How about "A woman needs an education like a fish needs a bicycle." I would not say that aloud in public. Maybe a slight modification to "A woman needs an education like a fish needs student loan debt."

Steve Martin couldn't have said it better.

From woman to man to red pill

July 30, 2023 | by Steven | Link | Original Link

I never thought my transition from female to male would lead me to the Men's Rights Movement.

I never even knew such a thing existed until a year after the fact. My transition was not about sexual politics, but about achieving personal brain-body congruence. I was correcting an internal dysphoria that had persisted since age 7, when I angrily declared to the boy next door that I was "Super Boy and not Super Girl," and staunchly defended my decision to enter the boys' restroom to a stressed-out elementary school teacher.

At 11 I begged my mother to let me cut my hair as short as possible and was thrilled when our dentist mistook me for a boy. In short, everything I was inside; everything that I could sense and attach to my identity, was male, even as my body said otherwise.

That conflict intensified harshly. The next year I tried to cut off the breast stubs that grew on my chest with a steak knife, and expressed a strong desire to get breast cancer, "so that I can get a double mastectomy like Grandma!" When I was 16 I developed anorexia in order to stop my periods and shrink my breasts as much as possible.

My distress never had much to do with social roles, and for the most part I did not transition in order to gain any perceived social privilege. I played with Barbie dolls and dressed up as a princess (though I always added a sword just to prove I was a tough princess). Xena was my role model.

From a young age, though, I did express extreme anger at not being able to enlist in the Army as an infantryman, and was enraged when a friend's grandmother presumed that I did not know how to put gas in a car because I was a girl. Any time a man showed "chivalry" towards me, such as offering to help me carry something heavy, I was insulted and angry. I also experienced howls and whistles on a daily basis from men in cars when I went out alone for walks.

"Well, I must be an extreme feminist," I remember thinking. "Because feminists are the only other girls who seem to get as angry at these things as I do."

I got the double mastectomy I'd always wanted the day before I turned 20. By this time I had learned of the existence of female-to-male transgender people and knew that this described my condition almost perfectly. I had gotten to the point where it was either get a sex change or kill myself.

After having my breasts removed I began administering weekly testosterone injections. My voice dropped and I began to grow a beard. At this time I began to be taken as male in social settings.

The first thing I noticed was that the cat calls from cars as I walked down the street came to an end. No longer feeling sexually threatened was a huge relief, although it also led to me to another most interesting observation. I wondered if I made an ugly boy since I no longer received daily assurance that I was sexually desirable. It actually took a while to get used to not being seen as the physically attractive sex. My gain became an unexpected loss and I began to realize there are some things on the other side of the fence that you cannot see until you cross over and stand there.

Standing there, as I do now, provides a very different view of life, and of men, than I ever had. Until I got here, there was much I was unaware of, like the previously unseen objectification of my body as an appliance.

It took a while to get it. I was pleasantly surprised when a female friend asked me to help her move furniture shortly after I began hormone therapy. At this point my muscles had developed somewhat in response to testosterone, but I was still within the female range of strength. Nevertheless, I was able to move the furniture (though I'm sure she could have done so herself). I felt very manly and tough. Wasn't it wonderful that people now presumed I was strong and capable rather than weak and in need of chivalric protection?

I was happy, celebrating the fact that I was no longer seen as just a piece of meat–although later I realized that now society either uses me or ignores me, because I'm not attractive enough to be a piece of meat. I'm instead just an ugly, hairy beast with a wallet and a pair of muscular arms. Or, I might say with some measure of irony, a piece of meat that doesn't even rate a cat call.

I have also found it very difficult to get used to always having to take action and make decisions. Men are expected, forced rather, to be the active agents of society. If there is a problem, men are expected to take the initiative to solve it rather than seek help or advice or take advantage of social services.

In straight relationships, the man is expected to approach the woman, initiate conversation, and move the relationship in the direction he wants it to go while simultaneously being extremely careful to monitor her unspoken cues to ensure he is not being rapey or creepy (and if he fails to correctly read those cues, he risks being put away in jail and raped himself).

Even in gay male relationships, no partner takes the "female" role: both are expected by the other to approach, initiate, take charge, and make decisions at least half of the time.

Being an active agent 24/7 is not a privilege, but a very tedious and stressful responsibility. Having it suddenly forced upon me without being trained for it since birth was mentally and physically exhausting.

The burden of all that hyperagency has a huge downside. Sometimes men need help as well. When they do, people are very reluctant to come to their aid and do not hesitate to make fun of them for needing assistance. There are virtually no domestic violence shelters for men, nobody cares if a man is homeless, or out of work, or if he is mentally ill and needs care and concern, because he's a man, damn it. He's supposed to be strong and capable, all the time, or else he's useless and might as well not exist (just like an older, unattractive and overweight woman is seen as useless).

According to feminism male privilege guarantees that he has it so much easier than women. They laugh at the notion that it might be difficult to be a man in this society, because they can't see the other side.

Well, I've stood on both sides of the fence and, without bias from either, I can safely say that "male privilege" in this day and age is bullshit. Women face a lot of threats, to be sure; but men face many of the same exact threats without the social and legal support that women have. Men's issues are for the most part not even acknowledged to exist.

Due to stress from college and bullying (which, oddly enough, came only from within the campus' LGBT/feminist community) I required a brief stint at a mental hospital last summer. I was at a very low point and began whimpering during my intake evaluation, at which point the doctor told me, "You're a man, right? That crying is pathetic. Man up!"

Man up. It suddenly hit me that most men are probably told this phrase hundreds of times throughout their boyhood. At one point I would have given anything for people to encourage me to toughen up like Xena. Now I realized that sometimes, men, like women, just don't feel tough and need the same love and care that women do when they are hurting. Why is this so hard for society to accept? Both men and women can be tough most of the time, but everybody has points in their lives in which they need to be taken care of by others.

Nevertheless, I stopped crying immediately (which testosterone makes physically easier to do), having been reminded that it is now socially unacceptable to show my feelings, even when being admitted to a mental hospital. I didn't mind that much. After all, it's a man's responsibility to always be strong and capable, right? I was a man, damn it, and right embarrassed that I'd failed to behave like one.

After a year of these experiences, and a year of listening to extreme feminist doctrine at my liberal arts college (which schooled me on the inherent violence of male sexuality, "rape culture," "trigger warnings," "safe spaces," etc.. it seemed to me that many of them wanted to be seen as weak, delicate flowers rather than as strong and capable women), I began to change the way I saw things. I took the red pill, you might say.

Since women now share traditional male "privileges," they also ought to share traditional male responsibilities; that is, to carry their own weight and acknowledge guilt when they are guilty, and to respect and care for the men in their lives like men respect and care for them.

Current feminist doctrine wants to retain traditional female privileges (in the form of the Violence Against Women Act, courts favoring mothers over fathers and ex-wives over ex-husbands, etc.) as well as all the traditionally male rights they have rightfully earned over the last hundred years (ability to enter virtually any career they wish and fully participate in society). It is a human rights victory worthy that women now share traditional male rights, but it is unfair that they are not willing to give up traditional female rights in return, because this now puts men in a disadvantaged position.

The Child Archetype as Responsible for Woke Dystopia

August 3, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Voices around the world are announcing a rapid decay of culture forms and a descent into dystopia. On a grass roots level, much of that decay is driven by the rise of infantile narcissism centered on 'me and my vulnerabilities' along with 'me and my demands' — a pathological focus that channels its energy into topics like racial or gender-diversity tribalisms, and the insistence that one's needs be taken care of by others.

The force of such tribalism tends to take as prisoner all remaining citizens who don't identify themselves with the child archetype, creating a two-class society of childlike adults who set out to pull on the heartstrings of more matured, responsible adults within the same society.

The result is a society operating not so much on a division between generations, races, genders, income or sexual orientations, but divided instead by those with a psychological attitude of children vs those with an adult mindset.

Using biological language, what we are witnessing is a hacking of the parental brain of society, garnering its collective sympathies with the bait of dramatized neoteny. When our biological operating system is hacked in this way, and the hack is taught as cultural operating practice within government institutions, universities and in popular culture, there is little chance to circumvent its omnipotent demands.

The only way to circumvent the aggressive vulnerability of the child archetype is for a portion of society to say NO when faced with its demands — demands which tend to appear as an insistence for redress of female victimhood, race victimhood, "marginalized" sexuality, wage inequality and so on — the masks of the child archetype.

Biologists, neurologists, evolutionary psychologists, and ethologists have long recognized parent and child instincts in the form of parents' urge to caretake and protect juveniles, and conversely of juveniles having an impulse to announce their vulnerability as a signal of their need to be cared for.

This biological fact was independently discovered and understood by archetypal psychologists (parent & child archetypes), object relations psychologists (parent & child objects), and by other schools of psychology dealing with the 'inner child' and its need for caretaking. Object relations psychology goes so far as claiming the sexual libido is subservient to the evolutionary imperative of parent~child bonding, making this dyad the strongest motivator in human affairs.

As a side observation, Jungians differentiate between the child archetype as described above, and what they alternatively refer to as the 'puer archetype.' These radically different archetypes can be represented respectively by the images of a baby or toddler (child archetype), or by an image of an older child/teenager (puer archetype). The puer archetype is perfectly represented by the figure of Peter Pan – youthful, loving of new experiences, playful, spontaneous, optimistic, adventurous and independent.

Contrary to the phenomenology of child archetype which is represented by a dependent infant in need of coddling and protecting, the puer archetype mentioned above is an *in*dependent child or youth; an imperative vital to the psychological health of all men and women.

This Jungian differentiation between the motives of infantile child archetype, and youthful puer archetype respectively, leads me to reject psychopathologising of the puer impulse, as happens when people refer to it as a Peter Pan syndrome or as a failure to launch, which essentially brands men as "pathetic man babies" and attempts to shame them into assuming one-sided, and indeed one-dimensional posture of adult responsibility. Failure to launch applies more properly to an overidentification with the child archetype – a posture that does deserve challenging when it reaches the status of personal or cultural dominance.

While the above video provides only half of the full speech given by Hillman on the child archetype, it does impart a good overview of the topic. Hillman touches on Jung's description of the child archetype as including traits of vulnerability, a sense of futurity (that life will begin in the future), innocence, and also a feeling of hermaphroditism. This sexual orientation (hermaphroditism) of the child archetype is also confirmed in Freud's idea that toddlers are polymorphous perverse and not yet forming what Freud understood as an appropriate genital identity as boy or girl.

Perhaps those early observations by Jung and Freud make sense when you consider the concerns of the 'marginalized' wokists today who champion multiple genders, non-binarism, bisexuality, transgenderism etc. and aggressively demand to be taken care of.

Infantriarchy

August 3, 2023 | by Gordon Wadsworth | Link | Original Link

If our species were observed by an alien race for any length of time, two profound defects in the human condition would rapidly become apparent to them. One is a defect in the female character, and the other is a defect in the male character. Although they weren't always defects, they have become such because they are fundamentally at odds with both legal equality and self-actualization.

The female defect is her desire to infantilize herself; to project a facade of weakness and victimhood. The female does this because part of her identity is contingent on compelling males to act on her behalf. This is a mechanism which allows the female to feel desirable, important, and powerful. The female often mistakes this behavior as personal empowerment, when in reality it is quite the opposite. Taking personal responsibility is something she will inherently resist, because as soon as she takes personal responsibility and stops infantilizing herself, her identity can no longer command others to act on her behalf. Thus, the female defect keeps her from assuming personal responsibility, which presents a barrier to her self-actualization.

This is why the self-actualized female finds playing the victim so repugnant; she is shunning part of her old identity.

The male defect is his desire to compensate for the infantilized female. He does this because part of his identity is contingent on earning female validation. He thus demonstrates his ability to protect, provision and inform. This is a mechanism for feeling useful, powerful, knowledgeable, and important. The male defect leads him to compete with other males to demonstrate his primacy to females, and it ultimately turns him into a guardian, which keeps him from relinquishing responsibility. This becomes his own barrier to self-actualization.

This is why the self-actualized male sees competing for female validation as idiotic; he is shunning part of his old identity.

These defects mean that the female path of self-actualization is one of taking responsibility, and the male path of self-actualization is one of relinquishing responsibility.

It is vitally important to recognize that the majority of males and females in our culture enjoy their dysfunction. The female has a puerile sexual identity validated by compelling a man to act on her behalf, and the male has a similarly puerile sexual identity validated by demonstrating his ability to act on her behalf. This is a drug that our species has been addicted to for millennia, and it is one we desperately need to cast aside. Moving past this behavior is the next step humanity must make to realize equality.

We already have a name for this drug. It's the blue pill. Those in the blue pill paradigm aren't conscious of this behavior, they're merely stuck engaging in it. Consciously recognizing this defective behavior is, in my opinion, the source of red pill wisdom. Once this behavior is seen for what it is, the blue pill paradigm becomes observable, and the transition to the red pill paradigm is made.

An understanding of the male defect is vital for contextualizing feminist criticism of men. Our defect, for example, is why many feminists are partially correct when they point to demonstrating power as a male motivation. We display power to demonstrate our readiness to compensate for the infantilized female. Our defect is also the source of feminist complaints about “mansplaining.” Men engaging in “mansplaining” are largely attempting to demonstrate their knowledge and value in order to demonstrate their capability to compensate for the infantilized female. Additionally, the “fatherly” guardian status that results from our defect is why the feminists are superficially correct about patriarchy, but why they are also leaving out half the picture.

Where the feminist is completely wrong is where she believes that pre-feminist Western culture was in its totality a patriarchy. Since the traditional paradigm of pre-feminist Western culture was an expression of both the male and the female defects, patriarchy was only half the picture.

Let’s clarify what patriarchy means.

For the most part, patriarchy is simply a word to describe the male defect. On its own, however, patriarchy says exactly nothing about the female defect. If we’re to have a fair and balanced discussion on sex and gender, we need a word to address both defects. Let us therefore add the word infantriarchy to describe the female defect.

Patriarchy and infantriarchy are simple concepts that reflect a relationship of codependency between the male and female defects. If the male defect is over expressed in society, female infantilization is compelled, and patriarchy results. If the female defect is over expressed in society, male compensation is compelled, and infantriarchy results.

Thus, the traditional paradigm of pre-feminist Western culture wasn’t in its totality a patriarchy, because it was built around the expression of both the male and the female defects. The fact that there exist both males and females who wish to return to traditionalism proves this. The traditionalist female was thus perfectly happy to infantilize herself, and infantriarchy was a part of traditionalism that cannot be ignored.

The feminist response to this, of course, will be to claim that patriarchy infantilizes women and that the second concept is therefore unnecessary. To clarify this response, the feminist will essentially be claiming that the male defect is wholly to blame. This line of reasoning is problematic because it denies the existence of the female defect, and in doing so it assumes women are perfect and asserts that the defect necessarily exists solely within men.

This can only be described as hate.

Because feminism doesn’t acknowledge the existence of the female defect, it denies female complicity in traditionalism, and thus distorts the male defect of compensating into one of oppressing. Thus, feminists mistakenly believe that women were uniquely oppressed because they’re using half of a theoretical model to examine traditionalism.

The notion of female oppression becomes highly dubious when one considers the female defect. The female defect, for example, becomes apparent when a woman claims that women have always been the primary victims of war, despite the countless millions of men who have died. The female defect has led a woman to cry about being victimized over a t-shirt, and it has led a journalist to claim that MHRM efforts are based on "victim envy." So it isn't terribly surprising that the female defect might lead certain women to claim that human history was one long story of female oppression. It is simply an expression of the female defect. It is the female projecting her victimhood.

What then, is feminism?

To be fair, I have met a handful of feminists whose goals I thought were legitimate. To a significant extent, however, feminism is merely a sociopolitical platform for these defects, an arena for them to play in, and the cultural force which is expanding infantriarchy. Feminists claim their movement is about female equality, but I disagree. Being an expression of the female defect, feminism is merely a movement to express female victimhood; more specifically, it is an expression of female victimhood to compel sociopolitical male compensation with the humorous goal of preventing female victimhood.

This results in a merry-go-round to hell, wherein feminism actively entrenches the same value it seeks to fight.

Because feminism is essentially an expression of female victimhood working to end female victimhood, most feminists are stuck in the destructive convulsions of an individual fighting against a victim identity she has chosen for herself.

The nail in the coffin for our society is that the male defect supports and encourages this female behavior. The majority of feminists are fighting an identity they've chosen for themselves, one that makes them feel deeply unhappy and traumatized, and the majority of males, instead of criticizing them, are simply trying to compensate for them. The male's drive to compensate for the infantilized female knows no bounds. If the female is expressing her oppression the male will seek to compensate. If the female is ruthlessly attacking the male's identity and stripping him of his rights, the male will still seek to compensate.

It is important to understand that both defects must disappear, or neither one will. These two defects are codependent. Females must stop infantilizing themselves, and males must stop compensating for infantilized females. If the female defect isn't addressed, then no matter how savagely the male defect is attacked, directly or indirectly, the problems with these defects will never be solved. One behavior compels the other, since men and women are and will always be two sides of the same coin. Men and women will evolve their consciousness together, or their consciousness will not evolve.

With this in mind, "patriarchal" expression of the male defect doesn't disappear in an infantriarchy, it merely changes forms. Remember, in infantriarchy, male compensation is compelled. "White knights" and "manginas" are the expressions of patriarchy, because they are the expressions of the compelled male defect, and often this expression is so pathetic as to beggar belief.

This patriarchal behavior goes largely unnoticed by feminists because they don't see the male defect directly for what it is. They arbitrarily define patriarchal behavior as authoritative, but they're mistaken in this regard. Patriarchal behavior is any expression of the male defect. White knights and manginas are thus expressing patriarchal behavior because their behavior seeks to compensate for the female, and it thus encourages the female to continue expressing her victimhood and self-infantilization.

This is the reason some feminists are beginning to recognize and reject men like Hugo Schwyzer for what they are. Men like Schwyzer will never criticize women on any level, simply because men like Schwyzer aren't remotely interested in equality. They are merely interested in validating their own puerile sexual identities by demonstrating their compensatory capacity. They are cowards, content to ignore real world suffering as they continue taking hits off the blue pill crack pipe. And they are ironically the very agents of patriarchy feminists denounce.

The profound irony of this is that feminism claims to oppose patriarchy while fiercely upholding it, and the MHRM hates the concept of patriarchy, but is currently the only cultural force actually fighting it.

Finally, an infantriarchy will be built around male blame. This is because the female defect leads her to project all authority on to the male, and this forms the basis for blaming him for all wrongdoing. In order to project victimhood, it is necessary for the female to cast the responsibility for her problems elsewhere. Thus, the more infantriarchal a society, the more male blame can be expected.

In our society, this blame is expressed in the feminist's belief that equality can be achieved by examining "masculinities," and by deconstructing "patriarchy." It is also why the feminist believes men just need to shut up and listen to women in order for equality to happen; inequality, after all, was "men's fault," and men should shut up and let women fix it.

In late stage infantriarchy, men even become blamed for a woman's feelings.

If a joke offends a woman, men are blamed. If a man says hello in an elevator in a way a woman dislikes, he is blamed for making her feel victimized. If a man approaches a woman in a bar and she doesn't like it, he is blamed for making her feel bad, and society responds by prohibiting men from talking to women in this way. If a man looks at a woman who is half naked and it makes her feel bad, he is blamed for looking.

Since the purpose of feminism is largely to express victimhood, "victim blaming" becomes one of its tools. "Victim blaming" is simply another expression of male blame. It is a tool designed to protect female victimhood by savagely casting blame at any male who ever dares to question it.

Feminism does not seek to address either defect, it seeks to criticize male behavior while upholding the male defect and openly expressing the female one. Feminism thus upholds both patriarchy and infantriarchy. Since directly deconstructing and understanding both defects is a minimum prerequisite to promote equality between the sexes, feminism will never achieve equality on its own, however viciously it attacks men.

In my opinion, the MHRM sees these two defects for what they are, and criticizes both of them directly. The MHRM opposes feminism as an unrestrained expression of the female defect, and it opposes “white knights,” “manginas,” and the forces of chivalry as expressions of the male defect and enablers of the female defect. The MHRM opposes both patriarchy and infantriarchy.

For all its claims, feminism is not a progressive movement. Whatever its stated goals, feminism binds humanity to an archaic sexual identity. The MHRM is the socially progressive movement because it is spearheading a move toward greater self actualization for both men and women.

Portrayal of men in the media: why there needs to be a reverse Bechdel test

August 5, 2023 | by Nikita Coulombe | Link | Original Link

The Bechdel Test is an informal rating system outlined by graphic novelist Alison Bechdel that classifies media with three simple criteria: to pass the test a plot must

- "have at least two [named] women in it,
- who talk to each other,
- about something besides a man."

Very few video games pass all the criteria of the Bechdel Test, and just over half of movies do.

The test is imperfect; a film could pass the test but still include sexist content; nevertheless some cinemas and organizations – such as the Swedish Film Institute – are taking the rating seriously, and using it to highlight gender bias against women.

Is there a similar, Bechdel-like test that shows bias against men? No, but there should be.

For far too long, men have been cast as duds, yet doing so has clearly been profitable, thus pressure to change such negative stereotypes will need to come from the outside. Of course this will only happen when people are willing to recognize gender biases affect men, too, or how earnestly young men need more positive male role models to look up to in the media.

What would a male version of the Bechdel Test look like? In our book, Man (Dis)connected, social psychologist Philip Zimbardo and I describe a possible option we call the "MacGyver Test" (named after the popular 90s television adventure series) that a film or television show passes if it meets any of these criteria about its male characters:

- The absence of the mother is not required for the father to be portrayed as a competent dad.
- An honest, hard-working man is in a successful or leadership position and is not portrayed as a hapless loser.
- The female protagonist shows interest in male protagonist before he is the hero.
- The male protagonist solves problems in creative ways, and only uses violence as a last resort to carry out his goals or mission.

The list of media that pass these modest criteria would no doubt be a short one.

Another way to raise awareness around the portrayal of men in the media would be to swap the male and female roles in movies and television shows, and then re-examine the plots.

For example, let's reverse the roles of the "fearless" Princess Anna and the "rugged" iceman Kristoff in the Academy Award-winning animated children's movie, Frozen.

In the movie, Anna's older sister, Elsa, banishes herself from their castle because she can't control her magical ability to produce ice and snow with her hands. Anna sets out to find her sister and bring her home.

Anna is offered help by the smooth-talking Prince Hans, whom she immediately falls in love with. But who ends up helping her? The penniless iceman Kristoff, whose sled and reindeer Anna decide she can use for her own agenda – never mind if he needs them (she doesn't ask).

After nearly getting him killed, destroying his sled, and finally rescuing Elsa, Anna and Kristoff go their separate ways. It is only after Prince Hans proves himself to be evil, and Olaf – the dopey snowman sidekick – says to Anna that Kristoff would be a good match that Anna even bothers to consider Kristoff as a romantic partner.

Now imagine a movie where a prince felt entitled to use a hardworking woman whose only possessions were her sled and reindeer, which she uses to eke out a living, to go rescue his brother and after she voluntarily busts her butt to help him he goes back to his life without a second thought. Audiences would be up in arms! We would think "what's wrong with him? Why can't he get his act together?" Yet that thought doesn't even cross our minds while watching Frozen. Instead, we think Anna is quirky and adventurous. By the way, Frozen does not pass the MacGyver Test…

When two out of five children are being born to single moms (the rate is one out of two for women under 30 years old), a third of boys are growing up in father-absent homes, and boys with fathers are only spending half an hour a week in one-on-one conversation with their fathers vs. 44 hours in front of a television or computer screen (see source 8 below), we need to ask ourselves what impact the negative media portrayals of men are having on them (as well as young women).

Is it possible for the idea of men being men responsibly to make its way back into popular culture?

Men tend to regulate emotions through actions rather than words

*This article first published at The Centre For Male Psychology.

At fifteen years of age I left school to start a blacksmithing trade. It was a physically demanding job but at the same time it was immensely creative and satisfying to learn about the physical properties of metals and their various states of malleability. When metal is in a red hot state it's similar in consistency to potter's clay which can be easily pushed, pulled, stretched, twisted, flattened, or poured – pretty much whatever you wanted to do with it. The only limitation was knowledge of how to use the hundreds of different grabbing tools, pincers, tongs, clamps, and hammers, but like any skill this would all come in time, with practice and with quality male mentorship.

While on the path of learning these skills I noticed a subsidiary layer of activity that was always accompanying the work, a psychological layer of emotional processes that seemed to mysteriously mingle with each task. If I was enjoying life, I tended to marvel more at the rainbow colours that would appear in the metal when grinding or heating it to varying degrees, or if I was experiencing frustration, anxiety or anger about something, I noticed that I was hammering a hot blade more aggressively than usual, generating a strange kind of relief and, I discovered, even further relief if I deliberately hit the object harder and with extra blows. Yet again I learned that if my hammering was getting too feverish I could at any moment choose to "quench" the hot blade in cold water, bringing an altogether different kind of relief.

"In fact not only the tasks of blacksmithing, but any physical activity soon revealed itself as a project I would 'use' for a canvas to regulate emotions"

Even at this young age I was consciously aware of how I was regulating my emotions via these acts, and of how this strange synchronicity of tasks formed a compliment. I also learned to make good use of physical work to regulate my emotions when I needed to establish any kind of baseline equilibrium. This wasn't a result of some special genius or education, nor from doing sessions with a psychologist or counsellor – it was my male nature understanding how to regulate itself.

In fact not only the tasks of blacksmithing, but any physical activity soon revealed itself as a project I would 'use' for a canvas to regulate emotions, and I could equally choose which physical activity to engage in based on what my desired outcome was – release of anger or frustration, to generate comfort, or perhaps to affirm or increase my enjoyment of life. All of this happened in a natural way as I engaged in work, various sports, and recreational activities (as it does for so most men) without need to say a single word about my feelings to anyone. Furthermore, not only was I able to regulate my own emotions in this way, but I found I could equally use these techniques to help regulate the emotions of friends and family; if a friend was struggling in some way I would invite them on a mountain hike, camping, fishing, or to the cinema where they could quietly undergo the secret alchemy that I had found so helpful. Helping friends made me feel good too… was there anything I could not do with this wisdom?

As for most young men this made intuitive sense, though I would later add a layer of sophistication to that understanding when I studied the psychology of emotional processing. There I learned that while people can express emotions via physical acts and gestures, or alternatively by conversing about emotional issues, men tend to specialise more in action-based regulation of emotion than do women who tend to specialise more in verbal regulation of emotions.

With this acquired knowledge about men's emotional awareness, imagine my surprise when I opened a study booklet written by one-time APA president Ronald Levant, published in 1997, claiming most men cannot understand their own nor other people's feelings: "One striking and far-reaching consequence of the male socialization ordeal is the inability to differentiate and identify their emotions… In its most basic sense, to live detached from one's emotions is to live isolated from oneself as well as from others – a condition that precludes true intimacy."[1]

This claim forms the basis of the theory that most men are severely lacking in emotional intelligence, and that even were they to discover some fragments of emotional awareness they would not know how to express it in words, such is the depth of male handicap. Levant refers to this condition as a normative male form of 'alexithymia' (a term meaning low emotional intelligence) which results in men being unable to read their emotions,[2] and he adds: "Lacking this emotional awareness, when asked to identify their feelings, they tend to rely on cognition and try to logically deduce how they should feel. They cannot do what is automatic for most women – simply sense inwardly, feel the feeling, and let the verbal description come to mind."

"…a woman might talk with her melancholic friend about what is worrying her in order to cheer her up; the man may invite the same melancholic friend to the movies".

According to this theory, men's lives are guided by action empathy, which are said to be an inadequate substitute for genuine emotional empathy, a skill typically displayed by most women. Action empathy is defined as the ability to see physical motivations from another person's point of view, and to focus on which concrete actions those people might perform, but that men otherwise do not understand emotional empathy in the way women do – women who are able to take another person's perspective and know how they feel. Levant states, "Action empathy also differs from emotional empathy in terms of its aim. Emotional empathy is usually employed to help another person and is thus prosocial, whereas action empathy is usually employed in the service of the self."[1]

As a result of men's claimed low emotional intelligence, they are said become strangers to their own emotional life, unconsciously transmuting their vulnerable emotions into anger and aggression, while also tending to extrude their caring emotions through the narrow channel of sexuality.[3]

Far from being evidence of low emotional intelligence, however, men's tendency to use action can be better understood as a form of emotional acumen. Some studies of emotional processing indicate that men and boys are able to identify the specifics of emotional arousal in themselves and others as well as do women – emotions like jealousy, love, anger, sadness, anxiety, and so on. For example, one study of 1285 men and women found that while women were more proficient at verbalizing feelings, men and women were equally proficient at identifying feelings,[4] and another study by Fischer et al.[5] of more than 5000 participants' ability to perceive facial emotions found "no gender differences in the perception of target emotions". Fischer et al. comment that this finding "diverges from various earlier reviews and meta-analyses on gender differences in emotion accuracy".[5] They speculate that this difference might be because earlier research tended to use student samples, whereas the participants in their study were from a range of ages and backgrounds.

The second observation, as outlined above, is that men and boys may choose to regulate emotions not by verbalising them so much (women's preferred method) but by taking intelligent action. By way of example a woman might talk with her melancholic friend about what is worrying her in order to cheer her up; the man may invite the same melancholic friend to the movies; both responses – talking, or acting – serve to intelligently modulate emotions.

"The two ways of regulating emotions have implications for the field of mental health, which relies predominately on talking therapy – in particular talking about feelings."

It is an error to conflate these two separate features of emotional processing as if they were one and the same: 1. recognising emotions, or 2. verbalising feelings. Men, like women, can usually recognise the full range of emotional phenomena but they may choose to respond to that knowledge in a very different manner than does the average woman. Men often choose to respond to such awareness by doing something pragmatic instead of verbalising feelings.

Talking about doings

The two ways of regulating emotions have implications for the field of mental health, which relies predominately on talking therapy – in particular talking about feelings. Does this not suggest that there could be, and perhaps needs to be, more emphasis on discussing the therapeutic value of action? It may not be practical to conduct therapy while engaged in physical activity such as a gym workout or while out walking in the streets, but the therapeutic discussion can at least focus more on the “doing” aspects of a man’s life. For example a therapist might ask how did problem XYZ make a man act out, along with exploring which physical activities or responses might help a him to modulate such emotions more optimally in future. Does riding a Jet Ski, or going for a jog, or building some wooden furniture make him feel better or worse? What about creating art or playing music? Does that difficult manoeuvre in the video game remind of difficulties in his relationship with his girlfriend? Does the same video game provide some optimism that if he can get past the difficult manoeuvre within the game then perhaps he can find a way around the impasse with his girlfriend? Activities like these provide a symbolic canvas on which men project, and then work through various scenarios of real life, with potential to shift affective resonances in the process.

When a man talks about how he operated a lathe, did some welding, restored a bit of discarded and broken furniture, might he be sharing a strategy of how he successfully redirected suicidal feelings? Perhaps we should not be so quick to shut down these conversations with accusations of being work obsessed, effectively stymieing natural male expressions with injunctions to talk less about activities and to communicate more effusively with feelings words. For many men, activities are the preferred canvases on which they can process feelings and carve out some genuine psychological equilibrium.

This is probably a reason why men talk so much about work, sports, building things, computer games, recreational activities – it may be their preferred way of communicating the ways they wrestle with psychological issues. Sadly, the therapeutic industry is quick to chastise men’s preference for intelligent actions, conflating them with pathological reflexes such as unconscious acts of aggression, dependence on drugs and booze, and other destructive versions of “acting-out” as they are so often branded.

Therapies centred in discussion of physical activities, or conversely centred in sharing strings of feeling-words, can both serve as forms of communication. With this in mind it’s perhaps time for therapy to free itself from looking exclusively into the mirror of feelings so it can look out of the window at the range of concrete activities that also serve psyche. The reaction of men to this approach might surprise us all.

Three Easy Pieces of the Red Pill

Three Easy Pieces of the Red Pill

- MGP: Men Got Problems
- GA: Gynocentrism Awareness
- CW: Caution of Women

In a healthy debate, the sides agree on where they disagree.

As wise as some commentators in the manosphere are, the movement's major value lies not in the teachings of any individual, but rather in the mere fact that these discussions are taking place. The mainstream reacts with fear and hysteria to the knowledge that we men are talking to each other seriously about our lives and issues; witness this reaction as evidence that these discussions are necessary, substantial, and impactful.

Paul Elam has described trying to express the full scope of the men's rights movement as akin to understanding a blizzard one snowflake at a time. An alternative, simplifying perspective would be to view it as a tree. The leaves are numerous, but most trace back to a few major branches. The danger of simplification is that ideas not easily categorize may be pushed to the margins. However, there is also much to gain.

The manosphere can be a confusing place. Newcomers encounter a cacophony of ideas, many tinged with anger or frustration. Outsiders bent on demonization can cherry-pick the most offensive bits and hold those up as representing the movement's core beliefs, like the Southern Poverty Law Center inventing a straw man "male supremacy movement."

There is also the internal sniping: pick-up oriented men call MGTOWs pussies, while MGTOWs call them stupid and deluded, and both call MRAs ineffectual chumps, while MRAs call both immature or extreme. It's good fun. The point is not for us to agree, but to map out where we differ, and understand what separates us all from the normies. The fact that we focus on our disagreements may add to the fog, but it is also healthy and natural, a necessary part of people hashing out ideas and stumbling towards a clearer picture.

In this article, I will pursue a particular categorization of arguments that results in a definition of the red pill, based on three necessary components. In the tree metaphor, these three ideas are branches coming off a single trunk (i.e., different perspectives on one deeper truth, selected to succinctly capture the most important red-pill lessons). The three ideas are not new, and this article will not focus on proving/documenting each one, but instead will explore how different perspectives on them divide the manosphere into its sub-groups. Abandoning the tree imagery, the remainder of this article will use the metaphor of an atomic particle ("Redpillium"), with the three essential ingredients making up the nucleus. In the role of electrons are other, related ideas which are influenced by the nucleus.

A key distinction is that the blue-pill world (1) is unfamiliar with the three nucleus components, while (2) being aware of the electrons, but viewing them differently than would a person possessed of red-pill knowledge. No doubt, some in the manosphere have versions of the red pill where the nucleus includes more ideas than the three below. Stretching the atomic metaphor, those could be other red-pill isotopes, which is fine. This article discusses three necessary components, though some may see them as not sufficient. That is, in my humble view, the lack of any one of these three elements renders a person not red-pill.

The Manosphere Sub-Groups

The participants in the manosphere often disagree on the details or consequences of the three nucleus ideas. We argue about them constantly, and our different viewpoints divide us into factions. I will attempt to describe these groups, recognizing that my definitions are imperfect, that many people do not fall neatly into any one group, that I am surely missing nuances, and that the situation is evolving so rapidly that much of what I describe will quickly become outdated.

First, are the Men's Rights Activists (MRAs), who seek to ease problems that afflict men, such as homelessness, suicide, incarceration, under-education, and forced alienation from their children. Second, are Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOWs) whose guiding principle is to deny women influence/control over their lives, specifically by never marrying or cohabitating. Third, are traditional conservatives (Tradcons) who, as I will argue below, fail the test of being red-pilled, yet they are relevant because (1) they recognize that society's indifference and demonization of men is undermining men's ability to be strong, productive citizens, and (2) their association with political conservatism allows them a large platform to influence mainstream discussion.

The fourth, and final, group currently lacks an established name. Exemplified by Rolo Tomassi, Richard Cooper, and the "Red Man Group," they have transformed what was previously called the pick-up artist (PUA) community into something more sweeping, rendering the PUA moniker inadequate. For the sake of this article, I will call them the "Red Men." Like prior PUAs, the Red Men have a focus on succeeding with women, but they do not see this as a stand-alone issue. Instead, they promote an overall philosophy of taking on life unapologetically, with open eyes, discipline, confidence, and resilience. They believe that such a stance makes a wide array of life accomplishments attainable, including with women.

This can-do mentality is not inherently red-pill. Shelves could be filled of mainstream self-help books touting similar messages—so in the Redpillium framework, those ideas are electrons. What makes the Red Men different, and will ultimately determine their place in the manosphere, is their promisingly firm commitment to open eyes, which includes taking in red-pill knowledge.

The distinction between Red Men and MGTOWs can be hazy, which is ironic given that MGTOW's defining characteristic is avoiding women, while Red Men are associated with pursuing them. Stepping down below the obvious, the most common definition of MGTOW is men who will not marry or cohabitate. A Red Man might pursue women while never intending on a serious commitment, and while doing so may not personally identify as MGTOW. Yet other MGTOW might regard him as one of them whose current hobby is chasing women, and might predict that he will eventually find the hobby unrewarding and scale it back.

The Three "Nuclear" Components: MGP, GA, and CW.

Nuclear #1: MGP

Men Got Problems, but society does not recognize/emphasize those problem to the degree it would if they afflicted women.

The litany of these problems is likely familiar, and includes suicide, homelessness, incarceration, early death, parental alienation, among many others.

For MRAs, MGP lies at the center of their red-pill thinking, leading them to advocate for relief of men's problems and raising social awareness.

Many Tradcons understand MGP (which makes them the closest thing the manosphere has to a mainstream ally). For example, a Tradcon might raise MGP in order to attack the left by undermining the left's claim of moral high-ground (i.e., the left claims to be compassionate, but their indifference to men shows their hypocrisy). Another common Tradcon invocation of MGP is that society needs to stop undermining men, or else men will not be able to fulfil their traditional producer/provider roles.

MGTOWs and Red Men are aware of MGP, but believe it is fruitless to try to convince society to care about men. When Red Men focus on MGP, they see it as demonstrating the need for men to strengthen themselves and become resilient, because they cannot expect caring or sympathy. MGTOWs mostly agree with Red Men, but place greater emphasis on (1) men's solidarity in this shared burden, as well as (2) contempt for the women who constantly moan about their own problems while completely ignoring men's.

Nuclear #2: GA

Gynocentrism Awareness: society idealizes women, overemphasizes them and their wants, and enforces this through shaming and threat narratives.

For example, society says that feminism should be the sole movement with a monopoly on discussing gender relations (gynocentric: only the female perspective), MRAs dissent and are met with shaming (MRAs are a bunch of pathetic losers), and threat narrative (what MRAs really want is to abuse women or turn them into second-class citizens). Some in the manosphere believe that gynocentrism is an inextricable part of human nature, while others think it is something we can fight back against, now or in the future.

Tradcons are lacking in GA. Some recognize the female-idealization aspect, but miss the female-overemphasis. Possibly, some would agree that women are emphasized more, but quibble over the judgemental statement that women are "overemphasized." For example, they could follow an evolutionary perspective and argue that men's proper place it to be considered disposable. (I would consider this thinking an example of the "appeal to nature"/ "naturalistic" fallacies.[1])

MRAs and MGTOWs grasp GA, and emphasize the illegitimacy of the social control mechanisms that enforce it (i.e., shaming and threat narratives). They encourage men to develop internal, psychological resistance to these tactics.

Similar to their view of MGP, when Red Men address GA they tend to see it as heightening the need for mens' toughness and self-reliance.

Although GA is perhaps the deepest and most far reaching of the three ingredients of the red pill (for example, it causes MGP), no group makes it their primary focus (it is more often the cause behind the focus).

Nuclear #3: CW

Caution of Women.

No woman in our culture could escape the message that she would be foolish to blindly trust an unfamiliar man, but the reverse side of that message is missing. Men are encouraged to seek fulfilment and existential validation through their relationships with women. We naturally want women to love us, and society does its best to whip that desire up into a desperate obsession. In view of the many potential dangers women carry, a more mature culture would teach men to keep that urge in check. Instead of shaming men when they fail to put women first, we should shame them for ever letting this woman-thirst steer their lives. The third piece of red-pill thinking is for men to develop their own personalized sense of CW.

With some exceptions, MRAs are soft on CW, striking a gentlemanly stance of, "We would very much like men's issues to be addressed, but in seeking this must honor the feelings and uphold the reputations of women as a group." The MRAs are still better than Tradcons, who seem to lack CW entirely, and prefer for men to march dutifully ahead in their traditional, disposable role. When Tradcons address CW, it is usually an attempt to talk men out of it. MTOWs and Red Men embrace CW with gusto, though approaching it from different angles.

My own CW odyssey began about two years ago. At that point, I had been dipping into men's issues for awhile, and had gradually become convinced that MRAs were sharing important information that was unrecognized in society. At that point, I firmly expected that women would get onboard, if only they knew. How naïve. I can now confidently inform readers, based on repeated experiences, both of my own and others I know, that almost all women respond to the very notion of men's issues with revulsion and discomfort. To most readers here, this is like telling you that the sky is blue. Both men and women surprised me, though not in the same way: towards women, men are loyal to a fault; while women are loyal only to themselves. I resisted this new information for some time, but eventually understood that I needed to correct my opinion of women.

To merely say that I started rethinking my assumptions about women shortcuts a great deal of psychological work. First, I needed to understand that I was allowed to view women differently. Men are inclined to see the best in women, to not judge them, to try to understand their point of view, forgive them, not hold them accountable, and most especially to believe that harboring ill feelings towards women as a group would make us deplorable. It took me about a year to let go of that idea and realize that it is fair to judge women by what they do and say. I support women's freedom to act and speak however they choose within the law, but they cannot also insist that men see them as angels.

In developing their CW, men often turn to scientifically based principles such as female hypergamy, Briffault's law, and women's dual mating strategy. The process is personal, practical, and situational. For example, if a man believes that he would not receive adequate due process in the case of a female accusation, his CW should incorporate this. CW conversations often offend normies' gynocentrism, resulting in boilerplate reactions of shaming and threat narratives. (GA: man-hating draws shrugs, while woman-hating draws torches and pitchforks.) Society is biased to assume that if women are allowed to share and discuss freely, the resulting ideas will be virtuous, but men enjoying that same freedom would produce something toxic. I disagree, and am not afraid of men talking.

As noted above, MRAs tend to tiptoe around CW, while Tradcons try to dispel it. The real evolution of CW thought is occurring distinctly between MGTOWs and Red Men. MGTOWs fight the issue at the root, attacking the idea that being with a woman is even desirable. A common catchphrase is, "The juice is not worth the squeeze." A MGTOW-lite philosophy holds that men will be happier if they de-prioritize women in the lives, which includes fighting their thirst enough to not put up with bad female behavior. (E.g., Paul Elam.) Some MGTOWs' interpretation of CW is to avoid all romantic contact ("MGTOW monks"), though nobody knows what percentage.

Unlike MGTOWs, Red Men's discussion of CW does not focus on reasons women are undesirable—although they do caution against imagining any woman to be solution to one's life ("oneitis"). Instead, they more try to understand the ways that women are crazy, so as to avoid going crazy themselves.

The Electrons

In the "Redpillium" model, the nucleus is surrounded by electrons—ideas that are not unique to red-pill individuals, but that are influenced by red-pill thinking. Here are a few examples:

Electron #1 Pick-up Game.

Many men follow a simple strategy for finding romantic partners. They work hard, maintain themselves, get their lives in order, and then they wait for a promising opportunity. Sometimes, they wait years; sometimes, the opportunity never comes.

Men wanting a more proactive approach need to develop a set of strategies ("game"). Game, in of itself, is a part-way red-pill concept. Players need to be practical about the nature of women (CW). A man who works up the gumption to approach women will usually be rejected. When keeping up game on a regular basis, these rejections threaten to be ego shredding. He works hard and takes care of himself; he knows that he is not chopped liver; but women do not feel about him anything like the way he feels about them.

His resilience to carry on can be boosted by the knowledge that men see women in a much more generous light than vice versa. Men find the average woman fairly attractive, while women are only physically attracted to a small fraction of men. The gaming man can de-personalize his rejections by understanding the statistical truth that women are cruel in their evaluations of men.

The women's-nature side of CW is inescapable for the pick-up community. Promisingly, the Red Men now also hint at the other half of CW: questioning how much they should prioritize romantic success, and unlearning the programming that women are the measure of a man.

Electron #2 Self-reliance.

As the red pill teaches men about their own disposability in the eyes of society, it reinforces in them the need for strength and self-reliance. They cannot expect others to recognize their humanity. This realization tilts many red-pill men towards libertarian thinking, while also having the healthful effect of prompting them to take ownership and responsibility for their lives because, with nobody to help them, bootstrap power is all they have.

Electron #3 Gender Politics.

Whenever our politicians take up a gender-related policy, their gynocentism is in the driver's seat. Both the policies themselves, and the debates surrounding them reek of the assumption that women and their wants deserve primacy. Personally, my GA and MGP make me skeptical that a decent political discussion of gendered issues is even possible in the current cultural climate.

Electron #4 Welfare and Taxes.

In a democracy, as long as men are loyal to a fault, while women are loyal only to themselves, tax-based wealth redistribution will take money from men and give it to women. This fact nudges red-pill thinkers to favor conservative/libertarian low-tax policies, but that view is not a consensus. Others, instead, recognize the female favoritism as a blemish on the policy, but are willing to accept that burden in order to help people through the benefits.

Conclusion

For readers who identify with the manosphere, I hope that my descriptions of your attitudes rings true. If not, please contact me and explain. You can email me at jon@rappelant.com. For other readers, I hope that this introduction helps you to understand what lies at the core of red-pill thinking.

Disney: Vaginas are magic!

August 9, 2023 | by Rachel Edwards | Link | Original Link

A disturbing trend is emerging out of Disney movies, especially their non-Pixar cartoons: their desire to be more "progressive" is moving them several steps backward in their depictions of men.

While the old Disney formula is flawed and based heavily in gender stereotypes, like Cinderella and her Prince Charming, their new criticism of that formula does nothing more than shift from traditionalism to full-blown gynocentrism. With films like Frozen and Maleficent emerging, it is easy to see that they are desperately trying to pander to a feminist audience.

In Frozen and Maleficent, it is no longer romantic love between men and women that breaks the spell. Instead, it is the power of The Sisterhood and the Sacred Feminine that heals everything. It is now the power of female compassion that is the only thing that can bring redemption.

This idea of redemption through women is not entirely new, either. If you look at male Disney characters of fairly recent vintage, you begin to see this disturbing pattern: men are not getting their "progressive" reboot at all. Even in movies where men are the main protagonists, it is only through the influence of a woman that the male protagonist is able to be fully a man. It is almost always the actions of a that bring about story resolution.

For example, Nala tells Simba to stop being a MGTOW and to return to his responsibilities. The Beast becomes a gentleman through the influence of Belle. Tarzan is made "civilized" by Jane's influence. They are perpetuating the idea that men must be made whole by women, but that women don't need men; women just have to be there.

When I mention the Sacred Feminine, I am referring to the idea that women, on their own, are the source of healing, as if they have this sort of inherent magical quality. It is an almost religious, if not outright religious, treatment of women, and they can do no wrong because femininity is sacred. They can destroy entire kingdoms and terrorize people for years. They can be completely toxic to everyone around them, and will still be seen as being worthy of praise and adoration. Whereas men are viewed as being beasts or misguided souls that need contact with this magical feminine energy to be whole.

There used to be a balance to that when male influence could also break magic spells in Disney universes, but now that it's been tossed aside we are left with stories of full-blown gynocentrism.

I say that because in Disney's two most recent offerings, Frozen and Maleficent, they did not create more complex and relatable villains; instead, they shifted the blame to men. They didn't make the male villains in those films sympathetic; they were basically just devils. These were simply films that explained how being an insufferable asshole is okay as long as women are the ones acting that way.

These films have removed the possibility of female redemption through male contact, most likely because feminists feel this is sexist. But somehow it’s totally okay for these people to make men these bumbling wanderers that need a woman’s magical healing touch to get their lives in order. They have made it taboo to make women villains, but men are fair game and will likely continue to be demonized by Disney and other companies because no one can be bothered to care.

I honestly hope that Disney moves away from this trend and takes a more balanced approach to their depiction of men, but it’s fairly unlikely. This gynocentric attitude, and cringing at feminist whinging, has taken too strong of a hold on the company, and more importantly it sells out movie theatres.

Because maleness is an evil, chaotic essence that must be controlled and contained, but vaginas are magic.

A memory of a barber

August 10, 2023 | by Matthew Steele | Link | Original Link

Perhaps it is my age, and it is arguable that I am being nostalgic, but indulge me for a moment, if you please. Growing up, I remember my first trips to a barber; a small little shop filled with the smell of apple flavored tobacco's and Birchwood soaps. The chairs were fine carved oak and decked out in worn red leather. You could see about a hundred pictures on the wall, of old cars, and men in chairs getting a fresh lathered shave. These were masculine moments, where being a man was not only accepted but expected. Men came into this place and I would hear them mutter about the local ball club favorite, or brashly curse about something that was irritating them. These were the moments as I sat in the chair quietly, that brought a smile and a slight scolding while Vern, my barber, was trimming down my sideburns.

Today, finding a man's barber is like finding a gold vein in a long abandoned mine, but you can find hair cutting Crapdonald's just about on every street corner. Perhaps even worse, there is a beauty spa named "Utopia" or some such fucking place that bleeds those poor male slaves of half the paycheck they handed over to their feminist masters. It begs the question of what one of the most important things has been taken from men today. Perhaps we could sum it up in one phrase, the pride of being a man.

Because in the end, when you walk out of there, you will remember what it was like to feel good being a man.[/quote] Men have been told they are manipulative and selfish, that they are, in essence, raping, lying, cheating bastards, incapable of any compassion without a woman's guidance. Alright, so maybe we bought into the lie, but more likely it was beaten into us by our master to which we foolishly said "I do." Hindsight being 20/20, you should have gotten into that sports car your buddy had waiting on you, when he hoped you would change your mind. Because you never really thought about what would happen to you in ten years, when she "rediscovered" herself.

When dealing with the courts, the part time fatherhood, struggling to pay child support while slumping into depression over not seeing your children, it's a miracle more men have not ended their lives over the trials this corrupt system has forced them to endure.

Yet men endure it, they take it, like they have hundreds of times over in man's history. Maybe it is because at the end of their enslavement, they find their balls again. Maybe they remember what it was like to stand on their own through the hard times, and find out that being who they are is good and decent and is worth being. Maybe they take a look around and found an old buddy who went through their experience too, and they realize the injustices being perpetrated on them by a misandric society. Then they take a bigger look around, to shows of men being portrayed as idiots and buffoons on television, to being inundated with pink ribbons, while their father dies of prostate cancer – with no marches for their struggle. With that much misandry, and that much money backing it, how much more can a man do to fight that? He cannot even get a decent shave anymore.

Hey, I understand, it was easy to go spend a few bucks on a disposable razor, and a few more on some white shit in a can. “Real” men do not go for shaves when their masters need their nails done and we do not want to short the grocery bill. Real men do not object when those same masters tell them, barber shops are only for men, and therefore, sexist. You chauvinistic bastard, what were you thinking when you wanted your beard trimmed? I know, it was all about being the superior over women and keeping them down. That was what you thought. Something along those lines. Ya. Sure.

Alright, so maybe we bought into the lie, but more likely it was beaten into us by our master to which we foolishly said “I do.” Or maybe, you just want to find a place where a man could be a man again. A place where it was alright to curse about your favorite ball club playing like hell. A place where you could walk in looking like hell and smell like a man when you walked out. Perhaps it was a camaraderie, or maybe it was the old pictures, hell, maybe it was the fact that you did not have to worry about a judge taking away 75 percent of your check, or how you were going to get that toy for the holidays for your child. It was a place where you had to trust another man who was holding a razor to your neck. The good part about that, was that you could trust him. He had your back, because you were on the same side. You were both men. We have to remember that when we look around, at other men, and watch them get dragged through hell. We have to remember our camaraderie in this fight against misandry.

So maybe it’s time to look up an old barber, and throw the fucking Gillette five razor disposable out the damned window. You do know that five razors is not good for your face when just one good sharp one will do, right? I guess that is my point. So much of man’s pride has been stripped from him because he was just a man, that we do not even remember how to shave properly anymore. So when your buddy just lost half his paycheck to child support over false domestic violence accusations, and cannot make the rent because the other half of his check is still going to the mortgage for the house he cannot live in? Call him up, and take him to a barber shop and get him a good shave and haircut. While you’re at it, get one for yourself, and ask the man shaving you for good tips on shaving for men.

Because in the end, when you walk out of there, you will remember what it was like to feel good being a man. Then maybe you will feel strong enough to begin to help your brothers fight back against what made them feel badly in the first place. Because in the long haul we are going to need every good man we can get. The way I see it, might as well look sharp getting there.

The role of ladies in the first sporting tournaments

August 11, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following by Charles Mills (1825) documents interaction between men and women at the first sports tournaments, a tradition from which we derive much of the structure and symbolism of today's sporting tournaments. Have we moderns lost some of the gynocentrism of the early sports tournaments, or have we added to it? You be the judge. – PW

Ladies were judges of the tournament

The ladies were the supreme judges of tournaments, and if any complaint was raised against a knight, they adjudged the cause without appeal. Generally, however, they deputed their power to a knight, who, on account of this distinction, was called the Knight of Honour. He bore at the end of his lance a ribbon or some other sign of woman's favour, and with this badge of power he waved the fiercest knights into order and obedience.

The heralds read to the knights the regulations of the sport, and announced the nature of the prize they were to contend for. The dames and maidens sometimes proposed jewels of price, a diamond, a ruby, and a sapphire, as rewards of valour. But the meed of renown was often more military, and the reader of Italian history remembers that at a tournament celebrated at Florence in the year 1468, Lorenzo de' Medici bore away the prize of a helmet of silver with a figure of Mars as the crest. It was the general wont of tournaments for a vanquished knight to forfeit his armour and horse to his victor.

Knights were led by ladies

The knights then trooped to the listed a plain, with lords, ladies, and damsels, the chivalry and beauty of the country, mounted on gaily-caparisoned steeds and palfreys, whose housings swept the ground. Sometimes a lady fair led the horse of her chosen knight, and in the song of the minstrel the bridle became a golden chain of love. At the day appointed for a merry tournament, in the reign of Richard II., there issued out of the Tower of London, first, three-score coursers, apparelled for the lists, and on every one a squire of honour riding a soft pace.

Then appeared three-score ladies of honour; mounted on fair palfreys, each lady leading by a chain of silver a knight sheathed in jousting harness. The fair and gallant troop, with the sound of clarions, trumpets, and other minstrelsy, rode along the streets of London, the fronts of the houses shining with martial glory in the rich banners and tapestries which hung from the windows. They reached Smithfield where the Queen of England and many matrons and damsels were already seated in richly adorned galleries. The ladies that led the knights joined them; the squires of honour alighted from their coursers, and the knights in good order vaulted upon them.

Knights wore ladies' favours, who imitated the dress of knights

The tilting armour in which knights were sheathed was generally of a light fabric, and splendid. Its ornaments came under a gentler authority than that of royal constables and marshals. If the iron front of a line of cavaliers in the battle-field was frequently- gemmed with the variously coloured signs of ladies' favors, those graceful additions to armour yet more beseemed the tournament. Damsels were wont to surmount the helmets of their knights with chaplets, or to affix streamers to their spears, and a cavalier who was thus honoured smiled with self-complacency on the highly emblazoned surcoat of his rival in chivalry.

The desire to please ladies fair formed the very soul of the tournament. Every young and gallant knight wore the device of his mistress, while, indeed, the hardier sons of chivalry carried fiercer signs of their own achievements but they were unmarked by the bright judges of the tourney, for their eyes could only follow through the press their own emblems of love. Nothing was now to be heard but the noise and clattering of horse and armour.

Knights thanked by ladies

Every preux cavalier had by his side a lady bright. The minstrels tuned their harps to the praise of courtesy and prowess, and when the merriment was most joyous, the heralds presented to the ladies the knights who had worthily demeaned themselves. She, who by the consent at her fail companions was called La Royne de la Beaulte et des Amours, delivered the prizes to the kneeling knights. This queen of beauty and love addressed each of them with a speech of courtesy, thanking him for the disport and labour which he had taken that day, presenting to him the prize as the ladies' award for his skill, and concluding with the wish that such a valorous cavalier would have much joy and worship with his lady.

"The victory was entirely owing to the favor of my mistress, which I wore in my helmet," was the gallant reply of the knight, for he was always solicitous to exalt the honor of his lady-love. As tournaments were scenes of pleasure, the knight who appeared in the most handsome guise was praised and, to complete the courtesies of chivalry, thanks were rendered to those who had travelled to the lists from far countries.

Judge Pirro slams women’s violence against men

August 12, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

In this video Judge Pirro addresses a woman who is a perpetrator and a man who is a victim.

To the women:

> “I’ve heard enough! I’ve heard too many cases of either men being stabbed or killed by women. Men don’t want to talk about it, or they just think that it is something that will go away. It will not go away.”

To the man:

> “The next beating is going to be worse than the last beating. Men are less likely to report the violence due to embarrassment or the assumption that others won’t believe you, but I believe you! I believe you.”

And again to the woman:

> “I have never seen a police report more blatant in terms of the pride you take for assaulting someone. What planet are you from?! You keep doing this and you’re going to end up in State prison – and maybe that’s exactly where you belong. You don’t take out your anger and physically abuse another human being – man or woman…. you should get your tail out of here and hide your face.”

What do a fashion doll and a physicist have in common?

August 13, 2023 | by Scott Wolf | Link | Original Link

What do a fashion doll and a physicist have in common? They are both protagonists of movies that explore different aspects of masculinity and how they cope with their insecurities and frustrations. Ken from the Barbie movie and Julius Oppenheimer from the Oppenheimer movie are two fictional characters who represent contrasting examples of masculinity in their respective movies. They both have their own insecurities and frustrations, but they deal with them in very different ways. Ken is more compassionate and humbler, while Oppenheimer is more ambitious and arrogant. Their different coping strategies have different consequences for themselves and for others.

Ken: A Doll's Journey to Self-Discovery

Ken is a fashion doll who lives in Barbie land, a feminist utopia where women are empowered, and men are supportive. He is in love with Barbie, the most popular and successful doll in Barbie land, but he feels insecure about his role and identity in their relationship. He wants to be more than just an accessory to Barbie, but he doesn't know how to express his feelings or find his own purpose. All he can do is "Beach". That dosen't seem very productive or worthwhile does it?

He copes with his insecurities and frustrations by leaving Barbie land and discovering the real world, where men are dominant and powerful. He tries to emulate the stereotypes of masculinity that he sees in movies and media, such as wearing fur coats, riding horses, and building a Mojo Dojo Casa House. He also tries to impose his newfound authority on the other Kens, who follow him blindly.

However, he soon realizes that his actions are not making him happy or fulfilled, and that he is alienating Barbie and the other Barbies. He eventually learns to accept himself as he is, and to respect Barbie as an equal partner. He also discovers his own passions and talents, such as singing and dancing.

Ken's journey is a satire of the traditional gender roles and expectations that society imposes on men and women. It also shows how men can be vulnerable and sensitive, and how they can overcome their insecurities by being true to themselves and by respecting others.

Oppenheimer: A Genius's Struggle with His Creation

Oppenheimer is a physicist who leads the Manhattan Project, the secret program that develops the atomic bomb during World War II. He is a genius and a visionary, who believes that his work will end the war and advance science. He is also a complex and conflicted man, who has a troubled marriage, an affair with a communist sympathizer, and a history of depression.

He copes with his insecurities and frustrations by dedicating himself to his mission, by collaborating with other brilliant scientists, and by seeking guidance from his mentors. However, he also faces moral dilemmas, political pressures, and personal attacks from his enemies. He struggles with the consequences of his creation, which unleashes unprecedented destruction and changes the course of history. He eventually becomes a victim of the Cold War paranoia, which accuses him of being a traitor and strips him of his security clearance.

Oppenheimer’s story is a tragedy of the human condition and the ethical implications of scientific progress. It also shows how men can be ambitious and arrogant, and how they can face their insecurities by handling their actions and by accepting their fate.

Ken and Oppenheimer are two portraits of masculinity in movies that show different aspects of masculinity and how they cope with their insecurities and frustrations. They both have their own insecurities and frustrations, but they deal with them in very different ways. Ken is more compassionate and humbler, while Oppenheimer is more ambitious and arrogant. Their different coping strategies have different consequences for themselves and for others.

Both of these movies are not only entertaining but also thought provoking, as they challenge the stereotypes of masculinity that are often portrayed in media and culture. They also invite us to reflect on our own identities and relationships, as well as on the social and ethical issues that affect our world.

Paul Elam responds to the Southern Poverty Law Center

August 14, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The Southern Poverty Law Center (SPLC), a feminist organization, recently designated XY Crew a hate group. XY Crew is the online men's outreach and support group I facilitate along with Janice Fiamengo and others. The SPLC's declaration is actually just the latest iteration in their long-running and frankly bizarre declarations about my work. Since the subject, and frankly the SPLC itself, are hardly worth significant effort to address, I'll give you the short version for context. SPLC first named A Voice for Men (when I was publisher) a hate group. Then they said A Voice for Men wasn't actually a hate group. Then they came back and decided A Voice for Men actually was a hate group. Then, once they figured out I no longer published A Voice for Men, they decided it was no longer a hate group. Obviously, that left them short one hate group, so they've decided that XY Crew will do.

Rather than bemoan all this over a group of grifters who lost relevance in the 1980s, I'd like to take the opportunity they've so kindly created to tell you about XY Crew. Five years ago, when I was still creating videos for social media, I set up a Patreon and started offering group meetings to patrons. Just a place to talk about life with like-minded men.

Five years later we've got 6 facilitators doing these groups most days of the week, covering everything from family of origin work, to personal growth and life challenges, to photography, to music sharing, to red pill living. We've served hundreds of men. Some of them showed up at our virtual door in bad shape, teetering on a dangerous edge. All of those who stuck around got better. Many are now embracing the next chapter of their lives with a positive outlook and a bit of wind at their back.

Something else rather remarkable happens at XY Crew. In the online world, red pill venues (like the rest of the internet) are wrought with conflict. Flame wars erupt spontaneously. Men who have so, so much in common turn on each other over minor differences. Entire MGTOW and red pill forums pop up then crash and burn just as quickly due to these petty and often meaningless conflicts.

What we have found with men, though, is that when you put them together face to face, even in virtual environment, they quickly establish a decorum that allows for closer, better relationships; relationships that actually serve to improve the lives of those involved.

Something else worth noting is the absence of shaming. That's of particularly great value in groups of men who are acutely aware of and sensitive to the way society controls and silences men by shaming them. The men at XY Crew are free to be who they are, surrounded by brothers who are cheering them on for success and improvement.

Finally, and most impressive to me, is the atmosphere of absolute accountability that the men of XY Crew foster. Feminists have peddled the victim identity for women since Seneca Falls. The women who bought it, and that is a whole lot of women, have been left miserable, angry, and bereft of personal agency. The men of XY Crew have collectively rejected this path. Instead, they've chosen the accountable life. In terms of setting and achieving goals, of realizing dreams, they hold each other's feet to the fire. It's done with respect and consideration. I dare say it's done with love. But most importantly it is done. It is the way men support each other when they're free to be men.

You may want to ask, "Who are these men at XY Crew?" Well, I can tell you who we are. We are old men in the last chapters of our lives. We are young men, just entering adulthood. We are men suffering ruinous divorces and parental alienation. We are men reconnecting with our children and repairing damage after years of separation. We are men who've been falsely accused. We are men who have repaired the damage in our lives and now support other men doing the same. We are men who have been rejected and abandoned by our families for daring to be take that red pill. We are men with close, active family ties. We are MGTOW monks. We are happily married with children. We are trapped in bad marriages. We are white, black, Hispanic, Asian, straight and gay. We are from all corners of the real world. And we are all pushing, day by day, to make the best of the lives we have without compromise or apology to anyone. That last part is really what puts the hate in the SPLC hate list.

It makes sense in a way. It's just the way the world reacts to men who get uppity and decide they have value. So, rather than just rely on the world as it is we built something better for ourselves.

One thing I should mention is that of the significant time and support all of us put into XY Crew, we deliver it to members for five dollars a month, and we never turn away anyone because of money. If you're reading this, and you happen to be a guy who is going through a rough patch, or if you're the kind of guy who cares about those guys going through rough patches, please consider joining us.

Oh, and if groups aren't your thing, consider tossing in the 5 spot per month on our SubscribeStar anyway to sponsor someone else who's been divorce-raped, or suffered the devastation of a rape lie, or who just wants to experience some sanity. Not to put too fine a point on it, but we are saving lives here. Drop into one of our meetings and ask around.

In closing let me say that writing this brings back some fond memories. It's been a while since I've been at the keyboard. It'll be nice to see my name on the byline again. Especially since A Voice for Men is no longer a hate group.

Robert Briffault insisted his ‘law’ doesn’t apply to humans

August 16, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

We’ve all heard it before – the claim that we must accept gynocentrism as the default setting of the human species and for human relationships because Robert Briffault said it was true a century ago. Only problem is that he didn’t say that at all; its a fabrication by people who have attempted to con us into thinking gynocentrism is the incontrovertible basis of human existence.

Briffault’s law, as stated in his book The Mothers, is this:

> “The female, not the male, determines all the conditions of the animal family. Where the female can derive no benefit from association with the male, no such association takes place.”[1]

Many have embraced Briffault’s Law and applied it to human relationships in a way that Briffault didn’t intend. Briffault applied his law strictly and explicitly to non-human animals in a chapter titled “The Herd And The Family Amongst Animals.”

In the section describing his ‘animal’ law he qualifies that, quote “There is, in fact, no analogy between the animal family and the patriarchal human family. The former is entirely the product of the female’s instincts, and she, not the male, is the head.”

The chapter is five pages long. In it he mentions tigers, elks, lions, zebras, gazelles, buffaloes, deer, monkeys, beavers, lions, birds and other animals, and only references humans briefly in order to contrast human behavioural patterns from those of animals. Briffault says:

> “There is in fact no analogy between that [animal] group and the patriarchal human family; to equate the two is a proceeding for which there is no justification. The patriarchal family in the form in which it exists today is a juridic institution. Whatever external and superficial similarities there may be in the constitution of the human and of the animal family, there is one profound and fundamental difference. The patriarchal family is founded upon the supremacy of the male as ‘pater familias,’ as head of the family. This is not the case in the animal family. it is, on the contrary, entirely the product and manifestation of the female’s instincts; she, and not the male, is its head. We may occasionally find the male employed in foraging for the brood and for the mother, while the latter is lying quiescent in charge of her eggs or brood; but there is nothing in those appearances to justify us in regarding the animal family as patriarchal; on the contrary, the conduct of the group is entirely determined not by the male but by the female.”[1]

Most of what Robert Briffault says is factually incorrect by today’s standard of knowledge.

But what we can say without any doubt is that he never applied his “law” to humans. Therefore, let us apply Occam’s razor to this monumental con-job that has been disseminated in the manosphere and beyond.

While we are at it, why not apply the razor to those people who insist that you adopt this and other bogus arguments for natural gynocentrism; they are not genuinely interested in men’s liberation.

Has the MRM become a gynocentric ideology?

August 16, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Some may be surprised to see an article asking this question appearing on A Voice for Men. Published in the interests of discussion. Unlike our opponents we're not afraid to look in the mirror. –Ed.

In 2013 I introduced the terms Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) and Men's Human Rights Advocacy (MHRA) to an audience raising awareness about men's issues, and since that time the phrase has come to enjoy a small place in the lexicon.

The phrase MHRA was partly introduced to indicate a different ideological accent to that of Men's Rights Activists, of which the following are a few stand-out points (note, these are generalisations which don't apply to all MRAs):

	MHRA	MRA
GENDER ROLES	Separate 'Men's' gender roles (traditional, modern, sexuality or otherwise)	Traditional gender roles (Mid-century 1950s Mad Men roles, [illegible])
MALE ADVOCACY	Specialising in champing the cultural narratives	Specialising in street activism, lobbying politicians, trying to change laws, etc
BIO-THEORIES	Rejects validity of the natural gynocentrism theory for the human species in favor of [illegible] model & genocentrism	Champions the evolutionary theory that the human species and human relationships are gynocentric
PSYCHOLOGICAL SUPPORT	Is [illegible] the narrative that gynocentrism is inevitable or natural, characterising it instead as maladaptive. Replaces [illegible] gynocentric neglectness with more [illegible] agency.	Extends sympathy and pity for men [illegible] but nevertheless 'natural' gynocentric system. Encourages men to look after their own needs as much as possible within the 'natural' gynocentric reality

Another advantage of adding the word human in Men's Human Rights Advocacy is that it better qualifies that the rights being sought are human rights as differentiated from "patriarchal" or other rights imputed to the movement by feminists and other bad actors who wish to malign the movement.

The MRM is characterized by feminist critics as a regressive misogynist enterprise aiming for the revocation of women's liberties and wanting women to be "essentially barefoot, pregnant and back in the kitchen." This caricature has been generated by individuals who feel threatened by the idea of men seeking to improve their lives.

Since coining the MHRM over a decade ago, the shorter 'MRM' label has become increasingly identified with belief in natural gynocentrism. Therefore the differences between MHRA and MRA can be increasingly summarized as non-gynocentrism, vs. advocacy for natural gynocentrism respectively: MRAs frequently see themselves as working within a natural gynocentric system to help men get a reasonable deal within its woman-centering parameters, whereas the MHRA position abandons the belief that humans must function within a gynocentric system of relationships.

I've checked the science used by gynocentrism advocates and it's thoroughly flawed – Pretentious appeals to Robert Briffault and his non-existent 'law'; the claim that humans are returning to hypothesised older layers of our genome shared with gynocentric gorillas and lions (pre Mutual Mate Choice models); or the claim that an increase in infanticide at the hands of women indicates they are evolutionarily more important than children or genes to successful reproduction. All of these arguments and more, including the examples of men going down on one knee to propose, or women's hypergamy, can be better explained by a culturally driven rise of gynocentric narcissism.

Even the argument about women's ova and wombs being sufficient for propagating the human species, with just a few men required as seed banks, is an unscientific fantasy of the narcissistic mind. Progeny of wombs stand little chance of survival without the infrastructure built by legions of men, even incel and bachelor men whose contributions to building infrastructure are equally vital for infant survival. We could say that men, collectively, are one giant paternal investment that cannot provide the necessary survival infrastructure if they were significantly reduced in numbers. What do we think would happen to world survival infrastructure today if the male population were reduced to 10% of the current number? I would hope the answer to this is obvious.

The high numbers of people invested in these fallacies include mindless meme-followers, narcissistically inclined women, male sycophants, and grifting institutions. To check whether these believers are promoting the theory due to memetic and psychological investment, ask yourself if a woman promoting natural gynocentrism theory is showing signs of narcissism? Equally, if a man promotes natural gynocentrism, ask yourself if he is also showing signs of trained sycophancy?

Perhaps we could put it this way: does "gynocentric MRA" sound like an oxymoron to you? It should. Because it is. And on that basis that I find myself more reluctant to use the label, though I should underline that I speak for no one but myself. Put simply, I cannot in good conscience support gynocentrism as a cornerstone of a men's movement – that would be like accepting the married state is essential to living the MGTOW life. I will add that not all MRAs "believe" in the natural gynocentrism theory, even if many do, but a sufficient majority has influenced the understanding of how far we should take Men's Rights Advocacy without infringing on supposedly sacrosanct models of gynocentrism.

Lastly, I like many MRAs who care about and/or have pity for men and boys – this is not an attempt to dismiss their positive contributions nor an attempt to create needless division. The above thoughts are long percolated, and I share them only on the offchance that it makes some small difference in the narrative – perhaps being of assistance to a few men and women who are seeking a way out of the maze of Victorian era myths.

Shaming men doesn’t build healthy sexuality

August 18, 2023 | by Dr. David Ley | Link | Original Link

Male sexuality is intensely under attack, in the increasingly vitriolic social dialogue related to pornography. Though women watch and make pornography, most of the current debates focus on aspects of masculine sexual behaviors. These behaviors include masturbation, use of pornography, prostitutes or sexual entertainment like strip clubs. Promiscuity, sex without commitment, and use of sex to manage stress or tension are all things that are frequently a part of male sexuality, whether we like it or not. But, male sexuality is not a disease, not a public health crisis, it is not evil, and it does not overpower men’s lives or choices. Shaming men for these behaviors isolates men, and ignores powerful, important and healthy aspects of masculinity.

There is a common perception of male sexuality as intrinsically selfish, overly focused on “scoring” and sexual conquests, on anonymous, “soulless” sex, and on the outward manifestations of virility. But there are other, oft neglected sides of male eroticism. Straight men are far more focused upon women’s needs, and upon closeness with women, than we give them credit for. Nancy Friday wrote that “Men’s love of women is often greater than their love of self.” Men give up friends and male camaraderie and accept a life of economic support of women, even leading up to an earlier death, all in order to be with women. More than half of all men describe that their best sexual encounters came when they “gave a woman physical pleasure beyond her dreams.” Men redirect their selfishness away from their own satisfaction, and toward a sense of fulfillment and accomplishment, by giving sexual satisfaction. Male sexuality often involves an intense focus on the needs of their partners, and men gain great pleasure, even a strong sense of manliness, from giving their lover sexual pleasure.

In fact, men’s desire to sexually satisfy their partners comes at the price of their own satisfaction. When a man is unable to make his partner orgasm, many men report incredible frustration, disappointment, and self-doubt. Women even complain that men put so much pressure and intent upon helping the woman achieve orgasm that the act ceases to be pleasurable and starts to feel more like childbirth. In such cases, women fake orgasms, not for themselves, but to satisfy their partner’s needs. Until a woman has an orgasm, a man doesn’t think he’s done his job, and his masculinity hangs in the balance.

Men are taught from a young age that they must be sexually competent and sexually powerful with exaggerated and impossible ideals. Surveys of sex in America find that, compared to women, men are far more insecure and anxious about their sexual performance. Nearly 30 percent of men fear that they ejaculate too soon, most men sometimes experience erectile dysfunction connected to anxiety, and one man in every six reports significant worries about his sexual abilities to satisfy his partner. These are huge burdens that men carry, and are just one reason why many men pursue other forms of sex such as masturbation to pornography.

Compared to women, men actually experience greater pain and psychological disruption from the ups and downs of romantic relationships. Not only do the negative aspects of a romantic relationship hurt men more than women, but the positive aspects and benefits of that relationship have greater impact upon the man than the woman. Because women are better able to access outside support from friends and family, they often fare better than men. Men are often isolated and burdened with the expectation that they shouldn't feel pain, or if they do, they must suffer alone.

For men, physical affection and sex is one of the main ways we feel loved, accepted, and regarded. For many men, it is only through physical love that we can voice tenderness and express our desire for togetherness and physical bonding. Only in sex can we let down boundaries and drop our armor enough to be emotionally vulnerable.

Sex plays a greater role in the lives of men as a form of acceptance and mutual regard than it does for women. Women touch each other all the time, with hugs, holding hands, closer body contact, and smaller "personal space." Men shake hands. Really good friends might, at best, punch each other in a loving way, do a careful "man hug," or even swat each other's buttocks, if it's during an approved masculine sporting event. (Many homosexual men experience this differently, when they come out and are part of the LGBTQ community) So the body-to-body contact that sex offers feeds an appetite, a craving, one that is often starved near to death in men.

Male sexuality is portrayed as something that men must guard against, and it is often described as though it is a demonic force, lurking within our souls, which must be constrained, feared and even rejected. Men are portrayed as powerless to control themselves, in the face of sexual arousal that is too strong. Men are painted as weak, harmed and warped by sexual experiences such as pornography. As a result, men are told to be ashamed of the sexual desires that society has called unhealthy, and told to forego those condemned sexual interests. But an essential part of man is lost when we encourage men to split themselves from their sexuality.

Unfortunately, as we teach men to be men, to understand, accept, and express their masculinity, we rarely attend adequately to the loving, nurturing, and amorous side of men. The most positive way that society and media currently portray male sexuality is when it is depicted as bumbling and stupid-making, a force that turns men into fools, easily led by our penises. But more often, male sexuality is depicted as a force that hovers just on the edge of rape, rage and destruction.

What is necessary for a healthy man, for complete masculinity, is the integration, consolidation, and incorporation of ALL the varied aspects of our sexuality. When we try to externalize our desires for love and sex, excising them from ourselves as something external and dangerous, we run the real risk of creating men without compassion, without tenderness, and without the ability to nurture. It is easy to suggest that what we are trying to excise are the base, primitive parts of men's eroticism, those desires to rape, dominate, and satisfy oneself selfishly. But in truth, those desires, as frightening as they can be, are integrally linked to male emotional desires for safety, acceptance, protection of others, and belonging.

Those things that make men admired and respected—their strength, courage, independence, and assertiveness—are the same things which contribute to the differences in male and female sexuality. By condemning these characteristics, we run the real and frightening risk of abolishing qualities that are essential to healthy masculinity.

A healthy sexual male is one who accepts and understands his erotic and sexual desires, along with his drive for success, dominance (and often submission as well) and excellence. Healthy sexual choices come from internal acceptance and awareness, not rejection and shame. Research has shown that all men have the ability to exercise control over their levels of sexual arousal and sexual behavior, but no men can fully suppress their sexual desire. Healthy men can be men who go to strip clubs, visit prostitutes and watch pornography. They are men who make conscious sexual choices, accepting the consequences of their actions.

Our culture needs a sexual ethic focused on personal relationships and social justice rather than particular sexual acts. All persons have the right and responsibility to lead sexual lives that express love, justice, mutuality, commitment, consent and pleasure. Grounded in respect for the body and for the vulnerability that intimacy brings, this ethic fosters physical, emotional and spiritual health. It accepts no double standards and applies to all persons, without regard to sex, gender, color, age, bodily condition, marital status or sexual orientation. – The Religious Institute

We need to begin encouraging personal integrity, responsibility, self-awareness and respect, both for oneself and one's sexual partner(s). This is, I think, the goal for all men – to make their sexual choices an integrated part of who they are, and the kind of man they desire to be. Unfortunately, as long as we continue to shame and condemn men in general, and for specific sexual acts such as watching porn, we are merely isolating men. Further, we are exacerbating the problem, because removing porn or shaming men for their desires or fantasies, does not teach men how to be a sexually healthy man.

Stooges behaving badly

August 20, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

When I was in grad school way back in the early 1970s, I had a visiting professor from the British Film Institute. One day he was digressing about how he had put himself through school by working as a projectionist. He reminisced about the comedy short subjects that had once been a fundamental part of every presentation but were now obsolete. He mentioned a number of comic actors and wondered if their names had gone down the memory hole (they had) and then asked if anybody in the class had ever heard of The Three Stooges.

The raucous response shocked him. He had no idea that the Three Stooges had been resurrected on American television and were an integral part of the childhood of just about every student in the room.

The Stooges were arguably more popular in the 50s and 60s than they were during their vaudeville and cinema heyday in the 1930s and 1940s. That would probably not be true today. They may well be available on some cable channel and some of their shorts in the public domain may be out there on YouTube, but there is much more competition for viewers' attention today, so their impact can't help but be lessened. In some circles, that would be considered a good thing.

I suspect that any enterprising soul trying to host a Stooge-a-Thon at a local college campus today would be met with a feminist/SJW task force intent on closing it down. Of course, Mrs. Grundy has never approved of the Stooges but today her disapproval encompasses more and more aspects of male behavior.

In my youth it was common knowledge that one of the fundamental differences between the sexes was that men loved the Three Stooges and women couldn't stand them. I think that's a topic worth exploring. As Moe was wont to say to Larry and/or Curly, "I'll explain it so even you can understand it." At least I'll try.

At this point in time, I fancy myself something of an expert on the Stooges as I have just finished watching in sequence all Three Stooges shorts (97 total) made during the Curly era (1934 – 1946). If I still had to write compositions about how I spent my summer vacation, I would have my theme. Since each short runs about 20 minutes, it was a time-consuming chore but thorough research is a must if sound scholarship is to result. In fact, I wouldn't be surprised to find out that somewhere a gender studies program has integrated the Three Stooges into the study plan. God knows they've studied stranger material in those classes.

It is a fact of life (which means feminists deny it) that women value high-status men who are good providers. Given this premise, it's no wonder women detested the Stooges. They embody everything women don't want in a man. When employed, the Stooges have menial jobs with no future. In addition, they are short, ill-mannered, and they dress funny. When the Stooges made their comedies, their haircuts were considered way out. Given today's hipster hairstyles, however, the Stooges' coiffures are almost mainstream.

In their films, more often than not, the Stooges are unemployed or underemployed. When they do work, they almost never have white collar jobs (it is difficult to imagine any of them sitting behind a desk). Of course, blue collar jobs are more physical and offer more opportunities for slapstick. The Stooges, however, are less than ideal spokesmen for the dignity of the proletariat.

Even when the Stooges portrayed professional men, they were lacking in gravitas. Ironically, the only Oscar nomination (for comedy short subject) they ever received was when they portrayed doctors in "Men in Black" in 1934. Of course, they graduated at the bottom of their class and are hopelessly incompetent, but incompetence is a recurring theme in humor. Male competence is the key to any functioning society – but it ain't particularly funny. Female incompetence is also funny (e.g., "I Love Lucy"), but no comedienne could get away with it today. "We can do it!" and "Girl Power!" y'know.

Despite the Stooges' overall lack of sex appeal, they do occasionally forge relationships with women. In fact, they portray married men in some of their shorts, but they are hardly the heads of their households. Often, they are content to let their wives be the breadwinners while they sleep late. Worst of all, they do not help with the housework, which is probably just as well, given their incompetence.

The Stooges have never been held up as role models. Mothers used to worry about their children imitating their violent interactions. I think the phrase, "Kids, don't try this at home" likely originated when the Stooges ruled the airways. Today the internet has much worse activities that might inspire imitation. Also, the "Jackass" TV show and movies make the Stooges look like sissies. Nevertheless, there are problematical elements in the Stooges' films pertaining to acceptable behavior in the enlightened, progressive America of today.

Since the Stooges live together, domestic violence is a recurring problem. Typically, Moe, the father figure, abuses the "children," Larry and Curly. Clearly, these movies should not be shown today without a trigger warning or an 800 number referring viewers to a domestic violence hotline.

Women are occasionally the brunt of the abuse (but when slapped they almost always slap back). Perhaps more distressing is the matter of female dignity, which often gets trashed. Women high up on the social scale are the most popular targets, as the humor in such situations is in inverse proportion to the social status of the person being humbled. Making a washerwoman the butt of a joke just doesn't elicit as much laughter.

The class struggle, in fact, is a recurring motif in the Stooges' films. Then as now, the nature-versus-nurture debate raged on. In "Hoi Polloi," a 1935 short, two wealthy gentlemen make a wager as to whether heredity is more important that environment or vice versa. Turning the Stooges into gentlemen is the acid test. Of course, it proves to be a fool's errand, but the plot was so good it was recycled in "Half-Wits Holiday" (sadly, Curly suffered a career-ending stroke on the set) in 1946. As late as 1958, the same plot was resurrected for "Pies and Guys," with Joe Besser in the Curly role.

The upshot of these shorts is that attempting to uplift the underclass is a waste of time and effort. In other words, inequality rules. This a controversial conclusion sure to upset social justice warriors, who generally deny any sort of inborn differences in human behavior (particularly gender roles) and decry those who assert otherwise.

Then there is the problem of insensitive language. Moe is the chief offender, given to calling Curly and Larry "imbeciles/idiots/morons." Of course, we no longer use those terms today. You can almost see psychologists rolling their eyes every time they hear one of these pejoratives. I guess if the Stooges were around today, Moe could say, "You special needs/special ed/mentally challenged persons!"

Among the most cringe-inducing Stooges' shorts are those in which they appear in women's clothing, thus making light of the plight of trans people. Curly is particularly egregious in this regard. He is more believable than Moe or Larry, perhaps because he is more neotenous. But his missteps go beyond cross-dressing.

Curly is obese and his appearance plays a big part in the humor. In ye olde cinema, fat people (e.g., Fatty Arbuckle, Oliver Hardy) were fair game for humor. It was socially acceptable to laugh at fat people simply because they looked (and walked) funny. Of course, in those days people laughed without looking over their shoulder to see if anyone was offended. Unfortunately, the fat-shaming in Stooge films isn't limited to Curly. One particularly insensitive scene occurs in "False Alarms" (1936) when a land whale (thankfully, no yoga pants back then), savoring a night on the town with her friends, exults, "Let's go places and eat things."

In a sense, insensitivity is integral to being a Stooge. If you have to absorb a lot of physical abuse, it helps to be insensitive. So let's take a look at the insensitivity of each Stooge.

Women may admire a man who takes charge, but I don't think Moe is what they have in mind. Moe has serious anger management problems, yet his ire is almost never directed at women. He never hits women and rarely hits on women. He just isn't a ladies' man. Though he acts the part of the alpha male (I think the adjective "bossy" applies here), he isn't any smarter than Larry and Curly. Moe is the demanding boss who issues commands right and left, the irascible father who dishes out corporal punishment, the drill sergeant given to humiliating tongue-lashings (think R. Lee Ermey with a funny haircut and without the uniform). Moe is the epitome of toxic masculinity. He would surely be described as a fascist today — and not without justification. Building on his authoritarian personality, he impersonated Hitler in two shorts ('You Nazty Spy" in 1940 and "I'll Never Heil Again" in 1941). I wouldn't say he was literally Hitler but it did seem like type casting.

Larry is the most passive of the stooges. A 1984 biography of Larry (written by his brother) was entitled "The Stooge in the Middle." We might describe Larry as a classic cuck. For the most part, he is a beta (at best) male who just goes with the flow. When it comes to punishment, he frequently takes it and only rarely dishes it out. For the most part he is a nice guy, albeit clueless, the guy who never gets the memo. Larry occasionally tries to ingratiate himself with attractive women but never gets anywhere. His big mistake is hitting on women with high sexual market value. If he sought out older women who have hit the wall, he'd probably fare much better.

Then we come to Curly the man-child. Every comedy team has one (Stan Laurel, Lou Costello, Harpo Marx, Jerry Lewis). His role is to be irritatingly childish or endearingly childlike. As a potential husband, he is worthless, but he sometimes awakens the maternal instinct in women. Today he would probably be diagnosed with Peter Pan Syndrome. Failure to launch doesn't begin to describe his flaws. Curly was not shy and was given to addressing strange women as "Toots" (probably not a wise move for pickup artists today).

Of course, no essay on the Stooges is complete without referring to the pie fights. The origin of this sort of humor dates back to vaudeville and British music hall, but it would be a wild goose chase to try to figure out who threw the first pie or who was the first person to get pied (yes, it is a verb). The Stooges, however, are among the foremost practitioners of the craft.

One of the primary targets for their pies was the hoity-toity female. Any number of elegantly-coiffed and draped women saw their dignity destroyed after a well-aimed pie. Feminism was on the back burner when the Stooges' films were in theaters, but I have to believe that if they were around today, they could really wreak havoc at, say, the NOW annual convention or a university feminist workshop. Why fight feminists with debates, arguments, lobbying, persuasion, statistics, or appeals to reason when you can pie them? A surprising number of high muckety-mucks have gotten this treatment but the perpetrators are usually captured by the high sheriffs.

Now I am not recommending that readers actually go out and shove a pie into anyone's face (though it might make the skirmishes between antifa and the free speechers less lethal). Depending on where you live, you could be charged with assault, battery, and maybe a hate crime. Besides, I don't like the idea of wasting baked goods. Still, given the wealth of feminist wrath on YouTube, anyone with a smidgen of smarts pertaining to video editing and CGI could probably match up shots of the Stooges or other slapstick artistes throwing pies at feminist targets.

I think it would be funny. How about it, Curly? Are you up to putting a pie in the puss of a sanctimonious harpy?

Soitanly!

Nyuck-nyuck-nyuck-nyuck….ad infinitum.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of August 2023 McLellan is still at large. Sebastian, who would now be 10, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Canada.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's investigator, Claudia Rodriguera.

A Voice for Men has been reviewing court documents pertaining to McLellan. There's a lot to this story. More to come.

Four levels of knowing

August 24, 2023 | by Dr. F (Ian Williams) | Link | Original Link

Some years back when my graduating film had just wrapped up with it's shooting I walked out of my house utterly dazed. It had been a grueling ten day shoot which had me spent; wallet and everything else. Watching the footage meter on the back of the Ariflex camera blur around was like seeing something on the dash of a rocket taxi to the moon. I was now in debt, and there was a tiny window of time between the film's wrapping and a three month haul in front of the editing machine.

I walked in to the local grocery shop to get away from the heat from the footpath, and the wonderful and jumbled smell of fresh fruit brought me back to sometime long ago when I was a kid at the markets. It was cool and pretty dark and my eyes needed time to catch up from a hullabaloo of light outside.

He didn't call it that, he called it the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. And he told me about it and didn't let up until he thought I understood it. There were a few people milling about, and I heard the sound of someone laughing with absolute joy. It was coming from a room at the back of the small shop and I walked towards the door ajar there. Inside there was an elderly man sitting at a card table and he was drinking something pretty strong and home made by the looks of the large bottle with a cork in it. We were the only people there and he looked at me and didn't miss a beat of his tearful laughing when he said, "Listen to the cricket, just listen to it…"

Nearby was an old transistor radio and the cricket was playing, so I listened to it hoping to get the joke. Quite frankly I didn't get it and thought maybe the guy was happy on his grappa and that was that. He leaned forward and said, "No, listen to the other cricket, can you hear the cricket ?" It was then that I heard the sound of the chirping of a cricket that I'd missed before.

I didn't think the joke was all that funny, but I was very amused by this man I'd never clapped eyes on before. He gestured me to sit and share a drink and so we did. We sat there sharing some of his strong grappa and although we were poles apart in our age and backgrounds we did have this short time together and he told me about the "four levels of knowing."

He didn't call it that, he called it the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. And he told me about it and didn't let up until he thought I understood it.

Now you have to understand I'm not retelling this moment with him as an earthbound Yoda or a swami in a cave with a beard as long as his name. This was just a man who knew something interesting and wanted to tell me about it and he did. Now I'm going to tell you about it and I'm using an analogy here with chess.

Level 1. Unconsciously Unaware:

When you are a toddler you know nothing of chess. You've never seen a chess board and you have never heard the word “chess” before.It’s here at level one you are not even aware that you know nothing of chess. You don’t know that you don’t even know.

Level 2. Consciously Unaware:

For the first time you see a chess game in play. Someone says “look, they’re playing chess.” You now know that there is a game called chess but you have no idea how to play it. You are at level two because you know that you are aware that you know nothing of chess. You know that you don’t know.

Level 3. Consciously Aware:

You are playing the game and you are very new at it. As you move each piece you have to remind yourself how each piece moves differently. The rules of the game are always in your mind, and it’s this that makes the play of the game a battle not on the board but in your head as you try to remember them. You not only know of chess, you can play it. This is the third level because you know that you know.

Level 4. Unconsciously Aware:

Years have past and you play at a competition level. You never give a thought about the rules and now you think of tactics only. While you play your mind may wander a moment to something else like a song or a conversation you’d had years before. You can think these things and play chess at the same time and your game is the same. You’re an expert. You’re at the highest level because when it comes to chess you are not aware that you’re thinking about the game while you’re playing it. You are so aware it has you asleep to how aware you are.

That’s just chess. There’s all the other things out there that have you at “competition level.” You tie your shoe laces up while wondering if warm beer’s better than cold. When you drive a car you listen to music and make words from the number plate in front of you.

All of us are at level four in many ways and in so many other ways we are level three or less. When we do our taxes, we are flying by the seat of our duds, and if we plant a fruit tree in the garden it’s normal to read about how much sun it needs and therefore where best to plant it. That’s most of us, but for an accountant or a botanist it’s a different story because at level four they never think about thinking about it and their minds are free to wander elsewhere.

So what the hell does any of this have to do with you and me? Well, the thing is because you and I know about the Quattro livelli di conoscenza. We can go about our ways better as MRA’s.

Have you ever been spluttering with impotent annoyance at a social gathering when someone dumps on blokes? I have and it burns my face red. When it happens I find myself trying to remember stats and sources of credible information and while I am doing this the moment has passed. The sensation of letting myself and you down stays with me and I play the moment over in my head like a creepy sound bite on a loop.

I’m at level three with these things. I am consciously aware of myself trying as hard as I can to remember the information here in the Mission and Values, and it’s not just that. There’s the shaming tactics I know about but wish to draw upon in a trice when I’m shamed.

There’s no way I’m wanting to score points in a misandric hotbed, I simply want to defeat with rapid grace. I can’t do this at level three. I just can’t while I’m checking the rules and the facts and wondering if I have the numbers and names right. My impotence is secured for the more dilligent feminists, and if there are passive blue pillarians there as well I have missed my moment. I can’t go on like this and I’m on a personal mission to bootstrap it to the next level.

Just like the times table or the shoe laces these things will soon be right with me always. I can’t sit back and have a beer and let by osmosis the newer me soak into me. I have to work at it, and having a low frustration tolerance in this respect will have me coming off second best.

Every time I practice as an MRA in any capacity online or in social circles I am getting closer to the level of doing something with such expertise I am never thinking of it, I just do it.

I never saw that old guy again and not for any dramatic reason either. With all frankness I never wanted to go back to that grocery shop because the short time I had with him was so treasured I shied from the chance of making it anything else. I didn’t want to see him measured less than my memory showed him and I’m happy with that. I’m just saying that he was just a guy who told me something very interesting. And now I’ve told you.

Custodial Mother Karma

August 25, 2023 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

Ah, custodial mothers, undoubtedly a topic of much angst with many readers of A Voice For Men. However, I do not intend to turn this article into a diatribe against the world's mothers as some may suspect. Actually, I do not think any negative or visceral writing I could pen here today could come as close to making a point about custodial mothers than where I intend to go with this article.

I would also like to extend a nod to the many custodial mothers who are a part of the Men's Human Rights Movement, those mothers who made the conscious decision to either turn their back on feminist ideology and made sure that the father of their children were equally included in their kids' lives, or those mothers here supporting us today that have male children who most likely are experiencing hell in the family courts (or soon will be).

My story starts twelve years ago when my first daughter was born and I found myself in a precarious position in her life as a putative father (father not married to the mother) and instantly found myself excessively denigrated by a family court system that has a long history of hurting legal fathers, but does so with great furor to fathers who are not married to the mother.

Needless to say, I was turned into an obligatory non-custodial father in the blink of an eye and handed my sentence of visitor four days a month. Being a new father, I figured the world wasn't such a bad place and figured the custodial mother would be happy that I wanted to be an equal parent in the child's life; to nurture, care for, feed, bathe, clean, and be involved in every part of her life.

Unfortunately, I was wrong. For the first six years, the custodial mother followed the court ordered visitation to the tee and life was hell. By age eight, the mother was giving me more and more time with the child and by age ten we eventually went to the courts and hammered out the perfect 50/50 shared parenting agreement that continues in effect today. I also must say that I realize I do not have it as bad as most of you here, although one may suspect so given that I am a tireless advocate for fathers in their quest to become equal parents in their kids' lives.

Actually, some of you may be surprised to learn that I am also a custodial father of a female child who is very young, and one who demands that the court give the mother 50/50 time even though the law won't allow it in North Carolina.

So where am I going with this post?

Custodial Mothers of the world, be careful in your exhaustive activism for unequal family courts, for thou may seal the fate of your male children.

Today, another child was born in North Carolina, one who will be lumped into statistics as yet another child who came into the world with a loving mother and putative father.

Before anyone gets excited, no this is not my newest child, the child is actually the grandchild of the custodial mother I mentioned in the opening of this article.
Now, I suspect many of you are grinning from ear to ear knowing exactly where I am going with this, and you could not be more right. Although, I do want to say that while I should be enjoying the hell out of this, sitting back smoking a cigar and laughing my ass off, I need to control that and remember that this young man has the potential to have his life shattered if the relationship with the child's mother does not go as planned. But, I am not as nice as many of you may suspect and I am going to take a moment to, with great verbosity and enjoyment, scream from the rooftops…

CUSTODIAL MOTHER KARMA!

Why? Today I watched a Mother, a woman who did everything possible in the first six years of my daughters life to make sure I was nothing more than a marginalized payment provider to HER child became a staunch and very aggressive father's rights advocate for HER SON who is now a newly minted putative father and did so in the blink of an eye.
Today I watched this former custodial mother fight with nursing staff wanting to know WHY the child did not have the last name of her son, and could not fathom their legal response that in North Carolina he is not a father because he is not married to the mother. When told that her son could sign an "affidavit of parentage" before leaving the hospital which would give him some legal rights IF the default custodial mother of this baby agreed to it, my former custodial mother had a look on her face that I will never forget, and the words will probably stick with me till death.
Grandma (former custodial mother of my child): "What the hell do you mean he can sign a piece of paper? My son is this child's FATHER!"
Nursing Staff: "Ma'am, I understand, but by law he can't be considered the father unless the mother allows him to sign this affidavit"
Grandma: "Will this put his name on the birth certificate?"
Nursing Staff: "No Ma'am, this is just a NC Department of Health and Human Services form that they give us to have fathers sign in these circumstances (preparation for child support proceedings just in case). He will have to contact an attorney in order to establish legal rights.."
Grandma: "Are your F'ing kidding me?!?!"
Of course I, having lived this side of hell, sat back, watched, and could have told her all this, but I digress…

What Custodial Mothers AND FEMINIST CO-CONSPIRATORS Can Learn From This Article

Right now, in every corner of this planet, there are soon to be mothers and custodial mothers in a furious fight to maintain their position as supreme lord over their children and who will have no part in the father joining her at the throne. These mothers can be found over on Jezebel, Feministing, BlogHer, and A Circle of Moms conspiring with other mommies about how bad their ex-husbands or boyfriends are and what they can do to make sure he never sees the light of day again. All of this, while they have a male child feeding from their nipple and looking at him in wonderment.

Little do any of these mothers realize, roughly 50% of the worlds militant custodial mothers have male children whom they are working diligently to make sure that he, as a father, will be summarily kicked in the ass by the custodial mother in his life and the family courts. And who, will likely be standing in a hospital or court room one day screaming to high hell about how her son is a father dammit!
All I can do is again say: CUSTODIAL MOTHER KARMA!
But I do have a wonderful message for these mothers, a message that your feminist leaders forgot to tell you when they took your money at fundraisers or put pictures in front of your face of beaten and bloody women claiming that this would be you if the father ever got near you or your child again (likely in an effort to squeeze another dollar out of your pocket an into their non-profit trust account).
My message to you is this: cancel your subscriptions to the National Organization For Women's mailing list, close your accounts on Jezebel and Feministing, and join the dark side because you will likely find that your new life as an activist and non-custodial grandmother who will likely rarely see her grandchildren is best served here on A Voice For Men.
And remember all those things your feminist co-conspirators told you about your ex-husband or boyfriend, how he is a likely rapist, domestic abuser, and child molester? Yeah well, you just remember that because as they took your money and time then, they have every intention to tell the custodial mother of YOUR son's child the same thing about YOUR son.
Enjoy your stay on A Voice For Men.

If NAWALT* Then NAMALT

August 27, 2023 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

“All men are potential rapists, and definitely sexual deviants!” “Yeah! Those creeps!”

“Men are no longer necessary.” “Damn skippy! Those useless slobs!”

“Men are dominating privileged patriarchal oppressors, rule the world, and own all corporations.” “They oppress women! Smash the patriarchy!”

“Men are stoic and emotionless. They don’t feel things like women do.” “Why won’t they listen to me!?!?!?”

“Men are poisoned by testosterone and their chromosomes are going extinct.” “Good! Who needs them anyway?”

“Boys won’t sit still in the class and are hard to control.” “So annoying! Why can’t they be more like girls?”

“Men are sexually selfish and don’t care about pleasing their partners.” “Of course not! They’re men!”

“Men pollute Mother Earth and plunge penis pumps in her to extract oil to fuel male privilege.” “Yeah! Women are more sensible and compassionate!”

“Men are violent thugs, and start all wars.” “Yes! If women ruled the world, there would be no war.”

“Men are unnecessary for the raising of a family.” “That’s right! Women can do it all!!!”

“Husbands and fathers beset their wives and children with marital rape, domestic violence, child abuse, and neglect.” “Those assholes are sick!”

“Men force women into restrictive gender roles.” “Yeah! Down with patriarchy! Women hold up half the sky!”

“Don’t let your man cheat on you, all men are pigs.” “Men don’t do any housework.”

“Men abandon their children.” “Men are boorish and insensitive.” “Men don’t know how to treat ladies anymore.” “Men are failing in school.” “Men have Peter Pan syndrome.” “Men should act more like women.” “Men are afraid of commitment.” “Men think with their dicks.”

“Women have a serious lack of respect for men’s humanity.” “NOT ALL WOMEN ARE LIKE THAT! Stop generalizing!”

Hyperbole aside, does this not sound familiar?

Here’s how it goes: misandrists and other ignorant jerks utter bigoted nonsense, a few people agree, and everyone else just silently accepts it. Except for a few who protest, and are quickly shouted down or told to “man up.”

But woe betide any man or woman who dare speak a less-than-flattering thing about women. “Not all women are like that” (NAWALT) is the least of the recriminations.

I understand some of the criticisms of generalizing, and the spirit behind NAWALT. While I think the human race would have died out long long ago without the ability to generalize, and to a certain point it is intellectually necessary, I get that we should treat people as individuals as much as possible. Women and men are human beings. Some of them are saints, some are pure evil, and most are a balance of both. And we're all just trying to live our lives.

But it is also glaringly obvious that when it comes to gender issues, it is regarded as hunky dory to generalize men in a horrible fashion. This should go without saying, but if Not All Women Are Like That, then Not All Men Are Like That.

If you're reading this, you probably already speak against misandry and other forms of bigotry. And if you say NAWALT, or warn against a generalization, you should be taken seriously. But if you don't speak against misandry and other bigotry, or you join in, then you have no right to utter NAWALT. That reveals a lack of courage and a broken moral compass. You can do better.

Remember: If NAWALT, then NAMALT.

---

* "Not All Women Are Like That", or NAWALT, is the phrase/acronym for a very common phenomenon in gender-related discourse. Whenever anyone says something less-than-positive about a woman, or a group of women, some version of "Not All Women Are Like That" is uttered as a non-answer to stop the conversation, or to deflect an obvious truth from acceptance.

A Bevy Of Bloated Beauties

August 27, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

I'd heard about the neo-burlesque movement of recent years but I hadn't seen any performances. From the pictures I'd seen of the performers, I couldn't muster any motivation. Recently, however, I was subjected to a brief unscheduled performance that preceded a film showing.

Two overweight women came out and plodded around the stage and stripped down to pasties and G-strings. One had an inordinate amount of cellulite in her buttocks. I felt as though I was looking through a telescope at two crater-pitted moons revolving around Heranus.

There were ritual cries of "Take it off!" and wolf whistles, but it all rang pretty hollow. It certainly wasn't eyeball candy…eyeball castor oil maybe. Thankfully, the two women were only on briefly before the movie started.

Well, if you've ever seen pictures or old videos of the classic burlesque queens, such as Blaze Starr, Tempest Storm, or Ann Corio, you know that their adipose tissue was where it was supposed to be and not where it wasn't supposed to be: In other words, the classic hourglass figure. The women I saw had figures more like those 33-ounce beer glasses the Germans hoist at Oktoberfest.

Believe it or not, there was a time when overweight girls ("pleasingly plump" as my grandmother was wont to say) were popular on the burlesque circuit. It had nothing to do with body positivity. It was supply and demand. There was a market for chubby chasers back then.

The prime mover behind this fat fetish was a vaudeville veteran known as Billy Watson. Born Isaac Levy on the Lower East Side somewhere between 1852 and 1867 (his date of death, however, is firmly established as January 14, 1945), Billy Watson did it all: Actor, writer, comedian, critic, director, emcee, and songwriter, among other pursuits. Logically enough, all this show biz savvy qualified him to be an impresario. Knowing that repeat customers are the lifeblood of a successful business, he knew it was essential to keep his musical revues fresh so patrons would come back. So in 1909 he decided to recast his chorus girls.

Before the late 19th Century, the fleshy girl was the norm in feminine beauty. Don't take my word for it. Go to an art museum and see for yourself. Especially notable was the Flemish painter Peter Paul Rubens (1577-1640), from whose nudes are derived the adjective "rubenesque." This is an all-purpose adjective that could be positive (voluptuous), neutral (plump) or negative (lard ass).

Flash forward a few centuries to the Gibson Girl, the creation of artist Charles Dana Gibson. Like the burlesque queens, this ubiquitous artistic ideal sported an hourglass figure, albeit fully clothed. And she remained the ideal into the first decade of the 20th Century when Billy Watson was in his prime.

Like most impresarios, Billy Watson was a bit of a gambler. He had a hunch that a lot of men missed the plumpers of their youth and would pay money to see them on stage once again. So Watson held a casting call for chorus girls for his proposed Beef Trust Beauties. As it turned out, they were more than a little overweight, as 180 pounds was the minimum requirement. Some overachievers were closer to 250 than 200.

Now at first blush, the word "beef" may seem highly insensitive as it compares women to bovine creatures. Nothing new about that, of course. Women have long been likened to cows and it has never been complimentary. But Billy Watson had something more in mind.

When the Beef Trust Beauties made their debut in 1909, the phrase "beef trust" was already a thing with the public. Upton Sinclair's best-selling 1906 novel The Jungle dealt with shady business practices in the Chicago meat packing industry. In Sinclair's muckraking classic, it appeared that the leading names in the industry (Swift and Armour, among others) had formed a trust.

Before the rise of corporations, trust was a good thing. The word had nothing but positive connotations. Towards the end of the 19th Century, it had come to mean corporations colluding to avoid competition and fix prices, creating a de facto monopoly. Famously, Standard Oil magnate John D. Rockefeller had once denounced competition as a "sin." If small businesses struggled and consumers paid higher prices, at least they weren't sinners.

The Sherman Antitrust Act of 1890 was passed to tackle the problem, but enforcement was delayed until VP Theodore Roosevelt ascended to the White House after William McKinley was assassinated in 1901. TR quickly established a reputation as a trust buster. A series of trustbusting indictments were pursued. The first was against railroads but others followed. The beef trust was broken up by the Supreme Court in 1905.

At any rate, the beef trust was on the public's mind during the first decade of the 20th Century. So Billy Watson came along and tapped into the phrase to name his overstuffed chorus line. The name implied that Watson had cornered the market on porker pulchritude. If daddy liked 'em buxom, this was the show for him!

Not surprisingly, the girls were the butt of jokes by reviewers. One of them wondered about the possibility of the stage collapsing while the "human pachyderms" pranced on it. Rumors of work crews shoring up stages before the Beef Trust Beauties came to town were rampant. Of course, many reviewers couldn't help but notice the Beef Trust Beauties arose during the administration of William Howard Taft (elected in 1908), the fattest (340 pounds) President in U.S. history.

Whatever your taste in women today, Watson was on to something in 1909. The box office was boffo! As Watson put it, "People get the idea that just because a gal tops 200 she's fat and nothing else, but she can still be big and beautiful. Why, I dare anybody to say my girls aren't petite, and besides they can do more routines better than little girls can."

Unfortunately, the names of these "girls" have been lost to history. It would be interesting to know how long they lived. Given their head start on diabetes, perhaps Watson had an endocrinologist on retainer.

It could be mere coincidence that in 1911 one of the most popular tunes of the day was "Oh, You Beautiful Doll." This was not just the name of the song but also the first line of the chorus. The second was "You great big beautiful doll." Had lyricist Seymour Brown seen the Beef Trust Beauties?

Then there is Walt Disney. When Disney was a 10-year old boy in Kansas City, he had a friend from a theatrical family that introduced him to vaudeville. Is it possible that he had heard about, if he was not old enough to see, the Beef Trust Beauties when they were appearing in Kansas City? If so, it could have made a lasting impression on him, one that lingered almost 20 years and inspired the dancing hippos sequence in Fantasia, which came out in 1940.

Well, we are so far removed from the beef trust era that the phrase has no relevance today. Curiously, in subsequent years beef became associated with the male body (beefcake) while cheesecake became a common term for fetching female bodies.

The term "trust" was given a positive spin a couple of decades after the heyday of the Beef Trust Beauties when Theodore Roosevelt's distant cousin Franklin was elected president in 1932. FDR's cabinet was referred to as the Brain Trust. In this case, the term was a compliment, as it implied that FDR had cornered the market on brainiacs; he had chosen the best and the brightest to pilot the ship of state through the depths of the Depression.

The phrase might have been apt even as late as the JFK administration, which was compared to King Arthur's Camelot, with the cabinet members presumably comparable to the knights of the round table. Given the results we've gotten from subsequent administrations, however, using the phrase "brain trust" to describe a President's cabinet would only meet with laughter or scorn. Plus, the very phrase reeks of elitism, so any Presidential handler would advise the Prez never to utter it.

Of course, we still have trusts today, as contemporary corporate flow charts evince. We don't call them trusts, however. Conglomerate seems to be the word of choice. So if anyone wanted to revive the Beef Trust Beauties, a new name would be in order. The Land Whale Blubber Revue maybe? On second thought, no; that would only invite protesters and bomb threats.

While fat-acceptance is all the rage today, I don't think a contemporary version of the Beef Trust Beauties could be profitable. It was a phenomenon peculiar to its era. On the other hand, a revue of obese drag queens…definite commercial potential in clown world!

The Beef Trust Beauties revue was certainly not your father's burlesque…but it might have been your great-great-grandfather's.

What is gynarchy?

August 29, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

This piece looking at the history and meaning of the word gynarchy was first published in 2013 – Eds.*

While 'gynarchy' is a relatively unused term, most by now would have heard of gynocentrism, a versatile term applied to literally anything we consider female dominated, from cultural institutions to gender relations, a term that has proven useful to discussion of gender issues.

Gynarchy, more specifically than gynocentrism, refers to government by and for female interests, including any establishment of laws and bureaucracies that benefit women. As you will see below it has also been described in earlier times as "petticoat government" and is synonymous with what is commonly referred to today as "feminist governance."

Gynarchy has a long literary application and isn't a neologism requiring introduction into the language. To get a taste of its value let's look at some of the historical uses of gynarchy (and its variants gunarchy, gunarchie, gynæcocracy, ginæcocratie, gynecocracy, gynocracy) starting in the 16th century:

1577: The gunarchie of Queene Cordeilla. [Holinshed Chron. I. 13/2]
1660: That in Gynarchy the wife is not subject, but superior to her husband [R. Coke Power & Subj.]
1737: Gynæcocracy is feminine rule; petticoat government [Universal English Dictionary]
1755: Gynæcocracy: petticoat government; female power [Dictionary English Language]
1758: I have always some hopes of a change under a Gunarchy; where whim and humour commonly prevail. [Chesterfield Letter. (1792) IV. cccl. 159]
1763: Denotes the government of women, or a state where women are capable of supreme command. Such are Britain and Spain. [Dictionary Of Arts & Sciences]
1816: In the fishing villages on the Firths of Forth and Tay?the government is gynecocracy. [Scott Antiq. xxvi. Note]
1838: [Under gynocracy] women enjoy a greater influence… Mr. Hoskins says they seem to lord it over their husbands, and all mercantile transactions are confided to their hands. [Gentl. Magazine]
1886: That social gynæcocracy for which France is famous. [Temple Bar LXXVIII. 509]
1890: So will you best help to maintain the true gynarchy [Blackw. Mag. CXLVII. 264/2]
1903: The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country." [Max O'Rell – Philadelphia Record]

Note the hierarchy of gender alluded to in the year 1660 which claims that under gynarchy the wife is not subject to, but superior to her husband, or the 1838 mention of wives being superior to husbands, indicating that gynarchy requires servitude and inferiority of men toward women. These examples indicate that some males, over the centuries, have been taught to serve a gynarchic principle with chivalrous servitude that reinforces the superiority of individual women.

We see this chivalrous reinforcement of the gynarchy from the Middle Ages through to the time of Ernest B. Bax and continuing forward to today's "feminist governance". Evidence of the latter is all around us; in female-serving male politicians (the vast majority), government funding and entitlement programs, education, and in popular woman-elevating culture. It is helpful to have a word standing for the individual and collective female governance that we can unsheath at quick notice – and this word gynarchy serves us well.

Matriarchy (rule by moms) is an inaccurate term for political hegemony enjoyed by the female sex (because not all females are moms), and similarly patriarchy is an inaccurate term when applied to all males (because not all males are dads) – not that accuracy ever worried feminists who continue to refer to patriarchy when andrarchy would be far more descriptive of their imaginary construct. However unlike the mythic patriarchy that lacks evidentiary backing, historical gynarchy is supported by a mountain of empirical evidence. If we define gynarchy as government by or for women's interests the evidence shows that most of today's social institutions are thoroughly gynarchic.

Modern dictionaries usually define gynarchy as a political system governed by women or a woman. For a more complete understanding it's important to recognise that "the political system" women govern may actually be staffed by male servants called prime ministers, presidents, or politicians who work on behalf of the ruling female gender.[1] In her book What's Right With Feminism Cassandra Langer gives a concise definition that accounts for the proxy role of male leaders: "Gynarchy refers to government by women, or women-centered government."

A Dream of Fecunda (part one)

August 30, 2023 | by Duncan Smith | Link | Original Link

Editor's Note: Below is an extract from the book, The Vast and the Spurious: 25 Problems for Feminism, by Duncan Smith. In this excerpt he examines the feminist vision of creating a utopia peopled only by women.

How long have we had feminism? It seems like eternity but it's only about fifty years since it really fired up. In those fifty years, there have been thousands of books, talks, and courses on the subject, but we're still no closer to gender Utopia. I reckon it's time to seize the moment and quit while we're behind. We must rise as one people and many genders and say Enough! After all this talk, after all this trash, it's time to give Fecunda a go.

And what is Fecunda? It is a magical land; a country never darkened by evil or sin. It is a holy realm without pay gaps, privilege, or rape culture. Fecunda is a land populated only by women.

Sounds pretty good, huh? But is Fecunda a real place, or one known only in legend? Well, if it ain't real, it ought to be. Women have suffered too long at the hands of men. As one feminist said, it's only down to their 'immense compassion or immense foolishness' that they continue to co-exist with men at all. Yet we can't expect women's love to be boundless. It's time for the Dear John letter; time to go our separate ways. Women deserve a homeland. They deserve Fecunda.

The idea of Fecunda came to me in a dream. It was right after I saw Black Panther, that documentary about the awesome country of Wakanda in Africa. Wakanda is a really cool place with advanced technology they developed on their own far from Western civilisation. Yet as we know, Wakanda is an ethnostate, only for Africans. Because of that, Wakanda has never had the problem of racism. It stands to reason there's no racism in an ethnostate. In the same way, an all-female Fecunda will solve the problem of sexism. That means no more domestic disputes, no more man-splaining or man-spreading. In fact, no more problems at all.

Sure, there's the matter of reproduction, for without children, how can Fecunda endure? Should they take a few men as breeding slaves in a sort of reverse Handmaid's Tale? Better not. No hint of toxic masculinity should ever taint the holy land of Fecunda. I guess the Fecundan scientists can figure out some kind of cloning system. But that is mere detail. The immediate need is to get Fecunda up and running. Men have held women back for too long. Women have earned the right to live under matriarchy, with all-female companies, universities, and families. Let them lead the way and show us how civilisation can be done.

The Case for Fecunda

Now, Fecunda is not for all women. It's for those who have made it clear they've had enough of men. In other words, feminists.

It's for Boston academic, Suzanna Danuta Walters, who wrote a famous article called 'Why Can't We Hate Men?' Some people say feminism's a hate movement. According to Walters, it has every right to be. Fecunda is also for Laurie Penny, who's fed up with women doing all the work in relationships. It's for Roxane Gay who says that in the age of Me Too, it's time for men to confess their part in creating rape culture. It's for all the authors ripping off Margaret Atwood and putting out their own versions of The Handmaid's Tale. Really, it's for everyone who thinks patriarchy has them in its vice-like, invisible grip. Men are the problem? Fecunda is the solution.

It's time to give Fecunda a go. Just think of all the problems getting rid of men would instantly solve. Like I said – no gender pay gap, no rape culture, no male privilege. Fecunda would have 100% female CEOs, a complete lack of sexism, and the Me Too movement would be about as necessary as those bicycles that fish don't ride.

If you want to do the thing properly, you could even wind the clock back to Year Zero. It's a grave injustice women in history were denied the chance to make all the great inventions and discoveries. A Stone Age Fecunda would give girls the chance to shine. Let the female Newtons and Darwins emerge as they will.

Or perhaps that is a bridge too far. Fecunda may be a social Utopia, but if it is to compete with other nations, let it have access to the knowledge male privilege has produced. Let Fecunda begin on an equal footing with everyone else. Then, it may shine as the model of what human potential can achieve once patriarchy is vanquished once and for all.

Trouble in Paradise?

In theory, Fecunda should be exactly what feminists want. Let them keep all the advantages of modern life, but remove the one blight on their lives: men and the patriarchy. They could build their own society from the ground up. What could possibly go wrong? Well, maybe a couple of things.

The first problem would be finding women to do all the hard, nasty, or dangerous jobs normally done by men. The garbage collection, building, manual labour, and so on. There'd be no more men to do all that stuff. There'd also be no more men at the top running, inventing, or achieving things from which all others benefit. Still, there's no reason women can't step up and start doing all this. That's what they want, isn't it?

The second problem would be mental. Being human and living a happy life is difficult. All this time feminists have told themselves their problems are caused by men. After living in that whole Excuse Culture, what are they going to do when the Great Excuse is removed?

Having played the blame game so long, they'll find it extremely hard to change – which is one reason they'll never leave. But imagine if they did. In Fecunda, there'd be no more blaming men for everything and thanking them for nothing. No more the eternal cop out. No more thinking 'I could be anything but for the cursed patriarchy!'

When your mindset is one of grievance, this mode of thinking isn't easy to give up. If a whole country was formed with people who think like this, it would be only a matter of time before a new scapegoat was found. Some new form of privilege or systemic unfairness would soon be discovered.

You can see this in the recent backlash against white feminists from women of colour. It is almost a matter of schadenfraude to see white feminists being chastised over their privilege, power, and even – Heaven forbid – the pay gap between black and white women. Still, we'd better not have any of that mean old schadenfraude stuff around here. It might lead to fantasies about what happens when people who do nothing but complain are forced to live with each other.

The Skeptics' Attack on Fecunda

I'm not the first to dream of Fecunda. Of course, there were the lesbian separatists in the 1970s, but as recently as 2018 – at the height of the Brett Kavanaugh furore – some visionary on Twitter said, 'Ladies, fuck it all. Let's start our own damn country.'

This set off a storm of replies. The most succinct of these was, 'And yet you're still here.'

Some insinuated an all-female country might not be a place of peace and harmony. 'The weekly civil wars would be draining,' said one. 'Y'all would hate each other in 4 days,' said another. A less optimistic forecast was 'I'd give your country about 2 hours before it burns to the ground.' One woman tweeted 'A country with only feminists in it? I think I've heard of that one. It's called Hell. But please go.'

Some men were in favour of an all-female country, but for different reasons. 'You can take the blame for a while,' said one guy. Another echoed the sentiment. 'Do it. There will be no way you can blame men for your problems!' Another said 'For the love of GOD, please do. Take all the Feminists and the Soy-boy fruitcake men. Let me know where to donate. It'll take you less than a year to have your own civil war when you realize that men AREN'T your problem YOU are.'

This was all terribly unfair. As one girl protested, 'It's funny how men think women can't run their own country because omg "women hate women," like they didn't create the systemic internalised misogyny to begin with.' So it looks like in Fecunda, men can still take the blame even if they're not there.

Then again, some women were keen to try it. 'I'm in!' one tweeted. 'I offer super mad admin, commercial and legal skills…as well as being a homemaker.' Now, while it's true those skills are useful in any modern economy, several replies showed a concern that other jobs might be harder to fill:

I'm curious about this proposal. I'm interested to see if you'll find enough workforce to construct the building, the roads, bridges, the power plants. Then there's the sewage plants, the plumbing, the mining, et al. This would be fascinating & educational.

Go ahead. Some things to ponder. 1. What's your constitution look like? 2. Who collects the resources? How are they distributed? 3. What's your medium of exchange? 4. How do you protect yourselves? 5. Have a draft? Mandatory military service? I've got more when you're done.

Who collects the garbage? Who climbs the cell phone towers? Who pumps your oil? Who frames your houses? Who defends your freedom? Hint: It's not feminist ink spillers with ZERO job skills.

Perceptive readers will pick up a hint of skepticism at the idea a women-only country could work. Still, pioneers have always been mocked for having the guts to try something new. They laughed at Columbus when he set off for the New World. They laughed at Julius Caesar when he tried to conquer Ancient Britain. They laughed at Jimmy Jones when he took his People's Temple to the tropical paradise of Guyana.

Don't laugh. Goddamn it, let's give Fecunda a try! Feminists have been saying for years women can do anything men can. Perhaps they're right. Yet until the experiment is tried, it's all hypothetical – and talk is cheap. That's why Fecunda is the perfect chance for women to finally achieve their full potential away from the shackles of patriarchy and the soul-crushing privilege of men. All together now – Give Fecunda a Go!

As for who would rule, there's no shortage of high profile leaders who could step up as Fecunda's first president: Angela Merkel, Julia Gillard, or Justin Trudeau, just to name a few. Hillary might even step into the breach if she's got nothing better to do. Maybe whoever it is could make some terrible empathy-based decisions like having open borders or something. Then again, that would defeat the point, wouldn't it? Fecunda is all about keeping the right ones in and the wrong ones out.

Envy 10, Empathy 0

This essay has been facetious in tone, but has a more serious intent. It's a response to what seems to be a systematic resentment of men.

Contrary to feminist belief, most Western men are not princes, lords, or playboys. We do not have lives of astonishing ease, free of troubles and sorrow.

Men are getting pretty tired of the Envy 10, Empathy 0 view of them. We're sick of being blamed for everything and thanked for nothing. We're sick of being a 'we' at all. Men are individuals, not part of a team that can be blamed for every problem, real or imagined, women think they have. We are not a gestalt entity to be blamed for the crimes of our worst members.

But if feminists really think men are the problem, Fecunda is the solution. They should leave and establish their own society. Let's see if it leads to any kind of Utopia.

Perhaps it will. Inga Muscio seems keen on the thought of an all-female space. In her magnum opus, Cunt: A Declaration of Independence, she describes the life changing experience of attending the Michigan Womyn's Music Festival, where it's not only the music that's female. The gatekeepers, bus drivers, and every other role is taken by women. Indeed the only men allowed to enter the site are there to empty the porta-loos.

Muscio contrasts this with regular life, where she cannot leave her home without being immersed in a male-created world. The cars, streets, and buildings are the result of men's labour and design. Even most of the songs she hears, or the movies she sees advertised, have been made by men.

This is quintessential feminist discontent. Instead of seeing our civilisation as something to be proud of or grateful for, it's a source of annoyance. The whole damn thing is a tiresome imposition on women. To be fair, Muscio's point is the frustration that women haven't had more of a hand in creating it – and Cunt certainly is one of the better feminist books. Yet in this section (from pages 206-07) the antagonism to men is so strong that maybe it's time to trial some kind of gender apartheid. Why not? Why not trial an all female country where women can run the show? It's time to replace the complaining with action. Fecunda would be like the Michigan Womyn's Festival, but all the time. The only problem is the Fecundans will have to empty their own porta-loos.

Is feminism a hate movement? The official answer is no, but it does seem to be angrier than ever the last few years. My city's main newspaper runs anti-male stories daily. One journalist used it to proclaim the Me Too movement a revolt against aeons of oppression. Another, writing after the murder of a young woman, raged against men as a class and said it was an act of folly for women to keep partnering with them at all.

In her infamous 'Why Can't We Hate Men?' essay, Suzanna Danuta Walters argues that hate is justified. She says that right around the world, women suffer at the hands of men, just as they have through history. Men are responsible for centuries of woe and the only way they can make amends is to get out of the way. She calls on men to give up all leadership positions and hand power to women to make up for all the damage they've caused.

Some expressions of hate are even more direct. During the Brett Kavanaugh affair, a lady I'll call Amelia was outraged by all the men defending Kavanaugh on social media. She tweeted that they all deserved horrible deaths and feminists would 'laugh as they take their last gasps,' before castrating their corpses and feeding them to pigs.

As an aside, Amelia recently defended free speech on Twitter. I tweeted a reply: 'For once I agree with you, Amelia.' 'You might agree with me on a few other things too,' she answered. Not sure how to take this, I tweeted, 'You may be right,' before returning to meditate on my hopes for Fecunda.

So, let's repeat: Men are the problem. Fecunda is the solution. If Danuta Walters wants women to rule, she could keep slogging away in the countries clogged up with men, but why not just move to Fecunda? Imagine how much women can achieve once their main problem is removed once and for all. I mean, on Christmas Day, 2018, someone called 'Feminist Next Door' sent out a special festive tweet on the same topic. The gist of it was to imagine that men vanished from the world for 24 hours. Mind you, they would not be harmed, just absent.

The day men vanished need not be Christmas Day itself. It could be any day. But it would be just like Christmas for people like 'Feminist Next Door.' The idea was for women to imagine what they could do on that joyful day, and given the nobility of the sentiment, let's forgive FND for ripping off Andrea Dworkin. A couple of months later she answered a male heckler who said something rude about International Women's Day. She said the other 364 days of the year were all International Men's Day, so the heckler should shut up and let women have their one special day.

The trouble is ‘Feminist Next Door’ is way too modest in her demands. 24 hours? What can you do in 24 hours? You need at least 24 years to see what women can really achieve. It’s just possible that after 24 years, Fecunda might be the greatest country in the entire world, a superpower to rival Wakanda itself. In Fecunda, it will be International Women’s Day 365 days a year.

*Part Two of this article will move on to the topic of ‘rape culture.’

A Dream of Fecunda (part two)

August 31, 2023 | by Duncan Smith | Link | Original Link

Editor's Note: Below is an extract from the book, The Vast and the Spurious: 25 Problems for Feminism.

Part Two – Rape Culture and Guilt

Part one of this article was about a fictional all-women country called Fecunda. Part two looks at a more serious question – are men as a class responsible for individual crimes against women, and are women entitled to hate them? It is after such crimes in my country, Australia, that feminist anger against men reaches a peak.

In June, 2018, a young woman named Eurydice Dixon was raped and murdered in a Melbourne park. This awful event stirred up a lot of anger. TV host, Lisa Wilkinson, mentioned The Handmaid's Tale in a tearful speech. Clementine Ford wrote a newspaper column scolding men for their collective sins.

This may seem odd, given that men as a class did not murder Eurydice Dixon. In fact, she was killed by a 19 year old autistic man named Jaymes Todd. But by some interpretations of feminist theory, men as a class did murder Eurydice, at least indirectly. She was a victim of 'rape culture' and systemic misogyny. So, if men as a whole are part of creating rape culture, some feminists hold them accountable.

Soon after the murder, a police chief spoke out urging women to take precautions – being careful where they walked at night, for instance. This drew an angry response: Why should women change their behaviour? Men are the ones who should change their behaviour. Stop raping women!

The feminists who said this weren't just talking to rapists, but to men as a class. The idea of 'rape culture' is that we live in a misogynistic society where rape becomes normalised through various attitudes toward women and sex. There's a well known triangular diagram used to explain rape culture. It lists twenty-one type of behaviour, at four levels. On level one are rape jokes and 'locker room banter,' for instance. Another version I saw includes 'sexist attitudes' and 'unequal pay,' showing that the causes of rape culture don't have to be directly sexual. Level two of the triangle has cat-calling, stalking, and revenge porn. Level three includes groping and sexual coercion, while actual rape and violence are up the top on level four.

The idea is that any act, no matter how trivial, is part of a spectrum in a general climate of misogyny. This makes rape more likely to happen, or allows its perpetrators to get away with it. That means any man committing the lower level sins – even on level one – is part of creating rape culture, so is to some degree complicit in rape itself.

Strangely, plenty of non-raping men don't like this idea, and 'not-all-men-are-rapists' is a common refrain. Such protests don't impress feminist, Clementine Ford. After the Dixon murder, Ford wrote, 'I am increasingly disagreeing with the view that not all men are part of the problem, and it's because I truly think most of them don't understand that the problem is theirs to solve.'

Her column went on to berate men over what they do to stand up for women. Do they challenge sexist comments from their male friends? Do they stop their colleagues harassing women? She also asked if they do their share of housework and parenting, so perhaps failure to vacuum or do the dishes is part of rape culture too.

As for who is really to blame for the murder of Eurydice Dixon, the correct answer is Jaymes Todd, the young man who actually did it. But as the theory of rape culture tries to blame a whole class of people for the acts of individuals, it is worth pointing out some problems with the idea.

To do this, I'll make two analogies. The first concerns our treatment of farm animals. If there is one class of beings with a genuine claim to being victims, it is the animals we raise and kill for food. The morality of killing animals is a separate argument that I won't go into here, but just for the sake of the analogy, let's say it is wrong. If so, then all people who eat meat are complicit in this and share whatever guilt is involved.

I've recently gone towards vegetarianism, but as I still sometimes eat meat, I share in the guilt. On the other hand, you can't say vegetarians and vegans share that guilt, for the obvious reason that they don't eat meat and actively avoid doing so.

So, going back to the murder of poor Eurydice Dixon, a feminist glaring at men and snarling you're part of the problem is like someone scolding a group of vegans and vegetarians for their part in killing animals. Most men do not rape, and trying to smear them with some kind of collective guilt for the crimes of rogue individuals is not just unfair but absurd.

In terms of the analogy, a feminist might say being a vegan isn't enough. You have to become a PETA activist and stop people eating meat. You can't, for example, stand around at a BBQ while people are eating sausages. You have to call them out on it or you're enabling 'carnivore culture.' But no, individuals are only responsible for their own acts. Carnivores are guilty of eating meat; vegetarians are not. Rapists are guilty of rape; non-rapists are not.

The second analogy I'll make is with Muslims as a whole being blamed for acts of terrorism. After terror acts by Muslim extremists, some people have tried to blame all Muslims, or Islam itself. It's a good parallel for feminist attempts to blame all men for individual crimes against women.

Suppose there are two types of Muslims – moderates and extremists. You can't blame the moderates for acts of terror committed by extremists. The moderates would have had no idea the atrocities were being planned, let alone executed.

You could argue there's a systemic hostility behind such acts. If – as some claim – the ideology of Islam is anti-Western, you could say the ideology is partly to blame for extremists' acts of terror. Yet even if that were true, you still can't blame moderate Muslims for what extremists do.

You might theorise that there's a 'terror culture' made up of anti-Western attitudes. This could be a four level spectrum like the one for rape culture. On level one are trivial acts like making anti-Western jokes or disapproving comments about Western morals. Level two might be refusing to serve Westerners in Muslim shops, or forming cultural enclaves. Actual terrorists acts would be at the top on level four. By this logic, using rape culture as a parallel, moderate Muslims who make anti-Western jokes are also guilty of acts of terror. But that is absurd.

It is true systemic hostility can lead to individual crimes, just as anti-Semitism in 1930s Germany led to crimes against Jews. But there are problems with trying to push this sort of collective guilt. First, a low level offence isn't the same as one at a high level. A Muslim tut-tutting about 'Western morality' isn't as bad as one who blows up a Balinese nightclub, as happened in 2002.

Second, you could say that if 'terror culture' helps normalise acts of terror, then those who refrain from such acts are actually more moral than they would otherwise be. If terror is normal, it is more virtuous than usual to refrain. Likewise, if 'rape culture' normalises rape, those who live in a rape culture and don't rape are more moral than those who live in a non-rape culture and don't rape.

Suppose there's a culture where it's legal to take child brides, for instance. Men who could take child brides but don't are more moral than men who can't take them and don't. Obviously, cultures where child marriage is legal don't see it as immoral, but for the sake of argument let's say there are two men who believe taking child brides is morally dubious. One of them lives in Australia, the other in Pakistan. In Australia, it is illegal and socially unacceptable to take child brides. In Pakistan it is both legal and relatively normal. If both these men find the practice morally dubious, the man from Pakistan is the more moral for refusing to do it – because he actually could, but doesn't.

To go back to the animal analogy, it's both legal and acceptable to eat meat. There is no moral censure for doing it, no consequences at all. As a result, the decision to abstain, by vegans and vegetarians, is admirable because they are making a moral choice in the absence of any social pressure to do so.

Therefore, if we live in this so called 'rape culture,' where sexual assault is somehow endorsed and enabled by misogyny, men who live in it and don't rape it are more moral than they would be if they didn't live in a rape culture.

It's a strange and fairly absurd argument to make, but that's what you get when a young woman's death is used as an excuse to shame all men for their supposed complicity.

Misogyny?

But why should we believe in rape culture in the first place? Taking the phrase literally for a moment, there's no Western country where rape is permitted. Taking it more broadly, there are reasons to doubt Western culture is deeply misogynistic, as some feminists believe.

First, there's been a big push in recent times to promote women's interests, in a number of ways. Why would that happen if society was misogynistic? Feminists may say this is all the result of their fight for justice, but if society was misogynistic those reforms wouldn't get through at all.

At the same time, there's been a lot of recent anti-male sentiment. Never mind men being the butt of jokes in sitcoms, or the steady stream of anti-male ad campaigns. You actually have in our universities, the systematic denigration of men, and especially white men, as being somehow to blame for all the world's problems. Society is misogynistic? If anything, it's increasingly misandric. (Of course, none of this is news to readers of A Voice For Men).

Just look at the main newspaper in my city. On any given day, you'll find several pro-female and anti-male articles. It's surely only a matter of time before the Sydney Morning Herald renames itself the Sydney Morning Feminist.

If we believe some theorists, the murder of Eurydice Dixon is the end result of systemic misogyny. 'Rape culture' is a spectrum of connected behaviour, and any man who engages in a sexist act at the low level is also contributing to rape. So if we could just reform men and get rid of rape culture as a whole, acts of rape and murder will also cease.

Call me a skeptic, but if you really think calling out sexist jokes at the office Christmas party is going to stop some psychopath murdering a random woman in a city park, well, good luck with that.

Do rapist-murderers do it because they hate women? No doubt some do, but others won't have thought it through that far. Obviously, some are immoral, acting from pure malice. Others are amoral in that they don't care about the ethics of their actions, or the effect on others. They're indifferent to moral questions. A third type are probably just stupid, with poor impulse control and no understanding of consequences. A fourth type are mentally ill and disturbed. The idea that all these men commit their crimes due to society-wide misogyny seems like a one-size-fits-all theory.

The real explanation of why some sick or evil men rape may be more prosaic. To put it in coldly clinical terms, rape may be a side effect of a system where supply and demand are heavily out of balance. That is, when it comes to sex, one gender can get it when they don't want it and the other can't get it when they do. Under those conditions, rape will sometimes occur from a minority of men who are evil, ill, or have poor impulse control. Of course, none of that is any justification for rape. But it seems a simpler, more likely reason for rape than the catch all theory of 'misogyny.'

Those who think rape culture is the problem think stopping misogyny is the solution. This seems over idealistic. If you really want to address the threat of rape, better to acknowledge that, in those coldly clinical terms, sexual supply and demand are way out of balance. As a result, there will always be a small minority of ill or evil men who are a threat to women. That's the reality of it. What you can do about it is a separate question.

There's a great YouTube talk by a feminist and rape survivor, Wendy McElroy, called 'Fallacy of the Rape Culture.' She makes the point that if people are serious about stopping rape, it can only happen by addressing its real causes. Pushing an ideology about ‘respecting women’ is a different issue, worthy in its own right, but may not have much to do with stopping rape, at least in the Western world.

McElroy agrees there are rape cultures in some parts of the world. Cultures which permit, for example, child brides, rape within marriage, mistreatment of low caste women, and so on. You could make a case that those sort of rape cultures are tied up in misogynistic values. In comparison, claims about rape culture in the West look trivial. They insult not just Western men, but those women around the world who have a genuine claim to be living in a rape culture.

Let’s Make Murder Illegal

Some feminists have said it is the responsibility of men as a class to stop rape and murder. It is ‘their problem to solve.’ How could men actually do this? Here’s a thought to get the ball rolling – why not make murder illegal?

After the Eurydice Dixon murder, men did try one thing. The Australian Senate proposed that women carry tasers, pepper spray and mace to defend themselves. That sounds like a good, proactive strategy, but it was rejected. A leading feminist was part of a senate majority who opposed the motion. They had a better idea: teach men not to assault women.

It’s hard to believe an immediate, practical step was turned down on the basis of ideology – an ideology that believes stopping rape culture will stop rape. Even if you accept that premise, it would still take decades to achieve. In the meantime, why not carry some pepper spray?

Some women are angry at being asked to take precautions, but any person should take steps to reduce risk. Compared to women, men are far more at risk of violence in public places, so they try not to put themselves in danger. They know, for example, not to go out in King’s Cross in Sydney after 1am. In the days of football hooliganism in England, peaceful football fans knew to stay away from rival fan areas. Generally, there are certain bars, streets, or events you should avoid. The reality is some men are violent, and other men have to take whatever steps are needed: learn self defence, don’t hang out with thugs, avoid bad locations after midnight. This is all routine and commonsense advice.

As for sexual assault, men don’t face the same risks as women, but in the Me Too era some of them have adopted ‘Mike Pence Rules.’ US vice president Pence has a rule to never be alone in a room with any woman other than his wife. This is to lower the risk of a false sexual harassment allegation. High profile men would prefer the risk didn’t exist, but it does – so they take precautions.

In a YouTube talk called ‘Are Men Responsible for Ending Sexual Violence?’ Janice Fiamengo refutes the idea that men could do so even if they tried. She says the demand that men eliminate rape conflates the truth that men have the individual power and responsibility not to commit sexual assault with the false claim they can stop it in others. It’s a ‘sleight of hand’ indeed.

Fiamengo makes an analogy with parenting. There are some terrible parents out there, (a small minority) but it would be unfair to make parents-as-a-class bear responsibility for what the bad ones do, and it is useless to imply they have any power to stop it.

A Hidden Source of Misogyny

Remember that 'rape culture' is a set of misogynistic attitudes that makes offences against women more likely to occur. Let's look at this idea from another angle.

To be fair, fostering an attitude of hate towards a class of people does have an effect – or rather, a number of effects. One is that you feel less sympathy for that group and their problems. Another is you may feel resentment towards them. A third is you might want to have nothing to do with them. This is true of various types of people that are antagonistic to other types.

But if it's true a systematic dislike of one group for another has consequences, one might argue feminists are responsible for creating hostility not just towards men as a class, but towards women as a class. How so?

Not all feminists hate men, but enough do to have real world effects. The Me Too movement, for instance, began as a protest against sleazy Hollywood moguls then turned into a much wider campaign with the potential for abuse. As Fiamengo said, 'all women have now acquired a deadly weapon… and a significant minority are willing or even eager to use it.'

No doubt some feminists are delighted to bring down as many powerful men as possible. Some of those men deserve it, others do not. Yet if some innocent men go down as collateral damage, these feminists will shrug their shoulders, talk about male tears, and see it as some kind of payback.

It's one thing to incite resentment of men, but a side effect is you also incite resentment of women. It may seem to feminists that their efforts to help women can do nothing but good. Where their causes are just, they may be right.

They may also think they're helping women when they lie about the gender pay gap, give a one sided view of domestic violence, or support a pro-female / anti-male agenda in the media and education. In the short term, these actions may help women, up to a point. What they also do is create a strong tide of resentment against women as a class.

Among the many fruits of this are the MGTOW movement, the refusal of some male bosses to mentor women in the wake of Me Too, less sympathy for women, strong antipathy to feminism as a cause, and less inclination to support pro-women reforms one might otherwise agree with.

Apparently, 'rape culture' is made of misogyny. But if misogyny means antagonism towards women, it's likely third wave feminism has created more antagonism than anyone else ever could. Feminism at its worst is self-defeating because it doesn't inspire either respect, or support for its causes – and feminism is at its worst all too often these days.

The movement may have begun as a just cause, but over the years it has become a hate movement. 'Why can't we hate men?' says Suzanna Danuta Walters. Well, sure, you can. Just do it somewhere else.

In Fecunda.

What is feminism today? ‘Rape culture.’ Me Too. The ‘gender pay gap.’ Envy 10, Empathy 0. Men-bad-women-good. Blaming men for everything and thanking them for nothing. And let’s not forget that men as a class are complicit in the rape and murder of Eurydice Dixon, an event which could only appal any moral person.

Soon after Dixon’s death, Clementine Ford wrote an angry newspaper column berating men. As it was written in the emotional aftermath of the murder, one might forgive some over-statement. Yet the passage below is from her book, published months later, with only minor changes from the original column.

> It is a mark of either immense compassion or immense foolishness that women continue to throw ourselves into the act of loving men despite amassing a lifetime of experiences that tell us how dangerous this decision can be. I am increasingly disagreeing with the view that not all men are part of the problem, and it’s because I truly think most of them don’t understand that the problem is theirs to solve…
> …Women don’t need to be told to look for the goodness in men, because we try our damnedest to find it every day. We work hard to nurture it, even as we’re told to be grateful for it. For our own survival, women must believe that not all men are the enemy.

I’ve read both Ford’s books and many of her columns and was surprised by her claims about looking for men’s goodness. Perhaps in her personal life she tries her damndest to find the goodness in men, but she sure doesn’t in her published work. On the contrary, she seems to try her damnedest to find the worst in them.

Clementine Ford is entitled to her views. She’s even entitled to broadcast them through books and newspaper columns. But if she really thinks women take their lives in their hands by partnering with men, perhaps it’s time to go our separate ways.

It’s time to give feminists the space and opportunity they need. Go, and may the Goddess go with you. Goodbye Suzanna. Goodbye Amelia. Goodbye to all the feminists convinced they live in The Handmaid’s Tale. Please go – with our blessings and good wishes. We wish you well in establishing the Republic of Fecunda and creating your dream country free from our eternal sabotage. Go in peace – and good luck.

Circumcision could raise the risk of autism

September 2, 2023 | by Debbie Nicholson | Link | Original Link

Approximately 55 percent to 65 percent of all newborn boys are circumcised in the United States each year. Routine circumcision is usually performed during the first 10 days (often within the first 48 hours), either in the hospital or, for some religious ritual circumcisions, at home.

Conclusions are based on converging observations in animal, clinical and ecological studies, MD, PhD, DSc, consultant and senior investigator conducting epidemiological research at Statens Serum Institute. Adjunct professor of sexual health epidemiology at Aalborg University and lead author of this study along with, Center for Sexology Research, Aalborg University, hypothesized a possible impact of ritual circumcision on the subsequent risk of autism spectrum disorder (ASD) in young boys.

This study included 342,877 boys born between 1994 and 2003 and followed through the age of nine, and during the course of the study.

During the course of the study 4.986 cases of autism were diagnosed. The study showed that regardless of cultural background, circumcised boys were more likely to develop autism. Being circumcised before age 10 was associated with a 46 percent increased risk but if circumcision took place before the age of five the risk doubled.

Circumcised boys in non-Muslim families were also more likely to develop hyperkinetic disorder by 81 percent.

Dr. Frisch stated “Our investigation was prompted by the combination of recent animal findings linking a single painful injury to lifelong deficits in stress response and a study showing a strong, positive correlation between a country’s neonatal male circumcision rate and its prevalence of ASD in boys.”

Today it is considered a medically unacceptable practice to circumcise boys without proper pain relief but none of the most common interventions used to reduce circumcision pain completely eliminates it. Some boys will endure intensely painful circumcisions. Researchers say that the pain associated with circumcision in very young babies is likely to be more severe during the operation and post-operatively.

Painful experiences in neonates have been shown in animal and human studies to be associated with long-term alterations in pain perception, a characteristic often encountered among children with ASD.

“Possible mechanisms linking early life pain and stress to an increased risk of neurodevelopmental, behavioral or psychological problems in later life remain incompletely conceptualized,” said Dr. Frisch, who continued, “Given the widespread practice of non-therapeutic circumcision in infancy and childhood around the world, our findings should prompt other researchers to examine the possibility that circumcision trauma in infancy or early childhood might carry an increased risk of serious neurodevelopmental and psychological consequences.”

There are experts, however, that are urging caution about this study.

Professor Jeremy Turk, MD, BSc (Hons), FRCPsych, FRCPCH, DCH, Consultant Child and Adolescent Psychiatrist in the Trust's Behavioural Phenotype Learning Disabilities Service and a Professor of Developmental Psychiatry at the Institute of Psychiatry, related to the Daily Mail that while the findings of the study were "interesting," they needed to be "considered carefully."

"This is not a causal study, but instead compares data sets and looks for correlations. While this is a valid way of doing a study, it means that we must be careful about any implications," he said. "For example, many cases of autism are missed until children are older and as there are relatively few cases of autism this could easily skew the data." "Furthermore, there are many potentially confounding variables which could explain raised ASD rates, which the authors do not explore or account for."

"Finally, I have some issues with the premise in that their speculations regarding early pain as a cause of autism are, to say the least, highly speculative."

Dr. Rosa Hoekstra, PhD, a lecturer in The Open University's Science faculty, commented to the Daily Mail, "I think this is an extremely speculative study." She related that the study is based on registered data, "and takes a registered autism diagnosis at face value, without considering cultural or social factors affecting the likelihood of an (early) autism diagnosis. Even in a high income country like Denmark, not all children with autism are detected and given a suitable autism diagnosis at an early age."

Professor McConway, professor of applied statistics also with the Open University adds "This study raises an interesting question, but one that cannot be fully answered with these data."

Ayaan Hirsi Ali's feigned fear of men in her family and the lie of a forced marriage

September 3, 2023 | by Sekhar Chandra | Link | Original Link

Over the last few years, many internet communities have seen a spate of women playing the damsel in distress card quite successfully. Many White Knights came to the rescue and brought the dollars with them, and there were plenty of skeptics, too. In the New Atheist community, the Ben Radford and Karen Stollznow episode is well known. In the wider culture there were some spectacular rape accusations that unraveled under scrutiny, such as the University of Virginia's Jackie case, and the University of Columbia's Emma Sulkowicz case. Women are human and they lie just like men, and sometimes they lie spectacularly. But society is easily fooled by tales of women's oppression, especially religious oppression and Islamic oppression. Ayaan Hirsi Ali is one such woman who played the damsel in distress card quite successfully in the 2000s, before being exposed by Dutch documentary Zembla in 2006, and yet retains a lot of the same victim cred to this day.

The exposé is quite thorough. It gathered evidence from Ayaan's family members, school records in Kenya, and from Ayaan's hosts during her immigration to the Netherlands. When Ayaan is confronted with the evidence, she admits to most of her lies. After such an exposé, one would hope that Ayaan's lies would not be repeated by her supporters. But as late as 04/2014, even the anti-feminist Barbara Kay repeated the falsehoods. She says

> But to recap, Ali was raised in a strict Islamic society in Somalia. She is a survivor of female genital mutilation, civil war, physical abuse from a violent father and a forced marriage. Through good fortune and her own determination, she exchanged a life of subjugation and misery under an oppressive religious yoke for secular freedom in the West

All of the above are lies, except perhaps female genital mutilation.

1. She left Somalia at age 7 before the civil war started. Her primary and secondary school records prove that she lived in Kenya from age 10.
2. She was reared mostly by her mother. Her parents divorced when she was 12, her father worked in a different country and sent home money, and she lived in comfort in a big house.
3. She studied in a reputed Muslim school, while her brother studied at a Christian school, thereby indicating that the family opted for a quality education and were not religious fanatics.
4. She had an arranged marriage, not a forced marriage, to a Somalian immigrant to Canada.

Ayaan is embraced by Barbara Kay and the wider Judeo-Christian Right for obvious reasons. They use her story to further their politico-religious battles, especially using the narrative of Islamic oppression of women. Lefty New Atheists have also embraced Ayaan as she is a great ally in Islam bashing. New Atheists are careful enough to repeat the only lie she has not admitted, the forced marriage. A 10/2007 article by Sam Harris and Salman Rushdie, > Hirsi Ali first fled to the Netherlands as a refugee from Somalia in 1992 after declining to submit to a forced marriage to a man she did not know. Once there, in hiding from her family, she began working as a cleaning lady.

A 05/2014 interview with Sam Harris

> In 1992, Ayaan was married off by her father to a distant cousin living in Canada. In order to escape this forced marriage, she fled to the Netherlands where she was granted asylum and then citizenship…

> Hirsi Ali: … I figured that if I could get this intake interview, then my father or the man he married me off to could come and say that they were looking for Ayaan Hirsi Magan, born November 13, 1969, and they would find me very easily. I wanted to prevent that, so I called myself Ayaan Hirsi Ali and changed my birth year to 1967. I was trying to cover my trail just enough that I wouldn't have the fear of being immediately found. I had never before lived in a system where there were any protections put in place for me.

> Harris: So you did this because you were afraid that someone would come to the Netherlands for the purpose of harming you?

> Hirsi Ali: Oh, yes. Absolutely. I was terrified that either my father or some of our clansmen—or the man whom I had been married off to—would come looking for me and find me. And they did come! My ex-husband was accompanied by three other men when he showed up at the asylum center where I was. But by then I had been in the country for something like four to six months, and even in that very, very short period, I came to understand that I had rights.

Ayaan insists that she escaped a forced marriage, and feared that her father and family may force her to go back to her husband, or honor-kill her otherwise. These claims fall flat in the face of the evidence presented in the documentary.

1. At 19:00, Ayaan is seen on a Dutch TV show claiming that her forced marriage even took place in her absence. I am from India, the land of arranged marriages, and I have never heard of a marriage in absentia. I have heard of something as odd as a marriage to a dog, and even that was not in absentia. They brought the dog to the wedding ceremony and managed to make it sit still.
   There is apparently such a thing as Proxy Marriage, but it is rare and still involves a substitute, real, person. It was historically engaged in by European Monarchs under extraordinary circumstances.

2. Ayaan's brother Mahad, aunt Faduma Osman, and bridegroom Osman Muse state that she was not only present at the wedding, but that she was happy throughout (~20:00). Ayaan claims all of them are lying.
3. After reaching the Netherlands, Ayaan is quite happy to appear on camera for a TV programme on the lives of Muslim immigrants. This is certainly not the behavior of someone who is fearful for her life.
4. Ayaan's first immigration-host in Netherlands, S Veerman, a fellow Somali, says Ayaan appeared just fine and never complained or showed fear of her family. Veerman says she has never heard of honor-killings in Somalia, and has only heard of them in some other countries like Turkey.
5. Ayaan's second immigration-host in Netherlands, a white Dutch woman W Scwoemaker, says Ayaan was in contact with her father and even received mail from him.
6. Ayaan's husband visited her in Netherlands after 6 months, and she admits to him that although he is a decent man she does not want to live with him. The husband accepts that and they part ways amicably enough.
7. Ayaan's husband feels that she used him as a passport to Europe. She would not have gotten to Germany as a first step without the Canadian visa and the ticket he got for her via marriage. Ayaan admits that she even offered to pay him back, but he refused to take the money.
8. In Nairobi, it is quite common for women to marry a foreigner to get a ticket to Europe and then get a divorce. Could Ayaan have done the same?

The evidence against Ayaan is substantial, and the evidence for her is just her testimony. If we apply the same scrutiny to her story as we did to the recent tales of damsels in distress, she would be seen as a false accuser that played the damsel in distress card and hyped up fear of men in her family.

Fast forward a few years. In 02/2010, at age 40, Ayaan was outed as having an affair with a wealthy, influential historian and married father of three Niall Ferguson aged 45. At the time, he was married to British Media executive Susan Douglas, aged 52. Ayaan got married to Niall in 09/2011 in Boston, with Henry Kissinger in attendance, just 3 months before giving birth to her first child. Wealthy men trading in an older wife for a younger wife, isn't that what "equity" feminists fight against? Luckily Ayaan does not live in a "patriarchal" country like India (or perhaps even Kenya), where mistresses have reason to be fearful, as they are sometimes beaten up by the current wife and her relatives.

This is the ultimate goal of feminism. Ramp up fear of men, trigger protective instinct in other men to clear women's path, and preferably mate with high status men.

In His Own Words: Deception and heartbreak

September 4, 2023 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

The following is a letter that was written by an Australian man for whom I, Andybob, have had the utmost respect throughout the three decades of our friendship. He is an intelligent and responsible man who found himself in a brief second marriage to an attractive, but, as he would soon discover, emotionally abusive, Russian woman, whom we shall call Natalia.

We should never underestimate the brutalizing effect that a woman like Natalia can have on a generous and trusting man like my friend, or how easily they can hide their dysfunction long enough to get that ring on their finger. Their entire relationship began and ended within one of the 11-month periods that I work outside Australia, so, I have never met Natalia.

The letter was intended for Natalia's mother and eighteen year-old daughter because my friend feared that they may not have been aware of Natalia's dysfunction. He quickly realized that this couldn't possibly be true, and decided not to send it to either of them. It is important to keep in mind that, due to the letter's intended recipients, this letter is the sanitized version of some of my friend's experiences while married to Natalia.

I became determined to find a suitable way to share his letter because, as he was reading it to me, it occurred to me that I was probably the only person who genuinely wanted to hear of his experience with an emotionally abusive spouse. As with so many men who have been in his situation, it was apparent that he felt very isolated from most of his family and friends. People, even loved ones, can become very uncomfortable and dismissive when men start talking about their pain – especially when they begin talking about how they have been emotionally hurt.

My friend just wanted to be heard, to share his experiences, and warn others that even strong, smart, ethical men can find themselves married to psychologically abusive women. Many assume that a man should know better, control 'his woman' and, above all, remain stoic and silent about his stress, loneliness and humiliation at the hands of their abusive wives and girlfriends. It is a deeply offensive and misandric way of marginalizing male pain until it is rendered all but invisible.

Here is the letter that my friend wanted me to share:

> To [Natalia's mother] and [Natalia's daughter],
>
> I would like to express how hurt, upset and devastated I am by the failure of Natalia's and my marriage. Over a seven-month period, Natalia did some very hurtful, cruel, unstable and deceptive things that a wife should not do. She had a strange man call claiming she met him on the Internet and then suggested it was an attempt to make me jealous.
> She often disconnected our phone without telling me and destroyed phone numbers of mine, both business clients and friends. She insisted on coming with me to tutoring appointments and that my clients contact her first. She had their number and my friends' but I never had any of her family or friends' numbers. She would contact my friends without telling me. Natalia hid in our locked bedroom and parked her car in another street to spy on me or surprise me.

I could not go out in public with Natalia because she would become angry and aggressive, claiming I was looking at others, and even when I was talking to her, she would storm off, claiming I was not looking at her. She often talked to other men and women in the street and this never bothered me, but, I was forbidden to do the same.

On one occasion, when I said hello to a mother when her small child nearly tripped me, she became violent and threatened to jump out of our moving car. Natalia would insist I swear on my children's or parents' lives I would not look at or talk to 'korva' or 'prostitute' as she called other women.

She began to go out at strange hours and I could not contact her. She would come home in the early hours of the morning and not explain where she had been. On one occasion, she returned home very late and told me she had parked her car in another street. The following morning, a taxi turned up and she insisted it was not for her, but the driver called her name. She claimed she had been too tired to drive home from her mother's, but I did not understand why she did not call or tell me.

When Natalia had a car accident, I was there to make sure she was safe. When I asked if we could quickly visit a client in the same street to apologize for missing my appointment, she became hysterical and aggressive and openly called her old boyfriend/boss in front of me. This was very hurtful. She often accepted financial help from him which was hurtful and disrespectful of me as her husband.

I looked after Natalia with all my ability. I cooked for her, cleaned for her and gave her everything I could. Over a six-month period, I gave her $10,000 to avoid a drink-driving charge, $25,000 for bank debts and credit cards, $15,000 for her mother's permanent residency, and $15,000 for her dance school business. I helped her pay many phone bills and registered her car and gave her financial help when she needed it. Now I am in financial difficulty.

When my father was seriously ill with cancer, I gave Natalia $500 to go to Melbourne to visit girlfriends and she did not contact me for several days. She eventually texted my sister to say she was in Newcastle for a beauty quest with accompanying photos, showing me and my family no respect or concern at this serious time.

Natalia is a physically attractive woman and enjoys attention from others to satisfy her ego and vanity. She is obstructively and aggressively jealous and unable to apply the same standards and expectations which she had of me to herself. She is extremely self-centred.

I feel Natalia has serious emotional and psychological issues that prevent her > from being able to maintain a healthy long-term relationship. This was supported by a counsellor we both attended. She is jealous and insecure and could never trust me or understand my loyalty and stability. Her aggressive and destructive behavior is hurtful and disturbing and I could not bear it any longer.

> I cannot help but feel Natalia used me for my financial resources. I loved her and am a good, honest man, but she drove us apart. I was not sure whether to write this letter, but Natalia contacted my family and friends and I want the truth to be known.
>
> I have no malice or ill-will towards Natalia, but am hurt and feel sorry that she will never be happy until she addresses her issues and faces the truth.
> P.S. Natalia told me she had been unfaithful during our marriage and this was the most hurtful action of all.

Thank you, Andybob, for caring enough to share your friend's experiences with Natalia.

Benenice and Arsinoe

Feminists would have us believe that women were systematically oppressed before they arrived to rescue women from The Patriarchy. Feminists often claim that the occasional woman was able to overcome this oppression and rise in to a leadership role despite all the men trying to put her down. History tells a different story. Female rulers were common historically.

Robert Brockway talked about the Ptolemaic dynasty of Egypt in his ICMI2021 presentation. Here is another fine video on the topic.

Note how many women are involved in this story and how often they went toe-to-toe with the men, and each other.

NB: We have it on good authority that Benenice would have pronounced her name something like Bear-en-eek-ay. The pronounciation used in the video is French.

My Lady Lump

September 9, 2023 | by Tim Patten | Link | Original Link

I was at home when I found the lump. I had just woken up to another bright and sunny morning in my beloved San Francisco, that peculiar city teeming with tech wizards, trailblazing culture warriors, and individuals of every race, color and creed, which God had created in Her own beautiful image.

The lump hurt. It was on my right breast, smaller than the size of a penny. I couldn't remember if it had been there the night before. For a while, I simply sat and stared at this unwelcome, frightening stranger. I prodded it with a finger and the pain rippled through my chest.

I groaned and swiveled my feet to the floor. The movement brought questions flooding into my head. Was the lump new? How long had it been there? And then, the big one: Was it cancer?

My heart raced as I thought of my father and grandmother. Both had succumbed to the hateful disease, and the memory of their deaths–long, painful affairs–made me shudder as if I was cold. I sat on the end of the mattress, hunched over, a twisted "Why me?" expression on my face, and a belly full of fear.

I had been here before. Last year. I had battled lymph node cancer through eight wretched months of intense treatments. I had won. But the experience left me with physical and emotional scars. And now this lump. Had the beast returned to wage war against my organs again?

I spent the next few days anxiously scrutinizing the lump, hoping against hope that it was only a temporary visitor. Perhaps it was a reaction to something I'd eaten or a strained muscle from too much exercise?

I'm retired now, and I couldn't stop thinking about the mystery bug inside me, creeping insidiously, targeting vulnerabilities and searching for a host to latch on to and overwhelm.

I became obsessed with the environment around me, frightening myself with imagined contaminants in the food I ate, the water I drank, and even the air I was breathing. The lump was driving me insane. It had to go. I had to get the poison out of me!

Eventually, I drew up the courage and went to my doctor, exactly one week after I had made that first, awful discovery. The lump had grown, or so I thought, and the pain had increased.

The speed with which my doctor reacted added to my sense of panic. I was immediately referred to the Breast Center for a mammogram. That's when I knew I was in trouble. My worst fears were confirmed: the big "C" had returned.

As soon as I arrived home, I rushed to my desk and switched on the PC, fingers trembling. Eight months of angst-filled chemo sessions, torturous radiation treatments and heart stopping doctor's exams flashed through my mind. I was overcome with feelings of utter helplessness. Would I have to go through all of that again? I could see the long, dark corridors of time; I felt the torment of unanswered questions. A familiar fear gripped my heart.

An Internet search revealed that between two and three thousand American men are diagnosed with breast cancer every year; around 500 die. I felt hot tears fill my eyes and my throat was as dry as sand. I didn't want this. I did not want return to a place I vowed never to visit again.

My hand shook as I dialed the number for the Breast Center.

"I'd like to schedule a mammogram." I said, struggling to maintain my composure.

"Pardon me?" She sounded almost amused.

I repeated my request and sat listening to the seconds of silence on the other end of the line.

"Have you seen a doctor?" She spoke slowly, as if she were addressing a child.

I took a deep breath. "Yes. Doctor Wilson sent a requisition."

"Huh." She thought it was a prank. I could hear it in her voice. I fought back the vague sensation of disgust. It's not her fault, I told myself. She probably gets many prank calls. I mean, men and breast cancer–come on!

She spoke again: "Name and D.O.B., please?"

I gave her the information and listened as her fingers tapped the keyboard. I sat quietly, my clothes moist with sweat. Her animosity seemed strange–maybe she was also having a difficult day. Ten minutes later, I was in a taxi, on the way to my first appointment.

We drove past the Painted Ladies, my eyes drifting over the familiar Victorian houses set against a backdrop of downtown skyscrapers. I hardly noticed the Golden Gate Bridge. It seemed like only seconds, but there I was, standing in the lobby of the Breast Center as the clerk wrote my name on the anonymous registration list. Suddenly my legs did not seem strong enough. I nearly collapsed into the chair, my chest gripped like it was in a vise.

There were five other women in the waiting area. A few were reading magazines. The rest looked down, staring at the generic, blue-gray carpet. I was the only man. My stomach lurched as I heard my name called.

"Ms. Patten?"

The women turned their heads towards me as I pull myself up and out of the chair. I headed towards the registrar's desk. She was in her late-thirties, I think, her hair tied back in a no-nonsense pony tail. Her eyes widened when she looked up to greet me.

"Oh! I'm sorry…."

I smiled her apologies away and waited while she recorded my details. Slowly, it dawned on me that I was embarrassed to be there. I was a man–a man with suspected breast cancer. The irony would be hilarious if such a prognosis wasn't so deadly. My face felt hot and I shifted my weight from foot to foot, a nervous schoolboy waiting to be scolded.

I've had my fair share of such visits. I've always felt comfortable and safe in clinics, hospitals, even emergency rooms. But this place seemed cold; I didn't feel like I should even be there. The clerk handed me a wristband and asked for my signature.

"Take the elevator to the second floor," she said, smiling and pointing down the hall. I fought the urge to simply turn and leave, scurrying away amid feelings of dread and embarrassment.

The elevator doors opened and I was greeted by two nurses lodged behind a needlessly imposing reception counter. I nodded "hello" and showed them my wristband. The one with 'Beth' written on her name tag pointed to a waiting area off to my right.

"Have a seat and we'll call you shortly," she said. Her voice was functional and seemingly devoid of empathy. I found a chair and sat among about a dozen women. Almost instantly, the one nearest to me moved her purse away and gripped it tightly against her belly. The others stared, but turned away when my eyes met theirs.

I remembered something that had happened a while back. One morning, my friend Jamal–tall and black, an ex-Broadway dancer–and I were on our way to an AA meeting. We had turned a corner and were walking side-by-side down Market Street when a woman glanced at my friend, startled, and used both her arms to brace her purse against her body. Jamal smiled, but I could see the disappointment in his eyes.

Now, in a room full of white women, I felt just like my friend. I was an interloper here; they did not trust me. Did they really think that I was going to steal their purses? I nearly laughed out loud at the ridiculousness of that thought.

A nurse approached. "Ms. Johnson," she called.

The dark-haired woman across from me slowly closed her magazine and stood up. I saw sideways glances in my direction. I crossed my legs and acted like I wasn't bothered, but I only wanted to crawl somewhere and hide. I buried my face in the pages of Self, engrossed in a two-page spread of the world's best-dressed women, nicely posed on a bright red carpet.

Soon, I catch myself looking around, staring at the faces of those who were around me. I was still getting the curious glances and I couldn't help but think that I was not welcome here. I was a trespasser, a male in a female place.

I noticed that none of the nurses wore make-up. They all looked freshly scrubbed, with tossed hair and clothes that hung loosely. It struck me that I was in a women-only zone; there was no pressure to be pretty. That's totally cool, I thought, because after all, isn't that exactly what we do? Straight guys don't spiff themselves up for others like them, so why should these women?

I realized then that I was being stared at by a girl with tattoos and a boy's crew cut. She had a badly disguised sneer and eyes full of suspicion. I felt uncomfortable and looked away. Why do they doubt my intentions, or even my character? Suddenly I felt like a pervert, hanging around for a glimpse of a boob. WTF, I thought, I don't even date women. Glimpsing a naked breast was the last thing on my mind. I had become a knuckle-dragging caveman, a predator, who had invaded their space. I wanted to leave.

A fortyish woman, dressed in scrubs, appeared at the reception desk and leaned down to Beth. I could hear them whispering and then they both laughed quietly to themselves. The nurse looked up and called my name.

“Tim Patten?”

She led me to an examination room where it soon becomes obvious that the procedure has not been designed with men in mind. I stood, stripped to the waist with perspiration oozing from my pores, as the nurse tried to squeeze me toward the machine. It was awkward. The little breasts I have didn’t quite fit. I couldn’t say who was more embarrassed, the nurse or me.

When it was over, I returned to my chair in the waiting area and sat quietly, my heart beating crazily. A woman with a small child emerged from the elevator and she was greeted with smiles. I assumed she was a staff member, coming in on her day off to show off her boy.

“Hi!”

“Good to see you and the little one!”

“Great to see you!”

The welcome committee was boisterous and enthusiastic, the girly-greetings sickly sweet. It brought back memories of empty high school cheerleader chit-chat–the sweet young girls who turned into backstabbing witches the moment one left their midst.

And then suddenly, I was that skinny little kid in the junior high lunchroom, surrounded by designer-clad girls with rich dads from the best neighborhoods. They were discussing boys, as usual, and competing for the attention of the captain of the football team.

“Oh! He’s cute!”

“Handsome!”

“So goofy!”

I despised it when I was young and hated it now. I had escaped from that painful reality, but now it was if I had been thrown right back in. I sank into my seat. I remembered that this was a woman’s world, and tried to be as inconspicuous as I could.

But then, something inside of me began to rebel. I sat up straight, stretched out my legs and spread them wide. Yeah, I thought with a smile, “Look at me. I’m a man airing his balls. Why don’t you arrest me like they do on some big city subways, because women’s groups had convinced lawmakers that it was illegal for a man to move his legs more than x inches apart?

The hens down the hall were still pecking when I grabbed another magazine to block them out. It was Pregnancy Magazine, which is apparently the authority on wombs and birthing. I sighed and uttered the “F” word under my breath. It was a uterus/breast celebration of things that made my stomach twist.

Out of nowhere, I had the urgent need to pee.

“Through the exit doors and on the right,” Beth instructed.

I walked down the corridor past the exit to the men’s room. It looked as if it had been put outside the clinic as an afterthought. The entire clinic, I realized as I zipped back up and washed my hands, was a vulva cave. I simply couldn’t wait to get the hell out of that thoroughly feminized space.

“Your ultrasound is this way,” she said curtly when I returned. “Follow me, please.”

She led me to a room where I laid down on a bed and waited for another woman to perform the test.

“The doctor will be in soon to explain your results,” she told me.

I had nothing to say. Fifteen minutes later, the doctor breezed in.

“Good news: you’re negative,” she said.

My head started to spin and I exhaled deeply. I was shaking while I waited outside for a taxi. I knew the emotional shock would hit me as soon as I got home. I climbed into the back of the cab as if it was a getaway car and I had just robbed a bank.

As we drove through the city, my still-reeling mind thought about all those liberal moms, obsessed with raising children without gender labels. The so-called ‘forward thinking’ females who desperately avoid the binary of blue for boys and pink for girls like it is some kind of medieval dogma that is too silly to comprehend.

They probably would not even be aware, let alone acknowledge, of what I went through, the deep and painful humiliation I experienced as a male inside the Breast Center. I had been trapped inside a blatantly sexist environment for hours on end, but because I was a man, I simply had to live with it. Had women’s idea of gender equality really devolved into female superiority and hostility toward men? It seemed so.

When I opened my door, I was completely exhausted. I fell into bed and slept for sixteen hours straight. My last thought as I drifted into blessed, healing sleep was that mammograms for men, well, they’re truly fked up.

Sex and attachment

Does the image above catch your attention?

Of course it does, because male motivation is tied to sexual reproduction and men are motivated primarily by urges to have sex with females, right?

Wrong.

It's more complex than that.

As far back as 1941 Scottish psychiatrist Ronald Fairbairn found that the desire for attachment in human beings, in terms of the overall psychobiological economy, is a more important necessity than the desire for sexual pleasure and reproduction.

You read it right: attachment is more important than sex.

This scientific finding, not controversial in the field of psychology, presents something of a heretical view to some in the Men's Rights Movement who, by contrast, seem to have come in recent years to believe that males are chasing sexual reproduction only — which, oddly enough, seems similar to the stereotype of the "all men want is sex" misandrist paradigm we've all come to find so annoying.

Fairbairn's proposition is now many decades old, but his findings heralded a Copernican revolution within the world of scientific research that would culminate in today's attachment sciences; it moved the discussion beyond the reductionist sexual theories of Darwin and Freud and into new areas—more complex, more subtle, more nuanced, and ultimately more human.

The question attachment scientists explored is: why do couples continue to stay with each other years after producing offspring, and indeed sometimes for decades after all sexual activity has ceased in relationships? The answer is because human beings are pair bonders who get more out of attachment than they do out of fucking.

Since Fairbairn, studies have confirmed that humans possess an array of distinct motivational systems each in communication with the surrounding environment. Of those systems two are singled out as particularly powerful in motivating humans to form relationships – the sexual urge (eros), and -separately- the urge to attach. Of these, attachment is quite simply the most important to the continued survival of the individual. This cannot be overstated: attachment is the more important to individual survival.

As studies reveal, an absence of close and consistent human attachment causes children to literally wither and die, refusing to thrive even when being provided with clothing, food and an adequate number of toys. Children need reliable and consistent relationships in order to thrive. Likewise adults literally sicken both physically and mentally, and often commit suicide to escape feelings of isolation and loneliness, especially after a relationship separation.

A lack of sexual contact on the contrary is not as life threatening; you will never see someone die simply because they didn't get to fuck with the opposite sex and reproduce. I would think that seals the case about what is really important to both men and women. Survival of the species depends on sex; survival of the individual depends on the vital bonds of attachment.

What does all this mean to men?

Well, it means that we need to evaluate separately our attachment needs and our sexual needs, and avoid the common mistake of conflating them; especially if that conflation sees us rejecting both when in fact it may be only one of these causing most of our relationship angst. It may turn out that attachment and sex both need to be rejected in our gynocentric zeitgeist because both are sources of entrapment, however that cannot be determined until we consider each factor separately and thoroughly.

In our psychobiological economy, various desires come into conflict with one another, each jostling for momentary supremacy where one imperative will usurp the claims of another. That game has reached a problematical impasse during the last 800 years because, during that (historically relatively short) time span, human culture has thrown the weight of its patronage into developing, intensifying and enforcing sexual gamesmanship to the degree that our sexual compulsions appear pumped up on steroids and taken to extremes never before seen in the human animal (myths about widespread Roman orgies notwithstanding).

If we lived back in Ancient Greece, Rome or anywhere else we would view sex as little more than a bodily function akin to eating, shitting and sleeping – a basic bodily function without the hype. After the Middle Ages however it developed into a commodity to pimp and trade, and the new cult of sexualized romance that arose resulted in a frustration of our basic need for attachment – a frustration aided and abetted by social institutions placing sexual manipulation at the centre of human interactions.

During these fairly recent centuries of increased hypergamy and sexual focus, our drive to pair-bond continues to shout its demands even while being neglected. Observe for example the not-infrequent feelings of disillusionment and loneliness of serial partner upgraders (hypergamy) or of promiscuous gamers, or consider a beautiful young woman living in her mansion with an aged but wealthy husband to whom she has little or no emotional attachment; even if she is getting sex on the side her loneliness can eat away at her sense of contentment. These examples reveal an urgency surrounding attachment when it is neglected for the sake of secondary sexual or power gains.

Like men, women desire secure attachment beyond whatever sexual advantages they can and do exploit. However the hypergamous compulsion tends to get in the way and frustrate their powerful need to pair-bond. From the Middle Ages all the way to today we read of men and women bitterly disillusioned by the interference of hypergamy in the desire to form stable pair-bonds. Read for instance the bitter, antifeminist complaints of 12th century Andreas Capellanus or those of 14th century Christine de Pizan, or the disillusionment and ultimate rejection of the benefits of hypergamy in later works like Madam Bovary. These authors knew full well that sexualized romantic love had upset the balance of attachment security for both men and women alike.

The question we must ask ourselves is this: can our human need for attachment be indulged without men and women succumbing to the destructive manipulations of the modern sex code? As we stand atop the mountain of bachelor freedoms, rightly rejecting gynocentric women and culture as bastions of exploitation, have we intellectually thrown out the attachment baby with the exploitation bathwater?

Sexual games need not get in the way of healthy attachment, so why should we live without relationships? Well no one ever said we had to, but in recent years I've sensed a trend both within and without the men's activism community (which I've long been part of) that foregoing "relationships" is a necessary part of the deal.

This does not seem a prudent attitude to be cultivating, especially for young men who may now be reading advice about rejecting relations with women and making extreme decisions about their lives; refusing to marry, cohabit, or procreate does not require a cutting off from human society. Even if we don't suicide from loneliness (as so many men do) we need to question if the absence of an intimate relationship in our lives can leave us limping, or somehow unfulfilled. Some will say no, and some of these naysayers may well be what are known as 'avoidant attachers.' Of those who would say yes, some might recommend we fill our intimacy void with friendships, which is I think a very good starting point. But this leads to a further question of whether there is an adequate formulation of friendship that can satisfy our needs in a modern context – a relationship that doesn't rely on the usual corruption at the core of sexualized romantic love.

These questions lead to an exploration of adult human attachment, and modern studies on the subject are abundant from psychological, biological and behavioural points of view. For those interested in following this subject further the Wikipedia entry on Attachment in Adults would be a good place to start, and to branch out from there. Of particular interest is the existence of four basic attachment styles in human beings, indicating that there must also be four main ways of conducting relationships:

> secure attachment (64% of the population) > anxious–preoccupied attachment (17% of the population) > fearful–avoidant attachment (12% of the population) > dismissive–avoidant attachment (7% of the population)

Only one of these styles (dismissive avoidant) involves a lack of desire for emotionally close relationships (relationships with minimal emotional intimacy may be tolerable to them), while the other three involve a desire to form emotionally intimate attachments. These are biologically-based traits appearing in each man before he considers rejecting intimacy with women, and they help to account for the behavioral and ideological variability we see among men – for the most part we are working creatively with what's already in our make up rather than changing our core attachment style.

The four attachment styles and their implications for men deserve a follow up article. While some men's rights advocates claim men do not need attachment at all, evidence is not in their favour. Thus, for most of us, constructing new ways to form secure relationships with our fellow humans in a rich and rewarding way is an important long-term question, even if we cannot pretend to have all the answers now; we start by knowing what we don't want: relationships of enslavement and entrapment to the opposite sex (or anyone else for that matter) in an environment that makes healthy attachment difficult. But how do we forge a more positive model for human relationships and attachment for ourselves?

We started this essay with an important question: are sex and attachment two relatively different motivations? The answer is a resounding yes! Yes, despite all the pop culture bombardment of sex, sex, sex, the sexual shaming of men, and all the rest, the answer is yes: sex and attachment are not the same. People can live their lives avoiding sexual games but they will not end their lives happily unless they meet their attachment requirements. And while this journey will be different for each man, we must not flinch from seeing the problem for what it is: not "overcoming our urge to procreate," but rather, how to be healthy human beings able to recognize and fulfill our natural need for human intimacy.

The trouble with testosterone: Will boys just be boys?

September 11, 2023 | by Dr. Robert Sapolsky | Link | Original Link

Face it, we all do it. We all believe certain stereotypes about certain minorities. The stereotypes are typically pejorative and usually false. But every now and then, they are true. I write apologetically as a member of a minority about which the stereotypes are indeed true. I am male. We males account for less than 50 percent of the population, yet we generate a disproportionate percentage of the violence. Whether it is something as primal as having an ax fight in an Amazonian clearing or as detached as using a computer-guided aircraft to strafe a village, something as condemned as assaulting a cripple or as glorified as killing someone wearing the wrong uniform, if it is violent, males excel at it.

Why should that be? We all think we know the answer. A dozen millennia ago or so, an adventurous soul managed to lop off a surly bull's testicles and thus invented behavioral endocrinology. It is unclear from the historical records whether this individual received either a grant or tenure as a result of the experiment, but it certainly generated an influential finding–something or other comes out of the testes that helps to make males such aggressive pains in the ass.

That something or other is testosterone.[1] The hormone binds to specialized receptors in muscles and causes those cells to enlarge. It binds to similar receptors in laryngeal cells and gives rise to operatic basses. It causes other secondary sexual characteristics, makes for relatively unhealthy blood vessels, alters biochemical events in the liver too dizzying to even contemplate, has a profound impact, no doubt, on the workings of cells in big toes. And it seeps into the brain, where it binds to those same "androgen" receptors and influences behavior in a way highly relevant to understanding aggression.

What evidence links testosterone with aggression? Some pretty obvious stuff. Males tend to have higher testosterone levels in their circulation than do females (one wild exception will be discussed later) and tend to be more aggressive. Times of life when males are swimming in testosterone (for example, after reaching puberty) correspond to when aggression peaks. Among numerous species, testes are mothballed most of the year, kicking into action and pouring out testosterone only during a very circumscribed mating season- precisely the time when male aggression soars.

Impressive, but these are only correlative data, testosterone repeatedly being on the scene with no alibi when some aggression has occurred. The proof comes with the knife, the performance of what is euphemistically known as a “subtraction” experiment. Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet. Reinstate normal testosterone levels afterward with injections of synthetic testosterone, and aggression returns.

To an endocrinologist, the subtraction and replacement paradigm represents pretty damning proof: this hormone is involved. “Normal testosterone levels appear to be a prerequisite for normative levels of aggressive behavior” is the sort of catchy, hummable phrase that the textbooks would use. That probably explains why you shouldn’t mess with a bull moose during rutting season. But that’s not why a lot of people want to understand this sliver of science. Does the action of this hormone tell us anything about individual differences in levels of aggression, anything about why some males, some human males, are exceptionally violent? Among an array of males –human or otherwise- are the highest testosterone levels found in the most aggressive individuals?

Generate some extreme differences and that is precisely what you see. Castrate some of the well-paid study subjects, inject others with enough testosterone to quadruple the normal human levels, and the high-testosterone males are overwhelmingly likely to be the more aggressive ones. However, that doesn’t tell us much about the real world. Now do something more subtle by studying the normative variability in testosterone-–in other words, don’t manipulate anything, just see what everyone’s natural levels are like–and high levels of testosterone and high levels of aggression still tend to go together. This would seem to seal the case-–interindividual differences in levels of aggression among normal individuals are probably driven by differences in levels of testosterone. But this turns out to be wrong.

Okay, suppose you note a correlation between levels of aggression and levels of testosterone among these normal males. This could be because (a) testosterone elevates aggression; (b) aggression elevates testosterone secretion; (c) neither causes the other. There’s a huge bias to assume option a, while b is the answer! Study after study has shown that when you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive. The subsequent behavioral differences drive the hormonal changes, rather than the other way around.

> When you examine testosterone levels when males are first placed together in a social group, testosterone levels predict nothing about who is going to be aggressive.

Because of a strong bias among certain scientists, it has taken forever to convince them of this point. Behavioral endocrinologists study what behavior and hormones have to do with each other. How do you study behavior? You get yourself a notebook and a stopwatch and a pair of binoculars. How do you measure the hormones? You need a gazillion-dollar machine, you muck around with radiation and chemicals, wear a lab coat, maybe even goggles- the whole nine yards. Which toys would you rather get for Christmas? Which facet of science are you going to believe in more? Because the endocrine aspects of the business are more high-tech, more reductive, there is a bias to think that it is somehow more scientific, more powerful. This is a classic case of what is often called physics envy, the disease among scientists where the behavioral biologists fear their discipline lacks the rigor of physiology, the physiologists wish for the techniques of the biochemists, the biochemists covet the clarity of the answers revealed by molecular biologists, all the way down until you get to the physicists, who confer only with God. Hormones seem to many to be more real, more substantive, than the ephemera of behavior, so when a correlation occurs, it must be because hormones regulate behavior, not the other way around.

As I said, it takes a lot of work to cure people of that physics envy, and to see that interindividual differences in testosterone levels don't predict subsequent differences in aggressive behavior among individuals. Similarly, fluctuations in testosterone levels within one individual over time do not predict subsequent changes in the levels of aggression in that one individual – get a hiccup in testosterone secretion one afternoon and that's not when the guy goes postal.

Look at our confusing state: normal levels of testosterone are a prerequisite for normal levels of aggression, yet changing the amount of testosterone in someone's bloodstream within the normal range doesn't alter his subsequent levels of aggressive behavior. This is where, like clockwork, the students suddenly start coming to office hours in a panic, asking whether they missed something in their lecture notes.

Yes, its going to be on the final exam, and its one of the more subtle points in endocrinology- what is referred to as a hormone having a "permissive effect". Remove someone's testes and, as noted, the frequency of aggressive behavior is likely to plummet. Reinstate precastration levels of testosterone by injecting that hormone, and precastration levels of aggression typically return. Fair enough. Now this time, castrate an individual and restore testosterone levels to only 20 percent of normal and … amazingly, normal precastration levels of aggression come back. Castrate and now generate twice the testosterone levels from before castration- and the same level of aggressive behavior returns. You need some testosterone around for normal aggressive behavior – zero levels after castration, and down it usually goes; quadruple it (the sort of range generated in weight lifters abusing anabolic steroids), and aggression typically increases. But anywhere from roughly 20 percent of normal to twice normal and it's all the same; the brain can't distinguish among this wide range of basically normal values.

We seem to have figured out a couple of things by now. First, knowing the differences in the levels of testosterone in the circulation of a bunch of males will not help you much in figuring out who is going to be aggressive. Second, the subtraction and reinstatement data seem to indicate that, nevertheless, in a broad sort of way, testosterone causes aggressive behavior. But that turns out not to be true either, and the implications of this are lost on most people the first thirty times you tell them about it. Which is why you'd better tell them about it thirty-one times, because it is the most important point of this piece.
