Round up some male monkeys. Put them in a group together, and give them plenty of time to sort out where they stand with each other- affiliative friendships, grudges, and dislikes. Give them enough time to form a dominance hierarchy, a linear ranking system of numbers 1 through 5. This is the hierarchical sort of system where number 3 monkey, for example, can pass his day throwing around his weight with numbers 4 and 5, ripping off their monkey chow, forcing them to relinquish the best spots to sit in, but, at the same time, remembering to deal with numbers 1 and 2 with shit-eating obsequiousness.

Hierarchy in place, it's time to do your experiment. Take that third ranking monkey and give him some testosterone. None of this within-the-normal-range stuff. Inject a ton of it into him, way higher than what you normally see in a rhesus monkey; give him enough testosterone to grow antlers and a beard on every neuron in his brain. And, no surprise, when you then check the behavioral data, it turns out that he will probably be participating in more aggressive interactions than before.

So even though small fluctuations in the levels of the hormone don't seem to matter much, testosterone still causes aggression. But that would be a wrong conclusion. Check out number 3 more closely. Is he now raining aggressive terror on any and all in the group, frothing in an androgenic glaze of indiscriminate violence? Not at all. He's still judiciously kowtowing to numbers 1 and 2, but has simply become a total bastard to numbers 4 and 5. This is critical: testosterone isn't causing aggression, it's exaggerating the aggression that's already there.

Another example just to show we're serious. There's a part of your brain that probably has lots to do with aggression, a region called the amygdala.[2] Sitting right near it is the Grand Central Station of emotion-related activity in your brain, the hypothalamus. The amygdala communicates with the hypothalamus by way of a cable of neuronal connections called stria terminalis. No more jargon, I promise. The amygdala has its influence on aggression via that pathway, with bursts of electrical excitation called action potentials that ripple down the stria terminalis, putting the hypothalamus in a pissy mood.

Once again, do your hormonal intervention; flood the area with testosterone. You can do that by injecting the hormone into the bloodstream, where it eventually makes its way to this part of the brain. Or you can be elegant and surgically microinject the stuff directly into this brain region. Six of one, half a dozen of the other. The key thing is what doesn't happen next. Does testosterone now cause there to be action potentials surging down the stria terminalis? Does it turn on that pathway? Not at all! If and only if the amygdala is already sending an aggression-provoking volley of action potentials down the stria terminalis, testosterone increases the rate of such action potentials by shortening the resting time between them. It’s not turning on the pathway, it’s increasing the volume of signaling if it is already turned on. It’s not causing aggression, it’s exaggerating the preexisting pattern of it, exaggerating the response to environmental triggers of aggression.

This transcends issues of testosterone and aggression. In every generation, it is the duty of behavioral biologists to try to teach this critical point, one that seems a maddening cliché once you get it. You take that hoary old dichotomy between nature and nurture , between biological influences and environmental influences, between intrinsic factors and extrinsic ones, and, the vast majority of the time, regardless of which behavior you are thinking about and what underlying biology you are studying, the dichotomy is a sham. No biology. No environment. Just the interaction between the two.

Do you want to know how important environment and experience are in understanding testosterone and aggression? Look back at how the effects of castration were discussed earlier. There were statements like “Remove the source of testosterone in species after species and levels of aggression typically plummet.” Not “Remove the source … and aggression always goes to zero.” On average it declines, but rarely to zero, and not at all in some individuals. And the more social experience an individual had being aggressive prior to castration, the more likely that behavior persists sans cojones. Social conditioning can more than make up for the hormone.

Another example, one from one of the stranger corners of the animal kingdom: If you want your assumptions about the nature of boy beasts and girl beasts challenged, check out the spotted hyena. These animals are fast becoming the darlings of endocrinologists, sociobiologists, gynecologists, and tabloid writers. Why? Because they have a wild sex-reversal system- females are more muscular and more aggressive than males and are socially dominant over them, rare traits in the mammalian world. And get this: females secrete more of certain testosterone-related hormones than males do, producing the muscles, the aggression (and, as a reason for much of the gawking interest in these animals, wildly masculinized private parts that make it supremely difficult to tell the sex of the hyena). So this appears to be a strong vote for the causative powers of high androgen levels in aggression and social dominance. But that’s not the whole answer. High up in the hills above the University of California at Berkley is the world’s largest colony of spotted hyenas, massive bone-crunching beasts who fight with each other for the chance to have their ears scratched by Laurence Frank, the zoologist who brought them over as infants from Kenya. Various scientists are studying their sex-reversal system. The female hyenas are bigger and more muscular than the males and have the same weirdo genitals ands elevated androgen levels that their female cousins do back in the savannah. Everything is in place except … the social system is completely different from that in the wild. Despite being stoked on androgens, there is a very significant delay in the time it takes for the females to begin socially dominating the males- they’re growing up without the established social system to learn from.

When people first grasp the extent to which biology has something to do with behavior, even subtle, complex, human behavior, there is often an initial evangelical enthusiasm of the convert, a massive placing of faith in the biological components of the story. And this enthusiasm is typically of a fairly reductive type–because of physics envy, because reductionism is so impressive, because it would be so nice if there were a single gene or hormone or neurotransmitter or part of the brain that was it, the cause, the explanation of everything. And the trouble with testosterone is that people tend to think this way in an arena that really matters.

This is no mere academic concern. We are a fine species with some potential. Yet we are racked with sickening amounts of violence. Unless we are hermits, we feel the threat of it, often as a daily shadow. And regardless of where we hide, should our leaders push the button, we will all be lost in a final global violence. But as we try to understand and wrestle with this feature of our sociality, it is critical to remember the limits of biology. Testosterone is never going to tell us much about the suburban teenager who, in his after-school chess club, has developed a particularly aggressive style with his bishops. And it certainly isn't going to tell us much about the teenager in some inner—city hellhole who has taken to mugging people. "Testosterone equals aggression" is inadequate for those who would offer a simple excuse: Boys will be boys and certain things in nature are inevitable. Violence is more complex than a single hormone. This is endocrinology for the bleeding heart liberal – our behavioral biology is usually meaningless outside the context of social factors and environment in which is occurs.

Notes:

[1] Testosterone is one of a family of related hormones, collectively known as "androgens" or "anabolic steroids." They all are secreted by the testes or are the result of a modification of testosterone, they all have similar chemical structure, and they all do roughly similar things. Nonetheless, androgen mavens spend entire careers studying the important differences in the actions of different androgens. I am going to throw that subtlety to the wind and, for the sake of simplification that will horrify many, will refer throughout to all of these related hormones as "testosterone."

[2] And no one has shown that differences in the size or shape of the amygdala, or differences in the numbers of neurons in it, can begin to predict differences in normal levels of aggression. Same punch line as with testosterone.

Further reading:

For a good general review of the subject, see E. Monaghan and S. Glickman, "Hormones and Aggressive Behavior," in J. Becker, M. Breedlove, and D. Crews, eds., Behavioral Endocrinology (Cambridge, Mass.: MIT Press, 1992), 261. This also has an overview of the hyena social system, as Glickman heads the study of the Berkley hyenas. For technical papers on the acquisition of the female dominance in hyenas, see S. Jenks, M. Weldele, L. Frank, and S. Glickman, "Acquisition of Matrilineal Rank in Captive Spotted Hyenas: Emergence of a National Social System in Peer-Reared Animals and Their Offspring," Animal Behavior 50 (1995): 893; and L. Frank, S. Glickman, and C. Zabel, "Ontogeny of Female Dominance in the Spotted Hyena: Perspectives from Nature and Captivity," in P.

Jewell and G. Maloiy, eds., “The Biology of Large African Mammals in Their Environment,” Symposium of the Zoological Society of London 61 (1989): 127.

I have emphasized that while testosterone levels in the normal range do not have much to do with aggression, a massive elevation of exposure, as would be seen in anabolic steroid abusers, does usually increase aggression. For a recent study in which even elevating into that range (approximately five times normal level) still had no effect on mood or behavior, see S. Bhasin, T. Storer, N. Berman, and colleagues, “The Effects of Supra-physiologic Doses of Testosterone on Muscle Size and Strength in Normal Men,” New England Journal of Medicine 335 (1996): 127.

The study showing that raising testosterone levels in the middle-ranking monkey exaggerates preexisting patterns of aggression can be found in A. Dixon and J. Herbert, “Testosterone, Aggressive Behavior and Dominance Rank in Captive Adult Male Talapoin Monkeys (Miopithecus talapoin), ” Physiology and Behavior 18 (1977): 539. For the demonstration that testosterone shortens the resting period between action potentials in neurons, see K. Kendrick and R. Drewett, “Testosterone Reduces Refractory Period of Stria Terminalis Neurons in the Rat Brain,” Science 204 (1979): 877.

This article was originally published in ‘The Trouble With testosterone, And Other Essays on The Human Predicament’ by Robert M. Sapolsky, and made available for AVfM by permission of the author. –Eds

William Of Aquitaine: The First Simp

September 13, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

If you've been an attentive follower of my work, particularly the collaborative efforts with Peter Wright, you know that we've explored the historical roots of gynocentrism and, just as importantly, the origins of the romantic model of pair bonding and marriage. We've written about Queen Eleanor of Aquitaine and her daughter Marie, who instituted a sex-relation model based on men idealizing women and being shamed into serving them. That model, once referred to as courtly love, was spread with the help of commissioned troubadours, reinforced with their love stories, romantic songs, and poetry. And as we can plainly see in modern times, electronic media continues that tradition in full force on a worldwide platform. Now operating under the heading of romantic love, we can describe it with a more modern and accurate turn of phrase; Romantic love is the practice of males simping to narcissistic women.

Eleanor and her daughter were the first to popularize this practice, however the original impetus came from Eleanor's grandfather William IX Duke of Aquitaine (l. 1071-1127 CE), who is considered the world's first troubadour – a man who wrote effusive, gushing poetry, expressing love for women in worshipful stanzas. He took delight in performing music and song, serenading women, and feeding their narcissistic hunger. William's gynocentrism was so exaggerated, in fact, that he had a picture of his naked mistress painted on his shield, claiming that he was glad to bear her image in battle as she had borne him in bed.

So, it is clear. William IX was patient zero in the romantic chivalry virus that has since infected the world. We find no historical example of this kind unbridled gynocentrism in a man of prominence that predates him. All of this is understood in academic circles, but little known outside of them. William M. Reddy, Professor of History and Cultural Anthropology at Duke University, describes William's role in the tradition as follows:

> The genre of the troubadour song, and with it the basic elements of courtly love, seems to have arisen full-blown in his mind, ready to be imitated and elaborated by his many enthusiastic followers.
>
> The lyrics of ten songs by William IX have survived. They form a curious series. Four are recognizably troubadour love songs, offering, in Reto Bezzola's words, "an entirely new conception of woman and of love, new not only for the count of Poitou, but for the entire world."[1]

While understandable that women would have embraced such a model in order to obtain material and narcissistic gratifications from men, it's more perplexing that a powerful man did so when he could have had any woman at any time, by simply wiggling his finger. How strange that his chosen path instilled a brand of pathetic sycophancy in contemporary and future men, effectively rendering him a traitor to his own sex.

And indeed, do we not see this on full display in modern times? How many powerful men with high sexual market value have you seen engaging in sappy public fawning over women, gratuitously feeding their egos as a kind of twisted performance art?

And how many men lend silent complicity to this game, following William's traitorous ways? Recently, there was a televised debate of Republican presidential hopefuls. Nikki Haley, the only woman on the stage alongside six very powerful, influential men, interrupted the entire field at one point and blurted out, "If you want something said, ask a man. If you want something done, ask a woman." The remark, a reference to her book of the same title, was met with applause by the audience and sheepish silence by the allegedly powerful men on stage. Now, even the most cursory look at modern civilization, where literally nothing is built or maintained by women, informs you that what Haley said is complete bullshit. That, however, didn't motivate a single man onstage to say a single corrective word. It was a telling microcosm of what society has become under the romantic model, and proof that William the Simp's infectious ideas took root and flourished.

The court of William IX at Poitou, considered the center of culture at that time, was filled with song, a culture of courtly love, and affluence. Aquitaine was the richest duchy in the south of France.[2] Eleanor was raised in this court where she would watch the spectacle of courtly love and its requisite worship of women play out every day of her childhood. Apparently, Eleanor warmed very quickly to the sight of obsequious men shamelessly competing for the approval of women. She would later elaborate and bring that vision to the entire world when she became Queen of both France and England.

Has there ever a greater traitor to the collective male sex than William? He's brought simping to the world and set the bar high on its practice. His little fetish has now spread to become more popular than the gospel of Jesus. More romantic love novels are sold each year than are copies of the Bible. In fact, just one Texan author alone sold 3 million more copies of her romance novel in 2022 than copies of the Bible in the same year. Let that sink in.[3]

William's story is instructive for how badly men can screw up, and that brings us to similar behaviours we see in men in the here and now. Should we really blame women for the rise of romantic chivalry? Is female narcissism the real culprit? Perhaps feminism? Certainly there's cause to point at those things, though diligence compels us to also look askance at men who swallowed the romantic narrative with little to no resistance. Fathers, husbands, male lovers all share in the blame.

And of course, blaming the source only gets you so far. Ultimately, we settled on the idea that William the Simp is the red pill man's greatest object lesson. In a way he's our best friend. The guy you learn what not to do from. After all, to William he was striking out into new territory: women had never been so elevated, so overblown before in any of recorded history. He was a powerful guy with a masochistic submission fantasy. Women jumped on that and rode it like a sybian sex aid.

But that's the good part. If you're a red pill guy here for your dose of content, you are also striking out into new territory. You're doing something unheard of to most men until recent times. The path you've chosen won't please women, and it won't sell near as well as kissing women's asses, but there's a major silver lining to that. The past thousand years of simping stops with you.

References:

[1] The Making of Romantic Love: Longing and Sexuality in Europe, South Asia, and Japan, 900-1200 CE.

[2] Eleanor of Aquitaine, in New World Encyclopedia.
[3] Author Colleen Hoover went from tending cows to writing bestsellers.

See also: Chasing The Dragon, by Paul Elam & Peter Wright

In praise of dead white men

September 14, 2023 | by Philip Carl Salzman | Link | Original Link

---

Every age has its obsessions. Religious differences among Christians led to brutal and bloody religious wars a few centuries ago. National conflicts among European powers led to worldwide wars in the 19th and 20th centuries. In the West, our 21st century obsession is identity politics and its conflict between genders, races, sexualities, ethnicities, economic classes, and religions.

Advocates of identity politics divide the world into oppressors and victims: male oppressors and female victims; white oppressors and people of colour victims; heterosexual oppressors and gay, etc. victims; Euro, Asian, Caribbean, and other Canadian oppressors and First Nations victims; prosperous oppressors and impoverished victims; Christian and Jewish oppressors and Muslim victims. Those aware and supportive of victims are considered "woke" and righteous.

Representatives of victim groups demand recognition and celebration. Bruised collective egos must be stroked, as a matter of "social justice." One strategy of enhancing the presence, importance, and value of victim categories is a determined effort to gain or grant greater representation in paintings, movies, statues, plaques, awards, advertisements, appointments, and assignments, through diversity requirements. A complementary strategy is to lobby for or comply with removal of representations of members of oppressor categories: hide their portraits, tear down their statues, remove their names, do not assign their works, do not cite them. This strategy applied above all to "dead white men," now deemed to be evil oppressors throughout history.

North American, and Antipodean university students and professors have rebelled against the study of Western Civilization, now deemed exemplary only in white supremacy, imperialism and colonialism, and slavery of people of colour and suppression and extermination of native peoples. Classical studies too are rejected, because the ancient Greeks and Romans were white. Medieval studies are now in an uproar because they are too white, and allegedly of interest to white supremacists.

These "social justice" views are ludicrous in their anachronistic and ahistorical preaching. Why such advocates imagine that their 21st century preferences for gender, race, sexual preference, and ethic diversity should or could have been honoured in the Ancient World, the Middle Ages, or the 18th and 19th centuries is beyond reason. Their demands are ethnocentric in the extreme. They contradict their multicultural claims of cultural relativity by demanding that others, in the past no less, conform to their values.

Two bludgeons energetically used todays by social justice advocates are slavery and native peoples. The arguments go along these lines: The American founding fathers were evil slave holders, so everything that they said or did, including the Constitution of the United States of America, must be rejected, along with their names, images, and works in toto. So too with any other slave holders, whatever else they did, especially if they built cities or universities; their names and images must be erased, a la Soviet historiography.

For Canada the great sin is not viewing native peoples, First Nations as we now call them, according to the ideas of the 21st century. As mentioned, an anachronistic and ethnocentric demand. The founding leader of Canada, John A. Macdonald stands condemned among social justice activists and politically correct conformists. Teachers Associations demand that no schools be named after Macdonald; the capital city of British Columbia has taken down its statue of Macdonald.

It is generally regarded as rude, if not racist, to refer to historical facts in discussing social justice demands. But I will risk the condemnation on behalf of truth and reason. Slavery was not unique to the United States. In fact, slavery was widespread throughout the world in all of history up to the 19th century. The Greeks and Romans and many others were slaving societies, with mainly white slaves. The Arab Islamic Empire from the 7th century made slaving of both whites and blacks a major policy. The Ottoman Empire followed up by slave taking of whites in the Balkans. North African Muslim "Moors" slave raided in southern Europe, all the way up to Ireland. West Africans traditionally captured slaves for their own use, and later slaved to feed them into the North Atlantic slave trade. South Asians did not need slaves, because they had "untouchables." Russians had serfs. Even tribal peoples took slaves; both the Baluch of southeast Iran and the Turkmen of northeast Iran captured Persians which they kept or sold as slaves. Canadian Northwest Coast natives made slaves of prisoners taken in raids and warfare. So the framing of slavery as whites enslaving people of colour is historically and ethnographically false.

Why was slavery almost ubiquitous throughout the world and throughout history? The answer is simple: Economic production depended upon human and animal power, and the amount produced was low. That meant that food security, prosperity, and wealth were almost impossible to accomplish. There was only one possible solution. That solution was to capture labour that would be uncompensated, which means that most of what was produced could be appropriated for others. In other words, adding uncompensated labour to the economy would raise the total amount produced, but would draw little from the total, thus increasing the products available to others, especially the elite. This uncompensated labour consisted of slaves. That is why imperial expeditions and expansions had as one of their main goals to capture foreigners to serve as slaves in the metropolis. The slaves laboured, and the citizens and their elite enjoyed the fruits of the slaves' labours.

Today, fortunately, slavery has largely been suppressed. It exists mainly in certain Muslim countries and Islamic movements, such as the (now happily defunct) Islamic State, and in small scale human trafficking. How did slavery come to be outmoded? The answer, again, is simple. In the 18th century white men in Western Europe generated first an agricultural revolution and then the industrial revolution, both of which raised the level of productivity to unheard of, high levels. For the first time in human history, economic productivity was able to provide foodstuffs and materials to satisfy basic human needs and even a degree of prosperity. This took place in the wider context of the Enlightenment and the invention of science, all also the work of European white men. It was during this period that slavery started to be banned by white men in various American states and European jurisdictions.

In 1807, white men in the United States made engaging in the slave trade a felony, and in the same year white men in the United Kingdom abolished slave trading and sent the Royal Navy to suppress the maritime slave trade. From the early 19th century the American abolition movement, which consisted largely of white men with the aid of some white women, as blacks continued to be enslaved, pressed for the end of slavery.

Lincoln's Emancipation Proclamation in 1863 freed the slaves in the secessionist states. Blacks were admitted to the Union Army and Navy, some 200,000 serving and fighting for their freedom by the end of the Civil War. The current social justice initiative of portraying white men as evil slavers may be good anti-white propaganda, but it is false history, and racist.

Throughout history, around the world, native populations have fought one another for territory, material resources, prestige, and slaves. North American native tribes fought one another, enclaved captives, and tortured captives. Middle Eastern Bedouin tribes fought among themselves from Arabia to Morocco. East African tribes raided each other for livestock, or for precedence and control of the state. South American native tribes fought one another, to steal women, among other goals. And everywhere, when native peoples came into contact with more powerful societies, they were killed off, enslaved, maintained as a subordinate population, or assimilated to the culture of their conquerors. You will recall that the Jewish tribes of ancient Israel were captured and carried off by the Persians eastward to slavery in Babylon, and then, having returned to Israel, were enslaved in Egypt. We see enslavement of conquered local peoples also with the Roman Empire that enslaved the tribes of Britain and central Europe, the Arab Muslim Empire as they conquered and enslaved many in the Christian and Jewish Levant and Berber North Africa, as well as Al-Andalus in the Iberian Peninsula, the Mongol Empire in Russia and the Middle East, and the Inka Empire in South America.

So why would it be a shock to us that a 19th century Canadian politician trying to build a new state would include among his priorities the control and assimilation of the native population? Why on earth would we imagine that he would take our 21st century, culturally relativist, multicultural, and social justice perspective? It is anachronistic, ethnocentric, and absurd to condemn 19th century men for not being 21st century men.

Having addressed some lines of the social justice attack, I now want to turn to the positive. We know perfectly well that dead white European men invented Western Civilization, the Enlightenment, and modern society through their scientific, agricultural, and industrial revolutions. Unlike social justice advocates, I would argue that this is good reason to celebrate dead white men, rather than to reject Western Civilization, the Enlightenment, and modernity. It is the achievements of dead white men that provided the prosperous and open society that enables ungrateful social justice warriors to make their claims, no matter how unjustified.

On a more positive note, I would like to mention a few dead white men who happen to be my personal favourites. I will leave aside the two streams of ancient cultures that were foundational for Western Civilization: the Hebrew and Christian, on the one side, and the Greek and the Roman on the other. As the generators of the Hebrew and Christian cultures were Middle Eastern Jews, their skin hue is uncertain, maybe tan or coffee coloured, perhaps off white, so we do not need to defend them for being white. The Greeks and Romans were certainly white, or at least Mediterranean olive skinned. Do I really need to explain why it would be childish to dismiss as irrelevant and unimportant Socrates, Plato, Aristotle, Sophocles, Aeschylus, Euripides, Aristophanes, et al? Or Roman law? I'll limit myself to a few favourites among the moderns, as examples.

Let's begin with the great empiricist philosopher, David Hume (Scottish, 1711-1776), who showed that philosophy can be both realistic and enlightening. Hume quote: "A wise man proportions his belief to the evidence."

Next are the scientific pioneers James Hutton (Scottish, 1726-1797) and Charles Lyell (1797-1875), who conceived of and documented "uniformitarianism," the doctrine that the physical earth can be explained best by the constant working of natural forces over time. Uniformitarianism rejected supernatural intervention and catastrophism as explanations for physical forms on earth. Hutton and Lyell were white men who invented modern geoscience.

Next is a man of practical invention, John Laudon McAdam (Scottish, 1756-1836), who invented the macadam road surface, the first modern road construction, and thus transformed transportation. Another dead white man.

Now I would introduce a dead white woman, Jane Austen (English, 1775-1817), brilliant author of six mature works, including Pride and Prejudice, Sense and Sensibility, and Emma, all beloved, repeatedly drawn on in television series and in feature length films. An author of great wit, warm heart, and unforgettable prose. The first sentence in Pride and Prejudice: "It is a truth universally acknowledged, that a single man in possession of a good fortune, must be in want of a wife."

Returning to dead white men, I would draw your attention to music. The richness of Western music is recognised around the world. The names of Bach, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven are legend. But my personal favourite is grand opera composer Gioachino Rossini (Italian, 1792-1868), who wrote the glorious, inspiring, uplifting, and always surprising music for "The Barber of Seville," "William Tell," "La Cenerentola [Cinderella]" and some forty five other operas.

The American Founding Fathers: George Washington, Thomas Jefferson, John Adams, Benjamin Franklin, James Madison, John Jay, Alexander Hamilton and others, drawing on the European Enlightenment tradition, built a country based on a vision of the rights of man, and designed a democratic government independent of religion and based on a division of powers.

Dead white men all, but their work was instrumental in giving birth to the most productive and powerful country in the world today, a country built by immigrants who became Americans, and who enjoyed freedom and opportunity that they had never known.

The founders of British Social Anthropology, both dead white men: Alfred Reginald Radcliffe-Brown (English, 1881-1955), foundational Professor of Social Anthropology at Oxford University, whose crystalline theoretical essays in inspired generations of anthropologists. Bronislaw Malinowski (Polish, 1884-1942) who set a standard of long term, participant observation in ethnographic research seldom matched, and whose vivid accounts of the people of the Trobriand Islanders inspired anthropologists since.

One white woman and two white men, none of them dead, are favourite novelists:

Annie Proulx (American, of English and French-Canadian ancestry,1935-) wrote The Shipping News, set in Newfoundland, winner of the Pulitzer Prize and National Book Award, a wonderfully uplifting book of personal redemption.

Richard Russo (American, 1949-) won the Pulitzer Prize for Empire Falls, one of several novels about run down, post-industrial, northeast American towns. His others, such as That Old Cape Magic and Nobody's Fool are equally compelling. Straight Man is one of the great campus novels.

David Adams Richards (Canadian, 1950-) writes novels recounting the lives of poorer inhabitants of New Brunswick, some in the Miramichi, each novel more devastating than the other: Mercy among the Children, which was awarded the Giller Prize, Nights below Station Street, which won the Governor General's Award, and Crimes against My Brother, among a dozen others. His happiest is his latest, Principles to Live By, although the protagonist…. [censored as a spoiler]. He was appointed to the Canadian Senate in 2017.

My final favourite is Ayaan Hirsi Ali (Somali, Dutch, American, 1969), who is not white, not male, and (happily) not dead. Her autobiography, Infidel, is a brilliant, informative, compelling book. I assigned it to the students in my seminar on "Immigration and Culture," a subject on which Infidel is incomparably rich. Many students read ahead, beyond the day's assignment; they could not stop reading. Ayaan Hirsi Ali is not only a person of talent, but also of great dedication and courage.

My selection of persons to celebrate is brief (you are welcome!) and personal. Others would have different favourites. But one thing is clear: anyone who says that the most important thing about a person is their race, gender, sexual preference, ethnicity, origin, or religion, and who wishes to block their exposure to anyone who is not of their identity category or a member of an alleged "victim" category, is impoverishing themselves. Anyone who wishes to edit history on those same grounds is being dishonest. Individuals and their works should be engaged and praised for their character, their heart, and their accomplishments, whatever their identity category, as I have tried to do here.

♠

Philip Carl Salzman is Professor of Anthropology Emeritus at McGill University, Senior Fellow at the Frontier Centre for Public Policy, Fellow at the Middle East Forum, and a Director of Scholars for Peace in the Middle East. His public interest articles can be found at the Frontier Centre, the Macdonald-Laurier Institute, Gatestone Institute, Middle East Forum, Minding the Campus, C2C Journal, Areo Magazine, and Dogma Review.

Shut the fuck up or FTSU

September 15, 2023 | by Greg Canning | Link | Original Link

Feminists such as this and this "shut the fuck up" variant, would have us believe that there exists in modern liberal democracies a "patriarchy", a system of systemic male control designed to oppress women by ostensibly favoring men over women in opportunity and thus singularly biasing outcomes.

I don't see it, rather I see social systems that have evolved over time to ensure the survival of the group, systems that progress over time toward improvement of conditions for the group's members. The reality of human reproductive biology has seen gynocentrism at the core of such systems, which involved different roles and treatment for subgroups based on sex, race, age, ability, and other discriminators. These systems continue to evolve, hopefully toward a situation of equity and fairness for all (I rarely hear the terms equity or fairness from the mouths of ideological feminists.)

Feminists also seem to be fixated on the idea that numerical parity (be it average wages, number of politicians, number of CEO's etc.) defines equality. Numerical parity is forgotten and ignored in the areas where women now surge well ahead [i.e. university enrolments, graduations, custody and alimony awards, life expectancy and health outcomes, reproductive choices etc.] but this is apparently acceptable payback for the presumed sins of generations of men past.

Similarly feminists are simply not interested acknowledging that in some areas such as the dirty and dangerous occupations, occupational deaths and injuries, educational outcomes, health outcomes, suicide rates, conscription and military service, family court bias, sentencing bias etc. numerical parity with men would equate to a significant loss of the systemic privilege women are currently afforded over men, by that system that they argue systemically favors men.

Regrettably women in general have not taken up all of the opportunities that feminism has purportedly opened up for them, as illustrated in this recent Queensland Government Report Queensland Women at a Glance, Aug 2012.

Despite decades of equal opportunity legislation, affirmative action and special programs encouraging women to participate fully in the workforce and in public life in many areas the burden of such participation still falls disproportionately on men.

Only 60% of women of working age are actually employed and almost half of these don't even work full time. Notwithstanding this lower workforce participation rate women still predominate overall in the cozy, comfortable and low risk occupations and the professions.

Of the total numbers employed, women account for 76% clerical and administrative workers, 68% of community and social service workers, 65% of sales workers, and 55% of those employed in the professions. Women have however, been unwilling to break through the glass floor and reach parity with men in the higher risk, less comfortable and more physically strenuous occupations.

Whilst 34% of workers classified as “laborers” are women, when it comes to getting down and dirty with hard manual labor the participation rates are pathetic, with women accounting for only 10% or technical and trade workers and a mere 6% of machinery operators and drivers.

Within the mining industry women constitute a meager 13.5% of the total workforce, but disproportionately hold 20.8% of the managerial roles and 64.9% of the clerical and administrative roles. There are very few women risking their lives, lungs and health at the coalface or underground, with women accounting for a paltry 1.7 % of trade workers and 4.3% of machinery operators.

Despite access to these more highly paying occupations and trades being equally available to men and women for more than 20 years women still mostly avoid them. Pay scales for these more dangerous and technical jobs are based on the position requirements and not on the sex of those preforming the task, which clearly explains why in 2006 the median weekly income in the mining industry was $1,600-$1,999 for men and $1,000-$1,299 for women. Women just won’t do the harder better paying jobs, and a similar pattern is evident in the manufacturing and construction industries.

Women in general retain a greater choice than many men in employment; they less frequently have the expectation of becoming primary breadwinners. Men’s worth on the other hand, is still more commonly judged by society on their ability to provide financial security to their families that is their value as an income deriving utility.

The clear reluctance of women to partake in hard work, or any work at all for that matter is evident in the fact that 1 in 5 women in Queensland list government welfare benefits as their main source of household income. (Presumably paid by the system that favors men over women — right?) Women also make up the vast majority of those who choose to be single parents (87.6%), who do not work and remain dependent on government handouts. Thus significantly increasing the burden on those men and women who do participate in the workforce and whose taxes fund the lifestyle of those too indolent to work or too selfish to offer their children the benefit of a 2 parent family.

We deny the existence of patriarchy (as preached by feminism) in modern western culture, but acknowledge a pervasive gynocentrism that historically confined both men and women to restrictive sex roles.

Students in high school in Queensland are allowed to select the non-core subjects they study. Despite this choice female students still make up the vast majority of students selecting the subjects such as Dance (92.6%), Home Economics (91.9%), Tourism (76.8%), Study of Society (79.4%) and Hospitality Studies (78.9%), but very few girls choose subjects such as Technology Studies (6.8%), Engineering Technology (5.3%), Aerospace Studies (12.3%) and Information Processing and Technology (16.3%).

Female students remain more engaged with education with school retention rates for girls to year 12 being 86% but only 80% for boys. University entry and course completions by women continue to far outnumber men; in 2010, 61.2% of course awards to domestic students went to women.

Whist authorities fail to acknowledge this education advantage held by women, women themselves seem unable or unwilling to translate it into more equal numbers in leadership roles.

Despite the fact that women hold almost 2/3 (64.2%) of Queensland Public service positions (no patriarchal bias there apparently) they account for 41.7% of Senior Officers and 32.2% of Senior Executive Service officers. These numbers show that a greater proportion than the, approximately 20% women who are career centered (according to Catherine Hakim's Preference Theory) are reaching senior and executive positions in the Queensland public service. As in public service employment generally, this likely reflects unfair favoritism shown women in government employment.

Women also comprise 36.7% of all Queensland Government Board members (December 2011) and 44.6% of all new appointments and 50.0% of reappointments to Queensland Government boards again representing higher numbers than expected.

For the record men's human rights activists have no intention of "shutting the fuck up," in fact the stronger your insistence that we do the louder and more persistent our voices will become.

We deny the existence of patriarchy (as preached by feminism) in modern western culture, but acknowledge a pervasive gynocentrism that historically confined both men and women to restrictive sex roles.

Equality or more correctly an equity that accounts for innate differences and the personal choices of men and women, will not be achieved whilst feminism remains focused only on women and women's outcomes and traditionalists attempt to keep sex roles confined.

What is required, is a dialogue, where men are given an equal voice with as much academic effort and funding applied to the men's perspective as has already been devoted to the women's perspective. This is beginning to happen and the response of junior gender ideologues such as Ms. Shut The Fuck Up and others as demonstrated at three recent CAFE events at the University of Toronto will greatly accelerate its momentum, whilst clearly demonstrating its necessity.

I’m a Victim

September 16, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Mount Athos

September 18, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Men only. That’s the law on Mount Athos, Greece.

As always at A Voice for Men we insist on both or neither. With so many places now forbidden to men it’s nice to know there are still a few places men can go for quiet contemplation amongst their fellows.

If you’re just interested in talking to other men you might find XY Crew easier to get to than Mount Athos.

The cover image depicts Mount Athos and is under CC-BY-SA 4.0.

New domestic violence law following brutal drink-driving death – 60 Minutes Australia

September 19, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Many of us at A Voice for Men know Faith Tkalac and she participated in ICMI21.

“Are you Bogged Mate?” – the farmer’s version of “R U OK?”

September 20, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Several of us at A Voice for Men know Mary O’Brien. We fully endorse her support for rural men in Australia.

The term bloke is used several times in the video and is a colloquial term for man in Australia.

The cover image depicts a tractor being transported in rural Australia, 2023. The image is licensed under CC-BY-SA 4.0

The Goal Post episode 26 – The New Zealand Menz Summit

September 22, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Misinformation/Disinformation and Parental Alienation Described by Amanda Sillars

September 24, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Don’t give up on marriage? Request denied.

September 25, 2023 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

The problems with marriage and relationships that have helped create and sustain MGTOW – Men Going Their Own Way – are not just confined to feminist-generated man-hate. Conservative women and their presumption of control over standards for men’s behavior are also at fault.

Every few months one sees articles, usually appeals by conservative women, imploring men to come back to civilization and somehow fix what feminists have broken: relationships between men and women.

Presumably, these non-feminist conservative women will look on admiringly as men rush to the rescue again.

In response to the “sexodus” of men abandoning both dating and marriage, in December of 2014, an article by Laura Perrins co-editrix of the British publication The Conservative Woman declared:

> [Men on dating] websites are heavily outnumbered by women (perhaps this confirms the sexodus). Sexodus men should know that not all women agree with the third wave feminists who want masculinity to be squashed. Many women do want a partner for life, and not on wholly unreasonable terms either. And remember you only have to find one! Just one. She is out there if you only put down the video game long enough to look.

My comment back then was this:

> Actually, given the divorce rate, men who believe in marriage must find not one, but a series of wives, each willing to settle for less as the ex-wives plunder our wallets.
>
> Until conservative women rise up in numbers to smite the hairy feminist hordes, don’t expect men, denied any voice on gender issues, to come running back to an estrogenic conflict we know we cannot win.
>
> #WomenAgainstFeminism are making a difference but need more voices.

The latest article in this genre is by Kathy Gyngell, also a co-editrix of The Conservative Woman. She implored:

> The crux of the matter is where all this leaves children. As [Peter] Lloyd points out:“not having a father leaves a hole in the soul of a child”. The next generation should be of concern to men as much as women. That’s why men playing victim, however badly they have been treated, is no answer. It will not stop that gap. It will just speed up the sexodus.
>
> The challenge for real men (and real women) is otherwise. It is to challenge feminism not to ape it.

Guess what, honey: REQUEST DENIED.

Marriage has become utterly useless to men. A married man is a fool. He has married the state, not a woman. The woman is merely the excuse for the state to harvest his labor and savings.

You cannot shame us with that “real men” bullshit any longer. We have broken the chains of obligation without recompense. The gate is open and the stallions are gone. Get the fuck over it.

Women dominate the social structures of society, from the family, to education, to divorce courts, to criminal justice, to every other institution of power. Women voters elect the toadying sycophant men who preside over women’s abattoir for the male gender.

If you want men to join in this fight for you again, with all due respect, you must join us, make it worth our while, and prove yourselves to be worthy, hard-working and compassionate partners to men.

Suck it up, buttercup. Men are sick of your shit and we will not take it any more.

When women like feminist firebrand Shulamith Firestone starve to death alone in their government-supported hovels, the fact of men not caring is not misogyny. It is a learned apathy, an extinction of our bonding instinct, killed piece by piece through societal torture. Our instincts are now undone, except perhaps for avoiding losing battles and enjoying a life independent of women’s endless demands.

We just have more fun things to do than to submit to the brutal slavery to women any longer.

Until YOU fix your own problems, you can jump right off for all we care.

If you see a man who is absurdly happy with his life, rest assured, he has discovered the joy of living as MGTOW. More and more men figure this out every day while you bleat your helplessness.

I know that men can find a joy in solitude that eludes the lonely souls of women. I know it because I found it.

Helplessness is no longer a good look for you, darling.

Matt Walsh attacks the men that need the most love and support. Why is that?

September 26, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Western Women Condemn Themselves in Condemning Passport Bros

September 27, 2023 | by Janice Fiamengo | Link | Original Link

---

Female commentary on so-called Passport Bros is not hard to find on the internet: women are angry, contemptuous, and incredulous that men are looking for women overseas and encouraging other men to do the same—not for sex tourism (which feminists loved to criticize until they discovered that women are doing it too, in which case it is acceptable), but for a long-term relationship, including, in many cases, marriage and children. These men will partially or entirely relocate to the women's home country in order to start a new, non-western (and non-feminist) life. The angry internet women claim not to care personally: let the losers go is their expressed attitude. Yet the sheer number and vehemence of their responses suggests they do care.

The angry commentary follows a standard pattern in which the women claim to know why a significant minority of men are giving up on western women as mates. The reason never has anything to do, of course, with faults in western women or their unrealistic expectations (see Tyler Durden's summation here).

Likewise, the reason never has anything to do with western divorce laws—in which a man can be ejected from his home, imprisoned, forced to undergo a psychiatric exam, fleeced, and deprived of his children by a grasping ex-wife—or with the fact that women are the ones who initiate divorce in upwards of 70% of cases (and are often applauded for doing so).

The reason has nothing to do with women's openly expressed attitudes of superiority, resentment, and anti-male bigotry, which are rampant in western cultures, especially Anglophone ones. It has nothing to do with the #MeToo/Believe Women climate of baseless accusation that regularly sees men accused and disgraced purely on a woman's say-so. It has nothing to do with the institutionalized discrimination of "equity" hiring that makes it difficult for men to find and advance in careers in order to be acceptably successful to the kind of women who now deride them for their failure.

According to the angry women online, men are leaving the west (particularly North America) to find partners because they aren't good enough for western women. The men are allegedly "terrible, and don't want to stop being terrible," according to one gleefully irate commentator. Their only chance is with women so poor as to be grateful for a "terrible" man; in return, such women will have to "subject themselves to [his] advances," according to another critic's Victorian-style phrasing.

Always choosing the worst possible interpretation of the men's actions, these women assume that a man who wishes to have a long-term sexual relationship with a woman is by definition a bad man wishing to exploit someone "unable to fight back." The implication that sex is a form of degradation (thank you, Andrea Dworkin) and that "fighting back" is the sine qua non of the western woman suggests something of the western man's plight.

.

Most of the angry commentary simultaneously mocks and accuses the men. Often it seems the women can't decide whether to be outraged on behalf of the overseas women allegedly exploited, or whether to ridicule the men for having to get a passport in order to find a willing partner. Gales of laughter—with the women doubled over in giggles—are spent on men who mistakenly think they're "so important" as to announce their "pathetic" decisions on YouTube.

In a clear act of psychological projection, such women assume that the men's statements about going overseas are threats directed at western women. It doesn't seem to occur that the men's decision and choice to share it are not directed at them at all. Most men who take to the internet are speaking to like-minded men, having already concluded that western women aren't going to change.

The question is: if these women don't want these men for themselves (which they clearly don't), why do they not send them out with a blessing? If such men may find a legal and consensual arrangement that suits them in the Dominican Republic or Thailand, why should western women worry about it?

(The question of whether the situation elsewhere is better for men cannot be decided here: men are exploited by women all over the world; but in some countries it may be possible for them to exert greater control over their lives (for an example, see YouTuber Mike's pros and cons of Philippine life).

What seems to bother Passport Bros' critics the most is the thought that the men are trying to get something that they don't deserve: a chance at a sex life with a "submissive woman" (a phrase repeated in many of the videos) and a modicum of freedom. The mere thought of these men finding women willing to partner with them in exchange for long-term financial support drives the commentators into paroxysms of outrage. Their anger shows the deeply punitive mindset of many western women.

Let’s grant that some of what critics say may apply to some Passport Bros. Perhaps some of these men are seeking a (gasp) “transactional relationship” in the short or long term. Some of these men are indeed turned off by the volatility and “high standards” of western women. Tired of trying to please such women, they want a woman who will try to please them.

It’s a matter of opinion whether there’s anything contemptible in the above, yet it’s far from the whole story. Some of the men thinking of an overseas life have spent years fruitlessly searching for a happy marriage. The last thing they want is to exploit anyone. They want to love, marry, and perhaps raise a family. They want a long-term companion. They’re willing to work hard, compromise, provide. In some instances, they are reluctantly divorced, perhaps more than once, and can’t afford to get burned again. They’re willing to give up a comfortable life in the west for the one thing they believe will complete their lives. Misguided or not, there’s nothing abusive or creepy about them. Yet the women mock and condemn ceaselessly.

It seems that a large number of women can’t bear the thought of any man finding an escape route from the hell of sexual loneliness and daily contempt that many women—without knowing anything about the men—have already decided is men’s due. Such women are furious that Passport Bros are seeking something more than feminist culture allows.

They are also enraged, it seems, that there are women in other parts of the world consciously willing to make a relationship work: willing to cook and rear children, willing to be sexually available and perhaps generous with compliments.

The angry women know that, whatever they say about it, the existence of these women, and the fact that many men prefer them (even if they aren’t yet willing to go to Thailand), is a condemnation of western womanhood. The women won’t say so, of course, but some of them must suspect that it’s not their “independence” that the men can’t bear. It’s not their alleged intelligence, nor their career-mindedness, nor their liberated determination to “fight back.” It’s their mean-spiritedness, selfishness, and bottomless self-love.

A lot of men don’t care whether they find a “traditional” woman. They just want one who isn’t a bitch on a regular basis.

.

Sit in on any all-female beauty salon, coffee klatch, or women's group, and the casual anti-male avowals are impossible to ignore. Many women don't seem to like their husbands or partners very much; even fewer respect them. I'm not talking about feminist women only. Many non-feminist women act this way too. They are the women who loved it when Michelle Obama said that men needed to "Be better." They're women who applaud the classic female response to the question, "What do you bring to the table?" that "I am the table."

Their attitude to their men combines weary forbearance with amused contempt, exasperation, or outright disgust. Many speak openly about husbands' alleged ineptitude, mess, failures of manliness, need, incompetence, and emotional immaturity. They divulge embarrassing personal details and tell stories, with relish, showing their husbands in a poor light.

By contrast, they claim their own emotional power, allegedly superior practical sense, and indispensability.

It is impossible to imagine groups of men discussing their wives and girlfriends with such jocose belittlement, and doing it as a regular pastime.

A few years ago, I watched some videos by Cat and Nat, two self-styled Moms who "share everything," who made videos in their cars about the collapse of their sexual interest, openly jeering at their husbands' so-tiresome love-making.

Many such women—protected by our pro-woman culture and deferred to by men terrified of female wrath—reach adulthood without ever having received any serious criticism. If and when they are criticized, their response is a howl of outrage and wounded self-regard. This is precisely what is happening in reaction to the Passport Bros.

Underneath the anger, there is perhaps a hint of fear. It's not fear that men will leave the west in droves (they don't see that happening yet, and neither do I), but it's fear that men are not, after all, entirely under female control. Not yet, and maybe never. Some men are sick of the anti-male abuse and starting to do something about it. They are critically examining women's characters and attitude; they're drawing back from the acquiescence they've always been expected (and been willing) to give. Some are walking away and telling other men to do the same.

These women are used to dishing out the denunciation, reveling in justified grievance; they are infuriated to find that now they are the ones being judged and found wanting.

Don't be that girl.

* * *

*This article originally published on Janice Fiamengo's Substack. Please consider subscribing and supporting her work here.

Foreign Women Are Not the Answer (NAFWALT)

September 29, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Are foreign-born wives a panacea for what ails American men who want to marry. Paul discusses the pitfalls of this option.

ICMI2023 – Day 1

October 1, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The first day of ICMI2023 saw fantastic speeches including Weaponising Women in Culture wars by Indian Youtuber Jeet.

Mike Buchanan wasn't able to attend in person due to scheduling problems but provided a presentation played during the conference opening.

Several of the participants were each given royal a hat from the Maratha Empire which was based in Pune. We can be seen wearing these later in the conference.

I talked about International Men's Issues & Perspectives. Jeet had mentioned a number of the same points during his presentation which helped to reinforce them.

Later participants were treated to the Elon Musk Pooja. We'll explain that one on a later date.

The venue has provided fantastic food and we all enjoyed a traditional Indian lunch.

After lunch the conference split in to two streams, one about experiences with the Indian supreme court and another about conducting political campaigns on a budget.

We then heard from the SIFF Social Media team who offered a lot of useful insights in to conducting social media campaigns.

We also heard about a hunger strike conducted by Indian MRAs. At one point during the strike Anil Kumar was conducting a media interview over the phone while having his blood pressure tested. Another participant travelled an extended distance on public transport and conduct a public demonstration after two days without food. Dedication.

We finished off with a fantastic conference dinner. Later some of the Western attendees had a go at Indian dancing but we're not naming names.

ICMI2023 – Day 2

October 2, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Another fantastic day at ICMI2023.

The day started with presentations on mental health and juvenile justice by professionals working in these areas.

There was quite a lot of focus on MGTOW today with a Western MGTOW, well known at A Voice for Men, being interviewed by Anil Kumar. This was followed by an interesting panel discussion of Indian MGTOW. There was even a session on financial advice for MGTOW which contained a lot of useful information.

We also heard from a group of alienated Indian fathers who, with their supporters, walked 65km as a protest against parental alienation. This emulated the Ratha Yatra festival which represents an unstoppable force and is the origin of the English word Juggernaut. Another walk is planned.

Later there was a panel discussion covering the unique problems of non-resident Indian men who are fighting their way through the Indian courts while living outside the country.

The cover image depicts Amanora township, Pune, at night and is under CC-BY-SA 4.0. Courtesy Wikimedia Commons.

Pearl Davis interviews Paul Elam and Karen Straughan on the meaning of feminism

October 2, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

ICMI2023 – Day 3

October 3, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The final day of ICMI2023 was fantastic. It was a little more relaxed than days one and two.

We were treated to a dance performance mixing contemporary Western and Indian styles of dance. The young girl who performed had previously been alienated from her father, who was an attendee at the conference. Her dad reports that all of his court cases are behind him and now he can just be a father.

Later we got to see traditional drumming styles from a number of conference attendees.

We also had a session in which we washed troublesome people out of our thoughts, International Men's Day was featured and there were several great panel discussions.

The conference included a lot of practical advice and had the same high standards we've come to expect from ICMIs.

I personally learnt that India has advanced economically a lot over the last few decades and continues to move forward.

On behalf of the foreign attendees I'd like to thank the organisers and attendees for the warm welcome and hospitality that we received.

ICMI2023 was a huge success. Well done to everyone involved.

The cover image depicts the historical fortification of Shaniwar Wada, Pune and is under CC-BY-SA 4.0. Courtesy Wikimedia Commons.

Gender Tribalism

October 7, 2023 | by Peter Schwartz | Link | Original Link

Editor's Note: This text first appeared in The Return of the Primitive: The Anti-Industrial Revolution (New York: Penguin, 1999, pp. 205-218.) This essay, published in the late 1990s, seems to describe events as they have unfolded over the last 40 years in many respects. –Ed.

Feminism has become a form of gender tribalism, a collectivism that denigrates individual agency and accomplishment in favor of the group or sisterhood. Positing women as the victims of oppressive forces beyond their control, feminism is today the leading voice in declaring women to be helpless and incapable of accomplishment without significant government aid. A mentality of entitlement and dependency has come to replace the more liberating idea of individual accomplishment; a "neo-hausfrau" movement. Feminism has degraded men and women alike. The rhetoric of liberation obscures a movement that replaces individual responsibility and achievement with a tribal mindset subservient to the group.

All forms of collectivism rest on a certain metaphysics. The collectivist tenets—in economics, that production is primarily a social effort; in politics, that the group, not the individual, has rights; in ethics, that the individual must sacrifice his interests to the needs of society; in epistemology, that the judgment of an individual mind is subordinate to the collective consensus—all stem from a deeper premise: that the individual is impotent to cope with reality. The individual, on this premise, cannot sustain his life on his own, and must depend upon the group for survival.

This viewpoint, as applied to women, is what feminism essentially promulgates.

Of all the supposedly demeaning views of women for which feminists condemn our "patriarchal" society, none is remotely as denigrating as that held by feminism itself. It is, today, uniquely feminists who depict women as congenitally helpless, endlessly "victimized" creatures.

It is feminists who declare that, without government aid, women are compelled to accept only 75 percent of what men are paid—that their advancement at work is blocked by a "glass ceiling," which only the weight of government can shatter—that women cannot be expected to hold full-time jobs unless government provides day-care services for their children—that women cannot get hired for the better jobs or admitted into the better schools, except through "affirmative-action" preferences—that women cannot attain self-esteem as long as Playboy-type material (which, a court rules, has "a negative impact on the individual's sense of self-worth and acceptance") is legally permitted to be sold.[1]

The message of such feminist stands is that the individual woman cannot succeed in life by her own efforts and on her own merit. She is at the mercy of forces she cannot control, unable to obtain work, education or self-respect without the succor of a (governmental) nursemaid.

This is not merely a journalistic description of what feminists see as an unfortunate condition of women at present. This is, rather, a part of their basic philosophy—a philosophy that holds metaphysical powerlessness to be woman's normal state.

And it is a state that feminists actively foster. They want women to believe that the way to attain one's goals is to rely, not on individual merit, but on the power of the group. According to feminism, acquiring the specific abilities necessary for success in some area should be of little concern to women. In fact, they should dismiss the very need for such abilities. What they should count on, instead, is the fact of their gender.

For example, the average woman scores lower on the Medical College Admissions Test (because of deficiencies in her knowledge of science) than the average man. Should women who want to be doctors come to the logical conclusion that they need to study harder? Should women be advised to master science, so that they can be accepted on the same basis as men, irrespective of gender? No, say the feminists; the only conclusion to be drawn is that not enough women are being admitted—so the qualifications must be changed.[2]

If a woman wants to be, say, a firefighter, the feminists do not encourage her to make sure she measures up to the demanding physical standards. What matters most, she is told, is that there be a representative contingent of her gender at the firehouse. And if she does not meet the standards? She should not have to, feminists retort; women are rightly due their quota of such jobs.

With all their prattle about female "empowerment," feminists disavow the only legitimate meaning of that term: i.e., the individual woman's self-created power to make herself into a value, the power to make an employer want to promote her or a school want to enroll her—as a mutually beneficial exchange, based on her objective ability, not as a sacrificial accommodation to her gender. But that would be too independent an approach for the feminists to sanction.

Their implicit message to women is: "You cannot succeed on your own—but you don't have to; your collective will get you what you want."

Ironically, when the contemporary feminist movement began, in the 1960s, people believed that its message was the exact opposite. They believed that women were being urged to abandon the traditional "hausfrau" mentality—i.e., the assumption (held by females no less than by males) that women were incapable of dealing with existence outside the confines of the kitchen and the bedroom. People believed that women were being urged to seek their own careers, to reject unchosen duties to others, to assert a moral right to the pursuit of their own happiness, to embrace the real world by becoming airline pilots, neurosurgeons, music composers and CEOs.

But the collectivism at the heart of the movement quickly surfaced, revealing feminism's true nature. It became clear that women were expected to obtain all these new positions, not by earning them qua individuals, but by demanding them qua females. It became clear that the hausfrau image, far from being rejected, was being endorsed by feminism—in an updated, uglier form.

Whereas the old hausfrau mentality said that women could not perform the more demanding jobs as competently as men, this same mentality now says that women should not be required to. Now, the fact of gender supposedly entitles women to their "fair share" of corporate vice presidencies, irrespective of ability. Now, under this "neo-hausfrauism," women don't have to earn any reward— they just have to call upon Momma State to grab it for them. Now, as before, the conclusion for women is: gender determines all.

It is only the perverse influence of modern collectivism that permits such moral debilitation to be termed "liberation."

In pushing this philosophy, feminism attracts the very worst among women. It draws all those who want to be absolved of responsibility for their lives. Every housewife who feels guilty for having forever given up her pursuit of a career—every mindless scrub nurse who regrets having abandoned her ambition for something more—every bitter woman in a dead-end job or a dead-end life—are all reassured that their plight is not their fault. The individual woman cannot succeed—feminist doctrine proclaims; so she is not to be reproached for her failures.

One type of woman, however, is to be reproached: the woman of true independence. The woman who wants to judge and be judged according to individual merit—who scorns the crutch of "affirmative action," who succeeds on her own and who is proud of it—is chastised as a traitor to her tribe. She would never have achieved anything—feminists resentfully insist—had it not been for the collective efforts of all women.

Feminism rests upon dependency. It tenaciously recruits—and molds—dependent, self-abnegating women. It inculcates in them a belief in their metaphysical helplessness—and then waits for them to become docile members of the flock.

Feminism wants to enshrine the very mentality from which it claims to "liberate" women. It seeks to re-channel the hausfrau mentality—the desire to be provided for—by simply switching the object of dependence from husbands to the "Sisterhood."

The leaders of feminism advocate the creed of the social worker. The social worker exists, not to help people escape from trouble, but to persuade them that life inherently is trouble—from which escape is impossible without the help of the social worker. Feminists want to instill a similar state of mind, by convincing the individual woman that she is doomed to frustration and failure— unless she hitches her wagon to the collective caravan of womanhood.

At the root of this malign conception of women lies a premise about free will. Feminists implicitly believe that women have no genuine volition and that their choices in life are not freely made.

Thus, according to feminism, a woman is never to feel guilty, no matter how low she may have sunk. Has she thrown her life away in a loveless marriage, in drug addiction, in prostitution, in violent crime? She could not help it, feminists tell her. Her choices are not the cause of her misery. Society did not allow her to do anything else. It is society, not she, that needs changing. And the only true “choice” a woman can make, therefore, is a collective one: to stand in solidarity with her female comrades.

The heroines of the feminist movement are not the women who achieve productive lives by their own efforts, but those who announce how empty and impossible their lives would have been without the maternalistic aid of a feminist-sensitive state. The woman who has no real self to assert—who pleads to be taken care of by her “sisters”—who preaches loyalty to quotas and subservience to the collective—who declares that the source of her unhappiness is not her own irrational choices in life but a tyrannical culture—it is she who is held up as a model to be emulated.

Because feminism regards volition as a myth, women are consistently portrayed as victims.

Since they are not held responsible for any failure to attain some end, every frustrated whim of theirs is taken as a sign of victimization. It is taken as evidence that women are being denied their rightful share of the goods. “Feminist consciousness”—says one author—“is consciousness of victimization.”[3] (Emphasis in original.)

The actual “victimizer” is, of course, reality itself. If a woman wants to be hired for a certain position or to gain entry into a certain school, not because she qualifies for it, but because she belongs to a class whose desires are not being fulfilled—then it is reality that is the barrier. For it is reality that demands objective qualifications. It is reality that presents us with the unbending law of causality, the law which states that a job can be done only by those who can do it. It is objectivity—the need to adhere to the requirements of reality—that is feminism’s real enemy.

But feminists dismiss the very concept of an objective reality, because the volitionless woman cannot survive in such a world. She cannot accommodate herself to a universe that makes such rigid demands upon her. She wants the “flexibility” of the non-objective. She feels ineffectual in an objective reality—so feminism repudiates it for her.

“Feminist analysis”—says a professor at the University of New Mexico Law School—“begins and ends with the principle that objective reality is a myth.”[4]

Thus feminists denounce the “exclusionary” means by which society evaluates doctors, lawyers, soldiers. Why, they ask, should women be judged by objective standards? And if one answers: because reality and reason mandate it—their reply is: Why should women be bound by reality and reason? Why can’t a woman be allowed to construct a more malleable world, a world she feels is more hospitable to her wishes? Why shouldn’t she be judged, for example, by her compassion for the ill, rather than her ability to perform surgery—or by her aptitude for telling stories rather than for logically analyzing legal principles—or by her capacity to bond with her fellow soldiers rather than to run an obstacle course in full military gear?

As the president of City College of New York, complaining about a lack of “diversity” in universities, writes: “Institutions of higher learning in the United States are products of Western society in which masculine values like an orientation toward achievement and objectivity are valued over cooperation, connectedness and subjectivity.”[5]

Why, feminists wonder, should even immutable facts stand in the way of women's egalitarian desires? For instance, why should women pay more for annuities just because they have longer life expectancies? Why should they pay different medical insurance premiums just because they incur pregnancy-related costs?[6] Why should females not be members of the Dallas Cowboys and the Vienna Boys Choir? As one feminist organization claims: "There is no such thing as fair and unfair discrimination."[7]

In this war between women and objectivity—between whims and reality—it is considered "discriminatory" to give priority to the latter combatant.

But since reality per se is not very responsive to political protests, feminists direct their grievances against the party they blame for "inventing" such an unyielding universe: men.

It is men who push the idea of objectivity—feminism argues—as a means of keeping women subjugated. It is men who arbitrarily refuse to indulge a woman's whims, as they insist that she be judged by merit, not gender. It is men who are to blame for every female who becomes a stewardess rather than a pilot, a cheerleader rather than a quarterback, a secretary rather than a vice president.

Feminists observe that males have somehow managed to succeed in reality. They have somehow been able to acquire the jobs, the wealth, the fame, the happiness. The way for women to do likewise—feminists maintain—is, not to master reality, but to harness its surrogate: the male. How? By acting like the children feminism believes they metaphysically are, and petulantly demanding that their desires be accommodated—by men. By insisting that they be given their "allowances," in the form of prescribed quotas of jobs, promotions, college admissions, etc.—to be produced and financed by men. (At least, the old hausfrau method of directly latching onto a husband for financial security was a more honest form of dependence.)

This evaluation of women as non-volitional ciphers, and of men as their vile oppressors, is implicit throughout the feminist philosophy. But there is one area in which this view is made virtually explicit: sex.

Sex between a man and a woman is not what it seems, according to feminists—i.e., it is not really voluntary. Law professor Susan Estrich, for instance, writes: "Many feminists would argue that so long as women are powerless relative to men, viewing a 'yes' as a sign of true consent is misguided."[8]

Other feminists contend that a woman cannot be held accountable for her decision to engage in sex. "There could be many reasons why a woman might not resist a man's advances so that unwanted intercourse could occur without force. The woman … may be confused. Her socialization may make it difficult for her to resist."[9]

In other words, women—adult women—are incapable of saying no when they do not want to have sex. They are the passive, deterministic products of their "socialization." Consequently, feminists say, women cannot be held responsible for having sex, any more than children can.

This idea of women as volitionless doormats obliterates the distinction between the voluntary and the forced. Do women have a rational faculty, by which they choose whether or not to engage in sex?

Not according to feminists, who declare that "verbal coercion" constitutes rape. And what is "verbal coercion"? It is "a woman's consenting to unwanted sexual activity because of a man's verbal arguments not including verbal threats of force."[10] (Emphasis added.) So whenever the man utters anything indicating a desire for sex, any subsequent sexual activity, no matter how willing the woman is, may well make him criminally liable.

This is why, in incidents in which men are denounced (sometimes correctly) for "sexual misconduct"—such as the one at the Navy's 1991 Tailhook convention—no differentiation is made between actions in which the women willingly engage and actions in which they are forced to participate. To the feminist, it is all "coercive."

On this view, it is not the objective facts that are legally decisive, but the woman's subjective emotions. Says law professor Catherine MacKinnon: "I call it rape whenever a woman has sex and feels violated."[11] (Emphasis added.)

Facts are simply brushed aside by feminists. Since women are seen as incapable of exercising volition, the crucial distinction with respect to sex is, not between the woman's giving and withholding consent, but between her feeling and not feeling "violated" —a feeling on the basis of which men are to be indicted, tried and sentenced.

A study of college students ("Project on Campus Sexual Assault"), sponsored by Ms. magazine in 1985, is widely hailed as an authoritative, scientific survey of the prevalence of rape in American society. It found that over 25 percent of college-age women had been victims of rape or attempted rape. This reinforced the portrait of a patriarchal culture in which women are under constant attack by, and need constant protection from, their natural enemy, the male.

Yet it was only the survey's distorted definition of rape—based on the view of women as "socialized" puppets, unable to make their own decisions—that led to such a conclusion. For example, according to the questionnaire, if a woman accepts a drink from a man and they then willingly have sex, it may be considered rape, because the man has "impair[ed] the other person's judgment or control by administering any drug or intoxicant."[12]

In fact, of those classified by the survey as having been raped, 73 percent indicated that they themselves did not believe that the sexual activity in question constituted rape. And over 40 percent of the "victims" had sex again with their "attackers."[13]

This neo-hausfrau movement believes that women must be treated like children. They cannot be trusted to give "informed consent," they cannot be relied upon to know whether they have been raped and they need continuous parental supervision to make sure their needs are being met.

When a march on Washington was organized by the National Organization for Women to publicize "violence against women," the objects of the protest were, not just rape or battery, but reductions in welfare spending and cutbacks in affirmative action programs. As reported in the New York Times, the feminists "equated what they called 'political violence' with physical attacks."[14] A parent who beats an infant and a parent who withholds meals from an infant are both guilty of physical abuse. Similarly—feminist thinking goes—adult women are "victimized" by a denial of welfare benefits as much as by a real assault.

Just as the essence of rape, according to feminists, is not the act of physically forcing a woman to have sex, so the nature of its evil is not the coercion—but the collective "discrimination" by one class against another.

This primitive, tribalist view is most openly advocated by MacKinnon, who writes: "Sexual violation is both a practice and an index of inequality between the sexes, both a symbol and an act of women's subordinate social status to men."[15] Unable to perceive a woman as an individual even with respect to her being the target of an actual rape, MacKinnon sees the crime as being committed against the tribe. It is not that a particular woman has been attacked by a particular man—or even that physical force has been used—but that one collective has been judged "inferior" to another.

Rape should be prosecuted as a "sex equality case," MacKinnon says. In a rape trial, the central questions about the accused would include: "How does this man treat women sexually? Is he a sex bigot?" If the courts were to adopt this approach, she concludes, "At least rape would be called in law what it is in life: sex discrimination."[16]

But if the essence of rape is "discrimination"—what is the difference between sex and rape? The act of sex is undeniably "discriminatory" —it discriminates by gender. Doesn't that make it inherently evil?

Whether the claim is that "yes" equals "no," or that rape equals "inequality"—sex is transformed by feminists into the archetypal act of aggression by men against women. Sex per se becomes rape. And all men become guilty of it.

Rape, says one "acquaintance-rape educator," "is not some form of psychopathology that afflicts a very small number of men. In fact rape is not that different from what we see as socially acceptable or socially laudable male behavior."[17] Rape, says a noted feminist author, is "a conscious process of intimidation by which all men keep all women in a state of fear."[18] (Emphasis in original.)

What is the source of this enormous hostility toward men, and particularly toward sex between men and women? The act of sex, Ayn Rand writes, is an act of metaphysical assertion: "To a rational man, sex is an expression of self-esteem—a celebration of himself and of existence.... [I]t is his response to his own highest values in the person of another."[19] (Emphasis in original.) Sex is an affirmation of an individual's self-worth, of his or her capability to live successfully in reality and to experience the joy of such success.

What assessment of sex, then, follows from an opposite metaphysics? If sex is good because it celebrates the individual's capacity to master reality and achieve values—how must feminists, who believe that a woman fundamentally lacks that capacity, perceive sex?

To them, sex is a union, not between two partners sharing their highest values, but between two antagonistic forces: a brutal despot—who wantonly denies woman her due by insisting that she earn her place in the world: and a feckless, perpetual victim—who desperately clings to others for her basic identity and for her very survival. On this view, sex for the woman is not a joyous affirmation of her sense of self-value, but an intolerable reinforcement of her sense of helplessness—and of her resentment toward the man for not being helpless.

Sex, according to feminists, is sheer oppression. The woman is being dominated. She is being "taken" by her enemy. Sex is the quintessential "victimization" of woman—the woman who lacks the capacity even to assert her own will in the face of male "verbal coercion."

Feminist theorist Andrea Dworkin, who depicts sex as "wartime invasion and occupation," presents this view unabashedly: "Physically, the woman in intercourse is a space inhabited, a literal territory occupied literally: occupied even if there has been no resistance, no force; even if the occupied person said yes please, yes hurry, yes more." The fact that women may judge sex to be good makes the act all the worse, she says. These "occupied women [are] more base in their collaboration than other collaborators have ever been: experiencing pleasure in their own inferiority, calling intercourse freedom."[20]

Dworkin's is not some "lunatic fringe" viewpoint. Her odious characterization of sex follows logically from the feminist metaphysics. If the individual woman is a powerless, volitionless nonentity, then sex is a combination of callous invasion and abject collaboration. Dworkin is merely being more consistent, and is taking feminist ideas more seriously, than many of her feminist cohorts.

The doctrine of feminism pervades today's culture. To question and oppose its "politically correct" tenets, especially within academia, requires an independent mind. That is, it requires precisely the faculty whose existence feminism will not acknowledge—and whose force it cannot withstand.

Feminism needs to be repudiated by everyone—man or woman—who recognizes the crucial need to think, and to act, by oneself. If you understand that a human being's basic identity is selfcreated, and is not the product of gender—if you grasp the fact of your capacity to achieve your own goals by your own effort—if you indignantly reject the demand that anyone live by the guidance and the power of the collective—then do not permit the ideas of feminism to go unchallenged. Expose, and condemn, the self-effacing dependency that this "liberation" movement cultivates. Above all, let people see that the ideological battle over feminism is not between the female and the male— but between tribalism and independence.

Footnotes

[1)] "Canada Court Says Pornography Harms Women," New York Times, February 2, 1992, p. B7

[2)] On the Medical College Admission Test—the only standardized test available to medical schools— women attain a mean score 88 percent that of men on the physical sciences section of the test; and 90 percent on the biological sciences. Yet in recent years, according to the Association of Medical Colleges, equal proportions of male and female applicants have been accepted to medical schools. ("Women seem to communicate better in the interview," says the associate dean of admissions at Harvard Medical School.) See Martin L. Gross, The End of Sanity (Avon Books, 1997) pp. 72-75.

[3)] Sadra Lee Bartky, Femininity and Domination: Studies in the Phenomenology of Oppression (Routledge, 1990), p. 15.

[4)] Ann Scales of the University of New Mexico Law School, quoted by David Brock in The Real Anita Hill (Free Press, 1993) p. 384.

[5)] Yolanda Moses, quoted in a New York Post editorial, "CUNY Does It Again," May 26, 1993, p. 18.

[6)] The Supreme Court has endorsed this view, ruling in 1983 that sex-segregated actuarial tables violate the Civil Rights Act of 1964 because "under the statute, even a true generalization about a class cannot justify class-based treatment."

[7)] An official of the National Federation of Business and Professional Women's Clubs, quoted in The Intellectual Activist, July 29, 1983, p. 3.

[8)] Quoted by Katie Roiphe in "Date Rape's Other Victim," New York Times Magazine, June 13, 1993, p. 30.

[9)] Charlene L. Muehlenhard and Jennifer L. Schrag, quoted by Norman Podhoretz in "Rape in Feminist Eyes," Commentary, October 1991, p. 33.

[10)] Roiphe, op. cit.

[11)] Quoted by Carol lannone, "Sex and the Feminists," Commentary, September 1993, p. 31.

[12)] Christina Hoff Sommers, Who Stole Feminism? (Simon & Schuster, 1994), pp. 212—213.

[13)] Ibid., pp. 213—214.

[14)] "Thousands in Capital Protest Attacks on Women," New York Times, April 10, 1995, p. A1.

[15)] "The Palm Beach Hanging," New York Times. December 15, 1991, Section 4, p. 15.

[16)] Ibid.

[17)] Py Bateman, quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 30.

[18)] Ibid. (from Susan Brownmiller's book Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape, Bantam, 1976).

[19)] Ayn Rand, "Of Living Death," The Voice of Reason (New American Library, 1998), p. 54.

[20)] Quoted by Podhoretz, op. cit., p. 31 (from Andrea Dworkin's book Intercourse, Free Press, 1988).

Editor's note: AVfM thanks Richard E. Ralston, Publishing Manager for the Ayn Rand Institute, for permission to reprint Mr. Schwartz's text, which was also reprinted in the journal New Male Studies, from which this copy was obtained.

Robert Brockway's ICMI2023 presentation – part 1

October 8, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Woke is a widely-used adjective. Woke is generally understood to involve supporting or believing in various notions that are widely accepted among social justice warriors. People who consider themselves woke generally:

- Consider themselves to be left-wing
- Support identity politics
- Support feminism
- Believe in rape culture
- Believe in male privilege
- Believe that street harassment is a serious problem
- Believe in and reject cultural appropriation
- Favour strong limitations on free speech
- Favour diversity over merit

The woke are typically intolerant but use the language of tolerance. They are typically exclusionary while using the language of inclusion.

Today I want to present a new concept to you. I call it The Woke Continuum, or increasingly just The Continuum.

There are various movements alive in the world today. Most have appeared within the last few decades and they have characteristics in common. These movements include Marxism, feminism and Black Lives Matter and Extinction Rebellion. Another one that is not as well known is the BDS movement. Each of these movements could be described as 'woke'.

Feminism, of course, needs no introduction here other than to say that while there are many forms of feminism on paper, Intersectional feminism won decades ago. This is so true that referring to feminism without further qualificiation is a reference to intersectional feminism.

Intersectional feminism concerns itself with the intersection of various grievances based on gender, ethnicity or sexual preferences. This set up feminism to be central to the woke continuum that was to come.

It also prompted some anti-feminists to start referring to the grievance hierarchy in reference to the difficulties feminists have in adjudicating difference sorts of grievances.

BDS is short for boycott, divestment and sanctions. The BDS movement is an anti-Israel movement. While it's officially opposed to Israel it seems to be anti-Jewish as well.

In 2018 some women's marches in the US excluded Jewish women's groups. This is a good example of the types of problems encountered within intersectionality. Who's grievances are more important?

Black Lives Matter was founded by three women, Patrisse Cullors, Alicia Garza and Opal

Tometi. Cullors has explicitely referred to herself and Alicia Garza as trained Marxists. During one interview Cullors commented on the wide range of philosophies she had read while attending a year-long course at the National School for Strategic Organising (NSSO):

> We spent the year reading, anything from Marx, to Lenin, to Mao, learning all types of global critical theory and about different campaigns across the world,…

Meanwhile Cullors has invested millions of US dollars in real estate. Some Marxism.

Information on what BLM truly believes used to be on their website but was removed in September 2020:

> We make our spaces family-friendly and enable parents to fully participate with their children. We dismantle the patriarchal practice that requires mothers to work "double shifts" so that they can mother in private even as they participate in public justice work.
>
> We disrupt the Western-prescribed nuclear family structure requirement by supporting each other as extended families and "villages" that collectively care for one another, especially our children, to the degree that mothers, parents, and children are comfortable.

And later on the same page:

> We foster a queer-affirming network. When we gather, we do so with the intention of freeing ourselves from the tight grip of heteronormative thinking, or rather, the belief that all in the world are heterosexual (unless s/he or they disclose otherwise).

Here we see clear links to feminism and Marxism.

BLM was ostensibly founded to assist Africa-Americans but it was clear during the riots in 2020 that it was doing nothing of the sort. Management at the many American corporations that supported BLM at the time should be ashamed of themselves.

Extinction Rebellion is a radical environmental group that is well known in the UK and Australia for disruptive protests. Extinction Rebellion aligns itself with feminism and BLM in embracing anti-Colonialism and also aligns itself with BDS in taking an explicitely anti-Israel position.

Generally speaking groups like Extinction Rebellion are pushing for a reduced standard of living to counter what they term as an imminent threat from climate change.

These movement exist on a continuum. They don't all agree with each other on everything. Their members don't all agree. But they exist on a continuum and they work together when it makes sense to do so.

This helps them to be evasive. They can deny an association with one of the other groups when needed but then join with them when it makes sense to work together. This gives them plausible deniability and has made it difficult for those outside of these movements to define them. Each of these movements have characteristics in common.

They tend to be good at manipulating language. They redefine words in a manner reminicient of New Speak from Nineteen Eighty-Four and thus avoid clear definitions. Consider a word like Colonialism. Who can deny that colonialism happened? But they change the implied meaning.

I believe that since about 2015 feminism has been less successful at manipulating language. They're tending to produce more clear definitions which is making our job a lot easier. We can now direct responses at their clear definitions and discredit them.

A good example is toxic masculinity. They are increasingly listing characteristics that they argue constitute toxic masculinity. In particular they talk about stoicism as leading to toxic masculinity while stoicism is very much a double-edged sword. It can be destructive but it can also lead men to greatness.

These movements are intolerant of alternative view points and tend to shout down opposition. They all seem to have been influenced by Saul Alinsky's Rules for Radicals.

They tend to be grass-roots and have little or no strong leadership. Even BLM which has identifiable leaders has tended to be decentralised with different groups managing to act in a concerted effort with little coordination.

Many have noticed the apparent decentralised nature of these groups. Some then posit that there must be a conspiracy going on. Some even argue that George Soros must be involved.

George Soros was originally born in Hungary. He's from a non-observant Jewish family and survived the Nazi occupation of Hungary. I'm quite certain these events helped to shape his world view.

Soros funds various progressive groups and organisations through his Open Societies Foundation but it is notable that the BDS movement has been critical of Soros for his investments in Israel.

I reject the conspiracy explanation. I think something simpler is going on. I believe these groups are effective because the message and the concepts used are simple and easy to grasp.

I'm arguing these movements are organic, which is far more dangerous. You can't cut the head off the snake if it doesn't have one.

The focus of these movements is remincient of the Four Olds the removal of which were central to the Cultural Revolution in China which lasted from 1966 to 1976:

- Old Ideas
- Old Culture
- Old Customs
- Old Habits

Consider what we've seen from these movements in recent years and where this may go from here.

Identity politics, or more recently idpol, is an ideology in which people are categorised on the basis of characteristics that are often readily identifiable. Characteristics often include gender, race, gender identity or sexuality. While identity politics often uses terminology such as diversity it is really talking about a coarse form of diversity based on physical characteristics and ignores important forms of diversity such as diversity of thought.

One of the greatest misunderstandings about the men's rights movement and anti-feminism is that they in any way involve identity politics. Merely seeking to address the problems faced by a particular group does not imply acceptance or endorsement of identity politics. In contrast, Feminism is increasingly tied to identity politics and post modernism.

The Oxford Dictionary defines identity politics as:

> A tendency for people of a particular religion, race, social background, etc., to form exclusive political alliances, moving away from traditional broad-based party politics.

Identity politics is inherently exclusionary and intolerant even as it uses the language of inclusion and tolerance.

The men's rights movement accepts anyone who wants to help us regardless of their gender, ethnicity, sexuality or any other characteristic they might have. Every major men's rights organisation has had women in leadership roles. This is because those women were willing and able to fill those positions. Anyone who wants to help MRAs address the problems facing men and boys is welcome.

Compare to feminist groups. Many exclude men from leadership roles and some exclude men entirely – calling them 'allies'. Some don't even want male allies. That's identity politics.

But all is not well among socialists and adherents of identity politics. There has been an ongoing war within socialism for years over identity politics. Some socialists argue that identity politics is central to socialism in the 21st century while others argue that it distracts from the core issues around worker's rights.

Socialist Alternative is a good example of a socialist group embracing idpol. It's also worth noting that they actively opposed the March for Men in 2018 in Melbourne, Australia in which I spoke. On their Red Flag website Socialist Alternative made an attempt to take me out of context that was so bad I now use it as an example.

In contrast the World Socialist Web Site actively attacks Socialist Alternative and claims they are part of the pseudo-left. Similarly Sahra Wagenknech is a prominent politician in the democratic socialist Left Party in Germany. She also thinks that identity politics is just a distraction from the core aims of socialism.

This conflict within socialism has been ongoing for many years and it isn't clear what the outcome will be. We're seeing a similar conflict inside feminism. Feminists that oppose the trans movement, such as Kellie-Jay Keen-Minshull, are rebranding as Women's Rights Activists. Some may think this opens the door for them to work with MRAs, but it doesn't. WRAs are still highly gynocentric. They have also taken to calling the trans movement a men’s rights movement. This is clearly not so. It was feminism that argued for 50 years that gender is a social construct. This is the natural end result of that position.

Continued in part 2.

Credit Daniel Baines, conference attendee, for the cover image.

Robert Brockway’s ICMI2023 presentation – part 2

October 10, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

There is another aspect to all of this too. Big Tech.

Big Tech refers to the big technology players like Facebook, Amazon, Apple, Netflix and Google. Collectively these companies are known as the FAANGs. They hold an enormous amount of power today.

But it wasn’t always so. The 1990s saw widespread democratisation of technology. The Internet started to compete with proprietary online services such as CompuServe and America Online. Many forget that these services originally operated private networks. They competed with the public Internet. Later they adopted the position that “if you can’t beat them, join them” and became Internet service providers.

Around the world there was countless small ISPs mostly running modems. For most the Internet was slow and unreliable. But it was also free. I don’t mean you didn’t have to pay for it. I mean that the environment was not dominated by large corporations. Nor, to a large degree, was it dominated by governments. The law was trailing the technology at that point and it showed. Many described the Internet of the 90s as the “Wild West”.

The Internet is based on open standards. These allow anyone with the skills to develop software that will talk to other systems on the network. People can talk to one another about what is important to them without governments and Big Tech being able to limit their speech.

Another aspect of technology that really took off in the 90s was free and open source software. Most people would just known it as “open source” so that’s how I’ll refer to it. Adoption of open sourcd grew rapidly during the 90s. It allowed people to use software as they saw fit.

I’ve been involved in open source software since 1994. First business wasn’t interested. Then they felt threatened. Later they adopted opens source and made alot of money from it. In 2013 I concluded that open source had won. At around the same time I started to realise the problems facing men and boys were far worse than I had previously realised. And so I embraced men’s rights. I aim to help another movement to victory as I once did with open source.

Ten years on it’s clear that Big Tech has done an end-run around open source. A lot of the freedom with technology we had in the past thanks, in part, to open standards and open source has been curtailed. So many people rely on Big Tech for so much of their lives that it has become inordinately powerful.

We talk on Facebook, or Twitter rather than forums or mailing lists as we would have done 10 or 20 years ago. Modern social media is a memory hole. I see so much information on men’s issues posted to social media never to see the light of day again. Get the most bang for your buck and put your information were people can find it. We accept end user agreements that allow Big Tech to analyse and even control our data.

We pay to use someone elses computer systems to run software that we could easily run ourselves.

Even if we do setup services ourselves we likely do so using infrastructure owned and controlled by Big Tech. Many of these large providers offer proprietary solutions that lock their customers in. They become dependent on one provider. Moving to another becomes impractical due to the expense and difficulty of doing so.

If the power of Big Tech continues to grow we may one day see the freedom of the underlying infrastructure threatened. But all is not lost. Everything we need to recapture the online freedom of earlier decades is still there. We just need to reach out and take it. And most of it is free. This is an area you will see A Voice for Men talking about more.

Big Tech sold a message that it was cheaper thanks, in part, to economies of scale. Decades of experience has shown this is often not true. Jeff Bezos, Founder and executive chairman of Amazon, is now worth more than $160 billion USD. That money came from somewhere, and it wasn't just from Amazon sales – Amazon Web Services dwarfed the rest of the Amazon company long ago. According to VisualCapitalist.com, as of July 2022 74% of Amazon's operating profit came from AWS.

A Voice for Men is entirely run on open source software, uses open standards and is portable. The systems run on a medium sized provider. If feminists brigaded the provider and forced us to move we can shift the entire site very quickly because we're using open standards.

Related to this I encourage men who may be down and out to skill up in IT. There is a shortage of certain skills in the industry and this is another area where A Voice for Men will be assisting men. We're all still too reliant on Big Tech for search. This is one aspect which I think is not yet solved.

The feminist historical narrative is an historical narrative widely believed by feminists and others. The feminist historical narrative is so pervasive that even many non-feminists buy in to it. It is largely built of lies, half-truths and oversimplifications.

Feminists love to claim that they freed women from the historical oppress of the Patriarchy. What Western civilisation has really done is dispense with gender roles. This is a huge social experiment and it remains to be seen how it will turn out.

I've talked extensively about the feminist historical narrative over the last few years. Anyone interested in this topic should watch my presentations for ICMI20, ICMI21, articles I've written for A Voice for Men and keep an eye out for my upcoming book, The Victorian Fallacy.

Unfortunately there are many academics in the West who are well paid to come up with waffle about The Patriarchy and other aspects of the feminist historical narrative. Those of us fighting it are mostly doing it on our own time.

Only independent researchers can truly be independent as we're not beholden to the public funds doled out to those that embrace orthodoxy.

The problems in the West are growing. Increasingly these problems are spilling in to other cultures thanks to Western, particularly American, cultural hegemony. These problems include, but are not limited to:

Gender fluidity is something quite new. This isn't about sexuality or about a male wanting to be a female or vice versa. Those who are gender fluid sometimes claim to be genderless, sometimes they claim to switch between male and female and sometimes they claim to be a new gender entirely.

From the outside it might look like the West has gone crazy. Sometimes it looks like that from the inside too. The truth isn't so simple though. The reality is the majority of people just act like none of this is happening a lot of the time. But it is happening.

Proponents of gender fluidity would have us believe that of all of the more than 100 billion humans who have ever lived they alone understand the true nature gender. Yes they argue that ancient cultures had 3rd genders or whatnot but their evidence is weak and sparse. The concept of male and female with distinct gender roles is evident throughout the world and through history. This is true even of hunter-gatherer societies which were arguably more egalitarian and with less strict gender roles than many societies that came after the adoption of agriculture.

There is growing intolerance to alternative viewpoints in Western nations. We see political partisanship in which followers on each side of politics are intolerant of the others.

We also see attacks on free speech with younger people being more likely to argue that speech that offends can legitimately be censored. This is particularly dangerous.

Free speech is an often misunderstood concept, especially by those who would seek to curtail it. The concept of free speech gives people the ability to express ideas publicly without fear.

Free speech does not mean anyone has to listen. Nor does it free a person from the consequences of their speech. Most countries place some limits on free speech. In particular incitement to violence is often not protected as free speech.

Free speech isn't some abstract idea dreamed up by people living in an ivory tower. It's a practical need and in a very real sense the only defence we have against tyranny. I say this to people who want to limit free speech:

- If you can do it then so can others
- They might just be better at it than you are

Censorship is another growing problem in the West with government increasingly seeking to block ill defined concepts such as hate speech.

Governments, though are not the only ones that can censor. Any organisation capable of sufficient control of the disemination of information can censor. Thus a media monopoly could censor even though it may be a commercial enterprise.

The mainstream media pushes a woke narrative. Interestingly comments sections on media publications over the last 10 years have seen a dramatic reversal. Years ago there would have been a lot of support for the position espoused by the media organisation.

Now there is rejection and anger at their position.

This is clear evidence of a growing divide between the media and the community.

Young men are disengaging. Between 2008 and 2018 the number of men in one age category who reported not having had sex in the last 12 months tripled from 10 to 28%. These men were under 20 in 2008 and under 30 in 2018. In contrast the protion of women went up about 8%. Regardless of one's views on premarital sex a sudden demographic change like this should be cause for concern.

A 2023 Pew Research study found that twice as many young American men describe themselves as single as do young American women. A few explanations have been proposed and there may be multiple causes. The single most plausible seems to be that young men and women may simply be using different definitions of the word 'single'.

Feminist women have never understood the male psyche. Despite what feminists claim the vast majority of men are adverse to harming women. Men who do harm women are very much in the minority.

Feminists expected a backlash but it never happened. Instead men simply walked away because to do otherwise would be to risk conflict with women, which most men find abhorent.

Feminists now like to claim there is a crisis in masculinity. Rather I think the crisis is being caused by how men are being treated.

I believe that most men do not buy in to the misandry. Rather I suspect they see straight through it and are angry as a result.

Men and boys are facing certain issues in Western countries, and in other part of the world. Some of these problems occur everywhere, while others are country-specific.

Western men are increasingly responding by disengaging. Given the situation young men find themselves in their actions are entirely rational.

Continued in part 3.

Robert Brockway's ICMI2023 presentation – part 3

October 12, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

I've been involved in men's rights for 10 years. In that time I've seen huge changes. Some of the problems we raise have gone mainstream. Terms like gynocentrism are now being uttered even by the mainstream media. 10 years ago you would have rarely heard that outside of A Voice for Men.

We've come a long way but we have further to go. So how do we fix this?

We're often accused of being in an echo chamber but that's more likely to be true of our opponents. This is evidenced by the material we look at and talk about. We look at their sites, they rarely look at ours. We welcome them to attend our events and ask questions. We are usually barred from theirs or if we are allowed to go we aren't allowed to ask questions.

Men's advocates tend to be culturally libertarian and are also often economically libertarian. Being culturally libertarian means being tolerant of alternative viewpoints. I'm anti-feminist and will criticise feminism for many of its ideological positions but I will never try to silence a feminist. Compare to how they treat us.

We need to encourage others to be tolerant of alternative viewpoints as we are.

We need to encourage others to get out of their echo chambers and listen to opinions and ideas that make them uncomfortable.

Don't ignore the mainstream media. Keep a track of them as I do.

Record examples of misandry in the mainstream media. Request an account on Wiki4Men as it's a great place to record this information.

My sense is that misandry in the mainstream media is actually declining as a result of push back over the last 10 years or so. I won't forgive them for the damage they've done to society over the last few decades though.

We can and are fighting back but it's an uneven fight.

We're held to a different standard than our opponents. They can make all sort of wild claims, such as the pay gap. The media and even governments will repeat their claims. If we make a mistake they're all over it. Thus we need to be very careful with our claims and provide solid evidence for any public statements we make.

We can resist Big Tech.

Big Tech is part of the problem. But we can solve it. Don't just hand over our hard earned cash to Big Tech. Consider using smaller providers. Consider setting up and running your own servers. If you don't have the skills to do this then you can reach out to smaller companies or even individuals who can provide these services online. Many such organisations exist right here in India.

As noted earlier search continues to be a problem. We're still too beholden to Google search and Microsoft Bing. Do you have an idea that could disrupt and democratise search? If successful it would be a huge boost to men's rights as well as being financially rewarding.

Support open standards and open source.

With the MSM dominated by misandrists it's up to us to convey the message that men don't need to be ashamed of being male. Because of our limited reach we can only help men who come and look for us.

It follows then that we will continue to spread our message through word of mouth.

I believe that a multi-pronged approach is best. Different groups MRAs and others take different approaches. This allows us to find the most effective strategies. Watch what others are doing and learn from them.

Data is necessary but not sufficient. It is important that we continue to quote facts and figures to support our arguments but that alone will not win the day.

I don't ever see the men's rights movement as being huge as feminism is. And I don't see us being bankrolled as feminism is. But that isn't a bad thing. The message is getting out there and the lack of money prevents corruption from coming in. A little more money would be nice though.

Finally, on a personal note, minimise contact with misandrists whenever possible. As well as all the hate they dish out, you're at greater risk of a false accusation if you have such people in your life.

Cato the Elder was a Roman orator in the second century BCE. Cato was famous for ending all of his speeches, regardless of the subject matter, with the words "Carthago Delenda Est" – Carthage must be detroyed.

Taking a leaf from Cato's scroll I will henceforth be ending all of my presentations with a call to assist in the lawful apprehension of Zoe MeLellan. And I will do this until she is in custody and the matter can be dealt with by the courts.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of October 2023 McLellan is still at large. Sebastian, who would now be 10, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Canada.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's investigator, Claudia Rodriguera.

The word on masculinity

October 14, 2023 | by Jared White | Link | Original Link

What makes a man, a man?

This question may well have been on the minds of the majority of the human race before recorded history. Not in the specific words above but still in some variation of how people communicated before writing and speaking was referred to as communication. It is a simple question designed to give men and boys a morality check. A question with answers that could inspire integrity or crime. So what makes a man, a man?

Absolutely nothing.

Men are men and that's all there is to it. They may be gay or cut their junk off but they will always be what they were born, men. What makes a man, a man is a question within a question. What makes a man a good man? This is the real question being put forth. The problem is that the answer to that question is being proposed by the wrong people.

Women.

Feminist women, to be more precise, are the ones working tirelessly towards pushing their views of "what makes a man a man" onto the general public. Yes there are feminist men who publish books and teach college courses on this subject. However, their words and ideas are not their own. They say what their enablers want them to say. They repeat things feminist women have already propagated.

The one thing that coincides with many who are feminists and those who are not when it comes to the question of manhood is masculinity. However, why this is the case I am not sure. If you were to ask an average guy on the street, masculinity would be the difference between a real man and…something else. If you were to ask a feminist, masculinity would be the harbinger of death to humanity.

Both would be wrong.

Masculinity is a word. A word created by human beings. A word used to describe human beings that exhibit certain traits or characteristics. Throughout recorded history, men around the world have maintained similar identifiable characteristics that have bridged cultures and broken barriers.

The warrior: This characteristic, I believe, is the most common among the men of all cultures. Every civilization I know of, even the supposed female led matriarchies have never strayed from the practice of using men as the protectors of society. Many generations ago, before steel and concrete buildings towered above the trees, men were born for one main purpose: to defend their society from other societies.

The architect: After humanity left the caves that once sheltered them and civilizations began to spring up around the globe, men took on another characteristic that aided in the survival of the human race. From teepees to mud huts, from log cabins to steel skyscrapers, the homes of humanity were built on the backs of the male half of the species. It has been and still is, even with advanced technology, a tireless and fatal effort.

However, men, as it seems have been the predominant humans to step forward and sacrifice their bodies so that others might live.

The risk taker: Walking into a pitch black mine filled with dynamite with the intention of lighting a fuse is not something many people are capable of doing. However, those that did undertake this endeavor were men and only men. Entering a small boat with three to four other passengers with the intention of hunting an animal the size of a large building with only a small spear is something most people would consider insane. However, to fuel the whale oil powered luxuries of the past, men stepped up and into those small boats. Not all risks men take are fatal but the largest risks taken by the human race are usually taken by the male half. Be they a walk across an unfinished skyscraper back in the early 20th century or a life savings put into the first steel mill, the risks are always big and the payoff upon success immeasurable.

The leader: Anyone can lead. Not everyone can lead well. While being the one in charge is stereotyped as something men crave more than anything else, knowing the one in charge can lead is what those who actually pay attention view as another male characteristic. A group of men from the past tasked with defending a small settlement that has been raided by a rival tribe will not put their trust and their lives in the hands of a man who has not proven himself on the battlefield. Even the warriors of today, soldiers in armies around the world only give respect to leaders who have earned it. Yes, today's military men are legally bound to respect the rank of an individual but few men respect individuals that have not proven themselves a leader. Within large successful companies it is intelligent to appoint those that produce the most profit for that company as leaders of their peers. In team sporting activities an individual player cannot win without a cohesive team, however, a team cannot be cohesive without a worthy leader. Groups of men choose their leaders because they know that the man chosen can outperform them at whatever task that needs to be accomplished. If a man has not earned the respect of a group of men then that group will remain leaderless.

The competitor: Competing is what has driven men to bring the human civilization out of caves and into the cockpit of airplanes. Men compete with each other over just about anything from leisure activities as such as drinking to crowd gathering professions like sports. Men compete for the affections of women on a daily basis. It is women, in fact, that have driven some men to create great works of art, invent revolutionary technologies, and lead armies to victory all for the sake of winning her affections.

The protector: Not only have men defended their societies from other societies. Nature has been kept at bay, whenever possible, by the ingenuity of men. To keep the rain, winds, and snow from killing their families, men built shelters. To prevent their loved ones from freezing to death, men built fireplaces. To protect those weaker than themselves from wild animals, men designed traps and fashioned weapons out of rocks and wood. Even today in our "civilized" world their still exist men and women who cannot conform to what we deem civil. They would take without asking, destroy what they did not create, and murder those they have never met. Once a common protective instinct among men over the years has now changed into an official position among the populace.

Soldier; Police officer; Firefighter.

These jobs were not always jobs and did not always hold names. Centuries ago common men stepped up and took on these roles when they were needed. There was no official corps of men who performed these services, except for soldiers and far back enough in time not even soldiers were official. Instead men simply defended their societies from criminals or nature. Even today among the thousands of men who are paid to perform these tasks there are men who do not hold the title and position of firefighter that will run into a burning building in order to save a loved one or a complete stranger. Even today there are men who pull men, women, and children they have never met from car accidents. Men jump into cold bodies of water to save drowning citizens from certain death. When a cry for help is heard it is men who rush in to save others from criminals and unprovoked attackers. Men have always been the protectors of their societies, the unsung and underappreciated heroes of their times.

The provider: Men have always given what they themselves have labored to obtain. Be it the meat from some wild animal or a roof they have spent months creating as a shield from nature. This is one male characteristic I believe is predominantly male for one reason. The roof over my head was designed and built by other men. The same goes for just about every other human being on the planet since and before recorded history. In the past it was understandable that only men could do these things. Raw strength and physical prowess was a must for hunting and building. Today we have machines built by men that lighten the physical burden needed to create homes and shelters. Sixty years ago it was already possible to construct a house within minutes. Yet still it is men who answer the call to shelter their societies.

You will notice all of these traits associated with men are good traits. It is indeed strange to hear the words good and man uttered in the same breath unless the one speaking is describing their own selfish desires they believe men should adhere to.

These traits, these characteristics are what describe masculinity to me. These characteristics used to be recognized by the world as masculine characteristics. Now many view them simply as human characteristics and that’s fine. Taking away the label that defines certain traits as male traits is fine. Not all men exhibit these traits. Also, some women exhibit these traits as well. However, whether or not defining these traits as male was never the issue in my mind. I have never felt the need to defend my masculinity.

Then I learned about feminism.

Feminism did something dishonest and in my opinion evil when dealing with masculinity. As anyone will find out after only a short time of studying feminism, celebrating men is not one of its functions. Not only did feminists have to shout to the world that the traits listed above are not exclusive to the male half of the species. No. Convincing the populace that masculine traits are found within women was not enough. Instead, feminists drew a line between men and women when it came to masculinity. Many of the good things that were viewed as masculine were argued to be inherent in women as well. Feminists couldn't stand being told that some good things, such as being a provider or protector, were things that mostly men did. So feminists sought to remove the title of masculinity from these characteristics. However, this is where the evil of feminism took hold. Feminists had no problem with renaming protector as a human characteristic but in the same stroke they named violence as a masculine characteristic.

Fuck all to honesty.

Violence, sexual deviancy, dominance, and several other nasty characteristics were attributed solely to men by feminists. You see they have no problem arguing that women can be competitive and only want to be led by someone worthy of leading. They can argue for that all day.

Why?

Because those are good characteristics that people have associated with men throughout history. But when it comes to the argument that women can be violent or rapists or dominant control freaks too? No they say. Women do not do such things. They say that if you just look at what men have done throughout history you will see that in general men have been the violent ones and men have been the ones seeking to control societies.

Not women, they say.

It is almost like a hamster wheel. Analyzing the subject of masculinity can send one's mind into an endless spiral of confusion and frustration especially when bombarded with feminist rhetoric. Aggressiveness, in general, is a male trait. It is used in sports, combat, and even the work room. But when this trait is said to be masculine, the word masculine, is changed. No longer does the word masculinity stand for a characteristic that has been observed mostly in men for generations. Now masculinity is a social construct according to feminists.

On some levels this is true because as I said masculinity is a word. A word created by us humans to describe something we see. Since it has been mostly men who have displayed these characteristics it is mostly men who are expected to uphold these characteristics.

Therein lays the rub.

We all know that not all men exhibit every characteristic associated with masculinity. However, since and before the dawn of civilization, most men have displayed these characteristics. Back then necessity played a big role in keeping those characteristics visible, which in turn kept them alive in the most noticeable ways, such as, keeping a budding society alive. Today we have technology. Technology erases a lot of the necessity surrounding the traits associated with masculinity. Sure the traits are still needed but the life of modern societies no longer depends fully on men crafting spears and hunting animals. Hard physical labor is still needed but that is mostly ignored in our society today. Money is the driving force behind what is created and what is destroyed now and masculinity is not needed to make money.

Boys being taught by their fathers to be competitive and aggressive can be viewed as a social construct to some and in some ways that is true. However, the fact remains that mostly men who were not taught to exhibit these characteristics still display them and have displayed them for thousands of years with no outside influence other than the will to survive.

The problem is that aggressiveness, the good trait associated with all, becomes violence, the bad trait associated with men. Feminists love associating bad things with men, especially when those bad things affect women. Violence in general is something feminists will blame solely on men. Why? Because the majority of violent crimes committed around the world are committed by men. However, point out the fact that the majority of people who protect others from criminals are also men and that fact just shoots over a feminist's head and flies out the window.

Think about it for a minute. One of these two characteristics, protectiveness and violence, used to be celebrated as a masculine trait and the other viewed as a shortcoming of the human species. Today people are taught, in schools no less, by feminists, that violence is masculine and protectiveness is a human trait.

I've got no problem with people wanting to ignore the fact that every civilization on the planet is defended by men. However, I take issue with feminists claiming that violence is a masculine trait. Note that I understand men use violence to protect others but that is not the type of violence feminists are referring to. They are talking about random and sadistic violence. They are talking about men who beat their wives and children simply because they can. Feminists put out commercials on national television, calling them "public service announcements", which depict men beating women for spilling coffee and claim this scenario to be the norm for everyday families.

Fucking spilt coffee.

That is what feminists claim is masculinity. This is what they claim young boys are being taught in our culture by men who uphold the "patriarchy". While there are some feminists too blinded by their hatred of men to see that violence is something both genders exhibit, a lot of feminists do realize this fact. However, this is where the straight path to common sense wraps around forming the hamster wheel. Feminists feel that sense it is mostly men whom enact violent crimes that violence is a part of masculinity and therefore must be destroyed. They use this backwards logic to justify their campaign to "fix" young boys so they don't grow up to be violent men.

So pathetic the feminist mind is…

To claim that violence is a part of masculinity simply because men commit the majority of violent crimes is the same thing as claiming that being protective is a part of masculinity simply because the majority of people that defend societies are men. A simple way to get around associating a good characteristic and a bad characteristic with the same word is to assign a different word for the bad characteristic. Thankfully, society has already given the bad characteristic a word.

FUCKING CRIMINAL.

Feminists propagate that the only way to reduce the number of violent men is to teach young boys to respect women. There is no advocating for girls to be taught that violence is wrong from feminists because according to feminist teachings, violence is a masculine trait.

You see what they did? The obviousness of what they did is only painfully mindboggling because of the fact that it worked. “Male violence” and measures to prevent it are the activities of college courses. “Toxic masculinity” is what is associated with men now. Feminists claim that men are violent because of the desire men have to live up to the societal view of what is masculine. They say that men fear being viewed as less of a man if they do not conform to “toxic masculinity”.

That’s bullshit.

A man cannot be less of a man. A man is a mammal. Man is a word used to describe the physical features of one half of the human species on the inside and the outside. So no matter what a man does socially or if he goes and has his penis cut off it doesn’t matter. A man is a man is a man.

“Toxic masculinity” is a term used by feminists in an attempt to destroy masculinity. Feminists do not want societies to recognize the fact that the characteristics associated with masculinity are predominantly male. They do not want men to be celebrated for their many contributions to civilization throughout history. Instead they want men to be viewed as violent and dangerous animals that only feminism can “fix”.

I for one, see through the lies feminism has put forth. The sad thing is most people don’t. For fucks sake this trash is in our schools. One of the saddest facts of life today is that men go to school and are taught that there is something wrong with them and virtually no one save a very small percentage of the population says anything about it.

It’s time to speak up.

What makes a man, a man?

Nothing.

What makes a man masculine?

You decide.

Kane Law & GALDEF’s Equal Protection Project: Litigation to Protect all Children from Mutilation

October 14, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The feminist view from a comfortable armchair.

October 16, 2023 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

We have all been armchair critics at some stage. We have passed judgement on another person's behaviour in a particular situation or environment without ever having been in a similar situation or had our values or morality tested in the searing heat of a life and death moment. Sometimes such judgement is perfectly understandable and legitimate. More frequently it is hasty, ill considered and ignorant.

You might hear someone say for example "all of the hostages should have just rushed the gunman" as they drink their morning cuppa and peruse the newspaper. If you are a thoughtful person you would have an instinctive gut reaction to such an easy, throw -away line. You may even call this would -be hero out and ask him or her how they know what they would have done in similar circumstances.

But there is another far more damaging form of armchair critic and they have been sitting back passing vicious, vitriolic, judgement upon a whole gender for decades without ever having walked even a few yards, let alone a mile in their shoes.

One of the first ports of call for any feminist who wants to shut down a discussion about violence or any form of gender equity is to bring up the subject of war. We have all heard the same mantra repeated again and again. Men start all wars. Men do all the killing and raping. If some innocent men get killed in war, blame other men.

The women who speak these words with smug satisfaction almost visibly swell with self righteous moral superiority before your eyes as they say them.

It brings to mind a wonderful quote from a New Zealand cartoonist, Murray Ball who wrote one of the first "anti-feminist "books, in the early nineties, titled The Sisterhood. This wonderful, brave book featured many brilliant cartoons accompanied by some powerful captions and text questioning many aspects of radical feminism.

Murray wrote:

It is foolish to praise a toothless tiger for not biting.

For me, this says so much about feminism in such a simple and concise manner.

I have just finished reading a book on Australia's participation in the killing fields in World War One. It was filled with eyewitness accounts of the butchery that went on and I shed tears on more than one occasion as I read them.

Young boys had their best mate's brains blown all over them as they stood side by side in trenches filled with mud, lice and rotting bodies. Charles Bean, the Australian War Correspondent who had unprecedented access to the frontlines spoke of the horrors of the constant shelling the boys were subjected to and how the nerve of even the bravest men snapped under such horrific pressure.

Bean wrote:

They have to stay there while shell after shell descends with a shriek close beside them.

Each one an acute mental torture-each shrieking, tearing crash bringing a promise to each man-instantaneous-I will tear you into ghastly wounds-I will rend your flesh and pulp your arm or leg-fling you, half a gaping, quivering man and like those that you see smashed around you one by one to lie there rotting and blackening……Every man in the trench has that instant fear thrust upon his shoulders-I don't care how brave he is-with a crash that is a physical pain and a strain to withstand.

This could go on for days at a time.

Why this little reminder of the hell endured by men in war?

It's only by having some form of understanding of what confronts a soldier when he enters a war zone and the effect it can have upon his psychological state that we can begin to understand the atrocities committed in war. We have all said and done things in a heated, adrenaline fueled moment of anger or frustration. Is it too hard to imagine the fear, adrenaline and rage pulsing through your body in a life and death encounter with the enemy?

I heard someone comment on the atrocities committed by American soldiers in the Vietnam War and I had to interrupt the condemnation of those men involved in massacres of civilian women and children. Such actions were appalling, horrific and barbaric. Surely these same words could be used to describe any war. Isn't war-even a justified war, an horrific event filled with inevitably horrendous violence and barbaric behavior? Atrocities cannot be condoned or ignored, but before anyone points an accusatory finger perhaps they need to pause and consider what most of these men had endured.

They had seen their mates, their close friends torn apart by cunningly set traps. Young children had entered their camps and were greeted with affection and smiles before they detonated bombs and blew these unsuspecting soldiers into tiny pieces. These men lived on a knife's edge that seems particularly keen in jungle warfare. They were exhausted, highly anxious, angry, and often high on drugs and trained to kill. In this state they carried out shocking massacres.

Many of these young men were conscripts from Australia and America. A simple matter of luck decided whether you received the call up via your letterbox. A brief walk to that box changed the lives of many young men forever. If you refused to go and fight you faced imprisonment unless you had compelling reasons for your refusal. Telling the board you didn't want to die or be maimed or butcher other people wasn't considered a reasonable excuse.

So young men often boys of 18 and 19, were sent away to fight in jungles and experience violence and horror that would permanently scar them. Yet on their return they were branded baby killers and monsters by a large section of the population in their home countries.

Who were these young men? They were unique individuals who had a life at home-perhaps a baker, lawyer, teacher, poet, artist, farmer or labourer. They had family and friends who they loved and were loved by in return. They were not monsters with an insatiable bloodlust, yet some of these young men would commit horrific acts of violence upon other human beings.

The very nature of war demands that a soldier leaves behind the innate empathy most people feel for the suffering of their fellow man. The army constantly reinforces the powerful message that it is kill or be killed-and that message is sadly true in the theatre of war. It is this attitude which saw the allies ultimately win two world wars-something we have all benefited from to this very day. Yes, the very women who sit in judgement on men who go to war are beneficiaries of the actions carried out by these trained killers.

Think about the young men you know in any social setting be it school, the local footy team, choir or just mates who gather for a regular drink at the pub. You know these people are good hearted human beings with the occasional exception-an exception to be found in a group of either gender. These are the men who would be shipped off to World War Three should it break out. These good blokes would witness atrocities and commit them.

As would any group of young women trained and shipped off to fight a foreign foe.

If one day, in a world we can only dream about, women and only women were conscripted to war would we see the same savagery as we see in war today?

What is a human being to do when they are forced, against their will into a combat zone? It is kill or be killed. You begin to lose dear friends, sometimes having their brains and intestines blown all over your own face and body. You are terrified for much of the time and exhausted, physically and mentally fatigued. You want to avenge the death of your friend who was turned to pulp before your eyes. The hatred and anger builds and when an opportunity presents itself, you grab it-with relish.

Of course we would hear of massacres and atrocities. These women would be trained to be ruthless killing machines just as the boys once were. We all know already how brutal some women can be in their own homes let alone a war zone.

Let’s continue this little excursion into an alternate universe.

The men back home could pass moral judgement upon every action or inaction by these female soldiers with impunity. We could condemn all women as being blood lusting monsters if given half a chance. We would do this knowing full well these women were given no choice but to go to war and were eagerly cheered on by the same men who now point a finger of condemnation at them.

That is the deliciously comfortable position held by all women in our western civilizations. Tutting and headshaking as you sip your latte with the girls.

We know that most mothers who see their children harmed would happily visit horrendous bodily harm upon the perpetrator. Such a violent response from mothers in response to the harming of a loved one is praised and held up as a shining example of the protective, powerful, passionate love a woman feels for her child-the lioness protecting her cubs. There would (rightly) be no condemnation of the violence she visited upon the target of her wrath.

Somehow this same understanding is not applied to men in war.

The same principle applies to the gender bigotry in operation in our Family Law Courts.

We are often confronted with the devastating stories of fathers who snap after years of torment at the hands of what is meant to be a system which operates under the guise of justice for all.

Imagine if in a parallel universe it was men who were granted full custody of the children after a divorce and full control over when and if the mother can see her own flesh and blood. Would we not see a clear pattern evolve? Is it so difficult to imagine the acts of retribution that would be carried out by enraged, frustrated, jilted mothers? We have seen how some women behave when a man ends their relationship-clothes are burned, cars scratched and dented and physical abuse is common-slaps and face scratching are often a feature of those final moments together.

What of a mother deprived of her children whilst being forced to pay for their upbringing? Suddenly mothers are threatening judges, ex husbands and seeking outlets for their understandable fury. We would have a very different narrative in such a world.

Sadly there is no universe where this theory can be tested.

Men are living this injustice on a daily basis and no –one gives a damn. Fathers are branded ”angry” as though that says all that needs to be said on the issue. No-one has the courage to ask why they are angry or turning to violence and threats. They are simply the moral inferiors of women. They consider them to be no more than little boys hiding in a man’s body, having a tantrum because they can’t get what they want. Some fools would suggest giving reasons for their anger and sometimes violent behaviour is the same as excusing it.

Any person of average intelligence would see what a ridiculous notion this is. How can any issue be resolved or prevented if we do not attempt to understand the events leading up to it? This seems a perfectly reasonable attitude when applied to road accidents, accidental deaths or injury in the workplace or any number of every- day occurrences under investigation. Sadly, when applied to instances of male violence against women it is considered a form of victim blaming.

Female violence however, is always explained away as a result of forces outside of the woman’s control. She was post natal, hormonal, menopausal, addicted, controlled, abused, exhausted; overwhelmed…..it was a cry for help.

Male violence is inexcusable and a result of his masculinity.

If a man dares to offer his opinion on abortion, menstruation, pregnancy or menopause he is quickly told to shut his cake –hole before it gets shut for him.

The feminist response is always:

“What would a man know about such things? How dare he offer an opinion on something he has never experienced!

This is not spoken in jest-if you doubt my word, attend a pro –abortion rally next time one hits town and offer a contrary view or perhaps you could pull aside a co-worker who is struggling with her heavy periods and give her some advice.

Yet women feel justified in passing judgement on men for behaviors and actions performed in circumstances they have never experienced and they have absolutely no comprehension of the physiological and psychological strain men feel in these situations. Nor do most men. This is why most war vets simply refuse to talk about their experiences with anyone other than fellow veterans.

My sister told me about a female friend of hers who was given a course of testosterone for a medical ailment. Her libido went through the roof and she said she would never again judge a man after getting a brief glimpse into the world of the male sex drive.

If only the feminists who attack male behavior in time of war or when they are treated as subhuman ATM's by the legal system could be provided with their own brief insight into a man's world in the form of a small dose of testosterone and a two year stint on the frontlines in a war.

http://listverse.com/2012/10/30/10-female-concentration-camp-guards/

http://www.theatlantic.com/international/archive/2012/12/a-wife-accused-of-war-crimes-the-unprecedented-case-of-simone-gbagbo/265828/

http://www.telegraph.co.uk/history/11213702/Can-women-kill-like-men-Meet-the-all-female-front-lines.html

http://www.mirror.co.uk/news/uk-news/nazi-she-devils-566055

http://www.wonderslist.com/10-most-evil-women-in-the-history/

http://learnwomen.com/rejection-often-leads-to-revenge

Protect our little boys too

October 17, 2023 | by Gary Costanza | Link | Original Link

The world seems to ignore and deny the pain and humanity of males from the moment of birth to adulthood: circumcision, suicide, forced military service, etc.

A man talks about his experience being raped by a female when he was nine and the ensuing reaction of an indifferent world.

Children need their fathers

October 18, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

We suppose radical “gender is a social construct” ideologues will explode in rage at the use of “masculine” and “feminine” here, and Social Justice Warriors will fly into a rage at the whole idea that fathers are necessary to children’s well-being.

Are Men Ok? | Peter Boghossian & Nina Power

October 19, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

De-constructing sentiment 1: The Empathy Gap

October 21, 2023 | by Nat Godot | Link | Original Link

Many men blame feminists for the fact that they feel marooned in the tidal movement of social change. But this is misplaced blame. Because their problems started much earlier than the birth of feminism. After all, feminism is a relatively new phenomenon. So there has to be something else at work in the background that has been causing hurt to men.

Actually, the reason why so many feminist ideas have gained such prominence has less to do with logic and truth than it does with sentiment. There is after all a disparity of sentiment between the genders which overwhelms factual evidence and undermines logical argument. The problem is that feminists did not invent this disparity. As Prof. Janice Fiamengo says, “Feminism didn’t create this asymmetrical concern out of nothing. It was already there in the DNA of our culture.” Feminists have certainly worked hard at amplifying it, and they have done so with the cooperation of important social agencies. But the truth is that it existed long before feminism.

Therefore the whole effort about men engaging in dialogue with feminists is flawed unless men understand the powers women possess, how they use those powers, and for what purpose. The dogmas of feminism are after all ultimately rooted in more general female attitudes that view relationships with males in terms of their value. This simple observable fact, coupled with the biological supremacy of females, normalises behaviours and attitudes towards men which would be considered farcical and unacceptable in any other context.

As far as the wider body of women goes though, they are getting a free ride. They may feign to keep their distance from the more extreme semantics of feminist rhetoric, and they may feign to excuse individual men. But they are complicit by their knowing silence, and they will continue that silence for so long as they see some material advantage in it. However, as soon as their expectations of material advantage start to be threatened, those women will be the ones to expose the self-interest and personal biases of their own presumptive leaders.

So it is a matter of the utmost importance to take a critical look at the disparity of sentiment between the genders. I have to start out though by first acknowledging the fundamental fact that babies are imprinted emotionally and psychologically through intimate contact with their mothers from the earliest moments of their lives, and throughout their most important formative experiences, with the presumption of female virtue and innocence. This presumption then becomes the bedrock for many of the illusions that benefit women exclusively. In particular, opening the door for what some writers describe as the ’empathy gap’ between the genders.[1]

One of the ironies regarding this issue is that even though the myths engendered by the presumption of female innocence require constant feeding, its own continued existence depends on obscurity. Therefore it requires some practice to follow. Nonetheless, there are signs to read, and it is worth the effort.

Jane Austen offers us some insight in her book Pride and Prejudice.[2] This book is widely acclaimed by women as 'inspiring' literature, and we underestimate the coded meaning of such words at our peril. In fact there are very good reasons why so many women describe this work of romantic fiction in such a strange way. Because its whole narrative is about nothing more and nothing less than social climbing. In this context, Austen uses the hero (Darcy) to issue an important caution to women when he says,

> "..there is a meanness in all the arts which ladies sometimes condescend to employ for captivation. Whatever bears affinity to cunning is despicable."

By this warning therefore the author impresses on her readers how vital the appearance of innocence is to courtship. We can understand the necessity of this warning more clearly if we remember that the problems faced by rich people in Austen's time are perennial problems faced by rich people even today. And one of the biggest of these problems is for them to know which person to trust when so many want to be their friend. Therefore Austen's warning to women is that if you want to go up the social ladder, you have to maintain the appearance of sincerity. So this is the point about the presumption of innocence. It creates an atmosphere in which people can be easily manipulated and exploited.

The author further elaborates her point in the words of one of the sub-heroines. Her name is Charlotte, and it is this character who comments on the initial dislike of the main heroine Elizabeth, for the hero, Darcy. For the purposes of romantic and literary trickery Darcy must eventually win the approval of the heroine. But at the early stage of the story, Elizabeth is still not convinced. So Charlotte says, "…all her friend's dislike would vanish if she (Elizabeth) could suppose him to be in her power."[2]

This statement is one of those pivotal messages that explains a great deal about why this story is so admired by women. Because it suggests to its readers that a woman may forgive a man's faults if it is to her benefit, and for the same reason, create an impression that he needs to be forgiven, even when he does not. Besides that, it reveals how the presumption of innocence bestows power. Because Austen's heroine could not conceivably exercise power over the hero if he did not presume her to be innocent.

So by following the footsteps that Austen lays out for her like-minded readers, we can observe that this presumption of innocence lies at the heart of female power, and of female deception. In this context then, it becomes both natural and inevitable that so many women should work so hard to monopolise the perception of victim-hood.

By this stage now I imagine that some of you are looking for something to contradict. But please don't waste your time contradicting me. It would be better if you direct your energies instead to the BBC. Because in 2004 the BBC[3] arranged a survey of sorts to find out what books women found to be most inspiring. The Women's Hour programme invited listeners to find the "top 10 novels that have changed the way we see women." Programme listeners were asked to choose a life-changing book that "has spoken to you on a personal level – it may have changed the way you look at yourself or simply made you happy to be a woman." And the winner by many thousands of votes was Austen's book, Pride and Prejudice.

Doctor Lisa Jardine was chosen to lead this project, which was called Women's Watershed Fiction, and she explained during her promotional interview with The Sunday Times that "women think deeply and strategically about forming relationships, whereas men don't think about it much at all." And then she added helpfully that, "…men could learn a lot from the books."[4]

So there you have it, unintentionally one must presume, from a leading feminist historian. She said that, when it comes to relationships, women are strategic thinkers, and they are inspired by books like Pride and Prejudice. But what is it about this book, one should ask, or indeed any of the others that made the top 10 list that would make them appeal to the instincts of strategic thinkers? Well, the answer to that question becomes abundantly clear when we view Pride and Prejudice as a continuation of the princess stories. Think about it. What is the difference between Pride and Prejudice, and the earlier princess stories like Sleeping Beauty, Cinderella, Snow White, and Rapunzel? Actually, the answer is, not much. Because they all pursue a common theme of social climbing for girls.

There are of course some strategic differences. Because the earlier princess stories appeared, at least on the surface, to speak about the dreams of little girls. But Austen translated these childhood dreams in to the fantasies of adult women. She did away with the prince and his castle and kingdom. But she replaced them with a very wealthy aristocrat. She also disposed of the beautiful girl idea in favour of a grown up woman whose claim to attention and admiration rested on her wit. So from the point of view of strategic thinkers, Pride and Prejudice makes the justification and the rewards of the princess stories accessible to a wider range of women.

In fact this underlying trail of literary evidence begins at least from the medieval princess stories, then wends its way through the Georgian and Victorian parlour aspirations of writers like Austen and Bronte, and on in to some very modern tales of romance. So it is not a vague and accidental whim, nor even an astrological coincidence. However, it is demonstrably a very old strategy, and it is a strategy that depends entirely on the myth of female innocence for its efficacy.

This pattern of self-interest in the words and behaviour of women is revealing even when we allow it to stand alone, but it starts to acquire a more self-conscious complexion when we juxtapose it with the trail of story telling that has guided the footsteps of young boys throughout the same period. Because, in contrast to the succession of princess stories for little girls, little boys received their lessons in self awareness from stories like The Boy Who Cried Wolf, The Emperor with no Clothes, and The Adventures of Pinocchio.

By contrast with the princess stories, these stories offer no material reward to their heroes. Indeed, the experience of love enjoyed by the heroines of the princess stories is confirmed by the fact that they are freed forever from a life of poverty. But Pinocchio's experience of love is the love of his father, which he has to express by working hard so that he can take care of him in his old age. The purely adult interest that fosters this idea is made clear when the good fairy finally concedes to grant the wish of Pinocchio[5] to be a real boy. She says, “In reward for your kind heart, I forgive you for all your old mischief. Boys who love and take care of their parents when they are old and sick deserve praise even though they may not be held up as models of obedience and good behaviour.”

Unlike the princess stories therefore, there is no sympathy, nor admiration, nor even material reward to be found here. Even at the final moment when young boys might anticipate a happy ending, their minds are drip fed with grudging praise that they realise when they get older is no praise at all. The modern film version of Pinocchio omitted some of the moral hectoring contained in the original. But it compensated for that by introducing the idea that Pinnochio’s nose would grow longer when he told a lie, thereby including something from ‘The Boy Who Cried Wolf.’ It should hardly come as any kind of surprise therefore that the myth of female innocence, and its converse argument about males is so deeply entrenched in modern culture. Of course it does not explain everything about how these myths are propagated, but it gives a good indication of the driving forces behind them.

These stories collectively don’t have any single origin or author, but they do collectively sort themselves in a pattern that conforms with female self-interest in a truly creepy way that is impossible to dismiss as coincidence. So this is where we find the motive that causes so many women to be so eager to denigrate men. It does have something to do with feminism, but it is in truth considerably older than the ‘newspeak’ of feminism.

It is therefore an inadequate response to address ourselves exclusively to the distortions of feminists, expecting that if only we could convince them to consider real evidence then we might somehow reach a common and logical understanding. The problem is that the behaviours which feminists exhibit are simply a modern iteration of an older and broader habit which will probably outlive feminism.

So it becomes obvious when we think about the princess stories that they play with our capacity for sympathy. That is not to say that they play with all of us equally, or in quite the same way. Because these stories heighten the capacity for sympathy in males, and heighten the expectation of sympathy in females.

The problem is, that when that sympathy is given, both males and females infer that justice is being done. But this perception of justice is not confined to feminists, nor is it limited to the larger constituency of women. Because it is also a perception indulged with just as much enthusiasm by an equal number of men. In other words, it uncovers a much wider existential problem that we could follow in to some very modern interpretations of justice. But I won’t go there right now. Except to acknowledge how often it happens that even when people think they are talking about justice, in fact they are being influenced by sentiment.

As time has passed, generations of women have accumulated these expectations of sympathy, and generations of men have been anaesthetised to the pain its absence causes them. Eventually the agents of commercial propaganda got involved, and for the purposes of seducing women, they magnified this disparity, and turned sympathy in to a commodity. Men can therefore haggle as much as they like with feminists, but advertisers welcome these arguments as a distraction from their own strategies. So they can continue to whisper ‘because you deserve it’ in the ears of a much wider female population, knowing that many of their listeners will translate those words as meaning ‘because he owes me.’

Another irony is that this propaganda is played out in the sly knowledge that men in general have an abundant capacity for the very thing that they are accused of lacking. Namely, sympathy. So it is a very narrow outlook to think only about the ascendancy of feminist semantics. Because one day it can be religion, and the day after that politics, and the day after that, as we have seen, it can be nouveau affections of social justice. The fact is that we are vulnerable to them all for so long as we fail to bring the manipulation of sentiment in to the light of day. This especially requires a new awakening in the consciousness of men, going beyond any consideration of their own presumptions about manliness.

In fact the manipulation of sentiment is a systemic problem in modern society. Which is not to say that it never happened before, but simply that the technologies that we have developed in the last century make it possible to mass produce and broadcast sentiment in ways that were never possible before now. This presents new challenges, because the manipulation of public sentiment is pertinent to the resolution of many critical issues, such as social equity, rational political governance, the volatility of stock markets, and so on.

The particular problem as far as men are concerned though is that the technologies and organisations that mass produce sentiment are under the influence of the propaganda agents of the consumer society, and those agents have established an exclusive alliance with women. The particular problem as far as women are concerned is that this alliance requires them to adopt behaviours that are costly to maintain and which are damaging to their well-being, and to the well-being of those around them.

I will discuss these issues in another post. But for the present, let me conclude by pointing out that sometime in the future men may have reason to look back on the historical ascendancy of feminism with some gratitude. Because it is attracting more realistic attention to the powers women exert through the use of sentiment, and how these same powers are used by other agencies.

References:

[1] Equality for Men by Glen Poole
[2] Pride and Prejudice by Jane Austen; 1813
[3] Orange Prize for Fiction: Women’s Watershed Fiction Long list announced, 2004
[4] Joyless Sex? A Great Read for Women, The Sunday Times, John Elliott 2004
[5] The Adventures of Pinocchio by Carlo Collodi, 1883

The feature is image from Wikimedia Commons and is licenced under CC-BY-SA 2.0.

De-constructing Sentiment 2: Female Power

October 22, 2023 | by Nat Godot | Link | Original Link

It is believed that a 19th century playwright was the first person to write that "the pen is mightier than the sword,"[1] and that adage is probably more relevant now than ever before. Because in this modern age of false words he could just as easily have said 'the pen is mightier than the truth.' The 'might' he makes reference to after all is the very real power wielded by people who succeed in owning the meaning and use of words.

So it is very pertinent to the way that feminists have usurped their own cause. Which means that when we take on the burden of contradicting the dogmas of modern feminism we need to take back the meaning of words, and one of those words is power.

Feminists like to talk about power, but only to say that men have power and women do not. Or to say that men abuse power and women do not. But they make little or no acknowledgement of the powers owned by women to imprint newly born minds with responses that will benefit themselves, to reinforce those responses throughout the most vulnerable years of that young life, and then to call on those responses when it is beneficial for them to do so. Although many men feel themselves to be immune from those requests, the truth is that many of them who feel that way still allow their resolve to crumble when faced with a woman exhibiting or feigning distress.

So there is a form of power granted by nature which is enjoyed exclusively by women, and we need to shine more light on it. In order to understand this a little better let's first look at a female power that is not human, and the peacock provides a good example. Although the word 'peacock' is sometimes used as a derogatory term to describe men who overdress, this is somewhat unfair. Because the extravagance of the peacock's plumage is not their own choice, it is determined solely by the preference of the females of the species. Therefore the day to day appearance masks the real power that shapes the relationship between them. And when we use that relationship as a model to understand gender power, we realise that the grand appearance of the peacock is not a demonstration of power, but evidence rather of powerlessness.

It is therefore a very significant anomaly of nature that in the human species it is the females that adopt extravagant plumage, and who suppress any inclination of males to compete with them. The actress and model Jacqueline Fernandez explains it like this. "Vanity is a women's prerogative, and it should stay that way."[2] Meaning that the pursuit of attention and admiration causes human females to reverse an established pattern of nature. Which is an anomaly that we take for granted, and a power we underestimate.

Popular scientific opinion/myth suggests that females only exercise their powers to benefit their children. But the plumage of the peacock demonstrates that feminine power is a force of nature, and that it can be eccentric and self-serving. We often hear men being lectured about expressing their feelings. But our society is no more willing to allow men to speak about their feelings than it would be to allow the peacock to contradict the peahen. Why is that you may well ask? It is because the peacock would say to the peahen, ‘you are not doing this for the sake of the children’.

So the enforcement of female choice is indicative of a power that shapes our cultural perception of what is good and what is bad. This may sound obscure and inconsequential, but the distortions contained in such perceptions are intrinsic to our social discourse, and they have a calculated purpose which can be explained by understanding the relationship between sentiment and power.

We tend to underestimate the power of sentiment, but organisations that wield power do not. Governments and corporations and advertisers and broadcasters compete fiercely with each other to influence the sentiments of large groups of people. They employ the very best and most well trained experts and psychologists to help them for that purpose, and are prepared to spend vast sums of money to achieve their ends.

In this respect, the stakes have been raised by the ongoing efforts to globalise the consumer economy. Meaning that the manipulation of consumer sentiment has now become an industry. But this also creates an opportunity of sorts. Because the illusions of sentiment depend a lot on obscurity, so there is a certain danger in repeating them too often. We may therefore even have something to be grateful for. Because the flood of contrived sentiment that pours out of modern media channels makes it possible to observe more clearly methods and patterns of behaviour that previously defied analysis.

Take sympathy for example. In the eyes of many people it would hardly appear significant, and yet when we open our eyes to it we discover that it saturates daily life. But even though there are times when we should show sympathy towards someone we love, there is never a time when we are obliged to love someone for whom we feel sympathy. So even though sympathy is less obvious a feeling than love, its reach is longer.

Therefore if our capacity for sympathy is addressed in the right way, we can be induced to do things for people that we don’t even know. In what way this might be useful to others is not always obvious, and yet those organisations that broadcast news and entertainment, by whatever medium, compete vigorously to influence the sympathies of their audience. So even though it appears to be such an imprecise feeling, sympathy is measured with great accuracy by people who have learned the value of it.

In order to demonstrate that sympathy is no childish or accidental sentiment bear with me for a short review of Ryan’s Daughter[3]. This is an Oscar winning film released in 1970 that was directed by David Lean. The story is essentially about two men and one woman. They live in a small town in the West of Ireland in the year 1916 when British military forces still occupied the country, and their relations with the local population were very tense. The heroine is a native of the small village and the daughter of one of its few prosperous citizens. She marries the local school teacher and shortly afterwards becomes bored with him. Then she meets the commanding officer of the nearby British military garrison and begins a sexual relationship with him, and the resulting sex scenes became a significant feature of what is commonly described as a ‘tragic love story.’

The sympathy of the audience for the heroine is carefully preserved by meticulous adjustment of the two male characters with whom she is involved. For this purpose, her husband is portrayed as boring and insensitive to her need for passionate love (or sex), which appears to justify her later behaviour. Meanwhile her lover is afflicted with a severe limp, and he also suffers from psychological trauma, both of which were caused by his war experiences on mainland Europe. So on the one hand her husband is excluded from sympathy because of his insensitivity to her 'needs', and on the other, the sympathy we feel for the heroine is not tainted by any dislike of her lover. Nonetheless their affair is exposed in the end to the local community who have no tolerance for locals who consort with British soldiers. So the pair are forced apart, and the soldier lover commits suicide.

The question is then, what would happen to the sympathy of the audience if we reverse the roles? We would have a story about an unemployed man who married a hard working school teacher and became bored with her because she was no good in bed. So he then starts a sexual relationship with a woman who is physically crippled and suffering from psychological problems. When this lonely and vulnerable woman then commits suicide the damnation of our hero would be complete, and no interpretation of artistic licence would excuse the film maker from talk of malice, or lurking dangerous attitudes towards women. Certainly there would be no talk of Oscar prizes.

Therefore when we watch this film from one point of view it appears like romance, but when we turn the story around, it becomes a depressing tale that would surely be condemned. Which means that film makers are not free to express any new idea for the sake of art. Because it is the formula by which the value of sympathy is calculated that makes it possible for them to portray violence against women, but not criticism of them. Actually their survival as artists depends very much on their willingness to conform to the rules by which the social taboos and monopolies on sentiment are maintained.

Nor is the value of sentiment confined to junk romance. Indeed, experts tell us that the equity and financial markets are driven by sentiment. So if even the value of stocks can be influenced by sentiment, then it stands to reason that people who learn to estimate their relationships in terms of value will also naturally develop an acute awareness of sentiment. Becoming alert to words and deeds that may indicate any change in the state of sentiments they have taken some trouble to cultivate.

When we speak of 'value' in the context of human behaviour therefore, it is not money that is the currency, it is sentiment. Money and gold and property of various kinds have a value that can be counted, and they do exercise a powerful influence, but they must be earned, inherited, or stolen. On the other hand, sentiment can be minted, and when it is properly crafted, it can be used to obtain material value. In this context then, the strategy of making other people feel sympathetic or indebted becomes both a business enterprise, and an abuse of power.

Of course the misuse of any power comes at a price. Take for example the well known fact that the display of anxiety or fear attracts attention and sympathy. So people who discover that sympathy has value are also discovering incentives to be anxious. But judging by what we see in the public media, sympathy is as much a female prerogative as vanity. Therefore it becomes possible to predict an imbalance in the levels of anxiety between males and females that corresponds with that imbalance. And indeed, the incidence of phobia (an extreme form of anxiety) is known to be at least twice as high in females[4] as it is in males. But that ratio rises to 3/1 for individuals with multiple phobias and 4/1 for phobias relating to animals.

And yet, in spite of being bombarded by so much of it, we appear to be largely ignorant not only of how sentiment is manipulated, but even of what it is. Which should not be surprising, since nothing about sentiment is obvious, except for what we are encouraged to notice. Think about encouragement for instance. On the face of it this is not a sentiment. In fact we need encouragement as children and depend on it for our learning and development. But we are supposed to reduce our dependence on it as we mature. When we don't, our belated need for it prevents that maturity from reaching its full potential and reflects itself in the mirror of our personalities as a desire for attention and admiration. Which, as it happens, is magnified disproportionately in the affectations and sentimental behaviours of women.

No doubt many people will object that men have this need too, and that is certainly true. But all of these arguments are about degrees and proportions. So if we take the distribution of high street retail space as a barometer, then we have to conclude that women have this need more than men by a very significant factor. This observation is also supported by figures for credit card spending in the UK[5] which indicate that in the year 2016 the ratio of female vs male spending on personal items was 4.5/1 on the high street, and rose to 7/1 for online shopping.

These differences present a whole range of problems. But there is one in particular that has reached epidemic proportions. Because what comes naturally for the child becomes more complicated for the adult. Meaning that we give attention admiration and sympathy to children without any need for justification. But adults who want to keep these things with them after childhood must increasingly find ways to justify them, and this need can exercise a powerful influence on their behaviour and relationships. The problem is though that the dripping need for justification creates a tendency towards exaggerated feelings and complicated accusations. Thus we arrive at the modern epidemic of accusing behaviour driven disproportionately by women, and egged on by the agents of consumer propaganda who seek to manipulate women by flattering and indulging them.

Overall then, when we step back and observe the patterns of sentiment and behaviour, we can recognise how much the mechanisms of power depend on them. The fact that women in general appear to be so proficient in the use of these mechanisms is not however to be taken as proof that women have superior moral insight or emotional intelligence which men lack. It is rather that women have a material motive that men do not, and that they have at least three advantages. The first is their biological power to suppress anything that might be disadvantageous to them, a power that translates itself in the minds of men as fear. The second is their ability to imprint the minds of children with responses that are primarily advantageous to them. And the third is their close alliance with the agents who manipulate consumer sentiment. And I haven't even mentioned sex.

Actually the issues I have mentioned here are only part of a spectrum of powers available to women which deserve consideration. But space does not allow, so I will come back to them another time. Nonetheless, it should be obvious even from this cursory look at the close rapport between sentiment and power that the image of pristine vulnerability which feminists have built in to their vocabulary for and about women is false. It is not that men do not possess power, or that men do not abuse power. They do that indeed. But they are not alone.

Now bear with me one more time please for a short digression. I noticed from comments to my previous article that there was some concern as to whether I understood gynocentrism or not. So in order to save good people from wasting their precious time, let me clarify the point, yes I understand. But I am reasonably convinced that pushing back directly against the monster will be a monumental task that will probably take a long time, and will only succeed to the degree that a lot more people get involved. Likewise feminism is locked on to the same driving forces that give life to gynocentrism, so I suspect that the struggle against feminism will also be long and acrimonious.

In the meantime, I ask myself, is there something I can do that will help the cause to gain traction? And everybody has their own answer to that question. In my case I take an oblique approach to the problem. Think of it like this. How do you convince a burglar not to break in to your house? You can plead all you like, and the burglar can give whatever assurances you might want to hear. But in the end the police will tell you to take away the ladder the crowbar and the flash light. So for me this is a matter of personal interest rather than alternative paradigm. I want to remove the tools, or at least make them harder to use. I hope that approach will become more clear as I work my way forward, and that it will prove useful to some small degree. But it is not meant to distract from the great work already done.

References:

1. http://www.bbc.com/news/magazine-30729480
2. http://www.bolegaindia.com/gossips/Jacqueline_Fernandez_shares_her_views_on_stereotypical_men-gid-11605-gc-6.html
3. http://www.imdb.com/title/tt0066319/?ref_=nv_sr_1
4. http://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/pii/0005796795000483
5. http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-3753812/Women-spend-7billion-year-clothes-shoes.html

The Goal Post Episode 27 – India, Australia, Israel

October 24, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Abortion extortion

October 25, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Whoever said women aren't as creative as men has never met these women finding new and uh, creative, ways to steal men's money.

Shivanthi Sathanandan changes her tune after being assaulted

October 26, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Shivanthi Sathanandan, an official in the Minnesota Democratic–Farmer–Labor Party, has previously advocated for defunding and dismantling the Minneapolis Police Department. She’s now praising them.

We’re very sorry to hear that her small children had to witness their mother being assaulted.

Food? For thee but not for me.

October 27, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The World Food Program (WFP) is a branch of the United Nations. It ostensibly exists to distribute food to those in need to address hunger and food security. Their mandate would suggest that they would be compelled by the UN and the world community to distribute food in a non-discriminatory way – but this is not so. The WFP routinely discriminates in the manner in which it distributes food. The WFP is so proud of this that they announce it on their website. Even many MRAs may be shocked to discover that the WFP only distributes food to women:

> "It is our methodology to distribute only to women to ensure that food gets to women and children in Haiti," she said. "Every time we have not had adequate security escorts, we have had riots at food sites."

The news article headline on the WFP website (now deleted) proudly announces that they prioritize food distribution to women, but the text of the article makes it clear that only women will have food distributed to them. The kindest possible interpretation of the headline is that staff at the WFP don't understand the meaning of the world 'prioritize' since this is clearly not consistent with the text of the news article.

The expectation is that these women would then distribute the food to their entire family – even the men and boys. There are unfortunately several issues with this approach.

Distributing food only to women would seem to leave families without women (such as those that had lost female family members during natural disasters) out in the cold, and hungry. The WFP has previously claimed that special provision is made for families that do not include women. It seems difficult to believe that in the chaotic environment that the WFP would generally need to operate in (following natural disasters for example) that their staff would have the resources to safely investigate the claims of men that they have no women in their family.

We can see similar policies from the American Red Cross. Advocates for the LGBT community have specifically raised this as a risk that gay men face following disasters:

> However, these men still needed a woman in order to actually benefit from distribution, because the Red Cross policy only allowed women to stand in line and present the ration cards for aid.

This is not theoretical as various organizations advocating for the LGBT community have provided case studies in which families consisting only of men and boys were excluded from food distribution in Haiti following the 2010 Haiti Earthquake and went hungry as a result.

Distributing food only to women opens up the possibility that hungry men, denied food because of their gender alone, may simply take food from women after they leave the distribution centers. This is called robbery and the policies of the WFP, and the American Red Cross are encouraging it. This policy would, in fact, seem to increase the chances of violence against women.

The United Nations itself has explicit prohibitions regarding discrimination against women but apparently refuses to take any action when it comes to discrimination against men. We can see this policy applied through UN and non-UN agencies alike.

Paul, Janice and Mike discuss ICMI24

October 29, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The cover image depicts the Hungarian parliament building in Budapest and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

My road: from blue pill to red

October 30, 2023 | by Patrick Henry | Link | Original Link

I was raised by a feminist, single mother. When I was very young, my father grew tired of hassling with her and drifted away. I grew up feeling that my father didn't love me. I didn't know what parental alienation was but I knew what it felt like. The only thing I was told about him was he was a "deadbeat dad," that didn't pay his child support.

When I was a teenager, my mother and I ran into him by chance while out on an errand. He looked at me and asked, "Do you know who I am?" I hadn't a clue and said, "No." I could tell by the pain on his face that I had stabbed him in the heart. As we said our goodbyes, he gave me his pocket knife. I never saw him again. I still have that pocket knife today to remind me of him.

My first taste of the red pill was in college, when there were no clothesline projects or white ribbon weeks, for which I'm grateful. I do remember the sense of unfairness with scholarships and finical aid. No one would help me because of my skin color and gender. Eventually, I "manned up" and earned my way through school.

Consumed with school, work, and girlfriends, my first taste of the bitter red pill was forgotten and I slipped back into my blue pill coma. I had met the love of my life and eventually we were married.

Nothing you could have told me back then would have changed my mind. We were best friends and perfect for each other. I wasn't going to make the same mistakes my mother and father made. I was going to always be there for my wife and children, no matter what. I made an oath before God and witnessnes to honor and protect her, till death do us part. I meant it and I lived it.

15 years later, I had a good job, a house, great kids, and I was still in love. I was truly happy. Blue cool-aid is yummy! What happened next would shake me to my core and force me to choke down the red pill; whole this time.

I discovered my wife was having an affair. When I confronted her about it she called the cops on me because she was "afraid." Afraid! Afraid of what? I was her white knight. I never laid a finger on her or the kids, ever. In a wash of horror, I got it. She wasn't afraid at all. It was over, and she just played her trump card.

I met the cop in the driveway and calmly told him what happened. He gave me a choice. I could leave and never come back or he could take me to jail. I'm grateful this happened before VAWA.

For the next year I lived in an unfurnished apartment, sleeping on the floor. Between my attorney fees and paying both the house mortgage and apartment rent, I was dead broke. There were days I would go without food because I didn't have any money.

I would "man-up" at work, then I would come home and sob. I had lost everything that was important to me. Friends and family turned on me. In some twisted way they blamed me for the divorce. I tried two different counselors who wanted to sell me their version of “women good, men bad.” There was nowhere to turn but within.

In my darkest hours, I considered taking my life. Blue pill withdrawal is a bitch. My children kept me going. I didn’t want to leave them with a whole in their hearts, like the one I felt as a child. During this time, I developed a deeper understanding and compassion for my father and his loss.

As time went by, I would just sit and think for hours. I would sit and wonder how did I get here? This was her wrong not mine. She had an affair, yet she gets the house, the car, and the kids. I get attorney fees, alimony, and child support. What kind of fucked up world is this? There is no justice!

Once the divorce was over, I got my life back together. I wandered for a couple years thinking the world was crazy. No one could see what I could see or at least wouldn’t admit to it. I was living outside the matrix. I was MGTOW but I didn’t know the term then.

Then one day on YouTube, I came across one of Factory’s videos, and then JTO’s, then The Happy Misogynist. I realized I wasn’t alone. In fact, there were men much farther down the road than I was. That day an MRA was born.

A new psychology for men

October 31, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

A Tragic Suicide in Bangladesh

November 3, 2023 | by A Voice For Men | Link | Original Link

The following is a suicide note left by a man in Bangladesh named Shamim Sultan. He took his own life after an acrimonious divorce. His note was posted on Facebook and went viral. We bring this to you with thanks to Dr. Rakib Hasan, who translated the note from Bengali to English. RIP Shamim. –Ed

Shamim Sultan

What is the point of having parents, sister, brother – in – law, uncle aunts, if they can't help me when I needed them the most? No one stood by me in my time of crisis. No one asked me how I was doing, or they didn't try to understand and solve my problem. My love is useless to my parents' ego, anger and arrogance.

I have few questions to the people of my neighborhood. You consider your ego is superior to my happiness? I had an arranged marriage but why so much problem after marriage? You guys created problems but never tried to mitigate them because it will hurt your ego. As a father you can't do this to your son at this time and age.

I want to say something to my in-laws. The financial conditions of a person can't remain same all the time. At some point, I used to carry USD 4500 worth of gadgets in my backpack. You also have a son who is looking for a job but cannot manage one because it is not easy nowadays.

I got married on October 22, 2017. That time I had good income that's why you said yes to marriage in such a short notice but when my financial condition worsened, I became a villain. All you want is money, not a son-in-law.

For Eshita's (my wife) job I rented house in a separate city. You might think only Eshita contributed to the family but that is not true. Nevertheless, my family was running smoothly but my mother-in-law used to interfere a lot. I always helped Eshita is household chores, washed clothes, but you left me.

Before marriage my in-laws used to tell Eshita she was lucky to have me but when the divorce was finalized everyone was saying I was an asshole.

Now, Eshita, I have something to tell you. I never had a relationship before marriage, so I loved you with all my heart. You said I was careless but all I cared was for you. I always tried to make you happy. Your family, relatives stood beside you at time of divorce but no one cared for you after the divorce. I did. I even brought you a dress, sent money, took you to job interviews with my bike after divorce. I can not tolerate this anymore, all I wanted someone to be by my side, but I am alone.

If I owe anyone money, please forgive me. Everyone be happy in your life. I pray, Eshita, that you find a person that you always wanted and be happy with him.

Totalitarian Tango

November 5, 2023 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

I was honored to be allowed to do a reading of this exceptional piece by Moiret Alligiere, a man of many talents. –PE

The inflated definition of misogyny

November 7, 2023 | by Zerbu | Link | Original Link

Feminists are very quick to scream when they see or hear something they consider to be discrimination against women. According to feminists, misogyny is still rampant in society, and women are treated badly and unfairly. Really, though, what do they consider to be sexist?

The issues most feminists today complain about, are normal issues that happen to many people and are not gender based. Mainstream misogyny is very rare in today's society, and if it ever occurs, people will know about it, report it immediately and it will be gotten rid of as soon as possible.

So, what are some examples of what feminists consider misogyny?

- If a man is chosen over a woman for a job, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl doesn't get taken seriously, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is not given complete control over her choices in life, it's considered misogyny;
- If violence is inflicted against a woman or girl, it's considered misogyny;
- If a female boss is not respected properly, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is falling behind in a class, it's considered misogyny on the part of the education system;
- If a woman or girl is not given proper health care, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl is poor or suffering financial stress, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl gets in trouble for a reason she disagrees with, it's considered misogyny;
- If a woman or girl in general is suffering, it's considered misogyny.

Now, despite what feminists claim, these issues are not misogyny, because they are not gender issues. These issues happen to everyone, not just women and girls. Men and boys suffer from them as much, a lot of the time even more so. It has nothing to do with gender discrimination.

- People get chosen for jobs over other people;
- People don't always get taken as seriously as they should;
- People aren't always given complete control over their choices in life, and may be restricted for financial, health and/or other reasons;

- People suffer violence;
- Bosses and people in power are not always respected the way they should be, regardless of gender;
- People often fall behind in classes;
- People are not always given the proper health care they need or deserve;
- People suffer financial problems;
- People get in trouble for improper reasons, or at least what they consider improper;
- People in general suffer.

…but if one of those people are female, feminists immediately blame it on discrimination. Most of the problems feminists call misogyny are simple human issues that effect both genders. As has been demonstrated, feminists are not after equality. What they really want, by making these claims, is to change it so that only men ever suffer from these normal issues.

An example of this is how feminists continuously try to classify domestic violence (and in some cases, even violence in general) as a form of gender discrimination. Men can be victims of domestic violence too, so domestic violence is a violence issue, not a gender issue.

To demonstrate further the way situations are so easily labelled misogyny, here is a detailed example of a fictional situation:

> A student at a school has just been accused of misbehaving. This student believes they have done nothing wrong, and is annoyed by the false accusation and is determined to have something done about it.
> The student complains to one of the teachers, but doesn't use proper manners and instead uses shouting and foul language. The teacher disciplines the student for it, and the student has to do extra work after class.

The short story above does not mention the gender of the teacher and student. So let's say, both the student and the teacher are male. It would be considered a normal dispute. Change the gender of both of them to female, and it's still a normal dispute. However, make one of them male and the other female, and bang… it's gender discrimination! The male in the situation is a chauvinist, and the female is being discriminated against, despite the argument having nothing to do with gender. It could also be noted that in situations like these, the male is the one who gets blamed the majority of the time, and the female is always considered the victim.

That, folks, is the inflated definition of misogyny. For something that is done by a man (or boy) to be considered discrimination against women (or girls), the woman or girl just has to disagree with it. Whether or not the problem actually has anything to do with gender makes no difference in what feminists decide to call it.

Hair Triggered

November 10, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

I've been a member of AANR (you can join at age 50) for more years than I'd like to admit. In that time I've seen any number of ads and sales pitches aimed at old people. One day it occurred to me that there was a form of discrimination out there that I hadn't noticed before. The victims are bald men.

Now I'm not personally offended, even though I'm bald. Sure, it would be nice to have a full head of hair, as I did in my 20s, just as it would have been nice to have enjoyed the financial assets I have now when I was that age. Every age of man has its pluses and minuses.

Still, I can't help but notice that when mature men are portrayed in ads, grey, silver, or white hair is acceptable. Bald heads are not, even though 50% of men will display androgenetic alopecia (male pattern baldness) by age 50. In a nation where every conceivable demographic is demanding equity, bald men are the exception. Need I point out the irony that our national symbol is bald? Also endangered, which could have even more metaphorical significance.

Needless to say, discrimination against bald men (or should I say people experiencing baldness) is just that: discrimination against men. Some women may have thinning hair as they age but baldness is exceedingly rare.

Of course, a woman with long, lustrous hair is the stuff not just of advertising art but fine art. It is no secret among women that healthy hair and lots of it is a key element when it comes to attracting the opposite sex. I think that was pretty much the case up till the 1920s when women began bobbing their hair. Rapunzel would have been hopelessly out of place in the Jazz Age. Since then all sorts of strange, unnatural hairdos (a beehive, seriously?) have passed in and out of fashion. And don't get me started on purple/green/blue hair.

Men's hairstyles are not as important since men are primarily prized for what they can do or provide, not for how they look. The dandy, the fop, the peacock, and the pretty boy have long been objects of scorn by men of substance. Any man who spends as much time and effort on his appearance as a woman is suspect in the eyes of his peers. For working class men, long hair can be a nuisance – and possibly dangerous around heavy machinery.

As for you men who tie up your long hair into a man bun…you are no more a samurai than was John Belushi in one of his Samurai Night Fever skits. OK for cosplay or Halloween but not as a regular look. And ponytails…they were once the province of teenage girls. Need I say more?

When young men began to wear their hair long in the 1960s, it was mostly men, not women, who criticized it. Had teenage girls expressed distaste for long hair on their male counterparts, then long hair on young men would not have been a thing. Short hair was supposedly more masculine, possibly because of the military connotations. For the wayward adolescent, military school was a threat and sometimes a reality. In fact, judges often gave budding criminals a choice: go to jail or enlist in the army. It was implied if not expressed that the army would make a man out of you. It was a dubious assertion then and one not likely to be uttered today when we are experiencing a bumper crop of pronouns, a testosterone drought, and a paucity of enlistees.

The military aside, it's hard to see what short hair has to do with masculinity. What about all those centuries-old paintings of long-haired, grim-faced European men in museums? Do those guys look like soyboys to you? Granted, those elaborate ruffled collars are rather sissified.

Those 18th century guys with the powdered wigs were a bit suspect also. Someone should tell those jurists in the UK that it's time to relegate those hairpieces to the dustbin of history or a compost heap, whichever is more convenient. How can a litigant in those countries have any confidence in jurisprudence when the presiding judge has a carpet remnant on his head? He's like something out of a Monty Python sketch…the minister of silly wigs.

Of course, when it comes to hairstyles, the World War II generation had few options. Was veterans' distaste at the idea of long-haired young men based on ideals of masculinity, or were they just envious that they never had the opportunity to sport a leonine head of hair? By the 1960s it was too late for the middle-aged baldies.

A good head of hair does count for something. It certainly helps if you are running for public office. You can get away with vapidity if you have good hair. Hair is much like height. The more a man has, the more alpha he appears – even if he is a dolt otherwise. If you are a chrome-dome candidate you'd better do your homework on the issues and brush up on your oratory skills.

Now I don't necessarily blame the advertising folks for eschewing bald men. Models are supposed to be attractive and at any age a full head of hair is much more attractive than an incomplete head of hair. I think it's been that way at least since the time of Samson (c. 1200 B.C.). Even in his case, his hair was prized not so much for its appearance but because it endowed him with great strength. It was more a symbol of virility and vitality than an aesthetic statement. It might have given Delilah pleasure to run her fingers through his luxuriant locks but that was nothing compared to the buzz she got when she emasculated him with a buzz cut.

Now baldness is not the worst fate that can befall a man, though there are a couple of drawbacks, albeit mild. When a man is young, he may not appreciate how hair protects the scalp from sunburn. Also, it provides a modicum of protection when you bump your head. A hat offers protection against both, however, so the physical drawbacks of baldness are easily overcome. The psychological drawbacks are another story.

One case in point was Curly of the Three Stooges. His nickname was in opposition to his boot-camp haircut. In reality, he had sported a rich crop of chestnut-colored hair before he joined the act. When he looked in a mirror and saw his sandpaper noggin, he got depressed. He felt his sex appeal was nil but his haircut was part and parcel of his comic persona (and his paychecks). He was indeed a victim of "coicumstances."

Yet today a man who totally shaves his head is often considered a bad ass. How many movie villains, professional wrestlers, security guards, and bouncers have exploited that look? A man with both a shaved head and a beard has a demonic demeanor. Exhibit A is the renowned Satanist Anton LaVey.

Why does a shaved head make a man look more dominant? A bald pate with a ring of hair from ear to ear around the back of the head is a more natural look but it reeks of beta maleness, unless you're a monk. Even worse is a man with a bald pate who lets his hair grow long in the back. That is downright creepy. Aging rock stars, take note.

It seems one must have a full head of hair or a totally shaved head to be considered sexy. There is no middle ground. A dome covered in peach fuzz is arguably worse than baldness. You might get by with a receding hairline if you maintain a prominent widow's peak. Call it the vampire look. The chicks dig it – at least in horror movies.

Of course, if you are a billionaire, you need not worry about what's under your chapeau. Worn at a jaunty angle, a yachting cap goes a long way towards camouflaging baldness. Especially while greeting guests as you stroll the deck on your yacht.

But for the average joe who is going bald, there is little hope. Forget about toupees. There is no bigger butt of jokes than a man with a bad hairpiece. Still, you cannot help but notice that hair transplants work for some. If you look at old videos of Joe Biden and note his bad comb-overs and then look at him today, there's no doubt he has had hair plugs. Any number of movie stars (e.g., John Wayne and Burt Reynolds) have done likewise. But if you're living from paycheck to paycheck, hair plugs are probably beyond your means.

If it matters that much to you and you are middle class and can put some money aside, you might be able to afford hair plugs. My uncle did this. It didn't look bad. If you didn't know he'd had some work done, you wouldn't notice anything unnatural. But to anyone who knew him, the difference was obvious. His excuse was he worked with younger men and didn't want to be at a disadvantage. Corporations are always looking for an excuse to clear out dead wood, but growing old is not necessarily a death sentence in the workplace as long as you don't look or act old. You can take pain medication for your arthritis. You can wear a diaper for incontinence. You can get stoked on caffeine to counteract flagging energy levels. Just don't look old. It reminds younger colleagues of their mortality. Your presence should not be a bummer.

If one could blame baldness on capitalism or the class struggle or racism, life would be so much easier for the non-hirsute. It is difficult to attribute your baldness to oppression when everyone knows that genetics is usually the cause. I guess you could blame it on your parents but it's not as though they deliberately passed on toxic genes to you. And if your parents had decided against bringing into the world a child who would likely suffer the stigma of baldness, you wouldn't be here. So you can't blame your baldness on anyone. Baldness is a male thing, and you know what that means: man up and deal with it. The rare woman afflicted with baldness can get by with a wig and no one will make fun of her.

So what's the answer to discrimination against bald men? Safe spaces? A political action committee? Reparations? Demonstrators super-gluing themselves to barber poles? Frankly, I don't know.

Now there may come a time in the future when medicine will have some sort of a remedy (gene therapy?) for baldness. If it is affordable, then perhaps one day bald men will be no more.

In the meantime, we must do all we can to make the world safe for baldness.

Bald Lives Matter! But don't turn that into an acronym. Too much potential for confusion. The Bureau of Land Management might take offense.

Women’s Sexual Peak Rests Atop a Pile of Lies

November 11, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This piece was originally published in 2010 – Eds.*

Some years ago I was at a night club with a group of men and women. Naturally the conversation turned to sex. One woman, in her late forties, said, in a good natured way, “It’s a shame that by the time men really learn what they are doing in bed, their equipment doesn’t work like it used to.”

“I understand how you feel,” I said, in an equally jovial tone, “By the time women start learning what they are doing in bed their looks start fading.”

Needless to say, my response, while as truthful as hers, more or less took her out of the conversation. It was not my intent at all, but you could tell by the look in her eyes that she felt like every line on her face was magnified a thousand times, reading like a giant “use by” date from the last millennium. Fortunately for me, I didn’t have all manner of ego and identity tied up in my penis, or I might have felt the same way.

There was a silver lining, though. It did spark a rather lively round of verbal sparring with the rest of the people at the table. And I am sure that it was a discussion that has been echoed millions of times at millions of night club gatherings.

Why is it that men and women hit their sexual peaks at such radically different ages?

And the answer is, of course, that they don’t. It is just another one of the myriad of lies we enable women to live for the sake of not disturbing their self image- and perhaps for the sake of getting in their pants in leaner times.

Where else but the current gender Zeitgeist can a woman with crows feet, sagging breasts, reduced sexual hormones, a vagina that does not lubricate as it once did, more difficulty conceiving and less ability to attract sexual partners of their preference, stand up and say “I am in my sexual prime,” and have everyone in their presence nod their head in agreement?

Only in a world where we tell women whatever they want to hear, no matter how ridiculous.

And it admittedly fits with part of women’s experience to maintain the lie. An observation I have, one that I cannot back up with any research, is that as women’s biological clocks tick down toward the final moments, there is a tendency, in the words of Dylan Thomas, to rage against the dying of the light.

It’s not sexual primacy, it’s desperate horniness. Their fantasy of being in their sexual prime when they are well past it is only the labored breathing of someone in their last moments, struggling to suck air just a little while longer.

I am not knocking it. When I was 21 I had a 45 year old woman show me what fer, good and proper, for three weeks in a cabin in Oklahoma. It was an educational rite of passage and a very fond memory in my life. Wouldn’t trade it for the world.

But, let’s face it, the only one in that cabin in their sexual prime was me. I was a youngster with a gold mine of a horny older woman desperate for sexual relevance. And when the experience was over, I walked away smiling, and a little better equipped to take care of business with women who were, well, who actually were in their sexual prime.

And she had at least one more round of clinging to her sexual power; to her relevance in the world.

The point is that without sexual viability, the power of most women in this culture is reduced to whatever is afforded by rote chivalry. And while that chivalry affords them a great deal of latitude, if doesn’t provide them with the meaningful significance of a younger woman who still turns heads- and can have babies.

Being in your sexual prime is about being ready to make babies, not about how willing you are to be ridden hard and put up wet.

In the pure biological sense, infertile women, even those that just appear to be, are just so much excess baggage. And since women as a group either cannot or will not draw their self worth from anything but sexual power (NAWALT stipulated), we will forever have them demanding to live lies. And in modern times, they even have the option of paying surgeons to cut, suction and inject that lie until it looks damned near the truth.

Business is booming.

There is a solution to this, though it is doubtful we will ever get there.

Women, feminists in particular, have long lamented the male beauty standard. They claim it drives women to extremes like surgery and eating disorders, and results in damaged self esteem, all because men want women to look a certain way.

But of course, once you peel back the layers of victimized drivel and get to the core of the matter, you find that women drive themselves to do these things, biology leading them by the nose, because that is their quickest route to personal power, and because they don’t rise above it and find relevance in other ways.

Like the ways men do.

When women collectively quit worrying about sexual primacy and start focusing on their own innate human potential, when they learn to value their own accomplishments more than they value what they can sexually manipulate out of men, the plastic surgeons will be out of business and their bad self esteem, rather than their personal significance, will be facing expiration.

What’s that you say, women already are like that? They already do more on their own than they try to get men to do for them through sex and other forms of manipulation?

Well, I would like to address that here, too. But I only take on one lie at a time.

Why More Men Are Quiet Quitting Women At Work

November 13, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Women in the 16th century sued their husbands for erectile dysfunction

November 14, 2023 | by Melissa Sartore | Link | Original Link

---

Sex, marriage, and impotence are the sorts of private matters not usually heard in public discourse. But in the 14th century, erectile dysfunction was under increased scrutiny in Europe. In pre-modern France, a woman could bring her husband to public trial for an annulment on the grounds that he was impotent. Impotence as a basis for divorce wasn't unique to France, similar accusations were made in medieval Spain and England as well.

The methods by which men had to prove their virility reached increasingly invasive and public levels during the Early Modern period with intricate medical exams, virginity tests, and even Trial by Congress – a public display of one's sexual ability. This insane method of determining whether a man was up for his marital duty (sorry, the puns write themselves) lasted less than a century. However, in a pre-reality TV world, the public followed these erectile trials closely.

Enlightenment thinkers called it an example of the over-reaching authority of the Church, while the general public just liked to read about the drama in published accounts. Back then, a man's erection was his only weapon in a challenge to his manhood. Without a doubt, pre-revolutionary impotence trials brought what we now consider to be private matters into very public places – literally.

The Church Had A Right To Be In Your Bedroom

From a moral perspective, Catholics and Protestants, among others, argued back then that marriage was the only appropriate outlet for the erotic urges humans suffer (yes, suffer). Impotence, in this context, was a criminal offense. A fraudulent crime against one party in a marriage.

Marriage didn't explicitly become a sacrament of the Catholic Church until the Council of Trent in the 16th century, but theologians and clergymen were active in matrimony through late antiquity and the Middle Ages. Christians who took part in marriage in its sacramental form understood that it was an agreement entered into with provisions. Marriage was between two baptized Christians, it was monogamous, it was for procreation purposes, and it was indissoluble. Protestant views on marriage were similar to Catholics in that it was a necessary institution.

Whether Catholic or Protestant, all religious officials agreed impotence was a valid reason to end a marriage and was definitely a matter of Church business.

Divorce Was Rare So Impotence Was A Woman's Best Chance To Get Out

When it came to marriage during the Middle Ages and the Early Modern period, the Catholic Church didn't allow for many exit routes. The basic goals of marriage were to procreate and provide the only acceptable outlet for sexual urges. Therefore if a man couldn't hold up his side of the bargain, an annulment was allowed.

It wasn't as easy as that, however. If a woman alleged impotence, there was a three-year window before the annulment was granted. In case the condition corrected itself. Additionally, not all annulments allowed those involved to remarry. This depended upon what was known about when and how the problem started.

Protestant Reformers believed that impotence was a valid reason for divorce, but also that remarriage was a must. For Protestants, women could only bring impotence to court after enough time had been given to procreate – anywhere from one to three years – and divorce was granted after a series of oaths or medical examinations.

A Wife Had To Prove She Wasn't To Blame

Unsurprisingly, a woman still had to prove she wasn't the cause of a couple's sexual woes. Her easiest way out of the marriage was to claim the marriage was never consummated. In this scenario she then had to prove she was still a virgin.

One test to prove this was to drink a diuretic. Since the urinary and reproductive systems were believed to be the same, if she urinated immediately, her hymen had been corrupted. An un-penetrated woman would be unaffected (or really good at holding her bladder). She was often subjected to a physical inspection also.

A woman's second best route to prove she was blameless was to claim her husband came with a faulty tool kit. This meant her husband was subjected to physical scrutiny. In 1370, for example, a certain John, was examined and found to have a "member…like an empty intestine of mottled skin… [with no] flesh in it, nor veins in the skin, and the middle of its front…totally black…[that] neither expanded nor grew…"

The Test To Verify Virginity Could, In Fact, De-Flower A Woman

The physical examination that a woman underwent to prove her virginity was, naturally, invasive. She was given a bath, in case she was using something to fake virginity, and then put on a bed in front of midwives and doctors. Her legs were spread and a doctor used a "mirror of the womb" or a mock-penis to explore the woman's genitals.

It was possible to break a woman's hymen this way but was still used as a method to determine virginity nonetheless. If a woman was said to not be a virgin, she could claim her husband had violated her with his fingers or had tried unsuccessful sex thus breaking her hymen.

A Man's Package Was Under Severe Scrutiny

A man with a penile malformation was a relatively straightforward case in these affairs. Similarly, cases of men with too little going on downstairs to allow for sex were quickly found lacking and a divorce was granted. Such was the case of Nicholas Cantilupe whose wife Katherine claimed that "that she could not stroke nor find anything there and that the place in which Nicholas' genitals ought be is as flat as the hand of a man."

Other cases weren't so clear cut. In the late 16th century, Magdeleine de Chastre claimed that her husband, the Baron d'Argenton, had no testicles and was thusly impotent. The two had consummated their marriage, proven by bloody sheets found after their wedding night, but the wife took her case to court anyway. The Baron's lawyer, Sebastien Roulliard, argued that denying the existence of hidden testicles was similar to denying the existence of the heart, lungs, or other non-visible organs. Nor, he argued, were they necessary for an erection.

All manner of impotence was brought before the courts. Accidental, temporary, and intermittent impotence all muddied the waters, so to speak. An increase in medical knowledge complicated impotence divorce later in the 18th and 19th centuries.

Men Had To Give Quite The, Ahem, Public Performance

Doctors in Spain devised their own methods of testing a man's penis in the fourteenth century: A hot and cold water test. A man's penis was put into cold water, then hot, and then observed for dilation and blood-flow. If this proved inconclusive a male surgeon would then attempt to stimulate the man to erection.

In Naples, matrone (female sex experts) were used. This woman would accompany a couple, rub ointments on them, encourage them to relax, give them aphrodisiacs, and watch to see what would happen. She'd then report back to the court. In France, in a Trial by Congress, men were expected to get an erection in front of the Court, usually by mounting his wife and copulating on demand.

Church officials and doctors did seem to realize that the inability to perform in front of an audience was possible but, generally speaking, a man could either get it up or he couldn't.

Impotence Was An All-Out Epidemic In 16th Century France

Based on the number of impotence cases in France by the 16th century one would assume there was something in the water. Of course, as one of the few ways to dissolve a marriage, it was an appealing process for a woman in a loveless marriage. Upper and middle class women were the most common litigants because they could afford to bring the cases to court.

Several factors contributed to the increased number of and interest in impotence trials. As more and more cases of impotence came to court, treatises and books about law and marriage alike proliferated. Contemporaries attributed the rise in trials to overall moral corruption, as well as the growing audacity and overt sexuality of women, with as many as ten thousand trials held during the 17th century.

There Were Three Possible Results From An Impotence Trial

If a man and woman in an impotence trial abided by their three-year trial period, endured the physical exams, and provided all the necessary info a court needed, there were three possible outcomes. If impotence was not proven, the parties were “condemned to live as man and wife.” If the impotence was proven, the marriage could be annulled – with provisions that one or both could remarry. Last, in rare cases, the couple was asked to give it another three-year trial period and see if things worked themselves out.

Narcissism Isn’t Self-Esteem

November 15, 2023 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Let me tell you what I’d do if I liked money more than self-respect. I’d go to the local shopper’s club and buy a hundred gross of small brown paper bags. Then I’d drive out-of-town to the nearest auction barn and pay them a fair price to let me go into the stalls and fill every bag with an even pound of cow crap.

Then I’d slap on some shiny pink labels with “Bag-O-Women’s-Self-Esteem,” printed on them in a distinctly womanish font, add a five, no, ten-dollar price tag, and tie ’em closed with couple of nice frou frou ribbons. Next, I’d set up a kick back arrangement with Oprah in exchange for an endorsement and take out an ad in Cosmo or Redbook.

Then I would head down to Belize and sit on the beach, throw back cocktails and check the bank account on my android 8 or 10 times a day. After about a week I’d buy the beach I was sitting on, and maybe that cute little senorita that was fetching my drinks. The word expatriate would start sounding pretty good.

And I’d be doing myself and you ladies a big favor. It would be perfect synergy. I like money, and you like buying disingenuous bullshit that feeds your narcissism.

You’ve been doing it for as long as I can remember. Fake self-esteem, like 98% of everything else that is marketed just to females, is just ego food for the insatiably hungry. It has become the psycho-porn of the western woman, with profits that would put a twinkle in Bill Gates’ eyes. How much profit exactly is anyone’s guess.

What I do know is that the narcissism racket comes in a lot of guises. I will deal with the two major ones here because that is all I have time for.

First, the plastic surgery route. With 8-year-olds getting bikini waxes and high school juniors getting fitted for an instant C cup, it is a growing industry for the grrls. Cosmetic surgeons know exactly how much narcissistic gratification results when your tits are bigger, producing more drooling mouths and hungry eyes. More adulation at first sight.

This is the narcissistic fulfillment that they pass off as self-esteem, and they use it as an advertising come on in the same way beer companies use girls in bikinis. Since you are the consumer, it sells like cheap crack in a bad neighborhood. And so now you and your sisters are lined up like schoolgirls for tickets to see Taylor Swift, to get cut and stretched, injected and inflated, and to have your fat asses suctioned down to bubbles of perfection.

But, there is one ever so slight problem. Actually, it’s a big one.

You see, narcissism isn’t self-esteem. Not even close. If you think self-esteem and the self-obsessed craving for worship are the same thing, then go buy those plastic titties. They will match your character and personality just fine, and they might go a long way toward a career as a porn star or topless dancer if the scars don’t show too much. After all, it’s common knowledge that self-esteem abounds for women who can squat down and pick up folded dollar bills off the floor with the crack of their ass while a room full of drunks howl at them.

Then you can attract more men and join the millions of other women that spend their time bitching about how those men won't look at them from the neck up. It's a small price to pay for all that "self-esteem."

Tell you what -today only- two bags of cow shit for the price of one.

Now, if you are not on an elective surgery budget, you needn't feel left out. There is a whole world of cheaper but equally fake assistance with your problem. It's the Stuart Smalley route of the self-esteem simpleton. And it is for sale in the wacky world of mental health. The purveyors, usually women who are every bit as narcissistic as you, are scattered across the world-wide web, thicker than Henry Kissinger's accent. For a mere hundred or two hundred per hour, they will give you the stalwart advice to look in the mirror -each and every day- and say really affirming things like "I am unique. I am special. I am the only 'me' there is!" They will advise you to smile while saying it, but I dare you to simply keep a straight face.

They will tell you there are lots of reasons you don't have self-esteem. The most common one being men that don't see just how special you really are, or don't tell you as much every 15 minutes. No narcissism there, eh?

Those women love to tell you that failure to saturate you with adulation is where you lose your self-esteem. They'll tell you, with faces as straight as bourbon whiskey, that this is where your self-esteem gets lost, like the pocket you kept it in had a hole in it and a hundred hours of therapy would help you find it again.

Actually, they will make it look a little more sinister. It's like this: You get into a relationship and at first he is all roses and chocolates and the compliments you so desperately need. After time though, he starts saying things that are not really bad, but just a little cutting, like "I'm going fishing with my friends,"

After some more time passes, it gets worse. When his fishing trips don't stop simply because you tell him how important it is for him to give them up for you, what started as "I'm going fishing with my friends," ends up being "Get off my back you insufferable fucking control freak."

With that, Self-esteem, or the narcissism disguised as much, goes right into the drink.

Seriously though, ladies, disinformation about your self-esteem aside, the self-help gurus aren't any better at it than the cutters. And they miss the most important thing about self-esteem, just like you do.

The cold truth is that if you have self-esteem, something very different from narcissism, nobody can take it from you. And if you can surrender it to someone, even an asshole who says he loves you, then you never had it to begin with.

That is partly because there is no such thing as self-esteem. It is just a made-up word; a marketing tool to get into your purse, or through you to your man's wallet. They just call it self-esteem instead of narcissism because women won't pay to address their narcissism.

There is, however, another asset you might consider. It's called self-respect. And self-respect, since it must be earned, is rarely sacrificed. And if you have it, you probably don't need a therapist or a surgeon.

When you have self-respect, respect from others is a given. But you can't have respect from others or yourself if what you keep chasing is actually a form of worship. And if you are the average woman in today's world, you don't have a damned clue as to the difference. It makes selling you bags of bullshit all the easier. In fact, as long as you insist on hanging on to the idea that you're not really a narcissist, it makes selling you anything but bullshit impossible. Narcissists don't buy self-improvement, or, for that matter, anything truthful.

Unlike what any plastic surgeon or psychobabble spouting huckster will tell you, you have to get off your ass and earn the way people see and treat you, and the way you see and treat yourself.

You do this through the development of your character, not as a princess or little girl or the self-designated center of someone else's universe, but as a grown human being with more focus on your responsibilities than your entitlements. Ante up like a big girl and see how quickly the world, and men, treat you like one.

But the real trick here is for you to understand that people, particularly men, failing to meet unrealistic expectations isn't robbing you of anything. They aren't respecting you by catering to your narcissistic childishness, they are just giving in to it, and, in the mother of all ironies, disrespecting themselves.

Now you can take this advice, which is totally free, and start applying it today. You can start by putting down the mirror and looking inward this very minute. Before you know it other people, men included, will be looking at you in a way you have likely never seen before. With genuine admiration. I know, it's a poor substitute for adulation, but in the real world it has to do.

Or, if you just can't wrap your mind around the idea that the onus is on you to get the job done; that self-respect is a by-product of maturity and humility, I have another form of self-esteem, right here, by the bag full.

Operators are standing by.

Men should be paid for their erection labor

November 15, 2023 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

You probably understand that construction workers are hard workers. But do you realize that many men are continually engaged in erection labor? Women have no idea how draining men's natural reproductive functioning can be.

Men's reproductive labor is less visible and less appreciated than women's reproductive labor. The raucous medieval French text Les Quinze joyes de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) explored the issue:

> Now it's quite true that a woman is sorely beset for so long as she's pregnant or bearing children, and that during childbirth she suffers untold grief and pain. But all this is nothing compared to the travail a reasonable man must endure when pondering any of his important undertakings. And as for the discomfort of pregnancy or childbirth, it impresses me not a bit more than that of a hen or goose laying an egg as big as my fist, and this through a hole too small for my pinkie just a moment before. One process is just as great as the other in Nature's scheme.

In pioneering comparative ethological analysis embracing humans and chickens, Les Quinze joyes de mariage reasoned:

> Thus you'll see the hen remains plumper than the cock, despite the fact that she lays daily; for the rooster is so stupid, he spends the whole day scratching for food to bill-feed his mate, while her sole concerns are eating, gabbling, and resting easy. And the same holds true for good, respectable husbands, I say it to their credit.

Adjusting for hours worked and years of job experience, women working the same jobs as men earn about the same pay. But women and men make significantly different job choices. Men have more dangerous, dirty, unpleasant jobs. That why about eleven times more men than women die from occupational fatalities. Moreover, women control 80% of consumer spending. Spending money is more enjoyable than earning it. Men who work longer hours for more years in more dangerous, unpleasant jobs so that women can spend more money are stupid.

But those economic issues are trivial compared to the physiological burden of a normal, healthy man's frequent, large erections. Women cannot imagine a man's labor in producing a massive erection. It's like rapidly donating several quarts of blood. Can you imagine rapidly donating several quarts of blood every ten or fifteen minutes throughout the day? And not just for nine months, but for twelve months a year, year after year. That's what it's like to be a man.

Men deserve to be paid for the biological burden of being a man. Men deserve to be paid for their erection labor. The simplest policy would be an erection tax credit. Modern smart watches with bio-sensing could easily generate documentation for erection tax credit claims. Men's smart watches could automatically detect their erection labor, estimate the magnitude of the blood flow, and wirelessly report the event to a central IRS erection tax credit claim database. The erection tax credit could be automatically applied to men's tax returns. The ability of impotent men to engage in erection tax credit fraud would be minimal with modern bio-sensing and centralized database technology.

Men naturally engage in erection labor. But men shouldn't be exploited just because of the way their bodies naturally function. Men deserve to be paid for their erection labor.

Notes:

The above quotes are from Les Quinze joyes de mariage, Seventh Joy, from Old French trans. Pitts (1985) pp. 67-8. Les Quinze joyes de mariage is thought to have been written about the year 1400.

This article is under the CC-BY-SA 3.0 unported licence. The original article can be found here.

The cover image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and is licenced under CC-BY-SA 4.0.

Welcome to the marriage strike

November 16, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Peter III of Russia

November 17, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

History doesn't remember Peter III of Russia fondly. The grandson of Peter the Great, he's ridiculed by historians. This is captured effectively by the 1911 Encyclopedia Britannica that had this to say about him:

> Nature had made him mean, the smallpox had made him hideous, and his degraded habits made him loathsome. And Peter had all the sentiments of the worst kind of a small German prince of the time. He had the conviction that his princeship entitled him to disregard decency and the feelings of others. He planned brutal practical jokes, in which blows had always a share. His most manly taste did not rise above the kind of military interest which has been defined as "corporal's mania," the passion for uniforms, pipeclay, buttons, the "tricks of parade and the froth of discipline." He detested the Russians, and surrounded himself with Holsteiners.

That historians and others should be so hostile to the memory of Peter III and laud so highly the Empress that followed him, Catherine, tends to count against the idea of The Patriarchy. Doubly so when we consider that Catherine was his wife and that she deposed him. History remembers her as Catherine the Great. I prefer to call her Catherine the Usurper. In the end Peter was on the throne for barely six months thanks to the actions of his wife and others.

The man who would later become Peter III, Emperor of Russia, was born in 1728 in the city of Kiel in what is now Germany. His mother died soon after from a postpartum infection and his father died when he was eleven. He was descended from Swedish and Russian royalty and was now a duke in own right. In 1742, when he was 14, he was named the heir presumptive of the Russian Empire by this aunt Empress Elizabeth. Soon after he moved to Russia where he lived for the rest of his life. Not long after moving to Russia he was also named as heir-presumptive of the Swedish throne however when Swedish authorities discovered that he was also the heir to the Russian throne the offer was apparently quietly dropped.

In 1762 Empress Elizabeth died and Peter ascended to the throne. One of his first acts on taking the throne was to end a seven year long war with Prussia. He ordered Russians to leave conquered Prussian land and provided compensation to Prussia He then went on to form an alliance with Prussia. So much for warmongering men.

Peter then embarked on an ambitious programme of reform. In his 186 days on the throne he passed 220 laws. He was able to maintain this prodigious rate as he had been preparing his legislative agenda over his 20 years as the heir to the Russian throne.

His daily routine was disciplined. He would rise at 7am, receive reports on the state of the empire from 8-10am, at 11am he would oversee the changing of the guard. He would generally take lunch at 1pm. Sometimes diplomats or Russians from across the class spectrum were invited to lunch with him.

Peter permitted religious freedom among his subjects, something that was unusual even in Western Europe at the time. He emphasised and encouraged education through his legislative reforms.

Peter went on to abolish the Secret Office of Investigation, a secret police force used principally to crush dissent against the state and the emperor.

Peter also established the first state bank in Russia, significantly reduced the control nobles had over trade and encouraged the rise of a merchant class. This can be seen today as economic liberalisation intended to promote wealth in Russia.

Notably Peter released nobles from compulsory military service. These same nobles were to assist his wife in deposing him months later.

During Peter's reign the killing of peasants by their lords was abolished. Henceforth lords that killed their peasants were subject to exile. One female landowner, E.N. Golshein-Bek, was reportedly so abusive to her peasants that her lands were taken from her.

While Peter has often been criticised for speaking little Russian, the truth is that French was the language of the Russian court and the Russian royal family had little cause to speak Russian on a daily basis.

Peter's predecessor, Elizabeth, had seized power from the infant emperor Ivan VI. Elizabeth had Ivan held incommunicado as a baby and forbade him receiving an education. In a story reminiscent of The Man in the Iron Mask Ivan's jailers were prohibited from even knowing his identity. When Peter came to the throne Ivan was 21 and still rotting in prison. Peter visited Ivan and there is some indication that he intended to improve the conditions of his incarceration.

While Catherine usurped her husband's power she did so with the support of the nobility, the army and the navy. After taking power Catherine reversed many of Peter's reforms although she retained those that benefitted the crown, such as an increased right to seize church property. Peter died in captivity but it isn't clear whether Catherine had a hand in this or not.

Catherine also created the infamous Pale of Settlement in which Russian Jews were required to reside. Jews in the army could leave when on active service but had to return to the Pale during leave. The Pale was to remain in place until the fall of the Russian monarchy in 1917.

After he died a number of pretenders stepped forward claiming to be Peter. In at least one case Catherine's forces defeated a pretender in battle.

As noted, historians have little good to say about Peter, while they praise Catherine. Many historians have uncritically accepted Catherine's version of events and of her husband.

Peter's attempts at liberalising Russian society and economy paint a different picture – of a monarch trying to make Russia better than it was. In doing so he made powerful enemies who ultimately removed him from power.

Whatever lead up to it, Russia's nobles concluded that they would be better off with Empress Catherine than Emperor Peter. Time and again the historical record has examples in which nobles supported a ruler based on their own self-interest rather than the gender of the ruler.

Today a statue stands in the city of his birth, one of the few monuments to this man. The narrative carried down through the centuries, of a small petty man, and that of his wife as a great ruler is itself a clear demonstration of the falsity of the feminist claims of Patriarchy. A Patriarchy would never suppress the good works of an emperor and exhault the empress that usurped him. A Patriarchy would never replace an emperor with an empress in the first place. Catherine rewrote history to justify her own reign and the world has to a large degree uncritically accepted her claims. This was true even before the rise of the modern feminist movement and is a very clear indication of the prevalence of gynocentrism throughout Russian and Western civilisation.

Officially Peter and Catherine had one son, Paul, who would go on to be emperor of Russia after his mother died. Later in life Catherine hinted that Peter had not been Paul's father however. Paul had a distant relationship with his mother as she showed much more affection to her many lovers than to her only son. Catherine attempted to pass over Paul and make his own son Alexander her heir. This was ultimately unsuccessful and Paul took the throne on the death of Catherine. Paul reportedly resembled Peter physically as well as in personality. Like Peter, Paul had attempted to improve the lot of the peasantry and was ultimately removed from power with the support of the nobility. When he wouldn't abdicate he was murdered by nobles.

Perhaps Peter's reforms were too ambitious for his time. It is unfortunate that he's continued to be viewed so negatively today. With hindsight we can see that his reforms would have helped to modernise Russian and ultimately helped the Russian people. Had Peter stayed on the throne and been able to complete his reforms the Russian revolutions of the early 20th century might never have materialised. If so the world today might be very different. Alas we will never know, because more than 260 years ago Catherine the Usurper deposed her husband Peter III and locked him in a prison cell, only to have him die soon after.

Instead of Peter the reformer we got Catherine the Usurper and autocrat. What could have been.

The cover image depicts Peter in 1761, the year of his reign.

Two-Factor Attractiveness Scale (tool for men to assess women's value)

November 18, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following is a summary of an attractiveness rating scale based on the two factors of sexual + pairbonding attractiveness, instead of the usual single rating factor of sexual attractiveness.

Preamble

Freud/psychoanalysis: "What decides the purpose of life is simply the programme of the pleasure principle."

Object relations psychology: "The primary motivational factors in one's life are based on human relationships, rather than sexual or aggressive triggers."

The above quotes imply two different kinds of female attractiveness for men, and a need for two separate rating scales: 1. sexual attractiveness, and 2. pairbonding attractiveness. The first rating is based purely on sexual provocation & attraction: body shape, boobs, hips, hair, cleavage, thighs & bedroom eyes, etc. The second rating implies the girl-next-door stereotype, more attractive for company, pair bonding and if desired, family. Rating a woman as 9/10 in sexual attractiveness is misleading as the only qualifier of a high quality partner, as she may be only 1/10 in the pairbonding attractiveness (or it may be the converse scores). Not that I'm into rating women, but for those who are I recommend using both scales mentioned here and combining the scores to get a more accurate, overall rating.

Two-Factor Attractiveness Scale

A two-factor attractiveness scale would work like this, and examples are arbitrary, e.g.

SEXUAL ATTRACTIVENESS SCORING: 0 to 10

0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

PAIRBONDING ATTRACTIVENESS SCORING: -10 to +10

-10 -9 -8 -7 -6 -5 -4 -3 -2 -1 0 1 2 3 4 5 6 7 8 9 10

Brittany Venti:
5/10 for sexual attractiveness
0/10 for pairbonding attractiveness.
Score: 5|0

Mikhaila Peterson:
5/10 for sexual attractiveness

1/10 for pairbonding attractiveness
Score: 5|1

Pearl Davis:
5/10 for sexual attractiveness
7/10 for pairbonding attractiveness
Score: 5|7

Nina-Marie Daniele:
7/10 Sexual attractiveness
5/10 Pairbonding attractiveness
Score: 7|5

Lauren Chen:
7/10 for sexual attractiveness
6/10 for pairbonding attractiveness
Score: 7|6

Amber Heard:
9/10 Sexual attractiveness
-5/10 Pairbonding attractiveness
Score: 9|-5

Comment

The two attractiveness scales are based on two different human motivations mentioned above, as also outlined by Evolutionary Psychology scholar Steve Stewart-Williams who writes, quote:

> "Human males have a number of well-documented, species-typical mate preferences. These include preferences for physical traits such as a low waist-to-hip ratio, facial and bodily symmetry, neoteny, and youthfulness. They also include preferences for psychological traits such as intelligence, emotional stability, and sexual fidelity."[1]

Notice in this quote the first group of physiological traits match sexual attractiveness, and the latter traits match pairbonding attractiveness. Sexual attractiveness is well understood, however pairbonding attractiveness requires a little more explanation: it is the ability of a woman to cultivate a successful, long term bond with a man, which includes traits such as emotional stability, sexual fidelity, low/no body count (signifying commitment to pairbonding), low narcissism, intelligence, modesty, and ability to positively work through relationship issues.

The list of traits and attributes belonging respectively to sexual and pairbonding attractiveness could be expanded into a very long list, and I do hope that someone bothers to take up that task and have some fun with it.

Lastly, although described in terms of rating women's attractiveness, the scale could be equally adapted to rate male attractiveness/value. The scale is not copyrighted and is free to use.

November 15, 2023

Reference:

[1] The Ape That Thought It Was a Peacock: Does Evolutionary Psychology Exaggerate Human Sex Differences?

MEN TOO – Domestic Violence Against Men

November 20, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 28 – Wikipedia: More Problems Than Woke?

November 21, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Girls Gone Wild… Boys Gone Mild

November 22, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

With age comes wisdom, or so they say. Personally, I don't buy it, at least not as a blanket statement. I've seen too many examples to the contrary. Rather, I would posit that with age comes perspective. Beyond a certain age, it is almost impossible not to reflect on the past when witnessing current events.

I would also propose that perspective goes beyond one's lifetime. My parents were born in the second decade of the 20th century and my grandparents were born in the mid-1890s. Listening to them talk about their lives and times adds yet more perspective to one's own. I didn't experience what they did first-hand, but via one or two degrees of separation.

For example, my grandmother introduced me to the phrase, "sowing his wild oats." This was in the late 60s when my cousin got engaged. She and her fiancé were both 19, and my grandmother objected that the young man hadn't finished sowing his wild oats. In truth, she didn't know if he had even started since she had never met him. The young man in question was Catholic so in my grandmother's eyes that might have been an even bigger objection. You young "love is love" whippersnappers might find it hard to believe, but in those bad old days, a white Catholic marrying a white Protestant was considered a mixed marriage, and had a good chance of ending up a nixed marriage so far as the parents were concerned.

Well, I'm happy to report that the marriage proved to be one of those till-death-do-us-part matches, so the whole wild oats controversy was moot. The phrase, however, intrigued me, as I was in my wild oats years at the time, though I was hardly a hellion. In retrospect, I like to think I had gotten a head start on middle age.

Some sayings have short shelf lives, others much longer. It seems, however, that "sowing his wild oats" has disappeared from the collective consciousness. I can't remember the last time I heard it. Yet it's not as though the phrase is no longer relevant.

Traditionally, the phrase was applied to young men who were full of piss and vinegar, another phrase that's fallen into disuse. In truth, it would be better applied to a woman douching with a full bladder.

In effect, sowing wild oats described a rebellious/adventurous phase of a man's life. It included but was not restricted to sexual matters. Most men were expected to emerge on the other side of this phase and settle down (a phrase we still hear today). Settling down, of course, is almost always equated with getting married. Never mind that as men's testosterone levels decline, they tend to settle down whether they get married or not. And there are a few testosterone-enhanced individuals who will transition from raw youth to rake to roué, sowing their wild oats till the grim reaper arrives at harvest time, when settling down is finally assured.

Of course, sowing wild oats, if taken literally, means to strew seed all over the place, so the sexual implications are obvious. A horny young buck will screw anything…but I never heard my grandmother put it that way.

The phrase was never intended to be applied to women. One never heard she is sowing her wild oats, always he. Of course, women can't strew their seed sexually, so the term would not be apt.

This is not to say women are incapable of having colorful and versatile sex lives. The old wartime statistic of body count is now used in relation to such women. They aren't sowing their wild oats but "riding the cock carousel." Then they go on social media to share their experiences. Many boast of their sexual adventures, much as men were wont to do in ages past.

It seems to me that this is something truly new in the long thread of human history. Of course, we have had decadent eras, such as the Weimar Republic in Germany and the Roaring 20s in the USA when nice girls became scarce. Of course, the Great Depression ended the revelry as self-indulgence became a luxury.

And every era has had its whores, sluts, tramps, doxies, floozies, loose women, town pumps, or whatever you want to call them, but no one ever said their actions were empowering or they were just exploring their sexuality. Some of them tried to conceal their behavior, others flaunted it. Either way, they were not considered suitable role models for young women.

The typical young woman was not expected to be experienced sexually before marriage. Now, however, it has been normalized, and I think that is definitely something new under the sun. Today the bar has been lowered so a good girl need not be a virgin but one with a low body count. Of course, "low" is a subjective figure.

I don't claim to be an expert on world history, but offhand I can't think of any civilization that dismissed young women sleeping around as girls will be girls. Which makes one wonder if the normalization of such behavior marks a turning point in civilization, arguably a wrong turn.

Of course, the contemporary response would be that if men can do it, why not women? Old-timers would have told you why: pregnancy and venereal disease (as STDs/STIs used to be called), but perhaps overriding those was the matter of a young woman's reputation, always important when attempting to marry off a daughter. Damaged goods can't command the same price as pristine goods. A girl can't sew her hymen back in after sowing her wild oats.

While the slut was more liable to be mocked or given some variation of the scarlet letter treatment in more traditional times, today the virgin is more likely to be the object of derision. Given the relatively late (and getting later) age of first marriage for women, women have plenty of time to carve notches on their bedposts before they arrive at the marriage bed. Women no longer go directly from a bedroom in their parents' house to the marriage bed. There is more opportunity for sexual exploration. Fornication used to be considered a crime, and like all other crimes, it is a crime of opportunity.

Of course, the usual suspects (feminism, abortion, the birth control pill) can be found front and center in the lineup when we search for culprits in this “crime wave.” The rise of singles culture has also played a big part. Of course, we have always had single people but nobody built blocks of apartment complexes and condos for them to live in. The single adult demographic was not big enough to be a marketing target. Singleness was a transitional phase, not a lifestyle choice. The young woman who failed to find a mate was a career girl at best or an old maid at worst. Upon reaching the ripe old age of 25, she would discover that all the girls in her circle had already tied the knot and wonder what they had that she didn’t have.

Several generations ago it was not unusual for high school sweethearts (is the term “going steady” still in use anywhere?) to get married after graduation. There was a little more leeway for college students, who were four years older when they graduated. For many women, one of the goals of attending college was snaring a husband. When men outnumbered women on college campuses it was a target-rich environment for women playing the mating game. Today’s coeds would roll their eyes at that concept even while they lament the lack of datable men on campus.

In fact, a few years ago, Susan Patton, a Princeton alumna, started a controversy when she wrote a letter to The Daily Princetonian, asserting that the pool of eligible men at Princeton was as good as it gets for a young woman who is planning on getting married. Given the hypergamous nature of women and that Princeton always appears near or at the top of elite universities, it’s difficult to argue with Patton’s assertion. But how dare anyone suggest that the modern bluestocking sully her precious college experience by stooping to mate-shopping.

Yet in days of old, many college women succeeded at the mating game, marrying soon after graduation, or in some cases even before. Today I think you would be hard-pressed to find a married undergraduate female. Given the increasing average age of marriage, even a married female grad student is likely a rare bird today.

I’m old enough to remember when it was not just socially acceptable for young women to admit they were in the market for a husband, it was taken for granted. Remember the cousin I mentioned in the third paragraph of this essay? Before she met her future husband, she would scribble future name changes pertaining to her then-boyfriends on scrap paper. So instead of her current name (call her Jane Doe), she would write down Jane Smith, or Mrs. Robert Smith, or Mr. and Mrs. Robert Smith, or best of all, Dr. and Mrs. Robert Smith. She was taking the names for a test ride to see how they looked on paper. Today, of course, you can’t assume a college-educated woman will change her name to reflect her married status.

Somewhere along the line the goal shifted from a husband to a relationship, an open-ended term that encompasses not just marriage but every conceivable sort of interaction between two people. In grandma’s day there was no shortage of how-to articles and books about getting married, just as today there is no scarcity of books and web sites offering advice for young women about relationships.

Throughout most off human history women were married off not long after they reached menarche. Today we may be horrified by the thought of a 14-year-old getting married unless it involves hillbilly humor. Even today we still have Sweet 16 parties (lowered to l5 in Hispanic cultures and known as quinceañeras). At the upper echelons of society, there are debutantes. It is a way of announcing to the world that one's daughter is ready to mate and is available to entertain suitable suitors. She is an IPO (initial public offering) in the sexual marketplace.

Of course, now a 15 or 16-year-old girl is more likely to be sexually experienced but she may still appear virginal and have many years of fertility in her future, which would still make her more desirable than an older woman with a higher body count.

Back in 1968, Joanne Woodward starred in (and won a Best Actress Oscar for) Rachel, Rachel, the story of a 35-year-old teacher who finally loses her virginity to an old classmate. She was on a path towards old maidhood, which was not a desirable status and would invite derision at worst or pity at best. Now we have more old maids than ever – but don't dare call them that. I wouldn't call them spinsters either. And whatever you do, don't pity them. Today the modern woman is celebrated because she don't need no man. Her fertility window is all but nailed shut and her sexual marketplace value has dropped to bargain basement levels, yet she is offered up to younger women as a role model.

Beyond a certain age, female virginity comes with a stigma. It just isn't cool. A much larger stigma, however, is borne by the male virgin. Consider the plight of the incel, which is phonetically and connotatively close to insult. In truth, it is hard to account for the incel. Are there no massage parlors? Are there no escort services? Are there no streetwalkers? Are there no brothels?

While the incel is considered a loser at best and a potential terrorist at worst (you never know when he might show up with an AR-15 at a women's college or a beauty salon). Of course, it wasn't that long ago (2005 to be exact) that audiences roared at Steve Carell in The 40-Year-Old Virgin, No. 18 in the year's box office receipts with $109,449,237). The protagonist was a fully functioning member of society but laughable simply because he had never done the deed.

In these (theoretically) egalitarian days, it is difficult to justify double standards in matters of sexual behavior, even by pointing out the obvious physiological differences. Two sexes, two standards would seem to be a reasonable policy, but it goes against the official story. Intrasexually, however, egalitarianism is nonexistent. Babes and studs are still in demand while wallflowers and nerds huddle in their blankets of quiet desperation.

For females, sowing one's wild oats is more than just body count. These days it probably includes bisexuality, lesbianism, or polyamorism. Filling the coffers of tattoo artists appears to be part of the program and nose rings are more prized than engagement rings. Gone are the days when one could leaf through National Geographic and snicker self-righteously at self-mutilating tribes living in remote jungles.

The concept of girls sowing their wild oats wasn't a thing in olden days because women had neither the time nor resources to do so. They were not expected to do so and they did not expect to do so. Domesticity was the norm, not dating apps or vacations in Santorini or hot rock massages in Sedona.

So where is it all going? Well, we know that bodily fluids are still being exchanged but the transactions are not resulting in more procreation. Birth rates are at or below replacement levels in every developed country. What motivation is there to return to old ways? Appeals to posterity have had little effect.

Can we save civilization from collapse by turning back the clock and once again shaming women for sowing their wild oats? Well, Eve couldn't regurgitate that apple and Pandora couldn't re-shut that box.

Now we have not only the curious prospect of women sowing their wild oats, but men declining to do so. People who keep track of such things inform us that men aren't getting laid as much as their fathers and grandfathers were. First buying a house was out of reach, then buying a car, and now this!

Of course, the potential for disaster in relationships with females has been exhaustively delineated on this web site. All it takes is one social media posting from a disgruntled sex partner and your career could be over, or your income source drastically reduced. It's enough to make a guy go full Onan. Better to spill one's seed and risk incurring God's wrath than to plant a seed in the swampy crotch-maw of some social media diva.

Once sex robots are on the market at popular prices, there'll be no turning back. The demand is already there just waiting for the supply to catch up. If the prices are low enough, a man could have a harem of robot females – ensuring a lifetime of sowing one's wild oats!

The sex robot is perhaps the ultimate expression of the human binary as the buyer can dictate his opposite sex turn-ons down to the slightest detail. No need to settle! The workplace robot, however, is the ultimate denial of the sexual binary: it is neither male nor female, it cares not for traditional male jobs or traditional female jobs. It is just a fungible work unit. Like sex robots, however, workplace robots require maintenance and sometimes replacement. The workplace robot will never take a day off for PMS, and the sex robot will never have a headache.

As we ponder where we are going, is it possible girls will continue to sow their wild oats – or do so with even more vigor – while men will continue to stow their mild oats – or lapse into an even deeper apathy so far as sex goes? Experience has taught us that when you think things have gone as far as they can go, you are almost always wrong.

As marriage rates approach zero, then the time frame of sowing one's wild oats will expand to encompass one's entire adult life. There will be no settling down. If a woman has no interest in and little chance of marriage, then body count will be irrelevant. There will be no stigma for slutty behavior because there will be no potential husbands.

Of course, that's assuming we don't have some sort of global game-changer. What could that be? Well, if things go sideways in the Middle East, a nuclear war would qualify. Afterwards, if there are a few female survivors capable of reproducing, they will face tremendous peer pressure to do so. Forget all that science fiction blather about artificial wombs. There will be no scientists to develop them, nor any money to do so, and a young woman who insists that sowing her wild oats is a basic human right will be decried as a human race traitor!

Going against the grain, wild oats will be domesticated till they are as tame as Quaker Oats. The meek will indeed inherit the earth!

Why Men’s Rights Activists Should Care About Folklore

November 23, 2023 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

Feminism is ubiquitous in fairy tale studies. Donald Haase edited a book about it: Fairy Tales and Feminism: New Approaches. Nancy Canepa, in Teaching Fairy Tales, called it “groundbreaking” and responsible for “stimulating” conversations within the field. Jack Zipes declared Laura Gonzenbach more important than the Brothers Grimm in his introduction to Beautiful Angiola, because her collection “more genuinely and more candidly” represented “the female if not feminist perspective on life.”

Men’s rights activists should be concerned about this political appropriation of folklore since the genre is globally popular (e.g., Disney) and has been used for “consciousness-raising and consensus-building in a wide range of social movements,” according to Ohio State University’s Center for Folklore Studies. This means worldwide pop culture and humanitarianism are being shaped by anti-male prejudices.

The best recourse is to reclaim folktales. Good candidates include “The Cow-Tail Switch,” which affirms male life and fatherhood; “Strike but Hear,” which champions due process; and “Ara the Fair and Shamiram,” which acknowledges male rape victims, as these tales examine men’s gendered experiences, and are underdiscussed among folklorists, giving MRAs the opportunity to popularize them and set the standard for how they’re interpreted. Text-to-world analysis, which compares real and fictional scenarios, helps the process by allowing MRAs to blend male issues discussion with textual study.

The Cow-Tail Switch

Found in The Cow-Tail Switch and Other West African Stories, this Liberian tale subverts common attitudes about men and their social roles. Ogaloussa goes hunting and disappears. Afterwards, his wife births a son, Puli, who asks where his father is, prompting his brothers to search the forest until they find their father’s corpse, and magically reanimate it. Ogaloussa returns home and crafts a cow-tail switch, saying it’s for the son most responsible for his rescue. His children argue over who deserves it, with other villagers arguing too, but he gives it to Puli and everyone agrees it’s the right choice.

The primary theme is the value of male wellness. Initially, nobody attempted to find Ogaloussa after he disappears, not even his family. This reflects male disposability.

Manifestations of the phenomenon include the Canadian government's exclusion of men and boys from its Inquiry Into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women, lesser assistance given to homeless men in the U.S., and the abandonment of military-aged men during warzone evacuations. However, this tale critiques such attitudes. Puli, unfamiliar with his father, and unaccustomed to the man endangering himself for others' benefit, is rewarded for caring about him by being gifted the titular object. A subtler critique comes from Ogaloussa and Puli being the sole characters with forenames which are generally reserved for important characters. The implication is that men who suffer are important and only those willing to help them deserve recognition.

The secondary theme is the importance of fathers. Puli's older brothers are competent individuals, implied to know combat, navigation, teamwork and tracking, along with their magic. While the text doesn't confirm it, it's reasonable to assume Ogaloussa taught them their survivalist skills given his occupation. Combined with the brothers' willingness to locate their father when Puli asks for him (a loving gesture), the story affirms what clinical research proves: father involvement positively effects educational success and prosocial behavior.

A men's rights perspective also answers to the story's final question: Does Puli, who remembered Ogaloussa and prompted his rescue, deserve more recognition than his brothers, who found and resurrected their father? As a "dilemma tale," the story's outcome is meant to be debatable. But the ending is inevitable considering Puli did the most and thus of anyone: he set a precedent that benefits all men in his community (i.e., valuing male life).

Strike but Hear

A story from Folk-Tales of Bengal that promotes due process rights. Three princes are tasked with patrolling their kingdom and on their first night the youngest son meets a guardian deity who warns him of his father's impending death. The prince beheads the cobra that was going to bite his father, but during the cleanup, he drops blood on his stepmother's breast. He wipes it off as his stepmother (who hates him) awakens, and she tells his father that he tried to rape her. Believing the accusation, the father summons his sons and asks them how he should punish the crime. They tell him to kill the perpetrator but warn him to prove guilt, citing three instances of people being harmed due to unsubstantiated claims. The youngest son then explains what happened and his father believes him.

The rajah's belief in his son's testimony is significant because a feature of real false allegations is that people ignore counterevidence. For instance, Reverend George Burroughs was executed on accusations of witchcraft during the Salem Witch Trials, despite reciting the Lord's Prayer perfectly, which was believed impossible for witches to do. Furthermore, civil rights activist Ida B. Wells noted that "No colored man, no matter what his reputation, is safe from lynching if a white woman, no matter what her standing or motive, cares to charge him with insult or assault." Even when the targets survive their lives are devastated. Consider the three lacrosse players from Duke University, whom were threatened with castration by angry protesters. While they were unharmed, their reputations were ruined and they faced intense hostility and scrutiny from the media and school faculty.

When read from a men's rights perspective, this tale exposes false accusations as timeless and international; prevalent enough to warrant documentation in oral narrative. It also joins a body of narratives that explore the topic: the Greco-Roman myth of Hippolytus and Phaedra and the Egyptian story of Anpu and Bata.

Ara the Fair and Shamiram

Taken from The Heritage of Armenian Literature, this legend highlights male sexual victimization. Queen Semiramis (Shamiram) hears of Ara's beauty and becomes obsessed with him, proposing either marriage or copulation, but the king declines both. The queen retaliates by invading Armenia with the intention of subduing and ravishing Ara. However, during the attack, he's killed and Semiramis fails to magically resurrect him. Armenian troops prepare a counterstrike, intent on avenging their king, but Semiramis convinces them that he's been revived by disguising another man as him, ending the war in her favor.

Ara's rejection of an eager woman is significant. His chastity contradicts perceptions of men as hypersexual – a stereotypes so pervasive it's influenced policies. One example was airlines barring men – but not women – from sitting beside unaccompanied minors; the assumption being that men are potential molesters. Inversely, Semiramis is defined by her predation. Her lasciviousness corresponds with data showing women commit 13% of rapes and 79% of "made to penetrates" against men. Moreover, the queen's use of military power to try to rape Ara reflects cultural and institutional acceptance of sexual violence against men throughout the world. Boys in Afghanistan are sometimes sold by their families as sex slaves to warlords. Israel has a legal definition of rape that excludes male victims. And the U.S. government once forced a survivor of statutory rape to pay child support to the woman who assaulted him.

Looked at from a men's rights angle, this story disrupts contemporary Western attitudes of gender and morality that frame females more positively than men, resulting in preferential treatment of women in various sectors of life. This older narrative shows that the ancients had a nuanced concept of good and evil with relation to the sexes.

Conclusion

In Fairy Tales from Before Fairy Tales, Jan M. Ziolkowski writes, "Being incorrigibly optimistic (if only when it comes to stories), I have faith that people will be inquisitive about ancient and medieval literatures if those literatures can be shown to relate somehow to their present." These literatures do relate to our present since they capture men's gendered experiences. They also belong to a financially lucrative and socially relevant genre that spans the world. Why not utilize that potential to bring attention to the issues and needs of men and boys? Doing so would further human rights progress while adding intellectual diversity to an academic discipline.

Zero Suicide Event Parliament House – Australia

November 24, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The wife of Bath

November 25, 2023 | by Eva Barb | Link | Original Link

The Wife of Bath is, arguably, the most notorious of Geoffrey Chaucer's pilgrims in his unfinished work, The Canterbury Tales (1387)—consisting of 116 tales and narrated by 29 distinct pilgrims. The generally accepted notion among scholars is that Jankyn (the Wife's fifth husband) and his book, The Book of Wicked Wife (an anthology of women-on-men violence), is misogynist. On the contrary, Jankyn's book is a collection that narrates male victimization, violence against men, and misandry.

The Wife is a skilled cloth-maker, self-identified nymphomaniac, and an out-spoken, dressed-for-battle veteran of a traveler who has been analyzed in light of psychoanalytic theory, feminism, Marxism and queer studies. Despite feminist scholars who celebrate the Wife of Bath as the representation of resistance to Church-imposed patriarchy, her qualities (feminist and anti-feminist alike) are violent and destructive.

Most importantly, they revolve around a systematic manipulation of men into subhuman positions of silence. Using the instance of the Wife's assault on Jankyn as the premise for this analysis, I interrogate the erasure of male victimization that occurs in the Wife's Prologue as well as a similar, but more damning, omission of these narratives throughout the critical history of The Canterbury Tales.

The Wife of Bath provides a sharp juxtaposition to the meekly dressed and soft-spoken nuns among the pilgrims. Her Tale recounts the story of a knight who is convicted of rape and must pay penance by traveling the world in order to find the secret behind what women most desire (which turns out to be absolute sovereignty). Setting up a direct precedent for her Tale is a Prologue that focuses on what she's learned throughout her five marriages. The Wife's convictions on matrimony and the dynamics of wife/husband can be identified as existing on the following tenets, (which implicate each corresponding point):

1. The husband's marital obligations are to provide money, property, and sexual fulfillment to his wife. The Wife explicitly refers to these obligations as "debts."
   A) A wife's obligation(s) to her husband is/are (for the most part) non-existent, despite the fact he is perpetually indebted to her.

2. In the Middle Ages, a woman's only way of experiencing her sexuality was through multiple marriages by way of widow-ship.
   B) The death of the husband is the sexual freedom of the wife, all the while she reaps the deceased's possessions.
3. A woman's education is defined by her experiences in matrimony and the knowledge on men and masculinity passed down by her mother.
   C) Perspectives on men and masculinity are defined by female agents.
4. Women are inherently irrational and deceptive.

D) The Wife is an unreliable narrator who, perhaps, shouldn't be taken at face-value.

5. Women most desire complete control over men.
   E) All the world's qualms can be solved by giving women tyrannical rule over men—an ideal echoed in mainstream feminism by mantras such as: "The future is female," and so on.

Jankyn is the Wife's youngest, most handsome, Oxford-educated husband. He is also the only one of the five husbands that she claims to truly love. He's good in bed, has a possessiveness comparable to that of the Wife's, and enjoys routinely reading from his Book of Wicked Wives. Intriguingly, the Wife prefaces the stories Jankyn recounts from the Book of Wicked Wives by echoing a medieval version of the Fable of Aesop: "Who peynted the leoun, tel me who?" (692). This version goes: a man and a lion were arguing over which of them were the stronger animal. The man shows the lion a painting of a man killing a lion, to which the lion asks, "Who painted the lion?" Then the lion eats the man (Boenig and Taylor 159). When the Wife asks: "Who painted the lion, tell me who?" she's suggesting that the painter's product directly correlates with his/her biases. Therefore, the male theologians that she spends the entirety of her Prologue disagreeing with are prejudiced to depict women in a negative light because, she claims, they are angry and sterile (707-8).

Contrary to the general consensus among scholars, the stories in The Book of Wicked Wives are not misogynist. In fact, there is no question about how vividly they convey misandry. The more relevant examples from Jankyn's book convey two significant points of contemporary misandry, 1) The feminine objectification of men by way of enforcing male sexual fidelity, and 2) The masculine obligation to fight in war, but most importantly, the social erasure of the pandemic male genocide that is war. These are as follows:

1. Hercules sets himself on fire, after his wife, Deianira, gives him a poisoned shirt in the hopes that he would remain faithful (Boenig and Taylor 159).

2. Socrates's wife, Xantippa, throwing urine on his head. "He sits still, as if he were dead," (729-30).
3. Clytemnestra conspiring with her paramour and murdering her husband, Agamemnon, upon his return from war (Boenig and Taylor 160).
4. When Amphiaraus hides in order to avoid a mandatory draft, his wife, Eriphyle, betrays his hiding place for a brooch of gold, and Amphiaraus is consequently killed on the battlefield (741-45).

Jankyn goes on to tell the Wife about other women who poisoned their husbands for political prominence and to avenge being cheated on. There is also more than one instance of murder via botched love potion. Perhaps the most grisly of these tales is when Jankyn speaks of an unidentified woman killing her husband and then proceeding to have sex with her lover next to the deceased's corpse.

If we treat The Canterbury Tales as a contained piece of poetry, whether it does or doesn't parallel reality, it nonetheless presents narratives of men being forsaken and murdered by women. Further, as we turn to the assault scene between the Wife and Jankyn, an uncanny and perplexing result becomes of it: Jankyn's submission to the Wife.

After hearing the complete aforementioned stories and more, the Wife gets so angry at Jankyn that she rips a page out of his book and punches him on the cheek so forcefully that he falls backward. In a moment of instigated anger, he gets up and hits her on the head, making her deaf in one ear. She falls to the floor, feigning death (or perhaps she was actually knocked unconscious). In a dramatic moment of utter nonsense, the Wife accuses Jankyn of having killed her for her land, and then goes on to kiss him one last time before she "dies." It is important to note that as the Wife recounts this story to her fellow pilgrims, she puts emphasis on how "gently" Jankyn kneels beside her, begs for forgiveness, (she then hits him on the cheek, again, and pretends to be dying, again). Ultimately, Jankyn grants the Wife absolute sovereignty over their estate and domestic life, burns his Book of Wicked Wives, and they (supposedly) live happily ever after.

Chaucer is known for his sense of humor. The assault scene in the Wife's Prologue might be hilarious in its incoherence, except when one begins to look at what really happened during this quarrel. Drawing from the Wife's unreliability as a narrator and her desire for absolute power over men, we can conclude that many, if not all, of the details she recounts are either entirely fabricated or edited to meet her needs.

Most suspicious is what makes Jankyn have such a sudden change of heart; strong enough to burn his beloved book and submit all of his independence to the Wife who just punched him (twice). This can easily be read as an example of the actual dominance women hold over men, especially when they've committed perhaps the most condemned of actions: hitting a woman. Plausibly, this is enough for Jankyn to give up all of his freedom and livelihood. If anything, we can see how Chaucer explicitly initiates narratives of male victimization and consequently exemplifies their erasures through the burning of the book, but also through Jankyn's Othering into a position of silent obedience.

In medieval times, misogyny (which consisted mostly of philosophers and theologians claiming that women were inferior to men) and agents of misandry (chivalry, matrimony, and pretty much everything the Wife says) existed on separate spheres. They were then, and still are now, forms of bigotry that have no relation to each other, except when feminists say misogyny! at the expense of misandry! Thus, erasure of violence against men perpetuates. Chaucer's Wife of Bath is the epitome of misandry, and in a cleverly ironic narrative construction, her Prologue both emphasizes male victimization and shows how easily, seamlessly, and without question it undergoes erasure.

Reference:

Chaucer, Geoffrey. The Canterbury Tales. "The Wife of Bath's Prologue." Edited by Robert Boenig and Andrew Taylor. Broadview, 2012, pp. 147-162.

The featured image depicts an 1812 painting of the wife of Bath by Swiss painter Henry Fuseli.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

November 27, 2023 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

---

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of August 2023 McLellan is still at large. Sebastian, who would now be 10, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Canada. We have information that McLellan has wealthy family in the New Orleans area and may be hiding out there.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's investigator, Claudia Rodriguera.

Harvey Silverglate of F.I.R.E.

November 28, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

With a tip of the hat to Bewildered, here is a magnificent example of why the editorial position of this website is to draw no lines of distinction between left and right for the purposes of men's activism.

Would you like to watch videos of the talks from ICMI24 in Budapest?

November 29, 2023 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

On our YouTube channel we have playlists of the talks (and more) of every ICMI held since the first held near Detroit in 2014 – here. Tom Caulfield, our Technical Director, has been responsible for the video recording and editing at every ICMI since ICMI16 in London, apart from the one that just took place in India. He's done a great job, often in very challenging circumstances.

The amount of equipment that needs to be taken to ICMIs is huge and includes three video cameras, tripods and lighting. Tom has run successful crowdfunders for every event he's covered, and his crowdfunder for the Budapest conference is here. Launched only recently, it's already received £485 towards the £3,000 target from generous supporters. The money will all go towards covering the cost of transport and accommodation. Tom has never charged anything for his services. If he charged his time at commercial rates, ICMIs would be financially unaffordable. The organizers of the events make little if any profit, and sometimes a loss.

Following a serious health issue early this year, Tom plans to retire from video recording ICMI talks after Budapest. He's been training another very competent video maker, Andy, who will join him in Budapest, and video record later ICMIs in Europe and possibly beyond.

These videos will one day be recognized as the extraordinary body of work that they are. Please donate what you can to help Tom meet the £3,000 target and thereby ensure there will be videos recorded in Budapest. Thank you, and have a good weekend.

The cover image depicts Budapest, courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Clinician Zander Keig has lived as both a man and a woman. Guess who had the privilege?

November 30, 2023 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Six Women in Maine Obsessed with Cutting Penis!

December 1, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Bumble acts as a check on female narcissism

December 2, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Pearl Davis: Fake Wives Abandon Perfect Husbands And Get Reality Checked

December 3, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Anonymous donation of £1,000 for the Budapest conference video fundraiser

December 4, 2023 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

Tom Caulfield, our Technical Director, was responsible for filming and editing all the videos at ICMIs since the 2016 event in London, other than the recent one in India. He's always done a magnificent job, often in challenging circumstances. Playlists of all those ICMI videos, as well as the videos from the inaugural ICMI near Detroit in 2014, and so many others besides, are on our YouTube channel – here.

Our thanks to Tom for letting us know of an amazing (anonymous) donation of £1,000 this evening, which lifted the crowdfunder total for next year's ICMI in Budapest to £1,730.

I've just posted my second donation (£20) so the total now stands at £1,750. That leaves £1,250 to be raised to put the funding in place for videos to be recorded for posterity in Budapest next August. I would ask you to join me in donating whatever you can afford for this important fundraiser. Thank you, and have a good week.

Chivalry feminism

December 4, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

It's easy to assume chivalry and feminism are unrelated, for don't feminists eschew chivalry as belittling to women? Well, yes and no.

Over a century ago Ernest B. Bax noticed feminist rhetoric has it both ways – feminists renounce chivalry as demeaning and even victimizing to women on the one hand, and on the other take it as something to be solicited from every layer of government, business and wider society by overtures about women's vulnerability. As most feminists continue to demonstrate, chivalry-seeking remains a core part of the business model, so much so that without it feminism might not exist.

Perhaps a shock to those among us who would do away with feminism in order to return to a 'traditional' model of sexual relations only to discover that the traditional woman is eerily similar to the new woman in that she too exploits and indeed expects male chivalry.

E.B. Bax describes first-wave feminists advocating male chivalry for the benefit of women. His assessment in the following quotes underscores how "chivalry feminists," as he called them, along with the masses of women influenced by their message, have tended to be duplicitous about their reliance on chivalry

Ernest B. Bax on 'Chivalry Feminism'

"THE justification for the whole movement of Modern Feminism in one of its main practical aspects – namely, the placing of the female sex in the position of privilege, advantage and immunity – is concentrated in the current conception of "chivalry." It behoves us, therefore, to devote some consideration to the meaning and implication of this notion. Now this word chivalry is the dernier ressort of those at a loss for a justification of the modern privileging of women.

[…]

"It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward.

[…]

“Every outrageous pretension of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, “manliness.” It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of “manliness.”

[…]

“Such is “chivalry” as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men.

[…]

But these considerations afford only one more illustration of the utter irrationality of the whole movement of Sentimental Feminism identified with the notion of “chivalry.” For the rest, we may find illustrations of this galore. A very flagrant case is that infamous “rule of the sea” which came so much into prominence at the time of the Titanic disaster. According to this preposterous “chivalric” Feminism, in the case of a ship foundering, it is the unwritten law of the seas, not that the passengers shall leave the ship and be rescued in their order as they come, but that the whole female portion shall have the right of being rescued before any man is allowed to leave the ship. Now this abominable piece of sex favouritism, on the face of it, cries aloud in its irrational injustice.

Source: Chapter-5 ‘The Chivalry Fake’ in The Fraud of Feminism, 1913

“Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of’ “What! Hit a woman!”

Why not, if she molests you?

“Treat a woman in this way!” “Shame!” responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender.”

[…]

“In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.

Source: The Fraud of Feminism – Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement

Modern Educayshun

December 5, 2023 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

---

Excellent satire illustrating the “potential dangers” of our increasingly reactionary culture of Political Correctness on our college campuses and in the media.

If you like Neel Kolhatkar‘s work his YT channel can be found here.

Acid attacks in Italy – Manipulation of the public

December 6, 2023 | by Silvio Altarelli | Link | Original Link

---

Acid attacks were unknown in Italy until 2009, when feminist journalists started to attack all men by talking about female victims of acid attacks in East Asia and Africa, painting it as a gender issue. The reality is that men are 48% of the victims of acid attacks in Cambodia, 18% in Bangladesh, 43% in Uganda, 60% in Nigeria, and we could go on like this. The reality is that this issue is both rare and non-gendered.

But only in one case did the press write about a man attacked with acid, and the title was as egregious as it gets: Nabila, the courageous woman who launched an acid attack against her 21-year-old boyfriend.

As a consequence of this topic being brought up in the media, the Italian public learned as follows: between 2009 & 2014, 16 persons were attacked with acid in Italy: 9 women and 7 men.

At this point, the feminist press could select a single victim as the symbol of the struggle that their ideology promotes. Of course, all men and children who were victims of acid attacks were discarded. A few women were discarded as well: one was a politician attacked by a man, another one was attacked by a woman, and another one claimed that she was attacked by men, but the police discovered that she threw acid on herself in order to build a false allegation.

Lucia Annibali, a female lawyer attacked by her ex-lover, had the politically correct victim profile. So she was heavily promoted: in some days we could see her in the morning, at lunch, at dinner, in major TV programs. She got prizes: the president of Italy (an 89-year-old ex-communist) nominated her with the title of "Cavaliere" (Knight). The feminist president of parliament received her. Luckily, Lucia mostly recovered from the aesthetic damages she suffered. Her aggressors were charged with attempted homicide and sentenced to 20 + 14 + 14 years and ordered to pay her €1.8 million in reparations.

Amongst the other forgotten victims was William Pezzullo. When his girlfriend started lying to him, he broke up with her. When he became a victim of stalking, he did not react, not even when his car was damaged. At some point his ex-girlfriend contacted her previous boyfriend. They then conspired and attacked William by hitting him on the head, and then she threw acid on him. After 20 days of intensive care he survived, but he was left severely disabled following the ordeal: he was left both deaf and blind.

The prosecutor refused to charge her with attempted homicide, stating that "we do not wish to create a monster," despite evidence that she had searched the Internet for the most aggressive type of acid to use. They got sentenced to 10 years of jail each, which in Italy essentially means five years of real jail for the man and zero for the woman. Indeed, the woman who attacked William is a mother, and according to an Italian feminist law, mothers should and indeed can avoid going to jail, even in situations like these.

William got no compensation so far, so his family sold their commercial business in order to pay for the treatments he needs (recovery from an acid attack is considered an aesthetic and elective procedure and it is thus not covered by state insurance). He is assisted by his mother, Paola Tomarelli, who told the Italian press:

> William has not improved at all, [on the contrary,] he is getting worse [and] we are desperate. One eye was completely lost, but at least with the other he could see shadows, and some movements. Now he does not see anything … The plastic reconstruction surgery failed to achieve the results; we took him to several hospitals, where they tried to rebuild using muscles and tissues from the neck, but now he is worse than before. William suffered for three months before leaving the intensive care unit. [The doctors] were not sure whether they'd be able to save his life. For 16 months now he is closed in our house and we leave the house only to bring him to hospitals or specialists. We are desperate, he is not self-sufficient, he will never become self-sufficient [and] this is the most dramatic aspect.

In theory, the president of Italy should be the president of everybody: so Paola Tomarelli and others wrote him asking for help for William. They only got an answer written by some woman in his staff: a letter that claims that men should be represented not by a victim but by some actors who appeared in a feminist advertisement saying, 'We do not hit women." The president's office essentially told them that William was the wrong sex. You can't make this stuff up! Read the letter here (in Italian).

Did feminists have a good reason for this disgusting operation that ruined the life of 16 persons? Yes, they had 82 million good reasons. This is the amount of public funds (in euros) that they wanted to obtain for their women-only shelters. That's over US$110 million.

In 2014, feminists got their Istanbul Convention ratified in Italy. Women and men are no longer equal under the law, not even formally. Men are perpetrators, women are victims. William is a perpetrator, Lucia is a victim. By virtue of their sex.

It was the feminist ideology who used to declare this. It's the law. Politicians and judges have a legal justification to discriminate against William, and against all men.

Gynocentrism: The Real Gender Cult

December 8, 2023 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

The Men’s Movement- Fair, but Imbalanced

December 10, 2023 | by Eincrou | Link | Original Link

In my very short time as an observer of the budding Men’s Movement I have been impressed with the analytical prowess of not only those who regularly write articles or run websites and blogs, but also those who intermittently leave comments. The concentration of Eureka! moments induced by the content I have viewed on men’s websites is unmatched by anywhere else I have been on the Internet. However, not everyone who has happened upon this growing movement has been as captivated by the quality of discourse as I have.

There is a certain brand of commenter who announces that the discussions in the men’s movement are unbalanced. Though they don’t necessarily disagree completely, they want to remind us that our analysis is flawed by not taking everything into account. It is true that the biggest challenge of proper analysis is incorporating all relevant information, but I have yet to see a commenter make an argument of this type that successfully invalidates an analysis. They invade the discussion as a champion of ‘balance’ but all they are actually doing is disrupting the scale by adding dusty rocks, broken twigs, crumpled tin cans and all manner of otherwise irrelevant debris.

I have to wonder why they would find it necessary to tell a feather being weighed against a hammer about the importance of ‘balance.’ It would seem that in this circumstance, the most efficient way to promote balance is to somehow address the massive weight of the hammer, rather than ensuring that the tip of the feather weighs as much as the stem. These people would better spend time in their search for equality and fairness if they did exactly what the men’s movement aims to do: strengthen the wills of men and tear down the zero-sum benefits women gain at the expense of men, specifically and civilization, ultimately.

Why, then, do they try to promote ‘balance’ here? Is it because they see us as actually willing to change our minds? Could it be an acknowledgement that what we think will soon have a great effect, and they want us to not forget to care about women? Or, could it be the opportunity to satiate their misandry at the same time as they imagine themselves to be intellectually competent enough to think about a topic as grand as the course of human society?

We are certainly easy targets here. Neither men nor women seem to have any qualms or fears about arguing with men. Both men and women have come to A Voice For Men to tell us we are unbalanced, and that we should be promoting everybody and not just men. I suppose they take issue with the fact that men’s sites honestly state a clear intention to uniquely help men. Feminists lie about their false position of balance by claiming to promote equality, even though they are literally incapable of even conceptualizing what that would mean. The ‘balance’ commenters expect us to be even-handed when feminists clearly are not. That hammer definitely has one end which is heavier than the other.

There is a distinct need for a school of thought unified towards promoting men because this is something men and women will not do passively. There must be articles written that totally fail to address women's issues, by intent and by design. We need thinkers who conduct skewed analyses of society, especially taking into account how men are affected. This should not be done in ill faith or by sacrificing truth and accuracy, but balance in the presentation is a luxury we must be willing to jettison. Anything less would be selling men short for the unique benefit of women a septillionth time.

Women have immense power over the minds of humanity. It is the power to get people to want to help her. Women have always had the ability to tip the scales of 'balance' in their favor by an innate and effortless ability to make people care about their concerns. Feminism represents a lust for the male form of power: forcing people to do things they do not want to do. Both of these powers combined is disastrous for men, and men must have the ability to focus on their issues for as long as this dynamic continues.

The people saying we are not taking everything into account about men and women are duly noted, and they are correct that we leave a lot out about 'bad men' and 'good women,' among other things. However, our goal is not to produce the most complete assessment of modern society in the West. It is to stop the abuses of decent men by governments at the behest of women, and it is difficult enough to get people to care about the well-being of men without setting our concerns parallel to those of women.

Another domestic abuse experiment shows same results

December 11, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

This is at least the third if not fourth experiment like this that we've seen. And we've seen it in multiple countries and languages too. The results are always the same:

Black Men First, Then The Rest

December 11, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Something many of us at AVfM have maintained for some time now is that most of the negative cultural forces against men in the United States started with the black community (and other minority communities), and spiraled outward from there. This video is sure to infuriate many who watch it, but while we don't have to agree with every single word here, there's more powerful truths here than most in this society would care to admit.

This also goes back to something else we've said many times before: when we stop allowing cultural forces to set men against each other because of ethnicity, and men start to come awake to reality and see their shared interests and their shared experiences, social change is going to come. Maybe faster than a lot of people realize.

Subscribe to MRDawson38 for more.

Lessons from nature: primal masculinity

December 12, 2023 | by Stephen Jarosek (aka Codebuster) | Link | Original Link

---

We human beings, especially those of us from the Anglosphere, grow up with strange notions of what it is to be a man. Americans bow to a pompous git wearing a black robe and address him as “Sir” for fear of going to debtor’s prison for being unable to pay child support. In Australia, draconian laws exist not to protect but to control – voting is compulsory, anti-association laws [1] (defining whom you are allowed to associate with) are periodically entertained and taken seriously, and we are fined hundreds of dollars for failing to wear bicycle helmets or failing to buckle up our seatbelts.

These are examples where we are penalized not for hurting anyone or stealing anything, but for minding our own business and taking responsibility for our own choices. In America and throughout the Anglosphere, we surrender our livelihoods and our dignity to provided-for women in their petty indulgences with Affirmative Action, while they grasp for alimony and government handouts. Men are having their children taken away from them in the interests of their primary abusers, placing their children at the mercy of their primary abusers. We must be the most gutless, spineless, dumbest manifestations of the male condition that the world has ever seen. Human dignity? What a joke.

It therefore pays to ask, what have we lost? What is the essence of male knowing? What does it mean to be a man? I reckon that this dude in the gorilla suit [2] might have a better idea than we do. What does he know? No one taught him to “man up”. What he knows seems to go beyond the petty “should” and “should-nots” of human society. What’s with his confidence, his calm temperament, and his sense of responsibility? He hangs back behind the group and looks around to check for stragglers, before rejoining them. He places a firm but gentle hand on one of the youngsters, guiding them to move aside, lest the over-enthusiastic youngster spook the oddly-behaving creature with the funny plumage. He encourages everyone in his tribe to check out the fragile creature at centre stage, making sure that no one hurts it, and it does not hurt them. His presence is a source of safety to both the fragile creature as well as the females and the youngsters of his tribe mesmerized by it.

Without his presence, who knows what impulses the females or the youngsters might heed, or what liberties they might be inclined to take? He sits back, observing proceedings, without feeling the need to also indulge. He is a natural leader, he turns to leave and everyone follows. He is the formidable male, and it is clear that he has earned the respect of his troop. If you look into his eyes, his face, and observe his demeanor, you cannot help but wonder what he knows that the females of his tribe never can. And he did not learn any of this from a human being. He is no chivalrous white knight, fawning over undeserving, grasping females regardless of their conduct. His is primal knowledge emerging from the jungle.

What is the nature of masculine knowing, without all the bullshit that we humans have to contend with? What do men, properly developed, know that women never can? Women have sexual power, but they can never know what men know. It's as if nature has deliberately established a divide that can never be traversed. There is no crossing this Rubicon. You cannot have both knowledge and sexual power.

What, on the other hand, is the nature of female knowing? For this, the best clues lie in matriarchal collectives, like bees, ants, meerkats, bonobos and hyenas. They too are impressive, but not in the same way that our video-clip shows the silverback male to be. Now I don't claim to be an authority who knows enough about gorillas in the wild or otherwise to provide a definitive, referable source accounting for their biology and behavior. But I do know that this singular video-clip has impressed me in an unexpected way.

Feminists, both male and female, despise the fact that at some primal level, the masculine ideal elicits their respect. They cannot stand it. Deep down inside they realize that the same kind of respect can never ever be earned by the provided-for sex. That is why feminists are trying to drive men down to their own level. That is why they are trying to turn men into [their impressions of] pleasure-seeking, group-thinking bonobos [3]. They cannot stand that they cannot know as men can. For all of women's sexual power, they find women's position of enslavement and inherent ignorance utterly unbearable.

REFERENCES

[1] Anti-biker legislation proposed – http://www.abc.net.au/news/2009-04-02/bikie-laws-an-overreaction/1639508

[2] Wild mountain gorilla – http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=1eXS0o6r-Wk

[3] Wikipedia on bonobos – http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Bonobo

The featured image is licenced under CC-BY-SA 4.0 and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Straight eye for the queer guy

December 13, 2023 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

The Maternal Preference

December 15, 2023 | by Tom James | Link | Original Link

Contrary to popular belief, there was never a time in American history when courts treated children as the "property" of their fathers so that mothers had to wage a decades-long Equal Rights campaign to win the right to have the custody of their own children. As explained in my book, The History of Custody Law, whatever the case may have been in other countries, American judges were applying the "best interests of children" standard to decide custody as early as 1804.

Sometimes an early nineteenth century judge even went so far as to chastise an attorney who tried to put forward a "father's rights" argument instead of a "best interests" argument. The truth is that America began by deciding custody on the basis of morality and marital fault. The movement that occurred in the nineteenth century was from that to a near-absolute preference for placing children in the sole custody of their mothers. That judicial predilection has come to be known as the maternal preference doctrine.

The maternal preference that was established in the nineteenth century continued to be the principal standard of decision in custody cases throughout most of the twentieth century.

"It is universally recognized that the mother is the natural custodian of her young. Accordingly, the mother is ordinarily awarded the custody of children of tender age, especially girls, unless it is clearly shown that she is not a fit and proper person."[1] Some jurisdictions codified it.[2] In others, courts applied a judicially-created presumption that maternal sole custody is in every child's best interests.

In all states, it was a firmly established rule of law throughout most of the twentieth century that the mother was entitled to custody of the children in a divorce or separation unless she was proven to be unfit to parent. “The mother of an illegitimate child is entitled to its custody unless she be unfit therefore. And the same rule as to custody of legitimate children is applied to the custody of illegitimate children, and the courts are controlled and actuated by the same considerations.”[3] As late as 1976, American Law Reports reported that “the vast majority of the jurisdictions continue to follow” the maternal preference, viewing the mother as the “natural custodian of her young” because “her love for her child is irreplaceable.”[4] Judges believed fathers either had no love for their children or whatever love they had was replaceable.

Prior to the 1980’s, judges simply assumed that mothers were imbued with a natural instinct for child-rearing, and that this instinct was lacking in fathers. Courts explained their refusal to grant custody to fathers this way: “To deprive [a] child of the society, companionship and the instinctive and natural maternal love of her mother … would hardly be to the interests of the child.”[5]

Sometimes courts characterized the mother-child bond as “sacred.” [6] The father-child bond was not. As the Wisconsin Supreme Court explained:

> [No father’s love] can be an adequate substitute for mother love – for that constant ministration required during the period of nurture that only a mother can give because in her alone is duty swallowed up in desire; in her alone is service expressed in terms of love.[7]

In 1972 the Maryland Court of Appeals candidly expressed its bias in favor of mothers in the following terms:

> The maternal tie is so primordial that it should not be lightly severed or attenuated. The appreciation of the visceral bond between mother and child will always be placed upon the balance scales, and all else being equal or nearly so, will tilt them.[8]

From article of faith to rule of reason

In 1973, Joseph Goldstein and Albert Solnit teamed up with Sigmund Freud’s daughter, Anna Freud, to publish a book called Beyond the Best Interests of the Child.[9] It espoused a psychoanalytic approach to determining what is in a child’s best interests, one that relied heavily on Sigmund Freud’s psychoanalytic theories and John Bowlby’s attachment theory, which also was grounded in Freudian theory.

Freud and her colleagues observed that an infant develops a psychological attachment to an adult who is personally and emotionally involved with him. They theorized that the attachment consisted of the baby’s superimposition of its libidinal interests on the events of bodily care (feeding and diaper-changing, for example.) They postulated that because of this early attachment, it is vitally important to a child’s psychological well-being for this first bond to remain uninterrupted.

> Such primitive and tenuous first attachments form the base from which any further relationships develop. What the child brings to them next are no longer only his needs for body comfort and gratification but his emotional demands for affection, companionship, and stimulating intimacy. Where these are answered reliably and regularly, the child-parent relationship becomes firm, with immensely productive effects on the child's intellectual and social development.[10]

"Unlike adults, who are generally capable of maintaining positive emotional ties with a number of different individuals," they asserted, "Children lack the capacity to do so."[11] Since mothers are the ones who are biologically equipped to nurse their babies, it is easy to see how Freud's theoretical framework could have been thought to support a preference for making awards of sole custody to mothers.

The fly in the ointment of course, is that it is not necessarily true that the mother is the one upon whom the child superimposes its libido in every case. If a particular father does a greater share of the feeding, diapering and comforting of the baby than the mother, then the theory would support a preference for making an award of sole custody to the father rather than the mother. The theory is not sufficient, by itself, to support a maternal preference or presumption specifically in favor of mothers.

Moreover, there was no basis for Freud's assumptions that children are incapable of forming psychological attachments to more than one person, much less that multiple attachments are detrimental to a developing child's psychological health. In fact, available empirical evidence contradicted those assumptions. For example, researchers H. Rudolph Schaffer and Peggy E. Emerson found that from birth to three months of age, babies respond and attach equally to any caregiver; between four and nine months, a baby tends to have a primary attachment to one person, but also maintains secondary attachments to others; and that by nine months babies form multiple attachments. In addition, they found that attachment correlates closely with the person who responds most accurately to the baby's needs and desires, not the person who spends the most time with the baby. Further, they reported that at eighteen months, a child's main attachment figure was the mother for only about half of the children studied, and the father was the main attachment figure for nearly all of the rest. Finally – and contrary to Freud's libidinal-superimposition theory — they found that the most important factor in forming attachments is not who feeds and diapers a child, but who plays and communicates with her.[12]

Nevertheless, late-twentieth century judges, custody evaluators, and family law policy-makers increasingly cited Freud's theory, as expounded in Beyond the Best Interests of the Child, as the justification for their preference for maternal sole custody, and for permitting children to have only very brief periods of visitation with their fathers.[13] By the end of the century, Freudian attachment theory had supplanted both God and maternal instinct as the doctrinal basis for the judicial preference for mothers.

Maternal unfitness

The maternal preference was never absolute. A father could rebut the presumption that custody should be awarded to the mother by proving that she was unfit to be a parent. Courts construed the concept of parental unfitness very narrowly when considering the fitness of a mother to parent, though. The double standard they had developed in this respect in the nineteenth century continued into the twentieth.

A father's insolvency or poverty was sufficient to support a finding of his unfitness for custody. In Bryant v. Dukehart,[14] the mother died and the trial court, instead of leaving the children in the custody of their father, awarded them to the guardian the mother had appointed in her will. Acknowledging that the surviving parent normally has a right to custody of the couple's children when one of the parents dies, the appellate court nevertheless affirmed the award of custody to the guardian rather than the father. In support of its decision, the court cited the fact that the father had entered into a lump-sum child support settlement at the time of the parties' divorce. The court held that a father's attempt to enter into a one-time lump-sum settlement of his child support obligation at the time of the divorce evidenced an intention to evade the obligation of a father to support women and children financially with periodic payments of money throughout their lives. That intention, the court declared, rendered him unfit to be a parent.

A mother's insolvency or poverty, by contrast, was deemed irrelevant to her fitness to parent. If a woman was not able to support her child, the courts reasoned that her financial difficulties could be ameliorated by ordering the father to pay alimony and child support to her. So long as she was not habitually drunk, did not suffer from a serious mental illness, and was not guilty of severe physical child abuse, a mother would be considered sufficiently fit for child-raising.[15]

In most states, a mother's commission of adultery would not support a finding the she was unfit to parent. A few states did treat adultery or other marital misconduct as evidence of parental unfitness.[16] Even in these states, though, a mother's termination of the adulterous relationship sufficed to restore her to full fitness.[17]

Other courts applied a more general double standard. These courts treated a father's commission of adultery, desertion or other marital misconduct as conclusive evidence of his unfitness to parent, but held that a mother's commission of these kinds of things did not necessarily render her unfit to parent, especially if the custody of a daughter, a disabled or unhealthy child, or a young child, was at stake. To these courts, the tender years doctrine overrode the presumption of parental unfitness that otherwise would arise upon proof of marital fault.

In most states, the fact that the mother was the one who was at fault for the divorce did not prevent a court from awarding her custody of the children, no matter how egregious her behavior had been. In Crabtree v. Crabtree,[18] the wife had cut a five-inch slit in her husband's throat with a razor blade, intending to kill him, and then chased him down and stabbed him again as he was running away. Upon his release from the hospital, he petitioned for divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty. The court found that the wife's attempt to kill him was not justified, her reason apparently having been simply her displeasure with his “sullen” attitude, and her anger at him for trying to get away from her. The court found that he had not been guilty of any wrongdoing, so he was indeed entitled to a divorce on the grounds of extreme cruelty. The court then proceeded to award custody of the children to the wife because she was their mother.

References:

[1] Comwell v. Comwell, 224 A. 2d 870 (Md. 1966); see also Hartog supra note 1 at 306 (“In 1950 (and still in 1960 and even in 1970), much of the nineteenth century law of husband and wife remained.”)

[2]La. Rev. Civ. Code art. 146 (1912) (superseded by La. Civ. Code art. 131 (2011)) (requiring courts to award custody to the wife even if she is at fault for the divorce); N.H. Stat. ch. 176 § 4 (superseded by N.H. Rev. Stat. § 458:16 (2011)) (authorizing only wives, not husbands, to get orders for temporary custody of children during the pendency of a divorce); R.I. Gen. Laws ch. 245, § 1 (1909) (superseded) (declaring that a married woman has sole custody if she lives separately from her husband for a year); Utah Comp. Laws § 3004 (1917) (superseded by Utah Code § 30-3-10 (2012)) (requiring courts to award custody to the mother unless she is proven to be “immoral or otherwise incompetent”); P.R. Civ. Code §§ 166, 175 (1902) (superseded) (requiring courts to award custody to the wife unless she is at fault for the divorce.)

[3] Pierce v. Jeffries, 137 S.E. 651 (W. Va. 1927).

[4] Thomas R. Trenkner, Annotation, Modern Status of Maternal Preference Rule or Presumption in Child Custody Cases, 70 A.L.R.3d 262 (1976).

[5] Pitts v. Pitts, 29 A. 2d 300, 305 (Md. 1942). Freudian dogma held that women were naturally suited for child-raising and had an inherent nurturing ability that men lacked, thereby making the mother-child relationship more important to children than the father-child relationship is. See Roth, supra note 2)

[6] See, e.g., Waldron v. Childers, 148 S.W. 1030 (Ark. 1912) (holding that “the natural affection of a mother … is stronger and more sacred than that of any other….”)

[7] Jenkins v. Jenkins, 181 N.W. 826, 827 (Wis. 1921)

[8] Kirstukas v. Kirstukas, 286 A.2d 535 (Md. Ct. App. 1972)

[9] Joseph Goldstein et al., Beyond the Best Interests of the Child (1973).

[10] Id. at 18.

[11] Id. at 13.

[12] H. Rudolph Schaffer and Peggy E. Emerson The Development of Social Attachments in Infancy, 29 Monographs of the Soc’y for Res. in Child Dev. no. 94 (1964)

[13] Kathryn L. Mercer, A Content Analysis of Judicial Decision-Making: How Judges Use Primary Caretaker Standard to Make a Custody Determination, 5 Wm. & Mary J. Women & L. 73 (1998)

[14] 210 P. 454, 457, 459 (Or. 1922).

[15] American Bar Association, supra note 288 at 172

[16] See, e.g., Palmer v. Palmer, 207 A.2d 481 (Md. 1965)

[17] As one family law treatise from the period put it: “the mother is preferred as their custodian,…and this though she may have been guilty of delinquencies in the past [provided] there is no evidence that she was delinquent at the time of determining the matter by the court.” Frank H. Keezer, Keezer on the Law of Marriage and Divorce (3d ed., John W. Morland ed., 1946)

[18] 242 S.W. 804 (1922)

Nineteenth-Century Novelist Henry James Predicted Twentieth-Century Feminism

December 15, 2023 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Is Climate Change a Man?

December 18, 2023 | by Jon Gunnarsson | Link | Original Link

Morality is pretty clear-cut in German classrooms. There's an approved list of evil, which includes racism, xenophobia, right-wing politics, sexism (i.e. sexism against women), pollution, and climate change. There's an approved list of good, which includes egalitarianism, democracy, tolerance (except for support of anything in the above list or criticism of anything in this list), moderate left-wing politics, and environmentalism.

And now, increasingly, pupils are taught to associate men with the first list and women with the second. One in a long list of attempts to demonize men is an article by Barbara Morawec entitled "Ist der Klimawandel ein Mann?" ("Is Climate Change a Man?")[1]. Responsible for this text is the German State Institute for School Quality and Education Research. The text is not intended for critical discussion, but is just supposed to be used to test reading comprehension. Pupils read the text and then have to answer questions about it[2].

> Steaks and cars, both as large as possible. That is – you guessed it – typically male. "That's why climate change is a man." This is the provocative thesis advanced in a study by Ines Weller, a professor in Bremen. Her arguments: men eat more meat on average and drive showy, gas-guzzling cars, preferably fast. Both increase the world-wide CO2 emission. According to Weller, this is further exacerbated by the fact that men do not want to change their behaviour. Thus, the Professor argues, they contribute more to global climate change than women.

This is how the article opens and it doesn't get better after that. Using Ines Weller's aforementioned study, as well as "research" done by environmental expert and physicist Gotelind Alber, the article asserts that women are affected more severely by climate change and that meat consumption "is another area where man seems to be the climate sinner."

After briefly considering that "women also contribute their mite to climate change" through consuming more dairy products, cosmetics, and clothing, the article concludes as follows:

> Nevertheless, the climate calculation seems to favour woman. Besides: women think differently about climate change than men; they are more willing to do something for the public good. "Women, who are usually more involved with children and family than men, are used to thinking of others," Alber says. Men, on the other hand, are obviously only ecology-minded when they don't have to pay for it.

The intent of this monstrosity is quite clear. Men are collectively at fault for climate change (which is evil and any opinion that questions this must therefore also be evil), of which women are the innocent victims. Once again, the evil men are oppressing the poor, helpless women. The text is quite remarkable in its consistent collectivism. It's not just men who drive SUVs and eat steak every other day who are causing global warming. No, the clearly identified villain is man, and woman is his victim.

There is no differentiation between individuals, no acknowledgement that there are also many men who don't have a large carbon footprint and women who do. All that is conveniently ignored to better construct a threat narrative. Man is out to get you! He'll melt the polar icecaps if you don't stop him!

At the Schiller Gymnasium in Hof (a town in the North East of Bavaria), this text was served up to 8th grade pupils[3]. What message does this send to 13 or 14-year-old boys? They are quite openly told that they are lesser, that they share the collective guilt of their gender. They are taught to be ashamed of being male. They are taught to hate themselves. This is today's version of original sin.

It's no accident that the article talks about climate sinners. This type of language is quite common in public discourse in Germany. Everything must be sorted neatly into good and evil; good must only be associated with women, evil only with men. Individual men may occasionally be praised, but that is the one time they are treated as individuals. At best, individual men are praiseworthy and good in spite of their sex.

Given all this, it's no wonder that boys are doing much worse than girls in school. While every new generation of women in Germany does better in schools and universities than the previous generation, for men the reverse is true[4]. With the school system becoming ever more feminist, boys are increasingly unmotivated to do well in school. A 2007 study by the Federal Ministry for Education and Research shows that boys and girls do about equally well given the same degree of interest[5]. But seeing how hostile schools have become toward boys, their lower level of interest is hardly surprising.

More damningly, the same study also revealed that given the same degree of competency, boys received worse grades than girls. Over five years have passed since this study, and nothing has been done about it. Tellingly, the Education Ministry released the embarrassing study without any press release and without drawing any attention to it. During the 2007 Christmas season, they even tried taking down the study from their webpage, hoping that nobody would notice. Thanks to some inquiring German Men's Rights Activists (MRAs), this attempt at censorship failed and they had to put up the study once again[6].

But even though the education deck is so stacked against them, men still do better on the job market. But for how long? Nowadays the internet can make up for much of the flaws in the state-run education system, but it is usually only those who are already intelligent and educated who make full use of this resource. Immigrant and lower class men are becoming increasingly marginalized. How long the German society can keep this up is anyone's guess. No society that wastes male potential to such a degree can sustain itself in the long run. For all of our sakes, let's hope that Germany—along with all of Western civilization—reverses its course before it is too late.

References:

[1] http://sciencefiles.files.wordpress.com/2013/07/klimawandel-ein-mann.pdf, quoted excerpts are my translation

[2] http://sciencefiles.org/2013/07/19/bedeutet-weiblicher-professor-gleich-depp/

[3] http://sciencefiles.org/2013/07/20/erziehung-zum-selbst-hass-das-neue-curriculum-an-deutschen-schulen/

[4] https://www.destatis.de/DE/Publikationen/Thematisch/BildungForschungKultur/Bildungsstand/BildungDeutschland5210001129004.pdf?__blob=publicationFile, page 43

[5] http://www.bmbf.de/pubRD/Bildungsmisserfolg.pdf, page 16

[6] http://www.wgvdl.com/forum2/Info/Politik/BMBF/StudieBildungsmisserfolg.htm

The Patriarchy™ and Marble Cake

December 20, 2023 | by Jason Gregory | Link | Original Link

I admit it. I have a guilty pleasure—feminist-philosophers (now defunct). No, feminist-philosophers are not necessarily oxymoronic, though some of them are morons. Take, for example, Iris M. Young.

Young studied philosophy and earned a doctorate in philosophy from Pennsylvania State University. She became a professor of political science and was well known for her work in "theories of justice, democratic theory and feminist theory." Sadly, Young lost a battle with cancer in 2006 and the world was deprived of "one of the most important feminist thinkers in the world…one of the most important political philosophers of the past quarter century."

While researching this much respected philosopher, I discovered one of her papers, "Humanism, Gynocentrism, and Feminist Politics." It is a brilliant and fascinating paper. It is a must read for anybody interested in The Patriarchy™, gender politics, and philosophy.

In this paper, Young presents two remarkably different versions of feminism—humanist-feminism and gynocentric-feminism. Young admits that these two types of feminisms are often contrary to and sometimes contradictory with each other. She also admits that both feminisms share the common narrative thread of male-as-antagonist. The overarching antagonist to both narratives is the male dominated culture that oppresses women—The Patriarchy™.

This antagonist represents weak and lazy writing. It's a tired, uninspiring, and one-dimensional villain. This antagonist no longer has a semblance of truth sufficient to procure for these shadows of imagination that willing suspension of disbelief for the moment, which constitutes poetic faith. The Patriarchy™ is the Snidely Whiplash of feminist narratives—a cartoonish caricature of evil, the archenemy of all women, humanity, and civilization. It is not an artifact of "poetic faith."

As such, The Patriarchy™ is not a real thing. It is only an imagined thing—a fetishized object of imagination that exists in the minds of feminists and other morons. It exists to perpetuate a shallow and one-dimensional narrative that presents women as objects-of-victimization. It is the sort of thing that feminists love to hate. It is loved because it can be blamed for everything. It is hated because it is the villain. Without The Patriarchy™, there would be no feminist narratives. Without Snidely Whiplash, there would be no Dudley Do-Right. The Patriarchy™ is one half of a shallow and one-dimensional dichotomy of good vs. evil that exists in feminist narratives. It's not any real thing of lived-experience. It is only an imaginary thing of imagined-experience.

To better understand this shallow dichotomy and the silliness of feminist narratives, let's look at two of the most significant and influential feminist narratives as presented by Iris M. Young. Both narratives present women as victims of The Patriarchy™. Both narratives present The Patriarchy™ as an antagonist, a villain like Snidely Whiplash who twiddles his moustache and has no human depth beyond a sadistic lust for the devaluing and disempowerment of women.

Humanist-feminism

Humanist-feminism, according to Young, is best described in the works of Simone de Beauvoir. At its core is a revolt against being imprisoned in femininity. For them The Patriarchy™ "has ascribed to women a distinct feminine nature by which it has justified the exclusion of women from most of the important and creative activity of society—science, politics, invention, industry, commerce, the arts." By rejecting such femininity, humanist-feminism delivered a revolt against The Patriarchy™ itself.

What makes this Beauvoirian revolt so fascinating is the fact that it is founded theoretically on the philosophical distinction between immanence and transcendence. Immanence roughly designates being an object. Transcendence roughly designates being a free-subject that defines its own nature and "makes projects that bring new entities into the world."

It is argued by humanist-feminists that The Patriarchy™ does not allow women to become such transcendent and free-subjects. Instead, women are relegated to being objects of domestic and sexual service to men and for the benefit of men. As such, the full humanity of women is restricted by The Patriarchy™. This is, according to humanist-feminists, a brutalization of the personhood of half the human race for benefit to the other half. The Patriarchy™ mutilates and deforms women into objects—the non-human Other. Young writes that this "distinction between transcendence and immanence ensnares Beauvoir in the very definition of woman as a non-human Other…"

By defining humanity as transcendence, as a free-subjectivity above mere life and the processes of nature that repeat in endless cycles, women can only exist as victims—"maimed, mutilated, dependent, confined to a life of immanence and forced to be an object." In short, humanity transcends, but women are imprisoned to a life of immanence. Humanist-feminism was a revolt against this sort of immanence, reproductive biology, domestic concerns, and motherhood—the things Beauvoir found most oppressive to women.

As such, Beauvoirians devalue women…just like The Patriarchy™ devalues women. The humanist-feminist revolt against The Patriarchy™ is patriarchal. As such, humanist-feminism is The Patriarchy™. They smash The Patriarchy™ by being it.

Gynocentric-feminism

According to Young, “gynocentric feminism defines the oppression of women very differently from humanist feminism. Women’s oppression consists not of being prevented from participating in full humanity, but of the denial and devaluation of specifically feminine virtues and activities by an overly instrumentalized and authoritarian masculinist culture.” Gynocentric-feminism is not a revolt against femininity. It is a revolt against the devaluation of femininity. It is a revolt against The Patriarchy™ by embracing what The Patriarchy™ always “ascribed” to women. As such, gynocentric-feminism is The Patriarchy™.

For gynocentric-feminists, femininity is “not the problem, not the source of women’s oppression, but indeed within traditional femininity lie the values that we should promote for a better society. Women’s oppression consists of the devaluation and repression of women’s nature and female activity by the patriarchal culture.” Again, The Patriarchy™ is still to blame because it “threaten[s] the survival of the planet and the human race. [Patriarchal] values exalt death, violence, competition, selfishness, a repression of the body, sexuality, and affectivity.”

According to Young, The Patriarchy™ produces “phallogocentric categorization,” a moral rationality and language of sharp distinctions, of abstract rights and justice. However, the feminine is supposed to produce loose categories, a flowing of language that envelops and folds in on itself, reflects itself in a continuous and particularistic ethics of care—a continuous flowing of garbled gibberish. The feminine virtue is supposed to place the particular over the abstract and universal, all the while denying the “nature/culture dichotomy held by humanists… [asserting] the connection of women and nature,” rooting the feminine in the body-experience, rather than in some sort of abstract transcendence.

Gynocentric-feminism places a high value on the woman’s reproductive processes. It is supposed that these processes give women a “living continuity with their offspring that it does not give men. Women thus have a temporal consciousness that is continuous, whereas male temporal consciousness is discontinuous.” As such, males are said to be more alienated from their children, but more connected to their work and other endeavors of artifact creation. In this way, being woman is not being an object. Bringing forth life into this world is one of the most important endeavors-of-creation…and only women can do that.

Gynocentric-feminism inverts humanist-feminism—completely upending prior notions of women’s oppression. Yet, smashing The Patriarchy™ remains a goal of gynocentric-feminism. They smash The Patriarchy™ by embracing it.

Implications

Where humanist-feminism destroyed the value of the feminine, gynocentric-feminism restores it. There is dignity for women within their bodies and within their uniquely female body-experiences. Gynocentric-feminism shows that this connection with the body produces uniquely feminine virtues, language, and experiences of which men are not privy. In fact, men are not privileged at all in this way. Men are alienated from these experiences, from a “living continuity” with their children, and relegated to such experiences by proxy—through intellectual creations, hierarchal competition, and through functioning as an object-of-utility for a woman, for women, and for society-in-general.

This reality requires a reassessment of what male privilege means. Young writes, “If we claim that masculinity distorts men more than it contributes to their self-development and capacities, again, the claim that women are the victims of injustice loses considerable force.” She eventually questions, “what warrants the claim that women need liberating…of what does male privilege consist?” She has difficulty swallowing that bitter red pill. She has difficulty being straight and saying that we’ve been wrong about The Patriarchy™ and male privilege.

Although, she never disavows patriarchy theory, she does put forth a clever analogy as a way to try and change the subject, to escape responsibility, yet still fetishize and blame The Patriarchy™. In regards to gender, Young states that “we need a conception of difference that is less like the icing bordering the layers of cake and more like a marble cake, in which the flavors remain recognizably different but thoroughly insinuated in one another. [And this]… social change requires changing the subject, which in turn means developing new ways of speaking, writing, and imagining.”

Translation

Young wants her cake and eat it too. She wants to change the subject and direct attention away from the wrongheaded notions about male privilege and female oppression. She wants to create a narrative in which female oppression and privilege simultaneously exist in one swirl of garbled gibberish—a marble cake. She does not come forward to clearly say, “Oops, we were wrong about male privilege and The Patriarchy™.” She does not apologize for the decades of bashing and shaming men about their so-called privilege. She makes no apologies for the centuries of oppression men have endured as objects-of-utility for women and for society-in-general. She does not make any apologies for wanting her cake and eating it too.

Young is playing a game, essentially saying “it’s the fault of The Patriarchy™ that we were wrong…even though we weren’t really wrong. The Patriarchy™ forced feminists to make distinct icing and borders on their narrative-cake. It’s the fault of The Patriarchy™ that feminists didn’t create a marble-cake-narrative in which women could be simultaneously oppressed and liberated, thoroughly insinuated in one another. It’s the fault of The Patriarchy™ that The Patriarchy™ was allowed to be the primary antagonist of any feminist narrative.” This is Young’s elaborate game of victim-blaming.

Why did you men allow us to blame you? It’s your fault that we falsely accused you. Had you men simply valued us women, we would never have falsely accused you men of oppressing us. Never mind the countless bodies of men who sacrificed their lives for women and for society-in-general; that’s oppression of women too. Valuing us is not-valuing us. Oppressing us is not-oppressing us. No matter what men do, it’s the fault of men that women are simultaneously liberated and oppressed, valued and not-valued, empowered and not-empowered. Men and by extension, The Patriarchy™, are to blame for everything.

Conclusion

Young, like most feminists, clings to her fetish—her imagined-experience of The Patriarchy™. She refuses to develop a more comprehensive narrative. She refuses to create a narrative that gives depth to the lived-experiences of men. She refuses to relinquish her hatred of men. She prefers blaming men for everything. This is her love, her hatred, and her fetish. She clung to these until death.

Sadly, this is what makes Young's paper so brilliant and fascinating. It illustrates the grasp of this fetish—The Patriarchy™. A philosopher as clever as Young fails to relinquish her fetish. Even after clearly making the case that prior notions of The Patriarchy™ and male privilege were wrong, she maintains that men are still to blame. Even when she knows that it's not the fault of men, she still blames men—The Patriarchy™.

By painting men as The Patriarchy™, men can be made a cartoonish caricature of evil. Men become as shallow and one-dimensional as Snidely Whiplash—the archenemy of women, humanity, civilization, and all things good. Men become The Patriarchy™, the non-human Other.

This is the narrative of feminisms. This is the common thread that binds together feminist narratives. This is the dehumanization of men as the antagonist. It is the fetishizing of men as The Patriarchy™–an imagined thing, a fetishized object of imagination, a villain.

This villain no longer inspires the "willing suspension of disbelief." This villain is not an artifact of "poetic faith." This villain represents weak and lazy writing. The Patriarchy™ is bad literature…and so are feminist narratives.

The way forward may be some sort of "marble cake," as Young describes, where gender differences are distinct, yet thoroughly insinuated within each other. However, before that can happen, a narrative granting multi-dimensionality and depth to men is needed. A narrative consisting of compassion and consideration for the lived-experiences of men and boys is needed. That will never happen as a feminist narrative. So long as men are written as the antagonist, as The Patriarchy™, men will always be the Other–the icing on the outside, apart from the cake, apart from humanity.

The featured image of marble cake is licended under CC-BY-SA 4.0 and is courtest of Wikimedia Commons.

Twerking and sexual independence?

December 22, 2023 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

---

So I just read an article by a feminist writer that basically says when you see the likes of Miley Cyrus, Rhianna, and millions of girls all over Facebook and Twitter twerking, dressing with minimal clothes, and expressing their independence and validation in being a sexual equal to boys and men, it is not an invitation to men and boys to objectify and have sex with them.

As the father of two girls, I certainly get that if either of my daughters ever decided to twerk, it should not be taken as a invitation for any boy to have sex with her. But is that really what the article linked above is saying–or is that the only message?

I think not.

To me, and I am certainly hoping to be challenged in the comment section, what the feminist writer in this article is asking all men and boys to do is validate and love women and girls who do this as equal people rather than as slutty girls asking for attention sexually. I do have some concerns that the typical 15-25 yr old boy will have a hard time trying to decipher whether a bent over girl thrusting her hips and genitalia against his genitalia is just "Mary being a equal human being who should be validated as a woman" as opposed to her wanting to have sex. But this is what the feminist writer is asking society: to force men and boys to morph into such that the only actual sex between men and women is achieved when the women gives loud verbal enthusiastic consent, screw body language, screw touching, screw inarticulate moans, or anything else: she screams "let's have sex!" or you're a rapist in waiting.

But here is where you hear crickets or the shattering of glass as the feminist house of equality comes crumbling down. Do these theories apply to boys and men as well? Of course not.

Here is what the feminist writer is asking for society to accept: if a principal or teacher witnesses a girl in high school wearing booty shorts, bent over, putting her ass into the air and wiggling HER clothed genitalia against HIS genitalia, then it is just her validating herself as an equal sexual creature and we must embrace that. However, it is pretty clear that if we witness another boy in high school with his girlfriend and she bends over and HE starts thrusting his clothed hips and genitalia against HER clothed genitalia, feminism wants him addressed as a sexual deviant and rapist.

If feminist theory was about equality, this little boy should be validated as a beautiful independent and equal human being by principals and teachers as long as he obtained "enthusiastic consent" by the girl who bent over on her own choice. But again, that is not what we will ever see from teachers, principles, or feminism.

Using feminism's own standard against them, I think it is very clear that Robin Thicke was sexually assaulted by Miley Cyrus–unless we take a second look at the video from the VMA awards. If we do NOT hear Robin Thicke giving verbal "enthusiastic consent," then Miley Cyrus should be in jail as a rapist.

Right?

In short, it sounds like feminism mandates that it is okay for there to be a double standard when it is against boys, but there better never be any double standard anywhere for women and girls. Which, come to think of it, sounds a lot like feminism's definition of "The Patriarchy."

If we are going to start encouraging scantly clad women and girls to gyrate their hips and genitalia against men and boys absent consent, but apply sexual deviant and rape connotations to boys for the same behavior, then mothers of the world who have sons need to start preparing their sons for prison, while feminists smile at each other and clap.

The featured image depicts Sunny Lane twerking, is released under CC-BY-SA 2.5 and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Adam Lee Hargrave: Acid-throwing almost exclusively a female crime

December 23, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Adam Lee Hargrave was an early 20th-century crime reporter and documentarian who wrote extensively on Scotland Yard, the C.I.D., Jack the Ripper, and similar topics. The following article about acid-throwing is from his 1912 book Woman and Crime, in which he states that women were almost exclusively responsible for the crime.—PW

THE VITRIOL-THROWERS

THE act of throwing vitriol may very well be bracketed with secret and slow poisoning as an example of extreme cruelty in women. Vitriol-throwing is rarely resorted to by men, being almost exclusively confined to females. The latter as we have already pointed out are also largely in the majority among poisoners. It is just as inexplicable as is the inhumanity of women towards little children, and why such savagery should find a home in the bosoms of those who are universally supposed to be inspired by instincts of sympathy and tenderness it is fruitless to try and discover. But it makes one thing quite clear, namely, that the orthodox opinions held by most men concerning women are not strictly accurate.

I recall the case of the Frenchwoman, Madame Emilie Foucault, who was indicted at the Old Bailey for throwing upon Andre Jacques Delombre a corrosive fluid, with intent to disfigure him or do him grievous bodily harm. I have already given an account of this case in another work of mine,[1] but think it as well to include it here, as in many respects it is a remarkable case of its kind.

Sir Charles Mathews, who conducted the prosecution, referred to it as a “drama,” and drama of a most sensational kind it certainly was. The story that preceded the act for which the woman was indicted might very well have been fiction written by a novelist in the habit of turning out “risky” works. The prisoner and the prosecutor first became acquainted in the year 1898, the man then being seventeen years of age and the woman twenty. They met in the streets, and their acquaintance at first was merely of a casual kind. But it was soon to become more cordial, for the woman was very pretty and the young man susceptible. Their respective social positions were widely asunder, he being the son of an ex-Cabinet Minister of France, and she the daughter of a tradesman. This difference in caste was destined in due course to lead to a tragedy.

In March, 1899, the prisoner married her first husband, a man named Foucault, who died in January, 1901. Directly after this marriage took place an improper intimacy began between Madame Foucault and the young fellow, Delombre. It endured through Foucault’s life and survived his death. In May of 1903 Madame Foucault married again, this time a literary man in a good position. But she still continued the improper intimacy with Delombre. The husband soon became suspicious, discovered how matters stood, at once sued for and obtained a divorce. The divorced wife intermittently continued the intimacy with Delombre. It is quite clear that she now entertained the notion and formed the resolution that the young fellow should marry her. He would seem to have still been somewhat infatuated with her and to be willing to become her lawful husband. But here the social disparity between them became an obstacle, and Delombre's parents would not entertain the proposed alliance. This opposition enraged Madame Foucault, who armed herself with a loaded revolver and threatened to shoot the young man's parents. His mother was most firmly opposed to the match, and upon her death-bed she made her son promise that he would not marry the woman.

In the course of 1906 Madame Foucault fell in the family way, and subsequently she asked Delombre if he would acknowledge the child. This he refused to do, in consequence of which some unpleasant scenes ensued. Upon one occasion Delombre forcibly took a loaded revolver from her. Apparently in consequence of the annoyance she gave him, Delombre decided in October, 1906, to come to England. He did so, taking up his residence in Lindley Road, Tottenham, where he pursued his studies. He was an agricultural engineer, and held a degree of the University of Paris. On November 17th, Madame Foucault followed Delombre to England, bringing with her a loaded revolver, a box of cartridges, and a large bottle of sulphuric acid, or vitriol. The latter she had had coloured to the hue of coffee. The reason for this will appear presently. Having discovered where Delombre was lodging, she went there and asked him for an explanation. That was a Saturday evening, and it was arranged that the interview should be postponed till the next day, a lodging for the night being found for Madame Foucault. The next day she said to a friend of Delombre's who lodged near him:

"I am expecting a child in January, and Delombre has abandoned me. After I have had an explanation I will return to Paris and make as much scandal as possible. I will have birth cards printed, and send them to his friends." (In France birth cards are sent round as marriage cards are sent round in this country.) At the Old Bailey Delombre stoutly denied that the child referred to was his, and that he was not the "only one."

Later in the day Delombre went with Madame Foucault to a hotel in the City, where he engaged a room in the name of Foucault. They had dinner there in the public room, afterwards retiring to the room they had engaged, where they would be by themselves. While seated at the dinner-table Delombre asked Madame Foucault what explanation she required, and the lady replied that she would wait for it until they had retired to their room. In the light of subsequent events this was significant. Well, when the woman found herself alone with her companion she said, "The explanation I have to ask you is this: Either you shall marry me or you must kill yourself, if you are not a coward, or I will kill you." That was the first time, said Delombre, that she had made any mention of marriage. He replied "Marry! No; never. Why, you don't love me. You hate me, and I don't love you." Then the woman said, "I shan't be troublesome. We shan't live together, but I want my child to bear your name." He replied "No." Madame, who all through this was perfectly calm, said "Then you must kill yourself, or I will kill you." It is difficult to understand why she should wish him to die, or how his death could benefit her in any way. But the fact that she was so calm through it all proves that it was mere idle talk and that she was temporising. It is a pity that he did not do the same thing. A man, however, is never equal to a woman in cunning and dissimulation.

It seems clear, however, that Delombre had become apprehensive, for he suggested that they should go for a walk. At the same time he went to the bed and took up his coat, which he proceeded to put on. Foolishly he turned his back upon her for a few moments. When he turned to her again she walked up to him and deliberately threw a cup of vitriol in his face. The premeditation was made apparent by the fact that she had contrived, unseen by her companion, to lock the door. He discovered this when, writhing in agony, he endeavoured to quit the room. His cries brought assistance, and he was conveyed to the hospital. The woman was taken into custody and while in prison awaiting trial she gave birth to a child.

Delombre permanently lost the sight of one eye and was otherwise disfigured for life. Most outrages committed by women are cowardly, and this one was particularly so. It was sheer vindictiveness, and no amount of provocation could mitigate its enormity. Her defence was that she intended to commit suicide in his presence, and that the vitriol and revolver were for that purpose. She further stated in the witness box that it was while in the act of drinking the vitriol herself that Delombre, while endeavouring to prevent her, splashed the vitriol over himself. This rather feeble contention could scarcely hold good in the face of the fact that the vitriol had been thrown or dashed at the prosecutor, as shown by the nature of the injuries.

The prosecutor declared that her original intention was that he should drink the acid, and that is why she had it made the colour of coffee. Her explanation of this discolouration was that it was caused by being poured into the bottle through a pewter funnel, and that it was the action of the latter on the acid that caused it to change colour. As a matter of fact pewter would not do anything of the kind, so that falls to the ground. The prosecutor explained that her intention was to cause him to drink the acid by “ringing the changes” on the cups. After they had had dinner he asked her if she would have coffee, and she declined. He, however, had a cup, and this evidently upset her arrangement, for her idea was to have the coffee upstairs, when she would have effected the change. She did in fact alter her mind when she got upstairs and had a cup brought up. And this served a purpose, although not the one originally intended. Having emptied the cup of coffee she substituted vitriol, which looked like coffee. So that she was able to get to close quarters with Delombre without arousing his suspicion as to the nature of the contents of the cup.

If the vitriol had in any way failed she unquestionably intended to make use of the revolver.

The above facts would appear to be pretty conclusive evidence of guilt, and there can be no doubt that the jury would have returned a verdict of “Guilty” had it not been for the introduction into the case by counsel for the defence of a number of letters which had been written to the prisoner from time to time by the prosecutor. These put the latter in a very odious light and seriously prejudiced the case for the prosecution. The letters were allowed to be read by the judge, although when counsel for the prosecution attempted to read some which had been sent by the prisoner to the prosecutor his lordship put his veto on it. He should of course have put his veto on the others, as they had nothing to do with the charge before the court, most of them having been written years before the visit to the City hotel took place.

The case occupied four days. The prisoner, a dark young woman of strikingly handsome appearance and neatly attired, was one of those females whom I have already referred to as possessing force of character and invincible will-power. The latter in combination with her personal attractions was destined to be destructive to men. Her complexion was pale, and she had what the French call the “fatal eyes.” They were in fact very remarkable eyes, very dark and wonderfully expressive. They had a velvety softness, and at times could be most alluring. She also contrived to get into them a remarkable number of varied expressions. When it was her purpose to enlist sympathy her eyes were irresistibly soft and caressing. But now and again when the lady was heckled in cross-examination, there flashed from her eyes something resembling forked lightning, which gave one an uncomfortable notion of what she was capable. I have already referred to a case where a female prisoner succeeded in winning over a jury. I then referred to Madame Foucault, who, in spite of the conclusive evidence I have detailed above, was acquitted. This I attribute to her personal influence on the jury, combined with the reading of the letters mentioned. It was a verdict, not of justice based on fact, but of sympathy in the face of truth.

The conduct of both prior to the events of November 18th at the City hotel was deserving of measureless reprobation, and the letters should not have aroused sympathy for either. What can be said for a woman who readily gives herself over to a paramour immediately after she has been wedded to another? Can she be “wronged” in any way? Delombre worked her no mischief; those whom he wronged were the husbands. There can be no doubt that the first marriage was entered into so that the husband might be utilised as a safeguard to the intrigue. I suppose a husband could hardly be put to a worse purpose than this, or a marriage contracted under more odious conditions. And nobody who saw the two young people in the flesh can doubt that the woman was the leading spirit in the intrigue, and that she influenced Delombre by her “fatal eyes” and her other attractions as she influenced the jury at her trial. A woman who cares twopence for her chastity does not give way with the readiness with which Madame Foucault did.

Just as I have already described how Mrs Chard Williams set herself to seduce the jury from the straight line of their duty by directing her gaze full at them and keeping it so throughout the hearing, so did Madame Foucault, and with more success. She directed her “fatal eyes” towards the jurymen, each one of whom she took in turn, lavishing upon them the most bewitching and ravishing glances. I sat beneath the jury-box and quite close to the dock. I closely watched her, and upon one occasion she, noticing my scrutiny and thinking perhaps that I might be an official and worth including, she turned her gaze full upon me and favoured me with a most entrancing optical caress. I felt a trifle “shivery” over it, like one might feel while being grinned at by a tigress, and was not sorry to avert my eyes.

After her acquittal she stated to an interviewer that at a certain stage of the proceedings she knew she had so many of the jury on her side. There can be no doubt that she did. Women like Madame Foucault know the weak points of men like they know their A. B. C. When counsel was describing the injuries of Delombre she appeared to be moved, but that it was humbug was proved by the fact that after the verdict was returned she pointed down triumphantly at the injured man and jeered at him. No doubt that what the man himself had told her, namely, that she hated him, was true. She subsequently endeavoured to fix the paternity of her child upon him, and a summons was served at the place in London where he had been staying. He had, however, gone back to Paris, but in spite of this fact an order was made against him by a magistrate. It seems a very easy matter to get a bastardy order against a man. In this case the magistrate took the bare word of the solicitor that the summons was duly served, when as a matter of fact it was not. Delombre took the matter to the High Court, where the judges set the order aside.

Vitriol-throwing is altogether a most ugly crime, for it is always committed in a spirit of extreme vindictiveness. Sometimes, too, it is done to avenge a wholly imaginary wrong, as in the case of the woman who, ironically enough, was named Mabel Truelove. The crime was committed in May, 1908. The woman Truelove was a habitual criminal, who had previously been confined in Reading gaol. She had conceived a great hatred of the matron, Miss Elizabeth Rogerson, who, she declared, had treated her harshly and cruelly. As a matter of fact Miss Rogerson was a most humane woman and had always dealt leniently with Truelove. However, the latter determined to do the matron a mischief, and she accomplished it in a truly fiendish manner. On a Sunday evening, while Miss Rogerson sat in St James’s Roman Catholic Church with a friend named Mrs Emily Cushan, Truelove came down the church and seated herself beside Miss Rogerson. In her teeth she was holding a shawl. She said to Miss Rogerson, “Well, how are you?” To which Miss Rogerson replied, “Oh, all right.” Truelove then drew a large cup of vitriol from under her shawl and flung the contents in the face of Miss Rogerson.

Miss Rogerson called out “Vitriol!” and fell in a faint. She was unable to see, and after she had been attended to by a nurse and a doctor she was conveyed to the Royal Berks Hospital. She was very seriously injured, being likely to lose the sight of one eye. Her friend, Mrs Cushan, was also seriously injured, the acid having splashed on to her. Also Truelove herself was very badly burnt, for the liquid also splashed back on her, which was a recoil of her vengeance peculiarly appropriate. If all vitriol-throwers also injured themselves in this manner, there might be less of the dastardly crime committed. When Truelove appeared in the dock of the Reading Police Court next morning her face presented a most repulsive appearance, the features being quite unrecognisable. Her lips were distended, her eyes invisible, and her cheeks scarred and wounded. She had to be assisted into the dock, and was hardly able to remain seated on the form. Would that all would-be vitriol-throwers could have witnessed this spectacle! She was remanded and afterwards removed to that prison upon the matron of which she had committed such a gross outrage.

The prisoner had had a most remarkable career. She came of a family which was said to be well connected and respected. She was an accomplished pianist, and some years ago had been a teacher of music. She was a pupil teacher at a Board School, but failing to pass a certain examination her scholastic career came to an end. She would then appear to have gone into service, acting as governess to several well-known families, but her temper was of such a violent character that nobody would keep her very long, and so she was constantly going from situation to situation. Her friends also gradually tired of assisting her, and so she sank lower and lower. Eventually she found herself without a roof “on the road” in which condition she remained some years, sleeping in various places, such, for instance, as doss-houses, churchyards, outhouses, or any place where she could find shelter. During this period she committed innumerable offences, prisons being among the places wherein she periodically slept. She resorted to all kinds of tricks to evade the police, on one occasion exchanging her dress for male garb while in a railway carriage. But as she left her own clothes behind, the police were enabled to soon get upon her track.

During her career she had been in several prisons of which Miss Rogerson had been matron, including that at Reading. Two years prior to the outrage at Reading, Truelove committed an assault on Miss Rogerson, for which she was bound over for six months. She then said to Detective-Sergeant Clarke, “The time won’t be long passing; I will leave the town and have something ready for her (meaning Miss Rogerson) when I come back." After she had committed the assault on Miss Rogerson at Reading, she said, "I don't care what I have to put up with myself; I have got my revenge, and revenge is sweet." When asked by Detective-Sergeant Clarke where she obtained the vitriol, she said, "Never mind; I know where to get it, and how to use it. I did not get it here. I should like to serve one or two more like it. I did not intend to hurt the other woman (Mrs Cushan). It serves her right though, if she mixes up with a – – like that." She was known in nearly every prison in the country, having been convicted no fewer than 127 times for various offences. In whatever prison she was located she created disturbances and put fear into the minds of the wardresses. She had followed wardresses about, molesting and threatening them, sometimes to throw vitriol over them. In consequence the wardresses went in fear of her. A wardress named Pemberdy told how on one occasion she saw Truelove carrying a jug without a handle, and that she told her, Miss Pemberdy, that she would like to spoil her face. Upon one occasion, while following Miss Rogerson and Miss Pemberdy, she said to the former, "You have played your ace, and it is my turn to play trumps now." She had also waited for days outside Reading Prison, in consequence of which the wardresses had remained indoors rather than go out and be insulted.

Another wardress named Miss Bingham wrote from Hull Prison to say that Truelove had followed her to church and waited outside until the service was over. Subsequently discovering that her home was at Lancaster, she gave a great deal of annoyance by calling at the house of her parents and waiting outside. She afterwards sent a postcard to Miss Bingham at the address of her relatives, worded, "I am coming. –(Signed) Jack the Ripper." Upon two occasions she had been sentenced to imprisonment for assaulting female officials. During the hearing of her case at the Berkshire Assizes the prisoner continually interrupted the proceedings. When reference was being made to Miss Rogerson's injuries, and counsel was describing the condition of "one of the lady's eyes," the prisoner interrupted with, " You don't call that thing a lady, do you?" It was inevitable that an effort would be made to establish a theory of insanity, and certainly the extravagance and pertinacity of her wrongdoing would seem to suggest that she was not altogether in her right mind. However, her counsel, Mr. Nash, was proceeding to say that she had been suffering from delusions for two years, when she interposed with, "You are no doctor. It's no use proving that I am mad, because I am not. I never suffered from delusions." The jury having found her guilty, the judge, Mr Justice Darling, sentenced her to five years' penal servitude.

Whether sane or insane, one thing is quite clear, Mabel Truelove has never been dealt with properly by the law. She ought never to have been allowed to carry on her career for so long a time, to have been constantly committing offences and continually going in and out of prison. She ought to have been dealt with more severely long ago. She is a fit subject for an indeterminate sentence. It is clear that it is dangerous for such a woman to be at large, and during the whole of her career she has never once exhibited any intention or desire to reform. She was most persistent and determined in her wrongdoing from first to last. Probably her lawlessness and rebellious behaviour generally is traceable to her early years, when she may have been without any restraining influence. Over-indulgent parents may be the source of as much mischief to their offspring as negligent ones. The seeds which are sown in childhood's days bear fruit years hence. The ironically-named Mabel Truelove seems to be a pretty hopeless case.

About the same time another case of vitriol throwing occurred at Hull, where a middle-aged woman named Selina Spencer threw acid over three persons, namely, Annie Roberts, a widow, Eliza Precious, her married daughter, and a little girl named Lily Dunelly. It appeared that Spencer had had a business transaction with Mrs Roberts and had called her a rogue. In consequence of this Spencer was ejected from the Alexandra Hotel. A few minutes later Mrs Roberts and her daughter left the hotel. They had not gone far, however, when they became aware that Spencer was following them. Eventually the latter came up with them and dashed the contents of a bottle in the face of Mrs Roberts, at the same time exclaiming "Take that!" Upon Mrs Precious interfering she also was served in the same way, being so badly burned that she lost the sight of one eye. Some of the acid also splashed on to the little girl. Spencer was then overpowered and prevented doing any further mischief. When taken into custody she had the effrontery to deny the charge, in spite of the evidence of eye-witnesses and the fact that her own hands were burned by the acid. She was duly convicted and punished.

A case which bore a striking resemblance to that of Madame Foucault, already dealt with, occurred at the end of April, 1907. It was generally believed in fact that the woman in this case had been reading the newspaper reports of the Foucault case, and had practically copied the Frenchwoman's methods. And the fact that the latter was acquitted doubtless acted as a strong incentive to her to venture on a similar course of conduct.

The woman's name was Lilian Sarah Woodcock. She was 27 years of age and was tried at the Old Bailey. She was charged with throwing a corrosive fluid hydrochloric acid over Mr John James Avery, a photographer, of Sandringham Road, Dalston. It appeared that she had been employed as manageress at a shop kept by a son of Mr Avery, in the East India Dock Road. The relations between Miss Woodcock and her employer, as admitted by the latter in the witness-box, were rather more cordial than those of master and servant. Mr Avery, senior, was the freeholder of the premises in East India Dock Road. Miss Woodcock claimed the premises as her own, as she said they had been given to her by Mr Avery's son. The latter, however, stoutly denied this. Well, the woman went so far as to obtain an injunction in the High Court to restrain Mr Avery, senior, from entering the place. However, other proceedings followed, and the injunction was at length quashed.

On the afternoon of the same day Woodcock called at the house of Mr Avery, senior, and asked to see the latter. Mr Avery accordingly came to the door, but thinking it unwise to discuss matters with his visitor was about to close the door when the woman exclaimed, "Take that!" Although he saw nothing he felt a burning sensation about the face. He was removed to the German Hospital, where it was found that the acid had entered both eyes and burnt the right side of the forehead and the right cheek.

The defence put forward by the woman was that she had intended committing suicide, and that in knocking the vessel containing the acid from her hand Mr Avery received some of the contents on his face. It will be remembered that that was precisely the story told by Madame Foucault. In this case it was just as feeble as it was in that of the Frenchwoman, for the wall at the back of where Mr Avery stood was marked with the acid, which made it clear that the latter was thrown. Fortunately Mr Avery's sight was not affected, although the acid used is of a very corrosive nature, and if not promptly attended to will destroy sight.

Fortunately in this case there were no letters, and the woman was convicted and sentenced to a year's imprisonment.

I have thus given the particulars of a few representative cases of vitriol-throwing, a crime almost exclusively committed by women. It is a crime of vindictiveness alone, expressed by the invariable cry of "Take that!" and represents woman in one of her most repugnant aspects.

Notes:

[1] A. L. Hargrave, The Story of Crime, Published by T. Werner Laurie.

See Also: For historical information about women's acid-throwing in the USA, see "Acid Queens" at The Unknown History of Misandry.

What is the “Duluth Model” & how does it affect gay men?

December 24, 2023 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

Children need fathers on Christmas

December 25, 2023 | by Lucian Vâlsan | Link | Original Link

After the Brits found out on December 25 that the tenth most wanted gift by the children is a DAD[1], on December 26, a few Bulgarian fathers took it to the streets with the message: 'Children need their fathers on Christmas'.
The organization named "Бащи за отговорно родителство" (Fathers for responsible parenthood) organized a protest in the Bulgarian capital, Sofia, in which they dressed themselves as Santa Claus in order to draw attention to the constant state sponsored parental alienation that is enabled by the Bulgarian government.
Although their protest was not huge, it was very attractive as the dads with signs offered small gifts to random children passing by, reminding them to cherish their fathers.
The situation of separated or divorced fathers in Bulgaria is no different, nor less dramatic, than anywhere else in the European Union, but this is the first time when a fathers' rights group was mentioned in the press. And by 'press' – I mean 'press' as a whole. Even this event got only three articles in the Bulgarian media, one in Serbia and one in Romania. Moreover, the Serbian and the Romanian media who reported this presented it as it's an anomaly to demand equal rights for men, which adds up to the depression that these fathers have to endure thanks to the misandric laws that never stop favoring women.
Vasil Popov from Plovdiv, Bulgaria, told to the Darik News Bulgaria (the only press agency that reported from the protest)[2]:

> Fathers are on the street, because for the most part they are the victims. After separation or divorce, fathers receive a restrictive regime which limits their contact with their children. If the mother does not want to allow child to maintain contact with the other parent, […], she gets the legal right to use the child against him. So she refers to a court order, not the paternal relationship, the relationship between child and parent. Personal relationships should not be regulated by a judicial act.

Basically, the law in Bulgaria presumes the mother to be the primary parent, regardless of whether she's an appropriate parent or not, and the father is deemed as a secondary non-parent. Not long ago, the family law in Romania was the same and it literally said that the "state protects the interests of mothers and children,"[3] while fathers were mentioned only when it came to child support.
It is really sad that these kinds of grassroots movements get little to no exposure.
However, there is also good news: The Sofia Municipality chose to support the message that 'Fathers for responsible parenthood' transmitted which means that public officials of the capital city will petition the government to amend the legislation and give fathers more access to their children. With a bit of luck, next Christmas will find more fathers close to their children in Bulgaria, and this can only be a good thing.
Slowly, bit by bit, country by country, men are starting to see through the lies in the public discourse and are starting to stand up for themselves.

[1] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2253047/A-dad-tenth-popular-Christmas-present-children-survey-reveals.html

[2] http://dariknews.bg/view_article.php?article_id=1016280

[3] http://e-juridic.manager.ro/index.php?pag=a&aid=5250

’Twas the night before a feminist Christmas

December 25, 2023 | by AVFM | Link | Original Link

’Twas the night before a feminist Christmas, when all through the house
Not a creature was stirring, ’cept Diana Boston and her mouse.
The blanties were hung by the chimney with care,
In hopes that St. Dworkin soon would be there.

The gender studies students were nestled snug in their beds,
While visions of slut walks danced in their heads.
With me in bed all warm with my cats,
I’d closed SCUM Manifesto and decided to nap.

When out on the lawn there arose such a clatter,
I sprang from my bed thinking a stalker on ladder.
Away to the window I flew like a flash,
Tripping on my dildo I fell with a crash.

I peered through the window like an old creepy male.
I stared out and exclaimed, “Oh man—what the hell!”
What to my oppressed eyes then did appear,
But a pink sleigh pulled by eight flying simps in bondage gear.

With a hairy old driver so angry, that bitch!
I smiled ever so slightly while my panties did twitch.
More rapid than state funding, her flying monkeys came,
And she hissed and she cursed and she called them by name:

“Now Kimmel, now Stewart, now Clinton and Alda!
On Gosling, on Flood, on Biden—Obama!
To the top of the porch! To the top of the wall!
Now dash away! Dash away! Cis male scum ’n all!”

To the women’s shelter rooftop the male feminists flew,
With the sleigh full of hate and St. Dworkin too.
As I drew in my head and was turning around,
Down the chimney St. Dworkin came with a bound.

She was dressed all in spandex from her head to her foot,
And her clothes were all stained with much food grease and soot.
A bundle of baby foreskins she had flung on her back,
And she looked like a whore with a huge sagging rack.

Her eyes were hollow and her moles were hairy.
Her hair was all matted with spittle—quite scary.
Her gaping mouth was drawn down in a frown.
Her breath smelled of cat shit and her teeth were all brown.

Her shirt said “#YesAllWomen” and “men are dumb.”

I knew right then that I wanted me some.
She had a hideous face and a huge round belly
That shook when she talked, like old K-Y Jelly.

She was crusty and smelly—a ripe old self,
And I sighed when I saw her in spite of myself.
With a fart and a scratch she started to work,
Filling the panties, and then turned with a jerk,

Grabbing her crotch and picking her nose,
Then giving a huff, up the chimney she rose.
Waddling to the sleigh, to her oppressors she yelled.
And away they all flew—like their balls that she held.

But I heard her swear as she drove out of sight, “#killallmen and to all women good night!”

Stakeholder DNA

December 26, 2023 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

While sitting in a winery enjoying a local fruit of the vine, I struck up a conversation with a fellow sitting next to me. He appeared to be in his mid-20s and spoke with a British accent. As it turned out, he was a Pakistani. I assumed, perhaps wrongly, he was a Muslim and wondered why he was imbibing an alcoholic beverage, but it would have been rude to bring up that issue.

It turned out he was in town on family business – or more to the point, his whole family was in town for family business. The young man was considering marrying a local girl and his family and hers were discussing the matter. Particularly surprising was the involvement of grandparents, aunts and uncles. That seemed odd to me, but what the hell do I know about Pakistani kinship systems and mating habits?

As I reflected on it afterwards, however, it started to make sense. After all, the young man shared DNA with his parents. This was also true, to a lesser extent, of his grandparents, aunts, and uncles. They were, in a sense, stakeholders in this young man's choice of a mate. Their DNA was contained in the young man's DNA, which would be passed on to the young man's children, so it was incumbent upon them to make sure that a suitable match was arranged. Of course, the prospective bride's family had the same interest. The family discussions, as the young man described them to me, had the businesslike ring of a corporate merger rather than a romantic pairing off of two young people. Of course, the trope in countless movies and novels is boy meets girl, not clan meets clan. Clannishness might have been considered positive or at least normal once upon a time; now the word has negative romantic connotations, evoking images of the Montagues and the Capulets.

In modern western societies, it is assumed that marriage is an individual choice and that love is the primary motivation. Even with more and more men self-medicating with red pills, it must be admitted that romantic love remains embedded in our culture. In fact, a lot of people make a lot of money off it. Romantic love drives jewelry sales, book sales (romance novels), candy sales (Valentine's Day), wedding planning, honeymoon travel, cosmetics sales, and the fashion industry. Even in an age of cynicism, love is love and love conquers all…except when it doesn't. In that case, one may revel in the martyrdom of love unrequited. Romantic love runs the gamut from bliss to masochism.

Of course, if a modern western couple becomes an item, it is still customary to introduce one's prospective spouse to one's parents. I seriously doubt, however, that a young man would approach his prospective father-in-law and formally ask for his daughter's hand in marriage. And I know the grandparents, aunts and uncles would not be consulted on the matter. As likely as not, they would not meet the fiancé before the wedding day.

Also, if a father objected to his daughter's choice of a mate today it would probably make no difference to her (unless the father was wealthy and swore to cut her out of the will). Of course, given the reality of same-sex marriage today, there's no telling how many fathers breathe a sigh of relief upon discovering that their daughter is not marrying someone else's daughter.

With birth rates in the dumper today, it is understandable that parents of adult children are concerned about the family bloodline. When birth rates were higher, it was pretty well assured that some if not all of one's offspring would engender their own offspring. Pity the only child today, forced to bear the bloodline burden all alone. And if said child has announced that being a girlboss or going MGTOW or changing sex are more important than offspring, what can the parents do? In a sense, it's their fault. They should have spawned more kids to tilt the odds in their favor.

Imagine how much pressure parents can apply in such a situation, then try to imagine how much pressure Pakistani parents, grandparents, uncles, and aunts can apply! Are they justified in exerting that pressure? If this sort of piling on took hold in western society, it would open up a can of worms.

Suppose a westernized Pakistani college girl meets the old-school family of her fiancé and the subject of abortion comes up. "My body, my choice," won't fly, as an aborted fetus bears the DNA of a lot of family members. You cannot abort that fetus any more than you can renege on any sort of sacred trust. The reply to the individualist existential question "Whose life is it?" is "Whose DNA is it?"

Speaking of stakeholders, how about the father of a child the mother wants to abort. Half the DNA of that fetus was contributed by the father but he has no say in whether that baby is allowed to be born? Equity, anyone?

Granted, it might be difficult for a modern Westerner to grasp this concept of shared DNA, as we are so hopelessly wrapped up in human rights and autonomy and equality and all sorts of other concepts. An obligation to one's clan is considered passé. Have you ever heard someone refer to a relative as a kinsman? I didn't think so. And describing a relative as a clansman evokes images of Birth of a Nation.

In truth, the clan is hardly the most repressive institution in the world today. While unbridled individualism appears to be the new normal, that is illusory. You have an obligation to the Big Clan, i.e., the state. That could be your city, your county, your state, the fedguv, or some sort of global consortium such as the UN or the WEF.

This brings up an important difference. In olden days you could walk away from your clan if there were some sort of irreconcilable breach. It might result in hard feelings or regrets but it could be done. Walking away from the state is another matter entirely. Assertions of individual sovereign immunity will not be entertained in any court of law, and only rarely in the court of public opinion.

One wonders…what would happen if a Pakistani woman paid a visit to a sperm bank. Would the donor have to undergo a vetting process from the family? If a son had his choice of frozen eggs from an assortment of women, would his relatives stage an inquest?

Can we say that the Pakistani way is superior to the western version of romantic attachment over all? Is mate choice by committee superior to mate choice by emotions?

Admittedly, the former is less likely to be influenced by rose-colored glasses. Of course, marriages of convenience have always taken place, but could such cold-blooded rationalism ever become the norm in the west? Can the head ultimately conquer the heart? If so, should it conquer the heart? Is it possible for the head and the heart to operate in synch? Think of it! The brain and the heart…two organs beating as one!

Of course, there is always the possibility that A.I./A.I. (artificial intelligence/artificial insemination) will take over and conventional human reproduction will no longer be needed and could conceivably be outlawed. Think of it! No more dysfunctional families! No more awkward Thanksgiving dinners! No more creepy in-laws! No more nepotism! And no need for Pakistani-style vetting!

In the meantime, does a thoroughly modern young couple want to have a flock of relatives sizing them up before they get married? I don't think so, but obligation goes both ways. The relatives are more likely to support you in a rough spot if you have respected their wishes. It's great if people are there when you need them, but that means they will likely be hanging around when you don't need them and would rather be left alone. For every close-knit family you envy, there is one that makes you shudder and say to yourself, "Sure glad I'm not one of them."

So what's the answer? Blue pill? Red pill? Black pill?

Where is Big Pharma when you really need them?

“Humans are a gynocentric species” is pure myth

December 27, 2023 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Don’t let the phony simp-science con you any longer. Here’s a debunking of the “humans are a gynocentric-species” foundations that gynocentrists don’t want you to consider:

- Gynocentric hypothesis: Women’s hypergamous behaviour indicates that human sexuality is driven by gynocentric imperatives, with societies historically prioritized around women’s desire for status.
  Fact: Women’s exaggerated hypergamy can be explained by the more recent rise of cultural narcissism which involves behaviors of self-enhancement and status-seeking. Moreover, narcissism is maladaptive in the sense that it contributes to a decrease in marriage, increasing divorce, and is implicated in plummeting birth rates.
- Gynocentric hypothesis: Women’s neotenous facial features prove that they evolved to be prioritized and pampered more than males.
  Fact: Today women’s neoteny can be explained in larger part by the use of cosmetics, practiced childlike gestures, and increasingly, plastic surgery. In comparison to other primates, human males also display a degree of neoteny, though not usually enhanced by cosmetic artifice as we see practiced by women.
- Gynocentric hypothesis: Women fall pregnant, give birth and care for offspring, which means that very few males are necessary for the perpetuation of the species.
  Fact: Women’s pregnancies are not more precious than male investment in child care and the provision of protective infrastructure for infant survival, without which a large percentage of infants would perish. Therefore men and women are equally important for reproductive success.
- Gynocentric hypothesis: Women are the gatekeepers of sex who decide which males get to have sex, and males generally comply with this exclusive female choice.
  Fact: Women are not “the gatekeepers” of sex. An overwhelming majority of men are approached by females attempting to initiate sex with them, and at other times men approach women. In these situations men have the full capacity to say “yes” or “no” to sexual opportunities, thus men are also gatekeepers of sex. Humans are a Mutual Mate Choice (MMC) species and males invest in parenting of offspring, leading them to also be choosy about the qualities of their sexual and reproductive partners.
- Gynocentric hypothesis: More females than males reproduced during human evolutionary history which suggests that women controlled which males had sex.
  Fact: this can be explained by the choices of powerful males sequestering women as wives and property, and by arranged marriages – this is not a result of female choice.
- Gynocentric hypothesis: Men go to die in wars for the single purpose of prioritizing and protecting women, thus indicating that women are more valuable to the human species.

Fact: Men dying in wars is historically for the sake of defending broader affiliations like religion, king, country, democracy, or entire family networks, and not simply for the sake of women's survival.

The list could go on. There's no evidence that humans are a "gynocentric species" whose relationships must, by evolutionary nature, be gynocentric. At most we can say men engage in a limited number of gynocentric acts that are matched by commensurate androcentric acts and gestures by women. Eclipsing both of these motives is a wider family centrism, and genecentrism.

Why does it matter?

It matters because if men and women imagine gynocentrism to be the natural default for human relationships, and for the human species, they tend to resign themselves to unbalanced relationships based entirely on deference to women's needs and wants. Retaining the belief that we are a gynocentric species works as a mental constraint which stymies our mental ability to override it, whereas clearing out such ideological garbage allows the mind to act more efficiently and to make wiser life decisions for the purposes of pair-bonding, families, society and for oneself.

The Trend Of The Sexes – The Men’s Review (1948 Article)

December 28, 2023 | by Mens Review | Link | Original Link

When we observe the relationship of the sexes in the past, we find woman solely of the ménage, a menial, subjective, subjected. The male holding the centre of the human drama. From this point to the next point -the present- can be traced the line following an upward trend, economically, intellectually, and politically, which forecasts the eventual future point, where men and women will be equal and complimentary to each other — a real factual equality.

The conception of equality at the moment is false. The female has gained a large measure of economic freedom, and will obtain more and more. But as she advances, these advances imply just adjustments in her relationship with the male. To take new freedoms and selfishly retain the oppressions over the male, is not only to arouse male resentment, but it is an abomination indeed, which even males who have a desire to free women, must fight in self-preservation.

Those women who have progressed farther than their fellows, who are conscious of the responsibilities the new situation brings, as well as its rights, have a duty towards their opposite sex, who after all, and their brothers, fathers, and sons. To give freedom with the same zeal as they demand it for themselves, that along the road of human progress, we may work in harmony to make life a thing of happiness for both.

THE TREND OF THE SEXES

By "RITH"

When we observe the relationship of the sexes in the past, we find woman solely of the ménage, a menial, subjective, subjected. The male holding the centre of the human drama. From this point to the next point, the present, can be traced the line following an upward trend, economically, intellectually, and politically, which forecasts the eventual future point, where men and women will be equal and complementary to each other—a real factual equality. The conception of equality at the moment is false. The female has gained a large measure of economic freedom, and will obtain more and more. But as she advances, these advances imply just adjustments in her relationship with the male. To take new freedoms and selfishly retain the oppressions over the male, is not only to arouse male resentment, but it is an abomination indeed, which even males who have a desire to free women, must fight in self-preservation. Those women who have progressed farther than their fellows, who are conscious of the responsibilities the new situation brings, as well as its rights, have a duty towards their opposite sex, who after all, are their brothers, fathers, and sons. To give freedom with the same zeal as they demand it for themselves, that along the road of human progress, we may work in harmony to make life a thing of happiness for both.

RapeHoax: The Joshua Strange Story

December 29, 2023 | by AVfM Video Source | Link | Original Link

---

Joshua Strange and his mother fought back against unfounded and untrue accusations after Joshua was unexpectedly arrested.

From an interesting channel.

Sweden, where man-beating is sport!

December 31, 2023 | by RK Hendrick | Link | Original Link

Welcome to the modern nation of Sweden, where brutally beating an unarmed man without justification or cause (by a female police officer) is permissible and socially acceptable.

In my lifetime, I have been a prosecutor, a defense attorney and a Pro Tem (part-time) Municipal Judge. I have read tens of thousands of police reports, viewed hundreds of police videos, completed many "ride alongs" with on duty police officers, participated in countless criminal trials and hearings, conducted thousands of interviews with police officers, been through hundreds of hours of courtroom police officer testimony, and trained & advised police officers on Search and Seizure. To be candid, I tend to have a very favorable view of police officers, as I know and appreciate how difficult their jobs can be.

Unfortunately, there are exceptions to this perspective.

Take a moment to review (more than once) the YouTube video that accompanies this article. I reviewed this video well over a half-dozen times. Each time I see it, I get completely appalled and outraged! To be candid, the police officer's conduct in this matter is disgusting, inhumane and amoral!

The video was taken in central Stockholm on Brunnsgatan (Brunns street) on or about the evening of July 11, 2013.

Upon review of the video of this brutal attack, you will note the following:

- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically threatening behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically abusive behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically lewd or profane gestures towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen yell at this female police officer.
- At All Times, this male citizen used open, respectful and compliant body language towards the female police officer. His arms were down at his side and the palms of his hands open.
- At All Times, this male citizen maintained an appropriate physical decorum and respectful distance from the female police. (Police officer safety).
- At All Times, the physical safety of the female police officer was NOT at issue and there was NO immediate and/or imminent physical harm being directed at her by the male citizen.
- At No Time did this male citizen provoke an attack by this female police officer.
- At No Time while being brutally attacked by the female police officer, did this male citizen engage in any type of physical alteration, combative behavior, retaliatory behavior or assaultive behavior towards the female police officer.

Regardless of what verbal exchange may have occurred off camera prior to this brutal attack or during the actual video, there is absolutely NO justification or basis for the officer's conduct and use of physical force.

This vicious unprovoked attack is completely without cause and/or reason. Under NO (zero) circumstances can the conduct of this police officer be morally justified and/or condoned. Any well-trained, well-adjusted police officer knows that when there is NO physical threat (to you or anyone else) you do NOT have the right to beat a citizen (bloody) to the ground with the aid of a baton and a German Shepherd attack dog! Bottom line: This is blatant misandric bigotry and the use malicious physical abuse on the part of the police officer.

If a male police officer engaged in this type of brutal unprovoked behavior and assaulted an unarmed female citizen in this manner, there would be an international outrage. This officer should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and go to prison with all of the other criminals. There is absolutely no rationale or excuse for this vicious inhumane conduct!

RK Hendrick, Esq.

Creator / Co Admin. of the Facebook Group: "Friend of Protection For Men" … The largest and most active Men's / Fathers' / Boys' Rights & Issues Discussion Group on Facebook with an international membership of some very influential and brilliant people. https://www.facebook.com/groups/protectionformen/

Author of: How To Avoid Getting Screwed When Getting Laid…Available on Amazon.com

Erin Pizzey CBE

January 1, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Erin Pizzey started the world's first domestic violence shelter in the UK in 1971. Originally called the Chiswick Women's Aid, you can still find this organisation operating under the name Refuge. In 2021 Refuge celebrated its 50th anniversary. Many well known figures, including politicians and royals, were present. Unfortunately Erin wasn't present. This wasn't an oversight. Refuge had deliberately excluded its founder from the celebration.

After starting Chiswick Women's Aid Erin began interviewing women and she soon realised that a high proportion of domestic and intimate partner violence was reciprocal in nature. Both partners were perpetrators and victims. Their violence fed off each other. Later research would confirm this but at the time it was a revolutionary idea.

She started to try to help men too, and that's when the feminists pushed Erin out. She was threatened and intimidated. Today there is one small reference to Erin on Refuge's website but that's it.

Continuing her work to support men, Erin has had an association with A Voice for Men since 2013.

Three years on from the 2021 celebration and things have changed. Erin has been appointed as a Commander of the British Empire (CBE) "for services to the victims of domestic abuse". This is a big deal as the CBE is a step up from the better-known Officer of the British Empire (OBE). The British honours system requires that there be no more than 8,960 living CBEs at any given time.

This is an amazing achievement for Erin and demonstrates national recognition of her work on domestic and intimate partner violence, including violence against men. This award, along with the appointment of Bettina Arndt as a Member of the Order of Australia in 2020, are further signs that times are changing.

Congratulations Erin. The award is well deserved.

Federal Court Allows Student to Sue Accuser & Yale Over False Metoo Claims

January 4, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

XY Crew: Interview with Brother K

January 4, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Why Men’s Rights Activists Should Care About Folklore

January 7, 2024 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

Feminism is ubiquitous in fairy tale studies. Donald Haase edited a book about it: Fairy Tales and Feminism: New Approaches. Nancy Canepa, in Teaching Fairy Tales, called it “groundbreaking” and responsible for “stimulating” conversations within the field. Jack Zipes declared Laura Gonzenbach more important than the Brothers Grimm in his introduction to Beautiful Angiola, because her collection “more genuinely and more candidly” represented “the female if not feminist perspective on life.”

Men’s rights activists should be concerned about this political appropriation of folklore since the genre is globally popular (e.g., Disney) and has been used for “consciousness-raising and consensus-building in a wide range of social movements,” according to Ohio State University’s Center for Folklore Studies. This means worldwide pop culture and humanitarianism are being shaped by anti-male prejudices.

The best recourse is to reclaim folktales. Good candidates include “The Cow-Tail Switch,” which affirms male life and fatherhood; “Strike but Hear,” which champions due process; and “Ara the Fair and Shamiram,” which acknowledges male rape victims, as these tales examine men’s gendered experiences, and are underdiscussed among folklorists, giving MRAs the opportunity to popularize them and set the standard for how they’re interpreted. Text-to-world analysis, which compares real and fictional scenarios, helps the process by allowing MRAs to blend male issues discussion with textual study.

The Cow-Tail Switch

Found in The Cow-Tail Switch and Other West African Stories, this Liberian tale subverts common attitudes about men and their social roles. Ogaloussa goes hunting and disappears. Afterwards, his wife births a son, Puli, who asks where his father is, prompting his brothers to search the forest until they find their father’s corpse, and magically reanimate it. Ogaloussa returns home and crafts a cow-tail switch, saying it’s for the son most responsible for his rescue. His children argue over who deserves it, with other villagers arguing too, but he gives it to Puli and everyone agrees it’s the right choice.

The primary theme is the value of male wellness. Initially, nobody attempted to find Ogaloussa after he disappears, not even his family. This reflects male disposability.

Manifestations of the phenomenon include the Canadian government's exclusion of men and boys from its Inquiry Into Missing and Murdered Indigenous Women, lesser assistance given to homeless men in the U.S., and the abandonment of military-aged men during warzone evacuations. However, this tale critiques such attitudes. Puli, unfamiliar with his father, and unaccustomed to the man endangering himself for others' benefit, is rewarded for caring about him by being gifted the titular object. A subtler critique comes from Ogaloussa and Puli being the sole characters with forenames which are generally reserved for important characters. The implication is that men who suffer are important and only those willing to help them deserve recognition.

The secondary theme is the importance of fathers. Puli's older brothers are competent individuals, implied to know combat, navigation, teamwork and tracking, along with their magic. While the text doesn't confirm it, it's reasonable to assume Ogaloussa taught them their survivalist skills given his occupation. Combined with the brothers' willingness to locate their father when Puli asks for him (a loving gesture), the story affirms what clinical research proves: father involvement positively effects educational success and prosocial behavior.

A men's rights perspective also answers to the story's final question: Does Puli, who remembered Ogaloussa and prompted his rescue, deserve more recognition than his brothers, who found and resurrected their father? As a "dilemma tale," the story's outcome is meant to be debatable. But the ending is inevitable considering Puli did the most and thus of anyone: he set a precedent that benefits all men in his community (i.e., valuing male life).

Strike but Hear

A story from Folk-Tales of Bengal that promotes due process rights. Three princes are tasked with patrolling their kingdom and on their first night the youngest son meets a guardian deity who warns him of his father's impending death. The prince beheads the cobra that was going to bite his father, but during the cleanup, he drops blood on his stepmother's breast. He wipes it off as his stepmother (who hates him) awakens, and she tells his father that he tried to rape her. Believing the accusation, the father summons his sons and asks them how he should punish the crime. They tell him to kill the perpetrator but warn him to prove guilt, citing three instances of people being harmed due to unsubstantiated claims. The youngest son then explains what happened and his father believes him.

The rajah's belief in his son's testimony is significant because a feature of real false allegations is that people ignore counterevidence. For instance, Reverend George Burroughs was executed on accusations of witchcraft during the Salem Witch Trials, despite reciting the Lord's Prayer perfectly, which was believed impossible for witches to do. Furthermore, civil rights activist Ida B. Wells noted that "No colored man, no matter what his reputation, is safe from lynching if a white woman, no matter what her standing or motive, cares to charge him with insult or assault." Even when the targets survive their lives are devastated. Consider the three lacrosse players from Duke University, whom were threatened with castration by angry protesters. While they were unharmed, their reputations were ruined and they faced intense hostility and scrutiny from the media and school faculty.

When read from a men's rights perspective, this tale exposes false accusations as timeless and international; prevalent enough to warrant documentation in oral narrative. It also joins a body of narratives that explore the topic: the Greco-Roman myth of Hippolytus and Phaedra and the Egyptian story of Anpu and Bata.

Ara the Fair and Shamiram

Taken from The Heritage of Armenian Literature, this legend highlights male sexual victimization. Queen Semiramis (Shamiram) hears of Ara's beauty and becomes obsessed with him, proposing either marriage or copulation, but the king declines both. The queen retaliates by invading Armenia with the intention of subduing and ravishing Ara. However, during the attack, he's killed and Semiramis fails to magically resurrect him. Armenian troops prepare a counterstrike, intent on avenging their king, but Semiramis convinces them that he's been revived by disguising another man as him, ending the war in her favor.

Ara's rejection of an eager woman is significant. His chastity contradicts perceptions of men as hypersexual – a stereotypes so pervasive it's influenced policies. One example was airlines barring men – but not women – from sitting beside unaccompanied minors; the assumption being that men are potential molesters. Inversely, Semiramis is defined by her predation. Her lasciviousness corresponds with data showing women commit 13% of rapes and 79% of "made to penetrates" against men. Moreover, the queen's use of military power to try to rape Ara reflects cultural and institutional acceptance of sexual violence against men throughout the world. Boys in Afghanistan are sometimes sold by their families as sex slaves to warlords. Israel has a legal definition of rape that excludes male victims. And the U.S. government once forced a survivor of statutory rape to pay child support to the woman who assaulted him.

Looked at from a men's rights angle, this story disrupts contemporary Western attitudes of gender and morality that frame females more positively than men, resulting in preferential treatment of women in various sectors of life. This older narrative shows that the ancients had a nuanced concept of good and evil with relation to the sexes.

Conclusion

In Fairy Tales from Before Fairy Tales, Jan M. Ziolkowski writes, "Being incorrigibly optimistic (if only when it comes to stories), I have faith that people will be inquisitive about ancient and medieval literatures if those literatures can be shown to relate somehow to their present." These literatures do relate to our present since they capture men's gendered experiences. They also belong to a financially lucrative and socially relevant genre that spans the world. Why not utilize that potential to bring attention to the issues and needs of men and boys? Doing so would further human rights progress while adding intellectual diversity to an academic discipline.

The Rise Of Transwomen — Process Philosophy in Action

January 8, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

> Process philosophy assumes that the universe and human systems are 'continually becoming.' It emphasizes the elements of change and novelty as contrasted with a belief in permanence of forms, and uniformity. In the Greek tradition Heraclitus said that no person ever steps into the same river twice, because on the second attempt it is not the same river and he is not the same man.

Vaginoplasty, womb transplants, hormone blockers, hormone injections. These things represent the crowning achievement of cultural feminism, creating a kind of unforeseen gyno-dystopia resulting from the elevation of all things female. That same feminism exerts a gravitational pull that tends to filter all human events through its interpretive lens. Many women show their participation in the feminist worldview via postures of gendered narcissism, while men might show their participation in it by acts of chivalry or, more recently, by initiating changes to their sexual and gender orientation (MtF) in order to become more like women.

Gynocentric feminism is the soil from which the transgender revolution has sprouted – a revolution that represents nothing less than a dissolution of centuries of accumulated gender customs. As Simone de Beauvoir (1949) famously stated of the feminist position, "One is not born, but rather becomes, a woman. No biological, psychological, or economic fate determines the figure that the human female presents in society; it is civilization as a whole that produces this creature."

The feminist perspective paved the way for gender to be delinked from sex, which appears to have opened the floodgates for men to adopt the celebrated gender identity of woman. Before we draw some ultimate conclusions about this development, lets first look at how female gender identity came to be celebrated.

The historical rise of gynocentrism

Putting the teenage trend of FtM transitioning to one side, we can conclude that mature age MtF transitions in the European and Anglosphere contents predominate, especially in the USA which has for centuries been a champion of more extreme forms of gynocentrism, as demonstrated by the following prima facie observations:

In 1846 a London Sun article describes American culture as an epicenter of exaggerated gynocentrism & chivalry:

> I am convinced that a lady, no matter what her age and attractions might be, could journey through the whole extent of the union, not only without > experiencing a single annoyance, but aided in every possible way with unobtrusive civility. Indeed a great number of Saphonisbas and Almiras do travel about, protected only by the chivalry of their countrymen and their own undoubted propriety.

>
> To them the best seats, the best of everything, are always allotted. A friend of mine told me of a little affair at New York Theatre, the other night, illustrative of my assertion. A stiff-necked Englishman had engaged a front place, and of course the best corner: when the curtain rose, he was duly seated, opera-glass in hand, to enjoy the performance. A lady and a gentleman came into the box shortly afterwards; the cavalier in escort, seeing that the place where our friend sat was the best, calling his attention, saying "The lady, sir," and motioned that the corner should be vacated. The possessor, partly because he disliked the imperative mood, and partly because it bored him to be disturbed, refused. Some words ensued, which attracted the attention of the sovereign people in the pit, who magisterially enquired what was the matter?
>
> The American came to the front of the box and said, "There is an Englishman here who will not give up his place to a lady." Immediately their majesties swarmed up by dozens over the barriers, seized the offender, very gently though, and carried him to the entrance; he kicked, cursed, and fought all in vain: he excited neither the pity nor the anger of his stern executioners; they placed him carefully on his feet again at the steps, one man handing him his hat, another his opera glass, and a third the price he had paid for his ticket of admission, then quickly shut the door upon him, and returned to their places. The shade of the departed Judge Lynch must have rejoiced at such an angelic administration of his law! – England in the New World.

In 1856, author of Putnam's Monthly Magazine published the following summary of the relations between men and women in America:

> "Long before the cry of woman's rights was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined. Usage superseded law, and trampled it under foot. Sentiment put logical consistency at defiance, and the American husband has thus become a legal monster, a logical impossibility, required to fly without wings, and to run without feet.
>
> "While the wife is thus rendered to a great extent independent of her husband, he, by a strange inconsistency is still held, both by law and public opinion, just as responsible for her as before. The old and reasonable maxim that 'he who dances must pay the piper,' does not apply to wives—they dance, and the husband pays. To such an extent is this carried, that if the wife beats her husband, and he, having no authority to punish her in kind, applies to the criminal courts for redress, she will be fined for assault and battery, which fine he must pay, even thought she has plenty of money of her own. or, in default of paying, go to jail! Such cases are by no means of unprecedented occurrence in > our criminal courts.

In 1903 culture critic Max O'Rell observed the following about gynocentrism in the USA:

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country."

Price Collier observed in 1909:

> In England the establishment is, as a rule, at any rate from a man's point of view, more comfortable than the American home. Americans staying any time in England, whether men or women, are impressed by the fact that it is the country of men. Likewise the English, both men and women, who visit America are impressed by the fact that America is the country of women.

The Independent reported the following in 1909:

> "In Europe the aristocracy is largely relieved from drudgery in order that they may cultivate the graces of life. In America the attempt is being made to relieve the women of all classes from drudgery, and we are glad to see that some of them at least are making good use of the leisure thus afforded them. It is a project involving unprecedented daring and self-sacrifice on the part of American men, this making an aristocracy of half the race. That it is possible yet remains to be proved. Whether it is desirable depends upon whether this new feminine aristocracy avoids the faults of the aristocracy of the Old World, such as frivolousness and snobbishness."

Irishman George A. Birmingham wrote in 1914:

> "There are people in the world who believe that we are born again and again, rising or sinking in the scale of living things at each successive incarnation according as we behave ourselves well or badly in our present state. If this creed were true, I should try very hard to be good, because I should want, next time I am born, to be an American woman. She seems to me to have a better kind of life than the women of any other nation, or, indeed, than anybody else, man or woman… American social life seems to me — the word is one to apologize for — gynocentric. It is arranged with a view to the convenience and delight of women. Men come in where and how they can…. The American woman is certainly more her own mistress than the Englishwoman, just because America does its best for women and only its second-best for men. The tendency among American humourists is to dwell a little on the greed of the Englishman, who is represented as incapable of earning money for himself. The English jester lays more stress on the American woman's desire to be called "my lady," and pokes sly fun at the true Democrat's fondness for titles. The American man is reverent toward women. It is not the homage of the strong toward the > weak, but the obeisance of the inferior in the presence of a superior. This difference of spirit underlies the whole relationship of men to women in England and America. The English feminist is up against chivalry and wants equality. The American woman, though she may claim rights, has no inducement to destroy reverence.

Albert Einstein observed in 1921:

> Above all things are the women who as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in the most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is in the vogue, and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

Summary and conclusion

Based on the above collection of artifacts, we can begin to wrap these details into a coherent conclusion, and for this we'll turn to Georg Wilhelm Friedrich Hegel (1770–1831) for a template.

Hegel naturally didn't write about vaginoplasties or the transgender movement, but he did write about process philosophy and the proposition that social processes are an ever-recurring cycle which he characterized by three phases (1) an initial set of cultural beliefs called a thesis, (2) next arises dissatisfaction and a negation of that thesis called the antithesis, and lastly (3) there occurs a synthesis of culture beliefs whereby the two conflicting ideas are reconciled to form a new proposition.

Thesis – Antithesis – Synthesis.

This provides a suitable template for organizing the peculiar shifts in gender ideology we've been witnessing over recent centuries which, following Hegel, we can now organize as follows:

1. Thesis: Centuries of gynocentrism
2. Antithesis: Men's rights backlash
3. Synthesis: Discovery of malleability of the sexual body (hormones/surgery), accompanied by belief in gender fluidity, resulting in a dissolution of clear sexual and gender boundaries, along with all traditional culture privileges that have accumulated around biological sex. [This completes the synthesis of the two conflicting ideas]

As mentioned elsewhere, the transgender movement is not a cause célèbre driven by men's rights advocates, as is sometimes claimed. Rather, the current support for transgender rights is derived from the power of government administrations and global regimes playing "freedom one-upmanship" – ie., the feigning of moral purity to position themselves at top of the global hierarchy.

The elites however are not the ones ultimately driving this process forward, even if they are doing the job of hastening, supporting and exploiting it. Instead, it appears to be Hegel's mysterious process philosophy that is driving the changes, and the elites and sundry grifters are riding this gender-bender horse in a rodeo of competing cultural powers.

Where does all this leave us?

We can draw the conclusion that over the last century our framing of gendered customs has become increasingly captured by a gynocentric turf war between traditional women, and progressive feminist forces, with trans activism being an emerging force that is actively working to disrupt it. Time will tell if the transgender movement continues its disintegrative influence over traditional sex roles, however the surgical and chemical technology that has allowed this to flourish does not look like disappearing anytime soon – in fact researchers are just getting started.

The chemical invention of the birth control pill for women, introduced in the 1950s, served to crown the gynocentric culture project and to cement the dominance of its centuries-long evolution. The chemical and surgical "support" for trans-people holds equally gargantuan potential; which includes the tangential possibility of leading us past the polarizing gynocentric setup of recent centuries and back to a saner place – post trans hysteria – where everyday men and women can be themselves without coercion and judgement… notably minus those inflated gender privileges and ideologies that have driven us into this absurd position to begin with.

See also:

- Transphobia vs. Manphobia
- Unintended Consequences of Transgender Activism on Men's Issues

•

Image by Freepik

Why do good girls become feminists?

January 9, 2024 | by Rachael Lefler | Link | Original Link

The MRA or mere critic of feminism commonly hears some variation of “Not all feminists are like that”, or “NAFALT”, whenever they attack feminism or call it out on behavior and ideas that seem irrational, cultish, fascist, hysterical, exaggerating, petty, childish, spiteful, greedy, envious, or hateful. But just because it’s an overused, to the point of becoming a cliché, response whenever someone criticizes feminism, it’s nonetheless worth probing into. Why is it that not all feminists are “like that?” Why would a thoughtful, considerate woman join what is more and more every day showing its true colors as a misandrist hate group that is intolerant of opposing voices?

The Appeal of Any Movement

Like religions, political movements offer converts several things of great psychological benefit, including:

1. Friendship and social acceptance.
2. An easy explanation for why the world is the way that it is.
3. An easy way to blame their problems and frustrations on something other than themselves.
4. The chance to become more powerful as a group than they could be individually.

I would say most people join movements or religions they see as representing the thing they lack in themselves and their lives, but want and hope for most. People who want stability, family, and community might seek a traditional, organized religion; people who want tranquility, freedom to be themselves, and oneness with nature might seek more modern and less organized religions. It is the same with political movements. For example, people who want more pay and benefits might be attracted to socialist politics, while people who want more freedom to run their own company how they want will prefer libertarianism.

With women, basically you (obviously) have a mix of good and bad ones. We can call “good” those who are even-tempered, rational, pleasant, calm, kind, loving, nurturing, compassionate, patient, and civilized. The “bad” ones are greedy, moody, irrational, self-absorbed, vain, bitchy, gossipy, and psychopathic, being thoughtlessly hurtful. But, while it’s good to be a good woman, it’s also a bit painful. It means stifling your urges to harm others. It means listening to that annoying old man’s umpteenth complaint at the nursing home you work for, always with the same calm smile, when you’d rather “accidentally” give him too many sedatives next meal time. It’s hard because society doesn’t always reward niceness like it should. The nice guy sees hot women hooking up with psychopathic men, and the nice girl turns green with envy as nasty bitches get what they want in life, or so it often seems. Outspoken women, even the really mean and arrogant ones, get rewarded with money, men who do their bidding, career advancement, and positive social regard. Nice women, like nice guys, too often get the short end of the stick.

Enter: Feminism

What feminism tells nice women is a seductive message; that all our problems are caused by patriarchy, and that being nice is a sign of our oppression, and that the key to liberation is to stop giving a fuck about being nice and just be more assertive, crude, mean, and masculine.

Feminism tells us geeky, bottom-rung-of-society nice girls that all we have to do to be free is to stop being nice girls. When we feel overwhelmed or powerless, it tells us things we want to hear because they make us feel powerful. Suddenly, no act or thought of ours is too mundane or too trivial to have no greater political meaning. It becomes revolutionary to stop shaving our legs or to not wear makeup, as revolutionary as a hunger strike or a worker's revolt. It makes us feel powerful, triumphant, big.

The Problem

The kind of illusory self-importance feminism offers us, however, is fragile. It's all built upon lies, false statistics, illogical assumptions, illusions, and deceptions that distort reality. Therefore, when someone becomes a feminist, they have to, to a certain degree, shut out reality, discarding even the most well-proven facts, if they discredit or challenge feminism.

The more illusory, bullshit power feminism gives us, the more hostile we become to other points of view. I think that's why 20-something women, including me, are more likely than older women to be able to shake off feminist brainwashing attempts, because we don't really receive the benefits of power that more experienced professional victims get from their more distinguished careers in whining. That way, there is nothing good we have that is threatened by challenges to the feminist worldview.

Feminism is like a stack of turtles from Dr. Seuss' "Yurtle the Turtle"; the ones on the bottom gain from their liberation by not having to support anyone they don't agree with or don't like, but the ones at the top have to really crack the whip to keep those supporters under them, or they fall. In other words, they need us more than we need them.

Once we realize that being kind and believing in equal political rights for both genders does NOT mean that you have to support the crazies and the professional complainers, those people lose their power.

In other words, I think the "cool" feminists who aren't "like that" should take a good look at themselves, and answer: Do you really need feminism, or does feminism just need you?

Feminist Gay-Bashing

January 10, 2024 | by Jim Doyle | Link | Original Link

Have you noticed how much hatred feminists direct at MGTOW guys? Is it just because they can't be bothered to distinguish between PUAs, MRAs and MGTOW or is there more to it? I think there is. I think if we look at feminism's record on gay men, the Ultimate MGTOW, we can see what's really going on.

A while ago I found out about the Redstockings, a radical feminist group founded in the late sixties. They had a nasty streak of man-hating gay-bashing and it wasn't incidental, it flowed from their basic premises. So maybe all their good was really no good at all. And they were not some fringe group and they were not the only feminists of their period to use gay-bashing rhetoric and weave man-hating and gay-bashing principles into their work. It turns out all kinds of very prominent feminists in the late '60s and early '70s went in for this kind of bigotry.

John Lauritsen gave a talk back in 1976 that lays this all out in great detail. He cites a widespread pattern of vilification of gay men and gay organizations by feminists of that time. Feminists conducted a campaign of disrupting gay events and undermining gay organizations. As they say, read the whole thing. It is a very ugly history. If you have never heard about it in your courses in Women's Studies, go back and ask why. Bring back the answers; I bet they will be hilarious.

Here he quotes Carol Hanisch where she explicitly enunciates the homophobic claim that male homosexuality and male separatism are misogynist. Oh that's it! It's all about the wimminz!

> "Men's liberationists always bring up 'confronting their own feelings about men' by which they mean homosexuality. Male homosexuality is an extension of the reactionary club (meaning both group and weapon). The growth of gay liberation carries contempt for women to the ultimate: total segregation. The desire of men to 'explore their homosexuality' really means encouraging the possibility of homosexuality as a reaction against feminist demands. This is the reason the movement for "gay rights" received much more support only after women's liberation became a mass movement."

There it is: men ignoring women is contempt. Even when we do nothing we are guilty of harming women, because we owe them attention and it is violence when we "deprive" them of it. Talk about a rape culture – they are entitled to our sexual attention.

So men have a duty to have sex with women and not with men. That is rape culture and it is feminists demanding it. Oh, and forced heterosexuality for men. Can you see the difference between these people and Sarah Palin or Rick Santorum? Me neither.

Or maybe there's no intention of there being any sex – men are just supposed to marry and support women – because they "deserve" it like all the advertising is constantly telling us. Female privilege much?

Lauritsen gives Kate Millett–author of “Sexual Politics” and, ironically, a lesbian separatist–special attention for her hatred of male relationships. She comes across as both stupid and dishonest. For instance she equates homosexuality and Nazism, which is an especially obscene piece of stupidity in view of the actual history, and a transparent piece of dishonesty in view of how well-known that history is.

He also details these feminists’ hatred of drag queens, too. That hatred came as no surprise either.

This bigotry is not some little splinter thing in feminism. It is foundational. Millett’s Sexual Politics was seminal to the movement and Hanish was a founding member of the radical wing of the movement. She edited the Redstockings Collective’s book the Feminist Revolution and coined the phrase “the personal is political”. These were not marginal people or marginal views. It’s no good whining how feminism is not a monolith when every pebble of it shares this theoretical underpinning.

Speaking of the Redstockings, we are going to look at their manifesto in the next post on this subject. Even if you have never read it or even heard of it, none of it will be unfamiliar. You see it in every feminist space on the net and you hear it in every gender studies class.

Lauritsen says it best:

> “We must recognize our enemies wherever we find them. Nobody’s ideas and nobody’s actions should be exempted from criticism.”

Gay men in solidarity with feminists against hetero men? That may be attractive to someone coming out of high school and all that trauma, but alliances with people who despise you are just sick.

Falling Down was propaganda

January 13, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

20 studies show how women do not support other women

January 14, 2024 | by Nikita Coulombe | Link | Original Link

I collected these studies in one place because women talk a lot about supporting other women but when it comes down to it, women often undermine each other in insidious ways.

That women in general cannot seem to get along with other women in the long-term has been one of the great disappointments of my life, and I do wonder if it's possible to better support each other, have more productive relationships with men, and better serve our communities if we have a better understanding around our own behavior and motivations.

Without further ado:

1. Women damage rivals' reputations but do not report explicitly disliking them: Competitive reputation manipulation: Women strategically transmit social information about romantic rivals.

2. Women report experiencing more incivility from other women in the workplace than from men: Further understanding incivility in the workplace: The effects of gender, agency, and communion.

3. Regardless of their own promiscuity, all female participants viewed sexually permissive women more negatively: Birds of a feather? Not when it comes to sexual permissiveness.

4. Women are more likely than men to respond to threats of social exclusion with exclusion: Under threat of social exclusion, females exclude more than males.

5. Females relationally victimizing each other has been observed even in elementary school: Relational and physical forms of peer victimization in preschool.

6. Adolescent girls have a poorer record of same-sex friendships than boys: The greater fragility of females' versus males' closest same-sex friendships.

7. While direct physical aggression is greater in males, indirect aggression is greater in females: Does sexual selection explain human sex differences in aggression?

8. The lifetime prevalence of violence by an intimate partner is 43.8% for lesbians vs 16.4% for gay men: The National Intimate Partner and Sexual Violence Survey.

9. Mommy Wars: working mothers and stay-at-home mothers argue over who are better parents: "Welcome to the Mommy Wars, Ladies": Making Sense of the Ideology of Combative Mothering in Mommy Blogs.

10. Women react more negatively than men do when outperformed by their same-sex peers: Sex differences in reactions to outperforming same-sex friends.

11. Even in elementary school, girls are less comfortable competing against their same-sex peers: Greater Discomfort as a Proximate Cause of Sex Differences in Competition.

12. Women are slower than men to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers: Human males appear more prepared than females to resolve conflicts with same-sex peers.

13. Women are irritated by sexy female peers: Intolerance of sexy peers: intrasexual competition among women.

14. Indirect aggression from women towards other women is about self-promotion and derogation of sexual rivals: Do human females use indirect aggression as an intrasexual competition strategy?

15. Female groups engage in social ostracism more than male groups: Human Sexual Differences in the Use of Social Ostracism as a Competitive Tactic.

16. Queen Bees: women are less likely than men to develop lower status same-sex peers: High status males invest more than high status females in lower status same-sex collaborators.

17. Women may think other women are good managers, but don't want to work for them: An exploration of unspoken bias: women who work for women.

18. In the workplace, women often see highly qualified female candidates as "competitive threats" that might be preferred and lower qualified female candidates as "collective threats" that could reinforce negative stereotypes about women and do not support either as work group peers: Female tokens in high-prestige work groups: Catalysts or inhibitors of group diversification?

19. The majority of women said their relationship with their female in-law caused them long-term unhappiness and stress: In-law tensions hit women hardest.

20. In a study of "misogynistic" Tweets, roughly half were sent from women about other women: The Use of Misogynistic Terms on Twitter.

♦

Feature image: Breaking up of the Blue Stocking Club by Carl H. Pforzheimer (1815)

Gonzalo Lira: Men’s Advocate & Journalist, Coach Red Pill Dead At 55

January 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Strong and Independent: A Brief Guide

January 15, 2024 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

So, you've decided to be strong and independent. I am happy for you, because becoming a strong, independent, self-actualized individual is the most positive thing we can do for ourselves and for others. Sadly, I find there is much conflicting information on how one demonstrates strength and independence. So, I've written up some suggestions. Also, feel free to suggest anything in the comments you feel are missing.

It is: Demonstrating civil behavior towards your fellow men and women, unless they show disrespect for your rights, in which case you should act in reasonable self-defense.

It is not: Treating a person with disrespect or malevolent intent.

It is: Taking ownership of your decisions, both good and bad.

It is not: Blaming your mistakes and poor decisions on another person or group of people.

It is: Perceiving fellow men and women as individuals.

It is not: Projecting fantasies, assumptions, or malevolent intent onto a person because of their race, gender, social class, or sexual orientation.

It is: In cases where social assistance is desired, this should be on the basis of real need.

It is not: Expecting handouts when you do not need them and/or because you insist you belong to an oppressed class.

It is: Engaging in relationships keeping your needs in mind, as well as your partner's needs in mind. Demonstrate reciprocity to your partner, and expect the same out of him/her.

It is not: Expecting to be given resources and cared for because of your gender or the traditions of a bygone era.

It is: Desiring to make one's way in the world through one's work ethic, skills, and attributes.

It is not: Demanding an express lane to success based on your gender and manufactured social grievances.

It is: Desiring to achieve success in physical or intellectual pursuits through skill, effort, and healthy competition.

It is not: Expecting other people to let you win because of the shape of your genitals or the traditions of a bygone era.

It is: Showing loyalty to partners, friends, and allies who have stood by you.

It is not: Engaging in relationships with "what can I get out of this person" at the forefront of your mind.

It is: Making a reasonable effort to solve your problems through your own efforts or through mutually-beneficial arrangements.

It is not: Insisting that the problems you face are the responsibility of others to fix for you.

There is no doubt that being strong and independent is a tough row to hoe. I can point to numerous instances of my adult life when I've failed to live up to these standards. But the rewards of pursuing it are great. We develop character through overcoming challenges, owning our decisions, and holding ourselves to a code of conduct.

I believe in you.

Pavement wars

January 18, 2024 | by Merlin | Link | Original Link

What I'm seeing on the pavements of our towns and cities is disturbing and cannot be ignored anymore. I am speaking of belligerent foot traffic on our pavements.

This phenomenon is somewhat concerning in its nature because it tells me, it tells us all, that basic manners and courtesy are being eroded and replaced with a total disregard for anyone else. This disregard is quite unsettling if it's to be considered a glimpse of what we are to look forwards to in the future.

This article will be looking at this phenomenon and is divided into sections for closer analysis. It reflects what I and others have experienced firsthand on our pavements.

The Shield Wall:

Identified by:

A group of women or girls occupying the full width of the pavement striding towards you.

Analysis:

The Shield Wall's occupants tend to be sublimated to the lowest animalistic denominator of a small crowd. More times than not the average blood alcohol reading of its occupants is inversely proportionate to their manners and good temper.

Rules of engagement:

Negotiating this one can be a tricky affair and mental alertness is of benefit. The primary option is to assess the pathway on the opposite side of the road and if clear one is to cross to that side for ease of passage.

If this is not possible, then the secondary option is to be employed; the formation of ramming stance and then employment of ramming speed centered at the weakest link of The Shield Wall. This maneuver is known as 'The Pavement Spear' or TPS."

A personal testament:

Brendon of London says, "I find the Shield Wall move to be particularly lacking in any thought or appreciation for other peoples movement and personal space. On one occasion as I walked along the pavement I could see a group of rowdy, semi drunken women out on the town. I could see the potential of this situation getting ugly so I chose to cross the road for clear advancement. Well…you would not believe what happened next as I couldn't believe it myself."

"Two from the group of women despite their drunken state noticed my avoidance tactics and breaking from their group deliberately crossed the road blocking my path once again. Walking arm in arm they headed straight for me. They proceeded to stay on course knowing full well that their chosen formation of "The Shield Wall" gave me very little room at all to avoid colliding with them."

"This belligerence fuelled my decision to adopt "The Pavement Spear". As I closed in on the women at ramming speed they continued indecently giving me no room to pass.

Consequently, TPS was duly executed breaking their linked arms. This was met with much muttering followed by drunken cackles. Incredibly, I'd gone out of my way in the first place to avoid such an altercation?"

Brendon went on to say, "If it wasn't for TPS I'd be done like a nuked dinner. I definitely recommend it's usage where required."

The Chariot Formation:

Identified by:

Two or three women with baby strollers walking side by side occupying the full width of the pavement striding towards you.

Analysis:

"The Chariot Formation" is the most disregarding and aggressive formation pitted against the unwitting pedestrian. The women indulging in The Chariot Formation are oblivious to anyone's need for passing space. These creatures are to be seen on our streets more and more, and The Chariot Formation is particularly despicable because it shows absolutely no thought for anyone else other than for those within its formation.

Rules of engagement:

There is but one option when encountering The Chariot Formation and that is to employ "The Castle Wall." TCW is a primarily defensive posture whereby the opponent is to hold tightly with muscular rigidity in order to mitigate against oncoming vehicular collision, i.e. The possibility of chariot burns on the ankles.

A personal testament:

Adrian of Manchester says, "The drivers of The Chariot Formation show no common sense or decency in any of the situations I've personally witnessed or been involved with. This one is tricky to negotiate without confrontation. Bearing in mind the majority of cases I've been involved in usually end up as an exchange of expletives because I haven't been prepared to walk into the road for their royal convenience. TCW has saved me on more occasions I can recall."

He went on to say "On one occasion I was returning home on foot when I noticed two women in the distance grouped in the Chariot Formation. The pavement was particularly narrow so I decided to make my position known early on by walking close to the wall. I'm done with the chivalrous road side.

He continued, "[a]s I approached the women I observed they had noticed me but they carried on relentlessly. It was obvious that they had no intention of making space, and this was when I decided to employ the stance of TCW with my coming to a complete halt – standing my ground. I had no intention of swerving onto the road for anyone and quite frankly, leaving a little passing room is just basic manners. Well, seeing that I wasn't going anywhere soon they just stopped right in front of me, didn't they?"

"There we were, the three of us standing eye to eye upon which I simply asked them,

“Where would you like me to go…would you like me to levitate perhaps?”

Remarkably, she was quite embarrassed by my question and proceeded to flush a delicate shade of ruby and made a vague apology. This was a rare occasion because most of the time I have been met by very hostile language and total a disregard for anyone else other than themselves.

The Flank Attack:

Identified by:

When a woman either pushing a chariot or simply walking alone, crosses to your side of the street when her side is perfectly clear.

Analysis:

The Flank Attack is not as common as the Chariot Formation, but is by its sheer bad manners one for which to always be vigilantly scoured. Wearing an iPod or other device that impairs the detection of scuffling feet to the side is to be avoided at all costs, and angular adjusted mirrors affixed to tailored eye-wear should be considered for the auditory challenged.

Rules of engagement:

When faced with the Flank Attack there is but one card to play. Assuming collision is imminent, no adjusted posture will mitigate against impending damage and the “Tarmac Turbo” is to be employed. The T.T. is best administered after ingestion of caffeine for the necessitation of the innocent party to speed up immensely in a short burst to avoid collision.

A personal testament:

Nathan, from Land’s End, Cornwall says, ”The flank attack really pisses me off in a big way. I have trouble comprehending what’s going through their minds with this one. There I am minding my own business and enjoying the crisp autumn air and relishing the fact that I don’t have to do a slalom course on an empty pavement in front of me, when all of a sudden out of nowhere someone is heading straight for the space directly in front of me. If I don’t check my walking pace there’s going to be a collision of some sort.

Nathan went on to say, “What is it with these women or girls that do this? It has me lost for words every time. I’ve looked across at the other side of the street to see them on the pavement with nobody in their path, yet they decide to cross the road in order to “head me off at the pass,” you might say.

I nearly lose it when I’m minding my own business and some brainless halfwit makes a grab at the space right in front of me nearly knocking me over. The space behind me isn’t good enough for her, oh no, she has to be the leader as such.

He concluded, “I’ve actually experienced a woman with her chariot administer the T.T. maneuver against me in order to secure the spot directly ahead of me. What’s with this bullshit? I’m starting to think that modern women and girls aren’t the shy, retiring and delicate wall flowers the media and legislators would have us believe.”

One On One combat:

Identified by:

An oncoming party directly in front of you adjusts their course of perambulation with the sole intention of inducing a collision or eventful encounter. Changing your intended course to avoid an impending collision elicits an immediate response of the oncoming party whereby their line of travel is aligned once again with yours.

Analysis:

Stepping onto the road, levitating, or ducking into an alley or open doorway of a shop is not to be considered as this will deliver a message of accommodation to the belligerent party. Accommodation of this order will foster future encounters of a similar nature with the belligerent party and their associates.

Rules of engagement:

The "Pedestrian Ruse Of Distraction," or PROD, is best administered. The PROD is best described as the innocent party feigning interest in something to one side whilst maintaining current momentum and direction of travel. This has a two pronged effect. Primarily it delivers the message that the innocent party has missed the cue to step aside and secondly that the innocent party does not give a rat's crap if a collision does indeed occur. When The PROD is delivered the belligerent party will immediately self-instigate a behavior change by correcting their course in order to produce an uneventful encounter.

A personal testament:

Hamish from Fife in Scotland says, "Now this one is frustrating and amusing at the same time. When I notice a woman in the distance heading towards me I chose a position on the pavement so as to avoid collision. She forces me to dance the 'pavement tango' with her."

He went on to explain, "The oncoming woman adjusts her course for a collision with me no matter what I do. I go one way and like a reflection in a mirror she does the same. It's a mystery why this happens, and it begs the question: What's going through her grey cells at that moment?" It almost seems that the simple law of physics doesn't register with her and this bizarre perambulating tango must ensue."

"To this end", Hamish continued, "I always use the PROD method. It works every time and I make damned sure I feign interest in something on the other side of the street leaving Tango Woman with the job of ensuring a collision is avoided. Sometimes it's been a last second swerve on her behalf, but they always get the message that you're not compromising your position on the pavement. I use the PROD to let them know that they have to watch where the fuck they are going and like all of us is better to stick to a path that doesn't involve a head-on.

So what are we to make of this, and what does it mean for the rest of us? Well I can't say for sure, but I'll bet you our parents saw only some of this and their parents none at all. Younger generations have seen a decline in "Time Served" traditional values, replaced with unorthodox practices that are used to reprogram the very foundation on which we once existed in harmony without corruptive government intervention.

Like a gathering cloud of Affinitas Toxicus that’s arrived in on a quiet breeze, I’m putting to you that feminism along with all its calculated hoopla and it’s aerobics has our once lovely women adulated and preened as princesses on a socially manufactured pedestal, a pedestal that’s long overdue for demolition.

Clinician Zander Keig has lived as both a man and a woman. Guess who had the privilege?

January 19, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

We don’t usually like to put videos/podcasts in the highest featured position on the site. This one is worth it.

Male minimalism: a real economic threat

January 20, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The impact of men disengaging is being noticed.

Confronted by Evidence

January 21, 2024 | by Steve Carter | Link | Original Link

Once, I nearly got lynched in a sociology class.

We were discussing domestic violence (because that is, ultimately, the point of most sociology classes run by women in general and feminists in particular). After much throwing around of angry bromides and accusations against men for the wretched crime of their existence, someone invoked the "no excuse for domestic violence" cliché, which was then echoed and repeated by nearly all present.

I was a youth mentor between 1989 and 2014, and was familiar both with the statistics and culture of domestic violence in the US. So I threw in the fact that, according to official reports from the Dept of Health & Human Services, women in general and mothers in particular were responsible for about 2/3 of violent child abuse.

Naturally, "it's not the same thing!" They began to venture all kinds of reasons why we needed to "understand what was happening first" before "rushing to judgment" on female abusers. They began to rationalize, and after a couple of them I began to write them on the whiteboard:

- the child was being disobedient and needed discipline
- the definition of "abuse" is too broad and easily misinterpreted
- sometimes kids are just egging you on
- you don't know, you weren't there!
- kids lie because they know CPS will act on unfounded claims …and so forth.

Then I pointed out that ALL OF THOSE could just as easily be used to justify a man slapping a woman around:

- the woman was being disobedient and needed discipline
- the definition of "abuse" is too broad and easily misinterpreted
- sometimes a woman is just egging him on
- you don't know, you weren't there!
- women lie because they know police and social agencies will act on unfounded claims

…and so forth.

The women got REALLY quiet… then exploded like Vesuvius. There was talk of having me kicked out of the class, and I was labeled all manner of horrible things. But I stood my ground, since the facts were on my side and–unlike Duke or U of VA–could be readily produced and objectively assessed.

Happily nothing came of it other than a lot of ugly looks and various snide comments about my undisguised "misogyny" (which is Feminist for "he who wants to protect children, even from women"). But what an excellent demonstration of Michael Crichton's statement about a role-reversal scenario being a powerful instrument for determining where our rules and ethics REALLY lie.

The premise behind their objection to man/woman violence was that it's unfair for a big person to hit a small person. This is true. But the premise falls apart under simple observation: there is nothing more out-of-control than a person who knows that her actions will not reap any real consequences. In this, women own a two-way advantage. A woman accusing a man of abuse will be assisted without concern to the man's side of the story, as demonstrated in microcosm by the episode in the Sociology class. But a woman accused of abusing a child will be allowed to defend herself–often in the judgment of other women of similar background and sympathetic leaning–before any corrective or disciplinary action comes around. Further, she will enjoy (and I do not use that word lightly) the assistance and defense of other parties who lean forward to her defense without solicitation. And this is partly what informs the 2/3 majority in violent child abuse: a woman knows she will be the sympathetic party, and acts accordingly.

And this–I must add here–is merely what they DO report. There's a glut of violence committed by women that's either ignored, denied, excused, rationalized, or blame-shifted by women or sympathetic male social workers, teachers, and others in positions of authority. And woe to the man who reports it as violence, for he shall be cast out for "misogyny" by those protecting the woman.

Sexual selection theory has weaknesses relative to field reports

January 22, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Like current law governing reproductive rights, the traditional theory of sexual selection emphasizes female choice. A leading biological anthropologist has explained, “it is the female who is ultimate arbiter of when she mates and how often and with whom.”[1] According to that understanding, the female directs a male to copulate with her whenever she desires, and he obeys. Another anthropologist has explained:

> Men must compete for sex but what is there for women to compete for? Not for copulations – any male would be more than happy to oblige her [2]

This theory reduces men to brainless, indiscriminate vagina-seeking penises. Scholars have criticized this traditional theory of sexual selection as undervaluing female sexuality.[3]

Much less authoritative field studies of human sexuality indicate very different sexual behavior. According to these studies, men prefer young, beautiful women with long hair and who like men. According to these studies, most men have absolutely no interest in copulating with old, ugly women who hate men, even if those women have socially impressive job titles and long lists of scholarly publications. According to these studies, men also are generally averse to copulating with obese women. These studies tend to be dismissed as superficial or hateful. But much the same could be said of the above highly credentialed scholarship on traditional sexual selection. Sexual selection theorists should adopt more inclusive thinking and consider uncredentialed field reports in relation to their theories.

Scholars of sexual selection have lamented lack of appreciation for female sexual aggressiveness and female sexual promiscuity. An anthropologist has observed:

> Females have been observed soliciting copulations in virtually every primate species that has been studied, and in the majority of species, females initiate the majority of copulations. [4]

Another anthropologist lamented:

> In retrospect one really does wonder why it was nearly 1980 before promiscuity among females attracted more than cursory theoretical attention. [5]

Could that be because gynocentrism creates belief that women exist on a higher moral plane than men do? On the other hand, in gynocentric society, everything, including failure to discuss sufficiently the prevalence of those the uneducated call sluts, is the fault of socially constructed belief in patriarchy.

All aspects of female sexuality surely are worthy of attention. A highly respected scholar noted:

> In her piece entitled "Bride Wore White, Groom Hopes for Parole," journalist Donatella Lorch (1996) describes women from a wide range of professions – bankers, journalists, judges, teachers, for whom resources are obviously not the issue – who marry men whose freedom of mate choice is severely circumscribed by the fact that they are in prison. … This vignette of sex-reversed claustration makes a serious point about just how little we know about female choice in breeding systems where male interests are not paramount and patrilines are not making the rules. [6]

Once again, fieldwork-based applied studies are far in advance of narrow-minded academics. Persons seriously engaged in field studies have long recognized that chicks dig jerks. More conventional social-scientific experiments are starting to explore that long-established practical principle.

If the science of sexual selection is to advance beyond misandry and fashionable cultic nonsense, it must take seriously the amazing body of work that uncredentialed, applied researchers are producing.

Notes:

[1] Hrdy (1981) p. 18. This statement refers to male and female organisms in general, not just humans. Commodity markets for sperm (sperm banks) make sufficiently wealthy women the ultimate arbiter of when, how often, and with which sperm donor she is inseminated.

[2] Campbell (2002) p. 310.

[3] Small (1993) Ch. 4. The alleged disparagement of female sexuality in sexual selection theory contradicts the women-are-wonderful effect.

[4] Smuts (1987) p. 392. See also Small (1993) Ch. 5. In the European Dark Ages, persons were more enlightened about female sexual ardor and female promiscuity.

[5] Hrdy (1986) p. 127.

[6] Hrdy (1997) p. 32. Of course, male interests have never been paramount, and male rulers make rules to serve females. Thus in the thirteenth-century French popular romance, The Romance of the Rose, an old woman declares:

> I called all the others lovers, but it was he alone that I loved. Understand, he didn't value me at one pea, and in fact told me so. He was bad — I never saw worse — and he never ceased despising me. This scoundrel, who didn't love me at all, would call me a common whore. A woman has very poor judgment, and I was truly a woman. I never loved a man who loved me, but, do you know, if that scoundrel had laid open my shoulder or broken my head, I would have thanked him for it. He wouldn't have known how to beat me so much that I would not have had him throw himself upon me, for he knew very well how to make his peace, however much he had done against me. He would never have treated me so badly, beaten me or dragged me or wounded my face or bruised it black, that he would not have begged my favor before he moved from the place. He would never had said so many shameful things to me that he would not have counseled peace to me and then made me happy in bed, so that we had peace and concord again. Thus he had me caught in his snare, for this false, treacherous thief was a very hard rider in bed.

From c. ll. 14480-14520, trans Dahlberg (1995) p. 247. The figure of being caught in a snare is common in the historical literature of men's sexed protests.

[image] A young White-fronted Capuchin Monkey. Thanks to Whaldener Endo and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Campbell, Anne. 2002. A mind of her own: the evolutionary psychology of women. Oxford ; New York, Oxford University Press.

Dahlberg, Charles, trans. 1995. Guillaume de Lorris and Jean de Meun. The romance of the Rose. 3rd ed. Princeton, N.J.: Princeton University Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1981. The woman that never evolved. Cambridge, Mass., Harvard University Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1986. "Empathy, polyandry, and the myth of the coy female." Pp. 119-146 in Ruth Bleier, ed. Feminist approaches to science. New York: Pergamon Press.

Hrdy, Sarah Blaffer. 1997. "Raising Darwin's Consciousness: Female Sexuality and the Prehominid Origins of Patriarchy." Human Nature 8 (1): 1-49.

Small, Meredith F. 1993. Female choices: sexual behavior of female primates. Ithaca, Cornell University Press.

Smuts, Barbara B. 1987. “Sexual competition and mate choice.” Pp. 385-399 in Barbara B. Smuts, Dorothy L. Cheney, Robert M. Seyfarth and Richard W. Wrangham, eds. Primate societies. Chicago: University of Chicago Press.

*Article published under creative commons license.

Boy Beats Classic Game – What's Your Excuse?

January 24, 2024 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

In a glorious way to kick off the new year, 13-year old Willis Gibson from Oklahoma, also known as Blue Scuti online, beat the classic NES game Tetris. The moment where the game freezes indicating the end of the game and his beautiful reaction right afterwards is preserved on video.

If you're the sort of person that would respond that this is not in any way significant, consider that while the feat in itself as it happened took 38 minutes, Willis had practiced around 20 hours a week to hone his skills at the game for it to lead to this moment. I can already predict the response in turn: "Why is he wasting his life playing video games for hours per day?" To that, I say: why is voluntary dedication to get better at any given thing a waste of one's time? Games entail technical problems that have to be solved, often by physical demand as well as mental.

When a teenage boy through his own effort is able to do a feat previously only done by an AI for the very first time, this is something to be held in high regard. Yes, there will be those such as the hag from Sky News whose only response is to sneer "Go outside, get some fresh air, beating Tetris is not a life goal." But those sort of people exist merely to assume the high ground for being unable to see the positive implications of such an achievement, and for being unable to have done it themselves.

This article is not actually about Willis and his accomplishment, but it should be clear that this news is an inspiration for it. Whatever it may entail, the day to day activities of men and boys are scrutinized and judged by members of society. When it is not called a danger, it would be called a waste of time or unproductive depending on the activity. A favorite disparagement is "He's failing to launch." The laudability factor rises merely when it is perceived to benefit society, or otherwise "others". Men and boys are perceived to be valued only if they are being "useful", and they are so if they serve the very people who want to control them.

It should be obvious that people who achieve just because they want to really end up helping people in one way or another. But instead of defending these men and boys on that condition alone, let us make the defense of these men and boys with the argument they deserve: the defense of doing something just because they desire to. Because they enjoy it.

The idea of enjoyment for its own sake rubs busybodies the wrong way. If a man is not acting in service to others and their notions of culture, he is dismissed as a "pleasure-seeker," a harbinger of the downfall of Western Civilization. They forget that the very idea of not being pushed around by the likes of these busybodies is a very Western, or at the very least American, idea. The pursuits particular to the individual's interests are a testament to the relative prosperity the Western world has had. The act of excelling in them out of his own dedication and volition is a testament to that individual. In fact, this is not even unique to the Western world; wherever a semblance of prosperity is in play, there is that free-minded achiever.

In defiance of a gynocentric world that protests “that’s a waste of time!” and attempts to shame men and boys, the proper mindset should be to interpret these whines as “it doesn’t serve my/our interests”. You are listening to aspiring parasites hoping to derive one-sided benefit from achievers that do for themselves. He who dares do something that he has passion for is anathema to those that exist to control others.

Let’s tackle this from a completely different perspective. On social media, have you ever seen something along the lines of a “before” picture of an out of shape person and then an “after” picture showing his exemplary progress in becoming fit, if not completely ripped? This is usually accompanied by: “What’s your excuse?”

Assuming that the intent is meant to be an inspirational one, this is perfectly fine. Sometimes, depending on the intent of who circulates such a meme, it can end up being somewhat smug; “You’ve got nothing better to do with your life, why don’t you dedicate hours to get jacked?” I know, this may not be the fairest interpretation, but there is a point to this. Clearly I have nothing but respect for those who are able to dedicate their time to train to be strong…so long as they are doing it because they want to and not to merely impress women.

But let’s say we extend this line to other avenues that don’t involve fitness as such. As if we needed a reminder, men and boys have more to do and much more to offer than merely physical tasks and being society’s (read: women’s) beasts of burden. All activities take time and be it physical or intellectual, it should be regarded with admiration to achieve a given breakthrough in that particular field.

Note that intellectual means anything involving decisive mind work – from games on the table like chess and poker, to video games from Tetris to more modern competitive ones like League of Legends, to artwork, to delicate craftsmanship, to any sort of writing, to engineering, even generating good comedy.

The mind is underrated, sadly by many who claim to extol men’s virtues. Funny how in our sphere of advocating for men, we speak disproportionately about men’s physical exploits and their “instinct” to put themselves at risk. Frankly, instinct is the argument from mindlessness. Let us dispense with the argument from mindlessness when advocating for men – we only shoot ourselves in the foot this way. Also, moral value responses (often mistaken for instinct) are mind matters, not heart matters.

There is something to be said about those who accomplish something for the first time, especially when it is suspected that the task is not possible. It doesn’t even need to have been done the first time; it just has to be an interesting challenge. As stated, it takes a lot of time and effort to be in a position to work at it, and finally do it. So when something like beating Tetris is done, it is apt to say, “He did it. What’s your excuse?”

A musician practices for hours a day to be as skilled as they are at performing and put on shows. What’s your excuse?

Artists spend anywhere from hours to months finishing a brilliant painting. What’s your excuse?

A climber made it to the summit of Mount Everest. What's your excuse?

Someone spent years amassing a model train collection with the most realistic model railway setup. What's your excuse?

Someone beat Super Mario 64 blindfolded in less than 12 hours. What's your excuse?

Skateboarding, while not quite bodybuilding, is a tremendous thing to see in action by the most practiced skateboarders or even moderately practiced skateboarders. You know the drill.

And I could go on.

You, who spout from your armchair about how kids are wasting their time: why aren't you doing as good, huh? What have you been doing with your life, eh?

These clearly aren't even close to the estimate of many different and diverse challenges in the world. Whether it takes somebody far away from home or it is something that can only be done in the privacy of his own space, the act of throwing oneself into a process is the same. Note that for each thing to devote oneself to, it's that less time to devote to other matters. That is a given. For example, if a man busy composing music or a work of fiction is devoting a great amount of his free time to it, he may not have time to devote becoming a muscleman. And, vice versa.

This is not a disparagement of either, but rather the case to legitimize vastly different pursuits. In other words, it'd be unfair or shortsighted to point at someone and judge them for not dedicating precious time for "approved manly interests" when they barely have time to squeeze in their own passions after what may be a busy work day. And don't assume they don't have family they may be placing priority on as well. Of course, everybody has to tend to the responsibilities they have and the ability to maintain themselves, or to learn to if they are a child.

I am clearly not saying that certain things should become a sort of obsession that takes over their day to day lives. In simpler terms, everyone is still accountable for their lives. Balance is key, of course. But I will say that this problem is rather overstated and hyped to death by pundits and grifters eager to point to a particular boogeyman such as video games to appeal to their busybody audience looking for a cheap thrill.

Funnily enough, nobody attacks people who do nothing much but read books all day. Imagine if "book addiction" swapped out video games in someone's out-of-their-ass dialogue about how it's a problem because it makes you "asocial". And nowadays, gaming appears to be more conducive to a social experience than reading, does it not?

In closing, Willis Gibson can be very proud of his achievement and it is no minor one. So many people have things they do and have done to be proud of. We should do more to give support to the men and boys who do the things that make life worth living for themselves.

The Goal Post Episode 30 – The Crazy Years

January 25, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Psychology of Guilting

January 27, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Accusations of wrongdoing, and the saddling of males with a sense of guilt and shame, is used as a means to increase male labor and productivity – a result that works extremely well to the benefit of women, companies, and the State.

That formula can be stated simply as – Aggression, Guilt, Repair.

It refers to a psychological process that happens when someone commits a slightly destructive or aggressive act, and they notice the damage they have caused, or otherwise are made to notice the damage by others. This triggers a guilt reaction for feeling that one has damaged people they may care about and, after feeling guilty, they will typically move to repair the damage with benevolent gestures.

It doesn't matter whether the claims of destructiveness are accurate, somewhat trumped up, or completely fabricated; it has the same effect of generating concern in the minds of the accused, who will react with various attempts to fix the problem and smooth it over.

This formula is laid out by pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott[1] who described the process already at work in earliest childhood, in infants who already show a concern over the results of their own destructiveness. Thus, when an infant bites his mother's nipple, or screams and kicks, the mother typically gets frustrated, verbally upset and proceeds to walk away from the infant. At that moment the baby descends into what is described as a guilt state (becoming listless, crying, fearful), then when mother returns the baby goes all out trying to repair the damage – reaching out to hug mother, smiling, offering mother a rattle, etc. This is the process of aggression – guilt – repair,[2] and it's a cycle repeated thousands of times during everyone's infancy.

It goes without saying that the repair effort is absolutely vital to any infant who is dependent on his mother for existence, and therefore we all carry that primal fear of loss when momma walks out of the room…… will she return? As a social and pair-bonding species the concern is real, and it probably goes a long way to explaining the popular cliché "If momma aint happy, aint nobody happy!" This sentiment is likely a hangover from childhood experience, one that can be exploited in adult relationships via acts of coldness; in the proverbial "silent treatment" or other forms of threat to a stable bond.

Winnicott contends that the aggression–guilt–repair cycle underlies all productivity in the wider social space; ie. that people wish to contribute into society to atone for supposed past destructiveness, no matter how insignificant, or to contribute as an atonement for future destructiveness that has not yet happened (and may never happen!). People want to feel good with the world, thus by contributing to people and the society around them they store up capital in their reparative bank accounts – often in the form of labor and sharing of finances, or otherwise via the currency of thoughtful gestures, deference, verbal compliments and the like.

When we consider that the reparative gestures more often take the form of labor – especially men's labor – we could perhaps equally render Winnicott's formula as Aggression – Guilt – Labor, and lose nothing of its meaning.

Here we note that the phrase 'emotional labor' takes on a whole new, and very male sense.

On a more tangible level I've talked with a lot of men who admitted that when they feel they've done something bad, no matter how minor, or that they've done something destructive in the eyes of their wife or partner, they go all-out trying to repair the damage. They may give her a bunch of flowers, or they might labor around the yard or paint the interior of the house or some other manual task, and via these constant reparative gestures they tend to provide far more labor than would normally be the case. This unfortunately can become a sick game between couples; if a man (or woman) can be made to feel bad enough, and frequently enough, they become pathologically productive.

To that end, many men feel that their wives have become daughters of B. F. Skinner, regularly hearing the nagging din of "You've been very insensitive to me recently, and you haven't even painted the house yet!" or "You never show me any love gestures!"

The myth of Greek hero Heracles is paradigmatic of this cycle, showing the same pattern described by Winnicott in an endless loop; Heracles commits destructive deeds, feels guilt, and then attempts to repair the damage through hard labors. His desire to repair things often comes via contributing to society, by helpful assertions of strength to rid the world of monsters and lawless creatures, or performing useful engineering feats, while at the same time vigorously denying any weakness that would slow him down. As Philip Slater observes;

> The Heraclean myths also include the self-abasing strategy. This is inferred, not from his appearance as a buffoon in Attic drama, but from his role as a servant of the gods and a slave to women. He consistently performs "dirty work" for others, killing pests, cleaning the Augeian stables, herding cattle, reaping grain, and so on. Indeed, his entire life is one of suffering, servitude, and degradation, relieved only by his achievements and final apotheosis. From the slave of the cowardly Eurystheus he becomes the slave of Omphale, and is constantly being cheated of his wages (e.g., by Eurystheus, Augeias, Eurytus, and Laomedon).[3] (p.375)

Heracles, along with every man who labors compulsively, is motivated to repair what he unconsciously feels are the results of his own destructiveness — even his potential destructiveness that may never manifest in real behavior. The mere potential of destructiveness is enough to set the compulsive work cycle in motion, especially if under the watchful direction of a scold.

Might this provide the esoteric rationale for why all men are labelled toxic?

We can only imagine what the world would look like if men were not operating under pressure of guilt; it would probably look more like a series of relaxed traditional villages instead of the outlandish marvels of civilization we see today. When it comes to measuring national productivity, the benchmark GDP could perhaps be partly interpreted as men's Guilty Domestic Product.[4]

Misandry as a fomenter of productivity

Misandry is not a simple scapegoating reflex, although that is a part of it. Misandric blaming is also an assist for increasing the power and enrichment of the State, of corporations, and of course women, because it increases men's productivity.

That payoff is why misandry has remained normalized, but it doesn't have to remain that way for conscious men.

Some of the phrases directed at men are proof of the desire to increase men's labor; phrasings like "You need to man up!" which often means a man needs to work harder. Men are called deadbeats (not producing enough money), 'man-babies' (for not wanting to overdo things nor put their health at risk), or Peter Pans (too busy enjoying life instead of working), or they may be characterized sarcastically as a 'failure to launch' (for younger men failing to rush headlong into a career and a job by which he can contribute his labor to society).

Or, in the recent past, what about the negative disparaging of a man as "gay" (whether he was or not), which implied such a man was failing to indenture himself in service to women and family with some kind of productive contribution (gay men were busying themselves doing non-gynocentric things). We've even heard that some men assaulted homosexual men, on rare occasions, as if they were a reminder of their own beaten up, freedom-yearning soul. As ugly as this is, it provides an example of men's internalized misandry that attempts to 'put a man in his place,' by violence if necessary.

In conclusion we can say that misandry is not only a vehicle for cathartic blame, but is more geared to 'keep men in their place' – and that place is to be a guilt-driven provider. Women in the long-ago past were similarly subjected to these 'in your place' roles, but those days for women are long gone in most developed nations.

It is now men's turn to break the cycle and say no to imputed guilt, or at least refuse to make genuine guilt available for others to exploit. If you fail to protect yourself in this regard, you are on a fast track to slavery and, in all likelihood, are already there.

References:

[1]. Donald Winnicott, The Development Of A Capacity For Concern (1963), Chapter 6 in The Maturational Process And The Facilitating Environment, International universities Press, (1965)

[2]. Donald Winnicott, Aggression, Guilt and Reparation (1960), Chapter 16 in Deprivation And Delinquency, Tavistock Publications, (1984)

[3]. Philip Slater, The Glory Of Hera: Greek Mythology and The Greek Family, Beacon Press, (1968)

[4]. Note: for those who are inclined to take comments literally, rest assured this comment about traditional villages (and GDP) is intended hyperbole.

For a longer study on the psychology of guilt, from which this article is a quote, see Heracles: A Slave To Guilt And Shame

International Conference on Men’s Issues 2024 – Budapest, August 10-11.

January 28, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

A reminder that ICMI 2024 will be held in Budapest, Hungary on 10-11 August 2024. This is a little over 10 years after the first ICMI was held in Detroit. Paul Elam, Janice Fiamengo and Mike Buchanan are among the speakers.

Tickets can be purchased on the ICMI 2024 website.

Industries for the destruction of men

January 29, 2024 | by Michael Sharron | Link | Original Link

If you are a father in the United States who has experienced divorce, then you know that the family courts want nothing to do with you except for you to participate in the system which helps make lawyers rich, submit to being a marginalized parent, and paying child support via the government so that women and children have access to government help once the mother disposes of you.

What you may not realize is that all U.S. state governments have become dependent on court-ordered alienated fathers who pay greater child support which, in turn, triggers Federal Title IV-D money that states then use to replenish money for welfare and other programs. But, this can only happen once paternity is established.

With this in mind, it may seem apparent to you that the biggest opposition to this industry is father's rights and shared parenting groups who are demanding increased time with their children and supporting them directly instead of via the government program of child support enforcement.

If you put your money on father's rights groups, I want to introduce another flourishing industry that has crept up in the past two decades that is in direct conflict with child support enforcement and their need to establish paternity of children and bringing fathers under Federal enforcement. In fact, this industry desperately opposes the establishment of paternity of the roughly 46% of children in the United States being born to a mother that is single or married to someone other than the child's biological father.

Introducing the adoption industry

In just about every U.S. state, there are laws that govern who is deemed to be the likely biological father when the mother of a child is unmarried. Furthermore, laws are setup in each state that say that these putative fathers have absolutely zero rights to their children unless they establish paternity, or have paternity decided via the courts. While the establishment of paternity is good news for child support enforcement, it is devastating to the adoption industry which wants an adoption to happen without there being a legal father who could oppose the adoption. And trust me, U.S. states are going to great lengths to make sure this happens, much to the dismay of the Federal program of child support enforcement that keeps women- and children-centered programs running. Let's take a look at Oklahoma's law on putative fathers:

> "A birth mother is under no obligation to inform the putative father of her pregnancy. In fact, if a birth mother creates an adoption plan during her pregnancy, she is not required to serve the Notice of Plan for Adoption on the putative father. If a putative father is served a Notice of Plan for Adoption, he must follow one of the options outlined in the notice. If he fails to act upon the Notice of Plan for Adoption, his failure to act will be seen by a court as a denial of > interest in asserting parental rights and will be sufficient grounds to terminate those parental rights.”

Furthermore, Oklahoma law states that…

> “Oklahoma law places the burden upon the putative father to learn if a pregnancy resulted from a relationship with the birth mother.“

In short, what Oklahoma is saying is that mothers can legally conceal pregnancy and adoption plans from a father, but puts the burden on the father to somehow discover this and stop it within 90 days.

If the father is unable to stop the adoption, the adoption industry, their lawyers, and their lobby groups win. But child support enforcement loses because that is one less purposefully marginalized father paying child support.

Either way, what is important for men and fathers (along with women in their families) to remember is that there are industries everywhere forming to capitalize on the destruction of men and fathers.

Equally important to remember, is that you are helping to fund these industries via your decision to get married and participate in creating motherhood. When are we going to stop arguing with feminist and feminist-controlled industries and finally launch a fatal shot into their battleships by going our own way?

If you are tired of being disempowered by feminist governance, then stop getting married. This will end alimony and the loss of property. It will also lessen your chances of having a false allegation of domestic violence brought against you.

If you are tired of being disempowered by feminist governance, then stop creating children. This will cripple child support enforcement and state governments’ ability to order your marginalization via social services. This will also end the adoption industry. Also, no more babies means no more children going to universities where academic feminists are waiting to turn them against you.

Gentlemen, you have WAY more power than you realize.

Mass Hysteria, Madness and Feminism

January 30, 2024 | by Jan Deichmohle | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: The following book excerpt is a translation from the German by the author. The following website provides an overview of his books: https://www.quellwerk.com

History of Mass Hysteria

An early occurrence of a new form of irrationality was surfacing in the age of ‚enlightenment', when a mob was yelling (rather unenlightened) "Hang to the lanterns, who has a handkerchief!", and "Hang to the lanterns, who hasn't got horny skin!".[i] The people who had soft skin, faced the danger to get lynched.[ii] On the picture above, women lead an armed march of revolutionaries.

Symbol of the French Revolution was an allegorical Marianne, portrayed swinging the tricolour during street fighting. When women and children, the whole family are involved in ideologies, this results in radicalisation. What had been rather a peripheral matter and aberration before, was transformed into a principle, the foundation of a systematically spread hysteria, and was spread along with ideological world views, closed in itself.

Suffragettes attacking the House of Commons

The first wave transformed hysteria into a principle of life, and to assume as a privileged group to be disadvantaged, to flock together as an angry sisterhood, whose attitude towards life was militant full of hatred and fighting, hysterical screaming because of completely imaginary disadvantages, and to fight against human nature and culture. Such screeching hysteria staged itself by a new political aesthetics they invented, which was later on taken over by fascism and is today regarded as typically fascist. That has been proven in my book “Critique of Feminist Ideology”. This ideology is not only linked to stubborn ideological militance, but also to victimhood. In self-referred navel view, they lamented about invented troubles and imaginary disadvantages. They believed, the world would be unjust to them. Today, when they get criticised, they redraw insulted to ‘safe rooms’.

I want the vote! (~1900-1913, while most men didn't have it either)
In this cartoon of the first wave 1900-1913 we can already recognize snow flakes of today.

Political hysteria of feminists was mentioned ~ 1910 in a debate of the British parliament as a characteristic attribute and danger, should society give in to feminist demands. The speech was quoted and analysed in my book on the first wave.

All of the predictions in that speech have been fulfilled. Additionally, later waves caused destructions much worse than the worst expectations of the speaker. Quotes and pictures of the book about the first wave show by historical sources, that this hysteria was not only linked to imaginary disadvantages and victimhood, but also to misandry.

Suffragists on the War Path. “Jump on him, he is only a mere man.”

After the First World War, feminism and its methods were accredited and integrated into society, after their demands were fulfilled. As a result, we had a disrooted generation of youth in the 1920s, disrooted and having trouble in matters of sexuality and sex roles; boyish women (flappers and vamps) and effeminate men were part of the phenomenon as well as massive difficulties of both sexes: confused women and men, whose money had been squeezed out by wives or ex-wives, boys, which girls didn’t accept as good enough any more. This has been proven using historical sources of the time in my book Critique of feminist ideology”.

Angry screaming became a method of the political fringes: On the streets, supporters of the red front an Stalin were parading, later on supporters of the brown front and Hitler. Young women were screaming excited, or even fainted: After each outburst of feminist irrationality follows a phase of confusion or disarray: Women try to regain lost triggers of female instincts, on which the love towards men and society are based. As human nature is damaged, and time-tested culture lost, this is done in a distorted – and dangerous – way. That may result in hysterical admiration of a Stalin or Hitler, or screeching and fainting at the concert of a boy group, or throwing teddies to welcome demographical intruders, applauding and welcoming demographical conquerors replacing native men, who get degraded to incels or losers. Those native men had before been fought by screaming hate-filled feminists.

Like feminists, both communists and fascists perceived themselves to be persecuted, while in reality it was the other way round: They were persecuting those of different believes. Thus their perception was contrary to reality. Fascists believed in a ‘Zionist world conspiracy’, communists in a ‘capitalist’ and ‘imperialist’ ‘enemy of their class’, blaming them for every screw, which wouldn’t fit. Feminists blamed subjective feelings and dissatisfaction with an invented ‘patriarchal structure’, as absurd a conspiration theory as the fascist version. They were never able to give any proof for the existence of such a structure. To the contrary, it can be proven that the course of their discontent were bad decisions of the feminists themselves, and the results of previous feminist waves.

> Many members of the BDM treated Hitler like a modern group of girls might a pop star; his visits to BDM groups were generally accompanied with screaming, swooning and fainting.»[iii] (babiafi.co.uk)

above: Beatlemania, below: Hitlermania

One only has to see old newsreels of women fainting, crying, screaming with adulation at the feet of Hitler»[iv] (dailymail.co.uk)

Association of German girls, The Hitler Youth, screaming

Irrationality generally broke out in world war and mass murder; after the ideology creating such actions was gutted, the causes remained: The breakdown of natural structures, of a cultural complement of both sexes and their relationships, through which feelings can develop and mature naturally. Feminism, in the delusion of knowing everything better and improving the world with an ideology, which is at war with human nature, and interpreting nature the wrong way round, made sure that the damage done by previous waves could never heal, but instead additionally new damage was done.

Therefore the problems persisted. Not only women were dissatisfied. Young people, especially boys, struggled to find a place in society. Women lacked something that could no longer develop naturally and culturally, after feminism damaged natural culture, eventually destroying it. There was therefore a lack of young men who seemed worthy of female admiration. Men were lacking, what could give them such feminine feelings. In particular, there was a lack of maturation which could give rise to mature, civilized love. Instead, dangerous animal instincts ran wild. Today, alpha males get preferred to betas and incels.

Beatlemania, mostly female fans screaming

In 1964 they screeched longing for rock musicians. In 1968, when the second wave broke out, they screamed aggressively, hateful protesting against ‘white heterosexual manliness’ and an imaginary ‘patriarchy’, a perversion of the longing for impressive males a few years back. Today they choose illegally admitted immigrants from Islamist or other problematic countries, because they unconsciously want victorious conquerors (like Hitler, Stalin, Duce, Mao, Che …). That’s a political perversion, too, resulting from the collapse of cultural bonds and structures.

Such animal instincts are very volatile and tip over quickly. A few years after girls screamed to adore young men, and some fainted because young men of high standing had already disappeared from normal society, the screeching discontent of daughters of the feminist era was already turning back into the hatred of men, with which trouble once had started.

> «I was a target for abuse. Anywhere I spoke there was a contingent of screaming, heckling feminists waiting for me. … Abusive telephone calls to my home, death threats and bomb scares, became a way of living for me and for my family.»[v] (Erin Pizzey)

When it comes to feminism, media has been biased since the first feminist wave. Voices critical of feminism where either ignored, or reports were defamatory. As documented in my books, as early as 1913 Ernest Bax described the bias of media and the feminist pressure on media, not to publish voices opposing feminism. One reason for this biased negative attitude is the sentiment of women influenced by feminism. They didn't want to tolerate free speech, which was a habit in previously male groups, as they existed in traditional cultures. Men talked among themselves without ‚political correctness'. However, when ladies were present, men tactfully avoided topics ladies could dislike. When women mingled into once male groups, they expected the same refraining from disliked topics or opinions. As a result, men had no place left where to talk unrestricted.

Our media didn't report about such matters. They were biased since the first feminist wave, even more so since 1968. When it came to emotic issues like the critique of feminism or emancipation, press wasn't free and either didn't report on it at all, or with a strong feminist bias. Even though there are enough historical sources and contemporary witnesses, it's not easy to find pictures of screaming feminists. Most reports are favouring them. When Erin Pizzey, who started women's shelters and soon realized, that men would need such shelters as much as women, was touring England to promote her book "Prone to Violence", she was threatened by hateful screeching feminists and needed police protection. Many had similar experiences.

They got naked in front of passers-by and then screamed angrily en masse [vi] (daily-mail.co.uk)

This continues until today's third wave. A pathological trait has been added: To smear themselves red like blood; in at least one demonstration, participants also scratched themselves with razor blades to stain with their own blood.

Blood-smeared or red-painted feminists screeching

> A group of women plays the attackers, wrestles down her colleagues for minutes, who are shouting slogans. Wheeze, screech, roar. "Always in sync," Inna tells the activists. [vii] (Bild)

The hysterical perversion also continues to admit and adore more aggressive intruders instead of their own men who are ravaged. Because of the cultural destruction caused by earlier feminist waves, strong men from a cultivated cultural elite are missing. That is why, as a substitute, the most inadequate and harmful ones are hailed and screamed at in admiration. The same happened for Hitler, Duce, Stalin, Mao, Che Guevara. A comparatively harmless variant was the Beatlemania, when girls overran police barriers or rushed into a hotel to get closer to the Beatles or the Rolling Stones. Today, suicidal for all of us, they welcome a millionfold surplus of men immigrating from zones of war, crises and the world's most problematic areas. Famous murderers on death row also receive baskets of female fan mail or even get married behind bars, or waiting for execution. Similar anti-social blenders get their attention. Such negative selection spoils our gene pool with harmful traits chosen for procreation.

Screaming feminists

> In 2015 I was stunned to see a particularly large number of women screaming at the 'refugees' like at an Elvis concert. For my part, I see my assumption confirmed – they sniffed pheromones and are on a testosterone trip. There are also more and more mixed couples… hooray… until one cries….
>
> They are trained to bite off competition, to step on rape victims again – because the stupid pig has only indicated it because of xenophobia. They don't come up with the idea of who is really the most primitive – like when you're on a panting hormone trip yourself. Everything is reduced to your own pleasure, there is no space for anything else.
>
> And you can immediately recognize them by the fact that they are incapable of a rational conversation and instead yell everyone down with hysterical stone age noise – here there is pure emotion … and nothing else.»[viii] (Alexandra Bader)

The inadequate and fanatic welcome corresponds to the same hysterical feminist perversion as hating their own 'white heterosexual' men. The same holds for their anger at an imaginary 'disadvantage' of actually privileged women. Only by prescribing their utopic ideology as a result to be achieved, they construct female 'disadvantage' where there is privilege and always has been. Again, same perversion in their self-pity towards imaginary sufferings, while excluding local men from empathy and ignoring their real problems.

At the same time they fight their own local men with revolutionary attitude, screaming hate. These men share their culture, are mostly adequate and educated to local standards, yet they get broken and oppressed by feminist agenda. Such perversion has been a driving force of all feminist waves. This perversion resulted in feminist distortion of science, utopical ideology contradicting human nature. Instincts ran wild. There's no grain of truth in the nonsense they produced.

Feminists attack Argentinian cathedral. Aggressive feminist women, ready to use violence
Since the first wave, hysteria is a driving force of political ideologies and consecutive feminist waves. Following generations have a vague feeling, that something is missing, without any clear indication, what is missing. So they are susceptible for political or religious ideologies and new feminist waves. They hate, what they need. They destroy, what could help them: the culture they and previous waves have destroyed. Their fanaticism made them attack human universals.

Angrily screaming feminists presenting a giant vagina sculpture

Political hysteria, misandry and the described perversion of sexuality are driving forces of a new form of irrationality. The first feminist wave brought it up and made it acceptable in society. Such political hysteria and irrationality have been adapted by many extremist groups since, along with the methods. As feminist emancipation disrooted many, they became susceptible.

The first feminist wave had invented a self-presentation, which was later on adopted by fascists and is today known as “aesthetics of fascism”. Already the first wave was intolerant to opposing opinions. The second wave was screaming hatefully, burning bras and spreading hatred against opponents and different views. The first wave was known for militancy and terrorist attacks on men and artworks. They sliced pictures; the Taliban blew up Buddhas. During the second wave, female terrorism resurfaced as phenomenon; this time, however, in left wing groups such as the RAF in Germany. Most however were quickly established in media, politics, at universities and in society.

Already 1968, professor Goldberg from the University of New York could hardly publish his study about a human universal – differences of both sexes and their roles found all over the world in different societies. Since the 1970s, it was next to impossible to publish a deep-rooted non-feminist argument. Erin Pizzey told in an interview, that she knew many smart men, who could never publish their non-feminist book. In the very rare cases it was published, they would get threatened, as she herself. Even Esther Vilar, whose book was published 1971, had difficulties finding a publisher. All German publishers except one had already rejected her book, she told, when the last publisher finally accepted. Yet she was attacked and threatened by feminists and was forced to exile.

Today, hysterical screaming in fear of CO2 works the same way it did during feminist waves. An inversion to enthusiastic reverence for leaders is displayed by extremist movements, may they be right wing, left wing or religious. Screeching tips over from anger, hate and protest to sexual desire or to leader cult, and the other way round.

Beatles fans cheered and screamed. Women long for admirable famous men, whether at a pop concert or in a dictatorship.

Third wave demonstrators may dress in pussy hats.

Welcome to Germany

Even though the last picture was not examined, whether it's photoshopped, the components are real and stem from the same movement. As such, it describes reality. Today, even the difference between good satire and reality has become fluid.

Madness and Feminism

Biographies of many leading feminists contain (often hidden) evidence of mental illnesses, that not only shaped the lives of activists introducing new ideas, but also first appeared during a feminist wave.

> Medical researchers have long puzzled over schizophrenia's late emergence (it was first diagnosed in 1911, in Switzerland) and its prevalence in the industrial world, where the illness is degenerative and permanent. (In "primitive" societies, when it exists at all, it is typically a passing malady.) In 2005, when Jean-Paul Selten and Elizabeth Cantor-Graae, experts on the epidemiology of schizophrenia, reviewed various risk factors—foremost among them migration, racism, and urban upbringing—they found that the factors all involved chronic isolation and loneliness, a condition that they called "social defeat." (New Yorker Magazine)

At that time, at the height of the first feminist wave, the last remnants of Western culture complementing of the sexes began to crumble, and with it the bond between the sexes on the one hand, and the sexual-social identity. It's not surprising, when new mental illnesses emerge at the same time, which also play a role in the lives of leading feminists. This combination of psychosis with the feminist movement spreads these problems. This is paradoxic and tragical: Feminists are unconsciously missing something, feel an unexplainable suffering, then irrationally blame and accuse a ‘patriarchy’, used as a conspiracy theory. In reality, the culture they attack would have been key to overcome their suffering, giving them, what was already missing. Their suffering was created by themselves, their feminist agenda and previous feminist movements. In spite of it they use this suffering as a driving force to pursue their work of further destruction, and to instigate an angry cultural revolution against the last cultural remains. Thus they create the suffering from which they claim to save. Their psychosis is the result of the breakdown of natural and cultural relationships, which, if intact, would prevent isolation, loneliness and loss of identity.

> «The second-wave feminists had hoped to alleviate this isolation through the refuge of sisterhood.«[ix] (New Yorker)

Several leading feminist founders were in psychiatric treatment, in a mental hospital.

> «It’s unclear when the first symptoms of schizophrenia surfaced … Neighbours were complaining that Firestone was screaming in the night and that she had left the taps running until the floorboards gave way. Laya flew to New York and found Shulamith emaciated and panhandling, carrying a bag holding a hammer and an unopened can of food. In the roman à clef, Firestone wrote that she had not eaten for a month—fearing that her food had been poisoned—and “looked like something out of Dostoevsky (which actually helped her beggar’s earnings).” The next day, Laya took the action for which, she said, “Shulie never forgave me,” and brought her to the Payne Whitney Clinic for evaluation. Her condition was diagnosed as paranoid schizophrenia, and she was involuntarily transferred to a residential facility in White Plains.»[x] (a.a.O.)

Beside Firestone also Kate Millet was affected. A lot of psychotic traits were described by her family, who suffered from her characteristics such as: “brutal sadist” and “violent bully”.

> «In the 1970’s I was alarmed to hear that my big sister, Kate Millett, who had serious mental health issues which had agonized my family and her friends for many years, was organizing a group called The Mental Patients’ Project in order to claim that the psychiatric community and society were “oppressing” people and “stigmatizing them with labels such as psychotic, bi-polar, schizophrenic, borderline personalities,” etc and unconstitutionally imprisoning them in hospitals thereby violating their civil rights. We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate’s issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. She was a brutal sadist, a violent bully at whose hands everyone about her suffered.»[xi] (Frontpage Mag)

As if in derision, all facts were turned upside down in psychiatric treatment, too: It was not the “brutally sadist” and “violent bully” that was the perpetrator, no, she considered herself to be the ‘innocent victim’ of a ‘repressive psychiatry’ that wrongly assumed all kinds of illnesses, just as she felt victim of a ‘patriarchy’, which she probably ascribed to be the ‘sadist’ and ‘bully’ she in fact was herself. By the way, the psychiatric agenda was harmful, too. Articles tell that many who needed treatment ended broken on the streets instead; some of them committed crimes as murder. Her rebellion against psychiatry cost lives, too. Just as many male suicides where the result of feminism.

The same trick she used in psychiatry and as a feminist, whether she blamed the psychiatric system, or men, society and the alleged ‘patriarchy’. It’s astonishing, that scientists, psychiatrists and the elite of her time either didn’t see or didn’t explain these absurdities, to stop a mass psychosis from spreading, which is at the core of feminism.

Jill Johnston, whose book “Lesbian Nation” is considered a breakthrough in lesbian feminism, also suffered from schizophrenia.

> «Hospitalized twice for schizophrenia, Johnston»[xii] (encyclopedia)

A list of important feminists having psychic disorders, stemming from feminists themselves, begins during the first wave at the end of the 19th century. It would be interesting to know, if non-feminist voices did observe more such cases.

> «The Politics of Women’s Madness Narratives is a study of autobiographical writing by women who were diagnosed with psychiatric conditions. The book explores the psychiatric pathologizing of women and the ways in which women have used autobiographical writing to rebel against forced treatment and incarceration. It also outlines the history of psychiatric treatment in the United States and examines the connection between larger social movements and reforms in the care of women mental patients. Among the American women whose narratives are discussed in the book are Elizabeth Packard, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, Mary Jane Ward, Joanne Greenberg, Jill Johnston, Kate Millett, and Susanna Kaysen.»[xiii]

A Who’s who of early feminism would resemble the list above. Already Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797), a precursor of feminism, had some sexual disorientation, according to modern feminist sources, who claim to continue her cause in modern unscientific gender subjects.

This should be a concern and field of research for scientists. As they fell silent in these matters, I’m compiling information so that it won’t get lost.

Contemporaries used to observe a lot of absurdities, contradictions and harmful consequences of the feminist wave they experienced. Usually they assume, previous waves would have been justified, whereas the then current wave would have lost reason and entered the realm of absurdity. The reason is, that people tend to consider as normal what they experienced during their childhood and adolescence. Thus, they accepted previous waves, without reflecting, that they had rightly appeared just as absurd and harmful to their ancestors. No progress can be made, before they realize, that they are not the first generation exposed to it, and that previous generation were justified to be as sceptical as they get today.

> «Last fall, as I interviewed New York's founding radical feminists, the stories of "social defeat" mounted: painful solitude, poverty, infirmity, mental illness, and even homelessness. In a 1998 essay, "The Feminist Time Forgot," Kate Millett lamented the lengthening list of her sisters who had "disappeared to struggle alone in makeshift oblivion or vanished into asylums and have yet to return to tell the tale," or who fell into "despairs that could only end in death." She noted the suicides of Ellen Frankfort, the author of "Vaginal Politics," and Elizabeth Fisher, the founder of Aphra, the first feminist literary journal.»[xiv] (New Yorker)

Except those two central founding leaders of feminism, many other activists of their avantgarde group were affected, as Kate Millet herself claimed, and other activists confirmed.

> «She was diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia and pleaded guilty to "reckless assault with intent to harm" ...
>
> While Warhol was on the phone, Solanas fired at him three times. Her first two shots missed, but the third went through both lungs, his spleen, stomach, liver, and oesophagus. She then shot art critic Mario Amaya in the hip. She tried to shoot Fred Hughes, Warhol's manager, in the head, but her gun jammed.»[xv] (Wikipedia)

Valerie Solanas was suffering of paranoid schizophrenia.[xvi] Ti-Grace Atkinson described self-destructive forces, too.

> «In a 1970 address, titled "Divisiveness and Self-Destruction in the Women's Movement: A Letter of Resignation," which was delivered to the Congress to Unite Women, in New York City, she warned that women's "rage, masquerading as a pseudo-egalitarian radicalism under the 'pro-woman' banner," was turning into "frighteningly vicious anti-intellectual fascism of the left." After hearing about the speech, several women, including Freeman, met and vowed to fight the problem. "Instead, each of us slipped back into our own isolation," Freeman said. "The result was that most of the women at that meeting dropped out, as I had done. Two ended up in the hospital with nervous breakdowns." After Ti-Grace Atkinson resigned from the Feminists, a group she had founded in New York, she declared, "Sisterhood is powerful. It kills. Mostly sisters."»[xvii]

We should not overlook the fact, that Freeman also identified isolation as a major problem, experienced something similar to Ti-Grace Atkinson, and experienced the destructive power of the sectarian feminist replacement community. Incidentially, Erin Pizzey, who was the first to fight domestic violence, recognized the same high percentage of female perpetrators and violent tendencies of problem-laden women, which is why feminists were hostile towards her. They stole her idea and turned it into a one-sided war against men. Erin Pizzey, who became a deserving voice against feminism, had grown up in Asia with large families and more cultural structures; in an interview she described the unusual loneliness in the small family of the West and the twisted reaction of the feminists to this problem.

Such isolation is understandably a problem when time-tested human relationships and communities we're used to break down. Additionally, the relationships of the sexes were once linked by exchange, both providing different contributions. That also faded away.

The loss of these natural bonds and efforts for each other makes us lonely. We are mostly concerned with the family, which was once an extended family or clan full of life, connections, roles and lifestyles. That was increasingly reduced to the core family, which was eventually also destroyed by feminism. Socially, that process was an impoverishment. Obviously, this creates loneliness and isolation, plus confusion of identity – exactly what triggered feminism, caused the suffering, which caused feminists to rise up, unfortunately in the most harmful way possible: to break families and culture. Causes, damage and suffering were increased and imposed on the rest of society and the world.

So far this was based on common sense, understandable for reasonable people. This isn't sufficient, though. We have to dig a little deeper to see the whole truth, step back from our habits, from what seems normal in our epoch, what we learned in childhood and life. We have to heed what ethnologist learn, enabling to understand foreign cultures as well as past eras of our own: We have to be prepared to give up everything we are used to, to shed contemporary values and ideas. Only then we can recognize the extent of damage done by feminism.

Only by digital differences of sound, like labial / non-labial, dental / non dental and so on, phonemes can evolve, enabling words, meaning and language. Grammar rules are also required for language to exist. Now the same happens for cultural structure and division of labour, whose origin was the division of labour between both sexes. If both do something different, they complement each other, and exchange evolves. That has been explained in detail in my first book Culture and sex". Doing something for each other creates bonds. These are important for our development. Feminists chose to fight and destroy them as 'gender stereotypes'. Since then, the misunderstanding of both sexes grows. Not astonishingly, except for those who fell for feminist propaganda.

Both, the ability to learn language and to pick up the local culture are inborn. It's like a pre-coded learning program used by small children, who are not smart enough yet to learn language by rules as adults. Yet they outdo adults, learning much faster. They have an inborn ability and need to learn language at a very young age. The same holds for learning cultural sex roles and structure. This is obvious from the fact, that children pick up sex difference as early as language, or even earlier. The earlier it is, the deeper rooted it is in our biology.

Culture is a human universal, existing in all cultures of all times worldwide. The cultural structure is just as elementary as linguistic structure. Both are pronounced from early infancy onwards, is a specifically human ability. Conservatives only see the family, maybe a few more considerations of the tribe or nation, but nothing more. For this reason, it's not enough to defend only the family, eventually nation or tribe. Many believe, all would be fine, if only the family will be restored. That is a mistake. Culture is much more than just a few family ties and habits. Western culture has been impoverished for centuries. While the family initially remained stable, the structures complementing both sexes and creating bonds between both, fell apart. At the same time, massive misandry and one-sided glorification of women have grown over centuries (see Kucklick, "The immoral sex"). A misperception of women as 'oppressed' and 'suffering', and increasing privileges of women resulted.

As both culture and family were reduced to a minimal core, dissatisfaction and loneliness grew. That was the real reason for evolving irrationality, including feminist waves. Feminism worsens the problem which creates feminism in the first place. Thus it's part of a doom loop making things worse constantly.

> «genital differences between human beings would no longer matter culturally … children would be born to both sexes equally, or independently of. … either, however one chooses to look at it; the dependence of the child on the mother (and vice versa) would give way to a greatly shortened dependence on a small group of others in general … The tyranny of the biological family would be broken.»[xviii] (Shulamith Firestone, clinically insane, The Dialectic of Sex, 1970)

According to biologists, anthropologists or Émile Durkheim, one of the founders of sociology, which at the time was not yet fallen prey to ideology, all division of labour goes back to a division of labour between both sexes, that has become increasingly refined and expanded to include social subgroups. That is central to culture and enabled it. Culture was originally describing, how members cooperate and do things for each other, harmoniously combining the different characteristics and needs of both sexes, an exchange that connects and obliges.

Those who grew up before the second feminist wave and paid enough attention to such things might still have experienced the social respect and love that was expressed by sex differences. We lack such warmth; we have become a bit more lonely, superfluous, uprooted, are more easily lost than before in anonymous masses. That intimacy resulting from exchange and togetherness is no longer. It was the charm of ancient cultures. We are missing something that we have to constantly seek, without in most cases ever finding, because these structures no longer exist.

It was a weird, ideological misinterpretation, that women should have everything that men work on. Feminism bereaved men of their contribution to society, making them less needed. Feminists spitefully enjoyed making them tendentially superfluous. On top of it, they felt envy and greed and made girls and women do and obtain themselves, what men do to win the sexual selection exerted by women and men. The result was increasing pressure on men and a growing number of incels and losers. Additionally, forcing men to reward women with alimony when kicking them out, and refused custody became another business model.

It is logically a serious mistake to demand the gift of the other side for yourself in an exchange system, because there is nothing left to exchange afterwards. There can only be an exchange if both sides contribute something of their own that the other side does not have. That's the only way a cultural structure, complementing them in an exchange of contributions for each other can exist. I am doing this for you because you are doing that for me. Mature feelings and sympathy for each other arise from such an exchange of care and contributions. Such tender and compassionate feelings were logically lost when the exchange faded away. We became an isolated crowd of egocentrics.

> «Growing up in seriously dysfunctional families seems to be a common denominator with radical feminists. It seems that if they don't have "daddy issues," they've got "mommy issues," and the predictable attempt to blame all their "issues" on male oppression is often at odds with the available evidence. … Uwe and Sheila Kitzinger sound like a perfect parody of the type of progressives who are so open-minded they believe in everything simultaneously. That three of their daughters turned out to be radical lesbian feminists doesn't seem particularly surprising. … This was circa 1974. Celia was plagued by "feelings of extreme isolation [that] led to a suicide attempt and subsequent hospitalization": Three months in a mental hospital, … So, naturally, she became a professor of psychology. Celia Kitzinger considers therapy harmful for women because women's problems are not personal, in her view, but rather political. Everything must ultimately be blamed on the patriarchy, of course. It is impossible for any feminist to to say otherwise. They have spent so many decades blaming every misfortune on the all-purpose scapegoat of male supremacy that one imagines the radical feminist who stubs her toe screaming in pain: "Damn the patriarchy!"
> Feminism is not a political philosophy; it's an idée fixe, the obsession of deranged minds. Male supremacy is to feminists what windmills were to Don Quixote or what Jews were to Hitler. This has been true since the Women's Liberation movement began, even before anyone realized that Shulamith Firestone was clinically insane.»[xix]

The clinically insane firestone predicted the end of cultural bisexuality: A core problem that conservative forces overlook, because they confine themselves to defending family and morality. They don't realize other crucial losses like subconscious cultural structures. An ethnologist I quoted in my books wrote, that the central features of a culture are not noticed by consciousness.

Envy has been established by feminism as basic moral principle of society and as a 'natural right'. Whatever men worked hard to gain, often to be accepted by society and women, women demanded for themselves, leaving those men without means to earn the admiration, women would waste on the unworthy. This closed our consciousness, so that we could not realize the losses involved.

Today's sentiments are shaped by competition. The interests and needs of both sexes conflict, whereas in a culture they match and both gain by the contributions of the opposite sex. Now that they compete, they tend to watch jealously, afraid to get ‘disadvantaged’. Some angrily demand an exactly equal devision (while gladly taking much more than half or everything for women). They force the outcome they like, even though most women don’t even want it. The more feminist influenced a society, the stronger both sexes differ in their attitudes and job preferences. This contemporary strive is a logical continuation of the struggle against human nature that feminism has been since its earliest waves. There is another source beside feminism to that mistake, though. As Kucklick has shown in his book, misandrist stereotypes were already fundamental to western philosophy of the enlightenment era. In that respect, it was rather unenlightened.

Justifications of feminism that we learn in childhood, school, education, the media and at universities, are institutionalized propaganda, turning facts upside down. This holds for past waves as much as for current ones. Women were never disadvantaged. Instead, they were always preferred. Under natural conditions, it did not make any sense for them to support feminist goals. Culture was offering them more. Men were carrying much heavier burdens. Only when modern technology lessened male burdens, and cultural structures were fading away, feminist envy could spread.

Man was always more burdened with duties and demands. Among animals and humans, the female sex dominates biologically. Females are fertile, limit procreation and exert sexual selection. Because of this, female life was protected more than male. Females were easily allowed to procreate, whereas many men in history never rose high enough in earnings or rank to be considered worthy enough. This is another male burden. Classic male strengths were a necessary counterweight. It’s always harder to be a man that a woman. A woman just needs to be woman and fertile to get accepted and desired. That is a female dominance force. Men have to work much harder to get accepted by society and women, and many don’t even succeed, even if they work hard. Feminism was gross nonsense right from the start.

Their feeling of being ‘oppressed’ or ‘disadvantaged’ was irrational hysteria contradicting the facts of biology and life. Society should never have listened to such irrational hysteria. Even the first wave of feminism was militant, radical, destructive and characterized by contempt for men. To make ‘role models’ out of these yesterday’s militants, indeed to be ‘holy figures’, is falsification of history. Feminist victors have rewritten history to mislead generations to come. Previous feminism was as hysterical, destructive and insane as today. As long as this is not understood, things won’t get better and we remain vulnerable to radical ideologies.

> «Yesterday’s mental illness is today’s social policy.» (Kathy Shaidle, “Feminism’s Rotting Corpse”, 2012)

Others also describe feminist madness as the cause and drive to invent a conspiracy theory of ‘patriarchal power’, to attribute to it their pathological conditions and suffering, whose origin is within themselves. Feminist arguments follow the same line: All guilt was attributed to others; they were unable to recognize their own fault. This is a pivotal mechanism, not just a minor human weakness.

> «That is to say, while feminists believe that the patriarchy makes women crazy, the rest of us suspect that crazy women made the patriarchy — inventing this imaginary conspiracy of "male supremacy" as the phantom menace of their paranoid minds, a fantasy bogeyman, a rationalization of their own unhappiness and misfortunes.
>
> Here is where the meaning of the famous feminist dictum "the personal is political" exposes the real truth of their ideology. Rather than looking at feminism as a political movement to redress legitimate grievances shared generally by all women, we must understand feminism as a personal movement, concerned with the specific grievances … And most feminists are profoundly miserable.»[xx]

Other feminists also described their own suffering from mental disorders, such as Ms. Johnson, who like many of her quarrelsome sisters, was able to establish herself as a professor at universities.

> «In 2010, Professor Johnson published a book about her struggles with borderline personality disorder — "a serious mental illness," according to the National Institutes for Mental Health. In her book, Girl in Need of a Tourniquet: Memoir of a Borderline Personality, Professor Johnson describes herself as a "psycho girlfriend" with a history of dysfunctional relationships with both men and women. Her book describes "what amounts to a nervous breakdown as the result of an affair with a married lesbian colleague." Professor Johnson in 2010 described herself as a "newlywed lesbian" whose partner was apparently her former student»[xxi]

Kate Millet burdened others with her suffering, but vehemently refused to accept the necessary medical help. Instead, she preferred to work spreading her suffering around the world.

> «We, as a family, had struggled for years with Kate's issues, many times attempting to hospitalize her so she could obtain the serious help she so obviously needed. …
>
> She was babbling and shouting incoherently whilst I nodded and pretended every word made perfect sense. …
>
> She stayed awake for five days babbling, ranting and wouldn't allow me to sleep. She was seeing "little green men" and her eyes were literally rolling around in their sockets. Never have I been more alone and terrified.»[xxii]

The mental illness seems to have broken out in childhood or adolescence, as her family describes it so impressively. Later, in her feminist days, employees suffered.

> «At one point, in 1973, I found myself alone with her in an apartment in Berkeley, > California where she did not allow me to sleep for five days as she raged at the world and menaced me physically. … This movie (Three Lives) was the very first ever produced with not one iota of male presence. Even the people who delivered food to the set had to be female and Kate was touting it as the first all-woman film production in history.

>
> Having had my youth overshadowed by Kate's irrationality I warily traveled West and the moment I spotted her in the airport knew I "was in for it". As she barreled across the airport's expanse it was clear that she was in the throes of her illness and my heart throbbed with the desire to turn and run.
>
> During the speech after the screening she fell apart onstage before a packed assembly of fawning admirers.»[xxiii]

Threats, torture caused by deprivation of sleep – the founding feminist did worse to women than even feminist black propaganda has accused men of. It should not be overlooked that her lesbian lover committed suicide because of her 'homage book'. Insanity had wreaked havoc beyond all the damage feminism caused, many cruelties to men and children, destroyed lives and families. Even society was broken and culture destroyed. We lost tradition and experience gathered in centuries. Children grew up with damaged souls and uprooted as stray individuals. Under the pressure of Kate Millet's propaganda, helpless mentally ill people in the United States were released from care, ended up on the streets, where they either became easy prey and victims themselves, or committed crimes and murders. The peace of society was also damaged by making cities a less livable place. The mass migration welcomed by feminist states and Mrs. Merkel later had a similar effect.

> «Kate, herself, has written several books on this part of her life (Flying, The Loony-Bin Trip) chronicling the "oppressive" actions of our family, vilifying us for our deeply worried attempts to aid in her obvious sufferings. So I am telling no "tales out of school" as she herself has documented her own struggles with sanity although she consistently claimed, "mental illness is a myth". "Many healthy people", she said, "are driven to mental illness by society's disapproval of unconventional behavior and by the authoritarian institution of psychiatry." Really? Tell that to the families of the nineteen who suffered and died that Friday in Santa Barbara. … And, speaking of the affected innocent victims: later, she wrote a book about her lesbian lover at that time. Sita was the title. This woman committed suicide in response to Kate's "homage." …
>
> So when it came to my attention that as a result of these adventures she and a few cohorts had concocted a new "civil rights movement" for mental patients and in her characteristic ruthlessness was determined to 'liberate' NY's mental patients I was beyond appalled. God help anyone who gets in the way of Kate and her "righteous indignation" which had already spearheaded the militant Women's Liberation Movement. This was to be called, "The Psychiatric Survivors Movement."»[xxiv]

Kate's family describes their mental illness and the behavior they suffered from, but they justify themselves not to reveal any secrets, because Kate described everything herself, but had disparaged her. It can therefore be assumed that families of some other founding feminists – especially if they have not been slandered in an autobiographical book – refrained from going public with their knowledge. The number of unidentified psychological problems among leading feminists will therefore be higher.

Feminists themselves described their suffering, which they spread all over the world with the missionary zeal of the sufferer. They elevated the causes of their suffering to basic principles, laying them down in laws and constitutions and enforcing them with state constraints in all areas of life and society. Now we all suffer to some extent of the troubles they spread:

> «She could not read. She could not write. . . . She sometimes recognized on the faces of others joy and ambition and other emotions she could recall having had once, long ago. But her life was ruined, and she had no salvage plan.» (Self-description of Firestone in the third person, "Airless Spaces" (1998), "Emotional Paralysis")

A systematic search would find clear signs of psychosis in even more of the leading feminist voices. Camille Paglia, who herself came from the feminist spectrum, wrote:

> «The anti-porn crusader Andrea Dworkin (who died a decade ago) was a rabid fanatic, a self-destructive woman so consumed by her hatred of men that she tottered on the edge of psychosis.»[xxv] (Camille Paglia)

Media ignored this, courting destructive ideologists of feminist waves. Instead of describing the actual delusion of many feminist leaders, critics were wrongly blamed of an imaginary delusion, according to the motto: Anyone who is seriously against feminism cannot be healthy. Everything was turned the wrong way round.

The connection between feminism and disorders, which were then mostly called "hysteria", was common knowledge already at the end of the 19th century.

> «By the 1880s in England, it had become customary for the term "hysterical" to be linked with feminist protest in the newspapers and in the rhetoric of antisuffragists. As Lisa Tickner notes in her study of the British suffrage movement, "for half a century and more, feminism and hysteria were readily mapped on to each other as forms of irregularity, disorder, and excess, and the claim that the women's movement was made up of hysterical females was one of the principal means by which it was popularly discredited."»[xxvi] (Elaine Showalter, Hysterie, Feminismus und Gender)

After the triumph of feminism, this was forgotten and became invisible, as the loss of identity had become the new role model. Contemporaries can only notice what contradicts their habits and the remaining rest of unconsciously descending culture.

> «In England the New Woman as neurotic feminist intellectual had become a recognizable type by the 1890s» (ibid)

Today's feminists consider this absurd and get upset, when such a view is mentioned. Yet the 'snowflakes' and 'SJW' of today proof it right, as they are as known for psychotic and hysterical reactions ressembling those of the suffragettes at the end of the 19th century. They cannot stand if someone disagrees, someone like Trump or Orbán is elected president, or in Germany, when despite wild daily defamation of the opposition party, it is elected to parliament. In kinder'garten style they uphold political correctness, silencing different views.

Feminists of today are not 'crazier' or 'more intolerant' than previous ones – we have changed. We grew up in a society that has absorbed earlier feminist waves and therefore considers those past waves as normal, even though they were just as psychotic, irrational, self-centered, ideological and destructive as today's. But almost all people judge by what they are used to. They condemn what is different from their habits. That is why the truth often asserts itself very slowly; in the long run, however, the truth cannot be denied.

> «In France, the femme nouvelle was blamed for the declining birthrate; new divisions of labor seemed to threaten the stability of the family and the state.» (ibid)

History has proven this claim to be correct. The birthrate sank to a record low; we don't know, whether the north European type of people will still exist in a few generations.

For all feminist waves, a connection with loss of identity and exchange structures between men and women can be demonstrated. This loss was always painful. Healthy people suffered from increasing loneliness, loss of meaning, dissolving relationships, families and disappearing cultural forms. Sick people also suffered from it, but reacted in a pathological manner; they then attacked precisely those humanly universal forms that exist in all cultures, including matriarchies, across all epochs, which already had become too weak for us to be functional. They rebelled blindly and psychotically, shifted their inner suffering and inner conflicts into an activist struggle outside against an imaginary 'patriarchy' and against exactly those cultural bonds, fathers and role models, from whose absence they suffered. So they worsened the problem for the whole society. That way, they attempted to reduce their pressure of suffering by political action and acceptance by their supporters. It is not surprising that they could never be satisfied with what they had achieved, however great it was, because their driving forces were irrational, psychotic.

> «Hysterie, Feminismus und Gender – Elaine Showalter
>
> Hysteria has taken many strange turnings in its long career, but one of the most surprising is the modern marriage of hysteria and feminism, the fascination among feminist intellectuals, literary critics, and artists with what Mary Kelly calls "the continuing romance of hysteria. Feminist understanding of hysteria has > been influenced by work in semiotics and discourse theory, seeing hysteria as a specifically feminine protolanguage, communicating through the body messages that cannot be verbalized. For some writers, hysteria has been claimed as the first step on the road to feminism …

>
> As the French novelist and theorist Hé1ène Cixous melodramatically inquires, "What woman is not Dora?"» (ibid)

That rhetorical question also reveals the mass impact of feminist ways of thinking that shapes the lives of entire generations to come. Contrary to what is believed in feminist self-reflection, the marriage of psychoses and feminism is ancient, already proven for the first wave.

> «But as Mark Micale notes, "No line of evolution within the historiography of hysteria is more complicated than the feminist one." The feminist romance with hysteria began in the wake of the women's liberation movement of the late 1960s and the French événements of May 1968, when a young generation of feminist intellectuals, writers, and critics in Europe and the United States began to look to Freudian and Lacanian psychoanalysis for a theory of femininity, sexuality, and sexual difference.» (ibid)

The latter claim is false, as we have already seen. A strong connection with hysteria has already been demonstrated for feminism in the 1880s and 1890s. There was also a relationship with schizophrenia, which first appeared at the time. In literary terms, mental illness was already expressed in feminist works such as Gilman's "Yellow Wallpaper".

> «Thus Jane Gallop writes, "Freud links hysteria to bisexuality; the hysteric identifies with members of both sexes, cannot choose one sexual identity. … If feminism is the calling into question of constraining sexual identities, then the hysteric may be a protofeminist." Similarly, Claire Kahane defines "hysterical questions" as questions about bisexuality and sexual identity: "Am I a man? Am I a woman? How is sexual identity assumed? How represented?"» (ibid)

A remark made by feminists is, that feminism is to question sexual identities. That was true even before the first wave, for example with Mary Wollstonecraft (1759-1797).

Feminist consensus confirms my claim in this case; only the interpretation differs fundamentally: feminism denies the existence of two natural sexes. In particular, it denies any completement of the sexes, any exchange and any cultural language that results from forms of exchange or division of labour between men and women. This attitude is demonstrably wrong because it is in blatant contradiction to human nature. It is not just about the fact that there are clear differences of both sexes, especially in the psyche, reproduction and life strategies. Such statements are true, but trivial, commonplace, truism. Irrespective of physical or mental differences, social exchange, reciprocity, relationships and structures are just as vital as human language, which is also a kind of social structure based on innate ability and a basic need.

If this natural relationship between both sexes ceases to exist, their exchange and connection breaks down, so does the sexual and social identity, the human frame of reference of life, which triggers uncertainty, confusion and suffering. Feminism has also misinterpreted this, made a principle out of the cause of her suffering, and forced both on the rest of the world. It is not only children who need boundaries so that they do not lose themselves. The whole self-discovery rhetoric of feminist emancies since the 1970s was based on precisely this loss of their natural identity and the resulting uncertainty. Today entire peoples are abolished because of this feminist misunderstanding of boundaries, differences, identity and the connections between different identities.

There's evidence that not only hysteria is a strong and widespread driving force for all feminist waves. The same also applies to schizophrenia, which first appeared at the same time as the spread of the first wave. In earlier epochs, and in other cultures, schizophrenia seems to be unknown as a permanent disease. Its appearance at the same time as the first feminist wave, even among several leading representatives, does not look like a coincidence.

Eating disorders and self-harm have also increased significantly; in the former case it is argued that the increased female choice overwhelms girls and young women. Because all women are instinctively interested in the same 20 percent men, they create a secondary social choice of the 20 percent coveted men, who make up only a fraction of the women. As a result, not every woman can get one of the few coveted men. So women create massive pressure for themselves through sexual discrimination against men. Since women attract men through beauty and body, they no longer feel good and slim enough, they want to be 'starving'. This is not due to a 'patriarchy', as feminists assume, but on the contrary to feminism, which destroyed helpful cultural forms that not only alleviated the selection pressure on men, but also strengthened the complacency of young girls. Eating disorders are still rare in Asia's extended families.

> «But when he talks about what he terms "successful hysterics," people who in their adult lives seemed to outgrow their adolescent hysteria, or transformed what had been hysterical symptoms into social causes, Israel mentions only women, such as Mary Baker Eddy, the founder of Christian Science, and Bertha Pappenheim, or Anna O., who became a German feminist leader. He sees their dedication as an evolutionary form of feminine hysteria itself, an obsessive desire to become the maître rather than submit to him, an acting out of fantasies of devotion. Thus female activism becomes merely a constructive pathology, and feminism only a healthier form of hysteria. …
>
> The same metaphor is used by Olive Schreiner, herself an example of the New Woman who overcame hysterical disorders to lead an important career as a feminist and writer. Schreiner imagined that if sex and reproduction could be separated … For Schreiner, the hysteric is thus a member of the sexual avant-garde. …
>
> Women were just as irritated by isolation and enforced idleness as men.

> Mitchell's patients indeed included many of the leading feminist intellectuals, activists, and writers of the period, including Jane Addams, Winifred Howells, Charlotte Perkins Gilman, and Edith Wharton. »[xxvii] (ibid)

In a similar manner, Greta Thunberg has been preaching hysterical anxiety regarding CO2 to overcome her psychotic symptoms. Even her father admitted that her activism was part of a self-therapy. That way irrational agenda has been spread to the world, so that the activist could keep their mental illness in check. Thus, the world got more sick.

Schizophrenics and hysterics thus shaped the ideology of feminism, which is based on misinterpreting facts, considering preferred women as disadvantaged, whereas men, discriminated against by women over sexual selection, as 'dominant' and 'oppressors'. Quite regularly it is the other way around. No, men and women are not equally affected. Feminists don't get off that cheap. It has been proven that men are sexually discriminated against, many are excluded from reproduction, and are therefore suppressed in key questions of life. The opposite of feminism is true! The destroyed culture has to be rebuilt, more precisely: a stronger, more balanced culture with no preference for women, no discrimination against men, which cannot be easily eradicated by feminist hysterics.

> «She sees female hysteria as stemming from sex-role conflicts that emerged in the nineteenth century.» (ibid)

There could be a connection, but unfortunately, it was interpreted the wrong way round, as is their habit. Erin Pizzey has confirmed it for loneliness: The breakdown of extended families and cultural structures made people lonely; this loneliness was a powerful driving force behind second wave feminism. Just like isolation, the disintegration of the complementing of man and woman, took away identity, dissolved relationships and connections, and thus also feelings. Feminists claim they were 'oppressed', but as always, it's an exact reversal of the facts. Women were the dominant and privileged sex, discriminated against men as "filters for genes" with sexual selection, and taught game rules useful for women. Feminists complained of overwork, demanded less work, and then found out that 'society does not demand enough of them'. (Betty Friedan) While feminists complained loudly about female work demanding its reduction, they actually suffered from boredom and lack of purpose. Her ambition was discontent with easy life, which was in fact a privilege and had been demanded by their predecessors, or even themselves. "Whom God wants to punish, he fulfills his wishes."

"Women were just as irritated by isolation and enforced idleness as men." (ibid)

While they were upset about the presence of men or families, it was actually isolation at home that they suffered from. On the contrary, with unsightly regularity everything was turned into the opposite and made worse. Incidentally it shows, that although men were just as irritated, feminist women became hysterical and reacted with irrational ideology. With more justification, masculist men could have protested, especially since they are actually discriminated as "filters for genes" in evolution and life. But they didn't.

The roles were not oppressive or too narrow, but much weaker and softer than in other advanced cultures. They were not constrained, but confused, shaken in identity and self-confidence, because they already had to little female roles and tasks. In prehistoric times, almost all work was divided between men and women; thus there was an abundance of tasks. The roles had never been so little as in contemporary West, when technical aids and devices began to make housewives superfluous. It was their increasing redundancy that made them dissatisfied. A healthy reaction would have been a new, sensible and balanced redistribution; they rioted hysterically, destroyed humanly universal foundations.

> «In The Newly-Born Woman (1975), Cixous took the position that hysteria was the "nuclear example of women's power to protest," and that Dora belonged to the pantheon of feminist history» (a.a.O.)

In the quote from a feminist's hand, hysteria is seen as the core of female power; whether 'nuclear' contains an additional allusion is undecided.

> «This romanticization and appropriation of the hysteric nostalgically assumes that she is a heroine of the past. "Où sont-elles passées les hystériques de jadis," asked Jacques Lacan in 1977, "ces femmes merveilleuses, les Anna O., les Emmy von N.? . . . Qu'est-ce qui remplace aujourd'hui les symptômes hystériques d'autrefois?" We might answer that the despised hysterics of yesteryear have been replaced by the feminist radicals of today, by contemporary women artists and poets, and by gay activists.» (ibid)

Let us note the instinctless aberration of praising serious problems as 'wonderful', and the replacement of hysteria by radical activism observed in feminist writings itself – even in subsequent generations. The contemporary "artists and poets" mentioned will be presented later.

The book quoted is biased; neither hysteria nor feminism are seen in a negative way; even critical voices are often part of a feminist society and its world view. They are caught inside a cage of feminist ideas. It needs a philosophical approach as provided by my books to get out of this cage.

> «In the popular mind, the pejorative association of feminism with hysteria and morbidity has not died yet.In 1983, for example, a controversy erupted in the Times Literary Supplement over the use of "hysterical" as a critical term for the poetry of Sylvia Plath and other "man-hating" feminist poets. Defending her position, Anne Stevenson wrote, "Hysteria is the very stuff of revolutions" … Moreover, those revolutions connected to gender and race continue to seem more "hysterical" than others… What had been hysterical hooliganism in the suffrage campaigns was now attributed to other groups.» (ibid)

These sources also see the connection and similarity of hysterical waves with feminism from then and now, as well as with hatred of men. Hysteria is even called the raw material of revolutions. The cases of famous feminists with psychological problems presented here, whether hysteria, schizophrenia or others, are therefore not 'weird inventions' on my part, but a connection that is manifested both by today's feminists and their literature, and by historical evidence from the time of the first wave. Even if people had not yet reached our level of science at the time and therefore their reasoning often no longer convinces, we should take them seriously. They weren't stupider than we are; their society was less disturbed than ours. They often sensed intuitively when a fate appeared. But because gender culture is unconscious and protected by taboos, they were unable to rationally justify it by today's standards. While their attempts to justify something that has grown naturally may be outdated today, the culture they defend is timeless and as valid today as it was then.

> «May Ayim (… actually Sylvia Brigitte Gertrud Opitz) …
>
> In 1985 she was a founding member of the Black Germans and Blacks Initiative in Germany. She made contacts with representatives of the international black women's movement such as Audre Lorde. … May Ayim suffered from psychotic episodes since the early 90s, which is why she voluntarily went to closed psychiatric clinics several times. … she plunged from a high-rise to death on August 9, 1996.»[xxviii] (Wikipedia)

Rose S. Garston was under psychological care for 'PTSD', when she ignored medical advice to organize a collective hunt for all anti-feminist sites with the aim of getting them deleted. They celebrated every deletion in public. (Evidence in my book: Fulminantes Finale, Volume 1, page 170 ff.)

> «"The yellow wallpaper" is an autobiographical short story by the American writer and women's rights activist Charlotte Perkins Gilman, which was first published in New England Magazine in January 1892. The short story is considered an important work of early American feminism; it is about a young woman who is not cured by the treatment of her depression, but goes mad. In the course of the story, the increasingly confused and delusional observations that the protagonist makes about the pattern of yellow wallpaper in her hospital room become an image of her deteriorating mental state. …
>
> The short story shows strong parallels to the life of the author. … After the birth of her daughter Katherine, Gilman suffered from depression, although in retrospect it is not clear whether it was postpartum depression or another type of mental illness. Gilman's mental health did not improve, and after three years of illness, Gilman decided to seek medical treatment.»[xxix] (Wikipedia de, 2016)

It is typical of Gilman and later feminists, that they seek healing in activism; they try to heal themselves by imposing ideas and methods to the world, that are rooted in their illness. Later the world experiences similar problems and therefore appreciates, that the 'pioneer' expresses their feelings and problems, they wouldn't have without her. That's another paradoxon of feminism.

Silvia Plath is celebrated in a similar way:

> «This study examines mental illness in literature, with a focus on Charlotte Perkins Gilman's "The Yellow Wallpaper" and Sylvia Plath's The Bell Jar, the primary texts of the research, and develops similarities and personal connections between the authors and their mentally unstable main characters. The study investigates the biographical aspects and mental health of the deceased women … Both women committed suicide … Plath began to develop mental illness at a younger age.»[xxx] (unt.edu)

A strongly feminist article clearly states:

> «Voices of Feminism and Schizophrenia in Plath's Poetry
>
> Clarissa LEE Ai Ling
>
> … Whilst struggling with the ardent feminist within her … Many of Plath's later poems are related to her battle with mental illness, despair, sense of betrayal and suicidal thoughts.»[xxxi] (utoronto.ca)

As in the pre-feminist and the first wave, so in the second and third.

> «Enter Polly Dunning. She is a third generation feminist (her mother is the feminist commentator Jane Caro). In a column for the Sydney Morning Herald she writes of how conflicted she felt when she learned that she was carrying a boy child rather than a girl: …
>
> "There were dark moments in the middle of the night (when all those dark thoughts come), when I felt sick at the thought of something male growing inside me."»[xxxii] (ozconservative)

What neither psychopaths nor feminists understand: It is not the male being who grows in her as her son who is sick, but she herself is mentally ill, if she sees her own child as a disease in an attitude hostile to men. Feminism is the disturbance that projects itself into the world. Feminism destroys everything, from which healthy sympathy and love for men can grow and mature. Feminism replaces a culture, in which men and women act and feel for each other, by a hostile chaos of conflict.

> «Mark Richardson, 31 December 2016
>
> They have created a social movement, a political ideology and a mental illness all in one place!
>
> Funny you should note this. I was in a bookshop yesterday and saw a copy of Clementine Ford's book. I read about five pages of it and had to put it down – I couldn't take any more of it. It was like reading the innermost thoughts of someone trying to convince themselves that they were not mentally unwell. Every paragraph read much the same: "Men hate us, want to kill us and rape us, the whole system leaves us unable to function, on the verge of breakdown, but > when we complain about this we are told that we are being dramatic/paranoid, but we're not crazy, it's the world that makes us like this."

>
> Later that day I looked through some reviews and discovered that Clementine Ford has, in fact, battled with mental ill health.
>
> And yet these are the types of women published in leading newspapers as representatives of their sex.»[xxxiii] (ozconservative)

She has a background typical of leading feminists of the first and second wave.

> «Clementine Ford (born 1981) is an Australian feminist writer, broadcaster and public speaker. She has a regular column for Daily Life …
>
> Ford spent the remainder of her teenage years growing up in Adelaide, South Australia. As a teenager, Ford struggled with body image, body dysmorphia and an eating disorder. … She studied at the University of Adelaide, where she took a gender studies course; she describes this as a personal catalyst for her decision to become a women's rights activist.»[xxxiv] (Wikipedia, 2016, 2020)

Here we see what havoc gender studies do: They indoctrinate entire generations with the opposite of the truth, persuade the privileged group (women) to be disadvantaged, call for the complete destruction of human culture and nature, whereupon future generations grow up disrooted and harmed. The victims of their deception believe, that all their suffering is not due to feminism, the destruction of natural identity and culture, but to a 'patriarchy', which is such a mysterious conspiracy theory, that even leading feminists cannot explain what it should consist of.

Feminist psychopaths do not look for the cause in themselves, but project everything outwards, spread their suffering through feminist means in society as a whole, so that future generations, who lack natural identity and culture, are fraught with problems like those feminists, who had invented such ideology. They are proclaimers, prophets and missionaries of their own suffering, misfortune, their own disturbance. They make the whole world sick, because they don't want to face their own illness. This is how feminism of all waves and epochs worked.

> «Clementine Ford: How I quell the panic when anxiety threatens to take over
>
> By Clementine Ford, May 19, 2016
>
> About six weeks ago, after a period of relative peace and harmony, the anxiety that's plagued me on and off for more than 20 years returned to me in full force. With its reappearance, I experienced some dark moments; moments where I was frightened not only by the despair I was feeling but also by the ferocity with which I was feeling it. I found myself plagued by obsessive thoughts and terrified by my inability to get myself out of the cycle of them. Anxiety is oppressive, both physically and mentally and even the threat of it can be exhausting.

> But I have practice in dealing with this particular demon»[xxxv] (smh.com.au)

Incidentally, she involuntarily reveals why feminist founders really felt oppressed: the cause was in them themselves, neither in men nor in a 'patriarchy' based on conspiracy theory. In a typically feminist way, ideologically bored people see the cause of their disturbance everywhere, except not within themselves and their ideology.

> «Clementine Ford: 'There's something really toxic with the way men bond in Australia'»[xxxvi] (Guardian)

Feminism is a distortion of all facts to the contrary, just as sexually discriminated men become supposed oppressors, so their own suffering is projected into the outside world. Any culture that could help them, which is there to prevent such suffering, is destroyed. In other words, they destroy exactly what should and can prevent such suffering, which plunges entire generations and epochs into suffering similar to that which characterized them. All because they didn't want to be helped; instead, they broke the world. Such psychopaths and feminist ideology wiped out mutual love, a culture of two sexes complementing and helping each other. They destroyed female empathy for male losers, when those needed it most.

> «Why women's mental illness deserves more attention
>
> Clementine Ford, April 22, 2016
>
> I was 12 years old the first time I experienced significant struggles with anxiety.»[xxxvii] (dailylife)

The more appropriate headline would be: Why psychosis, projections and false assumptions by feminists deserve more attention.

Their suffering is rooted within them, more precisely in their confusion of identity, which prevents them from developing a trusting symbiosis with the male sex and sympathetic love for men in general. They project their psychotic disorder onto men and a supposed 'patriarchy', which is an irrational conspiracy theory. Their perception is wrong because they make the wrong assumption, that biologically and culturally privileged women would be 'oppressed' and that biologically and evolutionarily discriminated men would be dominant. Originally an evolutionary protection mechanism for children and mothers, innate biased perception is radicalized with a feminist perspective. Similarly, male losers get excluded from sympathy, because according to the evolutionary principle, that males serve as filter for good or bad genes, they shouldn't procreate, thus get no empathy. As a result, we instinctively mock male losers complaining. Widespread incel and MRA bashing is part of it. To be able to complain and get help is another privilege of children and women. This was exacerbated by feminism, too. So an innate preference for women in perception is militantly exaggerated, in the delusion of persecution, that they consider themselves disadvantaged or even haunted by an imaginary 'oppressive structural patriarchy'. Because of this ideology, the entire cultural complementary structure is destroyed, whereupon subsequent generations can no longer mature healthily, but grow into problems created and spread by feminism.

Many writers celebrated by the women's movement were marked and driven by such problems.

> «Virginia Wolf – much more than an insane feminist
>
> The writer Virginia Wolf often is placed into categories like 'insane' or 'feminist'. She was much more than that. Above all, she revolutionized writing …
>
> You can often see them pigeonholed, one is that of feminism, which led to an increased Virginia Woolf reading wave in the 1970s and 1980s. It is also not wrong to see her as a great feminist who she was, but it narrows her eyes. The famous essay "A Room of One's Own" is of course one of the milestones in feminist literature.
>
> … your commitment to sex-independent equal opportunities goes hand in hand with your artistic emancipation. In the pseudobiographical novel "Orlando", a humorous declaration of love to the friend, Vita Sackville-West, who was sometimes beloved – Virginia Woolf was attracted to women, the marriage to Leonard was more platonic in nature – the androgynous hero not only travels through several centuries, he / she also changes from one sex to another.»[xxxviii] (msn)

Such "revolutionizing of writing" spreads contentual, methodical and in life the suffering and problems from which it arose. Describing books as "rejected children" says a lot in an era when motherhood gets neglected, love for children and mother devalued, the peoples affected can't even reproduce themselves sufficiently.

> «Marlene Haushofer (1920-1970)
>
> "My books are all rejected children"
>
> "I never write about something else than own experiences. All of my protagonists are a part of me, a kind of split off personality." …
>
> The culmination of this rebellion was her novel 'The Wall' [title and content based on: 'The Yellow Wallpaper' by Gilman], which appeared in 1963 and most radically describes a woman's departure from the world. … It wasn't until twenty years later, after the 1983 edition of the book, that the author became an icon of the women's movement.» (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise)

The reference to an "insanely" strong depression, which makes her hopeless, is also clear.

> «For decades, Marlen Haushofer periodically keeps a diary, but only keeps these records for a certain time and burns them doubtfully: "Actually, I can only live if I write and write. since I am not writing at the moment I feel swamped u. disgusting. Will make children's book, better than nothing. See that the stories > are insanely depressed and hopeless, written in a reasonably good time.”» (Jutta Rosenkranz, line by line my paradise)

Her writing is self-therapy, just as feminist activism was invented as self-therapy. One can feel sorry for the children who get to read the children’s books created in this way, because they are lured early onto a wrong track that damages them. She shared such suffering subjectivity with the later upheaval of the women’s movement in the 1970s.

> «Such statements and the limited world that appears in Haushofer’s texts have seduced readers to dismiss her prose as typically subjectivist women’s literature … A way of reading Haushofer’s texts identifying them with the new women’s literature of the 1970s and their demands for radical subjectivity … falls short of her.» (Franziska Frei Gerlach, Scripture and Gender: Feminist Designs and Readings…)

Such radical subjectivity has torn apart the last remnants of cultural connections between the two sexes, and thus the basis of healthy relationships. Because only what women and men do specifically for each other and exchange, creates a reliable relationship, gives them identity, and lets feelings mature. Without such a connection, compassion breaks down into self-centered or women-related sentiments and demands, as the women’s movement has done. That is the psychological and emotional core of the matter.

Feminism emerged as the denial and destruction of all connecting forces and forms between the two sexes. The feeling of paralysis of those affected was due to the crumbling of cultural complementing of both sexes, which increasingly narrowed the cultural field of life and thus deprived the sexes of meaning. The lack of importance and attention as a woman, which they state to have experienced, was due to the already too low importance that femininity and masculinity now had in modern times, shaped by technology. As technology is sex-neutral, its effect on human behaviour enables to more easily conflict human universals of all times and cultures. As always, feminism interpreted everything in the wrong way, found the worst possible turn, not only aggravated the problems, but made them a principle.

> «In her diary, she describes this book, which was created for the first time without being interrupted by an illness, as “a study of madness and suicide”.» (Jutta Rosary, line by line my paradise, about Virginia Woolf)

Psychiatrists of that time before feminism overran and turned our consciousness, were astonishingly silent in the face of visibly psychotic features of the movement. Scientific studies can only be easily found in individual cases:

> «Images in Psychiatry, Virginia Woolf (1882–1941) …
>
> From the age of 13, Woolf had symptoms that today would be diagnosed as bipolar disorder; she experienced mood swings from severe depression to manic excitement and episodes of psychosis… she comitted suicide …
> At times Woolf railed against her illness, felt frustrated and impeded by it, and at > other times, she felt that it was essential to her.»[xxxix] (Katherine Dalsimer, Ph.D., AmJ Psychiatry 161:5, Mai 2004)

Thrusts of a mental illness shaped her feminist revolution of writing; sometimes she felt handicapped by her suffering, but otherwise she felt that it was “essential to her”. To put it plainly: Her ideas and methods would not have arisen without illness; psychotic relapses are the driving force.

Incidentally, this should not only be typical of the feminist scene, but also its environment. In the early 1970s, young dropouts in London told me that their lifestyle was not intentional; they were not able to live differently, so they could not cope with it. Feminist writing and struggling was apparently the only way of life to get their suffering under control. The rest of the world pays for it, because this is how the cause of their suffering spreads all over the world: fanatically they force others on the confusion of identity and roles, which is the reason for their unsatisfactory existence. Because there was already far too little that both sexes do for each other. That is why the housewife existence was devoid of meaning, and also the male existence, by the way – only that men mostly reacted less psychotically.

Feminists broke exactly what would be necessary to enable happiness and recovery. Instead, they let their illness break out openly, become political. They wanted to make the symptoms controllable through living out in ‘self-treatment’. So they were rooted in society. Most youth of later generations was turned to some degree into a suffering feminist, who fights the last remnants of natural gender relationships, in order to get his own suffering under control, while creating greater suffering for everyone. The same model applies to CO2-anxiety and other hysterias of today.

> «Sarah Kane died in London last weekend. Whereof? By suicide.
>
> … Sarah Kane gave information about herself in conversations. Then she talks about the depression she had when writing “Phaedra”, about her unconditional search for truth… “I do not necessarily consider depression to be unhealthy. For me, this expresses a completely realistic perception of the environment. (laughs) You probably have to dull your sensibility to a certain extent. Otherwise you are chronically healthy in a sick society. Antonin Artaud is one such example: either you go crazy and die, or you work and you are sick. Which is the real madness.”
>
> Her role model and mentor Edward Bond says there is something emblematic about her death.»[xl] (Tagesspiegel)

What such performers think is ‘truth’ is a distortion that arises from their suffering; in their artistic or political activism they describe preoccupation with herself, which is lived out bringing harm to society as a whole. Thereby they try to keep their own pressure under control and consider this as self-therapy.

The psychotic core of feminism arises from the destruction of something, that is just as much innate, a need and ability for people, as language: The complementing of the sexes, that creates a connection by culturally pronounced mutual gifts. Exchange creates a social language that provides identity, empathizes and matures responsibility. Technical modernity had reduced this to a barely functional minimum in the 1950s, which resulted in a feeling of suffering. However, the suffering from a lack of mutual contributions for each other, the lack of cultural forms, took a morbid outbreak: Instead of standing up for developing a fulfilling, satisfying human culture again, limiting destructive influences of the technical environment on life, instead of creating forms and models worth living in, they accomplished destruction. They spread the causes of their suffering and their misery in the world as an artist or activist, while at the same time getting themselves under control by acting out. So they completely shred the remains of natural culture, leaving a pile of rubble.

It doesn't matter whether Kane was a feminist or not, because she did the same destructive work as feminists of all waves.

> «Whether Kane wanted to be called a feminist or not, the subversion of gender roles is obvious in her plays.»[xli] (csuohio.edu)

After such deep damage, a return to the lost experience of compensation mechanisms that have matured over thousands of years has become almost impossible. What can save us is a reconstruction of the primeval sex division of labor to complement and exchange, so that a new culture is created, in which we do things for each other, not merely for ourselves only. Such a division of labor would be broader and stronger than European tradition. Feminism is like a boomerang. Actually, people try to head this way on their own: The stronger feminist influence has been, the more job preferences of men and women differ.

The chapter Madness and Feminism would not be complete without naming psychotic disorders that were invented and spread epidemically by feminism using methods similar to medieval heretic hunting.

> «The New Yorker, April 6, 1998, The Politics of Hysteria …
>
> Prior to 1973's best-selling book, "Sybil," about a woman who had 16 different personalities, M.P.D. had been one of the rarest of mental disorders, but afterwards, M.P.D. exploded. Between 1985 and 1995 there were almost 40,000 new cases – mostly women – and the disease acquired a valid standing in the field of psychoanalysis. M.P.D. patients are susceptable to therapists' suggestions because they are given strong medications and are highly hypnotizable. Both M.P.D. and recovered memory are in large part feminist movements: female "victims" confronting their abusers. In fact, the M.P.D. craze was probably a side effect of feminism; it provided working-class women with a strong support network. M.P.D. is part of a history of hysteria, which has always been regarded as a women's syndrome – a manifestation of women's inherent moral weakness. It can be traced back 4,000 years, but in the late 19th century it acquired a new importance, in part as a reaction to the new women's rights movement.. During the hysteria fad, M.P.D. began to receive attention, > as a subtype of hysteria. Soon, however, hysteria and M.P.D. died out . The return of M.P.D. began with the child-protection movement in the ’70s, hich was then joined by the feminists. Out of this collaboration came the recovered-memory (R.M.) movement, which persuaded hundreds of thousands of women that they were part of a worldwide collection of sex-abuse victims, and many of these women began suing their alleged abusers. The single most important cause of the epidemic was the culture wars of the ’80s and ’90s, which caused both liberals and conservatives to embrace M.P.D. and R.M. Those who questioned the validity of the movement were accused of protecting sex criminals. This zealous fervor made the movement vulnerable to the thing that would finally undo it: the satanic-ritual-abuse, or S.R.A., craze.»[xlii] (New Yorker)

It is noteworthy that the feminist hysteria of false ‘rediscovered’ memories, the invention of non-existent diseases based on suggestion, auto-suggestion and hysterical campaigns, which had an almost hypnotic mass effect, was supported by all forces of society, by leftists and conservatives. Nobody wanted to stand back or catch a bad reputation. All parties embraced a movement that persuaded people to suffer from an invented problem that they created in large numbers. The real victims of real hysteria have been neglected, feminism critics have been insulted or ignored for criticizing false allegations. The movement fueled by feminism was victorious, did not end by itself. It was only when it went one step too far, expanded its methodology to include an alleged ‘satanic ritual abuse’, other groups such as Christian fundamentalists took part, that there was resistance, were falseness and absurdity of the allegations and methodology detected. Inborn preference for women and feminist ideology prevailed and allowed no contradiction. Hysterical delusion is only seen through when other groups are involved that are not preferred by innate, evolutionary forces.

A similar effect we experienced, after feminists had promoted mass immigration in their fight against the ‘white heterosexual man’. Their allegations were just as baseless, irrational in the mud fights against local men, and were also based on suggestive persuasion of almost hypnotic effect. Here too, feminism critics have been ignored for decades and given malice. Only when women themselves were affected and women were no longer privileged, rather victimized by a different privileged group during mass immigration, did the absurdity of the method begin to attract attention. Again, we see the boomerang effect of feminism: They claimed to fight an imaginary ‘victimization’ of women, only to create a real one. They had shared their female privilege with masses of immigrants from incompatible backgrounds, effectively destroying their own privilege.

> «The S.R.A. epidemic was kicked off in 1980 by “Michelle Remembers,” a book which described the alleged childhood satanic-ritual-abuse of Michelle Smith, who “recovered” these memories with the help of her therapist, Lawrence Pazder. Soon after the book’s publication, the day-care scandals erupted, with children claiming that they had suffered atrocities of the same sort. Before long, adult > women were also reporting such memories. In 1983, the F.B.I. investigated more than 300 such claims and could not find corroboration for a single one. …

>
> Predictably, the moderates walked out, extremism swamped the field, and the movement started to fizzle. The False Memory Syndrome Foundation was founded to help families confront their accusers, and soon the media reversed its supportive stance and began to criticize the movements; and criticism within the profession was also mounting at a furious pace. But the most dramatic change took place in the courts, as the wave of R.M. suits (patients suing abusers) gave way to malpractice suits (patients suing therapists). M.P.D. supporters started backpedalling, changing the name of the disorder, and even backing away from the central treatments – hypnosis, abreactions, alter-probing. The number of reported M.P.D. cases has significantly declined since the mid-'90s. Ultimately, the cause M.P.D. most damaged was feminism» (New Yorker, ibid)

Inventing and spreading psychotic disorders is itself pathological and deserves the name hysteria. For decades, feminists with hysterical energies assumed diseases, that were invented and later recognized as non-existent and discredited. Since large parts of society, the media and the public were infected, we are not only dealing with an almost exclusively invented illness MPD, false RM memories and non-existent satanic ritual abuse that were constructed by an RM movement to the detriment of those affected, but also with a real psychosis, namely the invention and imagination of nonexistent diseases, combined with an aggressive, suggestive assumption of such diseases, a virulent accusation and suspicion of large parts of society that is infected.

The procedure for mud fights against men in the feminist waves was the same. Feminist campaigns that assumed men to abuse, oppress, disadvantage, exploit, or the like, were a pandemic that worked with the same methods and psychological drives, spreading emotionally and ideologically contagious, like suggestively awakened false memories in the RM movement that 'Recovered Memories', i.e. supposedly 'found' false memories with their (auto) suggestions. Feminism of all waves is such a suggestion and auto-suggestion with an almost hypnotic mass effect, which is achieved through massive indoctrination and gendering from kindergarten.

It was therefore entirely justified to perceive feminism at the end of the 19th century as associated with a mental illness which at that time was given the name hysteria that has been used since ancient times. But regardless of name and diagnosis, they were right about their feelings and rejection. It would be wrong to dismiss the invention of non-existent diseases like the R.M. movement by saying that those "rediscovered memories" are now discredited. No, it's not just about not recognizing a non-existent disease. That's only the first step. It's much more important to recognize the real disease that breaks out with those irrational forces, that suggestively and fanatically persuade many people of false perceptions, false memories or false claims, which manifests itself in the form of the R.M. movement or feminist waves. Anyone who speaks of 'mass psychosis' in fascism must also do so in feminism, which as irrationally and systematically accuses innocents.

By the way, feminism is older than fascism, invented the self-staging that was later taken over by fascists and is today considered characteristic for them.

Feminist waves always generate new false, irrational, but highly effective, suggestive and contagious suspicions with which they damage society as a whole – not just once, but again in every wave. We are already so pre-damaged by feminism that we no longer notice the consequences of earlier waves, because they have become part of Western identity. This damage is the cause of our weakness, which is why we are overrun by less damaged civilizations from Africa and Orient.

The first feminist wave invented political hysteria based on psychosis, depression and irrational imaginations and made it socially acceptable. Since then, this method has been used by all feminist waves, as well as by right, left and religious extremists and dictatorships, as well as by Greens and gender confusers. ('Gender madness') Climate hysteria, CO2- and diesel fear are of the same psychotic type today.

«"I want you to feel the fear I feel everyday!"» (Greta Thunberg,in spite of Asperger's syndrome built up by ideological currents from feminist roots and compliant media as 'climate saint') "Spreading mass hysteria"

Barbara Brandner
@drbrandner

Follow

Offenbar ist Greta Thunberg ernsthaft krank. Statt etwas gegen ihre Panikattacken zu unternehmen, wird sie medienwirksam als Klimawandel-Prophetin herumgereicht. Ganz arm.

ZDF heute @ZDFheute
Handelt so, als würde euer Haus brennen, appelliert @GretaThunberg in #Davos an Top-Manager und Spitzenpolitiker. Sie fordert sofortige Maßnahmen gegen den #Klimawandel.

7:14 AM - 25 Jan 2019

«“Act as if your house would be on fire, demands Greta Thunberg” “Obviously, Greta Thunberg is seriously ill. Instead of doing something about her panic attacks, she is passed around as a climate change prophetess in an effective way. Very bad.”»
Already the first feminist wave has politically exploited a congenital distortion of perception of women as needy and suffering, of a majority of male losers as not worthy of compassion. This was further exacerbated by some mentally ill politicizing their suffering, creating a new principle of political hysteria. During the first wave, schizophrenia emerged as a new disease that was probably caused by “social failure”, triggered by the breakdown of traditional structures, extended families and cultural exchange systems between men and women. A disproportionately large number of founding feminists were affected by such diseases. They rationalized their illness, in a way tried to treat themselves by reshaping the whole world according to their ideology. Tragically, however, their ideology was based on error and exacerbated the very breakdown of sex complementing, extended families and cultural structures, which was the cause of the new emergence of suffering and previously unknown mental illnesses such as schizophrenia. To put it plainly: Feminists massively spread the causes of their suffering, made the whole world suffer from what had driven them into rebellion. Very similar mechanisms now also work for climate hysterics. Let us remember that we are in a geologically short warm interglacial period of a long ice age, so that in the long term the global warming hysteria is not only nonsensical, but is probably the opposite of reality, namely that a great cold period endangers human life. The sun still decides our climate much more than humans.

> «At the same time, however, Greta Thunberg is a 16-year-old in need of protection who suffers from Asperger’s syndrome and a number of other mental illnesses. …

> Artist mother, who was once plagued by eating disorders and depressive episodes, is not entirely satisfied with the course of her music career. She subconsciously compensates for this by concentrating on the long-term therapy of her behavior-sensitive children. In the end, the mother believes that the cold-hearted materialism that is destroying the global climate has also damaged her soul and the souls of her children.»[xliii] (Handelsblatt)

Similarly, founding feminists of all waves have suggested an irrational and false conspiracy theory that a 'patriarchy' would be to blame for their suffering. In fact, the opposite has been proven several times from autobiographies and other testimonies; a missing or too weak father, not the maliciously insinuated tyrannical. Feminists have often tried to 'treat' their social isolation, a real cause of their dissatisfaction and suffering, in feminist fighting groups of quarrelsome sisters. Thus, feminism of all waves was already a crazy self-therapy that fantasized together male power and patriarchy as absurdly as fascist anti-Semites a "Jewish world conspiracy" that would be to blame for everything that is not going well in the world. Incidentally, Hitler also came from a family with several severely mentally ill members.

Instrumentalization of mental disease has haunted us since the feminist waves, from the first to the present. Greta clairvoyantly said of herself, without Asperger (and other psychological problems) "this would not have been possible here". Feminist waves that invented political hysteria and made it socially acceptable were similarly radical and intertwined with psychological problems.

> «April 30, 2019, 1:02 p.m.
>
> Thunberg book
>
> "She is the child, we are the emperor" [her family exploits her!]
>
> … "Our daughter disappeared into a kind of darkness and practically stopped working," the mother writes. Greta fell silent, stopped playing the piano, or laughing. The doctors diagnosed Asperger and related mutism, which means that Greta only spoke to the closest family members. After she refused to eat, the parents decided on a radical break: An end to her solo career, and the daughter's recovery is the focus from now on. …
>
> The basic problem with the content of this book is, that Malena Ernman causally mixes one with the other, interpreting (family) illness as a sensitive symptom of the state of the world. Greta Thunberg may be right when she keeps saying in interviews: "If I hadn't had an Asperger, it wouldn't have been possible here." …
>
> Me too, feminism, symbolism of illness and dogma of performance, in places everything is mixed with the climate crisis into a somewhat confusing overall scenario.»[xliv] (Süddeutsche Zeitung)

Feminists have harmed their souls, as have those of the men they mistreated, and especially those of their children, who were too small and dependent to defend themselves against maternal indoctrination and inappropriate upbringing.

The Greta Thunberg case is a contemporary lesson in how feminist forces of all waves ignored inconvenient truth, instead constructing convenient lies out of nothing. The opponent of feminism Ernest Belfort Bax described this as early as 1913. Feminists tried to censor opponents already in 1913, put pressure on editors, not to publish inconvenient views. During the second wave, schizophrenic or otherwise mentally ill founding feminists were revered as initiators and leading voices. Their condition was simply ignored. At the same time, as early as 1968, it was almost impossible for professor Goldberg of the New York University, to publish his book, which demonstrated the human universality of sex roles: scientific truth was already ignored 1968. The same thing happened to my books and arguments for decades, whereas any dirty feminist campaign based on error or subjective misinterpretation, partly disturbed feminists, was immediately built up to a media sensation. Such fundamental media imbalance has been driving the process for generations. It would be fatal to think that only today's campaigns have got lost or that the media have only now become blatantly one-sided. Rather, it has been a systematic error for well over 100 years.

> «Greta's younger sister Beata, who campaigns for feminism, also had major problems. The doctors diagnosed the 14-year-old with ADHD as well as with Greta Asperger, as well as an obsessive-compulsive disorder.»[xlv] (Augsburger Allgemeine)

Press reports documented that not only Greta, but also her sister and mother suffer from psychological conditions such as ADHD, which the whole family reinterprets in response to fear of (presumably imaginary) man-made global warming. However, her sister lives out her problems as a feminist. This is analogous to the belief of founding feminists that an imaginary 'patriarchy' is to blame for their suffering, even though a missing or too weak father shaped their childhood, the isolation of women because of disintegration of extended families and cultural relationships between men and women are the cause of the increase of mental suffering and schizophrenia. Feminists then tragically fought families and the complementary structures of the sexes, exacerbating the actual causes of their suffering. They themselves pointed the wrong way round, believing their struggle against 'patriarchy' and 'female disadvantage' – although women were always privileged, while men were sexually discriminated and faced with specific burdens – would be a fight against the causes of their suffering. It could be similar with the global warming hysteria, because in fact the sun is the strongest force influencing climate. More likely we live near the end of a warm interglacial period, before the ice age returns and will actually be a danger to mankind – through cooling, the opposite of warming. Only in many millions of years, when the sun runs out of hydrogen, will it heat up and thus make the earth uninhabitable – but that is not human fault, but the natural end of a star the size of a sun.

Greta's family stages psychological suffering as political hysteria – just like feminists of all waves. As long as we do not completely overcome feminism and rebuild a functioning culture with completement of both sexes and male prestige, the sequence of such irrational political hysteria, which also includes green and other extremisms, might be infinite. Even the screeching at Duce, Hitler, Mao, the enthusiasm for Stalin, Pol Pot had, at least in part, similar causes.

A few days before the publication of Greta's mother's book, a Swedish activist who worked in the same radical environmental organizations as her father, began to build up Greta skillfully and vigorously. This continued on the day of the appearance. This is too much for a coincidence, especially since her father's organization with Greta has collected millions of Swedish kronor. Greta read aloud in front of an almost empty room. Compliant media cut out the empty rows of chairs, turned everything into hype and sensation. A Deichmohle with substantial arguments has been icy ignored or met with hostility for decades; her hysteria of man-made global warming, while the return of an ice age is more likely and more dangerous, is being worshiped; the disturbed girl has even been compared to Jesus.

> «Research by critical media has shown, however, that its success is largely due to the Swedish PR expert Ingmar Rentzhog, who has good contacts with several propaganda organizations. Four days after Greta started her climate strike, her mother Malena Ernman's book was presented. The same day, Rentzhog posted a photo of Greta on Instagram and wrote a long article on Facebook … Greta's mother Malena Ernman, a well-known soprano, then confirmed on Facebook that environmentalist Bo Thorén had recruited her daughter. Thorén is a member of the board of the environmental association Fossilfritt Dalsland and is a well-known representative of the international environmental movement Extinction Rebellion, which has also been active in Sweden since last autumn.
>
> This radical leftist group, "Extinction Rebellion" also operates very openly with WeDontHaveTime … Gretas Papa Svante is the managing director of both Ernman Produktion AB and Northern Grace AB … The shares of both companies have seen an immense increase since Greta's first appearance … Gretas Father cooperates with the foundation "WeDontHaveTime".»[xlvi] (Weltwoche.ch)

The idea, that a chain of happy coincidences granted the founders and managing directors millions unintentionally, is made unplausible by a report, that shows an acquaintance of the PR professional with Greta's mother.

> «The PR connection
>
> It is also understandable in media reports, that her mother apparently knows the PR consultant Ingmar Rentzhog. Among other things both have already written an article on climate protection for the Swedish newspaper Dagens Nyheter. Rentzhog is no stranger to Sweden, he sold his financial communications company and founded the platform "We don't have time"»[xlvii] (Meedia)

Mr. Mere Coincidence was very busy, as it seems.

Opinion media create a sensation from an empty hall, whereas genuine critique of feminism has been stifled by ignoring it for generations.

> «Greta apparently turned to the crème de la crème of climate policy gathered in the room. But a short video clip shown on television the following day revealed that Greta was actually speaking in an almost empty room.»[xlviii] (connectiv)

Those who speak the truth are hushed up or insulted. On the other hand, those who are mentally disturbed are raised to 'saints' of feminist hysteria and compared to a Messiah.

> «Berlin's Catholic Bishop Heiner Koch compared the exemplary effect of the Swedish climate protection activist Greta Thunberg with that of Jesus Christ.»[xlix] (evangelisch)

This series of books presents many independent evidence. Doubts about a document, argument or topic do not affect the validity of others.

References:

[i] e.g. Georg Büchner, „Dantons Death"

[ii] This holds for men – no need of horny skin for women

[iii] http://www.babiafi.co.uk/2015/05/the-hitler-youth.html

[iv] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-1142824/Nazi-women-exposed-bit-bad-Hitlers-deranged-male-followers.html

[v] http://fathersforlife.org/pizzey/failfamt.htm

[vi] http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-4561784/Feminist-group-strips-naked-forms-pile-bodies.html

[vii] http://www.bild.de/politik/ausland/femen/bild-de-im-camp-der-nackten-wut-paris-30622458.bild.html

[viii] https://alexandrabader.wordpress.com/2017/03/13/feminismus-und-weiblichkeit/

[ix] https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[x] http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[xi] www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xii] http://www.encyclopedia.com/social-sciences/encyclopedias-almanacs-transcripts-and-maps/johnston-jill

[xiii] Susan J. Hubert, The Politics of Women's Madness Narratives, https://books.google.de/books/about/Questions_of_Power.html?id=v8qbMxKRNuQC

[xiv] http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary

[xv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Valerie_Solanas, Stand: 28.2.2017

[xvi] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/List_of_people_with_schizophrenia

[xvii] «» (http://www.newyorker.com/magazine/2013/04/15/death-of-a-revolutionary)

[xviii] Shulamith Firestone, clinically insane, The Dialectic of Sex, 1970

[xix] theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xx] http://theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xxi] http://theothermccain.com/2014/08/25/sex-trouble-feminism-mental-illness-and-the-pathetic-daughters-of-misfortune/

[xxii] http://www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xxiii] http://www.frontpagemag.com/fpm/226834/no-gun-ever-killed-anyone-mallory-millett

[xxiv] ibid

[xxv] https://www.spiked-online.com/2015/12/10/feminist-trouble/

[xxvi] https://publishing.cdlib.org/ucpressebooks/view?docId=ft0p3003d3&chunk.id=d0e14039

[xxvii] https://publishing.cdlib.org/ucpressebooks/view?docId=ft0p3003d3&chunk.id=d0e14039

[xxviii] https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/May_Ayim, Stand: 27.2.2018

[xxix] https://de.wikipedia.org/wiki/Die_gelbe_Tapete

[xxx] https://eaglefeather.honors.unt.edu/2010/article/54#.WpXGiXyDPIU

[xxxi] http://french.chass.utoronto.ca/as-sa/ASSA-No14/article3en.html

[xxxii] http://ozconservative.blogspot.de/2016/12/feminist-mother-and-son.html

[xxxiii] http://ozconservative.blogspot.de/2016/12/feminist-mother-and-son.html

[xxxiv] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Clementine_Ford_(writer)

[xxxv] https://www.smh.com.au/lifestyle/health-and-wellness/clementine-ford-how-i-quell-the-panic-when-anxiety-threatens-to-take-over-20160512-got2gm.html

[xxxvi] https://www.theguardian.com/world/australia-books-blog/2016/sep/28/clementine-ford-theres-something-really-toxic-with-the-way-men-bond-in-australia

[xxxvii] http://www.dailylife.com.au/news-and-views/why-womens-mental-illness-deserves-more-a ttention-20160421-gobzq0.html

[xxxviii] https://www.msn.com/de-de/unterhaltung/kino/virginia-wolf-%E2%80%93-viel-mehr-als-eine-wahnsinnige-feministin/ar-AAv8In1

[xxxix] https://ajp.psychiatryonline.org/doi/pdf/10.1176/appi.ajp.161.5.809

[xl] https://www.tagesspiegel.de/kultur/buechners-schwester/72124.html

[xli] https://engagedscholarship.csuohio.edu/cgi/viewcontent.cgi?&httpsredir=1&article=1493&context=etdarchive

[xlii] https://www.newyorker.com/magazine/1998/04/06/the-politics-of-hysteria

[xliii] https://www.handelsblatt.com/arts_und_style/literatur/buchtipp-szenen-aus-dem-herzen-warum-das-buch-ueber-greta-thunbergs-familie-furchtbar-aber-wichtig-ist/24274034.html

[xliv] https://www.sueddeutsche.de/kultur/greta-thunberg-buch-mutter-1.4425956

[xlv] https://www.augsburger-allgemeine.de/politik/Greta-Thunberg-kennt-nur-Schwarz-oder-Weiss-id54135646.html

[xlvi] https://www.weltwoche.ch/ausgaben/2019-4/artikel/wir-basteln-uns-eine-klima-ikone-die-weltwoche-ausgabe-4-2019.html

[xlvii] https://meedia.de/2019/01/29/pr-marionette-oder-klima-galionsfigur-ist-die-greta-thunberg-story-zu-schoen-um-wahr-zu-sein/

[xlviii] https://connectiv.events/die-klima-ikone-greta-thunberg-wird-dieses-maedchen-fuer-eine-profitable-good-cause-company-instrumentalisiert/

[xlix] https://www.evangelisch.de/inhalte/155887/13-04-2019/bischof-koch-vergleicht-greta-mit-jesus

The absurdity of patriarchy

January 31, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The notion of The Patriarchy espoused by feminists has gone from being a radical fringe view to being mainstream not only among feminists but the wider community. The definition of patriarchy used by feminists differs from that used by anthropologists, sociologists and other researchers as well as differing from the common dictionary definition. These two concepts are entirely distinct and should not be confused. Due to the significant differences in meaning that this term has, anyone using it should clearly define the term before making their argument. Feminism relies heavily on the confusion between these two definitions. American feminist Kate Millett is believed to have been a major driving force behind the development of the feminist idea of The Patriarchy.

It is also recommended to avoid using the term patriarchy theory as this gives the term far too much credence.

A typical feminist definition comes from the London Feminist Network uses the following definition as:

> Patriarchy is the term used to describe the society in which we live today, characterised by current and historic unequal power relations between women and men whereby women are systematically disadvantaged and oppressed. This takes place across almost every sphere of life but is particularly noticeable in women's under-representation in key state institutions, in decision-making positions and in employment and industry. Male violence against women is also a key feature of patriarchy. Women in minority groups face multiple oppressions in this society, as race, class and sexuality intersect with sexism for example.

In contrast, dictionary.com defines patriarchy in this manner:

> pa·tri·arch·y [pey-tree-ahr-kee] Show IPA noun, plural pa·tri·arch·ies.
>
> # a form of social organization in which the father is the supreme authority in the family, clan, or tribe and descent is reckoned in the male line, with the children belonging to the father's clan or tribe.
> # a society, community, or country based on this social organization.

If the Men's Rights Movement could tear down belief in The Patriarchy it could make huge inroads into getting the wider community to accept the issues facing men and boys.

Feminists differ in their understanding of The Patriarchy. Some believe it has always existed while others believe it appeared a few thousand years ago. Some even believe there was an ancient matriarchy that was defeated by warlike Patriarchal societies. Belief in an ancient matriarchy is usually based on the notion that ancient societies were unaware of the connection between sexual intercourse and pregnancy. The idea that ancient societies (particularly hunger-gatherers) were unaware of this apparently obvious fact first arose among 19th-century European natural philosophers, although many feminists who espouse it are apparently unaware of its origins. Today anthropologists and sociologists consider the idea absurd. There has never been a human society that didn't know where babies come from.

There is a never-the-less general acceptance among feminists that The Patriarchy is based on the systematic oppression of women by men and is a constant of gender relations around the world.

Feminists often tell us that they want to destroy The Patriarchy. Implicit in this desire are two important points:

- The Patriarchy exists
- If it exists, that it can be destroyed

So does The Patriarchy exist? If so, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is unfalsifiable.

The Patriarchy, as defined by feminists, does not exist and never did exist. At best it is indicative of a very simplistic world view. At worst it is indicative of an ideological need to denigrate men and boys.

A belief in The Patriarchy is used by feminists to justify their anti-male activities. They argue that if men have oppressed women through the use of violence for thousands of years, surely it is ok to respond in kind.

Much of the criticism levelled at men by feminists is justified by a belief in The Patriarchy. Mainstream feminism posits that men have an intrinsic advantage in society merely for being men. They call this privilege and constantly entreat people to check it. This is a very binary view of the world, presuming that one gender has an intrinsic advantage over the other. It would be more accurate to say that both men and women have problems specific to their gender. Unfortunately, feminists have shown a consistent trend of ignoring the problems facing men and boys, and much of this occurs because they believe in The Patriarchy.

Does The Patriarchy exist?

Anyone believing in The Patriarchy should try to answer the following questions in concrete terms.

When and where did it start?

If The Patriarchy existed and exists, it must have started somewhere. Be specific in providing information on where and when this occurred.

What written evidence did the purveyors of The Patriarchy in the past leave behind?

If The Patriarchy existed in the past those maintaining the system would likely have had a theoretical basis for their activities and they would probably have written this down. Copies should survive.

The requirement here is for written evidence of the systematic and intended oppression of women. Documents that describe ancient cultural practices are not sufficient. This document would need to explicitly talk about the oppression of women, why it is done and how it is achieved. Transmitting a complex system from father to son generation after generation unchanged would be implausible without written reference documents.

Women who lived under The Patriarchy must have been aware of it. Did they leave any written records explicitly detailing the system used to oppress them?

Did women ever try to rise up and fight it?

Fighting in this context need not mean physical violence. The women of a village (or an entire society), realising their plight, could choose to leave en masse, fleeing their oppressors. Women could also fight the oppression of The Patriarchy by engaging in passive resistance. This would involve the women of a community (or a society) refusing to participate in their own oppression. They could collectively refuse to participate in any form of work that supported the society, and therefore their own oppression.

If this ever occurred it would likely have been a significant event and would be in the written record of that society or a neighbouring society.

It is worth noting that the MGTOW movement explicitly talks about men passively and lawfully resisting contributing to a state system that is hostile to them. If The Patriarchy existed, parallel attitudes should have existed among women.

If so, what was the result?

Did any of these women succeed in shaking off The Patriarchy? For those that did not succeed, what was the punishment? How many women were tortured, killed or exiled by the men of their society for the failed uprising? How many women were punished in other ways? When uprisings are suppressed it is common for the ruling class to publicise the unsuccessful uprising and the punishments meted out so as to dissuade others. Records detailing an event like this should still exist.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit female rulers?

Many societies had a large minority of female rulers. Those who believe in The Patriarchy must explain why a patriarchal system would ever permit any female rulers. Some feminists attempt to explain the rise of women into leadership roles as a result of intersectionality. The principle problem with this argument is that oppressors do not allow any member of an oppressed group into the ruling class regardless of any other characteristics they have. Indeed, any members of the oppressed group that might be possible leaders are often eliminated by their oppressors.

Those arguing for The Patriarchy must also explain why societies around the world allowed women to rule in their own right. Many examples are given here but many more examples exist. Each woman below ruled over a powerful state. Some ruled in their own right and some as regents, but they were all autocrats. These women are listed with the continent(s) in which their power was centred as well as dates of birth and death. In some cases the dates of birth and death are approximate.

- Merneith (Africa, 13th century BCE)
- Hatshepsut (Africa, 1508-1458 BCE)
- Artemisia I of Caria (Asia, 5th century BCE)
- Olympias (Europe, 375-316 BCE)
- Cleopatra Thea (Africa, 164-121 BCE)
- Cleopatra VII (Africa, 69-30 BCE)
- Boudica (Europe, 20-60 CE)
- Zenobia (West Asia, 240-275 CE)
- Empress Suiko (East Asia, 554-628 CE)
- Empress Wu Zetian (East Asia, 625-705 CE)
- Irene of Athens (West Asia, 752-803 CE)
- Theophano (West Asia, 943-969 CE)
- Theophano (Europe, 956-991 CE)
- Margaret of Austria (Europe, 1480-1530 CE)
- Catherine of Austria (Europe, 1507-1578 CE)
- Mary I (Europe, 1516-1558 CE)
- Elizabeth I (Europe, 1533-1603 CE)
- Joan of Austria (Europe, 1535-1573 CE)
- Mary Queen of Scots (Europe, 1542-1587 CE)
- Catherine the Great (Europe, 1729-1796 CE)

Societies from the Americas are lacking from the list above due to lack of historical records. It is likely that ancient societies in the Americas had similar proportions of female rulers. Female rulers, while a minority, were common around the world.

Why did The Patriarchy ever permit powerful female figures in mythology?

Goddesses could inspire women to seek power. It follows that a Patriarchial society would suppress the worship of goddesses. And yet Powerful female figures are a mainstay of mythology. Notable examples include:

- Andraste: Brittonic war goddess.
- Athena: Greek goddess of wisdom, war and the law.

- Dhat-Badan: Ethiopian goddess. Public worship of the goddess was prohibited without a priestess present.
- Eingana: Australian aboriginal goddess. Creator of everything.
- Eki: Basque Sun goddess. Protector of humanity.
- Ishtar: Middle Eastern goddess of justice, political power, sex and war. A particularly powerful goddess known for co-opting the domains of other gods and goddesses.
- Isis: Originally Egyptian, Isis came to be worshipped throughout the Greek and Roman worlds before the rise of Christianity. Among other domains, she was a goddess of kingship. During certain periods her domain was considered to include the entire Universe.
- Mbaba Mwana Waresa: Zulu goddess. Is said to have taught her people how to make beer.
- Percunatele: Baltic thunder goddess.
- Tanit: Punic and Phoenician goddess. Chief goddess alongside a male consort, Baal-Hamon.
- Tara: Tibetan Buddhist goddess. She is a female buddha and represents success in work and achievement.
- Wala: Australian aboriginal Sun goddess.

Even a cursory review of the powers and responsibilities assigned various goddesses in mythologies around the world will reveal that these were not societies that sought to oppress women.

If it exists, can The Patriarchy be destroyed?

Let's presume for a moment that The Patriarchy is real and that men have systematically oppressed women for thousands of years (or longer) through the use of violence. Where does that lead us?

If this is true then it is either something that is innate to men or it is learnt behaviour – something that men have passed to their sons for hundreds of generations. It is not reasonable to conclude that a system like this could be maintained without it either being innate or being explicitly passed from generation to generation. A system functioning for hundreds or thousands of years will leave a "paper trail".

Much feminist activity today is directed at changing male behaviour to "dismantle" The Patriarchy.

If The Patriarchy is innate then it cannot reasonably be dismantled through modification of male behaviour.

If The Patriarchy is a learnt behaviour then there must be documentary evidence of its existence.

Since we find no documentary evidence of The Patriarchy we must conclude that if it does exist it must be innate.

Therefore, feminist attempts at dismantling The Patriarchy are futile. If The Patriarchy really does exist then it is innate to masculinity and cannot be removed from the nature of men. Continued attempts to modify male behaviour are futile. Women who believe in The Patriarchy should forthwith make plans to completely separate themselves from men. Men, and the women who realise the world is more complex than this, can happily go on without them. Whenever I hear feminists talking about separating from men I always say: “Less talk, more separation!”.

The purpose of this article is to lead people into believing that The Patriarchy does not exist whereas it is actually a super-secret organisation that uses The Illuminati as a cover. The Moon landings were faked to cover up the real conspiracy! The featured image for this article depicts the Cave of the Patriarchs in Hebron. This is the world headquarters of The Patriarchy.

Feminism: A Self-Canceling Project

February 1, 2024 | by David Solway | Link | Original Link

One hears a lot of talk about cancel culture these days, but little discussion of how a cultural movement goes about canceling itself. This is especially the case with feminism. The entire program is ruptured by flagrant violations of common sense and manifold contradictions it cannot resolve. One scarcely knows where to start in disentangling the skein of incongruities, mystifications, fallacies, and inconsistencies which comprise its dogma and determine its destructive course in the public domain.

Many of the movement's disabling contradictions have been abundantly documented in various books, some of the most decisive including Paul Nathanson and Katherine Young's misandry volumes Spreading Misandry and Legalizing Misandry; William Collins' The Empathy Gap; Patricia Pearson's When She Was Bad; Christina Hoff Sommers' Who Stole Feminism?; Suzanne Venker and Phyllis Schlafly's The Flipside of Feminism; Janice Fiamengo's Sons of Feminism; Bettina Arndt's #MenToo, Stephen Baskerville's The New Politics of Sex; Esther Vilar's The Manipulated Man; and Megan Fox's Believe Evidence: The Death of Due Process from Salome to #MeToo to mention only a few. Some of these self-canceling anomalies are worth reviewing to demonstrate the magnitude of feminism's ideological incoherence.

As I wrote in an earlier article, "The most flagrant contradiction in the feminist psyche is modeled on the entitlement behavior of feminists who morbidly inveigh against the 'patriarchy' while enjoying the benefits of a world the much-maligned patriarchy built—a world of comfort, ease, leisure, advantage, convenience, security and plenty which they have no intention of rejecting or abandoning." Attacking the "patriarchy" as the most oppressive institution on the face of the planet and vilifying men as rapists, conquistadors, exploiters, and irremediably toxic abusers of women, they issue their writs of attainder from a cozy, safe and privileged environment that men created for them. Every amenity they enjoy, every labor-saving appliance, utensil, mechanism, and implement they take for granted, every technological innovation, scientific discovery, and medical advancement from which they benefit is almost entirely the gift of men that they refuse even to acknowledge.

Moreover, the feminist movement could never have flourished without massive support, sympathy, and legal instruments emanating from so ostensibly demonic an institution as the hated "patriarchy." The feminist takeover of the university, for example, owes chiefly, as Daphne Patai and Noretta Koertge point out in Professing Feminism, to "the active collaboration of well-placed male allies, who stimulated intentional receptivity to feminist ideas." Where, they ask, "was the much-maligned patriarchy while this unprecedented expansion and neoconfiguration of the academy was occurring?" A society clearly prepared to embrace feminist demands was "bolstered by legislation endorsed by the 'patriarchal' government in Washington, D.C." Such willingness to help the feminist cause on the part of male administrators is tactically scrubbed by feminist advocates, a form of lying by omission.

Feminists tend to rely on circular reasoning to further their agenda, analogous to the spurious logic of the white supremacy canard, best elaborated by celebrated feminist Peggy McIntosh in "White Privilege: Unpacking the Invisible Knapsack." She writes: "I think whites are carefully taught not to recognize white privilege, as males are taught not to recognize male privilege." The argument boils down to this. If a man denies that he is privileged, it follows that he is in fact privileged since, as male feminist Michael Kimmel has also argued, "privilege is invisible to those who have it." In a gross parody of deductive logic, invisibility is regarded as proof of the condition that is being denied. Since denial means that one is part of a repressive regime that has normalized violence against women (as it supposedly has against non-whites), a man who denies "rape culture"—like a man who denies "white supremacy"—is seen to participate in it.

But illogicality—or lack of common sense—is not merely a problem in feminist dogma; it is actually a feminist goal. For example, many strains in feminist epistemology are hostile to the traditional practice of science. Feminist claims about the exclusionary nature of scientific method and the concept of objectivity as a male stratagem to de-privilege female ways of knowing reveal the deep irrationality of feminist practices. As Paul Gross demonstrates in Noretta Koertge's edited volume, A House Built on Sand: Exposing Postmodernist Myths About Science, citing a profusion of sources isolating the pathogens of feminist discourse, feminists tend to redefine the ideal of objectivity as "something vaguely akin to multiculturalism." Gross alludes to a paper by Elizabeth Lloyd glossing Helen Longino's Science as Social Knowledge, where we find that objectivity in science derives "from the critical intersection of different groups and individuals with different social and cultural assumptions, and different stakes."

In other words, science is not about truth but about the political desires of various competing or colluding groups. Radical feminists like to insist that "scientific results are inseparable from the politics of the scientist." Objectivity, it turns out, is all about power struggles, male dominance, and systemic oppression. Of course, such statements are meant to be taken as objectively true, another revelatory contradiction made in bad faith.

Not content with trying to destroy science, feminism has also mounted a campaign against biology, claiming that gender is a social construct. Now in an irony of self cancellation, it is hoist with its own petard. The transgender phenomenon is a relatively recent development that has splintered the feminist juggernaut. Despite the swell of corporate, institutional, and pedagogical support for the transgender movement, resistance is mounting not only among the public at large and from parents who find their children undergoing trans indoctrination in the schools, but among many staunch and vocal feminists who cannot tolerate the righteous pre-eminence of men who profess to be women, who act like women, resemble women, and who have been medically and legally "re-assigned" or "confirmed" as women. Hence the recent campaign of lesbians and gays to drop the "T" from the LGBTQ acronym, for which they are being predictably attacked as "transphobic bigots."

Yet, if gender is indeed a social construct, as feminists have argued for decades, then men who have transitioned — whether surgically, hormonally, or cosmetically — have every claim to be regarded as women. After all, feminists are among the chief advocates for identity choice and women's rights. From the canonical standpoint, a man who has socially reconstructed himself as a woman has joined the female sex. "She" is a woman, enjoying all the rights and privileges that feminists have fought for and won—except that many feminists, as we see, continue to resist the intrusion of transwomen into their ranks. From the radical standpoint, such people are still biological males and therefore "toxic," patriarchs in deceptive guise. Many feminists, or TERFs (trans-exclusionary radical feminists), have changed their stripes, opportunistically believing that sexual identity is not a construct but a biological given.

Transgenderism relies on deception as does feminism. It is a biochemical contradiction that is even more profound and certainly no less dangerous, especially when one considers that transgender activists routinely urge governments to subvert parental rights and expose children to various forms of mutilation. A sign of its power comes from Sweden where an LGBT altarpiece unveiled at St. Paul's Church in Malmo, representing gay and lesbian couples in the Garden of Eden, was removed since it featured a transgender serpent. Trans advocates were not impressed. But that is no excuse for the feminist tendency to play both ends against the middle, and to argue from expedience rather than truth.

Feminism has also poisoned the wells of justice. Feminists argue with growing success that the justice system as we know it, predicated on the principles of due process and burden of proof, is a masculine invention for the oppression of women. Women who claim they have been sexually assaulted must be believed even in the absence of evidence. "Rarely is it ever suggested," writes Law professor David Tanovich in a discussion of both the status of "fact evidence" in Canadian law and the tenets of the U.S. Federal Rules of Evidence, "that the complainant is lying in these cases." Similarly, examining many cases and episodes of male-female conflict, Tim Goldich in Loving Men, Respecting Women: The Future of Gender Politics concludes that "the more serious sexist disadvantage is inherent in the male's presumed guilt, not in the female's presumed innocence." It seems to go without saying that only men are guilty of sexual misconduct or, worse, capable of sexual assault.

Indeed, the category of "sexual assault" has become a cowcatcher apparatus, whose application ranges from rape to merely touching a clothed body in a "sexual way" (however that may be interpreted). The euphemism of "preponderance of evidence" in cases of sexual litigation, which allows the trial judge to decide what seems more likely among opposing narratives, is gradually encroaching upon the concept of "beyond a reasonable doubt." It has been an integral part of so-called campus tribunals under Title IX and the purport of Obama's "Dear Colleague" letter, which enjoined the lowest possible standard of proof in sexual assault cases.

In such cases the accused, almost always a man, found he had no recourse to justice as it has been commonly understood for centuries. (Fortunately, the 2011 Dear Colleague letter has been rescinded by U.S. Education Secretary Betsy DeVos.) The situation is much less clear in Canada, where both Civil and University administrations tend to steer in the Title IX direction in the absence of cut-and-dried formal legislation. In any event, "Propensity of evidence," as Tanovich puts it, enables "the prospect of wrongful conviction."

Additionally, a woman who claims without evidence to have been sexually assaulted or molested can lie with impunity and will seldom if ever be counter-prosecuted for obstruction of justice or bearing false witness if her story is shown to be devoid of "probative value," that is, found improbable, fabricated, internally contradictory or collusive. She is the beneficiary of the power of deference. The testimony of Christine Blasey Ford against Justice Brett Kavenaugh in last year's Senate confirmation hearings is a case in point. An article by Mollie Hemingway and Carrie Severino in The Federalist methodically details "21 Reasons Not to Believe Blasey Ford." The evidence for Kavenaugh's presumed guilt was so sketchy, inconsistent, contradictory, unreliable, and uncorroborated as to have constituted an exercise in juridical frivolity. Perhaps the most famous instance in Canada involved CBC broadcaster Jian Ghomeshi, whose plaintiffs were shown to have conspired together, lied to police, and lied on the witness stand. In both cases no charges were preferred against the female complainants despite their mockery of judicial process. In short, the female lie will trump the male truth. How the feminist movement can be permitted to invade formal legal space and prosper in a democratic polity escapes both reason and morality.

The contradictions that render feminism illogical and self-canceling show no sign of abating. The legal system, as noted, is where its efforts are most destructive. Canadian law, in particular, has entered the realm of logical paradox, if not of pathological absurdity. For example, Bill C-36 makes it illegal for men to purchase sexual services while protecting women who sell their sexual services. Thus a prostitute is free to go about her business but a man is prohibited from "communicating with" or soliciting her, on pain of a maximum penalty of ten years imprisonment. The law also makes it illegal to advertise sexual services, but does not apply to the woman who does so, only to the operator of the website or other media she may use. This is the sort of legal bêtise and juridical gobbledygook one can expect when a nation becomes feminized.

In their triumphal march, feminists have also taken over the public square, transforming it into a feminine space in which men are insensibly compelled to adopt the idiom and comportment suitable, in the words of German sociologist George Simmel, to "a more feminine sensibility." In so doing, men have given up their masculine culture of risk-taking, venturesomeness, robust argument, disregard for sensitivities, and respect for fact and have been forced to conform to more feminine attributes such as solicitude, empathy, personal feelings, and unfettered emotion. The refusal to accede to this development sheds light on the feminist detestation of a macho president like Donald Trump, a man who builds towers, is combative by nature, and is unafraid to act with pugnacious authority.

The war against the president is also a war against unabashed manliness; it is a microcosm of the larger civilizational issue. For example, writing from a homophilic perspective, International Academy of Sex Research Fellow Eric Anderson in Inclusive Masculinity welcomes the "softening of heterosexual masculinities." This will presumably tenderize the West and make life ever more agreeable for all—though it will also render the Western world vulnerable to the unashamed masculinity of its foreign enemies and competitors. The current guidelines released by the déclassé American Psychological Association announce that "traditional masculinity—marked by stoicism, competitiveness, dominance and aggression—is, on the whole, harmful." Psychologists should focus "on supporting men in breaking free of masculinity." An epicene Barack Obama has declared that women are better than men: "if every nation on earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement…on just about everything." Similarly, the aptly named Ruth Whippman, writing in The New York Times, contends that we should teach men to be "more deferential. To reflect and listen and apologize where an apology is due…To aim for modesty and humility and cooperation rather than blowhard arrogance…Sell the female standard as the norm."

Some of these latter may be wonderful virtues in their appropriate place, but they are not, by and large, the defining attributes of the male sensibility. As columnist and historian Louis DeBroux argues in The Patriot Post, teaching men that they are defective women is a sure fire-recipe for gender confusion, social breakdown, and a Pandora's box of cultural ills. "It creates men who are either feminized, weak, and self-loathing, or men who are angry and resentful at being declared evil from birth." The prospects for normal life in a functional society dwindle by the day. Domestic anarchy becomes the rule, not the exception. "The relationship between men and women," writes Megan Fox in Believe Evidence, "is a mysterious and beautiful thing. When each is acting within their boundaries, there is no end to the joy that comes from male and female love, familial or romantic." To contend, as feminists and their male enablers do, that men should become more like women is to distort the relationship and introduce a schism into the culture that can lead only to turmoil and unhappiness for both men and women. This may partly explain why marriage is in decline and the MGTOW movement (Men Going Their Own Way) is gathering momentum.

Feminism is an irrational doctrine and an ultimately self-canceling project that has lost contact with reality, having rejected both biology and history. In a social and political environment that has exiled common sense, feminism has been valorized owing in large measure to its contradictory nature. Operating wholly in the realm of conjecture and offering not the slightest proof of its stentorian convictions, it nonetheless maintains its unholy grip on Western sensibility. Promoting and institutionalizing the rule of the arbitrary in public and professional life, it has gone a long way to unmanning the culture.

——————————————-

David Solway's latest book is Notes from a Derelict Culture, Black House Publishing, 2019, London. A CD of his original songs, Partial to Cain, appeared in 2019.

‘La Querelle Des Femmes’: The Birth of The Feminist Movement

February 2, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Not long after romantic chivalry was invented and popularised a millennium ago, some medieval authors began to make jokes about the outlandish male sycophancy and pedestalisation of women that the new tradition entailed. Christine de Pizan (1364-1431), a woman whom French feminists characterise as the “first feminist,” took public offense the attack on romantic chivalry and on female purity, which she considered a degradation of women’s dignity which feminists today would label misogyny.

Christine’s response launched a movement called La querelle des femmes (the quarrel about women’s rights), which continues today under the name ‘feminism.’ The basic theme of the centuries-long quarrel revolved, and continues to revolve, around advocacy for the rights, power and status of women, and thus the querelle des femmes serves as the originating title for the modern feminist movement.

Feminist historian Joan Kelly characterizes this early history of feminism as follows:

> We generally think of feminism, and certainly of feminist theory, as taking rise in the nineteenth and twentieth centuries. Most histories of the Anglo-American women’s movement acknowledge feminist “forerunners” in individual figures such as Anne Hutchinson, and in women inspired by the English and French revolutions, but only with the women’s rights conference at Seneca Falls in 1848 do they recognize the beginnings of a continuously developing body of feminist thought.
>
> Histories of French feminism claim a longer past. They tend to identify Christine de Pisan (1364-1430?) as the first to hold modern feminist views and then to survey other early figures who followed her in expressing pro-woman ideas up until the time of the French Revolution…
>
> The early feminists did not use the term “feminist,” of course. If they had applied any name to themselves, it would have been something like defenders or advocates of women, but it is fair to call this long line of prowomen writers that runs from Christine de Pisan to Mary Wollstonecraft by the name we use for their nineteenth- and twentieth-century descendants. Latter-day feminism, for all its additional richness, still incorporates the basic positions the feminists of the querelle were the first to take.[1]

When we consider the longevity of this movement, along with its aim to increase the power of women through the exploitation of gynocentric chivalry,[2] we might be forgiven for believing its time for romantic chivalry and the associated gender wars it has sparked to be finally put to rest.

A short summary:

ROMANTIC LOVE/CHIVALRY INVENTED	FEMINISM INVENTED TO DEFEND ROMANTIC LOVE/CHIVALRY
William IX of Aquitaine 1071-1127 Eleanor of Aquitaine 1122-1204 Marie de Champagne 1145-1198 ↓ These three individuals were responsible for inventing and codifying the conventions of romantic love/chivalry ↓ Romantic love/chivalry remains the dominant social custom in the Western world today	Christine de Pizan (1364-1431) launches the Querelle des Femmes (quarrel about women) in defense of romantic love/chivalry after the publication of Romance Of The Rose - a poem that satirized the conventions of romantic love/chivalry. Romantic chivalry and the associated pedestalization of women continues to be mocked throughout the following centuries (by thousands of commentators, eg. Cervantes), which ensured the continuation of the Querelle Des Femmes, which was rebranded "feminism" in the 1800s.

References:

[1] Kelly, J. (1982). Early feminist theory and the" querelle des femmes", 1400-1789. Signs: Journal of Women in Culture and Society, 8(1), 4-28. See also: Bock, G., & Zimmermann, M. (2002). The european Querelle des femmes. Donavín G., Poster, C. Utz, R.(coords) Medieval Forms of Argument Disputation and Debate, Or: Wipf and Stock Publishers, 127-156.

[2] Wright, P. (2018). Bastardized Chivalry: From Concern for Weakness to Sexual Exploitation. New Male Studies, 7(2).

This New Study Makes Women Look SO BAD!

February 3, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The right to be left alone

February 6, 2024 | by Geoffrey James | Link | Original Link

People on the Internet spend a lot of time talking about rights.

Reading some of the more active social media sites can set your head swimming with discussions about women's rights, gay rights, digital rights, privacy rights and whole other host of uses and abuses of the term "rights". Me, I'll settle for being left alone. I don't want to build some kind of masculine utopia. I don't want to see a white picket fence out the front of every house. I don't want to see women have their right to vote taken away or be forced to cover their faces in public – no matter how much feminists scream hysterically about what will become of them should masculinity begin to re-assert itself publicly.

All I want, and I suspect, all most men want, is the right to be left alone.

The book Men On Strike by Dr. Helen Smith talks about how men are walking away from society – dropping out of college, leaving the workforce, and avoiding marriage – due to the lack of incentives to contribute. I believe it's more than that, though. We've been hounded out of every place we used to gather. Young guys have retreated into video games and internet porn, and even there it can be hard to find solace now.

It would be one thing if this departure were met with stony silence, yet still we find hordes of shrieking harpies chasing men down, eager to continue the flogging. For example, the disgusting "Don't Be That Guy" campaign in Edmonton, Canada, which portrays all men as being somehow prone to accidentally-on-purpose slipping their penises into unconscious women is exactly the kind of thing I'm talking about. Not content that men are simply refusing to take on the risk of dating and marriage, Canada's "Battered Women Support Services" has to poster the entire town of Edmonton to remind men wherever they go that they are, in fact, to be considered sexual predators in waiting.

Women, meanwhile, are aghast that their continual temper tantrums aren't having the desired effect of motivating men to stick to their so-called "responsibilities". Women will happily moan and complain about men and their habits, and a media geared towards female consumers feeds their preconceptions voraciously. Then, they'll spend a good portion of their time trying to figure out how to get one of these awful creatures to go on a date with them.

Yet it still doesn't stop. If a man does find himself in a relationship with a woman in America, he'll be constantly critiqued, tested and (looking at the divorce rate) ultimately tossed aside. If he opts not to engage in the dating scene, he'll be constantly harangued about his lack of ability to "commit". Possibly because he can't "handle a strong woman". Of course.

If the nascent Men's Human Rights Movement sets out to achieve only one thing, it should be the right for men, and indeed everyone, simply to be left alone. We desire little more than to remain unmolested by people with fancy-sounding titles and lots of government funding (like the instigators of the squalid “Don’t Be That Guy” campaign) or by other people’s notions of what our obligations to everyone else are.

The absurdity of running somebody out of town only to demand they stand still just outside the town border so you can continue to scream at them, however, makes me want to pick up a bottle of scotch and look for an explanation at the bottom.

——————————————————————————

“Of all tyrannies, a tyranny exercised for the good of its victims may be the most oppressive. It may be better to live under robber barons than under omnipotent moral busybodies. The robber baron’s cruelty may sometimes sleep, his cupidity may at some point be satiated; but those who torment us for our own good will torment us without end, for they do so with the approval of their own conscience.” — C. S. Lewis

Article reprinted from NiceGuy’s Site. The original can be found here.

How feminists define gender traits

February 7, 2024 | by Zerbu | Link | Original Link

The ever so common feminist mantra in our misandric society is “men bad, women good.” To put it another way: men are inherently bad by nature, and women are inherently good by nature. If a man or boy ever displays a positive trait, or if a woman or girl ever displays a negative trait, it’s then identified as a social construct. In the mind of a feminist, and someone who believes feminism, women are the embodiment of everything good about the human species, and men are the embodiment of everything bad.

	Male	Female
Positive Trait	Learned	Innate
Negative Trait	Innate	Learned

Feminists switch between believing that all human behaviour is socially constructed, and believing that there is innate human behaviour, depending on whether the belief will support the “men bad, women good” mantra. They deny that there may be any innate positivity in males, or any innate negativity in females, by psychologically projecting any negative female traits onto males, and any positive male traits onto females. This way, they can continue to take down males.

How traits become male traits

Whenever someone who possesses male genitalia (that is quite literally the one and only requirement, a male personality isn’t even needed) displays a negative trait – it is a male trait. When someone with that same genitalia gets angry, it is “male aggression.” When a male does something stupid, it is because males are stupid.

This does not just apply to traits that are actually associated with maleness. The trait does not even have to actually be masculine for it to be seen as a typical male trait. As long as it is negative, and the person is male, it is a male trait. Even if it is equally likely to be displayed by females, it is still viewed as male behaviour. In fact, it could even be a typical female trait that is rarely displayed by a male, and feminists and other gynocentrics will still view it as a male trait, simply because it is something they don’t like.

The negative trait, whether it is typical male behaviour or not, gets attributed to the male gender. Even if it is only one person who has displayed it.

Of course, it is a common mistake for someone to attribute traits to someone’s gender, age, race, religion or other group, even if it is not a typical trait of that group, and this is a mistake that most people, regardless of their own gender, age, race, religion or other group, make. However, feminists and other gynocentrics not only go overboard with shaming the male gender in any way possible, but they even institutionalized their beliefs as the norm that men are bad and women are good.

Phrases such as “men are stupid”, “boys will be boys”, “sigh boys”, “all men are jerks” and many others can be used for any purpose, as long as the person they are used on has male genitalia.

Another thing worth mentioning is how male-on-male conflict is viewed in regards to gender. In a negative situation where both the perpetrator and the victim are male, it is often that both are blamed, even if the victim does everything he possibly can to avoid the situation. If a male so much as explains a lie that's been told about him by another male, he is accused of retaliating, as a result of his maleness of course. The term "boys fighting" can be used even if only one boy is actually doing any fighting, though a male being a victim of male-on-male violence can be viewed as violent.

What they say about females who display negative traits

When a woman or girl displays a negative trait, unlike a man or boy, it is viewed as a social construct. For example, if a female ever perpetrates any kind of violence, it is always because a man wound her up (even if it is something stupid like not getting her the right gift, it is still the man's fault.) Some feminists even blindly blame negative traits displayed by females on patriarchal discrimination. Negative traits displayed by females can also be portrayed positively. For example, when a female attacks a male, even for a stupid reason, it is sometimes considered perfectly acceptable, and in our society where everyone has been poisoned with misandric views, it is assumed that the male deserved it.

When a male and female are in an argument, the female is usually the one believed by default. Why? Because according to feminists, females are never wrong, only males are. If the female is reacting negatively, it must have been because the male did something very bad, whereas if a male is reacting negatively, it's his nature. Some feminists even consider any male who dares say no to a female to be a misogynistic woman-hater.

Some people make jokes about how women and girls who do show negative traits or do stupid things are acting "like men/boys." This label can be applied whether the behaviour is masculine, neutral, or feminine. It just has to be negative to be seen as a male trait.

In situations where both the perpetrator and victim are female, unlike where both are male (which was mentioned above,) it is seen as a social construct and that both parties have suffered problems in their life. Many feminists try to label this as a result of the so-called patriarchy. Generally, neither are really "blamed" for the situation.

So, an outline on who is by default blamed for problems…

- Male problem: It is a result of his male stupidity.
- Female problem: It is a result of the patriarchy oppressing her.
- Male-on-male conflict: Both are to blame.
- Male-on-female conflict: The male is to blame.
- Female-on-male conflict: The male is to blame.
- Female-on-female conflict: It's a social construct forced by the patriarchy.

So remember, the feminist mentality is that there are no positive male traits or negative female traits, and anything that contradicts the "men bad, women good" mantra is a social construct. That, folks, is how feminists define gender traits. Anyone who dares to question it will be labelled a misogynist by feminists.

A facet of the American culture

February 8, 2024 | by Anonymous Contributor | Link | Original Link

---

The development of the United States (and, possibly, Australia) was different from that of Europe.

Ambiguity and vagueness infused our culture.

When we secured the Louisiana Purchase, no one really, truly, knew how far west or north it extended (perhaps due to the primitive cartography). It was a huge flowing mass of land; and this affected how we communicated and thought.

“There’s gold in them thar’ hills,” “Something’s happenin’ down that-a-way,” “I hear there’s a job in the next valley,” “Go west, young man.”

Such uncertainty–that of the wanderer–enriched our culture.

One could argue (although this has now changed), that the old world advanced arguments like battalions of tanks, lined up in rows: discussions of defensiveness. In many (not all) cases, nothing was asserted unless it was known with certainty and could be argued in academia, before any experience.

Americans established a temporary truth, like a scaffold. We climbed it, took in the view, fixed what was beneath us, built it higher, and reached the moon.

It is this ambiguity, this acceptance of uncertainty, which gave rise to America’s triumph in science.

This time is now passing.

We have transitioned to a world where “yes must mean yes” and “no must mean no;” and which treats us like children.

Our respect for ambiguity and uncertainty is gone with the wind.

Seduction (sexual or in the pursuit of knowledge through disobedience) is disavowed. People are considered cripples who do not know how to deal with the uncertainty and shadows of the masculine energy. Society now demands exactitude before any advance. We don’t take risks anymore, we don’t let boys play; we take exams and surveys and instruction from the realms of social justice.

Adopting can be the smart choice for fathers

February 8, 2024 | by Hopeland Cash | Link | Original Link

Not everyone has strong parental aspirations. For some, children are a must to have the life they want. For others, children are a bland or even frightening idea. If you do want children, though, the drive to have a family can be extremely strong, but for men fatherhood can be a risky undertaking. Fulfilling, absolutely, but at the same time very difficult to control.

Men's parental rights stand in stark contrast to those of women. Radically unequal custody, staggering rates of fatherlessness, and the mental anguish of child and fathers separated from each other all attest to the fact that fathers are not respected as a member of the family by modern society. This unbalanced and gynocentric approach to the family has been legally codified on some level at least since the early 19th-century and has only been worsened by growing cultural misandry. Fathers are deemed superfluous and interchangeable, one man being as good a "father figure" as any other.

What, then, is a man dreaming of fatherhood to do? There are no "single fathers by choice" except via surrogacy. To father a child, a man needs the mother's ongoing and enthusiastic consent because from conception through to birth; mothers are given every opportunity to opt-out while father's options are limited to condoms, vasectomies, and vows of chastity. Add no-fault divorce, pro-mother court bias and unenforceable visitation, and father's rights are left up to the child's mother.

That isn't to say men should never reproduce conventionally. Most children—if only by a disturbingly slim margin—have a healthy, active relationship with their father, at least on a national average; in some communities, especially African-American, a man is betting against the house if he hopes to live with his children. I'll leave it at calling the prospect chancy and let individual men decide if they want to take that risk.

What I really want to address in this article is the topic of single men adopting children to raise by themselves. The preamble above was to set the backdrop against which men have to make the decision of how to become fathers, and why adoption can be a controversial but smart option.

When thinking of adoption, many people picture a man and a woman—often older or sterile—taking in a child when they can't have one of their own. Single individuals adopting doesn't tend to fit the mold, and even more so when it's a man. When I propose the idea, most people react with confusion, wondering why a single man wouldn't just find a nice girl to settle down with and have a family. Single motherhood by choice—a woman intentionally becoming pregnant without the involvement of the father—is becoming more culturally acceptable. Many people nod in understanding at such a decision, sympathizing with "how hard it is to find a good man" and with the woman's biological drive to have a family.

Men, though, lack the biological capacity to have a child alone (post-conception). Why, then, has adoption by single men not seen a rise in acceptance matching that of single mothers? It comes down to a lack of empathy: the public has consumed the message of the challenges faced by single mothers and is willing to accept that a woman might need to go it alone in order to do it at all. Fathers, however, are held to a much higher standard. The barriers to parenthood faced by men are overlooked, ignored, and sometimes actively reinforced by wider society. If a man wants a family he needs a woman, and that means meeting her every demand—when it comes to children, the buck stops at Mom. For most people there is no scenario in which a man is justified in intentionally becoming a single parent. The usual assumption is that if he can't get a woman he must be a loser. Inversely and symmetrically, a woman who becomes a single mother can't find any man who isn't a loser.

Luckily, the tide is shifting. More and more people are aware of the injustices faced by fathers, but change can't come soon enough. For many men—young, middle-aged and older—fatherhood is a core life goal, but a domestic partnership is risky enough to make them stop and think. This is where adoption becomes a good option; if a man has the necessary funds and residence he can adopt a child to raise on his own. Is it in the best interests of the child? Children raised by single parents suffer on many metrics of life happiness and success, but they still fare much better than in foster homes or orphanages; and the very act of choosing to adopt means the father has made a conscious choice to undertake parenting, hopefully demonstrating good responsibility.

There are more children in need of adoption than there are adoptive parents, so I fully support any fit adult choosing to adopt. There aren't any legal barriers to a single man adopting though I'm sure some men go up against personal biases in the vetting process. As with any non-traditional life style choice, the lack of social acceptance can be off-putting to adoptive fathers. Why, though, do so few people understand why a man might want to forgo traditional family in favor of adopting? The willful ignorance surrounding father's rights is staggering, but the topic of adoption offers a prime opportunity to illustrate the plight of fathers and why some men want to go it alone. There is a stark contrast between the rights of men in mother-father pairs and those who adopt alone, and a brief thought experiment inverting them can show the difference:

Let's imagine a different kind of adoption process. For the sake of this exercise, only men can apply. When one does, he has to select an "adoption overseer". There are lots of overseers, millions in fact, and he can approach any overseer he likes. It's up to the overseer, though, whether or not to take on the man as a client. This overseer has complete discretion to decide if the man will be allowed to adopt. She sets her own criteria and can turn him away at any point, no refund provided. Of course, the man can try as often as he wants.

Once a man finds a friendly overseer and wins her over, he gets to adopt. Presto, he's a father! He has a son or daughter to raise and love, to give everything to and do everything for. The overseer's still there, though. In a sense the child isn't even the father's; Junior is really just loaned to the father because the overseer can revoke the adoption at any point. Based on a whim, on new-found dislike for the father, on thinking another man would be more fit, the overseer can cancel the adoption and take the child away. No proof required, no show of unfitness. The man can appeal—if he has the money—but the odds aren't good. He's got no guarantee of maintaining contact and the judges almost always side with the adoption overseer. Even if he does win some partial retention of parental rights, there's no enforcement of them or punishment for thwarting them.

If adoptions were like that, if an adoptive parent were at the near-total mercy of the personal feelings of one individual overseer with no accountability, how many people would go through with it? How many men would say "That shit's crazy" and just walk away?

The reality of father's rights is even worse, though. Extending the thought experiment, imagine if, after opening negotiations with an adoption overseer, she could force the man to adopt even if he changes his mind? It goes on and on, beyond what anyone would believe in a thought experiment. The reality of fathers' lack of rights is far stranger than any piece of fiction can express.

Yeah, that shit's crazy, and that's why fewer and fewer men are willing to marry. A lot of them, though, still want to be fathers and adoption will become an increasingly appealing option. If you manage to adopt, you only have to answer to adoption agencies and Child Protective Services, and at least, they have some accountability and regulation. Are CPS agencies without fault? Absolutely not. In some states, they're coming under investigation for misconduct, and they can and do abuse parents' rights. But are they better than betting your family on the Russian roulette of family courts? I say absolutely. Men need to be able to be parents on their terms, to embrace their own, personal brand of fathering with confidence. No one's child should be able to be taken away based on another person's feelings, but that's exactly what family law does. No need for demonstration of unfitness, no enforcement of rights.

The sad truth is that a father is only considered a real parent if he's the only parent.

Author's Note: This article is not meant to provide legal advice or information on the adoption process. Each state, province, and country has its own laws regarding adoption, and a would-be parent should always research the requirements in their region before deciding whether or not to pursue adoption.

The debate between the sexes

February 9, 2024 | by Chris Good | Link | Original Link

The debate between the sexes has raged on for decades and it seems necessary to acknowledge that, to some degree, neither side will buckle to the other. The reason for this, obviously, is that we each have our own views, our beliefs and our own cause. A staggering amount of research and statistics are available that prove, beyond doubt, that institutional and cultural prejudice exists against men, so we must ask ourselves why the feminist movement, and individual feminists, refuse to acknowledge this?

My argument would be down to the natural tendency of us all, as humans, to favour information that supports our own preconceptions and our idea of the truth and to discredit that which threatens it; this is well known in psychology and is called "confirmation bias".

Perhaps one of the first lessons in research, science and experiment is to acknowledge our bias, prejudice and the simple fact that we are, most likely, looking into something in order to prove ourselves right. It can be an incredibly difficult task to remain objective when faced with data that conflicts with, what we know in our core and very being, is correct.

Confirmation bias is no more evident than where emotional investment and identity is at stake. It is one thing to objectively hold a viewpoint and opinion and face the challenge to change that, but it is quite another when it threatens a perspective and 'truth' that we have attached to our idea of 'who we are' and 'what we are'. I am a "Christian". I am a "Feminist". "I am a…." What we are saying is that we have made a belief a very definition of who we are and, perhaps, why we are here. This truth belongs to me, defines me and more than that, it IS me.

We might, then, understand the conflict of the Creationist when faced with the evidence of the Big Bang and evolution. It doesn't just threaten a fact within his mind, it threatens the core of his beliefs, who he is, what he is, how he got here. Better to discard the information and evidence and explain it away: better to protect oneself. Emotion before objective thought. Self-preservation before truth.

This is true, also, of anyone adopting beliefs and ideas with which they invest themselves on an emotional level and on a level of identity: "This is me", "I am a…."

I bought a fantastic book, "Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men? A Debate" by Warren Farrell and James P. Sterba. The reason I bought it? I liked that it was a book devoted to discussion. Both sides were represented. As a complete work, it was without bias, which is the objective manner in which I aim to approach the gender equality discussion. I ran a bath, made a mountain of bubbles, threw on some tunes, had a couple of candles flickering and readied a short whisky (which is perhaps the most stereotypically "manly" thing about that whole event, but I was happy). All that remained was to get the book which had arrived that day. I bought it for objectivity, with a noble and, perhaps, pious, idea of just how fair I would always be in my contributions to the discussion. As I approached the bathroom, the book in hand, my curiosity got the better of me. I would read every word in that book, but I couldn't wait to find out what its final answer and conclusion was to that question that was burning in my mind: Does feminism discriminate against men?

Padding toward the warmth of the bath, I flicked to the last page. It was going to tell me just how right I was. I had independently researched so many factors in this debate and formed my own conclusion that Feminism does, indeed, discriminate against men; and I was about to read, in black and white, just how intelligent, thorough and brilliant I had been in my efforts. It was going to agree with me…and what a joy the book would be to read as the candlelight flickered on the bubbles, as I sipped on my cheap whisky, knowing that with every passing word, I was getting closer to that last page, where it reads in stark black and white lettering: YOU WERE RIGHT, CHRIS!

"Given that feminism has not discriminated against men, the future of feminism and men looks very promising indeed, especially if men in sufficient numbers come around to endorse the feminist ideal of equality, so that it can be legally enforced."

I huffed, I puffed, my brow creased and I glared at the page before casting the book down onto a stack of towels and opting to read a sci-fi novel. How could it say that? How could a book claiming to look at the real facts come to that conclusion, in light of everything I've researched, every discussion I've had with broken fathers who are unrepresented in the law and every mind-numbing examination of statistics? How could a credible study of all the information available to us come to such a ludicrous conclusion and say that I am wrong? They'll publish anything these days!

With one foot plunging through the bubbles and half a mind to get some more whisky, I looked at the sci-fi novel, with disgust. Not just because it was proving to be an awful read, that caused me to consider that perhaps I could write fiction, but because I suddenly came face to face with my lack of integrity. Holding that awful sci-fi novel as a preferred option to facing whatever truth may be found in my previously planned bubble bath reading time, I saw bias. Prejudice; against truth and knowledge and wisdom.

I picked the book up again and resolved to find out why I might be wrong. Why did my research and my own mind lead me down a wrong path? I was, perhaps, to be challenged to question whether I was wrong, but that should always be the case, if my previously noble and definitely pious (proven by this point) notion of objectivity was to be believed. I was, perhaps, to find out that I was wrong: but am I seeking truth, or self-affirmation and sense of belonging in a community?

As it turns out, I had been a silly buffoon. The book is, indeed, designed as a debate. Warren Farrell, in opposition to feminism, went first; and if you'd like to read his summary page, you'll find it on page 111, in the middle of the book. James P Sterba then took his turn, concluding on the page that confronted me with an ugly side of myself.

Even with the most noble intentions, my own bias, my own prejudice for the truth I believed in and my own sense of self-preservation got the better of me.

I do not tell you this to, simply, disgrace myself. Rather, I admit to it as an example of how we all, whatever side we're on, are susceptible to that very real, very tangible, but often unnoticed in ourselves, discrimination against real truth and real knowledge. What is our goal?

I did read through that book and it remains my favourite, simply because it includes both sides of the argument in a concise and fair debate. It's not like trying to make sense of the issue as one person speaks about the wage gap and another brings up the disposable sex, before someone then brings up the lack of education for girls in third world countries. Even that last sentence was confusing! Read that book. Each subject is represented by one side and responded to fairly. The only question that matters is about how we will read it.

Through my own disgrace, I realised I had to acknowledge my prejudice and bias and read Farrell's arguments with a mind of questioning and criticism and Sterba's arguments with an openness to whatever truths might be found in his interpretation of the available data.

Truthfully, I do not think that an acknowledgement of personal bias and a genuine pursuit of truth will ever be found in the proud, emotionally-invested, career-feminists such as Valenti, Chemaly or Greer. All they see is that which supports their own sense of self, sells their books and keeps their articles popular. To some degree, perhaps they don't even choose to be blind to the very real facts of male discrimination.

For the same reason, I don't think there is any reversal of major feminist organisations, such as NOW, or even websites such as feminist.com. How many feminists who confront their own confirmation bias does it take to reverse the ingrained assumptions and direction of a moneymaking, job-safe feminist organisation? None: they get fired.

I would hope that any MRAs or humanists would engage with all topics in the gender equality debate as individual evaluations of discrimination, each deserving their own objective study, research and conclusions. Should we study an issue and objectively conclude that feminist claims were correct, would we allow that admission? I would hope so.

Still, I have to say it as I perceive the situation. The prejudice against truth will continue, the emotional investment and bias toward one's own truth will always result in two sides of an argument. Like the Protestant and Catholic churches, we must learn to live and communicate together, rather than spending all of our time and energy trying to pull down each other's steeples.

What we can demand, though, is an unbiased government. It is not their job to support either 'movement' or express any bias, or wear any campaign's T-shirt. What we should demand of them is that, while bias may exist in co-existing MRA or Feminism, it should not exist in the government or in laws.

Let the feminists enjoy their ivory towers and their personal affirmation of their own righteousness, seriously, leave them to it. Let us, instead, focus on taking what we know…what we objectively know…and demanding objective action from our government, not from feminism.

——-

What Were Medieval Attitudes Towards Sex?

February 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Much of feminism rests on the feminist historical narrative. If women weren't oppressed historically then what was feminism rescuing them from?

There is plenty of evidence, even from blue pill sources, that the feminist historical narrative is false. In particular, feminists would have you believe that men in the past tried to repress female sexuality. Not true, as the marital debt demonstrates.

This video goes through many aspects of sex and sexuality in Medieval Europe. It shows that medieval women were anything but sexually repressed and tells quite a few amusing stories along the way.

Husband’s sexual obligation to wife is matter of life & death

February 11, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

A wife having sex with her husband when she doesn’t feel like doing it is now regarded as her husband raping her. In the more enlightened Middle Ages, the situation was much different. Christian spouses had an obligation to grant each other’s requests for sex, even if one didn’t feel like doing it.[1] The Christian marital sexual obligation was know as the marital debt. But this marital sexual obligation wasn’t merely understand in contractual-commercial terms. A medieval husband’s sexual obligation to his wife included action saving her life and preserving her mental health.

In medieval Italy, a young, newly married woman was gravely ill. She lay on her back, her eyes closed, scarcely breathing, and looking like a corpse. Everyone thought that she would soon die. The young, newly married husband despaired greatly of her mortal illness. Showing manly initiative, he rose into action:

> The husband was lamenting that his wife, with whom he had been sexually intimate so few times and whom he loved greatly, was being so soon snatched away from him. He therefore decided to have sex with her before she expired. After having sent away all bystanders by mentioning vaguely the performance of some secret act, he engaged in sexual intimacy with his wife.
>
> { Dolebat vir tam cito eripi uxorem sibi, quam raro cognoverat, et eam, ut aequum erat, summe amabat. Decrevit ergo cum uxore, antequam ea expiraret, coire. Semotis omnibus (cum nescio quid se acturum secreto dixisset), uxorem cognovit. } [2]

The effects of marital sex were miraculous:

> Immediately, as if her husband had injected new life into her body, she began to draw in breath, she opened her eyes, and after a little while she began to speak. With a gentle voice, she called for her husband.
>
> { Illa e vestigio, tanquam vir novam vitam in corpus ejus indidisset, coepit spiritum ducere, atque oculis subapertis, post paululum loqui, et submissa voce virum appellare. }

As most husbands do, he responded promptly and obediently to his wife’s call. She asked for some food and drink. He got them for her. She was thus fully restored to good health. The course of the wife’s illness leaves no room for doubt: without the husband’s sexual service, the wife would have died. That’s a stressful burden for husbands to hold in the marital bed.

A husband’s obligation to have sex with his wife was also regarded as vitally important to his wife’s mental health. In medieval Tuscany, a wife was suffering from frenzy and delirium. To get her to a folk-healer for a prognosis and treatment, the husband and his helpers had to transport her across the Arno River:

> In order to cross the Arno River, they put the woman on the back of the strongest man. Immediately she began wriggling her buttocks, simulating sexual intercourse, and crying out in a loud voice, “I,” she said, frequently repeating her words, “want to be fucked!” Thus she voiced the cause of her illness.
>
> { Cum per Arnum fluvium transituri mulierem supra dorsum hominis validioris imposuissent, coepit illa vestigio nates movere, similis coeunti, ac magna vocce clamitans: “Ego,” inquit, saepius verba iterans, “vellem futui!” quibus vocibus causam expressit morbi. } [3]

Everyone laughed at the husband and attributed his wife’s illness to him:

> The one who was carrying the woman poured out such a fit of laughter that he fell into the water with her. All the rest burst out laughing with knowing the cure for this insanity. They asserted that, not the work of a folk-healer, but sexual intercourse would restore her to sanity. And they turned to her husband, “You,” they said, “will be the best doctor for your wife.”
>
> { Qui ferebat foeminam, adeo est in resum effusus, ut una cum ea in aquam caderet. Tum ridentes omnes, cum insaniae medelam cognovissent, non esse opus incantationibus asserunt, sed coitu, ad sanitatem restituendam. Et in virium versi: “Tu,” inquiunt, “optimus uxoris curator eris.” }

All then returned home. As soon as the husband had been sexually intimate with his wife, she perfectly recovered her mind.[4] Husbands were thus held responsible for wives’ mental health. That’s a heavy burden of sexual responsibility for husbands.

Medieval wives never forgave husbands who failed to fulfill their marital sexual responsibilities. Consider a medieval husband asking his dying wife for forgiveness for any injury he might have done her. He reminded her that he had been a good husband. He explained that he had never failed to pay his marital sexual debt to her, with one exception:

> excepting that time when she was not in good health, because he didn’t want to fatigue her with sexual intercourse.
>
> { eo excepto tempore, quo illa non recte valeret, ne coitu fatigaretur.} [5]

His wife, lying gravely ill in bed, responded:

> “This,” she said, “by my faith, I can never forgive you. I was never so sick or infirm that I wasn’t able to be flat on my back.”
>
> { “Hoc,” inquit, “per fidem nunquam parcam neque remittam tibi: nullo enim tempore adeo invalida atque infirma extiti, quin commode possem resupina jacere.” }

Husbands must learn to infer what their wives are actually saying. To any but the dullest husband, this wife's message to her husband is clear: get to your marital sexual work, now!

Throughout history, young, beautiful women have sexually harassed men. But within medieval marriage, sexual harassment wasn't a concern. Spouses were expected to have sex whenever one of them desired. Husbands had the longest and hardest part of this marital responsibility. For those drooping in their duty, beatings and other forms of punishment stimulated only a small share of men with peculiar predilections. A medieval proverb offered women more generally useful wisdom:

> she who would have her husband soothe her tail must pile endearments on his head. [6]

Today, men are incarcerated for not being able to make monthly payments to woman with whom they had sex. Being incarcerated greatly harms a father's ability to provide emotional and material support to his children. Loving men, or least treating them humanely, is a much better way.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] If both spouses never requested sex, Christians could live in a sexless marriage.

[2] Poggio, Facetiae 112, "Of a husband who was sexually intimate with his sick wife, and thus restored her to health {De viro qui uxorem aegrotam cognovit, et postea convaluit," Latin text from Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, p. 180. Here and subsequent quotes include my English translation, drawing upon that of id., but tracking the Latin more closely. The subsequent quote is from id.

[3] Poggio, Facetiae 24, "A frenetic wife {De muliere phrenetica}," Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 50-2. The subsequent quote is from id. Cf. John the Baptist, e.g. John 1:23, "I am the voice of one crying out {ego vox clamantis}.

[4] Classical Arabic literature preserves a similar understanding of the importance of men sexually serving women:

> It is said that the virgin, if she be kept too long from copulation, will suffer from a condition that the physicians call "constriction of the womb," which leads to delirium and melancholia in the brain, to the extent that she may be thought mad, though she is not; suffice that she be fucked for the ill to vanish immediately.

Nu'aymī (2009) p. 128.

[5] Poggio, Facetiae 42, "A husband who asked his wife for forgiveness while she was sick {Vir qui mulieri dum aegrota esset veniam postulavit}," Poggoi (1879) vol. 1, pp. 74-5. The subsequent quote is from id.

[6] Gautier le Leu, "La Veuve {The Widow}," from Old French trans. Hellman & O'Gorman

(1965) p. 155.

[image] A holy family in medieval Spain. Illumination from a Book of Hours. Made in Spain in the 1460s. On folio 48v in Ms. Add. 18193, British Library, London. Thanks to the Web Gallery of Art.

References:

Hellman, Robert, and Richard O'Gorman. 1965. Fabliaux; ribald tales from the old French. New York: Crowell.

Nu'aymī, Salwá (Salwa al Neimi), from Arabic trans. Carol Perkins. 2009. The proof of the honey. New York: Europa Editions.

Poggio. 1879. Gian Francesco Poggio Bracciolini. The facetiae or jocose tales of Poggio, now first translated into English with the Latin text. Paris: Isidore Liseux (vol. 1, vol. 2).

This article originally published at Purple Motes

A message to those on the fence about men’s rights

February 12, 2024 | by Danny Baines | Link | Original Link

So, you’ve heard about men’s rights activism. You are curious to know more. How could such a maligned movement possibly be valid? You stumble upon A Voice For Men. You see outrageous headlines. They confirm your fears that the movement is full of misogynists. You laugh for a while. We’ve all been there. The activists seem bitter and angry. They say some very inappropriate things.

The question in your mind is this: Why do people get drawn into this movement? I was one of those people drawn in, and I’ve stayed. So I know the answer.

We all know how bad women have it. We’ve read about all the rapes. We’ve read about how women are questioned and disbelieved when reporting rape. We’ve read about the single women struggling to raise children with an absentee father failing to pay his child support. We’ve read about FGM. We’ve read about domestic violence. We’ve heard about the sexualization of women in the media. We are, quite frankly, disgusted with the behavior of men.

Maybe you accept that men can have it hard in some ways. But that doesn’t invalidate feminism, surely? OK so men might have it hard sometimes, but you wouldn’t go as far as saying they need a movement, right? You wouldn’t be that extremist, right?

Right?

The following are areas of men’s rights activism, and how they relate to extremism. This list is by NO means complete!

1. Domestic violence

We know women are victims of domestic violence. So why deny it? The thing is, men’s right’s activists don’t deny it. We say that domestic violence is 50% by men, 50% by women. This statistic comes from 300 different studies, as shown in the Fiebert Bibliography. (1) MRA’s belief that both genders are victims is shown on whiteribbon.org.

In other words, MRAs believe the problem isn’t any gender’s fault. Which position is more extremist? Saying that just one group of people is responsible for everything bad, or sharing the blame equally?

2. Genital mutilation

We all know that women are the victims of FGM. Why do men’s rights activists have to derail the conversation? Why distract us with male circumcision issues all the time? The thing is, cutting off the foreskin is the same as FGM type 1, which also removes outer skin. In some circumcisions, the frenulum is removed. This is the same as removing the clitoris in FGM type 2. The rarest and worst type of FGM is type 3, which has no parallel in male circumcision.

But… you may note that FGM is illegal in every single western nation on the planet, (2) and has never been practiced in western culture throughout the whole of history. And we live in the west. Our campaigns affect the west. So which is more extremist? Focusing on an issue which causes 0% of the suffering, or focusing on an issue which causes 100% of the suffering? No child is capable of choosing mutilation, regardless of any minor coincidental medical benefits. It has always been a religious practice designed to oppress men's sexuality.

3. Sexualized body image

We all know that women are portrayed sexually everywhere in the media. The thing is, so are men. After you've finished walking down your local Walgreen's or Rite Aid's makeup section, take a walk down the aisle dedicated to muscle supplements, or look at the fitness magazine covers, or the deodorant adverts. Take a look at the romance novel section. Ask yourself, when was the last time you saw a man looking that good in real life? Ask yourself how easy it is for a man to live up to that body image? Are they photoshopped?

Which position is more extremist? That only women suffer from sexualization, or that only men suffer from sexualization? The answer is neither. The thing is, MRAs don't deny women are sexualized. They only point out that men are sexualized too, because who else will say it? Surely the middle ground is pointing out that both genders are even. It may be hard on us all, but we all have a basic instinct to look good for the opposite sex!

4. Child support

We all know of the deadbeat dads. They run off and leave a poor woman struggling to raise children on her own. Did you know that 70% of divorces are initiated by women? (3) That women desire custody of the children in 90% of cases anyway? Did you know that 75% of men fall into child support arrears because they lost their jobs? (4) Did you know that even when they can't pay, they are imprisoned, lose their driving licenses, and can't vote?

So which position is more extremist? Focusing on deadbeat dads and blaming them for the helplessness of single women? Or, focusing on men as victims of a situation beyond their control? Isn't it more extremist to blame the victim? Men are more often in the situations which we, as a society, put them in and want them in.

5. Patriarchy

We all know that men are at the head of everything. As owners of the system, they dominate and control women who have no power. By extension, men are to blame for everything. This is patriarchy. However, what are our gender roles? Men carry out their roles for society, just as women do. Women have always crossed those bridges men designed and built. They have always lived in those houses. Whether through taxation benefits or marriage, women have always shared in wealth of even the highest earning men. Children become what you make of them. Did you know that almost all children are raised by women?

So which position is more extremist? Believing that men are in charge of everything, so by extension, we live in a patriarchy? Or believing that women control us all for the first third of our lives, encourage us to succeed in our gender role, then spend our money? In this way, we could extend blame to women for literally every ill in the entire world. It's matriarchy. But here’s the thing. An MRA may believe in smashing a matriarchy. Or, he sees traditional gender roles as even and fair. He’s either just as extremist as a feminist, or, he’s taken a middle road and isn’t extremist at all!

So next time you read A Voice For Men, read all the anger, the parody, the farce, and see the ridiculous jokes, ask yourself if that anger is justified.

If the opponents of men’s rights see us as extremist, ask yourself if that’s really the case. If someone saw your views as extremist, and they were wrong, ask yourself if you’d take the mickey out of those people? Ask yourself if you’d joke about them? Ask yourself if you’d write sarcastically?

Imagine that you are not an extremist. And still, nobody listens to your important concerns. Imagine if your important concerns being so frowned upon that you got blamed for everything bad that has ever happened in the entire world. Wouldn’t your humor be tinged with bitterness? Wouldn’t you confront those telling lies about you?

I think you would.

Any word anyone writes on the Internet is there to be judged by all. That’s the nature of the beast. All we ask is that you judge with your mind clear and your eyes open.

Apollo – God of Incels

February 13, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

There are many characters from Greek mythology who displayed involuntary celibacy, but perhaps none more famous than Apollo, the god of rational thought.

Jungian psychologists view Greek gods and goddesses as archetypes – themes that appear not only in mythology but also psychologically and behaviorally in the lives of men and women. Apollo was the god of many things, including music, education, knowledge, and other intellectual pursuits.

The Apollo archetype personifies the aspect of the personality that wants clear definitions, is drawn to master a skill, values order and harmony. The Apollo archetype as it appears in the behavior of men (or women) favors thinking over feeling, distance over closeness, objective assessment over subjective intuition.

Apollo can be viewed a metaphorical 'incel' figure. The following from psychiatrist Jean Shinoda-Bolen's book Gods in Everyman describes this aspect of Apollo or the 'Apollo man' :

> Apollo was the most handsome of gods, as well as responsible and dependable: the sun always came up, rose and set when it was supposed to. He emphasized virtue and had precepts to live by carved on his temple walls. Yet he was unsuccessful in love, rejected by Cassandra, Sybil, Daphne, and Marpessa. The women Apollo the god wanted to have, and was rejected by, were the kind of women who also may reject an Apollo man.
>
> The woman who rejects a handsome, virtuous, dependable Apollo man usually does so because he lacks qualities that are essential for her, such as depth and intensity, or emotional closeness, or sexual spontaneity. Apollo men are rejected > by women who want a deeper bond, with more intensity and emotional expressiveness, than he can provide.

>
> The integrity in which an Apollo man may live out his precepts or live up to his agreements draw admiration and respect, rather than love or passion. Women who are aware of these priorities will not choose him to begin with, or, on discovering what is lacking, may reject him as a lover later. [1]

She further tells:

> Individuals who resemble Apollo have difficulties that are related to emotional distance, such as communication problems, and the inability to be intimate… Rapport with another person is hard for the Apollo man. He prefers to access (or judge) the situation or the person from a distance, not knowing that he must "get close up" – be vulnerable and empathic – in order to truly know someone else…. But if the woman wants a deeper, more personal relationship, then there are difficulties… she may become increasingly irrational or hysterical.[1]

When considering the idea of using Greek deities as descriptors, I'm reminded of a statement by C.G. Jung who wrote, "To serve a mania [a modern psych label] is detestable and undignified, but to serve a God is full of meaning."

If we translate Jung's statement into one that speaks to our present topic it would say this: To be a devotee of Apollo amounts to a life filled with meaning, but to be labelled an incel is detestable and undignified.

Said differently, a focus on the many positives of a man's life provides a more dignified estimation than focusing only on the negative of how he falls short of a petty, gynocentric value system.

Think for example of what would happen to human survival infrastructure if we removed all incel men from society; how would we invent, build or maintain such infrastructure with lowered numbers of available men? What would happen to communications tech, sewage processing, clean water, food growing and transportation? If these men were not helping to help create such infrastructure, mass baby deaths would be the likely result….. wombs rendered irrelevant to survival of the human species.

On a less grandiose level we might also consider incel contributions to family and community relationships. Taking Apollo as one archetype of an incel man, he was said to be one of the most important in the large family of Greek gods – celebrated more widely than the rest for his value and presence. Add to that his contributions of poetry, music and the arts which enriched the culture and brough joy to the people.

With so much negative and maligning discourse around the topic of incels, perhaps its time we looked at the life of an involuntary celibate as every bit worthy as any other life. If we use Apollo as a model, we might even call parts of that life divine.

References:

[1] Shinoda-Bolen, J., Gods in Everyman: A New Psychology of Men's Lives and Loves p.130-160 (1989)

I want a man to “spoil” me on Valentine’s Day

February 14, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

We often hear women say they want a man “to spoil” them on Valentine’s Day, or indeed on other occasions. After the event they might say they “feel spoiled.” Many women expect that spoiling experience so much that they will complain with an air of aggrieved entitlement if it doesn’t eventuate.

What exactly does this term mean, and where did it originate?

The word spoiled was derived from the Latin and Old French verb spoil, which meant “to strip, rob, plunder, or pillage.” The term was also used to describe something that was “destroyed, ruined, damaged so as to render useless.” The word was first applied as a metaphor, in the year 1640, to children or to women who were “over-indulged, injured in character by excessive lenience,” and carried the additional meaning of “to become tainted or unsavory, go bad, and lose freshness” – in other words a reference to something that has gone rotten, like a piece of stinking fish or old fruit.

The metaphor of s*poiling* later became synonymous with pampering women in the context of romantic relationships, where a man would treat a woman like a queen or a princess and indulge her with chivalric deference and love service. The implication here is that spoiling is synonymous with the spoiler going too far on behalf of spoilee, to the degree that it creates character damage.

A Google search for mentions of spoiling someone on Valentine's Day returned the following results:

"Spoiled her" – 409, 000 results
"Spoiled him" – 24, 000 results

That's a differential of 17:1 in favor of women being recipients of the spoiling experience. If we take spoiling a partner on Valentine's Day or any other occasion as a measure of narcissistic entitlement, then it appears women are doing very well despite the negative implications for character development.

To finish I will leave you with the following comments about what Valentine's Day means for men, or rather what it apparently should mean for men according to advice columnist and relationship expert Brooke Miller who insists on the spoiling treatment for women. She writes:

> First lesson: Valentine's Day matters. This really isn't debatable my darlings, just trust me on this one. Second lesson: Valentine's Day matters because… Because it's not really about Valentine's Day…it's a metaphor. Valentine's Day is a metaphor for every other moment throughout the entire duration of your relationship when the woman in your life needs and wants and hopes you are able to joyfully and proudly step out of your way, and make it about her.
>
> Valentine's Day is a holiday decorated with girly-pink-sparkly-chocolate-flowery-hearts…and and and. February 14th could not be less stereotypically masculine if it tried. Although this holiday may not be about you, it is in fact, for you. It gifts you the opportunity to demonstrate the kind of guy you can be when put in a situation that is not about you. It shows that beautiful human being you're lucky to be with that you, you amazing man, are able to show up selflessly to any occasion.
>
> "Women know very well that Valentine's Day doesn't particularly matter to you, but making it matter to you, simply and solely for her… now that's a guy worth being with."
>
> Valentine's Day gives your crush or girlfriend or fiancé or wife, either a taste or a reminder (women love being reminded) of your ability to care about things not because you care about them, but because you care about her… and she cares about things. Get it?
>
> Women know very well that Valentine's Day doesn't particularly matter to you, but making it matter to you, simply and solely for her… now that's a guy worth being with. An acknowledgment of the day, a card, flowers, or even a romantic gift like a massage or spa treatment (hint hint) shows your capacity to put > yourself aside even if she doesn't ask you to–especially if she doesn't ask you to… and put her first.[1]

After reading Brooke's advice, I hope we better appreciate the meaning of this little phrase to spoil, and its social consequences. Our ability to cultivate healthy, reciprocal relationships indicates that this particular practice needs to be nipped in the bud before it descends into unsalvageable narcissism.

* * *

[1] Brooke on Boys: Why Valentine's Day Matters, Primer Magazine: A Guy's Post-College Guide to Growing Up.

Valentines Schmalentines!

February 14, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Whenever Mardi Gras rolls around, it takes me back to 1981 when I actually spent a four-day weekend in New Orleans checking it out. 43 years later, I'm not up for that sort of revelry anymore, but I do wonder if the throngs still chant "Show your tits!" whenever a young lovely is in the vicinity.

This year Mardi Gras is just dental appointment day for me. Fat Tuesday is no big deal, but come to think of it, given the obesity rate today, isn't every Tuesday Fat Tuesday?

At any rate, I thought after leaving the dentist's office I might want to nurse a brew or two as a modest nod to the day, so I checked out a web site that highlights special events at local craft breweries. That was when I discovered that Fat Tuesday was also Galentine's Day. News to me, but I miss a lot of memos, so I thought I needed to catch up. So I took a little trip to Google land.

It is just a coincidence that this year Mardi Gras coincides with Galentine's Day, which always falls on February 13, one day before Valentine's Day. As you might expect from the name, it is a female-friendly holiday. At first blush, one might think it is some sort of lesbian holiday but that is not necessarily the case. The idea is to celebrate female empowerment and solidarity – in short, "ladies celebrating ladies." Apparently, it derives from a 2010 episode of the TV show Parks and Recreation. Fourteen years later, thanks to actress Amy Poehler and writer/producer Michael Schur, you can now buy Galentine's Day merch at Walmart, Target, and Party City. As near as I can tell, Hallmark has yet to honor the day with any greeting cards.

In some circles the holiday is abbreviated as G-Day, which raises the question: When it comes time to choose a bar or restaurant to celebrate the holiday, what is the best G-Spot to celebrate G-Day?

A quick check of the calendars in my home and office reveals no Galentine's Day listed. But that day may come. Holidays come and holidays go. For example, Lincoln's Birthday, the day before Galentine's Day, appears to be in transition. Some of my calendars list it, some don't. Hard to believe but one day the Great Emancipator might be scrubbed from calendars altogether and lumped in with the likes of Millard Fillmore and William Henry Harrison on President's Day.

You may or may not be surprised to find out that there is a male counterpart of Galentine's Day. Called Malentine's Day, it falls on February 12 – yet more competition for Honest Abe! It's a bit surprising that Ballantine beer hasn't tried to work out some sort of promotion for Malentine's Day. The ads almost write themselves.

Of course, in these inclusive times, we can't leave out the non-binary crowd. Enter Palentine's Day, also celebrated on February 13. This day is geared towards platonic relationships, so the emotional component of the holiday is mild. Not much commercial potential here. But I could be wrong. Just as everyone pretends to be Irish on St.

Patrick's Day, maybe in the future everyone will pretend to be an incel on Palentine's Day.

All these permutations on Valentine's Day should not be surprising. With more men going MGTOW and the marriage prospects for young women growing dimmer by the day, Valentine's Day no longer suffices for many people. Will the day come when the "Seasonal" section in your local chain store will stock as much candy, gifts, and kitsch for Galentine's/Malentine's/Palentine's Days as they do for Valentine's Day? In the final analysis, this proliferation of holidays may be about nothing more than making a buck. Something has to prop up the retail sector till the Christmas season.

Long before Galentine's Day, a predictable feature of the season was a flurry of articles consoling women who got depressed on Valentine's Day because they had no significant others. While women may have an exalted sense of entitlement today, they can't seem to wrap their heads around the fact that they are not entitled to a male companion. Especially galling is the fact that a receptionist, a dental hygienist, or a shop girl might have a guy but the girl boss doesn't.

Unattached women seem unable to relegate Valentine's Day to the scrap basket of N/A holidays, e.g., Grandparents Day…Gold Star Mother's Day…National Children's Day…National Foster Care Day…Administrative Professionals Day…National Back to School Day, etc. Maybe that's because Valentine's Day really does have something to offer the lonely woman. While her paired-up sisters revel in male attention, the single woman has the perfect excuse for a pity party or even a good cry. Kind of like Election Day.

Nevertheless, now that we have Galentine's/Malentine's/Palentine's Day, it would seem that everybody has a feel-good day in mid-February. Well, maybe not furries. That's a shame because there are intriguing alliterative possibilities for furries and February. Also, furry rhymes with merry! It's a situation just begging for exploitation.

In truth, the mid-Feb holiday season doesn't end with Valentine's Day! Singles Awareness Day, appropriately abbreviated as SAD, is celebrated on February 15. It's also the birthday of Susan B. Anthony, who might have unwittingly played a part in creating all those sad young women. And if all of that isn't depressing enough to contemplate, February 15 is also International Childhood Cancer Day.

Admittedly, February tends to be a depressing time of year. Winter has worn out its welcome and spring is still a ways off. So perhaps the mid-month holidays should, like some Valentine's Day chocolates, be bittersweet.

Man Up: a poetic response…

February 15, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

A manly masculine man stands up and give a list of ten poetic responses to the derogatory dehumanizing silencing heartless phrase, “Man Up!”

Why Modern Movies Suck – They Hate Their Own Fans

February 16, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Psy – Gentleman

February 17, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

From time to time we publish a humorous piece. 10 years on and this video continues to amuse. In this song K-Pop artist Psy claims to be a gentleman but watching the music video makes it clear that he is nothing of the sort. Kudos to Psy.

It's also worth noting how the Korean women are dressed compared to Western women in modern music videos. It's possible to be sexy and clothed at the same time.

The music may not be to everyone's taste but the video is worth watching through at least once. Keep a close eye though, a lot of the jokes come and go fast.

The feminists’ great “equality” lie

February 18, 2024 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

Ask a feminist what feminism is about, and the answer you’re most likely to get is a statement about fighting for equality. Look carefully at the combination of stances which mainstream, established feminist groups take on intimate partner violence, and “feminism is about fighting for equality” is quickly exposed as a bald-faced lie.

In response to discussion on reciprocal intimate partner violence, and men defending against assault by a female partner, the feminist position is that there is never any circumstance that justifies a man “hitting” a woman. For context, I should point out that in this type of discussion, any use of any kind of physical force or resistance by a man ends up getting described by feminists as “hitting,” regardless of the context of the action. If a woman throws a punch at a man, and he puts his arm up to take the punch with his forearm instead of his face or his chest, that’s him “hitting.” If she jabs at him with a sharp object, and he takes it from her, that’s him “hitting.” If he can’t flee from her assault without going past her, any touch she feels or imagines as he goes by is him “hitting.” If, to stop her attempt to hurt him, herself, or anyone else, he physically restrains her with a bear hug, that’s him “hitting.”

The sheer hypocrisy of the assertion that there could be any reason men should have no right to physically defend themselves from female abusers is evidenced by the use of “battered women’s syndrome” as a defense for women who kill their partners. Place the two assertions side by side, and reduce them to their most basic nature, and you have,”it’s acceptable to escalate domestic abuse to a more violent level, as long as the person escalating to greater violence is a female claiming self-defense.”

Adding to that hypocrisy is that part of the battered woman argument is based on treating the woman as if she’s trapped in the relationship. Feminists do not afford abused men the same consideration, even in light of the gender difference in ability to escape an abusive environment, where women arguably have it easier. Abused women (or even allegedly abused women) who decide to leave an intimate partnership have resources every step of the way, especially in the U.S. where domestic abuse law is based on the idea that abusers are men, and victims are women.

Even without alleging abuse, a woman has advantages in leaving a marriage or a partnership which has produced one or more children. In the legal arena, the default standard for her to get at least primary residential custody of the children, and there are many areas in which a divorcing man is expected to at least in part continue to financially support his ex-wife after she no longer lives with him even if there are no children (alimony).

Once abuse is alleged, she has additional support from police, criminal courts, and domestic violence victim’s advocacy organizations, who are all geared to think of the accuser as “the victim” from the moment she states her accusation. A woman with victim status is afforded leniency regarding her own behavior, and aggressively protected from conditions to which she might be averse. In the U.S., she is even provided an advocate paid for with federal funding, to see her through the process of prosecuting her alleged abuser.

The combined resources dedicated to abused women will provide her with legal protection, recourse within the criminal justice system, shelter, and financial assistance where needed. Many domestic abuse victim's advocacy organizations will support an accuser in her effort to get custody of and financial support for her children. Her case will be addressed from the position that she is a victim recovering from trauma, with related needs and quirks that must be taken into account. She'll be offered therapy to help her in her recovery. In other words, there is plenty of government-sponsored support for an abused woman to gain freedom from her abuser.

A man doesn't get the same benefits. In addition to the bias against him in civil court which translates into a woman's ability to punish him financially if he chooses to abandon a marriage, as a direct result of feminist activism in the area of domestic violence, despite existing evidence that intimate partner violence is not a gendered issue, systems intended to assist victims are designed to exclude those who are male. Policy at these organizations and agencies is built around a male aggressor/female victim model. Resources are dedicated to accommodating female victims, with little or nothing left for male victims. Instead of the consideration and compassion that gets offered to female victims, the male victim faces marginalization and false labeling. He has a strong chance of being told that victim's advocacy organizations are funded and designed to serve only women, and being given a number for a hotline for men that leads to a system designed to handle abusers seeking psychological treatment, where he'll be treated as such instead of offered assistance for his actual situation.

Organizations which do offer help to men do not offer them assistance that equals what they offer women. Men cannot stay in the same shelter because as men, they're considered dangerous. If housing is offered, it's usually a short stay in a hotel room, which doesn't help men trying to escape abusive partners with their children in tow. Abused fathers who don't want to leave their kids with abusive mothers are shit-outta-luck. They may receive some legal assistance if they're poor enough to qualify, but they won't receive the same level of support in establishing custody of and support for their children as is offered to abused mothers. If that lack of support leaves the abuser with custody of the children, then the burden of making child support payments will be added to the hurdles the abused man faces in his effort to leave the relationship.

Law enforcement is often no help to them, and can even present added danger. In the U.S., mandatory arrest and primary aggressor policies lead police to respond to female-perpetrated partner violence by arresting the victim. In many counties, mandatory prosecution policies guarantee that the injustice begun by arresting the victim will continue with dragging him into court, and putting him through a trial in which he will be accused of violence and face potential jail time.

It's rare for a man abused by his female partner to find adequate assistance within either system, and the law enforcement and justice system may actually add to the abuse instead of helping him to escape from it.

Feminists support the battered women's syndrome murder defense as if violence were the only option available for an abused woman to escape her abuser. The same group has fought to create an environment that punishes men for leaving a relationship with a female partner, and to deny assistance to male victims of female violence. After all of that, now they argue that an abused man genuinely trapped in his environment should not have the right to defend himself from his abuser, and they call any statement to the contrary "apologia" and "endorsement of violence against women."

If the mere suggestion that a trapped male victim of female violence should be allowed to defend himself is endorsement of violence against women…how much more is the effort feminists have made to establish a woman's "right" to abuse her male partner with impunity, with the power to make him stay and take it, an endorsement of violence against men?

But of course, feminism is about fighting for equality…as long as we all understand that some people are more equal than others.

The Goal Post Episode 32 – The Victorian Fallacy and Other Truths

February 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Bechdel Test, or how I learned to stop worrying about it and love character development

February 20, 2024 | by Catreece Macleod | Link | Original Link

---

So, what is the Bechdel Test, and why does it seem to be so surprisingly difficult to pass such an apparently simple set of criteria?

The Bechdel Test is a straightforward method to determine whether a work of fiction—such as a movie, book, video game, or other piece of media—can meet absolute bare minimum feminist standards. The concept is that if you can't even pass such an easy test, you really can't be trying that hard.

The test comprises three criteria:

1. There must be at least two or more women (no men)
2. Who talk to each other
3. About something other than a man.

Huh. Well, that really does sound easy, doesn't it? So why do so many works fail the Bechdel Test? Is it some conspiracy against women? Is it some awful sexist portrayal in which women are only entrusted to talk about boys and have no valuable thoughts in their head otherwise? Is it due to female characters with speaking parts being so low in number that they rarely even pass the first rule?

The answer is a lot more complex than the question itself, as with pretty much anything that involves human interaction. There are, in fact, some minor sexist undertones to the problem, but probably not the ones you'd expect, and oddly enough, feminist ideology is actually at fault for several of the underlying problems, so let's explore this for a bit.

What is a man? Nothing but a pile of secrets! Wait, hrm. No. Well, maybe. Still, the question we have to ask before we begin is what's the difference between a man and a woman when it comes to fiction?

Obviously, there's a difference, real or imagined; otherwise, the test wouldn't be problematic in the first place.

For this, we need to understand that there are a few key things about human psychology that affect the thought process behind how we view men and women.

Women are, by their very nature, deemed to be valuable. A woman is important, special, something of value without needing to be anything more than a woman. She need not be especially intelligent, charming, or even particularly useful to fulfill the role of "nice to have around." A woman can be an arrogant, stuck-up waste of flesh, but as long as she's a woman, that's good enough.

Men, in contrast, are worthless in and of themselves unless they prove themselves to be somehow valuable. A man must actually do something. You respect women for being women, but men need to earn that respect. They have to somehow help the collective, or a woman, or otherwise be handy to have around in a mechanical sense. A man who can't slay a dragon is not a man at all.

Due to this dichotomy, we have a problem already. People tend to strive to prove themselves only when there's a need to prove themselves. This goes for all of humanity in general, with one's gender irrelevant to the discussion—people get up off their butts and get stuff done when it's required for survival or love. Without hoops to jump through, we, as a species, tend to quickly grow lethargic and stop putting much effort into anything.

As such, we have our first issue: the objectification of women. Men do stuff; women simply are. Not because women are incapable of doing stuff, but they just don't have any need to do stuff to be a woman, while the same is not true for men. This is a case where positive discrimination can have negative connotations—as long as women are deemed to be more valuable than men, women will never be as valuable by their deeds because they simply don't have that gun against their back for failure to be useful.

Equality has to start from the ground up: equality in value and equality in responsibility. So as long as a man has more responsibility and less value, he will forever be forced to be "better" than a woman, whether he wants to or not, in order to be deemed worth keeping around. It doesn't help that double standards such as this are insulting to everyone, as both men and women suffer when this kind of thing is enforced by society. Just keep in mind, it doesn't stem from a hatred of women—it stems from trying to put women on a pedestal and failing to consider the indirect consequences tied to that action.

So what does this have to do with the Bechdel Test? Quite simply, it funnels back to character design and motivations.

If you have a female character, you have to provide some awfully compelling reasons (note the plural) for her to do pretty much anything. With a male character, it's simple—he wants to be valued, either by a woman, or by society, or by other men. This is the easiest out there is because it means a male character can always be thrown together in record time. Just give him a group that looks down on him for not being manly enough and, ta-da, you now have a male character who can move the plot forward.

For a female character, it's a lot more difficult from the start since if she's going to do anything, you can't just have a group that wants to oust her from society for the sake of being useless—that would be deemed sexist. A woman who is useless? Throw her out! Wait … no, that's violence against women! Yeah, so you can't do that. This means that writing a female character involves a more complex backstory to make her do pretty much anything. As such, this pretty much rules female characters out almost entirely from being a background character.

Toss in that violence against women is deemed evil, while violence against men is perfectly acceptable, and you basically have written women out of 90% of the possible roles they could fill already. With that in mind, suddenly we see how easy it is to fail the Bechdel Test; most movies can't even get past the first rule of having two or more women with speaking parts, and if they do toss in a female with a speaking part, it's often just a background character who gives a generic report or informs someone of something, yet she doesn't say anything that a man couldn't say, nor does she actually influence the plot in any relevant way.

Ah, and you thought it was over there? No. No, no, no. I'm afraid not. The rabbit hole goes much deeper, unfortunately.

If it were just a matter of female characters being more difficult to write and requiring more time for backstory, it would still mean most quality written works would have lots of well-written female characters as they'd be a great incentive for the writer not to rely on lazy writing techniques like they can with male characters. So … why, then, are female characters still so sparse in general, even among well-written works?

Well, there's a few more issues at fault here, some of them we've lightly touched on already, some we haven't.

For instance, the whole "women are special for being women" thing rears its ugly head yet again, and we find that making a unique male character is actually pretty easy—give him a whacky personality, tons of flaws, just dress him up with absurd attire, it's all good. Men absolutely have to strive to stand out from the crowd, so making a male character who is unique is pretty easy since men will tend toward extremes, even risky ones that people would think are strange or stupid, much more readily. Bad attention is still attention, after all.

Let's take an example: Alex Louis Armstrong from the famed Fullmetal Alchemist. He's got an absurdly large mustache, muscles all over, and prances about in a silly manner with sparkles and glitter. Seriously, I'm not joking here. He stands out as a character not only because his character has been passed down the Armstrong family line for generations but also because he takes his masculinity to absurd levels of silliness and it works.

Now, let's consider the reversal: a female character who has large breasts, a voluptuous body, and is a grease monkey. In this case (not Winry Rockbell, as she's actually well written and isn't a supermodel), it's cry after cry of objectification and sexism; she can't take her body to ludicrous levels without being considered only an object, even if she has a traditionally masculine role to offset it.

With male characters, you can do so much more with them. A man can be defined as any male who provides a useful service to society. Giant minotaur? No problem as long as you're friendly! What about a female minotaur? We-ell, no. Unfortunately, she's now deemed ugly, unless she's vastly more anthropomorphic than the male variant, as was found back in the World of Warcraft many years ago, when both male and female players insisted they didn't want Tauren women to look so bestial. Turns out even women don't like playing ugly female characters and don't associate monsters with being female.

Women in the media are a bit limited; sure, they get more options for clothing and how to pretty themselves up, but in the end they're limited to types of prettiness since they have to maintain the aspect of womanhood—a woman must look, sound, and act like a woman to be deemed a woman. Pvt. Vasquez in Aliens? Not a woman. Sure, she had breasts and made some gender-based jokes, but she's considered too butch to count as feminine and therefore the rules for men apply instead of the rules for women. The strong, independent woman isn't what people want, not even feminists, or they'd be praising her constantly over Ellen Ripley, who was largely useless except for when her motherly instinct kicked in. Ripley tried to be useful a few times but was largely viewed as "I guess you can, if you want, but you don't have to. You're valuable without being useful," except by the soldiers who viewed her as exactly that—useless until she provided some useful information. Jenette Vasquez, however, was "one of the guys" precisely because she was useful all the time and acted with the male mindset of having something to prove.

Regardless, I digress; we have more to cover. Much more.

Sexism is a problem, even when it's positive, as we've already seen. "You wouldn't hit a girl, would you?" is a major issue in particular.

Consider the idea of harming a woman for a moment … now consider the idea of harming a man. It's not the same, is it? Harming anyone should be abhorrent, yet that's not what we see in practice. A woman being harmed is supposedly far worse, and even the feminists can agree with me on this because they're the ones screaming that it's okay for a woman to hit a man but not for a man to defend himself from a woman who's attacking him.

Indeed, check any media and you'll see this played out time and again. You don't get a horror movie because a man was hurt. It's no big deal, so who cares? It's horror because a woman was hurt. This is how we know the villain is evil as well: he hurt a woman. How dare he.

In fact, let's consider the mere concept of killing a woman. You will never see this unless:

1. It is a horror movie (killing a man is not horrible enough to make it a horror movie).

2. She is shown not to be a "real woman," thereby undoing her special right as a woman to protection. That is, she is an alien (e.g., Aliens, Blade Runner), she has all the negative characteristics of a man (Aliens), or she is an out-and-out protagonist who is clearly crazy and a murderer (e.g., Misery, Fatal Attraction).
3. She threatens the life of an innocent woman (Shining Through, Fatal Attraction, and Total Recall).
4. She has been seen in no more than three scenes (we have not gotten to know her—she is not a "real woman" to us).
5. The rest of the movie is focused on avenging her death (Death Wish), making it, in essence, a morality film showing us that a woman killed leads to a man killed.

The above list is word for word from a class headed by a female scriptwriter and is quite literally the rules that writers use in the industry on how to handle female characters' deaths.

The fact of the matter is that you can't hurt a woman, nor can you kill her. If you do, you must adhere to strict limitations as to what is acceptable; otherwise, it's viewed as cruelty and sexism toward women. Which is odd, because treating a woman like a man is equality—yet it's cited as sexism. Go figure.

Even Anita Sarkeesian is quite adamant about these things, pointing out that women are not allowed to be harmed in any way, shape, or form in video games or it's sexist. Sure, going into a restaurant and murdering the all-male staff is fine, but kill a stripper and you'll get penalized for it.

Unfortunately, this "harm" is so broadly defined that it covers too much to do much of anything with a female character. You can't even criticize a female character or you're demeaning a woman and treating her as stupid, and therefore are being sexist. You can't have her face the consequences of poor decisions or actions, nor can you really hurt her in general.

Here's a little secret to writing—conflict exists in virtually all forms of storytelling, with the four standard types classified as Man against Man, Man against Society, Man against Nature, and Man against Self. You may notice that little stipulation about it being Man in conflict—the reason for this is that conflict isn't there for the purpose of there being conflict, it's just the surface element that is used to push the real purpose behind it forward: suffering.

In all storytelling, everything in the story must have a purpose: every description, every action, every element. There is always a purpose. In the case of conflict, the purpose is not to have an action scene but rather to wound the protagonist.

Why wound the protagonist? It's the easiest and, arguably, the only method of character growth. A character who is harmed must strive to better oneself, to overcome the pain, or to solve the problem. Without harming a character physically, emotionally, psychologically, or in some other manner, that character is unable to grow and become better than they are. This is exactly why Mary Sue–style characters are so bloody boring; they never face a challenge, they're never on the losing side, never the underdog—they never have to fight for survival, nor do they suffer. The audience never generates any sort of sympathy for them.

This is a large part of why, for example, you'll notice that Superman is not the core of any Superman movie, comic, or other media centered around him. He can't be hurt. He's essentially perfect. As such, the point isn't that conflict exists in relation to Superman himself but rather that conflict matters to those around Superman. Everything that happens that's of interest happens to the characters surrounding Superman; he's a setting, a backdrop, a framework for the narrative, but he isn't the true protagonist.

To generate character development, you absolutely have to harm the character, and conflict is the most common method. With a female character, since you're not allowed to harm them, you can't make them grow or better themselves in the vast majority of situations. You can't cut off a woman's hand for being a thief, then expect the audience to be okay about that as they would about a man receiving the same treatment. You can't injure her, hurt her, harm her, or kill her. She's limited by our protection of women, and as such, she's largely useless as a protagonist or antagonist since she not only has no motivation to do anything, but you also can't give her a motivation to do anything.

If you look at this in practice, you get movies like Frozen, in which the protagonist, Elsa, doesn't really learn anything, never really grows, and never really suffers. She freezes her entire kingdom, nearly kills her sister, and generally does a lot of terrible things, yet these are never allowed to truly harm her. She becomes withdrawn, yet fails to really take responsibility for her actions.

Which segues into yet another issue—responsibility.

Women in the media are not allowed to take responsibility for their actions, even if they want to. It's always someone else's fault, always some other issue causing them to act a certain way, always some external force acting upon them.

A woman is pure, without evil, unless evil is introduced to her artificially, or at least this is the narrative that has been forced upon us, and one that writers are forced to work with. You can't make a woman suffer the consequences for her actions or take responsibility for things she did wrong as something that was her choice. If she screws up, it's only because external factors forced her to.

Unfortunately, Spider-Man's Uncle Ben had it wrong—it's not "with great power comes great responsibility," but rather the reverse. By accepting great responsibility, you gain great power. When you say that you could have done something different, you accept the power to make that choice differently the next time.

If a woman is raped, she's told that she could do nothing to have changed it, and she has zero responsibility for the situation leading up to such. In reality, all this does is shelter her from her true capacity for power—to make a decision that could protect her in the future. This overprotection from responsibility prevents her from ever truly growing as an individual; the conflict occurs, but the character growth (even if it's in reality) fails to be gained, defeating the purpose of the conflict in the first place in a work of fiction.

A character absolutely must be capable of saying they screwed up and accepting the consequences for such if they are to be useful as a primary character in a storyline, regardless of medium. Without this capacity, the character simply can't be a protagonist. And without the ability to hang the burden of responsibility around their neck, they can't be the antagonist.

As such, the vast majority of female main characters, both protagonists and antagonists, are largely weakly written characters with no real purpose or value to the storyline. When excuses have to be made up for their failings, they fail to be valuable in telling the story and cease to be worth writing about at all.

And therein lies the true problem of the Bechdel Test—any half-decent script must have all its elements exist as an intentional addition with a purpose behind such. This means you can't just have two random female characters who have no value to the plot having a conversation that doesn't relate to the plot; otherwise, it's simply bad writing and will fall to the editing floor because it's pointless.

Therefore, the plot must be referenced, and as we've just covered, female characters, due to the limitations of such, make for remarkably poor protagonists and antagonists, so you're going to have either a male or a monster, which is assumed to be male by default. As such, the vast bulk of conversations about the plot almost invariably must include reference to either the protagonist or the antagonist, and by which action causes the work to fail the Bechdel Test.

In fact, the very things that are harmful to men are also the very things that make them stronger: pain, suffering, being ostracized from a group, having no innate value, being required to prove themselves, being expendable … the list goes on and on. Yet these all lead to the same path: strife generates character development. It doesn't necessitate positive character development, but it does ensure that some sort of character development is at least possible. Someone who is comfortable with their position in life will never rise to the challenge if there is no challenge to rise to, so they have to actively put themselves into risky positions so as to artificially generate that challenge.

Regardless, what this means is that female characters are heavily crippled just as actual women are by our overprotective society. Until a woman, or a female character, has the chance to seriously harm herself, she can never truly become more than she currently is, much less become an important part of the plot. Plot is what moves the story forward, it's the march of change, the journey from one state to another, and without harm or threat of harm as a catalyst for change, there can be only stagnation.

So interestingly enough, what will make more movies and video games pass the Bechdel Test is… equality. Actual equality. Treating women as poorly as men are treated and telling them to woman up is what forces them to do their best, and pulling away all the safety nets to save them is what ensures that most will succeed—they can't afford to fail. The downside is … some will be lost in the process. Some will fail, and some will fall, and they will make quite the unpleasant "splat" as they greet the concrete below. Until we're willing to let women fail, in reality and in fictional media, we simply won't see the Bechdel Test passed with any sort of consistency.

Because of this, there are remarkably few ways to successfully pass the Bechdel Test due to the nature of what we deem to be acceptable culturally. Most of those methods involve cop-outs, such as writing a scene that has no place of value in the script as it doesn't have any relevance to the plot; having an arbitrarily decided upon all-female cast that largely fails for the reasons above; or ignoring the cultural rules and creating a truly strong, empowered female character—the kind that feminists would absolutely abhor with the burning passion of one thousand suns because she would get the absolute crap kicked out of her and would actually confess to screwing up so as to cause the beatdown in the first place.

So, oddly enough, the ideal method of passing the Bechdel Test with good writing … is to write a cast of characters that the very people who complain about things not passing the Bechdel Test would be screaming about being sexist because the alternative options simply lead to bad writing.

And now you know why the Bechdel Test is so hard to pass. It’s not culturally acceptable to pass it unless you resort to bad writing techniques to bypass the positive discrimination in favour of women that prevents them from being able to be employed as useful characters in the plot. In fact, the only way to pass it with even vaguely competent writing is to add things that are considered sexist or misogynistic, which defeats the whole purpose of passing it, so it’s not like there’s any real incentive to want to pass it in the first place since it’s not going to actually make anyone happy anyway.

Feminism seeks rights without responsibilities

February 20, 2024 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

The following quotes are excerpted from the writings of E.B. Bax, on the subject of rights and responsibilities for women. –Ed.

"These dogmas of "advanced" faith in the Woman Question are… namely, that women ought to have all the rights of intellectual capacity with all the privileges of physical weakness, otherwise expressed, all the rights of men, and none of the duties or hardships of men. For it is a significant and amusing fact that no mention is ever made by the advocate of women's claims of the privileges which have always been accorded the "weaker sex." These privileges are quietly pocketed as a matter of course, without any sort of acknowledgment, much less any suggestion of surrender."
Some Heterodox Notes on the Women Question (1887)

"Now in order to maintain this position it is necessary to assume the complete intellectual and moral equality of women with men, while judiciously conceding their physical inferiority. A desire, conscious or unconscious, on the part of these Socialists, as of other advocates of Feminism, is to make out a claim for women to all that is honourable and agreeable in the functions of human life, while safeguarding them from any obligation to accept rough or dangerous duties. Thus Bebel, in his "Frau und der Sozialismus," while maintaining that no social function filled by men ought to be inaccessible to women, since any seeming unfitness in the latter is only the result of certain cruel oppression at the hands of vile man, yet is careful to guard his fair clients from the danger of being called upon for military purposes, even of defence."
Feminism in Extremis (1902)

"What does the woman's-rights movement demand? Female privilege, and when possible, female domination. It asks that women shall have all the rights of men with privileges thrown in (but no disagreeable duties, oh dear no!), and apparently be subject to no discipline but that of their own arbitrary wills. To exclude women on the ground of incapacity from any honourable, lucrative, or agreeable social function whatever, is a hideous injustice to be fulminated against from platform and in press – to treat them on the same footing as men in the matter of subordination to organised control or discipline is not to be thought of – is ungentlemanly ungallant, unchivalrous! … Advanced women and their male supporters in demanding all that is lucrative, honourable, and agreeable in the position of men take their stand on the dogma of sex-equality. No sooner, however, is the question one of disagreeable duties than "equality" goes by the board and they slink behind the old sex-immunity."

The "Monstrous Regiment" of Womanhood (1907)

"From all we have said, it will now be evident, one would think, to the most prejudiced reader that modern English Law, following obsequiously a deluded or apathetic stage of public opinion, has solved the problem of the division of rights and duties between the sexes, by conceding to woman all rights, and imposing on man all duties."
The Legal Subjection of Men, Chapter IX: A Sex Noblesse (1908)

"This public opinion regards it as axiomatic that women are capable of everything men are capable of, that they ought to have full responsibility in all honourable and lucrative functions and callings. There is only one thing for which unlimited allowance ought to be made on the ground of their otherwise non-existent womanly inferiority, and that is their own criminal or tortious acts! In a word, they are not to be held responsible, in the sense that men are, for their own actions when these entail unpleasant consequences for themselves. On the contrary, the obloquy and, where possible, the penalty for the wrong-doing is to be shifted on to the nearest wretched man with whom they have consorted."
Why I Am an Anti-Suffragist (1909)

"From being part of a general code of manners enjoined upon a particular guild or profession it has been degraded to mean the exclusive right in one sex guaranteed by law and custom to certain advantages and exemptions with- out any corresponding responsibility."
The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter V: The "Chivalry" Fake (1913)

"Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking."
The Fraud of Feminism, Chapter VII: The Psychology of the Movement (1913)

The Protocols of the Elders of the Patriarchy

February 21, 2024 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

---

“They” control all the wars, the media, the banking system. “They” don’t want you to know that they, through their web of power, pull all the strings. From the highest positions of power, through global domination, nothing goes on without their permission. You already know who I’m talking about, don’t you? Our oppressors!

Men!

Don’t call me crazy, that’s just what they want you to do, that’s how they oppress us!

Sounds familiar, doesn’t it? The Protocols of the Learned Elders of Zion is an anti-Semitic conspiracy theory, debunked a million times over that conspiracy wing-nuts keep rehashing. Similarly, “The Patriarchy” is an anti-male conspiracy. Likewise a million times debunked, that conspiracy wing-nuts also keep rehashing. Replace what you may have heard from a conspiracy theorist and substitute, Illuminati, Reptilians or Zionist for Men and bingo, you’re a feminist.

If you’ve ever met a die-hard conspiracy theorist, you may have thought that pointing out a few things that would debunk the theory might disabuse them of their paranoia. Yet, reason is rebuffed in favor of ad hoc explanations. This is because the conspiracy theorist sees through tunnel vision, cherry picks supporting data and discards what doesn’t fit their conspiracy. It does no good to argue with them. You’ll feel like wanting to bang your head against the wall, or worse, they’ll point their finger at you and start weaving you into their delusion.

For example, a person who believes “The Patriarchy” is patriarching them in their brain, might point to the fact that women are raped as proof of “The Patriarchy.” If you point out that men are raped much more often than women; more often molested as children, raped in prison, and countless males mutilated within days of being born, that’s slides right off their back. They already have a male rape apologetic ready to go for rape “against you people.” You see, they start weaving you into their delusion. “You people had it coming” because Patriarchy.

Patriarchy means there is always a man to blame. We draft our men by the millions to be slaves of war and die torturous deaths? “But that’s men fighting other men!” We might be quick to point out that they had no choice but to fight. “Yeah, but it’s men that sent them!” The anti-male conspiracy theorist often has the gendercide apologetics well rehearsed. We see that at every level, every atrocity that we see: Because of Patriarchy, there is always a man to blame, and that justifies the hatred of men and indifference to their suffering.

Let’s imagine this, just for our own illustrations. A conspiracy theorist would go into a psychotic break if you explained it this way, but just for a moment imagine some women mud wrestling. Now, this isn’t the best example, because they aren’t forced under law to mud wrestle, but it is women against women. Would the anti-male conspiracy theorist be okay with this being explained by “But it’s women against women!”

Of course not, because Patriarchy! There’s always a man to blame. Someone, some man is making money off of it. Oh, the money goes only to the mud wrestlers? “Well, they are wrestling for the men!” Just like the men dying in war are motivated to die for the women? To the anti-male conspiracy theorist, just keep going up a level until you find a man to blame.

Men constitute the majority of victims of almost all social ills; rape, murder, genital mutilation, sexual torture, suicide, assault, workplace deaths, drug abuse, depression.. That’s by no means exhaustive. All an anti-male bigot has to say is “Patriarchy” and then these transform from social ills to just desserts.

I would be remiss if I didn’t touch on a funny side to the anti-male conspiracy theories: The odd remedies to thwart or “Smash the Patriarchy.” The problem of “The Patriarchy” is simple: there’s a worldwide conspiracy of men to blame for everything. The solution is where the clearest insanity is brought out. The deluded solutions include dressing up as vaginas, smearing period blood all over their faces, shouting down church services with topless protests, and how can we forget hashtag activism like #KillAllMen.

We really can’t reach the conspiracy theorists already swallowed up by hateful anti-male bigotry. Though we can help change the culture of hate and indifference towards men. Instead of a blame-a-man attitude, we can point out when a man needs help and help him when no one else will. Men matter, men’s lives matter, their rights matter. We can remind people that men are good, men are human beings with feelings, rights and their own struggles, with issues that matter.

Is Feminism Non-Violent?

February 22, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

There are many schools of thought concerning revolution, how it works, and how to make it work better. I will discuss two of these, because I put them ahead of anything else you might say upon that subject.

First, consider Malcolm X, who famously remarked that “there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution”. He was right. Any revolution at all requires violence in the form of violation, meaning a discontinuity which violates a system of understanding or authority.

Discontinuity is the operative term because it implies a sudden change of state. First you are A, then all at once you are B. There is nothing seamless in the transition from A to B, and that’s what revolution is all about. To arrive at B, you must violate A.

Any revolution worth the name involves, more or less, a paradigm shift from A to B. More to the point, a revolution violates a paradigm by breaking out of it. For example, the American revolution violated the paradigm of the British Empire by breaking out of it.

So how do you break out of a paradigm? The same way you break out of anything else — by breaking something! And it is violent to break things, is it not?

I admit that Malcolm X could have meant “violence” as a layman would understand it, meaning down-and-dirty physical violence or the threat of such. If nothing else, a confrontation where voices are raised, emotions run high, and somebody finally backs off. So as you might conclude, “violence” covers quite a spectrum — but it always has something to do with violation.

Next, consider Gandhi, the apostle of non-violence who certainly tried his hand at revolution, although he did this too soon to benefit from Malcolm X’s 1963 wisdom. Gandhi faced his share of violence, and violence finally ended his life. Yet he did pull India out of the British Empire by violating the paradigm of that empire. I think it is safe to call this a revolution.

But again, Malcolm X was right — there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution. Not only are establishments notorious for never giving up their power without a fight, but revolution would not be revolution in the first place if the element of violation went missing.

All revolution is violative. You must break eggs to make omelettes.

How did Gandhi make his revolution happen non-violently? The answer is that he didn’t, or at any rate, not precisely. Let’s look again at Malcolm X’s precept. He says there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution, but what are we entitled to conclude from this? I would say, only that no revolution can occur without the admixture of violence somewhere along its timeline.

However, that says nothing about the source of the violence. It does not stipulate that the dissidents should be violent against the establishment, only that violence should occur somewhere in the mix of events. So it could just as well be the establishment cracking down on the dissidents – that too would count as violence, and would stamp the character of violence upon the revolutionary process.

The non-feminist revolution, like any other revolution, will entail violence because it will entail violation. The ruling cultural paradigm, that of feminism, is to be booted out of our lives on non-feminist authority — and that surely violates intellectual protocol, if nothing else. Those on the receiving end (the feminists themselves) will feel this as a wrenching change — rather like a quantum jump, owing to its discontinuity.

Events at the University of Toronto, in Canada, have been revealing. On three separate occasions, speakers were scheduled to give public lectures on matters pro-male or critical of the feminist establishment. Each time, anti-male crowds greeted the event with behavior that could be described as violent. Their purpose was manifestly political: to block open expression, within the academic community, of ideas that could undermine the accepted foundation of intellectual authority within that community.

Simply put, Toronto was a turf war. The anti-male rioters perfectly understood the critical nature of the conflict. They of course understood the symbolic significance of the occasion. But further, they knew that if the non-feminist side could proselytize unmolested in what they (the rioters) consider “their” territory, it would be a game changer, signalling that the non-feminist side has gained institutional legitimation.

So the anti-male rioters were repelling an attack upon their shore, preventing the enemy from gaining a beachhead that would ease the way to incursions further inland. Their naked fear was evident.

The greatly outnumbered non-feminist group acted with coolness, and did credit to itself. Nothing in their comportment hinted at physical violence. And yet, a rarified form of violence — a purely cerebral kind — was at least implicit. It may have lacked noise, blunt force or other such drama, but it was profoundly violative. A paradigm was openly challenged, and the enormity of this challenge was not lost upon the challenged. It provoked a wildly outlandish reaction from them because they felt violated.

What prompted all the fuss and feathers? A pair of staid middle-aged writers were making a speech about a serious social problem, namely misandry: the pervasive hatred of men and maleness in the culture at large.

Now surely we ought to look into something like that, and if possible, remedy it. I would certainly think so. Furthermore, I would salute the authors, Nathanson and Young, for their active moral conscience, and I would encourage them to give public lectures every chance they get.

But as we have seen, it is no easy thing to make an openly pro-male speech on a college campus. Many people in those settings simply do not want the possible reality of misandry to be referenced in any way, and if you attempt this they will try to shut you up by force.

In other words, by violence. They hate to be told that man-hating exists at all: their screaming paroxysms and their ‘Lord of the Flies’ stick-poundings bore witness to this.

The anti-male “Femistasi” group in Vancouver was whipped into a similar rage by the statement that men’s rights are human rights. Evidently they don’t approve of human rights for half the population, and the bare idea of such a thing makes them rabidly angry.

Friends, it looks like we are on the side of Ralph and Piggy. That’s the sort of revolutionaries we are.

So again, revolution is a violent process, meaning that violation is involved at every level.

First comes the violence of intellectual audacity needed to break out of a paradigm.

Next, any violence meted out by defenders of that paradigm.

Finally, any violence meted out by the attackers of the paradigm in response to the defenders.

Such is our template of revolution as extrapolated from Malcolm X, and it is a true vision. It comports with the facts of the world.

Malcolm X stated the facts, but Gandhi astutely put them to work. He apparently understood that violence in a raw, dramatic form comes at a cost because it can easily make you look like the bad guy. He also apparently understood that abstention from violence virtually never makes you look like the bad guy. He understood that if you confine your violence to only the most rarified forms of violation, you would drive your opponent into an untenable position — to either inflict raw, dramatic violence at the risk of discrediting himself, or to do nothing at all and leave you free to move your plans forward unmolested.

Gandhi’s method, if ideally practiced, is the miniscule violence of a pinprick which ends the life of a balloon: the main violence is the loud bang that follows!

So the principle holds true that no revolution happens without some manner of violence or violation. Feminism, with its genius for playing the victim, seems to have imbibed the spirit of Gandhi in a perverted way. A feminist will use every trick in the book to invert the narrative in feminism’s favor, either provoking actual violence from the opposition or elaborately lying about it.

Such is the art of the threat narrative, and the feminists are past masters of this art.

I think our best plan is to out-Gandhi the feminists. In principle, this is not difficult. We have seen how morbidly sensitive they are, when any threat to their paradigm looms on the horizon. That is when they “lose it”, and do unwise things, and make fools of themselves.

And this happens right readily, for the tree of feminist folly is heavy with fruit and need only be shaken. A threat to their paradigm, even a subtle one, is a pinch they will keenly feel — and keen too, will be their reaction.

Thus far, their reaction has consisted of yelling, pounding, ripping, lying and journalistic smearing. These operations attain a certain point on the violence spectrum, though not, I grant you, the utmost. But as matters predictably escalate, so too will the level of feminist violence.

Such is the nature of revolution. We ought to be on the lookout for this, and what's more, we ought to be careful that none of wildly exaggerated violence comes from our side.

Let THEM be the violent ones — that is, let them be the ones who look like the bad guys. They have already damaged themselves plenty, by their behavior, and we know that if we only push their buttons in the right combinations, they'll repeat the performance. They can barely restrain themselves, and not for long.

If the anti-male rioters had been wise, they would have stayed home and let the scheduled events take place in peace. But they were not wise, so they gave the non-feminist side valuable publicity while giving themselves horrendous publicity.

Of course, they were in a bind and they knew it, for if they had stayed home they would have symbolically surrendered the field and admitted the right of non-feminist groups to operate on "their" campus. They knew they had to make a gesture of some kind and so they did, but they made a hash of it and discredited themselves. In the end, they showed the world exactly how much they detested the idea of male human rights.

A word to our side. All who see themselves as part of the pro-male, non-feminist vanguard should openly endorse the principle of non-violence, and reiterate this in a way that the broader public will undoubtedly hear it. And when you form a non-feminist co-movement of any kind, you should state this principle near the top of your manifesto. Nail that manifesto to the wall, so you need only point to it and say: "THAT, right there! That is what we stand for!"

We should repudiate all physical violence apart from what self-defense requires, and we should stand quietly with our arms folded while the other side comes slowly to a boil. Let the world bear witness to this. If there is no such thing as a non-violent revolution, then let theirs be raw, dramatic violence, and let ours be merely intellectual violation that we direct against the feminist establishment and its cultural paradigm.

From such a strategy we can only gain, and they can only lose.

Dr. Randomercam Interviews David Futrelle

February 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The interview you thought you'd never see!

Is this where I mention that he's not really talking to Futrelle?

Crashing the gates: the Non-Feminist invasion of Feminist mindspace

February 25, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

At the heart of the non-feminist revolution lies the project to take back control of the cultural narrative from feminism. We call this project the battle for feminism's soul.

To take control of the narrative means, among other things, to shove a completely new conceptual reality into the feminist mindspace with no prior explanation or preparation. For them, it would be like walking into a movie halfway through — although that comparison hardly does justice to the radical nature of what we are proposing.

The point is, that they have had more than enough time to tell the rest of the world what "reality" is. The time has come for them to shut up and experience life on the receiving end. It is now their turn to wonder what in heaven's name is going on, and be impolitely told to "get with the program."

The treatment that we would dish out differs little from how they have treated the rest of the world for half a century. Henceforth, every settled notion of theirs will be jostled in the common marketplace of ideas like it was just any old thing. They will be critiqued, problematized, made light of, or best of all ignored when they try to express themselves. No more epistemic privilege of any kind, and no more pampering of their aesthetic sensibilities or lexical conventions. Thuswise they shall fare. They will lick it up, and they will like it.

We advocate this as a policy, consistent with the doctrine of post-argumentalism. Post-argumentalism proposes that argument or debate has no primacy among the methods we might use to move our project forward. Post-argumentalism further proposes that argument or debate, although useful in combination with other methods, is by no means imperative to the realization of our ends.

For in the end, we are not obligated to argue with a bully, a tyrant, or a lunatic. We do not delude ourselves that if we craft our words well enough the bully, tyrant or lunatic will suddenly understand us, admit that we are right, and begin to act differently. That realization is a truth which sets us free. So we are free to block their power unceremoniously, by walking away from argument altogether and moving ahead with our plans.

Those who specialize in argument, debate or explanation are certainly free to set up shop doing what they do best, according to their several areas of expertise. It is not good to waste any natural talent you might possess. But we have understood that argument or debate are not the main engine that will press matters forward. Recruitment, networking and mobilization will do that, independently of whether our enemy is persuaded or unpersuaded.

Very well. We have drawn our conclusions, and we claim the right to state them freely and to assume that others are up to speed about what we are saying. We cannot be bothered to attach a full explanatory essay to every word or concept, every time we use it, in our spoken or written communication. So in true post-argumental fashion, we do not argue the merit of our discourse by explaining it.

We must assume that our foundational ideas have been sufficiently established by an accumulated history of explanation, and that adversaries will make some effort to learn the basics before they converse with us. We must assume that the laborious work of establishing our ground of meaning has been concluded, and that we may now discourse with that agreeable speed which is properly the life of conversation.

So any feminist on earth must either sink or swim in the ocean of ideas that we will generate. If we graciously stop to explain, it is more than our duty requires, and gratitude is in order. But we won't slow down for them, and we will unleash a torrent of new jargons, new concepts and new frames of reference that will leave them mentally adrift and bewildered, as if the ground had been ripped from under their feet without warning and they were suddenly bobbing in zero gravity with no idea of up or down any more.

No doubt they will find this disturbing, and will experience something like culture shock when they realize that their reactions are not automatically shared, and that people not only don't know what the hell they are talking about, but are rudely telling them so!

Such is the non-feminist invasion of feminist mindspace.

Feminist ideology has been broken to the ranks, and must share the stage with everybody else. Nothing about the customary feminist discourse will be shown any deference, any leniency or any right of way through any discussion whatsoever. Feminism does not "own the conversation," and accordingly does not set the rules for any conversation where non-feminist participants are present.

Granted, where none but feminists are present it may be said that they are "in the feminist clubhouse," and may order the conversation as they see fit. But in the forum of humanity, it behooves them to embrace a more cosmopolitan outlook and "do as the Romans do."

More and more, feminism's realm of thought and discourse will implode, and it will be as if the floodwaters were breaking through the barriers from every direction, sweeping away every vestige of narrative privilege they have ever enjoyed and placing them on a footing of conversational "equality" with any male rights agitator, or any non-feminist Joe and Sally, they happen to encounter.

They can barricade themselves in the towers of academia for a while, but in the end the towers too will crumble and be swept away, and they will have no choice but walk through the world to the beat of a timeless drummer whom they can no longer ignore. Either that, or go crazy and do something stupid.

So . . I would prepare for that day, if I were them.

I really would do that. . . . if I were them.

The cover image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Barry Williams OAM

February 26, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

---

It is with sadness that we advise that Barry Williams OAM, former president of the Lone Fathers Association, passed away several days ago. Barry was tireless in advocating for the rights of fathers in Australia.

As a lone father of four children Barry became acutely aware of the lack of support that fathers were receiving. In 1972 Barry founded a chapter of the Lone Fathers Association in the Australian Capital Territory. He went on to advocate for the rights of fathers for decades.

Barry contributed to legislative reform and was ultimately recognised for his efforts with the medal of the Order of Australia. This allowed him to use the post-nominal letters OAM.

Barry attended and briefly spoke at ICMI17.

I spoke to Barry a number of times over the years and had the opportunity to get to know him a little better during ICMI17.

Barry will be missed.

The featured image depicts Barry in 1977.

Sex Equality: Defining One's Terms – The Men's Review (1948 Article)

February 27, 2024 | by Mens Review | Link | Original Link

We continue the series of Men's Review excerpts below with this piece exploring the meaning of 'sex equality'. – PW

* * *

Defining One's Terms

by C. Lea

THERE is a type of propagandist who finds it convenient to avoid defining his terms. He can thus vary the sense when and how it best suits him. He is not tied down to any particular interpretation.

The phrase "sex equality" is often used in this convenient and undefined way. On the one hand they denounce sex discrimination and deny sex difference favourable to men as contrary to the doctrine of sex equality. On the other hand, they regard sex discrimination or sex difference favourable to women as perfectly consistent with that doctrine.

Special rights, privileges and exemptions in favour of women are taken as a matter of course by people who hotly resent the least sex discrimination in favour of men.

Feminine superiorities, real or imaginary, are pushed down our throats by those who would indignantly deny the possibility in favour of men. These partisans readily discover arguments or evidence in support of their claims advantageous to women. They may justify special rights for women on the score of their special functions AS women, however they would, on the other hand, refuse to accept special rights for men on the same grounds.

Logically it is obvious that a series of one-sided feminine advantages cannot possibly give sex equality. Only a balance of masculine and feminine advantages can give real equality. The upholders of the system of one-sided feminine advantage continue to label it "equality," while stigmatising as "inequality" any compensatory masculine advantage.

The time is come for us to challenge the offenders of this intellectual dishonesty to give clear, logical definition of exactly what they mean by "sex equality."

SEX EQUALITY IN MARRIAGE

It is believed by many that in some mysterious and unexplained way the law favours the husband in marriage. It is difficult to fathom how anyone can have this view, since the man is under compulsion to perform most of his duties, while the woman can repudiate many of hers with impunity.

A husband must support his wife or be dealt with by a maintenance or separation order. A man cannot escape a distasteful marriage without heavy financial burdens. A woman who finds marriage distasteful can leave it, earn her own living and extract a maintenance from her husband.

It may be argued that while the husband of a bad wife has far less legal remedy than the wife of a bad husband, the wife who fulfils her side of the bargain has a harder position than her husband, but this does not mean that the law presses more hardy on the wife in such a case, it means that, to her credit, the wife concerned does her duty, and more than her duty without legal compulsion.

MEN'S REVIEW

A CHALLENGE TO MEN

DEFINING ONE'S TERMS

Toil and Trouble – Thoughts on Two Gynocentric Demands on Men

February 28, 2024 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Although what you are about to read is not actually an analysis of the Three Witches of Shakespeare's MacBeth, the general meaning of a part of their famous incantation "Double double, toil and trouble" is just as it sounds: the intent to cause toils and troubles for humankind for the sake of causing them. Perhaps it is apt to use the Three Witches as an analogy for those that demand and expect toil and trouble…in particular for malekind. It is worth seriously contemplating whether women of gynocentric society wish to see more trouble in the form of men's chivalric self-abnegating behavior, and toil for men as a way of life. Here are some thoughts on these two kinds of demands on men.

"I Would Die For You": The Male Expendability Kink

Whenever we see men in the business of saving lives, the praises of these men tend to have a common denominator: hooray for men risking their lives and well-being. These men, sometimes even boys, end up damaged in the process of performing their given heroic act. More than enough of them die. News of such occurrences make women who profess to long for the gender roles of old gush and fawn for these men willing to offer their lives. Men who invest a lot in what women think of them follow suit by saying this is what manhood is about and declares "not men" those who would dare to complain about this role they are placed in.

Just as a thought experiment, what if a man devised a way to save more and more lives while rendering the necessity of risk to the rescuer negligible or completely obsolete? Call me crazy, but I'll bet that the fawning will subside. In fact, I would dare say that it is not the wonderful act of saving a life that these women are grateful for, or these ever-chivalrous men want to measure up to. What they profess to be grateful for is rather the willingness for the man to be of service and self-expense for the good of our gynocentric society. When a man is expended or put in a position where he may be expended, it is a sensation for those who believe in the so-called traditional gender roles. If a man doesn't, it doesn't matter then if he did engage in a life-saving act; self-preservation is seen as cowardly and unmasculine. Whether it is a neotraditional or a feminist society, the standard for men and masculinity is based on the altruism of men on women's behalf. I will note that altruism is not compassion, but the act of living for the sake of the designated others. For some reason, this is seen as virtuous.

Whereas a feminist society upholds abnegation of masculinity as an end in itself in practice, gynocentric neo-traditionalism claims to esteem masculinity only where men are prepared to die in service towards the feminine ends. Women in the latter category appear to behave as though this the chief sexual and relational appeal of men, often more so than the well-known attraction to "loaded" financially successful men. In fact, if these two masculine "virtues" are combined, then ultimately it means she inherits the money of the dead husband, and she is all set.

How many times have we heard stories in which a woman or girl fantasizes about a crush, love interest, or ideal partner and the magic phrase uttered by the man to express his love to her is “I would die for you” or something to that effect? Preparedness to die is presented as a criteria for a male object of romance, it seems.

Why is a woman enamored with the idea of a man wanting to die for her? Granted, it is dangerous enough for the man to profess to live for her as that is a gynocentric folly in itself, but that’s beside the point here. In human history, we have not appropriately questioned the societal romanticizing of self-sacrifice and the worship of death, especially that of men. Women act consistently as if they are attracted to the male act of self-destruction, as it serves their ends. Why are women appreciative that someone dies for them? Why is anyone thankful instead of horrified?

Anti-Automation: For Male Jobs, or Male Toil?

Now, to switch gears quite a bit, let’s talk about automation and men’s work.

Everything mentioned thus far can apply to the idea of male toil and labor as well. How many times have we heard that automation is killing men’s jobs, as is the advent of artificial intelligence? Are those that profess to be on the side of men really expressing concern about men’s income, or are they after something else?

Well perhaps the women may have some investment in men’s income, especially since men’s income too often becomes women’s income if the man isn’t smart enough. What I really want to address here however is the fear of automation, and how some allege that automation is a men’s issue.

Automation is all about the development and usage of technology to aid in life so we can earn the space and time to self-actualize. Automation is devised largely by men; this means that to attack automation is to attack the hard work of these men in the information age. Automation can liberate men from unnecessary toil and allow men to accomplish tasks more efficiently; this means that it is of great value to men as they can do tasks better, and save room for whatever the next frontier might be. To attack automation is to want men to toil; it is to want men to set aside any desire to self-actualize and instead labor for the sake of laboring. Sadly, too many men can’t seem to define themselves as men without this canned distinction brought to you by the “fairer sex.”

Oh, I’m not saying that the abuse of automation and artificial intelligence by the powers-that-be isn’t a genuine issue. I’m not saying you should take technology for granted and not be cautious. However, that is a discussion for another time and is certainly not specific to men’s issues.

When automation is presented as a problem (leading to the destruction of men’s jobs, and so forth), what can the response be except for calling for a return to labor with decreased level of technology and tools, thereby ensuring more toil? These doomsayers forget that automation actually creates jobs, perhaps way more than it destroys. That is what is meant by the next frontier. Or should they just admit that all they want to do is to make men go back to their vision of “traditional” masculinity again, in which they are simply a laboring class?

And on top of all this, what’s more masculine than tools and gadgetry?? What’s so unmasculine about a sense of tinkering to make something creative that actually lightens the load and speeds things up? Invention is what I wholeheartedly call a masculine virtue. It ironically smashes traditions, though it can set the stage for new ones, until they get smashed! Also, I doubt automation will keep us from wanting to enjoy the great outdoors and play sports if we desire to, so no need to fear and bellyache about that in my opinion.

Women have vastly benefitted from automation as well. I suspect that some of the women fearmongering about automation don’t expect the convenience of their own lives to decrease if all that nice automation would be reverted somehow. I guess we all know who picks up the slack here.

Furthermore, if you think harder on the subject of male toil, you would also realize that this just as well has to do with the idea of the female disgust for the “idle man”: a male, who in the female’s eyes, isn’t doing anything. The solution, according to her amounts to “Men: work, work, work!” The fear of automation is the fear of the non-toiling man.

What Do You Really Want Out of Men?

This has been a set of premises put together in one stream of thought that asks the question of what do the women and men of gynocentric society actually love about men, and what do they even think their place is. I hate to sound cynical, but it does seem to me that these women have a fetish for the male intent on disposing himself, or else working and laboring, all for her as the woman, that royal class. I think we could stand to be a bit disturbed by this. It all resembles a desire on the part of the women of gynocentric society to just see men perform for their amusement. And who are the classic collective archetype of those that want to cause all this toil and trouble for their enjoyment? The Weird Sisters, or the Three Witches.

I think it would be an interesting experiment to see in action, to respond appropriately to gynocentrists who fawn over men’s physical damage and those that voice disapproval of men they refer to as idle, that is, not toiling and getting into life-threatening trouble. Just imagine these neo-traditionalists chanting “Double double, toil and trouble” and giving a shrill cackle of amusement.

In closing, I dare say that it has even got to the point that so many of us don’t know what love and appreciation for men for being men even looks like, and we can’t even describe it without resorting to the tired buzzwords such as labor, service, protect, provide, self-sacrifice and others that speak only of men’s utility and not as an entity to be valued in himself. So what do women really want out of men anyway, after all is said and done? Are men lovable because they’d die for these women? Are they valuable because they’d work to the ends of the earth do whatever Princess wants? Do the scars on a man’s body and face make him more sexy and exciting for women? The implications are worse than anyone can imagine if the answers are “Yes.”

1 in 4 women admit to violence in relationships

February 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Tom Golden with a stellar breakdown of how research results are narrowed and skewed to achieve an ideologically favorable outcome, particular for media consumption.

Mary, Jane, Mary, Elizabeth, Joan and Catherine

March 1, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The 16th century was a time of powerful female rulers in Western Europe. Queen Elizabeth ruled for what amounts to the second half of the 16th century. She was no figurehead either. She was the absolute ruler of England and Ireland (Britain would not arise as a state until generations later). Legally she was a 'Queen Regnant', meaning that she ruled in her own right and was not a 'Queen Consort' who is generally the wife of a King.

While it is true that English practiced Male-preference primogeniture (preferencing inheritance by the first born son over other sons and all daughters) this did not stop many women inheriting and retaining thrones in their own right around this time.

Elizabeth I is well known throughout the English speaking world and is generally remembered as an effective leader who reformed the English state and built up a strong navy in the face of external military threats. Others show that while the early years of her reign were generally prosperous this was not so later on. What all of these sources agree on was that Elizabeth was the queen in her own right. The decisions made were made by her. It should be clear from this that she was the leader of the English and Irish states.

What is generally not as well known is that there were several contemporary female monarchs in the British Isles. Immediately proceeding Elizabeth I as Queen of England and Ireland was Queen Mary I, her half sister. Queen Mary I is also known as 'Bloody Mary' as she had a habit of ordering the death of her subjects (usually by burning at the stake) when they didn't agree with her religious views. Mary I didn't reign for long (thankfully, given her penchant for violence) but was every bit as much in charge of England and Ireland as Elizabeth would be after her. Each effectively changed the national religion (Christian denomination) while reigning.

It is worth noting that Mary I's main competition for control of England and Ireland was another woman – Lady Jane Grey. In the end Mary made sure that Jane's head ended up rolling around in a basket rather than wearing a crown.

When Mary I married the terms of the marriage contract made her and her foreign husband joint rulers of England. He could not act without her consent. It is clear that the English nobility trusted an English woman to rule more than a foreign man. Nationality trumps gender. When Mary died in 1558 the crown did not remain with her foreign husband but rather went to her English half sister Elizabeth I. Patriarchy indeed.

To the north of England was Scotland, which was ruled by a Queen Regnant from 1542 to 1567. She is generally known as Mary Queen of Scots in English, probably to distinguish her from Mary I who was her contemporary. Her rule of Scotland overlaps that of both Mary I and Elizabeth I. The entirety of the British Isles was ruled over by female monarchs from 1553 to 1567. This period would likely have gone on much longer except that Elizabeth imprisoned and eventually executed Mary Queen of Scots after she fled south seeking Elizabeth's protection. Elizabeth apparently viewed Mary Queen of Scots as a potential rival since Mary was her niece. Mary Queen of Scots was fleeing south to England as she was suspected, then and now, of being a tacit accomplice in the brutal murder of her second husband.

Mary Queen of Scots was an absentee monarch during her early life, having spent her youth in France. Scotland was left in the hands of another woman, her mother, Mary of Guise.

So during this period we had Lady Jane Grey, Mary I, Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots vying for power across the British Isles.

While Mary I's husband was in England yet another woman, Joan of Austria (1535-1573) was regent in Spain. Joan's minor son ascended to the throne of Portugal and it was his grandmother, Catherine of Austria (1507-1578) who became regent there.

It should be clear that this was no patriarchy. These women were no ones puppets – those that were successful ruled over England, Scotland, Ireland, Spain and Portugal as ruthlessly and authoritatively as any male ruler. They also demonstrated that they were quite prepared to order the torture and execution of their enemies or those they perceived as enemies. These historical events and others that occurred in many other parts of the world throughout history demonstrate that these women were not helpless pawns of the patriarchy. They were powerful monarchs and in a very real sense, they were the law in their respective countries.

The Death Of The Girlboss?

March 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Everyday Hatred of Men: Hegemonic Masculinity

March 3, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 33 – Why Gad Saad Thinks You're An Imbecile

March 4, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Feminist Scream Singing

March 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

A bit of a distraction for your entertainment, here are the Feminist Sirens from Belgium.

Google’s Gemini Catastrophe: Wake-Up Call for Woke Tech?

March 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Time to throw the baby out with the bathwater

March 6, 2024 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

A friend once suggested that when it comes to marital discord couples fight more over one issue: who is going to play the child in the relationship and who is going to play the responsible parent.

His comment rings true on its face, with men historically being the ones who take on the parental role in marriage. It's witnessed in the centuries of men taking responsibility for the financial and other security concerns of wives, and also hinted at in the relationship age gap. Males marry younger females — not to control their sexuality (as we are frequently misled to believe), but because women seek an older male to place in the responsible, paternal role, to enhance the child theme they intend to play out in the relationship.

Women collectively spend billions annually to neotenize their appearance, enhancing their efforts to assume the infantilized role.

We see the same theme appear in our language when men are shamed for being 'Peter Pans' or 'man babies' along with the injunction to 'man-up' — which has no counterpart for women; they are phrases intended to jolt men out of any inclination to regress to a childlike state of dependency. Never do we hear women being chastised as immature Wendys, woman babies, nor do we ever hit them with the demand to 'woman-up.'

To be fair we may see the occasional man playing a full-time child to his female partner, and we can say that all men experience occasional moments of regression to boyhood in their relationships. However, society frowns upon men indulging too much of the child within. And such indulgence is roundly met with sexual rejection by women. The child role is reserved exclusively for women within the relationship context.

The stresses that this dynamic places on relationships and especially on men cannot be overstated; the catering to a child within an adult's body is exhausting and ultimately demeaning to both the infantilized woman and the parentified man. Standardizing childishness in one partner and hyperagency in the other prohibits any sort of relationship between adult peers. Instead, it breeds contempt and conflict.

The structure of this type of arrangement ultimately results in an assured relationship killer. Hostile dependency. It is impossible for the infantilized partner to maintain respect for, or a healthy emotional connection to, her chief enabler. And it is impossible for the chief enabler to maintain respect or a healthy emotional connection to what amounts to a financial, emotional and familial parasite. Self-respect in both parties is also a casualty of this arrangement.

Before getting more into the dynamics posed by this dysfunctional relationship, we'd like to elaborate a bit more on the concept of the adult child which is something quite different from the literal child we look after when they are small. The 'child' is also one of the fundaments of the human psyche, operating equally in biologically mature adults and in children, thus the popular qualifier of 'the inner child.'

The great 20th century psychologist Carl Jung wrote a paper on the inner child, or what he preferred to call the child archetype,[1] where he outlined its main psychological features which include 1. growth toward independence, 2. vulnerability, and 3. a state of innocence.

1. Growth toward independence (but never reached)

This aspect of the child archetype is concerned with futurity, and is captured in the phrase 'what I want to be when I grow up.' It reflects the ongoing state of becoming without ever arriving at the destination – it remains an eternal child. In this respect the child archetype differs from the archetype of development, a more heroic path that does eventually culminate in mature autonomy and self-reliance.

The ambition for perpetuated childhood, as we commonly see in modern women (and enabled by men), is the inevitable outcome of the child archetype. As men and women collude to remove the destination of adult autonomy from the life-map, they effectively kill the hero archetype of Jung's writing, the hero of true potential. And they give birth to the child of static permanency. Individuals dominated by the child archetype will always position themselves as eternally incapable of personal agency, even relying on the chief enabler to help fabricate a web of denial about their true nature.

This is reflected in the spiritual, financial, or relationship 'growth' workshops attended largely by women, who appear to pursue adult goals but who are in reality only participating in a charade. The true goal is more dependency and more childhood. These pursuits are often funded through the hard labor of the hopelessly paternalized male.

We also see this acted out in the psychodrama of the modern housewife, "taking charge" of such matters of household finances and other matters of home and hearth, without any responsibility for creating wealth, taking the risks that come with those efforts, or any other matter of real consequence. The perpetuated child chooses the colors but cannot buy the paint or climb the scaffold with brush in hand.

2. Vulnerability

Vulnerability is one of the main guises of the child, and so the woman dominated by this archetype is constantly signalling threats to herself from the surrounding environment. She is in danger of getting lost, hurt, abandoned and frightened, and just like the child of fairy tales she projects herself as lost in the woods with snarling bears and wolves, or afloat on the river Nile in a flimsy basket where she is in danger of getting lost or going under.

She is "at risk" at all times, including the risk of exposure to her chief enabler's frustrations or his wishes for her to realize adulthood.

The vulnerable, permanent child, communicates with the wider world through these threat narratives[2] which most everyone is familiar with through the archetypal damsel in distress — tied to the railway tracks, the locomotive of adult agency barreling down on her, or being held prisoner by a dragon from which she must be freed by your parental,

sacrificial rescue.

3. Innocence

The child's way of defending its perpetual dependency is to project its innocence: "I don't know", "I didn't realize", "I didn't mean anything", "It just happened", "I got carried away by my feelings." Yes, her own emotions can be the villain in her threat narrative. And the understanding of a hyper-responsible male is required to save her from it. Because she claims ignorance she divests herself of all responsibility for what happens, leaving others to pick up the tab – most likely her male partner if she has one.

We see this even in women's general predisposition to gravitate toward victim politics, supporting male candidates who offer enabling paternalism from the state, and the vision of woman as perpetually in distress.

Moving on from Jung, perhaps the best conceptualization of the child archetype comes from Eric Berne, whose transactional analysis shows three possible relationship dynamics:

- Child relating to a parent
- Parent relating to a child
- An adult relating to another adult.

The first of these – child to parent – encompasses all that we've said so far about the child archetype and its exploitative style of relating with others. The second – parent to child – represents the parental relationship to a child. And the last one – adult to adult – represents a healthier mode of conducting relationships based on steering a middle path between the more extreme demands of both parent and child. This latter is where we might hope to be along with anyone we might choose for pair bonding.

The perpetual child, however, demands that the default relationship setting be parent to child, an emotionally incestuous arrangement that affords some comfort to the irresponsible child, but that does so at the expense of a healthy adult connection.

Eventually, and we think invariably, this results in the parentified male viewing the infantilized female as inept, incapable and deserving of pity over respect. It can also breed a lot of anger that goes both ways, from the frustrated, overburdened male, and the dependent, irresponsible female whose life is a constant reminder of her lack of meaning.

The parental brain

Juvenile characteristics have long been known to evoke in caretakers a neurological state known as the parental brain. Children's faces and various other child gestures provoke hormonal changes that prime parents to be more sensitive towards infant cues and needs, resulting in nurturance, caretaking and protectiveness.

Adult women who learn to mimic child features through cosmetics, and the feigning of childlike behaviors of innocence and vulnerability, evoke in their male partners a very similar parental response. Like parents of literal infants men can be seen to respond with care-taking and protection, and if women are skilled at peppering the routine with threat-narratives she gains the ability to prompt him like a philharmonic concert conductor. Such is the obedient, reflexive state of readiness to rescue that defines the lives of so many men.

Readers here are no doubt familiar with this charade being played out between men and women, one which was not lost on Esther Vilar when she gave a sardonic description of it in her 1971 book The Manipulated Man. There she writes:

> Woman's greatest ideal is a life without work or responsibility – yet who leads such a life but a child? A child with appealing eyes, a funny little body with dimples and sweet layers of baby fat and clear, taut skin – that darling minature of an adult. It is a child that woman imitates – its easy laugh, its helplessness, its need for protection. A child must be cared for; it cannot look after itself. And what species does not, by natural instinct, look after its offspring? It must – or the species will die out.
>
> With the aid of skillfully applied cosmetics, designed to preserve that precious baby look; with the aid of helpless exclamations such as 'Ooh' and 'Ah' to denote astonishment, surprise, and admiration; with inane little bursts of conversation, women have preserved this 'baby look' for as long as possible so as to make the world continue to believe in the darling, sweet little girl she once was, and she relies on the protective instinct in man to make him take care of her."[3]

Vilar hits the nail right on the head; that many women have been taught they will be protected while having every whim catered for by simply playing the child.

This, perhaps more than any other theme entertained by MRAs and MGTOW, captures the dilemma we are wrestling with under the heading of gynocentrism – that being more than sexual attraction, more than pair bonding, more than romantic love and all the other social mandates. Our biological urge to care for children is king, and it's also an Achillies' Heel for those who abide by it unconsciously.

The good news is that our vulnerability to abuse is corrected in one move: by men refusing to play parent, whether indulging or trying to correct women who are perpetual children. Instead we have to insist that our female partners woman-up right alongside us, showing reciprocal responsibility between two adults. Or be prepared to show them the door once it's apparent that the task is too much for them to take on.

Esther Vilar's comment that a woman's greatest ideal is 'a life without work or responsibility' requires someone to facilitate it, and that someone is almost always a man. But men need not play the role of parent and we do have the option to seek a relationship between adult peers: two responsible adults supporting each other in the walk through life. Such a woman may be a unicorn but unicorns do exist. And success, if you are lucky enough to get it, will be more likely tied to the women you reject than the woman you seek.

References:

[1] C.G. Jung, 'The Psychology of the Child Archetype' in The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious, Princeton University Press (1969)
[2] Alison Tieman, Threat Narrative series
[3] Esther Vilar, The Manipulated Man (1971)

Voices of Male Victims of Coercive Control (UK)

March 8, 2024 | by Featured item | Link | Original Link

Domestic Abuse and Coercive Control are not gendered issues. Despite a huge body of scientific evidence showing that men are victimised at similar, or slightly higher rates, as women, male victims have been dismissed and ignored for decades. Taken from two large international surveys, here are the voices of men from the UK that have been subjected to domestic abuse and coercive control from their female partner.

Published By Firebird Psych

Republicans and Democrats, both Gynocrats

March 9, 2024 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

> All parties, all sorts and conditions of politicians, from the fashionable and Conservative west-end philanthropist to the Radical working-men's clubbite, seem (or seemed until lately) to have come to an unanimous conclusion on one point – to wit, that the female sex is grievously groaning under the weight of male oppression." – E. Belfort Bax, (1907)[1]

♦ ♦ ♦

Our two party political system increasingly reveals itself to be a staged battle, inspiring about the same credibility as professional wrestling. Democrats and Republicans allegedly square off on either side of a deep philosophical divide and battle for the hearts and minds of the American people. It is family values vs progressive ideals, religious edicts vs personal autonomy, secure borders vs open inclusion and multiculturalism vs national identity.

It is actually dozens of seemingly opposing ideals, impassioned voters on either side of the fence, setting off increasing media fireworks as we get closer to completing each election cycle.

Yet, as we see right before our eyes, our political practices and policies play vastly different than campaign issues would make it appear. The servants we elect wage the same wars, maintain the same extralegal prisons, bail out the same corrupt Wall Street players, cater to the same corporate interests and infringe equally on our Constitutional protections.

What we have pre-election is the Great American Psychodrama; a Dog and Pony Show that distracts us from the post-election reality that an agenda more powerful than Dem vs Pub is actually calling the shots on our governance.

We have a one party system. Republicrats vs Republicrats; a political mafia who sends front men out to "represent" respective sides of a philosophical battle that exists only in the minds of voters.

It allows politicians to run on platforms like "hope" and "change," with their biggest challenge being the maintaining of a straight face.

This is the perfect environment for modern sexual politics as well.

This is hardly a surprise to most men's advocates. Many are already aware that there are two different brands of politicians in today's world when it comes to gender issues: Knights and Troubadours. Just like Dems and Pubs, they ostensibly appear to be on opposing teams. That façade falls apart quickly, though, when you realize they answer to the same master; they are simple stage props used interchangeably by the same production company.

They are owned and operated by Gynocentrism, Inc. Their marching are women first and most often women only. They appear on the surface to be at odds but chivalry is the glue that binds them together. Everything they say and do comes back to women first every time.

Let's take a look at their approach to perpetuating gynocentric privilege for women through different styles of chivalry.

In the chivalric tradition knights are viewed as damsel savers. They are the protectors of womankind and the hero of ladies. We first saw them emerge all the way back to medieval politics where, for instance, Jean II Le Maingre – marshal of France and a knight renowned for his military skill – instituted The "Enterprise of the Green Shield with the White Lady," a chivalric order that gathered a team of knights to defend women's honor from male brutality. Inspired by the ideal of courtly love, the stated purpose of the order was to guard and defend the honor, estate, goods, reputation, fame and praise of all ladies.

Left: St. George slays dragon Right: George Bush pledges to rescue women from slavery

Alternatively, the troubadour politician has long been a permanent fixture in western politics, and has his roots in chivalric knighthood. He is the singer of sooth songs to female voters. He's the one who proudly waxes that women can do anything men can do, and do it better, and do it in heels.

This aristocratic crooner emerged in the troubadour revolution of France and Germany. But unlike the chivalric knights who aggressively rescues damsels, the troubadour makes stock and trade of awaiting counsel from his female superiors.

Medieval literature is rich with stories of such men seeking direction from women, the latter having an endless list of tasks for the troubadour to fulfill before his gynocentric credentials are confirmed. A famous example is Ulrich von Liechtenstein, a German troubadour (minnesinger) who wrote the autobiographical manual "The Servicing of Ladies." Von Liechtenstein's modus operandi, like that of all troubadours, was to put himself before a lady and ask to be directed.

Left: Troubador supplicates a female audience with sweet songs Right: President Obama

And then to strut around like a banty rooster, high on his own achievements and hopeful for a pat on the head or even access to the holy of holies.

Has anything changed? Nope. We still see the smugly sacrificing heroics of the alleged right and the sycophancy of the alleged left. We see both as they posture themselves as the advocates for all womankind, throwing men and boys directly into the meat grinder of feminist governance with open abandon.

The knightly politician of today likewise offers to protect women from harm and insult, the benevolent patriarch.

The more sensitive, troubadour-like politician of today offers his to support all female issues and alleviates all female discomforts on instruction from women. He's an archetypical feminist, SJW and sycophant.

The bottom line? What we live in today is essentially a gynarchy, defined as a political system governed by women or heavily in the interest of women. Some will protest that we don't live in a gynarchy because most of the political leaders are male, but that would be a superficial conclusion. In her book What's Right With Feminism Cassandra Langer gives a concise definition that accounts for the proxy role of male leaders: "Gynarchy refers to government by women, or women-centered government."[2]

Gynarchy refers to any government advocating female interests, including any establishment of laws and bureaucracies that mostly benefit women, regardless of whether the advocates in question are male or female. Said differently the political system that women govern may actually be staffed by male servants called prime ministers, presidents, or politicians who work on behalf of the of women.[3]

We can hear the protesters already: But surely the United States has always been governed by and for the dominant patriarchal powers?

No, not according to some early observers.

One of them was cultural critic Max O'Rell who in 1903 observed;

> "The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country." [4]

What O'Rell saw in 1903 was that both sides of politics were serving as liegemen to the female populace – and nothing else.

The solution to this is simple and far from easy. All we need is a healthy percentage of the population, say one or two percent, to look past FOX NEWS and CNN programmed thinking; to look past their own biological impulse to save those who don't need saving and to engage in a pragmatic, rational examination of modern sexual politics.

We need them to see that the so-called candidates they are so bitterly either defending or attacking are just the same whores wearing different clothing.

Mind you, this is not about right vs left, which is a much more tangible and credible divide.

In American elections there is no right and left, just the pandering to Americans acting like robots with emotion chips that have gone on the fritz.

Whether it is with Lilly Ledbetter, VAWA or any other legislation enjoying round bipartisan support, what Americans have is a single option two party system that gives voters the opportunity to feel warm and fuzzy as they destroy their sons while chanting "You GO Girl"

All it will take is a tenacious, indefatigable minority of people who will simply not allow the lies and the injustice to pass unchallenged.

References:

[1] E. Belfort Bax, The "Monstrous Regiment" of Womanhood (1907)
[2] Cassandra Langer, What's Right With Feminism, iUniverse, (2001)
[3] Alison Tieman provides a historical example of slave leadership in her video When Slaves Ruled.
[4] The Philadelphia Record, quoting Max O'Rell's 1903 comments on American women

Further reading:

–Elizabeth Poole Sandford, Female Power, Influence, and Privileges (1835)
–Max O'Rell, Petticoat Government in the USA, (1896)
–Max O'Rell, The gentle art of ruling a husband, Chapter VIII in Her Royal Highness, Woman (1903)
–Historical references to gynocentric culture in America
–Warren Farrell on female political power in the United States, from Myth of Male Power (1993)

A solution to prevent veteran suicide

March 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Veteran suicide is especially tragic. The Netherlands has a solution.

The cover image depicts Canadian Forces veterans. Courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Feminists vandalize a wedding dress store in Guadalajara, Mexico

March 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Smashing the patriarchy literally apparently…

The featured image depicts the Expiatorio Temple in Guadalajara, Mexico. The temple was not attacked in the video above.

On Men’s Advocacy

March 11, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Red Pill Raw Files – Is Male Disposability the Fault of Patriarchy? – Dr. Warren Farrell & Paul Elam

March 13, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Canaries in the coal mine

March 14, 2024 | by Elizabeth Hobson | Link | Original Link

AVfM Classics: DARVO: Deny, Attack, and Reverse Victim and Offender

March 14, 2024 | by Dr. Tara J. Palmatier | Link | Original Link

---

Have you ever marveled at how your abusive wife, girlfriend or ex is able to do and say the most hurtful, underhanded and contemptible things and then portray herself as the innocent victim? Have you ever wondered how she is able to convincingly accuse others, usually her victims, of the abusive behaviors and attitudes of which she is actually guilty? Wonder no more, the answer may be DARVO.

Dr Jennifer J. Freyd, PhD of the University of Oregon identified DARVO in the 1990s at the tail end of the repressed sexual abuse memories hysteria. In spite of its dubious origins, DARVO is a helpful concept with broader applications than Dr Freyd seems to have originally intended. Freyd writes about DARVO in conjunction with her work on betrayal trauma, which I discuss on the original Shrink4Men blog. According to Dr Freyd's webpage:

> "DARVO refers to a reaction that perpetrators of wrong doing, particularly sexual offenders, may display in response to being held accountable for their behavior. The perpetrator or offender may Deny the behavior, Attack the individual doing the confronting, and Reverse the roles of Victim and Offender such that the perpetrator assumes the victim role and turns the true victim into an alleged offender. This occurs, for instance, when an actually guilty perpetrator assumes the role of "falsely accused" and attacks the accuser's credibility or even blames the accuser of being the perpetrator of a false accusation."

DARVO seems to be a combination of projection, denial, lying, blame shifting and gaslighting. Dr Freyd notes that other observers have identified the same phenomena using different terms. My male clients experience this behavior when they try to hold the abusive women in their lives accountable. It also seems to be common behavior in most predators, bullies, high-conflict individuals and/or abusive personality-disordered individuals. DARVO especially seems to occur in high-conflict divorce and/or custody cases.

Of course, not everyone who denies wrong doing is engaging in DARVO. Many partners and exes of abusive women are accused of things they didn't do or of things that never happened. Naturally, when this happens, you deny the accusation and perhaps feel a little (or a lot) bewildered. How do you know if an individual's denial is the truth or an instance of DARVO? Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) proposes:

> "It is important to distinguish types of denial, for an innocent person will probably deny a false accusation. Thus denial is not evidence of guilt. However, I propose that a certain kind of indignant self-righteousness, and overly stated denial, may in fact relate to guilt.

> I hypothesize that if an accusation is true, and the accused person is abusive, the denial is more indignant, self-righteous and manipulative, as compared with denial in other cases. Similarly, I have observed that actual abusers threaten, bully and make a nightmare for anyone who holds them accountable or asks them to change their abusive behavior. This attack, intended to chill and terrify, typically includes threats of lawsuits, overt and covert attacks, on the whistle-blower's credibility and so on.
>
> The attack will often take the form of focusing on ridiculing the person who attempts to hold the offender accountable. The attack will also likely focus on ad hominem instead of intellectual/evidential issues. Finally, I propose that the offender rapidly creates the impression that the abuser is the wronged one, while the victim or concerned observer is the offender. Figure and ground are completely reversed. The more the offender is held accountable, the more wronged the offender claims to be."

This is similar to how William Eddy, LCSW, Esq describes the persuasive blaming tactics of high-conflict individuals."Persuasive Blamers persuade others that their internal problems are external, caused by something else or someone else. Once others are persuaded to get the problem backward, the dispute escalates into a long-term, high-conflict situation. One that few people other than persuasive blamers can tolerate" (Eddy, 2006, p. 29). Getting the problem backward is precisely what happens when DARVO occurs. Figure and ground are completely reversed.

"It's only the Persuasive Blamers of Cluster B who keep high-conflict disputes going. They are persuasive, and to keep the focus off their own behavior (the major source of the problem), they get others to join in the blaming" (Eddy, 2006, p. 30). This is why many Narcissists, Borderlines, Histrionics and Antisocials effectively employ smear campaign and mobbing tactics when they target someone—be it a spouse, attorney, court evaluator or therapist. By blaming others for everything that's wrong in their lives they keep the focus off the real problem; themselves. This seems to be the exact denial-attack-reverse victim and offender behavior Freyd describes.

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) states:

> "The offender is on the offense and the person attempting to hold the offender accountable is on the defense. 'Deny, Attack and Reverse Victim and Offender' work best together. How can someone be on the attack so viciously and be in the victim role? Future research may investigate the hypothesis that the offender rapidly goes back and forth between attack and reverse victim and offender."

This behavior is crazy-making if you are the target of it. You know you're being attacked while your partner/ex plays the victim role for all she's worth, insisting on her distorted version of un-reality. Worse yet, many people believe her; their reasoning being, "She's so upset it must be true." Even some of my male clients who know their wives'accusations and lies aren't true, sometimes doubt themselves and what they know to be reality. I believe that many women and men who engage in DARVO come to believe their own lies after they repeat them enough times. I call it the "O.J. Simpson Effect."

Abusers typically employ different types of denial. Perhaps you're familiar with some of the following ones:

- Outright denial or gaslighting. "That never happened."
- Minimization. "It wasn't that bad."
- Amnesia. "I don't remember doing that."
- Redefinition. "I have a bad temper, so you shouldn't upset me."
- Projection. "You're abusive and controlling. You hurt me."
- Conversion. "I did wrong, but I'm a changed person and won't do it again."

Freyd (1997, pp. 23-24) concludes:

"The offender takes advantage of the confusion we have in our culture over the relationship between public provability and reality (and a legal system that has a certain history in this regard) in redefining reality. Future research may test the hypothesis that the offender may well come to believe in [her] innocence via this logic: if no one can be sure [she] is guilty then logically [she] is not guilty no matter what really occurred. The reality is thus defined by public proof, not by personal lived experience."

It may be difficult to sort out who is telling the truth in these cases. However, I've found that high-conflict individuals who engage in this behavior often can't substantiate their claims or, if they just make up more lies to try to substantiate their claims, they're inconsistent over time, so pay close attention and document their lies. This may help you hang her with a rope of her own making, if and when you need to prove your version of events as opposed to her ever evolving versions of the truth.

If she is threatening to call the police and make false allegations against you and/or you're considering divorce, it's extremely important that you document the abuse you're experiencing in a journal, a digital recorder or some other medium. Abusive, persuasive blamers rely on the force of their emotions to sell their lies, half-truths and distortions. Since most people are suckers for drama, especially in the form of a tearful, self-righteous woman, you'll need proof if you want to be believed. Think of it as making yourself DARVO-proof.

References:

Eddy, W. (2006) SPLITTING: Protecting Yourself While Divorcing a Borderline or Narcissist.

Freyd, J.J. (1997) Violations of power, adaptive blindness, and betrayal trauma theory. Feminism & Psychology, 7, 22-32.

Shrink4Men Coaching and Consulting Services:

Dr Tara J. Palmatier provides confidential, fee-for-service, consultation/coaching services to help both men and women work through their relationship issues via telephone and/or Skype chat. Her practice combines practical advice, support, reality testing and goal-oriented outcomes. Please visit the Shrink4Men Services page for professional inquiries.

International Conference on Men’s Issues 2024 – Budapest, August 10-11.

March 16, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

A reminder that ICMI 2024 will be held in Budapest, Hungary on 10-11 August 2024. This is a little over 10 years after the first ICMI was held in Detroit. Paul Elam, Janice Fiamengo and Mike Buchanan are among the speakers.

Tickets can be purchased on the ICMI 2024 website.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

March 18, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of August 2023 McLellan is still at large. Sebastian, who would now be 10, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Canada. We have information that McLellan has wealthy family in the New Orleans area and may be hiding out there.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's office.

Proof that Woke is Ending…

March 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 34 – Trek is Dead

March 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Classic Elam: Primary Aggressor Listings by State

March 20, 2024 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Originally published 13 April 2011.

Ladies and Gentlemen, start your laptops. And in case you don't know, primary (or predominant) aggressor laws are laws designed to give police the edict to arrest men in domestic violence disputes. They use guidelines that target males, not evidence of who did or didn't commit a crime. If your state is on this list, you should be contacting your representatives and making a protest. – PE

Primary Aggressor Laws By State

State	Primary Aggressor Law
Alabama	Ala. Code § 13A-6-134
Alaska	Alaska Stat. § 18.65.530(b)
California	Cal. Penal. Code § 13701(b)
Colorado	Colo. Rev. Stat. § 18-6-803.6(2)
Florida	Fla. Stat. ch. 741.29 (4)(b)
Georgia	Ga. Code Ann. § 17-4-20.1 (b)
Iowa	Iowa Code § 236.12(3)
Maryland	Md. Ann. Code art. 27§ 594B (d)(2)
Missouri	Mo. Rev. Stat. § 455.085(3)
Montana	Mont. Code Ann. § 46-6-311(2)(b)
Nevada	Nev. Rev. Stat. Ann.§171.137(2)
New Hampshire	N.H. Rev. Stat. Ann. § 173-B:10(II)
New Jersey	N.J. Rev Stat. § 2C:25-21 (c)(2)
New York	N.Y. Crim. Proc. Law § 140.10 (4)(c)
Ohio	Ohio Rev. Code Ann. § 2935.032(A)(1)(a)(ii) & 2935.03(B)(3)(d)
Oregon	Or. Rev. Stat. § 133.055(2)(c)
Rhode Island	R.I. Gen. Laws § 12-29-3 (d)(2)
South Carolina	S.C. Code Ann. § 16-25-70 (D)
South Dakota	S.D. Codified Laws § 23A-3-2.2
Tennessee	Tenn. Code Ann. § 36-3-619 (b)&(c)
Utah	Utah Code Ann. § 77-36-2.2
Virginia	Va. Code Ann. § 19.2-81.3 (B)
Washington	Wash. Rev. Code § 10.31.100(2)(c)
Wisconsin	Wis. Stat. § 968.075(3)(1)(b) link to table of states with mandatory arrest laws

The woke are imploding over Australian Sam Kerr

March 20, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The power equation mentioned in the video has been around since 1970. Many in the mainstream are now waking up to the implications.

SCUM Manifested

March 21, 2024 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

The Hate-Filled Legacy of Valerie Solanas

Radical feminism can be traced more or less back to Valerie Solanas, author of the SCUM Manifesto. It was first published in 1967, though Solanas began drafting it in about 1959 or 60. In the Manifesto, Solanas calls on women to rise up against men who she sees as biologically inferior and responsible for all of the world's problems. However, she doesn't end there. She refers to the male as "a biological accident" and the Y-chromosome as being an incomplete X-chromosome, making the male an incomplete female. She further calls for men to be exterminated and to assist in eliminating themselves by eliminating each other.

There are those who have stated that this Manifesto is little more than a parody of "patriarchy" or a work of satire. They claim to view it as an anti-patriarchal statement, but state that the calls for the elimination of men should not be taken seriously. However, while the work may contain elements of parody and satire, these devices are used to emphasize the message, not to indicate that the author wasn't serious. Solanas' own history would indicate this as she shot pop artist Andy Warhol, art critic Mario Amaya, and attempted to shoot Warhol's manager Fred Hughes on June 3, 1968, attempting to kill them. In 1977, she claimed that her views had not changed since the Manifesto was published, indicating that she believed what she had written.

Further evidence that the SCUM Manifesto was to be taken seriously is found in the reaction of feminist leaders and organizations to Solanas' Manifesto and shooting of Andy Warhol. Ti-Grace Atkinson, radical feminist and president of the New York chapter of NOW, called Solanas "the first outstanding champion of women's rights" and heralded her as "a 'heroine' of the women's movement." Robin Morgan, former editor of Ms Magazine, included excerpts in her book, Sisterhood is Powerful. Other feminist authors such as Amanda Third and Catherine Lord have credited her with creating radical feminism and have stated that the feminist movement would not have occurred if it hadn't been for Valerie Solanas. There have also been several books, plays, and movies glorifying Solanas and her actions.

There are also those who would dispute the acronym that SCUM stands for the Society for Cutting Up Men. While this is not spelled out within the document itself, It was stated on the cover of her self-published version in 1967. Later, Solanas would deny that she intended the acronym. Instead she stated that there was no such organization, nor would there ever be. SCUM was a state of mind. It was meant as a reference to empowered women who considered themselves fit to rule.

The legacy of the SCUM Manifesto has continued. It was published as late as 2004 (perhaps since then, though I don't have a record of it) and has been translated into several languages. Currently there are organizations based on SCUM existing in Sweden (producing materials for high school students) and on the internet (RadfemHub) It has impacted society in many ways which will be outlined below.

In New York in 1967 at about the same time Solanas was publishing the SCUM Manifesto, Shulamith Firestone, Pam Allen, Carol Hanish, and Robin Morgan founded a group called New York Radical Women. This short-lived organization adopted a radical feminist ideology that emphasized the patriarchal oppression of women by men similar to that outlined in the SCUM Manifesto. They claimed that men exercised social dominance over women by creating social roles that divided privilege and power by gender. This group is often credited with the first bra burning at the 1968 Miss America Pageant. However, rather than burn them, they tossed bras and other artifacts of patriarchal oppression into a garbage can. Firestone would move on to found Redstockings and New York Radical Feminists while Morgan would become more involved in feminist activism and writing. Hanish would help found Redstockings and would later edit a journal called Meeting Ground in which she would publish an essay called The Personal is Political and is sometimes incorrectly credited with coining that phrase, although she undoubtedly helped popularize it.

In 1969, the radical feminist organization Redstockings published its Redstockings Manifesto. The influence of SCUM is unmistakable. It is considerably less violent, but no less hateful. It characterizes "all men" as oppressors of women. It characterizes individual male-female relationships as "class relationship(s)" and provides that all individual male-female conflicts are political, not personal and "can only be solved collectively." Men are identified as the agents of oppression and the users of physical force to subjugate women. "All power structures throughout history have been male-dominated and male-oriented. Men have controlled all political, economic and cultural institutions and backed up this control with physical force." In SCUM, Solanas outlines a similar concept:

> "Authority and Government: Having no sense of right and wrong … the male feels a need for external guidance and control. So he created authorities — priests, experts, bosses, leaders, etc — and government… he sees to it that all authorities are male."

Redstockings states: "We call on all men to give up their male privilege and support women's liberation in the interest of our humanity and their own… In fighting for our liberation we will always take the side of women against their oppressors. We will not ask what is "revolutionary" or "reformist," only what is good for women."

This is quite similar to Solanas' call for men to assist in their own extermination and /or work towards women's goals:

> "SCUM will kill all men who are not in the Men's Auxiliary of SCUM. Men in the Men's Auxiliary are those men who are working diligently to eliminate themselves, men who, regardless of their motives, do good, men who are playing pall[sic] with SCUM. A few examples of the men in the Men's Auxiliary are: men who kill men; biological scientists who are > working on constructive programs, as opposed to biological warfare; journalists, writers, editors, publishers and producers who disseminate and promote ideas that will lead to the achievement of SCUM's goals…"

Redstockings did not take the ideology to the same extreme as Solanas, but the hatred that Solanas felt towards men was obviously present as was Solanas' influence. The prevailing attitude of the SCUM Manifesto is that men are to blame for everything wrong in the world and that ridding the world of men will automatically result in improvement. The first portion of this was outlined by Carol Hanish in The Personal is Political in 1969. Hanish states:

> "The most important is getting rid of self-blame. Can you imagine what would happen if women, blacks, and workers (my definition of worker is anyone who has to work for a living as opposed to those who don't. All women are workers) would-stop blaming ourselves for our sad situations? …We are only starting to stop blaming ourselves."

She later adds: "Women, like blacks, workers, must stop blaming ourselves for our "failures."" Of course if women aren't to blame for their own condition or their own failures, who is? The Redstocking Manifesto provides the answer: men. "Women's submission is not the result of brain-washing, stupidity or mental illness but of continual, daily pressure from men. We do not need to change ourselves, but to change men." The result of this "blame shifting" is that women can deny responsibility for their actions. Any wrong committed by women (or a woman) can be blamed on men or "The Patriarchy." This "blame shift" has led to disastrous legal consequences for men; most notably in Family Law, domestic violence, rape and sexual assault laws.

But while Redstockings was not as extreme as SCUM (at least publically), some of its organizers were. Robin Morgan would attack marriage as the basis for all sexism "We can't destroy the inequities between men and women until we destroy marriage." She would also help lead the charge to define all sex as rape "I claim that rape exists any time sexual intercourse occurs when it has not been initiated by the woman, out of her own genuine affection and desire." Her hatred for men was nearly as intense as that of Solanas "I feel that "man-hating" is an honorable and viable political act, that the oppressed have a right to class-hatred against the class that is oppressing them."

In her Manifesto, Solanas spends a great deal of time demeaning and demonizing men. She begins:

> "The male is a biological accident: the Y (male) gene is an incomplete X (female) gene, that is, it has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.
>
> The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of > empathizing or identifying with others, or love, friendship, affection of tenderness. He is a completely isolated unit, incapable of rapport with anyone. His responses are entirely visceral, not cerebral; his intelligence is a mere tool in the services of his drives and needs; he is incapable of mental passion, mental interaction; he can't relate to anything other than his own physical sensations. He is a half-dead, unresponsive lump, incapable of giving or receiving pleasure or happiness; consequently, he is at best an utter bore, an inoffensive blob, since only those capable of absorption in others can be charming. He is trapped in a twilight zone halfway between humans and apes, and is far worse off than the apes because, unlike the apes, he is capable of a large array of negative feelings — hate, jealousy, contempt, disgust, guilt, shame, doubt — and moreover, he is aware of what he is and what he isn't."

She then continues:

> "Eaten up with guilt, shame, fears and insecurities and obtaining, if he's lucky, a barely perceptible physical feeling, the male is, nonetheless, obsessed with screwing; he'll swim through a river of snot, wade nostril-deep through a mile of vomit, if he thinks there'll be a friendly pussy awaiting him. He'll screw a woman he despises, any snaggle-toothed hag, and furthermore, pay for the opportunity. Why? Relieving physical tension isn't the answer, as masturbation suffices for that. It's not ego satisfaction; that doesn't explain screwing corpses and babies."
>
> "Fatherhood and Mental Illness (fear, cowardice, timidity, humility, insecurity, passivity): Mother wants what's best for her kids; Daddy only wants what's best for Daddy, that is peace and quiet, pandering to his delusion of dignity (`respect'), a good reflection on himself (status) and the opportunity to control and manipulate, or, if he's an `enlightened' father, to `give guidance'. His daughter, in addition, he wants sexually — he givers her hand in marriage; the other part is for him."

The demonizing of men, turning them into something sub-human and obsessed with sex would be a recurring theme of radical feminism. The obsession with sex would evolve into "all men are rapists" or "all men use rape to control all women." The desire to "control and manipulate" would become the "power and control" of the domestic violence industry. The concept of the male as a biological accident sets the stage for concepts of "testosterone poisoning" and "toxic masculinity." Both are concepts claiming that being male is by its very nature, a disease.

> "If men were wise they would seek to become really female, would do > intensive biological research that would lead to me, by means of operations on the brain and nervous system, being able t to be transformed in psyche, as well as body, into women."

This lays the foundation for the Redstocking Manifesto's claim that women need not change, but men must be changed. The feminist call for masculinity and manhood to be "redefined" stems from this concept as well. The "redefinition" is the changing of men.

> "Eliminate men and women will shape up. Women are improvable; men are no[t]."

Here we have the antecedent of "the personal is political," a statement that relieves women from any personal responsibility for their actions and places the blame on "patriarchy," the elimination of which will result (by default) in a better world and an improved woman.

Susan Brownmiller was another product of New York Radical Women and New York Radical Feminists, both associated with Redstockings. She would later write Against Our Will: Men, Women, and Rape in which she would proclaim that all men use rape and the fear of rape to keep all women in a state of fear in order to perpetuate male dominance. This position would be the logical next step to Solanas' assertion that men are sex-crazed animals that "[screw] corpses and babies" and desire their daughters (sexually).

Andrea Dworkin, a radical feminist crusader against pornography, may have also been influenced indirectly by Solanas and SCUM. While living in Europe in the late 60's, she was introduced to the writings of Shulamith Firestone and Robin Morgan, both members of Redstockings. Dworkin also worked closely with Gloria Steinem and Catharine MacKinnon in her opposition to pornography as a form of sexual discrimination that reinforces male dominance over women and as such promotes violence against women. Steinem had also worked with former Redstocking Robin Morgan to found the Women's Media Center.

Other radical feminists who appear to be under the influence of Solanas, but are not easily connected are Mary Daly, a radical feminist professor at Boston College who was removed from her position after refusing to admit male students to her advance courses in feminism, may also have been influenced by Solanas and her Manifesto. Daly was once quoted as stating "If life is to survive on this planet, there must be a decontamination of the Earth. I think this will be accompanied by an evolutionary process that will result in a drastic reduction of the population of males." This was apparently a response to a statement by Sally Miller Gearhart who advocated reducing and maintaining the male population at 10% of the human population. Gearhart helped establish on of the first women's studies programs in the US while teaching at San Francisco State. There could be little doubt that she was aware of Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. Although it is unclear as to when Solanas moved to San Francisco, that is where she was residing when she died in 1988.

The legacy of Valerie Solanas is found in the writings of Morgan, Dworkin, Firestone, Hanish, Brownmiller, Daly, Gearhart, MacKinnon, Steinem et al. But it doesn't stop there. Many of these women have led the charge on domestic violence and rape law reforms that have done away with basic rights to due process and fair, impartial trials. MacKinnon pioneered sexual harassment law and may have been the one to invent the term. The child abuse hysteria of the 80's may have been a direct result of the anti-porn crusade of Dworkin, MacKinnon, and Steinem.

The next generation of misandrists is already here. These are women like Sharon Osborne and the other women of "The Talk" who joked on national television when Catherine Becker sexually mutilated her husband after drugging him. They are the gender feminists of Sweden who open state-sponsored schools that portend to teach equality by emphasizing homosexual relationships and nearly excluding heteronormative relationships from the curriculum. They are the Swedish members of SCUM who produce videos depicting the brutal and senseless murder of men, then call upon women to "do their part." They are Swedish feminists such as Ireen von Wachenfeldt, chairwomen of the National Organization for Women's Shelters who have professed adherence to the SCUM Manifesto as have other prominent Swedish government officials such as former Minister of Gender Equality Margareta Winberg, and Professor Eva Lungren. Wachenfeldt publically stated "'All men are animals…All men are emotional parasites… The male of the species is a biological disaster… To call a man an animal is to pay him a compliment." They are the women of RadFemHub; Danielle Pynnonen, Kat Pinder, Isabelle Moreira, Mary Syrett, Julie LeComte, Lorraine Allen, Laila Namdarkhan, Pam O'Shaughnesey who are authors, teachers, childcare workers, and government officials from around the globe plotting and planning the destruction of the male sex via eugenics, murder, selective abortion, etc. There are Hugo Schwyzer, Michael Kimmel, Tom Matlack, The Conscious Men and many other men who might be considered the Men's Auxiliary of SCUM as they support and defend the hate movement known as feminism. Solanas has indeed left a legacy. It's a legacy of misandrous hatred and violence that by its own admission can only result in the destruction of the entire human race, men and women alike.

> "Why produce even females? Why should there be future generations? What is their purpose? When aging and death are eliminated, why continue to reproduce? Why should we care what happens when we're dead? Why should we care that there is no younger generation to succeed us." – Valerie Solanas, SCUM Manifesto.

[Addendum: The name of Evin Rubar was mistakenly included in the list of radical feminists. Instead of being a radical feminist, Evin was attempting to expose them. I apologize for the error. – TDOM

The myth that men only want one thing

March 22, 2024 | by Paul Bonea | Link | Original Link

You've probably heard of the phrase "men only want one thing". It's easy to drop it as "sage advice" in a real life discussion that's strayed into the more spicy areas of how men and women interact with each other.

The 'one thing' in this case is of course sex. The phrase is an example of how society at large enjoys perpetuating the notion, humorously or otherwise, that men are robots with simple programming and that all their efforts are directed towards their next sexual conquest.

Of course, the phrase is said as a joke most of the times. But "men only want one thing" and other phrases like it create today's cultural background that guides how men and women interact with one another.

An implicit meaning that women want "more than one thing"

Part of the subtlety of the phrase is that if men only want one thing, then by definition it must mean that "women want more than one thing". If it didn't, then the phrase might as well be gender neutral "people only want one thing", which doesn't quite have the same ring to it.

So what do women want?

After many thousands of years, we still don't quite have a scientific answer for that. But popular belief says that women want a connection and emotional commitment from the opposite sex, and not just "one thing".

At first glance, this doesn't sound like such an outrageous distinction between men and women. The problem is that men's desires are frowned upon as base and instinctive. By opposition, a woman's desires are somehow nobler and purer.

The end meaning of "men only want one thing" is a criticism and shaming of men's behavior and a pointed remark that a lifestyle of casual dating is "wrong" while entering and committing to long term relationships is "the right way".

Examples of this abound. One is the recent creation of the word "fuckboy" (interestingly however, people who mock the fuckboy also criticize slut shaming).

This shaming of men's intentions also extends to other aspects of their life, such as when a man wants to go out alone to a bar or club. Very, very few men are capable of going out alone without having the "creep" label attached, and most people will just assume he's out there to get laid.

Do men want just one thing?

This belief that men just want to play the field, ends conversations and doesn't ask the important question why don't men commit?

The simple answer is that by and large men don't really have an issue to stay with just one woman. In fact, most men would actually desire that.

What men do not want to do however, is to invest in relationships that are not fulfilling, and do not provide value to their life.

Men who only seem to want one thing are simply in the search for the right person. To be sure, some men have impossible standards that almost no woman can meet. However, most men are reasonable in their expectations but still have trouble finding a suitable partner.

For a man, the only logical solution to this problem is to "stay on the market" as it were, and keep looking for someone they feel is right for them, even if this means serial dating.

Viewed from a different perspective, this is men's equivalent of women who seem to experience a lack of financially marriageable men.

In popular media such as music and movies, men are depicted as rash and impulsive when it comes to relationships. But in real life, the silent majority of men are much more thoughtful and measured in how they choose their partners. Most men are readily willing to trade short term flings for a relationship with a woman that meets their criteria.

In a way, the trope of the woman that ends the bad boy's behavior has some truth to it. Except that it's not the woman who corrects the behavior, but the bad boy who believes he's found what he was looking for and can now move on to another stage of his life.

Why men are accused of wanting one thing

In the search for a suitable partner, men will likely go through many failed flings, relationships and situationships. As it so often happens, many men will be rejected by women they would have liked to pursue further. The reverse will also be true, and men will turn down women they consider to be incompatible with them.

Sometimes, feelings will be hurt and the women who are turned down will believe the man simply used them for sex, because "men only want one thing".

This is unfortunate, and perpetuates a negative stereotype of men's intentions and what they want from women. If it happens repeatedly it can lead to bitterness and can poison how the women who were turned down interact with future men in their lives. This then turns into to a negative downward spiral that is not fulfilling either for men or women.

If a rejection happens once, it's a fluke and a mismatch. But if it happens repeatedly, then it is an indication that how a woman approaches her interactions with men isn't healthy.

In this case, a woman who decides that "men only want one thing" makes a conscious decision to blame her romantic failures on men in general instead of looking inward, at herself, and how she might be sabotaging her own relationships.

This isn't something extreme to say. Nowadays, many people grow up in broken homes or dysfunctional families and have no intuitive understanding of how a healthy relationship should look like. For many, many people the ability to carry a relationship is something they learn over time through personal experience, instead of having a healthy relationship role model at home. This applies to men and women equally.

Thus, in the face of repeated rejections, a woman's best approach isn't to shift the blame on men being simple minded. Instead, a woman would be much better served to take a step back and figure out all the ways she harmed her interactions with men and what she can do to fix that.

What do men REALLY want?

There are 3.5 billion men on the planet, so it's a bit tricky to summarize what each and every man wants into a single phrase. But it is possible to make a vague guideline that can be used to describe the desires of most men (but not all men).

In two words, when it comes to long term relationships men cherish security and predictability. The exact meanings of these two words can be different from man to man, but the overall theme is the same.

Security in this case means that a man feels safe enough to invest himself in a relationship. A man wants to know that his efforts will not be wasted by a sudden attitude change from their partner, especially one that is out of their control.

But, as mentioned before, men can have different interpretations of security. For some men, it can mean unwavering support in difficult or stressful times, emotional reciprocation, genuine interest in their projects etc.

In regards to stability, a neat marriage joke applies very well: "Men marry women with the hope they will never change. Women marry men with the hope they will change. Invariably they are both disappointed."

The joke is of course a caricature. True stability isn't really possible since all people evolve. But what men want is to know that the central qualities that made fall for a woman will still be there 10 or 20 years down the line.

To sum it up

Probably the greatest argument to disprove the myth that "men only want one thing" is the fact that even in this day and age, men are overwhelmingly the ones that propose marriage. This alone should be proof that men want more than "one thing". The gist is that they want it with someone who fits their standards.

Could Men Legally Rape their Wives in the Nineteenth Century?

March 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Should redpillers vote this year?

March 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Commentator on men's issues ThisIsShah makes a pitch for men speaking up during this election cycle, because this year may provide a more fertile political environment to be heard. He suggests that men threaten to boycott the election (without necessarily doing so) in order to get the parties to start making some offerings to men, but then actually voting according to which candidates pony up the best pitch. Ed.

Chad Sues 50 Women For Defamation After Negative Comments On Facebook Dating Group

March 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Omelets, marriage and MGTOW

March 25, 2024 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

I make omelets my own way. By that, I mean exactly like you'd see in any cookbook. I whisk some eggs, melt some butter in a frying pan, pour the eggs in along with some cheese and maybe some other things for filling. What, you might ask, makes it my own way? The fact that it's me doing it.

I also go my own way to work in the morning. The highway and during rush hour with thousands of other people. Each of them also going their own way. Why do I say I'm going my own way to work? Simply because it's me doing it. Now you'd think that's hardly my own way. If I were to go my own way to work, you'd think it would mean in some way fundamentally different – and you'd be right.

Like men going their own way.

If you were to imagine going out on your own, on your own way, you might expect that would mean something like MGTOW, that you are free from outside control, not dependent on another's authority.

You might envision someone shrugging off society's yolk, refusing to self-sacrifice and being one's own boss. That's what MGTOW is, even though a man certainly has the right to place himself in danger, to sacrifice himself for another, and to support others, he chooses not to. He goes his own way, in his life, in his choices, he remains sovereign.

Marriage is dangerous for men, it's sacrificial and compels the man into support for his wife or ex-wife. In marriage, a man necessarily compromises, gives up sole control over his life and his property. As with the earliest known MGTOW groups "The Anti-Bardell Bachelor Band" it was acknowledged that MGTOW and marriage could not co-exist.

Now what about this concept of MGTOW simply meaning male self-determination? This is such a gross over-simplification as to completely change the concept. MGTOW can be better thought of as a second or third order male self-determination. That is, a man who is determined to maintain and preserve his self-determination and determined to refuse anything that might infringe on his future self-determinism.

> MGTOW can be better thought of as a man who is… determined to refuse anything that might infringe on his future self-determinism.

For example, a man has the right, and could have his own self-determination to join the military, but joining the military greatly reduces a man's self-determination. A soldier cannot go his own way. After he is no longer under military obligation, he could be MGTOW, yet while active, he no longer has his autonomy, independence and sovereignty. In the same way, a married man cannot be MGTOW.

Hopefully, I've already addressed possible rebuttals. Yes, men ought to have the maximum amount of choices, autonomy, freedom and options. Yet, the movement is not simply a group of men making choices from options they have. That understanding would not be recognizable to hardly anyone professing to be MGTOW. I won't be appealing to the dictionary to say that MGTOW are by definition unmarried, but rather re-iterate that the philosophy and reason for existing preclude marriage, since MGTOW can be better understood as a second or third order self-determinism.

MGTOW is not simply about men making their own choices. It's about making the choices that ensure further choices and maximum freedoms.

No man is under obligation to be MGTOW, but if you choose to sell yourself into government slavery (whether martial or marital), you are not MGTOW. If a man is married, he can be a great guy, he could live a great life, he could wake up sympathetic and with a desire to be MGTOW but he is not MGTOW. That's how the movement understands itself, that's what its philosophy prescribes and that's simply what MGTOW is.

Feminists attack cathedral – 2013

March 26, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

In this video from 2013 we see feminist women attacking a church and assaulting a group of Christian men who have surrounded the church. The men show great restraint.

Resolved: Feminism is evil

March 27, 2024 | by Tom Givens | Link | Original Link

You can count on me to pretty much consistently call feminism an ‘evil ideology,’

…

…and feminists as a group as well, come to think of it. A lot of people consider this to be hyperbole on my part, but sadly, this is not the case. I truly do believe feminism is evil to its core, and awakens the evil that lurks within each of us, which then provides fuel for the fire.

At this point, I suppose my religious views come into play, so in the interests of full disclosure I guess I better tell you my views on God and such. Feel free to skip this next bit, if you’re so inclined.

I see almost no contradiction at all between religion and science. This requires an understanding that The Bible was translated and edited, perhaps hundreds of times, by fallible humans with political interests. Science provides excellent descriptions of natural laws and processes, and reveals nature to have a beautiful symmetry in the mathematical world as well; an almost clockwork precision; an underlying order.

I also find the claim that science provides a complete explanation laughable, since morphing from ‘primordial ooze’ to ‘life’ requires every bit as much faith as a belief in God. For that matter, so does the belief in infinite numbers of universes resulting in ours at random. And science doesn’t provide a causation; a ‘before.’

I believe if you don’t take either viewpoint too seriously, they dovetail quite nicely. After all, one would expect God to be pretty good at math, and planning, wouldn’t they? Especially considering that ‘God’ could very well be nothing but the collective consciousness of the universe itself.

Life really is that weird, after all.

Ok, so enough with the religious stuff (and hopefully avoid fixation on the subject), and on to why I call feminists ‘evil.’

Ok maybe not quite yet, because first I have to let you know my definition of ‘evil.’ This is not as straightforward as it first may seem. Some people think ‘evil’ and they think Friday the 13th, or Dahmer, or child rapists. Many people define ‘evil’ as destructive, chaotic, and heartless. Cold, calculating, acid….evil.

I don’t. If these are the definitions, how does one account for the rapist/murderer who loves his mother, may even have a wife and children they love? How does one account for the evil mastermind who collapses in grief at the death of his squeeze? This hardly seems like the type of thing Freddie Kruger would give much of a shit about, don’t you think?

“Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark.”

…

And what about the ‘petty’ evils? The false accusations, the spreading of malicious lies, the mundane violence (bar fights, arguments/challenges, etc.), the plotting and popularity of daytime TV? Are these simply ‘Freddy Lite,’ the precursor to the Real Evil(tm), where they haven’t gone over to the Dark Side yet and all that jazz?

Or, as is more likely, is it possible to be a truly evil person, and yet still have a spouse you love, and children you love, and parents you love, and friends you love. Being evil doesn’t mean being devoid of love at all. It can’t, given the degrees of evil easily seen every day.

So evil isn’t hate or aggression, or for that matter indifference, because a person consumed by this would quickly burn every bridge in sight. Evil wouldn’t progress. And evil begets evil, as the saying goes.

Upon much reflection, I’ve landed on a candidate, and it’s served me well so far. Here it is:

Evil: unmitigated self-interest.

It allows for all of the ‘tender’ parts, while still allowing the evil person to torture, kill, maim, defraud, destroy, whatever at whim. After all, that person is nothing to them. Well, except a plaything. And they only matter as long as they mean something to the self-absorbed. And only in the way the evil person cares about, be it friend, victim, or both.

I think you can see where this is going, but I’ll spell it out for those unfamiliar with the facts:

Feminism is gynocentric in the extreme, and will tolerate all manner of injustice to men, indeed will increase those injustices when possible, to serve the selfish ends defined by its upper echelons. The ideology literally REQUIRES it’s adherents to believe their interests are paramount whenever in question; that ‘helping women’ is always the right answer. It requires a foundation of selfish thinking to begin with.

Denial of the suffering of others, and in some cases while openly delighting in it, is a feminist hallmark. Feminism appeals to the selfish little girl in women, with demands that she should ‘have it all’. And that anytime she doesn’t, it’s men’s fault. And it’s that scapegoating, the ‘othering’ of men that marks feminism as truly evil. As truly, unmitigated self interest on an industrial scale. With nothing good planned for men, that’s for sure.

Traditionalists talk of autonomy as the main characteristic of feminist thinking. Funny, even religious folk don’t recognize evil when it’s staring them right in the face.

And smirking.

5 practical ways to deal with Feminists

March 28, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

After putting up a guide on how to deal with Social Justice Warriors, Lucian Vâlsan now details time-tested strategies on how to deal with the actual Feminist ideologues behind the SJWs.

Definitely worth a watch for the amount of good ol' FTSU present in this guide.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Camille Paglia on feminism, male creativity & generation snowflake

March 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Author, art professor, feminist, and cultural critic Camille Paglia offers a scathing critique of feminism, praises male creativity, and laments Generation Snowflake.

The cover image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

New Hampshire Representative DESTROYS circumcision

March 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Richeut: 12th-century tale of paternity fraud & child support

March 30, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

In the twelfth-century French tale Richeut, the title character Richeut is a mistress of harlotry. Frustrated with her insufficient earnings from whoring, Richeut plots to get pregnant to extract more money from men. She drinks mandrake and hellebore and has sex with many men. She succeeds in getting pregnant.

Richeut then goes to one of her lovers, a priest. She cries, sighs, and complains. The priest comforts her:

The gentleman {priest} puts his arms around her neck and kisses her softly. Richeut squirms out of his embrace, bursts into a torrent of tears, and speaks her threat: "Whether I tell you or I keep silent about it, I'm pregnant because of you." [1]

Men, who have very limited contraceptive options and no reproductive rights, dread unwanted claims of unplanned parenthood. Unplanned parenthood and state-imposed sex payments (called "child support") can destroy a man's life.

Men lack women's natural, true knowledge of who are their biological children. While the priest had sex with Richeut, neither he nor she knows which man contributed to the pregnancy. The priest says to Richeut:

Richeut, I don't believe you; do you really believe it's mine? Certainly not.

She responds:

I know full well that it is; may I lose everything, may I fall silent and be put to death, if I didn't solemnly swear that you put into me that thing which made me fat and pregnant. Don't think I'll dump it in some ditch or in a monastery, if you refuse to help me.

Rather than arising merely from the skill of particular, deceiving women, paternity fraud is now institutionalized in government and hospital procedures for establishing paternity. The priest foolishly acquiesces to Richeut's paternity claim:

By my faith, Richeut, I promise you that if you desire anything of mine, I shall keep nothing that you might not have for yourself. Why would you blackmail me, or have the bishop bar me from saying Mass? Now, hide this pregnancy for as long as you can, and when the child is born, blame it on someone else. So help me God, I shall not fail you in this, not one jot.

Richeut then cries a little and tells the priest that she loves him. He then gives her money and goods and promises her more.

Richeut repeats her paternity fraud with the knight Lord Geezer. She aggressively confronts him:

I am seething with anger when I see you. You pledged your faith to me and you lied. Any woman who puts her arms around you must be out of her mind. There's no one as stingy as you from here to Lincoln. What did I get from you once I gave you pleasure, the other day (alas!) in bed? A curse brought me to lie down flat under you! A pox on your root that shoots off and dries up! I was a young girl then, and now no one cares to love me. You have knocked me up, and I do not care to hide it. I'm angry with you! Look at my belly swelling up! It won't be long until I have a child. You've got to help me. So help me God, if you deny it's yours, it will be your ruin! I say it in earnest. No matter how fortified, all your castles shall be burned and reduced to ashes unless you acknowledge your offspring. I'll sooner burn or hang myself — I tell you no lie — than let you go free. I come from a good family! I have seven knights among my relatives. And I have friends that would slay their man in no time.

The knight foolishly accepts Richeut's claim that he caused her pregnancy. He gives her money and a kiss, and promises to send her meat, vegetables, and fine wine.

Richeut also repeats her paternity fraud with a townsman who didn't have a heir. He thinks he is biologically unable to have children. Richeut goes to him and asks to have a private conversation:

They go into the room together and sit down on a bed. Sitting there, Richeut looks pensive, then says, "Sir, I came her because I was pushed by a desperate need. I'll be honest with you. I have a complaint to make, and you yourself are the cause. For the time is not long when I shall enter into labor. Sir, I'm incensed at you because you made me pregnant!"

At first the townsman, who thought himself to be sterile, stands up to Richeut:

"I? You must be joking!"
"This is no joke, sir, by Saint Thomas!"
"Without doubt, Richeut, you told a lie."
She cries and whines, and holds her hand to her face: "Sir, don't you recall the entire day that you played hanky-panky with me upstairs?"
"Yes, Richeut, that much I know."
"Without a doubt, dear sir, that is where I got this burden."
"Shut up, Richeut, don't ever say it!"
"May God confound me if I keep silent about it!"

The townsman's fantasy of having a male heir prevailed over his reason:

"Richeut, I don't know — I may well be the father. Let him be mine. If it's a boy, without fault, he'll inherit everything I own."

He gives Richeut much money and arranges to have her sent meat, wine, and bread.

Richeut herself benefits greatly from money she extracts for "child support." From pregnancy to long after the birth of her son Sampson, Richeut enjoys child support in the form of "meat, wine and claret, pepper sauce, fruit, cakes, pastries, and apples." Because she cannot bear Sampson's wailing, she hires another woman (a wet-nurse) to breast-feed him. Her lavish child-support income prompts her to raise her price as a whore. It also makes her an attractive marriage prospect for men seeking to avoid the burden of having to earn money for their family.

Richeut's child-support fraud devastates the men of the three estates. Richeut flatters the knight with tales of his manly and fearless son Sampson, who, she says, is just like him. She tells the trade-oriented townsman that Sampson "counts like an angel." She tells the priest that Sampson loves learning (priests were the leading scholars in the Middle Ages). Socially vulnerable and proud false fathers, the men of the three estates give all they have to Richeut for child support:

Richeut has blackmailed the priest so much that he now has only a grayish coat on his shoulders. And he's wearing nothing under the wool! As for the townsman, she's after his banking business. And she has threatened, flattered, and begged the knight so much that he has pledged her everything, both land and fief.

Just as child support today isn't required to be spent supporting children and in fact supports mainly interested adults, "Richeut takes and spends lavishly on herself — for the boy {her child Sampson} doesn't spend money!" Her three lovers as a result live in poverty.

Richeut's son Sampson grows up to be sexually voracious and highly skilled in seduction. Because the priest, the knight, and the townsman are languishing in poverty and despair, Sampson rejects them.[2] Richeut raises her son herself. She teaches him Ovid's love lessons. She teaches him additional lessons on flirting and techniques for sexual intercourse. Sampson is a good student. He masters the "summa of lechery." In travels spanning from Ireland to India, Sampson has sex with thousands of women. The only person more skilled than he in sexual seduction is his mother.[3]

The story of Richeut has considerable gender symmetry. Richeut exploits and abuses men and women alike. Her son treats women much the same way that she treats men. The priest, the knight, and the townsman stand for the three estates of medieval society. Richeut demonstrates the three estates' stupidity locally. Sampson demonstrates the three estates' stupidity internationally.[4]

Richeut provides potent satire of paternity establishment and child support in today's high-income democracies. The outrageous deceptions that Richeut perpetrates are now institutionalized in laws and policies. Stories like Richeut are now summarily rejected from broad public discourse. They are labeled "offensive" and "anti-feminist" because they challenge deeply entrenched injustices against men.

* * * * *

Notes:

[1] Richeut l. 170-5, from Old French trans. Haddad (1991) p. 8. All subsequent quotes above are from id. Since Richeut is relatively short and the quotes follow the order of the text, further specific line numbers and pages are omitted. For an alternate English translation and the French text, Ker (1976). The French text of Lecompte (1913) is freely available online. The current best French text of Richeut is Vernay (1988). Richeut is thought to date from the last third of the twelfth century. Arlima offers a comprehensive bibliography for Richeut.

In its brutal satire and depiction of low duplicity, Richeut is thematically related to Trubert and Le Roman de Renard. Richeut has a woman servant / friend named Hersant. Richeut and Hersant are the names of the wives of the fox and the wolf, respectively, in Le Roman de Renard. Disparagement of prostitution in Richeut associates it with the sayings of Marcolf in Solomon and Marcolf.

[2] Sampson asks his mother who his father is:

Tell me now, mother dear, which one of these three is my father?

Richeut responds:

Dear son, I don't know. I have mated with each of the three, and with a thousand others. I am not ashamed to tell you. How can a woman that's been mounted by this kind of population be expected to keep count of her children? One doesn't know from whom she conceives nor when. Just go to the richest of the three. Take your pick.

Sampson responds, "Mother, I don't want any of them."

[3] On the relationship of Richeut and Sampson, Adkins (2003).

[4] In medieval estates satire, townsmen and peasants are commonly grouped together in the third estate. Mann (1973) considers medieval estates satire, but focuses on Chaucer and ignores Richeut. Richeut surely has more direct, current public importance than Chaucer's General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales.

[image] Nell Gwyn. Painting by Simon Verelst c. 1680. Nell Gwyn (1650 – 1687) was a comic actress and long-time mistress of Charles II. She regarded herself as a whore. Image thanks to Wikipedia Commons, and no thanks to the rapacious, reactionary U.K. National Portrait Gallery.

References:

Adkins, Carole Ann. 2003. "Beastly Mothers — Beastly Sons: Richeut." Reinardus: Yearbook of the International Reynard Society. 16: 3-17.

Haddad, Gabriel. 1991. "Richeut: A Translation." Comitatus: A Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 22(1): 1-29.

Ker, Donald Eugene. 1976. The twelfth-century French poem of Richeut: a study in history, form and content. Ph.D. Thesis. Ohio State University.

Lecompte, Irville Charles. 1913. "Richeut, Old French poem of the twelfth century, with introduction, notes, and glossary." Pamphlet reprint of the article in The Romanic Review 4(3): 261-305.

Mann, Jill. 1973. Chaucer and medieval estates satire: the literature of social classes and the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. Cambridge, England: University Press.

Vernay, Philippe. 1988. Richeut. Berne, Switzerland: Editions Francke.

> Richeut: 12th-century tale of paternity fraud & child support

NollaGirl504: Women cheat just as much

March 31, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Ben Hart lays it out

March 31, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

This is a follow-up to various videos posted by Ben Hart and his daughter Madi. Ben's story will be familiar to many men who read A Voice for Men. He talks about the mistakes he made during his divorce and encourages other men to avoid making the same mistakes.

Victim of Botched Circumcision Speaks

April 1, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Are Women Raising Sonsbands?

April 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Willie Havmire has some thoughts here on something that will undoubtedly offend a lot of people, but actually describes reality for millions of single mothers and their sons:

Erin Pizzey has a term for what Havmire describes here this which is even more hard on the ears: emotional incest. It's when a mother uses her son to fulfill not just her economic needs but even her emotional needs. It doesn't literally mean physical incest, but EMOTIONAL; the relationship she wants to have with an adult man she tries to hold out through him, and this warps both her and more importantly, him as the child. It's a sad cycle but it's real, and more people should recognize it and try to correct it, not out of shaming people per se but in loving them enough to make them look at the truth.

This video is sure to spark some discussion. We'll look forward to seeing what else Willie Havmire has to say.

Make Women Great Again. What? Women Need to Change?

April 3, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Editor's note: AVfM does not aim to enforce nor promote traditional gender roles, however we do endorse free choice, including the choice of men and women who wish to pursue a traditionalist path.

1950s ads illustrating traditional roles for women…

MY WIFE
JEAN IS HAPPY,
PRETTY & PREGNANT
BOY, AM I GLAD I BOUGHT HER A NEW HOTPOINT WASHER & DRYER
Hotpoint
ONLY $249.95
Hotpoint
ONLY
$199.95
From the Oneonta Star, Oneonta, N.Y.

THE IDEAL GIFT FOR ALL OCCASIONS
"Oh darling! How lovely... I've just longed for a FOWLERS VACOLA BOTTLING OUTFIT for years!
Obtainable at all leading stores throughout Australia

Still want to thank you
THREE TIMES A DAY!
An everlasting gift!
New In-Sink-Erator
Saturn Garbage Disposer
Write TODAY for free literature!
In•Sink•Erator

WIVES.
Look this ad over carefully. Circle the items you want for Christmas. Show it to your husband. If he does not go to the store immediately, cry a little. Not a lot. Just a little. He'll go, he'll go.
Husbands:
Look this ad over carefully. Pick out what you, wife wants. Go buy it. Before she starts to cry.
Dormeyer

She's very special Show her how you feel with a Hoover Christmas gift

Give her a Hoover and you give her the Best THE HOOVER

More Power to You!
KitchenAid

Easier for YOU-and
You owe it to HIM
KitchenAid

LASTING WAYS TO SAY:
Merry Christmas
ALCOA
ALUMINUM
THESE FINE STORES AND OTHERS CARRY GIFT ITEMS OF ALCOA ALUMINUM

Skill want to thank you
THREE TIMES A DAY!
An everlasting gift!
New In-Sink-Erator
Saturn Garbage Disposer
Write TODAY for free literature!
In • Sink • Erator

HOOVER
Christmas morning she'll be happier with a Hoover HOOVER

JOHN BULL OUT OF THE CITY OF FEAR
by Scarlett Pauelsik
WIZARDS AT WAR
£500 FREE FOR HOME DECORATORS

Women and Sportsball

April 4, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

It is ironic that nothing has garnered more publicity for women's sports than the encroachment of men (i.e., trans women) into women-only spaces. Women crashing men-only spaces is now a given, and men in drag is not a new thing but men dressing up in the uniforms of female athletes and competing against them is definitely something new under the sun.

Predictably, the lunatic fringe supports the idea of trans women competing against women, even though all evidence indicates the result is that it enables also-ran male athletes to dominate in the female realm and in some instances results in violence against women! If you like to root for the underdog (or should I say underbitch?), go ahead, but in this situation, you'll likely die of old age before your faith is rewarded.

There is plenty of pushback against this nonsense. In essence, the "conservative" position is that there is no place for wannabe women in women's sports. I concur, but is this truly a conservative opinion?

For the most part the trans infiltration has been limited to amateur sports. Thanks to the famous/infamous Title IX, which has been in effect for more than 50 years, "equity" in college sports is mandated. While this has resulted in more intercollegiate sports teams and athletic scholarships for women, the nasty secret is that in order to maintain said equity it has been necessary to cut men's sports. Of course, this is not happening with football or basketball, since those sports are major revenue generators. Other sports, even baseball and men's track and field, are vulnerable, however.

Men's college teams have long served as quasi-minor leagues for professional teams. Professional sports leagues for women, however, are few and far between. The best known, the WNBA, is largely subsidized by the NBA but the league has never been self-supporting since its inception in 1997. Clearly, no matter how good a woman player is she will never be "promoted" to the NBA, but it's a good PR move.

There is also a National Women's Soccer League but the players are not getting rich. The average salary in May 2022 was $54,000. Obviously, a woman could take a traditional job as a schoolteacher or a secretary and do just as well – with more job security. FIFA (International Federation of Association Football), which governs national soccer associations, has been under fire for inequity in men's and women's prize pools. Even after coughing up more dough for women, the men's payout is still four times the women's payout ($440,000,000 vs. $110,000,000). The fact that men's soccer brings in much more revenue, thanks to higher attendance and higher ticket prices, is ignored by the equal-pay-for-equal-work ideologues.

If sports fans are reluctant to spring for tickets to watch women play soccer and basketball, one factor might be the high percentage of lesbians. The obnoxious soccerette Megan Rapinoe is perhaps the best known sapphic athlete (saphlete?) in the United States. If you Google “Lesbian Soccer Players,” however, you will see she has plenty of companions. A writer named Natalie on Autostraddle, a lesbian web site, noted that the 2023 FIFA Women’s World Cup “just might be the most openly queer sporting event in history.” If the soccer moms of yesteryear only knew!

Basketball is also a lesbian hotbed, pun intended. Sheryl Swoopes was the best known until Brittney Griner ran into that little drug dustup while playing in Russia. Another is Sue Bird, who is “engaged” to Megan Rapinoe. Interesting to note that another famed lesbian hoopster, Kate Starbird, a former basketball star at Stanford, is currently an advocate for government censorship of social media.

On Outsports, another queer-oriented web site, Ken Schultz posted a 2021 article titled “Over a third [e.g., 9] of all-time Top 25 WNBA players are out LGBTA athletes.” One can’t help but wonder if the NWSL and WNBA are broken down into cliques of heterosexuals and lesbians.

If you took a poll of the fans in attendance at NWSL or WNBA contests, I suspect you would find a disproportionate number of gender queer folk. This is not new. Many years ago (1980 or thereabouts) I went to see the Dallas Diamonds of the short-lived Women’s Professional Basketball League. Though I was not a big basketball fan and could have cared less about women’s sports, a friend of mine wanted to go see Nancy Lieberman, who was the face of the franchise (and perhaps the league) and had a highly marketable (i.e., she was white, heterosexual, and personable) personality. Tickets were cheap and I had nothing better to do so I went along. I don’t remember much about the game but to this day I will never forget the crowd. I have never seen so many people of indeterminate sex in one place. (Admittedly, I have never attended a Pride parade.)

A latter-day femme phenom is Caitlin Clark, a University of Iowa senior who has been rewriting the college basketball records books. Another highly marketable athlete (not only white and heterosexual but religious!), she has put butts in the seats wherever Iowa plays. She will surely boost attendance in the WNBA when she turns pro, but the revenue increase will hardly challenge NBA standards.

Given the high proportion of lesbians in basketball and soccer, it is remarkable that parents would encourage their daughters to play these sports. I’m not saying such girls wouldn’t turn out to be lesbians anyway, but I can’t help but wonder if some sort of grooming isn’t taking place. For sure, if the percentage of homosexuals were this high on male basketball and soccer teams, many parents would steer their boys away from these sports. Of course, in men’s sports homosexuality is relatively rare. They do crop up occasionally in solo sports, such as swimming and diving, figure skating, and tennis, but they are exceedingly rare in team sports. There have always been more rumors than out-of-the-closet players. For boys, grooming is more of a problem with clergymen, male teachers and scoutmasters. After a bad first-half, a football coach might break your balls but he won’t caress them.

No matter what the sport, homosexuality is much more popular in women’s sports than in men’s sports. When a female athlete comes out of the closet, it is a ho-hum event.

When a male athlete does so, it is headline news because it is so unusual. It is a rare indeed when a man can lay claim to be more stunning and brave than a female counterpart!

Sexuality aside, is there any benefit to society when women play sports? Now I'm all for physically fit females, but this was not a problem in years past. When women's sports teams were few and far between and fewer women went to college, land whales were almost as rare as white whales. Today body-positivity has clearly triumphed over physical fitness.

Given the fact that goalkeeping, ball handling, making corner kicks, shooting free throws, and other sports-specific skills are of little use in the real world, why waste so much time developing them? The human body is at its peak for relatively few years. For most people, just when they get good at something, their body starts to fall apart. Also, if such skills are developed to their utmost, all it takes is an injury to render them mediocre.

Of course, in days of old, a girl whose tomboy ways persisted into adolescence would have been severely discouraged. She would have been taught sewing, cooking, and the basics of childcare and running a home. Of course, those are merely skills that last a lifetime, so you can't expect a modern woman to waste time on such trifles.

While many parents might not want to push their daughters into sports, they can't help but notice all the female college scholarships on the table. If competing in sports helps alleviate the parental burden of financially supporting a college girl, mom and dad might reluctantly encourage their daughters to play sports and pray that they won't get groomed in the process. After all, mom and dad probably want grandchildren more than they want their daughter to be a college grad.

Of course, young men have always been motivated by athletic scholarships. If your chances of an academic scholarship are slim and you have some sort of athletic talent, you can still go to college for free. This has long been a way out of the ghetto for young black men, and if a college ever did decide to deep-six a losing men's basketball program or football, charges of racism and BLM demonstrations would likely result.

Defenders of men's college sports acknowledge that few amateur athletes will make a living as professionals but extol the "life lessons" they have learned. You know, teamwork, discipline, the importance of playing by the rules, etc. The implication has always been that the lessons learned in any collective enterprise such as a sports team will carry over to one's demeanor in a corporation or society at large. Since life lessons were a thing before organized sports leagues were founded, it makes one wonder how society got along before Major League Baseball, the National Football League, the National Basketball Association, and the National Hockey League were invented. I would suspect that one could learn many life lessons from pursuits other than organized sports…like learning to play a musical instrument, taking care of younger siblings, doing chores, running a small business, learning a foreign language. Before big bucks took over sports, parents were less inclined to indulge their sons' interest in baseball, football, basketball, or whatever.

There may be some truth to the assertion that if boys are playing sports it keeps them out of trouble. This does nothing for boys without athletic skills, but let's assume that for those who do participate in organized sports are venting a fair amount of male energy that might otherwise be expended on anti-social pursuits. The female rates of violent crime are nowhere close to the male crime rate, however, so if female sports were banned, a female crime wave would not result.

Of course, life lessons can also be dragged out to justify women's sports, but with the added benefit of showing women how to compete in a male-dominant world. While the feminists have long decried male culture, they applaud women who adopt that culture, whether in sports, the military, or corporations.

Men's sports at least generate revenue for a university, and for the select few there is the chance at a lucrative professional career, or at least some sort of sinecure as a high school or college coach. Women's sports are generating more revenue than they used to, but still lag way behind men's sports. Thanks to Title IX, however, those women's teams, even if they are financial drains, will remain at colleges and provide coaching jobs for former athletes.

While I don't find tattooed lesbians making layups entertaining, this is not to say I am totally against female sports. If you've ever happened upon a women's beach volleyball tournament on ESPN, you know what I mean. Butt-crack fetishists rejoice! I'm sure sports bras help them play better but if they played topless, the TV ratings would go through the roof.

Female tennis players have long been a source of eyeball candy. Over the years, many of the most popular (not necessarily the best) players were attractive. The web site Ranker has an article by Aaron Hager entitled "The Most Beautiful Female Tennis Players Of 2024." Of course, lesbians are not unknown in tennis (remember Billie Jean King and Martina Navratilova?), but the numbers are not off the charts. The same author also posted "The Most Beautiful Female Golfers of 2024." Again, there have been famous lesbian golfers (Babe Didrickson, Sandra Haynie, Kathy Whitworth) but the numbers are less than overwhelming.

Public interest in female sports is largely a function of how much sex appeal the participants possess. What is true of tennis and golf is also true of figure skating and gymnastics, but since most of the participants in the latter are what used to be called jailbait, male ogling strikes me as a bit creepy. Also suspect is Women's Mixed Martial Arts. I'm not a fan of femme fisticuffs but I realize there is a niche market for same. Frankly, I don't know how you can call it mixed when scratching and hair-pulling are prohibited. Think I'll stick with lingerie football and mud wrestling.

Male or female, spectator sports are clearly a form of bread and circuses to keep the masses amused. Of course, the media promote sports because a large part of their business is broadcasting sporting events and make money off them. The ratings for women sports are much lower, however, as is the income potential for the franchises.

When the media promote women's sports, is it a backhanded way of promoting queerness? Or more to the point, is it a way of promoting birth control? A male athlete can sire children all throughout his career, no matter how long it lasts. A female athlete, however, is at a disadvantage, as she spends her most fertile years on the court, the pitch, or the field. A working woman with an office job can work pretty much all the way through pregnancy. Not so with a female athlete. I seriously doubt that any team doctor would give the OK to a WNBA or NWSL player to continue playing if she was in a family way.

It has long been known that participation in sports puts females at risk for amenorrhea, or menstrual dysfunction. This could range from irregularity to outright cessation of periods, estimated at 25% among “elite” female athletes. While exercise increases male fitness and hence the ability to reproduce, the opposite is true for women. Ironically, the most physically fit women, due to menstrual problems and/or lesbianism, are much less likely to reproduce than their male counterparts.

The world got along just fine before female sports were a thing and would get along just fine if female sports vanished. Of course, we could do without male sports also, though it would leave a bigger vacuum. In the history of civilization men being paid to play games in organized leagues is relatively new. Play is part of being human, but it has usually been a leisure time pursuit, a form of recreation.

Recess was never meant to be turned into a profession. But decadent societies offer its members all sorts of novel ways to make a buck.

Women shocked men won’t approach them after more than a decade of insane feminists yelling at them

April 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Do you plan to attend the Budapest conference (10,11 August)? If so, you need to order your ticket(s) WITHIN THE NEXT SEVEN DAYS.

April 6, 2024 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

We're greatly looking forward to the Budapest conference (10,11 August). The events are the annual showcases for the global men's rights movement, and very important for the morale of the people active within it, as well as countless men and women with an interest in the human rights of men and boys. We have a great speaker line-up, and Janice Fiamengo will be the keynote speaker. Paul Elam and I will be the co-MCs.

As we explained some time ago, here, it's essential that we're confident of a sufficient number of attendees to make the event financially viable, in a timely fashion. This means selling enough tickets (£260.00) by the close of play on 12 April, just seven days away. You can order your ticket(s) here.

We recently published a video including my discussion with Paul Elam and Janice Fiamengo, it's on Paul's YouTube channel, here (video, 17:01).

We look forward to meeting you in Budapest, for another great event, 10 years after the first, organised by Paul Elam and held near Detroit, on behalf of A Voice for Men.

White Knights and Acolytes

April 7, 2024 | by Anja Eriud | Link | Original Link

Been meaning to do this for a while, and now the time is I believe, right. The Men's Human Rights Movement (MHRM) is part of a larger activism spectrum, with feminists on one end – the nasty end – and Men's Human Rights Activists on the other end – the good end. It is an eclectic mix of sites, blogs and youtube channels gradually coalescing around one single idea:

MEN'S RIGHTS ARE HUMAN RIGHTS.

The reason I include feminism at the shitty end and included a shitty end, is because the MHRM is the answer to feminism, is the positive, and on-the-side-of-the-angels Human Rights Movement, to feminism's negative and most definitely on-the-side-of-evil and hatred.

In between these two points is a mixed bag of, first, pseudo-feminists also known as "useful idiots," pawns of feminism, who spout meaningless "women's rights" rubbish and "I only believe in equality" crap. Aligned alongside them are the "White Knight" men who champion women, and not just demonstrably good women, but all women, because you see, all women are special simply for being women.

These white knights have other names: manginas, male feminists, "traditional men." But I prefer a simpler more descriptive word – fools.

There are some other types in this mess in the middle of the spectrum that bear closer scrutiny. These are for example, the chameleons, the shapeshifters, the "whichever way the wind blows" types, one minute they're for men's rights, the next they're talking about how women are actually "a bit discriminated against" don't ya know?

They pay lip service to Men's Rights but really don't want to get too mean about bad behavior from women. Because after all they can prove that NAWALT (Not All Women Are Like That) because these are usually married men, or those in a long-term relationship who have a "good woman" and while they might have experienced a quick blast of truly toxic femininity in their lives, it passed, and they dusted themselves off and voilà, everything came up roses for them.

What they don't actually comprehend, or even glimpse, is that their constant smug affirmation of how "happily married" or "happily coupled up" they are, is an insult. It is a self-absorption of such massive proportions that it blinds them to two things:

The core mission of the MHRM, and the majority of experiences of most men and boys.

It is a slap in the face, a calculated and blithely unaware insult to that core mission, and to the men and boys for whom the MHRM exists to support, to fight for, and to stand up for.

I'm glad they're happy, pleased they have this in their lives but, they are the lucky ones – the blessed – the exception. This is a good thing, but to wave it in the faces of the men and boys who the MHRM exists to serve is thoughtless.

But, they are either incapable or unwilling to see beyond the end of their own noses, to step outside their own limited perspective and see the big picture. All issues must be filtered through the rose-coloured spectacles of their personal lives. Oh yes, they're "sympathetic" and have a superficial grasp of the issues. But the fact that it never occurs to them to shut the fuck up about what a great life/wife/girlfriend they have and continue to wave this smug little world in the faces of deeply hurt, devastated and angry men illustrates how clueless they are about what the MHRM is about.

These are the acolytes. If it's got a vagina then they're hooked, if it plays the "woman card" then you may kiss men's rights goodbye, if it says "I'm just a girl" then it's "gosh darn it and shucks, let's just make a nice comfy place for this little gal to sit herself down" and of course "guys watch your tone, there's laaaaaaaaaaaadies present – watch that mouth buster!"

Which leads me on to the next group in this mixed bag. They are perhaps the most devious, the most underhanded of all, the "I'm not a feminist but…." types. These are those who see the wind changing, who recognise that feminism is dying and realise that if feminism dies, if Men's Rights become a viable and potent force in the cultural, social and political world, then the "women are special" myth dies as well.

This is exactly what is starting to happen. Feminism is dying, women are losing the shield of "perpetual victim and perpetually special" that has served them so well, helping to absolve them of accountability and personal responsibility for themselves.

So, they come, they come sniffing around men's rights sites and blogs with a very specific agenda, to tame men's rights activism, to give it a female twist, to bend it into a woman-centred shape, that they can approve of. After all, men don't get to have rights movements, men couldn't possibly know what the important issues are, nope, men need a certain type of female to come along and knock them back into shape.

They write articles about how "everybody just misunderstands feminism" and "women are still not equaaaaaaall" and "men are still being mean to women", and on and on and on.

But, as with all things, women know that in order to get men to readjust their attitude, they need other men to act as "enforcers" to prevail upon their "brothers in arms" to "see things from the woman's perspective." Again.

We are witnessing the birth of feminism 4.0, the "man-friendly" feminism, the "here's a few crumbs now shut up and let us take care of this whole men's rights" hoo ha. This is the feminism that is now evolving to take into account the growing voices of men, those voices that must not be allowed to get out of control, they must not be allowed to drown out women's voices (as if that was even possible) therefore, some small concessions must be made, a few crumbs thrown men's way, but the goal?

Feminism gets to remain in charge, feminism still gets to control the discourse, and that discourse will be, and always is, from a Woman's Perspective.

But, of all these idiots, worst of all are the male fools, the ones who write articles about how big of a fool they are, who proudly announce their stupidity by declaring themselves to be feminists, how they support “women’s rights” and how all you guys need to get back on your knees and start worshiping the golden uterus again.

Let me explain something for those of the “thinking is hard” mindset: feminism entrenches and translates gynocentrism into political power, it informs public policy, legislation and economic policy.

But it is Women, feminists or not, who entrench hypergamy, the disposability of men, the cultural, political and socially, lesser status of me into everyday life. Women who perpetuate, validate and insinuate the anti-male bias that exists in and at every level of our cultures and societies. Women who drive the engine of feminism, who feed this toxic vile ideology with the corrosive and putrid fuel it needs to keep going.

I’m female, and there is not one single Human Right that I do not have, and then some. Where I live there is absolutely no law, no piece of legislation in existence, that violates any one of my universally-recognised Human Rights. Not one.

In order for me to obtain, or be endowed with, any more “rights” I would have to become a feminist and find some pathetic meaningless pointless “issue” to have a whine about.

And Hell will Freeze Over, before I would become a feminist, in fact, before I would give two flying fucks about “women’s rights.” Anyone, female or male, who thinks or believes for one microsecond that “women’s rights” is a valid issue is a moron who wouldn’t know a Human Rights abuse if it jumped up and bit them on the backside.

So, could all you fools, white knights, manginas and acolytes playing at being Men’s Rights activists kiss my female Irish arse and grow a brain. Thanks.

This item first published on Not A Feminist.

Democracy so fragile

April 8, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

All feminists are tradcons

April 10, 2024 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

In the MRM we often see feminists and tradcons (traditional conservatives) compared and contrasted. We hear that tradcons are almost as bad as feminists. In this article I submit that all feminists are tradcons, though perhaps not all tradcons are feminists.

The initial objection to this thesis is that feminism is radically liberal, while tradcons are conservative, so how can feminists be tradcons? The reason is that under traditional conservative expectations, as with feminism, women have much more relaxed and different rules. There's a very narrow dress code for men, but wide dress code for women. Same with hair, personal expression, and with showing feelings and the expectation that people care about your emotions, or at least will not mock them like we do with male expressions. I'm thinking of the trendy "Manfeelz," "I bathe in male tears," "I drink male tears," "Oh, I hurt your fee-fees?" compared to the traditional-conservative equivalent "Keep a stiff upper lip," and "Boys don't cry."

With feminism and traditional conservatism, women are given more relaxed rules. For feminists, bouncing their bare breasts with the word slut painted on them is an absolute right, of course men don't ever dare take on a similar "slutty" display because the dress code is much stricter with men. In feminist thought, and I think it's safe to say traditional conservatism generally, this would be labeled "creepy", with female feelings being of the utmost importance.

When we look at the shared feminist and tradcon attitudes, near verbatim talking points and views on sex and gender, it makes me wonder if feminism isn't simply a subset of traditional conservatism. When taking a broader view, we see that all feminists are in fact tradcons. Let's talk about five ways feminism is traditional conservatism:

Separate rules for women

Feminists, like all tradcons have a real hard time saying no to women. To them, as a man you need to both satisfy and protect women. Treat her with kid gloves, like a child. To them, a man should never make a woman cry, he needs be attentive to her every need. For example, They'll shout "It's never okay to hit a woman!" Not even to defend yourself or your child? Not even to protect another woman? No. To tradcons, and I include feminists when I say tradcons, women are weak, therefore innocent. Men are strong, therefore abusive. Women can hit men without violating the tradcon mindset, because "What harm can a woman really do against men? Men are stronger." This is where both feminists and tradcons mock abused men, and minimize their issues. Being stronger, to them, means being deserving of abuse.

Real men

"Man up and be a feminist!," "Take it like a man!." Feminists, as tradcons, love controlling male behavior with this idea of "The real man". "Real men are feminists" didn't you know that? I guess I must not be a real man then. And piggybacking on our last point “Real men don’t hit women.” That’s because “Real men protect women.” We need men to sacrifice to their detriment for the benefit of women, that’s how you get to be a “real man.” “Benevolent patriarchy” you see? It’s problematic, except when it directly benefits women… in all other instances, it’s “misogyny writ large.”

Women and children

When the boat starts sinking everyone yells “Women and children first!” It demonstrates the selfless sacrificial love men are trained to have to women they don’t even know. Yet, to a feminist and perhaps even to an everyday tradcon with quite a dim view of men, this selfless sacrificial love is actually based on a hatred of women, on misogyny. Being in the unfortunate position of hearing a feminist try to make this point, we’ll just say it makes sense if you don’t think about it. It’s a recurring theme within feminism, the absolutely indiscriminate use of the concept of hatred with the word misogyny. This might seem like a position where tradcons and feminists disagree, the idea that love for women is hate. Yet, keep in mind the next point.

Men are after women for sex

Tradcons and feminists agree, men are only after women for sex. If he does something nice, watch out! A “nice” guy? No no, naive MRA, men are scum, they’re dangerous. Watch out for the big bad man. To them, men need to be restrained because they are like werewolves, ready to attack innocent women. As with traditional conservatism a female might “flirt” with a man, but a man in the same position is looked at as a potential predator. There’s the presupposition that a man is a up to no good with only sex on his mind, while the woman is pure and innocent. A display of male sexuality is variously “creepy” or “not appropriate,” contrasted with female sexuality where it is variously giving women a wider dress code or the title of “slut pride”. Don’t ever slut shame, you creep!

Men are super men and women are damsels

This last one is probably the biggest point to show how feminism overlaps with traditional conservatism. It screams both at the same time. “Save the women!,” “Fight for women!.” Those brave white knights, feminists, and other tradcons trumpeting the call to rescue those poor damsels. “You don’t say that to a lady,” “Check your privilege before you mansplain to a woman.” This is huge within feminism and a sentiment they love exploiting. Think Elevatorgate, Anita Sarkeesian and feminism generally. Feminism’s whole thing is the “men are evil oppressors”, “Women are oppressed” shtick.

After we consider these five points, we see how feminism is tradcon. When the male-bashing media portrays the MRM as pushing back against feminist over-reach, we have a good reference to see how there hasn’t been “over-reach” it’s simply a new kind of anti-male sentiment substituted for the old. There’s war between men and women for rights that men must lose so that women can win.

Feminism exploits traditional conservatism and our traditional thoughts to attempt to benefit women to the detriment of men in much the same way traditional conservatism expects men to sacrifice for the benefit of women to the detriment of themselves.

Feminism and traditional conservatism are virtually indistinguishable, if not identical.

The silence of the voiceless

April 11, 2024 | by Matthew Steele | Link | Original Link

The silence in the morning, when a man is outside breathing in the crisp winter air, alone with his thoughts and emotions, we say is golden. We never dare admit, however, these are the moments when we reflect on the emotions that have cracked the stony exterior of our being. We stand there quietly, even stoically, while we wage a war on ourselves, with no white flags being raised to stop the fighting. If another man were a fly on the wall, he may see the shimmer of a tear in our eyes, and the effort to swallow hard to choke the emotions back down. In the midst of the battle inside our minds and hearts, we would bellow a cry of rage and despair, but men have no such luxury, for silence to us, is golden.

As the sun breaks, the hues of purple shimmer from the rocks in the distance, and the rays of orange streak across the sky, illuminating the heavens, it begins the darkening of my mind. I find myself drifting from moment to moment, searching for answers that will never be given. In the darkest moments of our lives, unbidden at any time, there is the fear that the darkness will enclose us forever and we will fade into that oblivion. What is even worse, the fear subsides and we slip into those dark moments, wishing it would close off the light forever, and we can slip into that cold embrace. It would be easier to slip into that darkness, to let the physical pain that grips our chest subside; easier to forget the face of our fathers, and our children. Lest we forget, nothing that came easy was ever really worth having, and the consequence of those actions are too much for those who love us to bear.

So we walk in the darkness, we continue in the night, though the sun breathes warmth to our face in the cold air of winter. We forget the taste of food, and we plunge headlong into the bottom of a bottle of whiskey. We become old friends with the names on those bottles, and we let them fight the war on our pain, because we feel we have no strength left to fight the struggles. The air hangs like a stone on us, and every breath brings that old familiar ache in our hearts.

We can feel it, it is the physical expression of our emotional war. We can see it, like brutal autumn rain on a windshield, pouring across our eyes. As the rain pours down, the thunder crashes in our heads, and the weight becomes too heavy to bear, we fall like toy soldiers to our knees. We would cry out, and we try, but the emotions have choked our voice, and all that is left of that voice is the silent scream of the voiceless.

Men are not in touch with their emotions. Men do not feel anything. They have no compassion, they are automatons, they cannot communicate effectively, they do not feel to the depth women do and need consistent reminding of their inability to be complete human beings without women. They are not good parents without womanly guidance. They are not capable of properly providing a good home to a child without a woman. If they do not prostrate themselves in their relationships then it is acceptable to dispose of them and upgrade to a servant who will do as they are told. Men do not understand women, they lack the emotional maturity; they lack empathy, and they will abandon their responsibilities with no regard to whom they hurt because they do not feel emotions the way a woman does.

The thoughts weigh heavily as we go through our lives. Through the distorted hues of cold stones in a scotch glass, we try desperately to see how we came to this place. The emptiness of a room, filled with only a chair and a bottle, starts to close in on us. The ghosts of our past, and the events that led us to this room, without light, devoid of the smile of our children, haunts us to the core of our being. There are tears in this moment, as we sit, stone cold sober, staring at a drink untouched. We would give anything to change this moment, to hear laughter again, to trip over a skateboard, or step on a stuffed animal. We would give everything, for more moments like that, if it had not been robbed from us.

We gave our hearts, our time, our very souls, for that idea of completeness. We gave every waking moment, to a hope, and a dream. We never saw the betrayal coming, not from her, and not from the courts.

Yet, we were betrayed from the very first day. Oh, we knew, somewhere inside us, that it would come; that as time passed, and our favorite chair was thrown out, and our faults more viciously thrown at us as each day came and went. We lied to ourselves, and we took that abuse. We took it as she constantly reminded us of our shortcomings, told us how lucky we were to have her, and what failures we were as men. You do not make enough, you do not wash the dishes enough, you do not fix enough things around this house. You are not a good parent, you do not know how to communicate, you do not understand me, you do not give me any time for myself.

We let her shove us, and hit us while we stood in confusion. We ducked as she threw scissors and broke picture frames, and cleaned up the glass so our child would not be injured in the morning. What is worse, is that we believed we deserved all of it.

There are men, who, even now sit in the deepest of despair, and their sorrow dwells deep in their eyes. I watch as you men torture yourselves, placing your soul in chambers of the most brutal sort, and the iron maiden swings high from the chains you are bound in. Your mind spins like a wounded plane. Turning inward on yourself, you place heavy loads of blame, doubt, shame and even self loathing on your heart, believing you have to carry that weight. Like a little boy lost with no compass in the deepest of forests, you search endlessly for the way out. You take it, you endure it, until the strain cracks your stony facade like a sledge hammer to a pane of old glass. Make no mistake, you will fall. You will be buried under the rubble of their feminist revolution.

You can lay there, brother. You can lay there in the darkness, as the weight crushes the last of your life from you, and the sweet dark embraces you into the eternal black. However, there is another road you can choose. For outside that stone prison are the voices of your fathers, and their fathers before them. They bid you to get up, to push the weight away from your chest, and stand again; to let the sweet orange light of the morning bathe your face, and refresh your soul with its warmth. To remember your face is that of your father, and his father before him. To remember that your child is out there, and that child has your face.

Will you leave that child to someday be buried as you are? Will you sentence that child to that fate? Or would you, for one moment, strip away the shame, and the pain, that is not yours to bear, and remember you are not alone. Your brothers wait for you, and in that dark moment, if you reach through the stone, we will extend our hand and help you stand in the midst of others who pushed their way out as well. As the tears fade, and the moment of darkness ends; as the light pours down onto the sweet green of the trees, we will find our strength again.

We will do this together, and we will bring hell down on those who perpetuate injustice against fathers, and in doing so, perpetuate against their children as well. We will not be silent, we will not back down, we will never stop. We will do what is needed to see those little smiles again, no matter the cost, no matter the pain. We will ensure that our sons are not left in the darkness as we were. We will breathe deep that morning air, and let the roars of our voices thunder across the morning sky. We will have our justice, and true equality. We. Will.

Men in decline as the establishment looks away

April 12, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

False accusations as entrepreneurship

April 13, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Rape and assault are treated very seriously and very severely in India, despite what the Western media might have you think. Indian women know the power of a false accusation. And they're not afraid to use it.

Male Domestic Abuse – one man’s story (Curled Up)

April 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

A moving and impressive video from the folks at Mankind Initiative.

Subscribe to Maxade147.

Men: Ask her for something

April 15, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

“Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” – a book review

April 16, 2024 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

“Going Your Own Way: Understanding MGTOW” is a book released by Peter Wright and Paul Elam, and (as far as my research shows me) is the first serious publication that attempts to define, explain, and introduce MGTOW to the general public, as well as become sort of a “constitution” of the Men Going Their Own Way movement.

It is incredibly well written, clear, and succinct, and necessarily so as it attempts to lay down the theoretical foundations for an embryonic concept that will only be damaged if more concrete measures were made to define it. This immediately debunks Mr. Elam’s and Mr. Wright’s critics (who claim the authors are trying to claim MGTOW for their own and that it can’t be defined) as nearly two full chapters are dedicated to explaining how MGTOW is similar to an open source software wherein nobody can claim rights to it. After much explaining and intellectual honesty, I believe they manage to best define it as “male self-determination” and am inclined to agree.

With definitions out of the way, the book then delves into many aspects of traits of MGTOW laying down the logic, reason, empiricism, history, psychology, economic and other causes for the MGTOW phenomenon. I was particularly impressed with the amount of research that went into the historical (sometimes, ancient) study of “bachelors,” “bachelor theory,” and the bachelor lifestyle, providing not just historical perspective, but a shocking insight into society’s past psychological relationship with bachelors (for example “bachelor taxes” and the presumption bachelors some how owed it to society to marry and breed). I was also very impressed with the time dedicated towards pair bonding and attachment. The reason for this is that the same critics who berate Elam and Wright for daring to write a book about MGTOW, are also the same people who in a very hypocritical way insist on a rule that “no real MGTOW” would have anything to do with women. This false belief, unfortunately, presents a huge risk to the younger and disaffected men who search and find the MGTOW community, as they are consequently tempted to dismiss women altogether, women that may actually be of great benefit and contribution to their lives.

About the only real complaint or concern I had about the book was what I believed to be the overly liberal use of excerpts from various books, texts, and periodicals. Entire pages of “The Odyssey” and “The Art of Courtly Love” are quoted, where I would have just preferred some key quotes and then more analysis and commentary from the authors. There were also some philosophical and technical differences and disagreements that I had with the book, but nothing that would get my panties in a bundle, unlike many of the authors’ critics.

Besides that, I believe because the book is the first of its kind and is (more or less) introductory in nature, a glossary would be helpful to young men (and women) who are first being introduced to the concepts therein. “Gynocentrism,” “VAWA,” “hypergamy,” etc. are all terms that the average person does not know, and because of this may be misled into thinking it’s one of those “faux” studies like “women’s studies” where academians create made up words and acronyms to sound smart.

Overall, however, the book is a very good, thorough, and honest summation of what MGTOW is, easily digestible by the beginning reader or a people more involved and aware of the MGTOW philosophy. I would strongly recommend it as a primer to anyone looking to understand or research the topic. I would also strongly recommend ignoring all the fake reviews on Amazon as many in the MGTOW community viewed Mr. Wright’s and Elam’s writing of this book as “sacrilege” and have since been voting it down with faux votes.

Editorial update: Aaron also sent us this video, which he did shortly before finishing the book and writing the review. The reviews on Amazon from people who haven’t even read the book are rather bemusing.

Toward a ‘Gender Transition Movement’ (GTM)

April 17, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

The following is a Wiki4Men entry describing Warren Farrell’s proposed ‘Gender Transition Movement.’

* * *

Warren Farrell, author of The Myth of Male Power, advocates a “gender transition movement” which refers to more role-sharing among men and women than has traditionally been the case. Farrell proposes, for example, that women may wish to contribute more labor and more income so that “neither sex is expected to pay more than half the income,”[1] and men may wish to spend more time with family so that “both sexes raise the children.” [2,3]

Farrell states, “Taking what had worked for most women traditionally and seeing it as a plot against them led us to see men as “owing” women. This created Stage II entitlement: women being entitled to compensation for past oppression. This prevented us from seeing the need to make a transition from Stage I to Stage II together : the need not for a women’s movement or a men’s movement, but for a gender transition movement.” [4]

He further states, “A gender transition movement will be the longest of all movements because it is not proposing merely to integrate blacks or Latinos into a system that already exists; rather, it is proposing an evolutionary shift in the system itself—an end to “woman-the-protected” and “man-the-protector.”[5]

Farrell breaks down his proposed gender transition movement into stages of a grand historical process, which can be described as follows:

- 1. Historically men and women adhered to strict gender roles for the sake of survival.
- 2. Women chose to “liberate” themselves from that role to gain more freedom.
- 3. Men have responded women’s “liberation” by proposing they too might be liberated from some traditional gender roles.
- 4. Ideally this unfolding process can culminate in a gender liberation movement for both sexes.[6]

References:

1. The Myth of Male Power
2. The Myth of Male Power
3. Warren Farrell, Toward A Gender Transition Movement, in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?
4. The Myth of Male Power
5. Warren Farrell, Toward A Gender Transition Movement, in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?

6. The Myth of Male Power

Human sexual dimorphism

April 18, 2024 | by Dr. Robert Sapolsky | Link | Original Link

What Men Fear the Most

April 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Paul discusses primary fear men have.

Female Privilege on the Titanic

April 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

John Stuart Mill on chivalry

April 21, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

In 1869 John Stuart Mill published his gynocentric work The Subjection of Women (SOW), stating that while people everywhere were being freed from social roles, women remained tethered to theirs, stating: "Men hold women in subjection by representing to them meekness, submissiveness, and resignation of all individual will into the hands of a man, as an essential part of sexual attractiveness." (SOW, p. 272). Ironically, Mill sympathizes with women's subjection while lauding the male chivalry that women both inspired and were recipients of. Mill contends that male chivalry, however, was not always reliable and thus must give way to a more reliable, State-enforced protection and benevolence toward women.

In light of Mill's gynocentrism, Ernest Belfort Bax published an incisive rejoinder to the book pointing out the greater injustices faced by men.

The following is a quote from Mill's venerated SOW – PW

The moral influence of women: chivalry

The other mode in which the effect of women's opinion has been conspicuous is by giving a powerful stimulus to those qualities in men which, not being themselves trained in, it was necessary for them that they should find in their protectors. Courage, and the military virtues generally, have at all times been greatly indebted to the desire which men felt of being admired by women: and the stimulus reaches far beyond this one class of eminent qualities, since, by a very natural effect of their position, the best passport to the admiration and favour of women has always been to be thought highly of by men.

From the combination of the two kinds of moral influence thus exercised by women, arose the spirit of chivalry: the peculiarity of which is to aim at combining the highest standard of the warlike qualities with the cultivation of a totally different class of virtues – those of gentleness, generosity, and self-abnegation towards the non-military and defenseless classes generally, and a special submission and worship directed towards women; who were distinguished from the other defenceless classes by the high rewards which they had it in their power voluntarily to bestow on those who endeavoured to earn their favour, instead of extorting their subjection.

Though the practice of chivalry fell even more sadly short of its theoretic standard than practice generally falls below theory, it remains one of the most precious monuments of the moral history of our race; as a remarkable instance of a concerted and organised attempt by a most disorganised and distracted society, to raise up and carry into practice a moral ideal greatly in advance of its social condition and institutions; so much so as to have been completely frustrated in the main object, yet never entirely inefficacious, and which has left a most sensible, and for the most part a highly valuable impress on the ideas and feelings of all subsequent times.

The chivalrous ideal is the acme of the influence of women's sentiments on the moral cultivation of mankind: and if women are to remain in their subordinate situation, it were greatly to be lamented that the chivalrous standard should have passed away, for it is the only one at all capable of mitigating the demoralising influences of that position. But the changes in the general state of the species rendered inevitable the substitution of a totally different ideal of morality for the chivalrous one.

Chivalry was the attempt to infuse moral elements into a state of society in which everything depended for good or evil on individual prowess, under the softening influences of individual delicacy and generosity. In modern societies, all things, even in the military department of affairs, are decided, not by individual effort, but by the combined operations of numbers; while the main occupation of society has changed from fighting to business, from military to industrial life. The exigencies of the new life are no more exclusive of the virtues of generosity than those of the old, but it no longer entirely depends on them.

The main foundations of the moral life of modern times must be justice and prudence; the respect of each for the rights of every other, and the ability of each to take care of himself. Chivalry left without legal check all those forms of wrong which reigned unpunished throughout society; it only encouraged a few to do right in preference to wrong, by the direction it gave to the instruments of praise and admiration. But the real dependence of morality must always be upon its penal sanctions – its power to deter from evil. The security of society cannot rest on merely rendering honour to right, a motive so comparatively weak in all but a few, and which on very many does not operate at all.

Modern society is able to repress wrong through all departments of life, by a fit exertion of the superior strength which civilisation has given it, and thus to render the existence of the weaker members of society (no longer defenseless but protected by law) tolerable to them, without reliance on the chivalrous feelings of those who are in a position to tyrannise. The beauties and graces of the chivalrous character are still what they were, but the rights of the weak, and the general comfort of human life, now rest on a far surer and steadier support; or rather, they do so in every relation of life except the conjugal.

Featured image of John Stuart Mill courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Budapest conference

April 22, 2024 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

We are disappointed to report that sales of tickets by the deadline of 12 April were insufficient to persuade us that the event would be self-funding, so the in-person event has been cancelled. However, we have some positive things to report:

- The event will now be 'online' and consist of the publication of talks by the speakers on our YouTube channel. Previous ICMI talk playlists here.
- The legendary Paul Elam, the man who launched the ICMI series with an event near Detroit in 2014 and the man behind the XY Crew initiative, will be flying to Budapest to host the "XY Crew Jamboree, Budapest". To attend, you'll need to enrol as a member of XY Crew – membership is strictly limited to men – details here. Having attended a former XY Crew Jamboree (in the United States) I know you'll be assured of a great time with some terrific red-pilled men.

I shall be contacting the ticket buyers shortly to offer refunds.

As with most of the previous in-person ICMIs, a crowdfunder was used to cover the costs associated with video recording and editing of the talks. The ICMI24 crowdfunding page is here. If you donated to it, we hope you'll be prepared for your money to be retained to fund videos at future in-person ICMIs. But if you'd prefer a full or partial refund of your donation(s) please contact Tom Caulfield (aka Anthony Corniche) – the video maker from previous ICMIs since 2016 – at tom@tokkelossi.com.

This isn't the end of ICMIs, but we shall consider how they might need to change, going forward. Next year's event will be hosted by Rob Brockway in Sydney, Australia, the 2026 event in the United States (details to follow in due course). I shall be hosting one in 2027.

Have a good week, and thanks for your support.

Eating MGTOW: Stuffed Chauvinist Pig

April 23, 2024 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

---

I was a bit hesitant to write an article for this MGTOW series since it brought back college memories of my little British sports car, once again sitting on the side of the road in dire need of transport back to the service station for yet another repair I couldn't afford.

You see, back when I was a frat boy in college majoring in courses now related to rape studies, I decided that, in order to attract all the young, innocent, drunken college women that I was entitled to introduce to patriarchy, I would need a sexy little car. Instead, I bought an MG.

It looked like a car, but it mostly just sat in the parking lot at the frat house because, well, it was British and that is pretty much what British cars did back then. But I guess that is only fair since I have criticized Paul's recipes and called August's chicken boring, that I give them a chance to criticize my own recipe. So, although my MGTOW isn't quite the same as their MGTOW (NAMGTOWALT), a little diversity never hurts, right?

So I give you:

Stuffed Chauvinist Pig
(about 12-15 servings)

1 pork loin (about 5 lbs, costs about $12.50)

Trim any excess fat and starting about half an inch from the end cut a lengthwise opening along one side of the loin to within about half an inch of the other end. Cut as deep as you can without piercing the other side. The opening will form a large gaping gash into which you can thrust… well, you'll see.

Marinade
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine
¼ cup (60 ml) white wine vinegar
½ cup (120 ml) apple juice
1 tbs sriracha (15 ml) chili sauce
1 or 2 dashes Worcestershire sauce
Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, thyme

Like anything that is about to be stuffed, the pork loin should be well lubed. Combine the marinade ingredients; place your loin into as small a container as it will fit and pour on the marinade. Put it back into the fridge and leave it alone for anywhere from a couple of hours to overnight.

You can do this with a pork loin but don't try putting off young, innocent, drunken college women. This is asking for a false rape accusation whether you indulge them or not: they may come to regret the experience and then so will you.

Stuffing
½ cup (120 ml) dry bulgur
½ cup (120 ml) dry buckwheat

2 cups (480 ml) water
Seasonings: Salt, pepper, sage, rosemary, and thyme
½ cup (120 ml) pecan pieces
½ cup (120 ml) dried fruit (I like raisins, dates, figs, apricots, prunes, cranberries, etc. Just chop anything large into raisin or cranberry-sized pieces)

Cook the bulgur and buckwheat in the water with the seasonings (it cooks the same as rice). If you've purchased whole pecans put some of your excess testosterone to good use by placing them between paper towels on the counter and violently battering them into submission with a mallet. If you've got large pieces of dried fruit, now would be a good time to hone your knife skills by chopping the fruit into small pieces. Mix into the cooked grains.

Preheat the oven to 350 degrees F (about 175 C). Remove your meat from the marinade and pat dry with a paper towel to get rid of some of the evidence. Stuff the meat with as much of the stuffing as you can.

If you know how to tie a stuffed piece of meat, then now is a good time to apply a little bondage. If not, use a few toothpicks to secure the stuffing.

Place your loin on a baking sheet and roast in the oven until the internal temperature (in the center of the stuffing) reads at least 150 F (about 65 C).

Remove from the oven and allow to rest for about 20 minutes. Remove the string or toothpicks and cut into 1 inch slices. Serve with any leftover stuffing and steamed veggies.

But wait, there's more.

No good piece of meat is ever finished until you've smothered it in white sauce.

Dilute about half a cup of mayo with some white wine vinegar until it drizzles nicely off a spoon. Add a little minced garlic and/or grated horseradish, some salt and coarse ground black pepper. Drizzle over your loin.

Voilà! Stuffed Chauvinist Pig.

Sadly, I never did become the serial rapist that my feminist overlords insisted that I should aspire to be.

Instead, my career options as either patriarch or as MGTOW were cut short when I sold the car and met a nice Asian woman who wanted nothing more than to make my sammiches, bring me beer, and massage my feet; all while working two jobs so I don't have to.

The forces on men

April 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

This video takes a look at the forces on men in our culture. It shows how the power of gynocentrism filters down to a wide variety of places, some unexpected, in order to negatively impact men and boys.

Featured image courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

“Can’t explain” – the evil of Parental Alienation

April 25, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

An excellent look at a persistent evil that hurts parents and children alike.

The Company of Saint Ursula

April 25, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The feminist historical narrative tells us that men have been systematically oppressing women for at least 5000 years. The more someone looks at history the more it becomes clear this isn't true. History is replete with examples of women active in business and politics. Despite what feminists will tell you, societies historically educated their girls as well as their boys. In some societies the education was gender-specific but boys and girls were taught what they needed to know to survive in their societies. Feminists will then go on to tell you that women were only educated to be submissive and obedient. They have a bad answer for everything.

In 1535 Italian woman Angela Merici founded an organisation that still exists today – The Company of Saint Ursula. We might think that a woman able to achieve this in the 16th century would have to be aristocratic or very wealthy. Not so. Merici's parents had been farmers but she was orphaned at 10. She and her sister were taken in by an uncle while her brothers remained to run the family farm. Today we would call her family middle class, perhaps upper middle class.

Later when her sister died she became more religiously devout. At 20 Merici moved back to the family farm. She was apparently given a plot of land of her own by her brothers. It doesn't appear that she was under any pressure to marry. She could have lived on her farm, in safety, unmarried, for the rest of her life if she wished. Instead she started a school for girls. Later she did the same in a nearby city.

It was at this point that Merici established the Company of Saint Ursula. Notably the organisation is not monastic. The members participate in community life like anyone else with many today having regular jobs. The organisation continues to admit only women.

Merici believed she had received a calling from God but whatever the reason she quickly attracted a group of followers, men and women alike. Ultimately she decided to make her new organisation female-only. She selected 12 women as founding members. These women devoted themselves to caring for the sick and educating girls under the leadership of Merici.

By the time of her death in 1540 there were 24 communities in Italy educating girls and tending to the sick. In 1544 the Pope approved the rules she had set out for the organisation and he formally recognised it in 1546. In the late 16th century some chapters of the organisation adopted monasticism and thus left the organisation originally set up by Merici.

All of this was done by women in a time when they were supposedly oppressed by men. In this case one woman established an organisation, women then gathered and excluded men. They set up schools for girls. And all of this received the endorsement of the church hierarchy.

Like other religious organisations, the organisation was suppressed by Napoleon Boneparte following his invasion of Italy. The organisation recovered after French forces withdrew and continued to grow. The 20th century saw the organisation expand outside of Italy.

Interestingly, and perhaps surprisingly the organisation is named after a Romano-British woman from late 4th century England who even the Catholic Church admits might not have existed. Regardless, Merici very much admired Saint Ursula. The organisation claims Merici wanted her followers to adhere to the ideals of this ancient British saint.

Here we see some of the key points highlighted in The Victorian Fallacy:

- The feminist historical narrative is largely fiction
- Men have not systematically oppressed women around the world and throughout history
- Both men and women have been active participants in societies around the world and throughout history
- When women want to take on typically male roles men generally let them

The featured image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and depicts the resting place of Saint Angela Merici.

The final sacrifice

April 26, 2024 | by cooterbee | Link | Original Link

For the first time in history men are starting to address the concept of male disposability. Most of us hope that male disposability is merely a long standing social construct that may be dispatched with careful education and diligent application. What if it is not? What if it is, somehow, encoded in Y chromosome DNA and there is no prospect of dismissing it from our very natures? The tangible result of fully embracing a biological determination at the outer limits of its realization would be the exactly the same as the repudiation of an obsolete cultural meme.

As we understand it, male disposibility is the willingness to sacrifice that which is ours for the sake of women and society. If we absolutely must do so then let's make it count. The value of a sacrifice is proportional to how much it is cherished by the donor.

Some sacrifices made in the past:

Our Fortunes – for pikers – Whether it be a few coins in the Salvation Army kettle or vast corporate scale philanthropy, charity is an inferior sacrifice because it is an offering of material, not of the soul. Though there can be much benevolence behind it, the gift, itself, is impersonal.

Our Freedom – small potatoes – Military enlistment, matrimony and monasticism are examples of renouncing freedom. Though they are spiritual commitments, they narrow one's scope from a wider to a smaller world. One has to wonder if they can be considered a sacrifice at all in some cases because they are sometimes used as a voluntary refuge or outlet for personal ambition.

Our Chastity – no pain, no gain – To remain chaste is to defeat a very strong biological imperative. No mean feat. But is it a sacrifice or an orderly retreat in the face of stronger punitive factors such as STD's, a corrupt legal system and acrimonious interpersonal relations?

Our Lives – we can do better than that – Death is often called the supreme sacrifice. I beg to differ. Men have been willing to die for things as crass as money. Men have thrown their lives away for rabid patriotism, religious zealotry, mindless ideology and a host of other ephemeral and questionable reasons. Most often, men forfeit their lives to protect something even more dear, namely, the esteem and approval of women.

If men were in bitter earnest about making the most meaningful sacrifice, that sacrifice would be the regard of women. It is so valuable that men routinely lose life itself to secure it. It is moral because under the utilitarian definition of morality, if every man in the world forsook female approval simultaneously, conditions would improve. Lastly, it would be a highly personal act of devotion toward the betterment of all mankind. A most fitting sacrifice.

If male disposability is a social construct, then we extinguish it in accordance with our manifest will. If it is a biological directive, then we fulfill it by laying female approval on the alter of our DNA. Either way, disposibility is gone.

Suzanne McCarley interviewed on anti-feminism

April 28, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Long-time AVfM staff member Suzanne McCarley is interviewed here:

SJW MELTDOWN CHALLENGE: Do You Have What It Takes?!

April 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Defining and Implementing Zeta Masculinity

May 1, 2024 | by cooterbee | Link | Original Link

Zeta Masculinity is not a new concept. It has existed since the Axial Age and has had many adherents in every epoch of civilization since. Though it comes to our attention when many attempts at proscribing a new masculinity are in vogue. Most of these are contrived collections of mores and traits constructed at the behest of and for the convenience of women. Zeta masculinity is very different. It is ancient. It has always been a viable life strategy. The principles are unified and well developed. It is unquestionably and uniquely male in origin and practice. So much so that it is doubtful that any woman could ever pursue or mimic it and it would never be mistaken for a feminist inspired new manhood.

The main difference between the traditional Alpha, Beta, Omega model of masculinity and Zeta masculinity is focus. Traditional masculinity emphasizes duty to the man's particular society and the women in it. Zeta masculinity is devotion to a duty to humanity as a whole within in the service of virtue. The familiar traditional model depends greatly upon physical prowess, conformity and aggression – traits that advance the interests of society. Men who are not physically gifted men, men who are inhibited in the ways of aggression or have an unconventional turn of mind can often struggle to obtain an acceptable self image using the traditional model. Zeta masculinity, on the other hand, places a premium upon discipline and mental acuity – characteristics that further civilization, that ALL men can cultivate and do not have to be born with. Since it is not inborn, it can be acquired peace-meal, refined and altered according to a man's particular situation, and even discarded as conditions warrant.

Core Concepts – The three "V's"

Virtue – To a Zeta, virtue is an important concept. It is not to be confused with hand wringing shame over sexuality or bathroom activity. It is the manifestation of supremely developed skill – as in a virtuoso. Virtue is far too important an idea to limit it to the mere abstention from sex.

Volition – Other types of men have duties and responsibilities forced upon them by society. A Zeta man voluntarily selects his own duties in furtherance of his own purposes. This has two very important implications for mankind: 1) The individual judgment of a Zeta is superior to and more functional than the received edicts of his society. He may freely choose the optimum solution over the proscribed and most often faulty course of action that his society directs. 2) A Zeta may change his mind. When events go badly, the Zeta man has the flexibility to evaluate circumstances and change direction immediately and unapologetically. Ordinary men typically do not. They are bound by such sentiments as "My country right or wrong", "He who is not for us is against us" or even a simple "Stay the course." Only an ordinary, traditional man would think, "A man's gotta do what a man's gotta do". A Zeta believes a man's gotta do what he sees fit.

Veracity – Truth is the Zeta's stock in trade. It is his final and only authority and the basis of everything he thinks, says or does. He spreads it like seed and he gathers it like grain.

Prominent Zetas of the Past

Plato, Themistocles, Augustus, Seneca, Diocletian, Augustine, Gregory the Great, Benedict, Scotus, Anselm, Chaucer, Dante, Copernicus, Machiavelli, Columbus, Luther, Marlowe, Raleigh, Newton, Penn, Charles II,Voltaire, Rossini, Casanova, Hamilton, Jefferson, Emerson, Lincoln, Forrest, Bismark, Lord Byron, Lloyd George, Hemingway, Lenin, Rohm, Hess, Shostakovitch, Picasso

Special Mention

Diogenes – Cynic philosopher who slept in a barrel and carried a lamp through Athens in daylight looking for an honest man. Had the stones to trifle with Alexander the Great (Alpha if there ever was one) not once but twice and was permitted to live. Alexander went out to meet the notorious Diogenes and found him sun bathing. Alexander asked Diogenes if there was anything he could do for him. Diogenes said "Yes. Get out of my light." Alexander also found him studying a pile of bones. Diogenes told Alexander that he was searching for the bones of Alexander's father (Phillip II) but he could not distinguish them from the bones of a slave. Alexander stated that if he were not Alexander, he would wish to be Diogenes.

Julian the Apostate – Roman Emperor, writer, reformer and most accomplished man of his time. Gibbon (a celebrated Beta) said of him that if he had not been Emperor, Julian would have excelled in any circumstance. He would have obtained or at least deserved the highest honors of any profession he chose.

Zeta Jump Start

It is the nature of Zeta masculinity to be highly individualized. Therefore, it doesn't lend itself readily to rules or guiding principles. Most of the writings about Zeta are often a bit vague as Zetas don't demand any particular behavior of another man. Still, there is at least one proven tenant that if fully explicated and diligently applied to all facets of life, will yield the intended result. A man need to remember only one thing:

"A man is rich in proportion to the number of things he can afford to let alone." – Henry David Thoreau

- If he can let pussy alone, there is no chance of being exploited by women.
- If he can let pride alone, he cannot be manipulated.
- If he can let fame alone, he will not be a target for envy.
- If he can let drugs and alcohol alone, he avoids a myriad of problems. etc.

By this saying, a Zeta is always a very rich man. He practices the virtue of restraint and sets himself apart from those on the hamster wheel. He does so according to his own priorities and his own understanding. He is his own man and an indisputably masculine one. It is now and has always been the mark of a superior existence.

Classic Elam: The new male archetypes: Servant, Slave and Scapegoat

May 2, 2024 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

> "The modern hero, the modern individual who dares to heed the call and seek the mansion of that presence with whom it is our whole destiny to be atoned, cannot, indeed must not, wait for his community to cast off its slough of pride, fear, rationalized avarice, and sanctified misunderstanding. 'Live,' Nietzsche says, 'as though the day were here.' It is not society that is to guide and save the creative hero, but precisely the reverse. And so every one of us shares the supreme ordeal––carries the cross of the redeemer––not in the bright moments of his tribe's great victories, but in the silences of his personal despair." Joseph Campbell ~ The Hero with a Thousand Faces

♦ ♦ ♦

Anyone suggesting they have ideas that will actually help men, psychologically speaking, has an obligation to place their philosophy, their rationale, front and center for men to see. I also understand that most practitioners don't really do that, especially in what I loosely define as the "mental health" industry.

Usually what you get is a short and sputtering list of platitudes about "wholeness," finding your "inner this" or "inner that," accompanied by an obscure definition of the practitioner's approach. It is either that or you get nothing but the bill.

Sometimes, often actually, they will inform you that they subscribe to feminist theory, which is an admission of their philosophy, except to the extent that it should be viewed cautiously, regardless of your sex.

Perseus

This writing is intended to explain exactly what An Ear for Men is about in regard to assisting men, specifically in their more modern struggle for identity and an understanding of where they fit in the world. This is particularly important as the lack of those things may well result in some serious problems. Among them are family dysfunction, substance abuse, suicide, violence, anxiety, depression, shame and a lack of self-respect that often crosses the line into self-hatred.

It is not that the current crisis of male identity is the sole cause of these problems. It certainly isn't. For example, family dysfunction is a self-perpetuating malady passed down from parents to children. In and of itself it has little to do with modern masculinity. Alcoholism is not a "male problem," nor is violence or other forms of abuse, though those practicing under a feminist shingle may send that very message.

When assessing problems, it can be very difficult to tell the difference between cause and symptom, between a problem and its source. Does family dysfunction cause substance abuse or is substance abuse the cause of the dysfunction? Is violence at the root of relationship problems or do relationship problems fuel and promote the violence? Do communication problems cause hostility or does hostility cause communication problems?

Are all these problems symbiotic, just a teeter-totter interaction of various pathologies feeding each other? If so, can we ameliorate one problem by successfully intervening on another?

I suggest that there may be some truth answering those last two questions in the affirmative. There are, however, workarounds, back doors if you will, to what may well form part of the root structure of an array of problems with no readily visible connection. The good news about that is that you don't need to see the connection initially in order to do something about it.

The philosophy here is that solutions begin with a recognition that there is indeed a crisis in male identity and male self-respect. It affects all of us, gay or straight, black or white or other race, regardless of religion or socioeconomic status.

Fifty years of gender politics have thrust all men into a new paradigm of sexual politics with no rule book. We are now three generations of men who have been pummeled with messages of who we are, almost all of them wrong, and who we are supposed to be, almost all of them destructive in one way or another. Our mental health industry is one of the prime proponents of these misguided ideas. They are espoused, for profit, at the expense of our men and boys.

The Old School Archetypes

The classic, historical masculine archetypes of Hero, Villain, Ruler, Warrior, Creator, Sage, Rebel and Explorer, all of which either defined what men chose or what they were driven to be. They provided men a model of what they chose not to be as well. They gifted men with a sense of identity and purpose, a rudder for their navigation of life. To a great degree (with some downsides) they worked. Jungian analysts, in the days before the ideological corruption of the field of psychology would likely tell you that these archetypes are rooted in our biology.[1]

It is also important to note that all these archetypes are anthropomorphic projections of the human male experience. They took root in our earliest mythologies because they were already in play in human life. Strangely, "mythology" told the real story of our lives.

Every epic battle, great journey, tragedy and triumph of mythical figures mirrored the internal and external experience of real human beings in some way or another.

And so it went from epoch to epoch.

All that has been supplanted with a new and toxic narrative. To simplify it, we now live in a Zeitgeist where all male archetypes have been reduced to that of Villain, with the expectation that they will assume the role of Hero when needed…and directed. The ongoing expectations of men to protect, provide, sacrifice and endure have not changed. The change in narrative, however, demands that recognition and honoring of those things ceases in favor of persistent demonization.

Hera

Similar changes have happened in the lives of women. The Manipulator, the Bitch, the Saboteur, the Queen and the Damsel in Distress have usurped the timeless archetypes of mother (Demeter), daughter (Persephone), lover (Aphrodite), civic life and learning (Athena), etc.. While all these and other female archetypes are on full social display, the spectrum of those archetypes has begun to degrade into a vacillation between two roles based on immediate perception. Women are universally seen as the Queen, unless they are in distress or claim to be in distress. Once the perception of female distress registers, social consciousness reverts them to being the original Damsel in Distress. It is as though they live in a perpetual state of flux between empowered and helpless, depending on which is more advantageous, just as we see play out today across the geopolitical landscape.

That, too, is ultimately heading for a crisis of identity in women, though for the purpose of this discussion we need not explore that further.

The denial of all this, and the assumption that it has not had a tremendous impact on the psyches of men, has left them in an emotional and social wasteland that produces more of the psychosocial problems already identified in this writing.

This leads to an inescapable conclusion. While men do need assistance with specific problems, they are also suffering in a famine of functional archetypes. Failing to recognize this, even if we seek in earnest to help them with problems symptomatic of that deficit, is putting a Band-Aid on potentially mortal wounds.

If we are to help men, it requires us to enable them to nurture a new narrative of themselves and their lives. They need new archetypes that foster a new sense of identity if they are going to thrive in a new age.

So what exactly is an archetype?

The Greek root words are archein, meaning “original or old,” and typos, meaning “Model or type.” Archetype: Original Model. Archetypes are the old, original models on which men, in the unconscious recesses of their biology, shape and mold their lives.

Perhaps in the days when there were payoffs, e.g. honor, appreciation, respect and status, men’s unconscious movement toward one archetype or another made more sense.

We do not live in those times any more, and we haven’t for most or all of your lifetime. What remains for most men in modern life is a world of expectation without reward, burden without honor and service without self.

Most men know on some level that this is true, but many have a very hard time facing it out of fear. Fear of the loss of social approval, the loss of love and the loss of what they imagine is the only space the world grants them.

Some of the fear is at least superficially warranted. Facing these issues means reaching a level of consciousness sufficient to make you a bad fit in the world of the walking blind. It means a new mythology with new archetypes born of a newer and more accurate picture of the world.

Medea

The daunting challenge is that men can no longer afford the luxury of allowing biology alone to write their story. Technology and ideology have rendered that too dangerous.

The old model makes men far too easy to manipulate and far too willing to comply with the manipulation to their own detriment. You can find this same story throughout classic mythology so it is nothing new. Those, however, were cautionary tales, the moral lesson from which has been erased from the cultural consciousness. Most dare not speak honestly of Hera and Medea in the modern age.

The results of that resembles a modern genocide of the male soul.

Fortunately, that which has been forgotten can be learned again. And that which has been learned in error can be corrected. The fruits of that effort are the restoration and "wholeness" so easily promised and seldom delivered.

The risks of embracing this on a personal level is actually an illusion. Once you walk the newer path you will most probably find you don't particularly want to return to the old one. The feigned approval of others loses its luster when the vision clears.

Despite appearances, all of this is really not so arcane. It is actually quite simple. You can start with most any problem in life; relationship and family issues are a good start. Map the mythology that got you there, that determined your actions and reactions. Were you playing the role of the Hero? The Warrior? Were you surrendering to the Siren's Song? Was the Damsel in Distress a façade with something more sinister behind the surface impression?

Did a faulty narrative of your place and worth in this world lead you directly into a painful wall? And if that is true, do you have the fortitude to face it and change the story?

Imagine the consciously constructed mythology that would lead you to a better place with better people. Imagine the story of you being written by your own hand.

The solutions are not always easy, but they are made much more accessible when you make the decision to clear your own path; when you are at the helm, navigating your own way, when the stars in the sky are arranged according to your own dreams and desires.

How many miserable professional men out there can remember a time when they aspired to be artisans, writers or artists, only to watch those dreams buckle beneath the oppressive weight of a story that they did not write?

How many desperate men are clinging to the role of provider and protector, having become automatons in loveless, abusive marriages that have ground their self-respect into the dust?

How many men have stories that end with a bottle of scotch and a handgun because they cannot breathe and do not know where to find free air?

Men need an alternative to the new mythology's archetypes of Servant, Slave and Scapegoat. The only thing preventing that from happening is being trapped in or clinging to a narrative they did not produce and which has never served them.

We have seen the results of men living in a world that is devoid of any honoring of men's roles or even of men's being. How can men cope in this sort of world? How can therapists or anyone else facilitate a man moving from this restrictive, prison-like consciousness into a more truly masculine path that embraces his well-being, self-interest and happiness?

[1]Andrew Samuels, Jung and the Post-Jungians ISBN 0415059046, Routledge (1986)

Soft Guy Era! Drizzle Drizzle!

May 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Well-intended Affirmative Insanity

May 3, 2024 | by Jon Gunnarsson | Link | Original Link

Suppose you were working in a chemical lab, doing some experiment. You get careless and by accident you spill some acid into your eye. What do you do? The way I see it you have three options. Option 1: Do nothing, except blink a bit and rub your eye and hope it will get better. Option 2: Pour water into your eye to dilute the acid. Option 3: Pour a base into your eye, hoping to neutralize the acid.

Obviously, option 2 is the correct choice. Option 1 doesn't actually solve the problem and you'll experience unnecessary pain and damage to your eye. Option 3 is clearly insane. For this plan to work, you need to know exactly how much acid is in your eye and how potent it is and you need to be able to pour just the right amount of base into your eye. But even if you were able to do that, there's still the problem that the acid and the base will not necessarily spread evenly on the surface of your eye so you will have parts that have more acid than base and vice versa. It's clear that option 3 will do more harm than good.

Now consider a different scenario. You're running some sort of big organization. It could be a firm, a charity, a social club, a school, a hospital, etc. This organization has many members. Suppose these members belonged to two disjoint and clearly distinguishable groups A and B. Further suppose that you have received information that the Bs are disadvantaged and are being unfairly discriminated against. Despite there not being any official rules favouring one group over the other, almost all the positions of leadership within the organization are filled up with As and the Bs have lower status on average. You are a fair-minded person and want everyone to have the same opportunities and rights within your organization. What do you do?

Option 1: Do nothing and hope the problem goes away on its own. Option 2: Try to reduce discrimination through measures such as awareness campaigns or analyzing enforcement of rules to see if there is discrimination. Option 3: Implement official rules that favour Bs over As, such as a minimum quota of Bs in all leadership positions or a programme specifically designed to help Bs.

As in the previous example, option 1 doesn't solve the problem and option 2 is clearly reasonable. Option 3 in this case is what is commonly called affirmative action and it is just as insane and detrimental as option 3 in the first example.

First of all, there's a question we have to consider here which we did not in the first example and that is whether there is actually any discrimination. What if your information about discrimination were false? In the first example it's immediately obvious that you have acid in your eye because it burns, but with discrimination in a large organization things aren't so easy. The social sciences are notoriously inaccurate and unreliable. What if there were no acid and you poured in base anyway? What if there were no discrimination and you just introduced discrimination through affirmative action?

Maybe the reason As are doing better is due to different characteristics between As and Bs that are not due to discrimination. Maybe As are more intelligent or better educated, maybe they care more about your organization, maybe they care more about status, maybe they are more willing to make sacrifices to attain high positions, maybe they have more assertive and dominant personalities, maybe As or Bs or both are more comfortable with A leadership.

But even if there is indeed discrimination, it's not possible to accurately assess its precise nature and severity. If you introduce too little affirmative action, you're not solving the problem, only ameliorating it slightly. If you introduce too much affirmative action, you create a new problem. If you don't distribute the affirmative action properly, you will overshoot your goal in certain areas and not do enough in others.

Suppose for instance that we could subdivide the two demographics. Group A is actually made up of groups A1 and A2. A1 is actually the only group that's privileged, while A2 is not. So even though when we regard group A as a whole, A is privileged, it is actually just because of the A1s pulling up the average. Then suppose we can do the same thing with B. B1 is not actually discriminated against, it's only B2s who actually face discrimination.

So at the start we have one group that's unfairly privileged, one group that's unfairly discriminated against and two groups that are being treated fairly. Then we introduce affirmative action and let's suppose that we magically know exactly what sorts of measures we need to take to make groups A and B even. But then we look at the subgroups and see that we now haven't actually made anything more fair. A1 is now no longer privileged and B2 is now no longer discriminated against, but the two groups that were being treated fairly before have now merely switched places. A2 now faces unfair discrimination through the affirmative action measures while B1 now has unfair privilege. So even in this idealized world where we can precisely assess the exact right measures to bring about equality between the two groups, we haven't actually gained any ground. As and Bs collectively are now even, but when we look at the actual individuals, we haven't improved the situation. Groups have no existence of their own beyond the individuals who make them up. Only individuals think, act, and feel, so the only thing that matters is our treatment of individuals.

A further problem of affirmative action is that it is coercive and violates the principles of meritocracy. Because of that, people will try to resist it and you are likely to experience a good amount of conflict within your organization. You'll need to constantly apply pressure to push through and sustain your reforms, which costs a great deal of money and angers people. You also create resentment against Bs. Bs in leadership positions are going to be taken less seriously and command less respect because people will suspect that they got their jobs through affirmative action instead of merit. It also creates a lot of divisiveness between As and Bs and separates them firmly into two different camps.

Things get even worse if the government gets involved. Even if the government officials have the best intentions, they do not know the details of the industries they're regulating. They just impose some rule from up high that everyone must follow. Because the government does not have to pay for the costs of affirmative action legislation, it is more eager to pass such laws.

More troubling yet is that forcing private companies to comply with so called anti-discrimination legislation is a gross violation of property rights. One of the fundamental aspects of property is the right to include or exclude people from the use of your property. If I own a piece of land, I can forbid you from trespassing. But if I own a company, I no longer get to decide freely who to hire or fire. This erosion of property rights not only hurts the economy, but also infringes on basic economic freedoms.

But the worst thing of all is that the vast majority of politicians are not wise and benevolent leaders who only wish to serve their country. Rather, they act in their own self-interest, often at the detriment of everyone else. Modern democracy does not reward wise leadership and prudent management. After all, most of the voters have neither the inclination nor the knowledge to fully assess most of the decisions that a politician makes. Thus, politicians are more interested in signalling than in effective policies.

Advocating for affirmative action may be very detrimental to society as a whole, and a politician may even be aware of this, but the point is to be seen by the public as doing something against discrimination. It is about signalling opposition to sexism, racism, xenophobia, or other undesirable views. It then becomes difficult for political opponents to oppose proposals for affirmative action without signalling support for discrimination.

It’s impossible to legislate away bigotry through affirmative action. You cannot stop unfair discrimination through further unfair discrimination. Fighting fire with fire is highly dangerous, usually not successful, and people are likely to get burnt in the process. In the end, the only effective way of stopping discrimination is through awareness and through economic self-interest.

In a free market, bigotry doesn’t pay. If for instance an entrepreneur were a true misogynist and didn’t want to hire women, no matter how qualified they are, then he is passing up opportunities for making profit. His competitors who do hire women will do better than him, making it difficult for him to keep up. If he doesn’t relent, his market share will decrease and eventually he may go out of business.

This process may take a while, but in the end it’s the only way to achieve a just and meritocratic society.

Featured image courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

The Irrationality of Feminism: Remembering the Sokal Affair

May 4, 2024 | by Theodore Labadie | Link | Original Link

Some time ago I was talking with a feminist of long acquaintance about our different reasons for going to school. I wanted to learn something useful and dig myself out of poverty. She, quite to the contrary, had no interest in learning anything useful, only to learn how "to talk like academics" having overheard their discussions around town in cafes and the like. They had impressed her, using a language with unfamiliar words whose meaning she could only guess at, discussing such "impressive" and esoteric subjects as the construction of femininity in literature. Although she's never read Simone du Buvoir I'm certain that she would agree with her thesis that our understanding of the female mind as a consciousness quite different and distinct from the male mind has no origin in biology whatsoever. As I understand the theory, the female mind is completely an artificial construct forced on women by culture.

Which is nonsense. Women are not made; they are born. It should be inconceivable that the sex endowed with the biologic machinery to gestate, breastfeed, and nurture infants would not by necessity also be endowed with the mental machinery to use their sex-specific organs of procreation for maximal genetic and evolutionary advantage and it should not be a surprise that this template informs their entire psyche. Yet, this is exactly the message we get from the academy: there is no such thing as human nature.

The study of the biological provenance of human nature was at one time called sociobiology, but feminist and leftist propaganda has so demonized the word that it can no longer be used safely. Instead, euphemisms like "evolutionary psychology" were invented, but they too are used only with difficulty and with great resistance from most leftist academics. I remember reading how the progenitor of sociobiology, Edward O. Wilson, a venerable old Southerner who is perhaps the world's preeminent biologist and a writer of Pulitzer Prize-winning caliber was assaulted by members of the leftist International Committee Against Racism who dumped a pitcher of water over his head during a conference, chanting that he was "all wet." Good thing they had never heard him say, "Karl Marx was right, socialism works, it is just that he had the wrong species."

So much for the sanctity of reasoned academic discourse. But to my mind, there is no event that better illustrates the intellectual poverty of leftists and feminists and in particular the language they use in our institutions of higher learning than the Sokal affair.

In 1996 Alan Sokal, a professor of physics at New York University, became dismayed by the lack of intellectual rigor in the humanities and by the pervasive notion that science was socially constructed—an unprivileged method of acquiring knowledge. Determined to do something, he submitted a paper to an interdisciplinary postmodern journal, Social Text. The paper, "Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity," was a hoax. It was purposely crammed with obscure leftist and feminist jargon, appealed constantly to academic authority through the prodigious use of quotations, made outrageous scientific claims that anyone with some knowledge of physics would recognize as suspicious, and although grammatically correct was completely impenetrable. It made no sense at all. The paper was accepted uncritically and published without peer review. Here's a taste:

One characteristic of the emerging postmodern science is its stress on nonlinearity and discontinuity: this is evident, for example, in chaos theory and the theory of phase transitions as well as in quantum gravity. At the same time, feminist thinkers have pointed out the need for an adequate analysis of fluidity, in particular turbulent fluidity. These two themes are not as contradictory as it might at first appear: turbulence connects with strong nonlinearity, and smoothness/fluidity is sometimes associated with discontinuity (e.g. in catastrophe theory); so a synthesis is by no means out of the question.

Every statement makes an unsubstantiated claim, except, apparently, in Sokal's use of quotations which seem to be always taken out of context in a cut-and-paste approach to mimic the evidence-follows-claim convention of academic writing. Yet the evidence is false and nonsensical, in no way explaining his postulates. For example, what does he mean by "nonlinearity" in the context of an "emerging postmodern science" and how is it evident in chaos theory, phase transition theory, and quantum gravity? Phase transition is the transformation of the physical state of matter from solid to liquid, liquid to gas, etc. It is not a theory; it is a fact that anyone can observe by watching ice melt. In the sense that effect immediately follows cause (as when you apply heat to ice it turns to liquid water) it is also perfectly linear. As to quantum gravity, I've read that there's no evidence as of yet to show that it actually exists. It's still only a gleam in some scientist's eye. Being non-extant there is only one thing that quantum gravity can say concerning the philosophy of science or even of society: nothing.

On publication of his paper Sokal exposed his hoax in the journal Lingua Franca. The editors of Social Text immediately cried foul and added a misplaced criticism of Sokal's writing style. They missed the point, entirely. Sokal's intent was to write badly (and think badly) yet have his poor scholarship overlooked due to its superficial accordance with leftist ideology. It is very simple: most people will accept anything uncritically provided that it sounds like something they already believe.

The Sokal affair is described as famous but I have never heard anyone in the academy, student or instructor, discuss it or even to have heard about it without my introduction. I suppose this is because leftists find the Sokal affair so deeply embarrassing. They should. It exposes the deep poverty of intellectual discourse in our universities, a pry bar laying waste to rusting scrap, the impressive language so admired by my feminist acquaintance hot air.

I should point out that Sokal is not an anti-feminist. In fact, he is a leftist who wanted to point out that his compatriots were shooting themselves in the foot by accepting uncritically the kind of claptrap he parodies in “Transgressing the Boundaries.” No matter. A writer takes what he needs where he finds it. I suppose I should also disclose that at one time I uncritically accepted the label of “leftist,” though no longer. I am neither left nor right, only a man who out of life desires nothing more than for his mind to be completely free of false convention and ideology. And although such perfect freedom may be, as it is with the possession of perfect truth, unattainable it is nonetheless a very worthy goal on which to base a silly little life. There are indeed some people who will die for the fact that 2 plus 2 equals 4.

The entire text of Sokal’s “Transgressing the Boundaries: Towards a Transformative Hermeneutics of Quantum Gravity” is available in pdf form here.

ICMI 21 Presentation by Robert Brockway. “Feminist Lies, Bad History and The Truth”

May 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Shah reacts to James Sexton & Matt Walsh Interview

May 6, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Channeling Chandler: Mean Streets & MGTOW

May 7, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

In the introduction to his Encyclopedia Mysteriosa, William L. DeAndrea lists a series of assumptions that underlie detective fiction:

- That such a thing as objective truth exists.
- That it's desirable to find out what it is.
- That it's possible to find out what the truth is.
- That people have a responsibility to their fellow beings not to kill or hurt them or steal from them.
- That if people do hurt, kill, or steal, they should be found and punished, or at least forced to make restitution.

When DeAndrea's book came out in 1994, the above was the norm, not just for detective fiction but for society at large. Today, however, we hear about my truth or your truth while the very concept of objective truth is called into question. Meanwhile, lawlessness rules (or rather, misrules) the land and accountability means finger-pointing at everyone but oneself.

Nevertheless, I think DeAndrea's assumptions still hold true vis-à-vis the detective of fiction and film. Call him what you will – a sleuth, a gumshoe, a shamus, a PI, or a keyhole peeper – the detective's stock in trade is uncovering or discovering the truth. Always a bit of a loner, the detective was MGTOW before MGTOW was cool. Of course, some feminist bloggers and influencers would assert that MGTOWs have always been dicks.

When I say "detective," however, I am not including all fictional protagonists since the beginning of the genre. Edgar Allan Poe is often considered the father of the detective story (the annual awards for mysteries are known as the Edgar awards – in fact, DeAndrea's book won the Edgar for Best Critical or Biographical Work in 1994), but his Parisian detective (C. Auguste Dupin of "Murders in the Rue Morgue," "The Mystery of Marie Roget," and "The Purloined Letter") has little in common with the detectives who came along a century or so later.

I would also say the same of Sherlock Holmes, Arthur Conan Doyle's erudite Victorian, as well as Hercule Poirot and Miss Marple, Agatha Christie's best known protagonists. Christie's 1939 opus And Then There Were None (the book has an alternate title which includes a word that cannot be said in polite company) has sold more than 100 million copies, making it the most popular mystery in publishing history, so it is difficult to dismiss her contribution to the genre. Her books, however, are exemplars of the British whodunnit, in which a murder is just a puzzle to be solved. The dead body itself is the first clue and its discovery launches the plot. Against all probability (not to mention crime statistics), the victim and the suspects are usually from the more respectable tiers of society.

On the other hand, American detective stories feature tough guys, lowlifes and floozies! In an Agatha Christie novel, such people who would be as out of place as a booger in a cup of Earl Grey tea. So when I talk about detectives, I am talking about good old-fashioned, red-blooded, hard-boiled American detectives. (Feel free to chant "USA! USA! USA! USA!")

By exalting American detective writers, I don't mean to include all authors who happen to have U.S. birth certificates. No, I'm not talking about the Hardy Boys mysteries. Not the Nancy Drew mysteries. And certainly not the Scooby-Doo mysteries.

Also, I am not including the DEI detectives who followed the classic MGTOW detectives. These would include Walter Mosley's Easy Rawlins (black), Harry Kemelman's Rabbi Small (Jewish), and Sara Paretsky's V.I Warshawsky (female), who have attracted legions of fans and spawned profitable series for their authors. You probably will not be surprised to learn that novels with queer and trans detectives are now available. To a large degree all of the above are following the trail blazed by the pantheon of authors from the golden age (1930s-1940s) of hard-boiled detective fiction, which helped to inspire the golden age of film noir (1940s-1950s). Perhaps the most renowned author of the hard-boiled school was Raymond Chandler, creator of Philip Marlowe, protagonist of The Big Sleep, The Long Goodbye, The Lady in the Lake, and Farewell, My Lovely, among others. Chandler was also something of a theorist of the detective genre.

In December 1944, Chandler, wrote an essay entitled "The Simple Art of Murder" for the Atlantic magazine. An assessment of the state of detective fiction at the time, it has been cited often, perhaps because the works of Chandler as well as his peers, notably Dashiell Hammett (The Maltese Falcon, The Thin Man) and James M. Cain (The Postman Always Rings Twice, Double Indemnity, Mildred Pierce), are still read and provided the raw (in some cases, really raw!) material for many films that are still shown at repertory cinemas or appear periodically on Turner Classic Movies.

Chandler died in 1959 long before MGTOW was a thing, yet an oft-quoted excerpt from his 1944 essay has a contemporary ring to it. It almost sounds like a MGTOW manifesto:

> But down these mean streets a man must go who is not himself mean, who is neither tarnished nor afraid. The detective in this kind of story must be such a man. He is the hero; he is everything. He must be a complete man and a common man and yet an unusual man. He must be, to use a rather weathered phrase, a man of honor – by instinct, by inevitability, without thought of it, and certainly without saying it. He must be the best man in his world and a good enough man for any world.

The phrase "mean streets," of course was the source of the title of the 1973 Martin Scorsese movie about young hoods in New York's Little Italy. This raises the question of the meaning of mean. Clearly, "mean" in the sense of malicious is implied, but Chandler might have also meant in the sense of small-mindedness.

> He talks as the man of his age talks – that is, with rude wit, a lively sense of the > grotesque, a disgust for sham, and a contempt for pettiness.

The detective, in other words, is in this world but not of this world. He transcends it even as he lives in it. In fact, you could probably attach some quasi-religious significance to such a way of life. The "monk mode" school of MGTOW is not thar far removed from the world of the detective:

> The whole point is that the detective exists complete and entire and unchanged by anything that happens, that he is, as detective, outside the story and above it, and always will be. That is why he never gets the girl, never marries, never really has any private life, except insofar as he must eat and sleep and have a place to leave his clothes.

Chandler was perhaps an unlikely practitioner of hard-boiled fiction. Born in Chicago to Quaker parents, he grew up in Nebraska but spent his adolescence in England and received a classical education at tony Dulwich College. His novels appealed to both British and American readers, though his work was more in keeping with American taste in detective novels.

Chandler read the work of his competitors on both sides of the pond and had opinions on just about all of them. While he looked the part of the proper English gentleman, his prose belied that image. In his own words, Chandler "was trying to get murder away from the upper classes, the week-end house party and the vicar's rose garden, and back to the people who are really good at it." Consequently, while his prose was as polished as that of his British counterparts, the style was livelier and the dialogue was slangier. "The English may not always be the best writers in the world," he observed, "but they are incomparably the best dull writers."

Rooted in both America and England, Chandler chose to return to America as a young man but felt the call of duty after the British entered World War I. After serving in the Canadian army, he settled in Los Angeles and went to work in the accounting department of an oil company. Eventually, he was promoted to Vice-President but his alcoholism and the Great Depression consigned him to the ranks of the unemployed. A fan of pulp fiction, he felt he could improve on what he read. Given his circumstances, attempting to launch a career as a writer – a high-risk proposition even in the best of times – would seem to be ill-advised. In his youth in England he had published some essays and poetry, but that was hardly a suitable training ground for hard-boiled American fiction. Against all odds, he published his first short story, "Blackmailers Don't Shoot," in 1933 at the age of 45.

The protagonist of Chandler's story was named Mallory. The name derived from Thomas Malory, the 15th Century author of Le Morte d'Arthur, the definitive narrative of the King Arthur legend. When Chandler began The Big Sleep, his first novel, he started out with Mallory as the protagonist. His wife convinced him to change Mallory to Marlowe, perhaps a nod to playwright Christopher Marlowe, who followed Mallory about a century later. Since Marlowe's most famous play was The Tragicall History of Dr. Faustus, it might be that Chandler thought the morality play, the classic story of a man selling his soul to the devil, had more relevance to the 20th Century.

Chandler's stories first appeared in Black Mask, a renowned periodical that launched the careers of a number of purveyors of pulp fiction (e.g., Cornell Woolrich, Horace McCoy, Erle Stanley Gardner), many of whose works are still in print.

Black Mask was not a publication designed to appeal to female readers. If you were a teenager in the 1930s and your mother found some Black Mask magazines in your room, she would pitch them out, as surely as mothers in later decades would trash comic books, Mad magazine, or Famous Monsters of Filmland.

While tame by today's standards, the sexual component of hard-boiled fiction was troubling to those who advocated morally uplifting literature. The detective, being a normal male with normal testosterone levels (at least what was considered normal before the soyboy era), had an eye for hourglass figures and blondes, not necessarily in that order. He was attracted to women, dallied with them on occasion, yet never allowed them to "get" to him. In current parlance, he was "emotionally unavailable." According to Chandler, "A really good detective never gets married. He would lose his detachment, and this detachment is part of his charm." In fact, in Chandler's fiction, while Marlowe has an eye for the ladies, he never gets laid, at least not in the first five novels. He saves himself for The Long Goodbye in 1953.

Of course, another red flag in pulp fiction was the violence, no matter how logical it might be in relation to the storyline. Though not as brutal as his antagonists (Mickey Spillane's Mike Hammer might be an exception), the pulp fiction detective could both dish it out and take it. While some female readers might get a tingle when reading descriptions of male-on-male violence, they would likely be aghast if their husbands or sons behaved that way.

Male or female, middle-class readers found the pulp fiction detective story to be something of a guilty pleasure. The reader could take a walk on the wild side without leaving his easy chair. No worries about ending up a bloody mess in a back alley or an emergency room! There was no denying it was escapism – but did that preclude it from being literature?

Chandler was 51 years old when his first novel, The Big Sleep, was published in 1939. As each new novel was published, he acquired more and more fans, including "serious" writers, such as W.H. Auden, Graham Greene, T.S. Eliot, W. Somerset Maugham, Christopher Isherwood and Evelyn Waugh. In France existentialists took an interest in Chandler's works and some of them noted that Philip Marlowe was a pretty good match for Albert Camus' concept of the absurdist hero.

It is also possible that some cross-pollination occurred. Given the time frame of existentialism's spread through the intellectual class, it is not far-fetched to posit that a man as well-read as Chandler could have been influenced by it. Come to think of it, one could hardly ask for a better hard-boiled fiction title than Being and Nothingness, Jean Paul Sartre's seminal 1943 book.

It would be impossible to do justice to the philosophical/literary existentialist movement in this essay but if you're looking for a sound bite definition, I offer the following:

> Existentialism is about being a saint without God; being your own hero, without all the sanction and support of religion or society.

I don't always hold with Google definitions, but I must give them credit for this one. A Saint without God would be another superb title for a hard-boiled novel.

By conventional standards, the detective/existentialist may not be virtuous, but he adheres to a code of some sort, typically one he has devised himself. This, of course, sets him apart not just from most of his fellow men, but all his fellow women (a phrase that sounds like an oxymoron). The herd instinct is stronger in the female, who seeks consensus even if it clashes with the truth. She is more likely to be triggered by the truth, or to be concerned that the truth might make someone else uncomfortable. The truth hurts! So she is more likely to cover it up than seek it out. Or she might resort to her truth. Either way, even if she slugs gin as readily as she slugs guys who get too gropy, she is an unlikely hard-boiled detective.

A dame can investigate a mystery and maybe even solve it, but she can't be the protagonist in an American detective novel any more than she can be a knight in an Arthurian tale. The detective as knight (in tarnished if not shining) armor was a theme recognized by many literary critics who were fans of Chandler's work. In essence, Philip Marlowe was a modern-day knight errant with a different quest in every novel. Given Chandler's education during his lengthy British sojourn, this should not be surprising. Living in California while he pursued his writing career, he might have picked up a few cues from Asian culture. If so, he might have been aware of the Japanese ronin, a samurai without a master. Knight errant or ronin, each was a man going his own way.

Ironically, Chandler himself was not as MGTOW as his Mallory/Marlowe alter ego. In 1924, at the age of 35, he married Cissy Pascal, a 53-year-old divorcee – the stepmother of a friend. The marriage was her third, his first. Such a union would be unusual in any era, but it has provided much fodder for speculation among Chandler's biographers. As a mama's boy by default (his parents divorced when he was seven and he never saw his father again), was Chandler in the market for another mother? Notably, he and Cissy postponed marriage till Chandler's mother died. On the other hand, Cissy had been a looker in her youth – in fact an artist's model (on occasion nude) and had not let herself go. She looked at least ten years younger than her age (and passed herself off as such when she and Chandler tied the knot). Not surprisingly, she was a blonde, strawberry to be exact. So the age difference and her marital status (she was married at the time Chandler began his relationship with her) were irrelevant. It appeared that Chandler had not only met his match, he had met his muse.

Aside from Chandler's occasional bender or girl on the side, domesticity reigned in the Chandler household till Cissy died in 1954. Afterwards Chandler was inconsolable and began hitting the bottle harder than ever. It showed in his work. While The Long Goodbye, published one year before Cissy's death, was often cited as his best work, Playback, published in 1958, is generally considered the weakest. It was his only novel that was never filmed.

When Chandler died in 1959 he left behind four chapters of an unfinished novel (later finished by Robert B. Parker, a detective novelist who was also an admirer of Chandler) called Poodle Springs, in which Philip Marlowe is not only married he is the husband of a wealthy socialite, the woman he fornicated with in The Long Goodbye. They are living not in crime-infested Los Angeles but in the chi-chi resort town of Palm Springs. And that was Chandler's final word on Philip Marlowe – a kept man! It was the equivalent of a hard-core MGTOW getting married – and adopting his wife's last name! Thankfully, that is not the way Philip Marlowe is remembered.

"The detective by tradition and definition is the seeker after truth," noted Chandler. Yet 30 years after DeAndrea's encyclopedia was published, and 80 years after Chandler's essay on "The Simple Art of Murder" appeared, the truth is more elusive than ever. Even if discovered via investigation, it may not come to light, as it may conflict with the consensus or the narrative or the official story.

Nevertheless, more and more men are going their own way, which often takes them down mean streets peopled not just with the traditional goons, grifters, and doxies, but with feminists, Karens, body positivity activists, and gender studies majors.

The streets are a lot meaner – and uncleaner – than they were in 1944. But they're the only streets we've got.

Why Engagement Rings Are a Scam

May 8, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Of course most AVfM readers will know that we think marriage in the current climate is a terrible deal for most men in general, but everything in this video is true based on what we've read, and it helps demonstrate just how much we've been bamboozled by multiple parts of the culture into stupid ideas of what love is:

The World’s Fastest Patriarchy Disproof

May 9, 2024 | by Josh O'Brien | Link | Original Link

Feminists often chatter about ‘Patriarchy’ as if it is an indisputable fact of life. Rarely do they acknowledge anything to the contrary. It can be time-consuming and difficult to put together a factual, adequately sourced, eloquent argument, especially since it’s so blatantly obvious to anyone with common sense, and your arguments will likely be cherry picked, ignored, or blocked. So this article is essentially a handy guide to disproving patriarchy, very quickly.

Patriarchy is defined as a system in which all of the societal power is held by men as a class, and is used to oppress women as a class.

This is an interesting theory, but does not hold up to any real scrutiny or critical thinking.

For the purposes of quick dismantling, I will split societal power into four areas, or spheres.

The spheres are social, political, economic, and educational. The group which controls the majority of these spheres is the group with the power. Feminists claim that the group with control is men. Let’s see how that holds up to some critical thinking. Hint: Not well.

First, Educational. In the educational sphere it is clear that women have the power. They are more likely to be in education, less likely to drop out of education, more likely to get degrees and finish their education, more likely to teach, and more likely to be on decision-making boards concerning education.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Second, Political. In the political sphere, women still have more power. Women are the majority of the electorate in the majority of states. In a democratic system, the will of the majority is the will that is enforced as law. Therefore, women as a class have more political power than men as a class. Just because women don’t choose to use this power to elect other women does not mean they do not have the power. If every woman in America wanted a female president, there would be a female president. If every man in America wanted a male president, there would not be a male president. In the UK, where Parliamentary Sovereignty and a lack of a codified constitution allow any law to be made, even ones which contravene basic human rights, women could literally institute any law they wanted as long as they all agreed upon it.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Thirdly, moving onto the Economic sphere. Despite producing and being responsible for the existence of less than 50% of the US’ GDP (Gross Domestic Product), an estimated 63% of it is controlled by women. Yes, women control over half of the US’ GDP, despite not producing even half of it. That means that they control not only their own money but some of men’s money, too.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Finally the Social sphere. More difficult to quantify, but just as easy to understand. All throughout society there are obligations for men that place power in female hands. The obligation of chivalry, carrying with it protection, financial support, emotional support and submission to a female whim. The obligation of instigating a relationship, placing all risk of rejection on male shoulders. The obligation of trust, meaning that men feel forced to believe women in the face of all evidence. This, combined with the undeniable fact that issues affecting men are given less support than those affecting women, such as domestic abuse, rape, alimony or any number of other things, shows a lack of male power.

Verdict: Females have the power.

Now, the Social sphere is the only one which I can see being contested, as it cannot be factually quantified, but even if the social sphere were male controlled, that would still be 3 spheres under female control, a majority. Thus meaning: women would still have the majority of control in society.

So no, we don't live in a patriarchy.

One final point would be that just because women have this power does not mean they all exercise it, as we can see clearly in the world. Just because women can vote women in, does not mean they do, for example. But power is not dependent on use, simply possibility of use. Even if women all sat in the home as housewives voting for men and never exercising any of these powers, they would still have the power.

SOURCES:
Women in Education:
http://collegestats.org/articles/2012/08/9-signs-we-have-a-boy-crisis/
Women and GDP:
http://www.businessinsider.com/infographic-women-control-the-money-in-america-2012-2
Women and the Electorate:
https://www.census.gov/content/dam/Census/library/publications/2011/dec/c2010br-03.pdf

Rough Men Stand Ready

May 11, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

> They had the calm weathered faces of healthy men in hard condition. They had the eyes they always have, cloudy and grey like freezing water. The firm set mouth, the hard little wrinkles at the corners of the eyes, the hard hollow meaningless stare, not quite cruel and a thousand miles from kind.
>
> ~ Raymond Chandler describing policemen in The Little Sister

There are any number of books out there devoted to famous lines from famous movies. Even the casual moviegoer will recognize "Frankly, my dear, I don't give a damn," or "You're gonna need a bigger boat," or "Here's looking at you, kid" (Gone with the Wind, Jaws, and Casablanca, respectively). All of those movies have become entrenched in popular culture, but countless others have come and gone without attaining such lofty stature. That doesn't mean they are lacking in memorable dialogue. Every now and then a line from a relatively obscure movie lodges in the mind and refuses to go away.

As evidence, I offer a 1974 British thriller called The Black Windmill. The film stars Michael Caine as Major John Tarrant, an Army veteran who is now an intelligence officer with MI6, the British counterpart of the CIA. When his son David is kidnapped and held for ransom by terrorists, his colleagues fail him. In fact, they even suspect he has staged the kidnapping himself, seeing as he is so calm and collected throughout the ordeal.

Tarrant is separated from his wife Alex, who complains that his work has made him distant, cold and unfeeling. Since she is so distraught by the kidnapping, she cannot comprehend her estranged husband's ability to maintain his composure. He explains to her, "If there are things about me that you hate, Alex, be grateful for them now. They could be our last chance of seeing David alive again." Classic British stiff upperlipness!

I don't know why that particular line in a good but not great thriller stuck in my mind over the last half-century, but having looked at the film again recently, I think I know why.

The Black Windmill was directed by Don Siegel three years after he did Dirty Harry. Now there was a famous film with a memorable line of dialogue: "Do you feel lucky? Well, do you, punk?" was more than cool, it was downright cold-blooded. And it caught on, as did "Go ahead, make my day," in Sudden Impact, a 1983 sequel.

When Dirty Harry came out, professional hand-wringers responded predictably. Perhaps it was because the film asked a question they could not answer. What better way to thwart a psychopath than to assign a psychopath-adjacent police officer to take him down?

Perhaps because of space limitations, advertising taglines for movies are often spot on when it comes to letting people know what a film is all about. In this case, one was "Dirty Harry and the homicidal maniac. Harry's the one with the badge." Another was "You don't assign him to murder cases, you just turn him loose."

When Dirty Harry and The Black Windmill hit the screens in the early 1970s, we were in the throes of second-wave feminism. Anti-male rumblings and grumblings were bandied about but the term "toxic masculinity" was yet to be coined. In the subsequent half-century, the anti-male propaganda slowly morphed till it became anti-masculine, which is not quite the same thing. Active masculinity (shooting, fighting, competing) is bad, but passive masculine traits such as stoicism and self-control are just as bad. Men are often described as lacking in emotional intelligence – which is the same thing as saying they are emotional retards! Men, tsk tsk, just aren't in touch with their feelings the way women are.

Then at some point, the ante was upped to the point that masculinity and modern society could not be reconciled. Eating meat…hanging out at gun ranges…ogling good-looking women…passing gas audibly – you know who you are! Such behavior was, in a word, inappropriate, not just in certain situations but in all situations. Surely, there is no place for such behavior in our world…or is there? Consider the following quotation:

> People sleep peaceably in their beds at night only because rough men stand ready to do violence on their behalf.

There is some dispute as to the exact wording of the saying (e.g., We sleep safe in our beds because rough men stand ready in the night to visit violence on those who would do us harm.") but the meaning remains clear. There is also a dispute as to its origin. Winston Churchill was sometimes credited as a source, and it doesn't sound out of character, but as it turns out, George Orwell was the author. Yet it seems that Orwell was riffing on a theme inspired by Rudyard Kipling.

About as popular as any author in the English-speaking world in his heyday, Kipling has fallen out of favor, not because his stories and poetry are lacking in merit but because he was an apologist for colonialism, and we all know that will never do. His poem "The White Man's Burden" is probably sufficient to prohibit him from ever again appearing in a university English literature course, and I'd be surprised if any of his works still grace the pages of literary anthologies aimed at high school students. Even so, The Jungle Book and Just So Stories have delighted generations of children. It is surprising that the woke folks at Disney have not disavowed their Jungle Book franchise and sent it the way of Song of the South.

Kipling, however, was much more than a colonialist. His poem "If –" reads like a manosphere manifesto. Another famous poem, "Tommy," is particularly pertinent to this essay, as it is supposedly the work that inspired Orwell's quotation.

"Tommy" is British slang for a soldier in the service of the crown. In the narrative poem, a soldier tries to gain entrance to a bar only to find out that his kind just aren't welcome. During peacetime the civilians are "Makin' mock o' uniforms that guard you while you sleep." But the "uniforms" are welcome indeed when British soldiers or redcoats [the "thin red line of 'eroes"] are needed. If that phrase sounds familiar, that's because The Thin Red Line was the name of a 1962 James Jones war novel as well as movie adaptations in 1964 and 1998. An offshoot of that phrase is the thin blue line, a reference to the police as the borderline separating order from disorder.

So that was why the line from The Black Windmill stuck in my head. Is there no place in society for men, albeit sorely lacking in diplomacy, who are willing to risk their lives to keep the peace? Even the Beatitudes tell us that "Blessed are the peacemakers!" Granted, Christ didn't have the likes of Clint Eastwood or Michael Caine in mind when he said that. Nevertheless, as the ranks of law enforcement have dwindled has society become more peaceful? During the George Floyd riots the rough men were standing by but were ordered to stand down. The cry went out to defund the police even as they were being neutered. The thin blue line was barely a filament.

The word "rough" is a masculine adjective. Rough riders, rough around the edges, sleeping rough, rough and ready, roughshod, rough and tumble, roughneck, rough-hewn…all have a masculine connotation. Smooth is preferable to rough but smoothness can't be wished into existence. When deployed properly, rough men, like sandpaper, can smooth things out. There have always been virtuous people who will do right even when no one is looking. Unfortunately, other people are held in check only by fear of punishment. If so, inflicted by whom? In the absence of rough men, uniformed or civilian, what is there to fear?

I don't think I need to issue a spoiler alert by saying that Michael Caine prevails in The Black Windmill. He goes rogue and tracks the kidnappers to the eponymous windmill where his son is being held hostage. Then he visits violence on those who would do harm to him and his flesh and blood.

You've probably seen plenty of movies with violent resolutions. Revenge plotlines are as common as boy meets girl. While rough men remain suspect in modern society, where would movies be without them? In fact, I've long had a pet theory that a leading man in motion pictures must appear capable of killing another human being. He need not do that in every movie, and many scripts may not call upon him to do so, but he must be able to act as though he's capable of it.

Rough men are a vital implement in society's tool kit. Send them into exile and you are signing a death warrant for your society.

Classic Elam: Killing for Equality (2014)

May 12, 2024 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Last year in West Footscray, a smallish suburb just a stone's throw outside Melbourne, Victoria Australia, Phillip Bracken pushed his common law wife, Helen Curtis, to the ground. As she lay helpless he took the rifle he was holding and put two rounds in her head.

The next two bullets punched into her abdomen. Finally he fired the fifth and last round, boring a hole through her wrist.

Last week, at the end of his murder trial, the verdict was delivered.

Not guilty.

It was not because the accusations against him were not proven. Bracken admitted to the acts, precisely as described above. He was acquitted on the grounds that his domestic partner, known in Australia as a defacto wife, had physically, emotionally and psychologically abused him during the relationship. That abuse rose to a level characterized in Australian law as "intimate terrorism."

It was also brought out at trial that Curtis had made threats to murder Bracken's father, which he feared she would follow through with.

The only charge that remains against him at this point is the possession of an unregistered weapon, for which he is out of jail under his own recognizance.

This story puts an interesting twist on recent news coverage of University of Ottawa law professor Elizabeth Sheehy, who has asserted in her new book, Defending battered Women on Trial, that women not only have the right, but the moral obligation to kill their abusers. She contends that women who kill under these alleged circumstances should not be charged or tried for murder.

So, using the rationale of that university law expert, Phillip Bracken is a social justice hero, who has just been recognized as such by the nine women and three men who sat on the jury that gave him a pass.

This is despite the fact that Bracken had nearly countless options in front of him at the time he snuffed the life out of Helen Curtis.

At the point he was in possession of a loaded weapon, and she was on the ground before him, he had a range of options. He could have walked away. He could have trained the weapon on her and summoned police. He could have unloaded the weapon to ensure that it was not used by either party to deliver lethal force.

Instead he riddled her with enough bullets as she lay on the ground to kill her four times over.

I have little doubt that Curtis was every bit the abusive monster that Bracken claimed her to be. In fact, given that what was presented to the jury of her behavior and character was sufficient for them to issue a pass to a male for her murder, I would venture to guess that she was record breaker of a harridan.

And if we are to accept that Philip Bracken had a legal or moral right to kill her, then we forego the right to criticize the likes of Elizabeth Sheehy. Unless, of course, our only real objection to Sheehy's ideas is that they are gender specific; if we are ok with murder as a way to deal with abusive partners as long as it affords men and women equal rights to kill.

Who actually thinks this way? So far, it has only been feminists (without the caveat of equality), and I hope above all else that it remains that way.

What happened in West Footscray, Australia is a natural consequence of feminist jurisprudence and governance. Like the occasional women who wind up severed from their assets and their children in a corrupt family law apparatus, now some women will simply be rubbed out by husbands who they may be abusive toward.

The resultant actions of the justice system will be to give killers a pass because the people left standing, most notably the killers, said they had it coming.

I feel no more and no less repugnance for this verdict than I do when it happens to male victims. Murdering someone when you don't have to is vile. And so is the criminal justice system that finds excuses for it.

Perhaps, however, this particular kind of tragedy will serve some purpose in the end.

Ladies, welcome to the legal margin.

Thanks to the feminist insistence on our absolute reverence for "victims" (aka those who don't have the good sense to get away from abusive people), the tide is turning, and not in your direction.

The courts are going to start regarding those of you who put the "bad" in bad relationships, or who have been accused of such, as something less than human. With this ruling, and the precedent it establishes, there will surely be others who line up for their slaps on the wrist after taking you out.

Who knows? Maybe when enough men walk away from murder charges after killing women they did not have the sense to leave, someone will notice the stench of what is going on.

In the meantime, ladies, enjoy an emerging equality of which I am sure you never dreamed.

And sleep well.

Angels save Gawain from marriage

May 13, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Sometimes your friends really aren't looking out for your best interests. Especially if they're married, and they're urging you to marry. De coniuge non ducenda, a Latin work of men's sex protest written between 1225 and 1250, tells how three angels saved Gawain from marriage.

The married men who were Gawain's friends didn't act like angels. They instead sought company to the end of their miserable days. Gawain easily could have joined them:

> And all these made wild,
> By women that they used.
> Though I be now beguiled,
> I think I might be excused. [1]

Gawain explained:

> I once had planned to take a wife
> (To follow others' wretched life),
> A tender, juicy, winsome maid —
> By her alone my heart was swayed.
>
> Some friends advised me on the spot
> To run and tie the nuptial knot
> ("The married life's the way for you!"),
> To join me in their woeful crew.
>
> My hasty wedding they did press
> To cheer their gloom by my distress,
> But through three angels all was well:
> God snatched me from the gates of hell. [2]

Gawain's vigorous, celebrated knightly life could have ended with a lament like that of Matheolus in a Latin work of the late-thirteenth century:

> Just as I, though sad, am less disturbed in marriage
> Because my fellow husbands provide solace in their misery.
> Oh, single life! Be sad that single life ends in sadness
> Increased only because it is allowed to end. [3]

What made all the difference was the appearance of three angels. Just as three angels appeared to Abraham at Mamre, so too three angels came to Gawain at Mamre.[4] Is anything too wonderful for the Lord?

One angel was Peter of Corbeil, elevated to archbishop of Sens in 1200. Courtly poets described abstractly men's love servitude to women. Peter of Corbeil described the life of the ordinary, married working man:

> Who takes a wife a millstone ties > around his neck until he dies.
> The wife commands, the man obeys;
> He once was free, but slave he stays.
>
> His work piles up in rows and rows;
> Where one job ends, another grows.
> The man's an ass pricked on by spur
> To feed the brats produced by her. [5]

Patriarchy is a hateful fiction beguiling foolish students. Husbands have long lacked equal opportunities with wives to withdraw from paid work. The angel Peter proclaims, "Let Gawain shun the married life!"

The second angel was Lawrence. He was probably the poet Lawrence, prior of Durham, who died in 1154. Lawrence explained how biological inequality in parental knowledge works to oppress men:

> So rancour grips the married male
> Who keeps a wife who's up for sale.
> He names as heir another's brat
> And feeds what someone else begat.
>
> Thus bitter grief and shame begin —
> The child that's been conceived in sin.
> Its mother knows its bastard line,
> The foolish husband says, "It's mine."

Under English common law, a child born within a marriage is indisputably presumed to be the husband's responsibility. Thus a New York court in 1975 ruled that a prisoner was the father of four children his wife had while he was securely locked away from her in prison. The angel Lawrence proclaims, "Let Gawain therefore wife eschew!"

The third angel was John Chrysostom. Known in the ancient world as the golden-mouthed, with God's grace he spoke harsh truth to men:

> A married man's a slave for sure,
> His flesh and spirit pain endure —
> Like ox from market homeward led
> To work the plough until he's dead.
>
> Who takes a wife accepts a yoke;
> Not knowing pain, with pain he'll choke.
> Who takes a wife, himself is caught
> And to eternal serfdom brought.
> …
> A wife's demands are always met;

> If not, she'll quarrel, rage and fret.
> The noise defeats the patient spouse;
> He yields to her and quits the house.

Is it any wonder that men's lifespan is on average shorter than women's? Some say that's because men prefer to die than remain married. In truth, the matter hasn't been seriously investigated. International authorities don't care about gender inequality in lifespan that shortchanges men. The angel John advises, "If wise, then marriage you'll forbear!"

Marriage is a foolish game in which a wife is entitled to swing a legal axe at her husband's neck. There is no equal exchange under gynocentric law. When the axe strikes the husband's neck, his head will be severed from his body. It will never re-attach. Gawain had magic that Merlin lacked. But magic didn't save Gawain's neck. Against the selfish advice of his married friends, the Holy Trinity of angels Peter, Lawrence, and John interceded on Gawain's behalf. Give thanks and glory to them!

Read more:

- Heloise wholly innocent of disastrous marriage with Abelard
- Bernard of Cluny's De Contemptu Mundi trivialized men's sexed protests
- Andreas Capellanus's De amore dialogically manipulated men's sexed protest

[1] Sir Gawain and the Green Knight ll. 2425-9, close translation from Middle English by Benson (2012) p. 179. Like the bookish scholar, the knight Gawain learned from experience of the superior wiles of women. The verse romance Sir Gawain and the Green Knight was probably written in the latter half of the fourteenth century. Surviving only in one manuscript (British Library MS Cotton Nero A.x.), it's written in an English dialect associated with Cheshire (northwestern England). On Gawain's relation to the literature of men's sexed protest, Dove (1972).

[2] De coniuge non ducenda I2-I4, from Latin trans. Rigg (1986) pp. 67-9. A Latin text is freely available online in Wright (1841) pp. 77-85. De coniuge non ducenda survives in 55 Latin manuscripts. Considerable variation among manuscripts suggests transmission through scribal memory. Rigg's text is based mainly on the manuscript Cambridge, Corpus Christi College MS 450, dating from about 1310. Rigg chose it to represent the best-known and earliest form of the work. Id. pp. 1, 61. Like Sir Gawain and the Green Knight, De coniuge non ducenda encompasses realistic descriptions of mundane, non-bookish activities.

A French version of De coniuge non ducenda exists in the Harley 2253 manuscript as Article 83, De Mal Mariage (Against Marriage). Fein (2014). The Harley version, which is less sophisticated than Andreas Capellenus's De amore, inserts qualifiers limiting claims to "bad women" and "bad marriages." Another French version, Douce 210, lacks those qualifiers. Dove (2000) p. 341. There's also a Middle English version of De coniurge non ducenda attributed to John Lydgate and entitled Payne and Sorowe of Evyll Maryage. Salisbury (2002).

De coniuge non ducenda is part of the Latin tradition of men's sex protest that encompasses Juvenal's Satire 6, Jerome's Golden Book on Marriage attributed to Theophrastus, Walter Map's Dissuasio Valerii ad Rufinum, and Lamentationes Matheoluli. Rigg (1986), pp. 101-2, outlines parallels between De coniuge non ducenda and Lamentationes Matheoluli. He argues that the former, written in the second quarter of the thirteenth century, influenced the the latter, written about 1290.

[3] Lamentationes Matheoluli ll. 326-9, my translation from the Latin text of Van Hamel (1892) vol. 1, p. 23:

> Sicut ego, tristis, minus hinc conturbor in istis;
> Ut socios habeant solacia sunt miserorum.
> Ve solis! doleant, quia solis puncta dolorum
> Augmentatur eo quod eam soli paciuntur.

[4] On the three angels appearing to Abraham at Mamre, Genesis 18:1-15.

[5] De coniuge non ducenda P2-P3, trans. Rigg (1986) p. 73. The subsequent quotes are from id. pp. 79-99. Kuczynski (2000) reports:

> one nineteenth-century reader of De conjuge non ducenda (no. 83), one of Harley's antifeminist diatribes, spoke for many when he scrawled above the title of the Latin text in a book at the Tulane University Library, "A brutal piece of Monkish foulness, worse than any Classical smittishness. Luther is here justified."

Id. p. 141. Rigg (1986), in contrast, observes that De coniuge {conjuge} non ducenda is "a cheerful poem and not very serious." The poem's assertions:

> stress not the obstacles that marriage poses to the scholar or cleric but the disadvantages for the ordinary working man. … the context is an ordinary working man's household, beset above all by financial worries.

Id. preface, p. 4. Men's burdens historically have tended to be disparaged and depreciated.

[image] Wife of Bercilak de Hautedesert attempts to seduce Gawain in bed. Illumination detail from f. 125/129 recto from British Library MS Cotton Nero A.x, the only surviving manuscript of Sir Gawain and the Green Knight. Thanks to the Cotton Nero A.x. Project.

References:

Benson, Larry Dean, trans. 2012. Sir Gawain and the Green Knight: a close verse translation. Morgantown: West Virginia University Press.

Dove, Mary. 1972. "Gawain and the Blasme des Femmes Tradition." Medium Aevum 41: 20-26.

Dove, Mary. 2000. "Evading textual intimacy: the French secular verse." Pp. 329 – 349 in Fein, Susanna Greer. 2000. Studies in the Harley manuscript: the scribes, contents, and social contexts of British Library MS Harley 2253. Kalamazoo, Mich: Published for TEAMS in association with the University of Rochester by Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University.

Fein, Susanna, ed. with David B. Raybin, and Jan M. Ziolkowski, trans. 2014. The complete Harley 2253 Manuscript (vol. 1, vol. 2, vol. 3). Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University. Kalamazoo, Michigan.

Kuczynski, Michael P. 2000. “An ‘electric stream’: the religious contents.” Pp. 123-161 in Fein, Susanna Greer. 2000. Studies in the Harley manuscript.

Rigg, A. G. 1986. Gawain on marriage: the textual tradition of the De coniuge non ducenda with critical edition and translation. Toronto, Ont., Canada: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Salisbury, Eve. 2002. The trials and joys of marriage. Kalamazoo, Mich: Published for TEAMS in association with the University of Rochester by Medieval Institute Publications, Western Michigan University.

Van Hamel, Anton Gerard, ed. 1892. Mathéolus, Jean Le Fèvre. Les lamentations de Mathéolus et le livre de leesce de Jehan Le Fèvre, de Ressons: poèmes français du XIVe siècle. Paris: Bouillon.

Wright, Thomas, ed. 1841. The Latin poems commonly attributed to Walter Mapes. London: Printed for the Camden Society, by J.B. Nichols and Son.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The Goal Post Episode 37 – Too Ridiculous to Bear

May 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Man faces “street harassment” in New York City

May 15, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Double standards, anyone?

Mens’ Rights vs Feminist Rape Culture explained using Puzzle Pieces

May 16, 2024 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

Subscribe to Alison Tieman’s YouTube channel here

The non-feminist truth process

May 17, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

We all know that feminism is an anti-male hate movement which germinates from a bottomless disaffection both toward men and toward all things percieved as “masculine”. And frankly, as much as that bears repeating, that is old hat. But there is another side to feminist hate. Most people aren’t much aware of this other side, but we have got to train a worklight upon it and give it careful thought. More than that, we have got to give it due weight when we are strategizing. We must factor it into all of our calculations, pointing it out to as many people as we can so that those people, too, will commence pointing it out and spreading the iinformation further.

You see, feminism doesn’t simply hate men and stop there. It goes the extra mile, by hating everything that is alien to feminism itself. Everything which does not uphold the feminist project, and fuel the never-ending growth of that project, is fair game. In a nutshell, feminism hates the rest of the world — the specifically non-feminist part of the world which can never be co-opted or re-tooled into a servile extension of feminism.

This is home truth about feminism, that it hates the non-feminist sector — and this critically important realization is the absolute dead center of any Strict Anti-Feminist (SAF) politics. The feminists would like to keep this truth under wraps. After all, it doesn’t sound very nice . . . does it? And more to that, it betrays a fatal weakness within the feminist project. (We can discuss this elsewhere.)

Knowing all this, it becomes a priority task to squeeze feminism’s hate, as it were, onto an open table where the world can plainly see it and even place it under a microscope. Not merely the feminist hatred for “men”, but the hatred for anything or everything which is not feminist. The WORLD needs to know, in no uncertain terms, that feminist hates it. It is strategically insufficient for “men” to be the only ones who know that feminism hates them.

That is why we love it when a feminist bigot like Gloria Allred says, “if you’re not a feminist, you’re a bigot”. She does not harm us by calling us bigots. In fact, Gloria has cooperated (unwittingly) with the counter-feminist effort, greasing the skids toward feminism’s demise and making our work oh-so-much easier. We need only showcase these things — and throw in some tart commentary which helps the public to understand (by being entertained) that these things are part of a pattern. Clearly we would love it even more if thousands of Glorias were blossoming all over the landscape, saying equally bigoted things. So our mission is, to force their hand. And how to make that happen, you might ask?

Simple. Make conspicuously visible, to all concerned, that the non-feminist part of the world is SOMETHING.

As opposed to nothing.

Simple lack of feminism, as a factor in the algebra of occurrence, is profoundly political.

Like so-called empty space, it is anything but dead or static. It is a living presence, brimming with dynamic energy, capable of bending and warping and repositioning things. This truth, and specifically the conscious realization of it, is death to the feminist project.

To understand this, it helps to review what we know about feminism's operative character. We say that "feminism's being consists of being in motion." Zero motion equals zero feminism. Feminism must remain in motion if it is to keep existing at all. Motion, in this case, means extension of feminist ideology into ever more institutions and cultural spaces. Quite right, it's that "long march through the institutions" that we've all heard about. It's that colonization of human communities that we've all witnessed in society.

The minute feminism halts in its march it starts dying, because it starts unravelling and shrinking. Feminism thrives only on a sustained diet of cultural incursion and expansion. In practice, this means constructing a fabric of lies upon a foundation of earlier lies, generating a renewed foundation for more lies in the future.

There is a reason why stage one in the feminist-nonfeminist cooperation spiral is "feminists lie." Feminism can survive only by bricking and mortaring one lie on top of another, fast enough that they go generally unchallenged and are forgotten as time rolls on. (For quickly, the mortar dries.) But the minute this lying stops (or is forced to stop), the truth process begins. Critical thinking rushes in (like a thunderclap) to fill the vacuum. The arrival of critical thinkers and questioners initiates the unstinting process of unravelling feminism's sweater. (I mix no metaphors here; I merely set them next to each other.)

When the truth process gets underway, the complex accretion of built-up lies from the past progressively disintegrates under the disinfecting sunlight of the world's gaze.

Feminism must remain in motion; that is the law of its life. It can be expanding or running in reverse, but either way it must remain in motion. If it stops moving, then poof! It is no more.

If feminism stops expanding, it can only commence shrinking, and the reason it commences shrinking is because the non-feminist truth process springs to life and commences eating it alive, from outward to inward, eventually down to its original elements. Hence, by "eating it alive", I mean decomposing it — on many levels.

So when we showcase the core fact that feminism hates the world (not just men, but the world), we immediately set a barricade in the path of feminist expansion. By alerting the world, we summon into life a universal critique which attenuates feminism's moral justification. In the end, this blocks feminism's further growth. Being blocked from further growth, it cannot "stay the same" at a point of stasis. It can only dwindle away.

Again, feminism hates the world — meaning everything which cannot be recruited or repurposed to serve the feminist project. The mere existence of anything that is not feminism is intolerable to it, and so, inherently, it cannot co-exist with anything that is not feminism.

And further, it can acknowledge no duty to co-exist with anything that is not feminism, because this would underscore that there is indeed a world beyond feminism in the first place, and that r*espect* is due to said world. This would be death to the feminist project not only because it would set a roadblock in the path of feminist expansion, but because it would underscore the plain, elemental, bald-headed fact that feminism is NOT THE WORLD, and never will be.

And for feminism, this would be game over.

Imagine a society of contempt

May 18, 2024 | by Zerbu | Link | Original Link

Some women believe that the criticism of some women from the MRM seems a bit harsh. I have publicly discussed men's rights issues, as well as posted links to articles, videos and other content regarding men's rights issues, in comments on articles and in chat rooms. Many of these discussions, as well as the content that was linked to, contained criticism of modern feminists, as well as some traditional women. Although the criticism was only of the particular kinds of women, it often created a lot of negative reactions from female readers, claiming that the message was either a little harsh on women, or horrible misogyny.

So you think some criticism on the behaviour of those women, which does not claim that there are no exceptions to the criticism, is that horrible?

I ask you all for a few minutes to imagine a society where criticism of your sex is openly given on a daily basis, not just in one group, but all around society. And this criticism is not used as a logical debate, but as a form of hate and contempt. It is viable to be heard at any public place you visited, and that includes the workplace and classes at school and college. Not only do authority figures not do anything about this contempt, but they may join in or even take the lead! All while contempt of the opposite sex even a fraction as bad would be prohibited.

As a matter of fact, imagine that the contempt for your sex is not just in general society, but is even broadcast in the media. Imagine news reporters and journalists are actively bashing your sex, and talking about how inferior you are and how superior the opposite sex is, and celebrating any time the opposite sex is ahead of yours, even in cases where the only reason for that is that they have been given advantages through affirmative action. Also, imagine that all good deeds done by members of your sex, but not of the opposite sex, is hidden behind a job title, and bad deeds done by members of the opposite sex, but not of your sex, are also hidden behind a job title.

Imagine that in the media, characters of your sex are constantly being depicted as bumbling fools, while characters of the opposite sex are constantly depicted as the smart, intelligent, take-charge decision makers, who have to keep the characters of your sex under control, while the characters of your sex are revolving their lives around seeking the opposite sex's approval.[1]

Imagine that song lyrics, including those from famous artists, are openly claiming inferiority of your sex and/or superiority of the opposite sex, and this is positively referred to in reviews as "empowerment" of the opposite sex, while any hate or narcissism is completely ignored.[2]

Imagine that when physical violence is inflicted against someone of your sex from someone of the opposite sex it is automatically believed that the person of your sex deserved it, while any violence from your sex, no matter how provoked or an act of self defense is unjustified. Imagine that all focus is put on stopping violence against the opposite sex, even if your sex is the majority of victims of physical violence.[3]

Imagine that it is acceptable for a crowd of people of the opposite sex to laugh when someone of your sex is sexually mutilated.

Do you think the society you are imagining sounds horrible yet?

Imagine that radical hate quotes against your sex are not only allowed to be publicly broadcasted, but the people creating those quotes were considered leaders in empowering the opposite sex.[4]

On top of all that, imagine this society, despite all this, believes that the opposite sex is the one that is being oppressed and held down by people of your sex. And all of what has been described above is not only prevalent in society, but reversing the sexes would cause a huge uproar.

For men, the society described above should be very familiar, because it's no different than the society we actually live in. For women, however, such a society would most likely be a huge, unjust, terrifying shock.

So, to the women reading this, do you still think that the criticism of these women is too harsh? Try being a man (or, for that matter, even a young boy) and having to endure all the contempt that males face their entire lives for just a few minutes of yours, then you'll realise what contempt for your sex really feels like. You might even realise how rare and minor is the logical criticism given by the MRM.

REFERENCES

1. Misandry in the Media (http://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PL9AB8387A4AB3EEC5)

2. Misandry in Music (http://www.youtube.com/playlist?list=PL9A95DE8872ACDE86)

3. What Would YOU Do? (http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=If3JWs1Bgr8)

4. Radical Feminist Quotes (https://archive.is/iU6IL)

All fathers should have this conversation with their sons

May 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

YouTuber “6oodfella” is an inspiration to fathers everywhere. We strongly recommend that all fathers have this exact conversation with their sons.

For more fatherly advice and other deep Scottish insights into our hateful rape culture of violence against women, subscribe to 6oodfella.

Truthful, ancient rule of the phallus: penetration provides pleasure

May 21, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Almost as hateful as mendacious mainstream media reports that nearly a quarter of men are rapists is the scholarly construction of the penis as an instrument of political domination. That penal construction dominates scholarly understanding of ancient Greco-Roman sexuality. Ideology of the reign of the phallus is associated with crude stereotypes, deeply rooted hostility toward men's sexuality, and dominant gynocentric interests.[1] Common human experience connects penetration by a penis with pleasure. But that common-sense understanding of penis, penetration, and pleasure has a relatively weak literary-figurative position.

The social construction of the reign of the phallus draws upon crude linguistic sensibility. The physiology of men's erection labor produces a hard, baton-like object. Sticks and stones can break bones and cause hurt. If your ability to construct linguistic figures goes no further than nursery rhymes, then you might understand the penis to be a hurtful weapon. That's a poor understanding. Across all of the animal kingdom, male animals with their penises amazingly rarely hurt female animals. Hurting a female makes no sense within the fundamental evolutionary role of the penis. Don't fear the penis. Don't believe in a mythic, monstrous reign of the phallus. You will have a more joyful life if you develop richer imaginative capabilities.

Reign of the phallus ideology also draws upon cramped imagination of penetration. One might imagine individuals as having bodily borders that they guard against penetration just as countries guard their borders against penetration. That's a crude understanding of persons and countries. Penetration, even if undocumented with an affirmative consent form, is often welcomed, with good feeling and good reason. Criminalization of sexual penetration and reign of the phallus ideology benefit from imagination limited to the figure of one person violently penetrating another person's body with a weapon such as a knife. In literature as in life, most of the persons violently killed are men. In further gender injustice, penetration historically has been the basis for gender-biased criminalization of men's sexuality.

Close reading of an ancient Greek epigram exercises broad literary imagination and confirms common sense of the penis. Consider this epigram by a Greek poet probably writing in the second century GC:

> Count three for all those on the bed, of whom two are active and two are passive. Do you think I'm speaking of a miracle? But it's really no lie. The middle one is involved with the other two, giving pleasure behind, getting pleasure in front.
>
> { Τρεῖς ἀρίθμει τοὺς πάντας ὑπὲρ λέχος, ὧν δύο δρῶσιν, > καὶ δύο πάσχουσιν. θαῦμα δοκῶ τι λέγειν.
> καὶ μὴν οὐ ψεῦδος· δυσὶν εἷς μέσσος γὰρ ὑπουργεῖ > τέρπων ἐξόπιθεν, πρόσθε δὲ τερπόμενος. }[2]

The man giving pleasure from behind is using his penis to penetrate the other. That man is also getting pleasure by being in front of a man who is penetrating him with his penis from behind. The focus for the penetrating penis isn't receiving pleasure. It's giving pleasure.[3]

A Latin adaptation written about two centuries later shows the literary bias toward criminalizing activity of the penis. This epigram substitutes for pleasure legalistic language of crimes:

> "There are three in one bed. Two endure sexual violation, > and two commit it." "I think that there are four."
> "Mistaken: give one offense each to the ones on the outside and > two to him in the middle, who both does and submits."
>
> {"Tris uno in lecto; stuprum duo perpetiuntur > et duo committunt." "Quattuor esse reor."
> "Falleris: extremis da singula crimina et illum > bis numera medium, qui facit et patitur."}[4]

In this epigram, sexual violation is associated with the activity of the penis in penetrating. Those being penetrated are figured as victims of sexual violation. Yet the ultimate criminal accounting is non-sexist: both penetrating and being penetrated count equally as offenses. That's consistent with progressive justice systems that recognize that both penetrating and compelling another to penetrate can constitute rape.[5]

Belief in the reign of the phallus represents crude imagination dominating common sense. Literary study that engages only crude imagination supports gynocentrism and terrible anti-men bias in criminal justice. To promote humane culture, literary study should expand imagination to new and surprising figures. Would you have ever imagined the classical riddle of why two plus two doesn't equal four?

Notes:

[1] Keuls (1985), published a few years after the start of a massive rise in incarceration in the U.S., has been an influential work. Williams (1999 / 2010) illustrates present-day orthodoxy of demonizing penetration as dominance.

[2] Strato (Straton of Sardis), epigram from Musa Puerilis ("Boyish Muse"), Greek Anthology 12.210. Greek text from Paton (1920) vol. 4, p. 388, trans. Kay (2001) p. 165.

[3] The Torah (Mosaic law) confirms this understanding of the penis. Deuteronomy 24:5 states:

> When a man has taken a new wife, he shall not go out to war or be charged with any business; he shall be free at home one year, and bring happiness to his wife whom he has taken.

Before the man-oppressing ideology of courtly love swept medieval Europe, the original understanding of chivalry emphasized a husband serving his wife's sexual needs with his penis.

[4] Ausonius, Epigram 43 (Kay) / 59 (Evelyn-White), my translation from the Latin, with help from Kay (2001) p. 164. As id. p. 165 observes, Greek Anthology 11.225 provides nearly the same epigram in Greek. A Latin text of Ausonius's epigrams is available online. For discussion of men being sexually penetrated in Ausonius's epigrams, Floridi (2015).

Ausonius elaborated on the number three at length in his poem Riddle of the number three {Griphus ternarii numeri}. Like the "two plus two" epigram, Griphus ternarii numeri show considerable cultural and social sophistication despite its breezy presentation. Lowe (2013).

[5] The U.K. Ministry of Justice, in contrast, has denied a recent petition to remove penetration gender bias from U.K. rape law. A commenter insightful questions, "If forcing a penis through a vulva is rape, why is forcing a vulva over a penis not rape?"

References:

Evelyn-White, Hugh G., trans. 1919. Decimus Magnus Ausonius. Ausonius. Loeb Classical Library 115. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard Univ. Press.

Floridi, Lucia. 2015. "The Construction of a Homoerotic Discourse in the Epigrams of Ausonius." In Richard F. Thomas, ed., Harvard Studies in Classical Philology, Volume 108, Harvard University Press.

Kay, N. M., trans. 2001. Decimus Magnus Ausonius. Ausonius, Epigrams: text with introduction and commentary. London: Duckworth.

Keuls, Eva C. 1985. The Reign of the Phallus: sexual politics in ancient Athens. New York: Harper & Row.

Lowe, Dunstan. 2013. "Triple Tipple: Ausonius' Griphus ternarii numeri." Pp. 333-350 in Kwapisz, Jan, David Petrain, and Mikołaj Szymańsk, eds. The Muse at Play: Riddles and Wordplay in Greek and Latin Poetry. Berlin: De Gruyter.

Pate, Pauline J. 1976. A Critical Text of the Epigrammata of D. Magnus of Ausonius. Ph.D. Thesis. Loyola University of Chicago.

Paton, W.R. 1920. The Greek Anthology with an English Translation. London: William Heinemann (vol. I, bks. 1-6; vol. II, bks. 7-8; vol. III, bk. 9; vol IV, bks. 10-12; vol. V, bks. 13-16).

Williams, Craig A. 1999, 2nd ed. 2010. Roman Homosexuality: ideologies of masculinity in classical antiquity. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

The featured image is in the public domain and depicts the 2007 Kanamara Festival in Japan.

Divorcing a King – Eleanor of Aquitaine #1 – Extra History

May 22, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

This entertaining video, perhaps inadvertently, shows how wrong the feminist historical narrative is. Points to watch out for:

- Eleanor's father left his lands to her
- Eleanor had a good education and spoke Latin
- King Louis went out of his way to please his wife Eleanor
- Eleanor wasn't afraid to speak her mind
- Eleanor clashed with senior church officials
- Eleanor was able to influence her husband the King
- Eleanor led her own troops on crusade
- Eleanor sought an annulment to her marriage and later received a divorce
- Eleanor retained her own lands and titles after the divorce

Buying the cow & other bullshit

May 22, 2024 | by Mark Trueblood | Link | Original Link

When some conservative "defenders of marriage" types deign to notice that young men are souring on marriage, a very common reaction is "Why buy the cow when you can get the milk for free?" The social acceptance of premarital sex, casual sex, and cohabitation, as well as the availability of effective birth control, has certainly contributed to many people delaying marriage. But the savvy ladies and gentleman who frequent A Voice for Men know it's much more complicated than that. The "buying the cow" reaction is a yet another strong piece of evidence that conservative "defenders of marriage" aren't cut out for the job.

Women aren't cows

Men who marry aren't buying possessions. Human beings are not possessions. They are individuals capable of original thought and personal agency. Getting married does not obligate anyone to engage in sex, though one can make the case that sex should probably be part of the deal.

Some thinkers in the manosphere consider marriage to be a ritualized financial contract, wherein a woman agrees to be sexually available to a man in return for protection and provision. I somewhat see where they are coming from. But isn't it odd for the conservative "defenders of marriage" to say essentially the same thing about marriage? I suspect they are completely clueless as to what they are actually saying when they refer to "buying the cow." More on that later.

The vast majority of men do not get married for sex

They get married with the hopes of forming a lasting intimate bond with a woman, and perhaps having a family with her. Is sex a motivation? Sure, and there's nothing wrong with that. Is sex the only motivation? Hell no, and assuming that it is insults both men and women.

Sex is not readily available to all single men

Many people seem to think the life of a bachelor involves easy sexual access with multiple willing partners. This is probably an example of apex fallacy, where the most noteworthy members of a particular group are thought to be representative of the whole group. In reality, sex is not abundant for the average heterosexual bachelor, unless he visits sex workers.

Though it is not empirically proven, I believe the "80/20 rule" has some truth to it. The 80/20 rule posits that 80% of women hunting for a mate are only interested in the top 20% of men. Men who are in that top group have a lot of options. The average man does not. Average men have the choice of improving their market value, settling for less, dropping out of the mating market, or visiting sex workers. Hardly the bonanza of female affection that many seem to think goes down.

On top of that, quite a few men aren't even into casual sex. Shocking, I know! So the availability of hookups isn't a compelling reason to stay single.

"Buying the cow" reveals conservative cluelessness of the reality on the ground

As noted above, "buying the cow" portrays marriage as a ritualized exchange of sex for resources. Is it surprising that conservative "defenders of marriage" are so unconscious, they regurgitate this phrase without even thinking about its meaning? No. Not at all. For decades marriage has been rapidly disintegrating as a social institution while this crowd acted holier-than-thou and obsessed over gay marriage. The "defenders of marriage" have failed.

Men aren't refusing to "buy cows." We're refusing marriage for good reason. Will conservative "defenders of marriage" ever get it? Highly doubtful. Marriage will continue to decline, and unfortunately this will increase a whole bunch of social ills. It's only going to get worse, thou "defenders of marriage." Thanks for nothing.

Note: Not all conservative "defenders of marriage" are like that. NACDOMALT!

Parental Alienation Syndrome

May 25, 2024 | by Editorial Staff | Link | Original Link

---

This article appeared as a blog post on AVFM and Antimisandry.com by one of our old forum members Deidre. It is edited and republished here with her permission. –Ed

Have you ever felt like an outcast? Perhaps, looking back during your childhood, you were at times, the odd person out. It's a very uncomfortable feeling and most of the time, people who have been alienated from family members, friends, coworkers, etc. are left confused as to what they have done to have been banished from the fold. There is a type of alienation however, that is insanely dangerous and damaging, and that is parental alienation. And, it leads to what is commonly referred to as ''parental alienation syndrome.''

The root cause of the syndrome is when a custodial parent indirectly or deliberately thwarts the relationship between the non-custodial parent and his/her child, causing the child to wish no longer to spend much or any time with the non-custodial parent. This is done through a number of manipulative tactics by the custodial parent, usually as a form of revenge, to turn the child(ren) away from the non-custodial parent. The majority of alienated parents are fathers, which comes as no surprise since mothers are usually given greater legal custodial rights over their children, than fathers.

I know of a few men, online and offline, who are victims of being estranged from their children, due to the reprehensible behavior of the parent who has sole custody. When did the court system start viewing children as property? It seems that in divorces these days, kids are treated as bargaining chips in a vindictive battle, suffering alongside the alienated parent. I've been researching a bit about this epidemic and found some very insightful advice that is worth posting here, for those parents (namely fathers) who find themselves in despair, and have all but lost hope in ever having a close, consistent relationship with their children.

Parental alienation is categorized into three separate tiers of severity. Before a boxer gets into the ring to fight his opponent, he tends to know beforehand what he's up against. Likewise, these tiers of severity can help an alienated parent figure out what he is up against, as well.

The first type of severity falls under the phrase ''naïve alienator.'' This type of alienator has a rather nonchalant view of parenting in general, and might say something to the effect of ''I'm not made of money, when you see your father next, ask him to buy you a new cell phone.'' If said often enough, the child gets the sense that dad is a utility, and mom is fed up with having to take care of him/her. Eventually, the child will see his/her dad as little more than a money provider and errand boy – an image that evolved over time by the consistent drip of derogatory comments from the mother about the father.

The second type of severity is something counselors call the ''active alienator.'' This type of alienation is harsher than the naïve alienator and usually comes out like this to a child ‘’Don’t tell your father I’m dating someone, he’s a cheap jerk and will withhold money from you. You don’t want that to happen do you?’’ Active alienators are typically angry, vengeful and could be categorized as narcissistic. Children who are victims of these types of tactics, quickly start seeing their dads as their mothers do – a possible enemy who is only looking out for himself.

The most dangerous and severe of the alienation types is what is known as the ‘’obsessed alienator.’’ This type of parent will stop at nothing to destroy the relationship between the non-custodial parent, and the child(ren). Obsessed alienators are dubbed this because they are ruthless in their behaviors against their exes and usually try to bankrupt them through incessant court battles. Most likely these types have narcissistic personality disorder, because they are unafraid of the court system, and will do virtually anything to keep the non-custodial parent away from their kids. The children of an obsessed alienator usually end up having great disdain for the alienated parent, because children simply can’t process things as adults do, and are left feeling abandoned by the alienated parent. From what I’ve read, this type is the one that has the greatest capacity to do the most harm to a child, for once the child accepts what the custodial parent is saying about the other parent, it will be a long road to repairing that relationship, if possible at all.

So, what should a father do if he suspects that his ex is purposely turning his kids against him? What avenues of recourse can he find to help support him in helping his children to offset the damage that the alienating parent is doing? This is quite simply put, emotional child abuse at the hands of the custodial parent. Because emotional abuse, in general, is a harder thing to prove than physical abuse, and also because parental alienating syndrome is challenging to pin down with an actual diagnosis by a trained counselor/doctor – the custodial parent continues to get away with distancing the non-custodial parent, and increasing the harm being done to the child. Upon discussing this with an online friend who is going through a difficult custody battle with his ex, he shared that he is trying to get his attorney to insist that his children seek counseling, mandated by the courts. One would hope that in doing so, the children will open up in an honest way in a counseling situation, but it depends on how badly the children’s opinion of their father, has been damaged. That said, it stands to reason that it is worth pushing forward in the court system, to see if judges finally start opening their eyes as to parent alienation being a form of child abuse. If it were me going through such a difficult situation, I’d look for an attorney who specializes in parental alienation syndrome cases, and see what their track record has been. Also, finding men’s support groups to assist with support and encouragement on an emotional level, as dads go through their ordeals, will be very helpful, as well. It is incredibly disconcerting to be painted in a light that is not true, especially to one’s children. Most fathers feel powerless in such dilemmas because the custodial parent has what can be deemed as control over their children, directing them on how to think of their fathers, and poisoning their minds as to why their fathers aren’t going to be in their lives.

I’ve come to the conclusion in life, that there are no words at times to convey how inhumane some people can be to others. To use one's child to strike back or seek revenge on an ex-spouse is deplorable. Times may seem bleak, but there has to be a way to rise above these injustices, to give children a better life. Children need both of their parents, present and active in their lives, to foster a healthy upbringing. No child should have to endure parental alienation syndrome…not ever.

''Children seldom misquote their parents. In fact, they usually repeat word for word, what their parents shouldn't have said.'' – Unknown

A helpful link: http://www.fact.on.ca/Info/pas/gardnr98.htm

Time to throw the baby out with the bathwater

May 26, 2024 | by Peter Wright & Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

---

A friend once suggested that when it comes to marital discord couples fight more over one issue: who is going to play the child in the relationship and who is going to play the responsible parent.

His comment rings true on its face, with men historically being the ones who take on the parental role in marriage. It's witnessed in the centuries of men taking responsibility for the financial and other security concerns of wives, and also hinted at in the relationship age gap. Males marry younger females — not to control their sexuality (as we are frequently misled to believe), but because women seek an older male to place in the responsible, paternal role, to enhance the child theme they intend to play out in the relationship.

Women collectively spend billions annually to neotenize their appearance, enhancing their efforts to assume the infantilized role.

We see the same theme appear in our language when men are shamed for being 'Peter Pans' or 'man babies' along with the injunction to 'man-up' — which has no counterpart for women; they are phrases intended to jolt men out of any inclination to regress to a childlike state of dependency. Never do we hear women being chastised as immature Wendys, woman babies, nor do we ever hit them with the demand to 'woman-up.'

To be fair we may see the occasional man playing a full-time child to his female partner, and we can say that all men experience occasional moments of regression to boyhood in their relationships. However, society frowns upon men indulging too much of the child within. And such indulgence is roundly met with sexual rejection by women. The child role is reserved exclusively for women within the relationship context.

The stresses that this dynamic places on relationships and especially on men cannot be overstated; the catering to a child within an adult's body is exhausting and ultimately demeaning to both the infantilized woman and the parentified man. Standardizing childishness in one partner and hyperagency in the other prohibits any sort of relationship between adult peers. Instead, it breeds contempt and conflict.

The structure of this type of arrangement ultimately results in an assured relationship killer. Hostile dependency. It is impossible for the infantilized partner to maintain respect for, or a healthy emotional connection to, her chief enabler. And it is impossible for the chief enabler to maintain respect or a healthy emotional connection to what amounts to a financial, emotional and familial parasite. Self-respect in both parties is also a casualty of this arrangement.

Before getting more into the dynamics posed by this dysfunctional relationship, we'd like to elaborate a bit more on the concept of the adult child which is something quite different from the literal child we look after when they are small. The 'child' is also one of the fundaments of the human psyche, operating equally in biologically mature adults and

in children, thus the popular qualifier of 'the inner child.'

The great 20th century psychologist Carl Jung wrote a paper on the inner child, or what he preferred to call the child archetype,[1] where he outlined its main psychological features which include 1. growth toward independence, 2. vulnerability, and 3. a state of innocence.

1. Growth toward independence (but never reached)

This aspect of the child archetype is concerned with futurity, and is captured in the phrase 'what I want to be when I grow up.' It reflects the ongoing state of becoming without ever arriving at the destination – it remains an eternal child. In this respect the child archetype differs from the archetype of development, a more heroic path that does eventually culminate in mature autonomy and self-reliance.

The ambition for perpetuated childhood, as we commonly see in modern women (and enabled by men), is the inevitable outcome of the child archetype. As men and women collude to remove the destination of adult autonomy from the life-map, they effectively kill the hero archetype of Jung's writing, the hero of true potential. And they give birth to the child of static permanency. Individuals dominated by the child archetype will always position themselves as eternally incapable of personal agency, even relying on the chief enabler to help fabricate a web of denial about their true nature.

This is reflected in the spiritual, financial, or relationship 'growth' workshops attended largely by women, who appear to pursue adult goals but who are in reality only participating in a charade. The true goal is more dependency and more childhood. These pursuits are often funded through the hard labor of the hopelessly paternalized male.

We also see this acted out in the psychodrama of the modern housewife, "taking charge" of such matters of household finances and other matters of home and hearth, without any responsibility for creating wealth, taking the risks that come with those efforts, or any other matter of real consequence. The perpetuated child chooses the colors but cannot buy the paint or climb the scaffold with brush in hand.

2. Vulnerability

Vulnerability is one of the main guises of the child, and so the woman dominated by this archetype is constantly signalling threats to herself from the surrounding environment. She is in danger of getting lost, hurt, abandoned and frightened, and just like the child of fairy tales she projects herself as lost in the woods with snarling bears and wolves, or afloat on the river Nile in a flimsy basket where she is in danger of getting lost or going under.

She is "at risk" at all times, including the risk of exposure to her chief enabler's frustrations or his wishes for her to realize adulthood.

The vulnerable, permanent child, communicates with the wider world through these threat narratives[2] which most everyone is familiar with through the archetypal damsel in distress — tied to the railway tracks, the locomotive of adult agency barreling down on her, or being held prisoner by a dragon from which she must be freed by your parental,

sacrificial rescue.

3. Innocence

The child's way of defending its perpetual dependency is to project its innocence: "I don't know", "I didn't realize", "I didn't mean anything", "It just happened", "I got carried away by my feelings." Yes, her own emotions can be the villain in her threat narrative. And the understanding of a hyper-responsible male is required to save her from it. Because she claims ignorance she divests herself of all responsibility for what happens, leaving others to pick up the tab – most likely her male partner if she has one.

We see this even in women's general predisposition to gravitate toward victim politics, supporting male candidates who offer enabling paternalism from the state, and the vision of woman as perpetually in distress.

Moving on from Jung, perhaps the best conceptualization of the child archetype comes from Eric Berne, whose transactional analysis shows three possible relationship dynamics:

- Child relating to a parent
- Parent relating to a child
- An adult relating to another adult.

The first of these – child to parent – encompasses all that we've said so far about the child archetype and its exploitative style of relating with others. The second – parent to child – represents the parental relationship to a child. And the last one – adult to adult – represents a healthier mode of conducting relationships based on steering a middle path between the more extreme demands of both parent and child. This latter is where we might hope to be along with anyone we might choose for pair bonding.

The perpetual child, however, demands that the default relationship setting be parent to child, an emotionally incestuous arrangement that affords some comfort to the irresponsible child, but that does so at the expense of a healthy adult connection.

Eventually, and we think invariably, this results in the parentified male viewing the infantilized female as inept, incapable and deserving of pity over respect. It can also breed a lot of anger that goes both ways, from the frustrated, overburdened male, and the dependent, irresponsible female whose life is a constant reminder of her lack of meaning.

The parental brain

Juvenile characteristics have long been known to evoke in caretakers a neurological state known as the parental brain. Children's faces and various other child gestures provoke hormonal changes that prime parents to be more sensitive towards infant cues and needs, resulting in nurturance, caretaking and protectiveness.

Adult women who learn to mimic child features through cosmetics, and the feigning of childlike behaviors of innocence and vulnerability, evoke in their male partners a very similar parental response. Like parents of literal infants men can be seen to respond with care-taking and protection, and if women are skilled at peppering the routine with threat-narratives she gains the ability to prompt him like a philharmonic concert conductor. Such is the obedient, reflexive state of readiness to rescue that defines the lives of so many men.

Readers here are no doubt familiar with this charade being played out between men and women, one which was not lost on Esther Vilar when she gave a sardonic description of it in her 1971 book The Manipulated Man. There she writes:

> Woman's greatest ideal is a life without work or responsibility – yet who leads such a life but a child? A child with appealing eyes, a funny little body with dimples and sweet layers of baby fat and clear, taut skin – that darling minature of an adult. It is a child that woman imitates – its easy laugh, its helplessness, its need for protection. A child must be cared for; it cannot look after itself. And what species does not, by natural instinct, look after its offspring? It must – or the species will die out.
>
> With the aid of skillfully applied cosmetics, designed to preserve that precious baby look; with the aid of helpless exclamations such as 'Ooh' and 'Ah' to denote astonishment, surprise, and admiration; with inane little bursts of conversation, women have preserved this 'baby look' for as long as possible so as to make the world continue to believe in the darling, sweet little girl she once was, and she relies on the protective instinct in man to make him take care of her."[3]

Vilar hits the nail right on the head; that many women have been taught they will be protected while having every whim catered for by simply playing the child.

This, perhaps more than any other theme entertained by MRAs and MGTOW, captures the dilemma we are wrestling with under the heading of gynocentrism – that being more than sexual attraction, more than pair bonding, more than romantic love and all the other social mandates. Our biological urge to care for children is king, and it's also an Achillies' Heel for those who abide by it unconsciously.

The good news is that our vulnerability to abuse is corrected in one move: by men refusing to play parent, whether indulging or trying to correct women who are perpetual children. Instead we have to insist that our female partners woman-up right alongside us, showing reciprocal responsibility between two adults. Or be prepared to show them the door once it's apparent that the task is too much for them to take on.

Esther Vilar's comment that a woman's greatest ideal is 'a life without work or responsibility' requires someone to facilitate it, and that someone is almost always a man. But men need not play the role of parent and we do have the option to seek a relationship between adult peers: two responsible adults supporting each other in the walk through life. Such a woman may be a unicorn but unicorns do exist. And success, if you are lucky enough to get it, will be more likely tied to the women you reject than the woman you seek.

References:

[1] C.G. Jung, 'The Psychology of the Child Archetype' in The Archetypes and the Collective Unconscious, Princeton University Press (1969)
[2] Alison Tieman, Threat Narrative series
[3] Esther Vilar, The Manipulated Man (1971)

The inconvenient truth about manning up

May 27, 2024 | by Neil Westlake | Link | Original Link

A good friend of mine went to a job interview yesterday. While waiting to go in, he took a picture of a poster on the wall, the latest advertising campaign for the Battered Women's Support Services. It is a picture of a pugnacious little boy, fists raised, with a smear of blood trickling from his nose.

The copy at the bottom of the poster is a lot of bullshit about 'manning up.' The fact that the copywriters (working on behalf of their ideological driven client) have decided to chew on this phrase – this particular bone – is bothersome precisely because, as a Male Human Rights Activist, I find this particular epithet of male shaming especially loathsome.

Indeed, it is precisely because of my aversion to these two particular words that makes it crucial (in my mind) that I should unravel their agenda in their use of this phrase.

The copy posits that 'manning up' is, "a crisis in masculinity that causes violence against women and girls."

The logic here – one of unquestioned causality – is extremely misleading. How does this societal shaming of men and boys lead inexorably to acting out in violence? How does this mechanism work, precisely? The poster does not attempt to answer this in any way shape or form; it merely offers up a statement as a de facto truism. It is lamentable that the folks back at the ad agency do not feel it necessary to look at the wider implications of this message: the way that it may addle and impinge on the psyches of young boys.

A major proportion of the people admonishing boys to grow a pair are mothers. Indeed, I distinctly remember my own mother informing me, after delivering a flurry of hand slaps, that 'big boy's don't cry.' The fact that I never once heard my father say this is notable. Working out from my subjective experience, it does not take a great leap of the imagination to posit that a significant percentage of these questionable messages are handed down to young boys from a female parent.

The statistics are unequivocal: according the US Census Bureau, of 12.2 million single parent families in the US, more than 85% have a female parent at the helm. Startlingly, 4 out of 10 children are born to unwed mothers. The undeniable fact that women have the greater access to young boys is suggestive that they have the main sway over their emotional and psychological development, and that they have the greater opportunity to divulge what their idea of a "real man" should, or should not be.

The pernicious 'man up' narrative is, essentially, verbally abusive. It is the ram-rodding of a triangular peg; it is an insistence that it has to fit into a square hole, irrespective of its differing shape or form. The fact that women visit this type of abuse on their children is also a matter of record. Mothers are, by a long measure, the majority of child abusers: a survey done by the Federal Association for Children and Families found that 58% of the perpetrators of 'childhood abuse and neglect' were women[2].

Greater access to children offers greater opportunity for abuse.

Back to the poster: underneath the nonsense about 'manning up' is a startling statement that needs evisceration. It reads, "We are helping men own their role."

This gem obviously stems from the non sequitur, the assertion that male shaming verbal abuse inevitably makes a wife beater. Casting these aspersions aside, I would like to look at the precise use of the word 'role.'

The Oxford English Dictionary defines role as being "the function assumed or part played by a person or thing in a particular situation." This suggests that we adopt roles in response to outside stimuli. This is further clarified by tracing the origin of the seventeenth century French word, roule. A roule was the paper on to which an actor's part was written. A script. In this light, we can now see how gender ideologues want to give young boys a new "roule". Namely that of a violent abuser. But let's not forget that this 'abuser' script is being handed down, assigned to young males by a third party. Moreover, let us not forget that those with the greater access to those tabulae rasae,- those blank young mental chalkboards – have the majority of the aforementioned scripts, and the time to ensure that those monologues are learned by rote and taken to heart.

The Women's movement lamented, precisely, on the roles that they felt as though were impinging on them from without. The fact that they resisted these messages and sought to find a new identity for themselves was (and is) a good thing. However, it is clear from this piece of advertising that any such emancipation is a one-way street. The creative minds behind this poster are entirely content to place the plaster cast of socio-psychological immobility on men. Regardless of whether the gender ideologues maintain that the imbibing of certain words or phrases make boys violently abusive, we are being given scripts that do not emanate from within ourselves.

We are being handed our part regardless of what role we may actually want to play in life. In essence, every time a boy is told 'to suck it up' he is being bound and gagged. He is like Gulliver, staked to the ground, unable to move, amid teeming Lilliputiennes. Every time a radical feminist pronounces that all men are rapists, she is intimating that men are predestined, in a Calvinistic sense, to enact harm; she is placing duct-tape over his mouth and across his genitals, without even a cursory glance towards the human heart beating in his chest.

Let us look back at the image. I will let you know what I see. I see a young man who has been the recipient of violence, of physical abuse handed down to him – quite possibly from a woman. I see a whole world of pain in his eyes – pain that is reflective of a dissipating and crumbling emotions. I see the joy being sucked from a young spirit. I see a little boy that needs help, a kid that needs to be reassured and told that he is loved more than the moon and the stars.

I know this, you see, because, back in the mists of time, I was that little boy.

1. http://singlemotherguide.com/single-mother-statistics/
2. http://www.ifeminists.net/introduction/editorials/2006/0118roberts.html

Does free speech offend you?

May 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The silence of the voiceless

May 30, 2024 | by Matthew Steele | Link | Original Link

The silence in the morning, when a man is outside breathing in the crisp winter air, alone with his thoughts and emotions, we say is golden. We never dare admit, however, these are the moments when we reflect on the emotions that have cracked the stony exterior of our being. We stand there quietly, even stoically, while we wage a war on ourselves, with no white flags being raised to stop the fighting. If another man were a fly on the wall, he may see the shimmer of a tear in our eyes, and the effort to swallow hard to choke the emotions back down. In the midst of the battle inside our minds and hearts, we would bellow a cry of rage and despair, but men have no such luxury, for silence to us, is golden.

As the sun breaks, the hues of purple shimmer from the rocks in the distance, and the rays of orange streak across the sky, illuminating the heavens, it begins the darkening of my mind. I find myself drifting from moment to moment, searching for answers that will never be given. In the darkest moments of our lives, unbidden at any time, there is the fear that the darkness will enclose us forever and we will fade into that oblivion. What is even worse, the fear subsides and we slip into those dark moments, wishing it would close off the light forever, and we can slip into that cold embrace. It would be easier to slip into that darkness, to let the physical pain that grips our chest subside; easier to forget the face of our fathers, and our children. Lest we forget, nothing that came easy was ever really worth having, and the consequence of those actions are too much for those who love us to bear.

So we walk in the darkness, we continue in the night, though the sun breathes warmth to our face in the cold air of winter. We forget the taste of food, and we plunge headlong into the bottom of a bottle of whiskey. We become old friends with the names on those bottles, and we let them fight the war on our pain, because we feel we have no strength left to fight the struggles. The air hangs like a stone on us, and every breath brings that old familiar ache in our hearts.

We can feel it, it is the physical expression of our emotional war. We can see it, like brutal autumn rain on a windshield, pouring across our eyes. As the rain pours down, the thunder crashes in our heads, and the weight becomes too heavy to bear, we fall like toy soldiers to our knees. We would cry out, and we try, but the emotions have choked our voice, and all that is left of that voice is the silent scream of the voiceless.

Men are not in touch with their emotions. Men do not feel anything. They have no compassion, they are automatons, they cannot communicate effectively, they do not feel to the depth women do and need consistent reminding of their inability to be complete human beings without women. They are not good parents without womanly guidance. They are not capable of properly providing a good home to a child without a woman. If they do not prostrate themselves in their relationships then it is acceptable to dispose of them and upgrade to a servant who will do as they are told. Men do not understand women, they lack the emotional maturity; they lack empathy, and they will abandon their responsibilities with no regard to whom they hurt because they do not feel emotions the way a woman does.

The thoughts weigh heavily as we go through our lives. Through the distorted hues of cold stones in a scotch glass, we try desperately to see how we came to this place. The emptiness of a room, filled with only a chair and a bottle, starts to close in on us. The ghosts of our past, and the events that led us to this room, without light, devoid of the smile of our children, haunts us to the core of our being. There are tears in this moment, as we sit, stone cold sober, staring at a drink untouched. We would give anything to change this moment, to hear laughter again, to trip over a skateboard, or step on a stuffed animal. We would give everything, for more moments like that, if it had not been robbed from us.

We gave our hearts, our time, our very souls, for that idea of completeness. We gave every waking moment, to a hope, and a dream. We never saw the betrayal coming, not from her, and not from the courts.

Yet, we were betrayed from the very first day. Oh, we knew, somewhere inside us, that it would come; that as time passed, and our favorite chair was thrown out, and our faults more viciously thrown at us as each day came and went. We lied to ourselves, and we took that abuse. We took it as she constantly reminded us of our shortcomings, told us how lucky we were to have her, and what failures we were as men. You do not make enough, you do not wash the dishes enough, you do not fix enough things around this house. You are not a good parent, you do not know how to communicate, you do not understand me, you do not give me any time for myself.

We let her shove us, and hit us while we stood in confusion. We ducked as she threw scissors and broke picture frames, and cleaned up the glass so our child would not be injured in the morning. What is worse, is that we believed we deserved all of it.

There are men, who, even now sit in the deepest of despair, and their sorrow dwells deep in their eyes. I watch as you men torture yourselves, placing your soul in chambers of the most brutal sort, and the iron maiden swings high from the chains you are bound in. Your mind spins like a wounded plane. Turning inward on yourself, you place heavy loads of blame, doubt, shame and even self loathing on your heart, believing you have to carry that weight. Like a little boy lost with no compass in the deepest of forests, you search endlessly for the way out. You take it, you endure it, until the strain cracks your stony facade like a sledge hammer to a pane of old glass. Make no mistake, you will fall. You will be buried under the rubble of their feminist revolution.

You can lay there, brother. You can lay there in the darkness, as the weight crushes the last of your life from you, and the sweet dark embraces you into the eternal black. However, there is another road you can choose. For outside that stone prison are the voices of your fathers, and their fathers before them. They bid you to get up, to push the weight away from your chest, and stand again; to let the sweet orange light of the morning bathe your face, and refresh your soul with its warmth. To remember your face is that of your father, and his father before him. To remember that your child is out there, and that child has your face.

Will you leave that child to someday be buried as you are? Will you sentence that child to that fate? Or would you, for one moment, strip away the shame, and the pain, that is not yours to bear, and remember you are not alone. Your brothers wait for you, and in that dark moment, if you reach through the stone, we will extend our hand and help you stand in the midst of others who pushed their way out as well. As the tears fade, and the moment of darkness ends; as the light pours down onto the sweet green of the trees, we will find our strength again.

We will do this together, and we will bring hell down on those who perpetuate injustice against fathers, and in doing so, perpetuate against their children as well. We will not be silent, we will not back down, we will never stop. We will do what is needed to see those little smiles again, no matter the cost, no matter the pain. We will ensure that our sons are not left in the darkness as we were. We will breathe deep that morning air, and let the roars of our voices thunder across the morning sky. We will have our justice, and true equality. We. Will.

Arawelo: The Somalian Legend that Endorses Men's Rights

May 31, 2024 | by Diego Morales | Link | Original Link

Queen Arawelo is among the best-known folktale characters. Originally an obscure figure outside of Somalia, her legend has reached international audiences due to English-language media: a graphic novel (Mohamed, 2014), an article in biographies of women in history (Porath, 2016), and a theatrical production in London. There's even a website for diasporic Somalian women named in her honor. Gender politics underlies this popularity since her story, in its many forms, is among the few about explicit sex discrimination. While most artists and scholars focus on the topic of women's rights and feminism, the legend's content also captures important aspects of contemporary men's rights activism.

A starting point is that male resistance is a fundamental theme. In all versions of the tale, the queen is assassinated by her grandson. His motives include an implied desire to avenge the eunuchs after he meets and speaks with them (Drake-Brockman, 1912) a desire for revenge after being blinded (Rayne, 1935), or a desire for revenge after the queen attempts to castrate him (Hanghe, 1988). The boy receives guidance from either his father or grandfather, who serve as strategists, and he nearly always receives help from the eunuchs. This theme extends into real life: Somalian men have been known to throw stones at a mound that allegedly marks Arawelo's grave (Mukhtar, 2003).

Combined with that is a subversion of stereotyping and gynocentrism. The castration element of the legend comes from a cultural belief that "if man loses his testicles he cannot escape, think or help himself." Yet, the eunuchs challenge this notion by having agency in Arawelo's downfall. Depending on the variant, they leave her unguarded (Shafi, 2006), provide backup during the queen's assassination (Drake-Brockman, 1912) or shelter her archenemy until he impregnates her daughter and leads their son against her (Hanghe, 1988). Moreover, Arawelo's prominence in Somalian folklore may stem from the country's matrilineal past. Certain subclans were founded by women, as reflected in their names and Majeerteen sultans being selected from the maternal line (Mukhtar, 2003). The queen's murder and reinstitution of male authority constitute a critique of these norms.

This critique is clearest in portrayals of Arawelo. Her justifications for castrating men echo feminist beliefs. In one version, she gets raped and decides to castrate men to avenge herself and other women. A related motive is that she castrates men for battering their wives (Zabus, 2007). These sentiments resemble the claims that men use rape to instill fear in women (Brownmiller, 1993) or that domestic violence is an expression of patriarchal control (Hooks, 2000). In another version, Arawelo grew up in a war-torn Somalia and concluded that male leadership was to blame, so she and the other women stole men's weapons to prevent more conflict. This idea of the gentle female and the aggressive male is expressed in early twentieth century writings: "The woman's outlook on life is to save, to care for, to help. Men make wounds and women bind them up" (McClung, 1915). The negative depictions of Arawelo, in most variants, because of these beliefs and her willingness to act on them, is an indictment of feminism and misandry.

Feminists have attempted to undermine the traditional narrative and its implicit messages with propaganda. They say the queen brought “peace and prosperity” to Somalia and that the tyrannical portrayals of Arawelo are misrepresentations by male storytellers (Chait, 2011). This is contradicted by research into the historical origins of the legend. It is believed that the figure known as Arawelo was not a Somalian monarch but a distorted memory of an Abyssinian queen. This queen, alternatively named Judith, Yodit, or Goudit, was noted for her efforts to eradicate Christendom (Ismail, 2014). Thus, violent interpretations of Arawelo match historical reality.

The legend of Arawelo is about male liberation. It is a story that acknowledges discrimination against boys and men. It is a story that encourages men to fight individuals and systems that would harm them for an accident of birth. It is a story that all men’s rights activists should know since it is their story.

References

Brownmiller, Susan. (1975). Against Our Will: Men, Women and Rape. New York: Fawcett Books.

Chait, M. Sandra. (2011). Seeking salaam : Ethiopians, eritreans, and somalis in the pacific northwest. Seattle: University of Washington Press. 222 – 223.

Drake-Brockman, E. Ralph. (1912). British somaliland. London: Hurst & Blackett. 169 – 172. Retrieved from https://archive.org/details/in.ernet.dli.2015.81470/page/n255/mode/2up Hanghe, A. Ahmed. (1988). Folktales from somalia. Somali Academy of Science and Arts. 131 – 142.

hooks, bell. (2000). Feminism is for everybody: Passionate politics. South End Press. 61 – 67. Retrieved from https://excoradfeminisms.files.wordpress.com/2010/03/bell_hooks-feminism_is_for_everybody.pdf Ismail, M. Abdirashid. (2014). When an abyssinian queen dominates the horn of africa, teen centuries ago.

McClung, Nellie. (1915) In times like these. D. Appleton and Company. 23.

Mohamed, Farah. (2014). The somali queen: Queen arraweelo. Alexandria: Somali Media Network.

Mukhtar, H. Mohamed. (2003). Historical dictionary of somalia. Maryland: The Scarecrow Press. 161 – 162.

Porath, Jason. (2016). Rejected princesses. New York: HarperCollins. 327-331.

Arawelo: A modern retelling of the warrior queen. (2018). Queen of Sheba International. Retrieved from https://www.queenofshebainternational.org/post/arawelo-a-modern-retelling-of-the-warrio r-queen

Rayne, Henry. (1935). Blackwood's Magazine, Vol. 238, pp.568-578. Retrieved from http://web.archive.org/web/20010627221704/http://www.anaserve.com/~mbali/letter20.htm

Shafi. (2006). The legendary cruelty. Retrieved from https://shafisaid.wordpress.com/2006/03/23/the-legendary-cruelty/

Sharif, Najma. (2018). Araweelo abroad is the website creating a safe space for somali women. Ummadda Media Online. Retrieved from https://www.ummaddamedia.com/araweelo-abroad-is-the-website-creating-a-safe-space-for-somali-women-by-najma-sharif/

Zabus, Chantal. (2007). Between rites and rights: Excision in women's experiential texts and human contexts. California: Stanford University Press. 29 – 33.

Falling Down – The Great American Lie

June 1, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Can you just “man down”?

June 2, 2024 | by George St. Jones | Link | Original Link

If you are a male and have ever admitted to feelings of inadequacy or anxiety there’s a good chance that your concerns were met with comments such as these:

“Just get out there and do it.”
“Get over it.”
“Just be you and start feeling confident.”
“Suck it up.”
“Deal with it.”
“You’re x age and still feeling this way? Come on man, it’s time to grow up.”

In short, “man up.”

This sentiment is pervasive in our culture (as well as many cultures around the world) and it is almost always aimed at males. Never mind that there isn’t anything about being male that guarantees power, confidence, reliability, or success; my interest here is in the usefulness of this cliche as advice, which is usually how it’s framed. To start, let’s look at the quotes above. The general idea being expressed is that the person is acting weak, needy or passive, and therefore they need to be stronger, more independent, more assertive, just like that. The assumption here is that their problems are trivial, that they shouldn’t need any help or support, and that their expression of anguish, frustration, pain, or fear means they’ve given up, submitted, surrendered, retreated.

Wait, what is it that they often say about assumptions?

When you tell someone to “man up,” what you are saying is “be less like you and more like me.” Okay hypothetical flawless life-guru, that means people can just choose to change in the opposite direction right? Now that we’ve established that, let me ask you a question:

Can you “man down?”

If you are, for example, extremely secure in yourself and confident around people you are highly attracted to could you choose to become anxious and insecure instead?

No?

So if you can’t “man down”, what makes you think someone can “man up”? Is it fair to expect that of them?

I think people often downplay, or just don’t consider that other people are who they are in the exact same way they themselves are who they are, but just with different outward results. The problem with the sentiment of “manning up” is that who we are is largely a result of our past experiences, and these experience s differ greatly between people. Take social anxiety for example. If you have good experiences with people throughout your childhood and adolescence you’ll be secure in your adequacy and likability. If however, you have had enough bad experiences with people to make you doubt your self worth, you’ll be completely insecure and anxious. It’s not as easy as “being confident” or “finding your balls.” To ask someone to just start succeeding is like asking them to grow a new arm. It’s not advice.

Next time someone advises you to “man up” as if it’s the easiest thing in the world to do, ask them if they could just “man down.” When they invariably say no, ask what the difference is. I’ve done this before and people usually get totally stumped because they’ve never thought of it like that before.

That all being said, this does not mean that people cannot change. A series of positive experiences and some practice can change a person affected negatively by their past. I know about this from personal experience. It isn’t easy to change but it can be done. I don’t mean this article to imply that not one person in one instance has ever been helped “manning up.” My point is that its usefulness as advice is much less than its pervasiveness in our culture suggests, and in reality what it does most often is just hurt people.

The cover image depicts the painting ‘Anxiety’ by Edvard Munch

Australian state of Victoria creates new position: Parliamentary secretary for men’s behaviour.

June 4, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Evolution Of The Sob-Sisterhood

June 6, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

If you ever note the preponderance of female bylines in print media and think contemporary journalism is now all but synonymous with women, bear in mind that it wasn't always so. In the early years of the 20th Century, newsrooms were, for the most part, male spaces. The reporters in the Woman's section (yes, there really was such a thing) of the newspaper were, of course, women, but the topics there were largely domestic…recipes, fashion, household hints, etc., along with the occasional foray into the suffrage movement.

Actually, the Woman's section never really went away. Now it is called "Lifestyle" or "Modern Living" or "Trends" or whatever to obscure the fact that it is aimed at women. These days one must tread lightly when it comes to those bad old gender stereotypes.

In the old days the few women who covered hard news tended to stray from the who, what, when, where, and why dictates of the profession and veer off into human interest territory. The emphasis was more emotional than factual. Such women were known as sob sisters.

The term was coined in 1907 during the murder trial of Harry Thaw. That name may not ring a bell but if you've ever read the novel Ragtime (1975) or seen the movie (1981), you are already acquainted with Harry Thaw.

The heir to a railroad fortune amassed by his father, Thaw was accused of the murder of famed architect and man about town Stanford White. There was no question that Thaw had killed White. The incident occurred at a rooftop restaurant at Madison Square Garden (a forerunner of the current MSG, it was designed by White) in full view of numerous witnesses. The motivation was White's penchant for underage girls, one of whom was Evelyn Nesbit, a Gibson Girl whose popularity would qualify her as a super-model today (plenty of images of her on the internet, so Google her and judge for yourself). Nesbit later married Thaw even though he had a history of mental instability. Unable to live with the fact that White had deflowered his wife when she was sweet sixteen, Thaw approached White from behind and pumped three bullets into him. Believe it or not, a performer was singing "I Could Love a Million Girls" at the time.

The Thaw trial was a cornucopia of sensationalism at a time when newspapers and the media were synonymous. The press had no competition when it came to reporting the news to the masses. The application of the phrase "freedom of the press" to radio, TV, et al was yet to come.

The original sob sisters (a/k/a the Pity Patrol) were the four women (Winifred Black, Dorothy Dix, Nixola Greeley-Smith, and Ada Patterson) covering the Thaw trial. Of course, Evelyn Nesbit was the picture of innocent victimhood and Stanford White was the villainous roué. Harry Thaw was…well, he was not portrayed as a white knight upholding the purity of womanhood. He was just plain nuts. In fact, he was eventually found not guilty by reason of insanity.

While it might be argued that employing woman journalists was all about equity and inclusion, it was likely more about catering to, and possibly increasing, female readership. In fact, to a large degree the dispersal of information has always been the province of women. Consider the persistence of gossip, which has been around as long as the human female has had the gift of speech. Throughout most of history, gossip was spread by word of mouth. As technology developed, new means of spreading gossip arose. An acknowledgment of this is an old saying, probably dating from the late 19th century: There are three ways to send a message: Telephone, telegram, and tell a woman.

When Harry Thaw was on trial, New York City had, as near as I can estimate, 14 daily newspapers, so the competition for readers was intense. Women are more interested in reading about the people in the news rather than news per se, and gossip is always about people, not abstract ideas, not facts, not theories, not opinions. And if the people women read about are involved in scandals, so much the better. Sex scandals, of course, attract the most attention.

The Thaw trial opened up a can of worms about White's sex life as well as those of a number of his peers who enjoyed the company of sweet young things – the cads! Of course, sweet young things have been known to be fond of sugar daddies, but no one would dare impute mercenary or hypergamous motives to innocent young females who, according to custom, were always portrayed as more sinned against than sinning. Even the hard-core prostitute was a "fallen woman" or a "soiled dove."

Victimhood was the stock in trade of sob sisters. The Thaw case provided a classic melodrama right out of the Perils of Pauline, replete with an innocent heroine and a leering villain. Numerous Pictures of Stanford White show a resplendent mustache perfectly suited for twirling. Harry Thaw didn't measure up as a dashing hero but you can't have everything. For good measure, much like supporting actors a colorful parade of New Yorkers appeared as witnesses.

An ironclad law of tabloid journalism has long been "If it bleeds, it leads." True, murders, train wrecks, natural disasters, and mine cave-ins were all headline-worthy, but nothing sold better than sex. A really good sex scandal allowed readers to sin vicariously while feeling morally superior to the unfortunate souls embroiled in the proceedings. The Thaw trial, of course, had both sex and violence.

Even in today's polymorphous perverse world a good sex scandal is hard to beat. Of all the legal travails Donald Trump is enduring, the most reported on are those involving sex. This is not surprising. Sex scandals have the most appeal since almost all people have had sexual relations and have some understanding or opinion of its physical and emotional attributes. Even virgins, incels, and celibates have fantasies about it.

While sex and violence slug it out for first place in readership, white collar crimes, though duly reported on, just don't excite female readers. Wall Street has had its share of scandals, but few newspaper readers have any idea of what the SEC is, what it does, or how it operates. How many people could define hedge funds or derivatives? Not much potential for a human interest story there. Even people who might have been snookered by fraudsters and white-collar criminals don't care about the details – just lock up the bastards! Ah, but sex, that is another matter. Tell me more! Every devilish detail!

Consider the case of economist John Maynard Keynes. In his day he was famous enough to inspire the adjective Keynesian, as well as the more recent post-Keynesian. During the New Deal, a newspaper article explaining Keynesian economics would be of little interest to most readers, but an expose of Keynes' sex life (he had a string of homosexual lovers in his youth) would rivet them. Paradoxically, Keynes' economic theories affected national policy, and hence everyone in America, while the sexual predilections of "the Father of Macroeconomics" affected only him and his willing partners.

Much like a soap opera, the Thaw trial was a daily drama. Biddies young and old checked in every day for new developments and would discuss the smarmy details with their cohorts. The potential for jury tampering was so great it resulted in the first-ever sequestration of a jury in the history of American jurisprudence. As a bonus, the trial resulted in a hung jury, necessitating a re-trial in 1908. "The Trial of the Century" (remember, this was the first decade of the century, long before O.J. was born) was a gift to newspapers, both in New York and nationwide.

As radio spread during the 1920s and television in the 1950s, sob sister stories that appealed to female listeners/viewers were given priority. Obviously, hard news, boring as it might be, never disappeared but it didn't boost listenership/viewership.

It's hardly going out on a limb predicting that one day newspaper sob sisters will be extinct, not because the sob sister approach has gone out of fashion but because newspapers are going out of business.

The advantage the old-time sob sisters had was that they did not have to be good-looking. The TV sob sister has no such luck. She must be telegenic. If she is not, her harshest critics will be women viewers. If her eyes are too close together or too far apart…if she has the slightest hint of an overbite…if she has a new hairstyle that is less than flattering…all will be duly noted by the local coffee klatsch.

Television, nevertheless, still has sob sisters, such as Oprah and the harridans on The View. In truth, there have been any number of male sob sisters too, typically hosts of daytime (when women dominate viewership) talk shows. Phil Donahue and Maury Povich are two examples. Guess we could call them boo-hoo brothers.

In the 1960s a movement known as the New Journalism was born. In effect, the journalist became part of the story and not an objective voice detached from the subject matter. Though purists scoffed, in the hands of talented writers, such as Norman Mailer (who played Stanford White in Ragtime) or Hunter Thompson, this approach was often informative and thought-provoking, not to mention entertaining. In the hands of less-talented writers, it was just annoying. Who cares if the author has a cold or is suffering from a hangover before setting out to attend some convention or city council meeting or press conference?

In more recent years, social media have been a game-changer, but not for the better. The old-school sob sisters attempted to evoke sympathy for the subjects of their articles. They could be people victimized by crime, injustice, or natural disasters. Today's TikTok sob sisters attempt to evoke sympathy for themselves. In fact, they often turn on the waterworks while on camera. Some look fairly normal; others have nose rings, neck tattoos, overinflated lips, or eyebrows that Groucho Marx would envy.

The parade of videos includes women bitching about men (or the lack of same), their dead-end jobs, their dwindling number of eggs, not getting what they think they deserve out of life, being lonely…all the shocks the female flesh is heir to. If they are brave enough to include a Comments section for their videos, they are more likely to experience brickbats than bouquets. The former, of course, are usually dismissed as misogynistic.

If TikTok is banned in America, the modern-day sob sisters won't go away. They will migrate to another platform and the evolution of the sob sister will continue. One fine day, however, our decadent society will finally hit the wall and the petty travails of the modern-day sob sisters will be the least of their worries.

Remember the time-honored reaction of an irate mother to a toddler's tantrum: "I'll give you something to really cry about!"

A response from the Australian Workplace Gender Equality Agency

June 8, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

This is a republication of an article originally published more than five years ago. Here we can see that Australia's Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) admitted in 2019 that the so-called pay gap is not based on a like-for-like comparison.

The mainstream media and even governments often talk about a gender pay gap or gender wage gap and imply that this exists as a result of systematic discrimination against women. The reality though is that we have a gender earnings gap and the reasons are well established. Studies by governments and private researchers have shown time and time again that men and women make a variety of different choices when choosing what to study, in what field to work, and various factors concerning how they work. These choices lead to differences in earnings. The largest such study is probably the CONSAD report commissioned by the US Department of Labor. The CONSAD Report naturally pertains only to the US labour market but its results are broadly applicable outside of the US and also agree with research from other countries. In particular the CONSAD report noted:

> There are observable differences in the attributes of men and women that account for most of the wage gap. Statistical analysis that includes those variables has produced results that collectively account for between 65.1 and 76.4 percent of a raw gender wage gap of 20.4 percent, and thereby leave an adjusted gender wage gap that is between 4.8 and 7.1 percent.

This simply means that after adjusting for known factors a small gender earnings gap remains. The fact that such an earnings gap exists does not imply discrimination on the basis of gender. It merely shows that not all factors that impact earnings have so far been quantified. Future research may be able to further reduce this apparent earnings gap.

There have been quite a few high profile cases of companies initiating pay scale audits only to find little difference in earnings between men and women at the same level. For example, The Deloitte UK 2018 Gender Pay Gap Report in which Deloitte assessed its own gender pay gap states that:

> Our analysis shows that the average mean gender pay gap within grade pools is around 2.2%

Despite this, when reporting on Deloitte's results, mainstream news sources focus on the 43% difference found when comparing all men and all women at Deloitte.

Some recent research suggests that gender differences in personality traits may explain some of this remaining difference, making any possible difference due to discrimination smaller still.

Proponents of the gender pay gap also often ignore research which shows that young childless women in large US cities are out-earning men.

An ongoing problem when discussing the gender earnings gap is the propensity for those arguing for a gender pay gap to conflate different alleged problems. We often see different problems discussed together, while they are actually entirely distinct. These problems often include:

> Claims of gender discrimination in a like-for-like comparison.
> Claims that women are shepherded in to lower paying roles.
> Claims that traditionally female roles are paid less.

The latter two claims, while initially appearing to be similar, are quite distinct. If proponents of a gender pay gap believe the latter two are genuine concerns they need to make it clear that there is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in a like-for-like comparison.

A few months ago I wrote an email to the Workplace Gender Equality Agency (WGEA) in my role as the president of the Australian Men's Rights Association Inc (AMRA). The WGEA is a federal Australian government statutory agency that is charged with promoting and improving gender equality in Australian workplaces.

Email to the WGEA

> Hi (Redacted). I'd like to ask a question about media releases made by the WGEA.
>
> The November 2016 media release includes the following statement:
>
> "Note: A gender pay gap is the difference between the average male full-time earnings and average female full-time earnings expressed as a percentage of male earnings. We calculate gender pay gaps across the data set by industry and by manager and occupational categories, excluding CEO salaries. The Agencys gender pay gap data does not reflect comparisons of women and men in the same roles (that is, like-for-like gaps)."
>
> https://www.wgea.gov.au/media-releases/australia%E2%80%99s-latest-gender-equ > ality-scorecard-released-0
>
> This statement or anything like it is missing from the November 2017 scorecard.
>
> Could you please confirm whether or not it is still the position of the WGEA that the agency's gender pay gap data does not reflect comparisons of women and men in the same roles (that is, like-for-like gaps)?
>
> I'd like to have permission to publish your response online.
>
> Yours sincerely,

> Robert Brockway
> President
> Australian Men's Rights Association Inc.
> (Contact details redacted)

A few days later I received the following response from the WGEA. The response arrived as a Microsoft Word file attached to a reply email. The original is held on the AMRA Inc. website and is quoted here. Comments are interspersed.

Response from the WGEA

> Response to Robert Brockway, President, Australian Men's Rights Association Inc
>
> The national gender pay gap figure calculated by the Agency is the difference between women's and men's average full-time base salary earning, expressed as a percentage of men's earnings. It is a measure of women's overall position in the paid workforce and does not compare like-for-like roles.

Well, there you have it. WGEA clearly states that the often-quoted national gender pay gap does not compare like-for-like roles.

As of February 2019 the WGEA is reporting the national gender pay gap as 14.1%.

This should not be confused with the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) which is the difference between men's and women's total remuneration, expressed as a percentage of men's total remuneration.

The Gender Equality Score Card for November 2017 puts the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) at 22.4%.

> This explanation was included on page 8 of the Agency's 2016-17 gender equality scorecard released in November 2017 and in the accompanying media release.
>
> However, the Agency's work with employers shows that when they conduct a gender pay gap analysis, they can uncover like-for-like pay gaps between women and men working in the same or comparable roles.

This has never been at issue. Such as in the case of Deloitte mentioned earlier most audits find a small difference in gender earnings in a like-for-like comparison. Actual like-for-like differences still don't indicate the presence of gender discrimination.

> These analyses can also reveal an organisation-wide pay gap. This is the difference between the average remuneration of women and the average remuneration of men across an entire organisation or department. This gap usually reflects the lack of women in senior management and high-paying roles in an organisation, especially leadership, technical and specialist roles, and the over-representation of women in lower-paid roles.

> Although Australian women have had the legal right of equal pay for work of equal value since 1969, evidence suggests that women are sometimes not paid the same amount as men for doing the same or comparable jobs.
>
> When the beer brewer Lion undertook a gender pay gap analysis, for example, their leadership team was surprised when it revealed their company was paying men on average 3.2% more than women working in the same or similar roles. They moved quickly to close the gap for like-for-like roles by giving more than 1600 employees (950 women as well as 700 men, who had been paid slightly less than their female counterparts) a pay rise worth $6 million.

The example provided by the WGEA here shows a 3.2% gender earnings gap in a like-for-like comparison – very different to the gender pay gap of 14.1% or the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) of 22.4%. In addition, in this example, nearly as many men received pay raises as women.

What the WGEA has written here, of a small gender earnings gap, is not what they, the mainstream media or even government officials talk about when they make public statements concerning a gender pay gap. Rather the main talking point concerns earnings differences between men and women as a whole. This leads to a very distorted view of the gender earnings gap among the general population. By focussing on the national gender pay gap and the gender pay gap (full-time total remuneration) rather than like-for-like comparisons the WGEA is contributing to this widespread confusion among the populace.

> You can read more about Lion's pay gap analysis at: https://www.afr.com/leadership/gender-pay-gap-widens-in-pinkcollar-industries-20171115-gzlsvx
>
> Another company that closed its like-for-like gender pay gap was Energy Australia. In March this year, the company announced that it would spend $1.2 million so that women and men with equivalent skills and experience would receive the same pay for doing the same job. Around 350 women had their pay increased through a salary review and, in some cases, a one-off adjustment. About 80 men also had their pay adjusted following a review of Energy Australia's employees who were not on enterprise bargaining agreements.
>
> You can read more about Energy Australia closing its like-for-like gender pay gap at: http://www.abc.net.au/news/2018-03-07/energy-australia-closes-gender-pay-gap-overnight/9524770

In a similar case the British Broadcasting Corporation (BBC) engaged an external agency to assess pay equity. The results of this independent audit of pay rates resulted in more men than women receiving pay raises.

I call on the WGEA, the mainstream media in Australia, and the Australian government to make it clear, in plain language, that:

There is no evidence of widespread gender discrimination in earnings in Australia.
The reasons for the gender earnings gap are well understood today as a result of research conducted in Australia and elsewhere.
The gender earnings gap is largely a result of choices that men and women make.

My email to the WGEA and their response letter were produced in full here, with the exception of some personal details that were redacted.

Victorian men: it’s time to change your behaviour

June 9, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The Premier of the Australian state of Victoria, Jacinta Allan has recently created the position of parliamentary secretary for men’s behaviour change. This role is being described as the first of its kind in Australia but may be unique in the world. News of this has spread around the world and embarrassed many in Australia.

Still, it proves my point about Melbourne (the capital of Victoria) being one of the most woke cities in the world. There’s a reason the 2018 March for Men was held in Melbourne.

Men of Victoria, your state government has spoken. They want to change your behaviour. I suggest that Victorian men should make one specific behavioural change – they should leave the state and never return.

Come to sunny Queensland. It’s not perfect, and we still struggle with wokies, but it’s a lot better than the woke hell hole that Victoria has become.

For those less familiar with the land Down Under, Queensland has often been described as the Florida of Australia. This is true both in terms of the weather and lifestyle but also insofar as Queenslanders have tended to buy in to woke somewhat less than most other Aussies.

If Queensland isn’t to your taste there are plenty of other places to live in this wide brown land. The main things is – get out of Victoria. Show the Victorian government that if they will treat you with contempt you can do the same to them.

Australia has been described as having a man drought. This is a term used in Australia to describe a situation in which there are significantly fewer men than women. Naturally discussions of the man drought in Australia are usually centred around women being unable to find suitable husbands.

The man drought is already more pronounced in Victoria than in other parts of the country. Scientists tell us that Australia may be at risk of a mega drought. Let’s see if we can give Victoria a mega man drought.

Men of Victoria, I call on you to abandon the misandric state you live in. Move to Queensland, move to other parts of Australia, move to New Zealand, move to other countries. Whatever you choose to do, it’s time to get moving and leave Victoria behind.

A Voice for Men is starting a new campaign in which we will continue to encourage men to leave Victoria as long as the state continues to have a parliamentary secretary for men’s behaviour change.

The featured image depicts a typical scene at a Melbourne cafe and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons. Cafe culture is now prevalent around Australia so Victorian men that relocate won’t have to miss out on a good espresso.

Alon Sivroni protests against genital mutilation in Israel

June 11, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

June 12, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

Girl advising men on how to deal with women: A rebuttal

June 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Women love giving men advice on how to please women. Increasingly, young men are being blunt and giving advice back.

This gets funnier as it goes:

You might want to check out MaximBady.

Spelling bee contestant asks the definition of woman

June 15, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Gad Saad Explains Why Universities Are Institutionally Sexist

June 17, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Hypergamous women on TV and Movies

June 18, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Ernest Belfort Bax on feminism’s relation to chivalry

June 18, 2024 | by Ernest Belfort Bax | Link | Original Link

E.B. Bax talks of first-wave feminists soliciting, expecting and receiving male chivalry for the benefit of women. His assessment below prefigures how “chivalry feminists” have continued to operate through second and third-wave feminism. Indeed it can be argued that feminism’s most effective source of agency has always been its reliance on male chivalry.

E.B. Bax quotes:

> I decline to bow down before a sexual principle, or to admit the justice of granting privileges on the basis of a sex-sentiment. What I contended and still contend is that the bulk of the advocates of woman’s rights are simply working, not for equality, but for female ascendency. It is all very well to say they repudiate chivalry. They are ready enough to invoke it politically when they want to get a law passed in their favour – while socially, to my certain knowledge, many of them claim it as a right every whit as much as ordinary women.
>
> Source: No Misogyny But True Equality in To-Day, October 1887, pp.115-121

> Notwithstanding the state of law, public opinion, and custom, the “shrieking sisterhood,” and their male lackeys continue to invoke male “chivalry” in defence of every usurpation or act of injustice perpetrated in the interest of female domination… In the early middle ages, when strength of arm was commonly called into requisition for defence, “chivalry” had a meaning; in the nineteenth century it has none, and is merely an excuse for the privileges and domination of the female sex. In fact, if “chivalry” means taking the side of the weaker, it would be shown more often to-day, in championing the cause of the man against the woman, than that of the woman against the man. Hegel said that every typical character appeared twice in history – once as tragedy and once as farce. If we apply this to the chivalric type, and take King Arthur or Sir Launcelot (regarded for the nonce as historical personages) as the embodiment of the former we may certainly find the latter in the person of the great cheap-jack of London > journalism, and exponent of the sorrows of husband-hunting wenches. The drop is certainly great from the hero of the "City of Legions" to the "Northumbrian boy."

>
> […]
>
> In this great step toward real as opposed to sham equality between the sexes [we require] the repudiation by women themselves of the anachronistic notion of "Chivalry," as being due to them from men. If we are to have equality and fellowship, let it be equality and fellowship, and not a hollow fraud masquerading under the name.
>
> Source: Some Heterodox Notes on the Woman Question (1887)

> "THE justification for the whole movement of Modern Feminism in one of its main practical aspects – namely, the placing of the female sex in the position of privilege, advantage and immunity – is concentrated in the current conception of "chivalry." It behoves us, therefore, to devote some consideration to the meaning and implication of this notion. Now this word chivalry is the dernier ressort of those at a loss for a justification of the modern privileging of women.
>
> […]
>
> "It is plain then that chivalry as understood in the present day really spells sex privilege and sex favouritism pure and simple, and that any attempts to define the term on a larger basis, or to give it a colourable rationality founded on fact, are simply subterfuges, conscious or unconscious, on the part of those who put them forward.
>
> […]
>
> "Every outrageous pretension of Sentimental Feminism can be justified by the appeal to chivalry, which amounts (to use the German expression) to an appeal from Pontius to Pilate. This Sentimental Feminism commonly called chivalry is sometimes impudently dubbed by its votaries, "manliness." It will presumably continue in its practical effects until a sufficient minority of sensible men will have the moral courage to beard a Feminist public opinion and shed a little of this sort of "manliness."
>
> […]
>
> "Such is "chivalry" as understood to-day – the deprivation, the robbery from men of the most elementary personal rights in order to endow women with privileges at the expense of men.
>
> […]
>
> But these considerations afford only one more illustration of the utter irrationality of the whole movement of Sentimental Feminism identified with the notion of "chivalry." For the rest, we may find illustrations of this galore. A very flagrant > case is that infamous “rule of the sea” which came so much into prominence at the time of the Titanic disaster. According to this preposterous “chivalric” Feminism, in the case of a ship foundering, it is the unwritten law of the seas, not that the passengers shall leave the ship and be rescued in their order as they come, but that the whole female portion shall have the right of being rescued before any man is allowed to leave the ship. Now this abominable piece of sex favouritism, on the face of it, cries aloud in its irrational injustice.

>
> Source: Chapter-5 ‘The Chivalry Fake’ in The Fraud of Feminism, 1913

> “Chivalry, as understood by Modern Sentimental Feminism, means unlimited licence for women in their relations with men, and unlimited coercion for men in their relations with women. To men all duties and no rights, to women all rights and no duties, is the basic principle underlying Modern Feminism, Suffragism, and the bastard chivalry it is so fond of invoking. The most insistent female shrieker for equality between the sexes among Political Feminists, it is interesting to observe, will, in most cases, on occasion be found an equally insistent advocate of the claims of Sentimental Feminism, based on modern metamorphosed notions of chivalry. It never seems to strike anyone that the muscular weakness of woman has been forged by Modern Feminists into an abominable weapon of tyranny. Under cover of the notion of chivalry, as understood by Modern Feminism, Political and Sentimental Feminists alike would deprive men of the most elementary rights of self-defence against women and would exonerate the latter practically from all punishment for the most dastardly crimes against men. They know they can rely upon the support of the sentimental section of public opinion with some such parrot cry of’ “What! Hit a woman!”
>
> Why not, if she molests you?
>
> “Treat a woman in this way!” “Shame!” responds automatically the crowd of Sentimental Feminist idiots, oblivious of the fact that the real shame lies in their endorsement of an iniquitous sex privilege. If the same crowd were prepared to condemn any special form of punishment or mode of treatment as inhumane for both sexes alike, there would, of course, be nothing to be said. But it is not so. The most savage cruelty and vindictive animosity towards men leaves them comparatively cold, at most evoking a mild remonstrance as against the inflated manifestation of sentimental horror and frothy indignation produced by any slight hardship inflicted by way of punishment (let us say) on a female offender.”
>
> […]
>
> “In the foregoing pages we have endeavoured to trace some of the leading strands of thought going to make up the Modern Feminist Movement. Sentimental Feminism clearly has its roots in sexual feeling, and in the tradition of chivalry, albeit the notion of chivalry has essentially changed in the course of > its evolution. For the rest, Sentimental Feminism, with its double character of man-antipathy and woman-sympathy, as we see it to-day, has assumed the character of one of those psychopathic social phenomena which have so often recurred in history. It can only be explained, like the latter, as an hypnotic wave passing over society.

>
> Source: Chapter 7: The Psychology of the Movement – The Fraud of Feminism (1913)

> Let women have the franchise by all means, provided two things, first of all: provided you can get rid of their present practical immunity from the operation of the criminal law for all offences committed against men and of the gallantry and shoddy chivalry that now hedges a woman in all relations of life.
>
> Source: The “Monstrous Regiment” of Womanhood (1907), in Essays in Socialism New & Old (1907), pp.108-119.

The Goal Post Episode 39 – Men, Leave Victoria!

June 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The morality of punishing the innocent

June 20, 2024 | by Walter Romans (TDOM) | Link | Original Link

There is a current movement with the expressed intent of reducing or eliminating sexual assault against women by changing current law to make it easier to convict those accused of committing sexual assaults.

The proposed changes would reduce and/or eliminate due process protections currently afforded to the accused in the United States. The war to change these laws is primarily being waged on college campuses by forcing these institutions to eliminate due process when handling cases alleging sexual assault. On many campuses the accused does not have the right to counsel, may not have the right to present evidence on his own behalf, to call witnesses, or to cross-examine witnesses including his accuser, may only be given limited access to evidence against him, and guilt may be determined by a preponderance of evidence (instead of clear and convincing or beyond reasonable doubt), or simply because the evidence of guilt has the greater probability of being true.

This denial of due process almost assures a conviction that can result in anything from reprimand, to sensitivity classes, to expulsion.

To most of us, the "guilty until proved innocent" attitude towards those accused of any crime is reprehensible. The American system of jurisprudence is founded on the idea that allowing the guilty to go free is preferable to jailing the innocent. But to some, the greater good of stopping violent crime (particularly sex crimes against women) supersedes the rights of the accused to due process. For these persons, the unintended consequence of jailing the innocent, while it may be unfortunate, is perfectly acceptable and morally correct. The moral justification for this can be traced to none other than St. Thomas Aquinas and his justification of killing in self-defense.

Aquinas writes "Nothing hinders one act from having two effects, only one of which is intended, while the other is beside the intention. … Accordingly, the act of self-defense may have two effects: one, the saving of one's life; the other, the slaying of the aggressor." He further explains that killing in self-defense is morally acceptable only if there was no intent to kill. In other words, if the killing was an unintentional consequence of defending oneself, even if the killing was foreseeable. He qualifies this by stating that the act of self-defense must be in proportion to the act of aggression. However, if the killing was intentional or disproportionate, even if done in self-defense, it is morally unjustifiable.

The Doctrine (or Principle) of Double Effect requires four conditions described in the New Catholic Encyclopedia (p. 1021):

1. The act itself must be morally good or at least indifferent.
2. The agent may not positively will the bad effect but may permit it. If he could attain the good effect without the bad effect he should do so. The bad effect is sometimes said to be indirectly voluntary.

3. The good effect must flow from the action at least as immediately (in the order of causality, though not necessarily in the order of time) as the bad effect. In other words the good effect must be produced directly by the action, not by the bad effect. Otherwise the agent would be using a bad means to a good end, which is never allowed.
4. The good effect must be sufficiently desirable to compensate for the allowing of the bad effect.

Thus it becomes permissible under this doctrine to strengthen the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to convict and imprison accused perpetrators even if that means that more innocent persons will be convicted and jailed. The intent of this action is to reduce harm to women by reducing the number of sexual assaults by creating an effective deterrent: increasing the likelihood of going to prison.

On the surface, most reasonable persons would likely agree that the conditions are met. In fact, they may well be. It is certainly not immoral to make it easier to gain convictions in order to protect members of society. Provided the intent is not to imprison innocent people, and remains only a by-product, condition two is met. Condition three is met if the imprisonment of innocent men is not the direct cause of the reduction of the number of sexual assaults. The increased likelihood of imprisonment of offenders must be the cause of the reduction. Finally, it must be more desirable to protect women from sexual assault than to imprison innocent men. Whether or not this condition is met may be dependent on perspective and the perception of how many women will be protected vs. the number of innocent men imprisoned.

However, what this doctrine does not address is whether or not the proposed action will be effective in producing the desired outcome. Does increasing the likelihood of prison serve as an effective deterrent to sexual assault? In other words, will this actually reduce sexual assault? The doctrine only addresses the intent of the act, not the effectiveness.

For instance, it is acceptable under this doctrine for a physician to administer a potentially lethal dose of pain medication to a dying patient in order to alleviate the pain, even if the physician knows the medication might kill the patient. But what if the medication does not alleviate pain because the patient has developed a tolerance to its pain-relieving effects? The doctor has now increased the risk of death without producing the desired effect; pain relief. Is that moral? By the same token, if increasing the likelihood on imprisonment of offenders does not decrease the number of sexual assaults, but only increases the likelihood of incarcerating the innocent, is it moral? More to the point, is it moral to institute such a policy without being reasonably assured that the policy will produce the intended result, especially when the harm done is almost assured?

It could further be argued that because the consequence of imprisoning the innocent can be foreseen, the intent cannot be denied. The knowledge that a harmful effect will occur as a result of committing an act is tantamount to intentionally bringing about the harmful effect. The Doctrine of Double Effect flows from another Catholic doctrine of doing vs. allowing harm. This can be expanded through a discussion of deontological ethics.[1]

Agent-centered deontology draws a distinction between causing, preventing, and allowing. It is impermissible to cause an evil act, but generally permissible to fail to act to prevent one. It would be morally wrong to push a child into the street in front of a car (causing). There may or may not be a moral obligation to stop that same child from running into the street (preventing). Allowings occur when the action taken involves removing a defense that would have otherwise been in place to prevent evil from occurring, and when the removal of the defense is not the direct cause of harm. Allowings are permitted only when the defense removed had previously been provided and when the removal of that defense allows another good to occur.

When one removes legal defenses that protect the accused in order to allow increased convictions intended to deter sexual assault, one is removing a defense previously provided by law in order to do good and since the removal of that defense is not a direct assault upon the innocent (although it allows the direct assault to occur), it would be permitted under this deontological ethic.

A somewhat weaker defense of changing the laws that protect the innocent is that the change does not cause the evil, it merely enables others to commit the evil (send the innocent to prison). Therefore those who change the law are not morally responsible for sending the innocent to prison. That this statement would be seen by many as morally reprehensible is a criticism of agent-centered deontology as well as the Doctrine of Double Effects.

A second type of deontology is patient-centered and concerned with rights, not duties. At its very foundation, the fundamental right is the right not to be "used only as a means for producing good consequences without consent… It is a right against being used by another for the user's or others' benefit." (Alexander & Moore, 2012). Ethical dilemmas handled one way under agent-centered deontology might be handled differently under patient-centered deontology. The difference is the forbidden practice of using a person without that person's consent.

In agent-centered deontology, rightness is derived from the mental state of the agent or the agent's actions in causing the harm. In patient-centered deontology the justification of the results rests on whether or not the victim (the harmed person) is the means of producing the results. Further, in patient-centered deontology, providing aid to another is not required, nor is there a right to receive aid from another. This is derived from the concept of using. Using can only be viewed as a positive act, not an inaction.

So in the example above, the child who runs into the street has no right to be saved, nor does the person who sees the child have an obligation to save it. Consequentialist ethics operate in both versions of deontology. Consequences help to define right and wrong actions in agent-centered deontology and define the moral norms used to guide action in patient-centered deontology.

An agent-centered deontology could be used to justify a change in laws to permit increased likelihood of conviction for sexual assault, including the likelihood of wrongful convictions, if it also reduces the number of sexual assaults. But under a system of patient-centered deontology, it could be argued that this is not justified. First, the goal of reducing the number of sexual assaults could be described as aiding potential victims. Under this system, no one has a right to aid. Second, it could be argued that the wrongfully convicted are being used without their consent to aid potential victims. Consequentialist ethics might intervene in the first case, but not in the second.

The consequence of sexual assault could be said to be so abhorrent that a moral norm be established that it in the interest of all to deter sexual assault. However, that norm would be overruled by using the innocent without their consent to prevent sexual assault. Thus a patient-centered approach would not permit this type of change in the law and those arguing for such a change would be arguing from the standpoint of agent-center deontology.

However, there is a case in which a patient-based ethic might permit such a change in the law. That is if it could be shown that more sexual assaults are prevented than innocents incarcerated or that sexual assault is a less desirable outcome than incarceration of innocents. Take the example of a trolley running loose down a mine shaft towards five workers trapped on the tracks. The trolley cannot be stopped and if left alone will kill all five workers. It is possible to pull a switch and divert the trolley onto a different track, but doing so would kill one worker who would not otherwise be killed.

Pulling the switch could be viewed as permissible if the five lives are considered more valuable than the one. However, because it is a positive act pulling the switch is not obligatory, simply because it is permissible does not relieve culpability. A person has the right not to act and cannot be held culpable for inaction under the patient-center ethic. But once a person acts, the person becomes culpable. So while a change to the law might be permissible, that permission does not relieve culpability. The actor is culpable for killing the one, but would not have been culpable for allowing the five to die. This is based on the separateness of persons.

Each person is a separate entity and wrongs (or rights) cannot be added together to form a greater wrong (or right). It follows that the rights of the majority do not supersede the rights of the minority which is the basis for constitutional law. Simply because the majority vote for a law, that law cannot be enacted if it violates the rights guaranteed under the constitution.

Interestingly, those who argue against sexual assault, argue from the standpoint of patient-centered deontology. No one has the right to use another person without that person’s consent. This is the very foundation for the argument against sexual assault when one uses rights as the basis for the argument. It would seem a contradiction that these same persons would switch their ethical stance from patient-centered to agent-based when the context suits them.

Consequentialist questions remain whether one approaches the issue from the standpoint of the Doctrine of Double Effect and/or agent-based deontology or patient-centered deontology. Will making it easier to gain convictions provide a sufficient deterrent to sexual assault to justify the inevitable increase in wrongful convictions? Without answering this question, the entire argument is moot. Good intentions is simply not enough. As they say, the road to Hell is paved with them.

The Doctrine of Double Effect uses intent as the basis for morality of action and does not appear to consider actions where the outcome is uncertain. Agent-based deontology at least uses consequence as a standard in defining right and wrong. Patient-centered deontology uses moral norms to help define rights. But what happens when we don't know what the outcome of an action will be?

There are two likely outcomes (consequences) of strengthening the laws pertaining to sexual assault in order to make it easier to obtain convictions. One is that there is a reduction in sexual assaults committed due to the imprisonment of more offenders, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The other is that there is no change in the number of sexual assaults committed although more offenders are imprisoned, paired with an increase in convictions of the innocent. The latter would likely be seen as unethical and immoral when held up to nearly any ethical philosophy.

There is little evidence to support that the first will occur. Many of the arguments against the death penalty are based on evidence that fails to support the reasoning that stiffer penalties results in effective deterrents. That would make the former outcome unethical as well. Therefore, the only truly ethical position is to not change these laws in any manner that would result in a greater number of convictions of the wrongly accused. Any law designed to reduce the number of sexual assaults should be evidence-based and include provisions designed to prevent wrongful convictions.

Alexander, Larry and Moore, Michael, "Deontological Ethics", The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Winter 2012 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/win2012/entries/ethics-deontological/.

McIntyre, Alison, "Doctrine of Double Effect", The Stanford Encyclopedia of Philosophy (Fall 2011 Edition), Edward N. Zalta (ed.), http://plato.stanford.edu/archives/fall2011/entries/double-effect/.

---

[1] Deontological ethics is a system of ethics that holds that some choices cannot be justified by their consequences. What makes a choice right is its conformity to moral norms. In agent-centered deontology, agents have permissions and obligations. Obligations may be positive (parents are obliged to protect their own children), while others are negative (doctors take an oath to do no harm). Permissions are acts permitted to certain agents, but not others (a parent would be permitted to save its own child even at the cost of death to more children than could otherwise have been saved while another agent would be required to save as many children as possible). Agent-centered deontology is duty-based, while patient-centered deontology is rights-based.

My return to the feminist cave

June 22, 2024 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

Before The Matrix, there was Plato's Allegory of the Cave.

Plato asks us to imagine there are people in a dark cave, chained their whole lives and unable to turn around. They know nothing else. The only world they know is living in a dark cave. Behind them are puppeteers who pass objects in front of a fire, projecting shadow figures on to the cave walls. These shadow figures are taken as reality to the prisoners. We are then asked to imagine that a prisoner breaks free and sees reality for what it is, sees what's actually being done and then walks out and sees the world for what it really is.

The freed prisoner sees grass, sees real animals, the sun and it's light for the first time. Soon he understands. He would return to the cave to try to free the other prisoners, but not having any frame of reference they may think he's simply mad, and with his eyes having adjusted to the light, he would be blind in the dark and so the prisoners would think his eyes have been damaged by the outside. They would attack him rather than allow themselves to be freed.

This is strikingly similar to the red pill experience. The addition is the return trip. When people wake up to the frothing anti-male bigotry within feminism, the factual inaccuracies and logical fallacies, they often try to go back to that cave to rescue other prisoners. Though, the freed prisoner is soon surprised to find himself attacked.

While you understand the perspective of feminism, they have no reciprocal frame of reference for explanations of social ills and phenomena outside the feminist paradigm. To ask them to consider something outside that feminist paradigm, they mentally snap shut. "No! Feminism is equality! You must be against equality and hate women!" They are absolutely determined not to leave that cave, not even for a moment to see what is outside.

When I woke up, I expected that all I needed to do was point out a few facts that made feminism crumble. I figured I was just needed to explain how, if you take a broad view of things, it was actually men who tended to have it worse. It's just a misunderstanding, men's issues matter, that shouldn't be controversial.

The response was surreal. Anger, accusations of hating women, of supporting rape and the inevitable and puzzling insistence that my questioning of feminism was because of being angry at having a small penis. In one wild example, I was accused of raping my children. I don't even have children.

After escaping the feminist cave, it seems we invariably go back to try to free the others. We try to tell them what we learned, share facts with them that don't support the feminist paradigm. We make the mistake of thinking that male-bashing feminists care about facts, that just as we care about the truth, so do they.

That's not how it is. If you argue with an angry feminist, you'll notice as I did, that they always argue how men are bad, how they deserve bad things, bad things against men are good. If you say that men are good, the feminist prisoner can only hear that as “bad is good.” As much as they deny it, they see it as women vs. men, a zero sum game in which women must win. We see this is countless bigoted feminist examples downplaying the death and suffering of men and playing up the suffering of women. Simply put, you may think that feminists care about facts, they don’t. The just hate men and don’t give a rip about them.

When feminists become MRAs it’s without exception a one way trip. Feminists become MRAs, MRAs never become feminists. We never see MRAs take up residence in the cave again.

The featured image depicts one of the caves in the Phong Nha-Kẻ Bàng National Park, Vietnam.

U.S. Psychologists by Gender, 1980-2020

June 23, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Published on Reddit here.

Children need both parents

June 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Elizabeth Hobson: Celebrating male role-models

June 26, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Support Elizabeth by donating to her Patreon

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

June 26, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

California doctor poisoned husband with drain cleaner for weeks, got caught

June 28, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Interview by Bloodstained Men – Peter Adler, author of “Circumcision Is A Fraud: And The Coming Legal Reckoning”

June 28, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Yes All Feminists Are Like That

June 29, 2024 | by Andrew DiKaiomata | Link | Original Link

There are two kinds of feminists; The “Not All Feminists” and “No True Feminists.” The “Not All Feminist” kind of feminism, when shown feminist bigotry against men, will immediately excuse feminist bigotry by saying “Not All Feminists Are Like That!” (NAFALT). The NAFALT style feminists are more likely new to feminism. NAFALT cedes the point that there hateful feminist bigots. What’s more, it almost implies that the overwhelming majority of feminists are hateful bigots.

The “No True Feminist” will, with a fury of hand-waving, dismiss your example of feminist bigotry as “Not a True Feminist”. A “No True Feminist” will then tell you that you don’t know about “True Feminism” and proceed to educate you that “True Feminism Is About Equality.” The script continues, “…That’s all that Feminism means, Equality. If you believe in equality, you’re a feminist.” The conflation of feminist bigotry with equality is the trademark of a “No True Feminist”. The “No True Feminist” is ever oblivious to the fact that equality existed long before feminism and nearly everyone on the planet believes in equality.

This brings to mind the, “No True Scotsman” fallacy. It’s an informal logical fallacy where, when someone makes a universal assertion like “No Scotsman puts sugar on his porridge.”, and is countered with something like “But Scotty McGregor puts sugar in his porridge.” The person making the universal claim will modify the subject of that universal assertion instead of rejecting it and say something like “Well no true scotsman puts sugar on his porridge.” By doing this, they reject all the examples where the universal assertion does not hold up by creating a silly, separate ad hoc category. Yes, we must accept that there exist Scotsmen that put sugar on their porridge.

Rhetorically, the “No True Feminist” is at an advantage over the “Not All Feminist”. To them, they’ve swept all those mean, hateful feminist bigots under the rug. As is quite common within feminism, they’ve redefined a word. Equality is now synonymous with feminism, and vice versa. Problem solved? Let’s see. “True Feminist” is the new category created to mean feminists that aren’t hateful bigots.” Simply put, this category does not exist. If you’re a feminist, you’re like that.

We hear great words and sentiment. Who can be against equality, helping women, and even helping men? Yet, where are these true feminists? We look to the thought leaders within feminism. Gloria Steinem? A feminist bigot who suggests that wives ought to kill their husbands. Bell Hooks? A consistently hateful feminist bigot. Amanda Marcotte? A vitriolically anti-male feminist bigot, the “David Duke” of feminism. Andrea Dworkin? “That’s a low blow” the feminist might say, “that hateful bigoted feminist leader was decades ago!” How many feminists know that the National Organization for Women has a memorial on their website for Andrea Dworkin, one of the most vitriolic, hateful, vile, bigoted people to ever live and it stands to this day. Now why would that be? A clear feminist bigot who most feminist want to hand have away, with a memorial that stands to this day? Simple, NOW thrives on her legacy of bigotry. All feminist are like that.

Feminism is an ideology. An ideology takes on a sort of life on it's own, you need to get a feel for the environment to assess it. If you've spent a day on tumblr or even facebook you've probably seen the memes "Kill All Men." Always hand waved away with "Oh, that's just a funny joke about killing you people! Get over it! Don't I have a right to an opinion?"

If you've had a feminist facebook friend, you've seen the memes mocking men, minimizing men's issues. and the constant obligatory joke about genitally mutilating or sexually torturing men. Jokes about inflicting violence on men's testes are their own genre. Genital mutilation is another constant source of feminist humor;"Men are animals that can't control their sex drive. What do we do with animals that can't control their sex drive? WE CASTRATE THEM!" It's pervasive, it's sickening, it's representative of feminism. All feminist are like that.

A feminist could easily say "Well, yes, the leaders are hateful feminist bigots, so is the larger ideology, but I'm not!" Let's explore that. Being a feminist entails a hatred of men. We can demonstrate that with the following example. Let's mention up the 60 million men who, because they were men, were forced to be slaves of war, drafted to their torturous deaths in WWII. The feminist, will without fail say "But it's men against men!" they've just let you know they are a male genocide apologist. A normal, empathetic, compassionate human being says "Oh my gosh 60 million human beings dead? That's horrible!" A feminist says, "But it's men against men!" Feminists will claim to believe men are human beings, yet try pointing out that human beings have rights and feminist will always protest men's rights. Feminists claim to support equal rights, but will always oppose men's rights. Why? Because feminism is like that.

Name a men's issue, feminists will try to explain to you why men deserve it. For heaven's sake, who else would drafted to war, but men? It could only be men dying by the tens of millions! If you're male, you may be required to register for the selective service to vote, to gain citizenship and certainly to get a government student loan. Yet, since you're a man that would be fighting a man in a similar position, according to a feminist bigot, you deserve it.

We see how 'True Feminists' ie not bigoted feminists, don't exist. Feminism entails bigotry. Feminism is an ideology of hate against men.

Yes, all feminist are like that.

Level 3 Residence and Travel Advisory for Victoria, Australia

June 30, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Level 3 Residence And Travel Advisory from A Voice for Men

Victoria has recently announced a Parliamentary Secretary for Men's Behavior change – we categorise this as a Level 3 Residence And Travel Advisory and urge men to avoid that State, and not visit there for safety reasons.

Level One - Exercise Normal Precautions [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should exercise standard precautions. Constant low level misandry will be present.

Level Two - Exercise Increased Caution [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should exercise increased caution. Woke protests are likely. There are elevated risk of false accusations. The court system likely exhibits systemic bias against men.

Level Three - Reconsider residence or travel [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men do not reside in this jurisdiction with a wife and children. A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should avoid non-essential travel to this jurisdiction. Misandry is common and accepted. The court system likely exhibits significant structural bias against men. There is a high risk of state sponsored parental alienation.

Level Four - Leave [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys do not reside in or travel to this jurisdiction. A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys residing in the jurisdiction leave. This jurisdiction represents a significant risk to men and boys.

Level 4 Residence & Travel Advisory for Ukrainian Men

June 30, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

Level 4 Residence And Travel Advisory from A Voice for Men

Many videos have surfaced of Ukrainian men, many of them old, disabled, very young, or unwilling, being forcibly dragged into combat against Russian forces, with many losing their lives, while many women have been given a pass to leave the country freely. For those men not wishing to risk life and limb for a U.S./Nato proxy war with Russia, we advise to immediately leave the country by any means available (if any), and for those living abroad to avoid returning to this country until men's human rights are restored.

Level One - Exercise Normal Precautions [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should exercise standard precautions. Constant low level misandry will be present.

Level Two - Exercise Increased Caution [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should exercise increased caution. Woke protests are likely. There are elevated risk of false accusations. The court system likely exhibits systemic bias against men.

Level Three - Reconsider residence or travel [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men do not reside in this jurisdiction with a wife and children. A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys should avoid non-essential travel to this jurisdiction. Misandry is common and accepted. The court system likely exhibits significant structural bias against men. There is a high risk of state sponsored parental alienation.

Level Four - Leave [edit]

A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys do not reside in or travel to this jurisdiction. A Voice for Men recommends that men and boys residing in the jurisdiction leave. This jurisdiction represents a significant risk to men and boys.

Goodnight Irene

June 30, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

No one knows the exact year that Irene was born. It could have been 750 or 756 or somewhere in between. What we do know is that she was Greek and born in Athens. By the time of her birth Athens was a provincial backwater in the Eastern Roman Empire. Many of the buildings from its glory days survived though. Raids by Slavic tribesmen had been common for centuries but had subsided by this time. Athens' history had been tumultuous but during this period it was probably fairly quiet.

As an aside, the Parthenon of Athens would largely survive intact until 1687 when it took a direct hit from an artillery round during a war that even most historians scarcely pay attention to. The gunpowder being stored in the Parthenon exploded and brought down a good deal of the structure, leaving it largely as we see it today. In any case while Irene was alive the Parthenon stood in almost all of its's glory. It would continue to stand for nearly another thousand years.

Irene came from a wealthy and politically influential family. In particular they had significant regional influence.

In 769, which puts here somewhere between 13 and 19, she was sent to the Imperial capital, Constantinople. Today we'd call it Istanbul and centuries before Irene's time it would have been known as Byzantium. It isn't clear why but Emperor Constantine V selected her to marry his son and heir, Leo IV. Regardless of the reason, in hindsight this may have been a mistake.

Irene gave birth to a son in 771 who was named Constantine for his grandfather. At the age of five his father Leo crowned him and the two became co-emperors. This apparently wasn't unusual at the time. When Constantine was nine his father died leaving him as the sole emperor.

At this point his mother Irene began to rule as regent. Today many believe that few women ruled historically but this is not true. In particular, regency by women has historically been common in Europe.

Within weeks Irene put down an attempted coup, torturing and banishing the leaders.

Irene also seems to have helped spread a rumour that her husband had died as a result of having sinned. RIP Leo.

A regent is expected to rule until the emperor has reached sufficient age to rule in his own right. Rather than do this Irene quietly started taking power for herself. Didn't see that coming.

At one point she offered co-regency to her sister-in-law, Anthousa. This was apparently done as an attempt to placate her in-laws but again shows how often women were considered for leadership roles.

Irene ensured that coins of the realm showed her and her son as co-rulers. I think she was trying to tell the people something.

Later Irene crushed a rebellion by the military governor in Sicily.

After her son Constantine reached the age of majority he found that Irene was still running the empire. There was a period of conflict between Irene and her son in which each asserted their claim to be sole ruler of the empire. This ended with Constantine victorious.

Discontent continued however and two years later Constantine took a drastic step in an attempt to restore stability. He restored his mother's titles and position. Irene and Constantine were again co-rulers. We might think that Irene would be grateful and would stop causing trouble. No. Irene continued to plot against her son. It took her five years of preparation but she was eventually able to launch a coup against her own son, the rightful ruler of the empire.

Constantine fled the capital but was eventually arrested and returned to the city. There he was blinded. Some have tried to claim she did not give the order, but it seems improbable that her followers would harm her own son in such a manner except on her orders.

And so Irene ruled the empire, for a time. After only five years Irene was herself overthrown by her finance minister and exiled to the island of Lesbos, where she was forced to support herself. She died only a year later.

And so ended the tumultuous life story, and brief rulership of Irene. She had attempted to seize power from her own son. After being invited to resume a role in government she had worked to overthrow her son and ultimately have him blinded.

The new emperor, Nikephoros, was not even a member of the imperial family. Irene's actions had ended a dynasty. Constantine V should have left her in the provinces where he found her. Goodnight Irene.

The cover image depicts a fresco in Venice likely to be depicting Irene of Athens.

How to train a woman like a dog

July 1, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

You can (and should) sub to An Ear for Men Youtube here.

The Culture of MGM is Changing

July 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Independent filmmaker Eliyahu Ungar-Sargon discusses the experiences that informed his film, Cut: Slicing Through the Myths of Circumcision.

See the film's website:

http://www.cutthefilm.com/

We Have to Talk About the Bear | An HBR Production

July 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Littlemore

July 3, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Imagine. It's the 15th or 16th century in merry old England. You're a monk looking for some action on a Saturday night. Where do you go? Littlemore Priory of course!

In 1445 the priory was investigated because the prioress, Alice Wakeley, regularly hosted drinking sessions. At least one local monk often dropped by to party as did students from Oxford university which was a few miles away.

Gettin' down was a habit in this priory.

Party in the cell!

The bishop sorted them out, at least he thought he did. Looking back now, chances are that not much changed.

Decades later in 1517 rumours were circulating again. I bet they were praying that the bishop (someone else by this time, no doubt) didn't find out.

The bishop did eventually find out and sent another investigator, Edmund Horde.

Horde was told to "examining each member of the house, going into the minutest details." I think that was already happening before he arrived.

His report was so damning that the bishop later visited personally. Seeing is believing I suppose.

The prioress at this time, Katherine Wells, had a daughter with a chaplain from Kent, Richard Hewes. Hewes visited Littlemore two or three times a year to administer the sacraments. Its sounds like the prioress would often get some individual attention from Hewes, for her spiritual wellbeing you understand.

Instead of getting none he got a nun.

Completely forgetting the seventh commandment Prioress Wells was robbing the place blind in to order to fund her lifestyle, her relatives and the dowry of the daughter she shared with Hewes.

At least one other nun had a child. The place must have been alive with the laughter of children.

Mass too was a time of joy, full of parlour games, gossip and laughter.

Wells was a tough boss though. She had an inclination to put nuns in the stocks for the slightest infraction, including complaining how many nuns were ending up in the stocks.

Apparently a nun would occasionally be sprung from the stocks. On one such occasion the nuns (the one previously locked up and her rescuers) went on to break a window and abscond to a local village where they remained for several weeks.

Wells also wasn't beyond beating her subordinates. I suppose sometimes all the stocks were full.

Under Wells careful management the buildings were falling down, the nuns were wearing rags, the food was bad but most importantly the nuns couldn't get a decent beer. No wonder they went to the local village.

The nuns often shared beds. When questioned about this the nuns cited the aforementioned structural problems but considering all the other stuff going on at the priory I have to wonder. They might have been nuns but it sounds like they were getting plenty.

Enough was enough. The bishop instituted a strict one-nun-per-bed rule.

Wells was eventually summoned to face the bishopric court. Among other allegations she faced a charge of incontinence, which didn't have the same meaning it does today.

Wells was dismissed from her role as prioress but ordered to remain in place until a suitable replacement could be found. That showed her.

Wells wasn't even defrocked. Whatever. Hawes had done that to her years earlier anyway.

We don't know whether or not Wells was ever actually replaced as prioress before Littlemore itself was closed down in 1525. This information is lost to history. By 1525 the church needed money and one way to get it, and clean up a series of embarrassing scandals, was to dissolve priories like Littlemore. It was a win win really.

The priory had been around for a long time, centuries, and if you dropped by there was a good chance that the nuns would love you long time as well.

If you think the bishop's punishment for Wells was a bit lukewarm, well perhaps that's because he wasn't particularly surprised by what he found. Maybe Wells was just a bit indiscreet and that was why she was punished.

So in the 21st century when it seems like everything is sex sex sex, remember that people in the past were just as horny as people today, perhaps more so. They also liked to party.

For the pedants: the order of the commandments actually varies between Christian denominations. Thou shalt not steal is counted as the seventh commandment by Catholicism and so it is counted here, as Littlemore Piory was a Catholic establishment.

The featured image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and shows the only remaining building of the Littlemore Priory. More's the pity, it sounds like the place would have been great fun, except for the stocks and the beatings.

Another day in the MadTV life of the MHRM

July 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Those of us who work for the men's human rights movement are used to the hysterical, contrived, over-the-top attacks on us from both feminist hacks in the mainstream media and feminist cowards in academia.

In the face of all this, how do we carry on with such aplomb?

First of all, we recognize that as a result of those hit pieces, curious people worthy of us will investigate our website and discover for themselves that we are evidence-based and our opponents are genuinely unhinged.

Second, we think the attacks on us are hilarious, in part because they expose our enemies for what they are.

The following video, taken from the old television show "MadTV", illustrates our perspective fairly well. This is what it is like to live in a feminist world where everything is "triggering".

Please enjoy. We did.

Twelve foundational points of Counter-Feminist philosophy

July 6, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

1. The dictionary definition of feminism runs as follows: “The doctrine advocating social, political, and all other rights of women equal to those of men.” This definition is inadequate owing to the problematic nature of the term “equality,” which has no stable meaning outside the realm of mathematics. Consequently, the meaning can forever be refreshed, reframed or updated so that new demands for “equality” can always be put forward. There will never be enough “equality,” and feminism will never go out of business because it will always find new “inequality” in need of correction.

2. Feminism’s binding principle and driving force is disaffection toward men and maleness. This is arrayed on a spectrum, with mild disenchantment to the lower end, and vitriolic animosity, bordering on psychopathic, to the upper. If disaffection toward men, as men, did not exist in the world generally, then feminism itself would not exist. Feminism is not driven by vehemence about mere issues and abstract principles. Its politics are rooted in personal feelings about men. Feminism’s political, you might say, is personal. And so personal emotion is the only thing that keeps feminism in motion.

3. Feminism divides broadly into two cultural cohorts: Academic feminism (more intellectual), and pop feminism (less intellectual). These make opposing ends of a polarity, with a continuum stretching between them. Feminism as a whole needs both the academic and the pop cohorts. The academic cohort is needful so that feminism will have an intellectual vanguard — so that the snake will have a head, in other words. The pop cohort is needful so that the vanguard ideology will be demographically incarnated in numbers — so that the snake will have a body, in other words. Sophisticated ideas originate from the academic cohort, and trickle down to the pop cohort by the process of popularization.

4. At any point on the academic-pop continuum, you will find feminists from any point on the disaffection spectrum. Simply observe that the identical range of viciousness shows up at every intellectual level. Along with viciousness comes irrationality or intellectual dishonesty. All of this is transparent among the undisciplined pop feminists, but concealed under layers of erudite doubletalk among the academics.

5. Feminism at large should be understood as a social organism. The bottom line, is a division of functions which generates the illusion that “feminism is not monolithic.” That cliché is either true or false, depending on how you apply the term “monolithic.” It is true that feminism has many brands, flavors, schools of thought, “aspects,” and so on. In that regard, it is anything but monolithic. But when you consider that these different manifestations combine toward a common purpose as the parts of an organism or mechanism would do, then feminism emerges as One Thing — hence “monolithic.”

Accordingly, so far as we are concerned, feminism is indeed monolithic.

6. Several counter-feminist (or reality-based) definitions of feminism have been proposed, all of which point in the same general direction. One of these runs as follows: "Feminism is the project to increase the power of women." When you consider this alongside the dictionary definition (which describes feminism as a quest for "equality") and when you consider that "equality" is a mirage shimmering always out of reach, it is easy to see that chasing so-called "equality" ad infinitum, will only increase the power of women ad infinitum. But to increase the power of women, you must increase it in relation to something, and that "something" can only be men. So by its inherent logic, the feminist project can only be the project to put women in a state of power supremacy over men. In sum, therefore, feminism is female supremacism.

7. Feminism's most effective safeguard against discovery is to ridicule the very idea that it (feminism) is female supremacist, and to mock whoever might advance such an idea. Such words as "paranoid" or "misogynistic" will typically be employed to this end.

8. The project to increase women's power does not positively require disaffection toward men. But without it, the project would face a practical limit — to wit, the constraint that mutuality and unselfish regard for the other might impose. Yet sweep all that aside and you can pave the road of depredation as far as your lack of scruples will carry you. Indeed, that is where disaffection toward men comes in handy, and where the project to increase female power hits no glass ceiling of any kind.

9. Advocacy for women's interests, in whatever form, will naturally increase female advantage and thereby increase female power. Yet the advocates involved in such work needn't feel any conscious hostility toward men. They need only carry on industriously, disavow anti-male sentiments, and draw attention away from high-disaffection feminists by such distracting statements as "not all feminists are like that," or "I'm not that kind of feminist," or "those people are only fringe extremists." At times, they will deny that such feminists are even feminists at all. Still, the latter will continue to exist, and to do what they do, while their milder sisters look the other way.

10.The proclivity of feminism is to grow in the direction of greater female empowerment. In so doing, it initiates changes in the surrounding world. These changes create endless new obstacles to the female empowerment project, and force endless modifications to feminist policy in order to overcome said obstacles. At times, these modifications will involve changing the rules of the game altogether. There is no help for this, for if feminism operated from a fixed and finite set of rules, this would leave degrees of freedom that would permit male autonomy to operate. And this, in turn, would set an absolute upper limit on female empowerment. Code-switching, from one code of rules to another, is therefore an inherent feature of feminism as a social organism.

11. Feminist code-switching operates through space as well as through time, since at any given moment an indefinite number of distinct feminist rule systems, planet-wide, are found to be operating. This is quite understandable, given that women differ greatly as to taste, inclination, personality, station in life, and so on. Hence, their exact empowerment needs will differ, and each must employ a suitable code of rules.

12. Feminism's being is identical with its being-in-motion. Feminism, as a social organism, must either grow perpetually or die. "Perpetual Revolution" is the name we have given to this condition.

One for the boys

July 8, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

You might have minor quibbles with the delivery, but it still needs to be said.

Why Still a Feminist: A Question for Christina Hoff-Sommers

July 9, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Christina Hoff-Sommers, has an answer to a question she gets a lot. We think it's a fair answer, but we have another question we hope she will one day answer:

We think Dr. Sommers would be well-served to acknowledge that figures on poverty often erase men; men are the majority of the homeless population by far, and they frequently die as a result of it, often by their own hand. And even in the third world, it's good to look at where women are treated badly but it's important to look at where men are treated badly because the horror stories there are huge and deserve attention too; in most of these supposedly "male dominated" societies men are frequently beaten to death, tortured, enslaved–and yes, women play a role in that. As long-time admirers who have even learned from you, we would like you to address that some time if you can.
It's fair enough for there to be a women's movement, but given the horrors men frequently face that are as bad as what you describe, is there also not a need for a strong men's movement that looks after the interest in men and boys as well?

Sometime in the future

July 9, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Not a feminist, not a sexist

July 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

July 10, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

Setting The Record Straight: Gynocentrism, Biology, Culture And The Gender Empathy Gap

July 11, 2024 | by Peter Ryan | Link | Original Link

This article is dedicated to Gender Empathy Gap Day on July the 11th. To all men and boys, you do matter and more than you know!

What is gynocentrism? In the simplest sense it is the preferential concern for the well-being of women and girls and their elevation in social status on the basis of their sex. It is the gender empathy gap. It is the discrimination of men and boys and in favour of women and girls. It is female supremacy and female superiority. In a word it is bigotry. We live in a culture that normalises gynocentrism so well, that people can run targeted campaigns solely promoting the concern for the female homeless and completely ignoring the majority of homeless that are male. People will even seriously argue the primary victims of war are in fact women and ignore the millions of male dead.

There are many other countless examples like this illustrating the gender empathy gap. The myopic concern over the lack of women and girls in STEM and the complete silence and inaction on men and boys falling behind at every level of education from kindergarten to postgraduate study is one example. The comparative lack of funding for men's health in relation to women's health, despite men living considerably shorter lifespans, dying of most major diseases earlier and in higher numbers and men's far higher rates of suicide is another example. To add insult to injury, there are the female only quotas in employment and education and a complete lack of any effort to increase male representation in professions you would think gender diversity would be of highest relevance like psychology, education and medicine.

Perhaps the most glaringly obvious example is the willingness of society to force men off to be cannon fodder in war, whilst sparing women this male privilege. Possibly with that last example there will be some change in the US[1] where it concerns selective service. Even then it will be men no doubt who will actually be the ones deployed in combat zones in harm's way if a major war breaks out, just as it is men that are overwhelmingly expected and in fact demanded by society to do all of the dangerous, dirty and unglamorous work in society. Work which frequently leads to chronic injury and sometimes death.

We live in a gynocentric culture and women enjoy a monopoly where it concerns receiving empathy from society for their issues as a group and as individuals. Our culture routinely segregates men and boys from women and girls where it concerns matters to do with who gets support and who does not and who gets preferential treatment with quotas and who has to excel purely on merit and be shamed for doing so. The truth of the matter is that we do live in a society of gender segregation with women elevated above men. The dominant gender ideology of our age, naturally reflects the bigotry of our age. Feminism did not create this bigotry, feminism emerged from it and is a reflection of a longstanding prejudice we have.

We are told this society is a patriarchy and yet the wider culture and every institution at every level condemns the very behaviour and systems of discrimination that feminism claims our society normalises. Like with so many things, feminist ideology has become projection and an inversion of reality. Has it always been this way? No it has not always been this way. I would not go as far as to say our past societies were purely patriarchal as feminists have described them, however I also would not go as far as to say past society has been purely gynocentric either. Like with many aspects of society, for most of recorded history there has always been a mixture of elements in our culture that discriminate sometimes in favour of men and sometimes in favour of women. As Dr. Warren Farrell has written about in his book, The Myth Of Male Power[2], many of these double standards come from gender roles that themselves have arisen from societies relentless need to survive.

Whilst both sexes have faced unfair treatment on the basis of their sex, there has been a consistent pattern in our culture over the last 150 years to correct discrimination facing women. There has been relatively little current or historical effort to correct discrimination facing men. Why the difference? The gender empathy gap is the reason. Once technological change reduced the daily pressures on communities to survive and permitted desirable social change, the empathy we have for women drove female emancipation. In contrast we have not seen the same social change where it concerns the life of men and this is because our culture has lacked and still lacks the degree of empathy it has for women where it concerns men and the issues men face.

Men are still bound by the same traditional gender expectations that they have always been expected to adhere to. To protect and provide for others, often at their own expense and even sacrifice their lives in the process of doing so. Men are expected to not be the recipient of support and compassion from society and instead be the provider of such support. We have HeForShe campaigns but no SheForHe campaigns. We have White Ribbon campaigns and calls for men to stand up for women facing domestic violence, but no comparative movement for male victims of domestic violence, despite substantive rates of female perpetrated intimate partner violence against men.

Many point to biology as the origin of the gender empathy gap, making relatively simplistic arguments that the empathy gap has to do with women giving birth and the dependence on the community for enough women to survive so society can replace itself (the golden uterus dogma). The problem with this alluring but overly simplistic idea is that like the gender wage gap narrative, this explanation reduces a complex multivariate problem of sustaining a community or society into a model that has little resemblance to actual reality.

The golden uterus explanation for the gender empathy gap, reduces relatively complex requirements for a population to sustain itself down to primarily or exclusively one variable, simple reproduction. It does not give any proper or proportionate consideration for the numerous other factors that determine if a population will survive or perish, like maintaining the food supply and basic shelter. Many of these other factors related to survival, men play a more important or equally important role in. The golden uterus dogma does not consider the impact of losing the men and consequently the manpower available to provide the necessary food and resources a population needs to continue to subsist. Whilst a society may die out if enough women are lost, the same is true if enough men are lost and there are not enough men around to support the survival of the community. This narrow view of focusing solely on uteri and reproduction, also does not consider the impact of manpower allowing a society to thrive instead of merely subsist and in doing so making a society adaptable enough to withstand frequent environmental challenges and not die out.

Population size means little if everyone is starving and breeding without regard to basic survival constraints. This is why arranged marriage has been so common in so many cultures over the centuries, including in prehistoric times and why sexual relations between the sexes have often been heavily regulated by the community and by parents. More babies mean the community needs to support more children that cannot fend for themselves. Societies have been more concerned with regulating reproduction rather than focusing purely on maximising reproduction and how many uteri were available. Some cultures even still engage in female infanticide or leave female infants to the elements when they cannot be supported. Such practices of course are indefensible on moral grounds, but their existence and similar practices like them, fly in the face of this notion possessing a uterus makes someone more valuable as a human being and this therefore explains the gender empathy gap. The reality on the ground is more complicated than that.

Whilst I would not agree with the simplistic assertion women being the rate limiting factor of reproduction makes them more valuable and thus explains the gender empathy gap, biology is certainly involved to at least some degree in causing gynocentrism and the gender empathy gap. Sex differences arising from differences in life history strategy, mean that there is in my view a greater tendency for women to develop physical and psychological characteristics that elicit support or empathy from the community and a greater tendency for men to develop characteristics that promote a more individualistic, self-sufficient approach to survival and maximising reproductive success.

When a man can father hundreds of offspring, it can pay to take greater risks to maximise reproductive success and exhibit a high degree of personal agency and self-sufficiency and rely less on the community for support. In contrast when you can mother only a few dozen offspring at the most and spend considerable periods of time in a vulnerable physical state whilst pregnant and caring for infants, it can pay to take less risks and be able to garner the attention and empathy of the wider community for support.

The biological underpinnings of the gender empathy gap, is not about who is the more valuable sex. Such an explanation ironically reflects the same gynocentric bias it attempts to objectively explain without prejudice and then predictably fails in doing so. The biology behind the gender empathy gap, is about differences in how each sex maximises their chances of propagating their own genetic line and how these differences can work to the advantage and disadvantage of each sex depending on the scenario. At the extreme dysfunctional end of these differences, we get a gynocentric culture that promotes male hyperagency and shuns concern for men and encourages female hypoagency and treats women like children.

The greater degree of female neoteny stimulating a greater degree of societal concern for women, is one such example of a sex difference that can drive the gender empathy gap. Female neoteny is in fact not the product of women being more valuable because they possess a vagina. Evolutionary biology is a bit more complicated than repeating reductive gynocentric pseudoscience to justify the status quo, just as racists and eugenicists of the past did with debunked racial science ideas like Drapetomania[3], a theory that slaves desiring their freedom were suffering from mental illness!

Whilst there is undoubtedly a biological reality to the gender empathy gap. It is also a reality in our species, that sex differences in neoteny are not as pronounced as they are in many other animals and primates. It is also a fact that women and girls can and do spend a great deal of time exaggerating their neotenous appearance. These two observations can be replicated in relation to many of the major emotional, sexual and social triggers driving gynocentrism.

Peter Wright and Paul Elam have discussed the role of superstimuli and superresponses to those superstimuli at length in their works Chasing The Dragon[4] and Slaying The Dragon[5]. We live in an environment saturated with superstimuli that exaggerate female vulnerability, just as we live in an environment that amplifies the prevalence of salt and sugar in our diet and these superstimuli lead to an exaggerated superresponse to those stimuli. We cannot consider biology in isolation to the environment, particularly where it concerns the role of superstimuli underpinning the gender empathy gap and the role of modern communications and social media in amplifying their impact far beyond any evolved tendency to view women as the more vulnerable sex in need of support. We have in the West an environment full of feminist narratives of female victimhood and vulnerability and male perpetration and power which act as a form of gynocentric social superstimuli, that collectively with exaggerated female neoteny, put any evolved biological predisposition for gynocentrism on hyper drive. This then leads to male hyperagency and female hypoagency and a resulting gender empathy gap.

So whilst biology is involved, it is helpful to illustrate precisely how. When you roll a ball up a hill it has potential energy. If you push the ball down the hill it has a tendency to move in that direction and release that potential energy. Our biological predispositions toward various behaviours are similar in that regard only far more complex. Imagine the weather conditions that need to manifest themselves in a precise way to generate a tornado. The atmosphere on its own cannot generate a tornado unless it is in a particular state from local environmental conditions. Gynocentrism is similar in this regard and arises from a very complex interplay of biology and environment. When we are saying behaviour is biological, we are essentially stating the obvious. All behaviour involves a biological being and biological processes, but that is distinctively different from stating that a certain behaviour is an absolute like breathing and invariantly expressed regardless of the environment. Gynocentrism and the gender empathy gap are not absolute biological invariants, they are biological potentials which are expressed to different degrees depending on environmental conditions. In the West this biological potential is expressed to an exaggerated degree thanks to gynocentric superstimuli.

The frequent retort to this is the following question, “Can you find me a culture that is not gynocentric?”. Then you cite examples and then they cite back examples of gynocentrism in said culture. Of course if you look hard enough you can find examples of all sorts of behaviour in a given culture, that does not mean gynocentrism is mainstream in that culture, or acceptable to its social norms. It is also a fact that certain customs or laws may appear to be driven by gynocentrism in a given culture from a Western vantage point, when in fact there may be other reasons behind them that have little or nothing to do with gynocentrism. What is interesting though is the same people that ask these questions will not ask the question, “Can you point to a culture that is entirely gynocentric?”. Even our Western culture as gynocentric as it may appear, is not entirely gynocentric. That is to say, that our culture like many cultures is a complex mixture of different forces acting together, frequently in opposition all at the same time.

It would be false to suggest gynocentrism does not exist at all and it would be false to say gynocentrism is reflected throughout all cultures of the world at every level and in every context. In other words, it would be incorrect to say that either the existence or nonexistence of gynocentrism is an absolute and a biological invariant. Gynocentrism exists, but it does indeed vary across environments and even within cultures. Even how gynocentrism manifests in the West from one country to the next can be different. Gynocentrism is not a biologically invariant behaviour like breathing.

Gynocentrism is a complex set of behaviours that are learned from our culture and reinforced through our institutions, our media and our laws. Biology is just the substrate these forces act upon. The influence of our culture and our institutions on our biological predispositions in how we perceive and act on vulnerability when it comes to biological sex cannot be understated. Behavioural conditioning has ample empirical evidence supporting its existence in animals and humans. The results from classical conditioning and operant conditioning from numerous studies have been replicated thousands of times. It would be easy to believe that in every brain there is a basic program governing every aspect of human cognition and behaviour from breathing to which political ideology a person supports, but the reality is far more complicated.

How complicated? Watch Prof. Robert Sapolsky’s lecture series on behavioural biology and the limits of reductionism when explaining biological systems, particularly his first introductory lecture[6] and lecture on chaos theory[7]. To put it simply we really cannot reduce behaviour down to a single aspect of biology or culture or a genetic lock and key mechanism. Behind every behaviour there are hundreds, if not thousands of processes both biological and cultural working together to produce the complex behaviours we see. Like the weather the interactions are so complex and chaotic they are difficult to predict with pinpoint accuracy.

The reality is that social learning and conditioning, just like biology, does play a significant role in how we develop as people and how we collectively behave. Our legal system and the billions of dollars spent on marketing is based on this premise. Our own militaries and intelligence agencies and those of our adversary's, understand the importance of psychological warfare and controlling the narrative through propaganda. Organised religion relies upon social learning and behavioural reinforcement of approved customs and social norms. There is no biological program hardwired into people's brains to not eat meat on Good Friday, that is learned behaviour.

To suggest almost one thousand years of gynocentric cultural conditioning from one generation to the next and centuries of institutional enshrinement of gynocentric double standards has not had any impact on how we as biological beings behave, flies in the face of ample historical and scientific evidence. Evidence to show tradition, narratives of our history and conditioning associated with those traditions and narratives, shapes perception and shapes behaviour. Where do you think the concept of "man up" and being a "real man" comes from? That is basic social programming and operant conditioning at work to beat men over the head with when men start asking questions about gynocentric double standards.

Men and society at large have been under the assault of gynocentric social programming for centuries. The gender empathy gap exists because we have centuries of narratives and conditioning playing on biological potentials to view women as the more vulnerable party and men as powerful agents. It is analogous to playing keys in a certain sequence on a piano to produce a gynocentric melody that everyone becomes entrained into thinking as normal. It is a melody of social programming where men are portrayed as strong and as demonic in need of redemption from their toxic masculinity and women are portrayed as vulnerable and angelic in need of saving and adulation for their feminine divinity. This is called moral typecasting and there is evidence[8] to show that men are morally typecast as the less vulnerable sex and the sex least deserving of support and so we predictably demonstrate a lower expression of empathy toward them. Moral typecasting is learned and it impacts how we perceive the world and behave.

None of this is insurmountable though. Narratives change, evolve and are replaced over time with better narratives as the culture matures and evolves to higher and higher levels of moral development and sophistication. There was a time when sacrificing female virgins to appease the gods to ensure a good future harvest was considered acceptable and the right thing to do. We do not do that anymore, we evolved beyond practices we now consider to be barbaric or discriminatory but were once considered acceptable in the past.

Racism has a biological element to it as well. Humans have a biological predisposition to be tribal and form groups based on shared genetic heritage. Just as with gynocentrism, there are countless examples of racism throughout history and arguably over a far longer period of time. Just as with gynocentrism there have been narratives justifying discrimination, the segregation of races and even their extermination. Gynocentrism is nothing special. Racists of the past used the same pseudoscientific use of biology to justify their bigotry of racial superiority, just as some people currently do attempting to justify and rationalise gynocentrism as some immutable biological law that our species is unable to rise above. If we accepted such pseudoscientific nonsense on the matter of race, then we would not be living in the society we do today in the West. The reality is that despite our tribalistic nature, we have been able to rise above any biological predisposition we have and make progress against racism. The same can be true for gynocentrism which is the modern bigotry of our time.

The appeals to nature to explain and justify gynocentrism, doing nothing to address it and attacking those that do, are really just excuses people are using to avoid asking tough questions about human nature and about themselves. That is why there is so much vitriol when you dare question the idea gynocentrism is some immutable law of human behaviour. Human beings are herd animals and that too is biological. Despite the prevalence of herd mentality, groupthink and the desire for people to conform and despite numerous historical examples of the atrocities that have unfolded as a result and the research[9] demonstrating their power, these important aspects of human behaviour barely have been mentioned in relation to explaining gynocentrism. People are to an extent sheep and that permits people to blindly go along with all sorts of ideas, even when they are completely wrong and people know they are wrong. The biological desire to conform and not to be different from the group is strong. I would argue it is the desire to conform to gynocentric double standards that are socially enforced, that is the single most powerful driver of gynocentrism. It is the same force behind the groupthink we saw unfold in the pandemic and the herd mentality that resulted in the extermination of millions of Jews.

Once the desire to conform is removed or exhausted, men go their own way. The desire to conform has limits and every major social change or revolution that has occurred throughout history has always begun with a few outliers reaching the end of their patience and rebelling before it gradually becomes an unstoppable force and attracts millions of followers. As conditions become more and more unbearable, people one by one start to reach a tipping point where they will no longer conform and no longer obey. Even the desire to conform could not stop the social change of the civil rights movement and even in Nazi Germany there were multiple acts of resistance, including within the Germany Army itself. Eventually sooner or later, people get sick of conforming and desire change. That too is biological and human nature. People’s desire to conform only goes so far with their own biological interests before it becomes advantageous to rebel.

That is truly what our gynocentric society is afraid of. The gender empathy gap exists in large part because men acquiesce and go along with it. What can we do to change this? From my perspective it starts with men themselves. If men do not express any concern for their own well-being, then how can men expect the rest of the population to share that concern? If men continue to sign up to a marriage contract and are fully aware of the bias in divorce and family court, there is no reason to complain when they join the line of men subjected to the injustice of divorce and family court. Men teach society how to treat them through their own actions or lack of inaction to protect their wellbeing and interests. It is very simple stop acquiescing. From my experience men are far too willing to worry about pleasing other people where it concerns gynocentrism and especially worry far too much about female approval and their disapproval. Women are no more the gatekeepers of relationships than men are. It is all a matter of boundaries and enforcing those boundaries. Ask yourself these questions, if you are a man and worried about such things:

Why would you worry about the approval of someone that regards your well-being either as a secondary concern or of little to no concern at all?

What value is there really in a social connection where the other person sees you as existing to please them and values you solely for what you can do for them without reciprocity, if you can even call it a social connection at all let alone a relationship?

Men are raised from birth to view women as the fairer sex and the more peaceful and caring sex. This has profound impacts on how men view themselves in relation to women. However when those decades of social programming start to unravel from direct exposure to the wrongs and injustices of our modern gynocentric culture, men in increasing numbers are starting to question the narratives they have been told.

Part of addressing the gender empathy gap is to teach men that they are worthy of respect because they are men and that respect for their well-being is something that they must protect irrespective of what our dysfunctional gynocentric culture is trying to tell them. Men are remarkable creatures when you consider what men can do. A single man can literally change the world and leave a legacy lasting thousands of years. All of the men we would regard as great, often did things that went against the orthodoxy of their time. Jesus Christ and Martin Luther King etc. You cannot stand up to the culture when you do not believe in yourself and so that is the very first step men must take. It is one thing for me to write this and it is another for men to truly believe it about themselves deep in their bones.

Men have been lied to. Men have been told by this gynocentric culture they are disposable and are human doings. The truth is this gynocentric culture cannot exist without men believing those lies. In order for a human male to do anything and to be of use to anyone, they must regard themselves as a human being first and view themselves as worthy of basic care and look after themselves. How much male potential is squandered by men failing to take care of themselves and measuring themselves solely by what they do first whilst neglecting their wellbeing? How much does society lose by failing to take care of male wellbeing? A great deal.

If men want to address gynocentrism and resolve the gender empathy gap, then they have to value themselves enough to want to change how they are treated. Until men demand change, nothing will change, it is that simple. Forging a new narrative about men, women, power and vulnerability is also a key to how men demand this change. We need to play a new melody of cultural narratives on our biological piano that better resembles the world we want to live in and fully utilises our biological potential in a more positive and constructive way. Whenever it is brought up that we should have a tally on how many women have died from domestic violence over the year, men should be demanding the same be done for male victims and perhaps demands from men for a male suicide and homeless tally would not go astray either.

Men need to stop caring about what women think. If women have any value to men at all, then it is in loving them and supporting them as fellow human beings, as loved ones and as partners (and I would say the same advice for women). The same applies to men and how they regard their fellow man. What sort of man shames another man for protecting his well-being and his rights as a man? What sort of man abandons moral principles once a woman is involved? What sort of man shames another man that does not want to live in a subservient, second class and frequently demonised position in relation to women because he is male? No man at all. Masculinity in its basic form is self-respect and standing up for yourself and what you believe in and your values. The original code for chivalry before it was corrupted by our gynocentric culture was a military code of honour between men. It was a code that enshrined respect between men. This code needs to be revived and chivalry needs to be taken back by men and restored free of gynocentric corruption, perhaps with some modern modifications.

A gynocentric culture cannot tolerate a population of men that stand up for themselves and know their own worth in relation to women. This is why such much effort is put in and continues to be put into trying to “educate” men to respect women as some elevated aristocracy and every effort is made to demonise men and silence any attempt to instil self-respect in men. Self-respecting men are not violent unless they are defending themselves and do not disrespect women or men unless they act in a disrespectful manner.

Men have the moral high ground when they realise that self-respect is not oppression and that the true oppressors are the very people teaching them they are toxic, disposable, deserving of hate and inferior simply because they are male. Addressing the gender empathy gap starts with men taking that very first step of living life with self-respect and enforcing their personal boundaries. The next step is spreading a superior narrative that reflects the true reality of power and vulnerability when it comes to men and women in the modern world and calling out attempts to silence that narrative for the hate and oppression that it truly is. In the end lies cannot compete with the truth.

Gynocentric culture reduces fertility rates. When you elevate catering to female narcissism above the good of society and marginalising men, your society begins to die out. Whatever biological forces prevail, only societies that possess cultures that harness their genetics in ways that further their own existence will survive. Men must rise up for themselves, but also for the future of their communities. Masculinity and civilisation go hand in glove.

References:

[1] https://abcnews.go.com/Politics/legislation-require-women-men-sign-potential-draft/story?id=79013594

[2] https://www.amazon.com.au/Myth-Male-Power-Warren-Farrell-ebook/dp/B076HVLZGH

[3] https://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Drapetomania

[4] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=VygKQV-hEpY&t=1s

[5] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=n5WLNMX4COA&t=0s

[6] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=NNnIGh9g6fA&t=1030s

[7] https://www.youtube.com/watch?v=_njf8jwEGRo

[8]https://www.sciencedirect.com/science/article/abs/pii/S0749597820303630#:~:text=The%20moral%20typecasting%20hypothesis%20contends,schema%20is%20a%20prototype%20observers

[9] https://www.verywellmind.com/the-asch-conformity-experiments-2794996

The Goal Post Episode 40 – States of Incompetence

July 15, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

1. Surgical castration in Louisiana, with reference to the subject of chemical castration.
2. Koori Courts – a special court for indigenous Australians. We speak on the problem of ethnic courts such as this.
3. Vernon speaks about inappropriate tweets about and texts to a 12 year old male backup dancer in 2019 by Takemura Kiriko (best known as Kyary Pamyu Pamyu) and the fact that the general response to it was a small fraction of what it would have been if the sexes were reversed.
4. JK Rowling doesn't appear to see the problem in itself of UK law defining rape as commited by men only.
5. Trump assassination attempt on the 13th, and questions about SS performance.
6. Additional clarifications and nuance on misunderstood differences between West and East regarding taboos.
7. Zoe McLellan

Why It Sucks to Be a Male Hyena

July 16, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Something a little bit different.

Spare a thought for male hyenas. They are smaller than the females and stuck in a rigid hierarchy. This is where the feminists claim it’s just like human society but the other way around. They need to get out more.

Deconstructing Game, and PUA Frauds

July 17, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Improper Rogering

July 18, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

I think it is safe to say that for 99.999999…% of men, their sex lives do not come anywhere close to their sexual fantasies. In all of human history, one of the few exceptions might be the late Roger Vadim.

Vadim was a French filmmaker whose career peaked during the jet set/beautiful people/swinging 60s era. Born in 1928, he started working in the film industry at age 19 and worked his way up to writer/producer/director. Few of his films found an audience in the United States, but he had a global reputation, not so much for his films but for his private life, namely his marriages and/or long-term relationships with movie stars.

In 1986 Vadim published Bardot/Deneuve/Fonda: My Life with the Three Most Beautiful Women in the World. The title speaks for itself. I suspect a few film scholars and historians bought this book, but the bulk of the readership was likely composed of celebrity gossip hounds. Vadim was likened to Svengali and Pygmalion. Ingenues were his specialty.

Vadim was not a first-time author but this book had more commercial potential than his previous efforts. He noted, “My attitude is that if this book makes me a little money it will be a tiny compensation for all the money I helped those actresses make.” Whatever Vadim’s motivation, his book is more than a self-aggrandizing autobiography by the king of quim. His experiences offer life lessons to men of lesser renown in relationships with women who would never be mistaken for movie stars.

To start with, based on what he wrote and from what I could read between the lines, Vadim was almost the perfect chick magnet. Pictures in the book show a fit-looking fellow with a rugged but not craggy face. He was of French/Russian (Plemiannikov was his family name) heritage, which made him exotic, even though he was born in Paris. His work in the film industry enhanced his status while bringing him into contact with hordes of good-looking young women. And for good measure, he had such “sexy” hobbies as skiing and sports car racing. I could easily see him as the subject in one of those “What sort of man reads Playboy?” profiles that Hugh Hefner used to drop into his magazine. I wouldn’t be at all surprised if he visited the Playboy Mansion when he was in Hollywood. If so, he might have been familiar enough with the host to address him as Hef.

In his book, Vadim doesn’t reveal any recognizable political philosophy. I’m just speculating, but since Vadim’s parents had fled Russia to escape the Bolshevik revolution, he probably was no fan of communism, even though he hobnobbed with French intellectuals and artists who almost always leaned that way. Having grown up in France during the Nazi occupation, he was certainly no fan of fascism. But if communism and fascism were of no to interest him, there was one ism he followed: hedonism.

> At sixteen, I had established a rule for myself: In order to avoid cynicism, and worse, causticity and bitterness, I was going to take the best from life. Its > pleasures. The sea, nature, sports, Ferraris, friends and pals, art, nights of intoxication, the beauty of women, insolence and nose-thumbing at society.

YOLO Vadim met Brigitte Bardot in 1949 when she was 15. Hard to believe, given all those pictures of her with cascading blond tresses, but in those days she was a brunette with a much less voluminous coiffure. Given her age, marriage had to wait but they eventually made it legal in 1952.

Male moviegoers around the world salivated over Bardot's bare body in And God Created Woman in 1956. For the audience it was a fantasy; for Vadim it was reality. He was directing that bare body on the set and banging it at home. Call it work/life balance.

Hard to believe but at that point in their relationship Vadim admitted that sex with Bardot had become routine. Now you might say, hell, I'll take routine sex with Brigitte Bardot over the best sex I ever got from my old lady, but there is more. Bardot repeatedly asked Vadim, "You will always love me, won't you?" Vadim eventually figured out what she meant:

> I did not yet realize that women, obsessed with eternal love, are most susceptible to new relationships. "You will always love me?" really means: "Please don't allow me to fall in love with someone else." Most men consider these words proof that they are the one and only. In reality, it's exactly the opposite. Romantic women seek the absolute. They don't find it in any man. They talk about forever, but they run from present to present.

While comparing women to cats is a longstanding trope, it is notable that the phrase sex kitten was coined to describe Bardot. A kitten, of course, is an immature cat, and Bardot was an immature woman.

> It was probably Brigitte's profoundly childlike nature…which made our marriage difficult in the end. Like a child, she demanded too much from those she loved. If one failed to pay attention to her for one moment, she would be filled with anxiety.

Whether this immaturity was her true self or a result of receiving too much attention too soon is debatable, but the situation did not improve as Bardot got older.

> Brigitte didn't grow up. On the contrary – the more attention success brought her, the more personal devotion she demanded. It wasn't that, like certain domineering women, she wanted to control everything and make all the decisions; it was a much more subtle form of tyranny, an unquenchable thirst for love.

Vadim's mother put it best: "Brigitte, like all children, doesn't know what it is to feel remorse." For the record, Bardot tried to commit suicide three times during her relationship with Vadim.

At any rate, Vadim moved on. Bardot is a tough act to follow, but he consoled himself by impregnating Annette Stroyberg, a Danish model/actress in 1957 and marrying her the following year. Vadim was able to secure some roles for Stroyberg in movies but ultimately she fizzled out, as did their marriage. Her relative obscurity is reflected by the omission of her name from the title of the book.

In his early 30s Vadim became acquainted with Catherine Deneuve. Like Bardot, Deneuve was young (17) and a virgin when she met Vadim. Also like Bardot, she was a bottle blond. These days when you meet a girl with purple hair, at least you know it is not natural. Blond hair is another matter, since it occurs in nature but is not always natural. Yet it has always been in demand. As a Clairol hair coloring ad once said, "If I've only one life…let me live it as a blonde!" But verisimilitude is a must for aspiring blondes. Clairol also had an ad campaign with the tag line "Does she or doesn't she? Only her hairdresser knows for sure."

Also like Bardot, Deneuve was a looker but with a big difference. Bardot was popularly portrayed as an insouciant, pouty young thing with bee-stung lips (no Botox in those days). She gave the impression she would take on all comers (pun intended); I wouldn't classify her as a slut, but slut-adjacent might not be inaccurate. Deneuve, however, was a classic beauty, much like the embodiment of some Apollonian ideal; in short, a classy dame. You could have your way with Bardot in a hayloft; for Deneuve, you would have to rent a suite in the most expensive hotel in town. Curiously, her image was even more effective when it was tarnished, as in Roman Polanski's Repulsion (1965), wherein she portrays a woman undergoing a mental breakdown, and Luis Bunuel's Belle Du Jour (1967), in which she plays a respectable Paris housewife with more kinks than her bourgeois lifestyle might indicate.

While Vadim was with Deneuve from 1961 to 1964 and sired a child by her, he never got around to marrying her. As for the breakup, she opined, "You know, you can leave someone by doing everything to make them leave you."

After his relationship with Deneuve went south, Vadim observed "Women know many things without needing to learn them." Economy is not one of them, apparently, as Deneuve owned roughly 200 pairs of shoes when she was with Vadim.

Next in line was Jane Fonda, and you might wonder what in the world Vadim would want with her, given her longstanding reputation as a social justice amazon. But she did not start out that way. In fact, if you ever get a chance to see any of her "starter" films from the early 60s (Tall Story, Walk on the Wild Side, Sunday in New York), you might conclude she was a babe. In fact, some journalists had characterized her as "the American Brigitte Bardot." Lurking in the background, however, were daddy issues with papa Henry. This seems to be a common problem with the offspring of movie stars. It probably didn't help that her mother committed suicide.

Vadim met Fonda in 1964 when he directed her in La Ronde/Circle of Love in France. She was a bit more mature (age 26) than Vadim's previous women. They were married in 1965 and remained so through 1973. Vadim also directed her in The Game Is Over (1966) and Spirits of the Dead (1968). Their best known collaboration remains Barbarella (1968), a sexy science fiction film based on a French comic strip, and probably Vadim's best known film in America.

Unfortunately for Vadim, Fonda gained more respect for her work with other directors. She received a Best Actress Oscar nomination for They Shoot Horses, Don't They? (Sydney Pollack, 1969) and a Best Actress Oscar for Klute (Alan J. Pakula, 1971). Perhaps even more important, she got interested in geopolitics. In 1972 she made her infamous trip to Hanoi, highly controversial at the time, and still unforgivable in the eyes of surviving Vietnam veterans. Vadim didn't see it coming when he first met her:

> At the time I didn't realize that Jane already showed certain symptoms of a progressive form of American puritanism. She had a deep need to justify her right to exist by influencing or deciding what was best for others for their own good.

So in today's parlance, Jane was a Karen. It probably didn't help that Vadim's career was going in the opposite direction. When Fonda won her Oscar in 1971, Vadim was churning out T&A fluff like Pretty Maids All in a Row. He had become superfluous in her life, aside from the fact he was the father of her daughter. So it was splitsville for the Vadims.

Undaunted, Vadim continued to tie the knot. After Fonda divorced him, he was married to heiress/actress Catherine Schneider from 1975 through 1977, lived with TV writer/producer Ann Biderman from 1980-1987, and married French movie star Marie-Christine Barrault in 1990. That made a clean sweep: All of the women in his life were in show biz. No shop girls or secretaries for him.

So let's review: five marriages, two shack jobs, four children. In his book Vadim relates how his children were shuttled around from place to place, accompanied by nannies, spending the Christmas holidays with mama here, a summer with daddy and stepmother there…in Malibu, the French Riviera, a ski resort in the Alps. Through it all, Vadim never voices any sort of second thoughts about having sired this chaos.

Vadim had a busy career and plenty of outside interests, so I don't think he would have been sitting around twiddling his thumbs if he remained a bachelor, but monk mode and hedonism are incompatible. As the brief intervals between his relationships indicate, he was one of those guys who just had to have a woman in his life. Or was he simply a star-struck simp? Or did he feel he was, in the time-honored phrase "God's gift to women"?

As Vadim noted in his book a sense of entitlement was common to his women. When he entered their lives he was useful to them; when they didn't need him anymore, they left:

> For them [Bardot and Deneuve] success had come without much effort, and when they were very young. They seemed to have forgotten that luck was a factor and thought the world owed them everything. Since they had always succeeded easily in everything, they deduced that they were always right.

Of course, much the same was true of Jane Fonda, although her sense of entitlement was something of a birthright as her father was a member of Hollywood royalty.

Vadim is an unusual case, as he was in a position to initiate and prosecute relationships with starlets and stars. He must have known that serial polygamy among actresses dates back to the dawn of the movie industry. Though almost all movie stars came from humble origins, achieving riches and fame allowed them to flout conventional morals. Given their lucrative contracts, a husband's financial support was not necessary. While a number of stars were partial to male directors who could enhance their careers, in their private lives they didn't need no man! Even when they met men who could make them tingle, it never lasted. The movie star could continue to search for "the love of her life" while other women had to be content with daydreams. So movie actresses went from man to man the way a dowdy housewife goes from romance novel to romance novel.

Unlike today, divorce was rare in the general public while it was rampant in the movie industry. The "till death do us part" crowd had their favorite movie stars but felt morally superior to them. It was a curious mixture of envy and resentment. Hence, any sort of Hollywood scandal met with intense public scrutiny.

Today, however, the female "star syndrome" has grown apace. Thanks to social media, every woman with an account can have fans. A mediocre women can have body counts comparable to movie queens. The feminist and DEI movements have inspired the promotion of women, often laughably unqualified, to high places. So even the girl next door is now endowed with a sense of entitlement her mother and grandmother never had. That is why reading about the travails of Roger Vadim is useful to the average man today. The female behavior he describes is no longer restricted to the upper echelons of the fair sex.

As much pride as Vadim must have felt for his Bardot-Deneuve-Fonda trifecta (otherwise, why write the book?), it must be noted that he died at age 72 in 2000. His three movie queens are still among the living: Bardot is 89, Deneuve is 80, and Fonda is 86.

Vadim was indeed a player. He scored early and often but in the long run he was not a winner. As for the cause of his downfall, it is tempting to say "Cherchez la femme," or "Look for a Woman." Actually, his downfall was caused by looking for a woman…over and over and over.

This behavior might have been understandable when he was a horny young buck, but if one is incapable of learning from one's mistakes, life will not go well. 'Tis the way of the world. Or, if you prefer, c'est la vie!

Feminist “Allies”

July 19, 2024 | by Phil in Utah | Link | Original Link

When most Westerners hear the word “Allies”, they tend to think of relations between the United States and the United Kingdom, during World War II and the Cold War. Though we had declared war on them almost two centuries earlier to gain independence from them, we provided them with plenty of resources and several heavy cruisers, even before we declared war on the Axis powers. Of course, we had some strong disagreements, mainly on the issue of whether India should have been independent, but we shared intelligence, and often carried out joint operations.

That is why I find it profoundly disgraceful that on so many feminist websites, they list websites hosted by gay or bisexual men as “allies.” Feminists pander to gay men for the exact same reason that Rudy Giuliani pandered to firefighters: because their presence in photo-ops made him look good. A feminist brings in a sassy, snappy-dressed, non-threatening twink of a guy with an oh-so-cute speech impediment to sit next to her in round table discussions, where he’ll no doubt agree with her about how scummy Republicans are and how fugly Michelle Bachman’s getup is. He’ll also be allowed to fetch coffee for her and her gal pals, but that’s pretty much the limit of what he’s allowed to do.

As has been explained before, feminists are perfectly content to have men as allies, up until those men start thinking for themselves. When a man starts acting like a “dudebro”, as they call it, he’s being an obnoxious, sexist douchebag. As that article demonstrates, feminists don’t make any secret of their contempt for men who are self-thinkers or who want their own rights. Naturally, you’d think that they’d like gay guys for a change, since they act so feminine and don’t want anything to do with mainstream masculinity, right?

Wrong. Most gay men are virtually indistinguishable from their heterosexual counterparts. They drink beer, watch football, and work blue-collar jobs. The only substantial difference is that they prefer to have sex with men instead of women.

Perhaps that last one is the worst of all. Here, you have a bunch of men who not only enjoy acting in a way that feels right to them, they don’t go around seeking women’s approval. What does that mean? It means that they don’t care if a woman takes offense at what they’re saying, and they decide for themselves what makes a man a good man. What’ll they do next, find fulfillment in making money for themselves instead of forking it over to some ungrateful harpy who blows it on wine and jewelry and gives nothing in return? How dare they!

Now, I’m not going to pretend that I don’t have an agenda here. As I’ve said before, I’m openly bisexual. Feminists probably find this even more frustrating than dealing with a gay man, because I could potentially end up pleasing a woman sexually, but I have alternatives. So, what do they do when confronted with a man like me? Well, they do take some of the traditional approach; I’ve been called a “faggot” by no fewer than five feminists, all of whom stated on their blogs that they are SOOOO MAAAAD that gay marriage isn't legal in all fifty states. But, since I'm not totally gay, they just try to deny my existence. They insist that I'm a gay-in-denial, and that the moment a man ever experiences any sexual desire for or activity with another man, it automatically erases any and all interest in women. No, it doesn't.

When it comes to matters of sex, feminists will readily embrace antiquated, patriarchal notions about gay and bisexual men (i.e. that we're pedophiles, we're overly promiscuous, and our sexuality is predatory to the extreme). This, coupled with their refusal to denounce misandrists within their own movement, only goes to show just how much bigotry makes up the foundation of feminism. In the end, it's quite simple to figure out how they feel: if you have a penis between your legs, you are the enemy. End of story.

And THAT, my friends, is why we embrace men of all backgrounds here in the MRM.

On Dr. Phil: Cassie Jaye and Warren Farrell debate feminists

July 20, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The man’s quandary

July 21, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

It’s a story of a boyfriend who loves his girlfriend immensely, but one incident in his friend’s life makes him insecure, and he takes a drastic step that is against his ethics and moral.

Traveling Cinema Shorts is produced and curated by Traveling Cinema Productions.

Gynocentric etiquette for men (part 1)

July 22, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following excerpts on the subject of male etiquette are from Etiquette for Gentlemen, Or Short Rules and Reflections for Conduct in Society, published in 1847. While the forms of etiquette may have changed, the underlying principle of service to women remains the order of the day. –PW

"If you see a lady whom you do not know, unattended, and wanting the assistance of a man, offer your services to her immediately. Do it with great courtesy, taking off your hat and begging the honour of assisting her.

"You should never ask a lady at the table to help you to anything, but always apply to the servants. Your first duty at the table is to attend to the wants of the lady who sits next to you; the second, to attend to your own. In performing the first, you should take care that the lady has all that she wishes, yet without appearing to direct your attention too much to her plate, for nothing is more ill-bred than to watch a person eating. If the lady be something of a gourmande, and in over-zealous pursuit of the aroma of the wing of a pigeon, should raise an unmanageable portion to her mouth, you should cease all conversation with her, and look steadfastly into the opposite part of the room.

"If you are walking with a woman in the country, — ascending a mountain or strolling by the bank of a river, — and your companion, being fatigued, should choose to sit upon the ground, on no account allow yourself to do the same, but remain rigorously standing. To do otherwise would be flagrantly indecorous and she would probably resent it as the greatest insult.

"If you speak for a short time to a woman of condition in the open air, intending to leave her immediately, you should remain uncovered unless she desires you twice to put on your hat. If you are walking with women, or standing with them for any length of time, in the air, keep your hat on.

"It is deemed a requisition of good breeding for a gentleman, when paying a visit, or when present at a small party, to stand up when ever the lady of the house rose to pass from one part of the room to another. When the lady rises near you, especially if she has been previously conversing with you, you should by all means rise.

SOURCE: Etiquette for Gentlemen, Or Short Rules and Reflections for Conduct in Society

* * *

The next sample of expected male etiquette is from 'The Gentlemen's Book of Etiquette and Manual of Politeness Being a Complete Guide for a Gentleman's Conduct in all his Relations Towards Society' published in 1873. – PW

"In the familiar intercourse of society, a well-bred man will be known by the delicacy and deference with which he behaves towards females. That man would deservedly be looked upon as very deficient in proper respect and feeling, who should take any physical advantage of one of the weaker sex, or offer any personal slight towards her. Woman looks, and properly looks, for protection to man. It is the province of the husband to shield the wife from injury; of the father to protect the daughter; the brother has the same duty to perform towards the sister; and, in general, every man should, in this sense, be the champion and the lover of every woman.

Not only should he be ready to protect, but desirous to please, and willing to sacrifice much of his own personal ease and comfort, if, by doing so, he can increase those of any female in whose company he may find himself. Putting these principles into practice, a well-bred man, in his own house, will be kind and respectful in his behaviour to every female of the family. He will not use towards them harsh language, even if called upon to express dissatisfaction with their conduct. In conversation, he will abstain from every allusion which would put modesty to the blush. He will, as much as in his power, lighten their labors by cheerful and voluntary assistance. He will yield to them every little advantage which may occur in the regular routine of domestic life:—the most comfortable seat, if there be a difference; the warmest position by the winter's fireside; the nicest slice from the family joint, and so on.

"In a public assembly of any kind, a well-bred man will pay regard to the feelings and wishes of the females by whom he is surrounded. He will not secure the best seat for himself, and leave the women folk to take care of themselves. He will not be seated at all, if the meeting be crowded, and a single female appear unaccommodated.

"A true gentleman never stops to consider what may be the position of any woman whom it is in his power to aid in the street. He will assist an Irish washerwoman with her large basket or bundle over a crossing, or carry over the little charges of a distressed negro nurse, with the same gentle courtesy which he would extend toward the lady who was stepping from her private carriage. The true spirit of chivalry makes the courtesy due to the sex, not to the position of the individual. When you are escorting a lady in the street, politeness does not absolutely require you to carry her bundle or parasol, but if you are gallant you will do so. You must regulate your walk by hers, and not force her to keep up with your ordinary pace. Watch that you do not lead her into any bad places, and assist her carefully over each crossing, or wet place on the pavement. If you are walking in the country, and pass any streamlet, offer your hand to assist your companion in crossing.

"If walking with a female relative or friend, a well-bred man will take the outer side of the pavement, not only because the wall-side is the most honorable side of a public walk, but also because it is generally the farthest point from danger in the street. If walking alone, he will be ready to offer assistance to any female whom he may see exposed to real peril from any source. Courtesy and manly courage will both incite him to this line of conduct. In general, this is a point of honor which almost all men are proud to achieve. It has frequently happened that even where the savage passions of men have been excited, and when mobs have been in actual conflict, women have been gallantly escorted through the sanguinary crowd unharmed, and their presence has even been a protection to their protectors. This is as it should be; and such incidents have shown in a striking manner, not only the excellency of good breeding, but have also brought it out when and where it was least to be expected.

"Civility is particularly due to all women; and, remember, that no provocation whatsoever can justify any man in not being civil to every woman; and the greatest man would justly be reckoned a brute if he were not civil to the meanest woman. It is due to their sex, and is the only protection they have against the superior strength of ours; nay, even a little is allowable with women: and a man may, without weakness, tell a women she is either handsomer or wiser than she is.

SOURCE: The Gentlemen's Book of Etiquette and Manual of Politeness Being a Complete Guide for a Gentleman's Conduct in all his Relations Towards Society

Divorce under Communism

July 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Our own Lucian Vâlsan, a connoisseur of Communism, has started a series in which he brings real-life stories from the days of Communism into English. In his third episode, he brings a story of a young male university student who married a narcissistic woman and became the victim of paternity fraud. The story focuses on how the regime handled his paternity dispute and his divorce proceedings.

Fair warning: Some of those said in the story may sadly sound very familiar to the realities in some present-day nations.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

Must-see, in-depth discussion on circumcision – Cassie Jaye and J. Steven Svoboda

July 24, 2024 | by Gary Costanza | Link | Original Link

J. Steven Svoboda of Attorneys for the Rights of the Child (ARC) and NCFM is interviewed for Cassie Jaye's groundbreaking film "The Red Pill." Below is the full interview released by Jaye as part of her Red Pill/Raw Files series (#RPRF).

It doesn't get any better than this: enlightened Red-Pill filmmaker interviews longtime MRA and intactivist attorney J Steven Svoboda, discussing every aspect of circumcision and the movement to end it.

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

July 24, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

A Global Fertility Crisis – Dr. Shanna Swan

July 26, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

On Circumcision: Hidden Harm

July 28, 2024 | by Frank Lin | Link | Original Link

Circumcision can be a very personal topic, and while it stirs some powerful emotions, it's important to discuss. It can be difficult for a circumcised man to come to terms with the horror that he's the victim of something utterly beyond his control, and it can be easier to for him to say that he's not a victim at all, and search to justify why genital cutting of infant males is a reasonable practice in the 21st century. What I would ask is to think forward, and to consider the well-being of future generations of infant boys being brought into the world, and their futures lives as adult men.

Male circumcision bestows no hygienic benefits that can't already be attained by the use of soap and water. And parents should not be in the business of making aesthetic considerations of an infant's penis.

But what bothers me the most is the psychological barbarity of the practice. Days after an infant boy is born, while his mind is just beginning to make sense of the world he's been brought into, and his role in it, here at the crucial early stages of his life where his deepest sub-conscious drives are being organized, he is being told in no uncertain terms that his body is someone else's property, and his lot in life is suffering, and he had better get used to it. No one cares if you cry, young one, you have a job to do, and that job is to absorb pain.

While I speculate on the mental mechanics in play, research "by Dan Bollinger and Robert S. Van Howe, M.D., M.S., FAAP, found that circumcised men are 60% more likely to suffer from alexithymia, the inability to process emotions." From the link:

> People suffering from alexithymia have difficulty identifying and expressing their emotions. This translates into not being able to empathize with others. Sufferers of severe alexithymia are so removed from their feelings that they view themselves as being robots. If acquired at an early age, such as from infant circumcision, it might limit access to language and impede the socialization process that begins early in life. Moderate to high alexithymia can interfere with personal relationships and hinder psychotherapy. Impulsive behavior is a key symptom of alexithymia, and impulsivity is a precursor to violence.

So when people say circumcision isn't so bad because it happens at such a young age that the baby forgets the painful memories, I feel a deep sense of horror. At least with a traumatic memory, therapy, meditation, and introspection help you learn how that memory affects your perceptions of the world and your patterns of behavior in it. And being conscious of those perceptions and behaviors you can make choices about mitigating their most harmful effects. But if the memory is stored as a deep physical sensation at the bottom of your sub-conscious mind, locked away at the sub-basement machine code level of human awareness, reachable (if at all) only through the most soul-piercingly powerful and doggedly pursued meditation practices, it may remain forever unexamined.

I for one think it’s terribly cruel to inflict that kind of harm on a person, the kind of harm that changes your perceptions of the world without you ever being able to do anything about it. And if you still think that forgotten memories excuse barbarity, then you can justify any crime against a child, as long as he or she is young enough to forget how evil you are.

So you see, its not just about how the victim’s mind is conditioned, but also about the parents’ minds as well. And yours. We should not be nurturing callousness towards pain. The great chicken-and-egg question with men’s issues deals with men not speaking out, and society not listening. I believe one place where we can begin to slow down this cycle is by banning the practice of circumcision, so maybe, just maybe, there might be fewer men who never question the sources of their pain, and more people who are willing to listen when they do.

Those of us in the men’s rights world sometimes give short shrift to the term “micro-aggression,” but in the case of circumcision, I think it applies. We are, after all, talking about a small cut that inflicts permanent physical and psychological damage, effects perceptions, and alters behaviors. Perhaps the next next time our philosophical opponents lecture us about the evils of manspreading, we should thank them for their interest in our crotches, and direct them towards the more substantive issue of male genital cutting.

For further insight on the topic, here’s a pediatrician moved by integrity activists:

And here is the brilliant Karen Straughan giving the topic her two cents:

Karen Straughan at New Hampshire Libertarian Forum 2014

July 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Aussie men under attack!

July 30, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Translating feminist-speak into Christian terminology

July 31, 2024 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

Feminism is increasingly infiltrating Christianity to the quiet dismay of a lot of believers I know in my personal life. My Christian friends accept that I am more a student of religious faith than a practitioner of any religion. I should also note that, although I am too skeptical to take the "leap of faith" necessary to be a Christian, I have no animosity to religion itself, but I do oppose certain religious practices for cause – involuntary circumcision, for example.

I should also note that A Voice for Men is a secular site, and my discussion of Christianity is not intended to promote nor detract from that faith. I'll leave the translation of feminism into other faiths to those who are better versed in those faiths than me.

The feminist infiltration of Christianity has gone on for a long time. My former intellectual sparring buddy, Lutheran pastor, and late Catholic priest Richard John Neuhaus put it this way in 1990:

> Elizabeth Achtemeier, professor of Bible at Union Theological Seminary, Virginia, has flatly asserted that radical feminist theology is "another religion." Some may think that judgment excessive. After all, there are many women who think of themselves as feminists and are also determined to be orthodox Christians. Here the distinction between feminist and radical feminist comes into play. Women (and men) who say they are feminists often mean to say no more than that they think women should be treated more fairly than they have been treated in the past. They want the views, influences, and experiences of women to be taken more fully into account. They want women to have a greater opportunity to participate in all activities where gender differences are not pertinent. No sensible person can argue against feminism so defined. But such feminism has little or nothing to do with feminist theology today.
>
> There is a world of difference between feminism as fairness and feminism as ideology. Feminist theology, almost by definition, reflects the second kind of feminism. Unfortunately, ideological feminism frequently succeeds in infiltrating feminism as fairness. One reason for that is that women who feel frustrated in their quest for fairness are susceptible to the suggestion that unfairness is "systemic," is built into the very structure of Christianity. That suggestion, indeed that dogma, is the keystone of feminist theology. Feminist theology may be expressed in "moderate" or "radical" forms, but the enterprise itself is inherently radical.

Nothing has changed in the 25 years since Father Neuhaus wrote that: newb "choice" feminists still deny that they are the cannon fodder for the man-hating radfems even though radical feminism would be more disreputable than the Ku Klux Klan without them.

Still in doubt? Imagine how radical feminism would be received without naïve, hot young celebrities like Beyonce and Emma "#HeForShe" Watson in their corner.

For the thesis that feminism is a religion to succeed as a metaphor, one must draw a number of parallels between feminism and religion so that one can become a working model for the other. A successful metaphor between two classes (in this case, feminists and believers) allows us to generalize strategies for dealing with the classes: a factor that helps/hurts one should help/hurt the other, if the metaphor has power. There is no correct nor incorrect metaphor – a metaphor is either useful, or not.

For example, consider the idea that "things expand when they are heated." This is true of most materials; metals, glass, most gasses, and so on, but it fails for ice (which melts into a smaller volume of water) and room temperature rubber (which contracts under heat, behavior that is the basis for "shrink wrap").

So, with the warning that metaphors can be imperfect, lets translate feminist jargon into Christianity.

"Problematic" –

To feminists, "problematic" means "sin" or "sinful": it is a transgression against women in the same fashion as "sin" is a transgression against God (or the laws of God). This leads us naturally to the next translation:

"Women as a class" –

To feminists, "women as a class" are God – perfect, pure, all-powerful beings whose judgement is not to be questioned. Someone who doubts a woman's word has its own special term:

"Misogynist" –

This term translates as "atheist," or "skeptic." Such a person is inherently untrustworthy and is frozen out of all discussions of faith regardless of the objective, verifiable truth of what he says.

"Radical feminist" or "radfem" –

This term translates as "fundamentalist" – usually a long term, erudite believer who is more concerned with protecting the faith from apostasy than expanding the faith by soft-peddling the harsher requirements of dogma. Tends to be overly concerned with dogma, according to others. The more extreme the radical feminist/fundamentalist, the smaller the admitted class of true believers, which can often shrink down to just one person, the radfem/fundamentalist herself/himself.

"Moderate" feminist –

This is an evangelical who is more concerned with expanding the faith than with a strict adherence to dogma. Radfems and moderates, like fundamentalists and evangelicals, are often confused in the minds and media of the outside world and have the same internal conflicts that the outside world tends to overlook and/or misunderstand. For example, radfems reject an individual woman's "empowerment" in the same way that a fundamentalist might eschew “good works” as a key to salvation.

“Educate yourself” –

This is the same as “Read the bible” – a dismissive phrase used to redirect a questioner/seeker away from open verbal inquiry into a contentious issue of faith.

“Choice” feminist –

This translates as “convert” – a new believer in feminism who embodies the liberating aspects of the faith without grasping or internalizing the changes in behavior demanded by holy scripture.

“Patriarchy” (“Men as a class”) –

This translates as “evil,” Devils,” or “Hell on Earth”. This is the doctrine that the Earth is fallen from grace and in control of Satan.

“Male Privilege” –

This is the feminist version of “original sin”: all men (men only) are tainted with male privilege:

> One of the hardest parts of coming to grips with the depth and breadth of the patriarchy is recognizing that there are no exceptions. Maybe you didn’t, personally, do anything wrong, but you were still born into a power structure that gave you unjust rewards. The system — whether it’s the patriarchy or white supremacy or capitalism — does not offer special exemptions for individuals with good intentions. And that should make you mad: The fact is that even though you know better, and are truly a male feminist, you’re still stuck being the bad guy. You can’t opt out of the privileges you inherited at birth. Or, as my (male) feminist friend once put it, “I’m not one of the good ones and neither are you and neither is anyone, FYI.”

“Smash the Patriarchy” –

The feminist version of “go and sin no more.” In other words, feel bad, do nothing, and enjoy nothing of this world.

“Intersectionality” –

This is a weird amalgam of missionary work to foreign lands/inner cities and “the nobility of the savage” – the idea that those who have yet to hear the gospel are less guilty of sin because they don’t know any better Feminists believe that certain classes of people are less sinful (“God’s chosen people”) and more credible than they are (until proven otherwise).

“White feminism” –

These are the High Church Episcopalians of feminism – upper class, and absorbed in upper class problems. Enough said.

“Slut walks” –

These are the feminist version of camp meetings of evangelicals – raw, emotion-laden appeals for converts.

“Inclusivity” –

This is like ecumenical efforts designed to bring various sects together for common cause. Such efforts are short-lived and usually dissolve into partisan warfare.

“The male gaze” –

This is the pervasive evil that permeates society and leads to sin. Feminists try to subvert the male gaze by dressing outlandishly to attract the male gaze, and then assailing as horrible those men who gaze at them in horror.

“Microaggression” –

A small affront (venial sin) to the faith. For example, saying “happy holidays” is a microaggression against people who say “Merry Christmas” and saying “Merry Christmas” is a microaggression against atheists and Jews. For a feminist, a man saying “Good morning” to a woman is a microaggression because he did not ask her permission before speaking – indeed, even asking permission, holding open a door, or looking at a woman with the “male gaze” is a microaggression.

“Sexual harasser” –

A man who asks for permission or consent to court (date) a woman.

“Male entitlement” –

The idea that men are allowed to ask for consent to date a woman.

“Sexually empowered woman” –

A woman who asks a man on a date. The idea of asking a man for permission or consent is completely alien to feminism – women are entitled to do whatever they want regardless of consent or the marital status of either the man or woman.

“Homosexual”

A man who refuses a woman’s request for sexual intercourse. A woman who refuses a man’s request for sexual intercourse is “a victim of verbal domestic violence.”

“Internalized misogyny” –

A disorder of a non-virgin woman; the state of a woman, both mentally and physically, who agrees to sexual intercourse with any man, including her husband. In general it is used for any woman who likes, loves, defends, or appreciates men – for example, a faithful, loving wife and mother is said to suffer from “internalized misogyny.”

“Listen and believe” and “Believe the victim” –

This is the “leap of faith” – the willingness to accept faith in God absent objective proof of God. For feminists, any claim of rape, abuse or harassment made by a woman, no matter how outlandish or objectively false, must be believed without question, sort of like accepting as literally true a story about a talking snake without ears or vocal chords.

“The sisterhood” –

This is the feminist version of the magisterium (teaching authority).

“Male feminists” –

Monks, especially the self-flagellating sort. Male feminist leaders are rarer than female priests and even more strongly discouraged.

“Gender studies” (also, “women’s studies”).

This is an amalgam of catechism classes, Sunday school, worship, and even volunteer work. The closest parallel in Christianity is called “church.”

“Abortion clinic” –

This is similar to a baptismal, except that during the processes performed there, the child’s soul is sent to heaven with no delay, avoiding the pitfalls of being corrupted by further physical contact with women.

“Mansplaining” –

This is a term feminists use when they are familiar with the content of a sermon and annoyed that a man is reiterating it instead of fawning over them.

After 27 or so examples, I think I’ve established enough parallels to show that we can treat feminism as a religion. I invite others to submit their own example in the comments, and indeed,

Have a Blessed Day.

The featured image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Sweden, where man-beating is sport!

August 1, 2024 | by RK Hendrick | Link | Original Link

Welcome to the modern nation of Sweden, where brutally beating an unarmed man without justification or cause (by a female police officer) is permissible and socially acceptable.

In my lifetime, I have been a prosecutor, a defense attorney and a Pro Tem (part-time) Municipal Judge. I have read tens of thousands of police reports, viewed hundreds of police videos, completed many "ride alongs" with on duty police officers, participated in countless criminal trials and hearings, conducted thousands of interviews with police officers, been through hundreds of hours of courtroom police officer testimony, and trained & advised police officers on Search and Seizure. To be candid, I tend to have a very favorable view of police officers, as I know and appreciate how difficult their jobs can be.

Unfortunately, there are exceptions to this perspective.

Take a moment to review (more than once) the YouTube video that accompanies this article. I reviewed this video well over a half-dozen times. Each time I see it, I get completely appalled and outraged! To be candid, the police officer's conduct in this matter is disgusting, inhumane and amoral!

The video was taken in central Stockholm on Brunnsgatan (Brunns street) on or about the evening of July 11, 2013.

Upon review of the video of this brutal attack, you will note the following:

- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically threatening behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically abusive behavior towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen engage in physically lewd or profane gestures towards the female police officer.
- At No Time did this male citizen yell at this female police officer.
- At All Times, this male citizen used open, respectful and compliant body language towards the female police officer. His arms were down at his side and the palms of his hands open.
- At All Times, this male citizen maintained an appropriate physical decorum and respectful distance from the female police. (Police officer safety).
- At All Times, the physical safety of the female police officer was NOT at issue and there was NO immediate and/or imminent physical harm being directed at her by the male citizen.
- At No Time did this male citizen provoke an attack by this female police officer.
- At No Time while being brutally attacked by the female police officer, did this male citizen engage in any type of physical alteration, combative behavior, retaliatory behavior or assaultive behavior towards the female police officer.

Regardless of what verbal exchange may have occurred off camera prior to this brutal attack or during the actual video, there is absolutely NO justification or basis for the officer's conduct and use of physical force.

This vicious unprovoked attack is completely without cause and/or reason. Under NO (zero) circumstances can the conduct of this police officer be morally justified and/or condoned. Any well-trained, well-adjusted police officer knows that when there is NO physical threat (to you or anyone else) you do NOT have the right to beat a citizen (bloody) to the ground with the aid of a baton and a German Shepherd attack dog! Bottom line: This is blatant misandric bigotry and the use malicious physical abuse on the part of the police officer.

If a male police officer engaged in this type of brutal unprovoked behavior and assaulted an unarmed female citizen in this manner, there would be an international outrage. This officer should be prosecuted to the fullest extent of the law and go to prison with all of the other criminals. There is absolutely no rationale or excuse for this vicious inhumane conduct!

RK Hendrick, Esq.

Creator / Co Admin. of the Facebook Group: "Friend of Protection For Men" … The largest and most active Men's / Fathers' / Boys' Rights & Issues Discussion Group on Facebook with an international membership of some very influential and brilliant people. https://www.facebook.com/groups/protectionformen/

Author of: How To Avoid Getting Screwed When Getting Laid…Available on Amazon.com

Whatever Happened To The Inter-Gender Wrestling Champion Of The World?

August 2, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

While the news media dutifully calls our attention to anniversaries of great historical import, they occasionally are asleep at the switch. Consider the 40th anniversary of the passing (I think) of Andy Kaufman, the self-proclaimed Inter-Gender Wrestling Champion of the World. This anniversary occurred on May 16th, and I must admit I overlooked it myself.

To those of tender years who are not familiar with Andy Kaufman, he is a difficult fellow to explain, to put it mildly. For lack of a better word, he was a comedian. Yet he asserted, “I never told a joke in my life.”

Kaufman’s sense of humor was to humor what theater of the absurd was to theater. He never thought of himself as a comedian but as a performer or an entertainer. Some observers classified him as a performance artist, but without the pretentious baggage that job description often comes with. Looking back on Kaufman’s career today, it appears he was ahead of his time. I wouldn’t go so far as to say he invented the concept of Clown World, but he certainly pitched the tent for it.

You might look up some of Kaufman’s old television appearances on YouTube and find yourself laughing without knowing why. Attempts to describe his appeal generally fall flat. As the saying goes, you had to be there.

Probably the most normal gig he had was playing an immigrant mechanic on the Taxi sitcom. He also made numerous appearances on Saturday Night Live (15 starting with the show’s premiere in 1975), but when Producer Lorne Michaels held an on-air referendum on whether or not he should be invited back to the show, the naysayers won. It only went to prove that his humor, if you can call it that, was not for everyone. Exhibit A was his series of wrestling matches with women, which attracted a great deal of attention but probably cost him the female vote in the SNL election.

Professional wrestling is many things to many people. It might be considered a staple form of entertainment by the lower class, trash by the middle class, and possibly a guilty pleasure or slumming by the upper class…if they pay any attention to it at all. Andy Kaufman, a fan of pro wrestling while growing up, was weaned on the likes of Bruno Sammartino, Haystack Calhoun, Killer Kowalski, and "Nature Boy" Buddy Rogers, his favorite.

Professional wrestlers, whether heroes or villain, violate just about every standard of middle-class propriety. Obviously, that alone would be enough to make it attractive to adolescents in training. What impressed Kaufman, however, was that the wrestlers always remained in character. While actors typically play a part in one movie, TV show, or play, then move on to another role, professional wrestlers played the same role forever, in and out of the ring. They were nothing if not consistent, and Kaufman appreciated that:

> These guys are the real purists in show business. They have hair vs. hair grudge matches, spit on old ladies, taunt people outside on the street after the match.

A private detective hired to follow a wrestler might never once see him act out of character. Fans might suspect he would let his hair down somewhere, but it never happened in public. This brings up the concept of kayfabe. I defer to the internet definition:

> In professional wrestling, the term kayfabe refers to the practice of maintaining the illusion that everything is real – including the scripted personas, rivalries, and storylines. This often extends beyond the in-match performance to other contests, such as backstage footage and interviews.

While it is easy to dismiss professional wrestlers as fakes, the wall-to-wall consistency of their characters also brings up the nagging possibility that they might have become the characters they portray. This particular approach to "acting" was in synch with Kaufman's performances. The conventional comedian will occasionally step out of character in some sort of "But seriously, folks…" moment in support of his pet charity or some political candidate or natural disaster victims or world hunger. Kaufman never did that. As described by Bob Zmuda, his silent partner in comedy, “He would never break character – never, ever. Not in a million years.”

Kaufman, like the wrestlers he admired, was always onstage, which means he was never offstage, which in turn calls the whole concept of the stage into question. When Kaufman was ten years old, famed sociologist Erving Goffman published The Presentation of Self in Everyday Life which basically argues that everyone in every society is onstage, incessantly attempting to control the impressions of others. Of course, Shakespeare famously said that “All the world’s a stage.” If so, does the world have the equivalent of the theater’s fourth wall? If it does, can it be breached? Or is the concept of the fourth wall an illusion? Do theater and real life intermingle? Or are they merely two prongs of an artificial dichotomy?

All right, enough with the sophomoric musings…this ain’t no term paper. Let’s get back to pro wrestling.

In wrestling, as in movies and melodramas, the villain is often more compelling than the hero. And what could be more villainous than a man throttling a woman? Of course, there have been numerous female professional wrestlers over the years. Kaufman himself had a collection of 8mm films of female wrestlers. But the idea of pitting a man against a woman in a wrestling match has an element of absurdity to it. At least it did back when Kaufman was in the ring. Today, of course, it might be acceptable, even stunning and brave, for a trans woman to go to the mat against a biological woman. But none dare call it absurd. Not anymore. Clown World has rendered the concept of absurdity absurd.

The numbers of opponents Kaufman faced in the ring vary greatly. Bob Zmuda estimated 300. The first time was in April 1978 during a series of concerts in Tucson, Arizona. By 1979 it is a regular feature in his gigs. “Ladies and Gentlemen, I am here to wrestle tonight. This is not a comedy routine, this is not a skit. Okay? This is real! I am here to wrestle a woman!” His first match on TV was on the Saturday Night Live telecast of October 20, 1979.

Kaufman’s shtick was pretty much in keeping with conventional pro wrestling bluster: Say the most outrageous things that come to mind to rile the audience. Kaufman asserted that women belonged in the kitchen or that they were too stupid to defeat him in the ring. The men were not on his side, however, because he belittled them for having lost control of their women. The goal was to alienate as much of the audience as possible – to leave no fan untriggered. In one of his more inspired bits, he appeared to be defeated by an “offended” man, only to turn the tables on him after eating a can of spinach while the Popeye theme song played over the public address system.

At one match, Kaufman vowed he would shave his head if a woman defeated him and had a barber standing by just in case. The amount he offered potential challengers varied ($500 and $1,000 are the amounts usually mentioned), but he never lost a penny because Bob Zmuda was the referee. In case a challenger came a little too close to pinning Kaufman, Zmuda would take it slow with the three- count. Kaufman did lose one time – but with an asterisk. He was mudwrestling six girls at once at Chippendales, the famed night club featuring male strippers. It was strictly an exhibition and was not an "official" match.

Kaufman had as many as five matches in one night. He once sponsored a tournament of four husky females to see which one would face him in the ring. One of his bouts on Saturday Night Live was particularly controversial because his opponent was supposedly pregnant.

Bob Zmuda speculated that Kaufman's love of inter-gender wrestling was inspired by his shyness around women when he was young. He also estimated that he slept with around a third of his opponents. Say what you will, Kaufman's inter-gender wrestling matches were a novel way to get jiggy with the opposite sex in a hurry.

Adding to the zany atmosphere in the ring, Kaufman wore boxing trunks over thermal underwear. He was nowhere near as imposing as the bulked-up males who regularly appeared in wrestling matches. His nerdy appearance made it appear plausible that a woman could beat him, but Kaufman had more upper body strength than appeared at first glance. He astounded his 9th grade phys ed class by leading the group in chin-ups with 35. After watching his Midnight Special rendition of "It's a Small World" (highly recommended and readily available on YouTube), it occurs to me that one needs to be exceptionally well-coordinated to believably portray a spaz.

With typical wrestling showmanship, Kaufman basked in the hooting and hollering his behavior inspired in the crowd. He would ask for a volunteer (?) who would jump out of the audience, and the bout would begin. After a brief struggle, Kaufman would pin his opponent, then arise triumphantly, arms raised, and prance around the ring. Profuse abuse ensued.

I think it's safe to say this is another form of entertainment that would not be permitted today. The violence-against-women crowd would be all over it. Even the most dedicated wrestling promoter would wilt in the face of the demonstrations and bomb threats. And yet…

In more and more legit sports contests today we see biological men competing against women with the latter emerging with not just hurt feelings but hurt bodies. Kaufman's matches can be condemned as misogyny but no women were injured in his farcical matches.

Lest we forget, in Kaufman's day, no one was pushing quotas for women in physically demanding jobs with police and fire departments, or in the military or the secret service. When a woman got in the ring with Andy Kaufman, there was no such thing as grrrrrl power, no female empowerment, no Mary Sues, no DEI. Oh, there was perfect parity in every bout – one male versus one female – every time! Alas, there was no equity in the outcomes. Fixed or not, Kaufman's matches were closer to biological reality than the pipe dreams of today's egalitarian ideologues.

Speaking of reality, we should mention that Kaufman's inter-gender wrestling matches might have been inspired by a real fetish. About the time Kaufman was just starting to make a name for himself, I was doing free-lance writing for local publications. I remember going to the office of one such publication to receive a check for a recently-published article when I noticed a stack of tabloids sitting in a corner. I could see it was not the publication I had written for, so I went over for a closer look. The entire publication was nothing but pictures of nude black men wrestling nude white women. There was no penetration and there were no erections, so it wouldn't qualify as pornography. I don't know what you would call it, but it certainly wasn't the sort of periodical one would leave on a coffee table in the living room.

While the office manager was writing out a check to me, I asked him what the publication was. He said, "Oh, that's The Wrassler." Funny, I'd never seen it at the local newsstand. For all I know, this may have been just one riff on an inter-gender wrestling kink. Perhaps there were Asian/white, brown/black, black/Asian publications out there, along with niche markets involving midgets and amputees – consider the possibilities! This was almost half a century ago, but for all I know, these kinks may now be readily abundant online, maybe just a few clicks away. I can't help but wonder if Andy Kaufman had seen a copy of The Wrassler or some variation thereof before he embarked on his inter-gender wrestling career.

Unsurprisingly, Kaufman retired undefeated. His record against male professional wrestlers was not so good. Famously, after taunting the crowd with some redneck and white trash baiting at one of his favorite venues, the Mid-South Coliseum in Memphis, local hero Jerry Lawler cleaned his clock…or did he? Afterwards, Kaufman wore a neck brace for months but whether he needed it or not was debatable. The important thing was that fans ate it up. Whether they believed it or not was immaterial. Kaufman and Lawler got into an impromptu(?) re-match on the July 28, 1982 airing of The David Letterman Show. Was it real or fake? Who cares? It was a great moment in television history! Right up there with Lee Harvey Oswald getting gunned down by Jack Ruby! Say, was that real or fake or…well, let's not get into that.

While fake news has become a common concept today, fake entertainment has not been called on the carpet perhaps because suspension of belief is an integral part of entertainment. Even given the preface "Based on a true story" no one expects a faithful adherence to the facts. To paraphrase George Orwell in Animal Farm, "all forms of entertainment are fake but some forms of entertainment are more fake than others."

In a display of what feminists might call poetic justice, Kaufman, a non-smoker and health food fanatic, died of lung cancer at the age of 35 in 1984. His reputation as a faker was so good that even those closest to him figured it was all a practical joke. After all, he had often talked about faking his death. They guessed he would show up at his funeral and dispel the hoax.

He didn't.

Then people figured he had gone into hiding for a period of time known only to him…10, 20, maybe 30 years…before he would triumphantly return. He was into Hinduism, so it is not impossible that he would have joined some religious community in a remote corner of the world. If he is still walking the planet somewhere, he would be 75 years old today. In other words, he would have been “dead” longer than he had been alive. Of course, a lot of people born in 1949 are still fogging mirrors, so he might be one them but, alas, too old to make a wrestling comeback; at age 75, he might legitimately lose to a female challenger.

The ultimate question regarding Andy Kaufman was “Is this guy for real?” The answer remains elusive. I can state, however, that he was inducted into the WWE (World Wrestling Entertainment) Hall of Fame. And you can take that to the bank!

The question remains, however, as to whether or not his induction was posthumous. To be sure, he wasn’t there for the ceremony, but was he still drawing breath somewhere on planet earth? If so, that would be after four decades of seclusion. If you despair of Clown World today and find yourself mumbling, “Andy Kaufman, thou shouldst be alive at this hour,” take heart! He might be!

If you start young enough, you can fake being dead for ten, twenty, thirty, even forty years – maybe longer if you have good genes and take care of yourself. In the end, of course, the grim reaper will not be denied.

In the meantime, if Andy Kaufman isn’t dead, he can fake it till he makes it.

Overcoming Women’s Relational Aggression

August 3, 2024 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The Road: a must-see movie for men

August 4, 2024 | by B.R. Merrick | Link | Original Link

I used to pay a great deal of attention to the Oscars. I've been a serious movie buff ever since I saw Spielberg's "The Color Purple." Before you all get started, yes, I know all about this film. I won't go into details, or the reasons why I continue to watch it in spite of how it disdainfully showcases black men, except to point out that even though she's a feminist, the author of the book upon which it is based, Alice Walker, treated the character of Mr.____ far better than in the movie, and her masterful book, "The Third Life of Grange Copeland," centers around a far greater and more admirable male character. Feel free to hate the movie, but I have to admit, that's when the love affair with cinema started for me.

Since then, I've always wanted to take movies more seriously, and a very basic way to tell what's good and what's not is to note who gets nominated and who wins. Sometimes the Academy gets it right, and sometimes totally wrong. Then there are a few occasions when they mislead me into believing that I'm going to enjoy something I don't.

Such was the case with "No Country for Old Men," an intense cat-and-mouse thriller off of which I could not take my eyes, not only for the intensity, but for Javier Bardem's mesmerizing (and deserving) Oscar-winning performance. However, I wish, like Nine," that I could have found the strength to press the "eject" button. Instead, I was subjected to far more frightening and graphic violence than I can stand. Like a bagel I accidentally bit into when I was a teenager that was glazed with salt on the bottom, an act that has prevented me ever since from salting anything, this movie has turned me off to violence in a big way.

Therefore, when I saw a trailer for "The Road," starring the very manly Viggo Mortensen, and realized that it was based on a book by the same author as "No Country," in spite of the fact that I found the teaser intriguing, I thought, "No way." I've seriously had enough. Lucky for me, there's this dude who calls himself Angry Harry, who mentioned this guy named Paul Elam. Paul and a commenter named Jabberwocky calmed my squeamish self down, and assured me that violence was merely incidental in the film, and not the main bloody point.

What a fantastic film. On every level. Every man should see it. This includes politicians, who for the most part are nearly shells of men, as far as I'm concerned, and even alpha males, who probably won't get it, but you never know. However, before I can give you the reasons why every man should see it, I need to explain why, as an anarchist, I loved it so much, and how it enhanced what I have been thinking about lately, concerning the advance of feminism in our lifetime.

By itself, feminism could never have gotten anywhere, except on the back of a relentless machine set in motion and largely supported by alpha males: government. It is the nature of government, as I pointed out in "Coercion Is Death," to initiate coercion over everyone who inhabits a particular land mass (or masses, if you live on an archipelago, or if you intend to build and empire). By itself, feminism is basically powerless to force itself onto anyone other than another feminist.

Men like me don't do this. My general attitude, in spite of my Religious Right upbringing, when confronted with opposing beliefs, viewpoints, and behaviors face-to-face, has always been, "Hey, whatever floats your boat." Anarchy has only augmented that, and I have now joined in by floating my own boat. It has always been, and always will be, alpha males who set about sinking the boats. Their general attitude is opposite mine. It largely consists of, "Screw you. That's mine." I have never liked men like this. That is why I had such a hard time with Bardem's character in that horrific film. The kindly old gentleman who offered assistance on the side of the road did not deserve to get punctured in his brain. The alpha male takes and hurts. All I do in the presence of one is get taken from and hurt. In general, I don't care for gangster movies, either. Why would I want to indulge in watching alpha males take from others? As far as I'm concerned, they deserve their comeuppance.

There are certainly a few alpha females out there (okay, probably more than a few), but in general, when a woman says, "Screw you. That's mine," she is unable to take on her own, as an alpha male would, unless she has a gun, which is seldom. It reminds me of an interview with a nineties gay male porn star I read in a magazine a long time ago. He was a former bouncer at a gay bar, and he remarked that he had to be careful, because gay men would get "bitchy like women, but they're strong like men." An effeminate-acting gay man may seem like a weak female, but have you forgotten? He's 200 pounds with thick arms. That's the essential difference between alpha males and alpha females.

And alpha females know the difference. Men conceive of guns, design them, gather the resources to make them, hire workers to fashion them, hoard them, sell them, make improvements to them, study them, share information about them with like-minded alpha males, obsess about them, write songs about them, paint them, draw them, praise them, covet them, buy them, steal them, show them off, practice with them, bond with their sons using them, dream about them, mimic them with their dicks, etc. Alpha females know this. Alpha males know alpha females know this. The power struggle begins.

When power-hungry feminists see the opportunity, they pounce on the government created by these men, and the revenge fantasies begin. Alpha males with fewer guns, less money, and less smarts, along with the rest of us males, suffer, along with a great many women. Even if feminism went by the wayside tomorrow, this would still be the case. It is the smartest (and sometimes luckiest) alpha males who sit at the top. I had an alpha male dog as a teenager. (Cute story: As a puppy, he would hold his cloth leash in his mouth when I took him out for a walk. "Screw you. I'm taking you for a walk!") He could bark any other dog into submission, and he always did. My non-alpha male father remarked that in a pack of dogs, ours would either be dominant or he would be dead. This was one of the most correct things Dad ever said. This is how alpha males are. Feminists are aware. Like minarchists, those who believe in a small, constitutionally limited government, feminists see a system that isn't going to go away, so why not use it to their advantage?

This is what was going on when Betty Friedan wrote her seminal "The Feminine Mystique." America was a brand new empire, at least to the rest of the world. (The empire was building before the ink was dry on The Constitution, but we'll leave that for another rant.) By the late Fifties and early Sixties when Friedan was researching her book, women had enjoyed more than a decade of corporate, imperial luxury. The poorest of American housewives could expect what Stephen Sondheim wrote in "America" from "West Side Story," sung by Puerto Rican immigrants who came from nothing:

"I like to be in America!
O.K. by me in America!
Ev'rything free in America
For a small fee in America!

"…Automobile in America,
Chromium steel in America,
Wire-spoke wheel in America,
Very big deal in America!

"…I like the shores of America!
Comfort is yours in America!
Knobs on the doors in America,
Wall-to-wall floors in America!"

All this prosperity, so effortless and available even to the poorest among us, and now we're bored. I believe Friedan when she remarked at how surprised she was to have these women, who were virtually strangers, talk to her about their sexual fantasies. When you're bored, a sexual fantasy or two usually does the trick. The point of the empire was to ensure that the minions (that's you and me) are happy, the ruling elite have a comfortable, easily controlled populace, and the empire remains forever and ever. We'll leave aside the glaring fact that no empire on this earth has ever lasted, and it wasn't because modern technology wasn't available. Empires, based on initiatory coercion, are death-oriented, and must therefore eventually die. Feminism, the whore-wife of empire, is also death-oriented and won't last long when the emperor is finally dead.

When life comes this easily and quickly — when machines can now take care of the house, and since all women on this land mass have been subjected to numerous systems of coercion, one especially egregious one, government schooling, that spends countless hours drilling into you the idea that the empire of which you are a part is the best, with the best government, and the best way of life — why not grab at the reins of power and wield a little more of it on behalf of other bored housewives?

I have no doubt that the sometimes stifling manner of suburban culture was not sufficient for women, but then, I don't think it was sufficient for men, either. Small communities and big cities have always been a bit more spontaneous. People tend to gravitate to one or the other. Suburban life is good for a few things, and where it can grow organically, I would think it would have the appearance and attitude of small towns. But so much of modern community planning requires the input of a coercive body of people in order to ever come about (zoning, building permits, property taxes to keep out the n*ggers, et cetera, ad nauseam). Beyond the overarching system of coercion known as government, there are the softly coercive traditional roles for men and women, once crucial to our very survival, many no longer necessary, but tradition speaks louder (and more coercively) than individuality. In spite of modernity, we are still quite tribal. So we have bored housewives, malcontents like Friedan, government-planned suburbia, and a system of coercion in which these women have all been indoctrinated to place their trust. This is what's otherwise known as a powder keg. It also would have been impossible without the efforts of the alpha males to coerce, coerce, and coerce some more. "Give that to me. I have a date with an alpha female, and she wants some."

What does this have to do with the haunting, dark, and exquisitely beautiful movie, "The Road"? Well, the movie takes as its premise a great conflagration of the earth, accompanied by massive earthquakes, which wipe out swaths of humanity, virtually all animal life, and kill all crops. What's an alpha male to do?

They congregate amongst themselves, riding about the wasteland formerly known as America, shooting at will, taking, and generally causing distress to anyone unfortunate enough to come into their path. We are talking about a rapidly diminishing food supply, since the only things left to eat are canned goods and other humans. (There is a particularly disturbing scene in the middle, where a hapless mother and child are running from some of these alpha cannibals.)

What about the rest of us? How would we fare? As someone who believes that the state is not the answer, I found my own beliefs challenged, making the film darker than it already was. Ultimately, however, I found the direction of my present thinking enhanced, and in a way, cemented by the unfolding of the story. It centers on Viggo Mortensen as Papa, and his prepubescent son. They wander further and further south, perhaps clinging to the idea that they might eventually meet up with the boy's mother, who has left their once happy home, in a desperation that does not disparage women, so much as show how different people would react to such an unprecedented world event. The abandoned father and son have adventures, conversation, bonding, fear, arguments, and live the lives of refugees.

It is extraordinary to watch the level of intimacy between these two: one man, and one soon to be. It is the very essence of what a father and son relationship should be. In spite of the difficulties facing a father who knew a completely different world, the primal frustration is never taken out on the son. Beyond that, Papa constantly imparts to his son preparatory advice, which will come in handy late in the film, as it reaches perhaps its most touching moment. Anybody who thinks this is a misogynist film due to the mother's flight, or the relative absence of female characters in the movie, must watch until it's all over. Only then can you understand why this is the first film I have ever bothered to completely review. It is truly magnificent.

Beyond the wonderful father/son relationship you are privileged to see, the movie ultimately hints at the necessity of men in order to build the world. Although it never happens in the course of the film, you get the sense that someday crops will be sown again, due to the presence of the good men you see in this movie. Perhaps people will once again, when the earth ceases the constant burning and shaking, be able to rebuild society. Even more importantly, you are left with a hope that this time it will be built by men and women who understand and repudiate the true nature of the alpha personality, but that ultimately men, with their greater bodily strength, and their higher numbers of intellectually-minded members, along with the lesser numbers of women who are up to the task, will form a society that can deal with the new challenges that the planet has provided with its upheaval. The remaining women will concern themselves in general with the desires of their sisters and children. One of the last lines in the movie seems to hint at this, and it's the essence of motherhood and womanhood.

After all, in the world this gifted author has dreamt up (if the movie is any indication of the book), rights, privileges, opportunities, feminism, fascism, corporatism, militarism, statism, liberalism, libertarianism, socialism, communism, capitalism, and virtually every other -ism you can imagine, have all been burned to a crisp. All that's left is what individuals possess inside. They either have the will to live, to merely scrounge, or to take by force. All pretense has vanished. There is no time for women to think of luxury when the young haven't been fed for several days. Friedan's concerns would not exist. All that would be left for women to think about, and for the children to observe, is how hard the men have to think, work, and live, simply so that everyone else will go on. (Incidentally, I would not recommend this film to women, as it touches too strongly on what I believe a great many women fear the most.)

It's a tremendous concept, and one that was wrongfully ignored by the Oscars (can't always depend on them). Its spare, imaginative, horrifying look at the fragility of what we have built in the modern age, and the pretentious ideologies we have pulled so tightly over it, should have been praised to the high heavens, including the filmmakers' use of costuming, makeup, set design, sound and visual effects, music, and excellent pacing.

Perhaps the reason it was ignored was because of the blatancy of its portrayal of the essentials of manhood. Maybe if a couple of irresponsible feminists who shot a rapist had sped their Cadillac through the proceedings, it might have gotten the attention it deserved. No matter. When the America sung about by those Latina immigrants has finally collapsed, I pray that I will find myself in the company of the family that appears at the end of the movie. They think like me.

Can the Dowry Save Marriage?

August 5, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The following video by Shah provides a historical overview of how men & women BOTH contributed something to marriages in former times, and how in recent centuries we dropped the principle of women “bringing something to the table.” This is a one-of-a-kind analysis in underlining the importance of men setting economic expectations for women they form relationships with.

Subscribe to Shah here.

The Goal Post Episode 41 – The 2024 Olympics (Or, the Hunger Games)

August 6, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Love sick (part 1)

August 7, 2024 | by Dr. Frank Tallis | Link | Original Link

The following is Part 1 of a three-part extract from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. The book takes a good look at romantic love, or more accurately the sickness of it – a fact underlined by many writers at AVfM who have exposed the bankruptcy of romantic chivalry. Dr. Tallis' extensive clinical experience confirms just how sick-making these practices are for all who indulge them. – Eds.

Incurable Romantics

> Love, love, love – all the wretched cant of it, masking egotism, lust, masochism, fantasy under a mythology of sentimental postures, a welter of self-induced miseries and joys, blinding and masking the essential personalities in the frozen gestures of courtship, in the kissing and the dating and the desire, the compliments and the quarrels which vivify its barrenness.
>
> The Female Eunuch, Germaine Greer

Romantic love has been described by the Jungian psychoanalyst Robert Johnson as `the single greatest energy system in the Western psyche'. Although this sounds like a wildly extravagant claim, it is almost certainly true. Love – and in particular romantic love – is our great preoccupation. Almost every aspect of our life is affected, in some way, by the concept of romantic love.

The word 'romantic' is troubled by a long history. It is like an overworked canvas, the composition and brushwork of which cannot conceal the suggestion of earlier drafts. English dictionaries distinguish 'romantic' with several definitions, but in reality, such tidy divisions are misleading. When we use the word, these different meanings ings bleed into each other. To be romantically involved is an admission that carries a host of implications: passion, folly, obsession, anguish, recklessness, intrigue, and adventure; archetypes rise from varying depths and jostle with each other for recognition and influence.

As with any native tongue, we first speak the language of romantic love without being able to explain its grammar. The assumptions on which romantic love is predicated are buried in the unconscious mind, where they exert a powerful influence on our beliefs, attitudes, and expectations. We never pause to question their legitimacy. When a romantic hero decides he will sacrifice everything for love, no one will ask 'Is she really worth it?' or 'Can't he find someone else?' Romantic love has its own obscure logic which we all tacitly accept.

The roots of romantic love run deep. Indeed, the fundamental mental conventions of romantic love were consolidated on the ancestral plains of Africa, where evolutionary pressures determined that men should court women, that women should be coy, that relationships should be exclusive, and that love should storm the mind like a form of madness. However, since the rise of civilisation, these features have been increasingly complicated by ideological factors. The roots of romantic love are profoundly deep, but, now, they are also hopelessly tangled.

To understand fully the concept of romantic love requires an examination of its cultural history (in addition to its evolutionary history)…

* * *

The Islamic courtly tradition was introduced into Western culture by the troubadours, whose poetry preserved many features of Arab mysticism – particularly, a quasi-religious praise of female beauty. However, as this theme was reworked, it also began to change. Spiritual inaccessibility gradually evolved into alluring aloofness, which in turn became regal disdain. Thus, a recurring figure in troubadour poetry was the cold, cruel mistress.

The theme of inaccessibility was also explored in another way: the introduction of a female character, immensely desirable, but unavailable through marriage.

Even at this very early stage, the authenticity of love was being judged according to its difficulty (with respect to obstacles and impediments) and its irrationality. In troubadour poetry, we can recognise the cultural ancestry of modern concepts such as Lee's mania or Tennov's limerence: love that does not need liking – love that may even thrive in response to rejection or contempt. The troubadour's cruel mistress reappears again and again in literature in different guises: the enchantress, the femme fatale, the Belle Dame sans Merci. Long before psychologists began to study love in a systematic way, literature required a particular female type who would represent unhappy love.

The doctrine of romantic love (also known as courtezia or amour courtois) would have spread across Europe irrespective of royal patronage; however, the process was certainly accelerated by events at the court of Poitiers, where William IX is reputed to have been 'the first troubadour' (on account of having written the earliest surviving examples of coutly verse in the Provencal language). It was also at Poitiers that William's granddaughter, Eleanor of Aquitaine, and her daughter, Marie de Champagne, encouraged celebrated poets such as Bernard de Ventadour and Chretien de Troyes to compose works that exemplified courtly ideals. A narrative vehicle that was popular among the poets of Poitiers was Arthurian legend, which delivered a cast of characters whose relationships could be fully exploited to dramatise the frustrating dynamics of romantic love. Thus, Guinevere's beauty is beyond compare, and Lancelot – Arthur's most loyal servant – must fall hopelessly in love with the queen. (English readers are more familiar with this dynamic through Sir Thomas Malory's Le Morte d'Arthur.) In the poetry of Chretien de Troyes, love – always complicated, but even more complicated by courtly conventions – is once again described as an illness: 'My illness is what I want. And my pain is my health… I suffer agreeably… I am sick with delight.'

One of the most extraordinary developments at Poitiers was the creation of an inner court – the Court of Love – where noblewomen would meet to pose questions about love and the proper conduct of lovers. Questions would then be disputed, juried and judged, according to the increasingly dogmatic principles of courtezia. Perhaps, in an effort to make the task of this inner court easier, Marie instructed a cleric, Andrew Capelanus (also known as Andrew the Chaplain), to write a formal book of statutes: a kind of lovers' charter.

Andrew began his task by consulting a classical authority – the Ars Amatoria (or Art of Love) by Ovid. It is difficult to imagine a more inappropriate work on which to base a 'respectable' canon. As with much to do with romantic love, history reveals cross-purposes, because for Ovid adoration is only a means to an end. Ovid adores, not because he can't help himself, but because by feigning adoration he is more likely to succeed in seduction. He is a cunning and manipulative strategist, who advises on everything from good 'chat up' lines to how physical defects can be concealed by adopting special positions during intercourse. In an age of political correctness, he is still able to offend modern sensibilities. He recommends pretending to cry, making false promises, writing flattering verses (however insincere) and even coercion: `Some force is permissible – women are often pleased by force.'

Ovid also advises the aspirant libertine to affect the symptoms of love sickness: 'All lovers should be pallid, it's chic to be pale;/ Only fools deny it, pale skins rarely fail.' Moreover, he observes that loss of appetite and worry 'make the young lover as thin as a rake'. Therefore, if wishing to attract the attention of women, one should: `Look lean – it suggests passion.'

When Andrew Capelanus came to write his own work – The Art of Courtly Love – he did so by borrowing from Ovid. Thus, Ovid's cynical observations were used to shore up the romantic ideal. Love sickness – merely another weapon in Ovid's armamentarium – became fully established as a crucial sign of love's authenticity.

Capelanus described love as `a certain inborn suffering' and suggested thirty-one rules of love. They include the following:

Rule 2 He who is not jealous cannot love.
Rule 9 No one can love unless he is impelled by the persuasion of love (also translated as: No one can love who is not driven to do so by the power of love).
Rule 13 When made public love rarely endures.
Rule 14 The easy attainment of love makes it of little value; difficulty of attainment makes it prized.
Rule 15 Every lover regularly turns pale in the presence of his beloved.
Rule 16 When a lover suddenly catches sight of his beloved his heart palpitates.
Rule 20 A man in love is always apprehensive (also translated as: A lover is always fearful).
Rule 21 Real jealousy always increases the feeling of love.
Rule 22 Jealousy, and therefore love, are increased when one suspects his beloved.
Rule 30 A true lover is constantly and without intermission possessed by the thought of his beloved (Also translated as: The true lover is continuously obsessed with the image of his beloved.

Love and mental illness were closely linked according to the principles of Hippocratic medicine; however, Capelanus's principles seem to do much the same thing. At Poitiers it was decided that love – if true – must be disturbed and slightly perverse; it must be obsessive, compulsive, agitated, anxious, jealous, suspicious, clandestine, and frustrating.

There is still some debate concerning to what extent Capelanus meant his rules to be taken seriously. It is possible that The Art of Courtly Love was meant to be satirical – but if so, its satirical content was lost on contemporary and subsequent generations. The Art of Courtly Love was never viewed as a critique. It was always viewed as a manifesto.

Romantic love became an increasingly important feature of literature in the late twelfth and thirteenth centuries. The Lais of Marie de France and de Lorris's Romance of the Rose are significant examples; however, the quintessential courtly romance of the middle ages must be Tristan – now more widely encountered in the opera house as Wagner's Tristan and Isolde.

Although Tristan does not feature King Arthur, it is an 'Arthurian' romance set in a landscape of castles, quests and dragons. An authenticated 'original' does not exist, but five versions have been handed down – the most famous being those of Beroul, Gottfried von Strassburg and Thomas.

Tristan is raised by his uncle, King Mark of Cornwall, and it falls upon him to escort King Mark's bride-to-be, the beautiful Princess Isolde, from her home in Ireland to the king's castle. While crossing the Irish Sea, they both mistakenly drink a love potion, and subsequently fall in love. The love potion – a potent symbol of love's madness – neatly excuses Tristan's betrayal of his uncle.

In Gottfried's version, the bemused Tristan complains: `I do not know what has come over poor Isolde and me, but we have both of us gone mad in the briefest space of time, with unimaginable torment – we are dying of love …'

Tristan and Isolde (against their better judgement) become clandestine lovers and, in doing so, stir the gods of tragedy. Much of the ensuing drama concerns their attempts to avoid discovery, and eventually they must separate. Tristan is wounded by a poisoned spear and, as his life ebbs away, he calls for Isolde. She rushes to be with him, but arrives too late and can do nothing to save him. Clasping his dead body, she gives up her spirit and dies.

During the middle ages, romantic narrative's landscape of kings and queens, knights and ladies, heroism, bravery, destiny and magic became established in the Western imagination, and is familiar to children, appearing in numerous story-books. The idea of romantic love has penetrated so deep into our culture, that few people escape its influence before leaving the nursery. Unfortunately, a consequence of this is that many grow up assuming they will find fairy-tale happiness in the real world – an expectation that is rarely fulfilled. Moreover, it is curious that the main exemplars of courtly romance (which in a sense foster our fairy-tale aspirations) rarely end with a `happy ever after', but with torment, tears and death.

Continued in part-2.....

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

August 7, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

Love sick (part 2)

August 8, 2024 | by Dr. Frank Tallis | Link | Original Link

The following is Part 2 of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Dr. Tallis uncovers the cultural roots of men's tendency toward idealizing women and placing them on pedestals. -Ed.

Incurable Romantics

The romantic themes of idealisation and forbidden (or non-consummated) love were taken to new extremes in Renaissance Italy. Poets such as Dante and Petrarch placed their muses on absurdly elevated pedestals. Dante's Beatrice, and Petrarch's Laura, are portrayed as models of perfection and purity. Moreover, the fact that both women died prematurely and then reappear in poetic visions, emphasises their divinity. There is some debate concerning the identity of Petrarch's Laura. She may have been Laure de Noves of Avignon (a married woman with children), or she may never have existed at all (being merely a poetic invention). Dante's Beatrice, on the other hand, was definitely a real person.
The extreme idealisation of Beatrice and Laura is partly attributable to Marianism. During the thirteenth century, Mary became increasingly important as a mediator between human beings and God. It was to Mary that the majority prayed for divine intercession. She was more `human', and therefore approachable, than all three personifications of the Holy Trinity. Moreover, her curious (and paradoxical) position as the mother of God gave her considerable authority. For some time, the river of romantic literature was swollen by the tributary of Marianism. Women were worshipped with religious fervour, and sexual desire was wholly sublimated.

The story of Dante and Beatrice is principally recorded in Dante's The New Life (a hybrid of autobiography and literary treatise). They met for the first time as children, when the poet accompanied his father to the house of Folco Portinari (Beatrice's father). Dante immediately fell in love with Beatrice and remained devoted to her (more or less) for the rest of his life. She was married to a banker from an early age, and so – in true courtly style – Dante was forced to admire her from a distance. He appropriated the Arthurian role of Lancelot, and championed his `mistress', not with arms, but with poetry.

The Marian nature of Dante's love for Beatrice did not exempt him from the commonplace symptoms of love sickness. He complained of all the usual problems: expansive moods and depression, lightheadedness, obsession, anorexia, sleeplessness, paleness, trepidation and anguish. And Beatrice occupied such an elevated position in his universe that even the slightest suspicion of her disapproval was crushing. When she failed to return his greeting, Dante became extremely distressed:

> … I was overcome by such sorrow that I left my fellow men and went to a > secluded place, where I could bathe the earth with my bitter tears. Then, when my weeping was almost exhausted, I took myself to my room, where I could lament without being overheard. There, while calling for mercy from the lady of courtesy, and crying `Love, help your servant!', I fell asleep like a little child crying after it has been beaten.

If anything, the spiritual nature of Dante's love for Beatrice seemed to exaggerate the usual psychopathological resonances. Even his moments of rapture were tainted with the uncomfortable, manic energy of a religious fanatic. His eyes shine, and we question his sanity; we are not very far away from shaking fists, prophecy and revelation.

Perhaps the most compelling example of this arose during a period of sickness, when it suddenly occurred to Dante that Beatrice was mortal and might one day die: 'At this I was overcome by such delirium that I shut my eyes and started to thrash about like a fever patient.' He then entered a world of lurid hallucination: 'Then I saw the sun darken and the stars changed to such a colour that I thought they wept; birds dropped dead while flying through the air, and there were vast earthquakes.' We are reminded of the darkness that fell on the earth at the time of the crucifixion. For Dante, a presentiment of separation was not painful – it was the apocalypse.

At the age of twenty-four Beatrice did die, and predictably Dante was thrown into deep despair – even though, by then, he too was married. While grieving, he became temporarily infatuated with another woman; however, these feelings were completely expunged when Beatrice appeared to him in a heavenly vision. Dante was reminded of Beatrice's incomparable beauty and he subsequently committed himself to a life of continued adoration. He became, in effect, a votary.

Love is predicated on togetherness in a world where things must exist separately, and total separation – because of death – is an inevitable and unbearable truth that few lovers can keep from contemplating. In the history of romantic story telling, love and death are old companions. Great love stories are made all the more poignant by our certain knowledge that the couple are cavorting on the lip of an open grave.

In his scholarly treatise, Love in the Western World, the Swiss philosopher Denis de Rougemont wrote:

> Romance only comes into existence when love is fatal, frowned upon and doomed by life itself. What stirs lyrical poets to their finest flights is neither the delight of the senses nor the fruitful contentment of the settled couple; not the satisfaction of love, but its passion. And passion means suffering.

To live up to the romantic ideal, love must be fated. It must be passionate, painful and ultimately doomed. It must culminate in death and, if we are lucky, transfiguration.

But why?

Although death appears in love stories prior to the middle ages, it does so in the service of tragedy. After the middle ages, however, death is almost wholly in the service of love. The outcome of a fated love story might still be tragic, but death's function has changed.

Essentially, it offers unlimited possibilities for idealisation.

The most extraordinary feature of Dante's The New Life is the degree to which he idealises Beatrice. Until Dante, almost all love poetry – however heady – recognised that beauty fades. In the end, time must ruin even the loveliest of faces. Yet, when it comes to Beatrice, Dante simply refuses to concede any ground to time. Of course, Beatrice conveniently obliged him by dying young, and in the reliquary of Dante's imagination, Beatrice's incorruptible body parts were preserved like those of a medieval saint.

The romantic tradition has always demanded that the beloved be, in some sense, beyond reach. Yearning, without out satisfaction or release, was presumed to be ennobling. Because romantic love is never supposed to be consummated, it never weakens, and continues to dignify the lover. When the beloved dies, she exchanges an earthly marriage for a numinous marriage. In death, she becomes completely unattainable, and the yearning must then go on for ever.

Islamic mysticism, courtezia and Renaissance literature have all added registers of meaning to the word `romantic'; however, it has also been enriched by association with a more recent, but nevertheless highly important, cultural development – the rise of Romanticism.

Strictly speaking, Romanticism is only tenuously connected with `romantic love'. The Romantic movement began in Germany towards the end of the eighteenth century, and continued to be influential, by varying degrees, until the end of the nineteenth. It began as a reaction against the values and preoccupations of the Enlightenment. The great thinkers of the Enlightenment venerated reason, lived in cities, and were keen to instigate political change. Romantics, on the other hand were fascinated by emotions, revered nature, and were far more interested in personal psychology than social reform.

The concerns of the Romantic movement were much wider than those of the troubadours or the Court of Love at Poitiers. Even so, in matters of love, there are several continuities that link the idea of romance with Romanticism. Indeed, the work which launched the Romantic movement was a love story which preserves many courtly themes. This was Goethe's 1774 novel, The Sorrows of Young Werther.

Werther, an artistic young man, falls in love with the beautiful Lotte. Unfortunately, she is already engaged to Albert, a gentleman renowned for his honesty and good character. While waiting for Albert to announce the wedding day, Werther learns that Lotte and Albert have already been married. Werther tries to divert himself, and for a while wanders aimlessly, but his yearning for Lotte does not diminish and he feels compelled to return.

Werther is consumed with jealousy: 'At times I cannot grasp that she can love another man, that she dare love another man, when I love her alone with such passion and devotion, and neither know nor have anything but her!' He sinks into black despair: 'Ah, have ever men before me been so miserable?'

While out walking on a wet, dreary day, he meets a madman 'scrabbling about the rocks' picking flowers for his 'sweetheart'. The madman's mother appears, and explains to Werther that her son has only recently been released from a madhouse, where he has been restrained in chains for a whole year. The following day, Werther discovers that the madman was previously a clerk employed by Lotte's father. He, too, had fallen in love with Lotte, and the revelation of his love had cost him first his position and then his sanity.

The encounter with the madman is a presentiment of Werther's own fate. He becomes progressively more disturbed, agitated and has hallucinatory dreams of making love to Lotte: 'My senses are confused, for a full week I have been unable to think straight, my eyes are full of tears.' His misery becomes intolerable – even to the solicitous Lotte – who perceptively suggests: 'I fear, I very much fear that what makes the desire to possess me so attractive is its very impossibility.'

Werther cannot be reasoned with. He desires an eternal connection with Lotte, and he begins to see how this might be achieved. He leaves instructions for his body to be buried in clothes that are 'sacred' (because Lotte has touched them), and places a pink ribbon – a gift from Lotte – in his pocket. While experiencing a kind of spiritual reprieve from mental anguish ('All around me is so silent, and my soul is calm') Werther shoots himself, and dies.

A romantic love triangle, an idealised woman, an episode of wandering, and a young man who edges towards his doom. The old courtly themes are very much in evidence; however, it is Werther's demise that seems to resonate most strongly with the mystical origins of romantic idealism. Ultimately, courtly love is about realising spiritual objectives: beauty is back-lit by a sun that sets in paradise.

The spiritual sub-text of Werther's love for Lotte surfaces several times before his death. For example, at one point, he says of Lotte: 'She is sacred to me. All my desires are stilled in her presence. I never know what I am about when I am with her; it is as if my soul were throbbing in every nerve.' In another section, the possibility of a spiritual reunion is innocently raised by Lotte herself, when she discusses her religious convictions: 'There will be a life for us after death, Werther! . . . but will we find each other again? And know each other? What do you suppose? What do you say?'

The Romantics had a highly developed sense of the numinous. They believed in a universal soul – a mysterious `fundament' behind visible nature. Moreover, they believed that an understanding of this deeper truth might be achieved through communion with nature, or the experience of altered states of consciousness, such as powerful emotions, dreams or madness.

In this sense, Romanticism returns romantic love to its cultural source. It returns us to the desert, where Islamic sages sought truth in beauty. We are again in the company of Majnun, whose love is so intense, so powerful, it punctures the celestial dome and fenestrates heaven.

Romanticism is the closest thing we have to a religious faith in a predominantly secular society. This is probably because love is frequently associated with intense experiences of rapture and ecstasy. When love's madness enters its manic phase, consciousness is raised. If love is consummated, sexual activity can intensify the experience even further – evoking what psychologists have called ‘oceanic feelings’.

Love’s rapture and transcendent states have much in common. Both achieve a sense of escape from the limitations of human identity by union with another being (either lover or God). The desired outcome is a kind of self-annihilation, in which personality, ordinarily overburdened with worldly concerns, is lost in a moment of pure, unadulterated bliss.

Almost all religions have a pseudo-erotic mystical tradition. Hindus practise sexual Tantra and Sufi poetry is fundamentally love poetry. Even Christianity has – to the considerable embarrassment of the Church itself – been unable to resist linking sex and spirituality. St Teresa of Avila, for example, evokes the female genitalia by describing a ‘wound of love’, and famously wrote about a vision in which she was penetrated by an angel carrying a golden spear with ‘a point of fire’. For St Teresa, spiritual enlightenment is a process that begins when the soul falls in love with God, and ends with ‘spiritual marriage’.

In Revelations of Divine Love, another medieval Christian mystic, Julian of Norwich, described oddly pornographic visions of Jesus Christ’s bleeding body. The sensuous language she employs knowingly emphasises the carnal aspects of carnage. Thus, her ‘revelation’ is ‘horrifying and dreadful, sweet and lovely’. Moreover, when Jesus speaks, he speaks in the person of a lover: ‘It is I whom you love; it is I whom you delight in … it is I whom you long for, whom you desire.’

The division that exists between reason and emotion has created a curious predicament for Western humanity. We find it hard to believe in God, but at the same time, we still have the capacity to look at the natural world and feel something thing close to reverence and awe. Although we suspect that there is no God, we feel that there should be. We are still dissatisfied with the limitations of personal identity. This is evidenced by the continuing popularity of recreational drugs. In the absence of an alternative, many settle for a chemical Nirvana.

In the East, where spirituality is still very much a part of everyday life, less is expected of love between human beings. The spiritual instinct is satisfied by religious observances, meditation or scripture. In the West, however, where religion plays no real part in the lives of most people, we have replaced religion with love. We have become passionate pilgrims, seeking the transport and meanings of spiritual ecstasy in the religion of romance and the sacrament of sex.

Even if we have little knowledge of the cultural history of romance, we all – to a greater or lesser extent – subscribe to a broad set of ‘romantic’ expectations. The notion of romance has inveigled itself into every aspect of courtship, sex and love. We seek to create a ‘romantic atmosphere’ on a dinner date, we allow ourselves the indulgence of a ‘holiday romance’, or attempt to revive passion with a long-term partner by taking a ‘romantic weekend break’.

The cultural history of ‘romance’ and various meanings of the word ‘romantic’ make it extremely difficult to define ‘romantic love’. Academic psychology – usually quite pedantic about its terminology – has been unable to establish a consensus. Some psychologists use the term in accordance with its courtly origins, whereas others use it interchangeably with ‘passionate love’. As a culture, we seem to have settled on the latter usage, viewing ‘romantic love’ and ‘falling in love’ as much the same thing.

It has already been argued that the fundamental features of romantic love are evolutionary in origin. Thus, courtship gives women time to evaluate the fitness of suitors; heroic acts are a form of male resource display; and an exclusive (or idealised) relationship is necessary for the formation of a strong pair-bond. Most contemporary evolutionary theorists would agree with Capelanus when he points out that the ease with which love can be won is inversely related to its value. In any social hierarchy, the more beautiful a woman is, the more difficult it will be for a man to win her affection. Beauty advertises good genes which, being at a premium, can be withheld for longer. A beautiful woman is never short of suitors. The inaccessibility of fairy-tale queens is perhaps the logical extension of this principle.

That we should find traces of evolutionary theory in story telling is unremarkable. Art has always served as an instrument of self-enquiry and self-definition. Therefore, it was inevitable that certain fundamental features of human behaviour should appear as conventions in romantic literature. The problem with the courtly tradition, however, is that during the course of its development, the romantic ideal became increasingly rigid and extreme; the imposition of arbitrary codes of conduct offered unlimited scope for self-contradiction contradiction and confusion.

The idea that psychopathology is related to conflict is an old one, and it is an explanatory principle that appears and reappears in the writings of numerous psychologists. Thus, individuals whose theories of psychopathology are extremely different – for example, Sigmund Freud and Ivan Pavlov – still have this much in common.

In the 195os, Gregory Bateson and colleagues developed a new conflict-based theory of psychopathology which made use of a pivotal concept known as the ‘double bind’. Essentially, Bateson suggested that severe psychological problems might be caused by ‘mixed messages’ – as, for example, when a mother repeatedly tells her son that she loves him, while turning her head away in disgust. The term double bind has also been used to describe ‘catch-22’ situations, where whatever choice is made, the outcome is undesirable.

The doctrine of romantic love has a double bind at its heart. It confuses the carnal and the spiritual. What started off as allegorical literature eventually became a code of conduct – and a completely impractical one at that. Arab mystical literature explored the correspondences between sexual desire and spiritual desire. However, as these threads were carried over the Pyrenees they became inextricably entangled – and much follows from this. The ever present tension between the carnal and spiritual produces a dynamic which generates layer upon layer of self-contradiction.

We expect another human being to make us feel complete, or fulfilled, yet these profound feelings of completion are usually only vouchsafed to the spiritually enlightened. We expect passionate love to last for ever – and even increase in intensity – but it is transitory; it almost always diminishes or turns into companionate love. We expect beauty to be resistant to the depredations of time, but all beauty fades. We like to think that we are being inexorably guided by supernatural forces towards one true love, but the most important factor in the formation of relationships (whether we like it or not) is chance, and in reality we fall in love promiscuously.

Worse still, the fabric of romance comes apart under the forces generated by its own contradictions. Women are worshipped as paradigms of purity, personifications of Marian virtue, but the foundations of adoration sink into a quagmire of lust and desire. Men make women into Madonnas, but cannot deny their sexual needs. Thus, they inevitably despoil paradise. In the later versions of 'Arthurian' legend (including those concerning Tristan), this is recognised by the introduction of a fatally adulterous relationship: Lancelot sleeps with Guinevere; Tristan sleeps with Isolde. As the courtly tradition evolved, more and more writers became preoccupied with adultery, rather than ennobling abstinence.

The impossible demands of romantic love have left a deep impression on Western literature. As Denis de Rougemont has astutely observed: 'To judge by literature, adultery would seem to be one of the most remarkable of occupations in both Europe and America. Few are the novels that fail to allude to it … Without adultery, what would happen to imaginative writing?'

The fairy-tale, 'Once-upon-a-time' world of romantic love promises that we will live 'happy ever after', but romantic narrative is pure tragedy. Heroes vacillate between euphoria and melancholy, and then subside into states of morbid obsession. The name Tristan means child of sadness, and few romances end without first taking casualties. The confusion of the carnal and spiritual invites death into the bedroom and, ultimately, we join our voices with a vast choir and sing that great anthem of self-contradiction, the liebestod, the love death. Procreation and extinction accidentally join hands in the conceptual fog of romantic idealism, with devastating consequences.

Our romantic legacy is predicated on a Batesonian double bind, and its mixed messages incline us towards emotional instability. If evolutionary pressures have determined that love should drive us mad, then cultural pressures have created ideal conditions for its incubation.

Love sick (part 3)

August 9, 2024 | by Dr. Frank Tallis | Link | Original Link

The following is the final of a three-part series about romantic love from Frank Tallis' book Love Sick. In this part Tallis looks at the division between Asian and Western approaches to love. -Ed.

Incurable Romantics

In the early 1990's, a group of social scientists undertook a large cross-cultural study, in which they interviewed students from the USA, Italy, and the People's Republic of China about a variety of emotional experiences, including happiness, fear, anger, sadness and love. When the study was completed, it was found that there was remarkable agreement concerning all of the emotions, but with one exception – love. American and European subjects rated love very positively, and equated it with other positive experiences like joy and happiness. The Chinese subjects, however, were much more doubtful. In the Chinese language there are very few ideographs that correspond with the more positive love-related related words found in English and Italian. Instead, love tends to be associated with more negative emotional states. For example, the Chinese subjects linked passionate love with ideographs which translate as 'infatuation', 'unrequited love', 'nostalgia' and 'sorrow'. When told of Western ideas about love, the Chinese subjects thought they were inaccurate and unrealistic.

These findings raise some interesting questions. Has the Western romantic tradition made us blind to love's madness? China has no equivalent tradition. In fact, during the Cultural Revolution, 'romantic love' was outlawed – considered by the communist elite to be a 'bourgeois' indulgence. Given this context, is it possible that the Chinese are better equipped to evaluate the pitfalls of passionate love? It would seem that for many Chinese students, they would as much want to fall in love as develop a psychiatric illness.

The ancient Greeks were troubled by passion – seeing it as a force that could easily overthrow reason and disturb the mind's equilibrium. In many respects, this view has been preserved in several Asian and Oriental cultures. To be romantic is to play with fire – the volatile, inner fire of Hippocratic and Islamic medicine. Although passion can be exciting, it is extremely unreliable – so unreliable, that Asian and Oriental cultures have rejected passion as the basis of marriage, subscribing instead to the more rational processes of 'arrangement'. The formation of a new family unit is considered to be of such great importance – not only to the bride, groom, their progeny and immediate family, but to the entire local community and wider society – that it cannot be based on love alone. There must be a deeper level of compatibility, embracing factors such as background, education and temperament, to ensure that the relationship will last.

The Chinese anthropologist Francis Hsu has suggested that Western and Eastern cultures differ with respect to social awareness and obligation. In the West, the individual – his or her personal identity – is considered to be much more important than his or her social role. In the East, however, this is entirely reversed. The individual's personal identity is considered less important than their ability to be a good son, daughter, husband or mother. Therefore, a successful marriage is more likely to arise from a pairing that takes the full social and cultural credentials of both parties into account.

The romantic tradition represents the antithesis of this kind of thinking – and reaches its most extreme expression in elopement. From a Western perspective, the instinctive response to elopement is positive. Yet, the eloping couple are usually in the throes of love's madness, and remove themselves entirely from their social context. In doing so, they immediately lose the benefits of an existing support network (friends and family) and incur the costs of geographical displacement. They become disconnected, two mutually absorbed individuals who have relinquished social obligations and can no longer properly occupy a defined social role. Needless to say, a relationship that takes place in a social vacuum has fewer external forces holding it together.

It is interesting that this disregard for social context was always a feature of romantic writing. For example, the figure of the Majnun, being mad, is by necessity a social outcast, but in the romantic tradition, losing or risking everything for love, including one's mind, is almost expected. In the Lais of Marie de France (a collection of courtly tales written in the late twelfth century) the disconnection of lovers from their social context is even more conspicuous. French literature scholars Glynn Burgess and Keith Busby point out that:

> Marie concentrates on the individuality of her characters and is not very concerned with their integration into society. If society does not appreciate the lovers, then the lovers die or abandon society, and society is the poorer for it.

Perhaps as a consequence of this disenfranchisement, Marie's images of love are almost always painful. Again, Burgess and Busby write:

> If we take the Lais as a whole work, compared with other works of medieval literature, the characteristic of Marie's view of love seems to be an almost inevitable association with suffering.

The theme of the lover – or lovers – standing outside society, re-emerges intermittently throughout the entire history of romantic writing, and ultimately we find ourselves in the frozen wastes of Romantic poetry, where young men set off on winter journeys, meaning either never to return or to die. This represents yet another paradox. One of the main aims of the courtly tradition was to socialise love, to make it genteel and polite. Yet ultimately, romance is an anti-social phenomenon. It weakens social cohesion.

The Asian and Eastern belief that all of society has a stake in the success of love was curiously echoed by Erich Fromm in The Art of Loving. Fromm insisted that the principal problem of Western society is alienation. When we love, however, we should feel connected – and this sense of connection extends beyond the family to the social whole. Socially aware love – love that acknowledges its social context – is essential to the well-being of everyone.

For most people raised in the West, the concept of an arranged marriage – or policing love – seems distasteful, even repugnant. Yet, arranged marriage is practised by 60 per cent of the world's population – and approximately half of these couples claim that they stay together because of love (not romantic love, maybe, but something far more durable). In Britain and the US, where people still uphold the romantic ideal, nearly half of first marriages end in divorce, while those marriages that survive are often characterised by deep levels of dissatisfaction – particularly among women. The divorce rate for second and third marriages is even higher.

Love's madness usually strikes with the onset of adolescence. Subsequently, there is a high risk of pregnancy, impetuous marriage, or both. Statistics show that teenage marriages are very fragile, and a high percentage break down within only a few years. Teenage pregnancy (compared with pregnancy in early adulthood) is associated with premature birth, low birth weight, and death during childbirth. Teenage pregnancy also has social consequences. It will interrupt, or even terminate, a young woman's education, and the children of most teenage families are financially disadvantaged. The idea of risking everything for love is portrayed in the West as a noble undertaking, but subscribing to this doctrine frequently results in loneliness, hardship and poverty.

In stark contrast, the tradition of arranged marriage has a number of pragmatic advantages, rarely appreciated by dyed-in-the-wool romantics. The arranged marriage system is strongly associated with the idea of coercion, yet, in reality, Asian and Oriental cultures almost always allow the prospective bride and groom to exercise some choice, albeit limited. In India, the 'girl-seeing' ceremony has evolved specifically for this purpose. Typically, the young man's family will visit the young woman's family, and the young man is given a special seat. The young woman then enters the room, kneels, bows and leaves. Both are then in a position to decide whether they find each other attractive and wish to proceed further.

Although arranged marriages are treated with suspicion in the West, they represent a preference for many who have been raised in Asian and Eastern cultures. It is assumed that a 'good marriage' can only be achieved if couples are carefully matched, and then supported by their families. To base a marriage on passion is simply irresponsible, and likely to result in unhappiness. Surprisingly – for incurable romantics at least – contemporary research does not contradict this view.

Psychologists Paul Yelsma and Kuriakose Athappilly have studied relationship satisfaction levels of couples who married for love and those who married by arrangement. Those whose marriages were arranged show much higher levels of satisfaction than those who married for love. Other studies have produced a similar pattern of results.

Almost instinctively, the Occidental sensibility finds such results difficult to believe, but why shouldn't arranged marriages be superior to those that are based on a temporary madness? A long-term relationship – if it is to be happy – must be based on more than the tortured logic and inflated expectations of romantic idealism.

The Dalai Lama, examining romantic love from the cool, rational vantage of Buddhism, does not hesitate to identify it as a form of madness:

> When a couple has just met, seen each other on just a few occasions, they may be madly in love and very happy, but any decision about marriage made at that instant would be very shaky. Just as one can become, in some sense, insane from the power of intense anger or hatred, it is also possible for an individual to become in some sense insane by the power of passion and lust.

Romantic love springs from absurdities such as 'love at first sight'. It is preoccupied with superficial (and transient) characteristics such as physical beauty, and usually ends in confusion and frustration.

> … sometimes you might even find situations where an individual could feel, `Oh, my boyfriend or girlfriend is not really a good person, not a kind person, but still I feel attracted to him or her.'

According to the Dalai Lama, meaningful, satisfying and lasting relationships are not based on romantic idealism, but on mutual understanding, respect and compassion. True love is not instant. Love that strikes like a bolt of lightning is almost certainly suspect, as are the whirlwind romances that are the staple of romantic fiction. In essence, the Dalai Lama suggests that a commitment based on deep friendship is more likely to outlast a commitment based on desire. In contrast to the storm-tossed seas of romanticism, he offers an attractive alternative of still waters and lotus flowers – the relationship as sanctuary, a retreat from madness, rather than a manifestation of madness.

Perhaps, after more than a thousand years of disappointment, we can see the first signs of disaffection in the West – cultural trends that tacitly acknowledge the commonsense sense virtues of Asian and Oriental attitudes to love and marriage. Over the last fifty years, dating agencies have become increasingly popular, operating on similar principles to those that govern arranged marriages. The only fundamental difference is that the initial matching takes place in a computer, rather than a group of human brains. Even seemingly esoteric rituals, like the 'girl-seeing' ceremony, have equivalents – for instance, the provision of a photograph or video.

Dating agencies are distinctly unromantic. They militate against all the basic assumptions of romantic love. Yet, they are responsible for bringing a large number of people together in relationships that seem to be very successful.

The idea of arrangement does not preclude falling in love. Indeed, in Asian and other Eastern societies, it is assumed that a couple will fall in love and become passionate – but after the marriage has taken place. Thus, couples can experience love's madness safely, but know that when it passes, they will still have a robust and healthy relationship. Dating agencies seem to offer the same kind of security; couples can engage in the dangerous high-wire act of falling in love, comfortable in the knowledge that there is a safety net in place.

Disaffection with the failure of romantic love was dramatically demonstrated recently by American psychologist Robert Epstein, who, in addition to holding several academic posts, is also the editor-in-chief of Psychology Today. Having considered the merits of arranged marriages, Epstein wondered whether it would be possible to rehabilitate the concept for Western consumption. Consequently, in the June 2002 issue, he argued against romantic assumptions, and suggested that it might be possible to learn to love any suitable partner. He proposed a programme to test his hypothesis: the signing of a six-month exclusivity contract (to obviate the problem of parallel dating); commitment to intensive joint-counselling sessions; frequent 'getaways'; and participation in exercises designed to foster mutual love. Epstein suggested that such a programme – credible to Westerners – might achieve the same result as the arranged marriage system: reliable, meaningful and enduring love. More daringly, Epstein volunteered to be the first subject in his own experiment.

He expected the article to have little impact; however, the subsequent response was overwhelming. It aroused enormous media interest, and Epstein received hundreds of letters, e-mails and telephone calls from women eager to sign his contract.

It would seem that romantic love – which promises heaven on earth – has ultimately delivered something closer to despair.

Rowan Atkinson on free speech

August 11, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Dating in the Double-Bind

August 12, 2024 | by Editorial Staff | Link | Original Link

The following Blog entry was posted on the old AVFM forums by one of its members, jolierouge*. –Ed*

The most potent form of female coercive power is by exploiting the essential biological drive of a man and placing him, often implicitly, into a double bind. He is compelled by both biology, and to some degree social conditioning, to seek validation and completion from women. Women then sit like a spider in the center of a web and wait for a man to approach. However women in general both implicitly and explicitly make any man who approaches an unknown woman out to be a harasser, or seducer (both negative stereotypes, and explicitly undesirable, but implicitly desirable in undefined contexts). Furthermore, any person who seeks must be in a negative power relation to the individual who is sought. To approach women, a man should "be himself" so long as "himself" is not any of the negative attributes that women recoil from. He can't be needy, desperate, creepy, weird, too confident, too weak and so on.

A man is supposed to approach a woman, to get to know her, to ask her out, but she is never alone, or at least very rarely alone. She goes out with friends to protect her from the approach. If a man approaches her, he is likely to be required to not only seduce her but her friends. He is just as likely to be labeled a street harasser.

A man is supposed to approach a woman, but not at work (that's sexual harassment), not on the street (that's street harassment), he can't realistically approach when she's at a bar with her friends, or at a night club, unless of course he is very skilled or very attractive, and very willing to play a numbers game. Even the best PUAs don't do as well as one would hope. A man shouldn't approach when she's not in the mood to be approached, if she's busy, or feeling down. Now some feminists even go so far as to claim a man shouldn't approach a woman unless he has her permission, but one wonders how he is supposed to get permission.

If and when he does make the approach he is told he should possess and display a laundry list of behaviors (sensitive, kind, funny) that are meaningless as he really will have to demonstrate other attributes (indifferent, flippant, excitement seeking) not stated by women, but demonstrably proven to be essential.

The point being that a man who approaches a woman gives her the power of rejection; therefore, he can never be what she wants (powerful, indifferent), and since women almost never approach men, he is caught in a double bind. He doesn't know what to be because women and society tell him he should be soft, sensitive, affable and kind, but experience teaches him, women, actually only respond to men who are indifferent, self-interested, vain and glib.

He is supposed not to be needy, but generally, he needs sex. Both wanting and craving it, and needs the validation that will come from it. So he is like a hungry man who is made to pretend he doesn't want to eat to get maybe a meal one time out of 200 tries. If he works on Game and personal excellence, he can trim that down to maybe 1 in 20 if he's decently good looking. If he's a fatty or just congenitally ugly: tough fucking luck.

Women delight in the paradoxes they present men with, with casual cruelty they giggle about how difficult they are and how that's just the way it is. It's just the way they make it. They are exploiting biology to their benefit, and that is indeed cruel. The argument that men let them do it is only half true. That's like saying that people let McDonald's ruin their health as if fast food restaurants have no moral responsibility.

The featured image depicts the forum in Rome, is licenced under CC-BY-SA and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Women: Our Better Halves (1888)

August 13, 2024 | by Lester Frank Ward | Link | Original Link

---

Lester Frank Ward delivered this his first major essay on Gynæcocentrism Theory in 1888, entitled Our Better Halves. The speech was delivered at the Fourteenth Dinner of the Six O'clock Club in Washington on April 26, 1888, at Willard's Hotel, where Sex Equality was selected as the evening's topic. Distinguished women in Washington on that day were invited to the Club, among them being Mrs. Elizabeth Cady Stanton, Miss Phoebe Couzins, Mrs. Croly (Jennie June), Mrs. N. P. Willis, and a number of others equally well known. – PW

But let us now inquire what grounds there are for accepting this mental and physical inferiority of women as something inherent in the nature of things. Is it really true that the larger part taken by the female in the work of reproduction necessarily impairs her strength, dwarfs her proportions, and renders her a physically inferior and dependent being? In most human races it may be admitted that women are less stalwart than men, although all the stories of Amazonian tribes are not mere fictions. It is also true, as has been insisted upon, that the males of most mammals and birds exceed the females in size and strength, and often differ from them greatly in appearance.

But this is by no means always the case. The fable of the hedgehog that won the race with the hare by cunningly stationing Mrs. Hedgehog at the other end of the course, instructed to claim the stakes, is founded upon an exception which has many parallels. Among birds there are cases in which the rule is reversed. There are some entire families, as for example the hawks, in which the females exceed the males. If we go further down the scale, however, we find this attribute of male superiority to disappear almost entirely throughout the reptiles and amphibians, with a decided leaning toward female supremacy; and in the fishes, where male rivalry does not exist, the female, as every fisherman knows, is almost invariably the heavier game.

But it is not until we go below the vertebrate series and contemplate the invertebrate and vegetable worlds that we really begin to find the data for a philosophical study of the meaning of sex. It has been frequently remarked that the laws governing the higher forms of life can be rightly comprehended only by an acquaintance with the lower and more formative types of being. In no problem is this more true than in that of sex.

In studying this problem it is found that there is a great world of life that wholly antedates the appearance of sex—the world of asexual life—nor is the passage from the sexless to the distinctly male and female definite and abrupt. Between them occur parthenogenesis or virgin reproduction, hermaphroditism, in which the male being consists simply of an organ, and parasitic males, of which we shall presently speak, while the other devices of nature for perpetuating life are innumerable and infinitely varied. But so far as sex can be predicated of these beings, they must all be regarded as female. The asexual parent must be contemplated as, to all intents and purposes, maternal. The parthenogenetic aphis or shrimp is in all essential respects a mother. The hermaphrodite creature, whatever else it may be, is also necessarily a female. Following these states come the numberless cases in which the female form continues to constitute the type of life, the insignificant male appearing to be a mere afterthought.

The vegetable kingdom, except in its very lowest stages, affords comparatively few pointed illustrations of this truth. The strange behavior of the hemp plant, in which, as has long been known, the female plants crowd out the male plants by overshadowing them as soon as they have been fertilized by the latter, used to be frequently commented upon as a perverse anomaly in nature. Now it is correctly interpreted as an expression of the general law that the primary purpose of the male sex is to enable the female, or type form, to reproduce, after performing which function the male form is useless and a mere cumberer of the ground. But the hemp plant is by no means alone in possessing this peculiarity.

I could enumerate several pretty well known species that have a somewhat similar habit. I will mention only one, the common cud-weed, or everlasting (Antennaria plantaginifolia), which, unlike the hemp, has colonies of males separate from the females, and these male plants are small and short-lived. Long after their flowering stalks have disappeared the female plants continue to grow, and they become large and thrifty herbs lasting until frost.

In the animal kingdom below the vertebrates female superiority is well-nigh universal. In the few cases where it does not occur it is generally found that the males combat each other, after the manner of the higher animals, for the possession of the females. The cases that I shall name are such as all are familiar with. The only new thing in their presentation is their application to the point at issue.

The superiority of the queen bee over the drone is only a well-known illustration of a condition which, with the usual variations and exceptions, is common to a great natural order of insects. The only mosquito that the unscientific world knows is the female mosquito. The male mosquito is a frail and harmless little creature that swarms with the females in the early season and passes away when his work is done.

There are many insects of which the males possess no organs of nutrition in the imago state, their duties during their ephemeral existence being confined to what the Germans call the Minnedienst.[1] Such is the life of many male moths and butterflies. But much greater inequalities are often found. I should, perhaps, apologize for citing the familiar case of spiders, in some species of which the miniature lover is often seized and devoured during his courtship by the gigantic object of his affections. Something similar, I learn, sometimes occurs with the mantis or “praying insect.”

Merely mentioning the extreme case of Sphaerularia, in which the female is several thousand times as large as the male, I may surely be permitted to introduce the barnacle, since it is one of the creatures upon which Prof. Brooks lays considerable stress in the article to which I have referred. Not being myself a zoologist, I am only too happy to quote him. He says:

> Among the barnacles there are a few species the males and females of which differ remarkably. The female is an ordinary barnacle, with all the peculiarities of the group fully developed, while the male is a small parasite upon the body of the female, and is so different from the female of its own species, and from all ordinary barnacles, that no one would ever recognize in the adult male any affinity whatever to its closest allies.

The barnacle, or cirripede, is the creature which Mr. Darwin so long studied, and from which he learned so many lessons leading up to his grand generalizations. In a letter to Sir Charles Lyell, dated September 14, 1849, he recounts some of his discoveries while engaged in this study. Having learned that most cirripedes, but not all, were hermaphrodite, he remarks:

> The other day I got a curious case of a unisexual instead of hermaphrodite cirripede, in which the female had the common cirripedial character, and in two valves of her shell had two little pockets in each of which she kept a little husband. I do not know of any other case where a female invariably has two husbands. I have one still odder fact, common to several species, namely, that though they are hermaphrodite, they have small additional, or, as I call them, complemental males. One specimen, itself hermaphrodite, had no less than seven of these complemental males attached to it.

Prof. Brooks brings forward facts of this class to demonstrate that the male is the variable sex, while the female is comparatively stable. However much we may doubt his further conclusion that variability rather than supplementary procreative power was the primary purpose of the separate male principle, we must, it would seem, concede that variability and adaptability are the distinguishing characteristics of the male sex everywhere, as the transmitting power and permanence of type are those of the female. But this is a very different thing from saying that the female sex is incapable of progress, or that man is destined to develop indefinitely, leaving woman constantly farther and farther in the rear. Does the class of philosophers to which reference has been made look forward to a time when woman shall become as insignificant an object compared to man as the male spider is compared to the female? This would be the logical outcome of their argument if based upon the relative variability of the male sex.

We have now seen that, whether we contemplate the higher animals, among which male superiority prevails, or the lower forms, among which female superiority prevails, the argument from biology that the existing relations between the sexes in the human race are precisely what nature intended them to be, that they ought not to be disturbed and cannot be improved, leads, when carried to its logical conclusion, to a palpable absurdity. But have we, then, profited nothing by the thoughtful contemplation of the subject from these two points of view?

Those who rightly interpret the facts cannot avoid learning a most important lesson from each of these lines of inquiry. From the first the truth comes clearly forth that the relations of the sexes among the higher animals are widely abnormal, warped, and strained by a long line of curious influences, chiefly psychic, which are incident to the development of animal organisms under the competitive principle that prevails throughout nature. From the second comes now into full view the still more important truth with which we first set out, that the female sex is primary in point both of origin and of importance in the history and economy of organic life. And as life is the highest product of nature and human life the highest type of life, it follows that the grandest fact in nature is woman.

But we have learned even more than this, that which is certainly of more practical value. We have learned how to carry forward the progress of development so far advanced by the unconscious agencies of nature. Accepting evolution as we must, recognizing heredity as the distinctive attribute of the female sex, it becomes clear that it must be from the steady advance of woman rather than from the uncertain fluctuations of man that the sure and solid progress of the future is to come. The attempt to move the whole race forward by elevating only the sex that represents the principle of instability, has long enough been tried. The many cases of superior men the sons of superior mothers, coupled with the many more cases of degenerate sons of superior sires, have taught us over and over again that the way to civilize the race is to civilize woman. And now, thanks to science, we see why this is so.

Woman is the unchanging trunk of the great genealogic tree; while man, with all his vaunted superiority, is but a branch, a grafted scion, as it were, whose acquired qualities die with the individual, while those of woman are handed on to futurity. Woman is the race, and the race can be raised up only as she is raised up. There is no fixed rule by which Nature has intended that one sex should excel the other, any more than there is any fixed point beyond which either cannot further develop. Nature has no intentions, and evolution has no limits. True science teaches that the elevation of woman is the only sure road to the evolution of man.

Reference

[1] Service of love.

The featured image is under Creative Commons Attribution-Share Alike 3.0 and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Hyper-hypergamy: Eveline Neal, the Super-Vamp with 43 husbands

August 14, 2024 | by Robert St. Estephe | Link | Original Link

---

Lonely hearts rackets have long been a favorite way for the woman without a conscience to get rich quick. But in the history of the practice of the lonely hearts scam — in all its manifold variety (including the category "female lonely hearts serial killer") — the case of Englishwoman Eveline Neal stands out. Eveline was truly a "vamps vamp." This Channel-crossing gold-digger had beaucoup de class, in sharp contrast to that much more famous lonely hearts racketeer from rural Indiana, USA, Belle Gunness, the husky farm woman who lured men by the scores (over twenty of them, with some estimates being much higher) with her "husband wanted" newspaper classified ads, got ahold of their cash or property and then drugged them before dispatching them with her handy farm axe. Although this charmed English adventuress — Eveline Neal — seems to have allowed each and every one of her victims to remain above ground following her thorough fleecing of same, she most certainly deserves to be known far and wide as one of the world's greats in her particular and highly sophisticated craft. The Neal story is an amazing one, and for the lesson it teaches — of the relentlessness of the hypergamy instinct in some females — it well deserves to be retold, and retold often.
***

FULL TEXT: London, March 29.— The story of the woman who married forty-three husbands, brief reference to which was made in yesterday's report, has no equal in the criminal annals of modern times. Eveline Neal is the child of a well-to-do farmer in Shropshire, the fertility of whose acres made it an easy matter to provide handsomely for his family, composed of one daughter and three sons. Eveline, like many others in the same position, being the pet of her father and brothers, and fairly good looking, soon learned to command, and grew up in the belief that mankind was created to do her homage and minister to her wishes. How early she started in her present career is not yet known, but, as she is still young, if not in the heyday of youth, it is supposed that she early entered the crooked paths in which she has since strayed. Eveline's methods were admirable in their simplicity.

Fearing that the sturdy common sense of the majority of her countrymen might not prove favorable to her schemes, she long since transferred herself and her belongings to French soil, finding in Paris, and the general practice of patronizing marriage bureaus and answering advertisements holding out attractive inducements to commit matrimony, a congenial atmosphere and much encouragement.

Behold her, then, located in the gay capital, if she could be said to have a location when the necessities of her trade compelled her to be as locomotive as a grasshopper and quite protean in her many disguises. Of course, a woman of Miss Neal's genius could not adhere slavishly to any particular method. She had many, but a favorite scheme, and one that won her much wealth, was the announcement in the journals that she was a widow, with a fortune varying in different advertisements from 200,000 to 1,000,000 francs, and desired to marry a gentleman in good circumstances belonging to "high life" if not to the nobility, or to the select circles of commerce.

Answers were directed to be sent addressed poste restante, where they were called for by an accomplice. The latter then selected such of the replies as madam was pleased with and made appointments for an interview, not with the English maiden, but only with her friend. At this meeting the accomplice, M. urges, passed the candidates in serious review, noting down carefully the physical characteristics of each, the amount of fortune, etc. In cases where this examination proved satisfactory the victim was invited to madame's sumptuous apartments in sight or the Rond Point in the Champs Elysees, or some equally attractive quarter of the city.

On every occasion the widow assumed a new name, but each time she told a pitiful tale of how she had been married against her will, and, while she would like to please herself on the present occasion, she still had a mother, her lather being dead, whose wishes she must consult, and who still deemed her, in spite of her previous matrimonial experience, "o'er young to marry yet." In short the applicant must wait. Then began the most profitable portion of the game, the courtship being made as expensive as possible for the suitor. Nothing but the most costly presents would placate the imperious beauty, and if they fell off in the slightest from her high standard of quality and quantity, the dream of the infatuated admirer was promptly ended. Nor was this done in any disagreeable manner. There was no scene, no reproaches, no tears.

Madame simply disappeared. The profusely bled victim sought her in her accustomed haunts, but the most diligent search failed to reveal her. It goes without saying that the presents, constituting the magnificent “Corbeille,” [A tradition in 19th century France, the corbeille de mariage was a gift basket given by the groom to the bride upon the signing of the wedding contract] were also missing. The precious stones, rich jewels, and other valuable booty were not only invisible to the donor, but he would have been compelled to take ship in order to see them again. They had been safely transferred to the madame’s snug little mansion in the suburbs of London, which was rich from garret to cellar with the proceeds of her Parisian industry.

But madame had yet another method. In cases where something more than the sedate joys of a French courtship were needed to induce the fiance to part with his means in sufficient abundance, Eveline kindly consented to an actual marriage, which piece of gracious condescension never failed to produce the desired effect. The “Make” and the church would be visited in due course, the wedding breakfast eaten, and the presents duly received and ticketed, but when the shades of night had fallen on the scene the groom, who mayhap had indulged too freely in Chambartin, would suddenly be rudely awakened to the knowledge that both bride and gifts had departed.

The French police declare on their honor that in 1881, when Eveline was brought to their official attention for the first time, she had been married in this peculiar way thirteen times, but that now she had increased the score to the extraordinary total of forty-three.

The cause of the present unsought publicity given to Eveline and her ways is her experience with a certain viscount, which led to her arrest at the Hotel Meurice yesterday. This gentleman had ruined himself by gambling and was naturally anxious to obtain more wealth wherewith to regild his tarnished escutcheon.

At first attracted by Eveline’s supposititious millions, he at length became really in love with the adventuress, and followed her and her companion with canine fidelity in their travels throughout England, Belgium and Norway, the expenses being paid by the nobleman, who borrowed right and left on notes of hand based on his expectations of marrying a wealthy widow. This, however, could not go on forever. The viscount insisted that the happy day should be named; Eveline, knowing that no more presents could be gained by an actual marriage, declined to do so, and her suitor laid his case before the police. Eveline was astonished at her arrest but is a woman of too many resources to be greatly cast down.

[“Married Many Men. – Extraordinary Matrimonial Career of a High-Spirited English Girl. – Eveline Neal Achieves Fame and Fortune by Wedding Gullible Frenchmen. – She Also Reaps a Heavy Benefit by Selling Nuptial Gifts. – Her Little List of Sorrowing Husbands Now Foots Up Forty-Three.” St. Paul Daily Globe (Mn.), Mar. 30, 1891, p. 1]

The Fable of the Fish

August 15, 2024 | by Papa Possum | Link | Original Link

Editorial note: you can hear Papa Possum read his verse here. –Ed

Some angry creatures gathered once with grievances in mind
On how they felt society conspired against their kind.
We'll call them "fish" since that themselves they once did call in claim,
Although it's certain that you know them by another name.

Inside a bowl, upon a shelf,
in a department store,
They reinforced their discontent,
and shunned outside rapport,
Renounced the Strengths they could have played,
chose pessimism's pull:
"Our bowl, it is half empty! Don't dare say it is half full!"

With anger they topped off their bowl, each echoed Marx's name.
Not one fish thought to look toward self,
but sought something to blame.
Each clenched right fin into a fist,
and thrust it toward the air,
Then swam in circles leftward…
never getting anywhere.

Across the aisle, in Games and Sports, were bicycles displayed.
Each built for action, work, or speed;
the fuming fish surveyed
And through their fish-eye view assumed each bike of dark ideals,
"All bikes were built for just one thing:
crush us beneath their wheels!"

The bikes were taken quite aback, sought to this fear relieve.
But the fish rallied, fist fins high, with "Swim left and believe!"
The fish bowl boiled over and splashed water everywhere

And when, at last, the rage died down, no bike was standing there.

The bikes had moved to aisle far from undeserv'ed rage,
Then lived their lives as each thought best;
the fish stayed in their cage.
So, here the story ends and if a moral's what you wish…
Then, "men need marxist feminists like bicycles need fish."

The Red Pill Raw Files – Are Women More Discriminated Against? – Karen Straughan

August 17, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 42 – Raygunning

August 18, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

25 men bullshitting about male privilege – part 1

August 19, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Good women (and why that's a red herring)

August 20, 2024 | by Anakin Niceguy | Link | Original Link

From time to time, some critics of the Manosphere like to point out that there "are good women out there." The implication of this statement is that somehow MGTOWers/MRAs/PUAs/whatever-you-call-yourself have collectively failed to recognize the ability of women to be selfless, moral, jolly good fellows, and all that. So, what do I say to that? Yes, there are good women out there. And your point is …. ?

There are good women out there just like there are good people who have the misfortune of living in very dangerous urban slums. Are you expecting me to walk in such areas at night and sing the theme tune to Mr. Roger's Neighborhood? Do you think many "good women," let alone other men such as myself, would do that?

The issue is not the existence of good women. The issue is that society reflects the aspirations of malicious women in law, politics, academia, business, media, modern religion, the dating scene, the home, etc. What are the "good women" doing in the mean time? No-o-o-o-thing.

Ok, I exaggerate there. I acknowledge the woman here and there who "gets it." But let's face it: Jane Q. Public does not seem to be all that bothered by what malicious women are allowed to do. Jane Q. Public does not seem to be all that bothered by the suffering men are experiencing on all levels due to said malicious women: political, economic, social, relational, emotional, mental, and physical. What "concern" is shown to men is often couched in cynical, utilitarian terms (how a given issue impacts women).

Here's another matter to consider: What does your definition of a "good woman" entail, anyway? A friendly female coworker may be outgoing with you, the life of the party, generous with her friends, and yet come home and treat her husband like dog feces. The nice girl next door who goes to church, who loves her parents, loves her brother, loves Jesus, who volunteers at the soup kitchen, may nonetheless feel it's perfectly within her right to slap a man hard in the face and yet expect him to doing nothing in return except stand there and apologize. In other words, the problem isn't necessarily women who are deliberately evil. Rather, it's "good women" who don't even have a clue how unjust and harmful their behavior is towards men.

I know a lot of "good women" in real life. I love 'em, but honestly, they need to smell the java and get a revelation.

So, when some bucko tells me there are "good women out there," I dismiss the fact as a red herring. When it comes to the problem of misandry, I couldn't give two flips of a raccoon's hindquarters on a hot August night with regard to talking about said women. Just as I won't walk in a high-crime neighborhood at night until some developers turn it all into a well-lit shopping complex with fountains, bistros, and a truckload of security guards, I won't be singing paeans too loudly to "good women" just yet. Not until a critical mass of these "good women" say "enough of this garbage" and demonstrate they really do genuinely care about men. I want to see these so-called “good women” shout down malicious women, not honorable men.

I don’t even debate “NAWALT.” It’s not even on my game table. The Collective Sisterhood of NAWALT has their work cut for them. To quote a famous character in the Star Wars trilogy, “Asteroids do not concern me, Admiral. I want that ship.”

The delusion of glory

August 21, 2024 | by Zeta Male | Link | Original Link

From a young age boys are taught to persevere and to win. Boys are told stories with a message you should fight against all odds and attempt to gain the glory you desire. Stories of fantastic knights (often also upholding the valiant code of chivalry) who slay dragons sit in the minds of youth.

Gladiators and conquerors who reign supreme as they fight for what all that is right in the world and defending the people in the local village. Rock stars and champion athletes hold the attention of the world as people scream their names in excitement. These are who we are shown to look up to.

No child is without a glorious hero whose name will go down in legend, and almost every child dreams of being the person who would fight for such things no matter what the cost.

When a young boy is on the verge of collapsing, he is told to hold it in, endure the pain and keep going. The cheerleaders keep on screaming his name, despite his injury. The princess is waiting behind the beasts, as you fight for freedom and justice to save the world around you. That is what victory gets you! Fame! Glory! Power! The love of the people! You are a hero in their eyes and will live on as a god amongst men.

Of course from the knight in shining armor, to the football star, to the brave soldier we also see a sad story in the background. The thousandth knight to face the dragon, the last hope of the football team, and the mighty soldier who saves the day also share something else in common. They are the last to take the challenge. They aren't as special as much special, as they are the next in line to go against impossible odds. If they fail then someone else will come forth to take their place. Whether it be a pompous fool to fight the beast, the next season's quarterback, or the infantry reserves-they aren't the only hope that theyt have been made out to be.

No, in reality they are simply tools. Tools of society. And while that may not seem different than the roles of many others on the surface great heroes put their life at risk, lose everything and destroy them in the process. And if you are destroyed, you are just another tally on the list. And if you fail, then there is more glory offered. The glory of the hero is based on how many people failed before them, the more who fail, the more love there is to maintain. So much for glory.

So how does society get people to seek the glory? Glory is then associated with love. After growing up with countless tales of heroics and the love that comes with glory, you know not unconditional love, but love with a set of requirements. If you do not risk sacrificing yourself, how can you truly be loved? According the whimsical worlds imaginations are filled with, if there is no sacrifice, there is no chance of love.

Men can't simply have love, men have to win it. By being forced to win love, the masses use love as the bait for the servitude of men. Love will lure the fools towards ideas of glory, leading many to an early, unnecessary demise.

Love is glory, and glory is love by merging them together, men have learned to sacrifice themselves. There is no shrine, no parade, no ceremony for those who succeed without risking self destruction. There are no legends of those who protect without risk. Worst of all, there is no love. Without any sacrifice, there is nothing that can be obtained.

As our heroes bask in glory, they forget the dragon they stand upon covers a thousand corpses. That is the sad reality. The hero did what no one else could, but if he couldn't they would have found someone else, snaring them in with the promise of love. That is the dark truth behind glory.

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference – 31 August 2024 – Sydney, Australia

August 21, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mothers of Sons and Bettina Arndt are holding an important a one-day conference in Sydney Australia. The Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference is being held on 31 August 2024.

Speakers include Augusto Zimmermann and Bettina Arndt, who have both spoken previously at ICMI17, and Damien Coory who hosts the popular vlog The Other Side.

Tickets can be purchased here.

Here’s what happened to Esther Vilar after she angered feminists

August 23, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

When Esther Vilar published her book The Manipulated Man she was beaten up by four young women in the toilet of the Munich State Library who were angry about her perspectives.[1]

According to her own statement, her emigration from Germany goes back to this. The following account detailing her ongoing experience of violence by feminists was published in the San Rafael Daily Independent Journal Newspaper in 1973.[2]

[1] Esther Vilar: “Liebe macht unfrei”, Die Weltwoche, Ausgabe 51/2007

[2] San Rafael Daily Independent Journal Newspaper Archives January 08, 1973 Page 42.

What is feminism?

August 24, 2024 | by Adam Kostakis | Link | Original Link

There are countless definitions of what 'feminism' is, with feminists themselves pointing to glib dictionary definitions, and antifeminists preferring to define it as a female supremacy movement. A hundred other definitions could easily be offered, but the more important question is what (if anything) do all these different definitions hold in common?

Below, Adam Kostakis answers this question in the affirmative with an elegant definition that most would agree with. – PW

Even essentially contested concepts, as W. B. Gallie referred to them, must have meanings which are greater than normative, else communication about them would be rendered impossible. That is – there must be some amount of general consensus over what feminism is, between feminists and anti-feminists, or we would not be able to argue about it! Even despite the differences between a feminist's view of feminism and of our own, some shared content must exist at some level, or we would be talking about entirely different things. They might be talking about the feminist movement, while I am talking about horse-rearing, although we both refer to our respective subjects as 'feminism' – but we wouldn't have much to say to each other, would we, if this were the case?

So, I shall posit the following as a universally applicable definition of feminism; that is to say, it must fit everyone's criteria for what feminism is, in spite of the different perspectives that different people hold on its nature. It is a suitably limited definition, since it can encompass only those parts of feminism which all definitions hold in common. So, here it is: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

That, then, is what everybody who discusses feminism holds in common regarding the concept, whether they are supportive, skeptical, or nihilistically indifferent. No feminist, I think, would deny that this is, at the very least, the 'bare bones' of feminism, even if she would prefer to flesh it out in a lot more detail. But that will not do, for beyond this narrow inference, we disagree with each other. To be as objective as possible, then, we must take only that which everybody agrees upon, and that is our universally applicable definition.

Note that there is no mention of equality. This is because there are a number of feminists who explicitly did not pursue equality, but supremacy. So, equality cannot fit into the universal definition of feminism, since certain feminists themselves – who were very famously, unequivocally feminist – disavowed it. To say that feminism is 'about equality', then, would be to place oneself in diametrical opposition to several extremely influential feminists! And why, that would be … misogynistic!

Nor can feminism be said to be the project for increasing the power of women relative to men, since, in this counter-feminist's view, feminists are often quite content to increase the power of women in an absolute sense. That is, they endeavor to grab all they can for women, without reference to the status of men. The phrase 'relative to men,' then, only serves to imply that women are power-less relative to men at present, thus casting feminism in an unfairly favorable light. In reality, once women do achieve power which is at an equal or equivalent level to that of men, the demands of feminists do not stop. What we find is that female power becomes entrenched, and extended, and when it surpasses male power, this is simply referred to as 'parity' and ignored by feminists – at least, when they are not gloating over men's newfound powerlessness.

Nor are we able to list, in our universal definition, the specific areas of life, or spheres, in which the feminist project applies. This is because feminism is inherently universalizing; it seeks to colonize and dominate every single facet of life where men and women meet. It aims for domination in every sphere of life, actual and potential.

You may disagree with some of the points above, particularly if you are supportive of feminism. But this does nothing to change our universal definition, because all we can say about those points is that they are contentious. That is, feminists and non-feminists, who are educated about feminism, disagree about these aspects of feminism, and it would simply be biased to take one or the other view for granted. That would be like consulting only Jacobins on the historical accomplishments of the Jacobin Club, or like canvassing only conservatives to explain modern liberalism. It would be a good example of poor methodology, and would help us very little in our search for truth. Right? So then, our universally applicable definition cannot be expanded beyond that which we stated before: feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Source: The above excerpt is from Adam Kostakis' essay Pig Latin.

The Truth About Australia's "Domestic Violence Crisis"

August 25, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Truth About the Rachael Gunn Scandal

August 27, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Ben Hart is the world's oldest actively competing break dancer. He's recently also received negative publicity as a result of his daughter Madi attacking him publicly.

Here he talks about Rachael Gunn's Olympic performance with an expert eye. Well worth watching through for anyone interested in this saga. We do feel, however, that he doesn't lay enough responsibility at the feet of Raygun herself.

The cover image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and depicts the Eiffel Tower.

An alternative to Paper Abortion

August 28, 2024 | by Hopeland Cash | Link | Original Link

Paper Abortion refers to the concept of men (being non-fetus-carriers) having a legal equivalent to an abortion. Now, no actual abortion is involved; whoever may be carrying the baby, a Paper Abortion does not terminate the fetus. What is done is a termination of paternal rights and responsibilities. As far as the father of the child is concerned, the child is/was/will never be born, so he has no claim to be with it and cannot be called on to support it.

Just as if it had actually been terminated. He is, in effect, not a father.

Paper Abortion is not a popular idea. Many feminists argue that the discussion shouldn't even be held, but, unfortunately for them, we live in a nation believing in free speech, so the discussion has been and is being held. Do men deserve equal reproductive rights? Should fatherhood be able to be forced on a man where motherhood wouldn't be on his female counterpart? If not, how exactly do we fairly enact paper abortion so it won't be exploited by genuine deadbeats?

All valid questions rising from a valid concern. In the modern age of All Inclusive Equality, any imbalance between differing groups should be at least addressed. The imbalance here is clear: after conception, a woman has the option of abortion to terminate the pregnancy, preventing herself from becoming a mother. Men have no such option. Once they have sired a child, as long as it is carried to term, he has no legal means to not become a father. He can and likely will be forced to support the child, even if he never wanted to be a father.

By any reasonable definition that is an inequality.

So, given the assumption that women have greater reproductive autonomy (I'm sure there will be comments refuting that, but given…), how can the prenatal parental playing field be leveled?

Paper Abortion is one option, but, as I said already, it is unpopular. So, in the name of fairness and justice, I propose an alternative, a way to equalize men and women's parental rights without encouraging deadbeat dads.

Instead, let's create more deadbeat moms!

No, seriously.

I'll break it down: Society doesn't like to give men (as a group) more rights. Never has. Makes it harder to keep the workforce in check. Feminists say it's an attack on women. Giving men something in line with abortions would increase their reproductive rights, which is seen as a threat to women's rights. So Paper Abortions are out; no additional rights for men.

Society also doesn't like to take rights away from women (as a group) (at least not any more; history is a fucked-up place). As feminism has marched on over the last century and into its fourth wave, whatever has been gained has not been likely to be given up.

The point being, there's no taking abortion away from women. For legal, moral, medical and practical reasons, it's not happening.

So, no giving rights to men, and no taking them away from women.

What can we do?

Well, rights tend to be balanced by responsibilities. Every child learns that growing into adulthood brings more rights and privileges, but also duties and requirements. So, if women have more reproductive rights than men, but we can't actually change the distribution of rights, we should change the distribution of the corresponding responsibilities.

Let women have access to abortions. They can save women's lives. Men do not carry children, so they have no need for the procedure, no need for a equivalent. It is a biological difference, so let women have at it.

What needs to be equalized is the legal burden placed on parents. If we're going to accept women having abortions, we have to realize that they won't only have them for medical reasons; women do and will have abortions to terminate an unwanted pregnancy.

Let them. Women shouldn't have to carry an unwanted child. That is cruel to mother and child.

However, getting out of pregnancy need not be the same as getting out of parenthood.

Men can't, after all. Once his sperm is loose, if it conceives a child, he is its father and there is nothing he can do. He is responsible for it. Period.

Let the same be done for (to) women. Don't make them carry through an unwanted pregnancy, but enforce the parental responsibilities they have inferred. Once a person, man or woman, has conceived a child, they are responsible for it. Even if a woman has an abortion, she has still conceived, which means she is a mother.

How, you ask, can a woman still be a mother after an abortion?

Simple: adoption. Any time a woman has an abortion, she should be required to subsequently adopt a child. The father of the aborted fetus will be made the legal father, and she the legal mother. They are both responsible for it, must pay for it, care for it, must raise it as if it were their own. The woman does not have to go through the rigors of pregnancy, but she still must face the responsibilities she has taken upon herself by conceiving a child. She becomes a mother whether or not she has an abortion.

Equality is as simple as that. Abortions all around, for whatever reason, but evenly enforced parental responsibilities via adoption. If you conceive a child, you have to care for a child (even if it isn't genetically your own. But don't worry, it'll probably come to identify as your child, so same diff). There are a huge number of children in need of adoption in America alone, and this would help relieve their pain by giving them parents.

Women would then be on the same footing as men, knowing that if they conceive a child they will become a parent, albeit adoptive, even if they didn't want to. There won't be the backdoor any longer of hoping your (female) partner will have an abortion and free you both from parental responsibility, but at least it will be evenly cruel and unfair. Women can still have abortions for medical reasons, but that won't get them out of being a parent, just as men have no way to terminate their parental responsibilities. If a child is conceived, both parties are on the hook, no exceptions. The mother will still be the one to decide if they're on the hook for their own child or an adopted one, but there will be a child in their lives, his and hers.

If she didn't want to be a mother, she should've kept it out of her pants.

Editorial note: Given how stupid and dishonest some of our critics are, we feel it necessary to point out that this article is ironic and satirical and meant to force people to think what they're really saying when they say "if he didn't want to be a father he should have kept it in his pants." That we even have to say so explicitly is a sign of the times we live in. Adopt a child whether you want to or not! –Ed

Radical Feminism is not the “Fringe” of Feminism!

August 29, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

Radical feminism is feminism’s rotten core and the source of feminism’s life. Without radical feminism, feminism at large would amount to little and scatter to the four winds.

That is the whole truth and nothing other. However, it is a truth that plenty of people won’t square up to. It is quite fashionable nowadays, especially in the wake of the Agent Orange scandal, to brush aside radical feminism as outdated and popularly disregarded. When people do this, they are trying to change the subject and reassert control of the conversation so as to remove the feminist project, at large, from the critical spotlight.

Radical feminism – by which I mean chiefly the man-hating kind – is a standard which sets the measure for feminism as a whole. All brands of feminism are either more or less relevant depending on how closely they approximate radical feminism.

Radical feminism is 100 proof, and a radical feminist takes her feminism neat. Others take theirs watered down – but it’s all the same drink.

People love to tell you that the radfems are “just fringe extremists” – as if we were standing in a field and the radfems were some tight little cluster, cut off in their own world on the perimeter. What the speaker fails to consider is that all feminism is on a continuum whose unifying principle is disaffection toward men and things male. That’s all it is, and if you study feminism objectively you can form no other conclusion.

There is no break, no gap, no discontinuity, between radical feminism and the rest of feminism. It is a moral plenum, fully packed. For every foul man-hater, there is a slightly less foul man-hater, then a slightly less foul one than that . . . and down the line it goes, shade by shade. For example, Amanda Marcotte is only half as bad as Mary Daly – but comparatively speaking, that’s still pretty damned bad! So is Mary Daly unacceptable while Amanda gets a pass? Where should we set the cutoff?

If we were to address the radical man-hating gangrene as a serious issue, we would morally amputate the phenomenon. But in order for THAT to happen, we would need to establish a moral threshhold, to effectively quantify how much systemic man-hating we can theoretically “live with”.

Anything above the cutoff might be denounced and ostracized, but there would still be a boundary of acceptability – and that is just the problem. The stench of misandry wouldn’t be quite so overpowering any more, but it would still be present, and permanent, and tolerated. And it would still taint feminism as a whole.

Eventually, we might feel obligated to repeat the whole process; to hack off more of the rotten end and set the cap a little lower. If we were moved to do this time and again, there would soon be precious little of feminism remaining.

That ought to teach us that the apologists and deflectionists are right: we oughtn’t be so fixated on the extremists. The rot extends clear through the feminist organism to some degree, and examples closer to home (of casual misandry or mere perverse ignorance) are never lacking. Every chance we get, we should point out the pervasive anti-male bias – be this subtle or brazen.

Anti-male bias – whether in the form of hating men, or looking the other way when evidence of man-hating crops up, or simply the prevalence of double standards which favor women – is recognizable as the core principle which makes feminism feminism. This principle, more than anything, binds the feminist project together, moves it forward, and explains the complex reality of its evolvement through time.

The feminist project seeks to expand the power of women with no limit, and anything like ethical regard for men and maleness would impose a formidable barrier to such expansion. Remove that ethical regard, and the frontier is wide open. Hence, so far as the feminist project is concerned, ethical regard for men and maleness has got to go – and what better why to shuck off ethical regard for anything, than to HATE it?

Since the world always contains X number of women who hate men. . .and even MEN who hate men, feminism's inner cadre always has a sufficient recruitment pool. Hate is a tremendous motivator, and we can hardly account for feminism's vitality on the theory that the real movers-and-shakers are only mildly annoyed with men.

In the end, if feminism did not harbor a kind of moral black hole of infinite disaffection toward men and maleness, it would quickly reach the limit of its possible development. . . . and begin to dissipate.

So once again, radical feminism – to wit, the man-hating kind – is the CORE of feminism. By contrast, it is the liberals, the moderates, the humanists, and the "fun" feminists who make up the fluffy fringe on feminism's perimeter. They are the useful idiots who serve mainly as camouflage and as ideological pack mules.

Those who say that radical feminism is marginal to feminism at large, are lying – either to you, or to themselves.

“Men SHOULD Be Frightened!” – Ava Santina

August 30, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

A Prayer for Joe Bob

August 31, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Who Lost America?: Ex-Child Support Agent’s conversation with Dr. Stephen Baskerville

September 2, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 43 – The Red Episode

September 3, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Restoring the Presumption of Innocence Conference

September 4, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Aeneid and the horrors of a blue pill existence

September 5, 2024 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

Virgil's epic poem the Aeneid tells the story of Aeneas and his people, the Trojans, as they flee from their destroyed home of Troy (the Trojan War is recounted in Homer's Iliad) and venture to Italy to build a new home; the descendants of Aeneas himself (Romulus and Remus) are destined to become the founders of Rome. The first half of the poem recounts the Trojans' journey to Italy, while the second half recounts the war that breaks out between the Trojans and the Italians, a war kicked off thanks to petty divine intervention by Juno, wife of Jupiter and queen of the gods.

The character arc of Aeneas – the protagonist of the poem who is, "famous for his piety," (page 3) – provides an arguably excellent example of what occurs as a result of living a blue pill life as a man. We should begin by noting the importance of Aeneas', "piety," as it is his defining characteristic and one of the four virtues inscribed on the shield of Augustus (the first Roman emperor and the one during whose reign Virgil wrote the poem); the Latin term for this is pietas, which refers not only to religious devotion, but also to loyalty to one's family and one's compatriots and thus selflessness.

The enforced adherence to pietas occurs in a manner that is reminiscent of the blue pill existence by demanding numerous sacrifices from Aeneas in the service of a seemingly noble yet distant and nebulous ideal. In Book II of the Aeneid, Aeneas tells the story of the fall of Troy, which resulted in the death of his wife, Creusa. While Aeneas is running through the burning city, trying to find her – he lost track of her while initially escaping – he encounters her ghost, who tells him that her death would not have happened, "without the approval of the gods," (as a ghost, she has been to the underworld and can thus see the future) also instructing him to wipe, “away the tears you are shedding for Creusa whom you loved,” (page 47) because they will change nothing. Aeneas notes that he was left, “there in tears and longing to reply,” to her and yet was unable to do so.

The loss of Creusa is arguably the first major sacrifice demanded by the gods – specifically, as Creusa notes, it is the, “Great Mother of the Gods,” (page 47) referring to Juno – from Aeneas, and yet it is a sacrifice made without consent (it occurs because destiny has it that Aeneas will marry another woman named Lavinia, with whom he will give birth to the ancestors of Romulus and Remus). Aeneas is simply forced to accept this tragedy, and its justification is that it serves a higher purpose; even though Aeneas is committed to serving said higher purpose, the death of his wife still takes an understandable toll on him.

The second major sacrifice demanded of him is the severing of his relationship with Dido, the queen of Carthage, in Book IV. Aeneas and Dido fall in love after the Trojans land in Carthage – and have sex for the first time thanks to cynical divine intervention from Juno – but Jupiter (king of the gods) sends his messenger Mercury down to order Aeneas to leave Dido and resume his journey to Italy.

Jupiter questions – in an arguably paternalistic fashion, as if he knows what is better for Aeneas than Aeneas himself – whether, “the glory of such a destiny [becoming a venerated figure in Roman legend] does not fire his heart.” (page 76) When Dido eventually catches Aeneas trying to leave Carthage secretly, Aeneas makes this juxtaposition between what he desires and what the gods demand of him explicit when he states that, “It is not by my own will that I search for Italy.” (page 79) West, the translator, points out in the introduction that the, “weakness and misery,” that Aeneas shows upon being confronted by Dido are signs of, “Virgil’s human understanding,” (page xix) and a contribution to the contrast between the humanity of those on the ground and the wilful apathy of those above.

It is arguably the case that blue pill men live a life characterised by an internal conflict between what they consider to be their duty to the blue pill world around them and the women in their lives on one side, and their own personal desires on the other. Such a life involves the subjugation of the latter to the former in the name of being a ‘good man‘ or a ‘male ally’, ideals of masculinity which we red pill men know are meaningless. The one distinction I would draw between the average blue pill man and Aeneas, however, is that this process involves more consent from the blue pill man than it does from Aeneas; such men must fully submit to the loss of their individuality and make the necessary sacrifices to do so, while Aeneas genuinely has far less control over this process.

We must also analyse the conclusion of the Aeneid to get a picture of the final destination to which blue pill thinking inevitably leads men. In the final lines of Book XII, Aeneas slays Turnus, prince of the Rutulians (one of the Italian tribes that are at war with the Trojans), the justification for which has been debated by many scholars. The killing of Turnus is certainly at odds with pietas (it has nothing to do with devotion to either the gods or anybody), and it goes directly against another one of the aforementioned four virtues – clementia, which means ‘mercy’ (it’s where we get the word ‘clemency’ from). By the time that Aeneas kills him, Turnus is lying on the ground and begging for mercy, after Aeneas’ spear strikes him in, “the middle of the thigh,” (page 290) and cripples him; Turnus also has his strength sapped from his body thanks to divine intervention from Jupiter, ensuring that he had no chance of winning the duel.

Aeneas slays Turnus

Virgil applies the adjective furiis to Aeneas’ emotional state as he is about to kill Turnus, an adjective that is related to the Latin term furor, which can mean ‘frenzy’ or ‘rage’ or ‘madness’. Furor is significant in that it is depicted as being the opposite of pietas, Aeneas’ defining characteristic; furor connotes letting one’s emotions control one’s actions (instead of one’s devotion to the gods or to others) and being excessively (or, as the Romans would argue, immorally) selfish, being at odds with the selflessness associated with pietas. Aeneas adopting the characteristic of furor is like Jesus succumbing to the temptations of Satan, or Michael Kimmel starting to respect men; it’s completely against his nature. So why does he do it?

My argument as to why Aeneas disregards the ethical code outlined on the shield of Augustus is because he sees no value in adhering to it by the end of the poem. Fulfilling his destiny is a task that has involved many sacrifices for him – namely the deaths of Creusa, Dido, his father Anchises (Book III), and the loyal son Pallas of his ally King Evander (Book X), all losses over which Aeneas grieves humanely – and yet Aeneas has not been justly compensated for these sacrifices, as his understandable human troubles have been ignored and only viewed as obstacles by Jupiter to the accomplishment of this goal. The promise of glory does not fully satisfy Aeneas – this is the type of promise, by the way, that contributes to the male disposability that characterises wars – and it is entirely understandable as to why.

The killing of Turnus lacks a clear moral justification because Aeneas does not believe that one is necessary when those who have been forcing him to abide by that code evidently do not care at all for his wellbeing. This killing is like the existential implosion of a man who has just realised the shallowness of his own value structure, carried out with a nihilistic and Cain-esque fury reminiscent of men who murder their wives over unjust divorces. It is no wonder that such is the case, given that the structure of the idea of fate/destiny – where there is a predetermined end at which one will arrive, by whatever means necessary – resembles that of a lie (because when you lie, you choose an end ahead of time at which you want to arrive, and manipulate everyone and everything around you as much as is necessary to get there).

By the end of the poem, Aeneas has little to nothing of value to call his own, and so he curses Jupiter and destiny – or, in other words, the world around him – for stealing from him what he once loved, and the loss of faith in the proposition that existence is worthwhile is almost always accompanied by undeserved and futile (in the sense that existence can never be destroyed by acts of revenge committed against it) death.

The core lesson that we red pill men can learn from the Aeneid, brilliantly written as it was by Virgil, is that the subjugation of our will to external moral obligations that society expects us to adopt unquestioningly only contributes to the, "modern genocide on the male soul," that Paul Elam describes in his video 'Servant, Slave and Scapegoat' as being mercilessly conducted by the blue pill world. No matter what the dictates of those whom men perceive to be their gods may be, you must understand that your will is your own and that it can only be broken with your consent.

Note: All page references to the Aeneid are to the Penguin Classics edition, translated by David West.

Snow White Sued For Anti-Male Sexism As Disney Implode

September 6, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Australian men are getting screwed

September 8, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

A short video in which Bettina Arndt gets straight to the point.

Propertius & Prudentius show gender allocation of credit and blame

September 9, 2024 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

To demonstrate romantic sensibility and gain warm acclaim, a successful man often proclaims that he owes all his success to his wife. Under the common law of coverture, a husband is responsible for all the crimes his wife commits. Such examples aren't unusual. Crediting women while blaming men underpins the modern idea of gender equality. Propertius and Prudentius attest to that also being a classical practice.

In first century BGC Rome, the poet Propertius became famous for writing in the tradition of Gallus's love elegy. The Oxford World's Classics paperback edition of Propertius's poems in English translation, published in 2009, declares on its book-back blurb:

> Of all the great classical love poets, Propertius (c. 50-10 BC) is surely one of those with most immediate appeal for readers today. His helpless infatuation for the sinister figure of his mistress Cynthia forms the main subject of his poetry and is analyzed with a tormented but witty grandeur in all its changing moods, from ecstasy to suicidal despair. [1]

Propertius's poems have immediate appeal to many readers today for their appalling celebration of men's abasement to women. More men die from suicide than from homicide. Four times more men than women commit suicide. To make men's lives matter, by far the most important policy would be to reduce the power of sinister women over men. Instead, women and men delight in reading about Propertius's infatuation with the sinister figure of Cynthia.

Like many successful men today, Propertius credited his mistress Cynthia for all his poetic success. She is the source of his poetry. She makes him a genius:

> You ask, how do I write so many songs of love, > how my soft book comes forth, the talk of all.
> Not Calliope nor Apollo sings me this;
> my girl herself makes me a genius.
> If I see her go forth in shining Coan silk, > from that silk gown a scroll of verse comes;
> or if I see her tresses roam loose along her brow,
> she goes rejoicing, famous for her hair;
> or if her ivory fingers strike songs forth on the lyre,
> I marvel how her skilled hands press the strings; > or when she droops her drowsy eyes that yearn for sleep,
> I find a thousand new themes for my poems;
> or if she throws her gown off to wrestle with me nude, > ah, then, then I compose whole Iliads!

> Whatever she has done, whatever she has said, > great legends spring from nowhere into being.
>
> { Quaeritis, unde mihi totiens scribantur amores, > unde meus veniat mollis in ore liber.
> non haec Calliope, non haec mihi cantat Apollo.
> ingenium nobis ipsa puella facit.
> sive illam Cois fulgentem incedere vidi, > totum de Coa veste volumen erit;
> seu vidi ad frontem sparsos errare capillos, > gaudet laudatis ire superba comis;
> sive lyrae carmen digitis percussit eburnis, > miramur, facilis ut premat arte manus;
> seu compescentis somnum declinat ocellos, > invenio causas mille poeta novas;
> seu nuda erepto mecum luctatur amictu, > tum vero longas condimus Iliadas;
> seu quidquid fecit sivest quodcumque locuta, > maxima de nihilo nascitur historia. }[2]

Propertius imagined the Muses placing Cynthia in front of their dancing. Then they would give to Propertius poetic laurels. He understood Cynthia's eminent place, "for without you my genius has no recognized value {nam sine te nostrum non valet ingenium}."[3] In our age of individuality and intense concern for gender equity, how can such a fanciful gender allocation of credit be supported?

Although Cynthia is said to have created all of Propertius's love poetry, women allegedly lack agency with respect to wrong-doing. The poet Prudentius, writing about 400 GC, underscored the importance of recognizing agency:

> So did the horse, iron, bull, lion, rope, or olive > have criminal power within them when formed?
> The cause in madness by which man is killed isn't iron, > but the human hand, nor is a horse the creator of the frenzied insanity > of the circus, its folly and wild applause.
> That's mob mentality, destitute of reason, not the horses' course, > that rages on. Shameful passion ruins a useful gift.
>
> { numquid equus, ferrum, taurus, leo, funis, olivum > in se vim sceleris, cum formarentur, habebant?
> quod iugulatur homo, non ferrum causa furoris > sed manus est; nec equum vesania fervida circi > auctorem levitatis habet rabidive fragoris:
> mens vulgi rationis inops, non cursus equorum > perfurit: infami studio perit utile donum. }[4]

God made Adam with freedom of choice. Adam didn't have to be a slave to God or a slave to women:

> "Go forth," says the very parent, the maker and creator of Adam,
> "Go forth, human, ennobled above all through my mouth's breath, > not a slave, powerful, ruler of things, ruler also > and judge of your own mind. Subject yourself to me only > by your free will, so that your subjection will be itself a liberty > in your free judgement. I don't force or constrain you by my might, > but remind you to flee injustice and pursue justice.
> Light is companion of the just; the wicked's companion is horrid death.
> Choose the way of life. Virtue shall conduct you through the ages; > your fault in turn will condemn you for eternity.
> With freedom granted, choose between these alternate fates."
>
> { "vade," ait ipse parens opifexque et conditor Adae,
> "vade, homo, adflatu nostri praenobilis oris, > insubiecte, potens, rerum arbiter, arbiter idem > et iudex mentis propriae, mihi subdere soli > sponte tua, quo sit subiectio et ipsa soluto > libera iudicio, non cogo nec exigo per vim, > sed moneo iniustum fugias iustumque sequaris.
> lux comes est iusti, comes est mors horrida iniqui, > elige rem vitae; tua virtus temet in aevum > provehat, aeternum damnet tua culpa vicissim, > praestet et alterutram permissa licentia sortem." }[5]

With his own freedom and faulty choice, Adam fell. Eve, so blameless that she isn't even named, bore no guilt for Adam's fall:

> By this kindness and so abundant gift, Adam is a wanderer.
> He then transgresses established law, and with foresight > and volition chooses lethal ways, while believing more useful to himself > what, against God's prohibiting, the clever serpent persuaded, > persuaded certainly by exhortations, not compelled by harsh > command. Accused of this criminal act, the woman > responded to God that, herself enticed by evil artifice, > she persuaded her man. Her man himself then freely > consented. Could he not have spurned her exhortations with the freedom > of his upright soul? He could have. For surely God earlier > urged him to follow the better way willingly, but he, > spurning counsel, believed more the savage enemy.
>
> { hac pietate vagus et tanto munere abundans, > transit propositum fas et letalia prudens > eligit atque volens, magis utile dum sibi credit > quod prohibente Deo persuasit callidus anguis, > persuasit certe hortatu, non inpulit acri > imperio; hoc mulier rea criminis exprobranti > respondit Domino, suadelis se malefabris > inlectam suasisse viro; vir et ipse libenter > consensit, licuitne hortantem spernere recti > libertate animi? licuit; namque et Deus ante > suaserat ut meliora volens sequeretur; at ille > spernens consilium saevo plus credidit hosti. }[6]

In theory, Adam could have chosen to do other than what Eve urged. Most men with wives or girlfriends understand that such a choice isn't feasible in practice. Systemic gynocentrism is real. Under U.S. tax law, 90% of the "innocent spouses" granted tax relief for illegal joint marital tax filings are wives.[7] With remarkable foresight into social development, Prudentius assigned Adam all the blame for his fall.

> Cynthia made you a poet, lustful Propertius.
> Gallus's genius was lovely Lycoris.
> Beautiful Nemesis is the fame of witty Tibullus.
> Lesbia dictated to you, learned Catullus.
>
> { Cynthia te vatem fecit, lascive Properti; > ingenium Galli pulchra Lycoris erat;
> fama est arguti Nemesis formosa Tibulli;
> Lesbia dictavit, docte Catulle, tibi }[8]

Leading authorities work assiduously today to promote gender equality for women. Promoting "gender equality for women" isn't the same as promoting gender equality. Promoting gender equality for women actually means crediting women for more and blaming men for more. That's classical practice, now enhanced by the modern propaganda apparatus and the ideological zeal of rabidly monomaniac post-modernists. Men living within the Roman colonial legacy should seek a divorce from the Sabine women.

Notes:

[1] Lee (2009), from back cover.

[2] Propertius, Elegies 2.1.1-16, Latin text from Goold (1990), English translation (with my small changes) from Corelis (1995). A. S. Kline offers all of Propertius's poems in English prose translation in a web-native presentation.

One can find many similar claims throughout literary history. The man trobairitz Peire Vidal in twelfth-century southern France sung of his lady-love:

> If I know how to speak or act
> I owe her thanks, for she gave me > wisdom and understanding.

> My heart fills with joy and song;
> any good I ever do > comes from her beauty, her charm, > even when I lose myself in dreams.
>
> { E s'ieu sai ren dir ni faire,
> Ilh n'aia.l grat, que sciensa
> M'a donat e conoissensa,
> Per qu'ieu sui gais e chantaire.
> E tot quan fauc d'avinen
> Ai del sieu bell cors plazen,
> Neis quan de bon cor consire. }

Peire Vidal, "I breathe in the air {Ab l'alen tir vas me l'aire}" st. 4, Old Occitan text from Anglade (1913) p. 61 (song 19), English translation from Paden & Paden (2007) p. 133 (song 59). Alternate English translation and a musical performance of "Ab l'alen tir vas me l'aire" by the Camerata Mediterranea (Joel Cohen, director) from their album Lo Gai Saber: Troubadour and Minstrels 1100-1300, issued in 1990.

Medieval literature of men's sexed protest recognized gender injustice in the allocation of credit and blame. One such medieval work protested:

> When business prospers, wives maintain > that they take credit for the gain.
> If hardship strikes, they're quick to stress > their husband's blame for their distress.
>
> { Cum res coniugibus succedunt prospere,
> Uxores asserunt se totum facere;
> Si fiunt pauperes volunt arguere
> Quod propter homines sunt ipse misere. }

About not getting married {De coniuge non ducenda} P5, Latin text and English translation from Rigg (1986) pp. 64-5.

[3] Propertius, Elegies 2.30A.40, Latin text from Goold (1990), my English translation. Cf. 2.1.4.

[4] Prudentius, The Origin of Sin {Hamartigenia} vv. 358-64, Latin text from Thomson (1949) p. 228, my English translation, benefiting from that of id. and Malamud (2011) p. 21. These verses provide an early instance of the influential argument, "guns don't kill people, people kill people." Subsequent quotes from Hamartigenia are similarly sourced.

A proposed reform of U.S. tax law defining "innocent spouse" tax relief similarly emphasizes agency:

> the existing innocent spouse relief regime should be replaced with one that respects joint filers' agency when signing joint returns and affords relief only > when a joint filer was unable to exercise that agency.

McMahon (2014) p. 141. Agency in earning money within a marriage, however, has no legal relevance in determining the allocation of assets upon divorce. Moreover, since the spouse that works outside the home to earn money for the marriage has less time to spend with children, that spouse is highly disadvantaged in seeking custody of children of the marriage.

[5] Hamartigenia, vv. 697-707. Cf. Genesis 2:7 ("God formed the human from the dirt and breathed into his nostrils the breath of life."), Deuteronomy 30:15-20 ("Behold, today I have set before you life and prosperity, death and adversity. …"), James 1:25 ("the perfect law, the law of liberty").

[6] Hamartigenia, vv. 708-19. In his Cathemerinon, Prudentius recognized Eve's culpability in Adam's fall:

> Then the treacherous serpent > tempts the virgin's untrained mind.
> So with evil persuasion on her man, her partner, > she forces him to eat what was forbidden.
> She herself will be ruined in the same way.
>
> { Hic draco perfidus indocile > virginis inlicit ingenium, > ut socium malesuada virum > mandere cogeret ex vetitis > ipsa pari peritura modo. }

Prudentius, Book of the Daily Round {Liber Cathemerinon} 3, "Hymn before the meal {Hymnus ante cibum}," st. 23 (vv. 111-5), Latin text from O'Daly (2012) p. 88, my English translation benefiting from that of id. p. 89 and Malamud (2011) p. 142.

Prudentius's Hamartigenia distinctively treats Adam's culpability:

> Perhaps the most peculiar feature of the Hamartigenia to readers brought up on the Genesis account of the Creation and Fall of mankind and influenced by a literary tradition that has been fascinated by the figure of Eve is the way she is minimized, almost eliminated, from the narrative of the origin of sin. In this, Prudentius's account of original sin differs greatly from the biblical account.

Malamud (2011) p. 140. Prudentius was a highly sophisticated writer who apparently understood gynocentric oppression. He may have been ironically invoking the classical practice of shifting blame from women to men.

[7] In enacting innocent spouse tax relief, the U.S. Congress clearly understood that such relief would vastly disproportionately benefit women:

> All but one mention of innocent spouse relief in the Congressional Record referred to wives, most often divorced wives.

McMahon (2014) p. 149, n. 35. In Congressional debate concerning innocent spouse tax relief, Senator Jon Kyl declared: “Nine out of 10 innocent spouses are women.” Id. p. 49, citing statement of Senator Kyl in 1998. Available statistics on innocent spouse petitions are consistent with that claim:

> Wives sought relief in 85.4 percent of total cases, 85.3 percent of the trial cases and 88.1 percent of appeals. Not only do women bring more cases, courts appear to be more sympathetic to wives than to husbands. Wives won 21.6 percent of their appeals and 37.4 percent of their trials and husbands won 0.0 percent of their appeals and 25.4 percent of their trial cases. As a result of the dominance wives have in bringing suit, wives won 89.5 percent of total taxpayer victories.

McMahon (2012) p. 662. Interpreted literally as a matter of reason and logic, innocent spouse law seems to undermine gender equality:

> In the case of innocent spouse relief, in the attempt to help wives, relief might well cause more harm than good. For those spouses targeted for relief, we are creating a dangerous double standard. The reason for a more protective tax regime is that advocates worry that it is unfair to presume that wives can meaningfully evaluate the returns they sign. It is hard to see how this fails to send a signal to the nation that wives are not, or are at least not considered to be, equal members in marriage. This is not a message that we want Congress to send.
>
> McMahon (2014) p. 184. More sophisticated interpretation better indicates the intended undermining of gender equality. The U.S. Congress gutted due process of law through domestic violence legislation enacted under grossly anti-men gender-bigoted claims about domestic violence. Gender-profiling husbands for arrest for domestic violence makes husband legally disadvantage spouses. Congress apparently intended to send a message of female privilege through its domestic violence laws. Congress plausibly sought to send a similar, politically advantageous message of female privilege with its innocent spouse tax law.

Innocent spouse law includes an open-ended opportunity to get tax relief under the heading “equitable relief.” According to the U.S. Internal Revenue Service:

> If you don’t qualify for innocent spouse relief or separation of liability relief, you may still qualify for equitable relief. To qualify for equitable relief, you must establish that under all the facts and circumstances, it would be unfair to hold you liable for the deficiency or underpayment of tax.

The anti-men gender bias Congress intended is made more obvious with the additional explicit stipulation: “the IRS will take into account abuse and financial control by the nonrequesting spouse.”

[8] Martial, Epigrams 8.73.5-8, Latin text of Heraeus & Borovskij (1925) via Perseus, my English translation.

[image] Nude woman (maenad) in Roman fresco in the Casa del Criptoportico (I 6,2) in Pompeii. Painted before 79 GC (probably first century). Image thanks to WolfgangRieger and Wikimedia Commons.

References:

Anglade, Joseph, ed and trans. (French). 1913. Les Poésies de Peire Vidal. Classiques Français du Moyen Age, 11. Paris: H. Champion.

Corelis, Jon. 1995. Roman Erotic Elegy: Selections from Tibullus, Propertius, Ovid and Sulpicia. Salzburg Studies in English Literature, Poetic Drama & Poetic Theory 128. Salzburg: University of Salzburg.

Goold, G. P., ed and trans. 1990. Propertius. Elegies. Loeb Classical Library 18. Cambridge, MA: Harvard University Press, 1990.

Lee, Guy, trans. 2009. Propertius. The Poems. Oxford World's Classics. Oxford: Oxford University Press.

Malamud, Martha A. 2011. Prudentius. The Origin of Sin: An English Translation of the Hamartigenia. Cornell Studies in Classical Philology, 61. Cornell University Press. (review by Dennis E. Trout)

McMahon, Stephanie Hunter. 2012. "An Empirical Study of Innocent Spouse Relief: Do Courts Implement Congress's Legislative Intent?" Florida Tax Review. 12 (8): 629-707.

McMahon, Stephanie Hunter. 2014. "What Innocent Spouse Relief Says about Women and the Rest of Us." Harvard Journal of Law & Gender. 37 (1): 141-184.

O'Daly, Gerard J. P. 2012. Days Linked by Song: Prudentius' Cathemerinon. Oxford: Oxford University Press. (review by Catherine Conybeare)

Paden, William D., and Frances Freeman Paden, trans. 2007. Troubadour Poems from the South of France. Cambridge: D. S. Brewer.

Rigg, A. G. 1986. Gawain on Marriage: the textual tradition of the De coniuge non ducenda with critical edition and translation. Toronto, Ont., Canada: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Thomson, Henry John, ed. and trans. 1949. Prudentius. Loeb Classical Library 387, 398. Vol. 1, Vol. 2. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Released by the author under CC-BY-SA. The original article can be found on Purple Motes.

The cover image depicts the Prudentius manuscript and is in the public domain.

For the love of women

September 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

1959: Malvina Reynolds sings an awful song that wouldn’t be out of place in today’s misandric world

September 11, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Lyrics:

It says in Coronet Magazine
June nineteen-fifty six, page ten
That married women are not as happy
As women who have no men

Married women are cranky
Frustrated and disgusted
While single women are bright and gay
Creative and well adjusted

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When we need to move the piano
Otherwise they can stay at home
And read about the White Sox

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Manhattan

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When they have tickets for the symphony
Otherwise they can stay at home
And play a game of pinochle

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Wisconsin

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

The can come to see us
When they’re feeling pleasant and agreeable
Otherwise they can stay at home
And holler at the TV programs

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Madagascar

We don’t need the men
We don’t need the men
We don’t need to have them round
Except for now and then

They can come to see us
When they’re all dressed up with a suit on Otherwise they can stay at home
[Spoken]: And drop towels in their own bathroom

We don’t care about them
We can do without them
They’ll look cute in a bathing suit
On a billboard in Tierra del Fuego

Credit genius.com for the lyrics.

This Time (And Every Time) It’s Personal

September 12, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Perhaps the most famous quotation ever attributed to Sigmund Freud is “What do women want?” For the record, the complete quotation is “The great question that has never been answered, and which I have not yet been able to answer, despite my thirty years of research into the feminine soul, is ‘What does a woman want?’” Also for the record, the quote is from a letter he wrote to Marie Bonaparte, a descendant of Napoleon, who consulted Freud for frigidity beginning in 1925.

Freud lived till 1939, so he was around long enough to see the triumph of the suffragettes, though not the routine appointment or election of women to high office and other positions of authority. His thoughts on that development surely would have been interesting. Suggestion for Psych 101 term paper topic: “Is the Girl-Boss Phenomenon a Manifestation of Penis Envy?” Penis envy, of course, is another Freudian theory not beloved by feminists. Famously, Woody Allen once said he believed in the theory but didn’t think it should be restricted to women.

Now that women in positions of authority are commonplace, we can start to make some observations about patterns of female behavior when they wield power. At the outset, let’s trot out the obligatory NAWALT disclaimer. Even so, if your prejudices accompany you into the voting booth and you look askance at female candidates, your instincts will rarely lead you astray.

Another famous quote comes from former (1977-1987) Speaker of the House Thomas “Tip” O’Neill, a veteran of classic Irish ward-heeling politics in Boston. He once observed, “All politics is local.” It appears he did not coin this phrase but he is still associated with it even though he died 30 years ago.

There’s no telling how many talking heads have parsed this simple four-word phrase over the years, but it’s not particularly hard to understand. It means that a voter bases his decision on how candidates’ positions will affect him, his family, his neighborhood, his city, etc. with diminishing importance as one goes up the ladder. In other words, voters cast their ballots according to self-interest. What a revelation!

The concept of local is elastic to some degree. In a small or sparsely populated state, a local issue might be a matter of regional if not statewide importance. Typically, big-picture, geopolitical issues will gain little traction. When the flatscreen pundits turn to the pros and cons of regime change in Uzbekistan, local viewers/voters reach for the remote.

So keeping the two aforementioned quotes in mind, let’s assert this axiom for the woman politician and the woman voter: What women want politically is personal, i.e., local. No surprise there because women take everything personally. In fact, they admit it. One of the most popular second-wave feminist slogans was “the personal is political.” I wouldn’t go so far as to say women are incapable of objectivity, but I think their instinctive stance on any issue will be subjective rather than objective. The latter just doesn’t come naturally to them.

Chances are if there is some sort of charity regularly begging you for money, women are behind it. More often than not, there is some element of the personal in the charities they select. The ravages of (fill in name of birth defect) are rarely addressed by a woman unless she has given birth to a child with same. At that point, she is more likely to get involved in organizing a charity to fight said birth defect. Of course, while she does have a vested interest in alleviating the suffering of her child, the money will also alleviate the suffering of other people's children and possibly fund a cure. So self-interest often leads to more than just selfish ends.

Nevertheless, you can't come out and admit that your advocacy involves even a modicum of self-interest. The appeal must always be to the common good. Every candidate has a self-interest but woe betide anyone running for public office who admits it. The voter, of course, casts his ballot in secret, so no one can stop him from casting a ballot in his own best interest. Nevertheless, political pecksniffs still wag their fingers and admonish him to vote his conscience!

Actually, some people do vote conscience over self-interest. There is a word for such people: Suckers! By definition, only you can vote in your self-interest. If you don't do it, no one else can. In truth, such a practice is democracy in action. If everyone votes for his own self-interest, the people with the most self-interested votes win! Never had a poly sci course in my life, but even I figured that out.

So what happens when female self-interest goes beyond charity to public policy? An object lesson is an elementary school teacher named Jeanne Manford. In 1972 she learned that her son had been beaten up while distributing pro-homosexual flyers at a political gathering. So she wrote a letter to the New York Post announcing, "I have a homosexual son and I love him." One thing led to another, and she eventually founded Parents and Friends of Lesbians and Gays, later known as PFLAG. Now the Lesbians and Gays have become LGBTQ, et al, and we have Pride Month, same-sex marriage, and a Technicolor panorama of flags.

Would this have happened without mothers like Jeanne Manford serving as a sort of ladies' auxiliary? Would mother Manford have had an epiphany if her son had not been beaten up? Or if he had been a heterosexual beaten up for some other reason? Or if some other woman's homosexual son had been beaten up? Doubtful.

Another issue that women take personally – to put it mildly – is abortion. Of course, millions of women have had a personal experience with this procedure. Some have regretted it ever since. One such woman of my acquaintance has a birthday party on the due date of the child she aborted decades ago. Like a religious convert, she is more zealously anti-abortion than rank-and-file pro-life women who have never had and would never consider an abortion.

More numerous are those who have had abortions and admit to them – and sometimes boast of them – asserting that whatever success they have enjoyed in life would not have been possible if they had been hamstrung by children. Call them pro-choice or pro-abortion, they tend to be quite vocal about their beliefs. Curiously, some of the loudest are post-menopausal women whose self-interest would not seem to be served one way or another by whatever laws a state enacts pertaining to abortion. How to account for that?

In many cases, it is because such women have daughters and want to ensure that they will be able to abort their babies if they want to. One of the selling points for abortion is that there's a woman in every family who's had one, though you might have to include the extended family. You wouldn't vote against what's best for your stepmother or your sister-in-law or your second cousin, would you?

Paradoxically, taking things personally dovetails with the female herd instinct. Any threat to legalized abortion is perceived as an attack by the individual woman, and also as an attack against all women. Criticism of women in general is taken personally by the individual woman; criticism of an individual woman is an affront to all women. It is a rare woman indeed who does not play the sexist card when she becomes the subject of opprobrium.

Consequently, a nuanced, rational debate about abortion is all but impossible. As far as women are concerned, it is all about their bodies and their rights. More's the pity because the issue raises philosophical (when does life begin?), moral (if abortion involves the taking of life, can it ever be justified?), and religious (what would a higher power think about the deliberate eradication of inchoate human beings?) issues.

And what about the effects on society at large? Given the birth dearth, where will the future taxpayers come from to fund the welfare state that women are so fond of? On the other hand, a conservative argument in favor of abortion is that it is the most effective way ever devised to keep the underclass in check! Not that a pro-choice advocate will ever offer that up in an attempt to win hearts and minds. Feminists will be freezing their eggs in hell before they take to the streets bearing signs to that effect!

And what about the fathers of the fetuses? Don't they have a say in the matter? You already know the answer to that. Sit down and shut up, Mr. Man!

Thanks to the herd instinct, if a woman in Texas can't get an abortion, women in New York and California are outraged! They may even make a pilgrimage to Texas to raise hell about it. Of course, women can't get abortions in Afghanistan but even the most ardent feminist isn't crazy enough to travel there to lead workshops or protests against the Taliban. The hand of Allah writes, and having written moves on.

Given the tendency of women's menstrual periods to synchronize when they live in close proximity to one another, one can't help but wonder if the same is true of their political views. How many parents have been bewildered by seeing that vivacious young woman they sent off to college return to them a few months later as a social justice sourpuss, much too young to be a perpetually frowning frump, yet there she stews. A semester or two in the college hive will age a young woman but it won't help her grow up.

Whatever you do, don't engage such a young woman in debate. She will be passionate about a number of issues, and rational about none of them. If you don't see eye to eye with her and say so, it will be more than a disagreement; it will be a personal attack on her as well as her sex. If you're not down with abortion, then the question becomes: why do you hate women? The pro-abortion female is never asked why she hates fetuses.

Of course, this attitude is often present in regard to other issues. If you're not in favor of the beatification of St. George Floyd, why do you hate black people? If you criticize Hezbollah, why do you hate Palestinians? If you don't support Israel, why do you hate Jews? Is it possible that this attitude can be attributed to the increasing involvement of women (and testosterone-deficient men) in politics? Can we blame at least part of the Playskool politics of today on the increasing involvement of women?

After reading accounts of the 1787 constitutional convention, the Federalist Papers, and the writings of the founding fathers, one is tempted to say that public discourse in America has been on a downward trajectory for 250 years. Could that be because back then there was no input from women (no, Abigail Adams's letters to her husband John do not count) – and no need to appeal to the women's vote? If women were as politically involved then as they are now, we might still be British subjects, a more disturbing thought today than it would have been in 1776.

Of course, when the Declaration of Independence was drafted, all politicians were white males and women couldn't vote. No need to seek out a candidate who looked like you because every candidate looked like you! Candidates had to take a stand on the issues, and voters had to ponder the issues and figure out which party or candidate was preferable. Whew! Thanks to identity politics, we don't have to resort to that anymore!

In the early days of the republic, animosity was hardly unknown among male voters and office-seekers. But that was just part and parcel of being a man. If you were attacked, personally or politically, you counter-attacked; if someone zinged you, you zinged him back. A man who receives a tongue-lashing from a female foe doesn't have the luxury of playing the sexism card. Actually, it probably wouldn't occur to him to do so because the male herd instinct is not a thing.

When a man is verbally attacked by another man, a strong rejoinder is a must because if he fails to respond in some form or fashion, he will be adjudged a sissy – and that only makes things worse. There's something fundamentally defective about a guy who won't stand up for himself. Even a woman will look down on such a man – unless it's her son. A man's thought processes are more like, OK, he got me today, I'll get him later. Maybe it'll be face to face, maybe I'll drygulch him, but I will get him. More importantly, although you may not like the other guy, you don't hate him for what he said. He's just doing his job. It's nothing personal! If he out-insults or out-zings you, the onus is on you, not him.

Consider Playing the Dozens, an insult game played by black males. In short, it is a duel of oneupsmanship in insults. To say that the banter is insensitive would be an understatement. All's fair in love, war, and Playing the Dozens. While insulting one's mother would usually be taboo, in this contest it is common. You can say the worst thing imaginable about your opponent's mother, and he will respond in kind. The only taboo regarding your mother is running home to her so she can dry your tears.

Another good example is a Friars Club roast, in which comedians get together to "honor" one of their own. If you're good at dishing it out, you'd better be good at taking it. And if you're not…well, they probably wouldn't be roasting you in the first place.

Sports teams have always had bench jockeys and trash talkers. The abuse is milder than in days of old and there are more taboos, chiefly but not exclusively ethnic. It may be hard to believe, but there was a time when Yankee greats Joe DiMaggio and Phil Rizzuto took no offense at being dubbed Big Dago and Little Dago.

Today public address announcers will routinely warn fans not to engage in "racist or sexist" taunting. Of course, Joe and Phil wouldn't have known what sexist behavior was. In fact, I don't think the word "racism" was coined till after their heyday.

We are told that women seek consensus. More to the point, when they are in positions of authority, they impose it, creating a distinctly female form of totalitarianism. Being more hierarchical, men do not need consensus to function. The boss doesn't care what you think about his policies, he just wants you to do your job.

When we hear that many people are breaking up friendships these days due to political differences, I suspect that those people are mostly female, biological or wannabe. With men of normal testosterone levels have a political disagreement and the matter cannot be resolved, it is perfectly acceptable to agree to disagree. Of course, there are men who go along to get along. This is not the same thing as following orders. We're talking about trucklers who suck up to people in positions of authority. The yes man is universally despised. Is there such a thing as a yes woman? To be sure, but the phrase is redundant.

Ah, you say, haven't you heard the catty remarks women make about each other? I remember years ago when the Miss America pageant was a big deal. In those days the contestants had to be attractive: No dogs, no trans women, no land whales, no purple hair. During the annual televised panorama of pulchritude, I would hear my mother, aunt, grandmother, or some other adult female in the living room criticize just about every contestant…with a schnoz like that she must be related to Jimmy Durante…her legs are like matchsticks…looks like a bottle blonde to me…her butt is too big – or too small. As I horny teenager, I just didn't get it. They all aroused me. When does the swimsuit competition start?

An important difference in the jibes of men and women is that women's negative comments are never said to another woman's face. In fact, just the opposite. If a woman shows up with the most unflattering hairdo conceivable, the response is always, "Oh, I love what you've done with your hair!" If a poll was taken and her best friends unanimously thought she looked goofy, not one would break the news to her.

So it should be no surprise that the sacred cow status of freedom of speech is slowly eroding. The excuse is that it might – might, mind you – inspire some sort of anti-social behavior. Crack a joke about (fill in name of ethnic group) and you're a bigot! Crack a joke about a homosexual and you're a homophobe! Crack a joke about women and you're a misogynist! And if somewhere in our fair land some ethnic, some homosexual, or some woman is harmed, it's because of men like you! As a man, you believe in accountability but there are limits.

Before signing off, let’s bring back Freud for an encore. Another of his famous sayings is “The first human who hurled an insult instead of a stone was the founder of civilization.” So there you go! If not for insensitive remarks, we wouldn’t be here today!

So why do you hate women, Dr. Freud?

Hitler reacts to radical feminist Julie Bindel

September 13, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Credit Mike Buchanan's site Laughing at feminists for bringing this one to our attention.

I need angry women who hate men because…

September 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

‘Q & A’ with Peter Wright – by Jana Xiolier

September 15, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

---

Jana Xiolier posed the following questions to Peter Wright on July 4, 2024 .

Q. What do you think of our current culture and how it treats men?

A. In today’s culture, men are no longer appreciated for their presence or contributions and are routinely despised, especially when they fail to be of service to women and the State. This is because Western culture has lost its sense of family love – called storge by the Greeks – and in its place we now have atomised individuals driven by a narcissistic preoccupation with themselves; it’s a mindset that reduces men to mechanistic, utilitarian functionaries for the benefit of others, or to failures in that mandate.

Q. Do you feel fairly treated as a man?

A. If the benchmark for fairness is being treated with equal value to others, I think its reasonable to conclude that men are not – which I would say is demonstrated by the higher suicide rate of Western males. By way of comparison, Chinese women suicide in higher numbers than Chinese men, which also demonstrates the question of human value but with genders reversed.

Q. Do you think men have more power than women on a societal level?

A. Men more often hold the power of office, but what they do with that power deserves further consideration. To give an example, a local council where I live has eleven elected councillors (8 men and 3 women) who recently voted on whether to apportion money for celebrations of International Men’s Day in the city. The 8 men voted yes to funding, and the 3 women voted no! In a similar resolution voting to issue funds for International Women’s Day, the same 11 councillors voted yes, unanimously. My observation is that gendered use of power is generalizable to these examples; ie. men extend chivalry and consideration to women, but it is not reciprocated by women.

On a more general note I agree with Nancy Armstrong’s observation that there exists ‘two spheres’ of influence – one male sphere, and one female. She states that the interpersonal contract of romantic love and family relationships, which are directed largely by women, can often overrule the social contract controlled largely by male office holders. The result is that love can be the most powerful regulating convention between two parties – a possibility that is little considered by feminist writers in their rantings about males holding all the power in all domains.

Q. Do you think feminism is interested in equality?

A. Not at all. “Equality” on the feminist tongue serves as a euphemism for securing unearned and often unequal power for themselves, and for women more generally. This motive points to a definition of feminism that most people would agree with: i.e., feminism is the project for increasing the power of women.

Q. Does feminism help men?

A. Feminism sets out to actively harm men in many instances. Strangely enough, feminism may accidentally help men in some ways, especially when they get legislation passed for the purpose of empowering women, but men end up exploiting the same legislation to their own benefit. For example, legal redress for victims of sexual harassment or physical abuse, or even the 'abuse excuse' designed for women who murder a spouse are things men have used to their advantage, which elicited outrage by the feminist architects of these systems. In fact there has also been a trend of men claiming (but only on paper) that they are trans-women in order to secure multiple female-only privileges: for example, in Switzerland a man legally classified himself a woman on government documents and was able to retire younger and receive a pension at the same age as women. A man in Ecuador also changed his status to female, on paper, in order to gain custody of his children after divorce, as his country typically awards child custody to women. In Germany and also Norway, men have identified as women, on paper, in order to gain access to female-only university courses (eg. STEM quotas), or to gain access to female-only scholarships. These men did not "transition" in any material way, and were simply exploiting the gender privileges that have accumulated exclusively around the female sex.

Q. What do you think are the major issues facing men today?

A. First issues that come to mind are a lack of social valorization, which leads them to feeling worthless and paves the way for suicidal outcomes. A second major issue is the weight of imposed guilt that men carry around for being supposed members of a violent oppressor class. I could go on to list more men's issues, but these two items are among the most crushing for men and boys, working in the background of their psyches, which means that rectifying these messages would lead to a number of improvements for men – and by extension for Western society as well.

Q. What do you think a true path towards equality between men and women would look like?

A. Socially that would look like an equal valuing of men and women, and would rest legislatively on 'equality of opportunity' in place of the current feminist push for 'equality of outcomes' (equity).

Q. Can you tell me of an experience of someone you know or yourself that was unfair and related to our culture's treatment of men?

A. For me the heart breaker scenario is men in horrifically abusive relationships who can't leave for good reasons, men who sometimes suffer the double horror of being falsely painted an abuser by the actual female abuser – then having the world come down on that same man and multiplying his pain. I've seen many men in this situation, and feeling alone is an understatement for what they are going through. If readers know any man in this position, I encourage you to consider helping them – whether materially, or even simply with some kind words and a listening ear which may prove the difference between him living versus suiciding.

Q. Do you know of any experiences of people who have experienced issues with women in their lives or with the court system etc etc.?

A. Too many to count, and I wager most readers here will feel the same – the system is rigged against men from beginning to end. Again, if you know any man going through a break-up and family courts, consider if you can offer them some kind of support.

Q. What do you think of traditional gender roles?

A. Another tricky question because there's a variety of "traditional roles," each one differing somewhat in its customs and conventions. For example in the West we have two primary traditionalisms: the first one is highly gynocentric (prioritising wife/woman somewhat over husband and children) and the second model is a non-gynocentric tradition which values gender roles on the basis that they exist as service roles within the wider family nexus; this is a model I can get behind. I wrote two detailed articles on traditional gender roles titled, The Tradwife Revisited and Anti-Gynocentrism Is The Only Anti-Feminism That Matters – which I'd encourage readers to read if they want more detail. To summarise those two articles, I praise traditional gender roles that are non-gynocentric and family oriented, with the caveat that we now live in a society that doesn't support that model – in fact it actively tries to undermine it and rip it down.

Q. What do you think of intersectionality?

A. Advocates of the intersectional model claim its a way of seeing, and of being more inclusive toward marginalised people. In practice however, I'm seeing the opposite; the theory gets used for the sake of excluding people deemed too high on their 'privilege wheel,' and such exclusion is often based on wide categories like 'whiteness' or simply 'maleness.' On that basis I completely reject its interpretation & application.

Q. One last question. What would you say to the argument that the world is more child-centered than it is gynocentric? In that women are only centered, as much as they are, because they are useful to nature and that it is an attempt to center children, meaning that gynocentrism is an inaccurate way of describing society's focus on the issues women face?

A. One popular hypothesis holds that women have always been more 'centered' than other family members who remained on the periphery, this being due to women's usefulness in reproduction and in the raising of children. I reject this argument as another attempt to smuggle gynocentrism into families. The gynocentrism displayed today towards women who don't have any children, and who plan to remain childless, is evidence that something other than child-centrism is at play in our centering of women. I think that something else amounts to a gendered narcissism that aims to place women 'on a pedestal.' Far from being an evolutionary adaptation for production of children, this practice results in the maladaptive outcome of less pairbonding between men and women, acrimonious relationships, higher divorce rates, and plummeting birth rates.

In traditional societies all members of the family are considered central to the functioning of the family unit, providing an environment of support for the raising of children. And if any member of the family suffered injury or needed extra support, it was based wholly on need and not on being female. For example, I recently conducted a poll on X that fleshes out people's reactions to this question: "In a traditional society, which family member do you think men would have assisted out of a burning house first?" The answers to that question & the results are as follows:

In summary, all family members throughout our evolutionary history needed protection, or 'centering' to use your word, in order to be part of a strong, viable family team. But that isn't called gynocentrism; it's called storge as mentioned above. All family members were protected – as indicated in the poll. If women were vulnerable and needed protection occasionally, they would be. Men, too, were protected if they were injured, old, sick, or in need. Protection & provision has always been based on the shifting needs of various family members – whoever had the most immediate need was catered to, cared for and centered.

* * *

Jana Xiolier's YouTube Channel: Women Against Feminism

Serious questions surround anti-sexual-violence group What Were You Wearing? Australia

September 16, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

In this video Australian news-magazine programme A Current Affair has raised serious concerns about the sexual violence organisation What Were You Wearing? Australia.

The featured image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Lessons to Learn from The Folly of Herod Antipas

September 17, 2024 | by Andrew Exeter | Link | Original Link

Verses 3 to 11 of Chapter 14 of the Gospel of Matthew contain one of the accounts of the beheading of John the Baptist by Herod Antipas, the ruler of Galilee at the time, a story from which red pill men can learn some important lessons where it concerns what their own consciences tell them about the whims of manipulative women. Before we begin this analysis, a quick review of this story is in order.

The head of John the Baptist

Herod Antipas – one of the sons of Herod the Great, who tried but failed to kill Jesus Christ in Chapter 2 – has John the Baptist imprisoned, "for Herodias' sake;" (14:3) John had insisted that it was, "not lawful," (14:4) for Antipas to have married Herodias, because Antipas had divorced his first wife to do this and because Herodias had done the same with her first husband, Herod II. Herod II – also called Herod Philip I – is also the half-brother of Antipas (same father, different mother).

On one of Antipas' birthdays, Salome – the biological daughter of Herodias and Herod II, and thus the stepdaughter of Antipas – "danced before them, and pleased Herod," (14:6) to the point where Antipas, "promised with an oath to give her whatsoever she would ask." (14:7) Unfortunately for Antipas, Salome – at the instruction of her mother – demands, "John Baptist's head in a charger," (14:8) and the reluctant Antipas ultimately gives her want she wants and has John beheaded in prison.

Herodias and Salome

Biblical commentator Albert Barnes notes the significance of Antipas feeling, "sorry," (14:9) at the prospect of killing John, arguing that there are three likely reasons for this. Antipas felt a great respect for John – considering him, "a just man and an holy," as recorded in Mark 6:20 – he, "feared the multitude," who, "counted him as a prophet," (14:5) and Antipas had the sense that beheading John was, as Barnes argues, "so manifestly wicked," as to make Antipas' conscience object to the request. Barnes also contends that Antipas can see the shallowness of this request, which is made solely to, "gratify the malice of a wicked woman," referring to Herodias' hatred of John for his criticism of her marriage to Antipas.

Antipas has the power to deny Salome's request and preserve the life of John, but he beheads John both because of the oath he swore to give Salome whatever she wanted (made before he knew what exactly she wanted) and because of, "them which sat with him at meat." (14:9) Barnes argues that this is essentially a description of Antipas succumbing to peer pressure and being, "afraid of the charge of cowardice and want of spirit;" he gave Salome what she wanted and failed to have the courage to obey his conscience.

It is also worth noting the style of Salome's dance, dubbed the Dance of the Seven Veils; Barnes argues (as do cinematic depictions of the dance in 1953 and 1961) that this was a, “lascivious and wanton,” act performed by a, “dissolute,” girl, and the fact that Salome was Antipas’ stepdaughter adds an incestuous element to the dance. One arguably does not even need to hold the conservative views on sexuality that Barnes does to see the disturbing nature of this performance by Salome.

Antipas and his mistake

It is ultimately Antipas’ folly and personal cowardice – that is, cowardice in being reluctant to do that which he personally knows to be right – that leads to the death of John the Baptist, who arguably acts as a symbol for Antipas’ conscience. The first two verses of Chapter 14 recount Antipas’ belief that – after hearing of, “the fame of Jesus,” (14:1) fame which grew due to Christ’s performance of miracles for the people – John has somehow, “risen from the dead.” (14:2)

Barnes argues that Antipas mistook Christ for John because of his guilty conscience; Antipas knew that executing John was wrong from the beginning, and later feared that John had somehow miraculously returned, as Antipas’ conscience would never let him forget his fatal failure to do what needed to be done when it needed to be done. Antipas still bears ultimate responsibility for John’s execution, but even Jordan Peterson would argue that the provocative and likely neotenic Salome was, “deeply complicit,” in contributing to this mistake.

Knowing when you’re being manipulated

Red pill men recognise that their biology – by itself – will not serve them well when it comes to interacting with women, and Antipas was negligent to ignore the incestuous and thus highly questionable nature of Salome’s dance. Like the average blue pill man, he swore an oath to give a woman whose character he knew little to nothing about whatever she wanted purely because she visually, “pleased,” (14:6) him.

Hence the second point made by Paul Elam in his video ‘Six Subtle Gateways To Borderline Hell‘, in which he argues that if a woman becomes highly sexual with you early on in the relationship, this is a sign that she is weaponizing her sexuality to your detriment. Salome’s sexual manipulation is like that of the Greek goddess Hera – as discussed previously on this website by Peter Wright – in that it serves a purely selfish end; this is made even more unsettling by the collusion of her mother Herodias, who would have presumably been quite satisfied with the sight of John’s head after Salome, “brought it to her mother.” (14:11)

To reiterate, sexual manipulation is one of the easiest ways that a woman can get a man of her choosing to do whatever she likes, given how visual men are when it comes to sexual selection. It is this kind of manipulation that red pill men must be able to perceive for what it is – especially when it is coming from women about whom we know very little, or nothing at all – and they must value what their conscience tells them over what their hormones tell them when dealing with a Salome in their own lives.

*All quotes from the Bible are taken from the King James Version of the text.

Guardians of the Rowland Adelagun (ManWomanMyth) Series

September 18, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Gamma Bias In The Maintenance of Gynocentrism

September 20, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Gamma bias refers to a cognitive gender bias theory developed by Seager & Barry (2019).[1]

Gamma bias refers to the operation of two concurrent biases: alpha bias (exaggerating or magnifying gender differences) and beta bias (ignoring or minimizing gender differences). Gamma bias occurs when one gender difference is minimized while simultaneously another is magnified, resulting in a doubling of cognitive distortion.[2]

Gamma bias

Seager & Barry state that gamma bias works by magnifying women's issues and achievements and minimizing men's issues and achievements. Alternatively, the dynamic is reversed and employed to minimize negative female traits and behaviors, while magnifying or exaggerating negative male traits or behaviors.

Theories on the purpose of gamma bias

Hypotheses regarding the growth of gamma bias and the disfavoring of males include evolutionary pressures for males to protect and provide for women which involves a reluctance to view men as vulnerable, or alternatively the sociological explanation of 'ingroup' and 'outgroup' bias which may have developed around men and women in the form of social conventions.[1]

A more detailed explanation is provided by gynocentrism theory[3] which posits the genesis of gamma bias in medieval Europe where feudal class distinctions between lords and vassals were re-applied to men and women. The application of such class distinctions led C.S. Lewis to refer to it as "the feudalisation of love," making the observation that this sociological development “has left no corner of our ethics, our imagination, or our daily life untouched.”

Lewis explains that European society drifted essentially from a social feudalism to a sexual feudalism, fostering a convention of male chivalry in service to elevated Ladies of aristocratic society — a convention that moved by degrees, over time, to be embraced by all classes of people. The psychological operations supporting the ‘feudalization of love’ are numerous and involve gamma bias, male gender blindness, and also misandry to name a few. The internal operations result in a gender empathy gap which reinforces the root medieval trope.

Examples of gamma bias

References:

[1] Seager, M., Barry, J.A. (2019). Cognitive Distortion in Thinking About Gender Issues: Gamma Bias and the Gender Distortion Matrix. In: Barry, J., Kingerlee, R., Seager, M., Sullivan, L. (eds) The Palgrave Handbook of Male Psychology and Mental Health. Palgrave

Macmillan
[2] John Barry & Martin Seager, Can we discuss gender issues rationally? Yes, if we can stop gamma bias
[3] Wright, Peter. “Gynocentrism As A Narcissistic Pathology.” New Male Studies 9, no. 1 (2020).

Further reading:

- Gynocentrism defined
- Gynosympathy
- Women-are-wonderful effect
- Gynomyopia
- Confirmation bias
- Schema bias

Asking Britons: Are Straight White Men The Problem?

September 21, 2024 | by A Voice for Men | Link | Original Link

---

Highlights to look out for 2:56. Woman asks straight white man for help answering the questions after previously saying that straight white men are not important.

3:04. Woman admits the problem is class-based after previously blaming straight white men.

The War On Men

September 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Why Modern Movies Suck – They Hate Men (Part 1)

September 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 44 – Not Guilty By Reason of Automatism

September 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Keeping Up Appearances

September 26, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

The first time I saw it I was taken aback. As I saw it again and again, I found it less and less remarkable, though a long way from mainstream. The phenomenon I am referring to is men painting their fingernails.

The first time was at the box office/concession stand of a movie theater. The guy who sold me a ticket and a box of organic popcorn had solid black fingernails. I normally don't pay much attention to other people when engaging in routine transactions, but I took a closer look at this guy. He didn't appear unusual in any other way. I live in a part of town that is popular with hipsters (that explains the organic popcorn), so I didn't pay it any mind. I've seen stranger things, and I don't mean the TV show.

Yet as I was out and about I saw it in other parts of town in all sorts of places…bars, restaurants, shopping malls, convenience stores. Black and red seemed to be duking it out for market dominance.

Recently, I came across the phenomenon again, but this time in a highly unlikely venue. While attending a minor league baseball game, the home team's catcher (who shall remain nameless) was signing some autographs. I literally had a front-row seat for this, so I couldn't help but notice that the catcher had green fingernails. I'm sure there was some formal name for the shade but I have no idea what it was. If you've ever tried to match old paint with the shades available at Sherwin-Williams, you know how many different names they have for the plethora of variations on the primary colors. To my untutored eyes, the catcher's fingernails were somewhere between lime green and lima bean green.

It may be tempting to make some sort of homosexual joke about "pitching" and "catching," but I don't think that's pertinent to this situation. A 200-pound buzzcut bruiser with green fingernails might not attract attention if he's a bouncer at a hip nightspot, but this guy was not only a ballplayer, he was a catcher, a down-and-dirty position where wear and tear on the fingers is assured. The longer a catcher's tenure behind the plate, the greater his chances of getting jammed, dislocated, or broken fingers. To say fingernail polish is impractical would be a gross understatement. Too bad Yogi Berra is no longer available for comment.

Now I have heard that relatively long fingernails are essential for knuckleball pitchers. But that is the only instance I know of when fingernails have any relation to the game of baseball. And I'm pretty sure that fingernail polish would have no bearing on the effectiveness of a knuckler. So I can only conclude that green fingernails on a ballplayer are strictly a grooming choice.

Of course, fingernail painting is regularly found among drag queens and trans women. Not so much for regular guys. A little research turns up the fact that nail-painting has been a goth thing for a long while. Since I don't move in those circles, that was news to me. Another group that favors painted nails is what is called the emo crowd, or punk rockers. That genre, movement, or whatever you call it, has been around for decades but I have largely ignored it because I demand a bit more from music than volume and hostility. Aside from those two subcultures, however, I am not aware of fingernail polish being a thing among men. So how to account for it?

I believe it was Warren Farrell who once asserted that if women were attracted to men who could walk on their hands, men would immediately start learning how to do that. So there must be a significant number of women who approve of painted nails on men, or else it would not be happening. If women united on this issue and categorically decreed that men who apply fingernail polish are repulsive, it would quickly disappear. I'm sure there are individual women who feel this way, as women value men for their utility and painted fingernails do not convey that identity. But women will never voice their disapproval en masse. The reason is that breaking down gender stereotypes is a main theme of left-leaning women, meaning the majority of them. While they may not be thrilled about teenage sons who paint their nails, they will never forbid it. Indeed, they are more likely to see it as an opportunity to score some brownie points by boasting about the gender fluidity of their sons.

Of course, like any hard-to-explain phenomenon, male fingernail polish deserves a good conspiracy theory. Mine is this: It's the cosmetic companies!

Perhaps one day a cosmetics CEO had an epiphany, realizing that his corporation was selling to just half the population. There was a vast untapped market of men out there. But how to get them to bite? And how to reel them in?

First, it was necessary to prepare the way by changing attitudes. They had to convince men – and women – that fingernail polish was not just for women. A man who used it wasn't necessarily a sissy. Now I don't have access to the executive suites at Avon or Mary Kay, so I have no evidence for this theory. It's just my answer to the eternal question: Cui bono?

If there is such a thing as male privilege, it is surely the ability to lead a long, productive life without ever painting one's fingernails. If you've ever witnessed a female in your family stripping her nails of old polish and then going through the tedious process of applying new polish, you might say to yourself, thank God I don't have to do that. Life is greatly simplified when one can walk through a CVS or a Walgreens and totally ignore the aisles devoted to cosmetics.

Thanks to male privilege, fingernail grooming has traditionally been a simple matter of rooting out any dirt that gets under them. There is some wiggle room as far as length, but for men who work with their hands, short is a de facto job requirement. Long fingernails are simply incompatible with foundries, factories, and tools.

In my opinion, the ideal fingernail length, regardless of a man's profession, is long enough to extract boogers without undue effort. The exact length for performing this duty efficiently will vary according to the circumference of the finger as well as the nostril. The thumb and index finger are the usual choices for this task, but there is always the occasional nonconformist who prefers the ring finger, the middle finger, or the pinkie. Adhering to the tenets of inclusivity, I do not marginalize such men.

I realize that some readers might think I am degrading this essay by reducing the issue of male fingernails to mere booger picking, as practical as that application is. But there is more to it than that: Namely, scrotum scratching. In both of these essential male activities, fingernail length is a matter of practicality; polish is totally irrelevant.

What is true of male fingernails is pretty much true of other aspects of grooming and adornment. In most societies the difference between male and female hair care is like the difference between hedge-trimming and topiary. In decadent societies, that distinction erodes. As I recall, hairstyling for men didn't become a thing till the early 70s. Before that, haircuts were sufficient. I fail to see how styled hair enriched the lives of men. Perhaps it was another conspiracy, maybe a cabal of manufacturers of haircare products allied with underemployed hairdressers.

Then there is the subject of attire. If you watch awards shows, you can't help but notice that the tuxedo is the male uniform of the day for such get-togethers. Female attire has much more latitude but it also attracts more scrutiny.

When John F. Kennedy was President, he famously dropped an off-the-cuff remark that everywhere he went, commentators always dealt at length with the First Lady's attire and no one cared what he and Vice-President Johnson wore. That remained true right down to his last day in office. Even if you're not a big JFK assassination buff, you know that Jackie was wearing a pink Chanel suit and matching pillbox hat on that fatal day. What was JFK wearing? No matter how many times you've watched the Zapruder film, you might be hard-pressed to note anything distinctive.

And so it remains today. After all these years, no matter what their politics, men still go with the suit, the power tie, and black shoes. The cut of the suit may vary according to body type and current styles, but the basics are remarkably stable.

I remember some years ago watching a documentary film about a prominent (i.e., wealthy) personal injury lawyer. One thing that stuck in my mind was his procedure of swapping out his gaudy wedding ring for a simple gold band before he went to trial. This wasn't just a strategy to appeal to the jury – hey, look, I'm just a regular guy like you folks. He knew that the ring was a distraction. He didn't want jurors being distracted by his ring while he was trying to get a point across to them. He had the income to purchase all sorts of bling, but he knew that his income depended on what people thought about what he said, not about his personal effects. In an ideal world, he could dress and adorn himself any way he wanted and it wouldn't make any difference to the jury. But a real man must live in the real world.

It should come as no surprise that the teenage years are when the male agonizes the most about his appearance. The immature man says, "Look at me!" The mature man says, "Listen to me."

I suspect that if you were to go in search of a male trial lawyer with painted fingernails, you would be on a fool's errand…well, maybe not in San Francisco. If you are ever called in for jury duty, take a good look at how the attorneys are attired. Chances are it will be largely nondescript: suit, dress shirt, and tie, nothing out of the ordinary. They know that a bland wardrobe is a career requirement.

The exceptions are men whose appearance is interwoven with their public image. At one extreme, we have Michael Moore, a real-life counterpart of Peter Griffin of Family Guy. If you've ever seen a picture of Michael Moore's Michigan mansion, you know darn well he has enough dough for a gym membership, a sojourn at a fat farm, or Lap-Band surgery, not to mention an occasional visit to the men's department at an upscale department store. But being a fat slob is part of his brand. He would no longer be Michael Moore if he slimmed down and dressed better.

At the other extreme was the late author Tom Wolfe, who always appeared in public in a white suit. Of course, his dapper demeanor had no bearing on the quality of his prose any more than Colonel Sanders's white suit did on the quality of his fried chicken. But it was an effective form of marketing. Who knows how many people saw Wolfe on TV talk shows and thought he was an interesting guy, then came across one of his books and bought a copy. In effect, he was saying "Look at me" as a way to get people's attention so he could then say, "Listen to me," that is, buy my book!

Of course, there are degrees of flamboyancy. The most over-the-top examples are drag queens whose services would not be in demand if they portrayed plain Janes, drab housewives, or mousy secretaries. I don't pretend to understand the motivations that drive drag queens, but there seems to be some demand for their performances, so an income stream is involved. That cannot be said of the green-fingernailed catcher on my local minor league. I'm pretty sure nobody showed up at the ballpark to cheer or boo him based on his fingernails.

For females, there has always been a link between long nails and cat claws. The pussycat may look warm, fuzzy and inviting, but watch out! Also, the female fingernail thing is clearly a status trip. It's a way for a woman to show that she doesn't work with her hands, as the vast majority of women have done throughout history. Long painted fingernails announce to everyone present that she is not engaged in a menial occupation that would be likely to cause harm to those fingernails. Also, it's much more attention-getting when women engage in finger-wagging.

The status trip also applies to the male, accounting for the dandy, the fop, the toff, the metrosexual, or whatever you call him. One look at his hands and everybody knows he doesn't work at a forge or in the fields or in a factory. He may not be a genius but at least he doesn't work with his hands. Lip service paid to working-class people notwithstanding, the proverbial indoor job with no heavy lifting is still the ideal. The working-class hero is the stuff of fiction. The exception to that is the professional athlete, who indeed gets his hands dirty but generally has no trouble attracting chicks and lucrative contracts.

I really can't account for the catcher with the painted nails. Do his teammates give him grief about it? Don't know. Does he have a hot girlfriend, perhaps a cosmetician, who digs the nails? Don't know. Does he perform at drag brunches in the off-season? Don't know.

Geez, do you think he does his toenails too?

Only his teammates know for sure.

What Makes A Man Happy? – To crush your enemies. See them… actually it’s male friends and community

September 27, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Better Bachelor discussing the value and importance of male friendships.

Shah Reacts: Leeja Miller claims conservatives ruined marriage

September 29, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Anatomy of a Kneel

September 30, 2024 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Is it proper for mankind to be on its knees?

If this question was asked a long time ago, and if the answer was given the thought it deserved, perhaps the idea of servitude would not be so intrinsic to our society. We would not take it for granted nor in stride, and we would certainly not think of it as “sweet”.

We do not live in such a reality where mankind on its knees is unthinkable. What we and our ancestors managed instead is a reality in which submission and self-abasement evolved from an act of coercion to a form of voluntary virtue. While self-abasement takes many forms, nothing quite encapsulates it like the kneel.

Our world is one in which a man on the ground is somehow inspiring of elation and gratitude for the one the kneeler is at the feet of, who somehow is either not a tyrant, or permitted the tyrannical role though they never will admit to it by name.

Let it be clear from the start that my answer to the question is that it is improper for mankind to live on its knees. Instead, mankind is meant to live standing on its own two feet.

If you are well involved with men’s issues, then maybe you have some idea of why this needs to be talked about in context. At its core, men’s issues advocacy exists because of the need to bring to light the dignity of a man as a human being.

If talking about kneeling in a men’s advocacy space sounds strange to you, then consider the following. If you are a man then perhaps you tolerate your lack of dignity so much you don’t even notice it. If you are a woman then you may be too used to the control you assert to live through others.

Two Kinds of Man / On Natural Gynocentrism, Again

Man’s dignity begins with and is measured by how he stands his ground. When you see a man who does, you see a man with his spirit intact, defended, or being healed. You are seeing a man who owns himself, and belongs to no one else. This is one kind of man.

Now direct your attention to another kind of man: the man who kneels. The man on his knees. You see a man who lives by others' expectations, others' arbitrary standards, and others' undue authority. You see a man that does not own himself, and his spirit broken.

The question of the purpose of man, in both the senses of humanity and the human male, is of particular urgency in something such as the Men's Human Rights Movement. The case for men standing his ground today is in tandem to the case that he was always meant to.

We once again address the bizarre case for "natural gynocentrism" which attempts to determine that man is meant to service womankind, intrinsically, because of "biological reasons". Attached to it is the notion that man should not change it and instead accept such an existence, albeit with the possible stipulation that gynocentrism has "gotten out of hand".

This is the notion that mankind evolved to pedestalize women, and that's why we are here. Ergo, man was always meant to live on his knees for women. Because biology.

It is for this reason we must make clear and advocate for a new cultural narrative that says no, mankind was never meant to grovel, but instead is meant to hold himself up, and always was.

Perhaps it is much more than a convenience of evolution that human beings are creatures that stand tall on two legs. It could be that there is a deeper, metaphysical meaning behind that evolution. What does it mean to bring such a creature down from where he stands?

The observant will notice that not only is there not enough defense of the man who stands for himself, but rather glorifies the kowtower, and alleges its charm, calling it "humility."

If it is improper for a human being to be brought to his knees, then it follows that it is improper that anybody expects another human being to be on their knees for them. Taking all of this into consideration, we can point at where kneeling takes place in our society – who does them, for whom. Who expects this behavior. Who demands it. Who can't imagine life without it.

From kowtowing to authority figures to going on his knees to attain women's approval, mankind has made this practice an unquestioned habit. Under comfortable labels such as "sacrifice", "humility", "service" and even "love", the symbolic groveling act holds the status of virtuous behavior. The refusal to do so holds the status of reckless independence, stubbornness, and adolescent rebellion.

They are, in fact, partly right about the latter. Standing tall and defiant on one's feet requires independence. A streak of recklessness, for lack of a better term, can be a recipe for successful risk-taking endeavors where necessary. There is no problem with stubbornness if it means refusal to compromise one's values and the well-being of himself and his own kin. Some of us can stand to revisit our adolescent energy in the face of the Saturnian stagnation of cold authority. Furthermore, being a rebel for the right cause is always noteworthy.

Make no mistake that those that uphold the virtues of subservient existence consider these qualities anathema. They aren't misnomers, meaning that they are not mistaken in their choice of words as they blame independence for not being a good, humble-enough groveler.

What it Means to Kneel

Cast off all the clutter of empty justifications and excuses in the mind that grasps for any wholesome meaning to kneeling, and let's cut to the chase with this one. I'm going to tell you what going down on your knees really means.

We have to realize that kneeling is not a picture made up of one figure, but at least two. Even if it is a solo act, something abstract fills the second role. Figure A is of course the kneeler, the creature on his knees. Figure B is the one that Figure A is at the feet of. Figure B stands, and looks down at Figure A.

B knows that the dirt is A's rightful place. B may profess "compassion" and can possibly permit B to look up at A, emphasis on permit, but not generally; typically, A must avert his eyes.

The brutally honest interpretation of the image is Figure A representing the defeated being, the diminished, the lower, the inferior, the unworthy; Figure B would then represent the pedestalized, the exalted, the usurper, the tyrannical, the one that looks down and condescends.

This is a common historical toxic relationship between two humans – one human basking in the glory of being higher of another lowly, broken human. A relationship of host and parasite instead of equally human but different individuals – a defiance of human dignity, a false uplift involving the lowering of another.

There is no exception to this formula when we look at the everyday phenomenon of Romantic kneeling. A man is always expected to be on one or both of his knees. The woman, in presumed exaltation, looks down on him, and knows that in her mind and that of the society that upholds her, that he belongs there. He is hers to use and dispose.

Flip the genders, and this would constitute some sort of toxic, abusive relationship. The fact that it is acceptable the way we see it occurring in our real world is the problem that should be addressed and challenged.

It should be considered a form of sadism for a woman to actually be delighted to be in this position, or to observe this occurrence as a third party and classifying it as joyful. Likewise, it should be considered a form of masochism for a man to partake in such fundamental submission.

Too many think that these are the sort of things men do that women should be thankful for. At the risk of once again the message falling under deaf ears, I have to make this point yet again by asking the question: why is a man groveling on his knees and debasing himself something to be thankful for?

Why is the risk to men's well-being and sacrifice of their time, health, and very lives subject to female gratitude? Why does the belittling of one for the pedestalization of another have any place in what is supposed to be a civilized society, in which all of humanity enjoy same dignity as human beings?

The Meaning of Natural

A common response I receive when I speak out against the expectation that gynocentrism is natural goes something like the following: "I do believe it is natural, even if I am against it."

Again, a reminder of what is meant by gynocentrism: deference to women and their needs and wants at the expense of men and their needs and wants. These people are saying this state of affairs is natural, no matter what they ultimately feel about it. In other words, biologically proper to the species.

Perhaps it is only fair to reference two contexts of "natural": evolutionarily arrived at, and what is metaphysically meant to be. I will attempt to respond to the allegation of "gynocentric nature" from both of these contexts.

We are generally preoccupied with human reproduction as well as the survival of the species when invoking evolution in justifying gynocentrism. A favorite bromide, paraphrased, is "A man can inseminate many women and the tribe will survive, whereas the opposite is unsustainable, therefore women's survival is more valuable than any man."

I will remind you that too many antifeminists love this argument; beware of the ones that parrot it.

But as it turns out, if humanity was "centric" about anything, the case would be better made that it would be about the children since it is their survival that trumps both adult men and women, at least so it has socially been accepted. Even without the argument from child-centrism, both men and women are equally valuable and necessary, and men have to be highlighted now because of how they are treated as extras at best, disposable and less than human at worst.

Gynocentrism clearly prioritizes male groveling and catering to females as if they are a superhuman level of being. Either that, or the male is subhuman; regardless, the tiers are clear. Female more valuable than male. But if it rings true that men are what build society, then is vulgar to even imagine them as anything but valuable.

The question to ask then becomes this: is it biologically natural for men to be downplayed as a subspecies of human of little to no importance to the evolutionary equation? Is degradation and mortification mankind's natural state as it is the natural state for the female of the species to treat them accordingly?

There is a sickening prospect as traditional gynocentrists indulge in this line of thinking. Observe how they refer to the "science" of evopsych propaganda to justify the existence of the gynocentric status quo, just like Nazi Germany used the "science" of racial superiority as fuel for their particular ethnic crusade. Both use a form of scientism to justify classifying one group of humans as above, and the other below.

It is important to note that there is much more to the nature of humanity than just its survival and how it reproduces. The evolution of humanity chiefly has to do with how it evolved into its current physical and social form. As I have stated, Humanity evolved to stand and walk on its own two feet. Clearly, it is a large factor in bringing the species to where it is now.

Remember, however, what Homo Sapiens means: “Thinking Man”. Thinking is more than solving math problems or recognizing landscapes or realizing that fire burns…or worse, obeying; it is about asking questions – philosophy was born with the human, as he first contemplated the reason for his limited time on Earth.

Conclusion

What, then, is natural to mankind? To stand, to think, to achieve greatness.

What is decidedly not natural to mankind? To act in contrary fashion to the meaning of mankind. To not think, in other words conform. To not achieve, in other words to berate greatness or even worse, to destroy it. To not stand, in other words, to go down on his knees and grovel.

Based on what I have stated thus far, groveling is an act of non-humanity. The same species that looks forward and up for his aspirations and goals and ultimately followed through to create wonders civilizational, technological, and creative cannot simultaneously say that he is a mere animal in subservience.

Kneeling, then, means assuming the role of the subhuman. It becomes improper for anyone, man or woman, to assume the role that which condescends another human as a subhuman role. To see a man on his knees should be met with grave concern, instead of bubbling saccharine gratitude.

Groveling to the female of the species is completely incompatible to the nature of mankind as a bipedal driver of the motor of the world, end of story. This is my response to those who say that gynocentrism is natural, no matter whether they hate it or not: we are against gynocentrism because it is not natural, but rather a social disease with no proper biological backing.

Consider then why any woman must want this. Ever since the attempt to weasel into sex-relational favoritism by way of Romantic Love and courtship, in which the first gynocentrist gave an irresistible sales pitch that says “men much be subhuman servants to holy womankind” in order to curry favor with a woman, the stage was set. Women learned to see men as marks.

This has been my case for challenging the act of the kneel as gracious or wholesome as our gynocentric world loves to insist.

The next time you see a man proposing to a woman on his knees, know that he is degrading himself no matter the outcome of the proposal. The next time you see a man kowtowing on his knees to an authority figure that may or many not be divine, he is not practicing humility in any meaningful sense but rather has integrated his unworthiness as a human.

Kneeling is a gross affirmation of man as a sacrificial animal. It is an admission that he lives for the approval of tyrants big and small.

The reason why this should be placed as a higher issue for our men's movement is because too many who call for "real masculinity" cite kneeling as an actual masculine trait. This is a danger, and we will do well to know one when we spot one.

Snow Angels

October 1, 2024 | by D.D.Harper | Link | Original Link

Illinois winter. 1999.

There is nothing more rewarding than to see your children come of age and too often, these times are fleeting like sun reflected ripples rolling across the water. As a father I cherish each and every one and here is Gabriel's story.

One morning after a mid winter storm I thought my sons would get a kick out of making snow men in the yard so I ran down the hallway and burst with excitement through the boy's bedroom door.

"Guys time to get up we have things to do."

Gabe and Kevin four and ten shuffled in their beds grumbling a bit and attempted to go back to sleep.

"Hey, I'm serious it snowed last night and we need to get out there and make snow men."

The boys slowly rolled out of bed and when they were able to stand without stumbling I walked over and together we looked out the window. To their amazement they saw three feet of snow covering the yard, in their excitement they didn't take the time to get dressed before they ran down the hall to the kitchen, the boys in their skivvies opened the sliding glass door to the back deck of our house. Kevin had seen snow before so he knew the fun to be had, but this was Gabe's first time and the look of amazement on his face will always remain with me.

Gabe was reveling in his new discovery as Kevin and I decided to have a little adventure. I challenged him to a snow angel contest. Being skeptical for all of ten seconds he agreed to the challenge, as long as I went first.

Down to my boxers now, Kevin looked at me sheepishly with eyes wide open and a quizzical frown on his face. I carefully positioned myself, and with a quick breath I fell backwards with abandon maintaining my composure while I slowly made an angel in the snow. The boys had broad smiles on their faces with a bit of dubiety in their glaze that made it all worth the shock of icy shivers crawling down and up my body.

Once my angel was done I suggested to Kevin he should get a few towels before he made his angel. With towels now in hand Kevin carefully positioned himself next to my angel and slowly fell into the fluffy white layers covering the ground. There he was, lying flat and feeling that first shock I felt only moments before. I encouraged him to start moving his hands and feet to form his angel and like Jumping Jacks he made the fastest snow angel in history before he bounced up and shot like a bolt into the warm comfort of the towel I had waiting for him.

"Pretty good there Mr."

I was drying him off and getting him warm when Gabe insisted he wanted to make his angel next to ours.

“I don’t know Gabe. I don’t think you’ll like it very much.”

He looked at me confidently and with sparkles in his eyes he said “I can do it”

With trepidation I positioned him next to our angels and with all the bravery he could muster he fell back into the ground. For what seemed like agonizing minutes he just laid there with a look on his face, a face I had only seen once before when the doctor stitched his forehead after running into a cart at the supermarket.

“Dad what have I done?” Then he started screaming.

“Gabe shhh, it’s ok.”

The two of us stood there in shock for a moment and Kevin told Gabe to start moving his arms and legs. Gabe just laid there in his underwear, screaming and no doubt waking up the neighborhood. I was about to pull him out of the snow when we heard soft footsteps hurriedly coming our way.

“Kevin we’re in big trouble now.” I muttered.

We turned around and all I could say was “Hi honey!”

“What on earth are you two doing to Gabriel?”

“Hmmm, we’re making snow angels.”

“You guys are unbelievable!” She got Gabe out of the snow and bundled him in one of the towels. “What are you guys thinking? He’s only four.”

I thought to myself “you wouldn’t understand.”

Kevin was not helpful letting his mother know that Gabe wanted to do it and we told him to shoosh up.

After discussing what not to do we had showers and the breakfast was on me. I had a lot of atonement to do. After we finish eating the littlest guy chimed up and told his mother he wanted to make his own angel. I avoided eye contact and hoped Kevin did not say anything. Mom did everything to discourage Gabe but he was not having any of it.

Finally she looked at me and said quietly “See what you started?”

The only thing I could say with a weak smile was “we’d better get some dry towels.”

I tried to convince Gabe that it would be better if he put on some warm cloths and a jacket first, but the little man was firm that doing that wouldn’t make a good angel.

He took his clothes off and proclaimed he was ready. I opened the sliding door and he walked out gingerly where the snow was lightest then he carefully positioned himself and made his first snow angel without a squeak.

Gabriel is now one of the boys.

The feminists’ great “equality” lie

October 5, 2024 | by Hannah Wallen | Link | Original Link

Ask a feminist what feminism is about, and the answer you’re most likely to get is a statement about fighting for equality. Look carefully at the combination of stances which mainstream, established feminist groups take on intimate partner violence, and “feminism is about fighting for equality” is quickly exposed as a bald-faced lie.

In response to discussion on reciprocal intimate partner violence, and men defending against assault by a female partner, the feminist position is that there is never any circumstance that justifies a man “hitting” a woman. For context, I should point out that in this type of discussion, any use of any kind of physical force or resistance by a man ends up getting described by feminists as “hitting,” regardless of the context of the action. If a woman throws a punch at a man, and he puts his arm up to take the punch with his forearm instead of his face or his chest, that’s him “hitting.” If she jabs at him with a sharp object, and he takes it from her, that’s him “hitting.” If he can’t flee from her assault without going past her, any touch she feels or imagines as he goes by is him “hitting.” If, to stop her attempt to hurt him, herself, or anyone else, he physically restrains her with a bear hug, that’s him “hitting.”

The sheer hypocrisy of the assertion that there could be any reason men should have no right to physically defend themselves from female abusers is evidenced by the use of “battered women’s syndrome” as a defense for women who kill their partners. Place the two assertions side by side, and reduce them to their most basic nature, and you have,”it’s acceptable to escalate domestic abuse to a more violent level, as long as the person escalating to greater violence is a female claiming self-defense.”

Adding to that hypocrisy is that part of the battered woman argument is based on treating the woman as if she’s trapped in the relationship. Feminists do not afford abused men the same consideration, even in light of the gender difference in ability to escape an abusive environment, where women arguably have it easier. Abused women (or even allegedly abused women) who decide to leave an intimate partnership have resources every step of the way, especially in the U.S. where domestic abuse law is based on the idea that abusers are men, and victims are women.

Even without alleging abuse, a woman has advantages in leaving a marriage or a partnership which has produced one or more children. In the legal arena, the default standard for her to get at least primary residential custody of the children, and there are many areas in which a divorcing man is expected to at least in part continue to financially support his ex-wife after she no longer lives with him even if there are no children (alimony).

Once abuse is alleged, she has additional support from police, criminal courts, and domestic violence victim’s advocacy organizations, who are all geared to think of the accuser as “the victim” from the moment she states her accusation. A woman with victim status is afforded leniency regarding her own behavior, and aggressively protected from conditions to which she might be averse. In the U.S., she is even provided an advocate paid for with federal funding, to see her through the process of prosecuting her alleged abuser.

The combined resources dedicated to abused women will provide her with legal protection, recourse within the criminal justice system, shelter, and financial assistance where needed. Many domestic abuse victim's advocacy organizations will support an accuser in her effort to get custody of and financial support for her children. Her case will be addressed from the position that she is a victim recovering from trauma, with related needs and quirks that must be taken into account. She'll be offered therapy to help her in her recovery. In other words, there is plenty of government-sponsored support for an abused woman to gain freedom from her abuser.

A man doesn't get the same benefits. In addition to the bias against him in civil court which translates into a woman's ability to punish him financially if he chooses to abandon a marriage, as a direct result of feminist activism in the area of domestic violence, despite existing evidence that intimate partner violence is not a gendered issue, systems intended to assist victims are designed to exclude those who are male. Policy at these organizations and agencies is built around a male aggressor/female victim model. Resources are dedicated to accommodating female victims, with little or nothing left for male victims. Instead of the consideration and compassion that gets offered to female victims, the male victim faces marginalization and false labeling. He has a strong chance of being told that victim's advocacy organizations are funded and designed to serve only women, and being given a number for a hotline for men that leads to a system designed to handle abusers seeking psychological treatment, where he'll be treated as such instead of offered assistance for his actual situation.

Organizations which do offer help to men do not offer them assistance that equals what they offer women. Men cannot stay in the same shelter because as men, they're considered dangerous. If housing is offered, it's usually a short stay in a hotel room, which doesn't help men trying to escape abusive partners with their children in tow. Abused fathers who don't want to leave their kids with abusive mothers are shit-outta-luck. They may receive some legal assistance if they're poor enough to qualify, but they won't receive the same level of support in establishing custody of and support for their children as is offered to abused mothers. If that lack of support leaves the abuser with custody of the children, then the burden of making child support payments will be added to the hurdles the abused man faces in his effort to leave the relationship.

Law enforcement is often no help to them, and can even present added danger. In the U.S., mandatory arrest and primary aggressor policies lead police to respond to female-perpetrated partner violence by arresting the victim. In many counties, mandatory prosecution policies guarantee that the injustice begun by arresting the victim will continue with dragging him into court, and putting him through a trial in which he will be accused of violence and face potential jail time.

It's rare for a man abused by his female partner to find adequate assistance within either system, and the law enforcement and justice system may actually add to the abuse instead of helping him to escape from it.

Feminists support the battered women's syndrome murder defense as if violence were the only option available for an abused woman to escape her abuser. The same group has fought to create an environment that punishes men for leaving a relationship with a female partner, and to deny assistance to male victims of female violence. After all of that, now they argue that an abused man genuinely trapped in his environment should not have the right to defend himself from his abuser, and they call any statement to the contrary "apologia" and "endorsement of violence against women."

If the mere suggestion that a trapped male victim of female violence should be allowed to defend himself is endorsement of violence against women…how much more is the effort feminists have made to establish a woman's "right" to abuse her male partner with impunity, with the power to make him stay and take it, an endorsement of violence against men?

But of course, feminism is about fighting for equality…as long as we all understand that some people are more equal than others.

“The One True Masculinity” – Part 2: The Alpha

October 8, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

As mentioned in Part 1, ancient cultures recognized dozens of male archetypes – showcased for example in the Greek gods and heroes where each mythological character is presented as a carefully differentiated expression of masculinity.

Despite our tendency to think of Zeus as the single alpha male of the pack, it’s more accurate to say that each god, each archetype, demonstrates alpha qualities in a specific domain; each demonstrating a different kind of power.

Zeus was alpha in his political leadership, Ares in martial skill, Hephaestus in labour consciousness and artisan mastery, Apollo on intellectual pursuits, and so on. Conversely each of these characters are beta, if not sigma in the areas outside of their specialities, as demonstrated in the instances where each god was subjected to moments of dominance by another deity.

Looked at in this polytheistic way, modern descriptions of alpha, beta, sigma etc. appear not only reductionistic as applied to real men (men who may excel in one area and not another), but also frankly gynocentric in the way each ranking is defined by the criterion of whether a man is pleasing to, or useful for women. Is gynocentric appeal the only way to assess alpha value?

By way of contrast none of the classic male gods (archetypes) described by the Greeks were based on what women want, which alpha, beta, sigma etc. designations have unfortunately come to be defined today. Instead, they were based on special areas of male competency.

To summarize, humans are not like bears or wolves who become alpha based on simple formulae like strength and bite force. Alpha masculinity in humans can demonstrate superiority via a plurality of competencies, a fact not lost on the makers of Marvel movies which showcase a shifting mantle of ‘alpha’ based on the individual skillsets called for in a given (and always changing) situation. The sooner we jettison our singular notions of alpha, the sooner we can get down to appreciating the rich diversity of masculine potentials.

* * *

Further Reading: The One True Masculinity

Hannah Wallen Interview with Vernon Meigs

October 10, 2024 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

Women Viewing Men as Dogs

October 12, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following book titles are all aimed at female readers and were collected from a cursory glance at Amazon. This sample is nowhere near the entirety of those available in this, er, genre – but they are sufficient to paint a picture of how millions of women around the world apparently view relationships with men as experiments in animal behaviorism and manipulation strategies, with the aim of controlling men.

The tables of contents reveal the books as patently disrespectful toward men, misandric and certainly repulsive for any self-respecting male. But for the adventurous reader who would like to look more closely at the content, each of the titles are searchable at Amazon.com.

Male Victims Are Funny?

October 13, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Feminism in psychology corrupting public education; “feminism directly produces the atmosphere that discounts male victims by perpetuating a female victim story-line.”

Parental Alienation Syndrome

October 15, 2024 | by Editorial Staff | Link | Original Link

---

This article appeared as a blog post on AVFM and Antimisandry.com by one of our forum members Deidre. It is edited and republished here with her permission. –Ed

Have you ever felt like an outcast? Perhaps, looking back during your childhood, you were at times, the odd person out. It's a very uncomfortable feeling and most of the time, people who have been alienated from family members, friends, coworkers, etc. are left confused as to what they have done to have been banished from the fold. There is a type of alienation however, that is insanely dangerous and damaging, and that is parental alienation. And, it leads to what is commonly referred to as ''parental alienation syndrome.''

The root cause of the syndrome is when a custodial parent indirectly or deliberately thwarts the relationship between the non-custodial parent and his/her child, causing the child to wish no longer to spend much or any time with the non-custodial parent. This is done through a number of manipulative tactics by the custodial parent, usually as a form of revenge, to turn the child(ren) away from the non-custodial parent. The majority of alienated parents are fathers, which comes as no surprise since mothers are usually given greater legal custodial rights over their children, than fathers.

I know of a few men, online and offline, who are victims of being estranged from their children, due to the reprehensible behavior of the parent who has sole custody. When did the court system start viewing children as property? It seems that in divorces these days, kids are treated as bargaining chips in a vindictive battle, suffering alongside the alienated parent. I've been researching a bit about this epidemic and found some very insightful advice that is worth posting here, for those parents (namely fathers) who find themselves in despair, and have all but lost hope in ever having a close, consistent relationship with their children.

Parental alienation is categorized into three separate tiers of severity. Before a boxer gets into the ring to fight his opponent, he tends to know beforehand what he's up against. Likewise, these tiers of severity can help an alienated parent figure out what he is up against, as well.

The first type of severity falls under the phrase ''naïve alienator.'' This type of alienator has a rather nonchalant view of parenting in general, and might say something to the effect of ''I'm not made of money, when you see your father next, ask him to buy you a new cell phone.'' If said often enough, the child gets the sense that dad is a utility, and mom is fed up with having to take care of him/her. Eventually, the child will see his/her dad as little more than a money provider and errand boy – an image that evolved over time by the consistent drip of derogatory comments from the mother about the father.

The second type of severity is something counselors call the ''active alienator.'' This type of alienation is harsher than the naïve alienator and usually comes out like this to a child ‘’Don’t tell your father I’m dating someone, he’s a cheap jerk and will withhold money from you. You don’t want that to happen do you?’’ Active alienators are typically angry, vengeful and could be categorized as narcissistic. Children who are victims of these types of tactics, quickly start seeing their dads as their mothers do – a possible enemy who is only looking out for himself.

The most dangerous and severe of the alienation types is what is known as the ‘’obsessed alienator.’’ This type of parent will stop at nothing to destroy the relationship between the non-custodial parent, and the child(ren). Obsessed alienators are dubbed this because they are ruthless in their behaviors against their exes and usually try to bankrupt them through incessant court battles. Most likely these types have narcissistic personality disorder, because they are unafraid of the court system, and will do virtually anything to keep the non-custodial parent away from their kids. The children of an obsessed alienator usually end up having great disdain for the alienated parent, because children simply can’t process things as adults do, and are left feeling abandoned by the alienated parent. From what I’ve read, this type is the one that has the greatest capacity to do the most harm to a child, for once the child accepts what the custodial parent is saying about the other parent, it will be a long road to repairing that relationship, if possible at all.

So, what should a father do if he suspects that his ex is purposely turning his kids against him? What avenues of recourse can he find to help support him in helping his children to offset the damage that the alienating parent is doing? This is quite simply put, emotional child abuse at the hands of the custodial parent. Because emotional abuse, in general, is a harder thing to prove than physical abuse, and also because parental alienating syndrome is challenging to pin down with an actual diagnosis by a trained counselor/doctor – the custodial parent continues to get away with distancing the non-custodial parent, and increasing the harm being done to the child. Upon discussing this with an online friend who is going through a difficult custody battle with his ex, he shared that he is trying to get his attorney to insist that his children seek counseling, mandated by the courts. One would hope that in doing so, the children will open up in an honest way in a counseling situation, but it depends on how badly the children’s opinion of their father, has been damaged. That said, it stands to reason that it is worth pushing forward in the court system, to see if judges finally start opening their eyes as to parent alienation being a form of child abuse. If it were me going through such a difficult situation, I’d look for an attorney who specializes in parental alienation syndrome cases, and see what their track record has been. Also, finding men’s support groups to assist with support and encouragement on an emotional level, as dads go through their ordeals, will be very helpful, as well. It is incredibly disconcerting to be painted in a light that is not true, especially to one’s children. Most fathers feel powerless in such dilemmas because the custodial parent has what can be deemed as control over their children, directing them on how to think of their fathers, and poisoning their minds as to why their fathers aren’t going to be in their lives.

I’ve come to the conclusion in life, that there are no words at times to convey how inhumane some people can be to others. To use one's child to strike back or seek revenge on an ex-spouse is deplorable. Times may seem bleak, but there has to be a way to rise above these injustices, to give children a better life. Children need both of their parents, present and active in their lives, to foster a healthy upbringing. No child should have to endure parental alienation syndrome…not ever.

''Children seldom misquote their parents. In fact, they usually repeat word for word, what their parents shouldn't have said.'' – Unknown

A helpful link: http://www.fact.on.ca/Info/pas/gardnr98.htm

Semper Fido! Greater Love Hath No Dog

October 16, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

If I read one more article or listen to one more podcast about the dire social effects of flagging birth rates in developed nations, I think I'll have a cow myself. Various countries have tried various programs to hike the birth rate but with limited success. It's tempting to think we are doomed, that nothing can be done. Nevertheless, I think we can do something about it. In fact, I have a plan!

I know, I know, whenever you hear a politician say "I have a plan," the reflex response is a cringe followed by a hankering to stock up on food and water, plus a trip to the nearest gold and silver exchange. But I am not a politician! My proposal will in no way endanger the republic, though the great unwashed will likely find it outrageous. Nevertheless, I submit it for your consideration. It's really quite simple: MAKE DOGS ILLEGAL! Granted, that dictum might leave you scratching your head but not from flea infestation. The cause and effect of this policy needs some fleshing out, so let's do so.

Thanks to birth control, abortion, and feminism, women in the civilized world are having fewer babies. The barefoot and pregnant policy is kaput. And the consensus is that it's all good. After all, working women are good for the economy and, as we all know, if something is good for the economy, that trumps every other consideration. Of course, we could argue about what really is or is not "good" for the economy, short-term and long-term, but that would require a book-length digression.

Admittedly, keeping women barefoot and depriving them of their beloved footwear would be cruel and unusual punishment. Also, it would bankrupt shoe designers and manufacturers, which would ripple throughout the global economy and probably throw a lot of workers in third world sweatshops out of work. No need to do that.

Pregnancy is another matter. It's true that childless women earn more money so they have more disposable income – more money to buy more stuff! Also, the government collects more tax revenue! On the other hand, the minuscule birth rate is doing a number on manufacturers of kid-related merchandise. You might have noticed that Toys 'R" Us stores are no more. No telling what's going on with Mattel, Fisher-Price, and Oshkosh B'gosh. And what about Kellogg's and General Mills and all those other purveyors of kids' cereals? Do we want to live in a world devoid of Fruit Loops and Lucky Charms? Unthinkable, I know, but in the meantime I wouldn't advise buying stock in any of the above-referenced companies.

Then there's the whole welfare state Ponzi scheme…how can it stay afloat with more and more retired people and fewer and fewer working people? Of course, we can always revert to pre-welfare state realities…you know, work all your life till you die or get too sick to work, whichever comes first. Good luck selling that austerity program to the public.

Now let's introduce that much-vaunted female nurturing instinct. This is a divisive concept among feminists. The hard-core egalitarian feminists assert there is no such instinct. The nurturing instinct is just another social construct devised to keep women down. The female supremacist feminists insist there is a nurturing instinct and it is one reason why women are superior to men – but that doesn't mean they'll be any help in elevating the birth rate. You'll never hear any of them repeating that old "The hand that rocks the cradle rules the world" line. Nevertheless, let's give a nod to evolutionary biology and posit that there is something like a female nurturing instinct or drive. More to the point, how does this instinct or drive express itself among childless women?

Well, I have observed that as the birth rate has fallen the dog population has grown apace. I don't have any statistics to prove that, but I do have an informal survey. When I moved into my current home 40 years ago, I almost never saw anyone walking a dog down my street. There was one old lady with a dachshund who went by now and then, and that was it. Now almost every time I go out my door there is someone with one or more pooches on a leash going by. More often than not, it is a young man, woman, or couple in prime siring/childbearing years.

Now I'm sure that canine upkeep is cheaper than childcare. I don't think abortion has ever been a thing with dogs but canine disposability has a long history, as decomposing puppy corpses in burlap bags were once commonplace in lake and river bottoms. Unlike human beings, problematic dogs can be put down with no fear of social disapproval. And when a healthy dog wears out his welcome for one reason or another…well, you just take him for a long ride, open the car door, and let him fend for himself. If he gets in touch with his inner wolf, he just might make it.

Conscientious dog owners would never countenance the above behavior, even if Fido turns out to be a money pit. I remember once talking to a co-worker about a friend who had just paid a vet bill of $5,000. She huffed and responded, "That's nothing. I spent $10,000 on my dog last year!" Obviously, she had failed to apply a cost-benefit analysis to the situation, but I though it prudent not to raise that issue. Given the inflation that has occurred since that conversation, the sums mentioned above would probably be double today. So I am not surprised to find out that it is now possible to buy health insurance for your dog. I suppose it's just a matter of time before the left takes notice of this issue and proclaims that pet health insurance is a human right and government-administered, single-payer pet insurance must be instituted.

This is not to say that children aren't expensive, but at least one day they will probably pay taxes and contribute to Social Security and Medicare. If you treat them right, they might even take care of you in your old age. No guarantee, of course, but it is a possibility. Fido, of course, will never pay taxes or contribute to Social Security and Medicare. If he's still around when you are in your dotage, he might be a faithful friend, but he won't be able to feed you, change your diapers or drive you to your doctor appointments.

Fido won't like to hear this, but he and his ilk have never had it better. The canine sense of entitlement has never been greater. Forty years ago bringing one's dog to the office was unthinkable. The same was true of public transit, restaurants, and bars. Fido is no longer canis non grata. You can even take him to the ballpark on select dates. It will probably take a kennel cough pandemic to turn back the clock on this trend.

In days of yore if you took your dog everywhere you went, you'd darn well better be wearing dark glasses and have a white cane. I readily admit that a well-trained German shepherd who can keep a blind person from getting hit by a car is a big plus. But an emotional support chihuahua? Little children make do with stuffed animals. Couldn't adults do likewise?

When you watch people interacting with dogs it is readily apparent that they are substitute human beings. A man's wife may never bear him a son, but at least he has a dog to play catch with. Of course, he can never teach a Newfoundland to throw a curve ball.

Women are particularly fond of what we used to call lapdogs (c.f., neoteny or the infant schema), roughly the same size as a human infant…just as noisy and smelly, come to think of it. Childless women lavish love and attention on the diminutive mutts that mothers typically expend on their infants. A human infant will eventually mature, but no matter how old the little dogs get, they will always be childlike. I predict that women denied the companionship of these pseudo-children would turn to bearing real children to satisfy their nurturing instincts. Either that or develop a dwarf fetish.

Now when I recommend banning dogs, I would of course exempt the aforementioned seeing-eye dogs, K-9 patrol dogs, and any other dog who performs a service. I once knew a diabetic whose dog could sense when her blood sugar was going haywire and would alert her. Such dogs are not substitute children; they have a purpose in life, and that's more than you can say for a lot of human beings.

Like dogs, horses used to be a fixture in civilization. They were essential as beasts or burden or for transportation. Today horses are obsolete thanks to automation and the automobile. Their utility has ebbed greatly. They are of use to mounted police and ranchers, but otherwise they are an indulgence for those who have enough space and money to maintain them. Dogs have the good fortune to be much smaller, making them suitable for urban and suburban companionship. Hence the popularity of dogs as companions for the childless.

So how to bring about a ban on dogs? I don't think there are any legal barriers to doing so. Even the most adept practitioner of shyster sophistry would be hard-pressed to assert that there is a constitutional right to own dogs! On the contrary, the Tenth Amendment would allow for any state to ban dogs if it chose to do so.

Now I readily admit that banning dogs nationwide would be federal tyranny; that's why it should start locally. Try it first with a small legislative body, a city council for example. Then try a county-wide ban. Then take it up in the state legislature. If one state takes the step and bans dogs and birth rates start to rise in that state, then other states would take note. As a bonus, the imposition of fines on illegal dog owners would be a bountiful source of revenue. States would also note that and start drafting their own legislation.

Now if banning dogs is too radical for you, perhaps rationing dogs would be more practicable. No dogs for single people or childless couples, but if a couple has two children, then they qualify for a pooch. The number of dogs and children could be varied according to state. At the same time, the best specimens of each breed of dog can be kept in zoos for future humans to study and enjoy.

The messy part of outlawing dogs would be what to do with the dogs still in existence. Admittedly, Fidocide would be messy and politically unfeasible. But thanks to the relatively short lives of dogs, we can outlaw them by attrition. Dogs who die will not be replaced. Needless to say, the neutering of all dogs in existence will be compulsory.

Of course, numerous special interest groups will be outraged – veterinarians, for one. Dog groomers for another. But professions come and go regularly. Old skills can be transferred to new fields and new skills can be learned. Surely, learning to code is still a plus in the job market.

Perhaps the loudest squealers of all would be the pet food manufacturers. I'm sure Alpo, Iams, et al would fight any attempt to outlaw dogs. Actually, they would be just fine, as were the brewers who remained in business during Prohibition by brewing near beer and bottling soda pop. As inflation ravages the economy and grocery bills go higher and higher, the dog food processers could merely re-package their dog food for human consumption.

Now I can hear some dog lovers saying what about cats? Sorry, but cats and dogs are like apples and oranges. It's hard to estimate the cat population because people don't take them out in public. But out of sight does not mean out of mind. As the number of cat ladies grows, it stands to reason that the cat population is growing in proportion. But the cat population has no effect on the plunging human birth rate. Rather, it is a symptom of the birth dearth.

Cats are pretty self-sufficient; given enough food and water and someone to clean out their cat box and gather up their furballs, they can otherwise do without human company. So I don't think the female nurturing drive is visited upon felines, at least not beyond the kitten stage. Rather, the cat is a cohort, a companion for females who have hit the wall. The cat will remain so throughout menopause, old age, and unto death. In short, their presence does not abet the low human birth rate. So I would leave cats alone.

After all, the dog, not the cat, is man's best friend. There are numerous tales of dogs going to great lengths, sometimes even sacrificing their lives in service to their masters. Now the stakes are higher. The future of humanity is at stake, and the dog as ersatz child is a luxury we can tolerate no more. That's why the dog's greatest achievement may be to make the ultimate sacrifice for the good of man.

Now I readily admit that my proposal smacks of speciesism. In addition, feminists might assert that it is really just a backhanded form of misogyny. Compared to the future of mankind, these are petty concerns. We cannot go dog-whistling past the pet cemetery any longer.

Greater love hath no species than to die in service to humanity. It is a far, far better thing they do then they have ever done — far greater than anything Lassie or Rin-Tin-Tin ever did.

Like all legislation, the statutory ban on dogs can be rescinded. If women come to their senses – and that's a mighty big "if" – we will have our representative dog breeds in the zoos ready to produce litters of puppies for adoption.

There's no question we have the political means to enact such legislation. It will not be easy, but eventually dogged determination will win the day!

Fuck the Salvation Army

October 18, 2024 | by Jeremiah | Link | Original Link

I'm moving. I have a lot of clothes I don't need from when I was a consumer whore. I want to give them away because I'm a giving person.

In a functional society, I could give my clothes to an organization that would proceed to hand them, for free, to people who really need them.

Instead, the easiest options are giving to either Goodwill or The Salvation Army. Goodwill charges exorbitant prices to people with a lot of money and then goes and spends 84% of that money on vague social programs while spending 16% on running the business and filling the pockets of the jerks at the top who thought it would be a great idea to profit off of donations.

Now, on to The Salvation Army. Well I'd like to donate, so what does The Salvation Army stand for? I click on "Programs that Help" and the right at the top I see "Anti-Pornography".

Oh, Jesus, I'm not donating to that.

The only reason for anyone to be anti-pornography is that porn allows beta men an outlet for their sexual frustration instead 0f marrying a woman who will divorce his ass almost 50% of the time and take his children and all his money; where he'll be lucky not to end up in debtor's prison for failure to pay. And for all the feminists out there who complain about rape of women, porn allows fractional minority of truly depraved men an outlet other than acting out their aggressions in the real world.

And so I investigate further. Under the anti-porn heading, I see the following: "Code of Conduct for Men" and "Sexual Addiction Treatment," Oh, God. So now the Salvation Army is going to tell me how to be a man and whether I have a sex addiction (read: healthy male sexuality). Too good to be true.

Because the Salvation Army felt the need to make their little code of how to be a pussy beggar into an annoying JPEG image, I felt the need to reproduce the entire thing here in TEXT format, along with my translation in true-speak in italics.

Salvation Army Code of Conduct for Men space

I REJECT unconditionally all violence against women and children. All men are abusers of women and children, and women never abuse anyone, ever.

I REJECT the buying of sex with women and children. All men want to have sex with children, but if a child is not available then they'll settle for a woman. Oh, and women don't like to have sex, and don't like to be paid for it either.

I WILL intervene when I see a man physically abusing a woman. It is my job as a man to sacrifice my life and well-being for any human being, as long as she happens to have a vagina.

I WILL NOT physically abuse my wife or partner. All men abuse their partners, and women never do.

I WILL intervene when my male colleagues, friends, or family belittle or degrade women. Women are perfect angels and no woman should ever be scolded for any reason, ever. Western women are good, each and every one of them.

I RECOGNIZE prostitution as harmful to women and will do everything I can to see the end of it. I will ensure that men cannot have sex, ever, unless they satisfy women's definition of manhood.

I REJECT the buying of pornography, recognizing it as sexual exploitation. Already covered.

I WILL NOT buy products that advertise by exploiting women's bodies when it has nothing at all to do with the product. I will not buy anything. Oh, and women just HATE being exploited. That's why every female in the world who becomes even moderately famous begs to pose in Maxim or FHM. They're being exploited – they're not just narcissists.

I WILL NOT visit clubs and bars that exploit women through 'exotic' dancing. I will NOT admire women's bodies, ew gross!

I WILL NOT buy newspapers and magazines that advertise sexual services. blah…blah…blah

I REJECT all forms of sexual harassment, including wolf whistling, sexual insinuations, and unauthorized physical contact. UNAUTHORIZED PHYSICAL CONTACT. Right. Apparently I need a fucking signed contract to tap a woman on her shoulder, and Han Solo is a God Damn rapist. And don't forget the caveat, this only applies if you're unattractive to the offended woman.

I WILL intervene when my male colleagues, friends, or family engage in sexual harassment. I will intervene when people at work flirt with each other. I will intervene every time a woman makes an allegation.

I WILL respect my female colleagues and partners as equals. I will pretend that my female "colleagues" are equals, even when they are not, which is the case almost every time. Actually, no, I will respect EQUALS as EQUALS. If someone isn't up to the fucking job, it's utterly irrelevant to me whether they have a vagina.

I RECOGNIZE decision-making at home is about equality and partnership. I recognize that women are always right and a man should never make decisions. Males should never lead because they're stupid, horny animals.

I WILL encourage other men to adopt and live by this code, including teaching it to my children. I vow to ruin the lives of my fellow man and all my offspring.

Fuck you, Salvation Army. Fuck you real good. At least you've demonstrated that your evangelical church is no more than a front for chivalric (read: feminist) ideals.

Yikes, I just sexually harassed the Salvation Army. I hope she doesn’t have a vagina, or I’m screwed!

Anyway, if you’re in need of sexual addiction/healthy male sexuality treatment, I’m sure the Salvation Army can help.

Seriously, if I can’t a find a church that will give these clothes to people who actually need them, I’m going to leave them by the fucking dumpster.

The Goal Post Episode 46 – Five More Stories of Women in Charge

October 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Swearing-In of Australian Senator Lidia Thorpe

October 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Australian senator Lidia Thorpe is in the news again. As usual this is for all the wrong reasons.

This time she caused a disturbance in Parliament House. She yelled at the King and renounced her oath of allegiance.

The video below shows her taking the oath of allegiance in 2022. She inserted words on her first attempt and was made to repeat it. This was widely reported in the media. Her deliberate mispronunciation of words on her second attempt was largely ignored at the time but has become important in recent days.

Recently Thorpe reminded everyone that she actually swore an oath to Queen Elizabeth's hairs, not heirs. She couldn't have renounced her oath of allegiance because she never made it in the first place – or so her argument goes.

Apparently it never occurred to her that this would mean that she's sitting in parliament illegally. We think this was immediately obvious to everyone else.

Now she's retracted the claim that she deliberately mispronounced parts of the oath. A mental giant Thorpe is not.

This isn't about whether Australia should become a republic or remain a constitutional monarchy. It's about having competent politicians.

A Century Of Gallantry

October 25, 2024 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

---

100 years ago a classic entry in the genre of British adventure fiction was published, but don't expect any gushing centennial retrospectives. Not surprisingly, given its age, Percy Christopher Wren's Beau Geste has some triggering content, largely racial slurs and stereotypes. The colonial setting alone would be enough to brand it taboo these days. The fact that three privileged white boys are the protagonists would also be held against it.

In 1924, however, this tale of derring-do in the Foreign Legion (or, if you prefer, Lègion Étrangère) was tailor-made for cinema, and Hollywood responded with a 1926 silent film (with Ronald Colman in the title role), as well as a 1939 (starring Gary Cooper) talkie. Another remake in 1966 with Dean Stockwell has gone down the memory hole. In 1977 the aptly named satire, The Last Remake of Beau Geste, also joined the ranks of the little noted nor long remembered.

It's not hard to see why Hollywood was attracted to the tale. The French Foreign Legion had many elements that made it more interesting than conventional military outfits. The Foreign Legion was so-called not because the troops were deployed to foreign lands but because it was the only unit of the French military that accepted foreigners. They were particularly convenient in conflicts where a high casualty rate was assured, as French citizens would be less concerned about the deaths of foreigners than of their countrymen. As a reward, a legionnaire was granted French citizenship after three years of duty or being wounded in action. In the latter case, he was Français par le sang versé – French by spilled blood.

The Foreign Legion was notorious for attracting men on the lam for one reason or another ("the exile of the self-condemned"), so adopting an alias or a nom de guerre was commonplace. Consequently, the legionnaires were a more colorful lot than regular soldiers and the potential for intrigue was much greater. Throw in the Sahara Desert with searing sunshine, oppressive heat, sand as far as the eye can see, plus the possibility of le cafar (literally, the cockroach), a peculiar sort of madness that afflicted legionnaires in the Sahara. All that plus nifty uniforms.

So you have all the elements for cinematic success. It doesn't hurt that the enemies are turbaned Mohammedans who ride camels. That might be a problem in some circles today, but it is much more scenic than fighting people who look like you and have more or less the same weaponry.

Having grown up during the Victorian era and matured during the Edwardian era, Percy Christopher Wren (1875-1941) wrote in a style reflecting the mindset of the British Empire pre-World War I. Beau Geste, though published after the war, takes place before that conflict and does not reflect any of the disillusionment that characterized postwar English poetry and fiction. Its detailed portrayal of life in the legion might lead the reader to assume that Wren had been a legionnaire, but that is doubtful. More than likely, his detailed portrayal of legionnaire life is based on what he read and from conversations with veterans. While the book may reflect attitudes that seem quaint today, its portrayal of how men behave in do-or-die circumstances is relevant to the contemporary manosphere.

The story concerns the Geste boys, three orphaned English brothers who have been adopted by their well-to-do Aunt Patricia, who has also adopted her niece Isobel as well as two other young relations. After the Blue Water, a valuable sapphire, vanishes, the aunt's brood, particularly the Geste brothers are prime suspects. Michael (aka Beau), the oldest brother, sneaks away and joins the Foreign Legion. He is quickly followed by Digby, his fraternal twin, and John, his younger brother. We do not know which, if any, of the brothers was the culprit.

As boys, the Geste brothers played at soldiering and war but they quickly find out that the Foreign Legion is a long way from their romantic notions of adventure, glory, and honor. In addition to a marauding tribe of Bedouins called Tuaregs, the soldiers must contend with the terrain, the climate, and a sadistic commandant, Sergeant Dejaune (for some reason, renamed Markoff in the 1939 movie).

It would be tempting to dismiss Beau Geste as mere escapist fiction but as is often the case in the more enduring examples of popular culture, there is more than meets the eye. Bringing a different mindset to the material, 2024 readers/moviegoers might notice themes overlooked by their counterparts of a century ago.

Male disposability was not a concern 100 years ago (which is not to say it wasn't a reality) but it is an integral part – perhaps the principal theme – of Beau Geste. In fact, if you watch the 1926 and 1939 films, it is evident right from the start.

In narrative terms, the "hook" is something in the beginning of a story that transfixes the reader/moviegoer and, hopefully, keeps him on the hook for the remainder of the tale. The hooks in the aforementioned movie versions of Beau Geste are among the most memorable in cinema.

The films start with a relief column arriving at Fort Zinderneuf in the middle of the Sahara Desert (the movies were actually filmed outside of Yuma, Arizona). The French officer in charge of the column can't get a response from anyone in the fort even though he can see soldiers holding rifles in the embrasures along the parapet. After a rifle is fired from the fort, a bugler is dispatched to scale the wall and open the gate. But the gate remains closed and the bugler seems to have disappeared. After finally gaining entrance to the fort, the commanding officer discovers that the soldiers in the embrasures are all dead, a ghoulish chorus line of fresh corpses with a permanent thousand-yard stare. No one is alive, yet there is no evidence that the fort was breached by the Tuaregs. Adding to the mystery, the commandant, Sergeant Dejaune, has been killed not by a bullet but by a French bayonet. Then, after the befuddled officer returns to his troops outside the gate, the fort catches fire and burns to the ground. Like the commanding officer, we wonder what the hell's going on here?

While this opening is a classic cinematic set piece, it is also a sterling example of male disposability. Since the fort was short-staffed, Sgt. Dejaune had the soldiers' corpses propped up in the embrasures to prevent the attacking Tuaregs from finding out how badly undermanned the fort was. As each soldier was killed, his corpse was propped up, posed with a rifle, and secured in the embrasure. While one might think this macabre scene was a product of Wren's imagination, it was apparently based upon a real incident at a fort under siege.

As when they were alive, the dead men are only valued because they offer utility. But in this case, you can't blame women. It shows that an alpha male, such as the ambitious Sergeant Dejaune, will sacrifice as many beta males as possible to achieve his goals. Of course, the military is hyper-hierarchical, so why would an enlistee expect anything else? Today it is axiomatic that if you don't want to be sacrificed on the altar of gynocentrism, the last thing you want to do is get married; as a corollary, if you don't want to be sacrificed on the altar of hierarchy, the last thing you want to do is join the military. Every renowned officer's career is based on two hecatombs: one full of his enemies, the other full of his own troops.

The flip side of the military experience is the camaraderie, the band of brothers phenomenon – in this case literally. The 1926 movie starts out with a title card of an Arabian proverb: "The love of a man for a woman waxes and wanes like the moon….but the love of brother for brother is steadfast as the stars, and endures like the word of the Prophet." The Geste brothers' bond sustains them through the hardships they endure; their relationship is all that protects them from succumbing to despair or nihilism.

In fact, the bond was there right from the start. As boys, Beau and Digby promised a Viking funeral to whichever one died first. Hard to replicate that in an abandoned fort full of dead soldiers but brother Digby pulls it off. It turns out that Digby was the bugler who first entered the fort. Upon discovering the body of his brother Beau, he remembers his pledge to give him a fiery Viking funeral – so the fort is reduced to ashes along with Beau's body while Digby escapes.

Beau's send-off is particularly impressive when contrasted with the rude treatment his dead comrades received at the hands of Sgt. Dejaune. One might say a glorious death is a death nonetheless and no matter how much pageantry involved, the whole concept of glory is ridiculous. On the other hand, there is something deep in the male psyche that yearns for a kick-ass bon voyage party celebrating his entry into his version of Valhalla. If you've ever read about Hunter Thompson's funeral, you know what I mean.

Ironically, today cremation is more popular than ever, but all the mourners get for it is an urn full of ashes. Not much spectacle involved there. Just roll the departed into an oven and crank it up all the way. No one gets to see the loved one's body consumed in flames. Now that would provide closure! I'd think a funeral home that offered a Viking funeral would do a land office business, but I suppose most if not all cities, counties, and states have rules about that sort of thing. Hell, if they frown on shooting off fireworks on the 4th of July, it's safe to say that won't let you dispose of daddy's corpse in a burning boat, even if it's just a kayak.

Walking a thin line between the ugly realities of combat and the "glory" of doing one's duty no matter the consequences is what has made Beau Geste of longstanding interest to the male audience. You can find any number of antiwar films or jingoistic films. Finding one that is both at the same time is rare. Percy Christopher Wren died in 1941 but it would certainly be interesting to know what he thought about the early years of World War II.

Duality is also inherent in the very name phrase "beau geste." My American Heritage Dictionary defines the phrase as (1) "A gracious gesture," as well as (2) "A gesture noble in form but meaningless in substance." The first definition eventually becomes apparent when we learn that Beau was eavesdropping when his Aunt Patricia sold the Blue Water and substituted a glass simulacrum in a desperate bid to keep her estate afloat and avoid evicting any of the tenants. Not wanting to see his aunt disgraced when her globe-trotting husband comes home and discovers the ruse, Beau stole the glass bauble and took off for the Foreign Legion to divert suspicion from his aunt. When Digby and John follow him, she is, for all practical purposes, beyond suspicion. In addition, John is in love with Isobel, Aunt Patricia's niece, and wants to make sure no one suspects her.

Eventually, however, we learn that Aunt Patricia's husband has died far from home totally unaware of the fate of the Blue Water, so the beau geste was not necessary. In effect, Beau's death, and later that of Digby, were for nothing. So perhaps the second definition of "beau geste" is more apropos. Yet a third meaning of "beau geste" is a good joke. In this case, the joke was definitely on the Geste brothers.

While we're parsing the meaning of "beau geste," let's take a look at the word "gallantry." Again resorting to my dictionary, I see it is defined as (1) "Nobility of spirit or action" or "Chivalrous attention toward women." The two definitions are so far apart it seems unlikely that one word could encompass both. Yet Beau Geste manages to bridge the gap. The first definition is apparent from the behavior of the brothers, all courageous under fire. The second part is less obvious, yet, as explained above, it turns out to be the plot point that sets the whole Foreign Legion adventure in motion.

The phrase "conspicuous gallantry" often crops up in military circles (in fact, there is a Conspicuous Gallantry medal awarded in the UK). In other words, it is not only important to be gallant but to have one's gallantry obvious to one and all. Inconspicuous gallantry won't garner you any accolades. Much like Ishmael in Moby Dick, only one survivor lived to tell the tale of Fort Zinderneuf, and he went AWOL after the place burned down. That is the novel's narrator, John Geste.

So there is a great deal to ponder in Beau Geste. Just because gynocentrism and male disposability were not hot topics 100 years ago doesn't mean they didn't exist. Once one becomes conscious of them, one can't but wonder if the two are inevitable. Are they hard-wired into the male psyche in all societies to some degree? Or are they strictly cultural inculcations? If so, is it possible to overcome them?

Sorry if I included too many spoilers in this essay, but if you have neither read Beau Geste nor seen one of its film versions, it is well worth making an effort to acquaint yourself with the tale. Among other things, it is, as the Brits would say, a ripping yarn!

QUESTION FOR GAMERS: Is there a Foreign Legion or Beau Geste video game out there? If not, maybe there ought to be.

If feminism were about equality, it would never fly

October 27, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

In the present talk we shall discuss the axiomatic counter-feminist equation that feminism equals female supremacism. It falls within the mandate of strict anti-feminism to expose the inner workings of feminism in as many ways as possible, and the present talk operates under that mandate.

So what is female supremacism? It is the moral conviction, openly stated or merely implied, that women are superior to men and that the ruling power in most areas of life ought to be a female power. This is a revolutionary idea because it overturns many things and modifies the details of life in a radical, far-reaching way – more than we have time to describe here .

The accomplished outcome of female supremacism would be a state of female supremacy. Female supremacism and female supremacy are therefore separate things: the former is the anticipation of the latter, and the latter is what the former would swing into practice in real world terms.

I would make bold statement that female supremacism as a system of social energy is objectively real; it EXISTS; it is out there in the world, ranging freely in one guise or another, covertly or overtly. I can attest from my observation that many people harbor this culture virus either strongly or weakly. I would further attest that it overlaps with "feminism" , and more than just a trifle.

It is formulaic to declare that feminism "seeks equality between men and women", and whether you consider that an honest assessment of feminism, it is the one most commonly invoked. Yes, you hear it all the time. It is what a lot of people want the world to believe that feminism is.

So, if you believe that feminism is "about equality", then you would naturally suppose feminism and female supremacism to be mutually exclusive. Yet counter-intuitive as it seems, nothing rules out their cohabitation in the same individual's mind. And why? Because "equality" is an essentially contested concept. The possible meanings of "equality" are so varied, so flexible, and so ambiguous that (given the right mental gymnastics) they can easily admit female supremacism in close moral proximity. That is especially true if the thinker does not expressly call supremacism by its correct name, or harbors the doctrine latently, as a logical result of unclear thinking in some other area.

Consider also, that feminism is a movement which advocates for women's interests; who would dispute this? And female supremacism, if you wish to call it a "movement", certainly does likewise; how could it possibly do otherwise?

Therefore, feminism and female supremacism converge upon the point of advocating for women's interests. The only difference is that female supremacism, unlike "equality", doesn't sound respectable. Most people would not openly admit to it, but still, for reasons we have suggested, cognitive dissonance can be rationalized. And such being given, the terrain of women's advocacy is left wide open as a zone of conjoined political effort.

So, feminism (arbitrarily defined as "sexual equality") and female supremacism may coexist in the same person's mind — and I have only lightly sketched how this might happen. But the next step up from the individual is the collective: what is true of the individual mind could as well be true of the group mind, for what is a group mind if not (among other things) the sum of individual minds composing it?

It is clear that both equalitarians and supremacists may converge upon the zone of women's advocacy—and that is a lot of overlap. And in the battle for feminism's soul, the question that occupies us above all, is to know which of these principles is constitutive of the feminist movement as a group mind.

Consider once again the uncertainty of the term equality, and its doubtful utility as a category of understanding. A movement built upon the "quest for equality" would be a house built on mud or shifting sand, or worse, a cloud-castle built on thin air. So-called equality, if it is to mean anything at all, must be operationalized; it depends entirely on what is being done, when it is being done, how it is being done, and where you set the zero in the equation. Equality is infinitely plastic in its applications; the goal-posts can always be shifted and the parameters can always be reassigned. It is inherently fickle and flakey.

Now consider the meaning of female supremacism. It is easy to wrap your mind around, and in practice it would offer no puzzling quirks or moral uncertainties. The guidelines would be coherent and crystal clear—reducible to whatever gives women the upper hand in a given situation. Consider also that supremacism in its naked form would be elemental and devoid of hypocrisy, because unburdened by the need to appear respectable.

So which of these two, sexual equality or female supremacism, would compose the stable foundation for a movement?

Clearly, female supremacism would be the winning ticket. And yet, female supremacism sounds nasty. It does not sound respectable, and any movement that openly endorsed it would have a public image problem.

By contrast, sexual equality is a flakey concept that means little if anything, and yet. . . it sounds noble. It sounds lofty. It sounds edifying. And most of all, it is so very unseemly to question it.

A movement built upon either female supremacism alone, or sexual equality alone, would not be practical. But if you roll them up together in the same joint (so to speak), then hey man, that'd be some righteous shit!

The so-called "quest for equality" would fizzle out very quickly if it were not animated by a malignant will. It would not be infinitely greedy; it would not "want it all"; it would be satisfied with a clear, definite list of things, after which it would roll up the tent and call it a day. And more, it is doubtful that such a movement would even get airborne at all when you consider, once again, what an unstable concept this "equality" really is.

Female supremacism, on the other hand, wants it all. It is a malignant will that will not quit, but keeps on coming back for more. It is able to stay the course; it is able to go the distance; it never sleeps and never takes a day off, and ultimately, it will leave no stone unturned! But again. . . it is not respectable.

Or at least, not if it walks around naked.

And that is why the rhetoric of equality is so very, very important: because it drapes the obscene flesh of female supremacism in a decent bathrobe.

So once more, both sexual equality and female supremacism advocate for women; that is where they converge into a conjoined political effort. And their relation is symbiotic. If plenty of feminists did not have supremacist motives, the movement as a whole would have no stable foundation, no cohesion, nothing to give it permanence, and finally it would lack a reliable engine. Yet if the rhetoric of equality were missing, female supremacism could never travel; it could never leave the house without getting arrested! Equality rhetoric not only veils female supremacism, but permits it to operate almost unhindered in a multitude of forms because equality as a concept is capable of unlimited shape-shifting.

Female supremacism and equality rhetoric: what a team! Neither the bathrobe nor the obscene flesh would log any mileage at all without the other.

So, is “equality” the soul of feminism? Or would that title go to female supremacism? Ask yourself, where does feminism get its real muscle? What is the true animating principle? Is feminism powered by any so-called quest for equality, and is such a thing even possible considering the vacuity of equality as a concept? Does the so-called quest for equality exist as anything more than a RHETORIC of equality? And finally, what does this RHETORIC of equality in fact serve? Does it serve actual “equality” (whatever that is)? Or does it in fact serve female supremacism? Please think about these questions.

Ugandans are ‘fighting back’ after American government spends billions promoting genital mutilation of males

October 28, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

With a nod to the great work done by Bloodstained Men, here is a picture showing pushback by Ugandans after the American government spent billions promoting genital mutilation propaganda in African nations.

Brother K. states, “AMERICAN HEGEMONY … The United States won’t educate or feed the impoverished nations of Africa, but we spent billions of dollars to fund junk science experiments and deceive them with free circumcision. The purpose of the fake circumcision experiments was to create propaganda for the American people, that circumcision has benefits.”

Kamala CAUGHT On Hot Mic, Admits She’s Losing Male Voters, Democrats INSULTING Men Backfires

October 30, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Keep an ear out for the mention of male variability which we’ve been talking about for a decade. Good to see knowledge of this going mainstream.

Tim mentions Hillary Clinton’s famous comment about women being the primary victims of war. The original quote is from 1998. A lot of people don’t know that she repeated this statement recently.

Mary, Jane, Mary, Elizabeth, Joan and Catherine

November 1, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The 16th century was a time of powerful female rulers in Western Europe. Queen Elizabeth ruled for what amounts to the second half of the 16th century. She was no figurehead either. She was the absolute ruler of England and Ireland (Britain would not arise as a state until generations later). Legally she was a 'Queen Regnant', meaning that she ruled in her own right and was not a 'Queen Consort' who is generally the wife of a King.

While it is true that English practiced Male-preference primogeniture (preferencing inheritance by the first born son over other sons and all daughters) this did not stop many women inheriting and retaining thrones in their own right around this time.

Elizabeth I is well known throughout the English speaking world and is generally remembered as an effective leader who reformed the English state and built up a strong navy in the face of external military threats. Others show that while the early years of her reign were generally prosperous this was not so later on. What all of these sources agree on was that Elizabeth was the queen in her own right. The decisions made were made by her. It should be clear from this that she was the leader of the English and Irish states.

What is generally not as well known is that there were several contemporary female monarchs in the British Isles. Immediately proceeding Elizabeth I as Queen of England and Ireland was Queen Mary I, her half sister. Queen Mary I is also known as 'Bloody Mary' as she had a habit of ordering the death of her subjects (usually by burning at the stake) when they didn't agree with her religious views. Mary I didn't reign for long (thankfully, given her penchant for violence) but was every bit as much in charge of England and Ireland as Elizabeth would be after her. Each effectively changed the national religion (Christian denomination) while reigning.

It is worth noting that Mary I's main competition for control of England and Ireland was another woman – Lady Jane Grey. In the end Mary made sure that Jane's head ended up rolling around in a basket rather than wearing a crown.

When Mary I married the terms of the marriage contract made her and her foreign husband joint rulers of England. He could not act without her consent. It is clear that the English nobility trusted an English woman to rule more than a foreign man. Nationality trumps gender. When Mary died in 1558 the crown did not remain with her foreign husband but rather went to her English half sister Elizabeth I. Patriarchy indeed.

To the north of England was Scotland, which was ruled by a Queen Regnant from 1542 to 1567. She is generally known as Mary Queen of Scots in English, probably to distinguish her from Mary I who was her contemporary. Her rule of Scotland overlaps that of both Mary I and Elizabeth I. The entirety of the British Isles was ruled over by female monarchs from 1553 to 1567. This period would likely have gone on much longer except that Elizabeth imprisoned and eventually executed Mary Queen of Scots after she fled south seeking Elizabeth's protection. Elizabeth apparently viewed Mary Queen of Scots as a potential rival since Mary was her niece. Mary Queen of Scots was fleeing south to England as she was suspected, then and now, of being a tacit accomplice in the brutal murder of her second husband.

Mary Queen of Scots was an absentee monarch during her early life, having spent her youth in France. Scotland was left in the hands of another woman, her mother, Mary of Guise.

So during this period we had Lady Jane Grey, Mary I, Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots vying for power across the British Isles.

While Mary I's husband was in England yet another woman, Joan of Austria (1535-1573) was regent in Spain. Joan's minor son ascended to the throne of Portugal and it was his grandmother, Catherine of Austria (1507-1578) who became regent there.

It should be clear that this was no patriarchy. These women were no ones puppets – those that were successful ruled over England, Scotland, Ireland, Spain and Portugal as ruthlessly and authoritatively as any male ruler. They also demonstrated that they were quite prepared to order the torture and execution of their enemies or those they perceived as enemies. These historical events and others that occurred in many other parts of the world throughout history demonstrate that these women were not helpless pawns of the patriarchy. They were powerful monarchs and in a very real sense, they were the law in their respective countries.

Robert Brockway presents at the 9th Annual Men & Boys Health & Wellbeing Conference – New Zealand

November 3, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Robert Brockway presented the following to the 2024 New Zealand Conference over Zoom. In 2023 he attended the conference in person and hopes to do so again in 2025. –Ed.

There's an old joke. I don't recall when I first heard it. Although the wording varies, I first heard it as:

> "Just because you're paranoid doesn't mean they aren't trying to get you."

This conference series is about men's well being. There are certainly many who would seek to harm men's wellbeing today. But this isn't new. It's actually being going on for decades.

Misandry, the hatred or intense dislike of men, is common in our society. If you sit back and think about it, it's quite extrordinary that such a thing could occur. Society needs men. A society that alienates it's men will ultimately fall to those that don't. Alienating men enmasse would ultimately make everyone in the fallen society worse off – even the people driving it.

I'm going to talk a lot about feminists today. It isn't sufficient to say feminism is the problem, it's more complicated than that, but it's often the most visible component of the problem.

Many may be surprised to learn this but I'll be the first to say that not all feminists are like that. Unfortunately the feminists that matter are like that.

It all started in Seneca Falls, NY state in 1848. A group of around 300 men and women met to discuss women's rights at the time. These people were, by the standards of their time, progressives. Interestingly there was a heated debate about whether the conference should endorse women's suffrage or not. In the end they produced a document called the Declaration of Sentiments.

A woman by the name of Elizabeth Cady Stanton was the principal author although she was assisted by many others. The sentiments expressed give us some indication of what the conference was like:

> He has not ever permitted her to exercise her inalienable right to the elective franchise.

This at a time when even white most men in the United States couldn't vote.

> He has compelled her to submit to laws, in the formation of which she had no voice.

Again nor did most men.

> He has taken from her all right in property, even to the wages she earns.

This is likely a reference to coverture. Coveture was a concept in which a husband took control of his wife's assets but was also responsible for her debts.

> He has made her morally, an irresponsible being, as she can commit many crimes with impunity,…

This is an interesting one. Women are still treated more leniently under the law and there is a push on at the moment to close women's prisons in several countries.

> He has so framed the laws of divorce, as to what shall be the proper causes of divorce, in case of separation, to whom the guardianship of the children shall be given; as to be wholly regardless of the happiness of the women—the law, in all cases, going upon a false supposition of the supremacy of a man, and giving all power into his hands.

Many would argue that's completely reversed today.

> He has endeavored, in every way that he could to destroy her confidence in her own powers, to lessen her self-respect, and to make her willing to lead a dependent and abject life.

I don't agree with that one Liz.

This is only a section. The Declaration of Sentiments is widely available online and I would encourage everyone to take a look at it. At the end of the convention only 68 women and 32 men signed the declaration. I think this is telling given that the conference attendees were already predisposed to supporting these sorts of arguments.

Now back to Mrs Stanton. Remember she was the principal author of the declaration.

So what did she say about men?

> "We are, as a sex, infinitely superior to men, and if we were free and developed, healthy in body and mind, as we should be under natural conditions, our motherhood would be our glory. That function gives women such wisdom and power as no male can possess." –Stanton's Letters

And:

> "The male element is a destructive force, stern, selfish, aggrandizing, loving war, violence, conquest, acquisition, breeding in the material and moral world alike discord, disorder, disease, and death. See what a record of blood and cruelty the pages of history reveal! Through what slavery, slaughter, and sacrifice, through what inquisitions and imprisonments, pains and persecutions, black codes and gloomy creeds, the soul of humanity has struggled for the centuries, while mercy has veiled her face and all hearts have been dead alike to love and hope!" –The Destructive Male speech

Imagine being married to her.

I think Mrs Stanton's comments about men say more about her than they do about men.

We're only in the 1840s and the misandry abounds.

Before we go on I want to talk about suffrage.

Today a lot of people think that men long had the vote but women only gained it recently. This is demonstratably false. On Wiki4Men I have a large table in which I show the year of adoption of universal male and female suffrage for virtually every country. While the dates for the adoption of women's suffrage are easy to find the same can't be said for men's suffrage. It took me years to compile that list and I'm still chasing one or two.

You may note that the years in my table differ from those on Wikipedia. This is because Wikipedia does not use a clear and consistent definition of universal suffrage – I do.

In general if a country became independent and democratic during the 20th or 21st centuries men and women gained the franchise at the same time. If a country became independent and democratic during the 19th century men led women by a few years or decades. Decades may seem like a long time but this is nothing when you consider that the democracy we have is the result of at least 5000 years of evolution of political thought.

Winston Churchill is often quoted as having said:

> "Democracy is the worst form of government – except for all the others that have been tried."

Churchill did say this in parliament in 1947, it's in hansard, but he noted that it was already a popular saying by that time.

I'm with Winnie on this one. Democracy definitely has its flaws but the alternatives are far worse. If in doubt talk to people who have lived under those systems.

I encourage everyone to peruse the data I have on Wiki4Men. If you do this you'll see that modern representative democracy is only 100-150 years ago. Today democracy is under threat again. If we're not prepared to protect democracy it may yet be a footnote in history. In many cases the people and groups I'm going to talk about later are the same ones that would see democracy swept aside.

While it existed earlier, much of the misandry we see today really got going in the 1960s. What were fringe ideas are now mainstream. When thinking about this consider some of the ideas these people espoused that are not currently mainstream. What happens next?

Simone de Beauvoir was a French feminists who has had a global impact on feminism. We often hear that feminism is all about women's choices but if you actually watch the movement you see it insists that women make the choice to work over caring for children. De Beauvoir actually said this in the June 1975 issue of a magazine called The Saturday Review. While being interviewed by fellow feminist Betty Friedan de Beauvoir had this to say:

> "No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should > be authorized to stay at home and raise her children. Society should be totally different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one."

There it is. A core objective of feminism writ large.At this point I also want to mention that de Beauvoir and her partner Jean-Paul Sartre tried to have age of consent laws in abolished and worked to have pedophiles released from prison in France.

American feminist Kate Millet was heavily influenced by de Beauvoir. Millet was a prominent second wave feminist. Her first book was Sexual Politics was hugely influential on feminism. We can see here thoughts on pedophilia here:

> "Sex itself is presented as a crime to children. It is how adults control children, how they forbid them sexuality. This has been going on for ages and is infinitely important to adults." – Essay, Beyond Politics: Children and Sexuality

An associate of Millet's, Shulamith Firestone, believed that childhood, childhood innocence and the nuclear family were all products of the Patriarchy and intended to oppress women.

Firestone said:

> "Unless revolution uproots the basic social organization, the biological family — the vinculum through which the psychology of power can always be smuggled — the tapeworm of exploitation will never be annihilated."

And again:

> "The family structure is the source of psychological, economic and political oppression." –The Case Against the Sexual Revolution

Firestone, Millet and many others were involved in a radical feminist group in 1960s New York known as the Red Stockings. Much of the ideology we see in modern feminism came from this group. We're fortunate that Kate Millet's sister Mallory, who was present at many gatherings of this group, has spilled the beans about what went on. She makes it very clear that Redstockings were heavily influenced by Marxism and simply replaced captialists by men when inventing their new ideology.

But before Millett published Sexual Politics and before the formation of the Redstockings we had Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. Like Millet, Firestone and many others Solanas was living and forming her ideas in New York City.

Solanas is famous for two things:

• Writing the SCUM Manifesto

• Shooting Andy Warhol

First Solanas wrote and self-published the SCUM Manifesto. Despite what is often claimed, the acronym Society for Cutting Up Men does not appear in the text and was apparently created by an editor not Solanas herself.

In fact the term SCUM in the manifesto refers to women. But not all women, just the ones that Solanas felt should and would rule the world. She said:

> "The conflict, therefore, is not between females and males, but between SCUM—dominant, secure, self-confident, nasty, violent, selfish, independent, proud, thrill-seeking, free-wheeling arrogant females, who consider themselves fit to rule the universe, who have free-wheeled to the limits of this society and are ready to wheel onto something far beyond what it has to offer—and nice, passive, accepting, "cultivated", polite, dignified, subdued, dependent, scared, mindless, insecure, approval-seeking Daddy's Girls who can't cope with the unknown, who want to continue to wallow in the sewer that is at least familiar…"

All class Valerie.

The passage continued to ramble by the way. It could have used a full stop or two as well. Hence the need to end the quote.

I'm not a doctor but I do know that certain types of mental illness are characterised in writing by rambling and excessively long sentences.

Imagine a world run by people like that. Well I'd say that many leading feminists are exactly like that. So in the words of Valerie Solanas, they are SCUM.

So that's what she wanted for women. But what did she think about men? She tells us starting on page three of the SCUM Manifesto.

> The male is a biological accident: the y (male) gene is an incomplete x (female) gene, that is, has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.
>
> The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of empathizing or identifying with others, of love, friendship, affection or tenderness. He is a completely isolated unit, incapable of rapport with anyone. His responses are entirely visceral, not cerebral; his intelligence is a mere tool in the service of his drives and needs; he is incapable of mental passion, mental interaction; he can't relate to anything other than his own physical sensations….

She continues to ramble on for several pages like this. At least she occassionally uses full stops this time.

Feminists continue to praise the SCUM Manifesto and it continues to be required reading in gender studies classes. The SCUM Manifesto is available for download from Wiki4Men.

A year after she self-published the SCUM Manifesto Solanas attempted to murder famous artist Andy Warhol. She had previously had a brief professional association with Warhol. After shooting Warhol she also shot another man who was present and attempted to shoot a third.

Following the attack she was detained for a mental health evaluation and diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia. Now, remember what I said about the SCUM Manifesto. Imagine if instead of being praised for her work Solanas had received help.

Solanas' charges were downgraded and she ended up serving three years in prison. Andy Warhol was reportedly never the same, physically or emotionally. In being so emotionally harmed by Solanas, Andy Warhol actually proved her thesis about men in the SCUM Manifesto to be wrong.

After the shooting prominent feminist and leader in the National Organisation for Women, T-Grace Atkinson, described Solanas as:

> "The first outstanding champion of women's rights."

And:

> "A 'heroine' of the feminist movement."

Ti-Grace Atkinson also went on to say that:

> "The institution of sexual intercourse is anti-feminist."

Can anyone see a theme running through their comments?

By the 1970s feminist and eugenicist Sally Miller Gearhart was active in California. She is often credited with the saying the future is female. In fact the statement had been in circulation among feminists for several years before she wrote her essay The Future – If There Is One – Is Female. One line from the essay gives an idea of the tone:

> "The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race."

While Gearhart didn't originate the phrase, she did popularise it.

The entire essay is available for download from Wiki4Men.

A similar statement was espoused by Krista Milburn around 2014. This was widely reported by the media and widely celebrated in feminist circles. Milburn also suggested introducing International Castration Day. Lovely.

I noted that Gearhart was a eugenicist. For those that don't know eugenics was a pseudo-science that was popular in the Western world in the early 20th century. Eugenics advocated for selective breeding of humans for certain traits and was highly influential on Nazi ideology. Most prominent feminists were eugenicists during this period.

Hillary Clinton's quote about women being the primary victims of war is famous, but few know the details.

On 17 November 1998 Clinton was at a domestic violence conference in El Salvador. During the conference she made the following statement:

> "Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat."

This is the statement that we often see repeated. But it was 1998. Maybe she has changed her views? Short answer: No.

Recently she said pretty much the same thing. In March 2023 she told participants at the 30/50 Summit in Abu Dhabi. that:

> "Women and children are the primary victims of conflict and of climate change and there is no place that unfortunately, tragically, shows us that more dramatically than Ukraine today,…"

Probably the least well known person I will mention is French feminist Pauline Harmange. In 2020 Harmange wrote an essay with the simple title I Hate Men. She wrote it in French of course but you get the picture. We need to be clear here. This title is not clickbait. The essay argues that the hatred of men is not only acceptable but to be encourage. It argues that misandry exists only as a response to misogyny.

Harmange argues that women should prioritise relationships with women over men. Interestingly she is happily married to a man. I suppose it's a case of do as I say not as I do.

The French government tried to ban the essay which caused it to explode in popularity, an example of the Streisand Effect. As a result of all of the publicity it was later published as a book.

I disagree with the French government's attempt to ban the essay. I always oppose attempts to ban misandric publications. I do this for two reasons:

1. I'm nearly a free-speech absolutist. I oppose censorship unless there is a specific attempt to incite violence.

2. They prove our point for us. Many people have tried to deny that misandry exists – but that argument is easily defeated when I show them a selection of misandric publications

The first printing of Harmange's book sold out. It was subsequently reprinted in French and English .

Ten years earlier feminist Hanna Rosin wrote an article in The Atlantic entitled The End of Men. She later expanded this in to a book, published in 2012. In both Rosin argues that a fundamental social shift is occuring which will benefit women at the expense of men, essentially arguing that women will become the dominant gender in the future. She didn't say it but she meant that the future is female.

The arguments have been thoroughly debunked. You can find information on this on Wiki4Men. I do want to make one particular point though. Rosin argues that women today are more educated than men of the same age. Indeed this is a commonly repeated phrase.

This is only true if education is counted merely as years of formal schooling. This narrow definition has several serious problems:

• Not every year of formal schooling is equally valuable. A year in engineering is worth more to the individual and society than a year in gender studies.

• It seems to ignore non-tertiary training such as apprenticeships. I suspect the elitist types who believe this nonsense have forgotten the necessity of tradies to keep society running.

• Not all education is acquired formally.

And that's before we get on to the tendency of female teachers to make down male students. Yes that's real. It was first discovered by the London School of Economics. Further research carried out by the OECD has now verified that this is occuring in over 60 countries.

A year after Rosin's book was published she appeared in a televised debate – the motion of the debate was that men are obsolete. There were four debaters, all women. Not surprisingly Rosin appeared on the affirmative side while Camille Paglia was on the negative. For those that don't know Paglia is one of the rare breed of feminist who raises men's issues out of genuine concern.

The audience found that in favour of the affirmative – ie they claimed that men are indeed obsolete. One journalist who was present and spoke to audience members afterwards suggested that many men in the audience implied that they had voted affirmative to avoid upsetting their girlfriends. Sounds like they're in unhealthy relationships to me.

This debate was part of a series known as the Munk Debates. I had watched quite a few of them up to this point but was appalled at what I saw. I never watched a Munk debate again.

This sort of mindset pervades all areas of Western civilisation today. In 2014 Michelle Obama said:

> "So we can't waste this spotlight. It is temporary and life is short, and change is needed. And women are smarter than men."

It's important to understand that she said this while she was first lady. I think that's rather un first-lady like.

Intelligence is outside the scope of this presentation but suffice to say, no Michelle, that's not correct. We have plenty on this topic on A Voice for Men and Wiki4Men.

Not to be outdone her husband Barak Obama made some disparaging comments about men. At least he had the good sense to leave the White House first. Choice comments include:

> "If you look at the world and look at the problems it's usually old people, usually old men, not getting out of the way."
>
> "Now women, I just want you to know; you are not perfect, but what I can say pretty indisputably is that you're better than us [men]."
>
> "I'm absolutely confident that for two years if every nation on earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement across the board on just about everything… living standards and outcomes."

In actuality research in to both medieval European and modern leaders found that polities led by women were more likely to end up in armed conflict than those led by men. Researchers have tried to blame men for that, claiming that men will prey on female leaders.

So it started in the 19th century and in 1960s New York it received a huge boost. Since then it's been steadily growing and expanding. Around 2013 it really took off.

Now it's 2024 and I think it's peaked. Even the mainstream media is starting to raise concerns about men disengaging.

• Men aren't mentoring women at work

• Men aren't asking women out

Well known Australian academic Michael Flood recently said he avoids using the term toxic masculinity when talking to the community because (in his view) it's being misunderstood.

A Pew Research Center survey found that 63% of American men and 35% of American women say they are single. While some have tried to explain this as women dating each other, that alone cannot explain this massive disparity. A far more plausible explanation is that a lot of women think they are in a relatonship with a man but the man disagrees.

But it might already be too late.

Many men are going MGTOW. Many more have walked away but don't call themselves anything in particular. Others have simply left the West to pursue relationships elsewhere. A notable example of the latter being the Passport Bros.

I don't believe men are as lonely as it often claimed in the media. And I don't think they're coming back anytime soon. Regardless of what happens from hereon, the misandry and everything it's brought about needs to stop.

Zoe McLellen

Cato the Elder was a Roman orator in the second century BCE. Cato was famous for ending all of his speeches, regardless of the subject matter, with the words "Carthago Delenda Est" – Carthage must be destroyed.

Taking a leaf from Cato's scroll I end all of my presentations with a call to assist in the lawful apprehension of Zoe McLellan. And I will do this until she is brought to justice and the matter can be dealt with by the courts.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of November 2024 a warrant is still outstanding for the arrest of McLellan. Sebastian, who would now be 12, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Costa Rica or Canada.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney’s office.

The Goal Post Episode 47 – Woke Exposed: From Boeing to Trek

November 4, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The state of play

November 7, 2024 | by Mark Dent | Link | Original Link

If we ever required a simple, contemporary example of the utter contempt and disdain our society has for men, it can be found in an entirely unimportant yet highly instructive tweet from a rather disturbed human being named Miley Cyrus.

There are a number of reasons one could cite for questioning this woman's judgement and taste but let's put those aside and focus on her tweet.

Urging her followers not to "give up" in their pursuit of decent men, Cyrus wrote:[1]

> "There are good men out there guys don't give up,". You don't have to be gay, there are good people with dicks out there, you've just got to find them."
>
> "You've got to find a dick that's not a dick, you know? I always thought I had to be gay, because I thought all guys were evil, but it's not true," she explained. "There are good people out there that just happen to have dicks. I've only ever met one, and he's on this live."

Anyone like to hazard a guess as to what it was about this comment that caused a universal online meltdown?

Was it her assertion that she believed all guys were evil?

Perhaps it was her casual, patronizing play on the word dick.

"You've got to find a dick that's not a dick, you know."

Or perhaps it was the inference that good men are incredibly rare, even if they do exist.

"There are good people out there that just happen to have dicks. I've only ever met one, and he's on this live."

No-it was none of the above.

The outrage was based upon the unforgivable suggestion that being gay is something you can choose to be for convenience sake or simply because you are tired of one gender.

Hell was unleashed by progressives and the LGBT activists who accused Cyrus of:

"perpetuating the idea that sexuality is a choice."

Cyrus, who has previously declared herself both "pansexual and gender fluid," responded to the controversy on Monday, claiming that she was "talking shit about sucky guys" and reiterating her support for the LGBT agenda.

Being the ignorant Neanderthal I am, I confess to checking exactly what pansexual meant with the help of Google.

> Pansexuality, or omnisexuality, is the sexual, romantic or emotional attraction towards people regardless of their sex or gender identity. Pansexual people may refer to themselves as gender-blind, asserting that gender and sex are not* > determining factors in their romantic or sexual attraction to others.

Fair enough — each to his or her own.

Gender fluid required another check just to make certain of the term's meaning.

> denoting or relating to a person who does not identify themselves as having a fixed gender.

I don't care if a person wants to identify with any of these terms as long as they don't make any demands of me.

The sad fact is not one person, not one journalist even questioned, let alone criticized her assertion that for a long time she believed all men were evil, or the fact that even now, she thinks your chances of finding a dick that's not a dick are remote.

Perhaps the odds would be about the same as finding a four-leaf clover or a red headed Nigerian.

Even the original caption under a photo of Cyrus said:

The singer and progressive activist Miley Cyrus came under fire for saying she once thought she "had to be" a lesbian because "all guys are evil."

The 'all guys are evil' bit is so accepted it has become embedded into our society's psyche as an unquestioned fact, a "given" much like "the sun rises in the east" or "death is inevitable"

Nobody even sees the shocking dismissal of one entire gender in those few words.

Miley quickly and predictably apologized and bowed before the wrath of the mob and wrote a hurried apology.

"Let me be clear," she wrote on Instagram. "YOU don't CHOOSE your sexuality. You are born as you are. It has always been my priority to protect the LGBTQ community I am a part of. Happy Monday!"

Got that? You don't choose your sexuality. Forgive me for my transgression.

All men are evil and good dicks are hard to find? Now that should be enshrined in our constitution and taught in every classroom.

Keep in mind the fact that this woman has over one hundred million instagram followers. That's a lot of influence. As one well known politician would say:

Sad. So sad.

Reference:

[1] Miley Cyrus Message to Women: 'You Don't Have To Be Gay, There Are Good People with D*cks Out There'

An introduction to Post-Argumentalism

November 9, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

The accumulated wisdom of the activated non-feminist sector finds feminism to be, on balance, pernicious. The reasons for this verdict are many and have been examined elsewhere. For a start, know this: we mean to draw a line against the encroachment of feminist power into the non-feminist world. Since we find that power pernicious, we naturally find ourselves at odds with almost every aspect of it. This brings us to the topic of the moment: post-argumentalism.

Post-argumentalism is the stage "beyond argument", the stage you enter after you deplete the possibilities of debate or persuasion in a given setting. It is a kind of existential crisis in the face of an intractable other: the other may find your stance unacceptable but you find his equally so – and there you stand! Since argument has not settled the issue and apparently never will, you are excused from such activity and may henceforth either agree to disagree with the other, or enter a state of "war" with the other.

None of this holds any great mystery. If you have ever dealt with a fanatical cultist or an incorrigibly pigheaded person of any kind, you will perfectly understand the base dynamic. And what is true of a solitary individual can as well be true of an entire group or subculture.

The intractable other that now confronts us is the subculture called feminism. As said, we find feminism pernicious – and that implies that we have already settled the debate to our own satisfaction.

We see no reason to keep arguing in hope of persuading this intractable other – we've long since persuaded ourselves, and that should suffice. We know whose opinion we value, and whose judgment we trust. In all cases we cherish our own conclusion because we deem it best, and if we deemed otherwise we'd have concluded otherwise.

Argument is useless if it never ends, and worse than useless if it puts a freeze on necessary plans and actions. To tolerate such a freeze would seem to imply that we cannot act without a go-ahead from the intractable other. Yet a moment's thought might reveal that the other is likewise constrained by us – and there we stand! How to break free of this impasse? Apparently not by further persuasion efforts.

What are we waiting for? Will another three, five or twelve years of argument finally clear the road so we can set plans and actions afoot? What force – legal, moral, physical or otherwise – prevents us from turning our back and going our way immediately?

Feminism has been a dynamic force in the world, and never shy about setting plans and actions afoot. Nor has it been dutiful about consulting others and securing their agreement to such plans and actions. The point is that feminism itself is post-argumental. Feminism has trodden upon the alterity of the non-feminist sector, and the non-feminist sector may now, by rights, serve feminism likewise.

We should add that feminism is an entrenched system which extends through the social and political fabric. It is a major power structure, individual feminists are stakeholders in it, and if we think the stakeholders in any major power structure will be talked out of their advantage by sweet reason alone, we delude ourselves.

The two sides do not gather in a clean, well-lighted debating chamber, and air their views in turn until one side says to the other: “Yes, you have convinced me of the truth of your position, and from henceforth I will adopt it as my own and rearrange my life according to what it requires of me.” No, that is not how the world works.

Such being said, our project is not to reprogram the deep ideological conviction of every purported feminist. Rather, it is to make such people modify their outward behavior so that the pernicious implications of feminist ideology will no longer translate into real-world consequences. They can believe any pernicious thing they want to believe, but they must stop acting upon such belief. In so stating, we exercise a mandate. Such is the power of post-argumentalism – it nullifies the presumptive moral authority of feminism and commandeers authority on its own account. In this way, post-argumentalism is a revolutionary procedure, the starting point for anything at all that you could rightly call a revolution.

Truly, to nullify authority is a rightful deed when authority is intractable due to fraud or villainy. Post-argumentalism makes no fuss about this. It does the job brusquely, unceremoniously, unapologetically. To make omelets, you break eggs.

Both war and revolution have this in common, that they spring to life when reason and negotiatory discourse prove unavailing. The difference is that war is a contest between parties purportedly equal at the outset, whereas revolution is a contention where an upstart knocks authority off a pedestal. In the end, both war and revolution are a fight, and both involve the element of violation. The rules of war dictate that the parties violate each other until one side gives up, while the rules of revolution dictate that one system of rules gets violated so another system can replace it.

The non-feminist revolution is both a revolution and a war, and is not undertaken for light and transient causes.

As non-feminist men and women we must ask ourselves: what did we originally hope to accomplish by arguing? Supposing we could have persuaded the intractable other, what did we hope to gain? What did we hope to obtain that we couldn’t have gotten elsewise, in due course? What prevented us from simply taking it?

If something belongs to us, it is simply a question of overriding or overruling the intractable other in order to secure what is rightfully ours. Correct? In that case, what is the good of persuasion – to talk the other into giving us what is rightfully ours? To talk the thief into handing back our stolen property?

We know that this intractable other, feminism, is a taker who never quits taking, and gives nothing back at the behest of mere persuasion. We ought to craft our politics in the light of such understanding. In other words, we ought to craft our politics post-argumentally. We do not argue with feminism, we simply tell it things – and if it will not listen or modify its course, we hold it accountable.

Mike Buchanan at ICMI18

November 10, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Identity Politics Killed Kamala’s Campaign

November 11, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Internet never forgets?

November 13, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

The Internet never forgets, or so the saying goes. Actually it forgets all the time. We're constantly losing important information from the Internet. The loss of the Deja News archives was infamous. In the 1990s Deja had an enormous repository of online discussions from Usenet, arguably an early form of social media. And then Deja went out of business and their archive disappeared. It was a blow to many as the archive had been a very useful reference tool for areas as distinct as IT and history.

For several years it was thought that the Deja News archive was permanently lost and then a reel tape was found in someone's backyard shed. Google paid to have the archive restored. Google now considered themselves the owners of this information but at least it was online again. This was actually the origin of Google Groups which many will be familiar with. Information only stays online if someone cares to keep it there.

This is a good time to point out that The Cloud is just someone else's computer. Data can be lost from The Cloud as easily as local servers. There are no substitutes for good backups.

Which brings us to A Voice for Men. The organisation founded by Paul Elam continues despite the best efforts of a vast array of characters. The Southern Poverty Law Center declared A Voice for Men to be a hate site in 2018 and then removed the designation in 2022 after I took over. Yeah, they really don't like Paul.

A Voice for Men was, for so many years, nearly a lone voice in the Wilderness. A lot has changed in recent years. The Overton Window has moved substantially. Topics that would once have only appeared here are now mainstream.

Recent election results in various Western countries demonstrate a growing rejection of woke.

There are still challenges through. Traditional gynocentrism is ascendant as society pushes back against woke. A return to traditional gynocentrism won't make things better for men though. A Voice for Men has always been about finding a new way forward, a way free of the misandry which has dominated in the West for the past 50-60 years but also free of traditional gynocentric obligations on men.

And so we continue to try to steer a new course while keeping the flame alive. A big part of that is making sure that the sites hosted by A Voice for Men stay online. Together these sites represent a vast wealth of knowledge. At the time of writing the list includes:

- avoiceformen.com
- gynocentrism.com
- honest-ribbon.org
- icmi.info
- paulelam.com

- wiki4men.com

It is essential that these sites, and the information contained therein, go on.

Given that information online isn't nearly as safe as is often assumed we've taken a considerable amount of effort to ensure the continuity of the sites on A Voice for Men infrastructure.

The servers that make up A Voice for Men deliver the sites, monitor the sites and perform a variety of tasks behind the scenes to make sure it all keeps working. This process is largely automated and requires very little human time to keep running, now that the hard work of automating it has been done.

The servers are backed up daily. The servers can be quickly recovered from these backups. We can even clone the servers from these backups, which we do periodically to test new software.

In addition, the databases behind the sites are backed up hourly. Several days worth of these backups are held on the servers with a lot more in the server backups. Copies are periodically archived to allow us to view older data if needed.

Every three hours the latest database backup from each site and other site data is copied to a remote test server. This server then loads a copy of the site from the database and the other site data.

A monitor checks every minute on the health of the servers, the active sites and the test sites loaded every three hours. If a problem can't be corrected automatically a human is notified to take corrective action.

Additional copies of the sites are taken and stored offline and offsite at a considerable distance from the servers.

Our backups are:

- Offline
- Offsite
- Tested

In this way we can protect against the attacks we didn't see coming.

It's also worth noting that A Voice for Men infrastructure avoids Big Tech to the extent that we are able. Big Tech is so powerful and so expansive that it's impossible to completely avoid it.

I talked about Big Tech and the dangers it poses during my ICMI23 presentation.

I'd like to see viewership move away from the large social media sites and back towards blogs, forums and mailing lists where Big Tech is much weaker. It's worth noting that the Internet Engineering Task Force continues to use mailing lists. I think we can safely say they are tech-savvy. Maybe they're on to something.

The A Voice for Men infrastructure is also built to be portable. Many sites today are locked in to particular infrastructure while we're nimble and can move on short notice.

This, and some other plans in the works, are aimed at keeping the wealth of information on these sites available in to the future.

Protecting our own data is only part of the battle though. We make extensive use of archival sites to protect against the loss of valuable third party information. Despite our best efforts a lot of third party information has been lost. If you see a page and think it's valuable to our cause consider taking a copy with an archiver like this.

It's also worth noting that social media is largely a memory hole. Information posted to the large social media sites is mostly forgotten in short order. It's still there but the nature of most of these sites makes it difficult to access. Compare that to what we're doing at A Voice for Men.

The featured image depicts server racks at CERN, and is courtesy of the Wikimedia Foundation.

Virgin Woman GIVES UP on Men and joins the 4B Movement

November 14, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

An amusing little video by Man Talk. We enjoyed it, and we hope that you do too.

Men’s Rights versus Feminism explained using magnets

November 16, 2024 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

Men’s Rights activists seek to bring awareness to how men are acted upon by society, acted upon by other men and acted upon by women. They are opposed by feminists who think that bringing attention to how men are acted upon will take something away from women.
Every era has had its mythology of women’s weakness and men’s strength. Ours is no different and it’s not progressive. How easy is it for you to see Jill as a victim? How hard is it for you to see Jack as vulnerable?

Full Text of video
Sources

The featured image depicts Neodymium magnets and is courtesy of the Wikimedia Foundation. The featured image is licenced under CC-BY-SA 3.0.

Please tell me more about my male privilege!

November 18, 2024 | by Jason J. Bailey | Link | Original Link

---

Let's talk about this idea of male privilege that feminists have told us exists. But I should be more specific: the cisgender, heterosexual, Caucasian, male privilege. Now, anyone who observes the treatment of men in our society can tell you that this group is far from privileged. But in order for feminists to be able to make us believe in "oppressed women and privileged men," they must protect this lie. On a good day, we can just ignore their little world known as the patriarchy, but they allow serious issues faced by men and boys to be ignored so as not to sacrifice the plausibility of "male privilege." Now, as a privileged man, let's take a look at some of my privileges:

1. Unfair divorce laws. Despite marriage's obvious red flags, some men (albeit fewer and fewer) are still willing to marry. At this point, the percentage of men who value marriage is approximately 29%. I find it hard to believe that this group does not know the risks so I assume they justify marriage by telling themselves, "Divorce won't happen to me" or "My wife-to-be is the exception to the rule" or "She's pregnant." Regardless, the more than likely impending divorce is where men lose most (if not all) of their rights. Pre-nups are thrown out of court on a routine basis, and the judge can even use a flimsy excuse for nullifying the document, such as "It is not fair to the other party," and your soon-to-be ex-wife is able to turn your assets portfolio into a buffet. You can be ordered to pay obscene amounts of alimony (almost 98% of which is collected by women), you can lose your house (and still be obligated to pay the mortgage), you can be held responsible to cover any of her debt (given that it was incurred before or during the marriage), and if you do not comply you will be found in contempt of court for breaking a court order and you get to go to prison.

2. Little to no parental rights. This applies whether or not you are married to the mother of said children. All the mother has to do is say that you are abusive, you molested the children, she is intimidated by you, or any other excuse that portrays her and the children as victims and the police will remove you from your home. In many cases, you can even have a restraining order taken out against you. This makes it easy for her not only to attain full custody of the children (just like 80% to 90% of custody dispute cases end, depending on the location), but also the more custody she receives, the more child support she receives. Oops, I mean, the more child support the children receive. We know that the money is going to the children, even though there is no auditing system in place to make her prove how that money is spent because there is no such thing as a selfish and materialistic woman. To add insult to injury, men can be ordered to pay child support to the point of becoming destitute, with no consideration for them or even an attempt at finding a balance. If that is not bad enough, men can be ordered to pay child support for children who are not biologically theirs. This could be that they were the child's stepfather, living with the mother of the child, the "father by default," or even if they were victims of paternity fraud. The epitome of male privilege is finding out that the mother of your child cheated and let you raise another man's child while your only choice was to either support them irrespective of your own financial stability or go to jail.

3. Sexually related crimes and false rape accusations. This is the biggest flaw on part of the feminists that I have seen to date. They have turned the idea of rape, sexual assault, sexual abuse, sexual harassment, and statutory rape into a complete joke. In short, they are trying to set up a system in which men are responsible not only for their own actions (as they should be) but also for the actions of the woman. First, the conditions used to be that if a woman is drunk, she is not able to consent (I guess feminists do not know the difference between ability and capacity); then it became if her consent was not enthusiastic, she was raped. Then they took it a step further, encapsulated by Catherine MacKinnon's famous quote: "In a patriarchal society, all heterosexual intercourse is rape because women, as a group, are not strong enough to give meaningful consent." Next, they decided to separate the crimes "rape" and "made to penetrate," thereby eliminating male victims of heterosexual rape from their statistics. Furthermore, in 2011, U.S. President Barack Obama ordered post-secondary institutions that received federal funding to lower the burden of proof required to expel someone accused of sexual assault. Since there are few (if any) men who falsely accuse women of sexually related crimes, this was yet another way to demonize men. Last but not least, to show how privileged men really are, some feminists take it so far as to say that being falsely accused of rape can be a good experience for men, something from which they can learn. Yeah, I would do nothing but gain from being thrown out of school, fired from my job, sent to prison, and humiliated with that stigma and a criminal record for the rest of my life. Who wouldn't want that?

4. Domestic violence. The feminists cannot stand the idea of men being victims of domestic violence, let alone women being perpetrators, because it chips away at their faux-argument of women being oppressed. But it is a lot more serious than we think. Feminists have led us to believe that domestic violence is a male issue and it is a reason that women should fear men. In reality, the domestic violence rates are about equal pertaining to men on women and women on men and even women on women. The fact is, men have more of a right to be afraid. In some cases, men are bigger and stronger, but there is marginal sympathy for them. In Canada to date, there are no battered men's shelters, and as a society, there is a collective acceptance of women abusing men. In fact, the man is looked at as the bad guy if he defends himself. When he is the victim, not only is it acceptable, but it is also apparently funny, as seen here. What a privilege it is to be a man.

5. Men in the media. This one really shows the true nature of how a female-run media sees men. We see many commercials in which men are treated like idiots or as yet another kid in the house who needs the strong, confident woman to step in and take care of him. A YouTube channel called Vinny Mac has a series of videos called "Misandry in the Media" (you can view parts 1 and 2 here), which to date includes a 20-video compilation. Some will argue that these types of commercials are targeted toward women so they need to be something to which women can relate. Unfortunately, that argument raises more questions than it answers. First, why is man-hating something that women can relate to? Second, if sexism becomes acceptable based on the target demographic, what was the issue with having women in bikinis in beer commercials? Oh that's right, it is only okay to be sexist when the victim is a man.

6. Miscellaneous male privileges. There are many more, so I will briefly list them here. Most are common knowledge, but I have posted sources for most.

a. Men make up the majority of the homeless (Figure 4 shows that as age increases, male homelessness increases while female homelessness decreases).

b. Men make up the minority of college graduates (women earn 62% of associates degrees, 57% of bachelors degrees, 60% of masters degrees and 52% of doctorates).

c. The education system is tailored to girls.

d. Men and boys make up the majority of school dropouts.

e. Men make up the majority of workplace fatalities and workplace injuries.

f. Men are hated on for choosing more lucrative careers, more dangerous jobs, and on average working longer hours than women (wage gap).

g. Men are more likely than women to go to prison for the same crime.

h. Men are more likely to get longer sentences than women for the same crime.

i. Men are the majority of those residing in prison.

j. Men make up the majority of suicide victims.

k. Men are the majority of victims of public sphere violence.

l. Men make up the majority of unemployed.

m. Men make up the majority of persons addicted to drugs.

n. Men are the majority of rape victims (if you count "made of penetrate" as rape, as you should).

o. Boys receive lower grades than girls from female teachers.

p. Men who choose careers over family are selfish; women who do the same are empowered.

q. If a man finds a woman attractive, he is objectifying her; if he does not, he is shallow.

r. If a man tries to be a gentleman, he is a chauvinist; if he does not, he is rude.

s. TALKING ABOUT ANY OF THE ABOVE IS CENSORED BY FEMINISTS AND DEEMED MISOGYNISTIC AND ANTI-WOMAN.

After all of that, feminists somehow still perpetuate the concept of "male privilege," but back in reality "female privilege" seems more realistic. Maybe we are, in fact, even living in a matriarchal society in which women are privileged.

American Thought Leaders: The #1 Solution to The Boy Crisis

November 20, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Ignoring Men Has Become the Norm

November 23, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Bettina Arndt interviews former police officer Richard McDonald – part 1

November 26, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Well known Australian personality, long-time associate of A Voice for Men, and keynote speaker at ICMI17, Bettina Arndt has interviewed former police prosecutor Richard McDonald. Part 1 of the interview is below.

Walmart ends DEI policies, Red Skins logo may return, woke is broke, we're winning the culture war

November 28, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

We've been saying for years that woke is in decline. Here Tim Pool provides a good summary of some recent events.

The Goal Post Episode 48 – Is Social Media Actually the Problem?

December 3, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The 4B Movement – Have Women Gone Insane?

December 8, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The Filipina Pea does videos encouraging men to go to the Philippines to find love. While this may look like a good alternative to settling for a Western woman, marrying a woman from a more traditional society comes with its own challenges.

In any case the Filipina Pea has done a solid video on the 4B movement which is worth seeing. At the end she naturally encourages men to come to the Philippines.

Equality? What exactly do you mean by that?

December 10, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

In the course of dispute, many a feminist will inform you that you "don't know what feminism really is", and instruct you to "look in the dictionary". They will pronounce this with an air of immutable finality, as if they had settled the question for all time. In deference to their wisdom, I share the following dictionary entry:

> Feminism -n: 1 : the theory of the political, economic, and social equality of the sexes.

This definition is the source of the oft-heard claim that "feminism is about equality", meaning that it seeks to establish equality of the sexes in the form suggested. We call this "dictionary feminism", and if you enquire to know what feminism really is, it establishes a core minimum that nearly any feminist would publicly agree upon.

The problem with dictionary feminism is that it does not exist outside the dictionary. For this reason, we favor a more pragmatic or empirical way of knowledge. To us feminism is not merely a sentence on a book page, or even an ideology. It is a set of real-life practices – a dynamic pattern of things existing in the objective world. We see it, and we call it as we see it. From this we draw the counter-feminist maxim that "feminism is what we say it is".

To say that feminism is "about equality" is useless because, frankly, what is this thing called "equality"? No ready answer presents itself, and we are left with no coherent explanation. That compels us to set aside the dictionary and map our knowledge from independent principles.

For that purpose, we now go to investigate the difficulties of the term "equality".

One issue immediately crops up, namely, the rightness of this term in relation to "feminism". One sees that "masculism" could be supplied in place of "feminism" with no harm done to the requirements of "equality". Either term would be equally fitting, and provided both sexes came out "equal" it would all be good. (Ideally, however, both terms should be discarded in favor of something sexually neutral.)

Only if we assume that a present inequality exists, and that this condition disfavors women, can we justify using "feminism" according to the "equality" definition.

But not everybody would accept the notion that women suffer inequality. Many would find this notion problematic. Hence, the word feminism (as the dictionary defines it) is loaded. It is contraband language that smuggles a hidden premise into the discussion and tricks you into harboring an element of the feminist worldview. Like a thought-terminating cliché, it invites no cognitive process of discovery. So in order to ferret out the contraband in the dictionary definition of feminism, we should reconstruct the definition thuswise:

> Feminism -n: Advocacy for women on the grounds that women are burdened with > inequality.

Granted, this doesn't quite tell us what "equality" (or inequality) really means. But it frames the talk in a manner that precludes mischief, and puts us in a way to asking the relevant questions. In that spirit, we shall focus our lens narrowly upon the word "equality" itself. What does this word really mean? Here the talk gets especially interesting.

On the surface, "equality" would seem to be feminism's holy grail. Yet although this word is central to the dictionary definition of feminism, it is debatable whether feminism genuinely seeks "equality" between between the sexes. However, let's leave political questions aside for now.

The term is most at home in the realm of mathematics — and we could argue that it's away from home anywhere else. Fundamentally, "equality" is where two sides of an equation are identical. Hence, X = X is another way of saying that "X is X". Simply stated: anything is what it is. This is the law of identity.

Very well. The realm of mathematics is the realm of pure number, hence the realm of pure abstraction. A number is merely a conceptual quantifier. It may keep tabs on things in the real world, but a number in itself has no assignable quality apart from abstractness. Numbers are not hot or cold, wet or dry, sad or happy, male or female, socialist or capitalist. A number has no physical dimension, and it references nothing inherently.

So long as you stick to pure math, or anything that can be mathematically operationalized, equality is a workable concept. Otherwise, it is an essentially contested concept. The reason is, that when you apply this concept to human conditions in the world of lived reality, it turns into a hopeless muddle.

However, that does not stop legions of muddle-headed people from applying the concept of "equality" to the world of lived reality. They do this all the time.

The non-mathematical world is a world in flux, a metamorphosing world. It is a dynamic world, to say the least — it never sits still for long.

In such a world, "equality" becomes a very tricky and complicated idea. So what does it mean as a core minimum? As a core minimum, any way you cut it, "equality" signifies "sameness" or "identity". Numerical quantities on opposite sides of an equation are always the same — otherwise, the math is wrong.

This core idea of sameness carries over into the real world, but quickly goes south. That is because the only way to achieve universal "equality" in the human social world, or in the physical universe at large, is to create absolute SAMENESS of all things everywhere. Pure "equality" would equate to pure nothingness — pure non-existence — because it would*annihilate the basis for all differentiation.*

That's what you get, when you try to make a mathematical idea govern every facet of living reality. Mathematics is pure abstraction, hence pure nothingness, and when you force this upon the real world, the only logical outcome, is pure nothingness.

The real world is not only dynamic and ever-changing, but subject to countless frames of reference at any given instant. Would you make all of that "equal"? Then you must roll it flat, and convert it into . . . . nothing! No differentiation equals nothing. That's the rule.

Now, when feminists and various other people bang on about this "equality" thing, they are simply playing with a noble buzzword that makes them feel warm and fuzzy because it conjures up glowing mental images of truth and beauty and universal justice. This is called the halo effect.

In feminist discourse, at any rate, equality breaks down into two forms:

1. Equality of opportunity — also called "formal equality",

2. Equality of outcome — also called "substantive equality".

Equality of opportunity can be achieved when you mandate "equal rights" under law, so that everybody legally has the same opportunity in situation X. It's about anti-discrimination.

Equality of outcome, however, goes deeper. It aims to rearrange the world so that no gross disparities of wealth or situation will be found anywhere. As if, eveybody has not only an equal right to pick in the orchard, but a positive guarantee they will come away with the same number of apples.

Equality of outcome can only be made real, when some superior force — such as state power — intervenes in the world of affairs and either redistributes the harvest, or handicaps some of the harvesters so that they won't harvest any more than anybody else does.

Furthermore, equality of outcome can only be made real, when the intervening force cuts deeper and deeper into the microcosm of life, to see that redistribution and handicapping are applied to even the smallest of transactions. There is no theoretical limit to this.

In a nutshell, equality of outcome is inherently a totalitarian project. That is the level of control it eventually requires – total. Finally, it generates the biggest inequality of all, because the enforcers of "equality" will hold all the power and other people will hold little or none.

In the end, there is no ultimate "equality" in the real world. There is only endlessly redistributed inequality. That is where all of our efforts to achieve so-called "equality", in the real world, will take us. So if you want to worship "equality", be a mathematician. You will be on solid ground that way.

And never talk about "equality" in an abstract or freestanding way; never as a political catch-phrase or banner slogan. Any time you speak or write this word, you should directly follow up with a finite project or proposal where you hope to see some precise condition "equalized". Otherwise, don't say it. That is the only honest way to use this word: not as a glittering generality, not as a rainbow which invites pursuit, but as something immediate and quantifiable.

Remember that this "equality" thing which so many people prattle on about, amounts to intellectual cotton candy and very little more. In other words, it is a sweet nothing. So when people blather about it, they are blathering about . . . . nothing.

Tell me, how insane is that, to blather about nothing? Hallucination is not a wise idea. We need reality — the more the better.

Two Feminist Fallacies

December 12, 2024 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

This concerns two common errors of thinking which most feminists stumble into while they are scrambling to decipher what is happening to their world, why things are slipping out of their control, and how they might regain that control. I call these two errors the crosshairs fallacy, and the moral perfection fallacy.

When I call them fallacies, I do not mean they are strictly logical fallacies in the academic way. That is, I do not pretend to add them to the likes of ad hominem, circular argument, strawman, and so on. No, for my purpose, these new items are fallacious simply because they are mistaken; because they initialize thinking upon a foundation of error and trigger downstream error in conjoined regions of understanding. I am keen to call attention to them because they so strongly mark the behavior of feminists in particular — especially those who are describing or attacking the non-feminist revolution. So my motivation to write is political.

I will speak first of the crosshairs fallacy.

Feminists fall into this mistaken thoughtway owing to their confusion and consequent desire to simplify. In a word, they oversimplify. Beset by hostile forces which they cannot fathom, they try to align a narrow target, as it were, in the crosshairs of a sniper scope. Their deluded hope is, that the sum and substance of what threatens them lies within that constricted radius, and that if only they neutralize the target area, their troubles will go away and perpetual revolution will resume its course unhindered.

Among feminists, the crosshairs target of choice is the cyberspace group known as "MRAs", or Male Renaissance Agitators. Feminists are obsessed with MRAs as a kind of "red menace." They sense, quite rightly, that larger social forces are mobilizing against feminism and what feminism has inflicted on the world, and with utmost naïveté they have undertaken a shorthand analysis that would make these things mentally easier to cope with.

Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate. The crosshairs fallacy springs from a childish belief that the vital force of the non-feminist revolution concentrates in a point source — for example, a certain community of websites — and that if you neutralize this particular "head", then the "snake" will expire. But that is a gross misunderstanding — akin to attacking a prominent mushroom in complete ignorance of the underlying mycelium which spreads for miles. For even if you kill, imprison, or pinklist every suspected "MRA" on the planet, you will not have made a dent in the cultural forces which generated MRAs in the first place. Furthermore, you will have overlooked a host of *other*threats to feminism from other directions.

Accordingly, it will not do to sit around in feminist echo chambers mocking the bizarrities of presumptive MRAs who have posted comments on the internet. For such words are not spoken in a vacuum, nor do they enter the universe through a side door from nowhere. It should go without saying that such unsavoriness is the consequence of something — even a feminist could agree on that much. But what a feminist cannot hope to fathom without ceasing to be a feminist, is that these things originate from a source in the objective world which the feminist narrative is not competent to explain.

So the feminists have arrived at a false simplicity. The problem is not that the facts of the case are unduly difficult to comprehend, but that they are difficult for a specifically feminist mindset to process without a prerequisite self-knowledge and the sense of guilt this knowledge would instill. It is to avoid guilty self-knowledge, then, that the feminists project their anxieties onto an abstracted and quasi-mythical group of people — as onto a lightning rod.

To be sure, MRAs do exist in various forms. But "the MRA" as an*archetypal construct,* is largely a figment of the feminist imagination. And MRAs, whether concretely or archetypally, are only one piece of a much larger jigsaw puzzle. The more advanced non-feminist philosophers, by the way, do not make the equivalent error in their thinking about feminism or feminists. Rather, they have evolved a sophisticated conceptual model of feminism as a sociopolitical organism — a subject which I have treated elsewhere.

I will speak next of the moral perfection fallacy.

The feminists wish to discredit their enemies as simply as possible, and so they look for anything that is morally amiss about their enemies in order to expedite that project. This is fallacious mainly because it is shallow. For there is no way that any sizeable demographic sector can be a vessel of moral purity straight through, and the non-feminist sector is no exception. You will find the complete moral spectrum of human nature among those who oppose feminism, because we are talking about humanity en masse — and when did humanity en masse ever include less than a complete moral spectrum?Furthermore, you should understand that feminism is a utopian worldview. It upholds the abstract ideal of "progress" and holds the rest of the world accountable to a certain programme which it dictates in the service of this ideal.

So when the rest of the world is slow to measure up, it counts as proof (in the feminist mind) that the rest of the world is morally invalid and, thus invalidated, without warrant to challenge feminist claims. This mode of thinking is entirely circular and self-referential.In practice, all feminist assessment of human fallibility is made according to a feminist yardstick, meaning that no case of moral dysfunction is permitted to operate within its own frame of reference. Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate. And in the feminist utopian worldview, all things are either progressing toward a projected feminist future, or rebelling against that future in some way. No alterity is admitted, and by default, any possible theory of "sin" or "transgression" can only be a feminist theory, imposed by feminists and for feminists, upon the rest of the world.

And so the feminists cannot see the world as it exists in itself, but only as it appears through the lens of feminist theory. In consequence, feminist dealings with the non-feminist sector amount to a coercive falsification of reality injuriously imposed on others. For it ought to be obvious that all manner of folk may be aggrieved at feminism for all manner of reasons. It is not a bit obvious, however, that ALL of these reasons are invalid merely because SOME of them are proffered on questionable grounds by questionable people. Coercive falsification is therefore a cardinal sin upon feminism's doorstep; it is first imposed, reacted against by an aggrieved world, and imposed once more in rejoinder to that aggrieved reaction — which to the feminist mind is deemed a transgression. But with each round the falsification grows — always at the expense of any feminist claim to moral authority. This claim — or rather pretention — crumbles relentlessly.

In sum, feminism has a toxic moral agency within the social ecology. And so the moral perfection fallacy should inspire us to quote the Gospel verse which advises plucking the beam out of thine own eye before thou pluckest the mote out of thy neighbor's eye!

A concluding word: The crosshairs fallacy and the moral perfection fallacy are interrelated; they intertwine; they have territory in common; they illuminate each other. But I will leave it to the reader to work this out for himself or herself.

The Goal Post Episode 49 – How to Fight Woke (And How Not To)

December 16, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Demonising Men While Ignoring Female Filicide Data

December 18, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Jordan Peterson’s Map For Oedipal Men

December 19, 2024 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

To understand Jordan Peterson’s encouraging of young men to become heroes in service to the maternal principle, especially within the context of marriage, we must turn to his ideological pedigree in the formulations of Carl Jung. Jung characterized the hero archetype as bound up with what he called ‘the Great Mother archetype,’ believing that male heroism rests on resisting the negative mother or, alternatively, acting as servant to a positive mother. Jung’s mother-tied concept of the hero is laid out in his Symbols of Transformation, an idea that Peterson reiterates when he treats motherly women as an axis mundi who provide essential meaning to male striving (a position I touched on in a 2017 article titled The Gynocentrism of Jordan Peterson).

Peterson refers to Freud’s claim that the Oedipus myth is a “failed hero story,” but he proposes, following Jung, that relationships men have with mothers and other feminine figures might be more positive and more inspirational than the taboo interpretation insisted upon by Freud. Whether such relationships with inspiring or nurturing female figures be positive or negative, Peterson appears to miss Freud’s point that both of these options still belie an incestuous entanglement with mother imagos.

In this video for example, Peterson claims that positive mothers give birth to heroes. He illustrates this point by reference to an image of Hercules who floats on a chaotic ocean in what he refers to as a “feminine boat,” which is a metaphor for an uplifting, positive mother. In this lecture he reminds his female students of their role in creating and sustaining heroes: “That’s what you’re trying to produce if you’re a good mother, it’s this figure that can go out into the unknown armed, accurate and able to pay attention,” and he adds that mothers create male heroes who “can take on the troubles of the world.”

Might this be why Peterson places such strong emphasis on women becoming mothers – that they might breed and nurture the next generation of male heroes? That male heroes might then have a female boat to float their heroic mindset? Further, what might happen if we replaced all of Peterson’s inspiring female figures with inspiring male figures?

There is no way, at least in my reading, of understanding Peterson’s kind of feminine-tied heroism as anything other than a mother fixation. The archetypalist James Hillman agrees that “contrary to the classical analytical view, we would suggest that the son who succumbs and the hero who overcomes both take their definition through the relationship with the magna mater… When mother determines the role, then regardless how it is played its essence is always the same: a son. And, as Jung says of assertive heroism:

> “Unfortunately, however, this heroic deed has no lasting effects. Again and again the hero must renew the struggle, and always under the symbol of deliverance from the mother”[1]

What we are dealing with by over-emphasizing the role of mothers is the creation of two male archetypes: Mother’s son (Oedipus), and Mother’s hero (Hercules). Readers will be aware that Hercules' relationship with female figures leaves him riddled with guilt and pathology, and Oedipus is the ultimate example of malignant, incestuous heroics who is unable to enact his heroism as anything but the result of his relationship with female figures. But the Oedipal path is not the only way to view the male hero, as Hillman describes;

> The [maternal] dragon demands battle and the hero myth tells us how to proceed. But suppose we were to step out altogether from the great mother, from Jocasta and Oedipus and the exhausting, blinding heroics…. If Freud was right that Oedipus is the stuff of neurosis, then the corollary follows that Oedipus-heroics are the dynamism of neurosis. Heroism is thus a kind of neurosis, and the heroic ego is neurotic ego. Creative spirit and fertile matter are there embraced and embattled to the destruction of both.[2]

So far I've been referring only to a classical Jungian concept of the male hero, and to Jordan Peterson's reliance on same.[3] The hero archetype in Jung's writings is intimately bound up with the mother archetype (being a hero for mother / or fighting against the dragon mother), or otherwise tied up with feminine figures (inspiratress, or muse). These are archetypes that can be contrasted with other kinds of male hero who have zero entanglement with feminine figures.

Aside from the mother's heroes described above, there are a number of variations detailed by Joseph Campbell in his famous work The Hero With a Thousand Faces. Campbell wasn't a Jungian, and he was suspicious of Jungian dogmas, once claiming "I'm not a Jungian! I'm much more interested in diffusion and relationships historically than Jung was, so that the Jungians think of me as a kind of questionable person."[4] Likewise, Campbell's conception of the hero is not beholden to Jungian or Freudian orthodoxies.

Campbell paints the hero's journey as a stepping off into the unknown, into a more gutsy hero's journey as compared with stepping out into the world as 'mother's hero' to do her bidding. As Campbell characterized it, a more masculine hero's journey might entail leaving the mother-world behind and seeking atonement with the father, which Campbell describes; "When the child outgrows the popular idyl of the mother breast and turns to face the world of specialized adult action, it passes, spiritually, into the sphere of the father—who becomes, for his son, the sign of the future task… Whether he knows it or not, and no matter what his position in society, the father is the initiating priest through whom the young being passes on into the larger world."

As one facebook poster put it;

> "The hero's journey as described by Joseph Campbell begins by 'Separation,' the departure from the status quo. To me this personally I associate this to stepping out of and leaving the gynocentric view of the status quo."

Leaving behind the gynocentric world is precisely what is entailed. To whit, Campbell writes:

> This first stage of the mythological journey—which we have designated the "call to adventure"—signifies that destiny has summoned the hero and transferred his spiritual center of gravity from within the pale of his society to a zone unknown. This fateful region of both treasure and danger may be variously represented: as a distant land, a forest, a kingdom underground, beneath the waves, or above the sky, a secret island, lofty mountaintop, or profound dream state; but it is always a place of strangely fluid and polymorphous beings, unimaginable torments, superhuman deeds, and impossible delight. The hero can go forth of his own volition to accomplish the adventure, as did Theseus when he arrived in his father's city, Athens, and heard the horrible history of the Minotaur; or he may be carried or sent abroad by some benign or malignant agent, as was Odysseus, driven about the Mediterranean by the winds of the angered god, Poseidon.[5]

That refers to the father-inspired hero. For the mother-bound hero, however, this broader journey is renounced in favor of remaining within the family complex and enacting a pale heroism on its behalf. As Campbell tells;

> Often in actual life, and not infrequently in the myths and popular tales, we encounter the dull case of the call unanswered… The literature of psychoanalysis abounds in examples of such desperate fixations. What they represent is an impotence to put off the infantile ego, with its sphere of emotional relationships and ideals. One is bound in by the walls of childhood; the father and mother stand as threshold guardians, and the timorous soul, fearful of some punishment, fails to make the passage through the door and come to birth in the world without.[5]

Campbell entertained a few gynocentric beliefs of his own that were popular in academia in his time. Mercifully, he formulated the hero's Journey on the principle of men stepping out into new horizons without the need for maternal or feminine fixations, and on that journey he said it is frequently male figures who serve to encourage, inspire and guide the male hero – fathers, brothers, ancestral spirits, male mentors and guides. Campbell's hero provides a welcome change from Oedipal hero which sees men going from enmeshment with mothers straight into the married arms of a maternal wife as Peterson encourages for young men. In other words Campbell's hero template for men is explicitly Red Pill, as contrasted with gynocentric fixation on parental figures and roles.

Paul Elam, who has devoted much of his life to imparting the wisdom of self-determinism to men, made this incisive response regarding the comparison of Campbell's and Peterson's concepts of the hero:

After floating a description of this 'Campbellian' kind of hero on Twitter and describing his more masculine pedigree, a few people asked whether this path was suitable for all men; eg., straight, gay, soft, hard, nerd or Canadian lumberjack. The answer is yes, because we all have maternal influences dominating our childhood and have a choice to move into adult life remaining enmeshed or obsessed with feminine forces (Peterson), or otherwise to place the accent on atonement with the world of men and with adventure (Campbell). The choice, as always, is yours.

References:

[1] James Hillman, 'The Great Mother, Her Son, Her Hero, And The Puer,' in Fathers and mothers; five papers on the archetypal background of family psychology, Spring Publications (1973)
[2] Karl Kerenyi, James Hillman, Oedipus Variations: Studies in Literature and Psychoanalysis. Spring Publications (1995)
[3] Note: As well as deriving inspiration from Jung's conception of the hero, Peterson leans heavily on the work of Jungian Erich Neumann (The Great Mother, and The Origins And History of Consciousness) whose writings display an obsession with mother imagery. For readers wanting to investigate how irrational Neumann's ideas are, see the excellent critique by Wolfgang Giegerich titled ONTOGENY = PHYLOGENY? A Fundamental Critique of Erich Neumann's Analytical Psychology (1975).
[4] Joseph Campbell. An open life: Joseph Campbell in conversation with Michael Toms. Larson Publications (1988)
[5] Joseph Campbell, The hero with a thousand faces (rev. ed.). Bollingen Series, 17. (1990)

Stand by Your Manhood: Peter Lloyd Interview

December 21, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Peter Lloyd discussed issues facing men and boys on the Australian television program Studio 10. Various topics familiar to men's rights activists are discussed.

Eating while MGTOW: Look at the flowers! stoup

December 23, 2024 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

---

Eating well, eating healthily and eating inexpensively are my goals as MGTOW. As MGTOW we have to be smarter and more self-aware than the putative pair-bonders not only in how we manage our sexuality and relationships, but also in how we both manage and enjoy our physical existence.

I enjoy eating potatoes a great deal but eating a great deal of potatoes is not a good idea – as far as they hit your body, eating one is like eating a brick of sugar: potatoes are mostly starch that the body quickly breaks down into – yes – sugar in the bloodstream. Nutritionists measure this effect with something called the glycemic index and on that scale of 0 to 100, a baked potato rates an astounding 111 – 11% HIGHER than eating a brick of sugar (100).

So if you are watching carbohydrates in your diet, dropping or restricting potatoes and other starchy foods like rice and pasta is the only correct way to go MGTOW. For me, anyway.

A great vegetable to use in place of potatoes, rice and pasta is cauliflower.

To use it as rice, I grate it into rice-sized grains and toss it directly into stir fry dishes.

To use it like mashed potatoes, just boil for 10-12 minutes, drain well and mash like you would potatoes. I boil mine with a couple of cloves of garlic, then mash with butter, heavy cream, sour cream and/or cream cheese to get a mashed-potato-like result. Season with salt & pepper and voilà!

In college, our favorite late-night cram-time meal was Kraft(tm) macaroni & cheese mixed with browned hamburger. Not exactly great cuisine, but it was a fast, tasty and filling meal before my computer nerd friends and I slogged back to the books to memorize reams of feminist “academic” crap. I still remember being so frustrated by getting repeated grades of “B” from my feminist English professor that I stole an “A” paper written by a female friend. Her writing was so bad that I had my first red-pill moment: the only problem with my writing was my penis.

Nowadays, when I’m in the nostalgic mood for mac & cheese I fall back on my favorite way to prepare cauliflower: as a pseudo pasta product. The result is something the delightful, husky-voiced Rachel Ray on 30-minute meals would call a “stoup” – sort of stew and sort of soup.

“Look at the flowers! Stoup”
(serves one)

- Fill a large saucepan with water, add a bit of salt and bring to a rapid boil.
- Prepare 1/2 a head of cauliflower by slicing it thinly. Some of it will fall into crumbs but that is okay; gather up all the crumbs as well as the slices.

- Add the sliced cauliflower and one smashed clove of garlic to boiling water and return to a boil for 7 minutes; 6 minutes if you want a firmer result, 8 minutes for complete disintegration of the result.
- Drain in a colander while you prepare the sauce in the same saucepan.
- Under very low heat, add 1/8 cup (30 ml) heavy cream (more or less) to the pan. Half-n-half or milk will also work but these contain a bit of sugar that cream does not.
- Add about 3/4 cup (200 gm) of cubed Velveeta pasteurized prepared cheese product and stir to melt. I season the melting cheese with Sriracha Hot Chili Sauce, Mrs Dash Southwest Chipotle Seasoning blend, and freshly ground black pepper. Stir in the cauliflower until evenly coated and serve immediately.

You can augment this basic recipe with a variety of meats and vegetables. For example:

- Add 1/2 cup (120 g) of cubed or sliced ham to the cauliflower during boiling.
- Substitute broccoli or even broccoflower for some or even all the cauliflower for variety or a change of pace.
- Mix in one link of crumbled, browned hot Italian Sausage before serving.
- Add chopped fresh jalapeño or red bell peppers during boiling.
- Mix in pickled jalapeño peppers before serving.
- Bacon, hamburger, chicken, pork, shrimp – go wild if adventure suits you.

Whatever you do, make it so spicy that any delicate, easily triggered feminists in the vicinity flee in terror from both the intense, rapey flavor and the reality that you don't need them for anything any longer.

Whence "Look at the flowers!"? If you are a fan of the Walking Dead, you already know.

The Piano Guys – Merry Christmas!

December 24, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

To the men who haven’t seen their kids in a long time

December 25, 2024 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

---

Christmas is upon us again so we wanted to make a short post on a problem facing men around the world.

Parental alienation can take many forms. One parent may bad mouth the other when they are alone with the children. The alienating parent may make it difficult to arrange visits, cancelling visitation at the last minute or insisting on rescheduling without reasonable notice. In its most extreme form parental alienation involves one parent preventing the other from seeing their children for long periods of time, sometimes years.

There isn’t anything we can say that will soothe the pain of parental alienation. It is criminal to keep innocent men from their children. That the state should allow (and facilitate) this makes it beyond criminal.

We know that some of our readers haven’t seen their children in years. We can’t promise you that the future will turn out the way you want it to. What we can promise is that we will not let the world forget the evil that is parental alienation. It harms parents and it harms children.

If you are with your kids then count your blessings, give them a big hug and spare a thought for the fathers who won’t get to be so lucky.

Merry Christmas from the crew at A Voice for Men. Let’s all work towards a better future.

The Goal Post Episode 50: The Cure for ST:D

December 30, 2024 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Gynocentric cultures eventually lead to low birthrates

January 2, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Population growth is tied to economic growth. Culture centered on women's comforts (gynocentric) initially seemed a great way to promote economic growth because it stimulated men to work harder to buy more for women – not to mention women buying more for themselves and their families. That's why politicians around the world have loved promoting it; it creates a robust financial engine, while ensuring those same politicians continue to gain office for supporting women.

So in the short term the gynocentric ethos is great for creating a booming economy…… until it runs its course. It leads eventually to a kind of state narcissism among women and a collapse of the birthrate because, as studies have shown, kids get in the way of narcissistic goals.

Earning & spending on gynocentrism is great for the money machine, until there's negative birth rate. Then its game over, at which time we see politicians stepping in to prop up women with more financial offerings for each child born, tax breaks, and even state subsidized childcare in the hopes of encouraging more births, but this too fails.

The obvious fix now is to swap out gynocentrism in favor of family-centrism, things which can't co-exist because they are opposed motives. So for all those people wailing about the need to have more kids, there's just one thing you have to discard first – and then it will be all systems go. Good luck!

With that summary of the topic, let me now go back and explain what I mean by a gynocentric economy. It's an economy that supports women as the primary household buyers and spenders who make the larger share of major buying decisions whether that be a car, house, overseas holiday, household food, goods, furniture and decor.

As corollary to woman as spender, men are upheld as the primary money earners who labor to make women financially comfortable. Note that this kind of arrangement is not universal or essential; the economic setup can be equally geared to the family as primary economic unit, of which I'll say more in a moment, in contrast to the gendered hierarchy of women as primary economic focus.

A recent comment by American traditional conservative Charlie Kirk explains the 'man as earner / woman-as-spender' custom, which he published on platform X in December 2024 as follows:

> CHARLIE KIRK: "Let me tell the men out there, you do not spend a dime on video games or sports games or things for yourself until your wife does not have to worry about finances. You come last in the family when it comes to finances. Period. That is your job."

This wedding of money to women's happiness has been a specialty of American culture for the last two centuries. For example, in the year 1903, international culture critic Max O'Rell observed the following:

> "The American man is the most devoted and hard-working husband in the world. The poor, dear fellow! He works, and he works, and he works, and the beads of perspiration from his brow crystallize in the shape of diamonds all over the ears, the fingers and the neck of his interesting womankind. He invites her to share his pleasures, but he saves her the trouble of sharing his anxieties. The burden of life from seven in the morning till seven in the evening rests on his shoulders alone."

In similar vein, The Independent newspaper published the following summary in 1909:

> "In Europe the aristocracy is largely relieved from drudgery in order that they may cultivate the graces of life. In America the attempt is being made to relieve the women of all classes from drudgery, and we are glad to see that some of them at least are making good use of the leisure thus afforded them. It is a project involving unprecedented daring and self-sacrifice on the part of American men, this making an aristocracy of half the race. That it is possible yet remains to be proved. Whether it is desirable depends upon whether this new feminine aristocracy avoids the faults of the aristocracy of the Old World, such as frivolousness and snobbishness."

More on the theory behind collapsing birth-rates

First premise: Gynocentrism fosters narcissistic behavior in women. (hold that thought). [1]

According to a 2019 study,[2] individuals with higher levels of narcissism in young adulthood were less likely to have children by midlife. This study found that vanity, a facet of narcissism, was associated with fewer children and less stable relationships. This is supported by a 2025 study which found that vulnerable narcissism (which is more typically expressed by women), but not grandiose narcissism (which is more typical of men) was related to lower reproductive motivation and fertility. [3]

Second premise: A gynocentrically oriented economy, such as we have in the West, thrives only until the generated increase in narcissism reaches critical mass and negatively impacts the birthrate, resulting in a weakened, vulnerable economy.

By way of contrast, when I talk to older Asians about their work ethic and spending habits, they usually say that they are doing it "for the family" instead of for wife or women. However, the problem we have in much of the world today is that these two models – gynocentric economics vs. family economics – are clashing and causing birth-rate paralysis, with family economics getting crushed under the weight of a growing, but increasingly maladaptive gynocentric economy.

As an aside, I note the different pitch some older Asian women make to husbands. They nudge husbands to man-up "for the family" instead of "for women," and as part of that framework the women sees her own role as equally requiring her to 'woman-up' for family in terms of economic contributions.

Sadly, most younger Asian women have now caught the gynocentric virus, and their language has changed to saddling husbands with the need to economically man up for her and to provide an economic pedestal for her to sit on…… hence why there's a birthrate problem growing throughout Asia too.

Whatever the future brings, one thing is absolutely certain: there will be increasing hardship due to the collapsing birthrates around the world. At some point cultures will be forced to make a shift away from the negative costs of gynocentrism, and toward a traditional family-centrism that forms the basis of all healthy societies – societies that showcase healthy birth rates, and allow for sustainable economies that depend on them.

Sources:

[1] Wright, P. (2020). GYNOCENTRISM AS A NARCISSISTIC PATHOLOGY. New Male Studies, 9(1). and Wright, P. (2023). GYNOCENTRISM AS A NARCISSITIC PATHOLOGY PART 2. New Male Studies, 12(1).

[2] Wetzel, E., Grijalva, E., Robins, R. W., & Roberts, B. W. (2020). You're still so vain: Changes in narcissism from young adulthood to middle age. Journal of personality and social psychology, 119(2), 479.

[3] Mededovic, J., & Jovanov, N. (2024). Explaining the Links Between Narcissism and Fertility: Are There Differences Between the Grandiose and Vulnerable Component?.

Living Apart Together “LAT” Will this be the new normal?

January 4, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

USA, champion of extreme gynocentrism (1835–1929)

January 7, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

In 1835, the publication 'Democracy in America' by Alexis de Tocqueville concluded that the uniqueness of the American character, and its material growth, were due principally to female superiority:

> And if, now that I am approaching the end of this book, in which I have shown so many considerable things done by the Americans, you asked me to what I think the singular prosperity and growing strength of this people must be principally attributed, I would answer that it is to the superiority of their women.

In 1846, the following article, describing American culture as an epicenter of exaggerated gynocentrism & chivalry, was published in The London Sun:

> I am convinced that a lady, no matter what her age and attractions might be, could journey through the whole extent of the union, not only without experiencing a single annoyance, but aided in every possible way with unobtrusive civility. Indeed a great number of Saphonisbas and Almiras do travel about, protected only by the chivalry of their countrymen and their own undoubted propriety.
>
> To them the best seats, the best of everything, are always allotted. A friend of mine told me of a little affair at New York Theatre, the other night, illustrative of my assertion. A stiff-necked Englishman had engaged a front place, and of course the best corner: when the curtain rose, he was duly seated, opera-glass in hand, to enjoy the performance. A lady and a gentleman came into the box shortly afterwards; the cavalier in escort, seeing that the place where our friend sat was the best, calling his attention, saying "The lady, sir," and motioned that the corner should be vacated. The possessor, partly because he disliked the imperative mood, and partly because it bored him to be disturbed, refused. Some words ensued, which attracted the attention of the sovereign people in the pit, who magisterially enquired what was the matter?
>
> The American came to the front of the box and said, "There is an Englishman here who will not give up his place to a lady." Immediately their majesties swarmed up by dozens over the barriers, seized the offender, very gently though, and carried him to the entrance; he kicked, cursed, and fought all in vain: he excited neither the pity nor the anger of his stern executioners; they placed him carefully on his feet again at the steps, one man handing him his hat, another his opera glass, and a third the price he had paid for his ticket of admission, then quickly shut the door upon him, and returned to their places. The shade of the departed Judge Lynch must have rejoiced at such an angelic administration of his > law! – England in the New World.

In 1856, author of Putnam's Monthly Magazine published the following summary of the relations between men and women in America:

> "Long before the cry of woman's rights was openly raised, the powers and prerogatives of the American husband had been gradually undermined. Usage superseded law, and trampled it under foot. Sentiment put logical consistency at defiance, and the American husband has thus become a legal monster, a logical impossibility, required to fly without wings, and to run without feet.
>
> "While the wife is thus rendered to a great extent independent of her husband, he, by a strange inconsistency is still held, both by law and public opinion, just as responsible for her as before. The old and reasonable maxim that 'he who dances must pay the piper,' does not apply to wives—they dance, and the husband pays. To such an extent is this carried, that if the wife beats her husband, and he, having no authority to punish her in kind, applies to the criminal courts for redress, she will be fined for assault and battery, which fine he must pay, even thought she has plenty of money of her own. or, in default of paying, go to jail! Such cases are by no means of unprecedented occurrence in our criminal courts.

In 1872 a Japanese visitor expresses amazement at the gynocentric nature of American customs:

> American customs seem baffling to us. Among these differing customs by far the strangest was the social relations between men and women. In conjugal and family relations in Japan a wife is dutiful to her mother and father-in-law and children show respect to their parents. In America, however, it is the custom for the husband to serve his wife! This may involve carrying her lantern or shoes, offering her delicacies, dusting off her garments, helping her when she boards or lights from a carriage, pushing her chair forward when she sits, or carrying articles for her when she is walking. If the husband senses even the slightest displeasure from his wife he demonstrates his love and respect by bowing and apologizing. If the apology is not accepted he may be sent out of the room and cannot even eat. When men and women are traveling in the same carriage, the men stand immediately to offer their seats to the women who take them without hesitation. While women are present, men are circumspect in their behavior speaking softly and avoiding cursing and argument.

In 1887 The Open Court mentions that Continental European view Americans as suffering from gynocentrism rather than male-centeredness:

> M. Bois is unstinted in his praise and admiration for the inexhaustible potencies of the fair sex, and reviews their anthropology, or rather, if we may use the word in its literal sense, their gynaecology, less with the eye of the scientist than with the aim of the passionate special pleader [who] hails the advent of the femme> femme. “Woman, before being a wife, a sweetheart, or a mother, is and should be first a woman. Her full freedom must be conserved.”

>
> We Americans have not so much need to take his admonitions to heart as need Continental Europeans, seeing that captious critics are already prone to regard us as suffering rather from gynocentrism than anthropocentrism

In 1903 culture critic Max O’Rell observed the following about gynocentrism in the USA:

> “The government of the American people is not a Republic, it is not a monarchy: it is a gynarchy, a government by the women for the women, a sort of occult power behind the scenes that rules the country.”

Price Collier observed in 1909:

> In England the establishment is, as a rule, at any rate from a man’s point of view, more comfortable than the American home. Americans staying any time in England, whether men or women, are impressed by the fact that it is the country of men. Likewise the English, both men and women, who visit America are impressed by the fact that America is the country of women.

The Kalgoorlie Newspaper reported the following in 1910:

> “In Europe the aristocracy is largely relieved from drudgery in order that they may cultivate the graces of life. In America the attempt is being made to relieve the women of all classes from drudgery, and we are glad to see that some of them at least are making good use of the leisure thus afforded them. It is a project involving unprecedented daring and self-sacrifice on the part of American men, this making an aristocracy of half the race. That it is possible yet remains to be proved. Whether it is desirable depends upon whether this new feminine aristocracy avoids the faults of the aristocracy of the Old World, such as frivolousness and snobbishness.”

Irishman George A. Birmingham wrote in 1914:

> “There are people in the world who believe that we are born again and again, rising or sinking in the scale of living things at each successive incarnation according as we behave ourselves well or badly in our present state. If this creed were true, I should try very hard to be good, because I should want, next time I am born, to be an American woman. She seems to me to have a better kind of life than the women of any other nation, or, indeed, than anybody else, man or woman… American social life seems to me — the word is one to apologize for — gynocentric. It is arranged with a view to the convenience and delight of women. Men come in where and how they can…. The American woman is certainly more her own mistress than the Englishwoman, just because America does its best for women and only its second-best for men. The tendency among American humourists is to dwell a little on the greed of the > Englishman, who is represented as incapable of earning money for himself. The English jester lays more stress on the American woman's desire to be called "my lady," and pokes sly fun at the true Democrat's fondness for titles. The American man is reverent toward women. It is not the homage of the strong toward the weak, but the obeisance of the inferior in the presence of a superior. This difference of spirit underlies the whole relationship of men to women in England and America. The English feminist is up against chivalry and wants equality. The American woman, though she may claim rights, has no inducement to destroy reverence.

Albert Einstein observed in 1921:

> Above all things are the women who as a literal fact, dominate the entire life in America. The men take an interest in absolutely nothing at all. They work and work, the like of which I have never seen anywhere yet. For the rest they are the toy dogs of the women, who spend the money in the most unmeasurable, illimitable way and wrap themselves in a fog of extravagance. They do everything which is in the vogue, and now quite by chance they have thrown themselves on the Einstein fashion.

The following is a journalist's response to Constance Eaton's 1929 claim that the sexes have been crafted into social classes – "aristocratic women, and male serfs" :

> "THE AMERICAN MALE has always had a tendency to put woman on a pedestal, even if he is not so poetic about it as were the heroes of the age of chivalry. The modern 'equality of the sexes,' instead of doing away with this, has only changed its manner of expression. Woman may stand on the same political plane with man, but spiritually he considers her as remote as the stars. Mentally and morally she is supposed to belong to a higher sphere." At least that it what Constance Eaton, who has been making observations a la Keyserling, Sigfreid, Tolstoi, and others, for readers of The Daily Telegraph of London, believes she has discovered in what she terms America's sex aristocracy. It makes interesting reading to write that woman is considered mentally superior to man, in America. This may be true of the women, but in my experience I have found few men who held such a view. The burden of Miss Eaton's thesis is that man earns the money, woman spends it, woman forms the only leisure class, and that woman has spent her life cultivating herself. Man is abject before woman's superiority.

Article in the Kensington News and West London Times in 1930:

> I think it is quite possible that women will eventually occupy a dominant position in the political, business and social life, and to anyone who says that this situation is impossible I would say that America is an excellent example that it is possible. America has been described as a "woman-ridden" country, and we have many means of proving this to be true. For instance, in America, the unofficial > women’s clubs, which meet in every town, however small, spend a great deal of time passing resolutions, and doing all sorts of propaganda work which influences political activities in their own towns…. [cont.]

SEE ALSO: ‘American Man – the Most Successfully Manipulated Male on Earth’ – by Esther Vilar (1970)

Women, Whales and Whoppers

January 8, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Classic Elam: Fuck You, Tammy Bruce

January 9, 2025 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

The old feminism is on the way out, creating a vacuum in women's politics. Tammy Bruce has apparently decided to take over and fill in the void. Here is her video edict, slickly produced and polished, in which she mightily hails a new breed of feminism, with her at the helm, that is going to replace the corrupt, hateful ideology that current feminism has become. Just watch.

Wow, isn't that cool? Tammy Bruce has a whole new breed of feminism! She will need a new name for it though; maybe something like feminism-plus or not-the-old-feminism or something else equally catchy and original. Feminism 2.0 is so 2.0.

There are some actual differences between what Bruce is saying and what we have come to know of third wave feminists. First, Tammy does not like sluts and says so with haughty Victorian brio. This is by design. One, she wants to remind women, truly enough, of the power of pussy when they are not slinging it like cheap recreational drugs in a bad neighborhood. She is also reminding women, perhaps unintentionally, that a vagina is for more than just alleging it was violated by someone. Also, she means to raise the hackles of the anti-slut shaming sluts that now fill our universities, and, interchangeably, our night clubs.

This is called publicity. As we know so very well here, offending insane gender feminists is better than a large advertising budget. Tammy Bruce, make no mistake about it, knows that, too.

So her command to women now is to control the dick (and the dicks) by realizing that men won't buy a cow with so much free milk around. Regain the power of commodity over your vagina. Clean men up and make them presentable because, after all, they need women's "civilizing" effect. Your father, if the state allowed you to have one, could not have said that part better.

So, what is Tammy Bruce offering women now? It's third wave feminism with a chastity belt and another big fat shame sandwich to force down the throats of men.

Oh mind you, Tammy threw in all the needed sound bites to satisfy most reasonable, modern people. Every woman is entitled to self-determination, the pursuit of happiness, the right to (insert noble human sentiment of choice here). Men are too, of course, but we can't fault Tammy for not noticing. No one else does, either.

She rightfully called modern feminism out on its promotion of victim mentality and the completely vacuous worldview of men as oppressors. She was just spot on in the radical idea that women should view men as partners, touting the importance and value in cooperation between the two sexes.

Even as she tells us repeatedly that men are slovenly, unsophisticated, sexually promiscuous pigs.

I am mostly unclear whether she is advocating that women should partner with the pigs, or whether they should use their vagina to control the pigs, clean them up – thus turning them into serviceable men — and then “partner” with them once they are fit for public presentation. I am voting for the latter.

Gee, Tammy, can’t wait. Oink. Oink.

Side note: I have just suffered a twenty minute block in writing this piece. Not the kind of block that comes when you don’t know what to say next. It is the kind of block that comes with not knowing how to say fuck you in strong enough terms without resorting to larger fonts and the caps lock.

Fuck you, Tammy Bruce, in a regular font will have to suffice.

As I said, Tammy is smart enough to know that feminism as we know it, the damseling, distressed, victimized, statistics-pulled-out-of-your-slutty-ass variety of idiots now running academe and the media are just starting to see the curtain close on their 50 year reign of terror. And she imagines, in her mainstream media-addled mind, that she can head the fourth wave as long as she bashes men to a pulp in the process and tries to instill shame and puritan values in women.

Uh, take a look around you, Tammy. You are peddling the same shit gender feminists have made their raison d’etre for a half century. You are belittling men, calling women superior, screaming for pussy power and pushing to make men of service, while paying lip service to words like “partnership.”
You brilliant bitch, you! How fucking original.

Seriously, Tammy, if you think there are problems with feminism, you are right. If you think you are the solution, then watch your own video while using your brain. There is a lesson in it if you are teachable.

If you want men and women to partner with each other constructively, here is a hint. Pigs and humans are different species. We use pigs. We benefit from them in many ways, but we don’t love and partner with them. Not for the sake of a better society or any other reason. And if we did, it would not work. The pigs will always end up on someone’s plate.

Men and women working together is a great goal, and we will move close to that once we get women (and men) like you try another new product. It’s called Shut the Fuck Up 2.0™. Take your hateful ideas, and get out of the way. You are not helping anything. You are only further attempting to convince people that healing between men and women who respect each other as human beings isn’t possible. Your just like all the other gender feminist whackaloons before you.

There is indeed a response coming to the feminism of old. And it is long overdue. But if anyone has the notion that the next wave of sexual politics is going to include an unchallenged attack on men and masculinity, they are sorely mistaken.

Like I said, fuck you, Tammy Bruce.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

January 12, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

As of January 2025 a warrant is outstanding for the arrest of Zoe McLellan in relation to charges of kidnapping, child stealing and child custody deprivation.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan was reportedly residing in an apartment in River Ridge, Louisiana in April 2021 and may still be residing in the area.

McLellan grew up in the area of Port Orchard, WA and may have returned to the area.

Some sources believe that McLellan has left the United States and is residing in Canada or Costa Rica.

Prior to disappearing McLellan was known to use the alias Sarah Chandler.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's office.

How most men would deal with a pretty drunk girl

January 17, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

You may have heard about the viral video that purported to show how men in Los Angeles would sexually take advantage of a drunken woman on the streets. This video turns out to have been a complete hoax. The men were hired actors whose reputations were severely damaged because they were told they were taking part in a comedy skit and were not told the video would be portrayed as a real event. Even the girl who played the "victim" says she didn't know they were going to lie and manipulate people into believing a false narrative.

Here's a case of someone trying this social experiment for real, and we contend that this is what would actually happen in most cases–because on the whole, men are good:

The folks at Model Pranksters are worth subscribing to. They do all kinds of interesting and funny things, and they've done other videos that, while it may not have been their intent, strongly challenge misandrist cultural prejudices. See 3 Hours Of "Harassment" In NYC and Domestic Abuse In Public! (Social Experiment).

No, they're not MRAs. They aren't anything but pranksters. Often funny ones. But it's interesting how their honest social experiments so frequently wind up challenging bigoted narratives, isn't it?

How “Game” turns you into a joke

January 19, 2025 | by Jalon Cain (aka Aaron Sleazy) | Link | Original Link

---

One of the biggest problems of our gynocentric culture is the constant pampering to the erratic behavior of women. The dating arena is a prime example of this. I won’t ridicule mainstream dating advice. That the “walking wallet” strategy is dubious at best should be common knowledge by now. Instead, I want to attack a particular corner of the Internet that proclaims that they have the solution to the dating problem: the so-called seduction community. A lot of the criticism applies to the “manosphere” as well, though.

What struck me always as absurd was that those alleged seduction gurus didn’t teach men to “man up”. No, not in the “be a real man and marry some washed up chick in her late 30s”, but for real. They just don’t tell you to stand up for yourself. No, instead you are supposed to become an expert on astrology, religion, gossip, and all kinds of frivolous nonsense. This alone should make any reasonably smart man very skeptical. Even if this stuff worked — wouldn’t you want to have an at least halfway intelligent woman instead?

That’s not all, because mainstream seduction gurus also tell you how you should react to her boorish behavior. They call it “shit tests” when she’s acting rude towards you, and tell you to “just keep plowing, bro!” Do you know what any guy with an inkling of self-respect would do? If she’s unfriendly, you just move on, but if she’s rude to you, you can just tell her to go fuck herself. Amazingly, some women are so screwed up that they’ll get turned on by that and start chasing after you.

The women you’re interacting with are supposed to be adults, but if she behaves like a spoiled teenager, you have the choice of either confronting her or trying to change her behavior. Have fun with that! What also works is to not bother with her and looking for a more mature woman instead. By “mature” I don’t mean some woman past 30 who desperately tries to get pregnant or married or both, but a woman with a modicum of mental maturity. Mental maturity doesn’t depend so much on age. There are plenty of shockingly immature 40 year old people — men and women — around.

Let me just dwell on this topic a bit longer. Probably any guy who ever asked a girl out on a date, or asked her whether she wanted to “hang out” will have experienced that some girls just flake on you. No, they don’t cancel. Instead, they just don’t show up. A smart way of dealing with this problem is to schedule your dates so that your loss of time is at an absolute minimum. Let’s say you keep your gym bag in the car, and if she’s ten minutes late, you hop in your car and are on your way.

It is not the case that women are unaware that they flake on you. I guess the “patriarchy” keeps them down so that they can’t pick up their phone and text you, or just say “no” in the first place. What do those ridiculous dating coaches tell you, though? They talk about “contingency plans”. You’re supposed to keep sending her text messages to “build comfort”, and if she flakes on you, you’re supposed to act as if nothing happened or even pretend that you (!) missed the date, and tell her that you’re sorry and would like to meet up some other time.

I mean, whom are those “pickup artists” kidding? Even if you managed to eventually win such a girl over, what kinds of precedents did you set? If anything, the girl now knows that she can walk all over you, and that you’ll happily take her abuse. She knows that you’re a complete fucking idiot who happily gives up his self-respect for the remote chance to get some pussy. As if pussy was the solution to anything! Instead of calling her out on her bullshit, you invite her to abuse you some more, and you even make excuses for her shitty behavior. This is nothing but absurd. Congratulations, you’ve turned yourself into what they call a “mangina.” Yes, this — “game”, they call it — is the supposed alternative to mainstream dating advice. It’s laughable.

The right to be left alone

January 20, 2025 | by Geoffrey James | Link | Original Link

People on the Internet spend a lot of time talking about rights.

Reading some of the more active social media sites can set your head swimming with discussions about women's rights, gay rights, digital rights, privacy rights and whole other host of uses and abuses of the term "rights". Me, I'll settle for being left alone. I don't want to build some kind of masculine utopia. I don't want to see a white picket fence out the front of every house. I don't want to see women have their right to vote taken away or be forced to cover their faces in public – no matter how much feminists scream hysterically about what will become of them should masculinity begin to re-assert itself publicly.

All I want, and I suspect, all most men want, is the right to be left alone.

The book Men On Strike by Dr. Helen Smith talks about how men are walking away from society – dropping out of college, leaving the workforce, and avoiding marriage – due to the lack of incentives to contribute. I believe it's more than that, though. We've been hounded out of every place we used to gather. Young guys have retreated into video games and internet porn, and even there it can be hard to find solace now.

It would be one thing if this departure were met with stony silence, yet still we find hordes of shrieking harpies chasing men down, eager to continue the flogging. For example, the disgusting "Don't Be That Guy" campaign in Edmonton, Canada, which portrays all men as being somehow prone to accidentally-on-purpose slipping their penises into unconscious women is exactly the kind of thing I'm talking about. Not content that men are simply refusing to take on the risk of dating and marriage, Canada's "Battered Women Support Services" has to poster the entire town of Edmonton to remind men wherever they go that they are, in fact, to be considered sexual predators in waiting.

Women, meanwhile, are aghast that their continual temper tantrums aren't having the desired effect of motivating men to stick to their so-called "responsibilities". Women will happily moan and complain about men and their habits, and a media geared towards female consumers feeds their preconceptions voraciously. Then, they'll spend a good portion of their time trying to figure out how to get one of these awful creatures to go on a date with them.

Yet it still doesn't stop. If a man does find himself in a relationship with a woman in America, he'll be constantly critiqued, tested and (looking at the divorce rate) ultimately tossed aside. If he opts not to engage in the dating scene, he'll be constantly harangued about his lack of ability to "commit". Possibly because he can't "handle a strong woman". Of course.

If the nascent Men's Human Rights Movement sets out to achieve only one thing, it should be the right for men, and indeed everyone, simply to be left alone. We desire little more than to remain unmolested by people with fancy-sounding titles and lots of government funding (like the instigators of the squalid “Don’t Be That Guy” campaign) or by other people’s notions of what our obligations to everyone else are.

The absurdity of running somebody out of town only to demand they stand still just outside the town border so you can continue to scream at them, however, makes me want to pick up a bottle of scotch and look for an explanation at the bottom.

——————————————————————————

“Of all tyrannies, a tyranny exercised for the good of its victims may be the most oppressive. It may be better to live under robber barons than under omnipotent moral busybodies. The robber baron’s cruelty may sometimes sleep, his cupidity may at some point be satiated; but those who torment us for our own good will torment us without end, for they do so with the approval of their own conscience.” — C. S. Lewis

Article reprinted from NiceGuy’s Site. The original can be found here.

The Dearth Of Birthing People

January 21, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

There's a population explosion among the ranks of senior citizens in South Korea! The United Nations recently announced that South Korea has joined Japan in the ranks of Super-Aged Nations.

What that means is that more than 20% of the population is 65 or older. Actually, the UN has a three-tier system with 7-14% geezers/gaffers/duffers/codgers qualifying a nation as "aging," 15-20% as "aged," and the aforementioned Super-Aged" at 20%+. And given South Korea's astonishingly low birth rate of less than one child per woman, the UN might have to come up with another category beyond Super-Aged. May I suggest Super-Duper Aged to cover percentages above 25%.

One might think the intelligentsia would be trilling hosannas to the healthy lifestyles and modern medicine and sanitation that prolong life. Unfortunately, given the economic realities of the modern welfare/warfare state, it is not good news. The welfare state is basically a Ponzi scheme. The system depends on adding more and more people paying into it to keep it going. As for the warfare state…well, invading countries and building military bases overseas is expensive, and since there are 193 countries in the world, there is a limit to what even the most imperialistic taxpayer will cough up.

Some countries have attempted financial incentives to encourage larger families but only marginal changes in birth rates have resulted. Perhaps a different approach is warranted. Given the female herd instinct, perhaps we need a PR campaign to make motherhood sexy again. How about recruiting the best and the brightest on Madison Avenue to Market American Motherhood Again, or MAMA.

Consider these slogans:

> A womb is a terrible thing to waste.
>
> Have It Your Way – Natural or Cesarean
>
> Got Milk? (the California Milk Processor Board would likely object)
>
> The Best a Woman Can Get
>
> Betcha can't bear just one
>
> Hav Mor Chillun
>
> The Ultimate Birthing Machine
>
> Think Inside the Bun
>
> Double your birth rate, double your fun

If the PR approach (the carrot) doesn't work, then we must turn to the stick. The question is which stick? Let's start with those least likely to be effective:

1. End the welfare/warfare state. Not going to happen, just thought I'd mention it for the record. Only a rogue politician (come to think of it, that might be a redundancy) who doesn't care about being reelected or reviled would broach it as a possibility.

2. Curtail the welfare/warfare state. Also not going to happen. People like "free" stuff and the Pentagon needs a massive budget to keep up with its penchant for mission creep.
3. Just let the system collapse. This is the most likely result, albeit the most painful. There will be plenty of blame to go around and no shortage of scapegoats. Finger-pointing with your thumb up your ass is a nifty parlor trick, but armies of contortionist politicians and bureaucrats will do just that after a collapse. In the long run no one will go to jail. You can incarcerate individuals but not government bureaus or policies. In truth, many of the architects of flawed and/or failed policies are long dead.

But we have other options, some more realistic than others:

4. Bring back polygamy. Let the alpha males impregnate multiple wives. This would be a tough sell, even for men who could afford to support large numbers of offspring. In the 21st Century, most alphas appear to be satisfied with one respectable wife for reproductive purposes and a frisky young mistress for recreation. Over time such a man may shed one wife and/or mistress for another, but I can't envision harems in the USA, though harem pants might make a comeback.
5. Kill the old people. If you listen to any podcasts by younger content creators, you know there is a lot of anti-Boomer sentiment out there. I think a lot of them would be on board with the mass murder of that demographic. You might recall the 1976 science fiction film Logan's Run, portraying a futuristic society with a compulsory death age of 30. I don't think we need to be that draconian. 70 – the Biblical three score and ten – would be a good place to start. And we're not locked into that figure. If it proves insufficient, we can always ratchet it down. Of course, we're not talking public hangings or firing squads. The euphoric death of Sol (Edward G. Robinson) in Soylent Green, yet another 70s SF movie, is the humane option. If you're one of those anti-death penalty people, then we could limit the oldsters to so many years of Medicare or Social Security. Let's give them, say, five years of each…no, let's be generous…ten years of each. After which, no mandatory deaths, but we leave them unfunded and on their own and let nature take its course. If you're religious, you can wash your hands of the whole thing by acknowledging it's in God's hands.
6. Raise the birth rate. Now this is a tricky proposition. Young folk enjoying a protracted adolescence might approve execution of the aged but they would never approve of compulsory reproduction. Of course, you can't assure reproduction will take place no matter how often you introduce semen into a woman's privates. But you can make it more likely. That would mean a ban on abortion and birth control, which would be perceived as a civil rights violation. Of course, civil rights go on the back burner, sometimes temporarily, sometimes permanently in times of war, and one might argue that low birth rates are as much a threat to the nation as any foreign enemy. Sorry, ladies, but your “my body, my choice” ideology has to go if the nation is to survive. Having said all that, banning abortion and birth control could be even more politically unfeasible than Nos. 1 and 2 above, at least in some states. I suppose a national emergency could be declared and the Constitution could be suspended, but there is a better way. That leads us to Suggestion No. 7.

7. Take suffrage away from women, which would make bans on abortion and birth control more feasible. As with the 18th Amendment (Prohibition), a repeal of the 19th Amendment would require a new amendment, which would require a two-thirds majority in the US House and Senate; even worse, three-fourths of the states would have to ratify it. Of course, politicians dependent on the female electorate for their jobs would never sanction such a thing. Actually, they could get away with it if they timed it right. Ram it through after one election and make it effective with the following election. Voila! Prohibiting women from voting would no longer be a civil rights violation! Oh, women would tear out tufts of purple hair and bare their nipple-ringed breasts at demonstrations. Pro bono shysters would flood the courts with amicus curiae briefs. Female talking heads would crank up their screeching to record decibel levels. All to no avail. Once female disenfranchisement is embedded in the Constitution, turning women away at the polls will no longer be a civil rights violation.

8. Yet even Nos. 6 and 7 are not the most radical proposals. Ironically, all those Handmaid’s Tale women who stage demonstrations wearing those flying nun costumes may have unwittingly hit upon the solution: Dragoon them into bearing children! Of course, it wouldn’t be a lifetime thing. It would operate much like the draft. The younger, more nubile girls would be 1-A. As Dr. Strangelove put it, “the women will have to be selected for their sexual characteristics which will have to be of a highly stimulating nature.” The more mature women would be, say, 1-B, and only called up if there were a shortage of 1-As. The infertile would be 4-F. Above all, no student deferments! As a side benefit, the student loan crisis would slowly deflate. As for conscientious objectors…a woman with a conscience? Are you kidding me?

The fact that there is no easy way out of the birth rate crisis invites the question of how we got into this mess. I have distinct memories of days when reproducing was like voting in big cities: do it early and often. Of course, in those days one could also assume that every young woman was in the market for a husband and family. No normal girl wanted to end up an old maid any more than a card player wanted to be left holding the (old) bag, i.e., the Old Maid card. Also, old maid is a slang term for an unpopped kernel of corn. Now there’s a metaphor to ponder the next time you’re watching a movie and chowing down on a bucket of popcorn.

Better a young maiden than an old maid when it comes to reproduction. After all, doesn’t it make sense to start when girls are at their most fertile and a young man is a boner waiting to happen? Getting a late start on reproducing makes about as much sense as putting off becoming a tennis pro till your mid-30s. The efficiency of the human body deteriorates over time. Physical activities (and intercourse and giving birth certainly qualify) are best attempted when one is full of piss and vinegar, as opposed to laxatives and antidepressants.

That was pretty much a given when the welfare state was just a gleam in Franklin Roosevelt's eye. Consider that when Social Security was enacted in 1935, the birth rate had plummeted to 18.78 per 1,000 people. Also the infant mortality rate was 6%. But the life expectancy for men was 59.9 and 63.9 for women, so with a retirement age of 65, the program was bound to "succeed." Obviously, this setup had more losers than winners, in other words, more people paying in and collecting nothing than people getting something back. The losers finance the winners – just like a casino! But without the free drinks and the cheap buffets.

After 1935, however, the birth rate rose, peaking during the Baby Boom years. Of course, life expectancy was going up also but with all those young people paying into the system, Social Security was still on solid ground. Ah, but then came the birth dearth – the pill, abortion, feminism – to the point where the birth rate in 2024 had declined to 12.009 births per 1,000 people, well below the 1935 total. Meanwhile, the 2024 life expectancy was 76.1 for men and 81.1 for women, far above what it was in 1935. Well, you don't have to be a whiz at math to see that if these trends continue, Social Security, as we know it, has no future. You could probably say the same for Medicare. Does that mean the nation is doomed?

Consider Europe during the first half of the 14th century. Thanks to the Great Famine and the Black Death (the Hundred Years War didn't help any), mortality rates skyrocketed and populations nosedived. Yet life went on for the survivors. France, Spain, England, et al did not cease to exist – but they did not have welfare states to support in those days. It was every man/woman/family for himself/herself/itself. In fact, if you were a survivor, you might have found solace for lost loved ones in the realization that the subsequent labor shortage resulted in higher wages! Basically, the nations of Europe downsized. Europe's women responded to the challenge and after a couple of centuries of giving birth early and often, the population recovered.

Throughout history, fecundity has been a prized feature of womanhood. A barren woman was to be pitied. A woman childless by choice was not exactly shunned but considered suspect. One of those career girls – or worse…you know, the comfortable shoes crew. Today the career girls (girl bosses) and the comfortable shoes crew (choose your favorite slang term) are legion. One might assume the feminists have triumphed, yet they assert there's still a long way to go. One wonders if a birth rate of zero would satisfy the feminist fatales.

There was a time before feminism when all women were birthing machines. This wasn't a result of the patriarchy. It was the sad reality of life expectancy. It was said that if you wanted five children you would have to bear ten. Of course, more mouths to feed are a burden, but that same mouth was attached to a body that could be put to work on the family farm. Having children was the way of the world. As the saying goes, the rich get richer and the poor get children – but even the rich wanted an heir, preferably a son, to carry on the bloodline. Consider the case of Henry VIII, who pioneered the concept of female disposability. Needless to say, it didn't catch on.

As the founder of the Church of England, Henry VIII could not have foreseen that one day a rift in the birth rates according to denominations would occur. When I was a lad, any time one came across a large family, the assumption was they were Catholic. The exception, of course, was Utah, where one would likely conclude that such families were Mormon. Otherwise, white Protestants, the descendants of America's founding stock, backed away from big families. At some point, having more than, say, three children was considered bad form. And this was long before anyone heard of a carbon footprint.

Actually, it was more a class than a religious thing. My grandmother used to say of Catholics, "They're more interested in quantity than quality." I couldn't help but notice that in larger families the head of the house usually had a blue collar job. And his family didn't live in a bigger house – often they lived in smaller quarters. Think of it! One bathroom for all those people! I remember once hearing the sire of such a brood boasting that he'd never once suffered the shock of a cold toilet seat in his home.

The theory behind the superiority of small families is that parents can devote more attention and resources to one or two children than four or five. Hence, those one or two "quality" children will be of greater benefit to society than a flock of poorly parented ruffians. Theoretically, anyway. Given parental limitations of time and resources, the theory seems sound. Let's play the devil's advocate, and in this case, the devil is an unlikely source, a pious fellow named Branch Rickey, who is enshrined in the baseball Hall of Fame.

Branch Rickey is widely known as the front office executive who integrated major league baseball by signing Jackie Robinson to play for the Brooklyn Dodgers in 1947. Actually, Rickey's career entailed much more than that. One of his other achievements was inventing the farm system, an affiliation of a major league team with minor league teams at various levels of competence to serve as a pipeline for players. In doing so, Rickey created a vast network of teams for the St. Luis Cardinals, in some cases having more than one team in a league, leading to accusations of "syndicate baseball," that he was monopolizing young baseball talent to the detriment of other teams. His explanation was also a theory: "Out of quantity comes quality." In other words, the more players you have under contract, the greater the likelihood that big leaguers will result. Extrapolate that to a society, and you could make the argument that the higher the birth rate – in other words, the more you roll the genetic dice – the better your chances of producing all sorts of individuals of various aptitudes. In a rigid caste system, this probably wouldn't make much difference, as the more talented individuals would be thwarted from rising in the ranks. But in a more mobile society it would be a good thing.

This is not to say the "quantity" theory is not without its drawbacks. For one thing, there would be more people born on the dumbbell side of the bell curve, and no society needs that. But the “quality” argument is hardly above reproach.

In generations past, an only child was often pitied. It was not a desirable status. Supposedly, the child would grow up lonely without siblings. For sure, one’s ability to play well with others may be a function of having brothers and sisters. Yet with today’s lower birth rates, the only-child syndrome is more common than ever. Middle-aged people who lament the lack of grandchildren might want to ponder the role they played in their plight. If they limited their family to one or two kids, their chances of having grandchildren are now slim to dubious.

The only-child stigma today is much less because one-and-done motherhood has become so popular. Supposedly, with all of the family’s attention and finances fixated on an only child, a high-quality child and eventually adult should be assured. On the other hand, have you noticed that we hear more and more people described as narcissists today? Maybe the inevitable effect of being an only child?

It is amusing to listen to podcast pundits enumerate the reasons for collapsing birth rates. Typically, they mention feminism, but never fail to pledge their fealty to women’s rights and equality. It’s the land whale in the room. It’s like the old saw, “I’m not a racist, but…” or “I’m not a prude but…” You know the drill. Often mentioned is the fact that the countries in the world with the highest birth rates are also deficient in human rights. I mean, we could take away women’s rights and increase the birth rate…but what would the neighbors think? What neighbors? You know, all those other countries going down the tubes even faster than the USA.

But there’s no use touting the benefits of a large family in a world where human beings are demonized as destroyers of the planet. In some deep green circles birth control is not just an option but a commandment. In truth, if given a choice of living in a world with more trees and fewer people, I’d opt for…well, I’d have to give it some thought.

Of course, all of the above may be moot if there is a breakthrough in artificial wombs and ectogenesis becomes the norm. Childless women will be neither an object of pity nor an object of veneration. They will still be unhappy, however – I mean, aside from the fact that they will never have to fret over stretch marks again.

What is Gender Equality? It’s not about treating men and women the same

January 23, 2025 | by Tony Farr | Link | Original Link

At 16:53 on 12 January 2010, a severe (magnitude 7.0) earthquake struck Haiti. The centre was just 25 km from the capital, Port-au-Prince. Three million people – a third of the country’s population – were affected. The area around Port-au-Prince was devastated.

Roads were blocked, communications and electric power were down so that little food could be distributed in the first two weeks. By the end of the month things were desperate, help was essential and much hope was placed in the UN’s World Food Program (WFP).

The executive director of the WFP was Josette Sheeran – a committed feminist. Soon after starting at WFP, she issued a new policy on Gender Equality that mandated “focusing on women”. In Haiti, she put that policy into practice, announcing “It is our methodology to distribute only to women to ensure that food gets to women and children in Haiti.” This was only half true – in fact the WFP did nothing specific to ensure food got to children.

After the fact, the WFP claimed they had hoped that food might trickle down to children and men – but there’s no evidence that was a consideration in the decision making. And it’s clear that no thought was given to widowers, gay or single men many of whom had lost mothers and sisters. In desperation, gay men dressed as women to try to obtain food, some just ending up with a beating from guards. In the end, many vulnerable people were left to fend for themselves amid the devastation.

The WFP actions received only brief press attention (1, 2, 3, 4). Total deaths in Haiti were in the region of 200,000. The number of deaths among children and men caused by the WFP is unknown.

The WFP’s actions were inhumane. At a perilous time, they deliberately withheld food from men in contravention of humanitarian standards. Yet, strikingly, they saw their actions as consistent with the principles of Gender Equality. This raises a fundamental question: what does Gender Equality actually mean if it can justify such outcomes? What kind of ‘equality’ leaves so many excluded, desperate, and invisible?

I’ve followed gender politics for over a quarter century now. In that time I’ve consistently encountered the assertion that feminism is synonymous with Gender Equality. (1, 2, 3, 4, 5) So, if we can understand Gender Equality then it should help us understand feminism as well as the events in Haiti. Unfortunately, that’s easier said than done because there’s no consensus definition – surprising given that Gender Equality is so central to feminism.

Some definitions explicitly state that Gender Equality means not treating people equally (e.g. 1, 2) while others conflict with typical Gender Equality initiatives. Overall, the definitions don’t just vary, they contradict each other. We must seek clarity elsewhere.

Better, perhaps, to look at how Gender Equality is measured – there's nothing so good at dispelling ambiguity as numbers.

Luckily, there is an accepted numeric measure of Gender Equality – the World Economic Forum's Global Gender Gap. There are similar measures from the UN, OECD and EU but the Global Gender Gap is most prominent. Only it is greeted with such rapture when Australia rises in the league table and such gloom when it falls.

The Global Gender Gap Index is calculated as a weighted average of 14 statistics that deal with familiar feminist issues – female labour force participation, proportion of female professional and technical workers and proportion of female heads of state over the last 50 years. Variables that might reveal the other side of the ledger are excluded – family law outcomes, suicides, workplace deaths and injuries, sentencing disparities etc. This index was designed to show women falling short of Gender Equality.

The detailed calculation used for these 14 variables is, surprisingly, interesting. (Really!)

Let's look at the treatment of life expectancy and, particularly the results for Norway. Norway ranks second overall in the Global Gender Gap but its score has been reduced because of a poor performance on life expectancy. This is surprising given that Norwegian females enjoy a long life expectancy – in the top 10% globally and better than most other European countries. Nevertheless, the World Economic Forum (WEF) ranks Norway near the bottom – 126th for life span and 127th in the overall Health & Survival category out of a total of 146 countries. Surprisingly, Lesotho ranks equal 1st despite women dying more than 25 years earlier than Norwegian women.

Country	Female healthy life span	Ranking (1=best)
Norway	71.6 years	126
Lesotho	46.4 years	1

Note: The WEF doesn't use the normal life expectancy measure, but one that includes only the healthy part of one's life.
This has the effect of reducing the apparent disparity between women and men. Life Span data Norway's problem is that men live too long – not as long as women, but only 1% less. Whereas Lesotho gets a top rank because men's healthy life span is only 42 years so that they die 9% earlier than women. In the jargon used in the report, Lesotho has "exceeded the parity benchmark". Another country to share top honours with Lesotho is Ukraine where Russian tanks have helped the Ukraine to also exceed the parity benchmark.

This concern that the early death of men should be scored as a good thing has been raised before, but the WEF remains steadfast. Apparently, they believe that Norwegian women would be better off dying 25 years earlier if only the men in their life died 29 years earlier.

Other indicators are assessed in a similar way. For example, if fewer Australian boys were allowed into high school, this would improve Australia's score. And if boys were totally excluded this would yield a perfect score. Feminism is often criticised for zero sum thinking and this index strongly supports that criticism.

There are some other notable aspects of the Index that give further clues to the nature of Gender Equality:

- The index is designed to ignore disparities that work against men – first, by excluding statistics likely to reveal male disadvantage and then, as a failsafe, to score male disadvantage as perfect "equality". This ensures that only women can be seen to suffer inequality.
- The index only considers women as a group. Individuals are invisible and irrelevant.
- Related to the above, the index looks only at outcomes, not opportunities. Hence it ignores the question of whether people are treated equally.
- Underlying it is an assumption that society can be broken down into two competing groups based on a single axis – gender.

The key takeaway is that the Global Gender Gap Index doesn't deal with equality at all – it measures, and even celebrates, discrimination against men. It is about rigging the scoreboard, not levelling the playing field.

So, what does it look like when proponents "do" Gender Equality?

If we look at organisations working for Gender Equality (e.g. here and here) we see that most of them include "women" in their name. Men, boys and even people don't figure in their names.

If we look at broad objectives, for example of the Gates Foundation, we read that to improve Gender Equality they will "advance women's …", "increase women's …", "improve and protect women's …". There's much talk of women's health but no mention of men though it is men who die earlier.

The UN's targets for Gender equality start:

> 5.1 End all forms of discrimination against all women and girls everywhere
>
> 5.2 Eliminate all forms of violence against all women and girls in the public and private spheres, including trafficking and sexual and other types of exploitation…

There is no mention of men or boys as receiving Gender Equality. Nor is there any concern that men are much more likely to be victims of violence than women.

And the story is the same if we look at specific feminist initiatives:

- Reserving highly sought-after jobs for women only and justifying this as Gender Equality.
- Covertly excluding men from management roles in the name of Gender Equality.
- Free walk-in medical clinics that exclude boys and men despite women's life expectancy being more than four years greater than men's.
- Systematic discrimination against men by prosecutors and Police.
- In the midst of a housing crisis, subsidised housing that excludes men regardless of need.

- Large amounts of Government grants that are reserved for women alone.
- Free legal services reserved for women despite systemic discrimination against men in family and criminal law.

Perhaps it's no surprise to learn that Gender Equality is "for women" not men. The result is the same as we saw in the previous section – Gender Equality is about privileging the in-group and discriminating against the out group. Definitions of true equality vary but we can all agree that, unlike Gender Equality, it is not reserved for only one group.

My view of equality is a traditional one – it means treating everyone alike regardless of their group, exactly as Martin Luther King said. Gender Equality seems to be the diametric opposite. How can it possibly be reconciled with any reasonable interpretation of equality? What do feminists say on the subject?

Today, some feminists would explicitly abandon equality as a feminist objective – for example a recent book entitled Breaking Free: The Lie of Equality and the Feminist Fight for Freedom which the jacket describes as:

> A bold argument that "equality" is a racist, patriarchal ideal that perpetuates women's systemic oppression and limits the possibilities of feminism

Feminist academic Iris Marion Young has gone further and, in Justice and the Politics of Difference, argues that feminists should openly admit to discrimination:

> Supporters of affirmative action policies would be less on the defensive, I suggest, if they positively acknowledged that these policies discriminate, instead of trying to argue that they are an extension of or compatible with a principle of nondiscrimination.

And, at least in Australia, media statements like this have become unremarkable:

> overall societal equality is in fact improved by discriminating against some groups

Feminists are increasingly admitting to discrimination. But, for many, outright opposing equality would create too much cognitive dissonance and too much potential criticism. Instead, they pursue discriminatory policies but label them "Gender Equality."

Most of us support equality between the sexes. Sadly though, when feminists use the term Gender Equality, that's not at all what they are talking about. We've seen that when feminists measure Gender Equality, they actually measure male disadvantage. When feminists create organisations and programs for Gender Equality, they deliver privilege for women and discrimination against males. And, increasingly, when feminists talk about Gender Equality, they concede their objective is discrimination not equality.

If you doubt this, examine feminist programs and policies for yourself. Can you think of an example of feminists seeking equal treatment of men and women? Neither can I and I have followed gender politics for decades. Rather, in every feminist initiative I have seen, they oppose it. The contrast between Gender Equality's lofty rhetoric and its sordid reality is glaring.

In truth, Gender Equality means talking equality while doing discrimination.

This essay is drawn from my series on Substack: Critiquing Feminism. My next three essays will also deal with topics related to feminism, equality and discrimination. Future essays will address the drivers of feminism, feminism's relationship with the left, and its tension with Enlightenment values. Please consider subscribing.

How Woke Warriors Destroyed Anthropology – Elizabeth Weiss

January 25, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Elizabeth Weiss is doing great work raising awareness of how woke has enveloped anthropology, palaeontology and archaeology.

The featured image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons (CC-BY-SA 4.0) and is a rare example of bones actually still being displayed. –Ed

Arthur Phillip – a man who founded a nation

January 26, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Today is January 26 in Australia. In 1788 the First Fleet arrived in Botany Bay, establishing the first permanent European settlement on the continent of Australia. At the time it was generally called New Holland by Europeans as the western portion of the continent had been explored by the Dutch more than a century earlier. There might have even been earlier explorers. There are unsubstantiated claims of very early Portuguese exploration. Some even claim early Chinese mariners landed on the shores of Australia. The discovery in the 1940s of ancient African and more recently of a Chinese coin remain unexplained. It's possible they were left there by the Macassan people from Indonesia who were known to trade with Aborigines in Northern Australia, or perhaps they speak of more ancient contact. What we can say is that of all the groups that may have found Australia after the arrival of the Aborigines, only the British established a permanent presence.

James Cook embarked on three great journeys of discovery in the Pacific. The first of these, aboard HMS Endeavour, was ostensibly to establish an observatory on Tahiti in order to observe the transit of Venus in 1769 in which the planet Venus made a rare transit of the Sun. European Astronomers had determined that if they could gather sufficient data of this event they could accurately calculate the distance to the Sun. In an early example of international scientific co-operation, the great powers of Europe sent out missions all around the world to give the scientists as much data as they could.

The Admiralty were not ones to miss an opportunity. Cook turned to the secret orders he had been given, not to be opened until after the Endeavour left Britain. Cook was to search the Southern Hemisphere for a great continent known to Europeans as Terra Australia Incognita. Since Roman times Europeans had believed that a Eurasia sized continent must lay in the Southern Hemisphere to balance the world. Cook thoroughly explored the region and accurately charted the east coast of New Holland, along with other accomplishments. He established definitively that no equivalent of Eurasia existed in the Southern Hemisphere. In 1770 Cook did, however, claim the eastern portion of New Holland and called it New South Wales.

Britain had been sending its convicts to the Americas for decades when the start of the American War of Independence disrupted this practice. After American independence the British were, for a while, at a loss as to what to do with the prisoners it had formerly been shipping off to its American colonies. For a while they were housed in old ships, called hulks, along the Thames but this could only be a temporary solution.

Sir Joseph Banks, who had been with Cook in 1770, and others were pushing for the establishment of a British colony in New South Wales for strategic reasons. The need for a permanent solution to the convict problem in Britain gave them the opportunity they needed.

And so it was that in 1787 the First Fleet set sail for Australia under the command of Commodore Arthur Phillip. Phillip was an experienced naval officer and he had been given the task of assembling the fleet, obtaining all the provisions for an extended sea voyage for 1420 people as well as everything needed to establish the new colony, which he would then govern.

All eleven ships successfully arrived in New South Wales after a voyage of 24000 km (15000 miles) by way of Rio De Janeiro and Cape Town. It is a testament to the fine leadership that Phillip provided that only 69 people died, discharged, or deserted during the voyage with other later fleets travelling to Australia suffering far higher attrition rates.

Phillip was instructed to settle at a location suggested by Cook 18 years earlier, Botany Bay, but found it unsuitable. Phillip personally led a small contingent north to examine the nearby Port Jackson, where he established the new colony. Commodore Phillip later reported to the Admiralty "…we had the satisfaction of finding the finest harbour in the world, in which a thousand sail of the line may ride in the most perfect security…". Under Phillip's good leadership the new colony had been founded on one of the world's great harbours.

Arthur Phillip realised from the outset that the new colony would become a community, with many of the convicts unable to return to Britain even after their sentences were served. He also declared that slavery would be illegal in the new colony, decades before it would be made illegal Empire-wide. Phillip required the colonists to treat Aborigines respectfully. Any colonists that abused the local Aboriginal population were harshly punished. When he was speared by a local Aborigine he believed this had been a result of a misunderstanding and ordered his men to not retaliate.

The early years of the colony were difficult. With few farmers among the settlers, poor soils and weather patterns very different from their home food rationing had to be imposed. In 1790 one of the original ships from the First Fleet, HMS Supply, was sent to Batavia (modern-day Jakarta, Indonesia) for food. Later ships were sent to Capt Town and Calcutta for further supplies. Arthur Phillip successfully led the nascent colony through these difficult times.

Phillip resigned as governor and returned to Britain as his health began to fail. By the end of his tenure as governor in 1792, the colony's food supply had stabilised, freed convicts were establishing land claims, and the foundations of the nation that would become Australia had been laid. Relations with the Aboriginal population were largely peaceful, but unfortunately, that wouldn't last.

After returning to Britain Phillip's health recovered and he returned to having various sea commands, including during wartime. He was eventually promoted to the rank of admiral before retiring. Arthur Phillip continued to champion the new colony in England to the end of his life.

Eventually, five additional colonies split off from the original colony of New South Wales. In 1901 all six of these colonies joined together to create the Commonwealth of Australia. The modern nation-state of Australia can trace its origins directly from the moment that Arthur Phillip stepped ashore and proclaimed the establishment of the new colony 231 years ago.

Today Australia has one of the highest standards of living in the world and has been in the top ten nations on the Human Development Index for many years. Australia is also a nation beset by feminist dogma and political correctness which are gradually eroding the character that has made this nation great. Australia's founding fathers, Arthur Phillip among them, would no doubt be appalled that the country that started life as a penal colony and went on to become a great nation would be going down this road.

Only time will tell if we can change course and make Australia great again.

The feminist war on fun and human nature

January 29, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Feminists are at war with fun (particularly anything that's fun for men) and with human nature itself, says our own Lucian Vâlsan. And he's not exaggerating – he comes up with mainstream feminist examples to back up his allegations. Definitely worth a watch.

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative, here.

The Goal Post Episode 52 – When Rob Accidentally Read Romance

February 4, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

ANNOUNCEMENT: International Conferences on Men's Issues (ICMIs)

February 6, 2025 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

The first ICMI was hosted in 2014 near Detroit. It was organised and hosted by Paul Elam of A Voice for Men (AVfM). A few years ago he passed ownership of AVfM to Robert Brockway, an Australian MRA. The event was very successful, and so the series of ICMIs was born. Later successful events were held in London (2), Gold Coast (Australia), Chicago, Pune (India) and online.

There are more than 300 videos of the speeches and related materials in playlists on the Justice for Men & Boys YouTube channel, Paul Elam's playlists and AVfM playlists.

There has never been a conference series to compare with ICMIs. They have raised the consciousness and understanding of countless men and women globally with respect to men's and boys' issues since 2014. Three of the organisers – Paul Elam, Rob Brockway and myself – recently decided to retire from organising future ICMIs. We should like to warmly thank all the people who made the ICMI series such a success over the years. The ICMIs planned for this year (Australia) and next year (United States) will not take place unless new organisers are found.

ICMI is too important and well-known a brand to simply cease to exist, or be exploited by those without the wellbeing of men and boys as their prime concern. And so it is that we're very pleased to announce that with immediate effect, the highly-regarded MRA Anil Kumar – founder and leader of Save Indian Family Foundation – becomes the sole custodian of the ICMI brand. He brings many strengths and qualities to the role, and we wish him every success.

It follows that Anil alone can authorise people to organise and host future ICMIs. Anyone with a potential interest in organising future ICMIs, or contributing to them in any way, should contact Anil, his details:

Email: newageindian@gmail.com

Phone / WhatsApp: +91 984 514 3724

Telegram: @anilkl

X / Twitter: @RealSIFF

His office manager is Gowri Shankar:

Email: krishna.gs.india.siff@gmail.com

Phone / WhatsApp: +91 6362 000 498

CNN: Women are better doctors

February 10, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

… but are they?

Lucian Vâlsan argues that that's hardly the case and the evidence is nowhere near as convincing as the press would make it.

And no, the fact that it comes from a "Harvard researcher" isn't particularly impressive in and of itself at all.

A thorough rebuttal of the latest Harvard "study" on the matter:

You can subscribe to Lucian's Freedom Alternative here.

Eating While MGTOW: Caldera beans and jalapeno cheese cornbread

February 12, 2025 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

Nothing is better after a delicious, filling meal than a good stogie, a snifter of brandy and flatulence. I can't help you with the smoke and the drink but when it comes to post-victual methane production, I'm your huckleberry.

So switch on your printers, gents, because after the first time you eat this eruptive combination, you are going to want to come back over and over again. And besides, you're MGTOW. You either don't have a woman there or even if you do you are the kind of campfire king that doesn't mind just letting her deal with it.

First, the beans.

Get those beans going because they are going to cook long and slow. You can do this in a large pot on the stove if you want. I prefer a slow cooker because I like equipment that frees you up to more or less ignore it. Here are the ingredients:

One pound of rinsed pinto beans (look for small rocks as they add nothing to the flavor and are bad for your teeth).

One yellow onion, (trigger warning) skinned and quartered.

However many crushed cloves of garlic float your boat.

A big ol' ham hock (smoked turkey neck is a sure winner, too).

One poblano pepper, destemmed, seeded and hacked into chunks.

One tablespoon chili powder.

One tablespoon ground cumin.

Salt to taste.

Extras

One white (Spanish) onion. Cold!

Some chopped cilantro.

Now, put your little gas makers in a big bowl and cover them with water plus 2-3 inches. Let sit in the fridge overnight. Drain the water and toss them in a big ass pot or slow cooker. Cover with fresh water liberally. Give at least 3-4 inches of water above the beans.

Add everything except the cilantro and white onion.

Put the pot on a stove and light a high fire under its ass until it boils like a feminist in finishing school.

Lower heat to simmer, cover and cook for 3-4 hours. Cook and stir occasionally for the last 30 minutes to reduce.

Or, if using a slow cooker, just dump the ingredients in, turn it on low and walk away.

You will want to come back and stir from time to time, and taste, as you might want to adjust seasoning. In your stove pot be sure to stir from the bottom so you don't burn your beanies.

Now for a little cornbread magic.

A good bowl of beans just fine all by itself, but when you drown a big old hunk of fresh out of the oven cornbread in them, they go to a whole new level. Here is the recipe for that. TRIGGER WARNING: unless you like fat and fat shaming, this is not for you. But if you don't care about all that crap and just want a damn good meal (several actually) on the absolute cheap, then get ready to get serious about getting full.

Jalapeno Cheese Cornbread

Rub the bottom and sides of a 9 x 13 backing pan with butter till it is greasier than a Chicago politician.

3 cups all-purpose flour

1 cup yellow cornmeal

1/4 cup sugar

2 tablespoons baking powder

2 teaspoons salt

2 cups of obnoxious full fat milk

3 big ol' eggs, whoop up on 'em a little but don't overbeat them.

2 sticks of unsalted butter, melted.

Tip: Melting butter is one of the very few reasons for a microwave to even exist. But if you go that way be sure to cover the container you use. Butter has pockets of water in it and they tend to expand much faster than fat when heated quickly. The sticks can pop like a feminist brain engaging a fact, splattering useful butter on the inside walls of that otherwise useless contraption.

8 ounces of shredded Monterrey Jack or other cheese of your choice, though I don't recommend anything too sharp for this recipe. Set about an ounce of it aside.

4 chopped scallions, white and green parts for the batter.

1 chopped scallion, white and green parts for the garnish.

1 or 2 fresh, large jalapeno pepper(s), destemmed, seeded and finely chopped, depending on how much you want to bring the pain. If you leave them out altogether, turn everything off, make yourself a mayonnaise sammich and put Mary Poppins in the DVD player. You're done.

Just kidding. Real men eat whatever they want.

Now, put all your dry ingredients into a large bowl and mix 'em up. Then put all your wet ingredients into another bowl and mix them up. Again, flour, cornmeal, sugar, baking powder and salt in one bowl. Milk, eggs and butter into another. Use a soft whisk to stir the wet ingredients into the dry ingredients till most of the lumps are dissolved.

DO NOT OVERMIX.

At this point if all the kitchen violence is getting to you, take a short break. If not, push on to the finish line.

Gently fold in about 2 cups of the Monterrey Jack, 3 scallions and the jalapenos. Fold until completely mixed in, then STOP. Cover the top of the bowl and let it set for about a half hour at room temperature.

This is a good time to preheat your oven to 350 degrees.

Pour your batter into the greasy pan, even out the top and sprinkle it evenly with remaining cheese and scallions, then and shove it into the oven. Shut the door on it like it was chivalry.

Let it cook for about 30-35 minutes.

Tip: You can check cornbread for doneness with a toothpick. Stab the cornbread in the middle with it as far down as it will go. Pull it back out. If it is wet, put it back in the oven till the toothpick comes back dry enough to remind you of your ex.

When done, set on counter to cool.

This is a good time to peel your white onion and slice it into rings as well as chop your cilantro, about a tablespoon of it.

The rest is a matter of style. Some people like their bowl of beans with the cornbread on the side. Others like their cornbread on a plate or in a bowl smothered in beans. However you take it, sprinkle the fresh chopped cilantro on your beans when served. Serve the cold raw onion rings on the side.

Some people might complain this recipe could be what is known down here as borracho beans if you just add a bottle of beer to the water. Trust me, just drink the beer with your dinner.

Now, sit back and stuff yourself. Wait 15 minutes. Fart.

Repeat as necessary.

Other recipies from Eating While MGTOW:

- Boom boom chicken
- Chicken Valenti cassolette
- Hug box feminist vegetables
- Stuffed chauvinist pig
- Buck buck chicken
- Look at the flowers! Stoup
- Gender binary gelatin dessert
- Spicy civil breakdown chicken

The Goal Post Episode 53 – DEI & 4B…Don’t Pretend It Didn’t Happen

February 16, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Suffrage – a short history

February 18, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Suffrage, or the right to vote, is an important right in any democracy. Societies routinely exclude some sectors of the community from voting and this is entirely consistent with international norms. Normally voting in a democracy is open to citizens that have reached the age of majority. In many countries today that is 18 years. The rules vary by country, and even subnational jurisdiction. Voting is generally restricted to citizens but even they may be excluded from voting if they have resided outside of the country for an extended period, if they have been convicted of or incarcerated for serious offences, or for other reasons. Prohibiting individuals from voting in this manner is considered to be consistent with international standards today. This is generally called universal suffrage even though segments of the community are excluded from voting.

What is not considered acceptable by democracies today is to exclude someone from voting on the basis of gender. It is widely believed today that women were disenfranchised from voting until recently. This is true, but what is often not stated in this narrative is that the same was true for most or all men. A survey in 1780 in the UK, for example, revealed that only 3% of the population were entitled to vote.

Britain had no less than three acts of parliament during the 19th century that enfranchised a growing proportion of men – and yet a significant proportion of the male population remained unable to vote. The right to vote in the UK, as in most nations, was initially based on land ownership. This often meant that landowning women could vote but men without land could not. There is documentary evidence that British women who owned land were voting as early as 1843 – decades before most men obtained the the right to vote.

Many men were still disenfranchised when conscription was enacted in the UK in 1916 as the number of volunteers prepared to fight in World War I waned. Many of these men drafted and forced to war against their will were unable to vote. During 1918, the year the war ended, the UK finally granted the franchise to men. At the same time many women over 30 were permitted to vote. Had women received universal suffrage in 1918 along with men they would have constituted a majority of voters, due to the significant number of men killed during World War I. Women were finally fully enfranchised in 1928, only 10 years after men. In the UK we see a pattern repeated around the world. The franchise was held by a small group of people which grew over time. Common men and women in the UK had little political power until the 18th century.

A different situation existed in the United States. The Nineteenth Amendment of the US Constitution made it illegal to deny a US citizen the right to vote on the basis of their gender. Feminists will often claim that universal male suffrage was achieved in the US in 1856 and universal female suffrage in 1920. The reality though is that many citizens, men and women alike, were still being denied the vote. US states have significant latitude in establishing voter eligibility. This was used in some states to disenfranchise black and poor white Americans. Universal suffrage in the United States was only achieved following the civil rights movement of the 20th century. As a result American men and women effectively achieved universal suffrage at the same time rather than decades apart as feminists will often claim.

The situation in Australia was similar to the US. Men started to receive the franchise in the 1850s. This allowed them to vote for colonial parliaments. Women in Australia started receiving the franchise in the 1890s. Interestingly any Maori who happened to be living in Australia were entitled to vote decades before indigenous Australians were.

While much is made of the enfranchisement of women in many nations, such as the US and Australia, men of colour were usually enfranchised long after white women. The emphasis on gender as a primary determiner of voting rights is misleading and deflects attention from more important aspects.

Today it is common for gender to be over-emphasised as a defining characteristic. Culture, ethnicity, social class at birth, and many other characteristics are better determiners of the life a person will have than is gender. Historically most men and women were disenfranchised. Power rested with the ruling class, men and women alike. While it was generally true that men were more likely to wield hard power (and women soft power) even this was not universally true, and from time to time a powerful female ruler arose.

Feminists so often put the focus of enfranchisement on voting rights for women as if this was an event that occurred in a vacuum. The enfranchisement of women is in fact only a part of a greater story. Over a period of centuries, the body of electors grew. Impediments to enfranchisement included gender, property, age, and education. This process is in fact ongoing with increasing moves to enfranchise resident non-citizens and to further reduce the voting age in some nations. The enfranchisement of women was just one step among many, and not one that was easily separated from the enfranchisement of men in many nations.

The next time someone tells you how long women have had the vote in their nation, ask them how long men have had the vote. They probably won't know.

The cover image is depicts a ballot for the Labor party in Israel and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and by ניר ודל – Own work, CC BY-SA 4.0, Link

A 12th-century tale of paternity fraud

February 21, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

In the twelfth-century French tale Richeut, the title character Richeut is a mistress of harlotry. Frustrated with her insufficient earnings from whoring, Richeut plots to get pregnant to extract more money from men. She drinks mandrake and hellebore and has sex with many men. She succeeds in getting pregnant.

Richeut then goes to one of her lovers, a priest. She cries, sighs, and complains. The priest comforts her:

> The gentleman {priest} puts his arms around her neck and kisses her softly. Richeut squirms out of his embrace, bursts into a torrent of tears, and speaks her threat: "Whether I tell you or I keep silent about it, I'm pregnant because of you." [1]

Men, who have very limited contraceptive options and no reproductive rights, dread unwanted claims of unplanned parenthood. Unplanned parenthood and state-imposed sex payments (called "child support") can destroy a man's life.

Men lack women's natural, true knowledge of who are their biological children. While the priest had sex with Richeut, neither he nor she knows which man contributed to the pregnancy. The priest says to Richeut:

> Richeut, I don't believe you; do you really believe it's mine? Certainly not.

She responds:

> I know full well that it is; may I lose everything, may I fall silent and be put to death, if I didn't solemnly swear that you put into me that thing which made me fat and pregnant. Don't think I'll dump it in some ditch or in a monastery, if you refuse to help me.

Rather than arising merely from the skill of particular, deceiving women, paternity fraud is now institutionalized in government and hospital procedures for establishing paternity. The priest foolishly acquiesces to Richeut's paternity claim:

> By my faith, Richeut, I promise you that if you desire anything of mine, I shall keep nothing that you might not have for yourself. Why would you blackmail me, or have the bishop bar me from saying Mass? Now, hide this pregnancy for as long as you can, and when the child is born, blame it on someone else. So help me God, I shall not fail you in this, not one jot.

Richeut then cries a little and tells the priest that she loves him. He then gives her money and goods and promises her more.

Richeut repeats her paternity fraud with the knight Lord Geezer. She aggressively confronts him:

> I am seething with anger when I see you. You pledged your faith to me and you lied. Any woman who puts her arms around you must be out of her mind. There's no one as stingy as you from here to Lincoln. What did I get from you once I gave you pleasure, the other day (alas!) in bed? A curse brought me to lie down flat under you! A pox on your root that shoots off and dries up! I was a young girl then, and now no one cares to love me. You have knocked me up, and I do not care to hide it. I'm angry with you! Look at my belly swelling up! It won't be long until I have a child. You've got to help me. So help me God, if you deny it's yours, it will be your ruin! I say it in earnest. No matter how fortified, all your castles shall be burned and reduced to ashes unless you acknowledge your offspring. I'll sooner burn or hang myself — I tell you no lie — than let you go free. I come from a good family! I have seven knights among my relatives. And I have friends that would slay their man in no time.

The knight foolishly accepts Richeut's claim that he caused her pregnancy. He gives her money and a kiss, and promises to send her meat, vegetables, and fine wine.

Richeut also repeats her paternity fraud with a townsman who didn't have a heir. He thinks he is biologically unable to have children. Richeut goes to him and asks to have a private conversation:

> They go into the room together and sit down on a bed. Sitting there, Richeut looks pensive, then says, "Sir, I came her because I was pushed by a desperate need. I'll be honest with you. I have a complaint to make, and you yourself are the cause. For the time is not long when I shall enter into labor. Sir, I'm incensed at you because you made me pregnant!"

At first the townsman, who thought himself to be sterile, stands up to Richeut:

> "I? You must be joking!"
> "This is no joke, sir, by Saint Thomas!"
> "Without doubt, Richeut, you told a lie."
> She cries and whines, and holds her hand to her face: "Sir, don't you recall the entire day that you played hanky-panky with me upstairs?"
> "Yes, Richeut, that much I know."
> "Without a doubt, dear sir, that is where I got this burden."
> "Shut up, Richeut, don't ever say it!"
> "May God confound me if I keep silent about it!"

The townsman's fantasy of having a male heir prevailed over his reason:

> "Richeut, I don't know — I may well be the father. Let him be mine. If it's a boy, without fault, he'll inherit everything I own."

He gives Richeut much money and arranges to have her sent meat, wine, and bread.

Richeut herself benefits greatly from money she extracts for "child support." From pregnancy to long after the birth of her son Sampson, Richeut enjoys child support in the form of "meat, wine and claret, pepper sauce, fruit, cakes, pastries, and apples." Because she cannot bear Sampson's wailing, she hires another woman (a wet-nurse) to breast-feed him. Her lavish child-support income prompts her to raise her price as a whore. It also makes her an attractive marriage prospect for men seeking to avoid the burden of having to earn money for their family.

Richeut's child-support fraud devastates the men of the three estates. Richeut flatters the knight with tales of his manly and fearless son Sampson, who, she says, is just like him. She tells the trade-oriented townsman that Sampson "counts like an angel." She tells the priest that Sampson loves learning (priests were the leading scholars in the Middle Ages). Socially vulnerable and proud false fathers, the men of the three estates give all they have to Richeut for child support:

> Richeut has blackmailed the priest so much that he now has only a grayish coat on his shoulders. And he's wearing nothing under the wool! As for the townsman, she's after his banking business. And she has threatened, flattered, and begged the knight so much that he has pledged her everything, both land and fief.

Just as child support today isn't required to be spent supporting children and in fact supports mainly interested adults, "Richeut takes and spends lavishly on herself — for the boy {her child Sampson} doesn't spend money!" Her three lovers as a result live in poverty.

Richeut's son Sampson grows up to be sexually voracious and highly skilled in seduction. Because the priest, the knight, and the townsman are languishing in poverty and despair, Sampson rejects them.[2] Richeut raises her son herself. She teaches him Ovid's love lessons. She teaches him additional lessons on flirting and techniques for sexual intercourse. Sampson is a good student. He masters the "summa of lechery." In travels spanning from Ireland to India, Sampson has sex with thousands of women. The only person more skilled than he in sexual seduction is his mother.[3]

The story of Richeut has considerable gender symmetry. Richeut exploits and abuses men and women alike. Her son treats women much the same way that she treats men. The priest, the knight, and the townsman stand for the three estates of medieval society. Richeut demonstrates the three estates' stupidity locally. Sampson demonstrates the three estates' stupidity internationally.[4]

Richeut provides potent satire of paternity establishment and child support in today's high-income democracies. The outrageous deceptions that Richeut perpetrates are now institutionalized in laws and policies. Stories like Richeut are now summarily rejected from broad public discourse. They are labeled "offensive" and "anti-feminist" because they challenge deeply entrenched injustices against men.

Notes:

[1] Richeut l. 170-5, from Old French trans. Haddad (1991) p. 8. All subsequent quotes above are from id. Since Richeut is relatively short and the quotes follow the order of the text, further specific line numbers and pages are omitted. For an alternate English translation and the French text, Ker (1976). The French text of Lecompte (1913) is freely available online. The current best French text of Richeut is Vernay (1988). Richeut is thought to date from the last third of the twelfth century. Arlima offers a comprehensive bibliography for Richeut.

In its brutal satire and depiction of low duplicity, Richeut is thematically related to Trubert and Le Roman de Renard. Richeut has a woman servant / friend named Hersant. Richeut and Hersant are the names of the wives of the fox and the wolf, respectively, in Le Roman de Renard. Disparagement of prostitution in Richeut associates it with the sayings of Marcolf in Solomon and Marcolf.

[2] Sampson asks his mother who his father is:

> Tell me now, mother dear, which one of these three is my father?

Richeut responds:

> Dear son, I don't know. I have mated with each of the three, and with a thousand others. I am not ashamed to tell you. How can a woman that's been mounted by this kind of population be expected to keep count of her children? One doesn't know from whom she conceives nor when. Just go to the richest of the three. Take your pick.

Sampson responds, "Mother, I don't want any of them."

[3] On the relationship of Richeut and Sampson, Adkins (2003).

[4] In medieval estates satire, townsmen and peasants are commonly grouped together in the third estate. Mann (1973) considers medieval estates satire, but focuses on Chaucer and ignores Richeut. Richeut surely has more direct, current public importance than Chaucer's General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales.

[image] Nell Gwyn. Painting by Simon Verelst c. 1680. Nell Gwyn (1650 – 1687) was a comic actress and long-time mistress of Charles II. She regarded herself as a whore. Image thanks to Wikipedia Commons, and no thanks to the rapacious, reactionary U.K. National Portrait Gallery.

References:

Adkins, Carole Ann. 2003. "Beastly Mothers — Beastly Sons: Richeut." Reinardus: Yearbook of the International Reynard Society. 16: 3-17.

Haddad, Gabriel. 1991. "Richeut: A Translation." Comitatus: A Journal of Medieval and Renaissance Studies 22(1): 1-29.

Ker, Donald Eugene. 1976. The twelfth-century French poem of Richeut: a study in history, form and content. Ph.D. Thesis. Ohio State University.

Lecompte, Irville Charles. 1913. "Richeut, Old French poem of the twelfth century, with introduction, notes, and glossary." Pamphlet reprint of the article in The Romanic Review 4(3): 261-305.

Mann, Jill. 1973. Chaucer and medieval estates satire: the literature of social classes and the General Prologue to the Canterbury Tales. Cambridge, England: University Press.

Vernay, Philippe. 1988. Richeut. Berne, Switzerland: Editions Francke.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

When The Bull Moose Was Let Loose

February 22, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

In the North Texas town of Frisco, there is a minor league baseball team named the Rough Riders as a tribute to America's legendary fighting force during the Spanish-American War. One of the team's mascots is a Ted E. Bear, an ursine version of Thedore Roosevelt, the colorful Colonel of the 1st U.S. Volunteer Cavalry popularly known as the Rough Riders. Another mascot is a bull moose, evoking the Bull Moose Party, which was the nickname of Roosevelt's Progressive Party when he ran for a third Presidential term in 1912. Images of Theodore Roosevelt, decked out as a Rough Rider, abound on various souvenirs in the team shop.

Even though he died more than a century ago (January 6, 1919, to be exact), a cartoon figure of TR (as he was often called, and as I will do here for the sake of brevity) with his walrus mustache, gleaming white teeth, and pince-nez is immediately recognizable. The word "iconic" is overused today, but TR fits the definition. This is not to say that he doesn't have posthumous critics.

A couple of years ago TR got the iconoclasm treatment in New York City, not just the city of his birth but also where he was once the Police Commissioner (1895-1897). An equestrian statue that stood in front of the American Museum of Natural History has been removed. If the equestrian statue had depicted TR alone, it would still be there. Unfortunately, he is flanked by an American Indian and a black man – on foot. Critics said that the portrayal was symbolic of white domination of minorities. Alternative interpretations of the statue design were of little avail. The statue had to go.

At the time, I wondered what it would take to get TR's likeness removed from Mount Rushmore – a much more daunting task. In truth, one might wonder what he is doing there with the sainted Lincoln and founding fathers Washington and Jefferson. For one thing, when the sculpting began in 1927, TR was still fondly recalled in the collective memory. Another factor is geography. Mount Rushmore is located in South Dakota and TR was formerly a rancher in the Dakota Territory (which was split into the states of North and South Dakota when they were admitted to the union in 1889). Long after his death in 1919, TR's Presidential Library is being constructed in Medora, North Dakota.

TR's sojourn in the Dakota Territory is often mentioned as a turning point in his life. A scion of the eastern establishment (more specifically, he was a Knickerbocker, a descendant of New York's early Dutch settlers), he had a sickly, asthmatic childhood. At the age of 26, he experienced the death of his mother and his first wife on the same day, February 14, 1884. Much like a Biblical figure, he went off into the wilderness, which was certainly an apt description of the Dakota Territory in 1884. Having visited the area the year before for a buffalo hunt, he knew what he was getting into. He was deliberately opting for roughing it or, as he put it, "the strenuous life." His nearest neighbor was ten miles distant. Working on the ranch helped him build up his body and the solitude gave him time to think and read. He admitted, "I have always said I would not have been President had it not been for my experience in North Dakota."

Despite his best efforts, his ranch could not withstand the brutal winter of 1886-1887, which killed off about 80% of the cattle in the Badlands and put most cattlemen out of business. So he went back east for good. But the experience had transformed him. He had spent the better part of four years in a world that was not just dominated by men but was almost exclusively men. He acquired an admiration for cowboys and ranch hands who would have been considered uncouth and unwelcome in the polite society of his youth. In turn, the Dakotans learned to respect this well-read Harvard dude, who proved to be one tough hombre.

When TR auditioned volunteers for the Rough Riders, he signed up a number of cowboys for the job. But he also chose Ivy Leaguers, Texas Rangers, businessmen – even Indians. Horsemanship was the main criterion, and as Tom Wolfe might have put it, they all had "the right stuff." Ironically, once they arrived in Cuba, the horses never arrived, so they were essentially infantry.

While TR's status in American history remains formidable, I recently read about a side of his political philosophy that just might make him persona non grata. No, it's not that he was a jingoist or that he shot and killed a lot of wildlife. It was his attitude towards women. Now he didn't come right out and say anything overtly misogynistic or crack dirty jokes or keep a chippy on the side. In fact, his life is remarkably clean when it comes to any sort of off-color behavior. His "crime" is that he implied women had a duty to reproduce.

Comparing today's below-replacement birth rates with the more robust birth rates during TR's tenure (1901-1909) as President, it is hard to believe that it was an issue back then, yet "race suicide" was a talking point. In 1903, TR said it was "Fundamentally infinitely more important than any other question in this country."

TR could sense a trend. When he was born (1858), the population increases per decade were 35.58% (1860), down to 22.63% (1870) thanks to the Civil War, yet back up to 30.16% in 1880. Then a downward trend began: 25.48% in 1890, and 21.01% in 1900, one year before Vice-President Roosevelt assumed the Presidency after McKinley had been assassinated. And this was despite the massive immigration from Europe that took place in the late 19th Century. If TR was concerned about that 21.01% increase in 1900, imagine what he would think about the 7.35% growth from 2010-2020? This was the second-lowest of all-time, save for 1940, which was 7.27% thanks to the Great Depression.

Admittedly, a declining population doesn't necessarily spell doom for a country. Before the potato famine, Ireland's population was 8.18 million. Today it stands at 7.1 million. After more than 180 years, they still haven't recovered. Yet Ireland is still there. TR was essentially correct, however, since you can't have a country without people. Given his interest in expanding the American footprint around the world, he would probably add that size matters. You can't become or remain a world power with a declining population. Or can you? Since 1993 Russia has recorded more deaths than births every year save for 2013-2015, yet they are still a force to be reckoned with – just ask Ukraine!

In 1901, when TR moved into the White House, America was still a roomy place. The 1900 census came up with a total of 76,212,168. No one was worried about population explosion or global warming or deforestation. Abortion was a big no-no and contraception, aside from abstinence, was haphazard.

Curiously, TR was an advocate for women's rights. He was on board with equal pay for equal work and opening up professions to women. And he thought they should be given the vote. Ironically, his famous dictum, "Speak softly and carry a big stick" was actually a reworking of a West African proverb that pertained to the handling of women.

TR considered himself a progressive, but don't confuse him with today's self-styled progressives. He once said "wise progressivism and wise conservatism go hand in hand." Such sentiments might be the key to his mixed attitudes towards women. Consider the following quotes:

> [T]he man or woman who deliberately avoids marriage, and has a heat so cold as to know no passion and a brain so shallow and selfish as to dislike having children, is in effect a criminal against the race, and should be an object of contemptuous abhorrence by all healthy people.
>
> The chief of blessings for any nation is that it shall leave its seed to inherit the land. The greatest of all curses is sterility, and the severest of all condemnations should be that visited upon willful sterility.

Of course, he's talking about women who don't need no man, but he's also inveighing against male slackers. He would not be on board for MGTOW or the Playboy lifestyle any more than he would have looked kindly upon DINK (double income, no kids) couples. I don't believe he ever addressed the issue of homosexuality, but I can imagine what his thoughts on the subject would have been. As for transsexuals…well, let's just say the subject never came up in those days.

If we had to classify him today, a good case could be made for putting him in the tradcon column:

> If the men of the nation are not anxious to work in many different ways, with all their might and strength, and ready and able to fight at need, and anxious to be fathers of families, and if the women do not recognize that the greatest thing for any woman is to be a good wife and mother, why, that nation has cause to be alarmed about its future.
>
> A man to be a good citizen must first be a good bread-winner, a good husband, a good father – I hope the father of many healthy children.

To show his appreciation for fecundity, TR often sent personal letters to parents of large broods. But TR didn't just talk the talk, he walked the walk, having fathered six children, one with his first wife and five with his second. Yeah, the old Rough Rider did a lot of raw-dogging.

It could be argued that the years he spent as a rancher influenced his views on family formation. After all, there is no place for birth control in ranching. Potency and fertility are essential to the enterprise. Perhaps he felt the same was true of nation building. There is no substitute for a high sperm count!

In case you're wondering, six children is not a Presidential record – not even close. John Tyler, who became President in 1841 after the brief (one month) administration of William Henry Harrison, fathered 15 children! Eight with his first wife, seven with his second – who was only 24 when he married her in 1844 at the age of 54! He fathered No. 15 at the age of 70!

For better or worse, I doubt that TR's ideas about family size will make a comeback. But if he ever becomes anathema and they erase him from Mount Rushmore, I nominate John Tyler as his replacement!

That’s Amore! – The First Latin Lover

February 25, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Cecil B. DeMille is often credited with shooting the first feature-length film (The Squaw Man) in Hollywood in 1914. Thanks to DeMille, D.W. Griffith, Charlie Chaplin, John Ford and other names now familiar only to cinephiles, movies (and scandals!) became a fixture in American life by the 1920s, and low-rent nickelodeons gave way to movie palaces. Given the right role, an obscure actor could become a matinee idol overnight. There is no better example than Rudolph Valentino in The Sheik, a 1921 feature.

Valentino and The Sheik never totally faded from pop culture. More than a half-century after his death, his image was familiar enough that Gene Wilder spoofed it in The World’s Greatest Lover (1977).

When film societies and cinematheques bring back classic silent features, however, The Sheik is rarely among them. Yet Valentino and The Sheik definitely went viral in 1921. How did it happen? As the French used to say (at least before Simone de Beauvoir), “Cherchez la femme!” More specifically, distaff moviegoers.

Going viral may be a neologism but it is not a new phenomenon. Of course, through most of human history it involved word of mouth, whether kaffeeklatsch chatter, gossip over the backyard fence, or barroom banter. In fact, the term was more apt then than now, as it described a situation in which news, like a virus, was passed from person to person, not through media.

Then came the printing press and it was time to “start spreading the news” as Frank Sinatra would have put it. Printing presses brought us newspapers and magazines; moving pictures both documented reality and fostered illusion. In an early example of cross-pollination in media, fan magazines created buzz (though I don’t believe that term was in use 100 years ago) about movies and the people who made them, while the movies boosted the sale of the magazines. In 1921 there was a lot of buzz about The Sheik and its star, Rudolph Valentino. For the most part, it was a female hive phenomenon.

Viewing The Sheik today, one might find it difficult to see what all the fuss was about. It doesn’t seem much more than escapism for plain Janes. Even by the standards of the day, the film isn’t particularly well written or directed, and a lot of it seems overly melodramaic. Nevertheless, there are elements of it that resonate within the manosphere today.

One reason the film is seldom shown today could be its attitude towards Arabs. Frankly, I would not want to be the manager of a theater that screens a film with a title card that describes the setting as, “Where the children of Araby dwell in happy ignorance that civilization has passed them by.” That’s like asking for a suicide bomber to target your movie theater. Middle Eastern studies aside, the Sahara Desert is the setting for a plot right out of Romance Novel Writing 101. In fact, the film was based on a popular 1919 novel by Edith Maude Hull. While the story may seem corny today, it must be remembered that romance novels were not a genre in those days. When The Sheik was published, it was not relegated to the romance aisle, it was mainstream fiction.

The heroine is Lady Diana Mayo, an emancipated, independent young Englishwoman with bobbed hair and a headstrong attitude. Refusing a marriage proposal early in the film, she asserts "Marriage is captivity – the end of independence." In other words, she don't need no man. Of course, if that were really true, we would have no story. Even if you're not a fan of romance novels, you might surmise that an alpha male is exactly what she needs. She just hasn't met him – yet! This trope goes back at least as far as The Taming of the Shrew.

The narrative starts at the Algerian town of Biskra. Described as "the Monte Carlo of the Sahara," it appears to be something of a resort for well-to-do Europeans. For some reason, Lady Diana decides to join a caravan into the desert. A white woman on a long trek with Muslim men in the middle of the Sahara desert? What could go wrong? Well, no one ever said an independent streak and intelligence went hand in hand.

Enter the dashing Ahmed Ben Hassan (Valentino), a sheik who has been educated in Paris. Is he a gentleman or a brute? Having already met Lady Mayo in Biskra, he has found her intriguing and decides to abduct her from the caravan. His philosophy is "When an Arab sees a woman that he wants, he takes her."

She rebels against his authority, but he decides to show her who's boss. According to the title cards:

> "I am not accustomed to having my orders disobeyed," he states.
>
> "And I am not accustomed to obeying orders," she responds.
>
> "You will learn," he replies.

Indeed she does! According to another title card, "A week of sullen obedience" ensues. The viewer can't help but notice that she has traded in her mannish English getup (pith helmet, khakis and riding crop) for the colorful (presumably…after all, this is a black and white movie) garb of an Arab woman. Is she in the early stages of Stockholm syndrome?

Unfortunately, the Sheik is not her only admirer. Another is Omair, the leader of a bandit tribe who spirits her away from the sheik. Her youthful beauty and, frankly, her whiteness make her attractive to both men. So we have another ancient trope, namely Helen of Troy, with Lady Mayo as the face that launched a thousand Arabs on horseback.

Predictably, Ahmed Ben Hassan kills Omair but is seriously wounded in the scuffle. While recovering, he reflects on his relationship with Lady Diana. Having initially had the hots for her, he realizes she is more than a fling, that he is truly in love with her. Cue the happy ending.

Actually, the ending is even happier than one might suspect. Miscegenation might have been a thorny issue in 1921, and one can imagine that it might cut into box office returns, not just in the South but in the North, as the nationwide reincarnation of the Ku Klux Klan in the 1920s would indicate. No need to worry, however; it turns out that Ahmed is not really an Arab. You see, he is really a European whose parents (English father, Spanish mother) died while the family was in Algeria, and he was rescued and adopted by a sheik. After his adoptive father died, Ahmed took over leadership of the tribe. So he is a sheik but he is not an Arab. It's not quite bait and switch, however. After all the film is called The Sheik, not The Arab.

Like any movie, The Sheik has a host of people in front of and behind the camera, most of whom have faded from the public eye (one notable exception is Adolphe Menjou, whose acting career stretched from 1914 to 1960). The one indispensable presence, the only reason to see the film today, is the star, Rudolph Valentino (thankfully shortened from Rodolfo Pietro Filibertro Raffaello Guiglielmi di Valentina d' Antonguella). If you're going to be a heartthrob, it probably doesn't hurt to have a name that evokes Valentine's Day.

Born in Italy in 1895, Valentino was something of a mama's boy. His father was disappointed in him and eventually so was his mother, who advanced him money to emigrate to the United States in 1913. He had no particular trade or profession and lacking English language skills, he initially obtained only menial work in New York.

But he was young and handsome, had a foreign accent and bedroom eyes – and he could bust a move. So he found his services as a male taxi-dancer in demand. Eventually, he took his dance moves to a traveling musical troupe. When the troupe reached California, he decided to get into the movies, starting out as a $5/day extra.

Soon people behind the camera began to take note of him. Eventually, he came to the attention of June Mathis, a highly paid screenwriter and studio executive. At a time when leading men were WASPy, he had a different image, which resulted in his status as Hollywood's first Latin Lover. Or rather, he was a new breed of Latin lover. The old breed were aficionados of a dead language.

Though Valentino had never played a lead role, Mathis thought he was perfect for the role of Julio Desnoyers in The Four Horsemen of the Apocalypse, a scenario she had fashioned from Vicente Blasco Ibañez's worldwide best-selling 1916 novel about an Argentinian family's involvement in World War I. Valentino's dancing skills served him well in the tango scene, and publicity stills of him sporting his dashing gaucho duds are still easy to find on the internet.

The film was a smash hit, sitting atop the 1921 box office champs with an astounding gross of $9,200,000 and selling 131,428,571 tickets – far ahead of the No. 2 film, Chaplin's The Kid with a $2,500,000 gross and 35,714,285 tickets sold.

Later that year Valentino was cast in the title role in The Sheik. It not only became his signature role, it had ramifications in pop culture. A ladies' man was known as a sheik. Sheik condoms featured a silhouette of Valentino on the package and asked the question, "What does a woman want?"

Valentinomania (my term, not one that was in use at the time) was described by John Dos Passos in "The Big Money" the third section of his famous U.S.A. trilogy:

> The streets were jumbled with hysterical faces, waving hands, crazy eyes; they > stuck out their autographbooks, yanked his buttons off, cut a tail off his admirablytailored dress-suit; they stole his hat and pulled at his necktie; his valets removed young women from under his bed; all night in nightclubs and cabarets actresses leching for stardom made sheepseyes at him under their mascared lashes.

After more leading roles (notably Blood and Sand in 1922, Monsieur Beaucaire in 1924, The Eagle in 1925), he returned to the desert in Son of the Sheik, a 1926 potboiler. After five years he had come full circle. At the same time, he had come to the end of the line. 31 years old, he died of peritonitis later that year.

Dying young, of course, is always a good way to become a legend in Hollywood (also in sports and politics, among other endeavors) as it evokes endless speculation about what might have been. In Valentino's case, it is particularly interesting because his demise came just before the coming of talkies in 1927. Would he have survived the transition, or would his voice not have matched his image? Or would it have been too heavily accented for movie audiences to understand? Silent movies added an air of mystery to every actor, as the sound of one's voice, a key component of one's identity in person, was absent. Many silent film stars discovered their careers had been silenced after the talkies revealed their voices.

One of the ironic aspects of the silent cinema was its international appeal at a time when provincialism was prominent. Title cards could be easily translated into the language of any country where a movie was distributed. A European actor in a Hollywood movie could play any role, as could an American actor in a European movie. Valentino was an exception, as his "foreignness" added to his appeal in the United States. In a sense, he went against the prevailing mood of the country. The Sheik was released in 1921 when Sacco and Vanzetti were convicted, so it was not a particularly good time to be an Italian immigrant. Valentino actually died before they did. Thanks to appeals and protests, they were not executed till 1927.

The funeral of Valentino was an even bigger event than the release of one of his movies. 80,000+ mourners lined up in the August heat to pay their last respects as he lay in state in a bronze coffin at a New York funeral home. Reportedly, some of his fans could not attend since they had committed suicide after hearing of his demise.

Naturally, conspiracy theories abounded. It wasn't peritonitis that got him, it was this, that, or something else. Of course, histrionics were much in evidence among the mourners. Dos Passos wrote of his funeral:

> All the ambulances in that part of the city were busy carting off women who'd fainted….every few minutes a girl fainted in front of the bier and was revived by the newspapermen who put down her name and address and claims to notice in the public prints.

Since women had first voted in a Presidential election in 1920, it is not hard to imagine a number of men rolling their eyes at such behavior and saying, "What'd I tell ya?" Second thoughts about that 19th Amendment, anyone?

While femme moviegoers wet their panties over Valentino (H.L. Mencken said he was "catnip" to women), men were nonplussed, to put it mildly. Many considered him an effeminate dandy, if not downright queer (he was a close friend of Ramon Novarro, another Latin lover movie star, who was a known homosexual).

In the 1920s, far more men worked on farms or in factories and mines than today, so getting one's hands dirty was a reality for millions of men. At the same time, the era is often thought of as the time when advertising and consumer culture were born. Men were offered more grooming products than ever before. It was a time of transition from doing manly things to buying manly products. Today Valentino might have been what we call a metrosexual. His true sexual proclivities, however, are as ambiguous as the allegations about them.

Valentino's appeal was to something deep in the female psyche. The male ego daydream involves lording it over everyone, male and female; the female ego also wants to lord it over everyone, male and female, but secretly longs for an alpha male who will lord it over her. Thanks to the Valentino craze, American women became disappointed in their husbands, not realizing that seduction and marriage are two different things. The first is emotional, the second is transactional. If women found their husbands wanting emotionally, they never stopped to think that they might have found Valentino wanting as a husband. In fact, his relationships with the opposite sex are revealing…but exactly what they reveal is open to debate.

Valentino was a man of the old world, so it is not surprising that he is on record as preferring traditional, old-fashioned, home-centered women. Yet the women he married were anything but. His career depended not only on women in the movie audience, it depended on women in the movie industry. While the aforementioned June Mathis was a heterosexual, that does not appear to be the case with his other female influencers. Reportedly, he allowed them to make his major career decisions.

Valentino's first wife, actress Jean Acker, was a bisexual. In fact, the marriage was never consummated. She was linked with Alla Nazimova, a silent movie star.

Wife No. 2 was Natacha Rambova (her real name was Winifred Shaughnessy, and she was born into a Mormon family in Utah), a costume designer. A close friend of the aforementioned Nazimova, she was also suspected of being bisexual. Since Valentino married her before his first divorce was final, he was arrested for bigamy, as juicy a scandal as any tabloid could ever hope for.

At the time of Valentino's death, he was supposedly engaged to actress Pola Negri, who described him as the "love of her life." As proof, she fainted several times at his funeral. She also was rumored to be bisexual.

It is more than ironic that a man who made so many straight women swoon was surrounded by female control freaks who were allegedly switch-hitters. Given the millions of heterosexual women who got hot and bothered by Valentino, it is hard to believe he couldn't form a relationship with one. Were his wives mere beards in a “lavender marriage,” i.e., a homosexual marriage of convenience to keep up appearances? Or he was just content to let girlbosses run his life? During his brief career he earned $5,000,000, yet he was in debt at the time of his death. Did his female advisers also offer economic advice?

Of course, there is the possibility Valentino was ahead of his time. Today a movie star of ambiguous sexuality with a bisexual significant other would hardly be headline news. In fact, he would probably be the Grand Marshal of the WeHo (West Hollywood) Pride Parade.

Today you can watch The Sheik for free on YouTube. The run time is only 80 minutes so it’s not a huge investment of your time. While the film is certainly a far cry from the movies you see at your local multiplex today, it is an interesting take on the theme of gynocentrism. The film is all about what the woman wants; the man’s value lies in how well he can satisfy the woman’s wants – not just materially but emotionally. Though the man and woman are initially at loggerheads, he comes around to what she wants him to be.

As popular as The Sheik and Valentino were, it’s good to remind oneself that it’s only a movie…only a movie…only a movie. Yet in 1921 women compared real men to a phantom paragon and found them wanting.

Today the female conception of the ideal man isn’t what it was a century ago, but the female sense of entitlement vis-à-vis the man of their dreams hasn’t changed. Yes, the more things change, the more they stay the same.

Actually, some things do change. Today you have many options in the family planning section of your local pharmacy, but Sheik condoms are no longer one of them.

The Tale of Thomas and Mary Reibey

February 28, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Thomas was an officer on His Majesty's ship Britannia. Mary was a horse thief.

Thomas was a 19 year old junior officer when in 1794 he proposed to 17 year old Mary. Thomas was serving in the employ of the British East India Company at the time and Mary was under a seven year sentence of transportation to Australia, having arrived in 1792. Thomas had worked in India and other parts of the British Empire before coming to Australia.

Transportation (the criminal sentence) is an interesting topic. The individual was transported by ship to a remote British colony. Originally convicts were transported to British colonies in North America but the American Revolution put a stop to that. After a few years the British resumed transportation, this time to the newly established colony of New South Wales in what is now Australia.

Transportation generally came in three varieties, seven years, fourteen years and life. One of the interesting consequences of transportation is that those individuals so sentenced were free to return home after their period of transportation was up. Those sentenced to transportation for life were out of luck of course. The trick is that the transported individual had to pay for their own return trip. This was beyond the means of most. Thus for almost everyone transportation was a one way trip.

After Thomas and Mary married they settled on a land grant near Sydney which they began farming. It was standard practice at the time for the colonial government to parcel out land to free settlers and released convicts. The newly minted farmers were expected to start producing food within a few years. If they failed to do so they could forfeit the land.

Along with farming, Thomas also established a trading business. Over the next 15 years his assets and business grew. Using his connections in the East India Company he traded with locations as far away as India and China.

During this period Thomas would still sometimes go to sea. While he was away his wife Mary would manage the various businesses.

In 1806 Thomas heroically rescued several people during a period of severe flooding on the Hawksbury River north of Sydney.

Thomas made one final sea voyage in 1809-1810 and then died in Sydney in 1811 from a disease apparently picked up in India two years earlier. This left Mary Reibey in charge of her husband's business empire. She was now a wealthy woman thanks to her husband's business acumen. The young naval officer had done well for himself, and the horse thief had sorted herself out too.

Using experience gained by assisting her husband, Mary continued to run and grow the businesses. She opened new warehouses and purchased new ships. Such was her standing in the community that the Bank of New South Wales was founded in her house.

In 1820 she went home to England for a visit with two of her children. Yes she was wealthy enough to pay her own way back. She returned to Australia in 1821. This was her home now.

In 1825 Mary was appointed as the governor of a grammar school.

In 1828, seventeen years after the death of her husband, Mary stepped back from active involvement in her businesses and transitioned in to retirement. She went on to live another 27 years in comfort.

Feminists would have us believe that men have historically oppressed women. In contrast Mary Reibey was accepted by her society as a business owner and was appointed to a custodial position over a school. She bought and sold land in her own name. Even when Thomas was alive she was active in business.

Mary was a well respected member of her society. Wealthy and powerful. Hardly the image of the down-trodden woman that feminists would have us believe was the historical norm. Mary's situation was common. Wherever and whenever we look at the historical record we see women being active participants in their societies. Women who achieved were respected by men for their hard work and intellectual capabilities.

Along with supporting her husband in business, Mary bore Thomas seven children. The idea of the man working full-time and the woman working part-time while being the primary carer for small children is often seen as modern but it has been the norm for humans societies throughout history.

We must also not forget this society was not a democracy. New South Wales was still operating under marshall law when Thomas and Mary settled there. Governors were all senior officers in the Royal Navy or British Army during this period. Mary didn't have the vote but nor did Thomas. Australia was amongst the first places in the world to grant both universal male suffrage and universal female suffrage yet this would only happen decades after they died.

Both Thomas and Mary contributed to the development of the colony of New South Wales, out of which Australia would grow. Alas gynocentrism is alive and well. Today Mary Reibey is remembered as an important figure in colonial Australia and has appeared on Australian currency. Thomas is largely forgotten.

Further Reading

Australian Royalty

Biography of Mary Reibey at ANU

The featured image depicts Mary Reibey because we couldn't find a picture of Thomas. Any pictures you find online labelled Thomas Reibey are probably of his son or grandson, who were both also called Thomas Reibey. –Ed

The Ptolemys – a soap opera

March 2, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Almost everyone has heard of Cleopatra and Marc Antony. They fought against Octavian for control of what would soon be the Roman Empire after the death of Julius Caesar. They lost to Octavian. Shakespeare wrote a play about it.

But there is so much more to the story. Cleopatra was a descendent of Ptolemy I, one of Alexander the Great's generals. Ptolemy was left in charge of Egypt by Alexander and eventually founded a dynasty that ruled over the land for 275 years. The Ptolemys weren't very inventive when it came to names. The names Ptolemy, Benenice, Arsinoe and Cleopatra feature prominently among family members.

At the time of the conflict with Octavian Cleopatra was Pharaoh of Egypt. The preceding three decades was a story worthy of popular TV series Game of Thrones. I like to call it The Ptolomys – A Soap Opera.

Ptolemy XII was deposed by the Egyptian people and fled to Rome. His eldest daughter Berenice IV then seized the throne. I'm sure the Egyptians didn't rise up to replace one member of the Ptolemaic dynasty with another. With Roman assistance Ptolemy XII was able to return to Egypt and retake the throne. He then had his daughter Berenice executed. Ptolemy XII then named his young son Ptolemy XIII and another daughter Cleopatra VII as joint heirs to the throne of Egypt. Cleopatra VII is of course the woman known today simply by the mononym Cleopatra. Young Ptolemy was married to his sister Cleopatra as was the custom among pharaohs. Gradually Cleopatra's power grew over that of Ptolemy, with her face appearing on coins and his being omitted from official documents. Ptolemy and his supporters ultimately decided to dispose of his rival. They managed to get Cleopatra to flee the country.

At this point another of Ptolemy's sisters, Arsinoe IV, asserted a claim on the throne of Egypt. Julius Caesar arrived in Egypt as a result of events occurring in the Roman Civil War going on at the time. Cleopatra returned to Egypt and was famously able to have herself carried in to Caesar's room in a rolled up carpet. The carpet was unfurled and Cleopatra appeared – or so the legend goes. This scene is of course so dramatic that it's virtually always represented in recreations of the story. Caesar and Cleopatra entered in to a relationship around this time and she would later bear him a son, Caesarion.

At this point Ptolemy allied with Arsinoe against Cleopatra and Julius Caesar. The two sides fought over the Egyptian capital of Alexandria, seriously damaging the city. Ultimately the arrival of Roman reinforcements turned the tide. Ptolemy fled but history records that he ignominious drowned in the Nile. Arsinoe was exiled to live out her days in a religious temple after Caesar was pressured to keep her alive by powerful figures in Rome.

It wasn't to be though. After the death of Julius Caesar, Cleopatra took up with Marc Antony. Antony later had Arsinoe murdered at the request of Cleopatra.

Marc Antony and Cleopatra then went on to fight Octavian in yet another Roman civil war. They lost. It was a naval battle and, notably, Cleopatra fled with her fleet. Antony, on his flagship, saw her leave. History claims he jumped overboard, swam to a smaller, faster ship and followed her. With Antony and Cleopatra gone their remaining forces capitulated. Octavian had won.

Antony took his own life while Cleopatra was captured by Octavian. She also later took her own life.

What we see here is typical of history. Powerful men and women in an aristocratic family fighting other families and amongst themselves. Hardly the story feminists tell us of the perpetual oppression of women throughout history. Feminists will try to claim that the occasional woman could cut through the Patriarchy and rise in to a position of power, but they weren't occasional. Powerful women feature prominently throughout the historical record. What history shows is that social class and wealth mattered a lot more than gender when it came to power and influence.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

March 3, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

As of January 2025 a warrant is outstanding for the arrest of Zoe McLellan in relation to charges of kidnapping, child stealing and child custody deprivation.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan was reportedly residing in an apartment in River Ridge, Louisiana in April 2021 and may still be residing in the area.

McLellan grew up in the area of Port Orchard, WA and may have returned to the area.

Some sources believe that McLellan has left the United States and is residing in Canada or Costa Rica.

Prior to disappearing McLellan was known to use the alias Sarah Chandler.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney’s office.

The Goal Post Episode 54 – Technical Difficulties Attack

March 6, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Two Feminist Fallacies

March 12, 2025 | by Luigi Logan (aka Fidelbogen) | Link | Original Link

---

This concerns two common errors of thinking which most feminists stumble into while they are scrambling to decipher what is happening to their world, why things are slipping out of their control, and how they might regain that control. I call these two errors the crosshairs fallacy, and the moral perfection fallacy.

When I call them fallacies, I do not mean they are strictly logical fallacies in the academic way. That is, I do not pretend to add them to the likes of ad hominem, circular argument, strawman, and so on. No, for my purpose, these new items are fallacious simply because they are mistaken; because they initialize thinking upon a foundation of error and trigger downstream error in conjoined regions of understanding. I am keen to call attention to them because they so strongly mark the behavior of feminists in particular — especially those who are describing or attacking the non-feminist revolution. So my motivation to write is political.

I will speak first of the crosshairs fallacy.

Feminists fall into this mistaken thoughtway owing to their confusion and consequent desire to simplify. In a word, they oversimplify. Beset by hostile forces which they cannot fathom, they try to align a narrow target, as it were, in the crosshairs of a sniper scope. Their deluded hope is, that the sum and substance of what threatens them lies within that constricted radius, and that if only they neutralize the target area, their troubles will go away andperpetual revolution will resume its course unhindered.

Among feminists, the crosshairs target of choice is the cyberspace group known as "MRAs", or Male Renaissance Agitators. Feminists are obsessed with MRAs as a kind of "red menace." They sense, quite rightly, that larger social forces are mobilizing against feminism and what feminism has inflicted on the world, and with utmost naïveté they have undertaken a shorthand analysis that would make these things mentally easier to cope with.

> Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate.

The crosshairs fallacy springs from a childish belief that the vital force of the non-feminist revolution concentrates in a point source — for example, a certain community of websites — and that if you neutralize this particular "head", then the "snake" will expire. But that is a gross misunderstanding — akin to attacking a prominent mushroom in complete ignorance of the underlying mycelium which spreads for miles. For even if you kill, imprison, or pinklist every suspected "MRA" on the planet, you will not have made a dent in the cultural forces which generated MRAs in the first place. Furthermore, you will have overlooked a host of *other*threats to feminism from other directions.

Accordingly, it will not do to sit around in feminist echo chambers mocking the bizarrities of presumptive MRAs who have posted comments on the internet. For such words are not spoken in a vacuum, nor do they enter the universe through a side door from nowhere. It should go without saying that such unsavoriness is the consequence of something — even a feminist could agree on that much. But what a feminist cannot hope to fathom without ceasing to be a feminist, is that these things originate from a source in the objective world which the feminist narrative is not competent to explain.

So the feminists have arrived at a false simplicity. The problem is not that the facts of the case are unduly difficult to comprehend, but that they are difficult for a specifically feminist mindset to process without a prerequisite self-knowledge and the sense of guilt this knowledge would instill. It is to avoid guilty self-knowledge, then, that the feminists project their anxieties onto an abstracted and quasi-mythical group of people — as onto a lightning rod.

To be sure, MRAs do exist in various forms. But "the MRA" as an*archetypal construct,* is largely a figment of the feminist imagination. And MRAs, whether concretely or archetypally, are only one piece of a much larger jigsaw puzzle. The more advanced non-feminist philosophers, by the way, do not make the equivalent error in their thinking about feminism or feminists. Rather, they have evolved a sophisticated conceptual model of feminism as a sociopolitical organism — a subject which I have treated elsewhere.

I will speak next of the moral perfection fallacy.

The feminists wish to discredit their enemies as simply as possible, and so they look for anything that is morally amiss about their enemies in order to expedite that project. This is fallacious mainly because it is shallow. For there is no way that any sizeable demographic sector can be a vessel of moral purity straight through, and the non-feminist sector is no exception. You will find the complete moral spectrum of human nature among those who oppose feminism, because we are talking about humanity en masse — and when did humanity en masse ever include less than a complete moral spectrum?Furthermore, you should understand that feminism is a utopian worldview. It upholds the abstract ideal of "progress" and holds the rest of the world accountable to a certain programme which it dictates in the service of this ideal.

So when the rest of the world is slow to measure up, it counts as proof (in the feminist mind) that the rest of the world is morally invalid and, thus invalidated, without warrant to challenge feminist claims. This mode of thinking is entirely circular and self-referential.In practice, all feminist assessment of human fallibility is made according to a feminist yardstick, meaning that no case of moral dysfunction is permitted to operate within its own frame of reference. Things are never "bad" for independent local reasons, but for reasons which feminism arrogates sole authority to enunciate. And in the feminist utopian worldview, all things are either progressing toward a projected feminist future, or rebelling against that future in some way. No alterity is admitted, and by default, any possible theory of "sin" or "transgression" can only be a feminist theory, imposed by feminists and for feminists, upon the rest of the world.

And so the feminists cannot see the world as it exists in itself, but only as it appears through the lens of feminist theory. In consequence, feminist dealings with the non-feminist sector amount to a coercive falsification of reality injuriously imposed on others. For it ought to be obvious that all manner of folk may be aggrieved at feminism for all manner of reasons. It is not a bit obvious, however, that ALL of these reasons are invalid merely because SOME of them are proffered on questionable grounds by questionable people. Coercive falsification is therefore a cardinal sin upon feminism's doorstep; it is first imposed, reacted against by an aggrieved world, and imposed once more in rejoinder to that aggrieved reaction — which to the feminist mind is deemed a transgression. But with each round the falsification grows — always at the expense of any feminist claim to moral authority. This claim — or rather pretention — crumbles relentlessly.

In sum, feminism has a toxic moral agency within the social ecology. And so the moral perfection fallacy should inspire us to quote the Gospel verse which advises plucking the beam out of thine own eye before thou pluckest the mote out of thy neighbor's eye!

A concluding word: The crosshairs fallacy and the moral perfection fallacy are interrelated; they intertwine; they have territory in common; they illuminate each other. But I will leave it to the reader to work this out for himself or herself.

Disney Cancel Snow White’s Premiere – It’s Panic Time

March 15, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

To be, or not be “that guy”

March 16, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Some years ago I was dining at a fast food restaurant in downtown Houston. While I was placing my order at the counter, the young man taking the order appeared to be distracted. He wasn’t looking at me or his touch-screen; rather, he was looking at something going on behind me. I didn’t bother to turn around, so I didn’t know what it was. The next thing I know, he’s speaking to the manager on an intercom: “Mr. (can’t remember his name), we have an undesirable in the dining room.”

I figured he didn’t mean me, so I turned around and saw a bedraggled man dipping his bare hands into the salad bar and chowing down. Yes, I thought, that sort of behavior is definitely undesirable for a number of reasons.

Of course, everyone does undesirable things in the course of a lifetime, but few will be branded an undesirable. It is a status fraught with stigma and not one to be bestowed lightly, which might explain why Cecil was tolerated for so long.

No one ever accused Cecil of being a role model, but that phrase did not exist when I was a lad. Oh, one occasionally heard of a paragon who was a “good influence” or a rounder who was a “bad influence,” and it was possible to “fall in with a bad crowd,” as happened to Pinocchio. Even though he had a benign toymaker for a father figure, he was led astray. Then again, what marionette isn’t looking for someone to animate him?

In a sense, a “real boy” is like a marionette in search of someone who can animate him. Every adult male is a potential role model for a boy. Not that a boy consciously places all the adult males in his purview on some sort of internal balance scales weighing positive and negative traits, but at some level deep in his psyche, it occurs to him that he could grow up to be “that guy.” If so, he must wonder if it is desirable or undesirable to be “that guy.”

“That guy” could be one’s father or grandfather or uncle. He could be a teacher or a coach. He could be a celebrity of some sort. How many Little Leaguers have aped the batting stance of major league sluggers? How many teenage boys modeled their appearance after James Dean or the Beatles or some other pop culture idol?

On the other hand “that guy” could be the mailman, the clerk at the local convenience store, or a local drug dealer. Or someone like Cecil.

Cecil was not a relative but he was relative-adjacent. He was a friend of my uncle. In the summertime, he and my uncle would often go fishing. I sometimes encountered him when I visited my uncle’s house. Cecil was tolerated by the womenfolk but they were not enthusiastic about him. Granted, he was a bachelor. But that was really all they could hold against him.

Cecil had a good-paying job (an engineer); he wasn’t a criminal, a druggie, or an alcoholic. By all appearances, he was an even-tempered soul. In good conscience, no one could claim he was the proverbial “bad influence.” But he was a divorced man with no apparent desire to get married again. Worse than that, he appeared to be content with his lot in life. I hesitate to say he was thriving, but he certainly wasn't floundering.

I didn't give him much thought when I was young. Since we were of different generations, I rarely engaged him in conversation. In later years, however, he often came to mind. Married adult men were the standard in those days. This was not the Victorian era, so it was not unusual for a man to be divorced, but he usually remarried within the next few years. Cecil was the exception. Having been bucked off the horse once, he had no desire to get back in the saddle.

In mid-20th Century USA, no one ever said that getting married was mandatory but when one looked around and saw that all the adult males one knew were married, one intuited that it was a requirement for adult male status. The single man, assuming he was not a queer duck, was at least an odd duck. How could he ever be fulfilled without a wife and kids? Without intending to do so, Cecil showed that bachelorhood was a viable option.

I'm sure Cecil never looked at himself as a role model for the youth of America. But as I said earlier in this article, every man is a role model, like it or not. A grandfather or a father might be conscious of this status and strive to be a positive figure in his son's/grandson's life. But no man asks to be a role model for his entire sex. It is simply the way things are. Of course, there are boys who have women as role models, but that is another topic.

Today, thanks to the delayed age of first marriages and the divorce rate, there are more Cecils than ever before. Some will eventually marry or remarry; others, despite the blandishments of relatives and friends, will remain lifelong bachelors. They too will be role models simply by existing.

With legions of bachelors at large, it is not so difficult for a single man to find other single men to socialize with. There is no formal diktat that a single man who gets married must ostracize his single male friends, but it seems to work out that way. Usually, it is a means of keeping peace in the family. The wife realizes that male bonding takes attention away from her needs, so she puts her foot down. Married male friends are acceptable, however, since they provide more opportunities for socializing as a couple. The single male who is in the market for a significant other might be tolerated, at least for a while, but as for those who have no intention of tying the knot…highly suspect.

If a married woman has a son or two or three, the stakes are even higher. The wife doesn't want her husband's single friends to influence her sons because she wants grandchildren! Of course, if the single male friend is a boozer, a druggie, a criminal, or some other ne'er-do-well or underachiever, it is easy enough to point him out as a bad role model. But what to do if his only shortcoming is being a bachelor? How to prohibit him from the family circle when that is the only entry on his rap sheet?

And that was the case with Cecil. His only sin was being a middle-aged man with no intention of getting married again. Then again, my uncle and aunt had no sons, only daughters, so there were no impressionable young men in the immediate family – only me, an impressionable nephew, in the extended family.

I never knew anything about Cecil's sexual life, but I don't recall ever seeing him with a woman. For all I know, he could have been a formidable fornicator. Or he might have had a mistress stashed away somewhere. Or maybe he was celibate. Whatever his lot in life, he always seemed content. While the pursuit of happiness has been embedded into the American way of life since the Declaration of Independence, contentment is nowhere mentioned.

A man does not pursue contentment; it comes to him – if he's fortunate. And it is not the same as happiness. This may be why women distrust a man who is content. He is more passive than active. They want a man who is not content, someone with drive, which indicates he will fight tooth and claw to provide more goodies for her and her offspring. A single man who is content with his lot in life ("a confirmed bachelor" used to be the term) is hardly a criminal, but he might as well be. Even if he is an upstanding citizen in every other respect, he will always be an undesirable "that guy." He might even be labeled a misogynist or a woman-hater. Even if he never opines one way or the other about the opposite sex.

Most of the times I saw Cecil at my uncle's home he talked about fishing or the stock market, or various topics in the news. Only once did he ever offer an opinion on womanhood. He was sitting on the back porch with my uncle, his wife, my mother, and my grandmother. I was there too, of course. I was not a talkative child but my ears worked just fine.

Perhaps Cecil had downed one beer too many, or maybe he had a testosterone spike that evening, or maybe he was in one of those poke-the-beehive moods. I don't remember the context of the conversation, but at one point, he made the assertion that women should drop dead at 40. Needless to say, he was all alone in the lion's den and the lionesses responded predictably…after a brief pause while they pondered if he had really said what he said.

My uncle did not defend him. He stayed out of it. I can't blame him. After all, he had to live with the lionesses; Cecil didn't. After Cecil went home, there was plenty of commentary along the lines of "Who does he think he is? God's gift to women?"

If he had been a suspect before, now he was adjudged guilty, though not of being a sexist (that word didn't exist back then). He had dared to say the unsayable. Deep down, every woman over 40 knows that her sex appeal is running on empty, and she does not like to be reminded of it.

Well, I would not advise any man to parrot Cecil's dictum today in mixed company, and only with great discretion at a stag party. Some thoughts – I almost said truths – are best left unexpressed. Unless one has the cover of an alias or an avatar.

I have no idea what happened to Cecil. Since he was middle-aged while I was a boy, I'm sure he is dead. Did he have any regrets on his deathbed? For all I know, he died in his sleep or faded away in a nursing home. I doubt he was surrounded by loved ones wishing him bon voyage before he embarked on the big sleep. I could be wrong – maybe he had brothers or sisters or cousins or nephews or nieces, but he had no offspring. He might have worn Fruit of the Loom undies but there were no fruit-of-his-loins survivors.

It might be tempting to label Cecil as MGTOW, but in his day there was no such acronym. He was not trying to make a social or political statement. Even if he wanted to, it would have been futile; in those days there weren't enough Cecils to be a political force. He was just a mellow fellow enjoying life as he knew it. He did not proselytize for bachelorhood even as he embodied its advantages.

Whether Cecil knew it or not, whether he wanted to be or not, he was a role model; not the only one in my life, not the most prominent, but one who lingers in my mind many decades later. He wasn't the only "that guy" I encountered while growing up. But he was one of "those guys."

Perhaps you have or had a Cecil/"that guy" in your life. Was he a positive influence? Or was he an undisirable in the dining room of life?

The Men’s Rights Movement: Changing The Cultural Narrative

March 19, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The 2024 Ipsos survey answers the question of “Have we gone so far in promoting women’s equality that we are discriminating against men?”

The graph below provides the result of interviewing a total of 24,269 adults, from the countries of Japan, Australia, Brazil, Canada, China, France, Germany, Great Britain, Italy, New Zealand, Spain, U.S.A., Argentina, Belgium, Chile, Colombia, Hungary, Indonesia, Ireland, Malaysia, Mexico, the Netherlands, Peru, Poland, Singapore, South Africa, South Korea, Sweden, Thailand, and Turkey.

Results:

Source: SBS Australia

Source: Ipsos

This survey provides robust data about men's issues becoming recognized by greater numbers of men, rather than wishful guesses and copium regarding an increase in awareness. It confirms a thought I've entertained, over the last five years, that Gen Z men are standing on the cumulative activism of the three previous generations of men, while holding the new line…. and its an impressive line. All of which goes to prove that "changing the cultural narrative" is a successful men's rights enterprise, albiet one that takes a few generations of collective male teamwork to effect change. Political changes will certainly follow as politicians smell which way the breeze is blowing.

It's worth noting the real movers, as shown in the above graph, are Generation X who made the biggest cognitive jump of all gens: a full 10% increase on the former generation. The only other issue I'd like to touch on, in passing, is the small percentage of Gen Z men who slag off at boomers for being mindless simps to women; the same minority of Z's who fail to understand that thier own emerging resistance to gynocentrism and misandry is a recapitulation of each generation's knowledge that went before them, stages of awareness they've accumulated unconsciously, and who have now added a bit of thier own to the multi-generational stack of awareness. This is referred to as "cultural recapitulation learning" where stages of previous cultural innovation are incorporated into one's mind before adding a new layer to the same.

Cultural recapitulation theory[1]

Cultural recapitulation provides a captivating framework for understanding human cognitive development over time, suggesting that individual growth in knowledge mirrors the broader evolution of human understanding across cultural history. This interplay between personal awareness and the historical progression of ideas helps us to understand how contemporary shifts in perception, such as those revealed in the above survey of men across generations, might reflect this recapitulative arc, unfolding anew as each cohort engages with its cultural moment.

The accumulating awareness of men's issues across Boomers, Gen X, Millennials, and Gen Z extends cultural recapitulation beyond biological themes, and into the grassroots evolution of societal consciousness. The survey's findings stand as a recapitulation not merely of knowledge, but of awakening where each generation refines its inherited questions, inching toward a fuller, if contested, grasp of men's issues and equality.

In this interplay we see the dual helix of growth—personal and societal—twisting upward together. The Boomer's nascent feeling of unease surrounding gender roles, the Gen X rebel's defiant querying of gender issues, the Millennial's analytical map of the gender territory, and Gen Z's ironic remix form a continuum, with each stage providing an echo of the previous one as it stumbles toward enlightenment. As male awareness of discrimination rises, so too does the promise of a culture that, through recapitulation, learns to see itself anew, with its vision sharpened by the cumulative insights of those who came before.

Notes:

[1] Cultural recapitulation describes the phenomenon of successive generations incrementally building on a specific theme over a period of time—for example 200 years—distinguishing the process from biological recapitulation theories (Haeckel's ontogeny-phylogeny link). Cultural recapitulation shifts the focus from phylogeny—where an individual organism's development supposedly evolves through ancestral biological lineages—to a cultural, historical, or generational process.

The following provides a more concise description of cultural recapitulation, along with a few alternative concepts pointing to the same process:

1. Cultural Recapitulation
    - Implication: Highlights that the "recapitulation" happens in the realm of culture—ideas, practices, or themes passed down and refined across generations.
    - Differentiation: Moves away from biology to emphasize human-made progress, like art, technology, or values.
    - Example: "Cultural Recapitulation Theory suggests each generation revisits and advances the theme of communal storytelling."
2. Generational Recapitulation
    - Implication: Ties the concept explicitly to the succession of human generations, with each cohort adding its layer to the theme.
    - Differentiation: Narrows the scope to social units (generations) rather than individuals or species, avoiding Haeckel's framework.
    - Example: "Generational Recapitulation posits that over 200 years, each cohort incrementally refines the concept of individual liberty."

3. Progressive Recapitulation
    - Implication: Emphasizes forward momentum and improvement, suggesting the theme isn't just repeated but enhanced with each iteration.
    - Differentiation: Contrasts with static or cyclical notions of recapitulation, aligning with the idea of "building further."
    - Example: "Progressive Recapitulation describes how societies incrementally advance the pursuit of sustainable living."

"Cultural Recapitulation," "Generational Recapitulation," and "Progressive Recapitulation" each offers a slightly different framing for the same phenomenon; successive generations building incrementally, on a specific theme, over time and generations. The following shows how they apply:

- Cultural Recapitulation
  This frames the phenomenon as a cultural process—think of it as humanity's shared software getting iterative updates. It's broad enough to cover themes like art, philosophy, or social norms. For example, if your theme is "community resilience," you might say: "Cultural Recapitulation observes how each generation refines community practices, from early mutual aid societies in the 1800s to modern cooperative networks by 2025." It's distinct from biological recapitulation because it's about ideas, not embryos, and the idea is flexible for any cultural domain someone might want to explore.
- Generational Recapitulation
  This zooms in on the baton-passing between generations as the mechanism. It's less about the content (culture, tech, etc.) and more about the rhythm of cohorts—say, every 25 years—adding their twist. If your theme is "exploration," you could imagine: "Generational Recapitulation tracks how the Age of Sail in 1825 handed off to steamships by 1850, then flight by 1900, and space travel by 2000." It sidesteps Haeckel's theory by focusing on social units, not individuals, and keeps the spotlight on that 200-year relay.
- Progressive Recapitulation
  This one leans into the forward march—each generation doesn't just inherit a theme but pushes it to a higher level to impart a dynamic, optimistic vision. For a theme like "justice," you might frame it as: "Progressive Recapitulation shows justice evolving from basic legal codes in 1825 to universal suffrage by 1900 and global human rights by 2025." It's distinct from older recapitulation ideas by rejecting repetition for advancement, aligning with the "edged forward" concept.

Alfred North Whitehead

For those who want to think a bit more about this in terms of process philosophy, I'll leave you with a final question I posed to Grok AI, and Grok's response;

Question: "Does cultural recapitulation, as I've described it, align with Alfred North Whitehead's conceptualisation of process philosophy?

Grok: Your version of “Cultural Recapitulation”—where successive generations incrementally build on a specific theme over time—does share some intriguing parallels with Alfred North Whitehead’s process philosophy, though there are distinctions worth teasing out. Let’s explore how they align and where they diverge.

Whitehead’s process philosophy, laid out in works like Process and Reality (1929), sees reality as fundamentally dynamic, composed of events or “actual occasions” rather than static substances. Everything is in flux, with each moment inheriting from the past, adding its own creative twist, and contributing to the future. This emphasis on becoming, creativity, and the interdependence of events resonates with your Cultural Recapitulation. In your framework, each generation inherits a cultural theme (say, justice or men’s rights), reworks it through its own lens, and passes it forward—much like Whitehead’s idea of past occasions prehending (or grasping) into the present, which then shapes what’s next. The progressive, cumulative nature you describe mirrors Whitehead’s view of reality as an ongoing process of growth and novelty, not a fixed endpoint.

A key alignment is the focus on incremental advance. Whitehead saw the universe as evolving toward greater complexity and value through what he called “concrescence”—the process by which disparate elements come together into a new unity. Your Cultural Recapitulation, with generations edging a theme forward (e.g., from Bax’s legal critiques to Farrell’s broader human rights frame), echoes this: each era synthesizes what came before into something new, adding depth or scope. Whitehead’s notion of “eternal objects” (abstract potentials that get actualized in specific ways) could even map onto your “specific theme”—a persistent idea like justice manifesting differently across time yet retaining continuity.

However, there are differences. Whitehead’s philosophy is metaphysical, applying to all reality—cosmic, biological, and human—while your Cultural Recapitulation is narrower, zeroing in on human cultural development over a historical span (e.g., 200 years). Whitehead’s scope includes no final “goal” (though he nods to a divine lure toward harmony), whereas your framework implies a directional thrust—progress within a chosen theme. Also, Whitehead emphasizes the relational interplay of all events, while your model focuses more linearly on generational handoffs.

So, yes, your Cultural Recapitulation aligns with process philosophy’s spirit—its dynamism, inheritance, and creative advance—but it’s a tailored application, not a full mirror. It’s as if you’ve taken Whitehead’s broad canvas and painted a specific human story on it. [/end]

The Critical Drinker: Snow White – It’s Even Worse Than I Expected

March 23, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

The Critical Drink watched the new Snow White movie so that we don’t have to. Even ignoring the woke for a moment, it sounds like it has various story and technical problems.

The rape of the Sabine women

March 24, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

While the Roman Empire and the Roman Republic are well remembered today, less well known is the Kingdom of Rome.

Legend claims that the city of Rome was founded in 753BCE. Romulus killed Remus in an act of fratricide and went on to found the city of Rome, naming it after himself. Romulus then invited colonists to settle in his new city. A problem soon developed though. Most of the colonists were men. The Romans then hatched a plan. They would hold a festival and invite people from the neighbouring cities to attend. Then, at a pre-arranged signal, they would grab women from one of the neighbouring cities, Sabine, and then proceed to fight off the Sabine men. Somehow this bizarre plan is said to have worked.

This story, which is almost certainly entirely apocryphal, is remembered to history as the Rape of the Sabine women. Notably no women were raped. While they were briefly detained they were soon given the choice to freely marry the Roman men. The Sabine women, all but one of whom was unmarried, accepted marriage to the Romans. The story makes it clear that they had a choice to accept or reject these Roman men as their husbands.

Not surprisingly the surrounding cities declared war on Rome. Perhaps surprisingly the Sabines themselves were the last to declare war. Maybe they were debating whether they wanted the women back.

After a series of battles a Sabine army approached Rome. A young Roman woman, Tarpeia, saw an opportunity. She betrayed Rome and opened the city gates for the Sabines in return for loot. The story elaborates that Tarpeia was promised whatever the Sabines had on their wrists. She expected gold bracelets but was crushed by their shields as they poured through the city gates instead. Rough justice.

The Romans and Sabines then fought a pitched battle in the city. Suddenly the Sabine women rushed in to the middle of the fray. On one side were their husbands, on the other their fathers. They called on both sides to lay down their arms as they were now family. Peace was achieved. Men met their fathers-in-law for the first time. The story concludes by telling us that the Sabines joined with the Romans, becoming one nation. Thus, according to legend, this was the beginning of Rome.

We can learn a lot about a society from their legends. Even Roman commentator Titus Livius, better known as Livy, made it clear that no sexual assault took place and that the women were free to choose if they wanted to marry the Roman men. While this may seem like a modern concern, Livy made this point 2000 years ago.

The feminist historical narrative would have us believe that women were oppressed by The Patriarchy and are only now escaping its clutches. Even a story with a title as provocative as this reveals a more complex past. Twice in the story women act in a decisive manner to change events. Tarpeia opens the gates, nearly handing the battle to the Sabines. The Sabine women then intercede and stop the fight between their husbands and fathers. The women in this story had agency – a clear indication that this was how Roman society viewed women.

Compared to its contemporary societies ancient Rome had comparatively few women in public life, exerting direct authority. This sort of authority is sometimes called hard power. Roman women though were fully capable of exerting soft power. As wives and daughters, aristocratic women had the ear of powerful men. History is replete with examples of powerful men acting on advice from women close to them. Although their actions were not completely without risk, women historically exerting soft power generally experienced fewer direct threats to their health and safety. The actions of the Sabine women in stopping the battle is a good example of the effectiveness of soft power.

Feminists claim that ancient Rome was a Patriarchy. In the original sense of the word, in which father's ruled families, this is true. In the sense that feminists mean, in which men systematically oppress women, then it is very clearly not true. Feminism benefits from confusion between these two different meanings of the word Patriarchy.

If ancient Rome was a Patriarchy, in the sense that feminists mean, then neither the Roman not Sabine men would have paid any heed to a bunch of wailing women. Rather, then as now, the men wanted to keep their wives and daughters safe and happy and took their opinions in to account.

Ancient people lived lives far more similar to ours than is generally recognised. Many ancient societies though had better gender relations than we have today in the West. They understood gender differences and gender similarities – information that today has largely been forgotten.

The featured image depicts the painting 'The Intervention of the Sabine Women', by Jacques-Louis David, 1799.

Proof positive that feminists don’t care about women

March 28, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

There is a medical condition that is easily corrected, is debilitating if not corrected, is generally cheap to correct, and only affects women. It is a huge problem in the developing world, currently thought to affect over two million women.[1]

Many developing countries lack the infrastructure to correct this condition among the many women who are impacted. Despite being easily and cheaply corrected, many of the women who live in these countries can’t afford to pay for the operation to correct this condition.

The condition is known as an obstetric fistula. It normally occurs as a result of complications in giving birth and results in a tear between the vagina and the bladder or the vagina and the rectum. This results in urine or feces being discharged by the woman through the vagina. Women afflicted by this condition are unfortunately often ostracised by their communities. Even those that are not excluded from their communities are effectively housebound due the nature of the condition. Naturally this can result in a variety of mental and physical ailments.

In contrast, women in wealthy countries rarely have to concern themselves. Although very rare, obstetric fistulas still happen occasionally as a result of birth complications in wealthy countries but they are normally fixed quickly after the birth with a small operation.

The cost to correct an obstetric fistula is estimated to be around US$100-400 per patient in the developing world.[2]

That’s a tiny price to pay to give someone their life back. So here we have a condition that:

- Is easily corrected
- Is debilitating if not corrected
- Is generally cheap to correct
- Only affects women

Given these characteristics it would be an ideal issue for western feminists to focus on. They could raise money for their sisters in the developing world, allowing hospitals and the medical clinics to buy the equipment and medicines they need and train staff so that they could work on fixing this serious problem today and in to the future.

But that hardly happens. Hospitals and clinics in the developing world are devoid of resources and have a shortage of staff trained to deal with this problem.

Feminists, as it turns out, do very little to help correct this problem.

There are clinics that specialise in this condition of course. One notable clinic in Ethiopia, the Addis Ababa Fistula Hospital was started decades ago by two physicians, a husband and wife team from New Zealand and Australia respectively, and continues to function today.[4] It continues to function with a shortage of resources to address this problem. Where are the feminists?

The fact that obstetric fistulas are a common and well known problem among the medical fraternity around the world means that feminists cannot explain their inaction through ignorance. There are many feminist doctors who would know of this condition and who could make the problem known among the wider feminist community. In any case, feminists do occasionally talk about the topic.[5] Apparently this doesn't extend to actually doing much about it.

They even occasionally mention organisations like the Fistula Foundation that do work to correct this problem.[6][7] The response from feminists, though, seems to be mild disinterest at best.

An operation to easily and cheaply correct this condition has been available for decades and yet we hear little from the feminists.

If feminists focussed on this serious issue rather than telling us all about mansplaining, manspreading and manslamming they might actually help some women who are in desperate need.

The lackadaisical approach of feminists to the problem of obstetric fistulas is proof positive that feminists don't care about women.

- ↑ http://www.ncbi.nlm.nih.gov/pmc/articles/PMC2621054/
- ↑ http://www.biomedcentral.com/1471-2490/11/23
- ↑ http://hamlinfistula.org/
- ↑ http://www.motherjones.com/mojo/2007/12/what-now-feminist-fatigue-and-global-quest-womens-rights
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/
- ↑ https://radicalhubarchives.wordpress.com/2011/05/27/the-fistula-foundation/

The Goal Post Episode 55 – Pierre Curie and Henri Becquerel

March 31, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The one good man

April 1, 2025 | by Alison Tieman (Typhonblue) | Link | Original Link

---

The One Good Man sees in Woman what men lack. Woman is bright and charming and good. Men are dark and sinister and bad.

To maintain the image of Woman as bright and charming and good, the One Good Man swallows Her darkness. Her rages, Her excesses, Her cruelties are his responsibility, not Hers. All Her goodness is not chosen because She is helpless in Her goodness—as She is helpless in Her femininity. But because it is not chosen, it is not goodness and it feeds nothing in the One Good Man.

Without shadow there is no depth.

He craves dimension and he receives only bright, charming images as thin as a whisper. To compensate he tries to capture as many as he can, but they flit through his fingers like sunlight and his hunger grows.

He needs a Harem.

The politician signs into law one-sided advocacy that ignores the pain of men to help women: Domestic Violence, Rape, Sexual Harrassment, it doesn't matter. He sees it all as an avenue to destroy his competitors and win an adoring harem, even if it's only the myth of himself in his own mind. He is the One Good Man, good because of his influence, which he uses to advance women.

The family judge eviscerates his rival—a father and husband—and in the woman's approval he sees another adoring harem member. He knows that her husband has failed her otherwise why would she be here before him? But he won't fail her. He is the One Good Man, good because of his power, which he uses to benefit women.

The priest condemns the imperfect morality of his flock's husbands and in their admiration he sees a harem. He knows the church women are there to hear his words and uses them to throw petty sins of their husbands into high relief. He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his morality, which he uses to lionize women.

The petty bully brutalizes a smaller boy, cheered on by girls. The girls have a grievance; the boy presumed to ask one of them out, or maybe he was staring at her breasts too long? He won't fail them. He is the One Good Man, good because of his strength, which he uses to avenge women.

The One Good Man sees all other men as feckless, immoral, weak, beneath him. The One Good Man is good because he knows he is the only good man. He is special. He regales of stories of his goodness, all with the same refrain: "I have used my strengths to woman's service, I have crushed men so that women may walk upon them." And thus he is deserving of the admiration and approval of many women. He has a Harem. But that is not enough.

The One Good Man has enemies.

The One Good Man hates the Hungry Man because they are the same man. The Hungry Man hungers for women's bodies; The One Good Man hungers for their approval. The Hungry Man says, "women's only use is their sex." And the One Good Man disagrees because a woman's only use is their approval. That's why the One Good Man cannot allow himself to see Woman's shadow; because if he did, she might not approve.

Hungry Man and One Good Man are the same man, but they will never admit it. Hungry Man says he does not care for women's approval, yet he needs it to access her sex; One Good Man says he does not care for a woman's sex, but it's her sex that makes her approval worth so much.

Both the Hungry Man and the One Good Man fear the Bad Man, perhaps better called the Broken Man, for he is the Hungry Man having fed too little and the One Good Man having swallowed too much.

The Bad Man says "look, Woman has a shadow! A shadow that She casts, not me! Every shadow is Hers!"

The One Good Man hates the Bad Man's words; he points to an obvious flaw: "Some of those shadows are cast by you!" and dismisses the greater truth.

The One Good Man has a final enemy; and this one is most insidious of all because he is part of the One Good Man, the Hungry Man and the Bad Man.

He is just a man. Not a bad man, not a good man, not a "real man" or a fake man, not a strong man or a powerful man or an aggressive man or a useful man or a useless man. Just a man. A man who sees that words like good, strong, bad, real, fake, powerful, useless and useful are just words the One Good Man uses to divide himself from other men, to make himself special and thus worthy of his Harem.

The man, just a man, sees a woman as just a woman. She is made of light, and shadow in equal measure to the light, and so she has depth and form and substance. When she hurts him he says "you have hurt me. You take responsibility for it. I will not take responsibility for having been hurt." And if she does, he stays, because she feeds him.

With shadow, there is depth.

He does not need a Harem. And so he does not need to hate or hurt other men to have a Harem.

He is not the One Good Man. The Bad Man or the Hungry Man.

He is a man, just a man.

A strange sort of Patriarchy

April 3, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

While feminists have claimed for decades that female rulers are more peaceful, research has turned this on its head. A study conducted by researchers at the University of Chicago and McGill University found that Queens Regnant (Queens that ruled in their own right) were more likely to start wars and to continue the wars of their predecessors. Notably another study conducted at the University of Chicago found that the link between female leaders and armed conflict continues to the present time.

It is now almost universally accepted in western countries that all societies prior to the modern age were patriarchies. It is also often believed, by both men and women, that modern western countries are still patriarchies. This may seem like a reasonable presumption on the surface, after all, men did run all societies in the past didn't they? Not so much. Even a cursory review of history shows that this wasn't true. Female rulers were, in fact, common in many societies. Regarding these societies as patriarchies is, at best, a gross over-simplification. In reality, societies have generally constrained both men and women, forcing them into certain roles to serve the society itself.

A worked example can be found in the British Isles during the 16th century. Queen Elizabeth ruled for what amounts to the second half of the 16th century. She was no figurehead either. She was the absolute ruler of England and Ireland (Britain would not arise as a state until generations later).

While it is true that the English practiced Male-preference primogeniture (preferencing inheritance by the firstborn son over other sons and all daughters) this did not stop many women inheriting and retaining thrones in their own right around this time.

Elizabeth I is well known throughout the English speaking world and is generally remembered as an effective leader who reformed the English state and built up a strong navy in the face of external military threats. Others show that while the early years of her reign were generally prosperous this was not so later on. What all of these sources agree on was that Elizabeth was the queen in her own right. The decisions made were made by her. It should be clear from this that she was the leader of the English and Irish states. She was no figurehead.

What is generally not as well known is that there were several contemporary female monarchs in the British Isles. Immediately proceeding Elizabeth I as Queen of England and Ireland was Queen Mary I, her half-sister. Queen Mary I is also known as Bloody Mary as she had a habit of ordering the death of her subjects (usually by burning at the stake) when they didn't agree with her religious views. Mary I didn't reign for long (thankfully, given her penchant for violence) but was every bit as much in charge of England and Ireland as Elizabeth would be after her. Each effectively changed the national religion (Christian denomination) while reigning.

It is worth noting that Mary I's main competition for control of England and Ireland was another woman – Lady Jane Grey. In the end, Mary made sure that Jane's head ended up rolling around in a basket rather than wearing a crown.

When Mary I married the terms of the marriage contract made her and her foreign husband joint rulers of England. He could not act without her consent. It is clear that the English nobility trusted an English woman to rule more than a foreign man. Nationality trumps gender. When Mary died in 1558 the crown did not remain with her foreign husband but rather went to her English half-sister Elizabeth I. Patriarchy indeed.

To the north of England was Scotland, which was ruled by a Queen Regnant from 1542 to 1567. She is generally known as Mary Queen of Scots in English, probably to distinguish her from Mary I who was her contemporary. Her rule of Scotland overlaps that of both Mary I and Elizabeth I. The entirety of the British Isles was ruled over by female monarchs from 1553 to 1567. This period would likely have gone on much longer except that Elizabeth imprisoned and eventually executed Mary Queen of Scots after she fled south seeking Elizabeth's protection. That's right – Elizabeth imprisoned and then executed one of her own relatives who had sought her protection. That's a class act. Elizabeth apparently viewed Mary Queen of Scots as a potential rival since Mary was a close relative – first cousin, once removed. Mary Queen of Scots was fleeing south to England as she was suspected, then and now, of being a tacit accomplice in the brutal murder of her second husband.

Mary Queen of Scots was an absentee monarch during her early life, having spent her youth in France. Scotland was left in the hands of another woman, her mother, Mary of Guise.

So during this period, we had Lady Jane Grey, Mary I, Elizabeth I and Mary Queen of Scots vying for power across the British Isles. It should be clear that this was no patriarchy. These women were no one's puppets – those that were successful ruled over England, Scotland and Ireland as ruthlessly and authoritatively as any male ruler. They also demonstrated that they were quite prepared to order the torture and execution of their enemies or those they perceived as enemies. These historical events and others that occurred in many other parts of the world throughout history demonstrate that these women were not helpless pawns of The Patriarchy. They were powerful monarchs and in a very real sense, they were the law in their respective countries.

Patriarchy means literally rule by fathers but it is generally intended to mean rule by men. Such a society, one in which rule was mandated by men, would not permit female rulers. Women would simply not find their way into positions of power. Even a cursory view of history reveals that female rulers feature across a wide variety of societies and eras. While many rulers were women, it is men, and it has always been men, that have borne the brunt of armed conflict. These so-called patriarchies would dispose of men in wartime and peacetime. As research has shown, when executive authority is held by women we ultimately find more men dying in battle.

Men should be paid for their erection labor

April 7, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

You probably understand that construction workers are hard workers. But do you realize that many men are continually engaged in erection labor? Women have no idea how draining men's natural reproductive functioning can be.

Men's reproductive labor is less visible and less appreciated than women's reproductive labor. The raucous medieval French text Les Quinze joyes de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) explored the issue:

> Now it's quite true that a woman is sorely beset for so long as she's pregnant or bearing children, and that during childbirth she suffers untold grief and pain. But all this is nothing compared to the travail a reasonable man must endure when pondering any of his important undertakings. And as for the discomfort of pregnancy or childbirth, it impresses me not a bit more than that of a hen or goose laying an egg as big as my fist, and this through a hole too small for my pinkie just a moment before. One process is just as great as the other in Nature's scheme.

In pioneering comparative ethological analysis embracing humans and chickens, Les Quinze joyes de mariage reasoned:

> Thus you'll see the hen remains plumper than the cock, despite the fact that she lays daily; for the rooster is so stupid, he spends the whole day scratching for food to bill-feed his mate, while her sole concerns are eating, gabbling, and resting easy. And the same holds true for good, respectable husbands, I say it to their credit.

Adjusting for hours worked and years of job experience, women working the same jobs as men earn about the same pay. But women and men make significantly different job choices. Men have more dangerous, dirty, unpleasant jobs. That why about eleven times more men than women die from occupational fatalities. Moreover, women control 80% of consumer spending. Spending money is more enjoyable than earning it. Men who work longer hours for more years in more dangerous, unpleasant jobs so that women can spend more money are stupid.

But those economic issues are trivial compared to the physiological burden of a normal, healthy man's frequent, large erections. Women cannot imagine a man's labor in producing a massive erection. It's like rapidly donating several quarts of blood. Can you imagine rapidly donating several quarts of blood every ten or fifteen minutes throughout the day? And not just for nine months, but for twelve months a year, year after year. That's what it's like to be a man.

Men deserve to be paid for the biological burden of being a man. Men deserve to be paid for their erection labor. The simplest policy would be an erection tax credit. Modern smart watches with bio-sensing could easily generate documentation for erection tax credit claims. Men's smart watches could automatically detect their erection labor, estimate the magnitude of the blood flow, and wirelessly report the event to a central IRS erection tax credit claim database. The erection tax credit could be automatically applied to men's tax returns. The ability of impotent men to engage in erection tax credit fraud would be minimal with modern bio-sensing and centralized database technology.

Men naturally engage in erection labor. But men shouldn't be exploited just because of the way their bodies naturally function. Men deserve to be paid for their erection labor.

Notes:

The above quotes are from Les Quinze joyes de mariage, Seventh Joy, from Old French trans. Pitts (1985) pp. 67-8. Les Quinze joyes de mariage is thought to have been written about the year 1400.

This article is under the CC-BY-SA 3.0 unported licence. The original article can be found here.

The cover image is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons and is licenced under CC-BY-SA 4.0.

Evolutionary analysis devalues men relative to women

April 9, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Misunderstanding of anisogamy and anti-men bigotry in evolutionary psychology support the devaluation of men's lives relative to women's lives. The psychology of devaluing men's lives doesn't depend on failures in modern evolutionary thought. The medieval evolutionary analysis also devalued men.

Consider a widely disseminated medieval story of a king and his wife. They discovered under the wall of their castle two snakes, one female and one male. The king interrogated his wise men about the significance of those snakes. The wise men declared that if the male snake were killed, a man would die. If the female snake were killed, a woman would die. The king then displayed his false consciousness about men's subordinate class status:

> "If this is so," said the king, "kill the male snake, and let the female snake live. A man ought to be more willing to die himself than to permit the death of his wife." He gave the reason for this: "If my wife lives, she may bring forth many sons who may succeed to my throne. But if she should die, the kingdom would lack an heir."

That's faulty reasoning. If the king died, a new ruler would be promptly selected. That wouldn't necessarily be the king's widow. If another man were named king, children that the king's widow had with another man probably wouldn't have a good claim to the throne. If on the other hand, the king's wife died, the king could just remarry. Sons that the king had with another wife would be heirs to the throne. The king's decision and reason reflect the rule and rationalization of gynocentrism.

From reporting on the Costa Concordia's sinking to the United Nations' biased index of gender equality in expected lifespans, men's lives are devalued relative to women's lives. Efforts over the past four decades to promote gender equality have largely promoted lies and anti-men gender bigotry. Let's get serious about valuing equally women's and men's lives.

* * * * *

Notes:

The above quote is from Gesta Romanorum, Tale 92, from Latin trans. Swan & Hooper (1876) p. 165. The tale's application explains:

> My beloved, the King is Christ, and the wife, our human nature, for which He gave himself to death.

That application summarizes one-half of Ephesians 5:22-9.

[image] Intertwined snakes medical symbol, cropped. Thanks to Pixabay for Public Domain image.

Reference:

Swan, Charles, and Wynnard Hooper, trans. 1876. Gesta romanorum: entertaining moral stories. New York: Dover Publications Inc. (reprint edition of 1969).

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The cover image depicts King Charles I, who's execution ultimately changed nothing in his country.

A brief history of nagging

April 12, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

I recently mentioned to a friend that feminist verbiage amounts to little more than organized female nagging — the endless attempt to shame & guilt men into serving women. Is it any wonder that feminist street placards emphasise "having a voice," "women speaking up," "not being silenced," and "speaking out"? These phrases are nothing more than euphemisms for the ear piercing, fingernails-on-blackboard nagging that women have never gone without. Sadly, the days of being able to deal with nagging by use the following device are long gone:

Scold's bridle – historical device providing the nagging woman with some therapeutic time out

So universal is the archetype of the nagging woman that I visited Amazon in the certainty that someone would have written a book titled "The History Of Female Nagging," but to my surprise found there was none.

I guess its like other universals such as 'everyone has a buttocks,' – so blatantly obvious that no book is necessary. That said, I still wanted to dig deeper into the topic and so decided to check an online etymology dictionary, which reads as follows:

> nag (v.)
> 1828, intransitive, "find fault constantly;" by 1840, intransitive, "annoy by continued scolding, pester with petty complaints," originally a dialectal word meaning "to gnaw" (1825, Halliwell), probably ultimately from a Scandinavian source (compare Old Norse gnaga "to complain," literally "to bite, gnaw," dialectal Swedish and Norwegian nagga "to gnaw"), from Proto-Germanic gnagan*, related to Old English gnagan "to gnaw" (see gnaw). As a noun, 1894, "act of nagging;" by 1925, "person who nags."
> Related: Nagged; nagger; nagging.[1]

What struck me here was the association of nagging with acts of biting and gnawing, which is exactly what feels like is happening to your soul when being nagged, as any man or child will confirm. In this respect it reminds of the mythical eagle gnawing at the liver of Prometheus, only to have it happen again the very next day in an endless round of torture.

Considering the longevity and ubiquity of female nagging, and considering also that gynocentrism and feminism are collective nagathons, I think the future looks bleak in terms of a breakthrough for men. Our modern world has successfully institutionalized nagging at the highest levels – from the United Nations to national governments, and all the way down to schools.

This leads to the disturbing definition of feminism as "Institutionalized female nagging."

Let the naggers chew on that definition for a while.

Perhaps we can put a positive spin on it and say that the drip, drip, drip of female nagging, from bassinet to coffin, has a toughening effect on men, bringing out the best of stoic resistance and emotional control that men are famed for. At least when its not driving men to die early, or to suicide at four times the rate of women.

Having got the gist of what I already knew about nagging, I searched the internet a bit further and noticed the following blog article, which is relegated to Creative Commons. It digs a bit deeper into the topic, so I repost the following excerpts for your interest:

A brief history of nagging

The nagging wife is the universal villain of married life. From the earliest pages of human history there is perhaps no literature and folk tradition where the character of the nagging wife is not found widely. Along with archetypes of the sacrificing mother, forsaken lover, tragic hero and evil lord, the nagging wife will be found in all societies and cultures at all times in history. Even in today's world, irrespective of the differences of race, wealth, religion, culture, language and social reform, the character of the nagging wife is universal. She keeps popping up in jokes, films, songs, novels and other cultural cultural creations.

Socrates, the famous Greek philosopher, is supposed to have had a nagging wife who drove him to spend his time in the city squares and gymnasia, much to the benefit of philosophy. The figure of the nagging wife finds mention in the Bible, (indirectly) in the Quran, and is a crucial moment in the story of the Ramayana. She is to be found in renassaince Italy, in medieval England, on the expanding border of America's "wild west", in the bedrooms of colonial India and in the sit-coms of post-modern Europe.

What is interesting about this figure of the nagging wife is that it is one of those few characters who transcend history. Like the sacrificing mother, the unrequited lover or the tragic hero, the nagging wife can be found in ancient, slave owning agricultural societies, in prosperous trading medieval ones and in post-industrial wastelands of contemporary West. What is it about the nagging wife which makes this character so universal and transcendental?

***

It is not only the wife who deploys this weapon of the weak. Children use it to excellent effect. In that context (parent – child) it is not generally called nagging but rather 'pestering'. It too emerges from a similar context of powerlessness of children within the family, where the only way for them to get their point across is to 'pester' their parents till they accept defeat. Today, the power of children to pester their parents into taking decisions is an important weapon in the arsenal of advertisers who use "pester-power" to sell everything from groceries to cars.

In the contemporary world, many families have moved out of the context under which nagging by wives exists. Women own property, often they are in positions of power and are effective decision makers. Nagging does not automatically end in these contexts, just like it does not automatically exist in all patriarchal families. Today nagging is not necessarily confined to the patriarchal family and has been, in a sense, freed from the context of the patriarchal family under which it originated and survived. It has become a cultural archetype which women (and men) absorb into their personalities in the process of socialisation. Where it exists outside the immediate context of the patriarchal family, it exists only as a weapon of offence and not as a survival skill of the weak wife and it "forges its own chains" for those who deploy it in inter-personal relations. The question arises, are we courageous enough to surrender this weapon? [2]

References:

[1] Nag, in Online Etymology Dictionary.

[2] Aniket Alam, A brief history of nagging, Creative Commons(2008)

See Also: The Henpecked Club

Sex and The Patriarchy

April 13, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Thanks to decades of feminist misinformation the term conjugal rights is today most often associated with marital rape. The truth, as is often the case, is more complex than feminists would have us believe.

The Merriam-Webster dictionary defines conjugal rights as:

> : the sexual rights or privileges implied by and involved in the marriage relationship
> : the right of sexual intercourse between husband and wife

While the Cambridge dictionary defines it as:

> the right to have sex with the person you are married to.

Both definitions are gender neutral, which is notable considering the association the term carries today of men forcing themselves on women.

Conjugal rights exist in both the ancient concept of marriage as well as the modern concept of marriage. Feminist ideologues and others have encouraged confusion in the concept of a person's right to sex in marriage. In the modern Western context, a married person does not have a right to sex with their spouse at a particular time but they continue to have a right to sex in their marriage. Many societies recognised the concept of annullment for a marriage that was not consummated. This concept is distinct from divorce as an annulled marriage is taken to have never occurred. Even today many jurisdictions retain the option to annul a marriage that has not been consummated.

When a couple marry, even today, there is a presumption that each will have sex with the other. The exception is a chaste marriage agreed ahead of time. While rare, marriages like this exist today as they have historically. The Shakers are an offshoot of the better known Quaker religious movement. Shakers require adherents to have chaste marriages. This means that they can only expand their community through converts. Not surprisingly requiring adherents to have chaste marriages makes recruiting difficult and today there are few Shakers remaining. Most people who marry want to have sex, at least initially.

It is true that until recently men could not be charged with raping their wives in Common Law. Feminists often claim this meant that men had a right to force himself on his wife. This ignores the fact that men who were violent to their wives were often charged.

The feminist notion of The Patriarchy is, at best, a gross over-simplification of societies today and in the past. But we shouldn't give all adherents to this idea the benefit of the doubt. In many cases claims about The Patriarchy are just a bunch of lies. Discrediting The Patriarchy is outside the scope of this article but is covered well by existing and planned works.

Conjugal rights vary across religions. In Judaism wives have a right to sex with their husbands but husbands do not have a right to sex with their wives. The Talmud even defines the frequency of the husband's sexual obligations based on his occupation:

> Men of leisure, who do not work, must engage in marital relations every day, laborers must do so twice a week, donkey drivers once a week, camel drivers once every thirty days, and sailors once every six months.

In Christianity both men and women have a right to sex in marriage. The same is true in Islam. Further, Islam grants to women a right to sexual satisfaction beyond merely experiencing intercourse.

The three major Abrahamic religions all grant women a right to sex in marriage and one of them doesn't even grant that right to men. Contrast this to the nonsense that feminists spew about the state of women's lives historically. The feminist historical narrative is so pervasive that even many anti-feminists buy into it, but this will change.

The cover image depicts the Cave of the Patriarchs, Hebron. The Cave is the Secret Headquarters of The Global Patriarchy.

The Tradwife Revisited

April 15, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Having touched briefly on tradwives in the past, I though it was time to pen some matured thoughts on the subject – in particular the thought that there are actually two very different models of the tradwife.

The oldest, best, but apparently least appreciated kind of tradwife is the one who brings value to the table for men looking to pairbond or start a family with a woman – I'll refer to her loosely as Tradwife-1. The other more popular conceptualization of a tradwife amounts to a shallow and performative grifter who spies an easy ride on some poor man's goodwill and labor, whom I'll refer to as Tradwife-2.

Tradwife-1 mirrors a pre Victorian-era model consisting of non-gynocentric forms of traditionalism. It advocates a mixture of separate gender roles mixed in with a significant amount of role-sharing as might have been seen on a traditional farm, homestead or 'cottage industry' of pre-industrialized Britain or United States. This model assumes a commensurate valuing, interpersonal devotion, and labor contribution from both husband and wife.

Tradwife-2 is different, and aligns more with the post Victorian-era model of family. She is promoted by advocates of a traditional gynocentrism which reached its apogee in the 1950's housewife, and her needs, wants and comforts are generally prioritized over those of her husband. In this model, men and women are called to adhere to strict gender roles with husband functioning as symbolic 'head of household' who protects the wife and labors to earn all the money, while she makes babies, apple pies, keeps the house clean.

The model for the tradwife-2 is what many people refer to as the 'two-spheres doctrine' in which men and women are apportioned sovereignty over different realms – he over the political and labor realms, and she over the domestic and social realms. For the red pilled audience, this version of the tradwife sometimes appears as a parasite in an apron while contributing very little to the relationship, especially in the era of electrification and white goods.

Pre Victorian-Era Tradwife

Post Victorian-Era Tradwife

These two tradwives are the traditional alternatives to feminist-inspired relationships. For men who can't see value in older models, however, and who gravitate toward what Warren Farrell calls a "gender transition movement," there's a newer kind of a female companion we will refer to as the modwife.

Modwives

Farrell's proposed gender transition movement, and implied concept of a modwife, refers to greater role-sharing among men and women than has traditionally been the case. Farrell proposes, for example, that women may wish to contribute more labor and more income so that "neither sex is expected to pay more than half the income,"[1] and that men may wish to spend more time with family so that "both sexes raise the children." He states,

> "Taking what had worked for most women traditionally and seeing it as a plot against them led us to see men as "owing" women. This created Stage II entitlement: women being entitled to compensation for past oppression. This prevented us from seeing the need to make a transition from Stage I to Stage II together : the need not for a women's movement or a men's movement, but for a gender transition movement."[1]

He further adds,

> "A gender transition movement will be the longest of all movements because it is not proposing merely to integrate blacks or Latinos into a system that already exists; rather, it is proposing an evolutionary shift in the system itself—an end to "woman-the-protected" and "man-the-protector."[2]

Farrell's proposed transition movement involves stages of a grand historical process, which are simplified as follows:

1. Historically men and women adhered to strict gender roles for the sake of survival.
2. Women chose to "liberate" themselves from their role to gain more freedom.
3. Men have responded to women's "liberation" by proposing they too might be liberated from some traditional gender roles.
4. Ideally this unfolding process can culminate in a gender liberation movement for both sexes.[1]

By this process modwives are born, whom I've referred to elsewhere as women who have embraced multi-option lives over more traditional roles, and who accept or encourage multi-option lives for their male partners. While containing the word 'wife,' the term modwife applies equally to non-married women who follow the principles being outlined here… so there's no need to worry, men; this is not a Petersonian advert for marriage.

'Modwife' was coined as an alternative to the popular trend in tradwives outlined above. Both the tradwife and modwife eschew feminist prescriptions for relationships because they are geared toward female domination of men and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor, value and devotion. A distaste for feminism, however, is where the similarities between tradwife and modwife end.

Philosophical outlook of the modwife

The unlikelihood that modern women will embrace 'Tradwife' roles of yesteryear with genuine commitment underpins attraction to the modwife option. Thus for best-case scenario, today's multi-option women can invite their men to do same – to embrace multi-option lives. The modwife's modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her.

Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women's 'liberation' while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty and agreed economic contributions for both men and women in relationships — some of them will be recognized among the supporters of the men's rights movement.

That libetarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements, and negotiated economic contributions to the relationship.

Is this a rare stance among women? Absolutely yes, but they may exist for the man who is discerning, patient, and willing to hold fast to his values.

To summarize, the more shallow version of the tradwife is gaining popularity among traditional conservatives who have little appreciation for, nor awareness of the older, pre-Victorian models for same. Alternatively we have the shaky concept of the modwife touched on by Farrell, myself and others which may be a viable alternative but such women are currently as rare as spotting a unicorn in the forest. These templates offer ways of navigating the available relationship territory, and as always the choice to explore them, or abstain completely remains yours.

References:

[1] Warren Farrell, The Myth of Male Power

[2] Warren Farrell, 'Toward A Gender Transition Movement,' in Does Feminism Discriminate Against Men?

Anti-Gynocentrism is the Only Anti-Feminism That Matters

April 17, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Men's Rights Advocates have often watched with bemusement as newcomers arrive declaring support for men, with a resume saying just one thing: "I'm an antifeminist," as if that were all we needed to know.

Because antifeminism and men's rights activism is synonymous, right? That's literally what they assume.

With the resume tabled they quickly move to promote a gynocentric tradition that gushes about males saving women from floods, fires, bullets, or sparing them from minor inconveniences in life – like discomfort, dirt, criticism or employment. Feminine women, they say, are best preserved as home-makers; each woman as precious as the fingers of a concert pianist which must never be put under strain. Men, they say, are heroes, put on this earth to lift heavy things as Jordan Peterson would say, and lift them specifically for the fragile, and of course pregnant, womenfolk.

"Life back then was as close as we can get to perfect" they foam, "it was an arrangement that saw feminine women give compliments to men for ongoing sacrifices — an arrangement far superior to the feminist approach which goes out of its way to denigrate men while expecting those very same sacrifices to continue."

It is superior because massaging a man's ego in exchange for expected sacrifice is somehow less denigrating than saying, as the feminists do, "we hate you." But is such gratitude really better when both feminist and traditionalist women continue to expect male servitude – when they both reduce men to the role of 'do things for me'?

That is the essence of the deal: a little ego-stroking in exchange for a man destroying himself. She inflates his ego like a helium balloon, at least in the area of saving, serving and pedestalizing her, and he signs up for a smorgasbord of self-destructive sacrifices and an earlier death.

We could be forgiven for interpreting the traditionalist woman's complimenting of male sacrifice as superficial gushing, offered up with all the sincerity of a Miss World candidate saying she wants to bring about world peace, while watching the corpses pile up around her.

That appears to be the gynocentric tradition that most anti-feminists are peddling, the one they would substitute in place of feminist models. Here I should add that not all traditionalists are like that – at least not for the tiny minority of red pill men and women who seek to preserve the otherwise valuable, non-gynocentric aspects of tradition.

Some readers might protest that we should be grateful for those charging forward to destroy progressive gynocentrism (feminism) in order to substitute traditional gynocentrism in its place. But for this old timer that program reads like a rejection of Judas, in order to take sides with Iscariot.

I'm sure you all get the point.

As Paul Elam once summarized, 'anti-gynocentrism is the only anti-feminism that matters.'

Compare the traditional gynocentrist as described above with women who are neither feminist nor traditional gynocentrist; women like Janice Fiamengo, Suzanne McCarley, Elizabeth Hobson, Alison Tieman, Hanna Wallen and countless others who are as quick to question the unbalanced privileges of traditional women as they are the privileges held by feminists. The difference in perspective between these two kinds of women couldn't be more stark.

The rest unfortunately are frauds, women masquerading as allies while inviting men to adopt a women-serving scam with the bait of a 1950s smock and a demure look, women who are today unwilling to match men with reciprocal gestures or labor, nor the shouldering of life's stresses. When traditional gynocentric women are featured in media interviews, gushing praise for the usefulness of "masculinity" and "real men" who save women from house fires, one can't help but notice there's an absence of discussion of what's in it for the men, as if its not a relevant concern.

Perhaps praising is a form of respect for men, but respect for what? On face value it looks like that of a narcissist who "respects" others as food to satisfy his/her impersonal gluttony for special treatment.

Perhaps I could be more generous and say that rather than trying to enslave men, the I'm-Not-A-Feminist Gynocentrists are simply behind the times, believing that they are championing the lesser of the only two evils on offer. They view it as the lesser of the two evils because, under traditional gynocentrism, men were at least complimented for their labor, and given medals after their deaths – a thing denied under the feminist vision which sees men and women as competitors for narcissistic turf in which only women receive compliments. Not men, but women alone are the 'Stunning and the Brave.'

Sadly, the traditional contract under which that situation worked, the one that limited men's and women's options in favor of narrow set roles, can no longer work in a culture that refuses to encourage and support that same contract. Wave after wave of feminist activity has seen the toothpaste squeezed completely out of the tube. Women will never go back to the "role" of baby-making, apple-pie cooking wives, because any attempt to reduce women's "multi-option" life will be met with resentment, if not interpreted as abuse. Therefore any attempts to enact that traditional role today will amount to little more than cosplay.

Swapping progressive gynocentrism for traditional gynocentrism is going nowhere. We can no more turn back the clock on 'Women's Liberation' than we should ignore the fact that's Men's Liberation now is due – men who no longer need to be tied to the traditionalist role of He-for-She.

Before bringing this article to a close I want to come back to the question of what, if anything, is the value of anti-feminism for the men's rights movement. To that, two of the more obvious answers come to mind.

Firstly, antifeminist work pushes back against efforts to create more He-For-She demands, e.g. for men's supposed responsibility to stop partner violence; for men's responsibility to address the 'wage gap'; for men to assist in promoting affirmative action policies; to do more household chores; for taking up too much female space on public transport, or for not setting the office air conditioning to women's desired temperature. These and many more 'patrarchy-do' lists amount to little more than collective female nagging, which anti-feminists are helping to call out in the public domain.

Secondly, anti-feminists fight the widespread censorship of men's issues by feminists. The problem of feminist-driven deplatforming and censorship was even apparent in Ernest B. Baxs' day, which he described in the year 1913; "[Feminists] seek to stop the spread of the unpleasant truth so dangerous to their cause. The pressure put upon publishers and editors by the influential Feminist sisterhood is well known." In response there has always existed people within the MRM who push back against feminist-driven censorship of men's issues, and indeed censorship from other sources, and this needs to continue with full force.

To put these two concerns in context, pushing back against feminist demands on men, and feminist censorship, have never been the only goal of the men's movement despite claims by some that the MRM is synonymous with 'antifeminist backlash.' To suggest equivalence is to confuse purely antifeminist movements with the much broader portfolio of the men's human rights movement.

A survey of the last 100 years reveals that the MRM is concerned more directly with issues impacting men and boys such as alimony, genital mutilation of male infants, homelessness, mental illness, false accusations, family court bias, suicide, child custody, low funding for male health issues, legal discrimination, educational performance, and misandry in mainstream culture just to name a few. And just as important, a pressing issue today is fostering of more life choices for men: Its time for men to embrace whatever options exist beyond the narrowly prescribed role of serving women – just as women long ago rejected narrow roles and responsibilities toward men.

The time for the multi-option man is now.

Bird watching

April 19, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

I used to go bird watching when I was young but I haven't done it in a long time. I was thinking of getting back in to it. I thought I'd just discuss some of the birds I've watched over the years as some of you might like to take it up too. It can be a very rewarding hobby.

I love watching tits through binoculars while hiding in the woods. There aren't any tits where I live in Australia, though. I've only been able to see tits when travelling overseas. I think the tits in mainland Europe look great.

In contrast you can find boobies in Australia, but only on the coast. Over the years I've whiled away many hours sitting on the beach watching boobies.

Like myself I know a lot of you will enjoy watching a screamer but you'll generally have to go to South America to see them in the wild.

Some people like looking at cocks but that was never for me. While I've always left the cocks alone I never had a problem picking up chicks.

I've found too, that some people really hate getting woken up by cocks. But if you're going to live with one you just have to accept it. Cocks will be up early in the morning and there's nothing you can do about it.

There was one time I really wanted a shag but I couldn't get one. You can only get them in Europe. Besides, the government would object to me trying to bring one home.

I hope this short discussion on bird watching has sparked some interest.

Anyone interested in this topic may wish to visit the anti-feminist Facebook group Make Birding Great Again which people may find is a little more serious than this article.

WHAT IS A DOWRY?: Rules of Modern Dating & Understanding Women “It’s Complicated”

April 23, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 56 – Un-Suppressing Great Men of History

April 27, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Misogamy and Marriage Avoidance

April 30, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

---

misogamy [mi-sog-uh-mee, mahy-] SHOW IPA

SEE SYNONYMS FOR misogamy ON THESAURUS.COM

noun

1 hatred of marriage.

While it may seem like a modern topic, the burning question of whether men should marry or more to the point not marry, is centuries old. That men are rejecting marriage in increasing numbers is well documented, however cynicism about the virtues of marriage is nothing new.

Numerous scholarly books such as Howard Chudacoff's Age Of The Bachelor, or J. McCurdy's Citizen Bachelors have traced the historical rise of bachelor movements, which tend to occur when a given society sufficiently devalues men while saddling them with unreasonable demands of service to wives and the State. When societies treat males more favourably, then bachelor movements organically decline.

I recently chanced upon another book outlining the deeper history of 'marriage avoidance' under the heading the querelle du mariage (quarrel about marriage). The following excerpt provides some interesting detail:

The early manifestations of the quarrel often focus on marriage, one of the pressing problems of the late Middle Ages and the early modern period: An uxor sit ducenda (Should One Take a Wife) was a question much discussed by Italian men, and in Germany it could appear as Ob einem manne sey zu nemen ein eelichs weyb oder nit (Should a Man Take a Wife or Not? – Albrecht von Eyb, 1472). In answer to this question, male misogamy (hatred of marriage) is expressed as misogyny (hatred of women) and philogyny (love of women) is expressed as philogamy (love of marriage).

Christine de Pizan's praise of women was directed against the misogamists and misogynists of her time, the anonymous text Les quinze joies de mariage (The Fifteen Joys of Marriage) deplored the loss of male liberty in marriage, and a century later Erasmus of Rotterdam presented the misogamist virgin in his Virgo misogamos (The Misogamist Virgin – 1523), who desperately wants to enter a convent but inspired by love she thinks better of it at the last moment. Philogynous texts questioned why women were punished more strictly for adultery than men or why a husband had to be brought (by a dowry); misogamists and misogynists, eg. In England, answered the question by stating that women tend to squeeze money out of their husbands.

In Germany this aspect of the querelle has been largely ignored (interest has focused on voices which argued in favor of women's intelligence and reason), although the querelle du mariage played an important role here: the wide-ranging marriage debate during the Reformation, in particular in its sensational and scandalous early phases – public betrothals of monks and nuns, closures of monasteries and convents, an epidemic of marriages in Germany to which even French reformers travelled who wished to marry – must be read as an integral part of the European querelle des sexes and the same goes for the marriage debates of the Counter-Reformation. Martin Luther's Von chelichen Leben (The Estate of Married Life – 1522) speaks quite in the manner of a querelle text by turning against the traditional misogamist attitude:

> "What we would speak most of is the fact that the estate of marriage has universally fallen into such awful disrepute. There are many pagan books which treat of nothing but the depravity of womankind and the unhappiness of the estate of marriage […]. So they [young men listening to the advice of a Roman official] concluded that woman is a necessary evil, and that no household can be without such an evil. […] For this reason young men should be on their guard when they read pagan books and hear the common complaints about marriage, lest they inhale poison . For the estate of marriage does not sell well with the devil, because it is God's good will and work. This is why the devil has contrived to have so much shouted and written in the world against the institution of marriage […]. The world says of marriage, 'Brief is the joy, lasting the bitterness."[2]

* * *

I've long wondered what form male activism might have taken in response to the excesses of historical European and Anglosphere gynocentrism. From the above description, and from the many anti-marriage texts abounding through old Europe, it's clear that a historical form of men's rights advocacy concerned itself with the dangers of entrapment within marriage.

Heracles: A Slave To Guilt

May 2, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Guilt is a trap designed to enslave men. By exaggerating men's transgressions, society quickly saddles them with guilt ('You did wrong') and shame ('You're not a good man') – and then demands their labor as atonement. This dynamic of male existence is nowhere better illustrated than in the story of The Twelve Labors of Heracles.

Heracles (known to the Romans as Hercules) is one of the most celebrated heroes of classical mythology. Yet beneath his iconic masculine swagger, his life was no picnic. He endured endless trials and near-impossible labors, with the reward for his struggles being that he might live forever as a certified 'Real Man™' among the gods of Olympus. Focusing on his misdemeanors or on his great feats, but never on his pain (the story of everyman!), we tend to overlook the fact that Heracles life was beset by tragedy and unrelenting stress, with many of his deeds driven by a desire to escape intolerable feelings of guilt. Like a determined MMA fighter Heracles took all of this in his stride, and the fact that he displayed courage, strength, skill and endurance under stress deserves that we take a closer, and dare we say compassionate look at the demons that assailed him.

The story of the Twelve Labors of Heracles

The rise of guilt

There's no doubt that Heracles' feelings of guilt arose from the misdeeds he perpetrated; from his occasional insensitivity, to the more damning crime of murder (of which we will say more below). However, there was much more going on behind the scenes that worked to strain his composure and pushed him to commit such terrible deeds. The primary provocateur, who was constantly provoking him to lash out, was his step-mother Hera — the very same goddess who was pleased to see him tormented by guilt after his crimes had transpired.

Hera's provocations of Heracles were not isolated to a few occasions, as she is said to have persecuted him from the moment of his birth and throughout his entire life; "Even as an infant not yet a year old," tells the myth, "Hera sent venomous snakes to kill the boy while he slept in his cradle, but Heracles awoke and strangled them."

Young Heracles killing a snake

We can conclude that Hera embodied the archetype of the spiteful feminist who frequently disdained men while viewing their role as one of service to women. After reading many of the Greek stories it's fair to conclude that Hera can be considered, more than all the other goddesses, a poster girl for coercive control, manipulation, spite, jealousy and nagging – she is what we might call the Queen of relational aggression.

According to American sociologist Philip Slater, Hera represents narcissism in her attitude toward Heracles, stating that this was part of the reason she dealt the severest blows to him and imposed pain, grief, and labor on him — she both envied Heracles and wanted him to bring her status and glory.[1] Representing a kind of love-hate dynamic, Slater summarizes:

> Heracles is attacked in the womb, as an infant, and as a grown man, with Hera once again the persecutor. The attack which destroys him, however, comes after all of these, in his gruesome death on Mount Oeta. Even his labors are an expression of Hera's malevolence, as well as many of the supplementary difficulties which he must endure in carrying them out.
>
> Hera's enmity toward Heracles is supposed initially to have been aroused by Zeus's affair with Alcmene (Heracles' mortal mother). This is an absurdly weak reason, since Zeus's infidelities were legion, while no one suffered Hera's wrath so persistently as Heracles. But we are not to expect too much reason and coherence from such a melange of unrelated and contradictory traditions. What we do know is that the relation between Hera and Heracles is an intense one, and by no means always negative. That we are left with the contradictions, largely unrationalized, suggests that such ambivalence did not seem altogether strange > to the Greeks—that it tapped something meaningful in their experience.[1] (p.340)

Heracles sent mad by Hera

Hera's persecution eventually drove Heracles mad, by design, causing him to murder all his children and two sons of Iphicles. In some versions he also slew his wife Megara. When he recovered from the madness and realized what he had done an intolerable sense of guilt rose up in his soul. The oracle at Delphi instructed him to serve Eurystheus and perform the many hard labors that would be set for him as the only way he could atone for his guilty deeds.

No sooner were these accomplished, however, than Heracles committed another murder for which the only way he could make amends was to be sold into slavery to Queen Omphale. While serving in this capacity he achieved several more heroic exploits, and followed up his slavery with a military expedition to Troy, the killing of a sea-monster, further battles, and a new marriage — one which was to bring about his death.[1]

Philip Slater states that Heracles tries, without succeeding, to renounce his raw instinctual nature in favor of developing a sanitized urban consciousness, a process that entails a transition from a primitive condition to a more modern subjection to "guilt culture."[1] He adds that the failure of Heracles to achieve this goal is perhaps why his ascendancy to Mt. Olympus is associated with so little sense of rejoicing, and his suffering so little regarded as a means to a divine end: it is never in the least clear, as Freud pointed out in his Civilization And Its Discontents, that the achievement of guilt and its subsequent atonement is worth all the trouble:

> In any case, Heracles presents us with a curious contradiction. On the one hand he is all impulse, with his gross appetites and lack of restraint or foresight. On the other, he is a man engaged in chronic labor, with no release from suffering, no real love or enjoyment of life—a kind of unwitting adherent of the Protestant Work Ethic. Heracles is a civilizing force, but not civilized. He is proto-urban but not urban, chronically industrious without the capacity for sustained effort and self-denial. His is the blind and uncontrolled ambition out of which the capacity for civilization may accidentally arise. From his blocked pleasure derives the energy for cultural achievements. Yet he is, as noted, proto-urban, the force but not the product. He is like the crude lower-class racketeer who achieves economic success but not social respectability, and is rejected by his children for the very origins from which his success has insulated them.[1] (p.388)

In the same way that Heracles is captured by Hera's emotional snares, modern men are often subject to the same behavioral experiment both on a cultural level, and in their personal relationships. Routine inculcation of guilt saddles men with the feeling that they owe a debt, with a payback framed as servitude or slavery to the self-elected debtors.

Károly Kerényi, one of the founders of modern studies of Greek mythology, claims that Heracles demonstrates the characteristics of an archaic servant and rescuer of women.[2] If this is an accurate assessment, Hera not only exploited his gynocentric tendencies but seeded in him an enduring anxiety over masculine destructiveness and the associated guilt burden – an anxiety that may have played a part in the hero's eventual episodes of cross-dressing and other feminine displays.

Heracles engages in transvestitism

After completing his twelve labors, Heracles continued his adventures but he once again became subjected to exploitation and betrayal – this time by Eurytus, king of Oechalia. After his previous experiences, the new betrayals triggered a kind of PTSD response, sending him into a rage that resulted in him lashing out and killing the king's son, Iphitus. We are not told whether the crime was self-inspired or the result of madness inflicted on him by Hera, but whatever the case Heracles then descended into a serious bout of insanity.

Heracles was exhausted by these events and appealed for help to cure his madness, and to lift the burden of guilt. He was answered by the Delphic Oracle who advised him to accept another period of slavery in order to cleanse his soul from guilt and atone for his blood crime.

It followed that he was sold into slavery to queen Omphale of Lydia, a subservient role considered shameful for a man, especially to a woman from Lydia which was considered a barbarian nation. During his new period of servitude, which lasted three years, Heracles undertook numerous labors in a similar way to his period of servitude to Eurystheus (12 labors), though his new labors were often trivial and demeaning:

> There is general agreement that Heracles was Omphale's slave and lover, and there are many stories concerning the effeminacy to which the hero was reduced during this bondage. Later authors describe, and painters show, how the couple exchanged clothes—Omphale donning the lion pelt, Heracles her golden gown, slippers, and jewelry [Plutarch; "Whether an Old Man Should Engage in Public Affairs" 785E]. There are various elaborations on this theme, such as Heracles being forced to spin or carry Omphale's parasol, and a mistaken sexual approach to Heracles by Pan, but these are decidedly of later origin.[1] (p.379)

Hercules and Omphale, by Gustave Boulanger (1861)

Later references in texts or art depicted Omphale wearing the skin of the Nemean Lion and carrying Heracles' olive-wood club, while Heracles wore women's clothing while being forced to do various kinds of women's work which included holding a basket of wool while Omphale and her maidens did their spinning.

While Heracles engaged in episodes of transvestitism (he did this on two other occasions as well), we can assume his aim was not to become a female but to compensate for his previous existence. However, it's intriguing that he did so without complaint when he could easily have resisted and preserved his masculine integrity – after all it was considered absolutely shameful and denigrating for a man to behave this way.

Did Heracles secretly desire time-out as relief from his existence in guilty masculinity? He could easily have avoided this humiliation by employing his legendary strength to either refuse or escape, but it seems he may have viewed such effeminization as less burdensome than the crushing sense of guilt that came with his natural masculinity.

Rejecting the shame of being branded a 'toxic male' is the task of all men today, as it was throughout history. In extreme cases men might choose to renounce their masculinity as a means of compliance, and we might also wonder if this sentiment is at work for at least a portion of men who cross-dress, or identify as trans women. In such cases the solution tends to look more like a sickness than a cure.

The psychology of guilt

There's a basic formula showing how accusations of toxicity, and associated guilting of males, is used as a means to increase male labor and productivity – a result that works well to the benefit of women, companies, and the State.

That formula is stated simply as – Aggression, Guilt, Repair.

It refers to a psychological process that happens when someone commits an aggressive or slightly destructive act and they notice the damage they have caused (or are made to notice the damage by others). This triggers an automatic guilt reaction for feeling that one has damaged people they love or care about and, after feeling guilty, they move to repair the damage.

It doesn't matter whether the claims of destructiveness are accurate, somewhat trumped up, or completely fabricated; it has the same effect of generating concern in the minds of the accused, and they react with various attempts to fix the problem and smooth it over.

This formula is laid out by pediatric psychiatrist Donald Winnicott[3] who described the process already at work in earliest childhood. During the first years, infants already show a concern over the results of their own destructiveness. Thus, when an infant bites his mother's nipple hard, or screams and kicks, mother gets frustrated and upset and proceeds to walk away from the infant. At that moment the baby descends into a guilt state (becoming listless, crying, fearful), then when mother returns the baby goes all out trying to repair the damage – reaching out to hug mother, smiling, offering mother a rattle, etc. This again is the process of aggression – guilt – repair,[4] and it's a cycle repeated thousands of times during everyone's infancy.

The repair efforts, it goes almost without saying, are absolutely vital to any infant who is dependent on his mother for existence, and so we all carry that primal fear of loss when momma walks out of the room…… will she return? As a social and pair-bonding species the concern is real, and no-doubt hardwired. The concern might also explain the popular cliché "If momma aint happy, aint nobody happy!"

Winnicott says that such reparative gestures underlie all productivity and labor in the wider social space – ie. that people want to contribute into society to atone for supposed past destructiveness, and especially on behalf of future destructiveness that has not yet happened (and may never happen!). People want to feel good with the world, and so they work to store-up capital in their reparative bank accounts – usually in the form of labor and financial accumulation, though it could equally be in the currency of thoughtfulness, deference, verbal compliments and the like.

When we consider that the reparative gestures more often take the form of labor – especially men's labor – we could perhaps equally render Winnicott's formula as Aggression – Guilt – Labor, and lose nothing of its meaning.

Here we note that the phrase 'emotional labor' takes on a whole new, and very male sense.

On a more tangible level I've talked with a lot of men who admitted that when they feel they've done something bad, or that they've done something destructive in the eyes of their wife or partner, they go all-out trying to repair the damage. Not just giving her flowers, but they might labor around the yard or paint the interior of the house or some other manual task, and via these constant reparative gestures provide far more labor than would normally be the case. This unfortunately can become a sick game between couples; if a man (or woman) can be made to feel bad enough, and frequently enough, they become pathologically productive.

To that end, many men feel that their wives have become daughters of B. F. Skinner, regularly hearing the nagging din of "You've been very insensitive to me recently, and you haven't even painted the house yet!"

Heracles life is paradigmatic of this cycle, showing the same pattern described by Winnicott in an endless loop; he commits destructive deeds, feels guilt and then attempts to repair the damage through hard labors. His desire to repair things often comes via contributing to society, by helpful assertions of strength to rid the world of monsters and lawless creatures, performing useful engineering feats, while at the same time vigorously denying any weakness that would slow him down. As Slater observes;

> The Heraclean myths also include the self-abasing strategy. This is inferred, not from his appearance as a buffoon in Attic drama, but from his role as a servant of the gods and a slave to women. He consistently performs "dirty work" for others, killing pests, cleaning the Augeian stables, herding cattle, reaping grain, and so on. Indeed, his entire life is one of suffering, servitude, and degradation, relieved only by his achievements and final apotheosis. From the slave of the cowardly Eurystheus he becomes the slave of Omphale, and is constantly being cheated of his wages (e.g., by Eurystheus, Augeias, Eurytus, and Laomedon).[1] (p.375)

Heracles, and every man like him who labors compulsively is motivated to repair what he unconsciously feels are the results of his own destructiveness — even his potential destructiveness that may never manifest in real behavior. The mere potential of destructiveness is enough to set the compulsive work cycle in motion, especially if under the watchful direction of a scold.

We can only imagine what the world would look like if men were not operating under pressure of guilt; it would probably look more like grass huts and animal-skin clothing than the marvels of civilization we see around us today. When it comes to measuring national productivity, the benchmark GDP should be equally interpreted as men's Guilty

Domestic Product.[5]

The mechanics of misandry

Misandry is not a simple scapegoating reflex, although that is a part of it. Misandric blaming is also an assist for increasing the power and enrichment of the State, of corporations, and of course women, because it increases men's productivity.

The Heracles story highlights many elements of male existence, but especially misandry. Everybody disparages and treats him as toxic: Hera disparages him; the king he is in service to for 12 labors denigrates him; his Lydian slave-mistress demeans him, and so on. All through the story people are praising his legendary feats, but at the same time calling him toxic while he goes about his labors in an attempt to better both himself, and his reputation. Such denigration is where misandry derives its internal power, not only as a convenient method of scapegoating, but also as a built-in societal custom that ensures productivity.

That payoff is why misandry has remained normalized, but it doesn't have to remain that way for conscious men.

Some of the phrases directed at men are proof of the desire to get men to labor; misandric phrasings like "You need to man up!" which often means a man needs to work harder. Men are called deadbeats (not producing enough money), 'man-babies' (for not wanting to overdo things nor put their health at risk), or Peter Pans (too busy enjoying life instead of working), or they may be characterized sarcastically as a 'failure to launch' (for younger men failing to rush headlong into a career and a job by which he can contribute his labor to society).

Or, in the recent past, what about the negative disparaging of a man as "gay" (whether he was or not), which implied such a man was failing to indenture himself in service womenfolk and family with some kind of productive contribution (gay men were busying themselves doing non-gynocentric things). On rare occasion a man might even assault or kill a homosexual man as if they were a proxy and reminder of his own beaten up, freedom-yearning soul. As ugly as this is, it provides an example of men's indoctrination and internalized misandry that attempts to 'put a man in his place,' by violence if necessary.

In conclusion we can say that misandry is not only a vehicle for cathartic blame, but is more geared to 'keep men in their place' – and that place is to be a provider. Women in the long-ago past were similarly subjected to these 'in your place' roles, but those days are long gone in most developed nations.

It is now men's turn to break the cycle and say no to imputed guilt, or at least refuse to make genuine guilt available for others to exploit. If you fail to protect yourself in this regard, you are on a fast track to slavery and, in all likelihood, are already there.

References

[1]. Philip Slater, The Glory Of Hera: Greek Mythology and The Greek Family, Beacon

Press, (1968)
[2]. Károly Kerényi, The Heroes of The Greeks, Thames & Hudson, (1952)
[3]. Donald Winnicott, The Development Of A Capacity For Concern (1963), Chapter 6 in The Maturational Process And The Facilitating Environment, International universities Press, (1965)
[4]. Donald Winnicott, Aggression, Guilt and Reparation (1960), Chapter 16 in Deprivation And Delinquency, Tavistock Publications, (1984)
[5]. Note: for those who are inclined to take comments literally, rest assured this comment about grass huts (and GDP) is intended hyperbole.

The Goal Post Episode 57 – The Parallel Scientists

May 7, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Defining fascism

May 12, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

From time to time MRAs, others in the manosphere, and supporters are called fascists.

The term Fascist is notoriously difficult to define. Two definitions, narrow and broad are offered here and it is proposed that any reasonable definition must be bounded by these two.

Narrow

The narrowest possible definition is membership in the Italian National Fascist Party. Using this definition the ideology of Fascism is easy to define because it can be found in the manifesto of the party.

Broad

Most broadly a fascist could be seen to be an adherent to Italian fascism, Nazism, the ideology of Francisco Franco in Spain, or someone that seeks to re-establish a very similar system. In this context fascism can be seen as nationalist, dictatorial and corporatist. Fascists argue that democracy is fundamentally flawed and doomed to fail. Unlike communists and socialists, fascists do not seek to nationalise industry, preferring for private enterprise to continue to operate. Fascists do expect, however, that private enterprise be entirely subordinate to the state and support state initiatives.

Even the broadest possible definition of fascism does not intrinsically include opposition to immigration or xenophobia since these were no more prevalent in Fascist Italy or Spain under Franco than contemporary states. Benito Mussolini did eventually start persecuting Jews in Italy but only did so under pressure from Adolf Hitler.

Nor does the broadest possible definition of fascism include an aggressive foreign policy since Fascist Italy's attempts to expand were modest for the time, and Franco's Spain made no attempt to expand at all.

Conclusions

Definitions broader than the broad definition above are meaningless.

Some may disagree with the inclusion of Spain under Franco as a fascist state. The aim here is to produce as broad a definition of fascism as possible that is still meaningful. This demonstrates that the definition of fascism falls far short of the manner in which the term is used today.

Even if Spain under Franco was fascist, no fascist state has lasted more than a few decades so the long term prospects for such a system remain untested.

We may yet see the re-emergence of fascism in the 21st century but it won’t be coming from the manosphere.

Race Motherhood: Is Woman The Original Human Race? – by Dora B. Montefiore 1920

May 15, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following long essay written in 1920 is a recapitulation of the older gynocentric theory presented by Lester F. Ward. The theory, which was openly misandric, proved wildly popular among both feminists and laypersons in this early period of the modern era. Several notable men's human rights activists, including Ernest B. Bax pushed back on the idea. – PW

* * *

Race Motherhood: Is Woman The Race? – by Dora B. Montefiore 1920

Date: 1920
Published: Women's Freedom League
Topic: Lester Ward's Gynocentric Theory

A PERSONAL NOTE.

In the early days of the century I had the great pleasure of meeting at Oxford the late Professor Lester Ward, whom I had till then known through his scientific writings. In the course of several interesting conversations, I asked him if, in interests of the world-wide movements of women towards an equal share with men in social, political and economic freedom, he would republish in pamphlet form and at a democratic price those parts of Chapter XIV of his work, Pure Sociology, which set forth and give the evidence, for the Gynaecocentric theory of which he is the propounder.

He was much interested in my suggestion, but feared he could not at that time carry out my suggestion of the reprinting of the whole XIVth chapter as his Publisher would, no doubt consider that to republish a chapter of 125 pages out of a book of 575 pages might interfere seriously with the sale of the whole work. He, however, expressed the desire that a summary of the Gynaecocentric Theory would he put before the British Public, and I subsequently write two short articles on the subject, which were published in Justice and led to some correspondence, and requests for a fuller statement of the facts and data on which the theory is founded. At the present time (1920) it appears to me that the urgency of events caused by the recent waging of the World War calls for a reconstructive policy as regards the relations between androcentric and gynaecocentric influences and forces.

Mrs, Charlotte Perkins Gilman in her book 'The Man Made World' "grants to men to-day, a high pre-eminence over women in human development, but shows this development to be a distinction of humanity and not of sex, fully open to women if they use their human powers." It is because it is daily borne in upon many of us with increasing force and intensity how impossible it will be to reconstruct out of the war's chaos a civilisation worth the price we are now daily paying, if androcentric values and sanctions are still allowed unchallenged to prevail, that I desire to put before women and men a short popular statement of Professor Lester Ward's specialist studies in the social relations and spheres of the sexes.

My special object in insisting at the present time on the study of the androcentric and gynaecocentric theories, and of the proofs deduced on either side in support of them is, that at no other time as far as I can see in the world's history have things "centred round" the human male more than they have done during the world war resulting "Peace." His militarist activities, his trade rivalries, carefully preserved political privileges are the only subjects that arouse any enthusiasm in the daily press of the countries of Europe. And every other subject, even the most intimately special function of the human female—childbearing, and child nurture is only of interest to the predominant male in so far as the supply of young males is concerned, who are to fill the ranks in the conscript armies of the world.

Women's thoughts, their training, their activities are all to be centred on militarism and its kindred interests. A Russian General foretold in 1915 in the columns of a Times Supplement how during the next war 40,000,000 men will meet on the battlefields of the world; and women evidently are expected to supply, not only the men children who are to be trained for the ranks of this fantastic army, but are also, to help make the munitions which are eventually in a militarist orgy to maim and destroy their 40,000 000 sons. Never in any preceding war have women suffered the moral degradation of being exploited by men for the unworthy aims of militarism and of commercial rivalry.

Education is only valued in so far as it can beat commercially other nations. Art find literature are narrowed down in the estimation of the public to their financial success in portraying the prowess or the humour of the rival combatants; and what Professor Lester Ward calls “male efflorescence” is the key note of thought and action throughout the countries engaged in mutual extermination. Because it is hard,—well nigh impossible,—at such a moment to persuade men and women to think of anything but the indulgence of hatred or to listen to the calm voice of reason, therefore it is doubly necessary to work unceasingly in the field of right thought, because right thought eventually begets right action, and, though we of this generation may not live to see it, a revulsion of feeling must some day come, and things will have to centre round the nurture of life and of the race, instead of round its destruction.

Androcracy or a world ruled and administered entirely from the male point of view appears to be so helplessly incapable of solving the great life problems which androcentric war has thrust upon us, that it seems necessary to use every means to rouse women to the sense of their lost public opportunities and duties, and re-create in them that social consciousness which, when working with equal opportunity side by side with men, their brothers, shall eventually crown with success the twentieth century task of “the socialisation of achievement!”

D.B.M.
“Wayside,” Crowborough.
June, 1920.

The Gynaecocentric Theory of Life

Briefly to state the thesis of Professor Lester Ward:

“There has, till recently, been held universally by thinkers and writers the theory that the male sex is primary and the female secondary in the organic scheme, that all things centre, as it were, abut the male, and that the female, though necessary in carrying out the scheme, is only the means of continuing the life of the globe, but is otherwise an unimportant accessory, and incidental factor in the general result.”

This theory is called by Professor Ward the Androcentric Theory; and in the XIVth Chapter of “Pure Sociology” opposes it by a theory, the truth of which his studies had forced upon him, and which he calls the Gynaecocentric Theory, or that which holds that:

“The female sex is primary, and the male secondary in the organic scheme, that originally and normally all things centre, as it were, about the female, and that the male, though not necessary in carrying out the scheme, was developed under the operation of the principle of advantage, to secure organic progress through the crossing of strains.”

I have purposely placed the two theories quite baldly side by side, so that readers may see at a glance how absolutely opposed to one another they are, and how completely the gynaecocentric theory, if it can be proved to possess scientific value, sweeps away not only all the old cosmogonies, but the endless traditions, maxims, prejudices and sanctions of what is or is not, woman's sphere.

In support of the Androcentric Theory the main evidencies Professor Ward admits are both weighty and numerous.

"In all the principal animals, including the classes of mammals and birds, at least, the males are usually larger, stronger, more varied in structure and organs, and more highly ornamented and adorned than the females."

When we leave the regions of zoology, and begin to compare things in the human races:

"We find the same general class of facts somewhat emphasised … The difference in the brain of man and woman is quite as great as that of the rest of the body. Many measurements have been made of male and female brains, both of civilised and uncivilised races, and always with the same general result, at least, that the female brain is considerably leas than the male both in weight and cubic capacity." [1]

As regards mental power, Ward adduces evidence in support of the androcentric theory to prove that women have but little inventive faculty.

"As invention is the great key to civilisation, and as the function of the intellect, this is a fundamental difference, and has great weight."

Her creative genius is also stated to be inferior to that of men, even in the fine arts there are but few great women architects, sculptors, painters or musical composers.

"Still less," writes Professor Ward can be said for the female side of speculative genius, the faculty by which the mind deals with abstract truth and rises by a series of ever widening generalisations from multiplicity to unity. Women care very little for truth for its own sake, take very little interest in the abstract, and even concrete facts fail to win their attention unless connected more or less directly with persons and with personal advantage, not necessarily to self, but to self or others."

And finally to sum up appears to be a hopeless indictment against the possibility of women every playing an equal part with men in the affairs of the world, the American Professor writes, in order to put the whole case for the Androcentric Majority:

"A glance at the history and condition of the world in general is sufficient to show how small has been and is the role of woman in the most important affairs of life. … In political affairs she has been practically a cipher, except where hereditary descent has chanced to place a crown upon her head. In such cases, however, no one can say that it has not usually rested easily. But from a certain point of view it almost seems as if everything was done by men, and woman was only a means of continuing the race."

And yet in spite of what, on a superficial judgment appears to be overwhelming testimony that the female is secondary in the organic scheme, Professor Lester Ward holds, and expounds on the evidence which I now desire to synthesise in a popular form, the Gynaecocentric Theory.

As regards the history of the theory, he writes:

"So far as I have ever heard, it is wholly my own, no one else having proposed or even defended it, scarcely anyone accepting it, and no one certainly coveting it … At the same time it must rest on facts that cannot be disputed, and the question of its acceptance or rejection must become one of interpreting the facts."

The Professor then gives quotations from writers of different periods who have shadowed forth, in a more or less general way, without basing their reactions on specific facts, the gynaecocentric theory. Condorcet, in his "Tableau Historique des Progres de l'Esprit Humain" is the first writer quoted.

"If we try," writes Condorcet, "to compare the moral energy of women with that of men, taking into consideration the necessary effects of the inequality with which the two sexes have been treated by laws, institutions, customs and prejudices, and fix our attention on the numerous examples that they have furnished of contempt for death and suffering, of constancy in their resolutions and their convictions, of courage and intrepidity, and of greatness of mind, we shall see that we are far from having the proof of their alleged inferiority. Only through new observations can a true light be shed upon the question of the natural inequality of the two sexes."

This opinion of Condorcet's is so allied in spirit to that of our own philosophic writer, Henry Thomas Buckle, that I cannot refrain (though not quoted by Professor Ward) from giving it here. In an address on the subject of "The Influence of Women in the Progress of Knowledge," delivered by Buckle about the middle of the XIXth. century, the writer sets out to prove that in spite of the generally held opinion that women exercised little or no influence over the progress of knowledge, he held, and hoped to convince his audience that "they have actually exercised an enormous influence … so great in fact, that it is hardly possible to assign limits to it; and that great as it is, it may with advantage be still further increased."

After stating that knowledge has three divisions—method, science and art, he goes on to explain how the scientific enquirer has only two ways or methods of attaining his result.

"He may proceed from the external world to the internal; or he may begin with the internal and proceed to the external. In the former case he studies the facts presented to his senses in order to arrive at a true idea of them; in the latter case he studies the ideas already in his mind in order to explain the facts of which his senses are cognizant. If he begin with the facts his method is inductive; if he begin with the ideas it is deductive.

Both methods, of course, are valuable in the discovery of truth, and Buckle's contention is that women, being by nature, more deductive, and men more inductive,

"women have rendered great, though unconscious service to science by encouraging and keeping alive this habit of deductive thought; and that if it were not for them scientific men would be much too inductive, and the progress of our knowledge would be hindered."

Facts, as he implies, having merely a potential, and, as it were, subsequent value, the only advantage of possessing thorn being to draw conclusions from them, the sex that is intuitive and quick to grasp at an idea, is the sex which can use collected facts to advantage, and can act as a spur to the more laborious inductive investigator. He remarks on women's greater quickness of thought and powers of deduction than that of men; and adds:

"Indeed, nothing could prevent its being universally admitted except the fact that the remarkable rapidity with which women think is obscured by that miserable, that contemptible, that preposterous system, called their education, in which valuable things are carefully kept from them, and trifling things continually taught to them, until their fine and nimble minds are often irretrievably injured."

Of all modern writers Professor Ward holds that Mr. Havelock Ellis is the one most free from the androcentric bias; and he quotes the English writer's statement-

"That because of woman's permanent connection with the care of the young, she is of greater importance than the male from Nature's point of view." [2]

Bachofe, McLennan and Morgan have all brought to light valuable facts on the subject of the matriarchate, or period when name and property passed through the maternal parent, instead of, as it now does through the paternal. And Ratzenhofer, an ethnologist remarked:—

"It is probable that in the horde there existed a certain individual equality between man and woman; the results of our investigation leave it doubtful whether the man always had a superior position." Professor Riley, an American entomologist, and a personal friend of Professor Ward, admits that the facts of entomology sustain the gynaecocentric theory; and in the botanical works of Professor Meehan our author finds adumbrations of the same theory, as when he calls attention to a certain form of female superiority in plants; or when he points out that:

"a male flower is an intermediate stage between a perfect leaf and a perfect, or we may say a female flower."

These, and similar facts stand out, as Professor Ward explains, before the scientist.

"But not according with the accepted view of the relations of the sexes, they are brushed aside as worthless anomalies and exceptions that prove the rule. In fact in all branches of biology the progress of truth has been greatly impeded by this spirit … and we are probably in about the same position and stage with reference to the questions of sex, as were the men of the eighteenth century with reference to the question of evolution. Indeed the androcentric theory, may be profitably compared to the geocentric theory, and the gynaecocentric with the late heliocentric. The advancement of truth has always been in the direction of supplanting the superficial and apparent by the fundamental and real, and the gynaecocentric truth may be classed among the paradoxes of Nature."

In order to prove this theory Professor Ward has to probe deeply into the question of Reproduction, which, as he points out is a very different thing from sexuality, and is in fact a biological process practically identical with nutrition. Lamarck wrote:-

"The superabundance of nutrition in giving rise to the growth of the body prepares the materials for a new being which organisation places in position to resemble this same body, and therefore furnishes it with the means of reproducing itself."

Haeckel in 1866 gave this idea its scientific expression:

“Reproduction is a nutrition and a growth of the organism beyond its individual mass, which erects a part of it into a whole.”

The problem for Nature therefore was how to secure this continuous nutrition and keep the organism growing beyond the point where the original plastic structure tended to break down. This problem resulted in a variety of different modes of reproduction, which:

“Constitute a sort of ascending series from the point of view of complexity and adaptation to increasing development of structure—a series of steps from the more simple to the more complex.”

These various methods of reproduction independent of fertilisation are First: fission or a falling apart of living protoplasms taking the place of the parent one. Second: gemination or budding, when a small portion of the original substance protrudes and is then separated from the mother cell by a constriction that grows deeper and deeper, until the bud becomes entirely detached. This form of reproduction takes place not only in plants but in certain worms and other lower forms of animal life. Third: germinal budding, when within an individual composed of many cells a small group of cells, separates from the surrounding ones and gradually develops into an independent individual which sooner or later finds its way out of the mother. This is the process of reproduction of zoophytes; and of certain worms. The fourth step is—intermediate between germinal budding and the simplest forms of bisexuality, or reproduction in which fertilisation takes place. The fourth step is called germ cell formation or spore formation; and in this a single cell, instead of a group of cells becomes detached from the interior of the organism, but does not further develop until it has escaped from the latter. It then increases by division and forms a multicelular organism like its parent. This is the method of reproduction of certain low types of vegetation. There is still a fifth form of asexual reproduction (that is reproduction without fertilisation from the other sex) which is known as parthenogenesis or virgin reproduction.

“Here germ cells similar to all appearances to eggs, are capable of developing into new beings without the aid of any fertilising agent, The same cells may also be fertilised, and upon the fact of fertilisation or non-fertilisation usually depends the sex of the resulting creature.”

These last mentioned facts are known to bee keepers, as the unfertilized eggs of bees produce males, while the fertilised ones produce females.

Professor Ward considers that Nature, in the development of the principle of life-renewal up to this point, may have taken even other steps towards reproduction; but those already indicated point to a serial development from simpler to more complicated modes. After these a new principle enters into reproduction. From being a purely quantitative process a qualitative form of development now appears, and in order to improve and perfect this qualitative principle the advantageous process of fertilization or the crossing of one hereditary strain or stirp with another (an essentially dynamic principle of nature) appears.

“In any of the advanced stages of this process we have the phenomena of sex, but the use of this term for the earlier stages, if correct at all is at least misleading.”

We have, in following the thread of this most enthralling theory (which, if Professor Ward is correct in his deductions tends to prove that: “Woman is and remains the human race”) to remember that more than half of the organic beings on this earth have no sex at all or possess the dual character in an almost unrecognisably undeveloped state. Still sex remains, as we have seen, the dynamic principle in biology.

“Which is that of securing variation, and through variation the production of better and higher types of organic structure—in a word organic evolution.”

Having now brought the statement of facts relating to the gynaecocentiic theory down to the point of the origin of the male sex, which sex has not appeared in any of the reproductive processes yet described, Professor Ward enters on a statement that “life began as female.” The female being the fertile sex—whatever is fertile is looked upon as female.

“Assuredly,” he writes, “it would be absurd to look upon an organism propagating asexually, as male. Biologists have proceeded from this popular standpoint and regularly speak of ‘mother-cells’ and ‘daughter cells.’ It therefore does no violence to language or to science to say that life begins with the female organism, and is carried on a long distance by females alone … The further development of life serves to strengthen this gynaecocentric point of view … The female sex, which existed from the beginning, continues unchanged, but the male sex which did not exist at the beginning, made its appearance at a certain stage, and had a certain history and development but never became universal … The male is therefore, as it were, a mere after-thought of nature … Among millions of humble creatures the male is simply and solely a fertilizer.”

Female superiority Professor Ward postulates, continues in a more or less marked degree to prevail throughout the greater part of the invertebrates, and Darwin, in his first volume of “Descent of Man” has popularised the facts relating to the courtship of certain members of the Arachnidae or spider family when the relatively gigantic female seizes and devours the tiny male fertilizer immediately he has accomplished the act for which he exists. Milne Edwards, and other scientists have pointed out that in the case of certain male parasites the entire visceral cavity was occupied by the testicles, and no trace of digestive organs could be found. Professor Ward also considers that many of the facts relating to the animal Kingdom recorded in “Evolution of Sex” (Professors Geddes and Thompson) have a direct bearing on the gyncoceirtric theory; and that although the work is “pervaded with the androcentric spirit the ‘thesis’ of it that the female is anabolic and the male catatolic is a long step in the direction of the gynaecocentric theory forced or wrested, as it were, from unwilling minds by the mass of evidence.”

Even in the lower vertebrates there are cases of female superiority; male fishes are usually smaller than female; the female hawk is usually the larger and finer bird, and among the rodents there is but little appreciable difference in size or, strength, and very little (sometimes not at all) in colour and adornment.

Professor Ward then approaches, the question of the reasons:

“Why the male has advanced at all beyond its primitive estate as neither a fertilizing organ attached to the female or at most a minute organism detached from her, but devoted exclusively to the same purpose.”

The answer to this question is, of course; that the female, through the principle of sexual selection, has used her privilege of choice and has selected each time the male possessing the highest value in size and strength for the continuance of the race. This quality of choice on the part of the female coincides with a subjective feeling of preference, a feeling which constitutes the distinctive interest (in sexual reproduction) of the female—She being the guardian of hereditary qualities she realises instinctively that variation requires regulation; and she acts unconsciously as

“the balance wheel of the whole machinery. As the primary ancestral trunk she stands unmoved amid the heated strife of rivals and holds the scales that decide their relative worth to the race. While the voice of Nature speaking to the male in the form of an intense appetitive interest says to him fecundate! It gives to the female a different command, and says: discriminate! The order to the male is; cross the strains! That to the female is: choose the best! Here the value of a plurality of males is apparent.”

Professor Ward considers that this distinctive interest of the female which connotes choice—which interest is lacking in plants and the lowest animals but which makes its appearance at a very early stage in the history of sentient beings is “the dawn of the aesthetic faculty.” Just as the advent of mind gave the world a new dispensation and seemed to reverse the whole policy of Nature, so now

“Another profound transformation is to be wrought by a special psychic faculty, viz., the faculty of taste. This transformation is nothing less than the work of raising that miniature speck of existence, the primordial fertilizing agent, to the rank of a fully developed animal organism, approaching in varying degrees, and actually reaching in few instances the status of the original specific trunk, then called the female.” [3]

Naturalists have been specially attracted by the superficial differences between the sexes in animals, particularly in the matter of ornamentation in the male; and the influences which have caused these superficial, differences, having been at work in all the types of animal life Since the dawn of this psychic faculty, it is not surprising that they have resulted in what Professor Ward designates as “Male Efflorescence” or spurious “Male Superiority.” The female exercising her power of selection (which power is never coerced by male animals) has, through countless ages selected male consorts for beauty, which gave her offspring certain decorative embellishments, and for courage which stood for success.

“The formidable weapons of the males of many animals acquired through sexual selection are employed exclusively fighting other males, and never in the serious work of fighting enemies. The female simply looks on and admires the victorious rival and selects him to continue the species, thus at each selection emphasizing the qualities selected and causing these qualities to tower up into greater and greater prominence. The whole phenomenon of so-called male superiority bears a certain stamp of spuriousness and sham. It is to natural history what chivalry was to human history. It is pretentious, meretricious, quixotic; a sort of make believe, play, or sport of nature of an airy unsubstantial character. The male side of nature shot up and blossomed out in an unnatural fantastic way, cutting loose from the real business of and attracting a share of attention wholly disproportionate to its real importance. I call it male efflorescence. It certainly is not male supremacy, for throughout the animal world below man, in all the serious and essential affairs of life, the female is still supreme. There is no male hegemony or andrarchy. Nevertheless it represents organic evolution of which both sexes have partaken. Its chief value lies in the fact that, in lifting the male from nothing to his present estate it has elevated all species and all life, and placed the organic world on a higher plane."

In the larger apes, the group of animals most closely resembling man, male efflorescence is tolerably well marked, though not so much so as in other animals. Many of these apes have true beards like that of man; and the beard, which is the most prominent and typical sexual character of man was developed far back in the phylogenetic line.

"Nothing is known of the differences in the sexes Pithecanthropus (apeman) of which only part of one skeleton has been found, but it is a fair assumption that the males were larger and stronger than the females, and possessed other distinctively male characters."

The arrival of the earliest rational beings capable of utilising the forces of Nature to their own advantage heralded the evolution of man. But the word 'rational' as employed above, does not mean reasonable, it simply means a being capable of reasoning about the simplest and most materiel things; its chief role was to supplant instinct.

"It is instinct which throughout the animal Kingdom below man, maintains female supremacy and prevents the destruction of animal races. But with man reason begins to gain the ascendant over instinct."

Besides the comparatively unimportant characters, such as horns, spurs, bright colours, and musical powers as the products of sexual selection, increased bulk and strength with the assimilation of form to that of the primary organism or female, gained now in importance; and from the period that primitive man was evolved brain development gradually increased because:

"Success in rivalry for female favour became more and more dependent upon sagacity … But throughout the later geologic periods, and to some extent in all periods, the brain gained upon the body, as shown. By the phenomenon of cephalization, whereby the head, and especially the encephalon, has been growing larger in proportion to the body in all the great phylogenetic lines. Natural selection might bring this about to some extent, but the greater part of it is probably attributable to sexual selection, and the male brain has thus gained upon that of the female until we have the present state of things."

It is this male brain development which places man as a being apart from the rest of creation, enables him to violate the restraints of instinct and develop a state of thing's entirely different from that of his animal ancestors. In the dark recesses of the life of primitive man, the male; possessing only egoistic reasoning and destitute of either sympathy moral conceptions, used his superior strength to exact from women whatever satisfaction she could yield him and gradually the power of choice in sexual selection became transferred from the female to the male, thus causing distinct transformation in social evolution. To sum up therefore, to the period of primitive woman and man, Professor Ward writes:

"To the intelligent and sympathetic reader no apology is needed for having dwelt so long in the pre-human stage in the exposition of so unfamiliar a subject as a gynaecocentric theory. Long before we reach the human stage we find all the alleged evidence of the androcentrie theory, and without such a study of origins as we have been making there would be no counter-evidence, and in fact no data for understanding the real meaning of this evidence … It so happens that though the facts depended upon to support the androcenric theory are patent to all, those that support the gynaecocentric theory are latent and known to very few. But in this it does not differ at all from any of the great truths of science. The facts supposed to prove the apparent are on the surface, while those that prove the real, which is usually the reverse of the apparent, lie hidden and only come forth after prolonged investigation and reflection. The androcentric world view will prove as slow to give way as was the geocentric, or as is still the anthropocentric."

In Professor Ward's brief recapitulation of his gynaecocentric theory (page 373, Chapter XIV, Pure Sociology) sums up so succinctly and powerfully the main argument on which he bases his contention that "woman is and remains the human race," that I feel I cannot do better in this attempt to summarise and popularise his theory than to quote fully from that recapitulation: for the oftener I read it the more, perfectly it seems to me to set forth the unorthodox scientific position he takes up. After summarising the various forms of reproduction (without fertilisation) by which natural selection obtains its object of the continuance of life, he proceeds

"In the second place the manifest advantage of crossing strains and infusing into life elements that come from outside the organism, or even from a specialised organ or the same organism, was seized upon by natural selection and a process was inaugurated that is called fertilisation,—first through an organ belonging to the organism itself (hermaphroditism), and then by the detachment of this organ, and its erection into an independent, but miniature organism wholly unlike the primary one. This last was at first parasitic upon the primary organism, then complementary to it, and carried about in a sac provided for the purpose. Its simplest form was a sac filled with spermatozoa in liquid or gelatinous medium. Later it was endowed with an ephemeral independent existence and so adjusted that its contained sperm cells were at the proper time brought into contact with the germ cells of the organism proper This fertilising organ or miniature sperm sac was the primitive form of what subsequently developed into the male sex, the female sex being the organism proper, which remained practically unchanged.

The remaining steps in the entire process consisted therefore in the subsequent modification and creation as it were of the male organism. The development of a male organism out of this formless sperm sac or testicle was accomplished through the continuous selection of the organism proper, ultimately called the female, of such forms among the many varying forms of the fertilising agent as best conformed to the tastes or vaguely felt preferences of the organism, and the exclusion of all other forms from any part in the process of fertilisation. The peculiarities of form thus selected are transmitted by heredity, and while they do not affect the female they transform the male in harmony with these preferences of the female or organism proper. As the male fertiliser is a product of reproduction by the organism, it naturally inherits the general qualities of the organism. The preferences of the organism are also likely to be a form similar to itself. The organism, or female, therefore literally creates the male in its own image, and from a shapeless sac it generally assumes a definite form, agreeing in general characteristics with that of the original organism. There is no other reason why the male should in the least resemble the female, and but for these causes a male animal might belong to an entirely different type from the female. Even as it is the resemblance is often not close, and in the sexes differ enormously.

The introduction of fertilisation in connection with reproduction was gradual, and was not at first at all necessary to it. It came at the outset as an occasional resort for infusing new elements after a long series of generations through normal reproduction. This occasional fertilisation is called the alternation of generations. It is common to many of the lower organisms, and to all plants, reproduction of buds being the normal form, and that by seeds being the result of fertilisation. So great was the advantage of fertilisation that in the animal kingdom it first came to accompany each separate act of reproduction, and finally became a condition to reproduction itself. From the fact that such is the case in the higher animals, which are the ones best known to all, the error arose that fertilisation is an essential part of reproduction and that sex is necessary to reproduction, an error difficult to dislodge.

The male having been thus created at a comparatively late period in the history of organic life, it soon advanced under the influences described, and began to assume more or less the form and character of the primary organism, which is then called the female. It lost its character of a formless mass of sperm cells and assumed definite shape. For a long time it did not exist for itself but simply for its function, was exceedingly small, frail and ephemeral, often possessing no organ of nutrition, or powers of self-preservation, as perishing as soon as it had performed its function, or without performing it, if not selected from among a multitude of males. This selection of the best examples and rejection of the inferior ones caused the male to rise in the scale, and resemble more and more the primary organism or female. But other qualities were also selected than those that the female possessed. This was due to the early development of the aesthetic faculty in the female; and these qualities were in the nature of embellishments. [4]

The male therefore, while approaching the form and stature of the female, began to differ from her in these aesthetic qualities. The result was that, in the two highest classes of animals, birds and mammals, the male became in many cases, but not in all, highly ornamental and endowed with numerous peculiar organs, called secondary sexual characters. To further selection, a plurality of males often occurred, and these became rivals for female favour. This led to battle among males which further developed the latter especially in the direction of size, strength, weapons of defence and general fighting capacity. These qualities were never used to force the female into submission, but always and solely to gain her favour, and ensure the selection of the successful rivals. In many birds and mammals these qualities became greatly over-developed, resulting in what I have called Male efflorescence. To a considerable extent but less than in many other species the immediate ancestor of man possessed this over-development of the male; and in most primates the male is larger, stronger and more highly ornamented than the female.

When the human race finally appeared through gradual emergence from the great simian stock, this difference the sexes existed, and sexual selection was still going on. Primitive woman, though somewhat smaller, physically weaker and aesthetically plainer than man, still possessed the power of selection, and was mistress of the kinship group. Neither sex had any more idea of the connection between fertilisation and reproduction than have animals and therefore the mother alone claimed and cared for the offspring, as is done throughout the animal kingdom below man. So long as this state of things endured the race remained in the stage called gynaecocracy, or female rule. That this was a very long stage is attested by a great number of facts, many of which have been considered.

"As it was brain development which alone made man out of an animal by enabling him to break over faunal barriers and overspread the globe, so it was brain development that finally suggested the causal nexus between fertilisation and reproduction, and led to the recognition by man of his paternity and joint proprietorship with woman in the offspring of their loins. This produced a profound social revolution, overthrew the authority of woman, destroyed her power of selection, and finally reduced her to the condition of a mere slave of the stronger sex, although that strength had been conferred by her. The stage of gynaecocracy was succeeded by the stage of androcracy, and the subjection of woman was rendered complete."

Thus then is the evolutionary story of the Female "Fall" from that stage when "maternity was everything," and all things centred round the female; and hers was the choice in sexual selection, to that patriarchal period which prevailed throughout the remainder of the proto-social stage, when "woman being reduced to a mere chattel, bought and sold, was enslaved and abused beyond any powers of description.". As the various races among primitive hordes mixed, brain development increased, and when a leisured class was slowly evolved, the aesthetic sense in man led to a widespread system of male sexual selection, or andreclexis, through which the physical nature of woman was modified, and types of female beauty were produced. The effect of male sexual selection was, however, to lower the general status of woman by "increasing her dependence upon man, while at the same time reducing her power to labour, or in any way protect or preserve herself."

"There are many indications that woman was slow to surrender her sceptre, and that the gradual loss of her power of rejection and selection took place with all the irregularity that characterises all natural phenomena … Almost every conceivable form of marriage or union has been found: While most persons suppose that nothing is so certainly fixed by nature, and even by divine decree, as the particular form of marriage that happens to prevail in their own country, ethnologists know that nothing is so purely conventional as just this fact of the ways in which then and women arrange or agree to carry on the work of continuing the race."

What is known as Amazonism, through which at some period or other most races have passed, is a strong proof of gynaecocracy having universally prevailed in the human race; while the group of facts in which Bachefen in 1861 based his pronouncement that the ancient laws and records, both written and hieroglyphic, indicated a widespread system of descent and inheritance in the female line among both Aryan and Semitic peoples, supports it still more strongly, and opens out new vistas of the early relations of the sexes.

A little later McLennan discovered that a large number of existing uncivilised races still reckon through the female line, and actually have a more or less complete system of mother-right. Just as with animals the sex relations are arranged on a basis which best subserves the different species, so was it with early man, as he slowly emerged from the animal state; "and properly viewed they have always been such since that date." The many forms of marriage we find when we begin to study the question are all the result of the economic and other compelling conditions of existence. The Kaffir or Zulu of to-day buys his wife for so many yoke of oxen and the Kaffir woman looks down with contempt on the white wife, who has cost nothing in the white marriage market.

The reason for the market value placed on the Kaffir wife is that she is the agricultural labourer to a husband employer, who is one of the communal owners of a fertile land, and who loves to lie in the sunshine and smoke many pipes. The purchased wife toils loyally until enough oxen are obtained to buy wife No.2. who then shares the labours and eases the working burdens of No.1. Sometimes no.3 is added, but in every case each wife has her own hut, and own status as "wife," and brings up her children in their own little separate group. They are very much in the stage of the wives of the early patriarchs we read about in some of the books of the Bible. But by the time this patriarchal system prevailed, gynaecocracy had long ceased to exist in the more advanced races, and androcracy was fully established.

The discovery of paternity gave the father the desire to exercise power over the child in equal authority with the mother. This led to a comparison of physical strength between the sexes; for women did not for ages lay down lightly their exclusive maternal privileges; and this fact appears to the writer of this synopsis, to give a clue to the reason for women being so fiercely and often selfishly anti-social as regards the children of the race as a whole.

Tens of thousands of women are devoted and unselfish mothers to their own offspring, for whom they think nothing in the way of education and nurture too good; while they have a ‘blind spot’ as regards the children of other women, and they seem incapable of what might be called ‘social motherhood.’ May it be that the struggle for equal authority over the children between father and mother was so intense and embittered in the past, and the mother was so completely worsted and enslaved by the time when law finally emerged, that her maternal vision was absolutely narrowed down to the individual struggle which each woman had for ages to carry on for the retention of some scrap or fragment of mother-right?

“Physical strength never comes in question in the gynaecocratic stage. The female dispenses her favours according to her choice, and the males acquiesce after venting their jealousy on one another. The idea of coercing the female or extorting her favour never so much as occurs to the male mind. The virtue of the female animal is absolute, for virtue does not consist, as many suppose, in refusal, but in selection. It is refusal of the unfit, and of all at improper times and places. This definition of virtue applies to human beings, even the most civilised, as well as to animals. The female animal, or the human female in the gynaecocratic state would perish before she would surrender her virtue.”

What a commentary is this on modern social conditions, in which woman’s virtue is one of the articles of commerce, bought by the highest bidder, either in or out of marriage, and where the “unfit,” if possessed of economic power, have perforce to be accepted by the human female! In the passage from the gynaecocratic to the audrocratic state, man therefore, according to Professor Ward, lost his normal respect for the preferences of women, and woman lost her virtue.

“He began to learn the economic value of woman, and, in proportion to his realisation of physical strength making him the master creature, he used her to contribute to his pleasure and to his wants.”

This, our author considers, is the darkest spot in the somewhat dreary journey down the stream of time; and he quotes Herbert Spencer in this indictment of androcracy in its worst material manifestations.

“In the history of humanity as written, the saddest part concerns the treatment of women. … The amount of suffering which has been and is borne by women is utterly beyond imagination.”

And Professor Ward adds to Spencer’s indictment the remark:

“Far too many human sins are attributed to the brute that still lurks in man, but in this case it is flagrantly unjust to do this, since, as has been seen, no male brute maltreats the female, and the abuse of females by males is an exclusively human virtue.”

Darwin wrote:

“Man is more powerful in body and mind than woman, and in the savage state he keeps her in a far more abject state of bondage than does the male of any other animal.”

And when writing of the advances in the human mind, which are destroying ‘the prejudices that have produced between the sexes an inequality of rights injurious even to the favoured sex,' he remarks:

"In vain is it sought to justify it by differences in their physical organisation, in the strength of their intellects, in their moral sensibilities. This inequality has had no other origin than the abuse of power, and it is in vain that men have since sought to excuse it by sophisms."

While to wind up and synthesise the indictment of the general ill treatment and subjection, of women in the past, and the particular ill treatment and subjection of many women in the present, Lester Ward writes:

"The whole difficulty of understanding these abuses lies in the fact that civilised men cannot conceive of a state in which no moral sentiments exist, no sympathy for pain, no sense of justice. And yet every day, in every civilised country of the world, the public press informs us of wife beatings that are scarcely less horrid than those of savages, and these would of course be far more horrid and but for the restraints of law and police regulation.

At the stage in the history of any race at which the transition from gynaecocracy to androcacy took place, and for a long period afterwards, all men were morally below the level of the basest wife-beater of modern society, at a stage in which the first spark of sympathy for suffering in others had not yet kindled. It yet is this manner of man, man coming to consciousness through the dawn of a purely egoistic intellect, who suddenly, as it were, discovered that the physically inferior being, who had without his knowledge, endowed him with his superiority, was in his power, and could be made to serve him. Hence the subjection of woman."

In pursuance of the setting forth of his theory of how andocracy reached its present phase of development, Professor Lester Ward then treats briefly of the primitive family as it passed through the stages of polygamy, to monogamy, and of marriage in its various phases of marriage by capture and of barter to the more legalised arrangements of modern times. We all know that the "sacred" institution of family, as it now exists, is based on the famulus or slave of Roman times. Over this group of slaves, which included the wife and children, the old Roman patriarch had power of life and death. The word "marriage" in the English language, Ward explains has three meanings:

"1. The mutual, voluntary union of a man and a woman. 2. The act of union of a man to a woman, or of a woman to a man. 3. The causing of a woman to unite with a man … These uses of the word 'marriage' represent an evolution, and the first meaning was the last to be developed, and represents the greatest mutuality and equality of the marrying parties that has been attained."

The third meaning applied especially to marriage in patriarchal time, when the patriarch, who owned all the women of his family disposed of them as he saw fit. All women slaves taken in warfare were disposed of to the conquerors, the younger women as wives, the older as bond-slaves.

"With the origin of the State, and the establishment of more and more complete codes of law, marriage was legalised and regulated, and became more and more a human institution. But when we see how little advanced marriage was in Greece and Rome during what we call antiquity, we may easily imagine what it must have been at an earlier date, and among more backward races."

But, through the varied forms of marriage, down to modern times they contain one point in common, the proprietorship of the husband in the wife, while the slave origin of the marriage state is betrayed in the word "obey," which is to be found in the marriage ceremonies of most countries.

As regards male sexual selection Professor Ward holds that:

"The same aesthetic sense through which the female mind had created the male being, including man as we find him, was not extinguished, it was simply overwhelmed by the power of the new-born egoistic reason of man using the strength acquired through female selection in the subjugation and domination of the innocent and unconscious authoress of these gifts. Nor was this aesthetic sense an exclusively female attribute. It is au invariable concomitant of brain development … But the aesthetic sense is not intense … By the side of the sexual interest of the male, in animal and in earliest man, it is so feeble as scarcely to make itself felt … The only selection that took place down to the close of the proto-social stage was female selection. The females alone were sufficiently free from the violence of passion to compare, deliberate, and discriminate. This they did, and we have seen the result."

But with the lapse of centuries and the introduction of the caste system, and later of a leisured class, female selection, or gynaeclexis entirely ceased; and polygamy was made possible for the leisured class, the nobility and the priesthood, causing an intensive form of male selection or andreclexis, which made "the large seraglios of oriental, Semitic and arian peoples stirpicultural nurseries of female beauty." The process of male selection carried on for untold ages, produced, according to Professor Ward, the models for the exquisite specimens of Greek sculpture. He further points out that there is a certain amount of unreality, artificiality, and spuriousness about female as about male secondary sexual characters; that is to say man does not select woman generally for size, strength, intellectual, or moral qualities, or for fecundity; what he prefers is physical frailty, and ephemeral beauty. Woman therefore does not advance in any sterling mental or moral qualities; and under the same influence woman grows more sterile, rather than more fertile.

"The result is that, if this were to go on a sufficient length of time, without the neutralising and compensating effect of other more normal influences, woman might ultimately be reduced to a helpless parasite on society, comparable to the condition of the primitive male element, and, the cycle might be completed by the production of complemental females corresponding to Darwin's complemental males in the cirripeds. There are certain women now, in what is regarded as high society, who are even less useful, since they contribute nothing to the quantity or quality of the human species … In fact most leisure class ideas tend in the direction of making the woman of that class as useless as possible."

Thus is it that woman throughout historical times has occupied a position tending to fix in the human mind the idea of her eternal subjection and of man's eternal superiority.

"So universal is this attitude that a presentation of the real and fundamental relation of the sexes is something new to those who are able to see it, and something preposterous to those who are not. The idea that the female is naturally and really the superior sex seems incredible, and only the most liberal and emancipated minds, possessed of a store of biological information; are capable of realising it."

Oriental, Greek, Roman, and much of the literature of the fifteenth, sixteenth, and seventeenth centuries attribute to women every vile and despicable quality. In the fifteenth century, after Innocent VIII. had issued his Papal Bull against Witchcraft women who showed any special traits of mother-wisdom, or of intellectual self-expression were burnt in tens of thousands as witches.

All ancient cosmogonies, including the Hebrew, which still dominates European thought, describe woman as only a lower or secondary form of creation. The Indian Code of Manu places woman always in subjection; first to her father, then to her husband,—and if he dies then to her sons or other male relatives. In fact, taking into consideration the centuries of legal and social ostracism from most of the advantages which tend to foster mental and physical progress, the marvel is that women have accomplished as much as they have done.

The reason, no doubt, some comparatively few of them have always succeeded in rising above the dead level of the ordinary subjected woman, is that in cases where the male parent possessed special gifts of intellect or moral worth; these gifts have in many cases been handed down to the female offspring, and have enabled her in the teeth of tradition and conventions to prove herself an able woman—sometimes even a woman of genius. Of such, was Mary Wolstonecraft, who was described by a contemporary writer as "a hyena in petticoats." But light was even then (when Mary Wolstonecraft in the XVIIIth century wrote not only, be it remembered, of "The Rights of Women," but also "The Rights of Men") breaking on the long drawn-out and dark night of the history of women. As Professor Ward writes:

"A single glance at the last two centuries of the historic period, compared with the centuries that preceded them shows such an immense change in woman's condition as to suggest that the vast, downward curve has more than reached the lowest point, and that the ordinates have begun to shorten … Not only this, but a closer scrutiny reveals the fact that the curve does not lie wholly in the same plane, and that the figure has three dimensions. In other words, it is not a cycle or circle, but a spiral, and the ends will never meet and restore a true gynaecocracy. With the completion of a revolution, both man and woman will find themselves on a far higher plane, and in a stage that for want of a better term, may be called gyandrocratic, a stage in which both man and woman shall be free to rule themselves."

Having now brought my synopsis of Professor Lester Ward's gynaecocentric theory to a close, it is necessary to point out why it is so important that, at a time when life,—young, beautiful, healthy, life has been poured out on the battle-fields of Europe, Asia and Africa as if it were the dross, instead of the wealth of the world, we should begin to ask ourselves whether the androcracy, or man rule, which is still in the ascendant, is indeed the ideal rule, which is likely to guarantee the health, happiness and permanence of the human race?

Men have had for long ages now sole control of: the conditions of life. They make laws, not only about armaments, commerce, political and international questions, but also about social, domestic and economic questions, without consulting the subjected sex as to their wishes or interests. Childbearing, the education and rearing of children, questions of food purity, food supply and distribution (which questions all intimately concern the mother and the homemaker) are decided entirely by men, and are decided in a way to suit male commercial and military pursuits, not in a way which favours the highest development of the and consequently of the race.

It is true that women are being used daily more and more by men in public work and administration, but they are being used as tools for accomplishing men's aims and schemes, not as free citizens, having a mandate from their men and women fellow-citizens to plan and work and spend for the benefit of the race. The wildest absurdities arc being committed in Great Britain in the way of appointments of men by men to all the superior posts, even in Department's which are clearly indicated as being women's special sphere.

Instances of ignorant interference by men in conditions which affect the Home could be multiplied ad infinitum; they, like other wrong conditions, become more glaring in war time, and in periods following war, and also, unfortunately, cause more harm than in times of peace. They are supreme instances of Androcracy carried to its extreme limits, and made the more dangerous and far-reaching, because it is using some few women, in the pay of a masculine Government as its mouthpiece The business of these paid women is to endorse the decrees of that Government, be they wise or foolish; and to help in every way to cover up the mistakes and perplexities of the androcracy.

What we sorely need during the long crisis produced by a man-made war (and that is no doubt needed in both enemy and neutral countries) is the gynadrocracy, of which Lester. Ward writes in his forecast the higher plane of social and economic conditions towards which evolution is tending, "when both man and woman shall be free to rule themselves."

When that period comes the men and women who administer the affairs of each nation will be men chosen by a real democratic mandate, and if they allow the young life of the nation to be wasted, the agricultural resources of the nation to be frittered away or destroyed, the wealth of the nation in the necessaries of food, clothing, warmth and shelter to be so reduced that the nation as a whole suffers, then the community will deal with them as traitors to the common cause, who, having accepted heavy responsibility and high honour, have proved unworthy or unequal to carrying out their trust.

Security in the prosecution their daily work or business is what the nations demand, Security that the young sons for whom every sacrifice is being made by parents, shall not be trampled into the offal of a modern battle field, or live blinded or crippled for the rest of their days. Security that the young daughters, for whom also every sacrifice is made by parents shall not be used by an autocratic androcracy to manufacture horrible and ghastly weapons of slaughter, and be thus misused and prostituted for the war lusts of men, so that they became the destroyers instead of the nurturers of life. Security that the fields sown, and the flocks and herds raised shall not be destroyed by the red anarchy of modern warfare armed with every scientific contrivance and invention for wholesale wanton destruction. Security against the maiming and blasting of the moral life and conscience of millions of men and women, whom militarism and its attendant evils sweep off their feet into the ranks of the criminal the diseased, the outcasts of society.

Statistics show that every war has always resulted in an increase of venereal disease; and venereal disease is the arch enemy of the health of the race, and consequently of the Home. We women are always being reminded by men, when we ask to be allowed a share in public duties and responsibilities that our place is the Home. But in order to do our duty in the Home it is neccesary that we should have control over the conditions and influences that affect the Home. Food supply, food distribution, food purity and free freedom from adulteration. Health conditions, education, the moral conditions of our streets and towns, the industrial and other occupations in which our young people are employed, in all of these, we women as Home-makers, claim the right to legislate and to administer laws in order that the harmful influences to the race in these matters which are at present settled on a purely androcentric basis, may be removed.

Of what use we urge is it for us to strive to maintain in the Home an ideal of purity, grace and moral fragrance, if, immediately the boy or girl steps across the threshold of the Home, the very opposite influences are brought to bear, in all their vulgar commercial, crudity on the youth of the nation? No one who reflects on the conditions under which the race in any so-called civilised country is at present reared, can feel that the purely androcentric interests which rule and determine the environment, training and culture of the young are in scientific agreement with the knowledge and wisdom that are in the possession of both the woman and men of the race.

It is the man who decrees what money shall be spent on public education, though both men and women are taxed to supply that money. It is the man who decrees under what conditions the materials for food and clothing shall be raised, manufactured and distributed; though the functions, of feeding and clothing are the special functions of women; and the efficiency of Home administration is destroyed by the adulterated food, which it is to the commercial interests of the androcracy to supply; while short commons or starvation face the woman Home-maker and her children whenever androcentric national rivalries decree that War must take the place of Diplomacy, and that weapons for the destruction of the race must be produced in feverish haste throughout the world in the place of food, clothing, fuel and shelter.

It is the man who decrees what penal and civil laws shall be passed, though these laws affect equally the men and the women of the race. It is the man who decides the economic, social, sanitary and spiritual conditions under which the children of the race shall be born, and reared, though it is women who risk life to bear those children and who have to watch silently and bitterly the waste of infant life, because a bungling androcracy is interfering in matters which are outside its sex sphere.

Finally it is men who have decreed lately throughout the world that the supreme life-giving function of womanhood shall be exchanged for, or nullified by, the function of the destruction of life. In no previous war have women been in every country involved personally in the struggle, employed de facto as combatants in the making of the munitions which tear the limbs, put out the eyes, eviscerate and blow to bleeding atoms the sons of other women: Yet this has been going on daily in the most advanced and civilised countries in the world, while under the influence of artificially stimulated hatred, messages of derision and hate have been chalked on shells destined to make widows, orphans and childless mothers.

What the physical and psychic effects on the race will be of this inversion of female functions it is not hard to prognosticate. Psychic disturbances in the life of the human female have an immense influence on her child-bearing function. The tendency of the race under modern normal conditions is to become less and less prolific. Under the abnormal excitement, strain and hysterical hatred produced by being employed as active agents in a world war, we may expect, in the statistics of all the countries involved, not only a diminution in the birth rate, but also a lowering in the quality of the lives born.

The potential mothers of the race who have had placed upon them the unnatural strain of an active share in wholesale life destruction are likely to bear psychically ill-balanced, if not physically defective children.

In the days of gynaecocracy or mother-right, everything to do with the bearing and rearing of infants was a matter of important teaching, of religious initiation, the knowledge being passed on with formal observances from the elder to the younger women. It was not for nothing that the future mothers of the race were kept apart in the brooding quiet of the primitive home. Nature was working in the bodies of the maidens certain mysteries, preparing them for the nine months home of the yet-to-be-born. It was instinct and dawning woman wisdom in the care and nurture of the race which dictated foresight, this reasonable preparedness and helpfulness in Nature’s great reproductive aims.

But now that armed androcracy has culled every maid and wife from the home to help in a catastrophic struggle for world supremacy, it is possible that the very foundations of race life may be undermined and seriously threatened by the outburst of male rivalries which inspired the present world war.

It is for these reasons that I felt it might be at the present time of special interest to men and women to study in the past, what were the relations between the sexes,- in vegetable, insect, bird, mammal and human life, which led up to our present one-sided state of sex influence in all that vitally concerns the race. No fair minded woman or man can read the story of the gynaecocentric theory, as developed by Professor Lester Ward without finding therein the material to make her or him “furiously to think.” No fair minded woman or man can look at the world today as it groans and travails under andocentric rule without realising if gyandrocentric or equal rule between the sexes would give even an off chance of improvement in the condition under which the race has to live and develop, gyandrocracy should be given its chance.

Again I must make the point that gyandrocracy is not meant the choosing of a certain number of women by men as men's mouthpieces, with authority absolutely restricted by the wishes and financial doles of men; neither does it mean the granting of political votes to some propertied women; but it means equal responsibility in law-making and in arranging the social and economic conditions that control everyday life and work.

The essence of the gynaecocentric theory is that "the female is the race," and that under the long discipline of the period when all things centred round the female, she developed maternal courage and maternal efficiency; some of this courage and efficiency has necessarily been stultified since androcentric law usurped the place of gynaecocentric law.

May we not dare to hope that Nature may once more triumphantly bring good out of evil, and since men have elected to decimate their numbers and destroy: the flower of their youth in hecatombs of slaughter, women, being compelled by necessity to take the places of fallen men in the business and work of life, may insist on and succeed in obtaining equal power in the ordering and government of life and in the administration of affairs? Every material progress sets free more spiritual forces; and it is the spiritual life, the life of beauty, and of the whole synthetic range of Art, for lack of which the race at present starves, because it as no leisure to enjoy it: Till the present era the civilisation of a leisured class, whose existence has, in the long run, demoralised the leisured, and has led to disharmonies, and eventual decadence.

The slave class can now he replaced by applied modern machinery, which can produce wealth and do work, the story of which reads like a fairy tale. The scientific communal use of this machinery will set the world of women and men free to begin the struggle for the higher and more spiritual life, which in the future will be the goal of the race. The poets and thinkers have foreseen that day and have sung of its future glories; nations, like individuals may "rise on stepping stones of their dead selves to higher things."

When the murk and dust and refuse-heaps of war are cleared away, when towns and villages are rebuilt, and when grass and harvests grow once more on the tormented soil under which the sons of the rival nations sleep silently side by side; when the great ships sail once more in safety from port to port, carrying the necessities and the luxuries of life for all mankind to enjoy; when we can again look around us and count the costs,—the losses and the gains of the hurricane of passion and of death, which has swept through Europe, and has shaken with cyclonic devastation the four corners of the World,—then perhaps we may weigh and ponder with new wisdom and with clearer outlook the saying of Letourneau:

"The condition of women may even furnish a good criterion of the degree of development of a people."

Notes

1. As regards the relative size and capacity of the brains of men and women, Mr. Havelock Ellis writes: “There is much better ground for the later view, according to which, relating to size, the nervous superiority belongs to women, just as all small animals have relatively large brains. Man and Woman, page 141.

2. As regards this quotation Mr. Havelock Ellis writes me that he does not recognise it as being in any of his works. In ‘Man and Woman,’ page 422 he has written, “The female animal everywhere is more closely, and for a longer period occupied with the process of reproduction, which is Nature’s main concern”. This is indeed more than a zoological fact; it is a biological fact; among plants we find that the stamens soon fall away, while the pistil remains.

3. This theory of the aesthetic faculty in the sexual selection of the female is of rare interest, and seems to be supported by one of the paradoxical, but probably one of correct poetic guesses of a literary genius of the nineteenth century. “Life imitates Art far more than Art imitates Life. This results not merely from Life’s imitative instinct but from the fact that the self-conscious aim of Life is to find expression, and that Art offers certain beautiful forms through which it may realise that energy. It is a theory which has never been put forward before, but it is extremely fruitful, and throws an entirely new light upon the history of Art Art “The decay of Lying. A Dialogue. “ Oscar Wilde.

4. This question of aesthetic selection of animals is still a controversial one. Mr. Havelock Ellis discusses the point in his third volume “Studies.”—D.B.M

The Gold Pill: Rebuilding Relationships with Ancient Wisdom

May 17, 2025 | by Sufjan S. Fannin | Link | Original Link

---

1. Introduction: A New Language for a Broken Landscape

We live in a time when relationships are harder to navigate than ever. Expectations are unclear, commitments are unstable, and traditional frameworks have either collapsed or been pathologized. In the middle of this mess, something new has emerged—something grounded, mature, and restorative. It's called the Gold Pill.

The Gold Pill is not a fantasy or a reaction, but a return to realism. It offers men and women a way to understand relationships not just through feelings or resentment, but through value, structure, and mutual respect. It's a mindset for those who want a partnership that lasts, not just sparks that fade.

2. What Is the Gold Pill?

The Gold Pill is a philosophy of relationships rooted in ancient wisdom, updated for the modern world. It's a response to the extremes of the current dating culture—especially those promoted in the Manosphere—and offers a third path: neither cynical nor delusional.

At its heart, the Gold Pill insists that love is not free. Historically, love was structured—backed by family negotiations, community standards, and clear reciprocal obligations. That structure, however imperfect, kept relationships sustainable.

Today, that structure has been replaced by something far flimsier: feelings, vibes, and social media approval. The Gold Pill doesn't reject love. It simply warns that romance without reciprocity becomes a trap. What was once known as dowry, alliance, and mutual obligation has been degraded into performative gestures and one-sided devotion. Men now routinely pay for virtual attention on platforms like OnlyFans, and pledge lifelong devotion in the form of marriage proposals… often to women who offer little, if any, meaningful reciprocity. The Gold Pill reclaims those lost truths and reframes them in a way that is practical, fair, and deeply human.

Unlike the optimism of pop psychology, which often suggests that love will simply arrive if we work on ourselves, the Gold Pill recognizes that love is a social structure, not just a personal feeling. It must be cultivated, negotiated, and honored by both partners.

3. The Philosophical Backbone: Key Tenets of the Gold Pill

The Gold Pill Credo (by iTrebor) lays out its philosophy with clarity:

• Love is not unconditional: It has always required structure and contribution.
• The dowry system never disappeared: It changed form and became an unspoken expectation on men.

• Provision without reciprocity is exploitation: Giving without return is not noble—it is servitude.
• Romance is not a foundation: Feelings follow structure, not the other way around.
• Men have value by default: Worth is not earned through endless labor or submission.
• Fairness is the foundation of respect: Without balance, love decays into resentment.

This philosophy rejects both the idealism of the Blue Pill and the nihilism of the Black Pill. It avoids the rage of the Red Pill and the illusions of the pickup artist world. Instead, it studies history, incentives, and human nature. The goal is not domination or detachment—but durable connection.

4. Context: The Manosphere and Its Fragmented Pillars

To understand the Gold Pill, it helps to know the world it emerged from: the Manosphere. This loosely connected online ecosystem explores men's issues, dating dynamics, masculinity, and society's changing expectations of men.

Over time, the Manosphere has splintered into camps:

• Red Pill: Rooted in evolutionary psychology and social critique. Its main insight is that many romantic ideals are false, but it often falls into bitterness and manipulation.
• Blue Pill: The mainstream narrative. It believes in love as an organic, magical outcome if you're a good enough person. It's deeply idealistic—and often blind to modern realities.
• Black Pill: A fatalistic view that believes looks and status are all that matter. Often associated with incels, it sees relationships as rigged beyond redemption.
• Pickup Artists (PUAs): Focused on tactics for seduction. Often transactional and performance-based.
• MGTOW (Men Going Their Own Way): A disengagement philosophy where men distance themselves from traditional relationships—especially marriage—to protect their peace, autonomy, and long-term well-being. While many opt out entirely, some maintain selective relationships on their own terms. At its core, MGTOW resists systems seen as exploitative or one-sided.
• Men's Rights Activists (MRAs): Focus on legal and institutional bias against men, such as in family courts and domestic violence law.
• Christ Pill: A smaller but growing movement that believes a return to traditional Christian morality is the solution to modern relationship chaos.
• Passport Bros: Men who leave Western dating markets in search of relationships abroad where they feel more respected or appreciated.

These all offer pieces of the puzzle—but often fail to deliver a vision that is both honest and hopeful. That's where the Gold Pill comes in.

5. Origins and Influences: Where the Gold Pill Comes From

The Gold Pill grew organically from deep, ongoing conversations between creators, scholars, and thinkers trying to make sense of modern relationships. Its central figure is Shah, creator of the ThisIsShah stream on YouTube. Shah's work draws on everything from child support, men's issues, history, anthropology and economics to personal testimony and religious tradition.

The term "Gold Pill" itself was coined by Shah's friend iTrebor during a Saturday Night Stream on May 10, 2025. Since then, the idea has taken on a life of its own.

Other influential voices include:

• Jon, creator of the ItsComplicated YouTube channel, known for his street interviews revealing public confusion around relationship norms and gender roles.
• Paul Elam, founder of A Voice for Men, a key figure in the men's rights movement.
• Peter Wright, scholar and historian on gender norms and gynocentric culture, is the founder of Gynocentrism.com, a long-running blog documenting the history and impact of female-centered social structures.
• Stephen Baskerville, political scientist focusing on family law and fatherhood.
• The broader community of ThisIsShah stream participants, who bring lived experience, academic rigor, and honest dialogue to the table.

These thinkers, along with countless everyday men, are shaping a new paradigm—one where men no longer self-sacrifice to be accepted but instead build on mutual respect.

6. Reclaiming the Dowry: Ancient Tools for Modern Partnership

One of the most striking contributions of the Gold Pill is its re-evaluation of the dowry.

Most people today misunderstand dowries as primitive or patriarchal. But in truth, the dowry system often served as a stabilizing mechanism. It forced both families to take marriage seriously, provided the couple with resources to start their life, and ensured that the union was equitable. The dowry was not a payment for a bride—it was an investment in a future.

In many cultures, it balanced hypergamy, reinforced mutual obligations, and allowed structured negotiations. Where it functioned well, it gave young couples a better shot at long-term success than today's vibe-based dating economy.

The Gold Pill revives this understanding—not to copy it literally, but to translate its principles for today. Structure. Reciprocity. Shared mission. These are the real currencies of lasting relationships.

7. Conclusion: From Fragmentation to Foundation

The Gold Pill isn't a reaction—it's a reconstruction. It doesn't exist to fight women or rage against the system. It exists because men and women both deserve better than what we've been sold.

In a world of romantic confusion, the Gold Pill offers clarity.
In a world of transactional performance, it offers structure.
In a world of silent burnout, it offers reciprocity.

Whether you're a man trying to find your footing, or a woman seeking partnership that feels truly mutual, the Gold Pill invites you to rebuild—not from fantasy, but from value. From intention. From wisdom.

We don't retreat. We don't chase. We build.
And this time, we build with gold.

Epilogue: My Gold Pill Moment

For years, I navigated the world of dating with a sense of confusion and frustration. Despite my best efforts to be a supportive and understanding partner, relationships often left me feeling unappreciated and emotionally drained.

It wasn't until I discovered Shah's content that I began to see things differently. His insights into the dynamics of modern relationships and the importance of mutual respect resonated deeply with me. I realized that I had been operating under misguided assumptions, believing that self-sacrifice and constant validation were the keys to a successful partnership.

This revelation was both liberating and empowering. I started to approach relationships with a renewed sense of self-worth, seeking connections that were balanced, respectful, and grounded in mutual appreciation. The Gold Pill philosophy didn't just change my perspective—it transformed my life.

Just say No? Are you crazy?

May 19, 2025 | by August Løvenskiolds | Link | Original Link

> Heaven has no rage like love to hatred turned / Nor hell a fury like a woman scorned ~ The Mourning Bride by William Congreve (1697)

Have you ever refused a woman's sexual advances?

I've said no to women who were too old, too young, too drunk, too fat, too thin, too smelly, and even too needy. Quite often I've said no for no clear reason that I can identify other than something seemed off or I just wasn't interested. Once I even drove a woman 40 minutes to her apartment at 2 AM fully intending to spend the night – and then I drove away because I suddenly felt ill at ease – and I woke up with the flu the next morning.

Saying "no" to a woman in any context is difficult to impossible for most men – we will literally die rather than fail to protect or service them. As Karen Straughan has pointed out, male politicians have catered to women's needs and political demands long before women even got the vote – think Prohibition for example.

Medically, having regular sex with a woman pregnant with your child seems to reduce the odds of dangerous complications like pre-eclampsia – meaning that, if a man refuses sex with a woman who was, is, or will be pregnant with his child, his "selfishness" is putting both mother and child's lives at risk.

Historically, a man who refused any of the needs of his babymomma was placing his children at risk, so evolution seems to select in favor of men who slavishly obey their womenfolk, particularly when it comes to sex-on-demand.

Nowadays, however, college men are learning that if you say "yes" to sex with a woman who has been drinking, you are raping her, but if you say "no", your reputation, your education, your future livelihood, and even your life can be destroyed at the woman's whim: You're gay. You're a rapist. You drugged me. You've got a tiny dick. You hate women. Shut up, you privileged abuser. True or not, these allegations are real, unilateral power that women wield against men, and men have little defense other than walking away.

In doing background research for this piece I read a lot of articles about the reasons a man might refuse to have sex with a willing or even demanding woman. I was not completely surprised that all the items I found referenced male sexual refusal only in the context of a long-term relationship.

The idea that one can discuss why a man might refuse the sexual overtures of a new female partner seems almost like a social taboo – few are willing to entertain the radical notion that, even as the AIDS era approaches the end of its third decade, some lunatic, pathetic, yet straight man might set aside his horndog ways and resist the desires of a horny, needy woman. One man commented "You have got to be kidding me […] If I EVER turn down sex it's because I'm in a COMA!!!"

The other thing you too rarely see is how women react to a man's sexual rejection.

Now, I'm no great prize as a man – I'm way too much of a geek and average-looking on my best day, but I do know how to keep my cool around women most of the time, and as I grow older and more distinguished looking, I do get unwanted offers and demands for sex on a regular basis from women I barely know.

My most memorable refusal was of course the most traumatic one and over twenty years ago. After working as a computer programmer on mathematical projects for many years I was assigned a technically incompetent woman as a manager. "Terri" (an alias, as are all the names in this article) had no grasp of mathematics or computers, but in a high-pressure work culture where honesty and clarity was essential to success she was a master at covering her ass to explain away her many screw-ups and project failures. She started hitting on me almost immediately -Terri claimed I reminded her of the ex-husband she still pined for, and instead of letting me do my job, she tried to enlist me as a partner-in-crime in her scamming and ass-covering games.

I was a hard-working, loyal employee and I was appalled at what she was doing to both me and the company. When I resisted her bullshit in favor of actually working, she cut off all my communications with my clients and other employees – if I had a technical question or needed a clarification, it had to go through her, and because she was a math idiot, I never got the answers I needed. I did get a ton of flirting and joking from a woman I increasingly couldn't stand – after years my dream job had morphed into a nightmare in less than a month.

Finally, after another frustrating, unproductive day, Terri and I were the last ones left in the office, and she asked me out to dinner "to talk about things." I refused; I kept my work and social life separate, and I told her that I found her disgusting and unprofessional.

The very next morning she called me into her office for a "surprise" performance review – the first and only negative review I ever received. I was hoping to get fired, but that would have marked Terri as a failed manager for losing an employee who was up to that point considered a hero to the company – I should note that this was in the early 1990's when the idea of a man filing a sexual harassment claim was unthinkable (and in a lot of ways it still is).

I left the company shortly thereafter, and then in my new job (under a competent female boss, thank god) I started hiring away all the other male programmers working under Terri – to a man, they were happy to get out. Less than a month had passed when I started calling on the last and least experienced novice programmer they had left; they gave him an instant 20% salary boost and another manager ("Bob") called me and asked me why I was damaging them like that. I told him the whole story; soon, Terri was blacklisted and permanently stripped of all her remaining employees.

Then, for good measure, I hired Bob away from them, too. The entire product line we had worked on was soon dead and their entire division was gone in less than a year later.

I now own my own (non-computer) business in a struggling, artsy-fartsy entertainment district in a major city. At over 8 years mine is one of the longest-surviving businesses still there. I am expected to be a friendly, public “face” for my customers and regulars and while I don’t mind this at all, I do get approached by a lot of women, many of them tipsy and half my age or less. It is not unusual at all for me to be kissed, hugged and even more aggressively approached 4-6 times an evening. Most of the time I can painlessly deflect them by saying things like “it was good to meet you” and “let me know if you need anything else” but at least six times in the last year things have gotten ugly.

The first woman I refused, “Angel”, mid-twenties, former cheerleader, unwed mom of two kids by two different dads, just wanted “to take me home and fool around”. I declined politely and she seemed to take it in stride, but I soon found out from other female friends that she was complaining that I must be gay because no man had ever turned her down before. One dear friend of mine took it upon herself to set Angel straight – “I’ve seen Auggie with several beautiful women and I also know from personal experience he is NOT gay.”

The second woman, “Beth”, also mid-twenties, said that she had a crush on me, and considering her girth, I believed her – she called me gay to my face when I refused to have sex with her 250 lb, nominally Christian ass (that had already been through her second abortion). My response to her was, “well, as it happens, I wasn’t gay until I met you.” At the time I thought this was a clever rejoinder, but on reflection I concluded it carries a subtext of homophobia that was not accurate in expressing my intent.

By the time the third woman, “Chris”, early thirties and quite fetching, called me gay I had perfected my response: “Although I love my gay brothers, I am only sexually attracted to women who aren’t homophobic bitches like you.” Although she was stunned into silence, Chris still hits on me from time to time and I tolerate it because she has a number of male orbiters she parades in front of me and I don’t need open physical conflict in my business, but those guys do purchase a lot of stuff.

As I was trying to play a game of pinball, the fourth woman, “Darla” immediately cuddled up to me like a wounded puppy and as if I was an old lover of hers. I asked her to let me finish my game and she stormed off into the ladies’ room. I asked the friend she was with what was going on and she said that Darla had just been released from a mental health facility – no big shock there.

I finished the game and went to grab a beer and watch a baseball game. As I sat on a tall barstool Darla came up beside me and grabbed my penis through the fabric of my pants. I resisted the strong urge to physically defend myself; luckily for me a zeta woman pal of mine noticed what was happening, pulled Darla’s hand off of me and scared her away. Crazy dick-grabbing Darla hasn’t been back.

The fifth woman, “Ellie”, with no introduction, walked up, grabbed my left nipple and twisted it hard while I was playing a video game. Now, a woman assaulted like that can scream and cry, but a man so doing that would be seen as a coward. Without saying a word, I turned slightly, locked eyes with her, and twisted my head sideways like a reptile readying to engage an aggressor. She released her grip and scampered away in terror. I barely shifted in my seat as I returned to the game.

And finally and most recently, the sixth woman “Fran” complained loudly that the jukebox had stolen her money, then rubbed her body against mine and asked me if I could “help her out.” I looked at her coldly and said, “Unfortunately for you, I am not under the purview of women.” She teared up (ignored), then stuck out her tongue and made a raspberry noise (ignored), then flipped me off. I smiled slightly and said, “Try again once you grow up and get a job,” walked away, and then hugged a hot lesbian couple who happen to be close friends of mine.

Now, I grew up in a happy family and my parents were together until their deaths, but watching the misery of my many married and divorced friends I’ve always known that modern marriage is a terrible deal for men and soul-destroying for women. I did get dangerously close to marriage a couple of times but I always managed to escape – I guess I was born to be MGTOW long before I first heard the term not even a year ago.

Open your eyes even a crack and you will see women assaulting men with hundreds or even thousands of times the frequency that men assault women. A man who complains or refuses is characterized as a weak, worthless wimp, the butt of a joke, and he quickly learns to shut the fuck up in the face of women’s cruelty and just take it. A woman who complains about even imagined slights winds up as the prime minister of Australia.

But a few men are noticing their chains of pink shame and how easy it is to break them when they realize that men have intrinsic worth, too. Women are likewise noticing with angry concern that their whines are no longer keeping their male slaves from breaking away. I am no longer under the control of women, and I see their unease with men like us growing every day.

I’ve never been happier.

‘Frau Minne’ the Goddess who steals men’s hearts

May 24, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

German chandelier sculpture, ca. 1430, depicting Frau Minne as queen

Frau Minne (vrowe minne) is the personification of courtly love from German Middle Ages. She is frequently addressed directly in Minnesang poetry, usually by a pining lover who is complaining about his state of suffering, but she also appears in the longer Minnerede poems, and in prose works.

She is often referred to as the “Goddess” of romantic love, which is differentiated strongly from other kinds of love such as Christian agape as embodied in the figure of Jesus. To make the distinction clear, romantic love is understood as passion, whereas Christian and Buddhist love is understood as *com*passion.

A rare allegorical painting of ca. 1400, discovered in a guild house in Zurich in 2009 (see below) shows Frau Minne presiding over the suffering of male lovers who are having their hearts torn from their breasts. In this cruel scene Goddess Minne, the mistress of love, sits on a throne consisting of two men. She has just torn out the heart of a man to her left which she holds in her hand, while she is already cutting open the chest of another man to her right to rip his heart out.[1]

Goddess Minne sits on a throne made of two men, while preceding to rip out the hearts of men in love.

The pathological pain associated with romantic love has been linked to women's cultivation of superstimuli, i.e., sexually provocative clothing styles, cosmetics, practiced gestures, and the cultivation of titillating and often frustrating behaviors of courtship that resemble sado-masochistic practices. Such passion-inducing love contrasts with other kinds of love as mentioned above, such as friendship love; the basic parental love extended to children; or that of Christianity or Buddhism which focus on human compassion.

As mentioned elsewhere,[2] romantic love started as a code of conduct among the aristocratic classes of the middle ages. However, the trend made its way by degrees eventually to the middle classes, and finally to the lower classes – or rather it broke class structure altogether in the sense that all Western peoples became inheritors of the customs of romantic love regardless of their social station. This breaking of class barriers is marvelously rendered in the painting below by Hans Koberstein, who portrays the Goddess leading a helpless throng consisting of royalty and pauper, young and old, who are equally held under her sway.

Frau Minne smashes all class barriers, making rich and poor alike suffer from love sickness. [Painting by Hans Koberstein (German, 1864–1945)]

A 15th century depiction "The Power of Frau Minne" (see picture below) captures the pain and pathology so widely believed to be part of the romantic love experience. The pathology associated with romantic love is so disturbing, in fact, that clinical psychologist Dr. Frank Tallis has written a book detailing the sickness of it based on his extensive clinical experience:

> Obsessive thoughts, erratic mood swings, insomnia, loss of appetite, recurrent and persistent images and impulses, superstitious or ritualistic compulsions, delusion, the inability to concentrate—exhibiting just five or six of these symptoms is enough to merit a diagnosis of a major depressive episode. Yet we all subconsciously welcome these symptoms when we allow ourselves to fall in > love. In Love Sick, Dr. Frank Tallis, a leading authority on obsessive disorders, considers our experiences and expressions of love, and why the combinations of pleasure and pain, ecstasy and despair, rapture and grief have come to characterize what we mean when we speak of falling in love. Tallis examines why the agony associated with romantic love continues to be such a popular subject for poets, philosophers, songwriters, and scientists, and questions just how healthy our attitudes are and whether there may in fact be more sane, less tortured ways to love. A highly informative exploration of how, throughout time, principally in the West, the symptoms of mental illness have been used to describe the state of being in love, this book offers an eloquent, thought-provoking, and endlessly illuminating look at one of the most important aspects of human behavior.[3]

"The Power of Frau Minne". (Allegorical depiction of women's power over men's hearts). Broadsheet woodcut, coloured, 15th century by Master Caspar von Regensburg. Berlin, SMB, Kupferstichkabinett.

References:

[1] Frau Minne hat sich gut gehalten, 2009

[2] Wright, P., The evolution of romantic love via romance writings, (2017)

[3] Love Sick: Love as a Mental Illness, by Frank Tallis – overview on Goodreads

Feature image: Frau Minne (personification of courtly love), painted wood, Southern Germany, 1320-1330 ca. The image depicts the lover presenting Frau Minne with his heart which has been pierced by three arrows. There are two German inscriptions with the image, the first of which translates as "Lady, send me solace, my heart has been wounded," while the second reads as "Gracious Lady, I have surrendered."

A portrait of oppression

May 27, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Mona Eltahawy seeks to destroy The Patriarchy. Being so oppressed makes her a high profile feminist as we all know that within feminism the person with the most oppression points wins! As we will see, Eltahawy scores big.

This poor woman was born in Egypt, a country where today a third of the population live below the poverty line. Eltahawy herself was born to middle class parents who were engaging in medical research. By all accounts her childhood was safe, secure and she always had enough to eat, such was the extent to which she was downtrodden. When she was seven her family moved to the UK on a grant provided by the Egyptian government so that they could continue their research. Oppression! Starting at 15 she spent a few years in Saudi Arabia. During this time Eltahawy had it far harder than anyone else who happened to be living in Saudi Arabia at the time or at any other time.

Later she studied at the American Univerity of Cairo, graduating with two degrees in Mass Communication. Further proof of her subjugation. After university Eltahawy worked as a journalist in Egypt and Israel. She went on to write for The Washington Post, The Guardian, and other publications in the mainstream media. This poor beaten-down woman.

She eventually moved to the US and gained citizenship some years later. Sheer and unadulterated persecution.

Eltahawy is, by her own admission, a secular radical feminist Muslim woman. As such she is often preyed on by evil patriarchs and oppressive menz. The menz have so much power as a result of The Patriarchy that they are able to stop her travelling, speaking publicly and publishing books.

Today Eltahawy is so oppressed that she travels the world to say 'fuck The Patriarchy' wherever and whenever she pleases. How she is able to deal with this sort of suppression of her freedoms is anyone's guess.

Eltahawy is so sidelined that during her extensive travels she visited Australia where she spoke at the inaugural Broadside feminist conference held in Melbourne. Coinciding with the conference was an episode of Q&A on the main TV channel of the government-owned Australian Broadcasting Corporation (ABC). The ABC is widely considered to have a significant feminist bias in its reporting but the episode of Q&A took this to a new level. Five feminists including Eltahawy discussed a variety of topics including abolishing the police and physically harming men. It was so bad that even the biased ABC took the unprecedented step of removing the episode from its streaming service and stated that it would not be transmitted again on its TV stations. Eltahawy was not deterred though, pushed for the episode to be made available again, and made it available on her own Youtube channel against the wishes of the copyright holder, the ABC. Narcissism, thy name is Mona.

She has also published a book with the title Headscarves and Hymens: Why the Middle East Needs a Sexual Revolution. A man made her do it.

But fear not, with her bright red hair, garish glasses and a mouth that would make a drunken sailor blush, she is narcissism writ large.

Poor Eltahawy. Let us pity her. Let us weep. Hers is a life of systemic oppression characterised by international travel, fame and wealth. That we could all have it so hard.

The Discussion – The Gold Pill Emerges

May 29, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 58 – Aborigines and Reburial / Paul Erdős / Advertisements and Storytelling

June 1, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Female Generation: Power Without Responsibility

June 6, 2025 | by Sufjan S. Fannin | Link | Original Link

If all females disappeared from the planet tomorrow, life would go on — for a while. The youngest boys would grow up, live their lives, and eventually die of old age. After that, civilization would end — not because it couldn't function, but because it couldn't reproduce. But if all males disappeared, society would collapse in a week. And that week would be a hellscape.

Why? Because the systems that keep the modern world running are still overwhelmingly built and maintained by men. Women as a group haven't developed the institutional knowledge or experience to step in and run it entirely on their own. They didn't build this world. They inherited it.

> Civilized society must be a man's world, because the women's world is a slum... a ghetto.
> — Dr. Daniel Amneus, Garbage Generation

Amneus warned that a matriarchal society — one where women dominate — would lead to decline. Not because women are inferior, but because they haven't carried the responsibility of maintaining civilization the way men have for thousands of years. But here's what makes today's reality even darker: we don't need men to vanish to see this collapse. It's already happening — slowly, quietly.

Men are still around, but increasingly, we're just here to provide service, pay bills, maintain systems, and fund children that often aren't even ours — through child support and welfare programs. We keep things running without appreciation, recognition, and without even being desired. With AI advancing fast, even that usefulness might soon disappear.

So yes, they still need us — for now. But let's not pretend there isn't a growing fantasy of a world without men. The real question is: what happens when that becomes technically possible?

If women truly want a future that is female, as they love to tell us, there are two ways in which they can achieve this. The first would be to figure out how to create artificial semen and acquire the knowledge to sustain civilization — neither of which is anywhere close. The second would be to enslave 95% of the male population for labor and keep a select few for reproduction (much more likely). Either way, we're just tools. The improvement gurus and the traditional conservatives keep telling us to try harder and "man up," leading a march of men to compete for that top percentile. For the rest of us, it's a march toward slavery and self-deletion.

Women keep telling us they want to be worshipped like goddesses — but the role they actually want is more demonic than divine — like sadistic death-cult maniacs: oppressive and relentless.

Is that the future we want? Take a moment to tap into your humanity and ask yourself, how does this feels?

Now flip the scenario. If men wanted to go on without women, all we'd need is a functioning artificial womb. And if you've been paying attention, you already know which of these two outcomes is more likely to happen sooner.

To be clear, this isn't a call for one sex to dominate or eliminate the other. The urgency in my tone comes from wanting balance — where both sexes carry real responsibility and are held to the same standards of accountability. That doesn't erase femininity or masculinity; it reinforces them through mutual contribution. It's basic logic.

The hostility toward men won't stop until women carry the same burdens men always have. Only then will the champions of matriarchy grasp the pressure and sacrifice they've been shielded from — and maybe begin to empathize with the very men they've spent decades trying to displace. A human-centric future is possible, but only if we abandon double standards and stop treating responsibility as a male-only burden.

Until then, men cannot keep pretending these patterns are harmless or inevitable. We shouldn't sit back and watch the matriarchal scenario unfold unchecked — but neither should we romanticize the past and try to shove women back into cages labeled 'tradition.'

Need I remind you: they're God's children too — human.

A future built on the principles of reciprocity, merit, and respect beats one built on delusion and dependence. Every time.

The Many Boons of Transmaxxing

June 9, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: Transwomen shine a light on feminist debates about gender privilege; ie. if males have all the privilege then why are so many males transitioning and feeling more empowered with the results? MtF's accessing traditional female privileges is becoming deeply unsettling for feminists and their phony narratives about males holding all the power, and with the rise of a phenomenon called 'transmaxxing' that fear is likely to escalate further. – PW

Transmaxxing is a relatively new term referring to men who transition gender (MtF) in order to obtain personal, social and legal benefits associated with being female. Said differently, the transmaxxer transitions to female status, and not to recognizing a sense of female selfhood as is the case with transwomen.

The phenomenon appeared many years before the term was coined, and while it has recently gained some interest in the incel community, its application is far broader than that. It involves a decision to identify as a female regardless of this being contrary to one's usual sense-of-self.

The Urban Dictionary defines transmaxxing simply as, "Transitioning from male to female for personal gain."

Based on this broad Urban Dictionary definition we will conclude the following: 1. that transmaxxing cannot be reduced to an incel activity, nor to a proclivity of gay men as some have proposed, nor to any other single demographic. 2. It never or rarely applies to cases of female-to-male transition which are considered to involve minimal gain. 3. Transmaxxing isn't based on the clichéd explanation that the individual is "a female trapped inside a man's body," nor that he "has always felt like a woman." 4. The only premise of transmaxxing is the undergoing of a MtF transition for the sake of securing a range of benefits associated with female identification.

So lets look at some of those benefits.

Some recent online discussions have cited the following benefits belonging exclusively to the female sex, and also by legal extension to transmaxxers:

SAMPLE OF BENEFITS

- Get cheaper car and life insurance
- No registering with selective service
- Enter men's & women's locker rooms/restrooms whenever you want
- People will treat you better
- Whine all you want and people will listen
- Receive special considerations and child-custody in family court
- Earlier retirement and associated pension grant
- Free legal aid
- Services for victims of domestic violence
- Free or subsidized accommodation for the low income women
- Female only scholarships
- Female employment quotas
- Affirmative action hires
- Being able to sue for sexism
- Lighter prison sentences
- More leisure time, less work
- Receive greater empathy and sympathy
- Greater social support
- More narcissistic gratification for achievements
- To be believed regardless of lack of evidence
- Use public transport & parking spaces reserved for women
- Receive higher pass marks for the same school work

LIVING EXAMPLES

Equador

René Salinas Ramos is an Equadorian "transmaxxer-woman." Ramos, who works as a journalist, was born male. Ramos experienced discrimination against men in the Ecuadorian family court system and legally changed her gender to female in late 2022. Ramos hopes now that the courts will treat her more fairly and that she can gain custody of her children.[1]

Switzerland

In Switzerland a man has exploited an administrative loophole and formally transmaxxed his gender to female in order to retire a year earlier. Swiss rules enable any Swiss resident with the "intimate conviction" that they do not belong to the sex they are registered as in the civil status register can apply to change their gender, in addition to their first name, for just 75 Swiss francs (€72). The unnamed man from Lucerne successfully applied to transmax his gender so that he could receive his state pension at the Swiss retirement age for women of 64, a year earlier than men.[2][3]

Germany

In Germany a self-identified transmaxxer named Tina has undergone medical transition to reap various sexual and social advantages over her former existence as an 'incel,' and claims to be treated better as a female under the social systems in which she lives. Such advantages included being successfully admitted to attend a female-only university class, with Tina adding that "there's a government quota that needs to be met in Germany regarding women's employment, and obviously I count as a woman legally, so I will have a easier time finding a job."[4]

Tina was interviewed by Robert Brockway and Vernon Meigs on the The Goal Post.

Norway

In Norway, 2023, a male student changed gender to gain admission to the esteemed NTNU program which prioritized female applicants. The student took advantage of the nation's lenient gender self-identification laws to gain admission to the Norwegian University of Science and Technology (NTNU), and said that changing his gender for the purposes of gaining extra admission points was "about as easy as switching mobile plans." According to Finansavisen,[5] the unnamed male student took advantage of the policy after failing to meet merit-based standards. Seeking to gain extra admission points, the student changed his gender marker, allowing him to collect just enough points to be admitted into the Industrial Economics and Technology Management (Indøk) program. The program had a bonus two "gender points" for "female" applicants.[6][7][8]

PRAXIS

Transmaxxers don't need to use hormone replacement therapy, wear lipstick, put on a dress or engage in other performative gestures we might typically associate with transwomen (although some may choose to take these extra steps). Further, transmaxxer identification doesnt even require a renunciation of traits referred to as masculine. At minimum, all it requires is a technical change of gender either on a legal paper, or in some countries by verbal statement, and numerous aspects of female privilege become available for the transmaxxer's enjoyment.

While the change of gender may appear cynical or inauthentic, we can say that transmaxxers may genuinely identify with an internal sense of privilege, esteem, status, deservingness, dignity, worth, purity, beauty and social value that we euphemistically call "feminine." The degree to which a transmaxxer genuinely identifies with these "feminine" things, such femininity is integral to his sense of self.

Addendum: The primary difference between a transwoman and transmaxxer needs to be differentiated, as there seems to be some confusion on this point. Transwomen organically feel & desire female identification, with negligeable desire to identify as male. Whereas MtF transmaxxers tend to identify as male or gender dysphoric, without an organic desire to identify as a woman. This can be summarized as follows:

- Transwoman is an autonomous desire and identification of the self as female
- Transmaxxing is a decision, rather than an autonomous desire, to identify as female gender contrary to one's usual sense-of-self. The transmaxxer can be said to legitimately "transition" to female status, rather than female selfhood.

References:

1. Father legally changes gender to female in attempt to gain custody of his kids: 'I'm also a mom'
2. A man changes his gender to retire earlier – The European Times
3. Swiss man changes gender to retire and receive his pension a year earlier
4. Tina's Guide To Transmaxxing quote from video 'A bunch of Incels debating a transmaxxer'
5. Changing Gender To Get A Place On A Prestigious Course
6. NORWAY: Male Student Changes "Gender"To Gain Admission To Esteemed NTNU Program Which Prioritized Female Applicants, Feminist News And Opinion
7. Student gender change sparks debate on admission policies
8. Changing Gender To Get A Place On A Prestigious Course

The Problem of False Sexual Offense Allegations and the Register-Her Initiative

June 12, 2025 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

False accusations of sexual offenses can and do devastate lives, ruining reputations, careers, and even leading to tragic outcomes like suicide and murder. High-profile cases have highlighted this issue, prompting me to create the Register-Her website in 2011 to document proven instances of false allegations. Below are two notable false allegation cases, followed by an overview of the website's mission and its relaunch in 2025.

Case 1: Brian Banks (2002–2012) [1]

In 2002, Brian Banks, a promising high school football star from Long Beach, California, was falsely accused of rape by classmate Wanetta Gibson. Despite no physical evidence, Banks faced a potential 41-year sentence and was pressured into a no-contest plea, resulting in six years in prison, five years of parole, and registration as a sex offender. Gibson later received a $1.5 million settlement from a lawsuit against the school district for alleged security lapses. In 2011, Gibson admitted to fabricating the accusation in a recorded conversation with Banks, facilitated by a private investigator. Though the recording was inadmissible in court, the California Innocence Project used it to secure the reversal of Banks' conviction in 2012. In 2013, a Los Angeles Superior Court ordered Gibson to repay $2.6 million to the school district, including the settlement, attorney fees, interest, and punitive damages. Gibson failed to appear in court or repay the amount, and no criminal charges were filed against her. Banks lost critical years of his football career due to the rape lie.

Case 2: Rolling Stone "Jackie" Debacle (2014) [2]

In 2014, Rolling Stone published "A Rape on Campus," an article by Sabrina Rubin Erdely detailing an alleged gang rape at a University of Virginia fraternity, as reported by a student named "Jackie." The story gained widespread attention but was retracted in 2015 after investigations by The Washington Post and others revealed inconsistencies, including discrepancies in the alleged assailant's identity, the date of the incident, and a lack of corroborating evidence (e.g., no party matching Jackie's description occurred). Jackie's friends and fraternity members contradicted key details, and Rolling Stone was criticized for failing to verify the account, leading to defamation lawsuits and settlements, including $1.65 million to the fraternity. The case damaged trust in sexual assault reporting and highlighted the need for rigorous journalistic standards.

Other Examples

False allegations have led to tragic consequences beyond these cases:

- Jay Cheshire (2015): After being falsely accused of rape, Cheshire committed suicide. A year later, his mother, Karin Cheshire, also took her own life, unable to cope with the loss. The accuser's identity was shielded by media. [3]

- Christopher Hughes (2023): Falsely accused of rape, Hughes was murdered by seven men who stabbed him over 90 times. The media published the killers' names but protected the accuser's identity. [4]

There are countless other examples, far too numerous to go into here, which explains the need for the Register-Her website.

The Register-Her Website

Launched on September 13, 2011, Register-Her aimed to expose false sexual offense allegations by documenting cases from credible news sources. The site sought to highlight the criminal justice system's inconsistent and often lackadaisical response to such accusations and their devastating impact on innocent individuals. However, it faced significant backlash:

- Media outlets like BuzzFeed, We Hunted the Mammoth, and the Southern Poverty Law Center criticized the site, accusing it of doxxing and harassment.
- I was lifetime banned from Twitter (pre-2022 ownership) for sharing news stories about false allegations, which were alleged by Twitter to harass offenders.
- Maintaining the site became burdensome, leading to its lapse.

In the interim period since the site's lapse, we've had the #MeToo movement, which has fizzled due to strains on its own credibility. We've also had the Johnny Depp/Amber Heard matter, bringing some more badly needed attention to the false allegation problem as well as highlighting the public blind spot when it comes to women who lie about different forms of abuse from men.

Relaunch

Today, amidst the recent shift toward freer speech and well-earned skepticism of the "believe all women" narrative, Register-Her is being relaunched at RegisterHer.com. The site continues its mission to document verifiable false allegations, encouraging public contributions of news stories via a reporting feature on the website. A donation option is also available to support its maintenance. The relaunch aims to address the ongoing issue of false accusations, which, despite high-profile cases like Johnny Depp's defamation victory over Amber Heard in 2022, continue to harm lives due to societal tendencies to treat allegations as truth without evidence.

Call to Action

The Register-Her initiative invites individuals to contribute by submitting verified news stories about false sexual offense allegations. By raising awareness, the site seeks to foster a more balanced approach to addressing accusations while protecting the innocent from unjust consequences.

VISIT REGISTERHER.COM

[1] https://legaltalknetwork.com/blog/2023/04/falsely-accused-the-brian-banks-story/

[2] https://www.cjr.org/investigation/rolling_stone_investigation.php

[3] https://www.bbc.com/news/uk-england-hampshire-37696222

[4] https://www.bbc.com/news/uk-england-manchester-64385668

Gold Pill and the Modwife

June 13, 2025 | by Vernon Meigs | Link | Original Link

By now many of you have seen the "Gold Pill" trending in the men's issues sphere in social media. Naturally, wiki4men has the definition of the Gold Pill hot off the press:

> The gold pill is a philosophy and practice defined by two motives:
> 1. Men expecting women to come to the relationship table with a material or economic commitment, and > 2. Rejection of the unbalanced romantic model that favors passion over pragmatic concerns.

The Gold Pill is predominantly spoken of in a specific context within our sphere, namely, the history of marriage and relationship dynamics between men and women.

The dowry is highly referenced here, and the purpose of this is to remind those paying attention that historically speaking, the transactional element was very much intrinsic to marriage pairings. In other words, the pipedream touted by traditional gynocentrists today regarding male sacrifice and one-sided exaltation of the feminine was not the actuality of "traditional marriages" nor "traditional relationships".

The historical existence of the dowry is case in point showing that women were expected to bring something to the table to help the arrangement start off in a stable way. To bring up the dowry today is as if holding a mirror to both traditional gynocentric women and the average feminism-inspired "independent woman" who comically imagines herself as "high-value", and who claims that she is, in fact, the table.

Long story short, in their mind they don't have to contribute a damn thing. We are told that they are financially independent and yet too economically underprivileged to be able to invest, simultaneously. Such is the paradox of the gynocentric world of women.

As such, the dowry can be utilized as a backdrop for getting through the idea that both sides actually contribute some material substance to the relationship, or to the marriage if that's where things are. A far cry from being "superficial" and "materialistic" as those who parrot Romantic love ideology may decry this, such transactions are cornerstones to voluntary relations of any sort. Men asking, "What's in it for me?" is not the inappropriate question that too many think it is.

As most of you know, when it comes to men's issues I tend to highlight the case for men living according to his own terms and pursuing his visions in defiance of society's expectations and demands (e.g. "You're not a man if you don't marry and have children and sacrifice all of your passions"). In other words, advocacy of MGTOW and Red Pill in its original, uncorrupted sense.

With this in mind I must confess that the history of marriage and its restrictive expectations has not been a serious interest in my case; with regards to that, I consider Paul Elam, Peter Wright, and the Gold Pill's top proponent ThisIsShah to be the go-to sources on those. Hence, that is why I have been rather silent regarding the Gold Pill.

What's more, what views I actively have on marriage, relationships, and sex itself can be accurately regarded as non-traditional in many cases, and I feared I didn't have much to add to something that heavily references tradition in the way of the dowry, even if only as a historical backdrop and not a recommendation for its revival.

Then I got to thinking – we already have a paradigm for a relationship model that is both non-gynocentric and not exactly "traditional" either.

Remember the Modwife?

Let us recap. Wiki4Men defines the Modwife as follows:

> A Modwife (noun), refers to women who have embraced multi-option lives over more traditional roles, and who accept or encourage multi-option lives for their male partners.

The article clarifies immediately that despite the use of the word "wife", this can apply to non-legally-married relationships as well.

The following are the four relationship models for the reader to consider:

If you look at Tradwife-1, at this point we can easily associate phenomena such as the dowry as being slotted right into this arrangement. Through a Gold Pill lens, we can perhaps make some addendums: e.g. in addition to fair labor division, we can observe fair material contribution division; again the idea that both sides contribute something to the table. The contributions may not be identical in fact, but are fair in terms of the transaction.

Which is more that we can say for the gynocentric models in the middle. Observe – both insist that the woman "is the table." Or if we wanted to take "pedestalize" literally, then the woman is the thing the man puts on top of the table in addition to all else he is expected to bring.

Finally, the Modwife model speaks for itself. It is tailor-made for our modern world; despite whines of tradcon influencers to “reject modernity”, not only can we not truly escape it as our society evolves technologically, but it behooves us to embrace it head on but with strong values.

Without being too tangential, if we don’t take ownership of modernity and let it reflect a manifestation of our better values, then it becomes left to the gynocentric, the entitlement-based, subjectivist, and the truly crazy.

Back to the Modwife. When we speak of the libertarian model for husband and wife, and everything else described in our model, what we are potentially looking at are a man and woman with their own agency, accountability, and not in the least their own means to bring something to the relationship. In our modern world, when we speak of a woman who brings something to the relationship, to the table if you will, it is a woman who is able to pull her own financial and material weight.

The often screeched bromides of the tradgyn are thus: a woman is inherently of value and a woman should not have to work. Despite their claim to be conservatives, note their opportunistic use of Marxist terminology as they deem that “wage slavery” is not what makes women happy – and should be left to men whom all that drudgery befits.

This is opposite of the Modwife model, in which the woman knows of herself as someone who has to work to live for their own standard of living just as the man does for his. Contributions are unironically a self-interest based framework because the man doesn’t devote his money “for her” per se, but for the relationship, and the family that would ensue if done right. As such, so shall a womans contributions be likewise.

What’s more, the Modwife paradigm would shatter tradgyns’ expectations of men as “wage slave” because in a one-sided gynocentric model, men’s work may turn to drudgery to fulfill the unrealistic expectation of their arrangement. The Modwife model hypothetically eases the burden on the man as the work contributions are fairly delineated via “making a proposal,” a phrase which traditionally referred to material negotiations from husband and wife over contributions to a shared life, only in this case the negotiating is done in a more libertarian spirit instead of following a fixed set of traditional customs.

As a matter of fact, the prior gynocentric bromides are also the opposite of the Tradwife-1 model. One just wants to shout at the tradcons dreaming their silly dreams about the housewife that doesn’t work – “Women worked back then too you blithering, blue-pilled simpish dolts!!” Women also worked in the trades, certainly they worked if they were part of an agrarian society, and in any case, the notion of the all-too-frail-and-precious, automatically-holy, automatically-superior, “fairer sex” is a myth to be discarded never too soon.

Gold Pill is for the Modern World

There is a saying I have seen in the Gold Pill discussion that I paraphrase as: “Whereas the Red Pill was a short-term and possibly imperfect solution, the Gold Pill is the long-term alternative for our modern world”. While I don’t necessarily agree that the Red Pill is short-term or imperfect, I agree with the implication that the Gold Pill has come into being for men (and women) to use as a new framework, and an alternative to the gynocentric idiocy of Romantic love. Moreover, we can see that mainstream “Red Pill” discourse tends to specialize in short term dating strategies, whereas the Gold Pill speaks more intelligently as a strategy for long-term relationships.

What makes a modern man, or a modern woman for that matter? One that exists in the now, where we live. Simple as that. Again, it’s folly to escape it; one must tackle it head on. In order for such men and women to do this, the right framework is necessary; what is the way for the modern man and woman to live their most accountable lives and have a rational, viable, and non-parasitic relationship and method to raise a family? That is the question that has to be asked and I think the Gold Pill is a very good distillation of that reality.

I bring this up because I wonder if some cannot see past the traditional historical backdrop of the dowry. I almost didn’t. Again however, I support the discussion because it is meant as an eye-opener to the idea that it is perfectly natural, and quite right, that both sides actually contribute something real and non-fantastical to the relationship.

The traditional dowry was a product of its time in which society perhaps didn’t resemble the relative freedoms and technological lucrativeness we do now, but then it seemed to have served to bring that material accountability to marriages. We can wholeheartedly derive example from this, even if what we ultimately end up with won’t necessarily resemble closely what the dowry did.

In finding a successor while “taking the Gold Pill”, might I suggest looking into the Modwife model! Think about it – investment in relationships no longer being one-sided like it’s been for too long. Actual accountability and agency across the board.

Red Pill Grandparenting

June 16, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Casualties of the family court, AKA fathers and children, are so great in number I wouldn't be surprised if they outnumbered the collective casualties of all wars over the last century. Each of them were made casualties by a family court culture that sides with mothers bent on establishing ownership of children, a goal achieved via character assassination of fathers, and a performance of damseling.

If women are reduced to proverbial chattel within the English law system, which of course they never were, we can only conclude that children have always been the chattel of the chattel. Ernest B. Bax elaborates this point in the following comment penned in the year 1896:

> CUSTODY OF CHILDREN
>
> It has always in England been laid down as a fundamental law based on public policy, that the custody of children and their education is a duty incumbent on the father. It is said to be so fundamental that he is not permitted to waive his exercise of the right by pre-nuptial contract. (See the Agar v. Ellis Case.)
>
> This rule of the Common Law of England is of course in harmony with the policy of all Europe and Christendom, as well as with the historic conditions of the European social organisation, if not with the primal instincts of the race.
>
> Nevertheless, fundamental and necessary as the rule may be, the pro-feminist magistrates and judges of England are bent apparently on ignoring it with a light heart. They have not merely retained the old rule that the custody of infants of tender years remains with the mother until the child attains the age of seven. But they go much further than that. As a matter of course, and without considering in the least the interests of the child, or of society at large, they hand over the custody and education of all the children to the litigant wife, whenever she establishes –an easy thing to do– a flimsy and often farcical case of technical "cruelty."
>
> The victim husband has the privilege of maintaining the children as well as herself out of his property or earnings, and has the added consolation of knowing that they will brought up to detest him.
>
> Even in the extreme case where a deserting wife takes with her the children of the marriage, there is practically no redress for the husband if in narrow circumstances. The police courts will not interfere. The divorce court, as already stated, is expensive to the point of prohibition. In any case the husband has to face a tribunal already prejudiced in favour of the female, and the attendant scandal of a process will probably have no other result than to injure his children and their future prospects in life.

> – Ernest B. Bax, The Legal Subjection of Men (1896 p.16)

Most people reading this will recognize the story described by Bax all too well. The situation remains unchanged to this very day. What is slightly less well known is the impact on grandparents, especially paternal grandparents who tend to become collateral damage along with the alienated father. Mothers instinctively know that grandparents will side with their son in the face of a brutal divorce and custody dispute, so they make the callous and cynical decision to alienate the paternal grandparents and thereby obliterate all potential for opposition.

Callous is hardly a strong enough word for it, but whatever the appropriate adjectives, here we are thanks to a gynocentric feminism that has eaten away at family cohesion over the last two centuries.

The chances of this happening to grandparents are extremely high, except on the basis that they demonstrate a sycophantic compliance with, and longsuffering utilitarianism towards the controlling young mother and her inflated wants; babysitting on demand, transport to and from school, regularly complimenting the mother on her great single parent skills, and the clear expectation for grandparents to 'pay up' financially by buying items for the grandchildren or offering large money gifts for Christmas & birthdays – which of course the mother will decide the best use of.

This is the level of extortion that so many alienating mothers resort to – a kind of pay-to-play regime that grandparents are subjected to. For any self-respecting grandparent the juice may not be worth the squeeze, especially if faced with continued disapproval and a seemingly endless round of grifting.

When it comes to mothers displaying pronounced control issues within the intact young family, it raises the serious question of whether grandparents should form a relationship with grandchildren at the outset, and if so, how deep (or superficial) and how frequent. Such control issues are bankable indications that everything will eventually turn to shit, and grand parents need to wise up and decide how best they will deal with the broken relationships issues in advance.

Like the MGTOW response toward an excess in women's relational and legal power, I wouldn't be surprised to see an equivalent boycott trend among grandparents emerge – in this case jettisoning a portion of the increasingly vulnerable grandparent role. In fact it's already beginning to happen culturally: Grandparents Going Their Own Way (GGTOW). That's not to say that such grandparents would be disowning their son or his progeny – on the contrary – the aim is to protect both the son and his children from a greater heartache in the case of deeply attached bonds being destroyed by the alienating mother.

The cultivation of some distance serves the goal of mitigating the likely heartache were it to happen. The less abiding and less intense the grandparent-grandchild relationship, then the less drama there will be with the inevitable fallout. There would be some clear heads prevailing among the casualties, which may be all the better to help pick up the pieces for the ones you love.

Keeping a greater distance, but continuing to demonstrate a believable measure of love and support may be the most practical way for grandparents to maintain stability in the extended family, especially in the event of its collapse.

Welcome to the decline of the West.

The Goal Post Episode 59 – AI Takeover or Luddite Fallacy / The Humanity Market / Charles Babbage

June 23, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

youtube.com/watch?v=5aPTrcCMJXY

Tradwives, Modwives and Feminists

June 28, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Editor's note: the following article first published in 2019.

There's been a lot of discussion lately on a return to traditional gender roles as a way to reverse the ill effects of feminism. We see it promoted by advocates for traditional gynocentrism, and by those who promote non-gynocentric forms of traditionalism, in which men and women are called to adhere to strict 'gender roles' – eg. he is head of household who goes out and earns the money and protects her, while she makes babies, apple pies, and keeps the house clean. Its what many people refer to as the 'two-spheres doctrine' in which men and women are apportioned sovereignty over different realms – he over the political and social realm, and she over the domestic realm. This, argue the advocates of traditional gender roles, creates a delicate but eminently workable balance that has stood the test of time.

The fantasy of a return to the 'good old days' when men were masculine and chivalrous, and women were feminine and ladylike, has run strong through the manosphere and beyond, whether promoted by Anthony "Dream" Johnson and his traditionalism-promoting convention, or women like Suzanne Venker who specialize in promoting traditional roles for women.

I note Mike Buchanan of J4MB recently posted a link on his blog titled Tradwives – women who are bucking feminism, which leads to an article with the byline 'Submitting to my husband like it's 1959′: Why I became a #TradWife:

> And inevitably, it has become a 'thing' for a woman to actually admit that she wants a role as full-time housewife and mother. It's being called a Tradwife, short for traditional wife, though it was only ever a short-lived tradition for most people… Search the hashtag '#tradwife' on social media and you'll see images of cooked dinners and freshly-baked cakes with captions like, "A woman's place is in the home" or "Trying to be a man is a waste of a woman".

> There is a lot to that last statement, just as it is a waste of a man trying to be a woman. As Sweden has discovered, the more you try making men and women the same, the more they will emphasise their differences.[1]

I have also witnessed an occasional media article showcasing a woman who has decided to quit a stressful job to live like a 1950s housewife, insisting she's happy to spend her day cooking and cleaning because 'men should be spoiled by their wives.'

One such story in the UK Daily Mail describes a 30 yr old Oregon woman Katrina Holte as follows;

> A woman who was stressed out by her job in a busy payroll department, decided to quit the rat race and also turn back time – deciding to live like a 1950s housewife.
>
> Transforming her suburban home in Hillsborough, Oregon, into a working shrine to the era, Katrina Holte, 30, now loves keeping house for her engineering manager husband, Lars, 28 – cleaning, cooking and making dresses using 1950s patterns.
>
> Spinning vinyl discs by stars of the era like Doris Day, she flits about her business, making sure dinner is on the table when Lars gets in, saying: 'I feel like I'm living how I always wanted to. It's my dream life and my husband shares my vision.
>
> 'It is a lot of work. I do tons of dishes, laundry and ironing, but I love it and it's helping to take care of my husband and that makes me really happy.[2]

For most working men its a no-brainer that she would be more happy in a traditional roleplay of that kind. It is, as she points out, much better than working a stressful job as required of men's traditional role.

Whatever the trend for women to become tradwives, it is not the only alternative to feminist prescriptions, and it may not be the 'best' of the available alternatives either.

Here I'd like to introduce the phenomenon of "modwives" – women who have embraced multi-option lives over trad roles, and who allow, nay encourage multi-option lives for their husbands. Of course I just made up the term modwife, but they exist and are possibly also growing in number. Both tradwife and modwife eschew feminism which is geared only to female privilege, and not to partnerships based on reciprocal labor and devotion.

Over 150 years of feminism has bequeathed to women the famed multi-option lives, a sword which shattered the more narrow traditional roles with sure and mighty strokes. But the big question is this; are women today willing to renounce their multi-option lives in favour of single option traditional roles?

I would say not a snowfalke's chance in Hell. And to invite them to do so today can be construed as coercive and even an abusive act. I submit that few women today are going to genuinely trade in multi-option lives for traditional roles, other than a limited few who like the idea of free time and cosplay, and who can rely on husbands to bring home a healthy wage.

The unlikelihood that modern women will embrace 'Tradwife' roles of yesteryear with genuine commitment underpins attraction to the modwife option. Thus for best-case scenario, today's multi-option women can invite their men to do same – to embrace multi-option lives. The modwife's modus operandi is based on personal liberty within relationships, extending a freedom of opportunity to her partner such as society has championed for her.

Yet few multi-option women today are willing to extend that multi-option liberty to men, preferring instead to pocket the advantages extended by women's 'liberation' while expecting their boyfriends and husbands to remain in the mismatched role of protector and provider. There are women however, limited in number as they are, who lean toward the model of commensurate liberty and agreed economic contributions for both men and women in relationships — some of them will be recognized among the supporters of the men's rights movement.

That libetarian spirit is usually understood as belonging to the political sphere, but it is accepted by the modwife as a guiding principle in her relationship with men. It emphasizes individual choice, relative autonomy, voluntary association, individual judgement, free will, self-determination, free labor-sharing arrangements and agreements, and negotiated economic contributions to the relationship.

Applying the concept of freedom to relationships may seem odd, especially when we consider the entrapment traditionally associated with marriage, not to mention the dangers and the restrictions on freedom that come with strict, prescribed gender roles of yesteryear.

Psychologist James Hillman speaks to the topic of freedom in his paper Marriage, Intimacy, Freedom:

> Yet what does the soul want with that word Freedom which sets off such expectations? What sort of preposition accompanies and influences Freedom? Freedom from – from fear, want, and oppression, such as enunciated by the Charter that established that established the United Nations after World War Two? Or is it Freedom of – choice, opportunity and movement, or access to today's political language?
>
> Or, is it Freedom to – to do as I like, to hire whom I want, to tell the boss to shove it, to go where I want, to marry whom I please–freedom of agency in the empowered and recovered adult of therapy?
>
> Or, fourth, is it possibly Freedom in? This seems moronic or oxymoronic, for the fantasy of American, epitomized by Texan, freedom is "Don't fence me in." "In" means within limits or constraints of any place, time, situation, condition, such as the kitchen, in an hour, in a conversation, in a marriage.
>
> This forth preposition,"in," rather than freedom of, to and from, suggests that the > joyful expectation arising from the soul when the bell of freedom rings is nothing other than living fully in the actuality of this or that situation, as it is, which gives to that situation wings, freeing it from a desire to be elsewhere, to escape from it, to want more, thereby sating the soul's desire with the fullness of the present. How do I say it "I love what I'm doing… I'm fully in it." "I'm really into tex-mex cooking; my new computer; re-painting the house."[3]

Freedom 'in' as Hillman puts it, allows for creative negotiation on how to set up relationships that bypass the narrow choice-dichotomy between traditional relationships and feminist-informed ones.* For example, a man wishes to cook the food or be a stay-at-home father? So be it. She wants a career? Done. A bit of role sharing with him and her — both taking on part-time childcare, cooking and wage earning? Consider it done. This is the kind of freedom that comes with the multi-option couple, and it stands as a viable alternative to the traditional roles that we so often look back to with nostalgia.

The message of the men's rights movement has been consistent in its commitment to more options for men and boys. That call for more options, for more rights and privileges, turns out to be a good match for the liberties most women enjoy today. Whether we use that freedom to choose life with a tradwife or a modwife – or to reject wives and relationships with women completely – the choice is ultimately ours.

References:

[1] Tradwives – women who are bucking feminism, J4MB (Jan 2019)
[2] Siofra Brennan, Woman quits her stressful job to live like a 1950s housewife, UK Daily Mail (2019)
[3] James Hillman, Marriage, Intimacy Freedom, Spring Journal of Archetype and Culture (1997)

*Note: The terms Tradwife and Modwife – and by extension Tradhusband and Modhusband are used in a lighthearted way to designate the different ways people can set up a relationship.

An Introduction To Male Shame

July 1, 2025 | by Paul Elam | Link | Original Link

This transcript first published as a video in 2017

A long-standing tradition of the mentally unemployed is the advice column where people send lopsided versions of their current life problem to strangers, and invite said stranger to advise them on what to do about it.

One recent example of this was brought to my attention that starts with a recipe for disaster; an excerpt from an advice column in which a woman is getting advice from another woman, who doesn't know her, about dealing with a man who she also doesn't know. From the South Bend Tribune we have the 'Dear Annie' column featuring the thoughtful sage advice of one Annie Lane, a cutesy looking 20-something whom I am sure is steeped in the wisdom of Ages.

She demonstrates her incisive nature in a response to the following plea for help: "Dear Annie" a woman writes,

> "My husband and I have been married for over 20 years we've had our share of highs and lows during our time together. However, recently I discovered some things that are really bothering me. My husband always said he didn't do the whole Facebook thing I discovered he's been lying about not having a Facebook account when I was trying to set one up for him so he could use it to receive some promotional offers. I then discovered that he was searching for old girlfriends, single sites, pornography and other women on Facebook for two years behind my back. Some of the women my husband was looking up on Facebook were our daughter's age or even a couple of years younger. We live in a small town and some of these women work where he gets his hair cut, where we bank, or at other places where we do business. He visited several of the woman's Facebook pages multiple times. This is all very disturbing to me. When I try to discuss this with him he gets extremely defensive and angry with me. I'm hurt and don't believe that what he's doing is right. Please help;
>
> Signed – 'Feeling Very Broken.'

Now of course Dear Annie, whose name I'm sure just coincidentally sounds like Dear Abby, charges into the rescue to make sure that this advice seeker doesn't slip into self-blame.

"Dear broken" she answers, "the only one who should feel broken is your husband. Honesty is the cornerstone of a healthy marriage. Though it's definitely questionable that he's been browsing very young women's Facebook pages, there could at least plausibly be innocent explanations for that. The alarm bells sounded for me when you mentioned that he's been on single sites. This could indicate offline real-life infidelity. Talk to him about going to marriage counseling; if he refuses then consider separation or divorce. It's better to live alone than with a louse."

And that is it. Annie has summed up a plan of action that could determine the course of two lives in 90 words without so much as a single follow-up question and with no more knowledge of the people involved than she got from a single email.

Now you might be saying at the moment why should I give a fuck about any of these idiots, and of course you'd be right to ask. While both Annie and Broken aren't significant at all as human beings, what played out between them is an absolutely sterling example of the lens through which our culture, including self-help gurus and the mental health industry, view relationships.

I've known licensed marriage and family therapists who made well into six figures treating relationship problems with no more thought than Dear Annie has in her column, which is to say that they made big money from what the average person on the street would say for free – namely that whatever your sad story is as a woman, the man is at fault. We don't need to ask questions, he's wrong and the solution to the problem is either to get a professional to confirm that, or to kick them to the curb or both. After all just as Annie says, he's a louse now.

I know that none of this is a secret to this audience. I needed a much better reason than just telling you what you already know to make an article about this particular advice bimbo and her latest foray into terminal stupidity. The thing is, I like this example because it is so similar to what I witnessed in my clinical practice.

Many of my predominantly male clients were also in couples counseling as a part of their addictions treatment, and it was routine for me to sit in on at least one session with their couples therapist in an effort to ensure continuity of treatment. What I witnessed there, over and over again, was a repeat of Dear Annie giving advice to 'Feeling Very Broken,' and shitting all over brokens husband in the process.

Generally speaking, the approach was always the same. On cue from the couples counselor, the wife would go through the litany of everything he did while drinking or drugging. Going into sometimes excruciating detail about the damage it did to the family, and the lives that it harmed, the goal was to have him acknowledge all this without avoidance, minimization or other forms of denial. And he would be measured directly by the open remorse he showed, how genuine he was at expressing that remorse, and how well he was able to articulate his plans to make sure that the same mistakes would not be repeated in the future.

To be fair this is a standard and I think necessary part of the treatment for addictions. what was missing though, what was always missing, was the ways he was being harmed in the relationship. It was as simple as 1, 2, 3; he was the relationship problem. There was no need for shared examination or review of the marriage that was more realistic. Just hand him the whip and let the self flagellation begin.

Of course there was some attention to her enabling, and efforts were made to have her look at how behavior on her part made it easier for him to continue engaging actively in his addiction. That, however, was generally where any demands for her introspection ended. She was the designated victim, he was the default perpetrator. There's your fucking therapy.

I never saw a marriage and family therapist even begin to explore whether the female in that relationship might be the kind that makes sobering up seem worse than drinking Drano. Focusing on the worst parts of him and the best parts of her is a completely lopsided proposition. Even a crackhead recognizes that, so they use massive amounts of shame to beat the man down into compliance: “So she cheated on you? Well isn’t that because you drove her away with your drinking? What’s that you say – you didn’t start drinking heavily till after she cheated? You’re projecting the blame; no one made you pick up a bottle. How do you think that made her feel?”

What was even more fascinating was seeing how malleable men were in these situations. They were usually incapable of defending themselves. All they could do was stutter and fall flat in the face of shaming, no matter how blatantly unfair it was. The men who tried to defend themselves, or point to the fact that the wife was often as destructive as his addiction, were easily shut down by the sisters of shame – the tag-team pair of marriage therapist and wife.

For instance I remember one man who briefly interrupted the procession of his mistakes being beaten like a herd of dead horses and said, and I’m paraphrasing here, “I drank a lot out of frustration, living with her is like living with a block of ice. She barely talks to me unless she wants to complain or needs money.”

He was going to say more but the marriage therapist interrupted and said quite sharply, “So your being an alcoholic is her fault?!” She might as well have added an eye-roll. Now of course that was a ridiculous mischaracterization of what he actually said, and it was totally unfair, but it had the intended effect.

He shut up about his problems and went back to apologizing for the pain he had caused her. It was as though he was apologizing for being alive. His pain over feeling unloved used isolated and demonized got shoved right back down into his gut where he would probably drink over it in the future. The wife got to maintain her position of superiority with the help of her mental health professional, and I got to take on the task of trying to help him clean up the mess in the wake of that session.

Again I don’t think that what I’m saying is anything shocking or new to a men’s audience. We all know that, generally speaking, women lack an accountability, just as we know that the mental health profession and the world at large is hopelessly gynocentric.

What may be useful in this story is the lesson about shame and how it is used to control men, and how utterly powerful it can be. I worked with the particular client in my story, and scores of other men just like him about that shame. I found that in a supportive environment that they could clearly take responsibility for their choices and behaviors. They also had the capacity to keep it all in perspective and not let their feelings cloud their view about injustices that were also done to them. They could discern right from wrong, and tell the difference quickly between what was and was not their fault.

And then, when a judgmental woman entered the scene, all of that would fall apart. They quickly became fish-out-of-water struggling for words. Their self-confidence, even their self-respect, immediately circled the drain the moment their previously clear and concise thoughts were questioned by a woman. They faltered sometimes, they lost their cool and reacted with anger, becoming just as irrational as their female detractors.

So in a sense they defended themselves, but not by looking at these women in the eye and saying you're wrong and here's why. My client, when the therapist accused him of blaming his alcoholism on his wife, could not just stand up for himself and say "you're blowing what I said at a proportion and taking it out of context." So he retreated. Others might have blown up and told her to fuck off. But very very few would be able to stand firm, reject the bullshit, and insist that their experience was part of the discussion.

Shame, the universal male Achilles heel would, likely as not, blind them to the very possibility of healthier alternatives. Most men are socialized to feel deeply ashamed of standing up to a woman. In fact that is why you see white knights conflate setting limits with women with attacking them; like a lot of men they can't see the difference. Men are supposed to protect women, even vicious dishonest and dysfunctional ones.

Subsequently they live by a code that shames them for doing anything else even if it is vital to their psychological and emotional well-being. So when faced with that conflict of interest they usually either back down, or they cover their shame with enough anger to act in their own interest.

I have some questions that I would have asked Feeling Broken had she approached me with her problem. I'd start with something simple like tell me, Broken, when's the last time you had sex with your husband? Or how much time do you spend berating him, regardless of how justified you might feel?

I mean seriously, assuming that what Broken was saying is true, it is clear this guy is missing something in his relationship. I understand it's easy to fall into the expected position of showing moral outrage and indignation that a married man might be involved in or heading toward infidelity. It is painfully simple to take a 'case closed' attitude say the guy's a bum, and move on to the next put-upon woman with an ax to grind against her husband. You can do the same thing with guys that drink do drugs or act out violently. After all, if you don't give a damn about what is driving people's behavior then the sky's the limit.

Call me crazy but I don't like easy answers. That is probably because they are seldom right. Sure, some guys make promises and then get to breaking them at first opportunity, just because that's their nature. In my experience those guys are the exception that Broken and her future therapist will brand her husband as being regardless of the truth.

Most men I have known who broke promises to their wives, cheated on them, hit them, verbally abuse them, or who snuck around behind their backs were driven by forces into a life marked by one no-win situation after another. It was not even something they could put into words, and when they opened their mouths to try someone — usually a woman — shoved a big fat shame sandwich in to shut them up.

Men's experience in long-term relationships is often marked by abject loneliness, emotional and sexual deprivation, incessant unrealistic demands, constant badgering, indifference to the most fundamental of their needs, and even mocking and humiliation heaped on them if they had the temerity to say anything about it. The answer to this is simple and extraordinarily difficult: It is for men to learn to be shameless, and to take pride in it.

Guilt is “I made a mistake,” shame is “I am a mistake.” Guilt gives us a moral rudder that allows us to correct mistakes and move forward as better people. Shame is a set of shackles that binds us permanently to worthlessness. It gags us because inside we know that we are hopelessly unworthy and have no right to speak.

As I look around the world today, across the spectrum of human existence, I see little more than a worldwide culture that feeds itself on the shame of men. Traditional gynocentrists and feminists both share equally in the blame. Personally I’m pretty fucking tired of both of them.

TheGoal Post Episode 60 – UN Women / Democrats Try to Attract Men / Iraq WMDs / Richard Feynman

July 6, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Dream Idiots 155: The Curious Case of Zoe McLellan

July 9, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

A rare voice, other than ourselves, talking about Zoe McLellan.

The relevant section ends at about 22:10. After that they go on with other topics.

Oddly my comments on this video linking to her article on Wiki4Men keep disappearing.

The Goal Post Episode 61 – Male Child Care / The Outback / The LANTITE Test / Marcel Grossmann

July 16, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Coverture, domestic violence & criminalization of men

July 21, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

In a poem that a judge living in Georgia wrote in 1837, a judge heard a criminal domestic violence case. Henry Day, "a mild-looking man with a youthful face," was accused of having beaten his large strong wife, Julia Sweet. Day pleaded to the court:

> I don't deny I beat my wife;
> And for that part where you aver
> That Satan did my spirit stir —
> 'Tis true; for I was moved by her.
> The dying sinner's wildest groans
> Are music to her gentlest tones;
> And for her blows! alas, my bones!
> Well, let it pass; perhaps 't was wrong;
> But I had borne her curses long,
> And I am weak, and she is strong;
> Let that, too, pass. I've done my best;
> My counsel there must say the rest. [1]

Day's counsel might have invoked for him a claim to self-defense or a claim to be a battered spouse. Such legal strategies in actual domestic violence cases work almost exclusively for women defendants. With sound legal judgment of likely outcomes, Day's counsel turned instead to a ludicrous defense based on the common-law concept of coverture.

Coverture was the idea that husband and wife are one under law. More specifically, coverture assigned to the husband responsibility and punishment under law for his wife's criminal acts. Coverture also protected women from mass imprisonment for debt in early modern England. In this case, Day's counsel claimed that, according to coverture, a husband had an equal right to beat his wife as he did to beat himself. The prosecutor countered that if a husband killed his wife, he would be charged with murder, not suicide. The presiding judge summarized the law of coverture to the sitting jury.

> If any ill the wife hath done,
> The man is fined; for they are one:
> If any crime the man doth do,
> Still he is fined; for they are two.
> The rule is hard, it is confessed:
> It can't be helped, lex ita est. [2]

Coverture was among a range of institutions and ideas that generated highly disproportionate imprisonment of men. Legal history conventionally interprets coverture as a legal concept oppressing women. [3] Coverture oppressed women in the same way that men-only Selective Service registration oppresses women today.

Coverture has been badly misunderstood in legal history. Coverture assigned to husbands responsibility for their wives' criminal acts and their wives' debts. Coverture increased the criminalization of men. Coverture didn't give husbands the legal right to beat their wives. Men have long been punished for committing domestic violence, as well as punished for having domestic violence committed against them. Legal historians have stressed wife-beating and largely ignored husbands getting attacked by their wives. [4] Law and policy similarly treats domestic violence with anti-men bias today. Anti-men bias in invoking coverture is a general rhetorical pattern built upon deep structures of gynocentrism.

* * * * *

Read more:

- domestic violence in medieval fabliau and farce
- criminalizing seduction: the crime of men seducing women
- gender discrimination in child custody prevalent historically

Notes:

[1] Robert M. Charlton, "The State vs. Henry Day," in Charlton & Charlton (1839) pp. 92-104. The quotes above are from id. pp. 96, 97. In 1834, Charlton became Judge of the Supreme Court of the Eastern District of Georgia. From 1853-53, he served as a U.S. Senator for Georgia. See Robert Milledge Charlton biography. The poem is dated 1837. Charlton & Charlton (1839) p. 99. A long, final footnote added:

> Note to the Note.
>
> As the prose note to this poetical report has gone the rounds of the papers, headed "The way they do things in Georgia," perhaps it would be as well for the author to acknowledge that it is a highly exaggerated statement of the existing state of affairs in Georgia, and ought not to be received as evidence against the firmness and wisdom of the bench and bar of this State. The author was a member of the judiciary of Georgia at the time "the State vs. Henry Day" was composed, and therefore very little inclined to attack that branch of the government.

Id. pp. 103-4. "The State vs. Henry Day" appeared with the author's initials "R.M.C." in The American Jurist, vol. 20 (Oct. 1838) pp. 237-43. The poem there is dated May, 1837. Id. p. 237.

[2] Lex ita est is Latin for "thus is the law." After citing the verses in which the judge declared men's double criminal responsibility, Hartog (2000) p. 104 observed:

> The poem was a plausible fiction, coherent with the contemporary law.

As if unequal justice under law for men doesn't matter, Hartog moved from the poetic declaration of men's double criminal responsibility to the conventional one-sided, false understanding of the incidence of domestic violence. Coverture was a legal fiction rarely determinative of legal results. Id. p. 106. The legal fiction of coverture, however, supported general gynocentric bias towarddisproportionate punishment of men.

[3] Wikipedia, which has struggled with the problem of feminist bias, features considerable anti-men bias in its entry on coverture.

[4] E.g. Hartog (2000) pp. 104-110, with includes poorly informed discussion of the "rule of thumb." The myth that a husband could legally beat his wife with a stick no thicker than his thumb (the mythic "rule of thumb") is prevalent in scholarly family history. For a thorough review of formal law, Kelly (1994). Commenting on a court's declaration that it wouldn't interfere in minor incidents of violence at home or in the schoolyard, Kelly mythologizes law in action and endorses conventional gender stereotyping of domestic violence:

> the court would have made the same judgment {not all minor violence belongs in criminal court} if the wife had done the beating. One cannot conclude, therefore, that husbands were allowed a special latitude in chastising their wives, except, of course, in the sense that husbands were much more prone to such misconduct than wives and would more readily benefit from the court's conclusion.

Id. p. 346, n. 25. Especially if domestic violence is defined to encompass minor violence, e.g. slapping, women almost surely would be found to be more prone to domestic violence than are men. Almost all minor violence isn't in fact taken into criminal court and could not feasibly be policed in a non-totalitarian state. Charlton & Charlton (1839), p. 104, writing from judicial experience, frankly points to the legal difficulty of fairly judging domestic violence. Judges today would hardly dare to make that common-sense observation. More generally, Kelly (1994) falls to recognize the gynocentric structures supporting the "rule of thumb" myth and their implications for the criminalization of men.

[image] Princess. Thanks to Clipartcottage for making the image available under a Creative Commons Attribution license.

References:

Charlton, Robert M., and Thomas Jackson Charlton. 1839. Poems. Boston: C.C. Little and J. Brown. (2nd ed., 1842)

Hartog, Hendrik. 2000. Man and wife in America: a history. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University Press.

Kelly, Henry Ansgar. 1994. "'Rule of Thumb' and the Folklaw of the Husband's Stick." Journal of Legal Education. 44 (3): 341-65.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Feminist Builds “women-only” island – then calls men for help when things break

July 24, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Is It Really Hypergamy — Or Just Narcissism in Disguise?

July 26, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many commentators blame the rising female selectiveness in relationships on "hypergamy"—the idea that women naturally seek partners of higher status. While this has evolutionary grounding, a more compelling explanation lies in cultural narcissism.

In affluent, individualistic societies, narcissistic traits have surged—particularly among women raised in a culture that glorifies self-worth, esteem, and chivalric deference. This acquired status leads to what psychologists call Acquired Situational Narcissism, a form of narcissism born not from personality disorder, but from social reinforcement of perceived importance. Much of what's labeled "hypergamy" today may in fact be status-seeking motivated by this cultural narcissism, not a biologically adaptive mate strategy.

Research supports this view. Narcissists tend to choose romantic partners who boost their status—those who are attractive, wealthy, or high in social capital—not because of emotional closeness but to reflect glory and inflate self-esteem. They prefer "trophy partners," idealized mates who mirror their inflated self-image. These patterns of self-enhancing relationship selection are well-documented and correlate strongly with narcissistic motivations rather than with functional reproductive strategy.

> "Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation… They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends and trophy partners, perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people."

> — Grapsas et al., 2020

> "Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty)."
> — Wallace, 2011

> "Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation… These partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance."
> — Campbell, 1999

> "Narcissists particularly look for in a partner… physical attractiveness and agentic traits (e.g., status and success)… Indeed, narcissists report that part of the reason they are drawn to attractive and successful partners is that these people are similar to them."
> — Campbell, Brunell & Finkel, 2006

True evolutionary hypergamy does not require an individual to overrate their own attractiveness. Narcissism does. Thus, a useful test: if a woman dramatically overestimates her own desirability while seeking high-status men, this signals narcissism—not evolution. Mistaking the two leads to the normalization and even glorification of maladaptive traits under the guise of "natural female behavior."

Moreover, modern narcissistic self-enhancement is not adaptive—it undermines relationship quality, social cohesion, and even fertility rates. Unlike adaptive mate strategies, it serves the ego, not survival.

By distinguishing narcissistic self-enhancement from evolutionary hypergamy, we avoid excusing destructive behavior as biologically inevitable. What we see today is not always nature—it's culture, and it's increasingly narcissistic.

References:

1. Grapsas, S., Brummelman, E., Back, M. D., & Denissen, J. J. (2020). The "why" and "how" of narcissism: A process model of narcissistic status pursuit. Perspectives on Psychological Science, 15(1), 150-172.
2. Wallace, H. M. (2011). Narcissistic self-enhancement. In: Campbell, W. K., & Miller, J. D. (Eds.) The Handbook of Narcissism and Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Theoretical Approaches, Empirical Findings, and Treatments, 309-318.
3. Campbell, W. K. (1999). Narcissism and romantic attraction. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 77(6), 1254–1270.
4. Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach. In: Vohs, K. D.,

& Finkel, E. J. (Eds.), Self and Relationships: Connecting Intrapersonal and Interpersonal Processes, 57–83.

Feature image detail: Left half shows a tribal or historical woman looking with admiration at a strong, competent man (symbolizing adaptive hypergamy). The right half shows a modern woman taking selfies next to a luxury car, barely noticing the man she's with. Symbolism: Juxtaposes genuine evolutionary mate choice with modern narcissistic self-display.

Narcissism Exaggerates Baseline Hypergamy

July 30, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many social media commentators discuss the rise of hypergamous behaviors among modern women. Some pose reasonable evolutionary hypotheses for such behavior, but there may be another cause at work – cultural narcissism.

Observations of extreme hypergamy among women may be equally explained by the rise of cultural narcissism in affluent societies (Twenge & Campbell, 2009), a motive that differs from baseline hypergamy, but which nevertheless involves comparable behaviors of self-enhancement and status-seeking.

Society's encouragement of men in chivalric deference to women, and the associated practice of 'placing women on a pedestal', has generated a degree of gendered narcissism among women over time. To frame this differently, Acquired Situational Narcissism can arise with any acquired social status; for example in academic experts, politicians, pop singers, actors – and also in women who, in modern society, are taught that they deserve to be recognised for thier worth, dignity, value, purity, status, reputation and esteem in the context of their relationships with men. This psychological disposition in women, partly a result of traditional chivalry, promotes exaggerated self-enhancement behaviours beyond what evolutionary models of hypergamy would require.

Among narcissistic individuals, studies find higher incidence of hypergamy-like behaviors, indicating that such behavior is not the result of a culture of sexual liberation alone, nor of baseline evolutionary imperatives; it may also be the result of an acquired social class narcissism that says "I deserve."

Excerpts from narcissism studies:

> A third strand of evidence concerns narcissists' relationship choices. Because humans are a social species, relationship choices are an important feature of situation selection. Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation. For example, narcissists are keener on gaining new partners than on establishing close relationships with existing ones (Wurst et al., 2017). They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends (Jonason & Schmitt, 2012) and trophy partners (Campbell, 1999), perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people. In sum, narcissists are more likely to select social environments that allow them to display their performances publicly, ideally in competition with others. These settings are potentially more accepting and reinforcing of narcissistic status strivings.
>
> Source: The "Why" and "How" of Narcissism: A Process Model of Narcissistic Status Pursuit[1]

> Consistent with the self-orientation model, Study 5 provided an empirical demonstration of the mediational role of self enhancement in narcissists' > preference for perfect rather than caring romantic partners. Furthermore, these potential romantic partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance (i.e., social status). Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation. Narcissists also were attracted to self-oriented romantic partners to the extent that these others were viewed as similar. The mediational roles of self-enhancement and similarity were independent. That is, narcissists' romantic preferences were driven both by a desire to gain self-esteem and a desire to associate with similar others.

>
> Source: Narcissism and romantic attraction[2]

> Narcissism has been linked with the materialistic pursuit of wealth and symbols that convey high status (Kasser, 2002; Rose, 2007). This quest for status extends to relationship partners. Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty) (Campbell, 1999; Tanchotsrinon, Maneesri, & Campbell, 2007)
>
> Source: The Handbook of Narcissism And Narcissistic Personality Disorders[3]

> Narcissists are looking for partners who can provide them with self-esteem and status. How can a romantic partner provide status and esteem? First, he or she can do so directly: a romantic partner who admires me and thinks that I am wonderful elevates my esteem. Second, he or she can do so indirectly through a basic association: my partner is beautiful and popular, therefore I am too. This indirect esteem generation is clear from a range of social psychological research, from the self-evaluation maintenance (SEM) model (Tesser, 1988) to Basking in Reflected Glory (BIRGing; Cialdini et al., 1976). This indirect esteem provisioning is evident in the term "trophy" partner.
>
> There is good empirical evidence that narcissists like targets who provide esteem and status both directly and indirectly (Campbell, 1999). There is also an important interaction effect. Namely, narcissists like popular and attractive partners, especially when those others admire them. Narcissists, however, are not particularly interested in admiration from just anybody. This finding is inconsistent with the "doormat hypothesis." Narcissists are not looking for someone they can walk on and who worships them; rather, narcissists are looking for someone ideal who also admires them.
>
> The next question, of course, is what characteristics of a potential partner make them able to provide narcissists with narcissistic esteem? Not surprisingly, what narcissists particularly look for in a partner are physical attractiveness and agentic traits (e.g., status and success). A narcissist's ideal partner is like a narcissist's ideal self (recall Freud's comments): attractive, successful, and admiring of the narcissist. Indeed, in our research, narcissists report that part of the reason that they are drawn to attractive and successful partners is that these > people are similar to them (Campbell, 1999).

>
> Source: Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach.[4]

Dozens more quotations could be added, however the point is obvious: self-enhancement strategies of both narcissism and hypergamy share overlapping features.

The rise of narcissistic behaviors among women is receiving increased attention from academia, particularly with the addition of new variants to the lexicon such as communal narcissism, and vulnerable narcissism, which appear to be preferred female modes of expressing narcissism. A more in-depth survey of narcissism variants among women, and their implications can be read here.

Hypergamy, as an evolutionary motivation, doesn't require a woman to overestimate her own attractiveness and desirability as she seeks to secure high resource/status males. Narcissism, on the contrary, does entail an overestimation by women of their own attractiveness & desirability as they seek to secure high resource/status males.

To discover whether hypergamy or narcissism is at play, one might simply ask a woman to rate her own attractiveness. If she strongly overrates herself, then her mating-up is likely driven by narcissism and is maladaptive. If she rates herself honestly, then her desire to mate up is more likely driven by an adaptive hypergamy. Mating-up today appears largely driven by maladaptive narcissism; therefore any rationalizing or excusing it as "natural" and "adaptive" serves to compound and increase that same culturally-driven narcissism.

A note on terminology:

Sigmund Freud introduced narcissism as a developmental trait that ranged from healthy to unhealthy.[4,5] Some evolutionary psychologists posit that a degree of narcissism might be adaptive in the wider evolutionary sense, though this hypothesis (which has zero genetic evidence to confirm it) can only be applied to a limited subset of behaviours before tipping into maladaptive expressions of narcissism as measured by the usual psychometric instruments.[6,7,8] Moreover, no one has satisfactorily demonstrated that a mild, non-pathological narcissism is adaptive and belongs to a construct continuum with more pathological narcissism; therefore it is conjecture to claim that narcissism is natural but that it simply "gets out of hand" at the more extreme end of a hypothesised spectrum.

With these points in mind it's necessary to differentiate between female self-enhancement as an evolutionary survival strategy, versus female self-enhancement as a maladaptive, narcissistic pathology. The narcissistic self-enhancement we see increasingly demonstrated among women today is not a contributor to evolutionary success; on the contrary it works to undermine family ties, corrode intimate relationships, and is also associated with lowering the birth rate – the exact opposites of conditions required for evolutionary success. Lastly, by differentiating hypergamous self-enhancement from narcissistic self-enhancement we avoid the error of encouraging or excusing narcissism under the banner of it being “natural.”

Maladaptive vs. adaptive versions of self-enhancement

REFERENCES:

[1] Grapsas, S., Brummelman, E., Back, M. D., & Denissen, J. J. (2020). The “why” and “how” of narcissism: A process model of narcissistic status pursuit. Perspectives on Psychological Science, 15(1), 150-172.
[2] Campbell, W. K. (1999). Narcissism and romantic attraction. Journal of Personality and social Psychology, 77(6), 1254.
[3] Wallace, H. M. (2011). Narcissistic self-enhancement. The handbook of narcissism and narcissistic personality disorder: Theoretical approaches, empirical findings, and treatments, 309-318.
[4] Freud, S. (2014). On narcissism: An introduction. Read Books Ltd.
[5] Segal, H., & Bell, D. (2018). The theory of narcissism in the work of Freud and Klein. In Freud’s On Narcissism (pp. 149-174). Routledge.
[6] Holtzman, N. S., & Donnellan, M. B. (2015). The roots of Narcissus: Old and new models of the evolution of narcissism. Evolutionary perspectives on social psychology, 479-489.
[7] Holtzman, N. S. (2018). Did narcissism evolve?. Handbook of Trait Narcissism: Key Advances, Research Methods, and Controversies, 173-181.
[8] Czarna, AZ, Wróbel, M., Folger, LF, Holtzman, NS, Raley, JR, & Foster, JD (2022). Narcissism and Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Evolutionary roots and emotional profiles. In TK Shackelford & L. Al-Shawaf (Eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Evolution and the Emotions. Oxford University Press.

Servitude to women: don’t be that man

August 3, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

In Frauendienst (Service of Ladies), written in German about 1250, the knight Ulrich von Liechtenstein describes mis-education, delusion, and suffering. Poets and wise men, the teachers of that time, urged Ulrich to subordinate himself to a woman. Ulrich recalled:

> This I heard the wise men say:
> none can be happy, none can stay > contented in this world but he > who loves and with such loyalty > a noble woman that he’d die > if it would save her from a sigh.
> For thus all men have loved who gain > the honor others can’t obtain. [1]

Men’s lives are thus valued lower than a woman’s sigh. Only a very brave man would dare to reject that honor. Ulrich sought it:

> “I’ll give my body, all my mind > and life itself to womankind > and serve them all the best I can.
> And when I grow to be a man
> I’ll always be their loyal thane:
> though I succeed or serve in vain
> I’ll not despair and never part > from them,” thus spoke my childish heart.
> …
> Whoever spoke of women’s praise
> I followed, just to hear each phrase, > for it would make my heart so light > and fill me with true delight.
> I heard from many a learned tongue > their excellence and honor sung; > they praised one here and praised one there, > they praised the ladies everywhere. [2]

This is the sort of literature that gave rise to Hitler. If children were to read Theophrastus’s Golden Book rather than Dr. Theophrastus Seuss’s One Fish, Two Fish, Red Fish, Blue Fish, they would recognize that praise of ladies is a funny thing.[3] Or at least they would develop a sense of humor lacking today.

Ulrich pledged servitude to a lady. He engaged his aunt to plead his love suit. The lady replied to the aunt:

> That he excels I'll take your word > (although it's more than I have heard) > in every virtue, every skill, > yet for a woman it must still > prevent a close relationship > to see his most unsightly lip.
> You must forgive my saying so:
> it isn't pretty, as you know. [4]

The lady rejected Ulrich for his cleft lip. Oblivious to the lady's cruelty, he underwent a painful operation to have his cleft lip joined. Critical post-structuralists and ananavelist scholars have determined that the lady's rejection of Ulrich on the grounds of his cleft lip figures and problematizes the prevalence of male genital mutilation in medieval European Christian culture. More to the point, Ulrich served a heartless lady.

Ulrich enacted his loving devotion to his lady in various ridiculous ways. In one joust, he damaged a finger. After his lady expressed doubt about the seriousness of his wound, he had his finger cut off. He sent the cut-off finger to his lady along with a poem praising her. She responded to his messenger with a message of scorn:

> Go back and tell him my regret;
> he'd serve the ladies better yet, > were it not that his hand is shy > a finger. Tell him too that I > shall always keep the finger near, > buried in my dresser here,
> that I shall see it every day, > and that I mean just what I say.
>
> Tell him from me now, courtly youth:
> I'll keep the finger — not, in truth, > because my heart at last is moved > so that his prospects are improved > by a single hair. Make sure he hears > this: should he serve a thousand years, > the service I would always scorn.
> By my constancy I've sworn.

Ulrich was delighted. He thought that his lady continually viewing his amputated appendage was a sign that she loved him. But women preoccupied with amputation of men's appendages do not truly love men.[5]

Ulrich sought to please his lady by pretending to be a woman. He dressed himself as a woman, called himself Lady Venus, and traveled around Europe participating in dangerous jousting tournaments. He was wounded in the chest and took at least one lance blow to the head. While Ulrich was in a bathtub bathing a wound, an admirer showered him in rose petals.[6] Bodily wounds to men aren't socially understood to bleed real blood.

One day, Ulrich's lady summoned him to appear before her in secret. She told him to appear in rags like a leper. Ulrich raced to his lady to fulfill her summons. He donned rags and ate with lepers outside his lady's castle. His lady forced him to sleep outside the castle overnight in the rough, in the rain. The next morning he was instructed to wait until the evening. That evening, as instructed, he laid in hiding outside the castle. The castle warden making rounds took a long piss on him. After more misadventures, he was finally pulled up with a bedsheet onto the castle balcony.[7] Ulrich then declared to his lady:

> Lady, grant me grace.
> …
> Lady, you're my chief delight,
> may I be favored in your sight, > may your compassion take my part.
> Consider the longing of my heart > which constant love for you inspired.
> Consider that I have not desired > a thing more beautiful than you, > a lovelier I never knew.
>
> You're dearer far than all that I > have ever seen. If I could lie > with you tonight then I'd possess > all that I've dreamed of happiness.
> My life will gain by your assent > a lofty spirit and content > more and more until it ends.
> It's you on whom my joy depends.

That's a courtly speech by a man drenched in piss. Ulrich obviously hadn't learned from Ovid. His lady refused to lie with him.

Exploiting Ulrich's inferiority in guile, his lady got rid of him with deceptive hand-holding. She explained that she would do his will if he would re-enact his entrance and give her the opportunity to greet him as a lover. That meant for him to get on the bedsheet and be lowered down slightly, and then brought up again. Ulrich rightly was suspicious that she would let him down and never pull him up again. She offered to hold his hand as a good-faith guarantee. Ulrich agreed:

> Though worried, I then took my seat > inside the tightly knotted sheet.
> They let me down a little ways > to where they were supposed to raise > me up. My sweet continued slyly,

> “God knows, I never thought so highly > of any noble in the land > as of the knight that holds my hand.
>
> “My friend,” she spoke, “be welcome so.
> We both are freed from care and woe > and I can now invite you in.”
> While speaking thus, she raised my chin > and said, “Dear one, give me a kiss.”
> I was so overjoyed with this
> I let her hand go free and I > quite soon had cause to grieve thereby.

They dropped Ulrich down and pulled the sheet back up over the wall. Ulrich was in deep despair. If not for his comrade’s intervention, he would have drowned himself in a dark lake.

Ulrich von Liechtenstein’s Service of Ladies is far more than a playful game. Like the thirteenth-century Old French nouvelle The Three Knights and the Chainse, Service of Ladies represents the social construction of male disposability. Men will not achieve gender equality until men reject a life of service to ladies.[8]

Notes:

[1] Ulrich von Liechtenstein, Frauendienst (Service of Ladies) s. 9, trans. Thomas (1969) p. 52. Ulrich’s book is now commonly recognized to be fictional rather than autobiographical. Ulrich von Liechtenstein was historically a knight in thirteenth-century Germanic lands.

[2] Id. ss. 11, 13.

[3] Dr. Theophrastus Seuss’s One Fish, Two Fish, Red Fish, Blue Fish declares, “From there to here, from here to there, funny things are everywhere.”

[4] Frauendienst, s. 80, trans. Thomas (1969). Subsequent quotes are from id. ss. 453-4, {1198, 1205-6}, 1267-8. The aunt acts as the old woman go-between common in medieval Iberian literature.

[5] On pre-occupation with castration, see the discussion of the serranas stories in Libro de buen amor, note [8] and comparative criticism of the Old French works, Fisherman of Pont-sur-Seine and Lecheor.

[6] Frauendienst, ss. 733-5.

[7] Stories of Virgil and Hippocrates being suspended in a basket from a women’s window are part of the literature of men’s sexed protests. The summons for the secret meeting is ss. 1114-5; sleeping in the rain, 1168-70; getting pissed on, s. 1189.

[8] Classen (2004) emphasizes the theatrical, ludic element of Frauendienst. But Frauendienst, like Pamphilus, has significance extending all the way to scholarly life today. For example, a recent scholarly analysis of Frauendienst centered on the pleasures of ridiculing masculinity:

> Ulrich's lady openly mocks her male suitor, ridiculing his masculinity. What pleasures does such mockery offer to male and female audiences?

Perfetti (2003) p. 129. As scholarly work, id. could be regarded as a joke. But it's wide-ranging effects are apparent.

[image] Ulrich von Liechenstein, painting on folio 237r, Cod. Pal. germ. 848, Große Heidelberger Liederhandschrift (Codex Manesse). Zürich, ca. 1300 bis ca. 1340,

References:

Classen, Albrecht. 2004. "Moriz, Tristan, and Ulrich as Master Disguise Artists: Deconstruction and Reenactment of Courtliness in Moriz von Craûn, Tristan als Mönch, and Ulrich von Liechtenstein's Frauendienst." The Journal of English and Germanic Philology. 103 (4): 475-504.

Perfetti, Lisa. 2003. "'With them she had her playful game' The Performance of Gender and Genre in Ulrich von Lichtenstein's Frauendienst." Ch. 4 in Women & laughter in medieval comic literature. Ann Arbor: University of Michigan Press.

Thomas, J. W., trans. 1969. Ulrich von Liechtenstein's Service of ladies. Translated in condensed form into English verse with an introduction to the poet and the work. Chapel Hill: University of North Carolina Press.

Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Transphobia vs. Manphobia

August 9, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Discussion about transgenderism is all the rage, with many people railing against what they view as a Frankenstein fad, and yet others who are encouraging the trend beyond what anyone would consider reasonable limits – e.g., gender-affirming surgery for children. A third approach is that of the social phenomenologist which accounts for people (including myself) who are more interested in making sense of the phenomenon before screaming blue murder to the sky.

Most people appear eager to discover what Aristotle called the "efficient cause" that might lead men to become transwomen — with the most popular 'causes' being those of gender dysphoria, and autogynephilia which both end up falling short of sufficient explanations, for reasons I'll discuss below.

Autogynephilia

Autogynephilia is defined as a male's propensity to be sexually aroused by the thought of himself as a female. It's a paraphilia that is theorized to underlie transvestism and some forms of male-to-female transsexualism,[1] as showcased in the below tweet by a transwoman.

If 'getting off' by appearing as the opposite sex were the only motive we might reasonably assume that occasional cross-dressing and/or erotic roleplay would scratch the itch, but transgender individuals are clearly seeking a more permanent goal. Moreover, many transgender individuals experience a loss of sexual arousal after medically transitioning, indicating that the securing of permanent autogynephilic pleasure is not a sufficient explanation for making the change.[2]

Gender dysphoria

Gender dysphoria is the favorite go-to for advocates of traditional gender roles who pretentiously claim the body and psyche can only be exact Xerox copies of each other. As tidy as this formula sounds on its face, even people with a rudimentary understanding of human psychology will see its failings; failings demonstrated by the fact that everyone has an imaginative and psychological identity that is, at least in some ways, at odds with bodily reality:

- A stunningly beautiful woman identifies as plain, or ugly.
- A fat guy identifies as muscled and skinny.
- An old man identifies himself healthy, as fit as a teenager.
- A little girl identifies as a world-class singer.
- A little boy identifies as the best violinist in the world.
- A feminist identifies as more caring than others.
- A person identifies as more intelligent than others.
- A person born of privilege identifies as restricted.
- An underprivileged person identifies as someone who can be and do anything. Etc.

The psyche tends to ramble off in fanciful ways that do not match seamlessly with physical reality, and it has done this since way back in our evolutionary history. Psychological identity is not, and never will be, a faithful replica of physical reality…. and yet human civilization has continued to thrive in spite of this propensity.

With that human capacity for imagination in mind we can set aside those who champion seamless sex-and-gender identities, and associated social roles. We can also find some fault with Matt Walsh's recent insistence that there can be one, and only one definition of a woman.[3] While Matt is 100% correct in stating that there is only one definition of a biological woman, he conveniently omits the possibility that there may be a definition of 'woman' applying to a person's psychological identity, thus essentially giving us two definitions of woman corresponding to the soma/psyche split.

To reiterate, we all see the obvious XX woman of the body, and then there's the woman of psychological/imaginal identity which can operate somewhat independently of the former (hence transgenders, intergenders, etc). To illustrate this, Matt Walsh could have a body that looks like Matt Walsh but, hypothetically speaking, in his imaginative and psychological identity he might be more like Napoleon Bonaparte; when it comes to the human psyche anything is possible.

While all this might sound like a recipe for confusion, it isn't really. Dictionaries attest to the ability of the human mind to accept multiple definitions of a word. I can be stoned to death by literal rocks, and I can be stoned after smoking weed. I can suffer a physical pain, or alternatively I can be in psychological pain – and those 'two pains' might not be seamless pains going on at the same time; they might be completely unrelated.

When it comes to the public furor around this topic, the comical part is watching traditional conservatives argue there is only soma, and the progressives argue there's only psyche. The stupidity of these two partial arguments – and the debate between them – make for the best Punch and Judy show on offer.

If I wanted to take a more strictly phenomenological approach to our topic, I might be forced to say transwomen were both male and female. For example being a woman in one's imaginative identity will never mean that the chromosomal body has also changed, which indicates there are two identities running concurrently, one male and one female. That said, I appreciate that imagination can override the phenomenological approach to the point of absurdum.

What we can conclude from the more narrow arguments is that they are reductionist and kneejerk responses to a complex phenomenon, and so they provide insufficient explanations for the rise of transgender identity. They may be partially correct but it may help to consider more complex equations, not to mention the approaching of each trans person as possessing a unique biography that led them to become who they are. Following this line of thought I'd like to offer two more factors below that might help to complicate the picture.

Internalized misandry, and gyneolatry

I've observed in the rhetoric of many transwomen both an externalized and an internalized misandry. This appears in descriptions of the men they know, and in descriptions of themselves, and they also tend to rehearse feminist depictions of maleness that portray narrow and denigrating descriptions of masculinity. Conversely, transwomen tend to idealize women and femininity (i.e., gyneolatry),[4] leading to a conclusion that the feminine grass is of a greener hue.

The sense of internalized misandry was reinforced by a 1991 study which found that mothers of young boys with gender dysphoria frequently suffered psychiatric disorders and that these boys exhibited chronic suffering that was often expressed directly by them as self-hate. One such boy at age three said:

> "I hate myself. I don't want to be me. I want to be somebody else. I want to be a girl."[5]

When a man's potential masculinity is felt as toxic due to the operation of internalized misandry, it's only natural that such a person would have a dysphoric reaction to masculine selfhood. This might be understood as a pathological reaction, but it can be equally viewed as a healthy adaptation to an unhealthy, male-denigrating environment — for if I renounce maleness I protect myself from corrosive states of imposed self-hatred, along with de-personalizing those attacks directed at me from a misandric world.

Hence gender dysphoria is in some ways adaptive.

The position I have been leading to can be stated simply this way: Internalized misandry + gyneolatry + autogynephilia = transwoman. Of those three factors, I would consider autogynephilia somewhat more variable than the other two, and while often present, it is not always.

In order to render this triplicate formula more palpable, I encourage readers to watch the following Benjamin Boyce interview with former trans individual NJada[6] who masterfully illustrates the operation of internalized misandry and gyneolatry in his own experiences.

.

In conclusion, this article claims that autogynephilia, and gender dysphoria prove insufficient as "causes" of the desire to transition but may nevertheless operate as one factor among many. As a student of gender politics I have expanded the causa efficiens to three:

Internalized misandry + gyneolatry + autogynephilia = transwoman.

Lastly, and on a more general note Kara Dansky,[7] a trans-exclusionary radical feminist who is leading the charge against transgender individuals, recently tweeted, "It is, in effect, a men's rights movement intended to objectify women's bodies and erase us as a class. It is left-wing misogyny on steroids. I say this is as a leftist and a Democrat."

In response I feel it important to clarify that the transgender movement is not a cause célèbre driven by men's rights advocates, but rather the current support for transgender individuals/rights is derived from the power of government administrations and global regimes playing "freedom one-upmanship" – ie., the feigning of moral purity to position themselves at top of the global hierarchy.

Feminists were the ones who cleared this forest path for the global elites to walk on, and Dansky is right in the sense that it opens a window to become of benefit to men's rights movement – ie. it dissolves customary culture privileges that have accumulated around the female sex, making those privileges available to all humans, including men and boys, for the first time.[8]

References:

[1] Ray Blanchard, Autogynephilia: an underappreciated paraphilia, (2019) ; See also: C. Moser, Autogynephilia in Women (2009), which shows that autogynephilia also exists in large numbers of natal women, negating Blanchard's thesis that it is peculiar to transwomen.
[2] Autogynephilia | ContraPoints (2018)
[3] Matt Walsh: What Is A Woman? (2022)
[4] Gyneolotry | Gynocentrism And Its Origins
[5] Sonia Marantz and Susan Coates, Mothers of Boys with Gender Identity Disorder: A Comparison of Matched Controls (1991)
[6] Benjamin Boyce, Transition and Redemption | a Detrans Story, with NJada (2022)
[7] Kara Dansky, The Abolition of Sex: How the "Transgender" Agenda Harms Women and Girls (2021)
[8] Peter Wright, Unintended Effects Of Transgender Activism On Men's Issues (2021)

BLUE PILL THINKING: Rules of Modern Dating ~ “It’s Complicated”

August 18, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 62 – Rob in Japan Pt. 2 / AI, Luddite Fallacy and the Human Factor Revisited

August 23, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

It’s an ill wind

August 26, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

When I was a lad, I was informed that the word “fart” was an acronym for “Foul Air, Rear Trap.” It made sense to me at the time, but as is often the case, you eventually discover that you can’t believe everything grown-ups tell you.

Whatever the origin of the word, I have noticed that in recent years it has become more acceptable to utter it in polite society, even on television, which was once unthinkable…network standards, you know.

Today the Overton Window has been flung wide open to air the topic of flatulence. Yet in our egalitarian-obsessed society, it is difficult to obtain funding for any sort of study pertaining to group differences, particularly between men and women. Studies that reveal uncomfortable truths that conflict with egalitarianism might be uncovered and you don’t want to go down that road…unless you’re a standup comic.

So imagine my surprise to discover that one important male/female difference has been studied extensively in recent years and the results are in. It turns out there are measurable differences between men and women when it comes to passing gas. I don’t know how these studies were funded, but I haven’t come across any DOGE revelations. If federal funding was used, this is one rare example of your tax dollars being put to good use.

There are sound reasons for doing honest research on the topic. If male and female alimentary tracts are different, that would certainly affect the advice given by dietitians and nutritionists, not to mention physicians who prescribe medication. Gas is a common side effect of many foods and supplements and may be more likely in one sex than the other. So who are the people offering enlightenment on this topic?

The “Real Clear Science” web site offers “Women’s Farts Smell Worse, and Five More Facts You Need to Know About Flatulence.” It seems female emanations have higher concentrations of hydrogen sulfide, which produces the classic “rotten eggs” smell. Personally, I think it’s related to veganism, which is much more popular with women than men. What can you expect when you consume copious amounts of broccoli, cauliflower, and Brussels sprouts?

This may explain why women throughout history have experimented with so many different perfumes. Sooner or later a gal has to let one go and strong perfume might be just the thing to override her colon cologne.

Yet when it comes to the battle of the sexes in regard to stench warfare, nature has a way of evening things out. The ICEF (Invisible College of Experimental Flatology) has researched the topic, and according to “The Flatus Gap” by Eric Von Adkisson, women may have more hydrogen sulfide in their emanations, but men pass gas in larger volumes, so the actual malodorousness is pretty close to even. It’s the old quality versus quantity conundrum.

While hard science has studied the gender gas gap, the soft sciences have also weighed in on the topic. Consider L.G. Lippman's "Toward a social psychology of flatulence: The interpersonal regulation of natural gas," published in Psychology: a Quarterly Journal of Human Behavior, way back in 1980. Or you might want to check out Bethany Brookshire's "The Social Psychology of Flatulence" on the Weird Science web site. Or Lisa Wade's "Who farts? And who cares?" on The Society Pages web site.

It turns out that loud farts are funny, but men find them funnier than women. Well, that finding is in synch with my lifelong observations. Sense of humor is largely men's territory. Think about all the times somebody passed on a joke to you or emailed a funny meme. More than likely it was a man. I daresay you have never seen a woman emit a rip-snorter followed by a sly chuckle and a pause for applause. Frat boy behavior, no question about it. But there's a little bit of the frat boy in all of us men, even those who have never set foot inside a fraternity. Of course, there is often a little bit of the frat boy in many college girls, particularly after they have been overserved at a frat party.

Another non-startling revelation is that people find the sound of smelly farts to be slightly less funny than the sound of non-smelly farts." Intuitively obvious, I'd say. When it comes to the five senses and passing gas, taste, touch, and sight are irrelevant. That leaves us with hearing and smelling. Few farts will be so ear-shattering as to make one cover one's ears. Holding one's nose after someone pulls the pin on a fart grenade is a distinct possibility.

Various studies have concluded that women's sense of smell is more acute than men's. Many theories have been proffered to explain this. My theory is that a more sensitive sniffer informs mothers when it's time to check the baby's diapers. Given how much time women spend dealing with the miasma of infantile excretions, it's understandable that they fail to see the humor whenever you air out your colon.

As a lifelong male who is congenitally deficient in empathy, I have never given much thought to the etiquette of eructation. In some social situations it could be the perfect rejoinder; in others, merely a non sequitur. Today, however, many cities have made it illegal to smoke or vape in public. So far as I know, it is not illegal to pass gas in public. On the other hand, I wouldn't expect a positive response if you plead a First Amendment right to do so. You're more likely to get the Pepe Le Pew treatment.

Passing gas in one's own home is another matter. Unfortunately, a man's home is no longer his castle. In truth, I'm not sure it ever was. My grandfather was a pipe smoker. That was perfectly acceptable to my grandmother in the living room. But she drew the line at abdominal swamp gas. "You should excuse yourself and leave the room," was her advice. Easy to do today when you can take your tablet or smartphone with you, but in grandpa's day what to do when a barking sphincter coincides with the denouement of a Perry Mason episode? You couldn't take the TV console out of the room with you, and this was before home video recordings were possible. So when duty called, he let it go silently. He was a master at it. Never heard a peep out of him – not once! Whenever grandma caught a whiff and complained, he'd gaslight her about his gas passing! He would reply “Oh, you’re imagining things,” or words to that effect. Of course, “If two people are on an elevator and one of them farts, they both know who did it.” George Carlin’s very words! A Zen koan of the highest order.

Thinking back to my youth, I believe there was a sort of potty parity among toddlers. Little girls were as amused by whoopee cushions and armpit farts as little boys were. But eventually there came a parting of the ways and we ended up with the sex differences described in the above studies.

As valuable as these studies may be, there are questions that remain unanswered. For one thing, do mothers ever play the “pull my finger” game with their children, or is that the exclusive province of fathers? When teenage girls have get-togethers, do they have fart-lighting competitions as their male counterparts do? Are there more men than women in the wind section of your local orchestra? Pressing question: do these sex differences persist in the trans world? Is the chemical composition of a trans woman’s flatus closer to that of a biological male or female?

So many questions, so much more research needed – but you don’t need to go begging for government grants to study male versus female flatulence. I can’ t think of a better topic for a high school science fair.

Or a better way to meet chicks!

Frame Within Frame: A Gynocentric Misstep

August 29, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

As Max O'Rell noted in the year 1900, men tend to exert intersexual frame within a larger intersexual frame of gynocentrism of which they are unconscious, while deluding themselves that they are guiding the entire interaction.

> >
> "The best thing that can happen to a man is to be ruled by his wife; but she should rule him so discreetly, so diplomatically, that he could almost boast that it is he who rules her. At all events, he should remain very undecided which of the two it is that rules the other. And when a man is not quite sure that it is he who rules his wife, you may take it for granted that it is she who rules him."

In this comment, O'Rell illustrates the opposite of Rollo Tomassi's advice that men should 'always control the Frame, but resist giving the impression that you are.' In O'Rell's view, it is women who actually rule over men while giving the impression that they do not.

This is a 'frame within frame' conundrum—who is really pulling the strings?

Even when applying frame, accepting any of the following clichés means you're still operating inside the larger gynocentric frame that has taken shape over the past 150 years:

– Women are the hypergamous sex and men must adapt to that nature.
– Women are born valuable, and that men must create value.

– Women potentially fall pregnant, therefore we are a gynocentric species.
– Women are the evolutionary gatekeepers of sex.

The principles of gynocentrism, far from being an 'evolutionary norm,' function as a frame that men unwittingly step into—one so longstanding that it is no longer recognized as a frame at all. It's a frame used by women and society to tame and exploit men. In this scenario men set up their own frame inside of the prevailing gynocentric frame, while not realizing they are doing that. They think their frame is dominant—when in truth, it's nothing more than a little tent pitched inside a bigger tent.

Tent within a tent

The good news is that more men are waking up to the problem. As the two-frame issue gains cultural visibility, the moment may have arrived to break free from the gynocentric frame once and for all.

Not paying the cost to be a girlboss

September 2, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

As was the case with his peers, bluesman B.B. King (1925-2015) came from humble beginnings – to put it mildly. Born to sharecroppers on a Mississippi cotton plantation, his mother deserted the family when he was four years old. Thereafter, he was raised by his grandmother. His first job was working in a cotton gin. I'd say that qualifies as humble.

Without delving too deeply into King's musical career, he started performing in the mid-1940s and it was onward and upward from there. His R&B recordings had a great deal of crossover appeal and he often performed with white rockers. Over time he had enough pulling power to move on from blues bars to arenas and concert halls and music festivals. He kept on performing almost to the day he died in 2015. His name lives on, however, in the form of B.B. King's Blues Club franchises in such cities as Memphis, Los Angeles, Nashville, Orlando, Las Vegas, and New Orleans.

I don't have access to B.B. King's tax returns, so I can't testify as to his income, but the length of his career indicates he must have earned a lot of money during his life. I have no idea how he spent it or invested it, and it's possible that the reason he kept performing so long was that he spent it and didn't invest it, or didn't invest it wisely, all of which is beside the point. When you make a lot of money, you are entitled to do what you want with it. But many people, particularly those in the female faction, don't feel that way. As is often noted, in married couples, what the woman earns belongs to her but what the man earns belongs to both of them.

In 1968 B.B. King wrote a song called "Paying the Cost to Be the Boss." I don't know if that was a phrase in common currency or if he originated it, but it caught on, perhaps because it rings true. The song deals with a working man responding to a demanding woman. Let's sample a few verses to get the idea:

> I'll drink if I wanna
> And play a little poker too
> Don't you say nothing to me
> As long as I'm takin' care of you
>
> As long as I'm workin', baby
> And payin' all the bills
> I don't want no mouth from you
> About the way I'm supposed to live
>
> But I tell you, I'm gonna have all the money
> And I don't want no back talk
> If you don't like what I'm doing, baby
> Pick up your things and walk
>
> And the chorus:
>
> You gotta be crazy, baby

> You just gotta be out of your mind
> As long as I'm payin' the bills
> I'm payin' the cost to be the boss

In 1968 you could offer such a song with minimal pushback. Yet three years later, we got "I Am Woman" from Helen Reddy, and we've been going downhill ever since. If B.B. King were still performing today, he would likely be confronted by a platoon of females wearing T-shirts saying "A Black Woman Is Speaking – Listen and Learn."

Above and beyond the song, "paying the cost to be the boss" is pretty well understood above and beyond the battle of the sexes. Even Google gets it:

> The cost of being the boss means putting in the hard work, making tough decisions and, sometimes, sacrificing comfort for growth. Leadership often comes with a glamorous image, but the truth is being in charge requires sacrifices, resilience and an unwavering commitment to your vision.

Most people get it too. While your peers were out partying, you were studying. Perhaps you started a business, put in the hours, invested your money, took risks. Or maybe you went to work for an established business and worked your way up by going above and beyond the call of duty. You didn't expect to be the boss without paying the cost. About the only way you could do that was through nepotism, but you are not well-connected. You could be envious of those born into such circumstances, but you choose to be realistic. You play the hand you've been dealt and get to work rather than whine about how unfair the system is.

The concept of the Seven Deadly Sins is almost as old as Christianity. Envy is one of them, so we know it's been a problem long before anyone heard of Karl Marx. But it's not necessary to be a rabid leftist to suffer from envy. Many people of modest means eyeball a palatial mansion and think "No one should have so much" while simultaneously envisioning themselves so housed and thinking, "It must be nice." But they have no idea how many hoops the owner had to jump through to obtain such a domicile. It's a bit like theater. All the audience sees is what's on the stage. They have no idea how many hours of work it takes backstage to put on a show that amuses the audience for two hours.

It's difficult to put a dollar sign on paying the cost to be the boss, but I'm going to take a stab at it. As is the case with most of you, my experience with the monied elite is minimal – with one exception. My boss, whose origins were as humble as B.B. King's, realized his ambitions, became a multi-millionaire, and lives in a mansion. Occasionally, for Christmas parties or other functions, he invites staff and employees to his home. At one of these functions a number of years ago, I was chatting with the company controller, who also handled the boss's personal accounting. "I'll bet the property taxes on this place must run $50,000," I said, probing for a response but not really expecting one. Normally, such information would have been the corporate equivalent of a state secret. Lubricated with a couple of drinks, however, the controller snickered and said, "How about twice that much!" This was 15 years ago, so given the escalation of real estate in my city, I guess that now my boss is paying at least $150,000 a year and maybe closer to $200,000, just for the privilege of living in his own home.

Wandering the boss's mansion and grounds, one can't help but fantasize about living in such splendor. Who wouldn't? The question one should ask is not whether or not one would like to live there. The question is would one like it enough to scrape together $150,000+ this year…and next year…and the year after that, etc. Keep in mind that annual assessment has to be paid, even if one suffers a severe income disruption. If you lose your source of income, you will pay no income tax. If you have to tighten your belt, you will pay less in the way of sales taxes because you're spending less. But property taxes are the gift to the county that keeps on giving. And after you die, your estate must pay them till the property is sold. Paying the cost to be the boss doesn't end even when you're dead.

Taxation aside, how would you like to come up with the dough to pay for the cost of maintaining and repairing the mansion and its grounds, or for the utility bills that keep all that interior space cool or warm, as the case may be? It costs more – a lot more – to live in a mansion than in a bungalow. Who would have guessed? Add up all the costs you must pay to be the boss and you might discover that easy street is not without potholes and speed bumps.

As further evidence, I offer the HGTV (Home & Garden Television) channel. Once a year HGTV has a lottery for a "dream home." Most winners end up selling the home because of the financial burdens of maintaining said "dream home." In one case, an Illinois man won a 5,500 square foot lakefront home in East Texas. After he moved there he found he didn't have the income to maintain it. Appraised by the county at $1.85 million, it sold at auction for $1.3 million. He hadn't paid the cost to be the boss so he couldn't live like the boss…not for long anyway. I suspect he would not be a candidate to join the "Tax the rich" cult.

There will always be people offended by the fact that someone – if not their boss, likely someone else's boss – has more than they do. Consider the case of actor Michael Caine, who was Cockney-born and always had a populist bent in his social attitudes. By the late 1970s, Caine had become an international superstar of the cinema. He was paid accordingly, but he was residing in England, where his income was subject to an 82% tax rate. For that reason, a number of British rockers, movie stars, and other celebs had moved away from the UK. Caine, however, chose to remain.

Then one day he hired an electrician to do some work at his house. When the workman saw that Caine was living in relative comfort despite his heavy tax burdens, he stormed away, informing Caine that no one should live in such luxury. "It's people like you who are ruining this country," he fumed.

When you only get to keep 18% of the money you earn, and the rest is going to pay for the cradle-to-grave welfare state that serves the likes of the electrician – and he still feels aggrieved – the situation is untenable. So Caine decided the time had come to leave the

UK. He described the UK as “a communist country without a dictator.” Contemporary Brits might feel Caine’s 45-year-old assessment is still accurate. Just because Caine was paying the cost he had no right to think he was the boss. Just as the wage-earning man turns over the bulk of his paycheck to his wife, the high-income man is expected to turn over most of his income to the state. The woman sees no problem with such an arrangement; neither does the state – perhaps one reason why women seem to be drawn to jobs in government bureaucracies.

And that brings us to Justin Trudeau. It seems like ancient history now, but when Justin Trudeau was first elected prime minister of Canada in 2015, he was asked why half the members of his cabinet were female. “Because it’s 2015!” was his answer. In other words, he was invoking an egalitarian quota system. In days of old, it was a given that if you aspired to high office, such as a cabinet position, you would have to pay the cost to be the boss. Old-timey feminist dogma used to assert that you had to be twice as smart as a man and work twice as hard as a man to get ahead in this world. My, how times have changed!

Quotas are another way of saying it’s not necessary to pay the cost to be the boss; in fact; in fact, if you cut to the front of the line in front of smarter, better qualified people, there’s nothing wrong with that. Like the peasants trooping through the palace and thinking it must be nice, women look at men in positions of authority – or the so-called wage gap – and see injustice in the disparity. They think men shouldn’t have that much power…but it must be nice. Men shouldn’t make that much money…but it must be nice. The “Uneasy lies the head that wears a crown” concept is lost on them. All they see is conspicuous consumption. “Lifestyles of the Rich and Famous” ran for 11 years on TV. The pilot for “Struggles and Sacrifices of the Previously Poor” was never greenlighted.

I think it’s fair to say that B.B. King was rich and famous. In fact, as he got up in years, he assumed the status of national treasure. Among his tokens of recognition are several honorary doctor’s degrees, induction into the Blues, R& B and Rock & Roll Halls of Fame, a Grammy Lifetime Achievement Award, and the Presidential Medal of Freedom. I have to believe that the people who vote to bestow such honors had never heard “Paying the Cost to Be the Boss,” or if they did, they conveniently overlooked it. Then there is the matter of his fathering numerous children with numerous women, though he supported them all – which may be one reason he never retired.

If B.B. King’s attitudes toward women had been brought up when he was nominated for all the honors he received, would he have received them? Of course, he could be stripped of them posthumously. It’s been done before. And B.B. King is a candidate for cancellation, given his harem of baby mamas and the fact that his lyrics reek of misogyny and toxic masculinity.

At least he wouldn’t have to contend with accusations of white supremacy.

Feminism and Romance Literature

September 9, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

According to a recent poll only 18% of U.S. people consider themselves feminist.[1] On that account we can expect readers of romance novels to comprise not more than 18% feminists, and likely far less due to the fact that feminists disparage traditional approaches to romance.... at least according to their rhetoric.

A more generous National Geographic/Ipsos survey[2] of more than 1,000 American women found that 29% of respondents identified as feminists. From the study its worth noting, as an aside, the political spread among feminist women, with Republicans scoring low in feminist self-identification, Democrats scoring high, and Independents somewhere in the middle:

In line with these surveys, we can assume that women who identify as feminist represent less than one third of all women in the USA. With this fact in mind, imagine my surprise when I recently discovered that a whopping 60% of readers of romance novels are feminist, which means that almost two thirds of romantic love enthusiasts are…. feminists! This finding is from a survey of 800 people, which discovered the following details about the average romance reader:[3]

Author of the survey summarised the question and answers in the following way:

> "In the survey of romance readers, I asked if one identified as feminist, believed in equality but wouldn't use the term feminist – or, not at all. 61% of respondents replied in the affirmative to the first option. While many commentators expressed their ire at the believe-in-equality-but-wouldn't-use-the-term-feminist option, 35% selected this. Just 3% said not at all ("The third option makes me cry," one self declared feminist wrote).
>
> The more I read from both sides, the more I realized that we're more alike than we let on. Whether you call it chivalry or manners, we all want someone to open the door for us."[3]

Her last sentence proposes a rationale of (the high number of) feminist readers of romance novels: that they still want doors opened for them, whether actual doors, or doors into better jobs, boardrooms and other kinds of feminist power that are gifted to them by the actions of chivalric men. This point about feminist rationale was confirmed in a study by Gul & Kupfer[4] which discovered that feminists felt the positive sides of benevolent sexism outweighed the negatives even if they believed it was somewhat patronising.

Many feminists believe that romantic love is a subversive trope, a positive one that works to increase the power of women relative to men. Elizabeth Reid Boyd, of the School of Psychology and Social Science at Edith Cowan University, and Director of the Centre for Research for Women in Western Australia with more than a decade as a feminist researcher and teacher of women's studies, tells:

> "I muse upon arguments that romance is a form of feminism. Going back to its history in the Middle Ages and its invention by noblewomen who created the notion of courtly love, examining its contemporary popular explosion and the concurrent rise of popular romance studies in the academy that has emerged in the wake of women's studies, and positing an empowering female future for the genre, I propose that reading and writing romantic fiction is not only personal escapism, but also political activism.
>
> Romance has a feminist past that belies its ostensible frivolity. Romance, as most true romantics know, began in medieval times. The word originally referred to the language romanz, linked to the French, Italian and Spanish languages in which love stories, songs and ballads were written. Stories, poems and songs written in this language were called romances to separate them from more serious literature – a distinction we still have today. Romances were popular and fashionable. Love songs and stories, like those of Lancelot and Guinevere, Tristan and Isolde, were soon on the lips of troubadours and minstrels all over Europe. Romance spread rapidly. It has been called the first form of feminism (Putnam 1970).[4]

Readers of my writings are familiar with the idea that romantic love and feminism constitute a seamless tradition of gynocentrism that first began in the royal courts of Europe.[5] There have occurred transformations in the campaign strategies of feminists throughout the ensuing centuries, but the primary impulse remains consistent through each new generation of feminist activity: to increase the power of women via the institution of a 'sexual feudalism' – ie. the proposition that men should act as a quasi serving-class for women.

The following examples of romantic love in Victorian literature are excerpted from the book Male Masochism by Carol Siegal [6]. Notice the thematic continuity of this literature with the earlier sexual-relations contract first invented in Medieval Europe:

> "A great deal of what [Victorian] women's literary works had to say about gender relations may have been as disquieting as feminist political manifestos, and ironically so, in that the novels seem most anti-male in the very places where they most affirm a traditionally male vision of love. While women's lyric poetry tended to reverse the conventional gender roles in love by representing the female speaker as the lover instead of the object of love, women's fiction most frequently reproduced the images, so common in prior texts by men, of the self-abasing male lover and his exacting mistress.
>
> For example, in Wuthering Heights, Heathcliff declares himself Cathy's slave; in Jane Eyre, Rochester's desire for Jane is first inspired and then intensified by his physically dependent position; in Middlemarch, Will Ladislaw silently vows that Dorothea will always have him as her slave, his only claim to her love lies in how much he has suffered for her. In several Victorian novels by women, men must undergo quasi-ritualized humiliation or punishment before being judged deserving of their lady's attention. For instance, in Olive Schreiner's Story of an African Farm, the fair Lyndall condescends to treat her admirers tenderly after one has been horsewhipped and the other has dressed himself in women's clothes to wait on her. Although Victorian women's novels do explore the emotional insecurities of the heroines, their apparent self-possession is also stressed, in marked contrast to their lovers' displays of agony, desperation, and wounds."

The author goes on to say that male masochism and the dominatrix-like behavior of women in much literature is continuous with courtly love literature from the Middle Ages. And whilst some men self-consciously chose their lowly position in relation to women, the men described in Victorian women's novels lacked such volition and were helplessly controlled by the power of love and beauty:

> "These texts also insist that the true measure of male love is lack of volition. While the heroines make choices that define them morally, the heroes are helplessly compelled by love, and not judged to love unless they are helpless. In this respect Victorian women's fiction recovers the ethos so often expressed in medieval courtly romance that love must be "suffered as a destiny to be submitted to and not denied." It also departs from the conventions of medieval romance in describing the helpless submission to love as an attribute of true manliness, and thus Victorian women's fiction directly attacks the degeneration of chivalry into the self-conscious and controlled "gallantry" of eighteenth century libertines."

Just like their forebears, feminists constitute an army of women working to preserve and extend the tradition of elevated womanhood that has been championed over the last millennium, making the feminist project a remarkably traditional enterprise while putting a lie to its claim to be a forward looking, progressive movement.

The only question left to ask is how, exactly, can this tradition be most accurately characterised? Is it a philosophy, an ideology, human nature, or the slow cultural build-up of behaviorist techniques applied to heterosexual relationships? Its probably a little of all these things, but I'm going to follow the European tradition at the root of romantic love, which saw it primarily as a religion complete with its own guiding Goddess. Her name, as spoken in medieval Germany and through the centuries was Frau Minne.

I have published details about this Goddess before, so rather than rewriting the details I invite the reader to visit the article[7] and look further into the essential religiosity at the heart of our gynocentric cult. Furthermore, as recently stated by Alison Tieman, divinity has today become associated with every human woman, imparting to her the power of "I am a Goddess" in much the same way as once done to pharaohs or emperors, or divinised mortals, who became God-men in ancient times and received religious devotion due of a God. That is, half the human population has undergone an apotheosis, while the other half stand in awe and service.

The differences between a god-complex arising variously from a psychotic episode, in cases of extreme narcissism, or in a society that has seen fit to elevate an individual/s to God status is perhaps moot. These things more often appear together, in combinations. Whatever the causes, we are safe to conclude that feminism amounts today to a global religion, one as powerful as any that have gone before it, with women collectively representing the Godhead to an enthralled male audience.

A man presenting Frau Minne with his heart which has been stabbed by three arrows. (painted wood, Southern Germany, 1320-1330 ca.)

References:

[1] Only 18 percent of Americans consider themselves feminists, Vox 2015
[2] Less than a third of American women identify as feminists [3] Dangerous Books For Girls: The Bad Reputation of Romance Novels Explained.
[4] Elizabeth Reid Boyd, Romancing Feminism: From Women's Studies to Women's Fiction, 2014
[4] Gul, P., & Kupfer, T. R. (2018). Benevolent Sexism and Mate Preferences: Why Do Women Prefer Benevolent Men Despite Recognizing That They Can Be Undermining?. Personality and Social Psychology Bulletin, 0146167218781000.
[5] Damseling, chivalry and courtly love (part two)
[6] Male Masochism by Carol Siegal
[7] 'Frau Minne' the Goddess who steals men's hearts

Shameful anti-male bigotry in the study of honor-based killings

September 19, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

Study of honor-based killings and abuse is replicating the shameful anti-men bigotry prevalent in discussions of domestic violence and rape.

Honor killings make for sensational stories of sex and violence. Those stories are powerful weapons for demonizing men, promoting brutal suspension of civilized due process of law, and expanding the number of persons forceful held behind bars. That treatment of honor killings completely fails to provide an inspiring, alternate model of honor, decency, and humane tolerance.

A recent, book-length study of honor killings in Germany provides a rare window into the extent of anti-men bigotry in the treatment of honor killings. The study explained:

> We define honour killings as intentionally committed or attempted homicides that are carried out predominantly by males against females in the context of patriarchal families or societies in order to restore, from the perspective of the perpetrator, their family's or personal honour. [1]

The term "patriarchal families or societies" covers almost all circumstances under the dominant, hateful social construction of patriarchy. To ensure a sexist definition of honor killing, the scholars defined "honour killing in the strict sense":

> An honour killing in the strict sense is the killing of a girl or young woman by their blood relatives to restore collective family honour.

Under that definition, men cannot die in an honor killing. Alexander Hamilton's death in his duel with Aaron Burr thus wasn't an honor killing. The whole sordid history of men dueling is conceptually effaced with this definition of honor killing. The U.S. Federal Bureau of Investigation's (FBI's) standard definition of rape from 1927 to 2012 was "the carnal knowledge of a female, forcibly and against her will." The FBI explained that, under its definition, rape "included only forcible male penile penetration of a female vagina." This sexist and hetero-sexist definition of rape obscured the reality that rape of men is about as prevalent as rape of women. Study of honor killings is perpetrating similar ignorance.

The German study's definition of "honour killing in the strict sense" helped to obscure a remarkable finding. With extensive research, the study found 78 honor killing in Germany from 1996 to 2005. Of the persons killed, 43% were male.[2] Male victims of honor killings are nearly invisible in public discussion of honor killings. These dead men are not victims of "honour killing in the strict sense." In the U.S., about four times more men than women suffer violent deaths. That gender disparity gets almost no attention. In contrast, elites make the ludicrous claim that "violence against women is the most pressing human rights problem remaining in the world." Men's lives count remarkably little relative to women's lives in countries strongly affirming ideals of gender equality. That's shameful.

While criminal justice systems construct men as the perpetrators of honor killings, that's not socially realistic. A recent study of cases of honor-based abuse in Britain found:

> there was overwhelming evidence of abhorrent behaviours by mothers towards children in inflicting violence, condoning violence, deceiving and denigrating daughters, ostracising them from kin, bartering to sell them, wishing them "dead," threatening to kill them or throw them downstairs. [3]

In ten cases of honor-based abuse associated with pregnancy outside of marriage, direct violence by a mother seeking to induce her daughter to have an abortion was observed in two cases.[4] Honor-based killings are associated with family concerns. Historically, men have been predominately assigned the role of killing others. Women incite men to kill others and support the killing.

Criminal justice systems predominately assign men criminal responsibility for honor killings. Just as police engage in gender profiling men for arrest for domestic violence, police stereotype men as the perpetrators of honor-based killings and abuse:

> Despite police incident reports directly implicating mothers in violence (solely or with others), uniformed officers did not place mothers as perpetrators on police computer systems (PPI) or within formalised crime reports in 12% of cases. Instead fathers were often logged as perpetrators and/or arrested, sometimes based on little to no evidence. In one case despite only the mother being implicated in the violence by throwing shoes and chairs at the victim, surprisingly only the father is named as key perpetrator in the crime report. [5]

One of the starkest gender inequalities is the vastly disproportionate imprisonment of men relative to women. That anti-men gender disparity arises from sex discrimination against men from the definition of crimes and the assignment of responsibility to anti-men gender disparities in sentencing to incarceration. Study and persecution of honor-based killings shows shameful criminal justice sexism in action.

Within the full scope of violent death, "honour killing in the strict sense" is a relatively infrequent occurrences in countries historically associated with western European culture. In Germany from 1996 to 2005, about 8 honor killings occurred per year. For comparison, about 700 homicides occur annually in Germany. The number of honor killings per year in the U.S. isn't known, but it is surely only a small fraction of total homicides.[6] Honor killings have their greatest social significance in raising publicly the meaning of honor. Study and prosecution of honor killings and honor-based abused have shameful failed to uphold a humane, civilized, and enlightened understanding of honor.[7]

Notes:

[1] Oberwittler & Kasselt (2011), Executive Summary, p. 1. The subsequent quote is from id.

[2] Id. pp. 2-3.

[3] Aplin (2017) p. 9. Humans abuse each other in a variety of ways, and mothers are no different as perpetrators:

> Daughters were attacked by mothers (and other females) in a variety of ways, by pulling their hair, in some cases cutting off their hair; being slapped; being "hit" across the face and elsewhere being punched and kicked. Mothers also used household objects to assault daughters with, such as a hoover pipe, the metal frame of a bed; mothers threw "chairs and shoes" or slapped children on the head with slippers. In one case a 14-year-old child was tied to a chair and systematically assaulted, having her hair cut off by both mother and grandmother because she went missing from home and was found in the park.

Id. p. 3, parenthetical reference citations omitted.

[4] Id. p. 4.

[5]. Id. p. 8. Not recognizing mothers as perpetrators of abuse is facilitated by "victims unwavering loyalty to mother." Id. pp. 6-8.

[6] On honor killings per year compared to homicides per year in Germany, Oberwittler & Kasselt (2011), Executive Summary, p. 2. The number of homicides in the U.S. is less than the number of suicides for both men and women.

[7] Shapiro (2010) begins her analysis of honor crimes with a sensational story of a man killing his two daughters. Such sensational beginnings are a staple of shamefully gender-bigoted domestic violence legal scholarship. Shapiro then offers a sexist definition of honor crimes:

> Honor crimes are brutal acts of violence against women, committed by male relatives who seek to avenge their family's honor when the male perceives that the female engaged in a dishonorable act.

Id. p. 294, repeated at p. 297. With no sense of irony, Shapiro declares, "courts must comprehend the full meaning and context of honor killings." With another sensational, stereotyped story, she concludes, "this flawed perception of honor has once again caused society an immense and incomprehensible loss." Id. pp. 314-5. Such shamefully bigoted scholarship helps produce an immense loss in civilized, enlightened society. Underscoring the extent of the problem, the American Bar Association's Commission on Domestic Violence awarded Shapiro's article first prize in the 2009 Annual Law Student Writing Competition on Domestic Violence and the Law. Id. p. 293, footnote.

References:

Aplin, Rachael. 2017. "Exploring the role of mothers in 'honour' based abuse perpetration and the impact on the policing response." Women's Studies International Forum. 60: 1-10.

Oberwittler, Dietrich, and Julia Kasselt. 2011. Ehrenmorde in Deutschland, 1996-2005:

eine Untersuchung auf der Basis von Prozessakten. Kōln: Luchterhand (executive summary in English).

Shapiro, Shira T. 2010. "She Can Do No Wrong: Recent Failures in America's Immigration Courts to Provide Women Asylum from 'Honor Crimes' Abroad." American University Journal of Gender, Social Policy and the Law. 18 (2): 293-316.

licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License

Men’s pervasive burden of performance

September 26, 2025 | by Douglas Galbi | Link | Original Link

The massive market for “erectile dysfunction” drugs indicates the crushing burden of performance that keeps men down. While diligently securing affirmative consent at each level and appropriate time interval of romantic engagement, men fear that if they can’t perform like a virile donkey, they will be ridiculed as a feeble ass. Of course, donkeys don’t have to worry about bizarre prosecutions for rape. But that’s not the only way that men are put in a worse position than donkeys. Even for basic bodily functions such as farting, men are pressured to perform.[1]

Consider the case of Roland the Farter. He lived in early twelfth-century England. In exchange for the right to hold roughly a hundred acres of land, Roland the Farter had to perform for the king.[2] A record of feudal landholding in Suffolk in 1250 states:

> The serjeanty, which formerly was held of Roland the Farter in Hemingston in the country of Suffolk, for which he was obliged to perform every year on the birthday of our Lord {Christmas} before his master the king, one jump, a whistle, and one fart, was alienated in accordance with these specific requirements.[3]

Imagine facing eviction if you couldn’t produce a fart at a specific time and place. That’s even more dire than disappointing a lover. The pressure of performance that Roland the Farter felt must have been enormous.

Medieval literature offered men conflicting wisdom on farting performance. In the highly learned, politically transgressive Latin work Solomon and Marcolf, Marcolf states:

> Relax the asshole to fart, and it will shake itself!
> {Laxa culum pedere, et ipse concuciet se!} [4]

A medieval French text, by contrast, warns:

> One shits when one holds too tightly.
> {Trop estraindre fet chiier.} [5]

The meaning of the second aphorism echoes the wisdom “Clutching a thing too tightly makes you drop it.”[6] What is a man to do when his land tenure depends on dropping a fart? One could easily make a stinking mess of the situation.

Men’s natural bodily functions depend on their mental and emotional states. While men have similarities with dogs, most men are more mentally and emotionally complex than dogs. Subtle and sometimes even unconscious fears and anxieties can thwart men’s physical performances. Demanding performance at a particular time and with specific requirements creates a burden of performance. Those who seek to enjoy men’s wonderful physical capabilities should offer broad latitude for performance with ongoing consent and receptivity.

Notes:

[1] Of course women as well as men fart. Doubly transgressing gynocentric norms of discourse, Marcolf observed:

> A fat and large woman is more lavish in producing farts.
> {Mulier pinguis et grossa est largior in dando iussa.}

Solomon and Marcolf 14b, from Latin trans Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 56-7. The burden of performance, however, is characteristically much greater for men than women.

[2] Roland the Farter appears in the Latin manuscripts as Rollandus, le Pettus, Rollandus le Pettour, and Rollandus le Pettur. Those variants include a mixture of Latin, French, and Anglicized word forms. The English Calendar of the Close Rolls records for 1234 Walterus Fartere (Walter the Farter). The Leicestershire Lay Subsidy Roll records for 1327 Johannes le Fartere (John the Farter). Those names similarly mix forms across languages. Allen (2007) pp. 129, 178-9.

Men have performed as farters for millennia. Early in the fifth century GC, Augustine of Hippo noted:

> Some have such command of their bowels, that they can break wind continuously at pleasure, so as to produce the effect of singing.

Augustine, City of God 14.24. An eighth-century Irish document refers to remuneration for professional farters. A Japanese scroll from the Kamakura period (1185-1333) depicts professional farters. Documents from sixteenth-century Europe also refer to men skilled in fart performance. Allen (2007) pp. 163-5. In late nineteenth-century France, Joseph Pujol (“Le Pétomane”) rose to national prominence for farting. Purjol performed farting at the newly established Moulin Rouge theatre in Paris in the early 1890s.

[3] Liber Feodorum (“Book of Fees”) 2:1174, from Latin trans. Allen (2007) p. 18 (similarly p. 171, with one minor mistake). The Latin for “one jump, a whistle, and one fart” is unum saltum et siffletum et unum bumbulum. The performance context suggests that all three acts were probably required to be performed simultaneously.

The word bumbulum for farting is unusual but probably not new. Bumbulum referred to a musical instrument in pseudo-Jerome, Epistle 23 (to the prefect Dardanus), entitled De Diversis generibus musicorum (available in Patrologia Latina 30:214A-B). That text is from the early ninth century. A medieval manuscript written before the fourteenth century has an illustration of a bumbulum. See Bavarian State Library MS shelfmark Clm 14523, image 109. Solomon and Marcolf 31b has bombi for farts. Some manuscripts of that work deploy bumbisare for fart as a verb at l. 116b. Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 58, 139, 178-9. In describing Roland the Farter's performance, Liber Feodorum also uses the more common word pettum for fart (unum saltum, siffletum, et pettum). Allen (2007) p. 171.

[4] Solomon and Marcolf 90b, from Latin trans. Ziolkowski (2008) pp. 66-7. The Latin word used for fart is pedere:

> Although recorded only once in the fart-filled S&M {Solomon and Marcolf}, it was the principal word for expressing farting in Classical Latin and endured in Romance languages

Id. p. 167. This unusual farting diction within Solomon and Marcolf suggests a linguistic allusion in l. 90b for "shake itself": crepitus ventris ("shaking of the bowels"). In medieval Latin, ventre can be translated as "stomach," "bowels," or "intestines." Id. p. 147. In classical Latin texts, crepitus ventris is attested as a phrase for farting:

> He is even said to have thought of an edict allowing the privilege of breaking wind quietly or noisily at table, having learned of a man who ran some risk by restraining himself through modesty.
>
> dicitur etiam meditatus edictum, quo veniam daret flatum crepitumque ventris in convivio emittendi, cum periclitatum quendam prae pudore ex continentia repperisset.

Suetonius, Life of Claudius 32, trans. J.C. Rolfe, via a learned and instructive presentation at Laudator Temporis Acti.

[5] Rutebeuf, Le Pet au Vilain (The Peasant's Fart) l. 50, from Old French trans. Dubin (2013) p. 465, where for chiiet I've replaced "lets loose" with "shit." That's the translation given in id. p. 964 (note).

[6] The fifteenth-century French poet François Villon recorded the proverb Tant embrasse on que chiet la prise ("Clutching a thing too tightly makes you drop it.") Villon, *Ballade de Proverb*s, 23, text and trans. from Dubin (2013) pp. 963-4 (note), citing NRCF. A related Middle French proverb is Qui plus haut monte qu'il ne doit, de plus haut chet qu'il ne voidroit ("He who rises higher than he should, will fall farther than he would like." Hassell (1982) p. 167, M176 (English translation is mine).

A medieval Latin proverb highlights the challenge of performance in farting. Qui pedit dum vult, pedit dum pedere non vult ("He who farts when he wishes, farts when he does not wish to fart.") Ziolkowski (2008) p. 165, citing to Walther 4:235, no. 24465 and noting that this proverb is "a heavily spondaic (and presumably therefore comically onomatopoeic) hexameter."

[images] (1) Skateboard stunt at Venice Beach and Boardwalk, Los Angeles, US. Cropped version of photo by Matteo Paganelli. (2) Man looking out between rocks at Matterhorn, Zermatt, Switzerland. Cropped version of photo by Joshua Earle. Both available via Creative Commons Zero license at unsplash.com

References:

Allen, Valerie. 2007. On farting: language and laughter in the Middle Ages. New York: Palgrave Macmillan. (Danuta Shanzer's review)

Dubin, Nathaniel. 2013. The fabliaux. New York: Liveright.

Hassell, James Woodrow. 1982. Middle French proverbs, sentences and proverbial phrases. Toronto: Pontifical Institute of Mediaeval Studies.

Ziolkowski, Jan M. 2008. Solomon and Marcolf. Cambridge, Mass: Harvard University.

Article licensed under a Creative Commons Attribution-ShareAlike 3.0 Unported License.

The featured image depicts Bungay Castle, Suffolk and is courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

Enable Mike Buchanan to attend the XY Crew event in Thailand, 2-12 November, 2025

September 28, 2025 | by Mike Buchanan | Link | Original Link

I've just launched a crowdfunder with a target of £3,500, which will end at midnight, Sunday 5 October. The description in the crowdfunder takes up the remainder of this blog piece:

Hello. Paul Elam has organised the third XY Crew Jamboree which will take place in Pattaya City, Thailand, over 2-12 November, 2025:

XY Crew Jamboree 25

Paul will be there along with many other Men's Rights Activists (MRAs) from around the world, it will be a rare opportunity to meet up face-to-face with them all. I previously attended the first XY Crew Jamboree held near Paul's home in Roanoke, Virginia, in 2022, and it was both very useful and a great morale booster for us all.

You may (or may not) be aware that I haven't drawn personal income from donations to J4MB since we launched as a political party in 2013, up to the present day. I have eschewed paid employment since 2013 in order to devote myself full-time to the work of J4MB. My commitment to our cause has always been, remains, and always will be, unwavering. The hours are long, but knowing we've been instrumental in raising public awareness about men's and boys' issues and feminism since 2013 has been reward enough.

I'm not in a financial position to afford the trip to Thailand without support, hence this crowdfunder. Please donate what you can. Thank you for your support.

The featured image depicts Pattaya Beach, is under CC-BY-SA 3.0, and was taken by Sergey S. Dukachev.

The Goal Post Episode 64 – RIP Charlie Kirk / March for Australia / Alfred the Great / UBI

September 29, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Crash And Burn – The Emma Watson Story

October 3, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 65 – Zheng He / XY Crew Meetup / Insidious Misandry

October 7, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Systemic Chivalry is Benevolent Sexism? ~ ItsComplicated

October 14, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

What’s in a suffix? taking a closer look at the meaning of gyno–centrism

October 18, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

There’s some confusion around the word gynocentrism and it’s meaning, so this piece will explore a little discussed part of the term: -centrism. This suffix makes a restrictive demand, i.e., that women are most important interest we might hold.

The Cambridge dictionary describes centrism the following way:

> CENTRISM: The fact of having a particular type of person, place, or thing as your most important interest; the quality of being seen from the point of view of a particular type of person, place, or thing:
>
> - The Academy has been accused of Eurocentrism and gender bias.
> - The artist’s newest ventures embody his commitment to ecocentrism

Gynocentrism implies that our focus on the needs and wants of woman is the most important consideration; whether such focus be contained to a brief moment in time, or as applied to the entire duration of human relationships.

For example, when we celebrate Mother’s Day we can legitimately name this brief, isolated act as gyno-centric. Or for a more dramatic illustration of a brief gynocentric event, consider the scenario of a man taking on a knife-wielding maniac who is threatening to hurt his pregnant wife, while the wife retreats and does not help the husband during the fight; in this case the actions of both husband (protecting his wife) and wife (protecting herself) are rightly defined as gyno-centric.[1]

Alternatively if we consider the overall relationship between the same husband and wife we might ask a new question – is the entire relationship a gyno-centric one? If that husband and wife take turns supporting each other across the duration of their relationship, then the relationship might be rightly referred to as “couple centered” — because by definition a gyno-centric relationship centers exclusively around the woman and her needs and wants. As soon as you have genuine reciprocity in a relationship, one that involves a couple-centric or family-centric dynamic, based on commensurate importance, the relationship can no longer be considered gynocentric.

Employing the word gynocentrism to discuss reciprocal exchanges between men and women, where women are occasional beneficiaries in certain ways, and men are beneficiaries in certain ways, is an erroneous use of the term because such exchanges, strictly speaking, do not constitute a gender centrism across the duration of the relationship – ie. its not a gyno-centric relationship.

While there can be gynocentric elements in relationships, they are historically balanced out by other elements like family-centrism, andro-centrism, child-centrism, pairbondingcentrism, or tribe-centrism. The theory that human relationships are evolutionarily gyno-centric is an exaggeration and a piece of sappy modern propaganda that even some men's advocates fall prey to.

NOTE:

[1] After writing this essay in 2019, I've since become aware of Hanna Wallen's thesis of the 'Natural Gynocentrism Fallacy' which posits that even isolated, brief acts that I have described above as "gynocentric" are more accurately described as gene-centric, or family-centric behaviours. I agree with Hanna's proposition.

Women, like ALL family members throughout evolutionary history, needed protection in order to be part of a strong, viable family team. But that isn't called gynocentrism; it's called storge (the Greek word for 'family love'). All family members were protected – as indicated in my recent poll below.

Men, too, were protected if they were injured, old, sick etc. Protection & provision was always based on the shifting needs of various family members.... whoever had the most immediate need, was catered to and cared for.

Australian Senator Malcolm Roberts reveals feminist bias at the Australian Institute of Family Studies

October 27, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Something a little different today. Here is a recording from Australian Senate Estimates. Senate Estimates allow Australian senators to scrutinise government spending and operations.

Here Senator Malcolm Roberts questions the gynocentrism deeply embedded in the Australian government. Senator Roberts isn't the first to do this. Australia has had several senators that have used Senate Estimates to call out feminist dominance in the public sector.

In this case public servants actually mentioned bidirectional (aka reciprocal) partner violence briefly. After decades of denial that's a significant step forward, even if they downplay it. Ignoring reciprocal partner violence hurts both men and women. Even if they were only concerned about women they should still take it seriously. The fact that they don't speaks volumes.

The Goal Post Episode 67 – Cassiodorus / Importance of Backups / ADF Class Action / No Kings

November 2, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Has Chivalry Fled? (Article, May 1912)

November 6, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following article provides an example of a 'threat narrative' – i.e., in this case the threat that chivalry is departed or dying, thus putting women in danger in a myriad ways.

The 'Chivalry Is Dead' trope has been wheeled out by every newspaper and media outlet for the last two centuries, on a weekly basis. If romantic chivalry is taking hundreds of years to die then it must be the slowest death on earth!

However the intent of such articles appears not to report accurately on chivalry's demise (which doesn't appear to be happening to any significant degree), but to reinforce protection of chivalry as an article of dogmatic faith; i.e., the more one feels chivalry is under threat, the more one protects and upholds the institution.

To be sure there have occurred alterations in the way gynocentric chivalry is acted out on the contemporary scene, but the basic convention is still very much alive.

The following article appeared in the Evening Post LXXIII, Issue 112, 11 May, 1912:

The Human Reproductive Skew Is Not Evidence of Female Hypergamy

November 12, 2025 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The human reproductive skew is not evidence of female hypergamy. Nevertheless, it's the favorite myth of red-pill influencers, feMRAs, and pop-evopsych evangelists who distort a genetic statistic to gaslight you into accepting and catering to gynocentrism.

The Claim You Keep Hearing

"Twice as many women as men reproduced in our evolutionary past. That proves women are hypergamous—choosy gold-diggers who only sleep with the top 20% of men."

Wrong.

The reproductive skew—the fact that ~80% of ancestral females left descendants while only ~40% of males did—is real.
But it is not evidence of female mate choice.
It is not evidence of hypergamy.
It is not even evidence that women had any say in the matter.

What the Skew Actually Is

Genetic Fact	What It Means
Female effective population size = 2× male	Twice as many women as men contributed genes to the next generation.
~80% females reproduced	Almost every woman who reached adulthood had kids.
~40% males reproduced	Most men died genetic dead-ends.

That's it.
That's all the DNA tells us. It says nothing about why.

Two Ways to Get the Same Skew:

Scenario A – Female Choice (the Red-Pill fantasy)

- Women freely pick the richest, tallest, most dominant men.
- Top 20% of males get 80% of the sex.
- Bottom 80% of males get zero.
- Result: 2:1 female-to-male reproductive ratio.

Scenario B – Male Monopolization (historical reality)

- Warlords, kings, and chiefs use power, violence, wealth, and law to hoard women.

- Young girls are sold, captured, or assigned as brides.
- Low-status men are banished, killed, or priced out.
- Result: 2:1 female-to-male reproductive ratio.

Same genetic footprint. Totally different cause.

Historical Proof That Monopolization, Not Choice, Drove the Skew

1. Genghis Khan
    - 1 man: ~16 million male descendants today.
    - Not 16 million women choosing him.
    - Conquest, tribute, rape, and forced concubinage.
2. Ottoman Harems
    - One sultan, 1,000+ women.
    - Zero female opt-in.
3. West African Chiefs
    - Polygyny via bridewealth.
    - Poor men couldn't afford one wife.
    - Women traded like livestock.
4. Modern Cults
    - FLDS leaders exile teenage boys and assign wives.
    - No female choice. Massive skew.

These are not edge cases.
They are the rule in 85% of documented societies (Murdock's Ethnographic Atlas).

Why "Female Choice" Is The Weaker Explanation

Argument	Reality Check
"Women evolved to pick high-status men."	Sure—if they had the power. Most didn't.
"Modern surveys show women want rich guys."	Modern women have options. Ancestral women often had none.
"Dating apps prove the 80/20 rule."	Apps are opt-in, anonymous, urban, post-feminism. Not Paleolithic.

The Genetic Data Is Agnostic

Effective population size (Ne): Female Ne = 2× male Ne.
Translation: Twice as many unique mothers as fathers.

Possible causes:

- Women selecting alphas (low likelihood)
- Alphas taking women by force
- Arranged marriages
- War killing substantial numbers of men
- A mixture of the above

The relative influence of each of these factors varies across cultures, time periods, and ecological conditions.

David Buss Doesn't Claim 'The Skew' is Evidence of Hypergamy

Buss's work is about modern mate preferences, not ancestral monopolization.
He never says the skew "proves" hypergamy — that's a post-hoc fan fiction by gynocentric ideologues.

The Bottom Line

Reproductive skew is evidence of asymmetric mating outcomes, not asymmetric agency. It shows some men monopolized sex—but reveals nothing indicating that women chose them freely. For this reason, we can stop letting evosimps weaponize a Y-chromosome statistic to guilt men into pandering to modern female narcissism under the false banner of "natural" hypergamy.

Further Reading

- Zerjal et al. (2003) – The Genetic Legacy of the Mongols
- Moore et al. (2006) – Niall of the Nine Hostages
- Saint-Paul (2008) – Genes, Legitimacy and Hypergamy
- Boberg-Fazli? & Sharp (2024) – Historical Hypergamy? No.

Share this every time someone drops the "2:1 women-to-men reproduced" line…. the skew is not the gotcha they think it is.

How Thomas Oaster started International Men's Day – and how feminists tried to stop him

November 19, 2025 | by AVFM | Link | Original Link

This article is about how one gutsy MRA started International Men's Day despite attempts to shut him down. His name was Thomas Oaster.

Thomas Oaster was an articulate and passionate men's rights advocate. He was prolific in his work with men's groups, men's issues, and political advocacy both on and off campus where he taught. He had many fine MRAs around him, men and women who helped to improve the lot of males, but what of the man himself? Who was he really, and what is the unknown story of how he inaugurated the first International Men's Day? The following will be about Thomas Oaster and how he put IMD on the map for all who choose to celebrate the event into the distant future.

In the early 1990's Oaster's growing interest in advocating for men (and gynocentric resistance to that advocacy) led him to the idea of creating a globally celebrated International Men's Day. His goal was to create a platform where the stories of men could be told in their own words rather than being interpreted by others.

In a moment of nostalgia about this dream he mused:

> "You don't get points in men's groups for flexing your ego, but I'd like it to be known that Kansas City has become the hometown of International Men's Day because a hometown boy got that thing rolling."[1]

As you will read in what follows Thomas Oaster, and Kansas City, can indeed now take credit for being the epicenter of a global movement.

The first IMD event took place in 1992 when small groups of MRAs scattered through 4 continents simultaneously celebrated with Oaster in the first celebration. Today, thanks to his vision, there are millions of people in more than 60 countries celebrating IMD. This achievement is remarkable when we consider it took place 30 years ago at a time when advocacy for men and boys was considered unthinkable.

Thomas Oaster was the Director of the Missouri Center for Men's Studies and employed as Associate Professor at the University of Missouri, Kansas City where he taught classes on men's issues. That's right, classes on real men's issues. He told of how he first became attracted to the men's movement by an intellectual interest, but quickly came to feel persecuted for his association with this politically incorrect subject. "I got beat up, slammed" reports Oaster, "People said, 'What – do you hate women?' The more I got beat up, the more I got drawn in. My Teutonic background took over." [1].

During February 1991, Oaster wondered if a global recognition of men and their issues might be framed as a men's strike day, a kind of protest against misandry, which could be observed under the moniker 'Men's Day Off.' He later softened his approach, re-framing the proposed event as an educational exchange on men's issues, thus was born the idea of International Men's Day.

The first IMD event was organized and launched by Oaster on February 7, 1992 for the purpose of what he said was "drawing positive attention to important [men's] issues." [2] The event was successful both in 1992 and again in 1993 and 1994.[3] People in four continents celebrated and guests at the various events came along to hear speakers talk on topics ranging from the "silent tragedy of men's health" to "man bashing" and to share, talk, wine and dine.

It was a miraculous occasion. For the first time in history people gathered at the same time on four continents to actually speak of such things. On that day, February 7, men and women rejoiced in the company of like-minded souls as they shared intimate stories that ears had never before heard. Oaster spoke at his hometown Kansas event, reminding attendees that discussion of men's health and wellbeing deserved to be heard though the cacophony of misandry;

> "We want the bashing to stop. It's not a request. It's a statement. We want it to stop! To give you an example, a woman walked through here and saw the material and said, 'You've got to be kidding. You're not seriously going to have a men's day, are you?'"[4]

Oaster hoped that the day could become a means of education and consciousness raising where the positive cultural accomplishments of men could be celebrated and men might be faced with a better variety of choices about how they wanted to live their lives;

"Women and men should both have options" wrote Oaster, and "International Men's Day is an opportunity to draw attention to the issue of options."[5]

Oaster proposed six core objectives for a men's day, and they were to: celebrate men's positive traits and contributions, improve gender relations, focus attention on men's health and wellbeing, remove misandry, increase life options for men and boys, and to develop a humanitarian-style approach to all men's issues. These six objectives were the foundations that would later be reaffirmed and ratified by a new generation of IMD celebrants, but not before a group of 'anti-Oaster' University women had played their final hand.

After the popular success of the first International Men's Day event in 1992, feminists at his campus became increasingly vindictive. During his planning for the 1994 and 1995 IMD events, a bomb was suddenly dropped by at least 6 former and current female 'graduate students' who collectively complained that Oaster had sexually harassed them and was "hostile" in the classroom. The two most serious allegations put forward by the troupe were that Thomas Oaster had touched the forearm of one student with what she perceived was a "brief stroking motion", and that he had advised another student to dye her hair blonde in response to her question about what she could do improve her poor grade. To drive the nail deeper another student said he had referred to her as "Blondie" at least twice. The curators at the university entertained these shallow and dubious allegations and were quick to respond by imposing restrictions on Oaster's movements and work. [6]

Despite these distractions the next two IMD events went extremely well with several hundred individuals in attendance. However the fourth year of IMD heralded a change in the weather when his antagonists decided to double-down in their efforts to shut him down.

In 1995 Oaster had planned to orchestrate his fourth and biggest IMD event when he increasingly became the target of workplace bullying. He decided to sue the Curators of the University for Infringement of his civil rights as a tenured professor, claiming that he was being denied freedom of speech, salary increases, graduate teaching assistants and the use of university facilities.[6] Naturally the court proceedings took up much of his time and energy and this taxed his ability to effectively organize or advertise the upcoming IMD event.

Due to these circumstances the next IMD event was a flop with few people turning up. After this failure, and feeling drained by a complex court case, Oaster decided to defer future IMD plans and take a well-deserved rest.

With precision, Thomas Oaster had been persecuted for his role in the men's rights movement. [6] Late in 1995 Oaster won his court case against the UMKC and the University was forced to pay him $74,000 plus $15,000 for legal fees. After settlement Oaster resigned from his job as he felt he would no longer have the respect of his students, and he shelved plans to continue celebrating IMD. [6]

General interest in the event waned until 1999 when Dr. Jerome Teelucksingh, a History Professor at the University of the West Indies revived the event and shifted the date to November 19 – the date of his father's birthday.

Jerome Teelucksingh continued Oaster's emphasis on highlighting positive aspects and accomplishments of men. In a 2009 interview Teelucksingh also gave a nod to the work of Oaster when he stated this;

> "I could be considered the founder of this version of IMD on 19 November but we need to also acknowledge the pioneering efforts of persons and groups before 1999… They are the ones to be honoured." [3]

In 2009 an international IMD committee was formed with Jerome Teelucksingh as chairman. The group came together to increase awareness about the event and to foster its growth into more nations.

Taking note of the foundational IMD objectives introduced by both Oaster and Teelucksingh, the committee encapsulated the objectives of International Men's Day in six guiding principles that would serve to protect the core values of the day and offer a reliable reference point for future IMD celebrants.[3] The 'Six Pillars,' which are suitably loose and open to interpretation, are now used as a guide by IMD celebrants around the world:

- To promote positive male role models; not just movie stars and sports men but everyday, working class men who are living decent, honest lives.

- To celebrate men's positive contributions to society, community, family, marriage, child care, and to the environment.
- To focus on men's health and wellbeing; social, emotional, physical and spiritual.
- To highlight discrimination against males; in areas of social services, social attitudes and expectations, and law.
- To improve gender relations and promote gender equality.
- To create a safer, better world; where people can live free from harm and grow to reach their full potential

It's my belief that the spirit of Oaster's original vision and that of A Voice for Men have much in common. Both movements aim to create an inclusive international voice for men as free as possible from sectarian distractions. Moreover, both IMD and AVfM reject the notion of a unified men's movement, encouraging instead a diversity of men's voices on a variety of humanitarian issues:

Thomas Oaster said this:

> [T]here is no such thing as a unified men's movement, the phenomena involved comprise a variety of sub-movements, even after analogies to other issues concerning which there are far left, far right, and middle-of-the-road orientations, there is yet another more fundamental point which can be made about the value of respect for all men as human beings. A day of respect should go beyond the current social activities referred to as Men's movements. This is true because the men's movement itself goes beyond the Men's movements. The men's movement, more fundamentally, is a turning of the human psyche and the articulation of this turning through the male voice.[5]

Paul Elam, founder of avoiceformen.com said:

> [C]ontinuing to buy into the false unity of a non-existent entity will only slow us down. I have always taken care, and still do, to point out that AVfM is not synonymous with the men's movement. And after mulling this over one more time of thousands, I am really glad that I have taken this approach. I don't know what the men's movement is, in all honesty. I don't even know that it exists.[7]

While the similarities in the two movements are obvious, there are some important differences. For instance in Thomas Oaster's day there was no internet, whereas today it is a vital medium for all activism, including here at AVfM. Another difference is that IMD focuses the year-long work of activists into one big day of publicity, whereas other activists strive to make ‘every day’ a men’s day via regular online publicity.

. . .

International Men’s Day is a grassroots movement with no official management. It does not belong to any government nor is it owned by the United Nations or any of its agencies. We might say that nobody owns the event, or better yet everybody owns it. Any person can self-nominate as an IMD coordinator for a specific region or event and, if desired can form alliances with an international network of individuals working to promote the day. Any current and future coordinators are merely hitch-hikers catching a ride on an international platform that nobody owns.

Nobody needs to gain permission to mark the day. All one need do is be mindful of the spirit of the occasion as laid out in the six pillars which ask us to remain true to the lives of men and boys without allowing that message to be diminished by negative or irrelevant concerns.

In recent years IMD has spread into new regions and attracted some mainstream attention. With this new attention it is perhaps time to remind newcomers that the originators of the event were fighting for liberty and freedom, and that we still have a very long way to go on this front.

With this in mind let us finish with words of Abraham Lincoln’s Gettysburg address, itself delivered on November 19- the date of International Men’s Day. The words of his address speak equally to the purpose of International Men’s Day today and of the great sacrifices made by Oaster and other men and women who fought on the battlefield of cultural misandry;

> ‘Four score and seven years ago our fathers brought forth on this continent, a new nation, conceived in Liberty, and dedicated to the proposition that all men are created equal. Now we are engaged in a great civil war, testing whether that nation, or any nation so conceived and so dedicated, can long endure… The brave men, living and dead, who struggled here, have consecrated [the ground], far above our poor power to add or detract. The world will little note, nor long remember what we say here, but it can never forget what they did here. It is for us the living, rather, to be dedicated here to the unfinished work which they who fought here have thus far so nobly advanced.’ [Lincoln]

Despite the resistance, the tradition of IMD lives on. In Oaster’s name let’s dream it forward.

Sources:

[1] George Gurley, ‘Finally, men get their day’ (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)

[2] Fred Wickman, ‘about Town’ (Kansas City Star: Jan 27, 1992)

[3] Jason Thompson, ‘International Men’s Day; the making of a movement’ (Soul Books, 2010)

[4] James Fussell, ‘Men have their say at weekend forum’ (Kansas City Star: Feb 6, 1993)

[5] Thomas Oaster, ‘International Men’s Day: RSVP’ (Cummings and Hathaway, 1992)

[6] Cheryl Thompson, ‘Complaints surface about UMKC professor’ (Kansas City Star: Mar 10, 2003)

[7] Paul Elam, ‘Adios, c-ya, good-bye man-o-sphere’ (A Voice for Men. retrieved October 2012)

The Estrogen Inner Circle

November 27, 2025 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Way back in the early 80s, I was starting a new job which came with decent pay and benefits, as well as the usual amount of anxiety that comes with being the new kid on the block. Nevertheless, before long, I became friends with a long-time employee at my new workplace. One day at lunch, he cautioned me to watch out for the boss. Why? According to my friend, "He surrounds himself with females."

I had noticed that the boss looked the part of an executive. He was always impeccably groomed, a GQ kind of guy. I kept my friend's admonishment in mind as time passed and concluded that his observation was correct. The office staff was composed of both men and women but the boss's inner circle included only women. No question about it. The relevant question is why? What does it mean?

Now if you've ever worked in an office, you know that there is an official flow chart of personnel and an unofficial power structure. A lowly clerk or secretary might have the boss's ear whereas a VP might not. Some guys supposedly high up in the food chain might have been given an impressive-sounding job title and a corner office but don't have any pull with the boss. More than likely, they are there for their technical expertise or because they are difficult to replace, or simply because they are really, really good at what they do. That does not necessarily qualify them to enter the charmed circle of power, however.

In the ensuing years I've pondered why a guy whose inner circle is female is suspect. It seems like a situation just begging for a Psychology Today article, but I don't recall ever seeing a study addressing the topic. There are plenty of articles about male versus female bosses and how the sexes feel about same but nothing about a male boss with an opposite sex entourage. On the other hand, it is not unheard of for a female in power to have an inner circle of male advisers (e.g., Queen Elizabeth I, or Margaret Thatcher) – at least in the days before diversity became mandatory.

Then after Election Day 2025 I saw a video of New York mayor-elect Zohran Mamdani introducing his transition team of five females. Again the question started percolating in my head: What does it mean? A man surrounding himself with a harem of cuties a la Hugh Hefner is understandable. That was definitely not the case with Mamdani's "brain trust."

I don't want to go into Mamdani's political philosophy or the future of New York City. I don't live there and I'm not planning on visiting, so it's none of my concern. Also, pundits have pretty well exhausted the topic. At the risk of being called misogynists, some of them commented on the lack of diversity of his transition team, but no one offered any idea as to what it meant. Ten years ago Justin Trudeau was happy with a 50% female team "Because it's 2015!" Mandami didn't say, "Because it's 2025!" but he might as well have worn one of those "The Future is Female" T-shirts. There's a new sheriff – I mean, mayor – in town, New York, and he's got a pussy posse!

At first blush, it could be that Mamdani is merely repaying the debt he owes to female voters, but I think there's more to it than that. By definition, any leader needs followers. But what sort of followers does he have? Clearly, a leader wants to be respected. He wants to give an order and know that it will be carried out. The military has operated that way for thousands of years. So did monarchy until recent years. Unfortunately, there have been instances when the system breaks down and generals or kings are overthrown. Almost always those who do the overthrowing are other men. Often younger men. Yes, uneasy lies the head that wears the crown.

Immediately after the election Mamdani was immediately transformed from a young Turk to an establishment figure. He will be in charge of the nation's biggest city, a world capital. That means he is no longer an outsider seeking to wrest power from the old Turks. The scepter has been passed to him so he will be the target of the next young Turk, someone on the outside looking in and just wanting for the main chance, which could come as soon as the next Democratic primary.

It has long been a sociological axiom that young single men are potentially dangerous. Some are problematic loners, others get organized. Some are just common criminals, others become terrorists. They are a potential threat to the vested interests, the elites, the establishment, the status quo, or whatever you want to call it. Consequently, the man in charge has to be careful of the people he takes into his confidence. They might turn on him. Even a longtime loyal lieutenant might go rogue.

Of course, a loyal subaltern might be less than enthusiastic about the boss's policy and let him know why. A wise boss might ponder criticism and might course correct. A vain man, however, doesn't want any pushback or amendments to his agenda. Hence the corporate stereotype of the yes man, who has largely been replaced by the yes woman. The difference is that the yes man has always been the object of scorn or ridicule. Not so the yes woman. She is not subject to criticism because no one expects her to stand up for herself. That would be manly (i.e. toxic) behavior. The wife as helpmate might be a vanishing breed, but the subaltern as workplace helpmate is bigger than ever.

I'm sure there are any number of young men who would like to be part of Mamdani's mayoral administration. But there is always the risk that one of those young men might turn on hizonner. Worse yet, said young man might enlist other young men in the cause. In the corporate setting, anyone in a position of authority knows the risk of hiring an applicant who has the potential to one day displace/replace him. It's much safer to create a buffer zone of female devotees, modern-day vestal virgins who are grateful to the boss for empowering them with bureaucratic sinecures to fight the patriarchy or racism or injustice or whatever.

While the chances of a female underling overthrowing the alpha male is slim, there is always the possibility of some mild form of dissidence. If so, news of same will likely find its way back to the boss very quickly, thanks to a loyal female ratting out potential malcontents. This is hardly surprising. If you think back to grade school, who was more likely to say, “I’m telling teacher” after witnessing a misdeed? Boys and men are more likely to keep quiet. Females constitute an informal spy network and report back to the boss if something is amiss in the hive.

Despite all the nostrums about equality in the work force and glass ceilings, the alpha male remains a real phenomenon. And for every alpha male there is at least one and maybe more alpha males in training. Sometimes there is a bloodless coup. The alpha male retires or dies, clearing the way for a younger replacement. Other times the geezer doesn’t know when to leave the stage and has to be forcibly removed.

In all situations, the man at the top is safer if he surrounds himself with women. His position as alpha male is more secure because no potential alpha males are part of his inner circle to subvert him. Female employees might rise through the ranks but even the most talented cannot be an alpha male.

A man who surrounds himself with women was likely closer to his mother than his father. He might have been a mama’s boy, but I wouldn’t call him a sissy. In reading biographies of famous men, one often finds out that such men were the apple of their mothers’ eyes. They were golden boys! They could do no wrong! Of course, unconditional love is associated with motherhood; a father’s approval is harder to secure but necessary. Unconditional female approval should taper off as a boy grows up lest he turn into a smug, self-satisfied – but charming – prick.

Women have always relied more on charm than men to get ahead. I suspect that a young boy with a particularly charming mother picks up on her vibe and learns that charm can often get you where you want to go in life. With charm, you can manipulate people. You don’t have to boss them around. You control them without having to raise your voice. Such a man might deduce that it makes more sense than the male model of overt dominance.

Needless to say, charisma also helps. Charisma is not the same as charm. You can go to charm school to learn some techniques. As for charisma, you either have it or you don’t. It is like charm on an industrial scale. A man running for office can charm the office help and the volunteers and his aides, but he can’t charm each and every potential voter. He will never see them. In the early days of democracy, few people ever saw the candidates they voted for. Unless you were present for a stump speech, you had no idea if a candidate was charismatic or not. In fact, you wouldn’t even know what he looked like until daguerreotypes were invented.

Then along came newspapers. Voters could actually see what the candidates looked like but they couldn’t pick up much of a vibe from that. Next came newsreels and eventually television. You got to hear the voice and sense the personality or lack of same. Famously, in the 1960 Presidential election, a survey of voters split between radio listeners and television viewers after a Presidential debate. The radio faction thought that Nixon won the debate. The television viewers thought Kennedy won. In truth, Kennedy had charisma, as the posthumous tales of his numerous sexual escapades indicate.

If you think back to grammar school, you probably remember a young boy who became teacher's pet. Somehow he inspired grown women to fawn over him. My theory is that this personal magnetism developed very young in the family circle, perhaps as a result of the young boy's relationship with the females in his family, particularly if he has older sisters or multiple aunts. To survive in the family he must get along with females, but he is badly outnumbered and they are all bigger than he is. He can't order them around but he can manipulate them through charm.

Smiling is a big part of charm. Behavioral psychologists have long known that females smile more than men. It's a universal signal that one means no harm – it is safe to approach me. It's a means of ingratiating oneself. It works for females and it works for men who choose to adopt this female strategy. A smiling politician with a female inner circle is likely broadcasting that he is not a dangerous male. This might be appealing to female voters and soyboys but not to rank and file men. Unfortunately, the female/soyboy vote is usually enough to get elected.

The uptake is that one should be wary of a man who has no other men in his inner circle, not because he is a gender traitor but because he is probably not worth following. The ability to herd females does not mean he can be a leader of men. Charm may be essential for a con man or a game show host, but it isn't much help in persuading other men to hold the pass at Thermopylae or defend the Alamo.

It's certainly true that you can fool some of the people all of the time, and all of the people some of the time if you're a charming SOB. Though the charming man may be electable, however, he'd better get results once he's in office. Incompetence will out and charm has a limited shelf life.

Modern dating, feminism, and women's "delusional" expectations w/@ItsComplicatedChannel

November 30, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 68 – New Stargate / BBC Fails / ADF Class Action Cont’d / Venerable Bede

December 2, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The tale of Delphine LaLaurie

December 8, 2025 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

Western civilisation has regarded women as morally superior to men since at least the Middle Ages. Even a cursory review of history shows that this isn't so with women throughout the ages demonstrating their willingness and capacity to harm others. We know from recent research that queens regnant were more likely to start wars and more likely to continue the wars of their predecessors than were kings. And we have a prime example in Mary I of England. She was called Bloody Mary because of her penchant for burning her subjects alive when they disagreed with her religious stance.

Delphine LaLaurie wasn't a queen though, she was just a slave-owning socialite. Born in to privilege in New Orleans in 1787 she was to live most of her life in the city.

LaLaurie outlived two husbands before marrying again. In 1831 she purchased a block of land at 1140 Royal Street, New Orleans. The following year she had a two-story mansion built. Contemporary reports suggest that her husband had little to do with the running of the property as he was a practising physician.

Still in 1832 LaLaurie petitioned the court for legal separation from her husband. She continued to live at the Royal Street house with some of her children. Around this time rumours of her mistreatment of slaves started to circulate in polite New Orleans society. Between 1831 & 1834 twelves slaves were recorded as having died at the Royal Street address.

Harriet Martineau, a sociologist, visited New Orleans in 1836 and heard the rumours about LaLaurie, later publishing them in England. Martineau noted that local authorities had taken notice of the reports and investigated but had found no evidence of mistreatment at the time.

In her writing Martineau recounted various stories of cruelty by LaLaurie including one in which a young slave girl accidentally fell to her death from the roof of the mansion while being chased by a whip-wielding LaLaurie. This was reportedly witnessed by a neighbour. The death apparently led to an investigation in which LaLaurie was found to have been unlawfully cruel to her slaves.

In 1834 a fire broke out at 1140 Royal Street. Locals rushed in to the building to rescue anyone they could. Reports from the time indicate that LaLaurie refused to hand over the key to the slave quarters to rescuers so they had to break in. A local newspaper, the New Orleans Bee reported that they found:

> "seven slaves, more or less horribly mutilated … suspended by the neck, with their limbs apparently stretched and torn from one extremity to the other"

Rescuers also found that LaLaurie kept her cook, a slave, chained to the stove. The cook subsequently admitted to starting the fire as a suicide attempt.

As news spread after the fire, the citizens of New Orleans became so incensed at the treatment of slaves meted out by LaLaurie that a mob formed and attacked her house. LaLaurie fled, first going to Mobile, Alabama and then on to France where she apparently lived for the rest of her life. LaLaurie was never brought to justice for her crimes. The date of her death is unknown but may have been as early as 1842.

Over the decades stories about the cruelty of LaLaurie have grown and this may have even been true in her own time. While some of the stories are of questionable veracity, it is clear that LaLaurie was unusually cruel to her slaves and that she exceeded the norms of her time.

There are many elements in this story that contradict the feminist historical narrative.

LaLaurie legally separated from her husband. She was able to petition the courts and they accepted her arguments and granted the legal separation. Feminists will tell you that at this time women were the property of their husbands. LaLaurie wasn't property but the slaves she owned were. LaLaurie made her own decisions. Alas she was never held accountable for them.

Harriet Martineau was a social theorist and sociologist. She seems to have been largely responsible for disseminating information about LaLaurie outside of New Orleans. That Martineau was writing books on sociology, being published and earning enough to live from her work flies in the face of the feminist historical narrative. When faced with examples such as Martineau feminists sometimes weakly argue that some women were exceptions to the rule of systemic female oppression. A simpler explanation is that the oppression feminists talk about didn't exist. History is replete with examples such as Martineau.

That LaLaurie was also in charge of these slaves and able to inflict cruelty on them goes against the feminist historical narrative which paints women as helpless pawns under the control of men, completely lacking agency.

History is also replete with examples such as LaLaurie. Cruel women that deliberately harmed those in their charge, whether they were children, servants or slaves.

Even LaLaurie's separation speaks to a level agency for women often denied by feminists.

And the fact that the residents of New Orleans sought to hold LaLaurie accountable for her actions also speaks to views on women at the time.

Both Martineau & LaLaurie were mistresses of their own destiny, not mere pawns of The Patriarchy as feminists would have us believe.

Much of modern feminism rests on the feminist historical narrative. Feminism is built on a stack of lies. Lies about how men lived and acted in the past. Lies about how women lived and acted in the past. Feminism has to claim that women were oppressed historically. If it didn't make this claim then there would have been nothing for feminism to rescue women from. By revealing the historical truth we attack feminism at its base.

The house can still be seen 1140 Royal Street, New Orleans however it was extensively renovated after 1838 and is described as unrecognisable in comparison to how it looked when LaLaurie lived there.

Further Reading

ThoughtCo

Murderpedia

The Goal Post Episode 69 – Men Skipping College / Ludwig Von Mises / AI Discussion Continued

December 16, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 70 – TV Show Chat / Proxy Violence / Johannes Gutenberg / Abortion Rant

December 30, 2025 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Narcissism Exaggerates Baseline Hypergamy

January 7, 2026 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many social media commentators discuss the rise of hypergamous behaviors among modern women. Some pose reasonable evolutionary hypotheses for such behavior, but there may be another cause at work – cultural narcissism.

Observations of extreme hypergamy among women may be equally explained by the rise of cultural narcissism in affluent societies (Twenge & Campbell, 2009), a motive that differs from baseline hypergamy, but which nevertheless involves comparable behaviors of self-enhancement and status-seeking.

Society's encouragement of men in chivalric deference to women, and the associated practice of 'placing women on a pedestal', has generated a degree of gendered narcissism among women over time. To frame this differently, Acquired Situational Narcissism can arise with any acquired social status; for example in academic experts, politicians, pop singers, actors – and also in women who, in modern society, are taught that they deserve to be recognised for thier worth, dignity, value, purity, status, reputation and esteem in the context of their relationships with men. This psychological disposition in women, partly a result of traditional chivalry, promotes exaggerated self-enhancement behaviours beyond what evolutionary models of hypergamy would require.

Among narcissistic individuals, studies find higher incidence of hypergamy-like behaviors, indicating that such behavior is not the result of a culture of sexual liberation alone, nor of baseline evolutionary imperatives; it may also be the result of an acquired social class narcissism that says "I deserve."

Excerpts from narcissism studies:

> A third strand of evidence concerns narcissists' relationship choices. Because humans are a social species, relationship choices are an important feature of situation selection. Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation. For example, narcissists are keener on gaining new partners than on establishing close relationships with existing ones (Wurst et al., 2017). They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends (Jonason & Schmitt, 2012) and trophy partners (Campbell, 1999), perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people. In sum, narcissists are more likely to select social environments that allow them to display their performances publicly, ideally in competition with others. These settings are potentially more accepting and reinforcing of narcissistic status strivings.
>
> Source: The "Why" and "How" of Narcissism: A Process Model of Narcissistic Status Pursuit[1]

> Consistent with the self-orientation model, Study 5 provided an empirical demonstration of the mediational role of self enhancement in narcissists' > preference for perfect rather than caring romantic partners. Furthermore, these potential romantic partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance (i.e., social status). Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation. Narcissists also were attracted to self-oriented romantic partners to the extent that these others were viewed as similar. The mediational roles of self-enhancement and similarity were independent. That is, narcissists' romantic preferences were driven both by a desire to gain self-esteem and a desire to associate with similar others.

>
> Source: Narcissism and romantic attraction[2]

> Narcissism has been linked with the materialistic pursuit of wealth and symbols that convey high status (Kasser, 2002; Rose, 2007). This quest for status extends to relationship partners. Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty) (Campbell, 1999; Tanchotsrinon, Maneesri, & Campbell, 2007)
>
> Source: The Handbook of Narcissism And Narcissistic Personality Disorders[3]

> Narcissists are looking for partners who can provide them with self-esteem and status. How can a romantic partner provide status and esteem? First, he or she can do so directly: a romantic partner who admires me and thinks that I am wonderful elevates my esteem. Second, he or she can do so indirectly through a basic association: my partner is beautiful and popular, therefore I am too. This indirect esteem generation is clear from a range of social psychological research, from the self-evaluation maintenance (SEM) model (Tesser, 1988) to Basking in Reflected Glory (BIRGing; Cialdini et al., 1976). This indirect esteem provisioning is evident in the term "trophy" partner.
>
> There is good empirical evidence that narcissists like targets who provide esteem and status both directly and indirectly (Campbell, 1999). There is also an important interaction effect. Namely, narcissists like popular and attractive partners, especially when those others admire them. Narcissists, however, are not particularly interested in admiration from just anybody. This finding is inconsistent with the "doormat hypothesis." Narcissists are not looking for someone they can walk on and who worships them; rather, narcissists are looking for someone ideal who also admires them.
>
> The next question, of course, is what characteristics of a potential partner make them able to provide narcissists with narcissistic esteem? Not surprisingly, what narcissists particularly look for in a partner are physical attractiveness and agentic traits (e.g., status and success). A narcissist's ideal partner is like a narcissist's ideal self (recall Freud's comments): attractive, successful, and admiring of the narcissist. Indeed, in our research, narcissists report that part of the reason that they are drawn to attractive and successful partners is that these > people are similar to them (Campbell, 1999).

>
> Source: Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach.[4]

Dozens more quotations could be added, however the point is obvious: self-enhancement strategies of both narcissism and hypergamy share overlapping features.

The rise of narcissistic behaviors among women is receiving increased attention from academia, particularly with the addition of new variants to the lexicon such as communal narcissism, and vulnerable narcissism, which appear to be preferred female modes of expressing narcissism. A more in-depth survey of narcissism variants among women, and their implications can be read here.

Hypergamy, as an evolutionary motivation, doesn't require a woman to overestimate her own attractiveness and desirability as she seeks to secure high resource/status males. Narcissism, on the contrary, does entail an overestimation by women of their own attractiveness & desirability as they seek to secure high resource/status males.

To discover whether hypergamy or narcissism is at play, one might simply ask a woman to rate her own attractiveness. If she strongly overrates herself, then her mating-up is likely driven by narcissism and is maladaptive. If she rates herself honestly, then her desire to mate up is more likely driven by an adaptive hypergamy. Mating-up today appears largely driven by maladaptive narcissism; therefore any rationalizing or excusing it as "natural" and "adaptive" serves to compound and increase that same culturally-driven narcissism.

A note on terminology:

Sigmund Freud introduced narcissism as a developmental trait that ranged from healthy to unhealthy.[5,6] Some evolutionary psychologists posit that a degree of narcissism might be adaptive in the wider evolutionary sense, though this hypothesis (which has zero genetic evidence to confirm it) can only be applied to a limited subset of behaviours before tipping into maladaptive expressions of narcissism as measured by the usual psychometric instruments.[7,8,9] Moreover, no one has satisfactorily demonstrated that a mild, non-pathological narcissism is adaptive and belongs to a construct continuum with more pathological narcissism; therefore it is conjecture to claim that narcissism is natural, but that it simply "gets out of hand" at the more extreme end of a hypothesised spectrum.

With these points in mind it's necessary to differentiate between female self-enhancement as an evolutionary survival strategy, versus female self-enhancement as a maladaptive, narcissistic pathology. The narcissistic self-enhancement we see increasingly demonstrated among women today is not a contributor to evolutionary success; on the contrary it works to undermine family ties, corrode intimate relationships, and is also associated with lowering the birth rate – the exact opposites of conditions required for "adaptive." Lastly, by differentiating hypergamous self-enhancement from narcissistic self-enhancement we avoid the error of encouraging or excusing narcissism under the banner of it being “natural.”

Maladaptive vs. adaptive versions of self-enhancement

REFERENCES:

[1] Grapsas, S., Brummelman, E., Back, M. D., & Denissen, J. J. (2020). The “why” and “how” of narcissism: A process model of narcissistic status pursuit. Perspectives on Psychological Science, 15(1), 150-172.
[2] Campbell, W. K. (1999). Narcissism and romantic attraction. Journal of Personality and social Psychology, 77(6), 1254.
[3] Wallace, H. M. (2011). Narcissistic self-enhancement. The handbook of narcissism and narcissistic personality disorder: Theoretical approaches, empirical findings, and treatments, 309-318.
[4] Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach.
[5] Freud, S. (2014). On narcissism: An introduction. Read Books Ltd.
[6] Segal, H., & Bell, D. (2018). The theory of narcissism in the work of Freud and Klein. In Freud’s On Narcissism (pp. 149-174). Routledge.
[7] Holtzman, N. S., & Donnellan, M. B. (2015). The roots of Narcissus: Old and new models of the evolution of narcissism. Evolutionary perspectives on social psychology, 479-489.
[8] Holtzman, N. S. (2018). Did narcissism evolve?. Handbook of Trait Narcissism: Key Advances, Research Methods, and Controversies, 173-181.
[9] Czarna, AZ, Wróbel, M., Folger, LF, Holtzman, NS, Raley, JR, & Foster, JD (2022). Narcissism and Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Evolutionary roots and emotional profiles. In TK Shackelford & L. Al-Shawaf (Eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Evolution and the Emotions. Oxford University Press.

The Goal Post Episode 71 – William Stanley Jevons / PASK / Liberalism Definition / AI in Music

January 13, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

How fathers were destroyed by the most popular family movie of all time

January 19, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Screenwashed is a new channel on Youtube that has interesting content on the influence of popular movies on culture. In particular the impact on men and fatherhood is often mentioned.

In this video the channel discusses the movie Mary Poppins.

While this video makes many good points it fails to mention that at one point during Mary Poppins several female characters sing Though we adore men individually, we agree that as a group, They're rather stupid.

While there were many cultural threads that led to the current crisis this channel makes a good point about about the influence of movies.

The Goal Post Episode 72 – Starfleet Academy / The State of Play / James Prinsep

January 28, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

January 30, 2026 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

As of January 2026 a warrant is outstanding for the arrest of Zoe McLellan in relation to charges of kidnapping, child stealing and child custody deprivation.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan was reportedly residing in an apartment in River Ridge, Louisiana in April 2021 and may still be residing in the area.

McLellan grew up in the area of Port Orchard, WA and may have returned to the area.

Some sources believe that McLellan has left the United States and is residing in Canada or Costa Rica.

Prior to disappearing McLellan was known to use the alias Sarah Chandler.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney's office.

The Goal Post Episode 73 – Men in Education Reality / Saladin / Mariano Barbacid / Amelia Rant

February 10, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Fatherhood Under Attack: A Male Space with Paul Elam and Dr. Baskerville

February 18, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

In their own words

February 28, 2026 | by Robert Brockway | Link | Original Link

---

This article was originally presented as a speech at the 2024 Menz Summit in New Zealand.

There's an old joke. I don't recall when I first heard it. Although the wording varies, I first heard it as:

> "Just because you're paranoid doesn't mean they aren't trying to get you."

This conference series is about men's well being. There are certainly many who would seek to harm men's wellbeing today. But this isn't new. It's actually being going on for decades.

Misandry, the hatred or intense dislike of men, is common in our society. If you sit back and think about it, it's quite extrordinary that such a thing could occur. Society needs men. A society that alienates it's men will ultimately fall to those that don't. Alienating men enmasse would ultimately make everyone in the fallen society worse off – even the people driving it.

I'm going to talk a lot about feminists today. It isn't sufficient to say feminism is the problem, it's more complicated than that, but it's often the most visible component of the problem.

Many may be surprised to learn this but I'll be the first to say that not all feminists are like that. Unfortunately the feminists that matter are like that.

It all started in Seneca Falls, NY state in 1848. A group of around 300 men and women met to discuss women's rights at the time. These people were, by the standards of their time, progressives. Interestingly there was a heated debate about whether the conference should endorse women's suffrage or not. In the end they produced a document called the Declaration of Sentiments.

A woman by the name of Elizabeth Cady Stanton was the principal author although she was assisted by many others. The sentiments expressed give us some indication of what the conference was like:

> He has not ever permitted her to exercise her inalienable right to the elective franchise.

This at a time when even white most men in the United States couldn't vote.

> He has compelled her to submit to laws, in the formation of which she had no voice.

Again nor did most men.

> He has taken from her all right in property, even to the wages she earns.

This is likely a reference to coverture. Coveture was a concept in which a husband took control of his wife's assets but was also responsible for her debts.

> He has made her morally, an irresponsible being, as she can commit many crimes with impunity,…

This is an interesting one. Women are still treated more leniently under the law and there is a push on at the moment to close women's prisons in several countries.

> He has so framed the laws of divorce, as to what shall be the proper causes of divorce, in case of separation, to whom the guardianship of the children shall be given; as to be wholly regardless of the happiness of the women—the law, in all cases, going upon a false supposition of the supremacy of a man, and giving all power into his hands.

Many would argue that's completely reversed today.

> He has endeavored, in every way that he could to destroy her confidence in her own powers, to lessen her self-respect, and to make her willing to lead a dependent and abject life.

I don't agree with that one Liz.

This is only a section. The Declaration of Sentiments is widely available online and I would encourage everyone to take a look at it. At the end of the convention only 68 women and 32 men signed the declaration. I think this is telling given that the conference attendees were already predisposed to supporting these sorts of arguments.

Now back to Mrs Stanton. Remember she was the principal author of the declaration.

So what did she say about men?

> "We are, as a sex, infinitely superior to men, and if we were free and developed, healthy in body and mind, as we should be under natural conditions, our motherhood would be our glory. That function gives women such wisdom and power as no male can possess." –Stanton's Letters

And:

> "The male element is a destructive force, stern, selfish, aggrandizing, loving war, violence, conquest, acquisition, breeding in the material and moral world alike discord, disorder, disease, and death. See what a record of blood and cruelty the pages of history reveal! Through what slavery, slaughter, and sacrifice, through what inquisitions and imprisonments, pains and persecutions, black codes and gloomy creeds, the soul of humanity has struggled for the centuries, while mercy has veiled her face and all hearts have been dead alike to love and hope!" –The Destructive Male speech

Imagine being married to her.

I think Mrs Stanton's comments about men say more about her than they do about men.

We're only in the 1840s and the misandry abounds.

Before we go on I want to talk about suffrage.

Today a lot of people think that men long had the vote but women only gained it recently. This is demonstratably false. On Wiki4Men I have a large table in which I show the year of adoption of universal male and female suffrage for virtually every country. While the dates for the adoption of women's suffrage are easy to find the same can't be said for men's suffrage. It took me years to compile that list and I'm still chasing one or two.

You may note that the years in my table differ from those on Wikipedia. This is because Wikipedia does not use a clear and consistent definition of universal suffrage – I do.

In general if a country became independent and democratic during the 20th or 21st centuries men and women gained the franchise at the same time. If a country became independent and democratic during the 19th century men led women by a few years or decades. Decades may seem like a long time but this is nothing when you consider that the democracy we have is the result of at least 5000 years of evolution of political thought.

Winston Churchill is often quoted as having said:

> "Democracy is the worst form of government – except for all the others that have been tried."

Churchill did say this in parliament in 1947, it's in hansard, but he noted that it was already a popular saying by that time.

I'm with Winnie on this one. Democracy definitely has its flaws but the alternatives are far worse. If in doubt talk to people who have lived under those systems.

I encourage everyone to peruse the data I have on Wiki4Men. If you do this you'll see that modern representative democracy is only 100-150 years ago. Today democracy is under threat again. If we're not prepared to protect democracy it may yet be a footnote in history. In many cases the people and groups I'm going to talk about later are the same ones that would see democracy swept aside.

While it existed earlier, much of the misandry we see today really got going in the 1960s. What were fringe ideas are now mainstream. When thinking about this consider some of the ideas these people espoused that are not currently mainstream. What happens next?

Simone de Beauvoir was a French feminists who has had a global impact on feminism. We often hear that feminism is all about women's choices but if you actually watch the movement you see it insists that women make the choice to work over caring for children. De Beauvoir actually said this in the June 1975 issue of a magazine called The Saturday Review. While being interviewed by fellow feminist Betty Friedan de Beauvoir had this to say:

> "No, we don't believe that any woman should have this choice. No woman should be authorized to stay at home and raise her children. Society should be totally > different. Women should not have that choice, precisely because if there is such a choice, too many women will make that one."

There it is. A core objective of feminism writ large.At this point I also want to mention that de Beauvoir and her partner Jean-Paul Sartre tried to have age of consent laws in abolished and worked to have pedophiles released from prison in France.

American feminist Kate Millet was heavily influenced by de Beauvoir. Millet was a prominent second wave feminist. Her first book was Sexual Politics was hugely influential on feminism. We can see here thoughts on pedophilia here:

> "Sex itself is presented as a crime to children. It is how adults control children, how they forbid them sexuality. This has been going on for ages and is infinitely important to adults." – Essay, Beyond Politics: Children and Sexuality

An associate of Millet's, Shulamith Firestone, believed that childhood, childhood innocence and the nuclear family were all products of the Patriarchy and intended to oppress women.

Firestone said:

> "Unless revolution uproots the basic social organization, the biological family — the vinculum through which the psychology of power can always be smuggled — the tapeworm of exploitation will never be annihilated."

And again:

> "The family structure is the source of psychological, economic and political oppression." –The Case Against the Sexual Revolution

Firestone, Millet and many others were involved in a radical feminist group in 1960s New York known as the Red Stockings. Much of the ideology we see in modern feminism came from this group. We're fortunate that Kate Millet's sister Mallory, who was present at many gatherings of this group, has spilled the beans about what went on. She makes it very clear that Redstockings were heavily influenced by Marxism and simply replaced captialists by men when inventing their new ideology.

But before Millett published Sexual Politics and before the formation of the Redstockings we had Valerie Solanas and the SCUM Manifesto. Like Millet, Firestone and many others Solanas was living and forming her ideas in New York City.

Solanas is famous for two things:

- Writing the SCUM Manifesto
- Shooting Andy Warhol

First Solanas wrote and self-published the SCUM Manifesto. Despite what is often claimed, the acronym Society for Cutting Up Men does not appear in the text and was apparently created by an editor not Solanas herself.

In fact the term SCUM in the manifesto refers to women. But not all women, just the ones that Solanas felt should and would rule the world. She said:

> "The conflict, therefore, is not between females and males, but between SCUM—dominant, secure, self-confident, nasty, violent, selfish, independent, proud, thrill-seeking, free-wheeling arrogant females, who consider themselves fit to rule the universe, who have free-wheeled to the limits of this society and are ready to wheel onto something far beyond what it has to offer—and nice, passive, accepting, "cultivated", polite, dignified, subdued, dependent, scared, mindless, insecure, approval-seeking Daddy's Girls who can't cope with the unknown, who want to continue to wallow in the sewer that is at least familiar…"

All class Valerie.

The passage continued to ramble by the way. It could have used a full stop or two as well. Hence the need to end the quote.

I'm not a doctor but I do know that certain types of mental illness are characterised in writing by rambling and excessively long sentences.

Imagine a world run by people like that. Well I'd say that many leading feminists are exactly like that. So in the words of Valerie Solanas, they are SCUM.

So that's what she wanted for women. But what did she think about men? She tells us starting on page three of the SCUM Manifesto.

> The male is a biological accident: the y (male) gene is an incomplete x (female) gene, that is, has an incomplete set of chromosomes. In other words, the male is an incomplete female, a walking abortion, aborted at the gene stage. To be male is to be deficient, emotionally limited; maleness is a deficiency disease and males are emotional cripples.
>
> The male is completely egocentric, trapped inside himself, incapable of empathizing or identifying with others, of love, friendship, affection or tenderness. He is a completely isolated unit, incapable of rapport with anyone. His responses are entirely visceral, not cerebral; his intelligence is a mere tool in the service of his drives and needs; he is incapable of mental passion, mental interaction; he can't relate to anything other than his own physical sensations….

She continues to ramble on for several pages like this. At least she occassionally uses full stops this time.

Feminists continue to praise the SCUM Manifesto and it continues to be required reading in gender studies classes. The SCUM Manifesto is available for download from Wiki4Men.

A year after she self-published the SCUM Manifesto Solanas attempted to murder famous artist Andy Warhol. She had previously had a brief professional association with Warhol. After shooting Warhol she also shot another man who was present and attempted to shoot a third.

Following the attack she was detained for a mental health evaluation and diagnosed with paranoid schizophrenia. Now, remember what I said about the SCUM Manifesto. Imagine if instead of being praised for her work Solanas had received help.

Solanas' charges were downgraded and she ended up serving three years in prison. Andy Warhol was reportedly never the same, physically or emotionally. In being so emotionally harmed by Solanas, Andy Warhol actually proved her thesis about men in the SCUM Manifesto to be wrong.

After the shooting prominent feminist and leader in the National Organisation for Women, T-Grace Atkinson, described Solanas as:

> "The first outstanding champion of women's rights."

And:

> "A 'heroine' of the feminist movement."

Ti-Grace Atkinson also went on to say that:

> "The institution of sexual intercourse is anti-feminist."

Can anyone see a theme running through their comments?

By the 1970s feminist and eugenicist Sally Miller Gearhart was active in California. She is often credited with the saying the future is female. In fact the statement had been in circulation among feminists for several years before she wrote her essay The Future – If There Is One – Is Female. One line from the essay gives an idea of the tone:

> "The proportion of men must be reduced to and maintained at approximately 10% of the human race."

While Gearhart didn't originate the phrase, she did popularise it.

The entire essay is available for download from Wiki4Men.

A similar statement was espoused by Krista Milburn around 2014. This was widely reported by the media and widely celebrated in feminist circles. Milburn also suggested introducing International Castration Day. Lovely.

I noted that Gearhart was a eugenicist. For those that don't know eugenics was a pseudo-science that was popular in the Western world in the early 20th century. Eugenics advocated for selective breeding of humans for certain traits and was highly influential on Nazi ideology. Most prominent feminists were eugenicists during this period.

Hillary Clinton's quote about women being the primary victims of war is famous, but few know the details.

On 17 November 1998 Clinton was at a domestic violence conference in El Salvador. During the conference she made the following statement:

> "Women have always been the primary victims of war. Women lose their husbands, their fathers, their sons in combat."

This is the statement that we often see repeated. But it was 1998. Maybe she has changed her views? Short answer: No.

Recently she said pretty much the same thing. In March 2023 she told participants at the 30/50 Summit in Abu Dhabi. that:

> "Women and children are the primary victims of conflict and of climate change and there is no place that unfortunately, tragically, shows us that more dramatically than Ukraine today,…"

Probably the least well known person I will mention is French feminist Pauline Harmange. In 2020 Harmange wrote an essay with the simple title I Hate Men. She wrote it in French of course but you get the picture. We need to be clear here. This title is not clickbait. The essay argues that the hatred of men is not only acceptable but to be encourage. It argues that misandry exists only as a response to misogyny.

Harmange argues that women should prioritise relationships with women over men. Interestingly she is happily married to a man. I suppose it's a case of do as I say not as I do.

The French government tried to ban the essay which caused it to explode in popularity, an example of the Streisand Effect. As a result of all of the publicity it was later published as a book.

I disagree with the French government's attempt to ban the essay. I always oppose attempts to ban misandric publications. I do this for two reasons:

1. I'm nearly a free-speech absolutist. I oppose censorship unless there is a specific attempt to incite violence.

2. They prove our point for us. Many people have tried to deny that misandry exists – but that argument is easily defeated when I show them a selection of misandric publications

The first printing of Harmange's book sold out. It was subsequently reprinted in French and English .

Ten years earlier feminist Hanna Rosin wrote an article in The Atlantic entitled The End of Men. She later expanded this in to a book, published in 2012. In both Rosin argues that a fundamental social shift is occuring which will benefit women at the expense of men, essentially arguing that women will become the dominant gender in the future. She didn't say it but she meant that the future is female.

The arguments have been thoroughly debunked. You can find information on this on Wiki4Men. I do want to make one particular point though. Rosin argues that women today are more educated than men of the same age. Indeed this is a commonly repeated phrase.

This is only true if education is counted merely as years of formal schooling. This narrow definition has several serious problems:

• Not every year of formal schooling is equally valuable. A year in engineering is worth more to the individual and society than a year in gender studies.

• It seems to ignore non-tertiary training such as apprenticeships. I suspect the elitist types who believe this nonsense have forgotten the necessity of tradies to keep society running.

• Not all education is acquired formally.

And that's before we get on to the tendency of female teachers to make down male students. Yes that's real. It was first discovered by the London School of Economics. Further research carried out by the OECD has now verified that this is occuring in over 60 countries.

A year after Rosin's book was published she appeared in a televised debate – the motion of the debate was that men are obsolete. There were four debaters, all women. Not surprisingly Rosin appeared on the affirmative side while Camille Paglia was on the negative. For those that don't know Paglia is one of the rare breed of feminist who raises men's issues out of genuine concern.

The audience found that in favour of the affirmative – ie they claimed that men are indeed obsolete. One journalist who was present and spoke to audience members afterwards suggested that many men in the audience implied that they had voted affirmative to avoid upsetting their girlfriends. Sounds like they're in unhealthy relationships to me.

This debate was part of a series known as the Munk Debates. I had watched quite a few of them up to this point but was appalled at what I saw. I never watched a Munk debate again.

This sort of mindset pervades all areas of Western civilisation today. In 2014 Michelle Obama said:

> "So we can't waste this spotlight. It is temporary and life is short, and change is needed. And women are smarter than men."

It's important to understand that she said this while she was first lady. I think that's rather un first-lady like.

Intelligence is outside the scope of this presentation but suffice to say, no Michelle, that's not correct. We have plenty on this topic on A Voice for Men and Wiki4Men.

Not to be outdone her husband Barak Obama made some disparaging comments about men. At least he had the good sense to leave the White House first. Choice comments include:

> "If you look at the world and look at the problems it's usually old people, usually old men, not getting out of the way."
>
> "Now women, I just want you to know; you are not perfect, but what I can say pretty indisputably is that you're better than us [men]."
>
> "I'm absolutely confident that for two years if every nation on earth was run by women, you would see a significant improvement across the board on just about everything… living standards and outcomes."

In actuality research in to both medieval European and modern leaders found that polities led by women were more likely to end up in armed conflict than those led by men. Researchers have tried to blame men for that, claiming that men will prey on female leaders.

So it started in the 19th century and in 1960s New York it received a huge boost. Since then it's been steadily growing and expanding. Around 2013 it really took off.

Now it's 2024 and I think it's peaked. Even the mainstream media is starting to raise concerns about men disengaging.

• Men aren't mentoring women at work

• Men aren't asking women out

Well known Australian academic Michael Flood recently said he avoids using the term toxic masculinity when talking to the community because (in his view) it's being misunderstood.

A Pew Research Center survey found that 63% of American men and 35% of American women say they are single. While some have tried to explain this as women dating each other, that alone cannot explain this massive disparity. A far more plausible explanation is that a lot of women think they are in a relatonship with a man but the man disagrees.

But it might already be too late.

Many men are going MGTOW. Many more have walked away but don't call themselves anything in particular. Others have simply left the West to pursue relationships elsewhere. A notable example of the latter being the Passport Bros.

I don't believe men are as lonely as it often claimed in the media. And I don't think they're coming back anytime soon. Regardless of what happens from hereon, the misandry and everything it's brought about needs to stop.

Zoe McLellen

Cato the Elder was a Roman orator in the second century BCE. Cato was famous for ending all of his speeches, regardless of the subject matter, with the words "Carthago Delenda Est" – Carthage must be destroyed.

Taking a leaf from Cato's scroll I end all of my presentations with a call to assist in the lawful apprehension of Zoe McLellan. And I will do this until she is brought to justice and the matter can be dealt with by the courts.

Have you seen Zoe McLellan?

In November 2020 McLellan's ex-husband, Jean Gillain was awarded sole custody of their son, Sebastian Gillain.

McLellan had already absconded with Sebastian by then. In May 2021 an arrest warrant was issued for McLellan by the County of Los Angeles, California. As of November 2024 a warrant is still outstanding for the arrest of McLellan. Sebastian, who would now be 12, is also missing.

McLellan is a public figure who has appeared in numerous popular television shows including Star Trek: Voyager, JAG, NCIS: New Orleans and Designated Survivor. Her face is familiar to millions. It is extraordinary that she has evaded detection for so long.

McLellan is originally from Port Orchard, WA. Some locals have speculated she may be hiding out in rural WA. Other sources have speculated that she may have travelled to Costa Rica or Canada.

Anyone with any relevant information should contact the Los Angeles County District Attorney’s office.

Paul Elam discusses Red Pill, the Manosphere & Men’s Rights

March 13, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 74 – Nuclear Family / Democracy Talk / William Wilberforce / Stanislav Petrov

March 25, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

Has Chivalry Fled? (Article, May 1912)

April 6, 2026 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

The following article provides an example of a ‘threat narrative’ – i.e., in this case the threat that chivalry is departed or dying, thus putting women in danger in a myriad ways.

The ‘Chivalry Is Dead’ trope has been wheeled out by every newspaper and media outlet for the last two centuries, on a weekly basis. If romantic chivalry is taking hundreds of years to die then it must be the slowest death on earth!

However the intent of such articles appears not to report accurately on chivalry’s demise (which doesn’t appear to be happening to any significant degree), but to reinforce protection of chivalry as an article of dogmatic faith; i.e., the more one feels chivalry is under threat, the more one protects and upholds the institution.

To be sure there have occurred alterations in the way gynocentric chivalry is acted out on the contemporary scene, but the basic convention is still very much alive.

The following article appeared in the Evening Post LXXIII, Issue 112, 11 May, 1912:

Well-intended Affirmative Insanity

April 26, 2026 | by Jon Gunnarsson | Link | Original Link

Suppose you were working in a chemical lab, doing some experiment. You get careless and by accident you spill some acid into your eye. What do you do? The way I see it you have three options. Option 1: Do nothing, except blink a bit and rub your eye and hope it will get better. Option 2: Pour water into your eye to dilute the acid. Option 3: Pour a base into your eye, hoping to neutralize the acid.

Obviously, option 2 is the correct choice. Option 1 doesn't actually solve the problem and you'll experience unnecessary pain and damage to your eye. Option 3 is clearly insane. For this plan to work, you need to know exactly how much acid is in your eye and how potent it is and you need to be able to pour just the right amount of base into your eye. But even if you were able to do that, there's still the problem that the acid and the base will not necessarily spread evenly on the surface of your eye so you will have parts that have more acid than base and vice versa. It's clear that option 3 will do more harm than good.

Now consider a different scenario. You're running some sort of big organization. It could be a firm, a charity, a social club, a school, a hospital, etc. This organization has many members. Suppose these members belonged to two disjoint and clearly distinguishable groups A and B. Further suppose that you have received information that the Bs are disadvantaged and are being unfairly discriminated against. Despite there not being any official rules favouring one group over the other, almost all the positions of leadership within the organization are filled up with As and the Bs have lower status on average. You are a fair-minded person and want everyone to have the same opportunities and rights within your organization. What do you do?

Option 1: Do nothing and hope the problem goes away on its own. Option 2: Try to reduce discrimination through measures such as awareness campaigns or analyzing enforcement of rules to see if there is discrimination. Option 3: Implement official rules that favour Bs over As, such as a minimum quota of Bs in all leadership positions or a programme specifically designed to help Bs.

As in the previous example, option 1 doesn't solve the problem and option 2 is clearly reasonable. Option 3 in this case is what is commonly called affirmative action and it is just as insane and detrimental as option 3 in the first example.

First of all, there's a question we have to consider here which we did not in the first example and that is whether there is actually any discrimination. What if your information about discrimination were false? In the first example it's immediately obvious that you have acid in your eye because it burns, but with discrimination in a large organization things aren't so easy. The social sciences are notoriously inaccurate and unreliable. What if there were no acid and you poured in base anyway? What if there were no discrimination and you just introduced discrimination through affirmative action?

Maybe the reason As are doing better is due to different characteristics between As and Bs that are not due to discrimination. Maybe As are more intelligent or better educated, maybe they care more about your organization, maybe they care more about status, maybe they are more willing to make sacrifices to attain high positions, maybe they have more assertive and dominant personalities, maybe As or Bs or both are more comfortable with A leadership.

But even if there is indeed discrimination, it's not possible to accurately assess its precise nature and severity. If you introduce too little affirmative action, you're not solving the problem, only ameliorating it slightly. If you introduce too much affirmative action, you create a new problem. If you don't distribute the affirmative action properly, you will overshoot your goal in certain areas and not do enough in others.

Suppose for instance that we could subdivide the two demographics. Group A is actually made up of groups A1 and A2. A1 is actually the only group that's privileged, while A2 is not. So even though when we regard group A as a whole, A is privileged, it is actually just because of the A1s pulling up the average. Then suppose we can do the same thing with B. B1 is not actually discriminated against, it's only B2s who actually face discrimination.

So at the start we have one group that's unfairly privileged, one group that's unfairly discriminated against and two groups that are being treated fairly. Then we introduce affirmative action and let's suppose that we magically know exactly what sorts of measures we need to take to make groups A and B even. But then we look at the subgroups and see that we now haven't actually made anything more fair. A1 is now no longer privileged and B2 is now no longer discriminated against, but the two groups that were being treated fairly before have now merely switched places. A2 now faces unfair discrimination through the affirmative action measures while B1 now has unfair privilege. So even in this idealized world where we can precisely assess the exact right measures to bring about equality between the two groups, we haven't actually gained any ground. As and Bs collectively are now even, but when we look at the actual individuals, we haven't improved the situation. Groups have no existence of their own beyond the individuals who make them up. Only individuals think, act, and feel, so the only thing that matters is our treatment of individuals.

A further problem of affirmative action is that it is coercive and violates the principles of meritocracy. Because of that, people will try to resist it and you are likely to experience a good amount of conflict within your organization. You'll need to constantly apply pressure to push through and sustain your reforms, which costs a great deal of money and angers people. You also create resentment against Bs. Bs in leadership positions are going to be taken less seriously and command less respect because people will suspect that they got their jobs through affirmative action instead of merit. It also creates a lot of divisiveness between As and Bs and separates them firmly into two different camps.

Things get even worse if the government gets involved. Even if the government officials have the best intentions, they do not know the details of the industries they're regulating. They just impose some rule from up high that everyone must follow. Because the government does not have to pay for the costs of affirmative action legislation, it is more eager to pass such laws.

More troubling yet is that forcing private companies to comply with so called anti-discrimination legislation is a gross violation of property rights. One of the fundamental aspects of property is the right to include or exclude people from the use of your property. If I own a piece of land, I can forbid you from trespassing. But if I own a company, I no longer get to decide freely who to hire or fire. This erosion of property rights not only hurts the economy, but also infringes on basic economic freedoms.

But the worst thing of all is that the vast majority of politicians are not wise and benevolent leaders who only wish to serve their country. Rather, they act in their own self-interest, often at the detriment of everyone else. Modern democracy does not reward wise leadership and prudent management. After all, most of the voters have neither the inclination nor the knowledge to fully assess most of the decisions that a politician makes. Thus, politicians are more interested in signalling than in effective policies.

Advocating for affirmative action may be very detrimental to society as a whole, and a politician may even be aware of this, but the point is to be seen by the public as doing something against discrimination. It is about signalling opposition to sexism, racism, xenophobia, or other undesirable views. It then becomes difficult for political opponents to oppose proposals for affirmative action without signalling support for discrimination.

It’s impossible to legislate away bigotry through affirmative action. You cannot stop unfair discrimination through further unfair discrimination. Fighting fire with fire is highly dangerous, usually not successful, and people are likely to get burnt in the process. In the end, the only effective way of stopping discrimination is through awareness and through economic self-interest.

In a free market, bigotry doesn’t pay. If for instance an entrepreneur were a true misogynist and didn’t want to hire women, no matter how qualified they are, then he is passing up opportunities for making profit. His competitors who do hire women will do better than him, making it difficult for him to keep up. If he doesn’t relent, his market share will decrease and eventually he may go out of business.

This process may take a while, but in the end it’s the only way to achieve a just and meritocratic society.

Featured image courtesy of Wikimedia Commons.

The Goal Post Episode 75 – Emil Juresic / SPLC Followup / Father Involvement as Historical Norm

May 4, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

The Goal Post Episode 76 – Pythagoras / Vasily Arkhipov / Everyday Men

May 13, 2026 | by Wiki4Men | Link | Original Link

Mike Buchanan and Paul Elam: Men Stop Drinking, daily Zoom meetings

June 8, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Mike Buchanan has launched a new initiative, Men Stop Drinking. The video below has Mike and Paul Elam discuss the initative.

Amazon cancels new Stargate series over ‘modern audience’ concerns

June 10, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Stargate was a successful TV franchise, based on the well known movie of the same name, that ran from 1997 to 2011. An attempt to produce a new Stargate series involving many of the original creators was recently axed.

This is a video by Youtuber Nerdrotic in which the axing of the series is discussed. While the subject matter may only be of interest to SciFi fans it’s an example of the how many problems and issues once talked about only in the pages of AVfM (and a few allied sites) are now very much mainstream. During this video it’s noted how Stargate was patriotic and portrayed the United States military in a positive light and how it focused on male characters. Nerdrotic and the others recognise the problems with woke and simply include them in the discussion.

Doctor Who cancelled

June 16, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

---

Further to our previous post on Stargate, we now learn that the venerable SciFi franchise of Doctor Who has been cancelled (again).

Doctor Who first appeared on British TV screens the day after the assassination of JFK in 1963. The initial episode was actually rebroadcast as week later as many had skipped watching it in favour of information on the death of President Kennedy. This was virtually unheard of at the time.

Doctor Who went on to run continuously for 26 seasons, being a favourite of a generation of young boys in the UK, Australia and New Zealand. When it was relaunched in 2011 it hits the screens in North America and was a sensation around the world. And then it went woke.

It probably lasted longer than it should have given how much it had deteriorated as a result of identity politics and the rest of woke being rammed down the audience's throats.

Below is a video by the Critical Drinker that brings his typical humour to the situation.

Narcissism Exaggerates Baseline Hypergamy

June 27, 2026 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

Many social media commentators discuss the rise of hypergamous behaviors among modern women. Some pose reasonable evolutionary hypotheses for such behavior, but there may be another cause at work – cultural narcissism.

Observations of extreme hypergamy among women may be equally explained by the rise of cultural narcissism in affluent societies (Twenge & Campbell, 2009), a motive that differs from baseline hypergamy, but which nevertheless involves comparable behaviors of self-enhancement and status-seeking.

Society's encouragement of men in chivalric deference to women, and the associated practice of 'placing women on a pedestal', has generated a degree of gendered narcissism among women over time. To frame this differently, Acquired Situational Narcissism can arise with any acquired social status; for example in academic experts, politicians, pop singers, actors – and also in women who, in modern society, are taught that they deserve to be recognised for thier worth, dignity, value, purity, status, reputation and esteem in the context of their relationships with men. This psychological disposition in women, partly a result of traditional chivalry, promotes exaggerated self-enhancement behaviours beyond what evolutionary models of hypergamy would require.

Among narcissistic individuals, studies find higher incidence of hypergamy-like behaviors, indicating that such behavior is not the result of a culture of sexual liberation alone, nor of baseline evolutionary imperatives; it may also be the result of an acquired social class narcissism that says "I deserve."

Excerpts from narcissism studies:

> A third strand of evidence concerns narcissists' relationship choices. Because humans are a social species, relationship choices are an important feature of situation selection. Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation. For example, narcissists are keener on gaining new partners than on establishing close relationships with existing ones (Wurst et al., 2017). They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends (Jonason & Schmitt, 2012) and trophy partners (Campbell, 1999), perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people. In sum, narcissists are more likely to select social environments that allow them to display their performances publicly, ideally in competition with others. These settings are potentially more accepting and reinforcing of narcissistic status strivings.
>
> Source: The "Why" and "How" of Narcissism: A Process Model of Narcissistic Status Pursuit[1]

> Consistent with the self-orientation model, Study 5 provided an empirical demonstration of the mediational role of self enhancement in narcissists' > preference for perfect rather than caring romantic partners. Furthermore, these potential romantic partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance (i.e., social status). Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation. Narcissists also were attracted to self-oriented romantic partners to the extent that these others were viewed as similar. The mediational roles of self-enhancement and similarity were independent. That is, narcissists' romantic preferences were driven both by a desire to gain self-esteem and a desire to associate with similar others.

>
> Source: Narcissism and romantic attraction[2]

> Narcissism has been linked with the materialistic pursuit of wealth and symbols that convey high status (Kasser, 2002; Rose, 2007). This quest for status extends to relationship partners. Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty) (Campbell, 1999; Tanchotsrinon, Maneesri, & Campbell, 2007)
>
> Source: The Handbook of Narcissism And Narcissistic Personality Disorders[3]

> Narcissists are looking for partners who can provide them with self-esteem and status. How can a romantic partner provide status and esteem? First, he or she can do so directly: a romantic partner who admires me and thinks that I am wonderful elevates my esteem. Second, he or she can do so indirectly through a basic association: my partner is beautiful and popular, therefore I am too. This indirect esteem generation is clear from a range of social psychological research, from the self-evaluation maintenance (SEM) model (Tesser, 1988) to Basking in Reflected Glory (BIRGing; Cialdini et al., 1976). This indirect esteem provisioning is evident in the term "trophy" partner.
>
> There is good empirical evidence that narcissists like targets who provide esteem and status both directly and indirectly (Campbell, 1999). There is also an important interaction effect. Namely, narcissists like popular and attractive partners, especially when those others admire them. Narcissists, however, are not particularly interested in admiration from just anybody. This finding is inconsistent with the "doormat hypothesis." Narcissists are not looking for someone they can walk on and who worships them; rather, narcissists are looking for someone ideal who also admires them.
>
> The next question, of course, is what characteristics of a potential partner make them able to provide narcissists with narcissistic esteem? Not surprisingly, what narcissists particularly look for in a partner are physical attractiveness and agentic traits (e.g., status and success). A narcissist's ideal partner is like a narcissist's ideal self (recall Freud's comments): attractive, successful, and admiring of the narcissist. Indeed, in our research, narcissists report that part of the reason that they are drawn to attractive and successful partners is that these > people are similar to them (Campbell, 1999).

>
> Source: Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach.[4]

Dozens more quotations could be added, however the point is obvious: self-enhancement strategies of both narcissism and hypergamy share overlapping features.

The rise of narcissistic behaviors among women is receiving increased attention from academia, particularly with the addition of new variants to the lexicon such as communal narcissism, and vulnerable narcissism, which appear to be preferred female modes of expressing narcissism. A more in-depth survey of narcissism variants among women, and their implications can be read here.

Hypergamy, as an evolutionary motivation, doesn't require a woman to overestimate her own attractiveness and desirability as she seeks to secure high resource/status males. Narcissism, on the contrary, does entail an overestimation by women of their own attractiveness & desirability as they seek to secure high resource/status males.

To discover whether hypergamy or narcissism is at play, one might simply ask a woman to rate her own attractiveness. If she strongly overrates herself, then her mating-up is likely driven by narcissism and is maladaptive. If she rates herself honestly, then her desire to mate up is more likely driven by an adaptive hypergamy. Mating-up today appears largely driven by maladaptive narcissism; therefore any rationalizing or excusing it as "natural" and "adaptive" serves to compound and increase that same culturally-driven narcissism.

A note on terminology:

Sigmund Freud introduced narcissism as a developmental trait that ranged from healthy to unhealthy.[4,5] Some evolutionary psychologists posit that a degree of narcissism might be adaptive in the wider evolutionary sense, though this hypothesis (which has zero genetic evidence to confirm it) can only be applied to a limited subset of behaviours before tipping into maladaptive expressions of narcissism as measured by the usual psychometric instruments.[6,7,8] Moreover, no one has satisfactorily demonstrated that a mild, non-pathological narcissism is adaptive and belongs to a construct continuum with more pathological narcissism; therefore it is conjecture to claim that narcissism is natural but that it simply "gets out of hand" at the more extreme end of a hypothesised spectrum.

With these points in mind it's necessary to differentiate between female self-enhancement as an evolutionary survival strategy, versus female self-enhancement as a maladaptive, narcissistic pathology. The narcissistic self-enhancement we see increasingly demonstrated among women today is not a contributor to evolutionary success; on the contrary it works to undermine family ties, corrode intimate relationships, and is also associated with lowering the birth rate – the exact opposites of conditions required for evolutionary success. Lastly, by differentiating hypergamous self-enhancement from narcissistic self-enhancement we avoid the error of encouraging or excusing narcissism under the banner of it being “natural.”

Maladaptive vs. adaptive versions of self-enhancement

REFERENCES:

[1] Grapsas, S., Brummelman, E., Back, M. D., & Denissen, J. J. (2020). The “why” and “how” of narcissism: A process model of narcissistic status pursuit. Perspectives on Psychological Science, 15(1), 150-172.
[2] Campbell, W. K. (1999). Narcissism and romantic attraction. Journal of Personality and social Psychology, 77(6), 1254.
[3] Wallace, H. M. (2011). Narcissistic self-enhancement. The handbook of narcissism and narcissistic personality disorder: Theoretical approaches, empirical findings, and treatments, 309-318.
[4] Freud, S. (2014). On narcissism: An introduction. Read Books Ltd.
[5] Segal, H., & Bell, D. (2018). The theory of narcissism in the work of Freud and Klein. In Freud’s On Narcissism (pp. 149-174). Routledge.
[6] Holtzman, N. S., & Donnellan, M. B. (2015). The roots of Narcissus: Old and new models of the evolution of narcissism. Evolutionary perspectives on social psychology, 479-489.
[7] Holtzman, N. S. (2018). Did narcissism evolve?. Handbook of Trait Narcissism: Key Advances, Research Methods, and Controversies, 173-181.
[8] Czarna, AZ, Wróbel, M., Folger, LF, Holtzman, NS, Raley, JR, & Foster, JD (2022). Narcissism and Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Evolutionary roots and emotional profiles. In TK Shackelford & L. Al-Shawaf (Eds.), The Oxford Handbook of Evolution and the Emotions. Oxford University Press.

No Babies? — Not Hypergamy

July 2, 2026 | by Peter Wright | Link | Original Link

In the last decade, “hypergamy theory” has become the default explanation for women’s preference for high-status men. In its evolutionary form, the theory argues that ancestral women who secured higher-resource mates improved their children’s survival through better nutrition, safer environments, and greater parental investment.

If true, female status preference should be tightly linked to reproductive motivation, and modern dating-up should therefore produce more babies, not fewer. At its core, hypergamy is fundamentally a theory about successful reproduction — not status-seeking in isolation.

Yet the data tell the opposite story. Fertility rates have collapsed, especially among educated and higher-earning women who are most active in the contemporary mating market. Many women pursue visibly higher-status men while showing little interest in turning those pairings into families. This mismatch suggests the popular “hypergamy” explanation has been stretched well beyond its evolutionary logic.

The evolutionary rationale for hypergamy weakens when the reproductive goal that supposedly drove it is absent or greatly diminished. In that light, what we are seeing today is not adaptive mate choice for offspring viability, but a culturally exaggerated drive for personal status elevation operating in a void of its own.

Subclinical narcissism offers a more coherent account. Personality research shows that narcissistic women are drawn to partners who enhance their social image, prestige, and self-esteem. High-status or highly attractive men function less as co-parents than as trophies — symbols of personal success that provide admiration and reflected glory for the women.

Rather than seeking affiliation or reproduction, these women prioritize self-enhancement and status elevation; the relationships often dissolve once the man’s utility for ego-enhancement fades, skipping the long-term investment in offspring that classic hypergamy theory requires.

The research quotations provided below illustrate this point. Collectively, they show that status-oriented mate choice need not be read as evidence of evolutionary hypergamy at all. When reproductive motivation is diminishingly low or absent, this behavior reflects an entirely different drive: not a modified form of hypergamy, but narcissistic self-enhancement.

These women are pursuing high-status men primarily as trophies to elevate their own image, prestige, and ego — not as providers for future children. This is not hypergamy simply decoupled from babymaking. It is an entirely different phenomenon — narcissistic self-enhancement in romantic disguise. Said differently: No babies? Not hypergamy.

> “Narcissists are more likely to choose relationships that elevate their status over relationships that cultivate affiliation. For example, narcissists are keener on gaining new partners than on establishing close relationships with existing ones. They often demonstrate an increased preference for high-status friends and trophy partners, perhaps because they can bask in the reflected glory of these people." [1]

— Grapsas et al., 2020

"Narcissism has been linked with the materialistic pursuit of wealth and symbols that convey high status. This quest for status extends to relationship partners. Narcissists seek romantic partners who offer self-enhancement value either as sources of fawning admiration, or as human trophies (e.g., by possessing impressive wealth or exceptional physical beauty)."[2]
— Wallace, 2011

"Romantic partners were more likely to be seen as a source of self-esteem to the extent that they provided the narcissist with a sense of popularity and importance (i.e., social status). Narcissists' preference for romantic partners reflects a strategy for interpersonal self-esteem regulation… This pattern of relating romantically may have some benefits (notably self-esteem) but may lack durability, particularly when the ability of the partner to provide self-esteem wears thin. For example, as clinicians have noted, a narcissist's relationship with an attractive "trophy" spouse may end when that trophy ages or loses a prestigious job." [3]
— Campbell, 1999

"Narcissists particularly look for in a partner are physical attractiveness and agentic traits (e.g., status and success). A narcissist's ideal partner is like a narcissist's ideal self (recall Freud's comments): attractive, successful, and admiring of the narcissist. Indeed, in our research, narcissists report that part of the reason that they are drawn to attractive and successful partners is that these people are similar to them." [4]
— Campbell, Brunell & Finkel, 2006

"Narcissists use close relationships largely for the purpose of gaining social status and self-esteem (Campbell, 1999). A good example of this can be found in narcissists' reports of romantic attraction. Narcissists are particularly attracted to individuals who are (a) high in social status (e.g., successful, popular, and attractive) and can provide the narcissist with self enhancement via association, and (b) admiring and can enhance the narcissist's self-views directly via flattery and attention. In contrast, narcissists typically report less attraction for partners interested in close, caring relationships." [5]
— Tanchotsrinon, Maneesri & Campbell 2007

"Gold diggers were female, reckless (i.e., psychopathic), narcissistic, lived in larger cities, and students. Female, right-wing students scored highest in gold digging, consistent with increased access to resourceful partners… Its materialistic-exploitative behaviors mark gold digging as a fast life strategy, > emphasizing short-term mating and resource-extraction. Yet, gold diggers seek resources (e.g., money, status) but not reproduction––requiring a nuanced life history strategy calibration via self-centered (i.e., narcissistic) behavior over reciprocal decisions."[6]

> — Freyth & Jonason, 2026

In the evolutionary playbook, hypergamy was never an end in itself. We should stop treating it as a cogent explanation when it so clearly functions as a "Just-So" story for a distinctly maladaptive phenomenon.

References:

[1] Grapsas, S., Brummelman, E., Back, M. D., & Denissen, J. J. (2020). The "why" and "how" of narcissism: A process model of narcissistic status pursuit. Perspectives on Psychological Science, 15(1), 150-172.
[2] Wallace, H. M. (2011). Narcissistic self-enhancement. In: Campbell, W. K., & Miller, J. D. (Eds.) The Handbook of Narcissism and Narcissistic Personality Disorder: Theoretical Approaches, Empirical Findings, and Treatments, 309-318.
[3] Campbell, W. K. (1999). Narcissism and romantic attraction. Journal of Personality and Social Psychology, 77(6), 1254–1270.
[4] Campbell, W. K., Brunell, A. B., & Finkel, E. J. (2006). Narcissism, Interpersonal Self-Regulation, and Romantic Relationships: An Agency Model Approach. In: Vohs, K. D., & Finkel, E. J. (Eds.), Self and Relationships: Connecting Intrapersonal and Interpersonal Processes, 57–83.
[5] Tanchotsrinon, P., Maneesri, K., & Campbell, W. K. (2007). Narcissism and romantic attraction: Evidence from a collectivistic culture. Journal of Research in Personality, 41(3), 723-730.
[6] Freyth, L., & Jonason, P. K. (2026). Mercenary predators: Individual characteristics of gold diggers. Personality and Individual Differences, 258, 113817.

The Goal Post Episode 77 – Japan Meetup / Radical Progressivism / SPLC Scandal / Claude Shannon

July 6, 2026 | by A Voice For Men Videos | Link | Original Link

An Open Letter To James Talarico

July 21, 2026 | by Doug Mortimer | Link | Original Link

Dear Mr. Talarico:

Seems like only yesterday we had a Senate election in Texas. Now we've got another one. For whatever reason, Texas holds its primary elections early, so I started seeing your yard signs in April, more than six months before election day. Frankly, in this house we abhor all yard signs, but that is a topic for another day. In Texas, one might as well complain about the heat in the summer.

I do admire the simplicity of your message, however. "Talarico for Texas," black print on a white background. Some of my friends opine that "Talarico for Massachusetts" would be more appropriate, which may be true, but it lacks alliteration.

In the three months or so since your signs started popping up, I've learned more about you. I think you'd be the first to admit you didn't have much of a statewide profile before you secured the nomination. Now I know you have been a member of the Texas House of Representatives since 2018 and you currently represent the 50th Texas Congressional District which covers a good portion of Austin. Now that the "getting to know you" phase is over, I have some advice for you.

I have noticed that your lack of a wife has been remarked about by your political opponents. The Texas Constitution states that one must be 30 years old to run for governor. If you were 30, your lack of a spouse might not arouse a lot of suspicion. After all, JFK didn't get married till he was 36. Of course, before that he wasn't exactly a monk. You, however, are 37 years old and, by all accounts, hardly a player. I realize that the lack of a significant other should have no bearing on your ability to represent the State of Texas in the U.S. Senate. Many voters, however, will feel otherwise.

I saw that you or your handlers decided to introduce a girlfriend into the mix. Supposedly, she is your former chief of staff, which makes it look like she's taking one for the team. Consequently, her enlistment has not allayed all the rumors swirling about your sex life or lack of same.

Frankly, I don't know what turns you on. Even so, I have a bit of advice for you. It's simple: Come out of the closet – even if you are a regular heterosexual guy. Let me explain.

There was a time when homosexuals running for public office had to keep it under wraps. Nowadays, however, it's not that unusual for a member of a legislative body or a cabinet, or the occupant of a governor's mansion to be an out-and-out homosexual. A mature bachelor, however, is still a rarity in politics. The late Lindsey Graham was one and rumors persisted throughout his tenure in the Senate.

Now there are any number of reasons why a man might choose to remain single. Unfortunately, as the percentage of single men has grown in society, its acceptability has not grown in proportion, either in society or politics. A lot of women voters might look at your youthful, clean-cut image (your nickname “Opie” is appropriate) and see you as the son they wish they had…dutiful, attentive, sensitive. One man might see you as lacking in testosterone (I understand “Low T Talarico” has gained currency among your political foes); another might see you dating his daughter and abhor your politics but breathe a sign of relief…no tattoos, no piercings, no drugs. She could do worse.

If you are low T, consider yourself blessed. A strong sex drive causes a man to dissipate his energies and squander time, energy, and money. Sad to say, most men don’t realize that until they are older and their testosterone levels have plummeted. So you have avoided stepping on a lot of land mines.

Your background as a seminarian is a double-edged sword. With some people, it’s a plus, with others a negative. Some see you as a man of God, others as a sissified mama’s boy. Of course, it is possible to be both simultaneously. Also, you could be a preacher and a rake at the same time. Given the overwhelming majority of females in churches, a preacher man has plenty of opportunities for dalliances – and there is the occasional femme fatale hankering to defile a man of the cloth.

Most women, however, would look at a man of God (Catholic priests excluded) at age 37 and assume that the lack of a wife indicates a failure to engage with the marriage sacrament. There are any number of reasons why a man, whether of God or mammon, wouldn’t want to make a commitment to a woman, but women don’t see it that way. The way they look at it, you haven’t knuckled under. You have not donned the yoke. You’re not one of those MGTOWs, are you?

As I said, the best rejoinder is to simply come out of the closet. Of all the reasons for explaining one’s bachelorhood, the most politically acceptable is homosexuality. All you have to do is say, “I’m gay” and everyone will just nod and say, “Oh, OK, whatever.” There’s nothing wrong with that. No one will ever bother you again about your lack of a spouse. In fact, adjectives like “stunning,” “amazing,” and “brave” might be attached to your campaign.

Of course, the danger of this is that one day you might want to tie the knot with a woman. How to explain that? Maybe say you were hetero-curious and much to your surprise, you found a female life partner. Or you can announce you are bisexual. Again, the response will be, “Oh, OK, whatever.” There’s nothing wrong with that either. Again, no one will complain.

In today’s topsy-turvy world, almost anything is preferable to being a single heterosexual male. If you were a heterosexual female, you could pull it off – you know, you don’t need no man. But if you are a single man who don’t need no woman…well, women voters in Texas won’t cotton to such a man, and in 2024, 6,037,000 of them voted compared to just 5,404,000 men. Also, keep in mind that there are some male voters who don’t trust a bachelor. They look at it as failure to “man up.”

I wish I could tell you that you could just go ahead and campaign as a confirmed bachelor. Unfortunately, as we say in Texas, that dog won’t hunt. Tell Texas voters you haven’t found the right girl. Or you’re too picky. Or you don’t want to settle for anything less than a devout spouse. After all, being a seminarian, you must have found it hard to find a decent Christian woman, what with all those stoners, sluts, floozies, and hussies in Austin.

When faced with the question, “Are you seeing anyone?” you might attempt to make light of your situation by explaining you’re still sowing your wild oats. Given your personality, that is guaranteed to garner chuckles and defuse the situation so you can move on to the issues of the day.

Granted, if you are elected, attending social functions stag in Washington would be awkward. You might seek out someone on Lindsey Graham’s staff for advice on how he dealt with that. On the other hand, I’m sure there is a discreet D.C. escort service that will be more than happy to supply you with a hottie to hang on our arm. Just be sure you don’t commingle your campaign funds with your personal services funds. And if you ever happen to get caught in some sort of sex scandal, many male voters of Texas who had written you off might figure there’s hope for you yet.

One photo op you might consider is a visit to Boy’s Town in Nuevo Laredo. I’m going to assume you’ve never been there, but there was a time when any man running for office in Texas would have paid a visit or two or three there over the years. In fact, a road trip to Boy’s Town was a rite of passage for most Texas boys. Now I am not saying you should hire a hooker. Rather, you should go there and preach, attempting to save the souls of those poor misguided souls working in La Zona. Religious voters will think highly of your mission inside the belly of the beast. Most men, however, will see you went to Nuevo Laredo and assume you went there for the same reasons they did. There’s more to that boy than meets the eye, they’ll say.

Unfortunately, a pilgrimage to Boy’s Town has negative connotations in some quarters. Way back in 1990 we had a rancher named Clayton Williams who ran for governor. He boasted of having been not only to Boy’s Town but also the Chicken Ranch, the famous brothel storied in song (“LaGrange” by ZZ Top) and drama (The Best Little Whorehouse in Texas), and conveniently located midway between the University of Texas and the Texas A&M campuses. Williams, unfortunately, did not get elected and Texas got stuck with Ann Richards. Drat that 19th Amendment!

It’s a sad state of affairs but almost any status aside from being a never-married heterosexual male is acceptable today. If you are a straight man, I understand you might be reluctant to lie about being gay in order to get elected.

Hey, it’s not like you’d be the first politician who told a lie to win an election.

The featured image is of Palo Duro canyon, Texas. By Sefor4 – Own work, CC BY-SA 3.0, Link