Return of Kings
ARCHIVE

compiled by /u/dream-hunter

www.TheRedArchive.com

■ ■ ■

Every single post from the blog Return of Kings in a single PDF file.

Disclaimer:

I am not the creator of the posts; all I did is compile the entire blog into a single PDF file. Every single post is credited by its author below the title of the post, along with a link directly to the post.

Please redistribute the PDF file to as many people as possible, as the information contained is priceless and future generations should have access to it. If at any time the PDF file is lost, it can be officially downloaded from TheRedArchive.com.

Enjoy, and if you are a fan of red pill, don’t forget to check my website TheRedArchive.com for an archive of content related to The Red Pill community including many subreddits and blogs.

Best Regards,

/u/dream-hunter

July 23, 2026

■ ■ ■

American Women Simply Can’t Compete

January 15, 2011 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

American Women Simply Can’t Compete

The short clip above shows the growing business of introducing American men with potential Ukrainian brides, something we’ve highlighted here in the past. Five comments:

1. How can American women compete with a girl like Galina (0:30). Answer: they can’t. I’m greatly enchanted by Galina’s body, hair, smile, nails, flinty voice, heels, carefree personality, and—most importantly—the desire to please a man. She didn’t even use the word “fuck” once. No wonder American women are so quick to shame men who go abroad for women—there will be less beta males to tolerate their slovenly appearance and entitled attitudes. Comparing Galina to your standard issue American woman is like comparing Grey Goose to moonshine.

2. The Ukrainian brides were much nicer to the older American men than the Ukrainian girls I approached in Kharkiv clubs. I had to work like a dog to get some love from them. It’s nice to know that if I’m ready to marry, their initial demeanor towards me will improve.

3. Amazing dance move at 1:17.

4. The ugliest broad in the entire clip is—yup—a feminist (1:24). What a jealous, moon-faced hag.

5. A dating consultant said of Ukrainian women: “If she’s beautiful, why should she be poor?” Damn straight. Along the same vein, if a man has money, why shouldn’t he have a beautiful woman?

I don’t know where I’ll be in life when I’m past 50, but I’m pleased that one option can be going to Ukraine and marrying a woman half my age who will serve me as long as I can provide for her. I can live with that.

Read Next: American Girls vs Ukrainian Girls

99 Responses to American Women Simply Can’t Compete

1. RASER
   January 20, 2013 at 4:01 pm
   PRIMO!**

   We like them because they are sexy and as simple as just women

Not the monsters that seem to have grown in the west

Long may it last!

Reply

2. Wald
January 20, 2013 at 4:02 pm
Natalia doesn't like it because she's not pretty enough to marry a foreigner.

Reply

3. Uncle Elmer
January 20, 2013 at 4:12 pm
I got laid off from Encorpera on my 50th birthday. Later that year I married my lovely viet bride at the historic Continental Hotel in Saigon. We have been together 5 years now. I discussed some of the issues in "ForeignBride Product Review : Finding a Model That's Right for You", and one point in particular is her ability to acclimate to the U.S should she move here. It may be easier for an Eastern European gal or a Vietnamese if you live near a large viet population. It's important for her not to feel isolated. I should follow that post up with a discussion of the paperwork you will have to process for her visa and green card.

Reply

4. Fourmyle of Ceres
January 20, 2013 at 4:16 pm
I'd be incredibly wary of this sort of thing. What's the divorce rate like? What's the marital satisfaction 5 years out?

Marriage is no escape from the laws of sexual attraction. If you can't land a girl like this using your own game, you probably can't keep one either. Eventually her gratitude for being lifted out of poverty will wear off.

Reply

- Wilson
January 20, 2013 at 4:47 pm
Slavic women don't age well, so in 5 years you'd probably be glad to trade her in. I imagine both sides of these transactions have done the math on pre-nups, alimony, and green cards, etc. and the rich guy is guaranteed that he'll get enough time with the mistress in return for his money, and the "exploited" woman is guaranteed she'll get enough money in return for her time.

Reply

- Roosh
  January 20, 2013 at 4:49 pm
  And American women age well? I'll give you asian/black/hispanic women, but just about all white women age poorly. Scandinavian women are the worst.
- Caliente
  January 20, 2013 at 5:22 pm
  Well this is true,all white women age quite fast
  .
  So what the point of pursuing them when you can get a nice Brazilian ass?
  Nothing beats Brazilians,full stop.
- corvinus
  January 20, 2013 at 7:35 pm
  Black and Hispanic women do age worse than white women, by getting disgustingly fat at twice the rate of white women. I'll grant that if they do keep their figures they usually age better. East Asian women seem to age best.
- anon1
  January 20, 2013 at 8:23 pm
  @roosh east asian women do this:
  http://www.bigwowo.com/wp-content/uploads/2011/01/asian_timeline.jpg fairly decent up until 50
- rocko

January 20, 2013 at 11:29 pm
thought british women age the worst.the reason white women age badly because they drink and smoke more frequently than other women. In asia women drinkin and smokin is seen as unlady like.plus western diet sucks and are sedentary.otherwise they could look younger, instaed they hope for the best through miracle creams

- Anonymous
January 21, 2013 at 3:48 pm
@anon1:

that graphic is full of WIN and so true…. I see so many Asian descent-ers with hot bodies during the partying days of their 20s and even into popping out/raising kids. But then…

- Krail
January 21, 2013 at 4:59 pm
This is true, but they're not the worst. They usually manage to keep until 30, sometimes 35. Then they melt, although they usually manage to stay thin. Western European/Caucasian women are the worst, followed by Slavic. Just my observation.

Asian women are another world entirely.

- Caliente
January 22, 2013 at 6:50 am
You cant distinguish Slavic and non Slavic people that much based on genetics.
There is no such thing as a true Slavic.The genetic is mixed.
Germans in general have massive admix of Slavic blood,if you put 10 naked german chicks next to 10 naked polish chicks you won't see the difference.
The region of Pomerania was populated by Slavs.Prussia was a land of a Baltic tribe called Prussians who were than slowly germanised.Sorbs,a minority living in germany,a re slavs.And so on.
Ethnic Russians-are not true Slavs.Russians is a 50%-50% mix between Finnic local tribes which lived there since stone age times and Slavic new comers from the West.They also have small admix of Scandinavian blood. But these are just ethnic Russians.Russia is populated by Tatars (Turks),asians,jews (most of the famous “russians” in USA are jews,not russians) and so on.

Bulgarians are not Slavs at all they are Turks,genetically speaking.They were conquered by small number of Slavs somewhen around 7th century.After that Turkic Bulgars from Asia settled there too.Than Osman turks came.The same is relevant for most of the so-called “Slavic”nations of the Balkans.

- Caliente
  January 20, 2013 at 5:25 pm
  are you from portugal Ceres?

  Reply

5. Caliente
   January 20, 2013 at 4:35 pm
   Yet another repost from my own comment (I am always late to these articles).

   I am a ukrainian and I will tell you one thing: its much easier to fuck an american girl than a ukrainian.It will also cost you next to nothing.A ukrainian girl is not stupid,and she perfectly knows why are you there.She will make you work your poor ass off in order to get laid,and its not even guaranteed.
   Kiev is full of foreigners.The budget airlines fly very very cheap to Italy,Germany and Spain.And,lets be honest,there is noway an American man can compete with an Italian,you simply have it wrong in states in terms of Ukrainian females taste.And you guys look and act goofy.Your fashion style is wrong,your game is not suave enough and so on.
   I have nothing against americans,in fact I have great american buddies,but let me just share my opinion here.

   Let’s look deeper.The marriage with a ukrainian is the most terrible thing you might do in your life.Unlike in states,pre-nups dont exist.Courts decide always in favour of a woman,children are given to women in 99% cases,a word joint-custody exists only in theory.Men usually don’t see their children after a divorce at all.
   Courts also automatically assign half of your properties to a woman.If there are children-also properties bought before the marriage must be split.

   If you consider bringing her to the States-than lol.I live in Western Europe and I fuck with ukrainian/russian girls from time to time-there is a massive community here.Most of them got married than divorced within 3-5 years,once they could get a permanent residence permit.Never ending story.One of my current FBs in fact lives with her husband,claims to live as “different people” but I dont believe this crap.

If you dont believe me-browse around the “foreign bride” forums and pua community sites.

Ukrainan culture is also quite a beta male culture (although they are significantly more alpha than americans for obvious reasons),but men don’t realize it .Men provide,men work,men try hard-and usually they end up with nothing.There is a russian expression which is tranlated as a “bitch pit”.These are families where women of 2-3 generation live together without any men around (either divorced or ruined psychologically they run away,become alcoholics etc etc).Every apartment block in Ukraine has several “bitch pits”.

The rate of divorces is staggering,I think its higher than in the States.60 to 70% of children nowadays grow without fathers.

Ukrainian women are not that hot as some advertise here.They are flat,pale,have terrible skin and hair,can not dance,tend to be passionless in bed,age much faster than other women and have terrible character.They have this strong believe than “a man is obliged” and than a list of demands follows.
I have been having sex with women from different countries too-and trust me hardly any Ukrainian can compete with a Spanish in bed.As Roosh have said-they are Bernie.Very good comparison,I ve been looking for it all my life.

Roosh might give some practical advices on pulling the chicks,but he has no idea what lays deeper.

Stop believing in BS about some magic Dysney place with feminine women who will be with you till death do you apart.

Reply

- 08nagaer
  January 20, 2013 at 4:55 pm
  Thanks for the warning, Caliente.

  Reply

- RASER
  January 20, 2013 at 5:26 pm
  <<American man can compete with an Italian,you simply have it <<wrong in states in terms of Ukrainian females taste.And you guys <<look and act goofy.Your fashion style is wrong,your game is not <<suave enough and so on.

  AMEN!

That's why the Italians are the worlds best lovers, also the nonsense that they go hunting for pay sex etc

FORZA ITALIA!

Reply

- corvinus
  January 20, 2013 at 7:27 pm
  Italian women are better than Eastern European women, IMO. There may not be as many knockouts in Italy as in Ukraine, and the sex ratio is more unfavorable if you're looking for women born in the 1980s or early 1990s, but given the choice, I'd take an Italian 9 over a Ukrainian 9 any day.

- He Man
  January 20, 2013 at 5:39 pm
  "If you consider bringing her to the States-than lol.I live in Western Europe and I fuck with ukrainian/russian girls from time to time-there is a massive community here.Most of them got married than divorced within 3-5 years,once they could get a permanent residence permit.Never ending story.One of my current FBs in fact lives with her husband,claims to live as "different people" but I dont believe this crap.
  If you dont believe me-browse around the "foreign bride" forums and pua community sites."

  Interesting.

  I definitely think this is true. A lot of the girls in the video Roosh posted look like amateur bikini models. In the states, these chicks would get lots of attention. It would be just a matter of time before they divorced these old dudes they are with, and headed off to party and live it up. Therefore, if these old dudes are dumb enough to marry and then bring these girls back to the states, then they deserve to be scammed.

  The only way these marriages even have a chance at working is if you marry them, start a family with them right away, and LIVE IN Ukraine as a retired business man.

  Reply

- The Renegade
  January 20, 2013 at 7:27 pm

whatever you are saying here is known to the observant western man who has incurred such incidents tenfold but only with much uglier / gender ambiguous / vicious women…

so what might appear to you as ukranian hell / bitch pit, is actually refreshing warmth and intimacy to the majority of americans, british, scandinavians and western europe in general to a certain extent.

Reply

- Steve
  January 21, 2013 at 9:46 pm
  "lets be honest,there is noway an American man can compete with an Italian" be honest with yourself, that is a ridiculous statement.

  Americans can't compete?

  Funny one. Perhaps its the red pumas with the jeans, Oh maybe its the extra strong gel, no no wait, its the casanova from Rome. It's Americans are just not macho enough. Are you really serious?

  My Italian buddies in NY thank you though..

  Reply

6. Caliente
   January 20, 2013 at 4:38 pm
   You are welcome to ask me questions and ofcourse argue with me.

   Reply

   - Paul
     January 20, 2013 at 5:34 pm
     Here in the west the reputation of Ukrainian woman is that they are very devoted to their family, very affectionate mothers and totally loyal to their husbands. That Ukrainian women stick with their husbands through thick and thin and even went with them into exile in Siberia in the old days. Is this not true?

     Reply

     - Caliente

January 20, 2013 at 5:42 pm
Lol.Absolutely NOT TRUE.
You refer to the wifes of Decabrists but this was 1815 my friend.Even back than it was pretty much fucked up-Anna Karenina is based on Tolstoy's knowledge of intrigues in the world of aristocracy.And Tolstoy himself commited suicide (he walked from home and never got back) because of constant bitching and betaisation from his wife.
The russian national poet Pushkin was killed by Dantes,because his wife was flirting with Dantes and the news spread too fast.

With regards to nowadays-I hardly know any full family in Ukraine.I also dont know any relationships wihich would last longer than 5-6 years.

I have lived in Benelux and there I saw much more proper marriages than in Ukraine.Yes,Belgian or Dutch men might be betaised but women do have quite strong morals over there and the law is very indifferent to the sexes.

- Iamfrench

January 20, 2013 at 8:51 pm
I second caliente. I work with a Ukrainian guy and he told me exactly the same thing about Ukrainian girls as caliente. You only have to listen to what the "Match-Maker" says in the YouTube clip. "A girl should trade in her beauty for provision". But what about an even better deal? If she divorces a beta provider, she can have her everlasting provision while keeping her beauty.

The best way for old men to get Ukrainian poosy is to pay for it "Goomar/Tony Soprano" style.

Russian, Ukrainian, Belorussian chicks know it and accept it. They go out with guys their age and serve the old massa on call. Of course if a man is beta enough to subscribe to a marriage service just to get introduced to Ukrainian girls (Like DiGregorio in this clip) he'll surely be fucked in the ass down the road.

If you're blatantly luring a girl with money then it's very foolish to let her be the mistress of the house. She came for money and will leave with half of it as soon as she has leverage (i.e. Permanent Residence, Green Card, Titre de Séjour etc.).

These guys are so lame, they spent money on "Match Making Service" instead of learning Russian. How can we have sympathy for them when she walks away with half of everything?

- Anon
  January 20, 2013 at 11:41 pm
  I think you raise some good points but the chip on your shoulder when it comes to Americans really detracts from your credibility.

  Reply

  - The Renegade
    January 21, 2013 at 11:40 am
    whatever you are saying here is known to the observant western man who has incurred such incidents tenfold but only with much uglier / gender ambiguous / vicious women…

    so what might appear to you as ukranian hell / bitch pit, is actually refreshing warmth and intimacy to the majority of americans, british, scandinavians and western europe in general to a certain extent.

7. Revo Luzione
   January 20, 2013 at 4:51 pm
   One of m best amigos married a ukrainian chick who came to the US at age 19. She was beautiful –could have easily been a model, and brilliant; at 19 she already had a university degree, spoke several languages fluently and got to the US. They got together when she was 20 and working at a restaurant. Married when she was 22, he was 30.

   She hit the wall harder than a Tyson knockout punch. To make matters worse, she went to grad school in the US and became a lawyercunt. The marriage was a sham, she was not putting out and was acting like a cold-hearted bitch. Perhaps those were her true colors.

   Anyway, it’s just one story. An N=1, as they say in science. I would like to see a study of long term happiness & divorce rates on these sorts of marriages.

   I agree that mainstream american women are all but undateable. The answer is not to simply look to other cultures–that’s a category error. The best strategy is simply to screen for LTR characteristics, low influence from feminism, high femininity, etc, no matter which country you find yourself in.

   Reply

- Caliente
  January 20, 2013 at 4:56 pm
  Dude,I would be happy to provide you the study if you would speak Russian.There is a massive community of russian speaking men who have swallen the pill too.
  With regards to the study of Ukrainian/american in States-I dont think there are ones.

  Btw,about education.Most of the degrees in Ukraine are very easy to obtain and standards are very poor,lets be honest.the corruption in Universities is berserk

  Reply
  - jurko
    January 20, 2013 at 11:49 pm
    gde community of redpill russian speaking men? ssylochka plz?
  - Caliente
    January 21, 2013 at 8:07 am sxodi na antiwomen (dot) ru//ff tam i literatury kucha imeetsja pochitaj Vit Vitalisa,O.Novoselova.
  - Caliente
    January 21, 2013 at 8:19 am eshe tut vse tozhe, no szhato: www (dot)bezvoprosov (dot)ru
- Matthew Walker
  January 20, 2013 at 8:44 pm
  A former boss of mine had a Ukrainian wife. He advised me to do the same. He was Turkish, and told me all about how Ukrainian girls are much more feminine than these hardass aggro American man-creatures. I was like “huh, ok”, but then one day I was in his office when she called. “Yes. Yes. Sorry. I’m sorry.

Yes, I shouldn't have done that. I'm sorry. I'm sorry."

Pretty painful to watch.

Of course, this dude had zero game.

I know another guy whose Ukrainian wife left him after he so-signed some college loans. He was a real prick, though. He deserved it.

Reply

- Caliente
  January 21, 2013 at 8:18 am eshe tut vse tozhe no szhato: www (dot)bezvoprosov (dot)ru

  Reply

8. Caliente
   January 20, 2013 at 4:52 pm
   1 more thing: feminism does exist in Ukraine too.Check the FEMEN group,they are famous all around the world.

   In fact feminism is an innovation of communism.Women in USSR got the right to vote way before the Western women.Already in 20s Soviet women drove tractors,worked in cole mines and so on.
   The USSR was always interested in increasing its population,so the law has been pro-female as back as 50s.Soviet men older than 23 even had to pay the tax for being childless.

   The pro-feminine brainwash in Ukraine is immense.Men are seen as the combination of an ATM machine/sperm bank and nothing else.

   I understand that my speech here is nude and lacks facts,but of you would speak Russian I would point to the right resources where you could read about it.

   I also think that Roosh contradicts too much feminist America with non-feminist Ukraine.It is not true.Ukraine has very strong "bitch" culture,very high percentage of women in power and managing positions and so on.Look at the book shelves there in relationships sections-95% of books are manuals of "how to be a bitch".

   Ukrainian women older than 25 also have quite shady CVs.A lot of them have been involved in forms of prostitution and so on.
   The traditional hooks:like ability to cook usually ends up when the "demo version"is over.

   So dont have your hopes too high.Go for Polish instead,at least they are catholic over there and have rather higher standard of living.

   Reply

- Iamfrench
  January 20, 2013 at 8:59 pm
  I second Caliente again. This is soooo true. I live in Montreal in a Russian/Ukrainian neighborhood and know of at least 3 three Russo-Ukrainian brides who divorced their Anglo-Canadian (French-Canadians are the least beta men in whole of white North America, they won't do anything like that. Plus to be on the safe side, if they do engage in this type of bride-procurement game, they marry Haitian, Senegalese, Togolaise 19 year olds. As pretty as any Ukrainian chic but much less fucked-up. Of course these girls speak French too. How can you control a woman if you can't even speak her language?) older husbands as soon as they got Permanent Residence while taking half of their assets at the same time.

  And keep it in mind, once you bring them to US/Canada, it's going to be very hard to make them put out at a regular basis ;-)

  Reply

  - Traveler
    January 22, 2013 at 1:18 am ya vraiment une communautée russe importante à mtl? je viens de revenir de 7 mois en ukraine…

    @caliente
    ya nie znaio chto ti dialesh…. patamu chta ti skazal eto prosto nie pravda v moy opit…. mojet bit ti nie xochish amerikansky muzchenie vtornugsya ukr ??

- Hugh G. Rection
  January 21, 2013 at 8:57 am
  USSR women got the right to vote? What good does that do if you can only vote for one party?

  Reply

  - Caliente
    January 21, 2013 at 9:06 am
    You are right,but it was just an example.

Communism created a woman equal to a man.A woman who does not need a man,a woman can do everything.And they did,especially in 40s and 50s.

Modern ukrainian women are taught by their mothers (who spent all their lifes working) that the best quality in a man is his ability to provide,but the man itself and his personality has no value whatsoever.

Its a very weird society where a woman still possesses all the power,but pretends to be feminine to lure men into her control.

9. Caliente
January 20, 2013 at 5:06 pm
These are the girls from FEMEN.

http://femen.org/en/about

FEMEN – is the name of the new woman

FEMEN – is the new Amazons, capable to undermine the foundations of the patriarchal world by their intellect, sex, agility, make disorder, bring neurosis and panic to the men's world. FEMEN – is the ability to feel the problems of the world, beat it with the naked truth and bare nerve. FEMEN – is a hot boobs, a cool head and clean hands. Be FEMEN – means to mobilize every cell of your body on a relentless struggle against centuries of slavery of women!

Reply

- [image] Uncle Elmer
January 20, 2013 at 7:25 pm
where have I heard this before?….

Oh yeah :

I am woman, hear me roar
In numbers too big to ignore
And I know too much to go back an' pretend
'cause I've heard it all before
And I've been down there on the floor
No one's ever gonna keep me down again

CHORUS
Oh yes I am wise
But it's wisdom born of pain
Yes, I've paid the price
But look how much I gained
If I have to, I can do anything
I am strong (strong)
I am invincible (invincible)

I am woman

You can bend but never break me
’cause it only serves to make me
More determined to achieve my final goal
And I come back even stronger
Not a novice any longer
’cause you’ve deepened the conviction in my soul

CHORUS

I am woman watch me grow
See me standing toe to toe
As I spread my lovin’ arms across the land
But I’m still an embryo
With a long long way to go
Until I make my brother understand

Oh yes I am wise
But it’s wisdom born of pain
Yes, I’ve paid the price
But look how much I gained
If I have to I can face anything
I am strong (strong)
I am invincible (invincible)
I am woman
Oh, I am woman
I am invincible
I am strong

FADE
I am woman
I am invincible
I am strong
I am woman

Reply

10. [image] Frederique
    January 20, 2013 at 5:07 pm
    Those marriage agencies are scams, don’t fall for it. In Mykolaiv for example the girls are in the restaurants, working in shifts to “chat” with men.
    They are ONLY interested in your money dudes… ONLY !!

    Reply
11. [image] Caliente
    January 20, 2013 at 5:48 pm
    For those who know Russian read the book of Oleg Novoselov
    The dude suffers from massive M/W complex but he has written an amazing insight into the world of women from ex USSR.

You would be quite depressed upon finishing it,I guarantee.

Reply

- [image] erik
  January 20, 2013 at 6:12 pm
  @caliente

  So actually besides their looks you don't recommend Ukranian women? They might be bitchy, golddiggers and unreliable? What are their positive karakter traits?

  What dating advice would you give for ukranian women?

  Reply

  - [image] Iamfrench
    January 20, 2013 at 9:06 pm
    Their positive trait is that they are sexy. But for marriage purposes the negatives outweigh the positives.

    You can find a sexual value totem-pole on Roosh's site. White women are on the top and they know they have a very high SMV. Once you bring them to the US/Canada and give them a legal status, it's like asking them to leave you with half your money.

    If you follow the same totem-pole methodology, the African (black) women are at the bottom and know it too. So once you marry them (or give them a legal status) they are much less likely to leave you since it'd be difficult for them to find another match. Well this is the French (and Québecois) method and it seems to be working (at least as compared to the Ukrainian Bride Trade) method.

  - [image] Caliente
    January 21, 2013 at 6:45 am
    Yes.Have sex but don't get involved.

    They don't have any positive character traits,except of not being politically-correct,like western women.

    Dating advice?Its pretty much the same as for any other women.

    1)accept the fact that ukrainian women are hypergamous.You will hardly ever find a young ukrainian woman who will be with 1 man only.Nobody will tell you this,but once you are into their world you will see.
    Exception might be with religious chicks from Western Ukraine (they are carbin copy of Polish) but you wont meet many of them.

    2)avoid slut-shaming and pre-jugmental talks.Again accept that she is fucking with many "projects" at the same time and get on with it.

    3)You will be "cheated".Get on with it.Be polygamous yourself too.

    4)NEVER speak bad of women from your country.If she asks -say they are very cool.If you American you might get something like-Americans are fat.Reply:”Well,yes but we have many immigrants from latin america.And latin women are very sexy,thin,passionate and they are good dancers.I prefer latin”. The test is passed,she wont have anything to tell you.

Be inventive.

5)Although its hard to go around paying for them-it is still possible.If she really likes you-she will be buying you drinks herself.My last ukrainian hook-up bought me drinks and paid for my cab.
But in general there is nothing wrong with buying them drinks,it does not decrease your value in their eyes like with western women.

6)Dont listen to their BS.Accept that she might be lying to you about her past.Ukrainian women loose virginity very early,around 15-16 and tend to have a massive number of parthners by the age of 25.

7)Ukrainian women are betaisation machines and they go straight forward,unlike western women.Their tests are obvious and hard.Get ready to this crap.You MUST pass them with flying colour.

8)Ukrainian women are very instinctual and primative (not primitive).Unlike women from north western europe (like holland,germany etc) they are ruled by the pussy and instincts not by their head.
Very often you might encounter a very reserved,calm and intellectual woman but than she might something absolutely unexpected and mind-blowing. Accept it and go ahead.

9)You are already beta,just by the fact that you are looking for women abroad.Whatever you say you are doing in Ukraine-they won’ t believe you (unless you are a director of some company or bank,but in this case you wont need a dating advice lol).
Try to turn it around.

- [image] erik
  January 21, 2013 at 7:46 am
  Well thanks, that certainly sheds some new light on it. The fact that they are polydaters contradicts a little with Roosh’s statement that they only have sex on the 3rd date.

  A man can also go to Ukraine because he likes exotic women, not because he has bad game in his own country…

- [image] Caliente
  January 21, 2013 at 7:58 am
  Normally I have sex with a Ukrainian woman on 2nd date.I have had some SNLs with Ukrainian girls.

  I never keep seeing a Ukrainian girl for more than 3 dates (except when its obvious that she wants to fuck but logistics does not allow.But this happened only couple of times in my life).

In fact if you don't escalate early enough a Ukrainian would loose interest to you herself even earlier than 3d date.

In december I pulled a Ukrainian chick in a club and made out with her.She told me that she had to work next day so I did not take her to my place.Later appeared to be that she went to a house of a Russian dude the same night and fucked with him.Huge mistake of me.

12. [image] the passenger
    January 20, 2013 at 6:09 pm
    Which race ages best? Japanese!
    See masako mizutani http://masakomizutaniblog.blogspot.com/
    43 yrs old! Wow!!! I can't believe it, speechless, amazing…
    Roosh, first engage in 2 year relationship with EE girl and then you'll see if you want her as a wife ;-)

    Caliente, good points. I'd say most of what you've said about polish chicks, there are exceptions but in general, it is a wise decision to stay single and have all options available. Once you'll marry…

    Reply
    - [image] Richard
      January 20, 2013 at 11:28 pm
      Wow she is incredible!!!
      Need me a Japanese woman :)

      Reply
13. [image] uiterstrechts
    January 20, 2013 at 6:16 pm
    Roosh, by the time you're 50, Ukrainian girls probably won't be like you see in that video. Lustration and economic liberalization will lead to greater wealth which will lead to higher standards of living which will lead to Americanization of Ukrainian women. Also, due to low birth rates, I wouldn't be surprised if Ukraine took in a fuckload of third-worlders which would not only bring in a cultural shift but also an influx of genetic material that isn't quite as pretty as what you see in the video.

    Reply
14. [image] taterearl
    January 20, 2013 at 6:24 pm
    Well even if it is a scam…at least you get a pretty girl with a good attitude in the scam.

    In America it's a scam too…but it's with an overweight, slutty, you go grrl, independent woman.

    Reply
    - [image] Tony H
      January 20, 2013 at 8:30 pm

Bravo sir.

Reply

- [image] Iamfrench
  January 20, 2013 at 9:15 pm
  Yeah but what about “Not being scammed at all”? And even better, what about “Scamming the scammer” by not marrying at all?

  Sex or marriage, in either case, is a transaction. Why would you do a shitty transaction if you can avoid it?

  The guys in this clip are all old guys who perhaps see marriage as an end game and the wife as someone who’d care for them as they grow old. This is an illusion especially if they try to buy their way in to marriage.

  I have a solution for them if they’re reading. If you’ve got money, go McAfee. Settle in Belize or Costa Rica or Panama or Cuba and bang as many as 20 year olds as you’d like. Of course you’ll have to pay for it but it won’t be like handing over your car and house keys to them and believe me you could also find 20 year olds who’d be willing to take care of you once they realize that you’ve got money and you are not a sucker.

  Reply

  - [image] Mark
    January 20, 2013 at 10:22 pm
    Agreed. Go Six Flags, Perpetual Traveler lifestyle to keep her away from a green card and America culture, and to keep your assets away from her.

    http://www.byebyebigbrother.com/pt_six_flags_theory.php

  - [image] Krail
    January 21, 2013 at 5:20 pm
    McAfee… is actually a tremendous beta. Feel in love with a 17-year-old who openly told him that she was interested in his money. She tried to kill him while he was sleeping. In response, he bought her a house.

    http://www.wired.com/threatlevel/2012/12/ff-john-mcafees-last-stand/

- [image] Iamfrench
  January 20, 2013 at 9:47 pm
  Haha. Who told you sh’d have a “good attitude” after marriage? Read what caliente and myself have written in comments.

  Reply

  - [image] lester_pole
    January 20, 2013 at 11:30 pm
    Yea like an US bitch will have good attitude after marriage. More like good fattitude. I’d go for the Ukranian marriage scam everyday at least you get good young pussy

- [image] lester_pole

January 20, 2013 at 11:27 pm
Best comment

Reply

15. [image] The Renegade
January 20, 2013 at 6:49 pm
The funniest part is the reporter is stunned to declare that men have spent THOUSANDS of dollars for the privilege, oh mine the scandal, they are much better off staying home and giving their disgusting leech american wives MILLIONS instead in alimony and divorce rape…

Reply

- [image] Caliente
January 21, 2013 at 12:24 pm
With a Ukrainian it will be the same-alimony and the divorce rape.
Both in Ukraine (as I mentioned the law there is very biased towards women) and in the USA (as an American resident).

It keeps amazing me how you guys praise intelligence of Ukrainian women,at the same time assuming that they are stupid enough not to figure out how to consult a lawyer once in the States.

Do you honestly think that that hot Tatar woman from the video (Galina) wants to be with an old fuck who looks like a clown in his suit?

Of course not,its a simple calculation,a trade-in.By her humble 20-24 she has been with many hot bad boys and alpha men,she has been fucked in the ass,has been in treesomes and so on.She knows what is a good sex,and what means being with an alpha male.She is not stupid.

Reply

16. [image] Wow
January 20, 2013 at 7:25 pm
Going to a foreign country to PAY for a bride smacks of extreme BETA. Get her with game, or don't get her at all.

If you bring her back and get ass raped after the bait and switch is complete…you deserve it.

Reply

17. [image] k
January 20, 2013 at 7:29 pm
How can such a marriage be sustainable. Maybe some guys have very good longtrerm experiences. Would like to read that

Reply

18. [image] Ruxman
January 20, 2013 at 7:33 pm
To what extent are the women attracted to the visiting Americans? Is that a concern to a man beyond his 40′s?

Reply

19. [image] 2mques
    January 20, 2013 at 8:30 pm
    When men have issues with their own women, they always seek better women elsewhere. Unfortunately, they're just trying to take advantage of what the men of other societies/cultures have already built. Men build their women in any society: what men are willing to produce and go to war for is what the women will become.

    If men are willing to work and fight for fat and entitled women, that's what they will become. The fact that American men have bought into this idea of all women deserving equal treatment, is the engine that drives feminism. Simply treat women differently and be upfront and honest about it, and see how quickly McDonalds and the rest would go out of business.

    Reply

    - [image] Dillon
      January 21, 2013 at 8:31 pm
      Great comment.

      Women don't have a choice but to follow men, for better or worse.

      Our no questions asked, State enforced, welfare for all women no matter what her behaviour brings out the worst in them. Just like a spoiled kid of a bad parent.

      Reply

20. [image] Adam
    January 20, 2013 at 8:30 pm
    Definitely some alpha fucks beta bucks shit going on here. Those girls all look like they got gangbanged in a porn or two and are now scrambling to jump ship before they splat against the wall. But shit, I totally understand the old dude beta-ing it out to some young pussy (that first girl was gorgeous!) instead of the average Americunt Lindy West looking fattie.

    Reply

    - [image] The Renegade
      January 21, 2013 at 11:44 am
      Again, compared to the majority of women in established western cities, even the sluttiest Ukranian girl there is an angel without wings. You can almost see the reflection of her halo on her milky white face.

      I'm betting 100k EUR that any man above average IQ would take a Ukranian prostitute with an advanced degree in medicine over the standard female American mindset of entitlement and vicious me me me attitude any day of the week !!

      Reply

21. [image] Iamfrench

January 20, 2013 at 8:37 pm
Lol…the “women’s right campaigner” is the ugliest female in this reportage

Reply

- [image] David
  January 20, 2013 at 11:15 pm
  That’s not “Lol”. That’s “Duh.”

  Reply

22. [image] Iamfrench
    January 20, 2013 at 9:30 pm
    I still don’t understand why these guys would:

    (1) Pay THOUSANDS of dollars to go “meet” Ukrainian women? They can actually “bang” fit, attractive, beautiful young women by spending a fraction of it by going to Thailand, Central America, South America etc. Hell they can even stay there. The weather is excellent and the $ goes at least 3X more than it would if you were doing the same thing in the US.

    (2) Why the fuck marry? I didn’t know men in their 50s could be this dumb.

    (3) Why don’t they try AT LEAST to learn the language? I guess US males (at least in this video) are as entitled as the US women (as they’re described on manosphere). I mean the guy wants to marry a girl and he’s using an interpreter. It’s sickening. This is 21st fucking century and these dumbos don’t even know how male-female interaction works at the age of 55.

    (4) Why the fuck Ukraine? Whatever happened to the Baltic Gravy Train? Romania? Bulgaria?

    I guess the only attraction is that these girls resemble porn stars (I’m very serious here) while the Asian, Black, Latino, Mestizo, Mulatto girls don’t look like they’re coming straight out of Playboy’s pages. In fact they look like they might be your next door neighbor’s nanny. It’s a pity that for these guys there’s a psychological stigma attached to banging non-white girls. I guess they’ll avoid this stigma by losing half their assets.

    I guess these oldies deserve to be ass-raped by these Playmates.

    Reply

    - [image] Athlone McGinnis
      January 21, 2013 at 3:21 am
      You figured the reason for the “pay to meet” thing out towards the end there and He Man also fleshed the answer out a bit. The premium these girls seem to get over Asians, Latinas and Africans is a racial one. Guys want the young, hot middle/upper class white suburban girls they see at home. I’m talking about chicks like the ones you’ll see on this page:

      http://www.rooshvforum.com/thread-3335-page-151.html

      The problem is that these girls have very high value in the west, which makes them relatively harder to get, especially for an older guy.

What to do?

If these guys are more open to other races, then they'll find paradise in Asia, Latin America, or (if you're like Naughty Nomad), Africa. Like you said, these are much more fertile hunting grounds than Eastern Europe and the guys have much higher value there.

Generally, though, the preference for girls who resemble the kind of young, white hotties they don't get much access to at home will lead them to Eastern Europe. This is a harder and riskier option than the alternatives I mentioned, but the dream of getting a hot young white co-ed at a "discount" normally justifies it.

TL;DR: Young white girls are considered more valuable by a lot of guys, white or otherwise. Simple as that.

Reply

- [image] Anonymous
  January 21, 2013 at 10:01 am
  True. I agree with it and that's what I said but these morons are trying to marry these scammers. God be with them.

23. [image] He Man
    January 20, 2013 at 9:48 pm
    "I guess the only attraction is that these girls resemble porn stars…"

    That is the attraction. These old geezers want to score with young, white hotties, but girls that look like these Ukrainian girls in the USA wouldn't give them the time of day (unless they were extremely rich), so they pay thousands to a matchmaking service to arrange dates with these girls in the hopes that one of these Ukrainian hotties agrees to marry them.

    Of course, if they are stupid enough marry and bring one of these girls back to the USA, then they will soon find out that these girls are nothing more than a "bait and switch."

    Reply
24. [image] David
    January 20, 2013 at 11:20 pm
    If men would employ Game properly – not merely as a pick-up tactic with skanks on Friday nights, but as a part of a larger life of manliness rather than the beta male behaviors encouraged and enforced by pop culture and the government – then there should be no difficulty in getting an American woman. American girls will naturally change to possess the traits advertised by these Ukranian women around alpha males. Because, in their hearts, women don't believe the feminist orthodoxy any more than Roosh does. It's just stupid and unnatural, and has only sustained because of Jewish financing.

So men, don’t seek salvation in high class Easter European hookers….accept as a very last resort. Work your Game first (not just pick-up, but diet, exercising, etc.). You’ll find things turn around for you.

Reply

- [image] Anonymous
  January 21, 2013 at 4:10 pm
  “jewish financing”….. and here comes the WNs…. instead of commenting on eastern Europe articles, shouldn’t you be fixated on marrying your Aryan goddess from Norway?

  Reply

25. [image] Pantalones
    January 21, 2013 at 12:56 am
    Not everyone is Pierre Woodman, huh? LoL
    Google HIM! LOL

    Reply
26. [image] Dillon
    January 21, 2013 at 1:58 am
    You can’t buy love, but you can buy an act, until money runs out.

    Reply
27. [image] OlioOx
    January 21, 2013 at 4:50 am
    @Caliente
    Post all your informative Russian language links! At least people can try to find russians to translate little bits at a time — you know, COLLECTIVE effort WINK

    And of course there is automatic google translate or whatever — so you translate, then send bits to russians for correction and so on. There is nothing to lose by trying!

    Reply

    - [image] Caliente
      January 21, 2013 at 7:27 am
      I think I cant post links here
      Go to antiwomen(dot)ru/ff forum.Great resource on advice about relationships and so on,also legal side of it.Many many stories of real russian and ukrainian marriages.

      There is a book of Oleg Novoselov (“woman.manual for men”).its in russian only never was translated.Ask somebody you know who speak russian to look it up for you.
      lib (dot)rus(dot)ec/a/61410

      You dont have to read only russian resources.I have come across some forums where western men share their experiences of marring russian chicks too.

      Reply

        - [image] Anonymous
          January 22, 2013 at 2:22 am
          Excellent Caliente… Google automatic translation probably isn't good enough yet for this kind of thing but it's a start. It was worth going to "Antibabsky site" just to see that logo of the mean old Russian babushka!

28. Pingback: Daily Linkage – January 21, 2013 | The Second Estate
29. [image] Caliente
    January 21, 2013 at 7:33 am
    The fundamental mistake I think is a believe that Ukrainian women are "old fashioned".Its much more complicated than this.

    You must understand that the traditional fabric of Russian and Ukrainian society was destroyed during the revolution in 1917.Civil war has wiped out many men and communism have proclaimed the equality of sexes at the same time.

    The religion-the main back bone of the traditionalist society was abanadoned as early as 1920s.

    I was born in 80s and I can tell you than in my school I hardly knew any children who would have a father or a full family.In a traditional Ukrainian family the woman rules,its like a basic thing.

    If you want a woman from a patriarchal society -go for mediteranean or other catholics IMO.

    Reply
    - [image] anon
      January 21, 2013 at 2:37 pm
      Great comments caliente… I've long felt something was amiss regarding the praise Eastern Europe women were getting around these parts. Your posts here have confirmed my suspicions.

      This post here also supports another theory I have: We're on the same trajectory. It is Russia that has won the Cold War, and the future of the West looks a lot like the USSR post-collapse.

      Could America be the poosy paradise of the future?

      Reply
30. [image] AssNeck
    January 21, 2013 at 10:07 am
    Only marry if you want kids. Or maybe if you are in your 70s and want a younger woman to bang and take care of you in your declining years.

    I knew two guys who got Eastern European mail order brides. They both had Russian boyfriends and they both left the suckers who brought them over here.

    That being said, it might be better to actually move over there if you really want an Eastern European wife.That is much less beta.

    Reply

- [image] Caliente
  January 21, 2013 at 12:39 pm
  I'm one of those guys right now.As I mentioned I have an FB who lives with her western husband.
  She comes and spend nights in my place and I have no clue what she says to him,but they keep living together and he has not attempted to throw her out at all.I also think I am not the first one.
  As far as I can see a lot of them do this.And I think its natural- a woman is a woman and she wants to fuck.

  My last Ukrainian LTR was flirting with her Swiss client on her phone pretty much in front of me and was making fun of him.I did not care that much,but I think she has been to dates with him otherwise he would not be so invested.This guy was trying to qualify really hard btw,was telling her about his kids and so on.

  Reply

31. [image] AssNeck
    January 21, 2013 at 10:10 am
    "The religion-the main back bone of the traditionalist society was abanadoned as early as 1920s."

    Yes, I believe Solzhenitsyn spent his latter years trying to reinvigorate the Orthodox church in Russia.

    Reply
32. Pingback: Is it Fair? « M3
33. [image] Eddie Morra
    January 21, 2013 at 12:19 pm
    Actually if you look at Russian/Ukrainian women who have immigrated abroad and have been there a while, they don't age as fast. I would rarely consider dating a Ukrainian woman over 40 in Ukraine, but (especially in a western European country) I'd think twice. Just have a look at Slav women on some of their dating sites in countries outside the FSU and you'll see what I mean…..

    Reply
34. [image] slowness
    January 21, 2013 at 4:17 pm
    caliente, great insights…
    i think the most important disqualifier for the foreigners is: "what the hell are you doing here, chasing us? you obviously can´t make it back home".
    case closed.

    Reply
35. [image] Onder
    January 21, 2013 at 4:43 pm
    Slavic and Russian women in particular definitely don't age well. Could be due to the Soviet Union back in the day but i'm still quite wary.

I remember going to Turkey and i stayed in a hotel in Analya full of Russians and Germans. And all i saw were old aged Russian women who were all busted. They made American women look like prom queens.

The very few young ones that were there were like the ones seen in the video.

I don't know about anyone else but i'd much rather be with a girl who will grow old gracefully rather than bare having to see her become more monstrous with age.

Either that or i'll simply marry them when i'm old and not be alive to see them get that old…lol

Reply

36. [image] vader
    January 21, 2013 at 5:14 pm
    Is she going to marry me

    Reply
37. [image] DJ
    January 21, 2013 at 5:46 pm
    Great post Roosh! Well I am 42 and would NEVER date or marry an American skank after having lived and traveled the world. Planning to learn Russian, Polish and Brazilian Portuguese to spend some good times overseas.

    Reply
38. [image] Rich
    January 21, 2013 at 10:07 pm
    Ukraine females are glorified Roma whores. I say leave them to their back alley coat hanger abortions.

    Reply
39. [image] Armenian
    January 21, 2013 at 11:08 pm
    The free market prevails!
    Provider men are in demand in Ukraine and feminine women are in short supply in America

    Reply
40. [image] Sundance
    January 22, 2013 at 1:25 am
    I can attest to what some of the comments are saying. Although not Ukrainian I dated a Macedonian chick and I know their culture is also more blatantly opportunistic when it comes to beautiful women extracting a 'price' for their beauty. Hell it's hard-wired into a women's DNA. All good, just employ an exit strategy.

    Clientele – you're a trip dude. Love your insights and straight talk. Regarding your whole Beta American Man bit – yeah Beta's are plentiful. But America is a big, big place -plenty of "Alpha's" if that's how you refer to them. They are definitely not the chumps you'd see flying 3000 miles to meet a bride. Seems to be turning around regarding weak-ass pussy men. That shit doesn't fly like it did a few years ago.

Reply

41. [image] Sundance
    January 22, 2013 at 1:27 am
    * Caliente

    Reply

42. [image] corvinus
    January 22, 2013 at 2:22 am
    I would concur with Caliente and those others who recommend one use game on Ukrainian girls as assiduously as you would on Americans.

    After all, it's old betas are the ones getting ripped off, because they assume the women they're dealing with are Good Girls. No girls are Good Girls, unless maybe they're hyper-religious, and then you probably wouldn't want that kind anyway! Studying game is essential. It may seem like you're smooth sailing with foreign girls, but don't kid yourself. Caliente is right in one respect, although I would disagree with his assertion that Ukrainian girls aren't better on average than American girls. First of all, there's the fact that one-third of American girls are overweight or obese, and that's actually worse than India or China where a somewhat smaller fraction don't exist due to having been aborted.

    Besides the problems with American girls being fat and in insufficient numbers to go around, I also like foreign girls because I have been more isolated from mainstream American culture and, even though I'm American, I don't really fit in with the women in my own country. For instance, to pick two obvious examples, I like classical music like Mozart and Beethoven, and have a knack for foreign languages. Getting an American 9 or 10 would be extremely difficult for me, simply because I'm not in the social circles the 9s and 10s would be circulating in, and for hot, in-demand American girls, who live in a constant sausage-fest due to their scarcity, that's all that really matters.

    Every American man should expat to Europe (or another part of the world with lots of hot women) at least once, preferably multiple times. I know I intend to spend as much time as possible over there, and it appears my younger brother is jumping on the bandwagon as well.

    Reply

43. [image] dannyfrom504
    January 22, 2013 at 4:31 am
    my friends wife is from Laos. she offered me her 20 year cousin. i saw her in a pictue and DAAAAAAMN!!!! she was slamming.

    "all you have to do is fly her in and she's your."

    i thought it was a joke until husband (a good freind) said, "no she's serious. i met her, she's hot."

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

Welcome To Return Of Kings

October 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Welcome to my new project. Here is what I wrote on the about page:

> Return Of Kings is a site for masculine men who like having sex with thin, feminine women. It's meant for a small but vocal collection of men in America today who believe men should be masculine and women should be feminine.
>
> ROK aims to usher the return of the masculine man in a world where masculinity is being increasingly punished, shamed, and—in some cases—outlawed, all in favor of creating an androgynous and politically-correct society that is allowing women to assert superiority and control over men. The site aims to be a safe corner of the web who don't agree with the direction that Western culture is headed.

Compared to RooshV.com, ROK will feature shorter posts on a wider array of topics.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Women Are Disappointing Their Feminist Masters

October 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is concern that women want to be women…

> [Pinterest's] popularity highlights an uncomfortable reality: Pinterest's user-generated content, which overwhelmingly emphasizes recipes, home decor, and fitness and fashion tips, feels like a reminder that women still seek out the retrograde, materialistic content that women's magazines have been hawking for decades — and that the internet was supposed to help overcome.

Any guy who has studied internet game around the early 2000's has heard of the term "chick crack," which refers to a woman's propensity to discuss topics like psychology, astrology, handwriting analysis, soap operas, and so on. The best way to lose a girl is to go deep by talking about philosophy, economics, or other topics that men don't mind discussing. So it's surprising feminists don't understand that, when given the choice, women rather go shopping, talk about celebrities, and watch reality television than discuss ways to save the world.

Ironically, the less you respect a woman's intelligence, the more you will retain her interest long enough to get her into bed. You can't turn a millenial chick into a philosopher, no matter how much you educate her.

[Buzzfeed: How Pinterest Is Killing Feminism]

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World

October 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book is an attempt to apply libertarian philosophy as a template for a person's entire life instead of just for the political realm, with most of its advice concerning personal relationships.

"You have tremendous control over your life, but you give up that control when you try to control others."

The author tells you to embrace other people's natures while listening to your own, and to go after your own interests above all others, even that of your family. This book could be retitled "Finding Freedom Through Selfishness," and it's pretty close to how I've been living my life the past ten years.

Instead of trying to change the broken culture I come from, change American women, or change bosses I didn't like, I simply constructed a lifestyle from the ground up based on my personality and needs. Instead of protesting and trying to change the world, I changed myself (starting with learning game) and worked around the system to get what I want. This strategy has worked for me.

"You're in the identity trap when you try to be interested in something because it's expected of you, or when you try to do the things that others have said you should do, or when you try to live up to an image that others say is the only legitimate, valid image you're allowed to have."

The book encourages you not to bother trying to change the world. Work on changing yourself and finding your own happiness. Let other people waste their energy in fruitless endeavors where they must convince thousands or millions of people in order to make small, incremental changes. Fuck the herd and beat to your own drum.

“Improve your own situation without having to go to the trouble of making others agree with your way of thinking.”

Read this book if you want a great motivator to get off your ass and make a big change. All the excuses you probably make to prevent yourself from acting will be addressed in this book, which is like a 4-Hour Workweek from the 1970s that covers all aspects of your life instead of just money.

“There’s always a way [to happiness]—as long as you’re not looking for ways to change others.”

[How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World]

(Originally reviewed at RooshV.com)

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Pictures Of Felix Baumgartner’s Girlfriend Nicole Oetl

October 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

At 26 years old she’s not a bad-looking girl, but 43-year-old Felix may want to consider cashing in his fame for nonstop groupie action.

Jonny
Life

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why Pickups Fail

October 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Last summer in Poznan, the going got tough where I was no longer getting one-night stands on weekdays. I had to fall back to day game and long-form dating in order to keep my sexual activity at a desired level. Nonetheless, every night I went out my goal was still to get laid. Numbers and kisses aren't bad, but I want to completely seal the deal with a new chick whenever I step out of the door.

For those two summer months, I started to collect reasons why I didn't get the same-night bang. Many nights had multiple causes for failure. Here are reasons I tracked, from most frequent to least:

25%: Could not isolate solid prospect from her social circle

19%: Not enough women in the venue(s) I went to 13%: Girls I connected with most had a boyfriend

6%: Girl was 100% firm in not fucking same night

6%: I wasn't horny enough to make committed approaches

6%: I failed to venue change to my place after the kiss

6%: No girl was buying what I was selling (nothing but rejections all night long)

6%: Deadly late game cockblock

6%: Escalated too early and scared girl away

3%: Just wasn't feeling it

I noticed that reasons for failure fall under three categories.

1. The environment (e.g., not enough girls)
2. My own ability or mood (escalated too early, wasn't horny)

3. Combination of the above two (couldn't isolate)

My goal was to reduce failure in situations that I could affect. So I made three immediate changes:

1. I started asking girls if they had a boyfriend. This helped me avoid girls who weren't serious about having sex.
2. I avoided girls in big groups. Isolation and cockblocks are consistent issues with group approaches.
3. I ditched girls who put out a prudish vibe.

With the three changes I made, I ended up talking to less girls per night but got slightly more closes (a kiss or more).

Log reasons for failure in the next month or two. Every night you don't reach your goal (getting a number, kiss, or one-night stand), write down why you failed. Look at that list after a while to see if there's any changes you can make which would improve your odds. My decision to quickly screen for Polish girls with boyfriends, for example, saw an immediate positive change. While a big part of getting laid is to repeat actions that are working, sometimes it's more about avoiding behaviors or situations that you're sure are not helping you reach your goal.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Case Is Building Against South Korean Women

October 17, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A guy recently went to South Korea and didn't have much luck with women until him and his buddies put down $1,100 for bottle service at the club.

> Currently as of October 2012, the most happening night club is Octagon in Nonhyundong. Again, status is king here. I went twice this past trip: the first time I ran regular dance and bar game and got probably an 80% blowout rate, a few numbers, and one tiny makeout before the girl got pulled away by her friends to some other dude's table. The next night, I swallowed my pride and bought a table with a couple of other guys. At 1.2 million won ($1100 tax/tip included) split four ways, it was roughly the same as an LA club (infinitely cheaper than Vegas though)… After opening girls on the dance floor, I'd say at least 50% came upstairs with us after finding out we had a table.

This man had to spend $275 just not to get blown out. How about day game?

> Even if your Korean is super tight (mine isn't, I speak at a 70% mark and I have a 2-100's ratio) day game is not the way to go in Seoul. Korea is still considered the most Confucian country in the world, and that philosophy teaches strict hierarchies in society: people are taught from an early age that you should know the status of who you're talking to, and if you're some joker off the street, this totally goes against that mantra.

Another guy chimes in to say that while South Korean women are attractive, they're hard to get in the sack:

> they're very sexually conservative, you're not doing ONS'es there, in fact you'll > be lucky if you can bang her in under a month, and you'll probably have to commit, at least in words if not deeds, to being her "boyfriend".

Later in that thread you'll find this:

> I went out with this Korean chick the other day. We went to a bunch of places. Dinner, her college campus etc over two hours before I took her to a bar.
>
> She would not even sit next to me at the bar because she thought it would be "too forward" to sit next to a man she had only known for 2 hours.

Even if you meet your dream South Korean girl, you'll need to fork out a serious stack of cash to walk her down the aisle:

> in South Korea a couple wanting to get married also needs cash, a lot of it – nearly $200,000, or more than four times the average annual income.
>
> The sky-high costs stem from a combination of cultural traditions that mandate expensive pre-wedding gifts between families, such as mink coats and diamond rings, along with a decades-old custom that the groom must fork over money to provide a home.

The only compelling reason to go to South Korea is if you want to make some cash teaching English. If you go solely for the women, you may be disappointed.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

October 18, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently read a quote that said, “Economics is the study of secondary consequences.” Then feminism would be purposeful blindness to secondary consequences, which are coming home to roost as we speak.

> The reality is human biology makes it impossible for a large percentage of women to focus on casual sex and professional advancement to the degree that feminism insists is only natural. The reason for this is children require more investment than women themselves can provide. Women who want to be mothers need to extract resources from men in order to be truly successful parents. Many have looked at the success of a small number of widows in raising their children without the help of a husband and assumed husbands and fathers aren’t really necessary. However, what is possible as an exception isn’t something we can build a society on. Aside from those who started with great wealth, widows have always struggled to provide for and raise their children. In a healthy society made primarily of husband lead households they also benefit from an in tact social and familial structure.

While mankind concludes its great feminism experiment, today’s men are getting reamed for something that, ultimately, will collapse.

> There is insufficient incentive to keep the mass of men producing at the levels needed to transfer enough wealth to women.

[Dalrock: How the destruction of marriage is strangling the feminist welfare state]

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Why You Should Be Thankful For “Girl Power” Songs

October 19, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This catchy Pink song is about her breaking up with a long-term boyfriend. These types of girl power songs have at least two of the following three components:

1. How she was a great girlfriend.
2. How he wasn’t that good of a man.
3. How easily she was able to move on.

Here’s component two of the Pink song:

> I won’t miss all of the fighting that we always did,
> Take it in, I mean what I say when I say there is nothing left
> No more sick whiskey dick, no more battles for me

And now component three. Take a look into how she’s going to get over a man she obviously loved:

> I’ll dress nice, I’ll look good, I’ll go dancing alone
> I will laugh, I’ll get drunk, I’ll take somebody home

Pink is telling impressionable young girls that if things don’t work out with your man, to dress hot, get drunk, and quickly sleep with another guy. Who does that benefit? Men looking for easy sex! We need to encourage the idea that the best way to get over a boyfriend is to bang a lot of guys.

Taylor Swift had a similar song. Take a look:

> We are never ever ever getting back together
> We are never ever ever getting back together
> You go talk to your friends, talk to my friends, talk to me (talk to me)
> But we are never ever ever ever getting back together

Does having more single women on the dating market make it easier or harder for men to meet women? Easier. All these songs that promote dumping men in favor of freedom should be embraced by those men who like casual dating. So don't judge me when I'm blasting Pink—I'm doing it to benefit men.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Get Up In The Morning Without Hitting Snooze

October 20, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For those of you who have a 9-5 job, I'm guessing you set the alarm at a time that gets you to work right on schedule. Then there are the self-employed guys like me who don't have to get up at a certain time. My old habit is to set the alarm at 11am and then hit the snooze button until my alarm gives up. I wouldn't roll out of bed until after noon. I realized that this was costing me a lot of work time so I did some research to solve the problem. The solution, it turns out, is not getting a second alarm or one of those gizmos that rolls around your room until you can find it. It's visualizing your plan to get up the night before.

Here's what I do: when I set my alarm at night, I tell myself that when the alarm rings in the morning I will sit up immediately. For the next three minutes I visualize getting up without hitting the snooze button. Then I go to sleep. When the alarm rings in the morning, my response is now automatic, with no snooze button weakness. I already mentally prepared for the scenario so it plays out just like how I rehearsed: I sit up in bed and turn off the alarm. (Important tip: never turn off the alarm while you are laying down!) Then I sit upright in bed until I gain enough power to stand up. Try it!

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Sausagefests Are Good For You

October 21, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Several years ago I co-hosted a dozen DC blogger happy hours. Most of the attendees were blogger women who lived in the city, and Virgle Kent and I had slept with just about all of the pretty ones (no exaggeration). But after overweight women infiltrated the circle, we had to stop going because happy hours deteriorated into something resembling this:

After being away for so long, it was time to throw another happy hour—not to get laid but to exchange notes with other men. On October 13 we met on the rooftop of Brixton bar in the U Street area of DC. My favorite recap comes from Mentu, who got experience the horror of DC women firsthand:

> Manosphere writers are complete dicks.Never in my life have I shoulder-checked a bitch, but after watching one of our esteemed writers knock a princess into the railing on the sidewalk after she refused to move out of his way, I decided to give it a try. DC women can be rude as hell, so after the third or fourth time of literally being physically pushed out of the way, I shoulder-checked the fuck out of some little tart, and she spilled her drink on her sleeve. I did that twice last night, and it felt great. I don't know who in the hell these women think they are, but throughout the night, I refused to move out of a woman's way unless she met me halfway and showed a moderate amount of decorum. It was a new experience for me, since I never have to do that in Texas. The women folk down here have their share of problems, but at least they act like human beings and carry on as part of a society.

Bronan turned the meetup into a weekend adventure. Part one focuses on his night with Virgle while part two concerns the meetup.

> I hung back with the blogger guys, approached by the occasional forum member. I spent most of the night pretending to be Private Man. Several fans told me that they read "my" (PM's) blog all the time which was bullshit since PM is older than Methuselah, the Crypt Keeper and God combined and I'm clearly a total stud in his prime. Lots of beginners came out and it was cool to talk to dudes who were just getting into game and give them some encouragement. One basement dweller kept claiming to be the author of G Manifesto and I overheard some dude claiming to be Roissy, so there were a few fakes on the prowl. I hadn't bothered much with approaching since we had created DC's Ultimate Sausagefest of Dick Doom, but VK had gone all in with a short latina chick.

The best recap from a non-blogger came from Samseau, one of more popular posters on RVF.

> "Let me guess…. You're Matt!" This must have been Roosh's canned opener for the evening, but it was true that there were 6 or 7 Matt's there. I corrected him and introduced myself, and when he asked if I was from the blog or the forum I indicated myself as Samseau. Immediately he became quite animated and excited to meet me.
>
> Over our many conversations we had that evening, Roosh touted the advantages of growing older in the game, and the things myself and other guys could look forward to as we approached 30. We talked about how foreign women were superior in every way in comparison to domestic. Roosh told me of his next moves throughout the world, and the gave me words of encouragement towards building a more international lifestyle.

Bill Powell gave his thoughts on attending and how DC now has a special place in his heart…

> I've got to admit, DC is a nice place. I'd never had the opportunity to wander the streets like I got to this past weekend and my impression is that it's clean, relatively crime free at least in the areas I was hanging out in but there is an underlying current of classism. Let me explain.

Another reader almost got laid, but got cockblocked in the end..

> It was a good 10-minute walk down U Street to get to The Brixton. I walk in and make my way up to the rooftop. The first thing I notice when I get there is that it's a sausage fest. This is no surprise as I assume that its men who predominantly read Roosh's blog.
>
> When I first meet Roosh, he's taller and more in shape then I thought he would be. Virgil Kent was suited up and as expected, a chill, cool black dude.

After all was said and down, how many guys got laid? I know of five. If you saw how many guys were at the Brixton, that number is nothing short of miraculous.

The meetup was such a success that I'm already thinking of where to hold the next one. How does Poland sound?

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is It Easier To Get Laid In Poor Countries?

October 21, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

If you're a guy without life experience, you think money is the end-all-be-all for getting laid, that you don't need to work on your appearance, social skills, logistics, and so on. You think that any American man can go to a poor country like Ecuador and score with only models.

If you're a guy who has been around, on the other hand, you know that it gets more complicated. Poor girls don't primarily want sex from rich guys, they want his resources. To lock up those resources, she will dangle the prospect of sex until he gets whipped for her. This is easy to see in places like Colombia or Ukraine, where certain types of girls string along foreigners while maintaining sexual relations with local men (here's an example).

The best way for a guy with game to get laid is to meet a lot of women who want sex. But women who are poor don't go to the nightclubs (without men). Women who are worried about survival are less horny. Women who don't have a job lack reliable internet access to use dating sites. In other words, poor countries and poor women mean less notches.

When the economy is good and job prospects solid, girls don't seek comfort and stability in men, they seek fun and casual sex. They avoid monogamy This is why there is no shortage of one-night stands in the United States, England, and Scandinavia even though the countries are rich (problem is they lack quality). Love tourists need to find a sweet spot where the economy is good but the quality is high. I think right now that place is Central Europe, specifically Czech Republic, Poland, Slovakia, and the Balkans. By the time Western culture destroys Central Europe, prosperity will have moved eastward to Lithuania, Romania, and Ukraine, making them economically sound enough to sustain love touristy.

The crisis that is enveloping Europe is bad news for love tourists. While the world adoption of Facebook and smartphones is a worrying trend, what concerns me most is poverty. You simply can't pick up girls who don't go out. You need a strong economy for them to visit places that you also spend time in. This means that every time you hear news that Europe is doing poorly, your job just got a bit harder.

2 Responses to Is It Easier To Get Laid In Poor Countries?

1. RobP says:
   October 22, 2012 at 6:24 pm
   Roosh-can you say more about why daygame, with invites to a "party" you're hosting at your apartment doesn't work better in poor countries? Sort of a riff on your "after-party" success in Iceland. . . .

Reply

2. Jason says:
October 23, 2012 at 5:55 am
The central European countries are still poor by western standards. The average American/West European makes 2x more than the average central European, and the number is even higher in eastern Europe.

You still receive a substantial status boost if you're American/W. European because not only are you likely to be far better off than the local men, but there is certainly a stereotype in those areas where people from the author's part of the world are seen as wealthy.

The fact of the matter is: women crave power. Money = power in its most raw form. The fact that the author is playing down his relative wealth/status in poor countries (like I said, central Europe is poor by Western standards) demonstrates that he's:

1. Trying to sell you on some abstract idea of "game," being some sort of magic bullet for getting girls to fuck you

2. Rationalizing his own failures in the West

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

When James Bond Met A Lesbian

October 22, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There was a mediocre article recently in The American Conservative about the enduring masculinity of James Bond. It had one great quote worth sharing…

> That's what a half-century of self-entitlement does to a society: it takes the backbone out of people while simultaneously giving them notions of grandeur. This makes them malleable. Make enough people malleable and you can make them, en masse, believe in any fancy or whim. Want to know why gay marriage is inevitable? Because today's man, coerced into believing in his own emasculation, would introduce himself to a lesbian named Pussy Galore by saying: "I respect your lifestyle choice." When James Bond met a lesbian named Pussy Galore, he slept with her.
>
> James Bond: the opposite of self-entitlement.

The reason that liberalism gets attacked so frequency in the manosphere is that it's seen as the ideology that promotes entitlement and emasculation. Conservatives are full of enablers as well, but liberalism seems to lead the way. If you consider that feminism has used the liberal platform to advance its agenda, this shouldn't come as a surprise.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Who Is Mark Minter?

October 23, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There is a commenter named Mark Minter who is dropping anti-marriage bombs all over the manosphere. His first hall of fame comment comes via Donlak:

> This is the most ridiculous logic I have heard. To call someone a pussy that counsels not to get married because of the risk is blowhard bullshit. You have a 1 in 1,000,000 chance of dying when you leave the house. You have 1 in 2 chance of divorce. 1 in 2. My opinion and observation of data is that your odds are higher if you marry someone attractive. Higher still if you were a player. So go to a roulette wheel and bet 40% of all of your future income on the red or the black. Same thing. It depends on your definition of Game. Some say Game is proactive and allows you to get the best out of life. I think it is somewhat reactive. I say it is defensive. Game enables you to avoid Oneitis and to make sane and rational decisions, to not be dragged, tricked, or manipulated into marriage.
>
> You ever been married for 17 years? I have. I know what it is like. I know the boredom you will experience. I know what it is like to be chained to a career that is not your choosing because of the financial pressures placed on you. I am a expert at mid 19th Russian history because my fucking wife went to bed early for 10 years. Ask me how much mid 19th century Russian history I have read since divorce. None. I spent this weekend watching every college game on TV.
>
> The odds are you probably will end up divorced. You don't know how to be married. You think you do and you think that Game might help to avoid divorce.

Fuck off. The only way you will stay married is if she has no better alternative to you. And if you have no balls. If you are a nice little handyman, if you stand around and hold her coat and let her direct the movie, then she might just let you keep on being her slave. All this talk about Game saving you from divorce is pretty recent and to me, mighty suspect with what I know about being married. My opinion is that if you are a lion, then you will be divorced. If you are a mouse then you might be divorced. You have to toe the line of what women think is the "good dad" and you will have to subordinate yourself to the woman's definition of the "greater good". Both me and my brother-in-law were faced with a situation where both of us had vetted wives based on the fact that they would work. "Sure. Sure. We love to work. We're modern women". Then when the kids came both wives quit or got fired. They were both faced with some tough situations at work and both sat down. "My baby needs me." Fuck that. She didn't work anymore and used the convenient justification. Both, my brother-in-law and I freaked out. Both women felt absolutely justified. "People change. When I said I would work, I didn't know the reality of how much I would want to be with my child." You can say same about a ton of things, where you live, how much money is acceptable, how big a house. Also, my wife was supposed to inherit about 7 million dollars from her dad and then the dad re-married, out of the blue, right before he died, and the new wife took a great chunk of that money when the will was changed. My ex-wife figured, hey a few million isn't enough for two people to live on so it is in her advantage to ditch this guy before her dad died.

Fine, marriage might work out for you. It probably won't and you will fuck yourself bad. It happens to 1 in 2 men. 1 in fucking 2.

This might be the first time I have read this blog and I don't know man, but I certainly will filter anything you might write after this. This is pure hyper macho "Real alphas aren't afraid to marry". Fine, get a revolver, but 3 bullets in it, spin the chamber, and put it to your head. Same thing, buddy. 1 in 2 man.

The essence of modern divorce law is that it changes the classical trade of surplus labor for sex. Once anyone can receive the benefit from any deal without supplying their part then you can bet your ass that they will use the situation to their advantage. Dalrock wrote last week that the modern church preaches that it is the duty of the woman to withhold sex to coerce her husband into acting "right" as she defines "right" to be. Fairness never enters into it. "He won't go to Home Depot with me because I want to change all the light switches in the house because I don't like them and he wants to watch stupid football instead". That's justification enough for her to withhold sex. Or "I'm too tired. I have my job and the kids." or any 100s of reasons that the hamster will use to justify it and you can do nothing to keep it from happening. So then when she has starved you out for 6 months and then you look at porn after hours and hours of being alone, then "Aha, he looks a porn and I am justified in divorcing him". The law gives the woman undue advantage legally and you are hoping she will listen to her better angels and not take advantage.

It not a lack of courage. It is prudentiality. You examine the rewards and you consider the risk as well as the potential loss. And just because you have read four blogs that say game your wife and she won't leave you is not enough to make me forget that millions of men are tossed out into the street every year. You can read all you want about trading in Forex and think you are just the shit on trading the JPY-EUR pair and then lose your ass. Prudentiality or prudence, however you want to look at it, will allow to know a bad risk when you see it. Courage has nothing to do with judgement.

Your kidding yourself if you think you can eliminate risk by looking at age, education, parental history, and a bunch of factors. The only safe way is to not marry. And it is not a coward's way out. You will be happier in the end when you are 55, 60, 70. I have been alone for two years now at 57. The lack of stress, of not having a bitch, of no abuse, of no arguments, no Home Depot, no stupid female bullshit is tremendous. My dad never remarried after my mom died. They fought for years throughout the whole marriage and she slept alone in another room for about 5 years before she died. No one was more Alpha then him. He partied a bit and she was always on his ass about it. Once she accused him of having a girlfriend and he said "Evelyn, you may not have cured me of drinking, but you damn sure cured me of women." And he meant it. After she died, he never even had a girlfriend.

We all thought "Gosh, he must be lonely" He fucking wasn't. He had ample money to do as he pleased and he did exactly that. I didn't really know how happy he was to not have 5 kids up his ass all wanting something from him and a bitch on his back all the time. Until I did it.

He had sort of been a role model for me. I surely wanted to wait to marry, to not have a lot of kids, because even as a boy I figured out he was getting the shit end of the stick. I should have paid even better attention and never married.

Sure, when your in your 30s and early 40s, people will think there is something fucked with you because they all think old school, if you were worth a shit then a woman would want you or you would "man up".

You have to leave all that bullshit thinking behind. Like it or not, this is a new era in mankind. Marriage is and will continue to be the first casualty of PostModernism.

You know what. I am going exactly the other direction from you. You are a pussy if you do marry. You are a coward that is falling for conditioning, that you need the social validation of it, that you are afraid that you will be alone when you are old, that you need to follow what you are told to do and man-up and meet your responsibilities, that you are afraid to stick your nose out there and continue to struggle to get what you want from women and from the world and you want a bitch to tell you what to do, that you are such a fucking wimp that you need a > woman so you can lay your head on her chest and seek your mother like you were a little baby infant (Coco Chanel's word about men, not mine).

>
> Pussy.

He dropped another one on Rational Male:

> I was reading the Red Pill Blog (It's a very good blog if you have never read it. I highly recommend his article on The Female Social Matrix. It is very long. Here is a link to it:http://theredpillroom.blogspot.com/2012/05/female-social-matrix-introduction.html). The writer is another guy that has been married for 21 years. One of his articles says you can't be alpha part of the time. His wife says "Foreplay begins in the morning when your feet hit the floor after you wake up" He begins this list of things you should do:
>
> That means being the leader every day.
> That means being decisive in your leadership every day.
> That means soliciting her opinions before you make a decision about something important, every day.
> That means ensuring the health, safety, and welfare for your family every day.
> That means household maintenance every day.
> That means working out in some way, every day.
> That means making at least three good DHV Alpha moves every day.
> That means intriguing her sense of curiosity or wonder every day.
> That means making her come to you, not the other way around, every day.
>
> And this is just a fragment of his list and I started thinking after reading about a third of the way through it, "Fuck it". It's such a load of shit to go through just to be with a woman. You just can't "be" with one. There is always going to be this tension that you are going to be put through in one form or another. You either are the perfect little beta with a side of alpha that is the best little handyman or you have to now go through this contrived alpha shit that Ian Ironwood lists above.
>
> its such a lot of shit to go through just to have some regular pussy. That's not really even regular and it gets real tired. It is far better to fuck new pussy then your old tired ass wife and look that crap you have to go through to even get that.
>
> And none of it is guaranteed to work and most of this is just conjecture. A few married guys that a "her-i-cane" hasn't made "landfall" into his life and his marriage are like people living in Orlando telling people in southern Alabama how best to avoid a hurricane. Just because a major hurricane hasn't hit Orlando doesn't mean one won't ever hit there.
>
> I am 57. I am divorced. I live without a woman. I was sad and mad for about four years after the divorce. But now, not a day fucking goes by that I am not actually thankful that I don’t have that woman in my life. I don’t mean just a little bit thankful. I mean I am fucking giddy about it. Being happy is fucking easy. All you have to do to be happy is not be unhappy. I can’t really tell you how to be happy but I can fucking tell you how to be unhappy. Have a 55 year old wife. That’s how.

There are 3 women in their late forties or fifties that all three live right next to each other, right by me. I look at them and I am so glad I don’t have one of these beasts in my bed. My mother died way before my father and he never went with another woman. It wasn’t any devotion to her. He hated her. He was sick of her. She harangued and henpecked him for 40 or years. And he was alpha as mother fucker and he had all those good beta qualities of regularity and dependability that a woman could want in a man. He was 6’3″ 220 pound Sergeant-Major in the military that was about the meanest looking mother fucker you would see every week. He had a command voice that would freeze children in their tracks. I would run into his young troopers on the base when I was a teenager and when they found out who I was they would say “Your dad is a mean fucking asshole”. I would reply “You’re telling me something I don’t know. I’m his fucking son. Try that on for a while.” But no matter what, how alpha you are or what good alpha/beta mix you are there is still going to be something that is going to put a burr in that woman’s saddle. He was a good man and a good husband and still they ended up sleeping in different rooms.

All this ink and writing about how to be some alpha with some beta in you or a beta with some alpha in you is a fucking waste of time. There is no solution to this. Women and men are too far apart and there is no reconciliation. They have opinions that are rationalized, solipsistic, false, or generalized. They have the advantageous position of having a pussy that you want more than they want your dick, and they have the law, religion, and the media on their side. The highest rate of divorce is among interracial marriages of white woman and black men. And you know those relationships are the best example of women wanting to marry alpha dick and that is the only reason that the woman married the man.

Get it through your head, Men are from mars; women are FUCKING IDIOTS.

Never marry. Duh. Plate Theory. Duh. Game. Duh. Pump them, dump them, next them. Duh. THAT IS THE ONLY WAY TO WIN. Duh!!!!!

You have no idea how young you are going to feel when you are 57 and how old those women will be when they are 57. You will not feel a lick of shit older or different when you are 57. Your dick will work, your body will work. You will still be viable sexually. And that women will be a broken down piece of shit with a dead vagina and a body that would disgust you to see her naked much less fuck her. My ex-wife would be 50 years old right now and I have no idea how I could actually bring myself to fuck her knowing how she probably looks without clothes right now. Women say old men are pervs for wanting to fuck young girls. Fuck I > would think it is perverted to fuck old women. It is natural as a motherfucker to want to fuck young women. Duh.

>
> You can't fucking win at this game. Get a fucking PS3. Get DirectTV. Get a lot of guy friends. Go fishing. Get some kind of Game be it alpha game or beta game to make them think you will be their sucker provider and then run away after you get the trim.
>
> Whatever, just never marry. I am starting to get bored with this theme, how to be a better husband by being more alpha.
>
> It won't work.
>
> You cannot look at a 40 year old women today and say that today's thirty year old will be just like that when she is 40. You can't even look at a 30 year old today and say today's 20 year old will be like her. You have no idea what any of them are going to be like when they get older. The only reason women stayed with men in the past was because they had to and now they don't and they won't. Maybe if you are in the top 10% of income and your wife doesn't work then she might stay with you.
>
> There was this piece in The Atlantic a few days ago called "The Weaker Sex". It profiled 3 women as something the female writer called the DWP club, divorced women professionals. It profiled 4 women, three were already divorced and loving it. They had fucking weekends off from kids. The Ex husbands came and got the kids. So they had female nirvana, money, independence, nobody trying to fuck them, and someone else to raise the kids on the weekends. The fourth had a househusband, who she fucking abused, and the writer made him look like a nitwit idiot and hinted this woman was well on the way to getting a divorce. All made mid six figure incomes. Women will only stay with you if they have to and they don't have to any fucking more. Get it through your head. They get just as sick of your dick as you will with their tired ass boring pussy.
>
> Pump them, dump them, next them.
>
> If you do this, if you never marry, and they invent time machines in the next 30 years, your 57 year old self will fucking come back and thank you for doing it. If you don't listen to me, then your 57 will come back and say "Listen to me you little idiot, when you meet a blond woman named Suzanne from Long Island, New York, RUN!!!!!"

He has been getting criticisms about being bitter…

> I think he said some great red pill info, but he sounds so bitter.
>
> Women can be wonderful creatures, as well as nightmares also, I spent such good moments with them, also non considering sex and romance, I can't agree with all the things Mark Minter says.
>
> Let's not forget this, because enjoying women it's part of a player and should be > part of everyone’s life.

Bitter or not, I like his comments because he has been through the trenches. He speaks from experience and for that I think we should at least consider his warnings against marriage.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

This Blacksmith Is A Man

October 23, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Is this a man?

How about this guy?

Or maybe this?

How about the men who work here?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Man Outcompetes Beta Male To Fulfill His Destiny

October 24, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I received recently:

> I was at a small wedding at a Bed & Breakfast, there was only 1 single girl at the entire wedding and she was extremely attractive, I got in late the night before and she had already made the acquaintance of the only other single guy, he was no slouch in the art of conversation and wasn't bad looking, had a good job etc., I picked up on him as a possible obstacle so I befriended him and the next day I offered him a ride to the ceremony during which she sat next to him and playfully slapped him on the leg with the program, they talked quite a bit, etc.
>
> When the reception started they continued to talk and were always standing next to each other. The prior evening I had assertively introduced myself to the girl and dropped some cool stories during group conversations. So the approach had already been made, just had to worry about the middle game. For a while I thought she maybe had already chosen him, then I noticed he was crowding her terribly, always next to her, if she walked away he would stay put and wait for her to come back, if she had her back to him he would stand behind her waiting for another opportunity to engage her in conversation. At least once I saw her hand him her drink to hold while she walked away.
>
> I quickly realized that she hadn't chosen him at all, rather she was using him as a home base during the reception, he was making himself way too available to her. I am no slouch in notches but certainly not on your level so I recalled the tips I read in bang and would occasionally approach her throughout the reception, using my own material but practicing your theory on making her qualify herself.
>
> After each interaction I would go work the room some more, introduce myself to > people I hadn’t met, teaching the kids how to two step, taking lots of photos, drawing attention to myself but not in a douchey way. All of that worked and after a while she walked up out of no where and snapped a picture of me by myself. I took this as a sign of interest so my next move a half hour later, I noticed the Beta guy had left so I moved in, people were playing with those glow in the dark sticks that you can put connectors on to make them into bracelets and necklaces. I already had them on my wrists and I saw she had a bag of them so I went up and asked her to make me one that I could hang around my tie. She did not hesitate and started making one for me and then attached it to my tie while standing close to me. This was all I needed to proceed.

>
> The party moved into the master suite of the B&B and that’s when the real dancing started, I got a dance in with her but didn’t crowd her, one dance and then I walked outside to hang with a group of people, she followed a few minutes later. My friends had picked up on my plan so one of them helpfully wanted to take a picture of me and the girl, so that was the the first holding of the waist. Shortly after I closed the bang in her room.
>
> Anyways, I had your tips in mind the entire time, building up mystery, making her qualify herself, don’t be a coat rack, etc. you’re a great writer. This girl is actually pretty amazing and I’m hoping to date her, don’t let anyone ever tell you that you’re misogynistic, if you’re insight can be used to help dudes make a connection with a girl they like and want to be with then you’ve made a great contribution to the human race. Thanks Roosh!

Good job, reader!

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What It’s Like To Opt Out Of TSA’s Body Scanners

October 24, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Yesterday I flew out of the United States for the first time in two years. Since then, they’ve replaced all their metal scanners with x-ray backscatter machines. TSA agents were also sporting new uniforms that made them look like policemen.

Before arriving at the airport I had decided to opt out of the machine, which has concerned European authorities enough that they’ve banned them outright. Why subject myself to one extra zap of radiation if I don’t have to?

Once I got to the security line, I emptied my pockets into the white bin and took off my shoes and belt. Then I looked to the nearest TSA agent and said, “I’d like to opt out of the scanner.”

“No problem, sir, just push your things through the machine and wait right here.”

“But I won’t be able to see my stuff as they go through.”

“Don’t worry there are tons of agents here.”

That’s what I was worried about.

A tall white man came up to me and said to walk through the metal detector and follow him. “Do you want me to perform the pat down in public or private?”

“Here is fine,” I said.

He positioned me in front of my bins and said I could keep an eye on them. He told me how the pat down works, adding that he will be moving up around my thighs until he meets “resistance.” He asked if I had any medical accessories like insulin or colostomy bags. I did not.

“Okay, sir, raise your hands.” I put them up, just like the people who were walking through the scanner.

Then he ironed me. With the flats of his hand he pressed through every inch of my torso. He lifted my shirt slightly and felt around my jean waistline. Then he ironed my legs and the side of my thighs. He didn’t touch my crotch area. Afterwards he wiped a special gauze all over his gloves and put it through a machine. It took five seconds to get the results and then he said I was free to go. I had thought the pat down was going to be similar to how some nightclubs do it, but it was intimate enough that I’m sure the agent knows I’m not skimping on my deadlifts.

I passed seven lines out of the security area. Not one other person had opted out. I’m surprised, because it’s such an easy form of civil disobedience. It took about four minutes for my pat down procedure while the x-ray machine takes 15 seconds. If just 10% of flyers opt out, the whole thing shuts down and they’ll have no choice but to stop using them. The fact that most Americans don’t want to be inconvenienced for only four minutes tells me how much they care about having an increasingly authoritarian government. From this point on when I read a story about how the American government is encroaching on our rights, I’ll just think of the masses who just don’t seem to want them.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Beginning Of The End For The UFC

October 25, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Women to pummel themselves in the octagon…

> UFC president Dana White tells SI.com he's working on a female division of the UFC, largely because of Rousey's influence.
>
> "It's absolutely going to happen," White said Tuesday of the women's division.

Why are women obsessed with male activities? You don't see guys begging to get into knitting clubs, or whatever it is that women do. What's going to happen to the UFC is that women who are 20% as skilled as men will be lauded by the media as heroes and trailblazers, but will end up making most of their money through sexy spreads in magazines. The easiest path for women to riches is to present themselves as sex objects. For men, it's to be skilled.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Juicing: Flash In The Pan Or Growing Lifestyle Movement?

October 26, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Juicing has become a hot topic in the manosphere, exclusively driven by Danger & Play, who recently spun off a new blog called Juicing For Men. It's getting popular enough that in the past month I've seen Twitter updates of men announcing their juicer purchases.

Why juicing?

American nutritional wisdom has made juice the enemy because of its high caloric content, but D&P shares research that suggests it reduces depression and boosts your immune system, especially when you juice vegetables. In other words, juice is the solution to a healthy body, not the problem. If you're not convinced, check out the argument that compares juicing to game.

My take…

It's worth a three-month test drive to see if it offers a noticeable improvement in energy levels along with a reduction in minor body ailments. My skepticism lies in suggesting it takes a year or more of juicing to see benefits. I don't know of any other personal program (fitness, game, diet, or so on) that takes longer than a couple months to see some results from. There remains some doubt with juicing, but as more men get on board, we'll be able to see first-hand reports of its effects.

If you want to learn more about starting a juice program, check out this beginner guide.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

ROK Is Coming Out Of Beta

October 27, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Next Wednesday I will officially launch this site via my blog. So far I think you have an idea of where it's heading: short content full of links, videos, and images. ROK will be like grabbing a bite at Five Guys while RooshV.com will remain a family Italian restaurant that takes several hours to complete a meal. I'd like to publish 7-10 blog posts a week here while RV will have 3 a week. The only significant change is that I'm moving all my book reviews to ROK. They will published one at a time instead of in massive 3,000-word compilations.

My question to you: based on what you've seen so far, what are some ways to improve this site? What kind of content should I focus on?

Finally, I wanted to thank Danger & Play, Nexxt Level Up, Rational Male, The Private Man, and Matt Forney for supporting this venture so far.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Every Girl Has A Price

October 28, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A Russia guy messaged girls on VK (Russia's version of Facebook) with an offer of $3,000 in cash in exchange for sex. It's no surprise that the girls were very receptive, including one who had a boyfriend…

> Kak: You are already 18, right?
>
> Kristina: Yes, this year I will be 20. But I can't do it just like that, you also should understand me, I haven't had guys yet and I am a little bit afraid…
>
> Kak: I will not hurry you, we will meet, talk, you'll get used to me… So, what? Do you agree?Kristina: OK, bu the money you will pay me at once. OK?
>
> Kak: Before the sex – sure. But not at the first meeting.
>
> Kristina: Here is my number 8928****

I guarantee that any Russian or Ukrainian girl you date has accepted money or gifts in exchange for sex at some point in her life. The only question is what the results would be like if American girls were propositioned with large sums on a site like Ok Cupid.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What A Pump & Dump Looks Like

October 29, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
The Washington Post recently matched up two 30-somethings in DC for their Date Lab feature.

The man: solid job, Ivy League background, decent looks
The woman: unattractive

She indirectly admits that her standards are changing due to her rapidly decreasing value…

> He's a little bit, not preppy, but more clean-cut than I would usually go for. But he's more the type of person I'm looking for now.

Translation: "I would not have dated him ten years ago, but guys aren't exactly knocking down my door anymore." It's no surprise she practically falls in love with him. They kissed at the end of the first date and all signs point to sex on the second..

> Ben was about to head out of town … so these two motivated daters got together again the very next night, before he shipped out. Unfortunately, it now seems some personal issues might take Ben out of Washington for the foreseeable future. "It's bad timing," Wendy laments. "If those things weren't going on, we might see each other again."

But check out this anonymous comment..

> Ben is lying, I just saw him two nights ago. He is in town.

He pumped her, realized he didn't want to buy a depreciating asset that has ridden the DC carousel, then dumped her. It looks like she's going to have to lower her standards just a bit more.

About the Author

Roosh is an ugly misogynist with massive mommy issues. He created ROK in October 2012 because he has no friends. Currently he is traveling the world to have bad sex with poor girls who want to use him for an American greencard. His little penis is so ineffective at satisfying women that he has had to master the art of cunnilingus. It is absolutely certain that he will die alone in a basement alongside his massive porn collection. Sadly, his right hand is irreversibly deforming into a claw shape from excessive masturbation, causing him sharp pains when he types up one of his offensive rants. You can visit his sexist blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Showing Value Before The Approach

October 29, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an email I received recently:

> I discovered that when I settle in and enjoy myself, regardless of the dynamics of the room, I eminate magnetic energy that draws people in. I demonstrate higher enery rather than higher value. This is a result of choosing a good venue and settling in versus bouncing around a room approaching, or even bounceing between venues.
>
> I choose a strategic spot in the venue where the girls file by, usually an area of the bar close to the entrance. Since I'm in a venue I have a good time regardless, I'm already in a great frame of mind to approach–which is often just turning around to engage a hot girl, rather thn canvassing the room to make cold, stiff approaches.
>
> Women are intrigued by a man who's generating higher energy and see it across the room before you ever approach. On the other hand, higher value is a function of conversation: approaches, clever openers, routines, games, etc. A girl can't perceive higher value without conversation (unless she's turned on by a Rolex or Porsche). Traditional game relies on DHV that depends on verbal communications, which only happens after approach. High energy is non-verbal and be transmitted "wirelessly" across a crowded club to intrigue women before approaching. Higher value and attraction are hard-wire connections leading getting hard-wired!
>
> Traditional game focuses on building intrigue and attraction after approaching. I say that it's immensely more effective to build intrigue before approaching, so that girls want you to approach them before you actually do. I have an > experiences that demonstrates these concepts beautifully. But, will save the stories for another time.

This isn’t bad advice, but I much prefer to hunt than wait for girls to somehow recognize my value in a dark club when they have many male options. The more passive my game, the less I get.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Story Of O

October 30, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a novel about O, a woman who voluntarily becomes a sex slave at Chateau Roissy in France where she is whipped, tied up, and gangbanged in all her orifices by a menagerie of men. The story shows her deepening commitment to her masters and also the role she plays in trying to recruit additional women to the operation. It's an old book so there was some tenderness and romance in many scenes, like when her vagina was stretched with a special dildo harness.

> She did not wish to die, but if torture was the price she had to pay to keep her lover's love, then she only hoped he was pleased that she had endured it.

She got into the lifestyle due to her submissive nature and her desire to prove her love to a man who wanted to enslave her for himself and his friends. The game he used was along the lines of, "If you love me, you'll let this masked man violate your anus."

Many passages gave me boners. They were fleeting and not fully engorged, but it did get my mind imagining how to be a dominant slave master. The convincing style of writing makes you think that all women want to be dominated like O.

> O was happy that Rene had her whipped and had prostituted her, because her impassioned submission would furnish her love with the proof that she belonged to him, but also because the pain and shame of the lash, and the outrage inflicted upon her by those who compelled her to pleasure when they took her, and at the same time delighted in their own without paying the slightest heed to hers, seemed to her the way redemption of her sins.

Sadly, my boners went away towards the second half of the book where I simply couldn't get used to the beatings and pain even after it became clear that O loved it. Some women want to be tied up and anally pounded, but not all, and O's enslavement became disturbing when the branding irons were brought out. It didn't help that the writer gave O the personality of a dog. She was just an empty shell to be manipulated by her masters for awesome sexual pleasure.

> Would she ever dare to tell him that no pleasure, no joy, no figment of her imagination could ever compete with the happiness she felt at the way he used her with such utter freedom at the notion that he could do anything with her, that there was no limit, no restriction in the manner with which, on her body, he might search for pleasure.

If you consider that this is a romance novel intended for women, it did a great job of holding my attention and keeping me sexually entertained, especially in the first half. It's a quick read that gives you a disturbing look into the nature of some women (and men).

Read More: "The Story Of O" on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Jack Lalanne Was Ahead Of His Time

October 30, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Americans would easily lose a few pounds every month by solely eliminating white sugar from their diets. But they won't do it, because they don't want to "starve" themselves. How did it happen that a normal diet 30 years ago is equated with suffering today?

> People think of him as the old TV fitness guy but don't realize how many cutting edge advances he made in fitness. He was a real genius.
>
> Read his wikipedia entry-fascinating. A couple of interesting points- as you would expect doctors opposed his idea of fitness gyms saying it was unhealthy. when Lalanne was 15 he was inspired to get into the fitness lifestyle when he heard a talk by Paul Bragg of Braggs ACV fame. Lalanne did his daily fitness routine up until the day before his death at age 96!

Read More: Jack LaLanne at 80 Years Old

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

What To Say If You've Been To Her Country

October 31, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Once you get some travel under your belt, it will be common to meet girls from countries you've been to. There's actually an optimal way to drop the fact that you've been to her homeland. Here's how not to do it:

> Her: "I'm from Wroclaw."
>
> You: "Oh, I was there."
>
> Her: "Cool."
>
> You: "Yeah."

When you say "I was there," you give her nothing to respond with. Here's the right way to do it:

> Her: "I'm from Wroclaw."
>
> You: "Is Cafe Manana still the best bar in town?"
>
> Her: "What… ew no that bar is awful!"
>
> You: "Why is it awful?"
>
> Her: "Too many Spanish guys."
>
> You: "You don't like Spanish people? When I lived there, I noticed that girls loved Spanish culture."

Do you see the difference? One leads to a dead-end while the other creates conversation by showing insider knowledge. If you don't bring up the hip spots you found or local slang you learned, then you're not showing value. Any guy can hop on an airplane and be a tourist, so you have to give more than just saying you stepped foot into her country.

Otherwise she won’t care.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Woman Abandons Her Family, Gets Paid $85,000

November 1, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Check out this photo of a seemingly happy family (mom is on the far left):

[image]

She decided to get involved with the Occupy Wall Street movement. There's nothing inherently wrong with that except she completely abandoned her family in Florida in order to do so. From devoted mother to dreadlocked protester…

[image]

A media reporter asked how she could leave her four children. Her answer: "It's important for their future." We also get to see the Indian man she "cozies up to" at night. A fellow supporter adds that "She's a good mom."

In the next video you see her making out with a bearded guy at 1:29…

> She did respond when a Post reporter asked about a YouTube video showing her making out with another protester during an Occupy "Kiss In" on Valentine's Day.
>
> "I actually made out with four guys," she said, laughing wildly.

This seems to be an open-and-shut case of a neglectful mother, but the American judicial system still believes she deserves some cash. She was awarded the $85,000 in her husband's 401k, which is money that was controlled by a bank and earned through his job as a banker.

The ultimate insult is that she compares her cavorting with male protesters to being a soldier fighting a war:

> "Military people leave their families all the time, so why should I feel bad? I'm fighting for a better world."

Delusional or inspirational? Maybe we should ask the kids she left behind.

Source: New York Post

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Dumbest Question I've Ever Received

November 1, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> How should a woman go about the early stages of dating more than one guy at a time (under the assumption that there is a long-term relationship trajectory)? I am a 20 year old college junior and I am lucky right now in that I seem to have two options. I am not sure how to make sure I am respectful of both of them and their time/feelings/resources, but I don't want to only focus on one in case we aren't on the same page or aren't ultimately looking for the same thing. I don't want to be in sexual relationships with both of them at the same time for obvious reasons, but I also realize that you can only date a guy so long before physical expectations should be fulfilled. Is there any graceful way to handle this? If you don't have any suggestions I'll turn to my parents, but I figured I'd ask you as well since you always throw in a healthy dose of realistic cynicism.

Translation: "I want to feel wanted and receive affections from multiple men without giving anything up in return." I don't understand why women email me for advice. Why would I help the opposing team?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Morbidly Obese Girl Posts Picture Of Herself In Bikini

November 2, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Take a look at this picture:

Let’s see what she has to say about her weight:

> This picture is for the strange man at my nanny’s church who told me my belly > was too big when I was five.

>
> This picture is for my horseback riding trainer telling me I was too fat when I was nine.
>
> This picture is for the girl from summer camp who told me I'd be really pretty if I just lost a few pounds
>
> This picture is for all the fucking stupid advertising agents who are selling us cream to get rid of our stretch marks, a perfectly normal thing most people have (I got mine during puberty)
>
> This picture is for the boy at the party who told me I looked like a beached whale. [lol]

You go, girl!

> MOST OF ALL, this picture is for me. For the girl who hated her body so much she took extreme measures to try to change it.

Getting the tall frappucino instead of the venti is not extreme. Millions of thin people do it every day.

> THIS IS MY BODY, DEAL WITH IT.
>
> and FUCK YOU ALL who tried to degrade my being and sense of self with your hurtful comments and actions.
>
> GUESS WHAT IT DIDN'T WORK HAHAHAHAH

And that's the problem: the shaming didn't work because other people told her to "be you" and too many thirsty guys still wanted to seduce her into bed. Now she's bragging about her obesity on the internet and has gotten nearly 100,000 comments of validation. That weight is not going anywhere, and neither are the tiger claw marks on her stomach.

Source: The Body Love Blog

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

This Stuntman Is A Man

November 2, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

He runs over three live crocodiles, multiple times, for a James Bond movie. Stuntman don't make much, so he probably did it more for the thrill than the paycheck.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Watch A True G In Action

November 2, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

Watch A True G In Action

Adam Michaels from RVF has the low-down:

> Notice in the video how not ONE TIME did anyone talk to him dissrespectful or with an attitude. Both women were embarassed but they knew better than talk wrong to him. Even the snarky little host kept his mouth shut. Why?
>
> I'm a old school G, and you know this.
>
> First words out of his mouth when a CAMERA crew and his main chick confront him for cheating:
>
> I'm putting my cowboy boot down and I'm gonna finish eating my food and YOU need to step off with this bullshit
>
> ^My man didnt even apologize!
>
> When she tells him he better stop cheating on her:
>
> I was a player before you met me, and i'm gonna be a player while your with me. Do you understand? If you dont, pack your bags.
>
> Then he scolds his main chick for blowing up his spot:
>
> You know better, you know better. I trained you better than this
>
> Even when caught cheating, she never even said she wanted to leave him. She just said he needs to stop cheating. But he instead "fires" her for this bad behavior. Hahaha
>
> You know what? Im gonna get this woman to pack my food up, because you know Food is important to me, but your not important to me. Your ass is fired!
>
> Still the best frame ever:
>
> I'm an old school G. I been a old school G all my life and I'm gonna be one till I die. If you cant accept that get your ass to steppin.
>
> Cause bitch I take care of you. I buy you a house, you dont work, I pay the bills.
>
> And the whole time all of this is going on, his SIDE chick never left. At one point he goes over to her and tells her he'll smooth everything out and see her two days later on friday.
>
> Then he brings down the hammer:
>
> I know how to please her. You can be faithful all you want to, but what you wont do, THE NEXT ONE WILL baby. And I guarantee you that.
>
> Does the game get much tighter? Haha you know he still has both of those chicks today. I dont think you can even teach that, either you got it or you dont. Even on > this forum, I wonder how many dudes would respond like he did. Thats what seperates the real G's from the fake G's. Back them into a corner and see how they react. A real G keeps it G, and a fake G will supplicate and say he's sorry.

3 Responses to Watch A True G In Action

1. John
   November 3, 2012 at 10:50 pm
   Why couldn't this man have been my uncle? I curse every speck of beta crap I was indoctrinated with during the 80s.
   Reply
2. Mike Tisi
   November 4, 2012 at 4:03 am
   No fear of 'consequences'. What more could a real man be?
   Reply
3. J Doe
   November 4, 2012 at 6:30 am
   Fucking man.
   Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

How To Live A Balanced Life

November 4, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following poem was written 2,500 years ago by Tao Te Ching:

> Fill your bowl to the brim > and it will spill.
> Keep sharpening your knife > and it will blunt.
> Chase after money and security > and your heart will never unclench.
> Care about people's approval > and you will be their prisoner.
>
> Loading...
> Do your work, then step back.
> The only path to serenity.

You want more wisdom? Click here.

Source: Roosh V Comments

It’s Easier To Shine When You’re Younger

November 5, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here’s an email from an older guy that should give you young ones a nice kick in the ass:

> So, one key factor in success with women is developing demonstrable value in young men as quicly as possible–the kind of value that triggers response in young women. And not just money and superficial success. I’m talking about things that appeal to girls so-called “deep” intuitive senses and emotional inner being. The kind of valued accomplishment that flips the fuck-me switch.
>
> As an older gentleman myself, I think it’s much easier to build impressive accomplisments when you’re younger than when you’re older. Older men are expected to have more and have achieved more than younger men. The to differentiate yourself when you’re 30-something or 40-something is more difficult.
>
> I teach my own son this lesson – the younger you are, the more impressive the same accomplishment.
>
> For example, I urged my kids to write and publish a book while still in their teens. It didn’t matter how good the book was, just the accomplishment of having done it at such an early age would immediately set them apart from their peers.
>
> Publishing my first book in my 30′s isn’t nearly as impressive, although it still sets me apart from men who have never authored a book. Besdies, women dig a man who’s good with words. Funny thing is that none of the women I’ve shared this accomplishment with have asked to read my book. I think that would be too much work for many of them. lol
>
> However, on the flip side, men of my age who hit up the same women and bore those women to tears with the same old work, career, and financial success stories don’t get very far. I believe it’s because these men have demonstrated > nothing out of the ordinary for their age. Neither have they demonstrated anything of particular interest. I pity that man that tells a woman who or what he is in a single word or phrase: “I’m a doctor,” “I’m a layer,” “I run xyz company”, etc. BFD!

>
> I might just put together a list of things young men should accomplish that will quickly build inherent value in a 20 year old.
>
> You don’t have to outrun a bear to survive, you just have to run faster than the other guy.

So what’s the best way to show value if you’re an older guy?

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

You’ve Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

November 5, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The red pill is a common metaphor that roughly equates to “truth,” of seeing things as they really are. It came from The Matrix, a movie where the main character is unplugged from a false reality and introduced into the real world. One of the better red pill movies is actually The Truman Show.

Truman begins learning the truth of his false existence where he’s an unwilling participant in a reality show. The city he believes he lives in is nothing more than a massive Hollywood sound stage. In the movie there’s an interview with the show’s creator, the god of Truman’s life:

Reporter: “Why do you think Truman has taken so long to understand the true nature of his world?”

Loading...

Creator: “We accept the reality of the world with which we’re presented.”

Reporter: “If he absolutely wanted to discover the truth, there is no way we can prevent him.”

Creator: “Truman prefers his cell.”

He does not, eventually deciding to take the red pill. The most poignant moment of the movie is him banging on the wall of his large jail, of coming to the realization of his lifelong imprisonment.

The irony of game and learning how to get laid is that it primes you for the red pill. Men get into the game for sex, but dealing with the large quantity of women that is necessary for mastering it starts to teach you the true nature of women and all the little lies that society tells you about the sexes. The truth will set you free, but the sad fact is that many men rather remain plugged in.

9 Reasons Hvar Island Sucks

November 6, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After spending three weeks in Croatia's Hvar during the middle of summer, I can confidently advise you not to go there. Here's why:

1. Too many British people. If there is one nationality that knows how to ruin vacation spots, it's the British. It doesn't help that wherever you find British people, you'll probably stumble on some annoying Australians as well. In Hvar, about 40% of the night crowd was British. The girls seemed slightly better than American girls, but that would be like saying Burger King is better than McDonald's.

2. There are hardly any Eastern European girls. Most of the girls are from Britain, Norway, Sweden, Canada, America (if you can believe that), Spain, and France. I went to Hvar specifically for Eastern European women so as you can see I made a huge mistake. In three weeks I met one Polish girl and three Hungarian girls. No Estonians, Lithuanians, Latvians, Romanians, Bulgarians, Ukrainians, or Russians.

3. Croatian girls have a strong anti-foreigner shield in Hvar. They think all tourists are drunk fools who just want to stick their penis in anything. It's especially hard to get with Croatian girls living in Hvar for the summer. They don't want to be marked as the girl who sleeps with tourists in front of all their Croatian friends. The Croatian guys who work on the island seem to lock up all the girls early on, leaving tourists nothing but the Anglo girls in flip flops.

4. It's a tourist trap. I am 99% certain that the two only clubs on the island, Carpe Diem Beach and Veneranda, are diluting their vodka with water. Many travelers I talked to also suspect that dilution is going on. Even when not getting scammed, be prepared to pay double compared to the Croatian mainland.

5. The landlords treat you like little kids. No noise. No guests. No midgets. The old people want the benefits of tourism (money) without suffering the slightest inconvenience. If you're walking around with a girl at 5am and make a bit of noise, some old person will pop out of a wall to tell you to shut up. I had to sneak girls in and tell them to be quiet, only to get caught anyway. My Russian friend said this is how things went down in Soviet times.

Loading...

6. There are no freebies. Even if you go to Vegas, it will be easy to bang a 4 or 5. She will not put up roadblocks. In Hvar, there were no freebies. Even a 5 had to be gamed with everything you got, where success was far from guaranteed. The two biggest problems were cockblocking and logistics. It was also the case where the math was important: if you're with one guy but you're working on three girls, enjoy jerking off later with your hand. The only city in Europe where I had to work harder than Hvar was Riga. Even in Denmark I got much better results for my effort.

7. You're lost in a sea of dudes. The ratio at night wasn't actually that bad, about 1 girl for 1-2 guys, but these guys are so aggressive that really it feels like a 1 to 4 ratio. Girls are getting approached over a dozen times a day from guys all over the world while stuck in ADD hyper party mode. It was very hard to get and keep a girl's attention.

For example, a good day spot is Hula Hula Beach Club. Many times I had girls digging me, telling me to contact them later to hang, but nothing would pan out. Why would the girl care about me when by the time I contact her she will be hit on by another five guys? Hvar is the only place where I had to guard the girls. I started giving them bad advice to keep them away from the good spots while pushing for earlier meetups. I had no choice.

8. You need luck and aggressiveness, not game. The best way to describe the game here is musical chairs. Many nights I'd see a guy working on a girl for a while only for her to make out with another dude later on. You have to approach her at the exact time she's thinking of getting laid or else you will get nowhere. Girls cycle through huge quantities of guys every day with no obvious selection process. The best thing you can do is be aggressive and escalate quickly. If she doesn't dig it then move on to the next girl.

9. The nightlife is weak. Before 2am you have a bunch of dinky bars and then after 2am you only have a choice between two clubs which overcharge you and give you fake alcohol. If you don't have a solid prospect by 2am, you're going to be out of luck because the two clubs will be filled with mostly Anglo girls.

Hvar was a frustrating experience. In the end I did have a couple kills (including a virgin) that prevented the trip from being a total failure, but I would never go back again. I advise you to do the same.

Read More: Hvar Datasheet

Life Advice From The Doctor

November 6, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In a recent post I wondered when it' time to quit something that no longer gives you as much happiness as before. There was a gem of a comment by Dr. Jeremy from the magazine Psychology Today:

> There is often some black-and-white thinking that tends to keep men chasing the diminishing returns of additional notches. With some exceptions, the manosphere primarily offers two choices to men, 1) stay single and collect notches in ONSs and STRs, or 2) "brave" getting married and game your wife to get sex and avoid divorce. Given those two choices only, many men stay free, single, and notch-collecting.
>
> Unfortunately, there are a lot of options in between that are not as routinely or loudly discussed. Men have MLTRs concurrently, they build harems, they have open relationships, they date bisexual women who enjoy threesomes, polyamory, etc. All of these options give men the ability to build relationships in new areas with greater returns – while not having to completely "give up" the option of additional partners. They can shift some of their energy in a new direction, without completely trading one lifestyle's benefits for another.
>
> Loading...
> Like learning any "game", this does initially take more work (although the new challenge can be fun too). Over time, however, having a steady relationship (or several) can help a man meet his sexual needs with less effort than finding a new ONS whenever he has an itch to scratch. This can free a guy up from diminishing returns and allow more time for success in other areas of life. Then again, if/when he does really want something new, he still has the ability to get it – without having to "throw away" his existing relationship(s) in the process.
>
> Perhaps, instead of chasing notches then, you might find collecting LTRs in some fashion more appealing for awhile? Then you can decide whether you want to go back to notch collecting, eventually go the loving, family patriarch gamer road with a wife (perhaps in a foreign country), or the Hugh Hefner route and grow old with a revolving harem!

Not bad. A mistake that people often make is acting out the extremes when their min is sending them unhappiness signals. Instead of making a drastic change, why not try a couple small tweaks instead?

Read More: The Attraction Doctor

American Men Are Fearful Of Their Women

November 6, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

American Men Are Fearful Of Their Women

The above is an excellent sketch of how guys talk tough about their significant others but are actually scared shitless of them. Seven years ago I wrote how relationships destroy men:

> 1. Trick a guy into dating you by hiding your flaws and emotional instability.
>
> 2. For the first couple of months, indulge his desire to treat you like a slut in bed. Casually mention that you heard good things about anal sex.
>
> 3. Make him commit (a certainty if you flawlessly executed steps 1 and 2).
>
> 4. Remind him how much you hate his friends, how he is too good for them, and how they are holding him down.
>
> 5. Lower his self-esteem through sex withholding (start with oral) and subtle jabs at his masculinity.
>
> The result: He is forced to spend more time with you, putting his game out of practice. Not sure of his ability to get a new girl, his confidence goes down. He goes out less. His life now revolves around you. You start picking out his clothes. Your suggestion to move in together or get married now makes sense because he thinks he can't get another girl. You're his new mother. Destruction complete. Once you own him, start complaining endlessly to your girlfriends about the weak man you helped create.

Getting into a relationship is no reason to forget the skills and attitude that got you the girl in the first place. The choice is yours: keep your game sharp or end up whipped.

6 Responses to American Men Are Fearful Of Their Women

1. Wald
   November 7, 2012 at 5:38 pm
   Ah – It's funny because it's true.
   It's sad because it's true, too.
   Reply

2. Shawn
   November 7, 2012 at 5:57 pm
   Reading the comments on Youtube shows how the irony go over the blue pillers heads.
   Reply
3. Rich
   November 7, 2012 at 6:34 pm
   Funny but sad.
   Reply
4. loco
   November 7, 2012 at 11:49 pm sad but true
   guys in the western world are whipped guys in south america asia an africa are just laffin at us
   Reply
5. Pingback: Daily Linkage – November 8, 2012 | The Second Estate
6. el mechanico
   November 8, 2012 at 10:09 am
   I as a serial dater I see these moves in play a couple times a month on me. A new move that's kinda disturbing is girls faking STDs by telling you somethings wrong down there when they know you are going out without them. I find all of them humorous
   Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

Take College Courses Online For Free

November 7, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I recently discovered Coursera, a site that lets you take free courses through the internet. I signed up for these six and am waiting for them to begin…

Loading…

- Game Theory (Stanford)
- Exercise Physiology (U of Melbourne)
- Fundamentals Of Human Nutrition (U of Florida)
- Generating The Wealth Of Nations (U of Melbourne)
- The Science Of Gastronomy (Hong Kong University)
- Surviving Disruptive Technologies (U of MD)

With the already popular Khan Academy serving up millions of lessons, you have to wonder if in the near future you can get a complete college education for free (but without the diploma).

Learn More: The three biggest college course sites

Why Demographics Matter For The Younger Man

November 8, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Younger men face two simple biological realities:

1. Older men are generally more desirable to women than their younger selves. Women prefer men above their age range.

2. Younger women are generally more desirable than their older counterparts. Men, if given a choice, generally prefer to date women below them in age. Men in all age ranges are essentially competing most fiercely for women in one particular age range, generally 18-29. Everyone's competing for the same prize.

These realities ensure that younger men are always vulnerable to competition to older males who (being on average more experienced, affluent and confident versions of themselves) have an edge with younger girls.

Older women, meanwhile, are vulnerable to competition from younger females, a dynamic frequently referred to as "trading in for a new model", or something to that end. Women are well aware of this, and do everything in their power to guard against it (including shaming). This leads to an important demographic intersection with fertility rates.

A. When fertility rates are increasing, things are good for young men because there is a larger supply of younger women relative to the supply of older men (who, in a scenario where fertility rates are going up, would have been born in years of lower fertility and would therefore not be as numerous).

This means that there are more opportunities for younger guys to compete for the pool of younger girls their older counteparts are also shooting for. The older guys will still get plenty of touches (they've got far too many advantages over their younger selves), but there'll be a larger supply to keep everyone happy. Overall, this is great for them.

B. When fertility rates are decreasing, things get much rougher. This means that the older generations (born in a period of higher fertility) outnumber the young. That, of course, means a larger supply of older men to younger women. Younger guys thus face much stiffer competition for their female peers than they otherwise would, and they're left at a major disadvantage (they simply lack, on average, the same degree of experience/maturity/confidence/etc that their older selves will have in 3, 4 or 5+ years).

Attitudes are also impacted by this. In a decreasing fertility rate scenario, you've got a larger number of more attractive men (older dudes) pursuing a smaller number of the more attractive women (younger girls). The younger girls get more confident as a result of this-they now not only can choose from the more attractive men within their own age group, but not they also have a better shot at quality men 4, 5, or even 10 years their senior (some women will even consider men further above that range, though this is less common in some cultures).

This abundance mentality among young women compounds the difficulty for younger men, who already faced a numerical disadvantage. Now, to get with women in their age group, they need to meet the higher standard those girls now expect from their male peers, a standard enforced not only by the media/feminism/etc, but by the simple demographic realities that put more quality older men in front of them. Only the cream of the crop (the younger dudes with the highest degrees of confidence, maturity, sociability, physical fitness and status) manage to easily clear this hurdle.

Most western societies are in this stage of development right now (declining fertility over the past decade or so), and the effects are being felt.

How can a young guy use this information? Your reality on the ground can change drastically as societies move between these competing scenarios and fertility (or, for that matter, immigration) rates fluctuate. A society considered a virtual "pussy paradise" a mere decade ago (i.e. Brazil) can change quickly as fertility rates decline and the supply of younger women goes with it.

Similarly, realities on the ground can improve as some parts of the world see fertility increases that create a surplus of younger women for men to pursue down the road. It is up to the individual to put himself into the best position to be one of those men.

The sexual marketplace is a volatile place. Your fertile hunting ground today can be a dead zone tomorrow thanks to demographic shifts, and vice versa. Knowing this, guys should be careful to keep abreast of these changes and shifts as they happen, and be ready to move and/or adapt accordingly. Their romantic lives may depend on it.

Adapted From: RVF

About the Author

Athlone McGinnis is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today. His column runs every Monday.

Mark Minter Strikes Yet Again

November 8, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Minter dropped more bombs over on my 12 Things Wrong With America post. It's one of those articles where you need a little break after you're done reading. Take a look…

> This is my analysis of the election. And this is my manifesto.
>
> Here you had a sitting president that had everything going against him in voter sentiment, ambivalent economic data, if not bad data, a general lack of confidence of his ability to be a significant leader, and still he could not be beaten by his opponent.
>
> This has been the on going theme of my comments. Women are winning. Women are going to win and impose the changes on society that they wish and there is nothing you can do to stop it.
>
> The reason Obama won this election and why the Republicans were not able to gain any ground in the legislature was women. Pure and Simply. This election was about women. And the men lost. If the economy had improved even by a few percent more, then the election would never have been this close. Obama appealed to women and would blown Romney away. Romney was only in the race because of his ability to run on the economy and the antipathy that conservative white voters have towards Obama. In the Senate races, Woman won every race except for Maine where an independent candidate won, and the woman came in second. The conservative came in last.
>
> The forces arrayed against you, socially, economically, and politically are insurmountable. You can scream, whine, blog, comment, whatever, and you will not turn back the march of history. Even if the number of Red Pill aware men increases ten fold in the next few years, it still will not stop the inevitable erosion of the position of men, not only in America, but throughout the rest of the world.
>
> Now, I am going to tell you in no uncertain terms, if you have a dick then you are on your own and the forces of the world are arrayed against you. You can expect no political support, no social support, no support in the workplace, no support in the courts, with the police. Whether you realize it or not, women are a bigger enemy to you than any Arab, any Iranian, any Chinese.
>
> Your last chance to even slow this march was just lost. Democrats made a lot of hay about the Clint Eastwood presentation during the Republican convention where he used a chair a prop and addressed a hypothetical Barrack Obama in the chair. It was said that was essence of the Republican party, angry, old white men railing in their anger at a black Democratic president. And more and more of are those old, angry, white men going to die and not be replaced in the pipeline. In 2016 there will be even fewer of them and more and more non-white voters will move onto the voting rolls to replace those white male voters that will die over the next four years. Obama received 93% of the black vote, 69% of the hispanic vote, and 74% of the Asian vote. Romney won 59% of white voters. There will a smaller percentage of white voters in every election cycle from here on out.

But the real issue was the gender gap. Women favored Obama, 54 percent to 44 percent, while men chose Romney by an almost identical margin, 53 percent to 45 percent. Mothers were more likely to support Obama (55 percent to 45 percent), while fathers sided with Romney (55 percent to 43 percent).

“Democrats effectively made the case that issues important to women, not just issues like abortion and reproductive rights but economic issues of equal pay and access to jobs, those issues resonated with women,” said Ron Schurin, a political scientist at the University of Connecticut. “The Romney campaign seemed at times to be tone deaf on those issues. They tried to make a case, they just didn’t do it effectively.”

The key race in the election cycle, the bellweather indicator of things to come, was the race between Scott Brown and Elizabeth Warren. Expect this formula to be repeated by Democrats in subsequent elections. Elizabeth Warren was an academic, a law professor from Harvard, with a specialization in Bankrupty. So expect more races where a female former professor without any political baggage or experience will run, and win, on women’s issues that are masked as issues for families, for the “middle class”. It is my opinion that Elizabeth Warren will run for president in 2016 and will become the nominee. And more and more women will move into elected office and those women will push issues favorable to women as their primary agenda masking those issues as “for children”, “for education”, “for families”.

Also, the story of the next four years will be stagnation on issues involving spending, spending cuts, unless it is a measure that effects women. Then public opinion, the media, and the army of women will coerce the Republican legislature into caving. When there are cuts or spending deals to be made, expect the deal not to cut things would have a more direct effect on women and pushed towards cuts that will affect men. If defense is cut, that effects men, fewer soliders, fewer defense contracts. Expect less stimulus spending on infrastructure, again more jobs for men. Expect this ongoing deal, tax cuts for the wealthy or business in exchange for what women want. Expect head start, health benefits, food stamp progams, education, aid to dependent children to be untouched. Expect more legislation like WAVA and IMBRA. Expect an EEO interpretation that further broadens sexual harrassment and sexual discrimination.

Loading...
You all need to understand in no uncertain terms, women despise you, they think little of you. They believe you brutish and violent, bull headed, and fundamentally stupid. The see you as big children that must be controlled and disciplined in order make you useful to them. And if you are not useful to them, if you do not provide those things that they wish from you, actually, more correct to say, those things they need from you, then you will not be a part of their lives.

And they are earnest and driven in structuring society and the law in such a manner that you are no longer needed.

They are now avoiding marriage in droves, deferring pregnancy and motherhood, and using men, more and more, as forms of recreation and, less and less, as a necessary partner in the scheme of life as they are defining it. Their job and their female friends are more important to them than you are. They are celebrating and defining single motherhood as the form of child rearing preferrable to a two parent household.

And you should expect the bad behavior of women in relationships and in social situations to only get worse. There is a massive demographic shift that has been occuring since the end of the birth control. Compare the dearth of child bearing age women against the number of men from 19-55 that chase those women, men that throw deals and enticements at the feet of those women, with the rise in social media mechanisms available today that permit women to be approached and have those deals thrown at their feet, and you have recipe for more trouble ahead for men. Pity the poor boy born in 2007 when there was a birth rate of 4.32 babies born per 1000 people to the birth rate in 2011 of 1.9. There will be no girls for 50% of those boys, given that men tend to pair with younger women. If you wish to see the impact of demographic discrepancy on female behavior, study the history of Wyoming. Men literally had to pay women to have relationships and she shopped for the best offer. She would go a dance with one man and leave with another because she received the better offer.

So, I say to all of you, on this key date, this moment of national introspection that occurs every 4 years on election night when the character of our society unveils itself in the form of the ballot, we most certainly have entered into a new era of history. I call it the PostModern because I can only define it right now as what it isn't and I am not yet able to define it for what it is. You can call it Post Industrial. You can call it the Third Wave, the first being agriculture, the second being industrial.

But you can expect to see the world, society, and the relationships between men and women begin to organize in other means, other forms, other measures, than anything that has ever come before. The Modern Era, for as long as we have any sort of social memory has been organized along the lines of the family and the marriage between men and women. Everything was based on this, from work, to taxes, to even how houses are aligned along steets, neighborhoods are built, and how maps are drawn.

You need a new paradigm, new thinking about how you filter the information that your senses provide you and what you make of it. You need to question any value, any moral, any religion, your patriotism, your chivalry, your male code of conduct, any generalization, any stereotype, any caricature, anything that is an artifact from the Modern Era. And you need to replace it something, something more PostModern. You can't look back any fucking. Those days are gone and will never, never return.

Start with this statement right here and make it the first declaration in who you are, what you will be, and will do, what you won't be and what you won't do, and how you judge and think about the world

"I will be nobody's fucking slave and nobody's fool".

You owe nobody nothing. You owe women nothing. You owe society nothing. All of those things, those forces, those structures wish to impose a slavery on you and need begin to reject it right now. You need redefine to yourself, "What it means to be a man." And you need to begin to live that declaration of what it could, should, and would to be a man if you filter that determination with the first filter.

"I will be nobody's slave and nobody's fool".

We will stop being men that are useful to women, useful to society and start being men that live life on their terms. You have a power that you give away. We voluntarily let chains be placed on you because we think that is what "The Good Man" does.

Re-evaluate everything.

Revolt.

You cannot change where the world and society is going. But you have the power to change your life so that you live it on your own terms. There will no "macro" solution to the angst that you are feeling. There will be no grand social movement to correct the wrongs that you experience in your dealings with women and in how society views and what it expects from men.

But you have the solution in your hands.

Game.

Not just "Game" as pick-up lines, but "Game" as a way of viewing women, as a way of viewing life, as a way of reconstructing what is right and what is wrong, as a way of reacting to the changes that are beyond your control, as a way of dealing with the structural and social changes that already have come and inevitably are coming.

Don't worry about the world, worry about your world.

"I will be nobody's slave and nobody's fool.

Ever.

So when future historians look back on this PostModern time and make generalizations of this age, let them say:

"It was time when the men started being men, free men, that lived free, and no > longer accepted the roles as slaves that society and women had imposed on them.”

Check out Rational Male for more comments on his latest essay.

I Dare You

November 9, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I dare you to go to the bookstore, buy a big-ass history book that weighs more than your balls, and finish it within a week.

I dare you to buy Starting Strength then go to a gym and do some squats.

I dare you to walk out the door and get embarrasingly rejected by the first cute girl who crosses your path.

I dare you to register a domain name, figure out how to use WordPress, and put your ideas and experiences into words.

I dare you to turn your internet off for a day.

I dare you to dress nice, go to a club alone, and approach ten women.

I dare you to buy a self-improvement book, put aside your ego, and learn something new from another man.

Loading...
I dare you to delete all your porn, limit masturbating to only one day a week, and get horny enough to seek release inside a real vagina.

I dare you to do 100 pushups.

I dare you to stop talking about yourself in conversation, stop seeking validation, and simply ask questions and shut the fuck up.

I dare you to go for a long walk on Sunday without a cell phone and reflect on your goals and how you're going to get there.

I dare you to visit a neighboring city for a weekend and see if you can get laid.

I dare you to fail with even though you tried your best.

I dare you to forget everything I've ever told you and figure shit out on your own. No one has the knowledge and ability to improve your life like you can. Take big risks and learn big from them.

The Power Of Feminism

November 10, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

While I have no ambitions to change the world, watching the manosphere grow has made me wonder if our beliefs are becoming mainstream. Is it possible that one day the views of game guys and men's rights guys will crush feminism and repair its negative consequences on society?

I looked at feminist sites and blogs, trying to to estimate their traffic and userbase when I could. I'll spare you the effort: the feminist sphere is formidable The manosphere has less than 100 blogs with a least modest traffic, but they have thousands. Jezebel alone gets more visits than all of us combined.

They have 99% of women in their corner. They have all the beta males and white knights, which alone outnumber us ten-fold. They have all the gays and transsexuals. Even when you step out of the internet realm, they've infected higher education, government, and the media. Not only do they have near unlimited power to push their anti-male agenda, but they literally have millions of minions that spread their message. I estimate there are less than 100,000 guys in America who have firm red pill beliefs. We're essentially extremists.

If this was a real war, we'd have to run into the mountains and resort to guerrilla fighting because of the size of their army, but this is not a war. We're not fighting them. While they should be checked when the opportunity arises, any efforts to destroy them is ultimately futile. Society is not ready for men to reign superior. Forcing it will result is few gains. I could dedicate my life to changing America, by signing up one million dedicated culture warriors, yet still fail in the end. Unless you're trying to target specific legislation or take down the most egregious of feminists, war is a less useful use of our time than working on ourselves.

It pains me to admit that feminists were successful with their revolution. They had a long laundry-list of changes they wanted to enact and they got it all while men of our generation are left feeling stunned and powerless. But there is something they can never take away from us: the power of choice. It's possible to make choices that avoid their revolution and its effects. You can choose whether to buy products that mock men in advertisements. You can choose which woman to date, and whether or not to take abuse from them. You can choose whether to pay tuition for a college that has a radical woman's studies program. You can even choose whether to live in countries that don't have a feminist stronghold.

Loading…

For me, those choices have already been made. In the past couple of years, except for five months in Scandinavia and one month in America, I have not been exposed to feminist women who have a deep-seated hatred of men, and on the rare occasion I do meet one, I simply stop talking to them. It really is that simple. My only exposure to them is from what I read online, and in that case I don't feel anger but sympathy for the men who still have to interact with them.

If feminism contain lies, and manosphere sites contain truth, that leads to a question of whether we should actively bring in other guys into the fold. Should we expose them to teachings that help them get what they want in a society that is wholly against them? I say probably not. It will just be like trying to teach a guy game when he hasn't hit rock bottom. There will be a part of him that knows it's what he should learn, but he's not yet frustrated or angry enough to accept a new belief system. He'll close his eyes and shake his head like a petulant child refusing to take his medicine.

If a beta orbiter is getting validation that makes it seem like his compliment and cuddle strategy will some day in the next ten years lead to sex, he will not want to suddenly give that up (until he's 30 years old and realizes he's still a virgin). If a man thinks he's in a happy marriage, he's not going to care about men's rights (until he's raped in divorce court and loses custody of his kids). I say forget about feminism and the guys who insist on changing their tampons. I say let them destroy society. With the thousands of us already here, our energy is better spent helping each other instead of trying to change the world. The truth is they already won. The best we can do is find our own happiness.

Read More: The Happy Man

Brilliant Essay On What Capitalism Is Doing To Us

November 11, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Charles Hugh Smith, an economic and cultural thinker, recently wrote an essay that absolutely nailed how capitalism and individualism are destroying America. Here are the highlights:

> This classic analysis of Western liberal capitalist society contends that capitalism—and the culture it creates—harbors the seeds of its own downfall by creating a need among successful people for personal gratification—a need that corrodes the work ethic that led to their success in the first place.
>
> […]

> Narcissism is the result of the consumerist society's relentless focus on the essential project of consumerism, which is "the only self that is real is the self that is purchased and projected."
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> …narcissism has been on the rise for 30 years in advanced neoliberal economies.
>
> In my analysis, this is the direct consequence of the supremacy of a consumerism that is dependent on financialization: an economy dependent on debt-fueled consumption to power its "endless growth" is one that will necessarily implode from its internal contradictions: debt and leverage eventually exceed the carrying capacity of the collateral and the national income, and the narcissism of consumerism leads to social recession, a crippling state of "suspended animation" adolescence and great personal frustration and unhappiness.

Long live America!

Source: Narcissism, Consumerism and the End of Growth

Shortness Of Life

November 12, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This short essay by Seneca, a Roman philosopher who lived during the 1st century, surprisingly has a lot of advice that remains applicable today. He main argument is that nature gives us plenty of time to chase our dreams and be great, and that men who whine that life is too short are those who squander it most.

> It is not that we have a short space of time, but that we waste much of it. Life is long enough, and it has been given in sufficiently generous measure to allow the accomplishment of the very greatest things if the whole of it is well invested.
>
> […]
>
> No one is to be found who is willing to distribute his money, yet among how many does each of us distribute his life!
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> Everyone hurries his life on and suffers from a yearning for the future and a weariness of the present. But he who bestows all of his time on his own needs who plans out every day as if it were his last, neither long for nor fears the morrow. For what new pleasure is there that any hour can now bring?

He states that you should continuously reflect, be amendable to changing the course of your ship, and not give attention to that which doesn't benefit you. The essay was a quick read with a lot of fine quotes. You can download the PDF here.

"It's not that we have a short time to live, but that we waste a lot of it."

Read More: "Shortness Of Life" on Amazon

Communists Are Successfully Destroying America

November 12, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Captain Capitalism posits that the master plan of communism is to destroy women, thereby reducing man's motivation to marry, thereby reducing his economic production (since he doesn't need to work as hard to support a family), thereby hurting capitalist economies.

> Since the majority of this country's (an any other free country's) economic production is based on a man's desire to live a happy life by getting married and (sometimes) having children, if you can destroy the quality and caliber of women, let alone the incentive to get married or have children, you can destroy the economic productive capacity of the United States, and thus the country itself. Thus, you see that feminism really isn't about "helping women." It is nothing more than an thinly veiled economic and political attack against the US, freedom and capitalism. This is why I call it "Killing the American Muse."
>
> Loading…
> […]
>
> Feminism is nothing more than a cover for communists to destroy it and thus destroy your incentive to produce. The question is, though, are they succeeding? And the answer is sadly yes.

It may be a stretch to say that communists planned this all along, but the result is still the same: men no longer have incentive to endure the rat race if they don't have to support a family. There's another strong article which goes into more detail on the link between feminism and communism.

There are several countries where I only need $1,500 a month to live comfortably, eat well, and sleep with different women. That comes out to $18,000 a year. What will it mean for any economy when men only work as much to have a pleasant bachelor's existence?

How To Tell When A Girl Really Likes You

November 12, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

In most cases, you know a girl likes you when she allows you to put your penis inside her, but sometimes the interaction gets cut short and you're forced to get her number.

If a girl asks you to call her after you save her number in your phone, she really digs you.

If a girl doesn't like you, she won't care to get your number because she screens unknown numbers anyway. Having your number is a "just in case" move she only does on guys she wants to see again. Being aware of this lets you know which girls you can take a little more seriously.

3 Responses to How To Tell When A Girl Really Likes You

1. Starting Young & Aiming High
   November 13, 2012 at 10:04 pm
   Is this the same for girls who ask you to text them to get your number instead?
   Reply
   - Roosh
     November 14, 2012 at 6:19 am
     I imagine it would be the same.
     Reply
2. Pingback: Daily Linkage – November 14, 2012 | The Second Estate

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

Competitive Eaters Have Groupies

November 13, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

GQ shadowed a few "competitive" eaters to give us normal eaters a glimpse into their fascinating lifestyles. Let's take a look…

> …he has studied the ingestion techniques of snakes: "Their muscles are contracting constantly. You'll see when I'm eating, there's a constant weird up-and-down motion. I'm using my whole rib cage to compact the food.
>
> […]
>
> …after all of Joey's talk of science and preparation, I was imagining the corned-beef contest to be somehow more graceful and balletic. But as Shea counts down to zero and the eating begins, what I see instead are twelve people grotesquely cramming huge piles of meat and fat-sodden rye bread into their mouths. The juice drips down their arms, saturating their shirts. Their puffed-out cheeks are beetroot red. They resemble sweaty, meat-smeared squirrels.
>
> […]
>
> "I'd never eaten lobster before," Joey told me. "I was 21. I didn't know what the heck I was doing. I was scooping guts. But I tied for third. And the two men who beat me didn't look good. One was Bob Shoudt. He seemed in pain. And I felt fine! I was 'Oh, my God, they look like they're dying. And I can eat so much more!' I knew I was made for it after that contest."

After the cupcake eating contest…

Loading…

> I've never seen so many people experience such a profound sugar rush all at the same time. They're like windup dolls, lost in the middle of nowhere, discombobulated without enforceable rules to keep them steady, pacing around and around, starving for order.

It gets better…

> "I know it's viewed as horror, shock, a sideshow. But when people see us up there, it blows them away. Which is why the groupies are insane."
>
> "Groupies?!" I say.
>
> "I'm thoroughly happily married, so I'm on the sidelines," says Bob. "But I've seen stuff. Doors open."

There are good men right now who work in modern office buildings and can't get laid. But Bob here has girls who want to have sex with him because he can eat 25,000 calories in one sitting. God bless America!

One lesson from this article (there aren't many) is that if you're good at something, no matter how grotesque, you will get laid. The only rule is that it can't involve a cubicle and Dockers khakis.

> The truth is, rarely have I done a story about something that's so utterly, existentially pointless and so emblematic of the American tendency to go way too far.

Read The Article: Clear Eyes, Full Plates, Can't Puke

Why Being A Loner Makes You A Great Leader

November 14, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Great leaders think, and thinking requires solitude. That's the message given to the graduating class of West Point. Some more quotes:

> Solitude is one of the most important necessities of true leadership.
>
> […]
>
> We have a crisis of leadership in America because our overwhelming power and wealth, earned under earlier generations of leaders, made us complacent, and for too long we have been training leaders who only know how to keep the routine going.
>
> Loading...
> […]
>
> Thinking means concentrating on one thing long enough to develop an idea about it.

With technology enveloping us all, especially the younger generation, will it soon be possible to create an original thought not tied to the content we're consuming?

Read The Entire Speech at The American Scholar (HT: Danger & Play)

Street Brawler vs. Muay Thai Fighter

November 14, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

It looked like an even match in the beginning until the domination begins.

Lithuania Hates Me

November 15, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The Lithuanian media has gone apeshit after discovering my book Bang Lithuania. It was written about on the following outlets: Lyrtas, Balsas, Cosmo, Alfa, and Delfi.

Here's a review left on Amazon:

> Wow! I never even imagined that there will ever be such empty, stupid, sick person to write so many books about banging every countries girls…and to be proud of it……You are sick, and I hope you catch some HIV and die. Your lifestyle tells me that you are for sure very lonely and empty, very low self-esteem person. Congrats on all your "victories")

Here's an email from a girl that says I ruined her day:

> So I was enjoying my day, just reading random articles and stuff and then I noticed an article about your book ("bang Lithuania " to be precise) and my mood literally went from well to hell…I used to feel sorry for americans when people kept writing how dumb and fat you all are but I think I've just joined all the other haters… I'm no feminist but that book (and pretty much everything you wrote) is a huge pile of shit, no less. I find you repulsive..talking about women like something disposable, just a piece of meat you can stick your dick into…Well I'm not a fortune teller but I'm 99% sure you'll end up lonely, just you and your precious dick."People over 25 doesn't speak english" . SO WHAT? Most of them speaks both russian or polish or whatever + lithuanian..So 3 languages altogether and that's 2 more languages than an > average american speaks. So you're not really in a place to judge us… I bet your mamma's really proud of you, thaks for ruining the mood, you scumbag >:(

And here's a blog comment:

> What a bunch of sex starved morons! U want a nice intelligent girl for a one night stand? Well,it is not happening! U gotta work harder and longer for that. And bithes…u can find them everywhere. And to all those bashing lithuanian girls (especially) —- I guess u r so desperate and miserable that even bitches say NO to you!

A girl who knows the brother of a blogger I know posted about it on her Facebook:

>

This is the fourth time where I've woken up and had an entire country mad at me. It does make the day a little more interesting…

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Money Over Bitches?

November 15, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

Much debate has been held within the manosphere (particularly over at Roosh's forum) regarding the eternal battle between money and game. Men have taken sides and fought doggedly over the issue of which counts for more with women, but the reality is far more nuanced than the discussions have shown.

The dilemma for women

Women have competing interests when it comes to seeking a mate. On one hand, there is a strong desire for a genuinely "sexy", attractive man who can hit all of her more primal attraction cues (mental and physical). On the other, there is a strong and very practical desire for a provider, someone who can keep her and any of her potential offspring safe from danger and well taken care of (plenty of food, shelter, etc).

Rarely do these dueling desires coexist within the same male. Most men skew to one extreme or the other, with only a very fortunate few managing to be both genuinely attractive dudes and good providers. This creates a dilemma for many women, as they have evolved to want both of these qualities, but can only rarely find a man who has them together.

Some women, however, don't need to deal with this dilemma. When we begin talking about young, western girls (focusing on those aged 18-24), we see a prime example of females liberated from this eternal conflict. Let's use a case study to illustrate. Here we have a young western female:

She’s an attractive, 18-24 year old student in her physical prime and looking the part (an ideal catch for many a guy). Ask yourself: what does a typical American female fitting her description really need? She’s physically protected (the American suburbia in which she probably grew up is much safer than most of the planet is or has ever been). She’s got food and shelter pretty much taken care of thanks to parents (probably at least middle class suburbanites, if not more affluent). She’s safe, secure and well provisioned.

The reality of being young and attractive

And, if at any moment these realities falter, she has an army of (unattractive, but desperate and dedicated) white knights to uphold them and shield her from any cold realities. Maybe she'll feel those realities more later as she moves out from under her parents' wing, loses the ability to maintain a large white knight army and starts to hear a biological clock, but chances are that time will come well after she exits the 18-24 age range in which she is most desirable.

So ask yourself: what need does this young woman or any other similarly aged woman in a similar socio-economic state (and there are hundreds of millions of these across the western world) have for any individual provider as a mate?

Loading...
The answer is not much. This reality should inform any discussion in a game vs. money debate: one must understand the kind of woman you're dealing with. If you're dealing with a woman like this, you have to understand that for her, money (and the providing capacity it enables) may hold less appeal than it otherwise would.

She's got enough of money as is (usually basic needs all met and then some), and she doesn't yet need to deal with many of the realities (ex: student loans, fertility clocks, aging) that might make a typical provider and his (not balling, but still high and probably hard-earned) low to mid six figure salary useful.

Perhaps she'll think a little differently at 27-30, but for now she'd probably prefer to seek the more intangible qualities held by attractive men (read: game). She can afford to do this, because she's not got many tangible issues to worry about. She does not need a provider or a potential father, just a guy who turns her on, knows how to have fun and makes her look good in front of her peer group.

Does game trump money?

The successful young six-figure earning banker/consultant/lawyer is not much better than the broke but "hot" fratstar, the charming starving artist, or the struggling but handsome semi-pro athlete. Her provisioning allows these guys to compete on one (mostly) level playing field where cash-flow can't tip the scales too greatly.

Thus, when pursuing a woman similar to the example above (young, pretty, western, middle-class and in her prime), money is best primarily used to enhance the returns of said game (i.e. purchase better logistics with a more centralized/nice pad, buy better style, etc), and not as a substitute for it. In her case, game will (in all probability) trump money.

Could money still appeal to her?

Of course…but you'll probably need much more of it (more than 99.5% of men will ever be able to muster) in order for her to actually notice. If you don't meet this standard, the inherent romantic utility of your cash is diminished, especially in areas where there are many high earners and even a quarter-million dollars a year does not stand out as much as you'd think (ex: New York, LA).

Are there other situations in which money could hold more appeal than game? Sure, plenty. Are you outside of the West? If so, you're probably surrounded by women who do not have access to the wealth and privilege afforded the everyday western woman used in the example above. They struggle a bit more financially and/or don't have the social safety nets and white-knight armies to protect them that western women do. Their greater proximity to cold realities means money (and its ability to enable provision) may go further with them, even in their prime.

And then there are the cougars

The same goes for older western women who, having gone beyond their youthful prime, are forced to think more about the cold realities a provider might be useful for dealing with. Back when she was 23, a guy merely needed to turn her on and be "hot/cool" enough to earn the approval of her peer group. Now she needs to pay bills, probably desires a child, and her status among her peers is more closely tied to the kinds of things a provider can give (ex: how big is her home, what does her BF/Husband do, how big was her wedding/wedding ring, where does the she/her family vacation, etc) than to the more superficial "hot/cool" standard of her youth.

The point, however, is that there is too much nuance within the "Money vs. Game" debate to declare a true, undisputed winner in all cases. Whether or not money or game will provide a higher return with a given group of women depends heavily on their age, their geographic location, and their culture. It is up to the individual man to decide which tool will provide more romantic utility for him and where.

Read Last Week's Column: Why Demographics Matter For The Younger Man

What A Girl’s Haircut Says About Her

November 16, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

You’ve probably noticed—especially if you live in an urban setting in the United States or Northern Europe—the proliferation of short haircuts among young women.

That includes anything from the chin-length “bob,” to the so-called “pixie cut,” to the supremely repulsive Skrillex do—where a girl shaves one part of her head, while leaving the rest long, in the style of the famous electronica DJ, Skrillex.

One thing I’ve noticed is that there are some clear patterns in girls with short haircuts, versus girls with hair, say, to the mid-back and beyond.

They tend to (be):

More masculine and argumentative.

These girls are more likely cuss to more, challenge you on trifling details, and try to call the shots.

Willing to pay their own way or buy a round.

They may not mean it, but they’ll grope for their wallets and make a convincing “pump fake,” at least.

More interested in emasculated, effete men.

So, naturally, they feel threatened by a “manly” guy. They’ll dismiss a stronger, confident man as a “douchebag,” even before he opens his mouth. You’ll often see them paired-up longer-term with a bearded, vegan, NPR-listener type who doesn’t make a lot of waves.

Easier to get into bed.

In an effort to prove that they can be just like men, they often have sex quickly and with very few hang-ups.

Enjoy their sex on the rougher side.

Instinct takes over in a big way when the stretched out logical rubber-band in their brain finally gets to relax.

Of course there are exceptions and outliers—and these are based on my (still) unscientific sample. But, see for yourself: do you notice any differences in girls with short hair?

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

What’s Happening With The Manosphere?

November 17, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The year is ending in a bloodbath, with many sites closing (read more about it on Donlak and Private Man). It comes down to three problems:

1. Having a manosphere blog could get you fired from work. A lot of guys are closing because they feel their privacy was compromised. Any type of red pill content will be a warning flag to female-dominated human resource departments. You’re obviously not a team player if you question the status quo.

2. It’s hard to maintain a blog for over a year. It takes a freakish mind to write hundreds of posts on one or two topics.

3. Blogging remains a hobby for most, not a job. Most guys don’t get income from blogs like I do, taking away incentive to plow through the inevitable creative cold streaks.

When it rain, it pours, and what we’re seeing now is a natural withdrawal of hobbyist bloggers. Those who are committed to the topic matter will remain. There is no organized attack on the manosphere that I know of.

While it’s sad to see so many comrades fall, it’s just another day at the office for me.

Read More: What Is The Manosphere?

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Human Resources Is Your Master

November 18, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Did you know that you have two mothers? One is your biological mom, and the other is human resources. A guy on Reddit recently found this out when he tried to hit on a girl at work.

Now I think it's common sense to avoid dipping your pen in company ink, but the chat he had with her clearly shows that she actively encouraged him. Not only was she responding with enthusiasm but she used exclamation points to display her interest. See the entrapment for yourself.

When she was satisfied that she hooked his interest, she went straight to HR to complain…

> I get a call from HR a couple minutes ago telling me to stop.

I'm guessing they also told him to cease and desist all non-professional communications with the female victim.

"Sexual harassment" was just the beginning. Now you won't even be able to ask a girl to lunch—after she tells you how great of an idea that would be—without putting your job at risk. I can't help but think of how pitiful a man must feel to voluntarily put himself in that type of environment.

Personally, I rather be a poor English teacher in Ukraine. At least I can flirt with my students.

Read More: American Men Are The Best Slaves

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Finland (And Its Girls)

November 19, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. The street fashion blog Hel Looks does not represent the typical style in Finland. While many girls like to wear bright pastel colors and other hipster garb, they don't typically look like freaks that just stepped off an intergalactic spaceship. Skrillex haircuts aren't as common as in Iceland and Denmark, and I ended up being surprised at how nicely some girls dressed. After the shock of the first day settled down (I did come from feminine Ukraine, after all), I wasn't all too upset with the level of talent I found. They are hands down more attractive than American women.

2. The biggest factor hurting the attractiveness of Finnish girls is not feminine or hipster style but obesity. There is a McDonald's literally on every block, and Finnish people have taken to it wholesale. You can only shake your head when you see a fat Finnish person waiting patiently in line to grab a burger or hot dog after a night of heavy drinking. This is a shame since Finnish people aren't genetically ugly. What ends up happening is that the hot girls have tons of beta orbiters who keep them entertained and busy because no one wants a fattie.

3. Girls are open to dating other races. I saw quite a few brown and black guys with Finnish girlfriends. The kicker is that these guys are speaking in Finnish, so they have integrated into the culture. Liberal guilt is so strong in Scandinavia that girls feel ashamed to not give minority guys a fair chance. You won't encounter racism here.

4. Day game is not the best way to meet girls. They are helpful if you approach, but they don't really bite, especially on the street (better responses can be had in coffee shops). Girls are not as shy as Icelanders but still significantly shyer than Americans. I didn't see the point in day gaming much when I found out that girls were more open at night due to self-drugging themselves with copious amounts of booze.

5. Girls are better looking than Danes and Swedes and are just a hair better than Icelanders. I think the reason that Finnish girls do well is because there has been genetic mixing from the East. Many girls have Slavic inspired faces that make you wonder if they're from Russia or Latvia.

6. Americans are quite novel in Finland. Maybe not as much as in the Baltics or Poland, but you'll meet a lot of people excited that you are from the States. Even if they hate American politics, they want to meet an ambassador to a culture that they generally enjoy.

7. People are incredibly friendly. One time I asked for directions and when I said "Thank you" they replied back with "Thank you." They also seem to be a very trusting people who take things at face value. I'm sure they get scammed a lot when they travel.

8. There are tons of East Africans, mostly from Somalia. The African girls seem to be aiming for a Rihanna look. There are also many cute Asian girls. If you get bored with Finnish girls you can try your hard at some of the more ethnic minorities.

9. The biggest flaw in Finland is that it's really only a summer destination. The winters are long, cold, and dark, meaning that vagina only comes out of hibernation in the summer to get pounded by American tourists. It doesn't help that "summer" can be relative: even when I arrived in early June I got to experience chilly weather.

Other cultural features I noticed: uncomfortable coffee shops that are more like food diners, a strong skateboard culture, and an obsession with sailor hats among graduating students.

Don't Miss: The Helsinki Diaries

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Women Are Like Bread

November 19, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

When a loaf comes out of the oven (puberty), it's warm and delicious. You can't help but stuff yourself. (18-24 years old)

When you leave the loaf out, it gets a little hard. You have to heat it up with a toaster first, but it still won't taste fresh. (25-29 years old)

If you leave the bread out for too long, mold develops. You can cut away the mold, toast the bread, and still be able to eat it, but you won't enjoy it. You'd have to be starving. (30-34 years old)

If you leave it for even longer, mold takes over and completely destroys the bread. There is no way to excise the toxic portions. You must throw it away before the mold makes you sick. (35 and up)

The lesson in this? Live next to the bakery.

Read More: The Sweet Spot

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

An Effective Alternative To Using Deodorant

November 19, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Over a year ago I discovered how baking soda can be used as deodorant:

> I went to the grocery store (I was in Copenhagen at the time), and paid $1.50 for a small container. That night I showered, dipped two wet fingers in the baking soda, and rubbed it into my pits. I figured that it would take a few days to see a noticeable effect, like was the case with the deodorant stone.
>
> The next afternoon I stuck my nose under each arm and couldn't pick out a smell.

A lot of other guys swear by baking soda, but some complain about skin irritation and burning, especially if you put it on your balls. Enter Lavilin, a deodorant cream.

Here's the mysterious product description:

> A unique herbal deodorant free of aluminum and other harsh chemicals, yet so effective, just one application can eliminate perspiration odor for days — without the need to re-apply even after showering.

I used it for one month and can tell you that it definitely works, even slightly better than baking soda. But there are two downsides:

1. It's more expensive. A small jar will cost you over $10, though you need less than a pea size amount per application.

2. It's harder to apply. The cream is super water resistant so it will be tough to wash off your fingers after dabbing onto your pits.

The water resistance is key to Lavilin's success: even if you sweat a lot, the cream will stay on. Compare that to baking soda where sweat causes it to run down your body. The Lavilin cream also seems to kill the bacteria that causes odor, meaning you won't smell much even if you stop using it for days.

What I would do is put Lavilin on two days a week and then give a slight baking soda dab for the remaining days. With Lavilin or baking soda, you really can't go wrong if you want to eliminate body odor.

Learn More: Lavilin on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How I Raised Myself From Failure To Success In Selling

November 20, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After an injury that ended his baseball career, Frank Bettger decided to be a salesman. The going was tough. His conversion rate was low and he questioned if he had what it took to make it. He then started learning directly from the best salesman, and over the course of decades, became one of the best. In this book, he shares all the tips that helped him become a self-made salesman.

“The best way I ever found to help overcome fear and rapidly develop courage and self-confidence is by speaking before groups. I discovered that when I lost my fear of speaking to audiences, I lost my fear of talking to individuals.”

Short chapters give you a nice motivating kick in the ass. Advice includes the simple (plan a schedule) to the complex (word-for-word strategy on closing deals). The main issue with the book is that it’s dated. You may have to make adjustments to apply its face-to-face methods with today’s digital environment.

“The most important secret of salesmanship is to find out what the other fellow wants, then help him find the best way to get it."

The above quote may seem obvious but many men don't apply it. When I first meet a girl, I ask her straight-up what she wants in a man, and then in the following hours I will deliver the part of me that best matches her needs. If she wants a relationship, I'll put out a provider vibe. If she wants fun, I'll be more aggressive and energized.

One tip of Bettger's that I've inadvertently used is finding out why a person isn't buying. If you merely ask "Why?", a person may give a reason that is not the real one. Bettger says you should dig in by saying, "In addition to that, isn't there something else in the back of your mind?" If you don't find out the real reason, you can't give good counters that may change minds. Doing this with women has taught me that oftentimes the reason they don't want to come over is because they're on their period, not because they don't want to have sex.

"When a salesman stops making enough calls, frequently the real reason is that he has lost interest and enthusiasm for his own sales story."

"Prospecting is like shaving… if you don't do something about it every day, first thing you know, you'll be a bum."

This book reminded me that most modern self-help is derivative from older books and that the best ways of selling or living or making money hasn't really changed. While this book won't hold your hand for selling in the 21st century, it does provide a variety of social engineering tips that you can add to your repertoire.

Read More: "How I Raised Myself" on Amazon

You May Also Like: To Be Or Not To Be Intimidated: How To Win Through Intimidation

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

One Man Has Found The Secret To Banging Argentine Girls

November 21, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It's becoming somewhat common wisdom that Argentine girls are tough to bang. I had a laborious time in my approximately four months in the country (first trip vs second trip) and feedback on the forum relays much of the same. One guy wrote…

> I'm definitely seeing short attention span. I've opened sets and had girls all line up to meet me when they hear my American accent then a minute later seem to have no interest in talking to me.
>
> In dance clubs, it's been just a massacre for me. I can't get any girls to dance with me and I've tried a few different strategies multiple times, but still no success at all. The pulls I've seen discussed on the forums seem to be from clubs, so I'd like to improve here.

So it was refreshing to get this email from a guy who seems to have cracked the Argentine girl code…

> Roosh, as you know that social circles are very important. I've been living here for a few years now so I met my Argentine girlfriend through my contacts. But the question is: How does a foreigner visiting here establish the social circles he needs in a shorter time? What I would recommend to any man is to come here to BA (plan on staying a couple or three months here) and hook up with a large church. No I'm not kidding. There are a lot of holy rollers in this city, and some churches have memberships easily in the high hundreds. There's an elderly woman that my girlfriend and I help out occasionally. We've taken her to her > church a few times and always the place was packed with a lot of young poon and easy to meet. I would also like to add that the beauty factor is good. While there are examples of beauty range in 6 and 7, one can also find plenty of 8 and 9s (perfect 10s will always be a a matter of opinion) If you remember the photo I sent to you of my girlfriend a while back then you know she's smokin, and one can easily find that in the churches here. Now I'm not saying become religious, but here is the angle:

> Tell a chick you just moved here, hint about wanting to settle down and start a family. Really it seems that women at churches are fuckloads more friendly and open. Why is that? My speculation: because women know that men who attend church are already, shall we say, 'presenting'. In other words, men by being church going, are already as Esther Vilar puts it, willing to put in the highest bid by bringing the female to city hall for a marriage license. This is due to the fact that the church is a strong advocate of marriage and family, and the male members of the church are already pre-sold on the idea and are willing to march off to the gallows of matrimony.
> This is why an argi woman who meets a guy at church is willing to pretend to be a human being and give him the time of day. And even go out with him, and be pleasant about it. There may be an issue of premarital sex with some women there; perhaps they do not want to fuck until after you tie the knot. But you counter this by saying to her that you understand and respect this, and that maybe it's not God's will that we get married. Your willingness to withdraw your bid (i.e. to maybe not marry her) will almost certainly make her reconsider and change her mind.
> This may sound seriously fucked up, dishonest and underhanded, as well using a (supposed) sacred environment just get get your dick wet. It may even seem hypocritical. But now that you have read Vilar, is there nothing more hypocritical than a female in a church? When a man becomes unplugged and clearly realizes what is going on between the sexes, not just in Argentina but the world, the expression "All is fair in love and war" really applies.

With advice to meet girls in church, it appears that game has come full circle. The next innovative technique may be to write love letters in calligraphy.

Don't Miss: Top 5 South American Countries With The Hottest Girls

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

18 Self-Publishing Tips That Have Helped Me Sell Over 25,000 Books

November 21, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I was in my early 20s, I was fascinated by club promoters. How did they know so many people? How did they reliably fill up the clubs? I tried to be a promoter myself with a friend but we never brought more than 50 people each to the four parties we threw. It was fun, but we weren't exactly successful.

What I didn't understand was that those promoters brought value to other people, not just once, but continually and consistently. Even before they started throwing parties, they'd be the go-to source for asking advice on where to party. They'd always be at the clubs making sure people were having a good time. They'd buy rounds of drinks and make the night a little more enjoyable.

They already had a huge following by the time they decided to throw their first party. This is how bookselling works today. The book is the party, an afterthought to the value you've been bringing before it hit the Kindle store. Readers give you money not just for the book, but for all the free value you gave them before it was released.

I get a lot of emails from guys asking how to make money from selling books. This list is for them…

1. Ask not how to make money—ask how to bring value. How are you going to help or entertain people? No one cares about your goal to make $3,000 a month in book sales. They want to know how your writing will positively affect their lives. If you don't know the benefits that people will receive from your writing, you will not be successful.

2. The blog is more important than the book. I don't know of a single non-fiction self-published writer who is successful without having a blog. We're not in the old times where you can drop a book out of thin air and have it be a best seller. Before you start writing the book, you should have a plan to blog for one year to build an audience. After one year of selfless writing where you ask for nothing in return, you may then start writing a book that you will sell to your readers. If you don't have enough material to maintain an active blog and a book, you won't make it.

3. The snobby author is dead. Readers want to correspond with the people they follow. You can't pull a J.D. Salinger and be "mysterious" by disappearing from the face of the Earth. I remember once I asked an author if his book was available in ebook. He didn't bother responding and I didn't buy it. While I can't reply to every tweet or comment left on my blog, I do respond to over 90% of my emails, even though it takes a considerable amount of time. Today's writer should be more like a friend than an aloof celebrity.

4. The cover is more important than you realize. I know you're thinking, "But Roosh, your covers suck!" This is true, but in my genre guys want nondescript covers that don't get noticed in public. This is becoming irrelevant as we move to e-reading so don't be surprised if my future covers become more descriptive and pretty. The most important thing is to have a cover that looks great as a thumbnail. Take note of Amazon's "Customers also bought" section. If your thumbnail looks like crap there, it will get less clicks. I know you'll be broke when doing your first book, but plunk down the $299 and get the cover done via 99 Designs.

5. You don't need an editor, but you need a copyeditor. Readers hate typos. For them it feels wrong for a book to have them. They'll put up with meandering prose and even grammar mistakes but typos get to them. Go to Elance and find a copyeditor to proofread your book before publication. It's okay to send rough drafts to your friends for free to receive general comments, but you really need a pro to catch all the typos.

6. Don't be stingy with review copies. You have to think long-term with your book, not just the first month of sales. Even if your audience is small, I wouldn't give out less than 10 review copies. For Day Bang I gave out over 30.

7. Price the book at what your readers want, not what you want. This is how most authors price their book: "I want to make $2,000 a month, so if I price it at $20, I only have to sell 200 copies!" Newsflash: your readers don't care how much you want to make per month. They want cheap books filled with content that makes them feel like they are getting a good deal. Therefore your book should be priced low, with absolutely no consideration to how much you want to make. Even I'm surprised how price sensitive customers are.

If someone buys my book for $9.99 and sees yours for $20, they'll ask, "Well, it better be twice as good as Roosh's." If not then they will feel ripped off. You must price your book based on the market, and right now the market is driving prices down. Price it too high and you might as well just announce that you don't want to sell any books at all.

8a. Fighting piracy hurts your readers more than the pirates. If I were to put a password on PDF files, or enable DRM on the Kindle edition, I would just be annoying readers. Pirates can't be stopped, and caring about them shows that you're more concerned about how much you earn than the reading experience of people who buy your book. Make it easier for customers by putting your book on all available outlets, such as Createspace (for paperback), Amazon (Kindle), and Smashwords (everything else). Again, pretend you're a buyer. Wouldn't you want the book easy to buy without DRM? You fail as a bookseller when you encourage a customer to go to Google and search for a pirated copy.

8b. Give so much value that your reader would feel bad about pirating your work. 80% of the information I give is free on my blog or newsletter. About 20% of my writing is packaged into books. So when a customer is faced with a choice to pirate the book or give me money, he chooses the latter. I lost count how many times guys told me, "Your book is the only one I didn't pirate." They know I'm not some soulless corporation, but one guy trying to put out good work.

9. Promote your book, but not too much. Imagine if I plugged my books on every post or tweet. You'd get annoyed because book promos are not value. Don't think that having a large blog readership or Twitter following means people want to receive ads. Outside of book release days, the frequency at which you can promote your book should be "once in a while". Leave a link to the book somewhere on your navigation bar and then shut up about it. People know about your book and reminding them every day is going to turn them off.

10. The blog is more important than the book. Yes I know this is at number two but I must stress how important it is. Even after your book drops, a project that took you god knows how many hours of blood and sweat to make, you have to keep blogging. You're only just beginning! Your blog must be permanent and eternal, while the book is a secondary part of that. If you aren't ready to accept this, your book will not make it in today's publishing climate. Even when I go on a blog break of a couple weeks, I notice a dip in sales. Your blog is the heart that pumps oxygen to your book. Without the blog, your book dies.

11. Pray for luck on Amazon. If your book is in a hot niche and you have decent sales, it will be listed in the "Customers also bought" section of more popular books. My book Bang lists well under The Game and Mystery Method so it has enjoyed nice sales from people who don't even know about my blog.

12. After releasing your first book, get to work on the second. To make a living from writing, one book is not enough. You need to keep going and put book after book after book, all while blogging. A lot of people see my ability to live abroad and don't realize that my income came after blogging forever and putting out, as of this writing, thirteen books. Even though you think you only have one book on you, trust me when I say you'll get the idea for a second after you complete the first. A good goal is to complete one book a year.

13. Use the end of one book to promote another. When you get to the end of Bang, there is a promotion for Day Bang. When you get to the end of Day Bang, there is a promotion for Bang. If someone finished my book, they probably liked it and will be willing to read another one of my books. Sales beget more sales.

14. Stay on top of self-publishing trends. For hundreds of years, bookselling was the same. You put the book on paper and it landed in a bookstore. Things are changing so fast that how I sell books now is completely different than just three years ago. PDF used to be the gold standard, but now I include EPUB and MOBI formats in all my direct sales. Paperback used to account for 100% of my sales, but now it's less than 33%. Thankfully today there are sites like 99 Designs and Elance to hire contractors to help us, along with informative blogs like Joe Konrath and Self Publishing Review.

15. People buy you just as much as the book. Most of the sales from one of my recent books, Bang Poland, went to guys who will probably never step foot in Poland. So why are they buying it? Because they like my work and want to support it. I can open Microsoft Word, take a dump on my keyboard, and call it Bang Your Mom and it will have sales because people trust what I'm doing. This increases your responsibility as a writer because the last thing you want to do is make people feel like they are paying more for less.

16. Information products are still king. Even though I love my memoir A Dead Bat In Paraguay, it gets demolished in sales by Bang and Day Bang. The reason is that people want something that directly benefits them. Plus it's easier to sell an info product—just list how it will help a person's life. It's much tougher to sell fiction and memoirs.

17. Say thank you. Times are tough and that ten bucks that someone just gave you could have gone somewhere else. Don't take your readers' support for granted, and even if it sounds trite, say thanks. You can even use smiley faces.

18. Have sex with groupies. :hump:

Learn More About My Books: Bang Guides

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is This The Most Deluded Woman In The World?

November 22, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Does she not represent the disgraceful state of the Western woman?

0:40: “I got the X factor.” More like man face factor.

0:43: “I’ve got the body.” Of a 15-year-old male swimmer.

1:25: “I’m better than Madonna.” But better than Madonna’s camel toe?

2:08: Bitch got put in her place. Simon Cowell is the only man who can call out a woman on television and not get immediately fired.

Most Western women are already showing shades of this woman’s behavior. I don’t see it getting better.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Synergy Of Game And Money

November 22, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

In my last post, I wrote of a juxtaposition between game and money and how realistic nuance prevents the crowning of either one as an undisputed winner when it comes to pursuing women. In that post, I noted potential scenarios in which one could bring a higher return than the other, showing that both can come out on top in different situations.

Today, I'd like to show the utility of blending money and game in situations where one seems to carry more utility than the other.

Game Over Money

Let us say that you are in a situation in which game may count for more than money on average. Let’s assume you’re a young guy and your targets are precisely the kind of pretty, middle/upper class 18-24 year old co-eds that tend to be more distant from the concerns that money is useful for dealing with.

They don’t want or really need a provider/potential father and instead generally seek guys who look good, know how to turn them on (read: have game), know how to have fun and can make them look good in front of their peer group.

A guy can pass all of those tests with flying colors and be flat broke-money isn’t required here. But does this mean that money has no value in this scenario? Some guys with strong game and low cash flow might make that case.

While a smart player can lean entirely on game when pursuing this female demographic and do quite well, an even savvier player can enhance this success with properly allocated resources. This does not mean flashing your Big Bank/Firm business card and/or your new Porsche Boxster (she probably won’t care or will have seen it a million times before), but it can mean:

A) Increasing your style by purchasing higher quality clothing that looks good and fits you well.

B) Minimizing logistical failures by purchasing a quality, centrally located bachelor pad close to all the action/entertainment (and keeping it well furnished).

C) Putting the pursuit of women aside for a bit and pursuing your own hobbies and passions (travelling the world and seeing new places, taking up martial arts, film-making, extreme sports, etc.) and becoming a more well rounded individual with more genuine and interesting stories to tell.

While money alone will not be enough to lean on, the things it can buy when combined with game can create an individual who is very appealing even to those who don't tend to focus on cash. All three of the benefits above can result in a more attractive, interesting individual that girls will be more apt to want to know. Game is great, but game with money can be much, much better if one can get it. It would benefit any young guy, even one with strong game, to try and evaluate the ways and means in which money could make him a more well rounded player.

Money Over Game

Now let us assume you're in a situation where money may hold a higher return on investment than game on its own. Maybe you're an older guy pursuing women who have gone beyond their co-ed years (aged 27-32, let's say) and are more concerned with the kind of realities money is useful for dealing with. They're thinking about kids (and what kind of future can be provided for them), weddings, houses, and getting out of the rat race.

An affluent beta can pass all of these tests with flying colors even without any game, and draw a sizable number of fairly attractive women who may consider him husband material (even if they may not have given him a look 5-8 years ago). Does this mean that game is not necessary? Some affluent betas (we probably all know a few guys who fit this bill) might make this argument, denying the utility of game completely and arguing that they can get attractive women without it.

As most of us in this corner of the internet are aware, however, the answer to that question ("does this mean game isn't necessary?") is a resounding no. Though the aforementioned concerns may not require much game to be met, the internal female hardwiring for genuine attraction will still remain and will still require a man who understands how to turn her on. Marriage (or an LTR) is not an excuse to exit the sexual marketplace. If a guy makes the mistake of assuming that it is, he can find himself in a sexless marriage, brutal divorce, or much worse.

Game (and the clear, logical insight it provides) can also keep you from getting suckered into a marriage/LTR that you aren't ready for or simply do not want, an important benefit for any guy who'd like control over his own future.

Thus, it would benefit any beta, no matter how affluent, to try and understand how game can enhance his life and make him a better romantic prospect. He can get attractive women without game, but his ability to maintain the high quality of that relationship and ensure the relationship's longevity will be compromised without it.

While there is no undisputed winner in the Money vs. Game debate, there can be clear winners among those who find a way to blend the two together in a manner that best suits them.

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

Top 5 Style Tips

November 23, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The blog Nexxt Level Up is developing a nice archive of style advice. I wanted to highlight the best five posts I've seen so far…

1. The most important thing is fit.

> Even if you're in jeans, a T-shirt, and a hoodie, the fit is what's going to take you from being just another frat guy to being the interesting man who looks good.

2. Adopt the mentality of high-low.

> …mix elements of a dressier wardrobe with those of a more casual one. The go-to staple for this is jeans with a button-up shirt and blazer.

3. Suit up!

> The difference between rolling out in my usual outfit and dressing well was pretty amazing. Several of us rolled out to a college bar and were clearly the best dressed guys in the venue. Girls opened me several times asking why we were so dressed up. We made up a story that I'd just gotten out of a 10 year jail sentence for armed robbery and girls were eating it up. Guaranteed that I'd have been blown out by every girl that I talked to had I been using the same line dressed in jeans and a t-shirt.

4. Go for a more masculine look with a military jacket.

> This year the jacket has quickly become my go to grab and dash jacket while running errands during the weekend or if I know that late afternoon trip will turn into meeting up with friends later for drinks. I've received a few compliments from the ladies as well so I know it's on point. But what I didn't expect was how easily I could work this into my office look. Sometimes I don't feel like suiting all the way up and because of the fit and fashionable look of the Jacket I wear it into the office and it still goes with everything.

5. Look great even if you have big muscles.

> Swap out crew necks for V's and polos. The opening will give you a little extra room in the chest and help you keep everything else the right size. You don't want man cleavage, but showing some more skin keeps your face better framed as well.

There are also good tips on wearing blazers, finding outerwear, and using collar stays.

Read More: 9 Things I Learned From Wearing A Suit

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Careers That An American Education Can Buy You

November 24, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There's a bit of selection bias at work in this video but Peter Schiff still makes a good point: a college diploma is not what it once was. It doesn't help that people are majoring in things like "general studies" (2:07). Here's the video's description:

> President Obama promotes the myth that everyone must go to college. That if you don't go, your life will be ruined — that you will end up waiting tables, or trapped in some other mundane occupation. The truth is, even with a college degree, you may still end up waiting tables, you'll just begin your "career" four or five years later, tens of thousands of dollars in debt.
>
> Here is an example of some of the plumb jobs college grads were able to land during the Obama administration. Not just liberal arts majors mind you, but graduates with degrees in mathematics, robotics, neuroscience, engineering, accounting, business administration, economics, biology, communications, graphic design, marketing, and linguistics.
>
> Of course when it comes to education, it's not just the Obama administration that deserves a failing grade. For years, politicians of both parties have pandered to students by promising more aid in the form of direct or subsidized student loans. As a result, colleges and universities are freed from competitive forces that would otherwise keep tuition low. Easy access to cheap credit enables students to bid up tuition, benefiting the educational establishment at their expense. Politicians secure student's votes by promising relief from skyrocketing tuition by providing even more loans. Ironically, the loans themselves are the very reason tuition is so high in the first place.
>
> Before the Federal Government got involved, college degrees were much more > affordable, and ambitious students from poorer families could easily work their way through. In addition, as fewer high school graduates actually went on to college, not only were college degrees much less expensive to obtain, they were far more valuable to have. With so many high school grads now going on to college, a college degree is actually less valuable in today's job market, despite its inflated price tag, than was a high school diploma in the 1950s. The only solution is to get the Federal Government completely out of higher education, and let the free market fix what the government broke!

>
> For those of you who feel a college degree is essential to financial success consider John D Rockefeller and Andrew Carnegie. Rockefeller dropped out of high school and began working full-time at age 16. Carnegie didn't even go to high school and began working full-time at age 13. Both men were born poor and became self-made billionaires, with estimated net worths at their deaths (in today's dollars) of $670 and $300 billion respectively. To put those numbers into perspective, the richest living American, Bill Gates, who dropped out of Harvard during his sophomore year, has an estimated net worth of just $65 billion.

Read More: Don't Pick The Wrong Major

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Myth Of Male Privilege

November 25, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

What happens when a woman doesn't want a baby? She aborts it. She can go to the doctor for a minor procedure that inconveniences her for a day. The man who impregnated her has no legal right to prevent her from doing so.

What happens when a man doesn't want a baby? Assuming the woman wants to keep it, he is ordered by a court to provide payments. If he chooses not to, money will be automatically garnished from his salary. If garnishment is not an option, he is sent to prison.

A woman can kill life and she is empowered while receiving no interference from the state. A man can choose to merely ignore life and he can be imprisoned, his life ruined. And we live in a society of male privilege?

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Bang A Finnish Girl In Helsinki

November 26, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1. Stay in an apartment or hotel in the Kamppi area of Helsinki. This is the part of town with all the bars, clubs, and restaurants. It also has the train station. I stayed in City Koti apartments.

2. Starting on Tuesday night, go to Millionaire Klub, known locally as Milliklubi. It is right across the street from the train station. The address is Brunnsgatan 12.

3. Drink alcohol. The locals drink copiously so you should too.

4. Approach girls and run nice guy game that I taught in Don't Bang Denmark. Don't be arrogant or overly opinionated. Don't stereotype or generalize. Don't talk about feminism or gender neutrality. Thankfully, Finnish girls are much more likely to let you slide for "being American" than a Danish girl would, but nodding game is still important. Ask questions about her culture instead of making strong statements. A good act to play is that of a confused tourist who is really curious about Finnish culture.

5. At the end of the night, invite the chick you've been talking to back to your crib. Have sex with her.

That's it. I went to a few clubs but when it comes to getting laid with the least amount of effort, Milliklub was the best. It's not even worth mentioning the other clubs. If you are failing in Milliklub (don't see how you would unless you're not putting in the effort), then go to Lady Moon bar right next door.

Here are some photos from the club:

Don’t Miss: 9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Finland (And Its Girls)

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Perfect Woman: Heels

November 26, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I would like to start a new column here at ROK called “The Perfect Woman” to highlight the attractive traits I like in women. I will go over all major body parts and personality to nail down what I believe most men will find most pleasing. Today’s topic is footwear.

If you read my blog, you know I like heels. It’s an important feminine accessory that highlights a girl’s legs and increases the roundness of her ass. It serves as a mating call to men that she is ready to receive male attention. I don’t have scientific proof, but I believe the higher a girl’s heels, the warmer response you’ll get.

I also look for heels as a quick obesity check. Fat girls don’t prefer high heels because their weight tends to cause immense pain in their feet. While heels aren’t exactly the most comfortable of footwear, thin girls can wear them daily without problems (it’s something you see in Eastern European countries). If a girl complains about wearing heels, it’s a guarantee that she’s either fat, masculine, or lazy.

And now for some pictures…

The higher the better! Please go back home with your 2-inch heel and change into something more proper.

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

14 Things Every Guy Should Know About Swedish Girls

November 27, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

[image]

1. Sweden is a modern socialist state that places a lot of value on design. If Apple computer was a country, it would be Sweden. There is incredible detail to designing even simple lamps and chairs. Everything is optimized, logical, and clear, especially in public spaces. Sadly, these spaces are better presented than the women, who are the most overhyped on the planet. My guess is you think every girl there is a blond bombshell, but it couldn't be further from the truth. The talent level competes very poorly with other countries in Eastern Europe.

2. There are two levels of beauty. On the elite level you have a smattering of 8s and 9s with a few 7s thrown in. On the other level you have 6s and below who may have a cute face, but are extremely sloppy with their appearance and are overweight. Surprisingly, Sweden is fat. It's perhaps the fattest country in Scandinavia, though it's a close call with Denmark. Most girls are on the chubby side. If you like thick blonde girls, this may be your heaven.

3. Sweden has been infected with plain hipster style. All the girls wear Converse shoes and black stockings with tears in them. They believe Chucks match with anything, including dresses. Flip flops are to the USA what Chucks are to Sweden. Even guys wear it. The only positive is that you don't see as many Skrillex haircuts like in Denmark.

4. Swedish girls absolutely love Americans. Many have visited the US or worked as an au pair. You're their cultural bridge back to that happy time. The best part of it is that you don't need to drop your background with any special tactic—they quickly sense it with your accent.

5. They are exceptionally friendly. They aren't too sarcastic and won't hit you with the superiority nonsense that you get in Denmark. While friendliness can help turn things into something sexual, don't automatically assume it.

6. Demographics give an edge to women. The sex ratio everywhere is bad, with much more men than women. It reminded me of America. While Swedish guys don't approach, they do have extensive social connections that actually make it worse than if they approached a lot instead. While an approach can fail within a minute or so, Swedish guys get introductions to desirable girls and have automatic long conversations.

7. Girls with boyfriends have a roaming eye. According to modern feminist theory, it's best if a girl bangs a couple dozen bad boys to know what she wants before eventually settling down, but those slutty experiences re-wire her brain in such a way that it can be hard to resist one more go with a bull. Alcohol will be a great excuse to borrow a Swedish girl from her boyfriend. Unlike in Eastern Europe, Swedish girls are not looking to replace their man. Instead they'll go for a brief fling that no one finds out about.

If you have regular contact with her (e.g., you see her every day in the coffee shop), it's easier to pull a robbery than a one-off approach on the street or in the club.

8. It's a social circle driven society on par with Iceland. Even Swedes consider themselves socially awkward, so they depend on their circle to meet people. This is especially true with the hotter girls who have a million orbiters competing for their attention. To increase your chances of getting something, you need to isolate her from the group. I definitely noticed a trend that the prettier the girl, the more likely she has a boyfriend. Regardless of her status, the hottest girls seem to wrap themselves up in a little cocoon. You need to get them alone.

9. Sweden has a huge minority population with many people from Africa and the Middle East. I found the Middle Eastern girls to be slightly better looking than the Swedish girls. The only problem with this diversity is that when you're seeking a Swedish flag in a short amount of time, you'll have less targets to work with. It also doesn't help that the Middle Easterners are snobby, since they "made it" to Sweden.

10. The girls chew tobacco. I remember talking to a girl only for her to pop in a pouch midway into the conversation. I was not turned on.

11. Nightlife is very cliquey. The hot girls have a lot of beta orbiters who are happy wasting their time talking to a girl they most definitely won't fuck for quite some time (or ever). Day game is a fine option, but you still have to deal with the Scandinavian shyness. Being a foreigner who's American gives you an edge, but it can be hard to get the girl to really bite. Grinding it out at night is inefficient. Getting introduced via her social circle will be easier, assuming you can stay long enough to play that angle.

12. To get your flag, your best bet is to spit standard world game. Be a confident American guy and you're partway there. The only thing you need to keep in mind is to be careful about dropping value, cockiness, arrogance, and all those things that may suggest you're better than her. I found Swedish girls to be much more flexible than Danish girls if you break the "rules," but it's something you need to watch. Nodding game plays big.

Definitely avoid talking about "foreign women" and how Swedish girls compare. It's a sore spot since Swedish men are importing Asian women by the hundreds. If you say something she doesn't like, use the excuse, "Well in America that's standard," to make it seem like she's being closed-minded about your culture.

13. You'll have success with Icelandic street game, where you prowl the streets after the clubs close for lone girls. One night I spent 6 hours in the club to get nothing only to get laid with a street approach afterwards. While the clubs have girls, the groups are cockblock factories. Keep your eye out for pairs who don't know anyone.

14. Swedish girls can't handle reality. They are too sheltered within their gender neutral utopia. Any type of remark that references science or the real nature of men and women will get a negative response. What's interesting is that I had way better conversations with Ukrainian women, who spoke bad English, than Swedish girls who spoke fluent English. Ukrainian women see the world as it is. They understand sexual economics and human attraction. They weren't so politically correct that topics were off limits like in Sweden. It's one of the more open countries in Scandinavia when it comes to free speech but I felt censored. Stick to travel, music, and movies, and you should be straight.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Will The Norwegian People Disappear?

November 27, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I had an interesting conversation with a Norwegian woman in a bar the other night. We talked about marriage and then…

Me: “I read that if it wasn’t for the immigrants, the population of Norway would decline. Norwegians aren’t reproducing.”

Her: “No, they do. People have one or two kids.”

Me: “Yes but that’s not enough to sustain the population.”

Her: “That’s good anyway for the planet. We don’t need more kids.”

Me: “In a few hundred years, it’s possible there will be no such thing as ‘Norwegian.’ You don’t care that your race will die out?”

Her: “No because the planet should be saved.”

Me: “So you don’t mind that the Muslims are coming?”

Her: “No, not at all.”

Me: “Yes but the Muslims will reproduce. When I was in Oslo many girls told me of an ongoing rape wave where Norwegian girls were raped by packs of Muslim men. So you are telling me that it’s a good thing your country is being overtaken by immigrants who rape your countrywomen that no longer reproduce?”

Her: “Whatever, it doesn’t matter!”

She got visibly angry at this point and the conversation ended.

Norwegians are perhaps the most liberal on the planet. They are so opposed to other viewpoints that it takes a man to kill 77 people for those views to even be heard. The debate on multiculturalism will rage on…

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Getting Arrested On The First Date

November 27, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

Check out this email I received:

> Last week I went out on a second date with a gorgeous 20 yr old. She is a college student in the town that I live in. I met her at a coffee shop and have slowly created a rapport with her over the last few months. She is close friends with another young girl I used to sleep with. After awhile I texted the other girl I used to have relations with and asked her for the new girls number.
>
> We went out on a first date, it was nice, I had a pleasant time and we parted ways. We didn't speak all week and I asked her out on a second date. We went out and had a great time. All was well until I ended up getting pulled over on our way home for failure to stop at a stop sign and ended up getting a DUI. I got arrested right in front of this girl. This is my first offense of any kind, as I am an upstanding citizen. I was placed into the sheriff's car and hauled away. My 20yr old date was left along with the second officer.
>
> As I sat in jail, after having my younger sister bail me out via bail bond 2 states away. I was told there was a young women waiting for me outside. Abby, my date was there. She stayed and ended driving me home. What a great girl. She drove me home and within 15 minutes I was inside of her. She was one of the most amazing lays of my life and I have had quite a few.
>
> I was amazed at this. Here is a guy, she barely knows, getting arrested on her second date and she lays the hell out of me after picking me up from jail.
>
> It's a fun story and one that highlights the paradox of the female species.
>
> Cheers to the Zen like state of game beyond game. The biggest disservice anyone could do is get married before they are 40. I find that men just keep getting better with age. Getting married before 30 is Jordan retiring after his rookie year.

The game canon continues to grow. Now we can add "go to jail game" to our list of effective tactics.

15 Responses to Getting Arrested On The First Date

1. AneroidOcean
   November 28, 2012 at 9:12 pm
   The e-mail reads like a troll the more and more I read it. A fun story? Involving getting a DUI? I don't doubt at all that women can be attracted to men who go to jail, but the whole thing reads fishy. Anyone else get that impression?

Reply

2. Revo Luzione
November 28, 2012 at 10:06 pm
Sure, Aneroid, it's probably a troll, but it's also plausible. I've been in a similar situation myself, and she got even hotter and wetter when I told her that she was all I could think about when I was in the slammer, which was absolutely true.

.

Reply

3. Wilson
November 28, 2012 at 10:52 pm
Throw the field sobriety test, but be sure to get a blood test after being arrested. You don't want to be the guy who gets 5 years for his 7th DUI conviction just because you wanted to get a double-digit notch count.

Reply

4. Winston
November 29, 2012 at 12:06 am
Agreed with Revo… I have a story about how I was arrested in college (the whole thing was a misunderstanding and nothing bad came of it), but without fail, it seems to turn every girl I've told it to on.

Reply

5. Therapsid
November 29, 2012 at 1:15 am
It's a plausible story. But true or not, it has to be said: getting a DUI by far outweighs the benefit of getting laid by a 20 year old beauty for anyone not a Franciscan monk.

It isn't even close. That DUI will cost him a shitstorm of pussy through lack of mobility and expenses.

Reply

6. Nyk
November 29, 2012 at 5:31 am
"The biggest disservice anyone could do is get married before they are 40."

Good luck with having and raising children with the highest possible IQ then. The genetic load for a man will be quite high by the time he is 40. The alternative is to have kids with the sluts you pump&dump and let them raise them without a father. I don't really know what's worse.

Or you could start practicing game from 12 years of age, and struggle to find a quality woman by 25. I suspect this is no longer an option for most of us, but it could be for our (future) boys if we teach them game from a young age.

Reply

- Wilson
November 29, 2012 at 9:10 am
Selecting the female by IQ would have a much greater effect, and that's not something we do. I suppose a man could also freeze his sperm, though 40 is becoming the minimum age at which a woman will breed, and a 100-year-old nuclear engineer's sperm will be of better quality than those eggs/womb. Game is an adaptation to the obsolescence of marriage, not a reversal

  Reply

- Samseau
November 30, 2012 at 12:58 am
And what is the genetic load for a 40 year old man?

  Reply

- Anonymous
November 30, 2012 at 3:54 pm
You can always get your sperm frozen in cryogenic sperm storage facilities, genius… It's fairly cheap too…

  Reply

7. aaron
November 29, 2012 at 9:01 am
Why's everyone being a fag. It's a cool story.
Reply
    - Red Pill
    November 29, 2012 at 9:57 am
    +1
    Reply
8. Doggo
November 29, 2012 at 9:46 am
It is a cool (and instructive) story, but Jail Game seems pretty hardcore for a newbie like myself. For the time being, I'll stick to Day Game at bookstores, college libraries, and art museums.
Reply
    - Dude
    November 29, 2012 at 4:04 pm
    It's just an example of game and the female psyche at work, not an actual suggestion for picking up girls. Please don't think that getting arrested is worth it to bang some girl.
    That said, if you do get arrested, you might as well use it to your advantage, badboy ;)
    Reply
        - Doggo
        November 29, 2012 at 6:12 pm
        Rest assured I wasn't actually thinking of being put behind bars, but damned straight I'd use getting arrested to pickup girls! I'm now even thinking of whipping up some utterly insane and bogus story involving badboy me and the cops. An idea to ponder, since over the last year or so

I've noticed how much women seem to get off on a well-told piece of bullshit.

Reply

9. monster221
November 29, 2012 at 11:20 pm
i believe it. its "dangerous" and im sure some of you have heard that danger gets the pussy juices flowing.

i went to pick up a buddy from jail once. some girl shows up right after i get there to bail him out for 400 bucks. good lookin broad.

she turns to me and asks me if i know his last name.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

“You Didn’t Have To Make Things Awkward”

November 28, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Not long ago, I was at a “networking event” with some people I know in various professional capacities. The post-business-drinks-and-music part was held at a fancy bar-lounge. There, I spotted a married guy I know talking to a hot Mediterranean-looking girl. Naturally, it wasn’t long before he gathered his things and left the bar. I didn’t hesitate for one-crumb-of-a-second, and subtly swooped in to take his place. I wasn’t overtly hitting on the girl, but her attractiveness was the only reason I was talking to her.

Early in the conversation, the dialog took a weird turn:

> Tuthmosis: So, how do you know him [my married friend] anyway?
>
> Girl: My boyfriend is Canadian.
>
> Tuthmosis: OK, it was good knowing you. [smiling politely, waving, and starting to walk away]
>
> Girl: What? What do you mean?
>
> Tuthmosis: You used the magic word. You were giving me a cue.
>
> Girl: Yeah, but… [stammering]. Well, you didn’t have to make things awkward.
>
> Tuthmosis: I could tell you the same thing.

I said all of this with a smile on my face, but she knew I was being more serious than joking. The conversation pretty much ended there, but I quickly learned that this girl was going around the room and complaining to anyone who would listen about what I’d “done to [her].” Several people asked me about it throughout the night, much to my own mirth.

I explained.

> This girl made things awkward first, for me, by forcefully and transparently > inserting her boyfriend into the conversation. It was obvious that that she was trying to prevent me from hitting on her, even though I'd made no obvious overtures. I merely bounced her awkwardness back at her—apparently to her great discomfort.

>
> So, let's see if I have this straight: a man is somehow supposed to 'play it cool' when a girl eliminates the possibility of a romantic connection? Look around. There are at least a dozen cute, stylish, single chicks here. Yet, I'm supposed to continue to regale this girl with my stories, make her laugh with my jokes, and lavish her with validation, despite the confirmed fact that I have zero chance of getting with her? She can use the social weapon of selectively withdrawing from part of the conversation, but I can't?

I was surrounded by girls the rest of the night. I became famous in that room.

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

Is This The Most Horrible Woman In Washington DC?

November 28, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The latest edition of Washington Posts' Date Lab featured a woman with perhaps the worst attitude I've seen. She insults her blind date right from the beginning:

> I got [to the restaurant at] about 10 of. They said that he had called ahead and he'd be running late. My first impression was just: a nice, handsome guy, a typical D.C. guy, like he left Farragut North-land to go to dinner. Your typical D.C. bro-bro. That's what I call them: bro-bros. They're like a LAX[lacrosse]-bro, but not; now they have, like, real jobs, they have to look the part, but kinda goofy, like they don't know what's going on, but they do, a little bit.

She deems herself witty:

> It was difficult; like, what do we have in common? And then I was like, "Have you seen 'Seinfeld'?" I judge a lot of people off of that; you can read a person. I was shocked to learn that there's someone else out there that is witty like me, who doesn't care and just does that.

She also hits us with some wisdom:

> A blind date is great in theory, but the problem is that it's just like meeting a complete stranger.

:monkey:

She even drops a reference to Sex and the City. All that was more than enough ammunition for guys on the forum to air their views:

> What a banal bitch. Typical middle class urban woman; thinks she's much smarter and wittier than she is, thinks she's cultured because she watches TV, total sense of entitlement gleaned from chick TV(actually mentions Sex and the City) and magazines and has nothing to offer a man.
>
> Is a 4 who looks older than she is. Probably has occasional dates with betas, but mostly sits home watching Lifetime and diddling herself with her sex toy collection. Any doofus who marries her is going to regret it.
>
> The guy laid a pretty good smackdown: David: Her personality didn't engage mine whatsoever. I didn't find myself being compelled to find out more about her. She talked a lot about, like, movies and TV shows, and [it was] not an interesting conversation to me. I think, in that sense, we didn't connect on any level. The whole thing was pretty superficial.
>
> —
>
> Maybe I'm starting to become enlightened, or maybe it's just the realization that women aren't as complex as I once thought. That woman is slowly coming to the conclusion that her alpha-male disguised as a white knight may never show up. And she's bitter about that. She's had dates in the past with guys she really liked at first, only to realize a month later that they weren't who she thought/hoped they were. Again, she's bitter about this. She's watched Sex And The City religiously and believes that Sarah Jessica Parker was spot on in her assessment about men at large. And most importantly, that woman realizes she may not be as desirable now as she was in High School or even College when there was always a beta nearby to kick around until Mr. White Knight showed up on his fucking horse. She's full of realization, and she's bitter about it.

In case you're wondering how she looks, here you go…

Imagine a city of hundreds of Caitlin' running around, thinking they're witty and awesome, and you have Washington DC.

Don't Miss: What A Pump & Dump Looks Like

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Limits Of American Feminism

November 29, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There is much fear within the manosphere regarding the potential for the spread of American style feminism to other parts of the world. Many have voiced concerns that soon there will be “no escape” from this ideology because it will have taken hold in every society around the globe, “polluting” every culture.

This, I contend, is not a realistic scenario, a fact that becomes clearer when you analyze the reasons for the rise of this ideology.

The Necessary Condition

The primary roadblock to the expansion of American style feminism beyond a trivial level in many cultures is that other men simply do not put up with the kind of things that their American counterparts are willing to tolerate. This is important because men must agree to accept feminist imperatives before they can take hold.

The women who brought about the major shift towards the feminine imperative that we saw here in the USA during the latter half of the 20th century were not able to do this because of their physical strength or social dominance. It was their men (who controlled all major political, economic and social structures in American society) who allowed their aims to come into law and gain social legitimacy, and have largely allowed for this legitimacy to grow in recent decades.

The feminine imperative absolutely requires male acquiescence to start making headway. Put simply, men have to be willing to listen to its proponents and then allow their desires to come to fruition.

The Acquiescence of the American Male

In the USA, this is all a given because men here worship their women and define themselves in the context of their ability to satisfy the feminine imperative. American men allow their women to badmouth them in public with no consequences, flake with no consequences, and cheat/cuckold their men with no consequences.

They emasculate themselves in the media and in their personal lives in order to amuse their women. When women here behave/dress/speak in a more masculine manner or plump up, men here accept it and excuse it. When women here begin shaming men for being men and try to force them to adhere to the feminine imperative (example: talking down a guy in his mid-30's for seeing a woman in her early-mid 20's), men here capitulate and accept it, and even occasionally begin shaming one another for failing to do the same.

Women here know they can basically behave in any way they please and still have reasonably decent men willing to get with them and even praise them, while the legal system (still run largely by men while its laws are enforced primarily by men) enables much of that behavior. Men are desperate to please them, and will go to war for the right to white knight for an even moderately attractive woman.

As much as some men here complain about some of the effects of feminism, the reality is that American women are doing only as much as they are allowed. When they are aware of the fact that any complaint they make (no matter how trivial) will be taken seriously on a social level and likely even given some legitimacy in the eyes of the law, what incentive is there for them to be more reasonable? If you could request anything and stand a reasonable chance of getting it, wouldn't you do so confidently?

When they know they have an army of white knights ready to grant any wish they make, what incentive is there for them not to make the wish?

This is why the Anglosphere is so much worse when it comes to gender dynamics than other parts of the world, at least from a male perspective. It is in these societies that women have the least incentive not to step on male toes, and it is also in these societies that men voluntarily cater the most to the feminine imperative.

Refusal

The rest of the world simply doesn't have that tolerance. Several Slavic societies are well known for this, but even in parts of Western Europe you do not find the willing acceptance of female obesity and masculinity you see in the USA. In Italy a noted senior-citizen playboy who made little attempt to hide his dalliances with much younger women held onto the Prime Minister's seat for over a decade. Could you imagine Americans electing a similar character who so openly and shamelessly flaunts his masculinity? A mere blowjob was enough to get Clinton in serious trouble and JFK (probably the closest thing to a modern American Berlusconi we've seen) had to keep his affairs under wraps.

Deep down, there isn't any substantive difference between women here and elsewhere (those who migrate and grow up in the Anglosphere generally prove this by behaving similarly to natives), but in their cultures they simply aren't allowed to get away with the things their Anglo peers can. Why? Men won't put up with it. You just rarely see Africans, Caribbeans, many South/West Asians, Slavs, some Mediterraneans or Latinos supplicating en masse in the way that men reliably do in many Anglo nations (particularly the USA). They simply refuse to be shamed and aren't willing to constantly apologize for being male.

You can't have American feminism as we know it without extremely apologetic men who are ready to roll over.

The best defense against the kind of anti-male feminism that dominates here in the USA will come from men stepping up, ceasing to roll over and then actually being men, not lap dogs. Women simply won't respect anything else. Male populations that already do this have little to fear from American feminism so long as they continue. Male populations that fail to do this are their own worst enemy.

Athlone McGinnis
Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

This May Be The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

November 29, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

For the longest time I've been studying foreign language vocabulary with index cards. Problem is there's no optimal way to dump old words from my stack and introduce new ones. How do I know when I've mastered a word? How many new words should I attempt per day? These questions mean I'm experiencing inefficiencies that retard the learning process. Along comes Memrise, a web app that is flashcards on steroids.

Memrise quizzes you on words with a multiple choice and fill-in-the-blank system. More importantly, it helps you memorize words by telling you a mnemonic that other users have found helpful. Here's what the founder of Memrise had to say about his system in a recent Guardian article:

> "The idea of Memrise is to make learning properly fun," Ed told me over coffee on a recent visit to New York to meet with investors. "Normally people stop learning things because of a bunch of negative feedback, such as worries about whether they'll actually get anywhere, insecurities about their own intelligence, and a sense of it being effortful. With Memrise, we're trying to invert that and create a form of learning experience that is so fun, so secure, so well directed and so mischievously effortless that it's more like a game – something you'd want to do instead of watching TV."

I've been using it for Polish and it's 100% more enjoyable than paper flashcards. The key elements, I believe, are that it forces you to type in the words and tests you just enough so that you don't waste time on things that your brain already knows. It also has a built-in braking system that forces you to stay away so you don't burn yourself out.

If you have spotty internet, you can also try Anki, a software based flashcard system that achieves a similar result.

Read More: How I Learned A Language In 22 Hours

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

British Author Hates American Women

November 30, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> I spent five years living in Manhattan and, frankly, I'd rather stick pins in my eyes than go out on date with another American woman.

Is this sour grapes or he is accurately describing reality?

> They invariably had a check list of questions that they shamelessly ran through over the course of the evening. What did I do for a living? What part of town was my apartment in? What kind of car did I drive? It was less like a romantic encounter than an extremely tough job interview.

Reality!

> Even when I managed to jump this fence, I was still a long way from the finish line. North American women have a reputation for promiscuousness that is thoroughly undeserved.

Sour grapes!

> When American women complain that there's a shortage of eligible men what they mean is there's a shortage of tall, unattached, rich men who still have their own hair.

Reality!

> American women judge potential partners according to how many attributes they possess rather than what they're like as people. These are, in descending order: social status, net worth, physical appearance, apartment, summer house and, a long way down the list, personality. No man is held to possess any intrinsic value > – we’re all just the sum of our assets.

Both!

The author is your typical beta who doesn’t understand why he can’t meet a nice American girl by just being himself. I understand his grievances, but New York City is not a place where you can be an average guy and pull desirable women. He was actually so embittered by his experience that he wrote an America hater book called How To Lose Friends And Alienate People. What a loser for not having a good time in a country and then writing a mean book about it!

:roosh:

Read The Article: It’s Hard Dating American Women

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Iranian Rappers & Persian Porn

November 30, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a travel memoir of a British guy who decided to hitchhike to Iran from France because he hated his job. He nicknames the first Middle Eastern person he meets Saddam, which tells you the type of humor you'll encounter.

The author turns out to be a stereotypical backpacker who is hanging on to his limited funds in order to see an entire country as cheaply as possible. The trip ends up being framed from the lens of his poverty where we're exposed to nonstop stories of him negotiating with taxi drivers and hotel clerks. There were also a handful of "I think I got ripped off" anecdotes.

I'm well aware that Iranian people are very generous (if you go into an Iranian home you'll be offered everything short of a bride), but the Brit takes advantage of that in order to get free stuff from an impoverished people. He justifies it by saying "They're just so giving!" There was one scene where an Iranian man let him stay at his house, sleep on his bed, and eat his food. The Brit offers no payment, then converts $600 US in front of him at an exchange counter. Immediately after, he goes off to buy lunch for a hippie

Swede and his girlfriend who he had earlier made fun of.

I can’t help but see him as a charity case, constantly receiving goods and even money from people. I would be embarrassed to write a book where I accepted money from old people, but he does it without any shame. If your trip is dependent on receiving charity, maybe you should work two months more to increase your bankroll. Or shorten your trip by just a bit.

Besides my dislike for the writer, the story itself is lacking. The characters are not developed. There is no tension. He visits only restaurants that are in his Lonely Planet guidebook. He insists on not having a watch or alarm clock yet he stresses out on if he’ll be on time for trains. There was no real ending either—it simply stopped. His trip in Iran may have been amazing, but this book wasn’t.

Read More: “Iranian Rappers & Persian Porn” on Amazon

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Women Are Like T-Shirts

December 1, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When a t-shirt comes out of the factory (puberty), it’s crisp and bright. People compliment you on your new shirt (18-24 years old).

After you wear the t-shirt a couple of times, the fabric loses elasticity. You no longer get excited when wearing it because people have already seen you in it. Your eye starts to wander on new t-shirts (25-29 years old).

After a couple dozen wearings, yellow pit stains develop in the underarm area, especially if you’re of Middle Eastern descent. You stop wearing it in public, and only put it on when you’re doing work around the house (30-34 years old).

Eventually, holes develop in the fabric. It has been used too many times. Now it is only good to clean the toilet bowl before finally being placed in the trash. (35 and up).

The lesson in this? Live next to the t-shirt factory.

Don’t Miss: Women Are Like Bread

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at

RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Most Amazing Takedown Of Hipsters I've Ever Read

December 1, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have a love-hate relationship with hipsters. While I dislike how their culture degrades the appearance of women and encourages them to mutilate their bodies with tattoos and piercings, I do like how hipster girls seem to want to have sex with me. Either way, I couldn't help but smile when a French-influenced writer took down the whole sub-culture…

> To live ironically is to hide in public. It is flagrantly indirect, a form of subterfuge, which means etymologically to "secretly flee" (subter + fuge). Somehow, directness has become unbearable to us.
>
> How did this happen? It stems in part from the belief that this generation has little to offer in terms of culture, that everything has already been done, or that serious commitment to any belief will eventually be subsumed by an opposing belief, rendering the first laughable at best and contemptible at worst. This kind of defensive living works as a pre-emptive surrender and takes the form of reaction rather than action.

She argues that hipsters became ironic because they have nothing to live for and no big dreams to accomplish. Their only goal is that of a nihilistic aesthetic where they ask themselves if they appear interesting to the mirror mirror on the wall.

> …ironic living bespeaks cultural numbness, resignation and defeat. If life has become merely a clutter of kitsch objects, an endless series of sarcastic jokes and pop references, a competition to see who can care the least (or, at minimum, a performance of such a competition), it seems we've made a collective misstep.

The men I've met through my blog and forum have displayed a surprising lack of irony. I believe communication with men should consist of an efficient exchange of value in the form of stories, information, and wingmanship, something that the hipster culture seems diametrically opposed to. Sadly, hipsters seem content foraging through the past instead of living in the present.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Zara To Stop Expanding In USA Because Americans Are Too Fat

December 2, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A sign your country is too large is when a company decides that it's just not worth it to re-tool its fashions to accommodate the size of your countrymen's fat asses..

> "Would you expand in the United States?" Fraiman asks. "Zara to me is a European store for European style; it's very fashion forward. And what is the problem in America? They don't fit in the clothes. So why do it? Having to make larger sizes makes production so much more complex."

I am a regular customer of Zara because it’s the only store that I can consistently find nice clothes in Europe. At 6’2″ with broad shoulders, I fit comfortably in their large size. If you can’t fit into Zara clothing, you’re fat. Sorry. Hit the gym and eat less food.

Don’t Miss The :laugh: : Morbidly Obese Girl Posts Picture Of Herself In Bikini

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Eastern Teaching Methods Are Superior To Western

December 2, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you have two textbooks in front of you, one from the United States and one from Russia, you'll immediately notice a big difference: the American textbook is full of pictures and colorful diagrams with short captions. The Russian textbook is just blocks of text. From a young age, the American educational system indoctrinates students to be entertained while learning, which has the effect of shortening their attention spans and limiting the amount of material they can learn.

Another big difference that was recently highlighted in the NPR article Struggle For Smarts is that hard effort is looked upon as weakness in America…

> In Eastern cultures, Stigler says, it's just assumed that struggle is a predictable part of the learning process. Everyone is expected to struggle in the process of learning, and so struggling becomes a chance to show that you, the student, have what it takes emotionally to resolve the problem by persisting through that struggle.
>
> […]
>
> "We did a study many years ago with first-grade students," he tells me. "We decided to go out and give the students an impossible math problem to work on, and then we would measure how long they worked on it before they gave up."
>
> The American students "worked on it less than 30 seconds on average and then they basically looked at us and said, 'We haven't had this,' " he says.
>
> But the Japanese students worked for the entire hour on the impossible problem.

> “And finally we had to stop the session because the hour was up.
>
> […]
>
> in the Japanese classrooms that he’s studied, teachers consciously design tasks that are slightly beyond the capabilities of the students they teach, so the students can actually experience struggling with something just outside their reach. Then, once the task is mastered, the teachers actively point out that the student was able to accomplish it through hard work and struggle.

If it’s easy, then you’re not learning the material. You can apply this to not just learning but life.

Read More: The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Winners Of The Commenting Contest

December 2, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There were a total of 1,224 comments posted since this site launched a little over a month ago. Here are the five winning comments that were picked at random.

1. Torsten
2. Kanevast
3. Dr. Giggles
4. Revo Luzione
5. Doggo

Each man will receive a $15 Amazon gift certificate. Congrats!

:banana:

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

December 3, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
My fourth day in Sweden I was in complete shock that the country could suck so hard after all I had heard about it. I understood why Karl and so many other Swedes high tail it to South America, a place where it's far easier to get a more beautiful and feminine woman.

Ironically, while Swedish guys leave Sweden for South American women, many American guys are going to Sweden to find Swedish wives. I'm confident this is a mistake. Going from American girls to Swedish girls is nothing more than a lateral transfer. After you get past a Swedish girl's curious personality, you're still burdened with a hyper feminist chick who won't ever make you a sandwich.

In the end, Sweden isn't the answer for guys like us. You're not motivated to run day game because it's hard to find cute girls in isolation and they're often dressed like hipster bums. And you don't want to go out at night because it's expensive, it has a lot of sausage, and you're up against the cockblock army.

You really have to know which venues to hit, which nights to go, how to crack massive groups, and how to perform surgical extractions, though I must say that being American really helped—I can only imagine how being from a "boring" neighboring country like Germany or Holland would make things harder. Sweden may be fine to party for a weekend, where it's possible but not easy to get your flag, but I wouldn't commit more time than that.

Don't Miss: 14 Things Every Guy Should Know About Swedish Girls

Hungry For More? Read This: The Best Sex I Ever Had

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Worst Thing That Can Happen To Any Man

December 3, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Men in the United States are being tortured every day, sometimes for up to twenty years, and yet there is no complaint. The method? Solitary confinement.

> More than 80,000 people were in solitary confinement in the United States in 2005, the last time the federal government released such data. In California alone, at least 11,730 people are housed in some form of isolation. What is unique about Pennington—if being one of thousands can be considered unique—is that he doesn't know when, or if, he will get out of the SHU. Like at least 3,808 others in California, he is serving an indeterminate sentence.

The author of the story served time in an Iranian prison, and comments that he much prefers the one in Iran, home of our supposed barbaric enemy.

Should we feel sympathy for Americans locked up in solitary confinement, or let them rot as they are? I guess that depends on the type of society you feel yourself a part of.

Read The Article: Solitary in Iran Nearly Broke Me. Then I Went Inside America's Prisons

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at

RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Passive Game vs. Active Game

December 4, 2012 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

[image]
When men think of the word “game,” there is a lot of confusion when trying to pinpoint which behaviors attract a woman. Men usually break down into two camps.

“He got her because he’s rich/handsome/tall/has an awesome job.”

The first camp believes a man gets women not because of who he is, but what he is. The second camp is exactly the opposite:

“He got her because he has tight game.”

Both camps have valid points. A man who is rich, handsome, tall, and has an awesome job, has clear advantages over the average man. Yet there are plenty of rich/tall/handsome men resorting to hookers or working obscene hours with no vagina to show for it (except an aging gold-digger wife).

Likewise, a man with game would be nothing if he was broke. So which camp has it right?

They both are, but they’re talking past each other. The missing distinction is between passive and active game.

Passive game includes all the ways you can improve oneself over long periods of time, such as earning money, building a career, lifting at the gym, getting a fashion overhaul, learning a new language, and acquiring drugs for use as party favors.

Active game includes your immediate behaviors that directly affect an interaction with a woman, such as being charming, funny, witty, displaying some backbone, remembering to ask to use her bathroom when you drop her off at her house, etc. It’s what most players refer to when speaking of a man’s “game.”

Ideally a man wants to have strong passive and active game. Both are necessary to getting laid at all, but, depending on the man, it can be profitable to focus on your passive or active game.

Passive game will determine the quality of the women a man attracts, while active game will determine the quantity of the women he bangs. Passive game gets a woman's initial interest, but it takes active game to close the deal. Passive game is the product, active game is the sales pitch.

So if a man wants to bang hotter girls, he needs to increase his value via passive game. But if his dry spells are unacceptably long, he should be spending the majority of his time developing his active game.

Which side of your game needs improvement?

About the Author

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

19 Photos That Show How Starbucks Is Destroying Coffee

December 4, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is what coffee used to be:

Espresso

Black olive Chablis

Thanks to Starbucks, this is what coffee has become:

STARBUCKS
COFFEE
sixthseal.com

STARBUCKS

STARBUCKS COFFEE
TRENTA
Volume: 916 ml
ADULT HUMAN STOMACH
Average capacity: About 900 ml
Maximum capacity: 2,000 – 4,000ml

WISH
STARBUCKS COFFEE
hope
9. Caramel Brulee Crème 590 calories
CallMeThirsty.com

MELON
RASPBERRY
ORANGE
Nutrition Facts
Valeur nutritive

The Frankenstein drinks that Starbucks foists upon the masses consists of obscene amounts of sugar. In other words, they profit on the sale of sugar for sugarholic Americans. They deceive people into thinking that they are drinking “coffee.”

With most of their drinks masked by sweeteners, they have no incentive to refine their coffee product to have a robust taste that you could get in South America or Europe. The best thing that can happen for the future of coffee is if Starbucks goes out of business.

Don’t Miss: Jack Lalanne Predicting America’s Sugar Epidemic

Roosh Valizadeh

Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Is The United States Really Experiencing A Skills Gap?

December 4, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Employers like to complain that there is a skills gap. They claim that they want to hire workers, but there are none qualified. Positions remain unfilled while job-seekers continue trying to find employment.

A reporter for the New York Times attempts to debunk this narrative in a piece called Skills Don't Pay The Bills. It claims the problem is not a skills gap but low pay. Compensation is so low for high-tech jobs (manufacturing engineering is used as an example) that there is no incentive for anyone to attain the needed technical skills.

> This is partly because advanced manufacturing is really complicated. Running these machines requires a basic understanding of metallurgy, physics, chemistry, pneumatics, electrical wiring and computer code. It also requires a worker with the ability to figure out what's going on when the machine isn't working properly. And aspiring workers often need to spend a considerable amount of time and money taking classes like Goldenberg's to even be considered. Every one of Goldenberg's students, he says, will probably have a job for as long as he or she wants one.
>
> […]
>
> Eric Isbister, the C.E.O. of GenMet, a metal-fabricating manufacturer outside Milwaukee, told me that he would hire as many skilled workers as show up at his door. Last year, he received 1,051 applications and found only 25 people who > were qualified. He hired all of them, but soon had to fire 15. Part of Isbister's pickiness, he says, comes from an avoidance of workers with experience in a "union-type job." Isbister, after all, doesn't abide by strict work rules and $30-an-hour salaries. At GenMet, the starting pay is $10 an hour. Those with an associate degree can make $15, which can rise to $18 an hour after several years of good performance. From what I understand, a new shift manager at a nearby McDonald's can earn around $14 an hour.

Many comments to the article highlight the greed of the company owners, but let's follow that thought to a logical conclusion. Capitalists want to make as much money as they can. They take risks with their investments to purchase labor and capital in order to operate a business and reap profits. Their goal is to minimize their investment while maximizing profit, but they will almost always invest $1 if it will make them more than $1.

What's happening is that leaving positions unfilled doesn't hurt profits compared to filling them at a wage that the NY Times or job-seekers would find to be most agreeable. For whatever reason that you can attribute (e.g., slack in demand or uncertain global manufacturing conditions), it is not worth the capitalists' investment to hire more labor. More investment will not give them more profit, or else they would do it.

It's also not hard to find out about other corporations that are sitting on a mountain of money without hiring labor. If these companies are truly greedy, they would expand their operations to make even more money, but again, current economic conditions signal to them that an increase in investment will not yield more profit.

Articles in mainstream publications like this inform labor that manufacturing engineering does not pay. They now have a choice to avoid that industry. When the capitalist senses that expanding his operation would yield greater profit, he will increase his starting salary from $15 an hour.

The fault lies neither with the capitalist nor labor. The fault lies in an economy that doesn't justify expansion or high wages. Greed is actually the driver of investment, greater profits, and employment, not for limiting the size of businesses.

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Myth of Never Hitting a Woman

December 5, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

No one around here is for hitting or brutalizing women, but there's an enduring myth—that persists right up to the present—that you should never hit a woman. No matter what. As you can see from this PSA, this notion goes right up to the top: the President and Vice-President of the United States are saying it to your face. This isn't a Democrat-Republican issue. This isn't an Obama issue. This is a Western phenomenon, that long predates—and will long out-survive—this administration.

The problem is that this whole idea is predicated on several problematic assumptions. Among them are that:

1. Women never hit anyone, including men.

2. Hitting women is somehow worse than any other forms of unilateral violence (e.g., women hitting men, men hitting weaker men, or adults hitting children).

3. Women never provoke men, with inflammatory actions that—while not violence per se—are designed to elicit a reaction, humiliate them, or destroy their possessions (e.g., smash their car).

4. Hitting a woman immediately renders all of the prior circumstances irrelevant.

5. Mutual fights between women and men are impossible.

Real "domestic violence" (what I'd broadly define as uneven, unilateral forms of violence—bullying, essentially—between people in certain types of relationships) is a serious matter—one that should be legislated and punished. But, when you create an across-the-board, over-simplified rule that you should "never hit a woman," you basically reduce domestic violence to only unprovoked, male-to-female violence. Plus, it feeds an existing culture that grants women virtual carte blanche to act however they want—including hitting men—with little fear of serious legal, physical, or social consequences.

Loading...

If she hits him, he must have done something wrong. If he hits her back, he's abusive. In this calculus, men always turn out in the wrong. Meanwhile, a man will receive all three consequences—in spades—if he merely responds with the same exact level of violence. He'll likely get his-ass stomped by white knights. The cops will arrest him. And, people who learn of "his actions" will shame him.

Despite the countless problems with this appalling state of affairs, I'd say a majority of men, in my social circle at least, know how to handle a situation when a woman becomes violent at a bar, at home, or on the street–pushing him, getting in his face, punching him, or dumping a drink on him. They walk away, tell the bouncer, or restrain the woman until she calms down. He's expected to–and must–display the patience, restraint, and physical resilience of a saint.

But more importantly, what kind of women do you create as a society when you take the now-anachronistic notion (thanks to feminism) that women are in need of special protection to its logical extreme, selectively keeping that in place while removing other so-called out-dated notions of gender?

Comedian Bill Burr put it funniest, but here's what it looks like in action.

Read More: What A Girl's Haircut Says About Her

Parting Words From A Dying Man

December 5, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Linds Redding spent 25 years in the marketing business until being diagnosed with terminal esophageal cancer. Before he died in October, he wrote an article called A Short Lesson In Perspective where he shares the things he's learned. He also laments that his job wasn't as satisfying as he thought it was. Here are the highlights:

> The trick to being truly creative, I've always maintained, is to be completely unselfconscious. To resist the urge to self-censor. To not-give-a-shit what anybody thinks. That's why children are so good at it.
>
> […]
>
> Our technology whizzes along at the velocity of a speeding electron, and our poor overtaxed neurons struggle to keep up. Everything has become a split-second decision. Find something you like. Share it. Have a half-baked thought. Tweet it. Don't wait. Don't hesitate. Seize the moment. Keep up. There will be plenty of time to repent later. Oh, and just to cover your ass, don't forget to stick a smiley on the end just in case you've overstepped the mark.
>
> […]
>
> It is a universal truth that all artists think they a frauds and charlatans, and live in constant fear of being exposed. We believe by working harder than anyone else we can evaded detection. The bean-counters rumbled this centuries ago and have been profitably exploiting this weakness ever since. You don't have to drive creative folk like most workers. They drive themselves. Just wind 'em up and let 'em go.
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> The other thing I did, I now discover, was to convince myself that there was nothing else, absolutely nothing, I would rather be doing. That I had found my true calling in life, and that I was unbelievably lucky to be getting paid – most of the time – for something that I was passionate about, and would probably be doing in some form or other anyway. It turns out that my training and experience had equipped me perfectly for this epic act of self-deceit.
>
> […]
>
> But what I didn't do, with the benefit of perspective, is anything of any lasting importance. At least creatively speaking. Economically I probably helped shift some merchandise. Enhanced a few companies bottom lines. Helped make one or two wealthy men a bit wealthier than they already were.
>
> As a life, it all seemed like such a good idea at the time.

This is not the most uplifting article you will read, but it may help you realize whether you’re on the correct path.

Even more poignant is the post he writes when he knew he was going to die…

> “Since the last CT scan, there are new and enlarged supraclavicular and mediastinal and nodal metastases, new uper abdominal and retroperitneal nodal metastases, and new liver and pulminary metastases.”
>
> I feel the hot burn of adrenalin wash through me. “Shit, that doesn’t sound good.” I finally announced, with what in retrospect was admirable understatement.
>
> “No it doesn’t” says Doctor Dave.

May he rest in peace.

The Perfect Woman: Lips

December 5, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This edition of The Perfect Woman will discuss lips. Here are the six qualities that make for perfect lips:

1. Soft like an overly ripe banana. It not be so rigid that it feels like making contact with a lizard.

2. Dense like a pillow. There should be some give so that any impact with your own lips or sexual organs is met by pliable resistance.

3. Lack of herpes sores. It is not preferable for her lips to have red sores that are crusty or leaking blood.

4. Lubricated like a car engine. It should not be chapped and rough. This quality tends to go hand in hand with softness.

5. Pouty like a young child. Her lips should have a heart-shaped curvature that draws attention to her mouth and the physical pleasure it has evolved to give you.

6. Lack of piercings. Lip piercings are unnecessary adornments that provide no pleasure to the man, and should thus be avoided.

Here are some pictures of perfect lips:

Loading...

Read More: The Perfect Woman: Heels

Is Feminism Its Own Worst Enemy?

December 6, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

We in the manosphere have made plenty of fuss about the impact of modern western gender feminism on society, and much has been written regarding what should be done to cope with it. Given time to ponder the subject, however, I've come to wonder if much needs to be done at all. Feminism seems set to hurt itself absent any aid.

Low Fertility Rates

The closer a woman's ties to modern third-wave feminism, the less likely it appears that she will reproduce herself. Those more distant from the movement (more conservative and religious populations) are, conversely, reproducing the most. The most loyal foot-soldiers of this movement are urban liberals. These people simply do not replace themselves, and sport some of the lowest fertility rates of any demographic.

They're already slowly eroding themselves as a portion of the wider population, an action that has consequences in a democracy. I suspect that their failure to reproduce may not bode well for the persistence of their ideology, especially with their polar opposites multiplying so rapidly.

Female Unhappiness

A growing number of women who have bought into the modern feminist guide to life are apparently not all that happy. Many of them are succeeding financially (now often surpassing men) only to regret their lack of a family/mate (something that their adherence to modern feminist ideology often precluded).

They're finding that they don't actually want to work like men forever, and that they do want to be mothers even if it comes at the expense of career progression. They're finding men even more unlikely to commit than they were before, since they've made sex so cheap and abundant (as sex-positive feminists have encouraged them to do), thus inadvertently giving men an upper-hand in the modern mating game.

Most importantly, they're finding out that life is not actually like Sex and the City, where you can ride the cock-carousel until your mid-30's and still somehow easily snag Mr. Big and then have a happy family once you've "had your fun" and "found yourself".

In real life, Mr. Big either pumps and dumps you or just ignores you altogether for another (usually younger) woman, leaving you a) alone, b) regretting waiting this long and passing up other romantic opportunities before and/or c) settling for much less attractive men than were previously available (men who aren't so good at turning women on). Much of the time, women find themselves unable to even locate "Mr. Right" at all. They're settling more and more, and they are not happy about this.

The Infestation of Weak Men

Loading...

Women have seen the bitch-made men produced within the last 30-40 years as a result of the efforts their mothers/grandmothers/aunts made to create a more "sensitive" form of masculinity. They've spent a lifetime growing up with and watching these men getting in touch with their "sensitive side" and placing them on a pedestal simply because they have vaginas.

Instead of settling for these "nice" dudes, they've rightfully friendzoned them and started openly fantasizing about Christian Grey, immortal/un-dead bloodsucking flesh-eaters, and ruthless criminals on bikes, among other less than nice things.

Their mothers thought they could burn a few bras, spout a few whimsical/fantastical truths and get around their own DNA. Their daughters (who are not boomers and have grown up in a much less ideal time with less room for fantasy/error) are realizing that this won’t work, and they’re just coming to terms with that…slowly.

They’re gradually starting to understand that the “have it all” meme they were sold is a lie-compromises must be made. They’re starting to understand that 40 is not in fact the new 30 when it comes to attracting the men they want and having the children they want.

They’re also starting to come to terms with the fact that, regardless of what the politically correct/feminist narrative taught them to hope for, they can’t stand weak men. The mass of modern “nice guys” born from the early feminist movement, who are above all nonthreatening and eager to satisfy the feminine imperative (as they were taught), simply don’t turn them on.

They try, but they just can’t warm to the weak men that feminism produced for them in the way they can for more traditionally masculine males.

Their vote to this end is being made quite clear in real life (masses of “nice guys” left twiddling their thumbs and jerking off or getting cuckolded/divorced raped) and in the media, where the men they worship are the polar opposite of the real “nice guys” whose company they are often forced to keep in daily life.

The younger generation of women is facing these pitfalls as they become more and more evident. Maybe I'm being too optimistic, but I'm not going to count on all of these girls failing to learn a lesson from their predecessors. Something has got to give.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: The Power Of Feminism

Crazy Spinster: “Single Women Should Have Weddings!”

December 6, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

It’s becoming clear that The Atlantic is one of the leading troll organizations in American media, right behind the New York Times. Their “war between the sexes” articles seem to be explicitly designed to make men look like retarded children who are incapable of keeping up with today’s strong and independent woman. Here are some articles from just the past month:

- More Women in Foreign Policy Could Change the World
- The End of Violent, Simplistic, Macho Masculinity
- How Men Benefit From Having Female Mentors
- How America Is Still a Patriarchy
- Why Women Are Too Tall and Men Are Too Short
- Why Are Women Paid Less?

It doesn’t help that they have brought recognition to hack female writers such as Sandra Loh and Kay Hymowtiz. But they’ve recently outdone themselves with a nonsensical article by professional spinster Millie Kerr, who believes that single women shouldn’t have to wait until finding a man to experience a wedding…

Loading…

> Back in 2003, Sex and the City identified a cruel reality about single life: There’s no single-person’s equivalent of a wedding—a time when people travel from afar to bring you gifts and toast your life decisions.
>
> Carrie Bradshaw said, “If you are single after graduation, there isn’t one occasion when people celebrate you” besides birthdays, which we all enjoy.
>
> Despite a proliferation of single adults, little has changed since that episode aired nearly a decade ago: trips are not planned when we’re promoted at work, nor crystal glassware gifted when we buy our first homes. It seems that milestone celebrations are still reserved for couples and families.

It used to be the case that a woman would have to find a man in order to be a bride, but now that we’re in the middle of a dark period of humanity where unattractive spinster women believe they deserve to “have it all,” men are no longer needed. There will be no incentive to please a man to get a wedding proposal if the very idea of marriage is being destroyed and turned into a girl power exhibition of validation seeking. I wish Ms. Kerr the best of luck in her solo wedding…

Read More: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

The Father Of The Term “Sexual Marketplace”

December 7, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This novel is about a 30-year-old Parisian computer programmer who hates his life. He shares his daily tasks in and out of the office while throwing up Seinfeld-esque commentary for every human encounter he has. It’s a cynical work that makes you see the negative side of human nature and all the annoying social trivialities that we partake in without thinking about it.

There wasn’t much in the way of plot—just a stream of consciousness from a man who is approaching a nervous breakdown The only interesting part of the book is his analysis and commentary on modern life, but there are too few insights to hold this book up, no matter how capable the writing is.

> In a totally liberal sexual system certain people have a varied and exciting erotic life; others are reduced to masturbation and solitude. Economic liberalism is an extension of the domain of the struggle its extension to all ages and all classes of society. Sexual liberalism is likewise an extension of the domain of the struggle, its extension to all ages and all classes of society.

From Wikipedia we learn more on what the author, Michel Houellebecq, thinks about sexual economics:

Loading...

> A recurrent theme in Houellebecq’s novels is the intrusion of free-market economics into human relationships and sexuality. Whatever alludes to economic competition extending into the search for relationships. As the book says, a free market has winners and losers, and the same applies to relationships in a society that does not enforce monogamy.

Roissy/Heartiste has fleshed out these ideas for an American audience with his blog, bringing the phrase “sexual marketplace” onto the lips of many men who understand the perverse effects that demographics, choice, and hypergamy can have on relationships and ultimately society.

> In reality the successive sexual experiences accumulated during adolescence undermine and rapidly destroy all possibility of projection of an emotional and romantic sort; progressively, and in face extremely quickly, one becomes as > capable of love as an old slag. And so on leads, obviously, a slag's life; in ageing one becomes less seductive, and on that account bitter. One is jealous of the young, and so one hates them.

In spite of finely crafted passages like the one above, this is a boring book about a loser who is unable to cope with modern life, but the ideas that Houellebecq has put forth concerning the relations between the sexes (way back in 1994) has taken hold and made it easier for men to understand today's reality. In many ways he correctly predicted the future.

Read More: "Whatever" on Amazon

Are Sweatshops Coming To America?

December 7, 2012 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Ever wonder how Amazon.com gets you a product in three days or less?

(Source)

Loading…

Amazon.com is probably one of the most successful and fastest growing companies in the United States, and is the world's largest online retailer.

In between corporate favoritism, crushing inflation, globalization, and ObamaCare making full-time workers cost prohibitive, will the United States adopt the China model in order to stay competitive?

Read More: Today is Day Zero in the Destruction of Man

Airbnb Is Changing The Game For Love Tourists

December 8, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

One of the hardest parts of being a love tourist is finding comfortable lodging on short notice for a decent price. Now that Airbnb, a vacation rental site, has gone global, you can roll into almost any city in the world and have a nicely decorated apartment to discreetly bring back girls for love making, often at cheaper rates than hotels. In exchange you get not just a place to sleep but a home with fully equipped kitchens and private bathrooms.

Pros:

- The site allows you to triangulate an area in the city that you want to stay in. This is very handy if you know the spots you'll be primarily running game. Always do research on the nightlife before trying to find an apartment.
- It's easy to hit up multiple landlords at the same time in search of a better deal.
- There are a huge number of listings for all major cities in North America and Europe.
- Apartments usually have no identifying marks that tell girls you are staying for the short term.

Cons:

- It's best suited for short stays. Monthly rentals are too expensive.
- Airbnb rapes you with a ridiculous fee of up to 12%. When you see pictures of their luxurious offices, you get an idea that not all that money is going just to maintain the site. They're setting the stage to be undercut by a competitor like Wimdu, Housetrip and Roomorama.
- Owners may give you a bad review if you make too much noise or leave vaginal blood on the sheets

The key to using Airbnb is to find desperate landlords who are new to the site and will give you a low price in order to get paid and reviewed. If you're staying for longer than a week, you'd be a fool to not shop around and ask for discounts. There are a couple strategies to booking long-term and you should pick one that gives you the best price.

In the past I would have to depend on just a handful of agency rentals that were poorly designed and sometimes located in undesirable parts of town. Now I can go to a city and live right next to the nightlife zone. While Airbnb is not cheap, it will increase your options.

Read Next: Sex Tourists vs Love Tourists

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

You Can Now Be Arrested For Bad Game

December 8, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A month ago there was a story out of the USA about a man who gave a non-consensual hug to a woman and was promptly captured by police for sexual assault. It has been out-done with this one story from Toronto…

> The attack occurred shortly before 1 p.m. in the basement of Stong College, located near Keele St. and Steeles Ave. W., near the campus art gallery, according to a security bulletin posted Friday morning.
>
> A female student was allegedly approached by a male who asked her if she wanted to dance. The victim told police the suspect grabbed her hand and pressed himself against her. She pulled away and the man fled.
>
> Loading…
> […]
>
> Police arrested a 24-year-old Mississauga man on Saturday evening. He is schedule to appear in court on Jan. 15.

If you attempt to grind on a girl, and she rejects you, you can now be arrested. Toronto is the same city where a men's rights speaker was shouted down with profanity by unkempt women and their beta orbiters…

Toronto seems to be the epicenter of feminism in the Anglosphere. It's bad enough to warrant a 13 page forum discussion discussing its many faults.

Read More: The Myth Of Male Privilege

You’re A Misogynist

December 8, 2012 | by The Friend | Link | Original Link

If you like video games and read up on them, there’s a good chance you’re a misogynist, but that’s no worse than being a supplicating puppy dog or a stuttering beta tub of lard if you ask me. But you better be careful with that woman-hating attitude of yours, or you’ll get caught up in a $200 million dollar class action lawsuit if you can find a lady lawyer to take your case. It seems misogyny can be found everywhere these days, even at a women’s apparel retailer if you happen to be black.

I don’t know what all the hubbub is about with this gender inequality stuff since women call the shots at home and go on to be awarded permanent alimony while men are told to figure it out on their own. Maybe it’s just me, but I’d rather be an Alpha female trying to retain her title, or a woman falsely accused of feminism or even a female college student fending off a drunken kiss than be a man trying to worm my way out of a false rape accusation. Then again, some women have the decency to make false rape accusations and not bring a man into it — unlike those British Nanny types who shouldn’t be called sluts simply because they can’t take no for an answer or function without an Alpha male.

In the end, if you’re falsely accused of rape because your partner didn’t enjoy it or if the state of Maryland orders you to pay $6,000 per month in alimony and child support to a woman you bought with a goat, you can always move to Russia.

Now you know what I know. We’ll chat next week. Don’t forget to follow me on twitter.

5 Responses to You’re A Misogynist

1. Heh
   December 9, 2012 at 12:22 pm
   On the Maryland alimony story — my solution is deport both their asses back to the Congo!
   Reply
2. John Galt2
   December 9, 2012 at 12:53 pm
   Gentlemen – check out this outrageous story in the Wall Street Journal (from 2009)
   http://online.wsj.com/article/SB10001424052748703399204574505700448957522.html

30 YEARS after a divorce agreement, the ex wife comes back to the trough like the pig she is and rapes him for more money. There is no escaping the court system!

The modern man is a fool to marry in today's society. An absolute fool.

Reply

3. mccock
December 9, 2012 at 3:20 pm russia keepin it alpha heard in japan the woman takes the kids and disappears and no alimony

Reply

4. Heh
December 9, 2012 at 5:10 pm
"in japan the woman takes the kids and disappears and no alimony"

Kid not kids… that's if they bother to breed at all, which they usually don't.

Reply

5. Power Hydrant
December 9, 2012 at 6:13 pm
"in japan the woman takes the kids and disappears and no alimony"

True, but to Japan's credit it's actually pretty hard to get a divorce compared to the West, so much so that it's debatable whether Japan's really a Marriage 2.0 country at all. And most of those cases are clueless drunken white guys who married Japanese women, so it's a bit skewed; I wonder if it's the same for Japanese guys.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

Do McDonalds Workers Deserve High Pay?

December 9, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

McDonald's workers are going on strike because they feel their pay is too low.

> "They're not paying us enough to survive," 21-year-old McDonald's worker Raymond Lopez tells Salon. "This company has enough money to pay us a reasonable amount for all that we do … they're just not going to give it to us as long as they can get away with it."
>
> Strikers are hoping to unionize and get wages raised to $15 an hour.
>
> Lopez, who says he makes $8.75 an hour as a shift manager, also complained about "verbal abuse" and having to work off the clock "all of the time."

Mr. Lopez thinks that his wages should be nearly doubled. I would ask him two questions:

1. Is there a scarcity of labor in the market that would make it hard to replace your job at $8.75 an hour?

2. Is there not another employer who would hire you at the wage you believe you deserve? If so, why don't you work for them?

Lately there is a strong push for corporations to pay a "livable wage." The problem is that what's a livable wage for survival is not the same as a livable wage for an American who wants the accouterments of a first world lifestyle.

Loading…

Is it the moral duty of McDonald's to provide a higher wage than the market supports so that Mr. Lopez can purchase the latest smartphone with a 4G data package? Should unskilled workers be able to afford internet, cars, nights out at the club, Chipotle, and so on? Is it fair to deny them these purchases by letting the market decide compensation during times like this when labor is in surplus?

If McDonald's provided all it's workers with $15/hour jobs, their profits would decrease. Shareholders will not accept decreasing growth, so McDonald's will have to raise their price of food to maintain profits and their share price. This means that Mr. Lopez will be funded not by capitalist money but by McDonald's customers, who now have to pay higher prices. If customers choose not to pay higher prices, the business will collapse and Mr. Lopez, along with many of his peers, will be out of a job.

The "livable wage" movement doesn't hurt employers—it hurts customers. It results in increasing prices in order to pay labor more than their market value. If you support a "livable wage," then you support decreasing purchasing power of not only your income, but everyone else's. Instead of livable wage proponents forcing us to pay higher prices for McDonald's hamburgers, how about they donate their income directly to Mr. Lopez or other charities instead? I doubt you'll find anyone in opposition to that.

Read Next: Is The United States Really Experiencing A Skills Gap?

Being Popular In School Is Overrated

December 10, 2012 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

Every time a college or high school aged young man asks for game tips there is always one piece of overused advice thrown about: the most important thing for young guys in the game is to “be popular.” While being popular is indeed important for very young guys as they game girls from their own respective schools, telling guys to become popular as a blanket statement does not address the subtleties of how it affects your game.

Instead, younger guys should focus on improving their game by cold approaching. Their popularity in school will naturally improve as as a result.
Your school is a massive friendzone when it comes to you and the girls, and the smaller the school and the longer you have gone there the more so that this is true. As such, popularity is not enough. Being well liked by your peers simply means that you have been already been put into the friend and classmate category by the majority of the cute girls and that you get invited to house parties. Popularity is literally is only a foot in the door to get into them, yet you still need game to be able to pull at them.

On the other hand, being not only popular while having a reputation for being a player act together in synergy, turning girls who would have been firmly friendzoned you into prospects when they are open for fooling around both inside and outside of the party scene.

Only a minority of “popular” guys in school are players. Most of them will have had a girlfriend or two during their schooling years, being popular in itself hardly means that vagina will rain down from the sky like much of the marketing hype for young guys game advice on the internet implies.

Unfortunately, unless one were to begin quite young, it is difficult for a non-natural to gain a reputation for being a player within their school, simply because learning game requires that one approach a large volume of girls one has never met before, meaning they will be outside of the wider social circle of your school.

Therefore it’s not a good idea to tell young, up and coming high school aged guys to merely become popular in school. Instead, young guys need to cold approach as many girls as they can outside of school and improve their social skills and confidence. As they do this, they will gradually become more and more popular in their school.

The most important lesson for young guys to take from this is that improving your game is your number one priority rather than becoming more popular, the later of which will become totally moot once you finish school.

Read More: Why Demographics Matter For The Younger Man

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

Why Are Icelanders So Blasé About Sex?

December 10, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here's an excerpt from Bang Iceland:

> I once had a lady come up to me and say, "I'm here alone and I'm leaving soon." [Getting laid doesn't get] easier than that, but unfortunately she was atrocious, so I passed. Still it's worth mentioning that such propositions have never happened to me anywhere else in the world, ugly or not. Just as how Brazilian girls view a kiss as meaningless, akin to a handshake, both young and old Icelanders view sex the same way. In fact, I barely even had to kiss girls before sex. So little foreplay is needed that you must prepare yourself for encountering dry vaginas (I always pack Astroglide so that problem didn't affect me).

Iceland is the first place where I had sex with a girl whose name I didn't know (and who didn't ask for mine). Not until after sex did she start asking me personal questions that in most countries are typically asked before penis goes inside vagina.

There are two reasons why sex has little meaning in Iceland:

Loading...

1. Icelandic feminism encourages women to have sex with anyone and everyone. In Iceland, sex for women is a path to self-discovery where she can "learn" about herself and discover her place in the world. Icelanders think a lot of sex is actually the path to wisdom, even if it happens to be under absurd amounts of alcohol.

2. There's nothing else to do. Can you imagine how boring it is to live on a cold island in the middle of the ocean? Besides fishing and fucking, there really isn't much more to fill your days with. Of course Icelanders enjoy creating music and surfing the internet, but having sex is one of the main ways they keep themselves busy.

The surprising thing about Iceland is that it's not that cold—the European mainland has much more frigid temperatures. But when it comes to the Icelander approach to sex, nowhere is colder.

Learn More: How To Sleep With Icelandic Women In Iceland

Instagram Is Jumping The Shark

December 10, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

College Humor makes fun of Instagram users in the above video with such viciousness that I wonder if it will turn fans off from the service.

I tried to use Instgram earlier this year. I thought its hipster filters were cool because it made my low fidelity images look like they've aged dozens of years in a basement shoe box, but in the end I got no value from it. I really didn't care to view photos of what other people were eating or seeing. I didn't care about the everyday-irony that exists in the world. I didn't care to share insignificant images of my life experience.

Loading...
It turns out that Instagram is no more than an outlet for women to attention whore. While in the past a girl would have to manually upload any bathroom self-shot of herself to Facebook, Instagram gives women a one-click option to get adoration from her internet fans. Proof that it's utterly useless for men is the fact that they can't even get laid from it, something that you can at least do on Facebook.

If you want to be serious about photography, buy a camera and take real pictures. In the end, no self-respecting man would actively maintain an Instagram account. Thumbs down all the way.

Read Next: Women Who Own iPhones Lose The Ability To Love

Have You Swallowed The Red Pill? Take The Test

December 11, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There's a lot of guys who claim to haven taken the red pill, but I suspect there is a sea of blue still swirling within their core. To find out if that's you, watch the following three portions of the above video:

0:47 – 0:53
1:22 – 1:34
2:24 – 2:31

Time to grade the test:

1. Did you think what you just witnessed was the most heart-warming thing in the world? If yes, you're drowning in blue pill.

2. Do you wish you could have a female friend like the Indian man in the video? If yes, you're still blue pill.

3. Did you think there's nothing wrong with being friends with a girl? If yes, you're bluer than the ocean.

4. Did you run to the nearest bathroom and throw up in the toilet at his display of supreme betatude? If yes, you're red pill.

Loading...
5. Did you viscerally cringe and actually get angry at the world when the girl said, "You're my best friend in the world, and you always will be" while the beta withheld his tears of emotion? If yes, you're blood pill!

One problem with swallowing the red pill is that you will get offended at just about everything that mainstream people enjoy. You can no longer digest their media, enjoy their viral videos, or even have a normal conversation with a blue piller. You form your own red pill bubble, whether it's frequenting sites on the manosphere, not dating women from blue pill societies, or outright expatriating to countries where men are rewarded for being masculine. Long live the red pill!

P.S. I make an appearance at 2:24.

Read Next: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

How I Learned How To Stay In The Game

December 11, 2012 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Before I had entered law school, I decided to take up a sales job to make some extra cash. During one of the daily prep talks, a man dressed in a brown-grey custom-fitted pin-striped suit stood before us in the center of the room. He looked at all us all, Alec Baldwin style (without the anger), and gave a speech.

"I've been doing this for over ten years, and I can see myself in a lot of you. I remember when I graduated college. I didn't have any direction. I had several maxed out credit cards. Next week, I'm going to Aruba with my fiancé. I know it can seem really intimidating from your position, since you have years of hard and uncertain work ahead of you, full of good times and bad."

He cleared his throat, and walked to the back of the room.

"I'd like to share a story I learned when I was first starting out, and I've kept with me to this day. It taught me how to stay in the game."

> A boy in ancient China traveled into the mountains each day to fetch fresh water for his family. He would ride his horse to a small spring in the mountains, fill up his buckets, and ride back down to his family's farm.
>
> One day the boy was attacked by bandits along the road, and he lost his horse. He went back home to share the news with his family.
>
> When the rest of the village found out what happened to the horse, everyone said, "That poor family, that poor boy. How unfortunate! What will they do without a horse?" But the father of the family just shrugged his shoulders and said,
>
> "Is this a good thing, or is this a bad thing?"
>
> In the following days and months, the boy went into the mountains with his younger brother to fetch water. The work was grueling and required several trips. This continued for several months until, one day, they came across a pack of wild horses. The boy thought of a way to trap a horse, and he and his brother caught one.
>
> When the rest of the village found out about the new horse, everyone said, "What incredible fortune! Oh, how we wish we could have another horse for free!" But the father of the family simply shrugged and said,
>
> "Is this a good thing, or is this a bad thing?"
>
> Loading…
> After taming the new horse, the boy resumed his daily fetching of water. He grew fond of his horse and acquired fresh water without issue. However, during one trip into the mountains, a storm began to grow. The boy was too far from home and the storm raged. A bright lighting and loud thunder shook the nearby trees > and startled the horse. The horse kicked back in fear, and threw the boy onto some rocks, breaking his arm.

>
> When the rest of the village found out about the boy's injury, everyone said, "That poor boy! That poor family! What will they do with one less hand on the farm? Surely they will suffer!" But the father just shrugged his shoulders and said,
>
> "Is this a good thing, or is this a bad thing?"
>
> After two weeks had passed, the boy went into the mountains, with only one good arm. Fetching water was slow and tedious.
>
> But in the ensuing weeks, the local warlords of China grew furious with each other. War came. The general of the region came into the boy's village and recruited all males over the age of fourteen. But when he saw the boy he said, "Oh, this one has a broken arm. He will be of no use to us." He left the boy behind.
>
> Everyone in the village said, "What extreme fortune! Their boy was spared! Oh how we wish we could keep our sons."
>
> But the father of the family shrugged and said,
>
> "Is this a good thing, or is this a bad thing?"

The salesman stood silent for ten seconds, then he spoke:

"And so the moral of the story is to stay humble and never consider anything a success or a failure. When I close a deal worth tens of thousands, I ask myself, "Is this a good thing, or is this a bad thing? When the day goes by and I haven't made a sale, I ask, "Is this a good thing or a bad thing?"

Accept that you do not know the future, and don't get too carried away by the ups and downs of the job."

As the salesman left the room, I could see that the message had fallen on mostly deaf ears. I left that job, but I took the story with me. Every time something happens, and I feel uncertain, I always ask myself that question.

Although I have never been able to answer, here I remain in the game.

Read Next: The Foundations of Value, Part I

The Power Of Shame

December 12, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

When I was in elementary school, there was this fat girl we used to call “Hamburger.” She got that name because she had a habit of hanging out with this skinny girl (“Hot Dog”) and the contrast between their physiques was funny to our 11-year-old eyes. Hamburger would try her best to respond to our taunts, but my buddies and I had silver tongues, and would come back with an even funnier retort to whatever she could muster. Crowds would gather. She eventually recognized it was best to let things be.

It seems mean in retrospect, but everyone got it from someone at one point or another. Among the boys, we had a practice where you’d get “jumped” for saying something particularly idiotic. As soon as the silent consensus that what you’d said was retarded had set in, someone would yell, “jump ‘em,” and everyone would get in a few not-super-hard-but-also-not-light smacks in. I got my fair share of those.

Hamburger seemed to follow me from year-to-year and managed to stay looking the same until about the ninth grade, when she suddenly dropped a solid 40 or 50 clicks over the summer. It took a second to recognize her the first week of school, but it wasn’t long before I realize that there had been a reasonably cute chick under all those loaves of fat. Before long, she had also dropped Hot Dog from her lineup and was kicking it with a higher-end crowd. Things were looking up in Hamburger’s life.

Back then, they didn’t have a fancy label for what we’d done. Nowadays, they call it Fat Shame—with a capital F and S–and it can get you suspended from school, put on television, medicated to oblivion, or even arrested. Worse still, someone might make a Facebook group to reassure the subject of your observations that they aren’t really fat, or that it’s somehow okay.

There is now a well-entrenched Fat Apologist movement in the West, one that makes it wrong to even point out to people the plain truth. Unlike other forms of discrimination, fatness (especially among young people) is almost entirely under the control of the person in 95 percent of the cases—despite what many fatties and their apologists would have you believe. Celebrities like Adele fearlessly and crassly parade their fatness in your face. After all, what are you going to do about it?

Loading...

Just this week, a well-publicized story made the rounds where three morbidly obese tanks complained to the management at the unhealthy diner where they were strapping on the feed bag that night. Apparently, their waiter had typed in the words “Fat Girls” in a field on their receipt intended to help him identify the clients. The giggling manager almost succeeded in buying their silence off with food (an astute move on his part), but he made the mistake of low-balling the offer.

I'm convinced our steady social pressure back in elementary school played a role in Hamburger's improvement. In fact, our collective checks and corrections improved all of us. In an unwritten, unspoken code, our little community of school kids corrected one another's behavior. Whether it was an unacceptable level of fitness, making idiotic jokes, or tattling, you knew you were accountable. Your reputation mattered, and the last thing you wanted to do is embarrass yourself or others. Things have sure changed in a short while.

Don't get me wrong: shame culture is alive and well in America. Just certain types of shame have been deemed unacceptable, while others remain totally okay. Imagine if that table had been populated with fat dudes, and the receipt had said "Fat Guys."

What would have happened then?

Read More: The Anti-Male Commercial

Which Language Course Is Best: Michel Thomas Or Pimsleur?

December 12, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I finally got around to checking out the Michel Thomas course for Spanish after getting many recommendations from readers. The audio course is a recorded classroom instruction done by the late Michel Thomas, a Polish borne linguist and World War 2 adventurer.

His talent comes in breaking down the language into component parts and then providing simple rules and mnemonics to help you remember. For example, his "nose rule" for Spanish tells you that you should stress the second-to-last syllable in Spanish words that end with n, s, or a vowel. I've been studying Spanish for a while and never was taught a rule to remember the stress. His course is like an audio version of Madrigals Key To Spanish book, which I found to be extremely intuitive and practical.

I was initially skeptical to learn Spanish from Michel since he's not a native speaker, but his insistence on mastering pronunciation helped me more than learning from actual native speakers. His method strongly focuses on clarity, something I desperately needed as women have often told me that my Spanish sounds "robotic" because of not enunciating the vowels. I quickly got used to Thomas' accent and enjoyed his soothing, paternal coo.

The Thomas course is a mixture of instruction and call-and-response, unlike Pimsleur which is solely call-and-response. I understand the Pimsleur argument that if little kids don't need to be taught grammar rules then you don't either, but we're not little kids. Telling an adult a rule can make him understand the language a lot faster, so I'll have to give Thomas' course an edge in helping you understand the nuts and bolts of the language.

Loading…

Pimsleur courses aim to burn the rules into your head unconsciously, but it kills you not to know the rules. Adults need to know the why. Thomas helped me clarify the basic rules of Spanish that I should've already known.

Pimsleur does have an advantage in that it teaches you more touristy phrases that help you get by in a country from day one while Thomas focuses on casual conversation. Another positive with Pimsleur is that it gives you a lot more vocabulary, especially verbs (Thomas focuses only on a dozen verbs). While the Thomas course gives you a better understanding of the words you do know, it was much too limited to speak at length. I also liked the more structured approach to Pimsleur that forced you to stay alert the entire time. Sometimes during a long-winded Thomas soliloquy I lost attention and dozed off until I was forced to come up with an answer.

From this point on I'm going to recommend you do Pimsleur first in order to get around in the language (in taxis, restaurants, ticket offices, etc), and then Michel Thomas to aid you in real conversation with women. Since both courses are extremely helpful, I don’t see them as competitors but synergistic tools when learning a language through audio. If your goal is to master a language in the shortest amount of time, doing both is the way to go.

Read Next: This May Be The Fastest Way To Learn A Language

Effortless Attraction

December 12, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

It seems that in the midst of all the discussion concerning the value of practicing and actively working to hone one's game, it is easy for one to lose sight of the proper end game for any red pill male. That end game is effortless attraction.

Women respond best to displays of value that are not put forward with much effort by the man himself. This is in line with their naturally heightened reliance on indirect forms of communication. They prefer to casually see a man's value, sense it, hear about it or feel it rather than have it directly and deliberately advertised to them or shoved crudely into their faces to make a point.

This is why pre-selection is such a powerful weapon for any male. It is one thing for a male to try to DHV himself by revealing his high status directly to her (via story, routine, or whatever).

It is another when he does not do this and appears (via body language and other cues) to have absolutely no desire to do so, merely going about his business unaffected as other people (especially females) reveal his status to her with no prompting from him or as she witnesses in one way or another that he is indeed an attractive male with a lot going for him.

Men who are able to naturally convey value without consciously "DHV'ing" or trying to show higher value (showing off, running routines, etc) are, in reality, the most successful of all. They operate on a level many of us have difficulty conceiving of given the fact that so few men occupy it.

This level should be the end goal for any man attempting to learn game or wishing to embark upon a path of self-improvement. Some conscious, direct effort is necessary for men just beginning their self-improvement process. It is crucial to tearing down old limiting beliefs/behaviors and building a solid foundation for future improvements to one's quality as a mate.

Once this foundation is built, however, the end game must be to make these improvements as subconscious and effortless as possible.

You may start out by reading about certain attractive fashions and consciously mimicking them in order to improve your style. You must end by developing and then fully embracing an attractive style that works for you, and wearing it every day as though you know nothing else.

You may start out by memorizing some interesting stories that you use to build comfort/generate interest with girls you approach. Your end game must involve making those stories and experiences a part of you, things you've done for your own enjoyment that you can recall and recite as easily as what you ate for dinner the night before.

You start out by using your words as your main weapon to build attraction. You end by letting your actions take on more and more of that effort. In a sense, you are able to "just be yourself", but only after you have spent time making yourself someone truly worth being.

That is the path to "effortless attraction", and it would benefit any young player to make its completion a primary long term goal.

Read Next: Showing Value Before The Approach

19 Responses to Effortless Attraction

1. randomweights
   December 13, 2012 at 8:50 am
   Excellent. Great reading. Thanks.
   Reply
2. Isaac Jordan

December 13, 2012 at 9:58 am
Great post. This is something particularly pertinent to the whole game vs. lifestyle debate. While of course one needs to constantly be honing and improving his game, in the end creating a high-value lifestyle (and through that, jut being an awesome high-value guy in general) would seem to me the best long-term plan for snagging quality chicks.

Reply

3. thatdude
December 13, 2012 at 10:38 am
Great post as usual Athlone, your posts are always spot on.

Reply

4. YouSoWould
December 13, 2012 at 11:54 am
Completely agree. I made a draft post about this exact topic last night, but you've beaten me to the punch. I refer to it as Lifestyle Game.

As I progress along my route towards the goal, I'm going to try and share any and all tips I pic up on maxing your finances, fashion and all round lifestyle.

My latest escapade – joining a private members club in London.

Reply

5. John Galt2
December 13, 2012 at 2:59 pm
Excellent as usual Athlone. As I approach my 40th bday, I can talk about endgame and give some advice for the younger guys…

First, you need to think about where you want to be career/life wise around the age of 40. Are you in medical school and want to be a surgeon? Are you in business school and want to work on Wall Street? Are you a developer and want to hitch your wagon to a high growth start up?

Once that is visualized and somewhat realistic (sorry 5' 7" Indian dude, you aint making the NBA), then pour everything you have into it. Here are a couple different paths guys take.

The typical path – graduate from college, take some lifeless marketing or accounting job where there is limited upside, work 40 hours per week because you want a "balanced lifestyle", top out at high 5 figures in your late 20's, run some weak game, thinking it's a lot of hard work getting girls to notice you, and use it as a means to an end to get married to Susie Rottencrotch when you hit 30 and think you are getting old. Did you realize your full potential? As a man and as a contributor to society? Your life quickly moves to spending 95% of your time pleasing your wife beta style, popping out 1.5 kids, and the only reason you work hard now is so your wife wont bitch at you wondering how she can afford the brand new $80k kitchen with Viking appliances. Is this the end game you really want? Was there ever a time you projected "effortless attraction" as Athlone speaks of?

The righteous path – look around and see where the greatest upside is (see my 3 examples above) and have a laser focus on that path and never deviate. Put your head down and work 80 hours per week to be an expert in that field, rapidly increasing your income and wealth. You might not get as many girls as you would like in the interim, but since you are 26 and quite far from your peak, it's only a slight discount to what you would get through the Typical Path of working 40 hours per week at some soul sucking cubicle job. So keep your eye on the prize. While doing this, read blogs like Heartiste, Roosh and Rational Male, so you understand game basics and how women think and act (hypergamy, solipsism, etc). Read Bang and Day Bang before you go to bed instead of the mindless drivel on feminist centric American tv. And never forget fitness, keep a 10% bodyfat ratio through weightlifting, running, and yoga. Do it for your longterm health, never a woman. So what are you at age 37 after 15 years of improving yourself, both mentally and physically? You are a fucking rock star, that's what you are. The hot bartender and waitstaff know you by name, not because you are a patron, but because you own the bar. Effortless Attraction. You never talk about your car but 20 women see you valet your 911 out front of the latest lounge. "Can we park this out front sir?" "Yes, you may". Effortless Attraction. You meet a girl who wishes to travel "some day" and you recommend Ravintola Kuu for some authentic Finnish food away from the tourists whenever she is in Helsinki. Effortless Attraction.

I am 39, cashed out from my entrepreneurial venture, travel 6 months out of the year, consult when I want, and have some great stories to tell.

Now they come to me.

Reply

- Athlone McGinnis
  December 13, 2012 at 4:51 pm
  This is precisely what I had in mind. Well said.
  Reply

- Joshua
  December 13, 2012 at 10:29 pm
  Outstanding insight, thank you JG. This comment should be constructed into a blog post itself.
  Reply
- speakeasy
  December 14, 2012 at 5:43 am
  This is the type of advice I wish I'd heard years ago.
  Reply
- Omar
  December 14, 2012 at 2:07 pm
  Just sell em the dream Homey.
  Reply
- Anonymous
  December 15, 2012 at 6:28 am
  Work 80 hours a week while maintaining 10% bodyfat? Yeah, right. Even then, you'll still be a 37 y.o. who won't hold a candle for a broke but handsome 22 "actor"/loser, in North America anyway.
  Reply
  - John Galt2
    December 15, 2012 at 9:55 pm
    I did it, my path has served me well, and I dont really give a shit if you don't think its possible. And I do just fine, thank you. If you dont think that is the right path, please offer an alternative for Roosh's readers and add some value to the blog instead of sitting on your lazy ass saying "yeah, right". I would love to hear it.

- Lord Osis
  December 15, 2012 at 12:19 pm
  ” Put your head down and work 80 hours per week to be an expert in that field,…”

  For what? So that when you’re 40, you could get good quality women effortlessly? You can do it right now, if you follow Roosh’s path: learn Spanish/Russian/Portuguese/Japanese/whatever, and start traveling. Just being a foreigner gives you an edge in some places, with some women. In the end, you want to have both money and women, but the risk of becoming a cubicle peon with lost dreams is too big if you take the corporate way.

  I worked my butt off for 10 years, and I did not even get that lousy t-shirt. But okay, it is your life and your mileage may vary etc.

  Reply

  - John Galt2
    December 15, 2012 at 10:01 pm
    Plenty of ways to skin the cat, but lets get something straight – Roosh didnt learn everything overnight. He worked his ass off, took risks, and now is enjoying the fruits of his labor. From his blog, it looks like it took him about 10 years or so (like most “overnight success stories”). Took me about 15, negligible difference. Trick is to figure out what is best for you.

6. Samseau
   December 13, 2012 at 5:16 pm
   Everything that has been said thus far is good, but there is a missing nuance here. Just because people notice you and your passive value is high, does not mean you do not have to make approaches or not be an active participant in the social environment around you.

   ” Put your head down and work 80 hours per week to be an expert in that field, rapidly increasing your income and wealth. You might not get as many girls as you would like in the interim, but since you are 26 and quite far from your peak, it’s only a slight discount to what you would get through the Typical Path of working 40 hours per week at some soul sucking cubicle job.”

   Although I agree with working hard on something worthwhile, it’s not worth it if it means it’s going to destroy your all-mighty social skill set. In the end you’ll piss away your youth and be forced to relearn game as an older man, which may or may not be worth it since as a 40 year old dude you won't be able to pull the same 18-year old honeys. Not in America, anyways. If you want girls that young you'll need to go to other countries where it's socially acceptable to have such a large dating gap.

I also agree with you that it's not worth working the shitty 40 hour work week. My personal stance is,

- Either have something you can work hard at and be rewarded for,
- Or don't work hard at all.

Reply

- John Galt2
  December 13, 2012 at 6:55 pm
  Correct, the next sentence says "While doing this, read blogs like Heartiste, Roosh and Rational Male, so you understand game basics and how women think and act (hypergamy, solipsism, etc). Read Bang and Day Bang before you go to bed instead of the mindless drivel on feminist centric American tv." And with that, I imply using those skills every once in awhile though I didn't explicitly say it.

  Agree with your personal stance 100%

  Reply

  - Tom
    December 13, 2012 at 11:35 pm
    I found your comment useful john. I'm often turning down work ($) to make time for my real ventures that aren't making me any money right now but I feel alive when I work on them. But there's also no way I'm going to limit or discard the time I currently spend in the field gaming girls, 19 yr old pussy is too much fun and i don't wanna drop the ball.

7. Onder
   December 13, 2012 at 5:33 pm
   I'm going to use Adam Lyons' Principles of Attraction here as it's relevant:

   P.L.A.C.E.S

   Pre-Selection
   Leadership Ambition

Confidence Excellence
Social intelligence.

Get all of these qualities as high as possible and you'll be well on your way to banging 10′s consistently with little verbal game needed.

Reply

8. Heh
December 13, 2012 at 8:05 pm
Effortless game is the point at which you are not "faking it" or "manipulating women" – it is the real you.

Reply

9. Tom
December 13, 2012 at 11:48 pm
I'm finding the ultra suarve mens magazine pictures to be a bit overt? wearing suites is fine but why do we need the glossy pictures? and how many of us own sports cars? I suppose they're harmless but I feel they're almost satirising game and perhaps the post. The bond one fits right in though, great post.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

The Playboy Interview With George Carlin

December 13, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm sure you missed this interview with George Carlin, which took place back in 1982. I was three years old at the time. Here are the highlights:

> It's the American view that everything has to keep climbing: productivity, profits, even comedy. No time for reflection. No time to contract before another expansion. No time to grow up. No time to fuck up. No time to learn from your mistakes. But that notion goes against nature, which is cyclical.
>
> […]
>
> …there are some decent star fuckers, but they all want to fuck musicians and movie actors. To be a comedian fucker is like being a juggler fucker. Can you imagine a girl who wants to fuck only the opening act? It's like watching an animal trainer and then wanting to fuck the chimp.
>
> […]
>
> There's a thrill when you steal something in plain view of other people. When you drop a newspaper over a sign and walk away with it, or take something off a wall and the sound of the glue ripping makes people turn around. Your heart is racing, it's a rush.
>
> […]
>
> I did a lot of dating…. Well, dating may not be exactly the right word for it. Trying to get laid is a little more accurate. And please notice the word trying. I always wanted and enjoyed sex, but I never put much importance on scoring or having an athletic sex life. I guess I define myself more by my career and my commitment to a relationship than by my ability to have a lot of chicks or achieve ten orgasms in an evening.
>
> Loading…
> […]
>
> I don't like the phrase shock value. Surprise is essential in comedy, and if people are shocked by what I consider merely surprising, then that's their shock.
>
> […]
>
> But personally, emotionally, I'd rather divorce myself from the world than face the heartbreak of partial success. Because partial success implies overwhelming failure.
>
> […]
>
> People become performers for many reasons. Some do it to get a lot of pussy—and that's a good reason. Some want a bigger car. Other guys want to travel. My reason has always been that I was screaming to let all this shit out of > me.

>
> […]
>
> When I see blacks and women wanting to gain their freedom so they can become corporation executives, I realize that the situation is hopeless. What's the good of having freedom if you then willingly go off and become a slave to an amoral institution? It's especially depressing to see blacks wanting to dive into the mainstream of American commercial life. They come from a magnificent African culture based on aesthetics, and now they all want to become fort builders like the vicious people who originally enslaved them.

The interview is over a dozen pages long. Compare that to the softball interviews they give celebrities these days where the point is to offer Disney-esque anecdotes in between promoting the latest movie or album. With all our mega-stars firmly shielded by publicists, it's becoming increasingly rare to know the men behind the art.

The Best Book Of 2012 For Men

December 14, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The best book for men that I've read in 2012 is The Way Of Men by Jack Donovan. Nothing else perfectly encapsulates the problem that American men are facing today. Here is my original review…

The Way Of Men aims to explain the nature of man and masculinity, using both historical and present-day examples to paint a picture of what makes a man. Today, anyone with a penis is biologically considered a man, so the author delineates the difference between being a man and "being good at being a man."

> A man who is more concerned with being a good man than being good at being a man makes a very well-behaved slave.

In the past, you were a man through survival and warfare. If you were surviving or fighting in battle, you were a man. Today, any retard who can speak in complete sentences and push buttons on a smartphone will survive. Anyone who knows how to use a credit card can see the world in comfort. Even combat is becoming robotic and detached, like playing a video game.

In spite of modern progress, men still want to be men. Their attempts at masculinity come out in other forms, like bodybuilding, training in MMA, becoming a policeman or fireman, trying to bang a lot of women, and simply reading war histories or the biographies of great men. The Way Of Men explains how all of us seek a path to expressing our masculinity in a world that is trying to punish and control it.

> Men are dropping out and disengaging from our slick, easy, safe world. For what may be the first time in history, the average guy can afford to be careless. Nothing he does really matters, and—what's worse—there is a shrinking hope of any future where what he does will matter.
>
> Loading…

The book picked up steam in the second half where the author's voice strengthened when talking about the damaging effects of modern culture on masculinity. One thought provoking question he asks is: what do men have to gain with a feminist utopia? You quickly realize there is almost no benefit to the pile of crap that the ism ideologies are trying to force upon you today (and don't say easy sex, which I have debunked in the past). They’re not making you more of a man, they’re not making your family stronger, and they’re not increasing your happiness. The minute it takes a woman to show a man what it takes to be a man is when men stop being men. And that’s what’s happening now.

> Aren’t most men today spoiled mamma’s boys without father figures, without hunting of fighting or brother-bonds, whose only masculine outlet is promiscuous sex?

This book was important to me because it described the why of my current existence (and likely yours as well). Why do I get satisfaction from collecting flags and notches? Why do I like sticking my dick in a lot of different vaginas? Because in today’s world it’s one of the easiest ways to express my masculinity. While I’m sure I possess some genetic features that pushed me towards this outcome, I’m a man of my environment. I would have probably had a different “hobby” if I was born a couple generations ago.

> One of the great tragedies of modernity is the lack of opportunity for men to become what they are, to do what they were bred to do, what their bodies want to do.

This book should be required reading for all American men, containing brilliant insights I had not previously considered. It clearly shows how your masculinity is being muzzled in order to achieve an experimental result that doesn’t serve your interests. Highly recommended.

Learn More: Read “The Way Of Men” On Kindle Or Paperback

The Easiest Way To Explode Your Productivity

December 14, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

You probably have some sort of system to track tasks, most likely in the form of a to-do list. I have two lists:

- The to-do app in Google Desktop. It stays docked on my desktop so it's always visible.
- Astrid Tasks app on my Android.

I will also assume that you know how to chunk down big projects into small tasks, so that your to-do list has an entry of "1 hour writing" instead of "Write a book" or "Upload DOC file to Amazon" instead of "Publish book."

My productivity tip is simple: organize your to-do list for the next day before you go to bed with 10% more work than you think you're capable of doing. Therefore on Tuesday night, fill your to-do list of tasks you want to do on Wednesday.

Loading...

One of the reasons we procrastinate is because we know deep inside we don't have a lot of work, so when we wake up and see a nearly empty to-do list, our mind decides to mess around for a while. But when we wake up and see a boatload of work that we're not even sure we can complete, we are more reluctant to waste time.

It's critical that you put more work than you think you can handle, because it prevents you from having easy days where your productivity is low. You should be ruthless when setting up your to-do list at night so that there is no escape for you when get up in the morning. Even if you fail to complete all the tasks, you still do more work then if you gave yourself a lenient schedule and finished everything.

One last tip is to visualize how you're going to get all of next day's work done as you lay in bed. Go through the day and casually figure out time blocks where you can get the tasks done. When you wake up, your mind already has a plan to do the work.

Read Next: How To Get Up In The Morning Without Hitting Snooze

Coffee Is Good For Your Health

December 15, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A recent article says you can drink as much coffee as you want…

> The most recent findings that support coffee as a panacea will make their premiere this December in the American Journal of Clinical Nutrition. Coffee, researchers found, appears to reduce the risk of type 2 diabetes.
>
> […]
>
> When the Harvard School of Public Health visited the Health Professionals Follow-Up cohort in May 2011, it found that coffee's protective effects extend only to some types of prostate cancer (the most aggressive types, actually). In a separate study of the same population from this past July, they also found a reduced risk of basal cell carcinoma with increased caffeine intake.
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> If you're on a weight-training regimen, it can provide a mild (and legal) doping effect.

Other studies mentioned suggest that your rate for a host of diseases decreases as a result of coffee drinking. It even may relieve pain and depressions.

If you're already a coffee drinker, there's no compelling reason to cut back as long as you're sleep is not being disturbed. There are measurable benefits to coffee drinking that improve your well-being, but they're small enough that if you're not already a coffee drinker, you shouldn't start. I guess I'll maintain my two cappuccino a day habit.

Read Next: Starbucks Is Singlehandedly Destroying Coffee

Why Adopting A Frugal Mindset Will Hurt You

December 15, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Several years ago I was knee deep in credit card debt while working a normal 9-5 job. To pay off that debt I spent a lot of time learning frugal habits. I cooked my meals, cut out Starbucks, saved spare change, refrained from all types of expensive purchases, and generally just stopped spending money altogether. And it worked! Within a little over a year I had paid off all my credit card debt. Since frugality helped me get out of debt, why would I call it hurtful? Two reasons:

1. It absorbed a surprising amount of time and energy. I stayed on top of frugality web sites and had to mentally put a lot of effort into being frugal.

2. It didn't increase my income.

No matter what type of frugal champion you become, it won't increase your earnings. It teaches you how to be a miser, not a mogul. Unless being a miser is your natural disposition, frugality will not make you any happier. I hated being frugal because counting every dollar I spent made me feel like a loser in poverty, not a success. I couldn't even buy a round of shots for friends at the club without getting depressed at the expenditure.

Loading...
What is easier: spending less money or making money? Is it easier to pinch pennies and skip on laundry soap or is it easier provide a service or product that people want? Frugality is the path of least resistance. Take a look at these two subreddits and their numbers:

/r/Frugal – 197,000 subscribers
/r/Entrepreneur – 26,000 subscribers

The sheep chooses to be frugal. The lion chooses to make more money, to the point where the efforts to save money on a $50 oil change is totally irrelevant and something that doesn't even warrant thought. Instead of going down the rabbit hole of frugality, choose instead to give value.

Read Next: The Synergy Between Game & Money

5 Unexpected Ways To Be As Vapid As The Girl You're Dating

December 16, 2012 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Biggest Issue Evah!

The YWCA in New Zealand has come up with a unique way to bring attention to the gender pay gap. For one day only, the organization set up a coffee cart on the lawn of Wellington's Victoria University Law School campus and sold coffee drinks at different prices based on gender, with men being charged 10% more than female customers. Read this article.

From the comments section: "Never thought about it before but the gender pay-gap would be a great comeback to all those creeps who complain about "Ladies Nights" at bars." ~ rollerblades2

A Man's Right To Choose? Hahaha! Don't be Silly; Dude gotta pay!

A Wisconsin judge has ordered a man who owes $90,000 in child support after fathering nine children with six women to not have any more kids, at least for now. Racine County Circuit Court Judge Tim Boyle sentenced Corey Curtis, 44, to three years of probation on Monday with the condition he is not to procreate until he shows he can support his children, according to court documents. Read this article.

From the comments section: "I agree that the women are just as much to blame – it takes two to tango. Unfortunately, no matter where the blame lies, the damage lies with an innocent party – the poor kid/s born out of this mess. Ironic times we live in – I am 34, married, employed, with savings, and a house. I have been trying to get pregnant – unsuccessfully – for 4 years now. Guess we should've just made irresponsible mating decisions when we were younger. No good deed goes unpunished, eh?" ~Jules78

Lindsay Lohan Tries Not to be a Hooker, but Charlie Sheen Insists

"Anger Management" star Charlie Sheen reportedly reached into his bank account to help Lindsay Lohan pay off her outstanding IRS tab with a $100,000 check, sources told TMZ. Lohan, 26, reportedly declined Sheen's offer to pay down her IRS debt, but TMZ said he sent the check to her manager anyway. Read this article.

From the comments section: Why didn't he leave the check on the night table like every john do? ~CITYGUY4051

5 Unexpected Ways to be as Vapid as the Girl You're Dating

Show off your knowledge of celebrity families. She'll assume topics like Kate Middleton's baby bump and Suri Cruise's divorced parents are only allowed when she's with her girlfriends, so surprise her by knowing what's up with A-listers and their offspring. Read this article.

Loading...
From the comments section: [No comments at this time. There's still hope for American men.]

Don’t Let Dirty Looks Kill the Nice Guy (but women still don’t need you)

Don’t get discouraged by a few dirty looks. Keep acting like a gentleman. You’ll stand out in the crowd and will find a lady to appreciate you. So, the bottom line: We don’t need you to be the infallible knight in shining armor—but when you try, we literally melt into a little puddle of smitten goo. Read this article.

From the comments section: “How about WHY women would give you a dirty look? You may often run into a stubborn woman who is self-assured and doesn’t like accepting help. PEOPLE are like that sometimes. Not just women. However, [blah blah blah] …manners. ~Rae Vanille

Women Over 40 “Surprised” by Lack of Fertility

[…] messages about declining fertility could also have “unwelcome social implications,” the researchers said. A public education campaign that the ASRM undertook between 2000 and 2002 was criticized for pressuring women to have children before they were ready, and for undermining women’s efforts to become educated and have careers. Read this article or read a smackdown of this article.

From the comments section: “Men ought to be made more aware of the fact that their fertility declines with age as well, in line with women’s fertility, in fact. I have a number of guy friends who’re not taking romantic relationships seriously, thinking that they’ll just find someone younger than themselves when they’re ready. The onus should not be entirely on women’s planning and awareness.” ~JenniferCarter “Roosh 5” Gets a Little Competition from “REAL” PUAs.

We thought roosh 5’s books kicked ass but we wanted to write similar books for the common man who may not be a PUA yet or is still working on his PUA skills. if this sounds like you, and you have to fap it because your not good with…. Read this article.

From the comments section: “I assume this is a joke. If not, Roosh is going to sue you. And the V is for his last name, not the number 5. I assume you know this though and are attempting to be funny. I believe that the subjects discussed in the Androsphere are serious and should not be made fun of, and what you are doing here hurts the cause more than feminism and family courts combined.” ~Jeremy

21 Tips For Starting A Manosphere Blog

December 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Have you been reading the manosphere for a while? Do you comment on several blogs? Well it's inevitable that you'll want to take the plunge and start your own blog. In that case, The Private Man has you covered with 21 pieces of blog advice. Here are my favorite five:

> 1. Blogging requires patience and perseverance. Blogging for a couple of months and being disappointed is normal. A few hundred (if you're fortunate) page views a day is to be expected until readers realize the seriousness of the blog. There are few, if any, home runs with blogging. Writers should only expect singles and doubles as page view counts grow.
>
> 5. Haters gonna hate. Got hate comments? Nuke 'em and ban 'em. It's your blog. It's your real estate. If haters want to shit on your blog, moderate heavily and use the banhammer relentlessly. Don't engage trolls… ever.
>
> 8. Brevity is the soul of wit. Posts needn't be long. Rollo and Ian (links below) are the huge exception as their posts are usually quite long. You can't be the exception to the rule until you're well established. Three hundred words or so (well-written and concise) will do.
>
> 12. Find your niche. This will take time and your commenters will steer you in the right (write?) direction. As the Manosphere stands now, there are almost too many young men writing. For you young guys, consider focusing on a geographical or lifestyle niche on which to focus your concentration.
>
> 16. Post on forums with a link to your blog in your signature. There are loads of male-oriented forums that are not relationship of socially-focused oriented. Find the "other" category in gun, motorsports, sports, and male-oriented forums where men often go. Build a reputation there. Be taken seriously… then send them to your blog or other Manosphere blogs.
>
> Loading…

I'd like to add two of my own:

1. You only need one post to get started. A lot of budding bloggers have the typical creator insecurity of "I'll run out of ideas!" Hell, even I feel occasional doom that my well has been tapped, but necessity breeds invention and as soon as you hit publish on one post, your brain will send you an idea for another. If that doesn't happen to you, then you haven't had the right combination of experience and learnedness to synthesize your own ideas. Live and learn hard for a couple more years.

2. You don't exist in a bubble. The days are long gone when you could publish a piece of work and then sit back while you build devoted fans. Not only do you have to connect with your fans but you have to maintain positive relationships with bloggers who are in your field. You will depend on them for support as much as they will come to depend on you.

I'll admit that it's going to be very hard for you to start a manosphere blog today and get big league traffic, but that doesn't mean you can't cultivate a dedicated audience who encourages you to step out of your comfort zone while you attempt to make sense of the world. There will also be opportunities for younger guys to take initiative as myself and some of the other first-wave manosphere bloggers retreat from the game battlefield and move into lifestyle, political, or cultural topics. Gaps will be created for new guys to fill them.

Read More: 18 Self-Publishing Tips That Have Helped Me Sell Over 25,000 Books

Advertise On ROK

December 16, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Unlike my main blog Roosh V, I'd like to run third-party advertisements on ROK in order to maintain a high-volume output of content. Right now there's a special where advertising on the top right banner slot is only $40 for 25,000 views. Our first sponsor is getting a nice response to his campaign, netting 494 clicks halfway through his banner run. Click here to purchase a campaign. If you are a rich man, you could also use the order button as a donation.

Here are some demographic data for the past month.:

Loading...

In the past month, ROK, RV, and RVF collectively reached 371,000 people (16,000 a day). :roosh:

The Best Player Song Ever Recorded

December 16, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

The Best Player Song Ever Recorded

It's not too often that a player song comes out and almost perfectly matches the pickup process. Well, at least my pickup process. The song is "How Many Drinks" by Miguel, which you can listen to above. Here are the lyrics:

> Frustration (watching you dance)
> Hesitation (to get in them pants)
> Come closer baby (so I can touch)
> One question: Am I moving too fast?
>
> Cause' I ain't leaving alone—feel like I could be outer-space
> We both know that we're grown
> That's why I wanna know
>
> How many drinks would it take you to leave with me?
> Yeah you look good, and I got money
> But I don't wanna waste my time
> Back of my mind, I'm hoping you say two or three
> You look good; we came to party
> But I don't wanna waste my time
>
> Temptation (is calling your name)
> Sweet persuasion, oh (baby this is a game)
> Come closer baby (if you like what you hear)
> Impassioned (is what I'm making you feel)
>
> No-no-no. I ain't judging if you do decide that you might be fucking tonight
> What? More power to you if you do decide that you might be fuckinging tonight
> Le-le-let me dig that out like a foxhole
> Damn baby, dat ass is colossal
> Pilates and milk did that body so good
> You got in them pants? I wish I could
> How many drinks would it take you to leave with me? (oh, well…)
> You look good, and we came to party, but I don't wanna waste my time (oohhh no)
> Back of my mind, I'm hoping you say two or three (or three, indeed)
> You look, and we came to party but I don't wanna waste my time
>
> Or waste your time, or waste your time
> Or waste our time, baby it's alright
> Baby it's alright, baby it's alright yeah

> Oh it's alright now
> Alright. Oh yeah
> I don't wanna waste my time, no
> I don't wanna waste no time, oh no
> I don't wanna waste your time, babe
> I don't wanna waste our time, Oh my time, Oh whoaaa, now
>
> How many drinks would it take you to leave with me? (oh yeah)
> Yeah you look good, and I got money
> But I don't wanna waste my time (come wit' me baby)
> Back of my mind, I'm hoping you say two or three (yeah it's just a short drive home from here)
> You look good; we came to party
> But I don't wanna waste my time
>
> No-no-no. I ain't judgin' if you do decide that you might be fucking tonight
> What? More power to you if you do decide that you might be fucking tonight
> I ain't judgin' if you do decide that you might be fucking tonight
> What? More power to you if you do decide that you might be fucking tonight

Aloof player wants to get laid without working too hard or putting the pussy on the pedestal… yes please!

His album rivals that of The Weeknd when it comes to baby-making music. If I bring a girl to my pad, she's going to get banged out to one of them.

3 Responses to The Best Player Song Ever Recorded

1. madclassic
   December 17, 2012 at 9:33 am
   I think you'd appreciate this song from Big L. Not sure how well known it is but it's speaks truth:
   http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=9J2yI3mkIUQ
   Reply
2. Kieran
   December 17, 2012 at 1:47 pm
   There's so many game aware men in hip hop. Scarface is about as red pill as they come:

Nigga where your wife at, y’all niggas don’t like that
I bring a bitch the rough shit, you be on some love shit
Kiss and hold and hug shit, she be wantin thug dick
You winin, and dinin, puttin all ya time in
I be into windin, knockin out the linen
Silk pink panties, but she can’t understand me
I be buyin condoms, you be buyin candy
She love you, lust me, gansta shit, it must be
All the while you spoilin that bitch, she thinkin ‘fuck me’
Hard for you to see that, ’cause you be on that weak rap
“Ay, can I get some roses please?”, nigga where your ‘G’ at
A gentleman, fuck that, wearin suits, what’s that?
You hit the hoe she lay there, I hit the bitch she fuck back
Makin voices, noises, voices and noises (moaning)
But when she do, I send her home to you
Pussy hole swole up, everytime she roll up

Reply

- madclassic
  December 17, 2012 at 11:28 pm
  which song is that?

  Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

Gaming In School Is Not Enough

December 17, 2012 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

The single most important thing for guys learning game is to gain as much experience in cold approaching as possible. By far the best way for young guys to do this is to predominately approach and learn game outside of their own school environment through day game. House parties are not enough

Even if you were to attend all of the house parties thrown by members of your year level on top of parties thrown at other schools, you will still not come close to how many nights an older guy in the game will rack up if he goes to clubs and bars regularly week in week out, not to mention the fact they would be doing many more cold approaches in a club or bar environment than you would in a house party.

In general, house parties are a better bet to pick up in then a bar or club because girls' "bitch shields" will be much lower and they will simply be a lot more receptive to meeting you. This is because even if you go to different schools and have never met before, you are part of her extended social circle.

However, keep in mind that school parties are not only smaller, but consist of more or less the same crowd of people each time, making it much much harder to meet as many new girls as your older counterparts would while out in nightlife. Meanwhile the girls that you do know are surrounded by virtually all of their friends in the world both male and female not to mention other classmates, so they know that if anything happens a lot of people could find out about it, something you won't have to factor into your game in a club or bar.

As such, school parties are quite different to a club or bar. This is why young guys must not make the incorrect assumption that going to a school party counts as night gaming like going to a club does. Even when you strike up conversations with girls you have never met before at school parties it is simply incomparable to cold approaching in a club. If you do not do actual 100% cold approaches while in school, you are robbing yourself of the valuable experiences you will need to improve.

You must game as much as you can and on as many girls as you can. This means widening your horizons beyond gaming girls your own age and approaching girls a few years older than you while pretending that you are the same age. If you choose to do so, you could also start going out in venues that you might be underage in. In short the best way to improve your game is to go about approaching as similar as you can to an older guy past his school and college days.

By honing your game by approaching outside of school you will not only save yourself from a rude awakening once you leave the ~~cocoon~~ social circle of your school or college, but you will gain the skills to do much more damage while you are still there.

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

5 Reasons Why Every Man Needs Partner Dancing

December 18, 2012 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Partner dancing can be found in almost every major city. The dances and styles vary, but most cities have one of the follow three types of partner dancing:

- Salsa/Bachatta (almost impossible to go to a Salsa dance without Bachatta being played)
- Swing
- Tango

In any major city, one or two of these types of dances will be popular enough to use as a springboard to meet women. Why should a man care? Here are 5 reasons:

1. He likes having sex with women much younger than he is.

Many partner dancing venues do not serve alcohol. Do the math. When are women in their prime? Combined with the love women have for dancing, these non-alcoholic venues end up with a large pool of young women.

Places that serve alcohol tend to be more club like, which isn't always an advantage. The women are older yet just as slutty as they were during their college years, so these clubs can be fruitful. But older girls aren't as satisfying, and club environments tend to produce lots of bitch-shield type behaviors from women you approach.

Older women still frequent non-alcoholic venues, but they usually dance with much older men. It's kind of funny to watch 50 year old men pick up women in their 30′s, but for all I know I'll be doing the same thing someday.

2. He likes to date women hotter than he is.

How far can dancing game go? You tell me.

But surely, you think, this is just dancing. It's not like he's banging her. She isn't actually attracted to this fat bastard, is she?

Forward to 2:00:

Maybe he's just a beta at heart who doesn't really try to get laid very often. But if he wanted to, he could.

3. He hates dealing with cockblockers.

Many women travel to these events alone. Dancing requires a carefree attitude that's hard to fake. One truly cannot be afraid of being judged by onlookers, or by the dance partner, on his dance moves; all insecurities must be removed. Most men, and most women, have a lot of trouble doing this. Thus the women who tend to partner dancing scenes usually are the adventurous, free-spirited types that do things solo.

I'd say the ratio is 40% single, 25% couples, and 35% groups, but these girls in groups can easily be separated from each other as guys ask them to dances. Then it's just you and her.

Getting her out of the venue is easy if she came by herself, and if she came with friends she'll go tell them, provided you've swooped her well enough, "He's safe," and her friends won't judge or care if she leaves with you.

4. He likes to date outside of his race.

E.g.:

With those skills this black dude could smash more white birds than most white dudes ever could.

By targeting specific types of dances, a man can target different demographics of women. Do some research to find the kind of women you're interested in. E.g. Salsa for Latin/Asian girls, tango in Japan, swing for Jewish/white girls, etc. My most exotic notch right now is an Armenian notch.

5. Fat chicks disgust him, and he doesn't ever want to be fat himself.

Most fatties don't think about going to a venue where they have to physically exert themselves for a few hours as a good time.

The women at dance venues aren't always lookers, but less than 10% of the women at my dance venues are overweight (always go to venues where young girls are. Duh). And I know these girls are getting a good workout, because I know I am too.

Compared to most bars and clubs, dancing venues blow away the competition in terms of quality.

One hour of dancing is at least as rigorous as one hour of jogging. Dancing is an easy way to do a cardio routine. Instead of running on some dirt path or a treadmill, you can be holding a girl 8 years younger than you while she laughs and squeals as you burn calories.

6. Dance game is the ultimate back burner game.

A man doesn't need to be a professional dancer to benefit from dancing. After the initial month or so it takes to learn the basics of the dance, he needs to practice his new dance once or twice a week to continue to improve. A typical dance lasts 1-2 hours. That's 2-4 hours a week.

As he improves his dance skills, his ability to pull will also improve. As he goes to dances, he will keep himself in shape and healthy. He will have access to fit, young women. All for 2-4 hours per week.

It's so easy to maintain and make a habit out of, that it leaves lot of free time open for a man to pursue his own interests outside of getting laid, which in turn keeps the game from becoming stale.

Dancing game is easy, and best, to do in moderation, which means any man can keep it up indefinitely. As an experienced player, you'll see dance game as one of the best avenues to score.

Read Next: Dance Floor Game – Using Music to Get Laid

About the Author

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

Is The Feminist Movement Experiencing A Meltdown?

December 18, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I'm reluctant to admit that I have my finger on the pulse of American feminism. I'm familiar with the biggest web sites, their arguments, their activity on Reddit, and their most vocal spokespersons. Therefore I think I'm qualified to say that I've noticed a change in the past year.

They've moved away from providing something resembling intellectual arguments to now shouting down all dissent, even from within their ranks. They feel in their soft bellies that their arguments are "common sense" and that anyone who disagrees with them is an enemy that must be immediately outcasted. They know they've won the main battles so why bother putting in effort to keep convincing the masses that women are unfairly and brutally oppressed?

Even their supporters are getting turned off. Whereas in the past comments on Jezebel were a mere echo chamber of what the writers were spouting, you can now actually find critical comments that are voted up to the top of the page. Instead of taking a step back and re-thinking their approach to provide compelling arguments, the feminists are essentially resorting to a "You're stupid" strategy. A good example is a recent article by feminist writer Kate Harding, titled Fuck You, Men's Rights Activists.

The article has eighteen uses of the word "fuck," but not one instance of a cogent thought. Here's an excerpt:

> Fuck you for trying to make "misandry" happen. Your feminist enemies don't hate men; we only hate men who proudly stand up for the rights of abusers, rapists, and deadbeat dads.
>
> Fortunately, there aren't very many of you, no matter how hard you try to build a "movement." The simple fact is, most men don't beat, rape, or resent caring for their own children, and thus have no need for the kind of support and "activism" you specialize in. The "work" you do guarantees you'll continue to attract entitled shitbags who hate women, while driving away decent people who thought you might have something interesting to say—right up until they realized what you're really about.

Here is a picture of the author:

Loading…

Now check out this video of feminists letting the expletives fly to protest a famous male feminist speaker, Warren Farrell, who has served on the board of the National Organization of Women (fast forward to 3:56)…

In other example, when Jenna Marbles, Youtube celebrity extraordinaire, recently shared her thoughts that one-night stands are generally a bad idea for women, Jezebel came out to attack her along with an army of Youtube feminists, particularly this one, who deemed her video "dangerous thought" that should not have ever been uttered. Imagine for a second what type of state feminists would prefer if they were to lead a country. Dissent would be squashed. Everyone would be "equal" with a focus on redistribution of resources. And the idea of marriage would be eliminated in favor of being devoted to the social welfare state. What type of government is that, again?

I know a scared rat when I see one. The feminist response of whack-a-mole is not strengthening their cause any further than what we've seen in the past five years. They are worried that the MRA's are making progress and I personally predict that 2013 will be the year that MRA and other manosphere properties break out into the mainstream. The inclusion of many manosphere sites on an SPLC hate list was just the beginning of their melt down. It's not time to bust out the champagne, but their movement is in trouble, and they know it.

Read Next: Women Are Disappointing Their Feminist Masters

The Art Of Learning

December 19, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

An accomplished chess player and push hand (martial arts) champion shares how the bulk of his success has been due to being a good learner. I was expecting more of a technical guide, but this book actually had many exciting stories in excellent prose that added a lot of heart to his methods, a great example of showing instead of telling.

“Successful people shoot for the stars, put their hearts on the line in every battle, and ultimately discover that the lessons learned from the pursuit of excellence mean much more than the immediate trophies and glory.”

Many people will scoff at this but consistently getting laid on the international level is not unlike competitions that the author faced, especially when it comes to maintaining your concentration in order to perform at peak levels. Are bad nights out due to the girls not liking you or because you were off? How can you ensure that you’ll have a good night every night? The author talks primarily about chess and martial arts, but there’s a lot of anecdotes that players will be able to identify with.

For example, during his chess matches, he started getting annoyed at noises in the auditorium. Sometimes a song he heard earlier would loop in his head. He’d fail at removing them and then would end up losing the match. What he learned to do was to incorporate the noises into his head and use that to adjust his tempo.

Loading…

Compare noise in a chess match to a cockblocker in a club. We get mad at them, wanting to remove them for the equation, but how about understanding the nature of the cockblocker to successfully pull you girl anyway? Maybe you could approach smaller groups, go for the kiss faster to neutralize the cockblockers effects, or inoculate your target against the potential cockblocker. Harness and adapt to what the environment is giving you to succeed in spite of the difficulties.

What I liked most about the book is how analytical the author is, examining every facet of not only his behavior but how he thinks. In other words, he thinks about how he thinks, meditates on how he meditates. It has put his game on an entirely different level, telling me I may not be reflecting on my experiences enough. This will be especially true for people who seem to repeat mistakes.

“A competitor needs to be process-oriented, always looking for stronger opponents to spur growth but it is also important to keep on winning enough to maintain confidence."

This isn't one of those books where some nerd reviews psychological studies—it's a motivational tour de force written by a man who deliberately put himself through tough situations in order to become a champion. While there were some sluggish parts, particularly in the second half, it's been a while since I've read a book that makes me want to go out there and achieve. Work hard and learn hard—I can't think of a better winning formula.

Read More: "The Art Of Learning" on Amazon

The Anti-Male Commercial

December 19, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

The above is but one example of a very common motif of TV commercial that'll surely be familiar to you. It comes in many variations, but the premise is simple: the dumb, clueless, inept guy (often a father) bumbles his way through life, while an in-charge, competent, and disappointed girl (often a wife, daughter, or girlfriend) looks on in disbelief. The men are man-child imbeciles who can't fend for themselves, even in the most elementary of human functions.

In the early 2000s, Carl's Jr. (Hardee's) ran a whole campaign predicated on this ineptitude of men. "Without us, some guys would starve" was its tagline, which was voiced-over a multiplicity of bone-head guy scenarios. In one especially blatant spot, a guy is trying to make guacamole. For the whole 30 seconds of the commercial, he blankly stares at two avocado halves rumble around, un-broken, with the seed, in a blender cup. Needless to say, he doesn't know what's he doing.

Loading…

A common variation on this theme depicts the woman performing traditionally masculine functions. The man—usually a weak, timid specimen—is bossed around and obediently obliges.

These commercials, though ubiquitous in their own right, are part of an even larger theme visible in movies and television. Watch any Judd Apatow film and you'll quickly recognize men—of all races, ages, and stations—being raked across the coals whenever possible. Dogging on men, in short, has become a "safe" joke. Kicking a ball into a guy's nuts, or depicting him as a clueless moron, offends no one.

This, I'd argue, is part of a bigger cultural emasculation of men–one that's driven by the feminist imperative to erode male usefulness. Ask yourself a question: would putting a woman in the man's position in these commercials raise a firestorm of feminist complaints and spark calls for its removal?

Read More: The Myth of Never Hitting a Woman

Why So Serious?

December 20, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Here is a status I saw from a female on facebook recently:

"Never regret anything because at one time it was exactly what you wanted."

In analyzing this chick logic, we get the following translation:

If, at any one point in time, a certain thing was desired by an individual, then that thing should not be considered "regrettable" in the future by that individual. Why? Because it was desired. That is all.

Short version: "If I wanted it, then it was good."

What's wrong with this statement? Well, that list could fill a blog post by itself. Most men could twist themselves into mental knots trying to comprehend the logical holes here (ex: What if that "want" harmed others? What about personal responsibility?). The sheer lack of logic is almost painful, really.

Instead of going down that route, however, I would like to posit that this kind of logic provides the perfect context in which to consider the proper male reaction to female emotion: no reaction.

The logic expressed above is not uncommon among women, especially in the west. You'll will find it among women from a variety of ethnicities, regions and socio-economic backgrounds.

For women, emotions are the waves to be ridden, and they often determine what action is worthwhile and what isn't. If she felt right about it at the time, then it was right, and she can rationalize it as such in the future regardless of what she did. If she didn't feel right at the time, then it wasn't right. Sounds simple…

…but then perhaps she'll decide tomorrow that what was right before is wrong now, simply because she feels differently at this particular moment (hint: I know the girl who authored that status personally and she has not always expressed such a viewpoint-it could easily change again tomorrow).

Or she could decide that what was wrong then is right now, because her feelings have changed and what felt wrong then feels fine now. And maybe she'll come back around the next day and switch things up again because a change "just feels right" for her at "this stage" in her life, and it is exactly what thinks she "needs"…

…but then next week she feels out of place, so her change was wrong and needs to be curtailed for something else that "feels right"…and so on, so forth.

I haven't even mentioned all the crazies that an American male will undoubtedly run into as time passes. Their processes will make even less sense than those I mentioned above, and will generally be even less predictable.

This is an important key to male sexual frustration: too much logic with women and too much inclination to take their emotions seriously, as though they were always based on much more than a passing whim or feeling.

Too many men come into contact with women and seek to try to make sense of these inevitable emotional waves (using their own highly incompatible masculine methods of reasoning) or, even worse, engage these emotions directly. They try to fit a square peg (emotionally driven female reasoning) into a round opening (linear, logical masculine thought processes).

It is a lose-lose for them.

Once a man understands this and simply lets it all go, he puts himself in a position to enter a much better place, both romantically and spiritually. He quits fighting her emotional waves and holding them accountable to his own preconceived standards (which, as the text above outlines, should only be applied to men anyway).

Instead, he learns to ride them out and/or just let them flow. He is able to maintain his own stability in the face of her occasional volatility. This, in turn, puts him into a good position to learn and practice game properly.

Her emotions are the unpredictable, often chaotic storm bearing down on the land. He is the solid oak that stands firmly in place before and after its passing.

Note how the oak does not attempt to reason with the storm (or the weather that created it), confront the storm or change the storm as it passes. The oak doesn't bitch about the weather as though it could be altered either. Instead, the oak merely persists, solidly and reliably. The weather changes and the storms come and then go, but the oak remains as it was, rain or shine.

Deep down, every woman seeks to find her own "oak", the object that her own often unstable emotional "weather patterns" (including those often volatile storms and the waves they create) cannot move at will or destroy and are instead forced to respect as they pass by. It is the job of any male concerned with self-improvement to become that object.

Athlone McGinnis

Athlone is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today.

I Don’t Want To Travel Anymore

December 20, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I’m tired of spending so much of my free time learning a new language.

I’m tried of trying to figure out yet another new dating culture.

I’m tired of carrying big jugs of water from the grocery store because of not being able to drink from the tap.

I’m tired of rolling solo to the mega clubs that only play pop music.

I’m tired of getting ripped off by taxis.

I’m tired of not being able to spend time with my family.

I’m tired of how simple tasks can take hours.

I’m tired of not being able to find peanut butter.

I’m tired of packing all my shit.

I’m tired of not being able to buy new things due to lack of space in my luggage.

I’m tired of not having any close friends with me.

I’m tired of a lot of things, but yet I’m in Europe again for another trip. It’s hard for me to consciously admit that the positives of adventure and foreign vagina outweigh just about every negative I can possibly think of.

If there’s one thing I’ve learned in life, it’s never to trust yourself. Don’t listen to your inner monologue when it complains and whines. It will never be satisfied with the present moment. Simply ignore its voice and stick to your goals, whether it’s flagging or completing a project or what have you, no matter how hard and annoying it may be.

Only when you are successful with your goals, or at least gave it the amount of time and work necessary for it to succeed, may you then move on to something else. Sometimes it’s better to blindly soldier on than listen to your gut, until your gut is screaming so loudly that you can no long ignore it. Otherwise you will be listening to the sabatoeur, the weak man, the quitter that is inside all of us.

Read Next: What To Say If You've Been To Her Country

Roosh Valizadeh
Daryush "Roosh" Valizadeh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Does Your Posture Suck?

December 21, 2012 | by JC Deen | Link | Original Link

Posture is important. If you're like the average American who's spent a ton of your life sitting (school, and most jobs) you've probably been told to sit up straight at multiple times in your life. When given this cue, you probably straighten out that hunch in your mid back, pulling your shoulders back and sticking your chest out. That's actually a pretty good position to be in, but it hardly lasts. We're so used to curling over our computers, and workspaces that we eventually ease back into our bad habits.

Bad posture can wreak havoc on our entire bodies, making us less mobile, and even setting us up for muscle imbalances and injury. And I'm sure you'll agree most women are more attracted to a guy who stands up straight, and walks in confidence, with his shoulders square, and chest high.

The thing is this: bad posture is from a long history of bad habits of sitting too long, not stretching enough, etc. for most of us anyway. There are ways to combat this with a few daily exercises that take up almost no time, as well as things you can do in the gym if you regularly go to the gym.

In the videos below, I give some simple exercises you can do with a band and they can be done at home, or in the gym.

The exercises here are the upright rows, front raises and lateral raises. The upright rows and lateral raises are the most important movements to pay attention to here because they work your upper back and traps as I purposely shrug before doing the lateral raises.

When you're in the gym, you can focus on heavy rows using a barbell, dumbbells or a cable machine. A good rule of thumb is to do more pulling than pushing. A strong upper back will usually fix most postural problems cause by bad habits and muscle weaknesses.

At the end of every workout, and even on your off days, you can do various movements with a light band.

Those movements are: (1) Band pull aparts, (2) Band dislocates, and (3) Face pulls (band or cable stack).

Band Pull Aparts

Band Dislocates

Face pulls + Myofascial release with a medicine ball

If your posture really sucks, or you get a lot of upper back/shoulder pain, you can start with the band pull aparts and dislocates 3-5 times during the day. I'd start in the morning with a set of 10 for each movement. A few hours later do them again and repeat throughout the day as you find the time.

Of course, it'd be easy to throw some bands in your bag and take them everywhere you go. I even have some clients who do these at work at their desk every 60-90 minutes or so.

About the Author

JC Deen is a strength coach and fitness writer out of Nashville, TN. He's been seen in Men's Health, Bodybuilding.com, and ZenHabit.net. He regularly writes at JCDFitness.com.

The Perfect Woman: Hair

December 21, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Long and clean. That's all a girl needs to do to have attractive hair, which is why it's so unfortunate that many women can not even succeed on this front. While some look okay with short hair, the majority don't. A bob hairstyle will never be seen as more attractive to men than long hair, and needless to say neither will Skrillex haircuts.

Since hair is the easiest way for a girl to build attraction with men, I'm hesitant to talk to women who have ugly hair. If she can't take care of her own hair, which is attached to her body, how is going to have a clue on how to please me?

Here are some pictures of great hair:

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

Loading...

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14.

15.

Read Next: The Perfect Woman: Lips

Top 5 Nightlife For Gothenburg, Sweden

December 21, 2012 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

Nightlife in Gothenburg can be hit or miss depending on when you go out and how the weather is. When I was there, on one Friday night there were more people in the Burger King on a popular square than in the club across the street. So I just stood in front of the Burger King.

You're generally going to find a good spot on Friday and Saturday nights, but for pickup you'll have to head to the clubs because there are surprisingly few American-style bars where people aren't seated. There are two things to keep in mind:

- Some of the higher end clubs feature very beautiful Swedish girls, but isolation borders on impossible. A girl's friends won't let you mack in peace, especially once you move up in attractiveness.
- Get ready for some outrageous cover charges. Going early may help, but brace yourself for $20 entry fees at places that don't call for it.

And now here's my top five:

5. Locatelli Bar. It feels like a Fellini film with its assembly of strange, self-important characters. On Tuesdays and Wednesdays there may be a strong crowd at around 11pm.

4. Calor. This is a grimey bar that features thirsty African guys and the Swedish girls who love them. If you're a black guy, you may want to pop in. What's interesting about the Swedish girls here is that many of them dressed in slutty clothing. You knew they were looking for that big D.

3. Sticky Fingers. A rock bar that attracts a low level of talent. Nonetheless, the logistics make it the best "pickup" spot in Gothenburg. Girls are friendly and guys are clueless. I got my flag here.

2. Excet. Huge club with a large amount of young talent. It's actually a pretty fun spot with various rooms and also a huge outdoor terrace. It was a bit intimidating to conquer solo and even after several hours I had nothing to show for my efforts. Your best bet here is to go for the foreign girls in pairs since they were the most receptive. The cockblock here was pretty much automatic for me.

1. Yaki Da. International club that may be the only place that has people early in the week. At first I was kind of annoyed that there were so many foreigners (both guys and girls), but this is actually an advantage because the Swedish girls here want the multicultural penis. I met a drunk Swedish girl who insisted that we kiss but only if my lips were completely dry. That wasn't strange at all. One more note I can make about Sweden is that there is absolutely no discrimination against minorities. It's like the diversity ideal.

Read Next: The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

20 Responses to Top 5 Nightlife For Gothenburg, Sweden

1. anon1
   December 22, 2012 at 11:22 am is that excet picture representative of the kind of talent to be found in there? because i'm shocked how fat faced and ugly they look
   Reply
   - Roosh
     December 22, 2012 at 11:26 am
     Yes the three images are representative of the typical girl you'll find in Gothenburg.
     Note that even in the last picture with the two moon-faced chicks, you'll still need value to bang them.
     Reply
   - Samseau
     December 23, 2012 at 8:57 am
     Completely uninspiring
     Reply
2. Doggo
   December 22, 2012 at 12:43 pm
   Hanging around a Burger King on a Friday night in Gothenburg. Even the most accomplished guys among us sometimes have to eat the bitter to get to the sweet.
   Reply

3. Nik
December 22, 2012 at 5:18 pm
I see only two images because I get the impression that the image you use on the header before the article (and throughout your blog) are professional shots. Nonetheless thanks for providing them, and I'll pass on Sweden.

Reply

- Roosh
December 22, 2012 at 5:19 pm
I included the header image. It's a club shot of normal girls.

Reply

4. fogal
December 22, 2012 at 7:23 pm
no discrimination to minorities, watch the indians arabs asians latinos and africans come right in ..YAY any particular venues that work in other races favour instead of just the africans at calor?
or is vaki da the only one?

Reply

- Roosh
December 23, 2012 at 7:44 am
Yaki Da will be the best one

Reply

5. druxqks
December 23, 2012 at 9:07 am
This review is complete bullshit. Bordering on disinformation.

I live in Gothenburg you didn't get anything right except the part about Sticky Fingers, which is really just a random rock bar. And that's in the Top 5? If this review is so clueless, how are the other reviews for the rest of the world that your audience relies on?

Reply

- Roosh
  December 23, 2012 at 10:01 am
  Translation: “I’m a feminist who vehemently disagrees with most of what you said, but I’m neither going to say why nor give one piece of information which can help visitors to Gothenburg.”

  I look forward to your follow-up comment, which will contain absolutely no suggestions, venues, or advice.

  Reply

  - druxqks
    December 23, 2012 at 12:02 pm
    If you were interested in advice, why didn’t you get some before you wrote your “guide”?

    For other strugglers out there who actually have to visit this website in order to figure out how to get laid, here’s some better suggestions for you:

    1. Push (Images: http://www.stureplan.se)

    2. Lounge(s) (Images: http://www.aveny.se/?page_id=2)

    3. Peacock (Images: http://www.peacock.se)

    4. Yaki-Da (Images: http://www.aveny.se/?page_id=2)
    Note: Your guide is totally misrepresentative on this entry, it’s far from as bad as you describe it, actually one of the nicer places. Just go to the website above and look up the evidence yourself.)

    5. Park Lane

    Summertime suggestions:

    * Port Du Soleil (http://www.portdusoleil.se/)
    * Locatelli
    * M2 Backyard
    + others

    - druxqks
      December 23, 2012 at 12:04 pm

Correction, website adress:
http://www.peacockdinnerclub.com/

- Roosh
December 23, 2012 at 12:04 pm
Haha… I tricked you to drop some data!!

- druxqks
December 23, 2012 at 12:51 pm
Haha, you tricked me into dropping data?

Wow, the skills of your mentalist bullshit are astounding. I understand why people will flock from all around the world to hear you talk out of your ass.

The reason I gave you the links were to a) Show you that you are wrong and b) Show the readers what a pile of worthless junk your city guides are.

Now have a nice day, looking forward to see what new cognitive dissonances you can come up with in your next reply.

- anon1
December 24, 2012 at 8:03 am
It’s oh so easy to troll a troll..

- Anonymous
December 27, 2012 at 9:57 am
Wow, druxqks, you’re so amazing.

How incredible your knowledge of the nightlife is after the months or even years you’ve spent there — while Roosh was able to give a decent overview after just a week or two in the city.

And I’m sure you were just cleaning up all over the town, eh

6. Vicious

December 23, 2012 at 11:34 am
From what I gathered when we met Roosh you never visited Lounge(s), Park Lane, or Push. It's too bad because as a local I consider those to be best clubs in town. With the exception of Excet and maybe Yaki-da I wouldn't set foot in the rest of the clubs you mention.

Anyone that wants to form their own opinion of the average female club goer can check out http://www.aveny.se

Reply

7. RollingStone
December 24, 2012 at 1:30 pm
I was in Park Lane and some other club, full of stairs and different rooms, it felt like a maze.
Strangely enough Park Lane had nice girls, but also some asian hookers.

Reply

8. DJ_Q
December 24, 2012 at 11:18 pm
I am traveling to Sweden in June. I will be in Stockholm. I see this blog post is about another city but can someone provide info about some decent nightlife venues for Stockholm? I hear all this hype about girls in Stockholm being very hot, but all I want is objective opinion and what should I expect realistically when I get there? Is day game better than clubs/bars?

Reply

- Beowulf
December 26, 2012 at 9:21 am
Browse to http://www.stureplan.se and check out their assortment of clubs, they are the best in Stockholm.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

The History Of Flip Flops

December 22, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Here's a history nugget you won't learn anyone else (received via email)…

> In reading your thoughts on high heels. It dawned on me that you have spoken your opinion in the past on women wearing flip flops. I don't think your being entirely fair. See….flip flops were brought back by ww2 soldiers and became popular in the 60's.
>
> The reason they were brought to the U.S. is simple….thoughtful husbands and bitchy wives. The original flip flops were much thinner than those of today. Women used to bitch because standing on the hard kitchen floor cooking all day hurt their feet. Of course being a man we found a solution to this. That solution was flip flops. The space under the stove is small by design because women have small feet and small toes. With flip flops being a slight cushion but still being thin, we gave them comfort while maintaining the toes under the stove cooking process……the way it should be.
>
> The women's rights movement fucked all that up. Now they wear them everywhere never knowing their intended purpose. I could go on but this is all entirely bull shit. If one were feeling the desire to elaborate on such a grand story or even add to it. That person would have a defense against flip flop wearing battle ax women. …..also, it really makes the feminists angry.
>
> Loading…

More from Wikipedia…

> There is still a debate over whether this signaled a fundamental change in American culture — many youth feel that flip-flops are more dressy and can be worn in a variety of social contexts, while older generations feel that wearing them at formal occasions signifies laziness and comfort over style. In 2011, while vacationing in his native Hawai'i, Barack Obama became the first President of the United States to be photographed wearing a pair of flip-flops. The Dalai Lama of Tibet is also a frequent wearer of flip-flops and has met with several US presidents, including George W. Bush and Barack Obama, while wearing the sandals.

American men have already had to endure Obama's parroting of feminist talking points (e.g., men unfairly make more than woman), but now he's using his influence to encourage flip flop use. He has gone too far.

“This American Whore”

December 23, 2012 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Want to learn how to be a good pimp? Tune in to the “This American Whore” podcast.

“[…] her audience now is mainly those in the sex worker community, but [she] hopes this will change: ‘I want the world to be my main audience because I think whores are important and what whores have to say is important.’

This American Whore will be tackling a variety of topics in the next few months, such as how to be a good partner to a sex worker, and with upcoming guests like Kitty Stryker and Carol Queen. Q hopes by humanizing a marginalized community, it will help to end oppression and ignorance.”

Hey, whatever works. More power to her. I’m glad there’ll be a few classy whores around when I’m 80. Read the article here.

—

So-called nice guy? Meet the so-called friend zone.

According to a recent article at Jezebel, “Obviously; rule number one of being a real nice guy is that you never, ever refer to yourself as a ‘nice guy.’”

That’s funny. I’ve noticed that strong, independent, relevant women never ever refer to themselves as “strong, independent, relevant women” either. That little nugget works both ways. Imagine that.

You can read the strong, independent, relevant article here, or check out the Nice Guys of OKCupid tumblr blog referenced in the article here.

—

Alimony laws need to be reformed, because they affect women too.

“Alimony is not a gender issue as both men and woman are forced into paying permanent alimony against their economic capabilities and will. Many of the protestors at this event were women who were highly impacted by alimony and who support reform.”

Oh. Em. Gee. I cannot believe this type of nonsense affects women too! If you’re as upset about this as I am, you can read the article here.

—

Dumb broad solves the “mystery” behind Connecticut gunman’s horrific acts. It was misogyny!

Loading…
“My hope is that with the call for more responsible gun laws we might in the same courageous breath witness the misogyny of his act because it provides a key for unlocking any sense of “mystery” of how this could have happened and understand that women are often on the receiving end of hatred, however subtle or however much of an

“aside” it might seem. This is an important point, I think, because if we are to rid ourselves of misogyny we have to trace it to its root cause; and when we do we find ourselves at the striking at the root of all acts of such violence.”

She reminds me of those retarded kids in Sunday School class who thought the answer to everything was “Jesus.” If you want to read more on why “misogyny” is the answer to everything, click here.

—

Attention ladies: There are new rules for dating, and they’re not you mother’s rules!

Hey ladies, the unbelievably gifted duo who brought you “The Rules” have followed it up with a book out called “Not Your Mother’s Rules: The New Secrets for Dating.” I suggest you drop whatever you’re doing and pick yourself up a copy. Go ahead! Do something nice for yourself! It’s the perfect Christmas gift for the gal who already has everything but doesn’t know it.

Here’s a little sampling of one of the new and improved rules:

“A woman cannot e-mail, or even wink at a guy’s profile, without becoming the aggressor and possibly getting hurt down the line when the guy dumps her for the woman whose profile he really likes. The only way to be sure that a guy is interested is to let him make the first move.”

Groundbreaking. Before this book was published, my Match.com in-box was literally filled with dozens of beautiful women begging to sex me up. But now that the new magna carta of the sexual revolution is on the shelf, I have to send 20 emails just to get one or two responses.

—

Study shows some black chicks won’t exercise because of their hair.

“This topic certainly bears further research, but McMichael suggests that the amount of time and money some African-American women traditionally invest in frequent salon visits may deter them from sweaty physical activities that could ruin their hair treatments.”

I’m not touching this article with a 10-inch pole. But you can read the article here.

Demographic Ruin Is Upon Us

December 23, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The documentary above highlights the demographic doom that awaits the human race. The main problem is that replacement fertility is decreasing. The population is becoming elderly with less working people to support them, meaning that those who do work must be burdened to support the elderly via oppressive taxes.

Countries in Western Europe have taken a short-sighted and selfish approach to solving this problem in the form of pro-immigration policies. They conveniently ignore the fact that immigration decimates the countries where immigrants come from, increasing brain drain, reducing human capital, and ultimately guaranteeing that poor countries will remain poor. Those who favor immigration actually favor abject poverty and suffering. In addition, since most immigrants are men, you have an increasing amount of broken families in poor countries, tearing apart the fabric of those societies, all because well-off European women refuse to procreate.

Here are some additional quotes from the video:

"60% of population growth in USA came from immigrants and their children."

"Once we traveled the road of gender equality and birth control, everything changed."

"As a society, we don't want to talk about fertility decline to not offend people."

"If there is no economic incentive to have children, then people won't have children."

Loading...

In terms of how the demographic winter affects you most urgently, you'll experience a decreasing selection of young women but increasing numbers of older men who want them, intensifying competition in a game where there will be a greater percentage of male losers than in the past. In a world where egalitarianism is often promoted as an important human right, a small percentage of men will monopolize vaginal access to a great proportion of women, not unlike ancient times when kings and nobles possessed large harems.

Sociologists think the sexual revolution of the 1970s was the biggest factor of decreasing fertility rates. I must remind you that it was the feminists and their Marxist allies who successfully pushed the sexual revolution onto Western society. They are now suspiciously absent in how to solve the fiscal problems in countries where demographics is an urgent concern, and if their current shrieking about obesity acceptance and rape culture is any sign, they will be lacking in helping societies cope with this upcoming calamity.

Read Next: Why Demographics Matter For The Younger Man

The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

December 23, 2012 | by P Dog | Link | Original Link

As discussed in Gaming In School Is Not Enough, the most important game advice for young guys is to cold approach as many women as possible. In order to do this, school and college-aged guys must expand the pool of girls they approach and start going after slightly older women, making slight adjustments to their game as they do so.

For young men, the norm of dating girls their own age or younger severely reduces the number of available women for them to approach. Since for young guys, “older women” for them are still young and in their prime, it makes sense for them to pursue this demographic

In order to do so, young men will need to have these women think that they are the same age as them or slightly older. Often times, a girl who suspects that you are younger than her will ask how old you are early in the interaction, particularly with night game. The problem with the girl asking this is that it forces you to guess their age. If you think she is 23, and you give 22 as an answer to your age, swooping her will become more difficult when she says she is 24. If you say you are one year younger then it usually won’t be a big deal, but any more than that and it may harm your chances.

With girls you suspect of being older than you, it’s very important that the first personal question in the conversation you ask is “By the way, how old are you?” Do not do this too early into the approach, but make sure she doesn’t ask before you do. When she tells you her age, say that you are the exact same age or a year older and then note that you look young for your age. If she makes a point of agreeing with you, ramble about how annoying it is getting carded at venues all the time and how people mistake your younger brother for being older than you, but how you won’t be complaining when you’re in your 30′s and 40′s preying on nubile younger women.

This little routine will be less effective if you take a pause after saying your age and the girl interjects saying you look younger first, so do not give her that chance. The smaller the perceived age gap is between the two of you, the less this is needed. Running this on a girl only a year older than you could backfire, as the gap between what you look like and your claimed age is small enough to be believable without explanation, so providing one unnecessarily will raise a girls suspicions. On a girl who is three or more years older than you however, it will go a long way to reassuring her that you are as old as you say you are.

Warning: There is a limit to how much older you can claim to be. The oldest I have gotten away with is 7 years, and that was with facial hair and being dressed well. Individual variance will play a big role here, your mileage may vary.

Past the initial approach, there isn't much you need to adjust in your game. If you need to number close her, do not try and Facebook close instead because she'll quickly realize you lied about your age. If she doesn't want to give you her number but wants your Facebook instead, tell her you've deactivated it. If you do have a Facebook, make sure you've changed your privacy settings so that only mutual friends can find you via search.

Lastly, on subsequent dates you need to be able to remember and elaborate on the backstory you told the girl when you first met her. The easiest way to handle this is to pretend to be studying or employed in what you plan to do in the future. This makes sure that your personality will be congruent with your backstory.

If young guys approach women older than them, with a few minor adjustments to their game to account for the age gap, they can massively expand the number of girls in their dating pool and get more sex as a result.

Read More: It's Easier To Shine When You're Younger

12 Responses to The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

1. Sir Bert
   December 24, 2012 at 6:31 pm
   I can't agree with the suggestion to lie about one's age. One of the hottest and best lovers I've had was 29 when we were dating. I was 23 at the time and she was fully aware of my age.

   I would even suggest to young men to go for decent looking women in their 30′s and 40′s. They love getting nailed by young studs and it's one of the best ways for a guy to gain sexual experience.

   Reply

2. P Dog
   December 24, 2012 at 9:18 pm
   There's always exceptions, but women strongly prefer dating guys at least their age or older, which you can see by looking at marriage statistics. I've never banged a woman in her 30′s or 40′s, but my boners would rather me fuck a tight 20 year old over a used up 40 year old any day of the week.

   Reply

3. Chuck
   December 25, 2012 at 1:28 am
   Solid advice, very similar to what I did to snag a 22 year old college cutie when I was 17 (I told her I was 23). Unfortunately, a man can only refuse his girl's offer to go out for drinks so many times before she starts to get suspicious, and eventually I came clean about lying and made up a new story that I was actually 20 and would be turning 21 in a few months (Plan B was tell to her I'm a closet Mormon). I kept seeing her on and off until she graduated and moved to Texas. A month later I graduated high school.

   Now I'm 19 and in college, and I'd really like to step up my game and start banging those sexy 22, 23 year old seniors and grad students that I see heading off to bars and clubs while I'm on my way to another shitty frat party. Got any idea how I can lie about my age and dance around the alcohol issue at the same time? Besides getting a good fake I.D., of course.

   Reply

- P Dog
  December 25, 2012 at 8:30 am
  Don’t get a fake ID dude. What I did when I was underage was I got a guy who kind of looked like me and paid him the cost of having his drivers licence replaced by claiming it was lost and then I used the original.

  Reply

  - Chuck
    December 25, 2012 at 11:43 am
    Anyone ever figure out it wasn’t you?

    - P Dog
      December 25, 2012 at 8:32 pm
      Nope. They never even held it up and compared it to my face. All the bouncers did was check to see if it was real and squint at the date of birth. Make sure the skin tone, hair and eye colour on the photo are the same and you’ll be fine.

    - Anonymous
      December 27, 2012 at 2:01 am
      Not everybody will have that luxury. Some kids will have to get fakes if they want to drink.

4. JohnMichael
   December 25, 2012 at 7:19 am
   I’m not going to lie about my age to get some pussy.

   Reply

5. Nik
   December 25, 2012 at 12:09 pm

If we are talking about skags who are cougar aged then the secret is to simply show up. Thats a no-brainer.

Reply

6. Sleek
December 25, 2012 at 11:08 pm
I recently approached a junior college girl and told her I was a freshman in college, thinking I couldn't get away with saying I was her age. Turned out to be a mistake… got a fake number.

Reply

   - Anonymous
   December 27, 2012 at 2:02 am
   You didn't necessarily get the fake number because of saying your school year instead of age.

   How's the rest of your game?

   Reply

7. pirihuora
December 30, 2012 at 11:39 am
I won't be making up a fake personality just to impress a girl, that's ridiculous.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

☐ Sign up to our bi-monthly newsletter and receive digests to our most popular articles. Unsubscribe anytime.

☐ Notify me of follow-up comments by email.

9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Norwegian Girls

December 24, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

[image]

1. Norwegian girls are the hottest and thinnest in Scandinavia. Some are even feminine. The only downside is that they can be a bit thick from pulling sleighs or whatever they do in the countryside during the winter. In the summer they wear booty shorts, showing off their toned, tanned legs, and their best quality by far is their thick dick-sucking lips, something you don't see in other Scandinavian countries. My only regret from the week I spent in Oslo is not getting a blowjob (though I did get my flag).

2. They are not as crazy about Americans like the Swedes. Many did not care that I was born on American soil.

3. Some girls give you strong approach cues with eye contact and a smile. But they didn't approach me outright as much as girls in Iceland and Finland. Prepare yourself for quick rejections.

4. There was a rape wave a couple years ago. This was real rape where immigrants dragged girls into alleys. Girls were advised to take extreme care with guys they meet. Since rape is still a problem, it wouldn't hurt to establish more comfort than you usually do, especially if your skin complexion is on the brown side.

5. You won't get anywhere in the top-end clubs. Don't bother.

6. Norwegians are the most economically successful of the Scandinavian economies, and it shows. There is decreased Jante Law influence which means you get a cocky vibe from the girls (though not as cocky as Americans).

7. The guys are really good looking. I was taken aback by some of the male specimens on display. Thankfully they don't approach so I still had a competitive advantage over them.

8. In Oslo, nightlife shuts down at 3am but doesn't get going until midnight. Approaches from 2-3am will probably be most fruitful, especially if a girl is trying to get laid but has yet to meet a guy. It did feel more like Iceland in that if I waited for the guys to get drunk and the social circles to dissipate, I could drop in with a last call approach. Most of my successful approaches happened after 2am.

9. It's expensive as balls. My short-term apartment cost $200 a night. A vodka drink is $13-15. I ended up dropping about $1,400 in five days without even trying. I could easily go a month on that money in Poland or Ukraine.

Now here is a representative sample of how Norwegian girls look like:

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14.

Read Next: Will The Norwegian People Disappear?

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Eating From The Tree Of Wisdom

December 25, 2012 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

When I turned 21 I went to the Orthodox Church I was baptized in and gave my first confession, an acceptable way to apologize to God. That same night, I received a vision from God which, to the best of my interpretation, said that if I let my Christianity fall then my honor would also fall.

I still think about this vision when I casually suggest to a young girl that we should go get something to drink, and somehow find ourselves in my bedroom. Am I losing my honor?

I'm ashamed that I can't find happiness as a Christian. I never wanted to disobey God, but I understand why Adam took the apple from Eve—life outside of game doesn't seem to be worth living. So sweet and enticing was the siren call of easy sex that it was impossible for my heartbroken 23 year old virgin self to resist.

Thus I followed the serpent and found the secrets of game. I came to understand how emotional manipulation operated, what niche I could best score women, and how to get fast sex. I corrupted myself because I stopped believing in love.

> You have heard that it was said, 'You shall not commit adultery.'
>
> But I tell you that anyone who looks at a woman lustfully has already committed adultery with her in his heart.
>
> Loading...

I distinctly remember the time when I used to turn down offers for sex. If it seemed that a girl was only good for one thing then I never saw a point to the affair. Love was God's solution, lust led to hell.

The virgin I fell in love with in college didn't make it past her second year. She continued the charade of maintaining abstinence despite going into guys dorm rooms at 3am after receiving a phone call.

As it slowly dawned on me that for every chaste woman there were ten chaste men; that my culture actively destroyed women as love partners; that promiscuity for both sexes was promoted and rewarded; that my culture was dying with no chance of being a good place to live in my lifetime; I was faced with the unavoidable and grim conclusion: does a man want to please God in today's world? Celibacy is his only realistic option, as it is just as sinful to be a beta who pines away for women as it is to be an alpha who plows through them.

Who can live a life without sexual intimacy? The very idea is inhuman. To be a good Christian is therefore super human. If celibacy is what it takes to be a good Christian today, then I will never be a good Christian. I am not strong enough for that.

Merry Christmas, everyone.

Read Next: The Perfect Woman

60 Myths On Memory, Learning, Sleep, And Creativity

December 25, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I stumbled on an old website that debunked a lot of popular brain myths, many of which I believed, with the ultimate goal to help you more efficiently learn a language. Here are some excerpts:

> Myth: Memory gets worse as we age. Aging universally affects all organs. 50% of 80-year-olds show symptoms of Alzheimer's disease. Hence the overwhelming belief that memory unavoidably gets rusty at an older age. Fact: It is true we lose neurons with age. It is true that the risk of Alzheimer's increases with age. However, a well-trained memory is quite resilient and shows comparatively fewer functional signs of aging than the joints, the heart, the vascular system, etc. Moreover, training increases the scope of your knowledge, and paradoxically, your mental abilities may actually increase well into a very advanced age
>
> […]
>
> Myth: Learning while sleeping. An untold number of learning programs promises you to save years of life by learning during sleep. Fact: It is possible to store selected memories generated during sleep by: external stimuli, dreams, hypnagogic and hypnopompic hallucinations (i.e. hallucinations experienced while falling asleep and while waking up). However, it is nearly impossible to harness this process into productive learning. The volume of knowledge that can be gained during sleep is negligible. Learning in sleep may be disruptive to sleep itself. Learning while sleeping should not be confused with the natural process of memory consolidation and optimization that occurs during sleep… Learning while sleeping is not only a complete waste of time. It may simply be unhealthy
>
> […]
>
> Myth: Night shifts are unhealthy. Fact: People working in night shifts are often forced out of work by various ailments such as a heart condition. However, it is not night shifts that are harmful. It is the constant switching of the sleep rhythm from day to night and vice versa. It would be far healthier to let night shift people develop their own regular rhythm in which they would stay awake throughout the night. It is not night wakefulness that is harmful. It is the way we force our body do things it does not want to do
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
>
> Myth: People who sleep less live longer. In 2002, Dr Kripke compared the length of sleep with longevity (1982 data from a cancer risk survey). He figured > out that those who sleep 6-7 hours live longer than those who sleep 8 hours and more. No wonder that a message started spreading that those who sleep less live longer. Fact: The best longevity prognosis is ensured by sleeping in compliance with one's natural body rhythm. Those who stick to their own good rhythm often sleep less because their sleep is better structured (and thus more refreshing). "Naturally sleeping" people live longer. Those who sleep against their body call, often need to clock more hours and still do not feel refreshed. Moreover, disease is often correlated with increased demand for sleep. Infectious diseases are renowned for a dramatic change in sleep patterns. When in coma, you are not likely to be adding years to your life. Correlation is not causation

>
> […]
>
> Myth: Alarm clock can help you regulate the sleep rhythm. Fact: An alarm clock can help you push your sleep rhythm into the desired framework, but it will rarely help you accomplish a healthy sleep rhythm. The only tried-and-true way to accomplish a healthy sleep and a healthy sleep rhythm is to go to sleep only when you are truly sleepy, and to wake up naturally without external intervention

The article took a while to read but it contains a reasoned approach that urges respect for your brain and its limitations instead of seeking shortcuts that make the task of memorization harder. As a result of what I learned, I stopped using an alarm clock. It's been two weeks and I have a better understanding of exactly how much time my brain needs for rest (between 7 and 8 hours) for peak performance the next day. Paradoxically, I now go to bed earlier knowing that an alarm clock will not save me from the needed time that my brain needs to sleep.

If you keep your brain active with memorization, it's important to have an optimized routine that better retains what you've spent so much time learning. Otherwise you're wasting valuable time.

Read More: The Art Of Learning

The Holidays: Amateur Nights on Steroids

December 26, 2012 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

It seems like every few weeks I surprise one of my second-stringer blue-pill acquaintances when I turn down his "irresistible invitation" to some "can't-miss" weekend event or a bash for XYZ holiday. And, every time, I have to repeat the same sermon:

> I don't "go out" on amateur nights. Friday and Saturday are the nights every John Q. Paycheck goes out to the club, clogs it up with bad game, and starts beef when he realizes (toward the end of the night) that his hard-earned $150 didn't get him anywhere. The girls are extra resistant—there mostly to attention-whore in the first place, already on alert, and quickly worn down by the stink of bad game in the air. The ratios are bad and the prices are high.

The holidays are junior-varsity like the weekends, but on steroids. The sausage fests are more intense, the prices are even higher, and the attention-whoring attitudes are on blast.

In the US these are:

1. St. Patrick's Day
2. Cinco de Mayo
3. Independence Day
4. Halloween
5. New Year's Eve

As far as I'm concerned, any seasoned guy comes to this conclusion sooner or later. This is Single-Guy Resource Management 101: pros stay home on amateur nights. If you're still standing in lines outside of trendy clubs or bars on the weekend—or going out on the designated drinking holidays in hopes of snaring some low-hanging fruit—you're probably doing it wrong. I'm not saying it's not going to happen, I'm just saying that there are better ways to fill up your calendar, spend your precious time and money, or empty your testicles. You're playing against the odds in a numbers game. But I don't play the lottery. I run a business.

If that much is obvious, I've taken that lesson to its logical extreme: I avoid all hyped-up (promoted) events, most popular venues, and—here's the timely part—pack it up completely for about the last two or three weeks of the year plus the first week of the new one. Like the Hollywood studios, I go into re-runs (girls I already know biblically). Almost nothing good happens in December and, unless you already have something going, it's pretty much safe to go on cruise control. Girls go home for the holidays, people come visit girls for the holidays, and people pretty much shift into an end-of-year state of mind.

If girls are seasonal (and they are), their down season (winter) becomes their straight-up off-season come the holidays. "I'm super-busy," becomes the go-to excuse, and it's suddenly as if you're trying to grab a drink with Condoleezza Rice instead of girl who works 30 hours a week at a framing store. A lot of guys don't realize the slot machine isn't paying out, but they keep dropping in money and pulling. But, for me: No New Year's parties, no Christmas singles events, no hitting the pavement. A house party or a social-circle event is different, but I'm off the clock when it comes to anything with a cover charge, fee, or hoops to jump through.

This year, I decided to go against my own road-tested rule and pushed hard leading up to the holidays. I'd had a slow start to 2012, but really picked up steam around the fall equinox. "Gotta close the year strong." I was in full gallop working a series of promising fourth-quarter prospects. And, guess what: I had a staggering 80-percent flake rate for dates (4 out of 5 girls cancelled or attempted to re-schedule to an undesirable time/day). The one frigid chick who I managed to get out of the house out declared—with a straight face—that I "should look elsewhere if [I] want to have sex." If you'd been there, you'd know she's right.

I re-took my own lesson and decided to kick back, jerk off as needed, and catch up with people and work for the rest of the off-season. Just run out the clock.

I'm enjoying the rest.

Read More: "You Didn't Have to Make Things Awkward"

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

Are Manufacturing Jobs Coming Back To America?

December 26, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

The Atlantitroll has recently published an article heralding the great return of manufacturing jobs to America. Economic prosperity is coming back!

> Yet this year, something curious and hopeful has begun to happen, something that cannot be explained merely by the ebbing of the Great Recession, and with it the cyclical return of recently laid-off workers. On February 10, Appliance Park opened an all-new assembly line in Building 2—largely dormant for 14 years—to make cutting-edge, low-energy water heaters. It was the first new assembly line at Appliance Park in 55 years—and the water heaters it began making had previously been made for GE in a Chinese contract factory.
>
> On March 20, just 39 days later, Appliance Park opened a second new assembly line, this one in Building 5, to make new high-tech French-door refrigerators. The top-end model can sense the size of the container you place beneath its purified-water spigot, and shuts the spigot off automatically when the container is full. These refrigerators are the latest versions of a style that for years has been made in Mexico.
>
> Another assembly line is under construction in Building 3, to make a new stainless-steel dishwasher starting in early 2013. Building 1 is getting an assembly line to make the trendy front-loading washers and matching dryers Americans are enamored of; GE has never before made those in the United States. And Appliance Park already has new plastics-manufacturing facilities to make parts for these appliances, including simple items like the plastic-coated wire racks that go in the dishwashers.
>
> Loading…

This is a great example of big media's habit of taking one sample point and trying to extrapolate it for an entire country (the NY Times is especially guilty of doing this). Unfortunately for The Atlantitroll and America, the facts doesn't justify a substantial return of manufacturing jobs. Since 2001, 2.1 million manufacturing jobs have been lost. If you start from manufacturing's peak, 7 million manufacturing jobs have been lost, a fact made even more severe by the fact that the American population has grown by 70 million during the same time period.

And the number of jobs that will be gained through the "insourcing boom"? 1,700. That's how many jobs are created in the Atlantitroll's anecdote with GE, which pay much less than than the manufacturing jobs that were lost in the decline.

It's no small deal for those workers who now have a job thanks to insourcing, but until we create jobs in the millions, the boom is not even a hiccup for the economy. The reality is that globalization is here to stay, and if the Chinas of the world become unaffordable to manufacture, other countries will become cheaper. Only in specific industries with complex manufacturing will it be cheaper to produce in the United States.

If the living standards of the third-world is determined to rise, those of the first world must lower. Even a person dying of cancer will have his good days, but he cannot escape the inevitable.

Read Next: The Rise & Fall Of The Great Powers

Let Women Think You're Their Dream Man

December 27, 2012 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

[image]

I want to take the time to illustrate a classic mistake many men make in trying to determine the methodology behind female mate choice: thinking like a dude.

Our strictly logical minds sometimes conclude that we have to actually hit most of the stated points on a woman's checklist in order to "qualify" for that woman. This fails for one main reason above all: women rely more heavily on their emotions and feelings than do men when evaluating a potential mate.

A guy who merely appears to hit every point on the checklist in her dreams can punch well above his weight and render himself just as appealing as a guy who actually does, so long as he can sell her a dream that feels right to her.

To further illustrate this point, I'd like to present the story of former Texas Longhorn QB Matt Nordgren:

> Matt Nordgren is an all-American, blue-eyed Texan charmer. A University of Texas quarterback and team captain, he led the Longhorns to a national championship in 2006. He signed to play with the Philadelphia Eagles later that year, but an unexpected injury pushed him into the family energy business instead.

Let’s get the real story in here.

Firstly, Matt Nordgren was never a starter at the University of Texas. He threw a grand total of fourteen passes his entire four year career, with no touchdowns and a single interception. He also ran for two touchdowns. He lived in Vince Young’s shadow for pretty much his whole career at Texas.

He never “led” the Longhorns to anything. Vince Young led the Longhorns to a national title in 2006, following a spectacular 2005 season. Matt Nordgren was on the sideline watching him do it and giving him breathers during practice. He was also not a team captain.

Secondly, Matt Nordgren never had a realistic shot at the NFL. He got a look simply because he went to a big program, had NFL bloodlines (father once played for the Cowboys) and looked the part on paper with a big frame, a strong arm, plus decent athleticism. The Eagles gave him a rookie contract that basically amounted to a tryout, and he didn’t even make it to training camp. He was a camp arm at best.

How does Matt Nordgren take this mediocrity and maximize its value? He simply sells the dream and allows women to make it a reality in their own heads.

Once they have seen his appearance and then read “Texas Longhorn QB”, and “Philadelphia Eagles” next to his name, they will make shit up if they have to in order to fit him into the image they’ve created in their head. Since they are women and not football coaches, the details of his mediocre playing career will remain largely irrelevant, especially if his image looks nice and makes them feel good about being with him.

Once the process of selling the dream (the dream in this case being the chance to date a good looking “superstar” quarterback) has been completed, little has to be done. She’s already developed an image in her head of his accomplishments based on her limited knowledge of his status indicators. Her mind has already made him into a superstar.

She’s already looking up to him as a result, and he is already pre-selected and approved in her head. Her imagination will do most of the remaining work for him. All he needs to do is let her buy into the dream, like so…

He says: “I was a QB at the University of Texas, and I played for the Eagles”.

She thinks: “Wow, I see Texas on my TV! My dad’s a fan! That team is really good. And the QB is kind of the leader of a team, right? This guy must have led them to all those wins and that championship I heard about that one year! The Eagles are in the NFL, so he must have been the best. Plus, he’s so good looking! What a catch!”

Reality: Barely played in college, eternal backup, not a team leader, never really played for or even went to training camp with the Eagles (they cut him very early).

Note how her rationalization hamster did most of the work for him, expanding upon the relatively simple image he gave with her own interpretation of his status indicators. He looks the part, so she just made him into the finished product she wanted him to be because that idea made her feel good. No need for him to do much convincing-she will see what she wants to see.

In a sexual sense, this allows him to punch well above his weight and enjoy a lifestyle that few college benchwarmers ever get to enjoy. Matt Nordgren now spends his time running around the reality TV/celebrity circuit, doing red carpet premiers, getting snapped by paparazzi and banging a bunch of pretty hot women, including some Hollywood starlets. His personal life gets more female and celebrity attention than that of some actual Pro Bowl NFL QBs and Heisman winners.

Nobody cares that his football career was largely a bust beyond the high school level or that he spent just about all of his college career on the bench. As far as women are concerned, there is little difference between his career and that of Vince Young, who was a vastly superior quarterback. All he needed to do was sell the dream and let women make it into the reality that works best for him.

Athletes are not the only ones with the ability to benefit from this kind of action. Normal guys can go much further if they also learn how to project and sell an image and then just let the female imagination (and her own hypergamy) do much of the leg work for them.

Play the role of a marketing/advertising agency or agent, and view yourself as the product.

Chick logic can be quite annoying when encountered, but if you are able to avoid fighting it and instead make it work for you by allowing her wave of emotional rationalizations to up your own value, it can be turned into a useful tool.

Remember how female rationalization so often goes: if it feels good to her, then it is right, regardless of anything else. If the idea of you and/or being with you makes her feel good, then you are right, and the game can become a whole lot easier.

Read Next: The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

About the Author

Athlone McGinnis is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today. His column runs every Monday.

“No Law Can Be Sacred To Me But That Of My Nature”

December 27, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Ralph Waldo Emerson was one of the more famous American philosophers of the 19th century. He strongly influenced Henry David Thoreau, whose Walden took the idea of self-reliance to the literal while making it more accessible for the mainstream.

In the essay Self Reliance, Emerson argues that happiness only comes from laboring on your own projects, not from consuming another man’s creation. Not only do you have to work on your own projects but you have to be in tune to your nature to find out which satisfying projects you should embark upon in the first place. The ultimate goal is to live in a society of one—yourself—by pursuing your own interests and no one else’s.

Loading…

> Insist on yourself; never imitate. Your own gift you can present every moment with the cumulative force of a whole life’s cultivation; but of the adopted talent of another, you have only an extemporaneous, half possession. That which each can do best, none but his Maker can teach him.

The language of this essay was rather dense, more so than Seneca’s essay. However I understood enough to know that this was important wisdom of its day, helping many men discover their purpose in life. It’s a relatively short read: download the PDF here.

> He who travels to be amused, or to get somewhat which he does not carry, travels away from himself, and grows old even in youth among old things.

Read More: “Self Reliance” on Amazon (free Kindle edition)

Do Poor Americans Deserve An Ivy League Education?

December 28, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A low-income but high achieving American girl named Angelica wanted to go to Emory, a $40,000 a year university that has been deemed "new Ivy" by Kaplan. She initially qualified for financial aid, but it fell through for mysterious reasons, leaving her in the lurch. Her response was to take out a $60,000 private student loan without telling her mother. Her boyfriend cosigned the loan.

I'm sure you know where the story goes. She was unable to graduate and is now saddled with a huge debt while working a job that barely pays above minimum wage. The NY Times shed many tears over her situation, painting it as a trend that is contributing to America's decline. The article made heavy rounds on Reddit and leftist sites as proof that class divides are becoming more rigid as the oligarchical elite takes control over the country.

> Each showed the ability to do college work, even excel at it. But the need to earn money brought one set of strains, campus alienation brought others, and ties to boyfriends not in school added complications. With little guidance from family or school officials, college became a leap that they braved without a safety net.
>
> The story of their lost footing is also the story of something larger — the growing role that education plays in preserving class divisions. Poor students have long trailed affluent peers in school performance, but from grade-school tests to college completion, the gaps are growing. With school success and earning prospects ever more entwined, the consequences carry far: education, a force meant to erode class barriers, appears to be fortifying them.

The first thing I asked myself was, "What was her major?" The answer: psychology. Even if she did graduate, how would that bachelors pay off a $60,000 debt? Last time I checked, the only thing you can get with a psychology degree is an $18,000 a year job in a day care center or clinic. The Times didn't see it that way. In spite of the fact that she had trouble graduating from a high school that was declared "academically unacceptable," they saw no reason why she couldn't be part of the 1% by going to a top-tier school.

> "She was an extremely intelligent woman and an unusual one," she said.
>
> Yet even as Angelica's work hours grew, so did the rigor of her coursework. Meetings with faculty advisers were optional and Angelica did not consult hers. When it came time to declare a major, she had a B-plus average in the humanities and D's in psychology. She chose psychology.
>
> By the end of her second year, she felt exhausted and had grades to show it. Her long-distance love life was exhausted, too, and she briefly broke up with Fred.

> She went home for the summer to work at Target and dragged herself back to a troubled junior year.
>
> Loading…

I challenge the notion that she was "extremely intelligent" if she got a D in psychology. Class divide had nothing to do with her failure—it was due to being in over her head while making a series of bad decisions, such as…

—Going to an expensive faux Ivy instead of a public college near her home
—Not doing the coursework, or even going to class
—Picking a major that would not have provided her with a good-paying job
—Hiding a huge financial decision from her parent

Blame should also be placed on her immediate circle:

—Her mother, for not knowing that her daughter couldn't handle a tough college workload —Her father, for being absentee —Her boyfriend, for enabling a horrible financial decision that he himself is now burdened with —Her high school guidance counselors, for encouraging her to aim beyond her competency

While I have some sympathy for her, since she didn't have a father figure to aid her while the private loan industry preyed on her ignorance, I'd point the finger at just about everyone except "class division." The Times dares to suggest there's a new trend preventing Angelicas of the country from getting a good education, but I don't buy it. Was there ever a time in America where the daughter of a single mom working at a department store could easily get a degree from an Ivy League college?

I went to a state school with a lot of bright kids who had a more stable background than Angelica, and while most of them finished school, some took longer than four years because of the difficulty, and this was with a tuition of $8,000 a year. That money was no small change for me, and I ended up taking out $17,000 in student loans. However, I lived at home, worked part-time for two years, and picked a major (microbiology) where I knew there would be a job waiting for me, just a few miles away in Maryland's biotech corridor. My first year after graduating I made about $30,000, more than enough to pay my $180 a month student loan bill. While my major was the incorrect choice from a fulfillment perspective, it was a great choice financially. I thank my dad's advice and my own career research for that outcome.

When anyone with a heartbeat and no money thinks they can easily graduate from an Ivy League school in a worthless major without having to experience difficulty, the problem becomes not one of class divide but entitlement. An elite private education and a $100,000 job is no one's right, and not everyone is destined for an upper-class lifestyle. Unfortunately, some people–and their boyfriends—have to learn this the hard way.

Read Next: Careers That An American Education Can Buy You

Brilliant Takedown Of Feminism From An Old Man

December 28, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Many of you are probably familiar with Fred On Everything, a member of the old guard when it comes to the fight against feminism. His Hooking Up article gives a birds-eye view of how feminism corrupted women, in a way that only a senior citizen who has seen it all can elucidate.

> What I don't get is, why are gals bitching? This is the world they wanted. They clawed and scratched and burned their bras and had court cases and threw fits to get exactly what they have. They hated men because, they said, men weren't letting them copulate frantically like men had always wanted them to. Men, or more likely their mothers, didn't let them make themselves unattractive by dressing like hod-carriers and swearing like sailors. Finally men gave in and now women hate them for that. Whatever happened to gratitude?
>
> […]
>
> Sally Sue might have teeth like pearls and brains and perky tits and a wacky sense of humor and actually be quite a prize, but sex trumps art. If Sally didn't say Yes, she knew that Greta would. Women had commoditized themselves. It was a marvelous thing for the testosterone wads we think of as college boys.
>
> Loading...
> […]
>
> Certain dialogs become common:
>
> "All you want is sex!"
>
> "Uh…what else have you got?" or "So what?"
>
> Or, "Marriage? Why? Would sex be better? Would food taste better? I don't get it."
>
> Or, "Marriage doesn't make sense. Do you want to eat in the same restaurant all your life?"

Women weren't happen then and aren't happy now. Trying to please them will just sacrifice what you want while giving no guarantee that they'll be content, yet we still have beta males and white knights fighting among each other to appease the unappeasable. Will they collectively realize their folly?

Maybe a more relevant question is if we want them to wake up. When I'm looting the Best Buy after a hurricane, I don't want to compete with other looters. It's possible the quality of goods I'd be able to steal would be much less due to the competition.

Read Next: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

Top Oslo Nightlife Picks If You Want To Have Sex With A Norwegian Girl

December 29, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Do you want to go to Oslo and put your penis inside a Norwegian vagina? I got the itinerary for you to help make that happen…

Tuesday Night

Hit up Fugazi, a large club with a young and attractive crowd. It's best just to camp next to one of the bars and snare whatever girl comes by to order a drink. Make sure you come early because it can become impossible to get into after 1am.

Wednesday Night

This is the worst night in Oslo so you'll have to make due with smaller crowds. Your best bet is Apenbar, next to the touristy dock. It"s a small club that will have a handful of girls for you to approach.

Thursday Night

Now it starts getting much easier to find action. Hit up Horgan's, especially if you have more of a frat style. It gets nice and packed, but you'll have to compete with a lot of dudes. I had trouble with the big social circles but stayed until the bitter end because there were a lot of targets I could approach all night. There are also a couple other bars within the same block.

Friday Night

Check out Ryes, a retro-style bar that had a laid back crowd. It's in the "hip" Grünerløkka neighborhood, just north of the center, where you'll find tons of small bars. Simply walk up and down Thorvald Meyers Gate ("gate" means street in Norwegian) and pick the best spot. Black guys can check out club Bla, which has reggae music and seemed to attract chocoholic Norwegian girls.

Saturday Night

Anywhere! Hard to go wrong on this night.

I want to remind you that Norwegian girls are not shy about sex. Hit the night venues hard, enjoy drinking, and do the approaches. If you kiss a girl in the venue, think about getting her back to your place or hers. In case you're wondering, I got my flag in Grünerløkka. She was on the pill and let me ejaculate inside her four times. It was great.

For lodging, I stayed in My City Home. It was centrally located near the train station in an area where aggressive African hookers hang out, but not that close to the nightlife options I've listed. Thankfully, most Norwegian girls live alone so you can bang in their place.

Don't Miss: 15 Pictures Of Norwegian Girls

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Man Who Created His Own Language

December 29, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There's a recent article in the New Yorker that describes how one man created a language called Ithkuil.

> "I worked on this in fits and starts," he said, looking at the mass of documents. "It was very much dependent on whether I was dating anyone at the time. This isn't exactly something you discuss on a first or second date."

His language caught the interest of a Ukrainian university, which invited him to talk about it…

> "I was surrounded by all these people hanging on my every word. It was intoxicating—especially for a loner like me," Quijada said.
>
> […]
>
> We were picked up at the airport by Alla Vishneva, an attractive brunette with streaks of bleached blond in her hair, with whom Quijada had been exchanging e-mails and phone calls intermittently for the past several months. Vishneva, a former professor of Ukrainian at Rivne State Humanitarian University and a student of psychonetics, was the founder of an Ithkuil study group in Kiev.
>
> […]
>
> Quijada, who had been wearing a pair of Coke-bottle glasses and toting a cane to compensate for a leg injury, sized up her metallic silver boots and figure-hugging bluejeans and seemed taken aback. "What is a beautiful woman like you doing teaching Ithkuil?" he asked.
>
> Vishneva chuckled and returned the compliment in stilted English: "Ithkuil is beautiful. It's a very pure and logically constructed language."
>
> Quijada turned to me in the back seat of the car, visibly giddy. "It's one thing for another conlanger to call your work beautiful, but for someone halfway around the world with a million better things to do to say that—you've got to pinch yourself. It makes it seem like thirty years of slaving away might have been worth it."

A man who spent decades creating a language finally thinks it's worth only when it gets the attention of a beautiful woman. He was actually so enamored by Alla that he dedicated a future book to her.

Loading…

In America he couldn't even mention his invented language on a date for fear of being seen as a kook, but in Ukraine it helps garner the attention of a girl he's smitten by. Only if he knew how to stuff his mouth full of hot dogs would he have gotten sexual recognition for his work back home. There's a sociological lesson in this, somewhere.

Unfortunately, things take a weird turn for our hero when it turns out that the Ukrainian interest in his language comes from right wing nationalists who want to use his language to create a superhuman race. But hey, at least Alla warmed his heart.

From the article it's clear that language creation is not as rare as you might think. The most famous invented language is Esperanto, created in 1887. It was seen as so subversive that people were executed in the Soviet Union for speaking it. While reading the language's history, I came across this interesting fact:

> Some more focused reform projects, affecting only a particular feature of the language, have gained a few adherents. One of these is "riism", which modifies the language to incorporate non-sexist language and gender-neutral pronouns.

I see you, feminists! Esperanto, which sounds a bit like Italian, is interesting in that it has native speakers, including famous investor George Soros. Creating a language that people speak from birth… I'm sure the Esperanto creator would have had his own Ukrainian groupies as well.

Don't Miss: Which Language Course Is Best: Michel Thomas Or Pimsleur?

Please Take This Personally

December 30, 2012 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

This week I'm going to make a brief departure from my usual format of sharing articles from around the web, and invite you to share with us the things you've learned or re-learned in the Manosphere in 2012.

The Manosphere has changed significantly since I started reading back in 2008. There's been a shift in many game blogs toward more of a lifestyle theme, and I've seen several of my favorite bloggers close up shop only to be replaced by some of my new favorite bloggers.

Though I've made my transition in and out of the 'Sphere over the years as both a reader and a guest contributor, and though sometimes the information seems repetitive to the point where I'm a little curious as to why it takes some writers 8,000 words to say "don't be a wuss," I still glean information.

I think sometimes we underestimate the need to be reminded of things we already know. Well, at least I'm guilty of that to a certain extent. But now that I'm contributing again, I spend a little more time reading than I normally would, and I've learned that being reminded over and over of the same central theme keeps me sharp.

I read a post by Roosh several months ago talking about location and game from a logistical standpoint. I'm moving on January 12th to a newer, nicer place right in the heart of the downtown entertainment district as a direct result of that article. Just by mentioning it around work, I already have two girls who are excited to "know someone in the district" so they can crash after a night of drinking. This is going to get stupid – and I mean that in the best way possible. And no, the extra $350.00 per month is not only so I can get the poosy; it's closer to work, closer to higher-end organic grocery stores, it has a fantastic gym and a resort-style pool, and there are literally dozens of restaurants and bars within three blocks of my soon-to-be new front door.

Loading...

NexxtLevelUp had a guest post about online dating. I fired up my long-defunct Match.com profile and retooled it. I didn't copy and paste the writer's recommended profile, but I made it my own and kept the spirit of the intent. I'm already seeing more activity and interest than I ever have in online dating, and it's only been a week. No, its not a miracle cure, and no, women aren't standing in line outside my front door – but it's a noticeable improvement.

There's a post on the forum about OKCupid's "Best face app." I opened an OKC account just long enough to use the app (it took a few days to get my report) and then I shut it down since I prefer Match. I now know my best pictures and what type of online girl is in to me (late 20's/early 30's, liberal, heavily skewed vegetarian for some reason – pretty much the opposite of everything I find attractive in a woman). But at least I know what I'm dealing with. The report showed a photo of the other guys who beat me out of the contest when my photo wasn't chosen, so I have a good idea what my competition physically looks like.

I chat on the phone or text with Bronan the Barbarian and Nate at least once per week, and they keep me motivated in the fitness arena.

And who could live without this brilliant reminder of what the red pill truly is…

I already knew that living closer to the action would bring me more action. I already knew I needed to refresh my Match.com account. I already know that putting down the fork and hitting the gym will keep me in shape. I know these things, and I've known them for years.

But I appreciate the reminder, and I always try to take things personally. The examples listed above are just a few things I took action on recently. There's several more from earlier in the year, but you get the idea.

What about you? Did you take anything personally this year? Is there anything you can point to from the Manosphere in 2012 that motivated you to action? Was there any new concept that opened your eyes – or an existing concept that you're glad you were reminded of?

Sterile Warfare Is Not As Sterile As You Think

December 30, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

We're led to believe that drone missile technology makes war clean and safe, with fewer civilian casualties. Americans have bought this argument for they rarely question the impact that their drones are having in Afghanistan, Pakistan, and Yemen. The only time a discussion came up about their use in the past couple of months was when David Petraeus cheated on his cow of a wife, though much more attention was given on the hypergamous mistress who won his heart.

The Spiegel recently ran an article about the effects of drone operation on the pilots…

> Bryant remembers the first time he fired a missile, killing two men instantly. As Bryant looked on, he could see a third man in mortal agony. The man's leg was missing and he was holding his hands over the stump as his warm blood flowed onto the ground — for two long minutes. He cried on his way home, says Bryant, and he called his mother.
>
> "I felt disconnected from humanity for almost a week," he says, sitting in his favorite coffee shop in Missoula, where the smell of cinnamon and butter wafts in the air. He spends a lot of time there, watching people and reading books by Nietzsche and Mark Twain, sometimes getting up to change seats. He can't sit in one place for very long anymore, he says. It makes him nervous.

He looked to his girlfriend for emotional support, but that behavior was too beta for her, so she dumped him…

> His girlfriend broke up with him recently. She had asked him about the burden he carries, so he told her about it. But it proved to be a hardship she could neither cope with nor share.

A female pilot learned to ignore her emotions and to just go for the kill…

Loading…

> "There was no time for feelings" when she was preparing for an attack, she says today. Of course, she says, she felt her heart beating faster and the adrenaline rushing through her body. But then she adhered strictly to the rules and focused on positioning the aircraft. "When the decision had been made, and they saw that this was an enemy, a hostile person, a legal target that was worthy of being destroyed, I had no problem with taking the shot."

Many atrocities of the world have taken place from accepting the dehumanizing brainwashing that commanders use as justification for engaging against an "enemy."

> Today Meyer has two small children. She wants to show them "that mommy can get to work and do a good job." She doesn't want to be like the women in Afghanistan she watched — submissive and covered from head to toe. "The > women there are no warriors,” she says. Meyer says that he current job as a trainer is very satisfying but that, one day, she would like to return to combat duty.

History has shown that advanced military technology does not remain solely in the hands of the elite powers. It’s just a matter of time until drones with low-yield missiles became accessible to rogue states and well-funded terrorists. Are drones the invention that brings destruction onto American soil where Japanese fire balloons failed? I believe this painful result is inevitable. Perhaps not on a grand scale of a 9/11 that takes many lives, but at some point there will be an attempt made to launch a weak drone attack that makes us experience a small fraction of what our sustained drone bombing campaigns inflict on Middle Eastern populations.

Don’t Miss: What It’s Like To Opt Out Of TSA’s Body Scanners

Underage Game: How To Party With A Real Fake ID

December 31, 2012 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

Time and time again underage guys bring up the topic of going to bars and clubs underage with a fake ID. In my opinion, getting a fake ID is a stupid move. Instead, I decided to use a real ID of somebody with similar features to myself, frequenting venues with a young demographic.

Don't Use A Fake ID

Unless you have a family member or close friend who is a DJ or manager in a venue (and even then that's just one place) young guys will need to get an ID to be able to meet girls in clubs or bars or take them out for drinks. Young guys typically get fake ID's, but there are a lot of downsides to doing this.

Bouncers check every ID they get to see if it is real and since they've thousands of drivers licences before, they know what real ones look like. Using a fake ID might work occasionally but if you plan to go out regularly over a long period of time at some point you will wind up with a bouncer and a venue that will not take the chance of letting you in with a fake ID. They will take the ID off you, get the cops, ask you who you bought it from and slap you with a fine. This is why I decided to use a real ID.

Find Your Doppelganger

I'm an ethnic minority and did not know young people who looked like me. Virtually all the friends I did have of my racial background were female. I asked a hot one who hangs out with (and rides the cocks of) a lot of older dudes of our background to help me find somebody who would be willing to claim they lost their drivers licence and get it replaced, with me taking care of the replacement costs ($20 where I am) and using the original.

People I asked myself were wary of giving their ID to a person they do not know very well, but using a hot girl to do the asking for me seemed to get around this by activating a supplicating, "white knight" response in the guys. Within 30 mins of inboxing guys on Facebook, she'd found three willing to do it for me, although in the end I chose to use the drivers licence of one of my wingmen's best friends because he resembled me the most of out of all of my prospects.

Bouncers Don't Care About The Picture

While bouncers always checked to see if my ID was real, they do not do so nearly as much for the face. With the exception of a casino I've been to and the bars and clubs attached to it, all bouncers I've come across have primarily inspected the ID to see if it's real and squinted at the date of birth. Since the hair and eye color and skin tone matched and the face's shape was not radically different it fooled all of the bouncers, most of whom did not even look at the photo anyway.

People tend to look quite different in their drivers licence photos, so bouncers expect the photograph not to be an exact match. When I became "legal" I returned to the same venues I used to go to underage and the same bouncers who've seen me many times before did not even notice that I was using a different ID. They really aren't paying attention to things like the name or photograph, just the authenticity of ID and the date of birth.

Hit The Young Clubs

The last thing I did while underage was to predominately go to venues (mostly clubs) with a reputation for having young crowds. For young guys, a quick Facebook search of a venue and an inspection of how many of your peers have "Liked" it's page is a good start, but the best bet is to simply ask hot girls your age which places are easy to get into.

I've met girls in nightclubs who pretended to be old enough later on turned out to actually be as young as 16 who've borrowed an ID from an older friend or sister for the weekend. If 16 year old teeny bopper girls can get into meat market clubs with somebody else's ID, you can only imagine how simple it was for my wingmen and I to get in when we were underage, even for venues with older crowds.

By using a replaced authentic ID instead of a fake one, I was able to confidently gain access to bars and nightclubs without having to run the risk of getting busted with a fake ID or having to rely on somebody else to let me borrow their ID every time I needed it. Thus making it possible for me to consistently go out and meet hot girls instead of sitting at home and masturbating on my weekend nights if I didn't have a party on.

Read More: The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

France Is In Big Trouble

December 31, 2012 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

While most of the world is focused on the economical troubles of Greece, Spain, and Portugal, it's possible that France may blow past them in a rapid economical collapse.

France has been put under the spotlight when Gérard Depardieu, the country's famous actor, decided to move to Belgium to avoid paying an 75% tax rate that was recently introduced on the rich by the newly elected socialist government headed by President Hollande. Depardieu decided that enough was enough after contributing over 145 million euros to the government during his career. The Telegraph was sympathetic in his move to Belgium, but the same cannot be said of the Washington Post, whose article seems to have been written by Hollande himself…

> In real life, however, Depardieu has suddenly taken on a new role: filthy-rich tax-dodger, dissolute ingrate and traitor to his country in a time of need. It is a role he did not seek, but it has made him an unlikely political star at a time when France is bitterly divided over the Socialist government's efforts to pull out of an economic slump dragging into its fifth year.
>
> After it became known Depardieu bought a house in Belgium to become what is called here a "fiscal exile," Prime Minister Jean-Marc Ayrault called his conduct "tacky." Labor Minister Michel Sapin said he was an example not of France's cinematic accomplishments but of "personal degradation." Culture Minister Aurelie Filippetti accused him of "deserting the battlefield in a war against the economic crisis."
>
> President Francois Hollande tried hard to stay above the fray but could not resist a dig. "When someone loves France, he should serve it," the chief of state intoned in a radio interview Friday.

Germany's Spiegel claims that Hollande's government is in denial about globalization, trying to run the country like an economic history museum. Meanwhile, discontent from both the rich and poor are growing…

> Sociologist Olivier Galland, who headed the study, detects a feeling of bitterness and abandonment among 16- to 25-year-olds. "All of the elements are in place that could trigger yet another explosion," like the one in the late fall of 2005, when there was rioting in the outskirts of major French cities.
>
> Loading…
> "The system won't survive if we don't change," says Gérard Dussillol, a French expert on finance who works for a Franco-Belgian think-tank. He believes that "France, as a domino, can shake the entire system of the euro zone."
>
> Even fashion designer Karl Lagerfeld no longer has anything good to say about his adopted country, where he claims to pay €2 million in annual taxes, which he > calls “a sort of spa tax to the French state.” French politics, with its symbolic tax on the rich, has become “grotesque,” says Lagerfeld, while the French have “sterilized themselves intellectually.” The only thing that still works in the country is fashion, he said in an interview in Berlin.

:popcorn2:

Back in the US, economist Mish Shedlock calls France “economically insane” for trying to prevent companies from making layoffs.

> Hollande’s layoff clampdown solution according to Labour Minister Michel Sapin is to “make layoffs so expensive for companies that it’s not worth it.”
>
> Four things [will happen], all of them bad
>
> 1. Mass layoffs will occur before the law passes.
> 2. Companies will move any jobs they can overseas.
> 3. Ongoing, if it’s difficult to fire people, companies will not hire them in the first place.
> 4. Corporate profits will collapse along with the stock market should the need to fire people arise.

He believes France’s implosion is already underway…

> Looking ahead to 2013, I expect things in France to get worse at an accelerated pace.

My interest in France is due to me currently living in Europe. A faltering Europe weakens the Euro and increases my purchasing power (I earn USD), but on the other hand, collapsing economies means less disposable income for 20-somethings, especially women. They go out less, party less, purchase less feminine clothing, and are less open to casual sex. While it’d be nice to save $150-200 a month from a 10% rise in the dollar, I rather have the poosy benefits of happy girls whose cash enables them to go and “have fun” instead of worrying about how they will make next month’s rent. This is why poorer countries can be harder to get easy sex in than rich ones (assuming you don’t resort to prostitutes).

Regardless of what I think, as long as France’s government turns back time with policies that no longer work in a globalized economy, Europe’s future remains in doubt. Now enjoy this Alizee video…

This Is How To Be A Man

January 1, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here is the poem If by Rudyard Kipling, an English writer who won the Nobel Prize in literature.

> If you can keep your head when all about you
> Are losing theirs and blaming it on you,
> If you can trust yourself when all men doubt you,
> But make allowance for their doubting too;
>
> If you can wait and not be tired by waiting,
> Or being lied about, don't deal in lies,
> Or being hated, don't give way to hating,
> And yet don't look too good, nor talk too wise:
>
> If you can dream – and not make dreams your master;
> If you can think – and not make thoughts your aim;
> If you can meet with Triumph and Disaster
> And treat those two impostors just the same;
>
> If you can bear to hear the truth you've spoken
> Twisted by knaves to make a trap for fools,
> Or watch the things you gave your life to broken,
> And stoop and build 'em up with wornout tools:
>
> If you can make one heap of all your winnings
> And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings
> And never breathe a word about your loss;
>
> If you can force your heart and nerve and sinew
> To serve your turn long after they are gone,
> And so hold on when there is nothing in you
> Except the Will which says to them: 'Hold on!'
>
> If you can talk with crowds and keep your virtue,
> Or walk with kings – nor lose the common touch,
> If neither foes nor loving friends can hurt you,
> If all men count with you, but none too much;
>
> Loading...
> If you can fill the unforgiving minute
> With sixty seconds' worth of distance run –
> Yours is the Earth and everything that's in it,
> And – which is more – you'll be a Man my son!

This part leapt out at me:

> If you can make one heap of all your winnings
> And risk it on one turn of pitch-and-toss,
> And lose, and start again at your beginnings
> And never breathe a word about your loss;

To buffer ourselves against the future, we aim to save large sums of money. If you're a little older, you're probably familiar with hitting a certain savings goal and then immediately feeling that it's not enough. Then you construct a new goal in a neverending treadmill towards safety, comfort, and stability. But as long as our present needs are met, how important is accumulation and protection of wealth? Would it really be that bad if we had to start from scratch after some large misfortune? If comfort protects you from difficulty, and therefore prevents you from risk and the growth that the risk entails, maybe betting it all on a "pitch-and-toss" is not a bad idea.

Read Next: How To Live A Balanced Life

The Peak Of Democracy And The Death Of Feminism

January 1, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

We are currently living through the declining era of democracy. The age of democracy began in 1776, when America revolted from its King, but it was not until the French Revolution of 1789 and the destruction of most of Europe's monarchies in the ensuing Napoleonic Wars did the age of democracy begin in earnest.

Alexis de Toqueville was the first political philosopher to correctly note the rise of democratic power. After traveling through the United States in the 1830's, he claimed that the age of democracy, so perfectly encapsulated in his masterwork Democracy in America, was coming into being.

> America, then, exhibits in her social state a most extraordinary phenomenon. Men are there seen on a greater equality in point of fortune and intellect, or, in other words, more equal in their strength, than in any other country of the world, or in any age of which history has preserved the remembrance. (Source)

The principle quality of a democracy is equality. It shapes every facet of democratic life—mass elections, public debates, free-markets, welfare systems, and universal education. Name an institution of the modern world today, and it isn't difficult to see how equality plays a central assumption in its foundation. Indeed equality would become so important in the coming times that Tocqueville claimed no ruler would be able to operate without invoking its authority:

> On the other hand, I am persuaded that all who shall attempt, in the ages upon which we are entering, to base freedom upon aristocratic privilege, will fail-that all who shall attempt to draw and to retain authority within a single class, will fail. At the present day no ruler is skilful or strong enough to found a despotism, by re-establishing permanent distinctions of rank amongst his subjects: no legislator is wise or powerful enough to preserve free institutions, if he does not take equality for his first principle and his watchword. (Source)

Equality, it just so happens, is also the central assumption in the feminist movement. If feminists were to argue that people are unequal, men would retort that men are superior (many women would too). Equality is the premise that allows women to con men into believing they are all fighting for the same cause.

But before we examine feminism in greater detail, consider the following graph from Freedom House, a think tank that measures political freedoms across all countries:

Democracies have increased steadily throughout the latter half of the century, continuing a trend that started at least one-hundred years prior, with a marked rise in popularity after the collapse of the USSR. But looking closer at the numbers for "free" societies in the 2000's, we can see that there has been a steady decline in their freedom scores since the Twin Towers fell:

Loading...

Technically, they classify more countries as free, but the quality of that freedom has been in decline. I believe this is the beginning of a long-term trend.

Our age of democracy has reached the peak of its growth. If we consider the history of democracy and the spread of equality since the American Revolution, there hasn't been a major victory for democracy since the fall of the Berlin Wall. Democracies peaked at the turn of the century, but since 9/11 democratic nations have begun to die, both financially and demographically, whereas emerging economies and populations are coming from nations hostile to democracy and equality.

Thus democracies will shrink in power and scope as this century progresses. It will be discredited, much like communism was, and people will seek answers outside of democratic/representative governments. We are already seeing the transformation of democratic governments today as increasingly authoritarian controls are placed to solve intractable problems (i.e. TSA body scanners, printing trillions of dollars, never ending war, bailouts, "income based repayment" for student loans, etc).

The decline of democracy is significant for men because it also means the decline of feminism. As today's democracies are eventually replaced with oligarchic or monarchistic forms of governance, feminists are going to have a difficult time finding an audience with their message of equality.

When thinking of feminism in historical terms, we can consider feminism as any political movement designed to regulate male behavior in favor of female opportunity. One prominent historical example was Sparta, a state which gave undue license and freedoms to its women, while treating its men like cattle.

But other than short-term historical anomalies like Sparta, there has been no other political movement more favorable for female advancement than modern democracy. At no other time in human history have women held more power than a system where equality is true. And so the rise and fall of feminism will coincide with the rise and fall of democratic governments; so utterly dependent on equality that feminism will cease to exist anywhere near its current power without it. Instead some men and women will seize and maintain vastly more political power than others, and the common citizen will unquestioningly accept the dictates from his/her new masters.

Whether this is a good thing or a bad thing I cannot say, but it is clear that women will cease to exist as a significant political power when there is no more democratic government to serve them; instead both women and men will be regarded as property of the state to be used and managed as seen necessary by those in power. These trends may happen quickly or slowly, but make no mistake about where the world's political climate is heading; the age of democracy, and feminism, is coming to an end.

Read Next: Why Feminism Will Die

An Amazing Manosphere Blog You've Never Seen

January 2, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two years ago a man who went by the name of Solomon launched a blog called The Solomon Group. It went on to make a gigantic impact in its short six-month existence, with bootleg copies still in circulation today (pdf). Here's an excerpt from his introductory post…

> As with any wealthy and successful man of influence, Solomon was a pussy magnet. He had 700 wives and 300 concubines. Not surprisingly, this lead to his eventual downfall. It seems not even god-like wisdom can save a man from losing his damn mind when subjected to the coercion and incessant bitching of the fairer sex.
>
> Many men today are members of The Solomon Group. They are successful, knowledgeable and wise in the ways of the world – yet they underestimate how their decisions and interaction with the opposite sex impacts their lives until its too late. In Solomon's case, his nation began to degrade and his son's rightful kingdom was divided. Moral of the story: Trust your wisdom and judgment when it comes to women or God is going to fuck you so hard your children will feel it.
>
> This blog is a collection of modern day Proverbs for men derived from personal experience and information gleaned from the most talented writers and insightful commenters in the Manosphere.

On Christmas Day, when everyone was with their families, I sat down to read the entire archive. Here are a few things I highlighted…

> Men are responsible for 99.9% of everything worth celebrating, lamenting, embracing and shunning in recorded history. Good and evil are defined, constructed, and introduced to the world by men. Take your societal position seriously, and never allow women or feminized pussyboys to erode what it means to be a man. Never let them use shaming language to strip you of your title.
>
> […]
>
> …my quest is to have a plethora of women bent over my couch screaming my name while their future White Knight husband is working overtime to save money for the house she'll eventually take from him in the divorce.
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> Jealousy is nature's way of letting a man know that he has assigned too high of a value to a particular person or event. If you're living with jealousy over a girlfriend or an ex, you have placed her in a category higher than she deserves.
>
> […]

> Want to know the real reason why women shout “I just want to meet a nice guy”? Its simply because they want the nice guys to identify themselves so they know who not to sleep with.
>
> […]
>
> As men living in a world where women are nothing more than overgrown children, we’re constantly faced with a sobering reality. While both genders have their good sides and bad sides, society has encouraged women to view their weaknesses as strengths and their strengths as weaknesses. In the end, men are stuck with all of the downside and virtually none of the upside of a woman. Women used to be moody but feminine. Now they’re moody but slutty. They used to be irrational and submissive. Now they’re irrational and manipulative. In short, there was a time when men would suffer through a woman’s flaws because there was a payoff, and women would return the favor by overlooking a man’s flaws. In the end, happy unions for the most part and healthy families were the outcome.
>
> Those days are long gone.

It also included the infamous Slut Zone vs Player Zone graph…

Solomon helps you see American women for who they really are, and how to take advantage of the the times to get as much sex as you can. Click here to download the blog archive in PDF format.

Loot while you can, gentlemen.

Read Next: 21 Tips For Starting A Manosphere Blog

All Girls Like Muscular Guys

January 2, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

I've never been much of meathead gym-rat. I played sports in high school, including track and field, but was fed the line that weight lifting would "bulk me up" and "slow me down." I never really had much more than a slender, athletic build—muscular, but thin—a development that I attribute to several subsequent years of running distance to stay in shape. There was a time where I'd go on 10- or 12-mile runs like nothing, getting even thinner in the process.

My fitness decisions were based on a series of embarrassingly inaccurate myths, including the notion that endurance training was best for my "overall health" and— more importantly— that most girls "didn't really like muscular guys" anyway. In more recent years, I'd gradually degenerated into a skinny-fat build borne from a combination of boredom and laziness—not horribly out-of-shape, but with a weak-looking question-mark posture, a slightly protruding man-pooch, and nascent man boobs.

The whole thing came to a head, hilariously, when I was examining a sex video I'd made with an ex-girlfriend, and I saw what my body looked like from a distance. Here I was, filming this for posterity, and I couldn't bear to look at myself. Something needed to change. I went back to what I knew. I started jogging, doing light resistance training with an emphasis on reps over weight, and quickly noticed a difference. Within, I'd say, two months, I looked noticeably thinner again. I was back at zero.

This time around, though, I had a theory I wanted to test out. For years, people—including chicks—had been beating that same drum that only a small subset of girls liked muscular dudes. Years earlier, I'd abandoned taking advice from most people about girls—especially from girls—realizing it was irretrievably stupid. So why would this be accurate? I basically hadn't gone back and revised that part of my knowledge base to new realities.

So I decided to run an experiment on myself. "Let's see what happens if I get a little ripped." I picked up a series of weightlifting books, revised my workout routine with a focus on strength training, bought some weightlifting gloves, and started hitting the gym on the regular. One of the bread-and-butter components of my Workout Routine 1.0 had been a home workout. I'd do a series of body-weight exercises, with an emphasis on flexibility and endurance. I updated that process to focus on muscle-gain. I made a concerted effort to eat at home more often, eating protein and vegetables at better intervals. I started taking vitamins, including zinc and magnesium. I played hype songs on loop while doing push-ups and dips like a prison inmate.

Loading…

It wasn't long before I was in a zone. I was lifting at the gym three or four days a week, and supplementing that with a day or two of home workout. The differences in my physique and behavior were noticeable. Previously fitted shirts became snug around my arms and chest. My posture improved, making me look longer and sturdier. I threw out the trash shirtless.

Girls' reactions were a lot more interesting. I'd catch them staring—sometimes several times during a conversation—at my arms and chest. Girls' hands would linger on certain parts of my body when they would do one of those you're-so-funny pawings. The nerdiest, most bookish girls, the kind who like sci-fi and talk with a slight lisp—who most people never-in-a-million-years would imagine cared about such things—would oooh and ahhh when I'd tell them to feel my biceps and half-jokingly explain that I was "in the middle of getting ripped." I had unwittingly leveled-up.

Here's the thing: if you were to see me in the street right now, you'd never call me buff. By any serious measure, I'm just getting started. As 2013 gets underway, my "resolution" is to cement these gains and push them to the next level. Interestingly, at the same time that my humble progress has gotten me better attention from better girls, it has become less and less about them. Working out has become my thing.

But, if you pick up anything from my little experiment, it's this: every girl—regardless of what she, or anyone else, says—likes muscles on a guy. Don't believe otherwise.

Read More: The Power of Shame

How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

January 3, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Much has been made in the manosphere of the ongoing rise of negative social indicators in the United States and the general societal decline that they seem to be predicting, particularly as they relate to gender relations. Many guys are worried sick about this, and rightfully so.

In the midst of this concern, however, I would like to present some information that could shed some more light on what may come of all this: we have actually been here before. In fact, there exists within our society a model for the outcome of all the ongoing negative trends we are seeing, a culture that has already felt the impact of those trends and suffered their consequences.

That model or "prototype" for our future is Black America.

The manosphere is a predominantly white corner of the net, but many of the problems discussed there are quite familiar to the relatively few blacks who frequent it. Almost every social problem guys in the manosphere cite as a growing concern within the general population has already played itself out within the Black American community.

Let us examine some of them individually.

1. Concerned about growing obesity rates? Black American women already lead the nation here. 41% of those over 18 are obese, compared to just under a quarter of White American women in the same age range. African-American women are 70% more likely to be obese than non-Hispanic white women.

You think white girls are getting fat? You've got a long way to go.

2. Concerned about illegitimacy and rampant out of wedlock births? Black America has already been there and done that. The illegitimacy rate within that community has long been close to 70%. The nightmare scenarios being predicted in much of the manosphere regarding increased out of wedlock births and the complete breakdown of the family have already been played out there. Everyone else is playing catch-up.

There is great concern about the potential for the young men of the future to grow up without a father in the picture. For most black men (including myself), this is simply routine.

3. Concerned about the spread unchecked hypergamy is having on the dating market? Worried that it could lead to unrestrained bad-boy worship? Want to see where all of this is going?

Once again, look no further than black America. There may be no female more hypergamous than the average black american girl and, interestingly, there is no female with a lower rate of marriage. The culture places a tremendous emphasis for men on the possession of traits matching those of urban masculine culture (read: “swag”, aggression, edgy appearance, etc).

In no culture are decent guys and more academically inclined males more marginalized and insulted than they are in Black American culture.

You think the sexual market value of the average white or asian nerd is low? Try being their black equivalent and having your entire culture essentially disown you and claim that your intellect makes you an insult to the culture/race.

Bad-boy love and the extreme form of hypergamy that comes with it has ruled the black community for a couple of generations now. That nightmare is reality there.

4. What happens when men in a certain culture are marginalized and their households become largely matriarchal?

Loading...

Long Answer: Men will have high unemployment and incarceration rates, and young boys will be prone to violence, academic reticence, and poor performance in school. Nearly 70% of undergraduate and graduate degrees will be earned by females, while their men practically disappear from the higher echelons of the professional world and leave those women without suitable mates. These women will then proceed to ponder where all the good black men went.

A culture hostile to academia will arise, excessive male posturing (see modern urban gang culture and the media that imitates it) will become the norm to compensate for the lack of productive pursuits among the men and the next generation will live out a cycle characterized by generally dysfunctional behavior.

Short Answer: Black America will happen.

5. Are you concerned about the rise of anti-male attitudes among women? You'd likely already know the end game were you a black American male. The manosphere's archetype for the worst-case scenario of western womanhood is already normal in Black America.

"Backbreaker", an African-American male who posts on the SoSuave.net forums, broke this down quite well (emphasis is mine):

> "The thing is, and this isn't race bating or racism in the least bit, but because African Americans in the 70′s and 80′s were more single parent house holds than their Caucasian counterparts, most African American women today were raised not only without 2 parents around, but are fully convinced they don't need a man. we kinda like have a 20 year head start on this whole feminism thing.
>
> Black women have been telling black men they aren't st, weren't st and never will be ST well before their Caucasian counterparts thought it was cool."

…and well before any white woman decided to crow about "The End of Men".

Continuing (emphasis is again mine):

> "black women are the manosphere punch line /archetype of women who are too demanding and unrealistic and they all end up single. the only people who get got by black women are guys who want to get got. the only guy who was stupid enough to put a ring on my mom's finger (who is the ultimate alpha widow) was the beta male who bought into the church hype.. and we all know better. and in 2 years she had rented her own apartment to get away from him. my mom has dated a school district superintendent, an engineer, a lawyer and a bishop of a church, and none of them were good enough for her independent ass lol"

In short, the multiple nuclear bombs of societal decline that concern the manosphere have already went off in Black America. The end game is already on display.

It wasn't always like this. Black Americans used to have more stable families and much lower illegitimacy rates (on par with or somewhat lower than those of modern white Americans). They had thinner women and lower crime rates. Their men were valued once, less marginalized and expendable than they are now considered to be and not as frequently incarcerated either.

In other words, there was a time in which Black America was a much closer parallel to the White America we know.

White Americans still hold on to pieces of this old reality, and now sound alarms throughout the manosphere of decline as more negative trends come closer and closer to home. Meanwhile, Black Americans have no room left for decline-the destruction is already complete.

If current trends are any indication, others may be soon to follow. Perhaps the numerous misfortunes that have befallen the Black American community could serve to warn others of what to do next and how to proceed into this more disconcerting future.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read Next: Do Black Guys Have A Game Advantage?

The English Are Coming!

January 3, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book describes the etymology of thirty English words as a way to show how it became the world's most universal language. In between these explanations we get historical lessons on English's development from its Proto-Indo-European language roots. This is all done with the intention to explain why English came to dominate the world.

Today's modern languages are the result of natural selection from languages that are now dead. Languages go through evolution just like animals do, where the ones that survive are most useful for socializing and commerce. The most useful language that fulfills human needs is English. I consider myself a language enthusiast and picked up this book to satisfy my curiosity about the supremacy of English, but only a couple pages contained sound analysis. The book was mostly a list of facts that read like trivia.

Loading...

It was easy to tell that the author did a lot of her research on the internet. She connected very few dots of her own, simply parroting information she gleaned online. It seemed like at some point in her life she had decided to write a book—any book—and then did the research to construct one consisting of facts that you will forget in a matter of minutes. I got through half of the book and couldn't bear to read anymore. The premise was great, but the execution a total failure. Not recommended.

Read More: "The English Is Coming" on Amazon

Are You A Traditional Conservative But Don't Realize It?

January 4, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The other week someone called me a "traditional conservative." I had to look it up to see what exactly he meant. The Wikipedia page was a bit messy but it did lead me to a dense essay called Classical Conservatism (pdf). It reveals that I share some beliefs with the ideology. Here are the essay's highlights…

> The traditionalist conservative's first feeling, the intuition that constitutes his or her moral source, is the sense of loss, and hence, of nostalgia.
>
> […]
>
> While in possession, we take our good for granted and thus often fail to recognize it. But in the face of loss, the human good is vividly revealed to us. We lament the loss of goods, not the loss of evils, which is why lament illuminates. Is it not striking that whereas antebellum Southern writers championed both the economic and moral superiority of the "peculiar institution," postbellum Southern conservatives typically did not lament the loss of slavery? Rather, the latter lamented the loss of gentility, gallantry, domesticity, and the virtues of yeoman agriculturalists.
>
> […]
>
> The traditionalists' touchstones for the human good all lie in the past, not in some glorious visionary future.
>
> […]
>
> …no one would disagree that Wal-Mart and free trade spell lower prices and often greater choice for Americans as consumers. But, to take the case of Wal-Mart, is not something lost, some kind of social capital, when the proprietors of a small town's chamber of commerce are "converted" into corporate employees? Is not something lost, as well as gained, in the proliferation of broadcast media? Is more choice always better? Does life in a consumer society perhaps promote superficial "lifestyles" structured by purchases and ephemeral fashions rather than "ways of life" structured by lasting commitments?
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> The sun too will set on the era of American exceptionalism. When it does, those who have placed their fondest hopes in the promises of ideological politics may feel themselves dispossessed and demoralized; but those who have hearkened to the teachings of the traditionalists may find themselves, at last, at home.

Traditional conservatives can be boiled down into believing that not all change is good.

They look to the past for what was lost and how to recapture it while liberals look to the future for what more can be gained in the form of expanded rights, new privileges, birth control subsidies, and dole money. Both offer a counterbalance to society, with one side hitting the brakes while the other hits the gas.

I think it can be argued that in the past 30 years all we've done is hit the gas, with very little thought of how that progress impacts human behavior. The pedal is now to the metal while we all race down the highway in the dark of night without wearing out seatbelts. Traditional conservatives highlight the deadly accidents and say, "Look at this, we need to slow down!" while the left yells, "Fuck it, we need to keep going!"

The line for me was drawn with smartphones, a disruptive technology that came about in my late twenties. I was able to see first-hand how this invention degraded society, not just in America but later in Eastern Europe. I then began to think: what else has had a negative effect without us realizing it? How has pair bonding eroded with each new innovation or policy that have been heralded by our corporate masters?

While I don't place as much concern in the evaporating family unit like mainstream tradcons, I do believe they understand what it takes to create a stable family unit. The left has done a great job in labeling them as gay-hating crackpots, ensuring that the brakes won't be applied anytime soon.

Don't Miss: Amusing Ourselves To Death: The Degradation Of American Culture

5 Tips For Living A Location Independent Lifestyle

January 4, 2013 | by The_Dude | Link | Original Link

The world's leading freelance marketplace, Elance, recently released its new years' prediction: 2013 will be the year of the freelancer.

With more college students, underemployed people and retirees seeking supplementary income, online freelance work is set to grow dramatically in 2013. According to analysts at Elance, the dollar value of freelance work will more than double the 2012 amount.

Among the causes Elance sees driving the coming online work gold rush, there are factors like:

- More and more students opting to work part time online to offset skyrocketing tuition costs.
- "Obamacare" opening up contract work as a real possibility for those who would have previously been uninsured.
- The continued decline in the availability of truly stable private sector jobs.
- Companies increasingly contracting work out rather than choosing to hire employees.

But one item that wasn't mentioned in Elance's predictions,is a simple factor that might be more important than all four mentioned above:

More and more people are looking to online work as a reasonable and practical way to be able to work from any location in the world.

This factor applies most obviously to people who live in countries where full time work just isn't available, but also to a growing class of people who want the freedom to be able to work while they travel.

For young men in particular, the idea of "location independence" can seem like a dream. The ability to see new places, date a wide variety of women, and sample different cultures all while running and independent business, embodies a sort of "international playboy" fantasy straight out of old James Dean movies. But with more and more employers looking to contract their work out online every year, the "dream" of location independence is looking more and more like a very attainable reality.

The question is, how do you do it? The nagging question of whether online work is really feasible has probably kept more cubicle dwellers struggling in the trenchers than anything else. Here are five tips for being a location-independent freelancers, a group that I consider myself in…

Loading…

1. Sign up for a freelance site like Elance or Odesk.

The idea that the pay on these sites is lower than elsewhere is demonstrably false. Pay for most gigs may be low, but freelancers can easily filter out low paying gigs and focus only on ones that meet their criteria.

2. Write a professional-looking profile that highlights you skills and the value you can offer your clients.

The real killshot here is to point out how you can make the client money, not how “innovative” or “pretty” your work is. If you are not a writer, consider hiring one to write your profile for you.

3. Take some skills tests.

Many clients are reluctant to hire a someone with no established track record, even if their profile is well written. Skills tests (with high scores) can help you get your foot in the door.

4. Get a website.

A freelancer with no website looks like a job seeker. A freelancer with a website looks like a professional. Get a website, and your chances of getting hired improve. You can of course use a freelance site itself to get a website done for you (I recommend elance).

5. Pitch at least one new client every day.

So many people give up on freelancing because they throw out on or two pitches and don’t get a reply. Some may even throw out up to 20 pitches before they get hired. But when you compare this to the 1% conversion rates that most freelancers who rely on cold calling have to contend with, throwing out a dozen or so pitches a week doesn’t seem that bad at all.

As you can see, the answer is simpler than most people think. With freelance sites like Elance and oDesk offering a platform where anybody can sign up and start pitching their services to prospective employers right away, most of the historical freelancer woes like finding clients to pitch to and waiting months for pay, have evaporated. Increasingly, for location independent freelancers around the world, the question to ask about freelancing online seems to be more a “why not?” than a “why?” or a “how?”

Two Ways To Get Out Of A Sex Slump

January 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I've had my share of slumps, which I consider to be a lack of sex for a month or longer. They are usually due to four reasons:

1. You live in a seasonal city that empties out for a month or two at a time

2. You live in a small town and don't have new prospects to approach

3. You've fallen ill (hepatitis, mono, HIV, etc.)

4. The law of averages

The last one will be the cause for the bulk of your slumps, where your bangs will bunch instead of being equally spaced. Unless you're a full-time player, it will be extremely common for crickets to chirp in your bedroom if you're not a fan of relationships. But let's say that you're playing full time but still not getting laid. Here are two ways to get out of a slump:

1. Lower your standards

2. Approach more girls than your baseline rate

There are no other ways. You can learn new moves or routines but you'll still have to do one of the two in order to get laid again.

The issue with lowering your standards is that you have to still want to bang the girl you approach. You can approach a fatty, think it's going to be easy, put low effort, and then get handed a rejection that shatters your confidence. Instead, you must give the lower standard girls your regular game and make an honest go of it. As long as you use the boner test, there is no reason to feel shame upon a rejection. You should give it your all for every approach you make assuming you want to have sex with the girl.

There's no way to completely avoid slumps. They are a fact of every player's life that serve the benefit of allowing him to reflect on his most recent bangs and what he did right with them. As long as you don't freak out or totally re-shape your game, it's just a matter of time until experience vagina again.

Read Next: Getting Arrested On The First Date

Tweet Follow @returnofkings

About the Author

Roosh has been blogging for several years over at RooshV.com about travel and women. He has also written books on how to get laid in the United States, South America, and Eastern Europe. He launched Return Of Kings in October of 2012 to serve the needs of masculine men.

How To Quickly Learn The Basics Of Polish

January 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My love for Polish women has pushed me into learning the language. It's mostly unnecessary, since the majority of Polish women under 30 years old speak English, but I want to have access to all Polish women. Besides, I also want to master a Slavic language. Here are the four Polish resources you should study first:

1. Pimsleur Comprehensive Polish. This audio course has 30 lessons (one unit) that gives you a basic understanding of getting around and meeting people in Polish. Pimsleur really is the gold standard in learning instruction as they chop up hard languages into pieces that you memorize with just average effort.

2. Polish Pod 101. Pretty good online course that costs about $10 a month. I did all 60 audio lessons of their Survival course that complimented the Pimsleur course. Since the lesson transcripts are available in PDF, I was able to turn create a lot of useful flash cards.

3. Michel Thomas Polish. Affordable audio program that builds off the above two resources. My only complaint is that the level of difficulty jumps quite a bit from each CD instead of building slowly upon each other like with Pimsleur. Nonetheless, it was extremely helpful and answered a lot of grammar questions that Pimsleur doesn't address.

4. Polish In A Nutshell PDF. This is a free grammar book with lots of vocabulary and sample sentence. I think the book fails as a teaching guide because of its density, but it's short enough that you don't have to spend a lot of time extracting the information you need.

Loading...

If you study the above four carefully, you should have a Polish vocabulary of at around 750 words and phrases. This is strong enough to have very basic conversations in Polish while understanding bits of pieces of what is said to you. Your grammar will be atrocious but Polish people are very forgiving of your mistakes. At this point there are two things you can try:

5. Polish In 4 Weeks. This is a great textbook that starts to test your knowledge with written exercises. It will likely take you longer than four weeks to complete.

6. Private Teacher. It's time to get some live speaking practice done with a Polish native. If you're not in Poland, you can hire a teacher online via Italki or Fiverr. Or you can do a language exchange on Live Mocha.

Here are some additional free tools that will help:

- Forvo. Over 20,000 Polish words pronounced.
- Word Reference. Great Polish-English dictionary.
- Polish Verb Conjugator. Weird search engine but you'll get conjugations for all major verbs.

I gave you enough that you should be busy for about 4-6 months at two hours a day, assuming you also use a flash card program (I use Anki). Polish is not easy but if your long-term romantic goals involve Polish women, I believe it's worth it. Powodzenia!

Read Next: 60 Myths On Memory, Learning, Sleep, And Creativity

Modern Women Prefer 1950's Men

January 6, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

If there's one thing every player knows, it's that women gravitate to gentleman who are always on their best behavior and mind their manners. Why, just the other day I went to a bar and saw a man accidentally bump into a young woman, and when he said "I'm sorry, Miss, please excuse me" you could just feel the sexual tension in the air. But don't take my word for it; a recent survey proves women like nice guys with good manners:

> The study, which was commissioned and carried out by officials at Scaramouche & Fandango, brought with it some interesting results, the most striking of which was the fact that 61 per cent of females questioned believe that the image of men associated with the 1950s is more favorable than that of the young males of today.
>
> [...] explaining that the main reason behind the results was that men of the 1950s are perceived to have had much better manners than their modern, 21st century counterparts.

Nice guy beta males everywhere, rejoice! You're way ahead of the pack. But you still have a little manning up to do, because another analysis of this survey showed:

> What's more, although 79 per cent of men surveyed felt that they behaved in a gentlemanly way towards their partners, only 52 per cent of women agreed.
>
> Loading...

If you're a nice guy, you may want to pay close attention to those numbers. Try to ratchet up the gentlemanly behavior and close the gap a little. It's not hard to do, all it takes is a smile and a wallet.

> Old-fashioned manners proved overwhelmingly popular among women, with 82 per cent saying they preferred old style chivalry such as holding doors or buying flowers to their modern equivalent – buying a drink.

Hold the door open for her, buy flowers, and go ahead and pick up the tab too, just in case. Keep it up, old school nice guy – you know, since it's the manners and chivalry that attracts women and certainly not the fantasy of being banged silly by a handsome, aggressive, successful, fictional, philandering Mad Man.

The chasm between what women say and what they do grows larger by the day. Then again, being a 1950's man did have its perks...

Read Next: The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

3 Reasons Why The E-Book Money Train May Be Over

January 6, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you got into the e-book business when sales of the Kindle were taking off, you probably made quite a bit of money. There wasn't much Kindle content available in the "early" days, so you could easily dominate a category if you simply had a book with a half-decent cover and a couple of positive reviews. But those days are long gone. The mainstream has heralded the rise of self-publishing to such an extent that I wouldn't be surprised if your mom was planning on writing a book.

Here are three reasons why you're likely to make less money from e-books than if you started three years ago:

1. Increased competition. Now everyone is writing a book, with 100,000 new books being released a month. Dozens of self-publishing web sites that make it easy for anyone. Even long-time internet marketing guru Ryan Deiss is pushing ebook businesses. There is a flood of self-published books on Amazon with fancy covers and attractive packaging that are indistinguishable in style from published works.

2. Decreased sales of dedicated e-readers. Tablets have won while black and white e-readers have lost. Of course you can still read books on tablets, but I suspect that a tablet owner will read far fewer books than a e-reader owner. You read less when web, email, and Facebook is only one swipe away.

3. Pending decline of Amazon's influence. Amazon is getting resentment from all corners (media, customers, publishers, and indie authors) because of its massive power. People are now actively embracing half-baked alternatives. With the insane number of iPads that Apple is moving, I would expect the iTunes store to be in the best position of taking some of Amazon's money.

Here are two strategies that don't work as good as they used to:

1. Cheap pricing in the $0.99 – $2.99 range. Too many customers have been burned by crappy self-published works that were priced cheap, so they're being conditioned to believe that higher price equates to quality.

2. Lots of positive reviews. Very few intelligent customers trust Amazon reviews these days. Even I've been tricked a couple times by products that had glowing reviews. I now buy books based on excerpts and word-of-mouth.

The CEO of Smashwords, who helps indies distribute to iTunes, Kobo, and Nook, has a rosy outlook for 2013 that calls for some reading between the lines…

Loading…

> [We will see] a surge of new titles that never stop coming, and never go out of print. In 2013, self-published ebooks will swamp the titles put out by traditional publishers. This is good for the future of authors, readers and publishing. We're in the early stages of a full scale publishing renaissance. Readers now have > access to an amazing diversity of high quality books.

>
> Some industry participants – some authors included – fear this glut, because they think it'll either increase competition or decrease discoverability. Yes and no. More high-quality titles than ever will be released, because the barriers to publication have been eliminated. Readers will discover the best books and propel them forward through word of mouth. More poor-quality books than ever will also be released, and these books will be summarily ignored by readers, reviewed poorly, and will fail to spark word of mouth. Yes, competition will increase, but so will author opportunity, because more readers than ever will be reading ebooks.

Barriers to publication have already been removed, so I believe competition will make it harder for an average book to be successful. Even if you have a high-quality book, it could get lost in the noise whereas it wouldn't before.

I remember the good old days where my Kindle sales jumped every month without me having to do anything. Right after Christmas, the money poured in when people loaded up their new Kindles, more than doubling my sales until February. But this year, it "only" increased by 75%, probably due to a decreasing rate of Kindle e-reader sales and more books in my niche. The gold rush has passed, and my personal strategy will be more about maintenance more than growth. I doubt I'll sell more Kindle books in 2013 than 2012.

Established authors need to weather the storm until the newbies realize this is a challenging business and give up to move on to the next popular biz trend. I predict that growth won't jump again until 2015 or so when people get bored of tablets and become nostalgic for reading again.

E-book success will be easier for those who have a blog platform that is independent of Amazon, where loyal readers buy because of the value you give them instead of a fancy cover, cheap price, or dubious reviews. Those who already have a readership or popular web site will find it most easy to survive. There's still plenty of money to be made in ebooks, but you'll have to earn it.

Read Next: 18 Self-Publishing Tips That Have Helped Me Sell Over 25,000 Books

Being A Misogynist Can Help You Get Laid

January 7, 2013 | by Halfbreed | Link | Original Link

"Misogynist: A man who hates women as much as women hate one another." - H.L. Mencken

Misogyny can be a dilemma for the Western player practicing game. Growing up, many of us learned that sexism is evil. We loved, respected and even pedestalized our mothers and sisters. Some of us had contempt for misogynistic men before we took the red pill. However, it is hard to deny that many misogynists do well with women.

So is sexism useful for players? Some in the manosphere argue that misogyny is helpful for developing tight game. Krauser uses "cheerful misogyny." Other players disagree. The gentlemen at Third Millennium Men argue passionately against misogyny.

Will Misogyny Help Or Hurt Your Game?

Can you love women and still be a misogynist? Is sexism wrong? Red pill men should look beyond moral questions of whether misogyny is "bad" or "good." The only question you should ask is this: will misogyny help my game? The answer is yes. Misogyny will make your game tighter, especially in relationships. Embrace it and become a misogynist.

I do not advocate or condone hatred or abuse of women. Love your mother, sisters, and all your female relatives. However, be proud to be a misogynist. Reject feminism and the laughable premise that women are equal to men. Do not take silly and frivolous females seriously. They should be sheltered, protected, led, and dominated. However, do not hate them. Hatred is counter-productive to your goals.

When Should You Use Misogyny?

Like game itself, expressing misogyny is an art. The typical Western feminist woman can only take so much sexism at once. Be sure to display it at the right time and in measured doses. Convey your misogyny selectively and only when it benefits you, usually after you have slept with her and she's highly attracted to you. Thus, it is an effective harem management tool.

How can you express your misogyny? Tell her:

- If she gets fat, you will leave her.
- You support the loss of her voting privileges (once states repeal the 19th Amendment.)
- Her career and college degree do not impress you.
- You do not care where she has traveled.

Tell her that she had better be useful and available in the bedroom and the kitchen. You expect women to sacrifice their careers for the sake of staying at home and taking care of the children.

- Insist that she cook and clean for you.
- Make her buy you food and do your laundry.
- Insist that she be available to you sexually at all times.

This list will get you started, come up with your own ideas and learn to weave your personal style of sexism into your game.

Be A Loving Misogynist

Always be happy and teasing when showing misogyny. Be a loving man and treat your women well. Never be hateful. Express your sexism with a light heart and a twinkle in your eye. Although they will never admit it, women love a happy misogynist.

With enough practice, misogyny will become a part of your personality and help your sex life.

Read More: Passive game vs. Active game

About the Author

Halfbreed is an American writer. You can read his blog at Red Pill Game and follow him on Twitter.

Facebook Is Hurting Your Game

January 7, 2013 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

As of 2013, one can safely assume that virtually every person in Western society that does not live under a rock has a Facebook account, and most of them (myself included) are closed off to the idea of completely giving it up. While guys will usually get a girls cell phone number when they meet them from a cold approach, guys have been making the mistake of "Facebook closing" their approaches instead, which has a number of drawbacks compared to a traditional number close.

The best analogy for Facebook in relation to game is to think of it as "Friendbook". Guys should feel free to add any dudes or unattractive girls they meet if they wish but avoid girls to Facebook that they are trying to later have sex with.

Occasionally, a girl will turn down a number close and offer you her Facebook instead. Unless a girl has a legitimate reason for why she cannot make contact with you via phone, a girl who refuses to give you her phone number is not serious about meeting up with you again. Young girls give out their phone numbers like candy to the point where the most numbers are essentially worthless.

When a girl offers her Facebook to you instead, it is like the 21st century incarnation of "Let's Just Be Friends", but even worse considering that she still "friendzones" most of the guys who she gives her actual number to anyway. Girls will readily give out their Facebook profiles to gain yet another orbiter to validate her by liking her constant stream of photos and statuses. Do not be that guy.

Why You Shouldn't "Facebook Close" Girls

Something I see among young guys learning cold approach pickup is to actually ask for a girls Facebook straight off the bat without even trying for her phone number. To be frank, this is a stupid move. If you Facebook close a girl to arrange to meet up with her again later, it is guaranteed that she will go through your pictures and recent activity and use that information to reassess how attractive she thinks you are.

This is both a blessing and a curse depending on how “pimped out” your profile is, but I for one would rather play it safe and make girls use their impression of me in person to decide whether or not to meet up again rather than a Facebook profile.

Another critical reason why guys need to stop Facebook closing their cold approaches is the new “Seen by” feature on Facebook messages. This new feature allows Facebook users to know at exactly which time the person they were messaging saw their last message, which can lead to you having to put up with unnecessary drama when you decide to take your sweet time in responding to her.

Facebook Is Incompatible With The Player Lifestyle

Lastly, Facebook makes it logistically more difficult to date multiple girls at once, requiring you to delete or remove the tags of any incriminating comments, photos, statuses and check-in’s that your girls make that appear on your profile. This entire hassle and the danger of getting caught is infinitely smaller when you do not have them on Facebook. I don’t think it even needs to be said how adding girls you approach to Facebook won’t work if you are in a “Facebook official” relationship.

In a cold approach situation, I strongly advise young men against adding girls to Facebook that you’ve just met unless there is legitimate reason why she cannot communicate with you via phone. You can relax this policy post-sex and after you’ve known her a little for longer if you see no downside to doing so. It is a decision you have to make by ear.

How To Escape Giving Girls Your Facebook

If a girl you are seeing asks for your Facebook after a while and it would be a bad idea to give it to her (maybe because you have a girlfriend or you lied about your age when you met her or you just want to play it safe), tell her that you deactivated your account because you were tired of the bullshit and attention whoring on your newsfeed. Girls will nod their heads in agreement and understand exactly what you mean.

The next step you must take is to minimize the chances of your girls finding your Facebook by changing your Facebook’s privacy settings so that only people you have mutual friends with can find your profile by using Facebook’s search feature.

The rise of smartphones and social media has drastically changed the way young men and women communicate and make plans together. In a time when calling girls on the phone is rarely done outside of relationships, it is imperative that today’s young men do not let texting go the way of the dinosaur. Do not allow your Facebook profile to become a factor in your game.

Facebook=Friendbook.

Don’t Miss: The Secret To Approaching Older Women As A Young Man

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

Exclusive Interview With Solomon

January 7, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Last week I posted an archive of The Solomon Group, a short-lived blog that made a big impact during its run. The page received 10,000 views after being shared on three different Reddit forums (seddit, theredpill, and askwomen). The archive was downloaded over 4,000 times.

A trusted intermediary put me in touch with Solomon. He graciously answered the seven questions I forwarded to him…

1. What do you think of the renewed attention your blog archive has received, especially from Reddit?

> I was a bit surprised, because I think the highest number of hits I ever received on any given day when I was writing was ~2,500. I'm glad it lives on, because I didn't archive it.I read through the Reddit posts, and had a good laugh. When people get all bunched up like that, I know I'm on to something. A man without enemies is a man without influence, so the screams from Reddit were like a sweet sonnet reminding me of the influence I have over feminists and their White Knight enablers. Striking a nerve with folks like that brings me more pleasure than it probably should. Some say it's a character flaw, but I consider it part of my charm.

2. What is the original purpose or message you intended to transmit? Do you think you succeeded?

> The beauty of Solomon was that there was neither message nor purpose. I lived it, wrote it, published it, and let the chips fall where they may. Looking back, it was a bit silly of me to post real photos of girls and the audio I captured during our conversations, so I'm glad those files didn't survive the archival process. At the same time, it was nice to have evidence to refute the naysayers, because pictures and audio featuring the same male voice with countless women and numerous photos shot in the same apartment really made the blog stand on its own. My mindset at the time could be boiled down to "Here's what happened, here's the proof, here's what I learned – now do what you want with it."

3. What do you think of how the manosphere has evolved in the past two years? Has it taken a positive or negative direction?

> It's definitely a different manosphere than the one I joined back in the day. It seems more robust and well-rounded now, and it offers insight on topics that are, in my opinion, every bit as important as game. Some lament the swing toward lifestyle blogs, culinary advice, or fashion, but I think it's an improvement – especially since there are still plenty of solid game posts being written.

> Sometimes I find it hard to understand why some men reject this move to a more holistic approach to game. I distinctly remember a comment on someone's post about choosing a suit that said something like "This blog is turning into shit! We need guys like Solomon to return and start writing game posts again!"
>
> While I certainly appreciated the compliment, I remember thinking "Solomon doesn't pick up young slutty law students at the bars around Dedman in an ill-fitting suit, brother. You better pay attention." In fact, if I had Solomon to do all over again, I would have written more about brushing your teeth, hitting the gym, cleaning your nasty apartment, and owning at least one tailored suit. All of that was key to my success in the world of poon, but I just assumed guys already knew that stuff.

4. Where do you see the culture going? Will things get better or worse for the American man?

> I see the culture sinking into the abyss of an eternal quest for the next best thing. Will things be better or worse for the American man? I think it'll be worse for most men, and better for the men who strive to actually be the next best thing. And I don't mean better as in more notches; I mean better salaries, better quality of life, better health, better stress levels – all of which yields more notches. But notch counts alone can't be the goal, because putting that much effort toward the prize of an American woman isn't worth the trouble in my opinion.
>
> Loading…
> If the only motivation a man has to internalize game is his notch count, he'll likely burn out on it and end up married to some NAWALT fantasy in a couple of years. Game does work, but the benefits should be evident in all aspects of a man's life. What ends up between your sheets before being tossed back into the streets is just icing on the cake.
>
> I'd rather be able to game my boss than some girl at a coffee shop, and I'd rather project confidence in the boardroom than in the bedroom. But the brilliance and power of core game principles is that it's not an either/or choice; a man can easily do both, and oftentimes one begets the other. That's why I actually agree with the statement "there's more to life than booty!" even though it's usually uttered from the perpetually puckered ass-kissing lips of a spineless beta male. Yes, there's more to life than booty – but there's also more to life than no booty or even the same old booty every night.

5. If you could make one more blog post today, what would it be about?

> Men's Rights Activists. The beta male is the biggest external threat to the manosphere, but MRAs are the biggest internal threat. I believe we could put this entire society back in check in one decade if we eradicated men's unnatural desire to negotiate instead of conquer. Feminism, when examined on its own merit, is an unsustainable joke – but every time some MRA seeks to form a > coalition and negotiate, he's legitimizing their argument. It's funny how some men believe that the same failed communication and negotiating tactics that led them to the meat grinder in the first place will somehow be effective in convincing the butcher to become a vegetarian.

>
> If we put an end to male supplication and the tacit support known as negotiation, feminism would cannibalize itself. But instead of jerking a kink in society's rear end by refusing to support it, we keep negotiating our way back in to the gas chamber while lobbying Congress for better ventilation.
>
> The whole concept is ridiculous, and I reject it on its very premise.

6. What blogs or books are you reading now?

> I keep several blogs in my google reader, and I usually sift through them about once per week. I read the three Rs – Roosh, Rollo and Roissy – and try to keep up with multi-writer blogs like ROK and NexxtLevelUp. As far as books, I just finished the Reagan Diaries, and I'm working through an old book I found called Money and the Meaning of Life by Jacob Needleman. Next up will be Duct Tape Marketing by John Jantsch. That's an unusual reading list for me, since I usually stick to biographies of ex-Presidents and military leaders.

7. Are you going to blog again?

> Probably, but I'm going to give it some thought before I jump back in. I'm not sure what I have to contribute to the manosphere at this moment, but I'm sure something will come to me. I'm just not very excited about writing a blog without pics and audio, because I don't think it'll live up to the Solomon II name. I may have already jumped the shark.

With the exit of some high-profile bloggers last year, I think Solomon just may be what the manosphere needs. In case you missed it, click here to see highlights from Solomon's work.

The Father Of Relationship Game Shares His Secrets

January 8, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Long before PUA became mainstream, Thomas Hodges wrote The System: The Dating Dictionary, a manual advocating specific strategies for securing long-term relationships with the ever feisty American woman. The System has a ton of valuable advice, but it is sold at an unreasonable $100 per copy, and so much of the wisdom contained within is unavailable to the average man. With the down economy, and the modern flood of dating products, most men aren't going to pony up $100 for advice that can be found online if one searches hard enough. $100 dollar products look like scams.

The book is particularly notable for being the first of its kind. Not only does it have a strict game plan for men to follow, but it also was written by a man for men with the intention of keeping a good woman in a happy relationship. Prior to Doc Love, most relationship focused material was written by women, and therefore had no bearing to reality, or was just about scoring sex (e.g. Ross Jefferies). Doc Love tapped into this unexplored niche first and probably has profited the most from it, having been a regular columnist at Askmen for a decade, as well as hosting radio programs and seminars for men.

Thus the goal of this review is to give away the most valuable parts of the 300+ page book for free. As an experienced player I know the good parts of The System from the bad. We'll talk about why Doc Love advocates some of the crazy advice that he does, and what parts men should follow.

I. Interest Levels

When a woman meets a man, she is either interested in him or not. A man can only raise her initial interest level provided she has a high enough attraction to him. Doc Love rates a woman's interest level on a scale of 0-100%, with 0% being totally indifferent and 100% being so madly in love she would take a bullet for you.

A woman needs an interest level of 50% or higher before she can be gamed. Thus her initial impression of you is based on your passive game, and only afterward can you actively work to get inside of her pants. Ideally you want to game women who have high initial interest in you, so there is less work.

II. What Raises Her Interest Level?

The three most attractive personality traits any man can have are confidence, control, and challenge.

Confidence: Composed of self-esteem and self-confidence. Self-esteem involves standing up for yourself when being disrespected, and saying "No" to any behavior you find unacceptable. Self-confidence is believing in the principles of The System and not backing down from Doc Love's game plan. I would also add into self-confidence is knowing when to be sexual with a woman.

Control: Composed of self-control, patience, and discipline. Self-control means to have mastery of your own emotions, and never letting a woman get under your skin. Patience means to move slowly with women; never rush into relationships. Discipline means, again, sticking to The System.

Challenge: Letting the woman chase you. Avoiding being too needy of her attention.

Doing the bare minimum to keep the relationship going, always being prepared to dump her if she goes for another man or disrespects you.

According to Doc Love, only if you display confidence, control, and challenge, will a woman's Interest Level for a man raise over time.

III. What Is Doc Love's Game?

The entirety of Doc Love's game plan is to separate women who aren't interested in you from women who are. The strategy is to process a large volume of women and let The System sort the crappy relationship prospects from "Ms. Right."

Doc Love is also a big proponent of doing cold approaches in this quest, but he understands the success rate for cold approaches is low. Nonetheless, no matter the social setting, Doc Love's gameplan is as follows:

1. Make the best damn first impression possible. Be a charmer, like Cary Grant, and be (or at least act as) the most distinguished gentleman in the world.

2. Get her number and bounce.

3. Call her up in 5-9 days after you get the number, but never on a weekend (except Sunday evenings). So if you score her number on a Wednesday, you would wait until next Monday to call her for a date (Challenge).

4. Never schedule dates for the weekend unless she specifically requests for it (Challenge).

5. Once on the date, do not touch her until she touches you (Challenge). Again, be the most interesting awesome man in the world. At the end of the date, provided she made a move on you first, you can go for the kiss.

6. Wait 5-9 days again to ask her for another date, unless she calls you up first to ask you out again (always respond positively to a woman's advances).

7. Don't worry about pushing for sex. It will be obvious when she wants it (she'll ask to go to your house, she'll invite you over hers, etc), and if sex happens it will occur sometime between dates 2 and 9 (Patience).

8. If at any time the woman stops responding to your calls, or turns down your sexual advances on a date, you dump her.

Obviously, this game plan is going to turn off a lot of woman, but that's okay. In Doc Love's world, this is just sorting out women who have a low Interest Level in you, while keeping the ones who actually like you. There's no point in pursuing women with low interest in you, since even if you do manage to marry such a girl she'll just divorce rape you anyways.

Additionally, The System guarantees that the only women who stick around with have the best personality traits possible for pleasing a man.

IV. What Personality Traits Do Men Look For In Women?

There are three personality traits a woman must have if a man wants to have a long, happy, and fulfilling relationship.

Flexible: Does she bitch, nag, and argue about pointless shit all the time? Or does she let the man do as he pleases, such as going out by himself, and pursuing his own interests and hobbies? Quite obviously a man needs the latter, so avoid the shrew.

Giving: Does she like money more than men? Does she make time in the day for her activities but none for yours? Does she offer to pay for anything? Does she make an effort to please you (such as cook)? A giving woman is a loving woman, there is no other substitute in having a good wife.

Integrity: Is she loyal to you before other men? Does she lie, or is she honest? Can you trust her? Would you form a business partnership with her? If your woman doesn't have integrity, then she'll never be a good wife. You'll always have to second guess her motives and watch your back against possible betrayals.

The reason why Doc Love has men wait 5-9 days in between dates and approach relationships so slowly is to discover what kind of a woman she is before you get involved. If a woman lacks any of these three all-important qualities, then you should unload her. She isn't good relationship material.

Also, no woman is perfect. She might be really good in two areas but slightly deficient in a third, so it's ultimately up to each man to judge what he'll put up with.

Should a man discover the perfect giving woman with integrity and flexibility, then you should treasure her because you've found something special. Which is to say, continue to have confidence, control, and be a challenge.

V. What Is The Ultimate Goal Of The System?

The goal of the The System is to maintain power over your woman. Not power as a master over his slave, but power as a man over a woman. Power is what makes a woman fall in love with a man, and keeps her in love. Power comes from three sources.

1. A woman's beauty. The more beautiful she is, the more power she has over men.

2. A man's passive value. His looks, money, fame, etc, all weigh in to give a man power.

3. Whoever is winning the relationship game. If the man is gaming his woman properly, her interest level in the man will be higher than the man's interest level in the woman.

Note the implications in these statements.

Doc Love is very harsh on beautiful women – because of the disproportionate amount of power a beautiful woman has, the odds of having a good relationship with a beautiful woman is slim to none.

A man should also be working hard to increase his passive value at all times, because it's the only chance he has if he wants to keep a relationship alive over the long term.

VI. Samseau's Analysis And Recommendations

For something written back in the 90′s, I have a lot of respect for a system that basically treats women as expendable objects until you find Ms. Right. This is the right attitude for handling women. It's also a reflection of Doc Love's career background as a salesman – the only way to move product is by pushing a large volume of customers. The System can only work if you are approaching hundreds of women each year.

One of the biggest problems newbies have with The System is that they don't believe it. They cannot imagine waiting a week before calling, or standing up to your woman to make her like you more. However, both my experience and my friends experiences have confirmed that The System is legit, and as time passed much of Doc Love's wisdom became codified in popular game blogs.

But even though most of the good parts of Doc Love's system are mainstream in game circles today, I still see most players unaware of looking for a giving woman with integrity and flexibility. Most guys just go for the hottest women they can get, which is obviously a terrible idea for relationships. My best relationship was with a woman who was only a 6, easily worse looking than 50% of the women I've banged, yet I enjoyed sleeping with her every night. She treated me like a king and I had no problem giving her my time and attention.

Not Everything That Doc Love Recommends Is Good

Doc Love said to go for a girl's phone number, but this was before smart phones became ubiquitous. Phone numbers today are absolutely worthless, and have an astronomical flake rate. Dating in general is nothing like it was in the 90′s, and women today view dating as anti-challenge. A woman knows you like her if you ask her out, and so that can kill the seduction.

Doc Love advocated waiting on sex, but that's not a good strategy. Since the goal of The System, in Doc Love's words, is to increase your power over the woman, it doesn't make sense to let her control access to sex. You want to get her sex card played as soon as possible, in order to decrease the amount of power she has over you. Waiting one, or even two dates, for sex is acceptable, but in my experience the longer a woman makes the man wait, the less interested she is in him.

Waiting on sex means you'll miss on out a lot of flings since the only chance of banging most women (the ones who will never be your girlfriend) is if you move extremely fast. What man wants to go through long dry spells in search of Ms. Right? My preference is to get lots of easy sex in between girlfriends. Good relationship material seems to comes once every two years or so, and that's provided you're approaching hundreds of women each year. Waiting for up to two years with no sex doesn't sound like a good system to me.

Not to mention when you finally do meet Ms. Right, all of that sexual experience will sure come in handy.

The best way to run challenge game today is to bang the woman on the first day you meet her, and then wait a week before you call her up again to hang. If she wants to see you again, she can call you up in the meantime. If you meet her and bang again, then you'll want to wait another week (maybe two weeks even) to call her up again. You want to bait the woman into chasing you, so her interest level goes up.

The beauty of this plan is that if she loses interest in you, then you're off the hook! You already got the bang and now you don't have to deal with a woman of low relationship quality. It's win-win.

Finally, as a general note, The System is poorly written and the entire game plan has to be pieced together from various sections of the book. There is no neat outline like the one provided in section III. Doc Love is not a writer, he's a salesman. But a very clever one at that.

Read Next: Do You Want A Girlfriend? Here's How To Get One…

About the Author

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

40 Pictures That Show The Decline Of American Women

January 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you take a time machine back to the 1960s, this is what you would find:

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14.

15.

16.

17.

18.

In only thirty years we traded all that in, for this:

19.

20.

21.

Loading...

22.

23.

24.

25.

26.

27.

28.

29.

30.

31.

32.

33.

34.

okcupid

35.

SEX is Something People
Do Together
NOT Something You
Do to Someone Else

36.

37.

38.

39.

40.

Do you think men of the 1970’s realized at the time that they had the best American women? I doubt it.

[image]If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Don’t Miss: 35 Things Wrong With America

6 Reasons Why Jersey Shore Was Good For American Culture

January 8, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Was Jersey Shore really that bad? Sure there were some douche bag moments, too many faked binge drinking events, and a graphic tee outburst, but the positives must also be accounted for. Here are a few great benefits that emerged from The Jersey Shore:

1. Fitness. Thanks to the Jersey Shore the idea of GTL came into the main stream. As lame as it sounds it's a pretty good philosophy, especially starting with the G. While they focused on working out to get ladies, the overall benefit to lifting is greatly beneficial to the health of society.

2. Style Improvement. While some would deem their attire as repulsive and low class, if you initially grew up in a small town like myself, their style was a huge improvement. They even wore a different outfit every night instead of recycling the same three t-shirts every week.

3. Dance Moves for White People. If you're anything like me, you can't dance to save your life. Thanks to Jersey Shore there was the fist pump which for the first time since disco allowed us all to have a go to move that was acceptable. Like disco this died just as quick, but hey it was worth it while it lasted.

Loading...

4. Game Tips From Your Own Living Room: Usually when you're trying to learn about game you have to read some books, go out in public, get rejected, and watch other men swoop in on the chicks you desire. Thanks to Jersey Shore, you could learn a significant amount without ever leaving your parents' basement. I'm not saying it was the best game to watch, and actually the bad game probably helped you out the most. But the fact still remain: true game was represented in its entirety, the good, the bad, the ugly, and the grenade.

5. Fun Phrases, Code Word's and Moves: Who didn't enjoy calling an ugly girl a "grenade" or a "landmine"? It was just plain old good fun. It was also always a good time to tell your friends you "have a situation" for a potential group of girls. And lastly who could forget the spin move, helping attractive men dodge cock-blocking females everywhere.

6. Wingman: This last but not least point is probably the best exposure from the show. It helped many people realize what the pros already knew, that if you have a good wingman, you'll get more women. Sure it exposed our strategy to women, but who are we kidding to think they didn't already know we used it? At least with the help of the show men could learn how to be a bad wingman, like Situation, or how to be a good wingman, like Vinny.

In the end, as stupid and pointless as the show was, it brought out many good points, especially when it comes to improving your game. And I think a lot of sorry fellows are better with women because of it.

Read Next: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

25 More Reasons You Should Visit Ukraine

January 9, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1.
2.
3.
4.
5.
6.
7.
8.
9.
10.
11.
12.
13.
14.
15.
16.
17.
18.
19.

20.

21.

22.
(my personal favorite)

23.

24.

25.

If you liked this post then you'll like Bang Ukraine, my 103-page book that teaches you how to sleep with Ukrainian women during a visit to the country. It contains tourist tips, game advice, and sex stories that give you all the information you need to bang hyper-feminine Ukrainian women, with extra details not released on the blog. Click here to learn more about the book.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The 5 Commandments Of Online Dating

January 9, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Like it or not, online dating has emerged as a legit player in the dating market in recent years. What was once the repository for the dregs of female creation has become—for better and worse—a go-to dating option for a growing segment of (even top-shelf) girls.

The whole process is really the product of a perfect storm in the American dating market.

Reasonably attractive girls, increasingly suspicious of—and awkward around—strangers don't go "out" as much as they used to, less amenable to the prospect of being approached by "creepy guys," even as men approach girls less and less. Economic realities and cultural shifts have also made going out less appealing. With fewer men able, or willing, to fall for the old drink scam—voluntarily paying for drinks in exchange for face-time—girls are having to loosen their tightfisted grips on their wallets for a night on the town. When they do go out, they go out in a defensive posture that's not conducive to meeting a guy. Then, naturally, when they don't meet the man of their dreams, they confirm their bias against bars and clubs.

What's more, an increasing reliance on social networking to engage the world has rendered today's Western woman a social retard—who wouldn't know how to talk to Prince Charming if he was standing next to her with an engagement ring in his hand—and for whom dating electronically is not a far stretch from their normal, cell-phone-addicted habits. Like Facebook, online dating sites allow them to field countless sausage offers "safely," without the inconvenience and challenges of having to gracefully reject a prospect to his face, or the minutes-long feeling of discomfort while she watches a guy crash-and-burn his presentation. Girls, as I have written elsewhere, have hair-trigger tolerances for awkwardness and discomfort. They'll do anything to avoid situations that cause them the faintest amount of either.

Then there's today's man, who is more emasculated and clueless about how to properly approach and charm a girl than even a scant generation ago. They're buying into obsolete conventions and long-discredited myths that render them friendzoned before they even get out of the gate. A growing number of the quality guys—disillusioned by crushing male-to-female ratios, high drink costs, cockblocking, the fatty epidemic, and other night-life realities—have largely checked out of the club-and-bar scene. And, like their female counterparts, many of today's guys use electronic crutches like Facebook to fawn over girls from the safety of their room—feeding the vicious attention-whoring-from-a-distance cycle.

After dismissing online dating, for years, as little more than a crutch for approach anxiety, a time-suck with little real yield, and dumpster diving, I slowly recognized these forces converging. Over the course of the past two years, I have spent, literally, thousands of hours pouring over online profiles, unwittingly learning more about online dating (and, frankly, the female psyche) than I thought possible in that time. These hours have yielded countless dates and, more importantly, a deep well of knowledge.

These are some immutable laws that I've uncovered:

1. Her Worst Picture Is What She Will Actually Look Like.

Today's girl has her picture taken dozens of times—if nothing else, by her iPhone-wielding friends—every time she goes out. She gets constant input on Facebook, and elsewhere, about how she looks and when she looks best. Add to that, that from an even younger age, she has learned how to pose for the camera (or hold the camera herself) to maximize how flattering a picture turns out. I'm no longer surprised when I see average 13-year-olds striking competent step-and-repeat postures, undoubtedly learned from Kim Kardashian and her ilk.

When a girl chooses pictures for her online profile, she brings that deep knowledge of her physiology and, quite plainly, photography, to bear. In this respect, she's leaps and bounds ahead of the average dude. That means that when you're looking at a girls' profile pictures, you're likely seeing the best two or three shots—among thousands—sitting in her Apple-brand laptop. This almost ensures that they aren't representative, and explains why she will more closely resemble the worst of the selection. In my experience, there was one exception, but that is statistically insignificant.

2. Learn to Smoke Out the Secret Internet Fatties

One of the plagues of the online revolution has been the Secret Internet Fatty (SIF). Cynically manipulating the aforementioned knowledge of photography, fat girls will often use subterfuge to minimize or conceal her liability. This goes beyond the infamous—and now well-understood— Myspace-Angles technique of taking pictures from an oblique angle above her head to minimize size. Fatties use a panoply of other, subtler tricks that emphasize her best traits and distract an unsuspecting, or ill-trained, online-dater from her worst. These are often simple crimes of omission. A girl with a cute face, but a dumpy body, often fills her profile with nothing but head shots, tightly and strictly cropped at the neck.

Here's the bottom line: a girl knows when her body is nice, and will invariably show it off—often by crassly dangling it in your face. If she's concealing it, it's because it's not worthwhile. Period. If a girl only looks fat in one of her pictures, but look seemingly normal in the rest, remember Commandment No. 1. She will be fat.

Some other likely giveaways of a SIF (or other bad optics):

- Includes fewer than three pictures in her profile.
- Has anything other than "thin" or "skinny" (or similar) in her body description field. "Athletic" and "average" can, and do, often correspond to a fat girl.
- Displays the tell-tale fat arms, invisible collar bone, or sausage-finger hands.
- Broadcasts clear over-emphasis of one part of the body (breasts, ass, legs), to the exclusion of the other parts.
- Pictured with ugly or fat friends only (cute girls have cute friends, always).
- Pictured with food or at a restaurant. A girl has abundant pictures with food because she’s often eating, and that’s the only social activity she knows.

3. Know the Realities of Online-Dating and Adjust Accordingly

Girls on online-dating sites are like Wall Street traders on the New York Stock Exchange floor, at closing. Total sausage chaos. They’re getting non-stop offers, and they’re doing their best to field all of the best ones. People are jumping and throwing stuff. The bell is ringing. The ticker is flying. Even if she’s not a big-time trader, all of this attention and activity is making her feel like she is one.

Know that if your girl is available, she’s going to be available for a short while, and dudes are putting in proposals non-stop. Not all of those offers are going to be good, so on-point messaging and logistical planning will help you stand out from the noise.

4. Constantly Screen for Tire Kickers, Prudes, Job-Interviewers, and Other Pests

SIFs aren’t your only problem in the online universe. There are other time- and resource-wasting landmines lurking in the shadows. You can never insulate yourself 100 percent, but learn to read profiles, messages, and “match questions” intelligently to spot signals of a problem.

Some examples:

Problem: Tire Kickers

Description: Time-wasting shoppers who are indecisive about going on actual dates, “just checking things out,” and simply folding online dating into their daily 10 hours of online activity.

Symptoms: Responds too quickly, and elaborately (there’s a balance between a thought-out message and an overly elaborate message); balks at the idea of going on a date, but keeps messaging with you; explicitly mentions inexperience or apprehension in her profile.

Problem: Prudes

Description: N/A

Symptoms: Mentions things like wanting to “be friends first then [seeing] what happens”; resolute anti-sexual stance in sex-related questions; non-drinkers; religious types.

Problem: Job-Interviewers

Description: Sport daters who go out on tons of online dates, treating each batch of dudes as an evaluative round of elimination.

Symptoms: Careerist chicks; mentions of having tried online dating before; unsolicited mentions of prior dates in discussion or profile.

5. Take Things Analog ASAP

Not only is your prospect getting offers on a daily basis, but online conversations go stale pretty quickly. There’s no magic number, but I find that if I send more than four of five messages, with the last one being an offer to meet up and a phone-number request, I’ve gone too long. You eventually get a knack for it, but better to rush setting up a date a little bit than wait too long.

Online dating is here to stay. Whatever that means about “society,” realize it’s not any better or any worse than anything else out there. Like any source for mating prospects—probably from the moment that first amphibian walked onto dry land—online dating is filled with its own set of annoyances, perils, and, more importantly, hacks.

Read More: What a Girl’s Haircut Says About Her

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

Feminists Try To Debunk False Rape Culture With False Data

January 9, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Huffington Post politics reporter Laura Bassett, who I had an intimate liaison with eight years ago, shared the following infographic via Twitter the other day:

> Rape.24.media.tumblr.com/c5904ef556bb2b...
> — Laura Bassett (@LEBassett) January 7, 2013

Here it is:

It was picked up by Dylan Thomas of The Washington Post, who deemed it "the saddest graph you'll see today." It was also the most fabricated graph you saw that day.

> The above graphic, passed along by the Huffington Post's Laura Bassett, was put together by the Enliven Project using data from Department of Justice's National Crime Victimization Survey and FBI reports. It drives home extremely well the fact that false rape accusations are exceedingly rare, despite what media reports might suggest. Almost as rare are cases when rapists actually go to jail.

The Enliven Project, producer of the graphic, is led by a woman who deems herself a "semi-psychic." I'm not making this up.

> Sarah Pierson Beaulieu is the founder of The Enliven Project. She has had nearly 35 years of experience as a human and over 15 years experience in managing > complex relationships and partnerships, fundraising, and systematic approaches to change. She is a survivor and a truth teller, a poet, a semi-psychic, wife, mom, and a loyal friend.

My bullshit radar exploded, but apparently not The Washington Post's, who passed along the chart without checking if it was accurate. Their action was gently checked by a feminist on Slate, a site that happens to suspiciously be owned by the Post.

> The graphic overestimates the number of unreported rapes. It's hard to measure how many rapes go unreported, because, duh, unreported.

Someone on the internet created another graphic debunking the graphic. Even Reddit, one of the most feminist corners on the internet, lashed against it with dozens of comments.

> I'm looking through the data collection, and while the Enliven project fully admits that data collection is "a challenge", the most appropriate thing they could do is subtext the infographic with a disclaimer. Basically, these numbers are just guesses stretched to their most biased outlier value, and the figure they are downplaying (false accusations) is from wildly biased sources.
>
> Loading…
> In particular, their source for the 2% of reported rapes being false accusations is sourced from an article by "The National Center for the Prosecution of Violence Against Women", which (while a laudable organization) is hardly an unbiased source on this particular figure…and 2% isn't even what they said! They said 2%-8%.
>
> The NDAA.org article cited a number of figures, some biased, some not. The number they seemed to have settled around was about 8%, including their most rigorously cited study. So…8% is a better estimate, not 2%, as the infographic assumes.
>
> Further, Enliven's assumption of the reporting rate comes from a report from the UK (because even the robust NDAA article doesn't have any figures for how many rapes are actually reported). The UK study includes the following line: "It is currently estimated that between 75 and 95 per cent of rape crimes are never reported to the police." This report DOES NOT CITE how or where it got the number, and this is the only time this figure shows up in a 175 page document. The reporting rate was entirely guessed at, because it's almost impossible to gather data on it. So the infographic authors picked a nice round "10%", a number they have NO justification for.
>
> CONCLUSION: The infographic stretches the numbers, to say the least.

The founder of the Enliven Project, a self-proclaimed "truth-teller," sees no harm in her bogus graphic. The reason? It created a conversation! Here's a response to a critical tweet saying her graphic was bogus:

> @slate Fantastic response to our infographic, TY. So many challenges w/ rape stats, but all part of the same critical conversation.
>
> — Sarah Beaulieu (@sarahbeaulieu) January 8, 2013

The Washington Post eventually pushed an update to their original post:

> So while the phenomena described here are real (and Marcotte argues that, if anything, the chart exaggerates the number of false accusations), be aware that the exact numbers are subject to dispute.

Take a minute to soak that in. One of the biggest news organizations in America is telling you that accurate data is not important, but the "phenomenon," like perhaps UFO sightings, is bound to have happened. It must be true because they feel it's really happening! How's that for irony—using false data to disprove false rape accusations. Nonetheless, Laura Basset, Sarah Beaulieu, and Dylan Thomas will all get pats on the back for adding to the "conversation" of rape with their bogus chart while heterosexual American men will continue to be portrayed as misogynistic rapists. It doesn't matter that we're not rapists, but that we are capable of it and therefore contribute to this gross violation of womankind by merely existing.

As for Laura Basset, I'm confident that her hatred of men will propel her far up in the American media machine.

Read Next: You're A Misogynist

Having Sex In Iceland Can Destroy Your Soul

January 10, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
Here's an email I received from a guy who bought my book Bang Iceland before traveling there…

> Christmas Eve – 2nd Day After Christmas: The entire city was shut down. I mostly just walked around the town. It was somewhat lonely, especially since I just broke up with my girlfriend several days before. However, I am still building off of the positive experience I had in Costa Rica getting 1 bang
>
> Wednesday: Didn't go out, but I should have. Heard it was amazing.
>
> Thursday: I ended up getting laid within 1.5 hours of going into a bar on Laugavegur Street. I took your advice – I got an apartment literately where you could throw a stone to the bar from my apartment window (Room With a View – and Downtown Reykjavik Apartments for the off nights). The girl was about 32, and approached me drunk out of her mind. Initially she seemed just like a "party girl", but I quickly realized she didn't spend Christmas with her loved ones (huge in Iceland to do) and was lonely.
>
> She talked about how depressed she was about her boyfriend of 14 years (she met him while she was in high school) and they had split up. She was drunk out of her mind before she even got to the bar, and wanted someone to be with. I was her guy. I didn't use the "after-party" routine, because I had already drank the vodka for several days. She cried while we were having sex, and afterwards while we were walking back. This was extremely awkward, and I never want to do this again….
>
> Afterwards, I wanted to double down and go for normalcy. However, I struck out. I couldn't get my game going. I felt like an awkward tourist. I wasn't drunk anymore and I wasn't in the mood. I need advice on how to approach random girls on the street or in the bar. I used the "tourist" routine but they weren't receptive at all. Damn it.

Icelandic girls only like having sex while on the verge of being blackout drunk. This can often lend to unsatisfying sexual experiences. But hey, he got the Icelandic flag!

Another guy went to Iceland and had a much more positive experience, but did notice how shitfaced the girls would get…

> Drunk people everywhere at this convenience stores. Eventually get them to agree to walk back, and her two friends drop out and take a taxi home. Get my girl in my room, she won't take off her pantyhose and underwear and keeps saying she's on her period. I told her I don't care but she wouldn't relent and then passed out. In the morning she woke up and threw up twice and left.

The irony is that after my book on Iceland came out, I was the one who got criticism for hurting the reputation of Icelandic people. They seem to be doing a fine job of that themselves.

Don't Miss: Why Are Icelanders So Blasé About Sex?

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Ironies Of Female Empowerment

January 10, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

I am often stricken by how brazen some feminist thinkers and sympathizers can be in biting the hand that feeds them and throwing stones from glass houses. Many are bold enough to consider the end of men, or question the necessity of the male gender in its entirety, suggesting that the pace of female empowerment has rendered the male of the species obsolete or, at a bare minimum, pushed him into a position of objectively lower value than his female peer.

These women make such claims with little thought to the source of their empowerment and/or the irony behind the existence of the "empowered," upwardly mobile woman of the "Sex and the City" mold that so many feminists hold in the highest esteem today.

Undermining anti-male feminist rhetoric are the following seven vital concerns, the analysis of which will reveal the true irony behind modern feminist "empowerment" (and, it could be said, much of the modern feminist message altogether). To the growing number of feminists (and their many male and female sympathizers who prefer not to use that label) who question the worth of the male gender in the wake of their supposed progress, I pose the following concerns:

1. Who built the advanced Western society you live in?

And when I refer to the act of "building", I mean to describe the crafting of the laws and the actual physical establishment of a working, governable polity with all of the freedoms and liberties you now take for granted.

Who is it that, having built this society, has stood and still stands between you and that violent developing world you see on TV where the women aren't allowed to drive, real rape culture is the norm and children still die at rapid rates?

2. Who keeps the society you live in going?

Who puts up and maintains the buildings you walk in and out of, the big suburban homes you fantasize about, the roads you (incompetently) drive on? Who keeps the power on and the (clean) water flowing?

Who is responsible for getting all of that fresh seafood to the table in that fancy urban restaurant you consider yourself so special for being able to frequent every week, or for farming the contents of your latest vegan diets?

And those clothes you wear (and spend exorbitant amounts of money on), who is responsible for getting them to you? I mean, we might as well go all out: who is largely responsible for developing and expanding the textile industry in the first place?

3. Who crafted the laws that allow you to enjoy the liberties that are denied to the vast majority of women on Earth?

Who wrote, sponsored, and actually made legal the likes of Title IX and other laws designed to mandate equality between the sexes and bring you up to the level you enjoy today?

4. Who enforces these laws, and ensures that the liberties and freedoms you take for granted aren't ripped from you by physical force?

5. Who protects you and your children?

Aside from law enforcement, who does most of the heavy lifting when it comes to saving the free world or launching some sort of operation in a distant, undesirable part of the planet all for the sake of protecting the economic interests of your country so you can enjoy the cheap consumer products and reality TV you so desperately need?

Even more importantly, to which gender do those whose lives are most often sacrificed in the name of your safety (and “empowerment”) generally belong?

6. Who actually makes everything?

Loading…

Who engineers, designs and builds the Iphones, laptops, blackberries and other devices you can’t live without? Who develops the Facebook, Instagram, Myspace and Twitter that you spend all day gossiping, attention-whoring, and otherwise bullshitting on? Who creates the Youtube for you to show off your twerk videos and share your latest views on how useless and/or silly you think men are?

Who develops the film technology (cameras, 3D, etc) you use to get on TV (also a male invention) or the big screen (once again, male invention) and go on and on about how independent you are?

7. Who made “bad” men so valuable?

Feminists often complain about the existence of aggressive, risk-taking, and sometimes violent men being an issue that society must deal with. This concern is part of what keeps their movements active and relevant, as it provides a viable “threat” for them to shout about.

Yet in their rush to neuter the male gender in the name of public safety, they fail to recognize the source of this threat, which is an internal one.

Who is it that men are trying to impress by acquiring more wealth at any cost, or subjugating the next guy/nation, making decisive and often difficult/controversial decisions, or taking the undue risk and being the often disagreeable go-getter? Who is it that rewards the men who are most successful in these endeavours by giving them the enhanced chance of siring progeny?

Feminism points the finger at men, but they do not drive these developments. Women, many of them self-proclaimed feminists, do this themselves via their own free-will.

Like children, those feminists who further anti-male arguments see a limited picture and attempt to draw a full conclusion. In this limited picture, they run shit: they’re more educated than men, they can reproduce without marrying a man, and they are even beginning to out-earn men.

Their problem? If you broaden the scope to see the full picture, you'll realize that they only enjoy these privileges and advantages because of men. Every small, progressive step they take exists at the pleasure of men who craft these pro-feminist/equality laws and principles, enforce said laws/principles, and fight to ensure that nobody else infringes upon them and sends these women back to the sexist supposed "stone age" of gender relations (which still persists across most of the planet).

Every little privilege they get to enjoy as a result of this (dominance in higher education, increasing dominance in professional fields, increasingly higher incomes) is therefore actually provided at the pleasure of men, who also make sure that all the tools they take for granted (electricity, the internet, roadways, clubs, etc) are there and ready for use.

If men disappear or are otherwise marginalized as a whole, then so will go the progress of the "empowered" woman whose existence and persistence is largely a product of male effort. The empowerment that provides the fuel for the anti-male condescension of certain feminists is in itself a product of men, and will not continue to exist without their continued work and investment.

Like a child, the anti-male feminist sees the end result of this male effort and ignores all that came before it, assuming that the end product she enjoys is all there is. Her mind is too limited to see what goes into providing all of that, and so she instead attacks those responsible for providing it.

Unfortunately, as is often the case with children, she will probably only learn the hard way.

Read Next: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

Misandry Is Real

January 10, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

The English word misandry as defined as “The hatred of men.” It´s that simple. Yet if you use this word in writing you will find that it does not exist in any of the spellcheckers in most text document editors nor online spellchecks, including but not limited to gmail and hotmail. On the other hand, the word misogyny is universally recognized in all spellcheckers across the board. This may not seem like a big deal at first, but in fact it is.

The battles raged against men consists more than just a bunch of short haired, overweight, mustached feminists who hate their fathers and spend their days screaming at university protests like we saw recently in Toronto. Misandry is also at the most subtle levels of mainstream dialog and communication. The use of linguistics have a powerful impact on how we as humans interpret the world as well as ourselves; unbeknownst to us what is transpiring. Most times we are too busy doing our thing, trying to survive and better ourselves. Yet this goes on under our noses and the end result is an automated anti-male biased perception by the general public; an attitude that is accepted as the norm.

Loading…
In the above video the author explores just how this is being done in our media, showing that by gender neutralizing the headlines men have been reduced to non entities, at the same time putting women on pedestals. This brings about a collective guilt in men for being men. The end result is a majority populace where women hate men, men hate men, and some men even hate themselves.

No doubt there are jackals benefiting from all of this. Just as a military offensive is a money making operation, misandry is also lucrative. Governments use feminism as a means of controlling the male population, as well the non profit organizations and anti-male businesses gain financially from this runaway campaign.

To what the solution to this might be? These avenues of attack via the contemporary lexicon is part of the bigger hostilities aimed at us. I have not yet the answer, but at the least men should be aware of their second class citizenry they have in the English speaking World.

Don’t Miss: Being A Misogynist Can Help You Get Laid

Ukrainian Girls Have Lost Their Love For American Men

January 11, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
The Kyiv Post recently profiled Western men who moved to Ukraine. This passage immediately stuck out:

> During the first years I came here, things were a bit different in terms of Ukrainians' attitude toward foreigners, especially Americans. We were looked upon with great interest and intrigue as most common Ukrainians had never seen an American before.
>
> Another American told me that he had felt like some kind of "rock star" while visiting here. I was once asked myself by three city workers to pose with them so they could take a picture with me at the big fountain on Maidan Nezalezhnosti.
>
> Khreshchatyk Street was different then, too, without so much of the high-end retail shops. That was then. Things aren't the same now …and not as friendly as it was then. Many Ukrainians seem unhappy, if not a bit hostile. People are not as interested about my being here or showing what native English speakers call "wide-eyed curiosity." Some do, but most don't seem to care where I am from, much less ask for a picture with me as they once did…most just ask why I am staying here and don't go home.

In ten years, Americans went from being seen as celebrities to people who don't belong. It's upsetting that I could have had rock star status in my recent trip there, but I know that in ten years there will be many men lamenting the fact that they missed the boat on the Brazils and Polands that me and my penis got to vigorously experience.

Older Western men are now forced to use mail order bride agencies in order to meet feminine women. Here is a documentary that chronicles this phenomenon, featuring Tony "The Love Machine":

And how about the men who want to sleep with Ukrainian women without meeting them through a bridal agency? That's where I come in. I wrote a 103-page book called Bang Ukraine that teaches you how to sleep with Ukrainian women during a visit to the country. It contains tourist tips, game advice, and sex stories that give you all the information you need to bang hyper-feminine Ukrainian women, with extra details not released on the blog. Click here to learn more about the book.

About the Author

Roosh is an ugly misogynist with massive mommy issues. He created ROK in October 2012 because he has no friends. Currently he is traveling the world to have bad sex with poor girls who want to use him for an American greencard. His little penis is so ineffective at satisfying women that he has had to master the art of cunnilingus. It is absolutely certain that he will die alone in a basement alongside his massive porn collection. Sadly, his right hand is irreversibly deforming into a claw shape from excessive masturbation, causing him sharp pains when he types up one of his offensive rants. You can visit his sexist blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Workout Correctly

January 11, 2013 | by JC Deen | Link | Original Link

[image]
While I've always been involved with athletics and weight lifting in some form during most of my life, I was not always aware of how important the selection of movements and structure of a training program could be. In hindsight, everything I know now makes perfect sense to me, but I spent a lot of time learning the right and wrong ways to go about setting up a workout routine.

Most guys, especially if they have no background in athletics or previous weight training experience, will go into the gym and blindly mimic the other guys, or they'll follow a program from one of the latest magazines. While this is not the worst that can happen, I've known very few guys who get it right initially from this approach. In fact, some of them spend years doing it all incorrectly.

For many of us dudes, we like to spend a lot of time working our chest, shoulders, and arms, while neglecting the muscles of our back, and sometimes even neglecting our lower body altogether.

I know you've seen the typical guys who sport big chests, arms with tiny legs, and a small upper back. If you're into that look, fine. Keep it up. However, there's definitely a better way to structure your training, and the benefits are many.

First of all, a good rule of thumb is to balance out your pushing movements with pulling movements. For example, if you're doing 5 sets of 10 on bench press, you should be doing an equal amount of work for your back, something like 5 sets of 10 of pull-ups or rows.

The same goes for the legs. If you do 5 sets of squats, you should also do 5 sets of something like hyperextensions or Romanian deadlifts to work your hamstrings equally.

A good rule of thumb is to aim for anywhere from 50-80 reps per training session for each muscle group.

An example leg workout would look like this:

Squats 5×5 (25 reps)
Hyperextension 5z5 (25 reps)
DB Lunges 4×8 (32 reps)
Leg curls 4×8 (32 reps)

Total Pushing Reps: 57
Total Pulling Reps: 57

The Reason You Should Do It This Way

Training in this manner will help you build a well-rounded physique, and may help you prevent injury that can sometimes occur when some muscle groups become stronger than others, causing an imbalance.

Another reason to train in this manner is to get more done, which can help you limit your gym time if you have a busy schedule. In other words, you could do a full body routine over 3 days (Roosh has mentioned Starting Strength before), or an upper/lower split spanning 3-4 days.

Here’s another article that covers some more common workout mistakes people make.

Read More: Does Your Posture Suck?

About the Author

JC Deen is a strength coach and fitness writer out of Nashville, TN. He's been seen in Men's Health, Bodybuilding.com, and ZenHabit.net. He regularly writes at JCDFitness.com.

You're A Monster If You Don't Support The Welfare State

January 11, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Fifty million Americans get government assistance every month to pay for groceries. The current population of the United States is 311 million, so that means that 16% of Americans cannot fully support themselves. The state of Georgia finds this to be unacceptable. Their policy-makers think welfare begets more welfare, and that providing too much for their citizens ensures that poverty levels will remain high.

Their conservative-led state house has crusaded against welfare, reducing their rolls to only 4,000 people in a population of nearly 10 million. This amazing statistic actually hides the fact that food welfare is provided by the federal government. Therefore Georgia provides other benefits like housing to those 4,000 citizens.

Slate magazine, which is owned by the most liberal newspaper in the country, The Washington Post, thinks that Georgia might as well be performing crimes against humanity. You can feel the hatred coming from its reporter, Neil deMause, as he pulls at our heart strings with bad-luck stories of women who are down on their luck and need help from you, the taxpayer…

> It's a state of affairs that's left an increasing number of Georgians with nowhere to turn. Teresa, a single mom of a 2-year-old living in a domestic violence shelter, tells of how she broke down and applied for cash benefits after fleeing an abusive relationship—only to be chastised by state welfare officers who asked, "Wouldn't you rather work?" Eventually, Teresa says, "I was sitting there crying—I just didn't know what else to do. I said, you've gone from letting people sit on their butt and collect money to the very opposite of that."
>
> Ultimately, it didn't matter. In the end, she was rejected for failing to fill out her paperwork correctly.

Do you have sympathy for Teresa? I don't. I surely don't want to pay for her food after she's made the wrong decisions in life concerning her education, mate selection, and career choices.

> One woman in her seventh month of pregnancy was ordered to take a waitressing job that would require her to be on her feet all day. Another was told that if she applied for TANF while living in a shelter her children would be taken away. Smith recalls, "Some of the stuff that was said to individuals was pretty awful—'If you can't find a job, we'll have you shoveling shit at the dog pound.' "
>
> Loading…

A pregnant woman that has to stand all day is not cruelty. Next you know they'll be designated parking spots for pregnant women that treat them like disabled people.

What's cruel is having to make us pay for her pregnancy mistake when she doesn't have the income to support herself or her child.

The article quoted many more domestic abuse victims—all single moms—in what I think is an attempt to make you feel guilty. You're a savage if you don't want to help women who are beaten by men and have no money. The author is indignant that Georgia doesn't let these women go instantly on the dole. Those who have money should give to those who don't.

> "Two hundred and thirty-five dollars, what the hell is that supposed to pay?" wonders Renea Buck, a Savannah grandmother caring for her daughter's two children. [$200 a month can feed a family of four]

If anything, Neil's article is a great argument against welfare. Georgians aren't dying. No skeletons are being discovered in rancid apartments. No kids are going bald due to lack of protein in their diet. Instead, charities are filling the gap, funded by donations from those who have sympathy for these women. Who wins? The Georgian taxpayer. Let those with a soft heart provide food and shelter for the poor instead of all of us being forced to do so.

It could be said that I'm heartless and want to see my fellow Americans suffer without adequate food and shelter, but I believe that welfare beyond a few months enables poverty instead of solves it. People do suffer legitimate emergencies, but it's not my responsibility to provide for someone for years on end. If you disagree with me, and think that your money should be given to the poor, I urge you to donate money to a reputable Georgian charity like Step Up Savannah via their Paypal button.

I won't be donating.

Read Next: Money Over Bitches?

Internet Dating Killed My Game

January 11, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

I spent most of my high school years on the internet, not playing video games like the rest of the kids my age. The first thing I would do after getting home from school was log on to a social networking site and start talking with friends, both from real life and those I knew solely online. I'd spend hours messaging girls I thought were cute and I'd flirt with them.

I didn't share similar interests with my peers in high school so I turned to forums to learn from those wiser than me. I finally felt like I belonged somewhere, but truthfully this wasn't the case. The internet is the loneliest place one can be. If you're bored you can send out a few messages and have any kind of conversation you want, but every one you meet is a single serving friend. Rarely did I actually meet up with someone.

On the internet you don't experience the same nuances of social interaction as you would in person. You don't see body language, you're not good at adapting to the randomness of a real life conversation, and you don't need to empathize. This complete disconnect from actual human interaction was present in the back of my mind, but it only truly ever hit me a few times.

The first time I ever had a girl get naked for me was on my computer screen. I'd met this girl on a social networking site and moved things over to MSN. We'd chat all the time and eventually she expressed what she felt for me. I knew something was wrong with this even then. One day she asked to show me her new dress, I accepted her webcam invite and she started giving a sexy strip-tease. First she let the thin straps fall one by one off of her shoulder. Slowly she slid out of her very nice, tight, black dress. She stopped at her bra and told me how naughty she felt. I couldn't be more excited.

The dress came off and naked she sat back down in one of those wooden kitchen chairs. She began typing, asking how much I liked it and if I wanted her to continue. You can guess what I said. Afterwards something bugged me about the interaction, something felt off. I'd just had my first 'sexual' experience over an internet connection.

How does this all relate to game you ask? Well first of all fast forward to the present. You can't find a person today without a Facebook account and many people are turning to online dating to find quick love. I've begun to realize that online game is more detrimental than beneficial to one's progress. This is even more applicable to guys who are just getting into game or guys who don't approach often.

Benefits To Online Dating

- It's easy to "approach" mass amounts of women
- You know the woman are available and looking
- It's much easier to sit around pounding your keyboard instead of going out into the real world

- You can fill your calendar up with relative ease

Disadvantages To Online Dating

- You only get 1 on 1 social practice during a date
- If you don't go out and interact in the variety of places women can be found you get rusty and you don't improve
- The girls aren't as attractive, and if you see an attractive girl you can't help but wonder why she needs to go online to find guys
- You are more likely to reflect on successes/failures if they happen in real life (if you don't get a reply to a message you think nothing of it, but if a girl is unreceptive to your real life approach you spend some time figuring out why)
- You get too comfortable and rely on the internet to get pussy

A man does not improve himself by being lazy and relying on the internet to get laid. He can't be bothered to waste even 30 minutes messaging girls on the internet if he wants to improve himself. This is because he'll get complacent and won't reflect on his failures and successes. I'll leave you with a challenge to eschew online dating for a month and with a post by Hooligan Harry over on the forum:

> Lift your skirt and grab your balls already boys.
>
> APPROACH.
>
> This "Facebook game" and online dating shit is fucking homosexual. Unless you are in a country and don't speak the local language, there is no reason to be doing anything online.
>
> You need to get over this crutch and these social media and online dating threads need to get destroyed now. If you cant get over your fears to approach women everywhere then its always going to be a struggle. And anyone who says they do both is talking shit, because no man who has overcome his fear of approaching women is ever going to waste his time chasing women he has not put his eyes on yet.

If you rely on online game your approaching goes to shit. You won't realize it at first, but one day you'll see a girl in the supermarket looking confused at all the types of tea she can buy and instead of smoothly executing some day game you stumble and stutter through the interaction leaving with your dick in your hands and a box of terrible tasting tea.

Read Next: The 5 Commandments Of Online Dating

13 Responses to Internet Dating Killed My Game

1. Zampano
   January 12, 2013 at 7:08 pm
   Pure truth. Once you get the balls to just cold approach girls you see the futility of online dating. Everybody hits on girls on the Internet because its so easy, being a player means being the exception to the rule.

   Great post.

   Reply
2. Hammer
   January 12, 2013 at 9:58 pm
   True story. This has become pervasive problem. If it were not for the fact that this type of behavior has lead to massive female egos I would have said that this trend works in our benefit. Keeping a large majority of men from taking any worthwhile action.

   Solid post!

   Reply
3. Radio Wright
   January 12, 2013 at 10:42 pm
   I agree that online dating can be detrimental to a guys game if that’s all he rely’s on.

   In my case, online dating helped me tremendously.

   When my approach game sucked, I was still getting practice by having regular dates I met online.

   By the time my “in-person” game got good enough to get dates, I was already a master on actual dates because of online dating so I was able to capitalize when I started getting dates from “in-person” game.

   Most guys aren’t disciplined enough to do both and learn from both. They get lazy, like you said. Approaching is just more d@mn fun!

   Reply
4. Ruxman
   January 12, 2013 at 11:11 pm

I felt I was missing out by having zero patience for online dating, this just confirms what I felt before that online dating is pedestrian and stinks of beta.

Reply

5. Ruxman
January 12, 2013 at 11:14 pm
By the way nice feature image choice, it sums up the red pill.

Reply

    - Gentleman Slut
    January 13, 2013 at 11:24 am
    I really like it – can anyone tell me who its by/what its called?

    Reply

6. Infantry
January 13, 2013 at 1:06 am
Online game is a supplement to real life. It puts more girls in the pipeline, but should never be considered a primary source of women.

Reply

7. prepman
January 13, 2013 at 1:42 am
DON’T STOP ONLINE DATING!

I need guys to stay online to keep the fatty cockblockers, attention whores and otherwise low-value females at home and online rather than clogging my venues with their mega bitch attitudes and distorted self-image due in large to the undue attention they receive on PoF, OkCupid, and the rest.

I also appreciate that guys who are afraid to approach the pierced and tatooed 5 behind the counter at BetaBucks are not clogging my venues with anti-game and distorting the M/F ratios and raising the cost of my game by approaching any vagina in the room with fawning adoration free drinks.

I LOVE ONLINE DATING….. For everyone else!

Reply

8. JULZ
January 13, 2013 at 4:30 am
@ Radio Wright Well said! I will add this, online favors women but the streets are ours. Online is for skittish, timid creatures (women and betas). I (in a more beta life) depended heavily on the internet. Here is the problem. Women are getting tons of attention just by showing up. You, as a guy, need to work like a dog to stand out unless you are 6 feet + handsome. I am a huge proponent of the real life game. First you can screen out the crazy and the boring in 5 minutes of conversation versus god knows how many emails. I can't tell you how many times I met women on dates that seemed interesting and were just a disappointment. Especially here in Washington DC women are boosted by income nerds who will lick their feet no matter how busted they are.

   Issue two is that women are waaaaaaaaaaay more selective online than in person. I use my little sister as an example. Online dudes had to be almost perfect but the dudes she met in person were far from it.

   Moral of the story: Use your balls and approach offline. You really can't afford not to.

   Reply

9. Kosmos
January 13, 2013 at 10:15 am
Another drawback : girls are more picky online than in real life, and look matters a lot. It can lead you to think you're not good looking enough for hot girls.

   Reply

10. John Martinez
January 13, 2013 at 10:55 am
Off topic:

   I've just found this blog through an article posted today on Taki's Mag (http://takimag.com/article/a_sex_tourist_swallows_the_red_pill_nathan_wyatt#axzz2Hge30RlR).

   I'm not a regular reader of Manosphere blogs, except for Chateau Heartist, which is exceptionally well-written. Howerver, I've just bookmarked Return of Kings and will take some time to explore its content. Just like Chateau, it is way above the average in its genre. My compliments.

   Reply

11. Wow
January 13, 2013 at 11:00 am
This article seems to be directed at the south of 25 crowd with little responsibility, I was there at one time….before online stuff. Today, I am a single dad, 44, so online has been a godsend as I am busy in business and raising my son part time.

Discovered online only 3 months ago and banged 6 chicks with virtually no effort…7-8s all of them….there are no 9,10s. I am fortunate to be "tall enough" and "attractive" enough so I get a lot of attention.

The article is very true regarding the over-inflated value online chicks put on themselves. My approach is simply to be aggressive and "approach" relentlessly….meet them FAST, if you have a personality, closing them should be easy in 2-3 dates; you still need real GAME to close. You always have first right of refusal if she's garbage in person.

Online dating is also an amazing study in female hypergamy as well as educational, if you really read their profiles, read between the lines, many women are flat out telling you they hate betas. Yet, thousands of guys still message "hi", "you're hot"…ad nauseum.

Reply

12. WesternCancer should be banned from the forum
January 13, 2013 at 2:46 pm
I've never understood this either/or mentality that some of the forum members like WesternCancer have.

Do you never have any downtime during the day? Do you never have free time during work hours? What do you do when you're taking public transport with nothing to do? Talk to the fatty sitting beside you or do you take out your smart phone and start spamming some online dating profiles?

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

Life At The Bottom: A Law Graduate's Experience

January 12, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

It's not a big secret that being a new lawyer right now sucks. But even for those who do get a job, the problems have only begun.

Someone at the Something Awful forums decided to post an expose on what it's like to be a doc review attorney. Humorous as it is sad, as lawyers have a deep sense of morbidity.

> Meet the coworkers (I'm a combination of 13, 22, and have been 24):
>
> 1. The First-timer: This person is starting out on their first project. They're typically just out of school and fresh from getting their license. And now they're going to be paid for their skills! They almost always overdress for the first day, and are always overly excited to find out about the case. (Wow, a contract dispute!) They are still full of hopes and dreams that will soon be crushed.
>
> 2. The Gunner: Even the world of doc review has its gunners. They too overdress for the first day, and attempt to regale any nearby person with tales of past projects. They always attempt to engage both the recruiters and outside counsel in personal conversation, and never miss a chance to remind other reviewers how this project is so simple compared to others they've worked. They also love to ask long, drawn-out question that are tangential at best to the case, to demonstrate their own perceived legal knowledge. Their ultimate goal? They want to "carry the clipboard" and become a team leader, in a desperate bid to show that though they've ended up here, they're still better than you.
>
> 3. The Striver: This person deludes themselves into believing that standing out and achieving more on a project will result in something more than being out of a job. "Why, if the average is 50 docs per hour, and I code 80, why I'm sure the recruiters will give me a line on a real job. Maybe even outside counsel will recognize my effort and hire me on as a real attorney!" Hated by co-workers for pushing the average up and the project length down.
>
> 4. The Dreamer: Similar to the Striver, this person thinks they can "network" through doc review to an actual job, and not just another project. They can never be persuaded that one does not go from click monkey to associate. When doing an on-site review, the Dreamer hangs out in the regular employee's break areas, attempting to engage the full-time attorneys in conversation, never realizing that a) they will never offer him a job, and b) they view him as a click monkey, not as an attorney, and certainly not as an equal.
>
> 5. The Old-Timer: "Why, in my day we reviewed documents in banker's boxes, out in a warehouse, and we didn't need any fancy computers to do it!" The Old-timer never shuts up with their stories of doc review's past. Even more annoying, they manage to have computer trouble (which is almost always user error) every single day. "My login won't work! My mouse won't work! My computer is slow!"

Hated by those unlucky enough to sit near them and IT personnel everywhere.

6. The Talker: This person never shuts up. Ever. Even if everyone has headphones in, the Talker will make sure every other reviewer knows about their kids, their car, their neighbors, their opinions on everything capable of being discussed, and every other facet of their life before the project ends.

7. The Slob: This person quite possibly sleeps in their own filth, and brings that same level of hygiene with them to the project. They're constantly eating, smacking, slurping, and dropping trash all around their workspace. A true joy to sit near.

8. The Gossip: "I know everything about everyone on this project. And I'm going to make sure everyone knows." Their ability to create drama is exceeded only by their ability to make everyone hate them.

9. The Insider: Related to the Gossip, this person acts like they know everything about every recruiter and every project in town, and are wrong more often than not. But hey, if it's importance you seek in the eyes of fellow clickers, it's a good way to go. Their greatest ability is to stir up drama with whispers of a project that pays $2 more per hour that they just heard about. The monkeys rush to their phones to email recruiters, only to be crushed by news that the project is merely "in the pipeline."

10. The Professional: This person has accepted their fate — it's doc review for life. Bossy team leader? Annoying outside counsel? Whatever — they've done it all before. They come in, get out, and move on. Their greatest fear is conflicting out of the next project.

11. The Hero: This person thinks they've "solved the case" every time they find something responsive. Every day they manage to find a "hot" document, which they eagerly show to their unamused neighbors, team leaders, and maybe even the outside counsel. They care about the case way too much, and generally fail to understand not only that outside counsel doesn't care about their opinion, but also that all the really important stuff has probably already been reviewed, and not by them. Now stop checking "hot" already.

12. The Questioner: This person is mortified to make a responsive call without asking someone else's opinion. To the annoyance of everyone else on the project, they can barely function without input from another person. At least they keep the daily average down.

13. The Solo: This person has their own practice, and will spend 75% of their time on the project out in the hallway on their phone. The rest of the time they'll spend paying even less attention to their documents than the average reviewer, as their mind is solely on their own practice. Not that bad to sit near, until they start pressing you for business.

Loading...

14. The Could-have-been: "I could have been working at a great firm, I was going to be prestigious, but I…" Ended up in doc review? This wasn't supposed to happen to them, see? Yeah, they've always got an excuse, and they'll love to talk to you about it. It wasn't their fault, for one reason or another. A common fate of the Dreamer.

15. The Burnout: This jaded individual has accepted their fate, but hates the world for it. Can be recognized by their disheveled dress (even on the first day), their casual-at-best attitude regarding directions, their general lack of interest in anything other than turning in their hours, and their dislike of every other person on this list.

16. The Hill Billy
Male. This person comes from a small town maybe went to college and LS in 4th tier cities (think Syracuse or Cleveland) and now finds themselves for the first time in NYC. They rent an apt. quick paying 2k/month for a small studio on the upper east side. They have 150k in loans but a small town good attitude. They are looking for FT work but in the meantime they found out that you can go exempt while doing temp work! So while working 70 hrs. week they take home 2k a week because they dont pay taxes. This guy goes out drinking every night cause he is in the big time. At the end of the year he has made 80k but now also owes the IRS 15k!

17. The Job Hunter
Usually female. Everyone on the assignment knows she is looking for a FT attorney job. If you had a dollar for every time you heard the word JOB out of this person's mouth you would be matching Buffet in two months.

18. The loafer
This person has a great personality but less of a work ethic. Usually lowest weekly billables on a project. This person is on the make not in billing as much as possible to make the most money as fast as possible but in doing as little as possible to make 1500 a week. They will be 15 mins. late in the morning. 15 mins. late from lunch.

19. The mad biller
This person is usually a geek that when he gets told he can come in at any time and leave at any time takes this LITERALLY. This perrson will come in at 7am and bill until midnight. This person is the exact opposite of the loafer in 18 above. He will bill 15 hrs. a day 6 days a week and come back on Sunday to bill 8 more hrs. He takes home $5k a week.

20. The Shyster
This person would usually be considered an 18 Loafer, but bills like a 19 Mad Biller. Comes in late to work, takes 3 hour lunches to go shopping, leaves early, but somehow bills 60 hours a week and no one calls them on it.

21. The Paranoiac
No matter how many projects this specimen has done, no matter how mindlessly > routine the review, the Paranoiac will never make a coding call without asking his neighbor to confirm it. The Paranoiac's neighbors rarely appear at work without headphones after the first day, and will never, ever, under any circumstances, make eye contact. Similar to #12, but also constantly worries aloud that the underlying case is bound to settle this afternoon. Often ##9 or 10 will convince the project lead quietly to remove the Paranoiac from the project, in order to prevent bloodshed.

>
> 22. The "I just don't give a poo poo anymore" guy
> This gentleman (or young lady) has been on multiple projects and just doesn't care anymore. Possibly a hybrid of 10 & 15. Main focus is billing for money. Usually happy-go-lucky as opposed to burnout. Will read through documents and do okay in general. But when he doesn't understand something, will avoid looking like 12 The questioner, and blindly code the doc. Relevant? Oh, why not. Privileged? Sure. Hit "save & continue" His biggest fear is being promoted to team lead and having actual responsibility.
>
> 23. The "stumbles rear end backwards in jobs" guy
> This gentleman doesn't even want to be on coding jobs but is on unemployment benefits and cannot reject a recruiter calling him up on risk of being cut off from unemployment benefits. Somewhat related to 22. Will intentionally screw up just so you will lay him off. However, defies the laws of nature and gets "promoted" to QC, Privilege Logging, and even team lead positions. (sort of like the movie office space.)
>
> 24. The Lush
> This gentleman, almost always a gentleman, could rumple freshly-pressed clothes by walking past them. He smells of stale whiskey at 8am. After lunch, he smells of fresh whiskey.
>
> 25. The Angry Frat Boy Staff Attorney
> Usually in his late 20s or early 30s, this staff attorney, if you can call him that, spends days doling out batches of docs to reviewers and sending emails about recurring computer problems. He probably comes from an upper middle class family, spent most of college partying, and only went to law school because it seemed better than going to work for his father's company. He is perpetually disgruntled and spends a good portion of his day trying to catch the doc reviewers doing something wrong so that he can have them fired and actually feel good about himself for five minutes. He glares at the male reviewers who he views as "competition" and gives them that "I'm watching you" look made famous by Robert DeNiro in "Meet the Parents." All of the female doc reviewers love the guy though, largely because they know that they'd never consider dating a guy like that, which means they can use him to safely hone their flirting skills.

Still, it's not all bad…

> After a juicy project like this one winds down, I go to South America or Southeast Asia or somewhere warm for a long spell to unwind. You can never depend on these projects lasting forever – sometimes they settle without trial, and coders are done with no notice.

It’s kind of analogous to those guys who work six months a year on oil rigs and then spend the other six living it up. Only difference is, the pay is a lot less and the hours are less consistent because you’re doing a job that no one actually needs.

Read Next: $200K Student Debt But No Job. Time To Skip The Country?

What Guys Are Saying About Getting Laid In Ukraine

January 13, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A lot of guys have visited Ukraine and are telling their story. Here are some highlights from the forum…

Ukrainian women shit tests

> When you talk to ukrainian girls you will inevitably come across of some of the common shit tests they use.I will present some of them and the answers usually given.
>
> 1.Why are you in Ukraine?
>
> This test implies:Are you in Ukraine to hunt girls?If you answer I came to get girls you are immediately disqualified.If you answer I am a professional searching for business opportunities,interested in buying real estate,trying to open a shop or franchise etc you are in to be considered a liar.So carefully choose one reason why you are in Ukraine.How you justify your prsence.Tourist can mean sex tourist for them especially if you happen to be in a city flood by sex tourists or in a city with absolutely no tourist attraction.
>
> 2.How long will you stay in Ukraine?
>
> If you answer I came for a week she may decide you are not material for LTR.If you answer I came to stay for long(student etc) she will suspect you are a liar.So you have to think of a clear answer before to this question.From my experience it is usually better to tell the truth but promise to come back soon to show that you are a frequent traveller.If she asks why do you come here often say that you have visited most European countries and Ukraine is your favourite you like the architecture and nature.Maybe the food as well.

> 3.Are girls not beautiful in your country?Why do you want ukrainian girl?
>
> If you answer girls in my country suck you may appear as a sociopath or low value who cannot get a decent gf in his country.Or you may appear that you have high selection criteria so she is likely to be excluded as well.Or that you have a problem in character or a secret disadvantage that puts off girls.If you answer girls in my coutry are good she will ask then why do you not have a wife or girlfriend.This is another crucial question.
>
> 4.Why do you not have a girlfriend?Why are you not married?
>
> This means what is your story?Are you not eligible to get a wife in your country or are you irresponsible?Or do you have some kind of defect? The answer is sth along the lines of unluckiness I did not happen to meet sb special so she will question whether you are social and cannot find girls through social circles.So be prepared guys.Have an answer beforehand for everything.

Pipelining the Ukraine

> I really dont know what people expect from the Ukraine either. Like most FSU countries, its only now starting to drag itself out of the dirt. The people may not look it, but the vast majority are actually quite poor by western standards and life is a daily struggle for most of them. They may look first world, but they are far from it.
>
> The women themselves dont have time to waste either. They are over the hill at 25 and if they are unmarried as they move into their late 20′s they are really in quite a bit bit of trouble. Its over if they are in their 30′s for the most part. Now when they struggle like they do, it means nothing more than financial instability and loneliness for them as they get older. Throw into the mix a culture that believes and values traditional gender roles, and yes, the women are serious. They dont have time to waste on men who are not potential husbands. They dont have any safety nets and their safety net is their family and their husband.
>
> This is why I keep saying to everyone that they need to get their stories straight and lie like absolute motherfuckers to them if its purely notch count they are after. Prepare properly and you will have a good time. Go there without doing your homework, acting like a tight arsed backpacker or thinking the women are all going to be DTF just because they enjoy sex is only going to lead to frustration.

Bulgaria vs Ukraine vs Hungary vs Poland

> Ukraine is a different planet from anything else I've experienced, hardly anyone speaks english so you will need to brush up on your russian if you stay in the west, or your ukrainian if you go to the east [editor note: he has this reversed]. Kiev has a great metro system, marshrutkas are cheap and regular. Taxis suck ass, be prepared to haggle.

> The girls are feminine and have great bodies. The Quality of the girls in Kiev seemed to be on some queer polar bell curve, they were either slavic with hairy faces or model good looking. Learn russian, I'm not kidding. Go see the burried monks, it's a unesco world heritage site. The accomadation was not as cheap as I'd hoped in the Ukraine, and there isn't really any set strip which was a pain. get a room near kreschatik and you should be alright.
>
> There are plenty of back packers in the Ukraine so you can always pick up western tourists if you get bored of insanely pretty ukranian girls. Expect alot of dishonesty, bullshit, and outlight lies from the local guys. They are absolute scumbags, everyone is trying to rip you off. It's a weird sensation. On the plus side they all look like crap, so you should definitely be better dressed, built, looking, and have tighter game than the locals, but fo you can't speak Russian passably I would still give them the edge.
>
> I didn't get my Ukraine flag in Kiev, though did sleep with a back packer. The friends I made in my hostel said the girls were very mercenary, that they would sleep with you, but they needed to be taken out alot, so that would be your dollars working for you.

Ukraine – With Love

> I think everyone's experience in Ukraine has been pretty similar:
>
> - Hottest girls in the world
> - Nightlife is so-so
> - Traditional culture, social circle oriented
> - Have connections or at least pipeline before you get there.
> - No one speaks English. The name of the game is "find the English speaker"
> - Make sure you spend more than a week there, because you'll need it.
>
> The guys who did well spent 3-6 weeks there, had social contacts, and found English-speakers. Guys who did not do well there were only there for a week and spent their time cold approaching girls who spoke no English.

There's also the 27-page Industrial Shithole thread which I updated while I was in Ukraine.

If you liked this post then you'll like Bang Ukraine, my 103-page book that teaches you how to sleep with Ukrainian women during a visit to the country. It contains tourist tips, game advice, and sex stories that give you all the information you need to bang hyper-feminine Ukrainian women, with extra details not released on the blog. Click here to learn more about the book.

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How Women Become Worthless

January 13, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

I really enjoy writing here at ROK. The readers are intelligent, and the short format allows for a quick dissemination of brutal truth without the tawdry and oh-so-tiresome task of qualifying every single statement in order to preempt the inevitable bot comments from those with the reading comprehension of an empty beer can.

If I had a dollar for every "mean, misogynistic and short-sided" post I've written down through the years while making extra desk space for a coloring book and the 6 year old girl who stole my heart, I'd be a wealthy man. Her mom is a fine woman too, and I'm glad to have her around when she's allegedly between boyfriends.

There's no doubt that the world is filled with fine women, and any man committed to staying unmarried and not allowing emotional tomfoolery to inhabit his dome will often find his experience with the lady folk to be a rather pleasing one. Yeah, even the party girls with high notch counts. If you're not going to marry her, it really shouldn't matter as long as the two of you get along.

But unfortunately, many of these sufficient women become worthless. They start out as decent specimens, but somehow manage to find themselves on the red pill man's pump-and-dump list. This is a bittersweet topic for me, because while I enjoy a random romp with girls who have managed to concentrate all of their worth between their legs, I'm also well aware of the many added benefits of girlfriending up a good one.

The way women become worthless is simple. It's the SMP version of whats knows in the business world as the Peter Principle.

> The Peter Principle is a belief that, in an organization where promotion is based on achievement, success, and merit, that organization's members will eventually be promoted beyond their level of ability. The principle is commonly phrased, "Employees tend to rise to their level of incompetence."

A pretty girl posts a sexy pic on facebook and you click like.

You just promoted her.

Loading...
The same girl goes to the gym, and a dozen guys stare at her like hungry wolves.

Promoted again.

Everyone in her family and social circle sees her HB7 and raises her three points.

Promotion!

Everything that comes out of her pretty little mouth is super relevant and interesting to the guys who want to bang her.

Promoted again.

Her beta orbiters trip over themselves trying to please her just for the satisfaction of being near her.

Promotion!

The list goes on and on, but you get the idea. From the day she's born until the day she slams into the wall in her mid-30s, she just keeps being promoted until she reaches her level of incompetence. When the day comes that she can't live up to the position she's trying to fill – most awesome, sexy and unique thing everrrrr – she becomes a worthless self-centered bore who ends up in my phone as "Blonde HB7 Tiny Boobs Wrist Tattoo."

I hate to do it, but I'm going to have to pin this one on men. We create these monsters by promoting otherwise good women far above their grade. If you're doing this, I respectfully ask you to stop. Though the female ego is certainly complicit in this scenario, she can't promote herself. It would be unwise to point a finger at feminism or a society that promotes girl power because her ego is just a self-written performance report. It takes a man to review the report and agree to promote her.

Slamming into the wall is a hilarious version of downsizing that sends the old, fat or ugly ones to the feminist welfare line. But it doesn't have to be that way. I encourage men everywhere to cultivate a more solvent and manageable SMP by knocking off the beta orbiting, white knighting, and supplication that keeps promoting these women to positions they cannot handle. It's rather unbecoming, and the shaming language from those being ushered out of relevance by red pill security guards is starting to get on my nerves.

Read Next: Crazy Spinster: "Single Women Should Have Weddings!"

Is Zyzz A Role Model Or A Bad Influence?

January 14, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

There is no figure more polarizing in the eyes of young men today than deceased bodybuilder Aziz Shavershian. A tall and originally very skinny ectomorph, Aziz began posting videos on Youtube in 2007 documenting his transformation from scrawny teenager to shredded sensation. Zyzz attracted a cult following on the internet, particularly among male, teenage Australian gymgoers, who sought to emulate not only his physique, but the success with women produced by both his body and internet fame.

On one hand, Zyzz single-handedly made bodybuilding popular again among teenage boys, which is no mean feat in a culture where brazen displays of masculinity are stigmatized by the feminist establishment. Thanks to Zyzz, today's young men are much open to the idea of "getting shredded" than their older counterparts, offering hope that masculinity is not on it's way to being dead and buried in the 21st century English speaking world.

> I can safely say that my motivation to train goes far beyond that of merely impressing people, it is derived from the feeling of having set goals and achieving them and outdoing myself in the gym.

Thanks to Zyzz, hordes of young men have embarked on a journey of mastery and embraced positive masculinity while men such as Roosh chose to pursue the journey of game and men like Tim Ferris pursued entrepreneurship. Just like improving your game or building a business, body building encourages young men to better themselves and gain satisfaction from the goals they have achieved through sheer effort and persistence over an extended period of time, allowing those who take it to truly become Men.

Loading...

While Zyzz should be commended, his fame is not without controversy. It is almost certain that Zyzz's aesthetics were the result of heavy steroid and Human Growth Hormone (HGH) usage. On top of the questionable circumstances of his death (a heart attack in a Bangkok sauna at the age of 22), his elder brother "Chestbrah" was arrested for possession of steroids in 2011 and photos circulated on the internet depicting Zyzz being injected in the butt. Nobody is fooled that it was a flu shot. I know a guy who started taking steroids at a very young age during the peak of Zyzz's fame in the months following his death. How many other young men have started taking steroids and put their health in jeopardy due to Zyzz's own bad example?

> U mirin' brah?

Zyzz owed his success to pumping his body full of dangerous substances, and used his steroid-fuelled physique to work part-time as a male stripper. Zyzz not only "cheated" on his journey, but engaged in the most degrading and anti-masculine profession there is: being a rent-boy. While Zyzz no doubt enjoyed the fruits of his fame before his sudden death, his fleeting internet fame and lifestyle choices should not be taken as an example to follow by today's young men.

While Zyzz enjoyed a few years of unlimited access to young, tight women and no doubt had a blast with his crew before he died, he was never able to build any significant wealth from his an internet fame that will quickly be forgotten. Young men should follow Zyzz's example in regards to starting on their own journey of mastery whether it be game or business or weight lifting, but they should also learn from his mistakes and avoid taking perilous and unsustainable shortcuts.

Do not take the easy road. Do not let yourself down. Build your success the right away so you can enjoy the satisfaction brought to you by achieving your goals through hard work and sheer persistence. That’s what I’ve learned from Zzyz.

Read More: How To Workout Correctly

Why Swag Is Bad For Your Game

January 14, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Superbly Weak Amateur Game. That's what SWAG is, so don't bother. Unless you are under the age of 20, you should not be attempting to do swag.

SWAG, derived from swagger is a concept about "looking cool" and "being cool". I tried to find a better definition, but urban dictionary is filled with people making fun of it. All you really need to know is that Justin Bieber has a SWAG coach, so unless you prefer to look like him there's no point. I will say the concept of SWAG will work under the age of 20, mostly because women of that age want Bieber's nuts and haven't experienced enough in life to realize it's probably the douchiest thing out there next to YOLO, but if you're serious about game, do not do it. Every time I have seen someone try SWAG in public, they have failed, and hilarity ensues.

Do You Wan't To Look Like This?

Per the dictionary swagger is better defined as "to conduct oneself in an arrogant or superciliously pompous manner; especially : to walk with an air of overbearing self-confidence." Yes even the dictionary acknowledges that if you attempt swag you will be a dick. This is different from an alpha. Alphas assert dominance through confidence while using SWAG is like kicking a girl because you like her.

Loading…

Best Opener Out There … At Age 7

Class, on the other hand, is the best thing since sliced bread. It does everything you would think SWAG would do. Think Tom Brady versus Justin Bieber. Tom Brady is actually the perfect example of class and being an alpha. People call him a dick, but what has he really done that's made him one? Nothing. It's envy. He's a handsome man, with a supermodel wife, and three Superbowl rings. And if you need a definition for class, the dictionary states " social rank; especially : high social rank" as well as "high quality." This is exactly what women are looking for.

Remember the goal of game is to get laid. Class represents what you need to do to get laid. SWAG is the dollar store version. Just don't do it. And remember ….

Dont Miss: 6 Reasons Why Jersey Shore Was Good For American Culture

Get The Equivalent Of An MBA From Reading One Book

January 14, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Well that's what the author of The Personal MBA insinuates with his book. It's the distillation of his extensive business reading that focuses more of what he's learned than applied.

The most helpful chapter for most will be the one on value, where the author describes how successful businesses give people what they want. He reviews the following:

- The 5 human drives
- 10 steps to evaluating a market before you start a business
- 12 forms of economic value that businesses can provide

The ideas put forth in the value chapter should be enough for you to apply the skills and talents you've accumulated in life to create a product or service that other people want to pay for. If reading this part of the book doesn't get you excited about starting a business, then I suggest you put the book down and get to entrenching yourself further in your corporate gig to at least climb the ladder.

> The best businesses in the world are the ones that create the most value for other people. Some businesses thrive by providing a little value to many, and others focus on providing a lot of value to only a few people.
>
> Loading...

The format of the book is essentially a blog, with dozens of topics delivered in bite-size chunks. So many concepts are thrown at you that it's unlikely you'll retain most of it, especially since meaningful examples aren't often used. While this format may be great for those with short attention spans, topics are rarely connected, which leads to a lack of flow. It's laziness on the author's part to throw a hundred concepts at you in seemingly random order.

The second half turns into a psychology book and then eventually into a full-blown self help guide about setting goals and finding the root desires behind those goals. Is that what they learn in MBA programs? The psychology content was mostly review for me.

If you really want the equivalent of an MBA, you'll have to dig deeper, as short sections here can be an entire book or course on their own. A real MBA would laugh at you if this book was your sole business education, especially since it used absolutely no math.

I reluctantly recommend this book if you want to start a business, mostly due to the strong value chapter. I think the book succeeded in its goal on educating readers about the universal fundamentals of business, but you'll probably need a bit more in applying them.

Read More: "The Personal MBA" on Amazon

The 9 Ugliest Feminists In America

January 15, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

1. Lindy West

She's the fattest feminist in this roundup. Her crusade to eliminate fat shaming (on Jezebel) is designed so that when Skynet becomes self-aware, she'll be finally seen as culturally attractive.

2. Jessica Valenti

She has achieved mainstream acceptance with her books and articles in the Washington Post and The Atlantic. Surprisingly, she got married, but to a man who was awarded a "beta of the month" prize. She was somewhat attractive for one picture in her life:

But she looks nothing like that now…

3. Amanda Marcotte

The reason that feminists have large jaws is because of testosterone exposure during pre-natal development. In that case, Amanda must have been supplemented with testosterone via direct injection into the womb.

4. Carolyn Hax

I feel like it’s unfair to pick on the elderly, but such is life. She can be found shaming men on her Washington Post advice column.

5. Hanna Rosin

She wrote a book called The End Of Men: And The Rise Of Women. Enough said.

Loading...

6. Kay Hymowitz

Another senior citizen. She wrote a book called Manning Up: How The Rise Of Women Turned Men Into Boys.

7. Sandra Fluke

Obama's useful idiot for the 2012 presidential campaign. She believes the taxpayer should pay for her birth control.

8. Kate Harding

She believes men's rights activists should go fuck themselves. She also believes that fat shaming is a serious feminist issue. Of course she's fat.

9. Jen McCreight

She’s a popular atheist blogger who puts her science views on hold when passionately discussing feminism. I actually got into a blog war with her last year when she hated on my accurate observation that hyper-educated girls are less feminine.

Jen wins our ugliest feminist contest by a wide margin. She's so ugly that when she looks in the mirror, her reflection looks back and shakes its head. Really though she's so ugly that when she goes to the therapist, he asks her to lie on the couch face down. No but seriously, no playing around, she's so ugly that when she wants to practice birth control, all she has to do is turn on the light.

Feminists want to be valued for their brainpower and ideas above all else, but they still engage in professional photoshoots to push the prettiest picture of themselves on their web sites and book jackets. I guess even feminism can't completely demolish a girl's desire to be pretty.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Don't Miss: 3 American Cities Men Must Avoid At All Costs

It’s Always Great To Be A Man

January 16, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

I’ve asked hundreds of men, “When is a man in his prime?” and I have always gotten wildly different answers.

When considering the best times of a man’s life, men are often confused by the subject. They think back to their college days when they partied with many young women, or, if they are an older gentleman, they remember when they were at the top of their game and a true powerhouse of their company making tons of money.

What I’ve come to realize is that there is a lot going for the average man. We get to experience the unique pleasure of having many peaks in our lifetime: our sexual, financial, and philosophical prime.

Let’s talk about each in detail.

Sexual Prime

This subject has been covered to death by so many bloggers already, so let’s go over it quickly.

Going into your 20’s, a man is just starting to become a truly sexual being. No matter how sexually successful he was as a teenager, his attractiveness to women will continue to increase throughout his twenties. The only reason you need money at this stage is so you can pay your bills and get access to hot women, otherwise it’s all about having some really tight active game and using what God has given you.

Entering his 30’s, a man is finally grown up, and should by this point have plenty of experience with women and a much larger income to boot. He will be able to clean up with women if he did not waste his twenties jacking off. (The dotted red line going down from 30 is if a man does not use his twenties to constantly hit the gym, perfect his game, or make enough cash to survive.)

There are unlimited examples showing when men have had the most sexual success during their thirties, such as when Jerry Seinfeld was banging Shoshanna Lonstein in his late thirties (she was 17), but there are also many examples where very young men or very old men have great sexual success. However, these successes are exceptions that prove the rule; we notice these exceptions because of how well they defy the norm, not because they are the norm.

Finally, around age 45, men hit the wall. His grey hairs will need to be dyed (if he has hair), and going to the gym does not make him as cut as he used to be. His energy for going out and meeting tons of women has faded. The years of being a stallion are over. After hitting the wall, with diligence and hard effort he can preserve his once formidable sexual prowess, and he can maintain the leg up over women even fifteen years younger than himself. But if a man doesn't take care of himself in the golden years, his body will quickly decay and he will find himself a sexual outcast (the red dotted line after the age of 50 represents this).

Financial Prime

Making money is a skill. You get better at it with time. Making money is also dependent on a lot of factors beyond your control, such as your political climate, business connections, and the value of your skill set.

Thus what tends to happen over a man's lifetime, is a slow gradual build-up of income and resources until they hit that breakthrough moment sometime in their thirties when they start to make a lot of cash. The dotted green lane is the contingency of a man who fails to realize his financial potential during this time.

After leaving his parents in his twenties, a man begins to understand how he can fit into the economy. He makes friends with other men in the same situation as he is. He works hard despite shitty economic conditions, being screwed over by a loved one, or some other similar misfortune.

Usually it is not until a man's 30's before he understands how to make good money, and even then he's just getting started. Although he is now proficient in his chosen field, he is at the point in his life where other successful men will take him seriously.

Just a fact of life: Until you're 35, truly successful men aren't going to consider doing business with you. Other men will see you as a child and will not take you seriously.

More importantly, as a man ages so will his friends. If a man choose his friends wisely during his youth, many of his closest friends will become very successful, and can help take his financial situation to the next level. Provided his friendships were properly cultivated and the man in question was not a total screw-up, he can reliably depend on his friends to help his future business endeavours in any way possible. Often the help is mutual, which means that successful friends help each other become filthy rich in their 40's.

Loading...

This brings us to the ages of 40-60, which are by far and away when most men make their fortunes (Just look at the Forbes 400). By now, his economic expertise in his field, as well as the tens of thousands of business contacts a man has met and sorted through, and/or the corporate ladder he has climbed, has resulted in a realization of all possible economic opportunities.

For every man making bank during these two decades, there are another three who never found success. Not everyone can win this game, and should a man fail he can feel some consolation provided he tried his absolute best.

As a man nears 60, he will be exiting this prime as other men view him as too old to take seriously. If he was part of a corporation, he will be pushed out. Often times men start to feel the burnout of working hard for decades, and this is a major contributing factor towards the decline of a man's money making years.

However, it's not until beyond the age of 70 does a man really lose the traction he had in his 40's, as many of his friends who once helped make him into a powerhouse will have since retired, or have passed away. The skills he learned as a young man will no longer be useful, and it will be difficult to compete with 30 year old men who will seem to have unlimited energy.

With the end of his financial prime, hopefully he has enough cash to carry himself through his twilight years. This brings us to the often neglected...

Philosophical Prime

Philosophy is often misunderstood as a noun, and people try to ask, "What is philosophy? What works are considered philosophical or not?"

But they are looking at it the wrong way. Philosophy is a verb, and is the creative mode of thought that leads to new discoveries by analyzing the world in a different way. And there is no time better suited towards difficult thinking than the end of one's life, which is why a man's philosophical prime is between the years of 55-70.

Immanuel Kant published The Critique of Pure Reason when he was 57, and the second, more polished, version when he was 63. Socrates delivered The Apology in his old age, which has served as the foundation of all philosophy since. Aristotle was 50 when he founded The Lyceum and almost certainly produced all the works we have from him during his philosophical prime.

Even of philosophers who create great works early on, such as Wittgenstein or Hume, they often return to their early works in their later years only to renounce it entirely, as Wittgenstein did with his Tractus when he wrote his Philosophical Investigations, or as Hume did with his completely revised Treatise of Human Nature.

The reason why a philosophical prime comes so late in life, is because knowledge is difficult to acquire, and takes decades of learning before a man is able to make sense of things. And even then, we are always in a perpetual state of ignorance. Kant said that the only philosopher who could solve all of the world's problems is one who could live forever; who knows?

As a man processes information and becomes more and more self-aware of his human condition over the course of his life, he reaches his zenith of processing it all before old age sets in. After 70, the mind begins the gradual, inexorable, and often horrible decline that render's a man's memory incapable of recalling things he could once recite by rote. His mind is slower with each day. Senility is a bitch.

And yet, in spite of this, a man at 80 is still much more capable of understanding the world than he was at the age of 50, simply due the compounding effect experience has on the male mind. So as long he is capable of using his mind, a man should continue to have discourse with other younger men so that they may carry forward the great philosophical tradition binding the western man across centuries.

The only thing that can stop a man from using his life experience to inform and educate others is the risk of cognitive illness, such as Parkinson's, which is represented by the dotted blue line. If a man gets that he is done.

Conclusion

No matter a man's age, he is uniquely situated to take advantage and exploit his position in society to the best of his ability. A full life involves many sexual conquests, business deals, and thoughtful nights of quiet contemplation, with each taking a higher priority depending on the life experiences accumulated up to that point.

So, to answer the question, "When are a man's best years?" I would have to answer, "All of them."

Read Next: My Philosophy On Life

The Death Of Ladies Night In America

January 16, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

You've all seen the promotions. Bars and clubs go out of their way to have one or two nights a week geared, at least in appearance, to entice and attract the fairer sex. But how are such nights actually received by the women they are directed towards? From my experience the answer turns on where you are in the world. Let's take a look at some examples:

United States

In the U.S. there are two separate factors that impact the efficacy and frequency of Ladies' Nights. First, we are in the era of the feminist voice that claims equal rights and non-preferential treatment, as well as the unnecessarily revered "sex and the city" independent woman. This leads to a falsified belief among most women that "Ladies' Nights" are not desirable and, accordingly, should be skipped.

A feminist would not acquiesce to receiving preferential treatment and therefore would not attend. Those women modeling themselves over arguably one of the biggest myths of current female rationalization—the allure of the well-educated, overachieving aging woman—would rather get the girls together at the trendy rooftop bar and discuss the latest men in their rotation, glancing at their smartphones every few minutes to make sure they didn't miss anything on Instagram.

In other words the idea that these American women actually take advantage of Ladies' Nights, and in turn make it a good option for men to attend for the abundance of women to speak to, does not actually exist. As a Los Angeles resident, Ladies' Nights are sparse and those that do arise are typically fests of sausage.

The second reason—which may explain the dearth of Ladies' Nights in the first place in places such as Los Angeles—is that several states have made it illegal to discriminate based on gender. Promotions such as "ladies free" or "2 for 1 drinks for ladies" are prohibited. Legally and socially, it is predicated upon the notion that men and women are equal and thus one class should not be favored over the other in any respect.

Take California for example. By law, a business establishment cannot discriminate based on gender. If one does, they can be subjected to a civil lawsuit and fined a minimum of $4,000 per instance of discrimination. While California tries to mar the fundamental tenets of natural gender interaction via this law, thankfully few places actually abide by it. Have you been in line at a hot club before and seen attractive scantily clad girls walk right in, whereas the men are charged upwards of $50 per head for admission? Of course you have. I would also guess that once you do get inside, there are no complaints voiced for being surrounded by an abundance of thin girls in heels and dresses that were able to easily circumvent such "equal" rights.

Loading...

If such laws exist, then why do we see examples of its defiance on a consistent basis? Wouldn't it be better to completely enforce and mandate equality? Force hot girls to wait in line with Steve and John? While this may make for a great time in line, it pushes attractive girls to forums where their value is recognized and rewarded. Fortunately this is only a private right of action, meaning an individual has to sue to enforce this law. This considerably lessens the frequency of enforcement over those mediums regulated by governmental supervision.

Eastern Europe

Now imagine the complete opposite. The women are feminine rather than feminist. In fact, they do not even understand feminist ideology. Next, there is no police state in place imposing laws of equality countering evolutionary psychology. This lovely mix yields a very positive result for men who, upon deciding to frequent a Ladies' Night in these countries, are treated to something considerably better than what one finds here domestically. Let me relate two stories from my recent trip abroad.

In Poznan, Poland, my friends and I stumbled into a small bar on a Thursday night after noticing several girls inside. Once inside, those "several" morphed into "numerous." Pretty soon we realized the ratio was about 90/10 girls to guys. The approachability of girls inside was at an astronomical level. What gave rise to this favorable scenario? It was "Ladies' Night" where girls drank for free. And because the girls here welcomed the promotion, it resulted in an abundance of girls, mostly college-aged (i.e. without money) there to take advantage of the complimentary cocktails. We had a great night, met many endearing girls dancing, talking and flirting the night away without ever running out of girls to talk to.

Now take Poland and put it on steroids, and you have Ukraine where femininity and discrimination hit you like an anvil in the face. In Kiev several places host Ladies' Nights throughout the week. One particular bar my friend and I went to—which soon became our "spot" for obvious reasons—goes even further with the Ladies' Night concept. In addition to free drinks, men are forbidden entry until midnight. When the hands coincide at 12, the men walk in and are treated to a display of an entire room full of young, feminine girls dressed to the nines and tipsy off their free booze.

This also acts as a self-filtering process, as the girls that stay after the free booze (which many do), do so to meet men. A large portion of our success within Kiev came from this Ladies' Night. Coincidence? Possibly. But I am rather confident the existence of this promotion did not hurt.

But as we all know, we are wrong. We are idiots. America is great and how dare we think otherwise. I know that every time I travel, I can't wait to go back home to the frumpy girl in flats, shoulder pads and hipster pants who snarks at me for interrupting her conversation about the latest Housewives episode.

Read More: The Ironies Of Female Empowerment

3 Tips For A Successful Book Launch

January 16, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently I launched Bang Ukraine and it was my best ever in terms of unit sales, even though I've put out much stronger work. If you're launching an e-product launch of your own, you need to start with the following belief:

No one needs your product.

You can try to convince them they need it through fancy sales copy, but truth is no one will die or suffer if they don't buy your book. It's a luxury that for most customers will be treated as entertainment, a distraction to their lives.

So how can you sell someone something that no one really needs? Three ways:

1. Give amazing value. Your launch price should be so low that you may have trouble imagining how you will make money off of it. In addition, and perhaps more importantly, throw in bonuses that exceed the value of the book price. For Bang Ukraine, I think many men happily paid more than the $5 launch price for the bonuses alone, but they're also getting an entire book on top of that. I've actually had guys tell me that they bought a special deal of mine not because they wanted it, but because it was too good to pass up.

2. Light a fire under their ass. Make your special a limited time only. People have a lot of things going on in their lives. Unless you tell them that they only have a couple days to buy your massive special, they'll get distracted and forget. Remember: no one needs your book. Making your launch scarce pushes it up in a person's priority list so they remember to buy it before something else distracts them.

Loading...

3. Don't get any ideas that you deserve to make money. The whole launch should be based on how to give customers value, not how much cash you can make. If you give value, you'll get value in return. The money you make should be secondary to what you're offering to customers who are faced with unlimited choice in movies, music, and books. For instance, Bang Ukraine is a specialized guide based on full-time research in a field where there has been no prior writing. I'm sure there are guys who would pay $100 for it, but is that what most of my readers want? No, they want a cheap book with a bunch of extras. So I will provide that value for them.

The launch gives your book a big boost to eventually find a path to those guys who would benefit most from it. A successful launch plants a seed that gives the book a chance to grow for some long-tail income in the next 3-5 years until it gets buried under the avalanche of new content. It also helps if you have other products in your lineup. You want every book launch to leverage your older work, allowing them to work as a team to move the ball forward while still giving great value (in my biggest combo, I gave 15 books for $35, only $2.33 per book).

If you're just starting off, you'll probably have to offer your products with a pay-what-you-want model. At the end of your first book, have a link so the reader can donate via Paypal

(if they made it to the end of the book, they probably liked it). You won't make much money but you will develop a readership that will give you a couple extra bucks for your next book. The road to consistent revenue is long and laborious, but if this is your passion then I believe it's worth it.

If you remember anything, it's that everything you do must be centered around what your customers want, not what you want. They care about how your work helps them, not how much you get paid. But thankfully the more value you give people, the more you get back. It's quite simple, really.

Read Next: 3 Reasons Why The E-Book Money Train May Be Over

Even Norway Isn’t Immune To The Red Pill

January 17, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Norway is the most gender neutral, egalitarian, and feminist country in the world. The culture has been telling the women for decades that they can be anything, but in 2013, here’s what you’ll find:

- 90% of nurses are female
- 90% of engineers are male

This is in spite of the government’s best efforts to recruit males in nursing and females in engineering. Norway’s brightest minds have ruled out discrimination as a reason for this problem, and they’re so befuddled that they’re calling it a “paradox.” Readers of this blog, however, may have a different name for it: human nature.

A Norwegian red pill comedian, if you can believe it, has created a 3 hour documentary where he wonders if males and females are different (you can watch part one above). Of course this was a gigantic controversy in Norway. The series almost didn’t get aired in spite of the fact that he gives kid-glove treatment to the zany feminists he interviews on camera.

Here are a couple things I noticed or realized from the first installment:

Loading...

- Most of the “studies” that “prove” feminist arguments are based on self-reporting surveys that end up proving nothing.
- A reporter from the publication Dagbladet makes no effort at a neutral point-of-view. This isn’t a surprise since I was trashed in it.
- One study showed that children have a clear gender toy preference starting at nine months. Another study showed a difference from day one, obviously before environmental influence.
- An influential Norwegian gender thinker said, “There’s no room in biology for me.”
- Another Norwegian scientist wonders, “Why are some so concerned with finding biological differences?” I guess we know what he’s concerned with finding.

The highlight was seeing a Norwegian scientist get smacked down by a British female scientist for saying that the only difference between men and women are genitalia. Apparently hormonal differences are inconsequential to the Scandinavian elite.

The fact that red pill thinking is seeping into Norway, the most blue pill country on Earth, tells me only one thing: feminist ideology has peaked. Prepare for red pill domination.

Don’t Miss: 15 Pictures Of Norwegian Girls

Why Marriage Can Still Be A Viable Option

January 17, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There is much hostility toward the idea of matrimony within the manosphere, and understandably so. Most of those familiar with this part of the internet come from western nations and are therefore familiar with what the skyrocketing divorce rates, punitive alimony and biased custody laws associated with Western marriage have done to men.

In spite of this, I suspect that the idea of marriage has not entirely lost its luster for many of us. In fact, I'd posit that quite a few denizens of the manosphere would still be open to it under the right circumstances, at least in the long term. I know that I am one of them.

It is these circumstances that determine the wisdom of a male considering the idea of marriage in the modern age, separating the gullible saps from the wiser patriarchs. Teasing out these circumstances requires that a key distinction be made between two different forms of the marriage that exist in different cultures. This will determine the degree to which the male entering a marriage arrangement can be considered a fool.

Marriage 1.0

Marriage 1.0 is the older version of the institution. It features fewer incentives for dissolution of the union and offers significantly less room for the ideal fulfillment of the feminine imperative, while offering more incentive for the male involved. Keeping this arrangement going requires fewer games for the male to play and allows for a more equitable, mutually-beneficial partnership.

The most crucial key here is the elimination of easy outs for the female that could leave the male high and dry and with severe legal and financial obligations with little consequences to her. The legal risks for a man within a Marriage 1.0 contract are lower and quite a bit less one-sided.

Men have a bit more room to be men within the context of this arrangement because their investment in their family is more well protected and not as easy to invalidate as I will soon show it has become.

This deal is still available in many parts of the world where more traditional gender roles are still respected. Marriage isn't a horrible deal for your average man operating within the confines of these cultures. In the West, where the culture is largely oriented to cater to the feminine imperative, Marriage 1.0 is largely a memory, with the era in which it last dominated surviving only in fiction.

In today's western world, another option dominates…

Marriage 2.0

This is where lifetime alimony, stealth alimony, fem-centric child custody laws and a host of other factors combine to make marriage a general liability for men and a boon for women, who can essentially do no wrong barring a few extreme cases.

If a divorce is initiated after a male cheats on his spouse and fathers another secret family, the male is likely to lose custody of his children and be saddled with large financial obligations to his ex.

If a divorce is initiated after it is discovered that a female has cheated on her spouse and actually cuckolded him (paternity fraud), then the male is still likely to lose custody of his children (the ones that are his) and be saddled with large financial obligations to the child that isn't his.

Loading…

Marriage 2.0 is, in short, the story of male liability at all costs and in nearly all situations. It is the product of re-imagined divorce laws that, in effect, removed most of the protections men enjoyed under Marriage 1.0 and replaced them with a system that incentivizes the initiation of divorce by women, regardless of their actions.

So, Is Marriage Ever Worthwhile?

I have made a serious effort, but I'm failing to find many instances in which Marriage 2.0 could be considered worth the risk and effort. Marriage as a whole, though? That depends on the cultural context.

It is crucial not to overlook these cultural factors when it comes to the topic of marriage and whether or not a man should bother with it. The firmly anti-marriage view is pretty spot on if you're dealing with your typical western women and Marriage 2.0 is your only option, but the dynamics shift when you start talking about other parts of the world where Marriage 2.0 is not a dominant force.

Women in many of these places are a bit more willing to do the things many in this corner of the internet hope their partner would do in an ideal world that a lot of western women will not.

Combine this with the decreased financial/legal risks and a marriage-minded man in the Marriage 1.0 context suddenly seems like less of a sap. Even a less relationship-oriented man might begin to reconsider things in the right society.

Were Marriage 1.0 a more viable option for western men, there would be significantly fewer voices standing in opposition to matrimony altogether. Sites like this would, in fact, probably suffer quite a bit due to decreased participation. Guys would have less to complain about in a society where Marriage 1.0 was more than an often ridiculed memory.

If you can get out of the matrix that is the west (especially North America), marriage is still largely viable.

If you're marriage minded and you live in the West, your long term goal should be a more permanent expatriation to a society where Marriage 1.0 still persists (don't bring a girl back and risk her assimilation).

Even those who are not very open to possible matrimony in the near or short-term should at least flirt with the idea of Marriage 1.0 if it is available and see if you can't change your mind. At least avail yourself of all of your options before committing to eternal bachelorhood. Do not let your familiarity with the worst case scenario (Marriage 2.0) tarnish your view of matrimony entirely.

The institution of marriage is dead (or close to it) in the West, but that does not mean that all is lost.

Read Next: The Limits Of American Feminism

The 5 Socioeconomic Tiers Of Colombian Women

January 17, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

After a careful reading of Bang Colombia I have further recommendations for Bogota, the only city I've lived in. I grew up here and am familiar with everything there is to know about this city.

The first thing you will need to understand is that, unlike the United States, Colombia is not a racist country, but a classist one. Social stratification is embedded in this society thanks to years of the upper class controlling everything from politics and business to government. Therefore, upon your arrival to Bogota, it will be immediately evident to you that there are two Bogotas, one for the rich and one for the poor. You should also know that there is a direct correlation between social class and beauty, for reasons that I still don't know.

To be more clear I will divide Bogota's girls into 5 tiers…

Tier 1

This tier denotes girls from very low class and low education. They are low quality. These girls wont be seen unless you venture into the depths of the slums, in which case you also won't ever be seen again.

Tier II

Tier II girls usually have some sort of education, probably of the technical kind, with low enough resources that she won't be worried more about fucking than about surviving. Don't waste your time with them.

Tier III

The next type of girl is a very interesting kind, and the type of girls you will see most of the time. They're your typical middle class girl, Tier III. Most of them are university students. They party a lot, study a lot more, and are mostly DTF.

> The average Colombian girl doesn't have a whole lot to say, most likely due to limited experiences of living at home with her parents her entire life" (page 18, Roosh).

This is spot on, and it is important to understand that Tier III girls are divided into two bunches, the ones that have traveled and the ones who haven't.

Most of Tier III girls have been to Miami. For some reason she may think that her very limited traveling experience makes her better than the untraveled Tier III, so she may try to display some sort of cockiness. Remember these girls have been brought up in comfortable households, went to private schools, were fairly well educated, and might have the wrong idea that what they have to say actually matters. You should crush them.

Display all of your traveling experience, professional and linguistic abilities. If this type of girl believes for a second that you are a loser, her pussy will dry out and you will lose all access to it.

Another incentive of going for Tier III girls in Colombia is that they have more free time for themselves, since most of them don't have to work and study. This means more time to spend at the gym. Tier III also means enough resources so that she can actually afford a gym. This can also be bad news, since better make-up and clothing combined with the bad lighting of bars can make a 6 look like and 8. Be weary of this.

Tier IV

Lets move on to my favorite type of Colombian girls, Tier IV. These girls have reached this social tier by way of economic status or sheer beauty and thanks to their family money, they have been able to afford an international education. They often know at least two or three languages, are cocky, think they know it all, and think they are hot, but worst of all they know their value is high. If you are a fairly good looking fellow and are foreign you will be immediately accepted into this Tier, but need to be in the right place at the right time.

Tier V

These are the unicorns, the girls who belong to the top of Colombian society. They have access to private drivers and country clubs. They will be part of the ruling class of the country in a few years and are absolutely out of your league unless you belong to the equivalent social class in your home country, which I highly doubt. These are girls who are here by economic status and for sheer beauty. In the latter case, the girls who've moved from Tiers I-IV to Tier V project amazing confidence and might even intimidate you. Do not fall for it. For some reason only known to Satan they have kept their insecurities deep within. It might take you longer to crack them, but you will nonetheless do so.

Loading...
The ones that are in this tier by economic status will not be as easy to crack. There is no formula to do so and has to be done with time, money, and patience. Don't bother anyway, because you will most likely never see these girls as they don't usually go to places where they will be mixed among commoners such as yourself.

Game Advice

The advice of Bang Colombia on game, especially for day game, is beautifully set up and perfectly executed. I have nothing else to add to it. I do however have one commentary on night game: be careful with your sarcasm. She might not get it. Keep it basic or she will lose interest due to lack of understanding.

We will now explore a topic presented in the book:

> Because Colombian girls are extremely flakey (for reasons I don't completely > understand), were going to hit her with an additional cocky line that helps commit her to the pick-up. “So what qualities do you have which make me want to get to know you better?” (page 35)

I cannot stress enough how important this step is in order to nail any Colombian girl. This doesn’t only apply to girls from Bogota but from everywhere in the country. It’s an extremely important question because it presents a challenge to her and forces her to pursue approval. Ultimately it shakes her confidence.

Colombian girls are indeed flakey. Yes, all of them, but to differing degrees which depend on social status. Tier III girls are easier to impress while Tier IV girls aren’t so easy. Moreover, the book stresses that kisses are hard to get in the first night. I have never had trouble with that. I have found it easy to get a full on make out session, but banging her is a completely different story.

When it’s time to approach, locate your target, such as a group of girls sitting at the pub. This works better if you have a wingman. Sit by the girls and start a conversation with your wingman in your native language. If it’s English they will most likely talk to you and if it isn’t then they will ask what language it is and where you are from. From there you can’t mess it up and if you do you are an idiot.

If they show no interest try to get a local to run game with you (or the one in the group who has the best Spanish). Having him hype you up should do it, but if not then go back to your hostel and hang yourself from the ceiling.

The book talks about of the importance of dancing. It is completely true that Colombian girls love dancing, a convenience that foreigners can use to their advantage. Whenever she says she wants to dance, do it. Otherwise another guy will sweep her away. There is nothing that turns a Colombian girl on more than a good dancer. You should dance even if you are not a good dancer. Make her smile and keep her attention on you. If you want to play it safe, stick to reggaeton clubs. It’s like dancing hip-hop—just grind yourself silly. This is true for ALL tiers.

Finally, I wanted to address this quote:

> Catholic influence may cause them to put up ball-busting resistance when it comes time to taking off clothing. There’s no culture specific trick to breaking them does simply do what you normally do and understand that it may take a few extra minutes in the end, Colombian girls want to fuck just as bad as any other girl, especially when they’re in your bedroom” (Roosh, page 44).

It is important to understand that Colombia is a De Jure catholic country, however De Facto it is pretty secular. The advice is clear—just keep your game tight and wait it out. If you do everything right and follow the steps in the book you will have no problem.

As a Colombian man I recommend you read the book. Someone did the job for you, so simply follow the instructions. Colombian girls are a challenge to crack for a foreigner but once you do you will be a very happy man.

Learn More: Bang Colombia: How To Sleep With Colombian Women

4 Things One Man Has Learned About Relationships

January 18, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I received an interesting email the other day…

> Your writing has changed my life because it's changed the way I think about relationships. I used to think, what I need to do is fall in love with a woman and she'll be my best friend and we'll fuck and raise kids and laugh and hold hands on the beach, for the rest of our lives. Well, three divorces and numerous heartbreaks later, and with the help of your book and blog, I've realized the following:
>
> 1. "True love" is bullshit manufactured by Hollywood. All human relationships are transactional and center around the exchange of something: money, sex, food, shelter, power, status, whatever.
>
> 2. All relationships eventually fail because the exchange breaks down. She has kids and doesn't want sex any more. They both get bored. She goes out with her old college boyfriend and fucks him. He realizes he's being used or isn't getting what he wants any more.
>
> 3. All women (maybe all men too) are liars, unreliable and unfaithful. They will sacrifice everything for a lie.
>
> 4. The Hollywood ending of lifelong (or even long term) relationships is the worst lie of all. It's not that every marriage ends in divorce, but they all end. I know lots of long-time married couples (I'm a single dad) but very few where they still sleep together; probably more where one of them is having an affair; and almost none of them where the husband and wife are even friendly with each other.

> Bottom line, it’s crazy to treat relationships like they’re even potentially permanent. It’s a wave you ride til it runs out and you can catch the next one.
>
> Anyway, hat’s off to you Roosh. Keep up the great work, you’re a real inspiration.

One thing I wanted to add is that as long as a woman has unlimited male choice, and is not punished for leaving her current partner, the modern idea of a “relationship” can only mean something temporary and convenient. Why work so hard for one when it will barely last?

Read Next: Wisdom From Mark Minter

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

All Girls Like Rough Sex

January 18, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

I started out my young-adult life thinking the best of women. I don't know if that's because, from a young age, they drill it into your malleable brain through ridiculous adages—like that girls are "sugar and spice and everything nice" but that "men are pigs"—or simply because, later on, I fell for the good-girl façade that girls put out in public.

As I entered adulthood, this fable had crept into the sexual arena. Sure, some girls were "sluts," I figured, but most girls were good girls. Sex meant more to them. They were reluctant to have it. We were the nasty ones. So, once in bed, sex was all about finesse. Things might get "passionate," but you didn't want to get too pornographic or, god forbid, hurt the poor thing.

It took one incident to shatter this pretty little lie for good.

I had gone out on a date with a tiny, nerdy girl with big glasses and a little voice. She was a senior in college and a stand-out athlete, despite her diminutive stature and mousy features. Apart from her wide, tree-trunk, rock-hard quadriceps and other subtle physical cues, she was a timid, even weak-looking specimen. Frankly, I didn't believe her assertion that she'd almost made the U.S. Olympic team until she demonstrated some of her impressive skills in some online videos. After a round of drinks at a bar, we ended up at my place, and before long, we were making out. Things were escalating and, at the natural moment, I smoothly unbuckled her shorts. Until that point, everything was familiar.

Suddenly, out of no-where, she gave me a massive shove. I didn't know where she'd mustered the strength, but I ended up a respectable distance away from her. I looked up, only to see a huge, smug grin on her face. Figuring this was her odd, abrupt way of halting things, I sat up, ready to call it a night, only to be kangaroo kicked in the chest with both her massive legs. She sat up on her knees and followed that up with "I bet you can't do it," while glancing down at her unbuckled shorts. Against my better judgment, I accepted this ambiguous, and potentially dangerous, challenge. This was either going to be my Penthouse-Letter moment or the beginning of some drawn-out legal troubles.

I wasn't in great shape at the time, but I dove into the unsolicited wrestling match knowing that I had a significant weight and height advantage. But this girl turned out to be strongest 5-foot-2 chick on the planet. Over the next several minutes, she taunted and laughed at me while I struggled to get her shorts off, pushing me off periodically with her powerful haunches, slinking loose of any pin move, using her massive thigh strength to crush me, and holding the smile on her face the entire time. When I finally succeeded in pulling them off, the denim shorts were soaked through—as if you'd just pulled them out of the washing machine—and not with sweat. Underneath her was a dinner plate-sized puddle. I'd never seen anything like it in my life. We had sex.

In the aftermath of this incident, I told a lot of my buddies the story. Most guys chalked it to her being "weird" or a "secret freak," and moved on with a shrug. But one of them—an older guy with game—said to me:

> I'd hate to break it to you, but they're all like that. This one just made it a point to tell you. All women like rough sex—even the "nice"-looking ones. There's something about some well-placed aggression that triggers something in their lizard brain. It's disturbing, but true. I learned it years ago, when I tied this girl's hands as a joke and she went crazy. They like their hair pulled. They like to be thrown around. Their faces smashed into the bed. Some more than others, but they all like it. It's like you have to re-learn to have sex.

Like the Apostle Thomas, I had to see this for myself. I figured I'd turn up the juice a little in the sack, just enough to see if something happened, but little enough that I could backpeddle if necessary. But it wasn't necessary. The first time I pulled some hair, the appreciable rise in the girl's volume prompted a noise complaint from my Indian neighbor. I started pushing heads into pillows, slapping ass cheeks, firmly clutching forearms. I noticed the change immediately. I had girls texting me at odd hours, acquired my first legitimate stalker, and got several more noise complaints–some of them in writing. One time after sex, a girl informed me that I may have bruised her neck. When I apologized, she responded excitedly, “No. It’s so hot. I wonder if my parents will notice again.”

The more I talked to guys who actually have sex with girls on a regular basis, the more I got confirmation that this wasn’t just the girls I was happening upon. “Yup, girls are way-way nastier than you think, man.” “That’s the dirty little secret, my friend.” “Most guys have no idea that their girlfriend used to have—and wants—that kind of sex.” The comments piled up.

There’s no doubt that some girls like a little more tossing-around than others—and some like one kind of roughness over another—but the next time someone feeds you the good-girl-sex fable, be sure to ask how many girls they’ve actually slept with. Chances are, these guys—or worse, women—have no idea what they’re talking about.

Read Next: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

Shredded Flesh, Jungle Rot, And The Sledgehammer

January 18, 2013 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

3 American Cities Men Must Avoid At All Costs

January 19, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Recently our article Top 9 Ugliest Feminists In America went viral within the bloated feminist sphere. They lit up Twitter, Facebook, Tumblr, and Reddit, saying I was horrible and mean and so on. What they didn't realize is that the article was a honeypot operation for a research project to find out where feminists reside. Here was my methodology:

- Using Google Analytics, I compiled a list of the top 20 metropolitan cities for hits to our article.
- For each city I divided raw visits by total population to get a feminists per capita score (FPC).
- I averaged that score and calculated the standard deviation.

There were only three cities with a FPC above the standard deviation…

Most Feminist American Cities

1. Seattle – Tacoma

Even though it's only the 15th most populated center in America, it had the highest FPC, scoring 2.77 standard deviations above the mean. For those of you who don't know math, let me tell you that that's insane. I've never been there before so can someone tell me is it just a city of ugly feminists walking around with Skrillex haircuts and stupid tattoos?

2. San Francisco – Oakland – San Jose

This should be no surprise to anyone. San Francisco is gay hipster central, Oakland is hippie Occupy central, and San Jose is Man Jose, though I hear the latter does have some beach babes. This metropolitan area scored 1.23 standard deviations above the mean.

Loading…

3. Washington DC

My hometown, whoooooo! I've written extensively about how DC is a horrible place for men so I'm almost proud that it made the list. DC scored 1.07 standard deviations above the mean.

Other cities that scored high: Austin (0.75), Boston (0.62), Portland (0.56)

No heterosexual man who cares about his mental health and penile well-being should live in the above cities. Now let's go the other way and list the three cities that have the least feminists per capita…

Least Feminist American Cities

1. Houston

I know nothing about Houston except that they have oil. Its standard deviation was -1.19.

2. Miami – Ft. Lauderdale

Sexy Latina women have absolutely no use for a feminist ideology that makes it harder for them to find a provider husband. It had a score of -1.10.

3. Dallas

It can't be an accident that conservative Texan cities are also least feminist, while keepin-it-weird-and-gay Austin went the other way. Dallas had a score of -1.07.

Other cities that scored low: Phoenix (-0.93), Atlanta (-0.82), Baltimore (-0.57).

So there you have it—mathematical data on where feminists choose to nest. If you live in the top 3 feminist hellholes, you might want to think about getting out. I know I'm glad I did.

Don't Miss: The Death Of Ladies Night In America

When Fatties Attack

January 19, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

The two girls in the above video got kicked out of a punk show. Probably for being fat. To put this into context the show was a reunion of the legendary powerviolence (punk) band Infest. Their lyrics are standard punk fare: misanthropic, fuck authority (read: the police), be your own person, etc.

> Shackled down under control > life is acting playing the role > don't speak out do as you are told > fucking clone fitting the mold > stay in line with the rest > claim you're a 'freebird' but never left the nest > sport individuality seems more like conformity > say you're a black sheep but that's still a sheep
> I hope I never fucking sink that low!

Funny enough these days the scene is inundated with feminist ideology and manginas. You'll see the same people at a punk show as at the Warren Farrell protest. They are the same closed minded conformists Infest was talking about in the late 80s. However, I think attitudes are changing. No longer are men putting up with womens' childish temper tantrums which are based on a need for the attention of and the submission to a quality man.

The Good:

- "World Star" is being shouted while the girls cause trouble. The crowd doesn't take their temper tantrum seriously.
- Bouncers do their job. Same with the promoter.
- The crowd is mostly male. Girls like this go to shows to get sloppy drunk and have their tits fall out when they try to mosh with men twice their size.
- Guy in the blue stands up for himself when he is attacked by saying "I'll stomp you in the face bitch" at 1:06
- They're completely humiliated. People are laughing at them and not giving them the attention they want. They steal the pylons and fall over at 1:40 (is that dude peacocking?)
- "It was more funny than anything watching these girls trying to get sympathy from the crowd, in the way that they kept yelling 'assault' and other things… They straight-up yelled 'stop hitting me' when all security was doing was defending themselves." (source)
- No white knighting.
- The youtube comments.

The Bad:

Loading…

- Audience shouting man-up to either the bouncers or the chicks. Maybe they're mocking them. They shout it near the end too. Maybe they're mocking the girls' beliefs.
- The only female in the audience at 0:58 tells the girls "it's ok" to just placate them.

The Ugly:

Punk shows were always a masculine space. There was camaraderie, people felt part of something bigger than them, and the mosh pit was physical enough to release aggression. The girls in the video above ruin this. They create drama and even worse, dudes trip over their own dicks to try and bang them. Is this video a sign of things to come? Are men fighting back and pushing women and feminist ideals out of their traditionally masculine spaces? Or are the men just sick and tired of women acting like children and expecting special treatment?

Don't Miss: Feminists Try To Debunk False Rape Culture With False Data

The Easiest Way To Seal The Deal

January 20, 2013 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

---

[image]
So you've gone on a date or two with a girl and you've been unable to bang her. Maybe one of you is underage or doesn't have an ID so you couldn't take her out for drinks, or you just have bad logistics so you couldn't take her back to your place afterwards. Or she simply just wasn't DTF. You're frustrated by your lack of progress and need a sure fire way to cut to the chase and isolate your girl in a sex location. What do you do?

Guys in their late 20's or above will often use the classic "wine and a movie" at their place on the 2nd or 3rd date to seal the deal, but this is simply too mature a date for a young girl. After all, the wine that young people drink these days usually comes straight out of a goon bag. Instead, I have always told my peers to bring girls over to their place to "hang out" and smoke weed. It's that easy. It never ceases to amaze me how few young men actually think to use smokeups as a swoop move.

If your place isn't available due to strict parents, ask your friends if you can use theirs. If you have a dormmate, ask nicely if he can disappear for the night. If a girl smokes often (unlikely), tell her to come over for a "compression session," which is smoking up in an enclosed space where none of the smoke can escape. This only elevates the high further, and can also be done in the backseat of a car (great isolation move at house parties) or in a tent in your backyard. Do whatever you need to do to get her to a place where you can bang while she's fried and in the mood.

Smokeups can even be used to easily isolate girls that you know well from school or college without having to do any official dates. This is because meeting up to smoke weed can be rationalized as just friends hanging out and does not have the romantic connotations that coming over for "wine and a movie" does. But of course after some flirting, weed, and touchking, one thing leads to another and your belt is notched. What better way is there to get the hottie from across your dorm hall over for some floorcest?

Lastly, the way to frame a smokeup date is to pair it off with another activity. For example, "Let's smoke weed and watch a movie". After it finishes put on some chill, relaxed music like The xx, The Weenkd or Erotic Lounge as you ramp up the escalation and seal the deal.

Super Relevant: Getting Arrested On The First Date

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

Juicing Will Kill You

January 21, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

In fact, everything will kill you – so you shouldn't try anything new ever. You also shouldn't be doing the things you're doing now or the things you used to do. That'll definitely super kill you.

Isn't the internet great? No matter what topic you choose to research, there's an Ivy PhD or MD out there touting the benefits while other equally credentialed specialists condemn it. Toss in the wacky comments section, and it's nearly impossible to make an educated decision on anything anymore.

I'm not a juicing expert. In fact, I have only been juicing for a little over a month. I first became aware of juicing about six years ago when my parents started doing it, but I never really considered it as a topic worth researching until I started reading Juicing for Men. To my parents, juicing is about fresh orange juice and some miracle cure-all concoctions to make them take fewer piss breaks during the night. They swear it works, so good for them.

I'm not going to share my recipes or regimen with you, because I'm still perfecting it. All I'll offer is that I use juicing as a meal replacement 6 days per week, and on the 7th, I juice all day so that the organic produce I spent an arm and a leg for doesn't spoil. So far, I have experienced two benefits from juicing:

1. I have lost an average of 1.7 lbs per week since I started. I don't have much to lose, so these are the traditionally "stubborn" pounds people say are hard to drop. At this rate, I'll be at my ideal weight in three weeks. Note: my other meals are healthy and well-balanced just as they've been for years. Dinner was usually my "bad" or "unhealthy" meal, so that's the one I swapped out for juice.

2. I have a stressful job, and I have been taking an hour nap every day after work. After a week of juicing (including the one day juice fast) that ended. I haven't felt the need to "rest my eyes" after work since. It's not like I've gained a ton of energy, but I'm definitely less lethargic after the work day and the difference is noticeable.

But I'll leave the pro-juicing advice and the perceived benefits thereof to the people I trust to give solid advice. So make sure you check out Juicing for Men if the topic interests you. But before you hop over there and read, I want to point out a few things that bugged the living piss out of me while I was researching the pros and cons of juicing.

A nutritionist is not a Registered Dietitian. Anyone can call themselves a nutritionist. If I so choose, I can legally represent myself as the Chief Nutritionist at Return of Kings and even write books or articles – regardless of my education or lack thereof. A registered dietitian (RD) has been specifically trained, is allowed to conduct nutrition research, and is subject to the ADA. They must meet strict prerequisites and pass a national exam in order to achieve and maintain their credential.

Loading…

Most of the zany pro or anti-juicing advice you'll find out there comes from nutritionists, though many RDs have some unkind things to say about the practice as well. Here's the three major cons of juicing that surface the most from credentialed RDs:

1. What about the fiber?! Yes, it's true. When you juice, you're throwing away a ton of beneficial fiber. So if you happen to be one of those guys who comes home from work every day and feasts on six carrots, a pound of spinach, three stalks of kale, two tomatoes, beets, and a bushel-full of other greens, you might want to stick with that. However, if consuming half of a produce aisle is not a daily part of your diet, you might be better served with firing up the juicer.

2. Death! Microbes! Black Plague! Orrrrganisms! Ok, I can see that. So if you're a complete retard whose juicing practices include using a filthy juicer and letting your juice bake in the sun at room temperature by the window for two hours before consuming it, you might want to just stick with fresh foods.

3. Don't come crying to me when you're dead! If you suffer from Nephropathy as a result of advanced diabetes, consuming a sugar cocktail of 4 oranges and 3 apples three times a day may lead you to a premature dirt nap. Of course, this goes for a wide variety of chronic conditions, so always consult your medical provider before trying any new diet. That doesn't mean juicing is bad – it means bad juicing is bad.

That's it for me on the subject, so again, I'll defer to the experts from here on out. But I did want to share the benefits I've experienced and shed some light on the most commonly touted cons of juicing from my research. The purpose of this post was primarily to raise awareness of juicing and encourage you to do your own fact-finding.

Note: I am not suggesting that my juice blend helps me lose weight. But it does provide a nutritionally rich meal replacement that's far better than skipping a meal or using mass-produced chemical-laden alternatives such as Slim Fast shakes. Calories in vs. calories out has always been and shall always be the deal. Eat right and exercise – that's the key whether you juice or not. In addition, my extra energy may simply be from cutting out a shitty greasy dinner after I get home, and not the juice itself. But either way, I find juicing to be a tremendous asset as I strive to achieve, maintain, and sustain optimal health.

Don't Miss: Juicing: Flash In The Pan Or Growing Lifestyle Movement?

Learn To Be An Alpha From Athletes

January 21, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

To learn about the alpha male, one does not need to look any further than today's professional athletes. Athletes are the kings of the world with money, women, and fame. They are the modern Achilles, gods of the new age, and the ultimate alphas.

There was a recent debacle regarding Dwight Howard and Kobe Bryant in regards to the Lakers failing season, which brought up a discussion on being an alpha, and the butting of heads. Both men respectively shared their own opinions, which I believe gives a lot of insight to the general populace about what it really means to be an alpha.

In an attempt to compare the current situation in Los Angeles, Kobe was questioned by ESPN about the championship team with himself and Shaq.

> "That just wasn't going to last," he said, laughing. "You have too many alpha males. What do you think would happen if you put Jordan with Wilt? It's just not going to happen."

However , success in that situation did still happen. The Lakers won three championships during that period. So how did they do it?

> "One of them has to sacrifice. I sacrificed quite a bit with individual numbers and MVPs and NBA Finals and all this other stuff."

How does this apply to regular, everyday people? Simple. It's the same situation as when you go out. There is always an alpha male around. Both alpha's can have success with the women they are near, but there has to be some sort of respect and boundary limitation to allow both of them to run their game. The same goes for running wingman game with two alphas. As long as both men are willing to accept that the more attractive of two women is only going to pick one of them, they can still both have a successful night.

Loading…

Dwight also included some great insight on what it is to carry yourself as an alpha. This is a concept betas, especially those posing as alphas, usually don't understand.

> “If you’re an alpha male, you don’t have to always show that you’re the alpha male,” he said. “Just be who you are. You come in the room, people know you’re there.”

But how else are you supposed to assert your dominance and make sure every woman knows you are an alpha?

> “My presence is felt every day, and I don’t have to come here and growl and snarl at people. I don’t have to do all that.”

You shouldn’t be trying to run game by talking about how great you are, what you do, and what you own. The focus should be on doing whatever you need to do to leave with that girl, all while letting your presence reflect who you are. Alphas assert dominance through presence. Betas on the other hand attempt it through action.

Dwight basically sums up the key point of being an alpha with this last quote.

> “That’s who I am. I’ve been an alpha male my whole life, but I don’t go pissing everywhere to show people that I’m an alpha male. I just need to be who I am.”

What Dwight is really saying is, as an alpha you don’t need to be a dick or brag about who you are or how great you are. As an alpha that should be already known, or should be portrayed through a reflection of yourself through interaction. It’s like the old writing phrase goes, “show, don’t tell.” And that is how you should be running game; by showing, not telling.

So what does this really have to do with athletes? Simple. Athletes are the top dogs in the word. Biggest, strongest, fastest, and sometimes handsomest individuals. They have money, power, and the women. And yet, despite being at the very top, their idea of being an alpha isn’t any different than what it is to be an alpha in the local setting. In the end, it’s all the same concept.

Read Next: Why Swag Is Bad For Your Game

Economics In One Lesson

January 21, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a readable economics book that teaches you to look for secondary consequences of any policy. It closely follows libertarian thought while debunking economic fallacies that unfortunately are still promoted today. Highlights:

> Machines, technological improvements, economies and efficiency do not throw men out of work. […] It is a misconception to think of the function or result of machines as primarily one of creating jobs. The real result of the machine is to increase production, to raise the standard of living, to increase economic welfare.
>
> […]
>
> There is first of all a misunderstanding of what it is that has been causing prices to rise. The real cause is either a scarcity of goods or a surplus of money. Legal price ceilings cannot cure either.
>
> […]
>
> The best way to raise wages, therefore, is to raise labor productivity. This can be done by many methods: by an increase in capital accumulation i.e., by an increase in the machines with which the workers are aided; by new inventions and improvements; by more efficient management on the part of employers; by more industriousness and efficiency on the part of workers; by better education and training. The more the individual worker produces, the more he increases the wealth of the whole community. The more he produces, the more his services are worth to consumers, and hence to employers. And the more he is worth to employers, the more he will be paid. Real wages come out of production, not out of [minimum wage laws].
>
> […]
>
> The real cause for the tremendous increase in real wages in the last half century (especially in America) has been, to repeat, the accumulation of capital and the enormous technological advance made possible by it.
>
> Loading…
> […]
>
> If profits are limited to a maximum of, say, 10 per cent or some similar figure, > while the risk of losing one's entire capital still exists, what is likely to be the effect on the profit incentive, and hence on employment and production?

>
> […]
>
> Inflation itself is a form of taxation. It is perhaps the worst possible form, which usually bears hardest on those least able to pay.

You'll also learn:

- How when the profit motive is lessened through unions, regulation, or price fixing, producers will choose to invest abroad.
- How tariffs hurt both the consumer and producer
- How keeping interest rates unnaturally low creates economic distortions

The book leaned dry and read like a textbook at times, but chapters are short and examples lively. You want to keep going because you know you're reading something that will arm you against bad economics spouted by the media and politicians.

Overall, this is an economic red pill work that is logical and intuitive, ultimately advocating for capitalism with minimal government interference. It reminds you that economics is zero sum, that for anyone who benefits from a certain policy, someone else suffers, and that you must see both sides of the coin. Even though I took economics for a full year in college (macro and micro), this book gave me a better perspective of its real-world applications. Recommended.

Click here to download the PDF.

Read More: "Economics In One Lesson" on Amazon

9 Reasons Why You Should Say No To Fitness Gyms

January 22, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

By fitness gym I mean any gym that has a 50% female clientele and the yoga mats, aerobics classes, and exercise balls that go with it. Here's why you shouldn't bother with these establishments…

1. They are stocked with machines that prevent injury, not build muscle. Good luck finding a squat rack in a fitness gym. Instead you'll have Smith machines which are designed to make you think you can lift more than you actually can.

2. People go to socialize, not lift heavy ass weight. People are on their iPhones more than they're on the Cybex machines, which are already half useless. Everything is occupied by people who take forever because they have to send a text message between every set.

What the fack is this?

3. Signs that say "Don't drop the weights." If after your last deadlift rep your hands don't feel like giving way and dropping that bar, you're not doing enough. I'm not saying to be one of those guys who drops an overhead clean from the sky, but weights are meant to be dropped.

4. Neverending bicep curl. Hey man do you think I can cut into your 30 minute arm shredding workout with the 20 pound dumbbell so I can use them?

5. You have to witness guys spit horrible game. Hey look, there's a guy with a pot belly trying to show a girl correct form, but his form is not correct and he's not going to bang her.

Loading...

6. You pay for classes and equipment you don't need. A squat rack is cheap, but a treadmill is not, along with having to keep fitness classes stocked with trainers. You end up paying higher prices for equipment you don't use.

7. The intended market is women who don't know any better, not strong men. Today you even have gyms that don't allow grunting. How am I going to push this 200 pound bar above my chest without making noise? Should I whisper?

8. People take up space doing crazy exercises that are the equivalent of a minor stretch. My fitness gym (yes, I'm a sucker) has fat guys pulling on jump rope that's wrapped around the pull up bar. How long is he going to take before I can do a real exercise on the thing?

9. The New Years resolutioners. You know you're at a real gym when come January 1 you see no new faces. But at a fitness gym you have to put up with a horde of proles who you know don't have the will to lift heavy weight like you do.

"I'm going to wait until January 1 to improve my body"

There's an easy way to avoid all this nonsense: go to gyms that don't have any women. They're cheaper and guaranteed to have a squat rack.

Read Next: How To Workout Correctly

Racism Is A Feminist's Best Friend

January 22, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

At my gym, I became friends with a man named Antoine. He is classically black American. Tough guy, friendly, and charismatic, but broke because of a divorce that resulted in him losing custody of his children. His child support payments were overbearing and he had already lost his driver's license due to unpaid arrears (of which there was compounding interest on), and he had a court order to pay up on past due payments or else he would go to jail.

Like all black men I knew, he voted for Barack Obama. Like all men I knew who fell behind on child support payments, one day Antoine disappeared from the gym. I haven't seen him since Obama got his second term.

I've spent a lot of time in the manosphere. I've learned from the manosphere, I've taken from the manosphere, and I've given back to the manosphere. It has become my internet home. Like anyone accustomed to a living situation, they can tell you what is good and what is bad about their home.

And the topic I'd like to discuss is the worst part of my home; it inheres this from American men in general.

The issue is racism. The amount of bigotry, discrimination, and downright malevolence men have towards other men of different races is staggering. At first, I couldn't believe it. But after spending years posting on the RooshV Forums, I noticed that race topics caused a lot of anger. Real anger, resulting in bans, men quitting the forum, men putting each other on ignore lists, and hostility that would spill over from one thread into the next.

The internet, being the great place it is for anonymous discussion, allows men to reveal their true feelings on a subject, and when it comes to race it is obvious there is a deep, longstanding, and malicious grudge between men of various races in America. It is saddening to watch men hate each other over race.

But the racial infighting between American men wouldn't be so bad if it weren't for the political consequences.

Women, if you haven't noticed, do not fight with each other over racial conflicts. They might get angry over the past, but they are able to resolve all issues by agreeing on a scapegoat: the white man. Colored women will gladly forgive their white sisters, since, after all, it was the white man who oppressed women and minorities.

White men are the big, bad, evil masters, and as such, all females of different colors can agree to put aside their differences in order to bring the white man down.

When I got my first real job, it was as a therapist for one of the most left-wing state governments in the United States. The entire organization was run by women; on the first day of corporate training we had to go over why diversity was so important by reading this:

Target and Non-Target Groups

Types of Oppression	Target Grps	Non-Target Grps
Racism	People of Color	Whites
Class Oppression	Poor/working class	Middle/owning class
Sexism	Women	Men
Religious Oppression	Jews, Catholics, Muslims	Christians, Protestants
Ageism	Elders – 40+	Young people
LGBT	LGBT and questioning	Heterosexuals
Militarism	Vietnam Veterans	WWII, Korean, Gulf War Veterans
Adultism	Children	Middle-aged people
Immigrant Status	Immigrant	US born
Oppression of the physically different	Physically challenged, disabled, obese	Temporarily able-bodied persons

Out of the twenty new hirees in that room, I had fun as the only white man there. But I was shocked to see how deep feminism has sunk into the institutions of the United States.

When America had its Civil War, there were around 27 million whites, of which around a third lived in slavery south. Today in America there are over 200 million whites, and yet somehow these whites are to bear the blame of just 10 million racist whites in the past, but not the legacy of 17 million egalitarian whites. There are powerful interests who want to label white males as evil, so despite the absurdity of using past injustices to villainize whites the cultural brainwashing continues.

> "He who controls the past controls the future. He who controls the present controls the past."
>
> – George Orwell, 1984

Feminists, and their left-wing ilk, are some of the most politically savvy people I know. They recognize grudges and how to leverage them for political gain. Thus it makes sense that feminists are the biggest proponents of white male privilege memes that they indoctrinate the masses with. The more men of various colors are busy fighting and fearing each other, the less they will stand in the way of feminists. Divide and conquer – the most effective military tactic ever created.

I'm sure feminists must be extremely pleased with the latest election results: 80% of non-whites voted for Obama, while 60% of whites voted for Romney. Now, don't get me wrong. I'm not here to tell you how bad of a president Obama is or anything like that. I couldn't care less about telling you things that you already know: choosing between Democrat or Republican is like choosing between Coke and Pepsi.

Loading…

But put yourself in the feminist's shoes. The election results show that decades of brainwashing young American boys has been an unqualified success. Rather than have boys be loyal to their gender, boys have instead been trained to be loyal to their race.

Little non-white boys at the tender age of 9 years are fed lies about how white male oppressors created their poor living conditions, while white boys are taught that they need to correct the injustices of their forefathers lest they be guilty with the indelible sin of white privilege. Female teachers use the appropriate shaming tactics on these young minds to imprint the intended desire for conflict.

All according to plan. The following image is of a poster on a New England campus:

The Jewish man and black man gang up on the big bad white male rapist oppressor.

The intended effect is to have innocent boys grow into bigoted men. They form alliances with their respective races; they become distrustful of anyone without a similar skin color, and anytime questions this status quo of absurd race relations they are ironically labeled as racists. Of course men cannot outwardly display any hostility toward one race or another – that is against the rules – but should any man cross a racial taboo they face censorship, job loss, and possibly jail time due to "hate crime."

Thus men are forced to put on airs of being polite to every race, instead of voicing their true feelings to one another. This is important, because if men actually got around to an honest discussion of race in America it might result in less hostility between the races, which would mean a loss of power for feminists. Instead, they want men to keep their anger buried so that it will manifest itself at the voter box.

And should men start to get along too much, should men start to forget about their skin color for too long, feminists in the media will make sure to report more racial conflicts so they can maintain the political advantages that come with non-white men fighting white men. Can you imagine how easy it is for the news executives to report on race given the levels of racial indoctrination? I can hear their conversations now.

> "Oh? What's that? Some guy was fatally shot by the cops? Oscar Grant? …the fuck cares? Oh wait, Oscar was black? And the cop was white? Awesome. Put it on the front page."
>
> […]

> "So some black kid got shot? Huh? Trayvon Martin? Does anyone give a shit? Wait, wait, I'm sorry, did you say the shooter was white? His picture sure looks white. You mean he's actually hispanic? Well that's okay, because we can just call him a white hispanic."

The elites of this country couldn't give a damn about racial harmony. The only thing they see whenever a new race story comes to their attention: $$$$$$$$$. Men are pawns in the race game. Thus while American women feed themselves government largesse, jobs, university degrees, their husband's money, and child support money, American men fight each other over table scraps.

So we arrive at the red pill of race, which is to understand race as trivial; keeping your family and livelihood is better than sticking it to some bloke who just happens to have a slightly different genetic composition.

But until men realize that supporting their race over their gender is a one-way ticket to feminist hell, innocent men who happened to get involved with the wrong women, like my friend Antoine, will suffer over laws he unwittingly helped to pass by electing candidates he supported for racial reasons while ignoring their feminist credentials.

Just remember when white men and black men are arguing over whether or not affirmative action can counter the effects of Jim Crow laws, feminists make sure all women of all colors are included under affirmative action favoritism.

Just remember when white men try to defend their race by talking about "Human Bio-Diversity" and how other races are deficient in terms of intelligence, feminists make sure all women are respected for their intelligence regardless of their levels of achievement.

Just remember when blacks and hispanics claim there is systematic abuse toward non-whites in the court system, feminists make sure all women are given lighter punishments for the same crimes, are given the right to accuse men without any evidence, and make sure men are assumed guilty until proven innocent with laws like VAWA.

Ultimately, feminism is a political problem between men: women can only rule if men let them. So until there is that day when men of all colors can unite around a candidate, racism will always be a feminist's best friend.

Do feminists care about men of color? See for yourself: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

(Image h/t)

Single Women Want Your Money

January 22, 2013 | by Louie Grifon | Link | Original Link

The Atlantic's latest offering on sex and politics comes from two more female bloggers bent on kicking out the foundational structures of our once great society, and replacing them with something less upsetting to their childlike sense that everyone deserves a cookie. Why are they demanding these changes? So they can have a few more bucks in their purses, of course.

I swear you could write this stuff by formula. The ladies in question are Lisa Arnold and Christina Campbell, who run "a website about being single today," and this week their Fairness-Undermined-by-Patriarchy Alert Systems (F.U.P.A.S.) are blaring ALL HAMSTERS ON DECK because of the financial benefits that accrue to married people. They break these down into a number of categories: taxes, Social Security, housing, etc.

To give you a sense of the caliber of reasoning Ms. Arnold and Ms. Campbell bring to bear on this issue, check out their analysis of the unjustly high housing costs faced by single women:

> Our single woman making $40,000 spent $955,200 on housing over 60 years, whereas our married woman making $40,000 spent only $573,600. The married woman saves $381,600 in comparison to her unmarried equivalent.

This is because the married woman splits her housing costs with her husband. Put another way:

(Your Rent) > (Your Rent) / 2

The same holds true for (Your Mortgage Payment). The most fundamental operations in mathematics discriminate against single women, evidently.

Notice that, in the excerpt above, the authors have arrived at their totals by holding housing costs constant for 60 years. Your typical mortgage is paid off in 30 years. For more examples of their vain struggle with numbers, see basically every meaningful comment appended to the Atlantic's post.

There's more. Ms. Arnold and Ms. Campbell insist housing cost inequality goes beyond married couples splitting their rent payments. Why, singles could save all sorts of money on housing if only the government would…

> …provide housing options for alternative family structures or collective lifestyles that might benefit singles. Just one example might be a house or condo complex with several private bed/bath areas but a shared kitchen and shared living/dining room…

A house or condominium with "several private bed/bath areas" and "a shared kitchen and shared living/dining room." They have these already, you know. They're called multi-bedroom houses and apartments, and there are literally millions of them available, for rent or for purchase, all across America.

Small sampling of the housing options for single broads.

But okay. We've established that these authors' areas of expertise include neither math nor logistics. Still, even if you discard the trumped-up difference in housing expenses, they did find that over 60 years, a single woman of average income loses about $100,000 on things like taxes and Social Security as compared to a married woman with the same income. A single woman with more income ($80,000 annually) loses about $260,000 compared to her married equivalent.

Loading...

Let's pretend for a moment the authors nailed their calculations and these numbers are beyond question. Why are government policies saving married folks money? The authors say it's because marriage might make people "healthier and happier," and after all, the government is in the business of subsidizing your personal health and happiness.

This is wrong, and since Ms. Arnold and Ms. Campbell do run a website germane to this topic and are presumably informed about these things, I assume it's a deliberate lie. It is true that the government gives certain tax and entitlement benefits to married people. The reasons, however, are nothing so fuzzy as marginal improvements in self-reported happiness.

The government likes marriage because it makes people more stable, more productive, and more prosperous. The reasons for this are not complicated.

- Married couples have two salaries, or at least two eligible wage-earners. They spend more, they save more, and layoffs, accidents, illness, and all the other vicissitudes of life are less apt to land them (and their children) on the welfare rolls.
- Married couples are more involved in their communities. They split the time and costs involved in childcare and running a home. This means more money for charity, and more time for volunteerism and side businesses. Stay-at-home wives and wives who work part time once were (and in some American cities, still are) the lifeblood of PTAs, religious organizations, and all manner of volunteer groups. Careerist single women don't have time for quaint pursuits like strengthening the social fabric of their communities.

- And married couples raise better children, who perform better in school and, thanks to their parents' greater time and money, get to participate in more extracurricular activities.

Or look at it another way, one of the ladies in the crowd will appreciate: marriage is the ultimate form of welfare. It pools two people's resources to provide them with more freedom and financial security. Though it doesn't make married people into model citizens, it does push them in that direction. That is exactly the sort of thing I want my government to incentivize.

And while single people aren't deadbeats by default, you don't see a long row of hard-luck married women lined up outside your local welfare office. One survey found that 95 percent of women entering New Jersey's welfare program were unmarried. To all the single ladies paying more in taxes, just think of it as insurance against the rest of us having to underwrite your iPhone bills.

Not that I oppose government subsidies for high-res boob pics.

Of course, Ms. Arnold and Ms. Campbell's decision to run the numbers only for single women obscures the fact that single men like me also pay more in taxes and more for healthcare. If my sole interest were maxing out my checking account balance, maybe I could get behind this effort.

But as it happens, I would like to live in a prosperous nation, one where people raise their kids properly and have the time and money to help their neighbors. I may never get married myself, but I'm not going to cheerlead the atomization of our society through dismantling all incentives to marry.

Men who do get married are making one hell of a sacrifice for a good greater than their own. I'll happily pay a little more to avoid doing the same. And I'll keep calling out the shrikes, like Ms. Arnold and Ms. Campbell, who pretend their rootless profligacy makes them deserving of the same benefits given to married couples. Ladies, your situation may not be "fair," but there are things in this world more important than fairness.

Read More: Crazy Spinster: "Single Women Should Have Weddings!"

The 5 Easiest Clubs In The World To Get Laid

January 22, 2013 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

I estimate I've been to at least 500 bars and clubs in my lifetime, spread across 20 different countries. Some clubs are much easier to get laid than others due to variables like the layout, music, vibe, and culture. Here are the spots I recommend you visit if all you want to do is get laid…

5. Casa da Matriz (Rio de Janeiro, Brazil)

Brazil used to a be a popular place in the 80s and early 90s for American men to visit and get some easy loving from sexy women who were impressed with gringos. Times have changed: Brazil's economic miracle has created an entire class of snobby girls who rather play on their $1000 iPhones than give love to an American traveler. The top clubs of any major city will be stuffed with amazing talent, but unfortunately they won't give regular guys passing through much of a chance. You need to find a middle-of-the-road club that has nice girls who are still open to foreigners. In Rio, this place is Casa do Matriz.

Casa, as it's affectionately known, is a hipster rock club with cuties that don't mind flings with foreigners. In a country where one-night stands are not exactly easy, you should be able to get one here. Show up on the weekends before 12 to avoid the line, sip on some caipirinhas, and get ready to approach girls who speak English. This is where I met the most beautiful girl I've ever had sex with in my life.

Read More: Go To Brazil If You Look Like This Guy

4. Sticky Fingers (Gothenburg, Sweden)

Sweden women are positively portrayed in American media as blonde bombshells (the movie Dumb and Dumber comes to mind), but unfortunately this isn't the reality on the ground. What you have instead are chubby white girls who are obsessed with the hipster culture and think that wearing Chucks 24-7 is acceptable. The elite clubs have some of the Swedish hotties you probably hope for, but they are constantly surrounded by a social circle full of sniveling beta males hoping to get it in before Christmas. In a short trip you won't have access to them.

Your best bet if you're in Gothenburg, Sweden's second largest city, is Sticky Fingers, a two-floor rock venue that has acceptable Swedish women who are crazy about American men. I'm not exaggerating—once they find out you're American prepare for an automatic five minute conversation with very little effort on your part. With a bit of game it won't be hard to translate that interest into unprotected sex.

I like the semi-circle bar upstairs but the main bar downstairs is also good. The key here is not to be shy if a girl is with guys. Unless she's kissing or touching them, they're just friends and probably won't cockblock you when you start a conversation. Hell, he'll be impressed that you're American, too.

Read More: The Final Verdict On Swedish Girls

3. Bakken (Copenhagen, Denmark)

I've said it before and I'll say it again: Danish girls are ugly. Compared to other countries in Scandinavia, Denmark has by far the worst chicks when it comes to appearance and attitude. I don't know why this is but I strongly suspect inbreeding back from the days of Vikings. Nonetheless, if you find yourself stuck in the capital and still want to get laid, there's no better place to pull one-night stands than Bakken.

Bakken attracts a large cross-section of the Danish young set, from tattooed freaks to posh girls who don't care if they spill beer on your suit. The club is dank, cramped, and dark, making it a perfect venue to rub genitals with the opposite sex. There is even a back hallway behind the bar where you can get intimate without your other prospects for the night eyeing you.

There are two bits of advice I can give you if you want to smash: (1) go early on the weekend before the mammoth line develops after 12, especially in summer, and (2) hang by the main bar. There are going to be assholes who try to push you away from a prime bar spot but you have to be firm in staying because it's there where a nonstop procession of girls will brush against you to get their drink. They even may approach you outright.

Read More: Danish Girls Are The Most Masculine In The World

2. Bakkus (Reykjavik, Iceland)

It took me a while to figure out how to get laid in Iceland. I didn't understand that the people have a village mentality and don't want all their business on display to fellow villagers (the entire population of the country is around 350,000 people). While some of the young girls will slobber all over you face in public from not having yet developed a slut concealment mechanism, most girls want to be discrete. They don't want to be the girl who left her group of friends early to go hook up with a foreigner. So what's the solution?

Go to Bakkus at 3am, chill for an hour making small talk, and then approach girls in earnest starting around 4am, at a time when girls are splitting from groups. By then they'll be drunk and looking for a hookup. Ironically the very best time to approach in Iceland is on the weekend at 5am, right when the nightlife shuts down. Ask girls where the afterparty is and don't be surprised if you spin one at your apartment.

The interesting thing about Bakkus is that before 4am, it's really hard to get anything that leads to action. Save your energy for the final hour where you can probably score the easiest lay of your life.

Read More: How To Bang Icelandic Girls Using The Afterparty Move

We're now at the number one spot. Thee easiest club to get laid in the world is…

1. Milliklub (Helsinki, Finland)

Fellas, it doesn't get easier than this. I know no less than three other men who also got one-night stands here. The proof-of-concept test has passed with flying colors.
In Helsinki you should just ignore every other night venue if your main goal is to rack up notches.

The funny thing is that Milliklub is just a typical bar with a small dance floor. It's not obvious that sex will flow freely like Alpine water when you walk in, but soon you'll notice girls checking you out and approaching. You'll notice that everyone is getting fucked up. And you'll notice the amount of grimy dancing and hooking up that goes down on the dance floor. As long as you don't have high standards, it will be tough to fail here. I recommend starting on Tuesday night when it's ironically easier than the weekend. Make sure your hotel is close by so you can go for the old nightcap move.

Read More: 9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Finland (And Its Girls)

It's no surprise that most of the clubs on this list are in Scandinavia. God bless gender equality and the eradication of the slut concept, where girls have absolutely no problems sleeping with foreign men in record time. While clubs in other countries have better looking women (Poland, Estonia, and Croatia immediately come to mind), look no further than Scandinavia if your goal is fast sex. As long as you avoid the snobby clubs and focus on those that have a slight rock vibe to them, you won't go wrong.

10 Responses to The 5 Easiest Clubs In The World To Get Laid

1. Virgle Kent

January 23, 2013 at 5:11 pm
How did Tom Tom's in Adam's Morgan DC not make this list..... real talk

Reply

- Anonymous
  January 23, 2013 at 9:37 pm
  Gotta respectfully disagree, VK. Maybe 5-10 years ago Tom Tom's would have been on a list of easiest places — for DC.

  Except for the short cicada-like period of summer interns, there's a lot of attention whores not looking to hit it. And there's a lot of drunky and surly military dudes, ghetto guys from deep Southeast DC, and beta orbiters from MoCo cockblocking full-time there.

  Much better odds are available at:
  * Saturday night at BlackFinn on I Street,
  * Monday night half-price wine night at Clyde's – Rockville, and
  * in AdMo, True Story/Angry Inch/Draft Pix/About Last Night/whatever the fuck it's called now…

  Reply

2. Frederique
   January 23, 2013 at 6:24 pm
   Dont agree about milliclub. It was full of attentionwhores. The bigger clubs in Helsinki are better.

   Reply

3. Ruxman
   January 23, 2013 at 10:21 pm
   I'm gonna have to read bang iceland. I'm curious as to why Reykjavik has this late night/early morning swooping loophole.

   Reply

4. zac
   January 23, 2013 at 11:35 pm
   Well, this top 5 is certainly determined by one factor: YouR experiences. But I think it’s an interesting article., andI think this topic can serve to share expieriences of other people in other clubs all over the world.

The only one I have been to in your list is Casa da Matriz. I think this is a good place for one night stands, but the problem is that the girls are mostly not the most beautiful compared to other clubs (which you wrote yourself in ‘Gheridge’, which doesn’t mean of course that there aren’t cuties at all. Also it’s a rock bar, so sometimes you just see hipster chicks headbanging on bad music. But there is also electronic music and I was lucky there too. In Rio you just have to try another club every week because there are so many, and they all have a different atmposphere, and I certainly would’t say CdaM was the best.

In my opinion touristic party destionations (most important facor) are the best (ex. Cancun, Ibiza,Mykonos,..), people on vacation are very open to one night stands because they are away from home and don’t have a reputation to care about. Research revealed that 34 % of the women on holiday have a vacation love.

Reply

5. anon123
January 24, 2013 at 4:41 am
if you like hot finnish girls that dress like pin-up models go to navy jerry’s in helsinki. it has a great vibe and good music and lots of hot chicks if you arent into typical plastic club trash

Reply

6. OttoAu
January 24, 2013 at 4:56 am
I thought #2 and #3 said bukkake..lol :-)

Reply

7. Pingback: Daily Linkage – January 24, 2013 | The Second Estate

8. Jack shit
January 24, 2013 at 2:59 pm
Im Skandinavian and i can seriously tell you Guys that the idea of coming all the way over here to feel a little bit better about yourselves through getting make outs or getting laid with Scandinavian girls is a bad idea. First of all scandi girls are not easier than American girls, second even if you do get laid shell find a way to strip you of that warm fuzzy feeling before you leave anyway, third you have to humiliate yourself in one way or another before shell sleep with you. Save the airfare and buy a hooker. If you don't believe me, come anyway and be surprised, there is a reason why Scandinavian guys have a reputation for being beta, it's called social pressure. If you still disagree I challenge you to try get and keep a job here while still being so awesome and American alpha.

Reply

- Anonymous
  January 24, 2013 at 6:25 pm
  What a defeatist fuckin' attitude.

  Maybe you should bother reading one of Roosh's books, so you can figure out how to sleep with a girl from your country without demeaning yourself.

  After you learn some game and have the balls to run it properly, get back to us with your whining.

  Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

Welcome To Post-Gender Happytopia®!

January 23, 2013 | by Bronan The Barbarian! | Link | Original Link

---

Welcome to Post-Gender Happytopia®, the most non-offensive, gender role-free theme park in the Person's Republic of PoliticallyCorrectia (formerly Sweden)! Won't you please step inside? Care for a glass of warm soy milk? You're very welcome! Please remember to check your privilege at the door.

As you can see, we've renovated our theme park to remove the phallic Gender Construct Towers and replaced them with non-offensive NeuterDomes. Feel free to pick out your very own pair of cargo shorts from our Gender-Neutral Gift Shop! They come in XL or XXL. No, I'm afraid we don't have smaller sizes here in Happytopia®. Please check your thin privilege. Thank you. While we're here, would you like to purchase a Non Gender-Specific Androgny Playset™ for your BoyGirl or GirlBoy? S/he will certainly derive a government-mandated amount of enjoyment should you choose to do so!

HAPPYTOPIA® PATRIARCHY ZOO™

Time for the next section of our tour – the Patriarchy Zoo™! Please enter NeuterDome 573b. Inside, we have the last existing specimen of the "Y" chromosome safely contained behind three feet of BPA plastic. Please feel free to purchase a soy bar from the vending machine in order to assist handlers with feeding "him." Oh my goodness! I see that "he" displayed unnecessary male privilege in your general direction. I'm sorry for any oppression you may have experienced! Please take a complimentary Estrogen Pill. You're welcome.

Loading…

Let's make a quick pit stop at the Happytopia® Restroom just in case you've consumed a little too much soy milk. You'll notice that we've done away with phallocentric urinals and replaced them with oppression-free unisex bathrooms. Remember to urinate while sitting!

Next up it's the Happytopia® PC Respect 'N Reeducation Classroom™, located in NeuterDome 4C12E. Please sign up for the class of your choice. Thank you. We offer topics such as:

- Polyamory 101: Love Thy Neighbor

- The Incorrect Wrongness Of Heteronormativity
- Practical Application Of Guilt In Everyday Life
- Gynecomastia And You
- History of the Skrillex Haircut

I regret to inform you that we're nearly finished. I hope you've enjoyed your tour through Post-Gender Happytopia®, and remember to schedule your mandatory sex-reassignment surgery before you make your way back to your Volkswagen Beetle. Thank you!

Read More: The Anti-Male Commercial

7 Traits Of The Male Feminist

January 23, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

The only reason radical feminism has managed to achieve such an influential and mainstream position in Western society is through the vital reinforcements provided by turn-coat gender traitors who willfully cannibalize other men to please their female overlords. This is the male feminist. These are men whose entire personas are predicated on keeping others from offending their female bosses. They shame natural male behavior and spread the intellectualized delusion that are today's feminist talking-points.
They publicly self-castrate, lying to themselves and others about their own sexual impulses and imperatives.

The great irony—and secret—is that they have the same ends as guys who learn game: to get the women into the sack (loath as they may be to admit it), except they do it by trying to curry their favor through obsequious groveling.

There's nothing special about the specimen in the video above, except his exceptionally typical display of the tell-tale symptoms.

7 Traits of the Male Feminist

1. Lispy, effete voice.

There's good science that shows that today's men are being exposed to greater quantities of female hormones. Among the causes is a contaminated water supply with trace amounts of birth-control compounds from women's urine. The mass consumption of soy products—a natural source of estrogen—is another likely culprit. Whatever the origins, there is an epidemic of ostensibly heterosexual men with "gay voice," none more clearly than the male feminist, who deliberately takes the bass and manly tone out of his voice so as to not offend.

2. Condescending, snarky girl-tone and eye-rolling.

Added to the character of his voice is a patronizing, dismissive tone (often with "upspeak" and vocal fry) common with obnoxious teenage girls and a certain cross-section of (actual) gay men. Rather than disagree with an argument on its merits, they sigh through it like Al Gore at a presidential debate. To make matters worse, he artificially laces his speech with profanity, which rather than toughness, comes off like a moody girl cussing at her boyfriend.

3. Slovenly appearance, featuring a vegan-style beard.

The uniform of the male feminist is a non-threatening cocktail of emasculating hipster-wear, with an unkempt beard—the badge of today's weak guy—and anything else that makes it patently obvious he never hits the gym and poses no danger whatsoever to anything.

4. Parrots word salad of incoherent feminist talking points.

The male feminist repeats all of the made-up jargon of the hysterical feminist (science fiction-sounding utterances like “cis-gender” and “sex-positive”). They also participate in the misappropriation and abuse of once-sound, useful English-language words like “consent,” “patriarchy,” and “privilege.”

Loading...

5. Rape alarmist.

Like any lock-step feminist, the male feminist drops the Rape Card several times in any discussion, irrespective of subject. Like the word “smurf” in the 80s cartoon, the word “rape” is slowly being eroded of meaning by its catch-all use for anything and everything. The goal of this repeated invocation is to further whip up an exaggerated hysteria around rape, make everyone believe there’s a rapist on every corner, and make it sound like everyone’s whispering “rape jokes” when women aren’t looking. I can count on one hand how many rape jokes I’ve heard in my entire life, and still have enough fingers left over to stimulate the clitoris of a pixie cut-wearing, female-bodied individual.

6. Enabling feminist hysteria by providing excuses for bigoted behavior and by demanding that others also walk on egg shells.

According to this guy—and all feminists—it's okay to be permanently scared of men if you've ever been victimized by them, however real or imagined that victimization may have been. By this rationale, I can permanently remain "apprehensive" and "have fear" of black people "as a category" because I was once robbed, at gun point, by a black guy. Furthermore, he excuses feminist hate-speech as simple "making-fun-of-you" not to be taken seriously, while simultaneously labeling anything said by the opposing side as 100-percent-serious hate-speech.

7. False veneer of intellectualism and academic grounding.

To lend some kind of legitimacy to his specious, problematic logic, he cites oblique academic-sounding references in a poorly constructed straw-man argument about what "men's rights advocates" use to prove the existence of misandry. He engages in the typically feminist mental acrobatics that—when it's all said and done—have turned night into day, made up into down, and rendered men into women.

Like any outsider-turned-convert to a religion, the male feminist is always more radical—and dangerous—to the non-believer. If, like many men, you have the misfortune to have to be around them, tread carefully. Always looking to prove his loyalty, the male feminist will do everything in his power to cut down a confident, masculine man—fabricating stories, running to the authorities, and anything else to throw you under bus—all to (hopefully) score a few points with his female overlords.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Help Raise Awareness About Rape Tourette's

8 Great Lifestyle Cars For Under $15,000

January 24, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

The debate regarding the automobile and its relation to one's value in the sexual marketplace has been ongoing for some time, with some overstating the car's value as a tool of attraction.

While the automobile has little potential to serve as the pussy panacea some wish it would (unless you can afford something like this), it is still worthwhile for guys to get their car game on point as a part of a more comprehensive lifestyle improvement program and create a useful image with which to market themselves.

To that end, I've taken the time to recommend eight cars that are fairly cool, cheap, reliable, and affordable for a guy just beginning to improve his lifestyle game and looking to get a ride that fits the bill. I designed this list with a budget in mind-each car listed can be had used and in decent condition for $15,000, in some cases much less.

1. Nissan 350Z (Coupe or Convertible)

The existence of the newer, faster 370Z has helped to make these pretty cheap, but they still look good and make for a great value. Good examples of these can be found in the $13-14k range without too much effort, and they get cheaper than that if you're willing to deal with higher mileage (90,000 or more on the clock).

These are some of the better affordable droptops on the market too, if that's your style.

2. Infiniti G35 (Sedan or Coupe)

The G35 is based on the 350Z, and like that car is a great value. You get a little more luxury here and thus pay a little more for a G35 Coupe than a 350Z Coupe. The G35 sedans can get dirt cheap if you're willing to tolerate a higher mileage example, and they're not a bad deal either. This is a fitting ride for a young professional guy.

3. Pontiac GTO

Here's a value muscle car. Built in Australia (an Aussie/Kiwi reader here might recognize the Holden Monaro), the GTO was offered in the USA for a short three year run under the now defunct Pontiac name. The result was one of the best values on the market, and it still is. You can now have this 400hp RWD V8 monster for well under $15,000.

4. Acura TSX

This is a small sedan based on the Japanese/European version of the familiar Accord, which itself is the smaller, sportier vehicle that the much thinner folks in the rest of the world get to buy.

We pay a little more for ours here in the states because we get them under a more premium brand, but these are still pretty cheap. As little as $10-12k will get you into a decent 04.

5. Acura TL

Loading…

I think that the 01-03 TL is one of the more underrated values on the used car market, and a solid option for a young guy working his way up. A sporty, well-kept Type-S like the one pictured here can easily be had for less than $15k. They're reasonably luxurious (leather, sunroof, etc), they look decent and they're dirt cheap.

They have some transmission issues in the higher mileage ranges, but you can mitigate that by going for a lower mileage example (you'll still spend way less than $15k).

If you want the next generation (04-08), you'll fork out a bit more, but $15k will still get you a pretty well-kept car.

6. Lexus IS300

$13k will get you a decent 2004 or 2005 model without too much mileage. These are a great value and extremely well put together. They aren't as sharp on the track as the E46 3-Series, but they have fewer expensive bugs in other areas and I personally prefer this design. I wanted one of these myself to head off to college in, but couldn't make the financials work.

7. Cadillac CTS-V (04-05)

You'll have to tolerate higher mileage (above 85,000, generally) to find one in this price range, and they aren't abundant, but this is a car that might be worth the effort. They're not terribly efficient and the build quality isn't perfect, but you'll be hard pressed to find something that will take you faster while looking quite this good and costing you quite this little.

8. Chevy Cobalt SS

This is a surprisingly decent car considering the general mediocrity associated with the Cobalt name. It comes standard with a stick, a plus for the diehards who have watched the manual become a dying breed these days. They're easy to modify, perform very well, and get solid gas mileage too (owner reports indicate up to a possible 40mpg on the highway).

$13k will allow you to easily find a nice unit somewhere with well under 50k on the clock. This is more of a "budget" type of car than the others on this list, but it is a strong enough value to belong.

Honorable Mentions:

- Mitsubishi Lancer Evolution (03-07)
- Volvo S60R (03-07)
- BMW M3 (02-04)

There do perhaps exist other options, but these are the cars on top of my personal list, vehicles I'd trust if I were on the market. If you're a guy on a budget but looking to get a ride that fits the upwardly mobile trend in your personal and professional life that ROK hopes to facilitate, then these cars should be on your short list.

Read Next: Why Adopting A Frugal Mindset Will Hurt You

Only 29,000 Men Remained

January 24, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In 1865 Paraguay began a war with Uruguay, Argentina, and Brazil. Paraguay's leader at the time, Carlos Antonio López, decided to fight until the death…

> Because López had drafted every man in Paraguay, there was no labour to work the fields, and starvation set in. Many who subsisted on bitter wild oranges succumbed to cholera, malaria and dysentery. As able-bodied men died, López recruited a new army of wounded and child soldiers. He armed them with sticks painted to look like guns, disguising the youngsters with fake beards. The army's original red uniforms had dwindled to rags; rain seeped through ponchos made of shredded carpets. Eventually they fought naked.

López's refusal to give all almost wiped out Paraguay's population…

> According to a rough-and-ready post-war census, just 29,000 males over the age of 15 were left in Paraguay. One observer called the survivors "living skeletons…shockingly mutilated with bullet and sabre wounds". Jaguars roamed freely and feasted on human flesh. Women wandered the streets naked.

This is no doubt horrendous, but I couldn't help but imagine what it would have been like to be one of the 29,000 males who survived. Once there was some stabilization, and women were ready to have sex again, the ensuing party must have been amazing.

One reason for the mangina and white knight phenomenon we have in America today is that that the male to female ratio has shot to the moon due to lack of horrible wars that could dispose of excess males. This is great for all of us who don't have to fight in wars and risk death, but now we have to fight war into the sexual marketplace to get sex. While I wouldn't wish for men of my country to die in war so that I could get laid more easily, that was a clear benefit for surviving males of the past that we no longer get to experience. Yesterday's cannon fodder is now your competition in the club today.

Loading…

How about this for a thought experiment: a new virus attacks only the male penis and results in an ebola-like illness that kills 95% of all men on Earth. You are one of the lucky 5% who survive. Your male family and friends are all dead. Utilities are no longer running and even the internet has shut down. The world seems to be crumbling around you, but now when you step out of the house, you see nothing but females who wonder if they will ever be with a man again.

They seem to act like friendly zombies when they see you—running up to ask if you need help, if you're alone, and if you want some baked goods. They compliment you on your "strength" for surviving and even your appearance, something that rarely happened before the virus.

All the post-apocalyptic females seem to close the deal in the same way, asking if you could come over to their apartment to change the batteries on their radio. In the next year you end up having so much sex that your dick is in a permanent state of rawness, and you've lost count how many children you've sired, none of which you are required to provide for.

Is this scenario true happiness for men? Or is just something we'd get used to and eventually tire of? I'm not entirely sure, but I wouldn't mind experiencing it just to see.

Read Next: Sterile Warfare Is Not As Sterile As You Think

Taking The Red Pill Destroyed My Family

January 24, 2013 | by bojangles | Link | Original Link

Indians and tribalism go hand in hand, whether it's in ethnicity or even within households and extended family. Personally I can count the number of guys who are red pill and Indian on one hand. I am sure there are plenty out there but I've yet to come across them, in fact I have found that most Indian guys my age are just standard betas who bow to the will of their fathers and wives.

The psyche here comes from Indian families and how they work. By the age of 23-24 your parents/uncles/aunts and practically everyone in the generation above you is on your ass about getting married and finding a girl, constantly hooking you up on pointless blind dates. Most Indian guys easily succumb to that pressure and fulfill the wishes of their parents.

Asian family hierarchy is traditionally set in stone. Once a man marries and has a child, he automatically ascends to alpha in his household, even above his own father, who still tries to remain top of the perch but inevitably falls. If you don't follow this 'natural course' that being an Indian seems to dictate then inevitably that alpha male in your household will project his vision on you and do his best to make you do what he wants (get married and have bloody kids!).

I am still a bachelor at the grand old age of 28. According to my old man and my old dear I am past due and will soon find no-one to spend my life with. This was a conversation with my dad on my birthday when I turned 25:

> Father: "Don't you want to get married son and settle down? You can't be a bachelor forever you know? "
>
> Me: "Not yet, I'm fine, just want to have fun with as many girls as I can."
>
> Father: "Son there's only so many holes you can poke into the wall!"
>
> Me: "I know dad but my wall is the Great Wall of China"

He laughed and of course even I bloody did. Inside though he was rueing it, he knew it and suspected his downfall. My brother at that time had also been waging a war path in the house asserting his authority. I was the oldest son, having not lived under his roof for 10 years, so he had already lost his authority over me. He was not accepting that his time to rule his tribe has gone, and that neither of his sons would be getting married and having children.

On a fortnightly basis my very traditional mother did her best, ringing me to ask if I had a girlfriend and why I wasn't looking. She'd know of 'some girl' who is 'only' between 26-29. At 25 I had just started 'game,' but as that year went on I immersed myself more and more into the real reality of dating and what my value as a man was. Now I started to understand what I needed to do, with marriage nowhere on my list. Slowly I started to find more women interested in me compared to my barren years in my early 20s.

I got tired of my mother's bitching, the woman whose siblings' children were all getting married and having 'fairytale' Indian weddings. I knew that my mother wanted a wedding for herself in Indian culture, a status-showing occasion more for parents than an actual celebration of the marriage. She wanted to buy all the glamorous sarees, jewelry, and clothes. She wanted to pretty up a couple of banquet halls and show off my old man's wealth.

Loading...
My dad soon increased his badgering:

- "All your friends from school have got married now!"
- "Son you're getting old, all the good girls are gone!"

I couldn't believe he was shaming me. I snapped. I told my mother in plain simple words to stop harassing me to do something that I didn't want to do, to stop trying to set me up with women I didn't want to see, and to stop shaming me into getting what she wants at my expense—a wedding. My mother told my father, and he promptly disowned me over the phone. He was appalled that I would talk to my mother like that and not take their advice. He was appalled that I was not doing what they wanted and said how he was ashamed that I was his son. He told me I should not bother to phone or contact them. That was it, the end.

My father held sway not just over his own household but also over his brother and his sisters. Suddenly I found myself ostracized by my whole extended family, too. He told them not to speak to me and not to let me in their houses. Indian culture ingrains heavy involvement with your extended family as natural order—my friends were my cousins, the places I'd hang out were their houses, and a lot of my social life was heavily integrated with this extended family. If I fell into hardship these were the people I could rely on to help me, but no more.

Six months months later, my father phoned me. He offered a half-arsed apology and said he wanted to talk. I agreed but felt there was another motive behind it. I made the journey back home a few weeks later to see what was going to happen. I walked into a warzone.

My brother had decided that if my parents would disown me for not listening to them then he would take preemptive action and disown them first, which he did. He told me he lost all respect for them, and had not spoken to either of them despite living in the same household. At the same time, my mother had been at my father's throat because he wouldn't let her call me. She felt she had lost both her sons because of him and wanted to leave and move to her brother's house. My father was on the verge of giving up. After working his ass off since the age of 16, he was wealthy enough to retire and live a relaxed life. He wanted a ceasefire.

One day I sat them all down and sternly explained why I made the choices I made. I told them I would not yield. My father reluctantly accepted what I said while my mother put on a strained smile that showed her pain in having to let go of the magical wedding. My brother? He was just happy I was back and now “in charge.” I’m in charge? Yes, somehow I’m now king of my tribe. My mother is pacified and my father is going on about he’s happy if we’re happy. I thought taking the red pill caused me to lose my family for good, but the values it taught me helped me get them right back.

Read More: Woman Abandons Her Family, Gets Paid $85,000

How To Bang A Brazilian Woman In 5 Easy Steps

January 25, 2013 | by Maverick Traveler | Link | Original Link

Of all the women I've been with it's hard to beat the sheer sexiness and beauty of the Brazilians. They're also super friendly and easy-going, not to mention some of the best lays I've had in my life.

They're not, however, the easiest women to bed because one-night stands are less common when compared with the English-speaking countries and Scandinavia.

Not deterred by a few dates?

If so, here's how to do it in five easy steps:

1. Book a ticket to Rio de Janeiro

Rio de Janeiro is still the best city in Brazil to have fun with its sexy female residents. Doesn't really matter when you come, either — Rio is a hopping place year-round. And, no, you don't have to come during Carnival.

2. Go to Lapa on Friday and Saturday night

Grab a cheap beer or caipirinha from the street vendors then warm up by hitting on a few random girls. I've found the crowds before the Arcos (Arches) to be younger and less classy than the crowds after the Arcos (near the traditional Samba clubs such as Carioca da Gema). On Fridays there's more of a street-party feel, while on Saturdays people usually head to the clubs.

3. Hunt at the club

My favorite Lapa club is Rio Scenarium, where, unsurprisingly, many of my bangs came from. I recommend showing up at the line not later than 10:30pm. In Rio, nightlife begins and ends early because Rio's residents (Cariocas) are primarily day creatures and would rather enjoy their days tanning at the beaches instead of nursing the previous night's hangover in bed. Once inside the club, approach relentlessly. Brazilian nightlife is all about "hunting" so don't be shy about approaching and getting rejected quickly.

Brazilian girls kiss quickly so if she's still there 10-15 minutes into the conversation don't just stand there — grab and kiss her. If she rejected your kiss attempt, keep hunting — you'll have better luck seducing the next one than "convincing" her to kiss you again. Once you get the kiss spend some time with her before getting the number. Since it's rare — although not impossible — to bang the girl the very same night, you'll probably need more face time the next day before sealing the deal.

4. Meet her the next day

Brazil is not America, so don't wait a week before contacting her. If you got her number on a Friday or Saturday night and the following day is full of sunshine, you can be sure she's planning to go or is already at the beach. See if you she'd like to go to the beach, park or walk around the lake (Lagoa). Meeting her at the beach is also the perfect opportunity to see and feel her body when you're busy "saving her" from the "deadly waves" near the shore.

5. Transition to a bar and then to your place for the kill

As soon as the sun starts to set, feel her out and see if she'd like to grab a few choppes (draft beers) at a boteco (local bar). Grabbing a drink at a boteco is a very informal affair so unless she has other plans or doesn't want to bang you, she'll readily agree. My top pick is Devassa in Ipanema or Leblon but any bar is fine. Create an intimate environment by sitting next to her, touching her and making out. After an hour or two, ask her if she'd like to come over. If she doesn't give a quick no, assume a yes. Ask for the check and grab the next taxi. Once at your place, proceed as usual. Didn't get the bang? Simply repeat step 5 until you do.

Have fun hunting. :hump:

Read Next: The Pill That Cures Approach Anxiety

About the Author

Maverick Traveler swallowed the rid pill many years ago when he left America for Brazil, where he spent several years enjoying Brazilian women. When he's not busy seducing foreign women, you can find him ramble about travel, women and everything else at

MaverickTraveler.com

The Ascent Of Money

January 25, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Ascent Of Money by Niall Ferguson is an introduction to modern finance and the rise of money lending, presenting a favorable view of their effects upon the world.

> ...financial innovation has been an indispensable factor in man's advance from wretched subsistence to the giddy heights of material prosperity that so many people know today.
>
> ...poverty is not the result of rapacious financiers exploiting the poor. It has much more to do with the lack of financial institutions, with the absence of banks, not their presence. Only when borrowers have access to efficient credit networks can they escape from the clutches of loan sharks, and only when savers can deposit their money in reliable banks can it be channeled from the idle rich to the industrious poor.
>
> ...approximately $1 of every $14 paid to employees in the United States now goes to people working in finance. Finance is even more important in Britain, where it accounted for 9.4% of GDP in 2006.

The book gives an interesting history of some of the world's most famous bankers and the power they accumulated, particularly the Medicis and Rothchilds, who brought value by facilitating trade and commerce while reducing transaction prices. It also described the role of European bankers during the American Civil War.

> Though others had tried before them, the Medici were the first bankers to make the transition from financial success to hereditary status and power They achieved this by learning a crucial lesson: in finance small is seldom beautiful. By making their bank bigger and more diversified than any previous financial institution, they found a way of spreading their risk.

One of the biggest financial innovations was fractional reserve banking, pioneered by the Swedes. Other European countries improved finance while the Spaniards, still obsessed with silver and gold in their American colonies, kept defaulting time and time again, not understanding that the true nature of money lay in debt and not mineral reserves. One of the more interesting parts of the book was its description of the bond market and its powerful stranglehold on world governments.

> ...the bond market is powerful partly because it passes a daily judgement on the credibility of every government's fiscal and monetary policies. But its real power > lies in its ability to punish a government with higher borrowing costs. Even an upward move of half a percentage point can hurt a government that is running a deficit, adding higher debt service to its already high expenditures.

>
> Loading…
> …countries that defaulted on their debts risk economic sanctions, the imposition of foreign control over their finances and even, in at least five cases, military intervention.

While the book paints a rosy view of finance, it also highlights cases where the abuse of it through hook and crook caused problems for entire economies, particularly through price inflation. A recent example of that was Goldman Sachs' commodity manipulation that caused the price of common foodstuffs to rise. On the other hand, ignoring finance and having inflexible monetary policy can turn recessions into depressions. He suggests that Helicopter Ben Bernanke actually did the right thing in showering Wall Street with money to prevent a depression. He also thinks Alan Greenspan is a great man for admitting he shouldn't have kept interest rates so low.

> Economies that combined all these institutional innovations—banks, bond markets, stock markets, insurance and property-owning democracy—performed better over the long run than those that did not, because financial intermediation generally permits a more efficient allocation of resources then, say, feudalism or central planning. For this reason, it is not wholly surprising that the Western financial model tended to spread around the world, first in the guise of imperialism, and then in the guise of globalization.

You'll also read about:

- The abysmal effects of Britain's weflare system on their economy
- Argentina's failed destiny to become an economic superpower due to bad economic decisions and poor leadership
- How the "risk free" LTCM fund imploded and almost took the world economy with it

My problem with the book is that his explanations were too light. He glossed over tough concepts like sovereign bonds and other financial instruments without providing much in the way of examples, unlike a writer such as Matt Taibbi who explains the most complex concept in a way that laymen can understand. I felt like I had to read this book in front of Google so that I could look up things he mentioned only in passing.

The book also seemed hurried with its historical research, especially towards the end when it become a jumbled mess. Overall it's an okay book but I don't recommend it for the neophyte.

> …it's not owning property that gives you security; it just gives your creditors security. Real security comes from having a steady income.

Read More: "The Ascent Of Money" on Amazon

Average Never Got Anyone Anywhere

January 26, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Meet Joe:

At 34.4 years old Joe has done everything right in his life. He's married with two children and supports his family with a $32,000/year office job. Joe has a bit of money in the bank, but most of his salary goes to his mortgage and car payments. Having reached his physical prime at 23 Joe stopped exercising like he used to. At 5'9" 175lbs Joe can run an 8.5 minute mile, bench 160lbs and do one pullup.

Joe is content with his life, but a few months from now his wife will give him divorce papers because she found a new man named "Chad" who made her feel alive. Luckily for Joe his wife Jane was a kind woman. All she asked of him was to share the custody of their two children and help out with expenses until the children can follow in he and Jane's footsteps.

Joe is at his sexual prime and is not too far away from his financial prime. After the divorce he spends his time reminiscing about the 3 sexual partners he had before Jane. He'll be too scared to call up his high school sweetheart Jessica and will spend the rest of his days working a banal job, going home to watch TV, drinking beer, and eating fast food. He will die empty and completely alone after having sex with only 3 more women.

This is the average man according to various articles on the internet, but how many men do you see that have it 'worse' or 'better' than Joe? How many of you have friends who aspire to be nothing more than average or slightly above average. They'll tell you their plans about having sex with girls in university, getting a degree, then a good job, then a family. You'll ask them "Don't you want more?" they'll reply with dream cars, vacations, and children. Again you will ask them "Don't you want more?" and they will reply "What more is there?"

Loading...

What More Is There?

It is easy to see that “most men lead lives of quiet desperation and go to the grave with the song still in them.” This song is passion, ambition, drive, motivation, whatever you want to call it. It is the feeling of testosterone coursing through your veins and the thrill of accomplishment. It’s waking up every day and knowing that you are living for yourself, improving yourself, and doing anything you want to do.

It’s always great to be a man, but only if you work at it. When has the average guy ever done anything great? If you are reading this then you are more than likely far from average. If you set your mind to it you can accomplish more in a year than the average man will accomplish in his lifetime.

See Also: How Women Become Worthless

The Manosphere Is Approaching A Tipping Point

January 26, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In December I stated the following:

> The manosphere, long ignored by the American media, will be "discovered" in 2013. Bet on it.
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) December 2, 2012

This prediction wasn't exactly a leap of faith, for anyone who follows the manosphere could feel the wind filling our sails, but I didn't expect for it to start the very next month. Consider these recent events:

1. Taki Mag article: A Sex Tourist Swallows The Red Pill.

2. First appearance of the word "manosphere" on Wikipedia (see Norway section).

3. Viral explosion of Top 9 Ugliest Feminists with rage unlike anything I've seen, which culminated in an article in Australian media.

4. Article in The Independent suggesting that game is borderline rape.

Next up is a hit piece in the Daily Kos titled The New Misogyny.

> The community that characterize this misogyny call themselves the Manosphere, an interlocking network of blogs for "men's rights" activists (MRAs), pickup artists (PUA) and some online gamers. Unlike the mainstream conservative conceptions of women, the views espoused by the manosphere harkens back to what can only be described as a proto-fascist, and surprisingly, is becoming more popular on the internet.
>
> […]
>
> What's odd isn't just the intensity of the regression but also the completely apolitical nature of it. Unlike conservatives who view women's roles in a context of a broader political project, MRAs only interest is in women themselves, with little regard to politics insofar as it doesn't affect men's power over men. Indeed some of the hot button issues regarding women in American politics, from abortion to birth control are generally superfluous if not outright ignored by the community.
>
> Loading…

What strikes me in manosphere criticisms is the shock that our ideas are actually being accepted by men. I see many comments that go along the lines of "I don't believe this part of the web exists!" and "Why are people following this?!"

It's very simple: we provide answers for men. We help them get laid. We help them make money. We help them with travel. We help them enter relationships with feminine women. We help them lift heavy weight, become healthier, and improve their appearance. We help them navigate a rapidly changing world where men are being pushed aside.

I don’t understand why our critics are surprised that men gravitate to a community that gives them advice that works. In the end it simply comes down to value—the manosphere provides value for Western men who are increasingly being portrayed as privileged brutes that must be controlled like zoo animals. Astute men realize that complaints about the “gender wage gap” or “street harassment” are used as pretexts to assert female superiority through policies that only benefit women. If critics want to destroy the manosphere, all they have to do is provide the average men with value (they can start by having great sex with all the betas and white knights). But of course they won’t do that. They refuse to yield in any fashion.

Soon a tipping point will be reached, where the beliefs that are already shared here and on hundreds of small manosphere sites and forums will boil over the pot and reach other people who don’t even know that we exist. And when that happens, there will be no stopping progress for men. We’ll see a return—if not an outright celebration—of masculinity. They can attempt to shut down individual sites, or make a law against “female hate speech,” but they can’t destroy the ideas that help men lead better lives. I hope you now understand why I chose the name for this site.

Read Next: An Amazing Manosphere Blog You’ve Never Seen

Europe Is Gonna Have A Bloody Summer

January 26, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Did you think the 2011 riots in Greece were bad? That's when their youth unemployment was only 40 percent. Now it's at a staggering 55 percent, and increasing exponentially:

As one Zerohedge commenter astutely noted,

> Looks like we get to 100% youth unemployment in Spain and Greece sometime around 2017.

Which is impossible because at that point there would be full-scale youth militias robbing and pillaging in order to survive. But the hilarity of his point stands.

Combine this with the fact that Europe is going to have to impose harsher forms of austerity this year due to the political impossibility of more bailouts, as Merkel is up for reelection and most Germans aren't too keen on bailing out Greece for a fourth time, let alone the much larger economy of Spain, and we have a recipe for total chaos.

Loading…

It's almost guaranteed that the ECB (European Central Bank) will print a couple hundred billion to paper things over, but it will not reduce the need for austerity. Which brings us to the main point: civil unrest.

Examine this graph from eXiled and tell me if you disagree:

After the riots start in Greece and Spain, it will probably spread to Italy and southern France (especially with their large Islamic population) as they face similar problems.

Will this come to America? I'm not sure, but I'm wondering if I can travel to Greece this summer and experience a pussy paradise: I get a fun night, and she gets a bite to eat?

Read More: Is It Easier To Get Laid In Poor Countries?

Finland Is Honored To Have Sexual Women

January 27, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Two days. That's how long it took for our article The 5 Easiest Clubs In The World To Get Laid to go viral in Finland, home of the number one easiest club, Milliklub. Here's a sample of the coverage:

- Täältä lohkeaa helpoiten – helsinkiläisyökerho kyseenalaisen listan paalupaikalle!
- Näistä maailman baareista heruu helpoiten – ykkösenä suomalaisravintola
- Bloggari väittää: Helsingin Milliklubi on maailman paras pokauspaikka

Our article was blogged and tweeted extensively in Finland, with Facebook being the biggest traffic source. Here's what our Finnish man on the ground had to say:

> It has been referenced at least a few major Finnish radio stations, the second largest newspaper in Finland, a TV station etc.

The marketing manger of Millklub gave a prepared statement:

> Phones have been ringing and the Facebook and chat have been filled with people asking about the listing. It would be really enjoyable to laugh to the listing with the buddies but it offends our female customers. The same women who visit our Club also visit other clubs. We do not want anyone to be offended by the listing.
>
> Loading…

Allow us to translate his statement…

- "…but it offends our female customers" = Finnish women are easy.
- "The same women who visit our Club also visit other clubs." = Finnish women are easy everywhere, not just our club
- "We do not want anyone to be offended by the listing." = Everyone got laid this weekend because Finnish women are easy.

All kidding aside, it was a big traffic bump that beat our ugliest feminist surge…

And what's great is we got absolutely zero hate. Respect to Finnish people, who while somewhat androgynous, have a great sense of humor. Kiitos!

Don't Miss: 9 Things Every Guy Should Know About Finland (And Its Girls)

The 7 Greatest Bodybuilders Of Our Generation

January 27, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

Everybody knows the old farts like Arnold Schwarzenegger and Ronnie Coleman were legendary body builders, but their success is too far removed from the present to inspire today's young men. Instead, here are the seven greatest for our generation…

7. Alexey Lesukov

Russian bodybuilder Alexey Lesukov is easily one of the biggest 23 year old's on Earth. No sane man would want to get on the wrong side of this Russian bear.

6. Frank Yang

Youtube sensation Frank Yang has been making waves among young people for his humor filled videos. He is an inspiration to bookish young Asian men in particular to shred away their skinniness. While he looks lean in his photos, check out any of his videos and you'll see why he is the most prominent young Asian body builder today.

5. Lee Priest

Although relatively obscure, Lee Priest is a 40 year old Australian bodybuilder, best known for doing the bodywork for The Hulk movie, on top of being a champion race car driver and now actor. He won the IFBB (International Federation of Bodybuilders) Mr. Australia competitions when he was 17, 18 and 19.

4. Kai Greene

37-year-old Brooklyn native Kai Greene rose out of childhood poverty and foster homes to become the runner up in the Mr. Olympia competition in 2012 and winner of the 2011 New York Pro, a rare rags-to-riches bodybuilding tale.

Loading...

3. Phil Heath

33-year-old two times Mr. Olympia Phil Heath is in a word: legendary. Every aspiring body builder today has seen the picture of him below and thought to himself “I did not know getting that big was even possible” and then asked “Do I even want to get that big?”

2. Jay Cutler

Onto the big leagues, 39-year-old Jay Cutler is an inspiration to young men not just because of his size, but because he has won the Mr. Olympia competition four times, and was runner up in 2011. He is only the third Mr. Olympia to win the title in non-consecutive years, joining the ranks of Arnold Schwarzenegger and Franco Columbu.

1. Aziz “Zyzz” Shavershian

The Son of Zeus’s death spearheaded a bodybuilding revolution among young people, and has put more young men in the gym than any other body-builder this century. As such, one cannot deny that he is the greatest and most influential body builder of our generation.

Don’t Miss: Is Zyzz A Role Model Or A Bad Influence?

It’s Better To Be A Pessimist Than An Optimist

January 27, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In addition to the brilliant lecture above, the Wall Street Journal has a great article that reviews why pessimistic thinking is helpful…

> One pioneer of the “negative path” was the New York psychotherapist Albert Ellis, who died in 2007. He rediscovered a key insight of the Stoic philosophers of ancient Greece and Rome: that sometimes the best way to address an uncertain future is to focus not on the best-case scenario but on the worst.
>
> Seneca the Stoic was a radical on this matter. If you feared losing your wealth, he once advised, “set aside a certain number of days, during which you shall be content with the scantiest and cheapest fare, with coarse and rough dress, saying to yourself the while: ‘Is this the condition that I feared?’ ”
>
> […]
>
> Just thinking in sober detail about worst-case scenarios—a technique the Stoics called “the premeditation of evils”—can help to sap the future of its anxiety-producing power. The psychologist Julie Norem estimates that about one-third of Americans instinctively use this strategy, which she terms “defensive pessimism.” Positive thinking, by contrast, is the effort to convince yourself that things will turn out fine, which can reinforce the belief that it would be absolutely terrible if they didn’t.
>
> Loading...
> […]
>
> Goals may even lead to underachievement. Many New York taxi drivers, one team of economists concluded, make less money in rainy weather than they could because they finish work as soon as they reach their mental target for what constitute a good day’s earnings.

More people are waking up to the fact that positive thinking doesn’t work. It has never worked. Instead, it diverts energy from putting in hard work and transfers it to daydreaming about an outcome that requires much more than just mental thought. Positive thinking is great if you want to set yourself up for one disappointment after another.

Many people tell me that I’m pessimistic, and I take it as a compliment, because it’s that pessimism which has allowed me to accept and endure tough spells in life to push through to the other side. If I didn’t get my mind ready to tackle a big problem, how would I keep my composure to face it? Instead I hope for the best but expect the worst. This old saying perfectly captures how a pessimistic person approaches life.

Read Next: “No Law Can Be Sacred To Me But That Of My Nature”

8 Essential Rules To Surviving The Workplace

January 28, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

If I won the lottery and spent the weekend flying my new personal jet around the world with bikini models while collecting rare artifacts from sites of historical interest, the Monday morning discussion with my coworkers would go like this:

"Good morning, Friend. How was your weekend?"

"It was good. I went grocery shopping, got caught up on laundry, and spent a couple of quiet days resting at home. This is going to be a busy week! Hey, did you see that email requesting feedback on…"

I have learned the hard way several times that I absolutely cannot share personal details of any kind at work. I actually came close to getting fired my second year out of college simply for giving a watered down PG-13 version of a rather tame weekend at spring break. It wasn't the "possibly inappropriate" storytelling that nearly got me canned—it was the hatred and jealousy the story aroused in people that led them to criticize me as being "maybe a little too young and too focused on partying to give 100% to the organization, even though [my] work [hadn't] suffered yet."

I used quotes because those were actual quotes. And by the way, the ring leader of this witch hunt was a male coworker whose projects were not in any way shape or form connected to mine. He got all the chick coworkers gossiping about it, and one of them actually brought it up to the City Manager in a closed door meeting pertaining to something else entirely. She just kind of worked it in to the conversation and stabbed me in the back.

Red Pill wisdom is like religion: nobody cares what you think, and in their eyes, you're wrong before you even open your mouth. My advice is to red pill proselytize all you want online or in your social circle outside of work, but in the office, keep a tight lid on it.

Here is a list of the basic DOs and DON'Ts I follow to ensure proper workplace red pill etiquette.

1. DON'T flirt at work. Even if you're not crossing the line and even if she returns flirtatious behavior at double the rate—the minute there is a conflict on anything, you've lost. The conflict doesn't have to be personal or sexual in nature—it can be anything related to your job. But again, the moment it's you against her on any topic regardless of how severe or benign it may be, you've given yourself a serious handicap. It doesn't matter if your boss is male or female; 99.9% of the time, they're going to come down on her side if she even hints that there was a time you made her feel uncomfortable.

2. DON'T share your conquests with women or even other men—especially if those men are married. Nobody wants you to be happy, and nobody wants you to succeed unless your success is connected to theirs and does not exceed their own rate. They want you to be just like them and mirror their level of happiness or unhappiness. If you stick your head up above the crowd, someone will be there to knock it off. Any time you share anything about your conquests, you are fueling the fires of jealousy.

By the way, “conquests” refers to a new notch, that wild and crazy time you had out with your friends while your coworkers were stuck at home wishing their spouse would catch a heart attack, the new car you bought that doesn’t have a back seat for children or enough trunk space for a stroller, that last minute road trip for a microbrewery tour, and anything else that doesn’t revolve around some kid’s soccer schedule.

3. DON’T share red pill wisdom with anyone who draws a paycheck from your company. It’s not your job to save the world, it’s not your job to lift your beta coworker’s feet out of the miry clay and set them on the a solid rock of red pill wisdom, and it’s certainly not your job to make sure you’re the guy who everyone knows “gets it”—your job is to turn a profit for your employer in exchange for a paycheck without causing a disturbance on the team while manipulating the shit out of the system for personal gain. Any red pill wisdom you disseminate can and will be used against you in some form or fashion—even if it’s behind the scenes. That promotion you won’t get three years from now may be directly related to that “marriage is for chumps” comment you made two years ago at the company Christmas party—and you won’t even know it.

4. DON’T add coworkers to your social networks. I don’t care how cool they are or how tight-knit the team is you work with. If you’re living the life you should be living, your Facebook wall and twitter feed will be a liability to you at work. Stay up late one night and delete every last coworker, vendor and client from your Facebook wall, then suspend your profile for two weeks. If anybody mentions it at work, you’ll know who is just a little too interested in your private life, and you can tell them you decided to shut the whole thing down because you were tired of it. When you eventually open the account back up, your coworkers will already be deleted, so lock it down tighter than Fort Knox and use a different email so it’s not searchable by coworkers.

Facebook is dangerous as hell, and things can happen that you may never expect even if you’re not a Facebook user. The same goes for Twitter. I completely deleted my personal Facebook, LinkedIn, and Twitter accounts over a year ago, and I couldn’t be happier with my decision.

Loading...

5. DON’T ever speak to a fat chick at work unless she’s over the age of 40 and married. Single fat chicks are wired differently, and I still haven’t figured out what the hell is going on in their minds. They hate men, they hate their skinny chick coworkers, they hate other fat chicks, and they hate themselves. Other than an absolute professional mandate which requires you to engage with a fat chick on some work related topic, don’t even say hi to her unless her workspace is so close to yours that you absolutely have to. [Note: There’s a grandma clause in there for old fat chicks who bake cookies and hand out homemade Christmas and birthday cards.]

6. DO repeatedly lie your ass off. “Why am I not married?” Sigh (followed by a distant look of introspection) “I just haven’t found the one yet. But I’m on the lookout, and as soon as I find her, I’m going to do my best to hold on to her forever. I’m really looking forward to being a father and a husband someday."

Many of your male coworkers want to hear that just as much as your female coworkers do—EVEN the men who tell you "stay single and enjoy it!" Always validate your coworker's life choices even if you'd rather be butt-raped by a pack of wild horses than trade lives with them.

7. DO save the Alpha for the conference room. There is only so much Alpha capital that can be spent at work before you're labeled an asshole. If your private conversations are all red pill Alpha, you're diminishing the amount you can display in the conference room. Don't get wrapped up in dissing feminism or flashing your player credentials at work; save that energy and use it to get paid and promoted. Be polite and reserved on the floor, but earn a reputation for boldness in the conference room.

8. DO remember that following these rules will work so well that you'll be tempted to ignore them. This is where I admittedly need to follow my own damn advice. Once you master the rules above, you'll gain a reputation for being a no-nonsense professional who keeps to himself on the floor but brings bold ideas and a take-no-prisoners attitude to the conference room. Your married coworkers will accept you, the single ones will look up to you, and the fat chicks who hate everyone else will give you a hate pass because they just can't help but admire you. When this happens, you'll feel like its okay to loosen up a bit and socialize a little more since you're in control. But a month or two later, smack! you'll be reminded of why you followed those rules in the first place. It'll sound a little like this:

> "So, I hear you had a date on Thursday night. What's her name? Do you like her? What does she do for a living?"

This guy is a player who doesn't take relationships seriously. That's why we rarely meet these girls.

> "Did you really fly to Seattle last weekend to go to a concert? Man, I wish I could get away like that."

He puts his social life ahead of work, and it takes a lot of planning to go on a trip like that. I wonder if he booked that ticket on our time? I bet he did. I bet that's why he's always on his cellphone. I wonder if he really had an offsite meeting on Friday? Probably not —I bet he was heading to the airport.

> "Hey, not all of us can just do whatever we want. Some of us have responsibilities at home."

This guy has no idea what it's like to be an adult. With such little life experience, how can we trust him to make good decisions? Will he just up and quit one day and fly off to another job? He has no stability in his life, and we don't need that around here. He's a good guy, but I'm not sure he's up to the challenge.

> "Jennifer? Who is Jennifer? What happened to Elizabeth?"

He’s treating women like they’re interchangeable because he’s mentioned three different women in the past few months. I have a daughter Elizabeth’s age, and I wouldn’t want her to get hooked up with a guy like him. He never seems distraught about the breakups either; I bet he treats girls like my daughter’s last asshole boyfriend treated her. What a jerk. I can’t believe I have to work with him.

> “I heard from some of your concerned coworkers that you were pretty upset by the way Michelle snapped at you and I guess embarrassed you in front of everyone. But just remember that she’s under a lot of pressure, and it’s not easy for a woman to get ahead in this industry. She needs and deserves your full support on this initiative. If you have a problem with her, you should address it with her directly and not criticize her to your coworkers.”

He’s just another misogynistic asshole who can’t handle being dressed down in public by a menopausal lunatic for doing exactly what she asked him to do in the first place. Someday I too will become a menopausal lunatic ravaged by the guilt of ignoring my children and being a shitty mother in order to pursue a paycheck, and I sure as hell don’t need misogynistic men like him around to point it out.

————————–

If you have any other workplace red pill DOs and DON’Ts you’ve picked up down through the years, please drop them in the comments section below so we can get a good list going.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

10 Things I Learned From Manti Te’o

January 28, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

The Manti Te’o situation has been storming the news of both sports and mainstream as of late. For those who do not know the situation, I’ll explain it in brief:

Manti Te’o was the runner up for the Heisman Trophy, and was said to have overcome massive tragedy and turned it into success by dominating football, despite the deaths of his grandmother and girlfriend. After he lost the National Championship, it was exposed that his girlfriend did not exist. There are arguments going back and forth currently on whether he was duped by an internet troll for a long time, or whether he just made up the whole story, possibly due to being gay. Either way he potentially had an imaginary girlfriend for a significant period of time, gained support from many people in the nation, and is now the center of one of the weirdest scandals I have ever heard of. Whatever the truth ends up being, I’ve already learned the following things from the scandal….

1. Stay Away From The Internet

Whether or not Te’o was really a victim of catfishing, the point remains that the internet is a dangerous place filled with crazies and liars. If he really was catfished then he was clearly attempting internet game, which should never be done. He’s the prime example of internet dating going wrong.

2. Credible Sources Can Have Wrong Info

By this point in life, everyone should know that you can’t just go by what people say. Many people attempt to filter out misinformation by searching for “credible sources.”

Thanks to the Te’o incident I have learned that no source is credible on its own. The only way you can really know the truth behind a subject is to research it in detail yourself. Unfortunately for Te’o, it was through research that the world was told about his girlfriend being a hoax.

3. Beta’s Always Get Exposed

No matter how you look at this incident, whether Te’o made it up on his own, or whether he was duped by some internet troll, it still shows he is a beta. In the end you can’t fake being an alpha, you simply have to become one. If you fake it, eventually you’ll be discovered. If he really was an alpha, he would have had his own girlfriend. Unless of course there’s something else going on, which is covered later in this list.

4. Keep Your Lies Basic

I think everyone can acknowledge that we all lie. It’s how we get laid, how we get jobs, and how we do basically everything. That said, if you’re going to lie, keep it simple. Te’o had multiple instances where he elaborated his relationship only to have this whole incident get blown extremely out of proportion. Had he kept it simple, no one would care. Because he duped the public into having sympathy for the death of an imaginary individual he’s suffering.

5. Don’t Ever Show Your Cards

Given the possibility that Te’o may have really been duped by an internet troll, he has greatly exposed the fact that he’s a beta who likes to display everything he has to offer with no reward. It was mentioned that he supposedly talked on the phone for 8 hours a night talking about his life and god knows what else. The fact remains, never show your cards. It keeps your value high and prevents humiliation in the event of tragedy.

Seriously he used to be intimidating.

Loading…

6. The Value of Man Code

This is one of the few “positive” effects displayed from this whole saga. Throughout the whole ordeal, none of his teammates ratted him out no matter how blatantly obvious it was to them that his girlfriend wasn’t real. That is true man code value right there. They could have tried to make a name for themselves by exposing it, but they didn’t, because they value the way men work. The difference between men and women is men will try to show dominance without making other men look pathetic. Women set out to destroy other women at any given opportunity. Had this been an issue with females, this would have been exposed a long time ago.

7. Your Slump Is Never That Bad

We all fall into slumps, but no matter what you think, it can never be that bad. Unless you reach a point where you have to have an internet girlfriend that you don’t even know is real, and you have ZERO physical contact, you can move on. Trust me, that handshake you had with the random girl from the coffee shop is still more action than Te’o had in his relationship.

8. Fairy Tales Do Not Exist

The whole back story to the Te’o situation is that he saw his girlfriend (who doesn’t exist) in the stands at a Stanford game.

> “Their stares got pleasantly tangled, then Manti Te’o extended his hand to the > stranger with a warm smile and soulful eyes."

It was also mentioned about Manti's girlfriend that:

> "She was gifted in music, multi-lingual, had dreams grounded in reality and the talent to catch up to them."

The only problem is she wasn't real. Everyone seemed to be so captivated by the circumstances of their relationship, and now they are devastated because it was a lie. And that's because fairy tales don't exist; well unless you're the Alabama quarterback, and then you're dating the female below.

Sweet Home Alabama!

9. Being Famous Can Quickly Become A Curse

Had this happened at a high school or even a division-three college, chances are no one would have looked into the details of it. Hell, even if I fabricated the story no one would have cared. Because Manti Te'o is a future 1st round NFL pick, people care. And while sometimes I envy famous people for their insane bank accounts, I do not envy any of the magnification that befalls their personal lives.

10. People Still Have Issues With Homosexuality

The end theory behind Te'o making up the lie, in the event that he was behind the whole incident and not duped on the internet, is that it's because he is gay. This theory is actually quite possible, and it would easily explain how he failed to be a top division-one football athlete without being able to land a semi-attractive girl. Seriously, I've seen complete morons get some of the best women because of sports.

While most people would say, “If he’s gay why didn’t he just admit it?” The answer to that is simply because despite society accepting normal homosexual people, they do not accept gay athletes. Athletes are supposed to be the manliest men. Can you imagine how much people would freak out if the Rock said he liked dick. So yes, in the athletic world, people still freak out.

And there it is, the ten things I learned from Manti Te’o. Considering the circumstances of his imaginary girlfriend, I personally think he’s owed more credit for everything that he exposed for the rest of men.

Read Next: Learn To Be An Alpha From Athletes

General Robert E. Lee: American Hero Or Slavery Apologist?

January 28, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The above book is arguably the most thorough biography written of Confederate General Robert E. Lee. Even though it's the abridged edition, it still clocks in at 650 pages.

Lee was the son of a military man who fought in George Washington's army. He had the privilege of obtaining a classical military education at West Point Academy. His goal was to be first in his class, which he was able to accomplish while reading voraciously on the side.

> Between January 27 and May 24, [Lee] drew fifty-two books from the library. They covered a wide field—navigation, travel, strategy, biography, and history.

By the time he was 33 (the age that I am currently), he was married with four children and held a high position in the Army's engineering corps, tasked with solving logistical problems of a growing nation.

Soon after the Mexican War, where Lee was commended with his action on the field, South Carolina seceded from the Union. Many other States followed and Lee was courted to fight by both sides. He chose the South because that is what Virginia chose—his loyalties lay with the state before the nation. The author paints a picture that Lee was fighting more for Virginia's independence than for the continuance of slavery, a question that remains open to historical debate. He did believe in the eventual emancipation of the slaves, but will gain no favor from black people with quotes like this:

> The blacks are immeasurably better off here than in Africa, morally, socially & physically. The painful discipline they are undergoing, is necessary for their instruction as a race, & I hope will prepare & lead them to better things. How long their subjugation may be necessary is known & ordered by a wise Merciful Providence.

Once the Civil War was under way, Lee received nonstop criticism from both Confederate politicians and the press for his lack of leadership ability. He was actually called "Granny Lee" for being too timid on the field.

> …no enthusiasm attended the announcement of the selection of Lee as > commander of the army. In some quarters, “disparagement, sarcasm and ridicule” were the lot of Lee.

This is a man who has come to be seen as one of the more brilliant Generals of the Civil War and who singlehandedly extended it by over a year against the much superior Union army. It’s interesting that even historical figures before the age of the internet had committed haters.

Loading…

> As the battle raged beyond the furnace, men were carried beyond themselves and fought as if the fumes of gunpowder were a mysterious hashish that gave them the strength of madness.

Regardless of how well the South fought with their hearts and souls, the North could easily replace what they lost in battle while the South could not. Victory for the Union was only a matter of time, and looking back it’s clear that Lee merely delayed the inevitable.

In the book we learn that his success as a general came from taking the initiative and continuously re-adjusting his plans based on what was happening on the ground. He would enter situations with a sound plan, but once conditions changed, which they always seemed to do in war, he changed the plans accordingly. It was that simple. He never lamented bad conditions or dwelled on defeat, and he remained “undisturbed by the adverse conditions in which he found himself.” He was a master of playing the cards he was dealt, leading men to more victory than their paper strength would suggest, no doubt helped by the surprising incompetency of the Union generals.

The writing of this biography is graceful and dignified, but the battle action was far from suspenseful. The author makes a common mistake of trying to deliver too many facts, preventing you from being drawn into the prose and visualizing the battle. Therefore I can’t say it’s a page turner. Instead, it offers the development of a man who prided himself on being a gentleman during the most critical period in American history, with a vivid telling of his death and how it affected so many who saw him as an American hero.

The author obviously worshiped Lee so make no mistake that this is a glowing account, but it still reviewed his flaws and mistakes in what I think is a fair assessment of the man (I never got the feeling that I was reading propaganda). Overall it was an important but surreal book that describes a horrible war that took place on American soil between Americans.

> The power which the strong have over the weak, the employer over the employed, the educated over the unlettered, the experienced over the confiding, even the clever over the silly—the forbearing or inoffensive use of all this power or authority, or a total abstinence from it when the case admits it, will show the gentleman in a plain light. The gentleman does not needlessly and unnecessarily remind an offender of a wrong he may have committed against him. He can not only forgive, he can forget; and he strives for that nobleness of self and mildness of character which impart sufficient strength to let the past be but the past. A > true man of honor feels humbled himself when he cannot help humbling others.

Read More: “Lee” on Amazon

6 Types Of Guys Who Try To Get Laid Online

January 28, 2013 | by The_Dude | Link | Original Link

Online dating. The arena of fat chicks and single moms, of duckface and angle shots, of shattered dreams and lost hope. It's the place you turn to when you've exhausted all other options and fear your balls will explode if you don't get laid this week. Despite its increased popularity, online dating still hasn't totally shaken off its reputation as the sexual equivalent of a used car lot, a place where quality isn't the best and nothing is exactly as advertised.

The disadvantages of online dating for men are well known: the quality of the girls is usually below average, the contact-to-response ratio is abysmally bad, and a lot of the time you'll find girls using pictures of themselves from their younger and much thinner past.

At the same time, many men are recognizing that online dating comes with a unique set of advantages as well. Compared to hitting bars and clubs, online dating is very inexpensive, relatively anonymous, and extremely efficient. For men in high stress jobs, or guys who just don't like gaming in public, online dating could be the ideal way to meet girls.

But it's not for everyone. For every guy who can thrive with online dating, there's another who is probably better off sticking to the clubs or the coffee shop scene. With that in mind, the following are the six types of guys who most commonly use online dating, starting with the ones who are most likely to find success with it compared to other methods.

1. Dungeons And Dragons Guy

The Dungeons And Dragons Guy is your typical nerd who is scared to leave the house. In other words, a man who suffers from asperger's or severe social anxiety. Online dating is very effective for this guy in a relative sense: when gaming in real life, he will get nothing (if he's not good looking); but when gaming online, he will merely get very little. Though he will run into trouble as his interactions move from the laptop to the coffee shop and force him out of his warlock den, online dating at least gives him a chance.

2. Sweatshop Worker Guy

The sweatshop worker guy can be identified by his tendency to work more than 60 hours a week. Usually found in professions like law and investment banking, he has all the advantages of money and education, but suffers from one crippling flaw: his thirst to earn an annual bonus or “make partner” leaves him a de-facto slave of his bosses and keeps him from having an active social life. For sweatshop worker guy, online dating offers a way of meeting women that doesn’t interfere with his more important corporate ladder climbing duties.

3. Brad Pitt Lookalike

The Brad Pitt lookalike is simply a man who is so good looking, women take notice. In game, looks matter, and in online game, they matter even more. All the Brad Pitt lookalike needs to do is throw up a few pics and spam girls with lewd messages, and he'll have a bang by the end of the week.

But of course, just as online dating's advantages make it ideal for certain types of men, its disadvantages also make it one of the worst ways to meet women for men who are prone to falling into one of the three categories below.

4. The International Player

The international player is what most of this blog's readers are or aspire to be: a man who travels the world in search of lays, often hoping to escape the skrillex haircuts and high testosterone of western womandom. Theoretically, an international player shouldn't have trouble with online dating; after all, dating sites are plenty popular in just about every country. The real problem is this: foreign country game usually requires knowing a bit of the local language, and writing in a foreign language is significantly harder than simply speaking it. This is less of a problem in Asian countries where the women will gladly switch to English, but in much of Russia and Latin America there is a kind of national pride tied up in the language, which means you'll likely need it to succeed at online dating there if you can't write in the local language.

5. The Guy Aiming High

The guy aiming high is exactly what he sounds like: a man who only wants to bang 8s and above. The reason he is less likely to succeed with online dating is simply because really hot girls on dating sites get so much spam, his messages are not likely to get noticed. The brutal truth is that most men who try online dating will have to settle for 6s and below. However, if The Guy Aiming High is also a Brad Pitt lookalike, he may get a little further.

6. Sasquatch

The opposite of the Brad Pitt lookalike: a man who has been so badly beaten with an ugly stick, he causes children to have nightmares and vaginas to become dryer than fresh sawdust. The reason this man has very little luck with online dating is simple: looks matter much more online than in real life. The brutal reality is that game just doesn't work as well over a computer screen, for three reasons:

- You can't really use body language online
- It's much easier to ignore someone online
- The rules of politeness don't really apply online and women won't give you a bit of rope to work with if they're not into you right away

Game might make or break an average looking guy online, but for the sasquatches of the world, it's pretty much hopeless.

Of course, there are many men who try to get laid online who do not fall into any of the categories above. The above are merely the 6 types of guys most likely to succeed or fail to an extreme degree when meeting women online. Other online dating archetypes, such as the pedophile and the dick pics guy, are another subject altogether.

Read Next: Internet Dating Killed My Game

35 Responses to 6 Types Of Guys Who Try To Get Laid Online

1. Solomon
   January 29, 2013 at 9:29 am
   Nice bit of work. It's a fact that the quality online is consistently sub-par, and if there is an actual hot/semi-hot chick on there, she has 300 emails just like yours. Just from today. 700 more from yesterday.

   I don't get in line to compete for some mediocre chick's attention, but I will say, in years past I did well from online dating, and in a couple cases, REAL well. For me though, it wasn't the match or eharmony stuff, it was myspace (back when that existed)

   Laugh all you want, but it was seriously fish in a barrel. Even had chicks fly in from other states to see me for a weekend. The genius of that dating site is that it WASN'T a dating site, so it was easier to display personality, cast chick-bait, establish pre-selection and flirt without hitting bitch shields. That playground has gone away now, but good riddance. Those chicks were mainly a pain in my ass. The prerequisite drama followed.

I think being on match and OKCupid stuff is a DLV at this point, making it an even bigger struggle to succeed. I'm all for anyone who wants to fish there, but its not for me anymore.

In closing, I must protest the main pic of the schlub in the Zeppelin shirt.

Don't be dogging Zeppelin like that, man.

Reply

- Trouble
  January 29, 2013 at 2:42 pm
  I agree. MySpace was overflowing with pussy for me. Before that, the AOL chat rooms was where I met plenty of women with daddy issues and high libido.

  Then FB happened…

  Reply

2. ronin
   January 29, 2013 at 10:04 am
   Online dating is like dumpster diving

   Reply

   - RASER
     January 29, 2013 at 3:04 pm
     LOL, so true

     I am getting hit on by grandmothers and fatties, has not worked for me…"I AM NOT DESPERATE!"

     :-)

     Reply

3. Gustavo
   January 29, 2013 at 10:08 am

I remember the myspace days. I met a lot of women through there as well, but they were such head cases. One was such a nutcase I considered a restraining order. I gave Match a try in the early 2000′s and it was such a fail. All fatties hiding behind old photos, bad angles, and in some cases other peoples photos. I had the opportunity to try it again two years ago when my buddy let me use his premium account after getting back together with his ex. I was shocked at how attractive some of the women were. There's a big difference between the city and suburbs, but they all flaked eventually. Choice overload. The way I look at it is there's so many social activities in the city where you can have face time its pointless. The attractive women are just seeking validation for something.

Reply

4. noob

January 29, 2013 at 10:11 am

I once tried internet dating. Searched for about 5 minutes for a good site, then thought, fuck it, and carried on living. Can't believe I wasted those 5 minutes. Still kicking myself. True story.

Reply

5. Roosh

January 29, 2013 at 10:19 am

Internet game is great if you like 6s.

Reply

- RASER

  January 29, 2013 at 3:05 pm

  We are here to drain our sacks, just turn the lights off, same-same…lol

  Better a 6 and a bang, than a 9 and fap, aka nothing

  Reply

- Unending Improvement (@UnendImprov)

  January 30, 2013 at 11:29 pm

  Shit, I've lost 6′s. You can't even get them off of online dating.

  Reply

6. Phinn

January 29, 2013 at 10:32 am

I used to have a prejudice against online dating, but after seeing two women I know start gravitating toward it, I have reconsidered.

Granted, these two women are post-wall. Let's face it — they're old. But they are both single, very attractive for their age (thin, nice faces, fit, firm asses), have no kids to care for, are intelligent and fun to be around, and each worth tens of millions of dollars.

These women have trouble dating.

That's how fucking inexcusably BAD most men are these days. I blame the 1990s, and the era of Bill Clinton. His horndog ways made the leftist media go apeshit in downplaying horndogs. It was the era of the sweatervest, the absolute nadir of American masculinity.

But consider the problem that these two women face — they are (in their age group) both extremely desirable. They are as horny as a two-dick billy goat, and they drive cars that cost more than my house.

Their standards are not that high. They've both been in the dating market for more than 2 years, and with extremely poor success. They are looking for a man with the ability to take them out to a nice dinner once a week, go on a mini-vacation about 3 times per year, has a functioning dick, no substance abuse problems, a normal height-weight ratio, and doesn't lie pathologically.

It's really not that hard to meet these basic criteria, but apparently it's pretty rare. Even a guy with a few spinning plates would be acceptable to both of them, since (as we know) that pre-selection actually makes a man more attractive anyway.

There are, apparently, no men over the age of 40 who fit the bill. Zero. None. These women, who would suck the skin off your dick and then let you take her $300,000 sports car for a spin to the liquor store to re-stock the bar, have zero dating options.

So, they are turning to online dating.

I am convinced that it doesn't take much for a man to be a real stand-out, especially as you get out of your 20s —

1. Work for yourself, and make an acceptable amount of money. It doesn't have to be in the millions, and the amount varies from suburbs to the cities, but basically make enough to own your own place, drive a normal car, and have enough control over your work schedule to be able to take a 3-day weekend once every few months.

2. Don't be fat. Get some regular exercise. No excuses here.

3. Be able to hold a normal, lively conversation. Take voice lessons if you have to.

Be at least minimally interesting and socially presentable.

4. Eliminate the usual deal-breakers, like being a crack addict, an alcoholic, a compulsive gambler, a porn freak, a shut-in or a serial killer.

Any man who meets these basic criteria can rise to the top 0.001% of the dating market.

Dating women who are age 22-28, however, is a different story. Shallow bitches are shallow. But still, if you make a decent living, have your own place, pay for your own car, and don't play video games 6-7 days a week, then you are, again, ahead of 99.9% of guys, most of whom are living at their parents' home, play games on the Xbox constantly and have no social skills whatsoever.

Reply

- Wilson
  January 29, 2013 at 12:19 pm
  Men are "inexcusably BAD" because they don't want to date post-reproductive women? So they have money, but are they going to open their wallet for a man? A rich dude doesn't let his hot girlfriend drive his car, he buys her one; these rich bitches' dry snatches probably fuse shut if they have to cover the cost of dinner.

  Reply

- Bogart
  January 29, 2013 at 1:44 pm
  Yeah, I'm calling bullshit on this one too.

  I do agree with the overall general thrust of your argument, that men can rise much higher in the SMP by doing the things you listed. However, you forgot to mention all the rich guys, sons of rich guys, D-list celebs, athletes, DJ's, club bouncers, musicians, and other assorted D-bags who will always be at the top of the male SMV. These guys will leapfrog ahead of you by their good fortune or genetics, so you will never be in the top .01% without these attributes.

  On to the women: there is always something left out of the story of the rich, pretty woman who cannot find a single man worth of her attention.

  Firstly, there is the question of how they got their money. Most women with that kind of net worth got it in one of four ways:
  1) Assraped ex-husband in divorce court.
  2) Assraped ex-employer in frivolous 'harassment' lawsuit.
  3) Inherited the money.

4) Is such a manjawed, high-T lawyercunt type that she clawed her way to a well-paying corporate gig.

I would not date a woman who fit any of these 4 descriptions, no matter how many times she would let me drive her stupid car. Being around her would be a headache and a nightmare.

Women's money means jack shit because they are far too cheap and greedy to ever spend a cent on a man without expecting a dollar in return at a future date.

Almost certain that the women you describe have massive personality flaws that you are failing to mention. They are probably high-testosterone bitches.

Reply

- Phinn
  January 29, 2013 at 2:44 pm
  Look, they're all bitches.

  As bitches go, these two are above average. My point about their money and cars was sort of a joke, but you'd think that fun, athletic, attractive women who enjoy sports cars would be date-able, by someone, after 2 years (each) of putting the word out through their vast network of other bitches.

  To answer your question, one inherited from her money from her genius inventor father, and the other got it in a divorce (she settled for 1/4 of her ex-husband's assets to get the divorce finished quickly, because he kept getting arrested for picking up crack whores, and she still ended up with 8 figures).

  So, yes — they're bitches who do typical female shit to get money.

  My point is not that they are miracle-women. My point is not to try to set up the ROK readership with one of them.

  I'm saying that if any of you out there are over 40, like me, it is unbelievably easy to rise to the top of the male SMP, since the competition (single men with basic social skills, no gut, two nickels to rub together and a lack of major psychological disorders) is virtually non-existent.

- Ross
  January 29, 2013 at 4:34 pm
  You nailed it! And pretty much a man with his affairs in order is NOT going to settle for some over 40 year old woman! Why should he!

- Anonymous
  January 29, 2013 at 7:30 pm
  "You nailed it! And pretty much a man with his affairs in order is NOT going to settle for some over 40 year old woman! Why should he!"

  Yeah if this dude has all that going on, it's 33 or younger. Like Patrice O'neal said, the ugliest 19 year old beats the shit out of a fine 44 year old. I'm sure someone will enjoy the pump and dump with them. They had their era. Now it's my turn.

7. anonymous
   January 29, 2013 at 10:52 am
   Hidden Camera Captures a Nanny Feeding Baby With Sleeping Pills, Drinking Alcohol and Masturbating http://redhotrussia.com/nanny-hidden-camera/

   Reply

   - noob
     January 29, 2013 at 11:04 am
     Why would you post that here? What the hell has that got to do with this thread?

     Let me guess, you're a FemNazi trying to plant crap on this site so that you can make a case that the manosphere is just filled with crap?

     Disclaimer: haven't clicked the link, I'm just making the assumption based on the title.

     Reply

     - Unending Improvement (@UnendImprov)
       January 30, 2013 at 11:30 pm
       Dude, chill the hell out.

       It's a spam bot

- Trouble
  January 29, 2013 at 2:48 pm
  What the hell was she sticking in her fat cooch?
  Reply
- Mark
  January 29, 2013 at 4:51 pm
  This is autogen spam.
  Reply

8. Quintus Curtius
   January 29, 2013 at 11:19 am
   Well said, comrade.
   I have gone back and forth regarding internet game over the years…and finally have come to the conclusion that can be a very useful supplement to our game, provided we adhere to a few ground rules. I would propose the following:
   1. Internet game should be viewed as a supplement to, and not a substitute for, your in-person approaches and regular game. Think of a fisherman who has a number of lures and lines in the water. It's a force multiplier more than anything. Just don't make it your exclusive iron in the fire.
   2. Internet game can be very good for laying the foundation for international bangs. Say you know you're going to be in country XYZ for a certain period of time. You can use the international dating sites to line up some decent prospects in advance, so that you have some connections "on site" when you land and can hit the ground running.
   3. You need to adhere strictly to internet protocol. Any deviation will blow you out immediately. Remember that the hot chicks are bombarded with emails from betas with pathetic game. The only way you will get noticed is if you minimize your contact with the target. The internet is for SETTING UP IN PERSON DATES, not for having discussions. Get her off the keyboard and out for the date immediately. No long phone calls, no long email chats, period.
   4. You'd better have a kickass profile. The vibe you want to project is happy, fun, I-don't-really-give -a fuck. That means nothing that even remotely resembles neediness or beta behavior. All your photos need to have you smiling, and involved in activities that make you look like a leader of men, warrior, etc. You should have a couple photos of you with other hot chicks, too.

5. Internet “openers” need to be playful, funny, low-key statements. Pick something out from her profile and comment on it or ask a question about it.
6. Target foreign women. If I have to tell you this, you’re already lost….

Happy hunting. Remember that internet trolling can add much to your game portfolio…as long as you recognize its limitations and work within them. Like it or not, for better or for worse, it is where things are headed more and more.

Reply

9. Dr Zoidberg
January 29, 2013 at 11:38 am
Internet dating is good if you are looking for A) artsy non-partying introverts or B) recently ended LTR chicks looking for a rebound.

As stated above, it works good as a supplement especially if you live in an outdoorsy/recreational city with low nightlife (the nightlife scene consists of drinking around camp fires). Coffee shops, bookstores and REI are still your best option though.

Reply

- Anonymous
January 29, 2013 at 8:13 pm
REI? What’s the best way to game there, Doc? (Ask for help picking out new bike shorts? lulz)

Reply

10. Quoc
January 29, 2013 at 11:43 am
#5 pic’s fale tits are repulsive, imo.
But as for women in Asian countries gladly switching to English, in which Asian countries do quality women speak English?

Reply

- Quoc
January 29, 2013 at 11:44 am
*fake, though fail would have worked too. Sorry

Reply

- Armenian
  January 29, 2013 at 12:58 pm
  She is a perfect 10. What's wrong with fake tits?
- noob
  January 29, 2013 at 1:08 pm
  "What's wrong with fake tits?"

  Everything.
- Mark
  January 29, 2013 at 4:53 pm
  If you think fake tits are cool, why not go all the way? Plastic dolls are easier.
- Anonymous
  January 29, 2013 at 7:33 pm
  I'm borrowing that Mark, thanks.

11. logicwontgetmelaid
    January 29, 2013 at 12:08 pm
    I've been constructing a new profile for another stab at this since the last time out. I pulled some decent chicks but I wasn't yet in a good place in my life where I could convert in person. The hardest thing now is getting some good pictures with women in the frame and doing cool hobbies, etc. I imagine that's the hardest part for most guys though – guys hate taking pictures of each other.

    Reply
12. RASER
    January 29, 2013 at 3:08 pm

Unfortunately i am currently a # 2.., could be a lot worse if you consider all the above!!

Working on outing my huge hours workload, light at the end of the tunnel!

Reply

13. Connery
January 29, 2013 at 3:18 pm
Overall, a funny well written piece. Just my two cents thrown in here:

QUOTE: “Theoretically, an international player shouldn’t have trouble with online dating; after all, dating sites are plenty popular in just about every country.”

True, and quite frankly facebok.com is a defacto online dating site. Essentially one has the ability to meet other women without officially looking for a skag, unlike match.com and plebtyoffart.com

QUOTE: “The brutal truth is that most men who try online dating will have to settle for 6s and below. However, if The Guy Aiming High is also a Brad Pitt lookalike, he may get a little further.”

To be honest I highly doubt that even a Brad Pitt look alike is going to do any better. The hot chicks out there do not need to use dating sites to get attention. The hotties are in the real world at night clubs trying to score as much free cocaine and drinks or deciding which rich and horny chump she is going to dupe into taking her on a trip around the world. Any genuinely super good loking female with an online dating account is only doing so for the validation he gets every time some nerd emails PM’s her with some pathtic message like “OMG GURL….UR LIKE…. SO HAWT!”

Reply

14. Dr. Giggles
January 30, 2013 at 12:12 am
Last time I saw that ape pic on Arthur C. Clarke’s Mysterious World. Anyone remember that show?

Reply

15. SredniVashtar
January 30, 2013 at 3:44 am
As Roissy said: If she were hot would she be on internet dating? Maybe the standard’s better in the states but in the uk it’s a post-wall dating resource

Reply

16. [image] CL
    January 30, 2013 at 10:46 pm
    I'm definitely sweatshop worker guy. Although I'm keeping my tastes inexpensive so I can hopefully retire early and be do-whatever-I-want guy.
    Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: `` `<abbr title="">` `<acronym title="">` `` `<blockquote cite="">` `<cite>` `<code>` `` `` `` `<q cite="">` `<strike>` ``

Post Comment

8 Ways To Look Great In A Suit

January 29, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Never underestimate how useful being suited up is. As one of the last symbols of class in our vulgar democracy, the difference between a properly suited man and a common schmuck comes down to the details.

These 8 guidelines make sure you don't overlook any of the basics.

1. Cuffs

Make sure the cuffs on your button-down shirt are poking out from your blazer about half an inch.

This goes for cuff-links too.

2. Tie

Be sure to tie your tie with a dimple.

But this isn't your only option. A man below shows how to invert the tie dimple:

3. The Gig Line

The gig line is the line made by the alignment of your button-down shirt, your belt buckle, and your pants fly. Make sure they are all in a straight line.

4. Pants

The bottom of your pants leg should end at the middle of the rubber on your shoe’s heel. A tailor can easily make adjustments to fix this.

5. Socks

Socks should always be an off-color of whatever color the pants are. Anything else is the mark of an amateur.

Loading...

6. Shoes

Always wear black shoes with anything except khaki. And even then, wear black:

7. Shoulders/Waist

If the shoulders on your blazer are too wide, it can make you look incredibly awkward, like your shoulders bend at right angles or you have football padding underneath. Get a blazer that's more fitted to your body shape, or with the shoulder hem right at your shoulder joint. A tailor can also fix this.

Yes:

No. Just no:

8. Color

A lot of people go straight for black, which is fine, but you can never go wrong with a blue blazer. When in need of a semi-formal outfit for a get together or a meeting, go with blue.

And if you're going someplace where peacocking will win you points, talk to someone who knows what they are doing and try something creative:

Inspiration for today's post goes to "Matt." RoK tried to get you a guest account on here, but you gave us a bad email.

Read Next: Top 5 Style Tips

Now You Need Game To Get A Job

January 29, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Business Week recently published an article which discusses how you're now being interviewed for much more than just competency and skill…

> Job interviews are becoming more like first dates.
>
> […]
>
> …companies are making hiring decisions "in a manner more closely resembling the choice of friends or romantic partners."
>
> […]
>
> …"employers don't necessarily hire the most skilled candidates."
>
> […]
>
> "I hired someone as a manager, and it created a lot of tension because he didn't fit in. People tried to alienate him because they weren't interested in him as a friend," she says. And it also goes the other way. "I once hired a woman who really didn't have the right background or experience for the job, but who I hit it off with during the interview," says Rebecca Grossman-Cohen, a marketing executive at News Corp.

Human resources, the biggest impediment to American corporate progress, is now evaluating you like a potential sex partner. In this type of selection process, who suffers? Betas with no game.

Alphas with charm, sexy smirks, and the basic ability to make rapport with promiscuous HR women will get the job over shy guys in spite of having less technical skill. (I pity the game denialist who hopes that holding out will get him beautiful women and high-paying jobs!) The kicker is that HR has no shame about it. They are proudly announcing in media interviews how likability is a far more important trait than education or experience.

Loading…

> In an employment market in which many first-time employees relocate for work, offices are becoming surrogate families and social communities. New hires, especially young workers, want the secret Santa gift exchanges, the karaoke nights, and, increasingly, like-minded colleagues who share their values.
>
> […]
>
> "A lot of times, cultural fit is used as an excuse" for feelings interviewers aren't comfortable expressing, says Eric Peterson, manager of diversity and inclusion at the Society for Human Resources and Management. "Maybe a hiring manager can't picture himself having a beer with someone who has an accent. Sometimes, diversity candidates are shown the door for no other reason than that they made the interviewer a little less at ease."

What will happen to an economy where workers are hired based on their ability to give HR butterflies in their stomachs? We'll end up rewarding networkers, charlatans, charming rogues, and social hanger-ons who don't produce. There is only one result for a nation who takes this path:

Read Next: The Synergy Of Game And Money

A Tale Of Two Men

January 29, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Meet my friend Jack. In a lot of ways, we are very similar.

We are both lawyers. We went to the same law school together. We were in the same section and took most of our classes together. We studied together, went out to bars together, and have the same core group of friends. We both love drinking, beautiful girls, sports and humor based on dry sophisticated wit. We even share the same birthday.

During law school, some flashes of our differences began to illuminate. He started and sold a side business generating $100k in profit. I partied harder, moved to a beach city and stopped buying textbooks. He took a break from his longtime girlfriend and then got back together with her. I broke up with my girlfriend and commenced with mass dating. He received high grades and secured a great job at a big law firm. I received good grades and falling short of the big firm, took a job at one a tier below his.

As with most office or corporate settings, my life began to drift towards the conventional American mold. The natural corollary to this was that our lives started to coincide. We both purchased homes in the same city and signed paperwork encumbering ourselves with the perceived milestone of the famed mortgage. We both leased new cars. I started dating a girl seriously and after a few years, Jack and I were both living with our girlfriends.

At the end of 2009, our paths that were once parallel started to shift tremendously.

Jack got married to his longtime girlfriend. He advanced at his job and was making well over $200k. He started buying investment property across California and some other states. He sold his home and moved into a bigger home in a better school district, as he and his wife welcomed a new son to their family.

I also advanced at my job quite nicely, but was capped at earning low six figures. I was required to put in “face time” at the office even if I was without work. This was not what I wanted in life. The partner I worked for was an extremely talented attorney, so I modeled myself after him. Like a sponge I soaked up all his mannerisms, the way he wrote, the way he argued, the things he cared about and the things he found trivial. Eventually, I made my first huge decision. I quit and started my own firm.

My income went from the dependable six figures to a chaotic low fives in the first year. My savings started to evaporate. Having my own business however allowed me to get creative. I took on small clients that later spawned big cases. I bartered legal services for PR press, which landed me a published article and a subsequent deluge of opportunities.

Loading...

The freedom of having my own firm allowed me to travel — and so I did. A lot. In the past two years, I’ve gone to Finland, Russia, Poland, Belarus, Czech Republic, Colombia, Brazil, Argentina, Bermuda, Ukraine, Germany, Sweden, Norway, and Iceland. Slowly I began to realize what actually made me happy. It was not material possessions, but freedom. So I made my second huge decision — fuck convention, let me be the outlier in this mass imposed ideal of social norms. I was not happy in my relationship, so in my early 30s I broke up with my girlfriend of 4+ years. I found someone to take over the lease of my wonderful yet unnecessary $60k BMW. I cut my DirecTV service. I rented out my condo, sold my 3D Plasma TV, my projection TV, my leather couch and all my furnishings. The remainder of my items (art, memorabilia, etc.) went into a friend's storage. I'm currently taking a Russian language course because, well, I can.

Fast forward to today. Jack just quit his job and partnered up with a few other attorneys to do his own thing. He's happily married with a nice large house. His wife is extremely nice and stays at home to take care of their wonderful son. They live in a great area of suburban California and he has a few investment properties scattered throughout the U.S. He has a great family close by to him, comes out with the boys when he can and generally seems very happy. I have nothing but respect for him as both an individual and a professional.

My life is constantly improving. Professionally, I've landed new clients via email in New York, drafted motions from Iceland, and held conference calls from Ukraine. I fortuitously came up against my former boss in a case and beat him recently. That client turned out to be well-connected, garnering me some substantial business from referrals. In the past two years I've been recognized by a well-respected legal organization as tops in my practice.

The flip side is I have no car and no home. I use my little brother's non-luxury car as he's away at school. I find random apartments to sublease for however long necessary when I am back in LA. And when it's time to move again, I throw my suits, clothes and laptop into my brother's car and drive to the next place. I'm free from bosses, from a relationship that wasn't right for me, and from the unnecessary luxuries and expenses that ate at my income. But most importantly, I'm happy.

Read More: It's Always Great To Be A Man

The World Is A Cockblocker

January 30, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

I'm a huge eavesdropper. I listen in on a lot of things, but one of my favorites is girls talking amongst themselves when they think no one else is listening. Over the years I've culled countless hilarious gems from their conversations.

Not long ago, I was on some public transportation and noticed that a girl was talking on her iPhone. She was, give or take, a 7 on the 1-to-10. From the tone and cadence of her voice, it was clear that she was talking to a female friend. I was only getting half of the conversation, but it was pretty easy to fill in the gaps. The overall theme was that our girl was discouraging her friend from going out with some guy she had declared "kind of lame."

It was obvious there was an asymmetry of opinion. At a certain point, she raised her voice and said:

> Look, I don't think it's a good idea to be going out with these randos anyway. This is part of the reason I haven't been dating lately.

I was (visibly) shaking my head, though no one else seemed to notice the statement, or think anything of it if they had. Just as I was feeling bad for the poor, unsuspecting sausage who was having his well poisoned by this mean-spirited, cockblocking friend, the coup de grace dropped. Our girl told her friend that she was getting another call.

By now, I was standing close enough that I could see her iPhone screen. As she looked down, I read:

> Matthew (OKCupid)

She ignored it, and went back to her friend, without missing a single step. I looked around to find the hidden camera, certain that I was on some sort of prank show. My stop was next, and I gathered my stuff, recalling something that I learned when I first "swallowed the red pill."

When you stop and think about it, it's amazing any man gets laid. At every single turn, there's something trying to stop your penis from penetrating a vagina. Often, those are things you can see. The fat friend, the crabs-in-a-bucket male opportunist, the bartender, the bouncer, the white-knight interventionist, the hovering roommate. Even your own friends—especially if they're unsuccessful, beta types—are often working against you, either out of jealousy or simple ignorance.

If life is a video game, trying to get laid is that same game set on the highest difficulty. Enemies coming from every direction, things moving super-fast, and ultra-resilient bosses.

But, on top of all that, there's also a whole set of invisible forces you rarely think about. Her mom and dad don't want you banging their daughter. There are entire websites devoted to discouraging men from talking to women on the street. Workplaces and schools routinely set "rules" (not laws) preventing consenting, legal-age adults affiliated with them from having romantic engagements. Other women—who don't even know your target—don't want a complete stranger going home with another complete stranger. "Are you okay?" "Do you want me to call you a cab?" "Where are your friends?" The list goes on.

And, as we see here, a girl's friends are tirelessly working behind-the-scenes, while they're off-the-clock, to prevent the bang. I don't know if the girl on the train had ever met this guy before, but she seemed intent on them not connecting. She likely succeeded.

Then, I see people trying to shame guys for approaching and working on multiple girls, or for honing up their game to help them even the playing field.

But never let anyone make you feel guilty for doing what you have to do—within the bounds the law, of course—to get laid. The forces against you are more numerous, powerful, and tenacious than you, one man, realizes and can take on unaided.

Read More: "You Didn't Have To Make Things Awkward"

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

Top 5 Contrary Venues To Meet Brazilian Girls in Rio

January 30, 2013 | by Hencredible Casanova | Link | Original Link

In my recent forum thread about my brief recon mission in Rio de Janiero, I mentioned a friend of mine who has been living there for the past year without any intention of leaving anytime soon. As a place with many conflicting reports and inaccurate characterizations, solid boots-on-the-ground-intel about Rio has been desperately sought in the manosphere for some time. Sensitive to this clamoring for information, I decided to pick my friend's brain to gain an insider's perspective on how to pickup chicks in Rio. Here is what he suggested:

1. Samba Schools On Weekends

Samba schools are built around a local community. The people who go to these sorts of schools are normally members and have been members since they were kids. As a result, the bitch shields are lower and people tend to be friendlier than in the complete stranger environment of places like Rio Scenarium in Lapa and other bars and clubs around the city.

2. Shopping Malls

Must speak Portuguese for this one, but pretty much every hot girl in the city is in the mall AT LEAST once a month. Why not go to the places where the ladies frequent? Tijuca shopping and Barra shopping are golden.

3. Funk Clubs

You won't find women of high quality here, but if you are looking to get your dance on, this is a great place to go for an easy pickup. Not frequented a lot by tourists. I recommend the grown and sexy ones like Rei do Bacalhau and Ilha dos Pescadores, not the ones on the favelas.

4. Extension & Continuing Ed Courses

Great place to meet high quality, educated women. Bitch shields will be near non-existent. There are often more women than men in these classes, but knowing Portuguese is a requirement.

5. Batepapo.uol.com.br

Great tool for pipelining. There are chat rooms where you can strike up convos with chicks…my girl knows several Brazilian couples who have met through here.

Happy hunting! :hump:

Read More: How To Bang A Brazilian Woman In 5 Easy Steps

About the Author

Hencredible Casanova is a prolific world traveler constantly in search of the next hotspot to sow his royal oats. Having been a writer and a consultant for the past several years, he divides his time in the US between Washington DC and San Francisco.

American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

January 30, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The NY Times, ever on top of American culture with their n=4 sample sizes, recently published The End Of Courtship. Highlights:

> "The word 'date' should almost be stricken from the dictionary," Ms. Silver said. "Dating culture has evolved to a cycle of text messages, each one requiring the code-breaking skills of a cold war spy to interpret."
>
> [...]
>
> "I've seen men put more effort into finding a movie to watch on Netflix Instant than composing a coherent message to ask a woman out," said Anna Goldfarb, 34, an author and blogger in Moorestown, N.J. A typical, annoying query is the last-minute: "Is anything fun going on tonight?" More annoying still are the men who simply ping, "Hey" or " 'sup."
>
> [...]
>
> ...the median income for young, single, childless women is higher than it is for men in many of the country's biggest cities (though men still dominate the highest-income jobs, according to James Chung, the company's president). This may be one reason it is not uncommon to walk into the hottest new West Village bistro on a Saturday night and find five smartly dressed young women dining together — the nearest man the waiter. Income equality, or superiority, for women muddles the old, male-dominated dating structure.
>
> [...]

> After an evening when she exchanged flirtatious glances with a bouncer at a Williamsburg nightclub, the bouncer invited her and her friends back to his apartment for whiskey and boxed macaroni and cheese. When she agreed, he gamely hoisted her over his shoulders, and, she recalled, "carried me home, my girlfriends and his bros in tow, where we danced around a tiny apartment to some MGMT and Ratatat remixes."
>
> She spent the night at the apartment, which kicked off a cycle of weekly hookups, invariably preceded by a Thursday night text message from him saying, 'hey babe, what are you up to this weekend?" (It petered out after four months.)

A lot can be said of this article but there is one point everyone, male and females, must understand: desirable men will not date in a way that punishes their dick. If sending text messages with "Hey" didn't work, if inviting girls for "weekly hookups" or mac n' cheese didn't work, then the highest quality men of any society simply wouldn't do it. If we were to listen to these girls and apply more courtship rituals to our game, what would happen? We wouldn't get laid! The girls would construe it as needy and overbearing.

Women can change the dating game for the entire country in just one month. If every woman in America decided to simultaneously refuse aloof advances alphas, and instead fuck men who only took them out to dinner, called them daily, and complimented their appearance, the result would be obvious. Even if you are the most alpha of alpha in your crew, you would be wining and dining girls like a simp to get vagina if that was the only way to score. But that's not what the women want. They want the Skittles man and they want the man who texts like he has a 6th grade education. And as long as they prefer that, that's all they'll get.

Don't Miss: American Men Are Fearful Of Their Women

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Do Men Fear Commitment?

January 30, 2013 | by wrand | Link | Original Link

[image]
Or do they just fear American women? A frequent diatribe of American women is that supposedly "men are afraid of commitment." Like most other feminist criticism to which we have been subject, this bit of prejudice displays not only a lack of understanding of men but also an avoidance of the truth. Anyone with normal powers of perception can see that men have been consistently stalwart in making commitments to lifelong, sometimes life-threatening ventures. Despite long odds against the highest levels of success, men make commitments to law, medicine, arts, professional sports, and military, among other things.

Although a gratifying career and respectable income are expected outcomes, the commitment to four or more years of post-graduate education leaves men with the law or medical degree but also with school loans the size of a home mortgage and more time ahead as overworked interns. The feminist who goes to the hospital must be able to simply ignore the commitment of the doctor who treats her—unless, of course, the doctor is a woman.

Many men make commitments to the arts with virtually no promise of fame or fortune. The many young men who make a commitment to sports have a better chance of ending up with the lifelong effects of physical trauma than with National Football League contracts.

My own commitments to writing and the sport of weightlifting have produced trophies, books, bylines, and aching joints, but very little in the bank. During World War II, my father fought with the United States Marine Corps in the south Pacific islands of Saipan, Tinian, and Okinawa. After serving his first tour of duty, he volunteered for a second. Fortunately, he came home alive, having been wounded twice. Evidently the feminists forgot the men who made the commitment to fight in that war and others to preserve the very freedom they use so cavalierly to condemn us. "But," the feminists say, "we're talking about commitment to a family, not that other unimportant stuff."

My grandfather married my grandmother when he was eighteen years old. He remained in that committed, loving relationship until he died at the age of seventy-five. Needless to say, my grandmother was no feminist. She, in fact, held feminists in low regard. But, let's move the calendar up. The United States 2000 census reported: "The number of single-father households rose 62 percent in 10 years" Does any of that sound like commitment to a family? In the same article, "Thomas Coleman, executive director of the American Association for Single People, attributed the rise in single dads to several reasons, including . . . more women choosing their jobs over family life." Who seems to have been showing the commitment in recent years?

Men Are Making Commitments, Just Not With You

I know of several men who are committed to their marriages. They have all been married more than ten years, and they all have several children (by the same wife) whom they love and support in the home. Significantly, these men all have foreign wives from Canada, Costa Rica, and Colombia. Two of these couples live in the United States; the others live in South America. They are all happy; I have never heard any of the men say a word of complaint about their wives (by contrast, in recent years, I haven't met a man married to a United States feminist who hasn't complained about his wife). In fact, I can see for myself that those foreign wives are sweet, loving, and loyal to their husbands and also that they are just as beautiful after having four children as they were in their wedding pictures.

Perhaps we have arrived at the crux of the problem. "Men are afraid of making commitments," American women claim. I have twice seen American men visiting Colombia make lifelong commitments of marriage to Latin women they had known for only two weeks. But Colombian women have a reputation for honesty, stability, fidelity, sex appeal, sex drive and for treating their husbands well. A man evaluating a commitment can look at an experienced doctor, lawyer, professional athlete or married man, balance the pros and cons honestly and make a decision.

That same man can look at Thai, Colombian, Peruvian, Filipina, Mexican or Canadian women who have been married for ten or so years (and/or talk with their husbands), and he can see how they treat their husbands and how they take care of themselves; then he can confidently make a decision about a commitment to the young foreign woman he loves. That's how people make commitments: they weigh the potential rewards or moral necessity of the venture against the pros and cons of attempting it. Then they commit, or they don't.

Committing To American Women Is A Mistake

A man in the United States has a problem with this strategy. The slim, long-haired, affectionate woman whom the man loves and who is screwing his brains out and promising him a lifetime of marital happiness doesn't look or act at all like the married women around him. The married men around him aren't happy. None of them are doing what they want and a lot of them are broke. They're not getting laid at home. Their wives are fat. The divorce rate suggests a coin toss as a valid measure of success in a marriage to a United States woman.

The divorced men he knows have had everything they worked for (and committed themselves to) taken from them by their ex-wives, many of whom are "ex-wives" because of feminist oppression or cheating with other men. And, most unsettling, his instincts detect a level of selfish hostility beneath the veneer of kindness affected by his girlfriend, who additionally seems to have a lot of men around who are "just friends."

Men are not afraid of making commitments—they are afraid of making a commitment to the wrong woman.

Read More: Single Women Want Your Money

About the Author

wrand was a professor of creative writing, African American literature and cultural studies at a major United States university. He is now an expatriate writer and ESL teacher living in Mexico.

5 Kickstarter Projects Whose Failures Will Cheer You Up

January 31, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

---

Kickstarter is a website where entrepreneurs show off a prototype of something they want to build and sell to the public. Instead of seeking a large amount of funding upfront, they use sales revenue from pre-orders that Kickstarter users place to get a production run started. Once a project passes a specified funding threshold, the project goes into production. For example, one might showcase a pair of premium jeans to be sold for $100, but the project will only happen if it garners more than $100,000 in funding, or 1,000 pairs of jeans. It has been used to great effect, for instance, to fund independent films – 10% of films at Sundance are Kickstarter-funded, according to the company's 2012 annual report.

Of course, even the best of technologies cannot escape exploitation at the hands of the wicked. The Soviet Union had Sputnik, and well, the fat acceptance crowd now has Kickstarter. Some have objected to the word 'fat,' as harsh; in its stead, the term Women Hailing the Acceptance of Large Entities (WHALEs) has been gaining currency.

1. Seriously Plus What? A Magazine For Women With Curves

While WHALEs have had some visibility on places like Tumblr and Reddit, their presence in the world of mainstream magazines has been rather, er, thin. This venture sought to reverse that. Thankfully it never came to fruition. My sources report that the photo above is actually a brain teaser – the goal is to figure out how she has soaked herself in sweat by merely holding two pound dumbbells. Note the WHALE's aggressive show of soggy cleavage, to remind the viewer that appearances to the contrary, she is a woman. The venture offered t-shirts to those who volunteered funds, but curiously, the smallest size available was XXL (aka 1X) – somehow there is no room for non-morbidly obese backers in this movement.

Money Raised: $788

Progress towards goal: 7%

2. Plus-Size Fashion Rolls Into NYC

The goal of this project was to raise money to get the creations of a clothing designer into a plus size fashion show in New York City. Above all, I have to recommend their promotional video to the bodybuilders out there on the 'cutting' phase of their diet, for its welcome ability to suppress appetite. The video features these women dancing, and I am told it was filmed on March 11, 2011 – a curious coincidence. My sources further report that a certain master chef named Nigel was on the scene to sate them after their arduous filming.

Money Raised: $2,117

Progress towards goal: 26%

3. Pageant of Queens – ~~Mumu~~ Plus Size Fashion TV Show

Loading…

Pageant of Queens claims its aim is to create a TV fashion show to build the self-esteem of women whose self-image and knee joints are in tatters, thanks to their copious size. But in their promotional video, the last few frames make their intent clear. Like the great Martin Luther King Jr., the WHALEs too have a fantastic dream – that every Big Beautiful woman will have at least one young, handsome buck groveling for her company, and preferably multiple. (Note how the frame above reads “OUR PURPOSE” in great big capital letters, followed by an arrow pointing to a man kneeling before her.) This dream may seem fanciful to many contemporary ears, as did those of MLK in his time. With God’s blessing, however, they will not experience the success that Dr. King’s ideas have.

Money Raised: $0

Progress towards goal: 0%

4. Bijouz Full Figured Fashion

Here we have a promotion for a new fashion line. These women are so ~~fat~~ curvy that even the favorite tensed-muscle 'arms akimbo' pose favored by attention whores everywhere cannot obscure the brobdingnagian deposits of adipose tissue dwelling on their limbs. Wait, I meant to say, ladies – you're beautiful. Again, a similar trope crops up: the only men that belong in the presence of these women are young, lean and handsome.

Money Raised: $100

Progress towards goal: 5%

5. 'Adding a PLUS SIZE line to my online shop'

Here's the palate cleanser. Honestly, this one is just spiteful. The proprietor claims she wants to expand her offerings to include clothing for fat-sized women, and then puts up a promotional video consisting of cute slim babes frolicking in bikinis at the beach. Trying to curry the attention of WHALEs by shoving skinny girls in their face is like trying to get a feminist following by attempting to murder your girlfriend. Oh wait. That might actually work.

Money Raised: $331

Progress towards goal: 33%

Alright screw it, the photo from exhibit 2 is meme-worthy. Try your hand at writing a funny caption:

Don't Miss: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

How To Wear A Beard Without Looking Like An Ax Murderer

January 31, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I have not completely shaved my face is over five years. During that time I've continuously sported a beard and have learned the dos and don'ts of how to keep it aesthetically pleasing. Here's what you need to know:

1. A beard should never be more dominant than your head hair

If your beard is more prominent, you will have the dreaded ax murderer look. It also has the effect of making your eyes more beady. Notice how these beards don't match the head hair…

2. If you have a white beard, you can grow it out as thick as you want

The white color has a balancing effect, preventing even a long white beard from clashing with a thin head of hair. Bald men with dark beard hair should keep it cropped close. Otherwise your face will look like a bushy vagina.

3. If your beard doesn’t connect, you should not grow a beard

A beard should be one continuous, lush carpet. Otherwise you look sickly, like you just got over a terrible illness.

4. Don’t get creative

Your beard should not have sharp angles or any peculiar features. Your face is not a canvas, asshole.

Loading…

5. Be careful if you’re fair-skinned

Blonde beards tend to display more weakness than strength…

6. Eyebrows can make or break the rules

Guys with thick, dark eyebrows can generally wear any beard they want (I have thick eyebrows). Guys with thin or blonde eyebrows can’t.

THIS IS THE MAN.
FRENCH CONNECTION FOR MAN

"I LIKE THE SLEEVE VERY MUCH."

7. It’s all about balance!

The beard doesn’t exist outside of the individual—it must match your existing features. Here are some examples of great beards that match the man:

Just because you can grow a beard, doesn’t mean you should. You must weigh your beard genetics with your head hair to know if you should sport one or not.

Read Next: The Perfect Woman: Hair

How Hip-Hop Was Neutered

January 31, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

I like hip-hop. Contrary to the beliefs of some of the more conservative among us, I think the form has some artistic value and can certainly be enjoyable to listen to.

I am finding it increasingly more difficult, however, to overlook some of the disturbing trends I've seen growing in modern hip-hop culture. In many ways, I shouldn't be surprised-these trends often parallel some of the general cultural developments I've outlined before, which are spreading more widely in America.

Regardless, the growing emasculation of hip hop and the devolution of some of its leading figures into insecure, gaudy, feminized, and at times frankly absurd caricatures of men (and women) has gotten me thinking lately.

Hip-hop, as we know it today, is becoming an increasingly feminine culture.

Behind all the posturing you see from these men is a tremendous amount of insecurity about themselves, their status, and their own masculinity, as well as quite a bit of feminine style and energy.

This is part of why they promote such exaggerated, dysfunctional caricatures of what it means to be a man (ex: urban gang culture). They have no model for real masculinity because, in the matriarchies they come from, there simply are no fathers or other stable male authority figures to show them what that looks like. So, since they've got no template to go on, they simply make it up and try to derive new ways of "proving" their manhood.

The Journey To Urban Manhood

"Taking yo' bitch" is one way to prove maturity. In order to make this work, you must be sure to let everyone know you banged that other dude's girl via music or social media. Be sure to rap or instagram about it. Simply having sex with her isn't enough. Rather, it is the fact that everyone else knows you had sex with her that marks your manhood. So make sure they find out-attention whoring is your friend.

Snagging "the bad bitch" is another way to show one's manhood. Again, you can't just bang her. You gotta talk about it, rap about it, or tape it if you can. The world needs to know that you have the girl they want. Not necessarily the girl you want, but the one that they want.

This is similar in some ways to how women often choose men based in large part on their status or ability to impress her peers. This growing internalization of female attraction cues is leading to a larger number of male groupies in the world of hip-hop, men who (like women) prioritize status and peer approval over raw physical attraction.

“Shinin” is another way to prove to the hip-hop world that you’re a man. To do this, you’ve gotta have the biggest chains, shiniest/newest cars, flash the most money, roll on the biggest rims, and just generally spend like money is not an obstacle.

The key is not merely for you to enjoy your cash or the objects it can buy, but rather to make sure that everyone knows you’ve got that cash and how much it cost you to get those objects. If nobody knows, then it is really not worthwhile.

Loading...

Oh, and forget about building wealth—this isn't how you prove your manhood. You've got to spend as much as possible, so don't bother with things like home ownership. Lease and rent everything you can if it makes folks think you've got more cash.

Attention whoring via social media is another key to establishing your manhood. Instagram, Facebook and Twitter offer worthy platforms for you to prove your achievement of the many "manly goals" listed above. You can show off your bad bitch/other-dude's girl, let the world see your new ride, and even show off your cash flow directly.

We pulled up 2 the club at 12am! 17 minutes later #JaCCpOt already 10 rax in.. Ended the night at 25 rax goin in!! http://t.co/7LKbPvu about 5 hours ago via Echofon

Retweeted by 93 people

Reply Retweet

DeseanJackson10
Desean Jackson

The Colony
1743 Cahuenga Blvd
Los Angeles, CA 90028
323.525.2450

28 BRITTANY

Tbl 33/1 Chk 7505 Gst 1
Jun28'11 12:17AM

Table
8 Bottle Water 48.00
3 MAG Grey Goose 2550.00
2 BTL Patron Silvr 850.00
4 Ace of Spades 4400.00

SUBTOTAL 7848.00
20% SERVICE 1569.60
TAX 918.22
01:31AM TOTAL DUE 10335.82

www.sbe.com
smart luxury

We're used to social media attention whoring being a predominantly female phenomenon, but in hip-hop culture it is just as much a male one. Just as teenaged girls have to document every little socially relevant step they take, these men must do the same.

The Feminized Product

For all the posturing and attempted maintenance of an outwardly sexual, hyper-masculine frame, these men seem largely incapable of showing the independent spirit that is so often the essence of masculinity, the spirit that allows a man to go his own way even without extensive peer approval or adulation. Instead, like women, they are slaves the collective and have always got to prove themselves to everyone else-what the world thinks ALWAYS matters.

It isn't just about getting yours, its about making sure everyone else knows you got yours.

It is in this way that the culture reveals its growing femininity as it directly parallels female social structures. Just as girls work tirelessly to secure peer approval and conform to group social norms while rarely deviating from them, male adherents to the hip-hop culture and their deities in the entertainment industry work tirelessly to win the praise of their peers and posture to look as integrated with the culture as they can.

Like women, they rely heavily on fashion trends and attention whoring to aid them in these endeavors. Like women, they gossip and feud (or "beef") over trivial things. Like women, they're obsessed with brand names and jewelry. Like women, they love bright jewelry created by females, skinny jeans originally designed for feminine forms, Birkin bags and even skirts.

Truly masculine men once ruled the world of hip-hop. Much of the foundation for what we now know as game came from within the urban communities that birthed this culture, and we who benefit from the growth of a community surrounding game (which ultimately gave rise to sites like this) owe a lot to that. Increasingly, I fear that this legacy is being left behind, another victim of the west's seemingly unending bid to neuter the remnants of its masculinity.

Read Next: The Best Book Of 2012 For Men

4 Common Mistakes That Kill Your Game

January 31, 2013 | by decomposer917 | Link | Original Link

There are words and moves that are so weak and that are so inherently beta that they bring a fatal blow to your game. These game-killers are as important to keep in mind as they are easy to avoid…

1. Giving or taking Facebook contact information.

If you met a girl, the last thing you want to do is downgrade you interaction to Facebook. If you are interested in her, there is no reason to either make her your Facebook "friend" or become one of her 500 Facebook friends. If she asks you "Are you on Facebook?" this is a perfect opportunity for you to mess with her lightly and ask "Why?" When you refuse to take your communication all the way down to Facebook, you will stand out so much in this day and age, when so many guys out there think that Facebook is the "safe" way to go. Perhaps they mistakenly use the term "safe" where "lame" would be more appropriate.

2. Giving your number out to girls.

Realize that the girl who takes your number is not going to call you. Very few women can hop over the well set social barrier and call the guy first, even when they are the one who get the guy's number and even when they are interested in seeing that guy again. If you ask the girl for her number and she says: "Why don't you give me your number instead?" you should say that you are a gentleman, and you believe that the gentleman should be the one calling the lady. If she still doesn't give you her number, then you say "Never mind" and walk away. She didn't give you her number because she is either not interested, or too careful for her own good , or socially confused. Either way, there is nothing you can or should be doing about it.

[image]

3. Bragging.

This is another classic beta behavior and a huge turn-off to women. The more you talk about how accomplished and great you are, the more likely you are to come across as an insecure puppy who needs to be patted on his back. I seriously doubt that the likes of Bill

Gates or Warren Buffet have the need to announce about how successful they are. You are not Bill Gates but you can certainly learn from him how not to try to impress others. You best way of impressing might just be simply not trying to impress.

4. Small talk.

Small talk is meant to be an ice-breaker, not the “meat and potatoes” of your interactions with girls. Making comments about weather, her earrings and what’s on your plate at a dinner table is not going to make you sound interesting to be around, and it’s not going to make her want to see you again. Excessive political correctness might have been programmed for you since you remember yourself being able to talk, but it’s also an express, one-way ticket to boring the girl to death or, at best, to friends zone, which I am sure you want to avoid.

By avoiding these four mistakes you already jump your game to the next level. Try it.

Read More: Facebook Is Hurting Your Game

22 Responses to 4 Common Mistakes That Kill Your Game

1. Anonymous

February 1, 2013 at 5:24 pm
good post, would be nice to see some more game tips now and then as they seem to have vanished completely

Reply

2. kosmos
February 1, 2013 at 5:59 pm
I think Facebook is way much more efficient that a phone number. You'd better get used to it as it will be the standard way to keep in touch soon.

Reply

- Brandon 2.0
February 1, 2013 at 6:05 pm
psh, facebook is old news and on the way out. I deleted my account forever ago. It's still good for business promotion, but that'd be it.

Reply

  - Adam
February 1, 2013 at 9:33 pm
Yup. Been over 2 years since I deleted my facebook. Don't see why dudes are still on that shit. Telling girls that I don't use facebook is also a DHV imo.

- corvinus
February 1, 2013 at 7:58 pm
I agree. I think Facebook can work, but only if you avoid making mistakes 2, 3, and 4 (or 3, 3, and 4 rather) AND restrict your activity to getting phone numbers and making dates with girls on the Facebook Chat.

Dumping your life story on Facebook is what chicks do… perhaps it should be called Chickbook.

Reply

  - kosmos

February 1, 2013 at 8:47 pm
Of course if you use it like a beta you would be beta like any other way to contact her. I've got some chicks I cold approached in real life very into me after a few Facebook chat. It's like saying that calling on the phone is better that texting whereas no young girls answer to their phone anymore ahah

Brandon 2.0, I agree, I meant social networks/internet in general.

- taterearl
  February 2, 2013 at 5:11 am
  Facebook is nothing more than a chick circle jerk.

3. RASER
   February 1, 2013 at 7:14 pm
   The number "2″ is missing "2″

   Reply

4. anon1
   February 1, 2013 at 7:30 pm
   point 3.
   it depends,

   if you're doing something like chatting with them, and they give an indication that they'd like to meet up with you again, you can say 'yeah text me' and give them your number. (i.e. the sale has already been made and you're making her do the delivery)

   if its the situation you mentioned where she's just trying to wind you out of giving up her digits, then i agree its bullshit and a waste of time.

   for me, i'm lazy. if a girl is interested in me and down to bang, i'll either try that night, or let her make the effort, texting me and so forth. and then the conversation via text is short and sporadic, and only about meeting up. i let her take those extra steps of effort. and in the end when she gets the bang she feels like she's won a prize.

   Reply

5. gaoxiaen
February 1, 2013 at 7:37 pm
If she asks for my number, I give it to her.

Reply

- Ride4life
February 2, 2013 at 1:49 am
Same here, and even then I try to hesitate.

My attitude is simple; I don't give a fuck!

What does that do? It makes girls drool after me.

Reply

6. logicwontgetmelaid
February 1, 2013 at 8:21 pm
I find it extremely difficult to avoid bragging. I understand that DHV has to be snuck covertly into conversation, but it just never comes off that way. I killed a text exchange dead recently where she was flaking due to being exhausted from a camping trip, but she offered to reschedule. Like an idiot, I said I felt the same way when I got back from an earlier trip and asked when she was available. Never heard from her again. Bragging AND qualifying for the lose. While not a jumbo-tron fail, saying "yeah, for sure" and texting a new date a few days later would have sufficed.

It's damn difficult fighting against decades of garbage brain programming, but it's worth the pain and effort.

Reply

7. Anonymous
February 2, 2013 at 1:33 am
"Warrant Buffet?"

Reply

8. Ride4life
February 2, 2013 at 1:47 am

Are you for real?

This is the era of easy sex. You know, girls are liberated now. :-)

Reply

9. Bryan
February 2, 2013 at 8:13 am
3. Bragging

Same advice found in Dale Carnegie's "Winning Friends and Influencing People". Don't talk about yourself; ask and talk about her. In the professional world your acquaintance will think you're a fantastic conversationalist. For your game, it will do the same thing and add an aura of mystery about you that will keep her interested. My .02

Reply

10. 3rd Millenium Men
February 2, 2013 at 9:24 am
Great succinct article and all really good points.

Reply

11. prepman
February 2, 2013 at 11:54 am
For all those that still think Facebook and Internet dating are still more "efficient"…

While you're hitting up dozens of girls on FB and OKCupid, et. al, I'm interrupting them from responding to your virtual adoration by approaching them at the bar, lounge, club, coffee shop, boring dance recital, library, park, etc. — anyplace I see girls transfixed to their iPhones and/or laptops.You might as well be kicking penalty shots at the Brazilian goalie from mid-field. I'm kicking him in the nuts and rolling the ball in the goal while he's on the deck writhing in agony.

Get out there and do the work lads! Facebook means nothing!@ Phone numbers mean nada! Kino and kiss are fun, but mean nothing! Bring home the BANG.

Spend your time online honing your game. Sharpen the saw, as S. Covey says, then go out and clear cut a forest.

Reply

12. corvinus
February 2, 2013 at 3:27 pm
I would add another one:

Facing your body toward her.

Learned that one from CH, and it's totally 100% true. If you're talking when doing so, you come off as overeager, and if you're just standing there, you can come across as a creepy hoverer. If you face your body obliquely away, to the side or whatever, you come off as much more casual and cool.

Related to this is staring at her. Has anyone watched the South Park episode "Spookyfish"? Yeah. Exactly.

Also, I would recommend getting a pheromone cologne. There are several different brands, and I know that Pherlure does work, and it's also quite stable over time. It is my opinion that because of the pseudoestrogens in the water supply (female Pill-laden urine) and the food supply (soy products), that men aren't giving off their natural pheromones to as great a degree as they used to, along with our lowered sperm counts. Therefore, we may have to consider phermonones a nutritional supplement like vitamins.

Reply

- Tom
February 3, 2013 at 10:29 am
Are these pheromone products really effective? Seems like snake oil to me but I'd like to know others' opinions.

Reply

13. Blackdragon
February 2, 2013 at 6:12 pm
The small talk thing is huge. Men are constantly talking about all the boring crap they think they're "supposed" to talk about, rather than things that will turn a woman on or create sexual interest.

Reply

14. Manufacturer

February 2, 2013 at 7:40 pm
Giving out your number can depend on the situation. If you give it to her but don't take hers, then if she does call you know she's down. Saves a lot of wasted time.

Reply

15. Nick
February 2, 2013 at 8:46 pm
Can you elaborate on the small talk thing? What exactly does and does not constitute "small talk"? Obviously talking about the weather and what she does for a living is small talk, but do you have a link or something to some conversation topics that would NOT be considered small talk?

Thanks in advance,
Nick'

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

The Matrix Is Getting Pissed

February 1, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Admittedly the YouTube spoofs of the 2004 movie "Der Untergang" have become all too annoyingly frequent. Nonetheless the above clip is short, funny, yet sadly enough echoes the same dialog happening behind closed doors of the powers that be. For the German speakers viewing the clip I advise to turn down the volume to maximize the viewing experience (Für alle Deutschsprechenden, ich glaube ist besser drehen Sie die Lautstärke zuruck).

Make no mistake about it: the issues being addressed in this parody that you read in the subtitles is what is going through the minds of the government with regards to the increasing rise of single mothers combined with an increasing rise of men opting out of marriage tyranny.

In addition to the system using feminism to keep an iron fist on men, it also has to deal with single welfare mothers. Genuine deadbeat dads evading their responsibility is one thing, but aside from that issue, we are seeing a lot of irresponsibility on the part of women, as well as a draconian effort on the part of government to destroy men's lives.

Today's modern woman is not held accountable for her actions, so she essentially has carte blanche to live her life recklessly, get knocked up like a farm animal, and pop out an illegitimate kid. So what does The Matrix do? The answer is quite simple: For every welfare mother out there, the system finds some unsuspecting schmuck to stick the dinner check onto. This is a practice done by all States in America and it continues to get worse.

Loading...
DNA tests that prove the accused is not the father are dismissed by judges being the gavel wielding fascists pigs that they are. In many cases the judges will not even allow a DNA test to be done. It has gotten to the point where any woman can point a finger at a man whom she has never met and simply lie to the State that he is the father of her child. The State happily goes along with this because they know damn well they can extort a certain amount of short term money from the falsely accused before he eventually takes his case to a higher court and gets the judgement overturned. And bear in mind any money he loses cannot be reclaimed.

These case scenarios are just a couple of examples that have become common place today:

- Man's paycheck garnished for child support from women he doesn't even know
- Ditto for this guy. He apparently was 7 years old when he fathered a child

Although the worst of paternity fraud plays out in countries like the USA and UK, suffice it to say that involving one's self with a female in the Western World is extremely high risk. Maybe in the future things will change for the betterment of men, but I do not see anything on the horizon at this point in time that would suggest any rationality or sanity being brought to the system.

Read Next: You're A Monster If You Don't Support The Welfare State

14 Things I Learned From The Wealth Of Nations

February 1, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The original book seemed a little too unwieldy for me so I read the cliff notes over at Grade Saver. Here is what I learned…

1. The division of labor increases productivity and therefore increases wealth. Instead of producing all the things you need, produce one in excess and trade for everything else.

2. Human beings are natural traders. They give things they have in abundance for other things they want.

3. "Improvements to art and industry are made only when there is an assurance of a large market that will be able to absorb the products of labor."

4. A large population is needed to ensure a market for your goods. This is why urban developments have naturally formed.

5. Thriving economies are dependent on people who are motivated by self-interest.

6. "A situation in which the market price of labor is either significantly above or significantly below its natural price will be checked by actions of the laborers, who either devote themselves to a particular employment due to the high wages, or who turn their attention to other employments because wages are too low."

7. Growth is necessary in all economies. "In a stagnant economy, even a wealthy one, the lowest classes will be desperately poor."

8. Writers and entertainers are maintained by the annual produce of the productive land and labor of a country. There can't be a country of only entertainers. "Unproductive labor is not unnecessary or useless, but it does not create economic surpluses. It is funded from labor that does indeed create these surpluses."

Loading…

9. Once a society reaches a high level of opulence, resources get diverted to increasing amounts of unproductive labor, leading to decline.

10. "It takes a strong legal system for capitalism to flourish, because those who are prepared to invest must have the confidence that their capital will be protected."

11. "It is the nature of governments to hold tightly to their power, even if increased freedom would benefit the people and the economy."

12. "Anything that is self-sustaining may not be defined as unproductive."

13. “Perfect liberty [is] the only effective way to render the annual production the greatest possible.”

14. “The wealth of nations consists not in money, but in the consumable annual goods annually produced by the labor of the society.”

The book also had insight into the economy of the American colonies right before the revolutionary war.

I read the summary of this book because I’m getting the impression that politicians are bamboozling us when it comes to economics. I wanted to reach back to a source that is untainted with modern capitalist thought.

The more of this type of reading I do, the more I come to the conclusion that liberal economic policies based on a welfare or equality model is incompatible with growing and robust economies where actual wealth is generated. Capitalists take a large risk through investment, and only in societies where they feel that risk will be rewarded will such an investment occur. Understanding the fundamental rules of economics allows you to make sense of government action today and how they will fall far short of their intended purposes.

Read More: The Wealth Of Nations

7 Things You Need To Shave Like A Real Man

February 2, 2013 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

It’s Sunday night. You’re starting to look like this bro…

photo credit: Flikr

You have work in the morning, so you need to look like more like this guy…

photo credit: Flikr

You normally use one of these…

photo credit: Flikr

But you are getting sick of these prices…

photo credit: Flikr

There is a better way. Wet shaving is how your grandpa did it, and also Hemingway. It will cost you more up front to buy the gear. But it will save you money in the long run. Here are the 7 things you need to buy so you can shave like a real man.

1. A heavy, double-edged safety razor. Get a long-handled version if you have big hands.

photo credit: Flikr

Merkur Model 180 DE Razor

2. A silvertip badger hair brush. The stiff hair helps soften your beard.

photo credit: Jeremy Brooks via photopin cc

Parker Silvertip Bristle Brush

That’s right, badger. How many brushes will they get out of this one?

Photo credit: Andreas-photography via photopin cc

3. A good shave mug. Don’t use a coffee cup.

Loading...

Colonel Conk Shave Mug Model 129

4. Shave soap. Pricey soap is nice but the cheap stuff works just as well.

photo credit: ilmungo via photopin cc

Colonel Conk Shaving Soap

5. Razor blades. Buy the variety pack and test them all. 100 blades for $25 on Amazon. I like the Feather Platinum.

photo credit: Flikr

DE Razor Variety Pack

6. Quality after shave. Or Old Spice.

photo credit: Flikr

Bay Rum

7. A stand. Not absolutely necessary, but it looks cool and keeps brush and blade dry.

photo credit: Flikr

Colonel Conk Shave Stand

Then, learn to shave. Like Mr. Fassbender does it. It will take some practice.

photo credit: NYTimes Blog

Reap your well-deserved reward…

photo credit: inlinguaManchester via photopin cc

Read More: How To Wear A Beard Without Looking Like An Ax Murderer

Are You On Pace To Reach Your Goals?

February 2, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Today is February 2, 2013 and you're one month closer to death. What have you done this year to improve yourself? Some may say New Years resolutions are cop-outs for actually setting reasonable goals, instead of starting today we say "In a week I'll hit the gym and finally get ripped!" I like the idea of coming up with goals and plans to achieve them for January 1st of the next year. The start of each year is a mental rebirth, January 1 is a new snow begging for you to make fresh tracks in it, a blank canvas yearning to be painted on.

However, many do use New Years resolutions to feel better about themselves. They gorge themselves on baked goods, drink heartily and fail to exercise throughout the month of December telling themselves that "next year will be different" and "just one last time before I change." This is not the case for us here at Return of Kings. We are different — writers, readers, and commenters all strive to build themselves into the man they want to be.

Personally, I had some slip-ups through the month of January, but what sets the determined apart from the shambling masses is that we pick ourselves up and keep pushing forward one step at a time . I started the year off strong my days and nights booked full with dates, time with girlfriends, reconnecting with old friends. I eschewed online dating and become more social during the day time. I broke PRs on all of my lifts, dropped a few pounds, and sought coaching for the Olympic lifts.

Most importantly I held myself accountable for all of my actions. If I ate too much, drank too much or didn't take opportunities I should have, I picked myself up and adapted. Push forward and give everything you have. How bad do you want it?

Loading...

What happens when you reach your goal? Do you aim higher, or do you stop there and remain content with being slightly above average? If you choose the latter and have finite, concrete goals you are already anticipating the day you can quit building yourself. You're doomed for failure. Don't ever miss an opportunity to get better, take risks , analyze your successes/failures, and don't stop until you've surpassed your goals. Then strive to be better, faster and stronger.

What are your goals for 2013? Are they SMART? Do you have a purpose? Do you want to have sex with more beautiful women, learn a language, lift more weight and make more money? Do you have an accountability buddy or do you journal and meticulously track your progress?

How is your progress going?

Read Next: A Tale of Two Men

Brutal Takedown Of Budding Feminist Writer

February 2, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

We were recently mentioned in The Gateway, a student newspaper for the University of Alberta. The reporter, Paige Gorsak, confused us for men's rights activists…

> Last week, the blog Return of Kings posted a list of the nine ugliest feminists. But even more unfortunate than the list itself is that the blog is not alone in its view. Columns and websites that are misogynistic and openly anti-feminist plague the internet, where screen names protect identities and allow for so-called free speech. Even Edmonton has its own chapter of Men's Rights Activists.
>
> It's important to define what men's rights activism is. Coming from the local group, an MRA is a man or woman concerned with issues like "male circumcision, men's reproductive rights, domestic violence awareness, antifeminism, misandry, chivalry and false allegations." These vague descriptors are explained in further detail on the website site [sic], but the basis of the legitimate causes are explained and argued for in the framework of anti-feminism.

The other week I was called a PUAMRA. I predict that in one month I will be labeled a merman.

Here are two pictures of Paige Gorsak so you can visualize how her face must have looked when she was destroyed in a comment I'm about to share:

Here’s the comment:

Loading…

> Thank you, Paige, for your opinion piece about Men’s Rights Activism. In particular, thank you for using fallacious arguments to suggest that because you don’t care for the mission and the tactics of some MRA’s, MRA’s are a farce. Thank you for demonstrating that hasty generalization, straw man, false equivalence and other lapses of logic are not limited to men alone. Thank you for demeaning what many men perceive to be an inherent violation of bodily autonomy and integrity by dismissively saying that it’s not as bad as the “very real issue” of female circumcision. Thank you for grudgingly acknowledging that some MRA’s aren’t a complete waste of time and, as self-appointed Spokeswoman for Feminism, deigning to give me permission to advocate for those things that you believe should be important to me as a man. Thank you for making it clear that it is ok for a member of one gender to tell another gender what to think. Thank you for misrepresenting feminism as a unequivocally, schism-free homogenous quest for good, unlike fractious and controversial men’s rights, and that it is acceptable to define a civil rights movement by an outsider’s perception of its basest members. Most importantly, thank you for demonstrating the self-righteous ignorance and arrogance that drives much of the anti-feminist sentiment that you observed in many of the groups you wrote about. I also would like to pre-emptively thank you for misunderstanding this comment as an attack on women and feminism in general, rather than a criticism of the vapid and condescending nonsense you somehow had the temerity to publish.

What I want to ask Paige is why? As a young woman with the potential to be pretty, why are you putting one ounce of your energy into gender issues instead of focusing on your appearance (i.e., exercising and exerting more willpower over your diet)? If you lived in Eastern Europe, you'd be thin and pleasing. You wouldn't even know what feminism was. But thanks to your poisonous environment, you're turning into a fat, vapid idiot who is slated to be brainwashed further into hating the only gender who can give you any type of happiness in life: men. It's not too late Paige. Stop reading feminist blogs and hit the gym instead. Thank me later.

P.S. Would you bang?

Read Next: Brilliant Takedown Of Feminism From An Old Man

6 Things Indian Guys Have To Understand When Learning Game

February 3, 2013 | by bojangles | Link | Original Link

As a guy of Indian ethnicity there are some obstacles you have to overcome in order to have a balanced game. Circumstances can dictate what these are but following my last post a red pill infused Indian pal of mine and myself had a conversation about what these obstacles are:

1. Let go of limiting beliefs about being an Indian in the Western world

What do I mean by "limiting beliefs"? There is a particular mindset among Indian guys that they can only get with Indian girls. You must let go of these fears dictating that your ethnicity holds you back in what you can do. Being Indian does not mean you have to work in IT, accounting, business, construction or own a corner shop as in the same way it does not mean you have to date Indian girls.

2. Let go of your mummy's sari

It's something I've noticed among the large Indian community here in London: there are a large number of mummy's boys, men who are afraid to stand up to their mothers and what they want themselves. No one wants to disrespect their parents but also at the same time standing up for what you want should be your primary objective. Many a man will 'settle' with their girlfriends due to pressure from their mothers. As one acquaintance said, he preempted conflict by just doing what his mother wanted, even though he does not love the girl he married.

3. Let go and expand beyond your Indian comfort zone

Your extended family plays a large part of your life (not a bad thing), but a lot of guys also have their friends circle exclusively Indian. Expand your knowledge, gain new friends, travel, and learn new languages. It's a difficult transition to move from becoming over reliant on this little setup to independence from all influence, but it can be done and it will benefit your internal well being. The thing to remember is you are the average of the five people you spend most of your time with. It is highly likely none of your existing five friends will agree with your path into game. They will tell what is 'best for you' but in essence this is them subconsciously pulling you back down to their value as you increase your own.

4. Stop putting white women on a pedestal

White women are easy, white women are fun, white women are flirts, white women are great at sex or white women are sluts. Whatever white women are, as an Indian guy you must stop putting them on a pedestal for being all these sexually related things that you think Indian girls are not. There is no magical things that white women do that others do not. Besides, there is not a certain place in the world where white women will see you and jump on your cock as there is not a certain Bollywood film that will make a white woman gush all wet and demand you ravage her Aryan style. White woman pedestalization can be categorized as an inferiority complex displayed by Indian men. Stop thinking you're inferior to any woman regardless of her ethnic/racial origins.

Loading...

5. Understand that Indian girls are not different and are not more chaste

Being constantly around these Indian girls at family gatherings, community events and religious events makes you programmed into believing that you will marry one for certain because of their chaste and low promiscuity. A strong belief that Indian girls don't ride the cock carousel is blind faith because they do. In fact, all women in the western world do regardless of culture and their strong family traditional values. They are women, they get pussy tingles to the same game as white, black, Asian, orange, maroon and kiwi women. They have the same subconscious processes as all women that help them place a value on a man and inevitable slamming and spunk gobbling if he passes with flying colors. In a Western society these girls have the same external pressures and influences that appeal to their inner slut as much as any other woman. Your objective as a man is not to fall into the line of romantic thinking that they are different.

6. Do not be afraid of The Man

There's a man, a dominant man, somewhere in your family. He dictates, he dominates, and he makes the decisions. You have a fear of causing him displeasure. You do as he says as he's done the leading since your father emptied his ball sack into your mother. Stop. As much as a lot of Indian men have pressures from being mummy's little lad, there's plenty of them that disintegrate under the pressure of their fathers or uncles. Avoiding conflict is prevalent in your attitude, you do as you are told even though your mind is telling you this is not in your interest and possibly not in the wider interests of those close to you but you do it, as Uncle or Dad has told you to.

No one is telling you to fight, but start slowly, speak out, say what you think is best for you, get out of your shell and decide how you will live your life, not how Dad thinks you should live your life. You might be scared of the conflict and dissuade yourself from it but trust me when you finally grow some balls and exude some confidence and ability in yourself, these men will respect you, see you as equal, and place trust in your decisions.

This list could also apply to other cultures who follow similar dynamics to Indian culture, but don't stop at the above and think that's all you have to do—you still have to hit the ground running and approach just like any other guy learning game.

Read More: Taking The Red Pill Destroyed My Family

8 Cars You'll Never Be Able To Afford

February 3, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

---

1. Bugatti Veyron Super Sports $2,400,000

Easily the most expensive street legal production car available on the market today, the Bugatti Veyron Super Sports can go from 0-60 mph in 2.5 seconds. It is also the fastest street legal car in the world.

2. Aston Martin One-77 $1,850,000

Only 77 units of this 0-60 mph in 3.4 seconds automobile exists, hence the extreme cost. The sheer power of the 750 horse power Aston Martin One-77 is capable of melting female passengers panties almost instantly.

3. Lamborghini Reventon $1,600,000

The Reventon is hands down the most powerful Lamborghini ever built and it looks like it came straight from 2050 instead of 2007, hence the exorbitant price tag.

4. McLaren F1 $970,000

Built all the way back in good ol' 1994, the McLaren F1 was the fastest and most expensive car in the world back in the day. Despite it's age, it has a top speed of an astronomical 240 mph and can hit 60 mph in 3.2 seconds.

5. Ferrari Enzo $670,000

The most popular supercar ever built. The Enzo has a top speed of 217 mph and can go from 0 to 60 mph in 3.4 seconds. Only 400 were produced, hence why many are sold for over $1,000,000 at auctions.

Loading...

6. Pagani Zonda C12 F $660,000

Produced by a relatively obscure Italian brand, the Pagani Zonda C12 F is one of the sleekiest and most expensive cars in the world. It delivers a top speed of 215 mph and goes from 0-60 mph in 3.5 seconds.

7. Mercedes Benz E63 AMG Sedan $90,000

You'll need to make upper middle management to afford this wonderful feat of German engineering.

8. Subaru WRX STI $34,000

This is a speedy car that will get the heart pumping of any female passenger you happen to have, but at $34,000 stock it is out of reach for most middle class men in America. The Toyota Prius is a more economical choice at $24,000.

Keep Reading: 8 Great Lifestyle Cars For Under $15,000

12 Ways Danish Women Are Different From Brazilian Women

February 3, 2013 | by Kris | Link | Original Link

---

1. Danish girls act like guys.

After feminism had it's big triumphant waves rinsing the Danish countryside, we were left with some excellent female friends who want to be like us. Unfortunately they threw their feminine side out in the process, cutting their hair short, burning bras, and growing distinct male characteristics. This has not happened in they same way in Brazil, where the women kept their femininity, even if they are well educated and career minded.

2. Brazilian women are clean and take showers up to 5 times a day.

Danish women only shower once a day. This has obviously something to do with the different climate, but still it's nice to know that the "sweat spot" has been through several checkpoints during the day

3. Summer dresses, high heels and bikinis are, not surprisingly, a huge part of the Brazilian wardrobe.

As a man I can only say: "It's awesome!" In Denmark the weather doesn't allow for such boner-pleasing outfits except for the occasional two days of summer in July, where Danish women show off their white marble columns.

4. Danish women have cold attitude.

When Danish women venture out doing their daily tasks like grocery shopping or whatnot, they grab the nearest potato sack, put in the classical white iPhone earplugs and tramp/bike down to the local supermarket with a "Don't talk to me!" attitude. Brazilian women simply do some quick adjustments to that already perfect look in front of the mirror and slide gracefully down the sidewalk with an open minded, positive look in their eyes.

5. Brazilian people have a natural, healthy relationship with their bodies.

This makes sense in a sunny nation with an acute beach culture, but this can not be said about Danish people which has resulted in an awkward bed culture with lights off and blinds down during mechanical intercourse.

6. When asking for directions in Brazil, the women will kindly explain how to reach your destination, or even walk you some of the way.

In Denmark women will give you a suspicious look before unwillingly pulling out the earplugs to find out what your are rambling about and if you are a potential threat.

7. Brazilian women have for the most part really nice teeth.

Even if they don't have their father's extensive health plan coverage through Petrobraz or similar corporations, they brush their teeth 3-5 times a day and go to extreme lengths if correcting need be. Danish women brush their teeth only twice per day if you're lucky. In addition, those straight pearls granted from above are quite random, although not as random compared to the British royal family.

Loading...

8. Danish women are honest and raised with that circle pedagogy where everything should be debated in a friendly manner.

This is actually good and bad, because sometimes it's just nice to have a good old fashion fight. Brazilians have a tendency to give white lies and are masters at yelling each other to pieces, making up afterwards with big emotions and aggressive lovemaking.

9. Small talk combined with a genuine interest in new acquaintances are some of the trademarks in Brazil.

You can in many cases walk up to almost anyone and initiate a conversation about the weather, traffic, or football without it being weird and intrusive. Needless to say you will be regarded as a pervert doing that in Denmark.

10. It takes a long time to claw down the defenses that a Danish woman surrounds herself with.

Once you are in (after one or two years), you might just have a friend for life. The same can be said of the Brazilian woman, but in addition, after ten minutes you can be kissing her like you're a teenager again.

11. Brazilian women are jealous as hell.

If you are hoping to continue talking with your female single friends and ex-girlfriends while in a relationship with a Brazilian, which is not uncommon in Denmark, forget about it! A Brazilian woman will methodically make you go through each one of your female friends, putting you on the witness stand as she hammers down the verdict by which you are to comply.

12. Brazilians are a mixed race and you can recognize all kinds of characteristics in the faces when you walk down the street.

Out of that equation has come some of the most refined curvy women on the planet, with which Danish women simply can not compete. But, if you're into those slim hips and boyish behinds, you will certainly not waste your time in Denmark.

There are other aspects that these twelve points don't cover, like Janteloven (Jante Law), influence of beta and alpha males, structure of society, etc. They should be viewed as slightly caricatured observations. There is always that one exception in both cultures who doesn't fit in here, and thank God for that.

And thank God for Brazil!

Read Next: How To Bang A Brazilian Woman In 5 Easy Steps

Everything You Need To Know About Croatian Girls

February 3, 2013 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

---

1. Croatian girls are tall, tan, and thin. They primarily have a Mediterranean complexion of light olive skin, brown hair, and brown eyes, though blondes are not uncommon. Their long necks accentuate graceful, model-like figures. They have round asses but generally small breasts. They are, hands down, the most beautiful girls I've seen in my European travels, blowing away just about everywhere else except for pockets in the Baltics. They are both sexier and hotter than Polish and Ukrainian girls.

2. While Croatian girls are feminine, they seem ready for Westernization. Girls openly complain about wearing heels. If god came down from the sky and told them they didn't have to be feminine anymore, the streets would be littered with makeup kits, shoes, and other beauty accessories. There's a lazy "Why bother?" vibe I picked up, meaning it's no surprise that there's a high acceptance of hipsterism and the sloppy dress that it entails.

3. Most girls are sweethearts, but several negative personality traits will reveal themselves to you after a while. Girls can be crass, picky, lazy, and, most importantly, critical. Croatian girls are the pickiest I've encountered, with many girls openly criticizing me early in the approach about my physical flaws or chosen line of conversation. Not only will they constantly judge you, but they will do so in undiplomatic terms. The more confident the girl is, the more you'll encounter these negative personality traits.

4. They are hypergamous by nature. Girls with boyfriends will be completely open to an approach, not dropping that fact until late in the game. For this reason I've made it a requirement to ask about the boyfriend within 15 minutes. Whether that's good game or not, it made the difference for me in not getting strung along in text messaging hell with girls who wanted to play the field while in a relationship. Unfortunately, a large percentage of Croatian girls have boyfriends, but of course there are still many single girls around.

5. Almost all girls speak English. Everyone has to learn it in school from a young age.

6. Foreigners are well-liked. It's not that Croatian girls don't like their own dudes, but they feel that their country is boring and dull. They want to meet guys from exciting places like United States and England.

7. They offer a much better ROI than Ukrainian girls. In Ukraine you have the tough Eastern mentality, transactional female natures, rectum cities, and language barriers. In Croatia you have a pleasant capital city with English speakers and girls who are easier to get into bed. It's a no-brainer to pick Croatia over Ukraine, though the verdict is still out on who makes a better girlfriend. Beware: the word is out on Croatian girls and you will have to deal with other love tourist competition in the next five years.

8. My game in Croatia automatically turned cocky because of the amount of attitude I encountered. The attitude wasn't automatic, but it happened enough where I had to turn on the parts of my game that I haven't used since America, especially when it came to getting cockblocked or bitched out by a fat friend. As long as you stay out of the snobbiest venues in the city, you shouldn't have too many problems with this.

9. Isolation away from friends is key. Once you master isolation, you master banging Croatian girls. The move that helped me isolate and led to the most bangs was "Let's go for a walk." You must resist all her attempts to de-isolate in the form of bringing girlfriends along. If you're going for a fast bang, there is no benefit to trying to wow her social circle.

10. The older women (approaching 30) put out many spinster characteristics that are similar to their American counterparts. Their attitude is rougher, they play a lot of games, and they constantly test you. At an age where they should have a softer vibe in the hopes of competing against their younger counterparts, they can be a pain in the ass to deal with. I preferred to work in the 19-23 year old range.

11. Hot women over 24 are looking for rich dudes, even sponsors. You'll be able to smell them a mile away: impeccably dressed and done-up with the highest heels but wearing a constant bitch face. They don't care if the guy is in the mafia or in the board room as long as he's a big fish. As Western culture infects Croatia and destroys the nuclear family, I predict you'll have a lot of attractive older women waiting for a wealthy man to marry them. Ten years down the line, this may set up an excess supply issue that facilitates Croatian mail-order bride businesses.

12. Ignore reports on the internet that Croatian sea resorts during the summer are a great place to bang local girls. I found this to be hype. The sea resorts are huge sausage fests (both foreign and domestic sausage) and the girls know their value. It's not uncommon for them to be surrounded by gangs of friends. While you can still do it, it's far easier to bang a girl you meet in Zagreb in the middle of summer using day game than to compete with a bunch of horny, drunk guys on the seaside.

In spite of the many downsides you've just read, the average men will appreciate the talent in Croatia more than my diminishing favorite, Poland. My experience in Croatia did take away the glow I had on Polish girls because the quality I banged in Croatia was indisputably higher. The only question is if the party will continue as more love tourists head to Zagreb.

Read Next: 9 Reasons Hvar Island Sucks

25 Responses to Everything You Need To Know About Croatian Girls

1. playmuc

February 4, 2013 at 1:58 pm
Ah, good old Trg Jelačić Square..
Zagreb. I can't believe how often I went to that place. :)

Reply

- corvinus
  February 5, 2013 at 12:08 am
  What, is that Croatia's Milliklubi?

  Reply

2. Freckled
   February 4, 2013 at 2:14 pm
   "The only question is if the party will continue as more love tourists head to Zagreb."
   I don't think you have anything to fear in this regard. During the cold war, Yugoslavia (and especially the croatian part) opened their borders for tourists from Western Europe to get some much needed cash in so-called hard currencies. Many germans went there to spend the holidays and brought back croatian wives and apparently there are still enough left…

   Reply

   - niccolo and donkey
     February 4, 2013 at 4:29 pm
     Actually, the opposite case was much more frequent. Czech TV did a report not too long ago about "Croatian Doves" (local men who would hunt female tourists and nail them) who fathered children with Czech women who were on vacation and returned there.

     Reply

3. Coupe DeVillain
   February 4, 2013 at 2:55 pm
   Thread is useless w/o pics

   Reply

4. TaziTazi
February 4, 2013 at 3:11 pm
Roosh, you've nailed it 100%!
Reply
5. RASER
February 4, 2013 at 3:17 pm
Just call them Yugoslavian, that should get them talking and yourself a good spray…
Long live Field Marshal TITO!!
Reply
    - corvinus
    February 5, 2013 at 12:08 am
    They're assorted by religion.
    Catholic Yugoslavs = Croats
    Muslim Yugoslavs = Bosniaks
    Orthodox Yugoslavs = Serbs
    Reply
6. Wald
February 4, 2013 at 3:41 pm
Sounds like Croatia was poosy paradise about 5 years ago.
Reply
    - Caliente
    February 4, 2013 at 4:14 pm
    Do you really have to be given everything on a silver plate?Meditteranean countries have never been pussy paradises,climate and tons of tourists make wonders to a woman's attitude.
    Reply

7. niccolo and donkey
February 4, 2013 at 3:44 pm
Speaking as a Croatian I can safely say that Dalmatian women are the most attractive but as Roosh has found out, it's much easier to land a Croatian woman up in Zagreb.

His prediction of "Croatian mail-order brides" won't pan out as it's not Eastern European in orientation, but rather central-mediterranean.

Reply

   - corvinus
   February 5, 2013 at 12:13 am
   His prediction of "Croatian mail-order brides" won't pan out as it's not Eastern European in orientation, but rather central-mediterranean.

   I love Italian girls. They're probably among the most feminine in Western Europe, and very open and friendly. French girls are also pretty good, although they have more of an attitude than Italians. Only downside to Italy is that it's a sausagefest, so any Italian girl you get with almost certainly will have a boyfriend somewhere.

   And from what Roosh wrote here, and what I've heard elsewhere, Croats seem to be sort of a Slavic version of Italians.

   Reply

      - niccolo and donkey
      February 5, 2013 at 3:59 pm
      Pretty much, except for the far north where they will resemble Austrians or Magyars are bit more. Dalmatian and Istrian women are closest to Italian.

8. Reemee
February 4, 2013 at 4:38 pm
"While Croatian girls are feminine, they seem ready for Westernization. Girls openly complain about wearing heels. "

High heels are a Western invention. Throughout Eastern cultures many people go barefoot much of the time or wear sandal like flat shoes. So why do you equate flat shoes with “westernization” and high heels with Eastern femininity?

Reply

- corvinus
  February 5, 2013 at 12:06 am
  Not that far East, Reemee.

  Reply

9. anon1
   February 4, 2013 at 5:52 pm
   Any plans for a ‘bang croatia’ Roosh?

   Reply

10. Ruxman
    February 4, 2013 at 7:52 pm
    I hate the fact that it’s all in flux and what’s worse is that I’m sure it’s subjective, but to what extent? Gotta go there to see.

    Reply

11. Rich
    February 4, 2013 at 8:07 pm
    By Roosh

    “They are, hands down, the most beautiful girls I’ve seen in my European travels, blowing away just about everywhere else except for pockets in the Baltics. They are both sexier and hotter than Polish and Ukrainian girls.”

    No way are croat chicks more beautiful than russian or ukraine chicks. I have been to croatia and have fucked prettier.

    “2. While Croatian girls are feminine, they seem ready for Westernization. ”

    In other words: why bother with these skags who are simply going to turn into pig-shit once feminism finally sets into their culture

    Reply

12. Anonymous
February 4, 2013 at 9:37 pm
thaought ukranian girls were hotter naughtynomad gave them 5/5
Reply
13. Phallus of Doom
February 4, 2013 at 9:55 pm
I agree with your assessment that what's termed "game," (marketing catchphrase) is nothing more than not socializing like an awkward sperg. That's why I find the dudes who have prostrated themselves before this "concept" to be so utterly ridiculous and shortsighted. However, I disagree with your assessment of what game is and how roosh presents himself.

First, I don't see money and status as something "passive." Rather, they are the only resolute predictor of your success with women; they are fundamental elements underlying the a woman's natural attraction triggers. Everything else, i.e. how you dress, your physique, your confidence, and your "logistics" arise from how much resource you have and how skillful you are at leveraging it.

roosh is not entering warzones. He is in Poland and other parts of Europe. To my knowledge, these countries, outside of Serbia/Kosovo/former Czechoslovakia have not experienced war or famine for over two generations. What's really at play here is that roosh has more wealth than the average dude perusing the bars and so he knows how to leverage that to his advantage. He gets apartments in prime locations that the average Polish or Ukrainian dude could never afford, goes out to clubs frequently (again something the local dudes can't afford), spends money on dates, and is an American and thus considered "high status."

Reply

- Samseau
February 4, 2013 at 10:35 pm
Read this: http://www.returnofkings.com/999/passive-game-vs-active-game
Reply

14. bojangles
February 5, 2013 at 9:43 am

good old Trg Jelačić Square. I love that place, scores of daygame opens. Can't wait to go back in a few months.

Reply

15. Quintus Curtius
February 5, 2013 at 10:37 am
I spent a few months in Bosnia and Croatia and found Bosnian and Serbian girls to be much more approachable than Croats. Then again, this was back in 2000 and there was a lot of resurgent nationalism in Croatia that seemed to generate some anti-foreigner sentiment. Bosnian chicks in Sarajevo were fantastic…hot, approachable, and very little games. Croats in Zagreb and Split were just the opposite. The women seemed to have some serious attitude and tended to overvalue themselves. My thoughts: avoid Croatia and hit Serbia and Bosnia instead.
One other tip for you prong warriors out there. Lots of Italians vacation on the Dalmatian coast…I found that at Trogir, you get a high percentage of Italian female tourists looking to bang. They were very aggressive and willing.

Reply

16. ronin
February 5, 2013 at 1:44 pm
I'm croatian and IMO Roosh is pretty accurate here
Just a few notes about
#4
Croatian girls consider it embarrassing to be single, so a lot of them are in a relationship with guys they don't really care about.

and #11
I really wouldn't recommend Zagreb or any of the continental cities during summer. The capitol is kind of deserted as so many girls move to the coast for the summer. Especially those in 16-23 age range (high school and college students) who are free of classes during July and August. Financial crisis is not an issue, so many people have relatives/summer houses on the coast.

When it comes to love tourism, it's best visiting Zagreb and/or Osijek in spring and if coming to Croatia during summer, avoid the most hyped places like Zrce beach and Hvar, and go to smaller towns on the coast instead. Makarska, Vodice and Crikvenica are all amazing during summer: great nightlife, lots of girls, nice beaches…

Reply

- bojangles
  February 6, 2013 at 3:44 am top advice and on the ball, you can still get hot chick in Zagreb in July but it’s not as populated as other months
  Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

How To Get Divorced Like A Champ

February 4, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

True story as told by a bitter ex-wife:

Step 1: As you approach your 20 year anniversary, less than two weeks after your youngest child turns 18, start a conversation about how important the next few years of your life are and how you're looking forward to being together forever.

Step 2: Maintaining as much masculinity as possible, begin admitting how everything that has gone wrong since the history of time is your fault, and how you wish you could change it. Bring up everything she has ever bitched about in your 20 years together, admit she was right, apologize, and promise to do better.

Step 3: Two weeks before your 20 year anniversary, start dropping hints that you're planning a surprise for her that will blow her socks off. Tell her you'll reveal the surprise at the high-end restaurant you booked for the occasion.

Step 4: At your anniversary dinner, tell her you don't just want to apologize for your horrible behavior as a husband over the past 20 years – you want to show her how sorry you are and you want to make it up to her. Tell her you're going to sell the house, and you're going to take her around for the next several weekends looking for a lot to buy. You're going to build a retirement home to her specs. Whatever she wants, any design, any size – it's all about her because you've been an unbearable dick for so long.

Step 5: The following week, make good on your promise. Put your house up for sale, and spend all day on Saturdays and Sundays for the next month looking at lots. Find a cheap one, and put down a $5k deposit to hold it.

Step 6: Tell her in order to get the best rate on a loan for your soon-to-be-built custom home, the two of you will need to pay down all of your joint debt to improve your credit score. Secretly cancel the contract on the lot and get your money back. Use the deposit and most of your savings to pay down all outstanding debt – especially the debt that's in both of your names.

Step 7: While she's busy looking though magazines and blueprints for her perfect home, sell your current home and move into a small apartment while you're continuing to smooth out the details of your new place. No rush! It's gotta be perfect for your lovely wife!

Step 8: After your current home sells, take the $37k in profit and the rest of your savings and divide it up between your two brothers and your mother. Tell your wife it went into a special account managed by the builder to be used as a down payment on the new place.

Loading...

Step 9: Have your two brothers and your mother sign an affidavit stating that you and your wife owed them that money for a past debt.

Step 10: With all your debt paid off, the house sold, the contract on the lot cancelled, and a massive slush fund of liquid cash held by your brothers and parents, pick a fight with your wife. Keep telling her terrible things until she leaves the apartment – the apartment you set up without her name on the lease.

Step 11: When she gets mad and decides to go spend the night with her sister, have your brothers move all her personal belongings to a storage unit. Make sure everything she owns goes. If there's any doubt on ownership of an item, just give it to her.

Step 12: Move your stuff to a different storage unit. Pay the small fee of $450 to break your lease. You're free to go. No debt, no woman, no assets to split, and she legally vacated the premises and abandoned your marriage. She's already been bragging to her friends for two months about what a great guy you are and how you're building her a new home. Their contempt for her boasting will leave most of them on your side (comes in handy in a small town.)

Step 13: File for divorce and carry on with your new life while your ex sits at a bar bitching about you to the guy who will notch up his first cougar before the stroke of midnight.

Step 14: Replace your near-40 year old ex with a bulldog puppy. Name the bulldog after your ex and text her pics of him every time she blows up your phone bitching about something.

Step 15: Use your current job skills to find a position in your industry that requires travel. Take the $5k pay cut in exchange for being on the road and having your expenses paid. You'll technically come out ahead. When you're not "out on the road being a total man whore," bang your old neighbor's "20-something year old daughter who was always kind of slutty anyway."

Step 16: When people accuse you of planning all this out, take a tip from the rationalization hamster and just say "Huh? Whuuuu? Ohhh. Noooo. No. It wasn't like that!"

Read Next: 4 Things One Man Has Learned About Relationships

Build A Bachelor Pad And Save The World

February 4, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

If there is one thing everyone needs it's shelter, or at least a place with a roof where you can have lots of sex. Either way, many people shell out premium dollars on rent or mortgages, as well as utility costs. This results in many young men slaving their entire lives away to get a massive paycheck, only to end up with less than the crackwhore down the street sucking dick for rocks. So how do you get out of this crappy trend? Simple, build an earthship.

No, I'm not a delusional hippie, nor am I a survivor of a third world country. I have just realized through all the massive work I do to collect a paycheck, I usually spend most of it towards having a place to live. And while I value the importance of having a bachelor pad, I simply do not value the fact that my wallet is usually pretty light. Luckily one day I stumbled upon a post regarding earthships, which is what pegged my interest and research into the subject.

So what is an "earthship?" It's basically just an eco-friendly home primarily built out of dirt, cement, and trash that allows you to be self reliant in terms of electricity and water. On the outside, your home will be… unique, but on the inside, it'll look basically like any other home—or way better, depending on how much effort you put into it. Plus, you literally can build a castle from trash, and then proclaim that you are saving the world.

With a bathroom like that, your biggest problem might be keeping women from staying over.

The downside to an earthship is that your neighbors and women may initially think you're weird. The upside is if the "going green" trend continues to be popular you will look like a genius, and people will envy you. Plus you'll save a pretty significant amount of money by cutting utility bills down to internet and maybe satellite depending on your preferences.

Loading...
The basics of the home include a battery room, which is hooked up to a solar panel roof to provide you with electricity. The electricity isn't limited either, in fact you'll probably be able to store more than you can ever use, unless of course the sun burns out, and then who cares. Temperature for the house is regulated through blinds and the opening and closing of windows thanks to its greenhouse design. Additionally, any water you need is collected through rain or snow, stored in a well, and filtered and processed in your home. This means fresh drinking water, plenty of shower water, and of course a proper working septic system. If you want specifics you can either Google it, or watch the entire documentary (which I recommend) on YouTube. It's called Garbage Warrior.

The TV could be larger, but you get the idea.

The cost for an earthship is said to be similar to that of a conventional home mortgage, however upkeep is obviously drastically reduced by the simplicity of the home design, and like previously mentioned, you will have no utility bills. You'll also have a completely different home than your neighbors, or any other guy any woman has ever met, which may allow you to stand out. Plus it's your own home, bachelor pad for a king; and you can always use the "I'm saving the world" card. This means a lot more bangs.

Earthships might not be for everyone, but for those willing to venture into trying them, the benefits can be massive. Personally I'd like to build one myself someday as the positives seem to drastically outweigh the negatives. You basically get a cool looking house, more women, and more money in your pocket. Seriously, who doesn't want that?

Don't Miss: 10 Things I Learned From Manti Te'o

22 Photos Of Pretty Croatian Girls

February 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
I went to Badoo and looked through profiles of girls who listed Croatia as their residence. These were my favorites…

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

9.

10.

11.

12.

13.

14.

15.

16.

17.

18.

19.

20.

21.

Little Lolita!

22.

Read Next: Everything You Need To Know About Croatian Girls

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Hanna Rosin Wants YOU To Become An MRA

February 5, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

I decided to read Hanna Rosin's recent AMA since she's our #5 feminist, plus I knew nothing about her nor ever considered her to be anything special. My suppositions were correct. She was asked hundreds of questions yet only responded to a few in detail, mainly the softballs.

Look at how bad she fumbles when attempting to answer even moderately challenging questions…

1. Society thinks men are weird and more men need to become MRA's

When asked, "What should be done to help men," this is the answer Rosin gave:

> I think the general gist is, why, if women are doing so well, aren't we reaching out and helping men? I think the answer is that we as a society think that's weird. We have a hard time thinking of men as people who need help. So, for example, in my education chapter, I write about the open secret among admissions officers at private colleges that men get affirmative action, but also about how we are so squeamish about acknowledging that. So there are a ton of things we could do to help men but maybe men have to band together and advocate for some of those things, and not solely in the context of divorce and the law.

There you have it guys. Until men rise up to the giant shit test that is feminism, society is just going to keep thinking you're weird if you want help. Better do something about that… you better become an men's rights activist today.

2. The hookup culture is good for women, except that it's not

> I think it's really easy to tune into the heartbreak of a 35 year old woman or man for whom a good relationship has been elusive. I think no matter what we say we all want to love and be loved. But if you think of the hook up culture as something that happens in college, the fact is, most college graduates end up married, and in stable and relatively happy marriages. So I don't think there is much evidence that hook up culture leads to loneliness. One other thing: I don't "endorse" it. I just get tired of hearing how it destroys women. Joan Didion once complained about certain strains of the feminist movement perpetuating a vision of women as "creatures too 'tender' for the abrasiveness of daily life, too fragile for the streets… too 'sensitive' for the difficulties and ambiguities of adult life.
>
> So, yes, there is heartbreak but there is also a lot women gain from their independence.

So even if college girls piss away their best years as nothing more than sex objects, it's cool because they'll still be able to settle down with the man of their dreams so they can try to conceive before menopause. Like this woman:

Loading...

Lucky couple. However, someone had the nerve to ask Hanna an interesting question about having lots of sex:

> What do you think about the rising rates of single motherhood and fraction of babies born to unwed mothers? Considering that non-married families are far less symmetrical in child care than married ones, isn't this a step backward for women? How do you see this trend affecting the balance between the genders?

Rosin responds,

> I write about this in my book. I don't think it's great. The term studies use is "ambiguous independence" – meaning there is a certain degree of empowerment in going it alone, providing for your family, etc, but it's far from ideal.

So is a promiscuous culture good or bad? Apparently Rosin cannot draw the connection between out of wedlock sex and out-of-wedlock pregnancy.

While masses of college co-eds are slutting it up and producing no children, the women who contribute absolutely nothing to society breed without remorse. But I guess this is okay for Ms. Rosin. As long as someone marries these aging spinsters or takes care of their bastard children, promiscuity is not bad for young women. Might suck for nearly everyone else (not for me) but at least women can have 10 years of fun.

3. The End of Men was written to help women understand men.

I don't even know what prompted the Rosinator to write this response, but it is face-palm worthy:

> I'm afraid to say anything about the men's rights movement lest I inspire more rage but I will say that one of my aims in writing the book was to better understand the men who seemed out of work or resentful of their money making girlfriends or just plain lost.

By writing an entire book about how men are the losers of today's society, Rosin is helping women understand men. So if I wrote a book called The End of Gays detailing all of the shortcomings of their culture, I could avoid homophobic criticism by telling everyone "It was done to better understand fa – I mean, gays."

I get it!

I can imagine what an American woman thought about men before reading The End of Men:

"Men! So frustrating! Why are they all so messed up? Why can't they make me happy?"

And now the same woman after reading The End of Men:

"Men! They're just a bunch of jealous losers because their patriarchy is collapsing under the weight of the glorious feminist revolution. Losers."

Thanks for helping women understand, Hanna.

Read Next: The Men's Rights Movement Is Dead

5 Reasons To Learn Krav Maga

February 5, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Krav Maga is a self-defense system created based upon the street fighting skills of Hungarian-Israeli martial artist Imi Lichtenfeld. He used it to defend the Jewish quarter where he lived against fascist groups in the 1930s. Later, in the 40s he moved to Israel and began to offer combat training lessons to what later became the IDF (Israeli Defense Forces). The IDF has used, and continued to develop the system to this day.

The basic principle of Krav Maga is inflicting maximum damage to the opponent(s) in order to end the fight as quickly as possible. Brutal counter-attacks using your most effective tool (knees, elbows, weapons, etc.) to target your opponent's weakest area (neck, throat, eyes, knees, ribs, solar plexus, groin, etc.) are the focus. For this reason, it is not a competitive martial arts, like Brazilian Ju-Jitsu or Muay Thai, because people would die.

When I heard that Jason Bourne uses Krav Maga (which I later found out was, in fact, not true) and that it teach gun defenses (i.e. the most alpha technique ever), I immediately signed up. I just finished 6 months of training. It is indeed awesome. Here are the top 5 reasons you should sign up for classes today:

1. You will become a badass.

Nothing boosts confidence and testosterone levels like knowing you are legitimately prepared for whatever. Very few people have any formal self-defense or fight training. As a result, in tense situations where most people lose it, you will keep your cool. If something ever does go down, you're ready.

2. It is practical and intuitive.

Most martial arts are strongly based in ritual, and as a result often incorporate different forms or strange techniques. Krav is different. Brutal efficiency is the only concern. For this reason, many of the strikes and defenses utilize the same basic motion (e.g. the straight punch and many of the defenses against punches and knives). Moreover, all of the techniques are built upon the body's natural instincts (e.g. bringing your hands to your neck during a choke defense).

Loading…

3. It is great exercise.

Between the drills themselves and the conditioning, you are guaranteed a hell of a workout. Three minutes of throwing punches or knee strikes is exhausting. So is three minutes of burpees. Side note: The level 1 Krav test was the single most intense physical event of my life. Seriously. Three hours straight of punches, kicks, choke defenses, and groundwork is no joke. I consider myself to be is great shape and I almost vomited on multiple occasions.

4. It relieves stress.

Sure, so do most workouts, but pounding a kicking shield, or throwing your partner to the floor is a whole different ball game.

5. It is the perfect hobby.

I came to my first class with no idea how to throw a proper punch. After a couple weeks I thought I was Jason Bourne. After a couple months I realized that I wasn't. After 6 months I look back and I am amazed at the progress I made. Experiencing this progress is extremely satisfying.

Clearly taking up Krav Maga has many benefits. One word of caution – make sure you train somewhere with certified, experienced instructors. I have seen locations that turn it into a strictly cardio exercise experience, with little focus on technique – not good. So go take advantage of that free first class, now.

Check out my new #1 Amazon Bestseller, The Book of Alpha. It's full of direct, actionable advice for the man who wants to better himself.

Read More: The Only 2 Things A Man Can Depend On

16 Tips For Having Sex With Croatian Girls

February 5, 2013 | by Roosh | Link | Original Link

Day Game

1. Croatian girls are extremely receptive to day game. They want to be opened. Even if she has headphones and seems focused on her music, it can still go well. Same goes for girls on rollerblades ("Excuse me, where can I buy rollerblades like yours?").

2. Croatia is one of those places where both indirect and direct game work. Pick one that suits the venue and your personality. What I did was open indirect, chat for a couple minutes, and then hit her with a compliment about her "positive energy" to see how she'd respond. If she smiled, I knew I was in.

3. Girls will give you their number even if they have a boyfriend. It may not come out until the first meeting. To avoid this, when I was getting a number I'd jokingly say, "You're not married, right?" If she had a boyfriend, she would then announce it with a guilty look on her face.

4. Always go for the insta-date, especially if you're doing street game. Not only will this weed out flakey girls, but it gives you an opportunity to find out what she wants in life. Croatia has a lot of "good" girls who don't drink at all and want a serious relationship. You want to dump those prospects if you're not staying long.

5. A common issue you'll find on the first date is girls who want to bring their friends along. Don't let them or you'll get stuck in a hellish group chat. It's either a 1-on-1 date or nothing.

Night Game

6. You need to push the interaction as far as you can go. If you don't at least get a kiss, the odds that number will lead to a date is 25% or less. If you get a passionate kiss with some hand-holding at the end, over 50%. It's easy to get a number from a Croatian girl but you should resist: push for the kiss. It's similar to what you should do in America.

7. Absolutely do not add a Croatian girl to Facebook. They are accomplished attention whores and will string you along. If you didn't at least get a phone number, you got nothing.

8. Cockblocking is a huge problem. The best way to fight it is to be more selective about the venues you choose. Large clubs have the hottest girls, but they are harder to approach and you will end up getting cockblocked incessantly. Hipster bars have the ugliest girls, but you'll rarely get cockblocked. Experiment in the city to find something in the middle that has the best balance between beauty and attitude. So much of a successful Croatian experience will be based on the venue. Going from the best venue to the worst, you may even feel like you're in a different country. As a general rule, if you're in a club where the girls aren't genuinely excited you're a foreigner, you should go somewhere else.

9. Since so many girls go out in pairs, it's better to roll with a wingman than solo dolo. A problem you'll face if you 're going out solo is that a girl doesn't want to leave her friend alone. What I did was approach girls whose friend was already getting hit on by another guy.

10. Don't compliment at night. Croatian girls already have an elevated perception of themselves and get compliments all the time. They are not insecure as girls from the Baltics or Ukraine.

11. Don't call a girl before you bang her. They rarely answer. Text instead.

12. Croatia is slowly embracing one-night stands. With the right logistics, you should be able to get them. They are far easier than a place like Ukraine. The key here is having tight logistics. It should be so tight that you can "take a walk" with her and be at your place to hop in for a quick drink. The girls who are most likely to go for this will be 18-23 and who want a taste of the American sexual culture. Older women will be able to resist your logistical game.

13. Similar to the above point, all your dates should be close to your apartment. If your date venue is more than half a mile away, you're already shooting yourself in the foot. Even if a Croatian girl is playing aloof, she can turn on a dime once in a private room.

14. The less snobby the club, the more acceptable it is to buy a girl a drink without getting "punished" for it. Croatia isn't like other Eastern European countries where girls are generally upfront and honest with their intentions—they will play you if you give them the opportunity, especially the higher end venues. Generally speaking, as long as she didn't have a bitch face when you first approached her, you should be in the clear to buy a drink.

15. The best game for Zagreb, the capital, is to have the best logistics possible. Sadly, Croatian girls flake more than average so you want the proximity of your apartment to act as bait for casual hangouts that turn into bangs. Unless you're dealing with an older Croatian girl who is into you, you'll have to play the numbers game and not get hung up on any one girl. Get ready to meet some hardcore female players.

16. If you put X hours a day into day game and X hours into night game, you'll be rewarded with night game first. You can get surprisingly fast bangs at night that day game doesn't provide, mostly because aggressive night game easily screens out day girls who are simply bored but not really hankering for dick. If I go back to Croatia, I'll just move right next to a good bar.

Read Next: 22 Photos Of Pretty Croatian Girls

17 Responses to 16 Tips For Having Sex With Croatian Girls

1. ASF
   February 6, 2013 at 11:03 am
   Sounds like basically American game is required.
   Reply
2. Adam
   February 6, 2013 at 11:18 am
   Sounds like American girls except they have legitimate reasons to be such attention whores.
   Reply
3. Mario
   February 6, 2013 at 11:51 am
   I was planning to go to Ukraine. But after Roosh's tips, I'm heading to Croatia instead.
   Reply
   - Anonymous
     February 7, 2013 at 4:50 am
     @Mario -
     Why are you only limiting yourself to those two options? Roosh has mentioned other countries in the region that sound even more friendly and that bring less difficulty
     Reply
4. Emilio
   February 6, 2013 at 1:18 pm
   "Excuse me, where can I buy rollerblades like yours?"
   Wrong line!
   Better opener:

“Do u know the movie Boogie Nights?”

;-)

Reply

5. Trouble
February 6, 2013 at 2:25 pm
Sounds like American girls but not fat.

Reply

6. Spider58x
February 6, 2013 at 2:47 pm
Sounds like American Game. Except it is actually worth it in Croatia =)

Reply

7. Ninja Man
February 6, 2013 at 2:53 pm
“The girls who are most likely to go for this will be 18-23 and who want a taste of the American sexual culture”….. Does anyone know what an acceptable age for a man to date 18-23 yr old Croatian girls is?

Reply

8. Ninja Man
February 6, 2013 at 2:55 pm
….As in, what’s the oldest acceptable age.

Reply

- WhoCares
February 6, 2013 at 11:08 pm
Get out of your head man. Men SMV increases their whole life. Watch some DOS Eqquis commercials ;D

Reply

9. 1
February 6, 2013 at 3:09 pm
How come is it different from any other European girls?
Reply
    - Hugh G. Rection
    February 7, 2013 at 7:41 am
    Yeah that's weird. They don't even speak European!
    Reply
10. 1
February 6, 2013 at 3:11 pm
Must admit with all my 15 flags,have not got one from the Balkans.
I just never meet them
Reply
11. Rudebwoy
February 6, 2013 at 8:41 pm
I was in a bar in Zagreb, saw these two hotties and wanted to buy them a drink. The cool bartender shook his head and told me not to waste my money.
Reply
12. Ruxman
February 6, 2013 at 9:30 pm
Those large town squares dedicated to historical personalities look good for day game.
Reply
13. half caste
February 7, 2013 at 2:51 am

direct game vs indirect game…what does that mean?whatsvthe difference?

Reply

14. Anonymous
February 7, 2013 at 4:52 am
Haha, when you google “direct vs indirect game”, Roosh is the very first link! Google is your friend, pal…

http://www.rooshv.com/direct-game-vs-indirect-game

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

Don’t Believe The Lies About Foreign Brides

February 6, 2013 | by Harry | Link | Original Link

[image]
Roosh made a recent post about American Women who cant compete with foreign women and referenced a mail order bride event. As I was reading through the response to the article I noticed what has become a rather typical pattern in the comments. For some reason, the minute anyone mentions the words “foreign brides” or “mail order brides”, there is a mini descent into madness where all common sense and reason gets thrown out of the window.

The responses vary, but the common theme is that these women are nothing more than gold digging, green card chasing whores who will divorce these men the first chance they get. According to the majority of respondents, these women are laying traps to land suckers, betas, and whales. The belief that they may actually be the marriage minded, feminine women, that these countries tend to produce in droves, rarely enters the equation, they are just labelled mercenaries who will be out the door the minute they get the chance. What then almost always follows are anecdotal accounts of people who know scores of Russian, Eastern European or foreign women who are foreign brides that divorced local men after they brought them in. I would love to know where these guys meet all these divorced bitches with their new green cards, but the minute you raise this topic everyone knows like 300 of them it seems.

So I thought what the hell, let me see if I can drum up some stats and get to the bottom of it. I have seen statistics before that show its the exact opposite of what everyone normally says, yet the spazfest that people always throw when this subject comes up made me wonder just how true it all was.

Now I believe the vast majority of women looking for husbands are genuine given what I know of the cultures and the places I have traveled to over the years. I think because these women are more traditional and conservative, a decent guy will probably stand far less chance of divorce too. I also know that these women tend to be far more logical than the degenerate whores Western men deal with on a daily basis too, so the women would be less prone to divorcing unless the guy was abusive, a really poor provider or an absolute loser. They are prone to hypergamy just like all women, but its no where near as severe as it is with the average western slut.

I also believe that the foreign passport hunting, gold digging whore is one of the biggest myths out there. Sure, there are going to be horror stories and these women do exist, I just doubt that the horror stories are more frequent than the average divorce hell 50% of most Western men will go through. And I think that the majority of guys who end up going through hell with a foreign woman tend to meet these women in their home countries, instead of meeting those marriage minded foreign women in the woman’s home country.

Lastly, I always believed western women in general are threatened by this development, resorting to mindless accusations of exploitation in an effort to shame this behavior before it gains any mainstream traction.

The first study I wanted to share was one that used to be on Wikipedia. Used to be. Someone has decided to remove it, and I think it was removed because for some reason, the original USCIS study was removed. I know it was there because I have shared it in the past, and any search on the web for the extract below turns up countless websites that cite the study as a legitimate government source. I say this as I place the tinfoil hat on my head, but clearly its the sort of information that does not suit current policy makers and legislators that are pushing for restrictions on foreign brides.

Here it is:

> The United States Citizenship and Immigration Services (USCIS) reports that "…marriages arranged through [mail order bride] services would appear to have a lower divorce rate than the nation as a whole, fully 80 percent of these marriages having lasted over the years for which reports are available." The USCIS also reports that "… mail-order bride and e-mail correspondence services result in 4,000 to 6,000 marriages between U.S. men and foreign brides each year."

80% of the marriages have been successful.

This is not some guy bringing back his foreign wife after meeting her there on a trip or holiday. Its not guys who were expats somewhere and returned home with a wife after living there. These are outright MAIL ORDER BRIDES. These are guys going onto the internet or using services to find women to marry from day one. Zero romance and courtship, straight to business, I'll-get-to-know-you-once-we-are-married type marriages.

Eighty percent, and these are mail order brides, these are not women they met and gradually built a relationship with before they took the plunge. They are going into this with the intention of marrying them from the first meeting most of the time.

Next up is the Centre for Immigration Studies who again state a 20% divorce rate with mail order bride marriages. A separate organisation comes to the same conclusions the Immigration Department did, focusing on statistics gathered from foreign countries and agencies as they try to build a picture. Again, we see the same statistic: 80% of the marriages have been successful. Now granted these are statistics based on the USA in particular, and I was curious to see what the situation was in other Western countries with high divorce rates.

The next study was conducted in Switzerland. The white paper is available but its long, so I just share the web extract. Again, we see the same outcome, where divorce rates are far lower when the foreign women are not "Western". Ironically, they also track the divorce rate between Swiss women and foreign men, which clocks in at 80% failure rates.

> The statistical office of Switzerland has published some more detailed statistics: Note that to draw any conclusions, the divorce rate of mail-order marriages must be compared to the divorce rate of domestic marriages. In 1999, the divorce rate > for domestic marriages (Swiss married to Swiss) in Switzerland were at a record high of 50%. In the same year (1999), marriages with foreigners are comparatively better: Marriages between Swiss and German or Italian women have a comparatively better divorce rate: 40%. Marriages between Brazilian or Thai women and Swiss turned out to be more durable than expected, the divorce rate reached the low rate of 30%. Fantastically low divorce rates were reached at marriages with women from Colombia (20%). Marriages with women from the former USSR reached a rate of 15%; however, it must be noted that marriages between Swiss and Russians boom at the moment, and that the divorce rate is not that much meaningful, because the divorce rate rises with a time-lag. However, there are also marriages between Swiss and foreigners where the divorce rate is worse than the domestic rate: Marriages between Swiss and women from the Dominican Republic tend to work very badly, the divorce rate reached catastrophic sixty percent. Similarly, but not quite as bad, the divorce rate in marriages between Swiss and Philippine women reached 45%

So 85% success rate with women from the former USSR for the Swiss. The Swiss divorce rate is approaching 50%, yet these marriages are clocking in at 85% success rates.

Where is the passport hunting, divorcing mercenary everyone is talking about? Here we have arguably the two most desirable passports in the world on offer, and the success rate for these marriages is clocking in at rates that rival the divorce rates of the 50′s. Which shows that not only is there a complete misconception about the nature of these marriages, but there is a misconception about foreign women who marry western men under these sorts of arrangement. Many are simply conservative, traditional, marriage minded women looking for a husband and a better life.

This is supported by yet another major study called Negotiated Nuptials: A Transnational Analysis of the International Marriage Broker Industry and the Russian ‘Mail-Order Bride’. It goes into great detail proving how mail order brides don’t suffer abuse like the feminists are saying they do. At the same time, the research concludes that the vast majority of women looking for foreign husbands are genuine in their search. This study even won some feminist award, which shows the levels of hypocrisy. So not only does it prove that the feminists are exaggerating the rates of abuse, it also goes on to show how many of these arrangements are not only genuine but successful too.

Which point towards an agenda driving this misconception, and its an agenda that has even forced through legislation in the USA called IMBRA. Using nothing more than a few horror stories of abuse (which in itself could be lower than the average too for all we know), legislators have been lobbied into submission and inevitably complicate the entire process in an effort to slow things down. Men are put through substantial background checks and treated like absolute criminals simply because they have decided to seek foreign wives through non-traditional methods. Despite the fact that all parties involved are consenting adults, this legislation has been pushed through without any major study or even widely available statistics to justify the law. What statistics we do have shows the complete opposite of the perception many have.

Another thing that that turned up through my search were some ridiculous representations by feminists and the media too. The more I dug into it the more blatant it seemed. Clearly this is seen as a major threat to the harpies, because the lengths they are going to are absurd. The funniest example that I came across was a story about an English guy who started a marriage agency. He said in his interview that men are looking for feminine, traditional wives who are unspoiled by feminism, and he introduces them to each other.

This is the response from the female journalist about the whole thing, who equates it to human trafficking and slavery because these women tend to be housewives:

> However, couples can get around this obstacle by claiming they met through other avenues. There also tends to be little enforcement of IMBRA when the agencies are based outside the U.S. (Hand-In-Hand, for example, is registered in St. Kitts.) "The mail-order bride industry is a softer version of human trafficking," says Sonia Ossorio, executive director of the New York City chapter of the National Organization for Women. Ossorio also acknowledges that some relationships work out—but perhaps not in a way that would please Betty Friedan. "A lot of people who are attracted to it are just looking for a woman who's docile and obedient," she says.
>
> For some companies, such submissiveness is a selling point. Hand-In-Hand's website trumpets the fact that its females are "unspoiled by feminism." Company founder Weiner argues this form of chauvinism—like the mail-order bride business itself—is economically motivated. "You take a beautiful woman from the Czech Republic and you bring her into your home, she does all your cooking and cleaning and ironing," he says. "At the end of the day, the service is free." Hand-In-Hand estimates the potential savings of a homemaking wife at $150 per week.

Housewives are now slaves. A man who marries a traditional woman who stays at home to manage the household is now regarded seen as a slaver. These are the kind of people that not only have a public platform to spread their filth, they see press in major publications like Business Week. To make matters worse, the same article is then republished, and when it is the headlines are a complete misrepresentation of the interview and business as a whole

> Here is the first headline:
>
> The Mail-Order-Bride Trade Is Flourishing
>
> Here is the second headline on the same article in a different publication
>
> Former I-Banker's Mail Order Bride Business Sells Women Who Are "Unspoiled By Feminism"
>
> Here is the third headline

> Former Investment Banker's Human-Trafficking Business Is Booming

Laughable. Frikken laughable.

There is very little research that has been done on marriage between foreigners and nationals and their success rates for some reason. Seems like no one wants to touch it, or what is more likely, they cant get it through peer review. I think they would make for very interesting reading and I would not be surprised if we see stats very similar to what happened in Switzerland or what was uncovered by the USCIS. Not only were the marriages between foreign women and local men more successful, marriages between local women and foreign men were a disaster. Not the sort of thing feminized universities and organizations want to see published, thats for sure.

It has been effective too, because not only have the media done a fantastic job of convincing most people that these women are probably only after a green card, the men who bring them over tend to be abusive too. Its what drove legislation called IMBRA, which has made it incredibly difficult for American men to marry mail order brides now.

Now, what does that say about the situation as a whole?

Can you imagine what sort of man resorts to a mail order bride? While I dont think its the case for all of them, I think in 95% of cases you are dealing with highly introverted guys who have always struggled with women. They are probably middle income to upper middle income, middle aged to elderly and either cant land a date or have been raped in divorce court already and are throwing the towel in. I also think that a lot of them will punch way above their weight, trying to marry women far too young or incredibly good looking women while they have very little going for them looks wise. I think that many dont understand the cultures of these women either, which makes it even harder on the marriage too. They are probably in the majority though decent guys just looking for companions.

So here we have average looking guys with moderate incomes and no ability with women who are still able not only marry hotter women than they would get at home, they are younger, more feminine and traditional too. They are landing far better women than they could if they stuck it out at home.

The biggest farce of all? 80% of these arrangements are actually working according to statistics, while the rest of their countrymen will see 50% of their marriages end in divorce and family court rape.

Now I know there are guys who marry foreign women that end up taking them to the cleaners. The thing is, these guys are being taken to the cleaners far less often than they would be if they married local women. And if they did take a chance on a local chick, she would be no where near the same quality a foreign wife would be. Not in looks or what she was prepared to bring to the table as a traditional wife.

I am also willing to bet that many of these "foreign women" who everyone tells horror stories about just so happen to be women who immigrated here when young or were sent to study in Western universities and colleges, and after a few years in our indoctrination camps they come out the other end far more fucked up than when they went in. They are not a complete representation of foreign women because their exposure to our culture is far deeper than someone who moved and lived there for a long period of time.

Maybe its time for men as a whole to sit back and think these things through a little more before jumping to the conclusions they do.

Read Next: American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

About the Author

Harry is a bitter, angry, misogynist with a small penis and highly insecure infatuation with contact sports. Refusing to man up and contribute positively to society, Harry travels the world taking advantage of poor, third world women while he swindles innocent businessmen in the boardrooms of numerous developing countries. Outright intimidated by sassy, intelligent, super awesome modern women, Harry is an ignorant bigot of epic proportions that mortifies the cultural sensibilities of any typical progressive westerner. He likes to share his views with complete strangers as he comes to terms with the constant shame he feels. Deep down he really just wants someone to actually like him.

How A Vasectomy Improved My Game

February 6, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

[image]
Prior to getting a vasectomy my biggest fear in life was some girl I was fucking telling me she was pregnant. Forget thoughts of cancer, natural disasters or dying in a car accident this is what kept me up at night. Truth be told I had heard those words before and I have had to pay for more than one abortion—it was a road I swore I would never go down again. To ensure I would never be a dad against my will a couple years ago I got the best form of prevention available to a man, a vasectomy, which has been one of the best decisions I have ever made.

Obviously if you know you want to be a father one day do not get it done. But I believe a major life-altering move like becoming a parent should not be controlled by some girl you're fucking whose period is late. You need to really, really want to be a father and anything less you should just stay an uncle or be a big brother if your need to be around kids is that strong.

If you decide to get the vasectomy do yourself a favor and bank some of your sperm prior to the procedure. While it might end up being 3-500 dollars a year in storage fees it is worth it. Think of it as an insurance policy so if you change your mind you do not have to go under the knife for the dreaded vasectomy reversal (not always successful and usually not covered by insurance).

If you do decide to go through with it get a non-scalpel as it is the least invasive option and you should plan of taking at least 3-4 days off work/physical activity after its done. Then it is just a waiting game as for how long you will be shooting blanks but generally speaking after two months you will be sterile. After that the fun and attitude changes begin.

How Does A Vasectomy Relate To Game?

It gives you leverage with women, a sense of control that has made me feel untouchable to the biggest trap a woman can lay on a man, making him a father against his will. For instance, with the exception of one night stands, prior to getting a vasectomy I always would prescreen the girls I was with to see if they were religious or if their biological clocks were ticking just to make sure in the event of a pregnancy they would get an abortion. Today those thoughts are a distant memory and even if I am raw dogging a Mormon chick I can be assured she can't stick me with 18 years of child support. I sleep easy at night knowing as long as I don't get married legally no women can ever be entitled to any of my wealth.

While variations of a man's game may differ we can agree being alpha is a key component to it. That who gives a fuck, you-can't-affect-me attitude which is central to being alpha is on overdrive post vasectomy. My advice is don't tell the girls you are banging that you have had it done, as the way you act after a vasectomy will only further your I-don't-give-a-fuck nature in her eyes, and she doesn't need to know why that is.

This attitude extends itself to the bedroom as your prior inhibitions are now a thing of the past. Now you don't have to check your condom during sex to make sure it has not ripped or in that heat of the moment you don't have to worry about wrapping your dick. There is energy you expel post vasectomy that is palpable to the females in your orbit. The best part is that unlike so many things this feeling of being untouchable does not go away with time. It's a constant feeling that you carry around with you and you come to absorb the fact that now you are immune from being trapped by a female. That indifference to the consequences makes you attractive. I genuinely feel pity for men who have not had it done as I know how much their life will be altered in the event that some girl they are laying pipe to finds she is pregnant and decides to keep junior.

Waiting for the male pill is an option. But for how many years has it been talked about? Believe me if that was available I would not be writing this article as every player reading this would likely have a prescription to it. Upon disclosure of my vasectomy to other men I have been asked if I feel like less of a man. I find this amusing, because I have never felt as alpha as I do today.

Read Next: Passive Game vs. Active Game

Following his vasectomy surgery, Garrett totally creeped out his female co-workers by requesting they sign his cast.

About the Author

bacon is a libertarian that enjoys spending his time in developing countries

Super Bowl Commercials Aren't Sexist

February 6, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

Every year, the howls about just how "sexist" and "objectifying" and "disrespectful" and "misogynist" Super Bowl commercials are seem to get louder. Despite whatever else they may try to dilute it with, what really seems to get the bellyachers is the sexual nature of these commercials. Nowadays, nothing offends feminists and emasculated men more than any expression of men's natural sexuality. Threatened by, and uncomfortable around, attractive women—and, by extension, men's natural desire for them—they do their best to silence and suppress them both. Simply depicting female attractiveness is a crime to them.

This time around, the opposition was organized around an Internet boycott campaign that went by the almost-clever name #NotBuyingIt, complete with its own glossy Internet video, website, and twitter page. The idea was that outraged fatties, prudes, diesel lesbians, "pansexual" female-bodied persons, and lispy white knights from far and wide could narc instances of what they deemed to be "sexist." The community could then collectively refuse to buy products by the offending companies.

But, like most feminists, the short-haired fatties of #NotBuyingIt made the crime fit the punishment, conveniently ignoring plainly obvious facts in order to push their played-out talking points. They selectively read commercials for their one perceived offense (sexuality), while bypassing other problematic aspects, which were often worse.

Loading...

Take this Kia Motors commercial, which premiered during last Sunday's Super Bowl:

Any reasonable man (or woman) who sees this commercial immediately wonders: what if you were to reverse the roles? A woman is disrespecting a showroom car, greasing it up with her hands and kicking the tires. A male android notices the offense and is enraged by it. He punches the woman so hard she leaves a large impression in the wall across the room. He then celebrates his act with the touchdown gesture. Imagine the outrage.

Instead, this was reaction from #NotBuyingIt:

That’s right: all they saw was that an attractive girl was, god forbid, being attractive. Simply putting a hot girl in a commercial is now “objectification,” even if she’s in a maximally dominant position.

Unsurprisingly, they remain conspicuously silent on the commercial’s promotion of brutal violence against men.

Read Next: The Anti-Male Commercial

Why This Site Will Always Be “Creepy”

February 6, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

We get a lot of hate from the fairer sex, particularly feminists. On the surface, this seems a little odd. After all, what exactly are we trying to do here?

We’re hoping to facilitate the improvement of men by giving them a forum to share and to acquire knowledge about how to improve themselves socially, economically, and romantically. We try to give men new ways to improve their style, their finances, their health, their physique and, above all, their ability to appeal to women.

Sounds great, no? We’re helping to create wealthier, healthier, better looking, more attractive men. Isn’t that what women want-more polished, appealing, high quality guys? Why, then, do so many women express a seemingly inherent and irrational hostility to many sites like this?

They do this because the very act of teaching someone to better approach women is considered “creepy,” regardless of the results.

Women want effortless attraction. They want a guy who is very attractive to them without any evidence that he’s putting much effort into being that way. They very much value the romanticism of the “it just happened” kind of meeting, the idea that the guy was just there being himself and he was just right and he just happened to want her.

This is why media designed to appeal to women doesn’t feature male leads who seem to consciously plan to meet the female characters. Romance/adult novels (read: chick porn) feature extremely attractive men who, more often than not, are just kind of there. There is no attempt to show the development of these men into the very attractive specimens they become, or the mistakes they make in growing and getting there. They just are.

The “Disney Princess” movie model also reads this way, and does much to shape the perception of young women as they grow. The Prince does not game the Princess—he’s just there, he’s naturally charming, and he wants her. She has no idea how he became a prince or what he goes through to keep that title and maintain his authority, and that stuff rarely features in the story. He’s just there, he’s perfect for her the way he is and he can’t help but be drawn in by her. The End.

In female fantasy, the ideal male just is. She could care less about the effort it takes for that man to become what he is, as long as he just is.

The fact that many guys put in an effort to build that attraction and become that better man kills the ideal of organic attraction that most women want to maintain. The fact that something like “game” exists at all is even more damaging because it implies that there are some concrete formulas and methods that produce better results than others, killing the notion of “magical love” that they’d much prefer to cling to.

In the end, this all comes down to feelings. Women “feel” uncomfortable with inorganic models of sexual attraction. Game promotes an inorganic model of attraction by telling them that there is a formula that can increase a man’s appeal and that a woman can be drawn more reliably with practice and perfection of this formula. Therefore, game makes women feel uncomfortable.

“Creepy” is the catch-all label used by women for that which makes them feel uncomfortable. Hence, game is creepy.

Women also do not like the idea of losing control. Girls want the ability to choose winners and losers in the sexual marketplace—this uncontested place in the mating game’s driver’s seat is, in their mind, their natural prerogative and right.

When those winners (alpha males and guys who are just generally successful with women) and losers (dudes who don’t see much sexual success) start gathering on sites likes this in numbers and begin discussing and actually codifying how to do things, they begin to undermine that power women would like to keep.

It also becomes harder to tell which guys fit the “effortless attraction” model they idealize and spend most of their youth dreaming about and which guys merely look the part after a lot of effort. Girls would, generally, prefer to be able to make this distinction themselves, separating the more organic “naturals” from the others who had to work at it or are merely putting on a well practiced cover for weaknesses in their game that girls would otherwise readily see.

With “game” and the advice offered on sites like these that encourage male improvement, men take some of this ability and choice away from them.

To men, this may not seem like a bad thing since men are merely trying to give women more of what they want. That seems only logical to us.

The problem is that women do not want men making this decision and taking things out of their hands. This is a threat to the feminine imperative and a challenge to the romanticized organic model I described above, so women subconsciously shy away from it.

The feminine imperative calls for control over the direction of the sexual marketplace, and male cooperation and focused effort to improve their standing in said marketplace does nothing to help this aim. That merely shows the female hand and facilitates the rise of the more inorganic sexual marketplace females do not really want.

The standard response, therefore, is to shame those who participate in those discussions.

The term “creepy” is a good way to do that, and it fits since the whole idea makes women uncomfortable as well (creepy = “I don’t like the feeling he/it gives me”). This also makes rational discussion with female opponents (feminists especially) very difficult.

Of course, this feminine imperative creates a dilemma for men who try to abide by it. If they put in effort and that effort is seen, that’s creepy. If they don’t put in effort and they’re not naturals (very few men are), they are still creepy. Lose-lose.

This isn’t a good place for men to be, but women generally don’t care. They simply can’t, and we’ll be wasting our time expecting them to do so.

Don’t Miss: Effortless Attraction

106 Responses to Why This Site Will Always Be “Creepy”

1. Adam
   February 7, 2013 at 11:17 am
   Creep and creepy are so overused nowadays guys don’t give a shit about being called that anymore. We’re desensitized now.
   Reply
   - Mikael
     February 7, 2013 at 11:22 am
     A girl tried telling my friend one time that she thought I was creepy when she first met me. He laughed in her face when she tried to explain what I did and told her that it was EXACTLY what he had just done. Women are dumb, and thanks to facebook everyone is a creep.
     Reply
     - William
       February 8, 2013 at 7:25 am
       The most common definition of creep : Guy i don’t like did X.
2. Dillon
   February 7, 2013 at 11:31 am

A con-woman's #1 fear is getting conned herself.

Fear = creepy

Reply

3. MNL

February 7, 2013 at 11:32 am

Excellent points and well-written. It's indeed threatening. It's true: the mere act of wanting to learn game reveals that one must not have possessed it naturally in the first place, that it isn't innate.

Now carrying this one step further… if game isn't or wasn't innate, then it means all those good qualities that game appears to signal (leadership of men, protector of loved ones, etc.) are not enduring. Those qualities are not in one's DNA. If a woman were sleep with you as a result of your "learned" game, all those positive qualities wouldn't be genetically passed along. Hence, her fear of learned, i.e., creepy type of game.

Not naturally possessing game but instead learning it consciously (creepily), is viewed by women in the same way that school administers might view cheating on an exam: Yea, you might have technically received an "A" on that exam, but it's not a "true" A. You don't truly know the material.

Reply

- Takes 3 to Tango

  February 7, 2013 at 11:52 am

  You make a good point on why females would prefer natural game over learned game – the same positive qualities would be more likely to be passed on to her offspring.

  An even better analogy to that argument: a guy with learned game is similar to a women who was born ugly, but has had such great plastic surgery and facial reconstruction that she looks like a natural beauty. Even if the procedures turned out so well you can't tell that anything was every done, as soon as you have children, the man will find out. Clearly, a man would prefer a woman with true natural beauty that will get passed on through his bloodline.

  However, I'd argue that it's more beneficial to possess (and pass on to your offspring) the drive and motivation to better yourself and achieve greatness than it is to be a natural at aspects like leadership and charisma. With that motivation to get shit done and the guts to confront your fears, you have the ability to accomplish much more than just a few adjustments to your personality or outlook on life.

So once again, if women were logical about this situation they wouldn't be "creeped out" by guys who learn game and work to better themselves.

Reply

- Shawn
  February 7, 2013 at 1:09 pm
  Your comment brought this to mind.

  http://www.dailymail.co.uk/news/article-2223718/Chinese-man-sues-wife-ugly-court-AGREES–awarding-120-000.html#axzz2KEorp7jx

- Danish Broski
  February 8, 2013 at 8:37 pm
  If you can learn game, learn business and be successful then you have drive and drive will carry where talent can't. Drive is adaptive, talent is specific. Drive is just as important as talent. Ask any of the thousands almost-made-pro ahtletes who were once great young talens, but now only have the stories to tell. Adaptability to change is the essence of Darwinistic success.

- JS
  February 7, 2013 at 12:21 pm
  Women's primary biological concern is to screen good catches from bad. So much is at stake for her evolutionarily in mate choice. Game screws this screening process up and is a tremendous biological threat to her.

  Reply

- taterearl
  February 7, 2013 at 12:36 pm
  I'd argue that most men naturally possess what is considered game…but society beats it out of them in order to continue the feminine imperative.

  Reply

- Stuki Moi
  February 7, 2013 at 2:19 pm
  What constitutes “good game” is situational. In most of history, and geography, what passes for “good game” in our current dystopia, would lead to ostracizion or to getting killed. Facility with approaching every woman in sight, with at best thinly camouflaged sexual intent, simply isn’t a trait selected for in cultures with staying power. And neither is being a tall talking blowhard. Yet both traits are highly correlated with good game today.

  Looking at things over a more realistic time period, I’d guess what is good game, is that which is practiced by Afghan tribesmen, whatever that is. Seemingly a combination of keeping ones head low and don’t be a threat or burden, and ruthlessly and unquestionably killing all those that don’t follow that advice; or some such.
- Mike 2
  February 7, 2013 at 2:49 pm
  I agree. I think though that the represion of natural alpha comes from women in your family. My mother resented my fathers dominance. Between her and my older sister they tried to train me to be a good boy and serve their needs. We are a broken family.
- Holly
  February 8, 2013 at 2:22 pm
  I can totally see that.
  When I was growing up there was a lot of shit I was told or that was implied or I was led to believe, that come to find out… were really off the mark.
  I believe in women’s right as far as politics go… and i don’t think a woman (or anyone, really) should have the gov’t in her personal business. That being said, feminism has been massively skewed and it fucked things up. Not just for you guys.
  - Samseau

February 7, 2013 at 2:29 pm
No. That's like saying because a child learns to walk, or learns to read, he won't be able to have offspring who can walk or read either.

Reply

- Anon
  February 7, 2013 at 8:07 pm
  Uh…?! Not really…. What the…?! That's not a good analogy.

  Learning limits or pace is a trait for an individual and will have an affect on their offspring. Being able to read is just a small by product of that trait.

  "Game" is an exaggeration, or an untrue characteristic.

  So as a intellectual analogy. If a person portrayed themselves as being clever perhaps from having qualifications, but had really struggled to achieve it. They would not necessarily have clever kids.

  The struggle in itself is an achievement, and one the kids could likely possess, but is that nature or necessity…?

- Francesco
  February 7, 2013 at 2:51 pm
  You nailed the point!
  I was thinking the same while reading the article.

  In the very end the reason why women want an "alpha male" is to get top class genes to pass to their progeny!
  Learning game allows men to present themselves as alpha even when they do not posses "alpha genes", hence women needs to shame the men that learned seduction in order to screen the real alphas for the "fake" ones…

  Reply

4. MNL
   February 7, 2013 at 11:38 am
   Re-quoted from the top of Obsidian's blog this morning:

   "Anyone who can conceive, can be deceived."
   - David Buss

   Kind of applies to this post here too.

[For those who don't know David Buss, he's one of the most respected evolutionary psychologists, now teaching at the University of Texas. He studies game in its academic terms.]

Reply

5. Louie Grifon
February 7, 2013 at 11:40 am
This one reason why game is hardest and least effective when you're first starting: That's when the effort is most apparent.

Reply

6. Solomon
February 7, 2013 at 11:41 am
I want to add that not only do they lose their power in the marketplace because we are "tricking" them, by making zeroes look like heroes…

But also, this whole thing makes it more difficult for them to trick US!

Men are the real romantics, and when we peek behind the curtain and see what's really there, it becomes harder for them to pull our heartstrings, manipulate, and otherwise extract resources. Of course they have to try to shame it/stop it.

No need to expect that they would understand about men teaching men how to be better men. Single moms don't have a damned clue about teaching MEN, and don't even realize that there is a process a boy must go through to grow up right. Maybe because they never got the process girls need from older women to help them grow up right. It's like they have no conception about older generations teaching the younger generations simple wisdoms and strength of character.

because they've never seen it.

MEN know.

Reply

- Martel
February 7, 2013 at 1:55 pm
It also messes with snowflake theory. She can't convince herself as easily that she's the wise and precious princess when she's just been suckered by a "system". Not only that, it's a system that even dweeby guys can learn.

The proud protector of her friends in the club is actually just another category: the Mother Hen. Her supposedly unique speech on why she doesn't just feel it is an acronym: LJBF. Her requests that she subconsciously simultaneously hopes you pass and hopes you fail is a shit-test, a quantifiable demonstration of a pattern followed by EVERY female. Slut-defense. Last-minute resistance. All these phenomena that she think are unique to her specialness and priviledge are actually just patterns. The more she learns about game, the less she feels like a snowflake and the more she thinks of herself as a rat in a maze.

On some level, surrendering this sense of specialness to some dude who every chick ignored in high school has gotta hurt.

Reply

- Hook or Crook
  February 8, 2013 at 8:07 pm
  This is brilliant.

- kasparov
  February 7, 2013 at 2:58 pm
  I think you hit the nail on the head. one of the biggest aspects of learning game is experience. experience means interacting with, dating, and fucking a large quantity of women. this quantity of women and experience allows you to assess value much more critically than a guy who is innately gifted with good genetics and traditional good looks. women want the perfect guy, but they don't want him to know he's perfect, or that she is imperfect. they don't want to be compared to the 50, 100, or even 1000´s of other women the guy has had, because they don't like how they will measure up. it makes them insecure, because they know they can be replaced; and an experienced man knows just how easily she can be replaced, and whether or not the next one will likely be better, worse, or the same. they want high quality men, but they don't want to put any work into themselves to be worthy of a high quality man. they want a man who is completely clueless and inexperienced, so he will always think she is a goddess, when she is really nothing special.

  Reply

7. taterearl
   February 7, 2013 at 11:56 am
   Game wouldn't necessarily need to be taught…if men weren't brainwashed by feminist media and schools in the first place.

Most guys know naturally what women respond to…but you grow up in a culture of single motherdome, rom-coms, getting in touch with your female side, and your local feminist hag opining in the newspaper about how to get women and suddenly you have no clue what works.

You think in the early 1900s guys needed to consciously know that being a confident leader is what women wanted. Nope…they were just that way to begin with.

Reply

- JS
  February 7, 2013 at 12:25 pm
  Go to Google images and do a search for Civil War generals. You will see a collection of the most alpha looking dudes ever: the steely stare, the body language, the arrogant sense of honor. It's all there. Game is just rediscovering what previous centuries knew.

  Reply

  - Retrenched
    February 7, 2013 at 12:36 pm
    ^ this

    - taterearl
      February 7, 2013 at 12:51 pm
      I need to get Sherman's look down.

      - Martel
        February 7, 2013 at 2:01 pm
        In some eras, even the relative betas were REAL MEN. Wimps were a rare and routinely mocked aberration.

        - Thistlewythe
          February 7, 2013 at 2:47 pm
          True: Everything I needed to know about the world I learned in Kindergartern, and then it was beaten and shamed out of me by my clueless mother, male-hating media, stupid college feminists and passage-aggresive bitch former-girlfriends The 1990s really sucked, guys. I didn't discover the game and the Red Pill until 2005.

8. Quintus Curtius
February 7, 2013 at 11:59 am
Perceptive and intelligent article.
On balance, game has much more positives than negatives. The positives are:
1. Game gives men a plan of action, a code of conduct, and a sort-of "mission statement" in an era where male role models and rituals are constantly undermined and demeaned. Game helps empower men and give them the confidence to approach, seduce, and close the deal. Of course, there's no master code that will unlock every woman, but game provides a true insight into gender differences and female psychology.
2. Game helps turn the tables and counteract the feminist claptrap spewed out constantly by the media. It is deeply subversive to the established femino-centric order.
3. Game can actually be viewed as a self-help movement. It helps men dress better, act better, think better, and interact better. It's the finishing school that previous eras used to have…it is the "Knights Book of Chivalry" for the modern, alienated age.
4. Game has positive spinoff effects in a man's job, intellectual development, and travel life.
The negative of game, as I've noticed over the years, is:
1. Game can cause men to overvalue women, and waste a lot of time chasing females who, in the final analysis, are not worth the effort.
But when all is said and done, game exists and has become popularized because it is called for by the tenor of the times. It would not exist if it were not necessary. As the author notes, the main reason why feminists hate sites like this is because they undermine the established false orthodoxy.

Reply

- Banger
February 7, 2013 at 4:45 pm
Well said sir!

Reply

9. Ashley
February 7, 2013 at 12:03 pm
Feminist ideas are everywhere nowadays… (Jezebel as one example).. And I can't STAND it. So it's always refreshing to come on here or Roosh V. I always look forward to reading Rooshs posts and other mens articles on here. Thanks men for being who you are!
Reply
    - Shawn
    February 7, 2013 at 3:40 pm
    You can thank us by taking up the cause to overturn fucked laws that're not only detrimental to men but civilization itself. In the mean time piss off, no one like a suck up.
    Reply
        - Ashley
        February 7, 2013 at 4:37 pm
        Not sucking up, just showing my appreciation for what you men are doing. Simply put.
        - ariseandexcel
        February 7, 2013 at 7:09 pm
        Uncalled for.
10. [image] XDays
February 7, 2013 at 12:05 pm
In Western society you're idolized for being weak and the victim. The stronger and more powerful you grow, the more hate you receive.
Reply
    - [image] Lachlan
    February 7, 2013 at 4:26 pm
    This is very true
    Reply
11. [image] Hammer

February 7, 2013 at 12:24 pm
True power and independence is always hard won and it is not given to those who are not willing to fight for it. Feminism is a method of subjugating men who agree(as well as those that do not agree) to it's ideology. This is a great article, because it points out the fact that it is always better to do what YOU want to do to improve yourself, things that women will kick and scream at you for doing and the result is that they love you for doing so because they can't control you, they can't keep you from increasing your value and understanding. This is how they are threatened. And how they relish a man who is threatening. You can't help but take their feelings with a grain of salt they're feelings change all the time. So who cares?

Reply

12. [image] Ian Ironwood
February 7, 2013 at 12:25 pm
Brilliant analysis.

The way to break it down is by considering it in terms of "Mating Strategy" as part of a greater "Reproductive Strategy".

After all, women have been fighting for Reproductive Rights. A right is a freedom which we are able to exercise, within the limits imposed by our society and culture. With Reproductive Rights and Reproductive Freedom comes . . . the right and freedom to plot a Reproductive Strategy.

Now, if your Reproductive Strategy includes not having babies, then it devolves into a simple Mating Strategy, and you chase poon to your heart's content. Remaining childless with no intention of marriage — why should you? — is a perfectly reasonable goal of a Reproductive Strategy for a dude (or a chick, for that matter). In which case Game serves you as the device by which you are pursuing your Mating Strategy.

If your Reproductive Strategy involves having children with a well-selected and thoroughly-vetted female which you can develop a level of trust and sustainable attraction to sufficient to invest in said female, then Game serves as the means by which you can institute your exclusionary criteria. Your Mating Strategy, therefore, is dependent upon that ultimate goal of stable fatherhood. But the process leading up to that selection strongly resembles the usual dating/hookup process that a man using the non-Reproductive Strategy does. Game allows you, through observation, discussion and experience, to separate the unacceptably slutty from the potential future mother of your children.

Therefore Game is ideal for men to study regardless of their individual Reproductive/Mating Strategy . . . which is why, as Mr. McGinnis rightly points out, feminist hate it and women find it creepy. Game is a mating strategy . . . but so is True Love. The difference is one of approach, not destination. And when you can't tell the Alphas from the Betas from the Deltas from the Sigmas (Gammas, Omegas and Lamdas tend to stick out) in a crowded bar, that removes the ability for them to easily select and sort the potential suitors.

And they HATE that. If you look like a billionaire, by goddess, you should BE a billionaire! If you act all mysterious about where you live with a cocky grin, then you should be concealing your mansion from her, not your crappy studio apartment. If you're wearing great shoes and act like you're a movie star, you'd better not be a waiter whose uncle owns a consignment shop!

(A dedicated PUA friend of mine, who is actually looking for a wife now, made it a practice for years not to reveal ANY personal information about himself to a woman until he saw her tits. That provided the dual pleasure of making ambitious climbers squirm and raising a huge amount of intrigue. He'd spin the hamster wheel until it broke. He got turned down a lot . . . but he saw a lot of tits, too.)

I go on about this at length in this post: http://theredpillroom.blogspot.com/2012/10/game-is-mating-strategy-so-is-twu-wuv.html, and cover it elsewhere on the blog, too. But the essential take-away here should be that Game is the art and science of giving women exactly what they want (but not what they say they want) . . . good and hard.

So go give it to them, Gentlemen.

Reply

13. [image] YouSoWould
    February 7, 2013 at 12:28 pm
    Girl #1 – hottest girl I've seen on this blog yet. Good work.

    Reply

14. [image] Retrenched
    February 7, 2013 at 12:38 pm
    Another reason that women hate game is that it robs them of their plan B option, should they not be able to marry the man of their dreams (and few women are). Sure, she wants to marry Mr. Big, Prince Charming, the guy all the other girls want too. But if she can't get him for whatever reason, she can always find a "nice guy" at 28 who's been stuck in the sexual desert since puberty and will feel lucky as hell for a chance to finally get some action from a non-obese woman, and he'll even incur the risks of marriage 2.0 to get it.

    But when those "nice guys" figure out how to get laid without having to wife up former carousel riders, then that plan B falls apart. Women want the best of both worlds — the sexual adventures with the frat boys in their prime, and the nice guy husband to give her the Cinderella wedding when she's done with the frat boys. But if all the "nice guys" become like the frat boys, and are able to sate their sexual appetites… then who's going to wife her up once she's decided that she's had enough pony rides?

    Reply

    - [image] Thistlewythe
      February 7, 2013 at 2:59 pm

There was an article I read a few years ago, maybe in Harper's or The Atlantic Monthly, on men who finally, successfully,wore-down the girl of thier dreams and "got them." They just "hung in there" for YEARS until she finally got off her cock carousel, or divorced, or was dumped, or developed some std disease (I kid you not) and then these Betas swooped in and claimed her. It was amazing. It reminded me of an episode in the mid 1990s on Oprah, where she had these beautiful women on her show who were HIV positve, open about it, and still had men begging to be in relationships with them. Educated yet emotionally beaten men who were too happy just to be in a relationship with a woman, they didn't even care that she had AIDS and could infect them. Sadly, back then I was a beta as well, and I was partially sympathetic.

Reply

15. [image] Tango
    February 7, 2013 at 1:03 pm
    A quote from one of my favorite dance partners regarding the protagonist of the quasi-autobiographical tale

    She remarked "This woman thinks only with what is between her legs!"

    The problem critics have with this site is that it points out how many women do. None the feral females want to believe that remark applies to them.

    Reply
    - [image] Tango
      February 7, 2013 at 1:05 pm
      Must have misplaced a quote or close tag. The book I intended to reference is "Kiss and Tango" (Marina Palmer, 2005). The link above goes there.

      Reply
16. [image] Danger
    February 7, 2013 at 1:05 pm
    Women want to be able to filter men without having to deal with "fake confidence" or a beta in camoflauge.

    Their fear is rooted in giving away their eggs to a fasle alpha. Wasting their reproductive chance at securing high value genes.

    Not unlike themselves wearing make-up, high-heels, etc,… to fool men into thinking they are more attractive than they really are.

    Reply
17. [image] Theodora
    February 7, 2013 at 1:53 pm
    You may be right in all of the above, but you're forgetting that the main reason why some women might hate the whole game situation is the hate towards women that it comes from, and the hate it reveals, just because all women are treated the same, i.e. as mean, manipulative whores. Also because game, as anything, depends on who's using it, and some guys seem to misunderstand and misuse a lot of its concepts.

I don't know why you'd choose not to see that, I don't think women in general have an issue with anyone, man or woman, trying to be a better person, and make it in whatever they choose to.

Reply

- [image] Ian Ironwood
  February 7, 2013 at 2:15 pm
  I disagree. Game does not assume that all women are mean, manipulative whores — far from it. In fact, Game allows a man to help distinguish between the mean, manipulative whores and the decent women who might be worthy of further consideration.

  Game arises not out of a place of hate, but out of a place of cynicism and pragmatism. Oh, there's plenty of frustration fueling it, too, but the idea that Game is an expression of hate is misguided and incorrect. The goal of the Red Pill is not to be a dickhead to every woman you meet, the goal is to use the observable realities of the sexual marketplace to further your mating strategy.

  Game is power, no doubt. It takes power away from women, because it relies on their reflexive responses to verbal and non-verbal cues. It uses the realities of the female social matrix and the insecurities of women and exploits them for a specific end. It gives men awareness of female psychological vulnerabilities and the tools to use them as leverage in the course of seduction.

  More or less the same way a tight sweater, short skirt, and heels do for women.

  And that is, indeed, why women in general and feminists in particular dislike Game. It isn't because it comes from a place of hate. It's because it's empowering men at the expense of women's control of the sexual equation, it's muddying the waters of the marketplace, and it's denying the fundamental female paradigm that even die-hard feminists can't abandon: true love.

  Reply

  - [image] Theodora
    February 7, 2013 at 2:31 pm
    I agree, and your answer gives me hope.

    Just to clarify, I was talking about some of the men who use game, whose hate is evident (which in my opinion comes from fear of rejection), that's why I mentioned that like anything it can be misunderstoof and misused in the wrong hands. Everything in life needs a bit of brain too, and unfortunately not everyone comes with it.

    I'm sorry but I didn't understand your take on true love, if you don't mind explaining it a bit more. You're denying there can be true love?
  - [image] Ian Ironwood

February 7, 2013 at 2:56 pm
Here's my take on True Love.

http://theredpillroom.blogspot.com/2012/10/game-is-mating-strategy-so-is-twu-wuv.html

And this is what Happily Ever After looks like:

http://theredpillroom.blogspot.com/2012/10/the-real-happily-ever-after.html

Many men have every reason to hate women. And yes, it is partly a fear of rejection — that's a PRIMAL male fear. Dismissing it lightly is like trying to dismiss a woman's concern about her appearance. Men who discover Game may indeed learn it and use it to pump-and-dump one gullible woman after another . . . and that's Okay.

You see, there are no "wrong hands". As long as issues of consent are observed religiously, there's no reason at all why a dude shouldn't Game his way into every pair of panties in the room, if he's capable. And every woman who successfully falls for his Game reveals herself. As does every woman who resists successfully. Sure, he leaves a trail of emotionally battered, confused, and self-doubting women behind him who "fell" for his Game and were found unworthy, but is that any less heinous than a pretty woman who leaves a trail of rejected suitors behind her?

Game is a powerful tool for men. It's like having superpowers. I'm not going to make a moral judgement about how the men who learn it use it, any more than Gloria Steinem would insist that women only use their boobs for Good. It's an effective tool to promote a male mating strategy, and it's also a tool of masculine empowerment.

- [image] Banger
  February 7, 2013 at 5:11 pm
  Very well-written comment Ian. Consider writing some ROK articles if you haven't already.
- [image] F-LTD
  February 7, 2013 at 7:40 pm
  "(which in my opinion comes from fear of rejection)"

  Projection. It is clear you are worried that you and your sisters will be found wanting by better, game-aware men.

  Instead of trying to dictate mens' thoughts and feelings, focus on improving yourself. Be the best woman you can be.
- [image] Theodora
  February 8, 2013 at 7:16 am
  @F-LTD: I'm not trying to dictate anything, and it's common knoweldge that some men might have a fear of rejection. Ian even called it primal.

And of course I have it too, the only difference is I'm not trying to mask it by gaming people, I'd say it's kind of evident and I've learned to live with it! I guess some people are more sensitive than others, if you don't have it all I got to say is I envy you, I'm sure it works out better for you!

- [image] Theodora
  February 8, 2013 at 9:52 am
  Yeah I remember when I first started reading Psychology, "Projection" was my first smartass response I'd use on anyone that said anything that annoyed me.

- [image] Anonymous
  February 7, 2013 at 2:31 pm
  "manipulative whores"
  Can you find any better word to describe women in our society? There are a few born-again Christians, a few reactionary conservatives, a few Muslims, and a mass of modern 18-29 year old women who love to fuck guys just for the fun of it. "Whore" is too generous, at least whores demand a little money.

  Reply
- [image] Samseau
  February 7, 2013 at 2:43 pm
  You've perfectly captured the social stigma's surrounding game, but of course, none of it is true.

  Kinda reminds me of the hysteria Americans had towards weed a decade ago.

  Reply

18. [image] Theodora
    February 7, 2013 at 3:25 pm
    @Ian: Sure, he leaves a trail of emotionally battered, confused, and self-doubting women behind him who "fell" for his Game and were found unworthy.

    To me it's sad that you'd see that as a "sure, why not?" situation. I wouldn't call these women "unworthy" maybe too sensitive or clueless.

    So I got to disagree on that. But I have to admit that the post on HAE was really moving.

    Reply
19. [image] Sam Spade
    February 7, 2013 at 3:26 pm
    This was a terrific piece, thank you.

    It's easy for some men to get angry at women because of their failures in logic.

    What men fail to do is try to see it from the female standpoint. (This also predictably results in game mistakes.) This piece laid it out perfectly.

    I would only add that when it's the WOMAN who's setting out on her imperative, she also doesn't want to think of it as deliberate. I.e., she didn't go out to meet guys or get banged. She went out to have fun and things just happened. Etc.

Reply

20. [image] TAllagash
    February 7, 2013 at 3:33 pm
    Read The Great Gatsby.
    ultimately, Gatsby comes off as try hard/creepy b/c he has done through all the trials and tribulations to achieve Daisy….ultimately she goes with Tom, the man of inherited wealthy, physicality, and a serial philanderer.

    Reply
21. [image] Gern Blanston
    February 7, 2013 at 4:29 pm
    Athlone – an extremely well put and penetrating analysis. One for the book of wisdom.

    Reply
22. [image] Anonymous
    February 7, 2013 at 8:30 pm
    haters gonna hate
    back in my parents day the thought of a boy walkin by your place wasnt creepy in fact girls would get excited that"ooo he like me"…now naything u do is creepy even the thought of planning to make an approach happen was considered cute not creepy(think some bollywood films)

    Reply
23. [image] John McNeill
    February 7, 2013 at 8:38 pm
    Very insightful, thank you Athlone.

    Reply
24. [image] ItsObvious
    February 7, 2013 at 8:48 pm
    Eventually, you will come to realize that what women want, is the complete removal of all men from the planet and the warehousing of sperm. When this becomes clear, so too will the required male response.

    Reply

    - [image] Days of Broken Arrows
      February 7, 2013 at 9:03 pm
      Yeah, but when the power goes out, who's gonna go underground during the storm and get it running again?

      There are no feminists when the storm hits. Watch New England this weekend and see how many "we don't need men" editorials are written when they're under two feet of snow.

      Someone ought do a study tracking now anti-male editorials disappear when reports of natural disasters start up.

Reply

25. [image] Danny Ch
    February 7, 2013 at 9:27 pm
    Co-sign 100% Most cogent and thought-provoking column on ROK.

    Reply
26. [image] Dannyfrom504
    February 7, 2013 at 11:39 pm
    What Adam in the first comment.

    Creepy=she's not attracted to you.

    Reply
27. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 1:05 am
    I'm a woman. I wouldn't call it creepy but I'd call it delusional. I've seen comments referring to game as a superior way to understand women. To conquer women by having sex with them. The younger and prettier the better. Which those aren't quotes, but that's the overall theme I'm understanding here.

    I get that it feels that way when they fall for your game and you've had sex with them.
    It's absolutely delusional to think that's any sign of understanding women, conquering her, or anything remotely close to the fantasy achievement in your head.
    So you fucked an idiot. You fucked a hot drunk idiot. Sooo.. that's it? Allll of this- is for that?!
    That's something else!
    She'll eventually learn the lesson taught here (hopefully by the time she's 25… some girls are quicker than others) she will figure it out and decide to have enough self respect to stop fucking dudes while she's wasted. Or stop fucking dudes she doesn't really know that well. She'll be on her way. Great. Ok.
    So then what about you guys? You keep playing your game. One girl after another. But you're gonna get old. The game will eventually become a habit. You'll hit a point where not one woman who will give your old ass the time of day is dumb enough to fall for this, and you don't have enough money for the young girls you used to pull every weekend "back in the day"… and if you do have enough money, then hey! that's awesome for you.
    It's not creepy. It's just sad.
    The chicks you guys pull with game are just a few more shitty guys away from wising up. What are all of you going to do when that happens and you're too old to pull this stuff?

    Reply
    - [image] Theodora
      February 8, 2013 at 6:53 am

I wish I could have written this comment myself. This is exactly how it is. And it's especially sad for all those kids around 20 years old who have never been in a relationship: it seems like they will never expect to be in one, or expect to be screwed over and cheated if they ever get in one, or just give up altogether even before they have experienced for themselves what it can be like when it's good.

I appreciate all the knowledge that game can provide to both men and women about relationships, but people should be really careful about how they apply it all in real life. What if you miss out on a good girl just because you expect her to be cheating or manipulative? On the other hand if any of you guys are not interested in any sort of connection with a woman and are just interested in having as much sex as possible till you reach an age when it stops, then yes I guess this is the way to go.

And last, I have to mention the differences in character, personality and sensitivity that might exist between guys reading about game and guys writing about game. Maybe in some things the first are better or different, and more able to form relationships by having better intentions and more hopeful expectations. Maybe something that doesn't work for guys writing about game will work for you, or the opposite. Or maybe you're too different in too many aspects to expect to live an identical life and have the same results.

Other than that I personally appreciate and enjoy all the sites related to game, as long as they don't create a mass of angry, depressed, hopeless and lonely people.

Reply

- [image] J.M.
  February 8, 2013 at 9:30 am
  Just one word Theodora…projection.

  Please don't project your intentions and points of view into us.
- [image] bojangles
  February 8, 2013 at 10:48 am
  I don't see how websites like this that help improve your life lead to depressed people…

  A lot of projection in your post, or basically as we say in the UK, what a load of bollocks.
- [image] Ian Ironwood
  February 8, 2013 at 12:28 pm
  "And it's especially sad for all those kids around 20 years old who have never been in a relationship: it seems like they will never expect to be in one, or expect to be screwed over and cheated if they ever get in one, or just give up altogether even before they have experienced for themselves what it can be like when it's good."

Thank feminism for that. We're just responding to it. And yeah, girls can expect to get pumped-and-dumped if they aren't educated on the SMP. But then that's what feminism is championing. Face it, most of these girls wont get husbands anyway, so it just helps set the precedent for their long line of lackluster serially monogamous relationships before they hit the Wall and realize that they aren't likely to EVER find a man willing to commit to them. These tough, smart, strong and independent women don't need men, remember?

So they don't get them. They get pumped-and-dumped. If they wise up fast enough, they might get out before they're too damaged, but mostly they just rationalize their poor decisions, "follow their hearts", and do it all over again.

"What if you miss out on a good girl just because you expect her to be cheating or manipulative?"

We don't expect that, Game just prepares us for the likely eventuality. Men who practice Game tend to have higher mating standards than the AFCs, so the "good girl" you are referring to probably just didn't meet his selection criteria. It's not a moral judgement, it's just how it is. "He's just not that into you", and all.

"On the other hand if any of you guys are not interested in any sort of connection with a woman and are just interested in having as much sex as possible till you reach an age when it stops, then yes I guess this is the way to go."

Precisely. Feminism has made "any sort of connection with a woman" a dangerous prospect for any man, and marriage is the worst of the potential dangers. For most men, it's just a better deal to learn Game and have as much sex as possible than risking the coin flip that is American marriage. When feminism took the honor out of being a husband, it also took the incentive.

- [image] Theodora
  February 8, 2013 at 1:36 pm
  I don't know how this reply thing works, but this goes out to Ian:

  I hear you and I see your point. I'm not from the States and if that's the way it is with feminism and women there, then yes I guess there's no alternative–which I can only describe as sad, no matter whose fault it might be.

  That's why I think everytime I try to comment on something in any of these sites people start attacking and missing the point. I haven't experienced what you're talking about in this intensity, and any comments I make are not to take sides but to try and understand. But I seem to not be able to, because I come from a different background, or at least not able to make my point come across without hitting on some feminist stereotype that you guys might already have. So I'll just leave it at that and wish us all good luck!

- [image] J.M.
  February 8, 2013 at 9:28 am
  Women are the gatekeepers of sex. If it were for your hypocrite arguments and self-righteous tone, anyone would think the guys attempting to be better are dragging the women to their apartments and gangbanging them.

  P.S. If most women were not sick and perverted (even more than the guys you are depicting as pathetic) , books like 50 Shades of Masochism wouldn't be a sales success. Enjoy your delusions…

  Reply

  - [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 1:52 pm
    It's 2013. (i almost put 2012!lol. dammit.)
    Dude… women are not the gatekeepers of sex anymore!
    And could seem to have a self-righteous tone… it was meant to be a defensive tone. Tone doesn't translate well over the internet. =/
    And I fail to see how my writing is hypocritical.
    I don't understand what's so hard about asking a WOMAN how to be better. Wouldn't that make more sense? I don't mean these girls you're trying to fuck of course. Lol. I mean like.. a female in your life who is honest with you and cares about you… go ask 'em what the deal is!
  - [image] Athlone McGinnis
    February 8, 2013 at 2:28 pm

    > It's 2013. (i almost put 2012!lol. dammit.)
    > Dude… women are not the gatekeepers of sex anymore!

    That's a ridiculous statement. Women are and always have been the gatekeepers of sex. I would argue that in 2013 this is even more true than it has ever been, at least in Western nations where female sexual self-determination has become a societal right and expectation and male transgressions (no matter how minor) of it increasingly less tolerated.
  - [image] Robert
    February 8, 2013 at 3:19 pm
    It's 2013. (i almost put 2012!lol. dammit.)
    Dude… women are not the gatekeepers of sex anymore!

    So, what's rape again?

    Hamster exploding in 3..2…1…

- [image] bojangles
  February 8, 2013 at 10:47 am

You're living in a dream world, you women never wise up. You think you do, but then someone comes along and 'games' you.

Reply

- [image] Holly
  February 8, 2013 at 2:03 pm
  Lol! If I was living in a dream world, I'd be in friggin costa rica or some shit. Not stuck inside with nothing better to do than THIS! =)

- [image] Ian Ironwood
  February 8, 2013 at 12:11 pm
  By all means, allow me to rebut:

  "It's absolutely delusional to think that's any sign of understanding women, conquering her, or anything remotely close to the fantasy achievement in your head. So you fucked an idiot. You fucked a hot drunk idiot. Sooo.. that's it? Allll of this- is for that?! That's something else!"

  Well, since Game is about fucking women — and understanding them enough to get to that point — then yes, I'd call it an unqualified success. Now consider how much time, energy and effort women go through to make themselves attractive WITHOUT any real goal but self-esteem – they aren't even trying to get laid. I've seen my single female contemporaries spend hours and hours browsing magazines and websites for beauty tips, and they haven't had sex in years. Sooo . . .that's it? At least Game gets you laid. Cosmetics just make you poor.

  "So then what about you guys? You keep playing your game. One girl after another. But you're gonna get old. The game will eventually become a habit. You'll hit a point where not one woman who will give your old ass the time of day is dumb enough to fall for this, and you don't have enough money for the young girls you used to pull every weekend "back in the day"… and if you do have enough money, then hey! that's awesome for you."

  Actually, you're projecting. The fact of the matter is that men tend to get more sexually attractive (their Sex Rank goes up) with age regardless of other factors, while the reverse is true for women. Men don't stop getting calls until they are in their 70s. Why? Because while the 25 year olds may not be subject to your Game, at 55 a dude can pull a 35-40 year old woman with barely an effort. Women are attracted to older men.

  And then there is Married Game. Once you decide to leave the Puerarchy and get married, assuming you've managed to find and vet a worthy wife, then you can transfer all of those hard-won Game skills to your permanent relationship. See Married Man Sex Life Primer for details.

  "The chicks you guys pull with game are just a few more shitty guys away from wising up. What are all of you going to do when that happens and you're too old to pull this stuff?"

Hit on their younger sisters.

Reply

- [image] Holly
  February 8, 2013 at 2:07 pm
  mista ian.
  So in one writing you talk about game being used solely to fuck girls.
  Then you talk about marriage. whoa. mind-blown.
  i'm gonna have to check that article.

  I get there's going to be a lot of back an forth but really… I don't think it's unreasonable for me to think that having a hate for women at the core of your motivation to get with a woman, not the best thing that ever were to happen on earth. Is that unfounded, to you?

- [image] Athlone McGinnis
  February 8, 2013 at 2:25 pm

  > I get there's going to be a lot of back an forth but really… I don't think it's unreasonable for me to think that having a hate for women at the core of your motivation to get with a woman, not the best thing that ever were to happen on earth.

  Your conception of "game" is too narrow and in many ways wildly inaccurate.

  There are many who claim to "practice" game that do indeed have hatred of women at their core. There are also many who believe in "game" who claim that game is best practiced only once one has let any anger go, and that an angry man can never truly master "game". I fall into the latter camp, as do any others here.

  "Game" is not some sort of monolithic ideology. It does not require hatred to be practiced, and many would argue that said hatred inhibits that practice. It will all depend on who you talk to.

- [image] 2mques
  February 8, 2013 at 1:00 pm
  Hmmm, this is sad…because it's typical.

  Before puberty, when boys tend to stick to boys and girls tend to do their own thing as well, something begins to change: girls begin to develop big breasts, wider hips, curves in some cases etc. Boys begin to produce a lot more testosterone. All of a sudden, the guys who thought you had cooties, can't stop staring at you. Before that, most boys would much rather play with games or toys than even sit next to you in a classroom, and before that most girls would rather play dress-up and and watch cartoons and movies about finding their prince charming.

  You know what's ironic, girls, even after they become women never change, they're childhood things just evolve: dressing up, becomes shopping. Looking for prince charming evolves into standards that men aught to meet in order for you to be in relationships with them. All these things are considered to be adult-like behavior when it comes to "relationships." I mean shouldn't a woman want a man of her dreams (regardless of how more realistic they become due to cynicism that develops over time)? Shouldn't a woman want to look good, put on makeup, dress up and have matching shoes? Shouldn't women have shiny things that make them feel good? These are all the same things that a 5 yr old girl feels as well. Yet this fits into what women call maturity.

And yet, with boys, once testosterone kicks in, at first, all they want is to grab your ass. Then they want to french kiss you and grab your boobies. This evolves into wanting to grab your hair, and spank you in the ass while hitting it from the back. Yet, in the minds of women, men wanting to do this immature? Why? If a man isn't interested in a relationship (i.e. trying to make a woman happy by being close as he can possibly be to her idea of prince charming) then he's sad and childish. Because, as always, women think their POV on life, which is based entirely on their feelings and instinct is the only truth. And yet that is the truth, that is the biggest lie for anyone who has any testosterone in their body.

The truth my lady, is that like many women, you look at men through vain colored glasses. You look at them and judge them based off of what you would do if you were a woman in a man's body, and yet you lack no understanding of the essence of manliness. It's like you trying to relate to a pet, as though it was a human being.

Reply

- [image] Holly
  February 8, 2013 at 2:02 pm
  You're projecting.
  None of that is true as it pertains to me. Sorry!
- [image] 2mques
  February 8, 2013 at 2:42 pm
  @Holly

  Care to expand, tell us about yourself. What were you like as a girl, compared to what you are today.

28. [image] Professor Ashur
    February 8, 2013 at 1:12 am
    Well, I suppose most people don't reaaallly want to know how the illusionist saws the lady in half or makes someone disappear.

    We all beg to be shown the secret, but end up disappointed. ROK is just a look at the slow, grinding wheels that machine men into better product.

    Or, the "making of sausage", no pun intended. Women don't want to see the sausage being made, they just want the final product to pop into their mouths.

Reply

29. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 1:37 am
    As far as seeing how sausage is made… That would depend on the ingredients my friend.

    Reply

30. [image] Sceptic
    February 8, 2013 at 8:31 am
    Wait… What? You completely missed the point as to why women don't like sites like these. They don't like it because:
    1. Men here openly discuss the fact that fat, ugly, feminists (and non-feminists) should be deemed unfuckable. This is a problem for most of them because it would mean that they'll have to resort to vibrators and fingers to get off.
    2. Men here openly call women they don't like sluts and bitches and whores. Naturally all (or nearly all) women wouldn't like this. Fair enough, though, I don't like it when they call all men they don't like rapists and pigs.
    3. Men here openly break down the female psyche on how they manipulate betas. If we know their snares, we won't get suckered by them… and this is a threat to women as they'll have to come up with new "game" themselves.
    4. Men here openly dissuade other men from getting married and having children. There's no need to analyse why women would find this wave abhorrent.

    Reply

31. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 9:46 am
    quick question!

    According to "game"… Does the man pay on the first few dates?

    Reply

    - [image] Sceptic
      February 8, 2013 at 10:13 am
      If it's a coffee.

      Reply

      - [image] Holly
        February 8, 2013 at 1:40 pm
        So first date of coffee, a "game" guy will pay for.
        Any date after that I'm assuming… they'll expect to go dutch, not tell the girl that they expect to go dutch, resent her if she doesn't take out her cash, still pay the whole bill and, in turn, feel even more resentful towards her.. in turn, trying harder at the game so he can get her in the sack and mess with her head. Then come on here and bitch about her, brag about what he did, and everyone's like yeeeah!

is that about right or no?

- [image] Athlone McGinnis
  February 8, 2013 at 2:32 pm

  > So first date of coffee, a “game” guy will pay for.

  There is no such things as a “game guy”. There are many different views across the internet with regards to game and how it should be practiced, and these in turn vary depending on where you are in the world.

  Some men advocate never paying for any date. Some argue that you should always cover it. Some make both arguments, but apply them in different places. Some also feel comfortable paying and never come close to the resentfulness you seem to take as a given here. Some don’t like paying, but really don’t care all that much if they’re attracted to the girl and are willing to overlook it and continue talking to her.

  > is that about right or no?

  You’re about as far off as you could be.

- [image] Sceptic
  February 8, 2013 at 2:15 pm
  No. By, “If it’s a coffee,” I mean the “player” doesn’t invest too much time or cash for pussy. For instance, only a chump would go to a 5 star restaurant and order lobster and champagne for a first date. Why? Because to her he looks like he’s trying to buy sex – hence might only get a pity fuck at best. More likely he’ll be strung along for as many dates as it’ll take till his wallet’s bled dry (if he’s met the wrong type of woman).

  I qualify women based on how much they like me for being me; not how much I earn, or what car I drive. If they stick around without loads of money being spent on them then they are worth spending money on, if that makes any sense.

  As for, going Dutch, I don’t care what anyone here says, that’s just fucking cheap. At least split the bill.

32. [image] j
    February 8, 2013 at 10:51 am women want a natural alpha (for reproduction), not a dude who’s learned how to fake being an alpha.

    game used to be just that, a game. playing a woman into thinking you’re something you’re not so you can fuck her. but now, as this site is doing, its evolved into the actual making of men into something alpha.

    women should be totally supportive of sites like this one promoting better men. that women are not is perhaps the most important question for the Western world today.

    Reply

- [image] Holly
  February 8, 2013 at 1:34 pm
  There's the delusion again.

  I've yet to see anything resembling the actual making of men in a substantial, genuine sense.

  So far it's all fake to get women in the sack while taking pride in making her feel like shit.
  That's as manly as growing a beard and getting tattoos. That shit doesn't make you a man.

  Everyone hates being rejected and everyone deals with it in different ways. Yes even the 18-24 year old 10´s have to deal with rejection and are afraid of it.

  It's a strange thing to read about all of this advice to elude rejection, but the actions advised are rejection-worthy.
  Toughen up. Go through rejection without blaming anyone. Not even yourself.

  Find that balance between chasing a woman who's truly worth it, but having enough self respect to not be taken advantage of.
  Find a way to treat a women nicely without getting all pissed that she's not on your dick in appreciation. That's not how real life works. For anyone.
  It's like friend-zone complaints. They let it be known that they being taken advantage of and not putting up any sort of boundaries to stop it… That's your responsibility, guys. Not hers.
  Keywords: boundaries. self respect. take responsibility. stop blaming.

  As much as I'm reading the guys on here claim that any woman who looks good and doesn't want to fuck them is a manipulative whore bitch who's full of herself NEVER ONCE thinks that maybe she doesn't want to fuck them because she just doesn't like 'em? and she can tell your trying to pull game? Not once has that come up as a possibility? Delusional.

  As long as hate and resentment fuels your game, you're gonna be the loser, even if you fuck her.

  Reply
  - [image] Athlone McGinnis
    February 8, 2013 at 2:46 pm

    > There's the delusion again.
    >
    > I've yet to see anything resembling the actual making of men in a substantial, genuine sense.

    You need to read more, though I suspect your mind is made up.
    http://www.returnofkings.com/1407/effortless-attraction
    http://www.returnofkings.com/711/the-synergy-of-game-and-money

    > So far it's all fake to get women in the sack while taking pride in > making her feel like shit.

> That's as manly as growing a beard and getting tattoos. That shit doesn't make you a man.

I don't know who you're reading, but most of us really don't take pride in "making her feel like shit". This is about our own improvement, not about womens' feelings.

> It's a strange thing to read about all of this advice to elude rejection, but the actions advised are rejection-worthy.
> Toughen up. Go through rejection without blaming anyone. Not even yourself.

This is why we so often ignore female advice-it has no real application.

Most of us here have been through quite a lot of rejection, much more so than your typical attractive female has been. Most of us have been through a stage where that disparity in rejection, combined with the fact that we were rejected in and of itself, bothered us greatly and made us very bitter.

Most of us have already gone beyond that stage, and many of us have quit blaming women for what happened to us. In fact, many of us realized how unattractive our behavior was when the rejection occured, and understand now why those women would not have been interested in us. Many of us then decided to start learning how to improve on the things that made us unattractive.

In the end, this led many of us to sites like these.

You clearly do not understand us, nor do you understand the male perspective in this discussion in general. We've already toughened up, and we regularly advise one another to do the same. That is what sites like this and Roosh's forum are for-you've offered no advice that can be applicable to us.

> Find a way to treat a women nicely without getting all pissed that she's not on your dick in appreciation. That's not how real life works. For anyone.

We are not "Nice Guys (TM)". Cut the fuckery and quit trying to paint us with that brush.

Most of us understand that being nice to a woman does not entitle us to sex. Man of us learned that lesson perhaps a decade ago. If we didn't understand that, sites like this wouldn't exist.

> As much as I'm reading the guys on here claim that any woman who looks good and doesn't want to fuck them is a manipulative > whore bitch who's full of herself NEVER ONCE thinks that maybe she doesn't want to fuck them because she just doesn't like 'em?

That is why sites like these exist. If there were no understanding of the fact that many men are not finding success with women simply because they just aren't attractive, we wouldn't bother creating spaces to talk to men about how to become more attractive (better conversation, better date ideas, better, physique, etc, etc).

We're well ahead of you.

- [image] 2mques
  February 8, 2013 at 3:13 pm
  @Holly

  Wow, look at you being all motherly; telling boys to disregard what they want and desire, because if they don't they'll end up being losers (Substitute mother for church and loser for sinner and you can kind of see what you're doing). And what exactly is a loser: according to you someone who has resentment and hatred. Resentment and hatred are emotions, they are not actions, and it is the action of sex that men are concerned about and why they are here. They do not come here to improve their emotional well-being, unless of course it leads to the action of sex, as all the fellas can and will attest to, if you act in a non-passive aggressive kind of way.

  If men were interested in how to be in relationships, or finding women with self-respect and dignity, or how to make a woman happy (on her own terms), there are several resources: a mother, a female friend, magazines etc. There is a never-ending list of media dedicated to women expressing their wants and desires and speaking of them as though this is all life is about. But when a dude just wants to talk about f*cking and how he can do more of it, he's likely to come to a place like this.

  Now here is the difference between men and women when it comes to sex and relationships: men always have theories about women, and if they're wrong, they lose and they have to develop a new theory or end up with nothing: game is simply a theory. However, with women, even thought they have theories as to what a good man is, or what manhood is all about, or what love is all about, or what a good relationship is all about, when those theories don't work out, they say that it's because men didn't live up to them.

  If game is wrong, then there is nothing to fear except a bunch of hateful men who gather together online to hate on women and bask in the glory of misogyny. But if you believe like many feminists, that a man's emotion is the same as his actions, then by all means be the mother you are and try to guide these men towards the path of beta righteousness. Good luck to you, and may the good hamster lord be with you.

- [image] whatsamattayou
  February 8, 2013 at 3:46 pm
  troll's gonna troll

33. [image] Mike
    February 8, 2013 at 1:19 pm
    Wow. Just wanted to say that you killed it in this article. Very well done.

    Reply
34. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 2:56 pm
    Athlone- I read your comments and I think I understand what you're trying to bring to my attention here.
    Each man is an individual who have their own unique way of processing the information provided on this, and other, game sites. Each individual man commenting on here has their own way of putting the processed advice into practice.
    If i understood you correctly, you're saying my assumption that utilizing the game techniques can only be motivated by a hate for women is way off the mark because not every guy who uses the game holds that as their motivation.
    To lump every guy who reads this advice, and follows it in their own way, into a category of "misogynistic woman hater" (or anything insulting like that) is unfair, completely wrong, and generally… ignorant. Am I understanding that correctly?

    Reply
    - [image] Athlone McGinnis
      February 8, 2013 at 4:33 pm
      Yes.

      Reply
35. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 3:04 pm
    Athlone… What you are talking about is something completely different than what is otherwise brought across in these comment areas. You keep saying "us" and "we"…. If you really read the comments, all are fueled by the resentment of women, not the bettering of themselves or their situation. What you are bringing across to me is the exact and perfect opposite of the sentiments by nearly every other male commenter on here.
    That's in black and white. Right there. Read them yourself. What you are telling me, and what my comments are pertaining to, are two COMPLETELY different things. See what I'm saying?

    Reply
36. [image] Holly
    February 8, 2013 at 3:08 pm

And no- my mind is not made up. I understand doing things a certain way to protect yourself from crazy bitches… or from getting hurt by someone you barely know.. these things are important.
I want you to understand that my comments are to the commenters who are expressing what I have described.

Reply

- [image] Robert
  February 8, 2013 at 3:38 pm
  Don't you find the whole idea of coming to a board devoted to discussions by and for the opposite sex, and telling them what they should and shouldn't do, and how they should process their emotions, just a little bit…

  hypocritical? abusive? presumptive?

  Reply

37. [image] Solomon
    February 8, 2013 at 3:50 pm
    Why are there a bunch of chicks here?

    Why don't you girls go run and play?

    Reply

    - [image] whatsamattayou
      February 8, 2013 at 3:59 pm
      - females infiltrate and subvert from the inside, it is their way

      - they can't get enough alpha attention in the real world, so they clitdiddle manosphere blogs

      Reply

38. [image] AC
    February 8, 2013 at 3:59 pm
    Holy motherfucker…

    I wish Roosh just banned females from posting on this site. The comments section on every fucking article here is getting ruined by just one or two women. On this article it's Holly and her inability to understand basic concepts. On the Indian article posted a few days ago it's "Renee" or "Bharatiya Nari" spewing bullshit…

    Reply

    - [image] Anonymous
      February 8, 2013 at 6:06 pm
      ya that savita person or whatever the account is…..bitches be crazy

      Reply

39. [image] Nigel Big Game
    February 9, 2013 at 12:16 am
    I've never been called a creep.

    Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

‘Nice Guys’ Are Just Like Players

February 7, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

It’s become popular of late to castigate ‘nice guys’ as evil, manipulative monsters. That dude wearing dorky glasses and a sweater, trying to be your friend? He’s practically a rapist, but without the balls to do it. Otherwise sensible men chime in to agree with the women lobbing these charges. Nice guys, in fact, are a lot less malevolent than these harridans and gullible players believe. ‘Nice guys’ are accused of pretending to want friendships when they really only want sex. In reality, these men are just not sexually assertive, and aren’t quick to make their intentions clear. The girl, after all, shows some interest in him as a person, so he figures, well, if only I give her some time to see what a great person I am, she will show some sexual interest in me. After all, what’s the rush?

The Problem

Nice guys think girls choose men like people buy houses – the prospective home buyer opens the newspaper and looks at the houses available houses on sale, and methodically chooses a house suited for her tastes and needs. While a few choose a house rashly, most are smart about it. It’s a decision made after much consideration and planning.

Players meanwhile are more like that sweet old lady with saggy arms wearing a hairnet at your local supermarket, handing out free, tasty samples. You’re not even looking at her, and she beckons you over to have a taste. Even though it’s junk food, you can’t resist. You avoid sweets, and here you are eating a tiny cinnabon. And really, she won’t mind if you take just the ~~tip~~ taste.

Regardless, minutes later, you're going home with a 96-pack of cinnabons – and you don't even eat pastries! To be completely honest, the first time it happens, you're a little jarred and confused about how the whole thing went down so fast. As time goes on, you come to accept these periodic 'mistakes.' You start buying the cinnabons unprompted.

Now, imagine that that sweet old lady is actually a funny, strapping young man, and you buying those cinnabons is a woman agreeing to sex with him the night she met him. That confusion you felt after you bought a huge package of junk food? That's how a girl might feel after her first one-night stand. If you remain unconvinced, just remember that our economy is in shambles because tens of millions of people bought homes they cannot afford, and that half of us are comically obese from eating too much junk food. That granny sample lady is looking pretty formidable right now.

Instant Gratification

The bigger a purchase is, and the more rarely we make it, the more cautious we'll be about choosing it. We'll spend more time looking over the options, and think about which one is really best for our long term health and happiness. For women in America, deciding who to have sex with has gone from being a big infrequent 'purchase' to a frequent small one. Before, it might have coincided with the man she would marry or at least seriously date. Having sex meant she was agreeing to be with him for the long haul, so she wouldn't choose just anyone. If she slept with him outside of a relationship, and people found out, her whore score would rocket upwards.

Nowadays, it's just about the man who can tickle her taste buds, right now. And women definitely do not want what the nice guy is selling. While a woman was often tempted to have sex outside the confine of a serious relationship, a patriarchal social order made the restraint of female sexuality its highest priority. Single men and women had fewer opportunities to interact as platonic friends, and women would spend less time single and get married sooner. A woman hanging out with a man when she already had a boyfriend or husband was more likely to attract scrutiny. The men who would be 'nice guys' had much less opportunity to get into the rut they do now, where they pathetically cling to women who hardly notice them. With the lifting of all those restraints, a woman's choice of who to sleep with became as trivial as her choice of meat for dinner.

Fortune Favors The Bold

To a player, every flash of excitement and gale of laughter from the girl is like an army general commanding "ADVANCE, SOLDIER!" In an environment where pre-marital sex doesn't happen, and fathers ensure their daughters don't have sex, the player may have to settle for girls who are pariahs, or give up quick sex altogether. No wonder then that a player's first concern is always 'Is she DTF?'

Both players and 'nice guys' are using sexual strategies, and each have their time and place. But the 'nice guy' strategy just isn't cut out for a society where women have sex outside committed relationships, for a nation where instant gratification has made us uproariously fat.

When looking at the world of sex and relationships, it's valuable to look at things as an evolutionary biologist would; instead of initially castigating something as wrong or unmanly, assume that everything you see is potentially useful, even if you can't understand why people are doing it. Ask yourself, 'why does this exist?' The behavior may have effectively served some purpose in the past, and now it's just a relic of that former time.

The 'nice guy' is a simply a holdover from a patriarchal civilized past, where male romantic commitment was rewarded with sex, and female promiscuity was limited. The 'nice guy' was also more limited in how much time he could spend with a woman in the past – society was more sexually segregated, and eligible women would spend more time in relationships. While they were probably every bit as attracted to 'bad boys' and cads back then, choosing them was difficult or impossible.

Given how women are opting to have sex quickly and incautiously nowadays, being a 'nice guy' is about as useful as keeping your wisdom teeth when they're causing you pain – it's just retarded. If you want to avoid the pain and enjoy life, it's time to throw out those proverbial wisdom teeth, and man up. If you find yourself doing something for a woman that you wouldn't for a man, and you aren't banging her, it's time to let that one go and throw it back into the sea.

To the Machiavels out there, your time has come.

Don't Miss: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

Follow @returnofkings

About the Author

Emmanuel Goldstein is a pompous git who enjoys the company of girly mistresses, spirited men, endless buffets and luxurious clothes. He can be found on Twitter at @Goldsteineum.

Top 5 Clubs In Zagreb To Get Laid

February 7, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
This is a compact club with two floors and lots of attractive girls. Prices are fair and there are many spots to approach from. You do run into typical club issues here, like loud noise and low attention spans, but if an American man is coming off the airplane he'll be very satisfied with what he sees here. Visit starting on Thursday nights, but avoid it during the summer when there are a lot of fat and unruly British chicks.

2. Purgeraj

The biggest hipster venue in Zagreb. It has a loud dancefloor, a big bar room, and two outdoor seating areas. The ratio is usually bad (about two guys for every girl), but the guys here have absolutely no game and rarely approach at all. Instead they hope for a social introduction. The fact that so many people know each other is an advantage because you can talk to a girl and not be disturbed by her friend, who is content catching up with other people while you spit your game.

The biggest problem here is the lower level of talent, meaning you'll have to stay for much longer to find cute women to approach than in a club. On the other hand, if you want to get a one-night stand, this is the place to do it, with the friendliest girls in Zagreb. The party starts on Thursday nights.

3. Mansion

This is a large club next to Lake Jarun, about a 13 minute cab ride from the center. It's the best place to be on Wednesday night when they have their hip hop party. On that night the ratio is good and the girls can be somewhat friendly. The club is split into two parts, one with a dance floor and then another with a large center bar. It's the latter spot that I liked because it wasn't too loud.

I had a lot of luck here getting numbers and random makeouts but not much in the way of fast bangs because of logistics. Since the Lake is far, most girls come sharing a ride, so there is no way to extract them. But on Wednesday night it's worth a visit (party gets going around midnight)

4. Gallery

Just a stone's throw from Mansion, this club has the hottest girls in Zagreb, hands down. It's a snobby venue with table service and big groups, but a night here and you will happily renounce your American citizenship. I recommend you come on Friday or Saturday night around midnight to check it out and be able to brag to your friends back home on what you saw. What I liked about Gallery is that it stayed open later than Mansion, so I'd sneak inside the back entrance when no one was looking and do a few more approaches before going home to masturbate.

5. Alcatraz

This is a tiny, dank, dark pit of a bar that attracts a large street party right in front, a la the Brazilian style. The vibe is welcoming but you'll have to move fast if you see girls talking without guys. Don't be shy to casually insert yourself into conversations with mixed sets.

Honorable mention: Maraschino. On the weekends this seems to be a warm-up spot for girls before they hit the club. The talent was high but horrible logistics prevent you from putting in approaches. I heard the basement gets packed and awesome but it never happened while I was there.

Read Next: 16 Tips For Having Sex With Croatian Girls

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

Bodybuilding Vs. Building Your Body

February 7, 2013 | by BasileosHerakleios | Link | Original Link

---

This is the truth about bodybuilding: If you do everything about it right, expend huge amounts of time and energy, you'll end up stiff and muscle-bound, with very little functional strength and out of breath from merely tying your own shoelaces.

[image]

He's huge, he poses well. But ask him to carry a piece of furniture to the third floor and he'll shatter.

If you're doing bodybuilding the wrong way, you'll end up just as my personal laughing stock in the gym did: huge Arms, bulging chest, no upper back, well advanced beer gut and toothpick legs. And I forgot to mention: An inferiority complex to match his arms.

Bodybuilding as popularized by Arnold in the 1970s consists of isolating muscles in very specific exercises, long rests in between sets and eating lots of powdered protein. And don't forget to add all kinds of drugs to the mix. That makes conventional bodybuilding just about the most unnatural thing you can do to your body short of male pectoral implants.

Nothing in conventional bodybuilding teaches your muscles to work together in a group in order to execute vigorous movements. Nothing in it sharpens your sense of balance. And nothing in it is any good for getting your body in a posture of masculine grace.

As opposed to lifting weights. The Olympic way.

Olympic lifts – aka the clean and jerk and the snatch – do all those good things mentioned above. Why? Because they force nearly all the muscles in your body into an extreme effort. Together. As a unit.

Actually, Olympic weightlifting very much resembles the heavy exertions our ancestors did, but we seldomly get around to do. Think: lifting a slain boar and carrying it back to the cave for nourishment. Think: Roman soldiers building earthworks and wooden palisades around their camp. Think: gangs of laborers lifting bullhead railbeams.

[image]

Rome's finest lifted heavy things far more often than they did their swords

Those are natural activities for men. Activities which millennia of evolution have made us suited to. Which our bodies have a need to execute in order to develop into their proper, masculine shape.

But here we are now, ourselves designed to lift and carry heavy things, but caught in the 21st century where such activity seems very much out of place. Which gets us back to Olympic weightlifting, the one thing ready to fill that void in the life of postmodern males.

Loading...
[image]

Can you spot the difference?

The photo above illustrates perfectly the difference between a guy lifting weights vs a guy committed to conventional bodybuilding. Those two guys are among the very best at what they do, but I won't tell you which is the bodybuilder and which the lifter.

Hint: one looks like a pacific whale after heavy exposure to Fukushima radiation. Subsequently it beached somewhere along California's coastline and has since been taken in as a pet by the proprietor of a tanning salon.

Hint: one looks like a seriously athletic dude, equally ready for an MMA match or a 100 yard dash. Navy Seal recruiters masturbate to his image. Women feel their Pavlovian bell ringing violently. He would have beaten Brad Pitt's ass if the producers had taken the trouble to cast a credible Hector.

Have you been able to solve the riddle? Did you figure out which one has build himself a body like a Roman statue by seriously lifting? And did you spot the one that has transformed himself – through a myriad of hours at the gym, 'roids, protein powder and tanning – into a cross between trailer trash and oxen?

If you did, then it is time to break through the endless monotony of bicep curls and cable crossovers. Start picking up heavy things from the ground, then violently push them over your head, alternately clenching your teeth or screaming as you do so.

Get strong.

PS: So you guys know I'm not a 300 lbs tub of lard writing in his basement: This is me, taken with my cell's camera, prior to writing this article. I am 35 years old, spend most of my time at work and love tobacco and booze. I work out only twice a week, for 45 minutes. My core exercises are the clean and jerk and the chinup. Everything else I do is designed to strengthen the various phases of the clean and jerk. Considering the miniscule amount of time I invest, I love the results.

[image]

Lazy but fairly well in shape. Thanks to the allmighty barbell.

Don't Miss: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

5 Ways To Improve Your Online Game

February 7, 2013 | by Halfbreed | Link | Original Link

Online dating sparks debate in the manosphere. Some swear by it, others hate it. Tuthmosis recently acknowledged the merits of online dating. Western Cancer later countered that it hamstrings game. Both men make well-reasoned and valid arguments.

Online game is not perfect. It is true that you are unlikely to find many 9s or 10s online. It can also become a huge waste of time and energy if done improperly. It is not appropriate for all men. And it can hurt your game if used as an excuse to avoid approaching women in real life.

But you can get laid online consistently with minimal effort. Having a good system in place is crucial to success. It helps to approach it as a business. I like to make a game out of it, challenging myself to pull new women online efficiently.

Here are five ways I have personally improved my online dating efforts:

1. Macros

I cannot take credit for this online dating idea. Macros make online dating much more efficient. Download and install a macro program into your browser. Spend a few minutes creating and recording custom messages. After that, you just hit one button and quickly send your standard email to each new girl. This drastically cuts down on keystrokes and eliminates copy pasting.

2. Dating Apps

You may want to send openers from your phone. In this case, the standard free smart phone app for each individual dating site works well. Use that with an app like ColorNote. Save your custom messages in note form and then copy/paste your emails from your phone. This method is not as good as using macros on your PC, but it is much quicker than typing on your phone.

3. Email At Work

This applies to those who still work for someone else. Stick it to the Man. Set aside a few minutes each day to shoot off openers. Use boring meetings or cubicle down time as an opportunity to send emails. Focus on contacting girls who are “online now.” They obviously tend to respond more quickly and can be open to same night meet-ups.

4. Stack Your Dates

This is an effective way of planning dates. Schedule your dates back-to-back. Keep the two venues close by and leave a half hour cushion in between. Ride the momentum from one date into the next. Every time I have stacked two dates in one night, I have banged at least one of the girls. Stacking two dates in one night creates a real abundance mentality that is hard to fake. It also gives you an excuse to cut the date short if needed.

5. The Local Coffee Shop

I sometimes use bars for first dates. But I've been most successful meeting women at coffee houses for first dates. Avoid national chains; look for local shops close to your place instead. Many serve beer and wine. Coffee shops are usually cheaper than bars and will sometimes have evening happy hours. Timing your dates for this will reduce your overall cost per lay.

Online dating is not perfect, and not all men will find it useful. I agree it should probably not be your only source of new women. But, with a proper system in place, it can become an important part of your dating and seduction efforts.

Read More: 6 Types Of Guys Who Try To Get Laid Online

8 Responses to 5 Ways To Improve Your Online Game

1. James
   February 8, 2013 at 2:10 pm
   ha ha. I get a great laugh when I'm a starbucks and see a an online date going on. No way in hell you are coming close to that on the same night
   Reply
2. half caste
   February 8, 2013 at 2:13 pm
   The nexxtlevelup showed hot to make a good profile
   Reply
3. Double E
   February 8, 2013 at 2:21 pm
   if you stack dates how can the first date ever end in a bang, since you have to leave for the second date? Do you just blow off the second one if its looking like you will get it done on the first?
   Reply

4. Anonymous
February 8, 2013 at 2:32 pm

> get laid online

Is that like phone sex for the internetz?

Reply

5. Mark Minter
February 8, 2013 at 11:40 pm

To answer the stacked question above. If the first date is going as you wish then you blow off the second. And it does add that sense of abundance. Your looking at your watch. You're distracted. You have plans running through your head. And you almost have a sense that you want to get the fuck out of there. Aloof is very easy in this circumstance.

I once stacked 3 dates in one night. All day long I was worried about how I was going to actually do it, to swing from one to another to another. The first situation clicked and I just blew off all the others. I was in Madrid. It was a final Saturday night. I never heard from the other two ever again but frankly I didn't care. The stacked the other two behind the first because the first had been a foot dragger on other dates. So I had assumed the same thing this time and was ready to bail at the first moment merely to get on with the other two. Never underestimate the power of Dread in a woman and her ability to sense disinterest on your part.

I highly concur with not only stacking dates for the same night but only for the same time slot. Flaking is an enormous issue in modern dating and especially if you travel to another country.

If you go to another country and you use online dating to meet women then definitely stack and stack and stack. You can filter out flakes as you approach the time of the date(s).

Roosh had a suggestion of making a date for a few days in advance and telling the girl that you would text on the afternoon of the day of the date with final instructions. Then don't send the text. If the girl is genuinely interested then she will text you with a query about the final plans. If she doesn't then she probably had blown you off and was going to flake.

So by stacking multiple dates for the same day and also for the same time slot you can filter as you get closer and closer, even at the last minute. Go with the best option that has shown avid interest in meeting you. In Colombia, you could leave it open such that you go with the first girl that actually shows. Often you agree to meet somewhere public before going to the actual site of the date. Flaking is abysmal in Colombia and tardiness is legendary. You spent a lot of money to get there and a flake can blow your whole trip if you foolishly allow yourself to be dependent on her. Often the date will not go worth a shit and you can be standing there on a Saturday night, alone, in a foreign country after a failed date. So by stacking you have a backup plan.

Trust me, women are doing something similar to you and they do not hesitate nor feel bad when they flake on you because a better offer presented itself. She can wake up in the morning and look herself in the mirror and ask herself, “How am I going show this guy that I am genuinely interested in him?” And she has the opportunity to act accordingly. She can respond to communications in a timely manner, in a tone that shows interest. On the date, she can try to work with you, find common ground, find a reason to construct a relationship, and show genuine desire for you. If she doesn’t, then she lost.

If women were not flaky, if you could assume that things would go well on dates with them, then these strategies wouldn’t be necessary. She knows already because you asked her out that you will probably come, that you will probably like her and you will probably want to be with her. You do not have even close to the same assurance about her. She holds that she is reserving judgement and it is her right to do so. Fine. But you don’t have to take it.

She has every opportunity to make the situation work. If she doesn’t take the initiative, make the investment, show she cares, then you have options.

Reply

6. Mark Minter
February 8, 2013 at 11:56 pm
I would add this one thought to my above comment.

Tony Boselli was a nasty left tackle for the Jacksonville Jaguars that was one of the first left tackles to use aggression in his blocking strategy against the defensive end. He would slap the defensive player at the snap of the ball, not merely react to the rush, but actually drive the guy the direction he chose, and literally fight the guy all through the play.

He said “Where is it written that the blocker is supposed to take crap off of the pass rusher.?”

Stack dates. Don’t take any more crap from women.

Reply

7. M. Simon
February 9, 2013 at 8:27 am
Stacked dates (I prefer D cups). Take every thing they have got.
Reply
8. prepman
February 9, 2013 at 1:50 pm
Stacked dates are awesome! Had 3 in one night also. You just bounce with a completely different vibe knowing YOU'RE THE MAN IN DEMAND. It's a power heady trip that make all the dates individually better.
Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

Why Russian Girlfriends Are The Best

February 8, 2013 | by James Maverick | Link | Original Link

While I don't discriminate against any particular women, I still like to go back to my roots and date Russian (and other ex-Soviet Union) women every now and then.

One-night stands are a blast, but the real fun begins when you get yourself a nice Russian/Eastern European girlfriend for a mini-relationship. I've had my share of those and can tell you that the dynamics are exactly the opposite to what you'll find in feminist countries where women have been brainwashed into thinking they're the same as men.

Things finally return to normality, a dark and long-forgotten place where men are men, women are women, and children are scared.

What She Does For Me

1. Cooking

She begins cooking as soon as she comes home from work. Dishes range from basic (potato, soups) to the complex. While she's cooking I make myself useful by sitting in the living room mindlessly browsing the Internet or doing similarly important stuff. She's the queen of the kitchen, and I don't dare to interfere.

2. Laundry

My laundry is done every week like clockwork. Once it's done, the clothes are duly hanged to dry and then neatly folded and put back in my drawer. While she's hanging the clothes to dry or folding them afterwards, you'll usually find me helping by sitting in the living room watching random YouTube videos or chatting with my friends.

3. Cleaning

The house is duly cleaned once a week. While she's cleaning the floor, I make myself useful by pulling my feet up while she cleans the floor underneath. Then I resume my normal activities of browsing the Internet or reading some tech blogs.

4. Sex On Demand

I get sex anytime I want with no exceptions. She's tired after work – we bang. She has a headache – we bang. She is on her period – we bang. Her pussy is sore – we bang. I also get a blowjob so that my member is properly lubed for the raw dogging that follows.

Loading…

5. Loyalty

Eastern European women greatly value relationships over one-night stands with random guys. As long as she's in a committed (at least from her point of view) relationship all other guys are out of the picture. When the relationship starts to deteriorate that's when she'll start considering other guys, including her male "friends" who have been emailing her from time to time to "check in" and liking her silly posts on Facebook.

What I Do For Her

1. Be A Man

I'm tasked with fixing shit around the house, solving problems and making all decisions more complex than … – never mind, I'm tasked with making all decisions. I also have to provide emotional support if she's tired or had a bad day. If you need further clarification about this whole "be a man" concept, watch a couple of Russian movies (I recommend WWII) or go live in Moscow for a month.

2. Bang

If I'm free and haven't emptied my sperm reserves in a while, I give her a good and thorough pummeling — the harder the better. If, while her pussy is being demolished, her eyes roll to the back of her head, then I'm doing it right. Mediocre sex is not acceptable. I also give her a good pounding if she's moody and bugging me. Things quickly return to normal and everyone is happy. The health of the relationship is a complex function of quantity of sex multiplied by quality of sex of squared. Give her earth-shattering orgasms and she'll be your slave for life.

So unless you've had a Russian/EE girlfriend, you simply haven't lived. Her job is to make sure her man is well fed, well rested, and always has a warm hole to empty his sperm reserves. And these skills she learned from the school of life, a mystical place where reality based on biology always trumps any "reality" portrayed on that last episode of Sex And The City.

Read Next: What Guys Are Saying About Getting Laid In Ukraine

It’s Just A Little Chip

February 8, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Back in the mid 1980s I was at a party one summer evening, on break from college. The beer was good, and a few friends that I attended high school with were there. We were all chillin having a good time. During the course of the evening I met a friend of a friend, whose name I forgot, but he was one of those born again Christians. I do not care for religious fanatics, but this guy’s pro-Christ temperament seemed low key enough and tolerable. That, plus I was too drunk to get up and walk away.

Many born again Christians have a fascination with The Revelation. This is the last book in the Bible that metaphorically describes the upcoming signs of mankind’s demise. The born again guy at the party and I got talking, and he was telling me about the future of The Beast, or also known as The Mark, which I have also heard about before from other holy rollers. So we talked further and he explained to me that the Beast is where a person has something under his skin that can be scanned electronically to extract information about you: everything, in fact. He said your medical data, finances, and ability to pay for something (essentially replacing the credit card) will all be extracted from the Mark you have. That and more.

I thought to myself that this concept would make a great horror science fiction film. And it did so in the 1993 movie Demolition Man, but in fact it went further as we now see life imitating art. The above video is worth viewing all the way through. The RFID, or perhaps shall we call it The Beast, is part of Obama’s health care plan. And whereas the implementation of the chip being placed inside a human is not mandated as written, nonetheless the way the law is stated allows the specific operatives in charge of the program to decide whether or not the chip should be required. In short, the law is written vaguely enough to appear harmless at the same time giving full draconian control to the Matrix.

I also want to state here that in no way to I am trying to indirectly coerce anyone to becoming religious or repenting. The “Are you saved?” Christians have, in my opinion, done the most damage to the church than anyone. You can include me among the people who avoid those zealots. But to their credit that they seem to have successfully foreseen something that appears to be manifesting today.

Loading…

The issue is not this new technology per se, nor is it the fact that the government wants to implement it, nor is it the fact that the chip could evolve be more invasive then simply providing medical data. The issue is John Q. Public’s complacent “Yeah it could be abused really really bad, but think of all the good it could do” attitude. Those of you who have studied the Roman Empire are aware of the concept of ‘bread and circus,’ which states: keep the people stupid and entertained and you control Rome. Today’s bread and circus is extremely sophisticated via smartphones, social media, and all related technologies therein. So it comes as no surprise that one does not see an uproar about all of this.

We are at a cross roads. Lets assume for a moment that the initial chip will only be medical data. But if this generation allows this RFID version 1.0 be implanted, the next generation could be sold on a version of the chip to include say, one's driver's license and medical data. The following generation after that could be convinced to enable the chip to pay for things, as well as drivers license data, and medical records. A few more generations and versions down the road who knows? Perhaps the chip will be able to deactivate your life at the push of a button. I would like to think that this could never happen but yesterday's Orwellian fictional stories are becoming today's realities.

If the chip is implanted and mandated then I guess we'll have to rent Demolition Man so we will know what is expected of us.

Read Next: The Matrix Is Getting Pissed

16 Things I Learned From Mark Twain

February 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

What Is Man? is a powerful book written by Mark Twain that was sent to me by the heavens at the exact time I needed it. It advised me to look inside at what my mind was telling me to do instead of continuing to re-live behaviors that gave me happiness in the past.

Here is the wisdom I learned:

1. "Whatsoever a man is, is due to his make, and to the influences brought to bear upon it by his heredities, his habitat, his associations. He is moved, directed, commanded, by exterior influences—solely. He originates nothing, not even a thought."

2. Your thoughts are instantly formed without any work on your part, the result of thousands of influences that shape you into who you are. No thought of yours is truly original—it has all been influenced. All men do is observe and combine.

3. A man can only achieve the top of his society, not another's. A French musician can produce the finest of French music that is deeply enjoyed by his peers, but he will never produce music that is enjoyed by Chinese people.

4. A writer or artist is nothing more than a machine that is built up by influences. If an artist produces richer work than another, it's because he used brighter paint or finer threads. In other words, his influences were better.

5. Self-improvement is a form of training that takes raw material (knowledge) and turns it into something beautiful (finished product), like taking iron ore from a mountain and turning it into steel that constructs skyscrapers.

6. You are motivated only to benefit your own good, not to help others. Those who decide to help others do so because it satisfies something within. Everything you do is for your own approval, even selfless acts that benefit strangers.

Loading...

7. A man will never do anything which goes against what gives him true comfort. His behavior secures him peace of mind that has been determined by his training and temperament "He will always do the thing which will bring him the most mental comfort—for that is the sole law of his life."

8. "There is no act, large or small, fine or mean, which springs from any motive but the one—the necessity of approving and contenting one's own spirit."

9. Inner turmoil is a result of not doing what brings you comfort. Close your eyes and let your mind direct your behavior to that which it wants. It is your master—a master created by training and make.

10. We are indifferent to another person's pain unless that pain causes us pain.

11. Men do make sacrifices but it is for their own sake first, to please his spirit in some way.

12. Once a man thinks he has found truth, he puts up high walls to defend it. He is no longer open to different ideas or thought.

13. Your master (mind) is fickle and indecisive. Sometimes it makes you do things that make you feel pain. It is not perfect.

14. A good man will train himself in a way that his behaviors content him and also benefit those around him.

15. A man committing a horrible crime is actually an act that took many years and countless negative influences to accomplish. It was not a spontaneous behavior.

16. "Temperament is born, not made."

This book was absolutely brilliant and ranks aside Walden as a work that helped right my wobbly balance. I did sense a touch of Eastern philosophy within its pages, particular how thought is independent of self. While I do think that genetics play a larger role than Twain suggests, it's a mere minor fault in one of the best book's I've ever read. Highly recommended.

Read More: "What Is Man" on Amazon (free Kindle edition)

3 Passive Actions to Boost Your Success With Women

February 9, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Aloofness, amused mastery, being cool, and being interesting are all tenets of game. They all derive from confidence. Connery-era James Bond is a perfect example of amused mastery. Henchmen are always trying to kill him and women are always trying to sleep with him. Bond toys with his adversaries and his women because he is confident. His training and experience allow him to scoff at some goon trying to kill him while his experience with women allows him to effortlessly attract them. All the while Mr. Bond has the mission as his #1 priority.

A real life example would be an elite athlete. You'll see them on game day, fight night or at a meet effortlessly defeat their opponents. What you don't see is the hours of effort they put into training before the event. You don't see a regimented diet, practice, drills, strategy sessions, etc.

Having these traits will do wonders for your ability to meet and have sex with beautiful women, but no matter the amount of active work you do it will never make up for the passive actions which will ensure your success. In no order here are three habits you need to adapt to give you the confidence to talk with women. They all take the guesswork out so you can be smooth as butter.

1. Be mindful and observant of your surroundings.

If you've been out at a bar I'm sure you've noticed "that" guy at one point or another. If you haven't you're probably him. He stumbles in with a bunch of other dudes, is loud, bumps into people and is the bad kind of asshole. The game equivalent of this is the dancing monkey haphazardly approaching every woman in sight. He'll get laid, but precision is more efficient.

Next time you walk into a bar walk in slowly and look around the place scanning for girls giving you eye contact, girls standing by themselves, and what the bar setup is like. While you're doing this try to guess what mental state everyone is in. Does the girl standing by herself look like shes open and enjoying herself or is she sitting hunched over her iPhone?

Same thing goes during the day time. Early one Saturday I saw a very hot girl sitting with her sunglasses on and earbuds in. I approached her asking when the bus came. She responded quickly and nicely but also briefly. Upon further inspection she was wearing a tight black dress, short heels, her hair was in a wet bun. She'd probably had a one night stand with some guy and was on her way home – this interaction would be tough and probably fruitless.

Next time you see a girl in the day try to think what her current state of mind is. Is she hurrying or walking with a relaxed curiosity. Is she focused on her phone or is she alert and looking around. While sitting in a coffee shop does she keep checking her phone and looking at the entrance or is she sitting with a half drunk cappuccino enjoying a book?

If you practice this you will be able to single out the best opportunities for a conversation and will make your game better and more streamlined. Being able to sniff out which girls are open to conversation will naturally lead yourself to be more confident around her. You already have an idea of where her head is at so you can just relax and do your thing.

2. Have your logistics in place before you even approach

Have you ever started talking to a girl and in the middle of the interaction realized you had no idea where to take things when it came for you to part ways? You'll think "should I take her on a date now, or later? Where/when am I going to take her on a date?" If you have then my advice to you is to have a plan before you even talk to any girls.

If you're going to a certain part of town during the day, scout out some good places for an instadate such as a bar, coffee shop or interesting store. At night do the same thing, know the layout of the area. Know where you can get food, transportation and other bars you can bounce her to. If you're taking her phone number then have a place or activity and a date in mind before you even talk to her. Instead of saying "Lets grab a drink sometime" say "Lets grab a drink Wednesday evening" and get her digits.

Your place or hers? Know how to get everywhere easily. This has been beaten to death, but have your place in optimum condition: clean, organized, plan out things you'll show her, have ingredients for a drink, music, condoms, etc.

If you get all of your logistics in then it eliminates any uncertainties. You know what is going to happen when and this will allow you to show how cool and interesting you are with an aloof demeanor.

3. Know what kind of girl you want and what kind of girl you attract.

Stop right now and think about the last time you saw a girl who gave you an instant boner. Think about the best girlfriend you've had, think about the best lay you've had. Write down all of these traits from the physical to the mental and behavioral Be as detailed as you can be; paint the picture of your perfect 10.

Now think about the last time a girl has repulsed you so much you couldn't get a boner for days and had to sit in the fetal position crying for hours the first time you saw her. Do the same exercise as before. Write down everything and paint the complete picture of the ugliest and most annoying woman you could ever meet.

After you've done this think about what type of girls you attract with ease and which ones you actively repulse. Think about where you usually find these girls, then think about points 1 and 2.

This may seem like a stupid exercise, but when you see a girl with traits you like you'll know exactly why you like her. This will give you motivation to approach her and once you do you'll be in a qualifying frame asking her whether her other traits match up with your ideal.

These passive game tips all boil down to organization and observation. They are all habits which remove any guesswork and make your life easier. If your life is easier you'll bed women easier. If you're confident in your logistics, mate choice, and target selection you'll be confident and aloof when you end up approaching.

Read Next: Why This Site Will Always Be "Creepy"

About the Author

Western Cancer is just trying to get a nut like squirrels in this mad world. Land of milk and honey with the swirls, where reckless nekkid girls get necklaces of pearls. Follow me on twitter @WesternxCancer

How To Kill Zombie Arguments

February 9, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

A zombie argument is defined as any debunked but still blood-thirsty female argument that just won't fucking die. A perfect example is the "wage gap" argument that's been [shot] [so] [full] [of] holes that it looks like my favorite underwear, but we still can't seem to put this living dead topic back in the grave even as women continue their refusal to prepare for higher paying STEM jobs.

But this article isn't about the wage gap; it's about how to kill Zombie arguments dead and have a little fun in the process. If there's one thing any red pill (and many blue pill) men have learned, it's that logic, rational thinking, carefully constructed arguments, facts, tacit intelligence and evidence means absolutely nothing to a feminist – and to most women in general for that matter.

Man: These are the facts, and this is how I feel about it.

Woman: This is how I feel about it, so these must be the facts.

Loading...

It's no wonder gender conflict abounds in the West. We've pretty much taken the half of the population who functions like children and decided to take them seriously for some reason. But for the small percentage of men out there who would rather not be bothered with the charade, let's take a quick look at the Top 5 Zombie arguments that just won't die, and learn how to kill them dead.

Zombie #1: Men get paid more than women because of gender discrimination.

You: Men get paid more because we're worth more.

Zombie #2: All we want is true equality, fairness, and to end discrimination.

You: Why don't you just lose 15 pounds and see if that helps? I bet it will.

Zombie #3: You're a misogynist.

You: Well, I have been practicing more lately.

Zombie #4: There are no good men left.

You: Fucked them all already? What a slut.

Zombie #5: We're living in a rape culture.

You: (Looking her up and down slowly) I don't think you have anything to worry about.

Those are just five examples, but you get the idea. If you have the balls to do it, stop casting your pearls of wisdom before swine, become a red pill zombie slayer, and have a little fun. Never formulate logical arguments, engage in two-way discourse or try to educate a zombie, because that's using your brain and brains get them all worked up.

Happy hunting.

Read Next: Brilliant Takedown Of Feminism From An Old Man

Best Of The Manosphere: A Note To My Son

February 9, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Welcome to the Best Of The Manosphere series! This regular series will highlight the best works created in the manosphere, new and old. If you have any suggestions that you feel should be considered, feel free to leave them in the comments below.

For today's article, we have "A Note To My Son", which was written by a concerned father to his son on how to navigate the world as a man. You know this father had fully ingested the red-pill as an experienced man, but had to find a way to compress decades of info into one letter.

The letter is five pages. By internet standards, this note it's a lengthy read. However, once you get started it will be impossible to stop. And the things you learn within can be applied to any man, as wisdom is eternal.

For young men, this note will be full of practical life advice.

For older men, this note addresses the question of what it would be like to raise a son in a world hostile to men.

—

Hi Cole,

In a couple of days you'll be twenty-one, and then legally be able to do anything that's, well, legal. It's a time, perhaps, to begin to think more seriously about women and marriage, not so much with the idea of getting married anytime soon – a bad idea, in my mind—but rather about what you do and don't want in a relationship of any kind, marriage of course being the most serious, if only because of the consequences when things go wrong. I don't have much doubt that you'll consider such matters from your own unique perspective.

You may in fact not give a hoot about what I or anyone else has to say by way of friendly or fatherly advice. I'm this way on just about everything I do or have done, and all indications are that you're at least as single-minded and strong willed as I've ever been. Still, I can't resist putting down some of my thoughts for your benefit, things to consider that I would have given much more attention to in the past had I had the benefit of hindsight, all the "wisdom" that I've acquired in two marriages and several relationships and through talking to hundreds of men about sex and their marriages in my travels in Southeast Asia. Anyway, herewith some thoughts to think about.

Don't confuse lust and love, and be suspicious of anything that marches under the banner of love, one of the more ambiguous and abused words in the English language. Probably in every language. A word, indeed, that promises so much in the beginning and yet is destined to—and does—spawn more hurt and sorrow and hate and self-recrimination that one can imagine.

Lust, of course, is that gripping state of mind when you see someone that you'd love to crawl all over with your mouth and hands and then find yourself fortunate enough to have a damn good down home fxxx or two with—or one that lasts all night long and perhaps for several days or weeks. Lust, one comes to understand, is that state of mind that with any given woman can hang on for several months, a period of time that can only be described as perilous in the extreme. It's a roller coaster ride that cannot be controlled or stopped.

Lust is dangerous, to put it differently, because it really is true that, as the worn phrase goes, your little head is telling your big head what to do, and telling reason to fxxx off when it raises its shaky hand to be heard. When in a state of lust a person makes all kinds of foolish and costly decisions for which there can be a full lifetime of regret. So, when hearing or thinking about that vague and all-encompassing thing called love that, most of the time, and certainly early on in any relationship, is really little more than uncontrollable lust, go slow. Go real slow when it comes to making commitments, or talking about marriage and having kids.

When in this lustful state, and with any woman, never fail—not once—to wear a condom (except of course when getting what every honest man cannot do without—a blowjob). Use one even if the woman is on birth control pills and swears she faithfully takes them, because the one certainty about all women is that they cannot be trusted, and least of all when they think they're in love, which means they're also probably thinking about having children. Your children. They will, literally, do almost anything to bag the catch they are sure they want and cannot do without—you. Never forget—as I did at your age—that if you get a woman pregnant it's going to mean marriage, an abortion if you're lucky enough to persuade the woman to do it, or a couple of decades of supporting a kid you'll only see or be with on an occasional basis.

Okay, now to other matters. Let's assume that you wait another six or eight years to get into a serious relationship, and by this time you've accumulated some capital by virtue of having a good job or getting your hands on the assets that I have. Don't—ever—let on to the woman at any stage in the relationship how much you're worth, and if you are worth a couple of hundred thousand or more and moving toward a serious relationship, hide the money in a place the woman cannot find or know about, perhaps even consider burying it in an offshore account.

If you do get serious and get seriously talking about marriage, early on let the woman know that there will be no marriage without a prenuptial agreement. I don't care how sweet and loving and soft and generous the woman is or appears to be, and how many declarations of undying and everlasting love she professes for you, and how much you think she would never, ever try to skin you or clean you out—get one.

Work on the premise, as smart men with experience do, that every woman, and without exception, when faced with divorce will take you for everything her attorney can get out of you. Everything! As the trite but universal truth goes: All is fair in love and war. And one might add, love till death do us part invariably turns out to be little more than words that in a divorce battle come to mean: war by any and all nasty means.

Incidentally, when you go the prenup route, don't cheap it. Get the best attorney you can possibly afford, one who has worked with the courts and knows just how easily prenup agreements can be busted. As I noted, don't be fooled or taken in by any woman's crying and begging line to the effect that if you really love her there is absolutely no need for a prenup. This is the truth of the moment. It will clearly not be—as history so clearly shows for so many men—the truth of time, when a relationship goes south.

Now to a long list of things that I would find undesirable in any woman, any one of which would be reason enough for me to get rid of her sooner than later, by which I mean I'd ask her to be gone within the hour once I clearly saw what I did not like and could not tolerate for any length of time.

If she's got any kind of a history of mental illness, whether or not treated clinically—depression, a bipolar personality, mild or severe mood swings, any of a dozen phobias—get rid of her the moment you hear about or experience any of this. You don't want to deal with any kind of a mental basket case, even a mild one. Life is too short, and there's too many fantastic things to experience that can't be experienced if you're a caretaker.

There are plenty of men about who want to nurse and care for the sick, and are more than willing to give a big shoulder to women who love to cry about their illnesses—real or imaginary. Let these men take care of the millions, tens of millions of sick women. How long does it take to find out if you're getting into a relationship with a nut case—mild, severe, in between? Probably no more than a couple of weeks of steady dating—if you've got your eyes open. Often it takes no more than one small "crisis" to recognize what will be a recurrent and most unwelcome problem.

The same advice applies to a woman with a physical disability—of any sort. Let it be someone else's problem, her problem. The minute you become aware of the physical liability, get rid of her: walk and don't look back.

If you've got a lot of energy, as you do, then stay away from women who are low energy. You know, that kind of woman who lacks drive, has little or no curiosity about life, gets easily bored by just about everything, and loves to sit around and read romance novels and watch TV and eat Tom and Jerry ice cream. Get with this kind of woman and you'll find yourself living a solitary existence.

Likewise, if you've got a good sexual appetite and the woman that you find with a lot of positive traits does not, then be careful, real careful, because you'll find yourself soon looking elsewhere for satisfaction, and you'll take out your dissatisfaction on the woman you're with. It's a guarantee the relationship will suffer.

There's an ironclad law to remember about anything you encounter in a woman early on, or at any time, and it goes something like this: What you see now is what you'll get in two weeks and twenty weeks and twenty years; and if anything changes, and it always does, it will change for the worse. Little—and not just with women—rarely changes for the better. Translated, and back to the original point: if the woman's appetite for sex is not up to what you would like or need, you'd be a perfect fool to think that her appetite will increase with time or familiarity. It will almost certainly diminish, and then disappear.

If you find yourself attracted to a woman who declares herself a feminist at any point, seriously think of finding the door for her as quickly as possible. The only exception here is if you find yourself with what I'd call a soft feminist. She's interested, as all fair-minded people should be, and as I'm sure you are, in equal pay and equal opportunity and equal treatment on any and all issues.

On the other hand, if there is anything more than this, where, for example, there is a show or expression of "attitude" toward men, then run from the woman, and as fast you can. She's going to be more fxxxing trouble down the line than you can possibly imagine, and it's a guarantee that at this point in history it's not the kind of trouble any man of sound mind wants to deal with. Unfortunately, the West is now full of such women, and they are nothing but serious trouble, huge trouble in fact. Put differently, if you fxxx up, in their eyes, even a little, and even over something trivial, you could be looking at jail time. And I don't mean this metaphorically.

You are now living in a time in which things like sexual harassment and a woman feeling "uncomfortable" and even her imagining that you physically or mentally abused her at the very moment that you are literally in the wilds of Borneo catching butterflies will get you arrested. If you think I'm exaggerating, then I suggest we talk at length, and I will give you a hundred first-hand stories, and not a one of them will be an exaggeration or one of my fictions. So, women who want to talk about having to live in a "paternalistic society," and talk of "men the oppressor," and who peddle horseshit about one in four women in universities being "sexually assaulted"—these kinds of women are literally dangerous to your mental health, your financial health, and your physically health.

My advice to anyone your age, and my age too for that matter, is: Stay the fxxx away from these women. They're just plain toxic. In the workplace. In grocery stores where once upon a merry time it was a great place to find a pickup fxxx for the night. At parties whether they are only serving tea. And most of all don't find yourself in any kind of a relationship with women who have been indoctrinated in women's studies programs by man-hating women, the scum of scum in America today.

Don't even go near these university indoctrinated women for a dick-satisfying one-night fling; they have the power, literally, to come back to you six months or a year later and formally charge you with rape, for the sole reason that one morning they missed their period and had too much to drink and remembered that the one night they screamed and scratched in ecstasy and wanted more you only gave them one instead of two kisses upon getting out of bed to leave. Anything remotely like the filing of a formal rape charge and you are fxxxed big time.

Loading...

Don't get involved with any woman who doesn't have at least one or two of your real interests. Fishing, sports, being outdoors, whatever. There has to be some intersection of interests or you'll be living alone, or living with someone who constantly resents your absence when you are enjoying something you have enjoyed since childhood. Why the fxxx should you give up your interests for any woman? Or anyone? And don't forget to test her.

Don’t just take her word that she will do things with you, or that she shares one or more of your fascinations or hobbies. Get the evidence, see and feel the interest she has—or send her on her way. The general rule here is: don’t take a woman’s word about anything that really concerns your central sense of self and how you want to live.

Check out her personal habits carefully. Is she fat, or will she get fat, or does she care about her weight? If this is important to you, as it has been to me, then look at this carefully, or you will be more than a little sorry. And you will be damn sorry if you misread your own take on the matter, or where she’s at on this issue, because as the years start to pile up and she puts on weight, and you don’t like it, she will simply tell you to fxxx off and mind your own business. Or go get an attorney, and then you’ll find yourself where no man wants to find himself.

There’s always that issue of beauty, and almost all men when they use this word are thinking of how the woman looks. Does she have a pretty or attractive face, and an attractive (thin) body, and does she take care of herself—spend time but not too much time looking after her appearance? My advice is to stay away from what might be called the nines and tens, the beauty queens who love mirrors more than anything else.

Invariably, they’re going to be stuck on their specialness, and more often than not they’re going to be a less than exciting or adventuresome in an hour-long roll in the sack. (“Don’t mess up my hair, honey, I just got it done at the beauty salon this afternoon and it cost me a hundred and a half.”) More often than not they’re going to be spending your money or getting their nails all pretty and buying pricey Gucci handbags and diamond-studded high heels and hot and tight dresses and blouses meant to get other men looking at them. These kinds of women don’t change with time, or rather they only change in wanting to spend more of your money in an attempt to prevent the inevitable erosion of their faces and bodies. Their minds? It’s never an issue, and usually for the reason that there’s little there.

There is the inevitable question as to whether the pretty girl that everyone wants, and you too want, has anything in her head. Here you’re faced with a dilemma of sorts, because if you do find someone who is intellectually stimulating, someone with whom you can genuinely discuss a range of issues with and feel like you’re not with a half-cocked moron, you may discover—know right away in fact—that in the beauty arena she’s no more than a four or a five. She’s got a crooked face, she’s a bit fat or tending toward being fat, or she dresses and grooms like a Chinese peasant who has never worn shoes and has always been content to wear the same dress five days a week.

Then too you don’t want someone who wants to sit around all the time and dissect the latest liberal pap in the Nation, or loves to quote Shakespeare at breakfast, or insists on going to an opera or a small theater play every week or two, when what you really want to do is go on an over-nighter into Mexican waters when the yellowtail or yellow fin tuna are running. What I’m getting at here is that you most certainly want, as I always have wanted, someone who no one would ever dream of saying is an air head or is as dumb as paint; and yet you also don't want someone who wants to get into an exegesis of five of Thomas Mann's novels or the late Hemingway every time you want to drop her panties and get a good down and dirty fxxx on the living room floor while the steak is burning.

But, as I've already suggested, there's the complicating issue of what you have to look at every day—and men are visual to a fault. So, you want someone who's no worse than a seven or eight, and mostly certainly not a three or four, or maybe even a five. The tradeoffs, and given all the qualifications I've already made, are not easy to make, and then too it's never easy to predict the direction of certain changes and how these will affect one's mind and thereby the relationship, even assuming you'll been lucky enough to line up everything to your satisfaction in the beginning.

There's the issue of jealousy, and it seems to be something you've got to deal with in just about all women, and maybe just about all men too. I can't handle a jealous woman, period. As you know, I don't often carry a cell phone, and the simple reason is that I don't want calls from anyone about where I am or what I'm doing. As you also know, for years—many years now—I've traveled, and alone, and for extended periods of time, months at a time. What I'm doing on the road is no one's business, and it matters not whether or not she's living with me.

For me, and I'm not exactly within the first two standard deviations on this issue, it couldn't be any other way. Well, it could be in the minds of some women I might have gotten involved with, but not for long, because I would have been long gone once there was any attempt to tell me when I could and could not travel, and when I could and could not take a shit, and when I had to answer questions about where I had been for four hours or four days. A lot of men seem to have no problem at all living in prisons in which their wives are the jailers with the only set of keys.

A point I've been making in this note is that wise men (those with experience with women) think long and hard about what they see in the first couple of weeks or months in a relationship, because what you see in these short time frames is what you're going to get and be dealing with two and twenty and two hundred months on. And to add refinement to the rule, already noted above, if women change, and they do (like everyone) change, they change for the worse. If they don't like cooking that much when you meet them, they will like it less in five or ten years.

If in the beginning the woman only wants to go fishing with you every third time you go out, in five years she'll only want to go out with you every tenth time, or not at all. If you only got a blowjob every other time you were with her prior to marriage, the chances are damn good that by year three or four you'll be lucky to get a blowjob at all, or only after you buy her a new gold bracelet or upgrade the new car you bought her two years ago.

The best single indicator for knowing what a woman is going to be like is her mother. Study her mother like you are studying for the most important exam of your life, because the chances are damn good that all the good and all the bad and all the small things you don't like or will come to not like in your girlfriend or wife are baldly evident in her mother. Daughters tend to imitate their mothers like they had spent the whole of their youth locked in a Pavlovian experimental chamber.

Kids. Two is more than enough, and not because it's what might be called ecologically responsible to keep the number at two. Even with two you will have all kinds of freedoms abridged. Your hobbies, your time with friends, whatever. With two it's a guarantee you'll not spend anything like the kind of time with your wife that you spent with her before the first one, to say nothing of what happens when the second one comes.

She not only will have less time for you, but the odds are quite good—very good—that however important you were in her life before the kid or kids came, you are now no better than number two or her list of important people. Or quite likely number three if there are two kids. It's the "mother shit." It's the "genetic relatedness shit." It's the…I don't what the fxxx it is, but it's very real, and every man I've talked to who has kids will say exactly what I've written in this short paragraph.

As for having more than two kids, forget it. You're going to lose a minimum of twenty-five years of the best years of your life. Your bank account will be drained, your emotional bank account will go into Chapter 11 bankruptcy before you can figure out what's happened, and your sex life will go into a prolonged drought. Then too your wife in all likelihood will begin to look like she's been beaten and battered and fattened for the Rotary Club pig barbecue, and you'll wake up in the morning and say: Where the fxxx am I, and how can I get out of here?

If the woman who seems utterly irresistible smokes, and you don't, definitely get rid of her the first time you learn that she can't do without one or more cigarettes after each meal and each time you give her a singing orgasm. You'll smell smoke everywhere in your house, and the smell of her breath will make you wonder if it wouldn't be more desirable kissing a dog.

If the woman that seems irresistible drinks to excess, or can't hold what little she does drink without going nuts, don't even consider her for a relationship. This is a guaranteed recipe for disaster, and quite irrespective of how many cans of beer you throw down the hatch on a long Saturday or Sunday watching five hours of sporting events. Alcohol is an addiction few men or women can beat, and it's an addiction that some people can handle and many clearly cannot. Addictions only get worse over time.

If you get a woman who loves to nag, about anything, big or small, get rid of her. Tell her that there are plenty of men who love to be beaten up verbally and are masochists at heart. Get rid of her as soon as you see that she insists on telling you how to drive, or what to wear, or what to look at on TV, or how to economize in putting toothpaste on the toothbrush. These kinds of women—and the world is full of them—are just a nagging pain in the ass.

If you meet a woman who says she doesn't want to work, that she only wants to raise kids and pursue her artistic career—write novels and do better than Picasso with pen and oils, tell her you'll only stay with her if she gives you a notarized statement to the effect that upon the death of either her rich mother or father you'll receive, in your name and your name only, a certified check in the amount of at least five million dollars. If she blinks at this, tell her to get lost and not come through the door again.

Women want equality—great; I'm all for it. But I want a woman I live with to bring in a decent share of the household income, ideally half, so that in divorce court—a fifty percent probability for everyone in the West—she's not going to be taking away more than what's more or less rightfully hers. There'll no doubt be plenty of tenderized and warm bullshit about having to stay home to take care of the kids, but like I suggested or implied, if there are only two they can be farmed out during the day and you can share in bringing them up the rest of the time; and the wife can fulfill her soft feminist dream of getting equality in the marketplace of money and getting all the kudos that her ego demands for whatever she does to help pay the bills.

Enough. I haven't been positive, but then it's hard to be positive about relationships with women when the track record everywhere in the West is so dismal. For many men, and I'm one of them, the ideal marriage is one that lasts no more than one year, and is a renewable contract, if both parties agree. If this sounds terribly cynical, I doubt that it will by the time you're into the middle years of your life—unless you have been very careful in how you have picked a mate, and are lucky to boot.

In closing, it's fair to wonder what's left out there in the female population, given all the negative signposts and roadblocks I've identified. I guess the only answer I have is this: if you get through a check list of the sort I've put together here and the woman doesn't come up negative on anything (and no doubt a few I've missed or forgotten) then you've probably got what every man is after: a real winner. Grab her and don't let go. There aren't many genuinely good ones out there that any sane man would want to spend a lifetime with.

Dad

Read Next: 7 Things I Would Tell My Teenage Self

Why You Need More Female Friends

February 9, 2013 | by P Dog | Link | Original Link

There is a trope within the game community that female friends are a worthless pain in the ass to put up with. A lot of guys in game will remember painful “Let’s Just Be Friends” rejections of their early days, leaving them unwilling to touch platonic female friendships with a stick. They see no value in women they aren’t sleeping with or making money from, robbing them off the opportunities that having a wide variety of female friends brings you.

However, any guy with just average social skills will build a variety of platonic female friends from work, college, school or from across the hall, and this pool of female friends only expands as they start learning game and going out heavily, especially in a closed environment like a school or college campus, which is also the time where having female friends is of most use to men.

If you’re a “cool,” fun, social, and non-judgemental guy you can benefit massively from female friendships. Instead of completely shunning girls they aren’t sleeping with at the moment or in the near future, men need to put these social connections to proper use and know how to do it. The benefits may seem insignificant at first, but in the long term the perks and advantages of having attractive close female friends accumulates to the point of being invaluable.

Sidenote: If you happened to be “friendzoned” by a girl you’re emotionally invested in, cut off contact with her and go approach more girls. This post focuses on why you should harness the platonic female friendships you will acquire over time just from being a social person who regularly meets a lot of different girls via game or through social circles. Return of Kings does not advise you to purposely become friends with a girl instead of sleeping with her, but rather consciously make the best of female friendships you will naturally acquire because you’re just not going to be able to bang every single girl you get to know.

The Advantages of Platonic Female Friendships

Men in the game community have spouted a couple different metrics to judge whether a female friend is worthwhile having or not, typically along the lines of “Is she getting me more sex?” and “Is she getting me more money?” The correct mindset is actually “Is this girl increasing my pool of social opportunities?” Does she introduce you to new people? Does she invite you to nights out, parties and other events? If you think hard about it, I can almost guarantee you that no matter who you are, you have gotten laid from, made money from or advanced your career from an introduction or social connection made by a male friend. Now stop and think about the fact that young, good looking girls naturally have a much larger network of social connections.

Attractive young women have far more connections than their male counterparts and almost certainly have a lot more fun. Female friends have gotten me invites to parties, gigs, art exhibitions and tickets to sports games. They’ve referred me for a job interview, given me free alcohol and weed, gotten me sold out concert tickets, helped me get an ID when I was underage, and above all else: introduced me to other hot girls.

It is also much easier to become a +1 to parties if a girl is asking to bring you rather than guy, because people just don’t say “no” to girls as often as they do to guys, which allows you to use hot girls as an intermediary to getting something you want off a guy. Getting a female friend to ask a favour from somebody else on your behalf has a much much higher return on investment than if you were to ask yourself . The chumps who get played by this probably think that by helping you out for her they increase their odds of sleeping with her by winning their approval.

Gaining Insights Into the Female Psyche

I don't think it even needs to be said that you should NEVER ask female friends for dating advice, but having hot female friends also improves your game, because once they know that you're cool they'll share with you a never ending stream of "Compliment & Cuddle" through the sheer volume of corny, chode as hell Facebook and text messages they get from guys, and believe me they get a lot of them. The reason young women are glued to their iPhone's 24/7 is because of the massive stream of desperate betas feeding them attention.

All of the cringeworthy messages and stories female friends will tell you will improve your game as you listen to the girl trash talking betas, especially when she reads his messages aloud to all her friends. After seeing it happen so much, I'm literally incapable of being "cute" or using a smiley face or exclamation mark in any of my messages to people because they've been so heavily associated in my mind with pathetic behaviour.

Having a variety of female friends around who trust you enough to be honest with you provides invaluable insight into gender relations. Thanks to this I've come to realize that hot girls see beta males in exactly the same way that men see fat chicks, something repulsive to be put up with only out of politeness or necessity, the only difference is that girls will keep their version of fatties around to provide a constant stream of ego validating attention.

Having close female friendships has actually allowed me to sympathise with their sexual plights much more than I expected to. Using one example, I've come to understand that meeting so many guys wh0 they thought were alpha and were attracted to at first and then started behaving like betas soon after is the equivalent of a guy meeting a hot girl and then being told after a little while that she's a post-op transexual, which is a source of incredible sexual frustrating for women.

This is but one of many small insights I've gleaned from my friendships with girls that have given me a better understanding of how women think, which allows me to fine-tune my game.

Set the Right Frame Early On

There is a knee jerk reaction a lot of guys have to the suggestion of trying to expand their circle of female friends. In their minds platonic friendships = LJBF rejections = the quiet desperation of a beta orbiter. Don't do what the orbiters do. Have some backbone. Don't be afraid to say no. Tease them. Don't feed them attention, in fact keep communication sparse in between when you see them in person. The other key step to make it clear that you're just another chump orbiter is to mention in passing the latest news about who you've gotten with or being seeing lately, but don't frame it as if you're trying to impress them or ask their for advice about it. The vast majority of their male friends never do this, so it sets you apart.

Reaping The Rewards

Once they think you're cool with it, they will start to tell you about all the slutty things they've done lately. Be supportive and encouraging about it, don't be a buzz kill and don't judge them, at least not openly. I would go as far to suggesting being an enabler for their promiscuity. Once they know you won't judge them and are completely cool with it, they'll be surprisingly open about their sexual exploits, sometimes to the point of bragging about it or even telling you things they haven't told their close female friends.

They will never share any of this with their beta orbiters because they know they would get jealous and butthurt if they found out about it. It is a very good sign when a girl is telling you about the cock in her life and is asking you who you've gotten with or been seeing lately.

Once you've reached that point, this is when you can expect to reap rewards in terms of using girls to get beta males to do their bidding for your benefit, being introduced to and talked up to other hot girls, being told in advance which of the girls she's about to introduce to you are sluts or all of a sudden finding yourself showered in attention from her and invited out to hang out one on one. In terms of introductions and getting invites to parties, this is where having close female friends at other schools or colleges is extremely useful for young guys because it provides multiple parallel social structures and party scenes, not to mention fresh girls for you to game.

As your game improves with time, you will find yourself building a larger pool of female friends, doubly so if you are in school or college, so take care to avoid orbiter behaviour so you can enjoy the benefits that having a lot of female friends will bring you. Although the perks may seem trivial over a short period of time, over the long term the benefits of having chick friends really do start to add up.

Read More: Being Popular In School Is Overrated

44 Responses to Why You Need More Female Friends

1. Keoni Galt
   February 10, 2013 at 3:28 pm
   This piece is MONEY.

   Want to throw a huge party with plenty of hot girls in attendance? Have a few girl friends, invite them and tell them to invite whoever they want. They'll do all the work of spreading the word and getting people excited about it for you.

   That's what my room mates and I did all through college. We'd just tell a few girls "We got a keg, we got a live band, invite who you like."

   Guaranteed rager.

   Reply
2. Days of Broken Arrows
   February 10, 2013 at 3:34 pm
   Great post! I've been saying this for years. Keep nice looking women around to bring to parties and work events. It's the "Can't Buy Me Love" effect, if anyone has seen that old teen movie.

   Regarding this:
   "I would go as far to suggesting being an enabler for their promiscuity. Once they know you won't judge them and are completely cool with it, they'll be surprisingly open about their sexual exploits, sometimes to the point of bragging about it or even telling you things they haven't told their close female friends."

I mentioned this once over at Roissy. I've been able to spin these types of sexual female frienships into sex — but not the vanilla kind, the weird kind. When these women tell you story after story about their sex life, something will often come up that they're afraid to do or that they're having a problem with. That's when you offer to gently fit them with the anal plug that will let them ease into their anal sex fantasies. Or you "try out" the S&M gear on her, so she won't wet herself the first time a guy really uses it on her. I can go deeper into this, but I'm afraid I'll get banned for speaking about how to teach a woman to do sex acts banned in American porn…

Reply

3. thecaptainpower
February 10, 2013 at 3:38 pm
I always found the most girls at rock shows. I went to see the cranberries last year in NYC, and it was me with 45 other chicks and hardly any dudes…

Nice post…

Reply

- Wilson
February 10, 2013 at 4:07 pm
Those were probably lesbians, though…

Reply

- Mark Minter
February 10, 2013 at 9:17 pm
I got a joke.

An old cowboy sat down at the bar and ordered a Drink.As he sat sipping his drink, a young woman sat down next to him.

She turned to the cowboy and asked, "Are you a real cowboy?"

He replied, "Well, I've spent my whole life, breaking colts, working cows, going to rodeos, fixing fences, pulling calves,bailing hay, doctoring calves, cleaning my barn, fixing flats, working on tractors, and feeding my dogs, so I guess I am a cowboy."

She said, "I'm a lesbian. As soon as I get up in the morning, I think about women. When I shower,I think about women. When I watch TV, I think about women. I even think about women when I eat. It seems that everything makes me think of women.”

The two sat sipping in silence. A little while later, a man sat down on the other side of the old cowboy and asked, “Are you a real cowboy?”

He replied, “I always thought I was but I just found out I’m a lesbian.”

4. flyingfuck
February 10, 2013 at 3:50 pm
Even though the ‘rape’ meme is meant in good fun, isn’t it a little distasteful?
Reply
    - Turbo the drycleaner
    February 10, 2013 at 8:04 pm
    I have always followed the wise words of mike tyson; never speak to a woman if sex isnt directly in the picture. You say that women generally have a larger social network than men but this is not always true; a woman may be able to top a low value man but a high value man will trump a woman. Plus, then you can actually be friends with them, instead of wasting precious moments of life that you will never get back listening to the meaningless details of a womans sex life. If beta males are the pawns on the chessboard of social circles, hot girls are the queens but alpha males are the kings. Make friends with alpha males instead of women.
    Reply
        - Wanderlust
        February 10, 2013 at 8:45 pm
        They aren’t mutually exclusive.
        - Zal
        February 11, 2013 at 9:00 am
        Exactly. Wish I said the above.

- Zal
  February 11, 2013 at 9:01 am
  Edit: I meant to say I wish i said what Turbo the drycleaner stated.

5. Inception
   February 10, 2013 at 3:56 pm
   Some years ago, I lived in an apartment complex and knew the girl who lived upstairs from me. We hooked up sometimes, but always casual. But while I was indifferent about her in general, she was an amazing source for meeting new chicks. My success rate with chicks I met through this girl versus the average was remarkably higher, almost comically so. Sometimes the Upstairs Girl would flash jealousy and try to cock-block, but once the wheels were in motion and her chick friend was interested, it was game on — and in a way that wouldn't work had it been a guy friend who knew the chicks since invariably he would be competition.

   The key with female "friends" is that you not have an active interest in fucking them. Yes, you might have to listen to them whine or complain or bitch about some stupid stuff, but if she's bringing around a new flavor of the week to sample it's worth the aggravation.

   Reply

6. John
   February 10, 2013 at 4:19 pm
   This is sound advice, but there's a big warning I have for high-value guys.

   If you're a high value guy or alpha who generally attracts a lot of female attention, your girl-friends WILL become jealous of those other girls and this can work against you. For example, your girl-friend has another friend who's hotter than her, and that friend feels attracted to you when all of you hang out; your friend will get jealous and may try to sabotage your chances with her friend, because your friend wants you all to herself.

   Also, if you're a high-value guy, try to not be close friends with ugly fatty types; I used to think they would be a "safe" avenue to increase my social circle because I thought they would never think they have a chance with me, but by God I was wrong. I've learned firsthand how vindictive and jealous they can be.

   Generally speaking, this was a good post about having more female friends. From my experience I'd suggest that you leverage your female friendships as an invite events/parties so you can meet other random/new girls, rather than trying to meet her direct friends.

Reply

- DAP
  February 10, 2013 at 4:43 pm
  Fat chicks are only for blow jobs, home cooked meals, and rides home when you are too drunk to drive.

  Reply

  - Zal
    February 11, 2013 at 9:06 am
    Quote: “Fat chicks are only for blow jobs, home cooked meals, and rides home when you are too drunk to drive.”

    Not even. Like was stated even they too get jealous, when in fact any fat chick should know here true value on the social sexual marketplace is null — but given todays attitudes one sees these 400 lb gastropods think they deserve the same status as a swimsuit model.

7. Adam Dal Bello
   February 10, 2013 at 4:25 pm
   I’m sorry, but how the fuck can you even debase yourself like that by having a friend who is a girl? Have you no respect for the sanctity of your masculinity? I don’t believe this post for a second. Where’s Roosh? Fuck bitches, acquire currency.

   Reply

   - monster221
     February 11, 2013 at 4:06 am
     you sir are obviously an ameteur.

     Reply

     - My Name is Adam
       February 11, 2013 at 9:26 am

You’re clearly gay if you have a girl as a friend.

8. DAP
February 10, 2013 at 4:39 pm
There are certain venues you can’t even get into unless you have a female entourage with you.
Bottom Line: Top Shelf Pussy opens doors and attracts more Top Shelf Pussy.

Reply

9. YouSoWould
February 10, 2013 at 5:08 pm
This is all well and good, but I’d rather lobotomise myself than tolerate the inane, irrational drivel that 95% of women seem to believe constitutes intelligent conversation. The occasional girl who I do find who is genuinely funny, capable of actually challenging me on a mental level, or even at the very least able to provide sufficiently witty banter to keep me from falling asleep, is by definition an outlier and unlikely to have hot, single friends I can hit on.

I’m a man, and I prefer the company of men for camaraderie and companionship.

Reply

- Adam Dal Bello
February 10, 2013 at 5:11 pm
Hear, hear!

Reply

- Zal
February 10, 2013 at 5:49 pm
Thirded. here here, here.

The only exception is when I have a chick who definitely wants me romantically, but I do not want here. She becomes my beta orbiter in same the sense that a hot chick has a bunch of beta men with no dignity or self esteem to walk away from the situation. But then again my interaction with them is only when I need something. Its sweet when the tables get turned.

Reply

- Red Pill
  February 11, 2013 at 3:24 am
  Isn’t it bad enough to have to listen to the shit from chicks you are having sex with? No, the price for pre-screening is too high. It’s just too much hen clucking…

  By the way, are the articles the last few days taking a bit of a dip in quality?

  Reply

10. Quintus Curtius
    February 10, 2013 at 5:48 pm
    Very good article, but not one for beginners. Only the saltiest sea-dogs, with the benefits of time’s perspective, can see the value in female friends. Too many guys, myself among them at one point, saw the friend zone as a total wasteland. And it can be, certainly. Added to this is the fact that friend-zone shaming has been going on in the game community for a long time, resulting in a lot of prejudice against it. But if you have the discipline to apply a few ground rules, it can work for you in a limited way. First, as P-Dog says, you need to view her as a potential way to increase your level social interactions. Second (and this is the hardest) you must mentally write her off as a possible notch. Once you accept the fact that you’re not going to bang, the you can use it for what it is. The problem is that unseasoned warriors cannot disconnect their egos from the equation…they get pissed off at the girl and lose out on a possible source of interactions or “referrals”.
    But be careful, though. Remember that chick friends are an opportunity for them to add value to YOU. If they’re not doing that, scale back the interaction. If she is not increasing your level of social interactions, then you may have to cut your losses.

    Reply

    - monster221
      February 11, 2013 at 4:09 am also you have to be the one who writes off the bang. accepting that you arent going to bang AFTER trying and failing turns you into an orbiter.

      YOU have to be the one FIRST who refuses to fuck. otherwise its a no go.

      Reply

- J.M.
  February 11, 2013 at 11:44 pm
  You are right. Actually I am in a similar situation. I know this girl, she is slutty (I know it not from her), great ass, fine tits, delicious lips, slender body built, however she is more useful because her array of contacts (not just for friendship but for business) is incredible and many chumps in my business line would almost do anything for her in the hopes of getting into her pants.

  For me is more convenient to kill the idea of a bang and don´t even try to and behave as I've been doing so far: treating her somewhat rude and somewhat nice (nice as in helping her with mutual projects and not being a complete asshole) but not listening anything from her that is personal, withdrawing attention and stopping her when she tries to complain to me about something else (being sarcastic etc).

  It helps I am busy with other girls and other projects though

11. 2mques
    February 10, 2013 at 5:48 pm
    Yeh this could go either way.

    The deeper you get in the game, the harder it is to deal with women who waste your time with trivialities.

    Reply

12. Peter
    February 10, 2013 at 8:14 pm
    i can only do this if the chick has a bf or i don't want her sexually. what about you?

    if i know she is single and hot i will try and bang her – glory or nothing – that is why i don't have many female friends.

    Reply

13. Neil skywalker
    February 10, 2013 at 8:16 pm
    I will make a girl my friend if I don't succeed to pick her up but do see opportunities to use her for pre-selection.

It's always good to be seen with a good looking girl at your side. This builds value with girls as well as with guys.
This works extra well if you live in a smaller city where you might run into the same people on a night out.

Reply

14. Fatty McManjaw
February 10, 2013 at 9:41 pm
Choose your female friends wisely, as you do your male friends.

Well-filtered female platonic friends are like gold. My best friend is female, and she's the one that turned me on to the Manosphere. She gives me a different perspective socially, professionally, and with dating. Not your typical vapid female, she has a 140 IQ and can discuss the relative merits of Chevy vs Ford vs Chrysler small blocks or the underlying themes of Les Miserable – sometimes simultaneously. We have a great time whenever we're together, but neither of us are sexually attracted to the other… hence, no tension there.

As Emil Faber said, "Knowledge is Good". I've learned a hell of a lot from her that's improved my life immeasurably. Don't discard someone just because they happen to be female… but filter wisely or suffer the drama consequences.

Reply

15. monster221
February 11, 2013 at 4:21 am
this post is gold. boys dont forget your vitamins or to read this fucking post.

a few things i might add. she must be fucking FINE. this takes some discipline and a little not give a fuck that only comes with experience. most guys go for the fine ones, and to put one in the no pile and keep her around is difficult especially for the younger dudes.

second, you must decide you wont go for the bang from the get go. either that or you already banged her and she keeps coming around you and not the other way around. if its not either of those, congrats friend, you're an orbiter.

and one thing i think everybody missed. you must take EVERY opportunity she gives you. if you need free booze and she says "im going to so and sos house to drink a little" you must go. if she introduces you to her friend you MUST see the friend on a one on one at least and preferrably bang. if she keeps bringing you opportunities and you dont make anything of them eventually she will start to think you are in love with her and are really really good at pretending. the more she does for you the more she will value your friendship. and of course the more you will too.

Reply

16. dannyfrom504
February 11, 2013 at 7:12 am
word the fuck up. i used to be the defacto BF of 2 models back in NO. they just wanted to go into the city and dance, i ran interference when dudes tried to step to them. what i got in return was- GIRLS COMING ON TO ME.

seriously, bith my friends were hard 9´s. enven NOW, by best friend is a hard 8 asian. she wings for me like a champ. i don't have many female friends but i DO KEEP a couple in my back pocket. the services i offer in return is interpretations of male behavior for them. win-win.

hell i even posted the same damn dos equis pic on my site regarding this. lol.

i'll have to dig through my site to find the post and my laptops battery is low. but i WILL link said post.

good advice as per usual ROK

Reply

17. Dannyfrom504
February 11, 2013 at 9:31 am
Found it, but it's not the 2 models as friends post.

http://dannyfrom504.wordpress.com/2013/01/24/on-being-the-boss-and-hypergamy/

Reply

18. Dillon
February 11, 2013 at 10:43 am
The world is AQUAINTENCE. You NEVER make female "friends".

Also why would I want to hear about a girls sexual frustrations? Are we going to watch the lifetime channel and have a good cry afterwords?

Reply

19. thank you
February 11, 2013 at 10:58 am
Your posts always make me want to call to my dad, to remind me of what kind of man a want to be with. My dad and I have a lot closer bond now, when I have realised what some men are really like.

He still looks to my mother with adoring look in his eyes , after 30 years of marriage. He has never been aggressive towards her and never has felt the need to try to strip her her worth as a female. I do appreciate him tons because the basic goodness that is in him.

He is one of the rare males that I truly respect. (comments like yours have costed some men their share, and some I've even refused to talk to due the over eagerness and lack of basic manners)

Another thing that talking about (and laughing at) you misogynists has done is brought myself and my girlfriends a lot closer together. I've also gained dozens of new pretty girlfriends, when I've realised that they're not actually bitches but normal and friendly girls who only seek happiness like the rest of us. They're not a threat to me any longer (if they ever have been).
I don't think it would never have happened without you and your generous descriptions of different tricks and mind controlling games you are trying to use.
So, thank you. :)
Is there any way I can contribute your educational blog ?

Reply

- 2nd
  February 11, 2013 at 11:19 am
  My thoughts exactly! How can I ever repay you ?
  (I'm sure you get this a lot but.. I'm not gonna have sex with you. Think of something else.)

  Reply

20. Anonymous
    February 11, 2013 at 11:00 am
    In addition, having female friends increases your alpha score, women see you talking to hot girls you don't seem to be interested in, you look as if you have options and are good with game.

    Reply

    - +
      February 11, 2013 at 11:25 am

Also, it helps your female friends to make jealous the guy they're ACTUALLY interested in.

Reply

21. Trev427
February 11, 2013 at 11:35 am
Some of you guys are seriously overcompensating.

The author is not saying that you should fucking become some beta bitch and listen to her cry over a pint of Ben & Jerry's, but good-looking female friends are incredible assets after you filter out the riff-raff and FIND A GOOD ONE.

Women TRUST other women. Having a female friend wing for you is exponentially more effective than having a buddy do so because when a woman approaches another woman singing your praise, they're more receptive, less threatened, and more likely to want more. If you can't wrap your head around that, then I'm not sure what to say to you.

Being having beautiful women go to bat for you increases your value in the eyes of other women. FACT. Being surrounded by beautiful women at a bar or club increases your value in the eyes of other women, especially if they see a friendly dynamic, because it makes them ask, "What's this guy got going on that all these other girls are some comfortable around him?" It makes you less threatening, which in turn makes them vulnerable, and leaves you an easy kill.

Seriously, why on earth would you intentionally throw away an outstanding strategy because you can't be bothered to put in some time and develop your social assets? That's just laziness masquerading as alpha-male bullshit. Being an alpha is like being strong or powerful; if you have to tell us you are, then you aren't.

Reply

22. [image] dannyfrom504
February 11, 2013 at 12:22 pm
i can't find the post. but……

i was the pseudo BF for 2 models in new orleans when i was stationed here (1999-2002). i learned a TON from them. they wanted to go out and dance, but didn't want to get hit on-that's where i came in. i sat back nursing a beer and when a guy tried to move in on them (they're sisters) one would look my way and i'd walk over and the 2 of them would grind all over me. trini (the hottest/oldest one) would flip her hair and whisper to me BUT it looked like she was kissing me.

eventually i'd leave and go sit at the bar and that's 'where the fun would start. girls would APPROACH ME. lol. every time i went out with deb and trini i ALWAYS number and/or kiss closed.

and these 2 would wing like champs, especially trini. if i were talking to a girl, she'd pony up- throw her arms around me and proclaim how i was ignoring her. then tell girl i was chatting up, "stay away, he's a heartbreaker. now come dance with me Danny." lol. fucking pro.

a hot woman is the best wing ever. my girl so-so is a good friend, she's asian and has mad girl game. she wings like a champ.

stay-up.

Reply

23. [image] Adam Dal Bello
    February 11, 2013 at 1:24 pm
    Gay Gay Gay Gay. This post makes me nautious.

    Reply
    - [image] chase b
      February 11, 2013 at 2:53 pm
      Nautious? Is that when you get sick on a boat?

      Reply
24. [image] dannyfrom504
    February 11, 2013 at 6:35 pm
    if some of the posters here are actually "male", they need to schedule a pap. srslee.

    Reply
25. [image] Pete
    February 11, 2013 at 7:10 pm
    EXCELLENT reading! Must read for guys.

    Reply
26. [image] Shawn
    February 11, 2013 at 8:32 pm
    Women are for fucking not friendship. Female relatives are your women friends.

    Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

The Hunt For Brazilian Love

February 10, 2013 | by Kris | Link | Original Link

Growing up in Denmark I was raised with total equality between woman and man. It was only much later when I accidentally bumped into a Brazilian woman at a party that I realized I was born on the wrong continent.

We do have some great girls here, but the majority are way too cold and outright masculine in their attitudes. They make excellent friends though, but not marriage material! No! Women here fought so much for their rights during the last four decades, resulting in a breed of weak men who gave up their masculine side to better fit in to the "new and improved" relationship. And it works out great for many here, no doubt, but for those of us who aspire for that beautiful, feminine, charming, lovely, woman, who can make you wanna throw yourself of a cliff, we are faced with packing our bags and do something about it. That is not to say Brazilian women are weak. Many are well educated, determined, and strong, but did not lose their feminine side along with shaving the side of their heads in the process.

I have since then had three Brazilian girlfriends, lived in Brazil on two occasions, (each 5 months at the time), and gone through a lot of dates and learning experiences. If you are serious about finding a meaningful relationship with a Brazilian woman, there are a few things you need to come to terms with…

1. Most Brazilian women are like flowers. If you try bringing them home to your country expecting to live happily ever after, you are greatly mistaken. Because once the flower is away from it's native soil, it will wither away after a while. Brazilians are warm people and need to be close to their families, friends, and warm weather.

2. Maybe you should be the one to move permanently to Brazil. When it comes down to it, many Brazilian women are simply not capable of moving away from their country.

3. It helps immensely to have some kind of career along with a stable financial situation. Brazilian women are not into lazy men. They themselves are hardworking, often studying while keeping a full-time job. You are in luck if you have a tradecraft in oil, finance, and engineering, which are highly useful in Brazil.

Loading…

4. Learn the language and the culture! Just reading will definitely not be sufficient. Go on vacation for starters and experience things for yourself. Eventually you will understand why the girls say "I'll call you tomorrow" and then three days later send you a text saying: "You disappeared?" Brazilians are romantic mixed with a little flakiness, and a cute tendency to give white lies. Somehow it makes the society go round.

5. You will likely not find your dream girl on your first vacation. The simple reason is that most serious women are not into gringos who are on vacation. Sure you can find a short romance, but as long as you don't live there and have a job, you are not an eligible candidate for a serious relationship, unless you by some miracle bump into that one girl who just scored a scholarship in your country. (I once met a woman at the bar called Ovelha Negra in Botafogo. Conversation was going along fine until I mentioned that I would move back home soon… conversation over.)

If you insist on finding a Brazilian woman to bring to your own country, try to find someone who speaks English and has lived abroad before. She will naturally be interested in other cultures and know what it's like to be away from her family and friends. The latter are the hardest ones to come by, but not impossible. As for myself, I tried in the past to bring a girl to Denmark, which brought me to the conclusions above. It has been everything but easy in retrospect, so I strongly recommend you NOT do it yourself.

I am sure this leaves a lot of questions unanswered as to where exactly to find these charming, future wives and what approach to use once you have arrived in Brazil. But each person is unique—some will do well at bars while others in a work environment. There is no universal game strategy for a meaningful relationship, because once you drop the facade you will reveal the true nature of yourself. The five points mentioned above can only get you so far, the rest you'll have to figure out for yourself.

Happy love-hunting.

Read Next: 12 Ways Danish Women Are Different From Brazilian Women

The Web Site That Has Saved Me 100 Hours Of Sleep

February 10, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

One downside of urban living is the noise. I seem to have bad luck in this regard…

- In Rio I lived next to an elementary school. The yelling and screaming started at 9am.
- In Medellin I lived next to a road where noisy buses would constantly rumble through.
- In Riga I lived next to a nightclub. I could feel the bass in bed.
- In Tartu I lived next door to an apartment undergoing renovation.
- In Zagreb I lived below an apartment that was undergoing heavy re-construction. They used a jackhammer to break up the concrete starting at 8am.
- In Poland I lived next to a full-blown construction site with a crane.

In Rio I noticed that a good countermeasure to the noise was to turn on my fans to full blast. Even though the noise of the fan was loud, it would dilute the children noises and I could sleep. In Tartu I would leave on the kitchen fan above the stove to great effect. Then one day, in my curiosity about "white noise," I found a web site that would change my life: Simply Noise.

Loading…

Simply Noise is a white noise generator that blasts through your speakers, providing even more noise dilution than fans. If I wake up to the noise of construction, I just punch in Simply Noise on my browser and select the "brown noise" option. I jack up the volume and, even though it's technically loud, I can go back to sleep as construction takes place right next door. I estimate I've saved at least 100 hour of sleep because of this technique.

There's also a Simply Rain site (Rainy Mood is another option), something I use for naps because of its soothing qualities. I roll with maximum thunder because it makes my nap feel like I'm resting in a protective cocoon. I also use rain noises to troll my guests into thinking it's raining outside.

The only noise that Simply Noise can't beat is a nearby jackhammer. If you got jackhammering going in the floor above you, you're shit out of a luck and have to wait until they're done. But other than that, thank you Simply Noise for making my life a little bit better.

Read Next: How To Get Up In The Morning Without Hitting Snooze

Do Girls Flake Because Your Value Is Too Low?

February 11, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Here's an interesting insight I received via email about the cause of flaking…

> Girls flake because not enough value was built. As a result she at least thinks she's good enough for you (in the worst case she thinks she's the best you can get). So even if she cancels a few times, she's sure you'd be chasing her – so this is not a "cancellation" to her, just "postponement". Do you think an average Western chick would flake on Elvis? I'm pretty sure that even if she had some real family emergency, she'd still show up for him.
>
> The problem we're facing here is that it is damn hard to build sustained value for a Western chick due to the hordes of guys constantly throwing themselves on them. You may be the most articulated and expressive dude on the Earth, but she'll talk to a dozen more before she sees you again, and will forget everything you said.
>
> So far I figured out two key things here:
>
> 1. For a Western chick to be sure she'd call you back you need to build MORE attraction/value than you need to have a one night stand with her. So this only makes sense for the chicks you'd really want to meet as a person, not just as a wet hole. Sadly this excludes roughly 70% of the Western female population. This is why I'm not getting phone numbers in the US. Sure you combat it by playing the numbers game, but this is too much work for the below average results.
>
> 2. She must be sure that if she flakes, you won't ever call her again. I have stories about chicks who got mad on me since I invited her out with me > once, she canceled, and I never called her again after that. It also serves as an indicator – after the story is told, if she tries to justify the chick in any way, she'll flake too.

>
> In Always Have A Plan B you wrote, "This means you should always have a backup plan so that when a girl > cancels, you'll have an alternative that is as superior as going > out with her."
>
> This is why I don't really have dates anymore. I'm going out to karaoke, to hang out with a friend, to ride a cart or to a rock concert. And I just invite her to join me there. If she skips, no big deal, I go there anyway, probably with someone else. Your aim is to please _yourself_, not her. Do what YOU like to do, and find the chicks who'd enjoy doing the same. There are chicks who'd love to spend the evening coming to your place to play Xbox, you just won't meet them in a club.
>
> So the action should be – plan an activity you'd like to do, THEN call her. This way you're not tied up in any meaningful way by her.

Flaking is unfortunately an epidemic in America, and in a few years it will get so bad that you'll come to see Colombian girls—who are famous for their flaking—as reliable and dependable. The best solution right now is simply to hope she flakes.

Don't Miss: Watch A True G In Action

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

How To Become A Better Misogynist

February 11, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

As a group, the manosphere is continually labeled misogynistic. While I've yet to hear of one man ever losing a wink of sleep over it, I have seen many men embrace the title with an aloof smirk on their face – and that includes me.

"You're such a misogynist!"

"Well, I have been practicing [playful smirk] … [get laid]."

I honestly think 99% of the men in these parts are displaying bogus misogynist credentials in order to gain access to mountains of poosy since women of all ages and social/professional varieties seem to gravitate toward those types of men. While I don't blame them and often engage in this myself, I feel it is my duty as a manosphere writer to point out inconsistencies even when those inconsistencies are apparent in our own camp and I am a part of the problem.

Call yourself masculine, an asshole, a jerk, a player or an alpha male – but don't call yourself a misogynist unless you've earned it. If you want to be a true misogynist, you're going to have to do a lot better than an aloof attitude, player lifestyle, or cracking the occasional rape joke just to dim the countenance of a feminist shrew.

When it comes to really hating women and being a true misogynist, it's not enough to hookup with a bunch of girls who fight for their right to have hookups. The two kind of cancel each other out.

It's not enough to say something "piggish" because even the women who denounce it flash a quick smile if they find you attractive. That's why you said it in the first place.

It's not enough to pump-and-dump a bunch of women. They say they don't need a man anyway, so you're basically just helping them out with that. Plus, the real term should be "pump-and-dump-her-before-she-dumps-you-for-some-bad-boy-who-has-the-balls-to-pump-and-dump-her-because-she-likes-the-challenge" but that's a little too long to keep writing out.

It's not enough to crack rape jokes when you're the kind of man who would risk bodily harm to pull a perv rapist off of some woman you don't even know. If you really thought rape was ok or funny, you'd be a rapist or at least a rapist sympathizer.

It's not enough to call women bitches. We both know you'd exchange your own life for the safety of your wife, mother, sisters, daughters, nieces, and in some cases (if you're a misguided white knight) your girlfriend.

It's not enough to promote gender roles when study after study shows women are happier, marriages last longer, and the sex is better when couples liaise in a traditional manner. That actually makes you the opposite of a misogynist.

Now these masculine actions may cause Sandra Fluke's penis to chub in angry arousal or make some fat Jezebel writer crack open a second pint of Ben & Jerry's as her porky little sausage fingers feverishly pound the keyboard in a way no man would ever want to pound her, but it's not misogyny. If you really want to be a better misogynist, you may want to consider doubling down on the hate and doing something that destroys women (or at least permanently scars them.) Here's what I suggest:

1. Convince them there is no such thing as feminine strength.

Do your best to convince women that anything and everything that is feminine is weak. Teach them that being the primary influence in the next generation's life is oppression, and that outsourcing their biological and moral duties to a daycare center is a good idea. Teach them that their natural ability to be loving, caring, and nurturing while still having the fearlessness, tenacity and strength of a pissed off grizzly bear when someone attacks their family is a stereotype that should be avoided. Teach her that the natural masculine traits which garner her natural feminine attention only exist to take advantage of and oppress her.

When she does succumb to the allure of masculinity (and she will), teach her that the masculine man's propensity to love, value, protect, and defend her is creepy and controlling. If you can pull this off until you see a bunch of 45 year old women stuck in cubicles bitching about their weak husbands and talking about how much they miss seeing their children grow up, you sir can rightly call yourself a misogynist.

2. Trap them in slut culture.

Promote a hookup slut culture where alpha males can opt out whenever they choose and still attract the type of women they desire, but slutty women can't opt out and attract an alpha male who has options. This will create an environment where "settling" is something that only weak men and strong women do. This will also force the less-adventurous women to slut it up for alpha pleasure, because if they try to act like ladies and be selective, they will quickly lose the attention of the most desirable men who have a plethora of other easy sex options.

Loading…

When you force women to either put out quickly or risk a life of social solitude, you reinforce the idea that their primary contribution to society is booty, which will make them opt in to #1 above to prove their worth. Organize a slut walk or something. This is a brilliant self-sustaining cycle guaranteed to keep women unhappy, and only a true misogynist would dare go this far.

3. Convince them that Mother Nature and Father Time keep shoddy records.

Fertility declines far more rapidly than an organization's need for female workers to push paper or ship a few extra widgets. Convince women that biology will wait for them while they pick up that MBA and climb the corporate ladder. America is a place where a woman actually can have it all: she can be a beloved wife, a good mother and raise a wonderful family AND she can go to grad school and have a brilliant career. The trick is to get women to switch the two priorities so they go for the career first and the family later instead of the other way around which is a far more logical and biologically sound approach. This will ensure both choices are more difficult, less enjoyable, and have a negative impact on each other.

When women are overworked and overloaded physically and mentally, they cannot be the mother or employee they truly want to be. This mental tug of war will tear at their soul until they pack on additional body fat and need Prozac to manage the depression brought on by fatigue and guilt. A true misogynist would enjoy keeping women depressed, drugged up, and in a constant state of guilt.

4. Create a perma-victim female society.

Someone who truly hates women will incite fear by convincing them that everyone is out to get them. By ensuring a fear-fueled perma-victim female society and setting yourself up as their defender, you can enjoy a loyal following as you fight the perceived enemy. A confused and frightened population is easily manipulated, and the true misogynist knows how to inflict pain and then leverage it to win Presidential elections, push legislation, and shame the men and women who dare step out of line in order to maintain power. Once you get the majority of the female population to a place where they can't be strong and independent without your leadership and social support – an oxymoron of epic proportions – you can add "evil genius" to your misogynist title.

This is a cruel textbook example of sociopathy, but if you want to be a real misogynist, you've got to keep women in perma-victim status so you can manipulate them like little children.

5. Turn the Feminist Lite™ into a Radical Feminist.

Most women these days will occasionally spout off feminist talking points, but it's usually relatively harmless tripe regarding equal outcomes opportunity, guaranteed success access, or the removal of gender-based consequences barriers. These statements can be easily dismissed or ignored because the Feminist Lite™ will forget all about her so-called deeply held feminist beliefs when she gets a good stiff alpha pole inside of her or she becomes pregnant and magically turns into a conservative traditionalist. The true misogynist will find these Feminist Lite™ girls and turn them into Radical Feminists while they're young. Radical feminism isn't anti-male at all; it's actually anti-female.

Radical feminists don't want women to be more like men or men to be more like women – radical feminists want women to become just like they are: fat, ugly, unhappy, and mad at the world for taking notice. Radical feminists are the biggest misogynists on the planet, which is why Roosh's article "The 9 Ugliest Feminists In America" could have also been titled "The 9 Biggest Misogynists In America."

So basically, if you're really interested in learning how to become a woman-hating misogynist who is intimidated by feminine strength and jealous of feminine beauty, you need to stop reading Return of Kings and head over to Jezebel or Feministing. They're the experts.

Read Next: Being A Misogynist Can Help You Get Laid

The 5 Worst Wingmen In Modern History

February 11, 2013 | by TheCaptainPower | Link | Original Link

5. Chewbacca

"Chewy" cockblocked Han Solo back and forth across the entire galaxy. Besides being over 7 feet tall and hairy, Chewbacca couldn't speak one word of English, and he had a horrible temper.

At least he could back you up in a fight, and he most likely had a huge shlong.

And by the way, this isn't that first time that Harrison Ford had a horrible wingman:

"NO TIME FOR LOVE DR. JONES!"

4. Magic Johnson

Lets just say he won't be "taking one for the team" anytime soon.

"But Captain Power, Magic Johnson is rich and famous. Are you Positive that you don't want him as a wingman?"

"I'm HIV-Positive that I don't want him for a wingman."

3. Beavis

"He he he." With one of the most annoying laughs of all time, Beavis is the 3rd worst wingman in modern history. To be honest, I never thought that Butthead was a bad looking guy (no homo), and he definitely had some decent "game." Butthead should have gotten rid of this loser a long time ago. I couldn't get laid in high school either, so I used to stay up all night watching these guys on television. (Notice that they are in Washington D.C.)

Loading…

2. Hitler

My grandfather spent 3 years in Europe looking for this asshole. Can you imagine going into a bar with his guy? Besides being probably the worst human being in modern history, he is also one ugly bastard. I wouldn't let him stand within 20 feet of me with that horrible moustache and comb over.

Was he gay? Who knows. But he must have been somebody's wingman in his early 20's at the German Beer halls.

1. Paul from "The Wonder Years"

This guy was the worst wingman ever! I watched his best friend Kevin Arnold chase Winnie Copper around for five straight seasons! His best friend had the worst case of “one-itis” in television history, and Paul didn’t do anything to stop it. In almost every episode Paul was in the background bitching and complaining to Kevin, and being a total cockblocker. He was always wearing horrible clothes and his ugly glasses, and he was constantly blowing his nose because of his allergies.

Congratulations Paul! You are the worst wingman in modern history!

Read More: The World Is A Cock Blocker

How Superbowl Marketing Discredited Feminism

February 11, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

For anyone who tuned into the Superbowl, the above commercial from GoDaddy will be familiar. You're probably also recalling the fact that the commercial likely struck a nerve with your thoughts. For anyone who didn't witness it. Thanks to this ad however, I realized that everything feminism claims in regards to supporting betas and empowering women has now been abolished. Yes, sexual marketing, a primary target used for men, has now been turned around in a way to support manly ideas. God bless America!

I'll address the feminist side rather quickly. The average feminist is going to say the following two statements. First, that the use of sexuality is an evil ploy and that this ad finally has it backfire against men. Second, feminists will likely state that this empowers the idea of being a different kind of male and garnering success. Both are false statements.

The truth is as simple as the advertisement is. It not only garnered enough attention for GoDaddy to have another unforgettable commercial, but it also pointed out what the manosphere has been saying for years, that women do not want betas. While watching The Daily Show, I witnessed John Stewart poking fun at the commercial and the negative backlash towards it from the public by initially stating,

> "Oh really, that ad was controversial, oh because she was kissing a Jew, is that why"

He then quickly followed up his statement with a pretend correction where he stated the obvious.

> "The source was apparently America's belief that affection should only take place between… looks equals"

This statement is 100% truth, and helps to prove everything the manosphere has been saying for years, that women are just as shallow as men. This commercial also helped prove the 10 scale system which indicates you cannot go more than 2 points up or down in attractiveness for a partner. So after years of arguing that the 10 scale is in fact real and necessary, there is now certifiable evidence thanks to the otherwise useless invention that is Twitter.

Loading…

Additionally, Calvin Klein ran a female targeted sexual ad, which really accomplished nothing other than showing a hardly clothed muscular man posing. What's great about the advertisement is that it further discredits the idea of feminism saying they don't want alphas. The positive rants I saw on Facebook and Twitter following the airing of the commercial further supported the idea that women are just as shallow as men. A quick search of on Twitter using #CalvinKlein, revealed the following:

> Dang…the boy in the #CalvinKlein drawers ad has the body of an Adonis.Sorry…I lost myself for a moment. #superbowl2013
>
> — Star Jones (@StarJonesEsq) February 4, 2013

> Nice try #doritos but I'm pretty sure #calvinklein just did a better job at appealing to American moms. Their ad was the total, uh, package.
>
> — Carolyn Castiglia (@missckc) February 4, 2013

> WAKE UP LADIES THIS COMMERCIAL IS FOR US #CalvinKlein #Concept
>
> — Sara Schaefer (@saraschaefer1) February 4, 2013

So there you have it, thanks to two simple Superbowl ads, the entire basis of feminism has been discredited. Women want what the manosphere has said they want, and that's an alpha. When presented with an attractive female kissing a beta the world, including women, were repulsed. Manosphere 1, Feminism ZERO.

Don't Miss: Super Bowl Commercials Aren't Sexist

Everything Is Amazing Right Now And Nobody's Happy

February 12, 2013 | by casual | Link | Original Link

Some days when I'm browsing through my RSS feeds of all the pickup/manosphere blogs, I'm reminded of the popular interview of Louis CK on Conan where Louis laments that "everything is amazing right now and nobody's happy". Louis was making a point about how people take modern technology for granted, but the same can be said about game and the modern dating market.

All the bloggers out there (and sometimes even on this blog) regularly criticize feminism, hypergamy, the decline of American women, and so on, and don't seem to appreciate the simple truth:

We are living in the best time right now to be a man.

No one's had it better than we do. Not your dad, not your dad's dad, not some guy living in the mythic Golden Age of masculinity, not King Solomon with his 700 wives. At no other period in the history of our species has the average guy had access to as many beautiful women as we do today, and that's a fact.

Allow me to explain why:

1. There Are More Beautiful Women Now Than Ever

One of the things that a lot of bloggers like to complain about is the decline of modern women. Roosh is famous for this, and has even compiled a series of pictures comparing women from the 1960s to women today. And it's true to an extent, obesity is a big problem in America, and the average woman today is less attractive than the average woman 50 years ago.

However, this is true only for average women. Who cares about average women? Let's take a look at the hottest women around today compared to a few decades ago:

Makes you kind of glad to be alive today, doesn't it?

Advances in science and technology have helped to improve womens' looks in recent years. We understand more about human nutrition and physical fitness now than in the past, and women have access to fitness equipment, trainers, and nutritional supplements that didn't exist 50 years ago. Women today lead easier lives, free of physical hardship and disfiguring disease compared to women in the past.

Makeup technology has also improved (and yes, makeup is a technology) along with lotions, body creams, and other cosmetics women use to keep their skin looking smooth and youthful. Hair products have improved. Clothing has become tighter and more revealing. Women has access to implants, to supplement their natural assets. Cosmetic surgery technology has improved. The list goes on and on.

Now not all women take advantage of these advances, and many women don't, but if you're gunning for the 9s and 10s (which we all should be) then there's no better time to be alive. It's easy to point out all the overweight women out there, but it's just as easy to find gorgeous girls in any major city or college campus. And it's easier than ever to get them into bed, which brings us to point 2:

2. It's Easier To Get Women Into Bed Than Ever

Not only that, but today it's easier to have sex with more girls, get sex sooner, and have wilder sex than any time before in human history. Why is this possible?

The most obvious reason is contraception. Condoms have been around since the 19th century, but didn't gain widespread adoption until the 1950s. Another common contraceptive is The Pill, which first became widely available in the 1960s. Contraceptives lowered the risk of pregnancy and STDs, which made women more willing to have casual sex outside of a committed relationship.

Then of course there's feminism and the sexual revolution, which helped make it more acceptable for women to have casual sex. Feminism is often demonized in the manosphere, but feminism and women's empowerment helped contribute to the commitment free sex that we can enjoy today.

All of these things have led to the loosening of morals and the development of the current hook-up culture where more girls put out for more guys than in any time in history. Guys seem to forget that things weren't so easy in the past.

Loading...
Even if you could travel back in time to the 1960s, you'd find it more difficult to sleep with the women because the culture of casual sex just didn't exist back then. Can you imagine a girl from the '60s having sex with a guy she just met without even going on a formal date? Only very recently in our history has such behavior become the norm.

Compared to the past, we are living in the Golden Age. At no previous time in history have you had access to so many different women of different races, different countries, and different social classes. And at no time in history has it been more culturally acceptable for those women to sleep with you for a one-night stand (a term which was coined in 1963).

That's not to say that every guy can easily get laid today. If you're a beta herb, you're not going to get laid in this age or any age. To take advantage of the current situation, you have to know game, which brings us to point 3:

3. We Have Knowledge Of The Game

This alone is probably one of the best reasons to be a guy living today. Thanks to the internet and the PUA culture it spawned, guys now have access to routines and techniques that have been empirically tested thousands of times. Combined with our growing understanding of human psychology and biology, the average guy now has access to more information about how to get laid than any guy in history.

Your dad would have killed for the knowledge that we take for granted today. If your dad was lucky, maybe he had an older brother or friend who gave him some advice, and then had to figure out things the hard way, and maybe got lucky with a couple girls. YOU, on the other hand, have access to the results and experiments of thousands of guys from around the world who have approached tens of thousands of girls. Seriously, it's hard to overstate how much information can be had for free or for very little money today on the Internet.

In fact, today the problem is almost the opposite, with so much information out there that it can be difficult to digest. If this is the case for you, I have a few recommendations. First, get yourself a copy of "Double Your Dating" by David Deangelo. It's a little outdated, but the material is still good and it can be had for less than $20 bucks. If you're looking for something with a little more meat, try "Bang" by Roosh. If you need exercises, grab a copy of "Rules of the Game" by Neil Strauss. Google "Vin Di Carlo's Escalation Ladder".

That’s it, that’s all you need to get started. Just read the material above, go out and apply it, and I GUARANTEE you will get laid. If you need more hand holding, then hire a professional pickup coach who’s been doing this for 5-10 years, and have him demonstrate approaches and give you feedback in the field. It will shave months off your learning curve.

Writers and poets have always lamented that they could never understand the nature of women. Today, that nature is laid bare for all who dare explore it. You might not like everything that you find, but you no longer have to be frustrated with fumbling and not knowing.

Conclusion

Hopefully this post has been a wake-up call for you. We live in a time where you can go out almost any night of the week and meet beautiful young girls who are looking to hookup, and thanks to the game we have the tools to seduce them. We take these things for granted, but these are things that have never existed before.

I’m just an average guy, but since I discovered the game I’ve slept with over a dozen women, including white girls, Mexican girls, Chinese girls, Japanese girls, Koreans, Indians, a Salvadorean… at what point in history could an average guy like me have the opportunity to sleep with such a cornucopia of women?

There exists more opportunity for guys today than ever before in history, not just with women, but in business, health, anything you choose to pursue. Getting anything worthwhile out of life isn’t easy, but it’s easier today than it’s ever been. So go out there and take advantage of the opportunity, because everything is indeed amazing.

Read More: The Manosphere Is Approaching A Tipping Point

5 Easy Ways To Boost Your Testosterone

February 12, 2013 | by RandyMarsh | Link | Original Link

We hear the word a lot, it's what separates males from females and men from boys. So what exactly is it? It is the principle male sex hormone and acts as an anabolic steroid. Having lower testosterone can have horrendous effects on men: decreased muscle mass, weight gain, reduced energy levels, and lower libido.

In a study conducted by VA Puget Sound Health Care Systems and the University of Washington, Seattle, found that "about 19 percent had low testosterone levels; 28 percent had varying low and normal levels". In addition, testosterone levels decrease 1.5% every year after age 30. Which means you become less of a man every year past age 30. It was also found that "men with low testosterone levels had an 88 percent increase in risk of death compared with those who had normal levels".

So with all this negativity, is there any hope for man? Yes.

There are plenty of 'natural' ways to increase your testosterone levels.

1. Vitamin D3. This vitamin has been linked to increasing testosterone in men and increasing sex drive. (Source)

2. Eat your steak and whole eggs. Testosterone is derived from cholesterol. Sure egg whites and grilled chicken might be a great way to get your protein in, but cutting the red meat and yolks won't help raise your testosterone. Eggs are very nutrient dense, eat the yolks and reap the benefits. Same goes along with red beef, enjoy your steak. (Source)

Loading...

3. Workout. Pushing and pulling heavy weights in a compound movement (squats, deadlifts, benching, clean and press, etc.) cause a hormonal change in the body, producing more testosterone (with proper diet of course). (Source)

4. Avoid sugar. It will increase your insulin levels. Not only is that linked to weight gain, but also a reduction in testosterone levels. (Source)

5. Eat your fats. Don't leave out olive oil, peanut oils, avocados, egg yolks, nuts, and red meat (grass fed). (Source)

He’s been eating his steak

Just following these few points can have a dramatic effect on increasing your testosterone levels; your sex drive will rocket, your hard work from the gym will start to show, and women will be so turned on by your pheromones. Moral of the story: don’t underestimate the most important hormone in your body, it’s THAT important.

Read Next: The Pill That Cures Approach Anxiety

Notes From The Underground

February 12, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a depressing book that basically says “life sucks.” It describes how all humans are limited by a “wall” that places torturous constraints on existence. For example, a mere toothache can upend your life and make you a slave to the pain, to no inherent fault of your own.

> To live longer than forty years is bad manners, is vulgar, immoral. Who does live beyond forty? … sincerely and honestly I will tell you who do: fools and worthless fellows.

The author, Fyodor Dostoyevsky, differs from Mark Twain in saying that men do the opposite of what’s in their best interests for random and illogical reasons (Twain believes that actions that may seem disadvantageous on the surface actually benefits the man in some way). He does this in a babbling, stream-of-consciousness style that, while I’m sure was impressive in 1864, will frustrate the modern reader. He prefers massive paragraphs that have many words but say painfully little.

Loading…

> I did not understand that she was hiding her feelings under irony, that this is usually the last refuge of modest and chaste-souled people when the privacy of their soul is coarsely and intrusively invaded, and that their pride makes them refuse to surrender till the last moment and shrink from giving expression to their feelings before you.

The best way to describe this book is a man undergoing a nervous breakdown angrily sharing his grievances. While the author has been commended by such luminaries as Sartre and Nietzsche while being credited with writing the first existential novel, the hands of time has decreased enjoyment that you could get from this type of classic.

> …which is better—cheap happiness or exalted sufferings?

Read More: “Notes From The Underground” on Amazon (free Kindle edition)

Got A Girl At Your Crib? Feed Her These Drinks

February 12, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

First we can start by eliminating what she should not be drinking: beer. This is the worst source of alcohol per volume as most beers average a mere 5%. It will also cause her to go to the bathroom more than anything else you could pour for her. The best drinks to give women are ones that you make from scratch. Making a drink for a girl accomplishes two things. First it helps highlight your attributes and skills and makes you seem more desirable. Second, it gives her the liquid courage to let you take advantage of her in ways her sober self might execute self-restraint. It's a tried and proven method for me and if I can indulge your curiosity these are some of the best drinks I have found to help seal the deal.

1. Cosmo

Even the most amateur of drinkers knows women love this. Maybe it's the red coloring, the fruity aftertaste or because it's associated with the dumb show "Sex and the City". Anyway it's an easy drink to put together and women practically believe it's their duty as females to enjoy it.

2. Malibu rum and pineapple juice

I do not know the name of this drink but even someone who hates the taste of alcohol would not detect the slightest tinge of booze in this cocktail. I have known several non-drinkers who let their guard down when drinking this only to find themselves three sheets to the wind in no time at all. Gentlemen this cocktail is in many ways the equivalent to spiking a girl's drink with roofies but with none of the legal and moral complications. Basically, if the devil was serving a punch bowl to a bunch of church ladies this would be his recipe.

3. Blow Job

For shots make a blow job. The sexual innuendo is a plus but women genuinely love drinking this. It goes down smooth and its main ingredients are Bailey's Irish cream and Kahlua which are a staple in every single girl's liquor cabinet. Also any man who has seen the movie "American Pie" can without much imagination think of uses for final ingredient in the drink, whipped cream, once she is done taking the shot.

4. Cuba Libre

This drink is a rum and coke with a lime. I have found that a girl's familiarity with coke helps this drink go down easier. It is easy as shit to make and throwing in a lime wedge makes it seem like some effort went in to making this for her. By the way limes can last for months in the fridge and are cheap as shit.

5. Sangria

Every girl wants to go to Spain. I think it's implanted in their DNA at birth. They see it as a safe European country with lots of history and what not. Anyway, unless you're a master chef and can cook up some paella this is the next best thing to bringing them a bit of Spanish culture. The sweetness of the drink offsets the potency of the wine and makes it go down easy. Plus unless she is a wine snob, you can use cheap wine as the fruit juices make it difficult to tell what kind of financial investment you put into the bottle(or box) of wine that went into the sangria.

6. Pisco Sour

This drink separates the men from the bartenders. Seriously, if you have never been to Peru how many people have had one? It is actually pretty easy to make and in most liquor stores you can find a bottle of Pisco. While the exotic factor alone really makes women fall in love with this drink, it is also surprisingly sweet, sour and of a high alcohol volume. Since she is a girl (i.e. gullible) you can tell her you brought the bottle of Pisco back from your recent trip to Peru or that you had your Peruvian friends bring a bottle back from their homeland just for you.

There is one other benefit to making drinks I have not mentioned: you can easily make yourself a non alcoholic beverage and pass it off as cocktail. After all it´s not you who needs the liquid lubricant for sex.

Don't Miss: The Best Player Song Ever Recorded

24 Responses to Got A Girl At Your Crib? Feed Her These Drinks

1. Mebus
   February 13, 2013 at 5:14 pm
   "A little liquid courage can increase her sexual inhibition tenfold"

   So the more alcohol you feed her, the less likely she is to have sex with you?

   Reply
   -

     bacon
     February 13, 2013 at 9:36 pm
     yea i caught that after i submitted it

     Reply
2. Solomon
   February 13, 2013 at 5:50 pm
   no margaritas???

   Here ya go: 2 parts silver tequila, 1 part Cointreau (or other orange liquor) and 5 parts "Simply Limeade"

   This is an amazing drink, without that garbage margarita mix stuff. Throw a lime wedge in and you're done. I have never ever mat a girl who didn't love margaritas, and if you make one that kicks ass, as above, you're in business.

   Reply
3. Wald
   February 13, 2013 at 6:29 pm
   If you can make them, Caipirinhas are awesome as well.

   Reply
4. Mr. Mitchell
   February 13, 2013 at 6:32 pm
   ONE: In this day in age, you've got to be real careful about getting a girl tipsy while at your place. Considering the onslaught of feminism and unjust/absurd laws, you can be falsely accused of rape.

TWO: If your game is subpar and is not where it needs to be, then practicing this advice in this column is for you; on the other hand, if yoir game is impeccable and tight, this column's advice is useless. Personally, I prefer my girls absolutely sober. Am sure to get their panties off w/o a hitch.

Reply

5. austin
February 13, 2013 at 7:07 pm
Here in Missouri, home of tech n9ne, we call malibu and pineapple juice a "caribou Lou". We also add 151. It's stout and women go nuts for it.

Reply

- Matty
February 14, 2013 at 10:52 am lmaoooo

Reply

6. Anonymous
February 13, 2013 at 9:52 pm
The posts on this site have really gone down in quality lately.

Reply

7. Ross
February 13, 2013 at 10:09 pm
Give her a banana, coconut, strawberry fruit smoothie! With a side of ginger zing! :) Instant energy and full of antioxidants! :)

Reply

8. TMG
February 13, 2013 at 10:31 pm
Do you serve the drink before or after you get accused of raping an intoxicated woman?

Reply

- Ross
  February 13, 2013 at 11:24 pm
  That's why I recommend the Fruit Smoothie! :) Laws in the good ol USA have it that even a TRACE of alcohol in her bloodstream means she's too impaired to consent and you can end up in court fighting for your freedom. :P So if you serve drinks, have your camera rolling recording the CONSENT.

  Reply

9. Factory
   February 13, 2013 at 11:26 pm
   Uh…you should put a caveat on this article for Canadians saying NEVER DO THIS EVER IF YOU WANT TO STAY OUT OF PRISON. Section 273 of the Canadian criminal code states sex with an 'intoxicated' woman is rape…as in, you are actually guilty of it. This can be the case after as few as one single drink (and you don't even have to know she drank it).

   Know who decides if one drink was enough to 'incapacitate' her?

   A fuckin JURY, that's who.

   This is a goddamned irresponsible article on almost every level, and you're gonna land Canadian readers in jail with this shit.

   I agree with the other posters…this site had promise…what the fuck happened?

   Reply

   - Wald
     February 14, 2013 at 12:18 am
     If he is not Canadian, how is he supposed to know that?

     It's not his job to keep you out of jail. Christ.

     Reply

10. KC
    February 13, 2013 at 11:36 pm
    As a bartender for the past 7 years, this was really hard to read.

    Reply

11. dannyfrom504
February 14, 2013 at 1:49 am a little known (in the states) drink that's VERY popular in southern Spain- tinto de verano wine glass, fillhalf with red wine, fill last 1/4 of gladd with 7-up or sprite. add 1-2 ice cubes.

very very very very few american women have ever had it, it's original, and i've NEVER had a girl say she didn't like it. a cosmo- couldn't tell you what's in one. lol.

Reply

12. Apollo
February 14, 2013 at 1:49 am
My go-to cocktail is the Caprivodka, a modified Caipirinha which uses Vodka instead of the much harder to come by and more expensive Cachaca. Easy to make, uses few and easy to obtain ingredients, quick to drink, tasty and gets you hammered fast.

Take a half a lime, quarter it, drop it in a whisky tumbler style glass, muddle it to squeeze out all the lime juice possible, add a tablespoon worth of raw sugar, pour in a shot of vodka, give a quick stir and fill the glass with crushed ice. Have the Vodka chilled in the freezer and let it sit for a minute before serving for best effect. Dont use cheap Vodka, go at least for Smirnov, Absolut or 42 Below.

Reply

- Albert E
February 14, 2013 at 7:07 am
They call them Caiprioshkas not Caiprivodkas in Brazil. It was all I drank in Brazil because sometimes they use some horrid cachaca that gives you a headache before you go to sleep (not kidding).

I always liked to make green Screwdrivers. OJ, vodka and Blue Curacao chilled and served in an unusual glass and you have a drink shes never seen before.

Reply

13. Anonymous

February 14, 2013 at 2:22 am
pisco it is..anything that gets them hamered the quickest

Reply

14. Peter
February 14, 2013 at 3:46 am so no real listing of ingredients?

also anything more than 2 ingredients is complicating things when she's already in the room. focus on the chick, not making drinks.

here's what i use:

vanilla flavoured vodka chilled. tastes amazing. if you want to get fancy it also goes well with coke (vanilla coke flavour) or milk (vanilla milk flavour).

Reply

15. P Dog
February 14, 2013 at 5:32 am
When I take girls to my usual date bar I get a jug of Champagne Sangria (along with a Jolly Rancher), they love it's taste. Malibu rum and pineapple juice sounds intriguing, I'll have to try it out. It sounds like a less strong Long Island Iced Tea

Reply

16. dragnet
February 14, 2013 at 7:18 am
Lame.

Reply

17. Sam Spade
February 14, 2013 at 10:19 am
Pisco sour = liquid diabetes.

Reply

18. Symbiosis

February 14, 2013 at 12:45 pm
That last line is gross. If you’re a dude your tolerance is already likely much higher than the girl’s; if you need to get her shitfaced and keep yourself sober to get laid you’re doing it wrong and you’re kinda rapey. You can use arguments to justify it but you’re getting a girl too drunk to think while tricking her into thinking you’re also drunk when you aren’t, you’re only two degrees of separation from just holding her down and making her take it (but less straightforward than an actual rapist, ya big puss).

Reply

19. RASER
February 14, 2013 at 3:38 pm
Naaa, way to much work, just give her cool white wine, that does the trick, keep filling her glass

Job done

BANG!

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

6 Most Common Types Of Girls You'll Encounter Online

February 12, 2013 | by The_Dude | Link | Original Link

Online dating was once considered the garbage bin of the dating world, but is now widely recognized as a valid (if depressing) way for men to rack up quick bangs in a pinch. While most men still dismiss online dating as being somewhat pathetic, the truth is, most men who knock it, will have tried it at least once or twice in secret.

In the last installment of my series on online dating, I introduced you to the six types of guys who try to get laid online.

Now that you know the competition, it would make sense to familiarize yourself with the targets. So, without further ado, here are the six most common types of girls you'll encounter online, along with some preliminary insights on how to game them. Beware though: this list is hardly comprehensive, and if you venture into the stormy seas of online dating, be prepared to bring a dash of common sense and maybe a bag of lettuce to scare off the landbeasts.

1. The Octomom

As the name implies, the octomom is a woman with multiple children. What makes her unique though is not simply that she has kids, but that she aspires to find a man to actually commit his own time and resources to help raise them. Without fail, you will find the Octomom declaring that she "is not interested in hookups," that she is at a loss to comprehend the lack of "good men out there," and that she aspires find a suitable marriage partner similar to the kinds of men she dated before she shat out half a dozen kids.

How to game: don't.

2. The Land Beast

Perhaps the most common type of girl online, the land beast can be identified by her rounded figure and high body fat percentage. Arguably, this type needs no explanation; however, it should be noted that not all land beasts are created equal. If the land beast sports a pretty face or nice breasts, she may actually be popular with a subset of male online daters who are more numerous than you might imagine: the chubby chasers. Otherwise, you can bet the land beast will be the easiest, and least satisfying, of pickings you'll find online.

How to game: include a picture of a big mac on your profile and mention that you like dinner dates.

3. The MAGIC Land Beast

Like her cousin, the land beast, the Magic Land Beast is fat. The difference is, the magic land beast doesn't show it in her pictures. Hence the use of the word "magic." Like a magician making a rabbit disappear into thin air, the magic land beast does the same process in reverse: going from thin to fat in the length of times it takes you get from her profile to her favorite restaurant. If you're new to online dating, don't make the mistake of thinking her magic powers make her rare; some even say the magic land beast is more common than the regular land beast.

How to game: Look for girls with lots of angle shots and duckface pictures in their profiles, these are the key to the magic land beast's photographic illusions.

4. The Progressive

Found most frequently on OKCupid, the Progressive is a girl who wants to show you she's different… by doing everything the exact same way every other vaguely progressive college educated white woman does. The Progressive pushes the boundaries with such shockingly edgy and unconventional behaviors as labeling herself a feminist, claiming to be bisexual, getting tattoos, sporting a Skrillex-inspired half-shaven hairstyle, and generally doing everything the postmodern urban life Bible tells her to do. A veritable bastion of status-quo ideas, actions, and postures, you can usually identify her by the complete lack of originality in anything she does, combined with the insinuation that she really does think for herself. The most salient physical feature of the progressive is her white skin and upper middle class income level—no black, Hispanic or working class women of this description have ever been spotted.

How to game: Woo this special snowflake by sending her a message sympathizing with one of the safe, popular, politically correct positions she pays lip service to in her profile, like gay marriage.

5. The Model Who Can’t Get Hired

One of the most common denizens of the modern dating site, the model who can’t get hired can be identified by the abundance of pictures on her profile where she blows kisses, shows cleavage, or otherwise attention whores in the most obvious way possible. Her second most noteworthy characteristic is that she doesn’t actually meet any of the men who message her; instead, she watches the messages in her inbox build up, viewing the entire enterprise as a video game you win when you receive the “inbox full” message at the top of your inbox. In other words, a narcissist who is attractive enough to get some validation, but not attractive enough to make money off it.

How to game: Make her jealous by posting fake male model pictures, be sure to look your absolute worst if she actually shows up on a date.

6. The Escort

She’s attractive. She responds to your messages. She is not a bitch. She’s feminine…

… And the minute you get her on chat, you discover she’s trying to hustle you into her camwhore chatroom for just $50 an hour.

How to game: Have your credit card ready.

So, there you have it: the six most commonly encountered denizens of the modern online dating game. As you may have already discovered, the pickings are often slim in this sea, but as they say in Scotland, why buy the cow when you can get the milk for free? Just remember, if you head online expecting to find a beautiful, feminine, responsive and interesting woman with no children, this woman has an archetype as well: the tooth fairy.

Read Next: The 5 Commandments Of Online Dating

15 Responses to 6 Most Common Types Of Girls You’ll Encounter Online

1. Spaniard
   February 13, 2013 at 2:05 pm
   The picture for “5″ belongs in “3″ or “2.” Number “5″ is no model.
   Reply
2. le tigre MD
   February 13, 2013 at 2:14 pm

Devastatingly accurate.

Reply

3. Twenty
February 13, 2013 at 2:57 pm
Just remember, if you head online expecting to find a beautiful, feminine, responsive and interesting woman with no children, this woman has an archetype as well: the tooth fairy.

Now, now, now. I once met such a woman online. Granted, she was a lying, cheating whore — i.e., married — but she was cute, responsive, interesting, and had no children. And I'm not sure that the lying, cheating whore bit is necessarily opposed to the (feral) feminine nature.

Reply

4. surreyman
February 13, 2013 at 4:59 pm
This is SO true. The only decent girls I ever found online were foreign (ie didn't know anyone locally). the rest were one of the above.

You missed two things out with The Progressive: Irony and cupcakes.
Irony = a version of humour where instead of people laughing, they just feel an unjustified sense of intelligence.
Cupcakes = handheld obesity.

I don't know what the obsession is, but the rest of the sheep are interested in irony and cupcakes, so they are too.

Reply

5. BDM
February 13, 2013 at 5:56 pm
I've met a lot of good college girls online. In the Bay Area, OKCupid is like facebook, everyone has one. It's kind of ridiculous what you can get through it.

Reply

- CaptainCaveman
February 13, 2013 at 8:09 pm

TY. Advice in Bay Area. I'm lucky though. My bro is in the Gay Area and in a wheelchair permanently.

Reply

6. betatopua
February 13, 2013 at 7:10 pm
The magic land beast & model who can't get hired are the biggest problems for me.

I had 6 dates set up over the past 2 weeks. The two most attractive girls flake (models who can't get hired), out of the 4 who turn up 3 are magic land beasts and one girl is actually slim and moderately attractive.

That equates to a lot of my time wasted.

Reply

7. kinjutsu
February 13, 2013 at 9:11 pm
The magic land beast is a tricky one…
Look at the upper arms (bi-cep/tri-cep area) the bigger they are the bigger she will be in person.
This has a 98% success rate in determining her size in real life.

Reply

- Blujack21
February 14, 2013 at 1:56 am
Not always true. Know girl that is a size 4-6 on top with thin arms but has massive hips and thighs. Probably a size XL below. She always shows photographs from the waist up but never from the waist down. Hence the men are probably shocked when the see all of her. A whole body pic is the best.

Reply

  - freehub
February 14, 2013 at 1:10 pm
…and a thin or "average" girl (average in terms of how a guy would think of average, not how the term is abused in chicks profiles) will usually post a full body shot or other picture composed such that there's no doubt she's thin (or not fat). If her profile has nothing but pictures taken with the "fat girl angles" then that's your clue…

Of course there always the possibility those skinny full body shots were taken 50 pounds ago, but life is full of risks.

8. Martin F. Mayhem
February 14, 2013 at 12:43 am
I do believe the dude has nailed it on all counts.

Reply

9. Player of the Extreme
February 14, 2013 at 9:30 am
There is one vital piece missing from the article: context! The online dating population is diversified by the context where you live.

One of my favorite hunting grounds in the past was Prague in the Czech Republic. Interestingly enough, not because of the locals (quite tricky to handle) but because of its large Slavic emigrant population. Knowing their preferred dating websites and their language, gives you a totally different context then the one described in the article.

There I was handling with a ton of ladies from their early 20´s to the middle thirties, that were trying to make a living outside of their country and, quite often, of their family. Many of them top notch quality and hardly any of them matching the descriptions of the article. They were emotionally fragile and in need of human warmth so I preyed on them extensively and with astonishing rates of success. Thru online dating in Prague I managed to complete some of my most difficult challenges (example: fastest time between meeting a girl and get her in my bed; fastest consecutive one night stands, fastest consecutive one night stands with different nationalities, etc, etc)

In resume: online dating can be very effective depending on how you use the tool and the context where you live.

Reply

10. ronin
February 14, 2013 at 10:35 am
TBH this looks like a "what to avoid in online dating" list

Reply

11. Pingback: Conversational ability - Page 2
12. David
    February 14, 2013 at 6:26 pm
    there are cute, smart, sweet, feminine single girls… who are religious.
    If you do manage to find a nice girl online I recommend this site for tips on how to win her over.

    Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes: ` <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>    <q cite=""> <strike> `

Post Comment

5 Bachelor Pad Essentials

February 12, 2013 | by Tuthmosis | Link | Original Link

The advantages of having an optimal living situation are well-documented. In a perfect world, you already live in a happening neighborhood where there's a healthy cocktail of cafes, high-end boutiques, lounge-bars, and other skinny-girl magnets. In other words, you have a salad of day and night venues, with countless locations to loiter, browse, work, and "randomly" meet girls. You also live alone, without having to deal with pain-in-the-ass, cockblocking, or mangina roommates. Your place is roomy, has a view, and looks expensive.

Only a small percentage of us are fortunate enough to have all of those ingredients.

But, regardless of whether you live in your own 3,000-square-foot loft, or rent a room in an apartment with 12 other guys, there are things you can do to maximize your quality of life, and your chances of turning female guests into bangs.

1. Good Lamps

It's difficult to over-estimate the importance of quality lighting to a space. Good light makes cheap stuff look better, makes you look better, and, more importantly, sets the mood. In a world where more and more places have that hideous fluorescent light that makes everyone's eyes look bloodshot, warm incandescent bulbs—cast into corners of your room—is like a soothing balm to your guests.

Bonus: A lamp with a dimmer switch.

2. Framed Wall Art

Even a college freshman knows that bare walls are undesirable. What a lot of guys don't realize is that a taped-up Reservoir Dogs poster is almost as bad. Even if it's a cheap piece of garbage that you got at a second-hand store, put something on the wall that's in a frame. Unique-looking pieces—for which you can fabricate an elaborate story, even if it’s obviously made-up—are ideal.

Bonus: A hand-painted piece custom framed by a professional shop.

3. Home Bar

If you’re over 21 years old and not a recovering alcoholic, there’s no excuse for not having some alcohol at your house at all times. Drinks-at-the-house is one of the most powerful (and easy) lures for bringing girls back to your place. But, like anything else, delivery is everything. You should have more than a half-finished bottle of Popov in the freezer. A simple piece of furniture, matching glasses, a selection of mid-shelf alcohol, a few mixers, and a bucket of ice is enough to get you started, and does miracles for rounding the bases without being tagged out.

Bonus: Legitimate mixologist skills honed through practice or a formal bartending course.

4. Good Speakers and Playlist

There's an episode of Three's Company or one of those 80s TV show where a hairy-chested guy walks into the room, hits a wall switch, and some easy-listening music track automatically comes on. That got a laugh back then. Nowadays, it gets you points. Take your time to put together a killer list of ambient, un-jarring, non-popular music that's at least three hours long. Set it on loop just in case and have it ready before you leave the house. But remember: kick-ass music is no good coming out of some cheap, tinny laptop speakers. Invest in something with a subwoofer.

Bonus: A big LCD TV to run visualization effects full-screen while the music runs.

5. A No-Shoes Policy

You shouldn't be allowing people—especially girls you don't really know yet—traipsing mud into your place anyway. But having a no-shoes policy has the added advantage of getting a girl one (big) step closer to being clothes-free. There's nothing worse than having to contend with a tight pair of Uggs mid-makeout. Girls without shoes curl their legs back on the couch, recline, and get comfortable for you.

Bonus: Japanese-style guest slippers.

In the end, you have to remember one thing: women like comfortable, intriguing spaces. And, the more comfortable a chick is, the more she's interested in getting comfortable with you. Everything you add—and take away—from your bachelor pad, however humble, should enhance those features.

Read More: The Holidays: Amateur Nights On Steroids

33 Responses to 5 Bachelor Pad Essentials

1. Fit
   February 13, 2013 at 11:21 am
   Solid list. #1 is huge. Can't stress how important lighting is to mood.
   If I were to add one more, I'd say an iPad. Show a random picture from a trip on it. Naturally she will show you some "hilarious" YouTube clip, or video from some "super original unknown" band. It's much more intimate than a laptop or smart tv and gets you both very close.
   Reply
   - Tuthmosis
     February 14, 2013 at 2:46 am
     I have a few go-to videos and websites that I show girls at my place. The more show-and-tell stuff you have (whether that's a video, a funny book, or any other prop) the better. Digital stuff is no exception.

Reply

2. Takes 3 to Tango
February 13, 2013 at 11:25 am
Good list. A couple of additions:

1. A comfortable queen- or king-sized bed. It needs to be large enough to freely switch positions during sex and provide plenty of room to lay out after the deed.

2. Candles/fragrance – the power of smell is stronger in women and can do much to help set the mood. Using candles doubles as a sensual light source as well.

Reply

3. onan
February 13, 2013 at 11:35 am
bose speakers are crap… the more recent the shittier

I second the king size bed

Reply

4. mindstar
February 13, 2013 at 11:36 am
Brillant list. I particularly liked #5. I'd also suggest an extra toothbrush and some female friendly shampoo. Now she won't feel pressed to leave because she can't get ready for work at your place.

Reply

   - Hugh G. Rection
   February 13, 2013 at 11:52 am
   That will also drop a nice hint that you are used to having female company over.

   Reply

5. rivsdiary

February 13, 2013 at 11:45 am a simple but brilliant list. i got about half that shit. no excuses.

truthmosis, i am really liking your columns. the rough sex one was excellent.

guys, here are his articles:

http://www.returnofkings.com/author/tuthmosis

Reply

6. rivsdiary
February 13, 2013 at 11:47 am ipad, big bed, scented candles — more great suggestions. this stuff is fundamental, and falls under the underrated and critically important “logistics” category.

great stuff guys.

Reply

7. Anonymous
February 13, 2013 at 11:52 am
Big, big but subtle tip: don’t have a bed frame. Keep the queen-size bed, but stick the thick mattress on the floor (corner) instead. Cover it with tons of thick blankets. In my experience, this subtle difference gets girls real horny and comfortable (i also had a bean chair in the other corner) though I’m still trying to figure out the psychology behind it

Ive always been divided on the poster issue. What types of posters really work? i’ve seen successful guys use oldies bands like Hendrix or Bob Marley, but perhaps real art is the way to go.

.

Reply

- Tuthmosis
February 14, 2013 at 2:48 am
A platform bed–which sits low to the floor–has the same effect, but more elegantly.

There’s no problem with posters, provided they’re framed and well-placed.

Reply

- muy caliente
  February 14, 2013 at 8:01 am
  Dude,spot on!

  I came to this conclusion ages ago!Just buy a so called divan sofa (very low base)!

  Reply

8. Cyclone
   February 13, 2013 at 11:53 am
   Big, big but subtle tip: don't have a bed frame. Keep the queen-size bed, but stick the thick mattress on the floor (corner) instead. Cover it with tons of thick blankets. In my experience, this subtle difference gets girls real horny and comfortable (i also had a bean chair in the other corner) though I'm still trying to figure out the psychology behind it

   Ive always been divided on the poster issue. What types of posters really work? i've seen successful guys use oldies bands like Hendrix or Bob Marley, but perhaps real art is the way to go.

   .

   Reply

9. Dr Zoidberg
   February 13, 2013 at 12:29 pm
   Art is clutch, but it has to be good art – not just a $9.99 generic decoration from Michaels. My art has gotten me laid more than I can count. I have odd-ball pieces from friends hanging up all around and then a corner of all my own stuff just kind of stacked up and hanging out. Broads will inevitably want to look through them. Go take an art course at the local college and hang up your finished product. It's an automatic conversation piece for you to display value.

   Also, it sounds kinda gay, but try a Scentsy. They are really good at giving a slight fragrance without being overpowering. Plus they come in masculine smells unlike most candles (Leather, Hemingway and Imperial City are my three favorite). Some of the man-scents do smell like a frat house basement though.

   Finally, not a must have, but definitely a great addition – an animal trophy (that you hunted obviously). You don't need a wall of racks, but some deer or caribou antlers right upon entering let's a broad know she just descended into a real man's lair.

Reply

10. UKpua
February 13, 2013 at 1:38 pm
Few more items I have ..

1. Skateboard and a snowboard in the front room , ‘ whoa you are really sporty .. ‘ yes I know I can pump for hours
2. How to draw books bought from amazon for next to fuck all .. Chick crack . Left under the coffee table
3. Wall art of pictures from my travels put into canvas
4. Plants (most dying but looks ok)
5. Keep bathroom clean , chicks always go in the .
6. Instantly change into slouching track bottoms when arriving home .. ‘Slumber game’ Benefits are two fold , 1. You don’t have to make any more effort to look nice she’s already back at yours 2. It sets the tone for bed time ;)
7. Mirrors .. Chicks love mirrors
8. Drinks

Reply

- UKpua
February 13, 2013 at 1:42 pm
One more genius thing we use … A Polaroid camera left on the side that casually makes an appearance when we get chicks back .. It’s retro , quirky chick crack AND we get a trophy picture afterwards . Extra bonus is we stick up all the photos .. Social proof .. Gets chicks asking to be put on the ‘cool wall’ and begging for better positions . 100% hit rate

  Reply

  - Parker
  February 13, 2013 at 2:09 pm
  But I do believe that most girls would not like to be seen on the “I’ve just banged wall”

11. Dillon
February 13, 2013 at 1:55 pm

Personally, this article reminds me of something that you'd find in a woman's magazine. Something like this is not going to make or break your game, or even make a significant difference. If you're even taking the time to worry about things like this, I would argue that your head is in the wrong place. Just my two cents.

Also something to consider: http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=P9F7hcJfm68

Reply

12. dannyfrom504
February 13, 2013 at 2:05 pm
you missed 1 crucial item: BOOKS.

a brief run down of of how my house is set up to get tingles.

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=Ud3YEEnMS0I

Reply

    - Old Glory
    February 14, 2013 at 11:11 am
    That tip is money. Sweet house, bro.

    Reply

13. Emmanuel Goldstein
February 13, 2013 at 4:07 pm
Chicks always make a beeline for the bathroom, without fail. It's like some test of your fuckworthiness. So keep it nice and tidy. Otherwise, solid list.

Reply

    - Tuthmosis
    February 14, 2013 at 2:51 am
    I agree. I also keep interesting reading material in the bathroom. Even though that's the most spartan room in my place, I try to make sure everything I have in there is quality. Believe it or not, a designer bath mat makes a huge difference. Same goes for a REAL shower curtain.

    Reply

14. P Dog
February 13, 2013 at 4:24 pm
Damn, I thought I already had everything I needed down on my move out list but I didn't think to get a home bar. Cheers Tuth.
Reply
15. Shawn
February 13, 2013 at 5:20 pm
Fuck that. My lair is where i escape the matrix, unwind and plot with cohorts. Letting broads know where you rest in these times is like giving the enemy your co-ordinates. "Oh i was in the neighbourhood and stop by because i saw your car, bike, lights on, music on and the.drawbridge down".
Reply
    - Old Horndog
    February 13, 2013 at 6:47 pm
    @Shawn: Word!
    Reply
    - AneroidOcean
    February 13, 2013 at 8:43 pm
    While this is an inherent risk, if the girl is coming by unannounced, your game has other issues.
    Reply
        - Shawn
        February 14, 2013 at 10:17 am
        You can't game crazy.
16. Anonymous

February 13, 2013 at 6:10 pm
Finally a good article here,without the usual “girls dont like me”moaning

Reply

17. Dannyfrom504
February 14, 2013 at 9:59 am
Roissy had a great post about telling a woman you don’t allow women with clothes on in the bedroom.

Then, she’ll be dying to see the bedroom. I keep a lamp lot and the door ajar. Never had it fail. Lol.

Reply

18. Phinn
February 14, 2013 at 10:40 am
My apartments were always done in a Spartan/artist theme -

- low bed on a minimalist frame with no headboard or footboard.

- bare wood floors, polished and clean enough to eat off of, maybe one area rug somewhere to define a space

- tons of art and photos all over the place, too much to have it all up at once, so some is up on the walls, but the rest of it propped against the walls, so it suggested a constant flow of endless rearrangement (bitches loved to make their own selections)

- drawing, painting, or photography equipment right out in the open. It could be music stuff if that’s your thing

- sculptural figurines, or drawing props, or some other 3-D art. This is key. It really livens a place up, even one that’s otherwise fairly minimalist

- eye-level lighting, not overhead

- clothes hanging on one of those industrial racks, out in the open, next to open shelves for folded items and shoes (but no visible underwear, so those go into a bin or drawer)

- any table tall enough to be a dining table gets stacked with books or other objects of my interest, thus suggesting that all eating is done elsewhere. Dining tables are for families and women. Bachelors eat out, standing up, or maybe sitting on a sofa or coffee table.

Reply

- Phinn
  February 14, 2013 at 11:05 am
  The art studio minimalist thing was fairly popular. But one time I ended up house-sitting for a friend of a friend, while the owner of the house went on a 2-month trip to Europe. He was an architect, and had a pretty swank pad.

  When I first walked into his place, I assumed he was gay. Big, oversized furniture, in an elaborate whorehouse style. A giant sleigh bed that looked like it was made for the Borgias. Rugs everywhere. Even his coasters were high-end.

  But, apparently, the guy pulled more pussy than he could keep track of.

  So, go with what works for you.

  Reply

19. Anon
    February 14, 2013 at 10:52 am
    I was in a situation years ago where i had to commute into a metro area but already owned a house too far away. So, i setup a bachelor pad. Treated it like a private hotel. You can go a lot cheaper if you do not have to live there, enough to hire a good cleaning lady. The location was a bit noisy at night and the neighborhood was marginal, but ridiculously close to where i was picking up girls. The rent was low because of this. Especially for guys living with their parents, this works. They see you being responsible but not settled yet. You come home when you want so the space takes on a very purposeful layout, pun intended. The fact that you are living so minimally makes you intriguing. For me it also became almost like a monastic haven.

    The lack of any personal connection to the space is very liberating. Whether it be your work or art or the crimson arts, the space will inspire you. You don't realize how many cues there are when you are invested in a space. When you create this type, the girl focuses totally on the image that you create for yourself. I remember mounting and displaying some of my photographic art and bringing the exact book(s) that I intended to read. The mystery used to drive females wild. Their hamsters would spin when they would ask where my stuff was, like extra clothes, other camera equipment, other shoes, you get the idea. "I keep them at the house," would make them crazy. One even thought that i was married and loved the idea, great sex.

    You don't realize how insanely serene it is when you have only exactly what you need for a given stay such as your favorite tea and honey and cup. You have some extras in the small kitchen, but there is no connection to the space. Literally, i could have picked up my computer, camera and bag and abandoned it yet the place looked sharp. You don't realize how annoying keeping house is until you do this. If you don't have a house like i do or live with your parents (actually you should do this anyway), you should inventory your stuff and get a good and secure storage facility contract as your closet. A young apprentice of mine actually seasonally changes his wardrobe at one.

Right now i have rented a room with an interior bath from a lady with a large house that is near some of my action so i don't bring pickups into my house. I have a key and direct hall access, can come and go as i please, 500 per month NYC, in a hot area, heat and electric included. Any young guy can pull this off.

Another way is to have a medium size boat. I did this while in between houses. Just make sure that you know something about boats AND, it must have a great toilet (head) and hot water shower. If you are in a warm climate, this could be your residence full time. You must be in a marina slip for this to work and not in an area where storms can damage you. In other words, you must know something about the whole boating thing. Costs will be a bit higher, budget 14K per year and 20K to get started and the boat must be at least 35 feet. Mine did not even sail. Before you balk at the numbers think of what city living and down payments and broker fees cost on condos and apartment rentals. A guy at a starting salary can do this. Remember girls think that boat means shabby and damp and rotten facilities. When she is surprised by your waterfront condo, you are in. You can take an old sail boat and have all of the exterior painted to look like new. You should also paint a good portion of the interior wood to brighten it up. Oh and I had a cleaning lady for the boat.

Note on cleaning ladies: Most of the high-end exterminators in Manhattan are telling me that when their clients get infestations, it is from the cleaning ladies. Stay away from South American illegals; i use the polish ladies and have been very satisfied.

Reply

20. blah
February 14, 2013 at 8:17 pm
Was that clown pic painted by John Wayne Gacy?

Reply

21. Germanico
February 14, 2013 at 8:23 pm
"No shoes policy" unless its high heels. She has to keep those on at all times.

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

Highlights From The Chris Dorner Manifesto

February 13, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

Chris Dorner is a former LAPD officer who was terminated for reporting that a police officer was beating a suspect. His reward for violating the unwritten "blue line" was to be unceremoniously forced out. Once he took his appeals as far as they would go, he snapped and decided to wage war against the department by killing people associated with the LAPD.

At this time of this writing, he has killed four people and is holed up in a burning cabin. The first victim was Monica Quan, the daughter of the LAPD lawyer that represented him when he fought his dismissal. He killed her because he believed the lawyer sought to protect the department's interests before his own. His second victim was her fiance, who I presume was in the wrong place at the wrong time. His third victim was a police officer who he ambushed at a red light. The fourth was shot down around Big Bear Lake in California.

I took the time to read Dorner's 11,000 word manifesto. Here are the highlights:

> Even with the multiple conversations and ambient noise I heard Officer Magana call an indivdual a nigger again. Now that I had confirmed it, I told Magana not to use that word again. I explained that it was a well known offensive word that should not be used by anyone. He replied, "I'll say it when I want". Officer Burdios, a friend of his, also stated that he would say nigger when he wanted. At that point I jumped over my front passenger seat and two other officers where I placed my hands around Burdios' neck and squeezed. I stated to Burdios, "Don't fucking say that". At that point there was pushing and shoving and we were separated by several other officers. What I should have done, was put a Winchester Ranger SXT 9mm 147 grain bullet in his skull and Officer Magana's skull. The Situation would have been resolved effective, immediately.
>
> […]
>
> The LAPD's actions have cost me my law enforcement career that began on 2/7/05 and ended on 1/2/09. They cost me my Naval career which started on 4/02 and ends on 2/13.
>
> […]
>
> I've lost everything because the LAPD took my name and new I was INNOCENT!!! Capt Phil Tingirides, Justin Eisenberg, Martella, Randy Quan, and Sgt. Anderson all new I was innocent but decided to terminate me so they could continue Ofcr. Teresa Evans career. I know about the meeting between all of you where Evans attorney, Rico, confessed that she kicked Christopher Gettler (excessive force). Your day has come.
>
> […]

> I'm not an aspiring rapper, I'm not a gang member, I'm not a dope dealer, I don't have multiple babies momma's. I am an American by choice, I am a son, I am a brother, I am a military service member, I am a man who has lost complete faith in the system, when the system betrayed, slandered, and libeled me. I lived a good life and though not a religious man I always stuck to my own personal code of ethics, ethos and always stuck to my shoreline and true North. I didn't need the US Navy to instill Honor, Courage, and Commitment in me but I thank them for re-enforcing it. It's in my DNA.
>
> […]
>
> Luckily I don't have to live everyday like most of you. Concerned if the misconduct you were apart of is going to be discovered. Looking over your shoulder, scurrying at every phone call from internal affairs or from the Captains office wondering if that is the day PSB comes after you for the suspects you struck when they were cuffed months/years ago or that $500 you pocketed from the narcotics dealer, or when the other guys on your watch beat a transient nearly to death and you never reported the UOF to the supervisor. No, I don't have that concern, I stood up for what was right but unfortunately have dealt with the reprocussions of doing the right thing and now losing my name and everything I ever stood for.

It's hard not to root for him to get back at those who ruined his career when he worked his job with apparent integrity, but does the punishment he hopes to inflict (death) fit the crime of LAPD corruption? Dorner believes it is. He says, "Unfortunately, I will not be alive to see my name cleared. That's what this is about, my name. A man is nothing with his name."

His manifesto is surprisingly lucid and well-written. I never got the impression that I was reading the words of a maniac, though killing people he doesn't know is maniacal to most. Court records shows that he has never been in trouble with the law.

> Self Preservation is no longer important to me. I do not fear death as I died long ago on 1/2/09. I was told by my mother that sometimes bad things happen to good people. I refuse to accept that.
>
> […]
>
> From 2/05 to 1/09 I saw some of the most vile things humans can inflict on others as a police officer in Los Angeles. Unfortunately, it wasn't in the streets of LA. It was in the confounds of LAPD police stations and shops (cruisers). The enemy combatants in LA are not the citizens and suspects, it's the police officers.
>
> Loading…
> […]
>
> When the truth comes out, the killing stops.

He has given the LAPD an out, but it does not appear that they want to take him alive

(there have been two incidents of trigger happy LAPD gunning down vehicles similar to Dorner's). He can walk into a church, unarmed, but he will still die. He must die so that the issue can be swept under the rug instead of a public trial where LAPD corruption is brought to light.

Personally, I believe he was wronged, a silent victim of department corruption. Most people would ask Dorner to fight via the system, but when it's the system that has ruined his name and doesn't care for the truth, I can understand why he feels there is no other way out but through killing.

> This department has not changed from the Daryl Gates and Mark Fuhrman days. Those officers are still employed and have all promoted to Command staff and supervisory positions. I will correct this error. Are you aware that an officer (a rookie/probationer at the time) seen on the Rodney King videotape striking Mr. King multiple times with a baton on 3/3/91 is still employed by the LAPD and is now a Captain on the police department? Captain Rolando Solano is now the commanding officer of a LAPD police station (West LA division). As a commanding officer, he is now responsible for over 200 officers. Do you trust him to enforce department policy and investigate use of force investigations on arrestees by his officers? Are you aware Evans has since promoted to Sergeant after kicking Mr. Gettler in the face. Oh, you Violated a citizens civil rights? We will promote you.
>
> […]
>
> Those lesbian officers in supervising positions who go to work, day in day out, with the sole intent of attempting to prove your misandrist authority (not feminism) to degrade male officers. You are a high value target.
>
> […]
>
> Those of you who "go along to get along" have no backbone and destroy the foundation of courage. You are the enablers of those who are guilty of misconduct. You are just as guilty as those who break the code of ethics and oath you swore.
>
> […]
>
> I've heard many officers who state they see dead victims as ATV's, Waverunners, RV's and new clothes for their kids. Why would you shed a tear for them when they in return crack a smile for your loss because of the impending extra money they will receive in their next paycheck for sitting at your loved ones crime scene of 6 hours because of the overtime they will accrue. They take photos of your loved ones recently deceased bodies with their cellphones and play a game of who has the most graphic dead body of the night with officers from other divisions.
>
> […]
>
> How do you know when a police officer is lying??? When he begins his sentence with, "based on my experience and training".

> […]
>
> I never had the opportunity to have a family of my own, I'm terminating yours. Quan, Anderson, Evans, and BOR members Look your wives/husbands and surviving children directly in the face and tell them the truth as to why your children are dead.
>
> […]
>
> I have nothing to lose. My personal casualty means nothing. Just alike AAF's, ACM's, and AIF's, you can not prevail against an enemy combatant who has no fear of death. An enemy who embraces death is a lose, lose situation for their enemy combatants.

> The only thing that changes policy and garners attention is death.
>
> […]
>
> You said that I should have kept my mouth shut about another officer's misconduct. Maybe you were right. But I'm not built like others, it's not in my DNA and my history has always shown that. When you view the video of the suspect stating he was kicked by Evans, maybe you will see that I was a decent person after all. I told the truth.
>
> […]
>
> I thank my friends for the awesome shared experiences. I thank the unnamed women I dated over my lifetime for the great and sometimes not so great sex.

The media has interpreted his manifesto differently than what I read. They believe he's fighting against racism and gun control. This makes for an easy motive that fits well in 90 second news stories, but those issues had minor roles in his manifesto (his gun control view is only to limit military grade weapons that even police forces don't use). He does have typical liberal views with his support of Obama and the Clintons, but it's obvious from the manifesto that his crusade is against the wrongs he's been served. In his mind, he's killing based on principle, and he's ready to give his life for that principle. This is what makes him simultaneously dangerous, psychotic, and heroic, all at the same time. I don't agree with him killing people, but I do understand. I hope he survives to tell his story to the public, even if it's from a prison cell.

The Physical Decline of Modern Man

February 13, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

The physical state of modern man is in complete shambles. I know that this isn't ground breaking news to anyone who has actually stepped outside of their front door, but this observation is far from being merely anecdotal anymore. A recent study indicates that by the year 2020, 8 in 10 men in the UK will be considered obese or overweight. In other words, we are just 7 years away from a situation where 80% of the male populace in the UK can be considered an utter disgrace to their gender.

But it wasn't always like this. There was a time when the average man who walked the earth wouldn't die of a massive heart attack after sprinting 100 meters. His gut didn't stick out further than his chest. He could do more than one pull up. In fact, there was a time when the average man was muscular, lean, strong, and could probably kill you with his bare hands (or a sharpened stick).

The story of our feeble sloth is written in our bones. Studies conducted comparing our bones to those of fossil humans reveal that we have lost up to 40% of our bone mass and strength over the past 2 million years. Interestingly, the cause is not genetic. Case in point: the bulbous ends of our bones that form the joints, which are known to be genetically controlled, are still the same size in us as they are in our ancestor Homo erectus. However, where we have lost bone mass has largely been along the shafts of our long bones. This is due to declining levels of muscular load being placed on them. Fortunately, our bones can grow thicker in response to repeated muscular stress. For example, studies indicate that professional tennis players display thicknesses in their upper arm bones similar to that of our ancestor Homo erectus.

The evidence of prehistoric man's physical supremacy over his modern brethren isn't just limited to his bones. For example, archaeologists in Australia studying a set of 23,000 year old fossilized tracks in mud have determined that one individual (who was roughly 6’5”) was running at incredible speeds. The archaeologists calculated his stride length and determined his speed to be 23 miles per hour. Just to put this number into perspective, Usain Bolt (the fastest man on the planet) can hit speeds up to 27 miles per hour during a 100 meter race. Remember, our prehistoric ancestor was running bare foot in the mud!

The incredible athleticism displayed by the prehistoric Australian sprinter likely had more to do with ontogeny than “genetics.” Ontogeny is the process by which an organism grows by interaction with its environment. Prehistoric conditions were brutal, no question. But it was these conditions that allowed prehistoric man to develop such physical capabilities. It was a necessity.

Ontogeny is the same reason why modern man is a physical embarrassment. We have no need to exert ourselves very much these days. Most of our lives are spent sitting in front of a computer in the office. Then we sit in our car and drive home, only to get back and sit on the couch and watch television. Couple this inactivity with a diet rich in calories and you have the recipe for modern man: a shambling mass of flesh that couldn’t fight his way out of a paper bag.

There’s no way the average office worker is carrying that much muscle

But the beauty of all this is that we can change. We can mold our bodies however we want. Do you want to build a strong, athletic body? Go do heavy back squats supersetted with 50 meter sprints until you puke. In other words, change your environmental stimulus. There’s no excuse. It is time to stem the tide of suck.

Read More: How To Workout Correctly

27 Responses to The Physical Decline of Modern Man

1. Parth
   February 14, 2013 at 2:30 pm

Could you provide us with sources for the information you provided? Especially concerning the 6ft5 guy who could run incredibly fast?

Reply

- liam
  February 14, 2013 at 4:56 pm
  I've read it in a book called manthropology. It also has loads of evidence showing how our ancestors would of pissed all over even the best athletes of today. Interesting book. Check it.

  Reply

  - Barrani
    February 14, 2013 at 6:01 pm
    Do take some of its claims with a pinch of salt but otherwise I definitely agree that we are much more feeble than our ancestors were.

  - Parth
    February 14, 2013 at 8:00 pm
    I looked it up on amazon. There was one review (only 10 reviews total) that seemed to trash the book pretty hard:

    http://www.amazon.com/review/R16LG2DDB5DNZT/ref=cm_cr_pr_viewpnt#R16LG2DDB5DNZT

    I wouldn't be surprised if we've physically declined throughout the ages, but do you know of other sources that could make up for Manthropology's weaknesses?

  - liam
    February 15, 2013 at 12:11 pm
    I cant remember the details exactly but their's no doubt the rowers back in the day would of made a mockery out of the rowers today, and the wrestling and fights back in the day would of made UFC look like boys brigade.The books more about making the point that there's a good chance we aren't at the pinnacle of our physical prime and a have turned into a cauldron of bubbling estogen and makes a good case for it even if some of the sources are a bit sketchy.

2. Rael
February 14, 2013 at 2:32 pm
You mean it's not just the women who are overweight and out of shape?
Jeez – who knew?

Reply

3. David
February 14, 2013 at 2:36 pm
I agree mostly with this article, but I disagree that the bulk of the problem is with physical activity. In fact, studies of Aboriginal Australians have shown that they're obese when they exercise in modern Australia, but when they return to the wild and eat natural foods, they're LESS active and yet they become lean and robust like the guys in this photo.

What's the solution? The paleo diet! Check out the great book 'The Primal Blueprint' or the great documentaries 'Fat Head' and 'In Search of the Perfect Human Diet'.

Here's an Englishman who was one of these fat Westerners, he went paleo, and now look at him!

http://www.dailymail.co.uk/femail/article-2268236/Morbidly-obese-IT-consultant-loses-EIGHT-stone-months-Caveman-plan-refused-life-insurance.html

The paleo diet is HUGE in the MMA community, and professional athletes from Aaron Rodgers to Kobe Bryant have all had huge performance upswings when switching to it.

Reply

- anon1
February 14, 2013 at 3:17 pm
paleo is huge in every elite community. look at how niko djokovic started his crazy spree of winning multiple grandslams after beginning a gluten free diet

Reply

  - DRCP
February 16, 2013 at 11:25 am

I bet his winning streak was aided by Vitamin-S as well, which is popular in the tennis community nowadays. The twink in the picture at the top of the page looks a lot more muscular than tennis players ever have despite engaging in hours of catabolic activity every day. I wonder why?

Most of these stories about elite athletes getting on some retarded diet are a cover story for their drug usage. If you believe otherwise, you were probably one of this credulous fools who thought Lance was clean all along.

If you want to get bigger, squat more weight. It's as simple as that.

4. direct
February 14, 2013 at 3:24 pm
I've been living paleo for over five years. I have concluded that the being slimmer than 95% of the room is all the "game" you need.

Reply

5. Loc
February 14, 2013 at 3:27 pm
A must see when talking about the obesity statistics and the environmental causes of obesity:
http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=evcNPfZlrZs

Reply

6. Red Pill Woman
February 14, 2013 at 3:28 pm
That ancestor was probably running for his life!

Reply

7. kwash
February 14, 2013 at 3:32 pm
Poor shout – I thought that this was another article by Basileos whatsisname.. Why pick on poor old Blighty when roughly 6 out of 10 Canucks can be considered, right now, to be an 'utter disgrace'?

Reply

8. kwash
February 14, 2013 at 3:34 pm
Ahem, the link:
http://www.forbes.com/2007/02/07/worlds-fattest-countries-forbeslife-cx_ls_0208worldfat_2.html

Reply

9. Stuki Moi
February 14, 2013 at 3:37 pm
I'd suggest we temper our enthusiasm for environments requiring one to be a 6'5″ Usain Bolt merely in order to survive, by noting heavy heads and big, resource hungry brains become liabilities in such environments. It's a bit like birds; it's not like they benefit per se from being stupid, but the added weight of a less stupid brain extracts bigger costs in agility, than it gives back as benefits in ability to reason.

Also, in environments that harsh, as soon as Mr. TallBolt hits 35, and his sprinting speed drops below 22 mph; well, goodbye Mr. soon to be DeadBolt.

That's not to say a moderate amount of exercise is not beneficial. But I'd be very concerned about exercise regimens so intense they interfere with intellectual developments; and doubly so by supposedly "healthy" diets that my realistically reduce glucose availability for the brain. The latter is very hard to measure, since it's highest functions, the creative ones, cannot easily be quantified. But all intuition and experience from other areas, indicate that the kind of spontaneity and nondirected "action" that forms the basis of creativity, are more likely to happen in an environment of resource plenty.

That's not to say being a fat, lazy fatso is a positive, however.

Reply

10. whatsamattayou
February 14, 2013 at 3:50 pm
ever watch the movie wall-e? that's our near future.

Reply

11. Brock
February 14, 2013 at 3:54 pm
These 8 out of 10 obese men in the UK must be at home on the couch behind the telly, because I have been living in the UK for the last 3 months and I do not see this when walking around town or on the streets. Even the lower class and ‘chav’ men aren’t obese and from what I understand, those in poverty typically tend to be more obese. My guess, based on what I’ve seen with my own eyes is maybe 3 or 4 out of 10, if that. I’m, not disputing the statistic, just interesting to hear what the figures are compared to what I actually see.
Reply
    - liam
    February 14, 2013 at 5:02 pm
    I second that.Pubs and clubs I go to(South East London) there’s hardly any advantage at being in half decent shape as the majority of guys my age(mid 20′s) are.
    Reply
12. C in T.O.
February 14, 2013 at 4:28 pm
I wonder if the overweight / obese determination is determined only with respect to BMI. BMI can be unfair to men who are both short and very muscular. If you are 5 ‘ 8″ and weigh 195 lbs + of pure muscle with a 5% bodyfat (think a short NFL running back) you would be obese according to BMI.
Reply
    - whatsamattayou
    February 14, 2013 at 4:41 pm
    that’s true, but the majority of men aren’t built like that. outliers don’t affect the average much.
    Reply

- Brandon 2.0
  February 14, 2013 at 11:41 pm
  For a 5’8 tall man at 5% body fat and lots of muscle, 145-160 lbs would be optimal. Anything further and people will suspect you’re geared.

  The tribal men all have strong and proprtioned physics, naturally developed without the muscle chiseling technology we take for granted today.

  Reply

13. Jason
    February 14, 2013 at 11:03 pm
    The benefit of today, however, is that you have the potential to be stronger than any other human being in history given the fact that we have the resources for vast amounts of food, sleep, and superior methods for building strength and muscle.

    I would say that most gym rats today could beat the dog-shit out of any of our half-starved ancestors.

    Reply

    - liam
      February 16, 2013 at 6:42 pm
      I hope your joking.

      Reply

14. Ross
    February 14, 2013 at 11:48 pm
    Two books worth noting and applying the knowledge when done reading

    “Primal Body, Primal Mind” http://www.primalbody-primalmind.com/?page_id=1394

    And “Eat Stop Eat” by Brad Polin.

    Reply

15. XzY

February 15, 2013 at 12:59 am
Survival of the fittest…

Reply

16. dannyfrom504
February 15, 2013 at 5:06 am
yup. being in the military, i work with some pretty hardcore guys. if you croos a line they will swing on you.

got into 2 fights last year. not proud of that, but it happened. there's a great scene in fightclub where tyler tell the guys to get into a fight and lose, only to find that most men simply won't fight. even with adequate instigation.

hunting, fishing, basic survival skills: all lost characteristics to most men today.

as for the paleo talk, i follow it to an extent, but i have a buddy 5'11″, 200lbs, 8% body fat. he lifts weights all the time and eats EVERYTHING. for him it's all calorie absorption to build muscle.

Reply

17. corvinus
February 15, 2013 at 2:56 pm
In this society, one has to make time to exercise at least an hour a day so as to not turn into a blob, rather than getting one's exercise in the course of one's day by other means… how is that different from being on the space station?

Reply

Leave a Reply Cancel reply

Your email address will not be published.

Name

Email

Website

Comment

You may use these HTML tags and attributes:  <abbr title=""> <acronym title="">  <blockquote cite=""> <cite> <code>   <q cite=""> <strike>

Post Comment

The Truth About AIDS & Heterosexual Transmission

February 14, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

---

Always use protection, we're told. Gonorrhea, Syphilis, "The Clap"… they're all real, and usually quite treatable if caught early. But the biggest, baddest venereal disease has long been HIV, and the debilitating disease it causes, AIDS. Since the 1980s, we've been inundated with talk of AIDS and the great threat it poses. But the truth has never been told in mainstream channels, in clear and simple terms: HIV and AIDS are overwhelmingly the province of homosexual men, injectable drug users, and the people who sleep with them.

In America, the Center for Disease Control (CDC) estimates there are just over one million people with HIV. According to the CDC, HIV is at a higher prevalence among homosexual men and intravenous drug users, as compared to heterosexuals. Men who have had sex with men (MSM) within the last five years account for 78% of new male infections, 63% of all new infections, yet MSM are only about 2.0% of the entire population. Once you partition out the HIV rates of the various groups, using data buried in CDC tables, the differences are stark. Below, I've presented a series of graphics using the data from Table 17a, page 58, to illustrate the patterns of HIV infection.

Who Is Infected?

This chart illustrates who makes up those infected with HIV – for instance, a quarter of those who are infected with HIV are white men who contracted it from having sex with men. ('Sober' is used here to mean that HIV was not contracted through the use of intravenous drugs.) Gay black and Hispanic men are responsible for another 15% and 10% respectively, while intravenous drug users account for another 22%, 5.8 percentage points of whom are men who have sex with men. All told, some 73% of HIV infections are accounted for by men who have sex with men and intravenous drug users, groups that comprise less than 5% of the US population. Even for someone who contracts HIV through heterosexual contact, there's a good chance she got it from a bisexual man or a needle drug addict. As you may have noticed, a very large proportion of the populace is lumped into that 'Other' category. Below is a pie chart of the same groups, except the size of their respective slices indicates their share of the US population as a whole.

How Common Is HIV?

The simple pie charts above don't demonstrate the prevalence of HIV. I estimated the prevalence of each sub-group, using the CDC data, and these reveal that HIV and AIDS are very rare among straight, drug-free whites and Asians. Hispanic and black straight men are at higher risk, but still vastly below that of homosexual men and intravenous drug users. Comprehensive data on how HIV is being transmitted among heterosexuals is not available in the CDC report. But you can be sure that much of it is occurring because of people sleeping with high risk groups (a woman sleeping with a promiscuous homosexual man, or a man having unprotected anal sex with a heroin addict). Research has consistently shown that even among street hookers, HIV is rare to non-existent so long as the hookers were not using intravenous drugs.

Among men who don't sleep with men and don't do intravenous drugs, the prevalence of HIV is about 0.1%, while the comparable figure for gay men is 16%. Below are the rates of infection for various groups, between the ages of 18 and 54, inclusive. As you can see, straight, sober men hardly register; the only straight sober group with a prevalence above 1% are black women. Injectable drug users are represented only in the Injectable

Drug Using categories, and not the racial groupings.

Loading...

How Does The Rate Of Infection Compare Among Groups?

To give you a firmer idea of how the risk compares between groups, I divided the prevalence of HIV among all groups and divided them by the prevalence among sober straight white men. For example, a man who has sex with men is 700 to 800 times more likely to have HIV than a sober straight white man, the reference group. Below are four charts, one for straight men, one for straight women, one for men having sex with men, plus one chart with all of them in a single chart for easy comparison. All racial groups below only pertain to non-IDU users; IDU users of all races are included in the IDU-specific groups. Though not covered here, rates of syphilis are also vastly higher among men who have sex with men, as compared to heterosexuals, a difference of more than 100-fold.

Relative HIV Risk, Gay Men, 18-54
Men
41
Gay Men, Total
770
Gay Injectible Drug Users
3000
Sober Gay Men
710
Black
1700
Hispanic
840
White
590
Asian
210
Reference (SSWM)
1.0
0.0
500.0
1000.0
1500.0
2000.0
2500.0
3000.0
3500.0
HIV Infection Rate, Relative To Sober Straight White Men (SSWM)

Relative HIV Risk, Straight Men, 18-54
Straight Men, Total
10.5
Injectible Drug Users
200
Sober Straight Men
4.7
Black
25
Hispanic
5.2
White (Reference)
1.0
Asian
1.0
Non-Black
1.8
0.0
50.0
100.0
150.0
200.0
250.0
HIV Infection Rate, Relative To Sober Straight White Men

Transmission From Women To Men Via Vaginal Sex Is ‘Inefficient’

A study of sub-Saharan African heterosexual couples where one partner had HIV found that typically only one in 900 acts of unprotected sex would transmit the virus. Stanford School of Medicine’s Dr. Mark Holodniy, when asked how heterosexual men contract HIV, responded “I suspect that some of it relates to whether these men are truly hetero or bisexual, and whether injection drug use is a risk factor.” Provided you are not having sex with men, intravenous drug users, or women who sleep with such people, the risk of getting HIV is infinitesimally small.

Why are these facts kept from the light of day? One can only speculate. Homosexuals are a favorite of the modern left, and these figures would draw scrutiny to their behavior. For instance, why does such a debilitating disease continue to be so rampant among homosexuals? Why is it still spreading, at about 30,000 cases per year among men who have sex with men? Are they really as monogamous as gay marriage advocates would have us believe? On occasion, the media will admit to tiny cracks in the nice narrative of "Homosexuals, Just Like The Rest of Us" – a study covered in the New York Times reveals that 50% of gay marriages are 'open marriages.' Incorporating figures like these into our mental image of homosexuals is sure to raise some thorny questions of policy and propriety, a conversation that the left simply does not want. Meanwhile the mainstream right is too cowardly to pose much opposition.

Read Next: The World Is A Cockblocker

Why It’s Time For Some People To Put Down The Race Card

February 14, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

People are still talking about this year’s Super Bowl commercials. Aside from the most obviously controversial advert, one other spot is generating a lot of conversation. That ad came courtesy of Volkswagen:

The chattering classes immediately began to try drumming up controversy based on the fact that the ad shows white people speaking with Jamaican accents. This silly critique shows what I consider to be a remarkable irony: in this effort to play the race card where it does not need to be played, these people show the same kind of ignorance that many of the racists they criticize are guilty of.

My mother actually introduced me to this commercial on Facebook prior to the Super Bowl. She loved it, and so did I. Most every other Jamaican I’ve seen has no problem with it. Yet we have Americans claiming offense on our behalf.

Aside from the fact that the Jamaicans themselves generally have no issues with this ad, there are a couple of other reasons why the “racist” calls are nothing short of pure fuckery:

1. “Jamaican” is a nationality, not a race.

Culture and nationality can transcend racial boundaries. You would think that those who loudly claim to oppose racism, given their commitment to egalitarianism and opposition to rigid box definitions/generalizations about groups of people, would be able to understand this and perhaps grasp the possibility that not every Jamaican must be black. You would be wrong.

2. Going off of point one, there are many non-black Jamaicans.

Here is a site that catalogs photo albums of major club/party events in Jamaica. You can see a lot of young Jamaicans there. They are disproportionately from the island's socio-economic elite (those are the folks who frequent these particular events most), but still Jamaicans all the same.

What do you see?

Loading...

JAMAICA DEFENCE FORCE

White Jamaicans. Chinese Jamaicans. Indo-Jamaicans (Jamaicans of East Indian heritage). Black Jamaicans. And many more people who are some combination of these.

There are hundreds of thousands of these people running around in Jamaica, and they all have the same Jamaican accent you'd hear from Afro-Jamaicans. Jamaica (and, for that matter, the rest of the Caribbean) is far more diverse than people think.

Our national motto is "Out of many, one people". We take that seriously, and I don't appreciate watching idiots in the media subvert it in order to drum up needless controversy.

In this episode we see the limits of the race card and how it can be played. So quick have certain progressives and supposed anti-racists come to play the card that they now begin to show the same level of ignorance and offensive generalization their more racialist opponents are said to be guilty of. They place artificial divisions among peoples based on their own incomplete understandings of them, and in doing so foster some of the very division they claim to be fighting.

In working so hard not to offend, they end up being more offensive.

Multiracialism is a foundation of Jamaican culture (hence the whole “Out of many, one people” thing). We take that as a serious matter of national pride. Supposedly this is the kind of thing the folks opposed to this commercial would support given their opposition to “racism.” Yet their critiques imply a Jamaican identity that isn’t multiracial as it is in reality, but strictly mono-racial, one in which black Jamaicans are the only “real” Jamaicans.

You cannot knock down boundaries by erecting artificial ones. I’m all for pointing out instances of racism when they appear as racism is still an issue, but such efforts will soon be futile if people continue to play the race card where it is unwarranted. One can only cry wolf so many times before they are ignored.

When these people come to understand this, perhaps the irrational use of the race card in instances like this will decline. Until then, people need to sit back and just enjoy the commercial.

Read Next: Racism Is A Feminist’s Best Friend

Another Girl Succumbs To The Feminist Cult

February 14, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A couple weeks ago I highlighted the case of Paige Gorsak, a Canadian girl who has fallen by the wayside to stump for her feminist masters. With just a little bit of effort into her appearance and a sound diet, I argued, she could easily be an attractive woman who has no trouble finding a man willing to provide for her.

Today I share another case from Canada that is even more tragic. A bonafide cutie has corrupted her mind and soul to such a degree with feminist thought that she is more masculine and angry than yours truly. She attacked me on Facebook, unprovoked, and my attempts at a pleasant chat did nothing to tame her unbridled rage. Here is the conversation we had:

Batoul Jaber — 2 hours ago

Reading through your posts, I was seriously repulsed. I really hope that you have a daughter one day so you could come to the realization that women are not to be treated as objects nor as inferior to men. I also highly suggest you seek some kind of psychological help for your obvious mommy issues and any other self-esteem issues you may be dealing with.

Roosh V — about an hour ago

Where you from?

Batoul Jaber — about an hour ago

Canada.

Roosh V — 46 minutes ago

Toronto? Lot of girls there are angry at men.

Batoul Jaber — 45 minutes ago

It doesn't matter where in canada.

The fact that you call yourself a man is pathetic. You can't generalize about an entire sex and I am not angry at you or individuals that share your views, I actually feel sorry for you.

Clearly something is wrong with you or someone did something to you for you to have these views on women and I honestly wish you the best of luck in resolving these issues.

Roosh V — 16 minutes ago

Did you see my interview on Ukrainian tv?

Batoul Jaber — 16 minutes ago

I think so, or it might have been polish

Batoul Jaber — 15 minutes ago

if its in english, you could link me to it.

Roosh V 13 minutes ago

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cUDQQH_5C5M

What do you think of my cappuccino sipping at 0:52. I think it's smooth. And check out my eyelashes when I blink. Many girls would kill for that

"Innovative Casanova" On Ukrainian Television

Good times.

Share

Batoul Jaber 13 minutes ago

yea i watched that

dont understand the language

you're a pathetic excuse for a human being

Roosh V 11 minutes ago

Why you so angry like a man? When was the last time you got laid? be honest

Batoul Jaber 11 minutes ago

like a man?

and I don't think that is any of your business

I'm a beautiful, outgoing, educated and driven young women and I truly do not need sex to validate that.

Roosh V 10 minutes ago

I'll be the judge of your beauty. Looking through your photos now

Batoul Jaber 9 minutes ago

good luck with that. My profile is private and you can judge all you want but I don't care what you think of me because I am probably the most confident girl you will ever encounter. You tell your "men" to be emotional rocks. I was born a rock buddy, literally nothing could break me

Roosh V 8 minutes ago

That's what you think. Three photos are visible. I'm analyzing them now

Batoul Jaber 8 minutes ago

My physical attributes are not what I'm here to discuss

I'm just making it clear that I do not appreciate the way you objectify women and that you should seriously check your outlook on life because it cannot be healthy to live this way also i seriously want to know what kind of women would ever give you the time of day

Roosh V 6 minutes ago

Beauty is the only value you have. You'll realize this in 10 years.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/301516898615586816

It's going to be a close call between you and the girl on the left, I figure

> Twitter / rooshv: If you could only bang one ...
> twitter.com
> Instantly connect to what's most important to you. Follow your friends, experts, favorite celebrities, and breaking news.

Share

Batoul Jaber 7 minutes ago

I cannot believe you

I'm reporting this.

and no in 10 years ill be an established lawyer in NYC

This was the tweet I sent her, linking to a photo on Facebook of her and her friends:

> If you could only bang one of these girls, which would it be? (pic) ow.ly/hFfNf
> — Roosh (@rooshv) February 13, 2013

I found it humorous that this independent, strong, outgoing, educated, driven, beautiful girl, with the endurance of a rock that can never be broken, immediately started threatening me after a single tweet. I posted the story on the forum, where we tried to look inside her motives, needs, and most importantly, her appearance. As you can see from these two photos, she is not an unattractive girl:

There are a lot of good comments in the thread, but this one stands out:

> It’s like she had a little handbook of feminism next to her when she was writing that.
>
> Book: “First tell him you feel sorry for him”
>
> Girl: “‘I…feel…sorry…for…you’. Okay, what’s next?”
>
> Book: “Once you’re done with that, you’ve made him feel smaller. Better kick him > while he's down. Tell him he has mother issues."

>
> G: "Hey, yeah! Great idea! type type type That'll get him.....WAIT! What's this?! He didn't attack back?! Fuck, he called me out on my looks! Now what?!"
>
> Loading...
> Book: "Proceed to chapter 478".
>
> G: "Okay, phew. They have a chapter for this. blows dust off
>
> Let's see...ah! Tell him his outlook on life is shitty and he is a creep and that women clearly don't give him any time at all.
>
> Hmm..but I suppose his cappuccino sipping is quite smooth, and he does have quite nice fluttery eyelashs...hmmm
>
> NO! Remember the book!"
>
> Book: "Remember girl, you are a rock, an emotional rock. You can't be beaten"
>
> G: "YEAH! Fuck you Roosh! Not even the hundred mile an hour winds at the top of Mount Kilimanjaro could rock this rock! type type type"
>
> Roosh: "I'm throwing your meat to my wolves to see who they want the most"
>
> G: "Noooo! I'm telling! Daddy!!!! I'm gonna be a lawyer dammit!!!!"

Along with this:

> "I'm reporting you."
>
> It doesn't occur to her that she'll be reporting you to the MEN she needs to enforce rules that were made by the MEN made who made Twitter to begin with.
>
> She just undid her own point about being strong as a rock with that statement. Feminists are only as strong as men they can get to help them.
>
> Also, I'm tired of the "personal as political" meme they keep throwing out: "I hope you have a daughter who..." "What if it was you mother?!" Blah blah blah. People DID objectify my (formerly MILF) mother, and so fucking what? And if I had a daughter, I'd want guys to think she was hot.
>
> What is the opposite of all that? You'd want to women in your life to be sexless little worker bees, slaving away all day to make someone else rich?

One final attempt to make right was met with a fake apology:

This troll job reinforces the idea that a feminist is nothing—absolutely nothing—without the power of men behind her. The police officers who take away husbands for “domestic abuse” are men. The judges who give onerous rulings against dads are men. The publishers who publish feminist talking points on major media outlets are men. The lawmakers who write one-sided marriage laws are men. The university chancellors who allow women’s studies classes to misinform students on their campuses are men. They all enable girls like our misguided cupcake above to stupidly attack men such as myself, and by responding in kind, we only attack the symptom of the disease, not the raging, pus-riddled infection inside. The reason that—in spite of the ongoing war against feminism—they continue to have great power is simply because the men behind them remain untouched.

MGTOW Make More Sense Than MRA's

February 15, 2013 | by Harry | Link | Original Link

There has been a gradual awakening among men. Over the last decade, the ease of access to information that would typically be excluded from mainstream media has allowed fringe ideas to flourish. The mens rights movement in particular has come along in leaps and bounds, much of it initially spurred on by average guys who were just looking to get laid at first. Evidence has been gradually compiled and built up to the point where rational men have begun to realize that while they need to improve themselves and offer more, there is indeed a real underlying problem with western society and western women. There is no need to go into any great detail on how destructive feminism has been to men, women, the family or society as whole (I would only be preaching to the converted here) However, men as a whole are gradually starting to realize that they are getting a pretty raw deal.

The Mens Rights Activists have gained some traction of late and they have their hearts in the right place. I just fear that it's a complete waste of time trying to campaign for any meaningful change. Our systems of education and educational institutions, throughout the Western world, are so liberally biased that they have become nothing short of indoctrination camps, churning out armies of students and gullible chodes who take up employment in media, government, civil service, education, and all manner of positions where their beliefs dictate their activities and actions.

Feminism's foundations are based in egalitarianism, which means that for MRA's to find any sort of mainstream recognition they are going to have to prove that discrimination against men is not justified, if you can even force them to concede that there is widespread discrimination in the first place. MRA's, much like any other politically incorrect movement, simply do not control modern language or have any influence on it. Which means for every valid argument made, the counter argument will be accusations of bigotry, paranoia and bitterness. There is no rational debate to ever be had, only the inevitable outcome where you will be shamed into silence regardless of how sound an argument you make. It has become an exercise in futility, because movements based on egalitarian principles are often irrational movements based on an irrational premise held together by irrational arguments, yet they are regarded as politically correct and and infallible regardless.

Simply put, you cannot beat cultural Marxists at their own game when they constantly redefine the rules at their whim, and you cannot discredit feminism as a movement when its foundations are rooted in extreme egalitarian principle either. Feminism is one cog in a huge machine and you are not fighting feminism alone, you are fighting a particularly irrational pattern of thought that pervades most egalitarian principles, of which feminism is one just aspect. All the logical arguments, backed up with all the empirical evidence in the world is simply never going to challenge an entire ideology that is based on nothing more than good feelings and wishful thinking.

The best form of protest from men is rather simple, and it can be summed up best as simple indifference. Men built the world. They built the systems that run the world. They developed the philosophies those systems are built from. They invent the tools that help them build those systems. Everything from basic modern conveniences to necessities like food and water are only made available because somewhere a man is getting shit done or because he solved a problem that needed fixing. This is a mans world because we built it. Every brick and every nail.

Loading...

There is a reason why the Googles of the world are not being started by women or why the cure for cancer probably wont come from a woman either. There are reasons why men need to dig the ditches and pour the concrete. It's because at the end of the day there is a natural order of things that no amount of social engineering is ever going to change. Attempts to do so will only result in eventual systemic collapse, which is why this current social experiment is on borrowed time. Feminists and modern-day politicians buying votes are eventually going to run out of other people's money, and when they do there is simply not going to be a way to fund the numerous programs required that allow women to compete with men or survive without them. Their ideology was never based on reality and has been built on the foundations of prosperity that were laid by men in the first place.

Which is why the "Men Going Their Own Way" movement that has sprung up may indeed be the best form of protest we have, along with being the most realistic. I was skeptical at first and thought it extreme, but upon reflection over the years I have come to realize that there is no better form of peaceful protest than our indifference. As a philosophy in itself, its entire purpose is one of protest through inaction. The bottom line is that men are simply being taken for granted now, and it's reached the point where men are really faced with few options.

They can embrace the status quo, which marginalises them to the detriment of society. They can protest, which leads to substantial conflict as progressives reject the emergence of what they would classify as a movement based on hatred and bigotry. Or they can simply eject, which essentially leaves women and society to fend for itself without men breaking their backs for the cause selflessly. All options lead to systemic collapse anyway, the last option though is the least painful for men and one that teaches everyone a damn good lesson along the way.

If women are leaving the kitchen and the family, then men need to leave the building and the city. You can do this by simply living for yourself and acting no differently to the army of self-absorbed, entitled, narcissistic bitches that are being produced in droves. Live the carefree, selfish life women lead instead. Make everything in your life about you and your feelings, and what suits you as an individual, rather than your community. You have no obligation to society other than living within the law, and you are free to move to a place where the laws are more suitable for you if you wish.

Women and society have taken men for granted for too long, and the selfless actions of men are not appreciated as much as they are outright demanded now.

Fuck that, you don't owe anyone shit. Your loyalty should lie with your family and with your friends who return your loyalty, but that is as far as it should go . Do what you want and put yourself first now. Your acts of selflessness are no longer appreciated, they are resented and therefore wasted. If you want to play video games everyday or spend your free time fixing cars, do it without shame. If you want to notch up 200 club sluts or spend your spare time hunting, do it without shame. If you want to marry and have kids, do it because its what you want, not because you feel society or anyone else expects it of you, and do it on your god damned terms or not at all.

This has begun already, even if it does not seem like a conscious decision many men have made. Underneath the surface, there is massive undercurrent of inaction and we are seeing it in the gradual decline of the west as a whole. Men are checking out. Men are rejecting marriage or putting it off and marriage rates are in decline. We are seeing the emergence of shaming language like "Peter Pan Syndrome" or the media demanding that men "Man Up," which just shows how more and more men are going their own way, and they are scared shitless. We will probably see things like bachelor taxes in our lifetime as demographics change to the point where tax revenue declines, and expect political pressure to be heaped on men as everyone gets more hysterical.

Pump them and dump them boys, let God sort them out.

Read Next: Best of the Manosphere: A Note To My Son

Marriage Is Just Plain Tedious

February 15, 2013 | by The Quiet Rebel | Link | Original Link

---

Marriage Is Just Plain Tedious

The above clip is from the movie "Slaughterhouse Five" and to quickly surmise this comical excerpt: the protagonist's wife goes ape-shit when she finds out her husband's plane, on way to a convention, crash lands. She frantically gets in her car and ends up killing herself while en route to the hospital. This film is a classic, so if you get the chance I'd recommend seeing it. In the movie the wife is a chubby, and in a few different scenes she insists to her husband that she is going to lose weight but never does. But this is not to diss this woman entirely, because she genuinely loved her man. But as sweet as this woman demonstrated to be, she was simply your garden variety bag of hormones, and became completely unglued in a crisis situation.

Alright, the video is an absurd example, however, in the final analysis I contend that even under the best of circumstances, and with women who have the best of intentions, marriage is a raw deal for men.

Now I have to be honest and say that I have never been married so I cannot speak as an expert on this whereas the opinions of men who are or have been married are more qualified then mine. But I can say I have been in enough long term relationships to know that I would never want to to take that jump. One popular like-minded thinker, Fred Reed weighs in on this topic in his essay "To Marry, Or Not? That's Easy". He's happily married to a Mexicana and lives in Guadalajara so his criticisms about marriage apply in America and the Western World. And as a result of having some years on all of us, he offers good wisdom:

> The question is simply, "Why marry?" As a young man full of dangerous steroids, your answer will probably be, "Ah, because her hair is like corn silk under an August moon; her lips are as rubies and her teeth, pearls; and her smile would make a dead man cry." This amounts to, "I'm horny," with elaborations. It is as it ought to be. The race continues because maidens are glorious, and striplings both desperate and unwise. (…) Note, incidentally, that by the time October rolls around, corn silk is shriveled and brown (…) soon she will look like a fireplug with cellulite. Once the packaging deteriorates, there had better be something to get you through the next thirty years. Usually there isn't.

Reed's remarks represent an already accepted truism. For any of you over age 35 you need only think of some super cutie you knew from high school or college. Can you picture her now? Good. Now go do a search for her on facebook; she's probably married and if she posted a current photo of herself enjoy staring at the train wreck that some poor bastard got stuck with. I never envy ~~slaves~~ husbands. In fact the word 'husband' is synonymous with that scene from another movie titled “Full Metal Jacket ” where the company was standing around a couple of deceased fellow soldiers, and one guy looks at the dead and says “Better you than me!” You really have to be willing to commit the ~~suicide~~ sacrifice. The decision to marry has to be well thought out, and you must be prepared for what awaits you. Maybe it might be worth it, but most likely it will not be.

The problem for marriage goes beyond seeing your wife turn into a 400 lb. gastropod. Reed goes on:

> Women are more eager than men to enter marriage, and more eager to leave it — with the kids, the house, and the child support. It won’t be amicable, not after seven years. You will be astonished at how ruthless she will be, how well she knows the law, and how utterly hostile to divorcing fathers the law is. (…..) You don’t understand how bad the divorce courts are. You probably don’t know what “imputed income” is. You think that “joint custody” means “joint custody.” Think again. Quite possibly you will have to support her while she moves with your kids to Fukuoka with an Air Force colonel she met in a meat bar. (…) In short, marriage often means turning twenty-five years of your life into smoking wreckage. Yes, happy marriages exist (I personally know of one) and there are the somnolent marriages of habitual contentment or, perhaps, of quiet resignation. But the odds aren’t good.

I would replace “you will have to support her while she moves with your kids to Fukuoka with an Air Force colonel she met in a meat bar” with: “you will have to support her while she and her new boyfriend, a coke dealing piece-of-shit ex-con live it up in your house” which is more accurate to the current zeitgeist.

Perhaps I am being too negative, but to me it seems to be obvious that there is nothing that will drain a man quicker of his finances, emotion, and life force then playing the role of human D-Cell battery to a female. It is your right to ask “What do I get out of all of this?”, and please do ask yourself this question and weigh all the pros and all the cons. It is also wise to realize that people, times and circumstances can and do change. It’s the human condition. And like many of us who have our eyes open we have seen waay too many unions fail to never question that marriage is extremely high risk.

The Wikipedia article about Reed describes his writings as “…articles speak of a yearning for a simpler time when America was a free country and urge the reader to forgo the pursuit of money and comforts in favor of a cultured life of the mind” which in my opinion, is what we as men should be shooting for as a replacement for marriage. No doubt it is easier said then done. As much as we desire a good woman by our side, that is becoming more difficult with each passing day when one sees what is happening to women world wide not just through culture, but through contemporary mainstream technologies as well.

For female companionship, do so in a very superficial way. Take care with your interactions with women. For starters, pay close attention at the laws where you live. In most places in the USA co-habitation with a woman is considered De facto marriage.

When you guys break up ("when" not "if"—it ain't going to last forever), all the financial ass raping sentences that would apply for the guy who did it legal will apply to you should you and her share the same address. And literally it could easily mean just your and her name on the same mailbox even though the two of you never actually lived under same roof.

Short term relations work best. When to leave is easy: as soon as she brings up the notion of either marriage or moving in together then it's time to bail. If you do not, then the sound byte along the lines of "This relationship is not progressing" BS will slowly repeat and repeat and start getting worse and worse, like Chinese water torture. As difficult as it may be for some, a man is still better off alone then to be stuck with a nagging shrew or with financial alimony / palimony servitude.

As far as marriage is concerned the USA is an empty shell of was once a great country, whose women are beyond repair. What's that popular joke about marriage that I heard? Oh yes: instead of getting married you could simply find some fat bitch you hate and buy her a house because that, at the end of the day, is what you will end up with.

I also understand too that for many of the readers here on this forum an article such as this is simply beating a dead horse in the ground, but as long as there are men marching off to the gallows of matrimony, we need to continue to repeat the painfully obvious.

Read Next: I Fell In Love And Got Married

25 Great Quotes From German Philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer

February 15, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

You may have first been exposed to German philosopher Arthur Schopenhauer with his essay On Women, which I reviewed a year ago. It was originally found in his Studies In Pessimism compilation which includes eight other essays. Here are my favorite quotes from those essays:

1.

> …the greatest wisdom is to make the enjoyment of the present the supreme object of life; because that is the only reality, all else being merely the play of thought. On the other hand, such a course might just as well be called the greatest folly: for that which in the next moment exists no more, and vanishes utterly, like a dream, can never be worth a serious effort.

2.

> …a man never is happy, but spends his whole life in striving after something which he thinks will make him so; he seldom attains his goal, and when he does, it is only to be disappointed; he is mostly shipwrecked in the end, and comes into harbor with mast and rigging gone. And then, it is all one whether he has been happy or miserable; for his life was never anything more than a present moment always vanishing; and now it is over.

3.

> …to gain anything we have longed for is only to discover how vain and empty it is; and even though we are always living in expectation of better things, at the same time we often repent and long to have the past back again.

4.

> Every satisfaction he attains lays the seeds of some new desire, so that there is no end to the wishes of each individual will.

5.

> …if the lives of men were relieved of all need, hardship and adversity; if everything they took in hand were successful, they would be so swollen with arrogance that, though they might not burst, they would present the spectacle of > unbridled folly—nay, they would go mad. And I may say, further, that a certain amount of care or pain or trouble is necessary for every man at all times. A ship without ballast is unstable and will not go straight.

6.

> He who lives to see two or three generations is like a man who sits some time in the conjurer's booth at a fair, and witnesses the performance twice or thrice in succession. The tricks were meant to be seen only once; and when they are no longer a novelty and cease to deceive, their effect is gone.

7.

> …in order to increase his pleasures, man has intentionally added to the number and pressure of his needs, which in their original state were not much more difficult to satisfy than those of the brute. Hence luxury in all its forms; delicate food, the use of tobacco and opium, spirituous liquors, fine clothes, and the thousand and one things that he considers necessary to his existence.

8.

> …need and boredom are the two poles of human life.

9.

> …something of great importance now past is inferior to something of little importance now present, in that the latter is a reality, and related to the former as something to nothing.

10.

> If life—the craving for which is the very essence of our being—were possessed of any positive intrinsic value, there would be no such thing as boredom at all: mere existence would satisfy us in itself, and we should want for nothing. But as it is, we take no delight in existence except when we are struggling for something; and then distance and difficulties to be overcome make our goal look as though it would satisfy us.

11.

> [Consciousness makes] the individual careful to maintain his own existence; and if this were not so, there would be no surety for the preservation of the species. From all this it is clear that individuality is not a form of perfection, but rather a limitation; and so to be freed from it is not loss but gain.

12.

> The real meaning of persona is a mask, such as actors were accustomed to wear on the ancient stage; and it is quite true that no one shows himself as he is, but > wears his mask and plays his part. Indeed, the whole of our social arrangements may be likened to a perpetual comedy; and this is why a man who is worth anything finds society so insipid, while a blockhead is quite at home in it.

13.

> Every man takes the limits of his own field of vision for the limits of the world. This is an error of the intellect as inevitable as that error of the eye which lets you fancy that on the horizon heaven and earth meet.

14.

> No one knows what capacities for doing and suffering he has in himself, until something comes to rouse them to activity: just as in a pond of still water, lying there like a mirror, there is no sign of the roar and thunder with which it can leap from the precipice, and yet remain what it is; or again, rise high in the air as a fountain. When water is as cold as ice, you can have no idea of the latent warmth contained in it.

15.

> With people of only moderate ability, modesty is mere honesty; but with those who posses great talent, it is hypocrisy.

16.

Loading...

> ...man may have the most excellent judgment in all other matters, and yet go wrong in those which concern himself; because here the will comes in and deranges the intellect at once. Therefore let a man take counsel of a friend. A doctor can cure everyone but himself; if he falls ill, he sends for a colleague.

17.

> Imagination is strong in a man when that particular function of the brain which enables him to observe is roused to activity without any necessary excitement of the sense. Accordingly, we find that imagination is active just in proportion as our sense are not excited by external objects. A long period of solitude, whether in prison or in a sick room; quiet, twilight, darkness—these are the things that promote its activity; and under their influence it comes into play of itself.

18.

> The scenes and events of long ago, and the persons who took part in them, wear a charming aspect to the eye of memory, which sees only the outlines and takes no note of disagreeable details. The present enjoys no such advantage, and so it always seems defective.

19.

> The little incidents and accidents of every day fill us with emotion, anxiety, annoyance, passion, as long as they are close to us, when they appear so big, so important, so serious; but as soon as they are borne down the restless stream of time they lose what significance they had; we think no more of them and soon forget them altogether. They were big only because they were near.

20.

> It is a curious fact that in bad days we can very vividly recall the good time that is now no more; but that in good days, we have only a very cold and imperfect memory of the bad.

21.

> The ordinary method [of education] is to imprint ideas and opinions, in the strict sense of the word, prejudices, on the mind of the child, before it has had any but a very few particular observations. It is thus that he afterwards comes to view the world and gather experience through the medium of those ready-made ideas, rather than to let his ideas be formed for him out of his own experience of life, as they ought to be.

22.

> A man's knowledge may be said to be mature, in other words, when it has reached the most complete state of perfection to which he, as an individual, is capable of bringing it, when an exact correspondence is established between the whole of his abstract ideas and the things he has actually perceived for himself. His will mean that each of his abstract ideas rests, directly or indirectly, upon a basis of observation, which alone endows it with any real value; and also that he is able to place every observation he makes under the right abstract idea which belongs to it.

23.

> The nobler and more perfect a thing is, the later and slower it is in arriving at maturity. A man reaches the maturity of his reasoning powers and mental faculties hardly before the age of twenty-eight; a woman at eighteen.

24.

> …to marry means to halve one's rights and double one's duties.

25.

> The delight which a man has in hoping for and looking forward to some special satisfaction is a part of the real pleasure attaching to it enjoyed in advance. This is afterwards deducted; for the more we look forward to anything, > the less satisfaction we find in it when it comes. But the brute's enjoyment is not anticipated, and therefore, suffers no deduction; so that the actual pleasure of the moment comes to it whole and unimpaired."

And here are nine more things I learned from the essays:

1. The unconscious man, the brute, is superior to man because, while he doesn't have hope and anticipation, he doesn't get restless or experience discontent.

2. The punishment of wealth is boredom.

3. All the faults you criticize in others are what you're capable of, and which may be a prominent feature of your future. It is therefore prudent to have tolerance for your fellow man.

4. Consciousness is beneficial because it gives us a stronger will to live. It makes us think we are special and unique, giving us a fear of death that increases our survivability. It's evolution's victory of intelligence over will, but comes at a cost of allowing us to see life's vain and futile character. Yet even with individual character, most humans lead generic forms of existence.

5. Effortless mastery comes when you simply follow what your brain wants to do.

6. Pleasure comes from alternating between work and rest, hardship and comfort, pleasure and pain. There is no happiness in constant satisfaction.

7. Stimulus from the external world must be digested before it becomes creativity in the same way that food must digest before converting to nutrients that the body can use. There is a lag time between experience and mental enlightenment.

8. Smell is strongly connected to memory because it is unique and unambiguous. Smelling the perfume of your ex-girlfriend will immediately evoke a vivid memory of her.

9. Education stuffs you full of ideas without the coinciding experience that gave rise to those ideas in the first place, giving you incorrect perspective and notions.

The essays are surprisingly readable, and you can even pick out a bit of Schopenhauer's humor. I recommend it.

Read More: "Studies In Pessimism" on Amazon

5 Best Countries Where It’s Great To Be A Criminal

February 15, 2013 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

Most men who read Return Of Kings would probably agree that the Western world is in terminal decline. As time goes on and things get worse, economic options will disappear. Despite their best efforts, many men who have played by the rules will find they have little opportunity to build a better future.

Turning to a life of crime is one possible solution for those with nothing left to lose. But, not all nations are equal when it comes to criminal law, women, and living standards. Men living in fascist police states might find it useful to move to a more crime-friendly nation. Let’s explore some of the best countries for men to pursue criminality.

I judged each country based on the following six criteria:

1. Attractive Women. Because being a crime boss is worthless without hot women.
2. Wealthy. You may as well be a criminal in a wealthy, comfortable, first-world country.
3. Weak Crime Laws. Sympathetic judges, light sentences, and no capital punishment.
4. Nice Prisons. Why should prison be hard? Pick a country with nice jails.
5. Strong Gun Laws. Because disarmed victims can’t fight back too much.
6. Immigrant Friendly. You don’t want to be killed in the streets by Neo-Nazis or police.

Here is a list of the five good countries to begin a criminal career:

1. Sweden

Sweden is wealthy, full of hot women, and friendly towards immigrants. It has very weak laws and cushy prisons. Guns are restricted, but freezing to death is a danger.

Swedish Prison. Like an Ikea store.

2. Norway

Norway also has hot women and a very liberal attitude towards immigrants. This country has extremely weak criminal laws and some of the nicest prisons on the planet. Guns laws are very restrictive.

Norwegian Prison. Ocean views.

3. Canada

Canada is not exactly ideal, but it is lenient on its criminal immigrants. Stronger gun laws make it easier to find compliant victims. Quebec would be the best province to settle in, as it offers very attractive women. Canada is the best choice for criminals who want to stay in North America.

Loading...

Quebec Jail. Not inviting, but not too bad.

4. Austria

Austria has relatively attractive women and a strong economy. But Austria is very attractive due to weak criminal laws and amazing prisons. Neo-Nazis could make it dangerous for recent immigrants.

Austrian Prison. This is nicer than my house.

5. The Czech Republic

The Czech Republic is relatively wealthy and boasts attractive women. The Czechs are very lenient on crime, but their prisons are no joke. This country has weak gun laws. Citizens can lawfully carry concealed weapons, so be careful.

Czech Prison. Not quite as nice.

Any one of these countries would be a strong choice for the man determined to commence his criminal career, and notice how they are mostly in Europe. Your plan to be a Colombian drug mule? You may want to scratch that.

Read More: Will The Norwegian People Disappear?

Are Men Defeating Themselves With Labels?

February 15, 2013 | by wrand | Link | Original Link

Or is Norton now holding the leash?

Norton—yeah, the technology company that makes the crappy antivirus programs—has decided to block a list of men's rights websites which they have labeled "hate sites." When the list of sites newly blocked by Norton was published, the first reactions I saw comprised elaborate justifications and defenses focused on the term "hate site." I countered that with my comment: "I understand that we have to fight—maybe I'm looking forward to it—but please let's not bow down, justifying and explaining ourselves to these political correctness, capitalistic, conformist drones." I followed it with a call to avoid Norton products. I now think that I was also drifting from the point and focusing too much on reactions to the label.

The issue should be neither the definition of a "hate site" nor whether the websites on the list are, in fact, hate sites. We are fooling ourselves with too much concern for following politically acceptable labels and avoiding giving offense. The issue behind the Norton site blockage is neither the classification of the sites nor whether they offend anyone. The central issue really relates to social control through censorship, ultimately a question of constitutionally guaranteed freedoms.

Most courteous, civilized, reasonably sober people naturally try to avoid giving offense, under normal circumstances. However, we have reached a point in society where some previously disadvantaged groups, notably feminists, use the concepts of “offense” and “oppression” to gain social, economic and political power. Their tools are social aggression and censorship. Another commenter on the same forum remarked that the real mistake Norton is making is allowing themselves to be partisan between groups of people of strongly differing opinions by offering, what is effectively, a “morality judgement service”. Morality judgment is essentially what censorship in our society does, using labeling as one of its weapons. The result is power for the judges who can then tell us what we can or cannot say, how we can or cannot live, what we are allowed to think.

That kind of power is something we give up voluntarily through intimidation and learned shame. Feminists rant, and men hang their heads and apologize. A generation of men, raised by single mothers, has been taught to feel shame and guilt because of what they have been told about the way their grandfathers supposedly treated their grandmothers. Considering historical concerns of imbalances in employment and compensation, that may sound like a gross simplification, but that conclusion is the blue pill talking.

No one doubts, for instance, that racism exists in the United States. Discrimination also exists against immigrants, fat people, bald people, old people, homosexuals, the disabled and others. Nevertheless, social oppression today is not the same as it was in my father's time. The social status of some groups, relative to each other, have actually reversed, despite continued ranting by the supposed disadvantaged group. Middle-class women now earn more than middle-class men. More women enroll in college and graduate. High school girls (pardon me, young women) outperform boys in reading and writing. The only statistic in which men now strongly lead is in the suicide rate. Still, we must, at all costs, avoid giving verbal offense to anyone, most of all to women.

Loading...

Everyone knows the hateful, derogatory words that groups use in order to shame, silence, denigrate or otherwise control people of other groups, including sexist words like: creep, pig and misogynist. Everybody seems to be part of a group that somebody else doesn't like. By historical United States racial classifications, I am African American. I am also a heterosexual man, so, somehow, the politically correct power structure has put me in the position of oppressed and oppressor. How schizophrenic is that? Evidently, that is life, and not the point here.

The point should no longer be the word, the classification, the rant, the possible offence. The point should be the use of power as it applies to our basic, human rights—everyone's rights. The comedian Lenny Bruce (1925-1966) said, "Take away the right to say fuck, and you take away the right to say fuck the government." Now, judging by United States laws and court system, women seem to run the government and social structure of the country. Mike Buchanan says in Feminism, The Ugly Truth: "Any man prepared to comment objectively about women—even about a small group of women such as feminists—is automatically and immediately branded a sexist or a misogynist, often both. Once denounced as a sexist or a misogynist, a man must be reviled or avoided.” Does that sound like “the land of the free” or more like Nathaniel Hawthorne’s novel and critique against Puritanism and conformity, The Scarlet Letter?

We men are restricted now, not only in lifestyle but in speech. Feminists have convinced us to give up rights guaranteed to us by the First Amendment to the United States Constitution. How? In many ways, we silence ourselves, but Norton is helping out. In blocking websites, Norton has used the tools of political correctness and avoidance of giving offense to move censorship to the level of open and official corporate policy. Free speech is already a distant memory on United States universities. How long before speech restrictions return to government, as in the days of Lenny Bruce’s imprisonment?

The First Amendment guarantees freedom of speech and freedom of the press. In the way that they disseminate information, news, commercial advertisements and public opinion, it seems that contemporary websites constitute a media of the press, despite Puritanistic ranting against porn. Feminists and other political correctness oppressors, hiding behind Norton, are trying to restrict those basic constitutional freedoms.

John Woods (1951-2002) with rocker Ozzy Osbourne letting their feelings known to would-be censors everywhere! from the "Rock Out Censorship" site: www.theroc.org

The UK newspaper Daily Mail refers to what we have here as “political correctness gone mad.” Norton’s block list, restricting what it has labeled (or been told to label) as “hate sites” may seem like a small step now, but it could be the step that makes political correctness dangerous for us all.

Read More: The Manosphere Is Approaching A Tipping Point

Introducing The Muscle Bio-Diversity (MBD) Movement

February 16, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

There is a new sphere on the internet called Muscle Bio-diversity (MBD). It is composed of black men reviewing the latest literature that describes racial differences on muscle fiber type and athleticism. They have the science to back up the fact that black men are better athletes than white men, and have taken it upon themselves to broadcast this superiority on the internet. They have created dozens of blogs where they review and re-phrase decade-old data. They have invaded other blogs with a flood of comments saying how blacks are better athletes than whites.

Even when a blog post has nothing to do with racial differences in sports, they somehow bring the topic back to black superiority. They have provided an acceptable amount of science for black nationalists to push the idea that white men should be exiled from all sports. An ironic feature of the movement is that none of the most famous MBD'ers are actual athletes.

I just painted a fictional scenario, but the Human Bio-diversity (HBD) sphere is real. It's a group of people who say than white people are smarter than black people, using IQ studies as proof. A surprisingly balanced summary of their movement, which even Steve Sailor's declared "not all that bad," can be found on Daily Kos:

> There's an easy way to differentiate the scientific side of HBD from the racist side: fixation on IQ. These people love to wring the IQ data for every ounce of scientific justification they can find for their racism. They analyze IQ scores by race, religion, gender, national origin, and lots of other factors; I wouldn't be surprised if one of them hasn't calculated the correlation coefficient of IQ score with aversion to broccoli. They triumphantly trumpet the results that support their prejudices and quietly ignore results that undermine their prejudices, such as the finding that national IQ scores are correlated with GDP per capita.
>
> Loading…

Let's say that white people are indeed smarter than black people. My response to that is… so what? It would be the same as me, a tall person, starting a movement saying that tall people make more money. This very well may be true, but what benefit is there for me to push that assertion unless I'm feeling insecure about my position as a tall person? I enjoy the benefits of being tall every week—I don't need a scientific study to tell me, just like how a guy with a Porsche doesn't need to street-race a kid in a souped-up Civic to know his car is faster. I would understand if you want to challenge a specific enemy to an IQ duel, but to brag that your race is better than another race makes me wonder how you see your own intellect. It doesn't seem all that different than identifying with a sports team.

I’m sure an HDB’er will say that it’s important to know intellectual differences to help manage society, but unless you plan on a eugenic campaign to eliminate those with inferior IQs, HBD theories have no real-world use. I see HBD less as racist than a colossal waste of time that doesn’t even benefit its adherents.

Read Next: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

Ever Wonder What Kind Of Man Becomes A Russian Alpha?

February 16, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

You may have heard about the all-powerful oligarchs that formed in the wake of the USSR's destruction, but have you ever wondered what kind of man makes it to the top in such adverse circumstances?

Please introduce yourself to multi-billionare Roman Abramovich (and his current wife, Dasha Zhukova, 15 years his junior), one of the richest men in the world.

This man started his empire by smuggling contraband during the collapse of the Soviet Union. No one really knows how he got his goods or where he met his contacts (although he did have a brief stint in the Soviet Army), but it is known where he got his start, from his first wife Olga.

Olga’s parents gave Roman a 2,000 rouble wedding gift, which he soon multiplied while smuggling black market goods such as deodorant, perfume, tights, and toothpaste.

But as Roman’s success increased so did his desires. Olga already had children, having been knocked up by some traveling actor, but Roman wanted his own. He unloaded Olga in less than three years after marrying her, and left her with a bit of cash and a shitty apartment she continues to live in to this day.

Olga reported that Roman did not come home until very late towards the end of her marriage, and she never found out where he was or who he was with, but she does know that Roman had already impregnated his next wife, Irina, before he had divorced his first wife.

It was during his second marriage that Roman made his true fortune, when he met Boris Berezovsky, a Russian oil tycoon, who introduced Roman to Boris Yeltsin, then president of Russia. During this marriage he ended up having five children in total, had an incredible falling out with Berezovsky, and moved to London with all the other Russian oligarchs because foreign earned income is not taxed in Britian. His divorce to Irina cost him $300 million, only a fraction of his multi-billions.

What can we learn from this man?

Loading...

First, notice the political and social climate Russia had during Roman's ascent to power. The USSR during the 80's was in it's dying breaths, facing bankruptcy, and Roman took advantage of an otherwise terrible economic situation by capitalizing on the weak Russian government's ability to track his illegal contraband.

By exploiting and profiting from the weak system, Roman continued to take big risks with the law, and was heavily rewarded for doing so. Does this seem applicable to present day America?

This brings us to second observation of Roman's life, regarding his view on women. He matured during his first marriage, and swallowed the red pill once his wealth started to attract many more women. Realizing that women were expandable objects with little value other than the feelings they bring to the man, he got rid of his first wife before it became cost prohibitive.

Most likely Roman has gone through stages of being faithful and scandalous to his wives, but of course they never left him due to his incredible secrecy with his affairs and his enormous passive value. Once his second wife no longer gave him the satisfaction he wanted as a man, he replaced Irina with his current wife Dasha.

When we judging this man, and asking ourselves “What kind of man rises to the top in Russia,” perhaps one of the most cutthroat countries on the planet, we can see that the kind of man who rises to the top is the one unconcerned with questions of morality, legality, or love, and far more interested in questions of practicality, pleasure, and being useful to others. Balls, cunning, and game took Roman to the top.

But before this transformation occurred, he was once just another young buck chasing tail…

Read More: Sex, Drugs, and Libel In The New Russia

The Manosphere Is Becoming An Obvious Success

February 16, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

While undoubtedly, the latest success has been Roosh's post 9 Ugliest Feminists In America, it appears that the manosphere is starting to take off in the mainstream as well. I was recently browsing CNN when I discovered an article titled Cougars In Training: Young Women Dating Even Younger Men. It was here that I knew immediately, that the manosphere had struck instant gold.

Currently we are roughly through the first half of the first quarter of the year (companies use quarters not eighths), and Roosh had boldly predicted the following back in December:

> The manosphere, long ignored by the American media, will be "discovered" in 2013. Bet on it.
>
> — Roosh (@rooshv) December 2, 2012

This is becoming less of a statement and more of a fact and CNN is the evidence behind both the success of the manosphere, as well as the proving grounds of American media addressing it. Below are some memorable quotes that help sum up the article and what it means from the manosphere's perspective.

> The problem is largely cultural at this time. … (There will be) jokes about robbing a cradle. The expectations are somehow that (a woman is) not capable of being with a grown man and has thus chosen to date someone who our society thinks of as a boy.
>
> Loading…

This is a typical societal expectation that has long made it harder pick up older women. Thanks to advancement in game however, women have found a niche to look beyond age gaps; this is something men have disregarded for much longer.

> younger guys try harder to please you.

Men don't particularly try harder to please women, they are just becoming more aware of what women want and what to do and say to garner their attention. It's not that guys are willing flocking to become betas. The manosphere has just provided more men with the knowledge and confidence to trip the triggers of women.

> With some millennial guys … we're not seeing more guys who are feminine, but flexible.

I enjoy this quote because it discredits feminism. It's saying, in a politically correct manner, that men haven't surrendered to women. Men have just found a way to subliminally manipulate women. Basically, they now possess the knowledge in a widespread basis to counteract what women have attempted to do for decades.

And while CNN has not directly mentioned the manosphere, it is only a matter of time until it happens. Like I said, we are roughly halfway through the first quarter. As soon as the media's agenda to cover everything anti-gun is ended, I believe the manosphere will be covered through some sort of presentation. It may begin with a continuation of the current article regarding women dating younger, or it may come from a feminist protest. Either way 2013 seems to be a good year for the manosphere.

Read Next: An Amazing Manosphere Blog You've Never Seen

Interracial Dating for Indian Men

February 17, 2013 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

Thanks to the work of the Roosh V Forum's Indian Race Troll, the subject of brown men and interracial dating has come under a lot of scrutiny. My fellow brown writer bojangles wrote an excellent post entitled "6 Things Indian Guys Have To Understand When Learning Game" where the first point and perhaps most critical point he made was that brown men need to let go of limiting racial beliefs and insecurities if they want to improve their game. As showcased by the once endless stream of "Do girls from X country like Indian men?" questions, there clearly exists a subset of Indian men who are anxious about whether or not they will have success dating non-Indian girls. This post will explore the in's and out's of game for brown men, exploring both the causes and the solutions for their problems with dating interracially.

Full disclosure before we proceed: I am an extremely Westernised brown guy from a non-Indian background, but am mistaken for one half the time so I consider myself qualified to help my fellow brown men out. Men of other races, particularly East Asian men will also benefit from this post to a certain extent.

Is Racism The Problem?

One of the most common insecurities among brown guys asking for game advice is that non-brown girls and in particular, white girls are racist against brown men in terms of dating. Now I want all of you to picture the most stereotypically racist type of person you can think of in the Western world. Whether it's indeed true or not, the vast majority of readers just pictured something along the lines of an elderly, rural white man (riot in the comments from the HBD'ers in 3,2,1)… Now imagine the stereotypically least racist type of person you can think of.

A young, urban, single white women probably came to mind. The bleeding heart liberal, SWPL type of white girl, who are a dime a dozen in the places where brown people congregate most densely in the West: the major cities of England, Canada, Australia and New Zealand as well as the San Francisco Bay, New York and Washington D.C metropolitan areas of the United States. The type of women that some brown men think they cannot sleep with due to racism are the least racist cohort of people in the world, and probably of all of human history so far. Since these are the girls that Indian men will have to approach the most as they improve their game, racism is not the primary issue here. Hell, the latest fad for hipster white girls at the moment is wearing bindi's on their forehead, not to mention the popularity of Indian culture and yoga among the SWPL types.

Many Indian and Asian men starting out in game use racism as a defence mechanism to rationalize and distance themselves from the damage inflicted to their ego by their first rejections on approaches. Even I, a completely Westernized brown guy who'd already been dating white girls before I started cold approaching had that thought creep into my head a few times early on while doing direct daygame on the street. This lingering thought of "Is she not talking to me because I'm brown?" comes from the exact same place as does looks, age and height insecurities do. It is your rationalization hamster tricking you into believing you will never be able to improve your success with women due to whatever insecurity you have so that you won't exert the time and energy that it takes to improve. Your mind is your greatest enemy here and to get over that, you simply just have to approach a lot.

Does Skin Tone Matter?

When the Indian Race Troll was unmasked, a number of guys commented about how light an Indian he was, mistakenly assuming that many brown men's lack of success with women of other races stems from their darker skin tone. This always seemed preposterous to me because white women where I come from have a reputation overseas for having a thing for African American men. In reality, it is not the darker pigment that is responsible for Indian men's interracial dating troubles. Darker brown guys are actually more likely to date white women.

At first I thought it was because of being able to pull off "black guy swag" (all those years of being called "ma nigga" by suburban white kids who've never met a black guy will not have been in vain!), but then I realized that it is (at least partially) because Muslim and observant Sikh Desi men are lighter skinned (since they're from North of the subcontinent) and those two groups very rarely date out. As such, the skin tone of brown men dating out actually skews darker than brown male population as a whole. Other than that though it makes no difference. The portion of girls who are closed off to dating brown guys don't give a damn whether you're on the lighter or the darker side.

The Culprit Is Indian Culture

So then why do some Indian men struggle with non-Indian women? First off it should be noted that it's not like South Asian men are the only guys who struggle with dating. The vast majority of guys of every race have poor game.

It's because of their culture. South Asia's cultures produce the most beta men of anywhere on the planet after East Asia. Young brown men are conditioned from birth to study hard to get into a good college and then get a prestigious white collar job (preferably Doctor or Engineer) with which they can fund a mortgage and buy a Mercedes with their well educated wife of the same religious background as them. Rosca from the Roosh V Forum nailed it when he said about my own parents that "they're trying to make you beta". Brown parents purposely try to produce beta sons and they are quite good at doing it.

Many brown parents will tell their Western raised sons that white women are sluts who never cook or clean (I was basically taught Red Pill 101: Introduction to Western Women from a rather young age), but never have an ill-word to say about brown girls, who can be raging sluts to rival their white neighbours if raised in a Western country. This, in combination with Bollywood movie storyline's cause Indian men to place their own women on gigantic pedestals, but also see non-Indian women as out of reach.

This is compounded by the fact that not only do brown people congregate in a few cities, they also congregate heavily in certain neighbourhoods and schools, creating a generation of native born FOB brown boys with predominantly South or East Asian friends with whom they perpetuate their FOBness while having little to no contact with the mythical white woman, who they are also unlikely to mingle with in their Engineering or I.T college classes or work places. People want what they can't have. What is rare has more value to them. As such, they have now placed white and brown girls on two distinct pedestals.

Don’t Act Fresh Off The Boat

The more culturally Fresh Off the Boat one is, the more this is the case. There tends to be a direct correlation with how culturally attuned an Indian is to his ancestral background to how worse he’ll do with Western women, simply because their traditional mindset, it’s ensuing pedestalization and overall betaness are a massive turn off for them. Incidentally, I have met a couple FOB brown men with hot girlfriends who migrated from relatively traditional Southern Europe, which is something you’ll rarely see in the English speaking world. Roosh explicitly states in Bang Ukraine that Indian men also do well with Ukrainian girls, a sign that the traditional mindset of most Indian men that Western women detest is something that women in non-feminist countries may actually prefer.

The damage that FOBness does to Indian men’s game is why Americans seem to have by far the lowest opinion of Indian’s game out of any country, as Indian Americans tend to be much more recent arrivals and make a smaller portion of the population there than say in the U.K, where one can meet thoroughly Westernised third generation Indians whose ancestors have lived there since the 1960’s. Should the flow of new immigrants come to a halt, the collective game of Indian men would climb rapidly as they Westernize, break out of their enclaves and abandon their traditional views on sexuality morality which stunts the development of their game.

So What Is The Solution?

Unless you live in a predominately brown country (good luck, you’re going to need it), even if you want to get a girl from your own background in the end to settle down with you’re going to have to approach a large volume of girls to improve your game, which necessitates gaming girls of other races. Accept that the reason you might not do well with girls of other race is about YOUR lack of game and YOUR limiting beliefs and racial insecurities, which instantly dry women's pussies. Admit that you might suck, all the guys of other races just starting out suck too. Working on losing any accent you may have is very important, although most recent migrants who still have accents would rather marry a plain jane Indian doctor and start a family than learn game so that will not apply to most of you. Replace your glasses with contacts or get laser eye surgery. Most of you will also need to drastically change your wardrobe.

Sexy Stereotype Yourself

Why? Because Indian (and Asian) men have such a high proportion of beta males among them that white women sometimes automatically think you're beta. If you are dressed like the average dude, girls will assume you are an average (read: geeky beta) Indian. If you're swole and wearing a tank top or are rocking an urban, punk, indie, metalhead, hipster or any other kind of distinct look you will pique her interest due to your rarity and escape much of the negative beta connotations you'll get for dressing like the average guy does. Having girls blatantly checking out your sweet style isn't going to hurt you on your path to purging yourself of your racial insecurities either. Young guys generally have an easier time standing out with a little dress sense as well due to the abysmal competition.

This will shock many American readers, but the most common interracial pairing in the English speaking Commonwealth countries involving a white woman is with a brown man. There are roughly twice as many East Asian than South Asian people in my city, yet brown men date out more heavily than Asian and Middle Eastern men and I even see a fair few Brown guy – Asian girl pairings as well now but none of the other way around. It is very easy to notice these sorts of things with scanning around for any cute girls to approach in the daytime in high traffic areas. Personally, I think Brown and Asian guys who actually think they couldn't get girls of different backgrounds because of their own race never leave the house much or they think "that couple doesn't count because the guy is good looking or ripped etc." which only proves my point that race is not a critical factor for brown guys in dating.

You May Have To Put In More Work

I am not going to lie to you and say that race does not matter at all however. There will always be some portion of non-brown girls who are either completely closed off to dating out or whose mistaken assumption that you are beta just for being Indian costs you a potential bang you would've gotten had you been white. These girls are usually less intelligent and less educated on average and this is also more common with girls from rural areas. Studies show exposure to another ethnic group, whether or not they are of a different race improves peoples opinions of them. Remember that most white girls in the cities where most diaspora Indians live grew up with some of them from kindergarden.

The ones who don't know many brown guys think we all fit certain stereotypes and the assumption that you are beta right off the bat will just be something you'll have to overcome either through game, getting ripped in the gym or doing something like getting piercings or tattoos. At the end of the day however you're just going to have to approach that extra % more than other guys to match their results, which in the long term will help you because the better your game gets, the less race (and a myriad of other factors) matter.

Really though, if a girl is sitting around in a bar or coffee shop open to being approached she's not going to be suddenly become closed off when approached just because of your skin colour. You will have your shot at her just like guys of every other race will. White girls also do not have to worry about being judged by their friends or family if they sleep with you, as there is zero social stigma for dating with a brown guy either (at least in the places where most of the Indian diaspora live), which is the biggest hurdle to interracial dating that there is.

What About Indian Girls?

My final piece of advice to brown guys is not to avoid gaming brown girls, but also to realize that they are not pure snowflakes. Take the pussy off the pedestal. Western white girls are non-traditional and promiscuous just like your mother told you, but so are a lot of Western brown girls. Brown girls prefer brown guys, even the ones with predominately white friends. The one's that do sleep with white guys will also sleep with brown guys as well. Westernised Indian girls do however detest the FOBish Indian men just like their white sisters do. This is why brown guys who say they struggle with white girls actually struggle with every race of girl, because they have no game. Even if they woke up the next day as a white dude called Steve they'd still suck with girls.

Brown people tend to not hit up nightlife all that much, so when you do spot a hot brown girl in the bar or club make a beeline for her if there aren't many other brown guys in the venue. There are a lot more attractive ones than stereotypes would lead you believe (the quality is much higher among the diaspora than it is on the sub-continent itselfF) and there are many who are remarkably feminine despite being raised in the West. Every guy has a type or number of different types of girls that he'll have a niche in. By default, brown girls will be one of those niches for you by virtue of being brown yourself. The other types of girls you may also have a niche in will come down to individual variance, but I encourage you to push the boundaries and approach all different types of girls as well beyond the girls you already do best with.

In Conclusion

You never know, you may well be the first cool, fun, extroverted "Alpha" brown guy without an inferiority complex that a girl has ever met. You are her one and only shot for her to score her Indian flag. She'll never meet any other guy quite like you. You are the prize.

Don’t Miss: 6 Things Indian Guys Have To Understand When Learning Game

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

The Four-Way Test

February 17, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

When I graduated from high school I received a scholarship from my town's Rotary Club for my academic and extracurricular achievements. The club would occasionally invite me back to their meetings over the summer so I could speak to a group of 50-something moderate Republicans about my exciting college schedule and bright future. I recall that the Rotarians would end each meeting by reciting their "Four-Way Test," a set of questions that determined whether an agenda item fell within the organization's code of conduct:

1. Is it the truth?
2. Is it fair to all concerned?
3. Will it build goodwill and better friendships?
4. Will it be beneficial to all concerned?

As you seek to navigate a world designed to sabotage you emotionally, sexually, and physically, it is absolutely essential to develop guidelines about your willingness to allocate your resources, chiefly time and money. Are you going to get fat eating takeout food and watching hours of TV every night? Will you accommodate the unyielding assault on your time from a feminist American woman, as she reduces your manhood piecemeal and advances you further down the rabbit hole of an unhappy modern relationship? Or will you resist the crab-in-a-bucket pressure of the masses and withstand labels of "weird" and "selfish" as you embark on a path of constant self-improvement?

To avoid living an average existence devoid of principle, you must visualize the person you want to become and then develop a line of inquiry that will keep you on that path. This is the four-way test that I apply when determining how to use my precious free time and money, and a few pursuits they apply to:

- Will it help me improve at an useful and/or marketable skill? Some examples are computer programming, practicing a musical instrument, writing, developing a business idea, working on a side hustle
- Does it make me healthier or stronger? This applies to lifting heavy, juicing, learning a martial art, food shopping, and cooking my own meals.
- Does it improve my knowledge about the world or myself? This covers activities such as reading books, following selected blogs and articles online, traveling, and spending time with insightful and supportive friends
- Will it help me get laid? This includes devoting resources to either day or night game, investing effort in approaches, going out when not in the mood, traveling, and studying humor.

What about leisure time? Everybody needs to waste time and have non-productive fun occasionally, but the question to apply to this area is: "Is it a leisure activity that produces pleasure in a high ratio to time/money spent?" If something doesn't fulfill one of these four (and a half) criteria, I simply refuse to do it. These are examples of "normal" activities that fail my four-way test:

- Watching the vast majority of television shows
- Going out to happy hours and drinking with coworkers you don't like or respect
- Spending time with girls you are not fucking
- Going out to eat more than occasionally
- Devoting entire weekends to watching sports
- Following the popular news cycle

This is not meant to advocate a completely ascetic lifestyle. Rather, the test's purpose is to make you hyper-aware of when you are wasting time and not grinding towards your life's goals, so that it becomes the rare exception rather than the norm it is for nearly everyone else you meet. If you've been procrastinating making some major changes in your life, you should distill your principles down to a four-way test, then apply it religiously for a week. I guarantee you will be closer to your goals at week's end.

Don't Miss: Facebook Is Hurting Your Game

Winston Smith
Winston Smith is the editor of Return Of Kings.

The Romanian Deadlift

February 17, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Form talk starts at about 9 minutes into the video. The first 9 minutes explains the rationale behind doing them.

If you're like me and sit most of the day your hamstrings are probably as tight as an 18 year old Korean girl's snatch. I started doing Romanian deadlifts as part of an olympic lifting program (MSU Experimental program). They're great and I can feel my formerly weak and tight hamstrings getting stronger. I'm feeling more explosive out of the bottom of my squats, deadlift numbers are going up and its helping with the snatch and clean+jerk movement patterns. I am by no means an expert, so watch some videos, read some articles or ask a coach to see if you're doing them right. I am only raising awareness about this exercise.

Form:

Loading…

- Start with a light weight, the RDL is an assistance movement to strengthen and stretch the hamstrings. Don't do it if you want to throw around big weights, that's what the deadlift is for.
- Get into a conventional deadlift stance: feet hip width apart, double overhand grip at all times and a grip just outside your thighs. Lift the weight up and hold it in the hang position. (You can also start from a rack)
- From the hang position unlock your knees (at no point should you be bending them more than this)

- Drive your ass back, keep your shoulders tight and your back flat. Driving your ass back will lower the weight for you, don’t try to lower it like a normal deadlift.
- The bar must be in contact with your thighs at all times, pull it in with your lats.
- Drive your ass back and lower the bar until your back is completely parallel. You don’t want to have the weight touch the floor as it will break the tension in your hamstrings. The bottom position is when you start to feel your back unlocking.
- From the bottom position raise the bar back to the hang position making sure your knees are only unlocked and not flexing.
- Repeat.

There you have it, a relatively simple movement designed to stretch and strengthen your hamstrings. Because it is an assistance exercise do sets of 5, 8 or 10 and do them relatively light. Avoid lifting with your ego at all times, if you go too heavy then you defeat the purpose of the movement. Start light and slowly add more weight. My last session I did 185lbs 3×5 and my deadlift 1RM is 405lbs.

Romania has more to offer than hot chicks.

Read Next: 5 Easy Ways to Boost Your Testosterone

An Easy Technique To Be Incredibly Interesting to Women

February 18, 2013 | by George (3rd Millenium Men) | Link | Original Link

All too often, men are unable to keep women interested and invested in conversations. I've had Google searches like "great date questions" or "what do I talk to a girl about on a date" lead people to my site. However, these searches indicate that men are missing the point in conversations. While they're busy looking for a killer topic or the silver conversational bullet that will make women like them, they aren't realizing that even if they do ask some good questions, these will quickly run out.

Here's the secret: it doesn't matter WHAT you talk about as much as HOW you talk about it.

A massive part of communication and how you talk about things is conveyed through your body language, voice tone and eye contact. However, today I'm going to share one simple conversational technique that will rapidly improve your conversational abilities and how interesting women find you.

That technique is to share details.

Men and women with lower conversational abilities tend to gloss over the subjects they're talking about. They are unable to take people on an interesting or emotional journey with them, because of the lack of detail. If you can't picture something somebody's telling you, you're not going to get invested in it. It's consequently better to spend 2, 3, 4, or 5 minutes talking about one experience you've had, then to spend that time trying to mention three or four cool things you've done.

For example, consider and rate the responses by the following three guys:

Hot Girl: I like travelling.

Guy 1: Cool. Where have you been?

Guy 2: Cool, I just came home from Europe! It was great. I went to France, Germany and Spain. I saw the Eiffel Tower, did some really interesting history tours in Germany and ate lots of great food in Spain. Met lots of really cool people along the way as well. I'm definitely keen to go back and travel to more of Europe next time. Something I'd like to do is try sailing in Croatia, I hear there's lots of beautiful islands. Have you been to Europe?

Guy 3: Cool, I just came home from Europe. One of the countries I went to was France, partly because I'd always wanted to see the Eiffel Tower. I grew up reading about it in books and seeing it in movies, so actually being there was surreal. Even waiting in line for the elevator alongside my friends and total strangers made the experience all the more exciting and really gave me time to study what an incredible building it really is. Then the feeling of anticipation as our group went up was electrifying, and it seemed like the stresses of everyone's travels just seemed to disappear as we reached the observation deck and looked out over Paris…

Guy 1 demonstrates a complete lack of conversational ability. Rather than show the girl that he is a cool, interesting person, he thrusts the onus onto her to come up with something.

Guy 2 is able to show that he's done some interesting things. He's established that they have something basic in common. However, he hasn't differentiated himself from the thousands of other people who also traveled to Europe. He paid some money and saw some sights. Cool. But so what?

Guy 3 has taken the girl on an emotional journey with him. He told her about something he'd wanted to do as a child. He described how he felt about achieving his goal. He painted a vivid picture of the story, which allowed the girl to feel and join an emotional journey with him. He also provided plenty of hooks for her to take a hold of and keep talking. While the length of what Guy 3 said may seem like overkill, it's not. By indicating that France was just one of the countries he went to and providing more details about one particular topic, he was conversely able to hold lots more of himself back and show that there's much more to him than meets the eye. Girls are generally happy to listen and enjoy being taken somewhere outside of their ordinary, everyday routine.

Peoples brains are also wired to remember the specific, unusual things that we hear, rather than the mundane and ordinary things. So if you're one of ten guys who she's spoken to in the last week who thinks you're cool because you went overseas, think again. You need to frame what you say in such a way that will stick in her mind and make her remember. The best way to do that is through sharing details and connecting with her emotional responses. The same principles apply for more mundane and everyday conversations.

Hot Girl: Have a good weekend?

Guy 1: Yeah it was pretty good, how was yours?

Guy 2: It was fun, caught up with some friends, had dinner on Friday night with some people I hadn't caught up with in ages and then played sport Saturday. What about you?

Guy 3: It was great, caught up with some friends for dinner on Friday night.. oh and we went to restaurant X where I had the most delicious pasta I've had in ages. It was this really light spaghetti combined with a rich herb and mince sauce with just a mild kick of spice that rounded it off perfectly. Delicious. Eat anything particularly good on the weekend?

Guy 1 is boring, ordinary and clearly has nothing cool to talk about.

Guy 2 is your standard beta male. She will have forgotten about what he said by the time he's finished his conversation. The question at the end is standard, typical and boring.

Guy 3 will make her think about what he's saying. She'll also have to go back and think harder about what she ate on the weekend as it's a more unusual question than what she'd be used to. The little details he shares show that he is aware of his surroundings and appreciates the good things in life. The conversation will also leave her with a good vibe.

For a brilliant real life example of the importance of sharing details, disregard whatever you may think about President Obama and watch the huge amounts of details he shares in this story.

Now, try and imagine the speech if he hadn't shared how tired he was, or how he was hoping for sunshine but it was raining, or what an ordeal it was to get to the town, or that the woman was wearing a big hat and was a private detective, or one of the million other details he provided. He takes people on an emotional journey with him. He's able to do this because of sharing the seemingly inconsequential details of the story and painting a vivid picture as a result.

Share details, men. Your conversational success depends on it.

Read More: 4 Common Mistakes that Kill Your Game

About the Author

George (3rd Millenium Men) is the founder and lead author of 3rd Millenium Men, a site by 20-something year old guys about life, development and women. He has also started Best of the Manosphere, to rate and rank the best content that exists.

Why The U.S. Divorce Rate Is Not Important

February 18, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Every morning before I run out the door on my way to work, I do my best to catch up on the manosphere articles in my RSS feed.

One thing most of the blogs I read have in common is taking a critical eye toward marriage. Even the married writers spend a great deal of time offering guidance to their readers about divorce rates, how to choose the right woman if they must get married, and "marriage game" to keep her interested.

The most commonly cited statistic as a warning on marriage is the U.S. divorce rate or Western divorce rates in general. A recent article here at ROK on foreign brides got me thinking about American divorce rates v. the reported 80 to 85% success rate of Westerners who marry foreign brides, so I did a little digging.

The debate is endless regarding the true U.S. divorce rate. A quick google search will yield "proof" that the divorce rate is 18%, 31%, 47%, 50% and in a few cases, even higher. Being the intellectually curious chap that I am, I brewed a pot of coffee, logged in to my old University library with an account that still works for some reason, and started pulling raw divorce data, study abstracts, and other information on America's divorce rate.

It turns out that the data are so damn muddled that I couldn't reach any kind of firm conclusion. Frustrated, I turned back to the good old MSM to see if someone out there had put something together that didn't reek of agenda. After trolling for a while, I came across this article that had some good information on divorce statistics and the interpretation thereof.

> One of the problems with this measure of the divorce rate is that by using the total population as the base it includes children and unmarried adults which may distort the results.

Here we go.

> The other problem is that in recent years several states discontinued reporting divorces and so in the last 10 years, these "missing" state numbers may be distorting the overall national profile.

And here's where I stopped reading:

> This number suggests that the divorce rate overall may be twice as large as the estimates by the National Center for Health Statistics.

Numbers "suggest" that they "may" be incompatible with another metric that "suggests" it "may" also be wrong, but is still twice the rate of another analysis that's probably wrong too.

Now I'm fully aware of how difficult finding a true divorce rate would be given the variances in collection methods and incomplete reporting, so I'm not busting on the author's article by any means. It just goes to show how nobody really knows what the U.S. divorce rate is.

I started thinking about my own friends and acquaintances and their divorce rates since I'm in that demographic of people who supposedly experience lower rates of divorce: I'm a white guy between the ages of 30 and 40, I got me one of them there fancy graduate skool degrees in a relevant subject that doesn't suck ass, I have a big boy job that pays me a big boy salary, my parents are still married, and I have access to a lot of educated women.

I'm a certified, bonafide, sanctified SWPL kind of guy; a perfect candidate for marriage.

Put off by the fact that I wasted two hours of my life looking through bogus or incomplete divorce data, I decided to put together a list of my male friends and male coworkers who have been or are currently married and who also mirror my demographic. I came up with a sample size of N=31. It turns out that 35.4% of them have been divorced at least once.

Loading...

Now that's about as unscientific as it gets, and I know this. But the true realization for me came as I was looking at the list of men who were married and have never been divorced. These are the supposedly "good marriages" that will stand the test of time – though it's important to note that the in-progress marriages in my sample ranged from 3 to 11 years. But here's what struck me:

Out of all the currently married men (whether they had ever been divorced or not), I wouldn't want to trade places with any of them.

Isn’t this the real metric the manosphere should be concerned about? Divorce rates be damned. How many of your married friends or coworkers would you want to trade places with? I’m not talking about your fathers and grandfathers, I’m talking about the men in your demographic – a true representative sample of yourself.

Yes, I have one friend who pulled a Christian girl off a farm in Southern Indiana seven years ago and they seem plenty happy. She went to local community college while living at home with her parents, and then finished her bachelor’s degree online, again, while living at home. She’s downright pleasant, they treat each other well, and you can tell they truly care for each other. I think she worked as a receptionist at a mom-and-pop shop that sells feed grain or some shit, then quit two months after becoming pregnant with their first child.

She’s also ugly as sin, but he’s a goober so it doesn’t matter. I’m not suggesting that her ugliness has something to do with her being a good wife, but I’m sure it doesn’t hurt.

So forget about the divorce statistics and ask yourself how many married men in your demographic would you want to trade places with. How many women have you banged that if banging them meant you’d be coupled with them forever, you would have just walked away? How often do you look into the glazed-over eyes of a married friend or coworker and thought to yourself “Man, I wish I could be that guy!”

That’s the metric we should be focusing on, and since it’s personal, it takes into consideration geography, age, and a host of other variables to create a customized risk assessment. In the area where you live, with the girls you and your peers have access to, how many married men in your age, education, and financial demographic would you like to eternally trade places with?

Disclaimer: The author formally recognizes that not all women are like that, your girlfriend, fiancée or wife definitely isn’t like that, and none of our female readers are like that. Furthermore, it is noted that any man who dies without having children is a biological loser who cannot be called an Alpha male since he will not have offspring to carry on his royal bloodline or defend the motherland against the Hittites. Finally, the author recognizes that all of our married reader’s relationships are uh-mazing due to their Alpha supremacy and tight game. In fact, just ignore this article completely. Thanks for reading.

Don’t Miss: Don’t Believe The Lies About Foreign Brides

Freestyle Rap Tightened My Game

February 18, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Silence. My cousin and I are making a long drive, and the radio is busted. “We should freestyle” he suggests. He dabbles in rap. I immediately cringe at the thought, but agree nonetheless, quickly finding a youtube instrumental beat on my phone. He spits a few bars, and then waits for me to hop in. I freeze – it’s like the first time I approached a girl. I’m nervous. Hell, frightened.

Some of the worst rap known to man is delivered over the next two hours. But I was hooked. The few times I strung together a smooth combination of words were exhilarating — like the first time you hold a fun conversation with a cute stranger at the bar.

The same way I had become addicted to game, thoughts of freestyle began to dominate my conscience mind. After several weeks of freestyling on my hour-long commute home from work, I finally hit the inflection point — I could comfortably carry on for minutes at a time. The more I freestyle, the more parallels and connections I make between freestyling and game. And probably of more interest to you — the more my game has improved. The following list highlights some of the main contributions freestyle rap can add to your game, and more specifically — the ability to effortlessly banter.

1. Get loose.

You simply cannot freestyle when tense or nervous. By the same token, your game sucks under these conditions. I guarantee if you become confident freestyling in front of family and friends — talking to a girl, or anyone for that matter, will be a breeze. Even now, every time I freestyle in front of someone new, I get knots in my stomach as I begin. It sets the social confidence bar higher, making game seem relatively less strenuous.

Roosh recommends an episode of Seinfeld before gaming. I like that, but I have found a quick freestyle session to be twice as effective. And this extends beyond game — a few weeks ago I freestyled on my way to an interview. Needless to say, I killed it.

2. Shut your brain off.

Most people suck at freestyle when they start, because their mind is racing to come up with words and rhymes. Of course, all of this thinking ultimately inhibits them and leads to the familiar freeze reaction where nothing is said. The same phenomenon occurs in game. You only start to flow when you trust your subconscious mind to do all the work. One study of rappers’ brains while freestyling showed a reduction of activity in the prefrontal cortex — leading to lowered inhibitions.

3. Forget mistakes.

Another obstacle in learning to freestyle is continuing to spit after making a mistake. This one took me a while. I would complete a couple rhymes and then mumble some words, miss a rhyme, or lose my rhythm and stop dead in my tracks. When you are able to forget the mistake and instinctively supply a new line, your rate of improvement skyrockets. The same goes for bantering with some cutie. Say something stupid? Who gives a fuck.

4. Change subjects with ease.

Freestyling for more than a few seconds generally requires a change in topic. Making this switch without missing a beat is crucial. Once you have the ability to connect different thoughts and ideas while continuing to rhyme AND stay in rhythm — simple bantering starts to seem like a joke.

Clearly learning to freestyle can yield tangible improvements for your game. I promise it has done so for myself. It offers the ability to effortlessly get into a groove, and unconsciously flow. At the very least, it has given me a useful technique to get loose, and an entertaining skill that never fails to impress.

If you want to give it a try, there are a lot of youtube videos that offer practical instruction. Also, I find that the Pandora Instrumental Hip-Hop station offers a good selection of beats to get started.

Don’t Miss: Passive Game vs. Active Game

Game Does Not Need Science

February 19, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

[image]

Perhaps one of the most frequent and annoying criticisms made of game is that it has not been verified by science. Usually a claim made by pseudo-intellectuals who have a difficult time swallowing the red pill, these confused individuals insist that since there is no "peer-reviewed research" confirming the tenets of game, game should not be believed or practiced. Game, therefore, is akin to a religion, or cult, worshiped by followers who blindly believe what their chosen game guru tells them.

These same pseudo-intellectual game-haters will then use this line of criticism in front of unbiased observers in an effort to steer them away from game, so that their blue-pill beliefs about women will be protected. It then leaves the man who preaches the good word of game on the defensive position, since if he disagrees with the game denialist, he will be labeled as "anti-science" and portrayed as an idiot.

A typical example of this exchange…

An experienced man with women will tell you that women are emotional creatures who act based on their feelings and then rationalize their behavior afterwards.

A game-denialist will then come along and say,

> "Men also have rationalization hamsters. How do you know women are worse than men? Where's your peer-reviewed research supporting that claim?"

An experienced man will tell you that any woman will have sex on the same day she meets the right man in the right circumstances. If the right man with the right game comes along in her path, she will bang him regardless of her age or relationship status.

The game denialist:

> "Has there been any controlled experiments done to prove this? How do you know all women are the same?"

The experienced man says all women are the same, and that they follow their hypergamous instincts as obediently as a dog follows his nose.

The game denialist:

> "Where's the study that proves women will behave like animals? You're just talking out of your ass."

By attacking game along epistemological fault lines, the game denialist hopes to sow confusion amongst the ranks of both players and uninterested observers. Science is treated as an all-mighty authority in Western culture, having long since replaced the church, and the average democratic citizen believes that while God might not save them, technology can. Without the backing of science, who can trust game?

These arguments take advantage of the public's general ignorance regarding the nature of science, and sophistically use the lack of scientific research on game as evidence that the current beliefs surrounding game are bullshit.

Let us discuss what science is, how scientists actually practice it, and then we'll discuss why game doesn't need science (although it is helpful).

The first and most common misconception about science is that it can "prove" things. Science has never proven anything, nor can it. On a deep enough epistemological level, nothing can be proven.

In sixteenth century Europe, had you looked up the classification of what a swan was, you would see that scientists had listed these animals as white birds who lived in lake regions. But as Australia was colonized in the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, men discovered black swans.

And just like that, old science had been overturned and replaced with the new; classifying swans no longer referred to their color since if black swans exist, who is to say there are not purple swans out there in the universe, somewhere?

The same process of new science replacing the old is not an extraordinary phenomenon. Particularly notable examples include the Copernican revolution, where the Earth was no longer held at the center of the universe, the Newtonian revolution, where Aristotilean physics was replaced by Newton's Laws, and the Einsteinian revolution, where the General Theory of relativity replaced Newtonian Laws of physics.

The reason new science constantly replaces the old is because science can only disprove theories, but never prove them. Science is merely an effort at clarification, and nothing more.

Think of how vast our universe is. In order for a scientific theory to be proven with absolute certainty it would have to be tested in every corner of the universe to prove that the theory in question is true. How could such rigorous testing even be possible?

For example, the proposition, "All men are mortal." How do we know for sure that there isn't some planet in the universe where men would never die while living on it?

We do not for sure, and we cannot know for sure, but that does not mean the statement "all men are mortal" is not approximately true or useful. Science is thus based on a pragmatic approach, whereby all beliefs are nothing more than approximations of what we believe to be true, and the role of science is to try and disprove old theories, so that they can be replaced with an updated theory that presents a better description of reality.

For example, when Galileo questioned Aristotelian physics, he went after the proposition that "heavier objects fall faster than lighter ones." Galileo dropped two balls of different weight from a tower and showed that both fell at the same speed. And Aristotle was shown to be wrong. Someone then challenged Galileo and showed that a feather fell slower than the ball did, and Galileo responded that if there was no air pressure, both would fall at the same speed.

Of course there was no way for Galileo to test that statement about air pressure affecting the feather, so Galileo's statement was unscientific. Unless something can be tested, it is not scientific. However, did it make Galileo's refutation any less true or useful?

Although Galileo could not test his statement when he made it, it was true. Thus we must ask ourselves: how useful is science, really, if science cannot prove anything true but merely disprove it?

Because ultimately that is all science is, and ever will be – a tool to disprove statements. So when it comes to evaluating game with science, there is not too great a need to do so, since at most science would clarify core game concepts, such as whether or not it is more effective to approach women in the daytime or nighttime when it comes to casual sex.

Moreover, if science failed to find anything false with current game tenets, it would mean that the practitioners of game were right all along, and never needed science to begin with.

And this brings us to the final aspect of science – how useful, exactly, is science anyways? Since the great men of history have always created their theories and then tested them after the fact, we can conclude that science is only there to help coerce the masses into understanding what great men intuitively figure out on their own.

The average person is weak, feeble, and lacking in any sort of conviction, so he needs science to make conclusions for him. Being too afraid to search for the truth on his own he instead works to cloud the judgement of others by shrouding all claims in obscurity and skepticism, in order to bring others down to his level.

In short, science is mostly for haters.

Game, being at once a collective and individual pursuit, will necessarily have non-scientific claims. And that is okay. Not everyone can run experiments to prove that wearing a certain shirt to a certain bar will get him laid more often, even though the man who does get laid knows which shirts work best on him. Likewise a man who can help men generate conversations with women may not have produced a reliable experiment and control to isolate all possible variables, but he can offer reasonable suggestions after helping a few dozen men make approaches.

There is no need for the hysteria of having science to "validate" game, as Heartiste so often does, because while it is cool to see science be unable to disprove core game concepts, it does not mean that there is not yet some discovery that will completely redefine how men approach and interact women. As an evolving concept, game relies on artistic and philosophical modes of thought to make real progress, while science merely sorts through the trash theories to show who was right all along.

And if you're the guy sitting on knowledge of where the best spots in town to bang 18-year old chicks are, do you need science to make sure you can pursue them?

Read More: How I Learned How To Stay In The Game

About the Author

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

“Liberals” Are Not The Enemy

February 20, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

---

It’s difficult to deny that there’s a strong conservative leaning to the manosphere. This ranges from anti-state, laissez-faire, libertarian types on the one hand, to a much uglier streak of ahistorical, quasi-scientific white-nationalist sentiment on the other. For our purposes today, we’ll concern ourselves with the former category—and its immediate ideological neighbors. Whatever the case, I can’t count the number of times I’ve read “liberal,” “left,” or “progressive” as a pejorative in a manosphere article, tweet, or forum post.

The rightward lean is thoroughly unsurprising, since much of society’s ills have successfully been pinned on the specter of the so-called liberal (monolithic) left. The capital-L “Left,” the myth goes, is responsible for feminism, for an activist state that unfairly levels the playing field between men and women by force, and who enables and apologizes for a panoply of negative behaviors from women (and indeed men), from obesity to single motherhood to sexual promiscuity. The left shelters the characters we all hold in contempt: weak, white-knighting manginas and bitchy, short-haired feminists.

Truth be told, this isn’t entirely inaccurate. Many of the supporters of those very things describe themselves as liberals or progressives. Historically speaking, feminism originated—and was advanced—by members of the political left. Today’s self-branded progressives and liberals support candidates of the ostensibly liberal faction, the Democratic Party. Despite all that, problems arise when you start to unpack that over-simplified characterization.

There are entire segments of the left that don’t support any of those movements or fit those descriptions. The left is a diverse lot—one that’s become as ideologically fragmented as the right has in recent decades. Subscribing to a feminist, permissive, or castrated brand of politics isn’t an admission requirement to the left any more than subscribing to Evangelical Christianity is one to the right. One problem is that the distinctions between socially left-leaning, fiscally left-leaning, and other three-dimensional configurations have been blurred and flattened into a dismissive cocktail of talking points.

What’s more, many of the people conventionally lumped into the left aren’t very “left” at all. Take Barack Obama—the favorite scape goat of the conservative right. His politics, like those of the Democratic Party writ-large, are anywhere from center to center-right, by almost any historical or global measure. The notions of “right” and “left” have, quite simply, steadily drifted right in the United States over the past decades. Dwight Eisenhower, the famous example goes, couldn’t even get nominated in the Democratic Party today, never mind his own party.

Yet, the average man (and member of manosphere) has, would, and will benefit from wide array of the progressive politics of an activist state. I, for one, like having my seat belts, meat, and drinking water regulated by more than the "invisible hand of the market." Regulation, of banks and oil companies, for instance—which were steadily relaxed throughout the conservative ascendancy starting in the 1980s—would have prevented, or at least mitigated, a lot of the economic woes that have set America irretrievably back in recent years. The cynical tactic of dismantling federal apparatuses (by de-funding them), allowing them to fail, then pointing the finger at those failures to show how "government is the problem, not the solution," has successfully convinced a lot of people of the ineptitude of the state. This ignores the idea that the state is only as good as whoever is currently running it.

Loading...

I don't like the idea that General Electric pays no income tax and that when I call my credit card a guy in India picks up. I find it increasingly difficult to buy things not made in China. These are, quite plainly, the products of libertarian- and conservative-minded policies in recent decades. Some of these, as we all know, were passed by members of the Democratic Party—like Bill Clinton—who few in the intellectual left would regard as true progressives.

Whether you agree with my politics, or I yours, is immaterial. But, to the degree that, as members of the manosphere, we're all participating in a form of "politics," we do need to agree on one thing: a shift away from a wholesale dismissal of the left. If Red Pill Philosophy is the latest version of manospheric thought, and that branch is to mature into a legitimate and intelligent movement—carrying the mantle of a forceful and articulate response to feminism into mainstream credibility—it will only do so by virtue of operating a big tent. Otherwise, we'll be easily and quickly dismissed ourselves, as little more than another tin-foil-hat, reactionary movement from the extreme right. We're doomed to a collapse under the weight of our own intellectual incoherence, exclusiveness, or oversimplified talking points. Earlier ideologies from the manosphere already carry the burden of being branded as inactive complainers or deluded bigots, by none other than men predisposed to sympathize with their general world-view.

The left, in other words, isn't an enemy of the manosphere. Segments of it are, just like segments of the right are. Like attractive girls who push back against fat acceptance, refuse to wear pajamas in public, scorn effeminate men, and take pride in their own femininity, members of the manospheric left are invaluable allies in a war of complicated allegiances. What's more, the left offers us a set of intellectual tools to build out our beliefs—on matters such as gender and masculinity—into a coherent ideology. Just like the libertarian impulse offers a powerful set of ideas—self-determination, accountability, and suspicion of institutional might—the left offers us protection from the worst abuses of capital, the perils of an impoverished rabble with nothing to lose, and threats to our fair shot in the marketplace. It's time to drop the dubious catch-all that liberals-are-to-blame.

The left has long—and to a certain degree fairly—been stereotyped for the worst of its members: concave-chested, bearded, skinny-jeans wearing, bike-riding, vegan-food eating weaksters and their skrillex-cut, tatted-up, female-bodied girlfriends. But the left is much more than that. It's filled with tough, old-school, manly cats with the balls to stand up to corporate abuse, foreign threats, and, nowadays, the corrosive delusions of feminism.

We still exist. And there are more of us than you realize.

Read More: Is Feminism Its Own Worst Enemy?

Happy 50th Michael

February 20, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

This past Sunday, Michael Jordan turned 50. He is an incomparable individual that transcends sports by way of his talent, achievements and most of all his character. As ~~unarguably~~ arguably the greatest basketball player to ever grace the hardwood, there must be something elevating him to such a high level that, in all honesty, will probably never be replicated.

We all know about his talents and skills, but many athletes have come and gone with incredible talent. We know there are players more physically talented than him (i.e., Lebron) and there are also players with more championships than him (i.e., Bill Russell). So what is it about Michael that made him so great? Initially, nobody can deny his determination and dedication to succeed. Anyone familiar with his legacy knows about his fierce competitive nature that drove him to be so successful. Only a few individuals actually put forth such an abundance of effort on a consistent basis while remaining dedicated to their goals. If any of us, myself included, had even a tenth the dedication, effort and determination to reach our goals as he did, our lives would be incredibly more successful.

But there was a slightly lessor known trait he possessed…something you do not come across on a daily basis. His cockiness. And this was not your run of the mill arrogant bastard. He was at astronomical levels. He believed that he was the best and made no attempts to hide it. What do I mean? Well I put together a few anecdotes that demonstrate Michael's unapologetic and downright cutthroat approach he implemented time and again:

The Shot

Everyone knows about the 1989 game-winning shot over Craig Ehlo to defeat the Cavs in the playoffs. But not everyone knows how cocky Michael was only a few years into his career. Here's an interesting quote from a Chicago Tribune writer that covered the Bulls:

> Although it's difficult to believe now, the Bulls still weren't a major story in Chicago because few considered them championship contenders. So there was limited media traveling. The only regulars were myself, Lacy Banks from the Sun-Times and Kent McDill from the Daily Herald. We'd all picked against the Bulls before the series, Lacy in three and Kent in four. I thought Jordan could win two games, but not three. So I had Cavs in five. The game was about to start and Jordan was pacing in front of the Bulls bench and scorer's table, where we were sitting. Jordan's mood was buoyant, as if he knew. So he stops and first points to Lacy and says, "We took care of you," meaning Lacy's prediction. Then he moves over to Kent and points and says, "And we took care of you." Then he stops in front of me and points and says with a seemingly knowing smile, "And today we > take care of you."

The Cigar and Ferrari

From Chris Webber, who was playing against Jordan in a playoff series:

> I'll never forget, Jordan was sitting on his Ferrari and Pippen was right there and they have a cigar lit. We get off the bus and we have to pass them with a lit cigar. You want to talk about posturing? Forget Phil Jackson. You got Michael Jordan there behind the scenes smoking a cigar before the game, letting us know that he's the Red Auerbach before the game even started. It was almost like, 'I lit the cigar. I'm celebrating already. This is just a formality, you guys getting on the court tonight.
>
> Loading...

Again, the sheer audacity of a man who believes so much in himself that he not only preemptively celebrates a victory, but makes damn sure his competitor knows it too. That's essentially like walking up to a girl, throwing her a towel and telling her it's for cleaning up the sex fluids after you ravage her later tonight.

The Earring

[image]

Seems like just a pure mindfuck?

> The day before game 4 of the Bulls Suns finals with the Bulls leading the series 2-1. Michael and Charles Barkley went golfing. They played 48 holes of golf. And Michael bought Charles a $20,000 diamond earring. Johnny asked MJ, "what did you do all that for?" Michael responded, "he won't get in my way the rest of the series, what's $20,000 to me? Charles thinks we're great friends. I hate that fat f—." Jordan dropped 55 in game 4 and Barkley never touched him once.

"Shoot It"

Pretty harsh. But hey, if you want to shut him up then beat him:

> Series was tied at 2 and Hornets had a chance to win game 5 in Chicago. On the biggest possession of the game, Mugsy had the ball with the Hornets down 1. Jordan backed off of him and told him: “shoot it you f—ing midget.” Mugsy shot it, didn’t come close. A year later Mugsy actually told Johnny Bach that he believes that single play ruined his career. His shot never recovered.

Like anyone else however, he’s had his share of failures. He tried baseball to no avail. He divorced his wife and lost $168 million in the process. Stories of his gambling issues surface from time to time. His hall of fame induction speech was just terrible. But he commands a certain reverence and it is easy to see why. It was his absurd level of self-confidence that created this charismatic persona, one that morphed him into immortality. It oozed through our television sets and infected the general population, whether they were fans or casual observers, old or young, male or female. My grandparents do not speak English, but they know Michael Jordan. I had a strict TV cutoff time when I was a kid, but exceptions were made for Bulls’ games.

He made bold claims, would do outrageous things, only to back them up time and time again. Run your mouth and fail to deliver — you’re just a pompous ass. Run your mouth and not only deliver but destroy your competition in the process — you become an idol.

On a final, completely unrelated note, here’s his fiance. No surprise that after going through that hellish divorce, Michael went for something younger, hotter and foreign…a Cuban born model. To that I say Feliz Cumpleaños, Miguel.

Read More: Learn To Be An Alpha From Athletes

10 Signs A Bar Will Get You Laid

February 21, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

If you're reading this, you already have an advantage over most men going out at night. You've shown you want to focus on getting laid, instead of just following your wolf-pack of bros around to whatever strikes their fancy, at that moment. That's a recipe for failure. Most men going out are too confused or ashamed to admit that they want to get laid, so they can't bring themselves to ask, "what makes a bar great for getting laid." They'll say they're going out "to have fun" or "to drink with friends."

Personally, I don't suffer from any such delusions. I'm comfortable with the fact that I'm only going out to bars to get laid. I've been to a great variety of bars and met with success and failure countless times. And it wasn't random – the best bars for getting laid had certain traits. The more of these traits they had, the more efficient they were for getting laid. Here they are:

1. It's Not Too Loud

In at least one part of the bar, noise levels should be moderate. Generally, you have to talk to a girl before you can fuck her. Girls feel more comfortable going home with a man they've talked to. The quieter your immediate surroundings, the easier it is to have a good conversation. You can check Yelp for the noise levels of venues.

I'll admit, this one is personal – some guys thrive in loud environments, while other men can't be heard in these joints, or even carry on conversations. I'm in the second group – I get exhausted by having to constantly restart conversations, and answer to "What? What?" so I avoid overly loud places.

2. There's A Smoking Section

People who smoke are cooler and sluttier. Smoking sections are always quieter than the rest of the bar, because people like to talk when they smoke – and your conversations will benefit. Carry a pack of smokes so you can use the Greatest Opener of All Time. The mere act of smoking can improve your body language as long as the cigarette is lit – you'll start blowing smoke in her face in a fit of supreme indifference, and that will only pique her interest further.

3. It Has An Outdoor Patio

4. The Drinks Are Cheap And/Or Strong

The pours are strong, and people drink to excess. Even the people who aren't drunk will feel less inhibited. At one such bar recently, I had a hot young thing grabbing my ass as an icebreaker – and she turned out to be sober. Everyone else drinking hard was enough to loosen her up.

5. It's A Little Upscale

Upscale bars tend to have a better female to male ratio, and the girls are looking to mingle. At the shittier bars, girls will roll in with boyfriends and platonic friends, making them more closed off to your approach. College bars are an exception to this pattern – college bars can be middle of the road or even divey and still be as fertile as their competition.

6. You See People Gettin' Down

You see other men successfully meeting – and kissing – women they just met. These bars attract women who are comfortable getting down with strangers. Never underestimate the power of suggestion, and its ability to influence a girl's willingness to hook up with you.

7. The Bar Layout Promotes Mingling

The layout promotes mingling among people, instead of balkanization into private tables and separate seating. Look for places where people are casually socializing with strangers.

8. It's In A Hot Spot

Girls like to feel like they're at the center of the action. They're more drawn to bars that are in the hot parts of town and bars that are new, and getting lots of attention in the local cool crowd.

9. It Attracts Non-Natives

You want a bar that's in a part of town where social networks are weaker. Certain parts of town have more natives than other parts. When someone is not a native, their social networks are weaker, and the hot girls of this group especially are more willing to meet strange men. Every town has neighborhoods where transplants are common, and others where natives dominate. Hang out in the transplant ‘hoods.

10. There Are Fewer Distractions

The venue shouldn’t be dominated by a live band. It’s better for it not to have a live band, or there at least be rooms where the band can be avoided. A live band will easily cockblock you – the girl will be enamored by their strutting on stage, while you are trying to win her attention. You’ll have to try so hard to get anywhere that you’ll probably come off as pathetic anyway, unless you really are there for the band.

Choosing a bar is like playing poker. Even when you play the right hand in poker, you could lose the round. But you win over time by playing the right hand, every round. Choosing bars is the same – you could go to the worst bar in the world tonight and meet the girls of your dreams there… but some bars will yield more results, more consistently. You will never know what would’ve happened if you went elsewhere, but by going to the best bar for you, you’re maximizing your return in the long run.

You may find you did well the first time you went to a bar, and then the magic never returns on subsequent visits. It’s time to move on. Find the bars that give you a consistent return, and patronize them until your results there falter. You’re more like an old man obsessed with his retirement account – you’re looking for steady consistent returns.

Read Next: The 5 Easiest Clubs In The World To Get Laid

About the Author

Emmanuel Goldstein is a pompous git who enjoys the company of girly mistresses, spirited men, endless buffets and luxurious clothes. He can be found on Twitter at @Goldsteineum.

Disqus Commenting Change

February 21, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

I have just installed the Disqus commenting system. All old comments are currently importing to the new system and will appear within 12-24 hours. You can start leaving new comments in the meantime.

Loading...
Disqus has many advantages in the form of sorting and voting, features that are helpful in posts that get over 50 comments. You can still post anonymously without a user account, but you do need to provide a random email address.

As you try out the new system, share your thoughts below so that in one month I can decide if it's worth keeping or reverting back to the old system. Let me know if you notice any bugs.

When Female Ambition Clashes With Reality

February 21, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

There has been a lot of dialogue lately about the challenges career women face when it comes to family formation.

As I predicted earlier, women are beginning to run into the limits of the feminist dream, and some of them (along with their white knight sympathizers) are wondering what to do about it. This comment embodies the general tone from those who are anxious to keep the dream alive:

> Anyone who was serious about increasing the fertility of highly educated women would offer some policy proposals that would make child bearing and child rearing less overwhelmingly expensive for them. Only women at the highest income levels can have children without largely sacrificing all of their other goals. Universal preschool, longer school days and school years, and a more flexible and humane work culture (for everyone) would go a long way towards encouraging educated, middle-class women to have more kids.

And he's not entirely off here—those things would make it easier for women to have more children, and I suspect they would also create at least a slight uptick in the fertility rate.

The problem is that we cannot afford them.

The Price

The United States has budget issues right now that make funding a more expansive public education curriculum problematic. Can the US government afford to oversee a further expansion of its education system (paying for longer school days, longer school years, universal pre-school, more staff to manage all of this, etc) and deal with the coming boomer crunch on top of its other burdens the US maintains?

I don’t know. I’m not going to bet on it.

The problem here is that we have competing forces at work. Women are becoming more ambitious and want to move further and further up the ladder, but are hoping that they can keep some vestiges of the “old days” around. Those vestiges include the ability to find and marry a reasonably attractive male at or above their socio-economic level and the ability to raise a sizable family (the typical American woman desires at least 2 children).

The problem is that their goals clash with these desires.

The Disappearance of Mr. Right

Female dominance in higher education has resulted in fewer men who meet their standards. Educated women prefer men at or above their educational and financial level. Though more women are settling than before (often unhappily), that preference remains quite strong and is likely a product of innate female hypergamy. Women, more often than not, want to date up.

Loading…

When women increased their numbers in college and in the workplace, society did not create more jobs for them. Women simply took a larger share of what was available, which resulted in the displacement of men. This means fewer men with the means to satisfy these females’ requirements for a good husband/provider down the road, and more men who don’t come close to her socio-economic level and frankly couldn’t give a fuck about it.

Though a vocal minority of women say that they could care less about this (they either abstain from children or say they are happy to marry down/settle), the vast majority of still seem to want the ability to make this choice, and many of them no longer have it.

An increasingly large block of the female populace is finding itself unable to get what it wants romantically, despite having been told for most of their life that this would certainly come to them.

Working Compromises

The workplace conditions show us another clash. Women wanted the ability to excel in the traditionally male spheres of the working world, making equal salaries for the effort. This means doing equal work—there is no way around this. If we begin to make more allowances for women to take more time from work voluntarily, we'll have to accept that the pay gap may never close. Female employees will be rendered less productive because of this, and thus could not be compensated at precisely the same level. Many feminists simply will not accept this.

If we try to compensate for this by forcing men to take time off concurrently via male parental leave, we risk further lowering productivity of the workforce as a whole, and endangering our ability to maintain the economic strength and the wealth we now take for granted, the same strength/wealth that funds many of the benefits feminists are demanding. When we artificially lower male productivity in order to compensate women and enforce gender equality, we pay for it. There's no guarantee that we can afford that price.

The only viable solution would be for these women to accept an inability to succeed in the male professional sphere AND raise a family in a traditional sense without some massive compromise.

These women would perhaps call for increased work flexibility and parental leave, but would have to accept the persistence of a pay gap in return. These women would have to be willing to sacrifice their ambition for the sake of raising a family in the somewhat traditional ways they want to raise them, and accept that there is no way to avoid making that compromise.

As I said before, many of these privileged women (we are discussing an issue that deals almost exclusively with white, middle/upper class American women here) simply will not accept this. So long as that is the case, there is no real solution to their problems.

Read Next: Average Never Got Anyone Anywhere

Why You Should Become a Minimalist

February 21, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

The most abused word in the English language is “need.” If you’re reading this post, I contend there is little that you actually “need” beyond what you currently possess. You have ample electricity to power your computer in a climate-controlled environment, with running water and food in your well-stocked refrigerator. Why, then, do you always hear people talking about how they “need” more stuff?

Humans have a deeply-rooted drive to compete with each other, and advertisers capitalize on this impulse. Take a moment to picture the average person that you meet. What do they have to take pride in? Buying the newest thing allows them to join the club of consumers, and for a fleeting moment to be measured on an equal playing field despite their personal shortcomings. The internal pain of their life’s problems dissipates for the split second they can boast superiority over everyone who doesn’t have the same shiny widget.

This conspicuous consumption creates a self-fulfilling ego-investment in the broken system. Although borrowing money for useless luxury purchases subjugates people into debt slavery, the mentality is “If I paid $30,000 for this hunk of metal and I’m working overtime to pay it off, it MUST be worth it — and so are other things that the commercials are telling me to buy.” Quite literally, we are working jobs we hate so we can buy shit we don’t need.

If you’re reading this blog, you are likely a male aged 25-35 who wants to do one or more of the following: quit your job, travel, explore a location-independent income, get yourself in shape, take charge of a relationship, and learn valuable life skills. A minimalist mentality helps you do all of these things.

Having fewer possessions forces you to properly place a higher value on experiences. This will make it safer and more fulfilling to travel because you are in touch with what truly makes you happy. If you’re working on a side hustle or starting a business, the desire for needless possessions drains your disposable income levels and prevents you from taking risks. “If my business fails, will I have to give up my car lease?” Preempt this loss aversion by having less to lose.

If you want to move to a better city with a higher cost of living, having excess stuff sets a floor on how much rent you’ll pay to house your crap, and in turn how much you can spend on leisure activities. If you’re a distractable person like me, removing visual “noise” from your area makes you more likely to create things with your mind, and less likely to fixate on your environment.

Loading...

Throwing or giving useless things away is a good first step, since possessions have a psychic weight that you may not realize until you rid yourself of them. To fully embrace this mindset, you must also kill the desires that have been inculcated in you since birth.

Cut down on your “consumer impressions” by watching less TV and trying to rationally dissect the techniques used in the few advertisements you encounter. Find fulfillment in hobbies and work, rather than chasing the rush and eventual hedonic adaptation from consuming. Much like a drug, successive bouts of consumerism create a higher baseline where your overall happiness is no different, but you end up having a bunch of useless crap that ties you down.

Girls can also be troublesome in this endeavor. Ever notice that when a girl spends extended time in your living space, she beings to tell you that you “need” a new this, or a replacement that? A good friend once told me “All human beings have an innate desire to create — most women can’t, so they redecorate.” Limit your exposure to women who attempt to thwart a separation from consumerism. Ironically, men likely to lead a minimalist/nomadic lifestyle are simply more attractive to prime-SMV women. Think about whether the starving artist or the bottle service guy throwing money around ends up getting more ass. As always, watch how women behave rather than listening to what they say when they are protesting your lifestyle change.

Ask yourself this: If your house burned down and you had nothing but the clothes on your back, what would you be worth to society and to yourself? How would you feel about losing all of the possessions you own? Most people plugged into the matrix would rather die than think about replacing Aunt Gladys’s vase or baby pictures they haven’t looked at in a decade. This is an illusion. Once you begin to divorce yourself from this emotional investment to “stuff” you will implicitly place more value on your skills and past experiences.

Minimalism is not a synonym for frugality or cheapness. I don’t wear a potato sack while pedaling a used tricycle to work every day — I simply choose to allocate my money to experiences (and a few possessions) that will fulfill me and advance my life’s purpose, rather than enslave myself into debt for trinkets that will collect dust somewhere.

Taking the red pill is about learning to separate your priorities and desires from those that society forces upon you. I don’t promise that adopting this mindset will make everybody happy, but it will certainly help to clarify what contributes to your individual sense of self, and will allow you to focus on the internal and external traits that exemplify a man of value.

Don’t Miss: 14 Things I Learned From The Wealth of Nations

Why Sex Ratios Are So Important

February 21, 2013 | by Harry | Link | Original Link

There seems to be a belief that has developed in the PUA community where game is so powerful it can even overcome common sense. I often wonder just how much theory is put forward by guys who are actually getting laid with any regularity and how much of what they say is based on real life experience or any noticeable results they have had at all. I cant help but think that for every half decent PUA out there, there are tons of keyboard warriors who simply miss the point completely. I often imagine tons of basement dwelling geeks who seem to think that they can unlock some sort of secret combination of words or actions that will lead them to the pot of gold at the end of the rainbow. A nice neat formula that they can follow in a systemic manner which helps them overcome the lack of social skills they have.

It does not matter how good your skills are or how good you think your game may be, there are always going to be mitigating circumstances that increase or decrease your chances of getting laid. There are a few basics that either make your life easy or make your life hard. A basic understanding of this will allow you to calibrate your approach accordingly for the sort of results you are looking to achieve.

Game Is Paper Mache

Game is the illusion of real social status, its not actual social status. Its a basic understanding of female psychology that allows you to present yourself as someone that gives her the tingles and makes you a fuckable prospect. All you are doing is projecting an aura of high status and pulling on her emotional strings. Its not the be all and end all though, its merely one aspect of a man as a total package. The more a man has to offer as a total package, the hotter the women he is going to fuck on average.

This is something men need to learn to accept. Shit like money counts. So do looks. So does a good body. So does genuine social status. Nothing is ever a complete deal breaker or a prerequisite which is why men are lucky, but the more you have going for you the better your chances are of getting laid and the less effort that will be required on your part.

Your perceived status is relevant to the men around you however, because there needs to be a comparison that is made for any hierarchy to ever exist in the first place. It’s the same with women, whose status is determined predominantly by their looks relevant to the women around them. This is a very basic fundamental and there is no getting away from it.

Simply put, competition determines success for both men and women and it’s why ratios count as much as game, looks, physique or money. When ratios favor women, the end result will be highly picky women with bitch shields a mile high, even though looks-wise they would be considered very average. When the shoe is on the other foot however, women are forced to deal with slimmer pickings and their attitudes will adjust as a result.

There is a basic psychology at play here, and the simple fact is that game is nothing more than a play on that psychology at the end of the day. The crappier the ratios, the harder it becomes to adjust for it. Anyone who says that ratios make no difference and good game is good game, simply has no understanding of game or female psychology in the slightest.

Location Matters More Than You Think

What this means is that one of the most productive ways to ensure you are maximizing your chances of getting laid with hot women regularly instead of fat, drunk whores is to ensure that you are choosing the right sort of environments in which to concentrate your efforts. I don't care how good you think your game is, how beta you think everyone else is, there is no getting around the impact ratios will always have on your success rates. A model in a dive bar is high value, that same model at a Victoria's Secret event is average. This is why you don't spend your time looking for sausage fests—you look for happy hunting grounds where the ratios are in your favor. Yes, sometimes you can score when competition is high, but your chances are slimmer and the quality you end up with is not always going to be high when you are dealing with average women who have had their own status elevated by all the ugly women surrounding them.

Now with this is mind, I want to get to the point I am trying to make. For some reason, there is a substantial chunk of mentally handicapped "Pick Up Artists" who constantly berate men who prefer to hunt abroad. According to these keyboard warriors, men are going aboard because they cant get laid at home.

"If they had game, they would not need to go anywhere".

Clearly, few of these experts have ever traveled.

Contrary to popular belief, the only guys fucking swathes of hot, fresh ass the minute they get off the plane are the guys banging out pros and semi pros. Or they are not used to much attention from good looking women back home, and to them one new notch a month is a pretty big deal. Foreign women actually tend to be far more conservative than the Western whores we have the pleasure of dealing with, which means that while they are still women and many do still put out early from time to time, they generally require far more effort in many cases. Throw into the mix cultural differences, language problems, the social pressure on them and the occasional stigma of being a possible sex tourist in some places, and you only complicate things further.

Its not that foreign women require zero game to fuck, it's just that there are so many hot women the ratios begin to skew in your favor and this gives you more opportunities with hotter women. You think you are on a run, when in reality you are just in a place where the women are hotter on average. This is the miracle of going to countries where obesity has yet to reach epidemic proportions, which is the primary reason why the women are in a different league.

To drive that point home further, and contrary to popular belief yet again, your social status is not elevated simply because you are a foreigner either. In many cases, it can actually be a huge disadvantage for you. If you think the whole world will want to bang you because of the passport you carry, you are a fool. Sure, it can be an advantage in some places, but it's not always the case. In fact, the easiest women to bang are often the Western tourists, who are looking to get drunk and laid while on holiday.

The Bottom Line

If you are not hitting new ass regularly at home, getting on a plane is not going to going to solve your problems either. Women are women, attraction is attraction, their options determine attitude as much as their culture will. The only thing that will improve is the quantity of quality women, and not just looks-wise either. They are more feminine and they are more natural. Many do not suffer from the same levels of psychosis and entitlement that Western women do. They are, simply put, far better to spend time with on average and far more pleasant to fuck.

In the end you must ask yourself this question: Why would any sane man want to spend his weekends at an over-fished pond that has been ravaged by pollution, chasing the legend of the big cat fish in the deep, when he can just jump on a plane and spend a few weeks chasing big game instead?

Read Next: Why Russian Girlfriends Are Best

6 Most Corrupt And Vile Female Politicians

February 22, 2013 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

Here are six female politicians who actively accelerate the decline of Western civilization. This list begs the question: are female corruption and ugliness correlated? You be the judge.

1. Susan Rice – (D)

Rice blatantly lied about the State Department failure to prevent the Benghazi Massacre. Yet this utterly incompetent and deceptive female is still the current United States Ambassador to the United Nations.

2. Kathleen Sebelius – (D)

She is guilty of violating the Hatch Act and using her official capacity to help get Obama re-elected. Despite breaking the law, this woman still serves as United States Secretary of Health and Human Services.

3. Maxine Waters – (D)

This Congresswoman funneled millions of dollars to a bank in which she and her husband held shares. The House Ethics Committee made the controversial decision to clear Waters of wrongdoing (no surprise that corruption and scandal plagued the investigation). Of course, she is now a ranking member of the Committee on Financial Services, which oversees the banking industry.

4. Janet Napolitano – (D)

Most Americans support border control. They believe it is the government's duty to prevent illegal immigration. The United States Secretary of Homeland thinks differently. Last year she gave blanket amnesty to almost one million illegal immigrants with one stroke of her pen.

Loading…

5. Nancy Pelosi – (D)

The current Minority Leader of the United States House of Representatives has profited from her power. She was involved in various insider-trading scandals. She used her position to benefit friends and family. Pelosi routinely used military aircraft for personal flights when she was House Majority Leader.

6. Cristina Kirchner

She is our bonus foreign corrupt politician. Kirchner is the president of Argentina and queen of “crony capitalism.” Wealthy before taking office, she used her power to amass a fortune. She took cash from foreign leaders. Kirchner also succeeded in plundering the Argentine pension system.

Of course, corruption cuts across all political parties, sexes, and countries. Being a female does not make one more corrupt, but so much for the myth that women make better leaders.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: “Liberals” Are Not The Enemy

How Feminist Censorship Introduced Me To The Red Pill

February 22, 2013 | by yuumuraj | Link | Original Link

Red pill awakenings take many forms. When I was in college, I wrote an article for the student newspaper about an alleged sexual assault. It was one of those situations where a woman got very drunk, had sex with a guy and woke up the next morning with either hazy memory or buyer's remorse.

At first, she said she was raped. When university police tried to go over the details with her, she changed her tune — it had been consensual after all, she said. This was all outlined in police reports.

Cops have told me this is a common situation on campus. The girl will wake up from a night of drunken sex at a frat party with little memory of what had happened the night before. She'll realize she had intercourse and feel violated. When the cops press her for details, her memory sometimes comes back to her. If it doesn't, there are often multiple witnesses, male and female, that remember what happened.

As you can imagine, alcohol blackouts — the loss of memory associated with getting shit-faced drunk — make it extremely difficult to separate these cases from forcible rape. One officer told me, (off the record of course), they were hesitant to press forward with charges that are hard to prove, likely have little merit and will result in a ton of negative publicity for the accused.

But this girl was persistent. She took it to the disciplinary committee, to see if she could hit the guy that way, but the committee — headed by a woman — said there hadn't been any rules violations besides underage drinking.

She later filed lawsuits against the university and the defendant's fraternity.

When I wrote about it, I mentioned she had been intoxicated. Police reports said her BAC was .107 when she got tested — the morning after the party. She also told the disciplinary committee she had been drinking heavily.

I pointed out that, according to state law, women who are that drunk can't really "consent" to sex with a man. Any sex with them is legally considered rape. The police were trying to make it seem like they didn't have any basis for criminal charges, but technically, they did.

The mere mention of alcohol angered a campus feminist group that accused me of blaming the victim and being part of "rape culture." Even though it was fact, they felt I shouldn't have mentioned it.

One email in particular, from a student claiming to be an assault victim, really got to me. She said I was a part of a patriarchal society that shames rape victims, she said, and she wouldn't be shamed. She actually praised herself for being strong and courageous in speaking out against it. She later wrote a letter to the editor in a similar tone.

Loading...

I replied somewhat angrily (I was a pretty typical college liberal at the time), and few things seemed worse than being accused of sexism and support of “rape culture.” I told her she had completely missed the point. The inclusion of her BAC made the victim’s case stronger, not weaker, I said. Had she even read the article?

She forwarded my reply to other members of the group, who acted shocked that I had been so cruel to a sexual assault victim, even though she was the first to make personal attacks. She wasn’t content to say she didn’t like the framing of the article — she accused me of being a patriarchal rape supporter.

They wrote letters to the paper and took to our Facebook page to complain. The Facebook argument was pathetic, with many women buying into the narrative that the story was trying to “blame the victim.” I wondered how college students could have read the article without understanding the gist of it: police could’ve filed charges, but chose not to.

This was a shock because I was hopelessly naive about sexual assault, feminism and “rape culture” at the time. This experience showed me how illogical feminists are. Their feelings and sensibilities seemed to be more important than the facts of the case. This group was mad at me for writing the truth simply because it made the victim look bad.

The whole thing showed me a lot of the flaws I see in the feminist blogosphere every day — the lack of reading comprehension, the use of sexual assault victimhood as a shield against criticism, the lack of accountability, and a radar for anything that could be mildly construed as offensive.

As time goes on, that sphere continues to grow. It seems Slate and The Atlantic have been completely taken over by entitled, perpetually-offended females. Judging by the misandrist dreck spewed on university campuses, it’ll only get worse.

The more time passes, the more I regret my role in the article. Having sex with a drunk woman who consents to sex is not rape. The defendants in the case probably weren’t guilty of anything except sleaziness and poor judgment, at worst. He is lucky to have escaped jail, although his name was dragged through the mud.

The experience taught me some important lessons about writing about sexual assault accusations. But I took a more important life lesson away from it: feminists are full of shit.

If you like this article and are concerned about the future of the Western world, check out Roosh's book Free Speech Isn't Free. It gives an inside look to how the globalist establishment is attempting to marginalize masculine men with a leftist agenda that promotes censorship, feminism, and sterility. It also shares key knowledge and tools that you can use to defend yourself against social justice attacks. Click here to learn more about the book. Your support will help maintain our operation.

Read More: Feminists Try To Debunk False Rape Culture With False Data

5 Principles To Improve Your Public Speaking

February 22, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

---

Over a year ago I decided to join Toastmasters in an effort to improve my public speaking skills. I was never a terrible public speaker to begin with, but I wasn't terrific either. I understood that being an effective public speaker was an important part of being a man and a leader. After all, if you can't string together coherent sentences in front of a large group of people, how will you ever be able to lead them? So I took action and decided to join a local Toastmasters group.

In my experience with Toastmasters, I have learned a lot of different things that make someone an effective public speaker. The following are five principles that I think will make anyone a better public speaker and communicator:

1. Avoid the use of filler words when speaking

I would say this is the most common error people make when speaking in front of a crowd. When people are speaking there is a tendency for them to use filler words (e.g. uhh, umm, like, so etc.) in an effort to buy their brains enough time to come up with another thought. Cut this out to immediately sound more polished. Next time you feel like saying "uhh", pause instead. Wait until you get your next thought in your head and then continue speaking. This will create natural pregnant pauses in your speech that will make you seem more intelligent, poignant, and confident.

2. Maintain solid eye contact

When you are speaking in front of an audience, it is important that you make and maintain eye contact. Making and maintaining eye contact shows people that you are confident in what you are saying. Excessively nervous individuals will have a tendency to avoid eye contact (usually they will look straight ahead or to the side). Make sure to let your gaze linger just a bit longer than you feel is comfortable. Eye contact is very powerful in creating an intimate, seductive environment, and the best speakers know how to use this to their advantage.

3. Use your body

We all know the importance of body language in pick up. The same is true when we speak in front of a group of people. Next time you have to do a presentation or a speech, move around the room. Pace a little. Use the space. This will convey to the audience that you are relaxed and comfortable in your environment. Use your hands and body to make controlled, open gestures, which is another sign of high confidence. Just about the worst thing you can do is stand there like a stiff board with your hands in your pockets.

4. Alter your voice

This principle is a bit more advanced but it really separates the great speakers from merely the good ones. The ability to use your voice by altering its pitch and tone can dramatically improve your speaking. In fact, without this ability you will come off as flat and monotone (sort of like the teacher in the movie Ferris Bueller's Day Off). People will tune you out. Furthermore, it's important that your voice inflects to complement the emotion you are trying to convey. So when you are speaking about something sad your tone becomes more sombre, compared to when you are speaking about something exciting when your voices raises a few octaves.

5. Rehearse Your Material

This principle is a bit different from the others but is just as important. In order to be a good speaker, you need to practice. For example, think of the last time you watched a funny comedian on stage. Do you think he just thought up a bunch of jokes and jumped on stage to deliver them? Of course he didn't—he practiced that material over and over again. He refined his delivery and honed his craft until he came up with something funny. You should treat your presentations and speeches the same way. Rehearse your material enough so that you feel comfortable with it. Once you get there, delivering it in front of your audience will be that much easier.

So there you have it, five principles that will immediately make you an effective public speaker. But take another look at those principles; do you notice anything about them? If you realized that these principles will also make you better at attracting women you would be correct. If you apply these principles to your game I guarantee you will also be more successful with women.

Read Next: 5 Ways To Improve Your Online Game

4 Tips For Men Who Are Natural Introverts

February 22, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

To me, an introvert is a man who is well versed in social dynamics and attracting women, but chooses to spend his free time alone reading books, learning, and lifting weights. He prefers having mini-relationships or a harem structure over one night stands. He'll have a small social circle and will meet women mostly during the day or online.

The benefits of being an introvert:

- more time to spend improving oneself, pursuing hobbies, and building a lifestyle
- less work to maintain satisfaction in the realm of women
- natural inward focus and need for time alone (natural aloofness)
- can play the lone wolf angle exuding confidence and dominance
- naturally mysterious
- success/failures will be easier to analyze

Actual footage of me in a bar.

The costs of being an introvert:

- a smaller social circle will mean fewer opportunities to meet women
- easy to rationalize not approaching or not socializing
- may fall into the trap of approaching solely online
- many introverts will not spend their alone time productively (instead of learning a new language they will spend all day watching movies or focusing on something that will not benefit them, like video games)
- easy to fall into laziness

A lot of introverted men feel they need to be someone they're not in order to be successful with women. This isn't at all the case. Here are four tips for introverts that will help them get laid:

1. Don't feel the pressure to go out and fuck women just for the approval of friends. The ability to get pussy doesn't define you. Don't worry about if other people think you're cool or social, a common problem with introverts.

2. When out and about, focus outwardly. Focus your energy on being friendly and approaching for two or three-hour stretches. As soon as you get home, recharge your batteries with alone-time.

3. Day game is your friend. Follow El Mech's day game hack. Inconvenience yourself by taking short shopping trips, getting your coffee in a coffee shop, reading in a coffee shop, not listening to music or playing with your phone on the bus, and talking to people at the gym.

4. Don't do activities inside your house. If you want to watch the game, get a few buddies together and go to a bar. Go to a pub for dinner every once in a while instead of cooking. Buy a book at the bookstore instead of shopping online.

The introvert must realize both his strengths and his weaknesses. He must maximize his strengths by focusing his alone time on his own pursuits. He must minimize his weaknesses by actively being social and putting himself in as many public situations to meet women. He must avoid the traps of laziness, routine, and most of all, he mustn't rationalize not talking to women just because he self-identifies as an introvert. In short, be Bruce Wayne.

Read Next: An Easy Technique To Be Incredibly Interesting to Women

Your Parents Were Middle Class Because Of The Soviet Union

February 23, 2013 | by TheCaptainPower | Link | Original Link

---

I was born on a cold, windy, night in December of 1979.

My father was overwhelmed with joy to bring home his first born son for the holidays, but as with all new parents, he was anxious about the financial obligations of raising a new family.

He had just been hired to teach business classes at a NYC community college, receiving a full-time tenured position right after his first interview. After he was hired my mother resigned from her job in Manhattan, and she planned on being a stay at home mother until my brother (born in 1982), and I were in grade school.

As my father sat down at the dining room table and started to review his financials, he had to make a tough decision between 3 investment options:

A) 5 year CD in a bank paying 12%

B) Mutual funds (on Jan 2, 1980, the Dow Jones closed at 847 and paid a average dividend of 6%)

C) A large home in Brooklyn with a driveway for $69,000. (NYC median income was @18k)

After some quick deliberation, my 32-year-old father decided on choice (B) AND choice (C). With a stay at home wife and a new-born infant, my father was able to purchase a large home in Brooklyn, a Ford Escort, and his union matched his mutual fund 401k contributions up to 10% annually.

So how was my father and other families like ours able to do it? How can a first year college professor purchase a home with two kids, and a stay at home wife?

BECAUSE OF THE SOVIET UNION.

Let's be honest, my father didn't have any competition. From the end of WWII to the end of the Cold War, The United States did not have any strong foreign competition, and we can thank the Soviet Union for that.

The Soviet Union, and the Iron Curtain that it cast over Europe, was the best thing that ever could happen to the United States. With little foreign competition, many U.S companies were able to form strong labor unions, the government could apply trade protections, and we also had an embargo with the entire Soviet Bloc including China, Russia, Ukraine, and half of Germany. My father's main competition was mostly with other European-Americans living in the United States.

So When Did Everything Change?

Loading...

In late 1989 the Berlin Wall started to come down, and the Soviet Union was disbanded in late 1991. Growing up in Brooklyn there was always some Chinese students in my classes, but in the mid 1990's is when we started to see a lot of Russians, Ukrainian's, and Pollack's immigrate to NYC. My first impression was that they were mostly very poor, but extremely educated, and now almost 20 years later they have been fully integrated into American society.

When your father went for an interview in the late 1970's or early 80's, he was competing against "Vinny the Italian", "Manny the Greek", and "Frank from Pittsburgh". Today if you apply for a job teaching business at City University in New York, you are interviewing against 15 Russians with kick ass GPA's, your IT department at work is run by 35 Indians, and 95 percent of the items you that you own in your house are made in China.

My father had me around the same age that I am now, so let's look at my 3 investment options:

A) 5 Year CD paying 1.5%

B) Mutual Funds: Dow Jones at 14,000 (will it shoot to 150,000 ?) with an average dividend of 1.4%

C) Purchase my parent's house for $890,000 (medium NYC income is$56K)

America has changed. Job security doesn't exist, and a two income household has become a 3 or 4 income household. That includes either two working adults with two working grandparents, or two working adults with grandma and her social security check. The middle class is gone in America and it isn't coming back anytime soon. Outside of a major world war, the United States middle class will barely exist for the next several generations.

So what are the children of middle class European-American's going to do?

A) Work harder

B) Find a middle class society outside of the U.S.

But now we have the American government paying out more in benefits then it collects in revenue. This obviously creates a big economic problem. I've always planned to live in the United States for my entire life , but if the living conditions start to quickly deteriorate I will sell my possessions and get on the first boat to Asia.

With two major recessions since 2001, and with the U.S. on the brink of another major one, how much more can the American middle class take?

Read More: Do Poor Americans Deserve An Ivy League Education?

Mike Tyson On Fear

February 23, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

---

Mike Tyson was arguably one of the greatest heavyweight boxers of all time. Few boxers could match his combination of speed, power, and technique. Mike was knocking out grown men when he was just a teenager. He became the youngest heavyweight champion in history at the age of 20.

For those of you who remember watching his fights (or have seen his old fights on youtube) it was typical of him to score a brutal knockout in the first few rounds. Tyson had a very aggressive and unrelenting style. He beat many guys off of brute intimidation alone. In fact, the great Larry Holmes even admitted he was scared for the first time in his life when he stepped into the ring to fight Tyson.

But what a lot of people don't know is that for the most part it was all an act. Tyson was far from the fearless and totally confident fighter he pretended to be. The confident, fearless attitude was something that was instilled in him by his trainer and mentor, the late Cus D'amato:

> I tell my kids, what is the difference between a hero and a coward? What is the difference between being yellow and being brave? No difference. Only what you do. They both feel the same. They both fear dying and getting hurt. The man who is yellow refuses to face up to what he's got to face. The hero is more disciplined and he fights those feelings off and he does what he has to do. But they both feel the same, the hero and the coward. People who watch you judge you on what you do, not how you feel.

At a young age Tyson learned how to harness and control his own fear and project it on to his opponents. He kept up a fearless attitude to psych everyone out. In other words, Tyson knew the art of skullduggery:

The concept of a fearless warrior is a complete myth. We all feel fear. But as men we are not judged so much by what we say but rather what we do. A man separates himself based on his actions, not feelings.

I highly recommend watching the 2008 documentary Tyson for more great wisdom.

Read More: Do Men Fear Commitment?

You Should Go Out When The Weather Sucks

February 24, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

Not everyone is fortunate enough to live in a climactic paradise of perpetual sun, skimpy clothing, and smooth vajayjays. If your city is less than ideal in this respect, you need to push through the inertia and hit the streets twice as hard when the weather is bad.

The simple act of getting out in these situations will help minimize several demographics that stand in your way of gaming beautiful women:

1. Couples

“Oh honey it’s rainy out, let’s stay in and play with Pookums/watch a movie on the couch/avoid overtly acknowledging the monotony of our existence.” People in relationships are actively looking for reasons to stay home instead of patronizing the “creepy” bar scene, and are unlikely to brave the elements so they can pay $15 for a pair of Miller Lites. This also cuts down on committed women who are out with their friends, since the combination of bad weather and not looking for men is often enough to keep them home in pajamas even if they want to be social.

2. Bros who only care about getting drunk

“Fuck this rain, brah. Let’s kill this 30 rack of Keystone and play Halo.” These creatures may or may not pose a serious threat to your game, but they can take up space, make it more difficult to get a drink at the bar, and generally sour the atmosphere of your favorite laid-back pickup spot.

3. Large groups of girls out for no particular reason

Only when they are period-free, went to yoga class, are feeling adventurous, someone else is paying, and Halley's comet is nigh will typical American girls get off the couch, put makeup on, and go out in public. Crappy weather is just another barrier to achieving this activation energy. Women in big groups are often difficult to approach and more likely to have a cockblocking mother hen among them, so their absence improves your expected value for every approach.

Which populations does bad weather not dissuade as much?

1. Girls who are out looking for men

2. Guys who are serious about the game.

"Bad weather game" is frenetic. You must be ready to bounce venues early and often, and the usual patterns of demographics and timing at your favorite places do not necessarily apply. You should be prepared for worse guy/girl ratios and fewer people on the scene in general.

The upside? You are likely to see a higher percentage of approachable girls, since they had a compelling reason to put themselves in a situation to meet people despite the obvious inconveniences. Bad weather can work particularly to your advantage if you have good logistics — say, an apartment within quick walking distance. Craft your approaches towards dropping small bait about about your lifestyle, and be ready to have a good reason (new music to listen to, a special drink, an impressive view) to suggest moving to your nearby warm and dry lair.

Going out in bad weather may seem counterintuitive, but it presents one option for optimizing your nights out and maximizing the power of your approaches when others are unwilling to grind. If your game is tight and you are looking to take fewer but higher-percentage shots, you need to go out when the weather sucks.

Read More: Showing Value Before The Approach

About the Author

Black Knight co-authors Man Ex Machina, a new manosphere blog about game, dating, and self-improvement. Find him on Twitter here.

Anonymous Goes After Writer On Behalf Of Tumblr Feminists

February 24, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

---

A month ago I caught a post on Matt Forney's blog called How To Rape Women And Get Away With It [now removed]. Here were a couple excerpts:

> 2. When you're done raping your victim, kill her. Also self-explanatory. Dead men don't tell tales, and dead women don't file police reports. But because this generation is completely wussified, modern rapists can't even work up the nerve to slap their victims across the face after they're done.
>
> […]
>
> You might be tempted to just shove the body in the trunk of your 1992 Ford Festiva and dump it in the nearest body of water, but the problem with lakes and rivers is that it'll eventually wash ashore, and then people will start asking questions. You'd have to live near the ocean and be willing to motorboat out into international waters for this to have a chance of working.

Matt has put out some fine writing, but I didn't find this piece to be especially funny or powerful. Yet regardless of its distasteful quality, it was obvious he didn't sincerely advocate rape. He used his imagination not unlike the authors of 50 Shades Of Gray or The Story of O, popular books where female characters are put through abusive situations by men.

As you can imagine, Matt's post went viral within the feminist sphere, particular on Tumblr and Twitter. Here are some sample tweets:

> I wonder if this @realmattforney has a job. Because he won't after his employers see his "how to rape women" blog: mattforney.com/2013/01/22/how…
>
> — Jillian C. York (@jilliancyork) February 22, 2013

Threat to destroy his employment: check.

> Hi @realmattforney! Just so you know, you will die suddenly through a just act of god. Killing you would be too boring. I don't have time. — Stephen Ira (@supermattachine) February 22, 2013

Prayer to have him killed: check.

> Can we just report this guy @realmattforney "How to Rape Women & get away with it" for writing this crap #VAW #Rape #EverydaySexism — Ayesha (@ashsultana) February 22, 2013

Threat to report him to governmental authority: check.

> @realmattforney as if women arent raped enough, thank you for giving men

> DIRECTIONS on how to ruin lives and psychologically destroy people.
>
> — Mackenzie Halford (@Wish11x11) February 22, 2013
>
> Loading…

Tone deaf obliviousness to satire: check.

> @jilliancyork @realmattforney Can we, like, track this guy down and slap him until he bleeds and cries, right now? Would that be possible?
>
> — Mace (@MaceStampede) February 22, 2013

Desire to physically harm him: check.

> @realmattforney you know you've fucked up with you're "How to Rape Women and Get Away with It" Article…. ticktock for you
>
> — AnonymousU.K (@Anonuk7) February 23, 2013

Involvement of Anonymous: che… wait, what?

Matt later confirmed that he was indeed attacked by Anonymous:

> For the record, Anonymous did pull off a DDoS attack on my blog. I couldn't care less if they attacked me and me alone (the address/phone number that feminist trolls got off my domain's WHOIS profile are both out of date, the former by about six years), but they did me in when they announced that they were going to dox and harass my family members. They actually gave me the names of my parents and my little sister (I have two sisters, they missed one).

The irony of course is that Anonymous makes itself out to be a collective that protects free speech against the state, but here we have them squelching one man's legal free speech. Either you believe in free speech or you don't, and while I didn't care for Matt's article, he has a right to publish it and for its contents to be read. Is Anonymous also attacking those who disseminate the Anarchist Cookbook, which teaches readers how to kill people with bombs? I doubt it.

It's troubling that fat feminists can whine on Tumblr and Anonymous members swiftly white knight for them by threatening writers who didn't break any laws. Any type of work you publish must now be approved by feminists or else they could order Anonymous to attack you. It's no surprise that this attack came from the UK branch of Anonymous, where that government has full leeway to put people in jail for "provoking hatred." I wonder if American Anonymous members approve of the UK branch censoring an American writer.

It's a sad day when men attack other men to protect the "honor" of unattractive women, especially when those women aren't looking after the interests of the males who participated in the attack. I know a lot of people are rooting for Anonymous' brand of vigilante justice, but I wonder how they'll feel when Anonymous decides to come after them for merely hurting the feelings of a few women.

Postscript: As you can see from the failed tweet excerpt above, the Anonymous UK account has since deleted tweets that threatened Matt.

Sales vs. Game

February 24, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

I very recently had to quit my job working in the door-to-door sales division of a major company, due to no longer being able to work full-time hours. From the first day of training to the day I quit I began to notice that game and sales have a great deal in common, something that has been noted by a number of men in the manosphere. After having spent a little bit of time in door to door sales, I have come to conclude that while there is a great deal of overlap between them in terms of concepts, there are a few key differences.

During the induction process for my job, the company gave us a number of public speaking tests to measure our competence and suitability for the job, including a short impromptu speech about oneself and a number of mock sales pitches of random bizarre items to be presented to the group on the spot. My item was fluoro-green table tennis mesh. More than half of potential employees in my batch failed and were asked to leave.

The managers had weeded out those they felt were not confident enough to sell to other people. Why? Because just like in game, confidence is king. There is an extremely strong correlation between confidence and success with both women and sales.

One day during our training week, my boss took my group for the day and ran through the key concepts of sales. While explaining each of them he continuously referred to one example: chatting up a girl in a bar. He even briefly mentioned the term Neuro-Linguistic Programming (NLP), something that I'd never heard outside of a game context before.

Since sales and gaming women were used so interchangebly, I began to realize how many tactics and concepts could be applied to both. One example being the classic sales concept of "assuming the sale", which my boss laughably explained with the example of buying a girl a drink in a bar by opening her with the line "What are you drinking?" before getting two of that drink and having them with her. Makes me wonder exactly how much money he's pissed down the drain on that move.

Building Momentum

Momentum is another key concept that game and sales share in common. In my job, sales were not extremely infrequent. The average employee made around half a dozen sales in a full time work week. As such, every time we'd get one we'd feel a dopamine rush that would get us into "state". We'd feel like a boss and keep going at the job with more energy and confidence, netting more sales. As such the first sale of the day was always the hardest to make.

The concept of momentum is equally important in game, but is achieved in a much different way. On a night out, doing a few warm up approaches (even if they went nowhere) would be enough to get me into state, building the momentum and buzz to approach freely, similar to how you'd feel approaching after a few drinks. In sales however, talking to potential customers did not give me any sort of momentum. I only got my momentum through my successes and not the process itself, unlike game where momentum is achieved through both.

Loading...

Speaking of alcohol, in the specific type of sales I did, at least everybody would chug energy drinks like no tomorrow for the job. I personally never saw the appeal of it when I wasn't sleep deprived, but my teams reliance on Red Bull and Mother reminded me of guys using alcohol as a crutch to approach. My team would have one large energy drink at the beginning of the sales day and another halfway through, spacing their intake out like most pick up guys do with alcohol while approaching at night.

Building Prospects

One of the keys to direct sales is contacting as many people as possible. The more people you talk to the more likely you are to get a sale. A certain percentage of people you talk to will be the "yes customers" who want just what you're offering and don't even really need to be persuaded very much to sell them. This is basically the game equivalent of approaching till you find a girl that needs dick that night. It also takes more confidence and skill to convert "the maybes."

Just like in game there is a direct correlation between the amount of effort you put in and your results. The more "contacts" you make in the day and the more you persevere with each one the more sales you will get. It really is a numbers game.

Building Value

The most common comparison people make between the sales and game skillsets is that between pitching your product and "DHV'ing". There is a key difference between them however. The whole "sell yourself" mentality can be harmful in game depending on how how you go about it, especially if you try to logically "sell" yourself to a girl like you would with a product in your sales pitch, which not only fails to hit the girls emotional buttons and comes off needy as if you're trying to impress her.

With girls it is ideal to flip the script, so to speak, and get her to sell herself to you and work for your approval. If similar can be done in sales I did not come across it, at least in what I sold.

Although the male salesmen were above average in terms of alphaness, I don't believe their experience could easily translate into cold approaching if you threw them into the deep end. There isn't any "approach anxiety" for door to door, and their experience in selling their product to strangers wouldn't give them many transferable reference experiences to gaming. 90% of what we'd say to each potential customer is the same as what we had said to the one before.

While many of the concepts of sales and game can be applied to one another, the visceral experience of selling and gaming are very different from each other. A confident guy who can ramble a lot and command authority can exceed in both. Therefore I personally wouldn’t recommend getting a job as a door-to-door salesmen unless it’s temporary and your short on cash.

Read Next: Now You Need Game To Get A Job

John The Baptist Syndrome

February 25, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

There's been a few articles here at ROK lately that got several of our readers all worked up. One of them was written by me, where I advised men not to go all red pill at work and lose their jobs, and the other was by bacon regarding his vasectomy.

I'm not going to write a thesis in defense of either of these two articles, because they can stand (or fall) on their own merit. But what I will do is discuss the two primary philosophies that abound in the manosphere. The primary difference between the two philosophies is that one can be achieved through personal commitment, while the other requires external validation, cooperation, and commitment from those who would not benefit from validating, cooperating, and committing.

If you follow me on twitter, you'll see that my tagline says "Don't just enjoy the decline. Facilitate it." That's my basic philosophy in life, and the fundamental platform for all of my writings. I believe that society is too far gone to be brought back, and without a complete raze and rebuild brought on by a complete social revolution, your sons and your son's sons will be dealing with this crap 100 years from now.

To this end, instead of focusing on fighting the ills of feminism and liberal hogwash in society, I fight off the ills of feminism and liberal hogwash in my life. Sometimes the best way to rid my station of external fem and lib forces (redundant) is to be an asshole and call it like I see it, and sometimes it's to be quiet and manipulate the situation behind the scenes. It's often a blend of the two, and occasionally I find it best to just simply walk away altogether. Regardless, whichever path meets my goal is the path I choose, and all paths lead to personal freedom with a side of sweet, sweet poosy.

I call this More Awesome than a Charming and Devastatingly Handsome Alpha Nuclear Bomb Wrapped in all the Super Friends Combined Syndrome.

This path isn't for everyone, and I recognize that. In order to pull this off, you need to have charisma, tacit intelligence, and enough social insight to recognize and maximize the difference between friendships, relationships and partnerships while simultaneously knowing how to play organized society off of institutionalized society. Not many men can do this, and not all of those who can do it well. It's more of a mindset and philosophy than a list of actions, but the bottom line is you don't game women; you game the universe because the universe is your bitch.

Don't get it? Well, that's why you're probably a guy with John the Baptist Syndrome; a voice crying in the wilderness "Make straight the way for the Patriarchy!"

Copied and pasted from a medical journal that doesn't exist but totally should:

Loading...

John the Baptist Syndrome (JTBS) is a disease of the mind caused by nostalgia viruses. Characteristic symptoms are anger, butthurt, comment thread hijacking, and selective white knightery. Other symptoms can occur, like not-oneitis oneitis, supplicating to women and manning up the Christian conservative way instead of the liberal way, and fighting those who refuse to fight alongside you instead of fighting those you claim to be fighting. Symptoms of JTBS usually last for a length of time inversely correlated to the male patient's SMV.

If you think you may be suffering from John the Baptist Syndrome, I encourage you to take the test below. Knowing your risk level is an important first step.

1. Do you call yourself MGTOW, but would secretly slit your own mother's throat for the chance to date an HB7 for 10 minutes? (C'mon… you know who you are… and we do too…) ☐ Yes ☐ No

2. Does the thought of seeing a diamond you paid for shine high atop a finger that's been wrapped around my dick turn you into a game hater? ☐ Yes ☐ No

3. Do you think men should collectively lead women back to femininity because you can't personally pass the giant shit tests of the sex-positive feminist world? ☐ Yes ☐ No

4. Do you believe a man cannot be a "real man" unless he procreates like billions of other men and farm animals have routinely done? Is this because the only way you'll ever get pussy is by offering to be a provider for a woman and her child, and you'd really like to have your only option reframed as a choice? ☐ Yes ☐ No

5. Do you derail the comments threads of any post that advises men to better themselves in a way that you yourself do not have the backbone or resources to do? ☐

Yes □ No

6. Do you lack the capacity to even imagine a world in which masculinity can be defined without sacrificing something to the female imperative? Must you give at least something to some woman somewhere in order to identify yourself as man? □ Yes □ No

7. Do you want men to stop pursuing financial independence, personal happiness, intellectual stimulation, and social and physical health (collectively referred to by JTBS sufferers as "chasing pussy") and join you in your internet crusade to save society? Is the real reason you're so worried about society and the return of the patriarchy is so that a woman will be socially forced to take your fat, pasty broke ass seriously? □ Yes □ No

8. Are you so jealous of the success of others that you take pride in your state of disrepair? Do you see yourself as a martyr for the cause – a leader in the movement to bring society back – yet you can't get any attention from anyone unless you drop troll comments on the internet? □ Yes □ No

9. Do you hide behind Jesus or Ronald Regan to justify the symptoms listed above? □ Yes □ No

If you answered "Yes" to two or more of these questions, consult your doctor immediately. John the Baptist Syndrome, when left untreated, can be dangerous. If you'd like more information on JTBS prevention, or if you'd like to learn how to enjoy and facilitate the decline while still being successful and surrounding yourself with feminine women, take two red pills from the ROK archives and call me in the morning.

Read Next: Is This The Most Deluded Woman In The World?

G Manifesto Game On A Neil Skywalker Budget

February 25, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

Some people doubt that the author of G Manifesto is the real deal, because he does impossible things like put on a tie. Me, I'm a believer.

But what's the broke and (hopefully) young international playboy to do? Can a college student borrow from the G's philosophy, and make it his own? Yes he can. It's 100% possible to run G Manifesto Game On A Neil Skywalker Budget. All you have to do is follow these three steps:

1. Be The Best Dressed Man In Whatever Room You're In

James Bond wears $10,000 suits that have been tailored for him by the best that Savile Row has to offer. A sophomore whose dad is a plumber doesn't have that kind of cash to play with.

But here's the thing: if you can't afford a high-quality suit, you're probably not hanging out with people who can recognize one.

If you're just a broke kid, grab something off the rack for a few hundred bucks and look better than all your buddies in their jeans and button-ups. Once you have a career and start making a bit of money, you can upgrade to some decent retail brands. A nice collection of well-tailored Calvin Klein, Hugo Boss, and Zara joints, combined with some stylish shirts, ties, squares and other accessories, will put you a cut above the majority of your peers.

Once you've been working a few years, you can get good-quality bespoke work done in HK and Bangkok for under $1000/suit.

By the time you hit your mid-thirties, hopefully you're making enough that a few suits costing in the mid-four figures, and a lineup of shirts and accesories to match, is completely realistic. But until then, just go with whatever you can afford, and you'll still reap 95% of the benefits of actually dressing like an extra from Ocean's 11.

2. Choose Your Venues

There are two questions you need to ask yourself before you plan your night. The first is: Would James Bond dig this place?

Loading...
More generally, take a minute to visualize the sort of man you want to be. Now start going to venues that are congruent with that man. 90% of people go to the same dingy college bars that appeal to the fat middle of America's bell curve of class. On a long enough time scale, every man is the company he keeps.

Question number two: Is this the sort of place a hot girl would like?

Girls like places with expensive drinks and steep cover, because they fill the venue with guys with money. Would it be cool if girls were smart enough to see the appeal of dollar drink night with an awesome Dropkick Murphy's cover band? Yes, yes it would. But they are not. If The Hunt is your priority, spend your nights in the kind of high-end places favoured by women looking for high-quality men. Spending twenty bucks at the start of the night to triple your chances of a solid lay is money well spent.

3. Act The Part

When uncertainty strikes, ask yourself: how would John Dillinger handle this situation? What would Frank Sinatra say to that pretty girl over there? How would George Clooney talk his way to the front of this line? Take your answer and run with it. The biggest obstacle between who you are right now, and the man you want to be, is your inability to give yourself permission to be the alpha male. Role-playing in the skin of your role models is an effective means of by-passing whatever beta tendencies you have.

Suiting up and rolling to higher end venues is not just practically advantageous, it makes this sort of role-playing easier to pull off. Why? Because your style and environment will be congruent with the attitude you're shooting for. Dress up and play-act as the man you aspire to be, and soon enough you'll trick your brain into giving you permission to access a more confident, more attractive version of yourself.

Read Next: When James Bond Met A Lesbian

Is Feminism Really Killing Masculinity?

February 25, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Having recently watched the film Mansome, and having viewed a few other trends in society, I began to question feminism's role in the destruction of the true male. While I do not dispute the fact that feminism aims to destroy all that is man, I have wondered if the evolution of man's tendencies really is a byproduct of feminism, as they like to boast; or whether it's really a byproduct of male desire or consumerism.

Feminism in brief can be summed up as a movement initially designed to give women a more defined role in society, and has since turned into a movement to enslave and ruin mankind by reshaping society into a form that effectively creates a self implosion. As previously covered in other blog postings about feminism, it creates an imbalance to everything mankind evolved around, and will create death and despair through weakened individuals and unnatural gender roles.

Think of Soviet assignment failures where doctors were told to cook and cooks were told to operate. While their influence is clearly present, I don't believe the evolution of " femininity" in men is completely a byproduct of feminism, and the idea that it is just gives their meaningless agenda more credit than is due. They're actually pretty big failures at the influence of man.

Am I saying that men naturally want to doll themselves up like women? Not entirely. I don't believe men want to transform into wusses and wear women's clothing and remove everything masculine. What it appears to be is an attempt at expression of wealth.

Dating back in history it can be observed of men wearing wigs in colonial times, and dressing like fairies during the renaissance. The key element during both of these periods was the abundance of wealth. So despite the absurdity of their attire, men could exclaim that they were very expensive, and in essence they could display their wealth.

The negative backlash of recent years has turned men from driving flashy cars to wearing “flashy” clothing. Although strange currently, it’s something that has been common in historical cycles, and therefore actually discredits any progress feminism attempts to claim. So long as the highest of men backlash against the worst trends (i.e., skinny jeans), some sort of dignity can be maintained in the male spectrum.

Loading...

Lastly there is consumerism. This is probably the biggest influence upon the anti-male train. This also directly correlates to the above information. Being in a time of general prosperity (we aren’t growing crops in our backyard to survive the winter), it has been drilled into our heads to buy random products, show them off, and gain support. This affects men from the idea of needing the biggest TV all the way to the idea that they need to get manicures and pedicures to gain an edge in their appearance.

As a result, more products are marketed towards men such as aftershave, body waxing, and hair products. Marketing is designed to tell men to buy the products and then they will impress people through the use of them. Thus consumerism directly correlates with similar instances in history.

Therefore, none of these trends, whether good or bad, can be credited to feminism. While women have their role in affecting our behavior, they don’t have the decisive factor in the ability to directly alter them. Men have always needed to impress women in order to find a suitable mate.

What appears to work most effectively is being out of the ordinary. So having more muscles, being more vocal, more or less groomed, or having a more expensive car are things that all stand out. When the majority of men are less groomed, the one who chooses to groom will stand out. In retrospect, in a setting where more men groom, those who choose not to groom will stand out. What this means is that soon enough the idea of being a manly man will once again put you on top, if it hasn't already begun in your area. And the reason behind this is entirely due to the combination of marketing and the natural instinct of men to compete with one another.

Merica!

In conclusion, feminism has failed at altering mans course of direction. Their existence is massively over-credited, and the only real bearing women have over the effect of men is to seek out exceptionally unique qualities. So while the recent trend has been to dress elegantly and remain highly groomed, eventually it may become desirable to be Grizzly Adams. And this will all be due to the natural desire of men to find a way to get laid more.

Don't Miss: Why Swag Is Bad For Your Game

The Landmark Thucydides

February 25, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Landmark Thucydides is a modern translation of the History Of The Peloponnesian War, written in the fifth century BCE to document the war between Athens and Sparta. This is obviously no elementary work, but the editor has included many features to help make reading this book easier, such as explanatory headers, footnotes, maps, and margin summaries for every paragraph. The book was already rather readable, but the summaries were essential to get through difficult portions.

Athenians are characterized by Thucydides as daring innovators, always ready to conquer, while Sparta as old-fashioned conservatives who simply want to maintain what they have while preventing other city-states from gaining too much power. Make no mistake that Athens was an imperial empire, subjugating people and extracting tribute. At the same time they expressed a beloved concern for justice, they happily enslaved subjects that would dare question its rule.

Sparta goes to war with Athens as a check on their unquenchable thirst for more power in what ended up being a World War of its time, involving dozens of city-states and causing massive death and human suffering for nearly 30 years. The benefit of hindsight allows you to see great folly. In this book you see it performed mostly by the Athenians, who while overstretched and short on resources, still decided on a fateful invasion of Sicily. They were blinded by possible glory and conquest.

The highlight of the book was no question the invasion of Sicily. It was a campaign of the ages that involved huge land and sea battles between the Sicilian underdog and the overconfident Athenians. You want Athens to be defeated but at the same time you feel sympathy for its soldiers, who were put into a losing predicament by superstitious generals and incompetent statesmen.

Loading…

I was even more impressed with the transcribed speeches of diplomats and generals. There are no snarky sound bites here or George W. Bush moments of idiocy, but persuasive oratory that was the main way of influence during that time. More than any other parts of the book, they make you wonder how little has really changed in 2,000 years. Their pretexts for going to war is almost identical to what we use today, and they also were hampered by factors that limited their ability to amass armies, raise capital, and effectively lead men into battle. In addition, we still see the same see-saw struggle between the people (masses) and oligarchy (rich).

I especially smiled at a 1984 moment when, halfway through the war, Sparta allies itself with Athens, and then a couple years later resumes fighting against them. We were always at war with Eastasia, not Eurasia. I wonder how the citizens reacted to a surprising partnership with a city they had been fighting for a decade.

My biggest complaint of the book is that every page seemed to introduce a dozen new tribes and city-states. A billion names will be thrown at you. I gave up trying to keep track of them all and instead sought to remember if they were on the side of Athens or Sparta, though many times a city played both sides or changed them repeatedly. The book is best when it narrates the battles instead of giving details of alliances. You'll have to endure periods of numbing boredom to enjoy the relatively exciting bits.

I read the paperback and during that time I felt like I was being exposed to something profound, secrets of humanity and man that my feeble mind could barely grasp. The book put me through an intense mental journey in which I realized that the end, which took me over 30 hours to arrive at, was not the actual end (Thucydides died before completing the history). Eventually I'll have to read further materials before I come to understand the history of this war and the Ancient Greek people. Thucydides gives you a great overview of the war, but you will have to invest quite a bit more time to extract additional value from it.

We tend to think of ancients as primitive people, but they had a firm grasp on governance, war strategy, and human psychology. The greats of the past understand much more than the proles of today. It makes you want to think about what we have lost compared to that which we have gained.

Read More: "The Landmark Thucydides" on Amazon

3 Game Innovations You've Never Heard About

February 25, 2013 | by Samseau | Link | Original Link

The RooshV Forum is an incredible resource for men. It contains a plethora of topics that will appeal to all types, but in particular the game sub-forum is an awesome way to improve your game. Whether you need advice, or want to share a new technique for scoring some snatch, the game sub-forum can help you.

One thing I am always on the lookout for are new ways to get more women into my life, and the game forum always provides me with ideas. To that end, here are 3 ways to game most guys wouldn't believe existed even if you banged the girl you picked up in their room…

1. Yelp Game

Yelp is good for more than finding the best venues in town.

> Yelp is a great way of meeting fun, cute girls. I've been on the site writing reviews since 2008, but I only started to get back into it in 2012 after getting out of a LTR.
>
> I noticed a lot more cute chicks were on it than before, so started to write reviews while simultaneously hitting girls up. First it was "add as friend", then it was leaving innocuous compliments e.g. "great review on the orecchiette" and then asking for recommendations which segued easily into meet ups and eventual bangs.
>
> "Yelp Elite" events are also a great place to meet girls, especially cute Asians. Basically, Yelp partners with a bar/restaurant, you RSVP for a spot and they give you free food and alcohol. Unfortunately, they're usually during the week, but you'd be surprised how many drunken hookups I've seen happening in real time (a few experienced by yours truly too).
>
> You're definitely not going to have the numbers you have on OK Cupid or other > dating sites, but I've found the quality of the talent to be +1.5 higher on average than OKC. Granted, most of the girls (and 99% of the cute ones) write the most asinine shit in their reviews, but in person, they're usually pretty laid back and like to go out to eat. Plus all of them drink moderately/a lot which greatly aids the process along.

>
> All told, for the first half of 2012, I was averaging about one yelp bang per month where it was more like 3 for 2 months with OKC, but the quality on Yelp was way better. One yelper in particular (Mexican girl) was the best looking Latina I have ever been with, a rock solid 8, whereas I'd usually settle for 6′s on OKC.
>
> I've put in enough legwork in my reviews where girls will still hit me up about dining advice and meetups even though I specifically reference my girlfriend in my current posts. Strangely enough, I found her on OKC, but she's definitely an outlier.

Writing reviews on Yelp sounds pretty boring, but if you're a big city with lots of places to check out this will be an easy way to score free food, drinks, and girls. It will also allow men who hate dating site "profiles" to show themselves through their reviews – if you know how to write well and have a good yelp photo, that is – so there is less bullshit involved.

Plus, city girls who like to go out a lot are sluttier than average (which is already pretty damn high), and probably hotter than average since the reason they go out so much is because guys buy them stuff, or they have a "cool" circle of sex-in-the-city style girlfriends to split the bill with.

However, there is the downside of having to actually go to lots of places to have a strong Yelp review profile, so there is a bit of effort involved. Still seems like a lot more fun than Okstupid or Plenty of Shrimp.

Game innovation rating: A-

2. Reverse Gold-Digger MILF Game

We all know about how women use men to get money. But how would you like to be on the receiving end? Famed RVF member Pusscrook came to the forum with this bomb:

> I study these whores time and time again and for one reason only, to get them to pay! Yes , that's right, pay! Whenever I'm state-side , I don't fuck around with spring chickens. This is a lot of drama for me, I receive no wages, and I really don't have that kind of time. If I'm touring I seek out a little fawn to receive punishment.,but other than that, forget it.

For me the secret to pummeling milfs into paying has been the dual face attack. Cynical in nature… this is the classic carrot and stick approach.
Remember these whores are usually a little bit smarter than average, and have heard a thing or two.

[…]

This idea is to hijack the entire frontal lobe and make her a servant. Yea, even to the point of crippling her ability to apply any logic to your plot. Now, once I see she's more worried about me than herself (sweet) , it's time to knock the entire lining out of this pussy. Now you really have to fuck this woman with reckless abandon. Spare not one fibrous tissue my comrades. If you hit it right, this will lead to more confusion when you are hinting for pay. Now, more confusion means she's not sure why she pays but she knows it seems better WHEN she pays. I have three in rotation right now and averaging about 1500 or so a month. This does not include my gifts (I deserve them) and I get to experiment with these wounded creatures. Really , some of them I liken unto a wounded deer with a hoof caught in a fence awaiting some hungry lion to devour whatever precious little meat they have left on 'em. I am now placing my check-list of milf pussy secrets below. PLease add some things to the list, or tell a story so that we can all have this wonderful part-time "job". (disclaimer.. I am not a gigolo, just turning the "game" upside down

1. Select proper locations ..ie; barnes and nobles, parks, jazz lounge, gym. (I really like the lounge)
2. Get to know the victim really well. Don't half-step on this one, learn to listen. (my ears have bled doing this shit, but I got paid)!
3. Make sure your sob story matches what you present to her in real life. IE; I have several cars, but I drive a honda with no air condition when seeking out "wounded personnel". I have a house , but an apartment also, nothing fancy, small t.v. etc. <<<<This is what they see(you get the drift).
4. Try your best to stay away from her kids. (Fuck them, these are the worst cockblockers, and eats up way too much profit).. Ask about them but don't start doing shit with the "family".
5. Make references to what you "wish" you had but don't put too much mustard on it. Think of it in terms of a curve ball instead of a hard slider. They are very receptive to "saving" you from your despair.
6. When you finally get to dislodging her "inners" ,go back into sob story mode. Don't get cocky and ruin a pay-day. Oh , and make sure you do dislodge them. This is paramount, and could permanently seal the confusion in her tiny pea brain.

> 7. Lastly, remain unpredictable, yet close enough to monitor any subtle changes. These things have worked miracles ! The strangest thing is that I learned this all from a thugged out remedial dude who never worked and played on his xbox all day!
>
> […]
>
> Example: She calls and she hears some papers being shuffled around in the background…. (setting this bitch up just right). check the convo.
>
> Her : “What’s all that noise”?
> Me: ” Oh, nothing, just looking over something”.
> Her: “Are you busy’?
> Me” No, just a bit stressed , but how are you”?
> Her: “I’m fine , but what’s wrong” (this is the ” I got you bitch “phrase I was waiting to hear)
> Me: “Every time I think I’m moving forward, something always comes up. I just don’t know anymore. It’s o.k. I’ll figure it out”…. Pause..(rattle papers …. talking to myself like I’m adding up numbers) heh heh.
> Her: “Is there anything I can do to help”? (bingo, i got action)
> Me: “I just don’t know, things are just piling up.. but I”m trying ya’ know”
> Her” Talk to me., what do you need sweety”? (Yes i am your sweety)
> Me: “I’m ashamed ,let’s not talk about this”.
> Her” I won’t do anything to hurt you, I want to be there for you . You mean a lot to me . I think about you all the time (I’m creaming in my pants already)
> Me” I know,life sucks”
> Her: “I’ve been there too, this is what friends are for, do you need some help paying something”? (bless you my love).
> Me: I don’t know , I’m trying to see what I can do.
> Her: “Just tell me how much you need and don’t ever hide anything from me again ok”?
> Me” I’m sorry , it’s just been hard and I don’t want to stress you out or make you think I’m like that.
> Her: “Never that.. what we have is special , treat it that way…
> Me” Ok, sorry again.
>
> In terms of “liking” them…. This can be interpreted many ways.. I don’t usually fuck women I don’t like in some way or another. So ,there is some chemistry there. This is neither here or there when I am seeking out “wounded personnel”. Now do I like them enough to settle down, breed, this, that, and the other? Ummmm ,no.. This would be blasphemy. Imagine inheriting those bastards and for what? The trick is to appear to have such attributes that they envision in a man they want to spend the rest of their lives with.

Pure genius. You may be offended at Pusscrook’s vulgar language, but at the RVF people speak with a careless attitude because it is the only place in the world where free speech exists for men (provided you don't insult other members).

I've personally never thought about running this kind of game myself, but when I think about how I got my first real job, I can clearly see the advantages to finding older women with empty hearts and fat wallets. Pusscrook seems to advocate going for women with children, but obviously it doesn't matter and it is preferable if she has no kids.

The biggest snag in this game is that sometimes women get really angry if you dump them too harshly after receiving a lot of cash from them, they'll come at you with police charges. Even still, I can't see why a game qualified man couldn't get some supplemental income with this strategy.

Game innovation rating: A

[image]

3. Missed Encounters Game

You know those sad, pathetic, and cringe inducing personals of craigslist where people can post anonymous pleas about that attractive stranger they didn't have the guts to approach?

Well, now YOU can be the savior of some woman who needs a man to pick her up.

> Been trolling a while. Gotten three bangs off it in two months, not glorious but nothing to shake a stick at.
>
> Behold my strat:
>
> 1. I check sunday night.
>
> 2. I only respond to those that have descriptive comments. I.E. you were working at krogers and a guy in front of me was giving you a hard time, respond with what I was wearing
>
> 3. I send a quick vague email "Yeah im pretty sure i remember you, but I get a lot of people giving me a hard time at the register, pic for pic?"
>
> 4. If she responds and sends pic, I respond and send pic
>
> 5. about a 50% blowout (no your not the guy type deal), thats why I check sunday night and only go for thursday-friday night gals, hoping they were drunk or have the fog of war
>
> 6. If they pass the boner test, and they "remember me," i get a phone number and commence text game.
>
> 7. Meet up and proceed with Tuths bang strat
>
> I only go for the missed encounters where the women is withing my age range, It will show up, IE. W4M 26 (city). 10 mins of work every sunday.
>
> Normally only 3-4 good candidates a week
>
> […]
>
> I have had six meets. Two of those were stupid enough to believe I was the guy > they had originally seen. Four of those were “damage control,” which is where I think this has the most potential.

>
> I wont go into the girls that thought I was the original guy, as those will be rare encounters.
>
> The ones that knew I wasn’t the original guy are where I did the most work.
>
> Heres the breakdown of the punk chick, who calls me out, for an example:
>
> 1. her post – “I saw you at the Shell in “Town Name” getting some gas in the morning. You were wearing a suit and I commented on your cologne. You didn’t seem to willing to talk, but I think that was because you were in a hurry, I have never done this before So i just hope we can get a chance to talk again”
>
> 2. She meets age and location requirements. I gather intel by googling the town name and shell locations. There is only one (small town) so I look at coffee shops and bars nearby to have material for a first meet. I find a coffee shop right across the street.
>
> 3. Message back “Hey stalker, Im pretty sure I remember you and it was me you were talking too. I was actually about to go meet with an attorney about a new business proposal so I was a bit preoccupied. If it is you I am thinking off, you seemed cool and there is a “coffee shop name” right across the street we can meet up at and have a quick chat at. Send a quick pic to make sure your not the creepy gas station attendant that was giving me the eye”
>
> 4. Sends pic and makes a joke about the gas attendant, says the coffee shop is a great spot to meet.
>
> 5. Pic passed boner test. She was cute as hell but has a mohawk and the rest of her head shaved, probably brought her down a good point. So I send pic back and ask for digits. My pic is me in a full suit, to calibrate as much as possible with “her guy”
>
> 6. She replies – “The guy I met was blonde…I dont think you are him, but small world haha!” she sends no digits
>
> 7. I reply – “Yeah I don’t think your the cutie I met either. She had on a pink simpsons MuMu and was pushing about 250lbs im guessing, Oh well. Anyways you do seem like a cool person and already have pictures of me saved on your computer, we may as well meet for a cup of joe and figure how we are going to find our long lost crushes”
>
> 8. She replies – “Haha ok deal” and sends digits.
>
> 9. We meet and game as usual.

Creative? Check. Hitting a niche full of desperate women? Check. A little bit evil? Double check. Everything seems good, but then you remember it’s just craigslist so the quality can’t be that good. But given how low the competition is, who knows?

Game innovation rating: B+

There are a lot more threads like these on the RVF, so if you want more you'll have to lurk and find some. I'll be continuing these game innovations as a regular series as well. And if you want to talk to forum members directly and put your own game up for review, remember you can make an account on the first of every month.

Read Next: Why Pickups Fail

Why You Should Learn Latin

February 26, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

---

It goes without saying that you should know at least one modern foreign language. It adds depth to your soul, increases your travel options, and opens up new universes. Two modern languages would be better still, if you can manage it. But in addition to this, I would like to make the argument (or the exhortation) that you should at some point learn a classical language like Latin. Now, before you roll your eyes and dismiss the suggestion out of hand, consider the following arguments:

Latin Is Western Civilization

Eighty percent of Western civilization, I have read, comes directly from the Latin language. From roughly 100 B.C. to, say, A.D. 1750, it was the exclusive lingua franca in Europe for literature, science, philosophy, government, politics, and education. That is a long, long time. For example, as late as the 1700s, Isaac Newton's main opus, the "Principia", was written not in English, but Latin, so that he could reach an international audience. So, by knowing Latin, you get instant access to the world's most influential civilization, spanning the entire classical period, the Middle Ages, the Renaissance, and the early modern period. All of the West's preeminent works were written during this period.

All of the Romance languages (Spanish, Portuguese, French, Italian, Romanian, etc) are in essence corrupted or simplified versions of Latin. Latin is the key that opens all these doors as well. Taking this into account, Latin has had far more influence than English in history, over a much wider period of time.

Knowing Latin Opens Up The World Of The Past

It shows you what Western society used to be like in previous eras. For a modern American, it will be an eye-opening journey, I can promise you. I have suspected for a long time that the political correctness crowd, and the feminist crowd, do not want you to know what society was like in the past. They want to eradicate this knowledge, and promote the idea that we are now living in the best period of human history. This is false, of course.

Knowing Latin will enable you to have the keys to the forbidden kingdom. Latin, by opening up the world of the West's past, will fortify you against—and insulate you from—the depredations of feminist claptrap. You will know that the West was once built on healthy, biologically sound principles of relations between the sexes. You will begin to see our modern feminized culture as the negative historical aberration that it really is.

Loading…

As Will Durant once said, one cannot really claim to be a man of letters unless he knows a classical language. Regardless of what your intellectual goals are, there are strong arguments for working Latin into your educational development. You will know you are on the right path when people think you're "impractical" for trying to do it. Far from being a "dead" language, Latin is all around us. There are, for example internet radio broadcasts in Finland and Germany where you can hear news roundups in Latin, and there are email listservs where scholars communicate only in Latin.

Learning Latin will add to your "intellectual game" in ways that you could not imagine. For those interested, here are my own practical suggestions about how to go about learning Latin efficiently and enjoyably:

1. Use Hans Orberg's "natural languge" method texts, recordings, and workbooks, "Familia Romana" and "Roma Aeterna". This is Latin taught the European way. These materials can be bought from the website for Focus Publishing , the US distributor. Work your way through these books, together with the supplementary readers. You will need to make this a daily exercise, for at least 30 minutes per day. Suck it up. Any language is a jealous mistress, and will involve a lifelong relationship.

2. Work your way through John Traupman's "Conversational Latin for Oral Proficiency" with recordings. Remember Latin is a language like any other, not a museum relic. Treating it as if it were still a spoken language does wonders for your learning curve. You can also get on a Latin listserv, where the members write only in Latin. You really feel like a Renaissance scholar.

3. Listen weekly to Radio Finland's Latin language news roundup. It can be found here. Or, if you prefer hearing Latin with a German accent, check out Radio Bremen in Latin.

Valete!

Read More: How To Quickly Learn The Basics Of Polish

The Speech To Save Your Life

February 26, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If your conquerors held a sword above your neck but allowed you to give you a speech that might sway them, would you be able to convince them to save your life? This was the exact situation that the ancient Plataeans faced in 427 BCE when Sparta finally defeated them on behalf of their Theban allies. Tired and starving, two Platean man, Astymachus and Lacon, stepped up and spoke. Here is what they said, as written in The Landmark Thucydides:

> In the name of the gods who once presided over our confederacy, and of our own good service in the Hellenic cause, we appeal to you to relent; to rescind the decision which we fear that the Thebans may have obtained from you; to ask back the gift that you have given them, that they disgrace not you by slaying us; to gain a pure instead of a guilty gratitude and not to gratify others to be yourselves rewarded with shame.
>
> Our lives may be quickly taken, but it will be a heavy task to wipe away the infamy of the deed; as we are not enemies whom you might justly punish, but friends forced into taking arms against you.
>
> To grant us our lives would be, therefore, a righteous judgment; if you consider also that we are prisoners who surrendered of their own accord, stretching out our hands for quarter, whose slaughter Hellenic law forbids, and who besides were always your benefactors.
>
> Look at the tombs of your fathers, slain by the Persians and buried in our country, whom year by year we honored with garments and all other dues, and the first fruits of all that our land produced in their season, as friends from a friendly country and allies to our old companions in arms! Should you not decide aright, your conduct would be the very opposite to ours. Consider only:
>
> Pausanias [Spartan general] buried them thinking that he was laying them in friendly ground and among men as friendly; but you, if you kill us and make the Plataean territory Theban, will leave your fathers and kinsmen in a hostile soil and among their murderers, deprived of the honors which they now enjoy. What is more, you will enslave the land in which the freedom of the Hellenes was won, make desolate the temples of the gods to whom they prayed before they > overcame the Persians, and take away your ancestral sacrifices from those who found and instituted them.

>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> We, as we have a right to do and as our need impels us, entreat you, calling aloud upon the gods at whose common altar all the Hellenes worship, to hear our request, to be not unmindful of the oats which your fathers swore, and which we now plead. We supplicate you by the tombs of your fathers and appeal to those that are gone to save us from falling into the hands of the Thebans and prevent the dearest friends of the Hellenes from being given up to their most detested foes. We also remind you of that day on which we did the most glorious deeds by your fathers' sides, we who now on this day are likely to suffer the most dreadful fate.
>
> […]
>
> And at the same time we Plataeans, foremost among the Hellenic patriots, and suppliants to you, beseech you not to give us up out of your hands and faith to our most hated enemies, the Thebans, but to be our saviors. Do not, while you free the rest of the Hellenes, bring us to destruction.

If you were a Spartan general, would that have moved you? Would you have spared their lives even though they have put you through a costly siege that has weakened your position against Athens, the state you fight against? Here's what the Spartans did:

> The Spartan judges decided that the question, whether they had received any service from the Plataeans in the war, was a fair one for them to put; as they had always invited them to be neutral, agreeably to the original covenant of the Pausanias after the defeat of the Persians, and hand again definitely offered them the same conditions before the blockade.
>
> This offer having been refused, they were not, they conceived, by the loyalty of their intention released from their covenant; and having, as they considered, suffered evil at the hands of the Plataeans, they brought them in again one by one and asked each of them the same questions, that is to say, whether they had done the Spartans and allies any service in the war; and upon their saying that they had not, took them out and slew them all without exception.
>
> The number of Plataeans thus massacred was not less than two hundred, with twenty-five Athenians who had shared in the siege. The women were taken as slaves.

The city was demolished and an inn was built on top of its grounds. The lesson in this is could be that when pleading for your life, don't bother coming up with reasons far in the past of why you should be saved. Men with swords in their hands tend to have short memories.

Read Next: The Landmark Thucydides

The 5 Most Common Types of Cockblockers

February 27, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

We've talked about how the deck is stacked against men getting laid by a prevailing culture of cockblocking—people and institutions working behind the scenes to prevent you from getting trim. But, there's very little you and I can do about that. What's more, on a day-to-day basis, we're more likely to face the more visible types of cockblocker: actual people who do things to your face—intentionally or not—to salt your game, and in the process, scare off your prospect, extinguish your hard-earned rapport, or rattle you enough that you drop the ball.

With social ineptitude and obesity at all-time highs—the root causes of the resentment, frustration, and jealousy behind most cockblocking—the number of cockblockers are also higher than ever. With the further multiplier effect of the Internet, you really are beset on all sides.

That said, not all hope is lost. Cockblockers still break down into the same traditional taxonomies. Some are in-house (your own "friends"), others are external (her friends), and still others are environmental (strangers). And, even if you don't have a competent wing man (an increasingly rare species) to help distract or usher your game killer, there are still ways to handle the most common types.

The Hoverer

This is often a guy in your party, even a friend. Too afraid, or incapable, of entering the conversation you started, he will instead loom at an awkward distance, making your girls uncomfortable. Even when you try to include him in the conversation, his contributions are negative, at best, further hurting your chances.

Best Response: Box them out. Physically cut them out of the conversation in a gradual way, turning your back on them or wedging them with your hip or elbow. Ideally, you should re-position your girl's field of vision away from him.

The Crab-in-the-Bucket

This is the most dangerous in-house obstacle you can have, yet every guy seems to know at least one "friend" like this. This is a guy who climbs over you to try to get to the girl you're talking to, pulling you both down in the process. He's either a shitty wing man, who refuses to follow the guy-who-opens-gets-first-pick rule or a guy who wanders around "looking for his buddies," but is really just looking to poach pre-approached girls. He makes jokes at your expense, in a lame attempt to ingratiate himself with your girl. To make matters worse, he rarely has good game, so he further discredits you by your being associated with such a lame-ass dude who doesn't respect you.

Best Response: Stop going out with him or cut him out of your group entirely. I've not once succeeded in reforming one of these assholes. In order to do so, you basically have to teach these guys game from Square 1, which they'll never learn because they obviously can't or won't. They see themselves as entitled to your prospects, actually believing the girl is fair game unless you're actively penetrating them. Move on.

The Wrist Grabber

The classic cockblock move that remains as effective as it is simple. She drops in deus ex machina and extracts—often physically—your prospect from the conversation. The excuses range from a rushed, ambiguous "we have to go" to a more elaborate "we're meeting 'our friend.'" They'll often fool less experienced players with the promise of going to the bathroom and coming "right back." The goal is to "rescue" your girl whether or not she actually wants to be rescued.

Best Response: As much as you want to dress down or physically harm the wrist grabber, your best bet is to swallow your rage and ask her for "a couple of minutes" in a manly, but friendly, manner. While the angriest fatties will respond to this polite request with rudeness—granting you license to escalate to an old-school call-out—some will either leave you alone or linger in the conversation, enabling you to rap to them both. You can then bounce them over to the dance floor, get a solid phone number, or a sufficient amount of the friend's approval to break loose entirely.

The Snarky Color Commentator

This is often a problem in group settings where you're outnumbered by her friends. You've successfully entered their group and captured everyone's attention with your scintillating observational humor. But this girl, often on the uglier and fatter side, is accustomed to getting the laughs and loud-mouth attention in this hen house. She will compete with you for the group's attention, interrupting you with bitchy remarks, resorting to inside jokes in an effort to exclude you, or lob thinly veiled insults at you in a passive-aggressive tone.

Best Response: Include the snarky friend in the conversation, but steer her away from her lame attempts at humor. Ask her and the group questions about unrelated matters. Take the first opportunity for a side conversation with your prospect as soon as there's any fragmentation in the group conversation. If that doesn't happen, "borrow" the friend for a "few minutes."

The Curtain Puller

This is one of your more hostile types. This is a sideline observer—often one of your target's friends, but not necessarily—who's taken up the mission of "exposing" that you're hitting on your target. She will say rude shit like "Is that your line?" or "Do you always hit on girls here?" in an effort to rattle you and "warn" your "innocent" would-be "victim" that you have intentions. Given that you've done this before, you're not phased by being outed, just likely irritated. More importantly, it may embarrass your target and ruin the interaction.

Best Response: Restraint in your best friend. While you'll be tempted to verbally slap down the curtain puller, that's what she wants. Like Emperor Palpatine, you'll only make her stronger by striking her down. Roll with the exposure. Do some behind-the-scenes narrative about what you're doing and why you're hitting on this girl, all in your best cheeky tone. "Hell yeah, that's my line. Your friend looks like the type who likes sandwiches, so I'm building rapport by telling her about my impressive sandwich-making abilities. After this, I plan on asking some questions about that interesting bracelet there. Are you going to give me a chance to finish my presentation?"

Cockblocking is a reality of masculine life, one that's especially pronounced in nightlife game. More times than not, a determined cockblocker will be successful. Five minutes of rapport with a complete stranger is so fragile that it takes very little to shatter it. But, with a little restraint and some tact, you can deflect a lot of cockblock attempts and salvage your interactions.

Read More: The Holidays: Amateur Nights On Steroids

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a Columnist-at-Large at Return of Kings. His work has been covered by major media outlets such as The Huffington Post, Cosmopolitan, Vice Magazine, The Daily Mail, and Yahoo Shine. He's also been profiled by BuzzFeed and The New Statesman. You can follow him on Twitter.

The Oscar “Fallout” Is A Sham

February 27, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Following Sunday’s Oscar event, Ms. Davidson of the New Yorker decided that humor and fact can be interchangeable with sexism and misogyny. Using words such as “ugly,” “hostile,” “sexist,” and “misogynist,” to name a few, she attempts to impart her own skewed view of the world onto her readers.

Let’s take a look at this Pulitzer worthy article:

> But the evening’s misogyny involved a specific hostility to women in the workplace

Apparently the author and Merriam-Webster have taken a break, because I fail to see any part of the Oscars that exemplified a hatred or dislike of women. Nor did I see any hostility to women in the workplace. Wait, perhaps the heretic boob song? Yes, that must be it. As she explains:

> “We Saw Your Boobs” was as a song-and-dance routine in which MacFarlane and some grinning guys named actresses in the audience and the movies in which their breasts were visible. That’s about it.

EXACTLY. “That’s about it.” A recitation of facts wherein MacFarlane simply stated the name of the actress, the movie she showed her breasts in, and a chorus of literally “we saw your boobs.” Yet somehow Davidson ascribes not only an ill-natured undertone to it, but an active “hostility” towards women in the workplace. These actresses willingly took off their clothes for their movie roles. Why not be proud of your genetic prowess and show off your aesthetically blessed parts for the world to see?

What’s difficult for women who are not revered for their looks to understand is that women enjoy this attention. Attractive women like to feel attractive. Not surprisingly one of the more attractive winners of the night agreed to be part of the skit, showing a pre-recorded feigned surprise (Jennifer Lawrence) at the song.

> The Academy is supposedly a trade group, and yet it devoted its opening number to degrading a good part of its membership.

Again, providing details in song format about events that actually and indisputably occurred rises to the level of degradation. Undeterred, Davidson then goes onto what I thought was one of the funnier jokes of the night, the Rihanna/Chris Brown jab (pun intended).

> “Django Unchained,” he said, was “the story of a man fighting to get back his woman, who has been subjected to unthinkable violence. Or as Chris Brown and Rihanna call it, a date movie.” Relationships are complicated, and it can take a woman more than one attempt to leave an abuser. But if any woman who goes back is told that she has forfeited sympathy and can be written off with > mockery—that the whole thing is now an amusing spectacle—then we'll end up with more dead women.

So a joke, again rooted in fact about a female singer who openly chants about liking the pain associated with relationships and her sexual deviations including whips and chains, will somehow lead to "more dead women." Apparently not familiar with Rihanna's work, Davidson fails to realize that Rihanna is no stranger to placing herself in the limelight for exactly this type of discussion. Let's look at some of the lyrics Rihanna has sang in recent history:

> Feels so good being bad
> There's no way I'm turning back
> Now the pain is my pleasure 'cause nothing could measure
>
> […]
>
> Sticks and stones may break my bones
> But chains and whips excite me

Or perhaps this gem:

> Just gonna stand there and watch me burn
> But that's all right because I like the way it hurts
> Just gonna stand there and hear me cry
> But that's all right because I love the way you lie
> I love the way you lie
> Ohhh, I love the way you lie
>
> Loading…

We should not take these lyrics to heart, correct? Well according to Davidson, an off-the-cuff remark by one of the most well-known satirical artist of our times, presented in a known medium for satire, will lead to actual deaths. Yet Rihanna herself is not to blame because as we all know, there is no effect these actual lyrics will have on young, impressionable girls.

Next she throws in some religious commentary for shits and giggles:

> There are surely better things to joke about. Instead, we got a borderline anti-Semitic Teddy bear asking where the post-Oscars orgy would be.

I believe "anti-semitism" necessarily involves the hatred of or discrimination of Jews. The lovely teddy bear was, if anything, complimenting Jewish people and their governance of the entertainment industry. Having spoken to some Jewish people randomly after the show, it was unanimously agreed by them that this was the funniest part of the Oscars.

> The answer was Jack Nicholson's house; maybe not the same Jack Nicholson house where Roman Polanski raped a girl, but still, not funny.

Actually that was pretty damn funny. But I digress:

> One of the more dispiriting distractions from MacFarlane was the sight of actresses who weren't all that old whose faces seemed paralyzed, and younger ones who talked about how they hadn't eaten in a long, long time.

Get over it—real men like fit, trim and skinny girls. Anyone thinking otherwise is delusional. Ever wonder why there is no Lane Bryant Fashion Show nationally televised for all to see? Ever heard of a soon to be bride packing on the pounds before a wedding so she can look all plump in her gown?

> It's possible that the line about not caring that he couldn't understand a word that Penelope Cruz or Salma Hayek said because they were good to look at was directed as much at Latinos as at women, since he also mentioned Javier Bardem—but that doesn't make it any better.

So she admits that this joke was not sexist, as it clearly included a male as part of the punch line, yet still cites this as an example in her paragraph leading with the oh so eloquent phrase "misogynistic awfulness." In line with the entire article, it is devoid of any reasoning for its conclusion.

> What are women in Hollywood for? To judge from a few other MacFarlane jokes, they're for dating men in Hollywood, until the men decide that they're too old.

Not true, they are there to show off their boobs as well. How quickly one forgets…

> When Daniel Day-Lewis, accepting an Oscar for best actor that was presented by Meryl Streep, joked about the two of them having done a "straight swap," scuttling a plan for him to play Margaret Thatcher and for her to be Lincoln, one wanted nothing more than to see each of them in those roles—not because having them dress in drag would be fodder for a future MacFarlane number but because of how Day-Lewis might convey Thatcher's temporal power and the strength that Streep would bring to the role of a President.

Yes, this is exactly what most of America was thinking. Please. I cannot even fathom a single instance where one would seriously wonder what Meryl Streep would be like portraying Abraham Lincoln. What planet do you reside on where such dull hypotheticals are pondered yet a light jig about anatomical sightings generates an ire so substantial that it warranted an entire article on purported misogyny?

> Movies, and what women do in and to them, are better than the Academy seemed to realize.

You're right. There's no way they would give the best actress award to a hot, sassy-mouthed twenty-two year old fem…

Oh wait, they did.

Read More: Why You Should Be Thankful For "Girl Power" Songs

The Manosphere Needs A Communication Alternative

February 27, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Pictured above is a classic photo of taken from the office of the U.S. Defense Communications Agency (1960–1991), which has now become The Defense Information Systems Agency (DISA). This organization has numerous functions which includes communications support to the President, as well as the military to deal with combatant tasks, like for example when the nukes start going off. I submit that the manosphere develop one. Maybe call it MANOSPHERE DISA, or MDISA for short. It should be set up just in case.

In case of what you might ask? For same reason: in case the nukes start going off. But for the manosphere, nukes going off means a government that consists of warmongering feminists and anti-male ilk wanting to shut us up. As we are all too well aware they are convinced that all things with a penis and / or with a dissenting thought (dissenting from theirs) are evil, they will scream to shut down any media source of ideas they do not like to hear. Unfortunately since it appears that the majority of Americans have been sold on socialism, the notion of the net getting censored is plausible. We only need to look at China and see that this is technically feasible. Although the control of the net by the Matrix may not be 100%, and true there are some techies out there that can buck the system, I still think that it could be sufficiently controlled so John Q. Public does not have a voice, potentially putting an end to Publishing 2.0.

And while we see on CNN all these civil rights themed programs condemning the censorship of the Internet in other countries, these same hypocritical journalists will happily see anyone get muted that that is not a part of the social elites agenda. So for the dissenting voice it is quite simple: you have the right to free speech with the understanding that you will not actually use it. And you have the right to free speech so long as you do not say anything that they do not agree with.

Loading…

Let's take a look at some of the writing on the wall: Considering that there seems to be a major push for World government, it is no surprise that the UN wants to censor the Internet. Just recently of course a well done article here at ROK showed that Norton was taking it upon themselves to censor websites they didn't like. As well a Men's Rights ad banned in the UK because it was "too mean". If and when the net becomes censored, how does the Matrix decide who should be banned? Perhaps they might for example consult with SPLC, and let's not forget one Mr. Roosh is already in their crosshairs.

This does bring the question of what shall the backup means of staying in contact be. This is difficult to say because it will not be as good as having the net. When hurricanes hit and all communications are cut it is usually the ham radio that acts as the back up for the civilian population. This could be one possibility, but ham radio requires getting a license although I suppose one could still operate under rogue conditions. But he still needs the equipment and less than user-friendly know-how compared to how easy it is to blog,

Skype or email. Whatever is developed it will be a bit awkward and not as fast as the net, but under a crisis situation there will be a need to simply stay in contact. Hopefully I am being over the top, and hopefully an alternative system will never be needed. But consider it a fire extinguisher in your office. It most likely will never get used, but it's good to know it's there. Just in case…

Read Next: The Matrix Is Getting Pissed

A Sea Battle For The Ages

February 27, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following excerpt from The Landmark Thucydides describes an epic sea battle between Athens and Syracuse (Athens invaded Sicily, where Syracuse was the dominant power). After some quick victories, the tide turned against the Athenians and put them at a disadvantage going into a major sea battle. If Athens fails to win, they will be trapped on the island with no way of going home. Here's what happened:

> Meanwhile the two armies on shore, while victory hung in the balance, were a prey to the most agonizing and conflicting emotions; the natives [of Syracuse] thirsting for more glory than they had already won, while the invaders feared to find themselves in even worse plight than before.
>
> The fate of the Athenians being placed in their fleet, their fear for the event was like nothing they had ever felt; while their view of the struggle was necessarily as checkered as the battle itself.
>
> Close to the scene of action and not all looking at the same point at once, some saw their friends victorious and took courage, and fell to calling upon heaven not to deprive them of salvation, while others who had their eyes turned upon those who were losing, wailed and cried aloud, and, altogether spectators, were more overcome than the actual combatants. Others, again, were gazing at some spot where the battle was evenly disputed; as the strife was protracted without decisions, their swaying bodies reflected the agitation of their minds, and they suffered the worst agony of all, ever just within reach of safety or just on the point of destruction.
>
> Loading…
> In short, in that one Athenian army as long as the sea fight remained doubtful there was every sound to be heard at once, shrieks, cheers, "We win," "We lose," and all the other manifold exclamations that a great host would necessarily utter in great peril; and with the men in the fleet it was nearly the same; until at last the Syracuseans and their allies, after the battle had lasted a long while, put the Athenians to flight, and with much shouting and cheering chased them in the open rout to the shore.
>
> The naval force, one way, one another, as many as were not taken afloat, now > ran ashore and rushed from on board their ships to their camp; while the army, no more divided, but carried away but one impulse, all with shrieks and groans deplored the event, and ran down, some to help the ships, others to guard what was left of their wall, while the remaining and most numerous part already began to consider how they should save themselves.

>
> Indeed, the panic of the present moment had never been surpassed. They now suffered very nearly what they had inflicted at Pylos; as then the Spartans with the loss of their fleet lost also the men who had crossed over to the island, so now the Athenians had no hope of escaping by land, without the help of some extraordinary accident.

Tomorrow I will share the fate of this army after their defeat at sea.

Read Next: The Speech To Save Your Life

6 Reasons Why Online Dating Can Never Be As Good As Real Life

February 28, 2013 | by Hobnob | Link | Original Link

[image]
This is not a takedown of online dating or people using online dating, since I am one such person. This is an attempt to explain why otherwise successful men have difficulty meeting women online.

1. Contact

Touch is very important to intimacy, report, and attraction. Obviously, this is impossible to do through the tubes of the Internet (for now). Even basic eye contact is not possible through a computer.

2. Value Inflation

Just as adding more currency into an economy devalues all the other currency while increasing prices, adding more messages to the dating economy devalues other messages and inflates the self-perceived value of the girls.

Very attractive women do not benefit directly from online dating. If they are attractive they can meet men anywhere. Why do they create profiles on dating sites? Validation. They crave the attention of men, even those they'd label the C word. They get many messages a day and rarely respond. What happens next to the men on these sites is a lowering of standards. They begin to contact the lesser-attractive women. These women have their self-worth filled as well as their inboxes. They begin to think they are more attractive than they really are and begin responding to messages more selectively, thus continuing the cycle.

In the end, guys are contacting women they'd never speak with in real life (other than at 2:30 a.m.). The inflated self-perceived sexual value these women develop spills out into the real world, making it more difficult to pick them up. Luckily, the ones most affected by this are the women you'd likely avoid anyways.

3. Confidence

Women are attracted to confidence. Confidence is very difficult to express with a photo or a description. The best profiles show humour and cockiness; true confidence is elusive. The mere act of contacting a women online is quite simple (I cut and paste responses). This does not show confidence like, say, approaching a woman in a coffee shop might. It reveals little competence, as any macro program can do as good a job.

4. Impossible Standards

A few years ago, OKCupid surveyed their users on what they found attractive. Shockingly, but perhaps not surprisingly, women rated 80% of men below-average. Let that sink in for a minute: It doesn't take a post-grad in statistics to understand that is some pretty skewed data. If only 20% are above average how many of us are actually considered good looking? Clearly, these are standards the vast majority (90+%) of men can't ever hope to meet.

This data supports number three above. Since women find confidence attractive, and confidence is difficult to express online, it isn't hard to see why women are not attracted to the men who are online.

5. SIFs

I won't go into detail. Secret Internet Fatties have already wasted too much of your time.

6. Fairy Tale Princess Endings

The average woman fantasizes about being swept off her feet by Prince Charming while doing some mundane task like buying groceries, sitting in a coffee shop, or buying a book. They want to believe that the meeting was complete chance and that some characteristic of her was so striking that the man could not help but be overwhelmed with the need to approach her. Of course, this man would say the perfect things at the perfect moments and they'd together live happily ever after. This is exactly why game works the way it does, and why many women get very upset when they hear of game and PUA culture. They want to believe everything just happened; premeditation takes away the magic.

Nothing about online dating is magical. It is completely contrived and is set up in a pretty logical manner (not surprising since they all were designed by men). The popular sites have added features that allow you to see random matches in a way that tries to replicate a little of the magic women crave, but have not been successful to date.

Despite the above six points, which clearly show online dating can never be as good as approaching women in real life, it's not a complete waste of time. Gaining experience online can improve understanding of game and success with women. There is value in online dating. You will get laid. You'll just have to cast many times before you get something on the line.

Read More: Internet Dating Killed My Game

About the Author

Hobnob has been a longtime reader of the Manosphere and is beginning to share his thoughts.

How Higher Education Feeds Female Delusion

February 28, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

---

We spend a lot of time here debating the root of some of the antagonism going on between the genders in our society. Today, I'd like to submit an underrated source of this tension and of female delusion: the higher education bubble.

I mentioned female ambition in my previous post. Much of the ambition I described there is fed by easy access to higher education. All of these girls are being sold an idea of the "empowerment" a degree can offer, and they are buying it hook, line, and sinker.

The dream that universities are selling to young middle/upper class women is one in which they can all go to the top with the aid of an education and one in which the whole lot of them (even the less talented) can truly "have it all" so long as they've got the degree. If they just secure a few loans, go to school and study whatever interests them, they too can have trendy, powerful professional positions like the girls they see on TV, even if whatever they're majoring in is totally unmarketable in this economy.

Every little girl is a star.
Every little girl is a future corporate or legal power player.
Every little girl is special…so long as they've got the degree to show it.

Witness the girl Roosh recently trolled:

Roosh V 13 minutes ago

http://www.youtube.com/watch?v=cUDQQH_5C5M

What do you think of my cappuccino sipping at 0:52. I think it's smooth. And check out my eyelashes when I blink. Many girls would kill for that

"Innovative Casanova" On Ukrainian Television

Good times.

Share

Batoul Jaber 13 minutes ago

yea i watched that

dont understand the language

you're a pathetic excuse for a human being

Roosh V 11 minutes ago

Why you so angry like a man? When was the last time you got laid? be honest

Batoul Jaber 11 minutes ago

like a man?

and I don't think that is any of your business

I'm a beautiful, outgoing, educated and driven young women and I truly do not need sex to validate that.

Roosh V 10 minutes ago

I'll be the judge of your beauty. Looking through your photos now

Batoul Jaber 9 minutes ago

good luck with that. My profile is private and you can judge all you want but I don't care what you think of me because I am probably the most confident girl you will ever encounter. You tell your "men" to be emotional rocks. I was born a rock buddy, literally nothing could break me

Roosh V 8 minutes ago

That's what you think. Three photos are visible. I'm analyzing them now

Batoul Jaber 8 minutes ago

My physical attributes are not what I'm here to discuss

I'm just making it clear that I do not appreciate the way you objectify women and that you should seriously check your outlook on life because it cannot be healthy to live this way also i seriously want to know what kind of women would ever give you the time of day

Roosh V 6 minutes ago

Beauty is the only value you have. You'll realize this in 10 years.

https://twitter.com/rooshv/status/301516898615586816

It's going to be a close call between you and the girl on the left, I figure

> Twitter / rooshv: If you could only bang one ...
> twitter.com
> Instantly connect to what's most important to you. Follow your friends, experts, favorite celebrities, and breaking news.

Share

Batoul Jaber 7 minutes ago

I cannot believe you

I'm reporting this.

and no in 10 years ill be an established lawyer in NYC

Note the total lack of ambiguity in her speech—she is GOING to be an established lawyer in the largest legal market in North America, and it WILL happen in just a decade. There's no room for humility either—she IS beautiful, outgoing, driven and educated.

These qualities (especially the last one) make her special, and give her the false authority to insult and talk down to men she hasn't even met like Roosh. The college degree is the source of her audacity.

Realistically, unless she's good enough to get into a very good law school (top 25 at least), her chances of finding a good job and becoming an "established" lawyer in a decade aren't great. The current legal market sucks and even in better days it often took lawyers well over a decade to get "established" in major markets.

Do these realities register? Not really, and explaining them to the future feminist "superstar" in question won't help much. They're certain that they are all special snowflakes, and that is the end of the conversation. Men suffer from irrational ambition as well but, as evidenced by our inferior rates of degree attainment these days, we aren't being suckered into the academic ruse quite as readily as women are.

There are millions of broke dudes running around confident that they can all become big time producers, rappers, athletes, musicians or businessmen, even if there is little objective reason to believe so. The difference is that not quite as many of them are tying a college education (and the large amounts of debt that come with it) to these ambitions. Their female counterparts, who are all dying to be big time designers, fashionistas, writers, courtroom superstars (like the ones they see on Law and Order) and the like, are carrying much larger debt loads to service their ambition.

Loading...

As women increase their dominance in higher education, they also carry more of the consequences. An increasingly large percentage of our society's higher education debt load is now being carried by women.

What else fuels this irrational confidence and boundless ambition?

Myth A: The myth that a college degree still opens doors no matter what. This is what has folks like the girl above thinking that a law degree, simply by virtue of its being a law degree, will have them "established" in a decade, shitty legal job market and all.

Myth B: The college bubble—the excessive proliferation of these degrees and the borrowed money to finance them have made higher education below a certain stratosphere almost unremarkable, thus proving the fallacy of Myth A. Degrees are a dime a dozen now and everyone can find a way to pay for them (even as prices continue to grow), so many more people can put their belief in Myth A into practice only to discover its fallacy upon graduation.

The girl Roosh trolled above felt confident enough to contact him out of nowhere, condescend to him, lecture him, and then outright insult him. Why? Because of these delusions I'm bringing up. The widespread proliferation of degrees combined with the ease of financing them and the myth that they automatically open the doors to greatness provides a false sense of authority.

Women are the ones most impacted by this because they're dominating higher education and earning most of the degrees, all while being fed propaganda by modern feminists about "girl power" and "The End of Men." You're seeing attitudes among them that reflect this.

If you're sure you're so smart that your degree is about to make you a big shot (all your friends, the media, the schools, and your parents have told you so) and you got the social media machine feeding you constant validation (every instagram mirror shot you put up gets 30-50 likes minimum and a bunch of thirsty comments) and you have an army of white knights out at clubs and at your school to do the same, how are you going to behave?

Chances are you'll act a lot bigger than you actually are. How humble could you possibly be in the face of such unrelenting praise? Blatantly insulting a dude on the internet whose writing you don't like probably seems like nothing, and respecting anyone else may become a taller order as well, especially if they're male. You're certainly not going to offer proper apologies where they are warranted—why should you?

"I sincerely apologize if you saw it as bullying"? She's not sorry about what she actually did—she doesn't need to be because she's an empowered, special snowflake and future top legal professional. She's only sorry about the way the execution of the false authority she's been granted by her degree was perceived.

When the college mythology loses its luster and the bubble that is modern day higher education actually pops, we may indeed begin to see serious change. Girls of a mind similar to the one above may have a harder time finding financial backing for their degrees, and their delusions of grandeur will be revealed more clearly without that false authority to back it up. The fallacy of the "have it all" meme will become more and more obvious.

This may happen sooner than we think as many young women, formerly host to mindsets and ambitions similar to those of the girl above, find themselves playing the barista at Starbucks to get by following the attainment of their English degree from [Insert Run Of The Mill State/Overpriced Private University Here].

So long as this bubble remains, however, average and unremarkable girls will still feel entitled to a future resembling that of Hillary Clinton or Carrie Bradshaw (wealthy, educated, and/or powerful), and they'll act accordingly.

Why show any respect to the pawns and knights surrounding you when you have already been crowned a queen?

Read Next: Careers That An American Education Can Buy You

Girls Are About To Get Even Sluttier

February 28, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

The sexual revolution happened because the pill appeared, many contend. Women on the pill no longer had to worry about getting pregnant, single middle class women increasingly had the ability to work and live on their own (away from the scrutiny of their families), and they could now put off getting married to focus on their career. But recently, a researcher has fingered another factor in the onset of the 'sexual revolution' – the end of syphilis. Historically, syphilis was a debilitating disease that would deform the faces of victims, and often kill them. It ravaged much of Europe in the 18th and 19th centuries.

A Rembrandt portrait of a man with syphilis

In 1943, it was discovered that penicillin is an effective treatment for syphilis. In the 1940's and 50's, syphilis-related deaths declined dramatically. Andrew Francis of Emory University has studied this period, noting that promiscuity increased at the same time; he goes on to conclude that because syphilis ceased to be a fatal threat, people went on to have sex with more people and with greater abandon. His study abstract states:

> Measures of risky non-traditional sexual behavior began to rise during this period. These trends appeared to coincide with the collapse of the syphilis epidemic. Syphilis incidence reached an all-time low in 1957 and syphilis deaths fell rapidly during the 1940s and early 1950s. Regression analysis demonstrated that most measures of sexual behavior significantly increased immediately following the collapse of syphilis and most measures were significantly associated with the syphilis death rate. Together, the findings supported the notion that the > discovery of penicillin decreased the cost of syphilis and thereby played an important role in shaping modern sexuality.

The case of penicillin is an interesting, cautionary tale. A cure for a debilitating disease would seem like the perfect example of something with no downsides; how could a cure ever be a bad thing? But if Francis is right, even a welcome cure has its consequences, an impact to which many would object.

The Next Frontier

Dr. Tariq Sadiq is a UK researcher developing a device as consequential as the condom and the pill — a way to test for venereal diseases quickly, conveniently and cheaply. The device would be a chip that connects to a smartphone; the user would deposit urine or saliva on the chip, and would receive an immediate response as to whether he or she had common sexually transmitted diseases, like gonorrhea or chlamydia. Sadiq is not alone; Another researcher at Columbia University, Samuel Sia, is developing a similar device, planned for use in African clinics and eventually rich countries. Tests that used to require a full laboratory to conduct can now be done with a small handheld or desktop device, with little to no human labor required.

STD infection rates have been climbing in the UK, where Sadiq lives. In the US, chlamydia has become more prevalent, but the rate for other STDs seems to have leveled off. Regardless of the trends, the threat of contracting an STD continues to put a damper on the prospect of having sex with lots of people. Some of this is unfounded, as AIDS and syphilis to a lesser extent are far more common among men who have sex with men than among heterosexuals, but STD testing is often expensive and inconvenient. It can cost hundreds of dollars even if you have health insurance, and few get it more than once or twice a year, despite having multiple new sexual partners every year. In addition, it may take weeks to get an appointment, and yet more weeks to get your results, at which point you'll probably lose the paper it's written on. All you'll have left is a weak assurance to give your partner that "I'm clean." Of course, the less scrupulous are content baldly lying about their STD test record.

Loading...

With such testing devices, one would get results quickly and digitally. The results would be transmitted to an app on your phone, then you'd run the app and show your results to prospective sexual partners. Even if a test result were two weeks old, if the user has been having sex for eight years, over 99% of their sexual history is accounted for; unless they had some wild sex spree since then, the odds that the person has contracted an STD in the intervening two weeks are low. The test would be cheap, at $5 or less per use. Once people become comfortable sharing their data in this way, it might even start to appear in on online dating profiles. It's hard to see how this wouldn't catch on, in one form or another, given the obvious benefits.

The Response

The question posed above is a favorite of mine. If the case of penicillin and syphilis is any guide, electronic STD testing may usher in a new era of promiscuity. The responses above, as a statistical representation of how people would respond, is probably meaningless.

But even if you had a well crafted survey, whose sample reflected the population, the results would be near worthless. If you had asked girls in the 1950's if they would be having one night stands given that syphilis was no longer a threat, they wouldn't have said, 'Well yes, raw dogging is no longer a problem! Waiting 'til marriage is a sucker's game now, obvi!' They'd have shuddered with disgust. They wouldn't have foreseen that pre-marital, no strings attached sex would become the norm, just because of some medical innovations.

Recently, I spoke to a couple girls in their early 20's, girls who were relatively chaste – they'd usually only have sex with men with they've dated for some time. The topic of STDs came up, and both of them were quick to conclude that they'd have sex with strangers more often and more quickly if they had better assurance that the man in question was free of STDs. To be honest, I was a little surprised by how forthright they were, and that they weren't more critical of slutty behavior, given their own conduct.

Graphic Credit: The Sexonomist

With the diminished threat of contracting STDs, more and more women will have sex with less prior commitment. Even women who answered no to the question above, claiming that concerns about STDs will not change the number of men they sleep with, will become sluttier.

Imagine a girl named Becky, a six out of 10 on the looks scale. As Becky holds out for increasingly little commitment from a man before agreeing to have sex with him, the pool of men willing to try and bang her increases. Where before, when Becky waited until the engagement or the wedding to have sex, no man higher than a 6 on the status scale would have sex with her. Currently, Becky waits until the third date or fourth date to have sex, but men 8 or above on the status scale can't be bothered to stick around that long, for the most part. With the threat of STDs a thing of the past, Becky will start having one night stands regularly, and may even approach men outright with coy offers of quick sex. Even a high status man is happy to sleep with a plain woman like Becky, as long as she lets it happen quickly and easily.

Of course, this transition has already been happening for several decades; eliminating the threat of STDs will just hasten it. Some women are already having sex with strangers they just met, and more will join them in the ensuing years. More women will spend more time single, and less time in committed, exclusive relationships. As they choose to have more sex with less prior commitment, they will get more attention from high value men, men who would have ignored them when they were slower to have sex.

The plain men who would commit to these women will stop being appealing after all those romps with handsome and charming men. When and if these women do get married, they'll secretly hold their husbands in contempt, as pathetic lame creatures who have quietly robbed them of their independence. After all, these husbands have no hope of measuring up to the men of her youth. She will have infrequent sex with him and her libido will disappear. Health 'experts,' inevitably, will consign this to aging and a lack of 'communication,' and we'll forget what it's like to meet a girl who doesn't have a permanent seat on the cock carousel.

Read Next: All Girls Like Muscular Guys

The Humiliation Of A Great Empire

February 28, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

After losing the decisive sea battle with Syracuse, the Athenian army decided to make a run for it:

> Nicias and Demosthenes [Athenian generals] now thinking that enough had been done in the way of preparation, the departure of the army took place upon the second day after the sea fight.
>
> It was a lamentable scene, not merely from the single circumstance that they were retreating after having lost all their ships, their great hopes gone, and themselves and their state in peril; but also in leaving the camp there were things most grievous for every eye and heart to contemplate.
>
> The dead lay unburied, and each man as he recognized a friend among them shuddered with grief and horror; while the living whom they were leaving behind, wounded or sick, were to the living far more shocking than the dead, and more to be pitied than those who had perished.
>
> These fell to entreating and bewailing until their friends knew not what to do, begging them to take them and loudly calling to each individual comrade or relative whom they could see, hanging upon the necks of their tent-fellows in the act of departure, and following as far as they could, and when their bodily strength failed them, calling again and again upon heaven and shrieking aloud as they were left behind. So what the whole army being filled with tears and in a distraught state, found it not easy to go, even from an enemy's land, where they had already suffered evils too great for tears and in the unknown future before them feared to suffer more.
>
> Loading...
> Dejection and self-condemnation were also rife among them. Indeed they could only be compared to a starved-out city, and that no small one, escaping; the whole multitude upon the march being not less than forty thousand men. All carried anything they could which might be of use, and the hoplites and troopers, contrary to their custom while under arms, carried their own provisions, in some cases for lack of servants, in others through not trusting them; as they had long been deserting and now did so in greater numbers than ever. Yet even thus they > did not carry enough, as there was no longer food in the camp.

>
> Moreover their disgrace generally, and the universality of their sufferings, although to a certain extent alleviated by being borne in company, were still felt at the moment a heavy burden, especially when they contrasted the splendor and glory of their setting out with the humiliation in which it had ended.
>
> For this was by far the greatest reverse that ever befell an Hellenic army. They had come to enslave others, and were departing in fear of being enslaved themselves: they had sailed out with prayer and paeans, and now started to go back with omens directly contrary; traveling by land instead of by sea, and trusting not in their fleet but in their hoplites. Nevertheless the greatness of the danger still impending made all this appear tolerable.

It did not take long for Syracuse to chase down the army and accept their surrender. The two Athenian generals were executed and the soldiers imprisoned. Two-hundred naval ships were lost. The government back in Athens was in disbelief.

The Sicilian Expedition was a tipping point that eventually led to Athenian defeat in the Peloponnesian War. On a larger scale, this war brought the beginning of the end for Athens. In spite of Greek victory in Marathon against the Persians a half-century earlier, city-states could not compete with the vast amounts of resources that large empires have.

Read Next: A Sea Battle For The Ages

The Strong & Independent Woman Translator

March 1, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

If there's anything more adorable than a 2 year old kid's bare backside, I sure as hell haven't seen it. One find day while sitting on the couch, a little one that I had grown quite fond of ran in to the living room in nothing but her birthday suit, jumping up and own with a big smile on her face and screeching at the top of her lungs.

"I pooped! I pooped all by myself!"

I immediately ran over, scooped her up, and started dancing around the living room with her in my arms. "Yay Haley! Good girl! All by yourself like a big girl? I'm so proud of you sweetheart!"

The celebration of fecal matter continued as we ran into the bathroom to view the evidence. Sure enough, there it was – floating in all its glory. I didn't see any toilet paper in the bowl, so I sat her down in the tub. For a good 20 minutes while I was ensuring the Noli N Nali Big Girl Bubble Bath was doing its job, I smiled as she took every toy out of the plastic bin and shared her success.

To the rubber frog: "I pooped!"

To the wind-up shark with goggles: "I pooped!"

To the naked Barbie doll that didn't quite survive an earlier hair cut: "I pooped!"

To the Dora the Explorer mermaid: "I pooped!"

With each announcement to her plastic friends, I kissed them on the head and explained to them how proud I was of Haley's big girl accomplishments. I guess your first unassisted poop is a pretty big deal, so I made the most of it and let Haley enjoy the attention.

I personally don't see what all the hubbub is about, because dropping a choco-dragon in a bowl for immediate disposal seems like it should be rather intuitive.

You see where I'm going with this. Here's the strong independent woman translator:

I pay my own bills = I pooped!

I have my own apartment = I pooped!

Loading...
I don't need a man to buy me stuff = I pooped!

I worked my way through college = I pooped!

I have my own cubicle where I push papers = I pooped!

I always speak my mind = I pooped!

I went to a car lot alone and got a good deal = I pooped!

I had a flat tire, and I called AAA roadside assistance all by myself! = I pooped!

Whenever a strong independent women brags about doing something that a reasonable adult is expected to be doing anyway, don't say what I say:

“I certainly hope so. Would you like a medal? How about a chest to pin it on?”

Instead, translate it in your mind to “I pooped!” then scoop her up and make a big deal about it. Twirl her around in the air, congratulate her, and let her know that you’re extremely impressed and unbelievably proud of her toddler-brained approach to life. When she brags about it to her plastic friends, kiss them on the head and tell them how amazing she is and how proud you are of her.

Caveat: If she’s fat or unattractive, ignore this advice. Tell her to shut the hell up and get out of your face, then make fun of her until she cries tears of strength. This serves absolutely no purpose, but it sure is entertaining.

But if she’s hot and you want to keep her happy while you’re banging her for a few months, the “I pooped” praise method will go a long way to promoting the decline of society as well as the decline of her panties around her ankles.

I encourage you to give it a try. You’ll hate yourself for it later, but following up with a little asshole game will make the world right again.

Read Next: The Myth of Never Hitting a Woman

8 Reasons Why The Future Is Going To Suck

March 1, 2013 | by Mike Jones | Link | Original Link

What does the future hold for the West? As one astute member of the manosphere noted, we are not going to like it. George Orwell was right. Here are eight reasons why the future is going to suck:

1. Micro Chips

In the future, everyone will have a chip. RFID will become mandatory if one wishes to receive government healthcare. Chips will also be required to receive public education.

2. Drones

The skies will fill with drones of all different sizes. They will spy on you, destroy your home, or hunt you down like an animal. Some innovative citizens may respond by designing drone-proof cities. Others may learn to take advice from our enemies on how to cope.

3. Heavily Armed Governments

Government will arm up and purchase millions of rounds of hollow-point ammunition. They will also stock up on guns that they will be made illegal for law-abiding citizens.

4. Mosquito Drones

These creepy little bastards get a separate category. Insect-sized drones will spy, take DNA samples, and implant you with bad things.

5. Capital Controls

Governments will pass laws that make it difficult to move wealth out of the country. Alternatively, laws will pass that cause foreign financial institutions to drop western clients.

Loading...

6. Travel Restrictions

There will be restrictions on where people can go, who can leave, and for how long.

7. Cameras Everywhere

Back when I grew up, there were no public cameras. In the future, there will be cameras watching your every move. Fancy ones will alert authorities to your thoughts and stop you from committing “pre-crimes.”

8. Militarized Police

In the future, it will be hard to tell the difference between the military and civilian police. Although armed like real soldiers, they will lack requisite training. Many will resort to methods such as execution by fire.

Ah well, maybe I'm just a bitter old pessimist. Perhaps the future won't be so bad. After all, there will be plenty of worthwhile pursuits to distract us. At least we can all look forward to the days of flying jet packs, smoking legalized cannabis, and banging our own personal sex robots!

TUNDRA

Read More: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

12 Great Quotes From The Landmark Thucydides

March 1, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

1.

> Athens' biggest worry was the sheer recklessness of its own democratic government. A simple majority of the citizenry, urged on and incensed by clever demagogues, might capriciously send out military forces in unnecessary and exhausting adventures. [Written by the editor]

2.

> The Peloponnesian War turns out to be no dry chronicle of abstract cause and effect. No, it is above all an intense, riveting, and timeless story of strong and weak men, of heroes and scoundrels and innocents too, all caught in the fateful circumstances of rebellion, plague, and war that always strip away the veneer of culture and show us for what we really are. [Written by the editor]

3.

> Men's indignation, it seems, is more excited by legal wrong than by violent wrong; the first looks like being cheated by an equal, the second like being compelled by a superior.

4.

> In practice we always base our preparations against an enemy on the assumption that his plans are good; indeed, it is right to rest our hopes not on a belief in his blunders, but on the soundness of our provisions. [Archidamus]

5.

> Capital, it must be remembered, maintains a war more than forced contributions. Farmers are a class of men that are always more ready to serve in person than in purse. Confident that the former will survive the dangers, they are by no means so sure that the latter will not be prematurely exhausted, especially if the war last longer than they expect, which it very likely will. [Pericles]

6.

> For men can endure to hear others praised only so long as they can severally persuade themselves of their own ability to equal the actions recounted: when this point is passed, envy comes in and with it incredulity. [Pericles]

7.

> Again, your country has a right to your services in sustaining the glories of her position. These are a common source of pride to you all, and you cannot decline the burdens of empire and still expect to share its honors. You should remember also that what you are fighting against is not merely slavery as an exchange for independence, but also loss of empire and danger from the animosities incurred in its exercise. [Pericles]
>
> Loading...

8.

> In [the diplomacy] contest the blunter wits were most successful. Apprehensive of their own deficiencies and of the cleverness of their antagonists, they feared to be worsted in debate and to be surprised by the combinations of their more versatile opponents, and so at once boldly had recourse to action: while their adversaries, arrogantly thinking that they should know in time, and that it was unnecessary to secure by action what policy could provide, often fell victims to their lack of precaution.

9.

> ...for it is a habit of mankind to entrust to careless hope what they long for, and to use sovereign reason to thrust aside what they do not desire.

10.

> Few indeed have been the large armaments, either Hellenic or barbarian, that have gone far from home and been successful. They cannot be more numerous than the people of the country and their neighbors, whom fear unites; and if they fail for want of supplies in a foreign land, to those against whom their plans were laid they nonetheless leave renown, although they may themselves have been the main cause of their own discomfort. Thus these very Athenians rose by the defeat of the Persians, in a great measure due to accidental causes, from the mere fact that Athens had been the object of his attack. [Hermocrates, predicting Athenian defeat in Sicily]

11.

> I do not consider that I am now attacking a country that is still mine; I am rather trying to recover one that is mine no longer; and the true lover of his country is not he who consents to lose it unjustly rather than attack it, but he who longs for it so much that he will go to all lengths to recover it. [Alcibiades]

12.

> When men are one checked in what they consider their special excellence, their whole opinion of themselves suffers more than if they had not at first believed in their superiority, the unexpected shock to their pride causing them to give way more than their real strength warrants. [Gylippus]

Read Next: The Humiliation Of A Great Empire

4 Reasons Why Your Diet Sucks

March 1, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

---

1. You have no idea how much you are eating.

Ever wonder why you can't gain any muscle or lose any body fat? Well, the first place to look for the answer is your diet. Are you eating the requisite amount of calories for your goals? If you want to gain muscle you have to eat more calories than you burn, whereas if you want to lose body fat you have to eat fewer calories than you burn. There is no way around this simple fact. Even though this is nothing more than a grade school physics problem, I'm still baffled by the number of guys out there whining about being "hardgainers" or "endomorphs." Invest in a food scale and track your intake. It's really not that hard.

2. You are constantly looking for the next best supplement to take.

This is the game equivalent of asking for the one magic pick up line that will allow you to swoop top shelf girls left and right. The hard truth is that the vast majority of supplements are a complete waste of money. Guys flock to supplements because it's an easy fix. Instead of putting in the time and hard work needed to obtain the results they desire, they look for shortcuts in order to get ahead. Unfortunately, these shortcuts don't exist. The only time you should be worrying about supplements is when you have all of the other nutritional building blocks in place.

3. You think you don't have the time to eat healthy.

A lot of guys complain about being too busy to eat nutritious meals made mostly of whole foods. Guys will also complain about not having enough time to hit the gym after work (or during their lunch break). The problem here is not one of time, but rather of priorities. Guys would rather sleep-in than get up early to make themselves a good lunch to take to work. The bottom line is this: if you value your health then find the time to make yourself nutritious meals. Ditch the excuses.

4. You think there is one "best" diet for everyone

I've been in this game long enough to know that there is no one particular diet that is best for everyone. I remember about 10 years ago people were losing their minds over The Atkins Diet. About 5 years later people moved on to The Paleo Diet, and now Intermittent Fasting is all the rage. New diets will always be on the horizon, which pretty much guarantees that arguments on the internet about which diet is the "best" will never end. I do not know what the "best" diet is. What I do know is that all good diets have several things in common such as being based around whole foods, and acknowledging the importance of portion control, protein, fiber, and other important nutrients. Aside from these basics, whether you eat low carb or high carb, three meals a day or six meal, is entirely up to you and your lifestyle but make sure you get the basics down first.

If you can get a handle on just these four areas of your nutrition you will be ahead of the vast majority of individuals out there.

Read More: Juicing: Flash In The Pan Or Growing Lifestyle Movement?

What The Hell Is A Clitoris?

March 1, 2013 | by TheCaptainPower | Link | Original Link

On Sept 8th 1998, Mark McGwire stepped up to the plate in Busch Stadium, and blasted a home run off Steve Traschsel to set a new Major League record for home runs in a season.

1998 was a great year for the United States, the economy was booming, unemployment was low, and new startup companies like “MCI WorldCom “and “AskJeeves” were expected to be industry leaders for YEARS to come.

During that record-breaking season, a Sports Illustrated writer had walked by Mark McGwire’s locker and noticed a bottle of androstein. The reporter confronted McGwire about the new supplement, and McGwire willingly admitted that he took “andro,” along with “creatine,” to supplement his workouts. Little did we know at the time that he was also injecting himself in the ass with testosterone, but nonetheless this article had kickstarted a supplement BOOM across the entire United States.

I was a sophomore in college at the time, and I was working out a typical muscle head gym in Brooklyn, NY. After the article appeared about McGwire’s supplement use, so began the start of the “bulk’ era in modern bodybuilding. Dorian Yates was just wrapping up his illustrious bodybuilding career, and we were witnessing the emergence of a future bodybuilding legend named ”Ronnie Coleman.” The “symmetry” look was out of style, the grunge era was all but gone, and guys in the gym were bulking up like monsters.

I can still remember the Monday nights at the gym like it was yesterday. Guys were lined up six rows deep to use the bench press, creatine powder was spilled all over the floor in the locker rooms, and new bench press records were set almost daily.

Not only did the bodybuilding trends change over time, but also the sexual trends. In the late 90′s the most common way of banging girls was with the “Power Bomb” method. The “Power Bomb” method” was used my almost all the guys in the gym, and I enjoyed it because it was a really simple:

A) Get her pants off

B) Ram it in the hole

C) Start pounding away as hard, and as fast, as possible.

The name of the game was to ejaculate as quickly as possible, and the best part was that we were so dehydrated from the creatine, that we hardly produced any seminal fluid. When I would ejaculate it was like shooting a gun, and the only thing that would come out was a flag that said “BANG!”

I became so good in bed in the late 90′s, that I was able to ejaculate in 12 seconds flat! I was so good that my girlfriends used to brag in school about how fast I could cum. And like I stated before, the best part was that there was little to no mess afterwards because of the creatine.

Unfortunately, I got in an long term relationship in 1999, or like we say in the manosphere an “LTR,” and I was with the same girl for almost five years straight. When we broke up in 2004 I went back out on the dating scene, and I was totally lost and confused.

Not only were most of the guys at the clubs skinny and cut, but I tried to use the “Power Bomb” method on the first girl that I banged after breaking up, and it completely back fired. After we watched a movie in my apartment, I laid her down on my bed, ripped her pants off, and I jackhammered her for 17 seconds straight before I ejaculated. It wasn’t my best time ever, but I thought that 17 seconds was MORE than satisfactory. I was hoping to go under 15 seconds, but the alcohol was kicking in and I couldn’t blast off quick enough.

For some reason this girl never called me back, and I was in complete shock!

What went wrong?

I’m bench pressing really good, I’ve been supersetting my shoulders with my calves, why didn’t she call me back?

Like a blind man at an orgy, I was going to have to start feeling my away around.

I told one of my old training partners in the gym what had happened, and he started laughing at me. He said “Are you still using the Power Bomb technique?” ”Nobody uses that anymore, these girls today want you to stimulate the clitoris.”

“The clitoris?” “Are you fucking kidding me?’ I replied. “I haven’t heard that term used since junior high sex ed class! I like to bang my women the way I play basketball, one on one with little dribbling.”

“Hah, it’s not the 90′s anymore dude. I banged this girl for 45 minutes last night, with at least 15 minutes of foreplay. You need to start stimulating the clitoris if you want to impress the ladies.”

That year I learned a valuable lesson: You need to keep up with bodybuilding and sexual trends. Whether it is with pubic hair, bench press, or where you blow your load.

Today the only move that I saved from the 1990′s is called the “Tony Danza.” It’s when I’m banging a girl and I start yelling at her “Who’s the boss?? Who’s the BOSS?”

“Oh, you are Captain!”

SMACK!

“No bitch, its Tony Danza…”

Read Next: American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

Two Lessons From Porn

March 2, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Much has been written on the 'evils' of porn, from moral objections to psychological effects. Personally I find porn completely drains me of all motivation to talk to girls, or work on a campaign. However, there are two things all of us here at Return of Kings can learn from porn:

1. Every Girl Has A Buying Price

One of the larger trends in the porn world is a fake casting kind of deal. A professional looking man is a "casting agent" for large porn production companies. He invites the women in and gives them a breakdown of how the porn industry works, asks them a few questions and before you know it his dick is in their ass.

One might claim "but these are scripted! The girls have been in porn before or know the setup." I say "so what?" These women are still getting rawdogged, throat fucked, ass fucked, choked, and creampied by a complete stranger. Yes they get paid, maybe they do it because they have 'emotional wounds', maybe they like the attention or the thrill of pleasing voyeurs like yourself, maybe they are genuinely very sexual and are passionate about taking dick. Who knows, but there is a reason why they do it.

What can we learn from this?

Every girl has a buying price. This doesn't mean a monetary buying price, but the point at which she is so attracted to you she decides to have sex with you. For some girls it could be the way you pulled her head back and pushed her into the wall while making out, for others it could be a 'romantic' gesture such as sharing a bottle of wine with a great view, for others it could be logical "this guy could provide well for our children" and on and on. Its your job to find out.

2. Never Put A Girl On A Pedestal

Every woman has a threshold you can reach to sleep with her. Does this then mean all women are whores? It certainly does not, but it does mean that you should not pedestalize any single woman. Thinking she is above her biological imperative is foolish.

Loading...

A sex scandal surrounding Miss Teen Delaware has been blowing up lately. If you're not familiar: a video was leaked of her freshly 18-year-old ass being plundered by some dude in a cheesy motel. The situation plays out like I described before. He asks her some questions and they get to fucking. She happily takes a load to the face and thoroughly enjoys it. Danger and Play recently covered this story so I'll quote:

> Miss Teen Delaware was literally put on a pedestal. She was given a crown and treated like royalty.
>
> Men who met her felt intimidated. They viewed their sexual attraction for her as something immoral, unnatural even. They would feel odd approaching a nice girl like her. She's too special, too precious, too delicate, too innocent.
>
> The girl you view as a precious, delicate snowflake who must be protected is getting railed in a Motel 6 by a herpes-infected ex-con.

To me the most illogical facet of the average males' mind is that of pedestalization. They could jerk off five times a day for their whole life to different women. They can see every imaginable act being performed on every imaginable type of woman, yet they still fear that by expressing their sexuality they will tarnish such a beautiful specimen of female-kind. Like I said every woman has a point at which she will sleep with a man. Sex is the most natural thing in the world and yet guys think their oneitis is an inhuman, paragon of chasteness.

With enough comfort a girl will be open to doing almost anything. Her comfort must reach her sex-threshold before you can make sweet, passionate, tender, romantic, slow, love to her. If you've vowed to never watch porn again keep these lessons in mind and you'll thank yourself once you seduce the cute girl from the coffee shop.

Read Next: American Women Simply Can't Compete

How To Get Laid On Plenty Of Fish

March 2, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

Plenty of Fish is the most popular dating site in the world. It is free, it is easy to use, and it is filled with girls who lack the funds, the seriousness, or the intelligence to realize that every other dating site this side of Adult Friend Finder offers them better prospects for a guy who wants a long-term relationship.

In other words, it's perfect. The girls are pre-selected for some combination of stupidity, desperation and sluttiness. Not a great place to find a wife, but a prime hunting ground for the man looking to play some catch and release.

This guide will cover every step necessary to get you on a date with a girl. Once you've gotten a girl to meet you, run the Thumotic First Date Bang, or cook up the Thumotic Second Date Bang recipe. They work 100% of the time, most of the time.

But first you need to get those dates. Here are the five keys to succeeding at locking down girls on Plenty Of Fish:

1. Lie about your looks

75% of a man's attractiveness is completely within his control. Lifting, dressing well, and taking care of yourself will make you appear to be more genetically 'fit' than you actually are. Do it.

Now get some proper photographs taken. You know your one friend with a thousand dollar camera and a Pinterest account? Take a break from calling him gay and get him to take some quality pictures that highlight your best features.

If you aren't hideously deformed, you can throw up pictures that will be in the top 10% of the male population. Start your profile with a nice slideshow, and you're playing the online dating game on easy mode.

2. Lie about your height

Lying in the course of a seduction is always a fun idea. You can lie about your profession, your relationship history, what you're looking for. You can lie about where you've traveled. You can lie about whether or not you have AIDS. Get creative, readers!

The most important lie you can tell on Plenty Of Fish is your height, because it's a sortable search category. Unless you are between 6'2 and 6'5, you must lie about your height. Here is my suggested concordance between actual height and POF stated height:

6'7 -> 6'4

6'3 -> 6'3

6'0 -> 6'3

5'9 -> 6'1

5'6 -> 5'10

5’3 -> 5’7

And feel free to go ahead and experiment with even more extreme lies and report back with your results. My buddy who is 5’8 lists himself as 5’11 and has not been called out once. This works because:

1) Girls can’t recognize height, especially short girls.

2) A woman forgives you all, in her loins’ tingly thrall.

3) The worst case scenario is that a girl walks out on you when she realizes you lied, in which case, you’re still not having any less sex with her than you would have otherwise.

If this sort of blatant deception makes you feel guilty, you’re reading the wrong blog. I refuse to be morally high-roaded about this in an online dating culture where women clearly believe that:

Thin = usually thin, sometimes respectably average.

Athletic = usually hot, but too often the ‘athlete’ in question would be better suited to a role as a pulling guard for the Broncos.

Average = Fat. Always, always, always fat.

A few extra pounds = Cannot get out of bed without a pulley. Cannot tie own shoes. Cannot wipe ass without a toilet brush.

Curvy = Gravitational singularity

Remember, men, there is no Geneva convention in online dating. This is war. There are no rules.

So lie about your height. And of course, list your body type as athletic. You should be athletic anyways, because you eat right and lift, but do it no matter what you look like. If the women of POF have taught us anything, it’s that the body type category is meant to be aspirational rather than descriptive.

3. Lie about your profession

This one is actually counter-intuitive. I have a fairly high-status job title and position, but my success increased significantly when I replaced it with a simple It’s complicated. Friends of mine with various other solid professions have reported the same experience.

The ideal POF profession is to throw out some vague, ambiguous, undefined, semi-playful bullshit, but combine it with other obvious markers of status. So, describe your job like you don’t have one, but list your education as PhD/professional designation and look wealthy and well-traveled in your photos.

An acquaintance I know spent a month failing brutally at online dating. He’s an engineer, and foolish blue pill chump that he is, thinks that women would rather fuck a guy who designs supersonic aircraft than a welfare bum or a serial killer. I suggested he change his title to “it’s complicated” and his response rate tripled.

Friends, very few men have gone home alone to jerk off because they underestimated the character of the modern western woman.

There are certainly some professions that might be a net positive, i.e. doctor or lawyer. Well-defined is key here, though. Chicks see ‘finance’ and think bank teller. Tell them you work in IT and they’ll picture you doing tech support at a nursing home.

So remember: vague bullshit, coupled with the unspoken suggestion that you are a man of means. The persona you are shooting for is highly-educated drug dealer and professional blogger with friends in high places.

4. Lie about travel

Have you traveled a lot? According to your dating profile, you better be motherfucking Magellan. Post a few solid travel photos. If you don’t have them, bust out your Photoshop skills. How many 22-year-old girls on Plenty of Fish do you think can recognize a misplaced shadow?

You think I’m joking. I’m dead serious. As it happens, I’ve been to a few places. But in my younger, less well-traveled days, I often found myself losing attraction with a certain type of girl, once I revealed that I’d never been outside North America. My solution was to “borrow” the travel anecdotes and experiences my good friends had told me about. I suggest you do the same.

5. Lie about literally everything

Purge yourself of all virtue. Embrace the darkness. Spice up your life story. Drop details that imply your parents are rich. Hint at having published multiple books. Hint at owning lucrative businesses. Be reticent and embarrassed when she presses for details, and turn the conversation to more playful topics. This is an art.

6. Be the hooker with a heart of gold

Every man has his angle that he plays. This is mine. I am the man every girl is looking for: I am the Dashing Alpha Playboy finally on the verge of settling down. I don’t wear this on my sleeve—it’s very, very subtle. It’s an imperceptible boredom with the dating scene. A tiny hint of cynicism creeping into my heart. The faintest, most remote whispering of a hope that maybe, maybe, maybe, this girl sitting across from me is the one who will inspire me to give up the game.

This is such a common female fantasy, its a trope of romantic comedies. Hint at a sordid past and a dutiful future, even if neither is the case.

7. Invest nothing

Here is your opening email:

> Hey, you seem interesting. [Bullshit question about something in her profile]
>
> [Your Name]

If nothing comes to mind, send the above excerpt verbatim, [ ] and all.

If she responds with reasonable enthusiasm, give her a friendly response with some light qualification. If she responds positively to that, give her your number and meet up.

Do not stress over any one girl. Do not even bother to collect numbers. Let her make the effort, and cut her off if she's lazy. There are literally infinite girls on POF in any major city and new ones join every day. Pursue girls who dig your vibe, and do not waste time on girls who are on the fence.

8. Play the numbers game

The more lines you cast…

In the modern dating world, it is ridiculous to get attached to a girl until you've banged her at least ten times. Until then, you are a cold and mechanical hunter. Spam many messages, go on many dates, and you will be a man with a variety of options of gradually increasing quality.

Read Next: 6 Most Common Types Of Girls You'll Encounter Online

Top 10 Colleges For Getting Laid

March 3, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

---

10. University of Western Ontario

Canada's wildest party school. The University of Western Ontario may be a cold place to live, but it's attractive student body and reputation for debauchery makes it one of the best choices for young men in the Great White North.

9. Pennsylvania State University

One of America's largest colleges by enrolment and a constant presence on annual Best Party School lists, Penn State offers young men and endless sea of girls and a great party atmosphere to mack in, but suffers from relatively mundane North East weather.

8. California State University, Chico

Chico State has been affectionately labelled "DTF City" by members of the Roosh V Forum, featuring "some of the nicest and down to earth girls California has to offer". Need I say more?

7. Florida State University

While you can't really go wrong with any of Florida's larger colleges, Florida State takes the cake. It's got a huge student body, has a reputation for hard-partying and unlike some of other Sunshine State competitors, it isn't too bookish so the co-eds are even more inclined to get their freak on.

6. University of Texas at Austin

Austin is famed for being an amazing city for young men, and the girls of it's most landmark University of Texas are known for letting loose. U of T is a constant fixture on the annual party school lists, and Austin is packed to the brim with a diverse array of cute girls from both U of T, Austin itself, and tourist party goers from all around Texas, not to mention the infinite amount of bars particularly on its infamous 6th Street. Unfortunately, however, the outside of campus bar scene of Austin has at times been labelled a sausage fest.

5. McGill University

Located in the heart of Montreal, men who study at McGill University will not only enjoy it's academic prestige but the beauty and grace of Montreal's fine women. Bring some warm clothes and brush up on your French because I have it on good authority from a number of my own friends that once you go have a taste of the women of Quebec, you'll never want to go back to Anglo girls ever again.

4. New York University

Loading…

NYU is not only an excellent university, but it happens to be located in Manhattan's Greenwich Village neighborhood giving it's male students perfect logistics with which to chase poon in one of the best cities for game in the Western world. While it lacks the crazy frat parties of other colleges on this list, that is more than made up for by the sheer volume of cute young women every time you step onto the street or pass through Washington Square Park, not to mention NYC's famed nightlife and NYU's favorable straight guy to female ratio. NYU is conveniently situated next door to the East Village, which happens to have the greatest concentration of bars in the entire world.

3. University of Georgia

UGA is the flagship party school of the hard partying Southern colleges, beating out other venerable competitors such Louisiana State and Ole Miss. A player friend who lives in the South declared that he would surely “have STD’s if went to UGA” which sums the school up quite well. If a guy has game there they are going to kill it .

2. Arizona State University

A Roosh V Forum member said about ASU that whenever they visited his college for football and basketball games “it was ridiculous as if Playboy was holding events on campus.” ASU is well known across America for it’s hot and slutty co-eds. ASU is the single largest college in the United States by enrollment with over 60,000 students and due to it’s sheer size, ASU girls don’t have to worry about all their friends finding out about them hooking up with you. Constant sunshine plus hot, slutty women and plenty of anonymity, what more could you ask for?

1. University of California, Santa Barbara AKA the University of Casual Sex and Beer

The designated party school of the University of California system, UC Santa Barbara benefits not only from an attractive and hard partying student body (the featured image at the very top of this article being a good example), but also it’s beautiful on-campus beaches and year-round perfect weather. Isla Vista, California, which is home to the bulk of UCSB students is famous for it’s debauchery, beach culture and outdoor festivals. Whereas Berkeley and UCLA attract hard working academically oriented students, Santa Barbara is the favoured destination for party girls from across California. While The University of Southern California is a bastion for cliquey sorority girls, the culture of UCSB is simply much more conductive to gaming. This combined with it’s beautiful weather, beaches and laidback yet hard-partying culture make UC Santa Barbara paradise on Earth for young men. There is no other college that can beat the experience it offers for young college men with game.

Honorary Mention: Brigham Young University

For those poor souls that are looking for a nice, traditional (and also Mormon) girl who aren't afraid to put a ring on it, BYU is hands down for them to "game." If that's not what you're looking for, steer clear of of Brigham Young University like the plague.

Read Next: Being Popular In School Is Overrated

Does Alcohol Affect Muscle Growth?

March 3, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Alcohol, and its effects on building muscle is a topic that I hear about again and again. If I drink tonight, is the heavy lifting I did at the gym today wasted? Will it inhibit my ability to gain muscle? Will it turn me catabolic and eat up all my muscle? Will it all turn to fat? As someone who loves to go out and enjoy some quality spirits, these questions have always interested me. I decided to sift through a number of scientific journals in search of the answer, this is what I found:

The Facts

1. Alcohol is effectively a fourth macronutrient, coming in at 7 calories per gram (1).

2. Unfortunately, unlike the other 3 macronutrients (fats, carbohydrates, and protein) your body is not capable of efficiently deriving energy from it – hence the popular term empty calories. This is misleading, however, because some energy is, in fact, derived. Just a smaller percentage.

Furthermore this percentage decreases with subsequent drinks. This means that your body actually utilizes a substantial percentage of the calories consumed from the first couple of drinks for energy (2).

3. It inhibits protein synthesis. New muscle tissue develops when the rate of muscle protein synthesis is greater than the rate of muscle protein breakdown (i.e., in a positive muscle protein balance). It is important to note that the studies that confirm this notion have been performed on rats and alcoholics (3).

The Implications

These facts have a couple of key implications.

Loading...

1. In terms of weight or fat gain, energy balance is still king. If you consume more calories than you expend (eat more than you burn) you will gain weight—regardless if alcohol was or was not included in said calories.

2. Heavy alcohol consumption will affect your progress in the gym. Big surprise, right? Heavy drinking leads to less energy being derived from the beverages and suppresses the rate at which your body can synthesize muscle protein. Not to mention that your performance will suffer if you lift with a hangover.

The Conclusion

As long as you limit alcohol consumption to a moderate amount (roughly two drinks per day) there will be little to no negative side effects in the quest to gain muscle and improve your physique. Then again, if you are not concerned with deriving the absolute maximal benefits out of your training, going hard every once in a while is unlikely to seriously hinder your gains.

References:

1. Suter PM, Jéquier E, Schutz Y. Effect of ethanol on energy expenditure. American Journal of Physiology 1994;266(4 Pt 2):R1204-12.

2. Lieber CS. Perspectives: do alcohol calories count? American Journal of Clinical Nutrition 1991;54(6):976-982.

3. Pacy, P. J., et al. The effect of chronic alcohol ingestion on whole body and muscle protein synthesis—a stable isotope study. Alcohol and Alcoholism 1991;26(5-6):505-513.

Read More: Coffee Is Good For Your Health

5 Signs You Should Marry Her

March 3, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

I often refer to marriage-worthy women as Leprecorns because they're so rare, it's like finding the offspring of two mythical creatures. But that's just the nasty player side of me, and I'm finally starting to understand what I've been missing out on.

Have you ever noticed that it's the nice guys and the beta herbs who always seem to find the marriageable women, while players seem to keep dating the same old skanks and bitching about it on the internet? Well I certainly have, and no sir, I don't like it one bit. Players like me often suffer from selection bias, which means since we only pursue the type of women who are interested in quick sex, our view of the female gender as a whole (heh) becomes skewed. A player thinks most women are sluts in much the same way a drug dealer may think most people are addicts. The player's chosen environment and actions become a self-fulfilling prophecy, and in the end, he doesn't recognize marriage material when he sees it nor does he know how to attract it.

I finally recognize my own selection bias, and I'm just now starting to come to my senses. After many years of being secretly envious of my happily married – no, ecstatically married friends, I decided to break down and study their methods so I could achieve the same level of success. After much observation and deliberation, I've boiled it down to the top five signs that you should marry her.

I. She knows how to mirror

If you casually approach a young lady in a confident, mysterious, slightly aloof and funny/cocky way, she'll likely respond in a flirtatious manner since the game brings out the side of her that likes bad boys. Instead, approach her like a gentleman if you want to awaken the sweetheart within her. This works best if she's 27 or older – especially if her little sister or best friend just got engaged. Most guys aren't meeting the wrong women; they're meeting women the wrong way. If you want a kind, sweet, thoughtful woman, simply present yourself as a kind, sweet, thoughtful man and she'll mirror you since she most likely doesn't have a personality of her own.

II. She doesn't jump into bed quickly

After you meet her and give her a nice image to mirror, you'll find that she won't jump in to bed with you very quickly. This means she's not like that anymore and she'd never do that with you. The past is the past, people grow and change, and her reluctance to sleep with you until the eleventh date shows that she's either made a permanent change or she was never like that to begin with. Either way, you're dealing with a woman who has a good head on her shoulders. And if she makes casual comments like "I'm not like other girls" or "I'm not a slut" then rest assured you've got a keeper. Only marriage-worthy women say things like that.

III. She made good dating choices

A woman who is a prime candidate for marriage has made good dating choices. That means her very short list of ex-boyfriends will read like a who's who roster of up and coming gentlemen who weren't good enough for her for one reason or another. But like most things in life, there's an exception to this rule. She may have a list of bad boy ex-boyfriends a mile long, but even that means she was smart and strong enough to leave dead-end relationships behind after she was tricked into them by lying sack-o-shit players. So either she was smart enough to date a handful of good men, or smart enough to dump a bunch of jerks, or skilled enough to do and learn and grow from both. The end result is that basically all of her dating choices were good since she learned from them. She's smart and experienced, her experiences made her who she is today, and all her mistakes led her to you.

IV. She says it's time

If she has successfully mirrored your attitude and shown selectivity by not jumping into bed with you too quickly, and if she has learned from her mistakes (which means they're not really mistakes at all), you owe it to her to pop the question. Wasting a woman's time when she's staring down the barrel of the big three-oh is ungentlemanly, unpatriotic, and anti-Jesus. If she truly loves you with the kind of unending devotion that will last forever, you should put a ring on her finger before her eternal love's expiration date has been reached. For those of you not familiar with forever's expiration date, it's typically the first Valentine's Day after the 18-month anniversary of your first date. If she says it's time to settle down, then you should listen to her because she loves you and only wants what's best for your relationship. Plus, if 18 months of good behavior isn't worth an $8k ring and lifetime commitment, I don't know what is. In the words of my recently married best friend, "It's been a while and she's getting on my case, so I guess it's finally time to take the plunge brah."

V. She is a benevolent dictator

Women have been given the financial incentive and legal authority to end a marriage whether they want that authority and whether they plan to execute that privilege or not. You should propose to a woman who you believe will be benevolent dictator (a woman who will allow you to be a man.)

Do you game your way out of a speeding ticket? Do you game your way to extra paid time off at work?

While game certainly helps, getting off with a warning or getting extra paid time off ultimately depends on the benevolence of the cop or your boss because they're the deciding authority. The dissolution of marriage is the same, so be sure to choose a woman who is less likely to become unhappy. You can't alpha your way through anything and sustain it unless she agrees to it, and you can't lead if she refuses to follow. Tight game and alpha dominance will certainly go a long way to motivating her to be a good partner, but in the end, the final decision is hers and hers alone.

The best way to be reasonably sure she'll allow you to be a man is to ask her to double-dog pinky swear it. If she says she'll give you permission to be a man and promises never to rescind that permission by dragging you through divorce and family court, you're good to go! With a little alpha backbone and tight game, there's a 50% chance she'll let you pay for and be the King of the castle to which she holds the deed. Just work out the benevolent dictatorship (a minor detail really) in advance, and enjoy the rest of your life.

Thanks for reading. I'll be back right after I have my tongue surgically removed from my cheek.

Read Next: Taking The Red Pill Destroyed My Family

Where Did The Pretty American Girls Go?

March 4, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Recently I've been on a 80's and 90's movie kick. Partially because the movies are so absurd that they are enjoyable, and partially because I don't like to watch movies and have 18 problems surface which seems to be the current trend. I also love the the scenery of the long lost American woman. While watching Hardbodies on Crackle, I got to thinking, where did the American women go?

There was a time when America dominated everything. Foreign women loved our military men, and foreign men were envious of the abundance of our women. Those days are long gone, which is probably the biggest disappointment of my life. Being 24, the only thing I got to experience from 90's women was the fantasy that when I grew older I too would have gorgeous women in bikinis. Imagine my horror when I got to college in 2006 and I had a better chance of finding oil in my backyard than large groups of gorgeous blondes on the beach.

Here's a quick reflection of some of the great comparisons of the now extinct American beauty, and the current replacements.

Saved by the Bell dominated 90's TV. Viewers got to drool over Kelly, and the worst they had to look at was Jessie.

Saved by the Bell has now been replaced with Pitch Perfect. Yes the lead character is still attractive, but now instead of a less attractive friend, the world is left with Fat Amy. Oh Joy!

The Real World revolutionized television with the idea of reality TV, displaying seven seemingly attractive people in a house with the hopes of constant banging and arguments being caught on camera.

We are now left with The Biggest Loser, and while at least it bases it's concept on losing weight, the series is still full of morbidly obese humpback whales.

Loading...

Additionally, in the past we had Married with Children. The story of a typical loser man who hates his wife, has a weird son, and one really hot daughter.

Now we have Mike and Molly, the story of two love birds who can't decide if they can figure out how sex works, or whether they should just eat another deep fried turkey.

In the days of yesteryear, women congregated in groups of primarily equal quality. At worst they had a less attractive friend who was usually still more attractive than the alternatives. It was roughly a three tiered system: hottest, slightly less hot, still bangable. Now we have hottest, slightly less hot, bangable, maybe if i'm completely shitfaced, and oh my god my eyeballs are bleeding.

So what happened? From watching 80's movies its quite obvious that the system was perfect. Women and men had their gender roles, but when it came to the concept of sex they were on equal grounds. Thanks to feminism, women have been told men treat them as sex objects and they then second guess their sexcapades. In retrospect, in the 80's women had the right to get laid for their own pleasure, and there were no negative consequences. Why? Because as men, as long as she's a good lay and clean we don't care.

Cindy Crawford is the prime example of the lost American Woman.

So now as men we have two options. We can either pretend we are in the 80's and pine over old movies. Or we can leave the country where women still accept womanly roles and life procures as it should. Unfortunately, the American dream in regards to women is dead. There are no more Cindy Crawford's of this country. The American woman is dead. And that my friends, is a sad, sad thing.

Read Next: 6 Reasons Why Jersey Shore Was Good For American Culture

Thinking Of Going Paleo?

March 4, 2013 | by Spaniard | Link | Original Link

Take a walk around any American neighborhood and you'll notice one thing: Americans are big, and we're only getting bigger and bigger. The cause of this is that our country's addicted to grains and sugar, the former being a poor substitute for nutrient rich fruits, meats, and vegetables, and the latter being ultimately deadly in the quantities in which Americans are consuming it. We're a nation of addicts, yet there's no Grainaholics Anonymous or Sugaraholics Anonymous. Why is that? It's because there are so many grain and sugar addicts in this nation that they no longer have to be anonymous—they can be nonchalant about their addiction. There's safety in numbers.

In the days of our fathers, schoolboys took pride in shaming their wayward comrades, with epithets such as "lard-ass," "thunder-thighs," and "Fatty McChunks" being hurled on a daily basis to the open approbation of their healthy schoolmates. It was constructive criticism at its finest, with onlookers becoming clearly forewarned of the social ostracization which they too would suffer if they engaged in a sedentary lifestyle lacking in discipline and self control. This world is no more. As a result of a peculiar Western mental disorder, political correctness, America has lost the will to fight. The battle of the bulge has been lost.

Like the alien invaders in Invasion of the Body Snatchers, enough Americans have succumbed to this addiction that those of us who haven't yet been replaced by the body snatching American diet have no choice but to stay silent when in public in fear of being outed by the ululating cries of the brainless herd. It's a losing battle, and slowly but surely, we're all being replaced. This needs to stop, and there's only one solution to our national addiction—the paleo lifestyle. It's time to join the barbarian hordes!

It's going to take time and effort for the manosphere to undo the damage done by political correctness to our nation's psyche and physique, but nothing worth having can be had easily. The best way to lead is by example, so before we exert force in an outward direction, we've got to clean up our own house. For those of us who are keeping America's retail industry afloat by purchasing a new, ever expanding wardrobe to match our growing waistline every six months, it's time to Man Up. For those of us keeping America's fast food joints afloat with 3 a.m. trips to 24 hour joints, it's time to Man Up. For those of us consuming prodigious quantities of calorie-dense, nutrient poor alcohol as a substitute for inner confidence, it's time to Man Up.

There's two parts to being a man. The first is to behave like a man, and the second is to look like a man. Behaving like a man means being disciplined when facing decisions. Looking like a man is the inevitable, natural result of behaving like a man. Be a rock. Let the ocean of crass consumerism break itself on your braced musculature. Looking like a soft, effeminate eunuch guarding the sultan's harem is not the path to happiness—it's the path to spending your life in front of a double monitor computer setup with 32 open tabs of Asian porn. That's no way for anyone to live.

Loading...

So What's Paleo?

The paleo lifestyle's the first step in honing the discipline many of us never learned from our absent fathers. The lifestyle, known as the barbarian or caveman lifestyle, has been gaining in popularity in recent years. There's many variations of the diet, but in essence it boils down to this, if a pre-agricultural human could eat it: then it's allowed. Conversely, if a pre-agricultural human was unlikely to have access to it, it's not allowed. With the paleo diet, when a person is full, their body will let them know. The paleo diet is high in proteins, leading to adherents feeling full for a long time after having a meal. This is not the case when eating meals consisting primarily of grains like pasta, which provide a fleeting sense of fullness due to their low nutrient density, resulting in multiple high calorie meals throughout the day which leave their consumers continuously hungry, yet, paradoxically, larger and larger.

Humans like diversity in their palate, and the paleo diet provides this, making it easy to follow. Unlike the typical American diet, which could best be described as "one thousand ways to prepare nutrient sparse grains and two thousand ways to eat sugar," the paleo diet has actual variety to it, instead of the illusory variety experienced by those that think that eating a meal of lasagna with soda pop on Monday, pizza with soda pop on Tuesday, and spaghetti with soda pop on Wednesday is a diverse diet. That's a diet whose calories derive primarily from grains and sugar, a complete lack of diversity, and additionally, a recipe for obesity due to the propensity for overeating that diet creates.

A sample paleo diet meal would consist of a pound of salmon and a side of broccoli, carrots, and cauliflower on Monday, a pound of t-bone steak and a side of mushrooms and asparagus on Tuesday, and eggs with tomatoes, onions, and avocados on Wednesday, with all three days including blueberries, oranges, apples, and bananas as snacks throughout the day. The paleo menu, although occupying only a fraction of the supermarket space that's occupied by the components of the average American diet, is intrinsically more nutritionally diverse than the average American diet, is easy to follow, and is heavy on proteins, making it easy for adherents to stay on the right path, the path to manliness.

But It's Too Expensive!

A common counterpoint to the paleo diet is that it's expensive. On the surface, the argument seems solid, since eating a pound of t-bone steak or a pound of salmon every day sounds expensive, and adding fresh fruits to the mix doesn't help either, but proponents of this argument are missing the bigger picture. The most popular alternative, the diet of the average American, results in medical costs that can run into the tens of thousands of dollars, and that doesn't take into account the quality of life issues resulting indirectly from a poor diet, such as depression, lack of self confidence, and masturbatory marathons.

If we, as Americans, allow ourselves to continue consuming as we have been, the problem will only become larger and larger. Signs of our national decline are all around us, even our lexicon reflects the losing battle of the bulge, with ignominious portmanteaus like cankles and moobies, terms unheard of in previous generations, achieving popular usage. The solution is the paleo diet. It's our duty as men to lead, and the best way to lead is to lead by example. Respect is earned, not given, and with the current state of American men, it's only natural for American women to look and behave the way they do, they're only following our lead. It's time to raise the bar, Man Up, and join the barbarian horde!

Read More: Jack Lalanne Was Ahead Of His Time

How Myers Briggs Can Elevate Your Game

March 5, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

During my night approaches, I tend to shy away from scripted routines after the first couple of minutes. I respect guys who can put together engaging stories and deploy them with surgical precision, but my style tends to be a bit more conversational and extemporaneous.

Among an educated crowd in venues that promote conversation, one subject I often bring up is psychology, specifically personality types and their idiosyncrasies. Girls love to talk about their personalities, since it taps into their deep-rooted need to be part of a larger identity group, yet allows them enough leeway to show they are special snowflakes.

If I get a favorable initial reaction, I often bring up the Myers-Briggs (MBTI) personality test. The Myers-Briggs scale presents four different dimensions with two options for each, describing how a person creates energy, gathers information, makes decisions, and interacts with the world.

Myers-Briggs is a popular topic in undergraduate intro psych classes, and it may surprise you how many girls are familiar with the concept. I've found that about 20% of 22-28 year old girls know their type, and at least another 20% have heard of the test or are very interested in taking it. Ever notice how girls love to talk about astrology and their horoscopes? This subject touches the same interests and desires. Unlike astrology, however, it can provide valuable and actionable information to help your game.

If you know a girl's type, you have a blueprint of what motivates them, how they are predisposed to spend their time, and how they view the world. For example, if you discover a girl is an "E" you may engage her about going out with her friends, involvement in group activities, and demonstrate that you are open to new experiences. If she's an "I", you will likely be able to have a deeper conversation where you emphasize your more introverted hobbies (traveling alone, playing a music instrument, writing) to build comfort and attraction.

The next level of incorporating MBTI comes when you can tailor your short and long-term game based on specific personality types. These are just a few examples:

INTJ / INTP - Their brains are wired more like men. You can have rational and often insightful conversations with them, and drama will be minimal compared with other types. Sex often has wild/rough elements. They may lack the feminine "spark" that immediately endears them to you, but you can spend a peaceful day with this type without wanting to tear your hair out. They are likely to be shy at the beginning. Challenge them with wit and show physical/intellectual dominance. A rare type for girls.

ENFJ - Many nurses and teachers fall into this category. These girls are sweet and will respond positively to small bits of "beta game". ENFJs care about others, and they can be more engaging because they actually want to hear about your ideas and feelings. One of the best types to date in my experience.

ENFP - Prom queens. ENFPs are used to getting attention, and their egos are validated almost solely by the adoration of others. To capture her interest you need to push-pull as much as possible. Give her slight interest and then withdraw mercilessly. The script-flipping of making her search for your approval will bond her to you even more than with the average girl. If you're an introvert, you'll have to resist her pressure to go out more, meet people, and engage in social obligations in which you have little interest.

ESTP - These girls have a constant need for novelty and are keen manipulators. If you want to keep them in your rotation, switch things up and keep her guessing. ESTPs can range from absolute pleasures to used car salesmen, depending on your awareness of their subtle manipulation and how much you let them get away with.

INFJ - Ultimately you will get tired of dealing with their feelings. More than any other type, these girls have solid intuitions that they will follow blindly, even in the face of incontrovertible rational discourse. Their depth and number of feelings can be overwhelming to a repeated interaction, since they live in their heads more than ENFJs. May be more prone to depression and anxiety.

You can take the test for yourself, and familiarize yourself with the categories and the 16 types here.

As game continues to evolve from furry hats and magic tricks to a more optimized, lifestyle-oriented pursuit, specialization is a necessity to get the most out of your approaches. Familiarity with Myers-Briggs types provides insight that often takes precious time and effort to gather otherwise. By limiting the generalized game you pull from your normal playbook, Myers-Briggs can accelerate the process of building attraction and maintaining your frame, giving you an edge on the competition.

Read More: The Father Of Relationship Game Shares His Secrets

About the Author

Black Knight co-authors Man Ex Machina, a new manosphere blog about game, dating, and self-improvement. Find him on Twitter here.

3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation

March 5, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

False rape claims distort the pursuit of justice and ruin the lives of innocent men. I want both men and women to know the signs of a false rape so that men can protect themselves and women can avoid looking like a liar if they were legitimately raped.

So let's get to it. After many years of reading and hearing about various rape cases that were eventually dismissed, I started to notice patterns surrounding false rape accusations. While not any one of these tests are conclusive, if you see two or more of the signs below, your bullshit alarm should be going off.

1. Virtually no evidence of struggle

Contrary to what a lot of feminists claim, girls fight back when someone is trying to put an unwanted object in their vagina. Perhaps the most frustrating form of last-minute resistance known to man is having a naked girl on your bed who refuses to open her legs. How is a man supposed to rape her short of beating her down and tying her up?

Feminist response: "But what if the attacker has a knife/gun/(insert weapon here)?"

Unless the victim was approached in complete isolation, the attacker is going to have a very hard time sneaking in a weapon without being noticed in most public places, let alone raping her in public. And if a woman was raped in isolation, like some kind of back alley, then this test doesn't apply because she is a true victim.

Feminist response: "But what if she goes over to his house, or he goes over to her house?"

This brings us to our next point…

2. The attacker is invited to the victim's house OR the victim willingly went to the attacker's house

Put yourself in a criminal's shoes. If you wanted to rape a woman and get away with it, why would you rape a woman who invited you over? The evidence is already stacked against you should anything happen to her. The police would know for certain that you were in the same residence as her.

It is for this reason that a woman who claims to have been raped in her own house by a man she knew beforehand is a suspicious claim, since a man looking to rape someone would not pick a target who could identify him to the police.

This is especially true in our digital age – cell phones have GPS tracking systems, cars have GPS chips built in, and if someone so much as accesses the internet at a residence in any way a record is created – so the risk of being caught for any crime rises dramatically when in a personal residence. It would be impossible to create an alibi of being somewhere else.

The same is true for a man raping a woman he invited over to his house: why would he do such an act, knowing he could not deny being in the same residence with her? It doesn't make sense.

Feminist response: "But according to all the statistics, most women are raped by men they know!"

This brings us to the final, and most obvious sign…

3. Authorities are alerted days, weeks, or even months after the rape

If your car is robbed, do you wait a few weeks before telling the police? If your house burns down, do you wait a few months before making a claim?

I often hear women do not report rapes right away because they are ashamed or humiliated to report that it ever happened. This is pure bullshit because any rape victim working with the police can request to have their identity hidden from the press, and both the police and press must honor such requests under penalty of law.

Loading…
The most likely reason a woman waits to file rape charges is because she herself doesn't know how she feels about the sex she had – "Oh, he was cute but I was really drunk…" – and needs to convince herself she was somehow wronged.

But, in the real world, it's easy to see when you're wronged. Things like being raped aren't ambiguous. The only reason women wait to report a rape is because they are unsure of how to spin a convincing story, or because pangs of guilt prevent them from doing so. Ultimately, when women make a false rape charge it's to avoid admitting the man she slept with was a mistake.

Thus if a woman says she was "date raped" by a man she already known, and he had her at knife or gun point, ask yourself: How long did she wait to report the crime? Anything less than 36 hours and I would become suspicious.

Applying the tests

Try it for yourself. Go review some famous false-rape charges, such as the ones levied against Dominique Strauss-Khan, Julian Assange, or the Duke lacrosse players. You'll see in all cases unharmed women who were properly on the same premises as the attacker, and, in the case of Assange, women who took their sweet time to file some charges.

> When he was later interviewed by police in Stockholm, Assange agreed that he had had sex with Miss A but said he did not tear the condom, and that he was not aware that it had been torn. He told police that he had continued to sleep in Miss A's bed for the following week and she had never mentioned a torn condom.

I lived with my rapist for a week?

After looking at false rape reports, be sure to look at an actual rape case:

> Lucas arrived Saturday at the doorman building with a pizza for a customer on the 10th floor. Once his work was done, the teen allegedly found his way to the victim's unlocked door down the hall.
>
> "He goes through the building opening doors," said the victim, a modeling agent, as she wiped away tears. "There I am with my daughter sleeping. And he rapes me with my daughter right next to me?"
>
> The rape occurred inside a bedroom filled with dozens of porcelain and plastic dolls belonging to the little girl. Cops said the attacker tried to muzzle the victim's cries by putting his hand over her mouth.
>
> "It seemed fake," said the victim, who said she woke up a little disoriented to find Lucas already on top of her. "I opened my eyes. I said, 'Get off. What are you doing?' I was hysterical."
>
> Lucas was tracked down by police through the building doorman, who let him inside, and the customer, who steered them to the pizza shop.

As you can see the above case, an actual rape involves strangers, trespassing, and intense signs of struggle. While the three tests aren't 100% accurate, since nothing can be known with complete certainty, these indicators will be right more often than not.

So learn the difference, and end the abuse of our justice system.

Read More: How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation

Dr. Oz Is A Pussy

March 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Mehmet Oz, more commonly known as Dr. Oz, is the most famous and "most trusted" doctor in America. People bow down before his superior knowledge, healer skillz, and telegenic good looks, as described in a recent New Yorker profile.

> "I worship you, Dr. Oz," one woman told him. Another threw her arms around his neck. "I haven't seen a doctor in eight years," she said. "I'm scared. You are the only one I trust."

Now let's take a look at his wife:

The most trusted doctor in America has a fat, unhealthy wife. That fact warrants some additional investigation…

> Lisa is intelligent, articulate, and unconventional; she eats no meat (Oz does)

Alright.

> [Lisa] is wholly opposed to genetically modified foods (Oz is ambivalent)

Sounds reasonable.

> [She] has repeatedly expressed reservations about the value of some vaccinations

Oh boy.

> It didn't take long for Oz to become convinced that a patient's state of mind could be important to a successful surgical outcome.

And where did that convincing come from?

> With his father-in-law's encouragement, he began to explore music therapy, energy fields, and therapeutic touch, and he began to offer them to his surgical patients. Here, too, Lisa played a major role; she is a Reiki master, and Oz soon became famous at New York-Presbyterian, not to mention within the broader surgical community, for encouraging the practice of Reiki in the operating room. Reiki, the Japanese art of laying on hands, is based on the notion that an unseen, life-giving source of energy flows through our bodies. Oz hired a Reiki master named Julie Motz to stand in the operating room, where, she has said, she would attempt to harness "the body's own energy to help patients survive risky operations, such as heart transplants." Many of Oz's colleagues, including some who worked directly with him, thought that permitting a Reiki master to enter the surgical suite at New York-Presbyterian was ludicrous.

Being famous and married to a fatty is no crime and does not warrant my mockery alone, but not only does she cause him to go against medical science, she outright controls him like a puppet:

Loading...

> [Dr. Oz had] to explain publicly that, although he disagreed with Lisa, at home she was the boss. "I'm going to get it, but, I'll tell you, my wife is not going to immunize our kids," he said, on "Campbell Brown." He added that he was powerless to reverse her decision, because "when I go home I'm not Dr. Oz, I'm Mr. Oz." (Oz still disagrees with Lisa. In January, in front of an audience, he gave the CNN host Piers Morgan his first flu shot, and encouraged millions of > viewers to get one as well. At home, however, the situation hasn't changed. He remains Mr. Oz.)

The most famous doctor in America, and probably the richest doctor in America, with a million fans, gets bossed around by his man-jawed wife like a dog. It gets even more humiliating….

> Lisa Oz takes some credit for launching her husband's television career. "My favorite thing to do in the world is hang out with my husband and boss him around," she said. "His favorite thing to do is to work. There was no way for me to go into the operating room and hang out with him, and he was spending all of his time there." She went on, only half in jest, "So I had this scheme, about a television show where we would work together and I would be his producer, so I could boss him around."

During the inevitable divorce trial, I believe she's going to want a little more than "some" credit when her attorney demands 50% of his wealth in addition to alimony payments that allow her to live a life that she has become accustomed to. And there's more…

> Oz then introduced Jeffrey Smith, the author of "Genetic Roulette," who says that engineered foods may cause many serious diseases, including colitis, asthma, and cancer. Smith has also made a film version of the book; Oz, for the sake of full disclosure, noted that "my wife, Lisa, was a narrator in Jeffrey's film."
>
> […]
>
> When I asked Lisa about her involvement, she said that Smith presented a point of view that needed to be heard, and that the safety of genetically modified foods has not been proved. "I think Mehmet and I both feel, in general, that our mission is to empower the viewer or reader," she said.

This woman has a vice grip around Dr. Oz's balls, embarrassing him in a national publication, and he takes it like the pussy that he is. Dr. Oz is a disgrace to men everywhere. As long as his behavior is seen as "normal," more men will be pressured to follow in his mangina footsteps.

Read Next: Life Advice From The Doctor

Print A Gun Using Your 3D Printer

March 5, 2013 | by Thomas More | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, I wanted to share the above broadcast on a relatively new technology. The interview is by Glenn Beck of Cody Wilson who has developed a means whereby one can make their own weapon with a 3-D plastic rendering device. The plans can be downloaded and according to him, you simply press "print" on your machine and it renders the actual gun from hard plastic.

I'm a gun enthusiast but not a technician. I have a colleague who was the head of a major gun manufacturer and he told me some years ago he was approached by a gun designer who presented the first plastic gun. They tested it and indeed it fired. Then my colleague had asked the designer to place it in the freezer for a few hours. After about 4 hours he took it out and struck it with a hammer and the weapon cracked and fragmented. Perhaps now they have advanced polymers to withstand more extreme temperatures. I also think there has to be some other components made of metal and some kind of additional know-how is required to get a fully functional weapon. That plus one has to wonder how long a life it would have and no doubt it could not stand up against the life of a classic AK-47, or any other gun made of metal.

So it is more than a matter of simply pushing the "print" button on a 3D printer and out pops a ready combat pistol or rifle. It is worth noting however, that evolving technology is making it easier for the average person to manufacture a weapon. And for a quick, short McCivil war, being able to make a defense mechanism in a pinch is a very convenient thing. Just imagine 50 years from now how much easier it will be to make a gun in the home from scratch, assuming you have all the specs. The issue of patents and intellectual property also came into question with regards to this way of making firearms. This is very much the same issues that the record and movie industries have to deal with.

Loading...

There other items addressed were the things that the interviewee stated. In the video at 4:50, time-marker Wilson states "We see liberty under threat, we see sovereignty under threat" which was followed by radio silence. For Beck's sake he could not respond to Wilson's remark because although there is supposedly the freedom of speech in America, to actually state something that would either advocate violence or suggest supporting the undoing of government would mean the cancellation of his show and an American gulag for him to rot in for a while. Again Beck was very reserved at at 6:31 when Wilson then stated "Process is not the way to preserve liberty."

In the final analysis it is people that determine the peace of their society. On one hand, lunatics can get a gun and wreak havoc, but on the other hand if the general populous in Hitler Germany had access to weapons I still think the holocaust would have happened, but the average person would have had a much better chance to either escape or fight back. It's interesting that consumer friendly technologies are becoming a mitigating factor in the gun control issue, as well as changing the theater in society's struggle between freedom vs. chaos.

Read Next: How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World

The One Word Us Females Use That Screw Up Relationships

March 6, 2013 | by Mangosteen | Link | Original Link

There is a four-letter word in the English language that is so subtle yet insidious, it has single-handedly managed to pervert relationships, mangle trust, and thwart the happiness of humankind.

That word is “just.”

When I was a blossoming teenager, my grandmother gave me a piece of dating advice that would cloud my perception of men for years to come.

“Don’t trust any man,” she cautioned me, with protective intentions. “Guys will just want you for sex.”

This warning was echoed by feminist mentors and prematurely bitter girlfriends. Pretty soon, I had heard it enough times that I started to believe the conclusion myself, even though I had no experience of my own to base it on. For pleasure or power, I accepted, guys would only want me for my body.

Before I had even lost my virginity, I started to view sex as something stripped of emotional intimacy: a mechanical act that primarily benefited males. Guys just wanted to get it in—it didn’t matter with whom—and I was merely an appliance for jacking off: an upgraded hand, with self-secreting lotion.

And that’s when things started to get really twisted.

Sometimes I would meet guys I really liked, but I was afraid to act on my physical impulses for fear of turning myself into a sexual object. They may have wanted me for sex—but, I realized, I wanted them for sex, too.

So, why couldn’t I get past this notion of guys as sexual predators if, as I began to admit to myself, I wanted sex as much as they did?

Blame that treacherous word, “just.”

Of course, I didn't JUST want a guy for sex; there were numerous factors that played into the desire to get naked in bed with someone, including his sense of humor, education, kindness, financial stability, etc., but once enough of those qualities became apparent in a guy, the inevitable outcome was that I became stricken with the primal urge to have his babies. Why shouldn't it be the same for guys?

Any man who just wanted me for my mind and personality might as well be my father or gay best friend. But if a guy wanted me for sex, did that mean that sex was all he was after? There's kind of a major difference between the phrases "he wants to have sex with me," and "he just wants me for sex."

I realized that the word "just" had completely distorted my perception of guys, their intentions, and the role sex plays in building a healthy relationship. By assuming that guys only wanted to use me for my sexuality, I had been suppressing it for fear of being exploited.

After I took the word "just" out of the equation, I began to see sex as something more than an anonymous bodily function. Once I was on the same page with my first boyfriend, physical intimacy became part of the natural progression of making a human connection. We both wanted each other for sex (among other things)—and there was absolutely nothing wrong with that.

Sadly, female use of the word "just" continues to hijack many otherwise promising relationships, provoking misperception and hostility between genders. Granted, I'm also not surprised that there are men out there who actually do just want women for sex.

Read More: Modern Women Prefer 1950's Men

About the Author

Mangosteen is a racial mutt and atheist convert, Mangosteen supports equal discrimination against all sexes, cultures, and religions. She was homeschooled by end-of-the-world religious fanatics, hosts a nationally-syndicated radio talk show, and is the media-marketing maverick behind the online-dating assistant for men, Spam Her Clam.

Why So Ugly?

March 6, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Most people in America are pretty damn ugly. Don't believe me? Next time you leave your home, take a good look at the people around you — at the general population.

It actually took me a while to realize this, having lived in the nicer areas of Southern California for most of my adult life. If you are in a similar environment you may disagree with my first sentence. But try stepping slightly outside your deliciously tainted fantasy world (e.g., Santa Monica, West Hollywood, Manhattan, South Beach, Arizona State campus, and so forth) and you will see that most people are in fact aesthetically objectionable.

The Undateables — 70%

As I mentioned in one of my previous articles, I recently started taking a Russian language course. The only convenient option for me was at a community college in a second-tier city within Los Angeles. If I'm being generous, I would say roughly 1% of the student population consists of individuals you would not shudder introducing as a significant other. In my actual class, I have to constantly negotiate the room for a seat where my visual and olfactory senses are not offended.

The girl to my left? Smells like a sweaty foot. The guy to my right? Not sure what he ate but he reeks of decayed cheese. Two rows over? Rolls upon rolls of fat nestled upon a girl who cackles uncontrollably at everything the teacher says. Side row, warts. Back row, a girl that, without exaggeration, I cannot look at because I will start to laugh. Imagine the Operation guy mated with Waldo and had a daughter. Then, imagine said daughter exuding androgyny while sporting bright red lipstick and unbeknownst to me… somehow maintaining the constant face of a person who just witnessed a dog speaking Mandarin.

And this is not an aberration. Really go walk around an average city and see what people look like. Go to the DMV. Go to the bus stop. Check out the buffet on weekends. Visit the off-strip casinos in Vegas. Still disagree?

The Average — 20%

These people are not so bad that you are visually offended at their sight. You run into them here and there during your daily activities. You sometimes think, "she would be cute if…" They take showers, but have haircuts from the 90s. They wear suits, but they are two sizes too large. She has a nice figure, but she has greasy hair and acne.

The Above Average — 9%

The bread and butter of dating culture, desired nightlife attendees, game targets and Whole Foods' customers. Initially you may think this number is higher than a single digit percentage. But such thinking fails to account for the fact that these mediums specifically attract this demographic: those who you want to date, those that do go to the desired clubs and bars, and those health-conscious and/or trendy enough to shop at places like Whole Foods. They are actively trying to look good. They watch what they eat. They wear better clothing. They spend the extra minute trimming nose hairs (guys) or putting on mascara (girls).

This subsection of society includes the girls guys see and desire on a daily basis. The girls with the nice flowing hair from shampoo commercials wearing svelte dresses. It includes the men that trigger girls' hypergamous nature. Sure, they are not perfect by any means, nor beautiful — but one must applaud the fact that they at least try to put their best face foot forward.

The Beautiful — 1%

A rare sight. It stops you in your tracks. It ascends sexuality and is defined objectively. I know when I see a remarkably handsome guy. I definitely know when I see a stunner of a woman.

Try to say otherwise but these people live by different rules and a different reality. And unless you get an opportunity to temporarily step into their worlds, it is hard to comprehend. Two illustrative examples that come to mind:

Loading...

The Crusher: A few years ago my buddy and I were in Medellin. If you are familiar with the culture there, the traditional Western nightlife is non-existent as most girls go out with male friends and do not try to mingle with outsiders. We could not find any place where there were just girls out partying. Also relevant is that Colombia generally is not a country where guys are not known for their looks. Having a drink at a high end bar, we notice a guy who undoubtedly just crushes high quality pussy on a regular basis. 6'3, ripped, in a suit, blue eyes, angular face, wavy hair, and so on (no homo of course). I asked him in my conversational Spanish where he suggests for the night, and he casually mentioned so and so club would be fun. Well we went, and it was the only place in Medellin where we were surrounded by and consequently partied with very attractive young girls that were NOT with guys. Thank you, Mr. Crusher. Access is half the battle, and our assumption that a guy this attractive would know where to find attractive girls was right.

The Model: Last year I went out on a few dates with an actual runway model. Never really got anywhere with her because I gave up after what seemed to be low-grade psychosis on her part—changing plans constantly, one demand after another that always seemed to contradict the previous one and so forth. It was just too much mental accordion play. However, in my few dates I did see the difference—the aforementioned separate reality. She was treated like a movie star. People would comment on her aesthetics stemming from shock, not ulterior motives. Waiters and waitresses would incessantly follow up, just to make sure no comfort was sacrificed for her. This is something that absent fame, most of us will never experience. It was quite eye-opening and looking back, explains her attitude.

So…why so ugly?

First, let's put aside the 1% on each side. Hitting the genetic lottery for better or worse (deformities on one hand, and the model/beautiful types on the other) is not something you can control. Once you accept that, the answer should be obvious. It's laziness. The difference between an undateable and an average, and for that matter an average and an above-average, is lack of effort — not caring or doing enough with respect to your appearance.

Eat well? Fast food is easier. Go to the gym? Nah that's for vain people. Dress nice? My 12-year-old sweatshirt is just fine. I simplify as there are other factors but the main culprit is laziness. If a girl is out of shape she's too lazy to exercise. When a girl talks about chopping her hair off it's because long hair "is just so hard to maintain!" A guy has bad breath because he's too lazy to floss and brush.

These causes lead to certain effects. Unhygienic men do not hit trendy bars on a Friday night. Most girls sporting fat rolls do not have their Iphones blowing up with multiple gentlemen callers trying to connive themselves into their sweaty panties.

If you want to be desirable, all hope is not lost. These categories are fluid and movement from one to another is common, absent the 1% mentioned above. I will readily admit I've been undateable three separate times in my life, but after I ceased my laziness I escaped and now for good. There are plenty of articles around on how to improve one's looks and style, so I won't comment much on it. You can basically transform yourself in a day with some hygiene, decent clothes and a stylish haircut.

Finally, this highly scientific statistical breakdown is not meant to apply to every country. Ever wonder why so many girls love to travel to Argentina? Because the density of "crushers" there is rather high compared to most countries. Ever wonder why so many men love Ukraine/Russia? Because the girls there are the antithesis of laziness when it comes to their looks.

But hey, at least I'm not as pessimistic as some famed observationalists:

Read More: Do Girls Flake Because Your Value Is Too Low?

The 10 Most Overrated Female Celebrities

March 6, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

I've always said that the hottest girls in the world aren't famous. Most men who have been around, I'd venture to guess, would agree. Yet, that doesn't stop both men's and women's magazines and websites from coming out with annual lists of the "Hottest Women of the Year!" Invariably, these are little more than catalogs of the most hyped celebrities of the moment, and are compiled by people with no business assembling such lists: middle-aged women, gay men, and clueless chicks who think "empowered" you-go-girlism is somehow attractive to a heterosexual man.

Go to pretty much any major college campus in the US—especially those reputed to be party schools—and watch every single one of the girls on this list get blown out of the water repeatedly and unmercifully. And, that's by girls just leaving the gym, in their Lululemon pants, their hair in a ponytail, and not a single drop of deceptive makeup.

And, before you say it: of course I would bang. But, given the choice, I'm going with the no-name college hottie over the aging celeb under an inch of makeup, or behind five Photoshop filters, any day of the week.

10. Jennifer Lopez

Despite the fact that her undeserved hype train is finally slowing down, this doesn't preclude people from still including her on these "hottest" lists. She especially deserves mention because her famous "ass" remains one of the biggest fictions in all of ass history.

9. Jennifer Aniston

An aging divorcee who was somehow named Hottest Woman of All-Time by Men's Health last year. She's the supreme example of the media's tendency to shove aging women—long after their prime—into men's faces, thinking that this will somehow convince our boners that these women are more desirable than just about any non-fat girl 10 or 15 years her junior. Aniston, simply told, is middle-aged women's wishful projection that female beauty lasts as long as male attractiveness. Jennifer Aniston is not unlike Cameron Diaz or Demi Moore—formerly attractive women being passed around between male celebrities looking to improve their image.

8. Kim Kardashian

The darling of American black guys, a chick who looked merely okay a few years ago and, even then, only with the massive layers of Hollywood magic. She's lingered long after her somewhat attractive phase.

Loading...

7. Emma Stone

A merely bangable girl who somehow gets massive points for her pre-scripted, and over-written, snark in movies. Most men, in real life, would classify both that and her deep, raspy voice as negatives.

6. Rihanna

Her ugly haircuts and pursed face have—appropriately—invited comparisons to a llama.

5. Beyonce

The supreme example of how hyped-up you-go-girlism can artificially boost a girl's rating despite her merely okay looks. No one doubts that she can sing and dance, but her frequent inclusion—often near the top—in lists of the hottest girls around is obscene.

4. Mila Kunis

The new generation—along with Natalie Portman and Katie Holmes—of cute girls who have actually passed their prime but only now are suddenly being listed as hot. As uncomfortable a truth as it may be for the editors of media magazines, Mila looked 10 times better when she was on That '70s Show. The factor that puts her on this list, but spares her aging colleagues, is her tragically non-existent ass.

3. Taylor Swift

One of the rare cases where habitual carousel-riding (sluttiness) has been called out by the media (thanks, in no small part, to an intrepid Ellen DeGeneres). This is a girl with a stunning face—though only at select angles—but whose beauty breaks down when you start looking around even a little bit.

2. Katy Perry

A chick who offers little more than a large set of cans—that undoubtedly have a deep sag outside of their harness—and a face that declines massively when you remove the pounds of make-up she piles onto her face. Her body is shockingly unremarkable apart from her famed tits.

1. Kate Upton

America's current blonde sweetheart who, despite her being trumpeted as the hottest thing out there, is little more than a pair of tits on a milk-carton body. Upton boasts zero thighs, no hips, no ass, all on her massive 5'10" frame.

Read More: Super Bowl Commercials Aren't Sexist

How To Get Laid In Toronto

March 7, 2013 | by Gorillaronto (Gorilla in Toronto) | Link | Original Link

Living in Toronto for the past few years, it seems that a lot of people actively hate on the dating market and I often hear a lot of consistent feedback around how challenging it is to pick up, how entitled the women are and how much of an effort it is to get anything going with low quality prospects. Hopefully the points below will help you succeed if you're a long-term resident or stopping by for a visit.

Success Basics

1. Get respect

When you approach or get the situation going you need to man-up and go right for the girl. Establishing the respect first is key because it allows you to move onto the following steps. This means you don't buy her a drink first, you shoot down her ego if she's being loud or obnoxious, and you walk past all her friends in her group just to talk to her.

2. Go for the bang, always

Girls give their numbers out so easily that getting them is basically meaningless at this point. There have been many times where I texted a girl the day after getting her number without her even remembering who I was. Going for the bang ensures you have left a very strong impression in her mind. Plus it's the 2 steps forward 1 step back rule. If you try to take her home and you have to settle for making out at the club, you're still better off than just getting her number and walking away. We have had a lot of success with this alone. Even if absolutely nothing happens, you have left a strong enough impression that a date is guaranteed. And once you've set up the date the bang is basically a lock because Toronto girls are pretty promiscuous and to them, a date is intimate enough for a bang.

3. Go for the win

If you can't get the bang and the girl genuinely isn't interested or is generally being a bitch you need to go for the win. This is just for your piece of mind. You did everything right, but she's still not interested—fair enough it's bound to happen. This means providing a value-added social experience, such as maintaining a good conversation where everyone is laughing and having a good time (i.e., you socially come out on top). Or if the girl is acting like a brat, you make fun of her and get her friends to laugh at your jokes at her expense. You get the jist.

This can also help you later on in the night as it establishes your social proof, which can be leveraged against other girls who may be interested in you. There is an even bigger reason to do this that is important to mention. In general, as men, we need to take back this city—calling out girls with poor attitudes helps out everyone in the long-term. If a girl has been scorned for being a bitch, especially by a guy she really liked, then she is far more likely to keep her attitude in check with the next guy she dates. If you're that next guy, then you benefit from the previous call out. It's about paying it forward for the other guys in the city.

General Tactics

1. Coming over the top

You need to come over the top hard in every situation. You need to make yourself extremely memorable and get her respect right from the get-go. If you see a girl, you have to approach her immediately, sometimes pushing her friends out-of-the-way. Waiting to get eyes or any indication of attraction is a waste of time. See what you want, and then go get it. If a girl mother hen's you, you have to literally destroy that person. "Do you ruin your friend's chances with guys because you're too ugly to attract a man yourself?" You will obviously get gasps and shocks from her friends. A lot of people buckle here, you just have to come over the top again and explain that they're acting like immature children. You stop coming over the top when your point has been accepted otherwise cut your losses and walk away.

2. Go Gorilla Monsoon

Like that wrestler from the 80´s you have to literally "gorilla" girls. Telling girls what you're going to do, what drinks they are going to have, things like that. A particular tactic that works well is directing a girl into a man-made corner, with one hand on a wall and the either on the bar. It gives off a feeling of dominance, while having the side benefit of separating the girl from her potentially cock-blocking friends so you can build some rapport.

3. Constantly call girls out

A lot of girls in the city get away with way too much, like texting back two days later, flaking on plans, and telling you they're available only so they can change their mind when you offer plans. You need to nip that in the bud right off the bat. If a girl shows up 15 minutes late to a date you need to address it right then and there: “Look you’re 15 minutes late, that’s not cool and an immature thing to do… if you want this to work we need to be on the same page and you need to change your attitude.” This establishes control as well as boundaries and provides a steadying voice in the relationship which women are naturally drawn to.

You’re not trying to be an asshole here per se, you’re looking for someone who can acknowledge they did something wrong and can take responsibility for their actions (someone who has character). A response along the lines of, “You know what, I’m sorry that was lame on my part… first two rounds are on me” is the best case scenario in these situations. And one last thing, as an aside you should be keeping up your end of the bargain by showing up on time, dressing well, and having your shit together. Otherwise, calling her out makes you look like a bitch.

4. “Get bitches in play”

The ”bitches in play” principal plays an important role in developing respect. This means talking to some girls you wouldn’t otherwise talk to in order to establish your bar cred/value. This builds respect because girls often want what other girls have. Therefore, talking to attractive girls you may not be interested in actually increases your perceived value to the other girls at the bar you want to approach. And following this, the hotter girls in your vicinity (some of which may have been on the fence about whether they’re into you) will now be more approachable since you have been vetted by other girls.

5. Come in the summer

Come to Toronto between June and September. Toronto is bad in general. Toronto in the winter is even worse.

Logistics

For those of you who plan to visit you should either stay close to the King St. W. strip (i.e. between King and Spadina and King and Bathurst) or near Ossington close to Queen St. These are where most of the bars you want to go to are located. A few subway or street car stops from the bar to your door step is too far for most girls and will likely become a deal breaker. The bar has to be walking distance from your place.

Top 5 Bar Picks

For our purposes (I don’t want to hear stupid comments about what constitutes a “good bar”) there are two types of bars in Toronto that you should go to. First are the bars where “prissed-out-bitches” like to go. These are girls who live in the down-town core (i.e. around queens quay), have corporate jobs, are skinny/fat (do yoga/starve themselves/eat late night poutine or pizza), wear flowy tops/riding boots, have tube limbs (the wrist is the same diameter as the biceps making the arm look like a tube), wear jeggings with flip flops, late 20′s to early 30′s and are usually very hot. In this situation you are sacrificing personality for general hotness. For these types of girls you want to check out…

1. The Undergound

This is the best bar in the city for these types of girls. The music is rock with random sprinkles of hip-hop and sometimes they have a live band (often the band is actually really good so it's fun regardless of the girl situation).

2. 2Cats

Similar demographic to the underground, but not as good.

The second type of bar is the "sweatbox-danceparty." This is where you get girls 19-24, university students, slightly edgy, usually have a few tattoos, kind of quirky, can be hipsterish, usually semi-interesting and really good top 40 music. In this situation you are sacrificing talent (fewer hot girls and lower overall average as compared to above) for personality and way more fun.

3. Dance Cave

This is a very young place, but it has the best top 40 in the city, drinks are $3.50 before 11 and there are always hot 20-24 year-olds (not a crazy amount, but they are there) who just want to have an awesome dance party.

4. Bar 244

Bar upstairs, dance floor downstairs, $3 drinks all night, good music and atmosphere.

5. Levack Block

Similar to the two options above. There's a bar in the front and a sweat box of a dance floor in the back.

Next time you're passing through send us a note and we'll help you out / share what we know.

Read More: 4 Common Mistakes That Kill Your Game

About the Author

Gorillaronto (Gorilla in Toronto) is made up of two friends from Toronto. We look at what works, what doesn't and why. It's not easy and there are growing pains. We're not experts, at best we are works in progress with some understanding that has lead to some great successes.

The Rise Of “Straight Shaming”

March 7, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

We spend a lot of time on this part of the internet hating on abrasive feminists. I’m not saying that the likes of Lindy West and Jessica Valenti haven’t earned our general ill-will, but I’ve begun to think that they really are not the worst of the enemies men face in this society today. The most militant opponent of the red-pill man is, in fact, the mangina.

I’m not the first to say that, nor am I about to be the first to discuss the particular mangina on whose words this post will focus. He’s been talked about in the manosphere before, and for good reason. The man I speak of is none other than Hugo Schwyzer:

Schwyzer has already gone on record endorsing cuckolding and other ridiculous notions, so I’ve truly come to expect madness from him. What came about this week, however, surprised even me.

Today, gentlemen, Hugo Schwyzer would like you to consider taking it up the rear for gender equality:

> Want to make straight men better in bed — and better feminist allies? The path may be simple: fuck them up the ass. According to one brand new book, the path to making men more compassionate, appreciative and playful may be straight through their butts.
>
> In The Ultimate Guide to Prostate Pleasure: Erotic Exploration for Men and Their Partners, Charlie Glickman and Aislinn Emirzian make the case that straight “men who get into anal penetration are among the most secure in their masculinity: because they’ve examined themselves, faced their fears.”

No, he's not done yet:

> In a deeply misogynistic culture, there are few greater fears with which men are raised than the fear of being labeled as someone who acts like a woman, allowing himself to be penetrated…In his Myth of the Modern Homosexual, historian and cultural theorist Rictor Norton explains that the term "asshole" developed as a homophobic (and thus woman-hating) slur…
>
> …Glickman and Emirzian acknowledge that this myth is persistent: "The idea that penetration is an act of dominance is almost certainly tied in to sexism and the notion that the woman's role is inferior. Plenty of men have absorbed these ideas at a subconscious level. Even if a man doesn't think it is an act of dominance when he penetrates his (male or female) partner, he may still hesitate to switch roles because he is afraid that it will mean losing his masculinity if he takes a turn catching instead of pitching."

At this point you may be struggling to continue absorbing this insanity, but let's finish this off:

> The payoff for clearing those hurdles, Glickman says, is nothing less than the radical transformation of heterosexual sex. In 2011, Glickman wrote a column entitled "How Pegging Can Save the World," arguing that no other erotic experience a man can undergo can create greater empathy with women than being penetrated by his partner…the sooner men get over their anxiety and guilt, the more fun they and their partners will have. And maybe, just maybe, we can peg our way right out of sexism itself.

Alright, we've made it.

Contained within this absurd narrative is a clear insight into what could be considered a larger agenda of emasculation, and that agenda involves what I like to call straight shaming. Consider the following implications of this piece.

It is not enough now to merely be a heterosexual and tolerate those who have different orientations. Now, to truly combat misogyny in the eyes of folks like Schwyzer, one must be fully open to participating in homosexual acts.

Loading...

If you are a heterosexual male uncomfortable with the idea of partaking in a homosexual act, you are…

a) promoting the perpetuation of a misogynistic culture
b) showing that you're not comfortable in your own sexuality
c) promoting homophobia (which is now, apparently, also analogous to woman-hate)

Going by this logic, any male who is not open to participating in a homosexual act is now presumed to be insecure and, therefore, deemed secretly gay or bi.

Males who are open to those acts are deemed tolerant and worthy combatants against sexism and misogyny. Their open performance of these acts also essentially renders them gay or bi, just like their less "open" peers.

Meanwhile, the actual homosexuals (gay and bi men) are still as they always were.

Where does this logic leave us, then?

EVERY MAN IS GAY OR BI.

The goal is not just to promote the tolerance of homosexuality, but to promote the dominance of homosexuality. That is, to make homosexuality and openness to engaging in it the only acceptable way forward for any given man.

It is imperative that any heterosexual male concerned with self-improvement be aware of this phenomenon. There's nothing wrong with homosexuality—I don't believe it is a choice and I think we should recognize the right of those who are so inclined to live as they will.

That being said, there is also nothing wrong with being an unabashedly heterosexual male. You can rest assured that given the choice between that model of masculinity and the emasculated variant advocated here by Schwyzer, women will largely spring for the former, claims of their "anti-sexism" and opposition to "gender stereotypes" be damned.

Don't believe me? Take a look at our media. Do the ideal examples of masculinity in the media that women above the age of consent spend enormous amounts of time fantasizing about and swooning over resemble effete men with a penchant for getting it up the butt?

Or do they look like these guys?

The answer should make things very clear.

Women do desire actual men, and no male should apologize for satisfying that demand.

Read Next: The Physical Decline of Modern Man

The Lazy Man’s Way To Subvert The System And Deliver Justice

March 7, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Recently, a couple who had rescued a deer and nursed it back to good health — only for the state of Indiana to charge them with a misdemeanor and a jail sentence of 60 days. It’s quite the conundrum – they broke the law, but to punish a man for acting righteously is the height of wickedness. In the Bible, God annihilates the cities of Sodom and Gomorrah for such depravity. If it were a felony offense, the couple would be put before a jury, who must decide only on the facts of the case, on whether they committed the alleged crimes.

Except that last sentence is false. The entire legal system has conspired to keep jurors blind to one of their most powerful privileges – that they judge the facts AND the law. If a juror accepts that the person on trial did indeed violate the law, the juror may still return a finding of ‘not guilty’ because they consider the law unjust. This right is known as jury nullification. It has had a long and storied history; famously, a man was accused of sedition in New York in 1735, while it was still under the control of the British crown. There was no question that he, John Peter Zenger, had violated the law, with his truthful criticism of the government. But the jury returned a verdict of ‘not guilty’ because they deemed the law unjust.

In the years before the American Civil War, juries in the North refused to convict runaway slaves under the ‘Fugitive Slave Act,’ because they believed escaping bondage was not a crime. Jury nullification has also been practiced in Canada and the United Kingdom.

The Government Cover-Up

In 1794, in the case of Georgia v. Brailsford, the US Supreme Court ruled that judges were obligated to inform jurors of their right to jury nullification. A hundred years later, in Sparf v. United States, the Court ruled that judges were not obligated to tell the jury of their rights to judge the law. Later rulings would affirm the right of the courts to bar the defense from telling jurors that they could use jury nullification. A 1997 ruling held that a juror can be removed if he intends to use jury nullification; a 2001 California Supreme Court ruling involving a statutory rape case held that jurors must effectively snitch when a fellow panelist is opting for jury nullification.

In 1994, the courts in Colorado ended up going on a witch hunt after a woman started arguing for jury nullification to her fellow jurors. She turned out to have a drug-related sentence, 12 years prior, which she had not been asked about during jury selection. The government charged her with perjury, for not disclosing her prior drug sentence, even though she answered all jury selection questions truthfully. Said Clay Conrad, author of a book on jury nullification, "It is obvious from the context of the entire case they prosecuted her for her verdict. If they can punish jurors for their verdicts, the jury system is just a living fossil brought out to harm people. There is nothing left if jurors can't be independent and vote their own consciences."

To use jury nullification is to 'obstruct justice' these judges held, shredding the power of jury nullification. The court tried to convict her of perjury based on things she said during jury deliberations, deliberations which may not be used in court proceedings so that jurors can speak candidly among themselves when making decisions.

Loading...

I asked an older lawyer friend of mine about jury nullification, and he steadfastly denied that what I was proposing was legal. I asked another friend who is an attorney, and he had never heard of it, despite a successful career. In fact, federal prosecutors indicted a man for telling people about jury nullification, saying that "advocacy of jury nullification, directed as it is to jurors, would be both criminal and without Constitutional protections no matter where it occurred." In other words, the feds were too happy to baldly suppress free speech, in the case of a retired chemistry professor handing out pamphlets on juror rights. Thankfully, he was acquitted.

Honest, accurate coverage of jury nullification is the exception, not the rule. For a captivating illustration of jury nullification, see this brief work, by the illustrator of the internet sensation 'Go The FK To Sleep.' Noted libertarian Ron Paul is also a prominent advocate of jury nullification.

What You Can Do

The next time you hear some self-righteous jackass ask if you voted, ask them if they know what 'jury nullification' is. While your election votes will probably never make a difference, your vote in a jury trial in a criminal case is decisive—a guilty verdict is required from all twelve jurors. Without your assent to his guilt, the defendant cannot be convicted.

You must look to your own beliefs to decide when jury nullification is appropriate. But it's not hard to imagine them:

- The War on Drugs – someone is on trial for felony possession of marijuana: not guilty
- Domestic Violence – A man is facing jail time for slapping his wife after she was caught cheating on him: not guilty
- The Right To Bear Arms – A woman is charged with illegal weapons possession after confronting a mugger with a handgun, in a city where it is impossible for a law-abiding citizen to legally carry a firearm on his person: not guilty
- Self-Defense – A homeowner is charged with murder for shooting a burglar: not guilty
- Sexual Assault – A man is charged with sexual assault for not using a condom during sex: not guilty
- Assault – A man is charged for punching a woman who physically started a fight with him: not guilty
- Child Support – A man is charged for non-payment of child support for a woman who lied about being on the pill and refused to get an abortion: not guilty
- Statutory Rape – A 17 year old male turns 18 and continues to sleep with his 17 year old girlfriend, and then gets charged with statutory rape: not guilty

In short, if a defendant committed something you don't consider a punishable crime, and you believe it would be a violation of your conscience to convict the defendant, you simply vote 'not guilty.' Outcome: either the jury is hung, giving the defendant another trial, or the defendant is acquitted completely. I cannot think of any other power you have a citizen that is as easy, potent and immediate as jury nullification.

Read Next: How Feminist Censorship Introduced Me To The Red Pill

The Party Slut Anthem

March 8, 2013 | by Harry | Link | Original Link

Beethoven once said that music is a higher revelation than all wisdom and philosophy. That's a nice way of saying that it's a great way to determine where people are, at least culturally. There is no hiding behind music because it's an expressive art form, and some songs in particular almost become anthems for many generations or the sub cultures that develop around them. Think of the Sex Pistols, Bob Dylan or The Beatles. Bands and artists that produce popular music and songs can truly reveal people for who they are at that time.

So it's not without a few chuckles that I reveal the average party slut (i.e., 99.9% of the female population under 27). If ever you were in doubt over their gradual descent into whoredom and the glorification of everything that is the quintessential narcissistic slut, then you never have to look any further than Ke$ha.

Tik Tok went five times platinum, which means she sold over 6 million singles just in the USA. People liked it so much they were buying it instead of stealing it. Mindless drivel it may be, Kesha produced an anthem for the "you go girl" generation that sums up their finest qualities in a way few could. She is a cultural cliche so obnoxious I am astounded that she has seen any success at all, but given what her songs reveal, perhaps it should come as no surprise.

Lets see how much her silly song reflects on the reality of the modern day party gal you bump into most weekends:

> Wake up in the morning feeling like P Diddy
> (Hey, what up girl?)
> Grab my glasses, I'm out the door, I'm gonna hit this city
> (Lets go)
> Before I leave, brush my teeth with a bottle of Jack
> 'Cause when I leave for the night, I ain't coming back

This sums up the herd mentality of the average, degenerate, cum bucket better than most things I can think of. It's almost poetic.

The best part about this introduction to her pop hit is that she does not say the word "teeth" properly. She felt the compulsion to use the word "teef" instead, in an effort to street this shit up with her white girl ebonics. It's not that she has just proudly told the world she is a stuck-up bitch who is in love with herself, or even that she is still hung over yet getting ready for another massive night out. No, with that simple intro, we can all rest easy knowing that this talentless parrot is about to launch into a million cliches as she begins what is an anthem to the super awesome whore validation that is thrust upon us on a daily basis.

Party girl is…

- Easily influenced
- Vapid
- Vain
- Drunk
- Irresponsible
- Immature

> I'm talking pedicure on our toes, toes
> Trying on all our clothes, clothes
> Boys blowing up our phones, phones
> Drop-topping, playing our favorite CDs
> Pulling up to the parties
> Trying to get a little bit tipsy

This is a Sex in the City level inspired girl power orgasm so intense its almost as if she is talking about a lubed up, 12 inch vibrating dildo that is hitting her G spot. She is so overcome with self-love it sounds like she wants to make love to herself, and she wants the whole world to know it. There is just no way this awesome party chick can go an entire night without everyone she meets thinking she is awesome. All the boys are calling her. She has a million places to go. So many outfits to choose from.

I'm not going to lie, I almost came in pants myself because it sounds so awesome. The power she displays really gets me wet. One would think that this woman must be a 10/10. If we were to place her under a microscope, we would surely be able to see gods fingerprints on her.

Party girl is…

- Getting railed by half the town
- Unsure of what slutty outfits to wear next as she looks for fresh penis
- Extremely narcissistic
- Entitled
- Selfish
- DELUSIONAL

Loading…

> Don’t stop, make it pop
> DJ, blow my speakers up
> Tonight, I’mma fight
> ‘Til we see the sunlight
> Tick tock on the clock
> But the party don’t stop, no

Oh the cliches. The damn cliches. The one long, non-stop train wreck of cliches.

I wont repeat the chorus that sold millions of singles again. I cant believe she thinks the world should see her shake her fat ass. I just cant help but wonder how it all came to this. Why is there the need to be the “hard clubber” who views having fun almost like it’s a job? Why the constant pressure to make sure the night produced 20 million Facebook photos as she attention whores for any validation she can get? Who the hell would actually walks into a club like they have something to prove, and then makes a song about it singing to the world how awesome they are?

Party girl is…

- Stupid. Mentally handicapped level stupid
- An attention whore
- Insecure and seeks endless social validation
- Trendy to the point where she is basically a social drone
- Lacks any creativity or individualism at all

[image]

> Ain't got a care in world, but got plenty of beer
> Ain't got no money in my pocket, but I'm already here
> And now, the dudes are lining up cause they hear we got swagger
> But we kick em to the curb unless they look like Mick Jagger
> I'm talking about everybody getting crunk, crunk
> Boys tryin' to touch my junk, junk
> Gonna smack him if he getting too drunk, drunk

Oh good lord. I cant believe they put us in jail for beating girls like this.

Party girl…

- Is a bum trying to score free drinks
- Is so masculine she now considers access to beer as an important safety net
- Knows there are a ton of thirsty guys lining up for her, despite being a fat trainwreck with no redeeming qualities
- Feels she is a rock god despite being an obese heffer
- Is as drunk on the attention as she is the free alcohol her slut outfit got her
- Is grinding half the club like a washed up stripper, yet complains about getting attention
- Is getting fat with all the beer and junk food

> Now, now, we go until they kick us out, out
> Or the police shut us down, down
> Police shut us down, down
> Po-po shut us

There it goes with the ebonics again. A bit of a background check shows that she is the proud owner of Eastern European ancestry and was raised in Nashville where she attended a middle class white schools. They actually let these simpletons vote. Hell, this simpleton is running around with millions because morons play her music, buy her music and go to her concerts, even though she is a poser.

Sadly, Kesha manages to perfectly capture an entire generation of women, not by singing about them or breaking any boundaries, but by producing such a narcissistic piece of shit that it could have been written by any party slut out there really.

Here is another picture of what it means to be a party slut with a point to prove. She was not even 25 when these were taken. Just think of how many Keshas there are running around right now that are going to expect a man to settle down with them when they are in their 30’s.

Read More: Having Sex In Iceland Can Destroy Your Soul

Porfirio Rubirosa: The Last Playboy

March 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Last Playboy is a biography of Porfirio Rubirosa, son of a Dominican general and arguably the most celebrated playboy to have ever lived.

In his youth he gradually built up enough status from his name, charm, and debonair looks to be hand-picked by dictator Trujillo to have a visible role in the army. This position enabled him to seduce Trujillo's daughter, which almost got him killed. He successfully parlayed this marriage into scoring more women and money.

Rubi with the dictator's daughter

Not the most gifted politician, businessman, or soldier, Rubirosa got his money in three ways: leveraging friendships with the right people, getting paid from the wealthy women he seduced, and stealing expensive jewelry (one heist netted him nearly $200,000). When he worked in the Paris consulate, one of his business ventures involved selling visas to Jewish people trying to get out of Europe upon the onset of World War II.

Rubirosa's connections in the Dominican Republic, a small Caribbean country, only partly explain his massive success in sleeping with seemingly all the famous women of his time.

Essentially he banged famous women because he banged famous women. This is a catch-22 we sometimes see in modern times, such as Paris Hilton becoming famous for being famous. Rubirosa landed a couple high-profile women that enabled future monumental conquests that are hard to believe if they weren't fact. It didn't hurt that he had a gigantic penis. One of his lovers said that "it could have been a carnival attraction." His tailors gave special care to the fitting of his pants to compensate for his enlarged member.

His second wife Danielle Darrieux, a famous French actress

To live this kind of life, money is just one piece of the puzzle—you also require a pedigree. The reputation of your family name should precede you to get important invitations to the right social functions. If you don't have the pedigree, you'll either need to build a massive fortune or crack a new niche that gives you unquestionable fame, but the problem with fame is that it will be fleeting and you will only experience the high-life for a short amount of time.

It turns out that seducing famous women becomes not just a matter of money or fame, but also continuous access to them. This is what Rubirosa achieved. He would repeatedly run into famous women in his partying routine like it was no big deal, and the important fact is that these women already heard about him (and his dick). On the other hand, I've never meet famous women. Rubirosa had access to the top women in the world while I don't even know how to get access to the top women in a Eastern European city with half a million people.

His last wife Odile Rodin, also a French actress (note the massive age difference)

Loading…

Halfway through the book, I didn't have much respect for Rubirosa, as he wasn't especially skilled in anything besides seducing women, but as I got read on, I became rather seduced by his lifestyle. Maybe I didn't want to be exactly him, but I wanted to duplicate his success or at least get a taste of it. This man was truly a one-in-a-billion seducer of the likes that the world hasn't seen again.

Rubirosa followed the footsteps of his playboy friends and died in a car accident. Surprisingly, a lot of people who knew him were almost thankful that he died in this fashion instead of slowly declining with age. There was no decline for Rubirosa—he was a playboy until the very end, leaving the world stage almost as quickly as he arrived on it.

My 9 Favorite Quotes From The Book

1.

> He didn't care if he was being used. Military life, contrary to expectations, appealed to him. As he would recall, "Physical efforts filled our days: calisthenics, various sports, arms training, target practice, horseback riding. For a young man like me, it was paradise." It was made for him: the smart, elaborate uniforms, the camaraderie of fellow junior officers, the freedom from the responsibility to feed or house himself or define his days.

2.

> "It has always been one of my chief principles," he later confessed. "I will risk everything to avoid being bored."

3.

> I lived a swirling life, without cease, without the pauses that would have allowed me the chance to think and make me realize that giant steps aren't the only strides that suit a man."

4.

> "Tonight," [the maitre d'] crowed, "in my place are gathered the four most famous playboys in the world!" Everybody had a good laugh, but Rubi had the last. "Yes, that's true," he responded, "but there is a big difference between me and these other gentlemen: They all pay their women, and all my women pay me!"

5.

> "You expect Rubi to be a very dangerous young man who personifies the wolf. Instead, you meet someone who is so unbelievably charming and thoughtful that you are put off-guard before you know it."

6.

> "When I was in Palm Beach, nothing seemed more beautiful to me than the fading light on the Ile St. Louis. When I encountered the gray light of autumn in a Paris that was still recovering from the bar, I wanted nothing more than the sun of California."

7.

> Rubi deeply impressed Sammy [Davis Jr.], who always sought to fashion a gentleman of himself, with his sartorial sense. "I have always cared about clothes, and I will go to any length to look good," Sammy confessed. "But the way Rubirosa dressed made me feel as if I'd fallen off the garbage truck."

8.

> "Rubi used to like to go, as he would say, 'todo líquido'—all liquid, all drinking, nothing to eat," as Taki remembered: a good old-fashioned parranda. And the night of this unexpected victory would be one of those todo líquido nights."

9.

> It is better than it happened this way. A clean break with the life he loved. Neither he nor I could have endured the spectacle of him lingering on, a cripple, unable to dance, play polo or drive his car.
>
> If Rubi could have chosen the way he died, this is the way he would have gone. In his car, in the dawn, going fast as he loved to do. He loved speed. But he loved life even more.

Read More: “The Last Playboy” on Amazon

How To Survive A Pussy Wasteland

March 8, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

The Western world is a smartphone-riddled wasteland—D.C. is a domineering career chick hell-hole, Toronto is a feminist hotbed, the UK is full of nasty slags, and the Pacific Northwest is overrun with hipster-feminism.

What's a red blooded male with a thirst for making love to feminine women in the alley behind a club comfort of his own home, on sheets of Egyptian cotton, to do?

For one, our hero could move to poosy paradises such as Eastern Europe or Southeast Asia, but that is not in the cards for our typical reader. They may want to stay close to family, friends, or other commitments. Our hero could find a new job and relocate to somewhere more promising, but what if this too is not an option?

I'm willing to bet the average reader is not as free as he wants to be and is tied down with a job, friends, debt etc. So what is a man like this to do when faced with such formidable cockblocking circumstances?

Realize These Are Limiting Beliefs

I've heard guys complain that girls are always locked down with guys in their city. They have this self-defeating mindset that they're either all taken or have hundreds of nice-guys beating down their doors. First of all there is a 69% chance she is actually lying about having a boyfriend to avoid 'awkward feelings.' Second, more often than not a girl will cheat on her boyfriend, and with the increase in polyamory girls will have no qualms with you raw-dogging her in the bathroom of a dark nightclub. Third, it's nothing more than a limiting belief, since dudes out there are getting laid. Many of the top game writers honed their skills in the harsh environments described above.

Over at the forum user makaveli wrote a post about these limiting beliefs. He listed things he believed had a negative effect on pussy-pounding efficiency. They included: smartphones, social media, bad logistics, large groups, boyfriends and an unfeminine social climate. Think about it for a minute, what was the last complaint you had about your town, what was the last reason you gave yourself for not getting the bang? Make a list of all of these and realize they are limiting beliefs, you are hurting your success by just thinking “all the girls are in big social circles at night, I can’t isolate them easily so I’m not getting laid.”

Find The Silver Lining

Once you’ve got your list of limiting beliefs, take a long, hard look at them. Is there anything that stands out as impossible to overcome? Probably not, unless one of them is “I don’t have a dick so I can’t have sex with girls.”

The next step is to find the silver lining in these limiting beliefs. Think about each one and how you could possibly work it to your advantage. User makaveli said he employed the bathroom bang to overcome logistics, used social media to create local celebrity, acknowledged the ‘danger’ in flirting with a taken women, texted girls pictures of him and her to prevent flakes and so on.

In my case my city is full of hipsters and unfeminine women with an emphasis on tight knit social circles and poor logistics. I can complain about this or I can relocate and use social media to my advantage creating an online persona. I can also attend as many events as I can, getting to meet more and more people where my preferred women are. Many of the hipster chicks claim they are polyamorous to rationalize away any feelings of ‘being a slut’ they may have. To me this just means easy sex with skinny hipster chicks.

If you don’t have the means or the will to drastically change your environment, you can always adapt to it. Most reasons for not getting laid, or finding quality women are just limiting beliefs. I don’t believe anyone who says “all women in this city are ___, there are no sweet, feminine, thin women.” There always will be girls who are exactly your type. You just have to find the silver lining in your situations and look for them. Brainstorm, look up ways to demolish limiting beliefs, and find a way to get the girl you desire.

Read Next: How To Get Laid On Plenty of Fish

Liberals Are Not The Enemy…But Liberalism Is

March 9, 2013 | by tenderman100 | Link | Original Link

Roosh was kind enough to ask me to respond to Tuthmosis' post, "Liberals" Are Not The Enemy in an effort to be "fair and balanced."

First of all, Tuth is to be commended for attempting to bring nuance to the discussion. He is correct to say that there are segments of the left that don't support the emasculating feminist creed so common among the leftish/progressive wing of the political spectrum (though, ironically, feminism is great for game; more on that later). Tuth is the poster child for this fact.

So Tuth, and others in the manosphere who are left-leaning are not the enemy. But liberalism IS the enemy.

Liberalism Is Insidious

Why is liberalism the enemy? And by liberalism I mean the Social Democratic Welfare Entitlement State as exemplified in Western Europe and, increasingly, the United States.

Simply this: it is an insidious philosophy. And not JUST because it is largely aligned with the feminist movement – though that's clearly a black mark against it. No, liberalism is insidious because it depends upon extracting from you individual freedom in exchange for what the State thinks is a "better" outcome.

It also depends more and more on "revenue extraction" – taking more and more of private wealth to reallocate it to the "less fortunate." And because there is no end to the "good" that can be done, there is no end to the "need" to extract more and more money. The end result? State level bankruptcy. See Greece, Spain, Italy—and perhaps inevitably, the United States.

Liberalism claims to be about "social good" and "social justice." Nice sounding phrases, and they had some real meaning decades ago when prejudice and discrimination were rampant. But they are so vague and hollow now that they are unhelpful at best, and useless at worst.

Helping You? Or Hurting You?

Modern Social Democratic Liberalism depends on the State and government to provide services to you like healthcare and regulations that ostensibly are designed to make life "fairer" and "more just." Because providing services and regulations for YOUR benefit is the overarching principle of Social Democratic liberalism. As a consequence, this principle provides cover for all sorts of impositions of your life because such impositions are "good for you." Some may INDEED be good for you, but guess what? Many of them are awful.

To do "good" for you the State requires central planning —which is at the heart of Social Democratic Liberalism. Organize and manage health care, for example, or manage outcomes in any kind of economic activity. But central planning at worst inevitably fails, or at best, causes huge disruptions.

Loading...

Why? Because central planners are ALWAYS working with incomplete information. Individuals acting freely are much more efficient in terms of both personal and economic relationships. We're already seeing these disruptions with Obamacare. The law's requirements don't go into effect for a business until it reaches 50 employees. Guess what incentive that provides? Don't grow. The law also requires health insurance for full time employees. Guess what incentive that provides? Make employees part time. And we're seeing that now.

What Should Government Do?

Bottom line? Government should be minimalist and limited. This principle was at the heart of what prompted the U.S. founders to construct a republican government.

Government should (1) provide a basic safety net (because, yes, some WILL fall through the cracks by no fault of their own); (2) provide an environment of security against violence, both internationally and domestically; (3) support a judiciary that resolves disputes according to law arrived at in a republican fashion; and (4) protect private property while making sure use of such property doesn't harm others.

And that is it! That is government's role. No more. No less.

Government should not be doing stuff like Title 9. Government should not be doing Head Start. Government should not be providing health insurance, let alone health care. Government should not be in the energy venture capital business. Government should not be doling out favors to select business sectors. Government should be as small as possible.

How Does This Apply To Game?

So, how does this apply to game? Simple. Modern Social Democratic Liberalism is invariably feminized and mangina oriented. Alas, Tuth and the lefties in the manosphere are outliers in the context of mainstream Social Democratic Liberalism—they are the exception that proves the rule.

Social Democratic Liberalism, in its quest for the smoothest egalitarianism, eschews the reality of biological sex differences. It exalts the hamster. Independent male actors—i.e., guys who run game—are an anathema to it. All this in addition to the rot the philosophy induces because of its anti-individual liberty inclinations and its inclination to assume that there is tons of money available to "do good."

Of course, feminism is, ironically, great for game. The logic is simple. Feminists want to be like men, so they are willing to fuck like men at the drop of a hat. Of course, the reason they do it is because they are "exploring their sexuality" (a hamster phrase if ever there was one). Men do it because we are men.

Social Democratic Liberalism is insidious and reprehensible. It is the enemy.

Read More: “Liberals” Are Not The Enemy

Best Of The Manosphere: How to Un-Pick Up Girls

March 9, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Today's edition of Best of the Manosphere Series is by the author G Manifesto. He is a polarizing figure within the manosphere — people either love what he says, or believe he is full of shit. Regardless of where you may fall, G's blog offers some of the finest advice possible for any man. Often times his advice is completely beyond the comprehension of most readers because the G Manifesto assumes a large level of street-smart competency.

Despite the noise, I would like to present to you what I believe is one of his finest posts ever written, not to mention some of the best game advice I have ever seen.

Have you ever seen the following question: "After you bang a girl, what do you do with her?" Do you turn her into a relationship? Do you just pump and dump? Do you skip town? What should an aspiring player do if he wants to merely move beyond a girl without treating her like shit?

Is it possible to "leave her better than you found her?"

Turns out that there is an excellent solution to all of this, and that is the art of Un-Picking Up Girls.

> The True Art of The Game is How to Un-Pick up Girls.
>
> Keep in mind, I said this is an "Art". It is not about being an asshole to girls. Any regular guy from Rehab at The Hard Rock in an Affliction shirt can do that. It's about subtly "cooling out" girls, much like the old-school Con Men did to their "Marks".
>
> Ideally, you want her to "break up" with you (girls are just like lawyers, you have to be one step ahead and make them think it is their idea), but you don't want to piss the girl off so much that you can never swoop her again.
>
> The key is being able to "back-burner" girls so you are able to swoop the girls again down the road. (And swoop her fly friends). If you can throw a fly girl on the team, she can be a gift that keeps on giving.
>
> Here is how it is done:
>
> Smoking
> Smoking cigarettes works great while initially swooping girls. However, even the most "smoke friendly" girls these days will get over you soon enough if you are constantly spracking up. Chain smoking works especially well on American Girls and specifically Southern California girls. American Girls are now hardwired to hate chain smoking from pop-culture, Hollywood, glossy magazines and status quo thinking.
>
> Aloof Game
> Again, being aloof works great during attraction stages. Nevertheless, if you continue to be aloof towards girls they will finally reach the breaking point and want to call it quits. The best part of “Aloof Game” is when you run into the same girl 6 months later and she sees you dressed in custom vines, she won’t remember why she broke it off. She will probably apologize for not keeping in touch!

Heaters

I have said before that girls claim they like “Bad Boys” (girl’s language, not mine). The truth is, what girls really like is mass produced, mall purchased, corporate created Bad Boys. All but the most down girls will run the other way if you leave your Desert Eagle out on your Isamu Noguchi table with Ski Masks. Surprisingly, I have even used this on fly girls that have dated sons of famous, and I mean, historically famous Organized Crime figures. To great effect.

Travel

This is the key. When you first meet a girl, you have to imply/tell a girl you travel a lot. For your humble author, this is easy, since I do. After you take her home that night and swoop her, tell her you have to go on a trip to Rio de Janeiro or Latvia or something. It’s the perfect “cool out”. Then call her a week and a half later and swoop her again. Rinse and Repeat. Sooner or later, she will meet some Ed Hardy shirt guy that will sponsor her and she will break up with you!

Other Girls

Always say “what up” and give other girls you run into “two kisses” greetings when you are “dating” a girl. Get other girls phone numbers in front of the girl you are “dating”. Say something like, “she is on the board of such and such charity. She is a good girl to know”. After a while, even the most confident of girls (yes, I have done this on the most self assured Flyest Girls) will get edgy. It has to be natural though. Havoc said it best; “Hav’ don’t change for no chick, and they adapt to him. Never get cool with you ni$ggaz, I end up clappin ‘em”

Drugs

This one is risky, especially in The Down Economy, because a lot of fly girls love Drugs. You should only do this one on some moralistic Red State girl. The other risk, is a lot of girls “motherly” instinct will come out and they will want to “save you”. Still, heavy drug use is a classic on getting girls itchy. When you meet her down the line (so to speak) you can tell her you washed up your act and have been keeping your nose clean (so to speak). Re-swoop.

Loading...

Success Stories

If you constantly tell stories about your successes, and do it with a very high degree of swagger, most girls will want to breakup with you after a while. Girls, by and large are vindictive creatures that that want to keep you down. Only the best of the best actually want you to enjoy the rosy hue of unlimited success. (Makes no sense, I know).

Never two nights in a row

> One of the easiest ways to avoid getting in two deep (and I don't mean that 90's rap duo from Vallejo, CA either) is to never spend two nights in a row with a girl. Most cats will swoop a girl for the first time on a Friday night and take her out on Saturday night. After you swoop a girl, go on vacation. Swoop her again a week later. Keep her on that "once per week" program and sooner or later she will "want more" and cut you loose.
>
> If all else fails:
>
> Serial Killers
> Leave biographies of Serial Killers around your crib. It doesn't matter if it is a book about "The Stockwell Strangler"," The Lambeth Poisoner", "The Sunderland Strangler", "The Acid Bath Murderer", "The Vampire of London", "The Camden Ripper", "The Beast in the Night", "The Wolf Man", "The Sneinton Strangler", "The Black Panther", "Palmer the Poisoner", "The Brides in the Bath", "The Yorkshire Ripper", "House of Horrors", "The Ipswich Ripper", "The Freeway Killer", "The Hillside Strangler" or "The Shoe Fetish Slayer".
>
> But for maximum effect, biographies about Ed Gein (not the Maître d' at Canal bar either), Son of Sam, or Ted Bundy probably work best.
>
> If the girl doesn't mind all the above techniques, she is probably a cool girl and you should date her.
>
> She's a keeper.
>
> At least for a while.

If you want to experience the full glory of this post, then please read the original, which is complete with videos and links to his other works. I would also add to the above techniques:

> Gloat Over Your Conquests
>
> Tell your new girl about how you've swooped so many other girls the same way you picked her up. Tell the exact lines and logistical routines that have helped you bang so many others like her. But do it only with a playful, humorous tone, and tell her you're joking afterward.
>
> My personal favorite line is, "I need to go update notchcount.xls."
>
> Tell Her You Read Manosphere Blogs
>
> Self-explanatory. There's no way she'll stick around after reading some of the bat shit crazy stuff on here.

Written in 2009, this post touched upon relationship game relative to casual pick-up that I've never seen in any game blog before. It posits relationship game in a way perfectly congruent with picking up new girls. After learning how to un-pickup girls, I stopped viewing myself as a reptilian player whose only cold-hearted ambition is to relentlessly pump and dump. I also stopped believing that I needed "relationship game" to have a good relationship.

I'm not a player; just a flawed man looking for love in a world where people are unable to accept one another for who they are.

Rather than present the best side of myself, I merely act as I please. The art of un-picking up girls is to avoid seeking any relationship with the weaker sex, which means the women I do end up with are there because they want to be and not because I want them to be there.

The key to a happy relationship is not to have a happy husband, but a happy wife. Most relationships end because women grow tired of her man, and that's why women initiate most divorces. It's not a big deal that women are this way, but knowing this means it's not your interest level that matters, but hers.

So why worry about what a girl thinks? After you swoop, just be yourself. Let the girl decide if she wants to stay with you. Most women merely want a complacent man who is quiet, causes no trouble, and can help build the nest. It's fine if women want to live this way. But if you're the kind of man who'd go suicidal with such a lifestyle, then show your girl up-front how you actually are. She'll understand the incompatibilities and walk.

These techniques are also extremely powerful because they allow you to bang girls from your social circle without causing much harm to your reputation. If she's the one dumping you, what can she say about it to her friends afterwards? Provided you weren't lame in bed, or an egregious dickface, she'll at most mention that "things didn't work out."

And finally, there is the humor involved with all of G Manifesto's writings that capture the spirit of the manosphere. Being a man isn't about worrying over the future, arguing politics, or bragging about who can bang the most women. These are things we can talk about, of course.

The spirit of the manosphere is to enjoy your life, the best you can, as the man I am. There's no need to take anything too seriously, life is far too precious not to spend it happily.

When one combines all of the above, what we have is an extremely enjoyable blog post that is useful as it is funny. Bravo, G.

Read Next*: Best Of The Manosphere: A Note To My Son

(As always, feel free to suggest candidates for "Best Of The Manosphere" in the comments below.)

How To Build A Big Back

March 9, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

Other than the legs, I would say that the back is the most neglected body part by men in gyms across the country. Guys have no problems doing an endless amount of sets and exercises for the showy muscles (i.e. chest, arms, shoulders, and abdominals), but tend not to exert the same effort when it comes to the back and legs. It's certainly not surprising considering how brutal a heavy set of squats and deadlifts can be.

But building a strong back is important for several reasons. First, it will improve your posture. For example, the next time you are out in public note the number of guys with poor posture. Usually they will have a distinct, hunched over appearance. A weak upper back combined with an overdeveloped chest and shoulders is likely the culprit. In this case having a strong upper back will help to "lift" your chest up and eliminate the exaggerated curve in your spine. As an added bonus, when you have proper posture you also look taller so it's win-win.

This is the posture of the average guy. Not good.

Secondly, a well built back will enhance the effect of your v-taper. For the guys out there that don't naturally have a wide frame, adding width to their back (combined with trimming down at the waist) will help them achieve that v-taper look that is so imminently masculine.

Lastly, having a well built back will help you score chicks. It will make you stand out from a sea of curl jockeys. Now I'm not going to blow smoke up your ass and tell you chicks will be dropping their panties at the sight of your well built rhomboids, but having a well built body is NEVER a negative, plain and simple.

Now that you know the reasons for building up your back, I'm sure you're wondering how to go about doing it. First off, any gym rat knows the importance of deadlifts and chins so

I’m not going to belabour the point on those exercises beyond the fact that you should be doing them. However, one exercise that has not garnered nearly as much attention is the heavy, high rep dumbbell row.

A heavy, high rep dumbbell row is the perfect addition to your back routine. I first came across these a few years ago while reading some articles over at elitefts. Credit goes to powerlifter Matt Kroczaleski for popularizing the movement. Matt had discovered that when he included a heavy, high rep dumbbell row into his routine that his upper back strength improved tremendously, which in turn improved the lockout portion of his deadlift. Since his popularization of the movement, a heavy, high rep dumbbell row (aka a Kroc Row) has now become a staple in many lifters’ routines with much success.

A simple and effective way to add Kroc Rows to your routine would be as follows:

Deadlifts: Working up to a heavy single, double or triple or 5×5

Weighted Chins: 2-3 sets of 5-10 reps (vary the grip if you want).

Kroc Rows: 1-2 sets of 15+ reps. 15 reps here is really the bare minimum. Guys were doing as many as 20+ reps.

Do this 2x per week (although I would vary the intensity on the deadlifts with one lighter session and one heavier session in the week).

That’s it, a simple, no nonsense routine for building a solid back. Forget about all the pulley and cable work. Break your ass on just those three exercises and you won’t have much gas in the tank for anything else. You don’t need to water down your routine with useless exercises and half assed reps. Hack away at the inessential.

How to do a Kroc row (note the intensity):

Read More: The Romanian Deadlift

How To Game Girls In Class

March 10, 2013 | by Starting Young and Aiming High | Link | Original Link

Any man who has ever gone to college has come across a situation where they've spotted a cute girl all by her lonesome at a class. Maybe you spotted her standing outside by the wall beforehand or sitting with a free space next to her. For any guy who runs daygame, this is the best type of target you could ever ask for. Not only is she alone and stationary but she's also bored and probably more than willing for a chat. Knowing how to game such a girl may seem like a no-brainer, but today I have a special tip to share about college lecture game to create more attraction and get more solid closes.

How To Approach If She's Waiting Outside

Let's start off with the basics first. When you approach a girl while she's waiting outside the class, position yourself near her and ask her a question about the class or lecture. This will vary by what kind of class it is, how far you are into the semester and what assessments you have coming up soon and so forth. It doesn't really matter what it is as long as it's relevant and seems genuine. If there are other people waiting around right near the girl, it's a good idea to pose the question as if you're addressing all of them and as the conversation progresses direct most of your responses and follow-up questions to your target. This causes the other people to slip away into the background and stop participating or stop paying attention all together. From there transition into the basic get-to-know-you questions before the class starts and when it does, sit next to her. I'll come back to this scenario shortly.

How To Approach If She's Sitting In A Lecture

Say you walk into a lecture when it's halfway full (so there's a better chance there'll be a lonesome girl with a free spot next to her). Scan around, spot a girl preferably by herself, and sit next to her. If she's alone, it's either because she has no friends in the class, she does but they haven't arrived yet, or they just haven't or aren't going to spot each other in there. Instead of the purely indirect approach you'd take on a girl waiting outside, it's okay to be more obvious that you're purposely trying to get to know her. Sit next to her and say "Hey" as you unpack your books.

Girls actually find it very awkward if you actually don't talk to them in this situation so she will be quite receptive. If her friends come and sit on the other side of her it won't make a difference to how you'll game her except you'll have to be more subtle about number closing or insta-dating her around her friends. If somebody you're friends with comes and sits next to you that won't make a difference either, and if you get lucky like I have and one of your bros sits next to you, you can whisper things about other girls to him loud enough so that your girl on the other side can hear and become intrigued.

Get To Know Her Before The Class Get's Going

Either way, talk about class related questions with her for a little bit and then segue into the get-to-know-you questions like name, major, what classes she's in, etc. Girls you approach inside a lecture will often bring this up in the first couple minutes, so avoid the topic until then to gauge her interest level. The trick here is to get to that personal question phase early. You need to exchange that info either before the actual lecture begins or whisper it very early into it. In my regular daygaming I avoid questions like her name until she asks me first, but in a lecture if she doesn't ask first soon enough before it gets going it's better if you ask first. This situation is basically daygame on easy mode.

Do Not Whisper

Now both scenario's have met at the same place. Your sitting with your girl and the lecture's begun. Considering that one or both of you is going to want to be paying attention to what's being taught, it's not feasible nor is it polite to others around you to talk the whole way through. It is however necessary to communicate through the class.

If you only talk beforehand it makes an insta-date hangout or number close after class harder, simply because you haven't spent enough time talking. Whenever something interesting to say about the lecture or the lecturers behaviour came to mind, I would quickly whisper with the girls about it, being the natural way most people would talk in this situation, that some of you have probably already done. Whispering your little witty remarks and observations however is not the best way to game a girl however.

First and foremost it's often difficult to understand each other, and asking each other to repeat themselves all the time gets tedious. Secondly it's difficult to have a longer conversation with whispering, which in a lecture is more naturally suited to intermittent bursts of short sharp word exchanges. Lastly if your lecturer is a cranky bitch or just being one that day and especially if you're closer to the front you might get told to shut up for it.

Write Notes And Make Her Giggle Like A School Girl

So what should you do instead? Easy, write little notes on a spare piece of paper in YOUR notebook (we'll come to why it should be yours later). Why? Because for some reason girls enjoy this illicit note writing. It always gets them giggling to bag at the lecturer, their presentation, or random people in the rows in front of you even more than they do in sneaky whispering. Do try not to use your notes as your means of finding out her basic information however, because it sets the wrong vibe for how your notes to each other will go. Make sure you get that out of the way before you write her your first message.

"Passing notes" seems to be a forgotten mode of communication, having been made extinct in schools and colleges around the world by the mass proliferation of mobile phones. Writing notes to each other has the advantage of making it easier to have longer flowing conversations compared to whispering, but don't over do it. Just like texting its okay to see something they've said and not write back straight away. Don't write constantly the whole way through or she'll get bored of it, space it out, keep it novel and try to keep it fun and playful. Observing things going on in the class is the easiest way to do that.

Close

Towards the end ask what classes she's got after class, and if you're both free ask to her hangout verbally after it finishes. If one or both of you isn't available, get her to write her number on the paper in your notebook. Now, why should it be your notebook? First off because if she has cleavage you'll have a great view as she leans over to your desk to write messages (which you can make a point of conversation to keep things flirty and playful), but most importantly doing it all in your notebook means you get her number and not the other way around. If you number close here there tell her that she seems fun and you two should hangout sometime while the fun time she had with you in class is still fresh in her mind. Whether or not you insta-date her right after class or not, from then onwards you can run your game as you usually do.

Read Next: Top 10 Colleges For Getting Laid

About the Author

Starting Young and Aiming High

What I Learned From Death

March 11, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

---

1. The local police department may have to conduct traffic outside of the hospital, the lobby may be filled with people there for you, the family waiting rooms on 9 of the 11 floors may be packed to capacity, and you may be surrounded by your family – but when you walk through death's door, you walk through very much alone.

> "Look at me when I'm preaching to you. If you wanna sleep, go home. Listen, I know some of you don't want to hear it, but we live in a country where men have chosen to send their daughters to the front lines of combat. As far as I'm concerned, these lily-livered boys have lost their right to be called men. That might not be in the bible, but its still good preaching. [Laughter] Somebody better say 'amen' or I'm going to park it here for the rest of the sermon and you won't get home in time to watch the game."

2. When your lungs collapse and your heart explodes, your wife and daughters will clear the room in a split second and get sick in the hallway. The son who stays, holds your hand, and runs his fingers through your hair while you swell up and turn fourteen different shades of death will probably never be the same. I wouldn't wish that on my worst enemy, so I hope to die alone.

> "I wouldn't give you a plugged nickel for a man who lets his wife run him. I'd be ashamed to show my face if I had to ask a woman's permission every time I turned around."

3. Even if 1,783 people sign the memorial guest book, your wife will only be able to identify a small handful of people outside of the family who truly loved you. Cultivate and protect real friendships, and don't waste your time on acquaintances unless they can do something for you.

> "Teach your little boys to chase little girls, and teach your little girls to say no to little boys. It's good for both of them. Men hunt, and women protect; they need to learn how to do so under the watchful eye of their parents."

4. Everything that comes, comes to pass. Good and bad are both in constant transition, and complaining about one is about as pointless as boasting about the other.

> "No offense to our Catholic friends – many of whom are in these pews today, but I'm not sure what to think about a man who dresses like a mother and calls himself a father."

5. Your legacy will be an interpretation of who people perceived you to be in relation to themselves.

> "My bible says men should look like men, and women should look like women.

> What does your bible say? Judging by that boy's hair cut some of you women have, we must be reading out of two completely different books. Don't come to my office crying when your husband leaves you for a woman who actually looks like a woman. Oh, he'd be in the wrong, and he'd be a sinner, but I'd probably be a little too understanding of his predicament to suit your needs."

6. The organ donation people will show up a few moments before they unplug you and try to pressure your loved ones into overriding your admittedly uninformed but clearly stated wishes. It's a brutal and unconscionable situation for your family to endure.

Loading...

> "Men, if you'll lead, she'll follow. If she doesn't, send her back to her daddy's house and tell him you won't take her back until she's in her right mind. If she never comes back… [laughter]… well, count your blessings and tell God it's my fault. I'll take the blame when I get to heaven."

7. Leaving your wishes clearly spelled out, along with exactly how you want your funeral to be conducted is a wonderful gift to your family. Step by step instructions along with phone numbers and documents that have obviously been updated every year on your birthday for over a decade is a little disconcerting to read, but very much appreciated by those you leave behind.

> "Some of you women – I can see it on your faces right now – don't like what I have to say. But I'll let you in on a little secret: I'm not like your husband, and honey, I'm not afraid of you."

8. Organized religion is a branch of the human psyche hewn by either the faithful or the elite and offered as a crutch to the feeble minded. Organized religion is comprised of those who love god, those who use god, and those who need a god.

> "Good men build this country with the support of good women. Good women sustain this country with the support of good men. Good children are the future of this country with the support of good parents. We all need each other, and every man, woman and child is a critical part of God's natural order."

9. Nothing and everything matters; it just depends on who's doing the talking after you're dead. You really can't be all things to all people, so don't work too hard to garner favor.

> "Hell will freeze as solid as a popsicle before a woman stands behind this pulpit. Does that ruffle your feathers? Does that not sit well with you? Does that trample on your idea of fairness that some godless professor fed you in college? Good. There's the door, sister. And while you're at it, take your sissy husband with you."

10. At your funeral, a few will truly mourn your passing, but most will just want to see the show and get their drama fix for a good facebook status. If you really do it right and live a life of conviction without ever compromising on your principles, a handful will show up just to make sure you're really dead.

> "You don't like my preaching? Well bless God, I don't like your living so I guess that makes us about even."

———————–

Bear with me for just a sec…

If we with ink the ocean filled,
And were the skies of parchment made,
Were every stalk on earth a quill,
And every man a scribe by trade;
To write the love of God above,
Would drain the ocean dry.
Nor could the scroll contain the whole,
Though stretched from sky to sky.

I used to beg him to stop singing that in the car. Be careful what you wish for.

To the only man the funeral director ever had to hire a live obituary comment moderator for: Lulz for that, like father like son in a way I guess, and rest in peace.

Read Next: Eating From The Tree Of Wisdom

Working Out Favors Men

March 11, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

I believe it is safe to say that recently America has begun a “get fit” campaign thanks to constant media attention regarding our countries obesity rate. With the new craze towards fitness, attention has gone from the basic idea of join a gym, and evolved to a point where the manosphere has begun putting out pretty good information related to it. The one part that I believe the manosphere has not fully covered yet however, is the fact that working out is now tipping dating in favor of men.

That’s right, any woman thinking men working out benefits them is completely wrong. I’ve heard the following quote far too many times.

The best part about it though, is that men can now shove it back in women’s faces. This is all because men really are starting to get in that good of shape.

You see, women had long been in control of the dating spectrum. They contemplated what they wanted us to look like, and they always put men in a position where we were honored to have their presence. (Temporarily restrain your game comments, this post is about physique’s role in game). As men’s physiques quickly faded during their first year of college, it became a game of getting the hottest woman you could and holding on for dear life knowing that the following one would probably be less attractive. Women were always upgrading, and men were always downgrading. The single most annoying thing for a woman is to be left for a woman who is more attractive than her.

Thanks to the manosphere’s influence on working out, this may become ancient history. Initially the concept of working out was to be in shape to get a woman’s attention. That standard is quickly altering though. No longer will it be, I must be in shape to get a woman’s attention. The new standard will be taking over what women had. By getting to a certain level with your physique you will be able to set the standard for women whom wish to approach you.

The standard has basically always been, the more attractive you are the more attractive your partner will be. And while women controlled this forever with impossible standards, men reluctantly fell into a disturbing slump that caused the average male to finally look like this:

Loading…

But now the average man is beginning to look like this.

In retrospect, we have seen women go from this.

To this!

Women have told me they prefer me not to lift so they would not need to try and compete, and they would need to go to the gym to make sure I didn't end up with other women. This isn't a joke, their tone is always reflecting the idea that they are threatened. As I evolve my physique, I level up. The more attractive I become, the more opportunities are presented. And while the manosphere focuses on other traits of game beyond looks, it's a well known fact that a more attractive person can have worse game and better results in the majority of instances.

The biggest advantage for men though, is this will actually revolutionize women's behaviors. As men gear back towards physical fitness, women have an obligation to be in shape for men. So where men in the 1990's did whatever was necessary to get a woman's attention, women will now have to travel. At this rate, fashion and physique will be determined by what men desire, rather than women. Ultimately, sex will still be up to women, but men will once again be put in the power position of their forefathers, a place they haven't been since the early 20th century.

Read Next: Where Did The Pretty American Girls Go?

5 Honest Hiring Tips From Someone Who Hires

March 12, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

After being an employee for as long as I can remember, a few years back I gave that up and started my own law practice. The result was I have now seen literally over a thousand resumes and have interviewed countless people from assistants to actual attorneys. I just finished attending a law school job fair where students constantly approached me for potential jobs, so I thought this would be a good time to share some of my thoughts.

There are millions of articles out there on how to prepare a resume, get ready for an interview, send follow-up notes and so forth. Some of the following will overlap, but hopefully the rest will be advice you don't normally hear. In any event, since I don't give a shit about appeasing any editor or worrying about what my legal counterparts may think, here are five tips on presenting yourself as a legitimate candidate:

1. Know Your Target

The desired employee of one field of work can be completely different than another field. Take for example, an attractive girl applying for a job as a hostess at a top end restaurant versus the same attractive girl applying to be a pharmaceutical sales rep. For the former, aside from her looks she has to be extremely nice, understanding, pleasant, and able to handle complaints and concerns gracefully. A pharma girl on the other hand has to be able to flirt, sell, schmooze, and make the doctors want her around. If the same girl is applying to these two jobs, she better put on two very different personalities in the interview.

Even within the same field of work, specific areas vary. I litigate for a living – I'm constantly in court, in depositions, arguing with people and writing a lot. When looking for potential law students to hire, if they (1) cannot keep a conversation, (2) have me bored within seconds, (3) struggle to form sentences, (4) seem overly timid [but see below, nerves are not necessarily bad], or (5) have a ridiculous accent, I'm passing. Yet for a tax attorney or other transactional attorney that doesn't engage in much client or court interactions, these "deficiencies" can be overlooked especially if they possess absurdly high intellectual skills.

At my old firm, there was a Vietnamese attorney who had the thickest accent one can imagine. So much so that I understood less than 20% of what he said. The result? As a litigator he was never sent to court whereas even though I had no idea what I was doing as a first-year attorney, I was sent to court. Say what you will, but if the Judge can't understand what you are saying on behalf of your clients, then the firm you work for has no desire (or right, frankly) to send you out as the face of a client's case.

When I meet potential candidates for the first time, I judge them immediately. How was their handshake? Can they keep eye contact? Do they speak eloquently? How does the suit look on them? These are important to me as a law firm employer. If you are applying to be a fireman, that's a different set of traits the employer will be looking for. Same for doctor, bank teller, valet, and so on. Know your field and play up the characteristics of a successful employee in that field, even if you have to fake it.

One more thing – have different resumes for different employers. Applying to someone that focuses on minority legal aid in California? Better mention you can speak Spanish. All the hiring partners attend the local synagogue? Probably a good time to note you worked at the Law Offices of Schlomo Hebrewberg last summer. I had several versions of my same resume depending on who was going to be reading it.

2. Be Genuine

At this job fair I spoke to probably over 100 students. The one that stood out provided the most genuine and honest response to my initial question of anyone there.

I greeted everyone with "How's it going?" Responses varied from "I'm doing great" to "Just loving every second of my torts class!" In other words, at best it was a standard retort to at worst a feeble attempt at displaying fervor for a field few actually desire. However, one young lad had the following response:

> To be honest, I'm scared shitless. We have finals coming up, then the bar exam this summer which I'm not sure what to make of. I can't wait for this all to be over.

It was so refreshing to hear an honest answer after hearing the same script over and over again. Another girl, after two sentences stopped and said this was her first real interview of any kind and she was very nervous and asked if she was doing alright. I appreciated her honesty, we joked and had a great conversation.

3. Appearance

This relates to #1, so know how to dress for what you are seeking. Nobody wants an attorney that shows up in jeans for an interview. Make sure your suit fits, have your hair in check, no bad breath and so on. If you can't spend some time and effort into presenting yourself as best you can for your potential employer, why would you do the same for a big court hearing or client meeting? There's literally thousands of you out there and unless you have some sort of unrivaled skill or talent that is so desirable everything else can be overlooked (and guess what, 99% of you don't), then I'm passing on you.

Also, I prefer attractive people. It's the cold truth. Jurors, clients, and even judges subconsciously tend to give more credence to attractive people. I almost hired an intern on her looks alone, because she was tall, blonde and downright beautiful. I knew taking her to client meetings with me would seal the deal with various older businessmen. Unfortunately she was dumb as bricks, yet I almost justified the hire.

Loading...
Also, the no fat chicks policy applies to my office. I refuse to hire someone I have no respect for and my business partner fully endorses that belief. If your aesthetics are lacking, maybe it's time to stop being so lazy.

4. Know Something About The Company

See if you can tell which one of these law students I preferred.

Student 1: "So…what do you do at your firm?"

Student 2: "I just wanted to come by and say I think it's very cool how you just left a big firm and started your own. I know many attorneys think about it but never do so. I'm hoping to do that myself. But let me ask you, do you think it helped that you worked for a firm for several years first?"

Student 1 was dismissed before he even said another word. He didn't even know what type of law I practice, much less anything else. Student 2 on the other hand, presented himself nicely and I'll admit it's a little flattering to hear someone hold your actions in high regard. I realize that what Student 2 said was likely entirely bullshit. Does he really care that I undertook such "cool" actions and started my own firm? Fuck no, he just wants a job. But he put in the effort to bullshit, and guess what—as a litigator I applaud that.

I'm not saying you need to research my mother's maiden name, know about my proclivities towards considerably thin women, or that my favorite cheese is goat. But know something, anything. Show me you care just a bit.

5. Paperwork

When I put an ad on craigslist for an assistant position, I got 300 resumes in one day. So I had to really filter through these things, and quickly. And realize this is common for many employers—they will get inundated with resumes for any position and you have maybe 5-10 seconds to get your resume in the next round. So what's the result?

- Any mistake, no matter how small, and you're done. If you can't bother to proofread your resume a few times to ensure it is error-free then I don't want you. As I mentioned above, there are thousands of you and you are easily replaceable.
- Be interesting. I can't tell you how many times I've seen the same cover letter and resume bullshit, whether it be that you "are looking forward to being an integral part of the company" or that you "place teamwork and productivity ahead of your own personal goals" and whatever other standard template language you've stolen from monster.com. Congrats snowflake, so does every other candidate out there.

Here are some excerpts from an actual email I received today:

> I particularly enjoyed your real world advice for me in stressing the importance of keeping things in perspective if I don't get the particular firm job that I want.

Huh? My head hurt reading that. Plus I never gave him such advice, he confused me with someone else.

> I was really intrigued by our conversation and have more questions especially concerning any advice you may have for me going forward.

First, this email contained no questions. Second, how can he have questions about future advice I have not given yet? Fatal flaw there Mr. Logic. I'm guessing this was a poor attempt at asking me if I had any more advice for him. I'm not going to sit around and try to decode this generic verbiage. On to the next guy.

Let's go back to the resumes for a second. The first thing I look at before I check out the credentials are the skills/interests section at the bottom. I realize this is very subjective, but I want to see something interesting and frankly, a little out there. Show me you're creative and that I'd actually enjoy being around you in an office. Give me something to talk to you about. Saying you like to travel doesn't mean anything. Saying you spent a month in the favelas of Rio gives me glimpse of who you are.

Here's an excerpt from one of the recent resumes: "Interested in animal psychology, aquatic life, and jigsaw puzzles." Not exactly my cup of tea, but at least he's interesting.

But there is a limit to everything. Don't be that guy that provides a link in his cover letter to his own personal website, which discusses all his achievements in the third person as a musical ensemble plays and his name dances across the screen in florescent colors (true story).

* Bonus Tip For Employers

I unintentionally developed a great date routine from having to hire an assistant. I had a date scheduled and was falling behind going through so many resumes. So I asked my date if she wanted to just come over and help me sift through the resumes and find a good candidate. She jumped at the chance, we sat on my couch together and it was a great date. Made for easy chats, playful flirting all over a few glasses of wine. Simple, fun, cheap and you don't even have to leave your home. Let's just say I've reviewed the same set of resumes on first dates many, many times.

Read Next: 8 Essential Rules To Surviving The Workplace

5 Things I Learned About Life From Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu

March 12, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Brazilian jiu-jitsu is a grappling sport that focuses on takedowns, ground fighting, and self-defense designed to subdue a stronger opponent. Most current jiu-jitsu originates from the Gracie family, several of whom dominated the early days of mixed martial arts fighting. Royce Gracie won 3 of the first 4 UFCs with jiu-jitsu, leading to its wide recognition as one of the most effective forms of martial arts.

This article is not about jiu-jitsu's prowess as a fighting style, but rather how it can benefit your life in immeasurable ways. These are five things it has led me to discover:

1. Failure is inescapable

Are you on the path to achieving your dreams? If not, I guarantee that it is because you are terrified of failure. To improve at jiu-jitsu, you must put yourself in a life-or-death position literally hundreds of times in your first few months as a white belt. Tapping out to someone says "I acknowledge that my physical safety is completely in your hands," a difficult admission for most to accept. Affliction-wearing meatheads wash out quickly because they cannot stand the blow to their egos. Jiu-jitsu teaches you to manage the humiliation and emotional dump that comes with failure. Failing at jiu-jitsu desensitizes you to failing in life, the only way you can begin to succeed.

2. There is always someone better than you

Whether your passion includes game, fitness, athleticism, writing, or fighting, jiu-jitsu forces you to accept that you are never the master of your craft. How many times have you seen a gorgeous girl on the arms of a toady guy, only to hear your friends talk derisively about how his luck or money are the only reasons for his success? It is a loser's mindset to hate on someone because they are superior to you at something. Respecting and acknowledging mastery comes with exposure to the red pill mindset, and with exposure to jiu-jitsu as well.

3. There are no shortcuts

Loading...

It is well-established that experts in any field are made through thousands of hours of deliberate practice. Some people are better natural athletes or learn moves faster, but the true beasts at my gym are the guys who have put in the longest hours on the mat. Learning jiu-jitsu emphasizes the dedication necessary to achieve proficiency in any area. You can passively await a one-in-a-million stroke of luck, or you can take ownership of your position today and begin logging the hours required for mastery.

4. Your body is your greatest physical possession

Once you see the wondrous things you can do with it, it will deeply trouble you how little most people respect theirs. I ate well and worked out regularly before I began training, but seeing what some people can do on the mat drives me to optimize all aspects of my health. Older guys say that you only realize how much of a gift your body is when it begins to break down. I believe them and want to delay that process. Jiu-jitsu helps to redefine your commitment to your own body on a daily basis, amidst a population that is 2/3 overweight or obese.

5. Your daily grind matters less than you think

The Fight Club narrator insists that fighting turns down the volume on the rest of your life. This is true. Once you are put within a hair's breadth of serious injury on a regular basis, nagging things in your life lose significance. Lost your job? You'll find another one. Girl not interested in you? No big deal, there's plenty more. Having to modulate your stress level under extreme duress rewires your brain, giving you the ice in the veins required to excel in any competitive environment.

Jiu-jitsu is a beautiful art, one I would encourage anyone to try. Gym owners may try to sell jiu-jitsu or other martial arts as necessary to defend yourself in fights or prevent bullying, but this is a tertiary benefit at best. More importantly, from its lessons on failure, dedication, prioritization, and mastery, Brazilian jiu-jitsu teaches you how to become a better man.

Don't Miss: 5 Reasons To Learn Krav Maga

What Does It Feel Like To Be Betrayed By Your Own Country?

March 12, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

It is often said that today's America is not the same America we grew up in. We all know how far America has gone from its humble Constitutional beginnings, to its modern day decline and the feminist ruin of its women. The same story is present in all Western countries.

How can you, as an Western man, react to what is tantamount to a complete betrayal of your birthright? As always, turning back to the classics sheds light on a timeless situation. The historical background is from the Peloponnesian War, right on the eve of the doomed Athenian invasion of Sicily. The reason Athens lost, was not because Athens was incompetent but because Athens' most talented general, Alcibiades, defected to Sparta and revealed Athenian plans to wage war on Sicily. Armed with such knowledge, Sparta was easily able to sabotage the Sicilian invasion.

Why did Alcibiades betray his own home country? Enemies of Alcibiades framed him by defacing all of the religious statues around Athens in the night before the expedition to Sicily, and these same enemies managed to convince the public of Athens that Alcibiades was to blame for the blasphemy. As a result Alcibiades was arrested, but he managed to escape to Sparta.

And why was Sparta able to trust Alcibiades even though he was betraying his own country? Here's how Alcibiades convinced the Spartans while justifying his betryal. (Emphasis mine.)

Loading...

> Meanwhile I hope that none of you will think any the worse of me if after having hitherto passed as a lover of my country, I now actively join its worst enemies in attacking it, or will suspect what I say as the fruit of an outlaw's enthusiasm. I am an outlaw from the iniquity of those who drove me forth, not, if you will be guided by me, from your service: my worst enemies are not you who only harmed your foes, but they who forced their friends to become enemies; and love of country is what I do not feel when I am wronged, but what I felt when secure in my rights as a citizen. Indeed I do not consider that I am now attacking a country that is still mine; I am rather trying to recover one that is mine no longer; and the true lover of his country is not he who consents to lose it unjustly rather than attack it, but he who longs for it so much that he will go to all lengths to recover it. For myself, therefore, Spartans, I beg you to use me without scruple for danger and trouble of every kind, and to remember the argument in everyone's mouth, that if I did you great harm as an enemy, I could likewise do you good service as a friend, inasmuch as I know the plans of the Athenians, while I only guessed yours. For yourselves I entreat you to > believe that your most vital interests are now under consideration; and I urge you to send without hesitation the expeditions to Sicily and Attica; by the presence of a small part of your forces you will save important cities in that island, and you will destroy the power of Athens both present and prospective; after this you will dwell in security and enjoy the supremacy over all Hellas, resting not on force but upon consent and affection.

Here at the Return of Kings, we are above being merely a men's entertainment website – we are also aimed to deliver subversive info to the Western man so that we can attempt to recover what was once ours. For it is only by bringing our culture down completely is there any hope of returning the West to its lofty ideals — where once upon a time the successful were those who provided value to others instead of being too big to fail, where men and women were once friends but have since been co-opted into enemies.

When Jefferson said, "The tree of liberty must be refreshed from time to time with the blood of patriots and tyrants," you now know where he got his influences from. And while there is no intent at the Return of Kings to spill any blood, we can instead water the tree of liberty with a revolution from within, by educating the modern man on how his country betrays him and how to live his life in response to it.

Read Next: 12 Great Quotes From The Landmark Thucydides

American Girls Have No Game

March 13, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

A while ago, I met a Canadian girl on the subway.

I walked into the train and went straight for the long-haired cutie with a round face I'd spotted before the doors had even separated. I left only one seat between us, despite the fact that the train car was near-empty. Fortunately, she had her face buried in a book, so she didn't seem to notice.

After pretending to check my phone and rifle through my gym bag for a couple of minutes, I started up a conversation about the book she was reading—alleviating my aching curiosity if it was "any good." I chatted her up over the next several stops and got her number before we walked in opposite directions at the station. She was a sweetheart, and I couldn't help but notice that her warm eye-contact and smile had improved my mood—a rarity. I admit I was sort of hopeful that she'd text me back after my strict adherence to the 2.5-days-and-not-expressing-any-interest-beyond-transactional-plan-making texting rule.

She did. We went out to a local bar, where I bought us a round of beers, for which she thanked me twice. At a point during that beer, I ran to the bathroom. When I returned, she was looking out the window instead of her phone. After a single round, we went to my nearby apartment for a second one. It wasn't long after our arrival there that I learned she had boyfriend back in Canada. Irritated, I asked her why she hadn't seen fit to tell me earlier. She responded that it was because she'd normally "be very interested in getting to know [me]." But, despite this and my best efforts, I couldn't get more than a closed-lip peck on the front of my face from her—a nothing-move she said made her "feel really-really guilty" anyway. I talked to her a little longer, while ushering the conversation in a way that would get her out the door. I had jerking off to do, and TV to watch, and she seemed a little antsy to leave after the minor physical contact we'd had.

Partly from reflex and partly from the faint smell of blood in the water, I spit out the throw-away line, "we should do this again, though," as she was putting on her shoes. She replied more enthusiastically than I expected with, "Yeah, I'm going back to Canada for the weekend, but after that for sure!" On the way out, she thanked me for the additional beer I'd given her out of my fridge.

We got together a second time not long after she returned. Judging by the noticeable change in her attitude toward contact—and freshly groomed cooch—two things had likely happened: she'd dropped the boyfriend and had pre-meditated our bang. Whatever the case, the sex greatly exceeded my expectations.

It’s important to note that this girl knew that I wasn’t going to be her boyfriend. For one, she was going back to Canada—for good this time—a few weeks later. A recent college graduate, this was little more than an extended trip to visit some family. Secondly, she never brought it up or even intimated it in any oblique way. Yet, over the coming weeks, she’d do nice things that I can’t remember encountering in the US, at this—or any—stage of a non-formal relationship. When we’d confirm plans, she’d add something like “looking forward to seeing you!” She’d admit to things that no American girl ever does, “I was telling my mom about how interesting you are the other day!” She dressed stylishly, even when she was coming over to “just watch a movie.” She’d sometimes spend the night, other times she’d excuse herself and go home.

One time, I had to postpone her visit to my apartment by a half-hour because I was trying to meet a deadline on a project. She replied with this text:

> Wow, that’s late! Kidding. I’ll bring some snacks to help you relax.

She walked in the front door with a cranium-sized bowl of homemade guacamole, an equally large bowl of homemade salsa, a giant bag of organic corn chips, and a six pack of imported beer. The guacamole was so good that I asked her for the recipe. And, I make Mexican food regularly. Who was this girl?

She went back to Canada without a single tear or ounce of drama. She’d never been clingy or crazy. The closest thing was when she said “keep in touch,” while writing down her e-mail address on the last day I saw her. Right after that, she handed me a new toothbrush in the packaging. “Here, it’s to replace the one you gave me the first night I stayed over.” It was the same brand and model.

In the ensuing days and weeks, I experienced an unfamiliar feeling. It took me a while to figure it out, but I eventually identified it as kinda-missing-her. Canada Girl had tenderized me with her sweetness. She'd known exactly what to do, and executed it to perfection. Even though I knew what she'd done, it didn't reduce its effectiveness. She'd cracked my hard exterior.

Canadian girls (non-French) are known for being a lot like American girls—in all the wrong ways. So, as far as I could tell, this girl acted like girls I—and guys I know who have traveled more—mostly encounter outside of the English-speaking world. She'd been supremely feminine, but unafraid or awkward around a man. She had tact, never once flaunting her sexual past with masculine pride. She demonstrated her domestic skills by using them, instead of just boasting about them. She'd been nurturing, when she accurately ascertained it was called for. She never claimed to be too busy to see me—even though she actually had a lot going on. She displayed enthusiasm about seeing me. She never over-stayed her welcome, or made herself at home. She thanked me—even over-thanked me—for everything.

In short, this girl had game.

Guys who spend time abroad talk about how the girls—everything else being equal—are more feminine or more wholesome or more old-fashioned or just plain "better." But what they're not saying is that much of this basically amounts to "game." Girls with girl-game, simply told, know how to get (and, by extension, often keep) a man with more than dangling the quickly consumed new-pussy carrot.

Not long after Canada Girl left, I went out with a series of (American) girls who were a fairly typical sampling of my previous talent pool. The juxtaposition made the differences all too plain to ignore.

On one first date, I asked a girl where she'd gotten her colorful scarf. She answered, "My last boyfriend was Turkish. I went to Turkey with him all the time and got it there." Another girl proudly announced that she was a "Microwave Queen" when I showed her my expensive French cookware, bragging that she made "kick-ass [boxed] mac-and-cheese." Yet another girl—granted, I met her online—tried to schedule our first date two weeks out, because she had "several other dates [that] week."

This kind of thing continued, girl after girl.

When—after a heated first-date make-out session—I went to remove one girl's already-unbuttoned jeans, she blurted out, "I'm not having sex with you on the first whatever-this-is. That keeps happening and I don't feel good about that pattern." Another girl, with whom I had had sex on the first date, came back for the second with a confession that—over the recent extended holiday weekend—she'd "had a little too much to drink," had sex with someone else, and was now "just trying to figure it all out."

In those weeks, I never once got a thank-you for the first rounds of drinks that I bought, for the top-shelf alcohol they were served at my house, for the contact-lens solution, for the brie-cheese-on-crostini, or for anything else. I never once got a trace of feminine sweetness in a text, or otherwise. These girls resolutely hid any sign of interest or vulnerability, beyond whatever was implied in the course of physical intimacy. And, they certainly never replaced anything I'd given them. I got sex. And that's all.

There’s a myth that game is only for men, but there’s a whole universe of game for women that American girls were either never taught by their mothers, or willfully refuse to learn. It’s basically a dead language in America. There’s a myth that a girl just has to “look cute” and show up, and that there’s little more to getting a quality guy than playing musical man-chairs until you land on the “right” dick. My story proves otherwise.

There’s also a myth that American men have no game when, in reality, American women are even worse.

Read More: “You Didn’t Have To Make Things Awkward”

About the Author

Tuthmosis is a writer and consultant, with specialties in dating culture, social intelligence, and the state of masculinity. He splits his time between various U.S. cities. His column runs every Wednesday. You can follow him on Twitter

I Got Played

March 13, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is an excerpt from Bang Lithuania.

I had already decided never to go back to Europe in the winter again. The lack of sunlight and cold temperatures are bad enough, but even worse is that pussy is harder to find. Girls go out less at night and day game is all but eliminated unless you like hanging out at the mall.

It was already late January, the dead of winter, when I arrived in Kaunas from Estonia. I decided to tough it out a bit longer before heading to Ukraine in the spring. The mall would have to do.

My favorite opener during the day is asking a girl where a pet shop is. I've done it dozens of times and know how the conversation can play out for me to get a number. The opener goes off a lot more smoothly if there isn't a pet store nearby because the girl is forced to stop and think of an answer. The biggest mall in Kaunas has three pet stores. It was almost comedy hour with how the approaches were going.

"Have you been to the pet store right here?" the girl would ask.

"Yeah, but they don't have cats."

"And the one upstairs?"

"They also don't have cats."

"How about the one down the hall? I know they have cats."

"Are you sure? I don't think they have cats."

On my second day in the city, I approached a cute girl named Aista with pet store. She wanted to walk me to a pet store that I already knew had a black cat. I feigned surprise that they actually had this cat and she asked if I was going to buy it.

“Um, I don’t know about its color. I’m not a fan of black.”

“I think it’s a pretty cat. You should buy it!”

Was she drawing me out? I considered buying it just to call her bluff, but then told her maybe I wanted a hamster instead, which thankfully the store didn’t have.

My experience is that even if a girl knows my opener isn’t the truth, she still wants to see me again, assuming she likes me. It’s such an innocent “lie” that I’ve never had a girl use it against me. Aista eagerly gave me her number and we set up a date for Friday night.

When I first arrive in a country, I want to get my flag out of the way as quickly as possible, preferably in the first week. I use night game for that task, since a Thursday, Friday, and Saturday night mission is usually enough for me to bang. I don’t do dates from day game on those nights because of the usually longer length of time it takes to seal the deal, but I made an exception for Aista because winter was raging and I wasn’t sure if I could find fruitful nightlife. I felt that it was worth the risk.

On Friday night, the date got off to a slow start at an Irish pub. She didn’t talk at all, so I turned on my monologue and kept things going until she started opening up an hour later. I caught glimpses of her sexy body with huge titties that turned out to be uncommon among Lithuanian girls. Her long blonde hair draped across the sides of her chest. I wondered how far I could get with her that same night, especially after she told me she had just gotten out of a three-year relationship a couple weeks earlier.

I truthfully told her I was writing a travel book on Lithuania and she gave me a rundown on the culture and some popular venues, including a fun bar she said I had to visit called Republic. My nightlife reconnaissance was going well and by the second weekend I would know the best venues in the city.

“Am I the first American you’ve met?” I asked.

“Yes, you are. I’ve seen a couple other Americans around, but I never talked to them like I’m talking to you.”

“Well, I have to be extra nice so you’ll have a favorable impression of my country. I won’t act crazy or anything.”

She laughed and I knew the time was right for a venue change to a club where things could get more physical. I gave her the keys to the night by letting her pick the club. She chose one that was in the suburbs, so we had to take a taxi. The club was packed and I was the only foreigner there. The music was good, the vibe was good, and after I ordered a drink it didn’t take long for us to kiss.

I was surprised by her intimacy skills. She was only 22 but the way she kissed suggested a lot of experience. She knew how to pull back and how to bite with just the right pressure. My boner was operating at 100% power for much of the night as she rubbed against it through her wool dress. I felt like the king of the club and was pleased with my decision to give her a date on such an important night.

A couple hours after we got to the club (about four hours into the date), she stopped drinking, well short of the intoxication that would lead to bad decisions concerning sex with a relative stranger. Her kissing dropped in intensity as well. I couldn't trace it to something I said, since we had barely talked in the club, so I chalked it up as a case of her realizing she was moving too fast and wanting to slow things down. She had just gotten out of a relationship, after all.

My experience had shown that not all Eastern European women wanted to fuck right away, so I wasn't upset or surprised that I'd have to wait for another date. I was ready to close out the night to set the stage for a home dinner date the following week where I could seal the deal and get my Lithuanian flag.

We were both tired of dancing, so we sat in a booth. In case she did want to bang, I told her that just because I might invite her to my apartment later, or at any point in the future, it didn't mean I was expecting sex. It was a line I had perfected in Poland which made girls more comfortable coming over, of course leading to sex.

"In America, it's very common to have an afterparty," I said.

"Okay," Aista said. "I just don't want to be entertainment that you only use for sex."

"While I'm a single man and like sex, I like doing other things as well. We're talking, drinking, and dancing, with no expectations. We're just having a nice time."

She seemed to like that answer, but ten minutes later she got really quiet and started messing with her phone, sending text messages. I ignored that and we sat for another fifteen minutes until I suggested we go to a different bar. My instinct told me that she'd politely decline and we'd take a cab back to the city center. I wasn't prepared for what happened next.

"I think I'm going home," she said.

"We can share a cab back to the center," I suggested.

"Actually, my friend is going to pick me up."

The music kept playing, but I felt as if it had stopped. I asked a question I already knew the answer to.

"Is your friend a guy?"

She paused for a second, then said, "Yes."

I had spent hours with her, bought her drinks, paid for the long taxi ride, gave her my undivided attention, and the result of all that is that I had warmed her up to fuck another guy. While I didn't have the expectation that she'd fuck me, I did have the expectation that she'd treat me with respect. That was a mistake.

My response was immediate. Within two seconds, I was out of my seat and walking away. She gave chase and grabbed my arm, but I snatched it away, not before she could yell, "Stupid man!"

There would be no negotiation or further conversation. I had been played, and even if she had said, "But I'll fuck you next time we go out," I would have told her to go to hell.

I felt like the wind had been knocked out of me. For fifteen minutes I moped around like a pathetic sack of shit at the bar. I felt humiliated. All I wanted to do was go home and lick my wounds. She only saw me as a wallet and a stooge, a foreigner who could show her a good time while some local dude got the pussy. I had gotten her buzzed and horny just for him.

I looked at the time. It was 3:00. The club was way past its peak. There was little hope, but even though I was down, I still tried. I did two half-ass approaches that went alright, but nothing came out of them. I walked out of the club, still in disbelief about the reversal I had just faced. Things had seemed to be going so well. Why had she done me dirty like that? I thought only American women were capable of such harshness. She could have at least lied and said she wasn't feeling well, or that a girlfriend was coming to get her.

A cab dropped me in front of my apartment. Then I remembered the bar she had told me about—Republic. It was just a block from my place. It was probably closed, but I decided to check it out, not to meet a girl but to see if it was worth going to on another night.

I went inside and was stunned to find that it was packed with more women than men. The bar had narrow walkways with people standing up. The music wasn't too loud. Was I in a bar in America? The logistics were perfect, the first time I had encountered such an American-style venue in Eastern Europe. All that was missing were the fat American girls in flip-flops singing along to Bon Jovi. My mood immediately brightened. I ordered a drink and leaned against the bar. I couldn't believe I had found a spot that was tailor-made for me.

In my first approach, the girl didn't speak English, but her thick friend smiled and said, "Maybe I want to dance with you later." It was a good sign. Tons of girls were staring at me, and there were no Spanish or Italian dudes in sight. There had to be a catch, I thought, but there was none.

My second approach was on a gorgeous blonde. She was a sweet girl who obviously loved practicing her English, but after some time it came out that she had a boyfriend. "I'm not the jealous type," I said. She laughed.

I knew that talking to her wouldn't lead to sex, but I wanted some companionship after the supreme diss I had faced not one hour earlier. The blonde made me feel good and I wanted to be with her. Our conversation was fun and I could tell she liked me, but the revelation that she lived with her boyfriend told me I absolutely wasn't getting laid.

I thought of a night in Uruguay where I went out with two Brazilian girls, one younger and another much older. I wanted the younger one, but the older one wanted me. I decided to stick to my guns and go for the younger one, but at the end of the night I got neither. Then I thought of all the nights in Poland I wasted on girls with boyfriends after thinking that I could seduce them. I walked away empty-handed 95% of the time.

I looked at the blonde and realized that I'd be warming her up for sex with another guy, just like I had with Aista. Was that what I wanted to be to women, a fluffer? The blonde was the type of girl I could fall for, but I wasn't put on this Earth to serve as validation for women or to make projects of them.

I saw a brunette looking at me while I talked to the blonde. She wasn't as hot, but still cute. I could tell she was DTF, looking around and barely paying attention to her homely friend. I told the blonde I'd be right back and approached the brunette by complimenting her fur-lined vest. She received it well and asked where I was from.

Her friend quickly left, leaving us to a one-on-one conversation. Later the blonde came and said goodbye to me as she walked out. I told the brunette to hold on so I could say goodbye to the blonde—and maybe even get her number—but my feet stopped after only two steps. As I watched her leave, nothing in my being told me to chase after her. I turned back to the brunette and apologized for the interruption.

It took about twenty minutes to kiss the brunette and another ten minutes to invite her to my apartment. Forty-five minutes from meet to bang, something I would have expected more in Iceland than Lithuania. The brunette's body was not as good as Aista's, but my dick couldn't tell the difference. Her face wasn't as good as the blonde's, but again my dick couldn't tell the difference. She fucked me good, and in the end that's all that matters.

Read Next: How To Meet And Bang Lithuanian Women

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The SlutWalk Is Coming To a City Near You

March 13, 2013 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

I came across a flyer advertising on a bulletin in my city's (Victoria) university, and I was shocked. The feminist movement seems to be strongest in Canada's largest cities, Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, etc. Their latest novelty? An esteemed event called the "SlutWalk" which is a fundraiser parade for women against "victim blaming" and rape culture.

How SlutWalk Started

The SlutWalk is started in Toronto, Ontario after a comment made by Constable Michael Sanguinetti on Crime Prevention at York University, stating that women should avoid dressing in a promiscuous manner to decrease the likelihood of rape encounters. This angered the sluts of Toronto and 3,000 of them gathered at Queen's Park for fellowship and a march to the local police station.

The Aim Of SlutWalk

Originally, it was recommended for the participants to dress in average clothing, but many CHOSE to dress like whores instead (lingerie, stripper boots, you get the picture). They do this to protest rape culture, end victim blaming, and create a feminist-dominated society where women can choose to dress as they like and not have to suffer misogynistic comments and those dreaded whistles as they parade through the streets. In short, the event is trying to promote the idea that women should be able to dress and act as sexual and provocatively as they want, without drawing any sexual attention from the opposite sex.

Why The SlutWalk Is Stupid

The name says it all. As the wave of feminism begins to rise in society (Mainly North America), the idea of being a slut and acting like men is starting to become accepted by most women. This event is hardly a protest against rape as it is a club for whores looking to popularize their skank-religion. The statement "Against slut-shaming" contradicts itself because it is shameful to be a slut. If women think dressing like sluts shouldn't draw any attention compared to dressing normally, they have another thing coming. By this reasoning I should be able to dress as a policeman and not be asked for help, or be naked and not be called a nudist. It's one thing to protest against rape and raise awareness, it's another to be a self-declared slut and make a parade celebrating it. SlutWalk is only 2 years old. Let's stop this contagion before it becomes another tax-deductible North American tradition.

Loading...

11 Pictures Of Slutwalks

1.

2.

3.

4.

5.

6.

7.

8.

9.

to beaslut
.com
BODY
NOT CATCALLS
FLIRTATION
Sheraton
POSTES
CANADA

10.

Society teaches
"DON'T GET RAPED"
Rather than
"DON'T RAPE".

11.

For more information on how to crash a SlutWalk, visit Slutwalk Victoria BC.

Read More: 3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation

How Black America Was Created

March 14, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

In January, I made a post about how Black America has predicted our future. In that entry I talked about how many of the negative trends harped on in the manosphere have already been predicted in modern Black America, and how these trends are spreading. In that article, however, I failed to really go into the reasons for the development of those trends in Black America. For the sake of completion, I'll do so here.

The creation of modern Black America was born of a combination of three main things: the welfare state (specifically the tenets it promoted incentivizing single motherhood), the beginning of the drug war, and plain old racism (discrimination in the GI Bill, redlining, etc). I'll go on to describe each in some detail below.

Welfare State

The welfare state obviously made single motherhood much more practical and in some ways preferable to the nuclear family model in the black community. Feminism played a crucial role in this and did black folks no favors. When folks warned of the concerns inherent to the promotion of single motherhood at the expense of the nuclear family, many opposed it by applying feminist talking points to the struggle of black women ("they can do it on their own!!!"), which was impractical.

Feminists were not willing to consider the importance of male role models in the upbringing of children, and were all too happy to allow blacks to become the sacrificial lambs at the progressive altar of the "independent woman." Black women paid the early price so white women (for whom feminism was really intended and to whom it still generally caters predominantly to) would not have to do so.

Feminists used black women to make a point that blacks would gain nothing from, and whose consequences only blacks would feel (at first, anyway—whites are catching up now). I think that in the civil rights movement, feminists saw an opportunity to advance their own aims, and they did so splendidly at the (ironic) expense of minorities.

Drugs

The drug war's impact was obvious—it essentially battered the black poor and made them more desperate than they'd already been. It also greatly enhanced incarceration rates, though there is a discriminatory element there that has enhanced that.

Long story short—drugs did a number on the community.

Racism

This factor gets significantly more mainstream attention than the others when it comes to explaining modern problems in Black America. While the singular focus on it is unwarranted (the problems I outlined relating to welfare may have done just as much damage), it is difficult to minimize the role that racism played in facilitating some of the trends I mention above and the general state of modern black America as a whole.

Following WW2, many benefits were given to formerly marginalized European Americans with the aim of enabling the creation of a new middle class. Massive government initiative made this possible by subsidizing the provision of home loans, employment, higher education, and other benefits.

This worked quite well. The white middle class we know today is a direct product of these efforts. Prior to WW2, Non-WASP whites were often marginalized, stereotyped, and attacked. After WW2, they were lent a helping hand and pulled into a newer, wealthier, more cohesive white America, the one we know today.

Loading...

Blacks, however, were largely left out of this due to a combination of day-to-day discrimination (fewer checks on that existed back then—no political correctness to provide them) and legislation, which often served to blunt or just plain erase the impact of any benefits on their community.

Redlining, meanwhile, kept blacks out of the housing market that would, over the next half a century, come to comprise the bulk of white American wealth and provide a foundation for the vast swaths of suburban, middle-class America we take for granted today.

The “American Dream” was essentially not an option for African-Americans until well after the civil rights movement had ended and the earlier obstacles I mentioned (welfare and the drug war) had enjoyed plenty of time to do damage, expediting the decline.

Combine all of these things and the result is modern Black America.

OK, So Why Should I Care?

It is important to understand history in order to avoid its repetition. To this end, I would argue that there are three crucial lessons that can be taken from the history I outlined above:

1. Even the best of intentions can create the worst results. I’m sure that some of those who constructed welfare programs decades ago had good things in mind. On paper, what they built seemed like the charitable thing to do. Their failure to realize the perils of fatherless societies and guard against them, however, set the stage for trouble.

2. Division can foster more division. Today, there is a pretty large cultural and socioeconomic gap between black Americans and whites. The modern gap is in many respects (ex: illegitimacy rates) much wider now than it once was.

Had any significant portion of black America been allowed access to the middle class during the height of the post WW2 boom, could we be sure that these gaps would remain quite so large today? Perhaps the outcomes we live with today between the two groups would show a narrower degree of diversity today had there been more openness to more racial diversity early on.

3. Traditional values still have a place. Much of the reason why the architects of modern welfare programs ignored the warnings about the potential pitfalls of their system stemmed from their desire to move away from the “traditional” notion that a male influence was crucial to the functioning of a household. Black Americans have paid the price for this assumption.

Perhaps the place that these traditional notions occupy doesn’t need to be as large as it once was. I, for one, am confident that the social mores of the 1950's are in fact gone for good, and will not return to us. I'm not mad about that either. Even in a diminished form, however, traditional ideas relating to the value of the father will never totally lose relevance. Children must have some sort of male role model to look up to—women simply cannot totally supplement this role on their own without everyone paying some sort of price.

As the modern state of Black America shows us, societies ignore this reality at their own peril.

Don't Miss: How Black America Has Predicted Our Future

Spanish Politician Is Crushed For Questioning Feminist Dogma

March 14, 2013 | by Juan Sanchez Villalobos | Link | Original Link

---

Europe's first law specifically cracking down on gender-based violence was unanimously approved in Spain at the end of 2004 under the government of José Luis Rodríguez Zapatero. This law called for public education in gender equality, improved assistance to victims, stiffer sentences for aggressors, the creation of special courts, and a series of procedures aimed at protecting women under threat, bringing the full force of the state to bear on eradicating what they called "criminal machismo."

A Law Only For Women

This may seem fine at first until you realize that the law ONLY allows women to use it—not men. It also works on the principle that the aggressor is guilty until proven innocent (in direct contravention with Spain's own constitutional laws).

Needless to say, the law may encourage some bitter women to run into the police station and falsely cry abuse for different reasons, such as obtaining custody of children, increasing out-of-court divorce settlements, and plain old-fashioned jealousy.

In all cases the man is arrested and put in prison before facing summary trial in the specially set up courts. The case may end in a tragic outcome for the man, facing prison as well as having to fight the stigma of being a falsely accused "maltratador."

This is the situation in the Spanish political scene in 2013. But the times they are a changing…

Twitter Opened The Pandora Box

Antonio Cantó García del Moral (Valencia, January 14, 1965), better known as Toni Cantó, is a Spanish politician and actor, member of the Congress of Deputies of Spain. He participated in several movies and TV shows. He is one of the few politicians that dared to speak up about discrimination against men in Law. On February 25, he tweeted the following messages:

> "Most domestic violence allegations are false. The law does not enforce them. Statistics are biased"
>
> "Did you know that one-third of deaths for domestic violence are men?"
>
> "2,456 men committed suicide in Spain in 2010, a 78.09% of the total was in the process of separation or divorce"

These statements triggered outrage across the country. Almost immediately he was slayed in the Spanish media and on Twitter for what was considered a "classic machist rant." More than 40 women associations demanded his resignation from the "Commission of Equality", a commission where he owns a seat.

Cantó twittered again:

> "As soon as you mention fake claims they say that you don't care about women's deaths or they call you an abuser. This is what you get in this country"

The Mistake

The pressure didn't stop, and things got even worse for Cantó. He realized that the sources where he obtained his data weren't verified and therefore the figures weren't accurate. At that point he had no other option but to ask for an apology:

Loading...

> "I have to apologize because I didn't double checked my sources, and considering we are talking about domestic violence, this was a bad mistake."

The New Inquisition In Modern Spain

Cantó was called up for questioning before the "Commission for Equality." This is a commission of the Spanish Congress constituted almost entirely by women. In the meantime, some brave political manginas took advantage of the situation to kick him when he was down: "Comrades, today is the day to impale Tony Cantó."

During the session, Cantó was confronted and scolded by a furious group of angry-looking women. The Socialist party representative, Carmen Montón, suggested that he had behaved like an "accomplice of abusers" and would have contributed to "undermine the credibility of the victims."

Cantó only managed to keep his seat after issuing an official apology to the commission. "At any case", he added, "the equality that we are trying to build, goes against men."

Unexpected Support

The year is 2013 and the Spanish political scene is entirely dominated by fundamentalist forces that seem to despise any man who dare to stand up to the sexist, man-hating feminist movement. Well, not entirely, as Canto's statements were not disliked by everyone. Despite all criticism he also received support. Some bloggers expressed him their sympathy, the issue was discussed in forums and Spanish female journalist Anna Grau backed him up. She wrote an article titled "Any woman to support Tony Cantó? Yes, myself". This is a small excerpt:

> In short, Toni Cantó has been stoned in the media, peace and political correctness was seen here and there and a load of crap was swept under the rug. I am not writing this because I have Stockholm syndrome from Tony Cantó or > with the male gender in general. I write this on behalf of all the true battered women who do not deserve the scorn of lying. I write this in defense of all good men and friends who do not deserve to be stuck in the same bag of rapists and murderers. I write this in defense of decency, human dignity and yes, politics. Thanks Tony Cantó for trying to touch some truly painful subject. And please keep digging.

Soon after Anna posted the article, her site received the visit of a number of choleric feminists who expressed their disconformity in different ways.

Read more: You're A Monster If You Don't Support The Welfare State

Never Hack Her Facebook

March 14, 2013 | by Halfbreed | Link | Original Link

I'm involved with two different American white girls. Both in their mid-twenties, close to the same level of sluttiness, one small tattoo each, and typical liberal attitudes toward sex. Recently, I made the mistake of learning too much about one of them.

That's right, I hacked into her computer. She was upstairs, sleeping. She left her laptop right there in front of me, still on. Hacked is a bit of an exaggeration; I guessed her password….her first name, all lower case letters. The browser was up, her Facebook and email accounts still open. I knew I shouldn't have done it, but I did anyway. Just a few clicks and all the intimate details her life were exposed. What a mistake.

I found out damn near everything about her past sex life. Now I know her exact notch count and can put names to faces. I will continue dating her, but it won't be the same. And even though I know the second girl I date is just as slutty, the fact that I don't know her details makes it much easier to tolerate.

Learn from my mistakes. Don't hack her. Never look through her computer, iPhone, Facebook, or email accounts. Because if you do, here are some things you may find:

1. Naked Photos & Videos

A dozen men have naked pictures of her on their phones. She still has those pics saved in her sent folders.

2. The List

Your girl has a list of dudes she's banged. You won't like the number.

3. Alpha Emails/Texts

She doesn't delete emails from her old alpha boyfriends. You'll find out just how easily she gave it up.

4. Beta Emails/Texts

Lots of these, mainly harmless.

5. Cock Pics

These are usually sent to her iPhone by desperate, horny dudes who want to bang her.

Was it alpha to hack into her accounts? Was it beta? Does it really matter? It was a fucking waste of precious time. I've digested the red pill, I know I will never get married or have kids with her. So really, it doesn't matter either way. And it's not just her. We all know most American girls are not worth marrying. So why torture yourself? You will be happier in the relationship if you stay blissfully ignorant. Just assume she is a typical Western slut who is not worthy of bearing you children or carrying your family name.

Knowing everything will dull your affection for her, if you have any. That makes the time you spend together less enjoyable for you. The bottom line: she is not worth the time or energy it takes to hack her.

Read More: Facebook Is Hurting Your Game

Image credit: salihguler

How To Make A Great Company

March 15, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Good To Great uses extensive research to describe what takes a mediocre company into greatness, with chapters focusing on leadership, team assembly, company culture, identifying core value, and breaking through to greatness. It's one of the most popular business books of the 21st century.

The reason we as a culture don't aim for greatness is because everything is already good enough. We're not completely satisfied, but we're comfortable with what we got and don't have the work ethic, talent, or know-how to take our lives or our business to the next level. Most of us will live a life of complete mediocrity, never finding a deep passion that acts as a seed for greatness. This book distills organizational greatness into compelling rules that you can immediately apply to your own business. Here is what I learned:

1. Great leaders work for the organization, not for personal glory or riches. They ask themselves what will make the company great, and then don't take credit for their company's success.

2. Hire smart people, not the position.

3. Never compromise on hiring. You must wait for the good person to come.

4. Don't worry about motivating people. Hire self-motivated people instead.

5. Don't teach discipline. Hire disciplined people. Disciplined people leads to disciplined thought leads to disciplined action.

6. You know you have the right people when you greatly respect your staff, and stay in touch with them after you part ways.

7. Great leaders constantly check their vision against reality and the needs of customers. They have their ear to the ground and can sense change. They don't double down when a plan is failing to get customer responses.

8. Always think of the scary things that may impede future results, and how you can counter them before it hurts your business.

9. A big weakness of being a charismatic leader is that people will not want to tell you bad news. You have to make a conscious effort to discover the facts.

10. Debate is important for the company. It's okay if there are heated arguments.

11. Accept reality, no matter how brutal it may be, and then maintain unwavering faith that you can overcome it.

12. Your business should be built around a simple idea, that when pursued fanatically, causes huge growth.

13. Company strategy should be the intersection of three questions: (1) What are you deeply passionate about? (2) What can you be best in the world at? (3) What drives your economic engine?

14. If you have to motivate yourself to work, you're not passionate about what you're doing. Growth comes from passion.

15. If you can't be the best in the world at what you do, you will never be great. "It's not just about building on strength and competence, but about understanding what your organization truly has the potential to be the very best at and sticking to it." It actually takes a lot of courage to only stick to your core competency.

16. The competitiveness of your industry doesn't matter. You should be able to beat others by being the best. If you can't be the best, then get out.

17. Ignore competitors and simply be the best at what you do.

18. Identify one key metric (e.g., revenue per customer) that would give you insight into the performance of your business.

19. Institute a corporate system but let staff have liberty to apply their own creativity and strengths to it.

Loading...

20. Do not be seduced by unrelated business ventures or deal making.

21. Corporate hierarchies demotivate while simultaneously creating a privileged class that is resented by the workers.

22. Technology can only enhance a great business, but it can't make a bad business great.

23. It's important to have a core value beyond money that acts as an anchor to your company. Your company has to exist for a reason beyond just getting paid.

24. Failing companies keep grasping at straws, acquiring other companies in a desperate attempt at growth instead of focusing on their core value.

And here are my nine favorite quotes from the book:

1.

> The good-to-great companies did not focus principally on what to do to become great; they focuses equally on what not to do and what to stop doing.

2.

> You must maintain unwavering faith that you can and will prevail in the end, regardless of the difficulties, AND at the same time have the discipline to confront the most brutal facts of your current reality, whatever they might be.

3.

> One good-to-great executive said that his best hiring decisions often came from people with no industry or business experience. In one case, he hired a manager who'd been captured twice during the Second World War and escaped both times. "I thought that anyone who could do that shouldn't have trouble with business."

4.

> The moment you feel the need to tightly manage someone, you've made a hiring mistake. The best people don't need to be managed. Guided, taught, led—yes. But not tightly managed.

5.

> The good-to-great companies made a habit of putting their best people on their best opportunities, not their biggest problems. The comparison companies had a penchant for doing just the opposite, failing to grasp the fact that managing your problems can only make you feel good, whereas building your opportunities is the only way to become great.

6.

> The moment a leader allows himself to become the primary reality people worry about, rather than reality being the primary reality, you have a recipe for mediocrity, or worse. This is one of the key reasons why less charismatic leaders often produce better long-term results than their more charismatic counterparts.

7.

> Most companies build their bureaucratic rules to manage the small percentage of wrong people on the bus, which in turn drives away the right people on the bus, which then increases the percentage of wrong people on the bus, which increases the need for more bureaucracy to compensate for incompetence and lack of discipline, which then further drives the right people away, and so forth.

8.

> The single biggest danger in business and life, other than outright failure, is to be successful without being resolutely clear about why you are successful in the first place.

9.

> The single most harmful step you can take in a journey from good to great is to put the wrong people in key positions.

What I liked about this book is that it doesn't only apply to corporations, but to any type of personal business or goal that involves other people. It gives you a great framework for high achievement that you can start applying as you read. Highly recommended.

Read More: “Good To Great” on Amazon

Expensive Woman Seeks Retarded Millionaire

March 16, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Judging by the red pill comments, the article "Why Are So Many Professional Millennial Women Unable To Find Dateable Men?" has already made the rounds in the manosphere. I'll give props to the author, Larissa Faw, for managing to keep it as real as her little hamster could in some portions. Here's a sample that shows a wee bit of clarity:

> But now, [after focusing on becoming a career girl] a growing number of Millennial women are beginning to fret over the unanticipated consequences of prioritizing our careers before love. And I only need to look at my group of friends to see this reality. Again and again, year after year, my successful, gorgeous, and amazing friends remain kiss-less on New Year's Eve. And on Valentine's Day. And on the 4th of July.

I'm usually the first person to laugh my ass off when these types of women take a salty load of reality to the face, but I'm in a good mood today. If we would all lower our shields and sheathe our swords for a moment, we may be able to acknowledge that many women today were not prepared by their parents or society for the consequences of their actions. That doesn't make it right, which is why there are still consequences, but a growing number of 20 and 30-something women have been taught to ignore biology since the day they were born; assured by those they trusted most that there would be little or no penalties for their actions.

Internally, my heart goes out to them. But externally, only my dick goes out to them because I didn't create the problem and I have no moral or ethical obligation to solve it.

Moving on. I came across a response to this article that I wanted to use as a springboard for a different topic. After the author listed fancy clothes and cool apartment décor as a sign of success, and after everyone called her out for amassing debt and urged her to get a grip on reality, Arrow Night commented:

> [Slightly edited for clarity] They have to keep paying, and they have to keep spending because if they lose the house and the car, or fail to keep up with the latest fashions, they "fall into shadow" – and they won't be as attractive as their friends/worst-hated-competitors (same people). And when the "Retard Millionaire" finally shows up, they fear their friends will get rescued instead of them because they "looked" nicer to him as a "package". This is all in women's minds, mind you. Even a "Retard Millionaire" wants a young, hot girl.

This. Bravo, my good sir.

Women who are more concerned with their GRE score than their FICO score give me a runny case of the lulz. Time and time again I meet women who make half my salary, and in every single instance without exception, these women live far better than I do. They have a closet full of top-brand clothes, they have a decked out apartment on a higher floor, they roll in BMWs and Mercedes, they spend $200 per month or more on hair and nails, and they have all the latest mobile gadgets.

I waited until I had a job with tuition reimbursement before I went to grad school. My out-of-pocket expenses for my entire graduate degree including books was just under $6k. My last girlfriend still owes Emory University nearly $97k for a degree in Cognition & Development. I don't even know what the hell that is. Emory is expensive, but I have to assume a large portion of that $97k was for living expenses.

Twice per month, I go to Saks Off 5th and Nordstrom Rack and look for suits. When I find one made by a high-end clothier discounted to under $200, I pick it up and have a Laotian chick tailor it for $17. Most of my trips are in vain because shit is expensive, but over the years, I've put together a collection of tailored threads with timeless style – paid for in cash. My last girlfriend would model outfits for me, and when I said "you look amazing" she'd say "I should – you're looking at $900 not counting the purse and shoes."

Loading...

I cook at home five days per week, and take leftovers to work for lunch. I go out for brunch at my favorite hole-in-the-wall place and then splurge a little for dinner on Saturday. I juice all day Sunday. I haven't had a bar tab since Christmas (I've grown weary of bars and clubs) and if you see me with a drink in my hand, rest assured my company or a client is paying for it. This is one place where my last girlfriend has me beat, because I don't think she has ever paid for a drink or a meal in her life.

I owe $19k to General Motors for a car I could sell to a dealer for $26k and to a private individual for $29k. My last girlfriend put $2,999 plus fees down on a Land Rover lease that she had to pay $535 per month for. We live in a concrete jungle where it takes over an hour to get to the mountains, and you can't park that damn thing anywhere. I sure looked good in it though. Heh.

I have a corporate American Express card for travel that my company pays, and a Discover Card that I use for every purchase that I can so I'll earn Amazon.com dollars (tip: those points add up fast – highly recommended). On the 1st of every month, my Discover Card balance is $0. My last girlfriend had two Visa cards and who knows how many department store cards that, according to her, added up to "only around $11k last time I [she] checked."

My last girlfriend does not a trend make; however, we all know and work with dozens of young women like this. What man in his right freaking mind would marry that much debt? Do you have any idea how many top-shelf hookers or young gold-digging slutty college students you could buy, or how many trips you could take, or how many worthy causes you could support with the amount of cash it would take to just pay off the modern woman's unsecured debt?

Commenter Arrow Night was absolutely right. These women are looking for the retarded millionaire to come along and rescue them from themselves. They want to cash out around the age of 30, pop out a few kids, work less or quit working altogether, and find a man to pick up the tab.

That's why they want their "equal" and that's why they have such high standards. Never mind that their true equal would be so far in debt he couldn't pay his own bills let alone hers, and never mind that their standards are based on a Disney cartoon shown to them over and over by the same parents who led them down the wrong path to begin with.

In the interest of fairness, I understand this phenomenon can't only be assigned to women. Research shows that men tend to spend more and go into debt when they're trying to attract a mate too:

> Consider the case of Macon and Columbus, two Georgia cities located within 100 miles of each other. In Columbus, there are 1.18 single men for every single woman, while in Macon, there are 0.78 single men for every single woman. As it happens, the average consumer debt in Columbus is $3,479 higher, per capita, than it is in Macon. […] When shown images with many more men than women, men in the study were willing to reduce their savings by 42 percent, and were willing to assume 84 percent more debt. "When men see more men than women in these photograph arrays, they become more likely to want to spend money more quickly, even to the point of going into debt."

If you're interested, you can read the full article here.

But I don't date men, so I don't really care what they do with their money. The bottom line is that all these "gorgeous and amazing women" the author writes about are a massive liability to the very men they seek to procure. "Why Are So Many Professional Millennial Women Unable To Find Dateable Men?"

Because we're avoiding them for a list of reasons that continues to grow every day.

Read More: The Strong & Independent Woman Translator

3 Ab Exercises Every Man Must Know

March 17, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

(Image credit)

Have you ever had a six pack? If not, you should change that. Honestly, it's a simple process. Depending on how much body-fat you have – it may take some time. But the time will pass regardless, so why not just do it. On top of that, having a solid core will benefit you in numerous other ways. For example, one of the leading causes of lower back pain is a weak core (1).

Other benefits include (2):

- Improved balance
- Injury prevention
- Enhanced stabilization during dynamic movements

Definition: The Core
The core is comprised of more than just your abdominals. It includes the lumbar spine (lower back), pelvis, and hip joint (3). It literally forms the core of your body. But I know you really just want that six-pack, and that is just what I will give you.

How To Get A Six Pack

Abs are built in the gym, and sculpted in the kitchen. – A Wise Man

I do not care what you heard – no specific exercise or magical vegetable will get you a six-pack. You must reach a low enough level of body-fat so that your abdominal muscles are visible. Period. That is the only way. The muscles are always there, they are just covered by a layer of fat for most people. In a future article, I will discuss what a low body-fat diet consists of.

That said, building larger abs in the gym will allow them to become visible at higher levels of bodyfat, but I still do not advocate spending a huge amount of your time in the gym doing ab exercises. It is simply inefficient and your time is better spent on other lifts. The focus of ab work should be on strengthening your core as a whole.

The Only 3 Ab Exercises You Will Ever Need

The simple fact of the matter is that if you are already performing a variety of compound exercises (and you should be!), your abs and core are already being worked and strengthened, albeit indirectly.

For example, your abdominals are a major stabilizer during the squat. A sufficiently strong core is necessary to move any significant amount of weight. Think about it this way – if your core is unable to support the weight you place on your back – your body will simply fold.

However, I still do recommend working your abs directly. Next, I will go over the 3 basic types of abdominal movements, and my favorite exercise for each one. These movements cover all of the major muscles of the abdominal region. Strengthen your abs by progressing in these exercises and you will both reap the practical benefits listed above as well as build stronger, bigger ab muscles, allowing them to become visible at a higher level of body fat.

I suggest doing just 2-3 sets of each exercise per week. You may complete them all on the same day or on separate days. I work out three to four days per week and perform one ab exercise per workout, at the end of the workout.

Loading...

1. Flexion And Extension: The Hanging Leg Raise

The most common type of ab exercise. You flex and extend your core to work your abdominal region, with a focus on the rectus abdominis (aka. the six pack).

Progression (Advance when you can perform over 10-15 repetitions at a given level)

1. Raise your knees in a dip station, where your back is supported.
2. Raise your knees, hanging from a pull up bar.
3. Raise your extended legs, hanging from a pull up bar (pictured above).
4. Raise your extended legs, with a dumbbell in between your feet.

Other flexion/extension exercises: Decline sit-up, sit-up.

2. Rotation: Plate Twist

Rotational exercises work your whole abdominal region but focus on the obliques (internal and external). Sitting down, simply hold your hands together, or a weight, above your torso, lift your feet off the floor, and move the weight side-to-side, almost touching the floor on each repetition. Progress by both adding repetitions and weight.

Other rotational exercises: Cable Rotation, side dumbbell crunch.

3. Stabilization: Plank

Stabilization exercises work your entire abdominal region, but the stress is placed upon the transverse abdominis – the deepest abdominal muscle that wraps around your spine. This muscle is responsible for a the majority of your overall balance and stability, so it must not be neglected. Progress by planking for longer durations, and then planking on a stability ball.

General Guidelines

1. Draw in your navel (ie. pull your belly button towards your spine) throughout each movement. It increases pelvic stabilization and transverse abdominis activation (4).
2. Brace your core (ie. flex/tighten your core/abs). Helps properly recruit and activate the core muscles (3).

Read More: The Romanian Deadlift

References

1. Hodges, Paul W., and Carolyn A. Richardson. “Inefficient muscular stabilization of the lumbar spine associated with low back pain: a motor control evaluation of transversus abdominis.” Spine 21.22 (1996): 2640-2650.
2. Barr, Karen P., Miriam Griggs, and Todd Cadby. “Lumbar stabilization: core concepts and current literature, Part 1.” American journal of physical medicine & rehabilitation 84.6 (2005): 473-480.
3. Arokoski, Jari P., Taru Valta, and Olavi Airaksinen. “Back and abdominal muscle function during stabilization exercises.” Archives of physical medicine and rehabilitation

82.8 (2001): 1089-1098.
4. Richardson, Carolyn A., et al. “The relation between the transversus abdominis muscles, sacroiliac joint mechanics, and low back pain.” Spine 27.4 (2002): 399-405.

Enjoy The American Decline

March 17, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Very few men are connecting the dots of politics, feminism, and economics, but there is one who is making a writer's living out of it: Captain Capitalism. His new book, Enjoy The Decline, describes how you must emotionally detach yourself from America's decline and pillage what you can.

> Whether you'd like to admit it or not, the United States is in terminal decline. Making it even worse, is its inevitable demise will not be at the hands of a stronger foreign force, but rather at the hands of its own unfathomably ignorant citizens brainwashed and duped by its own unfathomably evil citizens. It is an internal cancer that is eating away at our beloved nation and despite our best efforts it is spreading.

He believes the biggest accelerator of our decline are entitlements in the form of social security, medicare, and welfare…

> If you do not support yourself and rely on the production of others you are by definition a parasite… This, by default, makes the people who work and pay the taxes to subsidize these parasites the host or slave.
>
> […]
>
> 70% of your tax money goes to other people, meaning the government is not an agent of governance as much as it is an agent of wealth-redistribution.
>
> […]
>
> The US government has gone from a minimalist-governing entity that served the people by leaving them be and letting them be as productive as possible, to a tool of the parasitic classes to confiscate the wealth of the productive classes.
>
> […]
>
> The social contract between producers and parasites is no longer one of temporary, emergency assistance, needed solely to ensure an economic parasite returns to production as quickly as possible. It is now a political class of slave-masters that purposely, knowingly, and actively vote to live off of the producers.

This book is vehemently anti-socialism, believing in a "sink or swim" philosophy where money should not be taken from the strong to support the weak, especially since it's the weak who will vote for politicians to give away more taxpayer money. We've reached a point where the American people will never vote for someone who will reduce benefits or promote a hard work ethic.

> It isn't the government or the state that you are fighting as much as it is the stupidity of the other 299,999,999 Americans. You by your little lonesome, no matter how right and correct, cannot overcome such odds and will have to suffer the consequences of the majority's ignorance. Acknowledging these lopsided odds allows you to let go and enjoy life.
>
> […]
>
> …any increase in the size of the government has to be paid for by its people, thereby necessarily lessening the individual.

He delineates between liberal and conservative men…

> The difference between the psychologies of liberal men and conservative/libertarian men is that of competition. Conservative men embrace competition. Liberal men avoid it. Conservative men want to achieve excellence. Liberal men want to achieve equality and fairness.
>
> […]
>
> Loading…
> The reason why liberal men are against competition is usually because they are uglier and weaker. Thus, it is in their best interests to have an egalitarian society where they don't have to compete. Consequently, better looking and stronger men favor free market ideologies because they can leverage their strength, looks, and tenacity to improve their lives.

Women get the brunt of his attacks, especially those who put career before family…

> If your career is more important than your children languishing in some daycare facility, that screams to the world, "I'm more important than everyone else, including my children."
>
> […]
>
> If you pursue a career and it doesn't pay off, you have done nothing more than waste your youth and cripple your financial future.
>
> […]
>
> You don't have to be a model every day, but if your husband isn't pawing at you at least one a week, then you are failing.

As for the solution, Clarey suggests a life of minimalism where you keep your income and tax rate low to avoid the fruits of your labor going to feed parasites. He advises on how to pillage the treasury to get government benefits that others are taking advantage of and how to execute his "Smith and Wesson retirement plan" for when it's time to make your final exit. He also gives some tips on how to survive (or not survive) a SHTF scenario. He ultimately believes that the key to a nationwide problem lies with the individual and his choices. It's better to safely spectate the decline instead of becoming victimized by it.

You may think that he's proposing a fantasy lifestyle, but if you read his blog you already know that he practices what he preaches. He dropped out of the rat race to pursue travel, write, spend time with friends, drink good liquor, and pursue his own hobbies. He seems to be sincerely enjoying the decline.

The book has three weaknesses. First, it talked almost exclusively about the poor parasites, not the finance parasites who require trillions of bailout money to stay afloat and who do just as much—if not more—harm to the country's balance sheet. Second, minimalism doesn't make the vagina wet. He already has a girlfriend, but for men trying to get laid, you need modest income to access women, go on dates, and provide a comfortable bed where sex can occur. I think he understands that with passages like this…

> Do you have any idea how marketable you are if you are over 30 and: (1) Don't have kids, (2) Never been married, (3) Never been to jail, (4) Don't live at home, and (5) Have a job.

Third, you will get passed by if you adopt a lifestyle of minimalism. Those closest to you will achieve more and make more money than you. Are you ready for that? There is money to be made even in this shitty economy and the verdict is out on how much you can make before it starts to negatively impact your happiness.

Nonetheless, I enjoyed the book. It made me think hard about the future and what the best course should be for men like me. While he adopted a course of minimalism in America, I have adopted a course of minimalism-lite in Eastern Europe. As different as our lives are, I think we're both enjoying the decline in our own way.

Read More: "Enjoy The Decline" on Amazon

How To Approach Girls On Airplanes

March 18, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

[image]
I travel quite a bit on airplanes, but I rarely find myself seated next to a pretty girl. I got tired of depending on luck, so I've come up with the following strategy to improve my odds.

1. When booking your flight, reserve a seat in the last row of the plane.

2. Be the absolute last person to get on the airplane. I don't get on until I hear the "last call" announcement. Otherwise there will be stragglers who get on after you.

3. Sit next to the girl you like. It doesn't matter if the plane is full of empty rows—simply seat yourself next to the prettiest girl on the airplane. Don't worry, she's not going to ask for your seat assignment (and neither will anyone else). By reserving a seat in the last row, you can scope out the entire plane before making a decision.

4. When the plane starts to descend, look towards the girl and say, "Is this your first time in [city name]?" (I stole the line from an elderly Polish businessman who successfully used it on me.) Have a chat about the city. I like to wait until the end because I don't want the pressure of having to talk to her for the entire flight. Descents usually take 20-30 minutes, which is a good amount of time to game and build attraction without having the conversation go stale.

5. Get her number.

It's really that easy. You can also do this on long-distance buses and trains. The key is to get on last, ignore your seat assignment, and sit next to a girl you like. If someone claims the seat, just play dumb and chances are you won't even have to get up.

Read Next: Showing Value Before The Approach

About the Author

Roosh created ROK in October 2012. You can visit his blog at RooshV.com or follow him on Twitter and Facebook.

The Harem, The Tribe, And The Pride

March 18, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

"You can't be one kind of man and another kind of president. You cannot separate the character of the president from the character of the presidency."

I was a young man when George H.W. Bush spoke those words regarding Democratic nominee Bill Clinton in 1998. Growing up in a strong conservative family, this idea was not new to me – in fact, it was our mantra. The good man was a man of his word, dependable, honest and fair. The good man didn't behave one way with some people and a different way with others.

I can't even begin to count the number of times during the first 18 years of my life that my father would get upset with me for a devious action and say "Thatch, quote James 1:8 for me."

"A double minded man is unstable in all of his ways."

There's something to be said for biblical wisdom, and there's something to be said for our 41st president's take on a man's character. When two men, one who was Jesus' brother and one who ascended to the most powerful office in the modern world have something to say, it's probably worth a listen even if you don't agree with them.

And I don't. I don't agree with them at all.

What worked for a guy born in 1924 and what worked for a guy who shared a childhood home with the Messiah doesn't quite cut it in today's world. Show me a man who is dependable, and I'll show you a man who is predictable. Show me a man who is predictable, and I'll show you a man who is used.

Trustworthiness, honor, love, and dependability are characteristics of the modern red pill man, as are shrewdness, viciousness, duplicity, judgment and perfidy. It is the double-minded man – the good and terrible man; the man who can be counted on for nothing and everything; the man of grace and wrath; the man arrogance and humble countenance – who survives and thrives in 2013.

Righteousness may have served our fathers and grandfathers well; traditional and dependable "good man" traits may have yielded them the love of a faithful wife and the respect of their children; dependability and honesty may have garnered them the loyalty of friends and the company they retired from; their uncompromising steadfastness to their principles may have solidified their legacy and caused their enemies to tremble with fear; but those days are gone.

The world has changed, and if we want what they had, we must change with change. If we want the same love, respect and admiration our forefathers enjoyed, we must adapt to our surroundings and meet new challenges in a new way.

Today's beta male would have been a national treasure 50 years ago – a pillar of society and the backbone of the greatest nation on earth. But now he's a mid-level manager living in a bachelor pad on the wrong side of the tracks, trying to scrape by on 26% of his earned income after taxes, alimony, and child support. He is a father without children, a provider without a wife, and a dickless wonder with mommy issues if he dares to question why. Every day he is inundated with social messages designed to make him feel like he isn't doing his part. He is a rapist in waiting, a misogynist, a bigot, and a loser until he proves himself and is pardoned by a legion White Knights and their feminist dependents.

Enough already.

Put the Bible on the shelf where it belongs, bury Grandpa's lessons in a plot right beside him, tell every little shit-mouthed college student feminist to burn in hell, and acknowledge that while all men are created equal, it's where they go from there that should determine how you deal with them.

Every man reading this article should ruthlessly judge every human being he knows, label them, and divide them into three distinct groups: The harem, the tribe and the pride.

The Harem

Anything goes. These are the women who serve as your playthings. There is no honor, loyalty, or trust among any members of the harem. It is a loosely managed and dynamic group designed to yield as much pleasure for as little investment as possible. Lie to them, lead them on, waste their time, tease them, fuck them good, be good to them when they serve your purpose and give them the drama they crave when they don't – and they'll love you for it.

Loading...
To disagree with that last statement is to out yourself as a woman or a man who's never known one.

The Tribe

The tribe is comprised of those with whom you've formed a symbiotic relationship. This would include your LTR girlfriend, most of your friends, all of your acquaintances, your coworkers, and your boss. Here, honesty and integrity are tools to be used only when they meet one of two criteria: 1) They benefit you and the other party, or 2) They benefit you and not the other party.

The tribe can vote you off the reservation without reason or notice, so shrewdness is a must. Match kindness with kindness, but when there's a conflict, never let your enemy live to fight another day. If your girlfriend crosses the line, show her the door and find her replacement. If a friend cockblocks you, delete his number and never speak him again. If a coworker criticizes you and interferes with your ability to earn a living, summon the demons of hell and ask their guidance on how to undermine his career and send him to the unemployment line.

The tribe must be a supportive culture, or else it has no value. Everyone in the tribe must pull his weight and contribute, and you must contribute to earn your place as well. Play fair in a fair game, cheat the cheaters, give only as good as you get, eschew loyalty and join a new tribe when it's necessary for your survival, and apologize for nothing.

The Pride

The pride consists of those who look to you for leadership and protection and who deserve your leadership and protection. Depending on your situation, this may include your immediate family, your children, a good wife, and that very small group of friends you know for certain would have your back no matter what.

In the pride, there is forgiveness and understanding. In the pride, a man's word is his bond. In the pride, a man makes sacrifices which are recognized and respected. The pride is fiercely defended and never compromised; a true inner sanctum and Holy of Holies where a man communes with his family. Everything that is good for the man is good for the pride, and everything that is good for the pride is good for the man. All blessings and all worthwhile sacrifice comes from the pride.

There is not one social problem that befalls modern man that cannot be attributed in some way to his inability to discern who belongs in the harem, who belongs in the tribe, and who belongs in the pride.

Someone reading this article has a good wife in his tribe when she belongs in his pride.

Someone reading this article has a girlfriend in his pride when she belongs in his tribe.

Someone reading this article has a little slut in his tribe or pride when she belongs in his harem.

Judge ruthlessly, audit continually, and reassign people to one of the three groups when circumstances dictate. Slap a big label on everyone you meet – basically do the total opposite of what feminist society and manginas tell you to do. Their goal is for you to never learn lessons so that you'll meet each and every one of them with an open mind, open heart, open arms, and an open wallet. They cannot perform their parasitic function without a willful host, and any rational thought you put in to managing your own life or determining who should benefit from your efforts is a tremendous threat to their social machine.

Say no without apology, push back without reservation, and determine for yourself who belongs in your harem, your tribe and your pride.

Read More: The Physical Decline Of Modern Men

How I Beat Social Anxiety

March 19, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

It was shaping up to be a great evening. I had tickets to see a concert with my girlfriend and my best friend, a welcome upgrade from the usual college Saturday of keg parties and greasy latenight pizza. As soon as we got to the crowded venue, though, things began to speed up. Everyone started moshing, the music was unbearably loud, and people were constantly invading my space. Something snapped and I couldn't be there anymore. I ran out of the club and back to my dorm room, locking myself inside. My friends tried to call me but I turned off my phone and went to sleep. I didn't leave my room for the rest of the weekend.

It had started during my sophomore year of college. For some reason meeting new people had become terrifying. I had developed irrational fears of calling someone by the wrong name, eating in front of people, not speaking quickly enough in friendly conversation, going grocery shopping, talking on the phone, and looking people in the eye when speaking with them. What was wrong with me?

[image]

When I went home for break, I explained the situation to our family doctor and he put me on medication for social anxiety. It was only a low dose of SSRI, but nevertheless I found myself dependent on medication to "even me out." True, it did prevent the pangs of anxiety that had become a regular occurrence, but it somehow made life's highs less high. I stayed on the medication or the next two years through the end of college, though not without detriment to other areas of my life. The medicine killed my sex drive. I gained weight because I didn't have the motivation to work out. And I had to wake up each day knowing that I was somehow "broken" and reliant on Big Pharma to give me a normal life.

After graduation I was able to get a one-in-a-million internship that I knew would be a make-or-break opportunity in a competitive industry. I also knew that forming positive relationships would be the cornerstone of my ability to succeed, and appearing to be an awkward weirdo would kill any chance of achieving my dream. Though my social anxiety was technically being "managed," the pharmaceuticals regulating my life would prevent me from being the dynamic, creative person I had to be to succeed.

I decided to make a change.

The day before my internship began, I quit my medication and decided to spend the summer combating my anxiety head-on. I was thousands of miles from home with no friends or support network. I barely had any money. I knew that I might fail miserably, but I owed it to myself to fight it head-on before resigning myself to a mediocre life lived in a medicated haze. These are the techniques I used in the intervening three months:

1. Find The One Reason

"General life improvement" isn't a powerful enough reason to keep you dedicated to this arduous process. Unless you want to lead a lonely existence with a solitary job, you have to come to grips that things are broken, and they will not fix themselves. Do you want to talk to prettier girls? Do you want to excel in a job that involves interacting with people? You must understand at the most basic level that none of those things will happen unless you can overcome your anxiety. Articulate the burning desire that your anxiety is preventing you from achieving. Write it down. Put it in your wallet. Say it to yourself in the mirror every morning. Don't lose sight of your goal.

Loading...

2. Eat Better

There is increasing evidence, both circumstantial and scientific, that suggests that a standard high-carb american diet is linked to depression and anxiety. Cut wheat, sugar, dairy, and legumes out of your diet. Eat grass fed meats and get your healthy fats, which are essential for optimum brain functioning.

3. Exercise

Exercise has the dual effect of reducing levels of the stress hormone cortisol, and building up your confidence. If you take up an organized sport, especially a martial art, it can help you deal with the adrenaline surges from talking to new people and other anxiety triggers.

4. Obliterate Your Comfort Zone

Remember the saying that you should do something that scares you every day? That advice sucks. If you have this problem, you must do five things that absolutely terrify you every day. With social anxiety, it may be as simple as walking into your boss's office for a chat, talking about the weather with the new girl in accounting, or going to the grocery store during peak hours. This is the most painful part of the process, but eventually you will desensitize yourself to the physiological and emotional fight-or-flight response.

5. Visualize Other Peoples' Thought Process

This step is similar to cognitive behavioral therapy, a common clinical treatment for anxiety. The root feeling of social anxiety is shame for how other people see you or feel about you. If you trip over the sidewalk, people will laugh for five seconds and then go about their day, forgetting about you as quickly as you entered their life. But someone with social anxiety may agonize over this moment for the rest of their day, allowing an isolated incident to bully their consciousness indefinitely. By attempting to put yourself in someone else's mind, you can (correctly) convince yourself that nobody really gives a shit about you because they are too busy thinking about themselves and their own problems. In Day Bang, Roosh has an excellent section about visualizing the worst possible scenario to overcome approach anxiety. You must realize that anything that could happen to you is far from your anxiety's worst case scenario.

That summer away from home was full of pain, joy, hardship, and ultimately victory. It wasn't easy or pleasant, but applying the strategy outlined above over the long term freed me from slavery to my brain chemistry. Nowadays I have a great job. I am confident enough to approach women during either day or night, have no problem talking with strangers, and feel comfortable in my own skin. Few would describe me as the life of the party, but even as a natural introvert I'm a social guy and can thrive among a variety of crowds.

The anxiety buried deep in the back of my mind will always be a part of me. But the essence of masculinity is taking ownership of situations in your life, and constantly improving at your deficiencies. I have given you the tools. Go out and beat it.

Don't Miss: Internet Dating Killed My Game

The Only 4 Exercises You Need

March 19, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

There is a phrase K.I.S.S. (keep it simple stupid) that I like to use a lot. And when it comes to fitness and working out, a lot of people need to learn to do that. While personally I complicate my workouts, primarily because I have access to a gym, it is a fact that you do not need a complex workout regiment to get in shape. Doing different styles of exercises does help maximize your results, anyone with dedication can get fit with the following four exercises. The key will be doing them in larger amounts than the average person.

Push-ups:

This will work your chest, back, biceps triceps, shoulders, and core all in one exercise. Additionally, there are multiple variations you can use from standard, to triangle, fingertip, knuckle, clapping, and elevated. Using the weight of your own body in multiple formats can get you the same reaction as a bench press, including decline, and incline responses.

Pull-ups:

Similar to push-ups your primary resistance comes from your own body weight. You too get the use of your back, chest, biceps, triceps, shoulder, and core. The most common grips are neutral, standard, and wide, but chin-ups are frequented as well. Depending on your level of advancement you can combine the movement of leg raises with your pull-ups for an extra abdominal push.

Running:

As simple as it sounds people forget about the concepts of interval and terrain training. Hiking and jogging give two different responses but can technically be classified as the same exercise. Combining those two with sprints will give your legs an overall workout to tone and shred muscles while building mass. I will admit that shoving around heavy weights is easier for muscle-building on your legs, since historically humans just walked a lot and carried supplies. Combine weighted-bag hikes, sprinting for muscle tearing, and jogging and you'll have yourself a total leg workout while also making sure your cardio stays up to par.

Loading…

Crunch/Sit-up:

This is one of the most known about and most debated core exercises out there, but it simply works. Failure with situps and crunches is primarily due to people's failure to address their diet and fat burning in other areas. A thousand crunches doesn't do anything if you're shoving a Big Mac down your throat three times a day. Alternate between situps, crunches, and side crunches for a four-move killer ab workout to help your midsection. Combining the crunch and sit-up with the results of running, push-ups, and pull-ups will give you an overall strong core.

There you have it—four simple yet effective exercises that will get the average person in shape with a decent physique. Just doing something is usually half the battle, and those four exercises hit most of the essential areas without having to do anything too crazy. The key is to take the basic movements and use them in as many variations as possible.

While doing standard push-ups, pull-ups, crunches, and going for a mile jog will get you some results, doing three-position pull-ups, three-position push-ups, sprinting 100 yards eight times, four-variation crunches, and then jogging a mile will boost your body like crazy.

Don’t Miss: Working Out Favors Men

How To Bang A Persian Girl

March 19, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

Ahh Persian girls. The sometimes delicate, always materialistic, often complicated and usually bitchy flowers of the female species. They vary from outright gorgeous to downright hideous with excess hair and cycloptic unibrows. On the bright side, a common ground most share is that they are traditional and feminine. They like dinner dates, they want to being picked up, they enjoy wearing dresses and heels – essentially they embrace being a woman.

Let's keep these generalizations going. Many live at home with their parents and learned how to cook and clean the tables from their elders. They care about their appearances so much so that they fear leaving the house without looking their best – be it make up, hair, heels, or that expensive dress. And of course, they are materialistic – they care what you drive, they have one or more Chanel bags, they'll invade your city's fancy bars/restaurants, and so on. They tend to hang out in large groups of other Persian girls and bounce around town in these flocks.

Although not my cup of tea, I know a substantial population of men find them sexy and desirable, yet are left clueless on how to bed one. Having lived in very Persian dominated communities all my life, I've come to know a thing or two about Persian girls. To ring in the Persian New Year, I thought what better way to celebrate than a quick nuts and bolts guide I put together on how to bang a Persian girl (click on the image for the full version).

Legend

Persian Game: It's a variation of standard Western game. You bring the wit, humor, “negs” as you call them, cocky attitude, and ability to demonstrate value. However, where it differs is you have to put forth some old school traditional game. You make all the plans, you pick her up, you are the man in this relationship. In a way, it falls into a bit of Eastern Game. Style is very important. So is money. You pay for everything. No cheaping out on dinners/dates/drinks. You don’t have to take her to $300 dinners or anything like that, but let’s just say happy hour and tacos is not going to cut it.

Private Man Persian Game: The same as Persian Game above, except you add in an aura of being very private. In her eyes, at least. You don’t discuss bangs with your friends. You don’t hang out with other Persians. You don’t know anyone in her social circle, or her family. It’s one of the few times where not being in her social circle is a huge advantage. These girls care about reputation more than anything, and you have to mitigate the fear of them being deemed a slut.

Traditional Persian Jew: This is a sliding scale as there is no magic question that determines whether she is or is not a TPJ. While not exhaustive, here are some clues that she is not a TPJ:

- She does not live at home, or has not lived at home for a period of more than just her college years
- She does not listen to exclusively Persian music
- She doesn’t care what you drive
- When asked who her friends are, less than 50% are Persian
- Her best friend is not Persian
- She goes out a lot on Friday nights (traditional Shabbat dinner for Jewish families)
- She has a history of dating non-Persian guys
- She eats pork
- She’s backpacked internationally (hotel stays with her bff on daddy’s dime doesn’t count)
- She has any tattoo whatsoever, wherever

Welcome To America Game: This one is rather simple. You are the wonderful man that is going to show her what America is really like, including its sexual liberation. You treat her like a foreigner that is just visiting – take her to tourist spots, show her around town, fun restaurants. You still need to have some Persian Game, but it can be lightened up. When it comes to sex, trust me she is dying to see what it’s about. Reassure her that this is the way it happens in America, sex is common and expected among people that are attracted and like each other. Sex happens quickly. Blowjobs are fun and exciting! Take a standard virgin’s curiosity and amplify it exponentially and you have the recently imported Persian girl who is more than happy to indulge herself in the Western experience.

Conclusion

As I mentioned these are generalizations. Inevitably there is always that random slut who lives at home and cooks ghormeh sabzi, yet will ground and pound any dick in sight. While it takes a bit of tweaking to your game (e.g. refusing to buy a drink = cheap/unmanly), for the large part the formula above will work. And even if you don't succeed penetrating the Persian girl society, at least you can can say you put in that Spartan effort.

Read Next: How To Bang A Finnish Girl In Helsinki

Why High Heels Are Attractive On Women

March 20, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

If you think about it, there isn't a strong logical reason for a man to prefer heels on women. While it has a good aesthetic in revealing the outline of a woman's foot, it doesn't show more skin, and the heels also don't perk up the ass as much as you think (try it yourself in the mirror by lifting your heels a couple inches. So why do heels appeal to men such as myself?

Because it makes women appear weak and defenseless. It brings out the masculine nature of men who want to protect women.

If a lion emerges from the jungle and there are two women in front of you—one in running shoes and one in heels, who will you instinctively help first? The woman in heels can not run away, so you must swoop her up and take her to safety. The woman in sneakers can probably make it on her own. Anything that makes a woman unable to protect herself will trigger the primitive area in a masculine man's brain to save her, for in ancestral times men had to actively protect their families to ensure their survival.

Loading…

Every now and then I run into a man who doesn't care at all for heels. These men may be smart, and they may get laid, but they're not masculine. There is a weak urge in their core to be a protector and defender. They're completely content with a woman who wears dirty Converse shoes and can protect herself.

In countries with masculine men, you will find the bulk of women in heels—women who are thin and fragile, who have long, impractical hair and nails that don't help them in the case the lion makes his appearance. To feel masculine and strong, these foreign men demand their women appear feminine and "weak." In the United States, however, the women want to feel masculine and strong. That leaves only one remaining role for the men, a role that I hope you are not filling.

Read Next: The Perfect Woman: Heels

How Young Women Promote The Hookup Culture

March 21, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

People wonder why it is that the hookup culture has risen as rapidly as it has, with some still seemingly taken aback by millennial apathy towards dating. Too often, those concerned with these developments look immediately to blame men for the devaluation of relationships.

Men are dogs, some say.

“Young guys just want to play the field,” say others.

A few posit that “Men don’t value good women.”

Some just ask themselves (and society in general) “Where did all the good men go?”

The list goes on. Take a trip around Tumblr, Facebook or any mainstream media/social media venue online and you'll see a host of critiques of male failure to uphold the relationship. These shortsighted arguments that look solely to the male sex as the source of the hookup culture's rise ignore a crucial reality: the role of young women, and the conscious effort on their part to move away from the meaningful relationship and toward the more informal hookup culture.

Recently, Leslie Bell took the time to expose this reality on The Atlantic:

> Ambitious young women in their 20s feel they shouldn't want relationships with men at this phase in their lives…
>
> …When I talk to real women, as I did in researching my book on sexual freedom and 20-something women, I hear young women's mixed feelings about relationships. Some young women deeply desire meaningful relationships with men, even as they feel guilty about those desires. Many express the same sentiment again and again: "Why do I, a young and highly educated woman in the 21st century, value relationships with men so highly?" To do so feels like a betrayal of themselves, of their education, and of their achievements…
>
> … Katie, a 25-year-old woman I spoke with as part of my research, confided that she worried her single-minded pursuit of a graduate degree might limit her ability to meet a man with whom she could build a life… She felt deeply ashamed by such thoughts, worried that they signaled weakness and dependence, qualities she did not admire. To put such a high premium on relationships was frightening to Katie. She worried that it meant she wasn't liberated and was still defined by traditional expectations of women. I have heard Katie's dilemma from countless young women.

Here rests my largest critique of modern feminism. Somewhere along the line, it began to preach a message that went beyond the mere encouragement of equal treatment and the maintenance of female choice. Instead, it began sending the message that to be a truly "empowered" woman in the feminist mold, females had to move entirely away from "old" ways (traditional relationships, marriage, motherhood, etc).

The end result? Women who feel guilty building anything meaningful with a male. They are more consciously working toward a model of “new femininity” constructed for them by modern feminism, and somewhere along the line they’ve been getting the message that they cannot get there with a man or by adhering in any way to more traditional models of femininity. The movement that claimed to be all about offering greater choice for women has, in the end, left them with only one real option—adhere to the new “independent,” career-oriented feminist model of womanhood.

And yet people wonder why so many have gotten the impression that feminism is anti-male. I mean, how could a movement that seems to have played such a large role in encouraging young women to view the maintenance of meaningful relationships with men as hindrances to their future and “betrayals” of their femininity be considered in any way anti-male?

But I digress. Continuing with the article…

> Laura Hamilton and Elizabeth Armstrong, sociologists at University of California, Merced and the University of Michigan studied relationship patterns among upper-middle-class female college students, and they discovered that these women believed relational commitments were supposed to take a backseat to self-development. And that young women often found relationships to be “greedy,” demanding excessive amounts of time and energy that detracted from the main tasks of college—educational achievements and meeting people. Hamilton and Armstrong found that young women often sought protection from relationships that could “derail their ambition.”

And herein rests a key driver of the modern hookup culture. Many girls have become just as allergic to commitment as young men are often stereotyped to be. Women are now playing just as large a part as men in the perpetuation of hookup culture.

Many men are still asking young women out, going on dinner dates, calling, and adhering to the other “gentlemanly” rules established for them in a much older age and still outwardly pined for by certain female critics. What they’re finding is that young women are becoming less and less responsive to this behavior—the more serious the men get, the more distant the girls begin to make themselves, ostensibly fearing for their “independence”.

Given such a reality, what is the appropriate male response?

Quit going on dinner dates. Quit asking girls out in a formal manner. Don’t call. Cease all manner of “gentlemanly” behavior you may have learned as a child via your parents or the Disney Channel. Replace dinners and other traditional dates with bar/pong dates, and allow late night “booty-call” texts to supplant phone calls and traditional methods of asking a girl out. In short, do less.

And lo and behold, what do men find as they move to these more informal methods of courtship? Far more enthusiastic responses from their female peers and more sexual success. The girls may complain to their peers about a given man’s lack of commitment, but his low investment offers no threat to her perceived identity as a “liberated woman”, and is therefore more acceptable than anything else.

The adaptations we are seeing from men in the dating world are a natural response to female choice. The reality is that women have begun to vote with their feet. Their actions are sending the clear message that they do not want to be stuck in the trappings of traditional relationships, and they are running away from the men who threaten to offer them. They have fought quite vigorously to remove themselves from the confines of traditional dating, and continue to battle in order to maintain that distance.

We do not live in an age where the male retains unquestioned dominance/control over the sexual and social behaviors of his female peers, and it is for this reason that men have no choice but to respect these efforts and the decisions they seem to symbolize.

Girls not responding to traditional approaches about commitment and relationships? Well, you can’t make them want what they don’t want, so just don’t provide it to them. Problem solved!

Slowly, the reality of growing female aversion to commitment is dawning on society and more people are beginning to talk about it. Any discourse, however, will prove unproductive if people fail to acknowledge the fem-centric nature of the trend. Women are the gatekeepers of sex—men (at least in Western nations like the USA) do not get to directly control all aspects of female sexuality as they once did, and it is women who decide which men receive sexual companionship, when they get it, and on what conditions it is given.

Right now, those conditions are increasingly requiring young men to minimize investment. Female action has determined this, and only female action can reverse it. If young women want more male investment in relationships, then they'll need to accept it more often when it is offered. Until such a time, men will just continue to do what works.

Read Next: American Women Are Mad They Aren't Courted Anymore

About the Author

Athlone McGinnis is a young man whose background gives him unique insight on sociological and cultural changes that are happening today. His column runs every Monday.

Modern Woman In Wanting To Be For Herself, Has Destroyed Herself

March 21, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

---

Take a look at the political debates raging today, and compare them to those of just ten years ago. In America, women can now be infantry, and homosexual marriage is gaining legal sanction, state by state. A man who was a Democrat by the standards of 2000 or even 2008, might well be a Republican now. Put two and two together, and it becomes clear that our political discourse is utterly hostile to anyone but morons and children – who else would reverse their views so quickly? It's impossible to be principled when your beliefs are just a rehash of the latest propaganda blasts from Hollywood or talk radio. To be educated, one must read broadly, across time and place, and that means reading principally the works of dead men.

Recently, I came upon the writings of a man who lived more than fifty years ago, and yet his writings on the sexes are more apt than ever.

Julius Evola

Julius Evola was a philosopher in the early to mid-20th century. Born a noble, he was an intermittent admirer and ally of fascism in Italy, and even of Nazism in Germany. Evola sought to trace the threads of the great civilizations, and identify what they had in common. He draws on sources as disparate as Aztec mythology and ancient Indian rites, and writes on many topics. And his work is not without controversy. Thankfully, there is no rule that one must agree with all of a man's work before accepting any of it. Evola is not very well known, but with the internet and translations of his works spreading, discussion of his ideas is rapidly increasing.

Here, I'd like to highlight some of Evola's thought on the sexes. Instead of reviewing or criticizing his work, I have posted some interesting excerpts and comments, and I encourage others to explore his works on their own. Quotations are taken from Revolt Against The Modern World, unless otherwise noted.

The Essence of Femininity: Selfless Dedication To Another

> This occurs when the feminine principle, whose force is centrifugal, does not turn to fleeting objects but rather to a "virile" stability in which she finds a limit to her "restlessness." Stability is then transmitted to the feminine principle to the point of intimately transfiguring all of its possibilities… What is needed therefore is a radical "conversion" of the feminine principle to the opposite principle; moreover, it is absolutely necessary for the masculine principle to remain wholly itself.
>
> …there are also two types available to the feminine nature. A woman realizes herself as such and even rises to the same level reached by a man as warrior and ascetic only as lover and mother… [the feminine is] totally giving of herself and being entirely for another being, whether he is the loved one or the son, finding in this dedication the meaning of her own life, her own joy, and her own justification.

In Evola's philosophy, to be feminine is to dedicate yourself selflessly to an external cause; masculinity is pure virility – as in the action of the warrior or the pure detachment of the ascetic. "To realize oneself," he writes, is "to reduce in a woman all that is masculine and in a man everything that is feminine." Within every person is a mix of the masculine and the feminine, but excellence lies in being a paragon of one's sex. While a man's success comes from achieving self-sufficiency and independent action, a woman achieves order by cleaving to a masculine force. Even in the absence of a man, she will seek to submit herself to some greater force.

As the blogger Roissy once wrote, without a strong man in her life, the Western woman simply seeks alternative masters to which she submits, typically idols with the seal of society's approval like careerism and progressiveness. For instance, you will find that support for multiculturalism among Westerners is very high among single white women; as these women marry and have children, and yoke themselves to a man, their support for liberalism fades.

Evola goes on to mention women who have achieved this feminine ideal. There is the Aztec mother who dies in childbirth, a death as valiant as the warrior's on the battlefield, in his estimation. Another is the Hindu woman, who ends her life on the flames of the funerary pyre of her husband, to join him in eternal afterlife.

> Likewise, there is a profound meaning in the legend about the Kalki-avatara, which talks about a woman who could not be possessed by anybody because the men who desired her and fell in love with her turned into women as the result of their passion.
>
> As far as the woman is concerned, there is true greatness in her when she is capable of giving without asking for anything in return; when she is like a flame feeding itself; when she loves even more as the object of her love does not commit himself, does not open himself up and even creates some distance; and finally, when the man is not perceived by her as a mere husband or lover, but as her lord. [emphasis added]

This Hindu legend is prescient – it accords with my observations — that the more a man gives to his woman, the less she will love him. The more he veers from his own pursuits to accommodate hers, the surer feminine betrayal is to follow. Nearly every time I hear of some man moving to another city to join his lover, she dumps him within the year. I recall reading the blog of woman complaining, how she had disliked her man's playing in a band. She had finally got him to stop playing with them, and shortly after she laments that she now sees him as less of a man. This is fairly typical – when a man gives in to his woman's demands and sacrifices for her, her respect and desire for him diminishes and deteriorates.

The Modern Woman, Long Before the iPhone and OKCupid

Evola tells of how men have abdicated their power, how they made women their equals and pushed them into formerly male spheres.

> …the results have been the degeneration of the feminine type even in her somatic characteristics, the atrophy of her natural possibilities, the suppression of her unique inner life. Hence the types of the woman-garconne [flapper or tomboy] and the shallow and vain woman, incapable of any elan beyond herself, utterly inadequate as far as sensuality and sinfulness are concerned because to the modern woman the possibilities of physical love are often not as interesting as the narcissistic cult of her body, or as being seen with as many or as few clothes as possible, or as engaging in physical training, dancing, practicing sports, pursuing wealth, and so on…
>
> Because of the woman's increased egocentrism, men will no longer be of interest to her; she will only care about what they will be able to offer to satisfy her pleasure or her vanity. In the end, she will even incur forms of corruption that usually accompany superficiality, namely, a practical and superficial lifestyle of a masculine type that has perverted her nature…
>
> The same holds true for the results of the Western "emancipation" of women, which is on its way to infecting the rest of the world faster than a plague…Modern woman in wanting to be for herself has destroyed herself. The "personality" she so much yearned for is killing all semblance of female personality in her. [p.164-165]

The men critical of modern women are quick to blame recent inventions, like the smartphone, or online dating, or even 'the pill' and antibiotics, as the cause for the disappearance of femininity. And their criticism of modern Western women mirrors Evola's, yet Revolt was published in 1934, easily predating any of those technologies by decades. While things like texting may have an impact, the fact that Evola could anticipate these criticisms some eighty years ago suggests that these recent technologies are mere sidenotes to the change that modernity has wrought.

Evola makes a similar criticism of American women, back in 1945:

Loading...

> The much-vaunted sex appeal of American women is drawn from films, reviews and pin-ups, and is in large print fictitious. A recent medical survey in the United States showed that 75 per cent of young American women are without strong sexual feeling and instead of satisfying their libido they seek pleasure narcissistically in exhibitionism, vanity and the cult of fitness and health in a sterile sense. American girls have no hang-ups about sex; they are easy going for the man who sees the whole sexual process as something in isolation thereby making it uninteresting and matter-of-fact, which, at such a level, it is meant to be. Thus, after she has been taken to the cinema or a dance, it is something like American good manners for the girl to let herself be kissed — this doesn't mean anything. American women are characteristically frigid and materialistic. The man who has his way with an American girl is under a material obligation to her. The woman has granted a material favor. In cases of divorce American law overwhelmingly favors the woman. American women will divorce readily enough when they see a better bargain. It is frequently the case in America that a woman will be married to one man but already engaged to a future husband, the man she plans to marry after a profitable divorce. [emphasis added, from Civilta Americana]

Here we have a man, some seventy years ago, saying how American women are uniquely constituted to be pumped and dumped by players – "they are easy going for the man who sees the whole sexual process as something in isolation." Long before the advent of the pill and safe sex, before no-fault divorce and the surge in the divorce rate, before middle class women went to college en masse, before the supposed 'golden age' of the 1950's, you have a man penning ideas that are now conventional in the manosphere.

A Misogynist, He Is Not

As you begin to peel back the curtains on what modern Western women are like, it's easy to become a misogynist – to simply write women off as inferior, even contemptible. There are two problems with this; for one, you are seeing woman at her worst, in a tiny slice of her time on Earth. It would be like taking an athlete and branding him a failure because he lost a game once. For another, you'd be practicing the same nonsense feminists do – judging men and women by the same standard. If one believes that men and women occupy different roles, comparing them on the same measure makes about as much sense as… judging a quarterback by how fast he can run a marathon. It’s not a point unique to Evola, but he states it well:

> We cannot ask ourselves whether “woman” is superior or inferior to “man” any more than we can ask ourselves whether water is superior or inferior to fire…
>
> There can be no doubt that a woman who is perfectly woman is superior to a man who is imperfectly man, just as a farmer who is faithful to his land and performs his work perfectly is superior to a king who cannot do his own work.[Eros, p.33-34]

Western-Style Romance Makes Men Of Women

True to form, Evola does not spare European romantic traditions, which he accuses of making women into men.

> The love Europe has celebrated is the love that does not tolerate the other person's lack of commitment. Now when a woman, before consecrating herself to a man, pretends that he belongs to her body and soul, not only has she already "humanized" and impoverished her offering, but worse yet, she has begun to betray the pure essence of femininity in order to borrow characteristics typical of the male nature – and possibly the lowest of these: the yearning to possess and lay claims over another person, and the pride of the ego… [p.165]

The blogger Roissy is very much in agreement with Evola here, when he advises men to give less than they get, though perhaps not for the same reasons. According to Evola, true femininity means devotion with, or without reciprocation. The female egocentrism that Evola profiles comes to form a repulsive fusion with Western-style romance; men are told to make pathetic, emasculating displays of affection. American women have the gall to say that such men are 'proving their manhood.' Considering that this is what Valentine's Day has become, it is easily the most wicked holiday on the calendar.

In case there is any doubt as to what Evola is referring to, consider these Rihanna lyrics:

> So boy forget about the world cuz it's gon' be me and you tonight
> I wanna make your bed for ya, then imma make you swallow your pride
> Want you to make me feel like I'm the only girl in the world
> Like I'm the only one that you'll ever love
> Like I'm the only one who knows your heart

> Only girl in the world…
> Like I'm the only one that's in command
> Cuz I'm the only one who understands how to make you feel like a man [Rihanna – Only Girl]

As Evola says, this possessiveness is a quintessentially masculine pose, and yet in modern America, only women have the license to do it. A man who takes a woman his as his own, who publicly and proudly, tells her she must show her love for him through regular cooking, cleaning and sex, is 'domineering' and 'controlling.'

By Evola's philosophy, for a woman to elect a priority above that of her lover or son is to suppress her femininity; devotion to her career over all is betrayal, an infidelity of which all polite people now approve. The masculine man who would be master often faces a dilemma – the woman refuses to dedicate herself to him. Alternatively, to accommodate her is to suppress his masculinity and endanger the relationship. Beset by this problem, there is no solution – only ignoble compromises.

Modern women will hardly make their men a priority at all, as evidenced by their steadfast refusal to try and please their man, except with deviant sexual acts. Many a man will do as I do, and simply resort to promiscuity. Since few women in the West will agree to submit or aim to please in any meaningful way that would make a lengthy relationship attractive, he compensates for the absence of quality with an increase in volume. He sleeps around, constantly seeking new charges to mask the emptiness evident in each. Evola contends, that with such incomplete men and women, with such adulterated gender roles, sex has been reduced to nothing but its mechanical, physical elements.

The Appeal of Traditionalism

Nowadays, we like to think we are urbane and cosmopolitan; we've seen all the world has to offer, and chosen only the best of it. In reality, we are some of the most provincial, narrow-minded humans to have ever lived. Societies across thousands of miles and years have lived by similar timeless principles, yet we think we're better and ignore all that. Which is plausible, except that the more change and 'progress' we experience, the more dysfunctional society gets.

When I listen to most people argue, I get this nagging feeling that the terms of the debate are all bullshit; before the debate has even started, both sides have agreed not to even consider whether certain beliefs are true. If you wonder whether these beliefs are valid, say about whether women working hurts their families, it doesn't matter how much truth you can marshal to prove your point. So if you ever dare to question beliefs that are common but false, you may be told that you're 'arguing for the sake of arguing,' or that your views 'belong in the 1950's', the 1800's, or even the Medieval Age. Invariably, these people think they're being cute, but all I can think is how foolish they are. Why are the people of a hundred or a thousand years ago automatically wrong, while people today are automatically right?

Turns out, they aren't. As men ignore convention and rediscover the truth, by dint of personal experience and sage advice, they will find themselves increasingly drawn to traditionalism.

Read Next: Are You A Traditional Conservative But Don't Realize It?

8 Signs You Should Break Up With A Girl

March 21, 2013 | by Tuthmosis | Link | Original Link

Whether he wants to admit it or not, even the most inveterate bachelor (a.k.a. “player”) parks his game from time to time to concentrate on one girl. Even if he is creeping a little on the side, he’s no longer actively pursuing new prospects in volume, no longer maintains an active rotation, and he’s seeing the same chick in regular intervals. In other words: he’s in a long-term relationship.

Perhaps more than any other subject, there’s some serious silence in the “game” world about how to think about and deal with relationships. It’s our Don’t Ask Don’t Tell. And, like two muscular dudes jerking each other off in the army latrine, we know guys are doing it, but the last thing we want to do is think about or discuss it.

If you associate with men with game, you already know how it goes down: periodically, a guy you know will disappear for a more-than-normal period of time, only to re-emerge a few months later, coming clean that he’s been holding hands with a girl the whole time. You shrug your shoulders and all is well again.

I’m from the camp that thinks that—despite the ever-diminishing returns of a relationship and the ever-shrinking pool of eligible girls—it’s good to get into one here and there. For one, constantly chasing new girls can get bone-tiring, as well as massively drain your time and resources. And that’s just from the going-out part. The administrative elements of being a full-time bachelor—managing phone numbers, keeping track of contact intervals, turning on a dime to work each girl according to what stage you have her in, even the timing of your ejaculation schedule—is never-ending behind-the-scenes work that can wear you down and take the fun out of being single.

Periodically resting from all of this for a few weeks or months at a time is not only desirable, but necessary, to recharge your batteries for new adventures. Not only that, there are actually some rewards that you reap from a relationship girl that you rarely get from a standard rotation member. To paraphrase Chris Rock, “new pussy can’t cook.”

The major problem with relationships is that 95 percent of guys stay in them long after the law of diminishing returns has tipped against their favor. They fail to manage their relationships properly and to spot signs along the way that things have irretrievably soured. That said, here are eight signs you should break up with your girl…

1. Gains an appreciable amount of weight.

Minor, temporary fluctuations in weight are understandable, even excusable, but anything beyond 8 or 10 pounds—especially without increasing anxiety and action about it—is a sign that she cares little about her appearance and, more importantly, cares little about what you think.

2. Talks about her (sexual) past.

In my world, I consider anything beyond a passing mention of her sexual past (especially without some clear pertinence to the conversation and an obvious attempt to courtesy-veil or massage it in a tactful way) a red flag going in, so chances are, if she’s talking about it now, it marks some sort of a change. A girl cavalierly talking about her past is a sign of crass indifference toward sex (sluttiness), at best, or intentional disrespect, at worst. In either case, it’s a deal-breaker for any kind of serious relationship.

The Official Fuck List

Rank	Subject (Score)
1.	(10.25/10)
2.	(9.5/10)
3.	(9/10)
4.	(8.75/10)
5.	(8.25/10)
6.	(7.75/10)
7.	(7/10)
8.	(4/10)
9.	(4/10)
10.	(3/10)
11.	(3/10)
12.	(3/10)
13.	(1/10)

Where the scores were tied, rank was awarded for looks, body type, creativity, and most importantly, my level of entertainment

3. Insists on having contact with her ex-boyfriends.

This is related to talking about her past, but is actually much worse. In the era of Facebook and 24/7 Internet connectivity, it's become nearly impossible for these guys to fully disappear into the past, but active contact—especially face-to-face—should prompt an ultimatum conversation. If you know anything about women, you can predict her stubborn reaction. In my case, that conversation ends with me severing ties.

4. Cuts her hair short.

Like gaining weight, cutting her hair signals bigger problems. I'm a firm believer that the short haircut in women is a political statement. By willfully removing one of the clearest cues of femininity, she's shoving a huge middle finger at men, in general, and—if you happen to be in a relationship with her—at you, in particular.

5. Develops a bitchy, snappy attitude. Disrespects you publicly.

A girl who routinely gives you attitude—especially publicly—has lost all respect for you. If you've let her intransigence slide more than, say, once, she's further lost respect for you. Nine times out of ten, this is symptom she will either dump you—or, frankly, cheat on you—soon.

6. Hangs out or communicates with way too many dudes.

I consider the "all-my-friends-are-guys" declaration to be a deal-preventer. That is, I will have likely learned about her dozens of male orbiters—and eliminated from consideration as a result—well before I've upgraded her status in my life. That said, discovering this anywhere along the way is an automatic two-and-and-half strikes. Short of some verifiable signs that she doesn't revel in stringing a bunch of men along, doesn't keep a bench of ready replacements, or hasn't banged several of them already, it's a bootable offense.

7. Frequency or quality of sex declines markedly. Dangles sex as a reward.

Look, you're probably not going to still be banging five times a night months into a relationship, but a sharp drop in frequency or quality means a vital element—physical chemistry—has evaporated. It's especially problematic if she begins to wield sex as some sort of carrot that you "earn" by doing things "right." She's wrested power from you, and it's a rare case where a man recovers from this.

8. Gets sloppy in her dress, habits, speech, or hygiene.

Like gaining weight, losing her gracefulness portends bigger problems. The moment a girl stops trying to impress you, she's checked out of your relationship. Depending on how attractive she is, the next guy who hits that switch in her brain will be granted an interview for your job.

If this list makes it sound like every relationship is doomed from the start, you're absolutely right. Being that in today's (Western) world, one or several of these are eventualities, the best a top-rate man can hope for is extended periods of bachelorhood punctuated by rewarding, time-limited relationships that end right as the returns diminish to an unacceptable level. That length of time, needless to say, varies dramatically from girl to girl.

Read More: 5 Bachelor Pad Essentials

How To Change Your Bad Habits

March 22, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This books describes what habits are, how they form, and how you can change them. It uses a variety of fascinating studies and stories to teach by example. Here's what I learned:

- The three components of a habit are the cue, routine, and reward. No habit can survive without a reward, even if that reward is as simple as checking a box or having your mouth fill with foam as you brush your teeth.
- In ingrained habits, you start to feel happiness from a reward that has not yet arrived (e.g., when thinking of smoking a cigarette makes you feel the relaxing effects of actually smoking).
- Habits that stick create a craving so strong that you have no hesitation to start the routine process.
- To dissect your habit, analyze your feelings and thoughts before starting the routine. What craving are you satisfying?
- You can't change a habit that you don't believe is possible for you to change.
- A good habit can cause ripple effects that make it easier to hold onto other good habits. Exercise is a good example—when you exercise, you tend to eat better and smoke less.
- You have only so much willpower to use in a day. It's a finite resource, but it can be strengthened over time with commitment.

My favorite quotes:

Loading…

> Habits, scientists say, emerge because the brain is constantly looking for ways to save effort. Left to its own devices, the brain will try to make almost any routine into a habit, because habits allow our minds to ramp down more often.
>
> […]
>
> When a habit emerges, the brain stops fully participating in decision making.
>
> […]
>
> If you want to do something that requires willpower—like going for a run after work—you have to conserve your willpower muscle during the day. If you use it > up too early on tedious tasks like writing emails or filling out complicated and boring expense forms, all the strength will be gone by the time you get home.

The major flaw of this book is that the author kept cutting off stories. He would only share small bits of a story before starting another one, leaving you hanging for the sole sake of leaving you hanging. If I wanted to read a suspense novel, I would have bought one.

In spite of that problem, The Power Of Habit was one of the best self-help books I read, giving me practical advice that is easy to implement. Not only did it help me analyze my own habits, but it gave me a clear roadmap on how I could tweak them, and by the time I finished the book, I introduced a new habit into my life that I'm already pleased with. Recommended.

Read More: "The Power Of Habit" on Amazon

Are You Riding The Tim Ferriss Wheel?

March 23, 2013 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Once upon a time, I was a Tim Ferriss groupie.

Well, not exactly, but I did think The 4-Hour Workweek was the greatest invention since RU-486. When I first went to Barnes & Noble to get my copy, I spent what seemed like an eternity poring over its pages, in awe at its philosophy and advice, only stopping when the manager announced over the intercom that the store was closing in fifteen minutes. It took me all of a weekend to finish the book, but even before then I was brainstorming idea upon idea for creating my own four-hour workweek.

Having spent a good portion of the past five years of my life hustling online, I was overjoyed at finally finding a roadmap to the land of riches. Unfortunately, that roadmap had a huge hole in the middle.

Don't worry, this isn't going to be some "anti-game" type hater screed: "Tim Ferriss is a LIAR and a SCAMMER wah wah wah POOR ME!" Realistically, the most I lost from The 4-Hour Workweek was $10 and about a week's worth of sleepless nights. I'm still a fan of Ferriss' books and I read his blog (not regularly, but whenever he writes a new post).

But I'd still tread carefully around him.

Asking a guy like Tim Ferriss for business advice is like asking a woman how to get laid. Girls spout useless pabulum like "just be yourself" because they have no clue what being a man is like—all most girls have to do is show up and they'll get men drooling over them. Tim Ferriss is selling a lifestyle that is achievable, but only by people who are named "Tim Ferriss." Here's why.

1. Tim Ferriss had a massive head start in life, but doesn't factor this into his advice.

Ferriss argues that anyone can flee the 9-to-5 existence by following his advice of ~~plagiarizing~~ paraphrasing other sources to create online businesses and having virtual assistants from India doing the grunt work. And Ferriss' rags-to-riches story is so inspiring it would make Horatio Alger shed a tear:

- Our friend Tim grew up on the mean streets of East Hampton, New York, located in the famously poverty-stricken east end of Long Island.
- He went to high school at St. Paul's in New Hampshire, a school so desperate for enrollment that it only has 500 students, and so poor that families of students who make $80,000 or less a year qualify for financial aid.
- After high school, Tim went on to attend a no-name private college in New Jersey called Princeton.

And he sincerely believes that you too can have a four-hour workweek despite not having his wealthy upbringing, his upper-class education, or his network of connected friends. Just like how you can pick up girls by "being yourself."

Loading…

I'm not knocking Ferriss—he's a smart guy who's made a comfortable living. But his entrepreneurial advice is worthless for most because he's unwilling—or unable—to acknowledge that he had an easier journey to the finish line than most. Sure, you might be able to eke out a good income ~~plagiarizing~~ paraphrasing NexxtLevelUp articles for a fitness DVD set, but you're just as equally likely to win the lottery, and Megaball tickets are both cheaper and don't take as much time to use.

Take a spin on the Tim Ferriss Wheel and you'll just end up right back where you started, a little more nauseous than when you began.

2. The 4-Hour Workweek's advice doesn't scale.

Ferriss' advice became useless the day he became popular enough to get a book deal. Cheating your way to wealth with your flunky Deepak might have worked ten years ago, but with hordes of Ferriss-wannabes now gunking up the works, every one of them gets an increasingly smaller chunk of the pie. Ferriss fanboys are the equivalent of the clueless dorks who read The Game when it was released and descended upon the dive bars wearing furry pimp hats doing impromptu palm readings.

Too bad we can't have an HB8.5 burst into mocking laughter every time some cubicle slave starts up an affiliate marketing site pushing weight-loss pills.

3. The only way to make money online is to shut up and do the work.

The Internet is not some parallel universe exempt from the laws of reality. Anyone who has anything here got it because they worked for it. Like in the real world, success in the world of online hustling is dependent on what your strengths are, how you leverage them, and who you network with. There are no shortcuts or loopholes beyond those that will help you learn the basics faster. My new book Confessions of an Online Hustler emphasizes this: unless you toil away and create a legit product that will enlighten and/or entertain people, your hustle will go nowhere.

But therein lies the problem: the kinds of people who slavishly defend the Tim Ferrisses of the world can't handle the truth. They don't want to be told that the only way to achieve anything in this world is to toil for it. They'd rather believe that there's a magic pill that can get them to shed their jiggling blubber rolls; that there's a magic line that will get women to suck their dicks; that there's a magic method that will allow them to spend the rest of their lives sunning themselves at the beach while a half-literate wage-slave in Calcutta runs a network of drop-shipping online stores for them.

Tim Ferriss is the patron saint of lazy-asses.

Read More: How I Found Freedom In An Unfree World

The Greatest Adventure

March 23, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Its the year 2023 and you're the first human being to set foot on Mars. You and the rest of the Mars One team have been anxiously awaiting this moment for the past 7 months accompanied only by the dim hum of your gliding vessel. You've been training and planning for years and have devoted the rest of your life to doing something no one has ever done, or may not ever do again. The history books will forever hold your name, your legacy.

Mars One will fund this expedition by creating their very own Truman Show. Everyone on earth will watch you as you live free from laws and society. They'll get to see the spectacle of human nature in its full glory as you set up a colony on Mars.

After a while you'll feel the burdening constraints of isolation. The constant scrutinizing of your actions will make you feel like a zoo animal, but you will keep working because what you are doing is great. Lost is the time of great adventurers who sail the seven seas discovering new lands, bizarre flora/fauna and new civilizations. Lost is the time of this freedom. Mars is your salvation.

Yes, this is a romanticized version of what could happen, but what greater of an adventure is there? You could be stuck in a barren, uninhabitable, void of isolation with no cute girls. Aliens could attack and suck your brains out for use in crazy experiments or you could spring a leak in your space suit causing your head would explode. Well shit, I'd take the legacy of this great adventure over going to the same lonely planet guide tourist trap spots any day. I'd take years of isolation over years of going to the same bars talking to overweight, stuck-up women.

I’ve always wanted a grand adventure, something that would change the scope of the world, influence how everyone thinks and how everyone acts. Think about men who have changed history and how society at its most basal level functions. Ancient philosophers who wrote timeless truths, psychologists who’ve changed the way we interpret, leaders of nations in the 20th century and more recently technological innovators: Zuckerberg and Jobs among many who have facilitated the change of society into what it is now.

These men devoted their existences to these purposes. They sacrificed many things to achieve what they did. They constantly worked to refine and re-evaluate their progress.

Although a guy like me can only dream of changing the world by hopping on a space ship and colonizing another planet — being the first man with an interplanetary harem — such greatness is not attainable for most people.

Loading…

What can most people achieve?

We here at Return of Kings are not average; we strive to be above average. We work to mold the world to our will and improve ourselves. We may not be able to change society as a whole, but we can change how we adapt to society. We can educate ourselves in the ways of social interaction so we can have control over our interpersonal relations for the purpose of women and jobs. We learn the benefits of health so we can live life to the fullest. We work hard for money so we can have more freedom. Some of us may have children and some of us may have wives, but we will all leave a legacy in the man we have built ourselves into.

Self-improvement may be masturbation, but it allows us freedoms which we would never have. Self-destruction on the other hand is the way many people lead their lives.

A recent source of entertainment over at the forum is that of a young woman who angrily asked Roosh to remove a photo of her from his most recent and controversial post. Instead of asking nicely — or in the very least neutrally — she asked with anger. Instead of saying “Could you please take picture x from article x off of your site, I don’t like that you used it” she said “Take the fucking picture of me down” and the rest is history.

Some extremely talented computer hackers [read: a guy with Google and a girl with no privacy settings on her Facebook profile] dug up a time line of this girl’s transformation. Kosko gives a good breakdown on the forum, but it reads as follows. She starts off with a look in her eye that suggests she’s happy with her life and ends hollow and unhealthy after years of self-destruction. She may have had many good times along the way as indicated by the photos posted, but where does this all lead? How does one have a fulfilling life if happiness is created by something like partying and self-destruction?

She is not free. She is constrained by her choices and she is one of many. Freedom is improving yourself. Building oneself is the greatest adventure a man can go on, even for getting the first ever Mars flag.

Read Next: 5 Things I Learned About Life From Brazilian Jiu-Jitsu

What Society Values

March 23, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A society which most values intelligence will create men of knowledge.

A society which most values money will create scoundrels.

A society which most values entertainment will create celebrities.

A society which most values equality will create helplessness.

A society which most values aesthetics will create beauty and art.

Loading...

A society which most values war will create death.

A society which most values women will create weak men.

What does your society value?

Don't Miss: The Landmark Thucydides

7 Soft Harem Tips For Introverts

March 24, 2013 | by Halfbreed | Link | Original Link

Some men don't like to keep women around for long. They prefer the thrill of the hunt, the taste of new flesh. Not me. I'm an introvert. I suspect that many guys reading this are the same. Of course, there is nothing like new pussy, but I can't tolerate extended periods of active gaming.

I know enough to get good results, but it doesn't come easily for me. I have to put in the work. My game trajectory resembles a roller coaster with peaks and valleys. Sometimes I ramp it up and score successive notches quickly. Other times I settle back and lazily enjoy my harem. I'll admit, I like the valleys better. I prefer the pleasure of sex to the excitement of gaming new women. I'm not a greedy man. Once I have a minimum of two horny young sluts on call, I'm good.

That's why I advocate harem building. It's nice having a few girls around for regular sex and, sometimes, companionship. That frees you to spend time on more productive pursuits, like weightlifting, empire building, and planning your escape from the West. Or smoking weed and playing Call Of Duty, if that's your thing. Either way, a soft harem is an efficient way for an introvert to keep multiple females for sex, with minimal amounts of time and effort. Here are seven tips to keep your soft harem sluts in love with you, even after they leave:

1. Make Her Cum Hard

Not every man agrees with this point. But in my experience, this is the only way she's going to share you for any length of time. If you want her to return, make her orgasm hard and often.

2. Reject Monogamy

The foundation of harem game is the rejection of monogamy. It's all built on that premise. If she doesn't want to share, she can leave. And that's it. Once she understands that you will never change, you can relax just a bit.

3. Let Her Go Easy

Let her go with no drama when she decides to leave. Wish her luck and happiness with her new monogamous boyfriend. Try to score your goodbye fuck. Then show her the door.

4. Be Aloof, But Accessible

Don't text, call or email her once she leaves. This should come easily to you. But respond if she reaches out. She's just making sure you're still an option for her, and you should quickly schedule a meet.

5. Indulge Your Dark Triad

Make Machiavelli proud. She might come back to you while she still has a boyfriend. Bang her anyway. Don't be upset if she returns to him for a while after that. She'll be back again.

6. Be Beta

Of course, it's best to be aloof and ruthless. But she will eventually get into a fight with her weak boyfriend and come fishing for your attention. Then it's OK to tell her you miss her; let her know she can return whenever she wants. Just keep that shit to a minimum.

7. Give Her A Soft Landing

Don't give her a hard time when she comes back. She probably won't want to talk about her recent breakup. If you can calmly tolerate your woman leaving you for other men, then she will return repeatedly. Just use a condom until after she gets tested.

Extroverted men may not see the point of a harem. Getting fresh pussy is a fun sport. But for introverts, it can be physically draining and mentally exhausting. Running a harem allows us to have sex with multiple women while remaining true to our introvert natures.

Read More: 4 Tips For Men Who Are Natural Introverts

Photo credit: Frederick Arthur Bridgman [Public domain], [image]

About the Author

Halfbreed is a bi-racial hedonist, entrepreneur, and serial womanizer from Texas. He's the author of Red Pill Orgasm. Read his blog at Red Pill Game and follow him on Twitter.

The Man Who Dropped Out Of Harvard To Become A Sailor

March 24, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of the best pleasures of books is to discover one that turns out to be unexpectedly great. I had just this experience recently with the old sea classic Two Years Before the Mast. If you think a book about a sea voyage published in 1840 has got nothing to teach you, think again. Fully expecting a dated and boring read, I was shocked at how readable, gripping, and relevant this book was. It's packed with knowledge that denizens of the manosphere will find appealing and applicable to their lives.

Richard Henry Dana was a prim and proper New Englander who dropped out of Harvard in the 1830s because of failing eyesight and unspecified health problems. Today, we would probably diagnose his crisis as just the restlessness of a healthy intellect, but in those days being a rebel was not so easy. He detested the constrictive, humdrum banality of his life. He itched to get away. To experience the beyond. The Great Other. Why did he have to do this? Well, because he had to.

Dana decided to go to sea as a common sailor on a merchant vessel from 1834 to 1836. It's hard today to wrap our minds around just how radical this decision was at the time. Seamanship in those days was backbreaking and dangerous work. It was simply not something that Harvard students or Boston bluebloods did. Dana spent two years aboard this vessel as it sailed to South America, around Cape Horn, and eventually put ashore in California, which in those days was a wild part of Mexico.

He kept a diary of his experiences, which formed the nucleus of his later published work.

The book is filled with awe-inspiring accounts of storms, conflicts aboard ship, brutal labor, the agonies of scurvy, and harrowing escapes from death. (Melville once said that his description of the frigid passage through Cape Horn must have been "written with an icicle"). We owe him a great debt, for his book is a great and timeless account of danger, struggle, courage, and perseverance. These are the major things I took away from the book:

1. You can't idealize brute labor.

Some people who have never actually done hard physical work for extended periods of time like to idealize the peasant, the proletarian, or the laborer. And it never works. You can try to idealize labor, you can talk yourself into it, and you can almost succeed. But in the end you just can't. The sea, like the soil, is a cruel, impersonal and brutal force; there is nothing idealistic about it, just as there's nothing idealistic about a snarling tiger. It has to be grappled and fought with, and is never mastered. Work aboard ship is a constant life-and-death struggle to stay one step ahead of cruel Nature, who would just as soon destroy you.

Loading...

2. Men must endure physical struggle to realize their true selves.

Dana knew, deep in his bones when he left mother and apple pie in Boston, that he needed to prove his mettle as a man. He needed to fight, to struggle, to slay his own dragons, on his own terms. This is the most elemental desire of man: to gain mastery over himself through conquest. You will never be a great man until you seek out and put yourself through some intense physical challenge.

3. Men who go through a life-changing, intense experience are elevated from normal society.

Dana lived out this great experience, then went on to become a lawyer and have a relatively uneventful life. But it was all worth it. Because he knew. He just knew. He had seen beyond. He had experienced life in a way that none of his peers had, and he could die with the knowledge that he had truly touched the acme of human existence. Life-changing experiences change you utterly, elevate you above the masses, and at the same time isolate you from them. You will never be able to go back to who you once were. Maybe the British writer D.H. Lawrence said it best in his own mystical way: "We know enough. We know too much. We know nothing. Let us smash something. Ourselves included. But the machine above all."

4. To be a leader of men, you must when necessary act with ruthlessness.

There is a scene in the book where a chronic malingerer aboard ship is to be flogged by the captain. Dana describes the scene with empathy and disgust, even vomiting over the side as the seaman is whipped. Another sailor who tries to protest the flogging to the captain is himself tied up and lashed. Dana wants us to be horrified by all this. But I wasn't, if truth be told. I thought that the slouching sailor got what he deserved. Long sea voyages can have a corrosive effect on morale and discipline. Anarchy and mutiny can threaten at any time if problems are not nipped in the bud when they start. This sluggard sailor upset the balance aboard ship and something had to be done to set things right again.

Leaders sometimes have to act with speed and decision to put everyone on notice. And besides all that, there are worse things than being flogged. Losing your self-respect, your honor, your dignity, is worse.

All told, Two Years Before The Mast is a forgotten classic of masculine virtue and adventure, and deserves more recognition than it has received in the past few decades. Check it out and see for yourself.

Read More: 16 Things I Learned From Mark Twain

5 Ways To Emasculate A Man

March 24, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Why is politically correct language so toxic? Please examine how the issue of rape is whitewashed by online magazine Ebony, in the following feminist article, "5 Ways We Can Teach Men Not to Rape."

> 1. Teach young men about legal consent: Legal consent tops my list for a reason. Without it, sexual contact with someone is rape…whether you intended to rape or not. A woman who is drunk, unconscious or sleeping cannot give legal consent. And it's not about a woman simply saying "no," it's really about making certain she's saying yes!

The idea of erotic resistance and a woman's tendency to resist sex in general is obviously ignored in favor of the politically correct idea that consent is some kind of black and white online submit form where it is always obvious that if she doesn't want sex, she really doesn't want sex.

Never mind the fact that rapists will never ask for consent, or that successful womanizers understand and know how to overcome last minute objections to closing the deal, because rape isn't the actual issue here – instead it is training men how to give more power to women. If men are involuntarily celibate because of the tension killing, erotically sterile, and safe beta mode of asking permission to rip the clothes off a woman in your room – well, that's not a woman's problem, now is it?

> 2. Teach young men to see women's humanity, instead of seeing them as sexual objects for male pleasure: There is a reason why women are shamed into silence and why teenage boys in Steubenville, Ohio are caught on camera laughing about gang raping an unconscious girl at a party. The dehumanization of women spans all areas of American life.

Oh, the humanity!

Quick question – if a woman is driving drunk and crashes into someone else, how come defense attorney's cannot use the defense of "she was drunk and therefore could not consent to crashing her car?"

And what about men's humanity? If the girl is drunk and the man is drunk, why is it only the girl who is unable to give consent?

But see, there's no need for asking tough questions, because the goal of political whitewashing is to interpret events in such a way it fits a political agenda, which is, in this case, of men oppressing women. For example, in the Ohio story – she wasn't gang raped. She was fingered without consent by boys a little less drunk than she was. Ooops – that's too complicated. Let's just call it a gang rape and preach about woman's humanity.

Remember – you're not human until you're blacked-out drunk and pissing all over your friend's carpet.

> The young men in Steubenville aren't monsters. They did something monstrous and criminal but perhaps we should begin to stop repeating the notion that "criminals" are the ones raping 1 in 5 women. No, it's our husbands, boyfriends, acquaintances, relatives, and friends and they rape because they are not taught to see women as full autonomous human.

1 in 5 women are raped? Yeah… I'll let the above paragraph speak for itself.

Loading…

> 3. Teach young men how to express healthy masculinity: "The question that's being asked about what women can do to prevent violence against them is the wrong question. It's not what can a woman say or do that can prevent being attacked. We need to turn that paradigm upside down. We need to focus on the messages that men are getting and about how they relate to women.

I have no idea what the hell healthy masculinity is, but I'm pretty sure it doesn't involve being afraid of making sexual advances on a woman lest she claims you raped her. In fact, I have no idea what the above paragraph says, but rest assured that this politically correct language is being foisted upon hundreds of thousands of college students every year in America.

> 4. Teach young men to believe women and girls who come forward: The vast majority of women do not report their rapes to the police and many more only tell one or two people in confidence. That is a result of our proclivity towards victim blaming. What were you wearing? How much did you drink? Why were you there in the first place? When we hear about a rape case in the news or when we hear about one in our own lives, the first reaction should be to believe and support the accuser.

Because females never lie, right? And even if she was lying, it's not a big deal, right?

Teenager Falsely Accused of Rape Beaten to Death by Gang:

> Luke Harwood, 18, was punched and kicked to death by the gang, who planned to slice off his fingers and pull out his teeth so the body could not be identified.
>
> The victim, who was 5ft 7ins tall and weight just seven stone, had the misfortune to move into a council house when Alice Hall, who made the false allegation, was there, the Old Bailey heard.
>
> […]
>
> Mr Denison said two years before Alice Hall had made a complaint to the police about the victim.
>
> "She initially claimed that he had raped her.
>
> "But when what she was saying was examined more closely by the police it was clear that she was not in fact saying he had raped her and no further action was > taken."

In the politically correct world, the female is always right — always a pure being full of humanity — so naturally stories of men being harmed by false accusations are just misogynistic propaganda.

> 5. Teach males about bystander intervention: Both Men Stopping Violence and Men Can Stop Rape have bystander intervention workshops for men of all ages. "It's about community accountability," says Pandit, "We require men to talk to other men in their lives and tell them about these programs. It is important that we have community networks that hold men accountable."

No emasculation article can be complete without a white-knighting clause. Because at the end of the day, women are weak, hapless creatures who need men to do their bidding or else they are left like infants, stamping their feet until they get their way.

Of course – attractive, young hot women will never be found having sex with a white-knight, but instead can be found at your local frat party getting blasted with all the men who do not respect her humanity yet she choose to hang out with.

By the way, this is a picture of the feminist propagandist:

Would you bang?

Read More: 3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation

Why You Think She’s The One

March 25, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Love is complicated; it’s hard to describe; you’ll just know it when you feel it. She’s the one; the one I’ve been waiting for. It’s hard to explain, but I feel it in my heart.

“If you can’t explain it simply, you don’t understand it well enough.” ~Albert Einstein

I had finally banged my first chick, and I was in love. Real love, too. I’m talking about the fervent kind of love that can only be experienced by a man who is scared to death that he’ll never get laid again if he loses the only girl he knows. Though Jenna and I had only fornicated once in the baptismal dressing room during a church service, I was absolutely convinced that she was my girl. She was the one.

She was the one who talked to me when few other women would.

She was the one who grew up just like I did, so we understood each other.

She was the one who was beautiful, feminine, and definitely only slutty with me, and definitely only that one time in a rare isolated incident.

She was the one who complimented me and made me feel special.

She was the one who captivated my thoughts as I drove back home to Atlanta.

She was the one I wanted by my side the following week as I bid farewell to 1994 and rang in the New Year.

She was also the one who didn’t return my calls.

Bummer. Perhaps going from zero to orgasm in less than 5 seconds isn’t the way to impress a lady, or maybe she just needed a little more time to realize that what we had was special.

I had a severe case of oneitis. I couldn’t get Jenna off my mind, and she couldn’t get my voicemails off of her machine.

Or my emails out of her AOL account, or my flowers off of her front porch.

Women enjoy a lot of things, but one of them definitely isn't being stalked by the guy they hooked up with at church during a Christmas service.

But what makes a man have oneitis? What on earth led me to believe that she was the one that I couldn't live without? Why would I spend the coming months feeling like death, not talking to other girls, and being so lonely for her? What is this phenomenon that makes us see one woman so differently than all the rest? Barring a few superficial differences in the way women execute sameness, they're pretty much all the same. We've all been in love with "the one" before, and we've all lived to be in love again with the next "the one." So what's up with the temporary psychosis that makes us view one woman as somehow special?

In 1911, Dr. Mario Ponzo described the geometrical optical illusion we now call the Ponzo Effect. This is where the human mind judges the size of an object based on its background, causing two identical objects to appear vastly different in size based on their surroundings.

Think of biggest, fullest moon you've ever seen, and then think of a night when the full moon seemed tiny in the sky. If you took a pencil in your hand, extended your arm, blocked out the horizon, and judged the size of the big moon and the seemingly smaller moon relative to the eraser, you'd discover they're the same size. The moon isn't bigger one night and smaller the next; our perception is different based on the objects surrounding it. When the horizon is in view, the moon just appears bigger, but it's still the same distance from the earth, and it's still the same size as on the nights it appears smaller.

That's oneitis in a nutshell. Some women seem different than others, but only relative to their surroundings. Jenna seemed bigger than life against a horizon of her country SWPL Christian background and her desire to have sex with me, but had that exact same experience occurred at a bar somewhere in Atlanta with a non-Christian city girl, I'd consider her a slut and try to ditch her after sex.

Oneitis is basically a Ponzo Effect of the heart; an illusion perceived and acted upon by men who aren't quite as smart as a pencil eraser.

Ask any happily coupled man, and he'll tell you that he loves his woman and can't imagine life without her. Good for him. But if someone dropped a house on her and he found himself single again, I'm pretty sure he'd find someone else to love and be all twisted up in. Now I'm not suggesting that mutual oneitis can't make a man happy, but I know a homeless guy who's thoroughly convinced that he's Napoleon Bonaparte, and he seems pretty damn happy too.

Am I disparaging love? Am I cheapening the bonds of holy matrimony? Am I insinuating that a man and a woman can't be happy together?

Absolutely not. I'm just trying to put it in perspective for you, Mr. Big Moon. Love is transactional, and commitment is a decision; walking into or away from such a situation blinded by the Ponzo Effect could be disastrous.

The severity of oneitis is directly related to how much experience a man has with women. If you're suffering from oneitis, you need to get out more. When you're around a lot of women – regardless of whether you sex them up or not – you learn pretty quickly not to elevate any of them above the collective herd. Love them for who they are, don't try to change them, enjoy their companionship while it lasts, work to preserve the relationship if it's worth preserving, never compromise your principles in the face of shaming language, and if they decide to leave anyway, find a replacement before their side of the bed gets cold.

Keep busy with that regimen, and oneitis will be a thing of the past. Don't chase; replace.

I eventually crawled out of my self-loathing oneitis cocoon and ventured back into the real world. Armed with the confidence of my single notch, I set out on a quest to find my next "the one." I was a pretty sad sight there for a couple of years, but I eventually figured it out.

If you meet a girl whose special blend of sameness compliments yours, hang on to her. If she seems different because her position in relation to your horizon makes her appear better or more interesting, that's actually a good thing – we'd all rather spend time with someone like that.

Just don't forget how a Ponzo Effect of the heart can lead you to assign value where it doesn't belong, keep your wits about you, and you'll be just fine.

Read Next: American Women Simply Can't Compete

Follow @returnofkings

About the Author

Edward Thatch was a weekly contributor at Return of Kings until he passed away unexpectedly after being crushed to death under the weight of his own massive ego. Tall, devastatingly handsome, witty, and successful; the poor lad just couldn’t handle the supreme awesomeness of his own being. May he rest in peace.

Life Was Better With Cigarettes

March 25, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Never mind any health related complications caused by smoking. Yes I know they give you lung, throat, mouth, teeth, and brain cancer. But my cell phone will give me brain and testicular cancer, the sun is giving me skin cancer, everything at the LAX airport will give me cancer, my microwave will give me cancer, red meat will give me cancer, and so will processed foods. That being said, everything was simply cooler when people still smoked.

When I first turned 21, Wisconsin was still fending off bordering states and their push against cigarettes by still allowing smoking in bars. What developed was smoke-filled dens called bars. They were packed with sleazy women and horned up men, which created a lot of hookups. On any given night, no matter what the weather was like, people were crammed in any dumpy establishment to chain smoke and binge drink until they either found a way to get laid or passed out in the street.

At the time, these events were normal. Twelve short months later however, I quickly realized that I had just fit into the last great period for bars in the area. Once cigarettes were banned, the bars emptied out. Whether you were a fan of smoking or not, the realization I quickly became aware of was that the majority of fun people who filled the bar smoked. Once the air was clean and clear the pterodactyl across the room seemed even less attractive than before.

What I also realized was that men were way more badass when they smoked. It's not that smoking really turns you into a badass—it's just something about the type of man that was portrayed during the height of men who smoked. Mad Men shows cutthroat business men. Marlboro portrayed kickass cowboys. The concept of a man in jeans and a beater drinking a PBR and smoking a cigarette is just simply cooler than some sissy in an affliction t-shirt drinking his apple martini. And unfortunately that is what society has developed into. Men are no longer hard-ass pussy slayers. They are now dolled-up wussbags.

Loading...
Additionally, while I despise the taste of cigarette smoke during a kiss, the appeal of a woman smoking a cigarette does wonders visually. Plus it provided quite possibly the two best openers of all time, offering a cigarette, or offering a light; acts that were both chivalrous and manly. The closest option you have these days is attempting to buy a drink; a move that betas have all but ruined.

So what made me recollect on these ideas? For starters, as I mentioned in one of my previous posts, I had been on a 80's movie kick. Clint Eastwood smoked and every character he played was awesome. Paul Newman smoked too. In fact, I challenge you to find an action flick in the 80's that didn't involve smoking. It's virtually impossible, because every action star got laid, smoked cigarettes, and blew stuff up. It was the 80's, that's how they rolled, and it was awesome!

The biggest push towards my recollection of how smoking made things better was going out in St. Paul for Saint Patrick's day. Outdoor tents were setup with makeshift bars downtown, and inside was filled with drunken youth listening to live bands, smoking, and chugging booze. It was a one night only refresher of the good ol' days. And as I participated in a night of social smoking and drinking I realized it's more a symbol of freedom and carelessness than anything else. The concept of cigarettes killing you is important to note, as life is good, but the idea of forever enjoying your youth is mostly founded on the idea of capturing the days of being carefree. And when people smoked frequently, it was the ultimate symbol of not caring. When cigarettes were present, zero fucks were given. And that is a symbol that America has lost.

Read Next: Working Out Favors Men

10 Best And Worst Countries For An American Man To Find A Wife

March 26, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

[image]
Thanks to the Department of Homeland Security, men now have hard data available on where American men have been finding their wives. HINT: Most stereotypes you know about foreign brides are true. How can we confirm the bias?

When looking at the Profiles on Legal Permanent Residents, click on “Country of Birth”, and then select a region or country, which will give you an Excel file… and buried inside of each excel file is a little known statistic called “Immediate Relatives of U.S. Citizens.” This is a measure of how many parents, spouses, and children obtain “legal permanent resident status” as “immediate relatives” of an existing US Citizen. Thus while the measure is not perfect it still gives a useful approximation for finding a foreign bride, because if most immediate relatives coming in from a given country are female then it’s a strong indication men are finding wives in these countries.

So here’s the world map after compiling all available data averages (click on pic for full size):

Please disregard the figures for America itself, since people obtaining legal permanent resident status while originating from the country itself are probably the result of children who were born on American soil, and then used their legal status to get their parents naturalized over time. I’m sure there are other loopholes. If you look at American figures you’ll notice that this number is low, only 269 cases of it occurred in 2011.

Regardless, when examining the rest of the world we get some interesting data of where American men are finding love. Again, figures are averaged from all available years (i.e. since the DHS was created).

Ten Best European Countries

1) Russia (77.2% of immediate relative visas are to females)
2) Estonia (77.1% female)
3) Latvia (76.4% female)
4) Belarus (75.0% female)
5) Slovakia (72.8% female)
6) Ukraine (71.6% female)
7) Finland (71.5% female)
8) Lithuania (71.4% female)
9) Moldova (70.2% female)
10) Poland (69.1% female)

Honorable mentions (for those who like Asian women)

1) Japan (89.1% female)
2) Thailand and Laos (both 80.8% female)
3) Mongolia (79.1% female)
4) Kyrgyzstan and Kazakhstan (78.9% and 78.7% female)
5) Indonesia (77.9% female)
6) Taiwan (76.5% female)
7) Vietnam (75.6% female)

Ten Worst European Countries

1) Ireland (36.0% female)
2) United Kingdom (39.1% female)
3) Cyprus (39.6% female)
4) Netherlands (40.7% female)
5) Italy (46.3% female)
6) Denmark (47.3% female)
7) Norway (48.1% female)
8) Belgium (49.1% female)
9) France (50.0% female)
10) Greece (50.3% female)

Dishonorable mentions

1) West Africa: Burkina Faso, Mali, Mauritania, Niger, Gambia, Benin (all <40% female)
2) Tunisia (33.1% female) — although, strangely enough, Tunisia suddenly flipped to majority female in 2010 and 2011.
3) New Zealand (41.5% female)
4) Israel (42.5% female)
5) Uruguay (46.6% female)
6) Australia (48.7% female)
7) Turkey (49.1% female) — but similar to Tunisia, Turkey flipped to majority female in 2011.

So… do you have any ideas of where to plan your next vacation?

Read More: Don't Believe The Lies About Foreign Brides

(Credit for the above data, figures, lists, and chart goes to reader Corvinus… You ARE DA MAN. Remember RoK readers: If you have something you want to share, we're all ears. Go to the submit button at the bottom of the page!)

About the Author

Samseau is a player philosopher psychologist who enjoys a good discussion. You can follow him on Twitter.

Red Pill Wisdom From Patrice O'Neal

March 26, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

It was Oscar Wilde who famously said "If you want to tell people the truth, make them laugh. Otherwise they'll kill you." Gone too soon from this world, Patrice O'Neal comes to mind whenever I hear this quotation. Patrice's blend of genius insight into gender relations, infectious laugh and delivery, and ability to break down social issues made him one of the most well-respected comedians in the business. Patrice spit the kind of universal truths that would get another man excluded from society, but did it in such a way that he brought joy into many lives and created valuable learning experiences for anyone willing to listen.

Perhaps the most distilled examples of Patrice's worldview occurred while he was hosting the Black Phillip Show. This short-lived radio program was intended to be a parody of Dr. Phil-type self help shows, dispensing relationship, dating, and game advice for men. All 13 episodes of the show are available for streaming on Youtube:

Here are some choice excerpts, all from just from the first hour of Episode 1:

The Two Sides Of The Female Mind

Patrice is telling a story about how his girl was subtly testing his manhood:

> "Women have two things in their head. They have the thing that makes them go 'I LOVE you. You're a MAN. You're bigger than me, stronger than me, I can't even open this pickle jar without you.' And then it's the other side of their brain that goes 'You faggot ass bitch, why are you loving this motherfucker so much?' So what they want is the girl shit at the expense of your manhood […] Women don't know how to tap into a man's desire [to help them]."

Male/Female Conversation Styles

> [To the female co-host] "Women are not born in honesty. You don't need to be. You don't need to have charisma or figure it all out. Men have developed a lot of different verbal skills that women haven't because you haven't had to. There's no need for you to have […] conversational ability. And when you do have conversational ability, you FORCE it on guys. Because you know that most women don't [have it].
>
> "Here's something that will work 99 percent of the time: If she says 'here's what I think,' all you have to do to combat her is go: 'Why? She never has the thought that is the purpose for her thought. There is never reasoning. Guys always have a reason behind what they're saying."

How To Deal With A Woman Pressuring Marriage

> "You have to not be afraid to take a loss to get your point across. When she gives you that ultimatum, if you look like you're sweating and you're blinking and you're nervous about her leaving, she will take advantage of that."
>
> "Stop trying to give her things to make her happy. You have to say, 'Look sweetie, this is how it is.' You have to be ready for her to walk out of your life. You ever see that movie Heat? Don't get involved in something you can't walk out on in less than 30 seconds."
>
> Loading…
> "One thing women need from you is emotions. […]. If you [calmly deflect them], her emotions have to eat on themselves. Let her emotions eat her soul up, then she'll think of another option because she's not walking out of your life unless you're crushed. Women don't leave unless you are completely crushed […] She won't take a step."

Cheating

A caller says that his wife no longer has sex with him, and he is debating cheating on her at a friend's bachelor party:

> "You can't love a woman like a woman loves you […] You can't go 'boobie bear', you can't hold her hand the way she's holding yours. It's a distance thing. […] You gotta make her chase you. Stay gone for a couple days."
>
> "There's a righteous fuck and a dishonest fuck. […] If you're gonna go to this bachelor party and get some righteous pussy, don't even look back because it's > not about her. […] They don't want what the can have, and right now she has you. Even in your attempt to be evil, you still have kind of a worthless self-image. You can't cheat and be thinking about how you're hurting her. If cheating on her helps your self esteem, you do it but you do it righteously to help YOU."

On Materialistic Women

A caller asks if there's a way to pre-screen for materialist girls before investing time/money in them:

> "Most loser women, all they have to barter is their pussy. Men have so many other things to barter when it comes to the sex game and the relationship game. It's not their fault, because they all do it, so there has to be nature involved."
>
> "We have other things that make us attractive to women. Initially, there's only one thing that makes them attractive to us, and that's fucking them, and then it builds from there."
>
> "You gotta understand that when you meet these women essentially they are losers. She HAS to get something out of her pussy, dude. She has to get dinner. She has to get a movie. How can she function if she doesn't get something out of what she has?"
>
> "When you're taking her out to dinner and to the movies, that's her way of fucking you. If you take her out 5 times, she's fucked you 5 times, and you haven't fucked her yet […] Don't let them fuck you, because dinner/movie time is them fucking you. Are you a whore? You can't let a woman whore out your time."

Patrice is a comedian at his core, so this stuff is guaranteed to make you laugh. More importantly, though, it will make you more attuned to an unspoken battlefield of gender relations few others are willing to address so candidly. This is a guy who gamed women, made every mistake in the book during his youth, and witnessed firsthand the interplay between fame, money, game, and confidence. Whether you're a veteran needing a refresher or a newbie looking to gain some power in your dealings with the opposite sex, the Black Phillip archives is an excellent place to continue your research.

Don't Miss: You've Already Seen One Of The Greatest Red Pill Movies Ever Made

The First Milestone In Becoming A Man

March 26, 2013 | by D | Link | Original Link

In part due to the talk of the delayed adolescence of men that's littered media articles from The New York Times to Jezebel, it has become clear that in the 21st century, the chief milestone that signifies the transition from boy to man is no longer serving in the military, turning 21, or getting married, as it was for much of recorded history. In 2013, the the defining right of passage into adulthood is permanently moving out of your parents home.

Roosh wrote the Bible on logistics with his landmark post The Secret To Fast Sex, stating in no uncertain terms that

> It doesn't matter how often you approach, how tight your game is, or how succulent your kisses are, but if your logistics are fucked, you're not getting laid.

Few men in game live centrally in the midst of their cities bars, clubs and day game opportunities, and even fewer due among younger men who almost exclusively live with their parents if they don't live on campus at a college. A few older men have told me that they felt that their sex life has reached a peak now that they have hit their 30's, and that those years are the best years to be a man. I cannot help but wonder if this is largely due to the fact that unmarried men in their 30's almost certainly live alone and are more likely to live where the action is rather than the cookie cutter family dominated sprawl of suburbia.

My Story

A month or so after you read this post, a perfectly located bachelor pad will become vacant for myself and my wingmen the same age as me to move in with a slightly older wingman of ours. While we had been planning to move out for a long time, it was only a few weeks ago we discovered we could move in with our friend, and only a few days ago we discovered exactly when the rooms would become vacant. It is not a necessity that we move out, and our financial situation will be a bit strained, but every day we live in the suburbs with our parents is another day that our potential for personal growth is wasted.

I've lost a depressing number of bangs due to being unable to co-ordinate drinks dates with girls in time before they lost interested or (in the case of tourists) continued on their travelling, with the final straw being losing a girl who asked to come with me from a club because I had nowhere to take her. Earlier this year I lost motivation to approach because of these losses, thinking that I would make up for it by approaching hardcore after moving out and that approaching while still living with my parents was a waste of time. I went from approaching regularly to becoming a "weekend warrior" of sorts. Don't fall into that trap, your penis will weep for you and your game will start improving at a snail's pace and if you stop altogether it will probably atrophy if you leave it for long enough.

Ease of Approaching

The example of what happened to me highlights one of the most crucial advantages that logistics gives you: ease of approaching. While having better logistics obviously makes it much easier to bang girls whether you met them that night or you just took them on a date, it also makes you approach much more.

When you have great logistics you are always motivated to approach because every time you step outside your front door you'll pass by cute girls on the street. Whenever your bored and have nothing to do on a Wednesday night you can take a stroll to the bar down the corner to see if there's any talent, something you wouldn't do if you had to make the long journey each way from suburbia. With logistics, you not only have a better chance of banging each girl you approach, you approach much more because of the infinitely smaller amount of activation energy each approach will require.

Loading...
I know this because not so long ago a member of the RVF got in touch with me to say that he was visiting my city. While back at home he lived with his parents in the suburbs, when he visited he got a hotel room in the middle of all the action. While back at home it was difficult for him to approach between his job and his living situation, when visiting he was easily able to approach heavily and broke a vicious dry spell he had been experiencing. With no doubt in my mind that would have slept with more girls if he were visiting long enough to follow up on the dozens phone numbers he acquired in the short period of time.

Now stop and think the difference in your average man's level of game and sex life after a few years of living with his parents versus living with great logistics like in the above example. This is why it's imperative for young guys to leave the nest as soon as possible, because when you're young you're not a lame corporate manboob yet have massive energy, libido and potential and every day you that you don't harness that you waste it.

Moving Out Is An Essential Step In Becoming A Man

The earlier you leave, the less complacent you will be later. Don't become one of those parent's basement dwelling 27 year old's. Feminists do indeed say this a lot, but it is true that any dude who still lives with his mum is not a man yet.

Many of you will say that you cannot afford to move out. Before you say that research how much your rent, bills and groceries will cost you if your share an apartment. Plus the cost of your clothes, alcohol, cover charges and every other expense that you will be responsible for. An easy way to estimate this is to take how much rent will be paying and multiply it by four, or three if you're not going to be taxed much and aren't concerned about saving yet.

Make Sacrifices

In order to slash your rent, which will be your biggest expense, considering converting living room the living room of your apartment into an extra bedroom, perhaps with the use of portable walls, to reduce your individual rent burdens. You might think this will overcrowd the apartment, but if you'd rather designate a special room just to watch television rather then making moving out home possible you need to rethink your priorities. If you need a space for everybody to gather and chill, using somebodies bedroom can suffice.

Sacrificing space in order to move out from your parents home is worth it. I once lived overseas with 3 of my friends and I slept in the one room divided into quadrants, each of us with only a wardrobe, desk and a bed to our personal space. Despite these living conditions, it was one of the happiest times of my life because of the experiences I had and memories I made in that period, two things which are much more important to one's happiness than material possessions. Besides you're young, you don't need all that much space.

I understand that it's not financially possible for many people to move unless you have a full time job. With part time work, savings and support from family or the government it is however very possible (depending on where you live) if you make sacrifices and budget well. Hell, you already know somebody that is doing it. In the end, you will never know unless you try. Whether it is a success or a failure and you end up moving back in with your parents, moving out is a fundamental to personal growth as a man in the 21st century. I'm taking my shot at it, and I urge you all to "man up" and take a shot as well.

Read Next: 5 Bachelor Pad Essentials

The Easiest City In The World To Get Laid

March 27, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

[image]
Imagine a place where you can realistically have sex approximately 50% of the nights you head out.

Imagine a place where you can talk to a girl from California, Oregon, Canada, China, Florida, Chicago, NYC, Brazil, Italy, France and Russia all on the same night.

Imagine a place where every single girl you meet is on vacation…and drunk.

Imagine a place where nobody has to drive anywhere.

Imagine a place where there are people partying 24 hours a day.

Imagine a place where a Tuesday night is the same as a Saturday night.

Imagine a place where indulging in your deepest and darkest pleasures is promoted… by the city itself.

I am referring to Las Vegas. This weekend's trip reminded me again, as it always does, that Vegas is hands down the easiest place to have sex I've ever been to — and I've been all over America and to over 60 cities outside the US. Any semblance of game and a willingness to put in a handful of approaches and any guy can have sex there. I'm not exaggerating, it's that easy. So why is it like this?

Logistics

Everyone is staying at a hotel nearby. You are no more than a 10 minute cab ride from almost every hotel, and only a 2 minute walk to the cab line. Plan correctly and you walk upstairs to your room and be there in 5 minutes. Nobody has work the next morning.

Mentality

Absent the people working, everybody is here on vacation. People fly in from as far away as Russia, and LA residents like myself may make a snap decision to take a quick 45 minute flight or drive 4 hours to party the weekend away. Some even start drinking before they land in the state of Nevada.

What are girls on vacation like? Slutty. Did I just sleep with that guy? Oh well, I'm on vacation! I have a boyfriend? It's okay, I'm on vacation! These are the standard thoughts that go through a girl's mind whether she's vacationing in Costa Rica, Madrid or NYC. As long as she's not in her home town there are less consequences for her actions. Now take that and couple it with what has to be the single greatest public service announcement in history for single men…

"What happens in Vegas, stays in Vegas."

If I could thank one man in person for what he's done for society, it would be whoever the genius was that developed and marketed this slogan. Let's really think about what this is saying. Basically, whatever the fuck you do in this city, nobody will ever find out. If your friends see you leaving with a random dude, it's supposed to "stay" in Vegas. Secrets are not told. You can act out your wildest fantasies be it blowing a dude in the bathroom of XS or getting gangbanged by some guys you just met in an elevator (true story). Your friends, family and coworkers will be none the wiser on Monday morning when you return than they were on Friday when you left.

In fact, Vegas has updated their advertising to keep up with social media. Now, girls are supposed to "know the code." Specifically, they are not allowed to post pictures, update their facebook or tweet about what is or has happened on their trip. And you know what happens when you place girls in a consequent-free environment — they go fucking nuts. Everyone knows Vegas is a free for all. No consequences = no worry of being judged = no need to rationalize your actions. Not only is she on vacation, but so is her hamster.

Opportunity

You can drink and party 24 hours a day in Vegas. You can drink in public on the strip. If you gamble you will drink for free while playing. If you like clubs, you can literally go all day and all night. Night club at 11pm, leave at 4am for afterhours, come back at 1pm and go to a pool party (summer) or day party/brunch (winter) and rinse and repeat. I've seen people so drunk they have been escorted back to their hotels in wheelchairs at 3 in the afternoon.

Like white girls? Asian girls? Foreign girls? Black girls? They are all there. There on business on a Tuesday? No problem. Those that fly in from further places tend to stay longer than just a weekend, so you will find a substantial amount of vacationing girls there on weekdays as well. The opportunity is endless here.

Success Rate

You will succeed here. Even average game has a high shot of success. Take me for example – on my last 6 trips to Vegas, totaling 16 nights, I've had sex 8 of those nights. On two other nights, I brought girls back who refused to have sex but we engaged in other shenanigans. One girl even apologized to me, saying "I know this is Vegas and I'm supposed to be a slut and not care, but I just can't do it." Obviously not every girl will turn into a raging whore, but even they admit they are supposed to be sluts.

And I'm not a male model by any means. I have only been part of the "game" for a year and a half. I'm not obscenely rich or famous. It would take me over 100 nights in LA to have sex 8 of those nights. In other words, Vegas is different.

They can't be that slutty, can they?

Yes they can. Here are some real stories compiled from my own experience and/or friends' experiences:

- Girl takes me to strip club and pays for my dances before going home with her
- Go home with a 21-year-old who later admits she has a list for Vegas, which includes banging a guy over 30 (me). Also on that list? Have a threesome. Spent the rest of the weekend trying to convince her friends to join, including the girl my friend banged and was sleeping in the bed next to us. Sadly she was unsuccessful.
- A girl meeting four guys in an elevator after a pool party (including my friend), inviting the guys in for a shot, and once there, she got on the bed and asked who's first. A train proceeded to run for the next hour.
- A Russian girl inviting my friend to lick her after she meets him on the elevator at 6am.
- Friend spending 15 hours straight with two Russian girls and showering with them during his bachelor party.
- Making out with a girl within 5 seconds of meeting her (this past Saturday). End up taking her home while her sister (who was there with her boyfriend) goes home with my friend.
- Friend's ex banging a random guy in the pool she just met.

I'm by no means saying you can fly to Vegas and have sex with models every night. Sometimes you get cockblocked too (this past Friday for me). But you can have sex fast and often. Some will be hot, some will be cute and some will not (but hopefully you drank enough that you won't remember). Some final tips:

- Dress sharp. I now wear only suits when I go out. This weekend I wore a tie and pocket square and my results improved.
- If you are in good shape hit the pool parties.
- Approach girls everywhere.
- Don't give up until you are in bed, and don't go to bed until after 7am. No girl wants to go home alone in Vegas.
- Approach smaller groups of girls, cockblocking still exists with bachelorette parties and larger groups.
- To get her from the club to your room tell her you want to gamble. If you're at a different hotel than the one the club's at, tell her you are lucky only at your hotel. Once you arrive at your hotel, if you are wearing a suit like you're supposed to, say you want to change real quick. You should never have to leave the room again.

If your goal is to have a lot of sex with many random girls, I can't think of a better place to attain this goal. Personally I hate the city after 2 nights because of how intense it is. All the drinking, smoke, lack of sleep, and downright indulgence in all senses breaks a man down. But it's the only place in the world where I expect to have sex within my first 48 hours there. Think about that.

Read Next: The Pill That Cures Approach Anxiety

About the Author

Law Dogger is an attorney and the litigation partner of his law firm. A traditionalist at heart, he travels often in an attempt to expose himself to as many cultures across the globe as possible. His column runs every Wednesday and he can be found on Twitter as well.

5 Questions With Captain Capitalism

March 27, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The following is an interview with Captain Capitalism, who wrote Enjoy The Decline…

1. First question I must ask is how's the decline going? What are you filling your days with?

The decline is going good and bad. "Good" in the sense there is unlimited freedom and I do pack my days in with stuff I truly enjoy. My sleep has been not only improving, but increasing. I'm averaging around 9 hours of sleep a night. I run and work out every day and feel much better health wise. I play/blog on the internet and get paid. Have taken the occasional trip south to avoid the cold. And once it stops snowing here in Minnesota I'll be able to head out on a couple motorcycle treks I've been planning.

The "bad" part is that having such freedom and liberty is the excess of time you have. You really need to work at keeping occupied and if you don't, your mind will atrophy and you WILL get down. Nobody else is around as most of your friends are working 9-5 gigs and stuck in traffic till 7. And even then, when people get back from work they're tired and don't feel like going out. You are on a completely different time schedule than they are and must adapt. It is very much like what older people experience when they retire. After 50 years (in my case 15) of a day in, day out schedule, it takes a while for your brain to deprogram and adjust to a retirement-esque lifestyle.

2. Recently the big news was how Cyprus savers were going to have 10% of their money confiscated to bail out their failings banks. What advice do you have for Americans who hold savings accounts? If things get rough here, which assets do you think they will go after first?

My advice to people with savings accounts, checking accounts, and any kind of retirement fund is to diversify, diversify, diversify. You need to prepare for the chance that the government will come in and confiscate you bank and retirement accounts. At the same time you cannot convert all the money in your checking account into silver bullion. And as it just so happens I believe 401k's and IRA's (since they ultimately derive their value from the future earnings of the underlying stocks that compose them) are naturally hedged against hyper-inflation, so I wouldn't liquidate those either.

What you want to do is have some "non-traditional" investments such as silver bullion, gold bullion, guns, skills and trades AND you want them in physical possession. The reason is two fold. First, such investments would dramatically increase should the government opt to nationalize your various savings and investment accounts. Second, in PHYSICALLY possessing them, the government cannot merely with a flick of a switch, transfer your electronically stored retirement account to the US Treasury's coffers. A lot of people recommend owning "paper" silver or gold (meaning mutual funds that invest in gold or silver mining companies), but again, if that is on electronic record, you will be helpless to stop the feds from taking your investments electronically. You don't need a ton (because if that happens prices of physical commodities will skyrocket), but you at least need SOME.

3. In my review of your book, there were many critical comments about libertarianism (I remember one saying that libertarians should move to Somalia). Why do you think there is such a knee-jerk reaction to this ideology?

Loading...
You got me. The libertarian ideology is what America was founded on. Both SOCIAL and ECONOMIC freedom. You leave me alone, let me practice whatever religion, marry who I want, smoke whatever I want, and let me keep the vast majority of the fruits of my labor – as long as I'm not hurting anybody, it's all good. How you can argue against a system like that, I don't know because it is the most adult and successful political model ever devised. I believe it is either people who are too lazy to read up on basic libertarianism or libertarians themselves who speak poorly and give the rest of us a bad reputation.

4. I gave my 16-year-old brother your book Worthless, where you advise against picking a liberal arts major that will not lead to a good job. You advise students to pick a STEM major instead, but with the economy going the way it is, do you still think STEM is safe? What advice would you give my brother today?

You are absolutely correct and I do try to address that in one of the chapters about how not all STEM degrees are safe depending on economic circumstances. For example computer programming was the cat's meow back in the late 90's and early 2000's until somebody realized Punjab in India can do it for a fraction of the cost than somebody in Palo Alto. There was a bio-medical bubble that (though outshone by the Dotcom bubble) left more than a handful of biology majors high and dry. And petroleum engineering (considered the highest earning field) can suffer as oil booms and busts occur.

A good bit of advice when considering a STEM field is to ask "does the job require a physical presence or can it be outsourced over the internet?" This makes even a trade like being an electrician a much more lucrative and stable field than computer programming. However, overall STEM majors are a better bet than liberal arts even if you choose one that is not in demand in that you can re-purpose your original degree into another STEM field that is in demand.

5. Your newest book has sold well and your profile has risen. How do you see your role in the next five years as a critic of liberalism and feminism? What do you hope to accomplish?

Mockery, ridicule and "I-told-you-so-ism." There really isn't much I can do to stop the overall educational, demographic, sociological and political trends in the United States and Western societies. This IS a democracy, and if people prefer to watch "Teen Idol" rather than educate themselves about government finances then it is a fool's errand to try to break through to these people. My life is too short for that.

Instead I will continue to point out the absurdity of both religions (leftism and feminism) not just to increase the blood pressure of their adherents, but do what I can to help the younger generations avoid the fate that most leftists and feminists suffer. I also plan on living my life to it's maximum level of enjoyment and fun. Not just for my sake, but to lead by example and provide people not so much "hope" as much as it is some general guidelines or advice that will make their lives easier. Besides, nothing angers a feminist or a socialist more than a bachelor who refuses to work, refuses to pay taxes, refuses to have children, refuses to "work for the commune," and instead lives life solely for himself, achieving things they never will.

Read More: Captain Capitalism

Mike Tyson On Fear Part II

March 27, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

At the end of my previous installment on Mike Tyson I linked to a clip from the 2008 documentary called Tyson where Mike describes in a sort of stream of consciousness style the various thoughts that are swirling around in his head as he got ready for a big fight. The important lesson that I took away from that clip was that even a fighter of Tyson's caliber and repute still had a lot of self doubt and fear.

Recently I came across another great clip on Mike Tyson. The following is a short documentary (~3 minutes) on Mike Tyson where he talks about his career and his relationship with Cus D'amato, as well as his fight against Larry Holmes (which I referenced in my previous post). I urge you all to take a few minutes out of your day and watch this clip and pay particular attention to what Tyson has to say from around the 2:45 minute mark:

> "In order to show courage there has to be fear, and that's why we have courage, because we are afraid. And that was the most successful part about me, I was so in touch with my fear, I was ferocious and blood thirsty, I hated and dread losing.I had been a loser all my life, my mother's a loser, my father's a loser, and I'm frightened still. That's just how it is in this world of fighters, the fighters are never who they appear to be"

After having watched several documentaries and countless interviews I'm still amazed at how thoughtful and intelligent Mike can be. There's no question he has lived life in the fast lane and that he's got a lot of wisdom to share. Most people are so used to seeing Mike as a complete savage that they are oftentimes shocked that he could produce sage like wisdom.

Anyway, enjoy the clip:

Read Next: Tyson On Fear

Why Modern Feminism Is White Woman's Privilege

March 28, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I've spoken about the limits of feminism before, but today I'd like to explore them further.

Feminism, as a whole, is not without some wide appeal. Women almost everywhere, for example, could get on board the whole "equal pay" train, and most would also agree with many feminist points relating to the evils of domestic violence and the like.

The core of modern gender feminism (the variety that you and I will most regularly encounter in western society today), however, is one that is fundamentally tied to the wishes and desires of affluent, white, western women above all others, and one that privileges their concerns more than anyone else's. I shall explain why this is.

The Core

To understand this, it is necessary to dive into the very depths of feminist history.

The core of the feminist movement is its opposition to "traditional gender roles". Feminism began as a movement built by affluent western white women (most of whom were firmly restricted to domestic life) in order to challenge the notion that a woman's place was in the home and nowhere else. It sought to show that women could be successful outside the home as professionals and thinkers, while also making the case that women could and should have an equal say in matters that go on outside their kitchens (e.g., the right to vote).

The thing is that these problems are, for the most part, white ones, specifically white western ones. Whereas western white women fought during the first and second waves of feminism to carve out roles outside the home, black, Native American, and even many Asian women have held such roles within their respective societies for centuries.

A Difference In Labor

In Africa, women had long labored outside the home. Whereas European gender roles often restricted women from performing labor crucial to society's sustenance (e.g., working in the fields), African women had long played a crucial role in their society's economic sustainability, performing extensive fieldwork and other indelicate but necessary chores. This was true long before slavery, and is still true to this day. They, unlike European women, exerted direct influence on the production and transport of food and in other forms of labor. African women have long been expected by their men to have some sort of say outside of the domestic realm.

Native American women (ancestors of the majority of Hispanics we know today, for the record) were doing the same thing. It was very common throughout Native America for women to perform all kinds of agricultural and other forms of manual labor in their communities.

When you study the "civilizing" missions attempted by Anglo-Americans in Native American societies during the 19th century and examine documents like the Lewis and Clark Journals, you'll see that this was a key bone of contention among Anglo-Americans looking to find solutions to the Indian "problem" as they saw it.

The fact that Native American women were performing actual labor was considered by white Americans to be evidence of their savagery. Meriwether Lewis thought it ridiculous that Native American women he met were sometimes seen performing acts of “drudgery” he considered improper for women, and took this as a sign that Native cultures did not respect their women. Most Europeans agreed with him, and would for centuries after he made his journey.

You would see this emphasized in American Indian “education” policy, whereby Native Americans were forced onto reservations or into boarding schools to be “civilized.” This civilization was based on the notion that they would adopt traditional European gender roles—their men would stop hunting and start farming, while their women would stop farming and start sewing.

Black women in the Americas, like Native Americans before them, spent centuries during and after slavery working outside of what Europeans would consider “traditional gender roles.” White western women were often shielded from serious work and protected in the home—these same women would be the ones to kick off the feminist movement and begin asking for more responsibility outside the home.

Black women already had this, as did Native American and some South Asian women. From a “feminist” perspective, Europeans actually brought Native American and African women backwards. They were already “liberated” from restrictive cults of domesticity—they did not need affluent white women to tell them how to find this liberation.

A Difference In Family Structure

Many African women also lived in matrilineal societies. Whereas European women long existed in a society that saw their marriage to a man as essentially a forfeiture of their economic and social independence, African women could maintain much of this due to matrilineal organizations that gave them greater control over family life and their children’s future.

The same was true of Native American women. In many Indian societies, it wasn't uncommon for the father's line of descent to prove somewhat inconsequential to the actual status of the child, a reality far removed from European norms that conveyed status largely on the basis of the father's name passing to a child.

Loading…

Differences In Male Dominance

Feminism also called for an end to the patriarchy and the dominance of men over women, an initiative that still animates the movement to this day. The problem, of course, is that the "patriarchy" referred to there simply hasn't persisted in every society.

Black men, for example, haven't had true dominion over their women for centuries. In Africa, the black man often had polygamy and certainly plenty of authority, but he also often dealt with matrilineal lines of social organization that limited his dominion and influence over his women and progeny.

In the new world, the black man was essentially a pack horse for his first several centuries. He had no real power to keep his family together (it could be split apart at anytime should a slave owner choose, often deliberately), and he also had no power to guard the sexuality of his women. He had no status or influence relative to the white men who took near undisputed dominion over the sexual capacity of the black female.

White men kept black women as mistresses or concubines and quite frequently impregnated them with very little opposition from black males who, frankly, could do nothing about it. Black men had no real power to stop their wives, sisters or daughters from being used in this way or sold indiscriminately. They had no control over black female mobility or sexuality.

Thus, when white women (over whose sexuality white men did maintain some control) come out and complain about freeing themselves from the “oppressive” control their men had over them, it becomes difficult for blacks to interpret things in the same way. Black men have not historically controlled black women in that way.

Black men also have not prevented black women from seeking roles outside the home in large part due to economic reality. Black males, unlike their white peers, didn’t have the money to fund the stay-at-home mom lifestyle so many white women felt “oppressed” by during the mid-century prior to the second wave feminist explosion in the sixties. While white women were reading “The Feminine Mystique” and ruminating about the “oppressive” nature of their role as pampered suburban housewives, black women were working in what were usually less than ideal conditions.

So how can black women adopt this white feminist narrative regarding the “patriarchy”? They can’t, really. Neither can Native American, Hispanic or even many South Asian women. That narrative comes from a (usually well-off) white woman’s perspective, and other groups simply haven’t had the same experiences.

The Eastern European Model

It must also be noted, lest you think this is strictly a white vs. non-white dynamic I’m trying to establish, that many Eastern European white women of today can’t adopt the western feminist narrative either because communism also saw them “liberated” from traditional gender roles.

While white women in the UK and USA were busy talking about their oppressive restriction to the home and their desire to do all the things men can do, Soviet women were on the frontlines putting bullets in German heads. Eastern European women were entering male realms of society (serving as combat pilots, combat troops, tank gunners, and also working in factories even after the war) earlier and in greater numbers than women elsewhere. The same was true, to some extent, in Communist China.

Thus, when white western feminists started going on and on about the need to be liberated from “traditional gender roles,” you could imagine that such calls may have had less pull in the east. These women had already had a greater taste of such “liberation” than any western white women at that point, and possibly greater than any western women have today (how many females do we have serving as frontline combat troops in the US military?). They simply did not have the same urgent need for that narrative, and many have probably already learned enough about it through experience to know that it has serious pitfalls.

To these and other women (Africans, Native Americans, and some Asians), traditional gender roles might not even seem quite so harmful. Some may even associate less traditional roles with oppression and/or racism. Black women, for example, could argue that they were forced outside of more traditional European gender roles due to racist limitation of black male earning potential, arguing that white female status as housewives within older cults of domesticity was actually a sign of privilege. To them, the white western feminist perspective is simply not as easy to understand, much less fight for.

Western gender feminism as we know it today is a middle/upper-class white, western female phenomenon. Its focus on minimizing the value of traditional gender roles and on the promotion of unrealistic gender equalism is founded on the status those women have historically enjoyed as the most well-protected, pampered, adored, and privileged women in history, and it is designed largely to serve problems that resonate with that experience. Other women can have “feminisms” of their own to address problems they face, but they would be fundamentally different from the kind of feminism we most commonly see here in the west.

Read Next: Modern Woman In Wanting To Be For Herself, Has Destroyed Herself

More Women Are Rejecting Feminism

March 29, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

I recently walked into Whole Foods during my lunch hour. In between checking out the babes in sheer yoga pants, and trying to steal kimchi from the salad bar, I started to notice that the women, notably the white women in their late 20's or 30's, came in two types. Some were pleasant, vaguely feminine, and even vibrant with joy. They were strolling about the store with a pleasing energy, content to sample Gruyeres and Malbecs as they walked about.

Others were rushed, tense, even haggard. These women walked around as if they had the weight of the world on their shoulders; they held everyone in slight contempt, as if for not doing their part to keep civilization running. Why the difference?

That first, comely group were all mothers. Mothers of young children. It's hard to miss the sheer joy these women experience, as mothers who spend their days pushing a stroller around farmers' markets, driving a Range Rover to the yoga studio. All the while, their childless peers in middle management look on in disgust, as cowards and traitors to the cause.

The world of progressive upper class yuppies is cleaving into two. New York magazine has published a long article, describing how young women are starting to embrace motherhood as surely as their grandmothers did in the fifties. A young mother on a internet message board, as quoted by the article's author, says it best:

> "I was … blessed," wrote one woman on the UrbanBaby message boards recently, "with the patience to truly enjoy being home with my kids and know that in the end family is what is important in life—not pushing papers at some crap job."

After several decades, these women are starting to realize en masse what men have always known: work isn't all it's cracked up to be. For all but a lucky few, work is a way to make money, not a way to realize one's self. As these women give birth, they feel the pangs of motherhood and the pull of domestic life. Meanwhile, work is as dreary as ever. These women are taking the work ethic they forged as a diligent student and employee, and applying it to the home. They are going about their domestic duties with an alacrity Martha Stewart couldn't match.

Feminism owes much of its support to the pariahs and outcasts of society, to women who would shudder at taking on feminine roles. Little surprise then, that feminism is most advanced in America, the society of pariahs. The historical record suggests many feminists were lesbians, like Mary Wollstonecraft, Susan B. Anthony, or the literary character Olive Chancellor. These women have probably always existed, but they traditionally lived on the fringes of society. Like your gay uncle at family reunions, they were met with a mix of tepid acceptance and distance, if not outright ostracism. In the past century or so, they've become dominant, and accepted by society, at least in name if not in practice.

While more women than ever espouse feminism, it's not clear that it's something that women are actually satisfied with. After all, if women can't be trusted to tell you what arouses them, why assume they know what they're talking about when they say a career will make them happy? Absent propaganda and welfare to prop up feminism, women would drift back to a more traditional, feminine role.

Maternal Careerism Is Past Its Peak

Chart 2. Labor force participation rates of married mothers by age of youngest child, 1994–2005

Participation of married mothers peaked in 1997, and has since declined, and then plateaued. Admittedly, the statistics are not that strong. But I sense things are slowly shifting, especially among upper class married women. Things like how 28% of female Harvard College graduates with MBAs are housewives. Witness a recent headline from the Daily Beast: "They raise chickens. They grow vegetables. They knit. Now a new generation of parents is even teaching their own kids." Are they referring to Little House on the Prairie? Actually, it says "urban parents" in the original headline, making it clear this is a yuppie phenomenon. And to make clear, they're talking about white hipsters, not poor inner city minorities, as the word 'urban' is usually meant.

Loading...

Parenthetically, I love how the author can't bring herself to call these women 'housewives,' and instead uses the abomination 'SAHM,' for 'stay-at-home-mom.' She only calls the women before the 1960's housewives. It's as if she must christen these new 'SAHMs' as good, while the housewives of the 1950's and before were bad. The women of prior generations didn't get to experience being a worker bee, while today's women do. So yesterday's women were ignorant and sheltered, while today's housewives are valiant and honorable for… making the same exact decision. Except she is less fertile and less beautiful than her grandmother would have been, at the time of marriage and childbirth. I suppose an ex-crackhead is superior to someone who has never touched drugs, because the ex-crackhead broadened her horizons and eventually walked away, while the abstainer avoided drugs entirely… or something. Never mind that the crackhead's life has come under irreparable damage during that stint of 'finding herself,' or that many crackheads never actually quit the drug.

The real implication is that as a woman, you deserve applause for everything you do. You had a long career in middle management, and successfully retired to an empty home?

You go girl! You got married at 30 and had several kids? Girl Power! There is no positive, coherent idea as to how people should behave; one can't even note what makes women happy, and recommend they do that. But, as a woman, the one thing that you definitely shouldn't do is limit your options. Don't you dare get married at 23 and throw away that promising career in public relations. You must preserve your choice.

On occasion, I've made the mistake of disclosing some of my traditional views at work when asked. My confreres were offended and disturbed when they heard what I said. They said, "It's okay if you just want this traditional life for yourself, as this private thing for yourself. But you can't just go around saying your way is better! You're not allowed to say that!" "But it is better; it would give people more meaningful, satisfying lives." To the progressive, you can't recognize that one way of life is generally superior to another, because that would be… imposing. Especially if you're right, and your observations aren't progressive.

Homeschooling On The Rise

In the 60's and 70's, homeschooling was the province of a few hippies and Christians. Since then, it has become a national phenomenon – from 1999 to 2007, homeschooling increased by over 75%, from 850,000 students to 1.5 million. The website Etsy, the eBay for hipsters and artisanal goods, even has a nice essay on one woman's story as a merchant and homeschooling mother. The practice has broad appeal, with leftist academics and Evangelical Christians partaking. Elite colleges are increasingly receptive to homeschooled students, who do well in classes and are more likely to graduate on time. And contrary to what you might think, homeschooling is most common among middle income households, earning $25-75,000. Homeschooling is relevant, because it's usually incompatible with a typical 'career;' at least one parent must spend lots of time with the child, and usually it is the mother. Homeschooling is especially pronounced where only one of the two parents is in the labor force.

While it's inherently difficult to figure out what these homeschooling parents are teaching their children, it's hard to imagine that it's any worse than what public schools offer. Government schooling is as much about enforcing conformity and accepting 'conventional' wisdom, as it is about inculcating knowledge. Presumably, when it comes to homeschooling, there is no requirement to teach your son that homosexuals are saints, to suspend him for playing with his food, or to silence his heterosexuality. It's hard to imagine that the rise of homeschooling is anything but a positive development.

The Future

Fertility in rich countries has plunged; yet some, citing evolutionary biology, predict fertility is due to rebound. Declines in fertility may owe to radical changes in our environment, like industrialization and the entrance of women to the workforce. But women still vary in how many kids they have, and that while some women have four kids while others have none is probably heritable, then the genes linked with higher fertility will spread, and fertility will rise. In other words, childless careerist women, and their male peers, are getting bred out of the gene pool.

Fundamentally, feminist women are like house cats—they are bred in such an unnatural environment that if released to the wild, to places like Russia or pre-Industrial Europe, they would fail spectacularly. They could hardly contend for a moment with the local talent. Without the constant sustenance and oversight from their guardians, they would starve. Without sexual anti-discrimination laws and confiscatory marriage policies, without the constant diversion of money and power to support them, they would flounder. They are parasites, who cannot subsist without their ignorant hosts.

Read Next: Decreasing Marriage Rate Is Hurting Feminism

6 Reasons Why We Should Support Abortion

March 29, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

I was at dinner the other night with several friends, and one of the girls in attendance raises awareness and funding for Planned Parenthood. She makes damn sure everybody knows about it too. As usual, I sat back and enjoyed watching the one idiot at the table who felt it was a good idea to give his counter-feminist opinion on something so culturally sensitive and politically charged.

I have every intention of banging Miss Planned Parenthood, so I let the poor guy twist in the wind and alienate himself. Zero backup from me – he was on his own. It was a slow and painful social death for him, and I couldn't help but feel sorry for the poor chap as he looked at me with "Dude! Why aren't you backing me up?" in his eyes.

And then, in one sentence, he sealed his fate with the pro-choice chick audience. "Abortion is murder. End of discussion!"

But is abortion murder?

Damned if I know. Is a blowjob sex? Is fingering a drunken girl at a party rape?

Clearly the answer to these questions depends solely on how the woman feels about it at the time. Fetal homicide laws in 23 states say causing injury to a woman resulting in the termination of her pregnancy is murder, but those same women in those same states can go have an abortion. Some fetal deaths are murder, and some fetal deaths are not. You gotta ask the chick how she feels about it at the moment, then fund a social program to support her decision.

Stick an ardent pro-choice astronomer behind a telescope and let her zoom in until she finds a single-celled organism trapped in a methane bubble on the side of a rock, and she'll start screaming "I found life on Mars!" Some single-celled organisms are life, and some are not. You gotta ask the chick how she feels about it at the moment, then fund a social program to support her decision.

Finger a drunken girl at a party, and the next day you're just as likely to wake up to a Facebook friend request as you are an arrest warrant. Some drunken sex is rape, and some drunken sex is not. You gotta ask the chick how she feels about it at the moment, then fund a social program to support her decision.

Now that we've established that as a man your job is to shut your mouth and open your wallet, hopefully we can move on from this. There's no way we can adequately cover this debate or come to a conclusion that'll satisfy everyone in a couple of paragraphs, so let's put the "Is abortion murder?" question aside for a moment. Instead of getting bogged down in the details, let's just acknowledge that abortion is legal and make the best of it.

There are many great reasons for men to support abortion, but here are a few of the main reasons I stand with Planned Parenthood and pro-choice feminists:

1. Abortion is a great way to reduce the minority population.

I saw a black guy at the supermarket the other day and he looked like he may be up to something (khakis and a polo shirt with a corporate logo ain't fooling anyone here). In almost the same month, a Hispanic man said "hi" to me, and it took me five minutes to realize who he was because I didn't recognize him without a leaf blower. Needless to say, both incidences were powerfully inconvenient and offended my Caucasian sensibilities.

Fortunately, black women are four times more likely and Hispanic women are 2.5 times more likely to have abortions than white women, so we're moving in the right direction. It's not Susie Suburb who whacks her kid, its Jai'lysa Williams and her friend Pepita who fill the waiting rooms at abortion clinics.

That's why I can't figure out why the White Nationalist faction of the Manosphere hates pro-choice feminism so much. You'd think shorter lines at Kentucky Fried Chicken and a few less "RIP Jose Gonzalez 1994 – 2011" signs airbrushed in Old English font across the back window of an unregistered pickup truck would be enough to bring us together.

2. Abortion is great way to reduce the number of Democrats.

Nearly 58% of Democrats are pro-choice, versus 22% of Republicans. Clearly a reduction in leftist ideology is a good thing, since entitlement programs are a real drag on our economy. Who knows, maybe we can actually abort our way to a balanced budget by reducing the number of babies born with their cute little hands out for gub'ment assistance. Once again, Planned Parenthood is doing us all a favor.

3. Abortion is a great way to please the Lord.

Loading...
Studies show that up to 25% of all clinically recognized pregnancies will end in spontaneous abortion (SAB), or miscarriage as it's more commonly known. Clearly the biggest threat to the unborn child is God himself, so there goes the religious part of the argument. Plus, over 70% of abortions are given to women who self-identify as Protestant or Catholic, so religious women don't seem to think it's an issue either. Who is on the Lord's side? Planned Parenthood apparently, which is why I stand with them.

4. Abortion saves men from having to transfer wealth to sluts.

Over 67% of abortions are performed on women who have never been married. That doesn't include the number of women who were married in the past but unmarried at the time of the abortion. And since 60% of abortions are performed on women who have had at least one child already, the overlap shows that most abortions are saving a lot of alpha players from having to write a check to a single mom who is already getting a check from some other poor schlep.

5. Abortion promotes educational opportunities and a workforce dedicated to gender diversity.

Well over half of all abortions in America are performed on women in their 20's. These are their prime education and critical working years, so removing unplanned biological barriers to educational and professional success is the right thing to do. Hell, there's always in vitro fertilization later after a woman hits the wall, and even then she can still decide to get an abortion if she changes her mind after the expensive little feller sets up shop in her substandard uterus.

6. Only a little over 18,000 fully-formed babies are chopped up and sucked out of the womb each year in the United States.

That's actually not a bad number if you think about it in relation to the total number of abortions that occur each year in America. It's actually less than 2% of the total, and hey, sometimes it takes a woman 5 months or more to determine if having a child is convenient. Sure it probably sucks for those little guys, but 18,000+ souls per year taking one for the team is a small price to pay for all the benefits listed above.

Fewer scary black people creeping through our neighborhoods, a reduction in the number of bilingual McDonald's billboards trashing up the freeways, much less of that "Welca do Bank of Amerdika. How may I assiss joo?" nonsense at the teller window, a balanced federal budget, more educational and professional gender equality, and fewer dudes paying child support to some chick they only banged for a month or two sounds like heaven on earth to me.

Feminists and Skinheads unite! Girl Power and White Power complement each other nicely, and a pro-choice Manosphere is a success story just waiting to happen. If you would like to join me, you can make a donation here to show your support as we right-to-choose our way to a whiter, safer, wealthier, and more aesthetically pleasing America.

References: [1] [2] [3] [4] [5]

Read Next: The Matrix Is Getting Pissed

The Other Red Pill

March 29, 2013 | by John Bayard | Link | Original Link

"Red pill" is so well established in the culture that few need to Google it anymore. It's about wish versus reality, the way things appear versus the way they really are. In respect to the manosphere, it's especially about feminism and game. In the political/economic sphere, it's represented by what Mencius Moldbug coined "the Cathedral": The common interests — and common narrative — of the institutions and individuals who derive benefit from the endless growth of the state.

The economic manifestations of the red pill are likewise well-known to most ROK readers. To understand the machinations of politicians, one need only ignore their words and watch what they do. Regardless of party affiliation, American politicians at the higher levels are doing what politicians have always done, which is to increase their power and net worth — via government — as much and as rapidly as feasible. It's gotten fairly breathtaking at the federal level, with full-time lobbyists numbering in the thousands. When the Copyright Term Extension Act was enacted, one didn't even need to hear it referred to as the Mickey Mouse Law to reasonably guess it had been pushed by corporate lobbyists like Disney.

Two Political Parties Treated As One

Since the structure of the US legal system makes the balder forms of corruption (like the classic cash under the table) hazardous, money-for-influence has taken on a more long-run, generic form. Using presidential elections as an example, favor-seeking donors just make generous campaign contributions to both the Democrat and Republican candidates. Heads the corporate donor wins, tails the corporate donor wins. There's no prosecutable trail between donation and reward, because no one ever needed to sit down in a smoke-filled room to make the arrangement. The modern president knows that, after his term ends, he'll have his pick of numerous lucrative "jobs" (sitting on corporate boards), speaking engagements, and sweetheart business/investment deals. From his perspective, it's a one-party system, and as a high-level participant, there's no question he'll end up swimming in riches. The fact that he does things while in office that have a hugely negative effect on most citizens just doesn't make any difference. Indeed, in the echo chamber of the Cathedral, he may be largely unaware of the damage.

Kicking the can — applying short-term patches to make it to the next election, leaving the next administration to deal with the fallout — has been raised to the level of an art form in the United States. Everyone knows that the debt and spending have reached surreal levels, so no need to bore you with numbers. What is really striking is the lack of outright…well, fear. We had a taste of it in 2008, when most every major banking-related organization had to be bailed out to prevent a total financial collapse. But here we are, five years later, with not only none of the root causes addressed, but with their having been hugely amplified…by means of the very practices which caused the wreck in the first place.

Am I preaching to the choir here? Probably. Since most men are not fortunate enough to have significant capital to deploy to benefit from the coming inflation, a common response to the above is “Tell me what I don’t already know.” But here is where I part ways with most members of the manosphere: I believe the investment vehicles that benefit from inflation are going to do better than most people expect. A lot better.

Not to put too fine a point on it, I think that they’re going to make the dot com bubble look like a hiccup, and that portfolios which seem very modest today will expand into fortunes in the fullness of time. Given that the Fed has conjured massive amounts of new dollars out of thin air, and that Congress has proven itself utterly incapable of making any meaningful reductions in spending, what else can realistically be expected to happen? Some argue that a deflationary collapse will put the kibosh on inflation, but in a fiat money system, sorry, that just doesn’t pass the smell test. The Fed can print endlessly, and Helicopter Ben has made clear his determination to do so. The elephant in the room is inflation, and the red pill most men have yet to swallow is the one that will open their eyes to the massive personal impact of owning metals and the miners.

The Shaming Of Minerals

A few of you are old enough to remember the Seventies, when inflation was a headline issue. What you may not remember is that the MSM successfully discouraged the public from fleeing into precious metals and mining stocks until the last year of that bull market. Those who quietly accumulated during the early and mid 1970’s made out like bandits but, just as today, they were successfully painted by the Cathedral as foil hat wearers.

The association was (and remains) with preppers, Christian fundamentalists, and anyone else that the TV camera could be pointed at who appeared (or could be made to appear with film editing) nutty. Such treatment lives on today in slogans like “You can’t eat gold.” But metals investors in the Seventies were riding only a mini-bull, a mere precursor to the one born some twelve years ago. This new one is occurring in the context of a worldwide inflation, one which will probably culminate in drastic changes to the global monetary system.

History says men who are in position to benefit from such an inflation will be flying high, while those who are not will be fed. “Positioned in” means owning both bullion and mining stocks, because another page from the historical playbook is that ownership of physical metal will eventually be outlawed, leaving the mining equities as the only (legal) game in town.

People like me, who watch the equities closely, are amazed at how much the miners have been lagging bullion lately. Not that I’m complaining; I loaded up in 2001 and so still have tremendous percentage gains. But the ratio of the gold and silver mining stock prices in relation to gold and silver bullion are on a par with the Bottom, at the turn of the millennium, when trade shows featuring the mining companies had to bus in retirees and give them free food so the exhibit hall wouldn’t look so empty. Today, the metals are still slumbering in their most recent interim downturn, the mini-bear that began in autumn of 2011.

Who Should You Listen To?

If you seek counsel from most anyone on this topic, they'll urge you to steer clear of the sector. "The bull market is over." Problem is, that's been the refrain during each interim correction for the entire bull market. "Yes, in hindsight, speculators have made a killing, but it's over. You missed it." That isn't Economics 101 talking, it's the Cathedral. Pay no attention to that secular bull market behind the curtain. The fact that central banks worldwide are printing like mad will not cause a raging bull in the mining stocks. Disregard charts like this one. Move along, nothing to see here. Buy Apple and Facebook.

Barring the tiny minority of us who can be a Skittles Man, money is important, it matters a lot. Not speaking of the Porsche-and-prawns level, but just the ability to function, to be well in body and mind. Ben Bernanke has vowed to prevent deflation, which means he's promised the US is going the route of every other country that ever tried to print its way out of a funk.

It's my studied opinion that any man who is not educating himself on how to benefit from inflation is setting himself up – by default – to be knocked out of his chair. The great news is that the miners have become so cheap that any basket of decent companies purchased now is all but certain to experience massive percentage gains over the next two or three years. The metals themselves have been drifting sideways for eighteen months, a new record for this bull market.

I respectfully suggest you swallow the other red pill. Ignore the Cathedral narrative on metals and mining stocks and protect yourself by getting into position now, so you will have a seat at the captain's table when the inevitable inflation makes its appearance.

Read Next: Have You Swallowed The Red Pill? Take The Test

The 6 Commandments Of Masculinity

March 30, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

A recent thread over on the forum made me think of the most important aspects of masculine development. Here is a list of the 6 most important themes from that thread.

1. "Study hard what interests you the most in the most undisciplined, irreverent and original manner possible." — Richard Feynman

The one thing you can be sure of in life is your own mind. The knowledge you have accumulated will grow and serve its purpose into old age. It is this knowledge which will help you more than instinct. Always be reading and learning from those more knowledgeable than you. Most people's minds are sedated by technology and the internet. Everything that has ever been written is at your fingertips so go and find something, anything to learn about. Whether it be a new skill, history, philosophy or science, always be learning.

2. "Game is everything and everything is game" — Tuthmosis

Game is a mandatory skill for every man. The most successful men you meet will have impeccable social skills. Game gives you the ability to make people comfortable and get what you want out of life. Follow the 16 commandments to a T and always be tweaking your skills. Pussy makes the world go 'round, think outside the box and learn to make your own supply. If you want good favors from the poon-gods always have your logistics in check.

3. "Women. They are a complete mystery" — Steven Hawking

Not if you study game.

Loading...

Understand the nature of women, what drives them and then you will know how to approach them. The one piece of advice for any man would be to judge women by their actions and not by their words. The same girl that says shes a nice girl who likes a sensitive man will be dripping wet after displays of your masculine dominance. Know that women crave strength and dominance; weakness elicits disgust. In spite of this do not hate women for what they are, understand their nature and appreciate it. Instead of detesting that a woman will base her actions off of emotions (and rationalize them later) use this to your advantage and instill in her the mood you want.

4. Health Is Your Number One Priority

Health, like knowledge, is best to create early in life. Being healthy is being free. Start lifting, eat unprocessed foods and experiment with things like juicing. Aside from your physical well-being a healthy body will improve your game.

5. “Be so bold and daring as to make yourself excruciatingly uncomfortable.” — thedude3737

Always be pushing yourself to be better. Stagnation is the enemy of progress and without pushing your comfort zone you will never progress. This discomfort will eventually turn into confidence in a given situation and this confidence is the life-blood of self-improvement. Confidence will also allow you to maneuver effortlessly in any aspect of your life leading to improvements in all areas. Douse your fears and success will follow.

6. Be Completely Unapologetic In Your Masculinity

Do not let the ‘shit-test’ that is modern feminism discourage you from embracing your biology. Do not apologize for your testosterone. Read and experience all that is man. Eat steak, drink beer, have sex with feminine women. This being said do not espouse your views because the average person is too comfortable in their naive existence. Be the change you want to see and follow the 48 Laws Of Power while you’re at it.

Read Also: How To Change Your Bad Habits

What Are You Prepared To Do?

March 31, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

"What are you prepared to do?" was the rhetorical question posed to Eliot Ness by the Sean Connery cop character named Malone in the 1987 film The Untouchables. I recently had occasion to wonder about this same question myself. Let me explain.

A few weeks ago I met a friend of mine at a boteco in the Leme district of Rio. He's an expatriate who operates a motorcycle touring business and knows a few interesting characters, the types of Joseph Conrad-esque people who always seem to wash up on the shores of foreign lands, for one reason or another. My conversations with people that night stayed with me for some time.

I first spoke to a couple of Syrian civil war refugees from Aleppo, both only 19 years old and working as waiters in local restaurants, who had been forced to leave their country and had experienced untold hardships along the way. These guys carried themselves with such dignity and composure that I could not help but admire them. They had guts aplenty. They were living proof of the adage that, although courage may not be the only virtue, it is the one virtue without which all the other ones become meaningless.

The most memorable conversation that night was with an intense Swede. He talked about some of local adventures. I have to admit that my previous contacts with Scandinavian men had not exactly inspired confidence in their abilities as risk-taking swashbucklers. But this guy was different. He had that weird glint in his eye, the type of look that only comes with having seen or experienced something beyond. What do I mean by beyond? Well, just beyond. It turned out that this dude was a hard-core snake-eater, the type of guy of whom old Charles XII of Sweden would have been proud. He related to me the following story.

One night, he had gotten the phone number of one hot Brazilian girl (who was definitely into him) at a club and had entered it into his cell phone. In the early hours of the next morning, making his way along Rua Nossa Senhora de Copacabana, he was confronted by a street thug who approached him quickly and pressed a metallic object against his ribs. The Portuguese dialogue went something like this:

"Give me the phone and your money, you son of a bitch".

"No. I'm not going to give you my phone. I've got some money and you can have that, but I need my phone because I've got a girl's number in it."

"Listen you stupid bitch, I'm going to kill you. I don't fucking care about your phone numbers. I'm hungry. Give me the phone and the money".

Loading...
"No".

The thug hesitated, realizing the interaction had entered uncharted territory.

"I'm going to kill you".

“Well, I have 60 rials. That’s all I’m willing to do. Here it is. Take it and go.”

The thug, flustered and not knowing quite how to handle the situation, took the money and scuttled away. The Swede ended up calling the girl and turning it into a successful short term relationship. He had persevered and won. On the subway ride back home that night, I could not get this little drama out of my mind and what, if any, lesson might be learned from it. Now, I am not advising that anyone should be a reckless fool, or plunge stupidly into dangerous situations. Truth be told, I would almost certainly have chosen discretion as the better part of valor in that situation.

But I do think there is a lesson here. In life, there are times when we must face serious danger, and take serious risk, if we want to push “beyond” and acquire that special glint in our eyes. That special glint that others will sense, but never fully experience for themselves. This guy was willing to face serious injury (or worse) for the sake of his goal, which was closing the deal with this girl. Regardless whether you agree with his priorities, the lesson still remains: if you are not constantly looking for ways to push yourself out of your comfort zone, you will not triumph.

Whether in business, life, or love, physical courage is paramount. Condition your body to become accustomed to physical discomfort and pain. Learn how to take physical hits. Know what your blood tastes like. Slash and hack away at your fears, as Hercules sliced the heads off the multi-headed Hydra, and cauterize that Hydra’s bloody stumps, as he did, so that new fears do not grow anew. Do not listen to the little voice in your head which tells you to retreat into your cushy comfort zone. I say that sometimes in life, we must throw out our grappling hooks, board that enemy vessel, draw our cutlasses from their scabbards, and fight with grim fury. And if you are not prepared to do this, you will not be successful. How far are you prepared to go?

Read More: The Shortness Of Life

The Downfall Of Every Diet

March 31, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Paleo, slow carb, vegan, atkins, intermittent fasting, you name it – they all suck. And all for one very simple reason. They artificially limit food choice. I already hear groaning. Isn't that the point of a diet? Indeed it is, and it is also exactly why you should avoid them. I believe the only diet you should adhere to is your own. What I mean by that is don't be lazy. Instead of taking someone else's pre-defined list of acceptable foods (whatever that means), figure out which foods work well for you, and more importantly, which you should avoid.

We are all different. Different foods affect different people in different ways. For example, eating foods that are high in lactose really bothers my stomach. So guess what? I don't eat ice cream or drink milk. Another example: eating a huge lunch (1500+ calories) leaves me feeling tired and lethargic. Again, guess what? I limit my lunch to roughly 1000 calories.

There are several important dietary considerations that everyone should account for in their diet…

Allergy

If you have a known food allergy, then avoid any foods that contain the allergen. For example, if you have celiac disease and cannot tolerate gluten, then research which foods contain it and avoid them.

Even if you do not have a known allergy, pay attention to your stomach. Do you constantly get bloated or have an irritated stomach after eating certain foods? Then avoid those foods. Chances are you have Irritable Bowel Syndrome (IBS), a term that encompasses a wide range of symptoms associated with abdominal pain caused by food digestion.

And honestly, that doesn't even matter. This is not rocket science. Just notice when you have poor reaction and eliminate the culprit. If you are unsure which food item it was that caused the problem, then eliminate one at a time from subsequent meals. Within a few days you will know. If you end up having sensitivities to grains, starches, legumes, and dairy then guess what – you are eating paleo! Honestly, you probably have a better chance at the lottery.

Energy

Loading…

Different foods will affect your energy levels in different ways. A lot of people report that they crash after a high sugar meal. Personally, I do not notice this phenomenon. If you do, then quit eating high sugar meals. Same goes for eating small meals vs large meals, a lot of carbs vs few carbs, etc.

There is no magic combo that works for everyone. Just because you feel great on diet A or diet B does not mean that a certain diet's prohibited foods will have a negative effect on you. In fact, many diets lead you to limiting your carb intake. Adding back in some carbs will most likely give your energy levels a substantial boost. Which leads me to my next point.

Macro-nutrient Balance

I seriously question any diet that restricts any one of the three macro-nutrients. Your body needs fats, carbohydrates, and protein. Fats are the only source of essential fatty acids, which are required by the body but cannot be produced by it naturally. Fats also help the body absorb and utilize vitamins A, D, E, and K and therefore are vital for healthy skin, hair, bones, and teeth (1). Carbohydrates can be converted into glucose (the sugar your body uses for energy) faster than fats or protein, and therefore is the preferred form of energy (2). Every cell in your body contains protein, and it also plays a major role in repairing cells and creating new ones (3).

So if you currently ARE following a specific diet, ask yourself why? If it is working for you and you enjoy it, by all means continue. But, realize you are most likely unnecessarily limiting your selection of foods, and in some cases may be neglecting a key macro-nutrient.

Check out my new book Shredded Beast here.

Read More: 4 Reasons Why Your Diet Sucks

References

1. National Research Council. Recommended Dietary Allowances, 10th ED. Washington, DC: National Academy Press, 1989.
2. Turcoatte LP, Hespel PJ, Graham TE, Richard EA. Impaired Plasma FFA oxidation imposed by extreme CHO deficiency in contracting rat skeletal muscle. Journal of Applied Physiology 1994;77(2):517-525.
3. Shils ME, Young VR. Modern Nutrition in Health and Disease, 7th ed. Philadelphia, PA: Lea & Febiger, 1988.

Why Can’t I Leave A Smiley Face?

March 31, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I released a new book that I think you might be interested in. Here’s an excerpt:

> The cougar had a habit of abruptly ending the conversation with me to go babysit her blonde friend with whichever new guy she was talking to. She seemed to get a kick out of playing matchmaker, but she started to make me look like a fool, expecting me to wait for her every time she left. A man can only take so much from a girl he doesn’t even like.
>
> She gave me a kiss then said, “Hold on, I have to talk to that guy over there to hook my friend up.”
>
> “You go talk to that guy and when you come back I won’t be here,” I said.
>
> “What do you mean?”
>
> “I’m not going to wait while you talk to him.”
>
> “Whatever. I had a boyfriend for three years and he was controlling just like you. That’s why I broke up with him.”
>
> “You can do whatever you want. You can talk to him, but I’ll be gone.”
>
> “I don’t believe that. You’re blowing it, you know. Do you want this to work or not?”
>
> Loading...
> “It’s my way or the highway.”
>
> She said nothing while I looked around. Then she put her arms around me and kissed me. I wanted to laugh that I was being tested by an older woman who wasn’t that attractive. I was curious how many poor saps had failed her stupid tests only to wonder why things suddenly went south.
>
> Something inside me started to come alive, a part of me I hadn’t seen in a while. It was the part that wanted to hurt a woman, just for the hell of it.

America, bringing the worst out of me since 1979.

The brief book is a collection of stories about my one month return to America after living in Europe for almost two years. Grab the book at a discount if you order by midnight tonight. Click here to learn more.

WHY CAN'T I USE A SMILEY
FACE

Nation’s Sodomites Under Threat As Expecting Parents Abort Homosexual Fetuses

April 1, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

San Francisco, Calif. — Recently, a pre-natal exam has become available to screen for homosexuality among male fetuses, and the results are devastating; among fetuses diagnosed with homosexuality, 90% have been aborted.

The test is highly non-invasive; nurses obtain a sample of blood from the mother, and measure the levels of free-flowing estrogen released by the fetus into the bloodstream. When the fetus is male, heightened estrogen levels indicate that the fetus is in fact homosexual. Test results are further confirmed by an ultrasound of the fetus, which technicians use to assess the angle of wrist flexion:

High Definition Ultrasound

Male fetuses with over 30° wrist flexion or extension are over 99% likely to be homosexual. When these results are combined with the estrogen level figures, the test correctly identifies homosexual male fetuses 99.9% of the time, with a false positive rate under 0.1%. The test was developed by researchers at Uganda’s Makerere University’s School of Medicine, under a grant funded by the Ugandan national government.

Wrist Flexion & Extension, As Indicator Of Homosexuality

A Progressive Nation Divided

The test has caused quite the schism among formerly tight-knit progressives. Feminists have defended the use of the exam and any abortions that ensue from it, saying it is a woman's right to abort for any reason, at any time. Even some lesbians are coming down on the side of choice. Said one, "The main thing is that the act homosexuals commit is ugly and repugnant and afterwards they're disgusted with themselves. They drink and take drugs, to palliate this, but they are disgusted with the act and they are always changing partners and cannot be really happy…. In women it is the opposite. They do nothing that they are disgusted by and nothing that is repulsive and afterwards they are happy and they can lead happy lives together." With the surging popularity of in vitro fertilization among lesbian couples, these choices are being made by everyone. Proponents of choice have cited the threat of back-alley abortions with wire hangers, if abortion is further regulated.

Loading...
[image]

Lesbian Protests for Abortion Rights

Meanwhile, queer men are up in arms at the prospect of a diminished future. Dr. Toby F. Gott of Wesleyan University's Feminism, Gender & Sexuality Studies (FGSS, pronounced fægz for short) said, "imagine if these tests remain legal, their use surges, the population of buggers will decline. Who will lead Zumba classes to whip overweight single women into shape? Who will have both the strength and the grace to push those food carts down airplane aisles? Who will wear Ed Hardy? We are talking about a homocaust here."

California legislators are mulling banning these selective abortions, but are running up against protest from the National Organization of Women and Planned Parenthood. Meanwhile, some medical practitioners are concerned that their fields will lose funding. Dr. Derr E. Ehr, uro-proctologist and director of the Anal Health Center, worries that researchers like him will lose their funding grants in a nation with fewer sodomites. Officials at the AIDS Research Institute at the University of California, San Francisco have expressed similar concern.

Meanwhile, Republicans are still trying to convince the nation that (1) they are sodomite friendly and (2) are not actually sodomites themselves. Recent epiphanies surrounding Republican politicians belie that, however.

A Republican And His Favorite Meeting Grounds

With the nation's great and good lining up on both sides of the debate, the outcome remains to be determined.

Read Next: 7 Traits Of The Male Feminist

How To Identify A Roast Beef Vagina

April 1, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

We've all been there. Your dapper charming self has wooed a girl by way of traditional date or maybe night time escalation. You get home, the mood is right, the drinks have been flowing and you have convinced her that in fact, yes… sex is a great idea. That magic moment comes when you start undressing her, she is on your bed and lifts her perfectly shaped bottom 6 inches off the duvet cover so you can slide her underwear off. And then you see it…

The dreaded roast beef. The meat curtains. The sleeve of wizard. Call it what you will, but for most that is quite the turn off and the last thing a man like yourself wants to see flapping in the wind before engaging in the feel-good coitus that could have been. Contrary to popular belief, it is not genetic. Nor is it caused by how many men she's slept with, or how large those men were. Some porn stars have beautiful entry points. So how does one avoid such a surprise? Are there ways to identify roast beef prior before it's too late? The answer is YES, and here are 5 ways to do so:

1. The Fatty Paradox

Most fat girls do not have the carcass cape. The reason is simple — the excess fat in and around the pelvic region creates an inverse effect on the vaginal lips, pushing out the blubber and inducing an inwards turn of the labia. Similar to how a black hole operates, the skin is sucked inwards creating the nice vagina effect. While she may pound away a ton of roast beef, at least her nether region will be devoid of any such flap happy activity.

2. Vowels

Avoid girls whose names end in consonants. This may seem strange and unsubstantiated by science, but it's true. If you have an Erica, a Melissa, an Yvonne, or perhaps an Alexandra, rest assured you will have that perfect slit surprise when you are ready to do the deed. The beautiful symmetry of a nicely shaped vagina, each lip in direct proportion to the other only separated by a slight line. No excess labial flap, no peek-a-boo wraparound meat skin. It's called the "o" face for a reason.

Loading...

However, god speed to you if you happen to go home with a Marilyn, an Allison, a Brittany or dare I say a Colleen. I hope you have your spelunking gear ready, because it is going to take some cavernous digging to find that clitoris under those goose wings.

3. Vegetarians

This one is self-explanatory. I have yet to meet a vegetarian girl who sports dildo drapes. If she doesn't eat meat, she doesn't yield meat. Rumor has it that protein deficiency causes aesthetically pleasing vaginal formation, but the medical studies have yet to come in on this. Stay tuned.

4. Window Coverings

This tactic only works if you end up at her place. Are her windows covered with blinds and shutters…or curtains and drapes? If it's blinds or shutters, she psychologically identifies her slit with straight, symmetrical openings. Proceed as normal. If she has curtains or drapes however, she is accustomed to long, malleable pieces of fabric. You can see where this is going…

5. Gym Clothes

Let's be honest, those accordion lips take up some extra room. So when you meet a girl at a bar, or the office or maybe a friend's dinner party, just innocuously bring up the gym and what people wear while they exercise. Mention your underarmour clothing. Tell her you have noticed a trend in yoga pants and spandex leggings for female gym attendees. Does she balk at the idea of wearing things so tight? Does she discuss the "freedom" of loose shorts for exercise? If so, you may have a closet pancake draper. Conversely, if she is one of the major proponents of lululemon pants then you may very well have a lady who sports an = sign for a vagina. Congratulations, a winner is you.

Hopefully I have saved some of you from the pain generally associated with being lured into the large labia luncheon. So there you have it. Five almost indisputable ways to identify, and consequently avoid, roast beef.

Read Next: The Perfect Woman: Lips

How To Make A Man Fall In Love With You

April 2, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

[image]

It seems I can't get through two consecutive days anymore without hearing women talk about their relationships or the lack thereof. I'm encouraged when I hear women talking about their boyfriends or husbands in a positive manner, and saddened when I see lovely young women lamenting a stagnant or unfulfilling relationship in which their needs are not met. That's why I've decided to forgo my usual male-centric article and offer a little insight for our female readership instead.

This one is for the ladies.

It has come to my attention that a small minority of intelligent, successful, beautiful and altogether lovely women still struggle with finding a man who is interested in commitment. Of course it's easy for a woman to get dates or short-term relationships based on superficial elements such as excitement or sexual compatibility, but finding love and commitment – assuming you've decided the time is right for you – can often be a daunting task.

Can you really make a man fall in love with you? While the question itself raises ethical and moral concerns, the answer is yes. Most men – from the nice guy to the bad boy player – are open to love and commitment when they meet the right woman. The key to success is creating an environment where love can form and evolve into commitment. When you make that happen, he almost can't help himself.

Let's start with the easy stuff; the things you've heard comedians, coworkers, male family members, guy friends, and even other women say. This certainly isn't news, but it's the foundation for where we're going in learning how to create an environment in which a man's love will spark and commitment will grow.

1. Your level of attractiveness dictates the maximum level of bitchiness you can display and still sustain a relationship.

This graph depicts the level of bitchiness on the Y axis, and the level of attractiveness on the X axis. For example, if you're a Hot Babe-6, then you can afford to crank up the level of bitchiness to a 6. Any more than that and you'll be back out in the dating market in a few months.

But how is something so subjective like attractiveness defined? What constitutes bitchiness? I could give you my opinion, but you'd be better off asking the man you're trying to attract because his definition matters far more than mine. And quite frankly, if gaining a man's commitment and love is your goal, then your definition of attractiveness and bitchiness doesn't really matter either.

There's a flipside to this as well wherein his opinion of himself is trumped by your opinion of him. It's a balanced and equitable approach to mate-vetting, and one should be careful not to set the relationship up for failure by shaming the other partner into espousing a particular view not fundamentally his own. Avoid shaming language like "A real man would…" or "You should man up and…" because only a weak man responds to that, and you'll end up hating him for it later without even knowing why.

2. The high-value man you're trying to attract is keenly aware of your maximum sustainable level of bitchiness versus your actual real-life level of bitchiness.

This is just an example of how attractiveness and bitchiness ratios can be in line or get out of hand across a wide spectrum of women.

3. The gap between your attractiveness level and how bitchy you are is Cupid's workshop.

A positive gap is the only space in the relationship universe where love can germinate and evolve into long-term commitment. The bigger the space, the more quality men you'll have to choose from.

Take a look at the chart above and focus on Hot Babe-7. The HB-7, HB-9 and HB-5 all have positive gaps between their attractiveness and bitchiness levels which will attract men and keep them interested. The superstar here of course is the HB-7. She's the woman every man wants – attractive and easy to get along with. In fact, when it comes to finding love and commitment, she'll easily outperform the two girls who are more attractive than her.

In this example, the HB-9 may make a good trophy wife. The HB-8 is slightly more trouble than she's worth, but she's still attractive enough to secure more short-term interest than she can handle. The HB-6 is the typical American girl and is seen by most men with options as a pump-and-dump candidate. She'll end up getting banged senseless by dozens of men who wouldn't wife her up if their lives depended on it, then she'll shower off the sticky residue and find some schlep to torment in marital hell.

The HB-2 is probably a fat chick with a chip on her shoulder that she won't recognize as metaphorical until she tries to eat it, and the HB-1 is most likely a feminist college student with hairy armpits, acne scars, and a boyfriend who everyone keeps mistaking for her sister.

4. Know the difference between how men with options assess casual relationships versus how they assess commitment.

That's pretty much the entire thought process a man goes through when he hooks up. However, that same man will take a completely different approach when he assesses commitment.

Far more involved than the "yes or no" approach to casual sex and dating, the assessment men conduct before commitment is serious business. If you really want to know how to make a man fall in love with you, here it is. Create Cupid's workspace. Maintain a gap between your attractiveness level and how much of a pain in the ass you are. It's a simple concept, but it'll work.

Here are a few additional tips that may help you along your journey toward locking down Mr. Perfect:

I. You can't fake it. You cannot increase your level of attractiveness by touting qualities you think men should be attracted to.

II. Learn the difference between respect and attraction. Men are not attracted to your education or your professional resume. We respect the level of intelligence and hard work it took for you to earn that Wharton MBA and become an account executive at an advertising agency all by yourself like a big girl, but this does not equate to attraction in any way.

III. Refrain from "Excluded Middle" thinking. Just because a man does not find your education or professional resume attractive does not mean that he finds it unattractive. Don't assume he's intimidated by your success – assume there's an attraction deficit or a bitchiness surplus that your degree or job title simply cannot balance.

IV. Shoot for two down and ten up. Find a man who is two points less attractive than you and 10 years older. As you age, you'll become less and less attractive while his social status and earning power increases which will make him more attractive to women. By shooting two down and ten up, you'll always be the apple of his eye if you stay in shape and lower your bitchiness ratio as your attractiveness declines.

V. Don't get pissed when the chickens come home to roost. Remember how sexually liberated you were during and right after college? Well, that 34 year old man you're hoping to lock down is working in a position of power around a lot of young 20's girls who are every bit as adventurous as you were at that age. You've already noticed that he's not nearly as eager to settle down as you are, so you may have to reduce your bitchiness level to an all-time low in order to keep his attention from turning to the women who are younger, more attractive, less demanding of commitment, less expensive, more eager to please, and much easier to satisfy than you are.

Good luck, Godspeed, and don't forget to send me an invitation to the wedding.

Read Next: 5 Signs You Should Marry Her

About the Author

Edward Thatch was a weekly contributor at Return of Kings until he passed away unexpectedly after being crushed to death under the weight of his own massive ego. Tall, devastatingly handsome, witty, and successful; the poor lad just couldn't handle the supreme awesomeness of his own being. May he rest in peace.

American Culture Is Corrupting Colombian Society

April 2, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

While reading mister Edward Thatch's brilliant article Expensive Woman Seeks Retarded Millionaire, I thought of Colombia. Women ignoring the unstoppable force of time is a trend that has permeated society not only in the United States but also in other countries that have become quickly Americanized. It is evident in certain social circles in my current country of residence, Colombia.

Saturday night I went to a party my cousin had invited me to. She is very well educated and from the top tier (IV) of Colombian society. Needless to say all her social circle belongs to this tier, as you know now from my previous article, Colombian society is extremely classist. Looking down on others for their social class is completely normal.

I arrived to the party expecting a good time with my cousin who had just gotten back from China. She introduced me to her friends, all of them educated in Europe, I introduced myself, grabbed a cocktail and started to mingle. Across the dance floor I saw a gorgeous blonde, a "paisa," a common term that denotes people from Antioquia, the coffee stronghold of the country.

I approached her and waited for her to talk with her particular accent. I said, "Oh, are you paisa?" (the accent is extremely noticeable). She laughed and we started talking. Right away I realized two things: (1) She was from only tier II, economically speaking, and (2) In her head she belonged to tier IV. This meant that if I was to fuck her, my wallet was in for a ride. This thank to the long standing drug money culture that has spoiled women in Medellin, specially those from low classes.

Thirty minutes into the conversation and I had no sight of hooking up with this girl that night. I was getting nasty looks from my cousin's crowd to get me back to the group mainly because I was talking to a girl from lower social status that was way hotter than them. Nonetheless, I wanted to see her again. She served to my New Year's resolution to go out with girls outside of my usual socio-economic range. Needless to say this has changed my overall availability of women.

After I got the paisa's number I went back to my cousin's group. They took turns on destroying her—"Her shoes are fake Louboutin" and "You only talked to her because she has huge tits, and they are probably fake" (which is very probably true due to the high ratio of boob jobs in Medellin). Facing this incredible threat of hate-filled comments I turned to Alejandra, a friend of my cousin who just graduated from LSE and hadn't uttered a word. "What do you think?" I asked.

"She is hot but lacks taste. Still you are completely free to fuck her. I would if I was you". This started a conversation that summarized my entire philosophy of life.

"Why do men do that?" Adriana, a single 30 something doctor asked.

"Do what?"

"That, why do you think you can just have sex with any girl like its nothing."

“Because I can.”

“You think very highly of yourself don’t you?” Here Alejandra interrupted her irritated friend, “Why shouldn’t he? He is very smart, attractive, in shape and rich. In ten years he is going to be the type of man every woman of his age is going to be looking for.” I turned to Alejandra, very surprised by what she had just said. She went on to say “Sometimes I wish I was a man. They have more freedom. In England girls kept saying how much power women have and how strong and independent they are… but we really aren’t, not like men. We can’t sleep around like they do with no consequences. Time plays against us while it plays in favor of them.”

This made Adriana so mad that she went home, I figured it made her so mad because it touched her profoundly. She identified with what Alejandra had said and had no arguments to counter her. She left and I kept talking to Alejandra, who was by far the most down to earth girl I’ve met in my life. She confessed how Adriana had been looking for a single, rich, intelligent 30 year old, and how she had told her that this man will not settle with a girl like her because he simply has no need to do so. She is deep into debt due to her lifestyle.

Loading…
Colombian society is being corrupted by American feminism with fantastic results for alpha males but terrible long term results for women. The main issues I have identified in Colombia are:

1. Women live a delusion

Feminism has convinced them that it is okay to sleep around, act like Ke$ha in her worst day and behave recklessly with no planning of the near future. This means that men have easier lays since girls are actively seeking to get laid and that girls get punished in the long run as this reckless lifestyle takes a toll in their bodies and self esteem. This is fueled by constant feminist ideas and steady beta attention, reassuring them that “it’s ok”, that they “don’t need to worry”, somehow things will just fall into place. They are feminist but still expect a man to come fix it all once they have “lived it up.” They want all of the benefits with none of the sacrifice.

2. The delusion gets more virulent

When my last girlfriend and I broke up, I told her she should really focus on building herself, making something out of herself by attaining some value other than her naturally given striking beauty, since it would fade with the inevitable pass of time. Her response was as baffling as striking. “Fuck you, I’ll be beautiful forever”. This is the spreading of the delusion, they believe they are impervious to the laws of nature and thus, act like if they are.

3. They actively need constant acceptance and approval

Adriana is a perfect example of this, driving a BMW that will take her 5 years to pay off and on which she will pay probably 40 or 50 % more than its regular price, living from paycheck to paycheck to cover her credit cards—even with a good paying job—in order to keep her lifestyle. A lifestyle that she desperately needs to be approved by her friends and get access to the social circle where she hopes to meet her 'savior', a person who will never come, unless she finally settles for a beta idiot, because no man in his right mind, with the attributes that she seeks, would take such a bad decision. This desperation in girls actively seeking men to marry is so evident than even my mother has told me at least 10 times in the last 3 months—"You are getting a prenup if you ever marry"… and that is my Colombian mother speaking.

4. They're too eager to go into debt

I understand wanting to live a good life, driving a good car, living in a pristine place, being able to travel and having access to the best and finest. I really do because that's the life that I myself strive to live, but I get to do that because I understand that I must live my financial life by the principle my dad inculcated to me since childhood, "Son, its not how much you spend, its how much you make." That's it, I drive a good car and have a designer wardrobe, but I have never thought of going into debt to have it, I know my value and my limits and live in them, while striving every day to better myself. As smart as women think they are, their financial sense is less than those telling them they can have it all.

The erosion of my country by feminism has started in force, as they are beginning to believe that being 'equal' is the paradigm of success, when they are not nearly close to that ideal. Alejandra's words reassured something I've known for a while now but I had failed to embrace they way I should have. I should think highly of myself because I have a high value, and every man who does should be proud of that, and if so you too should embrace it, and sleep with as many women as you can.

Read Next: The 5 Socioeconomic Tiers Of Colombian Women

How To Legally Cheat Your Student Loans In 3 Easy Steps

April 2, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

I'm sure you've seen the news about the student loan "bubble" that's 1 trillion and growing. How poor students are being crushed under debt and their future lives completely ruined.

Well, turns out there's a solution to all of this but it's not widely known. Follow these three steps and watch your student debt troubles disappear.

Step 0 – Get the right loans

This technically isn't a step, but it's an important caveat nonetheless. Your student loans must be federal or else nothing here applies.

If you are using private banks to fund your education, stop doing that and switch to Federal loans. Take out additional Federal loans to pay down the private loans if you must.

Step 1 – Get on the IBR Plan

Get setup with an income based repayment plan. To qualify, your loan payments must exceed a certain amount. Here's the full definition:

> You have a partial financial hardship if the monthly amount you would be required to pay on your IBR-eligible federal student loans under a 10-year Standard Repayment Plan is higher than the monthly amount you would be required to repay under IBR.

Since IBR payments are capped at 10% of your income, this means if your payments amount more than 10% of your yearly income you are eligible for the IBR plan. It used to be at 15% but Obama lowered it to 10%.

You also pay zero dollars per month (or an extremely low amount) the closer you get to the poverty level. For example:

[image]

Hmmm… paying $16 for my loans no matter how big my original loan size was sounds pretty good to me. You can play around with the IBR calculator here.

The IBR plan has a lifespan of 25 years, which is a long time, after which any additional amounts you owe are discharged. Depending on the state you are in, the amount discharged will be tacked onto your tax bill. But to avoid this sum you can just threaten bankruptcy, and most likely get the amount you owe reduced somewhere from 80-90%. And if they call your bluff, just declare bankruptcy and avoid any leftover debt. Make sure your big purchases are secured before you do this, and talk with your accountant/tax attorney to learn how to move assets to states that do not allow assets to be confiscated during bankruptcy.

Step 2 – Under-report your income

Right now you're probably thinking this IBR scheme is just to help out broke students who choose lousy majors like women's studies. Although I want to help them too, this article is intended for all income levels.

Loading…

Let's say you sign up for IBR now, but end up making big money in the future. How do you keep those IBR payments down? Just find ways to legally keep your reported income down. Work in cash. Get paid as a "gift". Talk with your accountant and ask what you must report and what you do not. And if your accountant doesn't give you any good ideas, find a new accountant. My accountant saves me thousands every year.

Let's say you make 40K per year, but manage to report only 30K of it. You'll save yourself hundreds on your payments for that year, on top of the taxes you avoid.

Step 3 – Let Inflation Take Care of the Rest

Inflation is a fact of American life. Since the IBR is paid over 25 years, can you imagine how much value the dollar will lose in that time? 25 years ago, gas was less than a $1 a gallon. 25 years from now, gas will be over $10 a gallon.

What does this mean for you? Well, do some math. If you have 100K in the bank and the dollar loses 25% of it's value in the next 25 years, then the real value of your savings is now 75K. Inflation makes it tough to save.

But the reverse is also true: Inflation makes it easy to borrow. Because if you have 100K in debt and the dollar loses 25% of it's value over 25 years, it means you'll have effectively only paid back 75K in real value, which is a net savings of 25K.

In other words, the value of money during inflationary times has more marginal utility in the present than it will in the future, so debt is one of the most profitable investments since you'll pay back less than you spend now.

I know that the interest on student loans means that overall savings from inflation might be neglible. After all, if your 100K loan at 6.8% becomes 200K in 25 years than the 25% you save on the dollar devaluation isn't much.

But if you follow steps 1 and 2 above, it means you'll be finding ways to make hidden sources of income so that what you do pay back will be low payments with severely devalued dollars. Congratulations: you win. And anything left over can be wiped with some bankruptcy threats if not a flat out bankruptcy itself.

