Now, you may ask yourself: isn't this wrong? Even if this is all legal, isn't this… stealing? No, it's justice. Because any student that scams the US Government out of the loan money using the above steps is doing his part to help bankrupt the US Government and hopefully bring about real hope for change.

Disclaimer: I'm no accountant or tax attorney. Make sure you talk with one of the two to avoid doing anything illegal. The IRS will destroy you if you give them the chance. That said, the above loopholes will give you a head-start.

The Dominance Experiment

April 2, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

Women love to be dominated. It is in their biology. Yet men tend to forget this almost universal truth given we are constantly exposed to various forms of masculine women in our western culture, be it via feminism or having to listen to career women brag about their sex and the city type exploits. Ask most girls you sleep with and a large number of them will admit they like to be dominated, they like it when a man takes control, they love it when they are thrown around in the sack. Any reading of evolutionary biology will confirm that women enjoy being the weaker sex—that it makes them happier as a whole. Ever heard of 50 Shades of Grey?

But let's say you still don't believe me. Or if you just want to have some fun with your girl…I want you to try something. But first, the ingredients:

HER: A girl with whom you are past the initial "dating" phase and have had sex with her on at least two different occasions. This can be a girlfriend or a casual fling. The key is your comfort level with her. She has to be comfortable getting naked in front of you, just coming over to watch a movie, and so on. If you are still nervous around her this won't work. (However, it's ok if she's nervous around you.) If you feel you have to still take her out and woo her to have sex, again this won't work.

YOU: To not have been a total pussy around her previously. If you are always asking her what she wants to do or you are rescheduling your life to see her, again this won't work. She has to have been exposed to you as a true man during the course of the relationship.

The Experiment

Invite her over via phone call or text for whatever reason. Say you are going to cook, go see a movie, go to bar — it doesn't matter. This can be done anytime of day from prior to a morning hike to an evening dinner. Make sure your last communication states that the door is open and for her to just let herself inside. If you have a roommate, expand the instruction to come into your room. You need to be dressed in something comfortable like shorts or track pants.

When she arrives, continue doing something for about 30 seconds or so such as checking email or typing on your phone. Let her start talking, sit down, walk around, anything. What she's doing is irrelevant. Get up and walk towards her and WITHOUT SAYING A SINGLE WORD, start kissing her. She will likely say things like "What are you doing?" or "What's going on?" or "I thought we were doing ____, are we not?" or whatever else her now confused mind will blurt out. The key is again to NOT SAY A SINGLE WORD DURING THE ENTIRE TIME. Continue kissing her, then groping her, then move towards sex. Rip off her clothing. Be a fucking caveman. By now she should be flowing like a waterfall. Bang her hard and well.

When you finish for added effect get dressed and go back to checking emails for a bit, again without saying a word. She will probably make some comments about how “that was unexpected” or something along those lines. Be unphased for a few minutes, then get up and speak for the first time before continuing with whatever plan you had.

Now, be smart about this. If she is asking a ton of questions as you initiate the process and it is more of an annoyance than anything else, you can stop, give her a cold “don’t be a brat” stare and then continue. That should be sufficient. However, if she does tell you to stop or start forcefully trying to get away, then of course stop what you are doing. I’m not suggesting to rape a girl, merely to demonstrate their affinity for dominance. Similarly don’t try this on a first date or with a virgin you just deflowered.

But assuming the right factors are in place with respect to the girl and yourself and you execute this correctly, then you have completely dominated her. You did not ask permission, you did not respond to her inquiries, you took what you wanted in the most primal and raw sense. And I bet you she responded very favorably to that. Not only in the moment, but she will now see you in a more attractive light than she did before.

I heard about this over 10 years ago from a famed red-pill radio host named Tom Leykis, so I have to give credit where credit is due. I have attempted it a few times and it has been beyond successful. Give it a try and see how effective dominance can be on the female mind.

Monsanto Ruins American Bodies

April 3, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Monsanto is an American biotech/agribusiness company that is responsible for the promotion of genetically modified crops (GMOs) and our country's reliance on corn as a major staple of its food supply. Over the years, Monsanto and a select few similar corporations have spent hundreds of millions of dollars lobbying the US government to influence food policy supporting purely financial aims. Monsanto has also developed intimate relationships with trusted agencies like the FDA and the USDA to promote their interests over the public health of our country.

Last week our government extended even more protection to this corporation by passing what people are calling the "Monsanto Protection Act." Hidden within a much larger government spending bill, the provision prevents future legal recourse against Monsanto in case GMO crops turn out to be harmful. There is even strong circumstantial evidence that the company itself had a hand in writing the legislation. President Obama signed the bill into law amidst significant public protest, continuing his legacy of deference to Big Corn at the expense of American health.

Why You Should Care

First of all, nobody really knows the long term effects of consuming genetically modified organisms. There is mounting concern that GMO foods pose some danger, though there hasn't been significant scientific inquiry done up to this point. Guess who funds most of the food research? Some speculate that GMOs can influence DNA expression through altering RNA that can survive digestion. The increasing rates of obesity, cancer, hormone deficiencies, etc. in our society may be purely coincidental, but they are likely linked to our eating habits as a society.

Even factoring out GMOs, the company is at the center of our government's support of Big Corn. Essentially, Monsanto and similar corporations control both the supply side and demand side of the corn market. Monsanto spends millions to lobby Washington for corn farmer subsidies that end up as corporate welfare for the company. Corn farmers receive further breaks if they use Monsanto's genetically modified crop seeds to grow their product.

If you've opened your eyes in the last 25 years or so, you'll notice that Americans are incredibly fat. Ever wonder why high fructose corn syrup is the first ingredient in nearly every staple of the standard American diet? Corn and soy are ubiquitous in the standard American diet not because of any nutritional benefits or inherent advantage to the crop, but rather because multinational companies like Monsanto influence legislation that makes them artificially profitable to grow and sell.

Loading...

Sweeteners such as corn syrup are also addictive and stimulate hunger, causing us to crave and consume more of them in spite of our bodies' inability to handle them over the long term. A superabundance of dietary sugar is linked to diabetes, hypertension metabolic syndrome, and heart disease. Even the meat you buy at the grocery store is fed on unnatural diet of corn, necessitating the animals to be pumped full of antibiotics near the end of their lives and decimating the nutritional composition of their meat.

What You Can Do

Though it's probably too late to make any realistic action to diminish the hegemony of Monsanto and Big Corn as arbiters of food policy in our country, you can combat it on an individual level by taking ownership of your diet:

1. Stop eating processed food altogether

2. Buy produce and meat labeled GMO-free, certified 100% organic, or 100% grass-fed

3. Encourage others to do the same

Other than Ancel Keys's dreadfully inaccurate lipid hypothesis, the Monsanto/Big Corn axis has had perhaps the most deleterious impact on our country's health of any single agency. People are at least generally aware of tobacco's bad effects, but most will blindly follow the insidious corporation-controlled governmental recommendations on nutrition. Look around you — the most elementary observation of day-to-day life should tell you that our emphasis on grains, low-fat, and high-carb is completely wrong and represents an epidemic failure of our government's food policy.

Once you realize that our government actively encourages the production of terrible food and that lawmakers have financial incentive to keep shoving corn and soy down our throats, the clear conclusion is to go Galt with your food. Cut these foods from your diet, and make conscious choices that keep Monsanto out of your kitchen.

How Thirsty Men Kill Everyone’s Game

April 4, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Much has been made of the drag social media has become on the dating market. The likes of Facebook, Twitter and Instagram have become inundated with “attention whores”, turning into mere tools for the provision of a never-ending stream of validation for girls. Some tire of this (rightfully so), but I feel few of us really and truly dig at the source of the problem: the simp.

While the conscious attention whoring of certain females can be annoying, it wouldn’t be nearly as prevalent without an army of extraordinarily thirsty men prepared to do whatever it takes to prove their undying loyalty to a pretty female they’ve never even met.

So, how do simps make life harder for you?

1. They build up female egos.

This is obvious, but it isn’t hard to turn a normal 8 into an 8 with an attitude befitting Athena herself if you throw enough praise and unrelenting worship at her.

After she has had a number of men insist that even her excrement is worthy of applause, you can bet that her standards will become harder for you to meet upon your own approach.

2. They build up female bitch shields.

While a lot of women will let the attention go to their heads, most also despise thirsty men. In their rush to avoid stalking threats and put permanent distance between themselves and these pathetic examples of masculinity, some women will become more guarded around all men, and more difficult to approach. They become increasingly convinced that men of worth who lack absurd amounts of thirst and aren't pathetically easy for them to control are rare enough that they need not bother much with guys at all.

Any male concerned with self-improvement, of course, would work to break through this barrier by standing out from the thristier hordes. The efforts of the simp, however, make this a much more challenging endeavor than it needs to be, and with the rise of Facebook and Instagram the simp can do more damage than he ever could before.

3. They raise the price of the game.

Dating is an expensive prospect in the western world, and it is the simp that has driven much of the price increase. This isn’t hard to understand from the perspective of the female: when a guy is offering you thousands of dollars just for the chance of making sexual contact with you, why not take it?

If men are willing to essentially bankroll your lifestyle simply because you look nice, why not take advantage? With enough offers, it isn't long before significant personal/financial sacrifice becomes the standard price of admission for some attractive (and savvy) women.

I could spend quite a bit of time writing on this topic, but I think some of the photographic evidence below will speak for itself. Though cringeworthy, the photos are worth viewing: one must always know their enemy, and the thirsty simp is the biggest enemy any red-pill male.

These men do more harm to other males than any feminist could. Their weakness is an embarrassment to the entire gender, and a hindrance to any improvement in male-female relations. Twitter, Instagram and Facebook have become their strongholds, aiding in the constant expression of their thirst.

As annoying as social media has become, it can still play a role in helping a red-pill male move forward by showing him precisely what NOT to emulate in his conduct with women. Pathetic and troublesome as they may be, the thirsty simp can still serve a useful function as fuel for your growth. Examine their weakness, avoid their mistakes, and improve yourself accordingly.

If you find yourself in any way resembling this guy in your conduct with women, you'll know it is time for a change:

Don’t Be Ashamed For Being A Bachelor

April 4, 2013 | by Harry | Link | Original Link

Have you ever wondered why self-imposed, eternal bachelorhood manages to evoke so many negative emotions in people? Sure it’s easy to quietly mock or pity those who ended up that way without a choice, but it’s the men who do so by choice that often attract the most scorn. As fertility rates continue to plummet, from who men continue to put off marriage more and more and we see the growing chorus of media shaming tactics trying to scold men into being the men their fathers were, the dwindling marriage rate is gradually becoming a major social, economic and political issue. We are starting to enter its beginning stages, and you can rest easy knowing that pressure will continue to mount.

What’s worse is the personal derision you often face from family, friends, your social circles and even in professional circles. No matter how logical your views may be or how justified your position is given the lifestyle you have chosen and wish to pursue based on your own individual and personal choices, the fact that a good man has willingly taken himself off the market seems to irritate everyone.

You face constant shaming, accusations of ignorance, accusations of selfishness and immaturity or the endless charade of never-asked-for-advice to help you conform. Jokes about being abnormal are also common, despite the fact that bachelorhood is gradually becoming the new normal, either by choice or through divorce anyway. It’s also not something we just see from women either, men very often are the biggest perpetrators despite the fact that women have the most to gain in modern marriage.

I have often wondered why it annoys people so much, and while there are many reasons for it and it varies from person to person, there is one common theme that seems to ring true for all of them:

People are terrified by the fact that they may be doing the wrong thing.

When you have invested so much into the socially expected life path that would be considered safe and desirable, anything that contradicts that life path is going to question the validity of their life choices. It stings them even more when the person rejecting that lifestyle is showing signs of significant success or happiness. The lovable loser attracts their pity, but the successful bachelor attracts their envy even when if there is no need to be envious. The former validates their life decisions, the latter questions it and forces them to evaluate their decisions a little more closely, which is incredibly uncomfortable for many people. Those who are most doubtful of the decisions they have made very often tend to be the most scornful. Likewise, those who take a great deal of social validation from their conformity also tend to be vocal in their criticism.

Why Cant You Just Fit In?

For a man, you are meant to go to school, go to college, get a job, get married as you start to find your feet, have 2.2 kids, save for their education and your retirement as you work your way up the corporate ladder. Your respite is the occasional holiday you enjoy when you are on annual leave or when you take the odd international trip if you are lucky. This is the life path you have been sold to us and it's deeply embedded in our culture. It's the outcome of every happy ending at the end of almost every romantic comedy you will ever see. It's the sitcoms you watch and lifestyle you are taught to chase from a very young age. This is what you are being told to do with every article you read that implores you to man up and marry, and it's what you are being told in every conversation you have where people ask you when you are going to settle down.

Now it's not a bad life path by any stretch, the problem is that it's not a life path men derive much benefit from anymore. It used to be a good, stable life for most men and one that brought a sense of comfort to many if not most. It's why so many fathers and grandfathers wished the same things for their sons. Life has changed though, the world has changed, and the path you are expected to take is now one that is looking to kick your ass endlessly along the way if you are a man.

Consider how:

Loading…

- School is now a hostile place for boys
- College is now a liberally biased indoctrination camp that will saddle you with immense debt
- Jobs are tougher to come by, but most also no longer pay enough to support a family on a single income if you land one
- Divorce rates are over 50% and marriage is a huge risk for men financially and emotionally
- Men get smashed in family courts making children a huge risk financially and emotionally
- Splintered families mean retirement is unlikely and child rearing costs you bear are higher

- You need to change jobs to win major promotions these days, internal promotions are far more rare.
- Two weeks vacation, yet we are working longer, harder and for less pay than we have in decades

Despite this, the natural desire to have a traditional family is so strong and the cultural influence so great that many men still gravitate towards it without question. The expectation and social pressure is so immense that men attach a great deal of value in calling themselves married, family men. If anything disproves the notion that most men are afraid of commitment to the right women, it's the fact that despite the entire system basically raping them cradle to grave still does not scare them away completely. Which is why so many men continue to marry and follow the expectations that society has for them, despite the statistical facts proving that they are on a hiding to nothing.

The doubt sets in soon though. Many end up feeling trapped in a life that they no longer feel is their own, which often will lead to them resenting those who took a different path or intend not to follow the same life path they may have. Things don't turn out the way the poor bastards expected them too, mostly because they have been sold an illusion. Likewise their wives and future wives, who often seen your lifestyle as a threat to their relationships with their husbands too. The last thing they need is hubby getting any bright ideas and jetting off to some foreign country so he can go fishing or golfing with his single friends. Have you ever noticed how men in serious relationships or those who are married gradually start cutting out their non married friends? In most cases, this is a result of the women in their lives heaving the pressure on their husbands and boyfriends to cut ties with their friends who don't conform to their views on relationships.

Women also despise the fact that you are not settling, and if you have anything to offer at all then many feel you should be on the market white knighting your life away the same way their men have. The more successful you are, the more they will apply indirect pressure or resort to shaming tactics in an effort to correct your behavior. It does not even matter if they are unhappy themselves, you can rest assured that they will see marriage as an ideal and seek the validation your agreement bestows.

The Silver Lining

For the younger guys reading this, your life gets better as you get older. Women have it ridiculously easy until their late 20's, after which it is downhill quickly. Their careers fizzle out, and between the ages of 30-35, the number of women who vacate the workforce becomes a landslide. They are simply not cut out for it and leave to "have families" when not in organisations that coddle them along.

Career wise, doors begin to explode open as women move on. Your dating options increase and if you have your shit together, women in their 30's are throwing themselves at you while the younger women are all still on the table. You also have far more reason to maintain your health and fitness, and while your friend are starting to become as fat as their wives, the free time you have allows you to maintain your exercise regimes.

You can travel more frequently and experience foreign countries as a single man too. Count your lucky stars that you are not one of those married men with fat wife in tow while you are in places like Thailand or Brazil. You too can laugh over your beer as they walk past with drool hanging from their chins while their wives scowl at everything under the sun. You can spend more time enjoying your hobbies. Nothing drives the second hand motorbike market like marriage. You can clock up the notches as you figure out what you really like in a woman rather than settling for the first hot piece of ass that gives it up. You can take more risks professionally as you only stand the chance of taking yourself into poverty, not your entire family. You can build far more wealth as you save a small fortune by avoiding the spending habits of a costly wife.

Of course, you could always do the right thing and man up…

6 Reasons Why Portland Sucks For Single Men

April 5, 2013 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

I relocated to Portland from my hometown of Syracuse, New York last year as part of a cross-country trip to see America and change my life. While I like the place—there are a lot of cool people and things to do here—Portland is not a city for everyone, and it's definitely not a place you want to go to get laid. Here's why…

1. The weather is miserable.

Seeing as I grew up in the snowiest large city in the U.S., I figured dealing with the weather in the Pacific Northwest would be easy. I was wrong. In the winter, Portland's stretches of rainy or overcast weather are so long that you'll start to forget what the sun looks like. From the time I arrived in December all through January, there were maybe two or three days total that the city wasn't blanketed in gray storm clouds. I'm pretty confident that the lack of sunshine—and the resulting depression caused by Vitamin D deficiency—is partly responsible for Portland's lazy "yeah, whatever man" culture.

2. The city is bum central.

I'm not exaggerating when I say Portland is full of bums, and I'm not talking about the hipsters. Thanks to the mild winter weather and limp-wristed police force, PDX has a huge population of homeless people. Hell, this city was where the term "skid row" originated. When they aren't sucking down free meals from the Rescue Mission, Portland's transients are either panhandling for smack money down at Pioneer Courthouse Square or pacing back and forth on the Burnside Bridge muttering the n-word to themselves. Because the city council lacks so much as one vertebra of backbone, their "solutions" to the homeless problem consist of letting them fare jump on the MAX and loiter in the Central Library all day, which now has a permanent funk of B.O. and dried urine.

3. The women are overweight and/or unhealthy looking…

Portland is supposedly one of the fittest cities in America, but you wouldn't know it by actually visiting here. The average Rose City girl either has a beach ball-shaped body or looks like an Auschwitz survivor; nothing in between. Add in their pasty flour dough skin and you can go days without seeing anything you'd want to bang. And like Toronto girls, Stumptown's womenfolk have a disturbing obsession with stuffing their faces, as evidenced by quirky local eateries like Voodoo Doughnut and the absurd number of late-night food trucks littering downtown.

4. …and the few that aren't look like Mad Max extras.

Because hipsters lack any semblance of imagination, they always choose to express their "individuality" in the most hackneyed ways possible: getting inked and pierced. Most girls here are covered in tacky tattoos and have enough studs in their faces to set off metal detectors. Additionally, they love dyeing their hair in ridiculous clown colors and cutting it short Skrillex-style. If you regularly jack off to the BBW section of Suicide Girls, you'll be in hog heaven in Portland; guys who like slender, feminine women need not apply.

Loading...

5. Nobody wants to talk to you…

You'd think a city half-comprised of people from other states would be more welcoming, but nope. Portland is hands-down one of the snobbiest and most cliquish places I've ever lived in. Try to make small talk with people and they'll act like you have chronic halitosis. Attempt to cold approach any girl, including the fat ones, and they'll treat you like you're an axe murderer. Even waitstaff and cashiers treat you with a rudeness that would get them fired anywhere else in the country, because they think their master's degree in Cephalopod Sexuality makes them superior to the hoi polloi.

I can hear Portlanders protesting, "Girls don't want to talk to you because you're creepy/ugly/only interested in sex!" They'll have to explain why in other Portland-esque cities like Madison, Wisconsin or Burlington, Vermont, women—and people in general—are eager to chat up out-of-towners like myself. Even in Williston, North Dakota, a city so overcrowded with men that fat girls are referred to as "Williston 10s," hot girls were kinder and more polite to me than Portland fatties.

From what I can tell, there are only two ways for a normal man to get laid in this city without paying for it: either start a mediocre indie rock band and bang groupies, or wait for a fat girl to get so horny that she tries to rape you. Bars and clubs in Portland are like abstract art exhibits: full of grotesque objects that you're not allowed to touch.

6. …and they have nothing interesting to say anyway.

"The city where young people go to retire" is not an exaggeration. Portland truly is a magnet for people who want to do nothing with their lives at all. If you can find one of the few girls who isn't an antisocial weirdo, all she'll do is repeat feminist cliches or lay down obnoxious sarcasm until your dick shrinks to the size of an olive. She'll be happy to bloviate about her made-up sexual orientation—pansexual, demisexual, polyamorous or whatever—all day, but she'll have absolutely no interest in what you have to say.

For example, whenever I brought up the fact that I hitchhiked here all the way from New York (which most normal people think is pretty interesting), the typical response from girls was a nonchalant "Yeah, that's cool." Meanwhile, their greatest achievements in life consist of operating an espresso machine five days a week for minimum wage and selling handmade doilies on Etsy.

I’m not trying to bash Portland as a whole. This city’s got a lot going for it: the variety of microbrews, the music scene, the lack of crime, and the low cost of living, among other things. But there’s no denying that the girls here are dumpy-looking, have nasty attitudes and are just plain boring to talk to. If you’re looking for love—or just a lay—you’re best served going somewhere else.

Two Ways To Pursue Happiness

April 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

There are two different ways to pursue happiness. The first way is to change yourself. Maybe you'll get a new job, move to a new city, learn a hobby, start a sport, or practice new techniques that get you laid more. It involves making changes on how you do things in order to aim for an ideal result.

The second way to pursue happiness is to change the world. Instead of changing yourself, you decide to change a culture of millions of people to an endpoint that you think will make you happy. This takes time. The initial person who starts this change will die before the end goal is achieved.

The founders of most human ideologies envision some sort of utopia in which they and their followers will be happy, and go about molding the environment to make that happen. Feminism, and its liberalism brother, are no different. A bunch of women got together and asked themselves what would make women the most happy. Their list:

- no more cooking
- more cash
- no judgement from men for acting bad or looking fat
- ability to work alongside men and monitor their behavior
- ability to fuck anyone
- ability to end marriages because of uncomfortable feelings

The feminists got everything on their list, things that they thought would make women happier, but women are less happier now than they were 40 years ago. What went wrong?

Loading...
First, they didn't understand that happiness is an individual sport that depends on a person's nature. If I were a god and somehow made every guy in the world travel constantly and fuck random European women, there would be a sizable percentage who wouldn't like it. You'd get some guys that prefer relationships with Asian women and some guys who prefer staying in one location. The gays wouldn't like it either.

The second reason feminists failed their followers is that they were lesbians and bisexuals who deeply hated men. I'm not joking. The things that made them happy are generally the things that are more likely to make men happy, not women. Women were led by those who made big promises without actually doing the research or introspection to see if there was a real-life benefit to heterosexual females.

Humans are lazy. In their search for happiness the last thing they're concerned about is self-improvement. A woman will spend four hours to attend a SlutWalk but won't spend four hours on a treadmill to have a body that increases her confidence. She will spend all day posting comments on Jezebel about how there is still an unequal wage gap while neglecting her job and therefore a better chance at promotion.

You know you're dealing with an ideology when happiness for someone else means YOU need to change. When YOU need to man up or when YOU need to start doing behaviors that serve others. If your approach to happiness is trying to changes the masses, then the bad news is you can change everyone in the world and you still won't be happy. Work on changing yourself instead.

Hot Chick Hibernation

April 6, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Its everyone's favorite time of year again. Flowers are blooming, the sun is out and birds are singing the beautiful song of spring.

Looks Like He's Caught a 'Bird'

A recent year-long study by your fellow "bird watchers" here at Return of Kings has come up with an interesting insight into the young western woman's mating habits. Oddly enough it seems that hot women – on average – will hibernate roughly half of the year.

This cycle is most noticeable in 19-22 year old university girls.

September – October:

The idealized romances of summer time (read: casual sex as far as the eye can see) are coming to an end. As the weather cools so do womens' firey passions. They know there is a long winter ahead of them and many girls will forgo braving the elements for a more long-term source of companionship. University girls will start the year strong. Hookups will be easy as long as the weather remains warm and sunny. Fun will be the name of the game, but as Halloween comes around, girls -– one by one — will shack up with a guy they started banging in September.

Even though they're no longer returning to university. Working women still undergo the same process. Summers are filled with partying and good times. Autumn comes and they taper their partying to a smaller social circle and thus land the winter boyfriend to leech attention and affection reserves off of.

November – January:

By this point women are reaching full hibernation mode. As you'll most likely notice there will be significantly fewer beautiful women roaming around. They'll be replaced by girls in big coats with scarves who's hotness is hard to assess. Approaches during this time of the year will lead to peak "I have a boyfriend" responses. However, the holidays bring out a certain nostalgia for girls. The weeks surrounding Christmas are laden with romantic comedies, baked goods and a longing for a Christmas miracle man. Many girls will visit home for the holidays and may be open for some fun in their home towns. (This leaves a pussy-vacuum in University towns, talent will be minimal at this time).

On New Year's Eve drunkeness and the restlessness associated with "boyfriend cabin-fever" will lead to a peak in infidelity. If you have a harem, things will start getting rocky. Girls will start getting more distant or will drop out entirely.

February:

February 14. The most infamous holiday celebrating all that is dangerous to a quality relationship (excess chocolate and beta boy pampering) — Valentine's Day. Valentine's Day marks the turning point in the year. Spring will soon be upon us and girls will either stick around for the long haul or reach the point of critical ass and split. Harems have a 69% chance of completely collapsing, but think on the bright side there will be that many more single girls out there.

In the weeks after valentine's day online dating sites blow up with just dumped, or lovelorn girls looking for some alpha love. Take advantage of this my fellow player.

March – May:

March and April are usually both pretty quiet. You will definitely see more and more beautiful women dressed in revealing clothing and you should use this as the motivation to approach. Once May rolls around girls the world 'round will be working out to get into shape for the beach, buying new clothing. and generally getting excited for the coming summer. Spring break will be the craziest time here so go hard.

June – August:

Summer is in full swing now and so are the beautiful women. They are fully out of their hibernative state and on the prowl for the good times of summer and the drunken memories held thenceforth.

As an aspiring “world Don Juan” you should observe and note the habits of women. Adopt their patterns for yourself. Start building a harem come the end of summer to last yourself the winter. Use this time to work on yourself and take a break from the grind of game. Come spring, when your girls begin dropping out of the rotation start the hunt once more and prep for the winter.

7 Things I've Learned About Life From Playing Chess

April 6, 2013 | by Spanier | Link | Original Link

The game of chess is one of man's great creations. The rules can seem arbitrary to a beginner, but are actually the product of over 1000 years of tinkering and refining. The modern game—essentially unchanged now for about 500 years—is perfectly designed to stretch the human mind to its outermost limits, but not beyond. The board is just the right size, and the moves of the pieces have just the right amount of variety, to offer the tantalizing but never attainable possibility of mastering the game with enough time and study.

Moreover, chess is a mirror of life, rich in metaphors for human experience. It is a pitched battle to the finish between opposing armies, yet completely non-violent, with no injuries ever reported from playing. It is a testing ground where we can experiment and act out personal dramas with no consequences other than wiping the board clean and starting over. A blend of primitive instinct and sophisticated calculation, it lets a player directly engage the mind of another human being—learning from experience, memorizing common patterns, methodically building a position, setting traps, analyzing variations, and finally moving in for the kill. And it is a canvas whereupon great players create masterpieces, like famous paintings, that can be enjoyed by generations to come.

1. Women are powerful, men are essential.

The queen is the most powerful piece on the board, the king by contrast is plodding and slow. Yet the game can continue for dozens of moves after the queens are off the board—but once the king dies, the game ends. As in real life, women are often the centers of attention with their dazzle and flash and drama, but in the end, it is individual male leadership that decides the outcome.

2. The threat is stronger than the execution.

This is a common saying among chess players. The idea is that by threatening an action, you can nudge your opponent in a certain direction, but actually carrying out the threat may cause as many problems for you as for your opponent. The parallels with human relationships are evident.

3. Chess is 99% tactics.

Another favorite maxim. While carrying out long-term plans, you have to constantly be on the alert for immediate dangers or opportunities that can radically change the game. You may become a master player, build a strong career, and have a solid physique, but if a moment's inattention causes you to swerve into the oncoming lane on the way home, it may be all for naught.

Loading...

4. Different phases of the game require different skills.

It took me a long time to realize that chess is really three separate games—with common tactical themes and goals, to be sure, but requiring very different skill sets overall. The opening requires a lot of experience with common strategic and tactical themes, and yes, quite a bit of memorization. The middle game involves imagination and creative risk-taking. And the endgame demands exactitude and mathematical calculation.

Personally, I've always had the hardest time with openings—both in chess and in approaching women. The game is literally wide open at this point and can go in a myriad of different directions, so you have to make strong, general moves that cover a wide variety of situations. At the same time, you need to study a lot of previous games—both your own and those of others—to be prepared for different responses.

5. Latent talent in ordinary people can become obvious after years of hard work.

Pawn promotion can be seen as a metaphor for the way in which ordinary people sometimes have unusual talents that only become apparent to others after years of diligent effort.

6. The best defense is a good offense.

A cliché in sports, this principle applies equally in chess. Even if all you want is a draw, playing passively is seldom effective against a strong opponent. You must actively work to keep the other player off-balance and create "counterplay" to distract him from his attacking plans.

7. A weakness is not a weakness unless it can be attacked.

Another way of saying, perhaps, that your limitations are self-imposed, and that something you perceive as a weakness on your part may be completely irrelevant in a given context. Thus, fixing your inner game—eliminating psychological insecurities—may be more important than addressing the weakness itself.

I could go on and on about chess. I could talk about the theories of force, space, and tempo; the way pawn structure gives shape to a position; the different styles of play; the cautions against resting on one's laurels ("It is not enough to be a good player—one must also play well"); and the social connections you can make and the influence you can acquire by playing. Suffice it to say now, I believe chess should be a part of any serious man's education. So who's up for a game?

In Praise of Painting

April 7, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Certain diversions we do because we more or less have to do, such as vigorous exercising, studying languages, sex, travel, and reading. And these all have their proper place. But there are times when the collective strain of responsibility, and the stress of duties, demand that entirely new parts of our brain be activated and exercised. When I say "new" parts of the brain, I mean literally that: a man can rub raw a particular part of his brain by continually using it, and exhaust himself by repetitive tasks.

Avoid Repetition

Doing the same things over and over again, even though they may be enjoyable, can cause our brains to settle into a comfortable rut from which little creative energy can be coaxed. We slide into a comfortable routine; we become assured in our torpor, and our brains and spirits move about within their own self-imposed and ever more restrictive boundaries.

Everyone knows that we live in a stressful world, where we are often harassed on all sides by deadlines, obligations, and similar impositions that act to upset our serenity. The worried mind can take hold of some oppressive thought and fixate on it. Often the mind will not let a troublesome thought go. It does no good, in this situation, to try to talk your mind out of thinking unwanted thoughts. The mind has its own separate engine, and will continue to expend its efforts day and night on its own fixations.

In this situation, I have found that the best remedy is not to try to banish stressful thoughts (for this is nearly impossible), but to introduce some new and totally different subject for the mind to focus on. The more different the subject matter, the better. The brain finds it refreshing to employ totally different parts of itself. And in so doing, it loosens its grip on stressful and oppressive thoughts. In this way, art can truly be liberating.

A New Hobby

And this is how I discovered the wonderfully therapeutic power of painting. I am talking here about painting pictures. Several years ago I reached a point in my life when I felt I needed a hobby that was totally different from my usual ones. On some sudden impulse, and with no previous background or experience in the visual arts, I bought an acrylic paint set at a hobby store and dove in. I let the colors fly. I could hardly believe how much better I began to feel as I began to focus on colors, spatial relations, depth perception, alignment and lighting. These were activities that were totally different from the skills employed in my regular life.

The process of being surrounded by rich and varied color somehow activates certain switches in your brain that attune you to other artistic things in the world. This was an activity totally different from any other I had taken up, and I could literally feel the synapses of my brain firing in ways they never before had. I mattered little that I had no experience or training: after cranking out twenty paintings, you will know how to paint. Plunge in and just start the colors flowing in bold strokes.

Loading...

The Benefits Of Color

Why is it that painting relaxes and soothes in ways that other hobbies do not? I think there are several reasons. One reason is that we city dwellers, cut off from nature, live in a color-starved world. Our world is filled with the drabness of concrete and steel, rather than with bold yellows, greens, reds, blues, purples, and oranges. We are famished for color sensory stimulation. Another reason is that is painting, unlike reading, is a handicraft: you are using your hands and motor skills to create a visual statement. You are expressing yourself in a non-verbal way. Painting enables you to generate sentiments that are nearly impossible to verbalize, and in so doing, you relieve the soul from its pent-up burdens. This creative act starts some kind of mysterious chain reaction in you, and the resulting creativity spills over into other aspects of your life. You will find your work, relationships, and love life improve considerably. This type of cross-fertilizing expression is a rare thing in the modern world.

The great modern artist Wassily Kandinsky thought that colors themselves possessed mystical qualities. In his great 1911 treatise Concerning the Spiritual in Art, Kandinsky even went so far as to assert that colors actually had musical qualities, whether alone or used together. This was one of the reasons he called his paintings "compositions": it was his way of relating paintings to musical symphonies. I don't know if I share his opinions, but I do believe that colors have some mystical force. Being bathed in a mix of color, whether from oil painting, watercolors, or acrylics, has some undeniable therapeutic power. It cannot be fully explained; you have to experience it for yourself.

Try painting. It will ease the tumescence of an active imagination, fire up and sustain your creative juices, enable you to see relationships and connections between things you never could see before, and make you a more complete man. The initial investment in money is far smaller than nearly any other hobby. It makes little demand on your time, and rewards you with serenity of spirit and an increased appreciation for the depth and richness of the colors of the world.

It does not matter if you prefer abstract art, landscapes, portraits, or any other visual style. And it is never too late to take up the brush. Winston Churchill came to recreational painting late in life after suffering political setbacks in his career, and found that it always sustained his spirits through trying times. His little 1932 homage to painting, the essay Painting as a Pastime is a wonderful little read in its own right. "Just to paint is great fun", he wrote. "The colors are lovely to look at and delicious to squeeze out. Matching them, however crudely, with what you see is fascinating and absolutely absorbing. Try it if you have not done so—before you die."

2 Steps To Effective Fat Loss

April 7, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Gentlemen, summer is almost upon us. It's time to make our bodies presentable. Time to shred off fat and display the masculine physique you have built that lies underneath. At a lower level of body-fat, all of the muscle you currently possess will be ever more apparent. It is not uncommon to look 10-20 pounds bigger by losing a little weight.

In this article I will explain the basics of cutting fat, with the focus being on maintaining muscle throughout the process. Anyone can lose a bunch of weight—the tricky part is maintaining your hard earned muscle in the process. Luckily it is just a two-step procedure that can be efficiently implemented:

Cutting Fat (But Not Muscle) = Losing Weight + Maintaining Strength

Losing Weight

Changes in weight are a result of energy balance—if you burn more calories than you consume you will lose weight (1). This is known as The Law of Thermodynamics, and there are 2 basic approaches to accomplishing this:

1. Burn more calories.

This can be done several different ways. Most people think cardio is the only way, but it is not. It does accomplish the goal, but it is important to recognize the alternatives. For example, by simply moving more over the course of the day you will burn more calories.

Walk instead of driving, take the stairs instead of the elevator, engage in more active hobbies, etc. Personally I love to play basketball and ride my bike, so I will simply engage in these activities with far more frequency when I am trying to cut weight.

2. Eat less.

This approach is arguably more effective. Most people grossly overestimate the number of calories burned through exercise. A recent study shows that running one mile yields a net caloric burn of just 100 calories (2). That is not much. If you run 3 miles during a session of exercise that yields 300 calories burned. Not bad, but the same effect is achieved by eating 300 calories less – something that requires less effort than 30 minutes of running.

The most effective route is to combine both 1 and 2, which is what I do and wholeheartedly recommend. Use this calculator to approximate how many calories you should eat daily to lose 1 pound per week (enter your stats and select the moderate weight loss option). Then incorporate some aerobic exercise as well, if you wish.

Now you should be losing 1 to 1.5 pounds per week. Why only 1.5 pounds per week you ask? The truth is more is possible but not recommended, as you will start to sacrifice muscle in the process. Not to mention fatigue, constipation, nausea, and diarrhea are side effects of extreme rates of weight loss (3).

Protein

One dietary consideration you should pay attention to is protein intake. While protein is an important factor for your body at all times, as it is responsible for repairing cells and creating new ones, it becomes even more important during a period of weight loss (if you are interested in preserving your muscle, that is) (4). This is because protein is muscle sparing—higher protein intake has been shown to assist your body in remaining anti-catabolic by maintaining a positive nitrogen balance (5). Positive nitrogen balance is found during periods of growth and repair.

Loading...

What this means for you is eat sufficient protein. I know a lot of numbers get thrown around for what exactly that entails, but current studies suggest that strength athletes should consume roughly 0.8 grams per pound (1.75 g/kg) of bodyweight per day (6). And I agree. It is a good deal of protein, but not a number so ridiculous that you need to plan the entire day around it. If you cannot achieve this number by chowing down some meat the old fashion way, then one protein shake a day (30-35 grams of protein if made with milk) will make hitting this target far easier.

Maintaining Strength

The second component of effective fat loss is maintaining strength. This is necessary because our bodies must adapt to the demands they are placed under. This principle is known as the General Adaptation Syndrome, and it means that when we place our muscles under sufficient stress, our bodies will be forced to retain them, or even spur them to grow (7).

In the case of weight loss I believe sufficient stress can be defined as using the same amount of weight and repetitions for your exercises as before you began to lose weight (or more, if possible). If this is done correctly, the majority of the lost weight will be fat, while most muscle is spared. If you neglect this fact and avoid weight training at a high intensity, you will lose significant portions of muscle along with fat during a period of weight loss (8).

However, energy levels tend will be lower during a period of weight loss. This is because your body has fewer calories to work with – literally less energy. And so training volume should drop to reflect this. I suggest weight training about 3 times per week, and performing fewer sets than normal during these sessions. But remember—you must maintain intensity (repetitions and weight).

Conclusion

Move more, eat less, and lift weights to lose fat but maintain your muscle mass.

Men Love Commitment

April 8, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Contrary to popular belief, men do in fact love commitment. I haven't really met anyone who is afraid of it to be honest. The problem for women is that men aren't committed to them. This isn't a problem with the idea of a committed relationship, or with commitments in general, it's just simply a problem with the quality of women available in the U.S.

Having long been away from an LTR after ending it due to issues of commonality and commitment, I had grown curious if I really was afraid of commitment. Being single for a while now, and having had a great Saint Patrick's day weekend downtown, as well as a follow up, albeit pretty crappy, workout session at the gym on Sunday, I realized that men aren't afraid of commitment, they just avoid them.

Now to be frank, the idea of having as many women as you want and trying multiple flavors will always be something that crosses men's minds. The fear of commitment however has nothing to do with men being afraid of committing to one woman. If you meet an amazing woman, that's no problem. The problem is there are no amazing women. This fact can be proven with a few simple things that I am committed to.

The Gym

This is my main hobby. I love to workout, I love the feeling afterwards, and it's my opportunity to get away from life's problems and exert any frustrations I have. My ex tried to get me to stop working out as often so we could hangout. So I stopped dating her. Some may say it's a douchebag move, but the gym is my hobby, and it's one that takes dedication. The offer was there for her to join and she refused. The option was pretty obvious. An additional fact is that if I don't workout or do something active enough I get

Lifting Friends

Commitment number two is, any lifting friend I have ever had. The best, albeit satyrical representation is below. I'd write a long paragraph, but the video pretty much sums it all up.

Sports Teams

Some people are equally committed to sports teams the just cheer for on TV, but I'm talking about real sports teams that I've committed to. The ones where you've worked really hard to play for and made sacrifices for. Jason Kidd has probably the best quote regarding the dedication associated with sports.

> A lot of late nights in the gym, a lot of early mornings, especially when your friends are going out, you're going to the gym, those are the sacrifices that you have to make if you want to be an NBA basketball player.

Education

I have earned a bachelors degree, and trust me it was a commitment. While BA's aren't as prestigious as they once were (mostly due to the push for everyone to now have one), they aren't easy to get either. If you can't deal with any type of commitment, you will either drop out, or get kicked out due to failure.There is at least a decent amount of commitment involved with the concept of going through four extra years of schooling and amassing an absurd amount of debt to get a college education. Debt problems rank as (1) marriage, (2) children, and (3) education. If you're willing to deal with that kind of debt, well, you know how to commit.

I could continue listing things that I've been committed to, but it would get repetitive in theme. The point is I learned that I, as well as many other men, actually love commitment. The frustrations of letting your team down in sports, losing a lifting friend, failing in your quest for higher education, can all deeply affect you just like a bad breakup, if not more. The key thing is that as men, commitment is assigned towards tasks that have high reward. Men live on a high reward system based on what can give them the most success.

The reason men stop trying for commitment with women isn't that they are gaining the sex too easily. If the sex is good men will keep going back. The problem is women have progressively lowered the quality available. It's like comparing a 67 Mustang to a 96 Mustang. The quality is gone but maintenance is higher. When feminism took such a hold on women that they became unreasonable, men stopped having commitment with them. So yes, female reader, I'm capable of commitment, just not to you.

Chicktini: The Liquid Panty-Dropper

April 8, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

One thing on every man's mind as summer approaches is getting a woman back to his place for a bang drink. Women aren't stupid and they know perfectly well what you're up to, so the key is to come up with something so unbelievably retarded that it allows her to blame her indiscretions on you. You must give her the excuse she needs to fuel the "one thing just led to another" hamsterbation process. Like Indiana Jones, you must successfully navigate a series of challenges if you hope to reveal the secret revolving door that leads to her Temple of Poon.

Your job is to create that "one thing" that "led to another," and that one thing can be the Chicktini.

Say you're a chick and I approach you at the pool (my favorite place to meet girls). I will have already fired up the grill and offered you one of my world-famous organic vegetarian fire-grilled cheese quesadillas as an opener. They taste great for a number of reasons, not the least of which is because they're neither organic nor vegetarian.

Somewhere during the inevitable conversation about my delicious quesadillas, I'll mention that I just perfected the Chicktini. I'll tell you I'd offer you one if they weren't so hard to make. You'll be curious and ask me about the ingredients, and I'll tell you the recipe is a secret blend of vodkas and fresh juices.

You'll say it sounds "amazing" or "unbelievable" or something equally predictable and trite.

I'll say I only make them on special occasions or for close friends.

You'll insist that you're a friend and that today is a special occasion.

I'll say that you're not a real friend until I see your boobs.

You'll pretend to be offended.

I'll pretend not to notice.

Inevitably, regardless of whether it's that night or a week or two later, you'll bring up the Chicktini and I'll invite you over to my place. We can only have them at my place because I need my juicer and my kitchen. Again, the Chicktini is a very involved drink and preparing one is a complicated process.

You'll show up 80% of the time, because flaking on someone who lives in the building isn't cool.

You'll watch as I open the freezer and take out a bottle of Grey Goose vodka and two cool-looking bottles I bought from the store which have been filled with mysterious homemade liquids. I'll grab a large Asian pear out of the fridge, and slice it up for juicing.

I'll explain the resource and time-intensive process it takes to create just one Chicktini as I begin to prepare it for you.

I'll juice half of the pear, and set the juice aside. If you're an absolute retard and have never seen an Asian pear (common) I'll tell you how rare they are and how I have to comb the city to find them.

I'll pour 2.5 oz. of fresh pear juice into the tumbler on ice.

I'll pour in 1.5 oz. of Grey Goose vodka.

I'll open the first mysterious bottle and have you take a whiff. You'll love the smell. I'll tell you how I have to soak the vodka in a perfect blend of natural vanilla and cinnamon sticks and then strain it through angel food cake in order for it to be sweet and crisp.

You'll be impressed as I pour 3/4 oz. of Thatch's special-blend vodka into the tumbler.

Next comes the other bottle filled with red liquid. While I'm carefully measuring out 1/3 oz. of the fresh pomegranate juice, I'll tell you how it takes for-freaking-ever to harvest fresh pomegranate seeds, boil them down, and turn them in to fresh pomegranate juice.

I'll shake the concoction on ice, pour it into a martini glass, and garnish it with a little sliver of the Asian pear.

OMG you will like, not be able to, like, believe how super amazing it tastes! Kittens and rainbows! You'll definitely snap a picture and put it on Instagram, Pinterest or Facebook along with the recipe.

- 2.5 oz. fresh Asian pear juice

- 1.5 oz. Grey Goose vodka

- 3/4 oz. Thatch's super-secret amazing special blend vodka

- 1/3 oz. fresh pomegranate juice

One of three things will happen. There's a 25% chance I'll get the bang that night, 50% chance I'll get the bang within two weeks (75% combined bang rate), and 25% chance I won't get the bang but you'll tell every girl in our building how epic the special Chicktini tastes, and what a super-awesome guy I am.

Oh, but I forgot to tell you about the secret ingredient!

The secret ingredient is lies.

There's no way in hell I'm going through all that work to make a cocktail for a girl. So let's go over the real recipe.

- 2.5 oz fresh Asian pear juice

- 1.5 oz Grey Goose vodka

- 3/4 oz UV brand whipped cream flavored vodka

- 1/3 oz POM brand pomegranate juice

The key here is to let her see you juice the pear. I hear it's sexy to watch a man in the kitchen (as long as he doesn't look like he belongs there), and that makes it plausible in her mind that the other ingredients are fresh too.

Go to the kitchen section of Target or Wal-Mart and buy glass artisan bottles with corks for around $6 each (I got mine from Etsy because sometimes I fag out like that), and pour the POM and UV flavored vodka into them so it looks homemade.

How does the Chicktini really taste?

Like any other over-priced bullshit chick drink you'd buy her at a douchebag bar. There's absolutely nothing special about it at all. In fact, it's a tad sweet, and though the POM cuts the sweetness a little, it really does nothing more than turn the drink pink.

Pro tip 1: Taste is regional, so if it's too sweet for the girls in your neck of the woods, split the pear juice into equal parts pear juice and cheap, dry sparkling wine. The 89 Le Colture NV Fagher Brut is a good choice, and you can pick up a bottle for under $20.

The important thing is that the Chicktini is pink and tastes like candy, so it goes down easy and rapidly. The whole game here is to get her back to your place so she can watch you juice and enjoy a "special" drink that you normally wouldn't make for anyone else because of the time-intensive recipe.

Pro tip 2: The Chicktini line falls flat in bars (for me, anyway). It works well in day game, but the greatest success is always poolside – most likely because chicks have their bitch shields lowered with a guy who is their neighbor.

Pro tip 3: The Chicktini is a vehicle, not a tool. She knows with 99.9% certainty if she's going to bang you or not before she even knocks on your door, and the remaining 0.1% is reserved for whether or not you say something stupid to change her mind. The Chicktini carries her to her pre-determined destination; it does not create a bang out of thin air for a gameless schmuck.

Though this particular Chicktini recipe is new for the 2013 summer season, I've been pulling this off for the past four summers and it works like a charm. So far, the new Chicktini recipe has been met with great reviews even though I think it tastes woefully predictable and a tad too sweet. I've only tested this particular recipe on three girls, but it seems that adding the juicing angle has really increased interest.

If it turns out they actually do serve beer in hell, the Chicktini would be a great addition to the drink menu. Cheers!

Robert Greene’s Mastery

April 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is the latest from Robert Greene, who has brought us important works such as The 48 Laws Of Power, The Art Of Seduction, and The 50th Law. Written in a similar style, Mastery alternates between sharing stories of masters with analysis and lessons from their success. An alternate title of this book could have been “How People Became Great.” Like always, Greene’s writing is smooth and easy.

The idea of mastery and craft is increasingly punished in modern society where easy fixes and hacks are preferred. No one wants to work hard to achieve a goal or dare take the untreaded path. Technology, which gives us so much without having to expend much energy, has enabled this phenomenon, causing people to avoid the repetition needed for mastery. Easy results are pursued instead, destroying the craftsmen model of the past.

Greene believes in identifying and honing your natural tendencies to turn them into a fulfilling vocation, giving several examples of how this was done for other successful people. His story of Charles Darwin was especially inspiring. Here was a man who was seen as “average” and even odd for his peculiar obsession with collecting specimens, yet when he was put into an environment where that obsession was nurtured, he went on to develop one of the most important theories of mankind.

Loading…
Here are some other things I learned from Mastery:

- Sometimes it takes a while to find your calling.
- Drill down your passions until you find one that speaks strongly to you and where you can be the best at it.
- Learn one skill at a time. Start with the one you already have some natural ability at.
- Invent exercises that work on your weaknesses.
- Never failing is a curse: you think you are “skilled” and then collapse when the inevitable failure does occur.
- Sometimes to solve a problem you have to think of what is missing, not what is present.
- A sign of a work’s power is to elicit extremes of reaction.

I’m finding that that I get less value in Greene’s sugary pontifications than in his stories and anecdotes of great people. He knows how to relay success in a way that inspires and motivates, and I won't be surprised if his next stop is motivational speaker. He does repeat examples here, noticeably more than his other work, so I did feel like he was trying to extract too much from too little instead of offering a more diverse sample.

Overall this was a solid book. It cleared my mind and reminded me to battle harder against distractions to focus more deeply. It also gave me advice on what it takes to get to the next level. However, I think I'm approaching the point of diminishing return from Greene's wisdom. Since the topic of his books are loosely related, you feel like you're reading sequels instead of entirely new productions, and when it comes to style, pages of his writing at a time can be reduced to a couple sentences. His monologues in this book often lacked punch. I will definitely read any future work he puts out, but I do hope he attempts something different.

Modern Marriage Is Rent Seeking Hell

Before the media created the idea of marriage as an emotionally-driven commitment, it was a simple economic transaction. A man exchanged his financial provisioning and physical protection for a female's chastity and guaranteed paternity of his children. In modern western culture, however, marriage has become a sham of misaligned values and perverse incentives. Legal precedent and the feminist court of public opinion have conspired to deprive married men of all power, encouraging women to extract maximum value from them without providing anything in return.

Economists have a term for such actions that facilitate transfer of wealth from one party to another without creating new value: "rent-seeking". Classic examples include political lobbying and government-mandated membership programs to reduce competition in a private industry (such as issuing taxi medallions in New York). In fact, there is already some economic research on viewing no-fault divorce through the paradigm of rent-seeking. I present to you the following revolutionary observation cited in this groundbreaking study:

> "Allen and Brinig (1998) show that differences in sex drives between spouses affect spousal bargaining strengths: the spouse having the lowest sex drive at any given point during marriage has the property right over whether or not sexual intercourse will occur, thus increasing his or her bargaining power."

Shockingly, this study doesn't go far enough. Due to various legal and financial incentives, I contend that the entire institution of western marriage has devolved into a rent-seeking arrangement. From Wikipedia:

> "Rent-seeking implies extraction of uncompensated value from others without making any contribution to productivity. The origin of the term refers to gaining control of land or other natural resources. Studies of rent-seeking focus on efforts to capture special monopoly privileges such as manipulating government regulation of free enterprise competition.[4]
> [As opposed to profit and wages], rent, by contrast with these two, is obtained when a third party deprives one party of access to otherwise accessible transaction opportunities, making nominally "consensual" transactions a rent-collection opportunity for the third party."
> Loading…

Sound familiar? Western marriage facilitates women capturing monopoly privileges over their husbands. Bolstered by modern divorce law, they no longer have to create value as part of the transaction. Women are entitled to cash and prizes in nearly all divorce scenarios, and even in the worst case they will have significant help from the state with raising their children. Women who choose to remain married continuously extract rents in the form of subservience, financial provisioning, and sexual denial from their husbands, even as their added value approaches zero.

This system remains in place because we punish men for exercising choice in the market, without any such punishment for women. Both law and public opinion deprive men of transaction opportunities that would yield infinitely more value than a fat nagging wife. If a man cheats on his wife, it's grounds for financially devastating divorce and he is shunned for being a cad. If a woman commits infidelity, she is praised for being "liberated" and breaking free of an otherwise fine man who was not catering to her every emotional and psychological whim.

This isn't simply a problem for married men. The rent-seeking nature of marriage snuffs out the social value traditionally created by the institution. It discourages a traditional division of labor allowing each partner to do work that befits their talents and self-actualization. The lack of value-creation in modern marriage also reduces the chance of producing well-adjusted children who will contribute positively to society.

Though we like to point out the frequent incongruence of female behavior with their stated goals, humans at our core are predictable creatures. We behave in response to incentives and act in our own self-interest. The clear economic solution to this problem is to limit the female-dominated monopoly privileges inherent in our marital system. Since this is unlikely to happen anytime soon, as a man you are best served by understanding the cold rationality of this transactional process and taking steps to ensure you are not victimized by it.

8 Ways The Manosphere Changed My Views

April 9, 2013 | by George (3rd Millenium Men) | Link | Original Link

I was introduced to the manosphere 12 months ago. It was an incredibly enlightening discovery, fundamentally shifting my viewpoints and taking the blinders off in a number of key areas. In tribute to the manosphere, here are the 8 biggest ways it has affected my views:

1. The Supreme Importance Of Being Alpha

Prior to the manosphere, I had extensive success in attracting and 'picking up' women. However, after just experiencing a bad breakup (where for the first time in my life a girlfriend dumped me), I realized I didn't have enough understanding or experience of maintaining attraction in the longer term. Heartiste's 16 Commandments was the first manosphere post I was introduced to. It significantly improved my confidence to be alpha and the way I interact with women. This isn't about being 'someone I'm not', as some whiny so-called 'nice guys' attest. It's simply allowing the more dominant side of my personality to show. We are multi-faceted people, and I was prepared to use that side more, whereas a lot of guys suppress it, thinking it must be a bad thing. Girls have been more attracted to me with less effort on my part as a result of not suppressing this.

The next most important post I read was Heartiste's explanation of What Women Want. I still consider these the two most important posts in the manosphere, and the two which have shaped my view on the importance of being alpha the most. I also realized how important this continues to be in marriage thanks to the likes of Dalrock's Untethered. Inside A Woman's Mind provides the best female perspective on this that I've read.

2. Age And Sexual Market Value

Prior to encountering the manosphere, I simply didn't have an understanding of the true relationship between age and sexual market value for both men and women. Rollo Tomassi's Sexual Market Value post opened my eyes to how this actually works.

The desperation of older single women started to make sense, thanks to the likes of Dr Meg Jay explaining fertility and Lori Gottleib giving her life story. The first hand experience of the Audacious Amateur Blogger and Athol Kay's post on relative sex rank also opened my eyes. The biggest problem with this is that I'm noticing the effects of women ageing far more. It has also meant that I've decided I would never start a serious relationship with a girl older than 23-24, as per Victor Pride's recommendation.

3. Game Evolving To The Next Level

After having studied the likes of David DeAngelo and later training with top PUAs around the world, I found that the ways guys were interacting with girls was again scaling dizzying heights. Krauser's escapades, Roosh's stories and Steve's videos indicate how this has gone to a new level.

4. Understanding The Dynamics Of A Breakup

I was a wreck after my relationship dissolved. Rollo Tomassi's post on committing suicide over a woman provided incredible levels of insight into exactly how badly breakups can affect men. This breaks open a taboo topic that I've never read anywhere else. I think the fact that the manosphere has done this is inspiring. While not directly in the manosphere, I was also inspired to read great books about the neurological processes of relationships, which helped further my understanding.

5. Exactly Why I Was So Put Off By Girls Sleeping Around

Since I was a teenager, I had always been extremely put-off by girlfriends who admitted to me the extent of their sexual escapades. The University of Man's post on A Man With Options helped explain exactly why the number of men a woman has been with impacts on a relationship. Heartiste's analysis of why girls who sleep around make bad wives provided data and statistical analysis of why this is so important in terms of marriage. A range of insights from manosphere commentators also elucidated the concept further, although they are sometimes too harsh. I'm not saying men or women are any less as people by how many sexual partners they've chosen to sleep with. But both sides have to realize that it does impact their future relationships.

6. The Devastating Effects of Pornography

I had been strongly opposed to porn for a number of years. However, rather than just seeing it as morally wrong and sapping the male sex drive, I began to understand how detrimental it is in other ways. The brilliant website Your Brain On Porn provided a plethora of insights in regards to this. Widespread stories of erectile dysfunction, brought to my attention by the now defunct Gmac and Bold and Determined should also be enough to scare the hell out of any man. The Brain That Changes Itself was also a genius book that provided superb levels of insight into how the brain rewires to try and handle porn.

7. Why Marriage Is So Important And Why Substitutes Don't Work

This goes against some manosphere rationalizing. However, all evidence shows that marriage is the single best way to raise children. Dalrock also highlights the plethora of benefits gained from marriage. In this period of time I learned about the detrimental Cohabitation Effect and Dalrock provided huge insights into why mini relationships do not stack up to marriage.

[image]

8. Understanding How Women Think

I more fully understood why women act the way they do. Rollo explained the psychology behind why women shit test, which has been well supported by Glenn P. Heartiste, explained what the automatic reaction should be. I came to understand why flaking on girls is so incredibly effective in making girls chase you, and why it should be done more often. Danny provided great insights and M3 also cleverly analysed why men being nice is a crime for women.

In summary, it's been a hell of a year in understanding men, women and their dynamics better. Keep growing and evolving men!

A False Rape Accusation: My Story

April 10, 2013 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

I've heard of many men being accused of rape, but few which explain the situation in detail. This is a true story and it was shortly after this that I started exploring the internet for answers, which lead me to the manosphere. I've been careful not to leave anything important out so you can see just how this milestone in my life unfolded.

A Quick Intro

About two years ago, a good friend of mine lived in a prime location town house, in the middle of an upper-class suburban area on the west coast of Canada. Liquor and convenience stores nearby made this two-story mini bachelor pad a hot-spot for throwing parties full of college girls.

It was basically a dream house for a group of young men, but if you've ever lived in a suburban area in Canada, you know how easy it is to get noise complaints and how quick police are to impede on your gatherings. For some reason, our get-togethers would go undetected, either because there were good neighbors, or the place was good at muffling noise.

My friends and I controlled this environment with efficiency and girls would flock to our place every weekend. Here I learned the importance of logistics for attracting women and what types of girls are more pleasant to keep around. Latin women were our main focus (Brazilians, Mexicans etc.) as there were many of them around, and were eager to make Canadian friends while they were studying abroad.

Canadian girls quickly disappeared off the guest list, a combination of obnoxious and boring attitudes along with their jealousy and aggressiveness towards the Latina girls. We'd mix them in every now and then, but there were definitely much less of them near the end.

Unfortunately, my friend was forced to move out due to financial strain.

The Rising Action

One of the last nights the house was in operation, the place was packed with thirsty co-eds and everyone was enjoying themselves. The Latinas had gone home (since it was the end of the school year), so we were left with self-entitled university sluts to suffice. No matter, all was well and nothing had broken yet.

Late in the night, two Canadian girls who were looking fairly DTF were expressing their interest in a hookup with my friend and I. The girl my friend was with (lets call her Bethany), had double d's and pierced nipples. It was a sight to behold. She was a famed "easy lay" around the neighborhood and I was sure my turn would come later on.

My girl (lets call her Taryn) was average looking and a feminist type. Half Japanese and half-witted, I was aware this girl would lead me to the Bethany Show, so I swallowed my pride and took one for the team. We quickly found a bedroom and proceeded to coitus with tweedle-hoe and tweedle-skank.

Things soon started getting hot and heavy and the girls started stripping. The double d's already had her top off and I could barely keep my eyes off those warlocks. At one point I stopped just to grab them, and admire for a few moments, before diving back into the sloppy make-out underneath me.

Then Taryn got up aggressively from the bed and started pushing a desk in front of the door. The desk legs snap and the desk collapsed on the ground, barricading us in the room. We were all a bit shocked she had done this. This piece of furniture had just been ruined in front of our eyes, and this girl didn't seem to care at all.

There was subtle knock on the door and Taryn screams: "Get the fuck out!"

At this point I'm thinking "wow this girl is going to rape me".

The Abrupt Decline

Our session continued and I started to use some digital foreplay. It looked like she was loving it by her moans, by now she had her shirt off and I'm waiting for our make-out to progress further. This continued for about 10 minutes and I found myself on top of her.

Suddenly, her "hot and bothered" look turned to "I think I lost my car keys." She said she needed to go. I couldn't believe she would go from hot to cold so quickly and for no reason, so I tried to convince her to stay. She mentioned something about having to call her mom, which I didn't believe for a second. Meanwhile beside me, Bethany and my friend seem to have stopped theirs to watch our conversation unfold.

Loading...
"I seriously have to go", she said now with more angst in her voice.

I was on top of her and so she was waiting for me to get off, so I finally did and I moved the broken desk for her so she could leave. Looking back, this girl wasn't deserving of that act of kindness by my part, but I assumed the role of man and moved a heavy object for the weaker person. She left and shortly after, Bethany left as well. Me and my friend sat on the bed for a bit laughing, realizing the humor in the situation, then we left too.

The Accusation

I had gone out for a smoke on the patio with some members of my tribe, so I wasn't aware of what was happening inside. It wasn't until I went back in to get more drinks did I see Taryn sobbing in the corner and her mother hen friend beside her giving me a death glare. I didn't know why this was, but I didn't give it too much thought. Dr. Dre's "Bitches ain't shit (but hoes and tricks)" was playing, which I found quite entertaining.

When I looked over again, a small crowd had formed around Taryn and looks of concern clouded their faces. I pulled another Corona out of the fridge and walked over to see what was the matter. I assumed she was just emotional from the being drunk, alcohol can be a real tear-jerker, especially for women.

As I got nearer and the mother-hen friend came over and said: "I'm going to kill you, fucking rapist! You are so done!" I was shocked to hear this, so I nervously laughed and asked her, "What do you mean?"

More yelling and finger-pointing occurred, but I denied everything and tried to look like I was concerned and innocent, which I was. I went over and apologized, but she was too busy sobbing to hear me. Her friend then says: "I'm calling the police."

At this point it really started to sink in that I could potentially get screwed over by these people. Things like witnesses and alibis started entering my thoughts. I was legitimately scared so I evacuated the building and took a walk outside with my friend to discuss the event and recollect my thoughts.

I calmed down, and when I got back inside, I found myself witnessing a catfight in between the sobbing accuser and another chick. The frail, hurt girl who had just been "raped," had now dropped the gloves and was getting her Sarah Kaufman on.

My relief that the cops were never called and that the attention was now off me quickly turned to anger. How did this even happen? The fact that I was put into this corner so easily was a really disconcerting thought. It took about a half hour to clear everyone out and I was left with my friends to pick up the bottles, and pick up the pieces of the night.

Some Afterthoughts

To this day I am still dumbfounded by the sheer audacity you'd have to posses to falsely accuse someone of something like rape. Now that I am somewhat educated with red pill knowledge, I can look back and see that this girl was a typical delusional feminist.

It's my theory that she did this because she realized that I was more interested in the large chested girl than her, and she reacted out of anger. It must have hit her, mid rape, that I was not there for her, but for her more attractive friend and this infuriated her.

It seems these women who think they can use the law in their favor, are using their power far too often than they should be. I'm sure you are familiar with the story "The Boy Who Cried Wolf", and this is very much like that. When an actual rapist comes around, their cries will be ignored.

My message to you readers is, careful with who you share a bed with, because you might not be as lucky as I was. My situation could have easily escalated into something much, much uglier. Rape accusers are all around, especially rampant in North America.

If you're wondering if I've seen this girl since, I have. A few times actually. I look her straight in the eye, but she looks away or to the floor, as if ashamed. I wonder how many other dudes shes pointed the rape finger at since?

The Scorpion And The Frog

April 10, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

One of my favorite Aesop fables is the Scorpion and the Frog. There are many variations to this famed fable, but the short of it is as follows:

> A scorpion and a frog meet on the bank of a stream and the scorpion asks the frog to carry him across on its back. The frog asks, "How do I know you won't sting me?" The scorpion says, "Because if I do, I will die too."
> The frog is satisfied, and they set out. But in midstream, the scorpion stings the frog. The frog feels the onset of paralysis and starts to sink, knowing they both will drown, but has just enough time to gasp "Why?"
> Replies the scorpion: "It's my nature…"

There are many things one can take from this short story. But here are the main points that jump out at me.

Accept Your Inner Scorpion

Ask a bunch of people if a person can change, and you will get various answers. Some will say of course people can change, others will say that no in fact one cannot change their true selves. I tend to agree with the latter.

Everyone can change their physical attributes with clothing, diet, makeup and/or exercise. But can you really change your ingrained personality? Well yes and no if you ask me. You can learn social skills to become less introverted. You can practice controlling your anger if you have issues. You can attend alcoholics anonymous to get that drinking problem under control.

But in reality these are band-aids to the problem. If you were placed in an environment where it was not necessary to be social to be accepted and/or succeed, you'd revert back to your introverted ways. Give that alcoholic a consequence-free setting and an open bar, and you can bet he will start drinking. Piss off that guy in anger management class and he'll come out in a full rage.

Loading…

The key is to realize who you really are, and accept that about yourself. Once you accept that you love to drink, or that you should not be in a relationship, or that you are horrible at math, you will be better off. Ever see someone go on a crash diet only to stuff themselves with a pound of cheesecake one day? How about the guy who was pressured into marriage and then gets to go away for a weekend, only to end up fucking anything that walked by him? Knowing your nature can help you adjust your life accordingly and generally be happier. Otherwise once that scorpion's sting surfaces, it may cause some significant damage.

Never Be The Frog

I can relate this to my own personal story from many moons ago. Boy (me) meets girl at wedding and has sex with her hours later. Girl acts like its no big deal. Girl admits she's had more partners than her age. Girl admits she was a stripper. Girl admits she has a past of sexual abuse. Girl admits she has never been faithful to any partner in the past, but that this time, boy is different. Girl will not cheat and will be the best girlfriend in the world.

Boy ignores the obvious nature of this particular scorpion. Boy believes girl's promise to not cheat and be faithful. So boy dates girl seriously, and they become a couple. One year later, the scorpion surfaced and stung the frog. The girl cheats on boy because, well, that was her nature.

Be smart enough to realize that despite what someone tells you, it will be his or her nature that controls and not their empty promises. While I learned this the hard way, I'm glad I did. Whether it's a girl, a deadbeat friend who asks to borrow money with the promise to repay, or a business partner you know is lazy, you need to be careful. Never be the frog.

Barack Obama Is The Most Pussy-Whipped President In History

April 10, 2013 | by redrock1t | Link | Original Link

In what can only be described as the most absurd sign of the times, President Obama practically had his balls removed for remarking that California Attorney General, Kamala Harris, was a bit of a hottie.

While speaking at a California fund raiser, he introduced her thusly: ”She’s brilliant and she’s dedicated, she’s tough… She also happens to be, by far, the best looking attorney general.” When the crowd gave him a bit of a frosty reception, he added, ”It’s true! C’mon!”

After stuck up, hypocritical, waste of space commentators from both Communist liberal and conservative camps took to Twitter to hammer his remarks as “unsettling,” “disgraceful,” and “disrespectful,” the poor pussy-whipped president had to issue a public statement saying he “regretted” the move.

Not even five years ago a statement like this would have been reserved for the discovery that he’d been banging her and they had a love child. Eliot Spitzer and John Edwards got off lightly for their indiscretions; by these standards they should have had their dicks cut off in public.

The fine lady is 48, mixed race, and she looks quite attractive, which is unusual for politics. A lot of women in politics look like their father was an Orc and their mother was a Cave Troll. Obama is a miserably happily married man. What’s the big deal ?

[image]

So what’s the moral of the story, even for a closet Marxist like Obama?

If Obama had called her an ugly old bat, certainly that would have been offensive, but normally praising someone’s appearance is considered a compliment. If Brad Pitt had taken up law and become Attorney General of California, would it be insulting to call him the most good looking Attorney General? If Obama had been at a function with Arnold Schwarzenegger, back in the day when he was governor, would a quirky comment about him being the most muscular governor have been offensive? The press, who seem to be in on this most hypocritical feminist rant against Obama, were quick to call Arnie the “Governator.” Nicknames like this are more derogatory than flattering, but made with a bit of humor, where is the harm ?

What are we supposed to glean? That by flattering a woman about her looks, you demean her professional capacity? Does that mean if I’m in a business meeting and a women comments that she likes my suit or haircut I should take it as an offensive remark? File for discrimination?

Are we so hung up on being politically correct that we can blast the president for making a cheeky but flattering, alpha male comment about a fellow government employ, but we’re not allowed to mention the $18 trillion dollar debt he has run up while in office? I mean never mind the tasty Californian lawyer, Barack has been pushing wheel barrows of the green dough faster than a Colombian drug baron.

This kind of politically correct attitude is only allowed to flourish when a nation is beginning its terminal decline. The old “emperor’s got no clothes” fable, tells of the idiocy of the general public who couldn’t dare mention that the finest tailor had left the King with nothing on. King Louis XVI would tell you, if he hadn’t had his head sliced off in a guillotine, that prancing about in fancy clothes and spouting platitudes doesn’t help when half the nation is sliding into poverty. We’re all busy believing fairy tales, and distracted when feminist rants about a hottie lawyer hit the headlines.

I suspect we don’t have to worry about feminism or the trillions in debt for too much longer. If people don’t understand that financial reality is more important than some politically correct jokes, we’ll be crawling about in a real life Mad Max, trying to find some fuel so we can steal a few shotgun shells and shoot at the crazy bikers chasing after us.

I’ll leave you with two quote from the founding fathers:

“America will never be destroyed from the outside. If we falter and lose our freedoms, it will be because we destroyed ourselves.” Abraham Lincoln

“Freedom is not a gift bestowed upon us by other men, but a right that belongs to us by the laws of God and nature.” Benjamin Franklin

If you can’t understand these quotes and you’re not prepared to stand up and fight for them.

And here are six photos that confirm Obama’s pussy-whipped status:

Why Money Can No Longer Save The Beta Male

[image]

I've already written about the limits of money when it comes to game. Suffice it to say that, in today's modern Western environment where young, attractive women are exceedingly well provisioned, the provider male is not as valuable as he used to be.

It was one thing to be financially stable in a world where women had few prospects for earning on their own, and where they could be socially ostracized for having sex outside of a marriage or a VERY committed relationship.

It is another thing entirely when women not only can support themselves, but also suffer no consequences for having sex with men outside of marriage and/or committed relationships. Women like that do not need to limit themselves to the borders desired by the traditional beta provider male—they are instead free to fuck whoever it is they find attractive, and do so without the pressure of marriage/family forced upon them by society as a cost.

Despite these glaring realities, there still remain many betas in our society who have not gotten the memo. To illustrate this, I present to you the story of one Mr. Rishi Bajaj:

> Rishi Bajaj, 33, says he opened his heart, then his wallet, to Miss New Mexico Teen USA 2007 Liz Kranz after she told him she was considering selling her eggs to raise cash for a relative in rehab.
> The sob story got the beauty a $20,000 loan from Bajaj, he claims in a Manhattan Supreme Court lawsuit.

We already know where this is going…

> Bajaj, who co-manages the $620 million hedge fund Altai Capital, then told Kranz, 24, to pick out a car for the couple to share — and was "surprised" when she selected a 2012 BMW that came with a $17,070 down payment.

Here we find a man who is shocked that a girl he essentially offered a blank check to would pick an expensive car. And even after finding this “surprise” he still paid for it.

> They met in July 2012 and dated for “several months,” even vacationing together in Italy, where, Bajaj said in court papers, he let Kranz use his American Express card.
> Kranz, of the Lower East Side, was also allowed to use Bajaj’s AmEx to buy a dress for a wedding they attended.
> In all, Bajaj claims Kranz spent $58,860 on his credit card over three months last year. In a November letter, his lawyer accused her of “theft, fraud and other egregious misconduct” and demanded she repay the full $58,860 in credit-card purchases.
> He wants the court to force Kranz to repay him at least $40,000 of the credit-card charges as well as the $20,000 loan and the BMW down payment plus an $1,853.73 late fee.

In this we see the sad plight of the pitiful, clueless beta male.
Blissfully unaware of the broad societal changes I outlined at the beginning of the article, Mr. Bajaj decided to give the world to a former beauty queen for no other reason other than the fact that she was young and reasonably hot. He essentially threw money at her, furnishing the woman with jewelry, clothing and an expensive new car.

Ms. Kranz, for reference:

In return for his ~~generosity~~ simping, Mr. Bajaj was probably expecting to secure Ms. Kranz's sexual loyalty and affection. After all, he's already done the "right" thing and "taken care of" her. Surely, she would have to respond by committing to him, expressing her undying love for him and articulating a willingness to stand by his side forever. Such is the stuff that beta dreams are made of. The reality, however, is not nearly that kind to the beta.

In another era, Mr. Bajaj's dreams could likely have come true. An attractive woman like Kranz would have had great incentive to settle with a wealthy, successful young man like Bajaj, beta or not. In the "old days", such a woman couldn't earn much on her own and social shaming would prevent her from waiting too long to settle down and/or messing with more attractive but less financially stable men outside of marriage.

So what did a woman do in these bygone eras? They settled, often for a man who was steady and reliable if not particularly sexually exciting (most were not lucky enough to snag more balanced prospects). She made do with the understanding that it was her best choice. Perhaps down the line she'd even develop some genuine affection for her husband for his ability to provide for her, even if he wasn't the most sexually attractive man she could have had sex with.

Often, however, there was an undercurrent of resentment in the hearts of these women, a current that I'm confident played some role in the explosion of second-wave feminism during the 60s and probably helped to drive the no-fault divorce movement. As has been articulated before, women hate betas. Given the choice between a weak, supplicating male she can easily control/extract resources from at a whim and a more confident, secure, self-assured man, most women would certainly pick the latter. In the past, the weaker men were protected from this reality.

They aren’t anymore.

> Now dating mixed-martial-arts hunk Max McGarr, Kranz did not respond to requests for comment.

Here is Mr. McGarr, for reference:

How much do you guys want to bet that Mr. McGarr hasn't felt the need to purchase a new BMW or drop $60,000 for the privilege of pounding this former beauty queen?

This story only highlights the reality of our modern environment, and the growing weakness of the provider model in securing the affection of young, attractive women with options. Ms. Kranz, unlike her mother and grandmother may have before her, didn't feel any compulsion to settle for a weak man like Rishi Bajaj.

He's wealthy, but she doesn't need his money. She can support herself just fine. He's a "nice guy," but such appearances are irrelevant in a world where girls like Liz Kranz do not face social ostracism for having unmarried sex with men who do not fit that traditional mold.

For better or worse, women are free now. They can finally make the sexual choices they've always wanted to make, choices dictated by their natural hypergamy. Rishi Bajaj and tens of millions of men like him are thus left with a stark choice: adapt to these new realities by improving yourself and becoming the more sexually attractive man that an attractive woman will want to choose over her abundance of other options or refuse to change and suffer the consequences (rejection, long sexual dry-spells, and embarrassing "extortion" of the kind seen in this story).

Women have made their conditions clear—supplicating betas and other wannabe "providers" need not apply. Men must either adapt to this reality or accept eternal frustration in the sexual marketplace. There is no middle ground.

The Kitchen Is A Window To A Woman's Soul

April 11, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Recently I was flying across the Americas, seated next to an American woman. She was 40 or so, blonde and thin – it was obvious she was attractive in her day, but Father Time and childlessness left her looking haggard and wearied. Between confessing to banging her way through the men of Cancun in bathroom stalls, and how her boyfriend dumped her because he refused to deal with her mother and is now dating a Colombian au-pair, she stated flatly, "I don't cook. I'm too busy, I have a great career, I just have no time for it."

Looking back, I've met plenty of these women. There was the insufferable Jewish princess who said, "I will not cook – I will have a great career in New York City and I will hire a nanny to cook meals for my children. There's no need for me to learn how to cook." Or you'll be at a girl's place, and after a vigorous bit of sex, you tramp off her to fridge for some food. Open the door, and you see… a jar of pickles, some Nutella, and a single, solitary Ball Park frank. You didn't even know people actually ate that shit. Her refrigerator is a testament to her inability to love.

What A Woman's Refusal To Cook Means

Cooking is not hard – making a healthful, tasty meal has never been easier. Between modern kitchen appliances, supermarkets, farmers' markets, car ownership and the wealth of information on the internet, making your own meals is fairly simple. The only thing that cooking requires is the desire for something better, and the will to make it happen. This is what I hear when a woman says she does not cook:

"Everything that can be bought, should be bought."

Now that she has a career and is earning some dough, she figures, why not spend some of it to make life a little easier. I'm pretty guilty of this myself – I've never changed the oil in my car, and I don't even know how to change my tires. My mechanical know-how consists of manhandling little kids into letting me build their Lego sets. But it gets to the point where there is practically nothing she won't outsource – cleaning her room, cutting her nails, ironing her clothes, and not least, cooking. Besides showering and maybe washing her own sheets, her job is the only time she's not actually just consuming the fruit of someone else's labor, in exchange for her cash. If you're hoping for random acts of generosity from her, keep dreaming. Which leads into…

"I am too lazy to take care of my basic needs."

She sees it as a sign of empowerment that she has outsourced one of man's most basic activities. It would be like taking a dump, and then announcing to the world that you can't be trusted to wipe your own ass. Why she takes pride in this, I don't know. But, do know that she won't hesitate to draft you as just another peon to make her life work. Doing nice things for you with any regularity will be foreign to her. After all, she's not used to giving up her time to do things for others, except within the confines of her job. She will do anything for her boss, but make a slight request of her as her man, she will blow up and call you a misogynistic asshole. You're basically as bad as one of those mythical Iranians who stone women to death for getting raped.

"I'm not your slave, I'm not cooking for you."

Loading…

You will have an easier time getting this girl to lick your asshole than you will getting her to prepare you a simple omelette. If I was already preparing some food, and I had a girl over and she asked to have some, I'd have no problem throwing in another couple eggs or slices of bacon. Flip the script, ask her to make you something, and suddenly you've turned back the clock to those dark days when uh, women didn't get free birth control from the government, and couldn't fuck around on their husband and expect to keep the kids. She actually will equate cooking for you with being your slave.

"I'm happy to make others provide for my every want."

Instead of showing her gratitude to you by dazzling you with fresh food and clean laundry, she opts for a different setup for her dates with you. The formula: you show up, and you shell out for some mass-made experience that she can check off a list and crow to her friends about. You are a pawn in her perpetual competition with her frenemies, and a six-foot dildo there for her pleasure if you score. After all, she has grown up believing that the whole point of having a job is to get enough money so she doesn't have to deal with pesky things like raising children – that's what the illiterate Mexican nanny is for. And because you're a man, you should be footing the bill for this conspicuous consumption.

"I can't be bothered to take my health seriously."

Healthy, satisfying, affordable – pick two. The only way to have all three is to cook your own meals. When a woman eats most of her meals out, she's compromising somewhere. Usually, she's eating food that she's been brainwashed into thinking is good for you, like Yoplait and oatmeal cookies, food that's actually stuffed with sugar, refined carbohydrates and oils cooked up in a chemistry lab. She's always straddling the line between starving herself and getting fat, because her diet leaves room for nothing else. In a time when restaurants serve such fattening meals, the argument for cooking at home has never been stronger. Yet she can't be bothered.

"I'm too busy to make you a priority"

She will tell you she just doesn't have the time to cook. Yet she is constantly talking about how she must 'catch up on' sixteen episodes of Game of Thrones, as if it were an essential homework assignment. She's a total phony. If you want to see this woman more than once a week, she may start to think you're weak and needy, even if all you want is sex. And because she's already watching so much media, she'll look to you to take her out of her drudgery to a fancy restaurant for when you do meet.

To be fair, many of my criticisms of single women can be levied in equal measure against men. Currently, I'm not looking for intimate relationships with men, so their personal behavior doesn't concern me as much. And for every point I made above, the woman who cooks merits the equal and opposite compliment.

With such obvious benefits to preparing your own meals, the fact that she doesn't is disconcerting. Thankfully, there are women who do cook, and even for those that don't, some are apt to change. I've known a few women who knew nothing about cooking when single, but became great cooks once married. Never bank on being able to change a girl of course, but keep an open mind; you may be surprised at how much you can influence a girl with the right guidance.

What Hitchhiking Taught Me About Picking Up Girls

April 12, 2013 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

Last year, I went on a hitchhiking trip across America that lasted six months and took me across sixteen states from New York to the West Coast. It was a wild, harrowing and disturbing trip, and while I wouldn't recommend hitchhiking to everyone, it's a great idea if you're looking for adventure and excitement. In particular, hitchhiking has a disturbing number of parallels with game. Here's just a few…

1. Looks matter.

Most “career” hitchhikers are slobs: they don’t shower and dress in raggedy, filthy, torn clothing. This isn’t even getting into their love of piercings, dreadlocks and other ugly facial accouterments. Who the hell would let a guy who has flies buzzing around him to get high into their car? I had a much easier time than most hitchhiking because I looked like a normal, everyday guy: I showered every day, wore clean, fresh clothes and cut my hair once a week. I lost count of the number of people who told me something to the effect of, “You’re the first hitchhiker I’ve ever picked up, because you don’t look like a bum.” In fact, there was one incident in Minnesota where a dirty Deadhead had been trying to get a ride for two hours; hitching from the same spot, I got a ride in five minutes.

If you’re looking to get laid, you need to look good. You don’t need to be an Adonis, but you need to at least put some effort into your appearance. No woman will be attracted to an unkempt slob.

2. Location matters.

The ease of hitchhiking in the U.S. largely depends on where you are. Even if you follow all the rules I lay out in my recent book, The Hitchhiking Crash Course, in some places you’re just plain going to have a hard time getting a ride. In places like Central New York and eastern Washington state, the average driver would rather set himself on fire than give a ride to a stranger, no matter what he looks like. In contrast, in places like Iowa and Montana, people will offer to give you a lift even when you aren’t looking for one. Additionally, if you’re in a place known for life-threatening weather, such as North Dakota in December, motorists will offer to pick you up so you don’t “fucking freeze!”

Likewise, some cities and countries are so wretched—either because of fattitude, sausage fests and antisocial attitudes—that even if you're a master at the game, you're going to have a difficult time. You're better off focusing on places where women are agreeable and attractive and the deck isn't stacked against you.

3. It's a numbers game…

Hitchhiking is best described as short bursts of action separated by long stretches of boredom. As a thumber, it's your job to sift through the drivers who pass by you, signalling them all until one of them pulls over and tells you to hop in. The majority of motorists will never deign to pick you up no matter what, so it's your obligation to keep trucking until you find the ones who will help you out.

The same goes with women. Unless you become famous, the majority of girls on Earth will never be interested in you, so you have no choice but to approach until you find the ones that do.

4. …that you will win so long as you persist.

There was more than one point during my trip where it felt like I would never get out of wherever I was. When you're stuck for a whole weekend in a grimy coal-mining town in the middle of nowhere, you start to go a little crazy. But despite all the obstacles the world threw in my path, I persevered and made it all the way to Oregon. It took pulling some insane stunts at points, but I made it.

Again, the same goes with girls. Unless you are completely hopeless (and few men are), there is at least one woman out there who will have sex with you because of who you are right now. Don't let the fact that you haven't achieved your personal goals yet stop you from seeking her out.

Five Steps To Becoming More Productive

So many people talk about becoming more productive and reading books like 7 Habits of Highly Effective People yet so few do anything real about actually becoming more productive. Like home gym equipment that's collecting dust in the closet and doesn't make you stronger or leaner, having a few books on productivity is not going to make you learn how to make better use of your time. Like one of my friends told his buddy once, who was a self help book junkie – "Stop watching porn and start having sex!"

Being more productive will necessarily make you a happier person for several reasons. First, you will accomplish more, you will have more reasons to be proud of yourself, and you will have more time for doing all the things that don't require maximum productivity, such as relaxing, laying on the beach, going out, etc. Just as importantly, lack of productivity is one significant source of guilt that many of us experience, which results from underachieving and not getting done what we planned to finish today, this week, this month or even this year.

Here are a five very simple, practical steps you can take today to become more productive in just about any ares of your life – school, work, and social engagements:

1. Stop Wasting Time

You may think that you don't waste time and you make the most out of your day, but I bet that if you looked at your life a little more closely, you would find many hours that go to waste each and every week.

Do you have a study or work partner or study group at school? If so, do you sidetrack 40% of your study time into the subjects that have nothing to do with your work, to only later stress out about not having studied enough and worrying about upcoming exams. If so, drop the study group. This doesn't meant that you can't be social and you can't be friends with the same people in the group. It just means that you should be better at separating work time from play time. Also, getting your work done will make your play time all the more fun, as it's surely easier to relax when you don't have the outstanding stuff you need to get done hang over your head.

Do you hang on the phone with friends for hours listening to their issues and sharing yours? There is nothing wrong with discussing your problems with those who are close to you, and that's what real friends do. However, if you spend more than 30 minutes on the phone with any given friend talking about nothing specific, you are likely wasting time – your and his/hers.

2. Minimize Commute Time

If you drive to work/school for longer than 30 minutes one way, something is wrong with the way your life is set up, and unless it seems like a very temporary situation, it's your duty to change that. Many of us live in suburban areas where you have to drive 5 miles to get a cup of coffee. I could write a treatise about all the things that are wrong with living in such an environment, but for now – you need to focus on setting up your life in way where you don't have to waste hours on commute every day.

We all know that being stuck in front of the wheel sucks – it's tiring and it's one of the biggest waste of time. If you can't find a job or school closer to where you live, then move closer to where you go every day. Spend extra few hundred dollars on rent. It will be worth it. "It's all about location" might sound like a total cliche, but it's as true today as it ever was. Just try it. You can always move back, but I bet that once you taste a better life – a life where you will be just a short drive or ideally – a quick walk from work/school will feel so much sweeter, that you will never want to go back to the way things were before, when you had to start your day on an wrong foot with a long commute on a congested road during rush hour.

Loading…

3. Treat Small Segments Of Free Time With Value And Respect

I meet people every day who tell me that they wish they had time to read and work out, but they do neither because they are too busy. I know that at the very list they have extra 10-15 minutes in the morning and 10-15 minutes in the evening to spare. 10 minutes doesn't sound like a whole lot of time, but most of us can comfortably run a mile in that time. Running a mile every day or even every other day is quite a work-out and is surely better than not working out at all. During the same 10 minutes, you might be able to read 2-3 pages of a great book.

Just because you don't have time to take a whole fitness class or read half a book in one sitting doesn't mean that you can't enjoy those activities in smaller doses. Don't dismiss small segments of time as useless. They are not. If an advertising agency can pack in so much entertainment and marketing in a commercial that lasts for 30 seconds or even less, if a comedian can make you laugh your ass off with his 2 min Youtube video, and if the President can address the nation in 20 minutes, who are we to say that 10-15 minutes of time cannot be put into good use?

4. St0p Spending Time On Issues That Don't Deserve Attention

I have known quite a few people who would fight the fights that were simply not worth fighting, like that guy who is making over $200k/year, and who hangs on the phone for an hour disputing a $4 charge on his phone bill, or this other guy who took half a day off work to fight a parking ticket that was virtually unwinnable, just because it was a matter of "principle".

Maximizing your productivity demands picking and choosing your battles carefully. Fighting for the principle is a noble idea, but it's only wise if you don't end up the loser in that battle, even when you technically win. I doubt that a professional guy who takes half a day off work to stand in line to fight a traffic ticket ends up a winner in that situation even if he gets his ticket cancelled.

5. Stop Spending Time With Women You Don't Like

Do you spend hours every week with a girl that you know you are not all that into, because no one better has come along yet? If so, you are doing a disservice to yourself by not using that time more productive on developing yourself professionally, socially, physically, spiritually, or even meeting the kind of girls that you would really like. You are also hurting the girl by possibly leading her into believing that you like her more than you do. Stop doing that. Unless both of you have great sexual chemistry, you both are completely honest with each other, and you both understand that you see each other exclusively to satisfy your mutual sexual desire for each other, you are wasting time – yours and hers.

Increasing your productivity is as much about being more productive as it is about making sure that you don't waste time or you waste less time today than you did yesterday on things that add nothing to your life.

Game Can Protect You From False Rape Accusations

April 13, 2013 | by Divorco | Link | Original Link

Many stories in the Manosphere warn of false rape accusations. Roosh penned How To Avoid A False Rape Accusation and published Samseau's 3 Signs She's Making A False Rape Accusation. A whole thread at the RooshV Forum discusses this problem: Avoiding False Rape Accusations.

False Accusation Paranoia

A common perspective incorrectly presumes that most accusations stem from bad sex, when a woman has sexual shame and recrimination. She then uses the false accusation as a psychological "anti-slut defense" to deny her willing promiscuity. This narrative is generally wrong, and the consequent advice will do little to prevent false rape allegations. Worse, it blames the victims. It presumes that even if men are legally innocent of rape, that "they must have done something." Perhaps they enjoyed illicit sex, were insensitive lovers, encouraged attached women to cheat, or generally "took advantage" of partners.

According to Robert Hazelwood and Ann Burgess, Practical Aspects of Rape Investigation: A Multidisciplinary Approach,

> In false rape allegations, generally all three components of the allegation are false (i.e., the act, the perpetrator, and the circumstances). … The pseudovictim has a conscious understanding that the complaint is false.

These are not cases of ambiguous consent, of sex gone bad, or subsequent recrimination. Instead, these cases involve complete fabrication.

3 Real Reasons for False Accusations

Women have different motivations for inventing these stories. Some are psychologically disturbed and want attention or sympathy. Some have financial motives. And others manufacture an alibi that covers their own misbehavior, e.g., missing curfew or having an affair.

1. Attention-seeking

Fortunately, many false allegations fail to charge a specific individual. The pseudovictim might present superficial, self-inflicted injuries to bolster her case. But then she provides vague details that do not risk exposing her lies by identifying a specific attacker. In these cases, a formal proceeding or prosecution that might expose the truth would not serve the woman's interest. Thus in many cases, false allegations do not involve accusations.

2. Financial Motivation

The famous Brian Banks case illustrates financial motivation, where the pseudovictim garnered a reported $1,500,000 settlement. It is important to recognize that although he knew the pseudovictim, Brian Banks never had sex with her. Notably, he did not defend himself in court. Instead, he accepted a reduced sentence by pleading no-contest to assault charges.

3. Alibi

The need for alibi is a big concern. Famous examples include the Cathleen Crowell and Tawana Brawley episodes. In both cases, the girls invented stories to conceal liaisons with their boyfriends. Importantly, women who need alibis for sexual indiscretions do not typically accuse their actual lovers. Instead they usually want to see those men again. Even in the case of one-night stands, it could be terribly inconvenient to accuse a real consensual partner of rape. The paramour may have evidence and witnesses that contradict the accusation.

Vorkuta's case from the RooshV Forum illustrates these issues. One of Vorkuta's co-defendants did not even have sex with the pseudovictim. The case was ultimately thrown out mid-trial because of inconsistent accuser testimony and contradictory evidence. Ironically, the circumstances of actual (consensual) sex left evidence to help rebut the false accusations.

How To Avoid False Accusations

To quote Vorkuta,

> So the question was how to avoid these allegations from happening: I have no idea.

Obviously it is difficult to avoid completely fictitious allegations. Video cameras cannot exonerate you by recording things that never happened. From the bachelors' perspective, it is instructive to examine the minority of cases that involve actual sex. They have one common denominator: the false-accusers do not want repeat sex with the accused.

When women are attracted to men, they want to see them again. If they need alibis, then they would rather accuse strangers than their actual lovers. Men with “game” have women chasing them. These men stay aloof, they are good lovers, and they keep the women coming back for more. The wrong lesson from the false rape alarmists is that promiscuous men put themselves at risk of false allegations. But false accusations rarely stem from actual sex. If anything, consensual affairs leave an evidence trail to exonerate the man. In this sense, game already protects men.

Take A Break From The Manosphere

I'm sure many of you followed the internet drama surrounding Matt Forney's latest submission about Portland. Judging by the sheer number of comments, many angry words were exchanged, and if you're anything like me, you got angry right back.

Portlanders dug up an old photo of Forney where it shows him as overweight and dressed poorly. I understand the "judge not lest ye be judged yourself" arguments, but he is working towards an ideal and expects the same ideal in the women he dates. However, this was nearly the only reasonable objection that was raised about the article. The rest was pure screeching vitriol and the hatred 'culminated' when one commenter decided to save all of the fragile and defenceless women of Portland from the evil internet man by attempting to take down Return of Kings and Matt Forney's blog.

Anger driving one white knight to lash out against someone 'tapping their supply'—it's just an isolated case right? No. Roosh shared a thread containing an email from a delusional beta orbiting white knight who told Roosh how much of a bad man he was for having sex with his BFFL and not calling back. Just like the Portlanders he rushes to defend the defenseless from the hairy evil that defiled his woman, even going so far as threatening to call the government and report him for terrorism.

Who knows maybe it was really just the girl in question trying to get back into our glorious leader's good graces after seeing the love he is receiving in Romania.

Everyone seems to have their reasons for why someone with an opposing view of the world has that view. Everyone has a rationalization for their hatred. Women see a celebrity with a younger woman and exclaim "its because he can't handle a real woman like me." Feminists regurgitate jargon instead of debating a topic logically. We say internet feminists are fat and unhappy clones which causes their irrationality and anger. All ad hominems. All worthless when it comes to communicating with one another.

Loading…

The Everything Else section over at the forum has blown up recently with more activity than ever before. It's become a sort of news site, full of the best and worst the world has to offer. After reading countless stories of false rape accusations, unqualified women attempting to be Dog the Bounty Hunter, ridiculous suspensions for eating snack-foods into particular shapes, belligerent feminists from Toronto, and media shaming men dating younger women, one begins to think there is no end to the madness. The list goes on and on and its hard not to begin to hate everything. It's hard not to want to move to a deserted tropical island, bring a harem of beautiful women, and live out your days drinking coconut water while getting in touch with your primal nature.

Sometimes we need a break from all this negativity and anger. Instead of noticing how the woman you are on a date with might be worth a mini-relationship, you'll think "but what if she tries to cry rape when I fuck her, what if blah blah I'm angry and paranoid." Instead of noticing a hot chick in yoga pants, you'll notice some skrillex-cutted chick in Whole Foods buying vegetables, making snarky remarks about your meat purchases. You'll psych yourself out of approaching because "all western women are the same: they have bad attitudes, are fat and entitled and on and on."

Essentially you'll become just like the commenters on the Portland article. Bitter and angry at everything that doesn't fit your worldview. You'll start seeing examples of what is "wrong" everywhere you go, just to validate the problem. I say at least try to find the good in every girl you meet. By no means am I saying to go and talk to the 40lbs overweight, short-haired chick who is shotgunning a beer and yelling with vocal fry about how she wants pizza. What I am saying is that most women you date will want you to be happy. She will change some of her habits to accommodate you. Find a girl that you don't mind spending time with and impart on her some good habits.

You can't hate society, you are a part of it. Adapt to the changes, acknowledge them as they are, and brush them off, but know that you are in control of how you interpret things. Only you can let yourself feel the way you do. It is your job as a man to create a lifestyle which makes you the most fulfilled. Tons of guys over at the forum have found girls they enjoy who are sweet and feminine. Anger will turn from a mood to a way of life. Stave off its poison with a healthy dose of positivity instead.

Coping With Exile

In H.G. Wells's 1904 short story "The Country of the Blind", an explorer in the remote Bolivian Andes discovers a long-isolated society of people who have become blind due to some congenital aberration, amplified by generations of inbreeding. The society has developed and been maintained with no concept of the sense of vision. He is taken in by the people and befriended by them. When he tries to explain to them the meaning of sight and the visual wonders of the world, they laugh at his delusions. All unanimously conclude that this wild-talking outsider is troubled at best, dangerous at worst. Falling in love with a local woman, his persistent efforts to explain vision to her gets him in trouble with the local elders, who conclude that he is suffering from a dangerous virus and should be forcibly blinded "for his own good." Eventually getting wind of this plan, the explorer is forced to make a desperate escape through the mountains, nearly losing his life in the process.

This little parable is instructive on several levels, but for our purposes it serves as a sobering reminder of the power of groupthink and mass psychology in suppressing the individual. Those who parrot the party line, who genuflect before the altars of the officially-sanctioned idols, can expect to be rewarded with praise and crumbs from the table of the master. Those who question the idols—i.e., those who dispense "red pill" wisdom—can expect quite different treatment. And so it is with modern American society.

It has becoming increasingly clear that modern American culture will be characterized by political cowardice and paralysis and accelerating social decay for the foreseeable future. To fill the void of authority left by rotting social institutions and a near-vanished nuclear family, the government will become more and more authoritarian as it frantically strives to maintain public order. Increased surveillance, travel restrictions, exchange controls, and other forms of expanded state power will become accepted and routine.

Nothing can be done to arrest these trends. The decline is irreversible. At some point, if not already, America will be unable to offer its ambitious young men either a decent job or decent women. If a man cannot even have these basic, minimal requirements for his health and happiness, what does he really have? What conceivable reason, then, would he have to continue to grind out his life under a corrupt and degenerate system that denies his masculine identity, suppresses his ambitions, and relegates him to second-class status?

Exile, or some form of expatriate status, may become a rational alternative. We must have the courage to call things what they are, and to make decisions based on reality, rather than on what we wished the world to be. In this respect, the Europeans are well ahead of us Americans. To a far greater extent than us ignorant, arrogant, spoiled Americans, Europeans have lived through wars, revolutions, civil unrest, collapsing economies, famines, and pestilences. Historically, Europeans are far more inclined to pick up and move when necessary, to migrate when required: they have been doing it for centuries. To an American, exile—that is, leaving America for another country—is nearly unthinkable. But it may be time to think the unthinkable.

But how can one cope with exile? How does one handle the shock of leaving one's country, and face the likelihood of a reduced living standard, the loss of reputation, and the feelings of isolation and loneliness? This is a question that I have turned over in my mind for a long time. I gained a fresh take on the issue from an unusual book that has recently been translated and published for the first time, after languishing, nearly forgotten, in undeserved obscurity for over five centuries.

Forgotten, that is, until now.

Loading…

The Italian Renaissance humanist Francesco Filelfo (1389-1481) had personal experience with exile, having lived in an age when it was common for men to relocate when necessity called for it. He wrote his treatise On Exile as a consolatory exercise, to describe how a man could turn the experience of exile—with all its associated hardships—to his own advantage and even profit from it. Written in the form of a dialogue, it is packed with examples from history and philosophy to demonstrate how being forced to leave one's country can even be a blessing in disguise. These are the main points I took away from his work:

1. Embrace the Renaissance concept of the "universal man."

This is a whole new way of viewing the concept of manhood. You are not a citizen of a specific region or country. Reject narrow parochialism or nationalism. You need to see yourself as a citizen of the world, a universal man, whose happiness is not dependent on geographical location. The true “universal man” has attained wisdom by his study of virtue and philosophy.

2. Cream will rise to the top.

Wherever a wise man has decided to live, he will always live there either as “the first citizen or among the first”. You will find a way to earn a living and provide for yourself. Do not fear. The soul of the universal man is a “prime mover” in the sense that it moves itself, rather than being moved by outside forces. As such, his soul is indestructible and eternal.

3. Follow your heart.

You are happy to the extent that you know your inner self, follow your natural inclinations, and never depart from them. If you are forced to leave your country, know that it is not so much that you have rejected your country, but that your country has already abandoned you.

4. The soul of a great man will not submit to Fortune in such a way that he does anything base or low.

Rather, the power of Fortune, even if it brings bad things, should be seen as a training ground for the great man’s own virtue. No truly wise man has ever been harmed by exile.

5. Have a comprehensive philosophy of life that you can draw on to sustain you.

It doesn’t matter so much what it is, as long as it leads to virtue, you believe it, and it gives you the strength of a lion. If you don’t have one, get one. Fast.

6. Reject the treadmill-like pursuit of riches and fame.

It only leads to more unmanly craving, and leaves you unsatiated. For the study of virtue, examine Stoicism, Platonism, and Epicureanism.

For anyone who has wrestled with the thought of leaving America and the possible trauma it could bring, Filelfo’s book On Exile may be a comfort. He shows that the secret of coping lies within us: polishing our own souls, striving to be that “universal man”, and focusing on what we can control, not on what we cannot control. I am not saying that the time has come to hit the eject button. But we should all have options at our disposal. We should all have our escape plan. It is time to think the unthinkable.

The Long March Home

April 14, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A Greek mercenary army was paid by Cyrus, son of the late Xerxes, to campaign against provincial enemies. Once the army found out they were actually hired to fight against Cyrus' brother for control of the Persian empire, while already deep in Persian territory, they thought best to bail and go home. Eventually they were convinced to stay and fight when Cryus promised extra payment and they realized that getting home on their own, without trustful guides, would be nearly impossible.

The day of the battle came and the Greeks fought valiantly, defeating the Persians on their quadrant, but Cyrus was slain. Armies dispersed. The Greek general went to make diplomacy with the Persians but was slaughtered instead.

> Here were they at the king's gates, and on every side environing them were many hostile cities and tribes of men. Who was there now to furnish them with a market? Separated from Hellas by more than a thousand miles, they had not even a guide to point the way. Impassable rivers lay athwart their homeward route, and hemmed them in. Betrayed even by the Asiatics, at whose side they had marched with Cyrus to the attack, they were left in isolation.

When all hope was lost, Xenophon, a professional soldier from Athens, rose up and inspired the men to fight and make their way home. And so the book Anabasis begins in earnest.

The Greeks had to adapt on-the-fly to defend themselves against Persian military superiority and feed themselves in unknown territory while making their way back to Greece. They experienced a nonstop barrage of problems, difficulties, and enemies, with treachery and deceit every way they turn, but with wise leadership from Xenophon they marched, fought, and refused to give up. This is a story of adventure and war, a story that only men can enjoy to hopefully feel just 1% of what ancient soldiers must have felt along this incredible journey.

"Surely it is better to fight today after a good breakfast than tomorrow on an empty stomach."

For such an ancient work, the writing was simple and clear. It was relatively easy to follow and I never had to look up online annotations like with The Landmark Thucydides. I recommend it.

Why Fat Women Should Be Sent To Prison

April 15, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

According to a study published in the Journal of the American Medical Association, obese children and adolescents reported significantly lower health-related quality of life in all domains studied. Their lowered quality of life was “similar to children and adolescents diagnosed as having cancer.”

From sleep apnea to diabetes and heart conditions (not to mention being a fucking fat ass), the lowered quality of life and greatly increased health risks for Tubby Tim and Jiggly Jane should be of primary concern. Fat permeates every aspect of these children’s lives, and their bloated BMI is “significantly inversely correlated to their total health scores” including physical functioning, social functioning, and psychosocial functioning.

The Journal of the American Academy of Pediatrics reports that “Maternal obesity [is] the most significant predictor of childhood obesity.” The same report also concludes that children born to fat chicks “have significantly elevated risks of developing obesity, independent of other demographic and socioeconomic factors.”

Tell me how fat chicks aren’t among the worst human beings on the planet. Look me straight in my god-given eyeball and tell me with a straight face how these seacows aren’t a threat to our society and our way of life.

I dare you.

If I were to walk around town with a syringe injecting unsuspecting children with a solution that would severely retard their physical, social, and psychological health leading to a low quality of life and premature death, there’s not a person reading this article who wouldn’t recommend I get the electric chair. I would be a monster – a subhuman social pariah – and you wouldn’t lose a wink of sleep as my rights were stripped away and I was hauled off to jail.

But what if I didn’t use a syringe? What if I used a fork instead? What if I didn’t sneak around to perpetrate my evil plan, but used a double Whopper with cheese instead? What if my main line of defense was that I was “too busy” to not slowly kill children? What if I shamed you for even mentioning what a useless piece of shit I am? What if I said I needed your support and understanding while I continued to slowly degrade the lives of the next generation?

Would you buy it? Would you back off on the insults? Would you make excuses for me? Would you support me as I continued slowly killing our children simply because I don’t have the human decency to say “No dessert for me please.” If all I had to do to save a child’s life was put down the fork and take a 30-minute walk three times a week but I refused to do so – would you rally around in support of my “disease” while I waddled on my merry way? Early indications are that you would if I had a vagina and feeeelings.

It’s time to take action. Here are my recommendations:

1. Do not speak to fat chicks

Fat chicks are worse than Jesus when it comes to the destructive force they unleash on the world. Ignore them, and let them know they will not be welcomed into polite society until they reduce their weight to a point to where they are no longer lethal to the next generation. They should be sent straight to prison, and since they're nothing but animals, we should ignore them like a stray cat.

Loading...

2. Remind fat chicks that they are (or will become) shitty mothers

This may sound cruel, but you're really just telling them something they already know. You can do this directly or indirectly as your style dictates, but make sure you get the word out. If you'd warn people about letting their children play in a dangerous construction zone, you are equally morally obligated to warn them about letting their children be birthed and raised by a two-ton tub of Crisco with legs.

3. Always be ready to fat shame (and to defend your fat shaming)

Every man should have this post by Bronan saved in their favorites. Post it on one fat chick's facebook profile per week for maximum man points. Defending your fat shaming is easy; simply smile and say "Aint it great!" Of course, you need to be ready to run like the wind because some fat chicks are "healthy" and run half-marathons like twice per year lozlzolzolzlzolzlzlzozllzollolzozlzlzol.

But perhaps the second biggest (heh) reason to shame fat chicks – next to doing it for the children – is because according to the American Journal of Thatch's Musings, fat chicks are 100% likelier to become ardent feminists. Come to think of it, that hurts children too, so shame away.

4. Praise fat chicks after they lose weight

Two weeks ago I saw a coworker who I hadn't seen in almost a year. She had to have lost 45 lbs or more – which is a massive amount for her tiny frame. Without embarrassing her, I made a pretty big deal of it, and even told her (in a very playful, indirect way and in front of witnesses) that she should call me if things don't work out with her husband. It made her happy, reinforced her positive behavior change, and got me the evil eye from the two fat chicks who were also in the room. Two birds, one stone: healthy praising and fat shaming are a dynamic duo.

5. Get over your own fat family members, and let the shaming begin

I'm fortunate in that none of my immediate family members are obese. I do have a couple of fat ass chick cousins though, but I don't let that stop me from calling it like I see it. If you're reading this and getting pissed because your mom or your sister is fat, let it go man. If this article pisses you off because your wife is fat, then hahahahah…… hahaahah… lozlzollzozlzlzozolzol*McRib*lulzlolzoizlzklzlzzl.

Seriously though, if your wife is fat, you suck at life.

Anyway, that's my thoughts on the subject. For those of you who follow me on twitter, I'll write up a post about my recent stroke of game luck for next week. Until then, remember that fat shaming is a powerful tool and you should do it for the chrrrrrrldren. Every time you shame a fat chick, you save a child and that makes you a red pill superhero.

All Girls Are Spoiled Children

All Girls Are Spoiled Children

If you grew up with younger siblings—or were one yourself—you're well familiar with the phenomenon of the younger brother or sister always trying to do what the older kids were doing, wanting everything the older siblings were getting, and challenging the big boys in general. When big brother got a skateboard, little brother wanted one too—even though everyone knew he was going to fall on his ass and stop using it. When big brother ordered a double cheeseburger, little sister wanted to order it too, even though she couldn't even finish the single in previous sittings.

If the parents knew how to run things, they put a stop to that noise with firm rules about when you got certain things and when you'd be allowed to engage in certain activities. If they were shitty parents, they caved. Invariably, the world enjoyed or suffered the consequences of this vital parenting decision.

This dynamic describes today's woman. Women bear an uncanny resemblance to a bratty little sibling—and children in general—in an uncomfortable variety of ways.

In this calculus, you're the big brother, she's the little sister (or brother), and society's the parents. Let's take a look.

Trying to be up in everything.

Nothing drives a spoiled kid crazier than being told they can't do, or have, something because it's for the big kids only. And nothing drives today's woman crazier than being told she can't go somewhere because it's for men only. You see this dynamic in a multitude of places, from private golf clubs to sports bars to military combat. Whether it's fun or not–or whether they can hang or not–they want to be there anyway.

Everything’s a test.

Like a growing puppy constantly trying to move up in the pecking order, a younger sibling is in a constant state of competition, and in a mindset to test and challenge boundaries. Competition is especially noticeable between siblings of the same gender, though it’s not necessary that they be the same. “I’m stronger than you.” “I’m hotter than you.” “I’m smarter than you.” Testing and challenging is often directed at the superior authority—the parents.

A girl you’re dating will similarly test you from Jump Street and won’t stop until you—or your relationship—is in the grave. The hotter the girl, the more frequent the tests. Girls will try to get away with changing plans on you out of the blue, disrespecting your stuff, calling you names, talking to her ex-boyfriends, dressing like shit, gaining weight, showing up late. More times than not, these are direct affronts to your masculinity and leadership.

Always want the newest toy and bore easily.

Women, like children with ADD, need to be constantly entertained with ever-more-elaborate stimuli. That includes actual things to distract them—like Facebook, the newest iPhone, and picture-driven websites—but also people. Like her toys, you’re a mere feature in her life, and unless you remain elusive, fashionable, and interesting, you too will be upgraded.

Are copy-cats.

Kids like doing what they see other kids—or older brothers—doing. As a rule, they’re not risk-takers, content to go it alone or unafraid to flaunt their avant-garde ideas, styles, or methods. It should therefore come as no surprise that seemingly every (American) girl walks around with a Starbucks Milkshake in one hand, an iPhone in the other, and Ugg Boots on her feet.

Run to the parents when they're losing the fight.

Despite his claim to be tougher than you, rest assured that your little brother will scream out for your parents as soon as you have him pinned to the floor. He'll even manufacture or exaggerate the conflict if it means winning the fight. Whether it's girls getting in a guy's face in a bar because she knows she has a whole bar of white knights (and bouncers) to back her up; girls with massive Internet courage that evaporates the moment you strike back; or even girls calling the cops and manufacturing cases of domestic "abuse"; know that a lot of women's "empowerment" is a false confidence predicated on having the parents on speed dial.

Guys in the manosphere often ponder out-loud whether feminism isn't just some giant, collective "shit test" from women—that is, a giant test of men's aggregate mettle. I suspect that—to a certain extent—it is, while being quick to add that feminism is merely one tray in a Las-Vegas-sized buffet of women's child-like behavior. Both society (parents), and men (older brother), have failed to keep our bratty little sister in check.

The solution: treat them like the little-siblings-who-never-grew-up that they are.

What Happened To Ashley?

April 15, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

From prom queen to dumpster slut. Seriously I didn't think it was possible, but I guess meth really can ruin your life; or having a lack of motivation as well possibly. Having your parents money could also contribute I suppose. Either way this is a great case of what the fucking fuck.

Below is someone I will name as "Ashley." The photo's are all real, but I've decided to change the name. More for protection of my own identity rather than hers. I could care less about this piece of garbage ever having her real identity discovered. This my friends, is a cautionary example of what direction the American female race is heading in.

She was homecoming queen for sure, and was probably prom queen once as well. My interaction in life with her was pretty limited. She was a friend of a friend who had relocated. She came to visit with that said friend once, and I think we hung out for only two days. She was a cool, cute, young woman, and she did admittedly have a crush on me, which made me feel great when she pointed it out to an ex who had broken up with me. This was when I had zero game so that's the sad ending of the story. Mikael got zero ass out of it.

Here is Ashley now:

Loading…

Yes, she looks like a dumpster slut. I'd assume her parents pay for her phone as she bums around the country, since she's always posting pictures on Facebook. All of her bum friends somehow have smart phones as well. The rest of her family is relatively normal. She's often home to attend family events in which she's clearly the black sheep of the family. The appalling part is the simple fact that she doesn't need to be. She was and has the potential to be attractive but refuses. So the question is why?

Option A is that she uses drugs. And well she probably does, but she still has all her teeth so I'm guessing its nothing more serious than weed. And weed isn't a drug, it's a plant. So in my opinion that option is out the window.

Option B is feminism. I'm going with that because she fits the perfect build of a feminist. She was told she can do whatever she want to do and she has. She's selected a man whom she can have sex with whenever she chooses. This said man will not question her authority, will do her bidding, and live with any consequences she has revolving her body. Her man is not Ryan Gosling, but he is the perfect slave according to what feminists desire. Just look below.

So this is the direction our women are now heading. From homecoming queens to dumpster sluts. Good job feminism. This is the direction you have lead our country. You lie in filth like the sheep you are.

Don’t Date Girls With Borderline Personality Disorder

April 15, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

If you date enough women, eventually you will encounter one with Borderline Personality Disorder. If autism is hyper-masculinization of the brain, it may help to think of BPD as characterizing hyper-feminization of the brain. Recent research suggests that the disorder, which afflicts 2% of the population, is linked to hormone levels and can be exacerbated by hormonal treatment such as birth control. From Wikipedia:

> Borderline personality disorder (BPD) is a personality disorder characterized by unusual variability and depth of moods. These moods may secondarily affect cognition and interpersonal relationships.
> Other symptoms of BPD include impulsive behaviour, intense and unstable interpersonal relationships, unstable self-image, feelings of abandonment and an unstable sense of self. People with BPD often engage in idealization and devaluation of themselves and of others, alternating between high positive regard and heavy disappointment or dislike. Self-harm and suicidal behavior are common and may require inpatient psychiatric care.

One night I successfully approached a knockout, the best looking girl in the entire venue. We were quick to kiss and things escalated back to her place. Luckily I was sober enough to realize something with this girl was just… off. Despite inviting me over she took offense to nearly everything I said, and not in the “you’re a jerk” way that most girls use to indicate interest. These perceived insults seemed to throw her into a complete funk, but just minutes later she was pushing me to have unprotected sex with her. She got visibly angry when I attempted to use a condom, so I thought the better of doing anything and just went to sleep.

We set up a date for later in the week, but when I picked her up she flipped out about inconsequential details like where to eat and whether to go to her place or mine, prompting me to leave her yelling on the sidewalk as I drove away in befuddlement. She called me crying five minutes later apologizing, as if she was simultaneously trying her best to piss me off but was also terrified that I would abandon her. I gritted my teeth through the date, did not attempt anything physical, and never called her again.

If you run into a broad with a few of these symptoms, watch out. BPD girls live in an unfortunate state of arrested development, as if you took a perpetually hormonal 12 year old and gave it the body and power of an adult. This is an especially dangerous combination because attractive girls, no matter how crazy, are essentially allowed to get away with anything in our society. These girls will be incredible manipulators and will turn people against you, since there is never a shortage of white knights ready to assuage a pretty girl’s perceived distress. The combination of impunity and impulsiveness makes them prime targets to throw out a false rape accusation, destroy your property, stalk you, and attempt to ruin your life from the inside out. The commonalities in the few girls I’ve encountered like this are:

Huge and unpredictable mood swings — From lovey-dovey to scary-rage in two seconds flat.

Child-like fascination with both infantile and adult subject matter — She may obsess over cute puppies and kitties, but also searches out the sensory overload like hardcore porn and gory slasher movies without batting an eye.

Risk-seeking behavior: She loves unprotected sex, gambling, and dangerous thrill-seeking. She lacks a filter before saying something or make a decision.

Your best solution? Disengage. Walk away. Even a superlatively attractive girl is not worth the mental anguish her presence will cause. If she's especially hot, your ego is going to push you to stay with her despite knowing that she is trouble. You have to fight this, but if you insist on putting yourself through this torment, you need to remember the following Ds:

Document. Make sure you get the "you didn't rape me" text if you have sex with her. Video tape if necessary. Use your phone to record conversations and intimate moments.

Deflect. She's going to raise hissy fits about nearly everything. This will happen so often that you'll wonder whether you're the one who's acting strangely. Don't take anything she says very seriously and maintain a calm, aloof demeanor.

Distance. You never, ever keep a girl like this in a relationship or even at the top of your rotation. She's at the bottom rung of your rotation, and when you get rid of her make sure it's a fade-out to minimize the chance of accusations, violence, vandalism, etc.

Ultimately no matter how attractive she is, dealing with this type of crazy is not worth it. Do not hesitate to kick these women to the curb if they exhibit this behavior. You've been warned.

American Women Are Deep Thinkers

April 16, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

In the year 2000, Mel Gibson came out with one of those predictable romcom movies called What Women Want. As described by IMDB:

> Nick, a somewhat chauvinistic advertising exec hot shot, has his life turned haywire when a fluke accident enables him to hear what women think.

I know what you are thinking…wouldn't it be absolutely wonderful to have this power? To have a window into the female mind and know what they are thinking day in and day out? What goes through these intricate heads while at work, at home, or at the hairdresser believing their ~~bitchiest~~ closest friends who told them they'd look cute with short hair? Well you're in luck. I found the portal to the inside, the holy grail. I now know what goes through these snowflakes' heads. And before you ask me — yes this is real.

Welcome To The Purse Forum

First the disclaimer. There are actually some decent and useful threads in here. However, they are so outweighed and overshadowed by the utter idiocy, nonsense and futility of the remainder of the threads that despite my knowledge of the sometimes simplistic nature of Western women, I still am left confused, shocked and perhaps slightly speechless. And now without further ado some of the better ones I came across:

Where are you right now? Over 8,000 posts of girls telling us where they are right at that moment. Surprise! Most are at home or at work. User frick&frack, who averages 20k posts a year likes to let her internet audience know where she is twice a day, which is (shockingly) usually at home.

What are you looking at? Before you click, take a second and think what one looks at when typing a response on a forum. If you guessed what one would expect someone to be looking at when typing a response on a forum…their computer, laptop, iphone or whatever other medium they are using to retort — well you are right. Perhaps in a nature forum, or an astronomy discussion this may be informative. But to the women of Purse Forum, there is no such thing as the obvious. This unbelievably useless thread has over 4,000 posts.

Loading…

Don't bump this thread #4! Ah, what seems to be the most popular thread on the forum. This thread alone has over 13,000 replies. I guess it's true that you tell a girl to do one thing and she does another. They really know how to break those rules! After four threads on this lovely topic surely they find it no longer entertaining. No way there is…

Don't bump this thread #5! Damn, I was wrong! With the endless highs and lows, the unbridled enthusiasm of not knowing whether the thread may or may not be bumped again, the girls couldn't resist. DBTT #5 is climbing the charts folks with nearly 10,000 plus posts and counting.

What can you hear right now? The less exciting sibling of such classics as “where are you right now,” and “what are you looking at right now” comes this gem of a thread. 5,600 posts.

Hearing, continued.Thought it was over? Think again. More girls talking about what they are hearing at that very moment. Finally, your inquisitive minds can rest with another 8,100 replies. In case you are wondering, it’s usually the a/c or their dogs barking.

Type 5 Letters Without Looking. Yes, this is an actual thread. At least someone had the decency to end it…after 5,600 fucking posts.

What time is it? Of all the threads on here, this has to be the winner. Ever in that horrible situation where you are without means to tell what time it is, and your only source of information is the Purse Forum? Then maybe you should visit this thread. Come here and users like Sweetpea will notify everyone of what time it is repeatedly throughout the day. I would ask the obvious, which is who cares? But apparently enough girls do to create over 10,000 posts about the present time. Seriously. Eventually, the thread was “archived due to length.”

I’d write a conclusion, but I honestly think this speaks for itself.

The Pill That Cures Approach Anxiety

April 17, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

[image]
How many of you have ever seen a cute girl like this…

and thought…

Wow, I should go talk to her…

Damn, that girl is really cute. I should DEFINITELY go talk to her…

Wait maybe too much time has passed…

Yeah it would be weird to talk to her now. I'll just wait for the NEXT cute girl. Because they're everywhere! Abundance mentality! Yeah!

Please raise your hand if this has happened to you. One, two, three… OK, good, everyone.

The truth is we all experience approach anxiety to some degree. I don't care if you are the most bad-ass approach machine on the planet, I guarantee you have had your moments of being an excuse-spewing little bitch. I have them all the time. I may approach more than 95% of men, but I still let tons of viable daytime approach targets slip through my fingers for no good reason. C'est la vie.

There are a variety of effective tactics, re-frames, and mental tricks you can play on yourself to lessen your approach anxiety. Many blog posts have been written on the subject. Books have been written. One could argue that overcoming approach anxiety is the single most important aspect of pick-up, hence why so much mental energy has been expended coming up with solutions, from Mystery's three-second rule, to Tyler Durden's Crash and Burn missions, Mark Manson's progressive desensitization therapy, to Roosh's innocuous elderly opener. In my own travels through life, I've developed a few NLP hacks of my own that have given me the ability to approach consistently.

But let's be honest: learning and implementing all that sounds like a lot of work. Seeing as it's the 21st Century, can't I just take a goddamn pill or something and be done with it?

I write this tongue-in-cheek, but the answer is: yes you can. You can take a safe, cheap and legal pill, and remove approach anxiety as an obstacle in your life. Return of Kings readers, please allow me to introduce you to: Theanine.

I started taking Theanine for it's Nootropic qualities. I had no idea it would have any effect on my ability to approach. Then, walking home from work on Day 1 of my Theanine experiment, I realized I had zero social fear whatsoever. My eyes confidently scanned every girl that I passed for fuckability. The three that made the cut, I opened effortlessly. No fear. No 'psyching up.' Just an easy-peasy introduction as if it were the most natural thing in the world. The three interactions (two solid numbers and a nice chat with a lovely girl who seems quite happy with her boyfriend) all went very smoothly. I was just totally and completely 'In The Zone.'

I was particularly surprised by the strength of my chilled out sex machine vibe, because I was rocking – at the risk of sounding like a middle school girl – a huge icky gross pimple right on my chin and feeling like, totally not pretty. I had no intention of crunching numbers that evening. It just happened. Motherfucking Theanine.

The effect was so strong, and the coincidence of it being my first day on Theanine too great. I got home and fired up the old laptop. Checked out the Google results for Theanine Social Anxiety. You can read the journal articles that all find effects with small sample sizes, or just trust the hordes of autists praising it to the heavens on social anxiety support forums.

It stands to reason that if Theanine can turn the socially anxious into the socially competent, it can turn the socially gifted (such as moi) into social Demigods. And so it was. I do not suffer from "Social Anxiety" in any reasonable sense, but pre-Theanine, daytime approaches were some degree of a challenge. Post-Theanine, they are a breeze.

Bottom line: Pick up a bottle for twenty bucks at your local gay herbal health store today, or buy it on Amazon here. You should also learn more about Theanine's Nootropic effects. After you've had a taste, come back and let us know how it worked out for you.

How Hypergamy Is Destroying The Nuclear Family

April 17, 2013 | by Juan Sanchez Villalobos | Link | Original Link

> Hypergamy: a woman's natural preference for a male that is of higher status than other men and also higher status than herself.

Among the wide range of relationships that most societies practiced throughout the history of man, monogamy has been one of the most popular, but anthropological research suggests that it has only been around for a few thousands of years. Back in the stone ages, when hunter-gatherer tribes populated the world, monogamy didn't exist. Polygyny (the practice of having more than one wife at one time) was one of the most common forms of male-female association. Homo Sapien men naturally surrendered to their polygamous nature. The evidence of the existence of marriage of a single male to multiple females has been present in all human cultures through man's history.

The Benefits of Polygamy

Intensive polygamy by wealthy, powerful males seems to be an optimal male reproductive strategy, as powerful males are able to control very large numbers of females. But the reality is, polygamy is a high stakes reproductive game for men, with some men winning big (alphas) and others losing big (betas). Stakes are pretty high for women as well. Females must invest greatly in reproduction – pregnancy, lactation, and often childcare that required an extraordinary amount of resources and time.

In short, polygamy actually advantages some men over other men, and some women over other women. Only a minority can achieve it. It's a less exaggerated form of "winner takes all" that some species employ (like cattle, lions, or wolves where there is only one reproductively successful male in a group).

How Did These Societies Turn to Monogamy

First, we should differentiate ecologically-imposed monogamy from socially-imposed monogamy. Ecologically imposed monogamy is usually found in societies that have been forced to adapt to very harsh environments, such as deserts, arctic regions or other adverse climates. The first Homo Sapien tribes that came to Europe established their settlements in the North Eurasian area. These populations were hunters and gatherers, not farmers. In such climates there was considerable pressure for male provisioning of the family. Hunting required experience and years of intensive practice. In other words, it required high-investment parenting. It also required intelligence because the hunting scenario is complex and ever changing.

Under such harsh conditions, it is impossible for males to control a great number of females, and women and their children would require a more committed provisioning from a male. If these conditions persisted for an evolutionarily significant period of time, one might expect to find that the population develops a more equal contribution for each sex, involving beta males into marriage, suggesting a tendency toward monogamy. This perspective is consistent with ecological theory. Under ecologically adverse circumstances, adaptations are directed at coping with the adverse physical environment.

In short, the “Homo Sapiens” survived and prospered while other Hominids (Neanderthals and Homo Erectus) became extinct. It’s not a coincidence that the rise of monogamy matches in time with the agricultural revolution. Many anthropologists consider this point in time to coincide with the rise of civilization, the remarkable transformation of human beings from hunters-gatherers to farmers.

The Rise of the Nuclear Family

The roots of the nuclear family can be traced back to the pre-industrial era, to the "Simple Household." Due to shorter life expectancy and high mortality rates in the pre-industrialized world, the survival of a family depended on having a big family that could work on the farmland and how well it organized and utilized its resources. The pre-industrial family was the critical vehicle of Western modernization. Post-industrial families became more private, nuclear and based on the emotional bonding between husband and wife, parents and children.

Despite the preference for polygamy in primitive societies, the institution of monogamy diligently suppressed one of the strongest instincts in humans and led to the creation of the nuclear family model that was so common during the first half of the 20th century, providing welfare, comfort and stability to husband, wife and children.

The Broken Gender Social Contract

At the beginning of the 21st century, the situation changed dramatically. There are several indicators that the working social contract between the sexes that served men and women for many centuries has broken. With divorce rates skyrocketing (as high as 70 per cent in some cases), marriages rapidly decreasing and fewer men committing to marriage, the destruction of the nuclear family's structure seems evident. Almost half of all new-born babies are entering into the world without a full nuclear family in place.

One of latest growing trends is co-parenting. Two independent persons, with no affiliation whatsoever, are coming together for the sole purpose of having a child. A child raised outside family environment. Pet style parenting—the family of the future.

The war against the family has been a regular feature of recent history. Few, if any seemed to have grasped the casualties.

Hypergamy Becomes Unchained

The induced monogamy that has prevailed for centuries and which assured a supply of females to every non-alpha male is long gone. A hypergamous fire has been raging across the world for almost 50 years, since the second wave of feminism in the 1960s. Whereas in an earlier time, the natural instincts of men and women were controlled and channeled properly into marriage, today there is no such cultural/societal barrier, which has led to widespread promiscuity and sexual adventure. Furthermore, the development of technology and proliferation of social media and smartphones have fueled this fire.

The Candy Store Effect

The constant bombardment by society, a culture that pedestalizes women while undervaluing men, and the proliferation of smartphones and social networks (WhatsApp, Facebook, Badoo), has caused women to give in to their hypergamous natures. It has created a "Candy Store Effect" for women, whereas basically tons of males are available within a tip of a fingers reach. This results in overconfident, deluded women (in regard to their true Sexual Market Value) who are invited to ride the carousel in their prime years, prejudice and guilt free.

Hypergamy vs. Men

For a man, there is little or no guarantee that a woman will stay faithful during the course of the relationship and won't "upgrade" him for a higher status male. This combined with divorce laws that marginalize and crush men, is reducing the flow of men that are willing to commit to marriage, increasing the number of men who prefer short flings and one night stands.

In addition, feminism and careerism is causing women to look for a man to settle long after their biological prime. Today's women spend their youth partying, studying and working. When the time comes and they decide to settle, it may already be too late. This is because women's "shelf-life" clashes with men's biological instincts which are naturally inclined to mate with younger women.

The Age Of The Beta Male Is Over

Women have not been taught the dangers of constantly seeking a better man. Hypergamy is as equally destructive to civilized society as polygamy. Both are destructive to civilization because they both leave non-alphas ("the foundation of society") and women with few prospects for a happy marriage. Neither polygamy nor hypergamy encourage loyalty and contentment with one's spouse; they both demand either "better" or "more," and nothing else. As the relationship between the sexes goes down the drain, so does civilization.

Conclusion

The idea of the decline of civilization has been the object of much debate and speculation over the years. Civilization as we know it is a complex system created by man that is very much like natural ecosystems which exist in a state of delicate balance. In order for a society to function and prosper, an overwhelming majority have to have a stake in the present and hope for the future. The biology of men and women does not take into account the creation of civilization, only the survival of our genes. Should a man not have a wife or a genetic legacy, he will feel little compulsion to work for the good of the community. Should a woman not have a husband or children, she will become depressed, bitter, and most likely poor. The civilizing effects of the doctrine of monogamy are abundantly clear: for peaceful societies to exist, both sexes must have a stake in it, and when they don't, society fragments and eventually fractures.

The question now is, can we still fix things or has humanity reached a point of no return.

Life Lessons From A Dog

April 18, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Back before I knew any better, I got myself into a serious long-term relationship with a dysfunctional girl who was so fucked up she probably deserves an article of her own. Among the many mistakes I made—apart from moving in with her, signing a lease, and co-mingling our assets and liabilities—was getting a dog with her.

Circumstances had it that I was (temporarily) neither in school or working, which meant I was sitting my ass home most of the day with a friendly and rambunctious Labrador Retriever puppy. With little else to do, the dog quickly became my full-time project. I became obsessed with behavioral training, reading as much as I could get my hands on, and testing it on my dog on a daily basis. We'd go on super-long walks in the middle of the day. We'd play endless games of fetch and chase-the-master. We'd waste away entire days carrying around tree branches, wandering around looking for trouble, and replenishing ourselves in public drinking fountains. The icing on the cake was this all happened in a lush, green suburban paradise. In retrospect, it was one of the most idyllic periods of my life.

It wasn't long before me and that dog were communicating on a different level. When she'd act out, all I had to do was look at her a certain way and take a step in her direction to have her stop. She knew every possible command, understood never to tighten the slack on the leash, and would even not start eating—despite her bowl being on the floor—until I gave the go-ahead. I fed her the best food, brushed her coat regularly, and even brushed her teeth. Her prize-dog looks, friendliness, and impeccable training made her a hit with everyone she met. People loved my dog—and I did too.

Inevitably, among the people who would your-dog-is-so-cute-I-want-to-pet-her me were hot girls. These were girls who not only put the chick I was shacked up with to shame, but were also a cut above the hottest girls in my various social circles. The experience of talking to higher-quality girls in such an effortless way quickly demystified them to me, and gave me a valuable lesson that would come in handy sooner than I imagined. Unwittingly, my dog was teaching me things, but these lessons didn't stop at dog training or the immense power of the wing-dog. These were life lessons. Nearly all of them came down to uncanny similarities between people and animals. Implementing these lessons permanently changed all of my social interactions, but especially my “romantic” ones.

The first thing you say doesn’t matter.

At first, girls approached me, but it didn’t take long for me to realize that I could instigate an opening myself. I’d let my dog sniff girls and then “apologize,” rambling on about how she’s friendly or was originally trained as “drug-sniffing dog” and was probably alerting me to something. If the girl was far away, like at the park, I’d let my dog off leash, give her a little tap on the side, and let her take care of some distance for us. It was only a matter of time before my conversations with girls went from dog-related banter to personal stuff.

Loading...

We’re governed, first and foremost, by our instincts.

My dog was very intelligent for a dog. She could even open doors and undo safety locks. But, despite that, the most effective way to communicate with her was still good old-fashioned reward-and-punishment conditioning. Most people will tell you that humans are different, but any guy who’s been with a lot of girls will start nodding yes before you even finish saying that the same rules apply to women.

We like and seek out predictability.

Dogs are astute observers of patterns and routines. They quickly settle into habits—for better or worse—that are hard to break. They become uncomfortable or suspicious around sudden change or the unfamiliar. Girls are exactly the same. Short-circuiting this mechanism remains a key feature of my first-date game and, if you stop and think about it, probably yours too.

Like canines, the happiest women have structure and firm-hand leadership in their lives.

My dog was the happiest animal you’d ever meet. She was treated with affection and respect, so long as she extended the same. She was strictly prohibited from doing certain things, but that didn't stop her from trying to get on the couch, chew on things, or tug on the leash. I corrected every one of those transgressions, lest they become habits. While she still periodically challenged my leadership, she came to accept a certain order and exchange. This made her into a delight to be around, to everyone she encountered.

Over time, I came to see the close correlation between effective dog management and effective leadership to such a degree, that—to this day—I automatically lose respect for a man with a poorly behaved dog. You can be sure he's bad with women and children.

Ironically, the greatest service my dog ever rendered was convincing me to change my life. She introduced me to better-looking chicks, gave me vital foundational game, and—by demonstrating, through contrast, just how much worse my day became the moment my "girlfriend" came home—exposed the biggest problem in my life. While making the decision to break up with the girl, I also had the grave realization that—still jobless and with nothing but a friend's couch to crash on in another part of the state—the dog would have to stay.

I never saw the girl or my dog again.

When Abortion Is The Best Option

April 18, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

My natural inclination has been to oppose the promotion and spread of abortion and birth control for reasons familiar to other traditionalists: they undermined the growth of the traditional family structure and, in the case of abortion, constitute an immoral early end to human life. For most of my youth, I stood staunchly in this pro-life corner.

As I grew older, however, the subtle nuances surrounding this debate began to dawn on me, and I started to soften my position. I came to realize that, while I still saw some value in the traditionalist views I'd held, many humans were not willing or able to live in accordance with that model. It became clear, in fact, that many humans were actually quite inept at any kind of family formation, and perhaps shouldn't bother with it at all.

A recent article reminded me of why I had decided to soften my views in this way.

> Isabella Dutton, 57, says she wishes she had remained childless
> My son Stuart was five days old when the realisation hit me like a physical blow: having a child had been the biggest mistake of my life. Even now, 33 years on, I can still picture the scene: Stuart was asleep in his crib. He was due to be fed but hadn't yet woken. I heard him stir but as I looked at his round face on the brink of wakefulness, I felt no bond. No warm rush of maternal affection. I felt completely detached from this alien being who had encroached upon my settled married life and changed it, irrevocably, for the worse.

What kind of mindset does it take to view your own offspring as “alien”? I don’t know, but I will argue that anyone with such a view ought to avoid reproducing.

Continuing…

> I was 22 when I had Stuart, who was a placid and biddable baby. So, no, my feelings were not sparked by tiredness, nor by post-natal depression or even a passing spell of baby blues. I remember asking myself, ‘Is he really mine?’ He could, quite literally, have been anyone’s baby. Had a kind stranger offered to adopt him at that moment, I would not have objected.
> Two years and four months after Stuart was born, I had my daughter Jo. It may seem perverse that I had a second child in view of my aversion to them, but I believe it is utterly selfish to have an only one.

This woman views her own children as aliens and cares little enough for them to support the idea of giving them away…

…yet she feels the need to have more than one, because having an only child is selfish (though despising that child for hampering your ability to dilly-dally around for a while longer is apparently not).

Sheer stupidity, insanity, or both? You be the judge.

> I felt precisely the same indifference towards her as I had to Stuart, but I knew I would care for Jo to the best of my ability, and love her as I’d grown to love him. Yet I dreaded her dependence; resented the time she would consume, and that like parasites, both my children would continue to take from me and give

> To some, my life before I had the children may have seemed humdrum and my job as a typist was, it's true, not much of a career. So what was the great sacrifice, you might think? What I valued most in my life was time on my own; to reflect, read and enjoy my own company and peace of mind. And suddenly that peace and solitude wasn't there any more. There were two small interlopers intruding on it. And I've never got that peace back.

Selfishness is not having an only child. Selfishness is finding so much comfort in time spent with *yourself that you begin to view your own flesh and blood a hindrance for being unable to contribute to that. Selfishness is valuing time spent sitting on your own doing absolutely nothing of import over the joys of guiding your own flesh and blood into adulthood. Selfishness is knowing that you are this way and still choosing to bring those children into the world because you're afraid of how others would perceive you.

> I have never hidden the truth from my husband Tony, now 62. After a couple of years of marriage, Tony began to ask whether I was still adamant that I didn't want children. In the end I relented because I loved him and felt it would be unfair of me to deny him the chance to be a dad.

Of course there is a beta involved in this sad tale. Had he avoided entering union with a woman whose goals were so diametrically opposite to his own, he could perhaps have saved two young souls from living with the knowledge that they are hated by the person who brought them into this world. That kind of knowledge has to do a number on your psyche.

Loading…

> But there were provisos: if I was going to have children I knew absolutely – illogical as it may seem in view of my feelings – that I intended to raise them myself without any help from nannies or childminders. This wasn't a way of assuaging my guilt, because I felt none. It was simply that, having brought them into the world, I would do my best for them.

Well, ok…

> And here, perhaps, is the nub of it: I would not take on the job of motherhood and do it half-heartedly. Unlike so many would-be mums I thought hard about the responsibilities of my role, and, I believe, if more women did before rushing heedlessly into it, they might share my reservations.

Ok, sounds fine…

> I was acutely aware that a child would usurp my independence and drain my finances. I felt no excitement as my due date approached. I had no compulsion to fill the nursery with toys, nor did I read parenting manuals or swap tips with friends. I focused on enjoying the last months of my freedom.

Wait a second. We've just finished reading this woman's discussion of the necessity of commitment to children and raising them as well as one is able. She has essentially spent half of the article patting herself on the back for doing this. And now, suddenly, we learn that she didn't show that commitment herself. She made little effort to prepare herself for the rigors of parenting beforehand and didn't even bother creating an ideal environment for the kids. Is it me, or do I sense some ongoing mental gymnastics at play here?

> I never wanted to hurt Stuart – I only wanted him to prosper and thrive. There is no doubt I grew to love him very much, and indeed still do. But I always wished I had never had him.

And we wonder why so many kids are growing up and turning into fuck-ups. Hard to keep sense when you know that your own parents could care less if you existed, and might in fact prefer that you didn't.

There's no surer way to mess up a kid than to let it know openly how much you despise its existence. I can't even imagine dealing with that. My parents, aunts and grandparents all cared for me unconditionally, and me them. They made tremendous sacrifices for me, and continue to do so now. There's no question that they wouldn't have it any other way.

I don't know what I'd do if it came to pass that these people not only didn't exist, but were instead replaced by relatives who actually regretted my coming into this world. I realize now how lucky I am. Knowing that women like this exist and are selfish enough to value "spontaneity" over the existence of their own flesh and blood, I really appreciate the women in my family, along with other good, family-oriented women out there who love their children. It also softens my attitude towards birth control/abortion.

I'm generally quite conservative on that issue, but this is part of the reason why I've moved left on it. These people just shouldn't have offspring, and anything that prevents them from doing so ought to be welcomed.

I suspect that those two poor souls this woman birthed have some serious issues. God help them. If greater access to abortion and birth control here in the west allows for fewer of them to be brought into this world, then I don't think I can bring myself to stand in the way.

What was my point with all of this? The lessons here are clear to me…

1. If you find yourself not inclined to have children then, please, don't have them. Get snipped or tie some tubes. As much as I hate abortion, even I'll back it in support of the anti-child crowd remaining childless. Many of the dysfunctions we complain about in this society are caused by fucked-up sons and daughters who all too often are the product of just these kinds of relationships. We're only doing ourselves a favor by reducing their number.

2. If you're a young man inclined towards family formation, be very careful about the woman you choose. There are plenty of females like this one out there who will undoubtedly harm any offspring you are able to create.

As UGK said:

> Dump-dump in the gut, raw from the giddy up
> Better choose that right one or pick-pick the kiddies up

Watch where that seed goes—there's a lot riding on it.

Dear Mr. Shepherd

April 18, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Dear Mr. Shepherd,

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you were born on a sheep farm to a family of shepherds.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you went to Shepherd University and earned an advanced degree in sheepherding.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you spend your days in the field.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you know grasslands like the back of your hand.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you protect and feed them at great expense to yourself.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you know the anatomy, physiology and psychology of sheep.

Sheep do not recognize you as a shepherd simply because you comment daily on sheep forums or read dozens of articles about sheep.

Sheep recognize you as a shepherd when you speak with authority, raise your rod, and demand compliance in an act of unbridled dominance. It’s not what you know or where you came from that matters; it’s what you do with what you know and where you’re leading that brings the lambs into the fold.

If you can’t or won’t be a wolf in sheep’s clothing, at least be a shepherd.

Very sincerely,

~ Thatch

You Are A Man Of Your Times

April 19, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

When I was young, my parents would reward me when I did well in school. I got good grades all throughout high school and college, but good grades was never my personal goal.

When I was in my early 20s, I went to work for a corporation. My bosses would reward me with praise and money when I worked hard in the laboratory, but working hard in that field was not something I really wanted.

Whenever I got a new bang, I told my friends and they congratulated me. This reward caused me to pursue bangs that I otherwise wouldn't have. I was thrusting the girl not just for me, but for my friends.

Whenever I got a new flag, I published a story on my blog or in a book. My readers rewarded me with their praise, causing me to chase flags longer than I had originally planned.

Whenever I sell a new book, I'm rewarded with money, causing me to write more books.

Whenever a girl compliments me on my strength, I work out even harder in the gym.

Whenever a man compliments me on my outfit, I think of new ways to better my style.

Am I not a machine that just seeks validation in others, in both obvious and subtle forms?

Loading…

How much of my desire truly comes from within, and how much is determined by reward or punishment? Why do I feel more reward from a bang than the average man? Why do I feel less reward from money? Haven't the goals we have in life been shaped for years by influences outside of our immediate control? How much say do we really have in the goals we set for ourselves? If I was put on an island, alone, at a young age, wouldn't my wants be quite different than they are now? How much different?

I'd like to believe that there is a strong genetic component to my being. I want to believe that my ancestors have determined my destiny, but it's hard to come to that conclusion. I'm nothing more than a man of my times, shaped by a wave of civilization that determines the majority of my behavior and thinking. I think we are all men of our times, and had we been born in a different era, we wouldn't even recognize ourselves in the mirror.

What Happens When Colombia Meets Columbus

April 20, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

I moved to Columbus, Ohio in January of 2008. I had just turned 18 and was having a blast in my birth country, Colombia. However I was offered an athletic scholarship, which added to the prospect of being totally independent from my parents, traveling, and meeting new people, especially hot girls (I used to believe all Americans were blonde and hot, boy was I in for a surprise). These were enough reasons to convince me to make the big move.

Up to this point I had been to the States several times. I had seen the ugly side of obesity in the States in every single one of my many trips to Florida, but I also had seen the bright side. I recall banging a very attractive 15 year old blonde in my room at the Disney resort at age 16 as one of my most pleasant experiences while vacationing in Florida. This matched well to the constant bombardment of Hollywood media in Colombian society that made me believe all women in the United States looked like either the Olsen twins or Britney Spears. I was still a young and innocent soul unaware of the magic of makeup, $2000-dollar photo-shoots and Photoshop.

Eventually, I would make my way to Columbus, Ohio. I lived fantastic experiences in it, as well as terrible ones, but mostly I am nothing but grateful with the city. This is my take on what Columbus has to offer:

The Weather

It has a mind of its own, does whatever the fuck it wants and doesn't care what you think. For a South American man who was used to fantastic Colombian weather, Columbus was hell on earth when I landed at Port Columbus. It was the coldest I had ever been, the trees were death, the sky was grey, and the people were rude. Nonetheless, as time went by I learned about seasons, and how a place that looked completely dead could blossom in only a couple months, I learned to look forward to the spring and summer and to the increased number of young, hot girls, with fewer layers of clothing roaming the streets.

The Partying

Once I had settled I began to experience what Columbus had to offer in terms of partying. I remember the first time partying at the dorms during my first week as a freshman. Someone handed me a Natural Light, a blend of hobo piss and water. I spitted out immediately and demanded a Belgian Stout.

It was then that I learned that most college students have no idea about quality, in general, and that they are as broke as Greece. This was hard for me to handle as I always had my wallet full, nonetheless, I didn't want to be the idiot who paid for it all. It took me a great deal of self-control not to behave like Michael Jackson at Harrods and spend it all on my new friends. However, having some cash came in handy when I realized how shallow and selfish the standard American college babe is.

Up to then I had never seen the embodiment of the concept of “slut.” I remember vividly the first time I witnessed it at a place called Major Woodies. I walked into a bathroom to a girl giving head to some dude, I shouted, “I’m next!”

Subsequently she proceeded to pull the cock out of her mouth, and shout back, I’M NOT A WHORE! Then resumed her fellatio. Needless to say I laughed like a mad man for the remainder of the night.

This summarizes the type of things I saw at that fantastic bar. There were a lot of underage girls willing to do anything for alcohol, you didn’t need game, you just needed a drink in hand. Major Woodies was Satan’s playground, and God do I miss it.

Inevitably, partying evolved, with law enforcement getting a tight grip in underage alcohol consumption. In present times Columbus has three main ways to party, the first of them being house parties. These are like everywhere else in the states and revolve around the OSU Buckeyes and their endlessness, relentless hate for Michigan, because, well FUCK MICHIGAN that’s why.

There is also The Arena District, which is slut country and where you will find the younger, more attractive and sluttier girls in Columbus. Unfortunately you will also find the bitchiest, most entitled and annoying ones, most of them being bland and uncultured. If you still feel compelled to see this side of town you can try your luck in Sugar Bar, Social, Brothers, Gas Works (where once I got in a fight with a bouncer because some idiot girl fucked up my martini), Cantina and some other nearby watering holes. Columbus pickup scene is really a hit or miss, some nights I would have a blast, some others I would want to burn the place down. However, there is almost always a steady supply of slutty girls, which make it fairly easy to get laid.

Loading...

Then there is the Short North, it contains the gay district, good restaurants, dive bars and the older range of people. Here you will find more interesting people and it’s a good place to have a nice, relaxed conversation. People here tend to be more interesting but still tasteless. The Short North has a varied offer for food and alcohol, however if you want to try a more Teutonic offer you can pay a visit to the German Village. Its filled with eye pleasant architecture and great places to eat. An important thing to highlight here is that the Short North is fairly cheap, as is Columbus in general.

Nonetheless, Columbus has serious issues with public transportation, other than public buses and cabs you have to rely on cars. Since I wouldn't be caught dead in a public bus, I relied in cabs and my car for getting around (a car is almost a necessity in Columbus). Cabs in Columbus are cheaper than in DC but more expensive than NYC… mind that fact.

The Low Crime

I often heard comments on how Columbus was a dangerous city. In my head I never quite considered Columbus a city, let alone a dangerous one (anything under 5 million people I don't consider a city). I was able to walk wherever I wanted at whatever time I wanted and never had any trouble. All dangerous situations I got in were the product of bar fights, never crime.

The People

I had a very close group of people at school, most of them foreign, a fact that quickly made us known around campus as "The Internationals." It took me some time to recognize the type of people I wanted to be part of my social group, to which not a lot of Americans made it, this due to the lack of culture and taste that most of them displayed.

In my book Columbus has one of the highest ratio of douchebag to nice guy I have ever seen ranking at an impressive 11:1 according to my 2012 calculations. Girls do much better in the equivalent bitch to sweetheart at 4:1, however a lot of the ones without an attitude are also the ugly ones or the fatties, which is unquestionably a problem.

The average Columbus male

People in Columbus have a general ignorance for good taste, elegance, luxury and fashion. Most believe the highest expression of fashion is A&F, Hollister, American Eagle, Kenneth Cole, and Forever 21. They will act like 50 dollars is a huge bar tab and they believe that luxury means bigger, not better.

The Girls

Columbus has a large pool of females to choose from, if you have any resemblance of game you should have no problem getting laid. Depending on the day you may need to lower your standards, if you decide not to, which you should, you will find that keeping your game tight in asshole/alpha mode will get the job done.

Most girls go out wanting to get laid. Their feminist-infested society has pre-programmed them to believe that riding a random dick equals freedom. Take advantage of this beautiful thing. Most of them are incredibly gullible and dumb, and I mean it. Once I had one of them believe that my Brazilian buddy and I were former F1 test drivers starting our careers over at Nascar. Another time I made one believe I was the son of Carlos Slim, and a cheerleader once believed that quiddicth was a real thing in England after my British buddy reassured her it was true in his Queen’s English accent.

I see this city growing in the near future. It has a lot going for it, as big business seems drawn to it. They could really work on their cultural offer as it lacks a great deal. Museums are nearly nonexistent. Shopping and tourist landmarks are limited, too. Also, up to the point to where I left, the city was getting infested by the hipster crowd. In a matter of months they took over the Short North. I managed to have my share of fun with them but it got boring after a while.

This is my take on Columbus, Ohio. A city as confusing as unpredictable, a rollercoaster of emotions that can take you from sheer joy to utter misery in a matter of seconds. I will go back this summer. I hope this information is helpful to you if you ever decide to go.

10 Reasons You Can’t Build Muscle

April 20, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

“One last feel,” she said as she groped my chest.

She worked her way down to my abdomen. And then my buttocks.

I smiled. The new girl I was with did not.

These were the parting words of a married woman, sneaking in one last feel before leaving the bar with her husband. She was 29 – with a slim, stacked body. 30 minutes earlier we were kissing on the dance floor.

I barely spoke a word. My body, on the other hand, did all the talking.

Every man should carry a solid amount of muscle mass, or strive to build more if that is not the case.

From increased strength and quality of life to an overall larger presence, the benefits of increased lean muscle tissue span across all areas of life. Below I have compiled what I believe to be the top 10 reasons most men fail to build muscle.

1. You Don’t Eat Enough

In order to build new muscle tissue, your body needs extra calories (ie. extra energy). This means you have to gain weight. And to gain weight you have to eat more.

Caution: Our bodies are not capable of adding more than roughly half a pound of lean muscle per week. Gain too fast and become chubby.

2. You Aren’t Consistent

This goes for both diet and exercise. Lift weights at least 3 times per week. Eat enough every single day. Consistency is key for any long term change. Missing a day here and there won’t kill you, but making a habit of it might.

3. Your Form Sucks

75% of dudes at the gym don’t know how to lift weights. And that is low-balling it for sure. Leave your ego at the door – using poor form to lift more weight is a good recipe for injury. Not to mention it fails to properly activate the correct musculature. You will get a lot more respect from experienced lifters as an added bonus.

Take some time and research good form for all of your lifts. Mark Rippletoe is a world class strength coach who offers invaluable information on proper form. Searching YouTube for “Mark Rippetoe Squat” or “Mark Rippetoe Bench Press” is a good place to start.

4. You Don’t Track Progress

If you don’t know how much weight you lifted for how many reps last time you were at the gym, you don’t have a target to aim to beat. I know everyone on this site recognizes the importance of pushing your limits. Be sure not to neglect this principle at the gym.

Loading…
Use a notepad or excel spreadsheet.

5. You Don’t Do These Exercises

Squats, presses, and rows. Learn to live by them. Deadlift, too. Embrace them and bump your game up a notch.

These are the core movements that we use in our everyday lives. That is why everyone from professional athletes to housewives benefits from strengthening them. They recruit many different muscle groups and stimulate maximal muscle growth as a result.

6. You Do Too Many Of These Exercises

Bicep curls, tricep extensions, and calf raises. Isolation exercises like these target only one muscle group at a time. And it tends to be a small muscle group that's already targeted by one of the big boy exercises above.

Use sparingly.

7. You Have No Butt

Having strong glutes helps immensely with squats and deadlifts. It also helps you sprint faster and protects against knee, lower back, hamstring, and groin injuries. Not to mention – a big, firm butt is the mark of a true alpha.

Start by doing floor bridges and focus on contracting your ass.

8. You Rely On Supplements

Whey protein can help you meet your daily protein intake. And creatine is proven to increase strength and muscle. But there is not much else out there that will truly help you.

Focus on your diet and training, not finding a magical potion.

9. You Expect Instant Results

Be patient. Enjoy the journey of building your body up little by little. It is a fulfilling process measured in months and years. Not days or weeks.

10.You Don't Have Time

This is an excuse. Not enough time = not a priority. Make a commitment or stay skinny.

Twilight Of The Idols: “Why Can’t I Use A Smiley Face?”

April 21, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some men were just born for suffering.

Born needing it, like the dualistic relation between an essential Blood-Spirit and its purgative catharsis: mingling, mingling, and never quite coming together. So we have this great Spirit, this Blood-Spirit, driving us forward, and at the same time this purging, this cleansing, that goes on at the same time. The two forces coexist, and are bound up together. Complementing each other, but at the same time in opposition.

Think of Roosh stumbling through South America, escaping the tyranny of Dr. Wang and his little petri dishes, from the tyranny of being told to be “respectable”; and at the same time, being wracked by parasites and dystentery. Following the essential Blood-Spirit, and being purged simultaneously. It is a fitting dualism, if you can manage it.

And there you have it. The essential purging that must take place before our Mr. Roosh can be free of greasy Dr. Wang, free from mother, free from sister, from the oppression of familiarity, and free from Maryland. Ah, how he hated Maryland, how he yearned to get away. Away. To scrape off the old resin with a Roman strigil.

And so they writhe, such men. Myself included. Some men were just born to writhe on the edges of razors they themselves spend their lives honing. To flail at themselves with their Idealistic cat-o-nine-tails. Thwack! Thwack! You can almost picture Roosh scourging his back again and again with his flail, wishing for Poland, for Brazil, for Colombia, for anywhere but here. But why, why, isn’t he happy? Because he knows the Ideal is doomed.

Roosh’s Why I Can’t I Use A Smiley Face is the poignant confession of a man who has lived this great experience for us, this experience of exploring foreign lands in search of the great female “Paradise”. Confessio pro vita sua. Poosy Paradise, as he calls it. The Great Snatch. The Pink El Dorado. And he returns to the US to find mostly grimness and disillusionment. To return home to get winks from 50 year single mothers on Match.com, to be condescended to by fat, arrogant dunces who nod politely and understand nothing. And so Roosh goes on flagellating himself. Thwack! Thwack! It is an entirely necessary flagellation, a required ritual.

And this is as it has always been, maybe. For it has been the fate of every real traveler—not your run-of the-mill Lonely Planet tourist–to return home to the maddening incomprehension of the common man. Don’t believe me? Look at what Melville, Richard Burton, and Wilfred Thesiger endured. Outcasts. The boorishness of the mob. The stupidity and inertia of the masses. Or think of Marco Polo, clapped into prison when he returned home for spinning what his countrymen called “tall tales”. Literally. Seems the Venetians didn’t like what he had to tell them. Didn’t want to hear it. Or Melville. Living among the South Sea Islanders, frolicking with Fayaway, on a different planet basically, and then coming home to face decades of disillusionment as a hack and occasional customs agent in New York City. With heating bills, a wife he hated, and a drunkard son. Anguish. He was another one born to suffer.

Well, our Mr. Roosh is right, of course. Society truly is a hateful place. The culture here is as soul-gobbling and rotten as he imagines it to be. Maybe more. You have only to enter any megastore in suburban America to view a species of humanity that barely qualifies as human. Homo corpulensis degeneratus. Walmart. Target. Home Depot. Take your pick.

But we are the agents of our suffering, mostly. Because it is we who construct the Great Ideals in the first place. The Great Ideal. The ideal of the Perfect Woman. We set ourselves up for disillusionment. The ideal of the perfect relationship. By persisting in our Ideals, we condemn ourselves to writhe on the edge of our own straight-razors: for there is no perfect woman, no perfect love, no perfect relationship. Melville tried and persisted in his Idealism, and went to his grave trying. He never quite recovered from his stint among the cannibals. He searched for the perfect love and couldn't find it: his Polynesian mistress could never measure up. Searched for the perfect friend, and couldn't find that either. His friendship with Nathaniel Hawthorne could not meet his Ideal. Nothing could, really. Because there is no Perfect Ideal. Because there is only struggle, and fight, and struggle some more. And this is life. Pass me a drink.

Loading...

And yet there is something great and noble and savage in this confession, this little testament of Roosh. This noble confessio. Because in his heart, Roosh remains a proud soul: an expression of the purest Dream-Quest. The great odyssey in search of the Great Ideal: the great Arthurian quest. And there is something stirring and redeeming in that. For its own sake. The quest itself redeems, does it not? The Ideal itself redeems. Even if it is doomed. Compare the noble and doomed love of Shakespeare's Anthony and Cleopatra to the unmanly whining and cringing of King Lear, shouting to heaven at the injustice of the world. You tell me which is more noble.

Because no matter what, our Roosh knows he is not going back to Dr. Wang and his test-tubes and his petri dishes. Ah, how he despised little greasy Dr. Wang and his rules, and how he ached to get away. To escape that prison. Away! Away! Anything to get away! And he did get away, he did indeed. He split from the whole program.

It is a noble confession because he never lost hope. Roosh never could abandon himself to despair or indifference. He never gave up. Even when he says "enjoy the decline", don't believe him. Don't believe a word of it. It is his unconscious way of dodging his real sentiment. He isn't enjoying the decline. He writhes with it. Because he cares. In truth, he loathes the decline. Like he despised old Wang and his petri dishes.

And this, the savage nobility of caring, is what makes him elevates him in the end. This is his Great Redeemer. The selflessness of the act of caring. Our Roosh, the great carer. The exterior he adopts–the acid, the profanity, the vitriol, the sarcasm–is his way of masking the essential gentility and nobility of character within. Of masking the purging of his Blood-Spirit, of masking the scars of the flagellation. Thwack! It is an armor of old date, a necessary protective coloration. Because Roosh doesn't really want a private purging, a private flagellation. He wants and needs a very public one, a public catharsis. An auto-da-fe for Mr. Roosh.

For by living this great experience for us, he has effectively shed his old skin, reptile-like, and has started to grow his new skin. His new identity, his new essence. It is a painful, agonizing process: like being reborn. The process of being reborn, if you will. Because a new Roosh is taking shape before our eyes.

It is a great confession. Because Roosh knows in his deepest soul that the Ideal is doomed. His old Ideal. He just knows it.

Doomed. But yet he refuses to abandon his Ideal. His Titanic-like Ideal is going down, down beneath the waves, but he continues to fight. And he stays true to his own noble Blood-Spirit. His deepest identity. And this is what redeems him, and will assist him in his new Rebirth. His new mission, his new Ideal.

Because sometimes we have to grind ourselves down, to shatter our old icons, to shed our old skins, before we can be reborn. When the old Idols no longer serve the purpose for which they were created, they must be overthrown. We must scale the steps of the pyramid, smash the old Idols, and roll them down the steps. Destroy them utterly. As Cortes pulled down the dead gods and dead idols in Tenochtitlan. Well, let the old gods die. Good riddance.

O, how I long to point my howitzer into the faces of the Old Idols, and pull the lanyard! Fire for effect! For only then can we be reborn. And begin anew.

4 Links For Enhanced Mobility

April 21, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

The one thing the average guy can learn from weightlifters is the importance of mobility work. The main takeaway from the whole paleo movement is the emphasis on how sitting is horrifically bad for your mobility. Some people also make claims that sitting for long periods of time is actually deleterious to your health. This infographic is a nice looking image which sums up all of these claims. To me it looks like many of those claims are correlations where other factors such as lifestyle choices are to blame for the negative health consequences of sitting such as downing gourmet donuts and 700 calorie "coffee" drinks.

Anyways, much has been written by people more knowledgeable than I on the topic of mobility work. If you lift I highly suggest you incorporate some basic drills to fix the tightness caused by sitting all day. Here are my top four mobility links:

4. Mobility Basics

70s big has helped me a lot in my lifting and one of the most important articles was this one. It gives the basics of when and why you should do mobility work and provides links to some of the most important mobility drills for lifters. One of which is the 'infamous' couch stretch. If you're as inflexible as I was you'll probably last 5 seconds then fall over the first time you do it. Here is a bonus post on mobility from the site. Lift Big Eat Big: Mobility For Sitting On Your Ass All Day is another article which breaks down and shows some good drills you can do to loosen up your posterior chain.

Loading...

3. Foam Rolling aka Self-Myofascial Release

I usually roll everything out as a warmup before my workout. It loosens everything up , gets the blood flowing, and relaxes tight muscles.

This is the wrong way to roll.

2. Agile Eight

About halfway down the page is the list of the “agile eight.” It’s a warmup routine which incorporates the movements from the previous links. Do this before every training session and I guarantee they’ll go much smoother.

1. Mobility WOD

Mobility WOD is a website with a new mobility drill every post so if you’re looking to add new drills to your routine this is the place to go. Posts are tagged by what muscle they target and even by sport specific drills.

What I Learned From Banging 5 Girls In 7 Days

I feel sorry for Bronan and Nate, because they had to listen to me bitch and moan through what I now call "The great dry spell of 2013." I went for over two months without a new or even a repeat notch – the longest dry spell in Thatch post-red pill history. It was brutal, and my anti-porn/anti-fapping policy went out the window in less than two weeks.

I won't be specific for privacy reasons, but I don't live in a city known for attractive women. It's not in any way uncommon to go out barhopping all weekend long and only see two or maybe three bangable girls without a ring on their finger. They marry young here, divorce early, and then remarry instantaneously. The typical set in my city is one girl, her man who she started dating in high school (but still somehow managed to rack up 50 notches), and two of his beta friends trying to be cool in their ill-fitting JC Penny suits and fedoras. Bar game is a bitch-and-a-half here, so I day game almost exclusively. Even then, "What high school did you go to/are you one of Linda's friends?" is the second sentence out of their mouths right after "I'm engaged."

I dropped my phone.

I got a new phone.

What's this iCloud thing?

Oh. It's that thing that turned 197 phone contacts into 231 contacts. Numbers from girls I hadn't seen or talked to in months or years repopulated on my phone.

About 20 texts to 20 different girls later, I had a date the following night that turned into a bang. She was a repeat so it wasn't a +1, but at least I had ended my dry spell.

In all, I banged 3 repeats that week. Then, as if the day game prospects I had churned up could sense my success through their fem antenna, I picked up a +1 and got an unsolicited text from another. A few nights later, another +1.

So how about a little brutal honesty? Let me just dump it all into this article so the haters can rip Thatch a new asshole. I know some of you have just been waiting, so here's your chance to armchair alpha in the comments section as I write things that go against traditional manosphere teachings.

Here's what I learned beta beta beta betabetabetabeta beta beta beta beta betabetabeta:

I. Scarcity mentality is counterproductive, but scarcity itself is a fact that we often overlook in the Manosphere.

I just told you how it's nearly impossible to meet single women in my city, and then I followed it up with how I banged a handful of them. But gentlemen, I'm older-but-not-old, my career choices have paid off, and I live in an uppity building in the heart of the city. Had I written this article 10 years ago in my early 20's and lived in this poon-forsaken city, the whole article would have been about how I still haven't broken my dry spell.

For those of you living out in a cornfield somewhere or in a rural town where the only thing on anybody's mind under the age of 30 is literally "My god, I either have to get married or get the hell out of here," don't give too much credence to the AMOG keyboard jockeys who slam you the moment you talk about how rare it is to see an attractive woman – not just without a boyfriend – but without a diamond on her finger. Yeah, they're both cheating on each other and they'll be married and divorced in about 3 years, but the price of admission to that party is being married or engaged yourself. I call it mutually assured destruction game.

True, there's got to be at least a handful of attractive single women around, and I insist you can find and bang them, but don't beat yourself up for not grabbing a different +1 every other weekend. Depending on your age, location and resources, you may be in a situation where one decent-looking +1 per year followed by an LTR constitutes age and resources-appropriate game.

Just be honest with yourself when you assess your surroundings and your level of game. Don't let the man version of the hamster convince you that your lack of poon is beyond your control. But I am painfully aware that the effort I put in here to pick up a +1 would have triple or quadruple the yield in other cities I've lived in – and I understand the same may go for you. Don't beat yourself up too much over these AMOG comments if you're living in Splitbritches Arkansas and don't even see (much less bang) 5 hotties per month. My guess is that over 90% of those guys are full of shit anyway.

II. They're all the same, and I'm tired of the game.

I'm going on my 5th year of writing in the manosphere. It does my heart good to see people quote my old personas in the comments section, and even more good when they quote something I said four years ago to completely trash something I said in a current article.

Some of the people who hate me the most are also my biggest fans. Heh.

A central theme in my writing over the years has been "they're all the same." I wrote this way because they are largely all the same in key ways, plus it really pisses women off when I say it, and it really pisses off beta fucktards when I say it bout their wives or girlfriends.

But when the day comes that you've banged every type of woman on the planet – rich, poor, good, bad, corporate, homebody, party, church, educated, dumb, funny, serious, political, clueless, etc. – you realize that "they're all the same" isn't something you just write in the manosphere to piss everybody off. It truly is like dating the same goddamn woman over and over and over and over again – just in a different body.

Bronan can back me up on this because we've discussed it ad nauseam: I told him I was going to double down, end my dry spell, and pick up a few +1's so I could call it quits while I still had the mojo to go out while banging more girls in one week than most betas will in a lifetime.

I pulled it off, I have the pictures to prove it, and I'm fucking done with this mess. I'm sure I'll change my mind in about three or four months, but for now, I'm over this shit. If you're a betting man, you'd be wise to put money on my return looking more like a serial monogamist than a player. This is not because I'm ready to settle down, but rather because I'm just flat-out tired of chasing ass all the time.

III. I now understand why men get married.

Marriage is risky, however, I can see why men who get to my point in life say "fuck it" and take a walk down the aisle.

Even if it's easy for you to get laid, it's not that easy, and eventually you'll tire of the whole rapid mating charade. When that happens, it's much easier to fool yourself into thinking she's special so that you can settle down and stop working hard to keep women interested. By the time you figure out that reasoning is severely and fundamentally flawed, you're screwed. But if you perceive your level of screwdness to be more tolerable than the pain-in-the-ass of chasing tail forever, you really may become a "happily" married man.

I get it now. It's like eating steak for so long that a gas station hotdog actually sounds good.

IV. I'm running out of things to say.

Like I said, I've been writing in the mansophere for a long time, and I'm losing my passion for writing about game because it's not new anymore. Take this article for example; I banged 5 women, three of which I'd be proud as fuck to post their photos, and the other two were bangable by any reasonable man's standards – yet this article offers zero game tips. But what on earth can I possibly say that hasn't been said 500,000 times already?

It's also becoming increasingly rare for me to bang a girl younger than 25, so I'm losing touch with what the younger guys need to hear. About 5 months ago I tagged a girl shortly before her 21st birthday, but all of my other lays in the past several years have been in the 25 to 32 year old age range. I don't know what the next generation of guys need to hear, because the 18 – 22 year old girl crop is much harder to deal with than any of the chicks in my rotation. Just a few weeks ago I was playing tennis with my nieces and their girlfriends, and I remember thinking how much more advanced their status whoring and shit testing skills are than even the 27 – 32 year old attorney chicks I've dated. The oldest of that bunch was 15 if memory serves, and these are the "good ones" even by manosphere standards.

Christ almighty I pity your sons. I really, really do.

V. My writing is starting to suck.

These days I just ramble. When I look back at my old work and see the passion I once had about sharing new experiences and concepts I learned, it puts my current writing to shame. Look how long this damn article is. It's going to be 2,000 words before I'm done with it, and I haven't said anything new or noteworthy.

The bottom line is that what I learned from banging 5 girls in 7 days is that I don't give a shit if I bang 5 girls in 7 days ever again. It's too much work, there's zero return on investment outside of an hour or two of carnal pleasure, and the moment I bust a nut, I can't stand the sound of her voice or having her in my personal space. The sad thing is that the vast majority of them are actually pretty nice gals, but once they start in on me with the "OMG I never ever do this!" talk, a portion of what little bit of soul I have left dies.

I know too much. I've seen, done and heard too much. I wouldn't trade it for the world, but it's really starting to become a drag. I cannot stand being lied to or being snowflaked on as if I'm some retarded beta with a diamond in his pocket just waiting for the perfect finger. The fact that they actually believe their own bullshit just makes it worse.

I think I've finally come to the place where I prefer to be lied to by one woman at a time.

It's been fun, gentlemen. I've fucked half your wives and all your daughters and don't regret a minute of it – but I'm officially sending my player jersey to the rafters of the Manosphere Dome.

7 Reasons Why The Twin Cities Are Great For Men

April 22, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Lately I've noticed that there's a negative in the manosphere. We've been posting a lot about why American women suck, and why certain cities in America suck. Well I figured it was time to pump in a bit of life to show that not all is lost in America. Luckily I didn't have to look beyond where I'm currently residing, the Twin Cities. Now I don't want to be a proponent of supporting the Twin Cities just because I reside here; however there's enough factual evidence to back up my claim.

1. High Level Of Attractiveness

Travel and Leisure ranks Minneapolis/St. Paul as the no. 10 for city with the most attractive people. The only cities that beat out the Twin Cities are places in the southern half of the United States where winter doesn't exist. Of those places south of the border, most are directly linked to a beach. When you factor in Minnesota being winter half the year, and only having access to 10,000 lakes, it's pretty impressive.

2. Mall of America

The country's largest mall, this place has endless possibilities and advantages. Primary advantage one, is the fact that there's no sales tax on clothes here. That means you have tons of options under one roof for a good wardrobe, and you never pay tax on it. Advantage number two, is the opportunity for gaming women, no matter what age. Being it's as large of a mall as it is, anyone from high school through their 40′s can run game here and find plenty of opportunities. Additionally, it's a fair tourist destination so whether you're a local, or visiting, you still have a fair opportunity to find something that will work.

3. Sports

Albeit not the most successful teams, there are plenty of teams based here which provides plenty of options for the sports fan who wants to catch a game. The advantage to the teams not having a great history comes in the cheap ticket pricing. Plus if you like hockey, well it's the state of hockey. Options include, NFL, NHL, NBA, MLB, WNBA, professional lacrosse, and professional soccer.

4. Women Still Want To Be Wives

Now I realize a lot of people on here aren't big fans of marriage, however the discussion often comes up that people hate marriage because there's no one worth marrying, and every marriage ends in divorce. That's true, except in Minnesota for some reason people get married, often and young, and they stay together. Honestly when I first moved here I felt like I hit a time warp and ended up in the 1950′s with women who cook and clean but no, it's just Minnesota. Good to know that there's still a foothold where feminism hasn't ruined everything in this country.

5. Statistic Round

Since there's a good following of people on this website that like to view statistics for proof here's a few simple statistical facts. The ratio of men to women is slightly in favor of men for Minneapolis showing 100 men to 103 women. St. Paul is comparable, with 100 men to 107 women. While a 1 to 1 ratio isn't the best, compared to places like DC and Portland, this is a dream. If you're curious about how old people are in the Twin Cities, as well as how much they make, well that's listed as well. Age can be broken down as men being approximately 34 years old and women 35.5 years of age. Overall that means this is a pretty young city in the grand scheme of things. The average household income is over $50k for both cities. It's not the highest, but the cost of living isn't much here either.

6. Healthiest Place In America

According to Forbes, the Twin Cities is the healthiest place in America right now. What does that mean? Well as a guy you have to hit the gym if you want success. But that also means that the woman you pick up is likely to take care of herself and be in shape as well. If you visit the neighbors to the east first you'll see a tremendous difference in appearance.

7. Food

Lastly, what every man loves, food. The Twin Cities are home to the beastly manburger known as the Jucy Lucy, a cheeseburger with the cheese inside. That's not all though. Altogether the Twin Cities have had over 40 restaurants featured on various television shows, all due to their delicious menu items.

And just in case those reasons weren't all enough, the Twin Cities are currently ranked number 11 in Best Cities for Men in 2013 according to Men's Health. So there you have it, a place in America that's still pretty awesome. It's got money, food, women (both looks and ratio) and the countries largest mall. And of all places, it's in the Midwest.

5 Tips For Dating In Small Towns

April 23, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

The information age has made our world much smaller. Just a few years ago one could wield a little black book of girls and maintain relative anonymity in most circles, but the ubiquity of social media has made this virtually impossible.

Men in small towns are most affected by the Big Brother triad of Facebook, Twitter, and LinkedIn. Word of who's dating who travels fast and social circles frequently overlap in these areas, causing headaches that a busy man has little time to deal with.

If you're forced to live in a smaller city, it helps to have ground rules for approaching the dating scene. Whether you're looking to date a few girls while you search for a relationship, or you're a player just looking for unattached fun, here are a few considerations while you build your game in a small city…

1. Respect the power of Facebook

Men in this sphere almost universally dislike Facebook, but it can be a powerful ally if used correctly. If you have a profile, lock down your security settings, especially those of who can search for you and whether your profile is public. Don't ever become Facebook friends with a girl you want to date. If a girl asks for your facebook but won't give you her number, she's probably not very interested anyway. Don't devote much time to sleuthing, but it may be helpful to find a girl's Facebook page to see what circles she travels in and whether you share any common friends.

2. Diversify

Your city may only have one major college or graduate school. If you're gaming younger girls, small class sizes ensure that your prospects are at maximum two degrees of separation from each other. I've ejected on promising leads because they were friendly with a current girl and I didn't want to deal with the inevitable drama. This is why you must diversify. It helps to have girls in different types of professions: one girl who's an artist, another who's an accountant, and another who is a doctor. Geographic divisions are also your ally—my city has a North Side and a South Side with very little intermingling between two. Force yourself to go to multiple areas, which gets you out of your comfort zone and facilitates dating women of different backgrounds.

3. Avoid lying

Veteran players may disagree on this point, but I prefer not to lie. Women want a shred of plausible deniability when they are dating a man they like, and as long as you don't make a fool out of them they rarely challenge you until they are issuing an ultimatum to define the relationship, in which case they've already made up their minds to walk. Newbies often ask "what if she asks if I am dating other people"? It's amazing how rarely I've been asked this question. If they do, you can go with the classic Heartiste "it's complicated" or the more nuanced "I like you but I prefer to keep my options open and see where things go." As a bonus, you don't have to devote as much brainpower to keeping your stories straight.

4. Get everything on your terms

Get them comfortable with following your lead on plans. Take different girls to different places — Lisa goes to the supermarket with you before you guys cook dinner, while Jenny is your date to the beach. Developing little routines like this helps you bond with the girl, and also helps you avoid crossing paths with other interests. Most importantly, always refuse to meet her her friends — they are a pointless timesink at best, and frequently become nosy and jealous saboteurs.

5. Let them down gently

Unless a girl is a complete mess, make it as amicable as possible when you stop seeing her. Explain that with where you are in life, you can't give her the committed relationship she wants and "deserves." This may prevent her from poisoning the well with her friends, who you are likely to encounter in the future. I've had ex-girls who later get into happy relationships and introduce me to new prospects. This is rare, but sometimes a bit of effort can at least prevent people from spewing vitriol behind your back.

I am aware that intrasexual competition can sometimes work in your favor, with jealous girls playing off each other. That said, this advice is geared toward someone who wants to engage in minimal-drama mini relationships, leaving freedom to find the right girl or pursue other goals. Small town game is a different animal, but with a bit of forethought you can create a solid rotation for yourself without dealing with the pitfalls common to a tiny social scene.

Why Tolstoy Rejected The Church

April 23, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Everyone knows there are innumerable sects of Christianity. Yet nearly all denominations have some sort of church. Have you ever wondered, "Why do we need a church at all?"

Leo Tolstoy was not only the most famous and revered of Russian authors, but also one of the most devout Christians of his day and one of the fiercest opponents of his church. How could a man at once honor his faith yet hate his church?

I now present to you one of the more interesting arguments you will ever read.

> In this [living as a Christian] consists the difference between the teaching of Christ and all other religious teachings, — a difference consisting not in the difference of demands, but in the difference of the way of guiding men. Christ gave no definitions of life. He never established any institutions, he never established marriage. But people who do not understand the peculiarities of Christ's teaching, who are accustomed to external tenets, and who wish to feel themselves in the right, as does the Pharisee, contrary to the whole spirit of Christ's teaching, — have out of the letter made an external teaching of rules, and have substituted this teaching for Christ's true teaching of the ideal.

The bolded above is indisputable. Both marriage and places of worship existed long before Christ, and many of Christ's disciples were asked to leave their families to instead seek God.

But even if Christ never advocated a church, it doesn't mean he was opposed to one either. How can Tolstoy make the leap from Christ's agnosticism of the Church to full blown heresy?

> The church teachings, which call themselves Christian, have in all manifestations of life substituted for Christ's teaching and ideal the external injunctions and rules which are contrary to the spirit of the teaching.

Thus Tolstoy claims that the Church offers rules when instead true Christians must only concern themselves with ideals, as rules are contrary to Christ's teachings. From earlier in the essay, Tolstoy writes,

> An ideal is only then an ideal when its realization is possible in the idea only, in thought, when it presents itself as attainable only at infinity, and when, therefore, the approach to it is infinite. If an ideal were not only attainable, but we could imagine its realization, it would cease to be an ideal. Such is Christ's ideal, the establishment of the kingdom of God upon earth…

Because ideals can never be realized, any attempts to make "rules" about how to achieve an ideal will automatically fail. Therefore Christian Churches which give rules to its members are misleading them from Christ's true teachings. Tolstoy continues,

> Only because over a small part of the persons united the clergy performs a certain ceremony, called church marriage, people of our world naively or hypocritically imagine that they are living in matrimony.
> There cannot be and never has been such a thing as Christian marriage, just as there has not been and cannot be a Christian divine service (Matt. vi. 5-12; John iv. 21), nor any Christian teachers and fathers (Matt. xxiii. 8-10), nor Christian property, nor army, nor courts, nor state.
> Thus the early Christians always understood it.
> The Christian's ideal is love of God and his neighbour, self- renunciation in order to serve God and his neighbour; carnal love, marriage, means serving oneself, and therefore is, in any case, a hindrance in the service of God and men, and, consequently, from the Christian point of view, a fall, a sin.

And so Tolstoy justified his departure from the Church, for not being Christian. Amidst the discussion on the necessity of the Church, Tolstoy touches upon many other subjects relevant to Christians, including why Christianity is superior to other religions, why chastity is such a high virtue, and the moral failings of Russia (which oddly enough sound just like criticisms many would make of American culture).

I recommend this essay because it shows a powerful way of thinking while giving the reader an insight into one of the most brilliant minds who ever lived. You can read the essay in it's entirety here.

A Tale Of Two Cities

April 23, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

A Tale Of Two Cities is a historical fiction novel written in 1859 that takes place in England and France around 1776. It focuses on the plight of the poor in those two countries as French peasantry begin its revolution against the aristocrats.

The writing style is very descriptive. The action moves slow but clear images pop in your mind of the characters and the environment. You can argue that this book is just as much about mood as it is plot. The author, Charles Dickens, forms characters whose motives you understand. I had to stop every couple of paragraphs to imagine what the characters must be feeling and what they will do next.

The only problem is that it takes a while for you to feel invested in the story, until all the odd bits and ends he introduces come together in the second half. I wouldn't be surprised if many readers quit this book well before the payoffs start to arrive.

> The water of the fountain ran, the swift river ran, the day ran into evening, so much life in the city ran into death according to rule, time and tide waited for no man, the rats were sleeping close together in their dark holes again, the Fancy Ball was lighted up at supper, all things ran their course.
> Loading...

The book is at its best during the revolution when the peasants begin hunting for those who wronged them. The aristocracy reaped what they sowed with its unfair treatment of the peasants, but the rageful hunting and rapid denouncements should give pause to any man who is a success in this world. What will happen to him if the poor and weak suddenly become the strong? Dickens seems to perfectly balance sympathy for the peasants with hints that their bloodthirst went too far.

If you attempt this book, and I must warn you that it's not an easy read, I think you will be rewarded in the end when the loose ends get tied. Every scene and chapter has purpose. As I approached the end, and the suspense built to a fever pitch, I read even slower so it wouldn't end. This is the hallmark of a good story. A Tale Of Two Cities is a rich book with rich characters and a plot that describes a fascinating period of mankind's history. If you have the time and patience, I highly recommend it.

The 15 Magical Years of Womanhood

One of the bigger problems plaguing today's woman is that she's lost touch with one of her most powerful evolutionary advantages—a well-calibrated internal clock. Remnants of this ancient gift are still visible, if you look closely. On average, I'd say, women are more consistently punctual and meet deadlines more often than men. In college, it was always the girls who left the library the earliest, having finished their work for the day. Past, say, 10 pm, the 24-hour library on campus always became a brutal sausage fest. Say what you will about the quality of the work, the female gender—everything else being equal—is better at getting shit done on time.

Whenever I've kept a girl around long-term, my efficiency has skyrocketed since, like the Microsoft Office paper clip, they're constantly nagging me back on track. "Come to bed." "We have to leave by 12 to get there on time." "I'm hungry and don't like eating dinner after 8." The other day, I cooked a huge dinner—from scratch—at 3:30 in the morning. I'm single.

For much of human history, this monitoring of time included a keen awareness of the time-limited nature of their fertility and their most valuable evolutionary commodity—their beauty. A properly raised girl used her prime years to lock down a quality man who, enamored with her youthful charms—and the prospect of enjoying them for several more years—signed up for the long-term membership. Women made sacrifices, but understood that the alternative was also a sacrifice.

But more recently, the false promises of feminism have lured girls away from this system—which worked for millennia. For at least the last two generations of women, an ideology that promised them that they could enjoy the benefits of their prime years indefinitely, while also getting everything men were getting, was devastatingly persuasive and irresistible. It seems foolhardy in retrospect—and from our male vantage point—but who could blame them?

Between, say, the ages of 15 and 30, the world is theirs. A woman of even average looks, but a well-kept physique, enjoys a massive amount of power and access. And the cocktail is absolutely intoxicating: constant attention, countless invitations, daily freebies, instant credibility for no other reason than you're pretty and female. Life is a fast-moving party, with more offers and activity than you could possibly service. If you shadow a hot girl for so much as an hour, you can see the stratospheric quality-of-life they enjoy. In the U.S., their day-to-day is the closest thing we have to royalty status without being famous. The promise of enjoying that for life is seductive, even though it should be patently obvious that–like anything else with all upside and no downside–it's simply too good to be true.

The great equalizer, of course, has always been that it does come to end. Men may not, on average, enjoy this kind of reward early in life, but their access increases as they enter their late 20s and 30s. Despite minor adaptations to current realities, and individual variance, the arc of a woman's beauty—and, by extension, power—has remained largely unchanged for generations.

By this age, most girls—with the exception of the latest of bloomers—will have gotten their first taste of the power of their femininity. Boys at their school will have already started doing things for them, in lame attempts to win their favor, and men on the outside will have started to lavish them with attention–setting off a long flow of ego-stroking validation. But, most girls will still be new at manipulating this new tool that's fallen into their lap. What's more, their underage status limits their opportunities to hone it, though Facebook, cell phones, and general social permissiveness has accelerated this process in recent years.

Loading…

Age 17

By their senior year in high school, most girls have at least two years of experience using their female power. As a result, they've developed intermediate girl-game, which places them (a conservative) 8-10 years ahead of boys her age in terms of social intelligence. They spend a lot of their day admiring their own (and their peers') beauty—mostly by constantly snapping pictures of each other and attention-whoring them out to their growing chorus of fawning admirers in the digital world.

Age 22

The four-year carnival called college is coming to a close. During this time, she's enjoyed the absolute ride of her life—non-stop parties, trips, and gorging herself on the buffet of cock available to an American college girl—without the uncomfortable social stigmas of generations past. At a time where previous generations of women were getting nervous if they hadn't snared a husband, today's girl is "just getting started." At this age, today's girl is irretrievably drunk on her power. Any cautionary advice will be greeted with hubristic ridicule and disbelief.

Age 25

The first alerts—which go unheeded—that this ride isn't forever start to rear their heads. The combination of a few harsh pump-and-dumps, and the knowledge that some of her smarter friends are getting hitched, start to impart a hard edge on her personality. Still, with ample beauty left over, most girls will continue to draw from the bank account with impunity.

Age 29

After repeated pressings of the snooze button, it starts getting harder to ignore the clangor of the alarm clock. Having gotten her fill on the party lifestyle—and starting to feel, if not fully understand, the diminished effectiveness of her fading looks—she declares herself "ready to settle down." Regrettably, the combination of having very little beauty-capital remaining and impossibly high standards—the product of years of enjoying the high life at the expense of her future solvency—will conspire to keep her single.

Age 32

The magical years are officially gone, and the long descent to complete invisibility to the opposite sex is well underway. Thanks to social programming (e.g., Sex in the City and the myth that "a woman's sexual prime is in her 30s"), she can rationalize that her "Mr. Right" will arrive any minute. However, she's likely to become little more than a second- or third-stringer in a player's long roster of options. A few of these women will get bailed out by blue-pill betas, who still buy into the marriage trap, and don't realize (or care) they're buying a used car with the odometer rolled back. But this marriage is almost certainly doomed to divorce-failure, since nothing can ever compete with her 15-year prime-time binge. She will be nagged by dissatisfaction the moment her last party–her wedding–ends.

She enjoyed the Sweet 15, but she'll enjoy little more.

Face Is Everything

April 24, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Inevitably you will one day be asked if you are an ass or tits man. My response has always been "neither."

Every man has his own tastes when it comes to women. Ask 100 men what is their favorite physical feature about a girl and you will get some varied answers. Some like them tall, some like them short, some like big asses while others love fake tits. And despite how much of a physical reaction a great pair of milky white breasts or the tautest of butts may cause a virile man, I've personally found one feature that — if encountered on a high level — time and time again will stop me in my tracks and even at times leave me speechless: the face.

Assuming everything else checks out (e.g. skinny, feminine, no flapjack tits or ginormous Colombian-style ass) then it's really hard to not say face trumps the rest. I'd take a perfect face over perfect tits/ass any day of the week.

Why Face?

It"s the only thing that will get me to stare in awe, almost as if I don't believe something like that can exist. Let's be honest, I definitely do appreciate the body – a lot. But while I will likely do a double-take of a nice set of cans, it will be a fleeting moment. The flawless face however will keep me thinking for a while. Maybe it's the rarity — how often do you really see a girl with a beautiful face? Now compare that with how often you see a great ass or a nice pair of tits.

Or maybe it's because absent drastic measures like plastic surgery or botox, there is really nothing a girl can do to "fix" a bad face. Therein lies its uniqueness and value. Of course there is makeup, but eventually you will see her without makeup and in reality, no amount of foundation or blush will hide massive pimples or change how crooked that sniffer is. Compare that with other "problems." Fat? Diet. Short? Wear heels. Flat ass? Squats. Small tits? Push up bra (though here you can argue for a boob job).

It's Our Nature

Numerous studies have shown that infants and small children who are arguably born with blank slates and minds without previous influence are drawn to more beautiful faces. So maybe, it is our nature to value face so highly. Granted, they probably didn't place an infant on the ground and see if it crawls to a fat or skinny chick first, but these studies still do tell us something:

Loading...

> The visual preferences of human infants for faces that varied in their attractiveness and is their symmetry about the midline were explored. The aim was to establish whether infants' visual preference for attractive faces may be > mediated by the vertical symmetry of the face. Chimeric faces, made from photographs of attractive and unattractive female faces, were produced by computer graphics. Babies looked longer at normal and at chimenic attractive faces than at normal and at chimeric unattractive faces. There were no developmental differences between the younger and older infants: all preferred to took at the attractive faces. Infants as young as 4 months showed similarity with adults in the 'aesthetic perception' of attractiveness and this preference was not based on the vertical symmetry of the face.

Another study:

> Psychologist Alan Slater of Exeter University showed pictures rated by adults as being more or less attractive to babies which were, on average, 2 and a half days old and found that babies invariably stared longer at faces which adults had rated as more attractive.
> Babies are born with an eye for beauty. Infants only hours old will choose to stare at an attractive face rather than an unattractive one…According to Alan Slater, a developmental psychologist at the University of Exeter, humans may have a biologically ingrained preference for beauty.

Ingredients

Most people know a beautiful face when they see one. But some characteristics tend to surface more often than not when one describes or sees a flawless face.

- Eyes. Usually light eyes take the cake here, but frequently enough a girl with those massive brown or black eyes will make you stop and stare.
- Skin. My personal favorite. If you have ever been to Iceland, you will know what I'm talking about. The girls there all have this glowing silky skin sans any zits, creases or other deficiencies. The smoothness of perfect skin is really a thing of beauty.
- Symmetry. If she has a snargletooth on one side, or she has a lazy eye, chances are she is not pushing the 9+ level on the face scale. Studies have also shown that symmetry indicates beauty as discussed above.
- Teeth. The pearly whites, coupled with small teeth can lead to some serious good looks. Oh, and none of that gummy smile shit…

Conclusion:

Breasts, butt, stomach, legs, hair, youth, and maybe even the propensity for bisexuality — all very important and attractive features of any woman. All I'm saying is if/when the time comes for a longer term situation with a girl, I can make some sacrifices, but face will not be one of them.

Not Dead, Can’t Quit

April 24, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

Several years ago I chanced upon an interesting memoir written by a former Navy SEAL called Lone Survivor. The book was about the harrowing account of Navy SEAL Marcus Luttrell’s fight for survival after having been critically wounded in a battle against Taliban fighters in Afghanistan. Prior to reading the book I had little knowledge about the SEALs beyond the fact that they were a group of elite Special Forces fighters that were a part of the United States Navy. I found the book so enthralling that I quickly devoured several more books on the same topic. Each book offered a unique glimpse into the world of a Special Forces warrior, from how they physically and mentally prepared themselves for combat to their sense of brotherhood and community.

Among the many books that I read there was one in particular that I found to offer the soundest advice for men. The book was called Unleash the Warrior Within by Richard Machowicz.

Let me briefly tell you his story.

When Richard Machowicz – or “Mack” as people like to call him – joined the United States Navy he was a gangly 6’0” and 150lbs teenager. He had joined the Navy with dreams of becoming a SEAL but everyone told him that he was too small and scrawny to ever make it through the arduous training. In fact someone even bet him $100,000 that he would never become a SEAL.

This didn’t stop Mack. If anything it fuelled the fire within him to succeed. He used his critics and doubters (i.e., haters) as a motivational tool.

Mack eventually passed the physical screening test to enter SEAL training. Just prior to heading off to BUD/S (SEAL training school), he received a picture from a friend’s brother who was already a SEAL. The photograph was meant to inspire and motivate him. The picture had a bunch of SEALs fully kitted jumping out of an airplane. But what was really interesting about the picture was what Mack had discovered written on the back:

"A man can only be beaten in two ways: if he gives up or he dies."

When Mack read that statement he found it to be so simple yet profound. It cut right to the heart of the matter. In fact, so much so that he decided to use the phrase as a sort of mantra (or positive affirmation) during SEAL training. He found the original quote to be a bit too long so he decided to shorten it to the following:

"Not Dead Can't Quit."

In the book Unleash the Warrior Within Mack talks about how difficult SEAL training was but no matter how tired and cold he was, no matter how bad the training got, as long as he had a single breath or pulse in his body he would not quit, period. That was the level of guts it took for him to make it through the training.

Mack eventually went on to become a Navy SEAL for ten years. Some of you may even recognize him now from some of his television work such as Future Weapons and The Deadliest Warrior.

After reading Mack's story, you can't help but wonder if you are bringing that same level of commitment to your goals. Are you willing to pay the price to succeed? If not, maybe you just don't want it bad enough. Mack gives you the sort of plain, no non-sense advice that every guy needs. "Not dead, can't quit" is about as simple as it gets.

There are a lot of self help books out there today, but very few that offer advice from a masculine perspective. I highly recommend people check out Mack's book, Unleash the Warrior Within for a fresh perspective.

Why Are Rappers Acting Like Women?

April 25, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I wrote not too long ago about the growing levels of emasculation we're seeing in modern hip-hop, despite it generally being credited as part of a highly masculine culture. For all of the posing and machismo we hear about, there is an inordinate amount of feminine whining and feminine styling among this culture's male adherents.

One of the issues I mentioned in that post related to the culture's obsession with "snagging the bad bitch":

> Snagging "the bad bitch" is another way to show one's manhood. Again, you can't just bang her. You gotta talk about it, rap about it, or tape it if you can. The world needs to know that you have the girl they want. Not necessarily the girl you want, but the one that they want.
> This is similar in some ways to how women often choose men based in large part on their status or ability to impress her peers. This growing internalization of female attraction cues is leading to a larger number of male groupies in the world of hip-hop, men who (like women) prioritize status and peer approval over raw physical attraction.

In short, men in this culture are showing their weakness and insecurity in their obsession with "the bad bitch" or the female with status tied to her appearance or reputation. They feel too often the need to get the girl not merely because they are men and they find her attractive, but because they need to impress other men. This is exceedingly insecure, bitch-made behavior, but it is common in this culture.

The artist Ray J has recently delivered a piece of work that embodies these concerns I spoke about then. For those who don't know, Ray J is a 32 year old rapper/R&B singer. He's not totally irrelevant—several years ago he delivered a top 3 certified platinum hit and has managed to see a couple of other songs and albums get some recognition. He's also had a reality show.

The thing Ray J is most known for by laymen today, however, is probably his relationship with Kim Kardashian, which yielded the infamous sex tape.

The title of Ray J's newest musical masterpiece? "I Hit It First".

Alright, so I'm sure I don't need to spell it out for you—the song is about Kim Kardashian, and how he supposedly beat everyone else to her vagina.

Let's examine some of the lyrics:

> She might move on to rappers and ballplayers
> But we all know I hit it first
> I hop in the club and boppers show love, and I don't even put in work
> I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it first
> I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it, I hit it first
> And if you were to come back to me
> Girl I know just why you'd choose me
> And if you were to come back to me
> Girl, I'll get it wet — jacuzzi
> And if you were to come back to me girl
> We'll make another movie

In typical Hip-hop fashion, Ray J feels the need to tout his ability to appeal to random women upon his sighting in a club. This is meant to indicate his masculinity—he's a player, he's a baller, blah blah blah.

And yet, at the same time, he's writing a song about one female.

Think about this for a second. If you're truly the kind of man who can get attractive women interested at first glance as you claim, why are you obsessing over one girl? If you've got fine females in your corner on a regular basis, why would you feel the need to try and brag about having had sex with just one? How is it that she could remain on your mind a decade after you hit it?

Loading…

Furthermore, why would you even suggest the notion of returning to that female when you have so many young, hot "boppers in the club" that allegedly want to get at you as soon as they spot you? Kim Kardashian was 23 when the sex tape was made. She’s 32 and knocked up now with quite a bit more mileage (Reggie Bush, Kris Humphries, Mile Austin, Kanye West and a bunch of other dudes have been there since Ray), and now you want her back?

This is a perfect illustration of the emasculating nature of modern urban/hip-hop culture, which has begun to turn men into women and women into men.

The culture assigns praise to men who get with women of a certain “status”. Men then proceed to gossip and brag about their sexual conquests in a manner reminiscent of the way a young hypergamous female enters discourse with her peer group about her sexual success with an alpha male. They even proceed to feud about these conquests in a way reminiscent of the high school cat fight (though more violent). Their insecurity and neverending pursuit of validation is reminiscent of a teenage girl, yet persists well into their own adulthood (Ray J is 32).

In essence, men become those hypergamous groupies in the urban community. They catch oneitis for certain girls who have enough status to boost them in the eyes of their peers, and proceed to try and feed off of that boost whenever they do get close to those females. Ray J's behavior is merely symptomatic of a much larger trend—it isn't uncommon for young men in this culture to create facebook albums, twitter messages, and or their own amateur mixtapes for the purpose of letting the world know who they fucked, when they fucked her, and why it makes them special and worthy of validation.

Discretion is one of the simplest ways for women to separate the masculine chaff from the actual wheat. Truly confident, high-value men understand the expediency of maintaining a degree of privacy and exclusivity in their relationships, and don't feel the need to completely undo that understanding in a bid to attention-whore like a bitch.

I am not saying that there are no decent masculine examples that can be drawn from modern hip-hop, but I am saying that one needs to be careful and increasingly more selective in turning to the genre as their source for these things. Despite its reputation, the culture is filled with men who behave as though they are the opposite of the confident players they claim to be, acting instead like insecure, thirsty attention whores. There's no room for that kind of thing in the heart or mind of the man concerned with self-improvement.

The American Woman Has Hit An All-Time Low

April 25, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

As the events surrounding the Boston bombings continue to unfold, lost in the noise of the terror is the wife of one of the bombers. Her name is Katherine Russell, and she is a profound marker in the decline of the American woman. Allow me to explain.

Born in North Kingstown, Rhode Island, Katherine was the oldest of three girls. She grew through an ordinary American life with regular high school proclivities, such as playing the saxophone and doing other high school spirit day activities.

In short, there was nothing special about this woman. She is common American female stock. And that is precisely why the implications are so disturbing.

According to reports, she met Tamerlan Tsarnaev in her Freshman or Sophomore year of college at Suffolk University. Tsarnaev, a recent immigrant from Chechnya, was a young boxer and drinker. He met her at a nightclub, most likely in one of the many immigrant nightclubs that populate the Boston area. Although it is unclear how he seduced her, my guess is that he got her with some Muslim game: intimidating gazes, ramrod straight stances, bottle service, congregating with all of the other jacked immigrants in the nightclub with their top two shirt buttons undone, and then inviting girls back to his table to talk.

Most likely they both frequented the same nightclubs when he noticed her, and made a few attempts to get her back to his place before he went for the close. Given that she was an American woman, she put out right away as she did for so many other men in her freshman and sophmore years.

Wouldn’t you hit it? I know I would.

Of course, given the American dating scene we all know so well, it's to be expected that their relationship did not consummate into monogamy right away. Most likely she was seeing a few other men, and meanwhile, Tsarnaev, who already had no respect for American culture, was enjoying trying to bang as many non-Islamic Ameri-skanks as he could.

As Tsarnaev was quoted saying, "I don't have a single American friend. I don't understand them." So we know this guy was like many Islamic immigrants who viewed American culture as toxic and full of broken women who are only good for one thing. On this point, I can agree with the Muslims.

However, this all came to a boiling point. With his increasing alienation from American culture, Tsarnaev probably felt a sense of abandonment on how women were throwing their youth away for worthless careers and empty promises. He became more in tune with his faith, went to more Islamic congregations, and fell in love with Katherine.

Now, defenders of American women might think, "Katherine was unaware of how abusive Tsarnaev was before she got involved with him, making it harder for her to leave him." But the truth is Tsarnaev was already known as a violent man and had been arrested for domestic abuse, before she met him.

> In 2009, Tamerlan Tsarnaev was arrested and charged with domestic assault and battery for assaulting his girlfriend in Cambridge, police records show.
> "Girlfriend called 911 on her cell phone indicating that she was beat up by her boyfriend," the police report states. The woman was described as "crying hysterically" and told police that she had been yelling at Tsarnaev "because of another girl." When asked if he had hit his girlfriend, Tsarnaev told the officer on duty, "Yes, I slapped her," the police report states.

And since this occurred in 2009, we know that Tsarnaev and Katherine had already met and most likely banged by that point. So Katherine knew this guy was a piece of shit from the get-go, but most likely willfully ignored it in favor of her lusts.

It was not long after Katherine became involved with the mass murderer before she started to receive regular beatings as well:

> Her roommate at Suffolk University, who asked not to be identified, told CBS News that Tsarnaev had also been violent with Russell and may have been arrested for assaulting her in 2009 as well.
> Loading…

Being that Katherine was a young American woman, she most likely did not see Tsarnaev, or any man she was banging, as anything beyond fun. But because Tsarnaev was a violent man, using force, coercion, and beatings to keep her from straying, she stayed. Any hint of infidelity resulted in some kind of punishment for Katherine.

> Neighbors indicate that the Tsarnaev household was probably not a very happy one.
> A man who lived next-door to the Tsarnaevs on Norfolk Street in Cambridge told The Boston Globe that he heard yelling "constantly" and that police would often show up at the Tsarnaevs' apartment. Another unidentified neighbor spoke of "screaming and arguments," The Globe reported.

I am not surprised that it took the violence of Tsarnaev's level to keep a young and beautiful girlfriend in Boston. I know that hookup culture well, and girls actively dump and cheat on men whenever they so please. Men are more likely to be pump and dumped than the women are.

Thus we reach the disturbing conclusion of this story – Katherine was not a victim, she was not a special case, she was an ordinary American woman who represented her culture in every way, and that is precisely why she betrayed it. She was given everything a woman could want in life, and instead she choose to find something, someone – anyone – who could take it away from her. Unsatisfied with her life of being catered on beck and call, of whim and notion, she was drawn to the first man who would remove it all and place chains around her – even if that man hated the country who raised her.

She worked 70-80 hours per week while he collected welfare.

> Russell worked 70 to 80 hours, 7 days a week as a home health-care aide, her lawyer, Amato DeLuca, told reporters, and she thought her husband was caring for their toddler at home while she was at work.

And since Katherine was nothing more than an "All-American girl," it is reasonable to conclude that most American women are exactly like Katherine – unhappy with their spoiled lives who would gladly give it up just for a chance to be enthralled by a powerful man. The women of this country have no more loyalty to the land that raised them, but instead are opportunists looking for a chance to submit in pleasure.

Until that opportunity comes, they will hate on all men who try to be anything good towards them, and act out against them – by denying them sex and relationships, by throwing them in jail with trumped up charges, by stealing their money under the pretense of marriage – until they are forced to stop. And it doesn't take much to stop them – even a welfare bum like Tsarnaev could do it.

Now, I do not think any man should go around beating women just so he can keep them. This is obviously a shitty, destructive way to live that will only cause you more pain and unhappiness in the long run. Any woman that requires beatdowns in order to remain faithful is a garbage woman who will never make you happy. And yet with the extreme shortage of eligible American women, what is a good American man supposed to do?

Just remember: whereas in many countries around the world, women are forced to endure domestic abuse from their husbands with no hope of justice, here in America we have women rushing with open legs into the crotches of abusers despite a legal system that is designed to "empower" them. I hope your exit strategy is going well.

UPDATE: Since publishing this article on April 25th, I have since been alerted to the following report which has been tracking the "tens of thousands" of Westerners who convert to Islam each year, 75 percent of whom are women. Feels so good to be so right.

When East Meets West

China is going through a cultural crisis due to a huge generation gap between parents who lived in rural communes and their children who crave smartphones and Western values. At the same time, Chinese culture still expects children to take of the parents, and are constantly reminded of their "duty" through a variety of shaming tactics. Chinese parents actually push children into buying apartments they can barely afford to guarantee they'll have a place to stay when they get old, as this article in Aeon Magazine describes.

> 'I have a friend the same age as me,' Luo the young professional said, 'whose parents just paid the down-payment on her apartment. But her mom has been staying with her since November, and she wants to stay on. It's a one-bedroom flat.' Buying their children apartments isn't just a simple investment for parents, but a guarantee, at least in their minds, of an old age spent in their children's house.

With this backdrop, the Chinese approach to dating appears to be transactional, based mostly on resources instead of love.

> The media often deplore the commercialised nature of young love, exemplified in 2010 by Ma Nuo, a contestant on a dating show; when asked by an unemployed contender if she would ride with him on his bike, she replied: 'I'd rather cry in a BMW than laugh on a bicycle.' It's true that the bling-laden snapshots of triumphant gold-diggers on dating sites and boastful blogs are deeply off-putting. But the criteria that parents give matchmakers, or advertise on placards that some of them carry around parks at the weekend while looking for suitable spouses for their unmarried offspring, are just as centered around salary, car and apartment.

Our Indian correspondent in the field shared similar sentiments with regard to the pressure that his parents placed on finding a mate, seemingly above his best interests. Why are Asian parents so vested in their children's spousal selection?

> At university, Sally dated a rural boy who was a student representative and, highly unusually, a sincere believer in Communism. 'He was so honest,' she told me, ruefully. 'He wouldn't even take pencils from the student council room to use for himself.'
> But he couldn't live up to the standards that Sally and her parents expected. She wanted a boyfriend who could buy her the phones and handbags she aspired to, while her parents wanted someone from a wealthy or well-connected family who could walk into a guaranteed career after university. She soon dumped him and, helped by a new nose paid for by her mother, snared a wealthy boy on campus.

> Loading...
> A couple of years into the new relationship, however, she found the positions reversed. After being introduced to her boyfriend's parents, his news was grim. 'I can't marry you,' he told her bluntly. 'My parents expect me to marry a girl of my own class.'

> 'My mother keeps calling me and reminding me I only have a couple more years to find someone,' commented a weary 25-year-old friend. 'Of course, she wants me to pick one of the boring losers she keeps trying to set me up with.'

You know a country is doing well economically when the women cast aside "boring" men and instead hold out for an exciting alpha. I've never heard the women of Ukraine complain that their men are boring. Could increasing use of the word "boring" by females to describe the opposite sex be a reliable way to predict economic prosperity, sort of like the Big Mac index?

> In response to social and parental prodding toward placing material concerns first, some young Chinese have invented a new term, 'naked marriage,' meaning getting wed purely for love, without house, ring, ceremony or car. The idea promises romance, but opinion is decidedly mixed, even from the young. A 2010 poll on sohu.com found that the majority of young women opposed the idea, seeing it as a way for men to dodge their responsibilities. Tellingly, the majority of young men supported it.

Western man, in spite of the poor female selection he must face, at least doesn't have his parents hanging over his head, pressuring him not only on which woman to date, but to also to buy an apartment so they can move in and mooch off him while shaming him out of bachelorhood. Someone always has it worse, I suppose.

> It takes a certain grit to dodge convention altogether. Luo, the young professional, saw no need to play the dating game at all, instead living with a moderately impoverished foreigner in his mid-thirties. 'My mother has stopped pestering me about it, but I know she'd rather I was looking for a conventional Chinese guy, with an apartment and a career. My father says it's OK because my > boyfriend is English, not a Yankee or a Jap.

With Chinese youth rejecting their parents values, eager to hop on a Western-style carousel, are we looking at the potential for a poosy paradise eruption in five or so years? Only time will tell.

Title Of The Post

April 26, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

Light-hearted introductory acknowledgment designed to re-familiarize the readership with my persona since it's been a week since I last posted. Brief casual statement to launch content.

Setting the stage in a near-combative way, but not overdoing it; don't want to turn the readers off yet. Immediate humorous statement giving a hat-tip to the subculture in order to balance out the dickishness of the previous statement. Question or comment that strongly alludes to the title of the post.

Bold statement symbolizing my willingness to "go there." Anecdotal evidence, conjecture, and personal opinion followed by the promise of scientific evidence to back it up. Preemptive slap at the guys who will disagree with this post for no other reason than they're the type who could point out 10 things wrong with a newborn baby. Get the article back on track with a supportive statement that ends in a clever restating of the title of the post.

Haters will have already identified a phrase or two to finger-fuck to death in the comments section by now; add statement to piss off aspies too. Nugget of wisdom to remind the majority of the readership that something truly worthwhile is on its way. Supposedly keen insight that's nothing more than an old Roissy concept from 2009 passed off as my own and retooled to support the title of the post. Restate the problem clearly and boldly.

Blame it all on feminism, fat chicks, Facebook, or manginas. Assert alpha dominance by being a complete dick in a way that's hard to argue with; no time for hyperbole since this is the one-liner everyone will tweet.

Posted 15 minutes ago and somebody already hates it. The rest of my day will revolve around pleasing people at work; but I didn't please this guy and that makes me feel better.

Over the life of the post, help 23 men and piss off 380,712 fat chicks, feminists, manginas, AMOGs, aspie nerds, and those Christian dudes who are absolutely obsessed with the location and proper handling of other men's genitalia.

Not a bad return for 3 hours of effort.

How To Tame A Clingy Girl

April 27, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

A friend of mine recently met a respectable young lady who, after imbibing extreme amounts of alcohol, whisked him away to his dorm room for love making as the rest of us left for the day's events. It was 3 in the afternoon, a solid start to any night. After their fun they caught up with us at the venue, hand in hand all butterflies and smiles. From what I remember, she didn't part from his side.

I chalked their closeness up to the excitement they were sharing, and sub-par game on his part, but a few weeks later what he thought was some no-strings-attached casual sex turned out to be a full fledged clinger situation. He brought up her incessant texting and suggestions for dates over beers with our group and from what I gather he made some very grave errors.

He was seeing her multiple times a week, letting her stay over, doing things the morning after, having long text conversations, and going on dates. He'd gone too far down the 'boyfriend' path and she was obsessing over him. After a week or two of this he'd had enough, he called her up and gave her it on straight and narrow.

"You're being too clingy, I was under the impression this was casual. I didn't think we were dating."

He thought he'd won when she called him an asshole and stopped texting, but little did he know that at that moment she wanted him more than ever. A day later he brings her up again saying she'd apologized for calling him names and that she wanted to make things work.

With just a few precautionary measures he could have avoided this whole situation. There is an art to keeping things 'casual' especially when it comes to clingy girls.

What Constitutes A Clinger?

The number one trait of a clinger is that of neediness. She will text you constantly because she is seeking attention. She will ask why you didn't reply quickly, she will subtly, or otherwise, ask your whereabouts. Even though you're miles away it still feels like she's breathing down your neck.

Clingers are usually very physical right off the bat. She will hang off of you, try to hold your hand and give an amazing blow job. This might seem nice until she follows you around like a lost puppy or won't let you leave her side. Unsettling escalations of future plans including: what you two are going to do a week from now, a month from now, and when you're married. She will ask a lot about your friends and try to integrate into your social circle as quickly as possible.

In short a clingy girl is like a bad smell that follows you from room to room. Once its too late its damn near impossible to get her off your back, but there are some things you can do even before you two have sex.

Pre-Emptive Measures

While the following are all around solid tips, I'm tailoring this for those who find themselves in potential clinger territory. Maybe you only got a makeout the first date, but she was very affectionate (physically), trying to cuddle and hold hands. Maybe after this date she texts you as soon as she leaves saying how much she enjoyed herself (a great sign), but follows that up later with a lot more texting pushing for a second date with relationship connotations such as dinner or a walk on the beach.

What you want to be doing here is leading the interaction and limiting the time she feels you've spent together. Note these are all assuming a solid first date where she shows a lot of interest, so much so that you suspect she might be clingy. Try these:

- Limit texting to mainly logistics, same with calling. Don't have a conversation especially since she is already showing a lot of interest.
- No 'formal' or 'romantic' dates. If you had a few drinks at a bar then went back to your place then just get her to come over again for liquor and a movie.
- See her once a week MAX (applies moreso post-bang)
- Do not bring her into your social circle and do not venture into hers. You want your 'relationship' to just be you two, she can't form any bonds with people you know, or know too much about your life, or it will give her more to hold on to once the neediness starts.
- Keep physical interaction to a minimum. Don't cuddle with her on the couch, don't give her lots of hugs, hold her hand or touch her too much (some of this is a given). She will become too familiar with your warmth.
- Be dismissive or outright ignore any requests. If you don't reply to a text and you phone the next day she might ask "Are you mad at me why didn't you reply?" Ignore her question and start talking about whatever you were going to talk to her about (again applies moreso post-bang).

Post-Bang Maneuvers

So you've kept her at a baseline level of attraction and have set the tone of things. She understands you are laid back and just want to hang out. She gets that you prefer talking in real life over texting, and she knows you don't bring her to meet your friends because you prefer just the two of you hanging out. What happens once you two start having sex and she starts bringing up you being her boyfriend?

To me the best way to make a woman understand that you two are friends with benefits who just keep things casual is to make her come to that conclusion herself. Based on the pre-emptive measures above she values the time you two spend together. Normal girls will understand this and won't push for a relationship. A clingy girl will latch on to the small amount of affection you give her and want more. Luckily women have an extreme prowess for rationalization. Your goal now is to guide her to the conclusion that you two aren't all that serious.

1. Don't let her fuck you. Keep leading like you were before, but don't give into the temptation of a late night hookup where you'd have to sleep over. She might send you a picture of her in her panties, but you must remain strong and have sex on your terms. Otherwise she will start chipping away at your aloof exterior and have you coming back for more.

2. Limit your rapport. Since you've already had sex you don't really need to do anything more than you've already done. Don't start inside jokes, don't let her pry into your past or you unto hers, don't be her confidant, and don't give her guidance. You two have sex and hang out. That's it.

Starved of enough attention the clingy girl will rationalize that you two aren't all that serious. She'll still be madly in love with you because you are the charming and mysterious stranger who swept her off her feet, but she knows it'll be nothing more than fun and she will enjoy it while it lasts. One more piece of advice would be that you should never keep a girl around any longer than she needs to be. If she stops adding value to your life or becomes too clingy just cut her free. There are plenty of other girls out there.

3 Reasons Fine Dining Sucks

April 27, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

"Fine" dining seems to be a huge industry these days, especially in major cities. It's associated with culture, class, and sophistication. But is it all that it's cracked it to be? I am not a big fan of fine dining at all, to put it mildly, for these three reasons…

1. It's Overpriced

When you go to an "upscale" restaurant, you never get what you pay for. I don't care how "amazing" any given dish you order is. Unless it's sprinkled with actual diamonds or gold dust, it should never cost more than $35. This has nothing to do with being cheap or generous, rich or poor. When you don't get the value for the money you spend, you can't help but feel like you have been taken advantage of, even if that was voluntary on your part.

Whenever I have to go to one of those restaurants where I end up spending $80 – $100 or more per person, I can't help but start thinking about the starving children and Africa and how much they would be hating me for such necessary and overrated indulgence. I know that it's beyond cliche to say something like this, and if I really cared about those children in Africa, I would probably be there now saving lives along with Red Cross, Unicef and alike, but I feel that there is something morally wrong with paying as much as some of those "fine" restaurants charge for food that's usually not that great anyway. I am sure that you noticed that the vast majority of upscale restaurants have one quality in common – they are overrated and consistently fail to woo you with either their food or their service.

Loading…

2. It's Extremely Unhealthy

I am not sure at all which one is more unhealthy – a cheeseburger at McDonald's, that has been getting so much bad rap, or a heavy pasta dish at an Italian restaurants or a typical entree at a French restaurant full of all kinds of greasy ingredients. I can't imagine how deep fried spaghetti with tons of sauces and cream at a typical French or Italian restaurant is any healthier than bread with some average quality meat, cheese and vegetables in between. If you look at a menu of a high-end restaurant that attracts all those business people and compare it to the far more simple and less "sophisticated" menu of your local crepe cafe, you will find the latter to be so much healthier and so much more nutritious.

3. It Prevents An Intimate Connection On Dates

Going out to a high end restaurant for a date is one of the typical mistakes that guys make. Some guys do this to impress the girl they are going out with, but dining in a formal atmosphere where you are spaced far from your date will hardly be helpful to developing a romantic connection, even when the two people seem to like each other.

Some guys think that they can make up with expensive food for what they are lacking in personality and sense of humor, or what the girl they are out with is lacking in the same departments. However, going out on a date to an expensive dinner will only postpone the inevitable decline of that interaction. If there is nothing there between the two of you, there is no wine bottle or exotic dessert in the world that will make your connection any better. The fact that expensive restaurants are notorious beta male magnets doesn't help the romantic cause either.

I love eating as much as anyone else. Dining is a huge industry involving art and science. However, we should not make more out of it than it is, and we should remember that fine dining is by far not the best investment – literally, or into our health, or into our romantic interactions.

Updating Benjamin Franklin

April 28, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

With independent careers as a diplomat, scientist, businessman, statesman, printer, and writer, Benjamin Franklin was the most versatile genius ever produced in North America.

He was also a wily old hypocrite. His Autobiography—still very much worth reading today—reads like a collaboration between Andrew Carnegie and John Stuart Mill.

And yet. There is something slithery about him, this wispy-haired little Benjamin. One gets the feeling that he is trying to put something over on us. Trying to rope us into his little Benjamin-esque corral. So he can control us. And take all the cookies from the jar for himself.

He even drew up a list of "virtues" which he claims to have aspired to and followed on a daily basis. Maddening. Benjamin wants to tap us on the head–tap, tap, tap–and send us out into the pitiless world armed with nothing but his "virtues". Well, noli me tangere, Benjamin. I loathe your little checklist. Here is what he says:

> Temperance: Eat not to fullness; drink not to elevation.
> Silence: Speak not but what may benefit others or yourself; avoid trifling conversation.
> Order: Let all your things have their places; let each part of your business have its time.
> Resolution: Resolve to perform what you ought; perform without fail what you resolve.
> Frugality: Make no expense but to do good to others or yourself—i.e., waste nothing.
> Industry: Lose no time, be always employed in something useful; cut off all unnecessary actions.
> Sincerity: Use no hurtful deceit; think innocently and justly, and if you speak, speak accordingly.
> Justice: Wrong none by doing injuries, or omitting the benefits that are your duty.
> Moderation: Avoid extremes, forbear resenting injuries as much as you think they deserve.
> Cleanliness: Tolerate no uncleanliness in body, clothes, or habitation.
> Tranquility: Be not disturbed at trifles, or at accidents common or unavoidable.
> Chastity: Rarely use venery but for health and offspring, never to dullness, weakness, or the injury of your own or another's peace or reputation.
> Humility: Imitate Jesus and Socrates."

So there we have it. Benjamin's little list. And with it, he pats us on the cheeks and relegates us to slavery, while he himself does what he likes. Uns tapinhas nas bochechas, Quintusinho.

One could just cringe. Because this is the same man who fled to Philadelphia from Boston at the age of fifteen to escape his brother's tyranny, and became a fugitive in the process. The same man who, at the court of the French king at Versailles, slept with every girl he could lay his hands on; the same man who played the role of the American rube in Europe, with his affected bear-skin cap; who hoarded money and titles like an Oriental satrap; and the same man who had several illegitimate children kept safely in the background.

But I don't resent him for this, really. I resent him for sending me out into the world with "virtues" that leave me naked, and ill-prepared for the hurly-burly, the stink, the sweat, and the eye-gouging gristle of life.

But, you see, that's the game after all, isn't it? He wants us sniffling into a wet hanky, like Paul Elam. Bemoaning your lot while doing nothing to improve it. And then going back to Benjamin and Poor Richard and whomever else for precious guidance. Long ago I broke free of you, Benjamin, and your ruinous morality.

So with my life and blood-experiences, I remedied little Benjamin. With my own list of virtues. My own code. My own creed. Nothing is so boring as metaphysics, and nothing is so important. And so here you have it:

Temperance: Be suspicious of any man who doesn't drink. He's usually concealing something. A great many things have been solved in this world with a good cocktail.

Loading...

Silence: I shall remain silent about silence.

Order: Too much order, too much pedantic organizing, often creates only a dead mechanism. I am not a mechanism. I am not a slithery Benjamin. I am a man. I contain a universe within myself. My soul–yours also–is the Axis of the World, the qutb of the mystics Ibn Arabi and Hallaj, around which the universe revolves.

Resolution, Frugality, Industry: These are the sign-posts on your journey towards your ultimate purpose. Your hunting down of your essential Blood-Spirit. Hunt it down and harpoon it, like a white whale, until it spouts black blood. Your mission in life is to learn your purpose, your innermost Blood-Spirit. Nothing was ever achieved without brutal struggle and sacrifice. Success comes when you realize no one is going to help you.

Sincerity: You owe no duty of honesty to a scoundrel. As Ernest Borgnine said in the 1969 film The Wild Bunch, "It's not your word that's important…it's who you give it to."

Justice: True justice is the knowledge that my woman cannot complete me. We are each separate, and must remain so. There are no perfect relationships. My friend cannot complete me. I must complete myself. I am the artisan of my soul. Beware any woman who wishes to "complete" you, for she harbors the unconscious desire to dethrone you and see you roll in the mud.

Soul. I am attracted to the Neoplatonism of Plotinus. My soul is part of the World-Soul. From the One emanates Intellect, which itself emanates the World Soul. My body does not contain my soul, but rather my body was generated by my soul, which preexisted the body. I am awash in the World-Soul. Because I am part of the World-Soul, my own individual soul, my essence, is eternal and indestructible. All three levels of being reside within me, and within us. You and I. My highest purpose is to rise up, by a study of virtue and philosophic truth, through the levels of being from Soul, through Intellect, to the One. To achieve union with the One, we must become that complete man, that universal man, by a regimen of disciplined study and right conduct. The greatest journey is the voyage within. This is the ultimate Good. To know that this world, and everything in it, is nothing but shadow, and illusion.

Chastity: Do not practice chastity. Passion is always a virtue as long as it is sincere. If it is insincere, it is not. Venery is good. Debauchery is not. Learn the difference.

Serenity: Moderation, tranquility, and humility will come from our knowledge of the universe within us. Seek the gods within you. Know, O my brother, that your soul is immortal, and you will never fear for anything, and you will carry all before you. How to show the immortality of the soul? Soul moves itself and matter, but it is not moved; and soul is indivisible. As the poet Richard Watson Dixon said:

> There is a soul above the soul of each,
> A mightier soul, which yet to each belongs;
> There is a sound made of all human speech,
> And numerous as the concourse of all songs:
> And in that soul lives each, in each that soul,
> Tho' all the ages are its life-time vast;
> Each soul that dies, in its most sacred whole
> Receiveth life that shall for ever last.

So this is my response to wispy-haired Benjamin. Make your virtues a pulse-pounding interplay, not a dead grocery-list. I pat you on the cheeks, Benjamin, and send you on your way. Agora vai receber uns tapinhas nas bochechas, Benjamininho.

5 Things The Corporate World Taught Me

April 28, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

When I graduated college I was going thru a bit of an identity crisis, feeling neither Colombian nor American. It was then that I realized a much-needed time at home was in order. I rejected some work offers in the states, packed my bags and left for Colombia. When I arrived I had a cultural shock, but nonetheless I managed to handle it by dividing my time between getting with girls, strenuous workouts, horse back riding and catching up with the family business.

Once settled home, my father offered me an executive position that I quickly filled and where I have worked for the last year. My father was as eager to teach me, as I was to learn, thus, I soaked up as much knowledge as I could from a man who built a leading company from scratch.

During this time I have learned invaluable lessons that will last for the rest of my life. I am still a young man with lots of things to learn, places to visit and girls to sleep with. I want to share what I have learned so far…

1. Respect is earned, not demanded.

Holding an executive position has levels of respect and even reverence that are intrinsic to it. I am often looked after and praised. But much like in the military you salute the rank and not the man. In the corporate world often time it is very much like this—people care about the position you hold instead of you.

This is particularly evident in the lower ranks of a company. They will salute you and call you sir, but when you give them your back they will mumble about how you are a lucky son of a bitch and how things were just handed to you. This is why it's far more important to earn the respect of your subordinates than to just demand it by way of your position.

I work in a mining company, where evidently there is a lot of physically demanding jobs. Being able to take your shirt off and get down to the level of an ordinary miner, helping hand to hand and not being scared of getting your hands dirty is a certain way to earn respect.

2. You are only valuable for what you can provide.

Even though this is my family's company, I would be sacked faster than I could say sorry if I made gross mistakes that constituted a loss for the company and its interests. I am only valuable as long as I can produce something, as long as I can bring something else to the table. The more rare what you provide is, the more valuable you are. This is applicable for many other fields in life, personal relations, friendships and yes, girls.

Here at ROK we have covered this issue extensively. Girls only value you for what you can provide. If you can give them a strong figure that can be solid and stable support in her life she will truly respect you. Moreover, if you can do things that she is unable to do she will be in a situation of dependency, and we all know how much feminists hate this.

A company is very similar, my subordinates respect me because I posses abilities that they do not, do the things that they can in less time and can perform under pressure in a way that many of them cannot.

Loading…

3. It takes an alpha to lead.

Being a strong leader is perhaps one of the most important characteristics you can have in the corporate world. This is why star CEO's get paid so much—it's a very hard trait to find. A true alpha can be distinguished without effort. He is immediately recognized as a leader, looked up to and looked after. The genuine alpha exudes an unmistakable confidence that transmits calm and comfort to others.

To do this in convincing fashion you will need to know your value. Knowing your value will definitely help you have and express true confidence. I don't think I need to cover the effects this will have in your daily life, your social interactions, and in your ability to impress and get girls.

4. You need game in the corporate world.

Whether you are trying to seduce a client, get better prices on tools, or a better interest rate for short-term money, you will need game. Same goes for that job interview for the job you want, or in some cases for the one you need. Confidence is a powerful tool that can open many doors, and many legs. Unsurprisingly, people in positions of power often have a great deal of confidence; this means that they can easily recognize when confidence is genuine and when it is posed. This same advice applies to girls; you are far better off being genuinely confident, thus projecting a natural vibe of superiority that no faking can attain.

5. At some point you are going to need to work very hard.

Although having an executive position is a fantastic way to earn a living, (and way better than being so corporate slave trapped in a cubicle all day, 6 days a week, 4 weeks a month), it is hard work.

I am not saying it's easier than being a miner, but when you are working a mine your only preoccupation is to break out the mineral, nothing else. In contrast an executive's normal day will involve over 200 emails, more than 100 calls and multiple unexpected issues that need immediate solving. These are all factors that add up to your stress threshold and that can make you miserable if you don't know how to handle it. It's hard work, and like everything else in life you need to get it done.

It's the same if you are trying to get in tip-top physical shape, earn a degree, or pick up a girl at a bar. You will need to work out hard and diet properly, study hard, and drop serious game. Everything worthwhile in life takes hard work, and no one else is going to get it done for you because no one cares. You are the only controlling factor of your own life and the only one capable of taking charge of it.

This is what I've learned from corporate life thus far, things that have shaped who I am and who I will become in the future. I hope this is useful to you and that it makes you a better man.

Why Christian Men Don’t Deserve Virgins

April 29, 2013 | by Edward Thatch | Link | Original Link

For years Dalrock has been one of my favorite writers. Though I rarely miss an article, I haven’t looked at the comments section in eons because nowhere else in the manosphere is there a greater chasm between my respect for an author and my utter disdain for his readership.

I had a very fortunate encounter with a young virgin Christian girl the other day, and this is the feedback I received after sending out (tasteful) photos of the encounter and sharing the story.

Said Nate: “Dalrock’s readers would fucking kill you if they saw this.”

Said Bronan: “She’s like a Dalrock reader’s wet dream. Bang of the century man.”

Said [redacted]: “Don’t send this to Dalrock. His readers would burn you at the stake lulzoloz.”

A few weeks later, Dalrock dropped this post about virginity, and as usual, he was dead-on in his assessment from a Christian perspective. Having recently found repeat success in this area, I decided to check out the comments section for the first time in ages and offer a few just the tips. Heh.

But before I could deliver my worldly wisdom, a pontificating little feller who goes by the name of “Frank” caught my attention. Writes the proud 36 year old virgin about marrying a non-virgin girl:

> Yes, that’s my dream marriage, to perpetually and subconsciously be compared to former “lovers.”

Yeah, ok. Everybody knows that virgins make better wives. I get where he’s coming from. But then in another comment, Frank got a little preachy:

> How about it’s best to save sex for marriage because to do anything otherwise is to disobey God’s word?

You may be tempted to argue with a guy like this – I know I sure was – but there’s really no point in even trying. It’s actually easier and more productive to argue with a feminist than a Christian, because there ain’t no hamster like a Holy Ghost hamster cuz a Holy Ghost hamster don’t stop.

Now you’d think that if premarital sex was that big of a deal, God would have put it in the Big Ten. But alas, as if some great Hebrew Twitter character limit had been imposed on Mt Sinai, it seems Moses had to condense the commandments down to ten, and premarital sex didn’t make the cut.

But that doesn’t matter. The bottom line is that guys like Frank and I would never see eye to eye on anything even though we were both arguing from the same bible. All that would happen if we engaged in biblical debate is that we’d end up slinging Gospoo at each other forever while some brown kid in Uzcrapistan died and went to hell after drinking the parasitic water we neglected to baptize him in.

God moves in mysterious ways.

You can't win when you argue with Christians, so for the remainder of this article let's forgo biblical debate and just use Frank's comments as a shining example of why Christian men like him in no way deserve the virgin church girl they desire. The comments section from the Dalrock article linked above sets the stage perfectly.

We open with a whiney comment from a virgin chick named alcestiseshtemoa:

> The first post is News Flash: You Probably Won't Marry a Virgin. This is going to get me slapped, or disdained, but why? Why? Why?

Frank embarrasses himself with a stunning display of White Knightery:

> Not me. My heart hearts your virginity. Don't ever let anyone treat you like something less of a human being because of it.

Then the virgin chick, overcome by the stench of beta, slaps him down:

> Thank you Frank but don't repeat the compliment. I don't need a beta orbiter.

Frank promptly acknowledges his beta orbiter status through an act of compliance with a side of butthurt:

> Duly noted. puts alcestiseshtemoa on ignore

I decided to be rude. Not my best work, but I was distracted by Family Guy reruns on TBS, so cut me some slack:

> Oh, and Frank, you're a fag dude. "I don't need a beta orbiter." Hahahahhahahahahahhahahahahahahhahahaha. Called out by a chick in your own corner of the web. Priceless.

In response, Frank gets overly theatrical and snarky in a way that's only manly when I do it:

> Whatever I said to offend you, I'm sorry and I promise I'll never do it again he says in his best beta/delta/gamma/omega voice Hugsies? holds out arms

I decided to point out the obvious:

> If the body of Christ has a vagina, it's you, bub.

Then the virgin girl made another appearance – but this time in defense of Frank. It was clear to her that Frank couldn't handle his own battles, so she lowered her wings like an old mother hen does when her biddies are in danger and offered him shelter:

> Edward Thatch, that was disrespectful of Frank. He's not a fag (virgin men are > not fags). Just leave him alone.

Now here comes the lulz. Frank, after scurrying under mother hen's wings of protection, supplicated again. Then in a failed attempt to balance out his betaness, he followed it up with a poorly delivered alpha retort that he probably lifted from ROK or le Chateau. As his comment fell flat, Jesus wept:

> Thanks for the defense, dear sister. Now shut up and go get me my sandwich. Don't forget the pickles either! You ALWAYS forget the pickles.

Frank's all-too-common toxic blend of Christian beta and horribly delivered alpha try-hard nonsense is the kind of thing that awakens the virgin church girl's inner Nero. Shit like this is why the Romans built coliseums and bred lions. Then again, guys like Frank leave the door wide open for men like me to swoop in and capitalize on the situation after they've rendered every virgin vagina within a three pew radius drier than a popcorn fart.

How did I approach my latest virgin girl? I left the cocky and aloof game in the bar where it belongs and conducted myself like a gentleman who's not ashamed of his dick. I took both of her hands, looked her straight in the eye and said:

"I'm going to kiss you now."

She responded "Why do I have the feeling that I'm going to be kissed even if I say no."

This is where the Christian beta would second-guess himself and try to convince her that he's not the kind of guy who would ever in a million years force a kiss on her.

Amateurs.

I smiled, pulled her in close and planted a big one on her.

In the church foyer.

During a missions conference.

Loading...

She rewarded my masculine confidence two nights later by giving me the virginity she had been saving for her future husband. But I can't take all the credit, because there was a spread working in my favor. Her actions were not only to reward my masculinity, but also to punish the bipolar beta behavior of the "good Christian men" like Frank who had been orbiting her like little fairies since she was 14 years old.

> These guys are sweet, but they're too sweet. I want to be the girl in the relationship. But then their sweet goes away and they say really mean and hurtful things thinking it's funny I guess, and then they go back to acting like a girl again. I can't figure these guys out – I'm like, 'can't they just be a man for one minute?'

If you're a red pill Christian man who isn't all hung up on premarital sex, and you realize cocky is only intriguing to a woman when she knows there's a cock at the end of it, then more power to you. Game on. But if you're some 30+ year old Christian virgin whining about not being able to do what I did with the kind of girl who allegedly doesn't exist anymore, here is a little advice for you:

Stop trying to be some Christian/player hybrid. You suck at both.

What do you think this is? This is the big leagues, man. We're not dealing with some church virgin who is only a virgin because she's ugly or not old enough to have consensual sex. We're not talking about your typical church slut reclaimed "born-again virgin." This is the crème de la crème; the seminary graduate who plays four different instruments; the young woman who somehow manages to be attractive in conservative apparel; the girl who loves and respects her mom and dad, wouldn't say shit if she had a mouth full of it, never misses a Sunday service, is openly submissive, leans conservative, and wants nothing more than to be a dedicated wife and a good mother someday.

You better get your act together man, or you're going to miss out. I swear that outside of cults and a few backwater farms, there can't be more than 100 girls of this quality left in America who aren't unfortunate looking, fat or acne-ridden social retards.

Would you like to know how you could have successfully cockblocked me and won the virgin girl? Well, here you go, pal. This advice is absolutely free since I wouldn't feel right about charging you for something you'll probably never use.

When men like me come around to poach your virgins…

I. Refrain from boasting about your Godliness in an attempt to make me look like a heathen.

Every time you say something boastful, I'll look at her and wink while she grins from ear to ear at your expense. This will create a form of relationship between us which automatically excludes you.

II. Resist the urge to trash me.

Her natural reaction will be to defend me, and when I handle your criticisms with grace, tact, and a wee bit of dismissiveness, she'll come to respect my judgment and follow my lead. Say what you will about me, but when my response is "Frank said that? Which one is Frank again? Nope, can't place him." you're dead in the water. In one short statement, I will have labeled you in her mind as a man who feels threatened by someone who doesn't even know he exists.

III. Don't be a Frank-like dickweed Alpha/Beta/Christian/PUA/virgin hybrid mongrel with shit game.

While you're White Knighting over her virginity, I'll be the man who kisses her lips instead of her ass. While you're negging her with stupid comments about sandwiches and pickles, I'll be the man who realizes that a base-level of masculinity is all it takes to garner and keep her attention.

IV. Stop wondering why she wants a guy like me, and realize that she actually doesn't.

She'd much rather have a Godly, non-whiney, less bitchy version of you. But since you can't deliver, I'm her only option. What's a virgin who wants to hold out til marriage going to do if there are no marriageable Christian men around and her clock starts ticking?

Me. The guy who only shows up to church once in a blue moon. The guy who does whatever the hell he wants. The guy who can quote more scripture off the cuff from memory while drunk than her pastor can with two hours of prep time. I'm the Christian bad boy extraordinaire; the irreverent backslidden black sheep with a heart of gold who treats her like a lady, loves his mother, and visits little old church ladies in the hospital.

As a woman with multiple years of proven strength of character to her credit, she could easily resist my charms. Yet she chooses not to resist because the alternative is you.

V. Don't warn her about my past; it'll just set me up to pass her shit tests like a champ.

She'll expect me to deny my past or get defensive when she brings it up. You'll be salivating in the shadows waiting for her to levy the critical blow that will thwart my attempt to gain access to her. But unfortunately for you, it'll go down like this (verbatim):

"So I hear you're some kind of a player man. Are you?"

"Thou sayest it."

Oh yeah. I can kick it up a Christian bad boy notch by quoting Jesus vs. Pontius Pilate. She's sharp as a tack, so she'll get the reference and instantly appreciate the symbolism. Then she'll laugh at me for comparing myself to Jesus, and I'll go off on some comedy routine about how I'm pretty sure one of my ancestors was Jesus' bodyguard – but he had to be let go because he clearly wasn't very good at his job.

VI. Remember that a virgin is far more valuable than a guy who hasn't gotten laid yet.

The word virgin literally means "maiden." A man can be abstinent, but he cannot be a virgin because virginity entails the safeguarding of a womb to ensure paternity. Traditionally, it's important for a woman to be a virgin, and it's important for a man to marry a virgin. Women show value by keeping their virginity, men show value by taking it. Whether this happens before or after marriage for a Christian man is a personal choice or biblical mandate depending on his interpretation of scripture, but it does very little to build his value in the eyes of a woman. In fact, if a Christian male's abstinence builds any value in a woman's mind at all, it has more to do with his ability to stay true to his principles than his actual lack of sex.

Virginity is her honor, and her gift to a man in exchange for his protection and leadership. What many beta Christian guys like Frank will never understand is that they don't deserve a virgin because they simply haven't fulfilled their end of the bargain. Their lonely dick is not an acceptable substitute for the Alpha qualities she seeks.

“I know what we did last night was a sin, and I know I’ll regret it. But just so you know; I may regret the sin, but I’ll never regret you.”

Supplements Don’t Build Muscle

April 29, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

I was inspired to write this after a friend of mine bragged to me about how he just dropped $200 on supplements for working out. Seeing his stack, I quickly realized that one of the most commonly known and discussed facts about workout supplements is simply not discussed enough.

For most people this is going to be a restatement of what they already knew. Supplements will not cause you to build muscle. Supplements are just what they are named, supplements. Well technically they’re dietary supplements.

A supplement is defined as:

> something that completes or makes an addition

A dietary supplement is basically just a revised definition. It is defined as:

> a product taken orally that contains one or more ingredients (as vitamins or amino acids) that are intended to supplement one’s diet and are not considered food

In plain English, supplements are available to help you boost the percentage of certain nutrients for your diet, without having to go through the complexities that normal food intake would include. A protein shake, for example, will allow you to ingest 25-30 grams of protein in a single serving.

If they don’t build muscle, then why is everyone taking them?

There are approximately 4-7 grams of protein in one ounce of medium-fat (average) meat. According to the Mayo-Clinic, the average serving of meat yields an approximate caloric intake of 130. Your average protein shake has four to five times the amount of protein with calories remaining the same as what a normal serving of meat would be. That means you get way more protein, at a way lower cost, way faster. In short, it’s like NOS for your body. You get a supercharged boost of nutrients for a short period of time.

What about the different kinds of supplements?

The key thing that tipped me towards writing this, was the fact that my friend has three types of protein powders he uses. Casein, Whey, and Whey Isolate. These are basically redundant of each other. Your normal whey is defined by as:

> the watery part of milk that is separated from the coagulable part or curd especially in the process of making cheese and that is rich in lactose, minerals, and vitamins and contains lactalbumin and traces of fat

Whey isolate is just a higher refined version of whey. And casein is a slower digesting version suggested before bed, however still rather un-necessary. For those wanting a dentition:

Loading...

> a phosphoprotein of milk: as one that is precipitated from milk by heating with an acid or by the action of lactic acid in souring and is used in making paints and adhesives

In short, my friend ordered three of the same thing. Now for professional bodybuilders, the differences are enough to justify ordering all three. For the average person, even extended gym enthusiast, you will never need all three. If you don’t believe me then watch the first minute and eight seconds of the video below. Although the video talks about alcohol, his point on where you will be with your fitness level remains the same as what I would say.

What’s Your Stack?

I do take supplements but my stack is simple. Whey protein for post workout shake, multi-vitamin (standard off the shelf brand), BCAA tablets, and a pre-workout. That’s it. I used to debate having more until I did research and found out that there’s really no need. And it all comes back to the fact that supplements don’t build muscle.

The only one who can build muscle is yourself. Muscle is built based on necessity. The better the workout and diet combination you have, the quicker it happens, this is why people use supplements. But chugging protein shakes every morning and walking three miles will probably just make you fatter than you were before. You’ll have to do some serious lifting to actually get results.

My friend could easily have bought either whey, or whey isolate, and even decided to drink one shake in the morning, and one shake post workout, have saved a boat load of money, and gotten the same results. Instead, he made the same rookie mistakes most people make, and that's invest a ton of money on supplements, and not enough time on their exercise program. The results is always that in the end they get mad over a lack of results.

So Why Take Them At All?

Like I said, they help supercharge your system. However they aren't necessary. I take them because I'm lazy. It's easier to chug a protein shake post workout than it is to down three chicken breasts. Plus I take in less calories with my shake. I take a pre-workout because it's nice to get that extra boost of energy prior to lifting, especially since I lift after working. You could chug a cup of coffee however, and probably get a similar result. My multi-vitamin is because my diet isn't as good as it should be. And my BCAA tablets, well I got them cheap as hell, and I don't feel like throwing them out.

In short, working out and muscle gains are solely based on yourself. If you workout hard and eat right, you'll have big gains. If you monitor it all closely, you can get away without ever taking supplements. Most people don't monitor their diet to the extreme, so supplements help add that extra boost to their system. But supplements will not give you muscle.

The Feast Of The Goat

This is a historical fiction novel about Rafael Trujillo, powerful dictator of the Dominican Republic for thirty years, who singlehandedly brought his country into the 20th century with a rapid modernization program. I was first introduced to him in The Last Playboy, a memoir of Dominican playboy Porfirio Rubirosa.

The novel is told through three different timelines: (1) The conspirators who want to kill him, (2) The mysterious daughter of a political insider who returns to the country many years after Trujillo's death, and (3) Trujillo himself in his twilight years. Through these angles we get a good view of the events that took place leading up to the end of his rule (much of which, of course, is fictionalized).

> Because sooner or later Trujillo will call upon him to serve the regime, or his person, and when he calls, one is not permitted to say no. He was proof of this truth. It never occurred to him to put up the slightest resistance to his appointments. As Estrella Sadhala always said, the Goat [Trujillo] had taken from people the sacred attribute given to them by God: their free will.

Trujillio was brutal, like most dictators are, with a secret police force that made political opponents disappear off the edge of cliffs, but he had a peculiar sexual perversion in that he enjoyed fucking the wives of his cabinet members. He would arrive to their houses during the day when the husbands were busy at work for him. Thanks to the personality cult he built, it was seen as an honor to have Trujillo bone your wife. I doubt he used condoms.

What's more impressive about the man is how he kept power for so long, especially in the face of international condemnation when he decided to exterminate 20,000 Haitians that he felt were creeping across the border.

Loading...

> The popular name for the massacre came from the shibboleth that the Dominican dictator Rafael Trujillo had his soldiers apply to determine whether or not those living on the border were native Dominicans or immigrant Haitians. Dominican soldiers would hold up a sprig of parsley to someone and ask "What is this?"; how the person would pronounce the Spanish word for parsley (perejil) would determine his/her fate. French and Haitian Creole pronounce the r as a uvular > approximant; thus, their speakers can have great difficulties with the alveolar tap or trill of Spanish. The Dominicans realized that a Haitian would have difficulty pronouncing perejil, so if the person could pronounce perejil with a trill, the person was considered to be Dominican and allowed to live, but if the person pronounced perejil without the trill, the person was considered to be Haitian and executed.

Trujillo was as much a genius psychologist than a strong ruler, sniffing out plots like a hound dog before they could affect his rule. Not only does this book serve as a rudimentary guide on being a dictator, but also on how to work for them. For example, if you're taking part on a secret mission, and that mission inadvertently becomes public, it's best to disappear. Your dictator boss will want to dispose of you to eliminate any evidence linking him to a failed operation.

The book provided realistic dialogue that made it more of a psychological thriller than a history book. The story got me involved and even though I knew how it would end, I couldn't wait to learn how it was done, with an episodic format that kept me in suspense. Overall the prose is smooth and the story is compelling—there's not much more that you can ask for in a work of historical fiction. Recommended.

Does Bottle Service Get You Laid?

April 30, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

[image]
The number one question I always get as a VIP Host is, “Can you bring me girls if I get bottle service?” And my answer is always “Yes” with a half-smile. Because I know the truth. Will I bring you the party girls to your table? Absolutely. Will I encourage them to drink as much as possible? Of course. Do I want to make more commission? No shit. Can I get you laid? No.

If you have ADD and want the answer to this article’s question immediately, then unfortunately you’re not in luck. Continue reading if you want the answer to what can be an expensive endeavor leaving you with blue balls, or the night of your life where you wake up with two naked girls in a Vegas suite.

First off, bottle service is expensive. Extremely expensive based on the actual value of the bottle. What you’re actually paying for is two things:

1. Holding Court

You’re paying thousands of dollars in order to have a TABLE with space to sit down and ‘hold court’. I have used the term ‘holding court’ for sometime in regards to bottle service because that is exactly what it is. YOU are the king and your bottle service waitress, who is always smoking hot and generally has nice big fake tits that are perked up and tantalizing you the whole night, is your Queen and the busboys are your servants. I know that you instantly thought “Can I fuck the bottle waitress?” (more on that later).

Want a condom? Tip the busboy and he’ll give you one. Want the bottle waitress to pour you shots? Ask her. They are yours for the night. All for the ‘cheap’ price of $450 for a bottle of Grey Goose that costs $37 at your local grocery store. The couch and the table are your DOMAIN and depending on the club and how prime the table location is (generally table minimums go up closer to the dj or proximity to the dance floor), it screams one thing over anything: STATUS.

A Piece of Heaven…

2. Status

Bottle service is in essence, nightclub DHV full tilt. I have pulled girls in dive bars, college bars, shitty nightclubs with no tables, and top clubs in LA, Vegas, Miami and NYC, but the difference in QUALITY has always been higher with bottle service. Now, some of you are screaming at your computer right now cussing me out thinking that I’m just pushing bottle service, however I’m not. I’m telling you cold-hard facts from over a decade in the nightclub world.

I feel more comfortable in a nightclub then in my own bed and I have a California King TemPurpedic, so calm yourself and listen up, because what I’m going to say is a fucking fact: The HOTTEST girls in clubs are almost ALWAYS put on a table.

What that means is this: hot girls walk up to a nightclub with a big line. The guy or girl who runs the door, instantly lifts the rope and lets them in. We’ve all seen this. Hot girls run the nightclub world. Period. Deal with it. Accept it, or buy a six-pack of beer sit on the couch and watch MTV Guy Code while bitching on Facebook about how women are bitches.

The VIP Hosts are next in line after the door host and will instantly snatch up the girls and lead them to a clients table. I’ve literally seen screaming matches between hosts over who grabs the girls first because they are a commodity. I’m not talking about solid 7′s who we would all fuck and be happy about. I'm talking about the dimes. The 8+, 9′s and 10′s of the world. We all have a different idea of what equates a 10 but you guys know what I'm talking about. That top tier chick. Guess who gets the hottest girls? Generally the baller on table 207 whose poppin bottles of Dom Perignon.

Girls want to have fun. Period.

Fat girls and gorgeous girls. Fat girls may be content with a movie and an extra large tub of Ben and Jerry's ice cream, but hot girls want that extra kick. Girls in their early twenties are all about status in their social media world and to one-up their girlfriends. They are competitive as fuck. Instagram has created little ego monsters among hot girls and I've literally heard conversations among little hotties bragging about their pics with a baller dropping thousands on bottles.

Just recently at one of the top most exclusive clubs in LA, a baller dropped $100,000 on ONE bottle of Dom Perignon. No lie. Guess who he left with that night? An A-list actress, who I will not mention the name because I don't want my ass sued. Point is he had the highest value in the club. Period. He was not a celebrity himself and was of average looks and in his mid-thirties. This goes back to the basics of evolutionary development between men and women. Women want the best provider by nature and in a club world, the guy balling out is 'proving' that he can provide for her.

Here's the flip side: I've seen guys spend thousands on bottle service, I've put hot party girls on their table and they still go home alone. Did the bottle service hurt their chances? Hell to the motherfucking NO. Their lack of game sabotaged the excellent tool that bottle service is.

Thirsty Girls Are More Fun

Imagine having good game. You walk in a club and you head to the bar and order a drink. You pull a hot little 7 and take her home for a pounding fuck. Good night right? Sure. Now imagine you walk in a club with good game and have your own space to hold court? It's like putting Derek Jeter in a little league game.

You cannot DEPEND on bottle service to get you laid, however you can UTILIZE it to get the cream of the crop in the club.

In fact I would suggest if you are a newbie to game that you not get bottle service and focus on working the room and building your club game. Once you have a good chance of walking into a club and pulling and meanwhile have been building your lifestyle in order to afford bottle service give it a shot.

You don't have to go crazy and charge your emergency credit card up on bottles. Instead grab 2-3 of your guys friends (who have game as well) and go in on two bottles and see the difference. There are clubs in every major city where you can get 2 bottles and after Uncle Sam's cut and your Bottle Waitress's tip, will walk out having only spent $1,000. Divide that by 4 guys and for $250 each you got to experience the difference of 'Holding Court' in a nightclub. I can honestly say there are very few feelings like standing on a couch and pouring Dom Perignon down the throats of thirsty models while their bright eyes shine up at you as though you are god.

When I was in college…

I learned the art of stealing drinks. Roosh has written about this as well and it's a great art to master. I actually took a girl out for a drink once literally not having a dime to my name. She was so sexy and just my type that I thought 'fuckit I'm going to see what happens'. At this point I had mastered the art of stealing a drink in a bar/nightclub. The challenge to me was how do I pull this off on a ‘date’?

I decided instead of using the “I’m going to the bathroom be right back” line in which I would jack two drinks and return as though I bought them, to include her in our new ‘adventure’. I literally used her as a distraction for patrons to steal their drinks. This was one of my golden moments in Poor Game. As she wiped my seed off her face later that night she said and I quote, “You know when I decided I was going to fuck you?…When we stole our first drinks”.

Any player knows you do not need to buy bottle service to get laid from a nightclub. However, if you want to shoot for the top girls in the club I GUARANTEE that Game + Bottle Service = Hottest Girls giving you attention. Are some gold diggers? Probably. Are they using you? Of course. Are you using them to reach the final result of bending them over your bathroom counter and pounding their pussy into oblivion? Damn right you are. Everyone wins.

Yes, this does happen in the VIP

The girls get free alcohol and pictures for their Instagram and YOU get nightclub value and hot girls on your lap all night. Unless you’re an absolute retard, it’s an almost guaranteed lay. I’ll put it this way: I have actually fucked girls at my tables (nothing like what a short club dress lifted up slightly and a quick unzip of your pants will do), and have never, I repeat never gotten bottle service and not gotten laid. Am I damn good at picking up girls anyway? Yes. But when I made the investment in bottles the quality went through the roof. I don’t know about you guys, but I want the best in everything in life and that definitely includes the hottest women walking this green earth.

Enjoy this video and thank me later.

The Author Who Was The Biggest Influence On The Manosphere

April 30, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Although many criticize the manosphere for being too negative, it is undeniable that self-improvement is a major focus of its content. Criticism is useful for knowing what to avoid, but there must be positive thoughts and actions if there is to be any increased happiness to our lives. Self-improvement in today's manosphere is one of those unspoken tenets that everyone knows we should be doing, even if our efforts in this area are neglected from time to time.

However, have you ever wondered why self-improvement is such a popular topic within our little online home? Who was the writer who brought to our attention that there are greater things we should be doing rather than chasing girls, money, or hating on our culture? Who was the writer that has influenced almost every single manosphere writer you know today, whether or not they are aware of it?

This author is Pook, who many are familiar with, yet still gets little honorable mention today. Pook wrote on the Sosuave forums back in 2000-2006, and then went on to write a blog spanning from 2006-2008 before he finally vanished (or at least retired the handle). Many of his forum posts are gone, but the best of his posts have since been complied together by admirers into what is known as The Book of Pook. It has been passed down through generations of manosphere writers and today you will get the pleasure of reading it for yourself, if you have not already.

Why is the Book of Pook so great? Because it is written with beautiful purple prose, and offers salvation for the man lost in the eternal ennui of our emasculating culture. While other manosphere authors in the early 2000's were talking about pickup artist tactics to get laid, or sharing tips to build a stronger career, or finding that perfect girlfriend, Pook decided he did not want any of that.

Pook said: "I know how to get laid. I know how to make money. I know how to get a girlfriend. I know how to build a career. And yet why am I not happy?" "Because," Pook continues, "My entire life has been focusing on everything except me."

From Pook was birthed what is now known as the, "Men Going Their Own Way" movement, or MGTOW for short, although sometimes I wonder if this movement lives up to the ideals of its founder. For Pook was not about forsaking women, money, or any of the pleasures and passions of life, but instead wanted to teach men to explore the world with their own interests in mind so they could enjoy all faucets of life to its fullest. Pook was an individualist who understood that a man's value grows with time (unlike a woman's value), and if it wasn't for Pook, I probably would not be half as learned and accomplished as I am today.

When I was merely but a boy entering college and deciding on the best way to get women and success, I read his essay, "If Life Seems Hard And Unhappy, Read This!"

You have two paths in love and life.
1) Live your dreams.
2) Live other people's dreams.

Two paths in love and life. Live your dreams or live other people's dreams. One path is HARD. The other path is EASY. One path leads to SECURITY. The other path leads to FREEDOM.

Permit me, for this paragraph, to use the analogy of money to love and life. We know how rich people live and what they drive. And let us assume, for this paragraph, that all people want what the rich have. There are two ways (in this paragraph at least) to obtain it. One is to buy the super cool car, big house, and everything else on bad debt. The other way is to obtain the assets and wealth to actually buy them. One way is EASY. The other way is HARD. One way requires little to no risk. The other takes a lot of risk (obtaining wealth and assets takes courage to go out and create. Bad debt does not). By going into bad debt, you end up literally working for those who lent you the money. And you know what? The world encourages you to get into bad debt. You can easily get a loan on a house you cannot pay off within 30 years. And look in your mailbox. Is that another pre-approved credit card? It's the third one this week. There are lots of people who 'look rich' but they are in major debt. I ask you, 'Are they free?' They will be working for the bank and car companies to repay the debt with most of the days from their life.

In the same way, young men do the same for women. They look 'rich' because they have the women and can enjoy them, but what was the price they had to pay for it? Whose dreams are they following? And because of that choice, who is he working for? Both the seducer and nice guy work for the women's dreams as they seem to have none of their own. It is the price for security. And just like bad debt, the world seems to want you to take this EASY path. Movies exemplify this thing called 'love' that you must sacrifice your dreams to. Pop songs are modern prayers to the Woman Goddess, to satisfy her and your addiction to female praise (which, today, we label as male 'love').

Pook drags a display up onto the stage.

Turn on the light, please. Thank you. This, gentlemen, is what I call the Security Path, the easy path that is default in 90% of young males:

> ## Time Difference in the Security Path
> Current
> Girl: Has girlfriend, multiple girlfriends.
> Friends: Hang out with old buddies.
> Job: OK job. Steady paycheck. Pays the bills.

> Family: Loves you.
> Later
> Girl: No girl or same old girl.
> Friends: Same friends.
> Job: Same or similar job. Promoted perhaps.
> Family: Loves you.

Pook hits the chart with his pointy stick.

In both current and later states, his family and friends are pleased with him. After all, he has a girl. He has his buds. He has a steady job that more than provides. And his family loves him. After all, he repeated exactly what his Dad did. So what more could he want?

Now scroll your eyes over to the 'later' side. He will one day wake up and realize he is now 'average' in life. He has not grown at all during the time difference. He is what he was with just an aged rotting body. Where is the dream?

All right guys, bring out the next chart.

> ## Time Difference in the Freedom Path
> Current Girl: No girl.
> Job: Transitional. Sometimes jobless.
> Family: Thinks he will become a loser.
> ## Later
> Girl: Has girl (or girls) who likes his life and him. (Life gets richer because she is with him because of the dreams he embraced, not to be a mere workhorse.)
> Friends: New friends. (Often smarter, cooler, better people).
> Job: Got the job or made the business/investments he always wanted.
> Family: Often despises him for his success.

Pook tapped with his pointy stick.

Here, he seems like a loser currently. Yet, he wins in the end. It is painful and hard to not go for the nearest girl but rather for the girl who likes what you like. (Note: why is so much attention on obtaining the girl but neglecting ourselves? The answer should be obvious.)

Look at his friends! He had to leave them behind. It is painful for sure. But he made new friends which helped develop himself into a better character.

Oh, and there is the job. He was transitional. He was trying out different jobs. He was starting businesses. He was making mistakes. The Security Path is scared of making mistakes. In fact, the Security Path praises itself because it is mistake-free! But in the end, the Freedom Path gets to work in his job of choice.

What I find particularly noteworthy is how there is the frustration that starts early in the Freedom Path, it vanishes over time. However, in the Security Path, the initial pain is not there but accumulates over time. The poor soul either suffers or lies to himself: i.e. “I have done the honorable path.” But you did not honor your dream and so committed treason against your Gift.

And perhaps the scared young men in particular, whose hearts are dazzled by the securities that women supposedly ‘bring them’, will consider life from this side of the question.

Perhaps they will say to themselves: “The origin of my dream-girl was to place my dream onto her. Thank heavens I was saved from such shackles! Now I know to embrace my dream, and to those girls who love that choice, they cease to be the girl of my dreams but the girl in my dreams.”

So what hope is there for the average guy? “Don’t be average.”

And how do you do this? “By doing what average guys don’t do.”

Which is? “Embracing the dreams first, the girls second.”

One strange phenomenon I’ve noticed among those of the Security Path is that, yes, they construct a ‘dream-girl’ and marry her. Talk to the gentleman and ask about his wife. He will paint the most wondrous praise and glory of his wife, with such animation and passion, even (especially in this case) if she is a fat hag!

Your wife ought to be praised but such infinitude and animation belongs to your dreams, not to a particular female. Do not make the Dante mistake and turn your Beatrice into a gigantic heavenly body.

The difference is so clear and precise. Those on the Security Path submit life to love. Those on the Freedom Path submit love to life. The Security Path reaches only for love. But those on the Freedom Path reach for life first and end up with both life and love. One projects the dreams onto the girl. The other invites the girl into his dreams.

After I had read this essay, I decided to forsake the pursuit of women for the rest of my college career in favor of the pursuit of my dreams. I devoured the classics and got near perfect grades, studied hard for the LSAT so I could go to a great law school.

But before I went to law school, I found myself a virgin in my early twenties with little to no experience with women whatsoever, so I looked through various pick-up manuals until I found Bang, started approaching women for about a year and a half until I got laid. And then once my virginity was gone, I went to law school. But when I was three weeks deep into my 1L I realized I had been chasing an empty promise for the past four years, seeking security instead of freedom, and I reread Pook before I decided to leave law school.

Afterwards, I picked up a job at a bar using the game I learned from Roosh and moved into a city, and I asked myself if there was more to getting laid besides approaching girls in bars all the time. So I went back to an old Pook post called "Be A Man!" and read this:

There is a prize to the person who correctly answers this question, What is a Man? When asked what they want in a guy, women say simply, "A MAN!" But, alas!, real men are becoming more and more rare these days. Women are tired of the sensitive wimps who have no backbones. One women even wrote a song about the subject, "Where have all the cowboys gone?"

So what is a Man? How should he act? Decades and centuries ago, the question was nonsense. But today in our feminized culture (this may be more in America then in other countries), most of us have been raised to believe that there is something inherently wrong with being a man and acting the way how a man should act. No wonder males don't know how to act around women! No wonder websites like these exist!

Loading...
Indeed, I embarked on this mystery to find out the answer to this question. Several women were bunched up in a group, gossiping and yapping about cute boys, fashion, relationships i.e. nothing. This behavior extends to all women of all cultures (and also different animal species. Cows group together and moo and gnaw on grass and take notice of bulls brave enough to approach the group).

I approach. "How are you, ladies!! I am the Pook."

A woman squeals. "Oh! It's a Pook!" The others squeal in unison.

Once the ladies calm themselves after being in the presence of a Pook, I ask them, "Ladies! Do tell me, what do you define as a Man?"

With devilish tongues, the women answer:

"A Man is someone sensitive to me."
"A Man is the guy who will take care of my needs."
"A Man is the one that is in tune with my feelings."
"A Man is one who doesn't have an ego."
"A Man is the guy who will sit and watch chick flicks all day with me."
"A Man is the guy who will go shopping with me."
"A Man is the guy who will share all his feelings with me."

Such are the common answers! The males listen and actualize what the women say. They are constantly declared 'sweet' and 'wonderful' and 'nice', oh 'so nice'. Mothers and older women are proud of them and tell them, "If I were younger, I would go for you!"

Poor Nice Guy! The women his own age avoid him like the plague and jump for the jerks. The Nice Guy becomes an emotional tampon to be used and discarded. The Nice Guy, being so nice and sweet, listens to the woman vomit her feelings about men and bleed her problems of her boyfriend on him. He listens with baited hope when he hears, "Oh, why can't guys be like you! You listen and understand." Then she turns around and gets abused by another jerk! The vicious cycle repeats again and again.

Why are women acting in this way?

They are simply acting as women do, as in their nature. The problem is not with them, it is with guys. We are afraid to embrace OUR nature, that of being a Man. Being in a culture that sees Manhood as predatory and oppressive and uncouth, we cover it up within ourselves. By doing so, we hide our sexuality. (Sexuality! Do I mean rock hard abs and rippling muscles? That is not what women find sexy [it's a contributing factor, not the core]. A type of PERSONALITY is what women are looking for. Someone they can depend on [has backbone], someone who will be successful [has ambition], and someone who is decisive [has charge]. Nice guys have no backbone because they think women are frail things that will break in confrontation; nice guys reveal no ambition because they fear being seen as arrogant to women; nice guys are afraid to be decisive for fear of being seen as 'oppressive'.)

Two poles of thought men drift into: the Nice Guy and the Jerk. Both blame the other.

"You ruin the women with your lack of commitment and unappreciative nature," says the Nice Guy.

"You spoil the women with your endless listening ear and stupid caring attitude," replies the Jerk.

The two endlessly war. Those on the sidelines have their own conclusions. One side says, "The Jerk is the way to go. Ceaseless sex! Evolution demands it." The other side says, "The Nice Guy is the way to go. Glorious relationship! Society demands it."

But the two still argue.

"You cause the women to think they are in control," says the Jerk.

"Ahh, but you cause the women to think all men are scum," replies the Nice Guy.

Is there not an end to the Nice Guy vs. Jerk debate? Are these the only choices?

The Cycle

The Nice Guy emerges. He is tenderized and wants to shout in every woman's ear "I will not abuse you. I am sweet and good. Based on that alone you should date me." When the Nice Guy talks to the girl on a date, poof, the date turns into Oprah. "Oh, my life has been SO downhill from here," the Nice Guy whines. "My little girly car was slashed, I failed my classes, but because of you this day has been so much better." Then the Nice Guy goes, "Let me tell you my life story. My birth was long, hard, and painful for my mother…" Our culture has become so feminized that the Nice Guy thinks it is proper to vomit his feelings and emotions all over the place. (It's gross!) Women, rightfully, run for the hills when they hear your declarations of love.

The Metamorphosis comes. The Nice Guy eventually realizes what all the ladies want, becomes bitter, and changes himself into a Jerk. His goal now is to sleep with as many women as possible and figure out all the tricks and tactics to do so. He focuses on calculation rather then natural joy. When a woman comes, he pulls out a chart of all the 'moves' and 'tactics' with arrows and patterns. He unleashes his lap top, accesses a Lay Guide, and reviews his strategy. Time passes and once was fun becomes meaningless.

Back to being nice. He sees it now as turning on Nice Guy or turning on Jerk. “Why can’t I just be myself!?” he soon thunders at Reality.

Just be a Man! There is no need to reprogram yourself. You will have the interests you have, the hobbies you have, the body you have, but you can easily become a MAN. It is all simply in the way how you think and as you think you shall become.

But what is Man? Shall we have the answer? Here it is:

A Man is a guy who is not scared of his testosterone!

A Man follows the passion in his life. Passion of women? Of course not. A Man has goals and desires that goes above that of chasing chicks. After childhood, there are TRUE winners and losers in life. A Man desires to be the winner. A Man WANTS to win in what he does. Because of his passion, a Man can sometimes come off as arrogant and egotistical. He does not apologize for this or for his desires.

“It is your actions that cause the disgrace of Men,” says the Nice Guy.

“It is yours,” replies the Jerk.

No, gentlemen, the disgrace of men is in not embracing your true nature: following your passion and, thus, loving life. Women are to enhance your life, not to be your life. So to the Nice Guy, stop placing your happiness on getting a girlfriend. To the Jerk, quit wasting your life on seduction. Don’t SPEND your time chasing girls, INVEST it by putting it into your interests and desires, thus the whole of your life.

When you do this, all of a sudden you have what every woman wants: Ambition, charge, decisiveness, backbone, kindness, stableness, and confidence.

-Does not go through life walking on eggshells.

Nice Guys think, “Does she like me? How do I get her to like me?” Good guys think, “Should I like her? Should I go for her?” The Good guy doesn’t think about the girl’s interest until they’re dating. The Good guy looks at all the girls and TAKES what he wants.

-Focuses on his dreams.

No, this does not include the chick. You must have passion for something in life, something you even want to do for the rest of your life. Your romantic life is an echo of your regular life.

-Does not apologize for his testosterone, for his desires.

“Oh, I am so sorry, ladies! I am afflicted with this disease known as M.A.L.E. It is natural for me to glance at you, your oh so curvaceous body. I am soooo sorry.
Please, please FORGIVE ME!”

Would a WOMAN apologize for her feminine acts? So why should YOU apologize for your masculinity?

-Tries to always win in what he does. (After childhood, there are real winners and losers in life.)

Men build towers; women build webs. If you aren't constructing your tower or aren't even planning it, why should she cast her web at you? If you want worthy chicks, you, yourself, must strive to become worthy.

-Has deep convictions that allows him to be a possible leader.

This is crucial because one day you will become the leader of your own household. Yes, we talk of 50/50, of everything being equal, but Nature's laws surpass that of Humans. Women naturally submit and nurture, Men naturally lead and provide.

If you were a woman, would YOU want a Nice Guy in charge of your household? Or would you want A MAN?

-Seeks to solve problems then to place blame.

If there is a problem, you solve it. You do not go, "Oh, BOO HOO! This was because of HIM." A woman naturally wants a guy who deals with problems, not pass them along. (Would you want that in your woman? Of course not!)

-Sees failure as only a temporary set-back to the inevitable.

Statistically, you're more likely to be REJECTED then to be ACCEPTED. So how do you become more and more accepted and have lots of girls? It is when you increase your trying so much that the acception rate satisfies you and you don't notice the rejections.

Napoleon Hill's book interviewing extremely successful people, these men of destiny did not let failure destroy them. Indeed, Napoleon concludes that Destiny puts out these trials and failures to TEST the men if they are proper and FIT for their role in shaping history.

-Knows where he is going in Life.

True seduction isn't calculation or painful discipline, it is the same as with everything that makes a success: A Passion for Life.

-Never loses his passion, for that would be the death of his soul.

Nice Guys HATE bachelorhood. They HATE, HATE, HATE it sooo much. Some even wish for the old days of arranged marriages so they wouldn't have to put up with all the games.

Jerks LOVE bachelorhood so much they can't see anything else in life. While women love guys that can get women, jerks offer nothing worthwile long term wise.

Alas, the women always try to change the Jerk but never the Nice Guy. Why? Because a Man is STRENGTH and a Jerk displays strength on some level. Nice Guys never do.

-Never feels he has to prove himself to anyone.

Flowers, candy, poetry all can be good additions to a relationship, but so many nice guys use them to BUY the relationship as if they must prove themselves. They flood with the poor woman with gifts to show they mean it.

So away with the flowers, those dead plants as tokens of affection. Away with the choclate, the candy, and sweets, those sugary pursuits to purchase love. Away with the poety, those rotten verses of declarations of love. Away with the quest to prove YOURSELF and let her prove HERSELF to you for YOU are the Don Juan.

Be a Man! And with it, you will advance in your career, your social life, and even your dealings with women. Men are very rare these days so if you become one, you will be in HIGH demand. Your career will become better as people look at you as a leader. Life will re-develop before your eyes for you will obtain the most single quality that men, not trophy husbands, not nice guys, not tactful players, but men have a monopoly on: Respect.

YOU are the MAN! For if you don't STAND for something, you shall FALL for everything!

So after reading this I decided to approach women the way I wanted to, and ended up creating my own style to truly became a man in my own right. I pull off hustles all the time and am always looking for more. And now as I go forward to the next stages of my life, I just remember the words, "As you think, you shall become…"

You can get the Book of Pook here.

Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal

April 30, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Ayn Rand is a philosopher and writer best known for her fictional works Atlas Shrugged and The Fountainhead, in which unlikely protagonists embodying individualism and rationality triumph over the evil forces of mediocrity and statism. Though Rand's fiction occupies a place in the western cannon, it was mostly a vehicle for explaining her philosophy of Objectivism, one tenet of which is the economic system of free-market capitalism.

Capitalism: The Unknown Ideal is a collection of essays by Rand and associates, outlining her political, social, and economic views. Its dense 350 pages contain thoughts on many subjects applicable to today's world, such as:

The repudiation of "extremism" as a political weapon:

"When men [ed: or women] feel that strongly about an issue, yet refuse to name it…one may be sure that their actual goal would not stand public identification"

Rand suggests that the crusade against extremism is a dangerous concept because the word itself holds no meaning. The creation of such "anti-concepts" allows ideas that are merely politically incorrect to be wrongly associated with ones that are evil. Even worse, if extremes of speech and thought are repudiated wholesale, the only thing remaining is a muddled centrist philosophy with no clear tenets. Repudiating "extremism" is rejecting the ability to have clear guiding principles of right and wrong, since one extreme must be wrong. The blanket labeling of manosphere blogs as "hate groups" is one example of this dangerous association.

The Gold Standard:

"The abandonment of the gold standard made it possible for the welfare statists to use the banking system as a means to an unlimited expansion of credit"

Loading...

In this essay, Alan Greenspan outlines why gold is a sensible choice for currency and why it should be reinstated as our currency-backing standard. In the modern model, the Federal Reserve will continue to print fiat currency to finance a deficit, which will eventually result in massive devaluation of money. Greenspan outlines how returning to a gold standard would promote natural self-regulation of interest rates and guard against massive stock market crashes. He cautions that without anything backing our currency, nothing will prevent the de facto confiscation of wealth via rampant inflation.

The persecution of American business through undefinable anti-trust laws:

"Today's liberals recognize the workers' (the majority's) rights to their livelihood (their wages), but deny the businessmen's (the minority's) right to their livelihood (their profits)"

Rand's essay outlines the arcane and contradictory anti-trust laws on our books, which exist to execute the whims of the government against businesses they do not favor. For example, the Supreme Court once ruled against the Aluminum Company of America simply for "taking advantage of every opportunity" to expand their business. Rand suggests that the only way that a truly coercive monopoly can be formed is when the government interferes in the free market by artificially subsidizing certain industries. This creates massive corruption and deadweight loss, such as in the railroad industry early in the 20th century.

More than once I had to remind myself that this book was written in 1967, since Rand's criticism of New Deal economic policies, the welfare state, and a mixed market economic structure ring chillingly true for our country's present political climate. The book's only drawback it is that it is incredibly dense. It certainly cannot be read in one sitting, but at the same time you can't jump into it for five minutes at a time, since the concepts require careful reflection to appreciate fully. If you're looking for a thought-provoking philosophical/economic manifesto that is highly relevant to modern issues, I suggest picking up a copy.

Open Letter To Fat Girls

May 1, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Dear Fat Girls,

I have a very simple solution for you on how to lose weight. It's so simple and easy, you may not believe me. It will work despite your "glandular issues" or "unlucky genetics." In fact, you don't even have to do anything — it requires absolutely no planning or energy on your part. You can even eat cheesecake, have cupcakes, enjoy wine and snack on that froyo you've been glaring at every time you walk by that stand at the mall. How did I discover this prized knowledge? What is this amazing revolutionary technique?

Other than basic logic, no science involved other than observation. From dating, living with and talking to skinny girls, I've noticed a pattern amongst them on how they stay skinny. This transcends nationality, from America to Italy to Ukraine. It requires no specialized tools and can be done whenever, wherever. So what is it?

Stop eating so fucking much.

Seriously. There is nothing else you need to do other than to put the damn fork down. And by way of story, let me explain how this works.

The Skinny Foreigners

I've traveled a lot. With respect to this topic, two things remain indelible in my mind. When I was 21, I remember sitting at the Trevi Fountain in Rome having gelato and noticing that all these Italian girls around me were so damn skinny. And they were all having gelato. How is this possible? What about all the sugar/carbs that goes hand in hand with desserts and ice cream and makes you fat? Well it didn't take long to find out this gelato is not preceded with a large creamy pasta dish, or calorie dense supposedly healthy turkey sandwich with aioli, cheddar and bacon. Gelato was lunch.

Then we have Ukraine. There was an incredibly cheap café my friend and I had lunch at every day. While we as hungry male Americans would pack two trays full of food every time, I noticed all these skinny girls in Ukraine shared the same type of meal on a daily basis. A glass of juice, a piece of bread and a small cup of soup. That's it. Perhaps some would exchange the soup for a small side salad with lettuce, tomatoes and maybe shredded carrots. There was no appetizer, main and dessert. We're talking maybe 500 calories at most here.

There was also the fact that I was told repeatedly by Ukranian girls that its their job is to be hungry and drunk, but that beautiful thought process is for another article.

The Model Roommate

How many times have you heard a chunkster say something along the lines of "Ugh, I hate her! Look how skinny she is and she's having cake! If only I had her genes. Well nothing I can do, I'm just unlucky to be fat."

Bullshit. I lived with a model for a week. A legit runway model. I saw what she ate on a daily basis. Banana nut muffins. Chocolate. Candy. Ice Cream. Basically anything she wanted. But—and it's a big but—it was in small amounts. I'll never forget her walking into the kitchen at lunch time, cutting half a muffin, and going "it's time for lunch!" Again, it didn't matter what she ate, just how much she ate. It's not magic or genetics that she is thin.

Loading...

Compare that to my other roommate. She is one of these chunksters. She has organic eggs fried in olive oil with turkey bacon for breakfast, along with whole wheat bread and some fruit. For lunch she will have some whole wheat pasta with tomato sauce or a turkey sandwich and maybe some yogurt on the side. She will have a subway sandwich for herself and snack on various things throughout the day, such as the other half of the muffin the model didn't eat. Overall a "healthy" diet, but she eats a lot. Probably over 2000 calories a day. See the difference?

As another example, look at this article. Even the title seems to imply a Victoria Secret model can eat bacon, egg and cheese sandwiches on a daily basis and still have that body. Fran the fattie sees the article, skims it and says well if she can eat that, so can I. However, really take a look at what that article says she eats in a day. That sandwich (350 calories), 2 cappuccinos (240 calories total), and half a "huge" salad (curious what a model considers a "huge" salad, but let's assume 400 calories). That's less than 1000 calories in the day. And, she also does some physical activity (yoga in this case).

Food Is Not Important

Currently one of the girls I am seeing has a very nice body. She goes for a run maybe three times a month. While guys may need to exercise to have a good body, girls do not. So her body is possible because she simply forgets to eat some days. Everything else takes priority – work, friends, tv, me, hanging out, etc. If she's not hungry, she doesn't eat. She doesn't eat because it's "lunch time" or because she just woke up and has to have breakfast. Yesterday I went to help her jump start her car, and she expressed that she was hungry to me, probably because she "forgot" to eat the day before. As a guy this makes no sense to me, but it works for her. And yes fatties, she's perfectly healthy. The ex-stripper I dated was the same way. Putting aside her flaws as a girlfriend, her body was ideal and food was an afterthought to her… she would sometimes lose track of when she ate last and have a bite or two of food when she actually did eat.

Conclusion

Of course you can exercise a lot, get a trainer, do Pilates and eat more and become or remain skinny that way. But let's say you are too lazy, cheap or poor to do so. It's still pretty simple for a girl not to be fat. Just eat less. And when in doubt ladies, never forget what Kate Moss stated years back and take it to heart:

3 Reasons To Start A Journal

May 1, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

I've recently moved overseas for an intermediate length of time (more than three months but less than two years) and resolved to record my thoughts and more notable experiences in a journal. This has manifested itself in the form of a simple Word document, with entries titled with a snappy tagline, the date they were written and the date(s) of the events in question. I originally intended this as purely a reflexive tool, to look back on someday and smile at the naivety of my youth, but after only a month I have noticed several unexpected benefits this practice has already brought me.

For something that takes zero time to set up and only requires about fifteen minutes every three or four days, the ROI on my writing has been incredible. Here's why I suggest you start to do the same:

1. You become motivated by the story

A lot of people allow their lives to slip by without much change while their ego rationalizes a feeling of progress. If you're allowing yourself to stagnate, the lack of recent entries in your journal (or the dreariness of the past few) will alert you that it's time to get off your ass.

Whether prompted by a lack of content, or a desire to maintain a high standard of narrative, you start making decisions that lead to more interesting, more varied and more rewarding experiences. Excuses like "I'm too tired" or "Maybe another time" vanish from your vocabulary and making bold choices in the moment becomes the new standard.

There are only two things in life—good things and good stories—but neither happens if you allow yourself to become a routine robot. Your journal is counting on you not to be that person, so you won't be.

2. Your life improves quicker

This is partly as a flow-on benefit of number one, but is also due to the power of reflection. Thinking back on a night-out the next day often highlights moments that at the time you hadn't considered all that important. 20/20 hindsight allows you to see how things early in the night affected the outcome later, and from that you can see how you could have made a better choice. What's more, the process of recording these lessons actively revises them, retaining a greater percentage of improvements per experience than simply bulldozing on with the next thing.

Loading...

Whether your goals are to have more fun, be a more magnetic individual or learn more about the world (especially relevant for time spent overseas or in completely unfamiliar environments), your journal is your best friend.

3. It improves your conversational skills

Your best fallback for awkward pauses, opportunities to impress and chances to make friends in conversation are personal stories. Writing a journal makes it unbelievably easy to always have something relevant or funny to share. I have only been recording my life for a month, but it already allows me to seamlessly produce structured, engaging stories with an accompanying moral on a dime, just by thinking back to stuff that has recently been deemed journal-worthy.

What's more, as my journal grows more and more extensive, I will be able to briefly skim-read it to refresh myself on the hundreds of highlights in my life and prevent them receding into the mists of time. Even for a naturally loquacious guy, I can't stress how surprised I've been by the impact this has made.

Concluding Remarks

In addition to the above benefits, your journal also passively improves your written communication skills. This is more essential for some than others, but everyone needs to write a CV or plan a promotion pitch at some stage. Plus, its value remains evergreen in reminding you of lessons you learnt a (long) while ago or as a nostalgic and entertaining read. It has zero setup time and costs virtually nothing. Try writing a journal for a month. I think you'll be surprised at the results.

Real Men Don’t Wait For A Yes

May 1, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Meet Eddie, 23 years old. When Eddie flirts with girls, he looks for signs that she’s interested. A twirling of the hair, a warm gaze, energetic conversation; he likes to make little advances when she makes these gestures. She shows more interest, and he moves a little closer.

Eddie is a coward.

Eddie is reduced to waiting on her every move, practically doting on her. There’s nothing a woman despises more than a man who asks for permission for each little thing he does. She starts to see Eddie as dependent on her for approval. She does something, and Eddie slavishly responds. He cling to her every word and gesture, for a sign that he’s wanted. She may even start to think he’s gay. Here’s an approximation of his thinking process, when talking to a girl:

[image]

Enter Stan

At first, Stan doesn’t seem so different from Eddie. They’re both fairly quick to touch girls. But look a little closer, and there’s a world of difference in how Stan acts. At any given moment, Stan is doing whatever the fuck he wants. He’s thrown caution to the wind, and listens only to what his dick is telling him. His thought process is “I wanna bang this chick” and everything else flows from that. He doesn’t even think – he doesn’t have some complicated mental model telling him when and when not to touch a girl. The only thinking he does is “how do I get this girl to a place where I can bang her?” His behavior is downright Pavlovian – through experience, he’s learned that touching precedes fucking, so he gropes girls purely out of instinct. Other men stare at Stan with bewilderment, as he makes out with girls he met mere minutes or seconds before.

Why Is Stan Attractive To Women?

I confess, I’m Stan. I’m not extremely charming or handsome, nor do I have a fat bank roll. But I go after what I want with boldness and determination. I simply don’t wait around looking for little signs to pass go – in the moment, all I care about is getting my dick wet, and the path to make that happen. And when I feel like grabbing a girl’s head and making out with her, I do. Sometimes she shoves me off, yet I try again seconds later, and am met with sweet success. I’m told that I’m extremely forward, and I make out with girls quicker than my wingmen – who are pretty experienced in their own right. Of course, just making out with a girl is nothing to be proud of.

Herr Gropenfuhrer, Showing The Way

Don’t Wait for “The Moment™,” Seize It

I was on a date with a girl, and the conversation was a little tepid. She seemed distant. I didn’t think I’d get laid – I figured she was bored. While she had never rebuffed my advances, she had never really registered them either. She was like a rag doll in my hands. We strolled down to the beach, and I made a move to kiss her. Whether I banged her on the beach that night or just fingered her there, and then banged her in my bedroom, I can’t recall. But in retrospect, I remember being astonished at how indifferent she seemed up until I kissed her. She had fucked a lot of guys, about 30, despite being young, so maybe she had just become desensitized; she wouldn’t show signs of arousal despite being DTF.

Don’t be deterred - every first kiss is sexual assault anyway. You’re going from touching her shoulder or hips, to putting your tongue down her throat, without ever asking for her permission. Y*ou never know she’s down until you’re balls deep*. You will truly never be sure if she is willing to sleep with you, until you go for it. There will be times where a girl is enjoying my company, but she thinks nothing of it – flirting with a cute guy is something she does five times a day, seven days a week. But when you suddenly grab her head and start sucking face, you’ve blitzed pass all those feckless men who flit in and out of her life. She has so many opportunities, that she has no need to defy her passive, feminine nature, and actively choose one of her many suitors. She leaves that to you.

A woman wants nothing more than to be objectified by a high status man; man desires, woman craves being desired. As one fling told me, “sometimes it feels good to be objectified.” As for some harpy braying on about ‘objectification of women,’ put her in a room with a willing Ryan Gosling, and see how she moans as his hand climbs up her skirt.

The Risks To Taking The Reins

Go far fast enough with girls, and you may start to find yourself in sticky situations from time to time. You'll have a girl lying in your bed, naked. You've fingered her, and maybe she even came several times already. You start putting on a condom, telegraphing your intent to bang. Most promiscuous girls are too happy to oblige you at this point, without any contest. Others never even let you get to this point – you can hardly even get her top off. One move I heartily recommend – grab her hand and put it on your shaft – once she starts fondling your junk, she will find it hard to say no to you returning the favor. As things progress, repeat the move without the bothersome clothing in the way.

There will be a few who verbally refuse to have sex, as they're lying naked in your bed, but you get the distinct feeling that if by some stroke of the gods, your penis ended up inside her, well… she'd be writhing with pleasure, happy that you forcibly ignored her protestations. One of these girls even said to me, "we're not going to have sex, but you can try if you want." In other words, "if you forcibly penetrate me, I'll change my mind." A touchy situation, to be sure.

Another one, I got her to admit that she sort of wanted a man to fuck her against her stated will, when I had her in this exact the scenario, because that would absolve her from responsibility, and therefore not make her feel like a slut. She was a Jezebel-reading feminist. I opt not to forcibly fuck girls under these conditions; the risk of a girl accusing you of rape after several penis-induced orgasms under such circumstances is too far above zero for my tastes.

Let Dignity Be Your Conscience

Despite what it sounds like, I don't chase girls until they call the cops on me. For the novice, it can be hard to tell if a girl truly doesn't want you at all, or if she's just playing games. With experience, one gets the sense for when it's appropriate to withdraw. I see it simply as a matter of dignity – if I feel I have to abase myself to continue pursuing her, I will stop. If she is snubbing me and ignoring me, and we have not even kissed, I quickly bail.

It All Starts With Honesty

Above all, you have to identify what it is you want, and then align your actions with that goal. Men today are confused – they have desires common to men all of eras, but they refuse to own up to them and act to satisfy them. They think they've evolved, that they're no longer a primal, violent beast, so they suppress their innermost desires. This suppression of male instinct is at the root of their woes with women in relationships. The man wants something, like sex twice daily, and the woman refuses to accommodate him. Yet he soldiers on, pissing away his dignity. Men are rewarding mediocrity from women when they'd never accept it from a man.

The masculine man, by contrast, is completely honest with himself about what he wants.

He isn't ashamed of groping girls, because that is something he finds spiritually fulfilling. He is quick to acknowledge that he is not getting what he wants. He doesn't suffer in relationships, because he knows that to do so is fruitless. If a girl say, starts refusing to have sex with him, he respects her wishes by withdrawing from her. He knows that he cannot continue with her.

He comes off as less 'creepy' than other men, because he suffers no delusions about what the future holds. He assumes the future is, at best, no better than the present, so he doesn't hold out for improvements in her character. As soon as his needs cease to be met, he bids her adieu. Short of being married, he knows the answer is always the same: walk.

> You have power over your mind – not outside events. Realize this, and you will find strength.
> If you are distressed by anything external, the pain is not due to the thing itself, but to your estimate of it; and this you have the power to revoke at any moment.
> —Marcus Aurelius, Meditations

He doesn't contrive schemes to make a female friend desire him. He knows he can do to nothing to make her want him, so he opts for fresh pastures instead. He is the oak tree, impervious to the egos of lesser men, unshakable in the face of female challenge.

How To Build A Beta Male

May 2, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

We spend a lot of time pointing out the flaws of the beta male and the reasons why any self-respecting man ought to avoid resembling one. What we less often do, however, is examine just how it is such men are produced.

The beta can be created in more than one way, but the above 18 minute short film from Denmark titled "Dennis" provides a perfect illustration of how influential a mother can be in that process. I've taken the time to watch it and think you should too, though I understand that not everyone will be able to do so. In any case, I've summarized its key points and provided the time in the video at which they occur for easy viewing.

0:30: Dennis is Danish and this movie takes place in Denmark. Roosh will tell you that place is the land of the beta, and Dennis does nothing to disprove that. Here he takes out a girl's phone number and proceeds to call for a date. He had never spoken to her before, and got the number from a friend—he actually tells her this.

The interaction is textbook pathetic beta game. We'll soon see how this dude (who is huge and quite clearly a fully grown man) got into such a pathetic state.

3:08: Dennis' mother gets home, and we see here the real source of this guy's pathetic behavior. She expects him to cook dinner that night and keep her company, but he tells her he has to go out to a movie. She gets angry, and starts shaming him for daring to have a life. He relents, unwilling to challenge her.

We'll find out later in the movie that Dennis' father was an alcoholic. He's out of the picture, and she has never let Dennis forget about it, consistently telling him in a shaming tone how much he reminds her of his father.

It is almost certain that this dynamic has been constant since childhood. Dennis' mother resents all men because of his father, presumably the distant alpha male who used and abused her (Dennis being the by-product). She coddles Dennis and refuses to let him be a real independent man in any way shape or form, shooting down any masculine independent streak he shows. At the same time, she consistently shames him because he is his father's son, and she cannot stand that man (or any men).

This combination is perfect for building a beta, and has likely repeated itself tens of millions of times throughout the western world. His mother's refusal to let him grow up and concurrent subtle shaming/distrust of him has left him weak. He can't speak up, he rarely looks up when talking to people (poor body language all around), and as we've seen and will continue to see, he knows nothing about how to interact with women.

5:30: This is a quick dinner scene, and it gives us some insight into why things are the way they are in this household. Dennis tells his mother about his training (insinuating that he might finally have a life outside the home) and she immediately quips back with how necessary it is for him to be at home.

Dennis surprisingly shows a little backbone here and is clearly frustrated with his mother's consistent coddling and unwillingness to support anything he does outside the home. He finally asks her when she is going to get a man. Her response?

"Men can't be trusted. You remind me so much of your father."

Did you ever wonder why so many uber-betas have such a hard time being forward and taking what they want, or why others simply behave like overly-emotional women? Bitter, anti-male single moms beat them down from a young age, that's why. His mother has been shaming him since childhood, insisting on how horrible his father was while also consistently implying that he is his father.

Again, this is the perfect beta recipe. His mother dominates his life completely (she allows no life for him away from her) and allows her own insecurities to tear her son down piece by piece. Men like this rarely ever grow up with a backbone because they never had the time to form one.

Loading...

7:30: Dennis begins a date with the cute girl he called at the beginning of the movie. Despite his betatude (the dinner date itself is a big mistake), the guy still has a shot with this girl, who is drinking a little and seems intrigued by his physique. As he walks away at the end, without even attempting to touch her, she invites him to hang out.

9:45: Dennis meets her friends. One thing leads to another, and soon they are asking him to take his shirt off so they can see his muscles. He does, and they start hooting and hollering. Two guys enter to hang out, and Dennis grabs his shirt and leaves quickly, embarrassed. The dudes are dumbfounded as to what he was doing there.

Despite having such an amazing physique and likely incredible strength (he could easily have crushed the two men who arrived), Dennis has no confidence in himself whatsoever. He was too shy to take advantage of the decent vibe he was inadvertently generating in the room with the girls as the center of attention, and the mere sight of a couple of new male faces was enough to scare him off.

Any one of us here could understand that he wasn't in a bad place when it came to getting at that girl he took on the date, and we all know what could—and maybe should—have been done. Dennis can't even think to go that far, though. He's been beaten down for far too long.

14:15: Dennis gets home. He sits in front of his mother who is playing cards by herself and insisting she had a good time. He sits in front of her with his head down, looking absolutely defeated. What she does next may ensure he never completely leaves this state.

She lays the final psychological beat down of the movie. She lets him know subtly that she knows what he was up to, asking if he was drinking and noting that his shirt was on inside out. Finally, she says in a cold tone with a hint of anger: "You remind me so much of your father." She leaves, ignoring him after that.

The movie ends with him in his boxers ready to go to bed. He gets up and crawls into his mother's bed, saying good night before turning the lights off, ending the film.

With this last scene, her domination is complete. This was his most ambitious attempt at having a life yet—he tried to find another woman, and have a normal social life complete with dinner dates, hang-out sessions, and even some alcohol. Unable to sustain this given his upbringing and general inexperience, he was forced to return to her and face her harsh judgement once again, and essentially accept "his place." You can bet that there won't be any more cute girls in his near future.

Such is the life of the beta/omega male. You can rest assured that there are many tens of millions of Dennis' in the western world whose behavior would make us all cringe. Yet they can do nothing else, regardless of how smart or physically impressive they are. This is frequently because their mothers (often angry, bitter women of the kind you saw in this film) will not let them.

The boys grow up either watching the men in the house getting destroyed by their mothers (in cases where the father/stepfather is a mangina foolish enough to subject himself to marriage with such a woman) or hearing their father get insulted constantly and suffering comparison to him, while also being coddled far too much.

This is another reason why men should be careful where they put their seed—a good woman can keep a man reasonably on-track in the absence of a father, but if your seed ends up in the wrong womb (e.g., belonging to a woman like Dennis' mother), there can be disastrous consequences for the child, especially if you're not around.

It is crucial that every self-aware male keep this in mind and avoid contributing to the manufacture of more Dennis' in the future.

The Advantage Of Being A Late-Bloomer

May 3, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

The other day I made the mistake of going on my fake Facebook account and looking up some people I went to high school with. I put on a playlist of all the music I was listening to back then to get me in a nostalgic mood. I don't use Facebook for real since, as any guy with game will tell you, it's a single man's worst enemy for at least 10 or 15 good reasons. I originally opened the fake account for an abandoned troll project and have kept it for the occasional pre-date reconnaissance job. It's amazing what information girls disclose voluntarily.

I started punching in names and, before long, I was trawling friend lists and started remembering names I'd hadn't seen since my crazy ex-girlfriend "accidentally" threw away my high school yearbook not long after graduation. The trend was—like it is for any other red-pill man who has gone through this exercise—remarkably familiar: the girls had become shockingly fat, the dudes disappointingly lame, and nearly everyone seemed to going out of their way to live as ordinary a life as possible. I couldn't decide if it was inspiring or depressing.

Surprisingly, some of the worst cases were the guys who had shown the most promise in high school—stand-out athletes, cool semi-geniuses who I was sure would cure cancer, and stylish players who were banging multiple girls before anyone else was. A surprising number of them now resembled Danny McBride from Eastbound and Down, but without any of irony or comedic value. Many of them were (practically) hitched to fatties or objectively unattractive chicks, who they were lovingly clutching in every other photograph. Even more of them were working nothing office-jobs, a fact they declared by showing pictures of themselves in their beige cubicles wearing ill-fitting suits.

These images brought me no joy. I wasn't a marginalized, quiet nerd in high school who got pushed into lockers by these guys and was praying for celestial payback all these years. They were either my friends or, at least, guys I would nod "wassup" to in the hallway. In high school, I was a pretty middle-of-the-road guy. My claims to fame were my teacher-infuriating (but student-pleasing) class-clown stunts, my silver tongue in insult contests, and being the mastermind of the greatest high school prank in Chester A. Arthur High School* history. I played a couple of sports and, while I was good enough, I didn't particularly distinguish myself in any of them. I was classified as one of the "smarter" kids, but I wasn't winning any best-of contests or giving any speeches at graduation. In retrospect, I was pretty good at talking to girls but, it turns out, terrible at "escalating."

not my real high school's name*

Loading...

The more I thought about it, the more I realized that an overwhelming majority of precocious types I've known—in high school and beyond—have followed a similar pattern. They stand out for a period of time, early in life, only to fade into mediocrity when the well that brought them that distinction dries up. If that supply was high-school sports, for example, their glory rarely lasts for very long after they return their rented caps and gowns. For others, the hey-day comes in college. A few manage to ride the wave a longer, but only a tiny majority parlay their exceptional skills in one thing into a diverse set of enduring life skills.

The other half of the Facebook story is the guys from high school who hadn't gotten fat, who had pictures with legit hotties, pictures from exotic travels, and seemingly interesting lives—at least from the fragments I could piece together through their varying privacy settings. Nearly all of them had been miscellaneous background extras who I barely remembered. One guy, a quiet stoner with buck teeth, whose only job on the junior-varsity basketball team was coming off the bench to take charges, was now co-owner of a sports equipment company. I know 101 percent of people exaggerate their status on Facebook, but you couldn't exaggerate the pictures of this guy's house. Or girlfriend. There were at least three other guys like this: straight-up surprises that nobody would have put any money on, who were now stand-outs, especially in the things we care about—“money, hoes, and clothes,” to quote a famous 1990s poet.

For as long as I’ve been involved in the “game community,” I’ve noticed that an overwhelming majority of guys, especially those most successful with women, were of this latter type—late bloomers. “Naturals,” as they call those with effortless success with women, rarely understand fully, if at all, where their success comes from. They coast on what they have—whether that’s good looks, exceptional athleticism, or some privileged access to a special fishbowl—until it runs out. Sometimes it doesn’t–but those guys tend to be the exception.

Meanwhile, the non-natural, the self-made man, spends those early years watching from the sidelines–whether as a bucked-tooth nerd or a middle-of-the-packer who simply doesn’t stand out as exceptional. But unlike the rest of the pack, he’s paying attention to the mechanism behind people’s behavior. Or, if he doesn’t, something down the line alerts him to this behind-the-scenes reality. Whatever the case, he studies it, takes it apart, and implements it into his own life. As a result, he develops superior social intelligence—the fulcrum for success with women, business, and continual self-improvement. His understanding of what creates success grants him an adaptability—one that naturals rarely develop—that enables him to extend his prime years long into the future. As a consequence, I’m convinced the red pill is an overwhelmingly late-bloomer phenomenon.

Chances are, I’ll never have a “real” Facebook profile, but I’d be more than happy to be another surprise to the high-school class.

9 Facts You Never Knew About Willpower

May 3, 2013 | by Red Pill Theorist | Link | Original Link

Willpower is the capacity to overrule the unconscious desires of the body in order to make rational decisions, like choosing a paleo-compliant avocado over a slice of pizza. No matter what your goal is (50 flags, 315 on the bench, 50 approaches a month, etc.) you're going to need it. Willpower: Rediscovering Humanity's Greatest Strength is a definitive, easy to read book that will bring you up to speed on the latest psychology of willpower. Willpower operates like a kind of mental gasoline. Making conscious decisions uses it up, and it doesn't recharge fully until you get a good night's rest. Here are nine facts about willpower:

1. Monitoring progress improves willpower

Showing someone with poor financial self-control his Visa bill before he makes a purchase activates a region in his brain which is active in people who are successful at managing their finances, and quiet in those who cannot. People who use Mint.com tend to spend less money than people who don't.

2. Glucose matters

Making decisions takes glucose. The brain is the principal energy consumer in the body. The ability to resist temptation is closely tied to glucose levels in the bloodstream. In a state of low glucose, willpower energy becomes depleted. This causes people to revert to the easiest option on a menu of possible choices: the status quo.

In an experiment with the Israeli equivalent of a parole board, the chances of the board granting parole to an inmate prior to lunch approached 20%. After lunch, it approached 65%. Keeping a prisoner in jail is the status quo, the easy decision in this example because it frees the board from considering the ramifications of freeing a potentially still-criminal individual into the general population.

3. The body sends warning signs when you're about to make bad decisions

Willpower depletion can be tricky to self-diagnose, but there are signs: feeling emotions more strongly than usual, difficulty making up one's mind, unusual laziness. Decisions made in this state are almost always suboptimal.

4. Postpone gratification

It can be nigh on impossible to resist temptation head on, but studies show that coming at it obliquely does help augment willpower. When you're at the squat rack, and your body is ready to give up, tell yourself you'll go easier on the next lift. Your feeling of accomplishment from a successful lift may just get you through all the others.

Loading...

5. Disorganization destroys willpower

When the brain has an unfinished task, the task occupies mental energy. When there are a sufficient number of unfinished tasks (most professionals average 150 items on their to-do lists) mental energy is fragmented across these small jobs. At that point, making strides on any of them becomes very difficult. Developing an orderly, specific system for completing tasks is crucial.

6. Making decisions tires out your brain

Making decisions with large numbers of options is willpower depleting. People who are depleted often show an irrational desire not to give up options. This may explain some of the behavior of women who delay marriage. In cities and towns where the dating pool is enormous, the possibility that she may settle for a lesser male increases. So she avoids making the decision entirely, to her own detriment. This may also have some relevance to game. Being at a bar with a large number of other men (even if there is a comparable or greater number of women) probably impedes notch acquisition.

7. Looking at porn is bad for discipline in other areas

Hot women change neurological activity in men's brains. "Men who saw photos of hot women shifted toward getting an immediate reward instead of waiting for a larger payoff in the future. Apparently, the sight of an attractive woman makes men want cash right away." Looking at porn destroys willpower.

8. Seeing your reflection enhances willpower

"Whenever people focused on themselves, they seemed to compare what they saw with some sort of idea of what they should be like." Putting a mirror on the desk, or in the kitchen, helps remind the mind of you of your self-ideal, and stop behavior that might hold back your goals. It's a cheap and easy reality check.

9. Your friends can be major willpower assets

Making a commitment to a friend (referee) strengthens willpower. So do financial penalties. A website called stickk.com allows users to pick any goal they want and choose a penalty when they fail to reach it. Penalties can include things like a donation to a cause a user hates or shame emails sent to family members. "People who draw up a contract without a financial penalty or a referee succeed only 35 percent of the time, whereas the ones with a penalty and a referee succeed nearly 80 percent of the time."

When Having A Harem Makes You Lazy

I've mentioned before that my preferred style is to have a few girls around at any given time. Being able to pick a different girl to see a few times a week has its benefits. First of all you have sex on tap so you can focus on more important things such as your health or the acquisition of money. Maybe you don't like going to bars to drink and pick up women all that often, or maybe you feel your time can be better spent. Fuck buddies provide two things: convenience and variety.

Like most men I enjoy the high you get after having sex with a woman within a few hours of meeting her, but more often than not I'd take seeing a girl for a few months over one or two drunken SNLs a month. Call me a romantic, but I enjoy spending time with the girls I choose to have sex with. I'd rather have the knowledge and memories you get from seeing a girl for a few months over the fleeting feeling of a drunken hookup.

However, there is a point at which having a steady rotation of women becomes a rationalization for laziness. A girl you keep around should always bring something more than average sex to the table. Whether it be: crazy kinky sex, someone to discuss movies with, someone who enjoys cooking as much as you etc. You should always try to learn something about either yourself or life when spending a few hours a week with a girl for a few months. One girl does not have to fit every role of your ideal woman, but she should at least have something in common with her.

I had what I thought was the ideal situation for a few months—3 girls at any time I had on call who I'd normally see once a week and in those same months a few new girls who either replaced the old ones or were a one night stand. As time went on though, I started focusing much more on things other than girls, so much so that they were just in the background. My approaches were few and far between. It finally hit me how rusty my game had gotten when I moved away, regained the hunger, and started approaching girls again.

4 Signs You Should Drop A Girl From Your Rotation

1. You hesitate: provided she is not overly attached let's say you get a text with a sexy picture begging for you to come over and have your way with her. A slight moment of hesitation will tell you how attracted you really are to her. If you think "but I'd rather watch ___ " or "I was going to get to bed early tonight and it will take me 10 minutes to get there an hour or two to bang and hang out then 10 minutes to get back… I'll be exhausted in the morning," you might just be keeping her around for convenience sake.

2. You use her as a masturbatory aid: a few moments fantasizing about Emily Ratajkowski blowing you instead of your girl is completely healthy, but if you need to fantasize about fucking other girls just to get off there's something wrong with the situation you're in. You need to drop the girl as quickly as possible and replace her with the girl you're fantasizing about.

3. She is always your plan B: if you have to consistently fall back on any particular girl because your game is off at the bar you might want to check your game. It's easy to keep the cycle going and just end up always seeing the girl. If you can't get laid with new girls so you fall back on an old one you'd be better off re-evaluating your game and starting from scratch.

4. You don't like spending time with her: aside from the sex what do you two share? Do you watch a certain TV show after you bang, are you more interested in the TV show than her? Do you wonder more about when she is going to leave (so you can get back to what you want to be doing) than enjoying the presumably great sex you just had?

All of these signs are a result of laziness, the complacency that can come with seeing a girl for an extended period of time. As Roosh once wrote "Complacency is second only to laziness as a game killer." You get comfortable with her, but every once and a while you'll be itching for more. As soon as she stops bringing value to the table and as soon as you lose your desire to go meet new women, you are beginning to tread water. Regression of your skills will result.

Kiss Talks About Groupies On Oprah

May 4, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Gene Simmons and Paul Stanley showed up on enemy territory to talk about banging groupies in the video above. Oprah tried to gently shame them, along with audience members, who have trouble believing that women want to fuck famous men. Gene holds his own, never losing his cool and responding with the only reasonable arguments you'll hear during the show, especially when Oprah suggests that he's leading on these poor groupies who think a relationship will develop after banging him backstage.

Here are the highlights:

12:35: Rock groupie is railing on Gene for things he didn't say. She obviously has been pumped and dumped by rock stars and is not happy about it.

17:10: Audience girl on the right wants to bang.

~18:30: There seems to be a hierarchy with bands—not all bands get equal amounts of pussy. It seems that Kiss were at the top.

25:57: Fat girl is mad.

Loading...
27:50: Supergroupie admits to banging the same amount of partners as Gene (at least 2,000 in the past 10 years).

29:10: There wasn't a groupie culture back in the 1960s. One groupie remarked how it was simple to get backstage, but now it's getting harder.

33:00: White knight is mad that they are making music to get laid instead of for the music alone.

Gene is so unapologetic about his lifestyle that even if you were a church-going monogamous man, it's hard not to admire him.

This was perhaps the first time that feminist arguments about objectifying women were displayed in the mainstream (thanks Oprah), and at the same time we get some red pill wisdom in return.

The Parable of Aepyornis Island

May 5, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

It is a shame that the short stories of H.G. Wells have been largely forgotten. For they showcase his keen interest in science and technology, along with a burning sense of moral passion quite unbecoming in an author of "scientific romances" (as he would say). I have so loved many of Wells's writings. Long concerned with the creation of earthly utopias through socialistic experiments and universal educational advancement, he nevertheless died a disillusioned man, convinced that humanity would be unable to cope with the challenges of modern society. In Wells's view:

Man + technology = 0

Meaning that when you mix humanity with advancement, you get a negation. You get nothing but self-destruction. Annihilation, basically. Wells died a pessimist because he persisted in scouring the earth for Fabian socialist utopias: in Russia, in England, anywhere. And he never found them, of course. He could never quite accept the fact that man is human, with all of his attendant foibles, warts, messes, and sulphur-fumes. Could not accept it. Why couldn't he accept it? In some men, the ideal just dies hard.

His 1905 story Aepyornis Island highlights this inner, unresolved conflict. The plot: a biologist exploring remote regions in Madagascar hunts for evidence of an immense, long-extinct flightless bird called Aepyornis vastissimus. Never seen by European eyes, the bird stood nearly fifteen feet tall and supposedly died out in the 1400s. The biologist chances upon a preserved nest of melon-sized eggs in a jungle swamp, protected for centuries by some freak of climate and soil, and takes them away in his boat. The boat becomes wrecked soon after, and the biologist finds himself marooned on a deserted island with a monstrous Aepyornis egg. The egg hatches, and out comes this feathered anachronism after hundreds of years of hibernation. It is very cute, at first. The biologist showers it with love, attention, and care. All seems blissfully wonderful. Idyllic. And all is rivers of honey and gum-drop trees. On a deserted island. And our biologist is enraptured.

And then things turn sour.

As the Aepyornis reaches adulthood, the biologist becomes uncomfortably aware that the animal is not a precious snowflake. It has a nasty and foul temper. It is greedy. And cruel. Soon enough the colossal bird attacks him, delivering sledge-hammer kicks that leave him swollen and bloody. And then it is all-out warfare. The once loving couple now stalk each other over the island, with savage bloodlust, in a vicious fight to the death. In the last scene, the biologist grapples furiously with the bird by the shoreline, sawing at its neck with his rusty knife in a murderous rage, hot blood spilling over the pure white sand. One is reminded of the desperate struggle in Jack London's Love of Life, where a starving man and wolf shadow each other across a frozen wasteland in a horrifying duel to the death.

Loading...

What, then, are we to make of such a story? Is it just another variation on the "be careful what you wish for" cliché? Or is there something darker, something deeper?

Consider the bird. Is he a symbol? Of course. But of what, exactly?

He is a symbol of our innermost, deepest Wish-Fulfillment. Our deepest Blood-Desire. And man, like the biologist in the story, is required to chase down and possess this deepest Wish-Fulfillment. Required to: if we are to be men. Nothing optional about it. We nurture this wish, covet it, and care for it, as the biologist did with his precious ancient cargo of eggs.

And then: chase it down, and hunt it down. And kill it. Possess it utterly. And this is never a pretty sight. For the process of hunting down and possessing our deepest desire is never as clean and easy as your typical springtime Easter egg hunt. One never emerges unscathed. It can be a ghastly, brutal process. And yet a necessary one. It is a cathartic, violent process. For it is only in this way that man can advance, grow, and move forward: much like being reborn. And this is why Wells was wrong in his belief that man and his implements of technology cancel each other out. The true moral equation should be:

Man + technology = MAN

I wish I could write it larger than that. MAN. That is, man and his tools—even if he wields only a rusty knife—are enough for him to master his environment. We—our tools and ourselves—don't negate each other: we complement each other.

I am a man, and I am master of my environment. Here I stand. With only a rusty knife in my hand. I am a man! And in the right hands, my dull, rusty knife here by my side is enough. It can slice through any Gordian knot I desire. We need only the will to use it. I am the captain of my ship, I am the master of my soul. I am the artisan of my fate. I. And only I.

And that is why I, unlike Wells, am an optimist. I know our Great Day is coming. You can just feel it. Because there is no other way, really. If we are to move forward to our own Great Day as men, we must go through this mortal hunt. This chasing down. Of our innermost Blood-Being and Blood-Desire. Even if it means we must grapple with our own inner, prehistoric monsters, and fight them to the death. With blood bubbling into our clean white sand. It must be done.

Must.

And there is no going back: for any reversion, any volte-face, would be the death of us, by gradual decomposition, as men. A real spiritual abandonment, and a corresponding degeneration of us, as men. We just can't go back. For our souls would decompose. The biologist couldn't go back, you can't go back, and I know that I couldn't go back, either. So it is only forward, forward, forward.

And once we accept this, we can approach the dawn of our own Great Day.

Changing Your Operating System

May 5, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

How do you change not just your habits, but your entire life routine? How do you lift yourself out of comfort and tackle something completely different than what you're used to? Derek Sivers recently posted a transcript of an interview he did about this topic, and while it's a long read, it's well worth your time. Some highlights:

> I felt like I needed to shatter my habits. So my little mini slogan was, "Wherever you used to say 'yes' say 'no' and wherever you used to say 'no' say 'yes'." Reversing all of the things you used to do and trying the opposite… I would use that even on a little micro level. I see the gorgeous girl across the room and I'm like "Ahhh!" terrified to talk to her! Then I remember, "Whatever scares you go do it! So here we go.." and I would just walk up to the girl that intimidates me and say hello. Then of course she's wonderful or not, whatever it is, but I walk away no longer scared. Now I just have that approach through life. I think whatever scares you go do it, because then it won't scare you anymore.
> I wanted to make it impossible for me to get stuck in a rut. So my mission was to spend the rest of my life outside of the US, mainly because I loved it too much. Santa Monica in particular. When I got to Santa Monica, I just felt "This is it, I have arrived. Like I love this place. I love these people. I love the food. I love the weather. I love everything. This is it. This is my home. This is where I belong."
> But that feeling kind of scares me, because it's like that thing when people get to a certain age and say "This is who I am. This is how I like my eggs. This is where I live." I didn't feel it was time to stop progressing, even in my physical location. So my challenge to my self is to live the rest of my life outside the US, because I love California too much.
> Loading…
> I went to New York City for 3 days, passing through for a friend's wedding, and I met this gorgeous girl and we had this great first date, we're all swooning over each other. So on our second date I said, "How would you feel about leaving the US and never coming back?" She looked at me for a second, kind of squinted and said, "Yeah, I could do that." And so then we had a third date and that's my wife.
> She's joined me on this mission to spend the rest of our life out of the US, even if it's uncomfortable. Even if it'd just be the easy and comfortable thing to just go back to Santa Monica to what I know well. It's the idea of kind of forcing yourself to keep progressing.
> It's really tempting to think it's the exciting quick fix adventure thing of hopping on a plane and quitting your job and breaking up your relationship. That's fun but > be really honest with yourself that maybe the thing to get you out of your rut is finally acting on the thing that you have been avoiding for years.

While reading the transcript all I could do is nod my head. I share a lot of beliefs with Derek, and even though we lead separate lives, the main drivers behind them (adventure, avoidance of comfort, tackling new challenges) are the same. I remarked upon this when I reviewed his book…

> I met the author of this book in Rio, after already having been a fan of his blog. We talked a little about life, business, and travel, surprised that so many of our beliefs were similar yet our paths so different. He poured his energy into music and business while I poured mine into women and writing. I hold him up to be a business role model, a guy on the same page as myself who brought value to his customers over several years and was greatly rewarded for it.

So it's no surprise that when Derek speaks, I listen.

Why There Are No 10’s

May 6, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The dangers of pedestalization are well documented in the manosphere, but one source of that peril is frequently overlooked: the myth of “the 10”, and the dangers of buying into it.

You’ve all heard it before.

“She’s a solid 10”

“Perfect, she’s a 10/10!”

A 10 implies perfection. When you hand out that label, you’re basically saying that there is absolutely nothing wrong with that girl, nothing at all that’s even slightly less than perfect on her. Even the most beautiful women have some sort of flaw physically and probably at least a couple of additional intangible imperfections. They themselves can often be very forthcoming about these flaws, and that is to be expected. Imperfection is our reality. They are all humans, and humans are naturally imperfect.

When you give out a “10”, you imply otherwise—that she’s transcended human norms of imperfection and become flawless or goddess-like. This is a mentality that naturally lends itself to the supplication and widespread pedestalization that has become rampant in our society. Men are too willing to elevate good-looking women into the realm of the divine where no human belongs.

Think about a girl in your mind who you've ever seen labeled a 10. Is she truly flawless? Is there nothing about her that, were you a god, you would make better? Could her boobs be shaped a little more pleasingly? Is her face the prettiest you've ever seen? If her face is the prettiest, then does she have a good waist-to-hip ratio to go with it? How are her teeth—could they be whiter? Could her stomach be tighter? Could she have better legs or height? I could go on.

The bottomline is that an objectively flawless woman (a real "10") cannot be nitpicked. If you can find anything at all you'd like better on her, she isn't a 10. If a large number of other men can find something they don't like (even if you can't quite do it yet), then she isn't a 10. After all, if a girl were truly perfect there really wouldn't be any significant number of men who could find obvious fault with her. Human subjectivity prevents this (beauty, though based on objective traits, is subjective beyond a certain point).

Put simply, if any other girl does any one thing (face, hips, etc) better than her, she isn't a 10. She isn't without flaws.

Loading…

The use of this label has a couple of impacts. Firstly, we talk about many girls having inflated egos, and I honestly believe this is part of why. We have too many guys telling them that they are perfect, flawless, entirely without fault and unable to do wrong. If you were that girl getting the “10” label all the time (on top of all the other kinds of red carpet treatment men give you), you’d probably have the same flaky attitude. People have basically said that you are perfection—you can’t be wrong. Why settle for any given guy when you’ve been deemed perfect and absolutely flawless?

On the other hand, even the vainest and most gorgeous women are aware of the fact that they are a) human and b) flawed in some way(s). This raises questions about precisely which signals the men using these “perfect ten” labels are sending to the girls they’re attaching them to. Since these realities are painfully obvious to her, she has to make one of three conclusions when she encounters a man who seems oblivious to them:

1. The man is simply too stupid to see these realities.
2. The man is too desperate or thirsty to acknowledge them.
3. Some combination of the above.

Regardless of which conclusion she settles on, the end result is the same: a man who isn't capable of recognizing these realities couldn't be worth much.

When guys ignore such realities and continue to hold females to a standard that even the girls themselves know they can't objectively meet, they engage in dangerous pedestalization and risk displaying very low value. Self-aware men should recognize this risk, and avoid it. Recognize that all women (even the most gorgeous) are people just like you, not goddesses immune to the realities of human imperfection. Once you've done that, proceed to treat them accordingly.

Do this, and you'll have taken a small but significant step forward in the drive to calm the pedestalization epidemic, while also adopting a mindset whose honesty holds more appeal to women than any supplicating praise could hope to. Despite some claims to the contrary, women (especially those who are more attractive and have many options) are constantly looking for ways to separate the masculine chaff (desperate, needy, insecure, supplicating, beta) from the more worthy wheat. The overuse by some men of the “ten” label and its implied perfection (perfection nearly all women know they can’t actually match) only makes it easier for them to spot the chaff.

The Future Of The Manosphere

May 6, 2013 | by Balboa | Link | Original Link

You might have noticed the jaded air wafting through your favorite sites recently. Prominent bloggers and personalities in the manosphere have been repeating themselves, confessing to dissatisfaction with their conquests, or just folding up tents and moving on. Are the lifestyles they preached really so unsatisfying? Maybe the red pill was just a fad, or these men are burning out and quietly returning to the mainstream, like hippies in 1973. However, I believe there is another explanation.

These pioneers are simply casting off for further shores, and they're going alone, or with a small group of companions, not a large audience. They are building the next stage of the men's awakening, in the form of a myriad of smaller, focused groups of men realizing their dreams both on-line and off. It will be more positive and creative, focused on achieving dreams and goals rather than simply Game ('sphere 1.0) or diagnosing the ills of modern culture (2.0).

I use the term manosphere unapologetically, because despite its faintly silly ring, it accurately delineates the core of blogs and sites that have shaped the thinking of a loose tribe of men since around 2008. This could be also called the Roissy-sphere, as the pseudonymous DC blogger was perhaps the main catalyst.

Roosh then added his uniquely simple insight, namely that Anglosphere women sucked in comparison to those of the rest of the world, kicking off what is probably the best broad online community we have right now. Other figures have been almost equally important, so mentally add in your favorites, and then there is the legion of worthy second-tier blogs.

But the Roissy-sphere is in fact manosphere 2.0, as it couldn't have existed without the legion of PUA/seduction sites as far back as the late 90s. As a participant in the early days of fastseduction.com, a time of Ross Jeffries vs Tyler Durden flamewars and a succession of now-forgotten gurus. Let me tell you that this manosphere 1.0 was exciting, empowering and necessary, but also incomplete and primitive. Beaten down by the rampant feminism of the 1990s—all Oprah, date-rape scaremongering and Ritalin—men regrouped by creating checklists of body language to emulate, IOIs to look for, and techniques to open mixed 5-sets.

But those men got a little older, had some success with women, and found themselves facing a slightly different set of problems. They could get laid. But they were increasingly aware of the gynocentric expectations of society, and the deteriorating quality of Western women as long-term partners. Finally came awareness of the emasculating power of the state, taxing and regulating obedient males beyond the point of tolerance, and then removing the traditional incentive of a role as head of the family. The ranks of the MRAs and MGTOWs swelled, but for confident, adventurous men of the world these are not satisfactory responses—MRAs were shrill and focused on elusive legal reforms, while MGTOWs merely raised a white flag as they were squeezed out of the sexual marketplace.

I believe that the current manosphere is in transition, as there are now significant numbers of men who have been educated in its ideas for several years, and not only that, have taken action and succeeded in changing their lives. We have learned game, we have lifted heavy, we have traveled and experienced relations with women from other hemispheres, and we might have even fired our boss. Or perhaps we haven't done all these things yet, but we are nevertheless on the path.

Loading...
So just as there came a point when you no longer needed to read constantly about new openers or how to neg effectively, it's no longer so important to read about the evils of feminism, the obesity epidemic, or female hypergamy. And a lot of the bloggers who opened our eyes are moving on, too, to the next stage of their lives.

The Future

What then is that next stage? I believe that there will no longer be a central online hub for men who have fully realized the red pill and are living out their lives boldly, adventurously, and without regard to the precepts of a decadent and gynocentric society. These are truly the men going their own way. Not MGTOWs playing video games and giving up on sex for fear of false rape charges, but men scattered all over the earth, creating and shaping their environments in their own image. Though not necessarily immediately visible, their impact will be great, most of all in their own lives and the lives of those around them.

Although I call the next stage manosphere 3.0, that's somewhat tongue-in-cheek. We won't need to latch on to a label, or to bookmark the same sites. We will just be doing our own thing, each in his own way. And the happier and more successful we get, the less we need to rail against the evils of society. We already know that many folks are fat and lazy, that women are following their own imperatives, and that there is no point in pinning hope on any political movement. Check, check and check. We move on and and pursue our goals, more centered in ourselves, more specialized in our tasks, and happily ignoring the play-by-play of the mainstream.

But although I see the next stage as very individualistic, it won't be done alone. It's only natural to form solid, real-world bonds of friendship with like-minded people. Manosphere 3.0 will be a multitude of clans and communities pursuing their own goals, of business, lifestyle, or whatever they choose. This will happen naturally and organically.

What then of manosphere 2.0? Some of the names may change, but there will continue to be discussion along the lines of what we have shared for the last several years. And in fact there will be increasing numbers of places, online and off, where men will be newly exposed to red pill thinking, with all the accompanying stages of denial, anger and adjustment. Places like the Red Pill subreddit will play an important role here, as masculine conservatism goes mainstream in a similar way to game going mainstream after 2005. (Of course, I don’t mean mainstream in the sense of a celebratory Time magazine article, but in the sense that most young men will be exposed to the key ideas, whether they agree with them or not.)

And so the world will continue to change, one person at a time. It’s an exciting time to watch the big-picture of the cultural landscape, but manosphere 3.0 will not be a social movement or a network of blogs. It will be your own journey, as you embark on a voyage of exploration and conquest of your own making, leaving behind the restrictions of the homeland to sail into the wind, no certain landfall ahead, but confident in your sea legs, your steel and your choice of trusted companions.

Stop Watching Sports

May 7, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I live in an area of the country where people are absolutely obsessed with college and pro football. This is the typical weekend schedule for 70% my city during the winter months:

Saturday:

- 10am – Wake up and start drinking
- 1-10pm – Watch college football
- 10pm – 2am – Go to the bar

Sunday:

- 10am – Wake up
- 11am – Get drunk at tailgate for the local NFL team
- 1pm – Watch local NFL team game
- 4pm -10pm – Watch other NFL teams play for fantasy sports purposes

Look, I get it. Drinking can be fun. Nachos are tasty. Sports are at least notionally "cool." But why are you willing to devote entire weekends of your precious free time to watching other men accomplish things? Would you ever sit around spectating at your buddy's effort to repaint the walls, or crack open a beer and relax on the couch watching your friend work feverishly on his business idea? If not, then why would you watch people you'll never meet engaging in contrived contests that have no meaningful impact on your life?

I enjoy the odd sporting event as much as the next guy. Freakish athletes doing things that I am incapable of is a spectacle worthy of occasional attention. Beyond that level of involvement, though, your sports fandom is a terrible time sink with no discernible return on investment. An American football game lasts 3 hours. If you watched one fewer football game per week, you could:

Loading...

- Do an intense weight-training and HIIT workout (1 hour)
- Juice vegetables to help your health (30 minutes)
- Go go the coffee shop and talk to a woman (1 hour)
- Practice writing or another language skill (30 minutes)

Americans fetishize sports because the distraction prevents them from contemplating the lack of meaning in their own lives. Henpecked husbands and manboobs who lack the drive to get off the couch would rather fight their wives tooth and nail for 3 free hours to "watch the game" than face the idea that their spouses, bosses, corporations, and debt dictate their existence.

Sports has supplanted religion as the modern opiate of the masses. Just as Martin Luther was excommunicated for pointing out that indulgences were a scam, any protest to Joe Schlub in his Peyton Manning jersey about sports not affecting his life is likely to turn you into an outcast. You may have to change your social circles if they are built around going to the bar and watching sports, but in the long run this is a supremely positive move.

Most people cannot accept that events on football fields and basketball courts have zero relevance to their lives. The sooner you internalize this fact, the closer you come to maximizing the short time you have on this earth.

Take The No-Shampoo Challenge

May 7, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

One of my smartest friends advised me to stop using shampoo. He said that shampoo dries out the hair and makes it necessary to use “hair product” in order to bring your hair to life again. I hated spending money on shampoo and hair spray, plus I didn’t like the look that contemporary hair care gave me, and so, being a perfectionist, I decided to embark on the No-Shampoo challenge. Here is the story of my hair’s journey.

Process: Daily shower. Once per week, a light sprinkling of baking soda to help clean out any major impurities and grease chunks. The amount I used was less than a dime-size of baking soda.

Note: You’ll have to forgive me in advance for the crappy resolution of my cell phone camera. I’m not into photography.

Week 0

This is my hair after a wash with shampoo and some product. If you notice, the hair is flat and lacks any sort of volume or texture. The bangs needed to be pushed to the side on the front because it fell down in chunks. I was not happy with my hair at this stage. This would be the last time I used shampoo – after this, I did one more final wash to get the product of my hair and threw out my shampoo bottle.

Week 4

The first four weeks were the most painful part of the process. Grease chunks had taken hold of my hair in various places and made it thick to the point of of jungle, wild-like hair. It was a bit of a pain to manage as well because the natural oils that your scalp produces are only secreted from the base of the hair follicle – so while the tips of my hair became dried and frayed, from the lack of any moisture, the new hair growing out of the scalp was thick with oil.

Thankfully, baking soda once per week helped to keep my hair salvagable. I never had any odor but the baka soda did really do a number on the tips of my hair, since that part of my hair lacked any oils to begin with, and the split ends were quite noticeable and messy.

By this point, I began to see results. A natural gloss and shine started to come through, and I noticed that I could finally see texture between all the pieces of my hair. The split ends had finally received some of the natural oils from the scalp, while grease chunks became less and less frequent. It seemed my head was adjusting to not receiving a nuclear bomb treatment of chemicals every day, and was producing less oils to compensate.

Even still, my hair was LONG by this point. I had a mullet and the bangs were so long I had to keep brushing them out of my eyes. Pretty much everyone I talked to assumed I was a pot head. Although I thought about getting innovative and doing some pothead game, I decided it was time for a cut.

Week 8

Loading…

This was my hair on the day of the cut. My hair was a little raw and tender from the cut, and doesn’t look as good as it did before the cut. I partly blame myself because I did not give proper instructions to my hair stylist – even though I told him not to use any shampoo or product in my hair, I told him to cut my sides shorter than the front, so it looks a bit uneven. Also, this picture is a bit darker than the others – not sure what happened here, I’m guessing the lighting mechanism on my cell phone didn’t adjust properly for this shot.

However, the split ends, remaining grease chunks, and mullet was gone so things were in proper formation to grow out anew. You can still see a natural sheen and gloss coming out of my hair at this point. I was excited to see results after months of effort.

The end result. A smooth, sleek, shiny head of hair with layered texture between all the pieces. My bangs flow like gentle waves across a clear lake. Styling is effortless. Because there's no product, the hair is constantly re-adjustable regardless of what happens to it. For example, this shot was taken after I had woken up from a nap – I merely brushed my hair around a bit with my hands and took the shot.

It's great to have movie star hair. I had been avoiding going out at night, due to cold weather and a general dissatisfaction with the girls in my city, but I figured it would be a waste if I didn't show the world my amazing hair. So when the first warm night came, I went out and every single girl I approached or danced with responded. Zero blow outs. One girl bought me a drink and invited me to another bar with her and her fat friend. I wanted more attention so I went. At the next bar I saw two guys in suits and complemented their attire. I told them I liked to suit up, but didn't because I was planning on dancing. They responded that I didn't need to wear a suit.

The girl I was with dragged me out of that bar and took me to another one. She told me she had a boyfriend and kissed me. We went inside and there was a birthday party going on. I approached the birthday group and the birthday girl came up to me and asked me to come home with her. She wasn't good looking enough for that so I told her she looked young for her age and went off to talk to other girls, some of whom turned out to be terrible bitches.

The girls I came with gave me another drink and by this point I really needed to go to the bathroom, so I went to find the bathroom and the birthday girl was there and pulled me into the ladies room and gave me a blowjob. Then I went to the men's room and took a leak. When the girls I came with asked me where I had been, I told them "there was a line" and she asked me if I had any weed, which I did, but the fat friend did a reverse cockblock* out on the street and prevented her from going anywhere else with me.

There’s really no substitute for a great haircut – it easily increases your looks value by a point or more on the ten scale. The no-shampoo challenge has been an amazing success for me, and, so far, everyone I know who has taken the red pill on hair-care has loved the results – both men and women. However, it does take a bit of patience as it took me nearly two months before I saw any results. If you have longer hair, it will take longer before the hair transformation is complete.

That said – what do you have to lose?

* Reverse Cockblock: “Oh, you know what? Just go home with him. You should go. Have a good time. Just go. I don’t care.” <—- Most effective cockblock line in the world. Even if she goes home with you, she’ll still feel like a slut as soon as you make a move on her and the LMR will be insurmountable.

Do Not Buy Her Dinner

May 8, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

[image]
This past Friday, I realized how far I've come in understanding women.

Two years ago I remember taking this very pretty girl out on a date. Let's call her Ashley. I had just broken up with my old girlfriend and was setup on a blind date. Per persuasion from my mother and sister (and I not being strong enough to listen to my own beliefs), I picked Ashley up and took her to a nice wine bar and restaurant. We had dinner, a glass of wine, and towards the end she mentioned how tired she was and that she'd like to go home, but that "we should definitely hang out again." So like a nice gentlemen I obliged and took Ashley home. And I never heard from her again.

Fast forward to the present. One of the girls I'm ~~fucking~~ seeing, told me she had plans for dinner with a friend on Friday night, but she'd like to "hook up" later if I was around. I told her that can be arranged. I had gone out every night last week, so when Friday came around I was sitting at home watching the NBA playoffs and just relaxing. She texted me around 9:45 p.m. that she was just finishing up dinner and that she'd be home soon. I told her I'd meet her there.

I put on my stained DARE shirt over a decade old, some loose jeans and sandals and headed over. We immediately had sex and while we were laying around after, I thought I'd verify what I was presuming:

> Me: Who'd you go to dinner with?
> Her: My friend Peter.
> Me: Ah, so you had a date?
> Her: No it was not a date! We are just friends.
> Me: Really. Let me ask you something…did he pay for dinner?
> Her: Well..yes. But he knows we are just friends.
> Me: He wants to sleep with you.
> Her: He knows that's not going to happen.
> Me: Has he tried to kiss you ever?
> Her: No. Well, sort of. He tried a pre-kiss.
> Me: What the hell is a pre-kiss?
> Her: He tried to hint at kissing me by kind of moving around weirdly near my face. I don't know how to explain it, but I could tell he was thinking of kissing me.
> Me: Didn't he wonder why you were leaving so early on a Friday night?
> Her: Yeah he wanted to go get drinks after, but I told him I had to get up early to > go hiking with a friend so I couldn't… (guilty smile)

Of course going hiking with a friend was actually coming back to have sex with me, after Peter had taken her out for dinner already. Which brings me to the main point for today:

Never Buy Dinner Prior To Banging

If you have been a student of the game by now you know this tenet very well as it's almost common knowledge (e.g. see #13 here). But since the above just happened to me, I thought I'd point it out in case any beginners or doubters still think otherwise. Initially, aside from the potential of being a chump who she uses for free food, dinner dates are counterproductive to the end goal of sex. The large meals soak up any alcohol you may have given her, sobering her up and increasing her inhibitions. It can be awkwardly long. You may have to sit across from each other at a table. She may perceive you as trying to buy her affection (spoiler – you are). It's expensive. And sadly in America, asking a girl to dinner = being a creeper.

Then there is the situation demonstrated by the anecdote above. Buying her dinner will not make her want to have sex with you. She's already decided that way beforehand. It's better to be the one that fucks her after than to entertain her prior. If she demands dinner, she was just using you anyway so move on.

The Two Exceptions

There are however two situations where purchasing a meal and/or having dinner can actually increase your chance of coitus:

1. The Home Dinner Date.

Roosh does a great explanation here, so I won't repeat it but rather only append to it. It's a great screener to see if she's interested in sex, because if you tell her you are going to cook, and she agrees to come over, she knows that you will be trying for sex. As a bonus here is one of my secrets: the first thing you should have her do is chop an onion. It will make her tear, potentially smear her makeup and you can poke fun at her and it immediately cuts all the awkwardness to the extent there was any to begin with. When cooking move her around by the waist a lot, touch her hand/arm to show her how to do things, and so on. You can physically escalate a lot. I've had great success doing the home dinner date.

2. The Weekend Brunch Date.

Yes you read that right. Brunch. Some view it as gay, some view it as girly, but guess what? Shit works. Next to my previous apartment there was a bar that offered brunch with bottomless mimosas. So I tried a date there. Since it's a bottomless drink and they refill mimosas every time they walk by, you don't really know how many you have had. And you don't have to affirmatively request another one, they just fill it up. So you eat, drink many mimosas and it's only 3pm. She should have nowhere else to go. It's too early for her weekend night plans. Offer any reason to go back to your place, maybe a glass of water to “sober up” or smoke a cigarette on your patio and run standard escalation and you will have a good chance at a bang. I’ve also had a lot of success implementing this date.

After The Bang

I actually like to treat a girl to a drink or nice meal. It coincides with my natural desire to provide and fosters the evolutionary roles of men and women in how the man provides and the woman is provided for. The problem is in Western culture if you provide before you penetrate, you’re a pussy. So you have to tweak the process. If you’ve now had sex with her, and you liked the sex or you like hanging out with her, I see no reason to not take her to a casual dinner or whatever else is within your means. In the end, however, it’s in your best interests to adopt a Pavlovian approach to women where you reward good behavior (sex) with treats (dinner,dates, and time).

How Not To Mean What You Say

May 8, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

Have you noticed all the hypocrisy that surrounds us no matter where we turn? It seems that we have gotten used to having people say one thing but do the opposite.

I can’t remember how many times I heard some guy say about how “spiritual” he is and how much he doesn’t care about money or material possessions only to see him drive away in a shiny Porsche or BMW shortly after. I’ve also noticed repeatedly that if someone says that they don’t care about money, it’s a sure sign they very much do—a lot. There is nothing wrong with caring about money, but there’s a big difference between being honest about its value and being in denial about idolizing it.

I have gone on quite a few dates with women who wouldn’t shut up about how accomplished and independent they were. They probably didn’t realize how ridiculous they looked to me when I would walk them back at the end of our date to their beat up car that belonged in the junk yard.

One of the more entertaining hypocritical statements that some women make is along the lines of: “I am not high maintenance; I just like nice things” or “I don’t care about money or meeting a rich guy. I just want to have a comfortable life without stressing out about money, my job, etc…”

The other seemingly harmless and typical claim that’s often charged with so much hypocrisy is any statement that start with “Trust me.” When I hear this from someone I don’t know, I am really temped to respond with “Why should I?” Trust is earned through a repeated showing of reliability and character, not because you say so.

Loading…

There is one place, however, where hypocrisy truly thrives more than anywhere else – the online dating world. Don’t you just love it when someone says in their profile: “I am always happy.” How is that possible? Even a double daily dose of Xanax is not going to keep you happy 100% of the time. Do these people who live in that supposedly constant state of bliss deceive others as much as themselves? Is “always happy” synonymous with being bipolar and suicidal, the same way as “single and fabulous” became synonymous with lonely and desperate, thanks to Sex and the City?

But hey, can we blame individuals for being hypocrites if the entire nation carries a big flag of hypocrisy on its shoulders? The next time you hear the “it’s a free country”, ask yourself whether freer countries exist where prostitution and light drugs have been legalized many years ago and where you can drink a beer on the beach. These are the same countries where dubious laws don’t paralyze men in the workplace with the fear of sexual harassment lawsuits that can blacklist them from their careers.

Abolishing hypocrisy on a personal and national level should be the first major step toward cleansing our minds and seeing things for the way they really are. Once we stop assuring others of who we are as individuals and as a nation, and instead let our actions speak rather than words, we will save ourselves from conflict and disappointment—with others and with ourselves.

Why Modern Dating Is Like Illegal Alaskan Halibut Fishing

In Alaska in the early 1990s, the population of halibut was in decline. The authorities tried to stem the fall by increasingly limiting fishing to certain periods of the year, to the point where there were only a few days left per year in which fishermen could legally catch halibut. According to Overfishing by Ray Hilborn, under this system there were "incentives for fishermen to buy ever bigger boats in order to beat the others to the catch" (p. 39).

They were "forced out to sea by a limited season. Gear losses were high, wasting both the fish hooked to it and money for replacement gear." On those few days, fishermen would make a mad dash to get as much halibut as possible – after all, that was the only time they could do it. "Two thousand or more boats might enter the fishing grounds, regardless of weather conditions, each setting excessive amounts of gear in a make-or-break race to land a full year's catch. [Source]" If these fishermen were more cautious, they would be left with an inferior catch, or none at all.

The Men of Today

Men today are in similar straits. Today, men resort to unhealthy spending for just a glimmer of female attention. The sailors setting out on a mad dash for halibut, risking their expensive equipment, remind me of one of the wolf-packs of men prowling the nation's clubs throwing down hundreds of dollars for bottle service in the hopes of catching something. Consider the modern woman and you'll see why. Nowadays, any girl who is somewhat young and attractive has a veritable conga line of men jostling for her attention. Facebook, texting, Snapchat, Instagram, OKCupid, the club, the bar, and so on.

She double- and triple-books her schedule just to ensure she gets a constant flood of validation from men, girlfriends and even the waiters and bartenders she loves to order around.

American men: alone, spendthrift and driven to drink

When a strange man meets a woman like this, often he has one single solitary date in which to have sex with her. Else, the week after their first date, she… has no openings in her schedule. She has to work extra that week. Her friends are scared that they'll lose a member of the slutty single sisterhood and have convinced her not to go out with him again. He voted Republican in the last election. Whatever the excuse, his impression on her will fade with time; given a week without face-to-face contact, he will be such a distant memory that she will turn him down to get cupcakes with Bertha. She will suddenly not 'find the time' for a second date, unless they had sex on the first one. After a steady diet of one night stands, Twilight and Mad Men, she may even subconsciously consider him a pussy for not banging her on the first date. After all, a couple months ago she had sex with that cute guy in the bar that night, so if it's taking "so long" to have sex with this new man, maybe "it just wasn't meant to be."

Grandmaster of the Thug Life, Niccolò Macchiavelli

This fatalism of women attests to the words of Niccolò Machiavelli, that "she allows herself to be mastered by the adventurous rather than by those who go to work more coldly." Ironically, it's the liberated woman who most rewards the sexually aggressive man – a man who fails to 'seize the day' will get left in the dust. She calls pickup artists 'creepy,' and then succumbs to his charm. A fling of mine loudly shouted"grossss" when the phrase 'pickup artist' was mentioned somehow. I sniggered silently. The modern woman is like a toilet in the coach section of an airplane – wait one moment, and you will find her occupied, with a long queue of men waiting to get in; and her condition will only worsen with time.

The Conditions Ahead

The fate of Alaskan halibut fishermen has improved, thanks to the implementation of private property rights for the fishery. That of American men has not. As Western women grow increasingly flaky and unable to emotionally connect with men, the 'hook-up culture' will predominate, and courtship will be as antiquated as chastity.

The modern woman knows nothing but lust – a long and storied sexual history, a commitment to her career above all, and her steady consumption of chick flicks ensure it. Where before she would care for the family of her birth, and then the husband of her choosing and the children from their union, she now lives for herself; with no one to care for and nurture, her femininity becomes unexpressed and marginalized. She can hardly care even for herself, judging by her failure to cook well and clothe herself becomingly.

She chooses men like she hails taxicabs – whichever one is suitably appointed and is in the right place and right time will do. Unless he is inordinately famous, powerful or good looking, she cannot long for a man before she has sex with him, so numb is she to feeling affection. If a man wants to continue enjoying a given woman's company, he must act quickly and aggressively to have sex with her. She is a grain of sand coursing through his fingers – if he blinks and loosens his grip, she is gone.

Is Vitaly A Fake?

May 9, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Vitaly's ballsy pranking of Miami citizens has quickly turned him into a Youtube sensation with over one million subscribers for his VitalyzdTv channel. His videos are entertaining and even educational (the above video has taught tens of thousands of men how easy getting a phone number can be). But the skeptics on RVF and Misc can no longer remain silent in the face of some disturbing inconsistencies.

Exhibit #1

Here's a video where he gets 40 second kisses from direct approaching during the day:

I believed this video was real because Vitaly has stated in an interview that it takes him hundreds of attempts to get just ten final responses for a clip. It's plausible that women in Miami wouldn't mind a man kissing them that fast. But Samseau pointed out how one of the girl's he kissed is actually overweight porn star Katie Cummings (presumably not her real name):

Coincidence? Or is her response around 0:48 just bad porn acting?

In End Of The World (1:28) and Taking Pictures Of Strangers (1:45), the same man makes an appearance:

Coincidence? Or is he using Craigslist actors to get the reactions that don't come naturally?

Exhibit #3

Loading…
His zombie attack prank is his top clip, garnering over 20 million views, but there are repeat appearances by two black guys, and the first one appears to be smiling before he "runs" away:

141

Exhibit #4

The beginning of this video seems undoubtedly fake. What man climbs a tree like a monkey because someone made weird noises at him?

I don't know anything about Vitaly's character, but he is from Russia, a part of the world has no shame in taking shortcuts in order to achieve an end. I say this as someone who has lived in Ukraine for three long months.

Typical Ukraine

My take*:* I think most of the reactions you see in his videos are real, but if the final result of his work is determined through the randomness of approaching strangers, I can see him hiring an actor or two in order to maintain quality. High expectations to keep his channel growing while satisfying his existing fans may have caused him to lessen the chance element in approaching hundreds of people a day for original responses that can be more easily hired out.

This article is not meant to hate on Vitaly, but to keep him honest. I am rooting for his success, but I—along with most other people—don't like being deceived. If you want to act then act, but leave a disclaimer so people understand they are watching fantasy instead of real life. I'll continue to watch Vitaly, but with a bit more skepticism than before.

Who Is The Biggest Alpha Male On Game Of Thrones?

May 10, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Sword fights, severed limbs, and doggy style sex are all trademarks of HBO's latest flagship television series. In other words, it's awesome.

Now in its third season, we have a good sense of the prominent characters, their values, and their histories. But who is the most masculine – the most alpha – in this giant power orgy?

The Players

Before I continue, yes I left out a few players such as Ned Stark, Littlefinger and Tywin Lannister. There's millions of characters in the show and I'm tired. Get over it.

Tyrion Lannister

"I'm a monster, as well as a dwarf. You should charge me double."

Alpha Characteristics: The ultimate conversationalist and a borderline genius. He consistently dominates everyone and makes them eat their own words. He also has a lot of sex. Much of which comes from whores that he puts down three at a time.

When push comes to shove in the largest battle of the show to date, he takes the place of the beta king and leads an army into battle – despite no combat experience.

Beta Characteristics: He' a midget.

Grade: A

Jon Snow

“First lesson, stick em with the pointy end.”

Alpha Characteristics: He would´t even be in this conversation the first two seasons, but this bastard child has developed over time. A late bloomer if you will. Solid in combat and unafraid, despite numerous attempts to intimidate him.

Beta Characteristics: Just lost his virginity, although he dominated in his rookie appearance. Used to be a bitch.

Grade: C

Jamie Lannister

“Has anyone ever told you you’re as boring as you are ugly?”

Alpha Characteristics: A true asshole, but a funny, charming one. Also an amazing fighter. He pretty much doesn’t give a fuck and does what he wants.

Beta Characteristics: He bangs his sister and he stabbed a king in the back.

Grade: B

Stannis Baratheon

Alpha Characteristics: A cold blooded killer with no other desire than obtaining the crown. He sees everything a means to an end.

Beta Characteristics: He is borderline controlled by a woman.

Grade: C

Loading...

Joffrey Baratheon

“You can’t talk to me like that.”

Alpha Characteristics: None.

Beta Characteristics: All of them.

Grade: F

Robb Stark

“I asked him, How can a man be brave if he’s afraid? That is the only time a man can be brave, he told me.”

Alpha Characteristics: Sticks to his principles regardless of the situation, ignores inconvenient conventions, and consistently takes bold actions despite opposition.

Beta Characteristics: None.

Grade: A

Sandor Clegane (“The Hound”)

“Fuck the water, bring me wine.”

Alpha Characteristics: A beast of a man who crushes in battle.

Beta Characteristics: Has little to no sex.

Grade: C

Khal Drogo

Alpha Characteristics: A silent barbarian king with badass fighting skills. He commands the utmost respect from a group of untamed, chaotic alphas. When one steps to him, he cuts his heart out. Don’t fuck with him.

Beta Characteristics: After rough sex consisting of little more than violent thrusting, his partner (see below) learns some tricks and begins to lead in the bedroom.

Grade: B

Daenerys Targaryen

"Dracarys."

Alpha Characteristics: A sexy blonde who controls a barbarian army. Oh, and three dragons. Not to mention she takes zero shit from anybody, does what she wants, and emasculates seemingly alpha males on the regular.

Beta Characteristics: She's a she.

Grade: A

The Winner

Based the grades above, it is obvious I believe the competition lies between Tyrion, Robb, and Daenerys. A hilarious midget, a bold king, and a powerful woman. Three distinct personalities, but all with larger than life presences that dominate whatever room they enter. However, I have to disqualify Daenerys based on gender. And Tyrion based on my minimum height requirement. So Robb Stark takes the cake.

Loving And Hating Feminism At The Same Time

May 10, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

I have previously and repeatedly stated how hard it was for me to adapt to American culture once I moved to the States. How it was shocking to see women behave in a way that until that day I could only regard as proper behavior for a man. I found myself being actively pursued, something that in Colombia would be inconceivable, something I quickly learned to take advantage of.

Having been raised in a very conservative and traditional household, I went to a top notch private high school were I was taught how to behave according to what the high and ultra conservative social class of my country expected. There, I learned the intricate mechanism that ruled social interaction at that level. I also learned that women were just as horny as men, but that they had to hide it. No one wants the daughter of an ambassador being publicly exposed as a slut.

I observed the scenario, recognized my target, and adapted to my situation. In other words, I saw that girls would never sleep with me if I shamed them for being sluts, and other sluts would then learn not to get involved with me because their reputation would be at stake. Therefore, to play the game in my teenage years I did my best effort to put a front of discipline and discretion. If I slept with a girl, as bad as I wanted to brag, I would keep my mouth shut. I realized this policy of discretion and reserve was the only possible way to keep my amorous adventures intact. It was horrible; not being able to tell anyone that I was banging girls left and right like I was running out of scotch.

Welcome To America

The contrast with American culture was astonishing, I saw girls openly claiming that they too were on the hunt for a night of blissful and shallow passion. I embraced this attitude and swore to myself I would never marry a Colombian woman. I was so infatuated with this cultural oasis that I started a relationship with an American girl.

She was smart and beautiful, but incredibly emotionally unstable , a hard-core Democrat and feminist. I decided to put this to a test by molding her into what I wanted in a girl. I would do whatever I wanted to her in bed, and then sent her to the kitchen to take care of my food. She then became too emotionally dependent and I was forced to end things, but I had learned what feminism stood for and what modern feminism stands for now.

I understand that some terrible things are done to the weaker sex. In some countries female circumcision is normal and required, and in others they are stoned for insulting the prophet Mohammed. Feminism is trying to help these women and make them equal in the eyes of the law, but more importantly, it has freed their sexuality, a fact that has had very generous results for yours truly.

The cost is that modern feminism has become as blind as radical Islam. In the same way that making a cartoon of Allah can get you killed, any attempt of a man to exhibit his nature and sexuality will have you labeled as condescending and damaging to women. Anything that even resembles any vestige of masculinity is a threat and therefore must be removed. They refuse to engage in logical, rational and methodical arguments, clearly exemplified in example of Toronto feminist Big Red, who Jezebel desperately attempted to defend.

Loading…

The Shaming Of Common Sense

When a person radicalizes a topic they close off to any attempt to a rational discussion. Current American feminists seem to think that any man who uses common sense and logic is anti-women, misogynist, male chauvinist and all other related nonsense.

For example, if the military won't admit women for a special division of bad ass armed forces they immediately jump the gun and shout you misogynistic pig! However there is a very simple reason why they do that: countries are not in the business of losing wars. And in the specific case of the United States, they didn't become the best armed forces on earth by training weak units.

Do not get me wrong, it's fine if girls put in the work and pass the tests like men, but wanting things handed to them because of gender alone without earning it is outrageous and simply comical.

I strive to always keep a rational and methodical process in everything that I do. This has led many women to label me as a woman hater, misogynist, womanizer and such. And although I will admit that often times my misanthropist side comes out for a walk, I do not think I'm a misogynist. I have loved many women quite frequently; if anything I am a philogynist. If there were no women left in the world I would probably throw myself off a cliff.

The Equality Excuse

What I find most annoying is their sanctimonious claim that feminism is for equality. If this bogus statement held any resemblance of truth I would have some respect for feminism, but the sheer hypocrisy of their behavior is perplexing. If feminism were truly for equality, they wouldn't obviate the concrete facts that evidence a society that is clearly lenient towards women. A clear example of this is the fact that women serve far less prison time for equal or comparable crimes (63% less time)

> …females arrested for a crime are also significantly more likely to avoid charges and convictions entirely, and twice as likely to avoid incarceration if convicted.

They also ignore the many cases of false rape accusations that destroy male careers and where men are treated as monsters. The incredible divorce settlements that end up on women taking everything and males ending up moving out of their own house. Kicking me out of my house is just as absurd from a woman as she expecting me to marry her at 32.

At this point please allow me to request that you do not take me for an MRA or a defender of male rights. I could not care less if a bunch of betas end up as lap dogs of some fat and unattractive girl (any man who lets that happen to him deserves it). In the end I don't even know why I'm writing this, because the more decadent American women become, the more easy sex I get. I used to have to spend my money on them—now they spend theirs on me. I should say I'm sorry for soaking up your American culture and banging you girls, but I'm not.

The 3 Somatotypes Are Bullshit

May 11, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Wherever there are dudes discussing lifting there is inevitably the mention of the somatotypes: ectomorph, mesomorph, and endomorph. Guys will subscribe to the belief that these body types exist and that they have supreme bearing on their life. Well, they do have a bearing on their lives in that they are needless limiting beliefs. As soon as you say "I'm a hardgainer" or "I've reached my potential as a mesomorph" you've already quit. You've already acknowledged that any failures to lose or gain mass can not be attributed to what you're doing, but attributed to your "body type".

First off a bit of history…

Somatotypes were first suggested by psychologist William Sheldon in the 40s. He published his "findings" in 1954. He concluded on the three body types by looking at thousands of pictures of people and classifying them based on how their appearance made him feel. There is no scientific basis to this, just the feelings and observations of a psychologist. The scientific knowledge at the time was that of a current high schooler. Scientists barely knew anything about genetics and biochemistry, so how is it that everyone these days claims scientific reasoning behind the somatotypes. To me they have about as much credibility as phrenology and as much usefulness as measuring BMI.

What was that about phrenology?

Body Type Is A Product of Lifestyle

Ectomorphs are frail and skinny because they stay inside all day and don't eat enough. Just because they're shy, introverted and skinny doesn't mean some mythical body type is the cause of that. Mesomorphs are described to be the athletic and well-built (i.e., a jock). They play sports and eat a lot of food growing up and thus have a respectable body. Endomorphs are described as jolly, extroverted food lovers. Duh, an endomorphic body type is a fatso with or without some muscle underneath, nothing more.

Loading...

Nothing can be done, he’s an endomorph.

Human beings are not so varied that there exists three distinct groups where morphology is enough to tell us everything we’d ever want to know about one’s metabolism or ideal training methods. Yes everyone is slightly different from one another. What works for one guy might not work as well for the next guy.

There was a guy on the forum who asked why he wasn’t gaining weight and when asked about his training program he said he did HIIT and ate paleo. Of course you’re going to be skinny if you do that, thats what people do to lose fat. If you find you’re gaining weight too fast drop a few hundred calories until you get it just right. There are much more important things to be worrying about, like willpower and preventing injuries.

Describing yourself by one of the three somatotypes is just a limiting belief and a rationalization for failure. The top skills someone training needs, regardless of goals, is accountability and consistency. If you don’t have a general idea of how much you’re eating or how much you’re progressing you’re just going to be stuck treadmilling in the same spot, going nowhere.

And some of us share Neanderthal DNA.

There Is No Hedge Against Inflation

May 11, 2013 | by JW Aurochs | Link | Original Link

You've seen him: an older man sitting next to a roaring fire or maybe walking the grounds of his ranch or he might be in a suit facing the camera. The messages are all the same: something about "troubling times" and "safety and security" —maybe they mention the federal reserve or money printing. Times are bad and could get worse, but they can help you. They have the answer. What is this company selling? GOLD.

Why would you want a gold coin or bar? It doesn't earn interest and it doesn't grow or produce anything. It is vulnerable to theft. The price can move down with astonishing speed as we saw last April (as of the time of this writing it has retraced over 50% of that selloff). But could it go up in value, could it "skyrocket" as the gold shills say?

Keep in mind that gold has already gone up a lot recently, about fivefold in the past ten years. And to simply say that gold is a hedge against inflation is misleading. If you compare the price today, let's say $1500 per oz, to the average price in 1974, about $150/oz, it actually exceeded inflation. Using CPI over this period gold's value increased at about double the rate of inflation. However, if you bought gold in 1980, average price that year about $600/oz, you'd have to wait until 2006 for the price to come back to that level and not inflation adjusted dollars either (inflation destroyed about 65% of the purchasing power in that timeframe – and this is using CPI which notoriously understates real world prices). Gold prices and inflation are not as closely correlated as the gold sellers would have you think.

But what about "these troubling times"? It's different now, right? It might be. This is basically what they're talking about: the federal government and the federal reserve have been acting in tandem to recapitalize the U.S. economy after the 2008 crisis. The government has been spending like crazy and running huge deficits (and buying lots of votes, funny how that works out for them). These deficits are financed by the issuing of bonds of which the federal reserve bank has been the main buyer under the guise of Quantitative Easing and the Zero Interest Rate Policy. This what they mean by printing money – the fed can buy whatever it wants and it has been buying these bonds that are loans to the government.

The Fed doesn't need money, rather, it creates it. It is the central bank and it can just put the bonds on its balance sheet. A lot of people, this author included, think the government and the Fed are nuts to think that this course would enable economic growth and it will probably only lead to inflation which could become severe and maybe uncontrollable. Without turning this into a financial doomer article, let's just say both sides make their case and we won't know which one is right until this QE and ZIRP experiment is over.

Loading…

This is what it comes down to: if the price of gold in dollars goes exponential in a hyperinflationary situation everything else priced in dollars is going to do the same. You can't expect that your gold coin will buy the same goods that it would buy now if this happens. The actual purchasing power of your gold will surely decline as day-to-day essentials become prioritized. Put another way, if 1500 this week buys you one gold coin or 250 basic meals, in a hyperinflationary situation that gold coin might exchange for the equivalent of 100 meals or maybe not even twenty. Of course, 1500 in a bank account or your mattress would be worth much less – maybe not even one meal. The possible hyperinflation scenario is the most compelling reason to hold gold now. It's not about getting rich. It's about retaining some savings in the face of a massive financial collapse.

In reality, nothing keeps up with inflation like you will want. Agriculture futures are seasonal and your position has to be rolled over every so often costing you fees and changing your cost basis. Your inflation hedge could get destroyed by a good harvest or weak global demand. Stocks are typically seen as an inflation hedge but in a real collapse your brokerage company or even your local bank might not even exist anymore. You may eventually be made whole on the companies you own but this will take years.

Outside of a financial crisis the case for gold is weak. If you're holding gold the best case scenario is unclear. Perhaps the price rises faster than inflation but that's probably a longshot. Consider that if interest rates start to rise, if the Fed sees the light on the harm ZIRP is doing, and if inflation is mild then those holding gold are going to be screwed as many decide to sell, preferring actual cash. Expect gold to lose at least 30% from today's prices and it could happen in a day or two. Don't expect your dealer to give you a good price or even answer your call or email if everyone comes in selling.

The risk of gold losing value in the face of an improving economy is something you need to be aware of and in a crisis it won't provide the kind of financial safety that the gold bugs allege. If you still need a place to park your savings you might consider silver. It's incrementally cheaper to get into and has more industrial value than gold though it is historically more volatile. Or what about booze? A case of good whiskey or rum is highly barterable, doesn't spoil, tracks inflation as well as anything, and if times get better (or worse), you can always drink it.

Julius Caesar’s Gallic War

Julius Caesar needs little introduction. By common consent, he occupies a high seat in the pantheon of Western historical figures. But few can adequately explain why he was a great man. A reading of Caesar’s most famous book, The Gallic War (De Bello Gallico), provides some answers and compelling lessons in the traits and attributes of a leader. It is one of the clearest testaments of battle leadership and competent decision-making ever written.

In the spring of 58 B.C., Caesar assumed his duties as governor of Cisalpine and Narbonese Gaul (regions in northern Italy and southern France). Soon after, many thousands of Germans under the leadership of an ambitious chieftain named Ariovistus began to conduct incursions into Gaul at the request of one Gallic tribe seeking help from another. It soon became clear that Ariovistus aspired to make himself ruler of all Gaul, and was strengthened in this ambition by the movement of some Germanic tribes all along the Rhine, all desiring to relocate to greener pastures in Gaul. Meanwhile, over 300,000 Helvetii (a tribe centered in what is now Geneva) began migrating westward. Caesar’s world became convulsed in ferment and turbulence, and he decided that unless decisive action were taken, Italy itself might be threatened.

Seeing these developments as profoundly threatening to Roman security, Caesar at his own expense raised and equipped a number of legions in addition to the ones already assigned to him. Not bothering to get permission from a suspicious Senate (anticipating Hernando Cortes’s brilliantly unauthorized conquest of Mexico 1500 years later), he undertook the methodical pacification of all Gaul and later even the invasion of Britain. His record of this campaign, On the Gallic War, is a collection of dispatches sent to Rome which were meant to describe his doings and achievements.

The book is written in a clear, masculine, terse style that shows Caesar to be a master of military tactics, political calculation, and negotiating skills. It is one of the key texts in Latin literature. Reading it, you feel you are with him on the march, as he crosses rivers, scales mountains, and plunges through dense forests. You share his privation and those of his soldiers, as he is harassed and attacked from all sides by hostile tribes and the merciless vagaries of weather. Not only did he survive everything thrown at him, but he actually conquered the entire country.

These are some of the qualities that enabled Caesar to triumph against odds that were almost always against him:

1. He moved quickly and with decision. Caesar never allowed his enemies to gain the advantage of speed over him. Quick to pursue a defeated enemy, he always pressed his battlefield victories to finality by pursuing enemies until they were rendered helpless. He was also always able to stay one step ahead of his opponents by being too nimble, too hard-working, and too cunning for them to cope with. He knew his commanders and their abilities well, and was always able to provide the right mix of fatherly encouragement and cold-blooded ruthlessness in leading his men.

2. He was merciful and gracious in victory. In an age when brutality on the battlefield was commonplace, Caesar always treated a defeated enemy with magnanimity. The benefit of this far-sighted policy was that he was able to win loyal friends and allies, and keep pacified areas from rebelling against him.

Loading...

He succeeded so well in this respect that during the later civil war in Rome, when Gaul could have easily rebelled, not a single local ruler or tribe made any move to throw off Roman rule. Gaul remained a Roman province for hundreds of years, becoming thoroughly Latin in speech and character. It would not be an exaggeration to say that Caesar's conquest planted the seeds of French civilization. It is doubtful that Caesar ever saw the immense consequences of his conquest of Gaul, but the perspective of history has made it clear that his conquest set Gaul on the trajectory it would follow forever after. His leniency foreshadowed his future greatness as a statesman.

3. He was willing to gamble big when the situation called for it. When necessary, he was not afraid to take huge risks. He staked everything on a siege of Alesia, where a leader named Vercingetorix had amassed 30,000 men. And he won. He made a risky crossing of the English Channel into Britain to subdue some tribes there, at a time when the country was little known to the Romans. With no prior experience in naval matters, he constructed a fleet of ships and ferried his armies across the Channel in a daring amphibious operation that could easily have come to ruin.

4. He never held his enemies in contempt or hatred. Rather, he showed a healthy respect for the fighting skills of the Gauls and Germans. There are many sections of his book where he describes in sympathetic detail the customs and mores of the Gallic tribes. He never treats his adversaries with hatred, mockery, or contempt. At the same time, he was canny enough to take hostages (obses) during negotiations, as human collateral to ensure performance of agreements.

The Gallic War is a classic of battle leadership and political maneuvering, written by an undeniable genius. Caesar was the most complete man that antiquity ever produced: he was successful as a military commander, a politician, an administrator, and a writer. Later in his career, he would go on to propose universal suffrage for freedmen of the entire empire, a massive public works program, and just administration of the laws to alleviate the oppressive power of the aristocracy. But all that was in his future. We see in his book some clear foreshadowing of his latent talents as an administrator and statesman. His transformation from the reckless, rakish lad of his 20s and 30s into one of the most just, wise, and enlightened rulers of history is nothing short of miraculous.

A suggestion: if you decide to buy this book, I recommend the Loeb Classical Library edition. It has the original Latin text with English translation on facing pages. Also very useful are a number of illustrated scholarly appendices on Roman military tactics, siege engines, and engineering machines.

The Mosou: A Matriarchal Dream or Aberration of History?

May 12, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Mosou are a civilization of around 30,000 people situated around Lugu Lake, roughly 30 miles in circumference, tucked away high up in the Himalayas in Southern China.

They settled the land sometime around 1500 years ago, according to documents from the ancient Han Dynasty. They have had precious little contact with the outside world – the Yuan Dynasty garrisoned troops for a time in their lands, as the Mosou have a practice of "non-resistance." They had no standing army or possess any weaponry as a result of their pacifistic tendencies. While the men of the society did engage in trade with other cultures, they did so on what was known as the Tea Horse Road, or the Southern Silk Route – other cultures did not come into Mosou lands – until recently.

The second notable encounter was when the communists seized control of China and they sent anthropologists and government officials to scour the land for all inhabitants. The final encounter was in modern times, as many other nations took an interest in the Mosou; most of the interest has been generated by all manner of left-winger, including feminists.

A Society Of Matriarchs

The Mosou are famous for being representative of a matriarchal society or a gender-equal society. While the society, from an anthropological perspective, is considered a matrilineal society. Men used to make up the highest level of society, but that has been worked out for centuries. Women are the face of power in Mosou society.

Regardless, this is the apex of a matriarchy. While the West may resemble some sort of matriarchy – especially at the bottom – the Mosou are the society that revolves around women and women's sexuality. A family's lineage is traced through the side of a female. A male will always belong to his family – the leader of which is a woman relative. They have no appreciable advances of technology in their history, nor any intellectual achievements of any stripe.

Truly, this was and is a society a society frozen in time, a beneficiary of severe isolation – a civilization that should have been ground up and tossed aside into the trash heap of history. Now, this aberration exists as a sort of utopia for gender equalists.

A review of the sexuality, marriage and child-rearing is necessary. Simply put, there is no marriage. No formal vows and no formal recognition outside the general knowledge in the community that a woman is mating with a man, or a male is a father of a particular child.

There is a popular misconception that there are no fathers in Mosou. That isn't right, but it would seem that way from the West's perspective. Once a child hits puberty, like any society, there is a series of rituals engaged in by the community to celebrate the child's growth into an adult, both for boys and girls.

The Walking Marriage

Girls are given a room in the family home (which is a compound comprised of four separate structures) and boys are expected to come to the girl's home and woo her – this is what is referred to as a "walking marriage." Boys are allowed to come and go purely at the girl's discretion. The process is generally referred to as mutual love and affection; but it is purely a function of a female's lust towards a particular male. The process operates purely at night – always. The wooing process is often non-aggressive on the male's part. They may throw rocks at a girl's window; they may linger outside the gate to the family's home until he is called in by the girl. While the matriarchs of the family – a single, usually elderly female, referred to as a "Dapu" may veto a particular male, it is rare and the young female is in control.

The famous concept of the promiscuous Mosou female isn't on point. The more appropriate term would be serial monogamy. Women often rack up notch counts right after puberty – obviously feeling out for alphas – but don't usually reproduce until late teens. The father is usually known because the females weren't having any relations with men they didn't want to sleep with. However, since fatherhood is considered more a determination of the woman, she can pick out the man she desires to be the father – provided they were sexually active with one another (a context I picked up).

This process goes on at night – forever. While there is social recognition of sexual relations, the men only mingle with their sexual liaisons and baby mommas at night. After the day's work, they travel to what village their female lives in. Early on, they may exclusively hang out in the woman's room. After childbirth, the fathers or boyfriends typically eat with the woman's family and engage in traditional familial activities – sometimes including cuddling with their children. If they retire to the woman's room, there may be sex, maybe cuddling, or nothing. Regardless of what goes down, the man leaves at dawn for his own family's dwelling, to begin the day's work.

Mosou Men Exist For The Service Of Women

And so it goes for the traditional Mosou man. His mother or some other female relative is the head of his home into perpetuity. He will never live with a woman that is not related to him, he will never live in a room by himself – unlike females. What he earns, produces and creates belongs to his family – obviously the decision of what to do with it is made by his Dapu. He is involved very much in child-rearing – but mostly of children his female relatives conceive. There is definitely a gendered division of labor, as males typically do the heavy labor, traveling for trade or work, and the generally distasteful jobs. That is to be expected, as women are not wont for these sorts of jobs, nor are proficient at them. He will raise his female relative's boys. Further, as one source astutely observed, "Boys are not regarded more than girls, girls are actually preferred." Three cheers for gender equality, eh?

The research I read had a bizarre level of praising the society for lacking competition, intolerance, etc. According to them, the society is a harmonious and equal society. Unsurprisingly, there is much praise for the lack of psychological issues, violence and unhappiness amongst the people. I don't trust the veracity of these claims to begin with; however, the researchers clearly came to Mosou with rose-tinted glasses.

Not Quite A Utopian Society

I will tackle two common misconceptions that revolve around the lack of the word "rape" or "jealousy" in the language of the Mosou that will wrap up my review – and highlight the problems with the worship of the Mosou by feminists.

First off, the Mosou have no written language. As expected with a female dominated society, there has been no progress intellectually or technologically – although many sources emphasized their "rich oral tradition." Further, there is a word for rape, it just is rare. As is most crimes. My theory is that crime exist because there is a real role in the culture for men, plus they are subjugated by the females in their family. There just are no examples of males competing against other males, plus there is little need to lash out for resources, because a man's Dapu will provide for you.

As for jealousy, of course it exists. There is a word for it. Further, there are examples of conflicts between villages with the intrusion of the modern world into the Mosou's lives. The articles I read most assuredly conveyed that it was the brute, capitalistic influence that brought jealousy and covetousness into the lives of the Mosou.

No. The Mosou are humans. They have feelings, which include anger, jealousy and the whole gamut of a human's feelings. The general theme of harmonious, hand-holding bliss isn't true. The fact there was and are elder councils where disputes were hammered out proves that there were and are conflicts. They just resolved them in ways that didn't involve in violence – so what?

Women are far more likely to resolve disagreements through female channels – the subtle manipulation of power through language. Women get together and create or enforce hierarchies based on their ability to manipulate the other women – usually their own self-assessment of their sexual value comes into play. This is a very undeveloped point of my argument, so take it as you will.

However, the cracks in the narrative are apparent when you read enough about the Mosou. They are a female-centric, matrilineal society that creates for men a subordinate role based on being a workhorse for jobs women don't want and which men women want to sleep with. Men do have a clearly defined role, and do get to see their children, albeit at the approval of the mother and her family – there were no examples presented of a man being denied to see his spawn, however.

In the end, the research I found was too protective of the sex lives of women to get a clear view of their society. This is very predictable. While there were weak exhortations that gendered labor divisions are not right, it was clear that the feminine imperative was in full force – guarding female choice of mate.

This is the heart and soul of feminism – unrestricted hypergamy. The fact women were not castigated for their choice of mate or inability to label who actually is the mate is repeatedly praised.

At any rate, this is the apex of a matriarchy. A stable society based on female sexual choice, male subjugation to a matronly figure and a complete lack of social progress. This was and is a society supported by their geographical privilege for their existence. That is what it is – a relic preserved in the mountains of southern China – a relic that so-called equalists are chasing as an ideal.

This ideal is just an illusion; just a mirage in the desert. Chase it, and you will come to your demise. Understand it, and you will understand why patriarchy is civilization.

8 Ways Game Is Like Big Business

May 13, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

While sitting in my cubicle doing my resume building job the other day, I realized how much working for a large corporation has taught me about the concept of game. While previously it has been mentioned on RoK that game can get you a job, people often overlook what a job can teach you about game. Below are eight reasons game is like big business:

1. Location

If a company is in a poorly located city, it will struggle. If it is in a great location however, it can excel. No one wants to go get $100 plate of dinner in the ghetto, and no one in Beverly Hills is seeking goodwill. Game works the same way. For me, I had to block out my entire home state, but for most people this is as simple as blocking out "Joe's Pub." While "Joe's Pub" offers $1 beers, "The Oar House" has triple the price, but it also has triple the girls. In the end being in the better location will get you better results.

2. Statistics

In business everything is about the numbers. You are rarely asked at a company how you did something. Companies want minimal effort, minimal cost, and maximum results. Game is no different. While it's great to brag about always going home with a 9, if you can leave the bar with consistent 8′s with significantly less effort, that should be your target. Only when you reach a significant level will anyone attempt to look beyond your numbers. More numbers and more stories equal more success.

3. Dress for Success

I've always been told that you should dress the part you want, not the part you have. The better you dress, the quicker you're noticed, and the more you seem motivated. If you go sit in your cubicle and hate your job but smile and wear a suit, you'll be noticed. In retrospect if you show up to work in your cubicle job that you love, happy as hell, and you wear ripped up jeans, shoes that are falling apart, and a coffee-stained button-up, no one will care that you love your job because you look like you don't have your shit together. Same goes for game. While you don't need to wear a suit at every venue, you should be finding ways to dress respectable and above the relative standard of those around you. Dressing to impress makes you stand out and more often approached for promotions at the office. It'll also get you laid.

4. You’re Just A Number

At a decent sized corporation, you are just a number. When you go to the bar (unless you’re running small town game) you are the same. Whoever you hit on has already encountered 18,000 other men just like you. That means you need to run your game and be you. Eventually employee #867443 may be the CEO of Americorp and the most powerful person in the world. But today you’re a number. So just do your job.

5. Marketing

Companies put a lot of money into finding ways to sell their products. If you can find a way to help them sell their products in more creative and effective ways you’re likely a valuable asset and will be well compensated for your services. Game is the same way. Women need you to sell yourself to them. And if you can do that, you’re gonna get laid.

6. Ulterior Motives

While every CEO want's to hear what you can do for them, it's ultimately what can they do for you. This directly correlates with marketing. You should be selling your product, but you should only be selling that product to better yourself. By coming up with a better plan you'll get a promotion, which means more money for yourself. With game you're basically selling yourself to women, but only for your own gain. Whether its business or game, always have an ulterior motive. It's how you get promoted.

7. Scandal (Haters)

In any office there is always someone more envious of you. Whether it's you who finds ways to advance quicker, or just doing your job with less effort, people get pissed and try and take you down with them. In the game world this is the obvious cockblocker. Whether it be an envious friend who's pissed you get laid, someone at the bar who just sees you leave every weekend successful, or the jealous fat friend of the woman you're trying to have sex with, haters are everywhere. If you're good at covering your tracks in the office to avoid confrontation, scandals, or punishment, you'll be fine at handling cock blockers.

8: Networking

Lastly is networking, probably the easiest and most overlooked way to success. The more people you meet through your company, or conventions with other companies, the more alternate opportunities will be presented to yourself. Game is the same way. While it's great to go out with your usual set of friends, finding alternate friends or even just other regulars at venues you frequent will give you a larger network to work with. Jack, who goes to your regular bar, might decide to throw a kick ass house party with a bunch of women he met in Toronto, and now you have an invite. Had you not decided to network, you'd be fighting the same crowds at your usual spots once again.

So there you have it. Now go get that office promotion.

How The Gender Script Was Flipped

May 13, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

There are a host of factors contributing to the perpetuation of blue pill mentalities. One of these is the pervasive myth regarding a gendered divide in the desire to commit. The myth goes something like this:

"Young women are looking for love. Men are dogs."

This is a myth that seems widely accepted in mainstream society. Stories discussing any difficulties faced by females in the mating game usually seek to blame men first and foremost. Media regularly plays up the myth of the male as the uncommitted predator or the rowdy oaf without as much interest in romantic pairings as his female counterparts. Society has said that men are dogs, and many have accepted this.

The reality, of course, is quite a different story. Red Pill takers will have been quicker to realize this, but the past few years have finally started to see the mainstream media itself unearth this reality:

> A new portrait of single Americans, drawn from a major new survey, suggests the attitudes and behaviors of today's singles are quite unlike their counterparts just a few decades ago. Data show men are quicker to fall in love and more likely than women to want children: 54% of men say they have experienced love at first sight, compared with 44% of women; among singles without children under 18, more men (24%) than women (15%) say they want children.
> And, across every age group, women want more independence than men in their relationships: 77% of women say having their personal space is "very important," vs. 58% for men; 78% of women say the same about having their own interests and hobbies (vs. 64% for men). And 35% of women (vs. 23% of men) say regular nights out with the guys/girls are important.
> Sara Barrett, 34, of Washington, says she and her women friends — both single and married — do talk about maintaining their individuality to make sure they > don't get "totally lost in their relationships."

> "The independence is really, really important to us," she says, noting that the "girls' night out" for a handful of friends is usually once a week.
> "With some friends, it's been an issue. They dated a guy who was clingier than they wanted."
> "I think men are more needy for a relationship than women," says June Ashley, who married at 17 and was divorced after nine years. She remarried and was widowed after seven years.
> Sherri Langburt of New York, founder of SingleEdition.com, a lifestyle website for singles, says she has noticed the changes in what men and women ask the site's panel of experts.
> "Men are writing us more about the emotional relationships than women. Women are writing us about the one-night stands," Langburt says. "Women are (asking) if it's OK — 'Can I have a one-night stand?' Men are writing, 'I'm single and I'm lonely and want to find love and can't admit it to anyone.'"

Romantic love is increasingly a notion bought into by young men first and foremost. Like Rollo Tomassi said, men are the true romantics. Despite the presence of pervasive myths that put romanticism in an almost exclusively female realm, the reality is that young men are falling in love faster and harder than young women are today.

What does all of this mean for your typical young guy in the modern dating scene? Basilransom, a young man who frequents Roosh's forum and other destinations in the manosphere, summed up the reality perfectly in a comment over at Dalrock's a while back:

> When girls are attracted to me, they are often quick to peg me as a cheeky asshole, or whatever. And if I do anything to intimate I'm interested in anything > more than sex, their disappointment is visceral, if subtle.

> Women are extremely turned off by men who want any sort of relationship before they do. It's the surest sign of being a loser in their eyes. Even for "good girls." They strongly believe that quality men need to be pinned down and snared into a relationship. I don't think young attractive women want exclusive LTRs with studs, at least initially.
> Also, girls are so used to socializing in mixed groups that dates freak them out. The slightest prospect of a relationship and thus a loss of independence scares them. I've had many girls tell me they feel weird talking on the phone to a man. They live in perpetual fear of 'awkwardness,' and will do their best to avoid situations that might give rise to it. Intimacy prior to sex is impossible for them.
> Maybe, after several bouts of sex, she will desire slightly more. She will ask that you stop banging other girls.
> Loading…
> I would ask girls out on dates in college – not because I wanted to make them my girlfriend, but because I wanted to bang them. Because it made getting sex easier than if I had done the usual "let's meet up together with our friends drunk Friday night" which is a logistical nightmare. And these dates would often consist of just a glass of wine in my room – not that I promised it'd be anything more. You couldn't have a clearer way of saying "I just want to bang you," but I could feel girls seeing me as less of a man for not trying to do what every other cool guy does, which is to haphazardly try to bang her drunk one night.

In short, the advice for young men is simple: DO LESS.

I've offered precisely that piece of advice before, and it remains true now. Independence is very important to young women today. The larger and more visible the investment you make in any girl, the greater a threat you will appear to her independence. The young, modern woman is increasingly likely to value that independence much more than she values your company, which means that you will be on the outs if you threaten it.

The script has flipped: young men are increasingly becoming the ones chasing commitment from women, and it is now the girls who are batting them away.

These realities must be internalized by young men when it comes to the young women they are pursuing:

1. They don’t want a provider (don’t act like one).

2. They don’t want your commitment (unless they’ve already offered you theirs, don’t give it to them).

3. They don’t want traditional dating (don’t give it to them).

4. Most of them aren’t all that excited about the idea of having a family or anything serious like that (make sure she doesn’t think that you are, especially early on).

This is where the importance of self-improvement as a focus for young men becomes abundantly clear. In a world where more commitment-oriented men are looked down upon, the man who has invested more heavily in himself is at a distinct advantage. As Basil noted above, you do not want to be the guy who pines for a relationship before the girl he is interested in does. When you have poured all of your effort into improving yourself financially, physically and spiritually, you will not have the time or the inclination to be that guy. You will be too busy working, exercising, learning and traveling to bother with that.

This, in turn, plays into another very important observation Basil made above: girls believe that quality men must be chased and pinned down. This means that if a girl ever did decide to compromise her independence to any degree for the sake of a man, it would be for what she would consider a “quality male”. Who is that quality male?

In all likelihood, he is a man who has interests of his own (e.g., business, exercise, travel, etc), invests heavily in them and probably doesn’t appear all that concerned about relationships. Neediness is a foreign concept to him.

In other words, he is the man who embodies the goals of any male looking into self-improvement. Women who generally value their independence very highly and shy away from commitment are likely to commit to… a man who values his independence very highly and might be inclined to shy away from or pay little mind to the idea of commitment. As you would expect from a reality so closely in line with classic theories of female hypergamy, only a small minority of men fit this bill. Your goal should be to become one of them.

These truths are difficult for a lot of men to accept. Many were raised to be precisely the man women now seek to distance themselves from. They were raised with images of more ‘traditional’ relationships in their heads (fueled in part by Disney and the rest of Hollywood), and told to get in touch with their feelings and be more open to expressing them. Many grow up and are shocked to learn that behaviors they considered ordinary and par for the romantic course now mark them as “clingy” and low value.

Difficult as it may be, change has come and these new realities are here to stay. Women want their independence. To this end, they are looking for an increasingly more independent, self-assured man. Become that man and give them what they want—nothing more, and nothing less. Adapt or die.

5 Commandments For Making A Club Your Poosy Paradise

May 13, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

I'm a bit tired. Not going to lie. The type of tired where you feel like you've been up three days straight, snorted an eight-ball and finished your last Red Bull and your eyes are still half-closed. This may be a great article or possibly the worst article to ever appear on ROK, because I just returned from Vegas, where I combined business and pleasure, with pleasure definitely being the highlight. So bear with me as I collect my few remaining brain cells and let you in on some insider secrets in nightlife…

Pack up sweetheart…

We all desire a poosy paradise and many of you gents have combed the earth in search of this one city/town/village/island, you name it, where the women are abundant and they are easy. Well, there is such a place, in just about every decent size city on earth and it's your local nightclub.

Unless you live in bum-f*ck (insert name of town where people have more beers on their porch than teeth), then you live within an hour's drive to a popular club. Many of you may not be able to travel so listen up. For the sake of simplicity, if you're more of a bar type, many of these 10 tips will apply to making a bar your poosy paradise as well.

Know Your Type

There's no sense in getting a house club on lockdown if you prefer hip-hop music. With music comes certain types of women. Hip-hop is associated with the African-American crowd and house music is associated with European types. If you hate the music you're not going to want to go so make life simple: pick a spot where you know you'll fit in and vibe with the music, even if it's not the hot spot and focus on that one club.

Dress Appropriate

The suit seems to be working for James…hmmm…

I would move this into a Common Sense section but you'd be surprised how many guys get turned away for idiotic clothing at the door.

-Do not wear a fuzzy hat with eye shadow and a fucking cane. You will get slapped.

-Do not wear a t-shirt stating "Bitches Love Me" or anything of the like.

-Do not wear baggy jeans with your ass hanging out. This isn't prison and unless you want to tell the world that your ass is available to be plundered, then pull your damn jeans up son.

-Do not always defer to the damn default button-up with jeans and square-toed dress shoes. This look has been around for so long it looks like some guys send out a memo to their friends and all show up looking like fucking clones. Maybe throw it in here and there but don't always default to it.

-DO put some time into your clothing. Every venue ranges on dress code but here is a simple way to always stand out in a good way: Suit the fuck up. Not going to beat a dead horse and there are varying opinions on this but it works for every gent I've 'converted' and will make you stand out in a good way. Suits command respect immediately.

…and Tony Stark too…could there be something to this?

If you hate the idea of a suit, fair enough, so try this on for size: A pair of nice jeans that fit and a V-Neck shirt/sweater with some nice hip shoes. Shoes are so essential to the outfit so do yourself a favor and invest in a decent pair. If you don't already have one Golden outfit that you feel confident in and you know you look good, then do that first before even thinking of starting to establish a rapport at a club.

Get To Know The Doorman/List Girl

The gent on the top right pointing his finger, while probably looking at some girl's tits, Marc Benecke, ran the door at Studio 54 in the 1970´s. Lucky bastard.

This one is no effin joke. The gatekeepers of a club can ruin or make your night. No one likes to wait in line for an hour to be turned away at the door. It's happened to everyone, even myself and it sucks. The key here is to be sincere but NOT needy. Neediness is the death of relationships both platonic and romantic.

-Don't be 'that guy' begging to be let in.

-A warm smile and a simple greeting are quite effective. Confidence is the #1 player in this equation so don't hold back. If there was ever a time to fake it even if you aren't normally confident it's now.

-Don't extend your hand for a handshake whatever you do. This comes later after you have established rapport. The last thing a doorguy or list girl wants to do is shake a strangers hand.

-If you have to pay cover then do so with ease and not one iota of complaining. Will you have to pay cover in the future? No. Not if you follow my steps exactly. Even after you walk in, don't turn to another club-goer and mouth off a stupid comment regarding any of the door staff, security, the color of the carpet or that girl in line who ignored you. Positive, positive, positive. I've seen people get blacklisted from clubs from running their mouth and someone overhears it. This is especially important for you cats who live in an area where there are a limited amount of clubs to go to. Those of you who live in a large city keep positive as well. Nightlife industry circles are small and word travels fast.

-Say 'Thank You' to whoever let you in. This goes so far in establishing rapport. A simple 'Thank you' or 'Much appreciated', is rarely heard and comes across loud and clear. Doormen, lists girls, VIP Hosts, promoters ALL remember who says 'Thank you' and who is a dick. Guess who gets better service?

-At some point you will be able to initiate more conversation, but when you first go in this is not the time. When you exit the club is when you make your mark which leads me to my next Law.

Tip Well

Palm it gents

Making a nightclub your poosy paradise is an investment. Don't expect to roll up to a club, be a cheap loser and have the red carpet rolled out for you next time. Doesn't have to be much, but a $20 bill goes along way in most clubs. When you order drinks use the 25% Rule. If a drink costs $12, tip $3 with a smile and once again a ‘thank you’.

Tipping the bartenders well is standard issue and trust me will definitely get you on the road of free drinks. I’m going to share a Golden Secret with you guys which in the beginning will costs you a tad more, but in the end of this mission will have you getting more drinks than your liver can handle. You ready…

Cheerful Kate

Once you have established rapport with the bartenders by tipping well, not laying your head on the bar and generating positive entertaining conversation when appropriate, then you can try this: Offer to bolster their tip for ‘free’ drinks.

Let’s say after a month of you attending every weekend you’re cool with the bartenders or maybe specifically one of them. Pick who you vibe with and naturally hit if off with and always order your drinks from them. Tell them I’ll tip you well if you can hookup a shot or a drink.

Bartenders with half a retarded monkey’s brain know where this is going and they LOVE it. They can pour free all night as long as CASH is being exchanged across the bar. It simply has to LOOK like you are paying. They hit a few buttons on the IOS screen and then drop the tip in the tip jar. They have this down to an art. Club owners will hate me for saying this but it goes on at every club. This is how this pans out for you money wise:

Using the original example of a $12 drink with a $3 tip brings your one drink tab to $15. Now under the Golden Secret you can give the bartender say $8 cash, get your free drink and you just saved yourself almost 50% off. This adds up. Over the course of the night say you buy 6 drinks at $15 total each, well you just spent $90. Using my method, you saved yourself $42 which is essentially, now another night out for yourself at the same club.

Another very important reason for getting the bartenders on your side is that they can cover your ass at the end of the night when you have a cute filly on your arm but need just one more shot for her to turn her hamster off and you are out of cash. Last minute shots are absolute fucking gold in my book and have definitely helped me close. Generally the bartender will pour you a shot and wink. They know what's up and if you've followed my formula then they have no problem comping you a shot here and there.

-When you leave for the night, tip the doorman and/or list girl. Why at the end of the night instead of the beginning? Well 99.9% of club articles about how to get in will say do it in the beginning. Wrong. If you tip in the beginning to get into the club it comes across as a bribe and even if they take the money and smile will deep down have less respect for you. Remember this takes some time. You're building a relationship with the staff not going for the quick kill. Depending on where you live the tip amount will vary, but generally $20-30 folded up and palmed into the hand of the doorman and/or list girl when you exit for the night does two specific things:

1. You've already gotten into the club. You've had your fun and hopefully you're taking a hot dame home with you who's draped on your arm, so essentially you've gotten what you came to get BUT you STILL TIP THEM. You have no reason to from a simple perspective, but you're not thinking simple anymore; you're thinking long-term in setting up your poosy paradise.

2. This sets-up your next visit the following weekend or next night depending on how much you go out. They will generally remember you because it's rare for people to tip at the end of the night and leaves them with a happy feeling about you. Next time you roll up to the club, don't be surprised if they wave you to the front of the line and let you in.

You may still pay cover (will get to the comped cover in a bit), but guess what Mr. Nightlife? Now you're not waiting in line with the minions. Never assume they will remember you and never expect it. Be confident, humble and go with the flow. Depending on the city's size and how many people the club turns out a night it might only take one visit or three. I've never had to do this more than 3 times and that was a major club. If you live in a smaller city, say Indianapolis, then done once or maybe twice and you will definitely be remembered.

When you tip them say something like, 'Thank you, had a great time. First time here and I'll definitely be back soon". This establishes that you are new, you're appreciative and you're coming back to spend money again. Doormen and list girls love to hear this. Depending on the friendliness level of the door staff, you might be able to ask for a card from them and exchange contact info, but generally it'll take a couple visits before they'll be open to this. Feel it out and go with your gut.

Lastly, on this subject, make sure you respect and take care of the bathroom attendant. This cat has the essentials for your night all for a measly couple bucks. If you drop a $5 bill in his jar he'll wash your car. Cologne, hair gel, breath mints, condoms, he's got you covered. If doing lines is your thing, then definitely tip him. Don't take care of him properly and just ask Bruno Mars how that worked out at the Hard Rock Hotel in Vegas.

Roll Solo

I’m sick and fucking tired of wannabe players bitching about how hard it is to roll solo dolo. No shit. But guess what? If you want to move into the minority of gents with real battle-field game then man the fuck up and look in the mirror and realize that you have the perfect wingman: Yourself. Look at this as a chance to work on two aspects of your game:

1. Building confidence by rolling solo, realizing no one can ever hold you back again but yourself.

2. It’s much, much, much easier to establish rapport and get a club on lock–down this way. The #1 Question a Doorman or List girl will ask you right away is, “Who are you with?”. This immediately helps them analyze the situation quickly and decide if you’re getting in. When you’re solo its so much easier to slip you in and a complete bitch for them to let in two guys. Ratios baby.

For some of you, your best friend may not have his shit together. He may prefer to sit at home playing World of Warcraft and falling asleep on his bean bag chair with a bottle of lotion and some used tissues on the floor beside him. Get my drift? Just because he’s your best friend doesn’t mean he’s right for this mission.

Think of getting a club on lock–down and making it your personal poosy paradise as a Mission. Not everyone is cut out for it. Even if your buddy is Mr. Cool, I still highly suggest rolling solo to build more confidence. Sure, you might feel odd at first standing in line alone, but spit some bullshit about how you’re ‘meeting your friends inside’ etc. This also forces you to engage with others and the staff. I don’t care how many books you read and videos you’ve watched on getting laid, nothing will ever beat getting in the trenches and putting in the time.

Ah yea…

If I don’t drop dead from exhaustion and dehydration, stay tuned for Part 2 with five more commandments, including: don’t get naked with the staff and understanding who the most important person in your new poosy paradise actually is.

The Strong Do What They Can, And The Weak Suffer What They Must

This story will teach you about the sublime uselessness of morality.

Halfway through the Peloponnesian War, the Athenians decided to complete their hegemony over the Aegean Sea by capturing the only remaining island not yet under their control, the island of Melos. Melos was originally a Spartan colony, but as the war between Sparta and Athens raged on, Melos remained neutral. This was not good enough for Athens. The Athenians took a fleet to Melos to demand monetary tribute and, should they refuse, press war.

Before waging war, the Athenians sent an envoy to try and negotiate with the Melians. The envoys, instead of being given an audience in front of the people of Melos, were taken aside to speak with the magistrates and other powerful men of the island. When greeted in such a fashion, the Athenians opened,

> Since the negotiations are not to go on before the people, in order that we may not be able to speak straight on without interruption, and deceive the ears of the multitude by seductive arguments which would pass without refutation (for we know that this is the meaning of our being brought before the few), what if you who sit there were to pursue a method more cautious still! Make no set speech yourselves, but take us up at whatever you do not like, and settle that before going any farther. And first tell us if this proposition of ours suits you.

And the stage was set. Because the discussion would be held apart from the masses, there would be no need for rhetoric, flowery language, or flattery. This would be a frank and no-bullshit rejoinder with only self-interest as a guide.

Understanding the great danger they were facing, the Melians replied,

> To the fairness of quietly instructing each other as you propose there is nothing to object; but your military preparations are too far advanced to agree with what you say, as we see you are come to be judges in your own cause, and that all we can reasonably expect from this negotiation is war, if we prove to have right on our side and refuse to submit, and in the contrary case, slavery.

In other words, the Melians did not feel they had much of a choice – war or slavery. What could they do except resist in the face of such outcomes? But the Athenians were unmoved, and their reply tells a man everything he needs to know about humanity and morality:

> For ourselves, we shall not trouble you with specious pretenses — either of how we have a right to our empire because we overthrew the Mede, or are now attacking you because of wrong that you have done us — and make a long speech which would not be believed; and in return we hope that you, instead of thinking to influence us by saying that you did not join the Spartans, although their colonists, or that you have done us no wrong, will aim at what is feasible, holding in view the real sentiments of us both; since you know as well as we do that right, as the world goes, is only in question between equals in power, while the strong do what they can and the weak suffer what they must.

And the offer was made: do what the strong want, or be crushed regardless of any protests to the contrary. For what else was there to say? The Athenians ruled the Aegean Sea, and Melos was powerless to stop them.

Loading…

The Melians then tried to persuade the Athenians to halt their invasion. They argued morality – that it would be wrong to attack a neutral nation, and should Athens lose the war the Spartans would show no mercy to Athens due to their treatment of their colony Melos. But the Athenians merely replied that they were less concerned with being defeated by Sparta and more concerned with appearing strong to the rest of the city-states they controlled in the Aegean Sea – for should they let Melos remain free, it may embolden other Athenian tributary states enough to revolt.

The Athenians commanded them to either pay tribute to the Athenian empire or be destroyed. The Melians refused, and told them they would hold out for Spartan assistance. The Athenians remarked,

> …we are struck by the fact, that after saying you would consult for the safety of your country, in all this discussion you have mentioned nothing which men might trust in and think to be saved by. Your strongest arguments depend upon hope and the future, and your actual resources are too scanty, as compared with those arrayed against you, for you to come out victorious.
> …it is certain that those who do not yield to their equals, who keep terms with their superiors, and are moderate toward their inferiors, on the whole succeed best.

The Melians held against the Athenian siege for six months, until, as Thucydides reports, > Reinforcements afterwards arriving from Athens in consequence, under the command of Philocrates, son of Demeas, the siege was now pressed vigorously; > and some treachery taking place inside, the Melians surrendered at discretion to the Athenians, who put to death all the grown men whom they took, and sold the women and children for slaves, and subsequently sent out five hundred colonists and inhabited the place themselves.

Then the Melians were no more. And the crimes the Athenians committed on that day were forgotten. At the end of the Peloponnesian War, with Sparta victorious, Athens was not punished in any significant way. It was Sparta who suffered the worst fate, as they were eventually conquered and utterly destroyed by the Thebians (who became strong because the Spartans eradicated the Plataeans). Meanwhile, Athens lived on, and continues to this day.

Out of everything I have discovered, there does not appear to be a truth more basic than this one. Forget notions of morality, karma, or afterlife justice – this world bows only to the strong, who do as they please, while the weak struggle to stay above the rising tides of history. If one wishes to take the advice given by the Kings here, then he must remember that the world he lives in operates according to this law, and, whenever faced with conflict, he must ask:

Who are the strong? Who are the weak? And to which category do I belong?

Therein will you find the answer to whatever situation you may be.

4 Things I Learned From Don Draper

May 14, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

The concepts of “alpha” and “beta” often inspire significant debate, but it’s clear that Mad Men’s main character Don Draper is one of the great alpha television characters of today, and perhaps of all time. It is telling that the show’s producers have to set a drama in the 1960s to depict male characters whose unabashed interests include making money, laying women, and competing for status. Among these, Don is the King Alpha. Here are a few things I have learned from watching this character develop throughout five seasons of the show:

Silence works

Don barely talks about anything outside of business. Nobody knows about his past, his personal life, his love affairs, his likes and dislikes, nothing. Don understands that the more someone knows about you, the more they can use the information against you. Sometimes you are valuable enough that it doesn’t matter (as Pete Campbell found out in season one), but it’s best to give your competitors as little ammunition as possible. The idea of opening up and allowing people to know you as a means of building trust is largely Sensitive New Age Guy psychobabble designed to identify and subjugate lesser males.

Never show outward emotion besides anger

Don is human — he’s prone to the occasional depressive episode of laying in bed for hours and contemplating what it all means, but nobody is privy to this save for his wife and the TV audience. At the office he is always composed, an unshakeable paragon of efficiency with perfectly slicked back hair and a well-tailored suit. Don doesn’t talk about his “feelings” because he knows that, ultimately, men are alone in the world and nobody cares about his problems. The only thing besides his dry sarcasm is the occasional well-timed rebuke when someone royally screws up. Don uses anger surgically, providing a counterpoint to his normally aloof nature. A man who is always sad, angry, or jealous cheapens these emotions and makes them essentially meaningless.

Loading...

Hide the effort of your successes

This is a crossover from Law 30 of the 48 Laws of Power, which Don exemplifies. Don is regarded as a genius whose often-spontaneous brilliance has kept his company afloat on multiple occasions. At the office, he is the top player who is sought after by other firms and envied by his coworkers. Few will cross him because of the value he brings and the mystique of being able to come up with the perfect idea in the nick of time. Only the viewer is treated to scenes of him in his undershirt, getting drunk as he struggles to brainstorm another revolutionary idea. Don is a genius to be sure, but he also works tirelessly (and secretly) at his craft.

Happiness is transient

Don is a millionaire with a high-powered successful career in a big city, a gorgeous wife, and two kids he doesn't have to see very often. Yet he is never happy for more than an episode or two at a time. He is overcome with a sense of emptiness, often trying to escape his feelings with spontaneous trips, alcohol, or sex outside of his marriage. Don understands at a basic level that all happiness is impermanent.

The employees at the ad firm know that their work is not selling products, but rather selling the feeling of happiness that people associate with their products. Like someone with autism who has to learn facial expressions by rote memorization, Don excels at this manipulation because he operates outside of a normal consumerist mindset and can understand it objectively. However, he is just as prone to the fleeting nature of contentment as the people he manipulates.

I normally advise against watching TV, but Mad Men is one of the two shows on television

I make time for each week. In a whitewashed, PC entertainment world with few male role models, Mad Men subtly gives men a blueprint of how to act in the workplace, at home, and in the bedroom.

5 Reasons Being A Lawyer Sucks

May 15, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Yesterday during our family BBQ for Mother's Day, I had the same conversation I have almost weekly with various friends and family:

> Person: You know I think I would have made a great lawyer. I love to argue with people.
> Me: Well it's not all arguing. There's a lot more to this than just arguing in Court.
> Person: Still, it's so cool that you take on a case, look for the ways to win and defeat your opponent. What a great job.
> Me: It's horrible.

I've gotten to the point where I'm pretty damn blunt with people. When I'm asked why I'm not married, I say because I have no rush to do so and there is no benefit to me as an American male. When girls ask me why I'm not more flirty via text I respond because I don't care. So when people ask me about my job and there is no downside to telling the truth*, I tell them that simply, it sucks.

Such situations include dates (projecting negativity never helps secure a bang) or business development (nobody wants to hire a lawyer who hates what he does).*

So why is being a lawyer, and specifically in my case litigation, not all that it's cracked up to be?

1. It Never Fucking Ends

The above clip hits home to me. Litigation is one case after another that follows the same damn path over and over again. You get a case, you either have to sue or defend it. Then you engage in "discovery" which is horrible, nothing but paperwork and taking depositions (testimony under oath). Then you file motions, and oppose motions, and argue motions. Then you try to settle. Perhaps informally, perhaps through the use of a mediator. If all else fails, in one to two years you will have trial. And THEN, there is maybe an appeal that goes another year or two.

Finally though, the case is over. You have won or lost and can now forget about it. Except you have another 10-15 just like them at various points. And you get another one and start the process over again. I'm guessing most jobs are like this, but when you combine it with the other negatives it really takes a toll on your mind.

On a daily basis, you suffer from this as well. There is no off time—I have clients calling me in the evenings and weekends. My cell phone has to be available. Often times I fantasize about having a normal job where people can shut it down mentally upon leaving the office. Type in to google "lawyer suicide depression" and you'll see that the added mental stress breaks many lawyers.

2. Your Peers Are Assholes

I'm a very mild mannered guy. I don't raise my voice, I don't engage in insults or name-calling. I'm the guy that you meet and think there's no way this guy will ever wrong me. On dates countless times I've heard when I start escalating hard that "I never expected this from you!" And so on. I mention this because all the best attorneys I've ever worked with or against, have had this "grandpa" demeanor. They are your best friend. Everything will be okay, no need to argue. In fact, this is the best demeanor to have when trying to elicit information from an adversary because people's natural propensities are to open up to people they trust, not people that they think are attacking them. But what makes a good lawyer is the topic of another day.

Sadly less than 10% of the attorneys in the real world are like this. Many think that bravado and overexcitement are the cornerstones of good lawyering because of their days watching SVU and CSI. Others think they are smarter than all the judges in the land and everyone is an idiot for disagreeing with them. It really makes no sense to me. I've had so many opposing attorneys say that "Between you and me I don't see how your client will win." Somehow they think these poor excuses for negotiation really work. Nonetheless these are the people you deal with. Straight-up idiots that somehow managed to pass the bar. And responding to an idiot's motion is a lot more effort and pain than a well-thought out decent attorney's paperwork. Here's an email I received today actually – another poor attempt at "negotiating":

> Literally, you have no idea how broke my client is.
> Nevertheless, I also am tired of spending my own time and money dealing with this ridiculous case…
> If not, as much as I can't believe that I've spent even 10 minutes of time, much less 40 hours on small case for a client who can't afford to pay a few dollars, I will take the trial and you and I can waste some more of our time. Please tell your client, whether he wants to believe it or not, this  has NO MONEY WHATSOEVER!!!!! Not a dime. Can't afford rent, can't afford gas, and is barely scraping by. He will not get a single penny if he gets a judgment…

None of this has any impact on me whatsoever. All I needed to know was the dollar amount of his offer. Here's another example:

> Everything over $3,000 is coming out of my pocket. So, am I to tell my wife that we can't go out for dinner for New Year's eve? Maybe we'll just drink water instead of wine.
> Loading…
>  wanted to know if you could take a credit card. Can you? Shame on you, robbing from the poor.

My response was as follows:

> We unfortunately do not take credit cards. I will email you a draft settlement > agreement shortly.

Unfortunately when this profession loses its professionalism we have attorneys like the above that just add unnecessary annoyance to simple things.

3. You're Everyone's Psychologist

Let's be honest, the only reason anybody comes to you as a litigator is because they just got fucked. Either someone screwed them out of some money or someone has just sued them trying to extract money from them. The client always thinks his case is the biggest thing since the ~~GM~~ Ford Pinto case. It doesn't matter if the person lost his life savings in shady real estate deals to low level landlord-tenant issues, nothing is more problematic than that person's case at that time. So they call, email and repeatedly tell you all their problems. And you have no choice but to listen.

Another manifestation of the same is that you undertake a lot of added mental "responsibility" for the outcomes of the cases. Even if they have a losing case, I do feel for them when they lose. Even worse is when they are supposed to win and they lose, of no fault of your own but of the legal system. It's a hard pill to swallow, trying to explain to someone that they either owe a significant amount of money, or that they will not be getting the amounts they were previously screwed out of.

4. No Control

No matter how well I write, or how great my argument is in court, the final outcome is out of my hands. It's the judge and jury that will decide and all I can do is put in my best effort to sway the decision. And I hate that. Did the judge's wife made him watch the baby last night? No sleep means he's cranky and doesn't feel like listening to argument today. Jury member randomly loves the city I'm suing? There goes that verdict. These are extreme examples but there is so many factors at play from scheduling dates through the court to a judge's mood one day that no matter how hard you work, prepare or try you cannot control your end result.

5. Debt v. Income

Unless you are going to one of the higher tier schools, you are not in the running for a high paying job. I have had attorneys work for me for free, just to get it on their resume. Top tier students are willing to intern for free for me during school. As a business owner, this is wonderful.

But for those considering law school, it's a bitch. First of all it's expensive as hell and you will be large debt coming out. Second, the market is horrible. You'd be looking at 5 figures for most of you, assuming you can even get a job.

Positives

As much as I dislike what I do there are positives. The biggest one is money…but only in one scenario. If you are good it's relatively easy to make a lot of money. There are not many jobs that start with a 6 figure salary or that you get paid nearly $400 an hour to do. It's an impressive job to women, be it girls you date or your mother's ability to brag about you. It's much harder to be civilly fucked with as a lawyer. You will be smarter and more logical than almost everyone around you just given your job. If you decide to jump ship there are many corollary careers you can dive into. This has kept me going for as long as I have, but with some tweaks to keep my sanity.

So Nobody Should Be A Lawyer?

There are plenty of people that have no business being a lawyer. But the more relevant question is that if you can actually be a good lawyer, should you be? The answer is only if you truly and seriously love being a lawyer. Otherwise it will kill you mentally. A little piece of me dies everyday. Sometimes I stare at my computer for what seems like an hour before I can gather up enough motivation to write another brief or call another attorney. But I'm good at it, it funds my life and allows me to travel like I want.

And yes I'm aware of the purported belief that "everyone dislikes their job." But I hardly believe that is true. I have friends that enjoy their jobs and I can likely find multiple examples that, while are not the norm, still evidences people that like their jobs. My friend used to edit porn for a living, he was far from hating that job. I'm pretty sure this guy's job doesn't suck either. So to me that is bullshit. Which leads me to my next point… who cares if everyone dislikes their jobs? That doesn't mean that you or I should as well.

The best advice I ever got from a lawyer was in response to my question about whether I should attend law school X or law school Y. His response: "Don't go to law school."

10 Surprising Facts About Sleep

May 15, 2013 | by Red Pill Theorist | Link | Original Link

The unsung hero of male self-improvement is sleep. A lack of sleep, or "sleep debt," will retard your progress in weightlifting, womanizing, and just about any other worthwhile pursuit you could care to name. The authors of Sugar, Sleep and Survival, a popular treatment of the latest sleep research: "Not enough sleep makes you fat, hungry, impotent, hypertensive, and cancerous, with a bad heart." Well then. In the interest of avoiding this parade of horribles, here are ten more facts you didn't know about sleep. Many of these are culled from Sugar, Sleep and Survival (an excellent read.) The rest are from various scientific studies.

1. Night owls are less healthy

People who stay up late and sleep late, even if they get adequate sleep, exhibit a marked increase in psychopathology, i.e. mental disorders. Early birds, or morning types, also tend to have healthier lifestyles.

2. Night owls are smarter

Friend of the manosphere Satoshi Kanazawa examined ethnographies of hunter-gatherer groups, and found that nocturnal activities were relatively rare in these societies. Since smart people are more likely to behave evolutionary novel ways, he theorized that higher IQ individuals were more likely to be night owls. A longitudinal study of American adolescents proved him right.

3. Peak performance comes two hours after waking

A cross-cultural study of 2.4 million (!) users of social media showed that people post the most positive messages on twitter around two hours after waking. Since a positive mood is important for "physical and emotional well-being, working memory, creativity, decision-making, and immune response" it's probably best to schedule difficult tasks around this time.

Loading...

4. Night owls are more politically radical

This one made me laugh. A 1988 study of 200 paid volunteers showed that political radicalism and anxiety were both positively correlated with staying up late. The general habit of 2am manosphere blog posts is now totally understandable.

5. You probably need more sleep than you thought

Long days signal to your body that it's late summertime. In the late summer, mammals begin to store fat for the winter. Humans "develop diabetes, heart disease, cancer, and severe depression on anything less than 9.5 hours of sleep a night for at least seven months out of the year." Yes, you read that right. Nine and a half folks.

6. Sleep deprivation makes you crave carbohydrates

If you've tried any of the diet recommendations promulgated by ROK and other sites, you know how bad the carbohydrate cravings are in week two of paleo. Sleep will help you through to the week three promised land.

7. Computer screens are the enemy of sleep

When it's time to sleep, your body produces a hormone called melatonin. While all forms of artificial light damage melatonin production, the blue light of your computer screen or plasma television has a particularly large negative impact. Staying off the web in the hours before bed is a smart move.

8. Showering before bed helps you fall asleep

When you sleep, blood flows from the abdomen into your extremities, bringing down your overall body temperature. The water evaporating from your skin after a shower mimics this effect, leading to drowsiness. You can also mimic the heat flow to your extremities by placing a hot water bottle at your feet.

9. Cooler ambient air temperature makes falling asleep easier

The same mechanism in fact number eight is at work here.

10. Sleep makes you more attractive

Sleep debt causes your cortisol levels to rise. Cortisol levels are a primary determinant in male facial symmetry and oxidative stress, both of which are profoundly correlated with perceived attractiveness.

Open Letter To American Fathers

May 16, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Dear Mister,

I showed up to your house, looking quite the gentleman. I even brought flowers to placate Mom. Your daughter, Stacy, showed me some family photos, and your wife is quite the MILF. You wore a stern, stoic expression, determined to show what a manly protective father you are. I could tell you were a controlling yet spineless prick, that you needed me to cower before you so you wouldn't feel threatened by me. Mid-conversation, I'd recount one of your daughter's glorious squirting orgasms in my head, and my eyes would flash with mischievous glee.

But no. I didn't do that. I know that would set you off with rage. So I played the nice guy. I shook your hand, and gave you a weak handshake. I averted your gaze, and deferred to your authority. I knew that emotionally, you needed me to be a weak, sexless male. If I were anything more, you'd subconsciously suspect your daughter would become a raging whore. Your suspicions are not unfounded, after all – you did raise her.

You, Mr. American Father, are a dime a dozen. You secretly wanted a boy, but you couldn't even admit that to yourself. So when the 'he' you hoped for was a 'she,' you figured 'Hell, there's no reason I can't treat her any differently than I would a son. Men and women are equal, after all, no reason it should be any different.' You got that third party penis envy. You had her playing field hockey when all she wanted as a little girl was to help make dinner and read Mansfield Park.

Her participation in team sports would come in handy later, as she learned to ape her high testosterone teammates. One by one, they taught her to value getting railed by the cool guys at school. It's like one of those bad reality TV shows, where a woman finds herself vying for a man's favor, only because there are four other women doing it too.

She’s lost her mind to the hive. Invariably, these guys get bored and dumped her. True to form, her friends allay her heartbreak with healthy doses of booze, weed and Instagram attention whoring.

You Never Had The Heart To Say No

With that little cherubic face begging you for the latest Bratz doll, you couldn’t find it in yourself to say no. When your wife started dressing Stacy like a tramp at only eight years old, you wanted to say something, but you stayed silent. The Mrs. was bored after all, and she had started to live vicariously through Stacy, imagining all the male attention and outright dick that her daughter would be getting. She was bored in her sexless marriage, sure, but she saw no reason why she couldn’t live through her daughter.

The reality is that you had two choices with your daughter – you either had to go full Muslim and keep her locked down at all times. Or you could lurch to the other extreme, and instill her with a sense of responsibility as she matured – that she and she alone was responsible for staying out of trouble, that when she screwed up, you wouldn’t come and pickup the pieces.

Instead, you half-assed them both. You said yes to anything your daughter could ask for. You physically could not bear to see her cry, so the moment disaster struck, you’d placate her by telling her, “it’s not your fault,” over and over, as you fixed the mess she made. You were disturbed by female emotion; you felt it was your duty to contain, control and calm it, rather than seeing its ebb and flow as the natural province of the feminine. Her outbursts were like little waves coming to shore, and yet they overpowered your gutless self.

When she needed true direction and firm guidance, you wilted and bought her off with candy instead. Just like how you’d have to buy your wife jewelry just to get your dick sucked. You wanted desperately to be her friend and not her father, so you’d coo to her in a voice that made you sound like a flaming child molester channeling Barney. In your mind, you weren’t ‘Father,’ but ‘Dad,’ the fun guy who takes her to sports games and throws her birthday parties. Patriarchy is a dirty word to you.

Making A Rebel Of A Careful Man’s Careless Daughter

I know you’d throw a fit if you saw me so much as touch your daughter’s hand, so I waited until we all sat down to dinner to make contact. You didn’t notice? Oh, I was fingering her under the table as you were spooning your butternut squash soup. Bitch couldn’t even wait ’til the turkey came out – your penchant for spoiling her means she can’t wait very long. I’m a good guy, so I let up before she could come. I didn’t want her making a big wet mess right at the dinner table. Frustrated, she later asked me why I stopped short, I explained it was out of deference to you. So now she’s a little mad at you over her missed big O. She already blew me in the church pews, so I figured getting digital during dinner with the parents was the next step.

In your head, you’ve got all these violent little fantasies about what you’ll do to me when you discover the depths to which I've defiled your daughter. But come on. We both know you're way too pussy to lay a hand on me. Even if you did, you'd be well on your way to tossing some salad at your local state penitentiary. I'm just sleeping in the bed you set, my heartfelt thanks, bro.

I love how you give her a curfew, as if her pussy only gets wet between the hours of nine to five. Noticed how she's suddenly been going to the 'library' a lot lately? And that she's hanging out after school with 'Emma,' the girl you thought she hated? I don't need to explain what's really going on. She's such a darling, I hardly even need to leave my bedroom to see her.

Your 'birds and the bees' talk was crucial to my game. You explained to her what sex was, warning her to stay away from it until you said otherwise. If she did have sex, you told her, the lecher responsible would be swiftly punished, while you would be her emotional ~~tampon~~ support, there to offer your unconditional love. Well, when she found out how amazing it felt, unlike how you described it, she just couldn't stop gunning for it. She had been bugging me about how all we do is have sex. And due to your little dinner, it'll be months until she demands that we "go on a real date." Thanks.

A Final Blow To American Education

Through a strange accident of timing, I was mostly educated by a generation of old-guard teachers on the verge of retirement. Starting in about the eighth grade, it seemed like two or three threw in the towel at the end of every year, having put in their 25 or 30 years. In other words, I was the last student for an uncanny number of teachers. I'm pretty young, but being schooled by a series of old-timers imparted an old-soul sensibility that still gets pointed out to me regularly.

Naturally, these teachers ran their classrooms in the old-school ways. My math teacher, a crusty frog- man with old-man spots, claimed to have fought in the Korean War—which was not thoroughly implausible. He'd actually retired and returned to teaching, since he had nothing else to do. When we asked him what good trigonometry would be in "the real world," he claimed he'd used it to fire volleys into the enemy camp. When he'd catch us taking notes on basic concepts he say, "This is why this generation is so stupid." If students seemed to be spacing out or dozing off, he throw pencil erasers at them or squirt them with a spray bottle, while hurling verbal abuse at the whole class.

Our woodshop teacher, a frustrated, angry dude with a heavy Southern accent, would facepalm (before that term was in wide use) every time a student did something he deemed to be dumb. He would take it upon himself to throw the brick of reality into our ninth-grade faces. When this gigantic fat kid refused to do his projects, he called him out in front of everyone.

> Teacher: Tyrell, what do you think you're going to do with your life, since you never do your work?
> Fat Kid: I'm going to play professional football.

> Teacher: Professional football players are fast—even the big ones. I'll tell you what: I'm 62 years old. You're 14 or 15. Let's go outside and race. If you win, I'll give you an automatic A in the class. If you don't, you have accept that you'll probably never make it onto a top college team, never mind the NFL.

The kid started crying. We didn't say fucking shit.

The hallways were no different. Every time you heard "young man!" behind you, you knew you were in for some trouble. One time, I made the mistake of spitting in one of the (outdoor) hallways on the way to class. Almost instantly, I heard the trademark call of Mr. Pritchard, the school disciplinarian:

> Pritchard: Young man!
> Me: Yes? [with attitude]
> Pritchard: I'm going to need you to pick that up.
> Me: How do you expect me to pick that shit up? [with more attitude]

At the sound of the S-word, Pritchard grabbed my punk-ass by the shirt, two-handed, and slammed me against the lockers directly behind me, painfully jamming the lock mechanism into my back. Somehow, it suddenly occurred to me that I could use the paper towel in my backpack to wipe it up, which I promptly did while apologizing.

Nowadays, any one of these acts would get a teacher fired, maybe indicted. But, at my school, a complaint would have had you laughed out of the office. And, no one thought to complain. Parents, teachers, administrators, and students all had an understanding that this is how you operated a school effectively. The old-timers ran a tight operation and had the freedom (and, more importantly, the power) to teach and discipline us. My experience was a little anachronistic, because so many of my teachers were old, but this was just the norm in very recent history.

Times have changed.

This week, a cell-phone video taken in a Duncanville, Texas classroom made the rounds on the Internet. In it, Jeff Bliss—a long-haired stoner who looks like one of the ancillary bullies from the Simpsons—directs a tirade at his teacher after having been asked to leave the room. In the 87-second video, the former drop-out criticizes his teacher's pedagogical technique, calling for her to "touch [her students'] hearts" instead of just handing them "freakin' packets."

Loading...

You'd think that this rather ordinary event would go unnoticed. Instead, the video went viral. Even more surprisingly, the kid was showered with praise for his "courage" and "intelligence." He appeared on the local news and was celebrated in a variety of online outlets. The teacher was held up as the paragon of everything that's wrong with today's education system: lazy, uncommitted, and incompetent. She was placed on administrative leave by the school's principal in direct response to the reaction to the video.

But neither of them deserved what they got.

This pot-head slacker certainly deserves no praise. Defiantly parroting a few tired, heartwarming platitudes from a Robin Williams movie isn't courage, it's disruptive—and ridiculous. It isn't the teacher's responsibility to captivate you with her creative teaching style, or blow you away with some creative illustration of how amazing the subject-matter is—like in some Hollywood movie–just so that you'll sit still in your chair. Being an 18-year-old man still in the tenth grade also evaporates any credibility you have in speaking on matters of learning and education. Furthermore, no one is talking about why Bliss was kicked out of the classroom in the first place. He's likely displayed this pattern of disruptiveness, for which he clearly accepts no accountability. It's always someone else's fault.

Julie Phung, the teacher, is also receiving undue blame. Even if the claims are true, what else do you expect from teachers nowadays? There's little incentive to do anything but the minimum, never mind scintillating daily presentations to keep the easily distractable engaged for an extra 10 minutes. The hours are long (contrary to popular belief) and the attitudes, nuisances, and outright risks you have to put with increase with every year. You're constantly attacked from all sides: the increasingly degenerate students, shitty (or entitled) parents, the principal, society at-large.

Not only that, you're also a paper tiger with little power to maintain order or stand up for yourself—a fact the students are keenly aware of. Even if a kid punches you in the face, you run the risk of major legal troubles—never mind jeopardizing your livelihood—for so much as restraining them. If Ms. Phung can be placed on leave for not "touching kids' hearts" enough, what do you think a slam against some lockers would get you? All of this for a job that pays shit–a salary so low that it's not going to attract the best and the brightest, and hasn't for years. Frankly, we should be thankful anyone is willing to do that job.

American education is in irretrievable decline for a laundry list of reasons: the willful de-funding of it, the decline of competent parenting, shrinking attention spans, large class-sizes, the criminalization of teacher-imposed discipline, the removal of trades (shop classes) from curriculum offerings, the McDonaldization effect created by mandatory standardized testing. The list goes on.

Teachers have been rendered into little more than a cross between babysitter and probation officer. We have to face the fact that the teaching profession, as we knew it, no longer exists. To blame teachers for systemic problems is not only unfair, it's easy.

The Hands Of Man

> In this book I would like to speak up for an ideal that is timeless but finds little accommodation today: manual competence, and the stance it entails towards the built, material world.

And so this philosophy book begins, using the backstory of an author who got tired of his job in a political think tank to become a motorcycle mechanic. From the title you can already guess the satisfied result. He goes on to explain the causes and effects of the decline in manual ability.

> This book grows out of an attempt to understand the greater sense of agency and competence I have always felt doing manual work, compared to other jobs that were officially recognized as "knowledge work."
> Those who work in an office often feel that, despite the proliferation of contrived metrics they must meet, their job lacks objective standards of the sort provided by, for example, a carpenter's level, and that as a result there is something arbitrary in the dispensing of credit and blame.
> A washing machine, for example, surely exists to serve our needs, but in contending with one that is broken, you have to ask what it needs. At such a moment, technology is no longer a means by which our mastery of the world is extended, but an affront to our usual self-absorption.

The decline of work started in the early 20th century with the introduction of scientific management, where knowledge was concentrated in the hands of the managerial elite and then doled out in tiny parts to workers who barely had to think when completing tasks. Once you remove need for a worker's judgement, you can pay him less and control him better.

The result has become a culture of workers who use a narrow spectrum of knowledge in their jobs. We've become generalists with no redeeming skills, and the more abstract our work, the more it must be judged subjectively by the emotions and whims of managers. We get less fulfillment from it as a result. The education system today does nothing but prepare students for a monotonous life of glorified clerkdom while wood shop classes of yesterday prepared the proles for Ford's assembly line.

Loading…

> White-collar professions, too, are subject to routinization and degradation, proceeding by the same logic that hit manual fabrication a hundred years ago: the cognitive elements of the job are appropriated from professionals, instantiated in a system or process, and then handed back to a new class of workers—clerks—who replace the professionals.
> The idea of opportunity costs presumes the fungibility of human experience: all our activities are equivalent or interchangeable once they are reduced to the abstract currency of clock time, and its wage correlate.
> …self-estrangement… arises from a work pace that ruthlessly subordinates the intrinsic goods of the job to the extrinsic metric of profit.

The author also describes the overreach of corporations in our lives, where we must submit to the monolithic "corporate culture" whether we're on duty or not. It's not even a shock anymore if someone gets fired from their job for something they did in their personal lives or for something they wrote on the internet. In fact, job advice articles tell you specifically how to be an obedient peon that will not get turned down for a job due to having a life.

Shop Class as Soulcraft clearly shows how work affects life and vice versa, similar in flavor to Neil Postman's Amusing Ourselves To Death. Perhaps you can call it a more readable version of Zen And The Art Of Motorcycle Maintenance. It advocates for tradition, for fixing things, and for solving problems using our brains and hands instead of being mindless consumers. All I know is that after reading it, you'll get the urge to make something. Recommended.

> …once I had the master's degree I felt like I belonged to a certain order of society, and was entitled to its forms. Despite the beautiful ties I wore, it turned out to be a more proletarian existence than I had known as a manual worker.

You Were Born To Follow

9AM Monday, at the office: I make my way to the kitchen, prepare my oats, and head back to my desk – passing my boss on the way. He scurries to his office and retrieves a packet of oatmeal.

11PM Wednesday, at home: "I don't know if I should break up with her," my roommate states. Silent, he awaits my response.

1PM Saturday, on the phone: "How should I respond?" my cousin asks me. He is texting a girl he met last weekend.

Monkey See, Monkey Do

Everyday I notice more and more examples of people living by social queues, a friend's approval, and others people's advice. They are essentially deferring their lives to others.

It is too easy to submit. To continue the trend. But are you really living?

We are all too familiar with the man who lives through other people. He has a boring, little life where the most exciting part of his day is listening to his friend's latest adventure over a coffee. He is easy to recognize. But the man who lives under the influence of other people is not.

His life is structured around the preferences of others. And the scary part is that he doesn't know.

Reaction vs. Creation

The book The Path of Least Resistance by Robert Fritz is possibly my favorite. It centers around decision making and the idea that you must create your life. Fritz proposes that it is our default behavior to live unconsciously and simply react to life's circumstances. If you have not read it, I strongly suggest you make it your next book.

His message echoes mine. Reacting is following. Following the norm. Following advice. Expectations. It is taking what life throws at you and allowing that to dictate your path.

Creating is leading. Choosing what you want to do. What you want to create. Where you will go.

The Crown Is Yours

You simply have to put it on. The moment you decide to think for yourself and make your own decisions, you free yourself from the chains of others. You must decide what you want and then consciously choose to obtain it. Don't fall for the natural trap and submit to society's expectations (the path of least resistance, if you will).

The beauty of a creation-based lifestyle is that others will naturally gravitate to you. The sheep unconsciously recognize the shepherd. They come to him for advice. They seek his approval. They follow him.

How To Control Your Emotional State

May 18, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

We all have our ups and downs. Some days you feel on top of the world, you ooze a sexy masculine confidence that women love whereas other days you couldn't be bothered to shave — you scowl at the thought of doing anything interesting and avoid all outside contact. Many guys accept this with a "que sera, sera" mentality. They feel it is just the natural ebb and flow of things, that taming your emotional state would be too chaotic of a task.

Those who do wish to change usually use hokey terminology talking about "energy" and the "universe." They'll seek guidance from another source so that they do not have to take responsibility for letting their emotions get out of check. People also seek a quick cure for a continual state of happiness, but what they do not realize is that happiness is transient.

I do believe there is a way to wrangle your emotions that relies on you, your habits and the power you have to respond to various stimuli. Essentially you must minimize the negativity and maximize the positivity in your life by altering certain habits.

Minimize Habits That Lead To Negativity

Take a moment to think about any time you've lost control of your emotions. When did you last get angry, depressed, hateful, etc.? What do you do when you're out talking to girls that hurts your success? Do you have unreasonable limiting beliefs? Do you believe you always need to be happy to be successful? Do you get frustrated when you have anxiety because of any of the above?

If you think about the above long enough and are mindful when such emotional states occur you will begin to notice a trend in what triggers them.

For me the biggest habits that lead to a negative state of mind, in which I lacked motivation, was depressed, and stayed inside all day, were my nutritional habits. I started to recognize a pattern: I'd go out drinking or eat highly processed foods, I'd wake up the next day tired and dehydrated, then I'd stay inside all day watching movies because I didn't want to go to the gym or talk to people. The cycle would just endlessly repeat until the natural ebb and flow of things took me to a high point.

Loading...

Maximize Habits That Lead To Positivity

Repeat the exercise above. When was the last time you felt on top of the world, when did you last feel invincible, when did you last have no anxieties? When were you on fire when talking to girls, what were you doing that made you so successful? What were the thoughts running through your head?

Again if you pay attention you will begin to see patterns. You'll start to realize what habits lead to a great mood.

For me I felt the best when 'rewarded' with something. Whether it was having great sex, sharing something with a friend, new PRs in the gym, busting my ass in the library and getting a good grade, or learning a new skill.

The Keystone Habit

Roosh brought up keystone habits in a recent article titled "One Approach A Day."

Essentially it is an innocuous habit that has a much larger effect than planned.

For me I started a few keystone habits: I started the day off with a nice cold glass of lemon water and my vitamins. In doing this I started drinking more and more water leading me to be less dehydrated, more energetic and making better food choices.

I also made a rule that as soon as I start talking myself out of something reasonable I would force myself to do whatever it was I was trying to rationalize my way out of. Maybe I'd start thinking "I'm kind of sore and I still haven't seen the new episode of Game of Thrones, I think I'll go to the gym later." I know I wouldn't go to the gym later so I would immediately get up and put on my workout gear. Just by doing this I started getting in the mood for lifting — I've also heard of guys packing a gym bag every night and leaving it in their car.

The peaks and troughs of our emotional state should not define us. As a man, whether it be through eliminating negative triggers or forming positive habits, you should be fully in control of your emotions. Use the power of a keystone habit to enact much larger scale change so you can be in a perpetual state of positivity, or at the very least, neutrality.

The Name Game

You may recall that nearly every Sherlock Holmes story would feature a little vignette where Holmes would make some dazzling display of what author Conan Doyle called “the science of deduction”. You remember the routine; some character would come across Holmes’s path, and Holmes would then proceed to make a series of razor-sharp, breezy deductions about the person’s life from something as simple as a smudge of mud on his shoe, or a blemish on his hand. Everyone would gasp in astonishment, and Holmes would establish his dominance. Are such a feats of observation possible in real life? Can one train one’s observation skills to such a high level? Well, probably not. But you can still improve your observation skills with hard work. I have seen extremely shrewd merchants in Cairo’s Khan al-Khalili market identify a wealth of information about foreigners in under a minute, just from observing them. And the overall effect was amazing.

While Conan Doyle was exaggerating “deduction” for literary effect, the fact remains that sharp powers of observation can pay huge dividends in social interactions. Whether your goal is to improve your gaming skills, negotiation skills at work, or social abilities in general, training yourself to become an observer of people is a critical talent. We can sharpen our powers of observation to a high degree by systematically focusing on a few areas. For example, facial construction and clothing are two areas that can be studied in detail with great profit. I enjoy names. Let’s call it the Name Game.

Remember the Grimm’s fairy tale “Rumpelstiltskin”? What enabled the maiden to triumph over the evil imp was her discovery of his name. Like many fairy tales, it can be interpreted allegorically as representing a subconscious psychological truth. The imp knew the maiden had gained power over him by unmasking his name and, by extension, his identity. The idea that names represent our inner selves is a very ancient one, probably going back to prehistoric days when totems and taboos surrounded place-names and certain objects. When someone can hone in on our name, and learn something about us—however insignificant—that person can be seen to have gained a subtle psychological advantage over us. I know from experience that, in the right circumstances, revealing some detail about a person’s name and place of origin can often give you an edge in a social interplay. Even if you are totally wrong in your guess, the attempt alone demonstrates awareness of cultures and nations. And that is what really matters.

The first and easiest step is to train yourself to recognize the ethnic origin of any name at a glance. For example, Russian names often end in –ov or –in; Armenian names in –ian, Greek names in –os, -is, or –on; Latvian names in –ius. These suffixes are often vestiges of inflectional endings in these respective languages. Finnish, Danish, Norweigan, Polish, and Swedish are easily distinguishable with a little practice; Arabic, Turkish, and Iranian names are also easily recognizable with some eye for detail. Nigerian, Ethiopic, and Kenyan names all have specific flavors and forms, and these are often closely bound up with tribal affiliations in these countries. Bosnian names have a South Slav “feel” but with Turkish overtones. I could continue, but you get the idea.

Every country and ethnic group in the world has a specific “flavor” of surname. Your job is to learn the flavor and be able to spot it instantly. People with language talent do well at the Name Game. You would be surprised how many people never bother to learn the basics of names. But if you want to be mingle with international women, you need to develop this skill.

The next step, which is more difficult, is to be able to probe more deeply into the surname. Can you associate a surname with a specific region in a country? Does it bear a tribal or ethnic affiliation? Does it have a specific meaning? This is hardly an exact science, and the rules will vary from country to country. But a bit of research and practice get you off to a running start. If you know you are visiting a specific country in advance, it would be worth it to put in some effort to ethnographic geography. For example, the Celtic nations (Ireland, Scotland, Wales) all have strong county and surname correlations: specific surnames can be traced to specific counties. The same holds true for the Scandinavian, Iberian (Spain and Portugal) and Mediterranean nations. For countries in the New World, the name game work as well, since almost everyone is an immigrant, but at least you can display some ethnographic knowledge of the Old Country. Take a look at the surname distribution in Spain by region:

Loading...

Despite all the travel and intermixing in the modern world, tribalism still has very strong roots and remains a fact of anthropology. A great many family names in any given country can be traced to specific regions in that country. There are country-specific lexicons and resource books available that give the geographic origin of family names for many nations. I have one for a country in the eastern Mediterranean, and it has detailed history of each family's origin, religion, and various branches.

To demonstrate how this operates in practice, let us consider Italy and France as random examples. Let's look at France first. In France, names that end in –ac are often from the southwest region (and some are from Brittany). The German-sounding names are often from the Alsace region. Typical Norman names (from Normandy) are Langlois and Duval, but most are similar to those of French-speaking parts of Belgium, Picardie, and Nord-pas-de-Calais. Spanish sounding French names, of course, would originate in the Pyrenees region (bordering Spain). With Italy, and the perhaps stronger connection between family and region, the rules are easier to lay out. Shown below are various regions in Italy, and the types of surname suffixes that hail from that region. In parentheses, some example names are provided for illustration:

Piemonte: -ero/-ario (Barbero, Sobrario), -esio (Gorresio), -audi/aldi (Rambaudi)

Liguria: -asco (Cevasco)

Lombardia: -ago/-aghi/-ati (Arconati), -atti/-etti (Orsatti), -di/-oldi (Soldi, Giraboldi), -ingo/-engo (Martinengo)

Toscana: -otti/-utti/-ut/-ot (Bertolotti, Biasutti, Franzot)

Sardegna: -au (Biddau, Madau), -as (Cannas, Piras), -u (Caffedu)

Sicilia: -isi (Puglisi), -aloro (Favaloro, Orghialoro)

Finally, some caveats are in order here. I am not saying that the Name Game is going to be a deciding factor in any social interaction. Alone, it is only of academic use. It is not a magic wand that will enable you to compensate for weak social skills in other areas. In fact, it is a very minor arrow in your social quiver. Furthermore, the average person won't be able to deploy the Name Game without some solid background work. If you haven't done the work, you're better off keeping your mouth shut and practicing your "nodding game". But you never know when some piece of information can ride to your rescue.

When it comes to game, everything is part of everything else. And everything matters. Game is all about situational awareness, that intangible "feel" for the situation and the target. So, don't look for cure-alls, and don't expect magic bullets. I'm only offering a small bit of advice on a small part of the overall equation. The right Name Game observation dropped at the right time can work wonders.

If the rest of your social skills are tight, playing the Name Game successfully can have a big impact on the interaction. I remember one time I was talking to this beautiful Kenyan girl who was being very polite but noticeably cool to my approach. After hearing her name, I was able to tell her what tribe she belonged to (Kikuyu) and what specific part of Kenya her family hailed from. I could see her defenses melt in an instant, and from that point on I could do no wrong.

As chance would have it, I had recently finished a basic book on East African history and geography and had some of this information at my fingertips. Africa is a great continent to play the Name Game, since tribal affiliation and regionalism there are still relatively strong. Take note. Nigeria, for example, is composed of very specific tribal and sectarian groupings, each with names that are easily identified.

Work towards being as well-read as you can be in geography, history, anthropology, and languages. These areas all help. Mastering the etymology of names for the country of your choice can be an interesting diversion that may help you where you least expect it. And in a larger sense, if you train yourself to become an astute observer of human behavior in all its various habitats and manifestations, your effort will be rewarded.

5 Reasons Manhattan Doesn’t Suck

May 19, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

A lot of bashing of large cities and big city girls has been done on this site and its sister sites in the manosphere. Many points are painfully valid, with which pretty much all of us can identify and agree with. The cost of living, the feminism and the attitude of women (and guys too) make many of the metro areas downright miserable and so undesirable to live in. However, the largest city of them all in the US deserves credit for being seemingly different and significantly better than many other big cities in the us. Here are reasons that New York City, specifically Manhattan, is far superior to Toronto, DC, San Francisco and alike:

1. Convenience & Options

You can’t beat having a fruit stand and a hot dog stand on every corner, as well as multitude of stores and cafes that are open 24 hours a day. No other city in the US offers that. With the multitude of bars, clubs, and restaurants and coffee shops, the options for going out, having a good time and both day and night game are endless. Having a great subway system that can take you just about anywhere and five cabs on every block, makes getting around so easy. Yes, the winter is cold and miserable, but the summer months are quite nice and warm, especially if you don’t have to wear a suit every day.

2. Large Bookstores

I was happy to see during my last visit to NYC that there are still several large Barnes and Noble stores still open and they seem to be quite busy. While in most other cities those social destinations have perished and have been taken away from people, NYC still has them. Bookstores are some of the best places for day game that our children will probably not get the opportunity we enjoy.

3. Less Attitude

You would expect New Yorkers to have a huge attitude problem and go overboard on the douche scale, since they live in one of the biggest and greatest city in the world, considered by many to be the center of the (civilized) world. However, I find both the people and the general vibe in bars, restaurants, and clubs to be far more pleasant than, for instance, in San Francisco. Perhaps it’s the infamous wanna-be effect that SF suffers from. New Yorkers don’t have anything to prove; hence less attitude.

Loading...

4. Better & Hotter Women

It doesn’t take long after you come to New York to realize that you are surrounded by a large number of some of the most beautiful women in the world. It seems like Manhattan attracts the best looking women of every kind and race. While they might not be as sweet as their Colombian, Brazilian or Polish peers, the women in Manhattan seem to be friendlier, happier and less hostile to men. This is in large part due to a more favorable ratio of men to women, at least in Manhattan. It's hard to be a bitch if there are ten girls standing behind you who are as hot or hotter than you are. You will also have a hard time finding fat women here (except for tourists from other states).

For example, standing by the entrance to the Time Warner Center during the busier hours, you will see one hot woman after another walking in and out. Admittedly, I didn't have too many interactions with women during my recent visit but my general impression is that there are plenty of professional, accomplished women who are also not masculinized and are very much interested in meeting guys and dating. Unlike in San Francisco, they don't separate themselves from the world with sunglasses and headphones and they seem to be far less glued to the cellphones than the Bay Area female crowd. I am well aware of all the rough, ghetto girls who bless Brooklyn, Jersey and surrounding areas with their presence. However, Manhattan, in large due to the far higher cost of living, keeps that element away.

5. Clean & Safe

Manhattan seems to be surprisingly clean and safe. Given the population and the amount of traffic, the job that the city does these days maintaining its appearance is nothing short of impressive. Women seem to be far more comfortable walking alone at nght, and they don't have the same fear in their eyes that you would see in other big cities. There seems to be very little space left for petty criminals and gangbangers in an area where you won't find a one-bedroom to rent for under $3,500.00.

If you haven't been to New York recently, I highly recommend to visit – even if just for a weekend – to ingest some real city energy during the day and at night, and see some of the most beautiful women you might have ever seen.

Why There Is No Escaping The Biological Clock

May 20, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

We've written extensively here in the manosphere about the falsehood that is the "have it all" meme and the very real limitations women face that seem so often willfully obscured by feminists. The biological clock is arguably the most prominent of those limitations. The restriction it places on female fertility combined with the general desire that the vast majority of women have to become mothers at some point in their lives makes for a powerful force.

Halle Berry's recent pregnancy has generated a lot of discussion both in the manosphere and out. Some have gone as far as to mark it a crucial step forward for the "have it all" crowd, a sign that career women will soon be able to delay childbirth indefinitely without penalty. Halle Berry, they say, will become a model for women who wish to prolong their ride on the career track or the "Sex and the City" casual dating carousel for as long as possible.

These fears are exaggerated, and I will explain why.

1. Halle Berry's pregnancy was, in all likelihood, extremely expensive.

IVF is pricy, even after over three decades of time for the medical community to perfect it. In the USA, costs for a single cycle of IVF can top $13,000. When you consider the fact that most couples undergoing IVF will require multiple cycles, you can start to see how astronomical these costs can get. The average woman simply will not be able to afford to follow in Halle Berry's footsteps.

A pregnancy like Berry's was likely made even more expensive by the following realities:

> What are my odds of getting pregnant at 46 naturally?
> Not good, said Klein. "Natural pregnancies—when a woman is trying to get pregnant with her own egg—do occur in women in their mid 40s, but it would be nearly miraculous," he said. Even in women using the assistance of IVF (in vitro fertilization), there has never been a clearly documented case of a baby being born from an IVF pregnancy in a woman older than age 45 using her own eggs.
> Klein estimated that the chance of having a baby at age 46 without intervention is probably about 0.01 percent or less.

In short, there is about a 99% chance that Halle Berry not only had to undergo multiple treatments for IVF, but then also had to pay for donor eggs. The acquisition and maintenance of said eggs is not cheap, and certainly far out of reach for the ordinary woman.

2. Subsidization for these high costs is limited, and will probably remain so.

Israel is one of the only nations on Earth that makes IVF somewhat affordable for the non-celebrity woman. In the USA, most states do not mandate health insurance coverage for IVF and those that do often attach significant limitations to the assistance (e.g., covering just a fraction of the cost and restricting the number of cycles and embryos involved).

These realities have kept IVF pricy even in nations with a much more liberal attitude to government subsidization of healthcare than the USA.

Political realities make further subsidization a very uncertain proposition. Western nations are aging, and with that reality comes an abundance of medical issues. When placed next to heart disease, cancer, and diabetes, infertility stands out as an issue considered by most to be less than essential to the continuance of life, a more casual lifestyle problem of sorts. Though fertility issues can result in some emotional distress, they don't carry the same danger or urgency posed by the likes of breast cancer, alzheimers, and many other ailments. This distinction has played a large role in keeping fertility treatments from getting the amount of government subsidization that other medical concerns receive, and I suspect it will continue to do so in the future.

Loading…

This distinction is further enhanced by the perception many have of IVF users as women who "frittered away" their best years and now seek to have the taxpayer cover the cost of their indecisiveness and poor judgment. Though not all users of fertility treatment fit this bill (many have genuine fertility problems), the fact that many do will keep taxpayers and politicians wary of subsidization.

People are not interested in paying for consequences of somebody else's "Sex and the City" fantasy carousel ride. Male opposition to this is obvious, but female opposition is likely to be strong as well. Keep in mind that those likely to be the most vocal about fertility treatment subsidization and most likely to take advantage of it are the same women served most directly by modern feminism: highly educated, affluent, and (usually) white women. Women who do not fit into some or any of these categories have plenty of reason to be suspicious of any plan seeking to use their tax money to subsidize those who do.

Combine these political realities with the high costs associated with the coverage of fertility treatment and the economic concerns facing the advanced Western nations most likely to consider providing it and you have a rather bleak picture of the future for fertility subsidization.

3. IVF is not foolproof.

IVF is challenging process without large guarantees of success, and those guarantees decline rapidly with age:

> Because of the emotional, physical, and financial toll exacted by IVF, it is preferable that a couple undertake the process with the mindset that they will be in it for more than one attempt. If a couple can only afford one treatment cycle, IVF may not be the right course of action.
> Recall that on average, with conventional IVF, there is only about one chance in three that it will result in a live birth, and there is a tremendous letdown if it fails. It is thus unreasonable to undergo IVF with the attitude that “if it doesn’t work the first time, we’re giving up.” In vitro fertilization is a gamble even in the best of circumstances.
> Statistically speaking, a woman under 40 years of age, using her own eggs, having selected a good IVF program is likely to have a better than 70% chance of having a baby within three completed attempts – provided that she has adequate ovarian reserve, (the ability to producing several follicles/eggs in response to gonadotropin stimulation), has a fertile male partner (or sperm donor sperm) with access to motile sperm, and has a normal and receptive uterus capable of > developing an “adequate” uterine lining. Women of 39-43 years of age who meet the same criteria, will likely have about half that chance (35%- 40%).

As mentioned earlier, multiple cycles are to be expected for IVF treatment. That means that even in nations where IVF costs are lower than they are in the USA ($3000-4000 in some parts of Northwestern Europe), a couple could still expect to fork out more than $10,000 for a pregnancy after three or more cycles of treatment. That is more than even many solid upper-middle class couples can reliably fork out.

These realities only get more dire with age. For a 35-year-old woman, three cycles could provide a 70% chance of a baby. Just four years later, those chances are cut in half. A woman at Halle Berry’s age almost certainly has to give up on the idea of using her own eggs and, by extension, having her own biological child.

Halle Berry’s pregnancy is not a sign of a future godsend for the carousel riders and wannabe Carrie Bradshaws among us. Such a godsend does not exist and probably never will. Berry is merely another in a line of expensive exceptions to the rule. Any woman looking to her experience as a reason to hold fertility treatments up as an insurance policy for her carousel ride will have to contend with exorbitant costs, relatively low success rates, and still limited time. Those who dislike these realities will not be able to count on change.

Real Men Make Sandwiches

May 20, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

All real men should have the ability to cook, and cook well. The ability to make a mean grilled cheese sandwich and survive off frozen pizza's and mac n' cheese is a trait that men need to abandon upon graduation of college (or age 22 if you skip college). Yes, when you are relaxing at your house during the week, or even need a quick meal, they are acceptable. Having the ability to cook real food however, goes a lot further in life than most young men can imagine.

Young Women Can't Cook

I mentioned this first because this is a troubling trend I have noticed in women age 26 and under as of late. It is also noteworthy because accepting this fact early on will help you to understand why you as a man need to know how to cook. Young women just simply can't cook to save their life. It's actually quite appalling that my mother's generation were great cooks, and my grandmothers generation had excelled to the point where I was convinced that my grandmother used witchcraft to concoct such amazing meals. And then you have women in my generation who can barely boil water without burning down the kitchen.

The building up of the "American princess" is what I blame this problem on. As the expectation was that men would buy dinner, they simply never learned how to cook because after all they could go on seven different dates their entire life and never cook dinner themselves.

It’ll Get You Laid

Cooking a decent meal for a woman is an easy way to get laid. Especially if you keep her around for conversations while she can watch you cook. Trust me this is probably one of the most under-rated alpha traits known to men. Often times there is confusion between buying a woman a meal and cooking one. Buying her dinner puts her on a pedestal. Cooking her a meal puts you in the category of being a capable individual. Add in the fact that by cooking you’re offering a trait 90% of other men don’t have, or don’t display goes a long way in terms of how a woman will view you. Most importantly, you get her to within mere feet of your bedroom.

Physique

Knowing how to cook properly greatly assists with your ability to have a great physique. Fitness is the combination of diet and exercise in it's simplest form. If you don't feed your body right you won't get the proper results. There are pre-cooked alternatives out there such as Nutrisystem, however the cost is over double what I spend on groceries myself for the month. If you can cook well you'll build muscle a lot easier.

Wallet

Directly relating into the above, knowing how to cook will simply save you money. I eat steak dinners 2-3 times a week. At an average restaurant I'd be paying $20+ for an 80z steak meal. Cooking at home brings my average cost to $7 or less. Cooking for yourself will save you money, boatloads of it. This in turn means more “play” money, whether it be going out of on weekends, or taking extra vacations.

Being able to cook an amazing meal is rewarding on all levels. Like mentioned before, it can get you laid, and it can also help you with your fitness gains. Being able to cook a great meal as a man however, will also help your confidence. There will, at some point in your life, be a moment where cooking will play a pivotal role for a situation to assert your dominance as a man. And when that time comes you’ll be able to grab the bull by the horns and Superman whip it against a wall. And immediately after that moment happens, you’ll be glad you learned to cook. And you’ll be proud to say you’re a man who cooks well.

3 More Game Innovations You've Never Heard About

May 21, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

I know you've been busy wasting your time on whatever it is you like to waste time on, but now it's time to focus on the really important stuff in life, like getting more women! Yeah! Because that will solve all of your problems. So here are some ways to stay ahead of the competition.

1. Jogging Game

Any runners in the house? As tipped off by one of the RVF's daygame experts, Giovanny:

> I've opened girls while jogging around tracks, jogging in the street, and most effectively…while running or hiking on popular trails and pathways. *The type of trails and "walks" that are talked about in running magazines and listed in touristy travel guides. Many of them are in state, county, and national parks. These trails and other popular high traffic areas attract a lot of tourists. Jog in these high traffic areas if you want a lot of targets!
> Think jogging at Venice Beach or Miami Beach. Or Ipanema. Or Central Park. Or The Magnificent Mile.
> I once met a Canadian tourist while jogging along The Embarcadero in SF. She was taking pictures, I stopped and asked were she was from. The next day I took her for a ride on my brothers harley davidson. Bang.
> I used to live near a popular high school in a swanky neighborhood. The school track was open to the public. Many people would go there to jog, run, use the pull up bars/dip bars/parallel bars/rings, or play soccer or football on the astro turf > field. There was a bit of a pick up culture to that track. I met a russian milf (got #, date, no bang)

> There was a running club there. The girls were amazing! Seriously, like two 9′s, four 8′s, and three 7′s in that running club. Running clubs are no joke talent wise!
> I have even opened girls who were running on the treadmill at the gym. But, never successfully.
> I think looking sharp is the biggest thing. You want a jogging outfit that "pops". Ideally, it would show off your body and also be stylish. That's the first thing that catches their eye. Then you have to come strong with your opener.
> Edit: Jog at University track!

But won't a man look too sweaty and disheveled to spit game while jogging?

> When you are running and your heart is pumping. You often have adrenaline pumping through your body, sometimes you get a "runners high". Your mind is clear and you feel charged and energized.
> This is a good time to talk to chicks. You can sometimes spit your strongest game in this state.

There you have it. If you're a runner, you have no excuses now!

2. Hospital Game

Now, technically, hospitals are necessary social institutions which takes care of the sick and injured. But who is to say can't we use such a venerable institution for "other" purposes? RVF regular Lothario educates us:

> Venue / University hospital: lets just say for example Jackson Memorial hospital @ Univ of Miami, Vanderbilt Univ hospital in Nashville, Georgetown Univ hospital in DC
> The bigger the hospital the better but any medium sized hospital will do, Univ hospitals have more targets because of the affiliated paramedical fields like pharmacy, nursing etc
> Why ? Target rich…. more women work at hospitals compared to men (Certified Fact)… for example there are…….
> Nurses, Nursing students, Physical Therapists, Radiology technicians, Medical Assistants, Residents, Interns, Med Students, Nurse Practitioners, Dietitians, Psychologists, Pharmacy students (Phramacy School deserves a special mention) and Students/Interns doing clinicals in medical related fields specifically at teaching hospitals.
> Timing: Best time to go is around Lunch time, Hang out/eat lunch at the main > cafeteria , also try benches/picnic tables in out door areas, Girls eating food/reading book .

> Angles to Play: for those of you who know something about Medicine, fabricating any story should not be difficult depending upon the girl, For other playas …. come up with some thing like….
> 1. You are VP of sales for a Software company negotiating a deal on a Medical Billing software with the hospital….. and just getting lunch and have to meet some one later……..
> 2. You were visiting your Aunt who is getting chemotherapy etc…..
> 3. You work for a recruitment Company and visiting the Nursing College/ Pharmacy School's placement office if some one is looking for a Job in a particular area such as CVC etc is looking for a pharmacist in that area/new medical office complex needs Certified Nursing assistants etc…..
> 4. I personally like this one "Working for a medical device Company and just moved here from Miami working out a deal with the hospital"
> Chit chat /Banter whoever comes in the Target Zone, tell them you are new to the area and would like to make some new friends etc Get the numbers and set up drink dates for later in the evening….. You all know how to do the rest……..
> Some of these girls are horny as hell and they never get approached and because of the Abundance Theory are DTF, There are more women then men in the hospitals, These girls like to see you in the Provider role, so make sure you DHV the hell out of them
> Dress: Going suited will help , trust me on this one……. Thanks to G, Girls sometimes stop/stare on days I am suited….
> or get a pair of Scrubs and make an excuse you were in the Operating Room volunteering etc……
> Volunteering: If any one can spare time in summer , A lot of girls aspiring to go to med school, nursing school , pharmacy school volunteer during summer vacation to enhance their resumes.
> Contact the volunteer dept at the hospital, even if you can volunteer for 2 hrs/week you will develop a lot more credible story and will also get to spit game on fellow volunteers……..
> Starbucks: Do not forget ur latte at the hospital Starbucks/Coffee shop, you will always find targets there……..
> GiftShop: Looking for flowers for ur Grandma……
> Hospital Game can basically be an off shoot of Day Game and can provide playas with a fresh and target rich venue when you are running out of places to spit game……..Something to do, Give it a try and let me know how it goes……

You'll have to forgive the text-speak. Lothario probably wrote that down on his cell while inside of a hospital. However, the ideas are sound. After all, who would expect that the well-dressed man inside of the hospital is actually there because he needs some new poonani?

3. Tarot Card Game

We all know that the more irrational something is, the more women love it. That's why tarot cards can be a worthy investment for the guy who loves to create a strong connection based on absolutely nothing. Hey, no one can help it that women are stupid. But we sure can take advantage! RVF poster Kwisatz elaborates:

> I read an article in a psychology forum about the different thought processes that men and women generally go through. One contributor briefly touched on women's propensity for "Magical Thinking", http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Magical_thinking. Another contributor cited the almost exclusively women's realm of Tarot Reading as a prime example of Magical Thinking.
> I like to challenge myself with new and interesting ways to enthrall women so after an evening of scouring the internet I added a few decks of Tarot Cards to my Amazon Wish list. Less than a week later, a woman bought me a deck.
> I can safely say this:
> 1) I am a complete fraud with Tarot!
> 2) 100 % of Spirit Mediums, Tarot Readers, and their associated disciplines are frauds as well!
> 3) I haven't had this much fun at someone else's expense in quite a while!
> I read two articles that taught me everything I know about how to be a Tarot Reader. Its all Game and Set-Ups. In less than 5 minutes I have had every woman I have done this to convinced that I am supernatural and know things about them that demonstrate my ability to "really see inside a person", that's a direct quote.
> Doug Bolden at http://www.wyrmis.com/journal/2009/11/19…-tips.html wrote the following:
> "Some quick tips to improve a cold-reading session with tarot, tea-leaves, etc
> Cold-reading, as the term is applied to various forms of fortune-telling, is just making stuff up. Sure, there is a knack and whatnot to it; but at its core, it is when someone sits down with the fortune-teller, and combinations of science and luck come together and the client walks away feeling a little dazed despite it being one big puppet show. They, by which I mean the types who make money off of this thing, all swear that you save cold-reading until those rare days you feel off, but it might be better to say that you rely on cold-reading except those few days you feel on.

There is a science to it, a practical con-man's game of slicing bits of information out of conversation and then combining them with a thick pasting of inductions and guesses; but that is not what this entry is about. That takes natural talent and trained skill. This is about the sort of things that just about anyone can do. Here are my quick and easy tips to improve your cold-reading session, if you choose to have one (and yes, these come from actual fortune-telling types that I used to talk to and study from back in the day).

First, split your marks from your hard-makes.

Some people only touch stuff like fortune-telling because they utterly disbelieve it and they want to prove it false. They can be confrontational, and will often mention "I don't like this crap" early on. Skim them out of the process. Ham it up for them, play it to the gills, and then laugh at yourself. If you do it right, they get show. If you do it wrong, they feel justified. Either way, they feel happy, and that's your job (assuming you are making money off of this). Those who want to believe, the easy-marks, they treat tarot-readings like a psychotherapy session. They are practically needing to spill their guts to someone, and why not $15 for a tarot-reader rather than $200 for a head-shrinker? They will also divulge too much information, which in the end, helps you to make them happy. At worst, though, they get a chance to be heard. Customer satisfaction.

Second, ritual ritual ritual ritual ritual. Ritual.

I don't care what, but you had best have a ritual. Take it slow, and steady. Knock on the table before picking up the cards. Only use your left hand. Something. Do not go into verbal discussions of the ritual, just make it known. It should take you ten or fifteen minutes minimum to do a good session. More time for them to talk, more time for them to be impressed, and more time for the hard-makes to expose themselves.

Third, mix clutter with a concentrated point.

Scatter random bits around the room, and then focus the attention on the relatively uncluttered table (which, by the way, has clutter on the edges). Make them feel like they are finding order in the midst of chaos.

Fourth, make them touch it.

If it's a tea cup, they drink from it. If it's a tarot deck, they cut it. They pull cards from it. They shuffle it. Whatever. Just make sure they think their vibe juice is all over the thing.

Fifth, skip rote but make it sound like you didn't.

You want to screw up a card reading? Try and remember what a Five of Wands means when it follows a Tower card. Skip it. The customer might know about the cards, and be willing to argue with you, but unless you are willing to point out your Little Book of Tarot they prefer to have symbols and images on the cards themselves pointed out. What does a Five of Wands mean according to said Little Book? Who cares? That means nothing next to pointing out the haystack in the background as a symbol of needing to start saving. The best thing about this whole thing? You need nothing but the cards or leaves themselves. Someone thrusts their palm into your hands, and you can blather on about the life line and such, but you want to especially notice the little knicks on the line, and the strange tapering.

Sure, 90% of palms have that tapering, but how many palms have they seen. Make. It. Up. And make it a little micro-epic. They are there because they want to matter. They paid you money for it. Say they matter because the cards never lie and there's a haystack and that means they matter, and when you say it, make it sound like that the haystack is especially for them, while also a symbol everyone knows, as decreed by the cards. Which brings me to…

Finally, short declarative zen-master sentences.

Say something declaratively, but back off the definite unless the definite is somehow so precise as to be almost nonsensical. Do not say "Your recent girl troubles", say "Underlying issues with personal relationships, not all of which you are aware of…". Do not ask "Have you recently met someone?" (they always do this in the movies, alas) but instead say "The new person whose name you are not sure of…" Maybe bust out a "Keep an eye out for red flowers on a sunny day, a body of water nearby but of unsure size, and her name is Lisa" every once in a while. They'll spend the next year remembering that line.

If you do it right, they will spend the next decade remembering that line.

Remember kids, have fun at parties, and never try any of these on the strange girls in black shirts sitting in the corner. Not unless you want to waste an afternoon.

Si Vales, Valeo"

The second article was about "The Forer effect, also called the Barnum Effect after P. T. Barnum's observation that "we've got something for everyone." http://en.wikipedia.org/wiki/Forer_effect

Excerpt:

"You have a great need for other people to like and admire you. You have a tendency to be critical of yourself. You have a great deal of unused capacity which you have not turned to your advantage. While you have some personality weaknesses, you are generally able to compensate for them. Your sexual adjustment has presented problems for you. Disciplined and self-controlled outside, you tend to be worrisome and insecure inside. At times you have serious doubts as to whether you have made the right decision or done the right thing. You prefer a certain amount of change and variety and become dissatisfied when hemmed in by restrictions and limitations. You pride yourself as an independent thinker and do not accept others' statements without satisfactory proof. You > have found it unwise to be too frank in revealing yourself to others. At times you are extroverted, affable, sociable, while at other times you are introverted, wary, reserved. Some of your aspirations tend to be pretty unrealistic. Security is one of your major goals in life."

> I used those two articles to form what I said for the first few times I used my Tarot. After that I realized I could say anything that came to mind and they'd eagerly swallow it down as gospel. I usually throw in a few gems about their "needing a change", "looking for something more powerful than themselves", and/or needing to "explore things once held as taboo". Those there I remember, I generally make up whatever is necessary for the woman in question to hear at the time to have her do what I want to later.

While everything said above is pretty damn clever, I cannot see myself carrying around a deck of tarot cards, nor do I think the average guy will either. However, if I, or you, happen to see some tarot cards in her room, now we have the knowledge to lay it on thick and heavy.

Why Do You Care About The News?

May 21, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I recently encountered a paper by Swiss entrepreneur Rolf Dobelli that advocates for completely cutting the consumption of news out of our lives.

> "Out of the approximately 10,000 news stories you have read in the last 12 months, name one that –because you consumed it – allowed you to make a better decision about a serious matter affecting your life, your career, your business – compared to what you would have known if you hadn't swallowed that morsel of news."

The author lists 15 compelling reasons to excise news from your informational diet. Among these are:

It alters your brain

Similar to the way porn rewires our brains to crave constant sexual novelty, news rewires our brains to crave constant informational novelty. I never felt the need for a Twitter account until a couple years ago. A few months ago I started checking it more often. Now I find myself checking it several times a day, almost compulsively when I'm idle for a few moments. This is not healthy. Our brains acclimate to increasingly unnatural levels of stimulation and then demand them when they are absent.

It inhibits thinking and prevents understanding

Becoming accustomed to the 30-second soundbyte prevents us from exercising the deeper analytical capabilities of our minds. Though most people fancy themselves expert multitaskers, true introspection on an idea necessitates concentration that a constant stream of news renders impossible. Some studies even suggest that consuming news makes us worse decision-makers.

It is manipulative

The media is used to planting ideas, often furthering the aims of equalism, feminism, and political correctness. Politicians and corporations alike use media campaigns to manipulate a public who considers it completely normal to spend several hours a day consuming news on their computers and televisions. The lack of context clues makes it difficult for the average person to detect whether a story has a particular bias.

Loading…

I suggest you read the full article, which is available here.

News is a vicarious time waster similar to sports. Nothing you see on popular news is going to help you get healthy, make money, or get girls. Even if you find the occasional useful tip on science or nutrition, you would have discovered it much earlier with more targeted independent research. The New York Times may begin singing the praises of intermittent fasting on a paleo diet in 10 years or so, but I'll have a decade's head start based on reading books, consulting with experts, and careful self-experimentation.

News, of course, isn't the only culprit in our ever-growing hunger for useless information. Some people are addicted to texting friends on their smartphones, reloading their Facebook pages, or checking for bikini shots on Instagram. These are all time-wasting activities, but occasionally they give us some insight about how to live or some superficial interaction with others. News fills your mind with wasteful thoughts without adding anything that will make you a more well-rounded, knowledgeable, or successful person.

The solution? Stop consuming the news. Cull your Google reader, switch your homepage from NYtimes.com, and bring a book to the doctor's office. You may just find yourself happier, sharper, and better equipped to dominate.

Meeting Melissa

1993: On the way to pick up your little brother from his “whack” basketball practice, you spot a girl at a local bus stop who goes to your high school. You recognize her as Melissa, one of the dancing “song girls” for the varsity football team. Like you, she’s a sophomore. She’s thin–even skinny–but with a nice girly figure. Her hair is teased up to the sky, her nails are painted, and her eye makeup is on perfect. She must have taken an hour to get ready in the morning. She’s carrying a three-ring binder and a textbook covered in a re-purposed brown-paper bag, which she’s hugging tightly against her chest. You play dumb, like you only kind-of recognize her, but you know her (and her looks) well.

2013: On the way home from school, you pass the Starbucks–like you always do–when you see a cute girl from your school coming out of there with one her friends. They’re both wearing loose sweatpants, with your high school’s name emblazoned on the side, and tucked into one of those pairs of Ugg Boots all the girls are wearing these days. You immediately recognize her as Melissa, since she’s one of the girls you’ve been eyeing from a distance since middle school, and is one of the most popular girls in the tenth grade. Not only that, she’s co-president of your school’s “Young Activist Task Force,” which made waves in the school paper last year for their stunts at their annual “body-image workshop.” She and her fat friend are both carrying Starbucks milkshakes in one hand and looking down at their iPhones in their other hand.

1993: You crush down your nearly paralyzing nervousness to talk to her. “Hey, I recognize you. You go to Grant High School, right?” Your voice cracks a little, but you plug along.

2013: Unsure about how to get your girl’s attention–and not wanting to interrupt whatever important thing she’s doing on her phone–you let the two girls walk ahead before dipping into a side street a block later.

1993: Melissa’s icy at first, responding to your question with the most tepid of yeses. But, with her bus nowhere in sight, and nothing to hide behind, she’s forced to field your weak game. You can see the anticipatory boredom in her face.

2013: You rush home, drop your bag without opening it, and boot up your computer. You load up Facebook, pull up Melissa’s page, and send her a friend request. You’ve been waiting for an excuse to add her, and this is perfect. You follow it up with a message that says, “Hope you enjoyed that frap today. ;)”

1993: You’ve picked up speed. After some stumbling in the beginning, you gained traction by bringing up music and dancing–which you pretended to not know she was into. Now you’ve realized that you have the same teacher for one class, at different times of the day. She’s laughing hysterically at your spot-on impersonation of Mr. Peterson and his infamous facial tick.

2013: You check your page three times that night, but no response. She’s probably busy.

Or she set her phone down for a while.

1993: Melissa points out her approaching bus in the distance. Realizing that you're running out of time, your voice trembles again as you say, "we should hang out some time." When she smiles and gives you a sincere-sounding "yeah" in response, you ask for her phone number. She writes it down in big, girly bubble-writing on a piece of notebook paper, tears it off, and hands it to you. As she gets on the bus, you gingerly put the golden ticket in your wallet, having tried to memorize the number in case you smudge the magenta-colored ink with your body heat, drop your wallet, or get robbed on the way home. You're so charged up, you actually run to your destination.

2013: Three days later, Melissa accepts your Facebook friend request. You're relieved, but wonder why she didn't respond to your message. You scroll through all 353 of the pictures in her profile and save your favorites in a folder on your hard drive. You masturbate to the ones from her recent beach trip.

1993: You're scared shitless because it's been a couple of days and you still haven't called. You finally decide to bite the bullet that night. You tell your mom and dad that you're going to make a call and ask them not to pick up the phone for the next few minutes, which prompts some annoying cutesy noises from your mom and an Arsenio-Hall fist pump from your dad. You then cover your bases by threatening your little brother with violence if he should so much as look at you while you're on your call. You opt for the kitchen phone, since there's more privacy there than in the living room. You dial the seven digits.

2013: Since your first angle didn't work, you decide to try the side-door approach. You reason that commenting on one of her pictures or status updates should prompt the desired effect. But, no sooner had you started to look for the right place for your comment than you started to notice that all of her pictures have a long trail of comments from "random" dudes–most of them annoying compliments. You click through to their pages and see that she's in a some of their pictures—at parties, out-and-about, or at school events. Is she "with" one of these guys? Who are they? What the fuck? You're at a loss.

1993: A man's voice picks up the phone. You immediately switch into adult phone-manner, which you were taught by your parents. "Good evening sir, is Melissa home?" You expected that to work, but he tells you Melissa is about to eat dinner and needs to finish her homework. You're about to give up, but decide to double down, "Oh, I understand. I'm just calling about some school things. We'll only be five minutes, I promise." At your respectful tone, the old man softens up, despite his suspicions of your ulterior motive. He asks for your name and calls out,"Melissa, phone!"

2013: After having all but given up on Facebook, you strike gold a few days later. You get an invitation from her to one of her club's activist events. You decide to go.

1993: You and Melissa have a surprisingly comfortable phone conversation. Gone is the iciness from the bus stop. You talk for about 20 minutes before before you start hearing her dad's voice in the background. Before she gets off the phone, you roll the dice again and suggest you should hang out after school later in the week. She agrees.

2013: You get to the event late, but just in time to hear Melissa shouting a speech about "gender norms" and "female sexuality" and "rape culture" to her club, which is composed of fat girls, nerdy-looking hipsters, and a smattering of odd-balls. There are novelty cupcakes and other refreshments in the back. You figure you'll get your chance to move in during the social part of the event.

1993: Your date with Melissa goes perfectly. You meet by the main gate after school and decide to go to a cool ice-cream place a few blocks away. After that, you go on a long walk along some of the quiet side-streets in the neighborhood, talking and laughing the whole way. At a certain point, with your fear completely evaporated, you decide to kiss her. As you move in, you can see she's now the nervous one. It's a magical moment you'll never forget. You sleep like a baby that night, knowing you have her.

2013: After the rally, you make a beeline to the refreshments table, figuring everyone will funnel into that area. You plan on loitering there till Melissa swings through and then chatting her up. When she finally does show up, she's surrounded by three of the hipster boys from the audience, boxing out any would-be interlopers like a presidential security detail. You recognize at least one of them from her Facebook wall. For the rest of the night, they never leave her side. You can't tell how well she knows them, but she seems to enjoy being the center of their attention. The rest of the fat girls in the room talk amongst themselves. A few try to talk to you, but you deflect them deftly. Eventually, you concede defeat for the night and talk to a couple of them near the empty cupcake boxes. "How do you know Melissa?," one of them asks. "Oh, we're friends."

Welcome To Los Angeles

Ryan's good friend Jim is moving to Los Angeles tomorrow. Having lived here already for the past ten years, Ryan thought it would be a good idea to show Jim around. Ryan picks Jim up from LAX at 9pm and knowing that Jim will be hungry, Ryan pulled some strings and got them a reservation and one of LA's hottest new restaurants, Access.

Jim arrives and gets in Ryan's car and immediately begins detailing his excitement to finally be in Los Angeles, ready to lay out in the famous beaches, walk along palm-tree ridden streets and of course go visit Access. Ryan, a long-time resident, remains silent for now. Jim tells Ryan about his flight and starts asking questions about LA, interrupted occasionally by Ryan's car hitting potholes on the drive. Jim is surprised how clear a night it is, because he swore he saw some cloud cover on the descent into LAX. Ryan explains that was actually smog, not clouds. "Oh," Jim retorts.

After a 45 minute drive to go 6 miles, which Jim now learns is typical even though it was 9pm on a Wednesday night, they get to Access and valet their car for $8. Once inside they are shown their table. The restaurant has a nice decor, set to the perfect temperature. Jim is very excited as he's heard about Access from friends, the news and even some TV shows. In fact, Access is always portrayed in the media for having Boxgap Steak, a rather scarce but overly desired steak not only in California, but the world. This steak is special. It is generally very lean, but has some fat in all the right places. It is tender, very moist and of course tastes like only something one can dream of. It's sourced from young cows between the ages of 18-24 months, as the 18 month mark is when California legally allows their slaughter. After 24 months, the steak starts to spoil and isn't as good as it used to be. Although Boxgap Steak comes from cows that are raised all over the US and sometimes even internationally, it somehow always finds its way to LA soon enough.

The waiter comes by and before even asking for their food order, Jim blurts out that he can't wait to try the Boxgap Steak. The waiter makes a confused face and asks Jim if this is his first time here. Ryan asks the waiter for a minute and turns to Jim and lets him know that unfortunately, he can't have the Boxgap Steak.

> Jim: Why?
> Ryan: Well, even though Access is famous for the Boxgap Steak, not everyone can have it. Only certain people can have it.
> Jim: What are you talking about? Look at that table by the kitchen – every person there has a Boxgap Steak! How's that possible?

That of course was the prime table at Access, the one by the kitchen where everyone gets Boxgap Steak. In fact, what Ryan and most LA residents know is that it is quite an illusion that anyone can come to LA and be eating Boxgap Steak right away. Ryan told Jim to look around, nobody has the Boxgap Steak absent that one table. So Jim asks why that table. Ryan explains:

> Well, you see that older guy? That's Don, he owns Access so of course he gets to have it.
> That guy next to him is the promoter for Access, Dylan. He goes out and finds people to come to the restaurant, promising them the opportunity for Boxgap Steak. He also is the one that sources the Boxgap Steak from the farms, so he gets to have it too.
> Next to him is some actor on TV. He's famous so he gets to have Boxgap Steak too.

Jim sees the man next to the actor, some ugly Persian guy with gold chains on and who is quite loud and obnoxious. Jim wondered why he got to have some.

> I see you looking at the Persian guy. He is insanely rich and pays $1,000 to have a seat at that table, so he can eat Boxgap Steak. Dylan found him. Ridiculous, I know, but to him money means nothing and that type of wealth gets you that type of steak.
> Then there's the chef Alan, he takes bits from the Boxgap Steak here and there when available.
> Billy is next to him, he works in the restaurant business. Because he's in the industry, he gets to have some Boxgap Steak too.
> Then there's Sergio. He's 6'5, 220lbs and ripped to shreds, and looks like a male model. He doesn't know himself how he got to sit at that table—he was just invited.
> And the last seat is Calvin, he has the best kosher salt in all of LA. He often hosts parties in his house in the Hollywood Hills, where he has an array of spices for the Boxgap Steaks. You should see how fast those steaks absorp the kosher salt, it's amazing. So because of his varied spices, and especially the kosher salt, he gets to have it too.
> Loading...

This was getting to be too much for Jim. He had grown up reading about and seeing all these stories about Boxgap Steaks and now he was finding out he couldn't have it? The waiter brought over the steaks to that table one by one, and Jim just stared luringly. The steaks were perfect. They glowed with a light only found on meat aged as indicated above. They smelled amazing, their aromas hitting Jim's olfactory senses as they were carried past him. They were very juicy and tender, glistening with what was likely some delicious butter. It was quite honestly one of the best looking and well put together steaks Jim has seen — certainly he never saw this type of steak where he's from.

Of course those sitting at the table by the kitchen didn't seem to value the Boxgap Steak as much as Jim did. They were laughing, eating their steaks callously, and he even saw the Persian guy fingering his steak. The gall on that man, Jim thought, fingering that Boxgap Steak in public. As Ryan explained however, they are used to the Boxgap Steaks. They can have them on whim, and some of them don't even pay for it. It's just because of who they are, who they know or what they can provide that they get it.

The waiter comes back and Ryan orders ground chuck hamburgers for both of them. "So that's what we get? Ground Chuck?" Jim exclaimed. Jim's anger was seeping out. Both him and Ryan were bright guys, spoke several languages, had good careers and were good-looking. He should not be limited to ground chuck. Ryan responded that while it is no Boxgap Steak, it's decent and gets the job done.

After eating, Jim stated that it was maybe a 6.5/10. Ryan agreed, and let Jim know it hovers in the 6-7 range, with maybe once in a while the ground chuck hitting an 8. The bill came and Jim was again shocked. "It's that expensive for some ground chuck?!?" Ryan explained that because of the market in LA, where only a select few get the Boxgap Steak and everyone else is left to fight for the ground chuck, it artificially inflates the price. "Don't feel too bad though," said Ryan. "Look outside, see that guy eating out of the trash? If I didn't take care of myself and improve myself to where I'm at now, I wouldn't even get ground chuck. I'd be that guy."

On the drive home Jim asked Ryan if he's ever had Boxgap Steak. A few times, Ryan explained. "Here it's mostly luck." The first time was when he found a Boxgap Steak that had just arrived at the supermarket, before Access or the other restaurants found out about it and swooped it up. "Sometimes" Ryan explained, "if you find some Boxgap Steak right when it arrives in LA, you can get to it. After about 30 days though, like clockwork they are poached by the big restaurants here and you can't get to them anymore."

Ryan went on to explain that Boxgap Steak was much more regularly available outside LA, in places like New York and Miami. This jogged Jim's memory and he inquired of Ryan if what they say about the steaks in Europe is true. Since Ryan recently traveled to Europe, he confirmed Jim's suspicion. "Especially in Eastern Europe. There's a lot of Boxgap Steak there that is way more accessible." Ryan explained that it's not impossible to get Boxgap Steak here, but you just have to be in the right type of industry, have unparalleled wealth or fame, and so on. Jim was discouraged.

They arrived back at Ryan's home and Jim was not tired yet. He asked Ryan if he would like to go out and have a drink. Ryan has to break Jim's heart again, telling him that "Unfortunately, it's already 1:00 a.m. and the bars all close in 30 minutes, so there is nowhere to go." Jim then goes to bed, starting to wonder what Ryan already knows, that LA may not be as wonderful as it seemed.

Over the next few years, the real LA showed itself to Jim and started to wear on him. There is traffic all the time. Despite having great weather, Jim started to miss the seasons. The lack of mass transit made it difficult to have fun nights out, always requiring a designated driver or the risk of a DUI. He grew tired of the ground chuck, and always lacking the ability to have the Boxgap Steak despite seeing it on a daily basis and being tortured with its sight and smell. He paid high taxes, the state had many unnecessary laws and housing was overpriced.

Eventually, Jim broke and left LA for greener pastures, like many before him. On his way through security at LAX, another fellow named Chad walked past Jim to start his new life in LA, like many before him. Chad arrives and gets in his friend Alan's car and immediately begins detailing his excitement to finally be in Los Angeles, ready to lay out in the famous beaches, walk along palm-tree ridden streets and of course… visit Access.

5 More Commandments For Making A Club Your Poosy Paradise

May 22, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Surprisingly, I did not die of exhaustion or dehydration, so we now have the second installment of this article (click here to read the first). If you don't have the time, or you just hate my writing, here's a recap:

- Know Your Type (Pick out a club you actually WANT to hang out at)
- Dress Appropriate (No fuzzy hats, flashing belt buckles and consider suiting up)
- Get To Know The Doorman/List Girl (be friendly but not a kissass and establish raport)
- Tip Well (You don't have to break the bank but don't be cheap)
- Roll Solo (Some friends' aren't meant to wing you)

[image]

Gentleman, I present the Top 5 Commandments…

5. Build Your Reputation

This Commandment takes time to fulfill, but one stupid move and it can be destroyed in a moment. We all know that your reputation in business, with your friends, parents and society determines your success to a certain extent and also can close and open doors in all avenues of life. If you're a liar and you get the liar rep then don't be surprised when your options are limited in business, etc.

In your Pussy Paradise, your reputation is just as important in garnering you respect from the staff and club-goers and continuing to keep the Pussy-Funnel operating smoothly to its optimal affect, thus supplying you with an endless supply of hot tail.

Here's some examples of way to f*ck up your reputation. Heed closely.

-Getting obliterated drunk, which generally never ends well. If you tend to be an angry drunk then know your limit and where the line is of no return. If you're a hyper drunk this one is more tolerable but please for love of God do NOT be that guy jumping on tables and acting like he's never been out of the house. I've seen this many times and it's pitiful.

-Not tipping. Nuff said.

-Bringing ugly girls to the club. We could debate until eternity about bringing sand to the beach but it's a club FACT, that bringing wing-girls or having the social circle of pretty girls is worth more than getting a 'degree' in game. Hot girls beget hot girls in a club environment. Hot girls see you with hot girls consistently and they want to know 'why'. I've slept with girls based purely on that reputation. The flip-side is that more relationship type girls may require more gaming due to your playboy rep but this advice is more for one night stand game.

-Getting into fights. I've seen this absolutely wreck people socially. Now, if someone gets in your face then of all means be a man and stand your ground and if need be kick some ass, but do not being an INSTIGATOR of fights. Two reasons I see fights break out in a club:

1. Somebody bumped somebody walking by. Let me laugh my fucking ass for a moment because this one is just classic. Let's see: it's a club, people are drinking, it's crowded (if you're not getting bumped into the club probably sucks), and some dumbass flies off the handle because someone bumped him. Really?

2. A look or a grab on a girl. If you're in a club with your steady girl and a dude grabs her ass then you have every right to drag him by the throat into an alley and proceed to kick his ass. However, if you just started talking to a girl and another dude walks up and cuts in then proceed with the best Cock-Blocking Formula I've seen work in a club:

S.I.E.V. Smile, Inquire, Escalate, Vacate

[image]

Here's the breakdown:

Smile: nothing screams alpha male more, than a confident, engaging smile. A guy intimidated by another guy does what? He looks down and away, thus allowing the new male in the group to have dominance. Don't be a submissive bitch. Smile and look at him straight in the eye.

Inquire: Ask a question off the bat. Now he might cut in on you and your convo with the girls with a cheesy pick–up line and this one is always golden, because you can just look at the girls and start laughing automatically making him lower in the eyes of the girls. If he doesn't though, then right away after smiling, ask a question regarding who he is, where his friends are, etc. There's a lot of opportunities to elevate yourself to the girls based on his answers but not in a condescending way. Example:

Him: I'm a lawyer

You: Exciting. So you basically work 80 hours a week and are an alcoholic.

Him: Uh yea pretty much.

It's a subtle way of making him look like an overworked addict who doesn't love his work nor is it exciting. I'm not knocking on lawyers just an example. Most professions can be made to look useless and boring with the right wording.

Escalate: If you can tell this guy isn't going to be your new best friend and his game is weak, here's where you can exploit him or call his bluff. Make the suggestion for a round of shots on him. I've used this so many times it's hysterical. Example:

Him: blah blah blah (just talking about nothing in particular)

You: Cool. (Turning to the girls who will almost never say 'No') How about a round of shots on our new friend here? (This puts him in the friend zone and forces him to pay or bounce. If he leaves the group you can make a remark about him being creepy because girls love that one, or if he agrees…)

Him: Ok sure. What do you girls want?

You: (taking control, suggest a shot that EVERY girl likes, a Lemon-drop. It's vodka and lemonade flavored mixer with sugar around the rim of the shot glass)

Him: (orders the drinks)

This is when you can smile at the girls behind his back and wink at them as though you know their game in getting guys to buy them drinks and you're in on it, putting you a different level of most men. Bonnie and Clyde attitude. I can almost guarantee that this will work, which gets you more free drinks and gets this guy categorized in the vein of every other guy in the club. The girls will get wet knowing that you know how to 'hustle' another dude so smoothly.

[image]

Downey knows…

Vacate: This is all about timing. As soon as you get the shots, say this cheers mantra which is GOLDEN: "Here's to beautiful girls with dirty thoughts", smile, throw the shot back, don't make a face, put the shot glass down, thank him and then grab one of the girls' hand, doesn't matter which one, could be whoever is closest to you, and say any of the following:

-"Girls, let's have a smoke"

-"Girls, let's check out the VIP" (obviously ONLY if you have the club on lock)

-"I'm bored lets walk around" (whisper this into one of the girls' ears)

-"Girls, let's hit the bathrooms" (girls ALWAYS want an excuse to go primp in the bathroom)

The point is to bounce. If he trails behind you, which sometimes happens and is pretty damn funny, because they usually resemble a lost puppy, then just focus on the girls and give him minimal attention. Girls will usually take care of this for you and will tell him one of a hundred excuses girls are professionals at giving.

-Getting the Creeper Rep. This one can be easy to catch if you are running around the club hitting on every decent looking girl. Remember gents, this is about getting a Club on Lock. It takes time and statistically speaking you will start taking girls home even if it takes you a few visits depending on your game level. Just keep it chill, post up at the bar and start looking around. Girls who look your way continually, or smile are generally receptive to being opened. Proceed as usual.

Here's some examples of ways to build a good reputation. Heed closely.

-Always be under control when drinking. This is so effin important and is paramount to one of the commandments coming up. All the staff talks and if you have a good rep, word will get back to the owner. He's key. You're not here to get white-boy wasted; you're here to get a nice buzz, build a rep and take a girl home. Note taking the girl home isn't the most important. If you don't drink and are comfortable being in a club setting without drinking then you're good to go.

-IF you bring girls to the club and you will at some point as your club social circle grows, then bring hot girls. This will play into a key facet of the game and can even get you free bottle service. No, that's not a typo. There's an insider secret to getting a comped bottle, but more on that later, if I decide to reveal it.

[image]

-Be positive, upbeat, don't unload your problems on the bartenders, have a devil–may–care attitude, have fun and always be appreciative, thank the staff, and show RESPECT for the club. Ash your cigs into an ash tray, leave your drinks on the bar or table; NOT the floor, don't spit on the floor and use good common sense that you are a GUEST and practice the Golden Rule.

-Always have the female staff's back. This may seem like White-Knighting, but trust me it's not. If you see a patron acting stupid with her and no one is noticing, don't be afraid to let security know or if you're in the vicinity try to alleviate the situation. She'll appreciate it, will introduce her hot friends to you and will talk. Girls talk. A lot. As word gets back to the owner, or if he's in the club and notices that you have his staffs' back, he will warm up to you even quicker.

4. Keep Your Circle Small

[image]

I've seen this happen with guys who start to get a club on lock and it starts producing that steady supply of females and even I've slipped on occasion in the past and have had to tighten up my circle again. What I'm talking about is Protecting Your Asset.

You have put out considerable effort on this mission of making a particular nightclub your pussy paradise and then you decide to bring your buddy Joe Blow along one night, to show off how much you have a club on lock, drink for free, and have the bottle waitresses giving you hugs. Problem is, Joe Blow gets wasted, grabs a bottle waitress's ass, pisses on the floor in the bathroom, knocks over a bottle service table stumbling around, and eventually gets tossed out for fighting with security. Not cool. Will you be banned? Probably not, if you were clearly not a part of his stupid acts, BUT it reflects on your reputation HARD.

The best rule to have is this, if you know that your wingmen, best friend, cousin, whatever, has ever shown a penchant for trouble and has had multiple episodes at parties or any social gatherings, then DO NOT BRING HIM. Common sense.

I wouldn't even recommend bringing a buddy until you have been a repeat visitor and built a good reputation for 1.5-2 months. This will depend on the size of the club, your city, etc. This is about YOU; not your friends. You wouldn't loan money to a friend who has a gambling problem, so why loan him access to your pussy paradise if he can't handle a few drinks?

If you do have some cool cats who you're pals with, then slowly integrate them into your world. I have been doing this for years and have a large social circle, but I still only have 2-3 friends who will I bring around to different spots. I know they handle themselves well and I'm happy to let them enjoy the fruits of my labor.

3. Don't Sleep With The Staff

Resist the fuzzy boots

Yea, I know the bottle waitresses are going to come on to you at some point, and that cute little coat check girl is just dying to have you bend her over, but do you want to potentially mess up and lose your pussy paradise? Maybe you don't give a fuck, so you do fuck the coat check girl and everything is cool for a week. Then she realizes that you're not going to date her and you're actually gaming other girls right in front her. How dare you?

Well, the cute coat check girl decides to get back at you and tells the owner you've been creeping her out at work always hitting on her and my goodness, she even saw you in the parking lot staring at her as she left for then night. Is it true? Doesn't matter.

We know in this feminist driven world that the female's voice in a workplace environment will win 99.9% of the time and this time will be no exception. I've seen this happen by guys who had a place on lock who wound up getting 86′d permanently from the club.

It's hard. It's damn hard, trust me I struggle with it weekly, but it's not worth jeporadizing what you have going on. Have some self control and maybe flirt here and there in a light charming George Clooney, type of way, but don't close the deal. There are a few girls who would sleep with you and then act like nothing happened next time they see you but females are females and their old instincts kick in and 9/10 times it will fuck you up at the club.

Do co-workers sleep with each other and club-goers screw the staff as well? Of course. I knew a GM of one of the largest clubs on the entire West Coast, get fired because he slept with a go-go dancer co-worker and she got mad. Plenty of ass coming through your pussy paradise; no sense in effing it up with one girl.

The simplest way to approach this is to do this: Act as though you are an employee of the club.

Don't do it. I warned you. Even if she looks at you like this…

[image]

2. Bring Table Clients

Nightlife is a business. Yea, it's not a 9-5 and it's fun most of the time but don't be fooled by the smiles and seeing the owner pop bottles. He's in the business to make money. For some of the owners it's their expensive hobby, but for most it's their business and ANY patron who brings in good business will be handed the keys to the kingdom. All of you gents, whether you know it or not right this moment, know of a friend who has a friend etc, who is a baller. Next time they want a night on the town, set them up with the List Girl or even better, the owner.

This is key so pay attention. You. Must. Get. Credit. For. New. Bottle. Business.

If you refer them to the List Girl or a VIP Host, do you think for a million years they are going to give you credit? Hell no. It's their job to bring in clients and they want to look good. Here's an example of a conversation between you and the owner of how this goes. Italics are the owner's thought process.

[image]

You: Hey Club Owner, I have a buddy who's a pro poker player coming in town next weekend and he wants to do it up big. I told him how dope this club is and he wants to get a table. Do I have him just call the club and reserve it?

Club Owner: Sure Nightclub guy, that'd be great. Have him just call the office number or bring him to List Girl the night of. I've seen this guy around a lot, always cool and I remember Bottle Waitress telling me how he had her back Wednesday night.

You: Sounds good, I'll bring him on Saturday night. Thanks.

Club Owner: No problem. Hey, why don't you have a drink on me, here's some drink tickets. (Hands you 2-3 drink tickets. Of course you don't need them now because you followed my steps for getting the bar on lock, but it speaks volumes) Anybody bringing me business in this shit-ass economy is good in my book. Going to keep him happy.

You: Appreciate that. See you Saturday.

Commandment #2 leads perfectly into the #1 Commandment of Making A Club Your Pussy Paradise which is…

1. Make Friends With The Owner

[image]

Doormen get fired. List Girls' get replaced by hotter, more bitchy List Girls. Heads of Security get fired for stealing, etc. Barbacks get deported (I kid, I kid) and everyone on the chain of command line from the General Manager down to the bathroom attendant will be replaced at some point; it's just a matter of time.

The one guy (or guys, but generally there is a 'floor guy') who matters more than any employee in the club is the Owner. Get in good with him and you'll essentially be a 'made man', if I may borrow from my heritage. You'll have 'made it'. The only one who can kick you out of the most inner of circles in that club, is him because he IS the inner circle.

I know you're wondering 'Well how the hell do I get in good with the owner of the club?', and I'm going to tell you in 3 steps:

1. Build your good reputation which gets back to him and he observes in person.

2. Bring him table business. Don't trip—it doesn't have to be more than once, but it shows you want to make him money and you're not just enjoying the perks of having a club on lock without reciprocating.

3. Bring him girls.

Number 3 is so key, I can't stress it enough. I have never, I repeat, never met, or gotten to know a night club owner who is not in the business, based on the premise of getting more pussy. Yes, they want to make money, but make no mistake, they chose the nightclub business to get ass and lots of it.

[image]

After you've talked to him a few times and built a rapport, then when he's at his table with his buddies, swing by and say hello, but with one key ingredient: bring over a couple hot girls and introduce them to him as the owner.

"But wait McQeen, if he's the owner of a club, he must have game and get laid a lot?" Wrong. Remember, club owners usually buy a club, in the hopes that that will get them laid and it does… sometimes. We all know money without game, leaves you relying on Lady Luck and hiring escorts. Also, not to be a dick, but I've never met a club owner who was very good looking at all. Most are between late 30′s to 50′s and got the short straw in the looks department. What they do have is power and they love to have their ass kissed.

"Fuck that McQueen! I want to get laid! Isn't that the point to have my own pussy paradise?" You've probably heard the story of the two bulls on top of the hill looking down at a pasture full of female cows…

Young Bull: Let's run down there and fuck a cow!

Old Bull: No. Let's walk down and fuck all of them.

When It’s Good To Be ‘That Guy’

If you can be ‘that guy’ and this time in a good way, as in That Guy is: the guy who’s never out of control drunk, always bring girls up to the owner, or to his table and introduces them to him and it helps him get laid and That Guy never asks for anything in return, then you my friend will reap the fruits of your labor in such a huge way, you’ll feel like you won the nightlife lottery. Here’s why:

-Since you have a rapport with the Owner, the rest of the staff will start kissing YOUR ass, because they know you talk to him and they want to be talked about in a good way.

-Access to the Owner’s bottle service table and unlimited bottles to pop. Generally, an owner will have one table that is reserved as his table. This is always a prime spot, definitely in the VIP and close to the Dj often times. When the owner feels comfortable with you he’ll have you at his table drinking for free and essentially getting bottle service all night long with no out of pocket expense. This is huge. I already covered why Bottle Service + Game = Cream of the Crop Girls in the club, well this just got even better.

Due to association, the girls want to initiate contact with you even more because you’re with the Owner. It does not get any higher club DHV then this, save being at LeBron James table. Here’s the kicker though: The next best thing to hot girls to an owner, is celebrities and guess where the owner usually puts the celebs? You got it. At HIS table. So now, you’re rubbing shoulders with the elite. If you live in a smaller city then this will probably not be the norm, but in larger cities it is.

-Access to when the club closes. Although this is not talked about much because it’s a grey area with liquor license, most owners, if they haven’t already left, will stick around when the club closes with a few close friends and girls and continue the party. This is essentially your afterparty and can help you close the deal.

Nothing like an afterparty in a real club with the sound setup, unlimited alcohol and plenty of empty bathrooms and dark corners to seal the deal. I’ve banged multiple girls after clubs closed and one particular time, even in the Owner’s office on the couch. He gave me permission because he was leaving, but the afterparty was still continuing. How’s that for having a club on lock? I still feel bad for some of my seed sprinkling his couch though. Damn girl didn’t open her mouth wide enough.

[image]

-Invitations to Better Events. Once you’ve become a nightlife friend of the Owner, don’t be surprised when he invites you to exclusive concerts, other nightclubs and parties with the elite crowd. These cats usually have money to some degree and love to party and be a part of the hip crowd. Some of the experiences I’ve had:

- Courtside seats to NBA games
- Partied with Chris Brown at his Hollywood Hills mansion and multiple other celebs in public and private settings
- Backstage access to multiple major concert events
- Access to Porn Star Parties

Pre-night out free dinners at some of the finest restaurants. This helped me gain access to owners of hip-fancy restaurants where I established individual relationships with them, which has gotten me multiple free dinners and yet, another spot on lock when meeting/picking up girls.

Pour Another Drink

I've covered alot here and it may seem overwhelming at first, but the effort is worth it. I can promise you, if you do these steps and get a club on lock to this point, you will definitely have your own Pussy Paradise without breaking the bank. It's a SMALL investment for a HUGE return.

Once you've done this at one club, you may decide to utilize it for months or even years, however if you enjoy challenges, then parlay your new connections and reputation into another club and start getting your City on Lock. When you can walk into just about any club or lounge in your city and get this treatment, then you can consider yourself a Nightlife King and nothing feels better than being the King.

[image]

If you really enjoy nightlife, then don't be surprised if you get offered a job at a club, promoting or VIP Hosting through your new connections and reputation.

That's what happened with me. It all started in college for me, when I stood outside a club in 12 degree weather for almost 2 hours in line and swore no matter, from that point forward, I would figure out the secrets to getting a club on lock and having consistent access to hot girls. I went out 3-4 times a week for years and developed these steps through trial and error and it culminated into me being offered a VIP Hosting position. That job led to another, which led to another, etc, and has given me the opportunities to party all over the USA and get paid to do it.

I've given you the 10 Commandments To Creating Your Own Pussy Paradise, so now it's up to you. Good luck gents and I look forward to hearing your success stories.

The Road To Whoredom Is Paved With Abstinence

May 23, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

From Yahoo:

> "If you have sex within 30 days of meeting somebody, you've got a 90 percent chance of being broken up within one year," says Dr. Wendy Walsh, author of The 30-Day Love Detox. Dr. Walsh joins Ali with scientific statistics showing that waiting longer leads to longer relationships, and why "sex is a high-risk hobby for women."

Sensible advice, in theory. Sex forms relationships that would otherwise fail. I've slept with many girls who, if the sex was postponed much longer, the loss of momentum and novelty would have meant no sex. They just weren't that interesting, or their attention span was too low to sustain our connection, without the help of a hot beef injection to restore excitement. If girls waited, they wouldn't end up fornicating with men who'd leave them shortly after anyways. Better to secure at least, a man's agreement to be her boyfriend before sex. With fewer sexual partners in their past, these women might be able to bond better with the men they do want to seriously date and marry.

One problem with Walsh's approach: it's based on a fallacious understanding of statistics. Here is the bedrock on which her strategy lies:

> The answer of course is slow love. Research supports this. Nearly 90 percent of the fast movers in one study had broken up before one year.[1] However, if couples waited just 30 days before engaging in sex, 24 percent were still together a year later. That's a one in four chance.

Similarly, she cites the now-popular notion that cohabiting raises the risk of divorce. In both, correlation is mistaken for causation – for instance, thinking it's raining because the sidewalk is wet. The kind of people who would wait 30 days before having sex are also more likely to be the kind of people that have more stable relationships. The mere act of waiting isn't responsible for all of the effect of lower breakup rates. A minor point though.

But notice how the advice is framed in terms of relationships. That if a woman wants a relationship, this is what she should do. The inverse of this: if you're a woman and you don't want a relationship, fuck as you please. Even if that is not what Walsh intended, that's how her message will be received, among the nubiles in her audience. Indeed, that's already how American women operate.

Behold the mind of the American Whore:

1. Woman tires of sleeping with men who show no real interest in her, so she decides she wants a "real" relationship. Quite reasonably, she realizes she must try something different to be successful this time. She settles on the advice of "don't sleep with a guy early, because it increases the risk of failed relationships," and decides to apply it.

2. She starts holding out on sex with men who want to seriously date her.

3. She gets bored of these suitors, because they start to seem stale without sex to liven things up.

4. Meanwhile, she hasn't had sex in weeks. She's getting thirsty. "I know!" she says to herself, "This is only for relationships! But I just need some sex to tide me over, until I find a nice boyfriend, and not a horndog who can't even wait a month." [Note how she will castigate men for things she herself does.]

5. She starts banging men who aren't going on dates with her, typically men she meets out at bars and clubs. But "this is okay, because I don't want to date… those guys." "Girls who have sex on the first date are sluts, and I don't want to be a slut." The fact that sleeping with strangers is even sluttier than sleeping with men she briefly dated never even enters her mind. She deigns to never have sex on first dates, yet sees nothing wrong with one-night stands.

6. With her need for sex met by men who aren't exclusive to her, she has no patience for settling for the man who would have her.

Ironically, the advice of Walsh, presented as something fresh and non-conventional, is actually identical to what many promiscuous women already practice. I have personally had girls tell me that it was "okay" that we had sex quickly, because I was obviously not a guy she wanted to date. So she wasn't "being a slut" by having sex with a stranger who offered no promise of commitment. Showing serious interest may only hurt your prospects of getting sex – every modern girl dreads the "Stage 5 Clinger," and she is quick to mistake any man with interest for one.

What Walsh says would be sound, if women truly wanted relationships. But they don't. In the same way, I wouldn't mind owning an Audi R8, a luxury sports car retailing for over a hundred grand. But that would mean spending way too much of my savings – I'm not prepared to make such a sacrifice for something so trivial.

Loading…

It is in this sense that jilted women "want" to have a relationship. They want exciting, virile men. But these men won't have them as exclusive girlfriends. Hypergamy 101. The men who would will bore them. But these women would prefer the fleeting company of players to the smothering gaze of men taken with her. In economics, this called a 'revealed preference' – that one's actions show what her true preference is.

Walsh, a spinster, is inveighing against drug dealers when the drug addicts and their demand are causing the problem. Probably because she's selling to the drug addicts themselves – she wouldn't have many book sales or get much media exposure if she held them responsible. While the addicts may not like the negative symptoms of their addiction to casual sex, like "heartbreak" and frustration, they have no intention of giving the drug up either.

Wendy Walsh, author of The 30-Day Love Detox

Having a relationship with any hope of success, as a woman, means actively rejecting the men who are too attractive to deign to date you. Very few Western women will agree to that. They won't even bother to ask if there's any prospect of a relationship, before sex. Among the dozens of women I've slept with, not once was I required to be exclusive, or agree to be her boyfriend, before having sex. While some girls do request this, it is on the wane. As men, we feel no 'frustration' from sleeping with a girl who won't date us. Once we're having sex, we don't care if she formally considers us her 'boyfriend' or not. Instead, we get rejected immediately, or 'blue-balled' and 'cockteased.'

Women are so flooded with stimuli and new sensations that it is impossible to hold her attention even for just a month, without the glue of sex. Return of Kings contributor Tuthmosis said, in a discussion of how the second date is dead:

> This is definitely a very recent development. I remember parking my game for a little while for an LTR [long-term relationship], and coming out to a different > world. Before that, I agree that if things ended in a make-out, you didn't even need to push for the bang. There was no reason to push for the bang, unless you were mad horny. There was an ease to the whole thing once you had a verified connection (a kiss, for instance). It was unheard-of to not get a second date if the first one went well. In fact, as long as you kept pushing the ball upfield, you knew you'd get another "first down." The three-date rule prevailed, and you were satisfied with a second- or third-date bang.

> Nowadays, I go for the first-date bang even when I'm not that horny, with full knowledge that if I don't, I'm going to get flaked on. Even when I do score a first-date bang–and put it down like champ–I might still get flaked on.
> Chicks have become dudes.

Contrary to popular belief, the player is not brazenly demanding sex on the first date. He is merely responding to the scenario that the woman has set – if sex doesn't happen soon, it won't happen, ever. Aggressively pushing for sex isn't without risks – aggressiveness would not be used as much, if women could be relied upon to go on further dates, as Tuthmosis suggests. And they did. Why chance upsetting her, when you can simply bide your time and get sex eventually? Well now you can't, because if you wait, that chance will never come.

In telling women to avoid early sex only when a woman wants a relationship, Walsh is trying to put out a fire with lighter fluid. Her solution may deliver the exact opposite of a healthy long relationship, because it will be misapplied. Walsh herself is 51 – decades past the point of sexual relevance. Walsh could not convince even her 22 year old self to refuse to sleep with men outside of a relationship. No one cares about what 50 year old spinsters and childless divorcees do, just as no one cares about the fates of the vast hordes of low status men of all ages.

And for the women out there who do want to apply her advice in earnest, it isn't enough. When a woman isn't rewarding the man with sex, she must find other ways to keep a high value man waiting. First and foremost, she must show that she won't change her mind halfway through the 'waiting period,' lest she bail and waste the man's time. Secondly, she should make the wait as pleasant as possible for him, to ensure he will stick around. That means looking superb, being a great conversationalist and offering him tasty, home-made meals. Even the most unrepentant player will have trouble saying no to a prude whose idea of a date is inviting him over and making him a nice meal in a dress and heels. Don't expect Walsh to tell any of that to her audience – that would mean doing something for a man.

How To Judge The Bad Sex You're Having

May 24, 2013 | by Alex Matlock | Link | Original Link

Although most of us believe that pleasing a woman in bed is key, you've probably noticed that most women haven't got the tiniest interest in pleasing us. The large majority of women believe that getting naked and allowing us to stab their insides with our manly part is pretty much all they have to do when it comes to having sex. Then they just judge the awkward sex that happened purely on our performance alone. Does that seem fair?

I think it's only natural that we should also judge the sex we have with them as well. Judging is important because it allow us to understand exactly what it is that we want from a sexual encounter.

Because we all grade women's looks on a scale from 1 to 10, I think it's only natural that we should grade the sexual experience in the same manner. Over the years I've banged a lot of chicks but most, if not all of them, fall in the below 5 categories. This is a scale from 1 (lowest) to 5 (highest) and it looks something like this:

1. The one that tries too much (aka The Disaster)

This girl has the potential to become the Pornstar (#5) but she hasn't yet watched enough porn. Because she tries so hard, she moves out of sync; is sloppy; does a good job at taking your attention off the sex part and more to the "WTF is she doing" part; she has the highest percentage of male genitalia injury; breaks condoms; helps you lose your boner and gives you a genuinely bad sexual experience.

Chicks that fall into this category are inexperienced and believe that a man's penis is made out of a rubber that has no pain receptors. Also, If they've been drinking, they would also fall into this category. That's just one more reason to avoid "taking advantage" of heavily inebriated women.

2. The one that's scared (aka The Virgin)

This girl doesn't necessarily have to be a virgin because she can still act the part many years after she's popped that priceless cherry. She will usually look at you with fear in her eyes as if she has no idea about what's going to happen. She gently pushes you away as if she's not ready for the event and when it does happen she continues to act like it's the first time. She usually sits in some extremely awkward positions that make you give up and just go missionary. This girl will eventually bust your nut but she'll surely leave you with a sense of disappointment and/or guilt.

3. The one that doesn’t move (aka The Starfish or The Doll)

The girl doesn’t know, doesn’t care or doesn’t like to do anything. As sad as that may seem, at least she doesn’t do anything that disrupts the actual lovemaking. Because of that, she will probably have many more orgasms than #1 and #2 simply because she lets the man do his thing. This is particularly true if the dude lives to please, in which case she’ll have a fantastic time.

But what about the guy? While this may be enough for many men, the ones that have sex more than a few times a year would probably like to see more. However, the overall sexual experience is average but quite acceptable for most of us.

This type of woman is by far the most common, usually under the age of 25 and really does go behind the belief that all a woman has to do in bed is to get naked and say YES.

4. The one that does something (aka The Girlfriend)

This chick has had at least one somewhat serious relationship in her life where she has witnessed that indeed, a man does want more than a starfish. While she may NOT be incredibly experienced in the art of lovemaking, she does go that little bit extra, enough to put a smile on our faces.

All girls can and will eventually become this girl, as long as they end up in a relationship with a dude that asks for it.

5. The one that knows (aka The Pornstar)

This is the girl that knows what she's doing. I don't know if it's the porn she watched, the amount of sex she had or what it is but, you'll know it when you see it. This is the girl dudes leave their wives for. This is the girl that was born to have sex and she knows it.

If you manage to land such a slampiece you're one lucky bastard. Although you may constantly have the "feeling" that she's either cheating on you, or there's something about her past you don't quite want to know, this girl is still going to blow your mind. She's the type of girl you'll give up crack for.

Note: With age, also comes experience. Generally, women below 25 don't have a clue about what they want in a sexual partner; let alone what to do with one. Women over 25 start to have a good idea about what they want and start to make an effort towards their partners. Only after 30 do most women become "sexually liberated" and will be able to provide you with high quality sex. Of course there are exceptions but, this is generally true. Finally, if we were going through this scale purely by age, EXCLUDING all exceptions, it would look like this:

Under 25: The Disaster, The virgin, The doll – very rare chance to find the Pornstar.

Over 25: The doll, The girlfriend. – will sometimes find the Pornstar.

Over 30: The girlfriend, The Pornstar. – your wife might already be a Pornstar.

Who Is Ayrton Senna?

May 24, 2013 | by Faust | Link | Original Link

On May first of 1994, after a mechanical problem that rendered the steering of his car useless, Ayrton Senna would be found dead at the Tamburello corner on lap 7 of the San Marino Gran Prix. Senna hit the concrete retaining wall at around 217 kph. The cars telemetry later showed that Senna had reacted incredibly fast, having the brakes fully on at the moment of the accident. However, there was nothing he could have done to prevent his death. The reaper had scheduled him that day.

I have seen hundreds of hours of footage of his driving; I have also raced for part of my life and have seen countless hours of racing. I have lived through many things that have impressed me deeply, but I have seen very few that have left me in awe once experienced.

Ayrton Senna's driving is the closest thing I have seen to divine revelation. Seeing anyone on the very edge, in the last stretch of human consciousness, is hands down one of the most beautiful, mystical displays of sheer brilliance that have filled me with joy. I compare his driving to Bernini's sculpting, to Tchaikovsky's compositions and is, to this day, one of the single most stunning things I have ever seen.

His discipline and commitment was astonishing; his bravery, determination, self-drive and ambition made him unique. He displayed an uncanny level of attention to detail that made him a titan in a land of giants. The names of Prost, Mansell and Schumacher all appeared amongst his rivals. They all raced against him and were all beaten. He understood that he needed to do whatever it took to reach his goal whether that was dying or spending several hours tuning his car.

Loading...

In 1990’s Japan’s Gran Prix, Senna would become world champion if Alain Prost did not finish. In the first lap he crashed Prost on purpose to take him out of the race, risking both his and Prost’s lifes. That was his level of determination. That is what it takes.

His level of sintony with both car and track, his ability to take body, mind, soul and machine to their very limits while still keeping absolute control of it all was almost supernatural. I recommend you watch some of his footage; maybe you will be able to appreciate the intensity of his driving. It will elevate your spirit and nourish your soul once you see what he understood; that he was to fulfill a destiny of greatness that had given him an almost divine right to win. He was a regular visitor in that unexplored world where passion, excellence, and untamed talent meet.

He once said:

> Once you are in it you are in it, you got to go all the way to the end because you commit yourself to such a level where there is no compromise. You give everything you have absolutely everything. Sometimes you find even more because it requires more if you want to stay ahead and you want to win. (…) So every time you are close to those limits the excitement increases, and your heart goes quicker, and your breath goes stronger.

It has occurred very few times in history that a man who has not won the most still manage to be the best. This is the case with Senna. He was undoubtedly the greatest racing driver that has ever lived. His grace on the wheel remains unchallenged and unrivaled. The Grand Prix venue misses him, I miss him, but he now rests among his equals, side by side with among greats.

Girls Should Just Be Happy

We all encounter those girls who stick in our minds like a bubblegum pop song. You'll be sitting at a coffee shop reading a good book and without even seeing her you'll feel her presence and turn around. At your favorite club while everyone else is standing around, guys with beers at chest level and girls huddled in small groups, she is lost in her own world dancing like a goddess on the dance floor. Time seems to slow as you two make eye contact. You go over and start dancing, inhaling her intoxicating feminine aroma as you two intermingle.

I've been thinking a lot about past lovers who gave me instantaneous and primal desire, the ones who after a night of sex I still couldn't get enough of, and even the girls who I can remember clear as day even though we never spoke. There was the traditionally feminine Eastern European girl I used to see. The "lesbian" who kind of looked like Miley Cyrus. The hourglass redhead whom I banged behind the club one night. The Nordic huntress who passed me in a crosswalk once. Even though I didn't get the chance to talk to her I remember everything about the way she walked. It was like she was the happiest girl in the world.

Then it hit me. I finally figured out what made these girls so different from all the others I'd met: happiness and a positive attitude. That alone made me remember these girls more than the ones who tell me "we can't have sex tonight because I've been having too many one night stands lately", the ones who show up stumbling drunk to a date, or the ones who claim to have "attitude" in hopes that they're unique.

The girls I remember most may not have embodied traditional femininity, but they sure were a pleasure to be around. Even though I fucked a girl in a back alley she still stuck up for me when her roommate started giving me shit. She apologized with a blowjob and noisy sex later in the night. The traditionally feminine girl asked me how I was doing every time I saw her and would make me exquisite cappuccinos. The “lesbian” offered me food and drink making sure I was comfortable even though we both knew it was going to be a one night stand.

Loading...

It wasn’t just those small actions either. I thought back to when I’d met them and all of them were smiling, open and seemed like they hadn’t a care in the world. I thought back to the girls who I’ve almost forgotten and when I’d met them they were borderline angry, bitchy or would eventually start complaining.

I know you girls are out there reading this, looking for another post to hate, another post to ridicule. Stop right now and start thinking about things you are thankful for in your life. Put down your iPhones and smile for once, ask the Starbucks barista how their day is going. Girls can cruise by with a default negative demeanor so they don’t have to own up to the fact that their social skills are terrible. You have no obligation to change because a man tells you to, but if you don’t want to end up on Ok Cupid with thousands of messages from thirsty simps you could do for an attitude adjustment. Screen your men by what you want in a man instead of what you don’t.

My self-summary

I hate all of you.

UGLY BOYS STOP TALKING TO ME!

FIRST OFF: NO FATTIES & NO BROS! Get you & your friggin mirror pics away from me! I also don't care if you play guitar- you and everyone else does. & what's up with guys only having pictures of themselves with sunglasses on?! How am I supposed to see what you look like? Fools. If you're old enough to be my dad then GTFO! (but you're prob too old to know what that even means so let me spell it out: GET THE FUCK OUT!) & if you're younger than 21, don't even bother. I don't date people who have a corporate office or military job. If you're going bald, I'm sorry, I like a full head of hair. ~"I only hang out with cool, artsy people"~ You have to have some kind of interest or talent in the arts (preferably visual arts). I will most likely ignore you. I have high standards & I only get the best. I'm also a bad bitch so be warned. I'm not looking to get fucked by you assholes so don't even go there. You don't know how hard it is to be a girl on okc. If you message me & you can't get your "your/you're" right, you most likely won't hear a reply. AND PLEASE, don't tell me that I'm pretty or beautiful. I'd rather be judged for my personality. If I like you, I'll tell you. I have no filter and I'm pretty blunt. I'm sassy. Hopefully, this bitchiness will scare 80% of you away. "I know I sound intimidating"...In reality, I'm a total sweetheart & although I can be brutally honest, I'm super nice, I swear. I'm also really laid back & carefree. I like a guy who can cook for me, vegans/veggies are a plus! I also don't really care if you find this profile funny and you message me to tell me that. I'm flattered, cool, but I hear it all the time. I get it.

Girls: Do the complete opposite of this girl.

This advice goes for men too. The biggest “quick fix” for your success with women would be your attitude. If you’re happy and positive girls will (for the most part) be the same back. I used to walk around with a permanent scowl for no reason whatsoever. One day a girl of mine sent me a dirty text as I was walking around town. I looked up with a smirk on my face and girls started smiling back when before they’d just look away. When it comes down to it ‘game’ is just about having a good time so go out there and have some fun.

5 Reasons You Look Like An Idiot At The Gym

May 25, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

The gym is a place to focus on yourself. It is a place to put on some tunes, lift heavy things, relieve stress, and grow.

However, the existence of social pressure is undeniable. And it is only natural given the fit, young population that tends to congregate in these fine establishments.

How you react to this pressure says a lot about your character. Do you puff out your chest and waltz around? Do you run, hide, and quiver in the corner? Or do you rise above the pressure and simply take care of business?

Avoid the five mistakes below, and you already have a foot up on the average chump.

1. You Flex… A Lot

Yes, you have biceps. Congratulations. Please don't put on a show, flex, and admire them in between every set. If you're small, it's just embarrassing. And if your big, people already can tell – no need to prove it.

Even worse is the stealth flex. You know, the guy who's constantly flexing his arms as he walks around the gym – whether it's to the water fountain or the bench. We can tell you're flexing. And the cardio bunnies are laughing at you, too.

2. You Don't Rack The Weights

Ignore this piece of advice if you want everyone hate you.

After you finish benching or squatting, take 30 seconds (far less for the average guy who makes this mistake) and put the weights back where they go. People notice, and we don't want to clean up after you.

Even worse, people will assume someone is still using the equipment.

Loading...

3. You Wear Silly Clothes

I'm going to assume you're not wearing jeans and a polo to the gym, although I saw a guy doing that yesterday. He was awesome.

That said, the term cut-off has been taken to new heights in recent years. There is no need to show off your pepperoni nipples in public. Sleeveless is fine, but the line needs to be drawn. Preferably before the nipples.

4. You're A Mute

This isn't the library. If you think someone might be using the squat rack, just ask. No need to creep around and sniff the situation out. Also, no need to be a hero and start un-racking someone's weights while they're getting some water.

By the same token, the gym is not the bar – if you're going to chat for more than a minute, please stay clear of the equipment.

5. You Curl In The Squat Rack

Don’t do it. Period.

Next time your’re at the gym, take a quick look around. How many people are breaking these simple rules? Do yourself a favor, observe them, and set yourself apart.

I am a huge fan of the website The Rawness. His approaches to psychological issues – or inner game – are insightful and supremely helpful. I mention this because one of his posts turned me on to a book called Emotional Vampires by Dr. Albert Berstein.

Overview

The book is a quick and great read. It is clearly organized and well-written. However, the most important aspect of the book is his emphasis on practical solutions. Many books on psychology are either too superficial to be of any real use, or are too theory-heavy for any person not versed in psychology to interpret and implement.

The subtitle of the book sums up what sort of people he will be discussing and analyzing – "people who drain you dry." This is important distinction to focus on people who drive other people up the wall, as opposed to driving themselves up the wall. People who make themselves crazy are usually referred to as having psychoses or neuroses, people who drive others crazy are usually referred to as having "personality disorders."

People with personality disorders display a wide range of issues. Inability to deal with boredom, excessive adherence to formalized rules, and complete and utter lack of empathy for others, amazing displays of charisma followed by utter depression or reverting to being boring (anybody who read The Game would remember Mystery falling into this category), or simply the inability to handle their own emotions, so they befriend or romance others so they have captive audiences for their emotional rollercoasters.

Regardless, one the most important themes throughout the book is his insistence on explaining why these sorts of people are the way they are. He stresses empathy, because almost always, if they are draining you, it isn't because of you – it is because of their internal conflicts. In order words, they are targeting you not because of you specifically, but because they need a victim to shore up their faltering psychology – like a vampire feeding on a person in order to slake their thirst for blood. You often see these disorders at full attention when the vampire is subjected to stress – their disorders are there to calm their nerves, even if that means pissing you off to no end. In sum – do not let them get to you.

These disorders often develop in childhood as a reaction to their needs not be met in a timely manner by parental figures.

Before I get into the types of vampires, let's talk about the common methods that a vampire comes at you in real life. Often times, these sorts of people make a fantastic first-impression; they are charismatic, empathetic and completely focused on you – think a lesser Bill Clinton. They often are great at misdirection, identifying what you want as a person and a creation of an alternate reality in which to get what you want. Warning signs you are being preyed include level of "instant rapport," departing from social convention, and creating a level of internal confusion in you. Like most of psychology, it isn't a rote list of behaviors or actions you can check through, you have to develop your sense on this stuff. Remember, they ultimately want to drain you emotionally.

Let's step through the broad categories of vampires he identifies: anti-social, histrionic, narcissistic, obsessive-compulsive, and paranoid. Let's go through anti-social first.

Anti-social personality

This sounds exactly like its name to a 1950's conservative: sex, drugs and rock and roll. These sorts of people are consumed by drugs, alcohol, sex and partying. The key observation about this disorder is the high insistence on new stimulation, impulsiveness and charm. These sorts of people are usually lovable – at least, superficially. He identifies anti-socials that purely just want thrills, and some that get thrills of dominating and exploiting other people. The purest forms of these people you don't often encounter in the workplace, as their drug use and partying is prohibitive to holding down a full-time job. You probably knew them in high school and college.

Histrionic

Histronic vampires are supremely superficial. Obsessed with looks, “putting on a good show,” treating acquaintances like close friends, and generally levels of superficiality – obsession with pop culture, others social lives and all manner of nothing important. The author goes out his way to say that it is wrong to assume this is a feminine problem – he claims the 1950’s dads had these sorts of issues. What he gets wrong is that he assumes masculinity was/is a façade. It makes marketing sense for his book, as women would balk being stereotyped as having this disorder.

Like anti-socials, these are addictive disorders – but to approval. Often times, if they are not getting the attention this want, they will become a pill-popper or alcoholics. Not because purely because of the physical thrill, but because of the attention they will come socially.

There are two main categories of Histronic disorder: “ham-it-up” and passive aggressive. To be sure, both are feminine. You probably know men with this disorder – they are often the worst of omega and beta males. “Ham-it-up” love putting on a show and are excellent at creating worlds where they offer themselves up as the prize. They are often wont to use illness and personal tragedy as a theater to showcase themselves.

Passive-aggressive vampires are people who divide their personality into pure, loving and good impulses and everything” negative” into the other. They are completely oblivious to their anger, meanness, etc. A classic example is asking somebody (who is clearly upset) what is wrong. The angry person responds, “Nothing is wrong.” This situation escalates until the vampire accuses the victim of being way too angry. See the transmission? They push their anger onto you, so they don’t have to acknowledge their anger.

Narcissism

Loading…

Next are narcissistic vampires. You know these types, grandiose, over the top and have a complete lack of regard for others. I have an intimate knowledge of these types, as my mother is one. In their life, there is no stopping; their self esteem rides on everything they do every day. They always have to win. However, these sorts of people become successful politicians (Bill Clinton), invent all sorts of stuff, explore the world, etc. In sum, often time these sorts of people who have made the world. They are often your favorite pro athletes – think Kobe Bryant. A key takeaway is the need for narcissistic supply – they need for your worship and devotion. Once they feel they have yours, you see their true side.

There are two main types of narcissists – I refer to them as internal and external vampires. Internal narcissists are grandiose in their own minds; they don't have real world accomplishments, not charismatic or anything. They would be some dude coming onto this board boasting of all his lays, while never having so much as whiffed the scent of pussy. The other type of narcissist is an external one. These guys and gals are the real deal. Usually charismatic, intelligent and often rich, these people are successful, socially and professionally. Remember, these sorts of people are their own harshest critics, they just project it onto you, so don't take it personally.

Obsessive-Compulsive

Next up are obsessive compulsive personality disordered people. These people are usually great workers, very reliable and incredibly predictable. The downside? They have no concept of the idea of "the spirit of the law." Rigid adherence to rules is their life. These sorts of people seem to be perpetually angry, which is true. Yet, the anger is subconscious. The two types – perfectionists and puritans – think their blind following of the rules will block out their aggressive impulses.

Perfectionists are the usual person you work with who thinks they work harder than everybody. The most annoying part is often they do. You can't criticize them because they follow company policy to the letter or are the perfect conservative/liberal. They use the rules as a way of bullying, constantly criticizing and downing others. They often rise to middle management and get stuck there. Which means anybody beneath them is subject to their tyranny – they don't criticize superiors. Puritans are your garden-variety religious or ideological person. They think the world punishes the virtuous and they are on high alert for offenses. Their response to perceived immorality is bullying – suppression of expression, outright cruelty and punishment.

Paranoid

The last is paranoid personality disorder. People who love conspiracy theories, who inordinately love philosophy, politics and intellectualism in general often have this disorder. In their mind, the whole world can be distilled into simple black and white theories. These sorts of people are people who produce bizarre manifestos, they are also the world's greatest philosophers or intellectuals. Their personal problems manifest in personal relationships. Their inherent mistrust of the world is really their mistrust of themselves.

There are two main categories: visionaries or the jealous. Visionaries are the classic crack-pot theorists. 90% of the time, their ideas are bullshit. However, when they are right, they are right. Paranoid people are very perceptive, however most of the time they see things that simply do not exist. What draws people in is their complete confidence in their ideas. The jealous are people who cannot trust others. Every relationship will eventually become marred with accusations of not really caring about them, talking behind their back, or – if it's sexual – cheating, running around or not really loving them. Very draining in the long run.

How To Deal With These People

Let's break down the approaches of dealing with these sorts of vampires, as there are many common themes. First off, you must always be aware when dealing with these people; like I said initially, be wary of instant connections, hypnosis, control and creation of alternate realities. It really means just be self-aware, never be too comfortable. This is good advice in general. Unless you are hanging with your best friends, never let your guard down completely.

Second, you need to understand their personal history. You need to get outside opinions of somebody. If you can, ask a few disinterested people about them. Often times, your wariness will be verified. You need to watch personal actions, not words. While this is obvious advice, it gets forgotten in real life. I myself have found myself transgressing this rule. A common technique that runs through all these disorders is the possession of a silver tongue – they are smooth talkers. Don't let them get to you; because once they do they will emotionally drain you.

Third, is you have to selective about what you deal with. You can't fight every conflict with them, you have to be discerning about what you act on. Wait till you know you have them in a spot for you to easily call them out – but be specific about your goal. If you are looking to just score points or vent your frustration at them, you won't help yourself. You need to be clear about what you want from them. Understand their psychology and approach them in effective ways. For example, with a narcissist, you need to pump their ego up a bit before criticizing them, know what you want from them, and tie your needs into theirs. They don't care about your needs, but if you let them know they can help themselves by helping you, you may succeed.

Fourth, ignore any and all outbursts where they lose their temper. I would guess unless it is escalating into physicality, the general rule is to ignore tantrums. The moment you give in, they will start draining you. Some specific situations do require intervention, however.

Finally, understand your own personal restrictions or limits. Unless the person is a boss or a coworker, know when it is best to walk away for your own mental health. The closer a person is to you, the more work you might want to do to deal with them; if they aren't really close, then maybe the best way forward to just bowing out.

In any event, I highly recommend reading this book. It has given me some great practical advice to deal with difficult people – most especially in the workplace. If you haven't already, you will encounter some real difficult people to handle at your job. Unlike your social circle, where you may be able to keep interactions superficial, if you work a 9-5 with a problem person, you need real tactics to keep yourself grounded. Also, Emotional Vampires is good because it reminds you to not judge them – they are really just fighting themselves. No good comes of judging them or you adopting their personality traits. Often times, these people are great at seduction, climbing the corporate ladder or just fun to hang out with. Be aware of positives as well their limitations and you can successfully navigate the vampiritic waters.

Machiavelli’s Comic Side

May 26, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Everyone knows Niccolo Machiavelli’s (1469-1527) status as a seminal political theorist, but few are also aware that he was a first-rate playwright and satirist. His play Mandragola (probably written around 1519) is one of the outstanding comedies of the Italian Renaissance stage (it can be found here: http://archive.org/details/TheMandragola). And chances are, you’ve never even heard of it. Of course, once you learn the plot, you’ll get a pretty good idea why you’re not likely to see this play staged by your local community college theatre group anytime soon. Our modern commissars of political correctness dare not allow it.

Machiavelli opens the play with a brief prologue in which he warns off any anticipated critics:

> Should anyone seek to cow the author by evil-speaking, I warn you that he, too, knows how to speak evil, and indeed excels in the art; and that he has no respect for anyone in Italy, though he bows and scrapes to those better dressed than himself.”

This was no idle threat. Invective and calumny were common pastimes among the literati in Italy then (as now), and few could sling mud as well as Machiavelli.

The play is set in Florence. Callimaco, our sensual protagonist, prides himself on his game skills with women. He hears someone praise the great beauty of Lucrezia, the wife of Nicias. Although Callimaco has never seen her, he at once decides that he must seduce her, if only so he can sleep peacefully. However, Lucrezia is also known for her virtue, and this may be an obstacle.

Callimaco sees an opening when he learns that Nicias is depressed over Lucrezia's failure to conceive a child. Callimaco bribes a friend to introduce him to Nicias as a doctor. Callimaco tells Nicias that he has a special "medicine" that can make any woman fertile; but the only problem, says Callimaco, is that the first man who sleeps with a woman taking the special potion may die. Callimaco generously offers to "risk his life" to sleep with Lucrezia, and the gullible beta-male Nicias eventually agrees.

Lucrezia, however, remains modest and is not keen on the plan. Fortunately for Callimaco, Lucrezia's mother is especially desirous of grandchildren. So the mother bribes a priest for twenty five ducats to advise Lucrezia, in the confessional, to agree to the plan. The bribed priest convinces her. She drinks the potion, sleeps with Callimaco, and becomes pregnant. Basically, everyone is happy at the end; everyone gets what they wanted. Callimaco can rest at ease, knowing he has slept with the beautiful Lucrezia; Nicias has a child; and the priest can recite benedictions.

Loading...

All in all, the play is a brilliant comedy. It is also amazing to learn that it was performed successfully in 1520 before Pope Leo X in Rome. The fact that the play celebrated sex and seduction, and totally ridiculed the clergy as frauds, bothered him not at all. In fact, the Pope liked it so much that he asked Cardinal Giulio de Medici to award Machiavelli a commission as a writer.

What can we conclude from all this? What is surprising—even shocking—for modern audiences is the theme that fraud and deception are actually good things. Not only is fraud not punished, but it is actually presented as a virtue, as long as everything turns out all right in the end. In other words, game creates its own morality. It is finally refreshing to hear someone celebrate the unadorned and unapologetic pursuit of sensualism.

The biographers tell us that in his personal life, Machiavelli fully enjoyed the pursuits of the flesh. When close to fifty years of age, he wrote to a friend, "Cupid's nets still enthrall me. Bad roads cannot exhaust my patience, nor dark nights daunt my courage…My whole mind is bent on love, for which I give Venus thanks." He also sent detailed letters of his sexual adventures to his friends, some of which are so frank that publishers to this day hesitate to print them.

If Mandragola were made into a film today, we can just imagine how it would be watered down. Feminism and political correctness would completely neuter its satiric impact, its pungent sexuality, its salty ribaldry. It would probably be turned into an ode to girl-power, with your standard Hollywood metrosexual beta male in the role of Callimaco, and the other men reduced to simpering lackeys. Picture a dour and snarky Jennifer Aniston as Lucrezia, lecturing the audience in dreary monologues on the evils of male sexuality. Imagine Seth Rogen in the role of Callimaco, now safely beta-ized; and visualize Jack Black in a standard jibberish-spewing appearance as Nicias.

Powerfully written, and a brilliant satire. Just don't expect to see it staged anytime soon.

Why I Love House Of Cards

May 27, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

TV has been rife with blue pill material for some time now. It seems you can't turn on the box without witnessing a pathetic example of emasculated manhood or white-knighting fuckery. Every so often, however, you get a gem, a beacon of masculinity that shines brightly through the morass of betatude.

Today's gem is Netflix's new original series, House of Cards.

The show is about a hard charging veteran US Congressman named Frank Underwood who essentially wheels and deals circles around his political opponents. He gets ahead using a remarkable (and ruthless) intellect combined with a sheer force of will, his greatest weapon resting in his ability to embody what we here in the manosphere consider an "alpha male". Each episode is an exercise in alphadom—the man regularly breaks the will of his opponents and even goes as far as to intimidate the President of the United States. Think of a massively more realistic and gritty version of West Wing and you've essentially got the idea. That realism and grit is probably why this show, unlike West Wing, isn't on network TV.

Frank has a wife named Claire, played by Robin Wright (perhaps best remembered as “Jennie” from Forrest Gump).

You get the picture: tall, trim, blonde and blue eyed, she’s pretty much the American dream, the prototype of what many an American male spends his days fantasizing about and white-knighting for. She’s also the embodiment of the kind of woman that only a real alpha male like Frank could have gotten: extremely hypergamous, highly ambitious, fully aware of her beauty and its power, and absolutely repulsed by the sight of weak men.

In Episode Six, Claire visits a sick former employee of Frank’s. The man, named Steve, had been Frank’s bodyguard for eight years. He now has cancer, is stuck in a hospital bed and will soon die. He sends a direct text message to Claire asking her to come visit him in person, where he essentially takes the opportunity to confess his love to her. I’m sure he expected some sympathy. He received instead a very healthy, potent dose of the red pill… from a woman.

> Claire: A lot of people do.
> Steve: The past eight years I watched over him. But it wasn't him I was watching. And every time I saw you, every time I heard your voice, all I could think to myself was 'Jesus what I would give'… I can't tell you how many times I thought about that.
> Claire: You know what Francis said to me when he proposed? I remember his exact words. He said, 'Claire, if all you want is happiness, say no. I'm not gonna give you a couple of kids and count the days until retirement. I promise you freedom from that. I promise you'll never be bored.'
> And you know, he was the only man, and there were a lot of others who proposed, he was the only one who understood me. He didn't put me on some pedestal. He knew that I didn't want to be adored or coddled. So he took my hand and he put a ring on it…because he knew I would say yes. He's a man who knows how to take what he wants.
> Loading…

What we have illustrated here is a perfect example of the reality men must face when they take the red pill. Here we have a decent, honorable man (a typical beta male or "nice guy") who thought he could win points with an attractive woman by putting down her "asshole" husband. He confesses his love for her and essentially admits that he has had her on a pedestal for a very long time.

She responds by telling him explicitly why she loves that "asshole". She doesn't want to be on a pedestal. She's attractive, and has had many (probably hundreds if not thousands) of men put her there but she simply never wanted their adoration or coddling—those things are worth less than mud to her.

She desired a man with the confidence and force of will not to beg her to be with him or worship at her altar and hope for her acquiescence, but rather to simply take her. And she responded very positively to the one man who offered her this, because that is the only kind of man she could respect.

Rest assured that there are many women like Claire out there. Chances are that if you're in a major city or on a college campus, you cross paths with dozens of them every day. They're attractive and they have many male suitors, all of whom pine for her on a regular basis and wish to give her the world.

You may be tempted to do the same. But know that if you do, you will just be another afterthought in her mind. For these women do not remember the many men who coddle them, worship them and place them on the pedestals they don't want to be on. Sure, the women are aware of who those men are and understand that they exist, but they don't register at all as sexual options. In fact, a part of these women despises those men for putting them in a position (pedestalized goddess) they have no desire to be in.

The man they do respond to is the one with the force of will to seize what he wants and to rise above the level of the average beta.

While said beta seeks to coddle and shield her at every opportunity, he lets her breathe. While the beta places her on a pedestal and treats her like a goddess or an invaluable ornament, he treats her like the fallible, human female she knows she is.

The beta offers her nothing more than a boring marriage with 2.5 kids, a white picket fence and a chance to count the days until retirement, while he offers her excitement and opportunity to go along with any ideas of family he might have.

It is in your best interest to become him. Don't be content to remain among the masses of discarded beta fodder, especially if you ever hope to attract a woman of this physical caliber in a society like this.

And watch House of Cards.

5 Surprising Uses For Baking Soda

May 27, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Everyone has heard of baking soda, and if you haven't you probably live under a rock. It's that fun stuff that helps you make a fake volcano to win the science fair in fourth grade, or stuff you use for baking. Well women use for baking, let's get serious we're men, we don't bake, we go to the store. But being as men don't generally bake, not every man has baking soda in their home as a bachelor, and you should. Here's a few common and not so common uses that make this item a must have for every bachelor pad.

Deodorant

Yes, it says it on the box but unless you're poor or have been to prison you've probably never actually used it for this purpose. For those of you that aren't super familiar with Roosh's work, he covered this topic of deodorant directly back in 2011. His full post regarding it can be found here, and I give him full credit regarding it as he's the one who experimented with it not me. But it is good to know in a pinch one always has options.

Tooth Whitener

The United States as of late has been obsessed with tooth color. And while it used to be determined that so long as your mouth wasn't yellow with foul breath you were good. These days having that perfect Hollywood smile is the expectation. So if your smile isn't as straight as Tyrese Gibson's you're already at a disadvantage. If you're teeth aren't as white as his, you're definitely discounting points. You can go and buy teeth whitening kits, or even go to the dentist to make your teeth whiter; or you could just buy baking soda which is a fraction of the price. It does the same thing, just don't overdue your home treatments as baking soda is a harsher way to treat your teeth. Recommendations for it are twice a week.

Loading…

Mosquito Bite Treatment

Mosquito's suck plain and simple and eventually you're going to get bit by them. This is a treatment I learned from my grandmother and use on a quite frequent basis. All you need to do is mix some baking soda with water to make a paste and smear it over your bites. Just let it dry out, the remaining baking soda will wipe right off and your itching will be gone. It doesn't fully get rid of the bites, but I've rarely had itching following the use, and it's definitely saved me some torment throughout the summer.

Refrigerator Deodorizer

This should be a common fact, but I'm sure there's one person in the world who doesn't know, or who has some fancy refrigerator deodorizer and they need to knock it off. Just buy a box of baking soda, put it in the back of your fridge and let it absorb the stank of your horrendous cooking leftovers. You just have to replace it once every so often. Some people have this marked down to days but it really depends how much food odor ends up in your fridge. If you've ever used a fridge that hasn't had baking soda in the back of if (college kids are dumb) you'll quickly realize how good of a solution this is.

To Extinguish A Fire

At some point one of you on here might start a fire and you might not have a fire extinguisher. Baking soda is once again to the rescue. Just throw a whole boat load on it and boom, fire be gone. You could also get fancy like this fat kid in the video below and make your own fire extinguisher (but who really has time for that). By the way I only put the video because the kid is fat, and fat people make me laugh.

So there you have it, five uses for baking soda. So go buy a bunch. Do it now!

Germany Is A Social Graveyard

May 28, 2013 | by BlickMang | Link | Original Link

To understand German culture is to understand history. Splintered by linguistic differences and the geopolitical influences of neighboring empires, Germany only emerged as a united country shortly before World War I. The powerful city-states of Bavaria, Prussia, Westphalia, and the Hanseatic north loosely coalesced, lacking the social homogeny of rival regional powers (e.g. England or France) and resulting in a patchwork of regional dialects, cultures, and values.

The contemporary cultural implications are vast and profound; following defeats in both World Wars and the political ramifications of communist and fascist governments, the historic cultural "German coldness" became even more deeply entrenched during the 1950's and 1960's, particularly in former East Germany. While some regions of Germany emerged largely untouched by this political ice age (e.g. Bavaria), the average German inherited a culture of social isolation, hesitant and reluctant to welcome strangers into existing social circles.

The castrated man

The defeat of Nazi Germany and subsequent division of East and West Germany played the largest role in shaping contemporary German culture. The "denazification" process implemented by the Western allies stripped the German male population of the masculinity predominant in the U.S. or United Kingdom. The primal male urge to master oneself physically and spiritually and assert this dominance over others to achieve success is no longer relevant to the German man, and is vehemently opposed by the society in which he lives. He is passive, uncompetitive, lacks physical and mental willpower, and is unwilling to aggressively pursue career goals or fulfill sexual desires. Deviance from this mentality is largely viewed as a return to the masculine nationalistic ideologies responsible for World War II and the Holocaust.

In short, describing the average German man as a “beta” would be an enormous compliment. German women overwhelmingly reject signs of masculinity and have lowered their standards as a result. Should you choose to travel or live in this social graveyard, accept this, and use this to your advantage while preparing game strategies.

“Americans are peaches, Germans are coconuts”

As an American traveling or living in Germany, adjust your expectations accordingly. Do not expect to be welcomed with open arms into unfamiliar social circles. Do not expect to be greeted warmly when approaching a girl, as you will be treated with apathy at best, open hostility at worst. It takes a tremendous amount of effort to break the ice with someone new in Germany. As a result, the majority of people in Germany tend to socialize only with those they meet through prior introductions or through work.

As I once heard, “Americans are peaches, Germans are coconuts”. Germans make great long-term friends, but breaking the tough, outer shell is an enormous feat in itself. With all of their god-forsaken flaws, I have come to appreciate the softness and warmth of American women when approached for the first time.

Die deutsche Frau

The German woman is well-dressed, educated, and extremely aggressive in pursuing career goals, oftentimes outpacing her male counterparts by wide margins (with the help of radical affirmative action policies, of course). Neofeminism has taken a firm hold of Germany, and the attitudes of the female population reflect this “emancipation.”

Despite varying degrees of physical attractiveness depending on region, the typical German woman is bland and boring, completely lacking originality and flavor. Do not expect to laugh with a German girl or enjoy a home cooked meal. German women tend to look, act, and dress the exact same; if you’ve met one, chances are, you’ve met them all.

From my experience here, there are two types of women in Germany: club rats and office ghosts.

Loading…

The club rats are typically young students (18-25) and spend at least three days per week snorting amphetamines and taking home random Turks or Africans from clubs. Being an articulate, well-educated Westerner is not an advantage at all, even if you can speak the language fluently; neofeminism has convinced them they must prove they are not Nazis (a subconscious result of German post-war guilt) by sleeping with 10 off-the-boat immigrants per weekend. It's important to note, however, that being an American doesn't put you into this category. Avoid these women like the plague.

Office ghosts tend to be attractive, young professionals with tolerable personalities, yet are extremely difficult to find in a social setting outside of work. Practice your day game and head to the nearest Rewe grocery store (one of the more expensive stores, often frequented by young professionals) or book store. Keep in mind, this group still possesses a cold, skeptical, and distant personality when approached by a stranger, so keep your expectations low.

The only women generally worth pursuing in Germany are Eastern immigrants from Poland or Russia, or ERASMUS exchange students from Italy or Spain.

We've only screwed ourselves – the US Army and college students

The long-term ramifications of maintaining a fluctuating force of between 50,000 and 100,000 American soldiers (a large portion of which lacks cultural perspective and post-secondary education) in a European country has proven to be largely detrimental to our image and reputation in Germany. Drunk driving accidents and clashes with locals are frequent. Entire cities have been reshaped by American presence, and in most locations, we are neither respected nor welcomed. Southern Germany (including Munich) is most affected.

Additionally, an obnoxious, uncultured influx of college exchange students over the past 10 years (typically white knight betas from Wisconsin or Ohio) has reinforced this negative stereotype of Americans. You can find these ridiculously loud idiots making embarrassing approaches in clubs and bars, often early in the night (10-11 PM) leaving the local stock with a bad impression by the time they've consumed a few drinks.

It's worth noting in this context that the demise of the American man in Germany is largely a result of our own behavior while traveling abroad. Americans tend to be extremely loud, superficial, and display an arrogant unwillingness to adapt to new languages and cultures. It’s crucial to disprove these stereotypes in order to achieve social success in Germany – learn the language, lower the volume, and be respectful!

Why avoid Germany?

To summarize, modern German culture, saturated with coldness and a general unwillingness to welcome newcomers into existing social circles, makes traveling within the country and meeting new people significantly less enjoyable or rewarding compared to other European countries. A pervasive post-war guilt complex, radical feminism, and decades of far-left governance have resulted in the widely held subconscious belief that masculinity is a detriment to society and a return to the nationalistic tendencies that destroyed the country. The presence of hundreds of thousands of American soldiers and students means the American man is no longer a cultural rarity as in Eastern Europe, Italy, or Spain, but rather a loud, obnoxious nuisance worthy of nothing more than an eye roll and “tschüss”. We are stale bread.

Is it possible to make great friends and have enlightening experiences living or traveling in Germany? Absolutely – but don’t be fooled by the rumors of quality beer and blondes in “dirndel” dresses. Germany has become a social graveyard with only a few old cathedrals and soccer games worth visiting. Save your money, head to a country with more hospitable people and weather, and you won’t regret it.

Everything Is Transactional

Media and culture tell us that altruism is a high virtue. Using our precious time, money, and energy to benefit others without expectation of return is encouraged and praised in our society. Conversely, our culture emphasizes that a transactional exchange of value supposedly cheapens our obligation to serve others' interests above our own.

This leads to problems, because transactionality is part of human nature. We are collaborative entities as a species, but our individual survival instinct motivates us to get something out of each interaction. We are only offended by the idea that relationships are transactional because its public repudiation helps to control our behavior. By elevating altruism, our society controls our desires, our output, and our basest impulse to improve our standing. Ironically, the institutionalizing of altriusm leads to a welfare state that gives producers little incentive to create societal value.

Notice the concepts that are used to mask transactionality — "loyalty","faith", "devotion", "allegiance" — all describe one-sided interactions where a person is expected to provide value indefinitely without reciprocation. Companies expect your loyalty and but will fire you without a second thought if it helps their margins. Girlfriends want your faith and devotion, but are likely to dump you if something better comes along.

Loading...

Just as a great country cannot sustain itself as a one-sided welfare state, your personal and professional relationships cannot persist if both parties are not bringing something to the table. The happiest people I know embrace this concept, while some of the most miserable fail over and over to realize this ultimate truth. People will assert some higher purpose as a reason for their devotion to a failing cause, all the while allowing others to stomp on their interests and subjugate their lives.

I am perhaps more preoccupied with optimizing my life than most, but periodically I try to ask myself whether each relationship is adding value to my life. And am I adding enough value to maintain a fair exchange? There is, of course, the issue of transaction costs. A girl who previously made you very happy may start misbehaving, or your dream job may evolve into something less desirable. Because of your prior investment it makes sense to attempt to change the circumstances before ending the interaction wholesale. Ultimately, though, most of us are leading the lives of our choosing. If we are being taken advantage of, it is because we are allowing it to happen.

Is this "cold" or "calculating"? Perhaps by the standards of our PC-obsessed nanny state. But I'd rather acknowledge human nature and make it work to my advantage than ignore it and allow other people to control my life. Provide me with value and I will do the same. Cease to do so, and we will end the interaction. It is better to be a mercenary than a pushover.

5 Bachelor Kitchen Essentials

Whether you live by yourself in baller crib, or with six other dudes in a shithole apartment in the ghetto, a decent working-kitchen—and some basic culinary skills to go with it—is an essential part of the bachelor lifestyle. Not only is being able to prepare quick, nutritious meals for yourself a time- and money-saving tactic, it's almost always a healthier alternative to daily restaurant eating. Not only that, next to a home bar, nothing is better for getting girls to your place and sealing the bang than being able to whip up interesting snacks and meals at home. It's one the classic moves that remains effective.

Regardless of your living situation, there are a few core, must-have items that enable you to prepare a wide array of good food for yourself and assemble impressive bites for your lady guests.

Cast-Iron Skillet

You'd be hard-pressed to find a more versatile and effective kitchen implement than the mighty cast-iron skillet. Iron is one of the best conductors of heat, making it perfect for anything from searing pork chops to sautéing vegetables. The best part is that, because it's solid metal, you can also throw it right in the oven to finish off steaks or as a make-shift baking sheet. A well cared-for cast-iron skillet can (and will) last more than a generation.

Cool Coffee-Making System

The days of the Mr. Coffee maker are over. One of the (few) things we can thank hipsters for is reminding us the value of a good cup of coffee. Grinding your own beans and running them through a pour-over funnel or a through a French press is worth the extra effort. Some people swear by the pour-over system—which requires special cone filters and a slow hot-water pour—but after testing it myself, I prefer the taste of the French press. In either case, I'm surprised at the number of overnight guests who comment on the quality of my morning coffee.

Steel-Bladed Knife and Cutting Board

Nothing makes cooking more frustrating than one of those cheap supermarket knives with the thin corrugated blades. Conversely, a good, sharp knife will make preparing even the most basic of meals into a joy. Every chef—no matter how amateur—should have a legitimate chef's knife which, with decent care, can last you over a decade. That means a triangle-shaped, 8-inch steel blade and a solid-feeling heft. Ideally, you should have that knife professionally sharpened every six months and keep it properly honed, with a honing steel, before every use. A decent cutting board—wood or bamboo—will ensure that blade stays sharp.

Enameled Dutch Oven

Any large pot to boil water and make soups is key. But, the great part about an enameled Dutch oven is that it gives you the added flexibility, like the cast-iron skillet, to throw it in the oven—enabling you to use it for making large roasts and other slow-cooked meals. A neat trick is to use the high walls of your Dutch oven to fry things that are liable to splash all over your clean kitchen.

Large Toaster Oven

One of the most underrated appliances in the kitchen is a quality toaster oven. Apart from toasting every imaginable form of bread (from bagels to garlic bread), it enables you to prepare and finish an assortment of full-fledged entrees, from pizzas to breaded chicken breasts. One of the most valuable uses for a good model is as a replacement for your microwave's reheating functions. Unlike the microwave, which leaves your food unevenly heated and soggy, a quality toaster oven (especially one with a "convection" feature) will leave your food crunchy and heated throughout. I can safely say that I use my toaster oven, for one thing or another, at least six days out of the week.

One of the great things about investing in your kitchen is that your items pay for themselves. You'll never regret dropping coin on these essentials.

My Grandmother, The Dodo

May 29, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

A few nights every month, I have the pleasure of experiencing something that would either require a time machine in modern day America, or a plane ticket and a passport. This magical event happens right in the heart of Los Angeles where all the negatives of today's western women run rampant. I am speaking about dinner at my grandmother's house.

My grandmother is the antithesis of what our feminist foes want every girl to be. She goes to the gym every day, despite being 70+ years old. She cooks massive delicious meals every time from scratch, feeding everyone in the family with plenty of leftovers. She cleans, takes care of her husband and never complains. She is what used to be the epitome of a housewife.

So what effect does this have? Let's take a few examples:

Grandfather:

He works everyday from 8am-6pm and comes home tired to his wife. But given her traditional ways, he absolutely and utterly loves her. He brings her flowers from time to time, and grandmother is genuinely excited every time. He tells her he loves her. There is no "beta" here, because this is the true nature of man and woman, the former the provider of security and the latter the provider of family. Traditional gender roles foster actual love.

The Female Offspring:

After every one of these dinners, my grandmother, her daughters and her daughters' daughters all get up and clean the table and do the dishes. The men go sit in the living room, have a drink and watch TV. My cousin, 24, knows how to actually make food and bake incredible desserts. Her Iphone wallpaper is that of a cow saying “moo” to remind her not to overeat. She despises men that want to know what her education and vocation are. She hates feminism. She seeks to be like her grandmother.

Loading...
The Male Offspring:

This includes myself and it should come as no surprise, we all fucking love these dinners. How can we not? Get fed and treated like kings. In turn, we’d do anything for grandma.

Good News / Bad News

The good news is there are pockets of women like this that still exist in America — trained and influenced by an earlier generation of women that have resisted the feminist movement and all the ill effects of westernization. The bad news is they are hard to find. Most are not even American, but immigrants from a different culture that can still shape the younger generation females in their group. And even if you do find them, they are sometimes hard to crack.

When I am at these dinners despite the fantastic satiety I inevitably feel I do get sad. I think about how this is very unlikely to happen for me in America. I start wondering if these brainwashed girls here realize that they are sacrificing their true happiness for some fabricated ideal of the independent female. But most of all I feel bad for any son I may eventually have — as by the time he will be dating, even these smaller sects of non-corrupted females will have died out and eventually become like the dodo…extinct.

Why Airlines Will Join The War On Fatties

May 30, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Recently, the airline Samoa Air elected to start charging passengers by the pound – their fares would be based on the sum of the weights of their body and their luggage. The airline's CEO Chris Langton defended the 'pay-as-you-weigh' pricing, saying "The industry has this concept that all people throughout the world are the same size… Aeroplanes always run on weight, irrespective of seats."

Samoa Air CEO Chris Langton

One of the biggest expenses of flying a plane is fuel, and the heavier the plane's cargo, the more fuel the plane burns to reach its destination. Charging passengers according to their weight means linking the price for serving them to the cost of flying them. Currently, airlines do not charge passengers according to their bodyweight. At most, they will insist that the largest passengers buy a second seat.

Imagine if every restaurant were an all you can eat buffet – restaurants would have to charge their patrons the average cost of serving them, plus some margin to make a profit. An upstart restaurant could gain an advantage, by say, charging the most gluttonous consumers more. That would lower the costs of serving everyone else, and allow them to charge those abstemious customers a lower price than the going rate, and thus attract more of them. Well, Samoa Air has done just that with its passengers, and it has the cash to prove it. Since implementing the policy, profits are up 20%, a spectacular figure considering how notoriously thin profit margins are in the airline industry.

The best part? Samoa Air is forcing its competitors into taking a loss by flying fatties for a flat rate. If a rival doesn't charge by weight, it will be hard or impossible to compete with Samoa Air and still make a profit, in the long run.

According to CBS, the price is about fifty cents a pound for a given route. Say the average passenger and his luggage is 200 lbs, for a total ticket price of $100 on Samoa Air, as well as its rival airlines. Passengers under 200 lbs will fly with Samoa Air to save money, while their weightier peers will go with its rivals. As rival airlines cater to heavier and heavier passengers, their planes will burn up more fuel on each flight, raising costs. Ticket prices will have to be raised, driving more passengers to Samoa Air. It becomes a sort of vicious cycle of adverse selection that ends in bankruptcy or aping Samoa Air and making customers pay by weight. Perhaps a few customers will pay for the privilege of not disclosing their weight initially. But when they board the flight and see themselves surrounded by the morbidly obese, they may suddenly change their minds…

More so than almost any other consumer product, customers choose airlines based on the fare price alone. And, when they choose an airline, they are comparing fare prices among all the major providers available. An airline with prices consistently above its peers may find it hard to attract passengers. Conversely, being just a few dollars cheaper than one's peers can make for a massive advantage. This explains why policy changes like charging for checked luggage have swept the industry so quickly. Faced with a rival with lower costs and lower ticket prices, and customers who only care about price, an airline has no choice but to do whatever is necessary to get its costs and prices down enough to match those of its rivals.

Loading…
With fuel such a major expense for airlines, it seems inevitable that once one major airline implements such a policy, its rivals will be forced to follow suit. Read comments on the Samoa Air story, and you will find plenty of people who are happy to 'pay by weight.' Just days before Samoa Air made this announcement, Norwegian economist Bharat Bhatta published a study saying paying by weight makes sense.

Weighing Passengers Saves Lives

In 2003, a plane crashed and all 19 of its passengers and its two pilots died, partly because the weight of the passengers was hundreds of pounds beyond the plane's capacity. They had used Federal Aviation Administration (FAA)-approved passenger weight estimates, which turned out be twenty pounds short of the passenger's actual average weight. In the aftermath of the crash, the National Transportation Safety Board recommended that small airplanes measure passenger weights before flight, but most still opt otherwise.

Unless fat apologists enlist governments to specifically ban the practice of charging by weight, it is only a matter of time until airlines implement it on a mass scale.

Players Club™ Premium Seating

While I'm on the topic, I might as well offer airlines another idea for increasing profits. Airplane seating is like playing roulette where you can only bet on red, but the ball only lands on black. Despite flying dozens of times, I've never had a bangable girl sit next to me. When a girl's flying, there's a ~50% chance she's going somewhere besides home, which means, conservatively, she's 500% more DTF than usual. Even if she's not, you've got a solid opportunity to lay some game sporadically throughout the flight. Even a Goldstein like me will pony up for that.

With airlines already asking for your birth date, weight and possibly height, there are tons of options for recouping a little of the dough lost from flying all those fat passengers. Sell the chance to sit next to a babe on the flight. You already have enough info to make a good guess as to who they are. Make it a sliding scale, so that the horndogs who can pay more, typically older men, are charged more for the privilege.

Hell, we're all such niggards we'd sell our own nephew to save a few bucks on airfares – tell young slim female passengers they'll get free cocktails if they sign in through Facebook. When a man signs up for Players Club™ Premium Seating, he sees photos of all the girls who signed up through Facebook, and bids for the chance to sit next to the woman of his choice. With the risk of getting 'Secret Internet Fattie'd reduced to nil, men will shell out. Maybe you'd even upgrade the dimes to first class, free of charge, just to get some tycoon to drop some coin for her presence. Meanwhile, she's getting liquored up, to the delight of the man now next to her.

If it became popular enough, airlines would compete to get babes in their seats. That means lower airfares for the girls, even to the point of being free. Look sexy and score a free ticket on your next ~~hoedown~~ vacation to Vegas? I can't think of a better incentive for the women of the West to slim down and doll up. With babes shedding pounds to score free seats, carbon emissions from flying would decline. Even Captain Planet would get behind this – it's a win-win-win-win. On the busy routes, entire planes could be players and babes. The glamor of aviation of days past is due for a comeback.

How Many Failures Before You Give Up?

May 30, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

How many times do you fail at something before you give up? How many flops before you throw in the towel out of frustration, declaring success impossible or rationalizing the results as inadequate? 1? 100? 10 000?

Truth is, it's not that difficult to make failure impossible. Let's make two assumptions about your method:

First: you are constantly altering your approach. You never stop testing modifications, incorporating only the changes that show improvements in your results and discarding those that don't.

Second: you don't stop until you reach your goal. This includes ignoring feelings of discomfort or distractions.

If you want something, and apply those two principles, success is inevitable. It is literally impossible that you don't reach your goal. Maybe it takes a long time or requires a lot of sacrifice* but, in the end, you will have what you want. Throw enough objects in a lake and you won't need a bridge.

Usually, the first point is not what causes a dream to be unfulfilled. Most people are smart enough to stop bashing their head against a wall after the first few tries and look for a way around. It is actually the second reason that is far and away the more common reason people fail.

Think about the last time you gave up on something. It was for one of the following reasons:

a. You weren't pursuing something YOU really wanted

There are all kinds of reasons you might have been doing this, such as to fulfill someone else's expectations. You don't want to go to law school, but both your parents did, so you submit a half-assed application to get them off your back.

Loading...

b. You were afraid to succeed

A lot of people are unconsciously afraid to succeed and so keep themselves in a state of failure. You might not want to alienate yourself from your current friends by earning twice their income, so you don't apply for a fantastic job opportunity you know you are qualified for.

From now on, stop wasting your time and energy on things you won't succeed at. Before you declare yourself committed to a new goal, consider your personal motivation for the outcome and any reasons you might self-sabotage. If you find anomalies, either handle them first or pursue something else. Whether you spend some time accepting that travelling the world will harm the relationships you have at home or decide friends and family are too important to leave behind, either is preferable to investing your valuable resources (time, money, energy) in an attempt to become location independent that is doomed from the outset.

Chase dreams that YOU believe in, and will go the distance for. It's foolhardy to do otherwise. If you're prepared to invest enough to fail once, commit to failing as many times as necessary until you succeed.

There are ways to optimize your approach and make success quicker or easier, but those are articles for another time.*

4 Bangs In 30 Hours

May 30, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Memorial Day Weekend in Vegas is Slut Central and this past weekend confirmed my well-known theory: If you want to rack up notches and quick, then head to Vegas, because it will not let you down. I decided to keep track of what happened this past weekend, because my trips to Vegas are generally a blast and this one was no exception.

Here's a look at what 30hrs in Vegas can be like, if you go all out and don't give a fk.

Saturday 11:47PM

My buddy, his girlfriend and myself are pulled off on the side of the highway at a rest stop for semi-trucks. The trunk and all four doors are open and the only thing missing is Highway Patrol searching the car. My buddy's girlfriend is in tears as she searches under the seats and tears through the glove box, almost ripping the compartment door off feverishly searching for her missing wallet. I roll my eyes and scan the desert. It's ominous and dark and looks like the Wrong Turn movie people are about to come running out of the darkness to kill us. Fk this. My cock is ready for Vegas. *B*tch how do you lose your wallet??*

The wallet is gone and apparently, after a quick phone call, we discover that it's sitting in a safe at the restaurant back in LA where we had previously stuffed our faces. Double fk. I had originally planned on flying with a client by private jet, but he bailed on the weekend last minute. Dammit.

Sunday 12:32AM

I've just been dropped off at the Veer Towers in Vegas. The Veer towers are luxury apartments adjacent to the Aria Hotel and Casino. My buddy and his girlfriend have to return to LA immediately to retrieve her wallet with her IDs and money it in. I would have rather had my fingernails pulled out, then sit in the car for another 4 hours careening through the dark with her wails of anguish penetrating my ears like fingernails on a chalkboard. Plus, it's Saturday night in Vegas and the party is alive and well. Problem is, no one's picking up the phone.

I try calling my friend at the Veer towers to come down. He's at XS nightclub already smashed and I don't have the heart to demand he come let me into his apt. I'm a beast; I'll figure this out. I call a girl I've been pipelining who I met three weeks ago in Vegas.

Me: "Where are you? I'm stranded and needed a fucking drink an hour ago"

Her: "I'm at RedRock"

Me: "RedRock? What the hell you doing out there?" (RedRock is a Hotel/Casino about 30 minutes from the Strip)

Her: "I'm drunk, come here"

Me: “Fuck..that’s full of white-trash and it’s a $60 cab ride”

Her: “I’m horny and need to fuck”

Me: “See you in 25 minutes”

Sunday 1:38AM

After waiting in a cab line at Aria for almost 30 minutes, I take a cab to RedRock. I was on the verge of choking the cabbie out, because he thought it would be cute to take the long route. Vegas cabbies are notorious for taking advantage of perceived tourists. I flashed my ‘locals card’ and he promptly apologized and changed course.

I arrive at RedRock and call the Pipelined Slut.

Me: “Here in the lobby, where you at?”

Her: “By the food court”

I walk over to the food court. No Pipelined Slut.

Me: “Um I’m standing here and I don’t see your ass…”

Her: “OMG!!! I’m so sorry I’m at Fill in the blank shitty hotel in North Las Vegas”

Me: “I’m going to choke you out. Is this a joke??”

Her: “I’m sorry!!! Just come here…”

Me: “No. Where do you live? I’ll meet you there”

Her: “Blah Blah address”

Me: “Better be there or I’m going to blacklist your ass from every club in Vegas and La for you being a time-wasting bitch”

Sunday 2:12AM

$47 more and I step out of the cab ready to choke someone out once again. Not a good start to this weekend. I need a drink and some fresh pussy and in that order. She’s standing outside of her apartment looking better than I remember. I had met her weeks prior, but it was a quick number close and then moving on. She's petite, maybe 100lbs, with big brown eyes and a sexy smile. A solid 8. The best part is: she's drunk and horny. I pour a drink of her cheap vodka straight with a couple ice cubes. Down it goes. Two more and I'm feeling a tad better.

Quick to work: take her shirt off and boom her knees hit the floor choking on my cock while staring up at me with her big brown slut eyes.

Me: Ahhh…guess the cab rides weren't too bad…

I go to town pounding her pussy with the frustration of being in a car and cabs for far too many hours. She took it like a champ and seemingly enjoyed the cum I sprayed like the Bellagio Fountains all over her face. I put her into her bed and tucked her in. I know that sounds weird, but girls enjoy being tucked into bed; at least the non-feminist women do. The man-hating women who generally do not enjoy Vegas, because they are fat and wear sandals are perfect for staying at Circus Circus, where the Parking Lot Pimps would love to 'pick-up' a chick pushing 250lbs with a face like an old used Goodyear Tire left out in the sun for 3 years.

First one down, now for another one…During the cab rides I was multi-tasking and texting with ANOTHER Pipelined Girl, a very cute Rhianna look-a-like cocktail waitress I had not banged yet. She knew I was coming in town and was eager to 'hang-out'. Sure sweetie you just want to 'hang out' at 3am. Slam-dunk.

Sunday 4:07AM

I text Pipelined Girl #2 the address of Pipelined Girl #1 and she came to get me. Girl #1 was sleeping peacefully as I gathered my luggage and slipped out of her apartment. I was tired but the scent of fresh pussy woke me up like coffee to a busy office worker. Game Time.

Sunday 5:17AM

Pipelined Girl #2 had a rocking body with a perfect bubble ass that she knew how to work and for you ranking types also a 8, maybe even a 8.5. I wasted no time in banging her and being done. When I'm in Vegas I'm not going for performance; it's solely get my pleasure and keep moving. I was in and out of her 22 years old pussy in 24 minutes. I needed to be at Wet Republic at 11:30AM to host so getting a lot of sleep wasn't going to happen but I was going to try.

Sunday 11:15AM

MGM Hotel, Wet Republic entrance. Five of my LA girls are waiting in the lobby ready to rock and roll a Vegas Pool Party. One tall gorgeous blonde, one very cute asian with fake tits, a cute petite persian girl, one smoking hot latina girl, and one white girl with massive tits that were causing men to walk into each other staring. Lets gooo!

I walk past the PACKS of people trying to get into Wet Republic for Calvin Harris, motion one of my buddies and magically VIP Wristbands appear.

Sunday 11:17AM

We’re in. Nothing like walking past literally hundreds of people with 5 pretty girls in tow all linked up holding hands. Have fun suckers. To get in now, it’s AT LEAST $100 per person cover and we didn’t pay.

The crowd is popping off and it’s time to get my drink on. I meet my two table clients, who are young investment banker types ready to get smashed and make memories. We post up at their table and the fun starts.

Sunday 3:16PM

I’m smashed. One of my clients is walking around with an Ace of Spades bottle pouring it in girls’ mouths. I can’t see straight. Is he holding one or 2 bottles? Damn I need water.

Sunday 4:40PM

I have no clue where I am. I'm in a town car I believe, with a group of people I've never met, but beside me appears to be an attractive blonde jabbering about politics. Wait, did she just say she lives in DC? She did. Oh fuck.

We get up to her room and there's an after-party going on. I take her in the bathroom to get busy. Her shirt comes off and her cute perky tits stare at me as though they are watching me.

Plop. FUCK. I just dropped my iPhone in the toilet.

Apparently the DC Curse is real.

Fucking was the last thing on my mind. My JOB depends on my phone being on. I grab my phone and bounce.

Sunday 7:33PM

Where the fuck am I?

I'm so drunk I literally have no idea where I am. I need to piss bad and I spot a bathroom door. Quick, unzip and piss. Ahhhhh so much better! Wait, is that Security running up to me??

Security: "What are you doing?"

Me: "I'm taking a piss, what's the problem?"

Security: "In the lobby?!"

Me: "Whatt?!"

Security: "Sir, you just pissed in a potted plant in the lobby of XYZ Hotel."

Me: "Oh."

Security: "Step outside with us."

Sunday 8:03PM

After 30 minutes of threats to be arrested for Public Nudity etc, I'm let go. I can be the most humble, kiss-ass known to man-kind when it comes to Law Enforcement and I went all out apologizing and telling them I had a bladder problem where I had to urinate and couldn't hold it in. Kind of like Narcolepsy, but for my bladder. They bought it.

Sunday 8:37PM

I'm in the elevator of XYZ place headed up to my room, when the doors open and lo and behold Future Ms. #3 is revealed and she's not a dime. In fact, she's a nickel. Literally, a 5 at best. I hang my head in shame at the thought that I banged this 52 year old woman, but yet I'm committed to telling you readers the truth, even when it's ugly.

This woman was from Texas and has a serious accent. She was maybe 30lbs overweight but she looked like she stepped out of the late 80′s. I put my arm around her neck, as I was in full cave-man zone, and proceeded to tell her to ‘Take a walk with me honey’. She obliged happily putting her flabby arm with her pudgy hands around my waist. I didn’t have the heart to insult my bed with her presence so I did the only thing proper to do in this situation and to such a lovely woman: I fucked her in the stairwell.

She tried to kiss me and I pushed her face away like a running back on the 30 yard line sprinting for the end zone. I pulled her pants down, bent her over and went to town.

I still don’t know why I banged this woman, the only thing I can think of is that she was in my ‘line of fire’ and when I get in the zone on a Pussy Hunt, every chick is fair game. Anyways, I made her ENTIRE life and she thanked me with tears in her eyes. I felt good because I had done my public service for the year. Moving on.

Sunday 10:15PM

I’m exhausted, still haven’t slept and my forehead is straining at the burden of holding my eyelids open. Sleep wasn’t an option because I had to be at Tao nightclub at 10:45pm to host my clients. Fuck. I should have slept instead of fucking that hag. Fuck public service.

I change into a suit, not even showering. Caveman Game has taken over and I don’t give a fuck in any regard. I spray some Burberry Brit all over and hope for the best. Still, the scent of the hag lingers.

Sunday 10:47PM

Where the fuck are my clients?? Scan the lobby, my eyes bouncing around landing on every cute chick with a tight ass and the sense to wear cute shoes. My standards are sky high now because I'm at 3 girls in less than 24 hours, the last one was a shame and now I want a dime or forget it.

"Hey Mr. Vegas!" I turn around and one of my clients grabs me in a bear hug and lifts me up. The bastard is 6'8″ and I want to rip his testicles off and toss them down the Venetian escalators for picking me up like that.

Sunday 10:56PM

We're in and seated at our table. It's a prime table because they had the sense to bribe the fuck out of me and in turn I made sure they got a great table. See how that works?

Monday 1:49AM

Kaskade is spinning and the joint is hopping with 90% of the crowd probably on drugs. I stay clean and instead sipped on a Vodka Tonic while looking for my next conquest. I had already pulled the "let's have a smoke" move on 3 different girls and moved them to the balcony. 3 cigs and 3 makeouts later and I still was not going to settle. The girls were very cute but I needed to redeem myself and offer a dime's pussy to my cock in penance for what I had done.

Bottles are flowing, my clients are happy and I'm still looking…

Monday 3:58AM

There she was. Walking up with a smile on her face was a legit 10. Tall, blonde, with a nice tan. Tits looked around a 34C and that ass….wow that ass…not far off from Jessica Biel's ass. She was walking by our table with a friend of hers, a very cute, tall brunette. It is on. I motioned for my client to look. I reached out and grabbed her hand and pulled her in close.

Me: "What's your name?"

Her: "Blah Blah"

Me: "Sit down and drink with me. Alcoholics are lonely."

Her: "Okay" (smiles)

All I know is that my act of public service by fucking the 52 yo woman was being repayed with the up–most in Karma. The dime now sitting on my lap was such a slam dunk I started to wonder if she was an escort…time to test her.

Me: "Where you staying?"

Her: "Luxor"

Me: "I'm sorry. Are you poor?"

Her: (laughing, hits my arm) "No! I'm an accountant"

Me: "Wow, your life sucks. Luxor and an accountant."

Her: "I'm actually a lot of FUN!"

Me: "Prove it. Let's go to your room."

Her: “Fine.”

Me: Nope. Not an escort. Thank you God.

Oops, what’s that in my throat coming up?!! I excuse myself and bolt for the bathroom, but not making it in time duck into the cock-tail waitresses station, throwing up into the garbage can. One of the cocktail waitresses and ‘friend’ of mine rubbed my back and laughed. Go to hell sweetheart, I’ve been drinking since Saturday night and it’s Monday morning!

Whew, much better. I feel sober actually and it only took throwing up 9 times. I head to the bathroom, gargle, grind up some mints like a crackhead on 6th and Los Angeles, spray some cologne and head back to the table. The dime is still a dime. Guess I have good buzzed judgement. I take her by the hand and lead her out to a cab.

The Pussy gods have smiled at me and blessed me with this perfect specimen of a female. Her ass was the gift that kept giving and I didn’t want to stop. Her lips are bee-stung and full. We fuck three times and each time I deposit a load somewhere strategically on her body: Ass, Tits and Face.

Time for sleep…ah nope. She wakes me up and says I have to go because somebody is coming back to the room. Fuck. Can I ever get rest??

I leave her room and pass a gentleman in the hall holding coffee and what appear to be a fresh Starbucks sandwich. He gives me a weird look and I smile and say, “Having fun in Vegas?” He mumbles something incoherent and I pause at the elevators. I see him knock on the door I just left.

Oops.

Monday 11:30AM

It starts all over again: Wet Republic for Deadmau5, followed by Hardwell at Hakkasan nightclub. I stay sober all day and pull nothing. It's ok, my sack is empty and I have no motivation left. I left all my motivation on the dime's face: Ms. Number 4.

Vegas, I shall return shortly to enjoy the women and fill my coffers. You'll always be there and will never let me down. Till next time.

To celebrate the launch of my Vegas Hangover Experience trips, I'm having a contest and one lucky winner will get a FREE 2 night trip to Vegas with me, showing you how to party in Vegas. Check it out: http://vegashangoverexperience.com/

5 Timeless Lessons From Miyamoto Musashi

May 31, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Miyamoto Musashi was born in 16th century feudal Japan. The exact year of his birth is debated. His accomplishments, however, are not.

At the age of 13 Musashi challenged an older samurai to a duel. His uncle, hearing the news, scurried to the agreed location and began to beg for his nephew's life.

Ignoring the commotion, Musashi engaged his opponent and knocked him from his feet, before beating him to death.

This victory marked the beginning of a violent but prosperous career, during which Musashi fought over 60 duels. He won all of them. Later in life, he wrote The Book of Five Rings, a text that details his tactics, philosophies, and strategies. The following five quotes are excerpts from this masterpiece. I deeply resonate with all of them.

Loading...

> 1. "There is nothing outside of yourself that can ever enable you to get better, richer, stronger, or smarter. Everything is within. Everything exists. Seek nothing outside of yourself."
> 2. "In battle, if you you make your opponent flinch, you have already won."
> 3. "Do not regret what you have done."
> 4. "All man are the same except for their belief in their own selves, regardless of what others may think of them."
> 5. "Do nothing which is of no use."

The values of self improvement, independence, forward-thinking, and productivity are all communicated through these passages. However, confidence and self-assurance undoubtedly stand out as Musashi's most prominent ideals. And I agree. The majority of problems people face today can be traced back to a lack of belief in one's self.

So heed these wise words, and proceed to crush your life, and your enemies – from within, but without regret.

How To Date Introverted Girls

June 1, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

One of my favorite types of girls is the bookish introvert. She’s usually mousey, waify, shy, and just a bit socially awkward. Sometimes she’ll look sad and other times she will look with wonderment out unto the world.

To me there are two types of introverted girls. The first is the internet attention whore who is shy and socially awkward. She will spend most of her time on tumblr accruing beta orbiters like there’s no tomorrow. The second type is the genuine introvert who might also be socially awkward, but prefers to live her life in the pages of a book. She still wants a man just like any other beautiful woman, but you have to approach her with the right mindset.

Where To Find Introverted Girls

As I said before, introverted girls tend to stay inside all day reading books or surfing the web. However, for some reason I notice them alone during the day much more frequently than other girls who are found walking around with a BFF gossiping about the latest drama.

You'll find introverted girls most frequently during the day time alone in thrift shops, book stores, art stores, grocery stores, and coffee shops. They'll be walking around by themselves intently browsing book shelves or sipping a warm latte in a coffee shop.

Introverted girls can also be found online. Every girl wants companionship and intimacy, but it is hard to meet members of the opposite sex if one doesn't put the required effort in. You can spot them most easily by their pictures. They will have a few selfies taken by their computer's webcam. Darker or faded colors, bad quality pictures, neutral expressions, and cats are all tell tale signs of an introverted girl.

One bonus is that they usually don't bother with myspace angles so your chances of meeting up with a secret internet fatty are slim. Introverted girls spend much of their time reading and listening to music so their profile will usually have a long list of various artists and authors they are in to. The 'self summary' section will be self-depreciating, "witty," or pretty straight forward.

How To Approach Introverted Girls

An indirect approach as described in Day Bang is the most successful route. Roosh talks about “scaring the cat” in Day Bang and introverted girls’ cats are extra sensitive so take care to have a very innocuous opener and a solid ramble. Make sure you keep an eye on their body language, introverted girls tend to be shy so she might not make lots of eye contact, but she could be doing something like facing you with her feet crossed to show interest. Try to keep it light, get her laughing, and grab her number. If she hasn’t excused herself and is keeping the conversation going, she is interested.

Where To Take Introverted Girls On A Date

For whatever reason, I’ve found a lot of introverted girls don’t like to drink a whole lot. Maybe they’re scared they’ll “come out of their shell” or will do something people may judge them for. Pick somewhere that will let her relax, somewhere without a lot of people walking about, nothing with really loud music (unless you know she likes a particular style); get some ice cream and walk down to the beach. Do something low key and have a few venues which you can go. I usually do 2-3 venues meeting somewhere in the middle of where we both live and traveling closer to my apartment with each venue change. Eventually I’ll head back to my place to “watch an episode of that show” or show her something interesting. Comfort and rapport is key when it comes to seducing introverted girls.

It might be hard to get her talking at first, but there are a bunch of things all introverted girls seem to like. They usually like “hipster/indie” music so check out Pitchfork for some trendy bands. For some reason all introverted girls like Wes Anderson movies, the X-files, and independent films. Twin Peaks, Amelie, Monty Python, Eternal Sunshine of the Spotless Mind etc. all seem to come up a lot as well. Introverted girls like post-modern literature such as Kurt Vonnegut or Joseph Heller (Catch 22). They also enjoy Haruki Murakami and The Hitchhiker's Guide to The Galaxy. Food and alcohol is another large talking point. Find something she likes and get her to open up about it.

And remember, always ask her "why" if she mentions a particular book or movie.

Coffee and pie anyone?

How To Have Sex With Introverted Girls

Introverted girls, like other girls, just want to be fucked by a confident and dominant man. Shyness will be a huge hurdle, but you need to focus on escalating at the right pace. For example I once took an introverted girl to a food truck near my place, we grabbed some ice cream after, but spent most of our time talking. In under an hour I had her back to my place to watch a TV show and she still wouldn't talk much or even look me in the eye. Fifteen minutes into the show I felt like I had to do something. Since she had followed my every move and was sitting on my bed, I knew she was interested so I made my move. I turned her head towards mine and kissed her. Shortly after we were having sex.

An introverted girl's body language might throw you off and make you think she's not interested, but if shes complying with any tests you give her, playfully hitting you, or back at your place, you can know for sure there's enough attraction and comfort to start kissing her.

One thing you should not do is assume she is an innocent nice girl who has never had sex. Don't try to psych yourself out saying "she won't have sex with me quickly, she's too shy." Introverted girls are just like any other girl, yes some do require a lot more comfort than others, but most of the time it is just easy enough to lead the interaction towards sex. If she is uncomfortable she will tell you so by saying “you’re moving too fast” or “I don’t even really know you”

Introverted girls make for great casual girlfriends. You can see them once a week and do low key activities like watching movies, seeing a band, or going on walks. There is a great upside in that you don’t really have to run over the top asshole game like you would on many girls you meet at night. Being an interesting, non-needy, and confident man is sometimes all it takes to seduce these women. Don’t mistake their shyness for disinterest and make sure you’re knowledgeable on the common artists they enjoy.

Why Rob Rhinehart Is An Idiot

June 1, 2013 | by Pill Scout | Link | Original Link

Rob Rhinehart has made waves in the media both online and offline recently for creating what he calls "Soylent."

> Rob found himself resenting the inordinate amount time it takes to fry an egg in the morning and decided something had to be done. Simplifying food as "nutrients required by the body to function" (which sounds totally bulimic, I know, but I promise it's not), Rob has come up with an odorless beige cocktail that he's named Soylent.

This powdered nutritional concoction is purported to contain all of the nutrients that are needed to sustain human life, and is the solution to the world's food-related woes.

This sounds fine and good and is actually quite an interesting experiment until you look at Rob's background and his inane reasons for creating this powder:

"It's environmentally friendly"

Nowhere has Rob Rhinehart explained where the nutritional sources of his Soylent product come from. For all anyone else knows, those nutrients came from food, thereby nullifying his points that Soylent is a way to live without food. Stuff doesn't just magically appear in a laboratory then poof you're teleported so you can purchase it in a store. It has to come from somewhere. Mankind's technology hasn't reached a point to where it can rearrange entire atoms in a cost-effective "green" way (while plants do this with the power of the sun). We have a long way to go.

And it’s also much worse for you too. You see, when people eat a balanced diet, they usually don’t have nutritional problems. Rob on the other hand already had a couple of hiccups a few months ago, one in which he suffered a minor sulfur deficiency. The previous critical nutrient he forgot was iron. He claims that this is just the process of experimentation, yet there is already talk of him rolling out his “experimental” product as if it were finally complete.

Judging by the amount of money they were pledged ($300,000+) there is clearly a demand for tube-fed World Of Warcraft fuel. I haven’t seen this much crowdfunding for something so silly since Anita Sarkeesian.

Rob’s problem is he is a software engineer, not a nutritionist or dietitian. While he is well-informed and educated enough to know the body needs certain nutrients, he’s applying the software development beta test phase to a product that is supposed to be a food substitute.

Personally, every time I see a software that’s in “beta test” stage I stay far away from it. Many software developers are embracing the Eternal Beta stage. Also, everyone hates betas in general; Rob is a huge one. If he had a woman cooking food for him, or if he could even cook for himself, he wouldn’t be complaining that he doesn’t eat well and doesn’t have time to cook, then this whole Soylent thing wouldn’t exist.

On another note, even the silly American FDA puts foods and drugs through extended trials before it is deemed as safe to eat. (The only way he’ll slip that one past them is if Soylent is labeled a “supplement.”) Note also that Rob has barely concocted this stuff in the beginning of the year and is already talking as if his food is the second coming of Christ. Total beta beta-testing.

“Foodies are reactionaries”

Rob’s criticized people who eat regular food as being “reactionary.” This appears to be a major case of projection, as Rob is harboring the same reactionary mentality that perpetuates diet fads and what led to this industrialized, genetically modified food mess that we have today.

Loading…
He thinks that his own industrialized food product is going to save the world, and that “new” and “different” are necessarily better. My opinion is that it’s going to make it more likely for us to live out our lives in hermetically-sealed boxes like something out of THX 1138 or 1984, and living off of Soylent and Soma pills to stave off thoughts of existential dread and suicide.

The guy’s already taking a buttload of daily nootropics, who’s to say this isn’t for that reason?

“Food is a hassle”

Rob thinks that food takes too much time to cook, and that his product will benefit everyone. Clearly he has never heard of Intermittent Fasting or eating one meal per day. I have experienced both and experienced the same subjectively “miraculous” benefits that he and his followers have reported, which leads me to believe that the Soylent experiment is nothing but a glorified juice fast.

Eating one meal a day and fasting for the rest doesn’t take long, it doesn’t take much food, and it doesn’t take a lot of time either. Do I need to buy some powder to live off of? No. I’m sure that the time it takes him to mix a large batch of bulk powder for a month of Soylent is the same amount of time it would take to prepare a month’s worth of meals to freeze and heat up later.

Who is to say that Rob’s powder is what I need? I’m trying to get stronger and smarter, not “smarter.” If you have a weak, frail software developer’s body like Rob’s, who is to say that your mind is strong? A weak body is a weak mind. Sustaining the minimum is to sustain mediocrity.

“We need to change food”

Really now? Humanity has lived off of food since forever, and it’s been doing relatively fine. When we started thinking we could put preservatives into it to make it last longer than it should, we started getting cancer and shit. With that mentality, Rob is feeding into the exact same issues his product hopes to correct. I think the nootropics and lack of proper nutrition is starting to cloud his thinking. How is more of the same supposed to be different or even superior?

I must admit though, Rob raises a great point: modern food is inefficient. But replacing one manufacturing process for another is an admission that he simply does not realize that the problems lie within the system’s own mentality. Would anyone in their right mind with a proper knowledge of modern science advocate genetically modified organisms? Hell no, GMO science is based on outmoded thinking that one gene = one protein. But that’s neither here nor there.

My totally biased conclusion

Soylent is a glorified supplement, not a legitimate food by any means. Just because you can theoretically live off of it doesn’t mean that you should. It gives you the bare minimum of nutrition, like a baby formula. Baby formula sucks even though a baby can technically live off of it. Everyone knows that human breast milk is superior to baby formula for babies, so why anyone would think that Rob’s Soylent baby powder is better for you than food or even a substitute is beyond me.

Soylent is by betas and for betas who want to become omegas that never have to leave the basement. I personally can’t take Rob’s assertions and silly sales pitches about his Soylent product 100% seriously, but, hey, everyone needs to root for their own team. All of the benefits that Rob's ardent cult followers have gained from Soylent are the same exact benefits that people receive from extended juice fasts. And while his idea is interesting to consider, Rob is a beta nerd and software developer with a clear bent for transhumanism and science fantasy. Nobody should be eating what he calls food.

The Art of Negotiation

June 2, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

So much ink has been spilled over the years in discussing negotiating that I was somewhat reluctant to add my thoughts to an already overcrowded marketplace of ideas. But in the end my recklessness got the better of me. And I thought I might commit some thoughts to paper in the hope that others may find them useful. My own experience has not necessarily caused me to reject what other writers on the subject have said; it is more that I think their thick books could be compressed into a few pages. At best.

I've always been irritated by pedantic types who love to make things more complicated than they need to be. We could easily dispense with these "experts" and their ponderous flow charts, Venn diagrams, CDs, glossy photos, and expensive seminars. Fundamentally stated, negotiation is two parties of opposing viewpoints, with each one trying to advance his or her own interest. Two wills in opposition, each seeking to maximize reward and minimize cost. My fundamental negotiation principles are not complicated, not convoluted, and not abstract. But they are based on my own years of experience in work and life. So here they are:

Armistice negotiations at the end of the Korean War, 1953.

1. Know What the Hell You Want.

Common sense, right? Wrong. When I've asked people this question ("What is your goal?") in negotiation settings, you would be surprised at how many of them cannot produce a meaningful answer. You can't just go in and "take a wait-and-see approach" when you are negotiating. You can't wing it. Unfortunately, we have become a society of people addicted to the sound of their own voices, a society hard-wired for instant problem resolution. A society of people who would rather babble on about bullshit for its own sake, than dig deep and solve real problems. So, ask yourself: do you want to solve problems, or would you rather fuck around? If the answer is that you'd rather fuck around, then do yourself a favor and go home.

2. Know What the Hell You're Talking About.

This cannot be stressed enough. Another way of stating this is that you need to be technically and tactically proficient in the subject under discussion. And I mean truly proficient. Whatever subject you are sitting down to negotiate, you'd better be supremely competent in your goddamn field. It is a weary platitude, but it is absolutely true that knowledge is power. There is no substitute for meticulous preparation. And you either have done the work, or you have not. You either have the knowledge, or you do not. And power, Stalin once told his ruthless Cheka director Felix Dzerzhinsky, "is the one part of the human condition that you can't fake."

Thorough, systematic preparation is the cornerstone of good success. It will breed confidence in you, and the ease of familiarity you have with the material will become evident to others. People can spot a fake or a bullshitter a mile away. Now you may think this is basic common sense…but it is not. Inevitably, people get sloppy and think they can bullshit their way through a subject.

3. Know Who the Hell You're Talking To.

You need to find out as much as you can about the person you're negotiating with. You need to divine their motivations, and what makes them tick. I know, I know, you say, "it's all common sense." Except it isn't. Because you're lazy, and you won't do the work. You will not. You'll sit there and say yeah, yeah, yeah, and then move onto some other subject, with the usual attention span of a ferret on a double espresso.

Know what the hell you want. And escalate.

4. Negotiate From A Position Of Strength.

In other words, you need to be holding some goddamn cards. If you go into a dialogue with nothing but your dick in your hand, the other side will sense it. Power and confidence radiate, and it comes from knowing that you have something to bludgeon the other side with. As a random example, if you are an attorney trying to settle a debt with a creditor, you're going to get a better result with a cash reserve to make a reduced lump sum offer with, rather than propose an extended payment plan. Money talks. In military scenarios, to give another example, the best negotiation results are attained when battlefield victories have been recently attained. Power creates its own momentum, and inscribes its own logic. The list of illustrative examples goes on and on.

Loading...

5. Have Something In Reserve.

Never play all your cards unless absolutely necessary. You need to have some resource that you can pull out when all else fails.

6. Don't Be An Asshole.

Negotiation is usually not war. (Well, sometimes!) The media perpetuates a certain stereotype that being a big-mouthed prick somehow equals strength and competence. American culture promotes this idea of the whip-cracking asshole who can get things done. In real life, it doesn't work this way. Douchebags are quickly sniffed out and generally are not successful in getting what they want. If you want to be successful in your negotiation, be courteous and respectful to the other side. Bottle the acid. Keep your feelings under control. Try to see things from their perspective. The sword should be brought out only when absolutely necessary, after other, gentler methods of persuasion have failed. Goodwill is a form of inclusion, in that you are opening yourself up to the world to allow it to experience your inner radiance. The gracious man gets stronger by implication.

When dealing with difficult people, do not get in the mosh pit and flail around with them. "When you wrestle with a pig", someone told me long ago, "all you get is dirty, and the pig don't learn shit". Always take the high road. Easier said than done, to be sure. But nevertheless true. You'll thank yourself for it later.

I'll end this post with a book recommendation. The best book I ever read about the art of negotiation is a long forgotten volume called How Communists Negotiate, written by Admiral C. Turner Joy. I have no idea why this book has been utterly forgotten. I first heard about the book when reading up on the Korean War, a conflict that I find fascinating. And don't be put off by the stodgy Cold War-sounding title. This is a truly entertaining, wonderfully instructive account of Joy's experiences as the leader of the UN armistice negotiating team at Kaesong and Panmunjom at the end of the war in 1953. It's available for free on Archive.org. The book recounts in detail the progress of the bitterly hostile negotiating experiences of the UN forces with China and North Korea. Among the many instructive anecdotes:

- How the enemy surrounded and threatened the UN team with weapons
- The endless one-upsmanship games played by both sides
- How the enemy tried to stack the agenda
- The various ways to stonewall an adversary
- How to wear down an adversary with invective and lies
- How at one point both sides simply glared at each other in hatred for hours
- How the armistice and battle lines were set, after endless deception and double-talk

Students of the art of negotiation (and history) will appreciate C. Turner Joy's book for its rare first-hand account of one of the most arduous negotiating experiences in the past century. And there is no better teacher than the crucible of history. I have visited Panmunjom, and believe me when I say it makes an impression. If you ever find yourself in Seoul (and I hope you do not), try to arrange a daytrip tour to the DMZ. It's the most sobering guided tour you'll ever make.

The Anatomy Of A False Sexual Harassment Accusation

June 2, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Clarence Thomas is a Supreme Court Justice. He is reviled in some circles because he is a black conservative. His opinions often track his conservative counterparts, like Antonin Scalia and John Roberts. Unlike other justices, he rarely speaks and even had a streak of seven years without asking a question from the bench. He did finally speak up in 2013, when he joked that a law degree from Yale might be proof of incompetence. Anita Hill was a professor at the University of Oklahoma, who worked with Thomas in the 1980's in Reagan's Department of Education and Reagan's EEOC.

Before we get into the controversy, let us compare Thomas' and Hill's lives. Clarence Thomas was born in Pin Point Georgia, a historically black community that was originally founded by freedman (freed slaves) after the Civil War. The town he grew up lacked a sewage system and paved roads. Further, his father left his mother when he was the tender age of two. He moved to live with his maternal grandparents, who lived in a more privileged community and was provided an opportunity for a real education. He then went to college and eventually enrolled in Yale Law School – an impressive feat.

He first worked in Missouri, then in DC for the Reagan administration, before being appointed to the federal bench by George H. W. Bush. After a couple years on the bench, Thurgood Marshall retired. Thomas was nominated to replace Marshall, another black man.

Loading…

Anita Hill had a similar childhood experience. She was the last child of 13, born to poor farmers in Arkansas. She was the typical female overachiever and attended Oklahoma State University, then Yale Law School. She began working for a local, prestigious law firm in DC. After a year, she became the attorney-adviser for Clarence Thomas. She worked for him for over three years, following him with his various appointments by Reagan. After her time with Thomas, she taught commercial paper and contracts at a couple of law schools before Thomas' nomination to the Supreme Court.

Thomas has self-described as having a "strong libertarian streak." Thomas' life is emblematic of that. He recognizes that racism hurts blacks, but he also understands that if he works hard, success can be had. He didn't make any excuses for himself. As for Anita Hill, the same can't be said. She is an avowed feminist and currently teaches women's studies and a Critical Race Theory class at Brandeis University. Both disciplines reinforce victimhood over empowerment.

Lead-up To The Nomination

H. W. Bush was looking to promote a black man to replace the esteemed Thurgood Marshall. To be sure, Thomas was on Bush' short list the year prior, when Bush decided to promote David Souter. However, the nomination was racially tinged from the outset. First, was the fact that Thomas graduated towards the middle of his class at Yale Law. Further, like anything else in life, it is what you do with your education that matters. Thomas had proven himself, time and again, to be very competent at lawyering.

Bush announced in July 1991 that he was going to appoint Thomas to the bench. For the rest of the summer, the Bush administration geared up for what they correctly perceived to be a tough nomination battle. Women's rights groups all summer prepared to battle the nomination; mostly because he made critical remarks about Roe v. Wade, which established a woman's right to abortion. This was in spite of that fact that he said he was undecided about the decision. However, feminists couldn't have predicted the gift they were given to topple his nomination.

Anita Hill's Testimony

A female at NPR leaked FBI documentation detailing Hill's allegations of sexual harassment. Women's rights groups and the media began to pressure her to testify. Indeed she did, in October 1991. She testified to a broad array of bizarre behavior on the part of Thomas. She described how he would comment on porn flicks he watched. She alleged he claimed to be well-endowed and was good in the bedroom. A famous claim of hers is that he approached her after he bought a Coke and asked, "Who put a pubic hair on my soda can?" Her testimony was reportedly viewed by over 20 million Americans when she testified.

Hill's commentary was questioned by the Senate Members on the board. Arlen Spector, then a Republican Senator from Pennsylvania, questioned her entire testimony – wondering aloud if it amounted to perjury. Democrats were worried about her credibility, as she was oddly specific about the incidents; later information would prove their fears rights. Two other women claimed to have been approached by Thomas. These two women never testified and it has never been resolved as to quite why.

Two of Thomas' assistants testified on his behalf. His personal assistant, who worked for him for six years, claimed to never have heard any sexist remarks or sexually harassing speech. Others testified to his adherence to professionalism and strict standards of propriety. Outside those two women who agreed with Hill, nobody testified against Thomas. All of his colleagues testified on his behalf.

Feminists – true to form – immediately began denouncing the proceedings as misogynistic and hateful. They claimed the questioning of Hill wasn't based on only belief in her truthfulness, but on men wanting to perpetuate the culture of sexual harassment. Remember, this was the zenith of feminism in America – just a couple years later many feminists cheered when Lorena Bobbitt chopped off her husband's penis.

Feminists stormed the capitol, decrying the sexist patriarchy that supported this man. They spewed all manner of hateful bile towards Thomas, some of it racially charged. Even some black feminists recall having a bad taste in their mouths after the fiasco, as they correctly perceived racism on the part of their sisters. Feminists used this incident to campaign against sexual harassment, penning screeds in major media outlets. Feminists claimed, after the fact, the media was against them, but how could that be the case? How can you claim the media is against you if they are publishing your opinions, giving you serious airtime and treating this allegation as very serious?

Cracks In Anita Hill's Allegations Appear

Damning evidence against Hill came out. Phone records showed that Thomas and Hill both exchanged numerous private phone calls, including after her employment with him. They also found hard evidence that they went on dates and often went to dinner, even after she left his employ. The Oyez Project at Chicago-Kent Law School – that religiously follows the Supreme Court – concluded there was no substantial evidence to back up Hill's claims. Further, some female commentators pointed out that women who are really harassed tend to distance themselves as far from their harasser as possible – they don't go to dinner with him regularly two years after leaving the job.

Thomas was given a chance to respond to the allegations. He smacked the hell out of the allegations, dropping some serious heat in his speech:

"This is not an opportunity to talk about difficult matters privately or in a closed environment. This is a circus. It's a national disgrace. And from my standpoint, as a black American, it is a high-tech lynching for uppity blacks who in any way deign to think for themselves, to do for themselves, to have different ideas, and it is a message that unless you kowtow to an old order, this is what will happen to you. You will be lynched, destroyed, caricatured by a committee of the U.S. Senate rather than hung from a tree."

The Confirmation & Aftermath

Thomas' nomination went forward to the whole of the Senate. The vote was 52-48 in his favor – by far the closest vote in over century on a Supreme Court nominee. He eventually was sworn in and currently sits on the Supreme Court to this day, consistently ranking as one the most respected Justices.

In the end, Thomas was and is a hardworking, self-made black man who arose from the backwards racism of the 1960's and 1970's to become one of the most erudite, perceptive and successful men of his generation. He also dealt with being a black conservative/libertarian his whole life; he stated that it was often tough to engage politically with fellow blacks. He came from nothing and became a symbol of the fading American Dream.

In the appointment of a lifetime, whomever does he see derailing his dreams? A black woman. A black woman he trusted, called and went to dinner with over the course of years, a black woman who helped him professionally. A black woman who falsely accused him of harassment at the time of his ascension to the Supreme Court – an institution that for most of American history pissed all over black people.

He proved that a black person can achieve greatness through the political and legal system. This sort of man is threatening to some – mainly women and some black men. It shows that real success and power can be achieved despite racism. Many people don't want to hear that nonsense. They want to be coddled and hear about how it somebody else's fault they aren't the person they want to be.

To a man like Clarence Thomas that is foolish. He would the last person to deny racism exists and hurts blacks. However, he believes in hard work and bettering himself. He's a self-made man who deserves accolades not accusations. Look at Anita Hill, a professor of law and women's studies at Brandeis University. All she does in her job is complain about how bad women have it in society – at a school funded primarily by men's tax dollars. The dollars that men like Thomas help create.

To this day, Anita Hill has never married and has no kids. She is 55 and has no hope of reproducing. Thomas is happily married with kids and is still hard at work on the Supreme Court.

I wonder who won this battle?

The Myth Of The Male Biological Clock

June 3, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

A couple of weeks back I wrote about the female biological clock and the futility of attempts to undermine or diminish its significance. Like it or not, the clock is here to stay, pathways around it are limited at best, and the forseeable future doesn't contain much hope for change.

In what I'm confident is a response to this immutable truth, several mainstream media outlets within the last year have worked to try and promote the existence of a male biological clock:

> It turns out that BOTH men and women are best suited, biologically speaking, to reproduce in their 20's and early 30's. After 35, both men and women are more likely to produce children with various kinds of developmental difficulties. Men face the same questions as women: can they afford to wait until their careers are settled before starting a family?

Here is why the notion of a male biological clock is, at best, extraordinarily misleading.

1. Male Fertility Persists Almost Indefinitely

Female fertility hits a proverbial brick wall in the 39-43 range. As noted last week, women undergoing fertility treatment at ages beyond that range are almost always forced to use donor eggs to conceive.

A man hits no such brick wall, which is why the application of the term “biological clock” is misleading. Women have a legitimate countdown to pay attention to. For men in general (some individuals will obviously be less fortunate), the clock essentially keeps running until death. Women see a halt to their fertility altogether, while men merely witness a slight increase in the complications associated with their fertility without it ever usually ceasing to exist. This is an important distinction willfully obscured by reports on this topic that attempt to make the female biological clock a unisexual construct.

This is also important when addressing the latter portions of the quote above:

> Men face the same questions as women: can they afford to wait until their careers are settled before starting a family?

The answer is yes. A man at 40 is not in a position comparable to a female at the same age. She is approaching a reproductive brick wall and may have to spend exorbitant amounts of money on fertility treatments to overcome this with no guarantee of success. He has no such brick wall to worry about. He can consider the fact that his sperm are more likely to produce a child with a condition like autism, but that risk (though close to twice as high as it was when he was a decade younger) is still VERY small:

> They found that men who had a daughter when they were 50 or older were 1.79 times more likely to have a grandchild with autism than a man who had a child when he was 20 to 24 years old. Men who had a son at 50 or later were 1.67 times more likely to have a grandchild with autism.
> “We know from previous studies that older paternal age is a risk factor for autism,” lead author Emma Frans, from Karolinska Institutet, said in a press release. “This study goes beyond that and suggests that older grandpaternal age is also a risk factor for autism, suggesting that risk factors for autism can build up through generations.”
> The overall risk is small, and the study was only observational, meaning > it did not prove that advanced age meant autistic grandchildren.

> "Although there was a statistically significant increase in the incidence of autism in families with older grandparents, it must be remembered that autism was still extremely infrequent even in families with the oldest grandparents," Dr. Andrew Adesman, chief of developmental and behavioral pediatrics at Steven & Alexandra Cohen Children's Medical Center of New York, in New Hyde Park, said to HealthDay. He was not involved in the study. "Thus, older parents and grandparents should not be unduly worried."

This particular study looked at men who reproduce at around 50, and concluded that the risk of autism in the resulting children, though statistically significant, was miniscule. Compare this to a woman at age 45 (1 in 30 risk of Down Syndrome) who takes a much more significant chance of having a child with a disorder, assuming she can get pregnant at all.

Loading...

The simple reality is that a man who has waited until 35 or 40 to settle his career and start a family is in a much better position than a woman at that age. He has no brick wall equivalent coming at him, his risk of producing a mentally/genetically ill child (or grandchild) is increased but still very small, and his sexual market value (assuming he has made a decent career and kept himself in shape) is generally going to be much higher than his female counterpart (read: he's going to have more numerous sexual options of higher average quality).

2. The consequences of advanced paternal age are not as severe as their maternal counterparts.

Nature.com, the primary source for the study regarding male fertility cited by the rest of the mainstream media, includes a couple of very crucial caveats to their results that are (unsurprisingly) left out of most mainstream articles on this topic:

> However, Mark Daly, a geneticist at Massachusetts General Hospital in Boston who studies autism, says that increasing paternal age is unlikely to account for all of the rise in autism prevalence. He notes that autism is highly heritable, but that most cases are not caused by a single new mutation — so there must be predisposing factors that are inherited from parents but are distinct from the new mutations occurring in sperm.
> Historical evidence suggests that older fathers are unlikely to augur a genetic meltdown. Throughout the seventeenth and eighteenth centuries, Icelandic men fathered children at much higher ages than they do today, averaging between 34 and 38. Moreover, genetic mutations are the basis for natural selection, Stefánsson points out. “You could argue what is bad for the next generation is good for the future of our species,” he says.

Though a correlation between paternal age and an increase in autism-spectrum disorders has been observed, the significance of it has not been fully determined. The evidence we do possess, however, indicates that this significance is not likely to be high. Maternal age still remains the more visible and prominent factor in child health, and will likely continue to be just that.

The mainstream media, of course, has told a different story, drawing many dramatic conclusions from a study that doesn’t seem to warrant them. Why have they done this? One such article on the topic was kind enough to make it obvious:

> I’d be lying if I didn’t admit that it’s also a small gift to imagine all the fathers out there who divorced a wife who was the mother of their autistic child and then moved on to start a new family with a younger, “safer” woman. While I don’t wish for anyone to have a child with all the difficulties that come with autism, if even a few of those dads read Wednesday’s news and felt a little heartburn with their morning coffee, I won’t lose too much sleep.

Simply put, the findings of this study are being blown up and out of proportion in order to tell women what they want to hear. Reality is irrelevant—schadenfreude is the order of the day.

The motivations behind the promotion of this idea are pretty obvious: mainstream media outlets know that women will be eager to read and buy into the notion that they are not alone in their fertility concerns and that men actually have no real advantage over them. The idea that they must contend with a limitation that men do not (a true biological clock) is uncomfortable to them and they naturally welcome any evidence to the contrary.

The truth is that while men do indeed have reproductive limitations, these limitations are fewer in number and of decidedly inferior severity relative to their female counterparts. The male of the species is not ageless, but his reproductive capacity is better suited for advanced age.

This is just the reality of human biology. Men enjoy vastly inferior sexual market value during the early portions of their lives relative to their female peers, who peak in their teens and early twenties. This is balanced by greater male sexual value at older ages, whereby men see a general increase in their appeal to the opposite sex as they enter their late-twenties and early thirties and also get to enjoy a larger reproductive window (extending essentially into old age).

No amount of rationalization and wishing will change this truth—men and women were simply not created equal in this regard, and should not be treated as such. The sooner this reality is accepted, the better.

The Art Of Meals On The Go

June 3, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Previously I explained why every man should cook, which you can read here. Today I figured I'd explain some tips for eating meals on the go. I still recommend that every man know how to cook, and I believe every man should be eating most of his meals from food cooked at home rather than purchased at a store or in a box. That being said, every man will find himself in a situation every now and then where he needs a quick meal and either hates everything in his house, or simply doesn't have time to make anything. Here are a few ways to eat decent semi-healthy options from regular places throughout the country.

Chipotle/Qdoba/Burracho's

Chipotle is king in the quick muscle meals world. Qdoba and Burracho's can be lumped in because they're the same concept but they're not as good. They're also in the semi-fast food category, which means you get sub restaurant quality food at a slightly slower and healthier pace than regular fast food. The key with these three restaurants are to follow this menu concept. Go with a burrito bowl, rice is acceptable. Add beans, fajita veggies, the meat of your choice, salsa (pico de gallo is the best option) and lettuce. Make sure you skip cheese, sour cream, and guacamole. Your total calorie intake should be 600 calories or less from this bowl while hitting the majority of necessary food groups to give yourself a balanced meal at a cheap price in a timely fashion.

McDonald's

McDonald's is like the bitch who gave your best friend herpes. She seems appealing but every man who sleeps with her still ends up with herpes. McDonald's is a last resort option, but you can make it work. The parfait's are safe if you throw out the granola topping, and side salad's are fine if you limit the amount of dressing you use to about 1/3rd of the packet they give you.

Everything else on the menu is equal in calories. The best example of this is a Big Mac versus the new Premium McWrap. A Crispy Chicken and Ranch Premium McWrap has 580 calories, 29 grams of fat, 55 grams of carbs, and 26 grams of protein. The “healthier” grilled version has 420 calories, 16 grams of fat, 41 grams of carbs and 30 grams of protein. A Big Mac has 550 calories, 29 grams of fat, 46 grams of carbs, and 25 grams of protein. The Big Mac is also the only one of those three that is sub 1000mg of sodium (barely). There’s three menu items which are extremely similar in nutrition content despite the fact that two are advertised as healthy alternatives. So warning, McDonald’s will not be safe.

Loading...

Subway

Thanks to Jared, every American now seems to believe that Subway is healthy and will help them lose weight. Wrong, Subway is just healthier than the alternative fast food restaurants, with the primary draw being cheap meals from processed junk. But if you are in an extreme pinch for time, you can make Subway work, and it’s way better than McDonalds. The key with Subway is to ignore half of what you thought you knew. Ignore the wheat bread at Subway and go for Italian. The Italian actually has less calories, and they are actually both made with enriched wheat flour (little known truthful fact). Stick to a six inch sub, load up on vegetables and skip on dressing. You can add to your meal with baked chips and water. I don’t recommend a foot-long for yourself because you’re eating processed garbage so the less you consume the better.

Resort to Salad

When in absolute doubt, resort to salad. Almost every quick restaurant option from BWW’s to McDonald’s does offer salads, so if you really can’t figure something out, that’s the best default option to resort to. It also takes the least amount of effort. You only need to remember two things with salads. Keep the chicken grilled, and keep the dressing on the side. Most restaurants include two-three hundred calories worth of dressing with their salads. Keeping it to the side will let you add significantly less. Keeping the chicken grilled keeps excess fat out of your salad. It might seem girly, but those ten minutes will disappear quickly once you spend an hour at the beach with six pack abs.

The biggest thing to eating on the go is watching what you consume and how much. I find myself in binds for time a lot so I've gotten use to making my options work. Some of my friends are convinced that my working out keeps weight in check but the truth is managing those meals on the go is what keeps it in check. I'd love guacamole, cheese, and sour cream on my a burrito bowl at Chipotle, but the fact is those three ingredients combined are almost as much as the rest of the burrito bowl. And remember your best option will always be to make your own meals as you can regularly get fresher ingredients for better nutrients, but if you do find yourself in a bind, you can make it work, you just can stuff your face till your full.

A Feminist Helps Men With Relationship Game

June 3, 2013 | by Samseau | Link | Original Link

> And Jacob served seven years for Rachel; and they seemed unto him but a few days, for the love he had for her.
> - Genesis 1:6-14

I hate the term "oneitis." Unrequited love needn't be so dreadful to think about. After all, "oneitis" is only bad if you have it. But it's good if her love is unrequited for you. So how can you as a man get babes to fall head over heels for you? You need to understand how the process of love works. You need to read Love and Limerence.

Published in 1979, Love and Limerence is one of the first American books to create a methodological study on the experience of being in love, and, to top it off, it was written by a feminist! Her name is Dorothy Tennov, and I suppose she represents one of those old-school breeds of feminists who weren't interested in emasculating men but instead gender parity. I don't think these kinds of feminists even exist anymore, so Love and Limerence is both interesting for its psychological breakdown of love and historical relevance of a time when feminism was not pure evil.

The word "limerence" is defined as the process that describes romantic love. According to Tennov, romantic love follows a common psychological process:

- Intrusive thinking about the object of your passionate desire (the limerent object or "LO"), who is a possible sexual partner.
- Acute longing for reciprocation.
- Dependency of mood on LO's actions, or more accurately, your interpretation of LO's actions with respect to the probability of reciprocation.
- Inability to react limerently to more than one person at a time (exceptions occur only when limerence is at low ebb — early on or in the last fading).
- Some fleeting and transient relief from unrequited limerent passion through vivid imagination of action by LO that means reciprocation.
- Fear of rejection and sometimes incapacitating but always unsettling shyness in LO's presence, especially in the beginning and whenever uncertainty strikes.
- Intensification through adversity (at least, up to a point).
- Acute sensitivity to any act or thought or condition that can be interpreted favorably, and an extraordinary ability to devise or invent “reasonable” explanations for why the neutrality that the disinterested observer might see is in fact a sign of hidden passion in the LO.

- An aching of the “heart” (a region in the center front of th e chest) when uncertainty is strong.
- Buoyancy (a feeling of walking on air) when reciprocation seems evident.
- A general intensity of feeling that leaves other concerns in the background.
- A remarkable ability to emphasize what is truly admirable in the LO and to avoid dwelling on the negative, even to respond with a compassion for the negative and render it, emotionally if not perceptually, in another positive attribute.

Does any of the above sound familiar to you, dear reader? The aching in the chest? The longing for a romantic partner who may or may not know about you? The sexual fantasies involving you saving her from some ill-happenstance which only reunites her in your arms (or you in his arms)? The ability to ignore all warning signs that a sexual partner is toxic and will destroy you? This is just limerence, the involuntary process that evolved to make sure the opposite sexes pair bonded enough to produce children and rear families. As if you thought you had free will. Nature has bigger plans for you. Your will means nothing.

The story of Romeo and Juliet is the iconic story of limerence; the conflict between the two families that serve as the catalyst to intensify the limerence until both lovers are ready to die for their love. Had the two families just let Romeo and Juliet bang, then their relationship would have merely run its course until 10 years later Romeo would think to himself, “What the hell was I thinking?”

Unrequited Love

There is perhaps nothing sadder than to watch a player hang up his game and retire into a life of matrimony. His single friends can only ask, “What the hell is he thinking?” But now you know — he’s been captured by the limerent process and nature now owns him. Short of murdering his object of affection, there is nothing you can do to save the person wrapped up in limerence. It is the unstoppable process that has grown humanity billions strong.

Thus, if you, the socially savvy man who desires to reverse-engineer nature’s machinations for his own ends, want to profit from the knowledge of limerence, I have two recommendations for you. First, read the book in its entirety so you understand the concept of limerence properly. It’s an easy read and the parts about how Freudian psychotherapists would seduce their female patients by making them feel vulnerable is hilarious.

Second, recognize the signs of limerence in girls that you bang, so that you’ll be able to guide them along in their limerence process until they are hopelessly in love with you. Give girls the fear and uncertainty they need and crave, mixed in with signs of affection and desire, while doing your best to keep a level head about the girl you are dating, so you’ll come out on top of the love game.

Just remember though – every girl you approach has the potential to take over your mind. You can do your best to avoid limerence, but it seems to me that even the strongest players succumb to love.

If you truly wish to master the game of love, then I recommend reading more from the father of relationship game, a man who developed a system to work limerence towards his own ends.

Surely You're Joking

June 4, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I just finished a book full of game advice, written by a keen social observer passionate about sharing his knowledge with others. The author raves about his travels in Brazil, and details the triumphs and missteps on his quest to live an interesting life. No, it wasn't A Dead Bat In Paraguay. It's "Surely You're Joking, Mr. Feynman," the memoirs of noted supergenius physicist and all around player-pimp of the 20th century Richard Feynman.

Feynman boasts a rare combination of superlative intellect, fascinating perspective on life, relatively good social skills, and a great sense of humor. Throughout his life Feynman learned to play samba music in Brazil, picked up showgirls in Vegas, became an expert lock-picker, got into bar fights, learned several languages, and became a commissioned portrait artist. Oh, and he also helped create the atomic bomb and is widely regarded as one of the most prolific geniuses of the 20th century. He shares his fascinating life experiences amidst the historical backdrop of World War II and the Manhattan Project at Los Alamos.

On true genius:

> "So I told Fermi I was doing this problem, and I started to describe the results. He said, "Wait, before you tell me the result, let me think. It's going to come out like this (he was right), and it's going to come out like this because of so and so. And there's a perfectly obvious explanation for this–" He was doing what I was supposed to be good at, ten times better. That was quite a lesson to me."

On his game awakening as a professor at Princeton:

> "That relieved me a great deal. It explained everything. I had been telling all the girls the simple-minded, stupid truth, and I never knew what the trouble was. It was perfectly obvious that I was being shunned by one girl after another when I did everything perfectly nice and natural and was polite, and answered the questions. Everything would look very pleasant, and then thwoop –it wouldn't work. I didn't understand it until this woman fortunately called me a damn liar. So then I tried to avoid all the questions, and it had the opposite effect: "Are you a freshman?"
> "Well, no."
> "Are you a graduate student?"
> "No."
> "What are you?"
> "I don't want to say."
> "Why won't you tell us what you are?"
> "I don't want to . . . –and they'd keep talking to me!

> Loading…
> I ended up with two girls over at my house and one of them told me that I really shouldn't feel uncomfortable about being a freshman; there were plenty of guys my age who were starting out in college, and it was really all right."

On the dissociation of intelligence and productivity:

> When I was at Princeton in the 1940s I could see what happened to those great minds at the Institute for Advanced Study, who had been specially selected for their tremendous brains and were now given this opportunity to sit in this lovely house by the woods there, with no classes to teach, with no obligations whatsoever. These poor bastards could now sit and think clearly all by themselves, OK? So they don't get any ideas for a while: They have every opportunity to do something, and they're not getting any ideas. I believe that in a situation like this a kind of guilt or depression worms inside of you, and you begin to worry about not getting any ideas. And nothing happens. Still no ideas come.

On conquering approach anxiety in Las Vegas:

> "They were all beautiful, and I just love beautiful girls. In fact, show girls were my real reason for liking Las Vegas so much. At first I was a little bit afraid: the girls were so beautiful, they had such a reputation, and so forth. I would try to meet them, and I'd choke a little bit when I talked. It was difficult at first, but gradually it got easier, and finally I had enough confidence that I wasn't afraid of anybody."

As a small awkward kid from Long Island who had to learn social skills piecemeal, Feynman is proof that working on one's personality trumps natural talent, and that high intelligence isn't a barrier to having tight game.

My only negative word about the memoir is that it is a bit disjointed in time, and occasionally explains technical topics at too great a length. I had to skim some of the dense math and physics passages, but these are infrequent. The occasional intense focus on these subjects also comes off as endearing, since it demonstrated Feynman's intense intellectual curiosity for nearly all subjects that crossed his path.

Books rarely make me laugh out loud; this one did. If there was ever a real-life inspiration for Dos Equis's "Most Interesting Man In The World," Feynman is it. It is highly recommended both for its entertainment value and for the lessons contained within.

What Effort Looks Like

I'll be the first to say I'm still far away from where I want to be in terms of success with women. In 2013, however I've noticed an uptick in my ability with women. Save two instances of pure novelty (smallest hands I've ever seen and an older MILF with a strange accent) the quality has been consistently of a higher nature — something that has not always been the case.

Recently I had some absurd success in a two-night stay in NYC and upon sharing the story with my friends, a few refused to believe I could have done what I did. After some thought I couldn't blame them, because they just heard about my results and not my efforts. If I told this story to myself four years ago, I also wouldn't believe it. To those friends of mine that don't see (or know) the psychosis by which I approach my infatuation with pursuing girls and the related effort that it requires, it does seem unbelievable.

I've been single since January 1, 2011. I discovered the red pill at that point and from then until now, I've put in a lot of effort into my so-called game. I went from stumbling my way into sex (aka drinking a ton), to figuring out how to actually pull girls in a calculated manner, to now working towards quality. But none of this is accidental and is the culmination of a lot of effort.

This article's point is nothing new. Everyone knows that practice makes perfect, you miss 100% of the shots you don't take, or whatever other trite motivational phrase you want to put in there. Everyone knows this because it's true. But instead of the abstract what about the details? What does the generic term "effort" look like actually translated into numbers? Here are some figures from time spent chasing girls during my peak:

- Going out at night, probably 3x a week to game new girls. About 6 hours each night (2 to shower/dress/predrink/commute, 4 at bar). 18 hours.
- Hungover recovery next day, minimum 3 hours per night out whether it's extra sleep or just being useless. 9 hours.
- Dates per week, vary from 1-3. So let's say 2, at 3 hours each (2.5 hour date, 30 min prep). 6 hours.
- Reading game related blogs and other material. Roughly 1 hour a day x 7 days. 7 hours.
- Discussing game/strategy with red pill friends. Roughly 20 minutes a day x 7 days. Round it to 2 hours.
- Text/calls to girls. Rough weekly total of 2 hours.
- Online pipelining. Roughly 2 hours per week.

So we have a estimated total of 46 hours per week, or nearly 2 full days per week. That's another fucking job. But there is absolutely no denying that all this time spent works, and works well. In 2011 I was just getting used to being single and the concept of game. I really started my "craze" in 2012 and in that year, I had sex with as many girls as I've had in my entire life previously.

Loading...

Then there are my efforts geared towards lifestyle which admittedly partly stem from my desire of higher quality girls. I have started working towards learning my fourth language. It is a great feeling to be talking to a girl that is only slightly interested in you, find out she is Russian, and switch to some basic Russian only to see her eyes light up with joy. Or to be on a date, and when discussing your travels, mention you can speak 4 languages and watch their perceived value of you rise right before your own eyes. But again it's not like one can just pick up Russian by throwing in some time here and there. Despite having my full-time job, I took night classes at a community college for an entire semester, attending classes for 3 hours twice a week, with another 3 hours of driving time per week. In addition I would listen to 30-minute Pimsleur lessons about 4 mornings a week. So in these 15 weeks, I spent 165 hours working towards learning Russian. Will this payoff? I don't know yet, but I know it will give me a lot more opportunities than if I did not put in this amount of time.

The craziest night of my life (perhaps for another post) happened because I was able to speak to a girl in Spanish when she rebuffed my English advances. Spanish I learned when I was younger and kept somewhat sharp over the years with practice.

Effort follows both cumulatively and in singularity too. Above are some examples of the benefits of cumulative effort. Then there comes the dedication and effort you put in on a nightly basis — or more directly stated — per bang. A few examples of what I've actually pulled off by not giving up:

- Meeting a girl at a bar (11:30pm), watching her bounce from guy to guy giving away her number, finding her at closing time, then driving all her friends to various places to get their cars, finally going back to her place only to have to help her walk her hermaphroditic dog (yes you read that correctly), coming back to see her neighbors drinking in the courtyard and having to join them for a bottle of wine, to finally banging her at 5am.
- After my second date of the night (first was horrible, second was a bang), having the energy to go out again. Getting declined at one club, walking back and seeing a girl smoking a cigarette and joining her. Finding out she was German, getting invited to join her and her father listening to live music, following them to a club after a random Rabbi invited us to join him, making out with her in the club watching my back because her father was drunk and the size of a lineman, her arguing with her father and eventually ditching him to come home with me. My night started at 8pm on the first date and ended at 8am the next day with the German.

With Effort Comes Failure

Nobody likes broadcasting their failures. A big reason why everyone should be weary of any PUA material that promises golden success with few failures. So while my friends or the public may see me succeeding here and there, they never see the nights where nothing happens. Last night, I walked around Vienna for 2 hours in the cold trying to find some place to go and finally giving in after realizing my only option was a group of chunksters sharing pizza and beer. A few weeks ago I went from bar to bar approaching multiple girls in Newport Beach only to walk home with a slice of cheese pizza and a massive hangover. A cute blonde recently told me it's not going to happen on a date after I tried to kiss her. After my friend brought back a girl from a Hollywood club and I didn't, I was woken up repeatedly hearing him have sex 5x in one night in the bedroom of our rented apartment as I was trying to sleep on a futon in the living room with a towel as my only source of covering. Failing happens, and it happens a lot.

But when you adopt the right mentality, and are willing to actually put in some substantial effort, you can do some things that will even you yourself can't believe you've done. It's pretty cool.

How Will We Know When the Bigotry is Over?

June 5, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

It is a Christmas tradition in Netherlands to paint your face black and act like a black Santa. Generally, even the local blacks don't take offense to that. They know it's done in good spirit and it isn't a big deal. Of course, it is not fair to compare Netherlands to the US, as they don't have our history of slavery and segregation on their own soil, but the bottom line is the same – the issue of race is not a sensitive topic over there, or at least not nearly as sensitive as it is here.

We can talk all we want about celebrating diversity, equality, and freedom. However, it is clear that behind all these big words and promising statements, we still have a long way to go toward true equality and true freedom from racial, religious, gender and other types of discrimination. I believe there is a simple and reliable way to know when the bigotry is truly over: when we stop being so damn (hyper)sensitive about those very issues, and we are able to make racist, sexist or gay jokes anywhere without offending anyone or feeling victimized by those words.

As of today – we are still very much behind in that department. On the contrary, it seems that even bringing up the very topic of race or religion makes you a racist. Even as much as citing objective statistics will backfire and will turn others against you. Imagine coming up to your black friend and telling him that according to official statistic some large percentage of people who are incarcerated are black. You will automatically be classified as a racist, even though you didn't express any opinions of your own and simply delivered objective data that you obtain from some other source. One of my Indian friends thought it was racist of one of his friends to ask him whether he plans to go back to India after he graduates from his masters program. What is so racist about that? It's not like he encouraged him to go back to his home country or in any way suggested that he wasn't welcome in the US.

These days, even saying something positive will turn you into one evil bigot. Try coming up to a female executive and telling her that you admire how she was able to get so high up in the corporate world without trying to behave or talk like a guy. She will likely freak out, completely misinterpret what you said and will twist what was supposed to be a compliment into a chauvinistic insult. I can almost hear the bullshit—"What do you mean acting like a man…. you don't think I can be powerful and confident and be woman at the same time? Do you want me to stay in the kitchen or something?"

One of my favorite jokes with the girls I am trying to flirt with is interrupting them right after they say "In my opinion," and telling them: "Hold on a second, you are about to state your opinion. I have to play close attention as I know it's going to be very important…" I may even pull out a notepad and pretend like I am about to write down what she is about to say, to tune up the sarcasm even higher. I may not be able to expect the whole nation to stop being uptight about gender and race issues overnight, but at least I know that if a girl responds to this laughing and playing along, instead of “I can’t believe you just said that!”, she is my kind of girl.

It will take at least a few decades from now for the current generation to die out and for the world to forget about slavery, holocaust, apartheid, feminism, and other genocides around the world. Until then, we will have to continue walking on eggshells, at least here in the US, when it comes to talking about race, gender, and religion, among other things.

3 Deadly Strategies To Use Against Cockblockers

June 5, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

We've all experienced it and it sucks. You've met a cute girl in a bar or club, things are escalating, you've even made out with her and then, boom! Her fat friend emerges out of nowhere like an iceberg to the Titantic, grabs her friend by the hand and whisks her away, while tossing back an insult somewhere along the lines of this, "Leave my friend alone!"

So how do you counter-attack this scenario that is inevitable? Here's 3 strategies that can be used in a bar, club or party.

You tell em sweetheart...

1. Befriend Them

I hate having to entertain annoying, ugly fat girls. Sometimes though, the one cockblocking you is actually cute. Despite her looks, you have to focus on the one you're trying to pull, while engaging the cockblocker. One way to do this is to befriend them. Even for the most callous, hateful bitch or asshole, showing friendliness can often defuse the situation. By fully engaging them and not trying to cut them out of the interaction between yourself and your 'target', you can overwhelm them into backing off. Example:

Target: I'm having sooo much fun!

You: As you should

(Cockblocker running up to Target)

Cockblocker: Oh my god, I've been looking everywhere for you, are you OK?!!!

You: Slow down there, what's your name?

Cockblocker: Um, Becky

You: Cute name. Let me tell you a secret.

(Leaning into the cockblocker to whisper in their ear. Girls LOVE secrets)

You: I'm digging your friend, any tips?

"But McQueen, that's BETA!" You're correct, it is, but not to the group. Remember, you're WHISPERING into the cockblock's ear. You're alpha bearing is not being dented because your target can't hear what you're saying. Think ultimate goal here: get into the pants of the girl. Utilize social charm and IQ to do that.

Cockblocker: She's awesome! She's my BEST friend! Ummm…she loves Twilight and likes ice cream

You: You're the best (wink)

Now addressing the group:

You: Let's go have a quick smoke (directed to your target)

Grab her hand and go. The cockblocker will feel as though she has bonded with you now and that her friend is in good hands. Skip the smoke and head for a taxi. It works. Try it.

2. Accuse Them

This one can be tricky and requires that you have built up significant rapport with the girl you're talking with, but deadly when done right. Every girl wants to think that she has the best interest of her girlfriends at heart and when you challenge that they can be quite defensive. Example:

You: (arm around your target's neck leaned back)

Her: You smell good

You: I know (wink)

(Cockblock barreling up stumbling into people with her rotound figure and spilling her drink on club patrons)

Cockblock: Where have you been?!

Her: Right here the whole time

Notice the mood of your target when the cockblock approaches and if it changes. Is she engaging of her cockblocking friend or does she noticeably stiffen up expecting what she's used to: Getting cockblocked herself.

You: Why wouldn't she be ok? (Smiling)

Cockblock: There's alot of creeps in the world!

You: It's your friend's lucky day because I stopped creeping yesterday (wink)

Her: (laughing) You're definitely not creepy

You: No shit.

Cockblock: Well I don't know you, so how do I know you're not a creep?

You: Your friend has excellent taste. Don't you trust her?

Cockblock: Umm well yea of course

You: Good. See you in a bit.

Take your girl by the hand and leave the vicinity. Lead and Be Bold. Never look back.

3. Ignore Them

This one is my favorite and is POWERFUL as f*ck when you are congruent in your body language and what you say. Essentially, you create a vibe that you are so ino tyour target when you approach her, that her cockblocking orbitors have no affect on you. You're THAT powerful. You're THAT badass. You're THAT alpha.

This entire interaction you're completely focused on your target addressing solely her.

(You approaching the group of 3 girls and 1 guy)

You: You know it's rude to stare without saying 'hello' right? (winking at Target)

Cockblocker: Excuse me, do we know you??

You: (still focused on target) Is she always so mean to cute guys?

Her: (Laughing) She's had a long day. I wasn't staring, but I did notice you

You: Likewise. I think your friends might jump me in a minute, lets grab a shot.

Her: Ok

You take her by the hand and walk away to the bar.

This may seem outlandish but A LOT of cockblockers will back the f*ck down when you show such dominance and the ability to be unfased by their stupidity.

Good luck trying these strategies out. More to come.

The Men’s Rights Movement Is No Place For Men

June 6, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Under the Soviet Union, a factory was never just a factory; it was a vital tool in the war on capitalist oppression. Every organ of society was repurposed to achieve a utopian society, as imagined by communism. The Soviet Union even manipulated science, as the case of Lysenkoism shows. You see something similar with today’s Men’s Rights Movement.

Take the military, for example. When the American military announced that it would start putting women in combat, Men’s Rights Advocates (MRAs) rejoiced. Letting women fight is stupid and dangerous for any number of reasons; women are markedly weaker than men, and even if they were held to the same standards, the number of women who would qualify be so few so as to not be worth it. The inevitable rise in allegations of sexual assault and rape among soldiers at war would more than counter any increase in the quality of recruits, if any actually occurred. As Dick Masterson says, “A woman* in the army always does more harm than good – and usually more troops than harm.”

One could cite countless more reasons, but to the MRA, that’s all irrelevant. To him, the military exists not to protect the nation, but to deliver gender equality. MRAs don’t care how effective the military is; to say that our men might get slaughtered on the battlefield because of MRA policies is not even a criticism – because the goal of the military would no longer be to defend our citizens, but to uproot traditional sex roles. It’ll all be worth it because it will mean treating women like men. And the military is but one example.

This is already happening with multiculturalism. The goal of a business is no longer to turn a profit, the end of a university is no longer to share the truth – the goal is everywhere always ‘celebrating diversity.’ There is a middle phase, where ideologues assure us that the new goals are at peace with the old ones – that say, multiculturalism won’t harm the academy’s search for truth. Eventually, the original, specific goals of these institutions are discarded outright, so that the ideology of the day can create ‘progress’ unimpeded. Once transformed, it will be demonstrably inferior at accomplishing the goal it had before – there will be more losses on the battlefield and more lies from the labia of academe. But that won’t be a problem, because success in the old realms of honor and truth will be irrelevant. Now, these organs of society exist to push the -ism of the day, whether that's communism, feminism or men's rights. Properly understood, men's rights is just another batty shade of utopian leftism.

As utopians, MRAs don't much care about any social institution for its own traditional role, but only insofar as it promotes 'gender equality.' Its goal is to remake every institution in society until androgyny of the sexes is attained and expected, and the 'oppression' of men has ceased. I've yet to meet any MRAs in person, so it's hard to understand exactly why they're so hostile to traditional sex roles. But they bear an uncanny resemblance to feminists because they resent the duties and limits that their sex imposes.

They are like fat chicks trying to redefine beauty to mean vile obesity. They are pariahs. Which would be fine, if they would simply leave everyone else alone, and carry on amongst themselves. Men Going Their Own Way (MGTOW) do exactly that, for which they have my respect. But like fat chicks and feminists, MRAs are too insecure for that; they desperately crave the wider society's approval. They can't bear to go off on their own while society writes them off. So they try to make pariahdom the new normal. The traditional forms of beauty and virtue become their sworn enemy.

For instance, there is a story posted on the website of the National Center For Men, of one man's disappointment that even hardcore feminists object to him wearing skirts, even as they only wear pants.

> But a man had better act and look like a man. He had better be steady, secure, a good provider and dressed in bifurcated clothing below the waist. A man in a skirt is a direct assault on society's views about masculinity and male responsibility. The image of him in that skirt seems so ridiculous to so many people because it penetrates deeply to the core of sexist prejudice against men.
> Loading...

This group had also defended a man in a prominent court case. I actually respect the author, for carrying out his beliefs to their logical conclusion, instead of hiding his true colors behind tiny changes. Feminism was supposed to free men and women from the expectations imposed by their sex, and it has succeeded, but mostly with women – no one bats an eye at a woman covered in tattoos, cursing freely, let alone one wearing pants; but if a straight man does anything remotely effeminate, his masculinity will come under question, especially at the hands of women. Even when women claim it's harmless, they refuse to see these men as worthy of sex, a rather damning fate from a Darwinian perspective. Men's rights wants to do for men what feminism did for women – make effeminacy as acceptable for men as mannishness is now for women.

The premier goal of MRA is to annihilate these notions that men should be masculine, and women should be feminine. MRAs and feminists are hostile to the idea that masculinity and femininity are desirable. The expectation that males carry themselves like men, strong and stoic, is a point of great irritation to them. Paul Elam, founder of the MRA website A Voice For Men, has said that if men were seen as inherently strong and dominant, males who lack these qualities would be seen as less worthy as men. And that that would be bigotry. To believe that men should be masculine and women should be feminine is ‘dangerous,’ according to Elam. Therefore, to say that men be confident and decisive, or that women be graceful and nurturing, is a sin.

Stony Brook University recently erected a men’s studies department, headed by Michael Kimmel, to the delight of MRAs. A little investigation reveals that Kimmel insists that more gender equality is the answer. The leaders of the men’s rights movement are little more than feminists – and this should come as no surprise to one who truly understands the movement. It’s not just one man wanting permission to wear skirts in public – it’s an entire movement based on discontent with being a man.

The Men’s Right’s Movement Lionizes Victimhood

Deep down, MRAs believe not only that men are victims, but that men can only advocate for their rights insofar as they are victims. Victimhood grants legitimacy. Plight makes right. Look at the issues dearest to MRAs, and you’ll find that stories of male victimhood dominate their discussions. Higher male suicide rates, male circumcision, men as rape victims, false rape accusations, divorce ‘theft,’ and men as victims of domestic violence.

Take that last one for example, a man who is beaten by his woman. Accepting responsibility for oneself is a cornerstone of masculinity; if a man is being abused and dominated against his will, by a woman that he himself has chosen, he has utterly failed as a man. He cannot protect himself, let alone his family or friends. Yet MRAs deify broken men like these, as the very icon of their movement. He who values strength disdains they that prize weakness. I have nothing but disgust for men who pride themselves on being victims; were the MRM to actually value manliness, instead of canonizing failures, it would be more popular. Most men don’t want to parade themselves as victims either.

Reject your sense of injury and the injury itself disappears – Marcus Aurelius

Elsewhere, they campaign for female-on-male rape to be recognized as a serious issue – an issue so marginal that everyone else writes them off as crazy for even bringing it up. To the feminist's claims that women are oppressed, the MRA replies, "hey, me too!" Just as feminists go apoplectic at the mention of sensible advice to help avoid getting raped, the MRA will become livid, if told that he can act to avert disaster.

MRAs Want You To Believe There's Nothing You Can Do

MRAs bleat so urgently, because they think they are powerless as individuals; only by collective action, ultimately by government fiat, can men be helped. He thinks that if he admits that he can take protective measures, some will say it was his fault when something does happen. So, he must deny that a man can do anything about these dangers. Man must be seen as a weak powerless victim, lest we minimize the challenges he faces.

Tell an MRA how to avoid false rape accusations and you'll just become one of his targets. You're ruining his narrative of man as helpless victim. Where the MRA retreats from challenge, the masculine man perseveres, to create the life he desires.

7 Brilliant Songs To Make Love To

June 6, 2013 | by George (3rd Millenium Men) | Link | Original Link

---

Below are my favourite songs to hookup to. Put them on your playlist the next time you're in the bedroom and watch the magic happen as they inspire sensuality…

1. Diva Mea

This is THE sexiest song EVER created. It is totally sensual and ethereal. Make sure that bass is up to bring out that loving. The whole album is worth getting, but this song reigns supreme.

2. Blackmill – Friend

A totally suave, smooth song. Absolutely beautiful.

3. Blackmill – Rain

Powerful beat which will inspire sexxyyy times.

4. Explosions in the Sky – Your Hand in Mine

Gives off a great atmosphere.

5. Ellie Goulding – Hanging On

Incredible beat. Make sure you listen to the version without Tinie Tempah, as the rap lyrics are not conducive to mood!

6. Lady Antebellum – Need You Now

The only mainstream song on the list, and I was hesitant about putting it in. However, from experience that beat and refrain work magic.

[image]

7. Lowland – Children (Orchestral Version)

A surreal and stunning 90s song that was a pioneering track of dream house. Another album worth getting.

Those are some of my favourites but I'm always open to more suggestions. Put yours below!

The Price Of The Taking The Red Pill

June 7, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

I've kept a journal for almost ten years. Unlike a girl's journal—which tends to ramble on about how she was feeling at a particular moment—mine is primarily a factual, narrative document. That's not to say it's icy and unfeeling, but that it's chiefly a record of my everyday life punctuated with the occasional rumination.

Writing in a journal is an exercise in deferred gratification. At the time, you see little value in writing stuff that's just happened. Events seem trivial and therefore pointless to record or, alternatively, so memorable that you swear you won't forget it. Both are false. I'm repeatedly shocked and entertained by my quotidian past—little details or entire events I forgot happened.

I'm also struck by the broader arc of my mental development. And I don't mean in an intellectual sense. I mean that—if you look at the big picture—I've become more red-pill with every passing year. Those early entries are astoundingly blue-pill, that is, subscribing to the myths foisted onto men about relationships, masculinity, and the nature of women by society. "Taking the red pill" is essentially rejecting those tenets as either obsolete relics of a halcyon past or outright lies told to us for sake of social control. In either case, I kind of miss that bluer-pill version of me. Life was simpler and neater for that guy, even if it was deluded.

The red-pill me, the man who stands before you, enjoys all of the benefits of having swallowed the red pill many times over. But, he also suffers the consequences—as does every man who's takes it.

Red-Pill Isolation

Literature like this website represents a minuscule fraction of the messaging available to men about lifestyle, relationships, and masculinity. Its readership is but a tiny minority of men in the West. Even when you account for the non-readers who harbor our sensibilities, red-pill men is small, and diminishing, group. This often results in an alone-in-a-crowded-room feeling for a lot of guys since, bereft of the type of male commiseration that was a matter of course a generation or two ago, we experience extended periods of isolation.

Loading...

Don't Enjoy Movies, TV Shows, Or Commercials As Much

An overwhelming amount of media today is geared toward women and beta males. Whatever side you take in the chicken-and-egg debate about whether the media is responsible for creating this milieu, or whether it's simply a product of the prevailing social currents, red-pill men are constantly bombarded with depictions of emasculated men, masculine women, and general male-bashing. Things that were once enjoyable, like Superbowl commercials, become cringe-worthy or infuriating. Things that were barely tolerable before, like chick flicks, become absolute torture.

Excitement About Girls Short-Lived Or Non-Existent

One of the first things to go is your affection and admiration for women. This is caused by a two-fold process. Learning about game (a key element of the red-pill universe) makes you increasingly successful with them. This success carries an attendant de-mystifying effect that renders you increasingly inured to the joys of their affections. Another, more insidious, force is learning about the true nature of women. The more you scratch off the innocent-girl veneer, the more you recognize women as inherently deceptive, manipulative, and selfish. Sure, you learn to exploit this to your benefit, but further the vicious downward spiral in the process.

You Have To Self-Censor

Despite your growing knowledge about the nature of relationships, women, and the world, you learn that it's best to keep your mouth quiet about it, lest you disturb the placid existence of your blue-pill neighbors or, god forbid, offend one of their female enablers. Most red-pill guys learn this lesson the hard way—trying to talk a sexless friend into the light or publicly slapping down delusional assertions from a vocal feminist. The resolute push-back, insults, and other social consequences are enough for them to say "fuck 'em" and keep to themselves.

Given a 100 chances, I would take the red pill 100 times. I think most guys on this side of the fence would do the exact same thing. But, like any major life revelation, you can't un-look behind that curtain.

Into The Wild

June 8, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

Into the Wild by Jon Krakauer is, among many things, the retelling and examination of the life of Chris McCandless. McCandless is viewed by some as the embodiment of youthful invincibility meeting its seemingly impossible demise, as the product of the negative feelings he harbors for his parents, or as an inspiring, yet naive vagabond. In my view he is all three.

The story begins at the end. Chris McCandless has become something more pure in his mind, something finally free of the constraints he felt his family and society placed upon him—he has become Alexander Supertramp. Alexander Supertramp, after hitchiking hundreds of miles, finally reaches the wilderness he has been lusting for all this time. After declining any support from the man who drove him he heads off into the unknown with minimal supplies. With the knowledge he has accumulated from a few books and a few years on the road, he hoped to survive the unforgiving Alaskan winter.

As any sane person could guess he ends up dead by his own unpreparedness. The author posits McCandless died of starvation induced by the poison he ingested after misidentifying a plant. While Chris had a handbook for identifying edible and non-edible plants, he did not have experience. He also did not come prepared with the supplies or knowledge he should have to survive in such harsh conditions. One of the most important things he left out of his pack was a map of the area. It is said that Chris wanted to experience nature in its purest form, to eschew the trappings of modern life and live off the land. In my opinion, he was just trying to shake the guilt of his own perceived privilege.

McCandless grew up in a nice suburban neighborhood. Son to a remarried father with previous kids, he was all around a pretty average guy. He worked hard, got good grades, and was accepted into Emory University where his escapes from reality became more frequent. He would go on long road trips in the summer time and one summer he went to the West coast where he discovered the truth: his father had been lying to him about his previous marriage. Chris had always been at odds with his father, but this discovery was the tipping point. He hated materialism and inequalities so he went to the inner city to feed the poor and talk with them. He hated that his father had a successful company and once worked for NASA so he studied the inequalities present in turmoil rich regions.

Loading...

Due to the hatred of the ideals his father embodied Chris set off to become the exact opposite. Instead of using his station in life to help those less fortunate than him, instead of using the gift of his education and his father's status to help right the inequalities he saw in the world, he set off on a narcissistic adventure to "find himself." Nonetheless, his travels are inspiring. Reading about his close calls, the friends he meets, and all of the beautiful scenery he experiences, one cannot help but want to go on their own adventure.

> So many people live within unhappy circumstances and yet will not take the initiative to change their situation because they are conditioned to a life of security, conformity, and conservatism, all of which may appear to give one peace of mind, but in reality nothing is more damaging to the adventurous spirit within a man than a secure future. The very basic core of a man's living spirit is his passion for adventure.

However, Chris' youthful idealism is far from reality. He refuses to insure his car as an act of rebellion, yet for a short while he complies with his supervisor at McDonald's. His car is flooded so he burns his money as a symbolic break from materialism, yet he works many jobs during his travels. Wishing to live purely off the land he goes unprepared into the wild, yet had he a map he would have been able to see just how close he really was to civilization. Just before dying Alexander Supertramp scrawls his epitaph under his real name — Christopher McCandless — on the inside of the bus he was using for shelter. Weeks later he is found by the infrequent travelers of the Stampede Trail.

If Into The Wild teaches us anything its that of realism in a world of idealism, one must see the forest for the tress to maintain a realistic manner of living. McCandless did everything in his power to escape the hate he had for his station in life. He eschewed the trappings of materialism and cultural bias, yet he perished in a relic of mankind, miles away from civilization.

> McCandless conveniently overlooked the fact that [Jack] London himself had spent just a single winter in the North and that he'd died by his own hand on his California estate at the age of forty, a fatuous drunk, obese and pathetic, maintaining a sedentary existence that bore scant resemblance to the ideals he espoused in print.

Stop Complaining About Your Job, Pussy!

June 8, 2013 | by TheCaptainPower | Link | Original Link

In the year 30,000 B.C, a lonely caveman wakes up shivering inside his cave dwelling.

As he takes a step outside to urinate, he is careful not to piss all over his legs considering his penis has fully retracted from the frozen temperature. As he looks down at his shriveled up manhood, he starts to contemplate how he will eat today. Besides some nuts and berries he has stored inside his cave, his family has run out of meat.

In several hours he will travel out into wilderness with just his trusty spear, and attempt to capture some game while dodging threats from deadly predators.

Life is difficult for our caveman:

- There are only two fresh water streams in his village. Unlike modern-day India, the cavemen designate one stream for shitting and washing out his anus, and the other one for drinking.

- At age 12 the caveman married his sister, and now they have 3 horrible looking children.
- He will suffer a brutal heart attack age 37 and die. He will be the oldest person in the village at his time of death.
- Eventually his family will be alerted of his death, and his body will be returned to his village.
- Unfortunately Jesus was not born yet, so the caveman's children will burn his body over a fire pit, and roasted "leg of dad" will be enjoyed by all.

Loading...
So let's hear your story….

- You were born in a nice air-conditioned hospital. Your parents drove you home in a vehicle run by gas, and the vehicle traveled on a nice paved road with electrical lights that provided clear vision.
- During your childhood your parents drove the vehicle powered by gas to the supermarket to purchase food, and you went to a beautiful elementary school with manicured lawns, running water, and heat.
- During your sophomore year of College, your 85-year-old grandfather died, and in his "will" he left you $50,000. Lucky this happened after Jesus, and your grandfather will be buried in a nice pine box in the dirt.
- Your cousin will receive a full scholarship to College just for hitting a green ball over a net with a racquet.

You eventually will attend a University, where you will drink gallons of beer, smoke marijuana on a daily basis, and chase pussy. After graduation you will eventually receive a job where you get paid while sitting in a chair.

- In the office you have free air conditioning, free heat, paid sick days, a 401K, health insurance, and you have to provide little to no physical effort to receive these benefits.
- You are paid so much money that in your free time you are able to travel the world, eat at fancy restaurants, gamble, and have sex with exotic women.

So unless you live in India, or you work for UPS in Detroit, there is no reason for anyone to be complaining about their job. Take advantage of your free time to get into shape, learn a new skill or hobby, and improve on yourself as a person. And most importantly,

Stop complaining about your job!

Single Mothers Should Be Held Accountable

June 9, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In 195 B.C., mobs of Roman women collected in the Forum and demanded the repeal of the Oppian Law of 215 B.C. This law had prohibited women from excessively adorning themselves with gold, wearing ostentatious dresses, or driving chariots. Cato the Elder, who had held the offices of quaestor and consul, warned his fellow men of the long-term consequences of giving in to the demands of the women. His words were uncannily accurate, and are worth quoting. He spoke to the men as follows:

> "If we had, each of us, upheld the rights and authority of the husband in our own households, we should not today have this trouble with our women. As things are now, our liberty of action, which has been annulled by female despotism at home, is crushed and trampled on here in the Forum….Remember all the regulations respecting women by which our ancestors curbed their license….If now you permit them to remove these restraints…and to put themselves on an equality with their husbands, do you imagine that you will be able to bear them? From the moment that they become your equals, they will be your masters." [Livy, Ab Urbe Condita, 34.1].

Note the last sentence. Have more prescient words ever been spoken regarding the female agenda? It is a lesson quite forgotten in modern America. Old Cato recognized that the nature of women is to use the idea of "equality" and such arguments as a smokescreen for their real ambition, which is supremacy. Supremacy over what? Over men, of course. And the ability to be unaccountable for anything they do as women.

Without a firm hand, feminine nature becomes destructive.

Nowhere is this truism more obvious today than in America, where women have used the mantras of "equality" and "fairness" to strip men of any remaining respect and authority they may once have had in the home, at work, and in popular culture. Women's goal, of course, has been to cherry-pick the best of both systems: to enjoy all the benefits of traditional female roles (enjoying the financial support and respect of men), while at the same time dodging any of the responsibilities that such a traditional role demanded (respecting men, child rearing, homemaking, etc).

In this hypocritical charade, played out unrelentingly for the past 40 years, women have been almost completely successful. Feminists have cannily enlisted government power in support of their cause: the state itself has become for them the surrogate man. Who needs a man in the role of provider when you can get the government to support your baby and pay your bills?

If feminists truly believed in equality, they would practice it. Equality means paying your way, taking your lumps in life without complaining, and accepting the consequences for your actions. Of course, women never do this. There are consequences for male misbehavior, of course, but not for female misbehavior, which is actually rewarded, enabled, and praised in American culture.

Imagine conducting a thought experiment in which feminist mantras were actually put to the test. Imagine if there were a way to see if women really believed their shrieking about their reproductive rights, bodies, empowerment, fairness, and all the rest. As it happens, we may now have the right conditions to conduct such a test. Last week, the international news site Al Jazeera English reported that a new law in China proposed to penalize women for having children out of wedlock. I quote from the report below:

Loading...

> "The plans, drawn up by family planning officials in Wuhan, the capital of Hubei province, would target women who "knowingly have children out of wedlock", according to a report in the Global Times newspaper.
> Unmarried mothers could be charged six times the annual per capita disposable income in Wuhan, a figure equivalent to about $26,000. Officials referred to the fines as "social compensation fees".

Chinese state media said the law would help keep the birth rate low and aid family planning management.

The law was announced just days after a newborn baby boy was rescued from a sewage pipe in Zhejiang province. Reports suggest that the unmarried mother was shunned by the father (such is the social stigma of single parenthood in China).

Chen Yaya, of the Shanghai Academy of Social Sciences, warned there could be more "sewer babies" if the policy is enacted.

Wang Qiong, a professor at Wuhan University, told the China Daily the regulation was "ridiculous".

> "What if a woman chooses to have a test tube baby without getting married? Should she also be fined?"

The Global Times said that the fines would target unmarried women who cannot prove the identity of the father of their child, or those who have a baby with men who they know have spouses.

Imagine that? Imagine proposing to hold irresponsible mothers to account for their actions! For a social problem that has reached epidemic proportions in the US, our glorious leaders have never even considered punishing women for their role in the reproductive process. Rather, men have been beaten into servitude with child support slavery. This goes without saying. "Man up!" we are constantly told. "Man up"! But if women really are responsible for their own bodies and decisions, as they claim to be, then they should be recognized as at least as culpable (if not more so) than the man in bringing a child into the world. A child who will, in all likelihood, be on the government dole in milliseconds after heaving the womb.

Of course, no American politician would dare advocate fining (or punishing in any way) an unwed mother for producing more government-supported spawn. This would be thoughtcrime, pure and simple. The proposed Chinese law exposes once again the hypocrisy and double standards inherent in Western feminist mantras.

We did it to ourselves. Or, I should say, our predecessors did it to us.

Men are to be punished, controlled, and made to pay. For everything, of course. Women are to be coddled, excused, and empowered. And men did it to themselves. Just today I witnessed the sickening and pathetic spectacle of American Generals at a Congressional hearing having to answer for an alleged "epidemic" of "sexual abuse" in the military. They all sat there, like penitent schoolchildren with chests full of medals, as they were verbally lashed by froth-mouthed feminist Congresswomen. Ah, humanity! I sometimes wonder what old Cato would say if he could see us now.

The Roots Of Feminism In America

June 9, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

This is the first installment of a multi-part series about the evolution, or devolution, of the American woman throughout the arc of American history.

Women's Contributions To The Revolutionary War Effort

As you are probably already aware – at this stage of American history – traditional gender roles reigned supreme in America. However, women did make significant contributions to the war effort, but also showed how much privilege is afforded to women in any society.

In the lead up to the war, they had played a key role in helping boycott British goods, as they went out of their way to make many consumer products themselves such as clothing, hurting the British market for American goods. Further, they helped start organizations to bolster the Patriot cause. Understand that most sources vastly overrate this point (historical revisionism is going on here). Most women did what was needed to care for their family, but were not politically active on any level. Also, note the fact that women have always been relevant to any war effort; it was just that American women showed signs of wanting more than their traditional roles.

Once the war started, women took on many roles related to their gender. They often worked in camps, serving not just their husbands, but other soldiers. They often cooked, cleaned and served as nurses. Some feared impoverishment in the absence of their soldier husband, so she would follow him through his deployments. Some women tried to serve as soldiers, and only a few (like Deborah Sampson) served in the military. Do note that Sampson impersonated a man in order to serve. Women did serve sometimes as spies and other noncombat roles.

The First American Feminist: Mary Wollstonecraft

The rhetoric around equality caused quite the buzz amongst the Patriots – particularly amongst blacks and women. (Black people are beyond the scope of this article, but understand racial equality and sexual equality are two different issues.) It was one woman, Mary Wollstonecraft, who laid the groundwork for American feminism.

Consider Mary Wollstonecraft's essay "A Vindication Of The Rights Of Woman." It is considered the first piece about a form of equality between men and women in America. American women got a taste of role equality in the war, as they served as more than wives and mothers. This was little more than a necessity – the idea that societies limit men's or women's role simply because of their sex is ridiculous. Women in rural America to this day perform all sorts of tasks on farms that urban feminists can't understand – they don't need false visions of empowerment that feminism seeks to promote.

Looking at Wollstonecraft's piece, she was convinced that women's deficiencies centered around their lack of education. She was certain that if women became companions, rather than wives, marriages would improve. She thinks the social superficiality of women would be cured by appropriate socialization. As we shall see in this series, she would be proved wrong again and again. At any rate, she also advocated for a level of equality between men and women in their socialization. Do note that she was interested in promoting the domestic sphere as just as important as the men's sphere of politics and leadership. While the domestic sphere certainly is vital and important to any society, note that it isn't as important as running a nation.

Wollstonecraft left an unfinished piece called "Maria: Or The Wrongs Of Woman," which really shed light on her views of men, women and society. She weaved a tale of a woman who was totally wronged by her husband – who had her committed to an insane asylum – which is where the story takes place. She highlights allegations of gambling, whoring and bankruptcy as reasons for the implosion of their relationship.

Loading...

After her death in 1797, her husband released a memoir of her unpublished writings. It was highly controversial, as she confessed to adultery and having an illegitimate child. She talked about female relationships bordering on lesbianism and recurring thoughts of suicide. She also talked, in detail, about the lead-up to her death.

Analysis Of Proto-Feminism

Despite how admired Wollstonecraft's work may have been, her views on women are necessarily limited by biology.

Let's consider her work "Maria." She intimated that society should worship female sexuality – many feminists have subsequently reiterated this point. The problem is hypergamy – there is no way a cogent society can worship female sexuality without suffering grave consequences. The issue, here, is that women have a false sense of their sexuality in a patriarchy. They sense their need to be motherly, but their hypergamic impulses are repressed. In America, this repression has forced some women to regress into indulgent self-worship. Hypergamy has some use from an evolutionary perspective, as women's desire only for the highest of quality of men greatly aided humanity. However, it is antithetical to the maintenance of a stable society.

In "Maria" the protagonist falls in love with a "disinterested" and confident man who turns out to be a bad person. Instead of understanding that not all women experience that sort of life, she ports her poor relationship onto all women, claiming that all women are victims of constant and brutal oppression. She cultivates a relationship with a nurse at the mental institution and that nurse relays a similar story of a poor life. She sees economic and sexual independence as the keys to free women from the problems in their life. What she doesn't consider is that the reason women pick men like that is because they are attractive to women. As we have seen with the Sexual Revolution, women are still picking all manners of jerks and douchebags to have sex and fall in love with. Unable to come to grips with the biological dimensions of their sexuality, they just blame patriarchy.

One other main point of “Maria” is that she pushes marriage as an oppressive construct that enslaves women. What is most amusing – and sad – is that she doesn’t identify men as being oppressed in these relationships like women. She notes that men have limited roles, but she really doesn’t talk about emotional or sexual limitations on these men. What she emphasizes is the lack of autonomy for women. She emphasizes women need well-paid work so they don’t have to lean on men fiscally.

Her inability to understand the economic independence will only provide economic independence is telling. It will do nothing to cure hypergamy, in fact, it makes it worse. Men in romance novels have gotten more dominant, taller, handsomer and rich since the Sexual Revolution. Her so-called “solutions” are really pouring fuel on the fire of female unhappiness. Women like her are betting their entire life on the slimmest of hopes – finding and keeping a stable & sexy male. That rarely happens because those men are rare.

However, in the end, consider the work American women did during the Revolutionary War. A handful of women kvetched to serve as soldiers, but as we have seen with modern women in the military, they simply want the accolades and honor, not any of the violent and fatal downsides. Also, understand how Mary Wollstonecraft’s own incredible personal disillusionment lead her to lay the groundwork for feminism. That is why American feminism is so psychologically sick – it’s roots are in a psychologically ill and suicidal female infatuated with her own hypergamy.

What Game of Thrones Says About Morality And Necessity

June 10, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Like tens of millions of others, I am a big fan of HBO's "Game of Thrones". I love the acting, I think the political intrigue is fascinating, and I find the fantasy world in which it takes place to be incredibly enthralling. As someone who has spent a lot of time reading and analyzing manosphere philosophy, however, there is another aspect of Game of Thrones that pulls me in: its accurate depiction of red pill realities.

A warning to some: there are major spoilers coming if you've not reached at least the ninth episode of the current season of Game of Thrones on HBO. If you are still waiting to see Episode 9, haven't read the books and don't want to be spoiled, stop reading now.

Last week saw the depiction of arguably the most emotionally charged scene in all of Martin's series (and, possibly, on all of TV): the Red Wedding. Robb Stark, "King in the North" and eldest son of Eddard Stark (former Lord of Winterfell), was slaughtered mercilessly alongside his bannermen, his mother, and his pregnant fiancé. This is done at the behest of the powerful and vengeful old Lord Walder Frey, whose daughter Robb Stark had promised to marry earlier in the series. Robb went back on this promise, and Frey went ahead with his revenge.

Before I continue, let me note where I stand sentimentally here: I like the Starks. I think that they actually are "good", "honourable" and possessing of many admirable traits. I also, however, believe that this is precisely their problem. The Starks provide a valuable illustration of a red pill reality crucial to anyone seeking true self-improvement in an often immoral world: "the right thing" is not always "the necessary thing". Sometimes, one must put aside old notions of what is "right" or "moral" in order to do what is necessary.

There are several examples within Game of Thrones that show Starks failing to understand this and paying horrible prices as a result. In the midst of the death of King Robert Baratheon, Ned Stark found himself at a crucial juncture: he had the opportunity to use Robert's children (who he has now discovered are actually the illegitimate products of incest, not of the King) to make peace with his enemies and secure the Iron Throne as well as his family's wellbeing.

Ned Stark received good advice calling for him to do just this, but chose to ignore it in order to do "the right thing", the "honourable" thing. He backed the "rightful" claim of another Baratheon, the King's brother Stannis, to the throne, helping to fuel more conflict and instability while putting himself in great danger. Instead of seizing the Queen and her illegitimate children of incest, he took the time to meet her face to face, let her know that he was aware of everything, and threaten to tell the King all about it.

This had the potential to destroy her family and keep her eldest son off of the throne. Despite that, Ned actually expected her to give up and go away quietly—instead, he merely ensured his eventual imprisonment and murder at the hands of her sociopathic spawn.

Robb Stark is very much his father's son: consistently giving preference to the "right" over the "necessary". Rob wanted to do the right thing and trust Theon Greyjoy, who he figured was like a brother. This was somewhat understandable in a moral sense (he grew up with Theon), but foolish in a practical one. Theon was a Greyjoy and the Greyjoys had a bone to pick with the Starks, one that Theon was bound to try and resolve himself at some point if given the chance. Robb, anxious to do the sentimentally good thing for someone he grew up with, ignored these realities, even though he was advised not to do so.

Robb also proved himself easily led astray by notions of love, the downfall of many an “honourable” man. As I mentioned earlier, Robb had made a vow to marry the daughter of the powerful Lord Walder Frey in order to form an alliance that could have proven invaluable. He went back on this promise in order to marry a girl he was “in love” with, Talisa Maegyr. Walder Frey was not pleased—he thought he’d successfully pawned a young daughter off and made her a Queen. Now he had nothing, and he made sure the Starks paid for that.

Loading…

You may be compelled to ask why it is that Robb did what he did. He probably could have still had Talisa on the side as a mistress following his marriage. Talisa may have understood (prettier women have put up with more from less powerful men), and Robb could have kept his alliance intact and preserved a shot at winning the war. He maybe even could have come to care for Roslin as a wife, the same way Ned and Catelyn’s love grew over time. After all, it can’t be too hard to warm to a woman who looks like this:

But Robb, we must remember, is the son of Ned Stark and possibly the most like him of all the Stark boys. Like most "honourable" men, he wanted to marry for "real love", even if it meant shunning duty. He was also probably morally opposed to the idea of having a woman he loved as a side piece, even if that was necessary (and quite commonly done by men of his stature) to maintain a crucial alliance. Instead he put himself and his entire clan closer to extinction in the name of "love". It sounds honourable and romantic, but it was stupid, and it got him killed. Had Robb been able to put the romantic BS aside, he could have survived and left House Stark in a much better position than it is. He let his "honourable", "romantic" feelings for a pretty woman control and, ultimately, destroy him.

A crucial part of the process associated with digesting the red pill is the acknowledgement of the need to put to bed many of the idealistic moral notions you once held sacred or dear, replacing them with more practical, necessary understandings of the world. For many of us that means accepting hard truths like "nice guys finish last", even though we'd been taught for most of our lives that being "nice" is the best shot at attaining lasting love with a quality woman. We cannot grow and witness true improvement in ourselves without developing the ability to see and accept these realities, even if they don't fit in with the moral compasses we were handed.

The two male leaders of House Stark provide us with a potent example of what could happen to those who fail to make this transition. Both men grew into influential, powerful leaders, ascending to positions in which success necessitated the ability to operate according to the laws of reality, not just morality. Both men failed to adapt to this, and both men paid the ultimate price. They stuck rigidly to old notions of "honour", and died with them.

None of the men reading this are kings and none of us will likely ever face the threat of beheading or violent matrimonial betrayal. Like the Starks, however, all of us can derive value from an ability to prioritize “the necessary” over “the right”.

At the end of the day, Robb’s downfall can be boiled down to mistakes we see destroy many men in real life: he found a pretty girl, he became overwhelmed with “honourable” notions of chivalry and romance, he let these notions cloud his judgment and, finally, he was destroyed by them. The ability to look at things with a slightly more cynical and realistic eye in order to avoid such detachment from reality can be invaluable. It might not be needed to avoid the threat of a “Red Wedding”, but it could certainly help you avoid a lifetime of financial, social, and romantic frustration.

The 9 Stages Of Working Out

June 10, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Any experienced body builder will tell you that their trip to being huge was a giant metamorphosis (or meatamorphosis as I like to call it). I can't directly give you insight as to the end stages and how different men have truly viewed them as I'm only halfway through my journey. But being halfway there, I am starting to understand what people like Arnold Schwarzenegger have said in the past about what body building is and how it works and how there are different stages. And really, the path of working out is one that can be explained as a metamorphosis.

Stage 1: The Couch Dreamer

Stage 1 is usually the guy laying on his couch. He's watched his ex girlfriends drool over Ryan Gosling shirtless and likely blew off the queue until he found himself shirtless and alone after a breakup. This stage usually involves watching infomercials about working out while eating potato chips and complaining about your life. A bro has not yet found this poor soul and so he sits in a realm of Purgatory. Not directly making himself too much worse but not fixing himself either. Just pondering the pros and cons to doing nothing versus doing something.

Stage 2: The Beginning

It is at this stage that our assailant has finally begun his journey. This was likely due to a bro-tervention with a friend telling him that he's being a sappy sad piece of crap and that if he wants to go balls deep anytime soon he better get rid of the tits he's carrying around and turn it into muscle. This is the first significant transformation for men who start working out because it's the first time they're really working out. It's also virgin gains territory where curling a 15lb dumbbell can actually give you gains. It's also likely the first time men will see positive affects from their initial workouts.

Stage 3: Quitting Versus Continuing

This stage is quick and simple and follows almost immediately after the beginning. Either the man will find enough success and reasoning to continue turning himself into a man beast, or his mother will tell him to clean his room and he'll quit. The more encouragement from friends will work wonders, but unrealistic expectations will shatter dreams. Many men quit here, but the best continue pushing onward.

Stage 4: Building Size

Stage 4 is around the time that men usually start seeing some sizable gains. The transition from toning based exercises to things that will actually start bulking up takes affect. Men at this level realize the idea of just getting really toned is an impossibility and will have you looking like a cross country queen. Men want pecks, biceps, quads, and abs, and they intend to make them large enough to see across the street. This is weight lifting level up number one of the final few stages. Good changes are happening and success is imminent.

Loading...

Stage 5: Loving Yourself

Working out initially begins as a way to get women. Most men who get really into working out had some strikeouts with women at some point. With the strikeouts and a push from a fellow bro the idea to get muscles to get women comes about. By stage 5 men stop caring what women think. it is at this stage that men begin to fall in love with the way they look in a mirror. The downside to this stage is there is often more flexing in a mirror while working out than truly necessary. The upside is men at this stage have a very high confidence level knowing that they look good. The only thing humbling people at this level comes when someone more jacked walks next to them.

Stage 6: Gym Alpha

This is the elite level of your local gym. You've lifted long enough to get good gains and garner the attention of women and newbies to the gym. You're buff and you know it but you're also in limbo. It's at this level that you can either choose to step it up a notch to go for Zyzz level. Of you can continue just being that buff guy at the gym who looks great at the beach. Staying on this level is acceptable, it's similar to being a really good athlete in high school. You did your part, people will remember you, but your journey just might not excel past this.

Stage 7: Going Pro

For the really hardcore gym alphas, this is when they decide they want to make a living lifting. Whether its as a fitness model, through strongmen, or through bodybuilding this is when shit gets serious. These men are beyond being in love with themselves. They want statues built of their physiques for space aliens to admire. They're making money off their body quicker than Puerto Rican hookers at Miami beach and love every second of it. They wake-up, lift, eat, nap, lift, and then don't party, because they take their shit seriously. If its not a female fitness model whose too busy to go out they're not banging her. But they can truthfully say they're going for quality (because quantity would ruin their diet).

Stage 8: Legend Status

This level is for the most elite men. This is retained for legendary trainers and beastly bodybuilders like Ronnie Coleman and Arnold Schwarzenegger. These men have turned from being bodybuilders to being professional icons. Statues truly will be built of these men as they enjoy their brief stints atop Mt. Olympus to reflect back on the journey of weight lifting and how it’s been great to them in life. They know the time is short, and so it’s lived fast and intense, usually capping a lifetimes worth of events in as few as couple months.

Stage 9: Giving Back

This level can be attained with skipping levels 7 and 8, however the best men for this level have been through those stages. This is the stage where men have gone beyond their peak and are in their wisdom days. The muscle gains are starting to slip (or they just don’t feel like putting in as much effort anymore). The best part is these are the men who train the next generation. They’ve garnered past secrets to help get gains in non-traditional ways which fuel the next generation of men who will undoubtedly go on a journey to get fucking huge.

The Myth of Date Rape Drink Spiking

June 11, 2013 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

I remember the first—and last—time someone tried to roofie a girl I knew. It was years ago in college. I was at a house party with some friends when we noticed that "Samantha," one of the girls with us, had suddenly gone catatonic and glassy-eyed, only an hour into the party. We tried to snap her out of it—shaking her, waving our hands in front of her face, shouting "Earth to Sam!"—but she just stared at us. We figured that some creep had slipped her a mickey while her back was turned, so a couple of her girlfriends walked her home.

Paradoxically, that incident made me realize that date rape drink spiking is a myth.

Oh sure, Sam had been roofied, that much was obvious. But the idea that there are hordes of women having their drinks spiked so strange men can drag them into dark alleyways to violate them is a complete lie. Here are three reasons why…

1. Most women who go out drinking aren’t alone.

Every single girl I’ve ever known who goes out to bars and parties does so with her friends. If she gets roofied, they’re going to notice her acting strangely, like we did with Sam. How exactly is a potential rapist supposed to peel away an obviously drugged woman away from her friends?

2. Assuming the girl is alone, you still have to isolate her somehow.

Every date rape drug that is potent enough to make a woman incapable of defending herself from a rapist also incapacitates her to the point where onlookers can visibly see that something is wrong with her. In order to forcibly penetrate her vagina, our rapist has to drag an unconscious or barely conscious girl past throngs of club/bar patrons or partygoers, bouncers, security cameras and any number of people who can notice what he's doing and stop him. What's the likelihood of anyone getting away with that?

3. Who gets off on having sex with an inert object?

Women honestly believe that men are such horny pigs that they'll fuck anything, even a woman who is completely unresponsive and uninterested. It's not true. As Jim Goad put it (NSFW), most men are turned off by a lack of consent. Every guy has a horror story about a girl who was a dead fish in bed, refusing to react to anything he did to her. The reason why Fleshlights, blow-up dolls and other male sex toys will never be as popular as vibrators is because most guys find the idea of banging an inanimate object to be repulsive.

So, let's recap: a man who wants to date rape a girl has to not only drug her, but somehow get her to a secluded spot where he can get his rape on without getting caught by her friends or the multitudes of human beings around him. If even the slightest thing goes wrong, he's looking at jail time and worse. And even if he succeeds, all he has to look forward to is a few minutes of sex with what's basically a living corpse.

If you're going to go to all that effort to drug and rape a girl without getting caught, why not just ask her out? You'll have the same chance of success, you'll actually end up enjoying banging her if you do take her home, and most importantly, you're not breaking the law.

The only conclusion is that most of the girls who claim to have been roofied are lying. They're using it as an excuse to binge drink and act out without having to own up to the consequences: "It wasn't my fault I blacked out and threw up all over myself! I was drugged!" Additionally, ugly and fat girls are probably claiming to be roofied as a way of deluding themselves into thinking they're attractive: "I'm so hot that men are drugging me just to have a shot at me!" Every major study on the subject has proven that date rape drink spiking is rare at best:

> Nick Ross, chair of the Jill Dando Institute of Crime Science, commented: "There is no evidence of widespread use of hypnotics in sexual assault, let alone Rohypnol, despite many attempts to prove the contrary.
> "During thousands of blood and alcohol tests lots of judgement-impairing compounds were discovered, but they were mostly street drugs or prescription pharmaceuticals taken by the victims themselves, and above all alcohol was the common theme.

The myth of date rape drink spiking persists because it lets women blame their problems on men and avoid taking responsibility for their actions. So the next time a girl tells you she was drugged, demand evidence. If she can't provide it, call her out for being a liar. Small steps towards a better world.

The Easiest Way To Overcome A Depression

June 11, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

One of the more common stereotypes of the manosphere is that it is full of angry, depressed men. Like most stereotypes, I believe this is true. However, I do not think it is our message which makes men depressed, but rather, men who are already bitter at the world tend to find the manosphere while searching for answers to their own miseries of life. There are mainly three types of manosphere readers:

1. Men who had shitty childhoods, and often grew up without any male role models.

2. Men who got screwed over, in way one or another, by a woman, and want to improve their love life.

3. Men who are already successful, but are looking for yet more ways to leverage their success.

This post is dedicated to the men in the first two groups. Invariably, men who are plagued with troubles go searching the internet for answers, since it is anonymous and avoids being shamed by others, and they stumble across one of the bigger manosphere websites while looking for answers. Then, once they find out that most of everything they've been told is a huge lie, it makes them angry and depressed. They hate the fact that a woman's love is conditional. They hate the fact that America is a feminist state which actively destroys fatherhood. They hate the fact that our education system is nothing more than a glorified indoctrination system that teaches almost nothing of real world value while emasculating men.

I suppose that learning these harsh truths is not going to help a man who's already on the brink of his emotional health. But, what is important to realize is that being depressed isn't itself important. What is truly important is to understand your own emotional self, and to try and understand what it is that makes you depressed so you can avoid it.

Let me elaborate.

I do not think humans have much, if any, free will. You do not control how you feel, you do not control how you are raised, what you learn, your culture, your physical health, etc. Thus it also seems plainly obvious to me that a man's emotions are controlled by external stimuli. So while you cannot choose how you feel in reaction to certain stimulus, you can, at the very least, attempt to control what stimulus comes your way.

So the easiest way to alter your surroundings is to travel. And indeed, travel is the only cure that I have found to depressions throughout my life.

I have suffered from numerous depressions since I turned 16. At least ten different depressions, two of which lasted over a year. Daily thoughts of suicide and all that. But I pressed on. I did not want medication because my rational mind understood that being dependent on drugs for my happiness was not a long term solution. For most of my depressions, I just waited it out. And slowly they went away. But the time lost during depressions was unacceptable.

Loading...
When a man is depressed, he lets everything go to waste: his body, his mind, his money, his relationships, and his professional life. It is as bad as being struck with a debilitating illness such as cancer. The worst part? There's technically nothing wrong with you – it is only emotional in nature. And this realization only feeds into your depression even more, because you convince yourself that you're just a fuck-up who can't do anything right even though you've got every reason to succeed.

That's why finding a cure to depression is extremely important – your time is precious. And the only times I can remember when I overcame my depressions quickly occurred at two points in my life:

1. When I went to college.

2. When I visited an old friend in Atlanta.

Both times I had been depressed beforehand, and both times when I changed my environment my depression went away. For college, it was because I finally got the hell out of my overbearing parents house and no longer had to attend my shit high school, while with Atlanta, it was because it gave me a fresh perspective on American culture that had been sorely lacking from my New England existence.

That is the most mysterious part – other than changing my environment, I cannot put my finger on exactly what happened to improve my mood. For college I totally uprooted myself and changed locations, while for Atlanta I only went for a week to hang out with a good friend I hadn't seen in years. But by simply removing myself from my old toxic environment I had stopped the pollution from entering my emotional mind, which was all it took to bring about a clean slate. And although coming back from Atlanta I re-entered the shitty culture of the North East once again, at least I knew for a certainty that it was not the norm, that there exists a part of the USA where people casually say "Hello!" to one another, where people still live in segregated communities yet aren't afraid to acknowledge or talk to someone who isn't of their own kind.

Even with temporary travel a man gains perspective, which is often enough for him to set goals on what to do next with his life. And with a permanent relocation, you can completely remove yourself from the old environment that was causing you to feel like trash all the time.

So if you feel sad, angry, or just plain unsatisfied with life – remember, it is your emotional mind telling you something. Your emotional mind does not like whatever circumstances you are in, and by making you feel like shit all the time, your emotional mind is hoping you'll change locations so that your emotional mind no longer has to deal with whatever poison it is currently saturated with.

And do not travel with the mere intent of getting fucked up and banging sluts. Instead, go somewhere for at least a week or more, and spend it totally sober, preferably with a good friend of yours, simply giving yourself as much time as you need to recover. Few things are more important than your health, and your emotional health is a necessary component of that.

How To Cook Four Delicious Entrées

June 11, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Three years ago I could barely microwave a burrito, but today I routinely cook full meals with tasty meat-based entrées. Assuming you have some basic kitchen essentials, these four meals will minimize labor and expense while maximizing taste and healthfulness:

1. Roasted Chicken Thighs

Ingredients: Two packages of chicken thighs, butter, salt

Equipment: Oven pan

This is a delicious and simple meal. Use your microwave to soften up some butter in a bowl and mix in salt and whatever other spices you like. Put the thighs in the pan, dry them off, and then coat them with the butter rub. Put them in the oven at 350 degrees for at least 1 hour, cranking up the heat to 450 for the last 5 minutes if you desire especially crispy skin. Take out and serve. Chicken thighs have a lot of dark meat, and are thus more forgiving to overcooking. These are also easy to store in aluminum foil and apportion if you wish to cook lunches for the entire week. Total labor — 10 minutes.

2. Grilled steak

Ingredients: Steak, coconut oil and/or butter, salt, pepper

Equipment: Cast iron pan

Coat your cast iron pan with a bit of coconut oil, or a combination of coconut oil and butter. Turn the heat on your burner to about 3/4 of capacity. While the pan is heating up for 5 minutes, dry off your steak and generously sprinkle salt and pepper on one side. Just when the pan starts to smoke, put the steak in the pan, seasoned side down. Cook to meat preference (mine is rare), making sure to salt and pepper the unseasoned side of the steak before flipping it. Serve by itself, or with a bit of butter on top. Note that cooking time and amount of seasoning will vary with the cut of meat. My favorite cuts are Porterhouse, N.Y. Strip, and skirt. Some people use olive oil, but I find that it smokes too much. Total labor — 10 minutes.

Loading...

3. Full Roast Chicken

Ingredients: One full chicken, butter, garlic salt, salt, pepper

Equipment: cooking pan

This is a perfect date meal, since the finished bird looks impressive and tastes great. Take the chicken out of the package, wash it off in the sink, and dry it with a paper towel. Put it on the pan, breast side up. Soften up some butter in the microwave and mix into it salt, pepper, garlic salt, and whatever other spices you have on hand. Take a spoon and separate the skin at the top of the breast bone. Scoop butter onto the spoon and then slide spoonfuls of the butter rub under the skin flap, spreading it out to season the breast meat. Rub the rest of the butter on the skin and add salt/pepper if you wish. Put the chicken in the oven at 400 degrees for 10-15 minutes per pound. Take out, let cool for 5 minutes, and serve. Total labor — 15 minutes

4. Pulled pork

Ingredients: Pork shoulder ("butt"), salt, pepper, spices as needed, bacon (optional), peppers (optional)

Equipment: Slow cooker

Purchase a large hunk of pork shoulder, which can be bought cheaply at Costco. Cut off the largest slab that will fit in your slow cooker, and freeze the rest in plastic bags. Put the pork in the slow cooker, along with a couple strips of bacon or sliced peppers/onions. Add some salt and pepper and other spices, turn your cooker on "low" and let sit for 8 hours without removing the lid. Take the cooked pork out and shred it with two forks. Add additional seasoning to taste, and serve. Optional: add store-bought or homemade barbecue sauce. Total labor — 10 minutes.

With the frightfully low level of cooking knowledge out there, being able to make just these four dishes will put you ahead of the average man, and will pay dividends both for your health and your wallet.

The Effect Of Americanization On A Hungarian Girl

June 12, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

This past weekend in Budapest I was given a clear look at how Western influence can ruin a society. These two dates took place on consecutive nights, allowing me to see how much of an effect the westernization virus can have on a society.

The Meet (Sabrina)

Wednesday night I go out in Budapest and it's a horrible cockfest—70% guys and girls are unattractive and bitchy. Went to numerous venues and the same everywhere. I break out my jump to conclusions mat, think Budapest is horrible (note: it is not — I was dead wrong) and the next morning go to my default back up plan of trying to set something up from the country's online women. They have OKCupid in Budapest? Ok odd but why not. Message a few girls, get one bite and we agree to meet on Friday night for a drink. She has the standard annoying profile I've come accustomed to in America. When I confirm the plans, she texts back "no need to repeat yourself." So much for being nice and making sure the language barrier does not cause confusion.

She is late for drinks and texts me "Don't give up!" I tell her what I'm wearing and that I'm outside, she texts back what she's wearing and she's inside. I go in, she's cute but in a loose blouse, jeans and flats. She's got just a tad of softness to her body, a dangerous sign of impending fatness. She works in project management. She is full of sarcasm and quick retorts. She is fully Americanized.

The Meet (Petra)

I realize quickly that I was wrong about Budapest. There are very hot girls around, and some sweet ones too. It was Friday night and I was at the apparent top club in Budapest, notice a tall slender blonde standing by herself. She is tall, long hair, very thin and wearing heels and a black dress. Go up to her and tell her she looks bored and should join me for a drink. She agrees but apologizes because her English is not too good. I tell her it's ok and pour her a glass of champagne from the bottle that cost me as much as a single drink would cost me in LA. She smiles at me and has to resort to her phone to use google translate. We chat a bit and then she has to go because her ride is leaving.

We set up plans to get drinks for the next night. She is also late, but texts me saying she is sorry because the trams were delayed. When she arrives, she apologizes about seven times for being 15 minutes late. She is a bartender.

The Date (Sabrina)

I ask her what she's drinking and she says beer. She grabs that 0.5L beer and has no problems drinking it like a German beer enthusiast. We grab a seat outside, and when the waiter comes to tell her it's closed down she tries to convince him to let us stay by flirting. Didn't work. We change venues and she goes to the bathroom and makes sure to take her phone with her. When I go to the bathroom and come back, she is on facebook and texting people.

Loading...
We are standing at the bar and a girl asks if she can move over a bit so she can place a drink order, and Sabrina retorts that she's not moving and there is space on the other end of the bar. When I can't understand something she said because of her accent, she inquires if I have water in my ear.

The Date (Petra)

I ask her what she's drinking and she says champagne. We get a bottle of champagne and sit outside in the same bar area. Her phone is out for google translate for the entire date, and not a single text or facebook check was made. She asks me if it's okay that she doesn't speak English so well — I tell her that's perfectly fine. She tells me about her family, how she likes to cook and so on. When Petra goes to the bathroom, she leaves her phone on the table.

It comes to pay the bill and the waiter is nowhere to be found. She goes around the restaurant looking for him and when we finally pay, she makes sure he gives me the right change back and not try to take advantage of the tourist.

My Place (Sabrina)

I invite Sabrina up for a drink and she agrees. After listening to her gab for 2o minutes, make out with her and try to escalate. She stops me and says "just so you know, we are not having sex tonight." What? How does she know the typical American girl I'm-going-to say-this-so-I'm-a-not-a-slut line? Nonetheless she told me about a million times how she was to wake up early the next morning for work, so the night had to end. Since I wasn't that into her and had friends at the night club already out, I didn't push it.

She agrees to walk me to the club. On the way there, she runs into her ex-boyfriend. She just completely ignores me and after a few minutes, I tell her I'll find the club myself. She goes okay and continues talking to him like my hands weren't fondling her breasts 20 minutes ago. The next day she texts me that she couldn't make our previously agreed plans of hanging out again because she ~~ended up fucking her ex~~ only got 2.5 hours of sleep last night.

My Place (Petra)

I invite Petra up for a drink and she agrees. We kiss rather soon, but she will not let me go any further. She tells me in broken English that this is our first date and this is not appropriate. Eventually I tell her that if she wants to sleep over she can, and no sex. She goes okay and changes into my shorts and a tshirt. Sex followed soon after. She gave no porn star demands that I've become accustomed to with American girls, just smooth nice sex. Afterwards she curls up on me and falls asleep, waking occasionally to give me a light peck. In the morning she types on the translator that she will go home now because she doesn’t want to inconvenience me.

And people wonder why some men go to Europe and never come back.

The American Military & Men Do Not Mix

June 12, 2013 | by Edmund Dantes | Link | Original Link

Shooting guns, blowing shit up, and working out. Shouldn't that best way to express masculinity? It's not, especially since feminism has taken over the military. This is not the military of WWII. Welcome to the feminazi military.

Just a Number

Being masculine has a lot to do with being in control of your life. You make decisions about what you eat, when to sleep, how you make your money, where you go and much more. You have the final say and thus determine where you go in life. The military is not like that at all. A soldier has replaced his parents with the government. Your life is in the hands of incompetent officers, most fresh out of college. They determine your life. They decide whether you party in Japan or spread "freedom" in the Middle East.

The sad truth is: a soldier is a slave. He sold his soul under the illusion of doing something noble and most importantly, for the few thousand dollars in his sign-up bonus. The monetary benefit has since been reduced by Obama through cuts in tuition assistance and a soldier is not even allowed to speak his mind because Article 15 allows punishment by court-martial if he says the wrong thing. He is only allowed to follow orders like the good little dog he was conditioned to be.

You can be the general of the entire Army but you are still the commander-in-chief's bitch. Hell, you could be the president but you would still be the bottom bitch for those who got you there. No matter what rank you are, you are just a tool. Easily replaced by the next poor minority from the slums.

Inequality

Statistics more skewed than a feminist's point of view.

Calling a female a "bitch" is grounds for sexual harassment. I shit you not. Feminism has spread and corrupted everything that was once masculine. Virtually everything is made to accommodate women. As a result of this feminist infection, false rape reports are now increasing in the military.

> "From 2009 to 2012, the number of sexual abuse reports rose from 3,244 to 3,374 — a 4 percent increase. During the same period, the number of what the Pentagon calls 'unfounded allegations' based on completed investigations of those reports rose from 331 to 444 — a 35 percent increase."
> Loading...

Thirty-five percent! More and more men's lives are being destroyed by liars! And for what? Removing the opposition for promotion? Attention? Fun?

> "Elaine Donnelly, who runs the Center for Military Readiness, said the Pentagon's Sexual Assault Response and Prevention Office (SAPRO) is ignoring the problem of false reports... 'Something should be done to reduce the numbers of false accusations, the first step being an admission that the problem exists.'"

Even a female agrees that something is wrong. God forbid a male says it! Regardless which gender points out the obvious injustice, the military is not doing anything to combat false rape reports. Why? Because false rape does not exist according to feminist dogma. At the very most, two percent of claims are false. By hamster logic, the rest of these "victims" and "heroes" for speaking out and the "criminals" should be executed. Inequality? Hell yes! Especially since the military fails to mention anything about women sexual assaulting men (but does include man-on-man).

How are these snakes able to get to these positions to ruin lives? Simple, the military lowers the physical standards for them. The minimum amount of push-ups for males is 35 while females have 13.

They can barely move their own body weight and the military is deciding whether they should be on the front lines with men. Imagine a female, barely weighing a buck ten, trying to carry a wounded man, twice her size, to safety. Not going to happen, feminists.

As you can see, the military today is nothing like the military of our grandfathers. I could go on about how promotions are based on race and gender rather than merit, how the military will squeeze every single last drop of whatever they want from you until you are useless to them, and so on, but the main point is that the American military and men do not mix. If you enjoy being a man, stay as far away from it as you can.

The 10 Slut Commandments

June 12, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Sluts are everywhere. See that cute barista at Starbucks? She just blew her new FWB in the parking lot on her break. That hot blonde working at Nordstroms at the cologne counter? She's wiping her mouth and chomping on Altoids because she just took a cum load in her mouth after getting it up her ass right before work. The sluts of America are alive and well and it's pointless to fight it anymore. Indulge, exploit, turn out and next them.

Now before you lurking White Knighters start swearing at your computer screens, as though I can hear you, hear me out.

I didn't create sluts and I would prefer that girls not spread their legs so easily, but guess what? Sluts are here to stay and they're only going to get sluttier, so sit back, relax and let em ride your cock.

Here's The 10 Slut Commandments. These are time-tested and designed to protect you, get you tons of ass and keep you from falling for a slut. True to form, I've included lots of slut pics as well. Enjoy.

1. Never Fall In Love With A Slut

Obvious as this may seem, any girl that is an expert at draining your balls with a sweet smile on her face, can suck you in emotionally too, and the resulting fireball of living hell you'll unleash on your life will not be pretty like her sweet bubble butt. This is the time for you to put away childish behavior like believing in 'the one', and getting a cure for your oneitis. The cure is simple: more sluts. Once you've had multiple girls all throwing the same script at you with the same responses to your jokes/lines etc, you'll quickly see that 99.9% of sluts are the same. Rinse, repeat.

2. Never Invest Valuable Time Into A Slut

Sluts are not worthy of too much of your time. Your time is valuable. Schedule sluts when it’s convenient for you. Let’s say you meet a sexy slut at a club one night and bring her home and bang her silly. Let’s say the sex was damn good. Let’s say she didn’t annoy the living hell out of you and you wouldn’t mind adding her to your harem. The incorrect way to play this would be to schedule a date with her. You wouldn’t believe how many guys will start spending money on a slut AFTER they’ve f*cked her. Are you serious?? She’s already given you access for free, so now you hold the power. Invite her over to f*ck you, have her meet up with you at a house party, or tell her to make you dinner on Thursday at 8pm.

You live your life and if she fits into your schedule of activities then so be it. If not, next her. Plenty of sluts around to replace her.

3. Turn A Slut Out

A slut is a slut because she has low self-esteem generally and gets satisfaction from sharing her body with men. Maybe she has daddy issues, maybe she’s a hardcore feminist who believes it empowers her to blow the Baltimore Ravens, maybe she’s just naturally a nasty freak who loves sex with multiple guys. Point is, it doesn’t matter. Any girl that is slutty right off the bat has given you the green light to Turn Her Out. Here’s some ways you can turn out a slut even more.

-Tell her, especially if she falls for you, she has 2 choices: She can have a threesome with you, or delete your number. The Law Of Abundance when properly understood paves the way for this powerful move.

-Anal, of course. It’s a power move that not only dominates her body, but her MIND, which is the key of Total Immersion. (Will cover that in a future article)

-Got a buddy you owe a favor to? Tell her to fuck him. (From personal experience I have done this and you’d be surprised how many sluts will do it at your request)

-Any sexual fetish you have, tell her you want to do it and see how far she will go.

-Sex tape. Girls are such attention whores now and the ‘success’ of Kim Kardashian’s slutty ways, only ensure most sluts are down to make a porno with you.

There are multiple ways to Turn A Slut Out, but the aforementioned are some of the main ones. Feel free to add your own personal favorites in the comments section.

4. Never Get A Slut Pregnant

In a perfect world this would be easy to adhere to, but clearly there will be instances where sluts get pregnant and she insists on keeping the child. My point is, IF you get a slut pregnant, convince her to have an abortion or worst case scenario give it up for adoption. Unless, you're dying to have a child and have the financial means to support a child and her slutty mother, then I highly suggest convincing her to not have it. Use bribery if necessary, offer to pay for the abortion, buy her a new purse (most sluts would love a new Prada purse), whatever you can say to convince her that it's not a good idea.

Am I against kids? Of course not. What I am against is a man accidently getting a slut pregnant, having his child delivered out of a polluted womb and then watching her mother slut it up while the child sits by and suffers the neglect that most sluts will deliver. F*ck that. When you're ready to have a child, find a woman that respects her body enough that she will also respect that which she delivers with her body: her children.

5. Never Make A Slut Your Girlfriend

I've been guilty of this and I'm sure many of you readers have as well. We know she's a slut. We can see it in her eyes as she greedily chokes on our cock, but somehow she weasels her way into our sub-conscious as a girl of high value that we can change. Let me pause for a second to laugh out loud…

Ok, I'm back. Let me tell you something and hear this wisdom: Believe a slut the first time she tells you who she is.

Here’s some tell-tale signs where she will ‘say’, whether verbally or through her actions that she is NOT worthy of girlfriend status.

Actions:

-She LOVES to go to Vegas and frequents Sin City often.

-Slutty photos on her social media.

-Multiple guys hitting her up constantly on her smart phone.

-Tattoos

-Smokes cigs

-Drinks heavily

-Does drugs

-Go’s out more than twice a week clubbing/partying

Verbal:

-”I love to get crazy! This one time in Cancun…”

-”I’ve only been with 17 guys and I just turned 19 years old”

-”I’ve had bigger cocks”

-”Let’s watch porn together”

Shall I go on?

6. Use Sluts For Personal Gain

Are you f*cking a slut and you’re tight on your rent this month? Tell one of your sluts to give you the difference or she can take a hike.

Are you an aspiring actor and a slut you know has a brother who's a powerful agent? Have her introduce you to him and make moves son.

Are you on the bus and a slut you just met has a trust fund and two cars? Tell her you're borrowing a car until you have the money saved to get your own.

Sluts enjoy being used, that's why they are sluts. The biggest mistake you can make when dealing with sluts is to treat them right. They do not know how to react because their self-worth is very low. Trust me on this, start treating a slut like she's a high value girl and watch how quick her vagina dries up and she doesn't respond to your texts.

Life is like chess. Sluts are there for a man's enjoyment and betterment. If she adds value to your life outside of draining your balls, then exploit it. Rinse and repeat.

7. Always Get The 'Morning After Happy Text' From A Slut

Less you get slapped with a false rape charge, protect yourself with this text. Before you say it's Beta, think about spending time in prison with a dude's cock up your ass while you stare through prison bars for a crime you didn't commit and then say "Is This Beta?" That's what I thought.

Sluts can be crazy and sometimes with their craziness in bed, which is thoroughly enjoyed, comes the flip-side, the psycho, falsely-accusing bitch with buyers remorse. The morning AFTER you bang her send her this EXACT text:

You: Last night was fun. Did you have fun sexy?

Her: I did!! :) My pussy still hurts. I had to put an ice pack on it lmao!!

You: Good girl

(This is an exact text exchange I've had)

Now do the following: Go in and DELETE her number so that it shows her phone number when you pull up the text. Now SCREENSHOT that. Then email the screenshot to yourself. Then enter her name in again under her number. The point is that it shows HER number as having sent the text saying she had a good time.

If she decides to cry ‘rape’ and you show this to law enforcement it will save you a lot of grief.

8. Have Zero Expectations of Sluts

You cats could save yourself a lot of grief if you threw away any expectations you have of sluts. Take them off the damn pedestal you’ve put them on. Sluts will be sluts will be sluts. If it looks like a skunk and acts like a skunk, then dammit it’s probably a skunk. Expect nothing of them, except that they will f*uck you silly. Enjoy it and turn your emotions OFF when dealing with them.

9. Tell Her She’s YOUR Slut

This is part of the Total Conversion process and it works well. F*ck her well and talk dirty to her. While she’s on her knees gagging on your cock, grab her by the throat and say:

You: “Your my dirty slut. What are you?”

Slut: (Mascara running down her face) “I’m your slut Christian”

You: “I can’t hear you”

Slut: “I’m your slut, I’m your filthy whore!”

You: “Damn right you are. Choke on my cock slut”

Key here is not to tell her she’s just a slut, but YOUR slut. This eventually becomes ingrained in their mind that they are to please you only. This won’t keep them from slutting it up with other guys per se, but it’s a powerful brainwashing tool that works wonders. Good times.

10. Don’t Be Cynical About Sluts

It’s easy to get cynical about sluts, but let me tell you something. Man the f*ck up. Sluts are a part of life. Swallow the Red-Pill. If you follow these commandments you’ll have fun with them, but not experience the hell they can unleash on your life when you put them in a position to f*ck with you, i.e. girlfriend/wife status. Treat them as grown-up children and have fun. There’s no need to get bent out of shape because you found out your little ‘special’ snowflake is also slutting it up with other guys. That’s what she does, nothing more and nothing less.

Don’t get cynical, get poosy, make money and set your life up so down the road if you so choose to, you’ll be in a great position to have a relationship with a woman of quality. There are a lot of sluts, but there is a small percentage of women worth investing more time and effort into, you just have to find them. You have to dig through a lot of rocks to find a diamond.

Study these 10 Slut Commandments, memorize them and use them. Sluts are fun when handled properly. Now go and find some sluts.

You-Go-Girlism Is More Toxic Than Feminism

June 13, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

The contradictions and deleterious effects of feminism are well documented—not just in the manosphere but beyond. What the growing backlash against feminism fails to acknowledge are seemingly trivial and ancillary forces that do more damage than they let on.

The most powerful among those factors is you-go-girlism—the empowerment ethos that tells women, at every turn, that they can not only do anything a man can do, but also all of the things women used to do. Women and girls are the smarter, more capable, and generally "better" than men. Girls are encouraged to do things that are traditionally masculine—like manly professions and sports—and are given a pass on negative behaviors, from sexual promiscuity to weight gain to physically attacking men, all with the same trite cheer, "You go girl!"

For the undiscerning mind, there's little risk in encouraging women to be all they can be. What harm could encouraging women and girls to do whatever they want and feel good about who they are bring? The far-reaching problems arise with the unintended consequences of telling an entire generation of women a series of pretty lies. Because it feels good, you think it'll get you in her pants, or because wouldn't-it-be-nice. Both men and women are complicitous in the out of control spiral of you-go-girlism that ends up being more harmful—by virtue of its ubiquity and insidiousness—than feminism.

A much bigger number of women (and frankly men), I'd venture to say, parrot you-go-girlism platitudes that outdo ideologically feminist talking points. They aren't necessarily the same thing. You-go-girlism is rooted, at least in part, in the female impulse—probably genetically programmed—to test boundaries and check for male weakness. This instinct is considerably older than feminist doctrine. It's safe to say that women have been testing the boundaries of the male domain since the dawn of time, and attempting to wrest authority from men they perceive as weak for equally as long.

At the same time, you didn't hear the absurd anything-you-can-do-I-can-do-better claims, to the degree that we do today, until the advent of second-wave feminism. You-go-girlism, in other words, is in a chicken-and-egg relationship with feminism. It's either one of its original cradles (and on-going critical nutrient) or, alternatively, plain-and-simple feminism masquerading as harmless "positivity." In either case, you-go-girlism is a more palatable—but therefore more toxic—ideology.

You-go-girlism is ultimately grounded in a resolute, reactionary defiance to do anything women were prohibited from doing in the past—irrespective of why those prohibitions were in place, whether they were real or imagined, and with an irrational dismissal of the differences between the sexes. Women's sexuality was once policed (and promiscuity shamed), therefore women should (and increasingly do) have no-consequences sex. The differences between male and female sexual imperatives, on the deep genetic level, are inconsequential. Women were once prohibited from playing male sports, therefore they should be permitted to do so. The differences between male and female physiques and abilities are "socially constructed." A tiny minority of women is physically abused by men, therefore women should get off scot-free when they do "the same thing" to men. The fact that women, in fact, hit men more often (and can manipulate and abuse men in an array of non-violent ways) is irrelevant.

Loading...

According to you-go-girlism, men and women aren't just the same, women are—in fact—better if given the chance. You-go-girlism takes female moral superiority for granted: a woman's actions are justified by the faulty premise that women aren't ever violent, never lie, and generally mean no harm. "If women ruled the world," the saying goes, "there would be no wars."

It would be bad enough if things ended there, but they don't. You-go-girlism also fuels a dangerous cycle of delusional over-confidence. Regrettably, it's gotten to be that women (and brainwashed, effeminate men to an increasing degree) actually believe the constellation of ego-boosting lies a combination of marketers, bemused men, and deluded feminists have been feeding them for a generation. Movies and video games with "strong" female leads doing the impossible are legion, and may seem innocuous, but they feed a mythology that girls can fight, run, and intimidate like men. When the delusion (e.g., women allowed to serve in military combat) meets reality (e.g., actual combat), the whole illusion breaks down. When girls, to an increasing degree, feel "empowered" to go face-to-face with men in bars and clubs, you know that the delusion has had a real effect. (We all know, of course, that the implicit knowledge that a room full of bouncers and white-knights are ready to come to her defense is part of her intricate calculus.)

You-go-girlism also disincentivizes self-improvement. It may feel good to tell women that they're all beautiful, no matter how they look—or how fat they are—but that's simply not true, by any measure. Beauty, contrary to popular belief, is not in the eye of the beholder and, like anything thing else worthwhile, requires work. But, if you think you already "look good" 20 pounds overweight or in pajama pants, why make an effort?

The result: a generation of overconfident, loud, entitled fat girls with fattitude. Regrettably, women aren't the only ones who have started to believe the myth. A generation of emasculated young men and boys—hypnotized by movies and video games depicting unrealistic portrayals of women—have come to believe the myth that women aren't only their equals, but their superiors. Female superheroes and action stars may seem fun–or even plausible–but they feed an alternative reality infinitely more dangerous that the "sexualized" images of women that feminists would have you believe are harming the female psyche.

The manosphere spills a lot of ink over feminism, and rightfully so. But to forcefully and, more importantly, effectively reverse its damage, we have to push back against its coded manifestations. Your average girl on the street isn't shouting about "rape culture," but she is screaming "you go girl!" to her friends.

What Does Your Price Imply About Your Value?

June 13, 2013 | by AlphaX | Link | Original Link

When I first started my engineering consulting business I was hard pressed to land any clients. I had wrongly assumed that price primarily drives the marketplace and that by offering a lower than industry price I was offering more value. In truth, price plus Perceived Value drives your Market Value.

Let me explain.

I was 23 years old with no debt, no house, and nothing to tie me down. I believed that starting a Engineering Consulting business focused on manufacturing and profitability would be a good fit for me since I already had several years of successful project engineering under my belt. I also believed that by lowering my price per hour I would entice more clients to retain me. With a lower overhead rate, I believed I could undercut my competition. What I hadn't counted on was perceived market value.

I quoted and estimated a dozen projects. I was rejected every time. At one point, a brokerage company that was outsourcing a large project contacted me. I was told I had the qualifications that they wanted, but my price was way off. I expected him to tell me I was too high, and was shocked to learn that because of my low price they believed I didn't fully understand the scope of the project or that I would not be able to complete the project by running out of funds.

I rapidly explained my logic on the price and the project manager understood what I was trying to do. He then doubled my price and resubmitted my quote.

I was hired.

The first phase of the position required six time-study engineers to track two manufacturing lines 24 hours a day. The project was on the Lincoln Continental and Ford Focus engine frames. The company that ultimately contracted me was unable to produce enough quality engine frames to meet Ford Q1 status and was at risk of paying for Ford downtime. For every hour the Ford plant we supplied was down it cost this company in the neighborhood of $1 million dollars. Needless to say there was a lot of stress and attention on this project.

After four weeks of long hours and a massive Pareto analysis, I submitted a plan to accelerate the production speeds of the line.

My contract was up, but now I had intimate knowledge of the line (my real and perceived value had increased) and they wanted me to implement my plan. So we renegotiated my contract for another two months and I doubled my hourly rate which increased my perceived marketplace value.

After two months, we had already increased the line speeds, minimized any risk of downtime to Ford and had a steady plan to put this product line into profitability. Because of this work, I had three other manufacturing clients that wanted my services. My current client didn't want me to go just yet, so they offered to double my hourly rate, yet again, if I would stay another month. By this time I am making more money in a day than what I would have in a week under the original contract.

I had to call my potential new clients and let them know I wasn't going to be able to start their projects untill after the projected that was just extended had ended. To which all my new clients offered to increase my rate of pay to compete with this new hourly rate.

I went from a new start-up consultant, hoping to make $60K a year (decent for 1993) to averaging over $200K a year. All because of perceived value. Since others were willing to pay the increased rate and I was willing to turn work down because I had higher offers, a bidding war occurred. I had my pick of projects, made more money than I ever had, and had more contracts than I could handle for years.

Was I actually more valuable? Maybe (with my increased knowledge), but what I really learned though is Perceived Value and Real Value are two very different things.

So what does this have to do with dating?

Quite a bit it seems!

What does the poor "nice" guy do when he first wants to date a girl (and yes this included me till my 30′s)? He figures he will be very sweet; complimenting her looks, offering to take her anywhere or buy her something. This is the guy that tries to help her solve any problem she has. He places her on a pedestal (but not high enough to see up her dress). And what does she do? She rejects him, either by telling him she just wants to be friends, or by ignoring and avoiding him.

The problem isn't just one of being nice, or needy, or even confident enough. The issues is his perceived value compared to her perceived value. All women want to be with a man they perceive as having higher value than themselves. This is one reason the guy usually makes more than the girl he is with does. But the dynamic is not one of just money, but the overall package of perceived value.

Think about the interactions this girl has had with other men. If she is attractive, she has been complimented to death. Guys have gone way overboard immediately offering to buy her things, to take her out, hell, to even take her on an exotic vacation. Believe me, I know – I have done it.

And if you are offering something perceived as high value then you may get the date. When I was 27 and making great money, I was able to land a very hot "Miss Hawaiian Tropics" calendar girl. She was a waitress at a local BBQ shop, and I would go in to see her a couple of times a week. We flirted a little, and I offered to take her on a cruise. Yes, you read that right… I offered to take her on a cruise for a first date.

And guess what happened? We went on a cruise where we slept in the same room. No, we didn't have sex. She wanted the experience of the cruise, and she enjoyed the good time I provided, but the way I had presented myself combined with my "nice" attitude lowered my perceived value. I was slated in the "friends" category.

After two months of going on dates with her, I finally had it. On Friday night she said she wanted to come over after she got off work. I canceled my plans with the guys to be with her. She arrived at my house, proceeded to give me a short peck on the cheek then took a shower. After the shower she puts on one sexy dress and started on her makeup. I asked her, "Are we were going somewhere?" She informed me she was going to go hang out with a "friend".

This same girl had dated a guy that cheated on her, wasn't available all that often to be with her, had kept her at a distance and basically made her believe that his relative value to hers was higher.

And what did she do? Drop everything if he called. Break dates with me or friends to be with him. Chase him and pine for him. And she would have sex with him whenever he wanted.

So I started really thinking about the dynamics and the social interaction between us. As I have understood more, I realize there are ways to demonstrate high value without having to brag, or tell stories of some exotic adventure you may or may not have been on.

We know that women in general are going to pick the man with the highest value. Not the highest real value, but the one that makes her feel he has the highest value relative to what she believes her value truly is, and that is his perceived value. If she thinks you have high value, you will be treated as such.

But this is where the fallacy lies. Remember the real life consulting example, when I charged too little per hour compared to other bidders versus when I charged five times more than that? My Real Value was pretty much the same at either price. I got the job done, and increased the company's ROI. As I racked up my fees though, I was viewed as having a much higher Perceived Value. This is the value you are judged against in most social situations.

I knew I needed to raise my perceived value in dating as well, but anything I started to say or discuss sounded like bragging. After a lot of thought I realized when I didn't like the girl that much, I was more demanding of her. I also complied less with her, and instead compelled her to comply with me. Said another way, an easy way to demonstrate high value and therefore increase you perceived value is to ask girls to do things for you.

It is always situational, but if I was out I would have the girl buy me a drink. Or hand me a beer. Save my seat. Hold my jacket. Just little task that had them complying with my wishes. As I got better, my request became more outlandish and more fun. I had girls refer to me as "Master" or "Sir". This is always fun and good for some role playing.

And every single time I started an interaction with a girl and had her comply with my easy little task, she became more attracted to me. Even telling a waitress to comply with something she would do anyway works. And the better looking she is, the more this works.

You have to realize that most men do not do this. And only the guys that perceive their value as being higher than hers would even dare. You are leading her by giving her task, and she perceives you to be of higher value since she only complies with men she likes.

As time as gone on, I have told women to wash my bike, truck, or boat. I have had them do my laundry or cook me dinner. I have asked them to post pictures to a website, or search for some information I needed. I have had them stop for something to drink before they came over. Anything little I could think of that would allow them the opportunity to comply with my wishes.

And as they comply, this allows you to compliment them in a way that also demonstrates high value. Rather than saying "You are so beautiful", which is the typical nice guy opener, you can say, "Hey, watch my seat…" Then when you return, "Thank you so much for guarding my seat. You must be really ferocious”, with a slight wink.

Sometimes, if she doesn’t move out of my chair fast enough I will follow with, “You can move now”, then reward her by spending a little time with her.

Most people want to feel they have earned your time. Girls especially want to feel they had to work to get you. Put a high price on yourself. As others start to comply and feel your perceived value, then sit back and enjoy the women try to prove their value to you.

How To Shave Like A Barber

June 14, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

Monday, 7AM. Already late, I hop into the shower.

After quickly rinsing off, I pat myself dry and head to the sink.

I smear on some shaving cream and grab my razor. Stroke by stroke I remove the cream, and with it my facial hair.

Fuck. I have mauled my neck once again. Blood oozes out and travels downward towards my chest.

My Quest For The Perfect Shave

I need to shave. I was not blessed with facial hair that grows to form a sexy five o'clock shadow. Clean shaven, on the other hand, I am quite sexy. It's my only option.

So after mauling my own neck more than a handful of times, I decided to find a fix.

My first stop was the electric razor. I scoured amazon until finding an option with solid reviews. It sucked. While it didn't irritate my skin, I looked like a homeless crackhead with patches of unshaven hair scattered across my face and neck.

Then one day I was getting a haircut, and chatting with my barber. I decided to probe further into his area of expertise.

How To Shave Like A Barber

The following is what he told me. I use this method and consistently have incredible shaves that are quick, effective, and leave my skin intact and feeling refreshed.

1. Shower

Take a shower and head directly to the sink. The sooner, the better. A warm, steamy shower opens up your pores and softens your skin, so that the razor can smoothly glide across and do its thing.

2. Apply Noxzema

“This is my secret,” the barber told me.

Yes, women use it to remove makeup. And it has a crazy smell – that I like. Wet your face and neck with warm water and then apply a healthy amount of Noxzema.

It creates a smooth surface for your razor, cleans your skin, and leaves it feeling fresh and tingly.

3. Apply Shave Cream

Loading...

If you do not have sensitive skin, skip this step. The Noxzema may be enough for you. In my case, I go ahead and apply a layer of cream on top.

4. Grab A Sharp Razor

This is where I used to make my biggest mistake. Yes, razor heads are expensive, but this is not something you want to skimp on. You should ideally change your razor every 2 weeks.

And don’t worry about how many blades you’re sporting. 3 million dull blades will fuck up your face just as badly as two or three – if not worse.

5. Shave (Across The Grain)

Long, gentle strokes are key.

Don’t shave with the grain – you won’t get close enough.

Don’t shave against the grain – you will remove skin.

Shave diagonally across it – this insures a close shave that is still gentle on your skin.

6. Rinse Off

Use cold water – it feels refreshing and closes your pores.

5 Things I Learned From Call of Duty

June 15, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

I played a lot of video games growing up; not as much as those weird neck-bearded kids who play WoW, but enough to learn just how much time one can waste playing them. After I got home from school I'd grab a snack and sit my ass on the couch and start playing until dinner. I'd go to friends houses on weekends and play games and when a new game came out I'd play it tirelessly until I beat it. Fifteen hours a week isn't all that much when you're a teenager; school is easy and you have no reason to be doing anything else, but the older I get the more I realize how much of a time-sink it was. However, there are a few important lessons I learned from playing all those hours.

1. There are complainers…

Most guys who play CoD either talk shit about how they fucked your mother or they just keep silent. The rest are those who bitch and moan about every little detail. They're the guys who complain you're 'hacking,' playing unfairly, or using a loadout that gives you an advantage. They're the sore losers and you encounter them in the real world all the time. In the real world those same guys whine about following the rules because they are scared of stepping out of line, they are the people who believe everyone needs to be brought to the same level lest one be left out. The best way I've found to deal with them is just ignore them. Ignore those who complain about perceived problems the same way you would ignore some 13 year old kid whining how using RPGs aren't fair.

2. …and then there are those who find patterns.

On the more extreme end of things there are those who learn patterns and exploit them. They're the guys who learn spawning patterns, optimized loadouts, good sniping positions and so on. They put in serious time to get good at the game, they also know they have to do more than learn the game to get good at the game. In the time it takes them to master the theoretical or detail oriented parts of the game their motor skills have increased as well. These guys are like us. We improve our social skills, appearance, and confidence as well as exploiting the current system in order to get better at the game of life.

3. The importance of competition

Competition is at the core of our masculinity, without it we are just participating in existence. Call of Duty is the most immediate form of competition I have come across and I never realized its importance until the first powerlifting meet I competed in. At the meet adrenaline coursed through my veins between attempts and although I cheered others on I felt a burning desire to lift as much as I damn could to prove myself better than the rest. While you may only be competing against half-literate, drugged out teenagers playing Call of Duty, you still get that same rush when trying to annihilate the other team. Even while relaxing with friends, having a few beers and playing CoD you want to beat their score. You want to be the best.

Loading…

4. The average man sucks

The last CoD game I played regularly was the first Black Ops game. There was an option to look at another player's scorecard. This scorecard showed their kill/death ratio, win/loss ratio, and every other imaginable metric of success. In this data was hours played. Between matches I'd always look at the opposition's scorecard and 9 times out of 10 the dude had fucking terrible stats. I would regularly see players who played hundreds of hours yet still died more than they killed. Even though most guys play CoD to relax they're still fucking terrible and aren't any better than when they started. Same goes in the real world. Most men you meet will be extremely average, and as we all know average never got anyone anywhere. You reconnect with a friend 5 years down the line and his accomplishments include: having a mortgage, being in debt, becoming overweight, and maybe driving a new car.

5. People will do anything if given the right rewards

Video game developers are crafty sons of bitches, like social media mavens they sell instant gratification. When you think about it a game like Call of Duty is extremely boring and repetitive. Each game is 10-15 minutes long and you do the exact same thing each time, something has to keep you coming back. While much of the draw can be attributed to the thrill of competition and success there is another factor: the instant gratification of rewards. The first few hours you play Call of Duty you're assaulted with various medals, ribbons, unlocks and upgrades. You get a medal for 5 kills, then 50, then 500. You get sucked in from the start and desire the hardest to get rewards. As in the real world people will perform the same mindless action day in, day out given enough monetary or emotional compensation.

I still play from time to time. Its nice to do nothing but move your thumbs for an hour, but no man should spend the majority of his precious free time doing something so unproductive as playing video games. One of my biggest regrets from being a teenager was spending much of my time alone playing games when I could have been out doing something interesting, or in the very least reading books. However I'm grateful for the lessons I've learned. I know now to ignore those who complain and instead of complaining myself I seek out ways to overcome obstacles and get better. I know now how easily average people can be manipulated into doing mindless things if they are sufficiently compensated. Most importantly I know the importance of competition in masculine development.

Women Fighting Against Feminism

June 15, 2013 | by favouritemartian | Link | Original Link

In what appears to be a strange mix of investigative journalism, vigilante justice and public outrage, a French anti-feminist movement decided to infiltrate FEMEN (the hysterical topless Ukrainian girls chanting slogans about female exploitation, dictatorship, the Pope and Islam) a few months ago.

Sociologically speaking, FEMEN is a typical example of a special interest group getting indulged by the media and the political system until they attain a certain critical mass and therefore legitimacy and public validation.

Liberté Egalité Féminisme: The irony of what these banners mean in their hands is lost on them

FEMEN in Paris

It all started when the pro-feminist (who isn't these days?) socialist French government allowed FEMEN to establish their operational headquarters in Paris. The FEMEN's choice to go "Parisian" can be viewed as a very shrewd media strategy.

You can imagine the difference between media attention if you demonstrate topless in some industrial wasteland in Eastern Europe versus doing the same thing in front of Notre Dame de Paris or Eiffel Tower. Exposure-wise, it's only a little less beneficial than hiring Don Draper to do your publicity campaign.

La France Profonde

However, a lot of people including FEMEN do not know and can not even imagine that, despite all the Woody Allen references to French debauchery, France is a very conservative country with a very strong and non-negligible practicing Catholic population.

The presence of tens of thousands of men, women and children in the recent demonstrations against the same-sex marriage legislation in Paris and the violence that ensued attest to the veracity of these statements. Nowhere else in Europe was same-sex marriage so vehemently opposed and so emphatically decried as was in France.

While the tension was mounting between the right-leaning French populace and the socialist government on the issue of same-sex marriage legislation, the FEMEN started their topless protests in Paris in early 2013.

Although the French Penal Code forbids nudity in a public places, not only the FEMEN were not prosecuted, they were protected by the police during an anti-Pope demonstration which culminated in the desecration of the famous Notre Dame cathedral.

FEMEN trolling a Joan of Arc day rally in Paris

Les Antigones declare war on FEMEN

This was the proverbial straw that broke the camel's back. The French public, which is already notoriously short-tempered and fond of general strikes, took the desecration of the cathedral as an attack on their culture, their society and their lifestyle. The result of this public outrage was the coming into being of this anti-feminist movement, who call themselves Les Antigones.

At first the Antigones tried to demonstrate in the streets against FEMEN but this did not prove effective because the French mainstream media (like all mainstream media have the tendency to do) did not give them any coverage whatsoever. Exasperated and feeling frustrated to some extent, they decided to infiltrate FEMEN in order to have an idea about their working, organization and especially how they were financed.

The Mole

One of the Antigones members, Iseul Turan (probably a fictitious name), then sent FEMEN a topless selfie and asked how she could become a FEMEN member. When she didn't get an answer for a week, she decided to go to their headquarters, posing as a FEMEN groupie and asked for an autograph and then innocently inquired what it took to be a member of FEMEN.

Oksana Chasko invited her to a FEMEN boot camp the following Saturday and thus started a two-month infiltration period during which FEMEN disrupted a conservative, nationalist and crypto anti-gay rally during the Joan of Arc day celebrations in Paris.

Les Antigones: Booby-trapping the FEMEN

Advertising, Trolling and Attention-Whoring

Soon afterwards the Antigones decided to pull the plug on the infiltration operation and started laying out in the open what they had learned during two months of FEMEN immersion. First thing that Iseul Turan said she noticed was that FEMEN operated much like an advertising agency whose only objective was to create a buzz and garner as much media attention as possible.

This validates what the manosphere has been saying about the fourth-wave feminism for quite some time now, that this new-age feminism is nothing more than trolling, attention-whoring and validation-seeking without any core objectives.

It is also worth noting that FEMEN, who has an anti-prostitution stance, were paying prostitutes to march topless in their demonstrations against the exploitation of women. Whether the irony of this hypocritical behavior was noticed by FEMEN is still a moot point.

Topless Jihad Is Also Fat Jihad

The FEMEN members were considered nothing more as cheap cannon fodder, recruited solely on the basis of their photogenic appearance and whether they were willing to demonstrate topless in public or not. My heart goes out for fat girls who got the short end of the stick even from their feminist friends. It looks like FEMEN needs to take a Fat-Acceptance™ course along with a corporate anger management training program.

Loading...

Or perhaps the fatties need to learn that no amount of Fat-Acceptance™ would make them presentable to the camera or to the masses for that matter. “Curvy” ladies of the world take notice: neither the FEMEN nor the Antigones have presented one single overweight activisit to the camera.

Manospheric Leanings Of The Antigones

The Antigones have a very manospheric approach towards the female behavior and the female role in the society. It actually looks like they have been going through some of Roosh's early work. While comparing themselves to FEMEN, they issued statements such as "We are daughters of our fathers, wives of our husbands, mothers of our sons, we don't abandon the men".

They also said that "You (FEMEN) assert that machismo dominates our society and that you fight men, our reply is that only with men would we be women in the complete sense of the word". In fact Iseul used the word "feminine" so many times in her video interview that I thought that either Roosh or Krauser had worked as her copy-writer.

Iseul Turan: Spilling FEMEN's beans in front of Notre Dame de Paris

The Antigones: Anti-Feminist and Anti-Miscegenation

In the name of objectivity though, some particularities about the Antigones must be outlined here. Most of the girls in the following YouTube video adhere to (or at least sympathize with) a fairly hardcore Catholic/Christian, racialist, return-to-the-European-roots ideology.

The white robes being a reference to the purity of the race as well as to the Spartan women of the antiquity who were considered as guardians of traditional family values and hence responsible for the stability of the society.

This also explains the absence of any women of color in the video or even in the group itself . Not all the members of the group are shown in the video, however the members not present in the video are also young white upper middle-class girls; studying in various French universities, Law schools and Business schools.

Bourgeois Eats Bourgeois

The upper-class roots of the Antigones shouldn't however come as a surprise. Feminism itself is a very bourgeois concept and any ideology that attempts to counter feminism could only have come from a similar social background. The working classes have never had the intellectual capacity nor means to produce any ideology.

As far as their affiliation with racialist ideals is concerned, it could easily be explained by the absence of any other mainstream ideology (Right or Left, Socialist or Capitalist, Democratic or Republican) that opposes feminism.

It is perfectly logical that this movement be the consequence of a racial awakening or has gravitated towards a racial identity. Simply because anti-feminism in itself can never be a motivation or an ideology for women.

It has to be transcended by some enveloping theory which provides an intellectual basis and a rational explanation for opposing feminism. This transcendental ideology can only come from hardcore religious beliefs or racial identification because both these political theories are extraneous to the incumbent political orthodoxy which is staunchly pro-feminist.

Manoshpere, HBD and Anti-Feminism

Race trolls arriving on VK's (now defunct) blog

This attachment to the racial identity as a political thought is not a trivial matter for the manosphere, which has a lot of non-whites in its ranks. For instance Roosh, the founder of RoK, is not white. Virgle Kent, a game/manosphere heavy weight who is black, has written some epic posts about the presence of HBD theory proponents on his blog.

You only have to take a look at the comments section of any random Roissy post where wave after wave of race trolls tries to prove that feminists are race traitors and are destroying the society by encouraging hypergamy and as a result of it, miscegenation.

And that any anti-feminist movement in the long run would have to clash with cultural Marxism, political correctness and eventually disproportionate minority power in the political realm.

One would not be very wrong in concluding that although the Antigones are anti-feminists, their opposition to feminism is only secondary and stems from the fact that feminism is destroying the Western society (notice the subtlety here: feminism is bad because it is destroying the Western society, it's not bad because it's intrinsically bad for women) and that women are willingly or unconsciously participating in it's destruction.

Consider this as a caveat emptor before being seduced by their pro-manosphere message if you are not white ("of European heritage" in David Duke speak).

Final Message

The Antigones finish their message to FEMEN by saying: "Manipulation and exploitation of women for feminist causes will no longer be tolerated. We demand the return of Inna and Oksana back to Ukraine, and an end to all the direct and indirect subsidies to their movement. We also demand an end to the judicial immunity for FEMEN who proclaim themselves as terrorists but whom our justice system willfully chooses to ignore. FEMEN, Antigones are ready to fight."

Man’s Most Valuable Possession

June 16, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The poet Phaedrus (c. 15 B.C.- 50 A.D.) was a Roman slave who is credited with collecting various fables that were current in his time and rendering them into simple but elegant Latin verses called senarii (iambic verse). Most of his fables were drawn from Greek sources, chiefly those of Aesop. His purpose, he says in the prologue to his work, was twofold: “to draw a smile, and to provide prudent counsel for life”. In this goal he largely succeeded, for his collection of fables was consistently popular through the Middle Ages and the Renaissance.

One fable has held a particular resonance for me. It is called “On the Shipwreck of Simonides” (Phaedrus IV.22). I translate it as follows:

> The learned man always contains riches within himself.
> Simonides, who wrote beautiful verses, in order to
> More easily ward off poverty,
> Began to travel around the cities of Asia,
> Singing the praises of notables for financial reward.
> Having become wealthy by this type of compensation,
> He wanted to return to his native land by sea
> (He was, they say, born on the island of Chios).
> So he boarded a ship, which broke apart in the middle > Of the sea, because of its old age, and a horrible storm.
> Some people collected their bags, others their precious

> Things to sustain their lives.
> One curious person said to Simonides:
> “Simonides, you really have nothing for yourself to take?”
> He said, “I already have all of my things with me”.
> Then a few swam away, but most perished due
> To the weight of their possessions.
> Then robbers came: they took what each man
> Had recovered, leaving them naked.
> By chance there was an ancient city near, called Clazomenae,
> To which the shipwrecked men made their way.
> Here there happened to be a learned man,
> Who had read the verses of Simonides, and
> Was a great admirer of him from afar, never having met him.
> Recognizing Simonides, he received him warmly, adorning him
> With clothing, financial support, and family servants.
> The other shipwreck victims carried their blank slates,
> Begging for food.
> Simonides saw them, and spoke: “I said all my things were with me.
> And what you brought away from the ship, is gone.”
> Loading...

Our most valuable possession, so says Phaedrus, is our own store of knowledge and experience. Even if we lose all else, as long as we retain our reservoir of knowledge, then we will be able to start over. All of us will eventually encounter severe hardship in life. No one floats through life on a magic carpet, untouched by tragedy. Misfortune knocks on every man’s door eventually. It is the measure of a man to see how well he handles such misfortunes; staring into the abyss, we find our true character.

Know, my brother, that you will eventually be buffeted by storms, disasters, or extreme hardships. In such situations, a man may lose his material possessions, his job, or his financial support. If one has not spent his life in productive activity by increasing his knowledge and experience, then he will be ill-prepared to weather the extreme shock of misfortune. The acquisition of knowledge and wisdom provides a maturity and seasoning that can prepare the soul for weathering the dislocation and shock of tragedy.

Focus on yourself, brother. I do not say that possessions are unimportant. It is only that you and your development are far more important. Cultivate yourself, your knowledge, your experience, your body, your health, your mind. The disciplined and strenuous pursuit of such goals will shape your character and strengthen it. For in the end, your knowledge and experience are really the only things you own. All else is transitory, is shadow, is illusion. All else can be snatched away from you in an instant. It can happen in the blink of an eye.

So do not waste your time in useless trifles. Those who place the focus of their efforts on foolish pursuits not only exhaust and debase themselves, but they also waste precious time. Education and knowledge can arm you against the vicissitudes of fate, and the cruelties of life. Turn away from the pursuits of vanity, for they will fail you in your hour of need. They will not satisfy you, and their senseless pursuit will devour your spirit.

No matter the environment, and no matter the circumstance, the learned man always contains a store of riches within himself. He shall want for nothing.

Critical Race Theory Is Repackaged Narcissism

June 16, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Overview Of The Theory

Critical Race Theory, or CRT, was developed in the 1980's on the heels of the Critical Legal Studies movement that started in the 1970's. A number of prominent law professors, most notably Derrick Bell, began to piece together the movement in the halls of America's elite law schools. The main thrust of CRT is that white privilege and white supremacy is so thoroughly ingrained into the fabric of society, that the traditional approaches to combat racism against blacks are not enough. CRT scholars regularly attack all sorts of institutions, legal decisions and approaches that have generally been deemed not to benefit minorities.

It has to be said that there many good points are made in some of the articles, but the Marxist and feminist framework is damning.

CRT has a few main points that need to be laid out to understand what CRT is about. First, is the use of the narrative/storytelling. One of most striking parts of CRT is the emphasis on the personal narrative. Many CRT articles are framed completely through the experiences of the writer. It was referred to me as "naming one's own reality." That phrase stuck with me, as often racism is assumed on the part of the person who invokes CRT doctrine. For example, one young woman in my class was discussing a situation in which she was turned down for an internship at the school. She said it was because she was black. I pointed out that she could be right, but the conclusion you reached isn't necessarily true. I was smacked down and told to stop dictating women's experiences to them.

Another striking feature of CRT is its emphasis on intersectionality, the fact different people have different life experiences – like the difference between a gay black dude born in Harlem compared to a white woman born into wealth in Boston. It is one the most mindbogglingly obvious concepts in the world, but the creation of the concept has been credited to Kimberlie Crenshaw. This is where feminist, homosexual and class critiques come in. There is no conservative or libertarian thought in this school.

The final point I would like to highlight is opposition to essentialism. Essentialism means reducing one group of people to definable characteristics shared by all members of the group. Race, sex , class and sexual orientation are generally listed. One of those categories is not like the other – sex. CRT does not entertain any notion that men and women are biologically different. Well, they may assume some differences, but one isn't going to get away with an outright "essentialist" argument that men and women are fundamentally different.

Let's examine one article – Race and Essentialism in Feminist Legal Theory by Angela Harris (pdf).

The article is fairly predictable. In her critique of her fellow radical feminists, she emphasizes that they aren't racist. She takes them to task for ignoring black voices, knowing how incredibly judgmental feminists are. Her point that white feminists have generally ignored black voices and assumed that their experiences are the same for all women is on point – but her article comes off the rails after that.

She makes an exhortation for women to recognize their common enemy – men. She projects a bunch of personal issues onto other people – including a bizarre part where she states that women can't gain real identities until male domination is eliminated. Are some feminists waiting to sort out their personal issues until the dreaded patriarchy is destroyed? She makes a point that feminists need to move beyond superficial changes.

Loading…

CRT Is Narcissistic

I agree with her that feminism, in some ways – and CRT – isn't about real change. It's about moral judgmentalism and inaction. I can't even count how many times I read the phrases "white power structures" or "female subjugation," or "privilege." Instead of trying to empower themselves via change, the movement simply wants to spin their wheels in the mud and judge everybody else. It is a form of therapy. At this point, I want to highlight what I am talking about how and why people come to and use CRT. They don't want to take charge of their life; they want to blame everybody else.

I see this reflected in anti-game blogs. Instead of hitting the gym or learning game, these fools blame all their problems on everybody else and get insanely jealous when they see former equals going out and getting laid on the regular. I believe part of the psychology is that they want everybody at their level – frustrated, angry and impotent – so through their bleatings that game isn't real, they are hoping that some men that otherwise would have bettered himself stays a simp. The less men stepping up and making their lives better, the less jealous they are.

This is the fundamental problem with CRT. I came to the class naively thinking were going to have some real discussions about race in America, but I was dead wrong. It was clear all the women in the class, save one, had some serious issues – most of them related to men. They didn't want to hear the truth. They wanted to hear some honeyed words about how it's racism's fault they have a bitchy personality or it's patriarchy's fault ugly women don't get alphas. I was pissed off being told repeatedly that I "just kinda have to believe this."

CRT isn't about helping black people or minorities. It was and is about therapy. The women came to class to blame all their problems on race and sex. They didn't have the drive to better themselves. They did what probably pisses off many psychologists – the whole idea that, yeah, racism does exist and hurts you but you are using racism as a way to self-aggrandize and tell yourself you are better than you really are. It really is depraved when you think about it – the black women need black people to be hurt by racism so they can prop up their flagging egos by using racism to explain away their failures to live up their out-sized visions of themselves. Didn't get the job in Boston – most likely because of your grades in school and because you weren't friendly in the interview – you can always blame racism!

As for the white women, they just doubled-down on "female oppression" so they didn't have to check their privilege. They blamed all their problems in life on patriarchy and sexism.

In the end, the articles I read did often make some good observations and, sometimes, some good analysis. However, the framework was downright awful. It was too narcissistic, as evidenced by the concept of the personal narrative and inability to understand the world around them. It was like some perpetual therapy session – they pretend to want to change themselves or the world, but just seek to blame others so they can avoid dealing with reality.

How Game Of Thrones Depicts The Ultimate Feminist

June 17, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

HBO's Game of Thrones has just concluded another highly lauded season. I'm a fan of the show, so last week I began to break down some of the aspects of it that I've found most appealing and informative. This week I want to discuss another aspect of the show: its depiction of "girl power" and its engagement with feminism.

On my way to dinner on my campus a couple of weeks back I heard two girls talking about television shows that were worth watching. One then began trying to convince the other to start getting into Game of Thrones. Her reasoning?

"You'll LOVE Daenerys so much! She's, like, quite the feminist!"

My school is crawling with the kind of gender feminists whose reasoning we frequently question here and elsewhere in the manosphere. They all love to make specious arguments about patriarchal constructs in the show and/or misogyny, but at the same time they love the "empowered" feminist aspects of it. There is absolutely no question in my mind that the show's producers are aware of the "girl power" potential certain characters have in the show and no question in my mind that they're playing it up.

With that being said, I got to thinking about that particular girl's statement and began to see its validity. George R.R. Martin's Daenerys Targaryen is, in many ways, the archetypical Western feminist, and her depiction in the HBO series only enhances this image. Her connection to the modern feminist narrative is embodied in three primary ways:

1. She's extremely privileged.

Feminism is a product of privilege. Not all feminists are rich and not all feminists can be called privileged, but the movement itself was clearly born of prosperity and, to this day, remains dominated by the daughters of such prosperity (white, upper-middle class females concentrated primarily in or around major urban areas, especially on the East Coast). They are entirely the products of success built long before them, and it is that same success (wealth, safety, etc) that allows them to wield the influence they do now. Feminism as we know it much less visible outside of the prosperous "developed" western world, and this isn't a coincidence.

Daenerys is a princess, heir to a vast noble legacy founded hundreds of years before her. It is this privilege that provides her with the power (and the respect for it) that she wields in the show, and allows her to act as "empowered" as she does. She is entirely the product of successes built long before her, and it is that same success that allows her to wield the influence she does now. It is her privilege that allowed her to gain the assistance she needed to become the leader she is.

2. She's bad-boy property.

You want to talk about pretty girls (particularly those of the Western variety) in love with "bad boys"? Meet the love of Daenerys Targaryen's life:

3. Her persistence is due primarily to the actions of the men who support her.

Feminism's persistence and success depends on male acquiescence. Without men to build and maintain the society in which they live while also protecting its inhabitants and creating the tools and technology they use, feminism as we know it cannot begin to develop, much less actually gain influence.

Daenerys is similarly reliant on men, who lay the foundation for her power and for her continued existence.

Her status as the wife of Khal Drogo provided her first taste of credibility as a leader and allowed her to gain her first subjects. It was also through her marriage with the Khal that she was able to acquire her dragons—they were a wedding gift.

Loading…

Jorah Mormont, the exiled Westerosi knight who has advised her since her wedding with the Khal, has saved her life more than once. Though originally contracted to betray Daenerys in return for social and monetary gain, he goes back on this and continues to protect her. His advice not only facilitates her growth as a leader, but also keeps her alive on more than one occasion. She would be lost and likely dead without him.

Ser Barristan Selmy, also an exiled Westerosi knight, provides another example of a man without whom Daenerys would probably be dead.

In Season 3 following her proposal to trade a dragon for an army, both of these men question their queen in front of her trading partner. Their advise is sound, as is their worry—it does appear to all the world that she's about to make a silly deal. She responds by threatening them with dismissal.

Though one can see where that threat is coming from, it is difficult to imagine her actually going through with it. Her threats, like those feminist calls for the "end of men" and claims of male irrelevance, are impractical. As mentioned earlier, feminists can't persist without male labor and acquiescence. The entire ideology is the product of prosperity produced primarily by men, and it will die in the absence of that. Again, modern feminism's general confinement to the prosperous developing world is not a coincidence.

Daenerys, similarly, can't persist without men, particularly the two advisers she has threatened with redundancy. She would not be alive now without them and she wouldn't last long in their absence.

It isn’t hard to see the appeal of this particular scene or of Daenerys in general to female viewers. They’re anxious to see signs of female power, and Daenerys seems to offer them. She wields tremendous influence and she scolds grown men like children. Her threat against Mormont and Selmy conveyed this quite well: two experienced, powerful fighting men left browbeaten by a dainty little girl who then goes off with a female slave by her side and tells her this as those men follow along sheepishly in the background:

She taps into the wannabe “badass” fantasies of many a Western woman. She is the ultimate feminist fantasy girl.

Like most such displays of feminist “empowerment”, however, there is much more to the story. Regardless of the desire for “girl power”, Daenerys (like her real-life feminist counterparts) will always owe a significant debt to men. The “End of Men” is not near, no matter how many “feminists badasses” try to indicate otherwise.

Is Your Smartphone Cock Blocking You?

June 17, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

In today's world smart phone's are less of a necessity and just simply a reality. The once common flip cell phone is all but on the verge of extinction, and with $40-$50 a month no-contract policies available, even Obama phone users have access to smartphones. As awesome as they are in regards to the information overload you now have available a few inches away from your cock, is it really helping or hurting?

The Good

Thanks to smartphones, you know have a few added advantages to the dating/hookup scene.

1. Google Maps

You used to have to worry about knowing where you were going. Even if you decided to go to a local venue, if you hadn't been there before, you may walk past it six times before noticing it. But now with phones you can simply yell the address and it tells you exactly where to go.

2. There's an app for that Can't spell, there's an app. Need to pay your bill so you have a place to bang, app for that. Need something to do while you shit, there's an app for that. There are literally so many apps that you could argue pulling your kid out of school and having it learn from your iPhone.

3. Dating connectivity

While personally I avoid online dating, anyone wishing to venture into it now has the advantage of the dating app. The plus side is half of them just simply tell you who is nearby rather than making you set up a complicated profile. If anything it's a decent blend of your picture looks decent, and if I can spot you at a bar and you look like the picture, you can talk, and then bang.

4. Access to venue reviews

Say you go downtown and the bar sucks, and you're not from the area. Smartphones allow you to use Google to find a place that's both nearby and find a review on it. This saves countless amounts of walking up and down a street to only end up in some dump crap venue where you're going to leave five minutes later.

The Bad

But for the negative side, there's some big downfalls to smartphones as well.

1. Social skill killer

For being only 25, I'm still a fan of the old fashion call for a date. The problem is, no one else is. It's not uncommon for me to call, only to have no answer, and then get an immediate text response of "hey whats up?" While this makes hookups easier when someone happens to be preoccupied, such as being at work, the flakiness is rarely due to an acceptable excuse. It's just primarily due to the fact that people want to hide behind a screen. AIM back in the day did the same thing, only this is worse, because this is with people 24/7, 365.

Loading...

2. Addiction

It's now being proven that people are addicted to cell phones. They cannot look away from their phones for five minutes, which in turn means you do not get their attention for more than four minutes. This sadly isn't a case of looking for the wrong women. The majority of people I have encountered are just simply addicted to technology. If you ever doubt it, go to a mall on a weekend and find a high school couple together. Nine times out of ten they will be walking together smiling, and texting someone else. I imagine the conversation goes "OMG I'm having so much fun with my bf at the mall." Meanwhile, neither of them ever talk to each other.

3. There's an app for that

Yes, this is a bit of a contradiction to the above, but a key point. Initially apps were useful. Now people are coming out with programs that are only hindering the intelligence of the human race. Becky's use of an app to see what astrological signs match up with her for dating will not get you laid unless you happen to be the one sign the app says matches up. As dating apps gain popularity as well, you're likely to see some blockage of cold approaches which will leave you stuck sending bait through an app. Game over.

He had such a great opener, from across the room, on his phone.

The only thing I can conclude from technology, primarily smart phones, is that they are the worst invention created in terms of game. Where they were once unique and useful, they've become common and pointless. The ability to assist has been shoved to the back of the room, while the primary focus is on ruining your intelligence and cockblocking you.

In the end, the only hope I can see for technology losing ground is if a trend is started going against technology. In it's current form though, you no longer have to worry about Ashley's fat-ass friend cock blocking you. Now you have to worry about her damn iPhone.

A Woman's Sexual Experience Means Nothing

[image]
Quite possibly my least favorite blue pill belief is the idea that a woman should be judged on her prior sexual experience. It leads men into a false sense of security whenever they believe she's a "good girl." Since she's not a slut, the reasoning goes, she's proven to be more trustworthy than a slut. I say nay; assume she is a bad woman until proven otherwise. Especially if she calls herself a virgin, assume guilt.

While I agree that "You can't turn a whore into a housewife," it is also true that some slutty housewives are not whores. Men should be less concerned with finding a chaste wife than finding a loyal one. Consider the following about virgins: Either she is a virgin because she is young, or she is a old prude who wants to use men with her sexuality. In the former case, she is but a young girl with plenty of time for her to turn into a slut, since all sluts are born virgins, or in the latter case, she is the worst type of relationship material possible as she is unable to open up to a man's love, only using her sexuality as a means to some end, always placing her interests above any man's.

For a real world example of an old virgin, see Exhibit A:

Claims to be a virgin… don't offer to marry her all at once now.

Olympic Athlete Lola Jones, in addition to loving attention, is also an extreme case of the old virgin archetype. She portrays her virginity as valuable, when in fact it represents her inability to bond with a man.

> "I've been tempted. I've had guys tell me, they're like, 'Hey you know if you have sex it will help you run faster,'" Jones revealed, before sharing her response. "If you marry me, then yeah."

She frames the conversation as something she is saving for "her husband," that is, something she is using as a bartering chip for the best possible deal in the mating game. She makes it sound like no one has been willing to marry her. But given how much of a buyer's market today's dating game is, which is more likely to have occurred? Did Lola Jones never find any quality men? Or did Lola Jones never accept any man? It is obvious that her virginity is not an asset, but instead a giant red flag indicating her intimacy issues. She approaches love with a mercenary's eye, evaluating men based on her personal gain.

I would say any woman who is a virgin after the age of 20 is already a bit crazy, and after 25 she will make the top 10 worst women you've ever dated (or at least top 100). But in any case, a woman who saves her virginity past her most sexually desirable years truly isn't interested in marriage as much as she's interested in herself. Although she's never cheated on any man, she has never been loyal to any man either.

Likewise, a young virgin has not proven to be anything more than a pretty face, tits, and ass. Even if you're the man to claim her cherry, she's still nothing more than a new girl you've started banging. I'll never forget how one of my close friends took the virginity of a 22 year old girl. He thought he had found "The One." He could not get enough of the sex, and could not stop raving about her. But when he revealed he had to go get his Masters in another city, it was but only two weeks after he moved before she was sleeping with a different man.

My friend's girl was not loyal. She valued herself over her man, and that's why, even though she "gave" her virginity to him, she was nothing but a slut who had saved her virginity. Valuing virginity, which is inherent to a woman's birth, is just as absurd as valuing a woman for anything else inherent to her birth, such as her eyeballs or hair. Certain crazy religions have worshiped a woman's virginity as if it revealed an important truth about her character, when, in fact, they have it backwards: A woman of loyal character is more likely to only sleep with one man in her life, but women who've only slept with one man may still be a lying, manipulative, nagging, and combative battleaxe. It is necessary for a woman of good character to have slept with few men, but it is not a sufficient.

Blue pill men mistake the effect for the cause, and see sexual experience as an odometer to be measured, when in fact it is nothing more than one card from her hand. You do not have a complete picture and if she's smart, you never will. So don't be a dumbass who places value on a woman's sexual history. Without any sort of context, virginity means nothing. By logical extension, if there's no reason to value a virgin, then there's no reason to value any woman who claims to have limited sexual experience.

And continuing further, I would go as far to say that a huge slut may yet still turn out to be better relationship material (never marriage material) than a virgin, since with the slut you know what you are getting while the virgin is someone who may put on false pretenses with her chastity.

Whenever a woman tells you her sexual experience, realize that she is trying to manipulate you by showing you an incomplete picture, shrug your shoulders, and just give her a one word answer of your choice: "Cool." "Okay." "Neat." "Whatever."

"I'm a virgin." YOU: shrugs "Cool."

"I've only had two boyfriends before you." YOU: shrugs "Okay."

"I've slept with 100 men." YOU: shrugs "Neat." (Guaranteed you'll make her feel insecure with this reply.)

"I'm not like other girls. I'm not easy." YOU: shrugs "Whatever."

Summer Festival Guide

June 18, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

If you're a music fan you're likely checking out a festival this summer season. Here are a few tips to get the most out of your experience:

Logistics

Many festivals (e.g. Lollapalooza, Outside Lands) take place in the heart of major cities. Use Airbnb or Craigslist to rent a private apartment, or at least a room with some privacy. If you're in an unfamiliar city, your first instinct will be to get a place close to the festival. Fight this urge — the better move is to book closer to the area of maximum nightlife in the city. If you can find a cheap hotel then do it, but keep in mind that they fill up fast and often are farther away from nightlife.

Music

I was overwhelmed by the sheer mass of people the first time I attended Lollapalooza. People will line up an hour beforehand to get a prime spot even for less popular bands, and the crowds increase exponentially as the day goes on. Accept that you're not going to be front-and-center for every band you see. Determine the 2-3 shows you want to be close for, and arrive at least an hour before showtime. At multi-stage festivals it can take up to 30 minutes to get from one end of the festival grounds to the other, so keep this fixed cost in mind when deciding whether to bounce from stage to stage. For latecomers, it's easier to worm your way to the front of the crowd if you're with a cute girl, but you'll still get a lot of shitty looks and random elbows thrown your way.

Enhancements

If there's anything that will enhance your personal festival experience — alcohol, drugs, etc. — bring it. The security at the entrance is typically concerned only with whether you have a weapon. They will rarely care about your flask, joint in a sunglasses case, etc. Don't be careless, but you're not going to get a TSA-level search when there are 50,000 other people waiting to get in.

If you are a drinker, you absolutely need to bring a flask and a bottle of liquor to refill it each night — this will save you $40-$50 worth of expenses each day. A flask is a necessity even if money is no object for you. Why? Beer is the main alcohol offering at many festivals, and to get reasonably intoxicated you have to consume lots of liquid. This will force you to take frequent bathroom trips and lose the best spots for your favorite bands. Repeat after me: "My flask is my friend."

I'm not a drug user, but if you enjoy entertainment of the chemical variety it's fairly easy to bring them in in a sunglasses case or pocket. Worst case scenario, you stick them in your underwear as you walk through the door. Security once inside is almost non-existent, and if you're not bothering anyone else you will not be hassled for smoking pot, tripping, or whatever your heart desires.

Loading...

Some people bring water bottles, but don't do this. There are refilling stations where you can re-use bottles you buy in the festival if you're concerned about saving money. This beats walking around all weekend toting a cumbersome (and goofy) Camelbak.

Pickup

First, the good news. There are a TON of young girls at these festivals. If you're over the age of 25, you are bound to feel old at least a few times during the weekend. There is a lot of great scenery and an unlimited number of approach opportunities.

The bad news is that it's difficult to pick up at most concerts. Though you are surrounded by young supple flesh, girls are with their friends and are more interested in displaying their scenester cred and "YOLO"ing than forming a connection with a stranger.

At Lollapalooza there is always a tent with electronic dance music. This is your best bet if you're looking to hook up, though you may have to put up with shitty music in the process. The rave-like atmosphere and mind-altering substances most people are on will make it easier to approach and escalate.

In the trenches of the normal rock shows, you have to grind out approaches and talk to everyone. You will at least meet interesting people and get tips on good bands while beating the bushes for prospects. Once you find reasonable targets, it helps to offer material value rather than just your personality. This seems counterintutive and "beta," but unless you are fantastically good looking, girls have short attention spans at these events. It's amazing how impressed young girls are with booze and weed, so just charge some sharing to the game. If you're in a camping festival, sealing the deal will be easier due to the Vegas-like, removed-from-the-real-world atmosphere. Treat this more like a club pickup where you live across the street.

When people disperse at night from a city festival your prospects often dry up. Remember the logistics from earlier? If you have prospects from the day, suggest bouncing to your rented apartment or hotel room for an afterparty, or pregaming going out in the city. If you aren't able to get any solid leads during the festival you're still in business. Go home to clean up, and then hit the town near the centrally-located apartment you rented. Pillage the local women as you would otherwise.

Conclusion

Get a cool place. Pick your favorite bands. Talk to everyone. Bring a flask. Share your goodies. Enjoy the city. Find good food. Run your normal game. Pickup or not, you're set for a memorable weekend.

Dictionary Of American Girlspeak, Volume I

June 19, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

American Girlspeak, though seemingly intelligible, is actually quite different from the language men like you and I use. While ours is a relatively straight-forward and functional lexicon, theirs is one ridden with obfuscating euphemisms, ambiguity, and double-speak. Words that mean one thing to us, can mean an entirely different thing to them. For better or worse—if you expect to transact with those who speak the female tongue (who, of course, aren't always women)—you need to be equipped with the proper linguistic equipment.

awkward

1. malleable word most often deployed as a no-fault excuse for inept, lazy, or outright rude social behavior. 2. also: term used to lay claim to the currently fashionable persona of nerd.

creepy

1. catch-all phrase used by girls for anything they can't (or won't) articulate that makes them uncomfortable or shatters an imagined fantasy of how things should be. Its power lies in its very ambiguity, since it can be used to intimate anything, from sexual deviance to illegality, without having to actually say it. 2. word often used to shame natural male sexuality. 3. girls' go-to phrase to attempt to shut down a conversation.

douchebag

1. last-resort insult for an otherwise attractive, tall, and/or put-together guy. 2. insult usually reserved for white guys, since racially tinged insults (e.g., "ghetto") are less effective against them.

guy friend

1. unfortunate male who's been irretrievably snared in the friendzone web or in an emotional-tampon cycle. 2. a male orbiter who occupies a space on a girl's unwritten second-stringer waiting list. 3. occasionally a girl's label for a former hook-up with whom she's kept an amicable relationship.

hooked up

1. deliberately ambiguous term that can refer to any kind of intimate contact—from plain-and-simple kissing to a triple-penetration gangbang. 2. noun: hook-up.

Loading...

iPhone

1. the bane of Western (and increasingly global) romantic life, which has destroyed a woman's ability to connect with a male suitor by steadily eroding her attention-span, providing her with a 24/7 social crutch, and giving her the means to binge on an array of character-destroying attention-whoring behaviors. 2. female status symbol whose possession grants no social cachet, but whose absence is regarded as a negative.

nerd

1. term that used to describe an unfashionable and socially awkward person who displays above-average academic ability (or excels in non-athletic endeavors), but has gradually come to connote someone who merely wears oversized dark-framed glasses, possesses below-average conversation skills, displays little-to-no scholarly or musical talent, and has given up on improving these conditions. 2. a no-risk social label (and pre-packaged, played-out persona) that girls have adopted now that it's safe to do so, having been stripped of its social stigma by an increasingly emasculated society that protects the weak at the expense of the strong.

1. extreme slut who also hooks up with women.

sex-positive

1. new-age feminist jargon for no-consequences sex for women. 2. see slut-shaming.

Starbucks

1. calorie-loading malt shop that masquerades as a global coffeehouse chain. 2. place that provides fat girls plausible deniability for their obesity, by serving them high-calorie milkshakes and other sugary drinks mislabeled as simple coffee.

There Is No Spoon

June 19, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

One of my favorite movies is the Matrix. That comes as no surprise as it is widely known as a great movie and a pioneer in the concept of how people perceive their worlds. And as we all know, its concept of blue pill/red pill is arguably the backbone of this website and other mansophere based sites. But there is one particular scene that I absolutely love in that movie, and try to remind myself of it often:

"There Is No Spoon"

> Spoon boy: Do not try and bend the spoon. That's impossible. Instead… only try to realize the truth.
> Neo: What truth?
> Spoon boy: There is no spoon.
> Neo: There is no spoon?
> Spoon boy: Then you'll see, that it is not the spoon that bends, it is only yourself.

It is the basic premise of the entire movie. Once you realize that the limitations you believe exist are only in your mind, then you can do anything because those limitations actually do not exist. Now obviously you cannot defy the laws of physics by flying or have 100% success by pulling threesomes cold on a nightly basis (or in this case, actually bending a spoon with your mind). But its amazing what you can actually do if you take yourself out of the mindset that "x" is not possible.

Application To Women

I am hardly pioneering any new thoughts or creating any new ideas. I can just relate my own experience as I had many limiting beliefs before. Lots of them have been shattered in the past few years alone, as I spent more time in the red pill world. Such as that one night stands are pure luck. Wrong. They are a result of some luck, but also developing a systematic approach to reach this goal involving hours of practice, logistics, screening and so forth.

Loading…

I've also had the pleasure of meeting and hanging out with some fellow ROK writers. For example, McQueen was met with hesitation about his 4 bangs in 30 hours article. Some thought it was bullshit. Three years ago I would not think that was possible absent celebrity status. But if you meet the guy, he operates in a totally different reality. I can never sustain that type of energy and being a lawyer does not surround you with hot drunk women like his job does. When you actually see his attitude in play in that kind of setting, you quickly go from skeptical to impressed.

I can definitively credit my last Vegas success partly to Emmanuel's unrivaled aggressiveness in kissing a girl quickly upon meeting. Having seen him do it many times before, at that moment in Vegas I went for it within seconds of meeting the girl. It worked. Again, something I did not previously think was possible, much less successful. Now I do it a lot more often.

One cool thing you can try at home — next time you are on a date with a girl just don't answer some of her questions. Literally don't respond to a question you don't want to, be silent and then start a new conversational thread. You'll be amazed that more than half the time she won't even inquire as to why you never answered her.

Application To Life

I am still being exposed to these applications of the no spoon reality. I have a friend who went from unable to keeping any job to being on the verge of becoming a multimillionaire. In college I saw a tiny thin guy rendering a massive man immobile with a self-defense move. Basically things you see in movies and do not think is possible. But it happens everyday.

A very educated guess would be that most of you reading this site have had several realities shattered in the past. Every time I see something with my own eyes that I previously thought was "impossible" I get a huge rush. I'm very excited to have my realities continue to be shattered in the future.

The Number 1 Way To Have A One Night Stand

June 19, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

I don't know about you, but I enjoy one night stands (ONS). The thrill of going out at night, meeting a new girl and fucking her within minutes or hours, has not gotten old to me. Fresh Flesh, I like to call it. Generally, players are driven by discovery. Discovery of a new body, how her pussy feels, what does her tits look like, is she good in bed, does she swallow; all of these discoveries are exciting and the reward for conquering a new girl.

A large part of it for myself, is the mental conquest of the girl. By pulling her the same night, in the face of competition, I have proven myself to be the best with game that night, in that moment, in that venue. While it's important to NOT base your self-esteem on whether you pull or not, it's fun to be good at your hobby, and that's what ONS's are to me; a hobby, that I happen to be great at.

The Number One way to pull a girl for a ONS is to head to a nightclub or bar.

I'm sure some of you just started to scroll to the Comments section to put me on blast for this statement, but reality is, there is NEVER a better environment for meeting a girl, escalating and fucking her within minutes or hours, then a nightclub or bar. Daygame is great for meeting quality women, but I think it's simply a matter of preference. If you have the ability to meet a girl at Starbucks and do an insta-date followed by sex, then more power to you, however, for those of you starting out in game, or those of you who are impatient, there is no quicker way to build your notch count and develop your social IQ, then learning to pull out of a club or bar.

These are the 5 reasons…

5. Current Culture

Now more than ever, we live in a culture where ‘going out’ is mainstream. Almost every pop/rap song that is being blasted in 21 yo sluts cars across America, from artists (and I use this word liberally) like Katy Perry to Jay-Z, from Ke$ha to Pharell, is about ‘going out’ and ‘poppin bottles’. The Electronic Dance Music (EDM) scene has exploded into becoming a part of our generation, much like the Beatles and the 60′s generation. It’s not just music; it’s a way of life. With going out such a big part of our generation; it’s no wonder that for almost every 21 yo girl in America, the HIGHLIGHT of their week is going out to a club or bar. It’s become acceptable for girls to get drunk and ‘make mistakes’ and chalk it up to that ‘crazy night in Vegas’. I didn’t create this current culture, I’m simply the messenger. Learn it, exploit it.

4. Sluttiest Girls Are At A Club

The hottest, sluttiest girls are in nightclubs. I didn’t say the hottest, best relationship material types; but the hottest AND sluttiest are at the club. If you want a girl who’s into fitness and that you can take home to Mom, then hit up your local Yoga studio and maybe you’ll find a girl of worth, but don’t complain if it takes 2-3 ‘dates’ to get into her panties.

If you want a steak for dinner, do you go to a cow pasture and pet a cow? Do you feed it grain and brush its coat? Hell no. You go to the butcher and select a slab of meat to take home and eat. Make life simple on yourself and cut out the bullshit. Girls like to get drunk and have ‘fun’, which usually entails getting naked with a guy they met at a club.

3. Alcohol

Without a doubt alcohol lowers girls inhibitions turning them into cock-craving nymphos, throwing inhibitions, morals and pregnancy concerns out the window of the club. Alcohol is the ‘lubricant’ for gaming girls; both on your end (if you need liquid courage) and on their end, to get comfortable getting naked so quickly with a ‘stranger’. We all have heard a girl’s favorite excuse for having a ONS, “I was drunk”. No shit slut, now do a shot.

2. Law of Abundance

The Law of Abundance is one of two factors that I believe are the most important components of game. The other is Frame. Striking out in a club is no big deal. Why? Because there's another 200 girls to meet. No where else can you find such an abundance of slutty girls in one place, consuming alcohol and partying. Sure you have to deal with cock-blockers, but that only tightens your game. Does it mean you'll pull 100% of the time? Hell no, but you increase your chances for a ONS by putting yourself in the right place.

1. Girls Just Want To Have Fun

Especially when they are freshly turned 21 year old sluts. They live for the weekend and the next 'big' party. Girls associate nightlife with fun. When you combine Environment + Alcohol + Sluts = Good Bang Statistics. If I had a dollar for every time I've heard a girl say this phrase, I'd be retired right now. This generation has YOLO'd itself into a hole of debt and stupidity, but that's neither here nor there; point is, girls are living FOR the moment to such an extent, that it's like taking candy from a child, to pull a girl out of the club for a ONS, if you know what you're doing.

Is There A Way Back To How Things Were?

June 20, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

I have always been a big believer in evolution, adaptation and the general cyclical nature of things. I have been convinced of this by compelling forces of nature. Seasons change, day is followed by night and yet followed again by day and the sun goes up and down. Our mood changes from being happy, excited and patient to anxious and depressed. Even our actual being and procreation is triggered by a cyclical motion in bed of going back and forth. Without that simply, even primitive motion, semen will not erupt from penis and will not shower a woman's egg and no new life will be created.

This cyclical nature of our planet and our being makes me harbor hope that the decline in our social dynamics is also a cyclical phenomenon that will inevitably be replaced by emergence from this post-modern mediocrity of how we communicate with each other. I may be naive but I hope that maybe, one day, people will take off their sunglasses, will stop trying to look so cool and all the wrong ways, and will go back to looking each other in the eye more. They will get off their cellphones and will start eavesdropping on the conversations around them and will listen other noises that the world produces.

In my little fantasy world, I see how people abandon Facebook and texting, and pick up the phone to hear each others' voices. They start making albums with photographs, pulling out the ones that bring the most sentimental memories and holding them in their hands for a long time, reminiscing on the times when the photos was taken, rather then browsing their Picasa folder.

Loading…
I know I am fooling myself but I still hope that one day our big bookstores will open up again, and I will be able to go through isle after isle and browse all kinds of books and magazines, checking out various publications, while having coffee and people watching, all at the same place.

When that day comes, the new people I meet will not ask me "Are you on Facebook?" but will go back to asking me for my phone number, like it used to be in not so distant past. Guys will go back to calling the girls they want to ask out instead of sending lame text messages.

From that day on, I will only receive actual, not "virtual" greeting cards for my birthday. And, the people who want to get to know me will do that by talking to me and observing my behavior and actions rather than googling me and making a bunch of unwarranted assumptions about who I am based on what they find.

It will be exactly the same day when being a dick doesn't make you cool, and being a douchebag doesn't earn you respect. It will be the same exact perfect day when no one flakes on each other, and small talk about weather and traffic yields to discussing things that really matter, even if it means disagreeing or criticizing something or someone. Judging will no longer be a crime. On the contrary – it will be a necessarily element of evaluating and re-evaluating ourselves and the world around us for continuous growth and improvement.

Are Feminists Genuinely Serious About Their Cause?

June 21, 2013 | by Whiskey | Link | Original Link

In case you don't speak Portuguese nor Spanish, the video above is a declaration of love from a girl named Sara Winter to her fiance for a Valentine's Day Contest promoted by a Brazilian clothing chain, which is celebrated on June 12th in Brazil. It looks like any other Valentine's Day video: she says he is her best friend; that they are engaged even they know each other for only four months; that she's leaving behind her family and her company to go to another state, because there's where her fiance works; and that she made a tattoo because of him and had his name written on her chest through scarifications.

That passionate girl you see in the video was the leader of FEMEN's Brazilian branch not long ago. Sara Winter is a good example of the kind of woman behind these feminist movements. Ex-prostitute and far right supporter. She supposedly got her pseudonym, or war name, as she likes to call it, from Sarah Winter, a British Nazi supporter during the 30's and early 40's.

She got expelled from the group in May, accused of being dishonest and a liar by the Ukrainian branch, because she didn't use the money FEMEN sent her for their intended purposes, like funding the protests . When asked by a Brazilian journal, Alexandra Shevchenko, FEMEN's co-founder, said that "Sara didn't respect the group's ideology" and that "she wasn't capable of doing what was necessary and wasn't ready to be part of FEMEN". It makes you think how she got there in the first place.

Anyway, now you might be thinking what Sara couldn't do that cost her position. That was defacing the statue Christ the Redeemer, known as one of the New 7 Wonders of the World. The Ukrainian branch ordered Sara to rent a helicopter to go to the statue and deface it. That's how serious feminists are about their protests and about what they are capable of doing to get what they want.

Behind The Protests

Loading…

Most of the feminist groups' leaders are like Sara Winter. They use whatever means they can to be at the commanding position of the local group. They protest seeking "support", most likely money, from bigger groups and non-governmental organizations, to get attention from media and more importantly, to affiliate with politicians, who sees supporting these groups as a way to get more votes.

That's the simple reason behind those loud protests: money and power. As leaders, they are the first to touch the money they get from their supporters. And just like Sara did, they take part of the money for themselves.

There are so many feminists groups out there that it's too hard to know where and with what they are spending that money. That's why we don't see many news about feminist leaders using the money with their own things. Unless they spend so much with their things that it gets attention from the media. When that happens, it's just a matter of time to watch who is going to accuse who, since no one wants a bad reputation to their movement. Just like Alexandra Shevchenko did to Sara.

After The Fall

And what should you do when those that you supported turn their backs against you? It's simple! You turn to you beloved beta husband looking for stability through his money and career as if your past didn't exist at all. That's how serious they are about their movements when problems arise.

This kind of behavior may not be new among them, but seeing one of them going from protesting naked in the streets to leaving everything behind to be dependent on her husband made me think, again, how this whole thing they call feminist movement is a lie.

It serves no purpose other than gaining money and inverting society's values and making slutty women look like they're an ideal catch.

Everything Is Just A Hobby

“Goodbye.”

I turn my shoulders and walk out of the room. Out of the building.

A feeling of freedom creeps over my body. I smile, looking ahead to my next venture.

This was the final day of my previous job. A job I enjoyed – until I realized I must try something new. So I left

Too often people paralyze themselves by assuming they will work their job forever. Or remain with the same girl forever. Don’t make this mistake.

Your job, girls, lifting weights, reading, writing, playing sports, traveling – are all the same. All hobbies. The moment you become overly invested in anything – you lose. You risk an emotional downfall when it comes to an end, expectedly or not.

Furermore, becoming overly invested in any one area generally kills your performance across the board. Imagine that girl that you lost it for. All you could think about was her, whether you were with her or not. First of all, your mind is absent when you’re at the gym or at work. Your productivity goes down, and so do your lifts. And it doesn’t end there. The fact that you put her on a pedestal causes the relationship to go stale. She gets sick of your intense affection and leaves. The house crumbles.

Loading...
The same phenomena occurs when you get lost in your job. Picture the attorney on a big case that neglects his diet, exercise, sleep, even his family. Maybe he wins the case, but his life goes down the drain. He gets fat, depressed, divorced, and loses his kids to his wife. All because he put too much importance in one area.

When you make the shift and view everything on an even playing field, something changes. A natural balance emerges. You can enjoy spending time with your girl(s) but also look forward to hitting the weights, reading a good book, or hanging out with your buddies. Everything has its place. Nothing should be neglected, nothing should be placed on a pedestal.

One way to make the shift is to view everything as a hobby. It keeps things fun, light, and playful. You stop taking yourself so seriously. And as a result, your performance and enjoyment in every area is raised. If you don’t get the girl, whatever – go work on your business, or enjoy that book.

No single area can make you. Or break you.

How Teaching English In China Can Improve Your Game

June 22, 2013 | by Nonpareil | Link | Original Link

First things first; this is not a 'How to get laid in China' post; to get laid in China, you need just five things;

1. Be foreign. Black, White, Latino, Indian or Middle-Eastern, it doesn't matter. Order of race attractiveness: 1) White/Chinese, 2) Latino, 3) Black, 4) Middle Eastern, 5) Indian (just because they're Chinese doesn't mean they can have a race ladder)

2. Have enough cash. A teachers' salary is more than enough.

3. Have entry-level game. Entry level meaning that you aren't afraid to approach and make moves.

4. Shoot for the middle. Especially as a first-timer with limited language skills. You have to accept that many of the top-end girls in China are either a) locked down by the ballers with ca$h, or b) prostitutes. Not that the middle is bad—the 'average' Chinese girl is about 1-1.5 points higher than the 'average' American girl because she knows how to dress herself and is skinny. But understand where your aim will be at. It doesn't matter if you look like an H&M model; if you speak no Chinese, are broke and have less game than a Fijian hockey player, it's not going to be easy for you. Skip this step if you have solid Chinese or cash.

5. Speak at least rudimentary Chinese. This is the hardest step.

6. Money (optional). For hookers, skip steps 1-5.

No, this post is about something else entirely: how teaching in China can help you grow your game back at home. Beautiful concept, isn't it? When you get past all the routines and the negs and all the calculation of it all, game is just like everything else—one thing flowing into another.

I have just returned from a shade over 13 months teaching English in China. It was a whirlwind adventure full of chaos, mystery, intrigue and the love and attention of a handful of beautiful Chinese girls. It really offered me something different, something that not many people I knew had done, considering that almost everyone who teaches English in the Orient goes to Korea or Japan – highly Westernized, first-world nations with access to most of the same amenities we have back at home and larger by comparison English populations.

I wanted to go where the talk was the loudest, the heat was the heaviest and things were changing the fastest, and so China. Since I have returned, I have noticed a few things different about the women, and how they react to me in my home, the United States of Canada; not just in a the sense of 'Oh, he's well-traveled and speaks an exotic language!' [Ed. note: to 30% fluency], just stuff that pertains to the basics of game and the way I carry myself.

I'm no spring chicken and chances are, you aren't either. You know the routines, you know how to act, you know all the material that's covered in the first semester at Game University. These things I've picked up, barring a change in my appearance (there hasn't been one), I'm led to believe have originated from the basic essence of what my job was; teaching the most impatient people with the lowest of attention spans (children) how to speak English. Here are the things that help me get laid over there (and 'over there' doesn't mean just China; it can be any country where English is a minority language).

1. I speak in a slower, lower and more clear voice and use smaller words

This adaptation took me a few months. In North America you can speak fairly quickly and get the point across, but just what point are you trying to push, especially to women? It hit me about five months in; 'Whoa…slower, deeper voice, fewer big words and more deliberate pronunciation…I speak to my kids almost the exact way I speak to the girls back at home!'

For all we often rightly deride women for their emotion-based decision making, short-term 'I don't care if it'll be worth $1000 next week, sell because those shoes will only be $100 for one more day!' thinking and the Grand Canyon of dissonance between what they say they want and what they actually pursue. In much the same way a man sees a girl with her slim waist, shiny hair, big tits and warm smile and instantly thinks 'I have to fuck that', a woman runs a similar algorithm evaluating you in her mind as soon as you open your mouth. They pick up on the small stuff; a guy speaking quickly will be perceived to be nervous and inexperienced, and the guy who uses too many big words will be assumed to be socially maladroit or eager to impress. Nine times out of ten, these perceptions will be accurate.

But the man who speaks slow and low, without ostentatious wordplay, like you need to speak when teaching English to children who speak a completely different language? That man knows what he's doing. Rhetorical: how many players do you know who ramble on quickly and incoherently?

Yeah, me neither…

2. The respect

Men as a rule tend not to need a constant stream of respect, validation and gentle taps on the ass to feel good about ourselves or properly do our jobs; that is why your paycheck has a line that reads how much money you made, and not lines that tell you how super-awesome and fantastic you are as a person.

That said, receiving respect definitely helps. We work for money, but it's also nice to know that your work brings value; we men are at our best when we know that we're doing a good job. The Chinese word for teacher, Lǎoshī, is derived from the name of the Daoist philosopher Laozi (second in reverence only to Confucius, who you may be loosely familiar with through the classic 'Confucius say' jokes) In addition to 'teacher', it means ‘master’, ‘old’ and ‘venerated’.

North America is funny in that way. Despite there being at least ten female teacher-male student controversies to every male teacher-female student story and the belief that ‘Prescribed gender roles were manufactured by the patriarchy to keep us girls in our place!’, whenever a woman wants to teach children, all is right and well in the world, but whenever a man wants to teach children, ‘He’s probably a pedophile’.

Even then, over here teaching is really not that respected a profession (North American teacher = babysitter with holidays off and a pension), and if it weren’t for the frequent time off and favorable compensation-to-difficulty ratio, I’d question why anyone would want to do it.

Fact is, at my job, the parents and my kids loved me. I’d get invited out for dinner or into their houses frequently, and if I ever ran into them on the street, they always said hello and asked how I was. Stop me if I sound like a bitch at any time here, but there’s something to be said about how a man feels when he knows that he’s providing value.

3. There will be blood

In my first few months, I lost 25 pounds. I was let go from my first job while my VISA was in traction. I had to live in a filthy hotel for almost a month. I had to uproot on a dime for 5 weeks to teach in a town I knew nothing about. I had to weather an STD scare (negative) alone with no one to translate. I struggled daily with the more esoteric aspects of the language (a spoon has more in common with a space ship than Chinese does with English, and it’s spoken at machine-gun speed). Advice: if you come to China, learn some Chinese first.

But I’m thankful for all of this. In our lives we seek to avoid struggle, we want to live free from pain and difficulty, but struggle is essential; a man is at his best during the struggle because it helps a man grow. For all the bad shit we see happening to men in North America, it’s still the safest, easiest place in which to live anywhere on the planet. Where else can you just shut up and do what you’re told and still land a decent job? Where else in the world is it nearly statistically impossible for a competent adult to die of hunger? Where else can you live where it’s actually illegal for your landlord to fail to provide heating and hot water, or for your boss to choose on a whim to decide not to pay you?

Not China. The streets run red with the blood of foreigners who the naturally insular and xenophobic locals have little to no interest in helping. Sure, I took my course and bought the lines, ‘Oh yeah, there’s always someone to help you!’. If you take a TESOL course like I did, no doubt you will hear this, but let me tell you something that they won’t; there is no cadre of Chinese people willing to do whatever it takes to make sure you’re sufficiently comfortable. I’m not painting all Chinese people with such a broad brush as if to say none of them give a shit about you, but just do this thought exercise; if someone came from a wealthier, more prosperous place to your country to receive three times your salary while working half as many hours, would you jump over yourself to ensure their maximum comfort? They’ll likely provide some degree of help for you, but for the most part, it’s up to you to navigate this strange place on your own.

Loading...

Everything I accomplished in China, from adjusting my game (China is all about World Game), cultivating a few good future connections, and learning the language, I had to do without the benefit of a broad support network. Is there anything more man than surviving, thriving, even, by your own skills and guile? At least once a week, when I'd wake up in the morning that old limiting voice in my head would say, 'Fuck it all, just go back home, take some shitty office job, make your 40k annually and continue to fuck soulless, unfeminine girls until it gets boring and then get married. Sure, after the ring goes on she'll expand faster than the universe and one day out of nowhere she'll probably just decide it's easier to ruin you than to actually work at the marriage, but at least your family will be happy and you'll be safe and comfortable…'

But I shut that voice out, and I grew and evolved because I did that. It's much the same as getting into the game in the first place; you'll read Roosh or Roissy, think 'That sounds so easy, I can do that!', go out and see very little results and want to give up, but only through struggling and learning, can you step your game up. In China, be prepared to struggle, and anticipate many learning opportunities.

4. On your toes

In the standard North American office, we have meetings, memos, automatic email reminders and schedules, for better or worse—worse in that this type of constant supervisory 'remindering' seems menial and time-consuming, but better, in that you always know when the shit you need to get done needs to get done. Things can be very easily and effectively prioritized in the North American office.

Over in China, I had to throw all that out the window; I can't even count the number of times I devised a lesson plan based on a certain number of students (say, four) appearing, only to have just one or two show up. I can't even count how many times I'd have a random Chinese helicopter parent wanted to 'sit in' and watch my class. I can't even count how many times I'd arrive at the start of the work day, two hours before my first class, and hear 'Oh, you have to pick up an extra class, it starts in twenty minutes…'

While this aspect of the Chinese office drove me batshit insane at times and I hated it, I can nonetheless see how it applies to game. I couldn't do jack shit about any of it, except adapt and be flexible to the situation. How many times when you're in the club do you see a girl you plan to talk to, and in your head you have exactly how it will go down, from your opening line to her reaction to the quick segue into the banter stage? I bet its more times than you can count. How many times did the interaction go exactly as you thought it would? I bet you can count these times on one hand. But you still got laid. Why? Because you're loose, flexible and know that you have to adapt to things in order to maximize the situation.

5. Practice, practice, practice…

Contrary to what some might think, game is not merely a tool we use to sleep with more women; game is a discipline that teaches you how to improve your social skills, outlook, and appearance, from which sleeping with more and higher-quality women flows. Learning game may also increase your pay, secure you more clients, earn the respect of your friends and improve (or kill) your relationship with your family.

However, game, like any other skill, is only effective as long as you use it. This is one thing that keeps guys from getting into the game, and that's how in your first year, you have to basically eat, sleep and breathe the game, and only after that can you pull it off. In spite of this, things come up; busy at work, an LTR, family responsibilities. All of these things can take the edge off your game, which is why you need to stay sharp.

EVERY SINGLE DAY, I used some well-known game tactics in class to help me control my students and enhance their education.

A student is teasing me and joking around? Playfully tease them right back.

A student thinks they have it all figured out and don't want to pay attention? Qualify them.

A student acts out because they desperately want your attention? Aloof indifference.

Some Chinese MILFS are going to sit in and observe their child's class? Run the classroom equivalent of nightlife generalship—dress sharp, get a fresh haircut and command the attention of all. Wingmanship plays here as well. Engage the mothers and involve them in the class as well as their kids.

There are a ton of guys who read about game, half-assedly dedicate themselves to it, see little or no results and so easily debunk it as witchcraft and bullshit. The reality of it is that game is like learning to play the guitar, learning Spanish or deciding to hit the gym to add some muscle; if you want to get good at it, you have to work at it, and working at it entails practicing it every day. You must also think about it when you aren't practicing it. The amount of practice I got on my game in the classroom is the equivalent of at least 1000 approaches and 50 dates.

6. Ramble On

I got my certification mainly to teach children; not because I'm a closet pedophile, but because I like to have fun, and have been told in the past, mostly by women, that I'm a giant child ('Hey Pot, this is that girl Kettle I told you about…').

However, because my school later tried to diversify its education, that means that I inevitably had several adult students that I had to teach. Teaching the kids is fun, but it can drain you; they're cute and they like to laugh, but they also run around like idiots, hit you and can only learn the most basic elements of the language.

The adults are a completely different wheelhouse; they can sit still, they ask tough questions and they want to listen to everyday conversation to improve. The result of this? For adults, my lesson plans consisted of a few dialogues, a few writing exercises and at least an hour of chatting and rambling.

The speaking was slower (in tune with point #1) and the questions were more basic, but the sheer amount of time I spent, just me, talking, was mind-boggling. So many guys out there struggle because they just don't know how to talk to women, failing to realize that talking to women is just like talking to anyone; you ask and answer questions, and you evaluate and calibrate based on their answers. I have always been a sharp ranter and an engaging raconteur, but returning from China has stepped my ramble game up into God territory; an ugly man (who has been window-dressed with wardrobe enhancements and gym time) with confidence and tremendous ramble game fucks 3 points above his gradient. Roosh once said that if you want to get laid, you need to be able to talk non-stop for twenty minutes, and if you can't do this, then to practice. What better practice is there then often having to talk for 90 minutes at a time?

7. Crazy insane, maintain frame…

One of the most important elements of game, and one of the hardest elements to stick, is the frame. What is 'frame'? Your frame is the boundary you set through which you seek to control your interactions with others. In layman's terms? It's making a person reveal what you want them to reveal when you want them to reveal it. Say you ask what she does and what she likes about it and she answers for five minutes. That's good frame, keep it up and the notch is yours for the taking. You ask what she does, she counters by asking what you do and you talk for 5 minutes? Poor frame, enter recovery mode.

With women, they like to try to break your frame with that most-common of female tricks; the shit test. In order to pass a shit test, you have to maintain your frame. I was lucky enough to learn how to hold frame by a good family friend; older cat, business connections, 46 at the time of this writing and regularly dates girls 27 and younger…seeing him in action was insane, but not everyone out there has been so lucky.

Young players often have a hard time with this; before they arrive, they'll be out and chatting up some girl, and he'll say something hilarious and offensive, and get swept away in her reaction in a feeble and pathetic show of back-tracking and apology-making. Seasoned vets of the hustle know that (at least 95% of the time) she isn't really 'angry'; she's testing your cred to see if you'll back down from your assertion, and as soon as you do that, the legs snap shut. The ability to keep your cool under fire is paramount.

I've had kids throw up on me. I've had kids shit their pants in my class. I've had kids punch me in the balls. I've had parents yell at me in Chinese. But, I kept it together, and maintained my frame. If you can keep frame (the Chinese have an expression 'to keep/lose face' that is almost analogous to 'to maintain/lose the frame') during any of those situations, then the tests that pretty girl at the club throws at you will be like shooting a glider out of the sky with a Stinger.

8. Generalship 101

The last point is going to be the shortest, but ask yourself this; what is game? You can throw out all sorts of answers and questions this, but bottom line, it’s being able to keep a girl’s attention long enough to convince her that sleeping with you is a good idea—no more, no less.

I feel no need to elaborate further on this, so I’ll just say it; if you can keep a child’s attention for 90 minutes, you should at least be able to keep a girl’s attention for 30.

Russell Brand Is A Social Genius

June 22, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

I'm sure many of you have seen Russel Brand's expert mockery of both the news media and the anchor's supposed social skills (see above). Videos of Brand pop up every so often and they're ripe with applicable knowledge. His chaotically funny and flirtatious over-the-top rambling is his number one skill—nearly every female interviewer I've seen with him ends up a giggling school girl. This is a video of genius in many forms. The man is a comedian, and like many comedians his best skill is presenting real issues in a comedic light. He ridicules the news media, makes fun of their superficiality, and exposed their contrived images. More importantly Brand showcases an expert application of social skills. Within the first minute he has set the frame of the conversation and has designated each participant a role.

0:12 Just over ten seconds into the interview Brand begins showing his disinterest for being there. This is not an angry disinterest, but a playful one. Brand calmly spins in his chair while the three interviewers rigidly sit there as if they were puppets controlled by a puppeteer. By creating such a stark contrast between him and them he sets the stage for the later parts of the interview.

0:35 Brian, your outfit is fucked. You have no originality and you are a product of your superiors and nothing else. You have not an ounce of autonomy in your entire body. You are a gear in their well oiled machine. In terms of game, Brand deals with his biggest obstacle right away. He instantly paints Brian as boring and the only way Brian can get out of the hole Brand dug for him is to become a try hard, begging for the attention of others.

generictieguy.jpeg

0:55 "You're a fellow Englishwoman…" With one sentence Brand frames it so that this woman is 'on his side' since they share a commonality. He recognizes this woman is the less dominant of the two woman so he gets her on his side. Throughout the course of the interview she refrains from playing along with the other two's antics.

Loading...

1:13 The last thing Brand does is spark the attraction of the most dominant interviewer, Mika. Brand has her help him put the table back to her. This is already an act of compliance and submission on her part. Immediately after, he comments on her dress and how low cut it ism thus sexualizing the interaction. He flirtatiously tells her he is a man and he has animal desires. From then on this host is uncomfortably squirming around in a puddle of her own sexual juices. A woman will always submit to a more dominant man, it doesn't matter if she is the host of a popular "news" program.

Brand creates his own reality. By non-verbally showing direct contrast to the anchors, without being overt about it, he gains the upper hand. The anchors treat him like a zoo animal, but he masterfully plays off it. Compare Brand's expert control of an interaction with that of the average person. These news anchors try to gain dominance by pretending he isn't there, talking down to him, and trying to trip him up in what he is saying, and of course they fail. They're unoriginal and try to bring up the same points over and over. Brian thinks Brand's power comes from his cold chain and open chested shirt.

Another facet of Brand's dominance is his positive demeanor and his use of the interviewers' reality against them. He never insults or argues with the host and instead chooses to either change the subject or make a comment that they have to comply with as to not look like an asshole. He mocks their entire existence while they smile and nod.

Brand won within the first minute of the interview. The anchors had no hope, they could not impose their will on his reality.

Introduction to Japanese Girls

June 23, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

It has been said—aptly—that water conforms to the shape of the vessel into which it is poured. Applied to women, the analogy means that the personal characteristics of women from a given nation are formed by the culture and customs of that nation. Environment shapes character. I have had the good fortune to spend several years of my life in mainland Japan and Okinawa. I've continued to visit Japan on and off over the years, and still interact with Japanese women here in the US. I thought it would be useful to comment on some of the positive qualities of Japanese women. I hope the reader will find something of value here, and will investigate further. Every man has his own female preferences, and what one man finds alluring, another man may not.

The hazard of an article like this, of course, is the risk of over-generalization. Japanese culture has changed much in recent decades, and it goes without saying that the younger generations are less traditional and more Westernized than their predecessors. This depressing erosion of traditional values is a feature that has been observed across the world. But Japanese women are still different enough that it is possible to make valid generalizations in comparing them with women of other nations. And since limitations of space here impose brevity on the writer, we must get to the point quickly, and trust to the tolerance of the patient reader.

My point is that Japanese women possess certain traits which make them especially appealing. You may not find in them the explosive libido or impressive curves of the Latin woman; but they have other qualities that, to me, more than compensate. Conditioned to act girly, almost childish (when they're happy or content), Japanese girls come from a culture that strongly discourages rudeness and arrogance in women. In short, the exact opposite of America. Japan is unique, and its distinct culture was formed over many hundreds of years of island isolation. Consider the following:

1. Politeness and Humility.

Coming from a culture where the women are taught to be big-mouthed, rude, and disrespectful, the American visitor to Japan will at once be pleasantly surprised by the poise, demeanor, and courtesy of the Japanese girl. This to me is sexually attractive. It is nice to be treated with respect wherever you go. Even when your approach is rejected, it is done with such exquisite politeness that you feel nothing unpleasant at all.

As I've gotten older, I have come to value courtesy and politeness very highly, perhaps because it is so rare in Anglo-American women. Obnoxiousness does not equal strength, as American women believe. Boundaries exist, and everyone knows what they are. Japanese culture also teaches humility and self-sacrifice as positive virtues. This ethic is extolled in countless historical dramas, soap operas, and other cultural contexts. Japanese girls are genuinely humble and modest, for the most part; and this character trait I find very appealing.

2. Discipline and Respect.

Japanese women come from a strongly structured culture. There are complex social rules that govern relations with family, with schoolmates, with work, and with society in general. (In America, by contrast, the women are bound by no rules of conduct at all). The fact that strict discipline is imposed on women means that they are trained to respect society, themselves, and men. Most of them resent its severity, but it has its advantages. It makes for loving girlfriends and mates. Even a physically unattractive woman in Japan has something of real value to offer, just by virtue of her pleasant way of acting, and her ability to do basic feminine skills, usually taught to her by her mother.

3. Poise and Behavior.

I was once lucky enough to attend a authentic kabuki play in Tokyo. (They're expensive, and I wasn't paying, fortunately). In old Japan, a hallmark of beauty and feminine sexual allure was the "sideways glance" of the eyes (nagashime). The play was able to convey this, and it highlighted an important point. This is the fact that Japanese women can convey strong feminine energy simply with their carriage, demeanor, and body movements. The compliant nod of a beautiful face, with glowing skin and gentle almond eyes, a singsong voice, the movement of a supple wrist, and the poise with which the beautiful girls of the Ginza carry their purses (right palm upturned) as they float lotus-like around the shopping malls of downtown Tokyo: these are the scenes that I want to flash across my mind before I die. You just feel better being around them. It is not easy to describe to someone who has not lived there, but it is tangible.

4. Openness to Sex.

Japanese culture is surprisingly hedonistic. Sexual puritanism is not part of the culture, bless their souls. And appearances are deceptive. The innocent-looking “OL” (office lady) with her perfect uniform, or the stone-faced department store elevator-operator girl, may appear to be angelic and conservative. But the girls are very approachable, provided you are polite, and behind closed doors can often be sexual tigresses. I have found that many Japanese girls tend to be much more “kinky” (open to unusual sexual practices) than girls of other nations. I have my own theories about why this is, but space here does not permit a digression on it.

How to Behave in Japan

The bare bones of your code of conduct should be an awareness of the following:

1. Show deference and respect for the Japanese and their culture, but don’t try to be too much like them.

You will enjoy some built-in status as an honored foreigner (provided you are a gentleman), and it is a mistake to forfeit this special status by going native too much. Remember, it is not what you do, but how you do it. Ethics are situational here. You would be surprised what you can get away with, provided you are a gentleman. Many girls want their “foreigner experience” notch, and it would be ungentlemanly not to give it to them. Know your audience. Never disrespect any Japanese man. Remember the women are the way they are because of the men. I can't emphasize enough how important it is to be polite to everyone and make everyone "feel good". If you can do this, opportunities will present themselves.

2. Be well dressed and groomed*.

Always. It shows humility and respect. A haggard, greasy, backpacker appearance will not score you points. You could wear a suit around Tokyo at any time and still look normal.

3. Hold your alcohol.

Drinking is part of the culture in Japan and Korea. If you're going out with groups people from work or whatever, you should be able to drink a bit and hold your own. No undisciplined, sloppy, amateurish scenes. People will take note. Being accepted by the group will lead to other opportunities. Be able to sing at least one karaoke song if you're there on business.

4. Basic language understanding*.

The Pimsleur series (all levels) on spoken Japanese is enough for a short stay. I wouldn't mess seriously with the written language unless you're going to be there long-term, but memorizing hiragana and katagana is probably worth it for a short stay.

Miscellaneous Tips

1. Get a cell phone*.

It's a must if you plan to run game. You can rent them at the airport if you're there for a short time, or buy a pay-as-you-go plan if there for a long duration.

2. Try to get out of Tokyo.

As much as I love Tokyo for the sweat and tears that I've put in there, it suffers from foreigner fatigue a bit. Getting away from the other foreigners is key: I prefer Osaka or Kyoto, or nearly any other city. My experiences in the countryside were simply incredible.

3. For me, day game was key.

The easy approachability of women at department stores, malls, and other public places means that you have no excuse not to practice. And forget all that American-style game: negs, sarcasm, aloof demeanor, all that. It doesn't translate, and will not be understood. In fact, it comes across as rude. Speak very slowly, with masculine intonations. You will be judged by your conduct. Don't make a lot of hand movements, and be patient and respectful. Avoid any serious topics, and keep it light and happy. Remember: unlike in America, girls here actually listen, rather than waiting for their turn to talk about themselves or their career in shuffling papers and looking busy.

4. Lead the interaction firmly.

In Asia, the man is still king. Girls in Japan are still conditioned that the man should lead. So, you will need to be guiding the interaction gracefully and firmly. Get acquainted with the love motel locations in your area if your room logistics are not good. Avoid physical intimacy or showy touching in public; save it for the bedroom. Japanese girls like to be discrete and will appreciate your understanding. Escalate physically when you are alone with her, not in public. This isn't Brazil. Preserve her dignity at all times. As I said before, ethics in Japan are situational, and you need to give your girls plausible deniability. Your patience will be rewarded.

5. Avoid trouble.

Lots of drunken scenes late at night. Stay away from groups that look like trouble, and don't stare at punks (chimpira) in entertainment districts at night.

The Forced Transsexuality Of David Reimer

June 23, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

David Reimer was born a boy named Bruce in 1965. He had a twin brother named Brian. Due to urinary issues, doctors recommended circumcision in order to alleviate said urinary concerns. The doctor used a controversial method of cauterization which resulted in the complete burning of his penis.

David Reimer

Bruce's parents were justifiably worried about his future & his happiness with no penis. They took him to Dr. John Money, a quickly emerging psychologist who was a strong proponent of blank slate theory. Dr. John Money was firmly convinced gender was a social construction and could be learned away through appropriate psychological & behavioral intervention.

John Money

Let's step through the ideas pioneered by Money. He believed in sex differences & gender differences. His perception of sex differences was small (but larger than most feminists consider); he noted sexual dimorphism & that women are vulnerable while rearing children, so that explains why men were the hunters & wanderers. However, he coined the term "gender role," replacing the traditional term "sex role." He thought most behavior exhibited by men and women was socially constructed. "Gender roles" are the publicly displayed traits while "gender identity" was how one conceived of their sexual identity in their head.

He was one of the leading scientific forces that helped second-wave feminism smash gender roles & traditional society. Armed with the information that gender and sexuality were socially built, they radically altered society. As for Money himself, he transformed the medical and scientific community and turned the professions towards social constructionism. We see the vestiges of this in the supreme reticence of academia to admit biological sex differences. Since feminism and social construction are fused at the hip, they know the disavowal of social constructionism would seriously call into question many feminist theories & approaches.

As for Bruce, he began to go to therapy with Money as an infant. Under Money's recommendation, Bruce's testicles were removed shortly before two years, but no artificial vagina was created – just leaving young Bruce with a urinary hole. Bruce was renamed Brenda. Brenda was a patient of Money's for about a decade with his brother Brian. Money noted this was perfect for deconstructing gender – as he had the perfect control in Brian.

The therapy was bizarre, making Brenda lie on the ground while Brian made thrusting motions, mimicking penetration. Money believed sexual identity around gender was formed during childhood sexual play. Money claimed that Brenda was a stereotypical girl & Brian the stereotypical boy – concluding gender is completely constructed.

Brenda, however, was not as he portrayed. Brenda refused to wear dresses at an early age and engaged in roughhousing with Brian. Brenda refused to sexualize boys and, for a time, identified as a lesbian. Bullied and abused at school, Brenda developed suicidal tendencies and refused to ever see Money again. She got estrogen treatments and underwent female puberty, growing breasts, developing a feminine voice and the whole bit. For his part, Brian developed a serious case of schizophrenia because of Money's incredibly reckless and ignorant "therapy."

Brenda, in high school, dropped the female act and assumed the identity of man named David. Notice the lack of taking his original name – most likely he was trying to assert autonomy over his life and identity. He eventually had a double mastectomy and had phalloplasty. This was years after he married a woman and became a step-father to a few children.

Brian, unable to cope with his mental illness, overdosed on his anti-depressants in 2002. Just two short years later, David's wife informed him she wanted a divorce. Unable to cope with his life, his brother's death and his impending divorce, he went to the local grocery store, put a sawed-off shotgun into his mouth and pulled the trigger. He was just 38.

Judith Butler: The Profile Of A Delusional Blank Slatist

Let's talk about a prominent feminist and ardent social constructionist named Judith Butler. Butler is a gay Jewish radical feminist. Like any prominent feminist, she was gifted class and educational privilege. In the so-called hallowed halls of American academia, she came to her fame for her dogged insistence that gender is little more than a performance. Her seminal work is "Gender Trouble," released in 1990 to the cheering applause of feminist and liberal academics.

A brief breakdown is needed. It is considered one of the essential readings of queer theorists and post-structural feminists. She is credited with coining the term “gender perfomativity.” The key point she belabors is the fact that both sex and gender are socially constructed – meaning humans have no inborn traits relating their sexual organs. She claims that both gender & sex are both socially constructed in the sense that heterosexist power structures demand conformity to existing norms based on misogyny & heterosexism. She further makes a Freudian argument that boys identifying as masculine are repressing incestuous & homosexual desires for their father – same for feminine women with regards for their mother. She calls for subversion of gender by parodying gender itself – she takes a strong liking to drag shows. She claims our humanity “admits no genealogy” and we are born into this world completely free & clear to be anybody we want – our bodies are necessarily limited by power structures that privilege men and heterosexuality.

A brief rebuttal would be this: Her ideas are based on theories of Freud that have long since been discredited. Do note that Cultural Marxism is rooted in Freudian theory, so it stands to reason they cling desperately to Freud’s theories of socialization & sexuality. The obsession with power and who controls it is key to understanding the psychology behind Butler’s arguments & social constructionists in general. The genealogical approach Foucault pioneered, utilized here through the lens of gender by Butler, explicitly refuses to consider biological & factual explanations for social phenomena in a society. Instead, the genealogical approach assumes truth is often discovered randomly and are often backed by power structures in a given society. Thus, all truths are subject to question – pure social relativism.

Butler is a classic homosexual narcissist – unable to understand that the strong majority of people don’t have the issues they have relating to masculinity and femininity; they demand the rest of the world change so they don’t have to reconcile the fact they will never be truly socially comfortable for their deviance based on lack of adherence to expected male/female behavior.

Her dogged insistence of blank-slatism is little more than her own issue with the fact she is a biological androgynous female. When we see such resolute devotion to social constructionism, it usually has either a biological or psychological root. Here, Butler was probably exposed to masculinizing hormones in the womb, but – as expected – she hit puberty and has estrogen coursing through her veins. Her inability to come to terms with that is the fuel that fires her pseudo-intellectualism. Often times, the strongest blank-slatists are people who, biologically, don’t fit the expectations of their sex. Here, Butler clearly is a lesbian that does not identify with femininity at all. Instead of coming to terms with that, she seeks to intellectualize her lack of feminine sensibility by trying to prove feminine women are really repressed lesbians.

As for psychological issues, let’s talk about when heterosexual females take to this rhetoric. Almost always there is a degree of narcissism. I strongly believe we exist in a culture of narcissism in America. As such, people often have fantasies that do not match up with the reality of their life. Feminist activism is emblematic of this idea. When heterosexual women take strongly to social constructionism, they often complain of impossible beauty standards or male fear of their self-perceived successes in life. It is a defense mechanism that allows them to pretend the men they find sexually attractive would desire them would it not be for untoward social forces. It is a form of self-handicapping that allows such women space to fantasize about men they desire sexually without ever having to worry about that being played out in real life.

Gender Politics As Narcissism & A Lament

Let's consider a post by The Last Psychiatrist: Couple Reveals Their Child's Gender Five Years Too Late

Let's break this down.

> What drove her to using her child as a you-go-first skydiving partner is the desire to be something coupled with the terror of doing anything– which results in ambivalence and inertia camouflaged in a consumerist lifestyle full of meaningless choices. This leaves a lot of unused emotional energy left over for me me me. She's had 46 years to obsess over her identity, and this is what she came up with, a hail mary pass in the second half of a mid-life crisis.

Gender politics is the porting of personal terror of betraying social expectations and demanding that other people change so they don't have to. The obsession over changing socialization, media representations of gender, etc. is little more than the inability to or fear of changing themselves.

If challenging of gender roles was a desire of the first order, a woman would flaunt her hairy legs, her refusal to wear dresses, etc. Notice how Jessica Valenti has hairy armpits – a classic narcissistic move as she can hide it if she wants to via clothing – but then show it off in photos. Look at me smash the patriarchy!

It isn't a desire of the first order, the foremost desire is conformity, which is represented in the desire for society to give them new scripts so they can avoid the existential terror of truly becoming self-actualized. Notice the constant rhetoric of oppression of true personhood by society – what they are signaling is they want new ways of socializing people to be enacted because they are too afraid of becoming the people they think they want to be.

> Her life has been marked by nothing eventful, nothing challenging, nothing unusual, nothing difficult, so she will have created drama out of ordinary events in order to self-identify. "Oh, God," she'd say as she parks her Subaru at the Gymboree. "These mums are all so desperately conformist. Marry the father of my child? How utterly bourgeois. Did I mention my child is a court jester?

Female gender warriors is the sort of woman TLP is talking about – most likely just another white, entitled female who has had nothing exceptional – good or bad – happen to her. She is most likely not dumb, but not smart. Not incompetent but not excellent. She needs to create alternate realities where the dialogue is about her exceptionalism.

> It isn't for the kid, it is for her. If it wasn't for her, you wouldn't have heard about it. Wasn't the whole point not to call attention to the gender? Oh, I had it backwards, the whole point was entirely to focus on the gender. Sigh. The main character in this story is herself. The kid is supporting cast. He is not a person, he is a blog topic.

This what gender politics is about – the person talking about gender politics. They don't give a damn about the people they purport to help – they just want the worship from like-minded people that they are pioneers transforming the world for the better. The people they target – the kid here – is little more than a pawn in a greater scheme of worship from their preferred authorities.

As we saw with Judith Butler, she doesn't understand that other people have vastly different relationships with femininity than she does. She understands the blank-slatist approach of academia and that encourages the retrenchment of her narcissism. As for the gender-neutral parents talked about above – all it is is their inability to smash gender roles like they claim to want to. They need proxies – children – who will supposedly prove their theories right. That is why feminists insist so strongly on taking over schools, universities and transforming the family – they need vulnerable children to become the people they never could be. Gender politics are self-absorption & narcissism of a supreme order.

David Reimer was little more than a pawn in the greater game of gender politics. Born into an ideologically churning world, he was little more than a notch-count for ignorant feminists who think the world revolves around their delusional ideas of reality & gender.

His suicide should have been the shot heard round the world for the death of blank-slatism. Was it? No. Most explanations revolve around financial issues, his brother's suicide, the clinical depression his family has that apparently has genetic roots. Ironic, isn't it? Claims of biological proclivities of depression conveyed from mother to son. Could it be he was denied his biological birthright of manhood?

Sure, maybe, according to apologists. However, it was those oppressive gendered standards of male behavior that mattered most. His wife wasn't leaving him, he was leaving his family because of unfair expectations of male behavior.

In the twilight of his life, his wife assured him he was sexually adequate as a male. Very reassuring to man who understands the woman he loves is leaving him. Not just a man, but a man whose life was deconstructed & reconstructed with no thought as to his concerns or the reality of sex.

The most obvious & clear reason he killed himself is he was denied his biological identity as male. The fact that article was called "The Real Reasons" was because anybody with a brain and a heart knew it was because he was denied his biological birthright. See the narcissism? Confronted with one of the saddest events to occur in life – suicide – social constructionists still go out of their way to assuage themselves that gender is still a social construct. Blame the free market – he can't find a job! Blame his depression – she left him because he was too angry!

David Reimer was a just a boy that never had a chance. After his botched circumcision, his mother became clinically depressed, his father an alcoholic and his brother became a schizophrenic. He was just a person born into this world who had to become his own man long before he had the tools to do so. He tried so hard to do right – he lived 38 horrid years before he took his own life.

Some might say he was weak, but no – he was strong. He fought so valiantly against the world around him – from infancy – that he did the best he could. Even the strongest of men can crack. He did. His suicide should have ushered in a serious gut-check for America about gender. Did it? No.

He died alone in a grocery store parking lot. He went to a place where communities come together, where families shop. He went alone. That is how he felt – on the outside, looking in. Losing his family was the final nail in coffin. That Rolling Stone writer was wrong – he wasn't leaving his family, his family left him.

His country failed him, the medical profession failed him, even his family failed him. He had no reason to believe in anything anybody shot his way – he was deceived, betrayed & lied to from his infancy. A victim of blank-slate narcissism, he was little more than a pawn in an ideological battle.

You think they attended his funeral? No, they just continued to whine about how gender was little more than a performance. In that act they revealed who they really cared about – themselves.

How To Be With 4 Women At The Same Time

June 24, 2013 | by Alex Matlock | Link | Original Link

Over the last few weeks I had more free time than usual so I decided to embark on a new journey. I figured I'd try to be with as many women as I can, simultaneously, to see exactly what's it all about. By "being with" I'm referring to somewhat regular sexual intercourse with all of them, keeping them all emotionally happy (at least to a satisfying degree) and still having time to do something else.

I'm currently seeing four on a regular basis and the only way I'd be able to see more was if I had no job and nothing else to do in my personal life.

With that being said, this article is going to show you how to get and have four "girlfriends", the difficulties that come with this and how to deal with them.

How To Do It

My plan was simple. It was so simple that it actually worked. Here's what you need to do. Get yourself to 0 people that you're having sex with and focus your mind on what's about to happen. Get some cash and go out almost every day for two weeks.

Depending on how lucky and how much game you have, you could be banging number 1 around the first weekend. The plan basically stipulates absolute best time management. Each night you go out to meet women (clubbing/bars) you will force yourself to get two solid numbers. This means that almost every next day, one of the solid numbers will see you. You can forget about the other one.

You're whole plan should be going out then going on a "date" the next day. Finish the date, if no sex; go out after she went home. Continue this for a maximum of two weeks and by the end of the second week you'll be seeing at least six women.

From the first date you'll be able to quickly gauge how soon a chick will sleep with you. If you know that she's going to take more than three dates, drop her and go out that night.

My initial plan was to get and keep just three but I ended up with four and said oh well…

The Difficulties

Every dude brags about how cool he is that he's seeing 99 women but in reality he's seeing that many women in front of his PC monitor with his pants around his ankles. Anybody that has ever dated more than two girls on a somewhat regular basis will tell you that this shit is freaking hard.

We all know how hard it is to have a girlfriend, well multiply that by four. Sure, you give them all less attention, less interest, less all that. You even tell them that you're seeing other women but that only makes them want to you more. In truth, seeing this many women will drain your time and resources tremendously.

The Money

The first issue on our list is the money. It will cost you loads. I don't agree with taking girls on dinner dates (unless they are your official girlfriend) but if you're going on a "drinks date" almost every night it's still going to cost you a pretty penny. Yes, you should be paying for her drinks as well and although most of the time they are well-mannered and don't break the bar (1-2 drinks max), you'll still be spending A TON (let's not forget about transport) especially if you like to drink. That being said, once you do get to sleep with them, the costs will go down slightly since you can just meet at your place or hers.

The Time

Time is probably your worst enemy here. All of the girls you'll be dating won't have such a full schedule. The thing is, you work till 5-6PM then you need to make sure you're going to see one of these girls every night. If you don't, you risk pushing your next meeting too much and if you didn't spit solid game or didn't sleep with her yet, that can cost you the chick.

If you're dating four chicks you want to basically see all of them at least two times a week. Of course that's going to be impossible which means each week you'll have to sacrifice seeing 2 of them only once. Why? Well because you need at least 1 day to rest, see your friends etc. You need to mix this pattern up so none of them feel like they're left out.

To make all of this work, you're basically going to have to be their very own personal assistant that gets a very good idea of each girl's schedule. If one of them works a random hours job it's going to get even harder.

The secret here is to keep a very close eye on their patterns. Taking down notes helps but it's not really necessary. If the chicks were as organized as you, you could basically plan your stuff for the next four weeks but unfortunately, that's never going to happen. All dates you're going to plan are planned at MOST one day before. It's just the nature of "unavailable" women which are in fact very available but are acting their part.

Texting/Calling Also Takes Time

Even though you're only seeing these girls every other day, you still need to keep an emotional connection via text or phone calls. To get rid of a chick I like to call her after she's done with work and talk about everyday things for about 20 mins. Yes, that's 20 mins per chick, per day. You're only going to call three of them because you're going to meet the 4th that night.

Also, because you've been spitting hard game, these chicks will start to call/text you themselves. Get ready to decline sex invitations, get ready to "be involved a lot more in your work" and get ready for awkward shit to happen.

The Conversations

The stuff you tell them and the stuff they tell you is outstandingly important. You can mix things up so easily that makes the whole thing NOT FUN anymore. Unfortunately, the only way to keep clear tabs on what you said and what she said is to take down notes.

Because every player that wants to sleep with a chick should mold his personality based on her needs and desires, you're going to be a fairly different person with each of them. When you're only seeing one chick this really isn't a problem but when it's four you best create that persona as close to the real you as possible. This way you're going to reduce the stuff you have to remember and you're going to have a much easier time. Sure, it can have bad consequences (chick might not like you) but when you're seeing this many women, who cares?

Write down what you told each girl and write down the things she says about herself. This is important because you don't want to repeat yourself nor do you want to assume that she already knew something about you when in fact you told that to someone else. It's hard but, if you write it down and read it before a date you'll be fine.

I'll give you a quick and simple example of how my list is now:

Tall and skinny chick – studies hard for masters, does something about restaurant inspection, is smart, gives me shit, independent woman type, worth it for the sex.

Petite chick – works at Burger King, has random hours, not much in her life, good in bed, hot bod, asks a lot of questions about my other affairs.

Curvy chick – is an accountant, does well with numbers, likes me too much already, will want relationship soon, doesn't like me seeing other chicks, great sex.

Foreign Chick – studies psychology year two, easy to talk to, laughs at my jokes often, is fairly available most of the time, can't go to her place, best bod, shy in bed.

You'll be amazed how just these simple notes are more than enough to make them think that you care about them, especially if you repeat their names in a conversation and then discuss their jobs, uni etc. Do this list again to what you told them about yourself and you should be fine.

some time ago I saw a dude in New York doing spreadsheets for something like this. The whole thing went public and was a total fail for the dude. If you like spreadsheets, do that but be careful about who gets access to your computer

The Sex

The final thing on our list is obviously the sex. All women are different; all women want something more than just you stabbing their insides with your manly part. I don't take notes here because I easily remember this part since it's the why I'm doing this whole thing in the first place.

The first two times you meet and have sex you should be exploring her like Columbus. You'll quickly see what she likes and how she likes it. How much pressure she can take from your fingers, your manhood, how sensitive she is in some areas compared to others etc.

This stuff is important because it's a major deciding factor in her sleeping with you again, especially after you only saw her once last week.

Ideally, you'll want to use condoms with all of them. Four regular sexual partners screams STD so be careful. If you think one of them is trustworthy or is on the pill, still consider the consequences and then do as you please.

Ending It

As you can see, dating four women at the same time is seriously hard work. It will drain your time, resources and life in general. If you don't think this is worth it, don't do it. I wanted to see how it is. I'm probably going to end it with three of them in a month's time because I personally can't do it much longer (can't decide which yet). With that being said, as far as scoring chicks and being a player, this is still one of the best things I've managed to do in my life and I think every dude or self-proclaimed player should at least try to do it once in his life.

How To Be The Ultimate White Knight

June 24, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Last week I spoke about the way Game of Thrones engages with feminism, specifically through its use of Daenerys Targaryen to portray the ultimate western feminist "badass" fantasy: an alpha male lover, tremendous power/influence, dominion over men and tremendous unearned privilege were all part of the equation there.

Today I want to discuss how Game of Thrones depicts the counterpart to this fantasy: the ultimate beta male/white knight, the nightmare that accompanies the feminist dream.

Ser Jorah Mormont is a an exiled Westerosi knight who has advised Daenerys since her wedding with Khal Drogo. On paper, he's an OK guy: he looks alright, is a skilled fighter, possesses vast amounts of knowledge and comes from a solid "highborn" (noble) pedigree. He's also loyal, patient and devoted, qualities that enable him to make Daenerys' transition into life as a Queen possible and keep her alive in the process. It isn't implausible to conclude that she would be dead without him.

The problem is that, during this process, he put Daenerys on a tremendous pedestal and subsequently became one of the more cringe-worthy cases of betatude on television today. How so?

1. He is the ever-present servant.

The man is always present and ever diligent in service to his queen, constantly professing his subordination to her and his will to serve her loyally and eternally. He seems to verbally reaffirm this commitment in just about every other episode.

You could say that he's just doing his job. The problem, of course, is that he sees Daenerys as more than a boss, and women do not respect men that are easily controlled. Mormont's position as the "ever-present servant" to his beloved queen sets up a cringe-worthy dynamic in which his pedestalization and the romantic tension it creates clashes with his subservient role and Daenerys' innate tendency to be sexually repulsed by it.

2. He pines silently for a single woman.

Jorah has been out in the non-Westerosi world for many years now and understands it very well. He’s an exotic, respected and knowledgeable traveler who, if he wanted, could probably enjoy a number of sexual options across the many lands he has traveled.

Aside from the pay-for-play scene (whores are well used in the show by men with less to offer than him), there are probably plenty of attractive non-working girls in Essos who could have given it up or, if he so chose, started a family with him. Mormont spent an inordinate amount of time among the Dothraki, a people whose women are not portrayed as sexually conservative or shy in the story.

Instead of taking advantage of this, Mormont chooses to pine for Daenerys, the only girl who seems to exist across the many lands he travels with her. He doesn’t explore other sexual options and instead spends his time wishing, hoping and then heaping profuse amounts of praise upon his princess (and often getting out-dueled for her affection).

Loading...

The result of all this, of course, is a sexually frustrating existence of the kind familiar to many a beta male.

3. That woman wants little to do with him, and it shows.

Women hate beta males. Daenerys Targaryen, mother of dragons or not, is a woman, and Jorah Mormont is most certainly a beta male. This sets up a number of cringe-inducing interactions in the story as Jorah's thinly veiled infatuation and very clear devotion to his queen meets with her natural tendency to want nothing to do sexually with such a man.

Aside from any natural repulsion to betas (the evolutionary sources of which are well documented in the manosphere), Daenerys' conditioning may also explain her inability to warm to Jorah Mormont. After all, her first romantic and sexual experiences came courtesy of this guy:

How can Jorah be expected to compete with that?

In pursuing the goal of self-improvement, it is important to keep a metaphorical map in mind. This map should track your destination, your current location and the points behind you that you seek to distance yourself from.

Jorah Mormont represents one of the points that should always be in your rearview mirror. He is everything that the male concerned with self-improvement should strive not to be: supplicating, needy, plagued with oneitis for a woman who asserts near total control over him and easily overshadowed by more substantial men.

It is in the interest of every male concerned with self-improvement to consciously avoid falling into these patterns of behavior. A Mormont-esque lifetime of sexual frustration awaits those who fail to do so.

The Language Of Feminism

June 25, 2013 | by Jesus Baetana | Link | Original Link

A feminist police state is upon us in the UK, with the latest installment being an attempt by the organisation UKFeminista to ban men's casual magazines from being handled by female staff, on the grounds it may cause "offence" or worse still, harm to female workers.

Yes, you read correctly – not because of protecting children or another cause with at least some level of rationality behind it to prevent it from being rubbished by any level headed person. This solemnly considered notice of intent is almost laughable in its foundation, yet I quote;

> '…displaying publications in stores or requiring staff to handle such magazines could amount to sex discrimination or sexual harassment'.

SEX DISCRIMINATION and SEXUAL HARASSMENT are actually the terms being wheeled out here. I'm surprised there is no mention of 'sexually abused hands' or 'eye rape' as well. The worst part about this is its likely retailers will have no other choice but to succumb to this, in light of there being no organised opposition.

The Usual Double Standards

Kat Banyard, the founder of UK Feminista, recycled the oestrogen sodden terminology from the feminist shed for the following quote;

> 'Lads mags aren't just a bit of harmless fun. By portraying women as sex objects they fuel sexist attitudes and behaviours. It is a national scandal that the 'big four' supermarkets and high-street shops like WH Smiths stock these sexist publications. By selling lads mags, companies like Tesco and WH Smith are normalising the idea that it is acceptable to treat women like sex objects'.

Are you sure Kat? If so, perhaps I should take offence at the Diet Coke adverts currently on mass rotation across all popular mediums, where a bunch of women leer over a barely dressed man. This is normalising my idea of how women perceive men with perfectly sculpted bodies and how it's perfectly okay for men to be treated as sex objects, as long as they dare not act on it without explicit (perhaps written) permission first.

If I were more of easily influenced man, I might even become so insecure from this 'normalised' imagery, I'd go and take some illegal supplements to enhance myself to the level of what would be expected of me. This could result in massive health complications, even premature death but… I'm a man, right? I am a beneficiary of the 'patriarchy'.

Loading…

A Disjointed Front

Perhaps if the female gender were to present a unified front on this matter, these claims could be taken a little more seriously. Even applying the same argument for sexualised imagery demeaning all people might give your exposition some weight. These ‘sexist’ publications require models to portray the imagery you find offensive, of which there is a huge selection jostling for the opportunity.

Or is this attack directed on beleaguered UK retailers, because they are aware of the magic words below, quoted directly from the press release of this campaign;

> ‘There is legal precedence of women working in other industries successfully suing their employers after being exposed to pornography at work’.

So really, shouldn’t Kat be attacking the women who expose themselves for money? One of the central tenets of feminism is the self empowerment of women; free to apply themselves as they choose. This is also one of the benefits of living in a democratic, Western country.

No, she instead chooses to adopt language feared by image conscious retailers in a massively imbalanced society. ‘Suing’ is included in all publicity to shift potential support focus from the absurdity of your claims, much in the same way as the word ‘rape’ is included in the majority of feminist literature to make it appear more legitimate amongst your peers.

Abuse Of Terminology

The very fact the majority of feminists use the word ‘rape’ within their literature with such an alarming regularity, is a disgusting insult to those women who have genuinely undergone such an atrocity. Likewise for overuse of the word ‘exploitation’, which I’m sure both men and women working in for example, a typical Bangladesh clothing sweatshop would be happy to comment on many issues where white, Western women claim they’ve been ‘exploited’.

Under the same principle, to leverage and encourage workers to sue their employers in a struggling economy, only ultimately serves to drive businesses away from employing women, which will no doubt result in another wave of protest.

You can’t have it both ways Kat. Educate your own gender first, figure out your end game, then perhaps you’ll be taken more seriously.

Men and Women; know your real enemy:

I Will Teach You To Be Rich

June 25, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

I guess common sense isn't so common. In "I Will Teach You To Be Rich," Ramit Sethi shares anecdote upon anecdote about people falling into horrible credit card debt keeping up with the unfortunately common consumerist lifestyle. Luckily, the book provides solid advice about how to break this cycle. Three main takeaways from the book are:

1. Optimize your credit

The clowns on r/Frugal would have you believe that credit cards are evil. This is incorrect. Credit helps you track your spending, can get you rewards, provides consumer protection, and helps you build a history that can save you thousands of dollars in interest on home and business loans. The key to these benefits is eliminating credit debt, usually the first step in financial triage.

2. Automate

Nearly everything can be automated: credit card payments, student loan payments, investment into your 401k, bill autopay, deposits to a savings account, etc. We are lazy and prone to passivity, so it is important to take as much day-to-day maintenance out of our hands as possible.

Loading...

3. Don't try to beat the market

For every Warren Buffet there are thousands of weekend warrior traders chasing meaningless short term gains. Sethi does a good job hammering home the point that even highly paid professionals rarely succeed in beating the market over the long term. Worse yet, actively traded funds eat significantly into your margins with management fees. It is better to play the long game and choose low-fee index funds (or similar investments) if you're investing for the long haul.

The fatal flaw of the book is that it errs too much on the side of frugality. In a book about becoming rich, there is very little about increasing your income, starting a side business, or value creation. While Sethi gives myriad tips on reducing spending, the only writing devoted towards making more money is when how to weasel a better raise out of your employers or get a job with a slightly better salary. Frugality isn't necessarily the best mindset for happiness over the long term, and at least Sethi agrees that one should identify sources of fulfillment and allocate spending to them.

I came to many of the conclusions in Sethi's book on my own, but that was through five years of reading forums, taking tidbits from friends and the media, and trial and error. The book can be quotidian and Blue Pill at times, but the good certainly outweighs the bad. It is a must-read for anyone in serious debt, or any twentysometihng to attain financial independence.

3 Quick Tips To Protect Yourself Legally

June 26, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

Being a litigator and dealing mostly with business related issues, I come across a lot of instances where either my client or the opposing client could have avoided a huge mess by simply being smarter about the way he or she approached the situation. It's very easy for me to say that however because as an attorney I see examples of such mistakes on a very regular basis. So how can a layperson better protect themselves legally on a day to day basis? Here are three quick tips that are easy to implement and can save you a lot of potential headache in the future:

Shut The Fuck Up

> Always Say Less Than Necessary
> When you are trying to impress people with words, the more you say, the more common you appear, and the less in control. Even if you are saying something banal, it will seem original if you make it vague, open-ended, and sphinxlike. Powerful people impress and intimidate by saying less. The more you say, the more likely you are to say something foolish."
> —Robert Greene, The 48 Laws of Power

When in doubt, which should be often if you are not an attorney, just stop talking. As an example let's say you get into a car accident. The police come and ask if you are ok and you feel fine at that moment, so you say "Yeah yeah I'm fine." Next morning you wake up and your neck and back are killing you as these injuries did not materialize immediately after the incident because you were still in shock. Now when you go to make your claim, the insurance company will lock itself to those four words you stated to the police and try to make it seem you are feigning your injuries.

You really don't have to talk to anyone. Even if the cops show up to an accident scene, you don't have to talk to them. You don't have to talk to your own insurance company. Lawyer up and let him do the talking for you.

This applies in other settings as well. Striking a business deal? Don't promise the world to him and later open yourself up to claims of misrepresentation and fraud. Of course it's not always possible to just be silent, so when you do have to talk, make sure to…

Always Confirm In Writing

Don't let things fall into the he said/she said crap. An email is forever, and it can help save you months of litigation and expense if it takes something that is open to interpretation and clearly establishes a disputed fact. Moving into a new apartment? Email a list of the damaged items to the manager instead of telling him over the telephone. Now when you move out he can't charge you for these things. Reached a verbal agreement for the delivery of some goods or services? Confirm it with an email so there is no question as to what the deal was in the future.

Loading...

I'll also share a tactic I use often when confirming things in writing. Which of the following is more effective?

> Thanks Jeff. Please confirm that if payment is made within 30 days my company will receive 10% off the final invoice.

Or…

> Thanks Jeff. This email confirms that if payment is made within 30 days my company will receive 10% off the final invoice.

In the first instance, if Jeff does not email you back then he can claim he never "confirmed" the discount and challenge it later. In the latter, the onus is on him so if he doesn't respond, that is essentially acquiescence to your terms. You can even bolster the second sentence and throw in a "If this is not your understanding please email me immediately."

Ambiguity Can Be Your Friend

There are certain instances however where you do not want to be so direct and clear in your writing or your words. Using words or phrases such as "it seems" or "it appears" or "based on my knowledge" can allow you some wiggle room in the future if you need to change your position on something. As a very basic example, compare these two statements in response to the question "What did the company promise you when you were hired?"

> Guaranteed salary of $5k/month, a tiered bonus structure, and a medical/dental plan.

Alternatively…

> From what I remember, I believe a guaranteed salary of $5k/month, a tiered bonus structure, and a medical/dental plan.

Afterwards you recall your company also stated you would get 10 days vacation per year. Now when you go back to supplement your response, under the first variation you can be met with some resistance for not stating it at that time. Under the second variation, you have already provided yourself with a means to supplement your response by having qualifiers indicating the response may not be complete.

Conclusion

While this may seem like common sense, a lot of people tend to actually do the opposite of what is stated above. People think they must explain themselves thoroughly to defend their position, where in reality they can be creating themselves a bigger hole by talking too much. Similarly people think that if they can't recall everything they are better off acting as they do and giving a complete answer, whereas giving yourself room to supplement is usually the better course of action. It's always better to actually hire an attorney — but for the times you can't these three quick tips should help.

What Is Your Plan For When The Decline Accelerates?

June 26, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

I watch that “Doomsday Preppers” show on the Discovery Channel, which displays people who prepare to survive some form of societal collapse. I have always found it odd that none of them never really plan to exploit the opportunity. They just seem to exist to continue existing. I have yet to see a wannabe warlord stockpiling weapons, ammunition and a logistical tail to support his own army that would make any Afghan chieftain proud. It seems to me that a lot of these people hoping for a collapse just can’t make it in today’s status quo and will most likely be just as successful in the future as they are now (which is not that successful).

Commentary on the decline

To paraphrase Bane’s saying in the Dark Knight Rises; are you ready for the next era of Western civilization? In this day and age of money printing, drone strikes, broad daylight decapitation and leftist worldviews crumbling, the future is bright for an agile mind. Such a mind should be able to find opportunities in a changing and fluid environment. The changing status quo could present an opening or just more closed doors depending on who and what you are. Just like the Decepticons tossing their brethren off of Astrotrain in the Transformers movie, when the government gravy train starts slowing down, it will be the weakest that get tossed off first.

The spiral has begun to rotate

This is already happening with this supposed sequester and will continue to get better or worse depending on how you favor the current paradigm. Government grants for pseudoscience, social justice, advocacy groups, and any other federal largesse are starting to dry up. The reduction of disposable income is starting gum up the works of a materialistic society. The coming change in atmosphere will only lead to more opportunity for new markets, plans, and schemes. The current system is not nimble and many of its dependents will be selected out in one form or another.

Loading...

Are you getting ready?

Readiness entails more than talking about it or thinking about it. It takes action. Action is not accomplished making Facebook posts about political stories. One cannot become a good gunfighter by watching fpsrussia videos on YouTube. Buying Powerball tickets isn't rational financial planning. As it has been said, preparation is the key to success. Pounding weights at the gym is a whole lot more productive than reading a muscle magazine. Reading books is a whole lot better guide than taking financial advice from TV. Taking positive actions to improve one's position is always a good move.

The future will be bright, for some…

Instead of worrying about the future, one can learn to enjoy the downward spiral. While it might be harsh times for everyone, those who have been coddled and put on a pedestal in the current system will feel the most pain. Imagine watching that women's studies professor having to turn tricks to keep her apartment warm or depend on the protection of a man to keep her safe from “youths”. That smarmy hipster won’t be able to enjoy his ethical coffee and those tears will be delicious. The words driven, cry, and lamentations come to mind. In conclusion it is better to be the ant than the grasshopper.

11 Step Prep For A Night Out

June 26, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

How you start your night isn't just key; it's an essential element that can set you up for success or failure in your quest to pull a chick. Does Lebron stretch before a game? Yes. A LOT of cats skip over this element and wonder why they are striking out left and right once they hit a party, a bar or the club. Fuck; even an art gallery showing. Here's the 11 Step Prep formula I've perfected and developed over 10 years of going out.

This article is an excerpt from my new system: Nightclub Bible

Step 11: Workout

If you don't workout, then start. You're doing yourself a disservice if you don't. Doesn't mean you have to go to the gym and sling iron like Arnold in his prime; simply drop and do 100 pushups, 100 crunches and 50 dips on your kitchen counter. If you do hit the gym, then focus on your Glamour Muscles: Arms + Chest. Also, if you do a heavy leg workout the day of, or day before going out, you will have an extra dose of testosterone which translates into your vibe/energy you put out.

Step 10: Post Workout Meal

Eat within 45 minutes after working out and focus on foods that will 'ground' your stomach for the drinking. Baked chicken, brown rice and some green beans and you'll get the proper protein and carbs needed for energy. Don't decide to go eat some spicy ass food if you're not normally used to that type of diet. Stick with the basics, especially if it's the evening of a big night for you.

Step 9: Prep Your Pad

Unless you're a degenerate nasty bastard, your living spot should be relatively clean. Do a quick 15 minute run through to ensure your spot is ready to go when you bring a girl back. You may wind up banging her at her spot, a stairwell or in an alley, but better to be safe then sorry. Here's the list:

- Quick vaccum, or sweep of floors if hardwood.
- Windex mirrors
- Lysol the kitchen counters, bathroom sink and toilet.
- Make sure PERSONAL shit isn't laying out: i.e. your budget, tax return, or God knows what.
- Check your sheets? If they're not fresh, then change them.
- Alcohol check: vodka is a sure thing and maybe a tequila and rum won't hurt. Think basic though: 1 bottle of alcohol, 1 mixer and make sure the damn ice machine is working.

You're done.

Step 8: Shower & Groom

Take your time showering and be sure to groom. Not talking about just shaving or maintaining your 5′oclock shadow; I'm talking about making sure your cock n balls are presentable. It will play into your confidence as well when approaching girls, that you know later when you get naked with one, or maybe two of them, that you're good to go.

My suggestion: Go Pornstar. Stays clean and chicks like it.

While doing this put on some of your favorite Feel Good music. Blast that shit.. This helps get you hyped up and feeling great. We all have different preferences, but I suggest Frank Sinatra. Stay away from any melancholy tunes no matter what.

Step 7: Suit Up

Yes, I'm an advocate of suiting up. Let's say you live in a small Texas town though, and it just doesn't make sense to wear a suit to your local bar. That's ok. Wear what's appropriate; BUT make sure your outfit is clean, ironed and looks good. If you are in the Suit-Up camp; then don't be afraid to throw some dashes of color into your outfit. It's summertime and something bold is great to be opened with.

I rocked a blue suit jacket (picture below) with a black dress shirt and cream dress pants, with a pink pocket square this past weekend and it was beyond a smashing hit. I had numerous girls approach me, touch my jacket and compliment it.

Step 6: Have One Drink (And One Smoke)

After I get suited up, I like to pour myself one vodka tonic with a couple of limes. I sit back, sip on my drink and have a cig. One unhurried drink before heading out, eases the mind and sets one straight. This is a time to release all of the bullshit of the day and to focus on your goal(s) for the night. What is she going to look like? Are you in the mood for Asian, Latina, Black, White? How about a redhead? Visualize it and smile.

Step 5: Do Affirmations

Affirmations without a doubt work; when done consistently. I'm not going to go Tony Robbins on your asses, but try it out. After you've gotten dressed and had your drink (and smoke), go stand in front of your mirror and look at yourself. Like what you see? You better; half the battle is knowing YOUR worth and feeling like you're the prize going out for the night and one LUCKY girl is going to get you. It might feel odd at first, but guess what? No one is watching you and know one gives a flying fuck.

This is your life so look into the mirror and say something like this, making sure to REPEAT each line 3 times:

"I am very charismatic"

"I am very good looking" (Doesn't matter if you are or not; it's a mindset trick which will help you carry yourself better)

"I will have a GREAT night"

"Girls fucking LOVE me"

"Girls WANT to fuck me"

"I'm a badass motherfucker who does what I want, when I want"

You'll find that when you get done, if you commit 100%, that you'll feel a new energy and jolt of excitement. You're putting it out there that you have control over what happens that night, which is very very powerful. Even if you want to knock this advice; try it for one week everyday and see how you feel at the end of the week. It's life-changing.

Step 4: Text Blasts

All of the cute girls you've met that week or have in your phone that are local to you, send out text blasts to them. Can be anything that is funny, sarcastic and witty. I send out emoji blasts sometimes that look like a cock shooting a load into a girls face. It puts it out there EXACTLY what you're about, but yet it's funny in a light way. Why send out texts BEFORE going out? It's called ASAP Pipelining.

When you have multiple girls texting you as you head out the door for the night, it increases your confidence and takes away any neediness you may feel with the first girl you talk to. Here's some sample texts taken from my phone. Feel free to use them:

Me: (Insert emojis of a cock busting in a girls mouth/face)

Her: OMG! Nasty boy ;)

Her: What are you doing tonite

Me: taking over the world

Her: Sounds fun. But seriously?

Me: sushi XYZ club then get naked with a sexy girl like yourself

Her: Ohhhh….hmmmm sounds fun. I have my best friends birthday but wanna meet up afterwards?

Me: prolly

Her: Ok! Text me when you're done

Now these are not fuck buddy chicks; these are girls in the pipeline who I HAVEN'T fucked. Get's you in the gaming mood and possibly fresh lays.

Step 3: Watch A Clip Of A Old School Film/Actor

This one is money. Nothing gets me more in the mood to go pull a fresh slut, then to watch a clip from an older movie with a badass actor who was an alpha man. Usually, I choose a clip where the scene involves a woman. They're short, to the point and help get your mindset ready to go. Here is one I watch. Classic McQueen with a hot filly; so fucking money.

Step 2: Talk To Everyone

The moment you step out of your pad, whether it's to go by the gas station for last minute essentials or the cabbie driving you to a joint, CONVERSATE. Keep convo light, upbeat and utilize eye contact (Eye contact is HUGE). It get's you flowing so when you spot a cutie and walk up to her it's in the natural flow of your state to talk to her. If the last person you talked to was your dog that night, then you are going to feel 'off'.

Step 1: Get Out Early

In a perfect world this would always be viable; however work commitments, etc. can sometimes make this difficult. When possible though, get out an hour to hour and a half BEFORE you hit the party, a bar or a club. I prefer hotel bars where I can get a drink, post up, respond to texts/calls and Ease Into The Night.

It makes a huge difference. Restaurants are great as well, especially if it's a hotspot with lots of girls. Grab an appetizer, talk to some girls and head to your next destination.

Fanfare For The American Career Woman

June 27, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Walk into any company office in the United States, and take a good look at the people there. You'll see some men in grey or navy suits, other men in chinos and tacky striped shirts. In fact, the electronics manufacturer Samsung made an academic documentary comparing the typical American male and female office workers:

The documentary, while brief, is accurate – in an office where the average man might be wearing an oxford shirt and tie, the typical woman is wearing at least one large piece of clothing in a loud tacky color, and is altogether much less formal. Not to worry, she doesn't stop to consider whether she's too old, fat or ugly to pull off such gaudy, frumpy clothing – she's so empowered that grace and humility are irrelevant. Her clothes are so sloppy even Goodwill wouldn't take them. Lest you think I am making all this up, take a gander at one of the most august institutions in the land, Congress, and its freshman class of 2013:

Even though there are several times more men than women, not one man appears in bright red, blue, pink or yellow. For the men, it gets about as radical as a light grey suit, plus the weirdo wearing a red shirt. The men are nearly identical – they wear conservative suits and shirts, and occasionally loud neckties. The women, on the other hand, have never met a gauche shade of neon they wouldn't wear. Why are American women so hell bent on attention whoring, precisely in the places where they say they want to be taken seriously? Why do women 'fight for equality' by swapping outfits with Bozo the Clown? Why are old white women so desperate to show us their wrinkly cleavage? It used to be common convention, that the uglier and saggier you are, the quieter your clothing should be.

I've yet to meet any group of straight men that can match the narcissism of the American woman at work. All I could find was the case of Buzz Bissinger, a GQ contributor who later checked into rehab for a shopping addiction. As far as I can tell, he is the male analog to the women I describe. And it is not pretty. Oh, it turns out he's had some homosexual encounters as well. I'd love to see a straight man test the bounds of 'equality,' and dress like these buffoons, and still keep his job.

A part of me likes the fact that this shenanigans is widely accepted. It's fun to imagine there's some fat bald dude at the top, chomping on a cigar, waving you a big "fuck you," smirking. "See punk, we have women wearing these clown suits to warn you that the rules only apply to you men. So you can't say you weren't warned!" And yet I've mentioned this to men at work, and they shrug their shoulders, with a mix of cowardice and resignation. They have never worked a day in their life where things were different, where women were subject to the same expectations. They have no other frame of reference, nor the breadth of mind to recognize how ridiculous these getups are.

The late traditionalist Lawrence Auster made one of those observations, that, once read, seems patently obvious:

> The way many women dress today, with half their breasts exposed, is an expression of total disrespect for men. Men are left with three possible responses. To grab the woman, which is illegal; to ogle the woman, which is socially unacceptable; or to affect not to notice the woman at all, which is emasculating. A culture that normalizes such female behavior—i.e. not only not noticing or objecting to it, but prohibiting any objection to it—is extremely sick.

A commenter, James N., added:

> To live in a world where something as natural as breathing is a crime is profoundly alienating—it unmans men, which is just exactly what it's intended to do.

> Loading…
> The “hip, cool” posture just covers up how much mojo the hipster has lost. He’s been castrated, and he’s not supposed to care.
> St. Bernard of Clairvaux said, “To be always with a woman and not have intercourse with her is harder than to raise the dead.” Men in today’s society have their work cut out for them.

It is ludicrous to take a women in such garb seriously; she is telegraphing “LOOK AT ME,” while you are supposed to respect her as a peer and comrade. Most men see skimpy attire on women as an unmitigated good. Insofar as it lets you know who the strumpets are, I suppose this is so.

The blogger Laura Woods adds:

> This sort of revealing dress in professional settings is a last-ditch effort by women to salvage their femininity. They are living daily lives of masculine aggression and drive. They are pressured to destroy their inherent selflessness and desire to serve. They make their breasts appear overblown, near-to-bursting balloons as a way of diverting attention from what they have become. I believe many professional women are bordering on mild schizophrenia, so divided are they between male and female.

Hers may be the most potent explanation yet. I have surmised as much about the ubiquity of the color hot pink, as a microcosm of this drive, and it’s popularity as a marketing tool to women. It is an impossibly ugly, tacky hue, yet women love it. These women are not feminine in any meaningful way, yet they think that having a vagina is something to be proud of. Wearing hot pink is akin to liking an anti-Kony group on Facebook to feel like you’re doing your part to fight genocide.

If there were substance to your intent, you wouldn’t even bother with these pointless public displays. You’d already have an outlet for this part of yourself, where you’re busy accomplishing things of substance. The brand Love Pink is the ultimate expression of this trend – incredibly slutty, trashy and plebeian. It strains the imagination to see a woman in these clothes as anything but an inveterate whore.

As the journalist Steve Sailer put it, the fundamental law of female journalism is "the most heartfelt articles by female journalists tend to be demands that social values be overturned in order that, Come the Revolution, the journalist herself will be considered hotter-looking." These women of Congress are declaring that merely being recognized as a Congressman is not enough, that they must brazenly inform everyone that they are women too, women who need attention, women who need to be recognized for their sexual value as well as their career accomplishments. Like the female journalists Sailer mocks, this is the battle of foremost concern to our female Congressmen, whose uniforms they wear with unswerving fealty.

"A woman simply is, but a man must become." – Camille Paglia

To be sure, both sexes crave attention. But the occasional male drama queen aside, there is a stark difference – men earn attention by accomplishment, while women feel entitled to attention for simply being. A man considers it unbecoming to vie for attention without prior accomplishment. Once a man achieves something of note, he contents himself with the respect and loyalty of his peers.

For many women, this simply isn't enough; it doesn't sate a woman's lust for validation as it would a man's. No, she wants to be the belle of the ball, to have men fawning over her and women envying her, to be the most desired of them all. And the 'girl power' message has reached such a crescendo that even looking as comely as a diva now is hardly a prerequisite for acting like one. Each sex has its vices. But if men and women are to work together towards a common end, they ought to dress to reflect that.

Photograph Yourself In Your Prime

June 28, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

When I was still a teenager, I dated a girl whose family friends included the lead singer of a famous soul-music band from the 1970s. The guy, who we'll call Randall, had since retired from the music scene, enjoying his years anonymously at a nondescript blue-collar job in the city. My then-girlfriend's father, who worked with the guy, only learned about Randall's glittering past two or three years into their professional relationship, when he'd requested some days off for a "reunion concert." Randall's former band members had talked him into getting on stage one more time.

Fortunately for me, my girlfriend's father was looking out and—knowing that I liked that type of music—had the presence of mind to hit the guy up for tickets. He called me to tell me the good news, adding that all I needed to do was to show up. Not only would I get to catch the extravaganza, I would be "part of his entourage" backstage. In retrospect, her father was the highlight of that relationship.

The show was at a big venue in New York City, and I showed up early enough to hang out with Randall and his band members in their hotel's lobby. Despite being decades past their prime, and several pounds overweight, these guys were absolutely electric. You could tell they had done this before. They were dressed to the nines, and emitted an effortless larger-than-life energy that drew stares.

I, on the other hands, couldn't have been greener. I wore nothing more than a plain-looking pair of corduroys and an ill-fitting vintage t-shirt. Despite this, two different (hot) girls approached me with the flimsiest of excuses. One asked me what kind of music "we" performed. Another asked me where I'd gotten the shitty t-shirt I was wearing. At the time, I thought she really wanted to know and carried on about how I'd managed to get my hands on it.

The entire time we were sitting in the lobby, Randall was snapping pictures of everyone—and everything—in sight with a professional-grade SLR camera he'd been wearing around his neck. And, when I say everything, I mean everything. He photographed the empty concierge desk. He photographed the lobby phone. He photographed me. It was the weirdest sight: a guy wearing a sequin-covered, disco-king outfit snapping pictures. It would have made more sense if it had been the other way around—with people taking pictures of him—a fact I noted out loud when I finally got irritated enough at having his camera in my face to same something. "Randall, why on Earth are you taking so many pictures?" His answer struck me.

Loading...

> When we were in our prime, we performed all over the world. We performed in front of royalty. We once performed with Michael Jackson. We won awards. We performed in amazing venues that no longer exist. I saw my name in lights, which is a feeling you can't imagine until you've experienced it. Do you know how many pictures I have from that time?

With his right-hand fingers he formed a number zero. "Not a single one. The only pictures from that world that I have are a few newspaper clippings."

Some years after the Randall incident, I was at another girlfriend's house. It must have been Thanksgiving, and a bunch of her family members were sitting around talking shit about the past. Naturally, the photo album came out. Bored, but intrigued at the prospect of spying something interesting or scandalous, I leaned in. On one of the pages I spotted the coolest cat. He had perfect hair, perfectly groomed sideburns, a beautiful (and expensive-looking) butterfly-collar shirt with a loud print, and a cigarette hanging loosely in his mouth. "Who's that?!" I asked with genuine admiration for the guy's steeze. "That's Bryan," a chorus of people answered. At hearing his name, Bryan—my girlfriend's old, pot-bellied, balding father—walked over and said, "Pfft. I was the shit back then."

Sitting in the corner, I couldn't help but wonder: how many pictures like that–of me in my prime–do I have? How many moments have I missed? How many more years do I have where I actually can look my best?

Despite the fact that nowadays everyone carries a phone with a camera in it, and social networking enables sharing pictures with incredible ease, I'm astounded by the number of guys I meet who agree with me when I say "man, I have such few pictures of myself." For all of the complaining that we do about female attention-whoring—and I'm among the leaders in that project—girls simply don't have this problem. They spend half their day photographing each other, in every permutation possible, looking for the most flattering angle, lighting, and facial expression.

Needless to say, we don't need to descend into the world of chick-level attention-whoring—Instagram selfies and 500 pictures in a single night out—but the next time you're suited up, coming off a two-month workout binge, or doing something big, have a buddy grab a few shots for you. You'll thank yourself for it later.

One Lift To Rule Them All

June 28, 2013 | by David | Link | Original Link

This article is not about the squat. Or the deadlift. Or even the bench press.

They are all great movement in their own right, don't get me wrong. They can build muscle, increase functional strength, and even power.

However, today I am writing about a move that has been forgotten in today's popular bodybuilding magazines and routines.

The Double Dumbbell Clean And Press

1. Grab a dumbbell in each hand, and stand tall – with your arms hanging at your side.

2. Hinge at the hips and bend until the dumbbells are about knee level.

3. Stand up quickly, squeezing your glutes and shrugging your shoulder while lifting the weights to your shoulders.

4. Perform an overhead press.

5. Return the weights to your sides.

This video does a decent job at demonstrating the exercise:

Loading...

Why?

Because it will break your ass down.

Seriously. Whether you choose a low weight and high reps, or vice versa. Cleaning the weight up to your shoulders builds explosive power. And the overhead press works the entire upper body.

Throughout the movement you work everything from your glutes and hamstrings to your back, shoulders, and arms.

Give it a try. Add this one exercise to the beginning of your next workout. Go for 5 sets of 5, upping the weight with each set. If you are having difficulty pressing the dumbbells overhead, then you're going too heavy.

Strength, power, hypertrophy – it's all here.

Do What You Want To Do For Fun

June 29, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

1. Don’t be a follower on your free time

People do a lot of things they don’t want to do. This can be acceptable for some course of employment or obligations to friends and family. But where I have a problem with it is when people feel obligated or coerced into doing things they don’t like in the guise of leisure and entertainment. Peer pressure and social conformity are powerful tools. Doing things for enjoyment because you think others do them for enjoyment is beta.

2. Having fun should be fun.

Logic would dictate if do something that you like, you must like doing it. I have seen the “go along to get along” and herd conformity in activities such as watching sports, drinking to excess, following social trends, and doing things they see other people have fun doing. I’ve also seen the flip side of that in that people avoid activities they enjoy because they fear might be found to not be mainstream or “trendy”. It seems to be a symptom of a living a life not of your own.

3. Observing the herd in the wild.

Watching a wannabe hipster choke down a craft beer he doesn’t like while wearing the uniform of the “non conformist” to fit in with the crowd to pretend he’s having fun is one example. There can be many causes for this. One might be the need to fit in. He might feel the need to imitate those who are actually having fun. Or it might be he just doesn’t have the stones to tell people he doesn’t like doing such things so the cycle continues. In the end though it doesn’t matter his motivation because he cheated himself out of fun and the pursuit of his own leisure and happiness. Seems like a rather hollow existence to me.

4. Have at it.

Herd creatures like women and girlie men fall victim to conformity to the point where it interferes with their leisure. Or it might be that being part of the herd is more fun than anything else to them, either case I do not care. The target audience of this website is masculine men and they should pursue what they want to do, not what they’re told to do. If you like doing something then don’t stop doing it because somebody else doesn’t like what you doing.

Caveat: unlawful activity is unlawful, also this is not an excuse to play World of Warcraft. If pounding club bitches through the mattress is your thing, have at it. If you like building as SR 71 blackbird model jets repeatedly because they are all black and have no external armament, have at it. If you like being mechanically asphyxiated with synthetic fiber leggings while you rumble your girl’s ovaries by displacing volume in her pelvic cavity, have at it.

Loading...

5. Don’t be a social zombie.

Speaking of conformity in social norms, it is wise to look into the motivations behind certain influences in society when it wants you to act a certain way. Some influences are rather benign and lookout for the best interest of society, such as not stuffing your face with lard every day. Other influences are not as altruistic and they could actually be the opposite of the benign ones such as fat acceptance.

Some marketing campaigns are designed to motivate people to do something for fun. Marketing might be social political and/or material. People drink Bud Light mostly because they see the ads plastered everywhere and their friends do as well. An easy way to identify the more weak-minded in society is by comparing liquor trends with advertising budgets. Some of these weak individuals actually become free advertising for the company’s when they say silly things like “Ciroc is the best”. If you do things because other people are doing it or you think it is the cool thing to do or because you have to in a certain environment (socially speaking, not legally), then you might actually not be thinking with your own mind.

6. Broadening horizons through leisure.

I discovered trolling certain people. I came up with a game that only seems to work on the East Coast and in liberal cities but it’s rather fun to play. It is a game to draw out the betas and rustle their jimmies. I order a rum drink that is either pink or white and is served in a martini glass with a pineapple, cherry, or whatever fruit I can think of. As I sit at the bar, quite a few people will make a comment. If that comment is insulting, 100% of the time it came from a beta. This might be the one instance where a beta feels safe confronting and insulting somebody in such an environment.

Like an ant lion laying in wait, I relish when they stumble into my trap. Usually they say something along the lines of “why didn’t you order a man drink?” I reply with “I didn’t realize beverage selection was the measure of a man, I always thought it was the capacity for violence.” At this point the beta and/or omega usually becomes visually perturbed and I continue “You measured me as a man with your method, can I measure you according to mine?”

I find this game fun on so many levels. First of all, the betas are reminded of what they really are. Second is that it is intriguing to women who might be watching. Third, it is intellectually agile enough to make the academic types butthurt. I’ve noticed two things while playing this game. One is actual alpha males never ask anything about my beverage selection other than curious questions. Another is I actually like most of these fruity drinks and I order them outside of this game because I enjoy them.

7. Conclusion.

Have fun doing something because you like it and be your own man. Common sense would dictate the wearing a bathing suit to funeral might not be the greatest idea. Don’t be somebody’s unwitting pawn to meet their sales numbers because you felt the need to belong. Make decisions with your own mind. But to paraphrase Topgun: don’t have your ego write checks your body can’t cash.

Successful Women Use Poor Women To Advance

June 29, 2013 | by favouritemartian | Link | Original Link

Much has been written about the liberation Feminism has brought about for women by fighting for their right to work and earn a salary like men have been doing since time immemorial or at least since the Industrial Revolution started in the late eighteenth century. However, little do we know that behind every successful woman living the Fourth-Wave dream, there are… a lot of very unsuccessful women.

Entrepreneur Mother Of Two

Sometimes it's only Sarah and her breast pump

I recently came across this account of the travails of an entrepreneur mom (about to touch 40) of two:

> In the 10 weeks since we've become a family of four, the four of us have been in the same city for about three weeks. My husband is finishing an MFA in photography and working on an ambitious two-year photography project in downtown Las Vegas.
> Add in a PandoMonthly in LA, two in New York, and two conferences since Evie's birth, and we've been criss-crossing much of the United States in endless combinations. Me and Evie and the night nurse. Eli and our nanny and my husband. Me and Evie and Eli and the Nanny. Me, Eli, Evie, my husband, and the nanny. And my least favorite combo: Just me and the breast pump

So just to make things clear:

- She lives and works somewhere around San Francisco/San Jose/Silicon Valley.
- Her husband is doing a very important photography project in downtown Las Vegas.
- She regularly travels to Los Angeles, New York and to other random cities several times a month for work.
- They have two kids—21 months and 3 months old.

Juanita She Is The Restless River

I was reading this and thinking "How can you do all this without having two full-time nannies? Ok, at least one full-time and one part-time." And full-time really means that the nanny travels, eats and lodges with you. All of which translates into lots of moolah changing hands. (To be fair, she talks about it at the end of her post).

Loading...

The fundamental question then becomes: Who is raising this nanny's kids while she is working for her 24 hours a day?

Perhaps Juanita has her kids back home in Tijuana being raised by her mother which makes it possible for her to be a 24/7 nanny. But more about the Juanitas, Paulitas and Carlitas of this world in another post.

The Barista Conundrum

If the ideal of feminism is that women can find fulfillment through work (as opposed to by raising their own kids), then the nannies, Subway sandwich artists, fast-food employees and coffee artists of this world are fucked, but not the Mayers, Sandbergs and Bradshaws.

I have daycare at my work.

Let’s talk about the paradox inherent in Feminism’s struggle for women’s right to work.

Behind every “successful” woman there’s a host of other women (nannies and housekeepers) working on minimum wages to raise her kids which brings us to the fact that, fundamentally. feminism is a bourgeois concept which was initiated by bored upper-class women/housewives who longed to get away from the boredom of their mansions. (You might want to read Flaubert’s Madame Bovary in order to have an idea of the effects boredom can have on idle upper-class housewives)

They wanted to break the so-called glass-ceiling by working as politicians, attorneys, journalists, managers, CEOs and fund-raisers in non-profits but never as nannies, burger-flippers and baristas meaning that it’s the nature of the work and the salary which is important and not the right to work per se.

Vertical vs. Horizontal

And this is where feminism fails completely as a viable tool to achieve social equality because the class struggle, if any such thing can exist in the 21st century, has to be vertically oriented. It has to be the poor against the rich (which are social categories) rather than women against men (which are genders within a social category).

It makes no sense to talk about the “condition of women” in a society because the said “condition” depends on the social class. There is no economic or social overlap between the condition of a girl being exploited at a Whole Foods cash register and that of a female CEO at a Fortune 500 company.

The system is winning

The system wins by supporting any movement that replaces this vertical struggle (between social classes) by a horizontal one (within a social class), hence its unconditional support for feminism since its inception. It can therefore be said that feminism, by definition, is a destroyer of class solidarity.

Feminist Burger-Flippers Do Not Exist

Surely a protest for increase in minimum wage (I'm just giving an example, don't burn me on the comments' stake for heresy) would bring out all the men and women working on minimum wages on the street regardless of their gender because they belong to the same social class.

However there is nothing in common between a female CEO and a female Starbucks barista because gender does not transcend social class. An exploitative female middle manager at a McDonald's would abuse her subordinates regardless of their gender.

For example Melissa Mayer and Sheryl Sandburg would never quit their jobs to raise their children. These jobs are so well-paid and high social status that they automatically become fulfilling.

However, give their nannies (or a random sample of "N" nannies) this offer and a majority of them will accept it readily because why raise someone else's kids on a low wage (and leave your own kids to someone else's care) when you can give your time of the day to your own kids with the support of a loving/caring husband who is providing for the family.

Simply speaking, Mayer's and Sandburg's jobs are too good to relinquish, those of the nannies are too shitty to keep. It's not like nannies and baby-sitters have a pension plan, a BYOD policy and health-care benefits which come with their job.

The beauty of this swindle lies in the fact that a huge percentage of women end up as low wage workers while very few achieve the "I'm having it all" dream.

Male Nannies Do Not Exist Either

Male Nannies: You can find them only in Hollywood movies

Feminism shafts working class women in another very subtle way as well. Despite all the brouhaha about gender equality, a male nanny doesn't exist because the evil patriarchy forbids people to hire male nannies.

So it's not like working at the KFC, where the gender ratio of minimum wage earning employees is roughly 50-50 which means that the system is dishing out misery to both men and women on a fairly equitable basis.

On the other hand, a nanny has to be a woman, because even the feminists (let alone your average Volvo driving soccer mom), no matter how much gender-neutral they might be, won't hire a male nanny.

Now what happens in real life is that poor working class and lower middle-class women end up raising rich women's kids. Escape from this kind of exploitative wage-system was an opportunity offered to them in the pre-feminism era when having a job was not an obligation imposed by the system as it is now.

Prozac Nation

Don’t worry. Juanita will take it from here.

We all know that the definition of “raising the kids” has changed a lot over time and now it essentially means leaving your kids at daycare to go to work, picking them up, making (re-heating?) them some dinner, and putting them to bed.

Our entrepreneur/photographer couple, however, has taken it to a whole new level. Very rarely both of them are present to spend time with the kids. They have essentially outsourced the raising of their kids to nannies while pursuing their respective passions (don’t forget that this is, for all intents and purposes, a middle-class couple).

And this is where we find the ultimate flaw in the feminist social proposition.

It has made women believe that all the women can have it all. In practice however a lot of them end up having nothing at all: Neither a fulfilling job nor well brought up children nor a healthy marriage/relationship.

I won’t fall off my chair if the kids and the parents in this family end up hating each other a few years from now. The kids thinking of their parents as selfish proles who prioritize their work over their family and the parents thinking of their children as ungrateful little bastards who can not even appreciate the sacrifices their parents are making in order to give them a better life.

We keep on wondering why kids as young as 13-14 years old are doing drugs in well-off suburban communities and nobody tries to connect the dots between daycare/nanny-induced alienation and parental absenteeism in the suburbia, which by definition has a nonexistent cultural life and no outlet for venting adolescent angst.

My suggestion to the parents dabbling in this sort of extreme parenting-by-proxy experiments is to start putting aside a little bit of money from now on for their kids. Not for their college education though, but in order to pay for their therapy sessions when they hit their teenage years.

Your Independence Is Not For Sale

June 30, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

There was a time in my life when I did not fully appreciate the value of personal independence. I was unduly enamored by the idea of security and safety: it was preferable, I thought, to accept a “safe” job uncongenial to my nature, than to take the employment choice I truly wanted. Applied to women, I often thought it preferable to continue in a mediocre relationship, rather than terminate it, since “nothing better” was on the horizon. What a fool I was. I now recognize this mentality for what it is: an expression of fear. Fear, born from a mentality of scarcity. We fear that nothing better will come along, or that the leap into the unknown holds intolerable terrors.

The paradox of this mentality is that an unsatisfying job and an unsatisfying relationship are not “secure” at all. There is no “safety” in them: they are inherently unstable, and become more so with the passage of time. For when we do something that violates our inner nature, our spirit eventually revolts. And then: down come the precious delusions which we have so laboriously erected. It cannot be otherwise. It cannot.

Let us hear what our brother Phaedrus has to say about this. Readers will remember Phaedrus, as I have leaned on his wisdom before. In “The Lean Wolf and the Plump Dog” [Phaedrus III.7], he narrates as follows (with any errors in translation being my own, of course):

> As liberty is sweet, I will speak briefly.
> A wolf of lean countenance chanced upon a well-fed dog.
> After exchanging greetings, the wolf said:
> “How is it, I’d like to know, that your coat shines so?
> With what food to you get such a body?
> I, who am stronger by far, nearly am perishing of famine!”
> The dog replied simply: “You would be able to have the same,
> If you could fulfill the requirements of my master.”
> “And what is that?” said the wolf.
> “For I am truly ready for anything. Now I suffer from the snow and rain,

> In the forest, bringing me a difficult life. How much > Easier it would be for me to live under a roof and to be satisfied
> With sufficient food and leisure!"
> The dog replied: "Then come with me!"
> As they walked off, the wolf noticed the bare spot
> On the dog's neck, worn away from his chain.
> "What is this, friend?" said the wolf
> Said the dog: "Nothing."
> "Still, tell me!" said the wolf.
> The dog said, "Because I see sharply, they chain me up by day,
> And in the morning also, so that I keep quiet, and at night
> So that I may be vigilant.
> Loading...
> Between day and night I am untied so that I may have some movement.
> Bread is brought occasionally. And my master gives bones from his table.
> The family tosses morsels to me from what they don't want.
> Thus my stomach is filled with little effort."
> Said the wolf: "And if you have a mind to go away, is that allowed?"
> "It is not," replied the dog.
> "Enjoy these things that you praise, my friend," said the wolf.
> "I do not want this domain of yours. It is no freedom to me."

Security that comes with the price tag of your freedom is no security at all. There are many times in our lives when we will be faced with the temptations of comfort, security, and money. And there will be times when these inducements come at the cost of our spiritual independence and the integrity of our souls. In Oliver Stone's 1987 film Wall Street, the office sage, played by Hal Holbrook, counsels a young Charlie Sheen: "The thing about money, Bud…it makes you do things you don't want to do".

I recognize that there are times in life when we must make short-term decisions based on survival, and that such decisions may not be ideal. Survival is the first imperative, of course. I do not doubt that. But that is another matter entirely. I am speaking of a situation here in which someone chooses to go for the easy money, or the convenient woman, when it is not really his true wish to do so. And woe unto him who does this. He will regret this decision.

My brother, listen to me, and hear my words: your freedom is not negotiable. Your soul is not for sale. You shall not traffic in your spiritual independence. You will be happier doing what your inner nature impels, even if the financial reward appears less on the surface, than in selling your soul to the highest bidder.

Know, O my brother, that the craving for security and safety in this tumultuous world cannot be gained at the expense of your soul. This craving is the voice of fear. For the bargain for your soul is an unequal one, and will corrode your spirit. As you adopt the mentality of abundance, you will see that the quest for absolute security is a fool's errand. There is no guaranteed security, no guaranteed safety.

You alone are the guarantor of your own destiny, and your own independence. The wise man will aspire to the gateway of independence and wisdom. Do not exhaust yourself in the search for this gateway: for the gateway is within you.

Feminist Delusions Around The Lewinksy Fiasco

June 30, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Sometime in the early winter season of 1995, Monica Lewinsky met Bill Clinton and had their first sexual encounter. Over the course of two years they had nine encounters that, allegedly, never amounted to sexual intercourse. Further, it was alleged she blew Clinton in the Oval Office, with some of his semen staining what would become her very famous blue dress. In 1996, she was moved from her post at the White House because it was perceived they were too close.

Kenneth Starr

Let's go through the breaking of the story and his eventual impeachment trial. Linda Tripp, a coworker of Lewinsky's, began to record her conversations with her in which Lewinsky recounted the sex acts and her relationship with the President. Eventually, these tapes were turned over to Kenneth Starr, an independent prosecutor.

Clinton had been previously sued by Paula Jones for sexual harassment. The suit was settled in late 1998, with a key element of that trial being his deposition in which he denied a sexual relationship with Lewinsky. While the allegations of sexual trysts between Clinton and Lewinsky didn't surface until January 1998, it did not explode in the media until Kenneth Starr dropped the Starr report in early fall 1998, making strong, controversial allegations of the sexual relationship. When the allegations surfaced Bill Clinton famously drawled, "I did not have sexual relations with that woman."

Clinton was served with articles of impeachment by the Republican House on December 19, 1998, with two counts – one of perjury (in the Paula Jones lawsuit) and one of obstruction of justice (same deposition, the allegation his testimony amounted to altering the course of justice because of his lies). It was a quick and highly political process. Democrats were minorities in both Houses, especially in the House. The House was crucial in this process, from a Constitutional perspective, as the allegations have to voted on by a majority of the members to move to the Senate, where impeachment accusations have to be voted for by 2/3 of the Senate.

From a political perspective, anti-Clinton animus was strong in the House, as even a few Democrats voted for impeachment. However, the Senate could not meet the 2/3 threshold, as every Democrat voted against impeachment, while a good number of Republicans did vote against it, as well. Understand that at the Senate level, it is treated as an actual trial. The Chief Supreme Court Justice presides over the proceedings, and House members preside as prosecutors. The accused have access to counsel, and the Senate as a whole serves as the jury, as they vote for or against the charges. After a private deliberation the House prosecutors failed to garner the necessary 67 votes, which would have led to Clinton's impeachment and forcible removal from office.

Feminist Reactions To The Affair

Let's talk about the feminist reaction. Understand that Clinton knew he had to appease feminists politically as the 1990's had a strong feminist vibe to them. He appointed Janet Reno as Attorney General to placate feminists. Also, consider his marrying of Hillary. That could have been a calculated move by Clinton – a female with impressive credentials marrying an alpha male. Even in the past election, feminists praised Clinton for marrying Hillary – "proving intelligent and capable women can find love through who they are, not what they look like."

In general, the feminist response was supportive. To be sure, it was muddled for some, but in order to support Clinton, they focused on Lewinsky. They complained loudly about the media depiction of her – her looks and weight were discussed and she was treated as dumb and entitled. Even one feminist proclaimed that when Starr released his report, she wondered whether the literary relationship between Starr and Lewinsky was consensual.

Feminists were upset Lewinsky was threatened with imprisonment for her actions and allegations. This was the sticking point – they were upset that a woman made a choice to sleep with a man and the choice could potentially blow up in her face. Which brings me to an article penned at Ms. Magazine that highlights the feminist response and the feminist relationship with alphas, hypergamy and their sexuality.

Susie Bright wrote aforementioned article in which she refers to Lewinsky as a "sexual superstar" for seducing the most powerful man in America. Notice the implicit admission of hypergamy – Bright never even considers her assumption powerful men are attractive. Second, is her assumption that Lewinsky seduced Clinton, like she is some sort of latter-day Cleopatra. There were pictures of Lewinsky staring adoringly at Clinton – yeah, a clinical narcissist falls for somebody? The evidence doesn't even back the seduction up – Lewinsky was in photos clearly being the swooning person.

She then treats Lewinsky as a sexual blueprint to snag powerful men – if you want to bag powerful men, you must start packing on pounds. She even comments that if women start gaining weight, men will cry a sigh of relief, as they have always craved fat women – men have used thinness a weapon to oppress women. Finally, she discusses Lewinsky's supposed brain. She claims Lewinsky is a genius and should have been groomed for great things – like being President.

When women sleep with a man, often times they pretend to have the traits he has. Lewinsky sleeps with a charismatic genius; she must be a charismatic genius as well. Women like to pretend they sleep with an equal; however, they know on some level they sleep with more powerful men. They are repulsed by inferiors and turned off by equals. However, in our society, women like to pretend they are equals to the men they bed. Part of this is the impetus for feminism – I can sleep with and marry lawyers, why can't I be a lawyer? I must be smart enough because he has sex with me. He isn't attracted to my looks; he is attracted to my brain. We must be equals then.

Bright concludes Lewinsky's problem source from two reasons: patriarchy and her father's decision to only pay for community college before university. The community college "issue" is bizarre and reeks of typical feminist privilege. Community college isn't bad at all – in fact, if you are looking to avoid deleterious levels of student loan debt, community college is a great choice.

As for her second point, she claims Lewinsky had to seduce Clinton in order to climb the political ladder – she treats it as some sort of second-class citizenship situation where women have to sleep up the ladder to get there. She ignores the fact that men respect people who work hard and put their nose to the grindstone – she implicitly admits that women are more concerned with likeability than competency when promoting people. She also keeps pushing the point that Lewinsky seduced Clinton, but not just for lust but because she had to in order to climb the sexist patriarchy. She sees Lewinsky as sex icon, talking about how beautiful she is and how the nation will be reeling from Lewinsky's beauty for decades.

This highlights the absolutely confused & bizarre response feminists took towards Bill Clinton & Monica Lewinsky. Susan Faludi, a very strong feminist, was quoted on the matter saying, "If anything, it sounds like she put the moves on him," agreeing with Bright. Recall the feminist response to the sexual harassment allegations against Clarence Thomas by Anita Hill. Feminists were uniformly behind Anita Hill. To be sure, Clarence Thomas is black & Bill Clinton is white, so you can't ignore racism. However, there is a huge, qualitative difference between feminist responses to both allegations of sexual harassment.

Evolutionary Psychology & How Feminists Get

Sexuality Wrong

Loading...

Let's step through some evolutionary psychology before I go through feminist psychology around human sexuality. Matt Ridley penned the "The Red Queen" in 1993, at the height of feminist power in America. In his book he talks about how men and women are different because of different biological impetus' based on different evolutionary needs of men and women.

He argues women have a biological conflict with the men they sexually desire. At the first level – lust – they desire powerful (alpha) males; however, they have desires of a second and third order related to companionship. In essence, they lust after alphas and then want beta male attention. Notice how when women are pregnant or rearing very young children they are very receptive to beta male advances. That is evolutionary – they are weak and need protection and provisioning. This can also play out with women seeking male commitment, then being open to advances of superior, more powerful males.

Many feminists were unable to resist Bill Clinton after the allegations of dalliances with Lewinsky surfaced. Feminist Erica Jong made comments she was glad her President was active sexually, commenting, "Imagine what it would be like to swallow the President's cum!" Tina Brown commented on how much more charismatic & handsome he appeared after the scandal. Many other feminists talked about his sexual appeal, his physical appeal and most assuredly approved of him sexually.

This wasn't the only feminist response to his dalliances. A few were disgusted with the unabashed expression of female sexuality of their sisters. They claimed to focus on the constellation of allegations against Clinton related to his sexual indiscretions. This is where the feminist consternation was concentrated. However, the real focus was most likely the uncomfortable relationship feminists have with sexuality.

Let's have a discussion about the feminist psychology with respects to alpha males – the men, like all women, they are sexually attracted to. First, America is a society founded on puritanical values. This is reflected in the feminist reaction to sexuality in general. American society is not generally supportive of a positive sexuality for either sex. To be sure, the reigns have been loosened socially, but the underlying discomfit still persists.

Further, American society is also a society steeped in narcissism – in other words, it often is very self-absorbed. Both of these issues are obvious when feminists are faced with their sexuality & the implications.

Puritanically, there are two processes, both based in fear, that a feminist can go through psychologically in order to balance feminism & female sexuality. Either a feminist can purely deny her sexuality: I am afraid of my sexuality, I perceive that society & authority figures do not approve of my sexuality, I don't want to lose their approval, therefore I will not express my sexuality. The other process is projecting their base desires onto men. Many radical feminists have some crazy thoughts about what men think about sex and women – far too specific to be anything more than psychological projection. Otherwise, she can blame the patriarchy for inculcating bad thoughts in a male – usually centered around expressions of sexuality outside of what they think sexuality should be. Turn off the lights and only missionary.

However, let's talk about the feminist psyche around alpha males & beta males. Here is a quote from a previous article I wrote on RVF:

> As usual, the guys would abuse women will do so with impunity – they often have anti-social tendencies so they don't care about what the social mores are. For guys that would not beat their girlfriends or wives all it does it create unnecessary fear on their part. It is beyond predictable that women target their psychological equal – the insecure beta male. Unable to control the men they desire – alphas – they double down on asserting supreme control over beta males. It is never satisfying for them.

Women are torn. The competition for status in their hierarchies bleed over to their competition for alpha males in two ways. They falsely assume the need to demonstrate social superiority in their approach. Sure, some men prefer higher-status women – that is true. However, social status does not nearly have the same effect on men as it does on women. Women, by and large, are supremely unhappy with the beta males they end up settling with. This reality usually turns into narcissism.

Feminists are not comfortable with male sexuality because, by and large, they do not have the ability to get the men they desire and the betas they get are unappealing. Affairs like Clinton & Lewinsky are appealing because they get to pretend alpha men like Clinton prefer chubby women like Lewinsky. The narcissistic exposure here is the delusion that reality reflects their belief that unattractive women, like Lewinsky, can get & keep the attention of a man like Clinton. Further, feminists don't understand what men want because of this narcissism – they cannot understand any sexual desires that they don't value in the same way.

This feeds into the feminist assumption that men & women want similar things sexually. This assumption causes many issues when feminists consider male sexuality. Men and women don't want the same things sexually. Women desire to test for dominance in a way men don't; women value intelligence, confidence & wealth in ways men don't. Anti-fat shaming and beliefs that beauty standards are socially constructed feed into this narcissism. Feminists engage in these deconstructions because they don't matter as much to women, however there is a more important reason. They seek to deny male sexuality while trying to alter sexual standards so they rise to the top of the sexual hierarchy. Not only that, but they want their expressions of sexuality to reflect on who they see themselves as a person.

Remember Susie Bright? She portrayed Lewinsky as a seducer of Clinton. She repackaged his alphaness as her seduction of him. They want to be the best – Bright considered Lewinsky as Presidential material. However, women are attracted to the best – money, power and influence. Again, this is where narcissism comes in. They substitute actual greatness – Clinton's life – with brushing against that greatness. They get to live out their fantasies of power and influence by coming into contact with it. However, they really don't want that power, just want the illusion of it; they don't want their fantasies comprised by reality.

In reality, Clinton moved on and, recently, gave a rousing speech at the 2012 DNC. As for Lewinsky, she still is deeply in love with Clinton. She is now over 40, no kids and very much overweight. Like Roissy once said, five minutes of alpha is worth more than five years of beta. This case proves it. She allegedly only blew him nine times, but that was more than enough for lifelong love. She will spend the rest of her days recounting her days with Slick Willy. Like that one woman who released a book on her days with JFK – just days – remember that alpha males will always win. Women will always defend alphas – many feminists here proved that. They decided to defend Lewinsky, but they were implicitly defending Clinton while talking about how sexy Clinton was.

Never doubt the sheer power of the alpha male.

How Abigail Fisher Wasted Everyone's Time

July 1, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Affirmative action (particularly the race-based variant of it) has long proven a controversial issue in the USA for many reasons. Strong feelings exist on both sides of the aisle. Conservative forces call race-based affirmative action an affront to the legacy of civil rights, and even go as far in some cases as to equate themselves to historical figures like MLK and Medgar Evars as the inheritors of a anti-racist legacy.

On the other side, liberal forces equate the maintenance of race-based affirmative action to the maintenance of America's moral legitimacy, claiming that the policies are essential to the reparation of past inequities/atrocities and that society is morally obligated to see said reparation through at all costs.

Both sides got their chance to be heard on America's largest legal stage recently thanks to a young female plaintiff named Abigail Fisher.

A (mediocre looking) Texan, Fisher applied to the University of Texas at Austin in 2008 and was rejected. With the backing of conservative donors and activists (including her father, a legacy at UT whose longtime friend and classmate Edward Blum has lead Fisher's legal charge), Fisher filed suit claiming that her race was used unfairly against her. The case was, obviously, a direct challenge to the use of race in college admissions, specifically UT-Austin's consideration of race (along with dozens of other factors) as part of its "holistic admissions" process for students like Fisher who do not qualify for automatic admission to the school via the state's "10 Percent Plan" (more on that plan later).

Fisher 's case was defeated in all of the lower courts, and many observers were surprised to see the Supreme Court take the case on appeal. The result of their examination, however, was less surprising: the court essentially punted the issue, handing it back down to a lower court and asking them to do what amounted to a "do over".

I say that this result was unsurprising because anyone, upon closer examination of Fisher's merits, could see that she was not the ideal poster child for white victimization at the hands of affirmative action. Here is why she proved to be a waste of time:

1. She didn't have particularly good numbers.

Fisher had a 3.59 GPA and an 1180 SAT score. UT-Austin offers automatic admission to all students who finish within the top 10% of their high school classes, and Fisher failed to do that. UT-Austin admits the majority of its students via this 10% plan, so this forced Fisher into a very competitive pool of applicants seeking the remaining spots in the class (just 8% of UT-Austin's in-state slots in 2008 went to students admitted outside of the 10% plan). That she failed with her scores was not surprising, since they didn't stand out among her group.

2. She can't prove that her race was used against her.

UT-Austin evaluates candidates who fall outside of their 10% auto-admit group on a host of factors. Race is just one of them, and Fisher has offered no evidence to show that it (and not the dozens of other alternatives) was the key that pushed her out of contention.

In their bid to substantiate that claim, Fisher and her supporters have argued that minorities with lower scores than hers were getting into the school, claiming that the only difference between these minorities and Fisher was racial. The numbers do not back this up:

Loading...

> Fisher did not particularly stand out. Court records show her grade point average (3.59) and SAT scores (1180 out of 1600) were good but not great for the highly selective flagship university. The school's rejection rate that year for the remaining 841 openings was higher than the turn-down rate for students trying to get into Harvard.
> As a result, university officials claim in court filings that even if Fisher received points for her race and every other personal achievement factor, the letter she received in the mail still would have said no.
> It's true that the university, for whatever reason, offered provisional admission to some students with lower test scores and grades than Fisher. Five of those students were black or Latino. Forty-two were white.
> Neither Fisher nor Blum mentioned those 42 applicants in interviews. Nor did they acknowledge the 168 black and Latino students with grades as good as or better than Fisher's who were also denied entry into the university that year. Also left unsaid is the fact that Fisher turned down a standard UT offer under which she could have gone to the university her > sophomore year if she earned a 3.2 GPA at another Texas university school in her freshman year.

Again, Fisher has argued along with her supporters that race was the key to her rejection, citing her scores and parroting the notion that less qualified minorities "took her spot". Yet the numbers show that the vast majority of those admitted ahead of Fisher despite being "less qualified" than (at least as far as test scores and GPA's went) were actually white, just like Fisher. Further, there were hundreds of black and Hispanic students with numbers at or above Fisher's level who, like Fisher, failed to gain admission. These rejected minorities outnumber the supposedly "less qualified" minorities admitted ahead of Fisher by a factor of more than 33.

Even Fisher's primary backer, Edward Blum, had to admit the absurdity of it all:

> In an interview last month, Blum agreed Fisher's credentials and circumstances make it difficult to argue — as he and his supporters have so ardently in public — that but for her race Fisher would have been a Longhorn.

The debate over affirmative action is not over, and it will not be going away anytime soon. Fisher's case has been punted, but that only means that the lower court will be revisiting it in a year's time. Furthermore, other cases relating to affirmative action are likely to pop up in the coming years.

That being said, those looking to challenge the viability of race based affirmative action are going to continue to have a hard time doing so with the likes of Abigail Fisher leading their way. Fisher is a an average individual who displays a strong sense of entitlement to above-average outcomes, using scapegoats to cover herself in the event of her inevitable failure to achieve them. That any time was wasted considering the inevitable and entirely defensible results of her entitlement in this land's highest court of law is disappointing. If such individuals come to be associated too often with the anti-affirmative action cause, then it will continue to struggle to gain ground.

Lessons Learned From The Fast And The Furious

July 1, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

It's not often that you can find a movie franchise successful enough to do six movies without having a reboot halfway through. Hell it's hard enough for Hollywood to even make a successful trilogy. And yet not too long after the release of Fast & Furious 6, the creators of the franchise seem to have found a way to simply do that. The question is: how? Having finished watching the sixth movie I got a quick reminder on what it is that keeps people coming back for more, and without giving spoilers, I can assure you it's from some common themes throughout all of the movies that don't just involve cars.

Seamlessly Incorporate Hobbies Into Your Life

Too often people tell others to get a hobby. And too often hobbies start to interfere with life. The reason is because hobbies get serious for the person involved with them while others who don't partake in said activity don't understand. This is why it's important to develop a life around a hobby.

As quickly as the first Fast and Furious movie it's shown that the characters are developed together as a family rather than just race friends. What drew them all together however was their hobby of cars. Having struggled enough myself with arguing over hobbies with friends, family, and girlfriends in the past, I've learned really quickly to fuse hobbies into your life. It'll save you a bigger headache when you have lasting relationships with people who actually understand what you enjoy whether it's a bro who lifts weights with you or a woman who wants' to help tune a car.

Find Your Mexico

The first 16 seconds of the clip above explains the idea of finding your Mexico perfectly. While this is a vastly different concept depending on each person's concept, the idea of finding your Mexico is meaningful. For myself it was Minnesota, for one of my best friends it was Georgia. For some of you, it may be as simple as moving twenty minutes from where you life now or as complicated as moving all the way to Thailand.

The idea behind finding your Mexico is simple. Everyone at some point will want to try to build a new life and the only way to do that is to find a new place. For some it's to find a place where no one knows their past and for others it's as simple as finding a place where they just feel they belong. The point is, find wherever it is that you can find peace, security, and happiness.

Winning Is Winning

Loading...
The above is one of my favorite clips from the franchise because it's 100% truthful. When it comes to life, sports, women, racing, whatever, winning is winning. Contrary to the Nancy talk that society tries to spread to today's youth that winning doesn't matter, it plain and simply does. If you go to the bar and another dude leaves with your girl, no one is going to give you props for having almost left with her. You're only going to get props for having gotten the notch yourself. And everything in life is the same way. Winning is all that matters, second place counts for nothing. The quicker you realize this the less frustration you'll deal with later.

Your Friends Are Your Family

Most people tend to associate their best friends as family, but few people I know seem to truthfully look at those friends as actual family. Unless you've moved away from your family like I have, you likely haven't had the fortunate insight to realize that your friends might not be blood but they can be your family.

Luckily, back home I had another group of friends close enough to be family so the concept wasn't too shocking after moving. Having moved away, however, has helped me realize how important your friends can be. Friends can be your family and often are. And in rare cases, the can be more important than your family. Not every bro has to be your brother, but finding one that is will make your life a whole lot more interesting and meaningful.

Family Is Everything

This is probably the best lesson learned from the franchise, and is shown as quickly as the first film. Your family is everything. Whether it be your actual family related by blood, or your best friends that you've met throughout life, never lose site of the importance of your family. Every man no matter how tough he pretends to be will hit a period where life is rough. Your family will get you out of those rough spots that we all pretend to be too macho to relate to.

Obviously one could draw many more lessons from this franchise, the ones provided are almost limitless. In my opinion though, these are the ones that ring truest to life and towards the vast majority of the franchises audience.

The Benefits Of Not Masturbating

July 2, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

The last time I masturbated was February 24th.

Why? Because before that, I had several streaks of not masturbating — including one for 165 days — and for me the pluses far outweighed the minuses. It was no cake walk and there were definitely some times where I wanted to give up. But these days I avoid it for as long as I can.

The Beginning

As we all do from time to time, I was bored one day browsing the internet and came across the TED Talks presentation on the negative effects of masturbation and porn. I know that you should take these TED Talks with a grain of salt but this one grabbed my attention. After reading through some more articles and personal accounts of the "no fap" challenge, I said what the hell let me try it out. Here's my actual contemporaneous log from my times on the challenge. Please note that some log entries will just reiterate thoughts from previous entries, but I wanted to leave it as close to unedited as possible:

Round 1 – Day 6

I'm 6 days in and it's quite torturous. To the point I had to invite a regular over tonight instead of going out for fresh because I feel like if I don't nut soon I will die.

Round 1 – Day 22

Almost caved yesterday. So far, I can't tell if it's this or something else, but I've been attracting the hottest girls of my life. On the flip side, I've been having more difficulty in closing the deal. Not sure how much of this relates.

It gets way worse when you have a break in action from regular girls. I'm on a voluntary dry streak of sorts, in that I have 2 girls in rotation but keep avoiding them to try and get new and fresh.

Round 1 – Day 27

My previous results are growing. My ability to attract girls and especially higher quality ones has skyrocketed, though it could just be random luck. My conversational and flirting skills are the best they've been. But my closing skills have gone to shit. I have no idea why. This is very frustrating. I've now had several girls out on dates/back at my place and can't close, whereas before closing was my easiest part.

Round 1 – Day 28

It's over — I broke down. Back to Day 1…

Round 2 – Day 31

I went 27 days before breaking down, started again and now am on day 31. So one wank in about 2 months. Here's what I've noticed:

- I have a lot more extreme emotions, which for me is still very muted. I don't really have mood swings.

- I’m rock hard with the slightest of touch from a girl.
- I think about sex a LOT.
- Most importantly my ability to interact with girls has skyrocketed. Don’t know if it’s this or what, but I find myself being able to carry on conversations with girls with ease.
- I give much less of a shit about 1) rejection, and 2) any particular girl that I’m dating/trying to bang.
- I’ve had a more difficult time closing on dates. Not sure why.
- That one time I did jerk it, I felt so damn happy for about 5 days afterwards. Like I was just flying high in happiness. This was quite odd, I don’t think I was this happy in years.
- I’ve been approaching a lot more, probably because I’m outrageously horny.
- I’m more of a dick to girls, which works initially but then I push it too much and has been backfiring of late.
- Porn now almost freaks me out a bit. It’s weird I know, but not in the sense that oh my god what are they doing, but that since I don’t view it regularly it is a bit shocking to my eyes. I’ve only seen it randomly and not on purpose.
- I’m actually less efficient with work, mostly because how to bang and who to bang next dominate my thoughts.

Round 2 – Day 40

I think I have to stop this. As much as it improves my mental clarity and makes me aggressive as shit, yesterday I had sex for the first time sober since starting this thing and I nutted in 10 seconds – no exaggeration. I had a condom on too. I’ve never blown that fast in my life. When I wank consistently it takes all the concentration in the world for me to nut. At least then I can give the girl a good pounding.

Not sure what the answer is but I can’t be so sensitive to blow in seconds. Jesus.

Round 2 – Day 65

The desire to jerk it has completely subsided. I never even think about it anymore. My ability to approach, conversate and bang women has increased substantially. I actually feel like a different person, more confident. Of course it’s hard to directly correlate my success to this, but I’m sure it helps. The only negative I’ve noticed so far is the one time I had sober sex I blew in less than 10 seconds and had to pretend I was still going…and this was with a condom on. The desensitization associated with masturbation was over-corrected. When I drink and have sex though I’m fine.

Nonetheless a very positive experience for me and coupled with the lack of desire to masturbate honestly I’m not sure when I’ll jerk it again in the near future.

Round 2 – Day 68

I’m past two months now and if I don’t approach a girl in about 48 hours or so I start twitching. It insanely boosts your desire to go out and talk to girls, I can't even describe it. Actually yes I can, I feel like a crack addict when I go so many days without interacting with a girl – I simply fiend it. Before, I could go all week and just be content with the weekend approaches/nights out.

Round 2 – Day 77

I almost broke down on Tuesday. Really struggled but pushed through. When I went out that night I literally was walking around going I need to have sex with someone. Happened with third girl I spoke to. It really makes a difference after you pass a certain point.

Round 2 – Day 97

Can't believe I got this far. It's really really hard sometimes.

Just looked at some stats and I'll give some general observations. I started early June. Prior to that for 2012, I banged out 10 girls. So about 2 a month. Since I started, I've banged 12 girls, including 6 in August. A lot more ONS in the post-fap period. Some observations now:

Loading…

- I absolutely cannot handle not talking to a girl for more than 2 days. Like a crackhead, I get an itch to approach after about 48 hours.
- I care almost exclusively about sex. This has helped and hurt me. It has helped because my goal is always sex. I don't care about dates, I don't care about conversation, everything is calculated to how I can get the sex fastest. This helps with girls that are DTF I guess, however I'm sure other girls that maybe would want to date a few times would be turned off. I've noticed more SNL and less 2nd dates if that makes sense. Like it's now or never.
- I went from only being able to nut without a condom after 30 minutes, to twice nutting in less than 10 seconds with a condom. That's actually quite embarrassing. But that only happens if I'm dead sober and haven't had sex for a while. If I drink I'm fine.
- Within probably 2 minutes of nutting I'll be good to go again. Sometimes I won't even go soft, happened once. The girl was shocked and happy.
- The slightest stimulation and I'll be as hard as a rock. So makeout, I'm hard. Speed bump in road, I'm hard.
- I'm more honeybadger style, in that I don't give a shit and approach a lot more. Also, I care a lot less about any particular goal because I'm so focused on sex as opposed to the girl herself. Literally when I'm at a bar, when I see a girl my first thought is can or would I have sex with her. Not what do I open with, who is she here with, is she drunk, etc. It's all secondary.
- I feel like my productivity has DECREASED actually. This is because of the amount of time I spend thinking about sex. However, this could be a byproduct of my lack of girls in rotation recently. I've been moving around and traveling a lot so it's hard for me to keep anything going. I've lost girls because they either move on to someone who will date them, or I'm just not around enough and they get impatient and leave.

- I've had insane streaks, including a different girl in my bed for 9 straight nights (not all sex), my first threesome, and 6 girls in a month. Never had that before.
- I feel more confident.
- I really don't give a shit about many things. In a good way, as in I don't let outside thoughts/opinions influence my actions.
- My patience for LMR has gone way down and as a result I'm giving up sooner than I should.

But I'm struggling now. As good as August was to me I came back sick after labor day, have not gone out as much and messed up some easy layups last weekend so I'm on almost 2 weeks without sex. Have 3 dates lined up this week so we'll see what happens.

Round 2 – Day 103

I think I'm going to give this up. I'm just way too quick on the release everytime I'm with a girl now sober, as opposed to before I'd last forever. Not sure what to do, though my approaching has gone way up and I'm much better at getting conversations going.

Round 2 – Day 107

- I'm insanely horny. Like sometimes I just can't take it anymore I want to fuck so badly.
- This makes me approach a lot more and I have a lot stronger interactions with the girls.
- This has hurt my ability to overcome LMR. When I get so close I think I've turned into some sort of desperate/aggressive guy that stops them from going forward and turns them off. Before this I was pretty damn good at overcoming LMR.
- I've had a lot more SNLs.
- The slightest touch or makeout and I'm hard as a rock, from lack of stimulation.
- Worst problem as I just mentioned, I nut way too quickly now unless I'm hammered. This is not cool.
- I spend way too much time thinking about sex and it takes away from work.

Round 2 – Day 132

It's getting very hard. I now fantasize about fapping… like when I will do it, where I will be, the porn I will watch, etc. Not sure how much longer I can hold out. Everything makes me super hard these days. I have banged a lot more girls since I started this though so there's something to be said for that.

Round 2 – Day 153

Never thought I'd go this long… I've been close to breaking a few times already but somehow get distracted and continue on my fapless ways.

Round 2 – Day 165. THE END

Alright, so I went 165 days and decided to end it last night. Immediately I regretted it. Here's what I was like towards the end:

- The most objectively indifferent and aloof I've ever been towards girls. I honestly could not care less about any of them.
- Most sex I've ever had on a consistent basis. This was towards the end, have two girls on rotation and the occasional SNL here and there.
- Most girls I've banged in a 165 day time span (19 different girls)
- Most aggressive I've ever been in terms of going out and approaching.
- Most scatterbrained I've been with respect to work and desire to work.
- Least I've ever worked out since I started going to the gym 14 years ago.

As soon as I fapped my mind rushed in with tons of beta thoughts for whatever reason. It scared me. I wanted to sleep over one of my rotation girl's places. I wanted to stop going out and be a good guy. Like I literally was being brainwashed.

Obviously I realize that the direct sole variable is not fapping or not fapping, but indirectly it is. I probably had so many bangs because I was so aggressive in going out, but that was because I was not fapping so my only release was through a girl – talk about motivation.

Not sure if I'm going to go another 5.5 months or whatever, but I'm definitely not going back to my ways of before (few times a week).

The Next 30 Days

Pretty interesting update I have. It's been about a month since I gave up the NoFap ("NF") challenge and jacked off and have been doing so since then. I've decided I'm going right back to NF, and here's why:

- I'm still relatively indifferent about girls. However, I did let my guard down with some slut. I don't think I would have been as duped while in NF phase.
- My quantity and frequency of sex is still very high, mostly because I'm fucking my roommate so she's always there. However, I'm not happy with that situation to be frank. Kills my ability and desire to go out a bit. Nonetheless I still have brought girls back home, though…
- In this month since giving up NF, I've banged a total of zero new girls. None, zilch. I went from roughly 3.5 new bangs/month to 0. Horrible.
- I'm considerably less aggressive. Admittedly, it is due to the fact that I had two girls on rotation for a lot of the time. But sometimes I could just walk out and go approach some girls and rather chose to stay in and jack off, such as today.
- A little bit more focused on work to be honest.
- Started working out again, but I've actually put on about 5lbs (0% muscle). Need to really get in shape.

The beta thoughts continued on. I was very comfortable with my roommate and just having sex on demand. Many nights I'd give up my ability to mack, though largely it was so my friends could try to bang her friends, in that I'd offer to have our groups meet up but knowing my night would then be over. Previously I was ruthless and would never do that.

I started feeling burnt out and wanted to stop gaming so much. I wonder if my lessened desire also led me to believe I was getting burnt out. I actually never felt that way beforehand.

Take it for what you will, but in my eyes there is no doubt I was much better – game wise at least – during the NF phase.

Conclusion

February 24th was my last breakdown, so currently I'm at another 4+ months. I know I can't go forever but currently I have no desire to masturbate. And in looking back at my times and coinciding them with my game success there is one other benefit I realized… the times when I've lowered my standards, brought back home girls that I wasn't too proud of, have all been within days or weeks of my breakdowns. You would think the fact that if your only form of release is from a live girl your standards would decrease. In my case at least, it was the complete opposite.

Everyone is different and I realize that what may work for one may not work for others.

But this shit worked for me, and it worked wonders. I would recommend every guy give this at least one shot.

Thank You, American Sororities

July 2, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Rebecca Martinson is an American patriot.

In case you didn't pay the internet bill last month, she is the young woman who became famous for an email excoriating her fellow University of Maryland sorority sisters for behavior unbecoming of their organization. The email went viral and caused great outrage. This is part of the letter:

> For those of you that have your heads stuck under rocks, which apparently is the majority of this chapter, we have been FUCKING UP in terms of night time events and general social interactions with Sigma Nu. I've been getting texts on texts about people LITERALLY being so fucking AWKWARD and so fucking BORING.
> I do not give a flying fuck, and Sigma Nu does not give a flying fuck, about how much you fucking love to talk to your sisters. You have 361 days out of the fucking year to talk to sisters, and this week is NOT, I fucking repeat NOT ONE OF THEM. This week is about fostering relationships in the greek community, and that's not fucking possible if you're going to stand around and talk to each other and not our matchup. Newsflash you stupid cocks: FRATS DON'T LIKE BORING SORORITIES. Oh wait, DOUBLE FUCKING NEWSFLASH: SIGMA NU IS NOT GOING TO WANT TO HANG OUT WITH US IF WE FUCKING SUCK, which by the way in case you're an idiot and need it spelled out for you, WE FUCKING SUCK SO FAR. This also applies to you little shits that have talked openly about post gaming at a different frat IN FRONT OF SIGMA NU BROTHERS. Are you people fucking retarded? That's not a rhetorical question, I LITERALLY want you to email me back telling me if you're mentally slow so I can make sure you don't go to anymore night time events. If Sigma Nu openly said "Yeah we're gonna invite Zeta over", would you be happy? WOULD YOU? No you wouldn't, so WHY THE FUCK WOULD YOU DO IT TO THEM?? IN FRONT OF THEM?!! First of all, you SHOULDN'T be post gaming at other frats, I don't give a FUCK if your boyfriend is in it, if your brother is in it, or if your entire family is in that frat. YOU DON'T GO. YOU. DON'T. GO. And you ESPECIALLY do fucking NOT convince other girls to leave with you.

I, for one, applaud Rebecca for her forthright commitment to the true ideals a sorority, which contradict nearly everything else girls are taught at U.S. colleges. Frumpy Women's Studies professors spend four years telling girls that emphasis on their appearance is a meaningless social construct, they are blameless victims of an unfair patriarchal system, and that they should forego having a family in favor of shuffling paper in a cubicle until after their biological expiration date. Even mothers encourage their daughters to attend slut walks, work on their marketing degrees, embrace their roles as "empowered women," and love themselves for the mediocrities they are rather than what they could become. Contrast these with the priorities emphasized by American sororities:

Loading...

- Keeping up one's appearance
- Being feminine
- Pleasing men
- Committing to a group ideal above the needs of the individual
- Snaring the best male possible for commitment

What other institution remains that teaches girls to prioritize looking presentable and being interesting to men? Even trad-con church girls are fully bought into the divorce rape culture, which holds men by the short hairs in their subservience to higher ideals of "the marriage." The ultimate goal of a sorority girl is to get into a relationship with a contextual Alpha who will go on to accomplish great things while he takes care of her.

Sororities also fulfill an important and rapidly disappearing societal role as de-facto harems for high-value men. Have you ever heard a sorority girl complain about "the patriarchy"? No. They know that if they remain desirable and don't raise too much of a fuss, the hard-wired realities of gender roles favor them. Feminism is a joke when one is able to live a life of comfort and status by learning to please high-value men.

The dark side of sorority life is the elevation of hypergamy and materialism, two of the more undesirable aspects of westernized women. Assuming that our dating culture is beyond rehabilitation, though, let's call the modern dating game for what it is — an exchange of sex for provisioning and power. We're all striving to be better, more attractive, more powerful, etc. so we can capture the top end of the dating market. If the divide between the haves and the have nots in the sexual marketplace is only growing, we might as well reward the "haves" with girls who know how to please them. What's worse — a 27 year old who has played the field a bit and realizes it's time to use her feminine charms to settle down with a high-value man, or a 33 year old "career woman" who has ridden the same carousel for half a decade longer and thinks she "deserves" prince charming because of her masters degree?

It says a lot about our society that Greek life is the last bastion of any gender role traditionalism on modern college campuses. Next time you see a cutie wearing booty shorts with Greek letters on them, make sure to say a silent thank you to Zeus and Aphrodite. If you are a high-value man, you can rest assured that she has been trained for four years in how to please you more effectively than the average woman.

All The Kings Men

July 2, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is a novel set in the 1930s about a Southern politician named Willie Stark who rises from a minor local government post to become governor of the state. It's narrated from his right-hand man Jack Burden as he comes to terms with his place in the South while questioning the type of shady political work he does for Stark.

It's hard to mess up a rise-from-the-ashes story but the author, Robert Penn Warren, manages to do it. The only interesting character is Stark, and if the story focused on him the work would have been better, but instead we get painfully long monologues about Burden and his pathetic love for a girl who has rejected him. There are no likeable character and no interesting subplots. The book is like an old man telling you a story that he can't quite finish because he's so wrapped up in irrelevant details, and many times I thought about quitting the book entirely. Less than fifty percent of the book is actual story while the rest is fluff that you have to endure. To give you an idea of what I mean, there were over 30 pages of Burden droning on about the love of his life who was getting boned by another guy.

> I held her body to me and pressed her face back and our legs trailed down together as we rose slowly and waveringly through the blackness of the water and the silver of ascending bubbles. We rose very slowly, or at least it seemed very slowly, and I was holding my breath so long there was a pain in my chest and a whirling dizziness in my head, but the pain and the dizziness had passed the line over into a rapture like that I had had in my room the night I had first taken her to a movie and had stopped on the way home. I thought we would never reach the surface, we rose so slowly.
> Loading…

There's more…

> I saw her on Christmas, for ten days. It wasn't like the summer. She told me she loved me and was going to marry me, and she let me go pretty far. But she wouldn't marry me then, and she wouldn't go the limit. We had a row about that just before she left. She had been willing to in September, but now she wouldn't. It seemed that she was, in a way, breaking a promise, and so I got pretty mad. I > told her she didn't love me. She said she did. I wanted to know why she wouldn't go on, then. "It's not because I'm afraid and it's not because I don't love you. Oh, I do love you, Jackie, I do," she said, "and it's not because I'm a nasty old nicey-pants. It's because you are the way you are, Jackie."

> But she wouldn't say any more. So we had an awful row. I went back to State a nervous wreck. She didn't write to me for a month. I held out about two weeks, and then began to apologize.

There was another painful flashback of another 40 pages when Burden researched a slave owner who became moral. This "symbolism" was linked to the present time and slapped across our face thereafter whenever Penn got the chance.

All The Kings Men is the type of book that would deeply impress a proletariat who only reads two books a year. They'll labor through it for a month, and regardless if they liked it or not, will commend themselves that they read "literature" and were smarter for it, telling anyone who would listen about the feat they had just accomplished. They may be able to convince themselves of its quality since they are supposed to like it, but there's no fooling me: this is a boring book, plain and simple.

The Lakers Resort to Beta Supplication

July 3, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Say what you will about the Los Angeles Lakers, there's no denying that they're one of the great American sports franchises, with a storied past and a long tradition of winning. Many of the greatest players in the history of professional basketball have donned the Laker purple and gold, and its 16 titles is only one short of their hated rivals—the Boston Celtics—for most in NBA history. Since the 1960s, the Lakers have been a perennial presence in the playoffs, with each succeeding "dynasty" adding its own set of trophies to the pile.

The franchise's list of accomplishments, hall-of-fame rosters, and legendary coaches is too long to do justice to in a single post. Even their longtime announcer, the late, great Chick Hearn, is universally regarded as the greatest announcer in basketball—if not sports—history, coining the very lexicon of the sport, from "slam dunk" to "alley-oop" to "air ball." He was so good at calling games, real-time, that it was often said there wasn't much difference between watching the game on television and just listening to it on the radio.

Much of this success came during the era of Dr. Jerry Buss—a successful real-estate investor who bought the team in the 1970s. Buss was a fan's owner. While day-to-day operations belonged to his General Manager (the iconic Jerry West for much of that time and, after 2000, West's adept protégé Mitch Kupchak), Buss was known to be an active owner who got involved in major roster decisions. And he put his money where his high expectations were. The team not only drafted and refined young talent, it repeatedly lured high-profile free agents to Tinseltown with record-breaking contracts.

But, beyond paying out the requisite paychecks, the team never had to resort to elaborate stunts or begging to entice top-shelf talent. The winning tradition, the ready-to-win rosters, and the many lures of sunny Southern California were more than enough.

Things have changed. Up to the end of his life at the beginning of 2013, Jerry Buss had incrementally ceded control of the family business to his son, the decidedly less capable (and reportedly more mercurial) Jim Buss. During this era, the Lakers had reassembled an impressive team around Kobe Bryant and Pau Gasol, with whom they had won two more championships. Shaquille O'Neal had, famously, departed after a tumultuous relationship and power struggle with Bryant in 2004. (It's also considered likely that O'Neal was traded for shouting "Pay me!" to Jerry Buss, who was sitting in the stands, during an exhibition game—in a crass reference to their on-going contract negotiations.)

Last season, the Lakers offered up a supremely lackluster performance—barely making the playoffs and being swept in the first round—despite the additions of superstars Dwight Howard and Steve Nash to their already talented squad.

Loading...

Dwight Howard, who was traded to Los Angeles from the Orlando Magic (a trade he requested), was eligible for free agency after his season. The Lakers had surrendered a top-notch prospect for Howard, and knew the risks of only having Howard locked down for a year going in. After a disappointing year—one in which Howard was publicly taken to task by Kobe Bryant and Laker fans for his disappointing individual performance—he announced that would entertain free-agent offers from several other franchises. Howard's multi-city tour started this week. Needless to say, the Lakers, who would stand to get nothing for him if he were to leave, are highly motivated to do whatever's necessary to keep him. This is especially the case since last season was tainted by a series of injuries (including Howard's) and a major coaching change—developments that prevented the team from performing to its full potential.

You'd think the team would have confined its overtures to Howard to the sorts of closed-door negotiations and personnel reconfigurations that have taken place behind the scenes for decades. Blue-chip players have options and, whatever your team's merits may be, other teams have offerings as well–so some give-and-take is to be expected. But, instead of that time-honored tradition, the Jim Buss-Era Lakers have resorted to good old-fashioned supplication. In a (very public) public-relations blitz, which includes a series of self-abasing billboards around Los Angeles, the Lakers have decided to flatly beg Howard to remain in Los Angeles. Reminiscent of the 90s hit by proto-hipster Lisa Loeb by the same title, the billboards plainly implore Howard to "stay."

What's more, the Lakers have recruited other players in their supplication campaign. Kobe Bryant will reportedly attend the "pitch meeting" with Howard (the Lakers have been granted the privilege of presenting to Howard last), where some are speculating he will bring one of his championship rings for a tantalizing show-and-tell. Steve Nash—a shoo-in for the Hall of Fame—condescended himself, and his own career accomplishments, to tweet this:

I always tell guys that "life is game and game is life." In other words, the basic principles of game apply not just to picking up girls, but to everything—from dealing with your boss in your shitty office job to running a billion-dollar basketball team. Begging a girl to stay, as all of us know, is a sure-fire way to make her do the exact opposite.

And, like a heart-broken chump standing at a girl's doorstep with a wilting bouquet of flowers in the rain–while she's inside fielding offers from other guys– the Lakers are likely to meet the same, predictable fate.

In Grouping Is A Good Thing

July 3, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

1. Strength in numbers.

A group is almost always more powerful, resilient, successful than an individual. Humans have been forming groups for a long time (it appears that more than one person built the Great Pyramids). Grouping allows for the division of labor and strength in numbers. It is wise to belong to a beneficial group.There's an old saying best put the Iraqi way:

> Me against my brother. Me and my brother against my cousin. My family against my tribe. My tribe against Iraq, Iraq against the world.

Notice the egg within an egg nesting of the groups. Not every group has to be enemies of every other group. Human groupings form naturally and unnaturally. These groups can and do work against other groups. That is why it's important to have a strong group. Strong groups can be bonded by blood, religion, and reason. Over time these bonds can coalesce, such as arranged marriages between European royalty or assimilation.

2. What makes a group strong.

Groups can have strong or weak bonds. Some religious groups have members that would blow themselves up for the group. Other religious groups have easily malleable principles. Some family groups have members that would sit in a cell before snitching on a brother. Other family groups have members that would sell each other out for various things. Strong bonds lead to strong groups over time.

3. Group competition.

The simplified spirit of in-group out-group is this: the in-group competes against other out-groups. This can be through economics, politics, violence or even deception. This creates relativism between the groups, so that every side can think “we are the good guys”. This also allows for the dehumanization of “the enemy” so that they receive no mercy or quarter in conflict. To restate, groups are almost always more powerful than individuals.

4. Group manipulation.

The concept of the state allows for a group of many individuals that might not be bonded in other groups. It also might make membership in the nation group non negotiable. It can be argued that the state is the pinnacle of in-group development. The concept of in-group out-group is simple yet somehow become convoluted. Words like traditional, ethnic, social construct, power structure, and hierarchy get thrown around until the average man has no identity with a powerful group unless it is one assigned to him. In Western societies, powerful groups not sanctioned by the state are frowned upon. They could be criminal, not politically popular or even a possible contender to state power.

Loading...

Grouping is a source of power so other groups can work to destroy the integrity of competing groups. It can be seen today with the elevation of some over the degradation of others. Natural groupings are sometimes discouraged and artificial ones encouraged. An example of this would be division on trivial political views or trends

The creation of “artificial” groups can be deceiving. There is a theory that the atomization of the American family was by design to weaken the power held by large groups of related people. Mommies dependent on the government instead of the father of their children is a good example of a mass of individuals easier to control than a group of bonded people. One can see powerful entities operate on this in group philosophy. For example, chairmen of wealthy nonprofit organizations tend to have strong fertile families living in insular suburbs even though the politics of their nonprofit might be to “help” the inner-city. As Bruce Wayne said in “Batman Begins”, he needed to become more than just a man. Sometimes you do to.

Some “socially constructed” group members have no actual loyalty to each other. These groups tend to be certain social movements and political groups. The basic design of these groups is powerful people at the top manipulating the foot soldiers at the bottom to do their bidding with little or no payoff. A sign carrier at an Occupy really has no tangible benefit for being the sign carrier but feels like he belongs to something. A soldier shooting it out with people he would have never met in the Third World feels like he belongs to something. Whoever moved those pawns on the board is surely getting a payoff.

5. Conclusions.

Be wary of groups that seem to be more of a master-slave relationship or predatory such as certain unions, community activism, and lonely hearts clubs. Also you can judge a person by their loyalty to the varying groups. If someone snitched on a member of his or her immediate family, it is best not to go into crime, business, or romantic relationships with them.

When Hypergamy Is Criminal

July 4, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

As the coach of Dismal University's football team, Coach Patterson is ambitious. Fresh off his stint at a bigger university as an assistant coach, Patterson is anxious to make a name for himself, and his new employer. Unfortunately for Coach Patterson, DU doesn't have the money or the prestige to be a football powerhouse, so it doesn't get many exceptional players.

But our coach can't abide DU's continued mediocrity on the field. He starts subjecting his players to an exacting training regime. He erects extraordinary athletic goals, and expects all of his players to meet them. The few extraordinary athletes on the team perform with aplomb, achieving the feats demanded by our coach. But the ordinary players are destined for failure. Unless, that is, they start to use forbidden performance enhancing drugs. Patterson sets his goals so high that most of his players have no hope of staying on the team, without the aid of steroids. Say goodbye to all those raucous football parties, and to those valuable scholarships, if you don't start juicing.

Deep down, Patterson knows this. He knows the quandary he's putting his players in. He pays lip service to 'playing fair,' and glibly tells his players to 'seek help' if they ever need it. But his constant thundering about the need for success at all costs shows where his heart truly lies.

Most would recognize Patterson's actions as immoral and deserving of punishment. It might even be illegal. Even if the coach technically did not know about the drug use among his charges, he effectively forced his players into cheating. If these players would quit before ever cheating, he might simply replace them, until he had a team composed almost entirely of athletes on steroids. He might not even want to go after the men who are naturally talented any more; after all, if he can obtain the same effect with a less desirable athlete on the right stack of drugs, why compete against all those football powerhouses for the few great naturals?

'I made a G today', But you made it in a sleazy way – Tupac

Coach Patterson is not alone. In fact, this situation is probably far more common in the worlds of commerce and government than in sports. It's practically executive standard operating procedure: make exacting demands of your employees, demands that can only reasonably be met through some cocktail of fraud and theft. Meanwhile, remain studiously ignorant of how they meet these impossible goals. If the fraud ever comes to light, loudly deny executive responsibility and publicly vow that "this does not represent the storied ideals of Americorp, Inc." Make a show of firing the employees involved, pretend to implement oversight, and ready the next crop of employees to defraud your way to corporate profits.

A woman simply is, but a man must become – Camille Paglia

With a confluence of factors, women of the West are increasingly drawn to the most audacious men. Men of modest means are left to idle in celibacy. The modern woman finds it irrelevant if a man is monogamous, provided he's appealing. She's not interested in marriage "right now," plus she is so amazing that he won't want another woman once he has a taste of her – that's what all those rom-coms promised, anyhow. So the top 1% of men will capture a bigger and bigger share of women. The competition among men to get in that echelon will be stiff. Roosh recently predicted that it will take fame or steroids to get laid in the future – that is our trajectory.

"Our generation's probably the worst since… the protestant reformation. Barbaric." – Metropolitan (1990)

When it comes to selecting a partner, men value femininity, beauty and youth. For long term partners in particular, they look for women with a kind, sweet nature, for women who seem devoted and loyal. Except for a few strained hypotheticals, it's hard to see how one could lead a woman to evil by rewarding such qualities. In fact, to cultivate these traits in a girl is to improve her character.

Women too respond to certain qualities among the opposite sex. Qualities that, in a sexually liberated era, lead them to quick, unattached sex with men. But these men are not quite the mirror image of the ideal woman. They are by turn narcissistic, Machiavellian, muscular, aggressive and successful. Some of these qualities can be expressed in a good or neutral way, as well as an evil one. Others, like Machiavellianism, are amoral at best, and evil at worst. Even for those traits that are neutral, it's harder to show them off in a constructive way, so many men will simply opt for destructive bravado. By and large, women simply don't care if these qualities are used for good or evil, only that they are there. If a man is rich, she will not question too closely how he got that way, only that he actually is rich. If it's the fruit of a forbidden tree, Eve doesn't want to know about it. She doesn't want to risk losing it – she just wants to enjoy it.

After being repeatedly lied to about the true nature of women, some might conclude woman is vile for desiring evil men. But that is to punish her for her God-given nature, to castigate the hawk for preying on the dove. The true question comes in how we are to live with our base natures. In a society in deference to the paternal instinct, known as patriarchy, rewards flow to those with virtue, to men with strength and spine, and to women with beauty and devotion.

A society in deference to the female libido is a society where men are reduced to sociopaths and castrati, where the machiavel is the ultimate expression of man. Judging by the decline in crime, emasculation is the more well-trodden route among today's men, with their cycle of video games, pornography and social withdrawal. But when men act out violently, it's important to note the role of the fairer sex, just as our coach was not blameless. The mere presence of women incites men to danger and risk-taking. Men do not act in a vacuum. If men fight merely for a woman's favor, is the woman so innocent and blameless? Perhaps, I'm simply late to the party, and black America has already predicted our future.

"Since I cannot prove a lover… I am determined to prove a villain." (Richard III)

This isn't what most men want. Even among the most callous lotharios I have known, there is a distinct reluctance on their part. They want to treat women well, they want a woman who would reward them for acting admirably. But they have never known women to reward gentility with sex, only celibacy and emasculation. Notice this in the company of the modern West, and you'll be branded a pervert and a loser: "Why do you think you deserve to get laid for doing what you're supposed to do? Creep." But why expect a man to behave when he gets rewarded for acting out? In an evolutionary sense, celibacy is death – and the machiavel chooses life.

The Greek Way

July 4, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

> We think and feel differently because of what a little Greek town did during a century or two, twenty-four hundred years ago. What was then produced of art and of thought has never been surpassed and very rarely equaled, and the stamp of it is upon all the art and all the thought of the Western world.
> None of the great civilization that preceded them and surrounded them served them as a model. With them something completely new came into the world.

Very little ancient Greek art and writing has survived, but what has been found still surpasses so much of what has been created since then. This book attempts to answer why the Greek people were able to achieve such monumental feats of knowledge and production in a relatively short time span, an accomplishment made even more amazing when you consider that they were the first Western thinkers who focused on the ideas of self and freedom. Once their time drew to a close, it took several hundred years for it be resurrected again with the European Renaissance. To put things in perspective, the ancient Greeks existed during the time where it was not known how far west Europe went.

The way we think, reason, and see the world is owed to the ancient Greeks. The DNA of our mentality was born with them, in a seemingly spontaneous explosion of thought the world still values over 2,000 years later. Preceding them was a wretched and miserable human existence, of those who believed in spirits and magic and where knowledge was possessed only by the priestly classes who used it as leverage to retain their power alongside the king.

> A noble, who had for years enjoyed the royal favor and then had lost it, was invited to dine with the [Persian] king. After he had feasted on the meat placed before him, he was presented with a covered basket. Lifting the lid he saw the head and hands and feet of his only son. “Do you know now,” the king asked pleasantly, “the kind of animal you have been eating?” The father had learned the lesson slaves must master, self-control. He answered with perfect composure, “I do know, indeed—and whatever the king is pleased to do pleases > me.” That was the spirit of the East from time immemorial.

Why did the Greeks operate differently? Why did Greek thought happen? The author believes it’s simply because they valued intellect and the mind above all else, shifting their resources to feed that value. What a society most values will define what that society will be like. She goes on to describe the most influential thinkers and creators of the time.

Loading…

This book starts off strong but degrades into blustering analysis that reads more like a graduate thesis (it seemed to be a contest in how difficult she can construct a sentence without saying much). While there were strong sections, I questioned whether or not to continue it after a powerful start that caught my interest. The author spends way too much time on poetry and theater and not enough on philosophical thinkers, war, and the ways of Greek rule and empire.

The strongest chapters are on Xenophon and Thucydides, especially the latter:

> Thucydides wrote his book because he believed that men would profit from a knowledge of what brought about that ruinous struggle precisely as they profit from a statement of what causes a deadly disease. He reasoned that since the nature of the human mind does not change any more than the nature of the human body, circumstances swayed by human nature are bound to repeat themselves, and in the same situation men are bound to act in the same way unless it is shown to them that such a course in other days ended disastrously.
> Power, Thucydides wrote, or its equivalent wealth, created the desire for more power, more wealth. The Athenians and the Spartans fought for one reason only—because they were powerful, and therefore were compelled (the words are Thucydides’ own) to seek more power.

I was eager to read analysis of how ancient Greece left its mark on the West, but I was mostly disappointed. It’s not a bad book, but you have to slog through many pages to get to the occasional gem. I reluctantly recommend this book to those who have a strong interest in ancient Greek, but your time is probably better spent going directly to the source instead of reading the author’s analysis.

> Things were simple in days of old when the single man had no right at all if a common good conflicted, his life taken for any purpose that served the public welfare, his blood sprinkled over the field to make the harvest plentiful. Then a new idea, the most disturbing ever conceived, dawned, that every human being had rights. Men began to question what had been unquestioned since the world began: a father’s authority, a king’s, a slave-holder’s. Perplexity and division came where all had been plain and simple. The individual had made his appearance and nothing was to be plain and simple again.

True Friendship Is About Tough Love

July 5, 2013 | by Raul Felix | Link | Original Link

> "Men kick friendship around like a football, but it doesn't seem to crack. Women treat it like glass and it goes to pieces." -Anne Morrow Lindbergh

My best friends are assholes. Whenever they see an opening to berate me and talk down to me, they not only strike viciously, but effectively. They are well-versed in the guerilla warfare that is shit talk. Innovative, ruthless, and accurate in their ability to destroy my spirit and ego, they stop at nothing to beat me down and bring me back to reality. For this I am blessed.

Anyone can pretend to listen to you and tell you the things you want to hear to make you feel better about your adorable little problems. It's a temporary patch that heals nothing and just strokes your ego. Your best friends are the ones who will rip into you and tell you the truth and what you need to hear. They won't sugar coat it, but there will be plenty of whisky to help out.

You could be moping around, feeling sorry for yourself because Betty Sue won't return your phone calls. You thought she was darn special didn't you? Your friends don't understand the heart break you're going through. She's a fucking unique snow flake and the prettiest of them all. She may be the love of your life. Damn, are you reading that? You see how pathetic you sound? That's bitch talk.

If your friends are true friends, they will listen to your little bitchfest, but probably give you three, four minutes tops until they tell you stop being a pussy. That they didn't know you were on your period and you should probably go to Walmart and get the premium brand of tampons to stop your heavy bleeding. No, in fact, your crimson tide is so heavy that you need to go to Costco and buy in bulk. They thought Betty Sue was a bitch any ways and thus, you shouldn't be grieving for her.

You're being a lazy, fat fuck who is apathetic about his future? You lack the self-awareness to recognize the useless piece of shit you've become? Don't worry, your best friends will let you know how truly worthless you are. They'll let you know that the path you're on is leading you nowhere and that you're wasting your life.

Loading...

Don't even think you gaining those ten extra pounds will go unnoticed. You think your boys are going to pass up the chance to ridicule you for being a lard ass? It will be such exquisite treat for them to mock you as your once mediocre body spirals downward into something resembling a potato sack with arms.

There are two reason they do this. One: it's fun to pick you apart and break you down. Two: they care about you. They want you to toughen up and not let a simple woman have so much control over your emotions. They want you to be successful and live up to your potential as a man. They don't want to see you spinning your wheels forever. They want you to move forward and make something out of yourself.

They're your best friends because you have a deep connection forged by years of shared experiences and tomfoolery. You've grown up together and seen each other at highs and lows. They know what you are and are not capable of. It pisses them off when you're not living up to your true potential, so they do shame you into—hopefully—doing something with your meager existence.

When you do actually start doing something to better yourself, they'll be your biggest fans and supporters. If you start taking writing seriously, they'll read every piece of shit article you write, hoping that you'll eventually write something readable. If you take your musical talents seriously, they'll be at your shows alongside your mom and no one else. When you decide to go back to school, they'll warn you not to major in a worthless degree like they did.

There are a lot of men out there who don't have close friends. If you're lucky enough to have a few key men you can depend on no matter what, you're way above the curve. The tough love they dish out comes with it. You truly need and want men who are honest with you, even brutally so. If not, you may as well be friends with gossipy chicks who will be your best friends to your face and talk shit behind your back.

A Lesson For All Men (Including Atheists) From The Bible

July 5, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

I'm not a big believer in Christianity. Like a lot of things, it has its strengths and weaknesses, but even better you don't need to subscribe to learn from the wisdom it has to offer. Personally, I think most Christians are actually quite poor representatives of their creed – frequently doing their utmost to make their Bible-influenced outlook appear rooted in shame, guilt, outdated traditions and ridiculous superstition.

I suspect the same is true of most other belief systems, hence why I decided to cut to the source and read the major texts of each world faith. The Bible is my second text on this holy crusade, weighing in at a whopping 1,700 pages, and will take me a while yet to get through.

My reading to date has confirmed two things for me. First, if religious folk actually read the Bible we would have a lot more agnostics and atheists in the world (how many "Christians" do you know that constantly prioritize watching the latest stupid reality TV show over finding out what the creator of the universe had to tell them?). Second, after you filter out the wackiness, some things will never stop being good ideas.

As a modest writer myself, I can do nothing but tip my hat to the most popular author of bite-sized social commentary ever. Without further ado, God (from his blog archive "The New International Version", categorized "Esther", 2nd post, starting subheading 10):

> 10 On the seventh day, when King Xerxes was in high spirits from wine, he commanded the seven eunuchs who served him—Mehuman, Biztha, Harbona, Bigtha, Abagtha, Zethar and Carcas-
> 11 to bring before him Queen Vashti, wearing her royal crown, in order to display her beauty to the people and nobles, for she was lovely to look at.
> 12 But when the attendants delivered the king's command, Queen Vashti refused to come. Then the king became furious and burned with anger.
> 13 Since it was customary for the king to consult experts in matters of law and justice, he spoke with the wise men who understood the times
> 14 and were closest to the king-Carshena, Shethar, Admatha, Tarshish, Meres, Marsena and Memucan, the seven nobles of Persia and Media who had special access to the king and were highest in the kingdom.
> 15 "According to law, what must be done to Queen Vashti?" he asked. "She has not obeyed the command of King Xerxes that the eunuchs have taken to her."
>
> Loading…
> 16 Then Memucan replied in the presence of the king and the nobles, "Queen Vashti has done wrong, not only against the king but also against all the nobles > and the peoples of all the provinces of King Xerxes.

> 17 For the queen's conduct will become known to all the women, and so they will despise their husbands and say, 'King Xerxes commanded Queen Vashti to be brought before him, but she would not come.'
> 18 This very day the Persian and Median women of the nobility who have heard about the queen's conduct will respond to all the king's nobles in the same way. There will be no end of disrespect and discord.
> 19 "Therefore, if it pleases the king, let him issue a royal decree and let it be written in the laws of Persia and Media, which cannot be repealed, that Vashti is never again to enter the presence of King Xerxes. Also let the king give her royal position to someone else who is better than she.
> 20 Then when the king's edict is proclaimed throughout all his vast realm, all the women will respect their husbands, from the least to the greatest."
> 21 The king and his nobles were pleased with this advice, so the king did as Memucan proposed.
> 22 He sent dispatches to all parts of the kingdom, to each province in its own script and to each people in its own language, proclaiming in each people's tongue that every man should be ruler over his own household.

Sound familiar? There's nothing new about seeking advice from "the wise men who understood the times" or setting strong boundaries and not tolerating disrespect. It worked thousands of years ago and it works now. The medium may change but the message does not.

I highly recommend downloading a full translation of The Bible and reading it yourself if you haven't (it's not hard to find a free copy). At the very least it will give you fodder to tear apart the next poorly read "Christian" or "modern marriage"-advocating feminist you get stuck next to at a dinner party.

How I Had My First Threesome

July 5, 2013 | by AlphaX | Link | Original Link

After my divorce, I spent several years reading, studying and trying everything I could on seduction and human behavior. I went out of my way to experiment and put myself in some very awkward situations just to see how the interaction played out. Luckily, outside of a lot of embarrassment for me, nothing really bad ever happened. But what I learned, those tools of communication and the irrational confidence I obtained, can never be valued. They are worth more than gold to me.

At one point, when my sex life was on autopilot with a small harem of partners to play with, I decided I wanted to have a threesome. I was 34 years old, and still had many limiting beliefs that prevented me from seeing just how easy it really is. I also didn't have the confidence level I have today.

At the time I was scared to broach the subject with the girls I did date. So I started thinking about the easiest way to engineer a situation to have a threesome happen. Outside of confidence, my favorite tools were social dynamics and preselection. If you are with a hot girl, it is very easy to meet other hot girls in a social setting. After a lot of thought and planning, this is what I did.

I booked a room at the Howard Johnson's on A1A Beach Front Avenue in Daytona Beach, Florida for a long weekend. I wanted to make sure I was nowhere close to my home turf in case this backfired on me. I arrived on a Thursday afternoon, and spent that evening scoping the beach and the local bar scene. HoJo had a little bar in it, but not conductive to what I wanted for the social experiment. I did find a more trendy night club about 6 blocks from my hotel. I was early, and didn't have to wait in line very long when I arrived.

My first step was to meet as much of the bar staff as possible. In line I talked with the bouncer about football. A blown knee cost him his shot, and I let him tell me all his stories. After I went inside, I brought him a coke (spiked with Jack – they aren't supposed to drink at work) just to say thanks. Thanks for what? I don't know, just felt like a way to cement our interaction.

I then met the bartenders, waiters, waitresses and the managers. My story was "I was a young entrepreneur who just needed to get away and clear my head. I had traveled alone, and just needed some downtime from my busy life," which was all true without the rest of my motivation. I didn't try to pick up anyone in the club, though I did tease, flirt and create a little sexual tension. Just enough to be seen as that "cool guy from last night". I went back to the hotel around 1 AM.

The next morning I ran by the store and got vodka, mixers and snacks, then I hit the beach. It was around 11 AM, and not very crowded, though it was July so the college crowd was home. First very attractive girl I saw I approached. She was laying out tanning.

Me: “Hi, are you from around her?”

Her: “Yes… why?” Said somewhat leery.

Me: “I just had to get away from work so I flew here yesterday. I don’t really know the area, are there any good places to hang out at?”

From this started a 30 minute conversation. We started on the topics of great restaurants and clubs, but drifted to her major, family, friends, etc. I maintained a confident composer and used cocky & funny to challenge her and create a little attraction. I ran my normal game amping the sexual tension where I could, and pulling back during the lulls. As we wrapped up our conversation I started to turn and leave. Almost like an afterthought I turned back around and said, “Tonight at 8, I am going to be at Joe’s in the HoJo before I start my evening. Meet me there and have a drink with me.” I didn’t ask, I told, as is my nature.

She told me “maybe” and started to ask for my number. I told her “No, I didn’t want her number. If she wanted to meet up and have a drink, wonderful, but I was not giving her my number, texting, calling or any of that. She could meet me, or not. Her choice with no pressure.”

Those of you skilled at game will see that I gave her a pattern interrupt, a slight neg, then left with an open loop. I needed her to be thinking about this interaction all day. I wanted to be seen with some mystery so she would be curious about me and what the evening might hold.

Now here is the real ballsy part… I did this with three more women. I invited them all to meet me at Joe’s Bar at the exact same time – 8 PM.

[image]

At 8 PM I am dressed and in the little bar sipping a scotch. I was more than a little nervous, but I had a plan and was willing to see this through. A few minutes after 8 I started to get worried no one would show, however those thoughts were short lived. The first girl arrived about 15 minutes late. She was a tight, slender blond with very long hair. She wore a very form fitting black dress with electric pink lipstick. It was obvious she decided to present herself in the best possible light, and I have no doubt this was done for the purpose of extracting a fun, yet free, evening from me.

I am typically against buying a drink for a woman I just met, but in this case, it was part of my plan. As she approached I smiled and waved. She joined me, and I asked her what she wanted to drink. Up to the bar, order the drink, and return. A few minutes later the second blond arrives. She is also very slender with medium length hair, and like the first, she was dressed to go clubbing. I wave her over, and it is obvious both girls are very confused. Now, I have studied human interaction for a while and people behave in predictable patterns as a general rule. When two people meet in most situations, they try to establish some commonality and rapport between themselves. My goal was to facilitate this interaction.

As she arrived at our table I introduce both girls. I ask girl 2 what she wants to drink, and then leave her with girl 1 to chit-chat as I get her drink. Shortly thereafter, girl 3 arrives. Holy shit, I couldn't believe it! I invited 4 girls because I figured a 50% no show rate. Girl 3 is a tall brunette who is not as slender as the other two, but made up for it with gorgeous eyes and large, firm breast. Same routine with her – introduce her to the other girls and go get her a drink. The whole idea of going to the bar and getting a drink is to allow the girls to talk and develop rapport without me being there or interfering. It also allowed them to subtly find out how each knew me.

When I arrive with girl number 3′s drink, girl number 4 showed up. She is a short Latino with jet black hair and the sexiest eyes. I can see that girl 1 and 2 are still confused, but still smiling a bit. Girl 3 is pissed. I bring over girl 4, introduce them all and go to get her a drink. When I return with girl 4′s drink, girl 3 lays into me with all the wrath of a woman scorned and knocked off her game.

She is accusing me of inviting all of them on a "date" and how I am a complete ass. I act completely indignant. "What? I didn't invite any of you on dates. I wouldn't take any of your numbers, I just wanted to go out and party, and I enjoy meeting cool people… did you…?" And just go into teasing them like I couldn't believe they would even think we would be on a date that evening. The mood lightens up a little. I let the conversation run where it will as I get everyone round 2 of drinks with shots. The girls all test me with little comments designed to throw me off my game and determine my confidence. I pass them all, but inside I am freaking out. I wanted to get two girls to bond through the night, change the social dynamics, and automatically create a situation where I was preselected. What the hell was I going to do with four girls?

After drink round number three, it is approaching 10 PM and I suggest we head to the bar. As we are walking I am teasing them all about being my "dates", and how they had better keep the other girls off of me. I have an arm around two of them, though it is more of a joking type interaction, and I am using high energy with a lot of cocky humor to keep the dynamics in "role play" mode. When we arrive to the club the line is already forming. I walk to the front and say high to the bouncer… he greets me like an old buddy, as I introduce my "dates". We bypass the line and as he lets us in I ask if he is parched, and bring him another Jack & Coke shortly thereafter.

As we are looking for a table in the club I see the manager from the night before, and I also introduce all of my "dates" to him. I can tell he is a bit thrown, but he goes beyond what I had hoped for and VIP's us. One of the girls ask when we met me and he tells her "just last night". I think that one comment helped solidify my charismatic persona since so many people remembered me and liked me from only the night before.

[image]

Now a funny thing happens when you walk into a club with four attractive women… people notice. And the hottest club girls want to know just who the hell I am. Every time I leave the table, I am approached. The waitresses are flirting with me and I am flirting back. As the evening progresses, the four girls I came with begin to act jealous and start to act bitchy of other women who came around. As a group they begin to cockblock the other girls. This is the pinnacle of power that I have ever felt with preselection and social dynamics as a tool for a seduction. Never again have I felt it so intensely and the lessons are seared into my being now.

The night progresses with shots, small talk and dancing. I am touching where appropriate, and as we all get drunk on the dance floor I kiss girl 3. I then look at girl 1, kiss her, while pulling in girl 3 and switching so they kiss. It was brief, but most girls have kissed another girl, so it wasn't awkward.

Near the end of the night, I inform the girls I have some refreshments back at my hotel. They are all parked there anyway (another one of my logistical plans). As we walk back we are all feeling the effects of the spirits and we are all having a good time.

Back in my room, I poor everyone a drink and break open the cut fruit, cheese and crackers I had. I could feel the sexual tension in the air. I had thought about trying to get them to go skinny dipping (plausible deniability as to how we got naked), but I really didn't want my junk floating in the ocean like a lure. For me it is "buck up or shut up time." I informed them I was very hot and sweaty from the club, I was going to take a shower and they could join me if they like. I proceed to strip naked in front of them rather slowly, and I made sure to have eye contact with all of them.

Girl 1 joined me in the shower in short order. Followed by the 3 other girls in a few minutes. They were all giggling and relishing the taboo excitement of the shower. Hotel showers are not very big, and it was a complete cluster as we tried to wash each other. First it starts with washing, then sensual touches, then slight kisses. I wish we could have done more, but the shower was too small.

After a few minutes, we stumble out of the shower and head to the bed. I am completely drunk on liquor and power, and begin letting my dominate side take over. I lay on the bed with girl 1, letting the rest watch. After a moments I pull in girl 3. Shortly the other two girls joined. Then I really became dominant—pulling hair, spanking, choking and telling them exactly what I want them to do. Up to that point in my life, it was the best moment I had ever experienced.

The next morning, the girls left as they awoke. I never saw them again.

To round out this story, I really like threesomes. If you have the balls and social skills you can pull a night like this off as well, and I did a few more times. However, there is a much easier way. Now, when I first meet a girl that I find attractive, my opener (or first question) is "Are you bisexual?" It is a serious question, a qualifier, a pattern interrupt and damn fun. 30% of the women I ask, say "yes" or they have some experience. 20% say "no" but they have wanted to try it. These days, it's not a pick up line – these days if you're not bi-sexual you are disqualified.

The next time you meet a girl, simply ask her "Are you bisexual" and make sure to maintain a calm, yet confident, frame. When you say this, look into her eyes, and you will see the spark of attraction, regardless of her orientation. If you date a bisexual girl, you will have a very easy time of having threesomes.

What Is The Worst That Could Happen?

July 5, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

The number one thing any man can do to skyrocket his success with women is to just start talking to them more. Just saying hi will put you ahead of 99% of guys. Hell, even making small talk with cashiers, waitresses, cab drivers, etc. will help your game. Most people are glued to their cellphones, genuinely terrified of basic social interaction outside of their social circle. I could count the number of times I've seen a "day approach" on one hand and the amount of times I've seen approach at night hasn't even hit triple digits yet.

A thread titled "A glimpse of 1987 America" stirred up a lot of discussion a while back. A lot of people couldn't believe how friendly the people were, how they weren't terrified of one another, how they weren't glued to their smart phones. I'm not saying that is how everything was back then, but when is the last time you've seen something like that during the day? What about at night? Facebook has replaced the intended function of bars/clubs. Rarely do people go there and try to meet other people or just be social with everyone around them.

I was at a bar a little while ago on a trip with some friends eating a late dinner while discussing girls and dating. They're moderately blue pill and I was pushing them to go approach some girls, or in the very least help me approach one of the many groups of girls at the venue. Then I saw the most cringe worthy approach I've seen in recent times. A group of 5 guys walked past, visibly drunk, and pointed out a table of very beautiful women. I can only assume these guys were a bachelor party and what they were about to do was a dare because they were dressed like total idiots: golf visor with frosted tipped hair sticking out the top, ill-fitting cargo shorts and a faded polo. These guys screamed "beta".

They surrounded the table of hot twentysomethings that 99% of males would be scared to talk to and start obnoxiously singing "She's lost that lovin feelin." I grab the popcorn and wait for the hilarity to unfold. Nothing happens. The girls sit there awkwardly looking at one another. About halfway through the song once they realize whats going on they start opening up and laughing. After they finish, all 5 of these guys sit down at the girls' table and talk to them for at least 30 minutes.

Only then did I realize that you have to fuck up horrifically bad or even provoke her for a girl to harshly reject you. The worst rejection I've ever had was going up to these two very hot 19 year olds and having them just look at me without saying anything until I left a few seconds after. Most women are like most men: timid, scared, and lacking confidence. Yes, women gain more confidence in a group, under the influence of alcohol and with catty friends, but most women don't have the balls to call someone out for being "creepy" or "awkward" they just wait until you're gone until they do so.

I had this one girl I saw for the better half of last year, she'd have to bus for over an hour to come see me. Her bus route was through the bad part of town where all the crackheads and mentally ill reside so she always had some good stories. More than once she would tell me about some cracked out old dude sitting next to her who was saying the most bizarre shit. She once had a guy with 3 teeth propose to her and she had another guy offer her drugs. What did she do about them? She got off the bus on the next stop or just sat somewhere else, that's it.

If I ever get that feeling of approach anxiety I know its time to just start talking because the only other guys approaching out there are crackheads, senior citizens, and homeless people. Even if you're the most boring dude with no game you'll be a breath of fresh air to a woman who regularly has to deal with guys who profess their undying love, offer drugs or even sing songs from old movies. What's the worst that could happen?

Lessons From The Life Of Casanova

July 7, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Giovanni Jacopo Casanova (1725-1798) tacked on the spurious title "de Seingalt" to his name as a way of impressing the people he was attempting to manipulate. By all accounts, he must rank as one of the most interesting men of the eighteenth century. Born in Venice to two itinerant actors in 1725, he claimed to have received a doctorate in law at the University of Padua at the age of sixteen. Scanning through his multi-volume Memoirs, we must remind ourselves that Casanova is one of those raconteurs who, despite his irrepressible, self-effacing candor, often allows his imagination to overwhelm his mastery of the facts. With Casanova, one is never quite certain where reality ends and imagination begins. Perhaps this was one of the secrets of his longevity and–it must be said–his genius.

His first conquest, a pretty girl of thirteen named Bettina, fell ill of smallpox; Casanova claims to have nursed her and caught the disease himself. He later met her years later, poor and in ill health, and she supposedly "died lovingly in his arms". He portrays all his amours as having loved him fiercely until their very deaths.

Poor, ambitious, and handsome, Casanova was one of those people who always seemed to be at the right place at the right time. He saved the Venetian senator Zuan Bragadino from a fall down a staircase in 1746 and thereafter enjoyed a measure of political protection for his shady activities, for which he was already acquiring a reputation. Under his tutelage, Casanova visited France, Germany, and Austria, hawking a peculiar blend of esoteric knowledge, medical cures, and occult magic.

His language skills and innate charm enabled him to float among clerics, socialites, royalty, and wealthy businessmen. Sentenced to prison for five years in Venice for teaching occult wisdom and disturbing the peace, he escaped after fifteen months (1757). He was able to attach himself to wealthy women by peddling the healing and magical arts, and added significantly to his income by cheating at cards and other games of chance.

Throughout his travels around Europe, he accumulated numerous mistresses and sired progeny here and there as opportunity would have it. His seductive self-assurance, wit, alleged “occult” knowledge, and unusual ability to win at casino games, earned him access to the highest social circles in the countries he visited, but sooner or later he always found himself either in jail or escorted to the frontier. Like all great seducers, he was possessed of a powerful intellect, which he was able to deploy on his targets when needed. And he had the daring and flair that comes from a man who has nothing to lose. He claimed even to have met and debated philosophy and religion with Voltaire, the great intellect of the age. If we are to believe his account of the debate with Voltaire (and it makes entertaining reading), Casanova even came out ahead in the exchange. He fought duels with angry rivals now and then, but according to him, of course, he always won.

After various adventures and assorted sexual conquests too numerous here to recount, he eventually discovered that his ruses, wit, and sleight-of-hand had reached the point of diminishing returns. He eventually accepted a position as a librarian at a castle in Bohemia, which was crushingly boring but at least stable and secure. There he spent the last fourteen years of his life in dreary book-lined drudgery, writing his Memoirs ten to twelve hours per day as a way of relieving the solitude of his existence. He claims absolute honesty in his narrative, and much of it actually agrees with history; but much of it also has no corroboration elsewhere.

Right up until the very end, Casanova retained a bit of his old panache. He claims to have been deeply religious, and this appears to be the case; but it is difficult to know how much of this was protective coloration in a religious age, or how much was sincere devotion.

Loading...

In surveying his career, can we say there is a coherent system of philosophy here? What are we to conclude from the life of this unique character? Should he be viewed as a cautionary tale, or as a hero? The reader will have to form his own conclusions. But let us summarize a bit of the ethos by which Casanova lived his life. The following points (consciously or unconsciously) are the undercurrents of his life, and seem to have formed the basics of his code of conduct:

A detached, ironic view of life is the best refuge.

Casanova likes to pretend that the hardships he endured (poor background, lack of family and permanent love) did not touch his emotions. He suppresses his feelings, and takes refuge in witty comments and philosophical statements. Not sure whether to believe in God or not? Then just employ Pascal's Wager, and all will be well, Casanova suggests. (Pascal's Wager, named after the French philosopher Blaise Pascal, is a name given to a sort of "cost-benefit" argument used to justify belief in God. Very basically, it says that since we will never know whether God exists or not, it makes more sense to believe in the existence of a Deity, since the benefits of belief outweigh the disadvantages of belief).

Crime may not pay; but then again, normal life is an existential straight-jacket.

Casanova never apologizes for any of his frauds, schemes, and trickery he did in his life. He definitely gives the impression that, although he regrets how he ended up, his personality would not have let things turn out any other way. Normal life was a soul-destroying charade anyway, he apparently believed, so a little fraud now and then would never hurt anyone.

Character determines fate.

This idea goes back as far as the Greek tragedians. Casanova knows that he could not escape his true nature, no matter how hard he tried. He appears to have discovered things about himself he would rather not have known at certain times in his life, and this knowledge sent him further down the path where he ended up. Basically, he had a stoic fatalism that suggested the wheels of Fate grind on regardless of a man's plans or needs. He ended up as he did because his character made it inevitable.

Fun counts for something.

Regardless how he ended up, Casanova packed several lifetimes of adventure into his years on this earth. He knows this very well, and always slyly suggests that it was all worth it. While he never advocated unrestrained debauchery, there is little doubt that he structured his life around the pursuit of sensual delights.

Alienation is inescapable.

Casanova takes delight in relating how he outwitted the wealthy aristocrats he came into contact with. He, from a poor background, could not help but notice how alienated and separated he was from the people he mixed with. No matter how hard he tried to integrate himself into proper society, it never worked. Casanova was the consummate outsider, condemned to live his existence on the margins. He was arguably the first red-pill ingester. And he knew it.

All in all, Casanova remains a figure of controversy. For how he ended up (unhappy and alone in a castle), one may ask: Was it all worth it? Did all the trickery, womanizing, and gamesmanship leave him better off than he would otherwise have been? I will let readers draw their own judgments. I have no doubt that he would have said yes. And it is difficult to disagree with him. One suspects that the Greeks really were right after all: perhaps, when all is said and done, character really does determine fate.

America’s Sexual Hierarchy Favors Alpha Males More Than Ever

July 7, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

America is a society that is drenched in narcissism. As such, American sexuality is very much influenced by this self-absorption. However, it is also a society that caters to women – it is society that is centered around female interests & desires. What often gets confused as male privilege is the fact that women are supremely interested in alpha males. Feminists would characterize this interest of women in alphas as male privilege, but what really is going on is that women are sexually attracted to alphas, so, clearly, those males will get great levels of exposure in society and media.

You see this in feminist circles with bitter fights over beauty standards, careers and relationships between men and women. Lesbian feminists could care less about heterosexual women getting the men they desire – they don’t want to be judged for being ugly and unfeminine. They try to pretend they care about gendered oppression of beauty standards, but they really just want to change those standards for their own homosexual benefit. The fight between these camps is narcissistic and grounded in their own sexuality. Lesbians get the benefit of ignoring male sexuality; heterosexual women cannot ignore male sexuality if they wish to have an actual sex life outside the confines of their own imagination.

The sexual hierarchy in America is this:

Alphas > Women > Betas > Omegas

For the purposes of this expose, alphas refer to men women find sexually attractive, betas are men women consider settling material and omegas are men that never get laid.

Alphas don’t have to be narcissists, but they do have some of those qualities because of being so privileged by female sexual adoration. When a person is subject to so much positive attention, it stands to reason narcissism can develop. Often times, though, narcissism doesn’t develop. What often develops is an abundance mentality that results in a more indifferent approach to women. The narcissism of women, however, radically alters the sexual hierarchy.

Women seek equality with alphas by trying to become alphas themselves. They want to have their money turn men on, they want their snark and independence make alphas salivate to for them. They want to work beside them in high status professions – think Boston Legal and Grey's Anatomy. They want crowds of fans rocking out to their live music. They want adoring alphas wearing their sports jerseys and come to their games and cheer when hit the trey.

A problem of the first order is the approval they get from beta/omega males and females. Women appreciate female approval on a superficial level, but they know it is often fake and is so ubiquitous that it is boring and expected. As for betas, let's set them aside as they are post-carousel material. Omegas are repulsive not just sexually but are a reflection of dark days for women. Most modern women has thrown herself at some retreating alpha, offering up her body as a salve to a failing relationship. Deep down, they know they spend way too many resources – emotional, financial & temporal – trying to keep said man around.

This is applicable to omegas because the rank desperation reminds them how unattainable alphas often are for them – omegas sometimes are a reflection of a woman's position vis-a-vis alphas. Further, they remind women of the lengths they would go for alpha approval by the lengths omegas will go to secure female approval.

The other problem is the fact that alphas are not sexually turned on by provisioning ability, confidence or social status. Women are often bitter and disappointed because alphas don't care about that. Women have been falsely told that everything they have gained since second-wave feminism have made them more attractive to men. It hasn't. The realization often makes women justifiably bitter. Women haven't become alphas, they have become the betas they settle for.

Loading...

The other issue is that if women get what they claim to want and get this approval from alphas, they often lose attraction to the alpha. Imagine some alpha husband wearing WNBA player's jersey to her games regularly– where do you think the arc of that relationship is headed? Sure, it is possible he has that much hand, but it isn't probable.

Let's talk about sexual marketplace value as it relates age and weight. The pool of alphas is fairly steady. The marriageable ones and the one's that will marry will dwindle quickly. Women at 35 are likely to find a 50 year old divorced alpha with no desire to father more children. Which brings in age; women are often forced to consider beta males as mates as they age. Which brings in betas.

When confronted with the reality that they have the mentality of a beta male or an omega coupled with their increasing inability to have sex with lesser alphas, a woman has a serious identity crisis. You get later in life lesbians, single mothers, women flying to Haiti for sexual adventurism. Think a "Stella Got Her Groove" back situation. The carousel riding ends here. What begins is long process of female self-delusion that very much tracks a female compensatory narcissist/male codependent relationship.

Women need serious levels of social support and self delusion to make a beta palatable. Some women are direct about their lack of love for their man, however that is usually after the valuation period. Facebook, Instagram and other forms of social media seriously aid women as she can publicly claim her beta is different and is a real man because he cuddles with her and confesses his deepest fears to the her. What he doesn't know is he is setting up a codependent/compensatory narcissist relationship with the woman. As such, the storm clouds gather.

The woman will sleep with the beta, romance him and make him feel loved. She acting out the beginning of relationships with alphas. The marriage engagement is a huge candy bar for her hamster to gnaw on while the her blood is starting to boil. It starts to come out during the engagement with anger about the wedding plans, with the beta comforting her and reassuring her that he loves her. She knows that that's why she is marrying you – she can control you knowing you need her more than she needs you – she knows you will always be there to assuage her ego. The wedding will be a calm before the storm once the honeymoon ends. The beta will think the wedding stress was the cause of the relationship issues.

The marriage will go downhill quickly. Sex will dry up and she will become increasingly critical. She will demand declarations of love and worship. She will begin to only treat him well in public and being to treat him poorly in private. She will often use sex as a weapon and sometimes physically abuse him. Unable to comprehend the problem is his lack of alpha, he will blame himself, beating himself up for not being supportive enough, not listening to her, etc. The gap between her own perception of her attractiveness to alphas and her attractiveness to alphas in reality will fuel how badly she will treat her beta.

Look at that the website Askmen.com – it is one massive beta indoctrination program. Women need to know men are reading that, in the vain hope alphas will become more beta and betas stay beta so they have a class of men to settle for.

This utilitarian approach women take to men have biological roots, but understand it is exacerbated by American psychology. Alphas have serious privilege and women resent it. The sexual revolution for them has been a large negative. A huge plus in college and right after, but women quickly realize it is bad that society does not force alphas and greater betas into marriage. Notice the constant preening rhetoric of how important the social gains are for women.

Yay careers! Yay not having to get married! My fancy degree means more than a man! Men are scared of my accomplishments! Ugh, I am so AWESOME!

So, uh, where are the hot boys?

This is little more than the self-absorbed preening in order to convince themselves that this whole scheme has been a net positive for them. It hasn't. As usual, alphas benefit supremely.

What Do You Bring To The Table?

July 8, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

We here in the manosphere are very quick to call girls out for maintaining outsized standards. From fat girls demanding fit men with six packs to 5’2” females turning down every male south of 6’0”, we have little patience for females shooting beyond their level. We don’t do this to be “misogynistic”—we do it because we believe each partner has an obligation to work to maintain attraction in the other if they want a relationship to continue (or to even begin).

In understanding this, however, we come to understand the crux of why sites like this exist and why male self-improvement is important. At their core, sites like ROK are designed to allow men to be better equipped to do work of their own. RooshV Forum and ROK are places where we can all share means and methods on how to do that work best, with advice tailored to age group, place of residence, environment, etc. This is done because it is essential for any male concerned with his romantic life to look critically at himself and mercilessly attack the flaws that he finds. It is only through this that process that men can be kept away from the entitlement we so often criticize in some of our female peers.

Men can begin this process by asking themselves a simple question: what do you bring to the table?

This question is in reference to the work you’ve done yourself. How well groomed are you? How engaging are you in conversation? Are you funny, witty, and confident enough when engaging the women you want? Do you dress well enough to catch their eye? Are you physically fit enough to catch their eye?

Loading…

The entitlement I've spent much time criticizing here and elsewhere in the manosphere is not entirely limited to women. I understand this because I once exhibited it myself. Young men, unaware of the realities of female attraction and unaware of how sexual repulsive many of their youthful, "beta" habits are, often express utter confusion at their lack of success with the opposite sex. Too often this confusion grows into anger and bitterness, vitriol expressed absent the necessary internal examinations necessary to build real self-improvement and success. It took me years to overcome this entitlement and begin acknowledging my faults as opposed to merely getting angry at women for not accepting them. Only then could I begin to improve and find some relief for my youthful sexual frustration.

This is a common narrative. Many young men demand dimes and find themselves in this corner of the internet lamenting their inability to attract them. The reality, however, is that these women are not obligated to be attracted to them. If you as a male are unable give an objectively favorable answer to all (or at least most) of those questions above regarding wit, confidence, conversational ability, and so on, then fine females won't be coming around your way too often, if at all.

Pretty girls have options, and this is truer here in the USA than almost anywhere else. As is the case in all humans, incentives drive their behavior. If you're not appealing enough to give them incentive to choose you to the exclusion of their many other options while subsequently keeping said girls as your only option, then you've got a problem.

Too many young men are unsure if girls think they are good enough or not. This crisis of confidence and insecurity often leads to bitterness or poorly executed negs thrown at female suitors, efforts that all too often leave entirely the wrong impression.

The mission for a young male concerned with improvement is really quite simple. Look at yourself. Find your strengths and find your faults. Adjust accordingly by playing to your strengths and shoring up your weaknesses via discourse on ROK, RVF, and similar spaces in the manosphere. Never cease to take stock of what you bring to the table, and always seek to bring more if you can. Those who are willing to endure this challenging process will see much greater romantic rewards in the future.

The Dangers of Bro Science

July 8, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Thanks to the internet, the science of bro has started to shoot its way into skinny virgins bookmarks on Google Chrome everywhere throughout the nation. While the general concept is good, and some of the statements are coincidentally factual, there are a lot of dangers out there as well.

As far as the good, the basics come down to common knowledge being displayed in plain English. Basic exercise routines being readily available for free. And there are reviews on almost anything related to being a bro out there.

As far as the bad, well there's many more.

Bad workout advice

This is pretty much self explanatory. With the surge of internet usage and the ability to get followers for doing practically nothing, there has accidentally been a channel created to allow people who know absolutely nothing about fitness to preach to others about fitness. On top of the terrible advice comes the contradictory information. While anyone who is experienced in fitness can easily tell the bullshit from the facts, it makes it damn near impossible for any new person. What's even worse for the new people is the impossibility to distinguish the credible from the morons which in the end leaves a whole generation of fuck ups on display (like the guy below).

Pointless nutrition advice

Loading...
If you haven't already, then I suggest you watch the pre-workout video above. Yes it's 3 minutes but it'll both make you laugh and point out the entire flaws with nutrition. That flaw is the fact that no one has any clue what the hell they are talking about. I'll be honest, I can give you my nutritional advice but my metabolism is going to be different than yours. So while some people paleo works great, others don't need it, same with 2 meals versus 8 meals.

It's not a definitive science

The beauty of bro-science is that it's science in the making. Men experiment with themselves and then tell others what has worked and what hasn't. The problem is that what works for one man will not necessarily work for another. While this general concept is great, many men will get frustrated with the fact that bro-science isn't a definitive science like the kind taught in school, and therefore it's lack of foundation hints at a lack of credibility.

Is it even worthwhile?

Despite several large flaws, bro-science is still something that should garner respect, especially as an offshoot of the manosphere. While perfection may not be a definitive quality of bro-science yet, the discoveries for men are just and useful. The key is to take anything from bro-science with a grain of salt. The knowledge present is enough to boost your quality of physical fitness to an extreme rather quickly, but if you're not careful you can wreck it just as quickly. Think of it as an apprenticeship rather than college. If you find a decent teacher, you'll be good.

We Are The Most Sexist Website On The Internet

July 8, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Our hard work has finally paid off. Totally Dublin, a second-rate culture blog for the city of Dublin, Ireland, wonders if we are the most sexist site on the whole internet…

> An even more disheartening (because you can't even blame it on the WKD-induced brain mush and null emotional maturity of college students) website is very much active and depressingly serious Return Of Kings (includes the extremely popular articles "How To Be With Four Women At The Same Time (Because One Is Never Enough)" and the equally grim 'You-Go-Girlism Is More Toxic Than Feminism: The Insidious Effects Of Irresponsible Female Ego-Boosting").

We only get a small mention in the mostly incoherent article written by Laura Gozzi, but I think I speak for the writers here when I say we appreciate the fact that we are being recognized for our slavish efforts to bring masculine truth to the ignorant masses. I hope that in 10 or 20 years the content we are publishing today will be seen as "common sense" or "obvious" to the next generation, though I'm not holding my breath.

There is only thing left to ask you, dear reader: WYB Laura Gozzi?

Five Daytime Approaches

July 8, 2013 | by Black Knight | Link | Original Link

I got into day game a year ago after reading Roosh's Day Bang. Though I am an introvert by nature, I was intrigued by the prospect of meeting high quality girls without having to deal with the ubiquitous nuclear bitch shields I'd encountered at bars and clubs. From approach number one, I kept a journal to help me reflect and improve with each interaction. I've been on a day game kick lately, so here are five excerpts from my journal that demonstrate the range of outcomes that will happen:

Approach #1

I had just finished reading Day Bang and began forcing myself into more day approach situations. I was getting coffee at a Starbucks when a slender, ethnic-looking girl walked in behind me. The blood rushed to my face as I lamely asked her whether the coffee mugs on display were any good. She mentioned something about putting soup in them, and I began staccato-like 2 minute ramble on the subject of soup. I was sure I'd blown it with such a dumb monologue but, to my astonishment, she began asking me questions about what I did and where I lived. She said she was in the area for her therapist appointment, but "I'm not crazy." Lozzlozlzol. I asked for her number and she said she had a boyfriend.

Pros: Got approach #1 out of the way. Rambled on a bit about stupid, non-threatening things. Dropped elements of GALNUC routine in the book (got name, asked where she usually hung out). Got her asking questions during silences.

Cons: Mind went blank several times and probably started sweating. Used goofy subject matter. Probably smiled too much

Approach #2

I'd seen this girl before reading books at the coffee shop next door and generally looking pretty bored. Opener: "Do you have to reserve this seat ahead of time or is it always open?" We talked for a bit and she was polite but seemed uninterested in anything I had to say. She mentioned her job, so I asked about it but she did not return any questions. She said she didn't get out much, so I offered to grab a drink with her and show her some places. She said she had a boyfriend and I told her they should come out with my friends sometime and got her number.

Pros: None

Cons: None

Approach #3

Saw her at a coffee shop while I was waiting for my drink. She was alone at a 4-person table, and made eye contact with me while she was looking around. I caught her doing it again two minutes later. I set up at a table about 15 feet away, with a clear sight line but not directly in front of her. After 10 minutes or so I walked up and delivered my opener: “Excuse me, you look absorbed in this book. What’s the topic?” She talked about reading books for grad school and seemed receptive to conversation, asked me to sit down very quickly. She asked about my job, and we had a lengthy conversation. It was 70-30 split of questions-rambling on my end, but rapport seemed good. I ran part of Roosh’s GALNUC routine and got her number to get a drink sometime. She seemed genuinely interested and I got her to laugh a couple times. We ended up going on a couple of dates.

Pros: Identified initial interest and capitalized on it. Left afterwards, didn’t hang around weirdly.

Cons: Probably should have ended it earlier. Still asked more questions than I should have, didn’t ramble enough. Too much “interview.”

Approach #4

Saw a strikingly beautiful girl walk into the coffee shop. My heart started beating immediately so I knew I had to approach. She looked around for a place to sit and settled near the back. I walked up to her and asked her about her computer, rambled a bit about needing a new one but did not continue long enough before asking her questions. I was more nervous than usual. She said she had just moved to town for art school and she hadn’t found much to do. I eventually asked for her number. Her exact words: “I’m not really in a position where I want to be giving out my number right now.” I told her it was nice meeting her and headed out.

Pros: Approached a very cute girl despite anxiety.

Cons: Didn’t ramble enough. Talked about “get your number” rather than “show you around” or something more innocuous. Need to develop better rambles

Approach #5

Noticed her from across the coffee shop but the seating arrangement was sub-optimal, with her at small table at the wall and me on the opposite side of the store with no space to sit down. She was using a laptop but appeared to be glancing up once in a while, not completely engrossed in what she was doing. I waited for someone to leave and then snaked a seat two tables away.

I asked how she liked her laptop and rambled a bit more than usual about wanting to get something I could travel with, talked about how iPad was good but a tool for consumption and not production, etc. She was very receptive and started asking me questions about what I was doing there, where I went to school, etc. We talked for a few minutes, and I told her I had to get going but said we should get a drink sometime and asked for her number. She asked for my Facebook and I told her I didn’t have one. She gave me her number and we exchanged a few texts later that night. We ended up dating for a while.

Pros: Approached a very attractive girl with sub-optimal logistics. Rambled longer than usual to create more comfort, which had been a problem in past approaches. Did not cave into beta-bait Facebook request.

Cons: None.

These five approaches amounted to several pleasant conversations, two promising numbers, and one quasi-relationship. All it took to be in these situations was drinking coffee and reading my book, which I would have been doing otherwise. They also illustrate the contrast between day and night approaches; the conversations were all pleasant, and the worst daytime blowout I received was when a girl made a lame excuse for not giving out her number. If you're not talking to women during the day, make it a habit.

Alpha Is Anything

July 9, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

When most men think of an “alpha male,” they think of some tall, young, and cool man who’s got impeccable style and class. They think of this:

But the above is merely just one expression of how an alpha male acts. Most guys see an example of an alpha male and try to emulate it. They see the tough jacked dude or suave looking guy in a suit and decide they can fit that mold too. But they are getting confused. They see the passive game, such as looks or money, and think that’s all there is to it, when in fact it's the active game which is responsible for getting the pull. Most men fail to understand the relativity of game — just because one type of game works for one man, does not mean it will work for another. Tight game is relative to each man. So while being a gentleman may work for some guys, like the Englishman in the above photo, it does not mean it will work for you.

Indeed, what I have noticed about the vast majority of alpha males is that none of them have anything in common, other than a base set of traits that have been repeated over and over again in game blogs such as dominance, confidence, extroversion, charisma, etc. But having these attractive qualities can manifest themselves in unlimited ways, so describing these qualities in abstract is usually pretty worthless. Let's have another example of an alpha:

This guy is a construction worker who married John Boehner's daughter. Most people were shocked in disbelief, but to the eyes of Boehner's daughter he was attractive. And since the only thing that matters for making a relationship work is the woman's interest level, it doesn't matter if the guy lives like a bum. All that matters is his ability to make her feel good when he's around her with his own brand of game. While very few men could probably pull off this kind of Rastafarian game, you don't need to. All you need to do is figure out your own optimal version of game, which I guarantee you will be unlike the vast majority of other men's game.

So if you're trying to become more successful with women, don't be afraid to experiment. Extreme individualism will only help you appeal to specific niche of women. I found my niche this way – and you can too, providing you are fearless and eager to try out lots of new behaviors with as many women as possible until you find something that sticks. I'll never forget one of my successful womanizer friends who got most of his lays from the subway. I would watch him score numbers with girls right on the train within a few stops. I would try his exact style of game and get a horrible rejection, over and over again. His type of game didn't work for me, but it worked for him. Likewise he hated to dance, but dancing worked for me.

Remember, if you can't get laid, then it's almost certainly because you aren't specializing yourself or you're simply in an environment that works against you. Consider being a young man in South East Asia – girls will value you because of your youth and good looks. But in Colombia, being young is considered a disadvantage, while older men in their 50´s get 20-year old girlfriends. The culture you're in has an enormous influence, so sometimes it is necessary to travel in order to determine if it is you who needs to change or your home address that needs to change. Consider this Ukrainian example:

Be open when evaluating other man's game, and not like the game denialists, since it is not immediately obvious to see how a guy can be wildly successful with women when most men are not. If you pay attention, and stay humble (never think you're better than the guy who's getting hotter women than you) then it is possible to learn from other alpha males in order to build onto your own style. Not everyone can be alpha, but alpha could be anyone. An alpha male is best defined as that which is attractive to women, and what a woman could be attracted to is only limited by your imagination. Take this knowledge and create yourself into the alpha you want to be.

Two Years Before The Mast

July 9, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I picked up this book after reading Quintus's review. It's about a Harvard man named Richard Henry Dana who takes a break from his studies to become a sailor for a two-year stint, with the hope that it will help his failing eyesight. The journey started off rough for him…

> I had often read of the nautical experiences of others, but I felt as though there could be none worse than mine; for in addition to every other evil, I could not but remember that this was only the first night of a two years' voyage.
> There is not so helpless and pitiable an object in the world as a landsman beginning a sailor's life.

This is a story that makes you feel like a weak man, ashamed for living a comfortable life where most of your time is spent sitting in front of a glowing screen on a comfortable chair to read pleasant articles at your leisure. The entirely of your soft existence will not come close to the difficulty that sailors faced in the 19th century, and I don't know if that's a compliment to mankind's progress or an insult to how we have chosen to lead our modern lives.

> It is the officers' duty to keep every one at work, even if there is nothing to be done but to scrape the rust from the chain cables. In no state prison are the convicts more regularly set to work, and more closely watched. No conversation is allowed among the crew at their duty, and though they frequently do talk when aloft, or when near one another, yet they always stop when an officer is nigh.
> The [pirate] vessel continued in pursuit, changing her course as we changed ours, to keep before the wind. The captain, who watched her with his glass, said that she was armed, and full of men, and showed no colors.
> Our clothes were all wet through, and the only change was from wet to more wet. It was in vain to thin of reading or working below, for we were too tired, the hatchways were closed down, and everything was wet and uncomfortable, black > and dirty, heaving and pitching. We had only to come below when the watch was out, wring our wet clothes, hand them up, and turn in and sleep as soundly as we could, until the watch was called again.

> We had long ago run through all our dry clothes, and as sailors have no other way of drying them than by the sun, we had nothing to do but to put on those which were the least wet.

As difficult as it sounded, this book offered a romantic view of manual labor, that through hard work comes a sense of masculine purity and goodness. The phrase to "earn your salt" had real meaning among these American sailors, where intellectual or service labor by comparison seems much less fitting for reward. We're not craftsmen or sailors now but internet marketers, computer programmers, office clerks, and the like. Less pride and fulfillment come from these professions, which is why modern man has to create random goals like riding across South America in a motorcycle or climbing an African mountain in order to fill his spirit.

By chronicling the voyage across Cape Horn and to California, Dana unwittingly becomes a Californian historian, offering great detail about life on the coast while it was in Mexican hands…

> Yet the least drop of Spanish blood, if it be only a quadroon or octoroon, is sufficient to raise them from the rank of slaves, and entitles them to a suit of clothes—boots, hat, cloak, spurs, long knife, and all complete, though coarse and dirty as may be,—and to call themselves Espanolos, and to hold property, if they can get any.
> The men in Monterey appeared to me to be always on horseback. Horses are as abundant here as dogs and chickens were in Juan Fernandez. There are not stables to keep the in, but they are allowed to run wild and graze wherever they please, being branded, and having long leather ropes, called "lassos," attached to their necks and dragging along behind them, but which they can be easily taken. The men usually catch one in the morning ,throw a saddle and bridle upon him, and use him for the day, and let him go at night, catching another the next day. When they go on long journeys, they ride one horse down, and catch another, throw the saddle and bridle upon him, and after riding him down, take a third, and so on to the end of the journey.

> The women have but little virtue but then the jealousy of their husbands is extreme, and their revenge deadly and almost certain. A few inches of cold steel has been the punishment of many an unwary man, who has been guilty, perhaps, of nothing more than indiscretion of manner.

His own journey takes a negative turn when he's told he may have to sail for four years instead of two…

> Still worse was [the news] for me, who did not mean to be a sailor for life; having intended only to be gone eighteen months or two years. Three or four years would make me a sailor in every respect, mind and habits, as well as body—nolens volens; and would put all my companions so far ahead of me that college and a profession would be in vain to think of; and I made up my mind that, feel as I might, a sailor I must be, and to be master of a vessel, must be the height of my ambition.

It was interesting to note the cold management style of the captain, who minimized his interaction with the crew and left most of the commanding to the first mate, though he did not hesitate to regain order when he felt the crew became loose with their labor and attitude.

> "Can't a man ask a question here without being flogged?"
> "No," shouted the captain; "nobody shall open his mouth aboard this vessel, but myself;" and began laying the blows upon his back, swinging half round between each blow, to give it full effect. As he went on, his passion increased, and he danced about the deck, calling out as he swung the rope,—If you want to know what I flog you for, I'll tell you. It's because I like to do it!—because I like to do it!—It suits me! That's what I do it for!"
> I thought of our situation, living under a tyranny; of the character of the country we were in; of the length of the voyage, and of the uncertainty attending our return to America; and then, if we should return, of the prospect of obtaining justice and satisfaction for these poor men; and vowed that if God should ever give me the means, I would do something to redress the grievances and relieve the sufferings of that poor class of beings, of whom I then was one.
> Loading…

While a sailor could bring charges against a captain on shore, he has no means of redress while in a voyage, for he is considered property of the shipping company, and any attempt to escape or fight the captain would put him in jail. He is not allowed to quit. Dana notes that some captains, who may be gentlemen on land, go somewhat mad with power while on their ship.

> A sailor's [day off] is but for a day; yet while it lasts it is perfect. He is under no one's eye, and can do whatever, and go wherever, he pleases. This day, for the first time, I may truly say, in my whole life, I felt the meaning of a term which I had often heard—the sweets of liberty.

Their journey had them engaged in the cattle hide trade, where they would sail up and down the California coast to collect hides from missionaries or Indian traders brought from the interior to store them in the company depot. They could not leave the coast until the depot was full of hides. Other ships off the coast were also engaged in this trade and usually manned by men from the Sandwich Islands (the former name of Hawaii). The Islanders would work on sailing rigs for the short-term to earn just enough money to drink, smoke, and live, never getting attached to any one place.

> …no one who has not been on a long, dull voyage, shut up in one ship, can conceive of the effect of monotony upon one's thoughts and wishes. The prospect of a change is like a green spot in a desert, and the remotest probability of great events and exciting scenes gives a feeling of delight, and sets life in motion, so as to give a pleasure, which any one not in the same state would be entirely unable to account for.
> Our forecastle, as usual after a liberty-day, was a scene of tumult all night long, from the drunken ones. They had just got to sleep towards morning, when they were turned up with the rest, and kept at work all day in the water, carrying hides, their heads aching so that they could hardly stand. This is sailor's pleasure.
> We accordingly made up a packet of letters, almost every one writing, and dating them "January 1st, 1836." The governor was true to his promise, and they all reached Boston before the middle of March, the shortest communication ever yet made across the country.

Masculinity is assumed among sailors, and nothing is worthy of praise…

> A sailor knows too well that his life hangs upon a thread, to wish to be always reminded of it; so, if a man has a [lucky break from death], he keeps it to himself, or makes a joke of it. I have often known a man's life to be saved by an instant of time, or by the merest chance,—the swinging of a rope,—and no notice taken of it.
> An overstrained sense of manliness is the characteristic of searfaring men, or, rather, of life on board ship. This often gives an appearance of want of feeling, and even of cruelty. From this, if a man comes within an ace of breaking his neck and escapes, it is made a joke of; and no notice must be taken of a bruise or cut; and any expression of pity, or any shot of attention, would look sisterly, and unbecoming a man who has to face the rough and tumble of such a life. From this, too, the sick are neglected at sea, and whatever sailors may be ashore, a sick man finds little sympathy and attention, forward or aft. A man, too, can having nothing peculiar or sacred on board ship; for all the nicer feelings they take pride in disregarding, both in themselves and others. A think-skinned man could not live an hour on ship-board. One would be torn raw unless he had the > hide of an ox.

Even with such a culture, you still notice that the dominant male cream rises to the top. One story had the first mate standing up to encroachment of the captain. There was no passive aggressive grumbling or vague Facebook updates, but a man-to-man confrontation where the strongest won. The weak are not supported by anyone, and if you are unable to fulfill your duties, whether through laziness or sickness, you are not considered worthy to be on ship.

Finally the journey comes to an end after Dana was able to switch ships (partly thanks to his family connections back home) on one that had a shorter length of duty…

> A year before, while carrying hides on the coast, the assurance that in a twelvemonth we should see Boston, made me half wild; but now that I was actually there, and in sight of home, the emotions which I had so long anticipated feeling, I did not find, and in their places was a state of very nearly entire apathy.
> There is probably so much of excitement in prolonged expectation, that the quiet realizing of it produces a momentary stagnation of feeling as well as of effort.

I'm sure those who traveled for long away from their home can relate to the anti-climatic return home.

Twenty-five years after his journey, he revisited California, now in American hands. He was disappointed at the change and rapid growth.

> The past was real. The present, all about me, was unreal, unnatural, repellent. I saw the big ships lying in the stream, the Alert, the California, the Rosa, with her Italians; then the handsome Ayacucho, my favorite, the poor, dear old Pilgrim, the home of hardship and hopelessness; the boats passing to and for; the cries of the sailors at the captain or falls; the peopled beach; the large hide-houses with their gangs of men; and the Kanakas [Indians] interspersed everywhere. All, all were gone! not a vestige to mark where one hide-house stood. The oven, too, was gone. I searched for its site, and found, where I thought it should be, a few broken bricks and bits of mortar. I alone was left of all, and how strangely was I here! What changes to me! Where were they all? Why should I care for them,—poor Kanakas and sailors, the refuse of civilization, the outlaws and beach-combers of the Pacific! Time and death seemed to transfigure them. Double nearly all were dead; but how had they died, and where? In hospitals, in fever-climes, in dens of vice, or falling from the mast, or dropping exhausted from the wreck.

One downside of this book is that he goes into technical detail of sailing and operating a ship, most of which you have no choice but to glaze over, but I recommend this book to give you perspective and show you how our modern civilization has made us into mush. Very few of us could right now perform the labor or endure the hardships that those men have faced, and while we're lucky that we don't have to endure it, I wonder how much this benefit damages our development as men.

Rape Jokes About Men Are Okay

July 10, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

One of the incontrovertible pieces of evidence that feminists present for the existence of so-called rape culture—that is, a social environment that excuses or even encourages sexual violence toward women—is the supposed prevalence of "rape jokes." The argument goes that by joking about rape you trivialize it, and therefore downplay its very real consequences on women and girls, encouraging behaviors (by men) that feed the cycle in the process. Add to that a society that engages in "slut shaming" and "blaming the victim" as a matter of course, and you live in a world in which women are beset on all sides by a specter of sexuality.

It's no wonder that the term rape culture is the go-to, catch-all label for rape alarmists everywhere. Like Bush's (and now Obama's) War on Terror, rape culture is a never-ending struggle against an invisible enemy that could be anywhere. It thrives on ambiguity and interminability. The goal isn't to win it, but to keep whipping up the hysteria.

You could devote an entire Tumblr to the fallacies, doublespeak, and incoherence around feminists' views around rape alone—never mind other aspect of their ideology. Trivializing rape is bad, but they trivialize it the most by abusing the word with impunity, applying it to everything from actual, brutal rape to leering or catcalls.

"One in four women is raped in their lifetimes," yet the methodology behind that go-to scare statistic has been repeatedly debunked and the figure revised enough times to eliminate any credibility. Women should be able dress how they please, act how they feel like, be as drunk as they want, go where they want (at whatever time they want), yet bear zero responsibility for their own safety. The list goes on, but the biggest hypocrisy is reserved for comedy.

One of the cardinal rules of rape culture is that rape is such a sacrosanct subject that it shouldn't be joked about. In fact, Daniel Tosh famously got into trouble with armchair feminists everywhere for violating that commandment last year. This reignited the hysteria over rape jokes, despite the fact that most of us can count on one hand how many rape jokes—about women—we've actually ever heard.

Loading...

A few comedians made the astute observation that feminism and comedians are natural enemies. What they omitted is that it isn't that feminists don't have a sense of humor, it's that they don't have a sense of humor about anything that affects women, especially those in their demographic—relatively privileged (and white) women. Jokes about men, especially ones that underscore their supposed oafishness and ineptitude, or in which they're subjected to violence (even sexual violence), continue to be okay.

I needn't point out the irony that probably the most common cultural meme about incarceration is about prison rape—which, of course, disproportionately affects men. Whenever a guy who's judged to be due for his comeuppance (especially if he's famous) gets sent to prison, the sodomy jokes are painfully repetitive. "Now he's going to become someone's girlfriend in jail!" "Hope he doesn't drop the soap!" "He's going to make someone very happy in prison!"

The recent arrest of Aaron Hernandez for alleged murder has dragged out all of the familiar gags, along with some new, situation-specific variations.

But where's the feminist outcry over these rape jokes? It should come as no surprise that there isn't any, and there never has been. This, despite the fact that prison rape actually affects one in five inmates, victimizes juveniles, and is disproportionately violent. This says nothing about the increased transmission rate of HIV and other diseases.

In the end, this is another data point to confirm that feminism—with its outcry rape culture and rape jokes—isn't about rape at all. And, it certainly isn't about men suffering rape. It's about hypocritically promoting a world where already privileged women are shielded from any potential offense, and largely pardoned from responsibility for their own actions, while continuing to enjoy an a-la-carte platter of benefits from the "patriarchal" past.

In the end, it's rape culture itself that's the joke.

Happy Birthday, America

I looked at my watch and it was midnight. July 4th had officially come. I had just arrived at a bowling alley with two girls, one of which I had seen previously and her best friend. Let's call her Kat. It was Kat's 22nd birthday and she invited me to join her and her friend (21) to celebrate. Normally I wouldn't do so because friends of girls you want to date usually become cockblocks, but on this July 4th… I didn't mind.

Kat and I had met the previous Friday at a high end bar in town. I caught her looking at me while she was seated, so I waved. She waved back and a few minutes later I went over and introduced myself. We started talking and hit it off pretty quickly. Two hours later of chatting and playful bantering, I invited her to join me for a drink at my home. She refused and asked if we can exchange numbers and Facebook information instead. The next day, I became her 14th friend on Facebook. We texted back and forth and saw each other a few times before going bowling for her birthday. Normally, numbers mean shit to me and I'd laugh at a Facebook request, but on this Friday prior to July 4th… I didn't mind.

She was a terrible bowler but her friend was great. They ordered food and a bottle of vodka and all of us proceed to get drunk and happy. We returned to my apartment where my friend had just come back himself from a date with another girl, a girl he had had sex with after the fifth date. Kat came into my room and stayed the night, and while we messed around she said it was still too early to have sex. This was our third date. Normally both my buddy and I would cut girls off after the third date without sex, but on this July 4th… we didn't mind.

Loading…

The morning came and Kat and her friend got up and asked us if we were hungry. We said yes, so they proceeded to raid our fridge, take out what they saw was appropriate and cook us a fantastic breakfast. We ate, the girls did not. After we finished eating, they washed all the dishes. We all laid around on the couch for a bit, then had some pizzas delivered for lunch and drank some beers. After all, it was July 4th so we tried to be as patriotic as possible — which meant pizza and beers. My friend and I had three slices each, the girls had one slice each. And again, they did all the dishes after we ate. Later we went for a walk in the nearby park. Me and my buddy were in shorts and a t-shirt while the girls were in heels and dresses. Normally we'd dread having some girls attach themselves to us during the day, but this July 4th… we didn't mind.

We bid them adieu shortly after since we were going out to dinner with our regular girls. We went home, showered, cleaned up the apartment and met them for dinner. Mine was 19 years old and showed up in a white dress with white heels. His was 22 and showed up in a black dress with red heels. We ordered food, they did not. As mine stated, it was past 6pm and she does not like to eat after that time. After we finished eating, we paid our tab and headed back to spend the night in the apartment. As we were walking out, a young gentlemen at the table next to us waved us down. “Nice to hear a familiar voice, happy 4th of July to you guys” he said. We retorted the same to him. With a big smile on his face he knew that on America’s birthday the next thing he was about to say was already understood by us—“Enjoy this country.”

I replied with an equally telling smile and exclamation of patriotism: “I know… Ukraine is a great place.”

How To Turn A Feminist Into Your Sex Slave

July 10, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Why the hell would you want to turn a Feminist into your own Sex Slave? Because it's fun, that's why, and it's what they want deep down, no pun intended. I've never met a feminist who didn't actually want to be dominated sexually in a mutually consenting sexual relationship between two adults. It's what they CRAVE. Here's your How-To Guide gentlemen.

5. Meet A Feminist

This should be easy for you lads in major cities. If you don't live in a major metropolis, then start with your local college campus, whether that's a major university or local community college. Don't worry; there's plenty of feminist studies classes at public colleges.

Focus on the feminist studies classes, where the girls searching for answers are just begging to be led. Now understand that this mission is one where you must tread lightly and adopt a different mentality in order to be successful. Retain your alpha personality, but be agreeable about a feminists' RIGHT TO SEXUAL CHOICE. This is key, because you must be laid back and focused on helping her experience varying degrees of sexual experiences without verbal judgment or commentary.

Your alpha attitude must be displayed enough to attract her, which it will, despite her rigid attitude of not wanting a 'bad boy', but laid back enough that she will feel safe enough to explore different facets of her sexuality in a casual manner.

4. Fuck Her

You have to walk before you can run, so run standard game to get her in bed. The small but very important difference in the game you run, besides the aforementioned, is to subtly show support for feminism and to throw in a couple of vocal comments regarding it. This has to be done lightly or she will see right through it. Say something like the below while in bed with her after you finally fuck her. This might take a couple of times of having sex with her for it to come off naturally, so feel it out.

You: “You know, it is important for a girl to be able to be sexual without being called a slut. Society has to keep loosening up, so women aren’t judged. You’re not a slut; it’s your right to fuck who you want and I admire that you own that.” (You may struggle keeping a straight face, but stay strong gents)

Her: “Wow, you know NO guy has ever said that to me. It’s like mostly if I say I want a threesome with two guys, they actually JUDGE me and make me feel like a whore which I’m not! If it’s okay for a guy to be with two girls then it should be totally cool for me to fuck two guys at once.”

You: “Exactly. I think it might be a turn-on actually.”

Her: “You get me!”

You: “I do. Now sit on my cock again.”

Her: “Ok” (smiles and slides onto your cock for Round 2)

When fucking her make sure to completely DOMINATE her. Most feminist girls crave being fucked dominately. Most girls in general do, but feminists especially. Fuck her hard and good. Feel free to use your imagination. The sheets should be wet from her pussy juice and sweat.

3. Escalate Sexual Situations

After you have her Addicted To Your Dick, start suggesting varying sexual experiences to share together. Here’s a list of ‘activites’ to suggest and verbal examples to accompany them.

Sex Shop

You: “Have you ever been to a sex shop? My cousin went to one and said it’s hysterical, let’s check it out.”

Take her to a sex shop and check out EVERYTHING. Look for clues. You can tell a lot about what a girl may be curious about, because her eyes will linger on certain toys etc. Be playful, but not a fucking comedian. You’re not Jim Carey, so be playful and light, but do not judge no matter what.

The exception would be if she grabs a strap-on dildo and suggests using it on you. At that point, if a feminist were to suggest that, then say you’re not into that, but would like to watch her use it on another girl. Situation averted and you just opened up the threesome scenario. If she persists, then say you’re going to use the restroom and walk away never to see her again.

Threesome

You: “Have you ever kissed a girl?” She will more than likely say yes, and escalate from there.

You: “Did you like kissing her?”

You: “I think it would be cool to watch a girl go down on you.” (Flip this if it seems like she would like to go down on a girl. Note her dominance levels)

Have a damn threesome. Once this world is opened up; the sky is the limit. Make sure though that it’s not a Viewing Threesome, i.e. her and a girl go to town munching carpet and you’re sitting in the corner of the hotel room on a dank ass chair masturbating furiously. Fuck that. You’re the man and they need to serve you. If the only way to get her to warm up to a threesome is to start with that, then you might want to try it, but generally speaking this backfires. Go for the gold.

Sex Club

You: “That threesome was really sexy. You know what I’ve always wanted to do? Have sex in front of other people. My cousin Joe Blow went to this sex club and said it was a blast. He fucked his girlfriend in front of like twenty people. She loved it.”

Check out sex clubs and pick one which seems classy. It might be a rotating party as well. Major cities have private groups which you have to be accepted into and then they notify you of the location generally the day of or the day before. Take her and have sex in front of people. Make sure that YOU are involved in each sexual situation. This is about making her your sex slave to the 9th degree and getting her wrapped up in you. Even hardcore feminists have the ability to develop feelings towards a guy.

BDSM

You: “I came so hard tying you up with my tie when you asked me to. How about we get some toys and see how we like it?”

Her: “My pussy was sooooo wet! Yea, let’s!”

Go buy some toys and experiment. The point of this is to get her comfortable to the point that you eventually are doing BDSM activities at the sex club in front of people. There are countless BDSM ways for two consenting adults to have fun with. Do your research and make sure that EVERYTHING you do is consensual. There’s a reason why the book 50 Shades of Grey has sold over 70 million copies worldwide.

2. Turn Her Out

This is part where you reap the rewards of putting up with her feminist babble for weeks or months while gaining her confidence sexually. Have you enjoyed yourself? Sure. Have you been annoyed with having to agree with her feminist rants while on the way to the sex club to fuck in ‘public’? More than likely. Now it’s time to up the ante and complete your goal: turning her into your consensual sex slave.

Start with a small request. After she has had threesomes with you, ‘public’ sex and had a ball gag in her mouth, she will be open to your requests. Suggest she blow your buddy next time he stops by for a beer and convo. Pull her aside and tell her she should go suck his dick while you mow the lawn.

Now you might be like why the fuck would I do that? It’s simple. You NEVER planned on keeping this feminist around. You NEVER intended to have a healthy relationship with her.

You planned to turn her out and dump her specifically BECAUSE she's a feminist.

Start with the blowjob request for your buddy, then turn it into, "Well my buddy Johnny Jones is coming back from Iraq and hasn't fucked a girl since 2011. Let's have him over and you should fuck him. It's for your country, sweetheart. He served; now it's your turn."

Unless she is the biggest slut known to mankind, the feminist will start questioning these requests. She will probably follow through at first, due to you having reaffirmed her 'Right to her own body and being sexual with whoever and whenever', but eventually, because she is a WOMAN, and woman and men are DIFFERENT in terms of sexuality, her feelings will emerge and she'll start to become difficult, due to her desire to "only be with you".

This is when you drop the hammer…

1. Reveal And Dump

All of your 'hard' work comes to this magical moment. You've experienced just about everything sexually and consensually, and her feelings have emerged. At this point she has feelings for you and wants to perhaps have a relationship or move 'to the next step'. Here's how you drop the hammer in the most effective manner possible:

Take her to dinner

Say you have a surprise for her and to meet you at XYZ restaurant on a certain day and at a certain time and you'd like for her to look extra pretty. In her Feminist Hamster brain she'll think she has already won and that you're going to offer commitment. Poor thing doesn't realize that a man of high value would never commit to a feminist slut. Anyways, I'll take that steak medium rare waiter…

Treat her extra well at dinner

Act excited about what you're going to talk about. Build the anticipation. Make her be almost begging you to tell her what you have to say.

Reveal yourself

Draw this out but essentially say something to this affect:

You: “So the reason I wanted you to join me for dinner is to tell you something. I’m very happy with you and I love spending time you. You’re so open sexually and that’s so refreshing.”

Her: “I love being with you too. What is it?!”

You: “It’s over Ms. Feminist. I only have been agreeing with your femi-nazi bullshit babble for weeks/months to turn you out sexually, show you what a worthless slut you are and allow you to wallow in a puddle of tears and contemplate your degrading acts. In the life of this planet I would never consider any kind of relationship with you. Waiter! The check please.”

Waiter: “Here you go sir.” (He slides it over to you because they generally defer the check to the man)

You: “Oh no, the feminist is paying. She want’s to act like a man of her own free will, then she can pay like a man.” (Slide the check to her side of the table, stand up, smile broadly and walk away)

Mission Complete.

The Master And The Slave

July 11, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Recently, Helen Smith published the book Men On Strike to much fanfare. The book discusses some of the challenges men face in our society. In response, some men noted that when a woman speaks up for men, she garners more respect than she would have if she were a man. Others said that if a woman can bring greater visibility and credibility, then she has value beyond merely the truth of their arguments.

It's possible to sympathize with both sides – I do. In a sense, the two sides are talking past each other – one is concerned with merit, the other with tactics. And to originate an idea is not enough – spreading it is just as urgent. But the merits of Smith's work aside, the phenomenon is undeniable: who are these men that pipe up excitedly just because a woman has taken up their cause? Why do they do it?

The Slave

A man gives undue respect to someone when he himself is not whole. He looks for someone to complete him, someone to whom he can attach himself. He does not trust his own mind, so he yearns for someone of even greater conviction, for a Joan of Arc to which to bond himself. Fundamentally, he is a slave. He needs a master to allay his fears, to assure him that he is on the right path. He is like a child that makes a show of running ahead of his father, yet keeps looking back to make sure father is still close behind.

These submissive men are everywhere. They believe only what is socially acceptable. If all the truth in the world points to an impolitic conclusion, he will run from truth. He waits for a big figure to sally forth, so that he can stand in its shadow and cheerlead, safe in the knowledge that he isn't alone. He may listen to your arguments and show no disagreement or skepticism. But his fear of being alone keeps him silent.

The Master

Compare with the man made whole, the master. He does not look to others for validation, when he believes he has settled on the truth. After all, what does it matter what others say, if the truth is on your side? It doesn't. Most men of this cast look indifferent even – he may consider it beneath him to herd sheep into believing the truth. He can come off as elitist and esoteric. He lives not by lies and that is enough for him. He keeps a few men as close friends, whom he trusts to think freely and reasonably. Otherwise, he knows most people are beyond reason, so he considers it fruitless to try and change them.

When he does encounter credible arguments, he applauds the author for teaching him something. Insofar as credit is due, the identity of the author doesn't matter – only the strength of the author's wisdom matters.

A Slave in Paradise

The Fear Of Being Alone

But there's an additional, sexual dimension. We live in an age where men are told that true love means committing to a woman who is your best friend. Her qualities as wife and mother? Irrelevant, antiquated and sexist. And the slaves believe this whole-heartedly.

But men and women are different. They have different tastes and pastimes, even in this age of androgyny. So the slave is constantly on the lookout for the few women who share his interests, be they spectator sports, videogames or powerlifting.

Loading...

Deep down, he fears women who are different from him. In his heart of hearts, he believes that a woman will only want him when he proves that he is identical to her. He has no value, he offers nothing. He is putty in the hands of a woman, ever ready to conform to her will, because he's always anxious to show how same and equal he is.

He can't fathom a woman liking him if she doesn't like World of Warcraft. That's his only hook. When he finds a like-minded woman, he yelps for joy. He salivates, "I've found her! My soulmate!" If her interest in his hobby wanes, it follows, her interest in him is sure to wane too. He is in constant fear that she will change and leave him.

He is so lonely, because so few women show any similarity to him. So he feels he can't afford to pass up any opportunities to find his match. He placates every woman that crosses his path, in the hopes that she'll appreciate what they have in common – which, in his figuring, is what makes her like him. He refuses to believe that masculinity, that force of character, has any role. So if he fails, it's because he didn't ape her enough.

Parenthetically, I've met many such women with male interests. To a woman, they all disdain this man. She mentions that she enjoys say, physics, only to get a deluge of try-hard men talking up Hans Bethe, so she regrets ever mentioning it.

Woman Unmans Lesser Men

Nowadays, men are desperately scared of being tarred as a homosexual or a failure with women – there are even men who will not have dinner with just one other man, because that would look too much like a date. When socializing, he may have three male friends with him, but he'll stare attentively at the one girl there. Whenever she speaks, everyone else is on mute.

Get to know a man made whole, and you will find a different take on the role of women in his life. He accepts that men and women are different; he looks to women for what he can't get from a man – her dissimilarity is a virtue, not a vice. She is valuable insofar as she is feminine and unlike a man. Perhaps she has some interest in common with him, as in philosophy or the arts, and that is welcome. But that's icing on the cake, because those needs are already met through his relationships with men. He doesn't care if other people think he's gay because he prefers the company of men. He frees himself from the petty expectations of others.

Ask people what they think of these two types of men, the master and the slave. Undoubtedly, the master would be deemed a misogynist and a sexist, for not wanting or letting a woman be his peer and equal. In truth, it's the slave who despises a woman, who so taxes her spirit. While the master is content to let a woman relax into her feminine self, the slave wants her to be all things to him all at once: best friend, parent of his children, spouse, advisor, protector, counselor. Little wonder when she starts to feel overwhelmed and masculinized. She starts to see the man as a child, unwilling to take control. The independent woman will cluck about equality when it is precisely inequality that satisfies her.

Top 8 Quotes From Steven Pressfield's Turning Pro

July 11, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Steven Pressfield's latest work about art and writing is Turning Pro, which attempts to help turn your amateur art into a profession. The premise is great but the execution is lacking, simply because the book has no meat. The anecdotes are forgettable and often second-hand while there are only a few passages which motivate. You truly want to get into this book, especially if you're an artist yourself, but there's nothing to get into. It's like diving into a pool that seems deep but is actually rather shallow.

But—it's such a quick read that I imagine you will get a useful idea or two out of it. It's a shame that Pressfield's work is reduced to "well, you'll get something out of it," because as a successful writer I do believe he has much wisdom to share, but after writing The War of Art, the bulk of his wisdom was tapped. Nonetheless, Turning Pro did give me some ideas to noodle on, so I reluctantly recommend it for the creative class.

Here are my favorite quotes from the book:

> To feel ambition and to act upon it is to embrace the unique calling of our souls. Not to act upon that ambition is to turn our backs on ourselves and on the reason for our existence.

2.

Loading...

> When we're living as amateurs, we're running away from our calling—meaning our work, our destiny, the obligation to become our truest and highest selves.

3.

> The amateur is an egoist. HE takes the material of his personal pain and uses it to draw attention to himself. He creates a 'life,' a 'character,' a 'personality.'

4.

> When we can't stand the fear, the shame, and the self-reproach that we feel, we obliterate it with an addiction.

5.

> Turning pro changes how people perceive us. Those who are still fleeing from their own fears will not try to sabotage us. They will tell us we've changed and try to undermine our efforts at further change. They will attempt to make us feel guilty for these changes. They will try to entice us to get stoned with them or fuck off with them or waste time with them, as we've done in the past, and when we refuse, they will turn against us and talk us down behind our backs.

6.

> Each day, the professional understands, he will wake up facing the same demons, the same Resistance, the same self-sabotage, the same tendencies to shadow activities and amateurism that he has always faced.

7.

> Our work is practice. One bad day is nothing to us. Ten bad days are nothing.

8.

> Once we turn pro, we're like sharks who have tasted blood, or renunciants who have glimpsed the face of God. For us, there is no finish line. No bell ends the bout. Life is the pursuit. Life is the hunt. When our hearts burst… then we'll go out, and no sooner.

5 Reasons Why Your Workout Sucked

July 11, 2013 | by Mr. Honey Badger | Link | Original Link

Without question we've all had days in the gym that were entirely unproductive. Days when we felt like we had no energy or desire to pump iron. Days that just plain sucked.

That's why in this article I want to discuss 5 of the most common reasons why your last gym session was abyssal, so that you can be better prepared next time to make the most of your workouts.

1. Your Diet Sucks

Proper nutrition is one of the most important aspects of your training. Without proper nutrition you will have a hard time making any substantive progress in the gym. That's why you have to go the extra mile and make sure you are feeding your body the right nutrients at the right time. This will not only help you recover and grow in between your workouts, but will also ensure that you have the energy to train like a beast every time you set foot in the gym.

I know far too many guys that underestimate the importance of diet. They spend their nights out on the town drinking heavily and eating garbage and then wonder why they feel weak as shit in the gym. I know some of you guys might like to take caffeine or other stimulants before a workout and that's fine, but they can only take you so far. Eventually you're crappy diet will catch up with you. So the next time you have a piss poor session in the gym, ask yourself "What has my diet been like for the past week?"

Looking for a pre-workout drink? Look no further:

2. Your Sleep Sucks

This is a no brainer but I'll mention it anyway. If you are not getting an adequate amount of rest your training will suffer. I understand that occasionally you won't be able to get a good night's sleep and that's fine. Does that mean you should skip the gym in order to rest? In my opinion, if it's just 1-2 nights of crappy sleep then just pop some caffeine and hit the gym anyway. However, if you are stringing together several sleepless nights or are suffering from a crippling bout of insomnia, it's better you get your sleep issues sorted out first before trying to go all beast mode in the gym. I recommend most guys get between 7-8 hours of sleep a night. Some will need more, some less. This is where you will need to do your own homework. I know that when I'm training very hard in the gym with weights very close to RMs (rep maximums), I need a little extra sleep.

3. You're Distracted In The Gym

Guys like to bitch and whine all the time about girls and their iphones. They complain that girls are on their phones 24/7 these days. In fact, some have even argued that it has gotten so bad that you now have to compete with it for the girl's attention (a sort of cock block 2.0 if you will). Well, I'd like to make the same comment about guys and their iphones in the gym. I see guys all the time glued to their iphones between sets in the gym. Usually they are flipping through facebook or having text conversations with friends.

This is a problem with modern society in general. We have completely lost the ability to focus on the task at hand. It's no wonder most guys just go through the motions at the gym, haphazardly doing sets in between text conversations with friends and checking their facebook profile. Cut this nonsense out. You are a grown man and should be able to focus on a single task for at least 60-90 minutes at a time. In fact, my advice to guys is to not even carry their phones into the gym. Cultivate a laser like focus on your workout and say goodbye to crappy gym sessions.

4. Your Intensity Sucks

This point sort of ties into the previous point in that most guys train with no intensity whatsoever. Walking into most commercial gyms these days feels like I'm interrupting a church service. It's an extremely rare sight for me to see a guy effectively psyche himself up for a lift, or make a little noise to grind out an extra rep or two.

It is a sorry state that gyms like Planet Fitness even exist. The lunk alarm has got to be one of the dumbest things I've ever heard of. That's why I'm giving you the green light to make a little noise if it helps you get psyched up for a lift, especially limit lifts. You don't need to bring smelling salts to the gym or ask your training partner to slap you across the face, but you must find a way to tap into some He-Man level strength if you want to inoculate yourself from repeated crappy sessions in the gym.

Ross tells you like it is:

5. You're Burnt Out

Although I think the term overtraining is used way too often these days, I must admit that even if you are training like a maniac you will eventually hit a plateau and your progress will come to a halt. In this case, if you know for a fact that you are covering all angles of your training adequately (nutrition, rest, recovery etc.) and you are still stuck, it's time for you to deload. This means that you will need to lighten the training stimulus for a few weeks before you build back up to smash some more PRs.

Although periodization is a concept that requires an article unto itself, my generic recommendation is for guys to dial back their poundages by roughly 20%. So for example, if I got struck with a 275lbs bench press for 5 reps, I would drop back down to 220-225lbs for 5 reps and build back up. This is when experience comes in handy. Over time you will learn what your body needs in order to get over a plateau, even if it's 2 steps forward and 1 back.

Final Word

So the next time you have a crappy session in the gym, review these 5 points. Is your diet and sleep in order? Are you training distraction free and with animal-like intensity? When was your last deload? The answers to these questions will help you determine if you are making the most of your time in the gym.

The One Thing That Makes A Man

July 12, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

As I was clearing out my bookmarks recently, I stumbled across a link to an old Chateau Heartiste post I'd once earmarked for future perusal: "Beta Valentine". When I saw that it was a movie review, I of course watched the film in question, praised by Roissy as "so bracing, so truthful, and so relevant to the cultural moment." I, too, highly recommend it.

The story depicts the decline of one Dean Pereira (and the relationship that crumbles as a result). While I watched a certainty crystallized in my cortex that had previously been but a whisper at the edge of my awareness. The essence of being a man.

The single thing that makes a man is control.

Self-control

A man knows that the present cannot be used to change the past, and acts accordingly. His actions, although rapid when required, are never hasty nor rash. On the very rare occasion he is roused to anger, it is not spontaneous violence but simmering discontent that he displays.

Loading...

Lifestyle control

A man does not flee from his problems with consistent drunkenness or drugs. His discipline and confidence manifests in a healthy diet and exercise regime. He listens to the wisdom of others and the voices of his community but always makes his own choices.

Financial control

A man supports himself by producing value for society. In some cases others rely on his financial support, but never the inverse. His finances are subject only to his scrutiny and administration, and he has contingencies in case of unforeseen complications.

Relationship control

A man maintains only the relationships that he values, and does not value people who do not value him. As he has the elements of control listed above, he cannot be dictated to, shamed or blackmailed. If treated poorly, he can and will walk away.

Control does NOT require or imply a lack of responsibilities. It is instead a state of mind and a state of affairs. Make it yours.

Does Your Marketing Strategy Suck?

July 13, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

Yesterday, I g0t an e-mail from a local credit card processing provider that has been trying to convince me to switch from using Square over to them. I made it very clear to them about a month ago that I was happy with Square and I was not looking to switch. This most recent e-mail said: "…. I am really surprised to hear that you are happy with Square, as we have many customers who have issues and complaints about their service." That line alone made me angry first, and then I rolled my eyes with a fair degree of disgust shortly after. I couldn't help but wonder – do these people realize how badly they hurt themselves by being so aggressive and in all the wrong ways?

Today, I went to a networking meeting, where a bunch of different professionals introduced themselves, bragged for a few minutes about how good they are at what they do, and started handing out business cards to each other, shamelessly asking for referrals. I am pretty sure that all those cards ended up in a trash can shortly after that meeting was over.

As I left the meeting and walked home, I noticed a giant billboard sign: "Injured in a car accident? Call us for justice and compensation" with a large picture of a greasy looking lawyer, who looked like he belonged in "Carlito's Way". As I got home, I had a voicemessage from a dentist on my voicemail reminding me that I am due for teeth cleaning. This is the fourth reminder over the past 2 months. When I got home, I also found a postcard from my dentist reminding me that it's time to get my teeth cleaned. This is the second postcard this month. This card was burried in my mail along with two home-loan refinancing offers, and a bunch of "pre-approved" credit card applications.

I thought that by now, it has become very clear in the world of commerce that being too pushy when it comes to marketing simply doesn't work, and actually has the opposite effect – annoying people and making them look the other way. The more sophisticated your target clients are, the more likely you are to turn them off by being too eager to sell or too eager to convince them to buy from you rather than from someone else.

The few excellent doctors, lawyers and accountants that I know personally do not advertise aggressively at all. You are not going to find their name by googling "the best lawyer/doctor/accountant in San Francisco". Their websites do not have "Come to us" buttons all over them and flash videos about how they are the best in their industry. Instead, they are quite conservative and simple. Those professionals' exceptional service, attention to their clients, and great results speak for themselves, and these are their main channels of promoting their business.

It is obvious that Roosh is well aware of this. That's why his ways of promoting his material are so mild and subtle. He has a section on his website dedicated to books, but he doesn't spend any time or space on his website on praising how great these books are. He lets his readers discuss his books in the forum. He doesn't post a bunch of (fake) testimonials, and he certainly doesn’t include a link to his books in every blog posting, like so many others would do and actually do.

Roosh hopes and succeeds at attracting people to his material through his thought-provoking and economical writing that everyone has access to for free. If you find what he writes to be interesting, entertaining or both, even if you disgree with half of what he says or find his views to be way too extreme, you will still be very curious to read his books, because you know that at least 20% of what you would find in those books will be the kind of honesty you can’t find anywhere else, and no one else out there will have the balls to put on the paper, even if they thought exactly the same way.

The message to all of us is clear and simple: it’s much better to impress your target audience with your skills and knowledge, and wait for them to come up to you and say “Thank you. Can I have your card?”, rather than shove your business card in their face as soon as you meet them.

You Shouldn’t Have To Game Friends

July 13, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

Permit me two stories.

About three years ago I was teaching a salsa dance class in Mankato, Minnesota. The dance scene had gone from a bustling marketplace of 20 something hotties, desperate to learn the art of ~~getting attention on a dance floor~~ “ballroom dancing,” to a sad shell of its former self. The 20 somethings left to start families, and now certainly in their 30’s, their children prevented them from such luxuries as taking dance classes. Instead my dance classes were now full of recent 50 something divorcees thinking they were going to find a “Latin lover” if they and their 200 pound ass just learned a little salsa dancing.

It had gotten so bad that sometimes I couldn’t teach dips because many women were literally too heavy to dip and the dwindling number of men that remained would injure themselves if they dared try. And so instead of being excited to start a new class, the previous decade of decline in the beauty of my students had taught me not to get excited and treat what was once my passion like a job I no longer cared about.

Then she walked in.

“She” being the second most beautiful girl I ever had in my then 13 years of dance classes. Tall, model-esque, and a face that was the epitome of beauty.

I was about to pigeon-hole her as just another self-absorbed attention queen, and play the appropriate game, until we had a drink after class and was shocked. She was a sergeant in the US Army, fresh from Iraq. She was a communications specialist, worked a real job, and had the misfortune of losing her mother early on in life. She was not spoiled, but rather had suffered a harsher than average life, and thus was a rather impressive person.

Normally, at this point, one’s mind might default to “wow, this might be the one,” but there was just one problem. Though stunningly beautiful, there was just no physical chemistry between her and me.

I KNEW she was attractive, my brain corroborating what my eyes saw, but oddly enough I just really couldn’t get it up for her. She was one of those rare “hot chicks” that everybody else would want to nail, just not you.

However, while the physical chemistry was just not there, the personality was. So much so that you would almost consider this person to be a soul brother/sister. Her experiences in life shaped her into an interesting person and also gave her the street smarts needed to just do things on an automated and unconscious level. She intuitively knew what you were saying, knew what you were doing, and would support you without thinking twice. She was observant and clever, making her a great wingman. I was convinced that though I would not be dating this girl, I would have a cool tomboy of a chick to hang out with and thus started inviting her to hang out with my crew.

Then, something interesting occurred.

While she was desperate to go and resurrect her social life after Iraq, pretty much every invitation I gave her went unanswered. I'd say, "Hey, we're going to a jazz club. Give you a chance to get out of uniform and dress like a girl for once." She'd respond enthusiastically, only never to show. I'd say, "Hey, we're going salsa dancing later tonight," only to get a response back the next day that she had to work. I'd say, "Hey, bunch of us are going for a motorcycle ride, we're coming through your town, you want us to pick you up?" Nothing again.

It soon got to the point that she so infrequently attended that I just stopped inviting her. However, I could never reconcile why we got along so great and why she expressed such an interest in doing things (to the point it sounded like she was "dying" to get out), only never to capitalize on my offers.

The next story is one set in Sheridan, Wyoming.

There I was working at a local bank, sifting through loans we made to local meth addicts, trailer trash, single moms, and degenerates who couldn't run a sports bar effectively. I was fortunate enough to live downtown, which meant I could walk to work, not to mention, four bars were literally within one block of my apartment (one literally under it).

Because of my proximity to bars, my social life received a significant boost. I would hit every bar, every night, and even taught dance classes at the largest bar in town on Tuesdays. Also because of the relatively small size of the town I became one of the "regulars" overnight, me knowing everybody and everybody knowing me.

Unfortunately, since this town was in Wyoming most of the local women were hideous. This is not my opinion. It's just a fact. Women in Wyoming just aren't pretty. They're overweight, they smoke and drink too much, aging their faces prematurely, they get pregnant before they graduate from high school, and they certainly don't care to doll themselves up. They rarely wear dresses. They never wear heels. And no amount of make-up can save them, so they don't even bother. Wyoming literally is just one big, square trailer park and their women represent this fact.

So imagine my surprise when a buxom,

drop-dead gorgeous blond in 6 inch cherry red heels and a matching red cleavage-dropping dress walked into the bar.

It didn't make sense. The needle went off the record. Men's jaws hit the floor and women sneered. NEVER had such a hot woman ever walked through those doors, let alone set foot inside Buffalo, Wyoming.

My instinct kicked in and I stopped looking, ensuring to be the only guy ignoring her. And sure enough she sat next to me and started talking to me.

But just like the beautiful sergeant from Mankato, her looks were deceiving.

She wasn't a ditzy broad, looking for free drinks. Turned out she worked at a rather prestigious ranch outside of town and this was her one night off that week. She never had the opportunity to dress up and had been wanting to wear this little red number for quite some time. And so she was going to wear it, consequences be damned.

She was also incredibly smart and incredibly different. She had traveled to Russia to purchase a unique breed of horse and start breeding them here in the states. She was also very well read on philosophy and could challenge my thinking and make me think of new ideas I had never pondered before. And add to it again, she was a tomboy. She liked not only ranching, lassoing, and riding horses, but 4 wheelers, motorcycles, hiking, fishing and amateur paleontology and archaeology.

I was happy for there were very few people in Wyoming I could talk to, let alone be intellectually stimulated by. And because of the rapport we had established it was in my mind a foregone conclusion we would be friends. She invited me out to her ranch where she said she'd cook me dinner and then we could go fishing, hiking, arrowhead hunting, or whatever we wanted. She gave me her number and given how few intelligent and in shape people there were in Wyoming, I promised not to ruin this gem of a find by trying to hit on her or making any advances.

A couple days later I headed out to her ranch where she gave me a tour. We drove a 4 wheeler around, saw some amazing mountains, cliffs and a picturesque stream filled with trout. She showed me the horses (not a big fan) and then she showed me some old buildings that were there during the pioneer days. It was a good ole time, but she had to wake up early the next morning to work on the ranch, and so I headed back. But before I did she gave me a large arrowhead piece. Too large to be an actual arrowhead, but rather was obviously a tool of some kind. Regardless, it was such a nice piece I would have considered it museum-quality and was consequently thankful and humbled for such a gift. It also made me think she was a kindred spirit and further confirmed I had made a friend.

Loading...

I was thinking since she could really only take off on weekends that we might climb this mountain I had scoped out the week before. Didn't want to see too rushing, so waited a couple days and left her a voice-mail. She was so far from town, however, that I knew she didn't have reception on the ranch. She had to drive to the state highway every night to get her voice-mails, so I figured she'd call back when she had the time.

Wednesday passed, then Thursday, then Friday and unfortunately, she never called.

No matter, I figured, probably busy. The ranch was quite the operation. I'll catch her next week.

I then walked down to one of the rowdier bars in town and surprise! There she was.

Red dress

Red heels

Drunk as all hell

She saw me and immediately lit up.

"Cappy!!!! Hi!!!!"

"Hi," I said, kind of surprised to see her bombed. I said in a jesting manner, "So I take it we're not going hiking tomorrow?"

"Nooo, I'm sorrrry, I forgot to call you. We can go hiking next week. I just needed to get out and let lose."

Understanding, I said, "Well, you're sure making a go of it now!"

We continued to hang out, but unlike the first night we met and the day we had at her ranch, she was now flirting with pretty much every guy at the bar. There was no conversation and she was now dancing on the floor to hip hop music, spilling beer. I decided to leave her at the bar and check out the one next door. Sure enough within an hour she followed.

"Why did you leaaave!??? I need you to protect me from this guy," she said somewhat slurred.

"What guy?" I asked.

"This guy, he keeps hitting on me."

I saw no guy.

Realizing she probably had a few too many I offered her a place to crash at my joint. She refused and instead decided to hit the remaining two bars, while I believe I had enough for the evening and walked home.

The next morning I saw her car parked downtown. I found that odd. So I walked into the bar beneath my apartment and inquired (I learned that in small towns in Wyoming bartenders proved a better source for information than the internet, and yes, bars are open that early in Wyoming).

"Oh yeah, Amy!? Yeah, good ole Amy. She got ripped. Ended up going home with a bunch of Italian tourists last night. Bit of a drama queen that one."

"Heh," I said, "she does this much?"

"Yeah, she'll come to town, get drunk, lead guys on, piss off their girlfriends, lead on the tourists. Provides for some decent entertainment."

And certainly it did, for it wasn't just that one night Amy came to town, but at least three more nights before I left for Minneapolis. I made a token few handful of calls to see if Amy wanted to go hiking, but none, of course, were ever returned. Last I saw her she was drunk at a bar scoring drinks out of a guy nearly thrice her age.

Now the moral of these stories is not one of entertainment value or living vicariously through the life of the ole Captain. But rather to prepare you for the likely event that in your 80 years of life expectancy you will run into a girl who is:

1. Gorgeous and
2. Has such a unique personality or spirit about her it practically compels you to be friends with her, but

3. For some reason you just aren't physically attracted to her

You will be excited. You will be happy. You will think, "Wow, you know, I just REALLY dig this person for herself and it would be totally cool to just go and hang out with her." But you will be let down, because the friendship you assume is a guarantee will never come to fruition. And the reason why is that her beauty prevents it.

Understand absolutely drop-dead gorgeous women are damaged goods in a certain regard. It isn't even necessarily their fault, but rather society's. Since they are so good looking, the vast majority of men interact with them on a sexual basis. They want to have sex with them, they want to be around them, they simply want to look at them. Sadly, none of them want to be their friends and therefore truly beautiful women have few, if any, platonic or non-sexual relationships with men. This skews their experience and mental development so far to the point that by the time they're 20, maybe 22, they're INCAPABLE of having normal, healthy, non-sexual friendships with males.

99.9% of the time, this is fine because 99.9% of the time men are physically attracted to such women and aren't interested in friendship. However, for the remaining .1% of men who just don't find that particular woman physically attractive, OR value a friendship more than a sexual relationship, you throw the girl for a loop. You "do not compute." Making matters worse, is that some of these women ARE genuinely interesting and intellectually-engaging people which draw you in on a platonic level. But since these women never had male friends, and thus, don't know how to interact with you, they assume you are just like every one else. You're hitting on them, you want to nail them, you're only interested in sex, and thus the games continue.

This will throw you off because (for once) you REALLY don't want to have sex with this woman! You will be approaching her in (GASP!) an honest and friendly way! And so when you say,

"Hey, let's go hiking this weekend."

You're not saying

"Hey, let me feign like I'm interested in hiking so I can get into your pants."

You're really, actually saying,

"Hey, let's go hiking this weekend."

But she doesn't know that. Matter of fact, her mind and psychology has been so predispositioned by how society interacts with her, she is incapable of knowing that. And therefore, no matter how cool a chick, no matter how much you jive on a certain level, and no matter how much you may enjoy each others company, don't get too excited about making a new friend. Because she is going to default to her sociological programming. She will play mind games. She will assume you want her. She will flake out. She will be the drama queen. She will be just another drop-dead gorgeous girl.

The sad thing, however, is not that you won't realize a true and great friendship with these women. That was fated never to happen anyway. What's really sad is you see a very interesting, engaging, unique person with incredible potential let society and their beauty dictate how they behave and what they'll inevitably become. For while you'll see the potential for a brilliant, intelligent woman, with various hobbies and interests, who would make a great wife or mother, and make a family incredibly happy, or have some amazing career, unfortunately she'll choose to be just another piece of T&A at the bar.

Hatred Is A Poison

July 14, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Some years ago I served with the Allied Military Intelligence Battalion (AMIB) during the Bosnia peacekeeping mission. It was a multinational unit, composed of military intelligence men from various NATO nations, and it was tasked with collecting information in Bosnia and Croatia as required by our ever-shifting commander's intent. Originally based in Sarajevo, I and a select group of Greek Army personnel later moved south to the Dalmatian coast, to an abandoned Yugoslav army base near the small town of Trogir, in Croatia.

I was the only Marine officer in the battalion, and it was the first time I was in a multinational service environment. So there was some culture shock for me at first. I was coming from the USMC's insular and regimented military culture, into a multinational immersion with European militaries which can only be described, in my opinion, as glorified police forces (except the Turks). Our job was human intelligence: basically to drive all over Bosnia and Croatia with our translator, and meet with various locals who might have information related to the topics we were assigned to investigate.

The people whom we met with were almost always the dregs of society: criminals, former militia members, opportunists, informers, killers. Mostly they were just looking for handouts from us, and all of them were eager to justify and minimize their actions in the ethnic cleansing and fighting that had taken place. Some bragged about their sniping, their violence, their assaults on their neighbors, and their frauds and scams. But being around such people, and in this environment, for an extended period of time had an effect on me, which I have learned to put into greater perspective with the passage of time.

The Bosnian and Croatian countryside was possessed of great beauty, and countless images from that time remain fixed in my memory: the weird, almost haunted, quality of the decrepit base near Trogir; the very different tribal characteristics of the nationalities in AMIB (Norweigans, British, French, Italians, Germans, Turks, Greeks); the many long road trips we took to Zadar, Knin, Split, and dozens of other obscure towns in Bosnia and Croatia; the people we would meet on our travels in the countryside; the same Euro-pop soundtrack that played in the background nearly everywhere we went; the Serbian Orthodox monastery in Krka, where we once had to go for an assignment; and the almost unbelievable lack of supervision the Greeks and I had as armed men driving back and forth between two countries.

I loved working with the Greeks: proud, prickly, and independent, they knew who they liked and didn't like, and fortunately I got along very well with them. Perhaps because of my own Mediterranean background, I knew how to deal with them in a way that none of the other Americans did. For that reason I was the officer assigned to work with them in Trogir. I will never forget my comrade a Greek army major, a hardworking, jovial man, possessed of great humanity, wisdom, and an utter ruthlessness when needed. He was also the only man I have ever seen who could hand-roll a cigarette while driving through a perilous Bosnian mountain road while at the same time talking politics or philosophy.

But darker images from the region's recent history were always present as reminders of the savage heart that pants just beneath the thin veneer of civilization. The natural beauty of the region formed an uncomfortable contrast with the obscene ghastliness of civil war, only recently abated, which was present in every village and in the wrinkled brow of every inhabitant. Political graffiti was nearly everywhere, and all of it was of the extreme type (fascist Ustase or Serb nationalist sloganeering). Parts of Sarajevo were mostly blasted apartment buildings, or buildings raked with machine gun or rocket fire. And driving through the countryside, one would see town after town of demolished houses, blown up by one group or another. The remnants were usually mined, a precaution taken by one group or another to ensure that no displaced persons ever entertained the thought of returning. Sullen hatred and repressed rage hung in the air like a poisonous cloud, and it could not be avoided. When talking with any of the locals, you just felt it immediately.

Loading…

I remember one time while driving in the Croatian countryside we decided, against my better judgment, to pick up a hitchhiker. She was a teenage Croat girl with a beautiful face. But when we got her in the car and attempted some friendly chit-chat, all that came out of her mouth was the foulest, crudest, ethnic hatred: how much she hated Serbs, how much she wished she could kill every one of them, and such talk. It was unsettling for us to hear such unprovoked vitriol come from the mouth of a girl so beautiful; the Greeks and I were taken aback and could hardly respond. We got rid of her in the next village. And for the rest of the drive none of us spoke much, our hearts heavy with the weight of this incident. I felt a deep sense of shame. Shame for sitting there and listening to the diatribe, without responding, and somehow feeling complicit in it. I felt tainted, corrupted, unclean. And I think about this episode sometimes, in darker moments. I have come to despise ethnic or racial bigotry, in whatever form, to the extent that I cannot stand to hear it for a more than a moment.

Hatred is a poison: a corrosive, insidious poison, which eats away at the soul of the bearer, until he becomes a hollow shell of a man, a shellacked and mummified corpse. This is not a metaphor. It is a literal truth, and I have seen it. Never hold onto hatred or animus. And never accept it as a burden from anyone else.

We like to think we can trace the roots of hatred and conflict among peoples and nations. Regarding the Bosnian war, you can read the excellent The Bridge on the Drina by Ivo Andric, as I did, and you can delude yourself that you know the reasons why this happened or why that happened. And to some extent, it is good to ask such questions. But I have come to think that irrational forces play a more powerful role in human affairs that we care to admit. In the end, the rational explanations are always somewhat deficient. Truth has many faces, and moves about on four legs. The unconscious, primeval Unknown is always there in the background, driving us forward, just as a sleepwalker is animated and guided by an invisible hand.

Sometimes, there is no reason why this or that happens. Civilization is a veneer, a mask attached to the face of the trousered ape which is man; and when the mask falls off, the beast behind it is revealed in all his brutishness. And the beast is a sick, craven, and destructive thing, when exposed to the light of day. Each generation must nurture the gift of civilization, and pass it on, this precious gift, to ensure that the face of barbarism remains safely hidden away. And when society fails in this task, consequences must be paid. And paid in blood.

Towards the end of my time in Bosnia, we once interviewed a hard-bitten Croat who was describing his supposed knowledge of a mass grave near the Bosnian border. He chain smoked, as most did, throughout the interview. Towards the end of the interview, and his spewing the usual anti-Serb litany, he leaned back in his chair, took a long drag on his cigarette, and squinted at me though narrow and cunning peasant eyes. They were afire with a mixture of scorn and undisguised vindictiveness. If I had encountered him in a combat zone and he had looked at me that way, I would have shot him without hesitation. But there was something else. There was despair in those eyes as well: beneath the animal, rat-like hostility, there was the forlorn look of the man who had lost his soul. The look of someone who knew, deep down, that everyone loathed him.

He said to me, through the translator, “I know what you’re thinking. And maybe I’ve said too much. But let me tell you that you have no right to judge me. You would have done the same things I did in my situation. You don’t know anything about me.”

I glared back at him, this slithery bastard. I wanted to tell him something he would remember for a long time.

“No”, I said slowly, “you don’t know what I’m thinking. You don’t know anything about me. But let me tell you: I will not allow you to give me your hatred. I refuse to take it from you. So you can take it back. All of it. You are not rich enough to give it to me."

Then he put down his cigarette, lowered his head, and was silent.

American Masculinity Is Based On Female Approval

July 14, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

In 1963, radical liberal Betty Freidan released an earth-shattering book named the "The Feminine Mystique." In it, she talks of the "problem that has no name," referring to the supposedly stultifying confines of middle-class and white womanhood. In this terrifying maelstrom of oppression and misogyny, women were forced to be little more than a wife and mother. Freidan thought women needed independent income streams in order to smash this retrograde, oppressive construct. She also urged women to smash the foundations of femininity – encouraging rebellion against female norms and creating new norms for women to follow.

This book is credited for kicking off second-wave feminism. Women began to take jobs that men once had (doctors, managers, lawyers, etc.), divorced their husbands, and began to live lives without a boyfriend or husband. The giddy beginnings of second-wave feminism were far less hateful than some would suggest; it was not until women realized that financial independence and sexual independence were not quite the panacea that second-wave feminists promised that the knives came out.

Contrary to popular belief, early second-wave feminism was focused on legal systems of oppression as opposed to patriarchal modes of oppression based on gendered norms of male supremacy. If a feminist ever says she isn't a radical feminist and she is a fan of the theory that patriarchal ideas of male supremacy are what oppresses women – inform said person they are a radical feminist. Unlike black people, second-wave feminists got their legal changes enacted in flip of a switch, providing real evidence that we live a female-dominated society, not a male-dominated one.

These changes did little to solve women's "problem with no name." Instead of engaging in real levels of introspection as to their discontentment, they continued to blame society, but began to shift to radical politics that blamed men and patriarchy for their psychological issues. This dumping on men has been overwhelming documented by the manosphere, but let's segue into the burgeoning men's movement that developed alongside feminism.

Throughout the sixties and seventies it was mostly quiet. In the eighties, men's groups began to develop alongside the increasing misandry witnessed by prominent feminists that got reflected in the media – songs, movies, magazines, etc. The groups were heavily ridiculed by both men and women. Women complained that men had nothing to complain about as men – they were so blindingly privileged by being a man they could not see how good they had it.

In response to these sorts of ignorant opinions, Warren Farrell eventually broke from feminism and wrote his ground-breaking seminal work, "The Myth Of Power." It did not go over as bad as you might think it would, but many feminists can be savvy and saw the writing on the wall and began to stress intersectionality hard so other feminists would have to start checking their hateful critiques of black men, poor men and gay men.

[image]

An interesting book was penned around the same time as "The Myth of Male Power," called "Iron John" by Robert Bly. In it, Bly examines many cultures and their approaches to manhood and masculinity. He was roundly criticized for examining "backwards" cultures that were violent and patriarchal. He was also criticized for thinking that cultures that are "simple," in which gender roles are clear, are superior to those that are not. What Bly was stumbling towards, whether he realized it or not, was questioning the fundamental nature of a boy transitioning to a man and how society influences that.

Consider this article from the NYT. It speaks, fairly derisively, of the self-styled "Male Identity Crisis." It isn't a fair article, but not bad at all considering it was originally published in 1994. It does a good job of presenting one the issues facing masculinity: its supreme mis-characterization in the media.

A man's masculinity doesn't flow from within but from without by authority figures in society. This picture represents that. Bushmaster's campaign was wildly misunderstood – even in the manosphere. This poster isn't about violent masculinity, promoting guns or misandric interpretations of men, but about that fact an authority figure in the media claims to be able to restore a man's sense of masculinity.

Further, it isn't just a claim, it is died-in-wool truth for most men – none of whom have taken the red-pill. Modern masculinity is based not a performance as feminists would claim, but based on men taught that their self-concept of masculinity should be based on approval from authority figures – at the home, in the media and women.

Consider Dr. Robert Glover's book, "No More Mister Nice Guy." In it, he notes the proliferation of single-mother homes and female dominated schools has completely blunted the positive growth of men. While he doesn't explicitly say it, I think the best working definition masculinity would be a man who feels no shame or guilt for being a man. Without having fathers around to develop positive relationships with, boys are often adrift in their life with no masculine figure to secure their positive growth to. Then these boys go to schools dominated by women and centered around girl's strengths. Boys are labeled troublemakers, listless and problems if they refuse to kowtow to the prevailing zeitgeist.

They also have to deal with the female-centric media leviathan. Many TV shows simply show male inferiors in juxtaposition with female achievers – all in the name of equality, of course. Many shows simply show soft men who spend their time being overly kind, deferential to women and supremely comfortable with expressing emotions—all the while to adoring female approval. The point of this media isn't to help boys develop into healthy men, but to shore up girls self-esteem and encourage them to willing and capable cogs in society. Further, it fuels female delusion about how they really treat men; the media exists to help women paper over their mistreatment of men.

This dynamic set up forces a boy, maturing to a man, to rely heavily on female approval for his sense of "masculinity" to in order have self-esteem. The authority figures in his early life are mothers and female relatives. Boys go to school where the authority figures are women. This bleeds into the transition to adolescence as the new authority figures become the girls that boys become sexually interested in. We see this very immature behavior towards girls many boys take—needlessly worshipful, suborning their lives to them and general behavior that is classified as beta. Authority figures in media reinforce this dynamic. Boys and men are told that being nice, respectful and open with women will lead to love and happiness for men. Feminist-aimed media takes the issue farther, blaming men for being men, stridently criticizing them ways calculated to make men feel guilt for existing as a male.

We see these soft men often trying to do is reconcile their upbringing with the reality of female sexuality. Unable to properly value themselves as men separate from female approval, they double down on a system born out of boyhood that is not appropriate for manhood. Like any other psychological issue, such supplication served a boy well in his female-dominated childhood, but does nothing to help him as a man.

Ernest W. Adams

Even feminists recognize this phenomenon. What isn't surprising is that they fall back on what they did to create this problem: problematize masculinity and its inherent socially constructed failure, then remedy it through shaming and guilt while reinforcing the need for female (feminist) approval to be a real man. The article has some very pointed things to say about men, using examples of individual men's behavior to paint a broad picture about men as a class. Essentialism never sounds so good to a feminist as when it applies against men.

His working theory is that all boys grow up hating women and that hatred signifies immaturity. Right out the gate, this hypothesis is false. However, as is usual with anything liberal or feminist, it has its roots in complete falsehood. He needs to prove that all men hate women at some point in their life and the reason some men seemingly hate women is they have not learned the appropriate social comportment. This is incorrect, as children are born as narcissists and their growth into adulthood is marked by their shedding of this self-absorption. Still, Adam's approach reeks of the typical interventionist type of feminist who feels the strong need to insert themselves into discussions about which they have no idea.

He presents the example of a man freaking out over a woman beating him in a game. First, he is assuming said man is doing so because she is a woman. Second, he neglects to mention many women – feminists – take great pride in besting men because they are men (female supremacism). As usual, it is just projection. Third, he ignores women who don't sexualize men they feel superior to—a man's anxiety over a woman besting him is understandable. Doubt he would know that though because this man clearly never has had consensual sex.

Telling men to treat women better will do little to change men who choose to hurt women. The article even mentions "anti-social" behavior as part of the impetus for men to behave in such a way. Telling anti-social men to behave in a certain way society demands is mindbogglingly ignorant because the definition anti-social behavior is that which expressly bucks social norms.

Further, it completely misrepresents men and masculinity. When I talked earlier of radical feminism bleeding into mainstream feminism, this article reflects that. Such strident and vociferous critiques of men can only spill from the ink pens of radical feminists – the complete devaluing of men while simultaneously pretending to offer the salve to save men from their misogynistic masculinity. Once again, the supreme ignorance of feminists bleeds through as Adams cannot even conceptualize of a male that does not care about social rules or anybody else. If he even admits that, he would chalk it up to misogyny, patriarchy or homophobia – whatever left-wing boogeyman he most recently got hard-on over. Most importantly, he cannot conceive of a man who can think for and value himself independent of female approval.

Consider the tone of the article. It reeks of a supreme air of arrogance only a completely delusional beta would have. He uses strong male shaming tactics in order to command men to stop engaging in hateful “gendered” behavior. Unwittingly, he makes a so-called patriarchal argument that men need to be successful, confident and live outside their parent’s home in order to be considered real men. What he doesn’t realize is these are markers of male marriageability based on “heteropatriachal” norms. He also calls for men to be better role models for boys. What a great idea – how about stop kicking men out of their homes via divorce courts, stop fueling the single-mother epidemic and start educating the public on the supreme importance of fatherhood. He would never criticize said institutions or women, as he knows his place in the hierarchy – his ideas, approaches and existence are completely suborned to women at large.

By writing this, he reinforces male subornation to female approval, as the reason he wrote it was to get female approval via comments, likes and retweets. He is fulfilling his role as a man whose masculinity is approved of by authority figures—in his life, women are the primary authority figures. He thinks he is ripping up gender roles and radically transforming society through his feminism. He isn’t.

All he desires is to toss out “patriarchal” and “misogynistic” markers for masculinity and replace them with ones that feminists would approve of. He isn’t changing the fundamental psychology here, he is just demanding a new set of even more female-friendly norms for male behavior. His new standards reinforce the idea that men need to have their self-concept of masculinity based out of female approval. His dogged insistence that men have it so much better than women is his way of justifying and papering over his own lack of true masculinity.

Since his sense of masculinity is wholly contingent upon female approval, he exists in a terrifying world than any single misstep of his could result in the crumbling of his identity by women withdrawing approval. He pushes hatred of men so hard because he knows it is the only way he has to not collapse into deep depression. Subconsciously, he knows how fickle female approval and any single act by him could result said approval being withdrawn with extreme prejudice.

It will be a cold day in Hell if any boy who has grown up in modern American believe men, collectively, have the power. Even when fathers are around, they are often betas who are subject to our narcissistic sexual hierarchy. Telling boys that men they will never be, meet or have their needs considered by is completely delusional. Men like him rapidly oppose the MRM precisely because he is terrified of men existing without female approval. He knows that learning to be self-sufficient, confident and masculine is something he could never do. So, he shames men for desiring to bond with other men, make them feel guilt for establishing male-only spaces—even if they are just to play video games. Men like him want men subject to eternal watchful of eye of the superior woman so he can grow into a better man. Of course, she is superior only because women are oppressed in society and the oppressed always have greater insight than the oppressors.

He really likes the idea of careful management of male behavior so as to produce a better beta. He is seeking men who will step off their "male privilege" into a world of equality with women, which requires rigorous standards, constant surveillance and incessant policing—all in the name of equality, of course.

This whole situation reeks of narcissism and codependency. Narcissistic women, who can't live out their grandiose hypergamic visions, resort to draining codependent beta males who have been masterfully trained in the modern art of slaking modern female's narcissistic thirst. The poorly socialized beta males take like a duck to water to this situation, as it is all they have ever known. Accusations of misogyny, sexism or not being a real man all reinforce that. Ultimately, what the accusers are seeking is male worship. Unable to properly value themselves without narcissism, they desperately need beta male adoration. They can always find it, but slaking narcissistic thirst outright is never enough. It constantly needs new victims to drain, which is why feminists demand more men become feminists—so they can prey on them as an object to be used and discard, not as a person.

Re-imaging masculinity in our post-feminist world is little more than further twisting men's arms in order to become better objects in the greater game of female self-delusion.

Disregard White Women, Acquire Currency

July 14, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Thanks to the push that modern society has given, middle class white women are far too entitled to be on the receiving end of the term “fuck bitches get money,” but the concept of disregarding them and acquiring more currency remains the same. If you deal with white women less, you will in fact have more money, which in turn will translate to more nights out and more bangs. And while yes, this is technically racist, it’s only racist thanks to the social norms that white women have developed, such as getting white girl wasted.

I realize some of you are going to want some more solid evidence as to why the once favored white women is now being destined to be avoided. As such I have prepared plenty of information.

For starters, the whole reason I made this discovery was from a recent venture to the bar with a young black woman whom regularly participates at my gym. Before you panic, this event triggered my response of past experiences with women of other races, so this was not a single isolated incident, but it was however the one incident that opened my eyes. The entire night out drinking with her not once was there even the suggestion of me buying her anything. Upon my recollection I realized that no woman of any other race other than white has ever expected me to buy her jack shit. While being smart enough to realize that cardinal rule number one is to never buy women anything, it’s pretty convenient when you don’t end up in a situation of “buy me this drink or I’ll go whore myself off to another guy.” Plain and simple, no other race, other than white women, have a false sense of entitlement to go along with their acts.

Shit White Women Expect

I decided to compile a list of stupid shit white women have decided they are entitled to over the years for doing absolutely nothing more than consuming the contaminated oxygen that I need to huff for survival.

Jobs

With a solid 2.0 barely graduated from college after 2 stints in tech school on academic leave, they believe they should be hired immediately for a $65,000 a year jobs to afford Coach purses and jeans that don't fit the shape of their generally flat asses.

Free drinks for life

Thanks to the moronic nature of beta college students and desperate 40 year old men everywhere, a breeding ground of free drinks every night of the week for drunken white sluts has spread across this nation, and for it, they will drink for free until they get knocked up, which is usually around age 26.

Anything they want on a date

Dating the average white female will require deep pocket books because they will never pay for a damn thing if they have it their way. You are the man and she is the woman, and after all that means you have to buy her shit for herself while she spends her own money on well, herself.

Things Other Women From Other Races Won't Expect From You

This is pretty simple, it's all of the above. Women of other races tend to have too much knowledge of reality and pride to expect that another man is going to just open his wallet and start handing shit out for free. If anything, you as a man are more likely to benefit from items being purchased for you from women of other races. If you're not a fan of a woman baking you a cake, sucking your dick, and then buying you drinks all night at the bar then you should probably leave this website now because they have a term for that, it’s called King.

While it’s a well known fact that women are commonly desired for “showing affection” in LTR’s, Latin women are fore for passionate all around. In fact there are women of plenty of other races besides white that stay more youthful, physically fit and passionate than white women. So why haven’t most men hopped off this train already? Because everyone’s always safe with Vanilla.

Why You Should Know Your Environment

July 15, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I've been beating the self-improvement drum here on the manosphere for some time now. From promoting the consistent questioning of what you bring to the table to outlining the need to build effortless attraction, the theme I've advocated for is clear: young men need to consistently identify their faults and, through doing so, take control over their own romantic futures.

Left out of this discussion, however, are a few crucial realities that relate to things that even those most devoted to the cause of self-improvement will find entirely out of their control. The first of the realities relates to our culture, which is inherently hostile to many of the goals sought by the self-improving male. The second and less well detailed reality relates to the mental state of those that so many of us seek to approach romantically.

As I put quite simply many months ago, many young American women are simply not alright in the head:

> The USA has long had the highest rates of mental illness in the world, but the latest reports on the extent of it are still pretty shocking: mental illness struck one in five U.S. adults in 2010.
> Among the highlights, people in the 50-plus age bracket had the lowest incidence of any mental illness (14.3%), while those ages 18 to 25 had the highest, at 29.9%. Women had higher rates than men: 23% versus 16.8%.
>
> When broken down by racial and ethnic groups, the highest rates of mental illness were seen among people who reported two or more races (25.4%), followed by whites (20.6%), blacks (19.7%), Native Americans or Alaska natives (18.7%), Hispanics (18.3%) and Asians (15.8%).
> This is an important story for American men looking to maintain perspective: at least a quarter of the women you run into at any given time are not going to be alright upstairs. When you take into consideration that the highly sought after 18-25 demographic has even higher illness rates and that many of > the mentally ill go undiagnosed, you could be looking at a vastly higher proportion of not-entirely-ok girls, possibly approaching 50%.

Alright, so that's been said. What does all of this mean for you?

1. Don't take girls too seriously.

Remember, if you're 18-25 then it is entirely possible that half of the women in your age group are operating with some sort of mental issue, and that means that for many of them odd, irrational behavior will be run-of-the-mill. Expect this behavior and take it in stride. Do not let it impact you.

Loading...

2. Don't get so down on yourself as a young guy.

You may think you're a loser because you get shot down by these girls more than you'd like, but this isn't always the case: you're often dealing with not-entirely-alright girls with illogical criteria.

This isn't an excuse, mind you. This doesn't mean that you aren't doing many things wrong and should stop examining and mercilessly eliminating your faults, but it does mean that you should never be too hard on yourself and must always be ready to chalk some losses up to the way of the world. Even the right moves can be the wrong moves in the eyes of someone who isn't mentally alright.

3. Don't try to argue or reason with them.

If you're 18-25, you will in many cases be dealing with someone who is fundamentally incapable of being reliably rational. You'll get nowhere playing by their rules, so play by your own. Don't get sucked into madness.

4. Take girls off the pedestal.

This is tough for young guys, but it has to be done. It should be made easier by the realization that many of the women men seek to place on unrealistic pedestals don't even have their own minds sorted properly, a fact that should clearly preclude them from receiving worship. This is just another reminder of what so many thirsty males forget time and time again: these women are just humans, imperfect beings like you and I. Nothing more, and nothing less.

5. Crazy works with crazy.

Dysfunctional treatment is often welcomed by dysfunctional people, and many of those with mental issues fit that bill. Since we've already established that a very large number of young women fit into that category, you should not be surprised to see so many of them respond positively to dysfunctional behavior.

It is not uncommon for young men to adopt some of these dysfunctional behaviors, find increased sexual/romantic success with their female peers as a result, and then feel guilty about it all. Such guilt is understandable (they don't like the fact that morally degraded versions of themselves are more appealing to girls in general than the men they actually prefer to be), but ultimately unnecessary—there is nothing a man can do about the female proclivity to welcome such behavior except adapt to it. It is the result of factors much bigger than him.

Self-improvement is important, but knowing your environment is crucial too. You can't help everyone, but you can help yourself to better deal with those around you.

The Second Most Influential Author Of The Manosphere

July 16, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Back in 2003, on the Nice Guy Forums, a user by the name of Bonecrcker cranked out a series of posts talking about the true state of American women, and disappeared never to return again. The Nice Guy community quickly took notice and added the posts to their forum's "Best Of" section (which I can no longer find), so it seems the only place where one can find a fully preserved Book of Bonecrcker is over at the NO MA'AM blog.

To call this guy influential is an understatement – he was a solid decade ahead of his time. He's also one of the most radical writers on women I've ever read. More radical than Roosh or Roissy. The manosphere consists of two parts – it's dark side and light side, where the light side is focused on self-improvement and progress and the dark side is focused on biting criticism and harsh exposure to the nature and reality of women. The light side's biggest influences comes from Pook, but the dark side's biggest influences come from Bonecrcker.

Without further ado, let's examine some Bonecrcker passages. Keep in mind, I'm posting more than what you can read in just one sitting. I'm showing you a smattering of passages for you to pick and choose through right now.

Bonecrker #10 — Women Choosing Scum:

> There are two reasons women go after scum… the one they tell themselves and the one that's true.
> The one they tell themselves has to do with the archetype of redemption. Love redeems all things. To a woman, love redeeming a bad man proves the love is real (too bad their love ain't real, lol). Also, a man who treats everyone poorly but herself, must really love her. This is the biggest crock of bull-ony… but exploiting > this sick, sad, self-deception will account for 90% of your free pussy if you live in the US.

> Unfortunately, the real reason women dig bad/low quality men is they are bad/low quality themselves. These men have attitudes and behaviours that match their own.
> Excitement is supposed to come from risk-taking behaviours that men like to engage in to have fun. But women find bad behavior exciting instead. It's normal for women to be attracted to men that like sky-diving, mountain climbing, and going off on adventures at the spur of the moment. It's abnormal for women to be attracted to men that like to beat women, have been in jail, and take drugs. But that's exactly what's going on today. All of the losers have all the women they can deal with (hehe, but evil people are bad for you….both ways), while all of the real men do without.

BoneCrcker #5 — Women Choosing Losers:

> All women say they want a dominant, successful, high status man with enlightened values. It is extremely easy to identify where a man is in the pecking order; by his job, by his dress, by the way he talks and acts and by the way other men treat him. Everyone knows where a man stands.
> This includes women, who could easily snap up a man like this who freely advertises if he is available or not.
> The problem is that almost no women actually follow through with this behavior. Dominant, successful, high status men with enlightened values are regularly passed up for dangerous, weak, emotionally unstable drug dealers with bad BO and a rap sheet as long as my arm. The younger and more attractive a woman is, the more likely she is to ignore the good men and screw as many of the bad men as she can get her hands on. Not all women do this. Some screw as many fraternity brothers as they can handle a night, just as long as they are drunk/high and treat her like dirt. Any man who doesn't act this way is labelled a loser, no matter how high status or macho. It's hilarious, and deeply, deeply sick.
> Then, when a woman reaches about age 25, she starts to hunt for a man who is both wealthy and weak willed. Both qualities are very important, because her sole purpose for hunting this man is to attach herself vampire-like onto him and drain him for all he is worth. They continue to screw bad men during the entire marriage. Strong willed men quickly say no to this crapola and move on to the next woman. After a while, they start to wonder if all women are vampires trying to trick them into a bad situation. Certainly they don't meet anyone who actually cares for him and sincerely wants to be his wife.
> Many of our country's most powerful men are either unmarried, taken to the cleaners by divorce, or are stuck in a marriage that is an obvious lie, often > making up for it with dishonourable behaviour. A perfect example of this is Bill Clinton. His wife is an obvious lesbian who only married him because he was going places and could further her own political ambitions (the pay off isn't always in money, lol).

> I'm tempted to say that American women are unable to recognize signs of status, power and high quality in men. But it's not true. They know full well what the deal is and purposefully choose the weak, psychotic, scum of the earth until they want a meal ticket.

Bonecrcker #6 – Women Choosing Extinction:

> I just downloaded the book, If Men Have All The Power, How Come Women Make The Rules? Excellent book, BTW. It's filled with all sorts of interesting information.
> Here's a quote that got me to thinking (originally from The Woman That Never Evolved, by Sarah Blaffer Hardy):
> "The central organizing principle of primate social life is competition between females and especially female lineages… Females should be, if anything, more competitive than males, not less, although the manner in which females compete may be less direct, less boisterous, and hence, more difficult to measure."
> Normally, women compete fiercely amongst each other for men. Unlike animals, human children take a looooooong time to mature and our most powerful survival ability (our mind) takes significant effort to train and develop. Before the modern era, any woman stupid enough to take a weak, deviant man, who left after sex… died. At the very least, her child had slim to none survival value. Her lineage died out. Normally, women compete for the best men, that competition being intense when they are scarce. One thing they don't do is willingly have sex with an inappropriate man, unless there absolutely isn't anyone else. Men also compete for the best women. Or rather, for the status among our peers that attracts the best women. However, since we don't actually have to bear the children, that competition isn't as fierce. Survival of our line has less to do with > who we choose and more to do with what we do. We (men) compete in who does things best. Women compete in who can get the best man. Men have the option of leaving. A woman who left usually died. That's the way it's always been and the way it should be.

> But American women aren't normal. They have absolutely stopped competing for good men. They go out of their way to devalue them. They freely engage in behaviors that result in the extinction of their lineage. They leave. They refuse to raise their children. They engage in infidelity. They choose disposable partners based on deviant behavior. The reason why women seem to be so scarce is not because they have made themselves unavailable but because they have ceased having any interest whatsoever in extending their female lineage to the next generation. There is a natural consequence for that… extinction. The children of these women grow up powerless and feral, with increasingly lower status. Eventually, their lines will disappear.
> The question we should be asking ourselves is, are we a valuable prize that would normally be fiercely competed over? If you are healthy, strong, successful, educated and have values that would promote the well being of a family, then that answer is yes. We have been lied to, repeatedly and in a systematic manner. What is interesting is what might happen if you left our abnormal women and went someplace where the women are desperately competing with each other for the best men. Especially if most of the men who live there don't have these traits. You might come away with a different opinion of where you are in the pecking order.
> Food for thought.

Bonecrcker #2 – Local vs. Foreign Women:

Any questions?

Men and women are two sides of the same coin. Without each other, there can be no fulfillment and no peace of mind. Together, there is*life*. This is the way it has been since the very beginning. It is an active thing, not a passive one. It's not enough for the people to just show up in each others lives. Each of you needs to actively love the other.

Many American men are willing to do this. Almost all American women are not. To make matters worse, these women do not value the men who are willing to love them. Instead, they value the men who couldn't give a shit about anything. He gets laid constantly and gives nothing to anyone (even himself). Since this type of man is good for nothing and is often a criminal, the last thing he is interested in or is capable of is taking care of a woman or a family. Women are also like this themselves, but pretend they are not. That pretending often extends towards making a phoney marriage and having several children she has no intention of putting any effort into raising. Most of the time, the point of the marriage is to manipulate the system into fleecing a good man of all his possessions…..rinse, repeat, until she gets too old.

This is not normal. For whatever reason, it is a problem endemic to westernized countries but is worst in the US, where our laws seriously enable these behaviours.

What many American men are figuring out though is they don't have to put up with this. By understanding the problem and its various aspects and, most importantly, the actual depth of the problem, he can avoid most of it, even fight back. The biggest obstacle though, is he is incomplete without a legitimate love in his life. American women use this fact as their greatest source of sinister > manipulation. They will dangle the image of this in front of you constantly but never, ever give it to you. The reason is simple: they can't. Because they can't, they are completely unacceptable as anything but a casual sexual fling. But one that is constantly trying to do you harm, requiring extreme vigilance and protective measures. Hopping from one loser to the next, in the vain hope that the next one might not be like this is a depressing way to live. Rather than find a rare jewel, most men simply give up after a while and retire from "the game".

> Loading...
> Most men don't know that this is abnormal. They think all women are like this and have always been this way. That's a dirty lie. A lie that women in this country foster in an attempt to keep men from looking around. It turns out, that things were never like this for our grandfathers and great grandfathers. It's a recent problem. More importantly, it's a localized one.
> In large chunks of the world, women aren't like this. They are the way they are supposed to be. If you bond with one and then love them, they will love you back. Although this is only the bare *minimum*needed for a good marriage and a good life, it changes things*dramatically*.
> This means that it is a good idea to date a number of women from these places. Because you will find a jewel there eventually. No matter what, you will find a large pool of women who are sincere in their attempts to be with you. Some of these women will be sexually promiscuous. Some of them will be nuns. Most will be somewhere in between. Luckily, sincerely loving women will be common, no matter what she is like elsewise.....because it's a seperate issue. If you want a nun or a tart, a schoolteacher, a welfare mom or a doctor, you will find someone sincere. Since you will also find the occassional evil person mixed in, you must learn to tell the difference. But the odds are stacked in your favour.
> That just doesn't exist in the US anymore (but it was once the rule, not the exception).

Bonecrcker #23 – Bad Boys vs. Alphas:

> "Badboys" are pussies, not alpha males. The easiest way to tell if a man is alpha is to observe if he has the respect and cooperation of other men, especially other men in general (i.e. he has power and respect in society, not just socially). You very rarely see a "badboy" meet these criteria. When you do, it's usually an alpha fooling around to get laid.
> Alpha males don't usually get the chicks. They get the best chick and she tends to stick around and beat the shit out of any other girls who come around.
> The multiple sex partner thing is the omega male's gig. You usually see all sorts of deviant behavior going on in addition to this. Although he is getting laid, he is powerless in relationships as well as every other aspect of his life. No one > respects him, not even the psycho chicks who screw him.

> Alpha's get snapped up quickly. Beta males screw a lot early in life while women are competing over them, and then settle down. Omegas can't form stable relationships. And Zeta males rarely get laid. Most people are betas.
> Humans aren't apes. We have a different mating strategy than them. Women compete for the best man they can get (at a very young age) and then stick with him for life. He sometimes cheats, but not to reproduce. She never cheats. Everyone pairs up. Whenever you see people straying from this paradigm, fucked-upness starts to happen. This is what is happening with women. They are becoming more and more omega. Their clustering around these men is not a normal thing, which is why it is so fucked up in all other ways.

Bonecrcker #11 – Women and Racism:

> In my experience, racism plays a big part of what's going on with American women. Several times I have met women whose attraction to men is race based… the more negatively stereotyped, the better. Behind their back, they use racial slurs, even when talking about their partner. You talk to them and it becomes clear that they have strong racist views, usually negative. They are chasing bad men and the racist views colors these men as bad. So, they go after them. It's a complicated issue, and one that women will test you on to see if you will accept it from them.
> For example, there was one stripper I knew. For awhile, she was sizing me up as a potential man. One day, out of the blue, she says this to me, "I've been with a lot of black boys." "Do you think less of me?" My answer to her at the time was, "Of course not."
> But that was the wrong answer. My answer should have been yes. There are > several reasons. First of all, she is testing me, not looking for reassurance of her worth. She wants to see if I will accept her in a devalued state. If the answer to that is yes, she loses interest (she did lol) and, at the same time, goes hog wild in the process of devaluing herself further. On the surface, she wants to know if I'm racist. But what she is really saying is she is racist, and a whore to boot. What's behind her statement is several years of screwing black men, but only from the criminal class of society. She did this in exchange for money and drugs. Certainly she would have no interest in a black man in a 3-piece suit and a law degree. Part of the manipulation has to do with what she means by "black boys." She means black men from the criminal class of society. But, phrasing it this way is a trap. If you say it devalues her, it seems like something racist (being with black guys devalues you) but, it's the having sex with men from the criminal class that devalues her. If you say no to this sort of behavior, it implies that you are racist. You'll see a lot of manipulation along these lines in society, especially with women. They want you to accept deviant behavior by associating it to minorities. Reject the behavior and they act as if you rejected the minority.

> You will see this pattern repeatedly with American women… multiple minority partners, sometimes multiple children of mixed racial background. The big lie is that inter-racial couples are now accepted, so people feel free to get together with those they like. But the truth is that racism and fucked-upness are behind most of these relationships (white men with black women; seem to me to be the exception). Look for extreme racist views in one or both of the partners (should be the LAST thing in an inter-racial couple), a history of trading sex for money and drugs, and multiple one night stands, often resulting in children. Like any good lie, there is always a grain of truth in the center to give it credibility. There are lots of legitimate inter-racial marriages. You can tell the legitimate ones by their stability, high degree of education of both partners, and successful career the man has.
> Racist views of women are a part of what's going on.

Bonecrcker #94 – Evil, Not Power, Is The Defining Attribute Of Women's Attraction Toward Deviant Men:

> Women aren't attracted to alpha males and they most certainly have no fear of men. Our society, on every level, goes out of its way to protect them. For most men, harming a woman is taboo.
> What a woman wants from a man isn't for him to be powerful. If this was true than large, strong, rich men with high IQs would be overrun with pussy. Sadly, this isn't the case. At best, a woman looks for a man like this who is easily manipulated (a rare find) so that she can feed off him during the last stages of her self-destruction. But what women go after with zeal and verve are the losers of our society…..uneducated, drug-using, criminal scum. Are these men > powerful? Absolutely not. That's why they stab you in the back but wouldn't dare face you man to man. It's also why they are complete failures in life…..they are weak beyond belief. But, other than being weak these bozos have one thing in common…..they are all evil. And it is that evil that attracts women.

> Evil, not power, is the defining attribute of women's attraction toward deviant men.

Bonecrcker #31 – Women Are Sick

> Women are sick. They are mentally ill. One of the characteristics of mental illness is stereotyping. What that means is that one woman is sick in exactly the same way as another. You see the same patterns over and over again.
> Our culture is involved in a complex scam trying to cover up this situation, particularly from young men. The worst case scenario is the totally oblivious guy who gets himself into a bad situation. However, most guys know something is wrong, but just can't put their finger on it because of the brainwashing. At first, they figure they just met some wacko and then try again. When the next one turns out just the same, they start to investigate if something is wrong with themselves (pleeeennnty of asshole relationship experts are willing to feed this). After awhile they come to the amazing conclusion that, yes, something is wrong with the entire female population. But they only know that something is wrong. And they don't know that "something" can be mapped out and understood.
> Every time we examine a case, we learn a little more about the specifics of that "something". Understanding the nature of a thing gives you power over it. Because humans have free will and exercise it in every single facet of our existence, you can never change another. Only they can change themselves, and only by choosing to do so, with no influence possible from anyone or anything. However, that doesn't mean you can't get things you need from them or have to put up with their bullshit. Understanding that "something" gives you vital information on how to 1) get what you want and need from women and 2) how to prevent them from causing you undue hardship.
> It's not simple, but it is understandable, reliable and effective.

As you can see, Bonecrcker wrote on a wide variety of subjects related to a man's life in America, and touches upon things that are only recently being discovered. For example, the fact that 25% of American women are mentally ill – Bonecrcker noticed this back in 2003! There are an abnormally large number of women who are dangerous and you should take steps to protect yourself from them.

Bonecrcker touches upon how American women are mostly worthless, and that a man today can only use American women for sex without seriously endangering himself in any way. He plainly states that women's mating preferences aren't normal, something I think most American men subconsciously understand, even if they cannot articulate it. Bonecrcker may have been one of the first to touch upon how women use ad-hominem shaming language to get men to conform.

The above work belongs to what I would call a powerful thinker. Don't forget to read the rest of Bonecrcker here.

Need A Push At The Gym? Try Creatine

July 16, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Background

Creatine monohydrate is one of the most widely-researched exercise supplements in existence. This chemical, which is also produced naturally in the body and supplemented through diet, acts on skeletal muscle cells allowing them to synthesize more ATP during times of stress.

An exhaustive review of the wealth of research done with creatine is beyond the scope of this post, but Examine.com has an excellent compilation of these studies and their findings. The short version? Creatine monohydrate supplementation is associated with myriad benefits involving the brain, skeletal system, cardiovascular system, endocrine system, cognition, and other areas. Even better, the supplement is incredibly cheap; you can get a 4-month supply for about $22.

If you mention to non-weight lifters that you are trying creatine, the first reaction is likely to be negative. You'll often hear "Isn't that some kind of steroid?" or "Doesn't that kill your kidneys?" Disregard this ignorance. The safety and efficacy of creatine is backed up by over 20 years of clinical science, as well as innumerable observations and self-report testimonials. Any social stigma to using this supplement is based on unfounded anti bro-science, but who cares? If it helps you at the gym, you should do it. I came to this conclusion myself and started taking it a couple of months ago.

Loading…

My Experience

I started with creatine during a lowered-weight week and loaded 10-15g for 10 days before returning to my normal program while taking the recommended 5g daily dose. I consume lots of red meat and eggs in my normal diet, so I suspected my endogenous creative levels were naturally higher. I was skeptical that there would be noticeable differences in my workout. I was wrong. Here are a few things I observed:

1. Measurably increased strength: I noticed quick improvement in calculated one-rep max (10-15 lbs for squats and deadlift a week after beginning supplementation). The initial reps in my sets still seemed difficult, but there was always more left in the tank to pound out an extra rep or two.

2. Mild cognitive enhancements: I was a bit more energetic and focused throughout the day. I noticed this more when I was first started taking it. I would put the effect size around half a cup of coffee.

3. Minimal side effects — Some people report sizeable water weight gains and an overall look of "puffiness," but I only gained about 2 lbs on a 180-pound frame.

4. Slight increase in thirstiness – I found myself craving more water. Most proponents of creatine recommend staying well-hydrated, though alarmist claims about organ damage are completely unsubstantiated for healthy individuals.

There is no established need to cycle on and off creatine, but the chemical is recruited most when lifting heavy weight to failure. Thus, it may make sense to use it only during periods of lifting heavy weight at lower reps.

If you’re looking for an extra push to reach your strength goals and get more out of your training, few choices beat creatine. It is one of the few supplements available that fulfills the trifecta of being cheap, safe, and effective.

Flowers For Algernon

July 16, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In this book, a retarded man enlists in an experimental program to make him smarter after trials were successfully done on rats. The story is told in the first person through his prognosis reports, where we see the effects of his IQ jumping from 70 to 180. He shares his realizations as his intelligence increases:

> I think it's a good thing about finding out how everybody laughs at me. I thought about it a lot. It's because I'm so dumb and I don't even know when I'm doing something dumb. People think it's funny when a dumb person can't do things the same way they can.
> Most of them felt the way Joe and Frank and Gimpy did. It had been all right as long they could laugh at me and appear clever at my expense, but now they were feeling inferior to the moron. I began to see that by my astonishing growth I had made them shrink and emphasized their inadequacies. I had betrayed them, and they hated me for it.
> I don't know. I'm like an animal who's been locked out of his nice, safe cage.

His emotional intelligence is lagging behind that of his intellect, causing a lot of problems in his relations with people. There is a red pill element to this book as the protagonist, Charlie, makes his way out of the cave and into the light.

> "Just that you've come a long way kind of fast," he said. "You've got a superb mind now, intelligence that can't really be calculated, more knowledge absorbed by now than most people pick up in a long lifetime. But you're lopsided. You know things. You see things. But you haven't developed understanding, or— I have to use the word— tolerance. You call them phonies, but when did either of them ever claim to be perfect, or superhuman? They're ordinary people. You're the genius."
> Loading…

His intellect becomes so strong that he identifies a major flaw in the experiment that indicates his intelligence will degrade back to its starting point. His suspicion is confirmed when a rat used in the experiment, Algernon, starts to lose his intelligence. He realizes that there is now a clock ticking for him to get everything done while he still considers himself whole. I consider this a parable to life itself. Don't we all have clocks over our heads where we will be unable to do what we currently take for granted?

> What has happened to me? Why am I so alone in the world?
> No, you don't understand because it isn't happening to you, and no one can understand but me. I don't blame you. You've got your job to do, and your Ph.D. to get, and— oh, yes, don't tell me, I know you're in this largely out of love of humanity, but still you've got your life to live and we don't happen to belong on the same level. I passed your floor on the way up, and now I'm passing it on the way down, and I don't think I'll be taking this elevator again.

Charlie's decline was gripping because deep down you know it will happen to you in one way or another. If you're the sentimental type then don't read the end of this book while in public. Highly recommended.

All Women Have Sex Within 24 Hours Of Breaking Up With You

July 17, 2013 | by TheCaptainPower | Link | Original Link

As a young man in my late teens and early twenties, I used to make a common mistake of getting into super serious relationships. Although I had no intention of getting married, I treated each relationship like it was life long commitment.

As with all young couples, after several months of dating you start to think about all the "other" people that you can potentially bang, and you start to resent being stuck in a relationship.

Your girlfriend will eventually go on a girls' night out to "test the waters," and after several massive arguments, you will break up. The next 24 hours after breaking up are crucial. If you don't reconcile with your women, she will have sex with someone else within those 24 hours.

She doesn't even have to look for someone else to bang, because she was already talking to other people:

- She has other guy friends she grew up with.
- She talks to other men at work.
- She talks to men at school.

Some lucky bastard is going to be balls deep in your woman if you don't step to the plate up immediately.

This happened to me at 6 or 7 times (that I know of), and two of the affairs resulted in children. And don't take it personal, it's just a women's nature: they are breeders, they are nurturers, their bodies produce milk. Until they reach menopause, their bodies need a steady supply of penises for potential fertilization, and this urge is highest right after the emotional pain of breaking up with you.

If it’s not your penis, it will be someone else’s.

A Lesson In Storytelling

July 17, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

This post reminded me of a girl I went out with a few years ago. In response to an online opener I sent her, she wrote me a truly remarkable story that I've yet to see be duplicated by any girl. The way she wrote it was, simply put, the perfect way you should tell a story to any prospective girl you want to get. She made me want to go out with her regardless of her looks (to a point of course, and nonetheless she was still cute).

I opened her with something about where she would take me on a trip and what we would do. While my opener was — if I may say so myself — quite creative and witty, her response completely knocked it out of the park. It was very impressive on two fronts. First, the effort she put in was remarkable given it was an online interaction. Second, look at the details and the way she puts you in the environment and gives you an actual feel of what is going on. This is what you should incorporate in your dates as that ROK article I link above states. Most girls eat it up when you can relate a story that well.

Below is the girl's response to my opener. To put it in context, I mentioned she looked like she was drinking and I was stuck at work so she would have to plan the trip, and my profile says I travel a lot:

> First off, I'm not buzzed, because I know the trick of drinking a Gatorade to subside the alcohol.
> Next, my bags are already packed, and so were yours. I was going to kidnap you and take you out of town before your work got canceled because I have amazing vision (my father is an ophthalmologist) and I can drive us anywhere. And fast, nonetheless, because I've seen the autobahn and the actual BMW and Mercedes plants in Germany where the cars are manufactured, so I have experience racing. I also planned to drive so you could do the work in the car if you did have to work, and if you get carsick, I brought medicine to fix that. (However, I respect you working long hours because my career will make me do the same. So if you completely object, I would just bring you dinner for the long nights of which you'd be working).

But since I found out that you ruined the spontaneous plans, instead of getting mad, I'm thrilled. This means I can cancel our four-day trip to Vegas, and do something different. I picked Vegas initially because I knew it may be tough to pull you away from work, and only Vegas, bikinis, hot dresses and gambling would be the bait to lure you away from your office.

So, instead, I let you have some Vegas adventure, and we drive to Vegas just Thursday night. We gamble, I wear my hot dress that makes you happy I'm your girlfriend and not someone else's, I cross my fingers so you win big, then we go back to the hotel and have…. well that will have to wait for the actual thing because words wont be able to describe… and I'm classy in emails.

Then in the morning, we're off, because now I get to pick somewhere where we both will have an amazing time…the Southwest special flight to Colorado. Here your great vision can indulge the picturesque Rocky Mountains, because you probably haven't been because you're from the Big Apple, and the only tall picturesque monuments are the spectacular Skyscrapers.

Of course I will let you sit next to the window because you've never had the experience of flying over the 14 footers and I want you to see them. Once we arrive, I will have already arranged for a limo to pick us up and drive us to Vail, which is only two hours away, thus allowing us a long stay in Colorado.

Loading…
Since you're so adventurous, we will walk around Vail Village and see the authentic stores, but not go inside because we hate shopping. We will probably meet foreigners because so many come to work there, so it'll be like you're in one of the countries of which you've visited.

Then we will take the chair lift up the top of the mountain (this time of year the snow is melted and we can see the Spring blooming flowers and have a better view of the mountains). As we're going up, I'm holding your hand because I'm scared and you're telling me we're going to be ok (or visa versa, but because I like you, I let you think I'm the one that's afraid… and we never tell your friends you were).

Once we are at the top, we have a fabulous lunch, wine and we take pictures of us at the Many Mile High mark. We may have some fun of our own before we go down, though.

Once we come down, we find a fun bike path to bike around. We don't do too many hills because we're stuffed from lunch. But we both could because my pictures are accurate and I'm in good shape. Or if you don't like biking, we take a hike around. We could even do the Alpine Slide if you want. After, we go back > and get ready for dinner. You've picked out my outfit before we left so its whatever you've chosen. After dinner, we go back to the Jacuzzi at our hotel. The rest of the night is like the previous, amazing but the description must wait until the actual night.

> The next day we decide to take that limo to Golden, where we get a tour of the Coors Brewery. This was accomplished only because I had connections, because they no longer do any tours. After visiting Golden, and sampling the top brews, we go to Denver, where we get to watch the Lakers defeat the Nuggets. We stay at the Four Seasons because I have connections again, so we save money because we both work hard.
> Then we wake up early Sunday morning, have brunch, and if you're allergic to anything, I make sure brunch doesn't have it in the ingredients. Then we pack our bags and head back to . We have dinner at  before going back to the apartment. You wake up for work on Monday with a smile and having experienced commercialized fun and natural fun. When you get to work, you open your briefcase and there's something I've left inside to get you excited to come home early……the newest season of Law and Order. Then you lift it up with pure joy and find something else, that may create a distraction from Law and Order. A travel guide for our next trip. Then you lift that up and there's something soft and somewhat…. inappropriate for work. So you come home early to get it out of your office and I show you how it's used. Then you tell me I'm the best girlfriend ever. The end. [image]

Notice how she plays to a man's ideal woman (sex, bringing dinner, staying fit). If a female's ability to captivate a man's logic-based imagination works, as it did here on me, think of the flip side. Girls are seated in emotion; if you can take them on a journey with your words by telling them a powerful story, you are way ahead of the curve.

The Process Of Becoming Great With Women

July 17, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

It's easy to focus on the rewards of learning game and becoming great with women, to walk into a hotel bar, a nightclub or a wedding reception and odds are now greater in your favor of being able to pull a sexy girl out for a night of carnal passion. What's usually not focused on in the manosphere, is the process that a man goes through in his quest to become great with women.

> "The brick walls are there for a reason. The brick walls are not there to keep us out. The brick walls are there to give us a chance to show how badly we want something. Because the brick walls are there to stop the people who don't want it badly enough. They're there to stop the OTHER people."
> -Randy Pausch

I dare say gentlemen, that nothing is harder than becoming great with women. Standing at the top, it's easy for me to walk into a social setting, meet a beautiful girl and have her naked within minutes or hours. Do I pull every time? Of course not, but if I shared my actual success rate, you would be shocked and perhaps perturbed at my level of success. What you would be missing though, is the years of my life I invested in the pursuit of finding out exactly what works and what doesn't. As many of the Masters of Game can attest to, including Roosh, is that we invested a lot. Yes, the rewards are great, plentiful and I wouldn't trade my experiences for all the money in the world, however, the road to success is what was really important.

This is not a how-to article, nor is it a Top 10 tips article; instead it's my humble offer of encouragement to my fellow men in their quest for success with women.

Despite your ‘flaws’, shortcomings and personal lists of ‘failures’ that you may beat yourself up with on a daily basis, or perhaps do not, I’m rooting for each and every one of you to fulfill your personal goals with girls. Maybe you want to learn Game in order to meet a girl and eventually settle down, or you might be pursuant of the player lifestyle instead and desire to travel the world indulging yourself in various girls. Whatever your personal goals are, understand that it might not come easily. Understand that you will spend countless hours and many lonely nights in learning Game, but that only with experience, comes success in a CONSISTENT form.

A beautiful woman is the most desired of anything to a man, save the accumulation of money. I have yet to meet a straight man who does not desire the company of beautiful women more than anything, besides possibly money. And the ones who have mass quantities of wealth, focused their energy on making lots of money solely to pull the hottest girls.

Many of us in the manosphere are accused of hating women and thus we desire to exploit and dump them; however, nothing could be further from the truth. In fact it is BECAUSE I love women so much, that I write these articles and it’s because I know game is something that can be LEARNED, that I share my advice with you. It is hard, especially in the beginning; but it is not impossible.

The pursuit of women and the quest for success with Game is a noble pursuit and I commend you. You will be mocked, ridiculed and cajoled by status quo schmucks intent on drizzling their fears and inadequacies on anyone around them who are foolish enough to listen and adhere to their ‘advice’, but ignore them and carry on. Game helps you not only with girls, but in other arenas of life including business. Life without Game, isn’t life. Game sweetens life, it is the key to living a life that is worthy of a memoir that can inspire, entertain and teach, all at the same time.

Don’t be discouraged when that little tart at the grocery story shoots down your request for her phone number. Don’t be discouraged when at the very last moment the fake tits, peroxide bleach blond girl from the club allows her best friend to cockblock you. It’s all apart of the journey. Smile to yourself and know that one day you will be great at game.

Now go and do.

The Parable Of The Cordwainers

July 18, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

There exists a firm with only two employees, an artisan and a seller. The artisan is a master cordwainer, maker of fine leather footwear. Starting with tanned calfskins and leather soles, he puts everything together by hand. As the artisan crafts oxfords and derbies, the seller builds relationships with the proprietors of high end boutiques, where the shoes will be sold. He curates a website and conducts interviews with the press to build interest. He ensures that the shoes reach the right stores through the right channels, and that customers are satisfied with the product.

There is almost no overlap between the duties of the artisan and the duties of the seller. Sure, they are broadly familiar with what the other does. But both men are essential, and neither one can do the other's job. Because their roles are so focused, they have become experts at their own craft.

Fraternité

Each man is quick to admit how inept he is at the other's job. And it's a point of pride for them, because each man is confident in the other man's expertise. Each man is humble, because he recognizes that the other is indispensable. He has great respect for his colleague, because he cannot reproduce his craft. He rarely runs strategic decisions by the other, because his decisions in his own domain are trusted. If it ever came to it, the artisan, as the origin of the shoes, has final authority; the seller's skills are broadly transferable to another cordwainer, or even another craft entirely – his transience means lets him choose a creator whose vision he endorses. But there is little acrimony and much mutual dependence and devolution.

To be sure, there are aspects of the job that they don't like. But there is no squabbling about who will clean the workshop or who will deal with angry customers – it's obvious who must do what. If ever there is a question, it's quickly settled, because this division of roles has been so successful in the past; they are anxious to restore order and assign obligations to one man or the other. Sovereignty and responsibility are in a fine balance, and each man's creative freedom is maximized.

Egalité

There exists another cordwaining duo, where both men fill both roles, of artisan and seller. In theory, this should be an efficient setup – when orders climb too high, both men will make shoes to meet the demand; at trade fairs, both will canvas the room to drum up business for their firm.

Loading...

The reality is not so rosy. They bicker incessantly over the right designs, over which direction to take the product. One wants to go avant-garde, and the other wants to go traditional. One wants to sell in low volume at high end stores, while the other wants to go in a more mass-market direction, and even outsource some of the work. Each one is involved in deciding, with each decision made by committee. From design to manufacture to distribution, every aspect of the business is a cause for dispute.

If their enterprise had corporate overlords, those overlords might decide to lay off one of the men, to cut off a head on a two-headed snake as it were. The product would still get made and sold with just one man on the payroll, after all. His sameness makes him eminently disposable, leading him to bemoan in quiet the ‘disposability of men.’ He knows he is interchangeable, and it corrodes his confidence. Superfluity erodes his humanity, and he succumbs to ennui. Each man thinks to himself, “I do all the real work.” That “the business would be so much better off if I had all the power.” “My partner is good for nothing – I don’t even need a partner!”

Yet each man is secretly scared of settling into a distinct role. He fears he will fail, so he contents himself with indecision, with a foot on each side; whenever he fails at one role, he tells himself his true prowess lies in the other, a little shell game he plays in his mind.

Each man is emasculated and encroached upon by the other, and feels he has many obligations but few freedoms. The men constantly undermine one another. And it is precisely their sameness that makes them chafe at and despise one another. Yet each secretly wishes the other would seize control, and take responsibility for the future of the firm. Yet when presented with the prospect of division of roles, both come together and snarl in disdain, confident that complementarity is a fate worse than death.

From Dictatorship To Democracy

July 18, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This book offers a regressive analysis of how dictatorships have collapsed, giving a general blueprint for how to bring one down and transform it into a democracy. The key word is "general," because there are almost no action items. Instead, it gives the theoretical means of destroying dictatorships (the author himself has not taken part in fighting against a dictator). This fact is made obvious by passages such as this:

> The use of a considerable number of [anti-dictatorship] methods —- carefully chosen, applied persistently and on a large scale, wielded in the context of a wise strategy and appropriate tactics by trained civilians — is likely to cause any illegitimate regime severe problems. This applies to all dictatorships.

Spoken like a true keyboard jockey. Nonetheless, the book does share some useful ideas:

> Violent rebellions can trigger brutal repression that frequently leaves the populace more helpless than before.
> […]
> When conventional military rebellion is recognized as unrealistic, some dissidents then favor guerrilla warfare. However, guerrilla warfare rarely, if ever, benefits the oppressed population or ushers in a democracy.
> A halt to resistance rarely brings reduced repression. Once the restraining force of internal and international opposition has been removed, dictators may even make their oppression and violence more brutal than before. The collapse of popular resistance often removes the countervailing force that has limited the control and brutality of the dictatorship.
> Resistance, not negotiations, is essential for change in conflicts where fundamental issues are at stake. In nearly all cases, resistance must continue to drive dictators out of power.
> […]
> Nonviolent discipline is a key to success and must be maintained despite > provocations and brutalities by the dictators and their agents.

>
> Loading…
> […]
> …skillful, disciplined, and persistent use of political defiance may result in more and more participation in the resistance by people who normally would give their tacit support to the dictators or generally remain neutral in the conflict.
> Even when the oppressive system was brought down, lack of planning on how to handle the transition to a democratic system has contributed to the emergence of a new dictatorship.

The author mentions an interesting point that partially explains why the Occupy movement in America fizzled out:

> Action based on a "bright idea" that someone has had is also limited. What is needed instead is action based on careful calculation of the "next steps" required to topple the dicatorship. Without strategic analysis, resistance leaders will often not know what that "next step" should be, for they have not thought carefully about the successive specific steps required to achieve victory. Creative and bright ideas are very important, but they need to be utilized in order to advance the strategic situation of the democratic forces.

Here is the four-step formula for bringing down a dictatorship:

> 1. One must strengthen the oppressed population themselves in their determination, self-confidence, and resistance skills;
> 2. One must strengthen the independent social groups and institutions of the oppressed people;
> 3. One must create a powerful internal resistance force;
> 4. One must develop a wise grand strategic plan for liberation and implement it skillfully.

Simply identify where the dictator gets his power, and then go about limiting those sources. Besides the highlights I've shared above, the book had little additional meat in the actual process of making that happen. Much of it will be common sense to a casual reader of history.

The Need To Game

July 19, 2013 | by The Jefe | Link | Original Link

[image]

I find myself one week into an alleged “LTR” (long term relationship).

After intermittently dating this girl for one month and having shot down a couple “boyfriend proposals”, I gave in – for the first time in years.

The sex is good, I like the girl, and I have been too busy to game of late. That was my rationale, at least.

But after just one week, I know this is not a commitment I can keep. Like many of you, I was born to game. And exclusivity is not an option.

Whether it’s a cute co-worker, the sexy waitress, or a hot body walking down the street – the burning desire to approach, flirt, and bang is ever-present. And this is as it should be.

The Straw That Broke The Camel’s Back

I sit at dinner with my new girlfriend. Our waitress approaches.

Sexy long nails, a small, tight body, and devilish eyes – the straw.

Throughout the course of the meal basic flirting occurs – and loads of intense eye contact from across the room. As we conclude, I urge my companion to use the restroom – my opportunity to close.

I approach the waitress, ask where the men’s room is… and that is all. During the remainder of the night I run through this scenario in my head ten times. I feel like I did the first time I went out “gaming.” Overcome with regret. Yes, I was out with my girlfriend. But somehow that does not matter. The need to game weighs heavy on my shoulders. My decision is made.

The Need

After a couple hundred or so approaches, I believe we cross the line.

We no longer must use all the willpower we have to push through and approach. We develop the need.

Instead of feeling knots in your stomach and thinking of excuses – you smirk and begin your advance on the target.

Instead of looking for a way out of your interactions – you push forward for the close.

Instead of looking at your cell phone for hours typing and deleting potential text messages – you send out the same basic thread to arrange a meetup ASAP.

And once you have experienced a complete loop – approach, touch, kiss, bang – you are hooked. The need to game has sprung its root deep inside your core. You have crossed the point of no return.

When To Stop

Never.

Or possibly when you meet someone with whom you are convinced you can spend the rest of your life.

But I will be honest – I don't know. I don't have the answer to this question. I am still young.

This brief relapse has triggered something inside of me. A new energy emerges. Maybe we could all use a break here and there.

A break that still involves copious amount of sex, preferably.

The Rise Of The Ratchets

July 19, 2013 | by Don Selonius | Link | Original Link

Pop culture has a massive influence on the masses, especially in a place like North America. With technology and social media aiding its delivery, never has there been a time where we've been more connected to the entertainment industry. New fads and trends are constantly being introduced to consumers, who eat it up without question. It's troubling to think that such an industry holds so much social power over a nation, more so when the rest of the world is watching its every move to see what is "cool" or "in". Those lost in its realm don't know any better, and those who know its detriments to society shake their heads disdainfully.

So what does Hollywood and the modern media have to do with the manosphere? Quite a bit, unfortunately. Women are submissive and highly influenced creatures, which makes them prime targets for manipulation. Not to say men aren't as well, but it's shocking how much power a female star holds on women who are always looking for a role model for their religion: "You-go-girlism". Observing these movements can provide valuable insight into the minds of modern women and help decipher their ongoing changes in behavior. Let's take a look at a recent phenomenon which spawned recently and has spread like wildfire to every corner of the U.S. and Canada: The Ratchet Hoe.

What's a "Ratchet?"

Urban Dictionary describes the ratchet as: "A diva, mostly from urban cities and ghettos, that has reason to believe she is every man's eye candy". The meaning goes deeper, however, "ratchet" can be used as an adjective too, as seen in the phrase "Let's get ratchet". While at first this word had very negative connotation for women, it has since adopted a lighter meaning to signify a girl who is crazy or dirty with regards to behavior and image.

It is presumed that this word started in lower class neighborhoods, to describe a girl who flaunts her body and exploits her own sexuality to men— usually to gain money or security in exchange for a strictly sexual relationship. While this is frowned upon by women of higher classes, it is an effective survival technique for poorer women looking to raise their social status by any means necessary. These women have accepted the role of sexual object in the eyes of men, so their whole existence revolves around sexualizing themselves as much as possible.

These behaviors have been seen in the wild. Female monkeys are said to sell their bodies for sex in exchange for tokens of food when it's scarce (you can research it yourself). Other women despise these ratchets because they earn the attention of men in the cheapest possible manner. Of course, the disapproval shown towards them only fuels their drive to continue their lifestyle as a borderline prostitute, and this behavior disorder continues to infect Western women like the plague.

How It Got Popular

This trend was no overnight ordeal, its been a while coming. The culprit: hip-hop. As an avid fan of the genre I observe its many changes closely and I was taken aback when this new type of rap music starting getting popular. It mainly promotes partying and misconduct, which I endorse 100% as a playful activity, but it's now gone too far. Instead of staying a a cult for select listeners, this rap game has gone fairly mainstream now and is swallowing the popular music world whole.

It makes one wonder about the general direction of society when young white girls from suburbs are trying to "twerk" and use ecstasy as recreational activities. America's second drug wave? Could be, but lets take a look at the "who told them this was okay."

The lovely Miley Cyrus, released a video recently called "We Can't Stop", and for those who don’t have time like me to watch Disney girls shake their junk on Youtube, I’ll explain the video. Miley talks about “dancing with molly”, “twerking” and is shown donning golden teeth while flaunting her pilates-hardened ass for her millions of viewers. Quite a contrast from her Hannah Montana show where she was America’s country-music star sweetheart. In other words, the little white girl role model has just entered ratchet territory and is bringing all her young fans along with her.

Loading…

The always entertaining Justin Bieber, another mogul in the pop music game, has also become fairly ratchet himself. With attempts to enter the rap game failed, Justin has settled for acting rather douche-like with his new hip-hop buddies as his favorite pastime. Snapbacks, tattoos and luxury vehicles are now all part of Justin’s lifestyle— with monthly run-ins with the law and angry tantrums with paparazzi on top. Bieber’s very young, impressionable fan base of teenage girls are watching his every move and are becoming enchanted with his persona for their own romantic lives.

With these two young superstars exhibiting this sort of behavior, it is no doubt their many, many fans will follow their ways like sheep.

Concerning the Manosphere

The decline of quality women in Western civilization is no new novelty for frequent readers of the manosphere, but it has just taken another blow. While the followers of the celebrities mentioned above perhaps are too young to be relevant for your consideration as sexual candidates, they won’t be in 3-5 years–they are the future. Their influence will only heighten the problems already being seen, which are:

1. Hypergamy

Every young girl is being taught that only the best of the best will suffice for her romantic life. Her worth is too large for just any bloke on the street, no matter how charming or educated. Only men that resemble Prince Bieber both in looks and status, is worthy of having access to their vaginas. When this dream man doesn't show up on their doorstep as they stupidly hoped, they will settle for #2, whoever that may be, which they will resent for not being their initial choice or man of their dreams.

2. You-Go-Girl-amy

A dangerous trait for a young woman's development. Miley has taught them that being an obnoxious, drug using, party girl is all part of the "good life" resulting in thousands of replicas running around in their natural night-life habitat. You will have to cater your act to sleep with these girls, which probably won't give you much satisfaction and will likely give you a few STD scares. If you're neutral to what kind of pussy you get, then all the power to you. Turn on TMZ and observe your girl's goddess spiral deep into the abyss of fame and stupidity.

3. Cross-Cultural Infection

As I mentioned earlier, the whole world is watching our pop culture intently (more so now with technological advances) and draw many ideas from the 1st world. Places like Brazil and Eastern Europe which were once untainted paradises for beautiful feminine women, will slowly start becoming more and more westernized. It is only a matter of time before we start seeing ratchet trends and behaviors in the most unlikely places around the world. Lets hope it doesn't.

I was drawn to write about this after hearing my cousins and their friends dancing to this new song in my native Argentina. I cried inside as they recited the lyrics to "We Can't Stop" just weeks after its release in the U.S. I tried convincing them that it wasn't cool but they wouldn't listen and instead dubbed me a hater. So to all of my fellow haters who are reading this, be wary of the shifts in pop culture, as trivial as it may seem to be educated on the subject. If this paradigm continues, I may have to start speaking in new age slang and get a "YOLO" tattoo just to get some ass. You've been warned.

The War Against White Knights

1. Becoming aware of the scourge.

One day I went over a lady friend's house to do my thing and something horrible happened. She told me she was no longer cool with our casual arrangement. I was confused. I didn't remember allowing her to dictate the terms of our "relationship". I asked her if she was feeling alright. She informed me that some guy brought her to church. I told her I did not care what she does when I am not around and asked her why her clothes were still on. She attempted to explain what being a good Christian is to me but I zoned out and focused on the lavish bible with its gold trim and leather cover on the nightstand. At that moment I had the shocking epiphany that I was cock-blocked through time and space by god. This church going gentleman with his fancy bible and attempts to turn a bad girl good ruined my Tuesday afternoons for awhile. On that day I realized something must be done.

2. Who is the enemy?

What is a "white knight"? In reality, a white knight is a man that irrationally places women on a pedestal and acts as her doormat and slave. In the white knight's mind, he is her righteous defender and honorable consort, personifying the ideals of chivalry. What would cause a man do to this? It could be mental illness, indoctrination, or ignorance. Whatever the cause, the problem exists and must be dealt with.

3. Why must they be fought?

In my short time on this planet I have realized that white knights are more dangerous than the silly jokes they appear to be. They are the enablers of certain deleterious social movements, behaviors, and attitudes that plague our society. Various elements they support work against the interests of me and other men like me. I've also noticed that while those they support might have certain protections, white knights do not. No one will defend a white knight and so they are vulnerable.

Why strike them wherever they may lurk? They are a cancer that tends to spread if not stamped out as soon as possible. With their weak minds and lack of knowledge of the world they are easy targets. Depending on how devious you are and how hard you want to crush them, there are many methods to combat this pathogen. Some white knights might be reformed and cease being white knights, others will be oblivious and continue with their ways, and some might double down on their beliefs, but the effort must be made.

Loading...
This article is not a "how to" in engaging the white night but a call to arms to take the fight to them. They are a worm that eats at the apple of masculinity. A lot of the groups they enable would not be able to stand without the support of white knights. These quislings need to be treated for what they are and deserve no mercy.

4. Conducting operations against them.

Usually their motivation to be a white knight is the key to destroy them. If they put a woman on a pedestal due to some bizarre belief of chivalry, use the dark soul of a woman against them. If they are motivated by the suicidal altruism of liberalism, serve them up some delicious "cultural enrichment". The sky is the limit. An agile mind come up with many devious and dastardly methods to bring the battle to the white knights.

In a previous article I mentioned the game where I would order fruity drinks to draw certain types out of the woodwork. Another method I use at the bar to engage the white knight is exploitation. If I observed a white knight that likes to buy drinks for the ladies, I'll send my lady friend over to get one from him and bring it to me. I make sure he sees this. Most of the time he remains quiet and possibly questions his belief system. Sometimes he'll say something along the lines of "I bought that for her" to which I reply "and she gave it to me". Rarely they question the manners of the woman exploiting them but if they do I tell them to look into how the world really goes round.

5. Why we fight.

To anyone who knows medieval history and the feudal system, the current revisionism of chivalry is an abortion that does not apply to men these days. Odds are you are do not speak French, are a vassal of some lord, or have a license to kill. Fantasy play has its time and place. It is cool as a child or maybe at a medieval fair, but not at a bar or in a modern city.

If you find yourself acting like a white night, stop it. If you see someone acting like a white knight then "see something say something". If enough men take up this crusade there will be positive change. Such change could include better sex ratios at the club, less female entitlement complexes, and a general return to the natural order.

Like a timid soldier cautiously moving down a block for fear of improvised explosive devices, white knights will think twice before they shit up a place with their nonsense after being hammered a few times. They should feel safe nowhere.

In Defense of Superficiality

July 20, 2013 | by Seneca Stone | Link | Original Link

I love when girls call me superficial. This usually happens when I comment on how I couldn't date someone who is overweight or otherwise unattractive. They probably expect me to correct myself, or defend my positions or feel sorry for my sexual and aesthetic preferences. Little do they know about what my response to their hypocritical posture is going to be.

Yes, indeed. I am superificial. But, under the risk of sounding obvious, we are superficial. That's our most basic nature. The way things look matters… a lot. It always did and it always will, as long as humans have eyes. It matters in just about anything. We buy homes, and go out to restaurants, bars and clubs to a large degree based on interior design (i.e., those establishments' appearance).

When it come to buying just about anything, form wins over substance almost every time. Let's not fool ourselves; as mechanically inclined as we might be, the way cars look and the image they portray is still the main deciding factor in buying a car, and not so much the speed, torque and other features. Even reliability doesn't seem to matter as much. Otherwise, BMW's and Audi's wouldn't be as popular, considering their highly shaky electrical system and lack of durability of some other vehicles.

A few years ago I asked my friend, who at that time was a high-level VP at Apple, whether iphone 2 had a particular functionality. He looked at me, smirked and said: "Who cares? Don't you get it? The only thing that matters is how it looks and how it feels in your hand. Who cares what it does, as long as it does the same things as any other phone? As long as it's thin, metal, and slick, people are going to prefer it over other phones. The very flat and thin Motorolla Razr was just the beginning."

At that time, it sounded like a mildly cynical joke to me, but with time, the ipad, the Mac Air, and alike have been proving his point over and over again—we buy that which looks good in our hands and which looks like a flattering accessory. We can deny it all we want, but that's not going to change the bottom line. Design seems to be more important than the substance, and the wine for some bizarre reason seems to taste better when you drink it out of a nice wine glass, rather than a cheap coffee mug.

Loading…

If looks and form matter so much in objects to us, how can they not matter to us even more in far more critical and fundamental things to our nature, such as sexual attraction and selection of dating and sexual partners? It's time we, men, stopped feeling embarrassed of what we like and why we like it. We don't have much control over it and neither should we have any. It takes us a fraction of a second to make the "hot / not hot" determination. Surely, we don't do it consciously, and very little analysis is going into that process.

Ironically, the women who blame us for being superficial are just as or even more superficial than us. A straight guy with a healthy sex drive is not going to be as picky about selecting a female partner, as an average woman will be about selecting a guy to go out with, let alone have sex with. As long as the girl has a decent body and her face is not ugly, she is “doable” in most guys’ eyes.

An average Western girl, however, is ready to dismiss a guy initially based on petty and extremely superficial details that would never matter to a guy in a woman, such as unpolished shoes, non-matching socks, a suit that doesn’t quite fit well, dorky haircut, etc. This is why how you dress and your overall style really matters to your game. But, if the is hot, she will be hot and desirable to us, even if she drives an old beat-up van, and even if she got her dress at a vintage store for $10. On the other hand, if she is not hot, the latest Ferrari is not going to make her any more desirable to us. However, in many cases an average looking guy will be far more noticeable if he drives an expensive sports car. This is not to blame women or point fingers at who is better and who is worse, but to simply point out facts about our nature.

The next time a girl calls you superficial, look her in the eye, smile and say, “Really? I thought I was just being human.” Then watch her walk away. She is probably on her way to doing far deeper things, like buying lipstick that matches her new shoes a little better than the twelve other lipsticks she bought over the past few months. And remember – the right girl – the one who likes you and who is sexually attracted to you will have no problem with your superficiality and being objectified in a tasteful, seductive way.

8 Films With Masculine Virtue

July 21, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

When I ask myself what films in recent years have been my favorites, I find that the answers all seem to have a few things in common. One, the movie must tell a compelling story; two, it must rise above its genre to make a larger statement about life or some universal idea; and three, it must be technically well made. All great art—including film—can serve as a vehicle for the presentation of ideas, and the promotion of a certain virtue. Although the mainstream American film industry has become more and more a sad repository of feminist cant and lowest-common-denominator commercial pandering, the foreign film world has undergone something of a renaissance in the past fifteen years.

The best films of France, Germany, Spain, and the UK are edgier, more intelligent, and more masculine than anything found in the US. It was not always so. But the work of great European directors like Jacques Audiard, Gaspar Noe, Nicolas Winding Refn, and Shane Meadows leaves little room for doubt that the true cutting-edge work is being done in Europe. (Argentina deserves honorable mention here as having an excellent film industry). The mainstream, corporate-driven US film industry has effectively smothered independent voices under an avalanche of political correctness, girl-power horseshit, chick-flickism, and mind-numbing CGI escapist dreck.

Movies that deal with masculine themes in a compelling way are not easy to come by these days. Honest explorations of masculine virtues are repressed, marginalized, or trivialized. One needs to scour the globe to cherry-pick the best here and there, and in some cases you have to go back decades in time. Luckily, the availability of Netflix and other subscription services has made this task much easier than it used to be. Access to the best cinema of Europe, South America, and Asia can be a great way for us to catch as glimpse at a foreign culture, as well as reflect on serious ideas.

I want to offer my recommendations on some films that I believe are an important part of the modern masculine experience, in all its wide variety and expression. Out of the scores of possible choices, I decided to pick the handful of films that are perhaps not as well known to readers. My opinions will not be shared by all. I encourage readers to draw up their own lists of films dealing with masculine themes, and hope they will reflect on the reasons behind their choices. Below are mine, in no particular order. In italics is a brief plot synopsis, followed by my own comments.

1. Straw Dogs (1971).

A mild-mannered American academic (Dustin Hoffman) living in rural Cornwall with his beautiful wife becomes the target of harassment by the local toughs. Things escalate to a sexual assault on his wife, and eventually to a brutal and protracted fight to the death when a local man takes refuge on their property.

Dustin Hoffman reaches his breaking point in "Straw Dogs"

This is a classic example of the type of movie that could never be made today. Arguably Sam Peckinpah's most daring film, it contains a controversial rape scene that seems to leave open the question whether Hoffman's wife (played by Susan George) was a victim or a willing participant. Faced with his wife's betrayal, and continuing harassment from local miscreants, Hoffman's character finds himself completely isolated and must learn to stand his ground and fight.

A chance incident later in the film sets the stage for a blood-soaked confrontation which is as inevitable as it is necessary. Peckinpah presents a compelling case for the cathartic power of violence, and the achievement of masculine identity through man-on-man combat. It is a theme I find myself strongly drawn to. Controversial, powerful, and unforgettable, Peckinpah proves himself an unapologetic and strident advocate of old-school martial virtue. We would do well to listen. His voice is sorely missed today. (Note: avoid the pathetic recent remake of this movie). Honorable mention: Peckinpah's The Wild Bunch (1969) and Bring Head of Alfredo Garcia (1974).

2. Sorcerer (1977).

A group of international renegades find themselves down and out in Nicaragua, and volunteer for a job transporting unstable dynamite across the country to quell an oil rig fire.

Due to inept marketing when this movie was first released, it never achieved the credit it so fully deserved. A motley group of international riff-raff (including the always appealing Roy Scheider) seeks redemption through a harrowing trial. But will they get it? Is it even desirable to escape one's dark past? The answers are complex, and director William Friedkin refuses to supply easy ones. The characters in this film are doomed, and they know it, but they still hold true to their own code. Which is itself honorable. Consequences must be paid for everything we do in life, and often the price comes in a way never expect. Dark, brooding, and humming with a pulse-pounding electronic score by Tangerine Dream, this film has deservedly become a cult classic. The ending is a shocker you'll never see coming.

Roy Scheider undertakes the most perilous journey of his life in William Friedkin's 1977 masterpiece "Sorcerer"

3. The Lives of Others (2006).

A coldly efficient Stasi (East German security service) officer (Ulrich Muhe) is enlisted by a Communist party hack in a surveillance program against a supposed subversive writer and his girlfriend. But monitoring the writer's life awakens sparks of nascent humanity in the Stasi man, and he eventually must decide whether to follow orders and destroy the writer, or to sacrifice himself to save him.

This German masterpiece was made with great fidelity to the look and feel of 1980s East Germany, and the results are evident in every frame. It belongs on any list of the greatest films ever made. The masculine virtue here is of a different type than viewers may be used to: it is a quiet, understated heroism, the type of heroism that probably happens every day but is hardly noticed. There is no bragging here, no chest-beating, no big-mouthed bravado. (In short, none of the wooden-headed caricatures that pass for masculinity in the US). The ethic here is about love and self-sacrifice, the noblest and greatest virtues of all.

The ethos of self-sacrifice is now considered old-fashioned and almost a punch-line, but historically it was valued very highly. It features in nearly all the old literary epics and dramas of Europe and Asia. Actor Ulrich Muhe pulls off a minor miracle of characterization here with his portrayal of a Stasi man named Weisler, whose special wiretapping assignment against a playwright transforms him from heartless automaton into awe-inspiring hero. The movie made me wonder just how many quiet, unassuming men there must be out there, whose toil, heroism, and sacrifice has never been, and never will be, acknowledged. The ending is transcendently beautiful, and moving beyond words.

4. Homicide (1991).

A police detective (Joe Mantegna) is assigned to investigate a murder case. The case awakens in him stirrings of his long-suppressed ethnic identity. Unfortunately, he will eventually be forced to choose between conflicting loyalties. And the consequences will be devastating.

No modern American director has probed the meaning of masculine identity more than David Mamet, and all of his films are meditations on themes related to illusion, reality, masculinity, and struggle. Homicide, a nearly unknown gem from the early 1990s, is perhaps his profoundest. Mamet knows that a man must make choices in his life, and for those choices, consequences must be paid. And very often, we find ourselves derailed by the mental edifices we construct for ourselves. The Mantegna character is led through a complex and increasingly ambiguous chain of events, only to find that at the heart of one mystery lies an even more inscrutable one. Beware the things you seek. You may not like what you find.

Joe Mantegna deals with the fatal consequences of his decisions in David Mamet's "Homicide"

5. A Prophet (2009).

An Algerian Arab is incarcerated in a French jail, and is drawn into the savage world of Corsican gangsters. Forced to kill or be killed, he is drawn into a pitiless world that recognizes only cunning and brutality. He finds himself straddling two realities: the world of his own nationality, and that of the Corsicans. And to survive and emerge triumphant, he must learn to play all sides against each other.

This film must be counted among the greatest crime dramas ever made. You simply can't take your eyes off the screen. The lesson here is that a man must learn to survive on his wits, and do whatever is necessary to stay alive. The Corsican boss whom Al Djebena (Tahar Rahim) works for is just about the most malevolent presence in recent screen memory. Part of France's continuing internal dialogue about its immigrant population, A Prophet is not to be missed.

Tahar Rahim learns a thing or two about Corsica in "A Prophet"

6. The Beat That My Heart Skipped (2005).

An intense young man (Romain Duris) works for his father as a real estate shark in urban Paris. His "job" consists of intimidating deadbeat immigrant tenants, vandalizing apartments, and forcibly collecting loans. He also plays the piano. Eventually, he is forced to decide which life he wants: the path laid out by his shady father, or the idealistic path of his own choosing. He's seeking redemption, but will he find it? And at what cost?

Again, we have here the themes of redemption and moral choice. Romain Duris has a screen presence and intensity that rivals anything done by Pacino in his prime, and some of the scenes here are fantastic. (His seduction of his friend's wife, Aure Atika, is one of many great scenes). All men will be confronted and tested by crises and situations beyond their control. How they respond to those situations will define who they are as men. Duris's character proves that redemption can be achieved, if wanted badly enough.

Romain Duris embodying screen intensity

7. Red Belt (2008).

Martial arts instructor Mike Terry is forced, against his principles, to consider entering a prize bout. He is abandoned and betrayed by his wife and friends, and must confront his challenges alone with only his code and his pride.

Another great meditation on masculine virtue and individualism by David Mamet. In his own unique dialogue style, Mamet showcases his belief that, in the end, all men stand alone. At the moment of truth, it is you, and only you, who will be staring into the abyss. Our trials by fire will not come in the time and at the place of our own choosing. But when they do come, a man must be prepared to hold his ground and fight his corner. Watch for Brazilian actress Alice Braga in a supporting role here. We hope to see more of her on American screens in the future.

8. Fear X (2003).

A repressed security guard (John Turturro) is searching for answers to who killed his wife. His strange behavior and ticking time-bomb manner begin to alarm friends and co-workers. One day he finds some information that may be a lead to solving the mystery. This discovery sets him on the path to realization. Or does it?

I am a big fan of the films of Nicolas Winding Refn (The Pusher trilogy, and Valhalla Rising), and this one is perhaps his most penetrating examination of a wounded psyche. It failed commercially when it first appeared, as many viewers were put off by his artistic flourishes and opaque ending. For me, this film is the deepest study of grief and repressed rage ever committed to film. All men will be confronted by tragedy, grief, and inexplicable loss during their lives. How we handle it will define who we are. The greatness of this film is that it explores Turturro's claustrophobic, neurotic world in a deeply personal way, and at the same time suggests that he may actually be on to something. This film covers the same philosophical ground as Francis Ford Coppola's The Conversation, in that it hints at the ultimate ambiguity of all things.

John Turturro confronts the unrelenting darkness of his own psyche in "Fear X"

If you are a Netflix subscriber and watch movies frequently, as I do, you may find it useful to keep a notebook near your television and jot down the titles of movies you see, and a few notes about what you liked or didn't like. You'd be surprised how much you can learn from movies. There are just so many good and bad ones out there that having some system for keeping track of them will be time well spent.

Are Gay Parents Superior To Straight Parents?

July 21, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Hanna Rosin recently penned a short piece in which she exhorted the superiority of gay parenting. It is one of those supremely superficial, navel-gazing pieces that manages to butcher the reality of sex, homosexuality and intimate relationships.

First, before considering Rosin and her piece, consider Mark Regnerus' study of gay parenting entitled New Family Structures. In it, he commits the cardinal sin of questioning sacrosanct left-wing dogma, by suggesting that homosexual approaches to parenting are deficient to heterosexual ones. The most obvious reason, and most rooted in common season, is that the world is full of both men and women. One must have some understanding of the opposite sex. As such, parents of both sexes are absolutely crucial in order to ensure said children grow into adults with healthy views of both sexes. Dr. Robert Glover, in his book No Mister Nice Guy, noted how the lack of a positive father figures often has a tremendous negative influence on a boy's growth into a healthy adult. Of course, when esteemed academic, Tom Bartlett, heard of Regnerus' study, he provided a shrewd insight into the intellectual rigor of the study, calling it "bullshit." Profound.

Later that summer, Oscar Robert Lopez penned an introspective and thoughtful essay reflecting on his childhood being raised by two lesbians. His experience was largely negative, as Lopez did not learn at all how to behave like a man. He struggled mightily with women, as his lesbian moms had absolutely nothing to teach them about seeking sex and relationships with women, as they had the benefit of living in the insular world of serial lesbian monogamy. Still, Lopez became a professor, a husband and a political conservative.

Despite his upbringing, he has made something of his life, but still struggles to this day with his untoward upbringing. His real self-reflection and introspection stands in stark constant to the narcissism and self-denial of Zach Wahls, another son of a lesbian coupling. The liberal media ignored Lopez's story of anguish and lauded Wahls' story, dubbing it proof positive of the triumph of female-centric parenting: lesbian parenting. Much like a Christian Scientist proclaiming their child's broken arm has been healed, while the arm is obviously disfigured, we see this astonishing level of delusion with respects to homosexual parenting fanatics on the left.

Reconsider Hanna Rosin. She is the portrait of an entitled American female. She comes from wealth and attended Stanford. Her life has been handed to her on a silver platter. As expected, she cashed in on her privilege by pretending to be an intellectual. Her ideas are not just derivative, but smack of a strong degree of superiority and narcissism. Her most famous book – The End of Men – reeks of a virulent level of female self-congratulation for doing jobs men have doing for time immemorial while also taking a sick sense of pride in hurting men. It is heavy-handed and has the smug superiority of a clinical narcissist. She senses weakness in many males and women like her have tethered their identity to one-upping men as a class.

A man commits suicide because he can't find work and his wife is leaving him? A pathetic male who could not reconcile the ascension of women with his own misogyny. Ugh, why am I so awesome!

A man complains that dating is very much stacked against men because women seek richer, more educated and more socially powerful men? Now he knows what it feels like to be a woman! Seriously, why I am so ridiculously good-looking?

Yet another clear manifestation of our narcissistic sexual hierarchy in America.

In this piece by her, she blames masculinity, patriarchy and gender roles for the issues around child-rearing in America. She presents an ostensible gay male couple who, by way of their sexual orientation, are superior to a heterosexual coupling. This is highly amusing from an evolutionary perspective, as she essentially calls out evolution for not properly selecting male/male and female/female couplings as superior to the utterly bourgeois coupling of a male and a female.

Her hypothetical gay coupling ignores both biology and socialization. She, like most feminists, pretends all gendered behavior is just a performance. It isn't. One curious aspect of homosexuality women like her don't consider is the exact biological parameters of homosexuality. Are babies born gay, but with no instincts on how to exercise that sexuality? Or are gay babies born with proclivities related to that orientation – often times mimicking the other sex; for example, are effeminate gay men born that way or have they freely chosen to abandon masculine norms? Essentially, are men born attracted to physical attractiveness? If that is so, then straight men value physical attractiveness in women, the same for gay men. Don't ask those sorts of questions in a Women's Studies or Queer studies class. Questions like that do NOT keep people in those classes or people like Rosin up at night because those questions would shatter their worldview.

She does nothing to understand anybody's reasons for who they are – just that if they buck the patriarchal norm, and then they must be autonomous decisions. Note the approach that a feminist could use here. If many gay men are born much more effeminate than the average male, then the issue becomes we, as a society, need to adjust norms on how we view men in order to not limit his autonomy. If the other approach is true – he has freely chose to not be masculine – the same analysis is used – we should not limit his autonomy in order to respect his identity. Once again, women like Rosin are not interested in whether gay men are born this way or that – they only consider power balances in society. Of course, through their own self-absorbed, narcissistic lens.

As usual, it is more heterosexual worship of the supposedly progressive, egalitarian unions of homosexuals. They don't have those relationships. That is not how power functions – there will always be a partner in power and one who is not. The most relevant question is not as to the existence of a power disparity, but how large that is. Once again, given Rosin's ignorance about reality, I highly doubt she would ever consider neuroses or personality disorders in her power analysis, much less the vagaries of personalities, random chance and the realities of life that affect power balances in a relationship.

Loading…

Note Rosin is a female. She has been told that real relationships are based on equality and mutuality. The absolutely massive, narcissistic problem here is that women will assume they are equal with the alpha males they desire. See the fuel behind second-wave feminism? Coming back to homosexual relationships, she assumes that they approach their relationship on a purely logical basis in the sense that whomever is best a particular chore/activity will do that. That because of the lack of opposite sex partners, then equality can truly be had, as gender isn't an issue. No, it is just that power in a relationship can't be hidden or explained away by gender inequalities. Truly, the whole concept of arguing over gendered roles reeks of a couple pretending to fight over feminist/anti-sexist issues while it is really a power struggle.

For anybody versed in negotiation theory, the savviest partner will able to steer the relationship in a way that suits them. Once again, Rosin is seeking to tilt the balance of power further into the hands of women. Women, as a class, have been able to manipulate men better than the reverse, mostly because of the naivete and low-self esteem of beta males.

For her, gender roles prevent women like her from dominating a relationship outright. When one partner has sole claim to at least one significant aspect of a relationship, that means they have sole control in at least one domain of the relationship. Rosin, while pretending to care about equity, will open up all aspects of a relationship to "equitable" negotiation, knowing full well she will pick a man she will establish a ~~business~~ partnership with, with her as ~~CEO~~ a loving equal. Her narcissism prevents her from seeing her duplicity and control issues, so trying to reach her as such is futile. Her sheer insistence on negotiation not only reflects her knowledge that she can manipulate beta males, but also her delusional idea she can hang with alpha males. She couldn't in her past sexually and cannot now as an intellectual.

When viewing gay couples, it is very telling she picks gay male couples. Rosin wants to put beta's collective testicles into the feminist vice grip. Since women can rarely control the alphas they desire, they double down on controlling beta males. The oppression will only get more cruel and narcissistic so long as betas submit to women like Rosin. Rosin needs to show betas how much better gay men are than straight men, shame them for their sexist, vestigial remains of out-dated masculinity and usher them completely into the androgynous future where beta males will have absolutely zero power and are completely at the whims of women. Male privilege and all that.

Rosin ends with an appeal to soften the strictures of monogamy and seemingly encourage heterosexual couples with experimenting with a level of infidelity. Since this is in the XX blog at Slate, it clearly is aimed at women and trying to alleviate their shame and guilt for cheating on the husbands they don't desire. For the men reading, it is show them, once again, the progressive approach gay men take infidelity—most specifically easing expectations for monogamy on the part of their spouses.

This is Rosin's world: an empowered woman who has a powerful job with a large salary, coming home to a man in the kitchen, raising the kids and cooking dinner. She comes home two hours late – was she cheating? It doesn't matter.

That man should be progressive enough to understand that his potential feelings of betrayal and sadness are little more than his deeply ingrained misogyny working its way to the surface. Real men respect a woman's autonomy and decisions about her life. If she decides it is more important to work all day and sleep around, that is more important than spending time with her children. If she decides to go see a movie after work the same analysis applies. Remember, men, this is a situation into which you freely and consensually negotiated into.

Further, gay parenting simultaneously eases the guilt of parents of two classes – single mothers and work-focused mothers. Both feel guilt over not parenting their children correctly, the former over not having a male influence in child-rearing, the latter over their largely absent mothering of their children. Both classes need to decouple the need for either sex to have a strong hand in the raising of children. Single mothers need to prove that men are not relevant to raise a child, working mothers often to need consume media that either explicitly says or implies that their diminished involvement in their children's lives is not just okay, but good for the kids. Remember, if you are reading it, it is for you.

In the end, it really is all about women and how they want the second-class objects in their life – their husbands, children, coworkers – play into the fantasy they have dreamed of since they were young girls, acting out princess fantasies in their bedroom. Mature women leave those fantasies in the past, women like Rosin substitute a princess costume and a gorgeous prince for a power suit and a controllable husband.

The buzz over gay marriage and gay parenting is a manifestation of this. Rosin dreams up un-realities of gay people's lives based on fantasies of how much more progressive and less gendered homosexual pairings are. Of course, in her analysis she explicitly leaves out power relations not based on gender. She falsely assumes modern heterosexual relationships reflect male privilege – suggesting the sheer invisibility of beta males to women like Rosin. Maybe she is not bothered by power imbalances not based on gender – i.e. a dominate gay male and a submissive gay male? Given she is a feminist, it wouldn't be surprising she is only bothered by relationships in which a man has the upper hand – as in hot and bothered. 50 Shades of Grey didn't sell millions of books because of the patriarchy.

Regardless, it is stereotypical fare of female hypergamic-driven fantasies of how the world should work. Gay parenting is not superior to straight parenting and certainly not for the reasons Rosin puts forth. Her concern isn't at all about the children, it is about making sure everybody adheres to liberal autonomy theory and divests themselves of gendered norms of behavior – so as to benefit women like Rosin. As usual, alphas benefit, women get increasingly frustrated and narcissistic, all the while betas remain the punching bags and pack mules for women. Leave to women like Rosin to take gay men's lives and shunt those lives through her delusions about how the world works and how it should revolve around her.

It could be called appropriation of gay men's lives, but what does Rosin care? It is your life as a male that is winding down while her future as a woman is so bright she will need sunglasses.

The Truth About Gym Game

July 22, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Few things in life truly emulate the cartoon depiction of holding a carrot on a stick as motivation. The gym is that one exception. Any man who has spent a significant amount of time at the gym knows what it's like to see the emergence of spandex pants in the winter, and booty shorts and sports bra's in the summer on fit bodies in the gym. It's the ultimate form of beauty for anyone into fitness, and yet like a strip club you're quickly slapped with a do not touch policy. One could take it a step further and push it towards Hooters where you know there's cleavage, but don't you dare get caught staring. Yet despite all these rules and stipulations, many men still decide to attempt game in the gym, usually while failing miserably. I'm here to save you some trouble by simply saying, don't waste your time.

The gym isn't your normal venture. The typical rules of alpha and beta don't apply in a conventional manner. Think of the gym as the Bermuda triangle of game. As such, in order to achieve success you're going to have to do a lot of things that will most likely waste your time and only cause frustration, possibly some deep embarrassment.

How To Succeed

Conventional forms of game will not work in the gym because of two key factors. The first is that every man in the gym thinks he is macho whether or not he really is and therefore tries the same lame routines that work in the bar, as the majority don't develop the true skill set needed for day game. The second is that men flocking to women in a gym puts women on a pedestal. While it's no mystery that women always want to believe they are in control, most of the time game is just a manipulation of their perception. In the case of the gym, each mans compliments only further amplify the size of the woman's ego which will further squander your chances of banging her.

The real key is to do two things. The first is ignore her entirely until she becomes a routine member. This does two thins. One is it eliminates any potential single time users that you really won't ever see again. Two once she becomes a regular it sets yourself up as a common face that she is prepared to interact with. Stage two is the most backwards things you will ever do since learning game, but it works; be her friend. I know shock-waves have been sent through the universe with this one but trust me this is the only way, and a normal beta will fail miserably at this.

In order to successfully game a woman in the gym is an extremely long drawn out process. People who actually look good at the gym are there to work on looking good and therefore don't want their workouts interrupted much. This means your social interaction is going to be at a minimal. You'll be lucky to get 10 minutes of conversing within one gym session. That means you're going to have to re-establish yourself every single time for several weeks before the brief conversations become normal. The bright side is that by the time they become normal it'll be easy to get her number and even easier to start hanging out outside of the gym, and ultimately get the bang.

Why It Isn't Worth It

There's a few key reasons why it's not worth your effort but trust me, they're all worth paying attention to. What you decide to do is ultimately up to you. You also might say that they aren't that out of the ordinary compared to normal women, and that's also somewhat true.

The first is simply that it takes too much time to game a woman at the gym. If you're going regularly and the opportunity presents itself then sure, go for it. But actually knowingly putting forth effort towards a woman in the gym is not worth your time. Statistically speaking any woman you meet is at pretty bad odds for being successful, but that's life. The key is as men we find ways to minimize the effort while maximizing the number to get a high quantity return on minimal effort. Gym game is going to be maximal effort for minimum quantity.

Secondly, if you do make it far enough to get her number she's likely a head-case with an extremely large ego. if she's an attractive woman from the gym she's used to getting all the attention in the world which means if you withdraw that attention, and you will because you read this website and know that no woman deserves that value, she's going to bail immediately. She's also not likely to give it up very quickly so you'll be playing this yes princess charade for a while. Any man with any sense of humility knows that no woman is worth that bullshit.

Lastly is simply the humility of the whole concept. While if you succeed and things go well and by some miracle nothing goes wrong with the whole ordeal you'll be looked at as awesome, if you screw up the repercussions will be ten-fold. Every woman whom your girl socializes with during cardio, which women do often, will hear about it.

Therefore…

Ultimately the decision on whether or not to go ahead with gym game is your own choice. Personally if it naturally occurs for the interaction I'm not 100% opposed to it, but I'll also be damned if I ever deliberately put forth the effort towards it. I had been curious for some time and eventually tried it out of boredom. If you want my opinion though, gym game is just simply too much effort for too minimal of a reward.

Why Trayvon Martin Isn't That Important

July 22, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The verdict in a case dealing with the murder of Trayvon Martin came out recently and, unless you've been living under a rock (or are far outside of North America), you've probably heard about the outcome. George Zimmerman, the neighborhood watchman who shot the unarmed Martin, stood accused of murder and has now been acquitted.

The reaction across the internet, mainstream media and our popular culture in general has been one of predictable disappointment and outrage.

> Beyonce called in a concert for a moment of silence for Trayvon Martin, rapper Young Jeezy released a song in Martin's memory and Russell Simmons called for peace after George Zimmerman was acquitted by a Florida jury in the death of the teenager.

And on twitter:

> Diddy: "#myTruth I am blessed to have 6 beautiful kids. I'm hurt and I'm mad as hell! My heart goes out to the family. He followed him! (Expletive) That!"
> Jordin Sparks: "What is happening?!"
> Solange Knowles: "Is this not what our ancestors, grandfathers and fathers fought for…? Now I will be fighting for my son…"
> Steve Harvey: "A Child is Dead & The Man that Killed Him is Free & Again The Child is Black…My Country Tis of Thee?"
> Gabrielle Union: "Help! What's the proper procedure when you're followed by a > random armed nutbag returning home from getting candy & iced tea?”

> Whoopi Goldberg: “My heart is with trayvon martins family tonight, so my focus on them. No one else really matters”
> Nicki Minaj: “And our taxes paid for that trial. We just paid to see a murderer walk free after killing an innocent unarmed little boy. #GodBlessAmerica”
>
> Sophia Bush: “The wind is more than knocked out of me… My heart aches for this boy’s family. Justice System? I don’t think so. #justicefortrayvon”
> Rihanna: “This is the saddest news ever!!! #whatsjustice #pray4theMartinFamily”
> John Legend: “My heart hurts”
> Lena Dunham: “No. My heart is with Sybrina Fulton, Rachel Jeantel, everyone who loved Trayvon and has been sent the message that his life didn’t matter.”

The most salient celebrity reaction in my view, however, came from the rapper Lupe Fiasco.

Try as I might, I can’t find much wrong with what Lupe had to say. I do not like George Zimmerman, nor do I agree with the decisions he made on that fateful night many months ago now. Trayvon should not have died, and his killer strikes me as an overzealous mall cop/vigilante.

Despite all of that, I still feel that Lupe is dead on.

Young black teens with decent heads on their shoulders are killed every day by other blacks for no good reason.

This one died for a piece of chicken.

Loading...

This 3 year old died for no conceivable reason at all:

This one got murdered for getting pregnant:

And this woman's child, like many other young black men, got killed fighting over some hoodrat:

I could go on, really, because this shit happens every day. Lupe is right to note that people have been "dancing to black death" for some time now. There is a lot of music out there that kind of glorifies the idea of killing for no good reason (ex: murder over a silly beef or over a girl, etc), yet people love it.

If you need an illustration of all of this, why not take a look at the urban community's glorification of gang culture. What do gangs do, exactly? Are they not known for violent conduct and frequent maiming/murder of people for no good reason? Do innocent souls not perish at the hands of gangsters every day?

Yet not only do we not even bother to discuss the loss of those innocent lives to gang violence to the extent that we discuss Trayvon's death, but we go on to glorify that culture in our music, dress, and everything else. Some of the same people expressing all of this sadness about the death of Trayvon and the verdict signaling some sort of "open season" on innocent young blacks are the same folks throwing up gang signs and glorifying a culture that promotes similar instances of murder for no good reason, all the while protecting perpetrators of such violence with silly "no snitching" rules and a total unwillingness to work with the police.

Young blacks have their lives stolen from them for absolutely no good reason at all in this society all the time, and it is usually other blacks doing the stealing. And yet in spite of all this, people only get up in arms when a white (or, in this case, a mestizo who could be mistaken for a white hispanic) person does the killing.

People are trying to say that the Trayvon case proves that black lives are less valuable. I don't support Zimmerman, but I have to say that if this case supports the low worth of black life, then black-on-black violence (and the apparent tolerance of that violence by many) absolutely establishes it.

This man sums things up quite well:

Again, I don't agree with the decisions made by George Zimmerman on that fateful night. Trayvon Martin's death is a tragedy, but in the grand scheme of things I can't see how it matters as much as our society seems to imply with the abundance of attention paid to the case. His is a drop in an ocean of innocent, young black lives taken for no good reason. The ethnicity of his murderer isn't all that relevant to me: Blacks (and Hispanics, for that matter) are killing each other for FAR less, and nobody cares to talk about that or give lives lost to such internecine violence the kind of attention that Trayvon has gotten. This is a problem that really needs a solution.

The Care and Feeding of Your New Foreign Wife

July 22, 2013 | by Hawsepiper | Link | Original Link

Despite your concerns and several disapproving conversations (with mostly-female coworkers or friends) and maybe the odd hint that you're almost certainly being farmed out for a green card, you went all in, and married a foreign girl, and now you're living out your version of marital bliss in the USA. Congratulations.

Your wife is completely different from any American woman you've ever been involved with. You celebrate those differences, and resolve to be the best husband you can be because you realized that you've suddenly been catapulted into a role as provider and patriarch, and she doesn't just want you… She NEEDS you, because she's a stranger here, and everything is new and a little intimidating but exciting, and holy shit she's sweet, beautiful, a little clueless and very vulnerable.

This was the situation I found myself in, a number of years ago with my new Brazilian wife. Being a professional mariner and having a serious commercial fishing habit that took up my time and money when I wasn't on a ship, I never expected to get married or have kids, yet here I was with a brown-skinned beauty queen whose English was only slightly better than my non-existent Portuguese.

These days my wife speaks a heavily-accented sort of English which I still find sexy.

In the years since we met, having negotiated the immigration and citizenship process, and raising a kid together, we've gotten pretty good at speaking bad English. Everything I've learned about marriage has been through trial and error—mostly errors, to be honest. Unfortunately, I learned mostly from my own mistakes rather than the mistakes of others. The couch is occasionally slept on even now (by her, I had the bed before I met her). Stereotypes have been reinforced, some broken, a lot of fights have been fought. That thing about the Latin temper? All true. My bedroom door has stab marks. Stab marks.

Yes, your new wife might have a temper. But on the other hand, this.

For anyone out there considering marriage to a non-American citizen, I'd give a cautioned approval to the idea; like any gamble, it's always possible to win big if you play the probabilities, and a cross-cultural marriage introduces the potential for a more respectful, caring and loving dynamic in the marriage. That being said, she can't be immersed in our culture without integrating some aspects of it in her philosophy.

She's going to be Americanized, and, let's be honest; you were attracted to her partially because she's not American. She doesn't look or sound the part, and more importantly, she doesn't act like an American woman. You need to be clear about boundaries and acceptable behaviors here, and become mindful of cultural creep, the slow integration of every antagonistic behavior exhibited by your American ex's that drove you into the dusky arms of your foreign wife in the first place. They're going to show up, and you'd best be ready if you want to keep your wife out of the bitch zone.

Be ready and be mindful. Americanization is rife with pitfalls. With that in mind, here are some things you absolutely need to be aware of if you want to have a successful cross-cultural marriage.

1. Prepare to be the patriarch.

You will be expected to be the leader, breadwinner and alpha in the house, and she will absolutely let you know when you're falling short of expectations. With this great trust that she places on you will come great expectations, too, and there's a steep learning curve if you're not naturally good at being the boss. The phrase "Happy wife, happy life" comes from this, and your foreign-born wife will do her part best when you're doing yours. She will be happy to serve you, but do not expect her to support you. The loneliness of command is the price you pay for a doting wife. She will entice you when she wants to guide you. If you force her into co-leadership, she will despise you. Not her job. The division of labor is an important distinction. Be sure the both of you know what the other expects here. You can expect her to pull you along sometimes, but if she has to push you, she will resent it.

2. Marriage is a BUSINESS contract between two people who love each other.

She knows this. You didn't. Let's be clear: she chose you for a package deal—you were weighed, measured and carefully judged, even if you don't recognize or appreciate the criteria. Don't expect that your having won the lottery by being born American will hold much water once she's wedded and bedded. That was a big plus when you were dating, but now it's just the status quo. While you can expect not to be taken for granted, she's not going to be worshiping at your alter if you don't hold up your end of the marriage bargain.

Your chemistry as a couple, your ability as a provider, leadership, a green card (more on that later), your relationship with your family, your economic potential, your looks, your personality, your religious views, everything. It's all measured. She's been programmed to want AND need a husband, chances are, and she'll never tell you if it's desire or need that primarily motivated her. At the end of the day, it doesn't matter (to you) and she knows that, too. So lose your romantic notions. Romance has an important place in marriage, but that doesn't minimize the practical and pragmatic way she's looking at this venture, and it also doesn't detract from the joy of it when she's happy with the decision. Finally, don't expect marriage to your new wife to be easier than it would be with an American woman. It'll potentially be more satisfying and interesting, but easy? No. Just different.

3. Don't minimize the value of the green card.

With marriage to you comes American residency and access to the American Dream. The green card is something that you bring to the table, and it holds great value. Pretending that this isn't an attractive thing is foolish. Of course this is part of that package! Don't hide from that. You are content with the qualities of your wife's personality, right? Would you be equally content if she weighed 600lbs and only got around on a scooter? No, of course not.

[image]

"She's curvy and has a wonderful personality."

Refusing to acknowledge reality doesn't make it any less real. Recognize the green card for what it is… it's simply a tool you have access to which can help you both build the life you want. Nothing more, nothing less. To her, it's more than that. The symbolism of the thing is… substantial. The Holy Grail. Marriage was exciting, but this, THIS, now she's going to tell everyone she got married. Assuming that you're not being scammed, of course. That certainly happens, but if you've gotten this far only to get taken for a ride, you deserve the harsh lesson.

4. You're not just marrying her, you're marrying into her family.

The clichés hold some truth here. Marry a Latina or a Filipina, and you'd better be ready to have a close relationship with blood relatives and, possibly, hundreds of cousins. Set boundaries early. No temporary move-ins of family, but be aware that you may very well be asked to make an exception for your mother-in-law. Your wife's brothers know enough to not invite her to live with them, so your kind-hearted wife will probably ask you to do this. This is the downside of close family ties—it can be mitigated, it can be accepted, or it can be made clear early on that it will never happen. That's up to you and her. Good luck with saying no, and enjoy the couch.

At the least, you stand a good chance at being involved in sending money to your mother-in-law overseas. This is pretty common, and, while it's concerning, it's also the price you pay for keeping an ocean between you and the dragon lady. You can be clear that it will be her responsibility to earn any money going to the Old Country, but be aware that eventually you might get tired of not having a second income when your wife has to work and she's still buying everything with with your paycheck, not hers. This is especially annoying when you discover just how expensive it is for her to always look her best and have matching 5″ heels with every outfit.

5. Beauty don't come cheap.

Your new wife has access to unprecedented income for her. She's going to want to invest in new clothes. You're going to want to indulge her. I can tell you firsthand that Brazilian waxes every 2 ½ weeks will cost you $100 a pop anyhow. Worth it. Salon visit, nails… you get the idea. It adds up. You can go on and on about the value of natural, casual prettiness in a wife, but there's something to be said in having a wife who takes great pride in looking her best at all times, because, unlike American women, foreign women accept the double standard with humor.

Is it manipulation if the both of you know that she's getting away with some shit because you're in lust with her even after a couple of years together? She knows that you like to look at her, and more, that you take pride in the fact that your wife is the great beauty she is. Maybe we as men are shallow in that way. I don't care. She won't be beautiful on the outside forever, so best to ensure it lasts as long as possible.

6. Culture and monogamy.

This is a touchy one. She may come from a culture that accepts male infidelity. Be warned. Jealousy is ugly, whether it's earned or unearned. In countries where women are second class citizens, there is a complex and convoluted series of undercurrents that govern issues of fidelity. She may come from a country that condones male infidelity, where women are dependents and therefore, deathly afraid of being cast aside if they are caught cheating themselves. Do not think that this makes them monogamous. They just are far, far better at hiding their affairs than their husbands.

Women and men in most cultures tend to cheat at about the same rate. There's a lot of variability in the statistics because of the fact that social scientists have a much lower bar when it comes to intelligence and the ability to do math than real scientists, but reliable, proven study shows that fidelity between the sexes in most cultures is comparable. Between two different cultures, the numbers vary. Regardless, be mindful. If your wife has good reason to believe you're cheating, all bets are off. She may be insecure and jealous even if you're devoted only to her. If that's the case, be respectful but firm in ignoring it. She WILL expect you to be jealous, and will shit test you until you slap this tendency down so hard that she panics. Regardless, this is something you will have to deal with.

Every male immigrant from her country will attempt to hit on your wife at any time, often right in front of you. You can trust your wife to do everything but make them stop, so make sure you make an example out of someone early on. Mate guarding will have her leaving snail trails on the furniture, and you can make this stop with a polite but very public establishment of dominance. She will gravitate to any local community made up of her countrymen, so this is an issue, but it's easily taken care of.

7. Beware of cultural creep.

Your wife is going to become Americanized. She's going to experience social pressures to conform to the behavioral standards of an American woman… you know, those things that drove you into the arms of a non-American. Feminist-promulgated behavioral standards are so pervasive that it's unavoidable, unless you want her to be dependent on you like an overgrown child.

The degree to which this happens is based on your ability to foster her desire to submit to you as her husband. This will challenge and test you. I've found that positive reinforcement works. When your wife complains about her American friends, listen. Agree and amplify if you can manage to pay attention longer than a moment or two. Complaining loudly and with pity when my friends' wives treat them like total garbage pretty much does the rest.

Caveat Emptor.

Ultimately, no matter where your wife is from, you'll have marital struggles of one form or another. Marrying someone from another culture won't give you a free pass in terms of dealing with trouble. You'll absolutely make a lot of mistakes out of plain ignorance, and so will she. You'll miscommunicate constantly, even if she already speaks passable English. You won't have to deal with the enmity, resentment, entitlement, ingratitude, immaturity, the use of sex as a weapon or reward, mind games or emasculation that are the birthright of the modern American woman, though, and that gives you a leg up and a greater reserve of patience and tolerance.

You can have kids and be more than just two support systems that orbit around your children. In this environment, you can actually have a nuclear family if you both so choose. Really, it's nice to be married to someone who wants to be a wife to you and doesn't need to have their ass kissed in order to treat you like a human being. While I sometimes envy my friends and shipmates' ability to easily communicate with their wives, I'd shoot myself in the dick before marrying an American woman.

Human Resources Have Absolute Power Over Male Workers

July 23, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Names and minor details have been changed, but otherwise this story is 100% true:

My friend Greg is an eminently employable fellow with a graduate degree in an in-demand field. In his management-level position paying well into six figures, he was responsible with overseeing both technical and customer-facing facets of a business. He was also forced to work alongside office managers who were retail-lifers that resented the salary and power commanded by a younger man. Greg's particular office manager was a late 30s twice-divorced single mother, who had been terminated from her last job for having sex with a subordinate on the premises. Despite her worthlessness as a person, Greg's relationship with her was cordial leading up to the incident that cost him his job.

The Incident

One day, a young girl was sent on a temp job to be managed by Greg. The girl was incapable of doing even basic tasks. Greg's office was understaffed to begin with, but he had to put up with someone who made stupid mistakes that could have led to serious liability for the company. Nonetheless, my friend was patient with her for a while, until he decided to be honest after she made the same mistake several times in a row. All Greg said was "This isn't difficult. I need you to start doing this the right way." The girl started crying immediately and wouldn't work for the rest of the day.

Greg explained the situation to the office manager divorcée and asked her to send the emotional girl home because she wasn't contributing anything and was causing a scene. Greg was forced to grind out the rest of the day solo. He chalked it up to a bad day and thought the matter was finished.

The Statement

When he arrived to work later that week, Greg was barraged by district, regional, and loss prevention managers. Unbeknownst to him, the two women had discussed the matter and gave a statement to HR that Greg was a terror to work for and created the nebulous and dreaded "hostile work environment" for females. My friend was astonished — he had a clean record, never had a formal complaint, and had in fact increased profitability at his location. The death blow came when the office manager alleged that Greg had called her a certain offensive word for the female anatomy. The young girl subordinate lied and corroborated this story, and he was promptly terminated.

Greg asked for notice, explanation, or rebuttal. He was afforded none of these things. The company maintained that they did not owe him an exit interview and because he was in an at-will employment state. He also requested a formal hearing and was turned down.

Loading...

The Aftermath

Greg collected only four weeks of unemployment before he found another job, but was later sued by the company for the money because he was terminated for misconduct. He didn't want to spend thousands of dollars on a lawyer to fight for a piddling $1700 in unemployment, so he elected to defend himself in the case. He attended a hearing via conference call, where the crying girl didn't even show up. The office manager and company personnel assailed his character until Greg was allowed to ask questions to the sworn-in office manager:

> Greg: "Did I ever directly or indirectly call you that word?"
> (there was a long silence on the line)
>
> Judge: "Answer the question please"
> Office Manager: "Well…I don't remember."
> Judge: "You gave a statement and another employee corroborated it. Did it or did it not happen?
> Office Manager: "…Well…it didn't really happen EXACTLY that way…but he made me feel really bad at work."

The judge confirmed that he never actually said the word that got him fired. Greg was allowed to keep the unemployment he had collected to that point, but never received reinstatement, compensation, or even an apology from his old company despite being fired for allegations were obviously false.

Greg was obviously pissed off and considered suing the company for wrongful termination, but ultimately did nothing. Many employers in his industry ask about prior wrongful termination suits in job interviews, and a friend in the industry advised that it was doubly damning if you were fired for creating a work environment hostile to women. He investigated the possible monetary settlements and, factoring in the attorney fees and extended litigation necessary for a relatively small dollar figure, decided to move on with his life.

A woman replaced him at his position.

Corporations are now so bent on political correctness that they will take an unsubstantiated claim from a woman and end a man's job or even career over it. This is a frighteningly common occurrence in a society that protects perceived "rights" of women in the workplace at the cost of truth, honor, or justice.

Things ultimately worked out well for Greg. He has a skill that is highly-paid and in-demand, so he was able to find another job almost immediately. Most men who are victims of HR terrorism are not so lucky. The moral of Greg's story: if you must work a corporate job, always cover your ass at work and remember who your true masters are. If you wish to keep your job you must document everything and fly as far under the radar of the female-dominated culture as possible, because there is rarely a good way to fight back.

Thoughts From A Siberian Girl

July 24, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

[image]
Siberia is an interesting place. My first impression — why the hell did I choose to come here? But it grows on you, ever so slowly, until you finally actually start appreciating the place. This week I met with a 24 year old Siberian girl on a platonic basis, for her to tell me about her city and her culture. Here are some of her thoughts on various topics, paraphrased:

Family

> I really want husband and children by now. I'm old at 24, and need to find someone. Several years ago, it was normal for girls to be married by 21 and start having kids. Now people are doing it later and I don't like it. Even still, some of my friends are already with second child.

Gender Roles

> I am not fan of this 'career woman' thing that is happening. What do you call it? Emancipation in America? I think it is horrible. Women should take care of families and the man should work.

America

> I don't like how America pushes itself and its ideas everywhere. It is spreading here and I don't like it. For example, the emancipation of women. Now sometimes women here think it's okay not to be married until later, and guys don't want to marry either. We don't even consider Moscow real Russia anymore, as it tries to be so American. I much prefer the USSR times even if that sounds crazy. At least then people got married when they should.
> Also we have stereotypes here that Americans are stupid, and sorry but I believe it. Are they really like that?

Health

> You should order this, it's real good Russian food. [I ask her what she wants.] Me? Nothing, it is past 7pm and I don't eat at night. I have to stay in good fitness.

Gays

> I don't think I can live in America. I am — how you say? — homophobe? I don't like gays or lesbians. You guys like them too much, I don't understand it.

My thoughts…

This is one of the more interesting and real conversations I have had with a girl. I wish I had more to share. About 15 minutes into our meeting I was tempted to break out my phone or pen/paper and start taking notes, but that would have been awkward. Especially given what started as platonic was morphing into sexual interest, as there was some thigh pushback.*

We went into discussing the dating culture here and she expressed her disinterest with Russian men. They were lazy and noncommittal. Upon pressing more, the men act this way because they have so many options. Later that night I went out to a club, and the ratio was blatantly more girls than guys. The girls there were telling me there were never any good looking guys at the club. On my way there, I saw a guy in shorts and flip flops with a model type in heels and a dress.

As Winston Churchill so famously exclaimed, Russia "is a riddle wrapped in a mystery inside an enigma." I agree. It is still to early to make any conclusive statements about the culture as I've only been here a week. But I am intrigued and look forward to increasing my understanding as I spend some more time here in the depths of Mother Russia.

* Thigh pushback is my rather reliable way to gauge a girl's sexual interest in me. While sitting next to each other, I let my thigh or knee fall onto her thigh while continuing my conversation in a non-sexual manner. If she retracts her thigh, she is not interested. If she keeps her thigh there, she is interested. If she pushes back with her thigh, she is very interested.

Helping Friends Who Have No Game Is A Bad Idea

July 24, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

One of the natural effects of having or developing advanced game is an impulse to help your close friends who aren't quite as fortunate as you. Seeing a friend paralyzed by simple interactions with the opposite sex, languishing in a relationship with a sub-standard girl, or being held back by the series of relationship myths that are force-fed to men—which are grounded in zero real-world realities—is enough to tempt even the coldest-hearted player into generously breaking off some crumbs from his hard-earned wisdom loaf.

Even if you're not overpowered by your generosity—or game reflexes—you're bound to get half-hearted solicitations for your "secrets" sooner or later. Like a guy with a cooler of sweaty bottles of Gatorade in the desert, you and your riches will elicit the envy of the thirsty.

But talk to any experienced player and he will tell you the same thing: throwing a blue-pill, no-game, sexless friend a game lifeline comes with major risks.

He Simply Won't Get It

Unless he's a young guy who simply hasn't had exposure yet (an increasingly unlikely scenario given the penetration of game-related material on the Internet), odds are your friend has had ample opportunities to observe and pick up elementary "game" in the real world. Yet, he's repeatedly passed up the opportunity. Instead, he probably buys into the mainstream, romantic-comedy version of dating, where things "just happen" and the "right girl" will fall out of the sky onto his dick if he waits long enough. Or, worse, he will have been infected by full-fledged feminist brainwashing: that deliberate efforts to meet and connect with women are "predatory" or "creepy"; that pursuing attractive girls is "shallow"; or that "game" is a series of mind-bending tricks to manipulate or confuse "insecure girls" into sleeping with you. Talking a guy out of this mindset is—if not outright impossible or dangerous—a time commitment ten times bigger than you imagine.

He Will Make Endless Excuses

Since it's unlikely that your friend has zero idea about what to do, chances are that he's actually a pussy, lazy, or simply not ready to undertake the long, arduous journey of learning game. Like learning a musical instrument or language, getting good with women requires years of work to learn, and an on-going commitment to maintain. His problem, in other words, goes well beyond simply not knowing game. He lacks the prerequisite personality traits necessary and mindset to improve. Whether it's insecurity about his height or race, faultfinding all the prospects around him, or the classic I'm-not-looking-to-bang-tons-of-girls-I'm-just-looking-for a-girlfriend logic, a man who's not ready will engage in the most impressive verbal and mental acrobatics to stay precisely where he is.

He Won’t Value Your Advice

Before I knew any better, I spend countless hours trying to help a miserably sexless friend who was habitually friendzoned by the surprisingly many cute girls in his social circles. He sat by as guy after guy plucked girls from his stable of crushes, pounded them out for a while, and returned them to the bin, like unrewinded video tapes to a Blockbuster. I eventually banged one of those girls myself, and he actually “confronted” me on the phone about it:

> No-Game Friend: …I think you should set me up with one of your female friends.
> Me: I don’t have any female friends. And, why?
> No-Game Friend: Because you got Amanda because of me. You could set me up with your friend Sara.
>
> Loading…
> Me: I met Amanda on my own, you didn’t even introduce us. And, Sara has a boyfriend. Not to mention that I’m currently trying to bang her. [I eventually did]
> No-Game Friend: Bottom line is you met Amanda at my party. You got something because of me and I never get anything from you!
> Me: Are you kidding me? Amanda wasn’t even there for your party, it’s just coincidence that you happen to know her. Plus, I’ve been helping you for months, coaching you when we go out, and given you volumes of rock-solid advice I never share with anyone.
> No-Game Friend: Advice is worthless. I want girls, not advice.

This story is extreme, but it’s hardly unique. Thirsty beta and blue-pill guys want magic bullets, not prescriptive programs that require social risk and work. They don’t see value in field-tested, results-proven information—especially when it comes free of charge. Guys pay a month’s salary on much less than I’d given him.

He Will Repeatedly Cockblock or Crab You

“Helping your friend” often involves bringing him out with you. That means enduring cockblock after cockblock during their learning phase, not to mention the consequences of the stink of lameness that wafts off of him and hangs over your whole party. Even when this isn’t the case, your friend will not remember or respect the wingman’s code when—crazed by his thirst—he sees the oasis on the horizon.

I once introduced another game-less friend to two Eastern European girls I was working at a club. In the clumsiest and most obvious way, he kept climbing over me to talk to the girl I’d clearly selected (the cuter and slightly thinner of the two), repeatedly interrupting me and ignoring the other girl. When he finally managed to scare them both off, I pulled him aside:

> Me: What are you doing, man? You know better than to go after my girl.
> No-Game Friend 2: I don't want the fat one. I want the hot one.
> Me: Yeah, it doesn't matter what you "want." You didn't do the work. You know the guy who opens gets to pick. Plus, she's not even fat!
> No-Game Friend 2: Well, if she's not fat why don't you take her then?
> Me: Because that's not how it works.
> No-Game Friend 2: Well, when they come back why don't we just see who they pick? [defiantly]
> Me: They're not coming back, you idiot.

You'll Destroy the Friendship

You broke it, you bought it. When you undisturb your friend's placid existence—however deluded or sexless it may be—he becomes your responsibility. I've heard stories of guys being blamed for future failures ("I said what you told me and I scared the girl away. This was my chance and you fucked me over!"), of thin-skinned newbies not being able to handle the sometimes-brutal feedback, and of former friends becoming active haters ("He only does well with chicks by manipulating them").

If you're like me, you actually don't outright befriend guys who don't display some degree of game already. I've gradually come to the point that I can't fully respect a man who doesn't have at least some marginal skills around women, since it speaks to other areas of his personal development, social intelligence, and masculinity.

But when can you help a friend with no game? When he begs you to teach him, and keeps returning after repeated rejections and denials that you even "have game."

Then you'll know he truly wants to–and can–learn.

Can Strippers, Pornstars and Live Sex Models Be Good Girlfriends?

July 24, 2013 | by Alex Matlock | Link | Original Link

We all want to go up to our friends and say “Hey man, I’ve been dating a stripper for 2 months, what have you been up to?” As fun as that may seem, could you really handle it?

Unless you’re a stone cold killer, a player or a dude that can’t have an emotional connection, dating women like these will always be difficult but, if you can soldier on, the benefits might very well be worth the extra stress.

Strippers

[image]

I’ve added strippers first on this list because dating a stripper may very well be the easiest out of the bunch. I’ve also been in a few “relationships” with strippers which means I have some experience.

The good:

The benefits here are plenty. First of all, if she’s a stripper, she’s got a rocking body. Not only that, she knows how to move and turn a guy on which when we think about it, is an outstanding quality to have as a woman.

Furthermore, knowing how to move usually also means, knows how to move in the bedroom. It’s the same with chicks that know how to dance a.k.a know how to keep a rhythm. If they can keep that rhythm on stage they could certainly keep that rhythm in the bedroom.

The Bad:

Most strippers aren’t hookers which means, most of them don’t sleep with their clientele. This means that if you’re banging a stripper that you may have met somewhere else, you can quickly get rid of that ridiculous idea out of your head. With that being said, she still gets naked (or at least topless) in front of other dudes. If this bothers you, then you can’t be dating no strippers. You need to understand that she is stripping for a living and will not stop doing it just because you said so.

Finally, most strippers have very little respect for the greasy dudes that walk into the strip club and shower her with greasy money which means that yet again, you can rest easy knowing that she won’t be banging or hooking up with the clientele. If you plan on taking this journey, make sure you don’t have a problem with your girlfriend getting naked and touching other dudes in a sleazy bar.

Live Sex Models

[image]

Live sex models are a different story. I’m actually dating one right now and it’s what gave me the idea for this article. Anyway, these chicks are different from strippers in the sense that they take things to a different level.

The good:

On the bright side, they don't get touched a lot by men, since most of their time is spent in front of a PC monitor with a piece of plastic/silicone/metal/glass inside their vagina. When you do touch them, they actually like it and as shocking as this may seem, they actually get really wet when it comes to being with a man.

Still on the bright side, they won't be digging through your pockets since they probably make A LOT more money than you. Let's not forget that they 100% know how to turn you on.

The bad:

They get naked on camera. Not naked like a stripper, but naked and abusive with all their orifices. They do this in front of men (who are often times showing how they're wanking off) for money. To make matters worse, the shit they see on a regular basis will blow you away. If it won't blow you away, it will probably make your dick hide in your ass which means it'll be really hard to show a girl like this a good time.

Also, if you're not into this kind of thing, know that your friends and even your dad could be paying her to get naked right now.

Just because these girls know how to use a dildo in front of a webcam doesn't mean these girls know how to have sex. They do know how to turn you on (and themselves) with a dildo, but not necessarily during sex. They never cum at work (unless it's requested and paid for, yet often still faked) and their hole gets a whole lot of abuse on a daily basis. The sex you'll have won't be pretty special unless the chick you're seeing is on a mission to satisfy you.

Finally, these women make a ton of money. That may be good if you're a lazy cheap bastard but most men will have a problem with this. The chick I'm seeing makes around $400-$600 a day, usually not working more than 5 hours. I don't know what sort of job you've got but that's insane for most people.

Pornstars

This is where stuff starts to get a lot more complicated. I've dated one of these chicks that I could say was doing semi-pro porn meaning it's not the sleazy shit you get on the free sites but it's also not the top notch BRAZZERS stuff you pay cash for.

The Good:

She can and will do the craziest shit in bed. She will know how to give you a blowjob because it comes with the job description. You can be proud of what you've got especially if she's well known and you can tell your friends about it. Also, she doesn't do that many scenes a month as the Live Sex Model so, she won't always be sore which means she'll bang you whenever you want.

The Bad:

The biggest issue is that she has sex with other men for a living. They do get tested, it is clean, but you'll always know that some pornstar dude was probably banging your girlfriend today. There's more to it than this but I if you can deal with that, you'll probably be able to handle everything. The sex she has in front of the camera is considered work which is completely different from the sex she has with you. If you can wrap that around your head, you might just be able to pull this off.

If you're possessive over women and believe that your girlfriend should only sleep with you, even if sleeping with other dudes doesn't mean anything then having a pornstar chick as your girlfriend might not be the best idea.

Final Notes:

Personally, I don't really have a problem with dating any of these women. My confidence is usually high and I'm not afraid I'm going to lose them or that one of them is cheating on me. Unfortunately, I don't see any of them as marriage material and you probably feel the same way. With that being said, just remember that this last little fact is never something you'd want to share with them.

On an unrelated note, I just finished putting together an ebook about text messaging. Learn more here: The Player's Guide To Texting Women.

The Long Ships

July 25, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

The Long Ships is a novel that chronicles the lives of several Vikings as they pillaged their way across Europe. It is the Scandinavian Odyssey.

Scandinavians used to have a principal profession of killing, robbing, and kidnapping. This wasn't just a few bad apples in Scandinavian society but a cultural norm where the word "viking" was a verb that meant the invasion of other lands. They robbed and murdered with impunity, even on each other.

> One of the twenty men who had followed Krok up the ladder was hanging from the stockade with an arrow in his eye, and three others had been hit in their passage along the bridge; but all those who had managed to reach the ground safely packed themselves together in a tight phalanx and, raising their battle-cry, fought their way with spear and sword to the gate. Here it was very dark, and they found themselves hard pressed indeed, with enemies behind as well as in front of them.
> "For no man," he said, "complains of the weight of the cargo when it is his own booty that is putting strain on his oar."

One of the main characters, Orm, became a galley slave on an enemy ship, rowing endlessly and often being whipped, but when the narrator describes his massive increase in strength and endurance, I couldn't help but slightly admire his misfortune. How full of malaise is modern life where you romanticize about being a slave on a cramped boat?

> …when the bride, who belonged to a well-known local family, saw her uncle's eye gouged out by one of the bridegroom's kinsmen, she had seized a torch from the wall and hit her bridegroom over the head with it, so that his hair caught fire. One of the bridesmaids, with great presence of mind, had forced her petticoat over his head and twisted it tight, thereby saving his life, though he screamed fearfully and his head, when it appeared again, was burned black and raw. Meanwhile the fire had caught the straw on the floor, and eleven drunken or wounded men lying in it had been burned to death; so that this wedding was generally agreed to have been one of the best they had had for years in > Finnveden, and one that would be long remembered. The bride and bridegroom were now living together in blissful happiness, though he had not been able to grow new hair to replace that which he had lost in the fire.

The story proceeds at a crisp pace, introducing brief side stories that add to the Viking atmosphere. This was a hard book to put down.

> Then the swords were passed round the whole table, for many of the guests were curious to examine such fine weapons, and Orm fidgeted nervously until he had Blue-Tongue back at his waist again, for he felt half naked without her cheek against his thigh.
> Loading...
> Everyone in the hall was happy to see that there was a good prospect of an armed combat; for a fight between two such men as Orm and Sigtrygg was sure to be worth the watching. Both King Sven and Styrbjörn expressed their opinion that this would add pleasant variety to the Yuletide drinking.
> "I have never myself met any of these Norwegians," he said, "but everyone knows that an encounter with them always provides fine fighting and good tales for the survivors to tell their children.

Foreign girls were attracted to the Viking men..

> When the crews caught sight of several fine young women among them, they shouted enthusiastically to them to make haste and come down, promising that they would find good prizes aboard, silver and merriment and bold men, as well as plenty of priests to pardon their sins in the best Christian manner. One or two of the young women giggled coyly and answered that they had a mind to do as the men bade them, but that it was a long way to jump; whereupon they were immediately grabbed by the hair by furious kinsfolk, who promised them the birch on their bare bodies for indulging in such lewd chatter with heathen men.

Unfortunately for the men, isolation with a woman was almost impossible. Heavy "coercion" of foreign women seemed to be the primary means Viking men had pre-marital sex. The sexes were kept separate because everyone knew that sex was almost guaranteed to happen once a man and woman were alone. This was undesirable because such an act would impede on a woman's honor and make it harder for her to find a husband. Times have since changed.

> …while to look for truth in a man can be like looking for a cuckoo in a dark wood, to look for the truth in a woman is like looking for the echo of the cuckoo's voice.
> […]
> The women of Miklagard are worth little. As soon as they marry, they become > thoughtless and lazy, and childbearing ages them and makes them fat and insubordinate. When their husbands try to tame them, they run shrieking to their priests and bishops. They are not like our women, who are understanding and work diligently and whom childbearing makes wiser and more comely.

> "I have killed him," he said, "though he was my kinsman. But I do not intend that any guest of mine shall be attacked, even by a madman. Besides which, his spear broke my feasting-cup; and whoever had done that, I would have killed him." The cup lay in fragments, and he was much grieved at its loss, for such a one he would not easily find again.
> …a well-manned ship is the best of all things. It is good to sit contented ashore, and no man need be ashamed to do so; but a voyage to a far land, with booty awaiting a man and this smell in his nostrils, is as good a lot as could be desired, and a sure cure for age and sorrow.

Not much more can be said of a book that is entertaining and captures the essences of masculinity long past. I highly recommend it.

A Little Known Mass Building Technique

July 25, 2013 | by AlphaX | Link | Original Link

Are you a hard gainer? I thought I was. When I started lifting in high school I was very thin and soft. Like a wad of cookie dough. I spent most of my high school and college years reading every article I could find on adding mass and getting bigger. I took every BS supplement available, and even had to go to the hospital once with a very bad reaction to one supplement that was supposed to give me 20 pounds of muscle growth in a month. That type of gain is better than what even illegal drugs can do, but I didn't know that at the time.

Of course, most of the articles and (mis)information I read came from body building magazines. You know the ones: Muscle & Fitness, Muscle Mag, Flex or Iron Man, to name a few. And each month there would be some new detailed workout by a top (drug using) body builder telling me on what days to workout, how many reps to do, and how this workout would make me massive! So I would try this workout, and usually overtrain since I wasn't using the chemical substances the bodybuilder was to recuperate so fast.

At one point, while I was totally out of shape, I decided once and for all I was going to learn how this is done. Rather than reading the online "How To Get Big" eBooks, I went to Baylor's Medical Library. I figured I would learn a lot from studying medical text books on health and fitness.

Now here's a funny thing that I have since confirmed with a few friends and relatives that are doctors: doctors know very little on health and fitness. It's not that they don't understand the body outside of health, or on how to repair the body with medicine or surgery. They just don't know sports health. I am very thankful for the skilled surgeon that rebuilt my knee with cadaver tendons to a point where it is actually stronger than before the accident. I am extremely thankful for all of the doctors that have put this body back together after my multitude of bike and car wrecks. The problem is, they (as a collective whole) don't have a clue how to build muscle optimally, and I have had doctors even give me a hard time for wanting to be bigger.

In reading the text books at Baylor, I learned how muscle is built. I learned about micro-tears and the rebuilding of not only muscle tissue, but the cardiovascular system that must grow to deliver oxygen for each rep, and the nervous system that must grow to deliver the electrical stimuli to contract this new muscle tissue so that is able to deliver more force when utilized. All fascinating stuff.

[image]

What I couldn't find in any of these books was HOW TO OPTIMIZE a routine to grow muscle. We all understand the basics: overload the muscle to failure, and the muscle will grow back stronger. It was at this time I decided to become a trainer and sports nutritionist to learn how this is done. I did learn more through this process, especially about technique and form. I did become certified as a trainer, but I dropped out of the nutritionist program. I swear, every person that was teaching these classes or was a "certified nutritionist" was 80 lbs overweight, or so soft and flabby that it repulsed me (for reference feel free to Google "fat nutritionist"). If they had the secrets, they weren't using them. Instead I started learning about evolutionary diets and following a modified paleolithic diet – one that I structured to ensure the metabolism stayed in high gear and the body's natural muscle and fat burning hormones where maximized in their release.

[image]

While learning about muscle growth, I began to study nutrients, vitamins, essential compounds, micro-nutrients and so on. There are certain substances that if you are deficient in, you simply won't build muscle. For example, you can eat and lift all you want and you will not add one molecule of muscle without sufficient pyridoxine in your system. For those of you not in the know, this is vitamin B6, and is only taken by the most devout bodybuilders. Not because it doesn't work, or is expensive or anything like that. It is simply not taken because most people don't know they need it. It's not sexy to advertise or sell vitamin B6 to become big and muscular. There just isn't enough money in it.

With my knowledge of training and side knowledge of body mechanics and nutrition, it finally made sense as to why body building is looked at like a three legged stool: rest, nutrition, resistance. Miss any leg of the stool and you will not grow. I had finally nailed the diet and I believe I have a fairly solid handle on supplements and nutrients (including vitamins), but I wasn't sure on the lifting. The routines that I did were the same routines everyone at the gym lifting weights did, with only minor variations. And results were still slow in coming even with nutrients and a clean diet.

Around this time I learned about a little known (or little thought about) fact. Did you ever realize you can hold more weight than you can lift? Did you realize you can lower more weight than you can lift but not as much as you can hold? I believe this is evolution's little trick to keep us from lifting something heavier than we can hold, which prevents us from crushing ourselves. Ah, Mother Nature, you sweet mistress. We can use this trick to overload the muscles with an intensity most lifters never achieve.

From this I started doing a lot of negatives in my workout, which improved my results. While researching medically documented muscle gains I read about the "The Colorado Experiment" and how static contractions can increase muscle mass.

[image]

Static Contractions

A static contraction is lifting as much weight as you can handle a minimal distance and holding it for 10 seconds.

By limiting the range of motion in an exercise, we can effectively increase intensity. The theory is that a subject could gain more muscle lifting 200 pounds a few inches one time than he could by lifting 100 pounds through his full range of motion multiple times.

Since intensity is so important in stimulating muscle growth, a study was created to see what would happen if bodybuilders used almost zero range of motion but with the heaviest weights they could possibly hold. Some hardcore bodybuilders were recruited who had already developed impressive builds. They were put on a routine averaging just 2.1 workouts per week where subjects statically held heavy weights (without any up and down movement) in their strongest range but without being “locked out”.

After just 10 weeks of static contraction training, these subjects:

- Increased static strength 51.3%
- Increased their full range 1-rep max 27.6%
- Increased their full range 10-rep max 34.3%
- Added 9.0 pounds of new muscle (one subject added 28.9 pounds)
- Lost 4.9 pounds of fat
- Added .5 inches to their biceps
- Added 1.1 inches to their chest

In testing this myself, I found that just doing heavy static contractions did increase muscle mass. The biggest problem I personally saw was that of symmetry. While my muscles got bigger, I noticed that they were developing a little out of proportion to each other. This is when I decided to couple a static contraction with a few sets of negative focused drop sets to make sure every muscle fiber was exhausted – large and small, fast and slow twitch.

Now I do static contractions, then reverse pyramid drop sets, to completely work every muscle fiber. It was once believed that the soreness after training was from lactic acid buildup in the muscles. However, now I believe that science has shown that lactic acid leaves your body within a few hours, and that longer term soreness is actually micro tears in the muscle and nervous system.

I tell you this because soreness is one way to judge the effectiveness of your workouts. If you aren’t sore 3-4 days after doing one of these workouts, you are not pushing yourself. And that is after every workout. Not just the first two weeks of training, but every workout for life.

The Basics of a Static Contraction

Bench Press: This exercise is performed inside a power rack or on a Smith Machine. Position the bar within two inches of your extended reach. Place 30-100% more weight on the bar than you normally use. Press the bar up one inch (do not lock-out) and hold for a count of 10 seconds. Experiment to find the most weight you can hold for 10 seconds.

Leg Press: This exercise is performed with the safety stops engaged at ALL TIMES. Position the seat so the sled is within 2 inches of your full extension. Place 100-200% more weight on the press than you normally use. Press the sled up one inch off the safety stops. Hold for a count of 10 seconds. Experiment to find the most weight you can hold for 10 seconds.

Lat Pull Down: This exercise is performed with the lat ull down machine. Position the seat or chain so the bar is within two inches of your extended reach (I uses mountain climbing hooks to lower the bar). Select 30-100% more weight on the machine than you can actually do. Pull the bar down one inch (do not lock-out) and hold for a count of 10 seconds. Experiment to find the most weight you can hold for 10 seconds.

Push yourself to the limits of your capability. Most people using this method make the mistake of estimating the weight they can lift far too low. You literally want to experience complete failure at 10 seconds. Then with each body part you add drop sets where you want the last rep to be at complete failure. My current static contraction for the bench press is 545 pounds. My first flat bench set is 315 pounds for 2-5 reps, wherever I happen to hit complete failure on that day. I then drop the weight by 20 pounds and go again. After going through all my bench press exercises with a negative drop set on every set, my final set is on a Nautilus bench press machine with a mere 40-60 pounds. I try with everything I have to get 20 reps, and sometimes I just can’t do it.

When you repeat these exercises expect very significant increases in weight and muscle mass. This routine coupled with a clean diet and a lot of rest was the foundation for my transformation from a 38 year old typical executive with a 40 inch waist barely able to bench 225 into a man with a 31 inch waist benching 385 for my max. It feels good to be that man.

Good luck!

How To Get Laid In South Korea

July 26, 2013 | by RedpoleQ | Link | Original Link

I've been teaching boot camps in South Korea since 2007 and while there is no doubt that Korean girls are hard, there are a lot of factors at play in Seoul that determine how easy or difficult it will be for any individual guy in any particular situation. And while you'll have to hustle, consistently getting Korean girls is very doable.

How Superficial Are Korean Girls?

Looks (including fashion) and status carry you a lot further here than in Japan, China, Hong Kong, and Taiwan. And when I say that, I mean that the bonus you get over the average guy for being attractive is so huge that an average guy will have to put in time and suffer flakes to pull a 7 (by Korean guy standards), while a good looking guy can have that girl call him up when she's drunk to suggest they hit a love motel together.

Status is similar. I know two guys who had it super easy in Korea. Both were American guys in their mid/late 20s and one worked for Google and the other worked for Groupon. They loved to party and they rolled with Korean guys, and had status because of their work situation. A guy here could be in the midst of being blown out and then if he hands the girl a card that says Samsung on it, things will flip super hard and he'll have an easy time to get the girl.

Among Korean "pickup artists", it's not uncommon to lie, about where they went to school (Seoul National University) or where they work (Samsung) and what car they drive (Mercedes) to get the lay. Since most Korean guys wouldn't keep seeing a girl who bangs them on the first night, the lying doesn't much matter. Also, the girl is so drunk she probably can't remember anyway. That's the other main tactic. Use status to pull her to your table, then get her so drunk that you can take her wherever.

What Makes Korea So Hard Is…

There is no doubt that Korean girls are the hardest in Asia for most guys who end up here. Guys seem to have the easiest time adjusting to China, while Japan gets amazingly easy if you're shooting for 7s and below, and understand how Japan works.

It's true that Korean guys are the worst cockblocks in Asia by a wide margin. And even if a guy just gives a girl the evil eye, that can be enough to make her walk off on you even though he's a total stranger. If you're a black guy, I think you'll find that non-black lover Korean girls are more open to black guys than non-black lover Thai girls are. And I think that average black guys don't have it much harder than average white guys here. Indian guys don't seem to be at any particular disadvantage either.

The fact is that most every guy (Koreans included) has a hard time getting action from Korean girls. Similar to how the US has the oft broken 3-date rule, Koreans have the 100 days rule which basically says you shouldn't sleep with a guy until he's been your boyfriend for 100 days! Of course they violate their rule all the time, but you have a good idea of the mindset. Korean girls don't seem to lose their virginity until around 22. One of my guys is dating a girl who is 28, and of her 10 close female friends, 2 are still virgins. A lot of Korean guys still want their wives to be virgins, though that's changing.

Where Should I Go To Find Korean Girls in Seoul?

Both day game and night game in Seoul are awesome. I'd say that most guys who are running both get a pretty even split on the lays they get from day game and night game. Day game is significantly easier because you don't have to deal with cock blocks and girls are often at coffee shops studying alone or waiting for friends. Also, there are massive volumes of girls in day game.

Generally, Hongdae is the least status conscious area because it's teeming with what my Korean friends says are the "poor students". It's also got the alternative scene and the biggest lesbian club in Seoul. Most foreigners find this to be the easiest place to pull good quality young girls. There are also a lot of bars/clubs that cater to young girls curious about foreigners here.

Itaewon is the next best place, though you're going to be going for girls that are more in the mid/late 20s and early 30s instead of girls in their early 20s. Much of Itaewon has become quite upscale in the past 3 years or so and it's starting to be less of a dive bar scene (though there are still plenty of those). Club UN is known for girls who are into black guys, and I even met a girl who got hit in the head with a bottle by another girl who was trying to take her man there.

B-ONE and glam are the spots to go these days. And along with Helio's, you'll find the highest number of white-lover Korean girls, though you will still have to open a lot unless you're really, really attractive by Korean standards.

Gangnam is by far the most difficult because the girls are both young and hot. It's teeming with 8+s. It's true that they are status conscious, and that they are also very image conscious, but most of my guys think it's worth it and with the volume coming through, as long as you don't mind getting blown out, you will find girls that hook.

There are a ton of night spots to choose from, but unsurprisingly, the more upscale the place, the more you will get blown out. You don't need a table to pull as most of the guys dropping big cash with fancy cars also go home alone, but you will get more interaction time. Usually tables are good, because girls' feet get tired and they want free drinks, so you get a longer opportunity to game sets that hook, which does improve your chances somewhat.

Here's the Bottom Line on Getting Korean Women

The flake rate is atrocious and I recommend massive texting as Korean girls are really much more concerned with how much you like them, than how much they like you. According to an informal street survey of Korean girls, 40-60 texts PER DAY is the norm between a girl and a guys she’s dating.

Japanese girls have the best faces in Asia, Chinese girls have the biggest tits, Taiwanese girls have a good mix of the Korean bodies and the Japanese faces, but hands down, Korean girls have the best bodies—long legs, and what they call a great “S-line” is common.

Korea is by far the hardest to game in East Asia, but it is very doable and most guys who learn game here will be able to close regularly if they are consistently meeting girls and have solid logistics. If you find that gaming Korean girls is easy it’s because either: (a) you are good looking to Koreans, (b) you have low standards, or (c) you have high status.

How To Pull A Slut From A Vegas Pool Party

July 26, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Summer is well upon us and this the time for the pools to be filled with sexy girls in tiny bikinis that somehow get smaller every year. By 2016 they will all be naked and I will walk around with a raging boner and a bottle of vodka, ready to stick both in any willing and participating pool sluts. A lot of you cats have written me regarding my Free Vegas Party Guide and have asked for more information specifically regarding Vegas pool parties, so I have obliged and here is the Guide of All Guides on How To Pull A Slut From A Vegas Pool Party.

With our current economy in shambles and no end in sight, I'm going to provide tips here so that you can go to a Vegas Pool Party and not spend a grip of dough. Yes, there's a Baller Way to do a pool party and it's very effective, however, here's how to do it on the cheap.

Slap on your sunscreen, slather your cock with KY and prepare for a fucking blast when you head to a pool party in Vegas. A small minority of people want to bitch how it's impossible to go out to a nightclub or beach club and you have to spend a grip to get laid. Wrong. You don't, but your biggest enemy is having a 'wingman' and your greatest friend is logistics. That's right, for a pool party you're definitely better off being there solo and I'll explain why in a bit.

From Bare Pool, one of my favorite pool party spots.

5. Get In The Right Mood

The first thing you have to make sure of, is that your mood is good. No one wants a Danny Downer roaming the pool party bitching about the heat. People go to pool parties to have FUN and a lot of it. Get yourself in a good mood while you're in your hotel room and carry it with you the rest of the day.

Listen to feel-good music, watch some funny clips on YouTube, and hype yourself up, so when you walk into the pool party your very AURA is on point and you become a magnet for girls. A lot of gaming girls in party environments comes down to being in the right mood, which you send off signals about before you even open your mouth.

Roll solo or with an experienced wingman who is down for a good time too. I have seen tons of guys get cock-blocked by a friend or even worse, they have to babysit the 'wingman' because their buddy got too wasted. If you're not 100% confident in your wingman's abilities leave him in the room. Also, it'll make it much much easier to get in immediately and not wait in line for an hour.

4. Pre-Drink & Pre-Mingle

Here's where you're going to save some money. Pool parties in Vegas generally start popping around noon-1pm. Tired sluts and studs are finally emerging from their hangover sleep and heading down to the pool. Here's some real advice: PRE-DRINK. One drink in one of those plastic cups at Wet Republic is $40. Yes, $40. Granted it's the equivalent of like 5-6 drinks so you get your money's worth, however if you have high tolerance like myself, then you could spend $120 and barely be buzzed.

Get a bottle from a liquor store off the Strip and post up in your room doing shots and getting your buzz on. This will costs you $15-20. Also, buy two Gatorades, whatever flavor you prefer. In one of the Gatorade bottles, after you've drank or poured out half, fill with vodka. You now have half-vodka and half Gatorade drink which is smooth as a strippers pussy. This is the best drink for staying hydrated, and trust me, Vegas heat during the day at a pool party is no fucking joke. The Gatorade counterbalances the alcohol.

Now that you have your proper buzz, get dressed for the pool party and head down to the casino floor. Note: Vegas pool parties are very strict on the swimsuit you wear. Do not wear basketball shorts; they will turn you away. Your shorts must be swimsuit material.

Once on the casino floor, start mingling. Talk to every fucking girl you see. Say 'hi', bullshit, just get warmed up. The moment you hit the pool you need to already be comfortable talking to girls. Mingling first will do that. Don't think of it as 'hitting on girls' either. Think about it as you're having the time of your life and you're spreading your infectious energy and happiness to everyone. Don't trip, soon enough you'll have a slut spreading her legs.

3. BE The Party

You now have gotten your mood in a great place, you have a nice buzz and you're feeling pretty confident and ready to meet some sluts. After you get past the rope and you're inside a slice of heaven and your neck is sore from all the ass walking around and tits staring back at you, I'm going to drop some next level club game on you. You ready?

Over 80% of the girls at the pool party are on drugs. Not a shock, but specifically, they are on MDMA or 'Molly'. Now I would never recommend you taking drugs to meet girls; there's simply no need to, but what I'm about to tell you will help you when dealing with these girls.

The girls, due to the excitement of being in Vegas, wearing next to nothing (it's a fact, that when adults are in public in little clothing, they're in a state of excitement), and being on drugs, that they will be happy. In fact, I believe it's even easier to meet girls at a pool party then a nightclub due to this variable. Yes, at nightclubs girls are on drugs as well, but not as much as during the day parties. Partly, because they need to wake up from the night before so the pop a pill, and partly because the pool parties are dominated by the EDM culture. So we have the girls in a state of uber-happiness. How do you deal with that?

By Matching Their State. Essentially, the easiest way to do this, since you're not on drugs, is to look at the pattern of activity of people around you. Observe. You can literally mirror people's actions by doing a slightly toned down version of what they're doing. I know this can be done because I do it at every day club or nightclub that I host at. I have to. If I were to consume drugs with all of my clients 4-5 times a week, I'd be dead. I came up with this because it's frustrating as hell to be around drugged up/drunk people and be sober.

Here's an example: chew gum. First off, it keeps your breathe fresh and you are talking to sluts all day. Secondly, people on MDMA tend to grind their teeth. Just by you chewing gum, it gives off the vibe that you too must be on MDMA.

Now you might be wondering why it matters if people think you're on shit or not… because people do not like reminders of sobriety while in a party environment. Trust me on this. It's a human subconscious reflex to reject the tribe member who won't eat the buffalo tongue with the rest of the tribe.

Secondly, Move To The Music. Note: I didn't say you have to dance, but some movement is necessary. I have my own shit I do and to each their own, but a Vegas Pool Party is NOT a place to stand under an imported palm tree and have your arms crossed.

I want you to walk around the pool talking to every girl who looks your way and be fun, be cool, be flirty. Smile, engage, flirt, and bounce. Follow my formula in the 10 Club Commandments for working a room. This is even more critical for a pool party.

2. Escalate And Hold On

Unless you look like a troll and have the game of I Am Sam, you WILL meet a slut at a Vegas Pool Party who's reciprocating your game. Now normally, I would recommend playing it chill and then going for it, however, for a pool party you must understand you're dealing with the following 'cockblock' issues:

1. It's day time. Girls feel freakier at night. It has something to do with the darkness of night I believe. Corrupt souls that they are.

2. She will have one friend at least. Focus on groups of two girls. They are in Vegas for cock and it's not difficult at all to pull 2 friends for a threesome after a pool party. The groups save for last resort.

3. They are planning on going out that night after the pool party so they want rest and food. This is the #1 Cockblock of Vegas Pool Parties. Thankfully, I am providing you with the solution…

Back to solutions. After building some comfort with her, venue change her within the same venue (I.e. You meet her at the bar, talk etc). Then grab her hand and go to the opposite side of the pool party and hang out. You don't need a fucking reason, she's buzzed and doesn't really care, it's to get her used to going somewhere else with you and her being safe.

If she's holding your hand and making out with you and rubbing her firm phat ass on your cock with her wet bikini, then you have a girl who is DTF asap. Stick with that girl and for all intent and purposes put all your eggs in one basket. Here's what you say:

You: "Fuckit I'm going to drink in my room, put on some Pandora and order some room service. Let's go."

Her: "What about my friend?"

You: (motioning to her friend who's dancing with a dude) "She's a big girl and she looks busy" (wink)

Her: (laughing) "Ok, let's go"

You: (grab her hand and get the fuck out of there asap)

Note: Generally speaking the best actual physical time to pull the girl is between 4:30-5:30pm. Any earlier she's probably going to blow you off because she wants to hear Tiesto's set. Well good ole Tiesto is only playing for an hour, so when his set is over the energy dies down considerable.

1. Logistics

The #1 Most Important Key Of Pulling A Slut From A Vegas Pool Party is Logistics.

You cannot skimp on this aspect, so even if you're on a tight budget, that's okay, but spend the majority of your trip budget on staying at the hotel connected to the day club that you're planning on attending. For example, if you want to go to Wet Republic Day Club, then you need to stay at The MGM, The MGM Signature Suites or Blue-Green Resort/Hotel. You can get rooms at these spots for reasonable rates, if you book early enough.

Meeting a girl and being able to get to your room ASAP, is everything. If you have to wait for a cab, (although you shouldn't be waiting if you took my taxi line bellman tip advice), or wait on the Strip stuck in a cab in traffic, or a million other things that can happen before you get her from the party to your room, then you're greatly REDUCING your chances of fucking her. Stay close and utilize the hell out of it. Get her up to your room and make sure you still have alcohol there ready to go. Once you get inside, do these things asap, especially if she's giving you resistance.

1. Walk in, grab the bottle of alcohol and do a shot with her.

2. Put your fancy smart phone on the iPhone player and play some music. You'll get a vibe for what she likes from earlier so throw that on.

3. Fuck room service. Kiss her, take that bikini off and go to town. After pool party sex is some of the best sex. I don't know why, but there's something primal and raw about it.

If you've never experienced a Vegas Pool Party well here's a taste gentlemen:

The First Red Pill Symposium

July 28, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

Two months ago I accepted the invitation of my good friend Giannozzo Strozzi for a celebration of his forty-second birthday at his family's modest yet comfortable villa outside Spoleto, in Umbria. He had mentioned that Roosh V would be flying in from the Ukraine to be present, and that some writers at Return of Kings would also be in attendance. (Not all writers were present, some having been detained at Rome due to travel delays). So I looked forward to the event with great anticipation. It is rare enough when the responsibilities of life allow us to escape and savor moments of reflection and conviviality, but it is rarer still to have an opportunity to share those moments with serious and stimulating personalities.

The topics we discussed at Strozzi's villa were weighty, beneficial, and memorable, and affected all of us deeply. I am sure all of us recall vividly the sight of Roosh V pacing back and forth, sometimes standing and sometimes reclining, answering our questions and goading us on, in his own maddening yet effective way, to greater and greater depths of inquiry.

I could not allow what was discussed there to fall into oblivion, so I took it upon myself to sketch some notes as our discussions during the weekend ran their course. What follows is my best recollection of the statements and dissertations of the speakers.

The Speakers: Roosh V, Athlone McGinness, Tuthmosis, Samseau, Christian McQueen, Emmanuel Goldstein, Law Dogger, Quintus Curtius, Giannozzo Strozzi, Rinaldo Manetti, Mario Palla, unidentified party.

Petri. Yesterday, Roosh, you presumptuously suggested that you could trace the origin and development of the patriarchy. I should like to hear more of that.

Goldstein. I would concur with that suggestion.

McGinnis. And I also, without doubt.

Roosh*. Well, you certainly seem eager not to waste time on preliminaries, my dear Petri. I suppose you could assist me by first explaining what you mean by "patriarchy". Am I to know what you mean by this word?

McQueen. Let's have none of these evasive games now, Roosh. The day has been long, and the mind grows weary. I think we all know what is meant by the term.

Roosh*. Do we, now? I certainly have never sought to wear out my welcome with unnecessary repetition. I have no desire to become one of those irritating poets who peddle stale verses. As Martial said of the annoying Ligurinus, who pestered him everywhere,

> Et stanti legis, et legis sedenti,
> Currenti legis, et legis cacanti.[1]

But I will certainly explain in detail what I mean by patriarchy and its origins. It is an important issue deserving of our patient consideration.

Tuthmosis*. It would be well to do so, for your position on this matter has yet to be fully clarified. We are thirsty, yet you seek to deprive us of the sustaining drink. One is reminded of Tantalus, surrounded by water but never able to quench his thirst,

> Mento summam aquam attingens enectus siti.[2]

Law Dogger. Well said, Tuthmosis. But let him proceed. I wish to hear the details, and can only gnaw on these olives here for so long. Pass me that wine there, Manetti.

Roosh. First, some preliminaries. The first matter is one that most of you are already aware of, but nevertheless must be said. This concerns the initial priority of silence in conducting inquiries into important issues. Silence must be the first imperative in the acquisition of knowledge and wisdom. Modern communication and technology has extended the persistence and scope of random opinion beyond anything imaginable by our ancestors; but this advancement in technology has not been matched by a concurrent advancement in patience and judgment. Technology has multiplied not only the volume of dispensers of knowledge, but also the founts of idiocy and jibberish as well.

Too many knaves now have a platform, too many dunces an outlet, and too many fools an unsustainable position. I often regret that our educational system places too great an emphasis on the training of the student's mind, but hardly anything at all on the development of the character and moral fortitude. Knowledge untempered by the fire of experience and wisdom is hardly worth its name.

Samseau. I would agree strongly with you on this point. Yet the modern environment is not exactly conducive to calm reflection and reasoning.

Roosh*. Consider, my friends, the philosopher Pythagoras. As soon as he deemed a novice worthy of admittance to his school, he would order the new student not to speak at all of the doctrines he was learning. This practice would continue for two years. Restraint in speech was the first imperative, as St. Benedict discovered centuries later when constructing the rule for his own order. Pythagoras believed, quite correctly, that a man was incapable of speaking coherently before he first learned to hold his tongue.

And so it is also with the art of leadership: one cannot lead unless one has first learned how to follow. It is also recorded that the second king of the Romans, Numa Pompilia, thought that his people should devote special worship to the goddess Tacita (that is, the goddess of silence). One seldom errs or goes astray by keeping silent, whereas injudicious speech has brought down many a house.

Palla*. I have often been sorry for my speech, but never for my silence.

Roosh*. Indeed, brother. It is a lesson that is lost on many people today, who can barely restrain themselves from offering an ill-considered thought on any occasion, and are hypersensitive to any perceived criticism. For this reason, we should not value what the ignorant multitude says of us, but only what wise men may think. Fame or infamy are two sides of the same coin; and the multitude, due to its feminine and fickle nature, can alternate between the two with startling rapidity. But let us consider the proposition at hand, the origin of the patriarchy.

[Unidentified party]. Yes, certainly. You had promised us an explanation of your position. But be mindful also of the warning the philosopher Pittacus issued: Tempus cognosce! [3]

Roosh. Let us begin. If I need to pace the room, forgive me in advance for this distraction. In most societies throughout history, the subordination of women has been the rule rather than the exception. Yes, there have been female rulers among some sub-Saharan African peoples; and in the social structure of the Pelew Islands, we are told by ethnologists, the chief made no decision without consultation from elder women. American Indian tribes present another example. Among the Iroquois and the Seneca, women also held great power. But these are the exceptions, rather than the rule.

Quintus. True. And during the Periclean period of Greek history, the social position of women was even lower than that of North American Indians. This, despite the fact that the relative position of women usually rises with the wealth of a society.

Roosh. Precisely. In the hunting stages of civilization, women perhaps did most of the work of the tribe except the dangerous pursuit and killing of big game. Agriculture, woodworking, weaving, pottery, child rearing, cooking, were all most likely female innovations. Because hunting involves brief periods of intense activity followed by long periods of rest, we can imagine that the life of a man in that age was something akin to bursts of danger interspersed by long periods of repose and idleness. We see this even today in many parts of the undeveloped world. In Neolithic times, women were most likely our near equals in strength and endurance. This is so because the sex roles may not have have been as differentiated as now with regards to physical labor. Anyone who has tried his hand at agriculture, the butchering of game, or any of the other handicrafts I have described will know how physically demanding they can be.

We are all, both men and women, but pale reflections of our ancestors! How many of us here can say they know what it is like to go without food, or without shelter, for any extended period of time? Or to be hounded by the ravages of disease? Primitive man knew that his life was either feast or famine. Some weeks the hunt went well, and some weeks he caught nothing. He and his kin were at the mercy of the elements, and the wild animals around him. Life could not be counted on beyond the next meal. And this is why in the primitive state before civilization, greed and cruelty may have been virtues, rather than the vices which they are today.

Manetti. I am not so sure, Roosh, that you are correct on this point.

Roosh. Women, at that time, were prized for their abilities as workers, artisans, and burden-bearers. I read once that a chief of the Chippewa Indians told an explorer, “Women are created for work. One of them can carry or draw as much as two men. They also pitch our tents, make our clothes, mend them, and keep us warm at night… we absolutely cannot get along without them on a journey. They do everything and cost only a little; for since they must be forever cooking, they can be satisfied in lean times by licking their fingers.” [4]

Law Dogger. Women may have been the original impetus behind primitive forms of commercial trade. That is, the exchange of agricultural goods, commodities, and necessary foodstuffs. We can imagine the women of one tribe or village exchanging “manufactured” goods with those of other communities.

Roosh. Perhaps. Primitive man, it is clear, had no delusions about sex and marriage as modern man does. He took his sex much more practically and philosophically than we do now, with no pretense to idealism. Marriage to primitive man was a frank economic transaction. He demanded from his woman practical virtues, along the lines of what I have earlier described. A woman who could function as an artisan, burden-bearer, child-rearer, or the like, was infinitely more valuable than one who could not. All women in those days, presumably, could do something useful. A woman who could do nothing was a burden, not a benefit. Certainly primitive man appreciated beauty—who does not?—but he was able to subordinate this appreciation of beauty to the necessities of life.

To him, marriage was worthless if it did not add to his economic benefit. How much more sensible were our ancestors than we are! Marriage was a profitable partnership, not a private pantomine of sexual frolic. The marital unit was meant to be a way for both parties to be more prosperous than if each worked alone.

Loading...

We would do well to remember this, brothers: in the history of civilization, whenever women have ceased to be an economic asset in marriage, the institution of marriage has declined. And when the institution of marriage has decayed, civilization has decayed with it. We see this process happening now with varying degrees of acceleration in different Western nations. Marriage has become nothing but a private contract, to be broken at a whim, with a resultant unequal transfer of wealth to the female. Civilization cannot sustain such an affront and a mockery for long.

Goldstein. I can see your point on this. But the implications are disturbing, and the leadership is incapable or unwilling to address it.

Roosh. Let us develop this point. As agriculture and societies became more complex and differentiated, it appears that the stronger sex—man—took more of the control of it into his hands. The domestication of animals, especially cattle, provided a source of wealth and power that women were unable to compete with. Slowly, women became replaced by animals in the fields; and the development of the plough placed more of a value on physical strength. The cultivation of the soil rose greatly in importance. For that reason, the stronger sex–man–desired the ability to pass it on to his offspring.

Manetti. Yes, this is quite true. The primacy of agriculture cannot be overstated. Land was transformed into a commodity of great value. As you know, Cato the Elder wrote in his treatise De Agricultura that the best use of agricultural land was "profitable cattle raising." He said the next best use of such land was "moderately profitable cattle raising"; and that the third best use of such land was "unprofitable cattle raising." In such a way did the great landed estates of Italy develop, the latifundia.

Roosh. The only way for a man to ensure that his woman's offspring were his own genetic product was for him to adapt custom and law to require the sexual subordination of women. Until that time, it is likely that virginity was a handicap rather than a virtue.

Strozzi. How so? I am not sure I follow you there.

Roosh. Primitive societies valued fertility over virginity, my dear Strozzi. The ability to bear offspring was an economic advantage. An obvious pregnancy settled all doubts as to fertility.

In any case, property began to be passed down through the male. Motherhood gave way to the patriarchy. Idols of worship which were once feminine fertility symbols began to be replaced by the graphic representation of gods as stern male figures. In essence, patriarchs. Have you not seen primitive Neolithic carvings of obese female fertility symbols? This ethic was replaced by another. And religion adapted itself to social and economic development.

And this is how the patriarchy was born. The woman essentially became the property of the man, first of her father or oldest brother, then of her husband. A woman could be bought in marriage just as a slave was bought at a market, and in some parts of the world this is still true. In some regions, such as New Guinea, Fiji, the Solomon Islands, the ancient Scandinavians, and India, the woman was either killed or expected to commit suicide when her husband died.

Samseau. I understand the British abolished the custom of the suttee in India when they consolidated their control over the country.

Roosh. The life of the woman was everywhere considered to be cheaper than that of a man. In Fiji, wives could be sold on a whim, with the price usually being a good rifle. In New Caledonia, we are told, the wife would sleep in a shed, while the man slept in the house. Marriage as an institution was the synthesis of two things: the law of property and, frankly, the institution of slavery.

Palla. Surely, Roosh, you have gone too far with this. And in any case, of what importance to us are these anthropological speculations? I fear we are exerting much effort for little reward. Remember the legend of Sisyphus, forever toiling to no avail:

Sisyphus versat saxum sudans nitendo neque proficit hilum, as Cicero says. [5]

Roosh. You are mistaken. They are important because, in order to understand our present situation, we need to know a little about the origins of civilization and the differentiation of gender roles. Have you not heard anything I have said? Have you not reflected on my words, Palla? It is clear that every civilization in history has been patriarchal in nature. Do you think this is an accident? Hundreds of thousands of years of human evolution have produced social institutions that have stood the test of time.

Modern feminism seeks to substitute its limited judgment for the verdict of thousands of years of human development. Can you imagine the arrogance, the egoism, of this presumption? It nearly takes one's breath away. But I believe the firm subordination of women to be more than just the result of economic factors. It is clear that all societies have recognized the inherently unstable and hidden destructive power latent in the female psyche.

It is for this reason that all major civilizations found it necessary to keep feminine instability firmly under control. We forget these lessons at our own peril. Left unchecked, feminine energy inclines towards mischief and irrationality. Our ancient Chinese, Mesopotamian, Greek, Roman, Aztec, Peruvian, and Abyssinian ancestors recognized this quite clearly, and never romanticized women as modern men do. The need to keep feminine irrationality firmly under control was a prerequisite for the smooth functioning of society. How can one hope to argue against the collective evolutionary wisdom of hundreds of thousands of years of hominid development?

Feminism, in its quest to destroy the patriarchy, seeks to overturn previous stages of human development. It seeks to replace the wisdom of thousands of years of trial and error with an androgynous, sterile, and fundamentally cruel conception of humanity. Few men have truly understood the fact that feminism is profoundly anti-civilization, at its core. We could correctly say that feminism is a new form of barbarism, in that it seeks to destroy the social basis for civilization.

McQueen*. Do you think, Roosh, that you may be exaggerating a bit here?

Roosh. Am I? Look around you at the creeping barbarism that is taking over America and parts of Europe. Already we are seeing clear signs that the social basis of civilization is being profoundly undermined by the influence of feminism. This is not a natural outgrowth of technological development. It is the result of the adoption of a specific, nihilistic philosophy of life. Feminism seeks to destroy the male identity, the social basis of the state, and the sound functioning of social systems.

As we know, the feminist's vision of humanity is a mindless army of drones, lacking in any beauty or virtue, mouthing its false slogans and genuflecting to its altars of obesity and androgyny. It is a new barbarism, and I fear we are at the doorstep of a new Dark Age. Vulgarization of our social and intellectual life has been proceeding steadily for decades now, birthrates are in decline, and the modern male is in deep crisis. The barbarians are not at the gates; they are already within the gates. As the old order collapses, we can expect generations of chaos and insecurity. So it was in Europe from roughly the deposition of Romulus Augustulus to the middle of the tenth century.

And yet, at the same time, feminism could not exist without the support and encouragement of the existing institutions. The existing institutions in the United States and Europe find it useful to support it because it enables the existing wealthy classes to make more money. Economic gain is held to be more important than social stability. Our leaders have betrayed all of quite profoundly.

Because it is based on lies, feminism cannot stand on its own. And the paradox of feminism is that it is destroying the very institutions which nurture and protect it. It saws the branch upon which it sits. Just as reputation follows virtue, so must infamy follow vice. Once those institutions finally crumble, it will likely burn itself out, much as a disease contagion burns itself out when there are no more hosts left to infect.

Samseau. What, then, can be done?

Roosh. Let us save that topic for future discussion. For now, let us adjourn this session, and meet again tomorrow. For just as we cannot pronounce many words simultaneously, so we cannot engage the intellect on many different subjects. Intellect is a kind of internal speech with which the mind speaks to itself; and whosoever proposes to use his intelligence, cannot hope to bring it to bear on more than one thing at once.

But know that virtue shall carry its own rewards, my dear Samseau. The virtues are the practice of good arts, by which men are made good. And know that this material world, and everything in it, is naught but shadow, and illusion. He who has equipped himself with the arts of virtue will be armored against the cruelties and brutalities of the vulgar mass, which hinders and obstructs rational inquiry.

A virtuous man will not fret about what others say, or do not say. As Augustine truly and wisely noted: "Glory is in hiding, and disgrace is on view. If a wicked act is being performed, it convenes all spectators. If a good deed is said to be taking place, it hardly finds people willing to listen, as if honorable actions were to be blushed at, and dishonorable ones matter for boasting about." [6]

At this point the discussion ended. Each of us left the dining room, and returned to our individual lodgings. I found myself thinking about the ideas discussed well into the night. More than ever before, I was convinced of the curative powers of philosophy for those matters which oppress the hearts and minds of thoughtful men. And I resolved, notwithstanding any obstacles, to record the substance of these matters which we discussed, so that they could be pondered and reflected upon by like-minded souls. The vine of human wisdom tends to wither at its root, unless that vine is regularly refreshed and sustained by a virtuous caretaker.

Mark Minter Is A Phony

July 28, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I write this with a heavy heart because I've privately corresponded with Mark and enjoyed his passionate diatribes, which I've published on this very blog not once, but twice. I've even invited him to contribute an article. But all is not what it seems to be.

In case you're not familiar with Mark, he's a prolific manosphere commenter who over the past year has hammered into our brains how destructive marriage in America is, wisdom learned from his own bitter divorce. Here is a sample of his previous writing:

> Fine, marriage might work out for you. It probably won't and you will fuck yourself bad. It happens to 1 in 2 men. 1 in fucking 2.
> And when I die, the fact I got to live elsewhere for a time, will dwarf what I feel about here. It is the basis of my rants about marriage and this American life as a married man being insipid, stupid, and a waste of the life of man. Because it ties you to here, it chains you, it removes your option, your hope, that you might leave, and seals your fate as a slave.
> Given the way women are, and the way most of you are, your odds of being in a marriage forever and not getting a divorce is about zilch.point.shit. 0.0000%. Enough zeros? Any of you that are married are probably on the way to divorce if you are not divorced already. Any of you that do get married surely will be divorced.
> A man must avoid marriage, whether you are alpha as fuck or beta as a hell.
> The reality is that after a few years of marriage you will probably prefer porn to your wife. And the reality is that porn IS better than your wife.
> And as for growing old with her. You'll be sleeping in different bedrooms and no fucking way will you be wanting to fuck that old beast. You'll be thinking "If I have to watch her fucking chew like a cow one more time I am surely going to choke her and shoot myself".

One enjoyable feature of his writing is a powerful voice that comes from being direct and unambiguous. You know exactly where he stands. There is no doubt he has been influential in causing young men to think about what the marriage institution has morphed into. I even sympathized with his preference of Colombian women, and envisioned him soaking up the eternal summer of Medellin to enjoy the company of feminine, more traditional women. And in spite of all that comes the bombshell announcement that he is re-marrying in America… to a single mom. He is signing into a legal contract where he will soon provide for another man's spawn.

This revelation has shocked many, and while some understand his need for companionship as he advances into elderly age, he is getting eviscerated for not living up to his own principles.

Here is his response:

> I practiced what I learned here. I am 58 year old man. None of you know what that truly entails until you get to that point in your life. Kate is an attractive 34 year old woman, with options galore if she chose to take them.
> And in following what I learned here, following the suggestions, the psychology, the mandates, I have an attractive woman 24 years younger than me that is ready to commit to me.
> Top that motherfuckers.

The criticisms against him have not been kind:

> I've seen photos of her before because she used to have them linked to her profile on Rollo's blog and to me the woman isn't hideous but that's about the nicest thing I can say. At least she isn't fat. Supposedly she's a single mother, but I guess that matters less as you advance in years. Most late middle-aged American men certainly do worse but at the same time, feeling lucky about marrying a not-fugly single mother whose neurosis has drawn her into the heartiste/rollo/roosh world of relationship dynamics, is like getting jacked that you hit a single cherry on the nickle slot machine.
> Normally two people coming together is a cause for celebration and we congratulate the couple while privately hoping for the best against the odds. I can't feel those sentiments given this context – an oscillating man waving a farcical anti-marriage banner and his shrill insistence on the deleterious effect of having a woman in your life. Suddenly a woman appears in his life, hardly a temptress, and he reflexively puts a fucking ring on it. This is after everything we all know about women and the common misery and drudgery of marriage. This is after everything he knows- that women can and will divorce you on a whim. I don't even think it's been a year since Mark Minter 'entered' this part of the web guns-a-blazin'. Well that fire went out quick!
> I understand the desire for companionship, and maybe these things are more important as you get older. But please remind me: what are the benefits of a 58 year old guy going to the courthouse and getting married instead of committing to a serious long term and loving relationship? Did something about the inherent risks of marriage change? Did something about women change? Why put yourself in this situation? (Source)
>
> Loading…
> […]

Like most on the Internet, he was a paper alpha.

Like I've said time and again, men who get divorce raped were white knights in a previous life. Once a white night, always a white knight. A 58 year old leopard does not lost its spots.

Minter wrote well because he wrote out of bitterness and anger. His writing did not reflect deeply held philosophical beliefs. He wrote to process his anger.

Just as there aren't many atheists in fox holes, there aren't many MGTOW when hot snatch is in their face.

Who is that morbidly obese radio host that so many guys look up to? The fat fuck can't control his eating and has been married 4 times. Yet guys look up to him because he TALKS a good game.

Best of luck to Minter. Since he is a beta male to his core, the cycle of his previous relationship will repeat itself. But maybe he'll have a nice, if short, run. (Source)

Seeing one of the biggest pillars of the dark manosphere self-destruct voluntarily is incredibly repulsive.

In the manosphere's early history books Mark Minter's name will now forever be associated with fraud. The guy took a dump on everything he has learned in his 58 years on this earth. And pissed on everything he supposedly stood for in his divorced life. All that for an officially-sanctioned state-sponsored union with a second-hand internet slut who is about to hit a wall while handing in another man's child to this old cuckold to raise. That would be really funny if it wasn't so fucked up.

As horrible as that act is, the biggest insult is in the ego-driven rationale he has given for it:

"Top that motherfuckers!" taunts Mark Minter the manosphere community where he has found nothing but love, support and understanding audience in his darkest, loneliest days.

This is from an internet swordsman who was self-reportedly a sworn archenemy of the institution of marriage. Someone who has guided other men with his unsolicited diatribes as much as he sought support from that same community of men. Only to turn around with "top that motherfuckers!" the minute he was comfortable enough to believe some used internet broken female fairy who pinky-promised to submit and commit to his ego.

This is disgusting also because the one thing that separates us/men from women is the principle of our beliefs. Women are whores because they have no concept of 'self'. Men are different from women in that once we believe in something, once we have that steadfast, unwavering faith we will never break that promise, that commitment, that belief. The real men are like bulldog locking its jaw unto a > victim. The true men of history, the Jesuses, the Genghis Khans, the Hitlers, the Gandhis, the Che Guevara's of this world, all died for their beliefs and principles (even if those beliefs were fucked up), rather than let go of them.

> And now we have Mark Minter.
> The first internet groupie who wiggled her tail in his direction wins him over.
> A man instantly vaporized.
> It's that easy with men who are not real men.
> Let that be a lesson to careless fools.
> In hindsight Mark Minter's change of heart comes as no surprise at all. Any amateur psychologist will tell you that a person who calls himself "narcissistic and Machiavellian" (like Mark has called himself) has an inherent capability to completely change his tune on a dime. But the way Mark Minter's ego has rationalized it ("top that motherfuckers!") is in really poor taste and is the biggest slap in the face to all real men in the manosphere. We all know that the weak-willed men will do anything for a pussy, including selling out their brothers for it. That's exactly why the phrase 'bros before hoes' was coined. But to have this guy who was supposedly a walking, breathing epitome of that maxim turn around and with straight face tell us: 'was just fucking with you, it was hoes before bros all along' – is actually a temporary defeat for the manosphere. The manosphere can not afford to have its biggest anti-marriage spokesman run off to get married the first chance he gets. Because it leaves the system looking like a joke. I see this and I know that his shallow, self-serving 'do as I say, not as I do' example will more than likely lead other doubting men to eventually go on that same certifiably wrong path. (Source)

He is like the conservative politician who espouses family values while diddling young boys on the side. He is the PUA who sells products on how to get laid but can't even approach a single woman, someone who creates a false character to gain either money or—in this case—praise, at the expense of everyone's trust. For that reason, he has lost all respect from me. If he were to knock on my door, starving, begging for food and drink, I would only place the sustenance on my front step. He would not be permitted to enter my home so that the foul odor of hypocrisy that now trails him does not infect my place of sleep.

I hope his name will forever be synonymous with a man who doesn't live by his own code. He deserves to be permanently exiled from the manosphere community. No more praise or compliments should be directed his way.

Why Game Is Necessary

July 29, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Those in the manosphere who study and discuss game have a lot of critics. White knights and feminists alike are quick to shame, calling knowledge of game and discussion of it an unnecessary waste of time (at best) or evidence of misogyny (at worst). To hear them tell it, you could be forgiven for concluding that an understanding of game and how men/women interact is useless or evil.

Individual life experience, of course, tells us otherwise. Unlike women, men cannot obtain high sexual value by merely growing up. For most young guys, self-improvement is crucial to building a rewarding sexual/romantic life. In a world rife with feminist-inspired androgyny and plagued by a genuine dearth of honest instruction to young men about how to actually be men, the manosphere is a lifeline. It is one of the only places available where men can have honest discussions about masculinity, what's right/wrong when it comes to women, and how to honestly evaluate themselves and tackle their own romantic/sexual faults.

What you are about to witness is the result of the absence of that lifeline. Incredibly needy, insecure, whiny and utterly unwilling to acknowledge and correct his own weaknesses, this is the kind of male bred by the actions of those who stand against game and despise the manosphere that helps to promote it.

I'll let the evidence speak for itself.

Loading...

Those who oppose game and the manosphere’s promotion of it often cite the need for men to turn to such sources for advice as “tragic”. To them, I say there is no tragedy in seeking self-improvement from like-minded men. The tragedy is in preventing men (especially young men) from doing so and risking the creation of more “males” like this one.

Game and self-improvement are the best ways out of the pathetic abyss illustrated here that so many young, desperate, inexperienced and insecure males fall into. Nobody wants to be Moses Garza and, hopefully with the growth of sites like this one, nobody will have to be.

The Manliest of Men: Adrian Carton de Wiart

July 29, 2013 | by Mikael | Link | Original Link

Man has created some of the toughest sons of bitches on the face of the planet through both real events and fiction over and over again throughout history. In the movies we have Rambo, Terminator, and James Bond. In video games, Master Chief, Snake, and Duke Nuke'em. Through reality we had George Washington, the man who killed Osama Bin Laden, and King Leonidas. Yet somehow throughout the course of history, what is possibly the manliest of men to have walked the face of this planet, seems to have slipped through the cracks of the system and remains rather anonymous. I am talking about none other than Adrian Carton de Wiart.

For those who aren't aware as to how badass this man truly is, here's a sample of the first paragraph from his Wikipedia page.

> Sir Adrian Paul Ghislain Carton de Wiart (5 May 1880 – 5 June 1963), was a British Army officer of Belgian and Irish descent. He served in the Boer War, First World War, and Second World War; was shot in the face, head, stomach, ankle, leg, hip, and ear; survived a plane crash; tunnelled out of a POW camp; and bit off his own fingers when a doctor refused to amputate them. He later wrote that "Frankly I had enjoyed the war" when describing his service in the First World War.

Excuse me for a minute. The man was shot in his face, head stomach, ankle, leg, hip, ear, survived a crash, escaped a POW camp, bit off his own fingers, and then said he enjoyed the war. I don't think there is a single man on the planet since the days of King Leonidas who would have been bold enough to make that statement, none-the-less actually mean it.

Loading…

> With his black eye patch and empty sleeve, Carton de Wiart looked like an elegant pirate, and became a figure of legend.

It’s kind of hard to argue with his look, but then to even further amplify the level of awesomeness this man achieved in life comes through with the level of alpha he displayed among his comrades.

> Carton de Wiart’s serious wound in the Boer War instilled in him a strong desire for physical fitness and he ran, jogged, walked, and played sports on a regular basis. In male company he was a delightful character and must hold the world record for bad language.

Basically he embodied everything that is manly. And of his escapades, the only real thing mentioned of him is that he had a wife who was 23 years younger than him. Although most of us now would laugh at marriage, looking at his time frame it was the norm, and hey at least he can be commended for picking up someone far younger than himself.

Carton de Wiart was also a man whom participated in both World Wars. While most men were battered into mush from the effects of PTSD, this man had enough testicular fortitude to both forge his way through two of the worst wars in history while continuing to live his life as he pleased until his death. For that I commend him. And while his life itself tended to embark upon several significant events, I’d rather keep this as a general overview, hoping to inspire some reading upon you as to whom this great man really was. And so with that I’ll just resolve this post with a quote of his.

> Governments may think and say as they like, but force cannot be eliminated, and it is the only real and unanswerable power. We are told that the pen is mightier > than the sword, but I know which of these weapons I would choose.

Take Me Out On The Lake!

July 30, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

Last week we were treated to the the latest viral video of women behaving badly. The self-shot episode depicted a wife breaking down and throwing a nuclear tantrum at her husband because he refused to take her on vacation on his one day off. The video is available here. Here are a few highlights:

0:26 — "It's petty money," she's screaming and crying as he tries to talk to her rationally

0:48 — "I need to get cigarettes!" Guy starts laughing shortly thereafter, which is a pro move

1:20 — Girl starts sobbing and crying, but the fake tears stop immediately with shrill screams

1:44 — She screams and kicks her feet around like a little kid. "I'm having an anxiety attack!" Dude plays it cool. Can you imagine your wife and mother of your children acting in such a manner?

2:25 — Guy calls her out for acting like a child who didn't get a toy

2:45 — Girl pulls out her attention pacifier to text her friends. Notice no tears. Guy calls her out for getting support form her friends and beta orbiters

3:26 — Girl can't take her car to do what she wants because of the "interlock thing" (punitive mechanism for DUI convictions)

3:31 — Girl gulps down a big mouthful of soda

To summarize, we have a irrational woman screaming because she doesn't get her way. She's a smoker, and a drunk, and her poor eating habits are reflected in a considerable amount of weight gain after only fourteen months of marriage:

Loading…

As if she wasn’t fully embodying the stereotype of the entitled American woman, the only way this monstrosity can pacify herself is with her smartphone. The husband maintains his frame surprisingly well, treating her like the bratty little girl she’s emulating.

We might assume that men and women alike can come together and condemn this behavior as unacceptable for any adult in a supposedly equal and mature partnership. Nope. Youtube took down the video because it was flagged as “content designed to harass, bully, or threaten”. The woman goes on to rationalize her behavior in the same manner:

> “Speaking to RightThisMinute.com, Whitney, who works as a nurse, said her husband had promised to take her to the lake with some friends, but he changed his mind after they got into an argument. She said her breakdown was caused by him egging her on and that she felt like she was being bullied.

I can remember a time when bullying referred to a stronger party abusing its power to harass, coerce, or physically attack a weaker party without reasonable justification. Nowadays, “bullying” refers to anything that calls out a person’s bad behavior, disgusting lifestyle, or inane world view. When applied to adults, the term is used almost exclusively when a woman is on the receiving end of the tough love.

People suggest that her husband breaking a promise and laughing at her dumb antics falls under this catch-all description. Gawker commenters suggest that he is an abusive husband, despite zero evidence of this and a mountain of evidence that this woman is a shrill, irrational, immature, unstable person.

Facebook has recently initiated a similar policy to Youtube on “gender-based hate speech,” which has been used to censor posts that are deemed “offensive.” Of course these are private companies that are not required to promote free speech and open discourse, but this is a ominous omen for the future of our society.

The solution is that men must continue the charge to expose this hypocrisy. Is your wife or girlfriend misbeahving? Document it and shame her. At best you’ll initiate a long-overdue divorce or save yourself from domestic violence litigation, and at worst you’ll have a funny story to share with your friends and millions of strangers on the internet.

Cyropaedia: The Education Of Cyrus

July 30, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

Cyropaedia is a biography of Cyrus The Great, written by Xenophon, the Greek writer and soldier of fortune who also wrote Anabasis. Cyrus The Great united the Persian empire and installed institutions that gave it the strength to endure. This book chronicles his brilliance as a general, administrator, and king.

> The reason of this public sanction for [hunting] is not far to seek; the king leads just as he does in war, hunting in person at the head of the field, and making his men follow, because it is felt that the exercise itself is the best possible training for the needs of war. It accustoms a man to early rising; it hardens him to endure heat and cold; it teaches him to march and to run at the top of his speed; he must perforce learn to let fly arrow and javelin the moment the quarry is across his path; and, above all, the edge of his spirit must need be sharpened by encountering any of the mightier beasts; he must deal his stroke when the creature closes, and stand on guard when it makes its rush: indeed, it would be hard to find a case in war that has not its parallel in the chase.
> …never put off the collecting of supplies until the day of need, make the season of your abundance provide against the time of dearth. You will gain better terms from those on whom you must depend if you are not thought to be in straits, and, what is more, you will be free from blame in the eyes of your soldiers. That in itself will make you more respected; wherever you desire to help or to hurt, your troops will follow you with greater readiness, so long as they have all they need, and your words, you may be sure, will carry the greater weight the fuller your display of power for weal or woe.
> When the interests of mankind are at stake, they will obey with joy the man whom they believe to be wiser than themselves.
> One thing you must ever bear in mind: if you wish your men to follow you, remember that they expect you to plan for them. Hence you must never know a careless mood; if it be night, you must consider what your troops shall do when it > is day; if day, how the night had best be spent.

Many monologues are given on how a man should conduct himself as a soldier, whether at peace or at war. Most of these were uttered by Cyrus himself. He was a master of the mind, using the weapon of psychology as much as he used his sword. He would effortlessly formulate strategies for situations never before encountered, even inventing a deadlier form of chariot.

> Such is the ordinance of God: those who will not work out their own salvation he gives into the hands of other men to bear rule over them.

> When fortune comes to us, if we guard her with discretion, we may live to grow old in peace, but if we are insatiate, if we use and abuse our pleasures, chasing first one and then another, we may well fear lest that fate be ours which, the proverb tells us, falls on those mariners who cannot forgo their voyages in the pursuit of wealth, and one day the deep sea swallows them. Thus has many a warrior achieved one victory only to clutch at another and lose the first.

> I begin to understand, Cyrus, how it is that while we have more goblets and more gold, more apparel and more wealth than you, yet we ourselves are not worth as much. We are always trying to increased what we possess, but you seem to set your hearts on perfecting your own souls.
> …men in the mass, when aflame with courage, are irresistible, and when their hearts fail them, the more numerous they are the worse their panic that seizes them.

> Cyrus was convinced that no one has a right to rule who is not superior to his subjects.

The book aims to describe the balance between work and leisure:

> Yet I foresee that if we betake ourselves to the life of indolence and luxury, the life of the degenerate who think that labour is the worst of evils and freedom from toil the height of happiness, the day will come, and speedily, when we shall > be unworthy of ourselves, and with the loss of honour will come the loss of wealth. Once to have been valiant is not enough; no man can keep his valour unless he watch over it to the end. As the arts decay through neglect, as the body, once healthy and alert, will grow weak through sloth and indolence, even so the powers of the spirit, temperance, self-control, and courage, if we grow slack in training, fall back once more to rottenness and death. We must watch ourselves; we must not surrender to the sweetness of the day. It is a great work, methinks, to found an empire, but a far greater to keep it safe. To seize it may be the fruit of daring and daring only, but to hold it is impossible without self-restraint and self-command and endless care.

> …a man's enjoyment of all good things is in exact proportion to the pains he has undergone to gain them. Toil is the seasoning of delight; without desire and longing, no dish, however costly, could be sweet.
> Self-restraint, he believed, would best be cultivated if he made men see in himself one who could not be dragged from the pursuit of virtue by the pleasure of the moment, one who chose to toil first for the happy-hearted joys that go hand-in-hand with beauty and nobleness.

> "I assure you, my friend," said Pheraulas, "the possession of riches is nothing like so sweet as the loss of them is painful. And here is a proof for you: no rich man lies awake from pure joy at his wealth, but did you ever know a man who could close his eyes when he was losing?"

The book was surprisingly readable in spite of the meandering sentences, making it far easier to tackle than The Landmark Thucydides. The crawling bits were broken up with supreme wisdom that made it serve as a manual on how to run the empire that is a man's life. Don't expect too much in terms of battle action or excitement, but if you have enjoyed other Greek classics, this is worth a read.

Young Girls Are Better Than Older Women

> When he asked me out, Barbi recalls, I was 18 and he was 42. I said I'd never gone out with anyone older than 24. Hugh replied, "Neither have I."

If you pick up any book on evolutionary psychology, or do even some light research scratching the surface of any type of gender based scientific research, one thing pops up over and over again… a man's desire for younger women. There are of course strong reproductive and biological bases upon which this desire is founded, but I will leave such elaborations to those more skilled in the arts of science and research.

Instead, I will try to memorialize those feelings most men get upon seeing an attractive, young girl out on the streets, at a bar or in the grocery store. I say most men, because you will naturally run into those who based on their inability to attract the younger sect, rev their own hamsters up rationalizing young girls as undesirable based on their purported inability to carry a conversation, their lack of maturity, or the scarce number of things they have in common with said men. This is quite the bulky hamster. Last time I checked the conversational ability, maturity levels and thoughts in common of a young girl stemmed from the fact she was a woman rather than how old she was. And if you truly desire such characteristics in your woman, just head east where college girls there will blow their American counterparts out of the water.

Physically, Young Girls Dominate

Yes, there are portly young piglets out there. Yes, there are women in their 30s who have done Pilates all their life and look amazing. But overall, the bodies of young girls are tighter, firmer, and aesthetically more pleasurable to look at. Their skin is tighter on their bodies. Their skin glows more on their face and there are no wrinkles. Want to see a thing of beauty? Notice how their breasts defy gravity. The distance between their nipples to their chins is less than the distance between their nipples to their belly buttons. Sadly as every year passes that beautiful ratio dissipates. Even internally, their vaginas are nicer and tighter (usually).

There's a reason why models are kept in a specific age range, usually expiring by age 24. If you take a random sampling of some of the more famous models that we have had the pleasure to fantasize about, most started their careers at a young age:

- Adriana Lima – 15
- Naomi Campbell – 15
- Cindy Crawford – 17
- Claudia Schiffer – 17
- Heidi Klum – 19

After about 22-24, they deteriorate. This is no secret, and why many girls you see that rely on their looks for money make a shift around age 25 into some other related field that relies less on aesthetics and more other aspects. Models become designers, receptionists become data entry assistants, and so on.

Innocence And Energy

> "The only reason to wait a month for sex is if she's 17 years, 11 months old." – Barney Stinson

The physical aspect of youth is subjective. Most girl head towards a decline by their mid 20s. However, with respect to dating younger girls, this is more subjective in terms of what is desirable. In my early 30s, a 20 year old girl is a lot more preferable than a 27 year old girl. To a man in his 70s, a 27 year old girl is euphoric.

Having dated girls in various age ranges, there is a lot to be said about being in the presence of someone who is generally carefree, happy and enjoying life. Take Mary, a 30 year old marketing assistant. Since graduating college 8 years ago, she's been in the workforce on a daily basis, waking up at 7am to get to work and sit on a desk, get yelled at for her incompetence, spend happy hours with her friends recounting the fact that her boss "is such a jerk!", and heating up a frozen dinner as she sits on her couch watching the Bachelor at night. When she can, she'll go to that bootcamp down the street 2-3x a week.

Loading...

Conversely, there's Alyssa… a 19 year old college girl. She spends some nights partying away, but usually will sleep until 2 p.m. the next day. Her worries are what she will wear the next day, what's going on with her Facebook friends, whether her roommate is going to do the dishes, and a few times a year studying for some tests. She'll walk across campus and down into town daily and pick up a fresh juice from Whole Foods.

If I go out with Mary, the night will look like this. She will meet me at a bar by her house after work. We have a drink, she tells me about how horrible her day was and how hilarious it was that her friend Susie went on this horrible date with this doctor that didn't do x, y and z for her. When she finally does ask about me, she wants the specifics on a case I'm working on. We go back to my place, she sets down her $4,000 Chanel purse and removes her $1,200 Louboutin heels, things she "has to have" and why she needs to make more money at work. She asks for a grey goose and tonic, specifically by brand name.

When I start making out with her, she stops me and says she's not that type of girl for a first date. She wants me to respect her. Of course, little does she know that my level of respect for her is irrelevant, considering she is not a viable candidate for a long term relationship. Now buzzed, I have to drive her back to her car at the bar because she has to wake up early for work. When we eventually do have sex, on the third date, she insists on a condom because "maybe I have AIDS" and she is not on the pill because the hormones make her feel nasty.

If I go out with Alyssa, the night will look like this. I will pick her up because she doesn't have a car, as she's in college and doesn't need one. She is 19, so we go to a local restaurant where I know they will serve her some wine. We have a snack and a drink, and she asks me about what I do, and when I say lawyer she responds "cool!" She tells me about her history class that she's now taking, and how hilarious it was that her roommate forgot to set her alarm yesterday and slept through class.

We go back to my place, she kicks off her $50 heels and jumps on the couch. I ask her what she wants to drink, she responds "whatever!" When I start making out with her, she stops me and says she's sorry that she doesn't have huge boobs. I tell her not to worry as I stare at her stomach that remains foldless despite her being seated. We have sex, condom or not my choice because she's on the pill. We have sex a few more times because she has the energy, she sleeps over and I drop her off tomorrow on my way to work.

These illustrative examples demonstrate the difference in energy and overall vibe younger girls bring with them. It's a beautiful thing. As a man in his early 30s, my energy levels are not what they were. Recently my friend and I spent a week vacationing with two 22 year old girls we met. They would drink, dance, run around the rented vacation apartment, laugh, cook, clean, bang, shower, you name it. They were just enjoying being a young, carefree happy girls. They never ran out of energy and it rubbed off on us. It would have been a much different trip had the girls been… say 32 years old.

When Given The Option, Youth Is Always The Preferred Choice

James Woods recently dumped his 26 year old girlfriend for a 20 year old girlfriend. Jason Statham just got engaged to a 26 year old Victoria Secret Model. The same practices abound with other people of status and power. Why? Because they can. When given the option, why wouldn't a man want to have a younger rather than older mate? It is very rare for a man of high value to date older.

Just know next time a woman tries to berate you for being attracted to and dating an eighteen year old, calling you a "pervert" and "creep" take solace in the fact that deep down, she knows that she just can't compete.

The Most Masculine Oldies Music

July 31, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

Chances are you're already familiar with the classic above, "Walk Like a Man" by Frankie Valli and the Four Seasons. Besides being an absolute gem of 1960s rock, it contains some of the hardest-hitting, no-nonsense manly wisdom ever sung in a falsetto voice.

A son, frustrated with his absolute bitch-of-a-girlfriend turns to his father for advice.

> But my good father said
> "Give her up don't bother
> The world isn't coming to an end"
> He said it, walk like a man
> Talk like a man
> Walk like a man my son
> No woman's worth
> Crawling on the earth
> So walk like a man, my son

Like every other era of music, the catalog of so-called Golden Oldies (music from the 1950s and 60s) is jam-packed with milquetoast love songs (though admittedly at a time when that fantasy was probably more true than it is today). Despite this, you'll find some loud proclamations of alpha-male commandments hidden among them if you pay attention.

"Cash, Cars, and Bros Before Hoes."

The Beach Boys were famously big on cars, surfing, and girls. Here, they make it clear what comes last in that order.

> We always take my car 'cause it's never been beat
> And we've never missed yet with the girls we meet
> None of the guys go steady 'cause it wouldn't be right
> To leave their best girl home on a Saturday night

"Women Come and Go. Don't Overpay for Low Quality."

Dads weren't the only ones dropping wisdom. In this hit, Smokey Robinson and the Miracles get their knowledge from dear old mom.

> And then she said, "Just because you've become a young man now
> There's still some things that you don't understand now
> Before you ask some girl for her hand now
> Keep your freedom for as long as you can now
> My mama told me, "You better shop around"

> Just as sure as the wind's gonna blow now
> The women come and the women gonna go now
> Before you tell 'em that you love 'em, so now
> My mama told me, "You better shop around"
> Try to get yourself a bargain, son
> Don't be sold on the very first one > Pretty girls come a dime a dozen

"Recognize the Value of Domesticity, Loyalty, and the Quality of Life a Woman Offers."

In this tongue-in-cheek classic, Jimmy Soul presents the advantages of marrying an "ugly girl" over a vapid hot chick.

> If you wanna be happy for the rest of your life
> Never make a pretty woman your wife
> So from my personal point of view
> Get an ugly girl to marry you
> ….
>
> Loading…
> A pretty woman makes her husband look small
> And very often causes his downfall.
> As soon as he marries her
> Then she starts to do
> The things that will break his heart.
> But if you make an ugly woman your wife,
> You'll be happy for the rest of your life,
> An ugly woman cooks her meals on time,
> She'll always give you peace of mind.

"Keep Your Pimp Hand Strong."

What do you do when you come home to find your house in disarray? Santana lays the smack down in this legendary call-out.

> You've got to change your evil ways…baby
> Before I stop loving you.
> You've got to change…baby
> This can't go on…
> Lord knows you got to change…baby.

> When I come home…baby
> My house is dark and my pots are cold
> You hang round… baby
> With Jean and Joan [probably her slutty bad-influence friends] and a-who knows who > I'm getting tired of waiting and fooling around
> I'll find somebody, who won't make me feel like a clown

"Go Where the Best Pussy Is. Keep Moving, If Necessary."

We weren't the first guys willing to circle the globe for quality girls and variety.

> Oh well, I'm the type of guy who will never settle down
> Where pretty girls are, well you know that I'm around
> I kiss 'em and I love'em 'cause to me they're all the same
> I hug 'em and I squeeze 'em they don't even know my name
> They call me the wanderer, yeah the wanderer
> I roam around-around-around
> Oh well, I roam from town to town
> I go through life without a care
> And I'm as happy as a clown
> And when I find myself I'm a-fallin' for some girl
> Yeah, I hop right into that car of mine
> I drive around the world
> Yeah, I'm a wanderer, yeah the wanderer
> I roam around-around-around

With the exception of a select group of rappers—who are quick to remind us to "Fuck Bitches, Get Money" and that "Bitches Ain't Shit"—a significant percentage of music today is so nauseatingly weak that you have to flat-out ignore the lyrics. And, truth be told, most oldies weren't much better.

So, the next time you need a break from all that noise, remember your masculine oldies.

A Vindication Of The Writings Of Men

July 31, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

Recently, the New York Times ran an article about 'sex on campus' at the University of Pennsylvania. Remarkably, the article is honest – it simply reports as it observes. No surprise then that its observations mirror those of the manosphere. What little delusional content there is comes from the female interviewees themselves.

> Until recently, those who studied the rise of hookup culture had generally assumed that it was driven by men, and that women were reluctant participants, more interested in romance than in casual sexual encounters. But there is an increasing realization that young women are propelling it, too.

For the last several years, sociologists who surveyed campus relations puzzled over the hookup scene: why were girls opting for non-committal sex with uncaring men? Women prefer relationships to flings, so why were women choosing hookups over dating?

Typically, the answer was: women aren't choosing. They're being forced into hooking up. The explanations offered looked something like this:

"The sex ratios are skewed in favor of men." In a previous installment, the New York Times examined the scene at a university where women outnumbered men. But this was just cherry-picking: the hookup scene is in full force even at schools where sex ratios are even, such as the Ivy League. At the very least, skewed sex ratios are not the only factor, if hook-up scenes are cropping up even at sexually balanced universities. And the latest article goes on to consider factors that have nothing to do with the sex ratio.

"Men control the social scene, and ply women with alcohol, drugs and even assault to get sex." Women are helpless to set the terms of their own romances; they have to contend with a system rigged in favor of men's penchant for unattached sex.

There are many more such explanations lying in the quivers of willfully blind researchers. Except there's nothing forcing women to have sex on a whim. Behind all these excuses is the determination to see everything but the girls themselves as factors in the demise of dating. Everything else, particularly the men, must be fingered as responsible. Women are not allowed to be human, to have agency. They cannot even be animals, base impulses and all. When it comes time to assign culpability, only men have moral agency.

Then there's the myopia. Anything that isn't strictly quantified in some arcane research dataset is ignored wholesale. Combine these, and you have the expert's profound ignorance of how dating actually proceeds on college campuses and beyond. Little scrutiny was given to whether women actually were choosing this life for themselves, and whether they truly did always prefer relationships to flings.

A Change In Tone

Lately, there has been a change in the establishment's tone. It is increasingly willing to consider that women are just as depraved as men. While I'd like to credit the manosphere, it may be due to the efforts of people like Hanna Rosin who make this view socially acceptable. Last year, she identified women as the driving force of the hook-up scene, and that this arrangement empowers women to devote more time to their careers.

More recently, Daniel Bergner published a book about science's answer to the age old question, what do women want? More pointedly, what arouses women? It was well received by the establishment. While the manosphere easily precedes such works, their voices went mostly unheard by the intelligentsia; it now looks as if it will become more and more acceptable to make the very same points the manosphere has.

For the beliefs of the upper middle class, the truth was never relevant – only, "can I say this at a cocktail party without sounding like a nut?" Now that such observations have graced the pages of the New York Times, they can be broached in polite company. Below, I've chosen several excerpts from the article itself that echo what the manosphere has been saying.

Self-Imposed Female Unavailability

> "I positioned myself in college in such a way that I can't have a meaningful romantic relationship, because I'm always busy and the people that I am interested in are always busy, too," she said. … "But there are so many other things going on in my life that I find so important that I just, like, can't make time, and I don't want to make time."

Even if a man wanted to, girls are making themselves unavailable for more than a weekly dalliance. She's busy getting cosmos with her friends, or padding her resume with something to impress future employers. And if your aim is to seduce her, don't bother inquiring about it, because she herself has no intrinsic interest in it. In tossing aside man, her former master, she appoints the corporation as her new overlord. As Roissy wrote, woman cannot content herself with freedom – she simply elects another master to dominate her. Naturally, that leaves little place for any boyfriends.

And when a girl deigns to spend only a day or two a week with a man, she is a fractional girlfriend. So even if a man wanted a full-time girlfriend, he may have to 'settle' for fucking three or four girls concurrently instead.

Modern Man's Mission

Careerism As The Path To Whoredom

> These women said they saw building their résumés, not finding boyfriends (never mind husbands), as their main job at Penn. They envisioned their 20s as a period of unencumbered striving, when they might work at a bank in Hong Kong one year, then go to business school, then move to a corporate job in New York. The idea of lugging a relationship through all those transitions was hard for many to imagine. Almost universally, the women said they did not plan to marry until their late 20s or early 30s…
> But Elizabeth A. Armstrong, a sociologist at the University of Michigan who studies young women's sexuality, said that women at elite universities were choosing hookups because they saw relationships as too demanding and potentially too distracting from their goals.

With their career as their highest priority, committed relationships are now a nuisance. Relationships now recall in her mind the story of Sisyphus, who was condemned to pushing a heavy stone up a mountain for eternity, only for it to keep falling down. She knows she won't get married until 30, so pre-marital relationships are just formalized fuck buddies. The 'boyfriend and girlfriend' relationship of the 20th century is rootless; its only basis is convenience. When it ceases to be convenient, girls will go without it.

Our elders think that pre-marital relationships meant something. And maybe they were right, at one point. But with the priority of a career in the modern woman's life, the boyfriend is obsolete. He is simply dick on delivery.

Rather than sign up for the inevitable breakups that her careerism ensures, she ditches them altogether. The boyfriend was just a convenient fabrication to make her feel less slutty for pre-marital sex anyway. And now even that has proven too onerous.

> As A. explained her schedule, "If I'm sober, I'm working."…
> Instead, she enjoyed casual sex on her terms — often late at night, after a few drinks, and never at her place, she noted, because then she would have to wash the sheets…
> Dancing like that felt good but dirty, and like a number of girls, Haley said she had to be drunk in order to enjoy it. Women said universally that hookups could not exist without alcohol, because they were for the most part too uncomfortable to pair off with men they did not know well without being drunk.

Women like A are fundamentally incapable of intimacy without copious alcohol. Shirley Temple Prudes, Vodka Sluts. You will meet women who have been gangbanged, yet cannot stomach a first kiss from an attractive man while sober. I do, routinely. Notice also how she shirks the domestic duty of laundry to men. (A prolific squirter, perhaps?) Not to worry, she'll still complain about how slovenly men are.

There will be plenty of people clucking in response at how terrible this is; logically speaking, however, it is A who is right. With time, the link between whoredom and female careerism becomes evident, as pragmatic concerns whittle away at meaningful monogamy. And since practically no one is willing to renounce careerism's status as commendable for women, nothing will change.

The American father pushes his daughter to work and become independent, yet expresses alarm at the promiscuity among her peers. He responds to getting raped in the ass by asking for more lube. He doesn't truly want to solve the problem, he just wants to feel better about the job he's done. "Ignorance is bliss."

[image]

Modern Family

Plenty of men here like to think that A. will get her comeuppance, and find herself alone and bitter come the age of 35. Frankly, the evidence on this point is rather absent – upper class women like A still marry more than her lower class peers. If she wants to marry, A can stay thin and presentable; she will have a decent career that mitigates her risk to a man's wealth in the case of divorce; plus, she's intelligent. There is no shortage of eligible men who'd sign up for marrying A. Absent extreme entitlement, she will approach marriage like a job interview, and identify what her prospective husbands demand to snare a man that meets her criteria, and act accordingly.

Besides, American men are not even aware of the delights to be had among foreign women, of the Brazilian's sensuality, of the Pole's sweetness, or of the Ukrainian's devotion. As far as he knows, American women are as good as it gets. Even if he suspects they aren't, nothing else seems within reach.

Whoredom Begins At Home

> But, in fact, many of the Penn women said that warnings not to become overly involved in a relationship came not from feminists, but from their parents, who urged them to be independent.
> “That’s one thing that my mom has always instilled in me: ‘Make decisions for yourself, not for a guy,’ ” one senior at Penn said.

The current crop of college aged women are the offspring of the Boomer generation. The central conceit of the boomer is his studied adolescence - he discards the traditions of his father in the name of progress, yet he is dumbfounded when his daughters turn out like the strumpets profiled. For why would liberating a woman from a life of kinder, kirche, küche turn her into a slut? It’s impossible that progress would yield something as undesirable as promiscuity.

Watch the progressive closely, and you will glimpse for only a moment any intellectual honesty. Before social changes take full effect, the progressive will deny deny deny that his reforms have returned an unpalatable result; the moment this becomes an obvious lie, he will simply rebrand the ugly as beautiful. Fat acceptance, abortion, bastardy, promiscuity… there’s no shortage of examples. Rosin serves just this purpose, when she rebrands whoredom as commendable when it becomes clear just how prevalent it is among today’s youth.

How To Shave Your Head

August 1, 2013 | by Matt Forney | Link | Original Link

With the exception of a two-month stint I spent in North Dakota last year, I've cut my own hair once a week for the past five years, and I haven't regretted a minute of it. If you want to change up your look and/or avoid having to waste an hour every other week at the barbershop, going cueball is a great way to do it. Here are some of the many benefits of shaving your head…

It saves you money.

Good quality haircuts aren't cheap; the last time I had my hair professionally done, I was shelling out $15 every other week. A quality electric razor will cost you $40-50 up-front, but it pays for itself many times over; I've been using the same razor for four years and the same $4 bottle of clipper oil for nearly as long. The razor even survived a cross-country hitchhiking trip (yes, I really am that vain). All I've had to do to keep it working is replace the blade every so often and wrap electrical tape around a frayed part of the cord.

It's low maintenance.

I spend exactly half-an-hour on my hair every week. Depending on how quickly your hair grows and what color it is, you may not even have to do that much. Additionally, you can skip shampooing every night; with no hair, the need to constantly scrub your scalp is lessened.

It makes you look younger and/or more masculine.

There is not a single man on Earth who looks good with male pattern baldness. Women and men both look at guys with monk's rings—even young guys—and instinctively write them off as ugly old farts. Depending on how old you are, going completely bald will shave years off your appearance and make you look more masculine. For example, I turned 25 recently, but girls I meet in real life usually mistake me for a college undergrad. Not only that, if you already put a minimum of care into your appearance, it's impossible to look like a pussy when you have a shaved head. The only guy I know who's managed to pull that off is that loser from R.E.M.

That said, there are a number of downsides to the skinhead look…

It exposes you to UV damage.

Without anything to shield your scalp from the sun's rays, you're looking at some pretty painful sunburns—and possible skin cancer—if you're fair-skinned and spend a lot of time outdoors. In fact, you can even get sunburned in the winter unless you live in a northerly location like Canada or Scandinavia; I once got a mild scalp burn during a biathlon in upstate New York. Get used to either wearing hats or rubbing sunscreen into your skull when you head out the door.

You become much more sensitive to the surrounding temperature.

The vast majority of your body heat is lost through your head, which is why it's paramount to wear a hat if it's cold out. Your hair does a decent job at keeping you warm; not having any will make it seem like your surroundings are five degrees colder than they actually are. This is an advantage when it's hot out because you'll be sweating less than your friends, but a huge disadvantage in autumn and winter. In my last year of college, I lived in an apartment with poor insulation; even with the heat cranked up all the way, I had to wear a wool cap indoors during the winter to keep from freezing.

Depending on your skin color, you may have to grow a beard to balance out your facial features.

A good rule of thumb is that the lighter your skin, the greater likelihood you'll need facial hair to pair with your bald head. Black guys generally can get away with being bald and clean-shaven; many white guys who try to pull that off will look like cancer patients. If you can't grow a good beard, you might as well forget about going cueball.

If this all sounds good, here's my quick and dirty guide to shaving your head. Note that before you drop any money on expensive razors or other equipment, you should have your barber or hairstylist shave your head so you know what it looks like.

Loading…

Get the equipment you need.

At the bare minimum, you need an electric razor, a bottle of clipper oil and razor brushes (which are usually included with the razor). My personal recommendation is the Wahl Professional 8110 5-Star Balding Clipper; as I said already, this clipper has lasted me four years without any issues. It cuts cleanly, doesn't get clogged easily and is small enough to take with you on trips. Note that the Wahl clipper is wall-powered; if you don't have any outlets in your bathroom, you'll need to get a battery-powered clipper. Regardless of whatever razor you buy, it has to be a balding razor; regular razors will only cut your hair down to an eighth of an inch, not take it off entirely.

Most razors include a little sample of clipper oil, but it won't last you more than a couple of uses. You need oil to keep the razor functioning properly and avoid cutting yourself, so make sure to pick up a $4 bottle of the stuff.

While it is possible to shave your head with a hand razor, I don't recommend it because it takes too long—I've never been able to do it in less than an hour-and-a-half—and because the risk of cutting yourself is much higher. Additionally, you also run the risk of creating ingrown hairs with a hand razor.

Before you begin shaving, take your shirt off.

Hair on your clothes is a real bitch to get out, so it's best to shave half-naked. Additionally, depending on your bathroom layout and/or hair length, you may want to lay some newspapers down beforehand to minimize the mess. You may also want to take a shower afterwards to wash off any stray clumps of hair that get stuck to your chest and shoulders.

Dab some clipper oil on your razor before you start cutting.

After you've applied the oil, switch the razor on to ensure that the oil gets spread evenly over the blades. This will pay huge dividends later.

Shave one side of your head at a time.

You want to concentrate on getting all the hair on one portion off your head all at once. For example, I usually start with the right side of my head, move to the back, the left side, and finally the top for last. You can vary it up if you want—because I'm right-handed, I find it easier to start with the right side—but in my experience, the left and right sides are the most time-consuming to shave because your ears make certain portions of your hair difficult to access. If necessary, use your free hand to fold your ear back so you don't miss anything. When you've fully shaved part of your head, run your fingers against the grain to ensure you haven't missed any spots.

Be careful you don't cut yourself.

Nicks and cuts are inevitable when you're starting out, but you don't need to make them worse. When shaving, move the razor in smooth, even strokes, and press it lightly against your skin so that it’s just barely touching. Also, be careful around bumps and moles, as the razor will all but shred them if you aren’t careful. I’ve actually had to have a dermatologist surgically remove several moles from my head because they were getting in the way of my shaving.

Clean out the blades regularly.

Hair will get stuck in the razor with repeated use, making it less effective. Use your brushes to keep the blades clear. Razors typically come with two, a large one for getting out huge clumps and a smaller, finer one for cleaning out individual nooks and crannies.

Remember to clean up afterwards.

A small but important detail. Fortunately, the clipper oil will cause your hair to come off in tiny little clumps, which will make sweeping them up a lot easier.

The skinhead look isn’t for every man, but if you’ve got the right stuff, shaving your head will make you considerably more attractive. Good luck!

Carry The Big Stick

A man should be proficient with his weapon. A samurai has his katana, a centurion has his gladius, a cowboy has his six-shooter, and that's how it was. Personal weapons are a uniquely masculine accessory. It says a lot about the discipline of a man and his ability to stop people from taking his stuff if he is handy with his steel. In the 21st century the steel takes the form of the automatic pistol. I do not really consider revolvers for their inability to lay down suppressing fire.

Many so-called sophisticated peoples view an armed private citizen as unnecessary and an anachronism. People like this are disingenuous, and I will not delve into their various altruistic or nefarious motivations. I will give a quick overview of how to outfit a man to be handy with his steel. For those of you who live in a locale where handguns are unobtainable, that's just too bad. For those of you interested, the particular machine you might select is entirely personal preference. I leave it to you to do the specific research. I do not really consider revolvers for their inability to lay down suppressing fire.

What To Get

First thing a man needs for outfitting himself is an actual handgun. There are pros and cons to all the machines on the market. A man decides what he wants for himself. Some like the fine lines of Italian style, and there is a gun for that. Others like expensive German over-engineering, and there is a gun for that as well. There are so-called business casual guns that can either it be dressed up or dressed down depending on the event. Some favor devices with switches, levers and/or safeties for safety reasons or for something to play with while they watch TV. Others favor the spartan experience of minimal controls. The decision is up to you on the practicality and whatever you are willing to sacrifice for "fashion". I base my selection on the device's ability to throw bullets reliably, the availability of spare parts and certain other personal preferences. Whatever device and features you select, you must actually practice in order to obtain proficiency. This cannot be accomplished by playing call of duty or watching YouTube videos.

Size

On the old comic strip "Calvin and Hobbes" by Bill Waterston, Calvin once stated "in a perfect world, women will wear tight clothes, and men will carry powerful handguns". While some can argue the various calibers have their various merits, the caliber debate has ended in my mind. George Zimmerman's one shot one kill with a Kel Tec PF9 can be thanked for that. Some men might want to be "continental" and 9mm is their preference. Other men like to follow tradition and prefer .45. And yet others choose .40 for various reasons.

There are other automatic cartridges available but remember one must be able to obtain a lot of them in order to practice. I could tell you to buy something readily available and not buy something outrageously powerful for the notoriety of it. But I am not going to pull a Mark Minter and preach something I do not practice. A modern man can make his own decision on how big of a bang he wants to make.

Accessories

After a man selects a pistol, he should also buy a holster to carry it in. Free balling a handgun is not recommended. Shooting oneself in the dick should be avoided. As with any fashion accessory, a holster should be well made. Select one that works for you, but I recommend one that encloses the trigger so you don't start the party early by accident. Again one should practice to be proficient pulling the weapon out of its holster. You might need to buy more than one holster for it to go to various types of clothing you might wear. No one likes outfits that don't go together.

Loading...

Safety First

Don’t think your purchasing journey is over yet. There are a few more items you need to buy in order to ensure satisfactory practice. Unless you’re Jason Bourne, your gun is going to be real loud when you shoot it. To counter the potential for hearing loss, one should purchase earplugs or muffs. I recommend muffs so one can focus on practice in comfort. Pistols have parts that move really fast while in operation. This can throw debris and oil back onto the shooter. The shooter should wear eye protection to defend against this along with ejected casings. I’ll recommend you buy a quality pair of clear lenses so there will be no optical distortion or color shifts between practice firing and what you might encounter on the street. Others might recommend tinted or shaded lenses but that is beyond the scope of this article.

A Clean Gun Is A Happy Gun

A man needs to keep his steel well-maintained. Swords get sharpened, polished and oiled. The same concept applies to handguns. You should clean it every so often even if you haven’t shot it. Oddly enough, the good cleaning products for handguns are not usually sold at the places the handguns are sold. One must search for the product he finds adequate. In my experience, multi-functional products tend to do each function poorly. Therefore I recommend a separate cleaner and lubricant. Make sure you research your selection thoroughly; old wives’ tales tend to ruin investments. For example, oven cleaner is a poor choice to clean a handgun.

Price

Remember, you get what you pay for. Going cheap gets you cheap. This goes especially true for handguns and their accessories. If the gun you want is not in your price range, buy it used. It's better to buy one with a few dings or handling marks then to settle for some $250 jam-o-matic you will regret buying anyway. My gun doesn't have any expensive options like tritium sites. That is my preference and has saved me money.

First Aid

If a man's going to have a gun and practice with it, he should plan for the "getting shot" scenario. He should research first aid and to have actual supplies or the ability to MacGyver something. I recommend gauze and medical tape. You can finger bang the gunshot wound with as much gauze as you can stuff in there and then put the tape on top to hold you until you get to the hospital. This works surprisingly well compared to placing a bandage over the wound.

The Law

If you're going to "roll heavy", it is best to do it legally. Make sure you have all the proper permits and licenses for your locale. Also look into how to use force legally before you actually use force. A smart man would talk to a lawyer for any legal advice. Where I live, one needs to get a permit to carry a handgun in any fashion. In some places, a visible handgun will bring a massive police response that you might not survive even if it is carried legally, so be wise.

Practice

Practice is tantamount to performance. Try different positions at the range. Try shooting from the opposite hand. I find marksmanship is like playing pool. Sure, a lot of people give advice, but the more you do it, the better you become.

Conclusion

While some can argue the lack of necessity, its danger to society, or the state's need for a monopoly on violence, a handgun can be a neat accessory for any masculine man. It puts pep in your step. It gives you confidence while you walk through certain parts of the city late at night. Also, that dull thud a holstered pistol makes hitting the ground speaks directly to a woman's hind-brain that you are a mate that can actually protect her when you drop your pants when she services you.

Why We Need To Fight For The Patriarchy

August 2, 2013 | by jinnaZiller | Link | Original Link

We are in a transition from a traditional society (let's call it the patriarchy) to a liberal-minded society (let's call it a matriarchy). Men suffer quite a lot in this transition, because the laws are essentially all very patriarchal and women still expect things like child-support (something which would normally only exist in a patriarchy), while they behave as though they are in a matriarchy (wanting to sleep around and still be respected, etc.).

Now the patriarchy is actually not a society that favors men over women, and the matriarchy is not a society which favors women over men. Both societies favor men and women equally. I know a lot of MRAs do not believe this and use the draft as evidence that the patriarchy favored women more, but that is not true. The patriarchy is actually a society that favors children, while the matriarchy favors the individual (or self).

The patriarchy is a child-centered society. It is interested in birth and survival rates of children, and that is why males were drafted. Male disposability led to more children. The patriarchy comes from difficult times, it was born in hard times, it is a very social system, an efficient system, and it's a survival mechanism.

We know it leads to successful societies because many of the major cultures that dominate the world today have a patriarchal history. And we can see this most clearly through the fact that the world's major religions like Christianity, Islam, Hinduism and Confucianism all come from cultures which support the patriarchy. All of these religions and the cultures that support them speak of female obedience to her husband and male responsibility and dominance over to his family.

Most of the world's major cultures have patriarchal roots, this is a map showing the major religions of each country as it was in 1960. It is taken from Hans Rosling's talk on religion and babies.

Since people who share the same religion also often share common cultural practices with respect to structuring family life, and the cultures associated with the major religions in the picture above are all patriarchal, we can see that the patriarchal way of structuring society has had a lot of success.

The matriarchy–and I feel like I have lived in one, which is Jamaica–is a “matriarchal” society within a patriarchal setting. It is not a very social system, and is in fact very inefficient. It works when resources are abundant and easy to access and it works on the principal that everyone just does what is best for themselves. What happens in such a society is that men do not take care of or even know their kids. Women work and take all the steady, easy and good jobs. Men, who only need to take care of themselves, take the unstable and unreliable jobs, the hard jobs.

Men and women do not live together and do not seek to form relationships. They just come together for sex. Gender roles still exist, but male female interaction is more limited so they only exist pre-sex. Typically males compete for female attention and have to offer women something material in order to get sex. The thing is, though, in this system most women are attracted to the same men and those men get the most sex. Also, on a side-note, I think you have bit more bisexualism in this type of society. This is not a bad thing, but I think many women use it as a sort of birth control, they have sex with other women because they know it is safe and they cannot get pregnant.

Loading...

Now I know a lot of people will disagree with me, but in part male/female relations are actually a trade with sex being the commodity. In any sexual act the person with the most at stake is the female. Putting aside unfair laws, child support actually came from the patriarchy. The woman is the one who might get pregnant when the act is over, she might end up with a child, while the man ends up with no consequence beyond sex. That sets things up so that men are always seeking sex from women.

Now essentially without science we can define women and men by saying women make babies and feed infants, and men do not make babies or feed infants, freeing them up to do other things with their time. This sets things up so that women are more limited than men with respect to their access to resources. So with men in need of sex and women in need of rare or hard to get resources, in both the patriarchy and the matriarchy, this trade takes place.

Marriage was a trade of sex (and access to one's children) for male work (less limited work). In the matriarchy that same trade occurs (minus access to one's children) but on a short term basis. The traditional system is a much more social system because it shares the sex and male work equally, while the matriarchal does not. I think the majority of people can actually benefit from the traditional system. There are some who will do better in the matriarchal system, but the majority does better in the patriarchy. So we need to maintain that balance and so we need to fight for the patriarchy to stay.

Humans are social beings. The social part of us causes most of us to follow the crowd and to fit into whatever we identify as the pattern (whether that pattern is to be weird, to be liberal, to be odd, or to fit in). The social part of our psychology causes society to trend either to traditionalism in an extreme form or to liberalism in an extreme form. We have to fight so that society does not end up on the extremely liberal side, so that we have balance.

The picture below shows how I think the cycle between the matriarchy and the patriarchy works, I do not mean to imply that any one society is fully matriarchal or fully patriarchal, because in fact I think there are layers from both sides in every society. The idea of a central government and taxes for example is a social system and it exists in many capitalist settings. I think society takes the parts from the self-centered society that it can, while using the parts of the society-centered society that are necessary.

What I do mean to imply is that many parts of the traditional way of structuring society are beneficial to the majority of society, and so I think we should hold on to them. The patriarchy has been successful for many reasons, and we have to be careful not to ignore some of these reasons. Male investment and access to their offspring both in the form of being a role model who would love, guide, and seek the best interests of their children and through their economic contributions benefited society enormously. Allowing women the freedom to focus on producing and caring for children also benefited society.

The patriarchy as we know it was not perfect, but neither is a matriarchy, and so I think we as a society need to start sifting through both systems, and it is important that as we do this we keep the parts of the patriarchal ways of structuring society that were, and can still be, beneficial to individuals and society.

6 Wedding Gifts For Happiness Ever After

August 3, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

[image]
Maybe you've sworn off ever getting married, but you're still getting invited right and left to the weddings of your friends and family. Instead of being that asshole who tries to dissuade your friend from getting hitched, better to wish him luck and arm him with the tools ensure he will live happily ever after. And hey, there's no reason to limit it to your male friends – you'd want the same for the man marrying your daughter. Set them on the good and righteous path of marital bliss.

> A man well-fed and well-fucked is too content with slumber to sleep around on his woman.

Child Paternity Test Voucher

There may be no children yet, but you want to ensure that amidst all the fracas of childbirth in the future, he knows he's the father. Hell, he may even object to verifying his wife's fidelity ("PUSSY!"). Spare him from making that decision, and simply pay his way for a paternity test in advance for his first-born.

A Paddle

You may think that a wife ought to get ~~slapped around~~ disciplined and conditioned on the regular, that pain well-applied begets marital bliss. Good luck persuading the groom of that – odds are he's a pussy, and there's little you can do to change that. Instead, give him a paddle. It may go unused at first, but curiosity will get the best of them as it lies on their mantle, beckoning to be used, "just once, to see what it's like." A little spanking could have her worshiping the royal scepter in no time.

Bonus: If the man is such a bitch that he ends up getting hit with it, you have earned favor in God's eyes, for delivering punishment on such an abomination of man.

A Personal Lecture From Dr. Robert Lustig

Sugar meets women's liberation

Lustig is a medical researcher who has declared sugar toxic. He's internet famous for a

YouTube video declaring as much, an impressive feat considering that the video is an hour and a half. The harsh words of Lustig will help to scare her straight from a life of iniquity replete with cupcakes and cronuts. And the groom will be forever indebted to you for his wife's tiny waist and firm ass.

An All Expenses Paid Honeymoon to the Wichita Falls Athletic Club

Bitches love it when Mark lets it Ripp

Missing: 180 lbs on the bar

You worship at the altar of Mark Rippetoe, author of Starting Strength. And as penance for your pathetic sub-1000 lb squat numbers, you put the couple on a pilgrimage to Wichita Falls. You're a cheap fuck, and only pay for the essentials for her, the squat and the deadlift instruction. But that's okay, because all she needs is good posture, a tiny waist and a fat ass anyway; leave the broad backs and pink dumbbells to the tomboys and the flat-assed yuppies. And she won't do just any squat, but the low bar back squat done well past parallel, and heavy, for maximum ass growth. If the groom is not a big booty luvr, Rippetoe will go apeshit on him and Bert stare him until he becomes one. Not to worry, as a man gets bigger and stronger, his appetite for the Brazilian-sized bunda swells exponentially.

Free Prenup Consultation

Save this for the engagement party actually. Find a local attorney with experience in writing prenuptial agreements for breadwinners, i.e. men. Attorneys often offer free consultations anyway, but pretend you paid for it, so your friend feels pressured to use it, and not just let it go to waste. There's no better salesman for pre-nups than the man who writes them, so you're putting your duty to preach the pre-nup gospel in the hands of a pro.

The Hapifork

Conceived by the Chateau and created by a Frenchman, the Hapifork vibrates when the user starts shoveling food into her maw too quickly. For those times when she's hoovering up cheesecake en masse, the Hapifork will vibrate violently, alerting her to "slow the fuck down, woman." If she's been trained well, every time the fork vibrates, she will burst into tears and run to the altar of the squat rack to repent for her gluttony.

Hugo Schwyzer Pulls A Mark Minter

August 3, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

In some sort of symbolic exchange, the femosphere lost one of its more notable writers in the same week the manosphere lost Mark Minter. And for the exact same vice!
Hugo Schwyzer, the self-proclaimed "pegging" male feminist came out of the closet this week announcing he was tired of being criticized by both feminists and normal people.

> After I wrote about Manic Pixie Dream Girls, this guy Chris tweeted, "the number one job of male feminists is to never let Hugo Schwyzer get another freelancing gig." It got 120 retweets and 140 favorites in an hour. I mean, that wildly overestimates the job, right? And it was just really hurtful. I was like, I don't want to go through this anymore. I feel like a little kid trying to get attention.

And while he was at it, he just so happened let slip that he wasn't performing his role:

> Off-brand … as in out of character?
> In that I'm supposed to be reformed. The affair was with someone in the same circles that you and I move in, so I have to protect her. But there's a lot of gossiping. It may reach you. Don't be surprised.

Whoooooooppsss

Gee, who would have guessed that Hugo was a phony? No one would have EVER thought that Hugo was a lying, self-serving snake playing the game to get some slutty feminist snatch. He claimed reformed, but we always knew what kind of man Hugo was all along:

> He's a great troll.
> He used to bang students, probably still does.
> He's mooched off of women. He's been a gigolo. His notch count is in the hundreds.
> Game recognize game.

> He is the most disgusting white knight that there is: getting laid because he is famous and behaving in pretty much all the anti-feminist ways himself (yay for banging your students!), yet kissing ass to it and feeding hamsters worldwide with his man-hating bullshit. He is the ultimate parasite. The only comparable white knight that I can think of is that Claes Bogstrom guy, a famous Swedish advocate for the "expansion of definition of rape" (and responsible for Julian Assange's arrest).
> The fact that he has game doesn't make him admirable. Imagine if Roosh used his fame to spout common feminist claims – I don't think he'd remain admired (by us) for long.

And as Hugo predicted, the gossip around his affair went public. This chick (NSFW).

I wish it were my cock, my rigid, cum leaking cock
You should have fucked me before I was circumcised
I'm very very tight, I make sure of that. But I can accommodate a hard fuck
I love uncut. So much. But then again, I also like cut
I'm squirting cum all over the sheets
Oh, I'd love to find out

Would you bang? I think most men would have succumbed to the temptation.

No matter what a man calls himself – Christian, Feminist, Republican, Communist, etc – he is, and always will be, a man, and he will share the same sexual nature. Hot poonani? = Yes please. Just as the manosphere's Mr. Minter claimed he had learned the error of his ways and would avoid marriage, so too did Mr. Schwyzer believe he had had reformed his old ways to finally respect women:

> HS: Hah, I love the ambiguity of the word "intense." In terms of my sexual history with my students (which for the sake of clarification ended abruptly when I got sober in '98), the key word is simply "unethical." Though my promiscuity was hardly confined to my own students, that behavior stands out as deeply and profoundly wrong. Even if it was consensual, and involved students who for the most part were my approximate chronological peers, it was still a boundary violation. In the broader sense, that aspect of my past has made me keenly sensitive to power imbalances in sexual relationships. It's made me mistrustful of the possibility of consent in those instances where one person has so much more experience and authority than the other.

Hugo's lying and obfuscation skills are magnificent. I think they may even surpass my own, and I've told girls some pretty big whoppers. The fact that so many fell for it is still classic though.

However, realize that there were many who read Minter and probably felt the same way most of us felt about Hugo. There's no need to start witch hunts for phonies, but always remember it's far more important to judge a man's character than it is to judge his ideology.

The Christo-Feminist Porn Wars Of The 1980's

August 4, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Human sexuality and the expression of said sexuality has been one the most contentious issues in America since the Puritans settled New England in the 16th century. Ascending from the barbaric repression of sexuality of the English Protestants, American sexuality has always been subject to an incredible degree of social and ideological scrutiny. Inextricably bound up in this consideration of human sexuality is the concept of pornography. In America, just as marriage, gender roles and the like have been a proxy for the psychological struggle over human sexuality, pornography has been a significant proxy for the fight over what human sexuality is and how it should be expressed.

Consider the legality of pornography. Federal law prohibits the possession and use of obscene materials. The law is fairly old as it bans "filthy pamphlets" and "filthy phonograph recordings."

Generally speaking, pornography is not considered a protected from of speech under the 1st Amendment, as it is obscene. Obscene materials are not protected by the 1st Amendment. A case in 1973 altered the legal standard that defines what obscene is – it is a controversial three-prong test referred to as the Miller test. The first two prongs deal with community standards; if the average person of the community, applying state law, would deem the work appealing to a prurient interest and depicts sexually offensive conduct, it counts as obscene. The final prong refers to whether the work has any literary, artistic, political or scientific value based on whether a reasonable person in America would determine so. This third prong is a check on works, that in certain communities, would be obscene in a community but would have value at large in America.

Given the ubiquity of pornography and the fact a number of men will be on the jury, it is hard to conceive most pornography (obviously, child pornography will always be obscene) being found to be obscene. A conservative Christian group called "Concerned Women Of America" contacted all the federal prosecutor's offices in the 2000's to ask if they will go forward prosecuting obscenity cases – most did not respond and the ones that did said they had no plans to prosecute pornography.

With the loosened sex morals of the country that happened in the 1960's and the changes in legal proscriptions of obscene material, a booming pornography business began to emerge in America. Simultaneously, anti-pornography groups began to coalesce.

The most strident anti-pornography feminists are anti-sex feminists – referred to as radical feminists going forward. This strain of feminism was born out of lesbian feminism in the early 1970's. Books like Rita Mae Brown's "The Rubyfruit Jungle" detail lesbian's exploration and their adulation of female sexuality. Quickly, they began to realize how markedly different their sexuality was from male sexuality.

Instead of exploring biological reasons, it was immediately chalked up to patriarchal male oppression. A great distillation of their arguments, by Ellen Willis, is that male sexuality is based on "patriarchal sexual relations backed up by male power by force." They thought the use of pornography was a way of socializing and reinforcing female subordination to the male. They focused on BDSM initially and, eventually, on violence against women in pornography.

Pro-sex feminists are nominally pro- human sexuality but, usually, only insofar that they believe women should be able to pursue sexual relations as they please. They saw and see anti-sex feminists as morally puritanical and they view the push to ban pornography as a threat to free speech.

Still, there was and is a meeting of the minds between pro-sex and radical feminists insomuch as they believe beauty standards are created by men in order to oppress women. Clearly, that is another reason for radical feminists to oppose pornography; for pro-sex feminists, in order to counter beauty standards, they fight for nonconforming women to be in mainstream pornography.

Starting eight years ago, there is a Feminist Porn Awards where feminist conforming videos and artwork are awarded for their sexual, racial and body diversity. Important topics in feminist porn are consent, female sexual pleasure and having a female writer or director. While BDSM is accepted, it has to be clearly grounded in consent for all parties.

While the movement was forming itself, the anti-pornography movement began to settle on focusing on pornography as promoting violence against women. The poster child for this movement was Andrea Dworkin. Her heated and vicious rhetoric was polarizing and fundamentally altered the arc of feminism. She made no difference between heterosexuality or homosexuality; she said all male sexuality is based on hatred, power and male privilege. Here is commonly quoted statement by her:

Pornography is the essential sexuality of male power: of hate, of ownership, of hierarchy; of sadism, of dominance. The premises of pornography are controlling in every rape and every rape case, whenever a woman is battered or prostituted, in incest, including in incest that occurs before a child can even speak, and in murder—murders of women by husbands, lovers, and serial killers.

Andrea Dworkin and this movement gained steamed through the early 1980's. A couple of highly-charged feminist conventions were marred by the divisions between these two camps. NOW endorsed the anti-sex approach, while another feminist convention in 1982 was not keen on radical feminist approaches to sexuality – they locked radical feminists out of the planning of the event as they correctly observed radical feminists were dominating feminist theory.

At the height of this movement, Andrea Dworkin and Catherine MacKinnon (a prominent legal scholar) sought to legislatively codify their approach to pornography. Leaning on the Miller standard, they decided to target municipalities for their model ordinance. They framed pornography as sexual discrimination and labeled pornography as "the graphic sexual subordination of women through pictures or words." (Would "Fifty Shades of Grey" pass under this ordinance?) Under that definition, they articulated that their definition of pornography includes at least one of a number of criteria: sexual submission by a female, women presented as sexual objects, women on display and women being penetrated by objects. These ordinances were introduced into many cities, most famously in Minneapolis, twice. Even when they were passed, such as Indianapolis, they were quickly slapped down by federal courts as violating the 1st Amendment.

At the same time radical feminist's agitated against the fruits of the Sexual Revolution represented by pornography, conservative Christians began to grow disaffected. Lyndon Johnson famously remarked after signing the Civil Rights Act of 1965 he signed the South over to the Republicans for 50 years. While he was right, he wasn't right about what would emerge as the major organizing movement for Republicans. Nixon pursued a "Southern Strategy" whereby he would appeal to racism of the South by way of campaigning for states' rights and a strong, muscular police force. Top Republicans understood the arc of American progress and knew weakening voting rights and civil rights were a complete nonstarter for their Northern voters, but understood the Democratic hegemony of the South no longer existed. In this vacuum, emerged a man named Jerry Falwell.

Loading...

Jerry Falwell was an influential Christian pastor who was not only charismatic, but also politically savvy. He sensed the growing discord Christian Americans had with the arc of American society and began to form a political movement known as the "Moral Majority." Opposition to abortion, opposition to the ERA and maintaining strong ties to Israel were all key planks of the movement. The growing power of the movement almost catapulted Reagan to the Republican nomination in 1976; it certainly helped Reagan to secure the Presidency in 1980.

As for Reagan himself, as governor of California, he signed off on bills legalizing abortion and no-fault divorce. Both signings tarnished his conservative reputation – no-fault divorce, in particular – so he needed to appease the conservative Christians who voted for him. As such, he stridently opposed pornography. He was renowned for stance against pornography and his Presidency was noted for his increasing enforcement of federal laws against pornography.

Reagan sponsored a meeting in 1983 about how to deal with pornography at the federal level. This lead to Reagan's sanctioning of the Meese Commission in 1985.

Edwin Meese was the Attorney General for Reagan's second term. He was a stereotypical conservative Christian attorney, but he had a curious obsession with pornography.
Both Lyndon Johnson and Richard Nixon had funded inquiries into pornography and those studies had concluded it was best to legalize pornography. Reagan did not agree with the studies and had Meese chair more studies on pornography. The hearings focused on the effect of pornography on children, but also the violence inherent in pornography. The funding for the hearings was limited, but afforded a particularly interesting union of Christians and radical feminists.

Radical feminists heard of the hearings and came in droves. In these hearings, they unleashed their firebrand theories – and it was, by and large, swallowed whole by the sponsors. The chairman of the hearings, Henry Hudson, requested transcripts of the radical feminist testimony. In the end, the commission issued all sorts of recommendations and possible legal approaches to combating pornography. They advanced some bizarre legal approaches to pornography, such as considering consensual pornographic films a violation of the right to privacy. They also advanced a legal theory that participation in a pornographic film was a violation of federal labor law.

However, by far the most disturbing recommendation was the wholesale endorsement of the Dworkin-MacKinnon ordinance. They endorsed treating pornography as a violation against women, as a class, and endorsed all the ways their definition sought to limit the expression of pornography. Dworkin and MacKinnon held a joint press conference celebrating the endorsement. Meese wasn't a legal fool, as he knew their approach to the law would never pass muster with the Supreme Court, so he dropped a footnote in the report stating that Dworkin-MacKinnon approach should necessarily be limited by Supreme Court jurisprudence. While the Dworkin-MacKinnon approach has never been directly addressed by the Court, the Court has affirmed an appellate case that dismissed the approach on 1st Amendment grounds.

The reason both radical feminists and some conservative Christians came together over the issue of pornography is the wages of moral puritanism – otherwise known as Obsessive Compulsive Personality Disorder. OCPD is based out of the inability to come to terms with anti-social thoughts (we all have bad impulses within ourselves) and, as such, they need very strong rules in place in order to prevent the expression of said impulses and behaviors. The trouble is, all of us have anti-social impulses and desires from time to time; people who have levels of OCPD don't understand that. All they understand is enforcing rules so they never have to come to terms with those untoward impulses or thoughts.

Pornography is a difficult concept to understand for some. It represents the biological nature of sexuality, it depicts sexuality in a way that doesn't reflect the sort of fanciful dimensions that are taught to children and teenagers in America and it represents impulses that are completely upsetting to some, mostly moral puritans. The vicious fight over pornography in America revealed the common strain of psychology that undergirds much of mainstream conservative Christianity and feminism. The fact that Meese and radical feminists agreed on a plan to ban pornography showcased the fact that their collective psychology is similar and the effects of their actions – the banning of pornography – is also reflective of that psychology. When considering any ideology's psychology, the end result of their actions must always be considered, as the end result is reflective of what they truly desire.

The banning of pornography pursued by both groups here has little to do with promoting better values in society, reducing violence against women or any other excuse invented to explain away their dogged pursuit at drowning out human sexuality through censorship. It is about brutally oppressing the expression of human sexuality so they never have to come to terms with their sexuality. Humans, as sexual beings, have all sorts of bizarre, violent and downright weird sexual impulses both infrequently and frequently. Using ideologies (Christianity) or creating ones out of whole cloth (feminism) in order to oppress other's expression and enjoyment of their sexuality isn't about the expressing party so much as it is the oppressing party seeking to scrub the world of that which makes them all too aware of their anti-social impulses.

The problem with such enforcement of rules is that it does nothing but shore up their sense of the world. People are always curious about what they are told to not view. Pretending that such strict enforcement of the rules will do anything but help calm them is ludicrous. Often times, their dogged pursuit at censorship, social shaming and outright punishment has the reverse effect – exacerbating the problems they seek to target. Often, this is intentional. By driving others to engage in anti-social behaviors, they seek to use increasingly strident enforcement of rules to shore up their psychology.

The Porn Wars of the 1980's certainly was a strange time in American history. Of course, there is little to nothing to be done against the proliferation of pornography in society, especially with the invention of the Internet. Just like the parable of Pandora's Box, it is next to impossible to stuff human sexuality back into the neat box of gender roles, the nuclear family and social stability.

Pornography is representative of that, as humans can no longer deny that men are biologically attracted to youth and beauty. Books like "50 Shades of Grey" represent women are attracted to power, confidence and social status. There is no going back now. However, some of us like to pretend we can travel back to a time when we could whimsically fantasize about the reality of human sexuality. The cold, indifferent truth about human sexuality is staring society down. The Rubicon was crossed a long time ago. We can pretend to ignore the reality of human sexuality or we can face it head-on and make informed decisions going forward. Given the existence of the Porn Wars as a real episode in US history, I have a strong inkling as to which path we shall chose.

Jealousy Should Prompt Learning

August 4, 2013 | by Mark Ford | Link | Original Link

One of the first concepts I was introduced to as part of my "red pill" reawakening, and certainly one of the core aspects of any man's self-improvement journey, is moving from a scarcity to an abundance mindset.

In brief: when humans believe there is not enough of something, they start to hoard it, value it, agonize over it, compete for it and be dismayed at their lack of it. When it seems there is more than enough of something, humans trivialize it, share it, avail themselves of it and are generally unconcerned about it.

Two important notes:

1. It is not the actual availability of something that influences our behaviour, but the perceived availability.

2. A small shift in perception can trigger a shift in attitude, which then alters returns and finally perception, creating a snowball effect. This too is independent of the actual availability of the thing in question.

We'll come back to these.

I want stuff

This is an extremely powerful principle – the obvious application in this context is women, but it has equally potent ramifications with regards to money, power, time and motivation (among others).

Look around you – winners are in abundance and losers are in scarcity. Everyone wants to be the guy with more women, money, time, motivation and/or social status than he knows what to do with, and is secretly glad not to be the guy with none. It's a Catch-22, the guy with an abundance mindset always seems to end up with more than he needs while the guy with a scarcity mindset never has enough. You can debate all day whether it was the chicken or the egg that came first but it's ultimately semantics, the results speak for themselves.

If you really need "proof" or examples, track down interviews with any rich person and find out if they pinched pennies to get there, ask any smooth guy if he's worried about losing his girlfriend or observe the most popular guy at a party constantly giving out compliments and building other people up.

Loading...

S/He has what I want

Right, let's associate this with jealousy. What is jealousy? Being annoyed that someone else has something that you don't. The same suspects show up here as mentioned above – women, money, social status, time, motivation etc.

Here's the epiphany:

It is only possible to be jealous when in a scarcity mindset.

Once more for clarity:

It is only possible to be jealous when in a scarcity mindset.

If we refer back to my two important notes though, we realize that there is an incredibly high chance that this is not due to an actual scarcity but rather a perceived one. You're mad because you think someone else is cutting away a slice of your pie, when actually you should be asking their advice on knife sharpening so you can both eat your fill from the communal pie.

Actions points

Next time you find yourself jealous of anyone for your lack of anything:

DON'T: Be like the friend with no game. Don't rationalize a reason they have what they have and you don't ("he's lucky he's so tall, that girl would be with me if I was 6'3"), silently insult them in your own mind ("faggot") or pretend you don't care ("whatever, I don't even want a girlfriend anyway")

DO: Gain some respect for that person (they have the ability to get what you want, so the two of you aren't so different), politely ask for their advice and listen carefully to what they say, apply their advice to see if it works for you and finally be grateful for learning something new.

Everyone knows something you don't, you're only shooting yourself in the foot if you get upset about it.

Why Feminists Shouldn’t Miss Hugo Schwyzer

August 5, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Last week the internet was greeted with news of the departure of the feminist blogosphere’s leading man, Hugo Schwyzer. Why?

> For one, the toxicity of take-down culture is exhausting and dispiriting…
> … But despite [my] past and my glib prose, I don’t think I’m wrong that when it comes to a concerted effort to drive me off the internet, I’ve been more sinned against than sinning.

For those who can’t be bothered, I’ll summarize it for you: the internet hurt his feelings.

In case you don’t know him, Schwyzer was one of the most tireless advocates of male emasculation on the internet. I wrote most recently about his promotion of “pegging”, and his shaming of older men who choose to date younger women also stands in a long list of his anti-male diatribes.

In a way, however, Schwyzer’s departure is a victory for the feminist blogosphere. Why?

1. He was a raging hypocrite.

As I mentioned above, Hugo Schwyzer has been an outspoken opponent of men taking an interest in younger women.

This is awkward because, as I mentioned above, Schwyzer has had no problem fucking his students. He’s also had no problem sexting women nearly two decades his junior:

> The details of this marital infidelity are not known, but in January 2013, Schwyzer, then 45, had a brief but torrid texting, telephonic and online fling with a 27 year old woman named Christina Parreira, also known is “sex worker activism’ circles as Christina Page.
> …Parreira vacationed in Los Angeles from late January to mid-February, and had also planned to speak in Schwyzer’s class.

But wait! That’s not all. Schwyzer sought to go further than just the mere sext. Schwyzer wanted to fuck Christina Page…and his “son”:

> Hugo Schwyzer engineered a media blitz in February after inviting popular porn performer and Lindsay Lohan co-star James Deen to address at Schwyzer’s “Navigating Pornography” class at Pasadena Community College…
> …In private messages with her ex-boyfriend, Parreira claims that she and Schwyzer shared fantasies about having a three-way with Deen. Parreira also related that Schwyzer – a bisexual who reportedly told Parreira he was in a monogamous yet sexless relationship with his wife – claimed he “missed sucking cock.”

Briana Sakura Casado oh, james deen can actually see that post. that's embarrassing..

Hugo Schwyzer I remember when I first saw him in a movie, and I did a triple take. I've been writing about beauty and living in Los Angeles for a long time... and I am no great expert on porn. But I know charisma when I see it, you know?

I can't breathe from laughter. Yes your son that you're dying to fuck

OMG LOI

So, Hugo says this in his male-shaming articles:

> If there's one tangible thing that men can do to help end sexism—and create a healthier culture in which young people come of age—it's to stop chasing after women young enough to be their biological daughters. As hyperbolic as it may sound, there are few more powerful actions that men can take to transform the culture than to date, mate, and stay with their approximate chronological peers.

Yes, Hugo, we'll avoid dating women young enough to be our daughters…

…while you (a married man) run around looking for sex with women AND MEN young enough to be your children. Sounds legit.

Feminists have long been fighting the notion that they are hypocritical and illogical, prone to making demands of men that they don't intend to apply to women. Given their likely desire not to promote this image, do they really need someone like this on their side?

On the contrary, such an "ally" can do more damage than even their most devoted enemies.

2. He was dishonest.

We in the manosphere are quite often portrayed as morally degenerate and/or misguided by our opponents, but Schwyzer did his level best to bring that characterization to his supposed feminist allies as well via his own conduct as a self-proclaimed "male feminist".

This was a man who has openly admitted to possibly cuckolding another man and seemed to see nothing wrong with it. Instead of coming to terms with the fact that what he did was immoral, he rationalizes it in a way only a sociopath can, attempting to disassociate sperm provision from the concept of fatherhood in order to justify his probable role in deceiving other men into raising children that aren't theirs:

Loading…

> Fourteen autumns ago, I was casually dating a woman I'll call Jill*. We had unprotected intercourse a handful of times in late October and early November. And just before Thanksgiving, Jill discovered she was pregnant.
> She didn't tell me until after New Year's Day. While Jill and I had been in a "friends with benefits" arrangement, she'd also been growing more serious about another man, Ted.*

Enter the unwitting beta into the inescapable trap…

> She'd first slept with him for the first time two nights before she had last slept with me. It was that week that Jill got pregnant, and as she would later tell me, there was no way to know for sure which one of us was the father.
> But there was no question which one of us was a better bet as a romantic partner. Jill had broken things off with me as soon as she and Ted had decided on an exclusive relationship (just before she found out she was pregnant.) Ted was several years older than I was, professionally and emotionally stable, and clearly falling in love with Jill. I was drinking, partying, with some time to go before I'd hit my rock bottom. Jill wanted to be a mom. Ted wanted to be a dad. I wasn't sure what I wanted. In her mind, these facts settled it: the baby was Ted's. Or > it needed to be Ted's.

> Fathering has everything to do with being present after conception and after birth, and very little with providing the sperm to fertilize an egg. Regardless of what a paternity test would reveal, I am still my daughter's dad – and in every meaningful sense, Ted is Alastair's.

If the fact that he may not have actually fathered his supposed "son" is so meaningless (because sperm provision has no significance at all in Mr. Schwyzer's World), then why not just let Ted know that he may not have fathered his "son" and may have been tricked into thinking otherwise?

I mean, that distinction is "meaningless", right? So why hide it? If he's as smart and "emotionally stable" as Schwyzer claimed, surely he'll recognize how "meaningless" the distinction is and all will be well. What is there to fear from that which has no meaning?

> The specifics of human reproduction mean that men may have children of whose existence they are unaware, and they may unwittingly raise as their own children conceived with another man's sperm. But women have it harder, and not only in terms of pregnancy, labor, and delivery. It is Jill, not I, who carries the burden of an unresolved question through her relationship with her husband and her first-born son.
> These uncertainties that I know many men share are part of the cost of a habit of unprotected heterosexual intercourse. But the solution to the problem isn't suspicion or frantic demands for paternity tests, Jerry Springer style. The solution isn't even the rigorous use of contraception (though that's a very good idea.)
> The solution is to remember that it is love, not sperm, that makes a great dad.

Summary: I met a whore who got around with multiple men at the same time. She met a good beta who didn't know any better. She got knocked up and I may very well be the father. I ignored this because the whore's rationalization hamster decreed that the beta was the father because she "needed it to be". This man may have been deceived by me and this whore into raising a child that isn't his, but that's totally ok because it's all about “love”.

Yeah, that sounds great. Forget about honesty, integrity, trust or fidelity. It’s great to be an unwitting cuckold, so long as you’ve got “love”!

:Whores and the disingenuous sociopathic pricks who impregnate them but don’t want to deal with the offspring approve this message.

3. He was an abusive predator.

Hugo Schwyzer was also a man who has been open about having acted in a manner that I think most feminists would consider “predatory”:

> In the fall of 1996, I was 29. Three years into my teaching career, my reputation as an energetic lecturer was quickly being eclipsed by rumors of my sleeping with students. Most of the rumors were true. I was reckless to the point of stupidity, showing little interest in protecting the job I loved. I was trying to get sober and failing. I stashed drugs in the same file cabinets that held student papers, gave lectures with booze in my bloodstream. I had sex with students on my office desk.

And abusive:

> The current backlash against him, set in motion by yet another article recounting this troubling history, took on unprecedented intensity after the resurfacing of a post, originally written a year ago, in which Schwyzer admitted to nearly killing a former girlfriend in a drug-fueled murder-suicide attempt.

Hugo Schwyzer was not a man equipped psychologically or intellectually to do feminists any real good. He represented everything that many consider wrong with feminism in one tidy package, a walking hypocrite with views too comically anti-male to come from anyone reasonable and worth listening to.

Long story short, feminists have won a tremendous victory by extricating a malignant, sociopathic cancer from their movement (or, in this case, having the cancer extricate itself). They still have plenty of tumors left, I'm sure, but every little bit helps.

15 Language Learning Tips For Self-Study

August 5, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

One of the key milestones in any man's development is the mastery of one or more foreign languages. Unfortunately, like so many critical skills, there are great differences of opinion regarding how to go about accomplishing this goal. There are many purveyors of theory, but relatively few who have actually rolled up their sleeves and mastered the art of learning a language through a systematic and focused application of willpower.

Many men have convinced themselves that the goal is beyond their reach, when in fact they have not been pursuing their goal in an efficient way. Like all limiting beliefs, it is one that must be shattered. I wanted to share my own tips and thoughts on what has worked for me over the years. The paragraphs below offer my own thoughts and suggestions.

No one is going to help you.

There is a pervasive myth that being around native speakers will somehow enable you to learn by osmosis. Or, men think that a native speaker girlfriend will solve all their problems. This is not the case. Native speakers are not your security blanket. You have to do the grunt work yourself. Native speakers, even if they're your friend or lover, often don't have the patience or inclination to listen to you flummox about in their language. And in many cases, when you are living abroad, people will be more interested in pimping you out for English practice.

Of course, interaction with natives is critical, but you need to be realistic about what it will and will not do for you. Success comes when you realize that you have to fight for your goal of fluency alone. A good rule of thumb is: do the grunt work yourself, and use native speakers to test what you've learned, or polish what you know. Expecting more from other people is setting yourself up for frustration.

She's into you, but she can only help you so much.

Conventional classroom language classes are better than nothing, but in most cases are close to being worthless.

The reason is simply that they are too easy. They are not difficult enough or frequent enough (unless you are in a specialized immersion program). They use passive, old fashioned instructional methods. You need daily, intense contact with the language, something that a classroom work does not provide. Instead, focus on being an intense self-learner with a specific and sustained agenda for the long term.

Choose your books, workbooks, and recordings very carefully.

Most of the language courses on the market today are simply too easy. You need something that is going to make serious demands on your cognitive abilities if you want to improve. I have found that the resources offered by the academic presses of Georgetown, Yale, Cambridge, and Oxford to be very good. But you need to look around. No one company has everything. You will need to collect multiple courses over time, from different publishers, and work through all of them. I have very specific course recommendations for Arabic, Portuguese, and Latin, for those who are interested. Whichever courses you choose, they should have certain things in common:

1. The course should contain a large number of dialogues for a variety of situations: basic social situations, doctor, work, employment, renting, music, dating, repairing vehicle, discussing politics, health, education, current events, etc. There must be recordings with the materials. Books with no recordings are not worth much. You need to hear the dialogues and memorize them. Repeat them aloud. Converse with yourself. Repetition is critical, and you need to hear yourself speaking. I prefer courses that employ the "natural language" method: only the target language is used in instruction. No English is used. You need to begin training yourself to use the language right from the beginning.

2. The books should be sturdily made in order to hold up to frequent use, and should have ample margins to write notes. Don't underestimate the importance of this. Check the bindings and covers for durability. As you go through the course, every word you don't know should be written down and spoken aloud. Keep a separate composition book to write the words again, and review them frequently once or twice during the day.

3. At the intermediate and advanced stages, you should be using annotated readers with ample explanatory notes. A poorly edited text is useless. A good reader will have selections of articles from the popular press, history, folklore, education, art, etc. You need to be exposed to a variety of vocabulary from different fields of endeavor or interest.

4. Buy a variety of courses. No one single course is enough. The variety will do you good, and help reinforce previous learning.

5. Besides good books and recordings, you will need a good reference grammar at the intermediate and advanced stages. Notice I did not say at the beginning stages. Trying to learn too much grammar in the beginning will only slow you down. Remember, the goal is to learn the language, not to learn about the language. There is a big difference.

6. Flash cards are all right, if a bit overrated. They're good as a supplement in your down time, with certain caveats. You should have a set with about 2500 of the most commonly used verbs. (Verbs are more important than nouns). But to be worth anything, they should have an illustrative sentence on one side of the card. Say the sentence out loud, always. Memorization occurs in context, not in isolation. I like the cards made by Tuttle Publishing, which I believe is an Australian company.

Emotions affect performance.

Be aware that "affective filters" can block your progress. Studying should be done at a time when you are relaxed and refreshed, not when you're tired or stressed. You will notice a great variance in performance from day to day when you open your books in a restful state, and when you open them in a state of fatigue.

A native of New Guinea breaks it all down for a field researcher.

Don't worry too much about different dialects or about diglossia.

Just learn the standard version of whatever language you are studying. Specialists and linguists like to make a big deal about how there are different dialects of this or that language. Many languages also have a feature called "diglossia" where there are different "versions" of the language: one used in formal contexts, and another used in informal contexts. In diglossic situations, the style of speech spoken by people on a daily basis is a much different "register" of the language than the more literary form found in the press, television, or literature. The specialists are right, of course, but that doesn't mean you should worry about it too much.

Both Arabic and Portugese, as well as most other languages, have significant degrees of diglossia. But in practice it's not a big deal. Nobody expects you to speak like a native speaker. And in fact most natives prefer the non-native to use formal and correct speech. Just focus on learning both registers of the language (the "high" form and the "low" form) together, and don't make a big deal out of it.

Older books are often better than the newer ones.

This is not always true, of course, but you'd be surprised how good some of the stuff made in the 1960s is, compared with now. I also think computer-based courses are generally worthless. Educational standards have declined steadily in America and the UK in recent decades. Rigor has been replaced by an emphasis on making the student "feel good". This "dumbing down" effect on language learning is likely to continue, so be careful not to make things too easy on yourself.

Ask native speakers to correct you in conversation.

Instant correction on the spot will help to prevent what are called "fossilized errors", or errors that become embedded in your speaking style. This is very important. Make sure to tell your native speaker friends to correct you. Demand it, in fact.

Take a break every few months.

The mind needs time to rest and let the material "gel" in your head. You will find that coming back after a brief layoff of 7 to 10 days every few months will enable you to be stronger and better than before.

You need a daily commitment.

You need to be working at least 30 minutes per day, every day, for a few years. One hour would be better still. If you can't handle this commitment, then you will not be successful. Chose your language carefully; you'll be living with it for many years.

If you are studying more than one language at a time, use different desks or tables in your home for each language you are studying.

I learned this technique in a biography of Sir Richard Burton, an amazing 19th century British explorer and linguist. He had a separate desk in his house for each language he regularly studied. The idea is that you want to go to a different place for each separate language. The technique works: the mind tends to separate and remember things much better. This speeds learning and prevents “linguistic interference” where one language blends with another.

You need regular exposure to soap operas, movies, podcasts, cable TV, and internet video.

Subtitling is a good thing if you can get it. Satellite “free-to-air” TV is also good, although you will mostly get boring government stations. The internet has made the old option, shortwave radio, almost totally obsolete.

Do not allow yourself to settle into a rut.

Language learning is like working out. You are going to hit plateaus and do not want the mind to settle into a comfortable rut. Every few months, shake yourself up and mix the pot a little.

Memorize a few short stories, anecdotes, fables, or poems.

And be able to deliver them flawlessly. In the old days, language learners memorized large volumes of text in the target language. It helps cement structures in your brain. But it is also a good way to charm native speakers. Being able to rattle off a whole story or fable in the target language can be very impressive.

In the intermediate and advanced stages, use major news websites.

Print off short one page articles on current events, economics, health, culture, or whatever, and then translate them. I like to use Al Jazeera for Arabic, or O Globo for Portuguese. Keep a composition book (I love these) to write down all unknown vocabulary. Say the article out loud, as if you are a newscaster. This will keep you current on idioms, structures, and popular culture.

Expect plateaus.

The most common plateaus are:

1. Limited vocabulary (find yourself using the same words over and over again)
2. Embedded or “fossilized” errors (making the same mistakes so often that they become part of your conversational routine).
3. Not knowing enough grammatical constructions to express yourself fully.

As I said above, you just have to fight through plateaus. Keep plowing forward, keep up the daily grind. Remember that the people who succeed in learning are the ones willing to put in the sweat. Language learning can be a very tedious grind at times, but you should be powerfully motivated to do it despite all impediments.

It is all worth it. When you find yourself in a foreign land interacting with native speakers and shedding your old skin, you will know without doubt that you have spent your time wisely.

The Case For Minimalist Running

August 6, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

A focus of the book Born To Run is that running injuries have skyrocketed partially due to the increased use of unnaturally-padded running shoes. Though the sporting goods industry would have us believe otherwise, millions of years of natural selection has molded the human foot into the ideal mechanism for supporting weight and distributing impact force during distance running, an activity unique to humans.

I used to run frequently to stay in shape, but I always had nagging injuries such as foot pain, shin splints, and metatarsal stress reactions. I attributed this to having flat feet, and every year I would buy a brand new set of heavily-padded shoes and wonder why the injuries continued to mount. After searching for ways to end this cycle, I decided to try minimalist running shoes and have not looked back since buying my first pair of Vibram Fivefingers. I go "barefoot" for both distance and sprinting, and have used these shoes for a half marathon, scores of 10-mile runs and hundreds of hours of lifting in the gym. My recurring injuries have completely subsided.

Barefoot running is a big adjustment, requiring changing footfall patterns to run on a different part of the foot. Padded shoes encourage us to land on the heel and then slam the rest of the foot down, creating an unnatural deceleration that can lead to injury. Barefoot/minimalist shoes promote running on the middle of the foot, distributing the force of impact more evenly throughout the body.

Loading…

When switching to barefoot-style running, it's best to temporarily ramp down both distance and frequency. There are muscles and tendons in the legs that are underused with a heel-first strike in conventional shoes, so some minor soreness for the first week or two is normal. Once your footfall is altered and you have acclimated to the shoes, though, your legs will be stronger and less reliant on unnatural padding.

Besides added resistance to injury, barefoot running gives a more natural feel to the exercise, and a more minimalist running experience. The shoes make economic sense, costing $100 for a pair that will last for several years, unlike normal running shoes that are supposed to be replaced multiple times a year under normal use. They are waterproof and machine washable, and take up less space during travel.

Going "barefoot" is not only beneficial for runners. Wearing Vibrams in the gym gives you better feel for the ground, improving balance and creating a slightly lower center of gravity on compound lifts such as deadlifts and squats. I used to do these exercises in sneakers, but noticed an immediate improvement in stability after switching to the barefoot shoes.

Though Nike and other mainstream companies have begun to emulate Vibram's design, the shoes are still fairly counterculture and you're going to get some weird looks from time to time. Barefoot running may not be for everybody, but in the long term it may help you to avoid injury and get more out of your runs.

How To Manage Your Wealth (According To Cyrus The Great)

August 6, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

From Cyropaedia:

> Indeed, a saying of [Cyrus] is handed down comparing a good king to a good shepherd—the shepherd must manage his flock by giving them all they need, and the king must satisfy the needs of his cities and his subjects if he is to manage them. We need not wonder, then, that with such opinions his ambition was to excel mankind in courtesy and care. There was a noble illustration of his philosophy in the answer we are told he gave to Croesus, who had taken him to task, saying his lavish gifts would bring him to beggary, although he could lay by more treasures for himself than any man had ever had before. Cyrus, it is said, asked him in return, "How much wealth do you suppose I could have amassed already, had I collected gold, as you bid me, ever since I came into my empire?"

Croesus chastised Cyrus for giving away too much instead of accumulating more wealth for himself. He asked Croesus how much money he should be in possession of.

> And Croesus named an enormous sum. Then Cyrus said, "Listen, Croesus, here is my friend, Hystaspas, and you must send with him a man that you can trust." Then, turning to Hystaspas, "Do you," he said, "go round to my friends and tell them that I need money for a certain enterprise—and that is true, I do need it. Bid each of them write down the amount he can give me, seal the letter, and hand it to the messenger of Croesus, who will bring it here." Thereupon Cyrus wrote his wishes and put his seal on the letter, and gave it to Hystaspas to carry round, only he added a request that they should all welcome Hystaspas as a friend of his. And when the messengers came back, the officer of Croesus carrying the answers, Hystaspas cried, "Cyrus, my lord, you must know I am a rich man now! I have made my fortune, thanks to your letter! They have loaded me with gifts."

Cyrus sent his assistant to various friends asking how much money they could pledge to him. His assistant comes back, ecstatic, saying that the gifts alone given by those friends has made him a rich man.

> And Cyrus said, "There, Croesus, that is treasure number one; and now run through the rest, and count what sums I have in hand, in case I need them." And Croesus counted, and found, so the story tells us, that the sum was far larger than the amount he had said would have been lying in the treasury if only Cyrus had made a hoard.

In addition, the amount pledged by his friends exceeded the vast sum that Croesus originally stated, revealing that Cyrus, through his style of rule and approach to wealth, was far wealthier than the amount of gold in his vault.

Loading…

> At this discovery Cyrus said, so we are told, “You see, Croesus, I have my treasures too. Only you advise me to collect them and hide them, and be envied and hated because of them, and set mercenaries to guard them, putting my trust in hirelings. But I hold to it that if I make my friends rich they will be my treasures themselves, and far better guards too, for me and all we have, than if I set hired watchmen over my wealth.
> And I have somewhat else to say; I tell you, Croesus, there is something the gods have implanted in our souls, and there they have made us all beggars alike, something I can never overcome. I too, like all the rest, am insatiate of riches, only in one respect I fancy I am different. Most men when they have more wealth than they require bury some of it underground, and let some of it rot, and some they count and measure, and they guard it and they air it, and give themselves a world of trouble, and yet for all their wealth they cannot eat more than they have stomach for–they would burst asunder if they did–nor wear more clothes than they can carry–they would die of suffocation–and so their extra wealth means nothing but extra work.

Cyrus stated that accumulation of wealth beyond one’s capacity to consume it breeds ill-will and waste.

> For my part, I serve the gods, and I stretch out my hands for more and more; only when I have got what is beyond my own requirements I piece out the wants of my friends, and so, helping my fellows, I purchase their love and their goodwill, and out of these I garner security and renown, fruits that can never rot, rich meats that can work no mischief; for glory, the more it grows, the grander it becomes, and the fairer, and the lighter to be borne; it even gives a lighter step to those who bear it. One thing more, Croesus, I would have you know; the happiest men, in my judgment, are not the holders of vast riches and the masters who have the most to guard; else the sentinels of our citadels would be the happiest of mortals, seeing they guard the whole wealth of the state. He, I hold, has won the crown of happiness who has had the skill to gain wealth by the paths of righteousness and use it for all that is honourable and fair.”
> That was the doctrine Cyrus preached, and all men could see that his practice matched his words.

If you sent out an email to your social network asking for help or favors, how many would be willing to help? Perhaps this is a more accurate total of the wealth you truly have, and not what is in your bank account.

Letting Women Into Your Life

August 6, 2013 | by Redpill2late | Link | Original Link

I am probably older than the average Return of Kings reader. As my bio reads, I have been married twice. I have had some very difficult experiences from my marriages: I have been cheated on, left for another man, had money taken from me by a betraying wife, had large amounts of money squandered in secret, been infected with an STI.

My initial plan for this post was to relate one of the many marriage horror stories I have experienced. However, the more I planned this post, the more my thoughts moved from a micro level (my marriage horror stories) to a macro level (marriage IS a horror story). It's not that my stories are unique, it's that my stories are typical.

As I contemplated marriage AS a horror story, one movie in particular stood out as the perfect analogy for marriage: Let Me In. If you have not seen the movie, spoiler alert. I am going to discuss the plot and give away the ending.

Story Line

The movie title refers to the fact that a vampire cannot enter a dwelling unless invited. If a vampire enters a dwelling uninvited, it will die. Once invited in, the vampire may come and go at will.

A little girl, Abby, and her father move into the apartment next door to Owen, an unhappy, bullied 12 year old whose parents are in the process of divorcing. Abby is an odd child. She only comes out at night, and she is always bare foot, despite the cold temperatures and snow on the ground. Abby and Owen become friends. The movie progresses, and we discover Abby is a very old vampire. Abby's father is not her father, but a boy she befriended many years ago. Being human, he continued to age while Abby has not. Abby's father murders people and drains their blood to feed Abby.

Abby's "father" crashes a car during a botched murder, and he pours acid on his face to avoid being identified by police. Abby learns of this and goes to his hospital. She asks him to invite her into his room, but he cannot talk as a result of dousing himself with acid. He understands she cannot enter without his permission and dutifully leans out the window to allow Abby to drink his blood. He then falls to his death.

Abby now becomes closer to Owen. She asks to enter his apartment, and he challenges her to enter without the invitation. He refuses, but she enters anyway. She begins to bleed until Owen gives her the verbal invite to save her life. Fast forward a bit, and she saves his life when local bullies attempt to kill him.

The closing scene is Owen on a train, leaving town with a large trunk during the day. He taps on the trunk and Abby taps back from the inside. Owen is starting the cycle anew having replaced her "father".

The Analogy

This story is an absolutely beautiful analogy for marriage as we know it today, particularly in the Western world. The husband's role is to labor and sacrifice in order to provide for the wife's desires.

An interesting aspect of the analogy is that two characters represent the husband: Owen and the father.

The father lives and exists to serve Abby. He is getting older and less able to provide for her needs. His last acts are selfless and sacrificial: he disfigures himself so the police cannot quickly identify him and find Abby. He is unable to invite her into his hospital room because he cannot talk, so he dutifully leans out the window to allow Abby to drain him. He gives his last bit of life for her. Completely drained, he is discarded and Abby moves on to find a replacement.

Owen represents the husband at the beginning of the marriage. He is young and full of potential. He will serve Abby well for many years. His labor and efforts will not be his own but serve her desires and needs. When he becomes older and less able to meet her needs, he will be replaced, just as he replaced the father.

Abby represents the wife. Everything and everyone exists to serve her. She finds someone to cater to those desires. Once that person is unable to serve her or she finds someone that can server her better, she drains the last bit of life and resources from the first and moves on to the new provider.

The Critical Decision Point

A critical point of this analogy is the limitation of the vampire to enter a dwelling without being invited in.

As you get older, there will be many women wanting to latch onto you after riding the carousel. They will be knocking, asking for that invitation to be part of your life. When this happens, remember this movie, remember Owen, remember Abby's "father".

Be very, very careful of who you let in.

The Many Levels Of Game

August 7, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

Kevin is George Clooney's agent. He accompanies George to a restaurant opening. As they walk in, he notices every single girl in the room suddenly stop what they are doing, fix their clothing, check their makeup and hair and turn into little schoolgirls. George pays them no attention, takes a seat and enjoys his meal. Throughout the night, several girls come up to George and not so subtly each express that she is available for him if he wants her. Some slip him their addresses and phone numbers. They were melting in front of him. Kevin thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Later that week, Kevin takes out a prospective musician Craig for drinks at a trendy bar in town. Craig is a good talent and Kevin is evaluating whether to take him on as his agent. As they are out drinking, several very attractive girls come up to Kevin, chit chat with him and make small talk. All the waitresses and bartenders know Kevin. Kevin explains to Craig that with his job, and the associated power that comes with it, he is able to bed a lot of girls of this quality. Craig thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Craig leaves and has a gig at a local bar in town playing a live set. A girl he is dating is there with him, tall, skinny objectively very attractive girl that most would be quite happy with. After his set, they come to the bar and order drinks and next to them is LD, who came out for a bit before his flight the next morning. LD, Craig and his girlfriend get to talking and Craig explains that they met after a concert she attended and they hit it off. LD is slightly taken aback by her beauty, and she is nice to boot. LD thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

LD wakes up the next morning and gets on the plane for his trip. On the flight, he starts chatting with Rick who is flying to the same town. As they exit the plane, LD walks outside to be surprised by a girl he's dated before, who is 19, in heels and a dress, and baked him a cake for his arrival. LD embraces her, they kiss and walk out of the airport. Rick sees this and thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Rick meets his friend Andrew the next night at a bar in town. After a few beers, Rick turns to the girl next to him and starts chatting with her. She is 28, reasonably cute and an accountant. They have a few drinks, Rick suggests they listen to some music at his place and she agrees. Rick says goodbye to Andrew with a smile on his face, and knowing Rick, Andrew knows what will happen. Andrew thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

After Rick leaves, Andrew walks around the bar speaking to various girls around the venue. On his fifth approach, Andrew is talking to an average looking girl. She is a bit tipsy and so is Andrew at this point, and they start making out. They accidentally bump into a twenty-three year old engineer named Jason as they devour each other's faces. Jason just got a promotion at his job and was out celebrating with friends, after receiving permission from his chubby girlfriend that he lives with. As Jason walks by Andrew, he thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Jason goes home around 1:00 a.m. His girlfriend is there having ice cream with a few friends, including Gary. Jason excuses himself and goes right to his bedroom, tired and not wanting to deal with his girlfriend or her friends. Gary cannot believe how poorly Jason treats his girlfriend, always ignoring her. Yet somehow Jason's girlfriend won't leave him. Gary shakes his head and silently thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Gary has had sex with two women in his life. He recently heard about online dating, so he is now attempting to meet some girls online. He goes out with Ann, pays for a long expensive dinner, and sees her two more times before she disappears and won't return his calls. On the second date he made out with her, and on the third date he cradled some bare breast. Frustrated, at the next family dinner he tells his cousin Kyle the story. Kyle nods his head in agreement, not wanting to tell Gary that he's actually never been on a date before. As Gary goes into detail about Ann's nipple to tit ratio, Kyle thinks to himself, I wish I could pull girls like that.

Kyle's had enough. It takes him three days to build the courage, but he says no matter what he is going to hit on two girls today. Kyle showers, gets dressed, and goes to the local mall. At the food court, he sits and stares for an hour before finally mustering the strength to go talk to a girl as she finishes her lunch. Kyle is awful at it, but manages to get the girl to converse for a minute before she politely rejects him. On his second approach, the girl quickly states she has a boyfriend and leaves. Unbeknownst to Kyle, a guy named Eric was watching him on his lunch break. Eric works everyday and watches porn every night he comes home. He has never attempted to talk to a girl on a non-platonic basis. Eric stares at Kyle in awe, thinking how fearless he is, and wishes that one day, he could talk to girls like that.

8 Signs She’s A Keeper

August 8, 2013 | by Christian McQueen | Link | Original Link

Despite my articles aimed around sluts and how to deal and pull them, I also am aware that there are some girls (a very small percentage) worth keeping around. I’m not saying marry a girl tomorrow, if she displays these qualities, but she may be worthy of girlfriend material and after at least 2 years of dating, a possible candidate for marriage. I understand that not all of you cats have the desire to fuck fresh sluts every weekend and are more of a one girl type of guy. If you’re that type of guy, then pour a fresh cup of coffee or chug a Red Bull and read closely.

Note: These are not in a particular order of importance. They are ALL important.

8. Good Family (But not too involved)

Point out a family and there's a good chance you can tell what type of daughter they have. You want trailer trash? Then date a trailer park family's daughter. You want a WASP, then vacation in the Hamptons and meet an All-American girl; however it's not about their economic background, it's about how solid the family is as a unit. This is a fact. If a girl grew up the result of divorced parents, then she will not be as apt to commit, nor to remain committed through thick and thin.

I would say it's better to date and marry equal to, or less than in terms of family money. If you're blue-collared and your wife is blue-blooded, then good luck constantly being compared to her relatives and being considered the outcast. Better to be the one with 'money' and looked up to, then the flipside. You don't want to be dependent on a chick's family money. Trust me.

Is the father the patriarch? Does the mom wear the pants? Study the dynamic and choose the girl with the family who's father reigns supreme, as it should be.

A family that is cohesive, supportive, but not too involved in the details of your relationship with their daughter is perfect.

7. Good Relationship With Her Dad

This is a given. Yes, I know, a girl can have a great relationship with her dad and be sucking every cock in sight while away from him, however odds are if the dad is street smart and has trained his daughter well, then she won't be a slut.

On the flipside, be careful about a girl who's too much of a 'Daddy's Girl' and who runs to him for every little issue. You'll constantly be compared to her dad and this is when you lay the law down and let her know you're not her dad and you won't tolerate being compared or disrespected.

The perfect blend is a girl who honors her dad, respects him and is obedient. Trust me, she will treat you the same.

6. She's Had Less Than 10 Cocks

If you want a girl with a Arby's Special for a labia then choose a girl who's had more cocks then Jenna Jameson. If you want a girl who has had some respect for herself and her future significant other, then choose a girl who's not very sexually experienced. Some of you may want a girl who know's how to suck the chrome off a pipe, well my friends, why don't you let her practice on you? Turn her into YOUR own personal porn star. Who wants a chick who's had multiple cum loads deposited into her pussy?

Science tells us now that a girl who's had 16 or more sexual partners has difficulty bonding with a partner, as well as their future children. I say 10 or less. Something happens when they hit the double digit numbers and it becomes easier for them to justify and rationalize it. Get a girl who's open sexually, but with you and isn't experienced. Thank me later.

5. She Has No Kids

Unless you're Mark Minter and you enjoy raising another man's sperm, then definitely do NOT date/marry a girl who has kids from a previous guy. You will regret this like hell, I'm warning you in all seriousness. If you were to get a divorce and you make more than her, then guess what buddy? You'll be paying child support for a fucking kid that's not even yours. Repeat after me: FUCK THAT SHIT. Life is too short to be cleaning up other people's mistakes.

Leave the cuckoldry to Mark Minter.

4. She’s Never Been Married

Damaged goods. Damaged goods. Damaged goods. You want her vision of marriage to be fresh, pure and untainted by Bubba Joe who she married in 2004 and they lasted 1 year until she found him bent over in the bathroom with a suction cup dildo fucking himself.

If you’re getting serious with her, don’t take her word for never having been married. Run her name in the marriage license nationwide database and make sure. It doesn’t make you a creep; it makes you fucking smart that you value your time, your money and your fucking future. Moving on…

3. She Follows You

Show me a successful relationship or a marriage and I’ll show you a couple where the Man is a Man and the Woman follows him. You do not want an ‘enlightened feminist’ cunt who will make your life hell and question every fucking action or decision of yours. You want a sweet, feminine, girl who WANTS to follow a strong man wherever that might be. She will be happier for it and it will make your job easier which is to lead.

Grab the helm Captain; lead your girl.

2. She’s Not Materialistic

Now I like a girl with fashion sense and who has a taste in fine things and the baller lifestyle, HOWEVER, there is a huge difference between a girl who wants you for you and a girl who wants you for your lifestyle and money. Find a girl who while she has CLASS, she’s not feigning for it, nor is it a dealbreaker if you don’t have money. The girl who takes the bus with you is the same girl who should be in your Bentley. If she scoffs at the bus, then what the fuck do you think she will do when all hell breaks loose in your life and you lose everything? (God forbid, but hypothetically)

I’ve been on both sides of the fence, on the bus and in a Bentley and back again over and over up and down and let me tell you, the girls who rode the bus were the quality girls. The ones who wanted in the Bentley were shallow gold digging cunts who were out once the Bentley was gone.

If her eyes light up about material shit and she won’t shut up about certain designer shit when she knows you can’t afford it, then dump her to the side. Or leave her at the next bus stop.

1. She’s A Ride or Die Bitch

This is the MOST important quality a girl can have. I’ve been at those moments in life where I didn’t know if I was getting out of handcuffs that night, but I did know that I could make one call to the RorD Girl and tell her to “get some cash from you know where and bail my ass out”.

There is no price tag on this quality. It can safe your life and that’s not a joke.

A girl that’s there for you when you’re sick, homeless (I’ve been there believe it or not), hungry and broke, is infucking valuable. Treat her right. She’s a keeper.

“Your Son Is A Fucking Faggot”

August 8, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

A few nights ago, Katie Vyktoriah started getting her son Dexter ready for a trip to Wal-Mart:

> After struggling to get him dressed and get his shoes on, I had to pry an overlarge teddy bear out of Dexter’s arms, as he was set on taking him with us. This brought on tears and tantrums, which I somehow managed to calm very quickly. But when I attempted to remove my discarded lace flower headband from his head (which he’d been wearing all day), I saw him getting ready to fight, so I left him to it…
> The fact that he was wearing a cute girly headband made him feel good, and he was charming all the old ladies by waving like a little pageant prince.

Dexter

Suddenly, a voice rings out:

> Out of nowhere a big booming voice rang out. “THAT’S a BOY?!” The man was overly large with a bushy beard and a camouflage shirt with the arms cut off. He had tattered shorts and lace-up work boots with no laces. I could smell the fug of cigarette smoke surrounding him, and there was a definite pong of beer on him.
> “Yes,” I said simply, still smiling.
> With no notice, the man stepped forward, grabbed the headband off of Dexter’s head and threw it to the bottom of our shopping cart. He then cuffed Dexter > around the side of his head (not hard, but that is not the point) and said with a big laugh, “You’ll thank me later, little man!”

> At the same time as I stepped forward, Dexter grabbed his head where the man had smacked him and threw his other hand forward, stomping his foot and shouting, “NO!” I got between my son and this man and said very firmly, “If you touch my son again, I will cut your damn hands off.”
> The guy snarled at me, looked at Dexter with disgust and said, “Your son is a f*cking fat.” He then started sauntering out, but not before he threw over his shoulder, “He’ll get shot for it one day.”

In a time when our sons are showered with praise for dressing like little girls, Walmart Man saunters onto the field of battle, defiant in tone, astir with conviction. He suffers no doubt as he walks the path of the righteous. His attire is plebeian, yet his virtue is regal. His actions recall the story of David; instead of one awesome enemy, however, his opponents are many and diffuse.

Artistic Rendering of Walmart Man

Vyktoriah (great stripper name by the way) is but one of millions of jezebels roaming the nation, unleashed from any masculine authority. She may have pledged her undying obedience to a man, but a master cannot obey his own slave. Her wedding vows are immaterial abstractions, when paired with the reality of a spineless husband. Like a mother who eats her own children, she arrays her son for sexual failure, for contempt in the eyes of his peers and his romantic prospects. At the meager age of two, indignity has befallen him already, as teenage girls stand by and laugh at him.

Vyktoriah has never known this failure on a regular basis. She has never known the sting of sexual rejection that any man of action faces daily. Living in America, she never had to be feminine to secure a lover.

Based on her own experience as a woman in America, she assumes the same is true for men – that her son need not be masculine to attract women. Girls strut about, their skin mired in tattoos, with profanities effortlessly rolling off their tongues. As monks would cut their hair short in their devotion to Christ or Buddha, the modern woman shaves her head in her devotion to pleasing only herself. Yet she has no shortage of suitors, who wait obediently at her beck and call.

Loading...

The same is true for men, she assumes – men need not do anything to attract the opposite sex. If even women, the oppressed sex, needn't aim to please to get what they want, then men should be even more free from sexual expectation. That he can prance about in dresses and suffer no pain for it, as girls do with their flip flops and pierced septums, is her fatal conceit. She cannot imagine that leaving her son free to embrace effeminacy will actually imprison him. From there, there is no easy escape. He is "destined to exist as a social outcast," just as Robert Oscar Lopez was, after being raised by two lesbians.

> I stood there, shaking, fists clenched, waiting for the man to disappear out the door, and then I fell apart. I was shaking so hard, holding back tears and comforting Dexter.
> Not a single person said or did anything. There were several people who had witnessed the encounter, but not one of them came over to offer support or console me or my son.

She stands, shaken and angry, that no white knight sallies forth to console her after her confrontation with Walmart Man.

Not long ago, I was sitting in a stranger's household, socializing with a group of young professionals and their families. I knew none of them. We were playing a board game, one notably bereft of aggression, and one which every nerd loves. I was alone in despising it, but I was a stranger in a strange land, with nothing better to do that evening. One player was the mother of a young boy – her, chubby, shapeless. She had only long hair to signify her status as a female. And her son was hopping about in furry hot pink slippers. Even strippers are not so gauche.

His mother remarked contentedly about his slippers, about how 'cute' they were as the women about cooed with approval. The males, fathers and colleagues, smiled wanly in approval. Inside, I was livid – "why does she delight in making her son look like a flaming little bitch?" In retrospect, I wish I'd said something, like "oh, he'd look right at home in the Castro in San Francisco." This instinct, to castrate and emasculate one's own sons is increasingly common among American mothers.

The head creative director of J. Crew did so, painting her son's toenails pink, in an ad campaign for her company. Later, Jenna Lyons would go on to divorce the father of her son, and marry a woman. Lyons' face is bereft of any softness or even humanity – frankly, she looks like a dead alien. Her lesbian paramour is not much of an improvement.

The response is always the same – "it looks so cuuuute on him!" Why do these mothers enjoy making their sons look like "faggots?" The old stereotype of Jewish mothers may apply – it's to keep them from leaving home and falling in love with a woman who isn't his mother.

There are those who would call Walmart Man a homophobe. Quite the opposite. Imagine seeing a delicious looking bowl of fruit, only to find out they were fake and made of wax. You'd feel cheated. This is precisely the fate which Walmart Man is trying to prevent – an effeminate male prancing around, coaxing faygeles into thinking he likes men when he doesn't. After all, everyone hates a cocktease. He doesn't want Dexter getting 'shot' after blue-balling a bear. Walmart Man has this little boy's best interests at heart, more than even Dexter's own mother.

Walmart Man has brought great honor upon himself his family. For his valor and courage, he has earned himself a hallowed position in our inaugural Hall Of Kings, an honorarium for men who fight for beauty, truth and justice.

Dictionary Of American Girlspeak, Volume II

August 9, 2013 | by Tuthmosis Sonofra | Link | Original Link

We pick up our lessons in the complex argot of the American woman where we left off last time.

Audrey Hepburn

1. Celebrated British actress whose iconic performances in a series of Hollywood film classics throughout the 1950s and 60s gained her international recognition and fame. 2. Girls' go-to example of a woman who could "pull off" pixie cut, despite the fact that she—like every other woman with a short haircut—looked ten times better with it long.

Best Friend

1. A meaningless title that, despite having the connotation of exclusivity by its use of the superlative, is given out to multiple people. 2. "Girl(s) with whom I'm currently spending the most time."

Busy

1. Occupied with something. 2. Cycling between her Facebook, Instagram, and online dating profile, while incessantly texting her best friends and guy friends in the interstices about the trivial matters in her ordinary life. 3. Meeting up with an alpha male who provides her with no-strings-attached sex, or staying home with her sex toys. 4. Not interested.

Cat

1. A small, domesticated member of the genus Felis. 2. A proxy for female maternal instinct that many girls begin acquiring in their mid-to-late 20s (and accumulating in subsequent decades) that serves a series of psychological functions: enabling her to rationalize her on-going single status; giving her living prop for Facebook pictures; granting her the satisfaction of caring for a living creature without any of the inconvenience of having to do any real work, since cats—apart from having to fill their bowls and clean their litter box—are essentially self-sustaining. 3. A virtually useless, intensely disloyal pet that barely recognizes you as part of its life.

Cupcake

1. A miniature cake, often decorated with sprinkles and frosting. 2. Another urban fad to which young-adult females—especially foodies—are especially susceptible, given its irresistible combination of being: popular with everyone else, overpriced, overhyped, and calorie-laden.

Loading...

Facebook

1. A popular social networking website that allows members to exchange messages and images with other members. 2. A woman's best friend, providing all of the ego-boosting benefits of 24/7 attention-whoring, without any of messy side-effects—actually having to leave the house, dealing with creepy guys, or having to occasionally put out. 3. A girl's rejection pile or waiting list, filled with guy friends, orbiters, and thirsty ego-caressers.

Foodie

1. A person with a knowledge of and taste for gourmet foods, especially from restaurants. 2. A backward rationalization for being anywhere from slightly overweight to obese. 3. Addicted to buttery and sugary foods without the modest self-restraint needed to eat them in moderation.

Model

1. An often physically attractive person employed to promote products, serve as a physical specimen for artists, or to display commercial objects—such as clothing or accessories—in advertisements and catalogs. 2. Having a friend with a nice camera willing to take photographs of you for little or no cost. 3. A woman with a basic account on the ModelMayhem website.

Sarcastic

1. A propensity for using clever and acerbic wit, dry humor, and matter-of-fact indifference to matters large and small. 2. A posture of being abrasive, bored, vulgar, and difficult-just-for-the-sake-of-being-difficult that girls adopt because they think it's a desirable or attractive personality trait, makes them funny, or is rare—despite the fact that every other girl is also copying the same popular television characters from whom their "unique" personality is being lifted (e.g., Liz Lemon).

Little Deaths: When Beta Males Turn Murderous

August 9, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Little Deaths is a horror film that is really 3 short flicks. The first one is a typical vampire short and the second one involves Nazis. The third one is a peculiar short simply called "Bitch." In thirty minutes, it shows a relationship between a beta, his domineering woman and its ultimate demise. It showcases the most horrific – and beta – act a man can commit: murdering his woman.

Overview Of The Movie

The movie features only two people of importance: Pete – a bartender – and Claire – a receptionist. The short opens up with her coming home and demanding that he make her a meal. He refuses and she tosses the food he was eating on the ground. She apologizes and says she will make it up to him – by going "to the room." When he suggests the bedroom, she refuses. Later on, we see what the room is. After a night at a bar, where Claire clearly has eyes for the leader singer of the band playing, she tells Pete he would be better off going home. He refuses, but relents eventually, because he knows she will do what she always does – cheat on him.

That night she does not come home and he is the "room." The room is a doghouse he sleeps in lieu of sleeping in the bedroom with her. They have relations that involve him placing on a dog mask and she pegs him -penetrating his ass with a strap-on. However, tensions are rising in the relationship with Pete becoming unsatisfied with it. One day at work, she comes in to his bar and she refuses to give him money, as she controls the purse-strings. He gets angry, gets in her face and tells her if she doe not give him the money he will smash her face till she bleeds to death. They go back home and for the first time they have actual heterosexual sex. However, Pete is a serious premature ejaculator and orgasms after a few seconds. She sighs – she grabs a dildo, with him lying next to her, and does herself. He pesters her and she ignores him. The camera slowly zooms in on him, as this is the beginning of the splitting for Pete.

The next day, we find out she has a deep fear of dogs and needs to be consoled after confronting one. Regardless, the climax is that night when a friend of Pete's friend comes over for a drink and Claire is shamelessly flirting with him in front of Pete. The friend responds positively to her flirtations and they decide to hook up – while in front of Pete. He mistakenly assumed it will be a devil's three-way; Claire intones Pete isn't part of this. Those two retire to the bedroom and Pete tosses on his dog mask and saunters in on all fours. He sees first hand his woman getting fucked – they way he could not. He runs back to his doghouse and starts to sob. In this moment, he splits completely.

He rents a local garage and begins to purchase dogs, feed and lots of beef. He goes back to the apartment and begins to ignore her outright. He marches into the room and begins to dismantle the doghouse. She comes in, apologetic and crying, begging for him not to. He tells her it is over – she responds that she still wants it.

He leaves the apartment for a number of days, training his dogs to eat the beef and meat.

He goes back to the apartment on the fateful day, wakes her up from her sleep with a glass of wine and a package. She opens it eagerly and it has a pair of handcuffs in it. She flirtatious looks at him and intones she is privy to being cuffed up and fucked. He cuffs her up right then and leaves. She is screaming at him to come back – and he does, but with his pack of dogs. He pours the beef and meat he has been training them to eat all over her writhing body. He leaves the room and unleashes the hounds into her room. Pete celebrates with a glass of wine as the dogs begin to tear into her flesh. The background music montage cuts out to her dying screams as the trained beasts render her limb from limb. Pete is shown to be crying in the final shot.

Understanding Psychological Splitting

Hypergamy rules in any society that has been through a sexual revolution – America is no different. The narcissism of America distorts the sexual marketplace in ways that are obvious in "Little Deaths." We have a clear codependent in Pete and a compensatory narcissist in Claire. Claire is not a clinical narcissist, just one that takes on the role when presented with a weaker-willed person. Here, Pete is a supremely weak beta male, one that Claire can drain while still simultaneously chase alpha males. Pete, however, has a few experiences in the movie that push him over the codependent cliff.

Understand this is psychological splitting. The definition of splitting is the inability of a person to reconcile both positive & negative traits of themselves or others into a complete, coherent whole. Classic splitting behavior is the vacillation between emotional extremes – for example, either you view yourself as completely moral & good or you view yourself as completely evil & bad. There is no middle ground. The worse the splitting is, the wider the chasm is between the states. This is hallmark behavior of a borderline personality disordered individual.

First, consider narcissistic splitting. Compensatory narcissists and codependents are still narcissists. Codependency is a form of narcissism that is called inverted narcissism. As such, they can split psychologically. The classic narcissist will always have intermittent episodes of “narcissistic depression” whereby they give into their supremely low self-esteem and engage in a period of superlative self-pitying. It will always be alleviated – usually by a codependent who will think this is moment they have been waiting for where they can finally act out a real, mutually compassionate relationship. Once the narcissist feels the worship, they shore up their flagging ego and revert back to standard narcissist operating procedure – completely devaluing of others.

This segues into codependent splitting. The key factor of codependency is having a deep ability to understand other’s emotions, but only insofar as it relates to perform particular emotional roles in other’s lives. This is narcissism, as codependents only see others as persons that they need to emotionally manipulate in order to get their approval. They sense the roles that a particular individual would like them to play out; they play them out in order to get approval & love. The key difference between the narcissism and codependency is how they view themselves: narcissists think the world of themselves, codependents think they are not worthy of the world.

Second, as such, codependents can split. Splitting occurs when deep-seated fears are faced, often forced by somebody else or some event. The delicate psychological balance of any sort of narcissist can be disrupted by anything that threatens something that is crucial to the maintenance of their identity. The maintenance of that identity is expressly to avoid dealing with their deepest fears. When directly confronted with their fears, splitting can occur. They can become unusually narcissistic in order to paper over their fears. They can also fall deep into depression. Depending on how deep the rabbit hole goes determines the outcome. If the ending of that rabbit hole is the very core of their being, it can get violent – either through suicide or killing others that represent the source of their existential terror.

Pete's Splitting in Little Deaths

In light of this, consider Pete and Claire in "Little Deaths." There are three key elements to understand in order to fully flesh out the relationship: the doghouse/pegging, Pete's premature ejaculation & the lead-up to and the killing of Claire.

Pete lives in a doghouse in a small room adjacent to Claire's bedroom. This highlights the fact he is the clear subordinate in the relationship. Not content with psychologically dominating him, she places him in geographical isolation in a structure meant to reinforce his inferiority. It is for both of them, as Claire needs psychological reassurance that Pete is her inferior, Pete needs Claire's approval he gets through complying with Claire's frame.

The pegging is a clear inversion of heterosexuality. Pete wears a dog's mask that reinforces his status as subhuman; Claire fucks him with ruthless abandon. Pete knows in order to get her approval, he has to let her fuck him in the ways the men Claire desires fuck her. It has an angry & bitter air to it, as Claire is upset she cannot get men she wants to commit to her. So, like many women, she locks down a beta male. However, she takes it to an extreme as she completely subjugates her beta, complete with forcible penetration.

Pete is presented with an opportunity when Claire's interested is piqued when Pete sacks up & confronts her. In response to his nascent masculinity, she entertains the notion of an actual sexual encounter with Pete. She flirts with him and they go to her bedroom with giddy anticipation. However, even when we only see Pete's backside, we see his burgeoning masculinity crumple once his cock tastes her vagina. His codependency takes over as it has never so much as sniffed this level of approval from Claire. He orgasms within seconds and his slumping shoulders signify a man defeated. Claire has a look of annoyed expectance, rolling over to use an object –a dildo – to pleasure herself. Pete notices this and recognizes that is all he has been to her – a tool, an object for her pleasure.

In the final act, after Pete splits when Claire openly fucks Pete's friend in front of him, Pete decides to blow the whole relationship up. In a moving scene, Pete returns to the apartment to dismantle the doghouse. Claire intervenes, claiming the relationship was for both of them – and she would be right. However, Pete has decided that instead of dealing with his personal issues related to masculinity, self-esteem and women, he will completely and utterly destroy the relationship which has brought him so much reassurance and grief.

In her begging, she mentions that she still enjoys the relationship very much. He thoughtfully responds, "Well that's the thing isn't it – it has always been about you." He leaves to finish training his dogs, only to return sometime later with an invitation for Claire. It is clear the roles of compensatory narcissist and codependent have flipped for the moment, as Claire accepts his offering of wine & handcuffs. Note, here, Pete is narcissistically wooing her for a change and she submits to his frame and dons the cuffs, completely at his mercy.

Here, he is subjecting her to a physical manifestation of their relationship. In the relationship, he was subject completely to her frame and whims. He had no recourse as he needed her as much as she needed him. Narcissists know their codependents fears and use them mercilessly against them. Pete knew Claire's ultimate fear of dogs and used it against her in the worst way possible. He exposed her genitals and ass to that fear as he pointedly removed her panties before ushering in the beasts.

Which reveals his deepest fear – sexual inadequacy. By allowing Claire to peg him, he is releaved of any need to perform sexually beyond allowing her access to his ass. When he has a chance to change and face that fear down, he fails miserably and is confronted head-on with his sexual issues. When Claire flips on the dildo he must have been feeling supreme levels of inadequacy as he realizes a plastic object is more satisfying than a human being. When he cuts off her panties in order to expose them to her greatest fear, he reveals that his sexuality is his greatest fear. He wants to expose her like he has been exposed by her in his life.

When feminists, like Hugo Schywzer, talk about men needing to get pegged to be better men, what really is being suggested is a sort of Faustian bargain. It is trying to cover up your male sexual deficiencies by allowing a female to act out her anguish over not being able to control the men she is attracted to. The bargain is: "Let me fuck you in the way the men I want fuck me and I will stay with you. You will never have to deal with your sexual inadequacy issues and I will never have to deal with my abandonment issues."

Both postures are biologically untenable and are psychologically unhealthy. However, so long as each person plays their role, it will exist into perpetuity. When one splits, like Pete, is it anybody's guess as to what will happen in the aftermath. Biologically, he is grasping at his male identity of autonomy over his life, but he tragically outsources said autonomy in a murderous way. Psychologically, he is destroying the embodiment of his woes – Claire. When he is tearing up at the end, part of that is his recognition that he must now face down what has really been bothering him – his relationship with himself.

I must end with a lament. Men like Pete are ubiquitous in modern society. Their lives are marked by self-absorbed desperation that is reflected through their insatiable need for female approval. They were gifted that complex through a society that prioritizes female parenting and teaching. Many men are born to single mothers who are shepherded through a thoroughly female-dominated school system. These men only learn to kowtow to a female's frame and suborn themselves to female emotions.

The lament here isn't for the debasement of civilization that will surely follow such an arrangement, but for the individual men hurt and deceived.

Sometimes, society is progressing and recognizing issues that all men face. However, that progress is usually dashed on the coast of female privilege, as the media at large will always privilege female interests – it gets distorted as male privilege as alphas males get adoring audiences from female viewers.

Society isn't progressing. It isn't necessarily regressing, but stuck in the mud where betas like Pete get tore up in the hamster wheel spinning. Unable to capture the alphas they desire, women spin their wheels in the mud, using & pushing beta males like Pete further into irrelevancy. Most of the time they accept their inferiority – sometimes they violently crack like Pete.

We don't live in a society that encourages real personal growth. Men like Pete mostly just fall through the cracks; occasionally striking back, like Pete, but most succumb to the feminine frame of subservience.

Murder is absolutely wrong, but what choice do you have when you are nothing but an object in a person's life?

Everyone Dies By Their Own Idea

Mark Ames, of Exile fame, recently wrote about Edward Snowden on NSFW Corp (unfortunately locked up behind a pay wall). He relays a story of getting caught up in the trial of a Russian political agitator Eduard Limonov. While debating whether he should testify in the agitator's defense, he gets advice from a friend, who says the following:

> My father always told me something that I've only recently started to understand, and I'm going to tell it to you now: Everyone dies by their idea. Do you understand what I mean, mate? We all die by our own idea. You know my father—he was a member of the Academy of Sciences, he's a physicist, a great physicist, and for the Soviet times, in the 1970s, to be a physicist in the Academy of Sciences was really the top of everything. But he got into a fight with a powerful clan, on principles, politics—I won't get into that now, but my father did not back down. And he paid for it. He was kicked out. He lost his privileges. He lost everything. And he told me, many times now, 'Everyone dies by their own idea.' So you have to ask yourself what is your idea you'll die by.

> "Limonov—we know his idea. For some reason, mate, you like this guy. I don't like Limonov myself, I can't stand that motherfucker. But at least I know this about Limonov—that he's living and he's probably going to die by his idea. No one thinks he'll ever get out of jail alive. I think he's a motherfucker for taking other people down with him, but some people are weak, and those people die by someone else's idea. You see what I"m saying, mate? I'm not going to give you any advice or tell you what to do anymore. You like trouble, you like that kind of journalism. I don't get the point of it. You know what I think about your shitty newspaper, mate, and all fucking journalists for that matter. But you're my friend, and I try to help my friends. I don't like losing my friends. Now, about this Limonov trial. What his lawyers are trying to do to you, is fuck you to save their client—is this your idea, mate? Just think about what you believe in before you do something stupid or weak.

Powerful words. I wonder what is worse—having an idea that will lead to your demise, or not having one at all.

One College’s Bizarre Approach To Sexual Assault

August 11, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

Antioch College is a small, liberal arts college in rural Ohio. It was shut down in 2008 because of funding issues, but recently reopened and has received many applications – although the enrollment in October 2012 was only 75 students with many students declining acceptance. Apparently, many students turned down the chance to attend an “elite” school to help rebuild the decayed institution.

Antioch College was founded in the middle of the 1800’s and was a bastion of progressive politics from its inception – it was one of the first schools to accept applications from black people. Its stature grew over time, and had its heyday in the 1960’s and 1970’s. It was a center for the anti-war movement, anti-racism and feminism. The school was committed to democracy and community governance – which includes students. Students play a real, active role in the governance of the campus and the development of school policy. Further, the students do not receive grades, but detailed breakdowns, over several paragraphs, of their professor’s opinions of the student’s performance. Part of this is to break down the hierarchy between professors and students in order to foster more equal relations.

The school began to decay in the 1980’s and 1990’s and really tailed off in the 2000’s – and was not helped by it’s absurd sexual assault policy articulated in the 90’s.

What makes the college of interest isn’t their cartoonish commitment to liberalism, but their real and absurd sexual consent policy. In 1990-1991 term, a couple of date rapes were reported to the school. Remember this – two date rapes that were never substantiated were used as the impetus for producing this policy. A group called “Womyn of Antioch” began to rumble about how the school did not take sexual assault seriously enough and some women actually stated the school actually wanted to encourage sexual assault of women – sound familiar? That spurred the group to produce a new university code applying to sexual assault. It was not formalized at the time, but it was the next year.

The code developed a new standard for deciding whether a woman consented to a sex act or sexual contact – “the act of willingly and verbally agreeing to engage in specific sexual contact or conduct.” Also, the school stated a position that sexual assault isn’t just a violation of an individual, but a violation of the community. Yes, they collectivized sexual assault – it isn’t just one woman’s problem, but every man and woman’s problem. The piece was gender-neutral, but feminist writing on the policy quickly reassured distraught equalists that it really is about women. Feminists further argued even when the policy’s approach recognizes a male victim, the policy is still based solely out of helping women – men are just incidentally helped as victims. The real purpose was to cure the campus of male privilege by forcing men to divest themselves of rape culture that is part and parcel of hooking up on campus.

The policy was modified, refined and codified in 1996. In the time before that, the policy attracted a media circus, which mostly mocked the approach. Some commentators, such as the insufferable Ellen Goodman, endorsed the approach in the national press. The attention was not welcome for the university, as they see themselves as morally superior to rest of the knuckle-draggers that inhabit America. Antioch College saw the criticism as misogynistic, rape-supporting and reeked of people who refused to understand Antioch College’s superior wisdom and morality that rids the world of ~~sexuality~~ sexual assault.

There are two very striking aspects of the policy, both relating to consent and what it means. First, is the need for verbal approval. The policy explicitly states that silence is not consent nor is body language – unless a person explicitly states he or she consents, then it is not consent. The aforementioned Ellen Goodman mentions that in movies women can consent with eye contact and body language, but this school takes the “better” approach of requiring verbal consent.

Loading…

The reality is that people who support this policy are narcissistic losers who only know how to interact with other humans in their head – i.e. they don’t how to deal with others in real life. They don’t know how to interpret body language, most assuredly in the sexual arena. To them, two people meeting and engaging in the timeless dance of seduction and sex is absolutely foreign to them. In their world, the only way people have sex is through an escalation of verbal agreements. This robotic approach to natural human relations is very narcissistic, as it is completely represses feelings of lust and desire.

Further, consider the escalation doctrine. In order to meet the consent standard, you must ask and receive verbal approval for any escalation of sexual activity. For example, let’s say you go to the bedroom with an Antioch female and you have verbally escalated to making out. Before touching her boobs, you have to ask for consent. So, you have to stop kissing and ask if you can touch her boob. Then, if you want to lick her boobs, you have to ask for that. If you want to do anything beyond that hasn’t already been verbally agreed to, you have to ask. Can you imagine doing this drunk – can you remember all the shit you asked for? It is an incredibly fumbling way to approach sex. If you take some woman to the bedroom, is making out with you – body on body – she knows damn well where she wants this go. She wants to have sex. You know damn well what you want. You want to have sex.

What if you forget you only asked to fondle her left boob and not her right? Touch her right boob and now, under this administrative standard, you are now a man who has committed sexual assault. You would have been administratively deemed to have committed the same act if you broke into her dorm and room and forcibly raped her. Always beware of Orwellian designations that group vastly different behaviors under one umbrella term.

This policy is just moral puritanism taking the form of feminist sexual policy. It has the stab of something we would have gotten from some Cotton Mather type of person. This sort of policy does nothing to stop sexual assault and penalizes a whole raft of behavior that really is just misunderstanding or, usually, nothing at all. All it does it create a chilling effect on the expression of sexuality – which is the real impetus for this policy.

Criminal law in the United States is more than adequate to deal with sexual assault. Further, there are Constitutional safeguards that the accused get that they do not at the collegiate level. In civilized republics, we should place a higher value on protecting the accused rather than over-zealously hunt for offenders. This Antioch approach not only is frightfully skewed in favor of women and the accuser, but also relies on administrative law which has fewer Constitutional safeguards than criminal law.

The true fire for this policy is to put an administrative chill on the expression of sexuality. You can use your religion, you can use morality in general or you can use fear of sexual assault – at the end of the day, it is based out of the need to drown out anti-social thoughts in the heads of the puritans. The supporters of Antioch College's policy approach are, essentially, closeted freaks. They tamp down, drown out and do their best to ignore all their deviant sexual thoughts and need to oppress other's expression of their sexuality in order ease their puritanical anguish.

In general, the administrative framework developed to deal with sexual assault cases by universities is woefully lacking – especially after Obama lowered the evidentiary standard for administrative proceedings dealing with sexual assault accusations. The twin vector's of Antioch's approach and the Obama standard create a dangerously puritanical atmosphere on Antioch's campus that is aimed at burying human sexuality in America's narcissistic closet as deep as it can. Nothing sounds so good to narcissistic puritans as the complete disavowal of sexuality and the anxiety that stems from expressing that sexuality.

Should A Wise Man Get Married?

August 12, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

In the late 1450s, the Italian humanist Bartolomeo Scala wrote a long letter of advice to Piero de Medici, son of the great Cosimo de Medici. Cosimo had been the unofficial ruler of Florence for thirty years, and was known for his generosity, learning, and patronage of the arts. Scala's letter was written in the form of an essay entitled Whether a Wise Man Should Marry. It is unique in its sincerity, humor, and frank treatment of its subject matter. In good classical rhetorical style, the essay first lists the reasons why a wise man should not marry. It then presents counter-arguments as to why he should marry.

Arguments Against Marriage

For Scala, a "wise man" is he who "diligently pursues peace of mind and tranquility." Such a man will pursue actions that tend to increase his peace and tranquility, since any other course would by definition be against his interests. Since wives, according to the philosopher Epicurus, are "on the borderline between good and bad," the wise man would avoid marriage as an unacceptable risk. That being married was "on the borderline" between good and bad was something Scala considered self-evident, and not requiring any proof to a sexually experienced man.

However, says Scala, wives are certainly not all bad. Epicurus–in his view–was wrong. In fact, history is filled with examples of noble, brave, and virtuous women, and Scala warmly gives many vivid examples. He then cites the Greek philosopher Theophrastus, who laid down the rule that a wise man should marry only if four requirements are met:

1. The woman should be beautiful.

2. She should be of good character.
3. She should come from a good family.
4. The man should be in excellent health.

Theophrastus (says Scala) believed that since it is rare for all these conditions to be met, the wise man should only rarely marry. Beauty will always fade with age, Scala argues; every wise man who marries a beautiful woman will eventually find himself with an ugly one. Regarding a woman's character, it is always difficult to know it with certainty. Most women are adept at concealing their faults behind a façade of sweetness. Scala amusingly notes how odd it is that some men will marry a woman without seeing anything of her body or knowing her character, yet will spend a great deal of time researching the acquisition of lesser things, like a horse, farm, or a business.

Even the oft-cited reason for marriage, the procreation of children, is a delusion, says Scala. To the wise man, offspring mean very little. Mothers-in-law will always be a torment. The consolation of carrying on one's name after death is a false pleasure. The idea that a wise man's children will comfort him in his old age is also a trap: for children usually bring us more heartache than pleasure. Although we hope for comfort in old age, we can expect an equal possibility of abandonment or misery, as our children are just as likely to rejoice in our death as to grieve over it.

Engraved portrait of Bartolomeo Scala, around 1460.

But what about love? Is this not a valid reason to marry? Nothing could be farther from the truth, argues Scala. Love is an emotional disturbance, he says, more akin to insanity. Quoting Seneca, he adds that love "is a close neighbor to madness." More often than not, love "breaks the highest and most generous spirits." Marriage cannot save us from solitude, says Scala. Marriage should never be undertaken to relieve loneliness, for "the wise man is never less alone than when he is alone". A man should never think of himself as alone without a wife, "because even solitude is better than evil company." Never make a decision for marriage based on fear.

Arguments For Marriage

What sort of "wisdom", asks Scala, would make us retreat from the world in such a cowardly way as to avoid the risks and hazards of Nature? Is not a refusal to marry a blasphemy against life itself? If we are to take Nature as a guide to living, and family life is an imperative of Nature, then anyone to fights against Nature is by definition unwise, counter-argues Scala. Even the gentlest of animals is roused to ferocity in protecting its offspring. Is not having offspring a fundamental purpose of man? The continuation of life should be the concern of anyone who wishes to be called wise.

Furthermore, says Scala, Epicurus's timid admonition to stay away from the risks of marriage seems more like unmanly fear than true wisdom. It seems more like a flight from life itself, and this type of fleeing is unbecoming to a wise man. A wise man needs calculated risks as a way of testing his fortitude and forcing him to improve. Love and marriage have inspired some of the noblest art, poetry, passion, and sentiment in history. History abounds with examples of noble, selfless, and virtuous women. Union with such a woman does not detract from the philosophic life, but actually enhances it. The right woman is no impediment to the scholar's life or to philosophic thought.

Loading...

Critique and Final Thoughts

Though society has changed much since his day, Scala says much of value. He may be forgiven for equating reproduction with marriage, since in his day marriages were normally arranged between families and not done for romantic love. He underestimated the importance of law and tradition in keeping marriage a worthwhile institution for men. He would undoubtedly be shocked to see the present state of the domestic law in the United States, which saddles the man with all the responsibilities of marriage, yet grants him none of the authority that existed in his day.

In short, marriage is much more risky today for men than it was in Scala's era. In the 1450s, there were no child support orders backed by threats of imprisonment, no alimony payments, no domestic violence court, no restraining orders, and no police official willing to indulge the lies or fantasies of a jilted female. Existing institutions supported and cultivated the masculine ethic; men were valued and respected. This stands in sharp contrast to our own day, where societal institutions denigrate and punish healthy masculinity.

A man in Scala's day could count on firm institutional backing from the Church, government, family and clan structures, and other existing social systems. There existed fraternal male-only trade guilds, military orders, religious fraternities, and associations of scholars (like the Academia Platonica in Florence). The man of today has no such support systems. Traditional bastions of masculine virtue in the West have been eviscerated or dismantled.

Even the military, for so long the final holdout against feminist inroads, is in the process of being reshaped into a gender-blind (i.e., female dominated) institution. In this brave new world, the wise man is truly on is own. He must be stronger, wiser, and more astute than ever before.

In my own opinion, marriage is sensible only if either one of the following scenarios apply:

1. Marry only if you want to have children and raise a family at that time. It should be your decision, not your girlfriend's decision. It is irrelevant what her opinion is. This is not a decision that should be made in consultation with her. Since you will be the one paying for everything, you alone should ask yourself: do I want children? It should be a yes or no answer. If you are unsure, the answer is no. You must be prepared for a financial commitment that will last decades.

2. Marriages for companionship should be undertaken only when you have known her for at least several years, and have investigated all aspects of her character. A written prenuptial agreement should be arranged. All legal aspects of what you are doing should be clear to you. Nothing will protect you completely, of course, but at least you can have some firewalls in place to put her on notice that you are aware of your rights. Nothing in life is risk free. There are no guarantees of anything in life. At some point, one must do the best one can and trust to Fate.

With either one of these scenarios, certain other baseline conditions must be met. You probably should be at least 35 or older; a man needs a degree of real-world seasoning before he approaches his optimal maturity level. You should sincerely and truly be in love, and I mean the kind of love that would give teeth to the "till death do us part" phrase. You should have enough experience to know the warning signs of women to be wary of.

Some examples of these are: excessive lateness, antisocial tendencies (e.g., petty crime, drug use, or gambling), any hint of disdain for traditional feminine roles (e.g., cooking, cleaning, child-rearing), excessive criticism of you in any way, carelessness with money, and over-focus on career. This list is not exhaustive. Any flaw a woman has becomes magnified over time. A small problem now will become a big one later. You must test her and carefully observe her behavior when evaluating her character. Do not rationalize, excuse, or sugar-coat bad behavior. You must be utterly ruthless and clear-headed when evaluating her character.

But if we learn nothing else from Bartolomeo Scala's advice, I hope the reader will remember the following timeless counsel: "Let [the wise man] not consider himself to be alone without a wife. For, as we are warned by an indisputable maxim, even solitude is better than evil company."

Even solitude is better than evil company. Indeed. It is advice that has far too often gone unheeded.

How American Football Became A Racket

August 12, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

The game of American football has played a large role in my life. It shaped most of my youth, the effort I exerted to remain competitive in it having governed the way I ate, the way I behaved, and, to some extent, even the way I studied. The game gave me quite a bit, and I'm thankful for it.

Having been away from it for a couple of years now, however, I've come to adopt a more critical view of the game. American Football is one of the most difficult and exploitative games you can play. Almost no sport asks more of you and gives you less in return.

The recent case of Johnny "Football" Manziel has highlighted this reality for me.

For those unaware of his identity, Johnny Manziel (nickname "Johnny Football") is a quarterback who plays for Texas A&M University. He has only played for one full season, but it was a good one. He broke a number of records and became the first freshman ever to win the Heisman Trophy, college football's most coveted award. At the age of 20 he is arguably college football's biggest star right now, and is certainly one of the most recognizable athletes across the country.

Now, Manziel has created his share of controversy. His persona comes across as that of the cocky alpha-male athlete. He’s good at what he does and he also comes from an affluent family. He has regularly sparred with twitter followers critical of his celebrity and he has not been afraid to share his more controversial opinions.

He was arrested in 2012 for disorderly conduct.

He's been known to crash frat parties at rival schools and has been thrown out unceremoniously:

And he’s been caught with a bong:

None of these incidents, however, carry the potential to do him in quite like this one:

> The NCAA is investigating whether Heisman Trophy winner Johnny Manziel was paid for signing hundreds of autographs on photos and sports memorabilia in January, "Outside the Lines" has learned. Two sources tell "Outside the Lines" that the Texas A&M quarterback agreed to sign memorabilia in exchange for a five-figure flat fee during his trip to Miami for the Discover BCS National Championship. Both sources said they witnessed the signing, though neither saw the actual exchange of money.
> If the NCAA investigation finds that Manziel has violated NCAA Bylaw 12.5.2.1 — accepting money for promoting or advertising the commercial sale of a product or service — he could be ruled ineligible.

Here is where the exploitative nature of American football's college game becomes quite evident.
Johnny Manziel is under threat of suspension now for allegedly profiting from his notoriety and image. The odd thing, however, is that the NCAA and his own university have profited extensively from his notoriety and image.

How much profit, you ask? Try $37 million as far as Texas A&M University is concerned:

Loading…

> If it's true that athletics is the window to the world from which a university is seen, Texas A&M University is providing a great view.
> The university recently retained the services of a renowned sports and sponsorship evaluation company to measure the media exposure generated by the football team's historic finish and quarterback Johnny Manziel winning the > 2012 Heisman Trophy. Research conducted by Joyce Julius & Associates shows that the redshirt freshman winning the prestigious trophy produced more than 1.8 million media impressions, which translates into $37 million in media exposure for Texas A&M.

> Media impressions, the company officials explain, include news mentions from print, television and internet sources. The figures do not reflect increases from merchandise sales, ticket requests or donations to the school, all of which historically have risen dramatically at schools that have produced a Heisman Trophy winner. The Collegiate Licensing Company has calculated a five-year average growth in sales and royalties of 27.5 percent based on the past five Heisman winners.

Johnny Football is making a lot of money for a lot of people. His university is raking in the cash. The NCAA is raking in the cash. Networks that broadcast the games he plays in (which draw viewers in large part because of him) are raking in the cash. Manufacturers and retailers of Manziel merchandise are raking in the cash. Advertisers are raking in the cash.

In short: Johnny Football's ability is making a lot of people rich, and he's bringing that money in the hard way.

American Football is the most dangerous major team sport out there. American football players at the professional level have shorter careers, lower earnings and higher rates of violent injury than those in any other major team sport. Unlike other sports where one can go pro as a teen, American Football players are forced into three years of competition at the "amateur" collegiate level, where violent injury is more common than in any other NCAA sport:

> In 1982, the NCAA began collecting standardized injury and exposure data for collegiate sports through its Injury Surveillance System (ISS). This special issue reviews 182 000 injuries and slightly more than 1 million exposure records captured over a 16-year time period (1988–1989 through 2003–2004). Game and practice injuries that required medical attention and resulted in at least 1 day of time loss were included. An exposure was defined as 1 athlete participating in 1 practice or game and is expressed as an athlete-exposure (A-E).
> …Football had the highest injury rates for both practices (9.6 injuries per 1000 A-Es) and games (35.9 injuries per 1000 A-Es)

From regular head injuries/concussions to busted knees, annihilated shoulders and everything in between, college football demands a very high price from those who seek to compete. Any player like Johnny Manziel, who sees the field extensively and is exposed to violent collisions on a regular basis, is putting a lot on the line.

Given the risk he’s taking and the money he’s making for everyone else while doing it, you’d figure that he could perhaps earn a little money for his troubles. You’d think wrong.

The light that shines on many college football stars often blinds us to the true nature of their reality. Yes, they get full scholarships. Yes, their facilities are often quite nice. Yes, they get a lot of notoriety and plenty of female attention. But at the end of the day, they’re not coming out on top. At the end of the day, even the greatest college football star is nothing more than a pack mule designed to be ridden into the ground for profit.

He will make far more for the NCAA, his school and other interested parties than he will ever see in scholarship aid or in the equipment gifted to him, he will take a very significant risk to his own wellbeing (involving plenty of violent injury and a lot of pain) in order to generate that cash and he will not be allowed to benefit himself. If he's lucky, he'll manage to make it to the NFL where he will in all likelihood have a very short career in which he won't make nearly enough to cover the many health issues that decades spent playing football at a high level will create for him. He will then be rewarded for his excellence (having made it to the NFL) with an early grave:

> Of all the football statistics you'll read in your time on Earth, none will be as shocking as this one: According to a 2006 report in the St. Petersburg Times, for every season a player spends on an NFL roster, his life expectancy decreases by almost three years.
> Read that again.
> The average American male lives to be almost 75. According to the Times report, an NFL player, whose career lasts roughly four years on average, lives to be 55. The more years a player spends in the NFL, the more games and practices he survives, the quicker he dies.

Johnny Football, for all of the celebrity now surrounding him and the despite all of the accolades he's received, is just another pack mule. He broke the rules by attempting to do what everyone else was doing: make money off of his notoriety, image and ability. That isn't an American football player's place. His mission is to make money for everyone else, regardless of the physical cost of doing so. That's the reality.

The NCAA and its supporters should quit sugarcoating the one-sided nature of this system and this game with bullshit about “student athletes,” “amateurism,” and “passion for the game,” and simply call it as it is.

The Western Male Is The Reason Why His Women Suck

August 13, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Although us Kings criticize the modern Western woman, we only do so because it is the modern Western man who is to blame for our broken state of gendered affairs. Men are naturally the stronger and superior sex, so it follows that women can only do what men grant them. I do not write to convince women to change their ways, but instead to educate the minds of men. The more I study Western culture, the more I realize how well-trained and obediently my fellow Western "males" (as undeserving of this title as they may be) give their power to the opposite sex.

When men relinquish their power over women, women will always take advantage of them. And after all, why shouldn't they? Women merely take advantage of what is offered to them. If some man was sacrificing his life for your benefit, wouldn't you accept his patronage?

Often times it is difficult for the average Western males understand how much of a weak, amorphous, and utterly subservient coward he is, but, thanks to the 2013 Askmen dating survey, denial is no longer an option for the Western beta. Since this survey mostly pertains to young men, and Askmen's audience is millions strong, I find it to be a good indicator of what the future will bring.

Also, as a technical note, the survey only polled Anglo countries, but given the influence of Anglo countries I believe it is safe to assume all Western countries suffer from the same problems with their men.

The survey opens with questions about marriage. Nearly three-fourths of men believe in marriage and just as many believe there is little to no reason for a pre-nup.

Q2 DO YOU BELIEVE IN THE INSTITUTION OF MARRIAGE?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
72%	Yes, I believe it is a necessary institution and one in which I will participate.	76%	70%	65%	75%
17%	Yes, I believe in it as an institution, but it is not for me.	16%	17%	21%	13%
11%	No, I do not believe in it.	8%	13%	14%	12%

Q4 HOW IMPORTANT IS IT TO YOU THAT YOUR WIFE/FUTURE WIFE SIGN A PRENUP?
ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
34%	Not very important	33%	34%	34%	36%
34%	Not at all important	32%	30%	39%	34%
24%	Somewhat important	25%	25%	21%	23%
8%	Very important	10%	11%	6%	7%

In other words:

At first I thought that Q2 was worded poorly; there was no option that said, “I would accept marriage if it wasn’t rigged,” but when I read Q4 I realized if that option had existed few would have chosen it. I cannot understand anyone who would get married without a pre-nup, let alone get married, since you forfeit so many of your basic rights when you do so.

Indeed, most men do not know that pre-nups are still a bad deal, as judges will usually side with the female. If the man was rich and makes a poor woman sign the pre-nup, magically the judges will determine that the pre-nup was invalid. Even if she was cheating on you. (<—- You won’t believe this link until you click on it.)

If you have children, the wife also gets them unless you can prove she is a criminal or drug addict. If the husband is the breadwinner, the wife gets the children because the husband is not “the primary caretaker.” But if the husband is the stay-at-home dad, the judge will rule in favor of the woman because she has greater “capacity and disposition” to provide for her children.

Finally, I know some male feminist will read this article and think, “NO WAY! Primary caretakers always have the advantage in court. That one case you dug up is the exception.” A King’s response: “Wrong again, noob.” When a wife starts a divorce proceeding the police have strict orders to kick the husband out of the house, thus leaving the children in the hands of the mother. If the wife is the primary breadwinner, she will be able to shut off any cash to her estranged husband and prevent him from acquiring a good attorney. He will probably be unable to even afford a place to live. Then she will drag out the divorce proceedings for as long as possible, for as many years as she can, so when the judge finally rules on the case he will see that the children have been living with his mother for the past several years and thereby rule the mother as the primary caretaker.

Take a look at this man's all too common story:

> i just dont want to lose my son, and from what she said her attorney said that i will lose primary custody to her, and i cant let that happen. but right now the "status quo" is staying with her since she stole him from me, and by the time we get into the court he will have been with her for a long time.

The online attorney responds,

> OK, that is not good. Is there a reason you haven't yet hired a lawyer to file a motion for emergent custody, if it is still NEW that he is with her. What you are kind of saying now is that one upon a time, you were the primary, but now she is.

The reason he hasn't hired a lawyer? Wow, isn't it obvious?

> i really wish you were my attorney. I unfortunately cant afford one at this time.

No matter what a man does in a Western marriage, he loses. And yet men are clamoring to get to the altar more than women are, despite how far the odds are stacked against them.

The western man never thinks with his self-interest first, even if women are doing so all the time.

Q5 IF THERE WERE NO CHANCE OF YOUR PARTNER FINDING OUT, HOW LIKELY WOULD YOU BE TO CHEAT?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
41%	Not at all likely. I might be tempted, but cheating violates my morals.	40%	42%	41%	40%
33%	Not very likely. I might be tempted, but I love and respect her too much	32%	32%	33%	33%
18%	Somewhat likely. But I would feel guilty, nonetheless.	19%	18%	18%	18%
5%	Very likely. She can't be hurt if she doesn't know about it.	5%	5%	5%	5%
3%	I already cheat on her.	4%	3%	3%	4%

So concerned with the welfare of his woman, the modern man forgets about his own. He is pure like a monk, except for the fact that he is dating a bunch of devils. "Lots of people talk and few of them know, soul of a woman was created below."

The correct answer is "Very likely." Why? Because if you are the kind of man who would cheat if he could get away with it, it means she'll work harder to keep you happy and fend off possible competition. By being the kind of man who would cheat, you are less likely to be cheated on or dumped. But most guys cannot understand this because they are unable to think like a woman, and for that they must suffer.

Women must be reminded that they are replaceable and expendable in order to keep them on their best behavior. That said, make sure you never tell your woman that you cheated on her. That would be insensitive and cruel.

> The way to keep a good relationship going is for the man to fool around when he gets the urge and to keep shtum afterward. Never admit and you will make the wife happy. Forget what she says. It's what you say that counts. And say nothing.

If she asks if you've had other women, look into her eyes and say, "You don't want to know," and leave it at that. Even if you haven't cheated on her. Because in truth, she doesn't want to know. If you have cheated, it will hurt her, and if you haven't, she'll wonder if you're still the same stud she originally fell for. Say nothing, and cheat when you need to.

The same principle applies to Q18:

Q18 WOULD YOU SHARE RACY PICS THAT YOU RECEIVED WITH FRIENDS?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
83%	No, they are for my eyes only.	83%	84%	85%	81%
17%	Yes, why not?	17%	16%	15%	19%

I wouldn't be surprised at all to find out that the 17% of men who are willing to share pics get more sex and female attention than the 83% of men, combined, who would refuse to share pics.

Look at the wording of the question – it is not, "Would you share racy pics that you received over the internet," nor is it "Would you share racy pics that you received with anonymous strangers," but "friends." Any man who places more worth on some random chick he dates over genuine friends is extremely likely to be one massively weak beta. The other possibility is that men who voted no simply do not have good friends they can trust, in which case they do not understand that if you cannot trust someone they are not your friend.

No surprise that Britain gets the lowest score on Q18.

Q8 WOULD YOU DUMP A GIRLFRIEND IF SHE GAINED A SIGNIFICANT AMOUNT OF WEIGHT?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
51%	No	50%	48%	51%	53%
49%	Yes	50%	52%	49%	47%

Q8 is particularly pathetic; there really are no excuses for why 51% of men should date a fatass. Again, look at the wording of the question. It's not "Would you dump a wife," but "girlfriend." The question presumes the man is not tied to her in any significant way.

Hello dumb fucking betas – what do you think will happen if you stay with her? Is she going to get skinnier? Will you need a Viagra prescription in the future? Nearly every major world religion frowns upon gluttony. There is no excuse for fatties, or fatty fuckers. I can forgive a man who bangs a fatty, but I cannot forgive a man who seriously dates one. If you know any such men, dear readers, then the Kings here ask you to disassociate yourself from them for the good of all mankind.

Loading...

Part of the reason for the Western obesity epidemic is that most Western food is disgusting and unhealthy, but the other unmentioned side of the story is that nearly half of the male population is so hard up for sex and companionship that they will date fat chicks like Lindy West.

The fact is, Western men will take anything.

Q44 AT WHAT AGE DO WOMEN START LOSING THEIR LOOKS?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
35%	40	35%	36%	32%	35%
22%	50	23%	21%	23%	21%
21%	Never	18%	22%	26%	17%
15%	30	14%	14%	10%	20%
8%	60	9%	7%	9%	6%
0%	20	1%	--	--	1%

Only 15% of men believe a woman starts to lose her looks at 30. It's one thing to be a desperate man who will wife up a single mom, but to sincerely doublethink yourself into believing women do not start losing her looks until 40, 50, 60, or "never" (!) takes some serious mental gymnastics I did not even know man was capable of.

If you've ever wondered why so few Western men swallow the red pill, just remember it's because they are secretly fantasizing about their size 9 coworkers that they get to talk to for 20 minutes at lunch break.

Still, there may faint signs of hope:

Q10 WHAT'S YOUR PREFERRED ROUTE TO APPROACHING A WOMAN YOU WANT TO SLEEP WITH?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
48%	Walk up to her directly, in real life.	52%	48%	46%	44%
41%	Through an introduction by a mutual friend.	38%	39%	41%	45%
7%	Online.	6%	8%	7%	7%
4%	In a pack of guys, approaching a pack of girls	4%	5%	6%	4%

At the very least, nearly half of men today understand that having the balls to approach a woman you are interested in is the correct move. This question is proof that game techniques have some sort of recognition amongst the general populace. Not only does approaching first retain your power of choice as the one who starts a relationship, but 90% of women love a man with balls. To a woman, a smooth approach is more exciting than buying a new pair of shoes.

However, when we tally up the other choices we see that the majority of men have no balls, with a shocking 41% asking for an introduction by a mutual friend. I cannot imagine a more emasculating life than having to rely on friends, or internet dating, in order to get laid. Shame on you, Australia.

Q19 HOW FAR WILL YOU GO TO "PRE-STALK" A PROSPECTIVE PARTNER?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
45%	I will check out her Facebook profile.	41%	41%	51%	48%
21%	I won't "pre-stalk" at all.	21%	24%	19%	20%
21%	All of the above.	24%	21%	17%	20%
7%	I will do a straight Google search and see what comes up.	6%	8%	6%	7%
6%	I will check out all her social media profiles.	8%	6%	7%	5%

Yet more evidence of how sad the western male is, here only 21% of men would not pre-stalk. Let me make something very clear here. “Pre-stalking” is for women. Until you’ve banged her, what the hell is the point of doing any online research at all?

Here the try-hard and supplicating nature of the Western man is revealed, because you know he’s pre-stalking so he can fantasize how she looks naked, or to see what her interests are so he can talk about them on dates, or because he doesn’t want to say anything to offend her. All of these reasons are pathetically beta.

An alpha male is completely the opposite when it comes to dating. First of all, most alpha males avoid dates because they are boring as fuck and generally have low returns on investment. Alpha males look for other more spontaneous ways to meet women, such as through dancing, insta-dating in the daytime, or pulling from a bar or club, but sometimes dating is the most viable option a man has (especially in certain foreign countries). Second, since we are talking about Western countries, let me tell you how attractive men view dates:

- They care very little about her background, including her job, education, or marital/relationship status. Anything that is listed on Facebook is the last thing on their minds.
- Does she have a fun, warm, and friendly personality (good character)?
- Can she dress well?
- Does she shit-test too much?
- Is she a feminist?
- Does she freak out when he touches her?
- How interested is she in his life?

They care far less about pleasing their date because they are more interested in pleasing themselves, a concept that is foreign to the beta. Whereas the beta pre-stalks, the alpha "verifies" a woman he has been banging for some time by checking up on Facebook or the internet to see if she is who she claims.

The only reason alphas date is to have fun and sex. After having his fun, the alpha will evaluate his woman's potential for a relationship and take it from there. But if he's just met her, why should he give her any more time than is necessary? She has no credibility or trust built with him, and until she does it's guilty until proven innocent.

Continuing on with the concept of betas being nothing more than instruments for a woman's pleasure, we can see how powerful this theme really is.

Q38 DO YOU CARE IF SHE ORGASMS?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
91%	Yes	93%	92%	90%	89%
9%	No	7%	8%	10%	11%

Q37 WOULD YOU BE OFFENDED IF A WOMAN FAKED AN ORGASM DURING INTERCOURSE WITH YOU?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
50%	Yes, I would be offended that I wasn't able to pleasure her.	51%	49%	50%	48%
28%	Yes, I would be offended that she was deceiving me.	26%	29%	31%	27%
22%	No.	23%	22%	19%	25%

Behold, the modern western male:

You would think that, after all the hoops the modern man jumps through to get love and attention from women — studying hard in school and college, working out at the gym, gaining friends and social status, competing for a good job, and meeting god-knows-how-many demands women make — he would at least try to satisfy himself first in the one domain that men truly care about.

Instead, he treats himself like the human dildo pictured above. I suppose this outcome is natural given how the western male is usually raised.

Let me make myself clear. It is not bad to give a woman an orgasm. But it's not important if you do. As the survey shows, most men believe that giving a girl an orgasm is important. They infer that if she comes, then she'll like him more and he'll get more sex in the long run. But this just isn't true. The less a man cares, the more likely he'll do all the right things in a relationship, from the bar to the bedroom. Use her, abuse her, and let her please you instead, and she'll be far more likely to experience a powerful orgasm than if you directly try to please her. That's because women are attracted to men, not little bitches. But you cannot fake this. You must truly not give a shit, and instead view women as objects of your pleasure.

And if you can do this, you will not find yourself in the top category for Q26:

Q26 WHICH ASPECT OF YOUR SEX LIFE HAVE YOU LIED ABOUT?

ALL	PERCENTAGE BY COUNTRY:
51%	The number of sex partners I've had.	51%	47%	54%	52%
30%	The perverted things I am into.	31%	33%	28%	28%
8%	The fact that I have paid for sex.	7%	7%	6%	10%
6%	The size of my penis.	5%	7%	5%	6%
5%	Whether or not I have been tested.	6%	6%	7%	4%

Ultimately, when Western men lie about their sex partner count they are really lying to themselves about their satisfaction with the opposite sex. Unable to admit they have a problem, denial comes in many forms:

- “Not all women are like that.” (The dumbest counter-argument in the world is to refute a generalization with a specific counter-instance.)
- “I’m not tall enough.”
- “I’m not rich enough.”
- “I’m only looking for one special girl.”
- “Not everyone is as perverted as you are.” (So why do betas have porn collections that fill several hard drives?)
- “Some guys have it, and some guys don’t. I’m not one of those guys.”
- “You don’t know what you’re talking about. Your view of women is fucked up.”

Short of beating the shit out of beta males, I cannot think of a way to change who they are. They are weak, pathetic little suckers who exist only to serve others. And rather than face reality, they viciously attack anyone who would expose the lies they tell themselves. If you try to show them the error of their ways, they will hate you for it. So I don’t try to convince them otherwise.

Instead of helping betas now, I just use and abuse them like women do. Why respect a beta when he cannot respect himself? Our women act like cunts because our men have no backbone or self-respect. They refuse to stand for their own self-interest and so women act like tyrants because they can. This Askmen survey merely validates this fact. I treat betas like shit, and they aren’t even aware of it. I think they like it this way.

We were born into a very strange world.

The HGTV Channel Poisons Female Minds

August 13, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

If you've ever allowed a woman to pick what to watch on television, chances are you have endured Home & Garden Television (HGTV). Despite the occasional useful how-to programming, HGTV panders to the predominantly female impulse to accumulate without mindfulness. Here are four aspects of HGTV's poisonous campaign:

1. Buy A House!

Renting because you're unsure if owning is the right financial move? You should buy a house at the top of your budget! Do you already own a house? Buy a bigger house! Shows like House Hunters and Property Virgins depict home ownership as a noble financial, emotional, and social ideal. The National Association of Realtors advertises during these shows, insisting that the housing market has never been more attractive for new buyers. The only renters featured are those looking to rent abroad for a year — while vacationing from the house they own at home.

2. Women are encouraged to go wild with their wants, not counseled on their needs

The typical episode of House Hunters is a cohabitating couple who wants to purchase a home to signal the seriousness of their relationship. In the brief interviews about their desires, the man will typically say something practical like "a colonial within our budget with a nice backyard for the dog." The woman will give a laundry list with unjustifiable extras: open floor plan, in-suite bathroom, a walk-in closet to store unnecessary stuff, etc. If there's any discrepancy between their priorities, she always wins. The paper tiger men attempt to maintain some semblance of control by setting a budget, but the women (with the realtor and show host's blessings) usually manipulate the men in to acquiescing.

Loading…

3. Everything needs to be updated

A network with this focus would understandably have shows about renovating houses, but what qualifies as "out-of-date" has become comical. Beautiful kitchens, spacious living rooms, and quaint backyards built in the last 50 years are labeled eyesores that must be updated to current styles for reasons unknown. Lowe's runs constant ads declaring the ease of completely changing your home in between segments about how much nicer everyone else's house is than your own.

4. Minimalism is not an option

So you've signed away 30 years of your future and updated everything to remove the stink of the early 2000s. Now fill it with crap! Rooms designed by the Property Brothers and backyards on Yard Crashers are stuffed to the brim with useless trinkets. Every shelf needs to have fake books, every table needs to be draped with cloth, every open space needs to be filled. Do you have a wall without a picture hanging on it? You must be poor.

A constant, subversive theme here is that men's desires don't matter. When a couple has to make a decision, the woman typically gets her way. These shows often focus on wall-bound women searching for some societally-approved talisman of their status. Straight, unattached men are less likely to possess this elemental desire to buy more things and own more space than they can afford, rendering them bad investments as customers.

Next time you have a few minutes to kill, flip over to HGTV and witness these themes for yourselves. Foreknowledge of how the corporate master manipulates the female nesting instinct will help you guard against its insidious effects on the women in your life.

5 Game Lessons From Barney Stinson

August 13, 2013 | by Law Dogger | Link | Original Link

A few years ago, How I Met Your Mother was a great comedy with a great set of characters. Now it just sucks. But arguably its greatest character has delivered some excellent advice through the years. Despite being housed in fiction, Stinson had numerous quotes, ideas, and tactics that apply to modern game, which is ironic given the fact that the character is portrayed by an openly gay actor. Nonetheless, here are 5 of these that all men should follow:

5. "The only reason to wait a month for sex is if she's 17 years, 11 months old."

There are a few parts to this brilliant quote. First, let's keep it legal folks. Second, it alludes to the value of youth in women, something that cannot and should not be overlooked. Finally and most importantly, you should never wait an extra day for sex, much less a month. What I mean by this is that when you are out with a girl, or when meeting a girl at a club or bar, ALWAYS go for sex that night. No bang? Blowjob. No blowjob? Handjob/fingering (then go for bang again). No hands play? Tittie play. No tits? Groping and makeouts. No groping and makeouts? THEN go for the number. This is more applicable to night time than day, but always remember you can only get what you ask for. So ask for them to accept your penis first.

Sometimes the first meeting will not pan out, so on the first date you should also go for the bang. "Women sometimes forgive a man who presses an opportunity, but never a man who misses one." — Charles Maurice de Talleyrand-Périgord. In other words, never wait longer than you absolutely must for sex. Girls will never punish you for trying for sex, yet will punish you for being a pussy and not trying.

4. "When I get sad, I stop being sad and be awesome instead."

Nobody wants to be around a guy who is always down and in a foul mood. Girls are emotional creatures and they thrive on “feeling.” Definitely know that if you are moping around and feeling bad for yourself then no girl will want to be around you. Moreover, it ties into your confidence levels too. If you are sad and down in the dumps, you simply cannot come across as that confident man a girl is attracted to. On the contrary, being upbeat, awesome, and in a great mood will draw people to you…including women. No life of the party is ever sitting in the corner with a frown or emo gaze.

3. “The point is, marriage is stupid. Every day new 22-year olds go into bars…”

We are all now aware of the vast issues and negatives associated with marriage, especially in the Western world. Some people end up getting married because of the lack of abundance mentality. The man will think that either a) he will never find another girl as great as the one he has, or even worse, b) no girl will want to marry him other than this one. Bullshit. Step outside your door and you will run into hundreds of girls. Every day thousands of girls in your city turn 18, turn 21, enroll in college, join a gym, go to the grocery store, get coffee, etc. There is no shortage of girls in this world.

2. Have you met Ted?

Watch the above clip. Sometimes we get caught up with what we want to say to a girl upon approaching her when it really doesn't matter. Sure, don't go there and blurt out "nice hair, mind if I slip my dick inside?" But even a simple "Hi" is sufficient. Currently I've started waving to girls at bars and smiling. If they wave back, there is interest. If not, there is not. Simple, yet effective. My friend and I have actually tried the "have you met ___?" It works great. The point is just go and approach, don't overthink things.

1. "Suit Up"

I'm a huge advocate of suiting up when going out. It shows status, power, money, confidence, style, and so on. You feel more confident in a suit. You stand out in a suit in certain venues where everyone else is wearing the standard jeans and button down shirt. I've had more success with girls wearing a suit (alternatively, a blazer) than all my other outfits combined. Next time you go out to a night club, put on a suit, tie, and pocket square. Take only suits with you next time you go to Vegas. Even better, do it in Eastern Europe and watch girls' eyes light up as she stares you up and down, fidgets in her tiny dress and inquires "you are boss?"

All Girls Are Cheapskates

---

The other day, I came home from the gym to a flashing light on my cell phone. When I read the text message that had prompted the alert, I saw that it was from a second-string fuck buddy who's managed to survive a couple of rounds of major layoffs due to her contributions to the company (her willingness to come over for short-notice sex at odd hours of the night and her above-average skills at giving back massages).

> Are you home?

While I might ignore such a text on a different night, my full testicles decided to handle the reply, taking it upon themselves to ask "why?" That prompted a call, which I reluctantly answered.

> Me: What's up?
> FB: Hey, I'm in your neighborhood. If you're home, I can stop by and say hi.
> Me: I just have to jump in the shower, but sure.
> FB: Oh, and do you have anything to eat? I haven't eaten since lunch.
> Me: Ummm, I think I have some snacks in the fridge.
> FB: Snacks?! Well [weighing options]…okay…I'll see you in 10 minutes.

I couldn't help but wonder if her visit was more about "saying hi" to me, or to my fridge, with whom she'd developed a close relationship in the prior few weeks. While this girl usually does more of the traveling (to get to my house), she's been handsomely compensated with drinks made from top-shelf liquor; home-cooked meals; and a series of toiletries that I keep expressly for guests (e.g., contact solution). Not once has she cooked a meal for me or brought something with her, with the exception of a half-eaten sandwich she proceeded to finish in front of me one time.

What's astounding about the situation isn't how unusual her gall was, but how thoroughly unsurprising it was. Her behavior is well in-line with the overwhelming majority of girls I've encountered. Dating American women, from a wide range of geographic regions and socioeconomic backgrounds, has taught me one thing: they're almost universally cheapskates, who are not only allergic to spending their own money, but have developed elaborate techniques for extracting stuff out of men while minimizing their own overhead.

In world striving for so-called gender equality, women are content with not only selectively holding onto this relic from the past, but indeed updating it to new realities.

This is a tiny sampling of the tacky, cheapskate behavior—from various girls–that I've encountered just in the last two years:

Trying to bring a half-finished bottle of wine home

A girl that I'd seen a few times finally came over not-empty-handed. She'd brought a "nice" bottle of wine, of which we finished maybe 65 percent. The next morning, after she'd finished her half of the fresh pot of coffee I'd brewed, she checked if the cork was securely on the wine bottle she'd brought and started walking out with it. When I said, "what are you doing?" she replied "it's good wine!" "That's why I'm not going to let it go to waste," I said as I pried it out of her cold stiff hand. The next day, I made marinara sauce out of it.

Loading...

Asking me for the three dollars I "owed her"

Despite the fact that I'd paid for a couple of meals in full, I'd incurred a three-dollar "debt" with a girl when we actually went dutch on our third meal out together. When, on the way back to the car, I suggested that I'd pay her "in kind," she snapped back with, "I'd prefer the cash, thanks." When I "forgot" to pay her, she reminded me a few days later.

Telling me to make her another drink because she didn't like the first one I'd made her

After making a girl a fine gin and tonic—with Hendrick's gin, cucumber slices, and premium tonic water—she informed me that she "didn't like it," and asked me if I could make her another one. She literally took one sip of it and left it there. I handed her a Pabst Blue Ribbon in a can instead. "Maybe this is more your speed."

Asking if she should leave her wallet home altogether

As this girl and I were headed out from my place—to get something to eat and have a night out on the town–she asked me if she "even [needed] to bring [her] wallet." I answered, "Nah, just grab your credit card and some cash." She brought her whole purse.

Ordering a bunch of food, jacking up the price of the bill, then asking to evenly split

Not all of these stunts have been from girls I was dating or banging. In this case, it was a group of marginal acquaintances of a girl I was dating—though I've had this exact scenario happen on various occasions. The three girls decided to order every "special" dish and gimmicky drink on the menu, each of which carried a premium price tag. I ordered my standard, reliable dish. Since they serve everything "family style"—and the girls turned out, as they always do, to dislike what they got—they proceeded to tap my dish. Having depleted my plate, which is always solid, they left their own tasteless experiments behind. When the bill came, they climbed over each other to suggest that we split it evenly. Imagine their surprise when I announced I was only paying for my stuff.

This only begins to scratch the surface of the brazenly cheap moves that I see from women as a matter of course. Most of the behaviors are so common that I'm more surprised when they don't happen: the most unconvincing, half-assed reaches for their purses times perfectly so your wallet comes out first; suggesting a fancier, more expensive plan, only to drag their feet come check time; and an array of disrespectful acts on my car or my home–from leaving trash behind, traipsing dirt onto the rugs, or shoving nice stuff aside to sit down. I'm no cheapskate myself, but I'm also no rich man. And, it's not like these are broke chicks either. They were—more times than not—thoroughly solvent, came from money, or were decked out in designer clothes.

For all of the complaining that we hear, girls refuse to acknowledge the astounding number of freebies that they get on a regular basis–to the degree that they come to expect them everywhere they go and from every (especially male) person they meet. Sure, the hotter the girl the more accustomed to not paying she is. But, from free meals on dates, to free drinks from chumps at bars, to unsolicited free samples at Whole Foods, it's good to be a chick in America.

Housewives Are The New Battered Wives

Recently, the New York Times treated us to another epic hagiography of the American career woman. The problem is familiar, and dire: women with degrees from prestigious universities and six-figure incomes feel vaguely unhappy. The article begins with the story of Sheilah, a wife who starts working fewer hours to cope with the demands of motherhood. Even though she was working much less than her husband, she balked at doing her new domestic duties, even as a nanny did much of the work anyway.

In the hopes of improving her marriage, she quit her job entirely. “A sense of personal dislocation set in,” we are told. “Without a salary or an independent work identity, her self-confidence plummeted.” The author of the piece, Judith Warner, begins to weave her thesis: traditional sex roles beget personal and marital failure.

Sheilah starts volunteering. Her husband Mark’s words about her volunteering are damning, if not surprising:

> “I look back on it as the beginning of the end of our marriage…Once she started to work, she started to place more value in herself, and because she put more value in herself, she put herself in front of a lot of things — family, and ultimately, her marriage.”

The Times informs us that Sheilah and Mark “agree the job drove a destructive wedge between them.”

By dint of experience, Mark channels Julius Evola – “modern woman in wanting to be for herself has destroyed herself.” Her aim to realize herself destroys her marriage and her family. And Sheilah isn’t exactly cutting her own path – her family supports her divorce. Her father is complicit in the destruction of her family; he commended her for her independence as a child, and that’s now bearing bitter fruit. In America, these fathers are the rule, not the exception, saying they only want ‘what’s best for my daughter.’ Parenthetically, Sheilah refused to take Mark’s last name – let that be an omen to any man contending with a woman who insists on keeping her name.

Even as a single anecdote, the story of Sheilah might make one doubt whether traditional sex roles are healthy for a marriage. In truth, tradition was set to fail. Tradition had little chance of succeeding with a woman bred to believe her worth lay in making money and dominating others. Even in the most traditional of eras, some are pariahs, and are simply not suited for marriage or motherhood. Sheilah is a suggestive example.

Next, we are introduced to Carrie and Stuart. Carrie's resentment grew because she hated doing housework. These wives, with their intolerance for wifely duties, are cruel caricatures of the American mother. Yet they are true, cartoonish entitlement and all. Carrie chafed at her husband's expectation of a clean house; she would blab on inanely at the dinner table, boring her husband. Foolishly, he suggested she go back to work to become interesting again.

Loading...

Carrie takes his advice, and soon enough, packs her schedule with attending to the children and a full-time job. She has little time to enjoy her husband, or catch her breath.

> "I think a big issue is that we both want to be taken care of at the end of the day, and neither of us has any energy to take care of the other," Carrie said. "It's the proverbial 'meet me at the door with a martini and slippers.' Don't we all want that? A clean house and someone at the door? I think when I wasn't working I had some guilt that that wasn't me, but now I want to be that other person. . . . When you're absolutely exhausted, it's hard to be emotionally generous."

The irony is sweet, and tragic. The American career woman, in all her glory, vindicates the modest demands of the traditional father: a clean home, an attentive wife and her warm dinner after a long day's work to provide for the family. Carrie admits that given her strenuous obligations, she wants that now. Implicitly, it's not all that much to ask. The feminist harangues about the oppressiveness of domestic life start to ring hollow.

> Many of the women I spoke with were troubled by the gender-role traditionalism > that crept into their marriages once they gave up work, transforming them from being their husbands' intellectual equals into the one member of their partnership uniquely endowed with gifts for laundry or cooking and cleaning; a junior member of the household, who sometimes had to "negotiate" with her husband to get money for child care…

> But when traditional gender arrangements were put into place, there was a subtle slide into inequality.

The ominous tones call to mind that heroine of yore, the battered woman. The abusive husband of today is more subtle, and thereby more pernicious. Instead of gracing her with a black eye, he… lets her stay at home. He… doesn't let her outsource child-rearing to a nanny of color. Arbeit Macht Frei. Work is redemption, and he keeps her from it. Her husband is patriarchal oppression personified, even as she prefers her new state. No amount of no-fault divorce and guaranteed alimony can save her; like her battered counterpart, the housewife is vulnerable and powerless to leave the dominion of her abuser.

> Not a single woman I spoke with said she wished that she could return to her old, pre-opting-out job — no matter what price she paid for her decision to stop working.

Unique Things To Consider When Going To The Bar

August 15, 2013 | by Douglas Heppner | Link | Original Link

Background

After perusing the Internet I've noticed many articles on what to do and what not to do at an alcohol serving establishment. Most advice pieces are from the perspective of a customer such as a roller, pick up artist, safety advocate, etc. Some pieces are written from service industry employees who are biased for their own profit. I decided to add my own two cents as altruistically as possible. There are some things that are never mentioned in other articles that I noticed so I will focus on them. So sit back and prepare to suspend your disbelief.

The Establishment

The establishment you choose is key for a good night. Aside from the obvious cleanliness and criminal element presence indicators, there are certain things you should scope out. One thing is the cash register. If it is a relatively new and sophisticated computer system, the odds of you being ripped off are minimal. If it is some dollar tree Casio numerical keypad register with a separate credit card machine attached, one should beware. Another thing to take notice of is the liquor bottles. When bottles are empty I throw them away, so that bottle of Jack Daniels you see on the shelf should look brand-new. If you notice bottles of high-volume sales liquors with beat up labels, there is a strong possibility that bottle of Jameson is not actually filled with Jameson. Also, if they don't pour the drinks in the open, red flags should go up in your mind.

Tells of Cheapness

When going to a reputable establishment, it is best not to do things that give the impression that you are a cheapskate. A quick indicator of cheapskates is knockoff clothing, jewelry, and accessories. Another thing that gives them away quickly is when they ask how much something costs. If you have to ask how much something is, you can't afford it. Another one that defies logic and my brain is people who think they get more alcohol by asking for it in a tall glass or with less ice. Telling the bartender it is your birthday is acceptable. Asking for free shot because it is your birthday is not. Another move that gives away a cheapskate is telling the bartender that you tip at the end of the night without starting a tab. Also, using a dead credit card to start a tab might actually have you sent to jail.

Be Prepared

Know what you want to drink before you come to the bar. Be ready to pay immediately after the drink has been served. If it is a busy night, people will be irritated at you slowing things down. If you plan on banging barflies, make sure you consistently use a fake name and pack condoms. If you plan on getting intoxicated to the point of blacking out, wear clothes you wouldn't mind puking on and have a cab number programmed in your phone. Preparation is the key to your success.

Loading…

Don’t Be Ignorant

The “T” at the end of Merlot is silent, do not pronounce it. Amaretto it is not pronounced “Amarillo”. Don’t ever say “this doesn’t taste like how I make it at home” or at Applebee’s. Sometimes someone will pull the old ”I’ll have a vodka tonic”, and then when I deliver it say “I said vodka cranberry”. Trying to score free stuff by saying you wanted something else does not work. I will pour said drink down the drain or put in the fridge for me to drink later. Also, no matter how many MMA classes you have been to, you will not be able to engage a bouncer effectively while intoxicated. “AMOG”ing employees is not recommended.

Making Things Complicated

I’ve noticed some groups like to do something call social preening. This is a pretentious and vapid way to appear sophisticated. One method of social preening is to order complicated drinks to appear sophisticated. I enjoy making mojitos and other popular yet complicated drinks , but when someone orders a drink they don’t even know what’s in it or tries playing the “test the bartender’s knowledge game” using some new iPhone app, frustration will ensue. My register has the bar Bible on it, so you cannot win with the “Screaming Viking”. Also if you order four shots, you are expected to pay for said four shots, not “he will pay for that one I’ll pay for these two and she’ll get that last one”.

Here To Serve You

Some customers cannot make up their mind on what they would like to drink, so I ask them their preferred method and motivations for drinking are. Want to get drunk cheap? I can do that. Want something you can’t make at home? I can do that. Want something makes you look manly but not too strong? I can do that as well, all you have to do is ask. Some oddball requests I’ve gotten include stuffing a glass with cherries and filling it with Crown Royal, making a $100 sex on the beach in a beer pitcher(surprisingly difficult math wise), and sending a round of three shots of water to some angry ladies. For the most part if you got the money, I can make it happen within the bounds of the law. If an establishment does not respect you and you are not being a jack ass, you should not continue to do business with them.

Different Perspectives

I must state that my demeanor, motivations and actions are not the same as all bar service employees. For example, I do not mind if customers go “hey you” or snap their fingers at me but this appears to be extremely irritating to others. I enjoy watching customers accomplish their “mission” and will help a dude “get it in”. Surprisingly or not depending on your perspective, female bartenders put their ego ahead of their paychecks sometimes. They might submarine your chances of sealing the deal with a girl because they are jealous you are giving her attention. Also, I actually enjoy hearing people’s stories and learning new things, but to some other bartenders, the customer is just a step toward another 8 ball of cocaine.

Conclusion

To have a good time at the bar, have fun. Don’t bring outside problems in or use alcohol as an escape from reality. Remember it is a business though, and business is business.

Three Crappy Mistakes I've Made As A Boyfriend

August 15, 2013 | by Raul Felix | Link | Original Link

So you think you've got your woman on lockdown because your competence as a lover is so grand that the mere sight of you makes her privates all moist and tingly. With your confidence, masculine presence, and sexual powers, you've managed to enslave her with your cock. It's a great feeling isn't it? You've dedicated yourself to learning how her delicate, soft, and beautiful body reacts to your touches as you finger bang her through her pretty pink panties. You've communicated with her and found out what turns her on and what really turns her on, that nympho. She's your little toy that you use as you please. Life is good.

Now, I want you to think about the other things you do in your relationships after you've given her the most amazing 30 seconds of her life with your 3 inches of fury, stud. As much as you wish it wasn't true, a vast majority of the time you spend with her isn't going to be with your cock punishing one of her orifices. What are some things you can do to avoid losing your precious little nympho during those times when you can't display your coital powers? Here are some crappy mistakes I've made as a boyfriend.

Don't Make Minimums, Maximums

You don't cheat on, beat, or emotionally abuse your woman. Great, maybe you also want your cock sucked for not murdering someone, robbing a bank, or pushing old ladies down stairs. That's not something to be proud of, it should be a standard that you hold yourself to. It's what is expected out of you from a relationship, it's not just a happy plus.

When is the last time you've done something to really make your woman feel special? Has it really been that long you can't even remember? You're fucking up. You don't believe it matters, but it does. We're not talking about some slut you pump and dump, but a person who you actually care about.

My ex was a very lovely Israeli woman and I would take a one and half hour bus ride to go see her. I'd do it twice a week, sometimes more. In my mind, I was doing a lot for her. I was going out of my way to see her all the time, that's romantic right? Did it ever occur to me to buy her flowers, get her chocolates, or other cutesy crap girls like? Yes, it did, but I always failed to act upon it. I thought the trip I was doing was more than enough to show my love. I failed to acknowledge the subtle and not so subtle hints she gave that she wanted me to do more romantic things.

Don’t make the minimums your maximums. She is your woman, you’re expected to go out of your way to see her. You’re expected to take her out on occasion. You’re expected to tell her she is beautiful. Just because you do those things, doesn’t mean you can’t do more. You can buy her those flowers or surprise her with a sushi candlelight dinner on the balcony. You can send cute little love letters through the mail that will be reminiscent of by gone era before the invention of e-mail. Yes, the big things matter, but so do the little things. Strive to do way more than is required to be a good boyfriend.

There is a lazy human tendency we all tend to have where we become complacent. We grow comfortable in our relationships and start believing the just doing the minimum to show our love and devotion is enough. We already did all that romantic bullshit in the beginning, why do we need to keep on doing it? It’s established how we feel. Boredom sets in, gentlemen, and your little sex vixen will wonder why she is no longer worth your thoughtfulness and attention. She will become bored and disenchanted, and a woman bored and disenchanted is one in a position to over examine every detail of the relationship and what it has become.

The choice is yours, maybe she’ll stay loyal and break up with you cleanly, or maybe she’ll fuck around on you, but either is something you can avoid if you took those extra steps. If she does either anyways, fuck that bitch then, at least you gave it your all.

It’s Okay to Look, but Don’t Lie About It

I know some people are in an open relationship, which is cool, but that’s not how I roll. That doesn’t mean I don’t take the liberty to check out a hot piece of ass that is passing by. My girl and I would be walking along being a happy and loving couple, when all of sudden some chick with a generous breast size would come towards us. My eyes would focus on those huge tits, but being the tactful man I am my head or body movements would never give a hint. Then, she would pass by, I would wait three-seconds and turn around to check out the ass. I was a sly one.

I wasn’t. My girl noticed every single time. Your girl notices every single time. She probably will notice the chick before you and thus knowing your tastes, will know she is the kind of eye candy you go after. She will then begin to sense any type of movements or subtle changes you make in your misguided effort to masquerade eye-fucking another chick.

Now, the part the truly pisses her off is not the fact that you're checking out other chicks, but that you're making a pathetic attempt to hide it. You really think your girl is that clueless that she won't notice you eye-fucking every fine piece of ass the passes by? Don't insult her intelligence.

The best thing to do is to be honest about it. It's natural for you as a man to be attracted to other women (and she to other men.) Its part of our genetic make up. If you have a traditional type relationship, make sure to follow the age-old rule: look, but never touch. As long as your woman isn't the overbearing, jealous type she won't mind too much if you look so long as you don't do anymore than that. Honesty is the key.

Who knows, if you tell her what kind of girls you're attracted to, she'll be more inclined to suggest some extra naughty things in the sack and maybe, dare you dream, suggest a threesome. Most likely not though, but it's always nice to fantasize about it.

Easy on the Criticism

You like big 36DD sized boobs, but your girl has a respectable, but slightly smaller sized 36C. You know what is not a great idea? Telling her that maybe she should get breasts implants. Yes, I said that, and yes, I am an idiot.

By criticizing her body, you have undermined her self-confidence, and thus her willingness to be your little sex vixen. How is she suppose to feel sexy wearing that silk red lingerie she bought just for you if you told her you prefer big floppy boobs over her nice and perky ones? It's the equivalent of her saying she prefers a cock that is only a couple of inches larger than yours.

Seriously, think about that for a moment. Your woman who you love so dearly, just told your cock is just a bit too small. How good do you feel about yourself? Do you feel adequate? Do you feel like a man? I bet you don't. You are doing the same thing to her by criticizing her slight lack of breasts size. You are making her feel bad, inadequate, and unfeminine. Pretty easy to make her pussy dry up like Death Valley. Kind of a fucked up thing to do to the person you love.

As long as your woman isn't obese, getting obese, or disgusting (why would she be your woman if she was?), make her feel comfortable in her body. Her body has a special uniqueness that only belongs to her. Part of the fun of fucking a woman is that you get to feel every inch of her. Your hands have free to reign to run wild all over her body and feel how her special curves line up. Enjoy it, because they are a part of her and most likely, you're never going to fuck a girl that looks perfectly like her again.

Make it known that you love to ravage every inch of her body and keep your hyper critical and non-constructive comments to yourself. You'll get so much more in return. Otherwise, you'll be back to jerking off to porn with girls with 36DD in no time.

24 Pieces Of Wisdom From Lao Tzu

August 16, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

My re-entry into Eastern philosophy has put Lao Tzu's seminal work in my hand. It's an introduction to Tao, a metaphysical Chinese philosophy. Here are my favorite quotes:

1. "To desire fame, wealth, and honor is to bring about a downfall of your own doing. When your work is done, then retire. The Sage seeks neither fame nor fortune. Withdrawing once the work is done in a natural manner. This is the way of the Tao."

2. "Excessive desires will madden the mind. Excessive possessions preoccupy the mind with fear. The more you desire, the more you'll be discontented from what you have. The Sage fills his belly, not his eyes. The Sage satisfies his inner desires with what cannot be seen, not with the external temptations of the world."

3. "Meet failure or success with grace, honor and kindness. Accept misfortune or fortune with grace, honor and kindness… Accept all that comes your way"

4. "Clarity comes to muddy waters by being stilled. In being tranquil in the stillness brings about peace from the chaos."

5. "Allow the ten thousand things to come and go while just observing. See how one ending is just another beginning."

6. "More important is living in a simple manner within one's own nature and keeping the well-being of others at heart. Living an unpretentious life with compassion and keeping your desires tempered is to live in your own true nature."

7. "To have little leaves room for more."

8. "He doesn't compete therefore no one can compete with him."

9. "High winds do not last the morning. Thunderstorms do not last all day."

10. "The way of nature is the way of the Tao. Therefore you cannot improve upon nature. Those who try to change it in the end destroy it. Those who try to grasp it cannot hold it."

11. "The wise only uses weapons when it cannot be avoided. The wise practice restraint and caution in the use of them. Never does the wise see glory in their use."

12. "By not showing greatness is truly great."

Loading…

13. "The foolish man who is always trying to do, leaves much undone."

14. “…being humble is the foundation of greatness.”

15. “For in gaining, one loses. For in losing, one gains.”

16. “The man attached to fame and wealth will suffer. By gaining the man will still lose.”

17. “The greatest sin for man is desire. The greatest misfortune for man is discontentment. The greatest violation for man is coveting that of others. Therefore the man being in a state of contentment is always contented.”

18. “Exhaustion is caused by doing too much. Whoever behaves in this manner will have their years reduced for it is not natural.”

19. “In nature the difficult things are done in an easy manner, great things are made up by the acts of small things. This is the nature of nature, achieving greatness with no effort. This is the law of natural progression. The Sage is like nature in achieving greatness by practicing the law of natural progression in doing small acts to obtain greatness.”

20. “From not putting oneself ahead of others come leadership.”

21. “When you realize that death is nothing more than an illusion then your fear of death disappears. Men who live in fear of death are afraid of breaking the laws that result in death.”

22. “Keeping balance and harmony by taking from an overabundance and giving to where there is a deficiency.”

23. “Therefore the Sage gives without needing recognition, serves without bringing attention to his actions, he achieves without the need of reward. Once his work is accomplished he moves on. He shows no desire except to help others for this is his wisdom.”

24. “The wise do not argue to prove a point. The men that argue their point are not wise.”

This brief book leverages observations of nature for guiding humans on how to live. Many analogies use streams, trees, or animals. If you want more explanation into the concepts of Tao, I highly recommend The Empty Boat by Osho.

Can The Red Pill Subreddit Survive?

August 17, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

In late January, The Red Pill subreddit was created by an anonymous individual who goes by the handle RedPillSchool. In less than 6 months, it passed 10,000 members, and is about to hit 14,000. It has been one of the only places on Reddit where male issues can be discussed without influence from feminists or beta males. But there are three issues that need solving:

1. Tourists

If you take a look at Seddit, a forum for the worst game advice on the internet, you'll quickly come to the realization that men simply want the magic piece of advice to get their dream girl instead of making structural changes to their beliefs or game. In other words, guys want game without having to run game. From my casual browsing of The Red Pill, I'm starting to see these blue pillers seep in and post beta male statements that get a surprising amount of upvotes. This degrades the discourse. When the The Red Pill first started, over 95% of the content was exclusively red, but now I find myself having to consciously apply a filter to exclude blue pill talking points.

2. Reddit Feminists

For whatever reason, the executives of Reddit are highly sympathetic to feminism. They have allowed the SRS group to troll the entire site with impunity. One thing SRS has done is create a troll headquarters called The Blue Pill, which is exclusively dedicated to destroying The Red Pill. These trolls are lesbians and transgendered freaks who simply do nothing all day but downvote opinions they don't like (known on Reddit as "brigading"). Their numbers are high and they seem to have unlimited power to subvert any subreddit they choose. Thanks to their efforts, The Men's Rights subreddit has been partially neutered.

Loading...

3. Rapid Growth

With growth comes problems. The Red Pill is growing so fast that it doesn't appear people are being smoothly absorbed into the culture. Idiots are trying to contribute without even knowing what the red pill stands for, leading to an decreasing signal to noise ratio. To combat this problem on my forum, I have limited registration. This stops the flood of people who try to participate without knowing what the forum's mindset and best practices are.

My forum is also a semi-closed atmosphere. I can keep a close eye on member contributions. It only requires one other moderator besides myself. The Red Pill, however, is wide open and I suspect the moderators are overwhelmed in battling undesirables. As long as The Red Pill remains on the Reddit infrastructure, where feminists have elevated power over them, I remain deeply concerned for its survival. It was a smart move to establish a base off Reddit with the Puerarchy blog, but I believe the problems they are facing will only increase as time goes on.

I'm strongly rooting for their success, but it remains to be seen if they can endure the onslaught that is sure to intensify. It's going to be a fierce battle.

It Shouldn't Take A Crisis, But It Does

August 17, 2013 | by Aaron Clarey | Link | Original Link

It was darn well near an annual event I would have to suffer "female hysterics" during my 20's. Be it a suicide threat, a screaming, inconsolable girl on the interstate, or an attention-whore slapping me and then dramatically exiting a night club, at least once a year some 20-something girl I was courting would throw a tantrum for the slightest and most fabricated of reasons.

Oddly enough, this abruptly ended once I entered my 30's.

My tactics didn't change. The type of girls I dated didn't change. My venues didn't change. But the veritable spoiled brat suburbanite princess screaming at the top of her lungs and threatening suicide because I didn't offer to buy her a soda, oddly vanished from my dating experiences.

The reasons why are bi-fold.

One, these little girls realized once men hit their 30's, they were never going to fall for female hysterics again. Temper-tantrums and female hysterics were very short term strategies, with shelf-lives only as long as it took men to figure out what BS they were. So girls would deploy this strategy on a naive and unsuspecting 23 year old who didn't know any better and would foolishly ask "what did I do wrong," but would never try it against a 31 year old who had the wisdom to say, "dat bitch be crazy."

Two, these girls grew up.

But what is interesting is the second reason – these girls grew up. And it is this second point where a lesson lies.

Understand, for the most part, American and western women are the most spoiled, entitled group of people in the economic history of the world.

This is not opinion.

This is not hyperbole.

This is not bitterness.

It is fact.

From the day they are born into the 1st world lottery of the planet they have their daddies taking care of "their precious little girl." Daddy's girl is then treated to a 17 year K-College experience where academia, media, society, and boys bend over backwards to adorn them with praise, adulation, and money. An additional 3-5 years of praise is granted by graduate school, affirmative action, government, and the entertainment industry serving and fulfilling every one of their financial, educational and psychological needs. So by the time they are 30 they have never suffered genuine strife, never really had to try, never had any challenge, and have had the entire world paying money to have the honor and privilege to kiss their ass. The result is a woman whose entire focus in life is herself. She is incapable of sympathy, empathy, selflessness and altruism, and consequently is also incapable of marriage.

That is until the “crisis.”

Understand when I say “crisis” I’m not talking so much about “the wall” or “biological clock,” but rather an event in life where unconsciously

and for the first time

women force themselves into a position where they are no longer the center of their lives. And because of this they now HAVE to consider others, they HAVE to take responsibility and HAVE to suffer the consequences of their decisions. And it is here where they have their “crisis.”

The crisis can take any number of forms. Daddy confesses he’s bankrupt and has been borrowing money to maintain a lifestyle he can’t afford and thus Lil’ Princess has to pay for her own convertible Cabriolet. Princess graduates from grad school, but can’t find a job and now has to figure out how to pay back all those student loans. Sweetie Pie marries the wrong guy and in three years gets divorced. Or, the most common one, Cupcake has a child. Whatever form the crisis takes, the spoiled little suburbanite princess goes from a picturesque world of the Daddy-Government complex bailing her out, with academia and media ensuring her ego and career are intact, as she sips “Flirtini’s” as desperate boys cover the tab, to a divorced single mom, with poor career prospects, and severe financial issues within a matter of ohhh…3-6 years.

Loading...
5 years ago she and her girlfriends were getting guys to buy them martini’s at Sex and the City night at the night club.

Now her 3 year old daughter has strep.

5 years ago she and her boyfriend were enjoying a nice dinner together.

Now she has to hit him up for child support.

5 years ago she was the assistant, vice, director of the public school’s diversity program.

Now she’s looking for a job with her “masters in education” because budget cuts eliminated worthless positions and programs.

In short the former elite princess, who was on top of the social, economic, and sexual world, are now suffering her first dose of reality and it is such a devastating blow, it destroys the insufferable princess and replaces it with a genuine woman capable of empathy, care, compassion, selflessness, and altruism. She actually becomes a tolerable, humble, honest, approachable and enjoyable person, one who is on time, responsible, and is thus capable of marriage.

But oh, the irony. The harsh and cruel irony.

For, in order for a woman to “convert” from the spoiled brat American princess, she needs to suffer her “crisis.” And in order to suffer her crisis, she more or less needs to make a mistake. But in making that mistake she by default takes on baggage. Baggage, that more often than not, mutually excludes her from being a viable candidate for courting or marriage.

For example, my millionaire pilot friend faces this exact and very binary quandary. He's 42. He's in shape. He's a millionaire and he's a pilot. He is every girl's dream come true. He has absolutely no problem finding hot little 20 somethings to date, but when out with them they are insufferable. They are not interesting. They have not suffered strife in their lives. And they are completely self-absorbed. He then opts for 30+ women. Thankfully they are more mature, reliable, interesting and nice, but the only reason they are nice is because they have gone through their crisis and by default they have deal-breaking baggage.

Another man's child.

A divorce.

A criminal record.

Psychological damage.

Financial problems

Etc.

They may be nice, but they are now officially damaged goods. They too are also not marriage material.

This behooves the question then, "can a woman be marriage material without having to go through some sort of crisis that results in the commensurate baggage that would ironically 86 any marriage potential?" and the answer is sadly "no."

In the olden days, "yes," where a wise father would have sat his daughter down and explained to her just how lucky she would be to have a pilot, millionaire, husband, let alone a reliable accountant who pulled in $50,000/year. But, no, not today. The two today are a mutually exclusive event. You cannot find a sane woman who has gained that sanity through strife without the mandatory baggage that comes with said strife. The "best" hope you can have is a girl who was brought up under poverty, appreciates hard work and discipline, is a self-supporting woman, and who also physically bloomed later in life. In this "ideal" condition you have a woman who learned her lessons while still young, didn't manage to bring another man's child into the world for you to pay for, had humility beat into her because she was the "ugly duckling," and thus when she "blooms" you have the best of both worlds. Unfortunately, such women account for less than 1% of the population, and to my knowledge are theoretical because I have never personally seen such a woman. Thus, in short, you are forced into that dichotomy – baggageless women who are insufferable or women who have suffered their crisis, are compatible with marriage, but are necessarily damaged goods.

All the more reason when you do find the rare marriage-worthy girl, you appreciate her.

The Millennial Generation Are Rank Narcissists

August 18, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

It's Always Sunny In Philadelphia (hereafter referred to as Always Sunny) is a show on FX that has spawned many seasons.

Overview Of Setup & Characters

The show has been called "Seinfeld on crack." They do draw on the idea of a show "about nothing." Further, the characters are even more self-absorbed, self-destructive and bizarre than anything on Seinfeld. In fact, the characters actually track the Seinfeld characters.

The show is set in Philadelphia (surprise!) and is centered around five people called "The Gang." Two of the members own a bar called Paddy's Pub and most of the show is centered around this bar. It is poorly run, as the characters are all self-absorbed and constantly hatching crazy or ridiculous plans. They are ineffective, lazy and often cruel.

Dennis Reynolds: A clear-cut narcissist. He lives out most of his fantasies in his head. He does bed women, but they are usually repulsed by his rank self-absorption. He rarely displays empathy or compassion and is, in general, an asshole. He is the brother of Dee and the one of the co-owners of Paddy's Pub. He went to UPenn and thinks he is far more intelligent than he really is. He pretends to the be the leader, and technically is, but is only interested in the worship and status.

Ronald “Mac” McDonald: The other co-owner of Paddy’s Pub. He came from a terrible broken home – his father was a drug dealer and his mother is apathetic towards him. He is a codependent & Dennis is the narcissist he needs. His catchphrase is “What’s up bitches?” He feels superior to the rest of the group. He feels he is the strongest of the group and the protector. He carried on a relationship with a pre-op transsexual and claiming to be “putting time in” before the surgery. Hilarious.

Charlie Day: The omega of the group. He is the janitor of the bar, doing all the work nobody else wants to do. He lives in an apartment with Frank. He is nursing a serious crush on “The Waitress” at a café “The Gang” frequents. He probably is the most compassionate of the group, as he is the only one who will regularly display levels of compassion for others. That being said, he is an alcoholic and drug addict. He has poor personal hygiene and is completely unable to function in normal society. He clearly hates himself and suppresses his natural talents for songwriting and the piano. He might be the most interesting character on the show.

Dee Reynolds: A stereotypical inverted narcissist that will vacillate between compensatory narcissism and strong codependency depending on the situation. She is a caricature of the modern American female. In way, it is done brilliantly. She is supremely superficial and completely self-absorbed. Her internal view of herself will never match up with the way she sees herself in reality. She vainly tries to be seen as a member of "The Gang," but the other three males sense her qualification and toy with her. She wants to be an actress and comedian but she never will accomplish either of those goals.

The Rank Narcissism Of "The Gang"

Let's talk a bit about Seinfeld. It was a phenomenal show that featured genius-levels of writing and jokes. However, it was the precursor for this show. Recall the character of George. He is a classic codependent. George was continually labeled highly unattractive by women who watched the show – he was the classic inverted narcissist with little going on for him. The other characters – Seinfeld, Elaine, and Kramer all displayed levels of narcissism, but nothing of the clinical level. However, their issues bled into the Millennial Generation and created an even worse generation – exemplified by Always Sunny.

The characters on the show are all narcissists of some degree. I doubt any one of them could go to a psychologist and not get diagnosed with a strong case of narcissism. They are a group that desperately needs each other, but they only care about themselves. They need each other so they have victims to prey on psychologically.

They really are a group of shitty people. The more I think about it, the more I am reminding of how sick our society is and how sick my generation is.

However, consider the above picture. Charlie & Mac are leaning away – they are the only characters who have displayed the ability to change. Dennis and Dee know they are the key psychological members of the group. Charlie has his back completely turned, Mac just has a downward gaze. Charlie knows he is the omega – the low man on the totem pole. Mac knows he will always play second fiddle to Dennis – the role he doesn't want to play, but the only role he can play in this relationship.

Charlie knows he could bounce and it would affect the group the least – that is why his back is to them. They call his garbage-man job "Charlie work," their way of reinforcing his inferiority. As for Mac, Dennis needs him as much as Mac needs Dennis; that break won't happen. His downward gaze reflects he gets no affection from Dennis – he needs to worship Dennis in order for their relationship to exist.

Nothing healthy here.

It's Always Cloudy In America: The Inefficacy Of The Millennial Generation

Inefficacy is generally defined as lacking the power to achieve the targeted result. That is my generation in one word.

Loading…
The Millennial Generation is a generation of narcissistic people who think they know more than they do. Read this sobering article from the The Last Pyschiatrist.

Consider Always Sunny through this article, in particular, this quote:

> And, rather than the internet bringing diverse people together, it seems to foster tribes of the like-minded, who never closely examine anything different(ly).

Diversity is skin-deep in American society. Recall I took a Critical Race Theory class in law school, and during a presentation on the lack of diversity in the professors at the school they claimed there was only one LGBT professor on staff. I inquired into the political/philosophical views of said professor. They gave me a blank stare and said it was very important to increase the sexual orientation diversity on the staff.

I responded if you judge people on the content of their character, what matters most is the diversity of ideas. A group of four white males, one a communist, one a libertarian, one a conservative and one an anarchist will produce more intellectual content than a black male, lesbian, Asian transsexual and poor Hispanic who are all solid liberals. The blank stares I received were telling. Narcissistic diversity only considers immutable characteristics, real diversity values mutable characteristics over immutable ones – without ignoring the contributions race or class might bring.

I was going to quote more, but it really is pointless. My generation – the Millennial Generation – is the greatest bunch of self-absorbed narcissists this world have even seen. I wonder if every civilization ends this way – a bunch of entitled fools who think wealth and privilege are their birthright. Millennial's get records amounts of worthless degrees, place incredible amounts of value on artificial goods and are followers of a supreme order. They worry themselves sick over social acceptance and have little ability and desire to change themselves.

Always Sunny shows this. They no ability to change who they are and are completely preoccupied with their self-image. All the characters clearly have been raised, as children, poorly and their narcissism is their way of compensating for that childhood. The school system enforces this, as children do best learning from their parents or other family figures. Children do not do well learning from strangers. If the school system was doing the most to help students, children would not bounce from teacher to teacher each grade level – they would have the same teacher from kindergarten through, at least, 8th grade.

Which brings up the next point. TLP notes that my parent's generation – teachers – really is dumb, they just don't know it. You see this in the teaching profession. Right now, with no training, I can assure you I can teach any cohort up until high school. I could easily riff on English, writing, history and social science with no training. Math might need some work, but that could be done quickly. That is the issue – the people who teach have no passion nor any desire for true intellectual betterment.

I have many female friends who are teachers. None, not one, has a passion for knowledge. They call their passion for raising children as the passion for teaching. It is all about them and their desire to be seen as people who truly care about the education of the next generation, only to go home at night, curled up with a bucket of ice cream and watching some inane reality TV show.

Which highlights the narcissism of my generation. They know how to put on a great show – or not (the flipside) – but have nothing to back up their bluster. You see this in Always Sunny, as the characters are often outed to be bullshitting. In one episode, Charlies claims to be an expert on "Bird Law" and the real attorney he was arguing with just gave him a look that says, "What the fuck is wrong with you?"

The art of bullshitting is a narcissistic trait, but one that doesn't prove narcissism. Everybody who succeeds in life needs to be able to bullshit.

However, we see the insecurity bubble up in society as "Teacher Appreciation" days/weeks/months. As TLP observed in the article, on some level the teachers get their deficiencies. They need inordinate amounts of praise in order to shore up their flagging egos. The more students continue to fail, the more we will need more social praise for teachers. Unable to come to terms with their professional failure, they more they need social approval – although it doesn't end there. Consider the vast majority of teachers are women. Maybe if they became wives and mothers they would not need to command small armies of children – they could just give birth to their own. A main contribution to teacher narcissism is the fact that teachers can just walk away or just pass on a troubled kid to another grade.

Bringing it back to Always Sunny and my generation, they are just products of a severely deficient system. They are products of not just a narcissistic society at large, but a school system steeped in narcissism. All of the characters display serious issues, most relating to narcissism. Many of them just live in worlds of their own creation with as little reference to the real world as they can handle. I remember watching a movie in which video games went full viral in the sense you could live whatever life you wanted inside your head with the game. That sort of game would absolutely destroy civilization.

The incredible psychological and mental deficiencies of the Millennial generation certainly aren't their fault, but are their responsibility. The generation must come to grips with their self-absorption and face it head on, in order to save the fate of America. Odds are, that won't happen. Just more status updates about how awesome they are – #YOLO! – as America slowly flushes out to sea.

Surely You're Illustrated, Mr. Feynman

August 18, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

This is an illustrated book of anecdotes from the life of American scientist Richard Feynman, whose book Surely You're Joking, Mr. Feynman, along with Walden, influenced me in my mid 20s to find my own path. About half of the stories in this book were new to me even though I'm familiar with Feynman's work.

> "If you ask a question, and no one can answer, you're at the edge of knowledge." (paraphrase)

> "In science, we don't have perfect theories, and we do just fine with successive approximations."

> In response to an offer to work for a secret government project: "I don't want my brain clogged with stuff I can't talk about."

This book is actually a great introduction to red pill thinking for teenage males, where “red pill” refers to a search for truth based on scientific principles. My 17-year-old brother read it and I believe the book did much more in inculcating him to observe, think for himself, and respect the scientific method than I could if I proselytized to him outright.

The book did lose me when trying to explain quantum electrodynamics, but that was but a small stain in a well-produced book that has only increased my respect for the late scientist. Recommended.

Why Solidarity Really Is For White Women

August 19, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

I wrote a while ago about the nature of feminism as a general expression of white western female privilege. In short, modern western feminism is a movement of well-off white Western women, by well-off Western white women and for well-off Western white women.

I was not the first to make this kind of claim, but such critiques weren't as common as I'd have expected given how obvious these realities have been. Recently (and to my great pleasure), this has been changing.

The most recent shake-up began during a debate about a certain dysfunctional hypocrite/male feminist and his recent "retirement" from the internet. A black feminist by the name of Mikki Kendall accused supporters of this retired hypocrite of being dismissive toward women of color. Said hypocrite had engaged in open attacks on women of color because of their race, but had not been reprimanded by supposedly anti-racist mainstream feminists for this. Instead, he found support among them (he was allowed to write for some of the largest feminist publications in existence), and still finds support from them even after admitting his behavior.

> So to the many people I hurt I am sorry. To the women of color I trashed in 2008, I am so sorry

#SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen was born then, and it exploded globally online as many women across the planet began to empathize. Many of the best tweets from this viral episode re-state some of the critiques I mentioned in my earlier article, but also add some interesting new ones:

As I noted in my discussion on the limits of Western feminism, Western feminists are in some ways their own worst enemy. They argue endlessly from the perspective of downtrodden victims, but few can fail to notice that they tend to disproportionately be white and well-off. It is also not easy to overlook the fact that their interests as well-off white women tend to take precedent over the interests of others who are non-white, not well-off or both.

It is also hard to miss their partaking in some of the very eurocentric/prejudicial behavior that they claim to want to avoid:

> #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen when convos about gender pay gap ignore that white women earn higher wages than black, Latino and Native men.
> — Rania Khalek (@RaniaKhalek) August 12, 2013

> #solidarityisforwhitewomen when i’m expected to support slutwalk but y’all carry on celebrating the french ban on hijabs and niqabs.
> — sanaa (@sanaa_cue) August 12, 2013 > #solidarityisforwhitewomen is when my cousins and friends are raped/assaulted on reservations and we can't get the US attorney to prosecute.

> — Coya (@coyahope) August 13, 2013

> I know #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen when NDN women can't get so much as a mention in discussions of #rapeculture
> — Mikki Kendall (@Karnythia) August 12, 2013

> #SolidarityIsForWhiteWomen when stats about sexual violence are manipulated to center white women not NDN women at the most risk.
> — Mikki Kendall (@Karnythia) August 12, 2013

One of the biggest issues that modern western feminism is going to face in the coming years relates to its own links to racism. As many of the tweets have shown, feminists have been tied to racially insensitive positions. This, among other things, is a problem for a movement seeking global influence in a world that is primarily nonwhite. Why should nonwhites support people who have shown a tendency to support and occasionally praise those who engage in openly anti-nonwhite behavior? Whether it's through the support of hypocrites like Schwyzer or open eugenicists who have not hidden their desire to actually eliminate non-white populations, feminists will have a lot to answer for.

As I noted in previous articles, cultures vary across the world. White Western (primarily Anglo) feminists dominate the feminist narrative, but the reality is that their goals differ substantially from those of many women across the globe. Not every group of women is going to have the same views on acceptable dress, the worth of traditional gender roles (which are, in some places, held in much higher esteem than they are in the West) and how to deal with issues relating to work-life balancing. Western feminists haven't done much to acknowledge this or to work these different visions of female "empowerment" into the mainstream feminist narrative, and they will pay a price for this as some respond by simply refusing to associate themselves with the movement.

The long and short of all this is simple: the affluent white Western women leading the feminist movement aren't going to be able to accomplish all that they hope to accomplish without non-white women firmly by their side. Numbers are crucial, and they are not in the wealthy white feminist's favor. As things stand, however, neither are many of the non-white women she most needs to accomplish all that she hopes to accomplish.

A Basic Glossary Of Americhick Words

August 19, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

I recently read on the BBC's website that archaeologists in early August discovered a huge cache of Mayan artifacts in a Guatemalan pyramid. Hearing this news made me wonder just what our remote ancestors, when musing over the fragments of our own civilization, might think of us and our own culture. It would be useful to provide them with some sort of word-list, or glossary, so that the dominant dialect of modern America does not become as forgotten as the bewildering catalogue of Mayan heiroglyphs. This is the dialect of Americhick.

It is the speech of the American woman, in all of its bewildering, elusive, reversible-raincoat-rhetoric glory. The importance of recording the outlines of Americhick for posterity is clear when we consider the especially shifty nature of this patois. For while most languages are meant to convey information, Americhick is meant to distort it.

Below are listed some of the most frequently used terms of Americhick. The meaning of each term is then given, as it is actually interpreted by the average, early 21st century American woman. The cookie-cutter uniformity of the Americhick personality means that this glossary will be useful in any region of the United States (the territories of Guam and Puerto Rico are excepted). Feel free to laminate a printout of this list, for handy future desk reference, if the need to decode one of these terms should ever arise.

Answer. A response to a query she wished she had been asked, rather than the one she actually had been asked.

Effort. Something not needed for any relationship. See also: (1) grooming.

Sex. Something Americhicks think they're good at, but are not.

Drama. The sum total of her life.

Attitude. A condition created when the real world does not match her fantasy.

Grooming. A concealment of incipient obesity or ugliness.

Nepotism. Getting a job on merit.

"Working the issues". A phrase interchangeable with "looking busy", used often for boasting about the same.

Self-important. An employed woman. See also: arrogant.

Logic. A mountain of jibberish concealing a pebble of fact.

Argument. Being wrong or off-point in a loud, snarky voice.

Poverty. Single-mother reality concealed by turbo-charged delusion.

Cruelty. Any attempt to impose standards, discipline, or manners on an Americhick.

Strength. A constant disposition to offend or insult.

Child. A living reminder of the Americhick carousel years.

Looking busy. Advanced attention-seeking behavior. Although it is harder to look busy than to be busy, looking busy gets an Americhick more attention, so is therefore more useful.

Validation. Electronic feel-good feedback from Facebook likes, Twitter re-tweets, friend requests, and beta male simping behavior. If validation drops below a certain level, extreme emotional distress is normally triggered.

Man. Any or all of the following: (1) A transmitter of electronic validation, (2) a bill payer, (3) an ATM machine, or (3) a host to an Americhick parasite.

Tantrum. Persuasion.

Sex. The act of coitus. But what does not "count" as sex are any of the following: (1) sex on vacation, (2) revenge sex outside a relationship when she is angry with boyfriend/husband, or (3) sex with anyone less than once per month.

Alone. The unfortunate condition of having less than 10 beta orbiters.

Loading...

Apology. Always to be received, never given. See also: respect.

Back. That part of the male anatomy in which is it most expedient to insert a knife.

Behavior. Physical actions guided by narcissism and selfishness.

Misogynist. A person holding an opinion about women or relationships that an Amerchick doesn't like. Interchangeable with: racist, sexist, elitist.

Hair. Cut it off.

Celebrity. A spiritual guide, oracle, and ideal exemplar.

Phone call. Let it go into voicemail. Picking it up would involve effort and courtesy.

Hateful. Any subject matter or topic which an Americhik doesn't really understand or makes her feel uncomfortable.

Cheap. A man who refuses to play host to her parasite.

Photo. An electronic image emitted to enhance her self-esteem. There is a proportional correlation between the quantity of emissions and the inflation of her ego. Represented mathematically by $E = kP$, where E stands for ego expansion measured in neurological feel-good feedback, P represents the volume of photos published on social media, and k is a constant.

Therapy. Session paid for by a man where she can blame her pre-scripted litany of misdeeds on the faults of others.

Abuse. A true or helpful suggestion made by a man to an Americhick more than once.

Promise. The expression of an unlikely possibility.

Flirt. Delivering snark.

Fairness. Unrestricted female privilege.

Equality. Unencumbered female privilege.

Feelings. Things she has but a man does not have.

Respect. Always to be received, never given. See also: apology.

Dialogue. A condescending, rude female monologue.

Discussion. A belligerent female monologue.

Debate. Hysterical female monologue.

Healthy weight. Overweight.

My career. My paper shuffling. See also: Looking busy.

Strong woman. Rude, disrespectful woman.

Divorce. The end of her starter marriage and the beginning of her second career, launched by the transfer of wealth from ex-husband to her.

Court. A dispenser of wealth to a woman.

Government. 1. An ATM machine. 2. Surrogate husband. See also: Court.

Patriarchy. A female excuse for failure in any endeavor.

Wife. A dependent of a husband masquerading as an equal partner.

Truth. A lie not yet discovered.

Kitchen. A room with a sink, table, and microwave, rarely visited.

Conversation. Complaining about imaginary health and beauty problems, hating on her girlfriends behind their backs, and discoursing on petty jealousies of all kinds.

Tattoo. Visible proof of conformity.

Morals. Situational and ever-changing.

So keep this list handy for quick and easy reference. I hope it helps you navigate the whirlpools and eddies of the frothy bounty that is Americhick language. Feel free to add to it based on the principle stated at the beginning of this post: to an Americhick, language is not meant to convey information, but to distort it.

Is Prostitution Good For Men?

August 20, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Recently at the RVF, someone posted a link to an AMA from a man who's banged 100 hookers. Naturally, being a forum dedicated to the pursuit of game, most men were already skeptical to the idea of paying for sex. Longtime member Fisto voiced what many players believe:

> paying for sex is one of the worst things you can ever do for you inner game/self esteem. A girl is sleeping with you as her part of a transaction, not for any real affection or even kind of liking you. If you do this, a little piece of you dies.

And yet, some RVF regulars were swayed in favor of P4P (pay for play):

> The guy at the AMA would say, "Why do you need to have a woman validate your worth by sleeping with you? Who cares if a woman likes you if you get what you want (sex) out of it?"
> If a man's self-worth is wrapped up in whether a woman is having sex for him out of "affection" or "liking," then isn't he giving women far too much power?

Fisto responds:

> I read it and I would ask him "Do you feel good about yourself when you are dishonest? Do you feel good about yourself when you don't do something you know you should? Do you feel good about yourself when you blame someone else for something even if no one finds out?"
>
> Those things are independent of outsiders opinion of you. Fucking a girl because you paid her doesn't matter to the girl, but it should matter to a man that wants to master himself and grow.
> Loading...
> He can say that all he wants, but if I looked into the dull listless eyes of some whore laying under me pretending to enjoy sex so that I'll cum soon and she can get to the next john I'd feel terrible about myself, and that's from an internal point of view independent from any external opinion.

MikeCF rejoins:

> He pays with money. You pay with time spent in the gym, time spent seducing a woman, time spent out where nothing happens (sunk costs that have to be factored in to the "cost" of a bang), time spent exchanging game times/learning game, a bar tab here and there.
> I don't do p4p and never have, but the man makes solid points and he completely changed my view on the subject.
> Everyone pays. It's just a question of the currency you're using and the cost.

The thread continues and the debate rages on. I throw in my two cents comparing hookers to sophisticated sex toys; in principle, there is no real difference between a fleshlight and a prostitute. I think it should be obvious that there is a qualitative difference between P4P and seducing a girl to fall for you.

Yet, there is something to be said to having a high quality orgasm with minimal effort involved. Time is the most precious resource, and using a ho to save time has its advantages.

What do you think? Is this a subjective debate that varies between men? Or is P4P objectively as much of a loser habit as sitting in your room masturbating all the time? Although prostitution is usually debated in terms of whether or not it hurts women, rarely do people inquire how men feel about the subject.

What Facebook Quotations Say About A Girl

August 20, 2013 | by Winston Smith | Link | Original Link

As learned masters of the western literary canon, American females will often fill their social networking profiles with useful bits of life wisdom. While these deep perspectives usually feature noted philosophers and artists, isolated banalities will occasionally slip through. You shouldn't be Facebook friends with prospects, but in case you are, this list will help you to identify landmines ahead of time.

1. "I'm selfish, impatient and a little insecure. I make mistakes, I am out of control and at times hard to handle. But if you can't handle me at my worst, then you sure as hell don't deserve me at my best." - Marilyn Monroe

Starting off with the big guns. This may be the most overused quote on the internet by crazy drama queens with delusions of grandeur. She compares her life to celebrities and cannot exercise any executive control over her insane emotions, expecting others to just "deal with it" and pick up the pieces. Conventional asshole game will get you far in the feature film of her life, but you will never be more than a supporting character. This girl can rationalize anything.

2. "It is not the critic who counts; not the man who points out how the strong man stumbles, or where the doer of deeds could have done them better. The credit belongs to the man who is actually in the arena, whose face is marred by dust and sweat and blood." – Teddy Roosevelt

This is often a favorite of quasi-motivated, if uncreative, men. Girls with this quote are likely to be desperate to prove that they can hang with males in personal and professional settings. They're often hypercompetitive and more manly than average. What does her jaw look like? Is she an aspiring lawyer? Though she may want to dominate you in bed, credit must be given for quoting an American president and not a drug-addicted movie star.

3. "Live well, laugh often, love much."

This girl is more likely to have a solid family background and reasonable head on her shoulders. The downside? Booooring. This is the one entry on this list that is a self-contained bromide in its own right, rather than due to being overused. There's also a high probability that she's fat and/or ugly. You may be better off dating this girl than the tattoo-clad bandchaser, but she is likely to be vanilla and vapid.

Loading...

4. “But we keep trying. Because you have to figure, if the world’s fattest twins can find love, there’s hope for all of us. Somewhere out there, there’s another little freak that will love us, understand us, and kiss our three heads and make it all better.” – Sex and the City

More of a mid-2000s favorite, if the girl has this dating cliché on her profile she’s at least 28 and rapidly hurtling toward the wall. Her hours spent mimicking Sex and the City have forced her to internalize the commoditization of love and eroded her ability to bond emotionally, but ironically she is still romanticizing her epic search for “the one.” As soon as she finds her “little freak to love her” she will immediately resent that he limits the grandiose lifestyle that Carrie, Samantha, and the others have convinced her she deserves. She will make a dreadful wife and mother. Prepare for the Eat Pray Love midlife ejection. Spinsterhood awaits.

5. “Boys are not worth crying over, and the one who is wont make you cry.”

A favorite among the under-25 crowd. She has been burned many times and sees herself as jaded, but secretly loves the emotional rollercoaster that comes with dating alpha badboys. There’s a reason that she’s put herself in the same situation repeatedly. She purports to want a white knight in shining armor and complains about the lack of “good guys,” but a decent-looking guy with a white collar job is as repulsive as a leper to her. You have to make her cry once in a while, or she will find someone who will.

6. “Dream as if you’ll live forever. Live as if you’ll die today.” – James Dean

There are two distinct groups who identify with this quote: the first actually lives by the quotation, which is horrifying because their low future time orientation prompts them to bang anything holding a guitar. You can identify this woman by her abundance of tattoos and her generally low-rent existence. For the second type, the life philosophy is completely aspirational: unless they would spend their last days watching reality television, browsing Facebook, and posting pictures on Instagram, their choice of quote belies an inner ennui from a life lived without purpose. Bring some actual excitement into her life and she’ll be yours.

How Can I Go Back?

August 21, 2013 | by L.D. Hume | Link | Original Link

The television series LOST featured a group of people who survived a plane crash on a mysterious island. Far far away, this island was very odd and entirely different from their lives back home. Eventually a handful of them made it home, only for the main character to realize that home was not the same anymore, and that he needed to go back to that island.

Although this show is a lot more complicated than this little snippet entails, this small portion relates in a mild sense to what I am feeling right now. I left the US for Eastern Europe on June 1st. My trip concludes in 10 days. And I have come to the realization that what I previously thought was home, where I thought I would eventually settle down, and how I imagined my domicile being set up is no longer an option. And I am not alone in this.

Why? Well, many reasons…some of which can be explained and some of which just need to be experienced. Nonetheless, here's my attempt at explaining some of them.

The Women

The most important and obvious one, especially to our readers. There have been endless articles written here and around the internet about the qualities and superiority of Eastern European women. Instead of stating the obvious femininity or the almost universal ability of every girl to cook, I'll just go through a few things that girls said, did, or were on this trip from the various countries I visited:

- Cooking me numerous dinners, from scratch
- Showing up at the airport with a cake baked for my arrival
- Wearing a dress and heels to go for a walk
- Her: "I'm 18, and you?" Me: "Early thirties." Her: "Oh! I love older men!"
- Her: "I wrote 18 on my birthday cake because I do not like being old." She turned 20.
- Her (different girl): "I don't want to be 22, I want to be 18 forever."
- Grabbing my shirt and telling me she will iron it for me
- Cleaning my entire kitchen unsolicited
- Bringing me homemade jam she and her grandmother made the day before
- Refusing to eat after 6 p.m.
- Putting away her phone during the entire date
- With the exception of one girl, being under the age of 25 as the object of my approach
- Happily meeting my sister as she walked by randomly on our first date
- Kicking me out of the kitchen when I tried to prepare lunch
- Having her friends help her get her coat, to leave with me from the club the same night I met her

- Actually caring about what I do for a living and my desires in the future

The most I got from their American counterparts in the past year was making hamburgers for dinner and ordering an extra dish of Thai from her iPhone app that delivers food to her apartment, while telling me about how Eric at work fucked Stefanie and how much of a jerk her boss is for asking her to put in some more effort. Vomit.

I know what's coming. Last year I went to Central and Eastern Europe for a month and upon my return went out to a happy hour in West Hollywood. I will never forget looking around the bar, seeing all the girls without dresses and heels on, seeing no girls that broke the 7 level, and seeing an endless sea of men waiting their turn to hit on them. I was utterly disgusted and disappointed. I cannot imagine how I will react after three months.

The Drying Machine

As you spend more time in Eastern Europe, you begin to realize that all the comforts of home are just that…comforts. They are not necessary. Is it that horrible to have to hang dry your clothes? The first few times you are left wondering why the hell they can't just have dryers in Europe too. But then you realize, what difference does an extra five minutes make in terms of hanging your clothes to dry? It doesn't. This extends to almost all comforts of home — you slowly begin to realize you don't need them.

Do I really need to have the waitress come ask me if everything is ok? No, I do not. I can wave her over when I need her.

Loading…
Do I really need a car? No, I do not. Almost all major cities here have decent if not amazing transportation systems (I realize this applies more to me as a resident of Los Angeles, than say New York).

Do I really need a happy hour? I can do without seeing coworkers or friends for a few hours after work one day, drinking beers and eating fried foods.

Can I really not walk for 10-15 minutes to get to my destination? Of course I can. You don't realize how fucking lazy most Americans are until you start walking everywhere. Only then can you appreciate how ludicrous it is when Americans try to find the closest parking spot to a store to save themselves 100 feet of walking.

Do I really need to have the espresso maker? The DirecTV subscription? The 3DTV? The BMW? The Starbucks every 5 blocks? Costco? The answer to all of these is no. We have been deluded into thinking that life is a lot more complicated than it is, morphing these conveniences into apparent necessities in order to assuage our discomforts.

The Act

I read Roosh's book regarding smiley faces and while I thought it was a great read, I couldn't really grasp its message until now. Seriously, if I want to leave a fucking smiley face why can't I? Because American girls will punish you for it. You have to act as if you don't give a shit about them at all just to start the process of moistening the vagina. The same reasoning applies to buying girls a drink, or paying for dinner, or whatever you want to use as an example. We are forced to go against ourselves as men, as the provider, in order to court efficiently. Whereas in Eastern Europe you are rewarded and respected for this behavior, as you should be.

Then there is the political correctness factor. If my true thoughts were shared on a regular basis, I would be excommunicated by most. If back when I worked at my corporate job I stated that I think women thrive in their traditional roles as caretaker of the home, that they are happier in that role, that as their weight increases and their hair length decreases so does their appeal, and that I would never hire a female employee to any position of importance, I'd be fired or at a minimum be sent to sensitivity training. Here, it is the accepted belief and would be met with a "yes of course."

Nobody Understands

Try explaining to your coworker, your friend, or your mother why you want to visit Siberia. Or why you want to live for a year in Kiev. Or why Moscow may be worth fighting through its winters. You can't. Unless they have physically visited these locations, they just have no idea. They don't know what it's like to sit at a cafe and see two girls dressed as if they are going to a wedding, drinking coffee and chatting with each other in another language. It is not possible to know what it feels like to walk up to an attractive girl, say "Hi, how are you?" and instead of their minds being trained to think this guy may be a potential creep for intruding upon 3 seconds of her day, she gets a slight twinkle in her eye and curiosity takes over, leading her to ask "where you from?" with genuine interest.

They hear the stories, but they think they are exaggerated. "Sure Law Dogger, Russian girls are that much better than Susie from Ohio. And tell me again why I should move to a city where I don't know the language, I have to specifically ask for ice, and I can't readily find a pastrami sandwich nearby? I'm fine here with my Prius and college football Saturdays."

In all honesty, who knows where I will end up or what I will end up doing. I'm still trying to figure this out myself. But one thing I do know is now when I hear a random person on the streets of Russia speaking English, I feel disgust. Not comfort.

Debating The Mighty 1-to-10 Scale

Few subjects inspire more spirited debate between men than the 1-to-10 scale—the go-to metric for rating a girl's viability as a sexual partner or arm candy. I've literally stayed up all night arguing with buddies about the theoretical underpinnings of the thing—from whether a 10 ("dime") can actually exist in nature, to the irrelevancy of the "potential-girlfriend factor," to the exact location of the barely bangable line.

I was also single-handedly responsible for having the once-great-but-now-shitty website HotOrNot blocked at my old job, when the IT department invariably realized how much a work-buddy and I would visit the site from my office computer. We'd sit there arguing for 5 minutes about whether a particular girl was a 5 or a 6, only to then discuss why after we'd arrived on a consensus. We'd then repeat the same ritual on the very next girl. This went on for entire afternoons during light days.

It seems like every few months I come across another attempt to settle the debate which, in the end, reeks of reductionism or hubris. This debate will never end because, like sports and politics, the joy is in the disagreement. Comparing women like commodities in a store display is man's ancient, god-given right, inscribed in the hand of god on the inner walls of his scrotum.

The best we can do is chart the boundaries and features of the debate and hope to arrive on a détente—that we all can live with—so we can sit back down at the desk and keep rating girls.

The Binary Solution

This is reductionism at its worst. In sum, the argument goes that "there are only two types of women: bangable and not bangable." Guys who subscribe to this belief claim to simply rate women as zeroes or ones. The laughable gaps in this logic are too easy, and numerous, to itemize. I usually just counter: that's like rating a car driveable or not driveable.

Asymptotic Theory

One of the least controversial views is that there is, in fact, no such thing as a 10. A 10, on a 1-to-10 scale, implies perfection, and most guys—particularly those with our sensibilities—soundly reject the notion of flawlessness among women. The scale goes in whole numbers (with occasional allowances for halves) until you get to 9. After that, you can approach 10, but you can never reach it. Some guys increase granularity into the tenths after 9 (e.g., 9.2), but that itself is a matter of controversy.

The Pictorial Concept

This is a novel solution that has been impressively executed by various sources. While some of the more impressive iterations use methodologies that most men can stand behind—accounting for personal taste, pegging a girl's rating to the number of "highlights" a she has, and putting pictures to black-and-white abstractions—it still suffers from an array of logical imperfections that keep it from being authoritative (e.g., an over-emphasis on factors under human control, such as makeup or hygiene, rather than a raw score).

Loading…

Extremism, Pride, and Emotion

A regrettable feature of the 1-to-10 debates is that a lot of guys succumb to emotion in their ratings, rather than producing even-handed, consistent assessments based on logic. I've seen guys reflexively rate a girl a "1!" despite the fact that, while unquestionably unattractive, she was a probably no worse than a 3. I've also see guys do the opposite, which is no less annoying: declaring a girl "a dime!" when she's no more than a 7 with an inch of caked-on makeup, high heels, and a Photoshop filter. Guys are also subject to inflate the numbers of their own catches, while holding everyone else's girls to a higher standard.

The Bangability Line

Another matter of contention is settling on the location of the barely bangable line. While I find that a majority of men (myself included) now set that line at 5, others set it as high as 7. Placing the line that high tells me that a man's scale likely suffers from inflation, with bottlenecking at the very top of the range. The implication—which is rarely true—is that he only bangs 8s and 9s.

The Embarrassment Metric

To my knowledge, I'm the originator of this framework, though I'm certain many other guys will be quick to claim it as their own. Because female beauty is a quantifiable commodity that both men and women recognize as a status symbol for the men who can capture it, people's expected reaction to a girl is as reliable a barometer as we have for objectively measuring a girl. How embarrassed—and conversely, proud—in other words, you'd be at being seen with a girl (especially by your buddies, ex-girlfriends, and haters) is the best way to determine a score.

My personal scale, which is strongly pegged to the Embarrasment Metric and Asymptotic Theory looks like this, summarized:

> 0: No Such Thing. Has a dick.
> 1: Hideously Unattractive. A monster. Disfigured or irretrievably mutilated. Has two heads, is missing an eye, etc.
> 2: Very Unattractive. Disproportionate, morbidly obese.
> 3: Unattractive. Ugly, fat, and/or old.
> 4: Almost Bangable. But definitely doesn't pass the boner test. Still not good-looking.
> 5: Merely Bangable. Barely passes the boner test. You'd be pretty embarrassed to be seen with her.
> 6: Almost Cute. She might be cute if one or two things were different, but they're not. You may not be super-embarrassed to be seen with her, but you certainly wouldn't be proud, and you definitely wouldn't willingly bring her around to anything.
> 7: Solidly Cute. Zero embarrassment, even some nascent pride in being seen with her. You could bring her to things without looking bad, or losing any of the luster on your game.

> 8: Hot-Cute. Would be straight-up proud to be seen with her and/or bring her to things. This is often the sweet spot for long-term relationship material.
> 9: Smoking Hot. This is a girl who can easily monetize her beauty. You're going out of your way to be seen with her.
> 10: Perfection. A theoretical abstraction that only exists in the laboratory.

I use halves (.5s) to achieve a little more precision. The idea is that a girl who's almost at that next level—but doesn't quite have it takes to get the rating outright—will get a .5. I'll also occasionally grant (or deduct) halves for "intangibles"—things like extraordinary sweetness (or bitchiness), a sexy vibe (or awkwardness), or a personal preference (though I'm quick to disclose the latter).

Judicious and honest application of the 1-to-10 scale is an essential part of guy talk. I doubt we'll ever fully agree but—whether you accept my version, somebody else's, or have your own exotic A-to-Z scale—strive for consistency and responsibility in your ratings.

The 10 College Commandments

It's that time of year again, the weather is getting cooler, girls are putting on underwear, college kids are eagerly anticipating a fresh semester full of partying, poon, and of course, studying. Ahem. Back in the day around 1958, when I was in college, no one wrote a guide on what to do and how to dominate college life. The closest 'guide' we had was National Lampoon's Animal House, which wasn't too bad, but was hard to access at a party when you needed information in a clutch.

Well, your generation is much luckier, besides ObamaCare and the feminization of men, but that's another story, because I'm presenting you the 10 Commandments of College, which will change your college experience forever and for the better. Study them like you would for a mid-term and you will be the Van Wilder of your campus (with good grades).

The things I would do to this slut…curse words cannot explain…

10. Study (but not too much)

Unlike Van Wilder, of course you must study, however, don't become the guy in the library every waking hour with zero social life and a pair of blue balls. College is about balance. Balancing one pair of tits while sucking on another pair. Kidding. Seriously though, it's bullshit to spend, or get loans for college to only experience the library and exam after exam. If there is one guarantee I can promise you, it's this: College is it's OWN experience. Once it's over, no matter what, life will not be the same. Enjoy the hell out of it.

Study moderately, get good grades and keep moving. If you struggle a lot with school, then give up and become a rapper or pro athlete. Kidding. Kind of.

9. Get Involved

Show me a popular man on campus and I'll show you a young cat who's involved with campus life. The stoner who hasn't left his dorm room all weekend? Not so much. Doesn't mean you have to be Mr. Gung-Ho, which in and of itself is annoying as fuck, but find out what your interests are, besides getting tragically wasted and nutting on cute co-eds cunts and put some effort out.

In order to have friends one must be friendly (or have a lot of money haha), so talk to everyone, find your niche and refrain from being a closet freak playing Xbox every fucking weekend until you have callouses on your thumbs.

This picture has nothing to do with the article but it's fucking hysterical

8. Be The Alpha In At Least 1 Group

This ties in with the 9th Commandment: Get Involved. How does one build status on campus? By being the fun partier AND the leader of one organization/school club/frat president. If your school has a Greek system and you want to rush then go ahead. I went to a Big 10 school and we had a massive Greek system. I didn't rush and still had a blast and fucked many many many sorority sluts, so don't think your life is ruined if you're not Alpha Nutus Cuntus.

The line between those who become professional partiers and the nerds are the cats who figure out that they are in the process of 3 different things at all times: 1. Coming from somewhere. 2. Doing something. 3. Going somewhere. This is a constant no matter what.

1. Coming From Somewhere: you just finished high school and now have some real freedom. Hopefully you went to school at least a few hours away so your dad can't jump in his Jeep Grand Wagoner with wood paneling and surprise your ass.

2. Doing Something Now: You're IN college. You are experiencing college right this second: every moment that happens, every good and bad experience adds up to the complete college experience. Live in the NOW to a certain extent.

3. You're Going Somewhere: You have a future and what you do now affects that. Live in the now, while also remembering that one day college will be over and the real world will kick in and with such swiftness, you'll hit the ground gripping your balls like Ben Stiller in Dodgeball.

By being the leader or president of one social group/club, you will not only build confidence as an alpha male, but you will start to garner a reputation of being 'the man' for a certain niche group. This is good and is a building block for your social value to grow from.

Yes, I'm aware 'Complain' is spelled wrong. Blame the web; not me.

7. Don't Gutter Fuck

I know it's been three weeks since you've been laid and that cuddly fat cock-slurping chick in the corner is eye-fucking you, but don't do it buddy. Once word gets out you fucked ole Margaret then good luck getting with the 8+ camp of poon and you'll be dubbed Fatty Fucker by the entire student body.

Chicks gossip, in fact, they love to gossip and by the time you pull your A&F boxers back up, ole Margaret will have Facebooked and tweeted about your little sexscapades. Especially if you are way above her level. This calls for attention whoring! An alpha male thought I was good enough to dip his cock into. Just don't. Thank me later.

Have your pick. Welcome to college. Good ole ASU never fails.

6. Don’t Be Ruled By Emotions

Average college attendee age is around 18-22, so during this transition time from adolescent into young adult, you will have varying degrees of emotions. Wow, that sounded clinical. Yawn. Point is, is that with this transition time comes events, both good and bad, that will happen to you. It’s called Life and sometimes it’s a real bitch. While college years are the best years of your life, it can also be the playground of major Class A Fuckups. I’ve seen friends fuck up and ruin their lives because they didn’t think things through well enough before responding.

Example:

You’re at a house party doing shots of Jager with a cute blonde with an ass like a bubblegum jar. Round n tight! You have to piss like a racehorse so you bounce to the bathroom only to return to see her being chatted up by Big Derek the football captain. Fuck. The Jager has you feeling invincible so you walk up and stupidly push him in the chest. “I was talking to her bruh!” Well, Big Derek faceplants you into the refrigerator (like you deserve) and now you’re slipping and sliding on the blood and loose teeth sliding around on the kitchen floor.

You decide to get even and go get a bat in your friend’s room. You walk back in and clunk Big D on the back of the head. Oops. Turns out you put Big D into a coma and now you’re facing felony assault charges and will go to prison for at least a couple of years. All over a cute blonde who’s name you forgot and not being able to control your temper. Get my drift?

I had my college bar fights and luckily didn’t get arrested or jailed, however, we live in a different age nowadays, so be a man, hold your ground, but be smart and THINK before taking action over an insult or slight. Jail isn’t as fun as college. Trust me.

5. Do Spring Break

If you want to have unbridled absolute drunken fun, then plan to go to Mexico for at least one Spring Break. Topless sluts dying for Cock N’ Cum, plenty of alcohol and enough sunburn to send you straight to Cancer Treatment Centers of America. My suggestion: There are Spring Break College Tours who will HIRE you to come for free, get paid and show other students around. Inside tip: It's NOT work; it's a fucking joke and it could very well be the best Pussy Funnel yet for you. Damn I miss college.

Note the brunette's little high-tops on the far right: instant sack drainer for me.

4. Ditch The Losers

I may sound like your Dad, but dammit it's true: You're the average of your 5 closest friends. Stop fucking around with losers who are going nowhere in there life. Become friends with the movers and shakers who will be able to set you up with jobs, loans for entrepreneurial endeavors etc. It's not high school anymore. You can start fresh. You don't owe Skinny Pete (Breaking Bad reference) a mutherfucking thing so leave him be and create a new posse of badass dudes who are tearing up campus (in a good way), and are headed down a path of success. They say that the friends who you make in college wind up being your friends for life. This tends to be very true.

3. Fuck A Lot Of Girls

College is like a buffet my friend and never is there a better playground for dipping your dick. Girls get their first taste of freedom and are ready to rip their panties off for an alpah's cock. A LOT of freshman girls have dumped their high school boyfriends for 'New Experiences', i.e. trying out new cocks and this is YOUR TIME. Stay away from the fatties and social retards, but anything that is cute, pump n dump. Do NOT get attached, trust me they aren't attached to you.

Two heads are better than one

2. Do NOT Get A Girlfriend

No matter what gentlemen, DO NOT get a girlfriend in college. Nothing will RUIN your college experience more than being tied down with a ball and chain girlfriend. Guys night drinking beers and seeing who can slam the most cans against their head? Forget it! Thursday night ladies night at the Clucky Rooster Bar chugging down $3 well drinks and ending with two fresh freshman sluts sucking your cock? Hell no! Taking off for Spring Break with no tears and pleadings to stay? Don’t even think about it!

There’s plenty of time for a girlfriend, but IT IS NOT NOW. This is YOUR time to build new friendships with your buddies, kickass in school, workout and set the framework for your body for decades to come and of course, to fuck as many college sluts as your cock can handle. Pro-Tip: It’s a lot.

1. Enjoy The Experience

College unequivocally can be an incredible experience and possibly the best time of your life. Enjoy EVERY moment and live every weekend like it's your last, minus the bat to Big Derek's head. Generally speaking, your only real responsibilities are getting good grades and making sure the shirts are folding properly at your part-time Gap job. Live it up. I did well in school graduated with a 3.6GPA and had a full-ride Law school scholarship to a Top 20 Law School, only to turn it down and in the process send my dear mother into tears. Is what it is; I don't regret it and wasn't what I wanted to do. You know what I do regret? Not partying a little harder.

In closing here's a formula which worked for me and will work for you. Write it down and post it somewhere where it's visible to you every day:

Study + Fitness + Game + Social = Best College Experience

Balance your life, do well in school, but remember, your grades is just a small part of the college experience. Don't graduate with a 4.0GPA and a 1.0LPA (Life Point Average).

The most important book you'll ever study in college and yes, I gave you cats a discount since you're college students (Enter: CollegeSluts in the PROMO box to get a fat discount) www.Nightclubbible.com

P.S. Fuck USC!

12 Essentials To Being A Great Wingman

August 22, 2013 | by Emmanuel Goldstein | Link | Original Link

“Bros before hoes” is dead. Or maybe it never existed to begin with. In truth, when you and your wingman both abide by certain rules, and have realistic expectations, there is no betrayal or disrespect of your fellow man. You will get laid more, and enjoy going out more too. Here is my twelve-fold path to wingman greatness:

1. Don’t Be A Bitch

The wingman isn’t there to go to the bathroom with you. He’s not there to cradle you in his arms after you down too many Jagerbombs. He isn’t there to approach girls and pass them onto you. The rule isn’t “fags before hags.”

You exist to facilitate your wingman getting laid, and vice versa. If you’re an impediment to getting your wingman laid, you are a failure as a wingman. Sure, he can continue to be friends with you and invite you to his barbecues and go to your bridal shower; but he will have no reason to go out on the town with you. You wouldn’t ask an emaciated girlfriend to help you move your couch, so you shouldn’t expect to wing with a man if you’re not upping his odds of getting ass.

The standard ethics don’t apply. For example, if you pick up a friend to drive somewhere, typically you’d also drop him off on the way back. But if you’re raring to take home a girl you just met at the bar, taking your friend home might mean losing the lay, that night and probably forever. There is no “if we come together we leave together” rule, because that would defeat the whole enterprise of getting laid. This isn’t disrespect or rudeness, it’s mutual sacrifice for a greater cause. It’s honoring and achieving your real, common goal.

Only men who don’t get laid fuss about being ‘ditched.’ If a man is scolding you with ‘bros before hoes,’ it’s because he’s not getting laid and he feels left out.

2. Look Sharp

Even if your wing is stylish and charming, girls are going to judge him by the company he keeps. If you're sixty pounds overweight or you wear nylon pants to the bar while your wing is svelte and suited up, girls will not only think little of you, but they will also look at your wingman with prejudice. Don't let your wingman wonder if you're actually a liability, and look sharp. A debonair wing makes you look good. His appearance does not come at your expense. The reverse holds true too - girls like to assess a man by the company he keeps. So when the girl you're flirting with sees that your wing is a cool guy too, she takes it as further proof that you are cool.

A few guys are such a force of personality that they can look like fat slobs and still bang hot girls, but they are rare. You are not that guy.

3. Learn To Fly Solo First

There are times when your company is a boon to your wingman, and there are times when it's not. You have to be ready to walk away from your wingman immediately when you cease to be of help, like when a single girl takes an interest in him. If you're not comfortable going solo, then you're going to dote on your wingman and cockblock him, because you're too pussy to leave his side. You need to be comfortable going solo for hours at a time.

4. Practice Good Rules Of Engagement

He who opens a group of girls gets to choose. If the girls express interest otherwise, switch girls. If your girl sucks, don't go and bear down on your wing and his girl – if your buddy is doing well, try and occupy your girl. It's up to you and him how long you have to run interference – if you find yourself jumping on the grenade so much you're getting fewer results, ease up and let him pick up the slack.

I once approached two Russian girls. One turned out to be bitchy, so I opted for the nice one. I brought an Australian guy along that night, and he swooped in and initially tried for the bitchy one. He quickly made the same discovery I did. Instead of plowing through or walking off, he came over to me and the girl I had, and cockblocked me into oblivion.

When your wingman does something flagrantly disrespectful, you have to call him out on it, and get his assurance that he will stop. If he continues to do it, he's simply a prick who won't change – the only solution is to stop being his wingman. I called out the Australian on his cockblocking – after he did that once or twice more, I simply stopped going out with him.

If at any time you break a rule, you make it up to him. E.g., buy his next drink or pay for his valet - 'sorry' doesn't cut it. Be generous and always get him back - like when your wing gives you a ride, you volunteer to pay for his parking. Don't wait for him to call you a cheap fuck. Otherwise, you may find him avoiding you while you have no idea why.

5. You're In The Taliban Now – Act Like It

When your wingman is talking to a single girl, there is no reason to engage him. Or her. Imagine you are in Taliban-controlled Afghanistan, and that talking to your wingman's girl will get you stoned at the next village carnival. Half of seduction is isolation – interrupt that, and you may blow the whole effort. She may start sizing you up in relation to your wingman, and decide that you're both comparable and therefore both unexceptional and not worthy of sex with her.

6. Don't Be A Pussy-Pincher

Every night in every bar in America, there is the same pattern of men cockblocking each other: two or three men are talking to one woman. This happens because they are too cowardly to part; and no one wants to 'lose' her. In reality, none of them will get her, because they're cockblocking each other continuously, preventing any one of them from getting alone with her to seduce her. I see this one constantly, and it never ceases to amaze me how clueless guys can be. The more you cling to the pussy, the less you'll have of it.

If you and your wingman find yourself in this situation, one of you must walk. Better that the one she's more keen on stays. If she hasn't made a clear choice, you can use some tiebreaker where in the event of a tie, you get say, the tall or white girls, and he gets the short or non-white girls.

7. Avoid Zero Sum Thinking

If you've ever been in business with the peoples of the world, you've gotten to experience 'zero-sum thinking' first-hand. These are the men who think they can only win by making you lose. I've seen it myself among Middle Eastern people, and I'm sure it's common elsewhere. In cultures where such thinking is prevalent, you'll even hear sales pitches invoking it – "I'm losing money by selling you a Persian rug at this price, khoobi. Please, take it."

They think that if you're not in pain, they must be losing, because there must be a winner and a loser in every transaction. They'll screw everyone short of their first cousin. A lot of men think this way when it comes to women. If you have a zero-sum mentality, you will think your wing's success comes at your expense, and you will be tempted to undermine him as a result. You will be a terrible wingman.

8. Never Disrespect Your Wing

I had a college buddy who had a nasty habit of making jokes at my expense when we'd go out. If he had made these cracks in the company of male friends, I wouldn't care. But he would do it explicitly in front of girls as if to say "hey, look how much better I am than Emmanuel!" Trash talk among men has its place. But trash talking your friend is never appropriate when you're macking random girls.

When you disrespect your friend in front of a girl, you are saying "hey, it's okay if you disrespect him too." It's like a child seeing his own parents insult each other – their attacks on each other just undermine their authority. The whole spectacle sullies everyone. Why should a girl respect your wing when she just saw you trampling all over him? And she isn't going to bang a man she spent the whole night disrespecting. When you treat your wing like a king, you convey that he must be respected. This also helps him get laid.

As a tactical matter, undermining your wing doesn't make you more attractive by comparison. Just the opposite. She may think "if he's such a loser, and you know he's a loser, why are you still friends with him? Maybe you can't do better - you must be a loser too." No matter how rude and petty a girl is, she will see your passive-aggressiveness as a sign that you're a little bitch, and treat you accordingly. Your jibes just come off as reverse-bragging, which makes you seem insecure.

More masculine men tend to trash talk a lot, and this can be a hard habit to break. Instead, team up with your wingman and tease the girls. Imagine yourself as coaches of a sports team who mold the character of their charges with some gentle verbal hazing.

9. Pimps Up, Hos Down

Young attractive women hold tremendous power to determine what is and isn't cool. Being labeled 'creepy' by a girl in front of an audience is nigh impossible to recover from. It's all a façade though. If you can make her feel that no one cares what she thinks, she will become unsure of herself, and quit being so prissy.

Considering that you're reading this site, your views about women and sex are vastly different from that of the typical girl. That'll make for interesting and contentious conversation. Maybe you baldly state that women always look better with long hair, and she starts clucking in disagreement. As your wing, I'd shoot her a patronizing look and laugh with warm condescension. Even if she doesn't outright change her mind, she will start to question herself, with her ego bruised. This also makes her easier to seduce.

All that's needed for women to stop spouting nonsense is for men to stop nodding along. Deny them their license to pronounce judgment, and their power is diminished. She may even hold her tongue in the future.

10. Isolate As Quickly As Possible

The big mixed group dynamic creates a more asexual vibe, while the time spent alone with a girl has the opposite effect. Get into a one-on-one conversation as soon as is convenient, preferably out of the ear-shot of her friend and your wingman. This doesn't mean going to the other side of the bar – just position yourselves so that conversation with the other girl and your wingman becomes difficult. Maybe your girl has a boyfriend, and her friend will cockblock you if she's still in the conversation. Distance will keep her at bay.

A lot of extroverted men have a compulsion to be the 'life of the party' and attention whore themselves at all costs. They aren't content to entertain just one girl, even though that's usually the surest route to sex. Very good looking men with charm can have a similar effect. Unchecked, these men will outshine you again and again – or even just cockblock the two of you. If you keep calling him out on it and he responds that he's 'just being social,' he is a lost cause, and should be abandoned immediately as a wing.

Good wingmen avoid this. Even if you are still right next to your wing and his girl, strive to maintain separate conversations. Both you and your wing need a chance at banging your respective girls, and this can't happen when you both keep one-upping each other. You need to give each other some distance to give yourselves both a chance.

11. Your Female Friends Are There To Be Enjoyed

Your female friends are going to have sex with someone, and it might as well be your wing. For one reason or another, you aren't banging her, and you aren't going to. Let your wing enjoy her. Provided your wing is socially well-adjusted, you should have no qualms with your wingman taking a crack at her. If you try to 'protect' a female friend from having sex, it means you have some deeper insecurity. Maybe you think men 'ruin' 'good girls,' and she'll suddenly start having casual sex when she had "never done that before." Let her make the decision, not you.

Defending the 'chastity' of an American girl is like trying to swat flies with a hula hoop – it's just not going to work, the buggers will always get through. And when your wingman sleeps with your friend ~~and gives her the gift of herpes~~, guaranteed, he will find a way to repay you. Hell, she probably will too.

Personally, I can't think of a single girl in my history that I would keep a friend from fucking, if I were still talking to her. There's going to be some reason I'm not getting with her now, so I'd have no problem with my friend having a go at her.

12. Players And Haters Don't Mix

People who aren't in the enterprise of banging female strangers just don't appreciate its inherent difficulties. You may only have one chance to bang that girl you met two nights ago, and that means canceling your plan to get drinks with your buddy. Women are especially critical – after all, there's no such thing as a man turning down sex because of 'lost momentum.' A girl doesn't have to worry about a man refusing to meet up because he had, say, gone on vacation since they had last met. This is a very real, very common risk for a man going after strange women. Personally, I say it's okay to break off a minor engagement for a first date with a girl if needed – reschedule and buy your friend a drink or lunch as a token of your apology.

However, this only applies for girls you haven't banged. If you're already banging a girl on the regular, there is no such urgency, and you should turn her down and continue with your prior engagement. Ironically, the man who isn't a player is often far worse; he'll disappear from his friends just to spend time with his girl who clearly isn't going anywhere.

Being Funny Will Get You Laid (But Not For The Reason You Think)

August 23, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

Women don't like men who make them laugh – they laugh at the jokes of the men they like. Sorry, funny guys.

There is, however, one way for a funny guy like yourself to leverage his talent into some fresh juicy vaginas. It's also a damn fun hobby – and the subject of today's post.

Stand-up is humanity's oldest art form.

Comedy clubs are new enough, but human beings have been sitting in the dark and telling each other stories since the dawn of creation. If you're looking for a creative outlet, an opportunity to teach men in your community about Red Pill ideas, or just another way to get your dick wet, here are three reasons why you should sign up for an amateur night in your city right now.

Comedy will get you laid

Amateur nights are mostly filled with socially awkward nerds, AKA stand-up comedians and their friends.

But hot girls dig comedy too, and you can't go wrong when you're on a stage in front of them with a microphone. Fame will get you laid.

Comedy (and any other sort of fame game) also give you most effective number close line ever: "You should come check out my show."

Comedy also gives you a plethora of great topics to launch into at any point in the seduction process. Talk about the nature of performing in front of a crowd ("It's a lot of pressure, you're up there in front of everyone and they're hanging on every single word and movement") and give her a nice intense visualization of your high status. Run some Krauser-style Intellectual Mastery Game, and get deep into the nature of humour, and the biological evolution of our ability to perceive it.

When you tell women (or men for that matter) you're a comic, you are setting them up for an incredibly obvious shit test: "Tell me a joke!" The best way to knock it out of the park is to use Norm Macdonald's moth joke. Used correctly – make them really pry it out of you – that joke is Shiva, conqueror of rooms.

Comedy will tighten up your game

Loading...
Stand up comedy and seduction are very similar.

Crafting a stand-up act is more than just memorizing words. A comic has to script every second of tonality, inflection, body language, and facial expressions. Practicing comedy forces a man to observe himself, and improve every aspect of his communication. Sound familiar, pick-up artists?

Stand-up will also give you lots of opportunities to watch yourself on video. For men whose social skills need work, this will be an extremely valuable and painful experience.

Comedy is heresy

Among the many illnesses afflicting the progressive mind, its dreadful seriousness is the most painful to observe. Can you even picture a feminist with a sense of humour?

But laughter comes easy to honest and politically incorrect gentlemen such as ourselves. Stand-up is a fun and effective way to rub the noses of brain-dead leftoids in the stupidity of their beliefs.

If you were to see my act, you would instantly recognize the influence of the Red Pill. Big stars like Joe Rogan, Hannibal Burress, Patrice O'Neal and above all, the great Bill Burr – whether they read Heartiste, Roosh and Thumotic or not – have stumbled across the same glitches in the matrix as us, and have probably had ten times as much success in bringing those ideas to the masses. As Oscar Wilde said:

> "If you want to tell people the truth, make them laugh, otherwise they'll kill you."
> – Oscar Wilde

Signing up for an open mic is usually simple enough. You'll probably get a six-minute set. Put the time in to write, re-write, and re-re-write your jokes, then rehearse the shit out of it. If you're naturally funny and you prepare, you'll probably at least have an OK set and get a few laughs. You'll have fun. Your friends will think you're hilarious.

If you're serious about it, stand-up comedy is a tough business to make real money in, but because of the importance of frequent live shows in small venues, it supports a lot more paid work then many other art forms.

So what do you say, champ: Do you want to have some fun, get some girls, and kick sand in the eyes of an unworthy ruling elite? Grab that mic.

The Best And Worst Nationalities of Women (According to Google)

August 23, 2013 | by RioNomad | Link | Original Link

After a RVF thread surfaced showing how terrible even Google thinks American women are, I got curious as to what it had to say about other nationalities of women.

The results….not so shocking, though they are hilarious.

Let's get this party started with the RVF's favorite pastime, bashing American chicks.

Spoiled, masculine, big, entitled, selfish, loud, boring, worthless, unhappy, whorish and cunty…..I may have made the last two up, but I'm certain they are numbers 10 and 11 on the list.

Why would any man subject themselves to women like this? Well, many are stuck in the US, so they don't have a whole lot of choice. Others are so god dammed thirsty they actually find these traits attractive. Either way, American women are the only nationality of women I could find that didn't have a single positive quality.

Fuck yeah, America.

Moving on….

Oh, black women (yes, I know that isn't a nationality, but the results were too good to leave out), I guess our dark skinned brethren at the RVF are right on the money about you. Overweight? Check. Rude? Check. Loud? Check. Angry, masculine and bitter? Check, check and check.

They do get a hit for being beautiful, which I will get on board with. Black women can be very beautiful, assuming they don't mirror the adjectives listed above.

Black women may rejoice at being described as "sassy", but we all know that really just means bitchy, and no one likes an overweight, loud, bitchy woman, unless your name is Dan Conner.

Next up to bat…Russian women.

Tall, blonde and beautiful ice queens. Appears to be a fitting description from the Russia and FSU trip reports I've read. They also apparently have great fashion sense, which goes hand in hand with Google describing them as materialistic.

If you can handle some cold shoulders and a wee bit of gold digging, Russian women just might be for you.

Lets move on to some Latinas, and see what they have in store for us with the Brazilians and Mexicans.

Well, Brazilian women sure come off well in the eyes of Google. Aside from a bit of jealousy, which is easily made up for with that whole thing about them being easy, there isn't a negative trait on the list. Good in bed, gorgeous, thin and pretty all sit just fine with me. No problem overlooking some jealousy issues in exchange for that.

No wonder so many black American men are hopping the next jet plane down to Rio De Janeiro.

Mexican women don't stack up so well against their Brazilian sisters to the south, however they are still miles ahead of American women. That's kind of like bragging about beating up the retarded kid at school though.

Loading...

Getting slammed for being mean and rude right out of the gate is a bit tough, and I'm on the fence how I feel about them being fertile, since I am not ready to have any little Mexican babies running around. Beautiful, attractive and pretty are great ways to be described though, so Mexican women definitely got something going for them.

Ok, let's head across the ocean over to my personal stomping grounds, Asia.

Although I am no expert in Japanese women, Google's results seem to be pretty consistent with what I know about them. Skinny, small, feminine, attractive, subservient, etc. Childish seems to fit, if the number of Japanese girls I see over here running around with little kid backpacks on is the norm.

I was a bit thrown off by loud though. The more I think about it, the more that must be a trait of Japanese-American women. The Japanese girls I see here in Bangkok are the exact opposite of that. Maybe people got them mixed up with those rude-ass Chinese tourists?

Anyway, moving on to what I know best, Thai women.

Google nearly got it right with Thai women. Thailand is definitely a country full of thin and attractive women. Along with feminine, those are probably the three best adjectives to describe them.

I gotta disagree with them being good in bed however. It's not that they are bad in the sack, but normal Thai women are very reserved, so they won't be screaming for you to stick your fingers in precarious places too often.

The whole Thai women all being prostitutes stereotype is to be expected. The fact is most men who come to Thailand end up paying prostitutes or dating bottom of the barrel Isaan chicks. Western women who come here also absolutely loathe Thai women. They are basically everything they want to be, but will never admit. The fact that western women can't hardly give it away out here only adds to their frustration towards Thai women.

I had two female friends from back home stop off in Bangkok for a week while they were traveling. After an entire night of Thai women bashing (and me throwing a little gasoline onto the fire as well) such as, “Thai women are too skinny”, “They all look like little kids”, and “Guys who like me would never like girls like them” it resulted in two overweight white women doing crunches at 9AM on my living room floor.

Let’s shoot back over to the Anglo sphere and wrap this bad boy up with some bad teeth and bad attitudes.

English and Irish women seem to suffer from mostly the same character flaws as American women. Though, they do get beautiful and hot thrown in there as well. I'm not sure if this is actually the case, or if Google is mistaken by US searchers whose only contact with British women is via movie stars such as Elizabeth Hurley and Keira Knightely. Either way, stuck up, rude, angry, fussy, annoying and cold are far too much to put up with just for an aesthetically pleasing piece of ass.

Well, that's enough Google searching and white women bashing for this week. Off to meet my Isaan girlfriend at Nana Plaza and give her 10,000 baht for her family's sick buffalo. Cheers.

Worked To Death

August 24, 2013 | by Western Cancer | Link | Original Link

> There is no room for passion in the routinized settings which provide us with security in modern social life. Yet who can live without passion?

Back when I was in school I met countless guys who were typical “Type A” personalities. They wanted to be the best, they wanted to dominate, and they wanted nothing more than to win. These were guys like Moritz Erhardt, the investment bank intern who quite literally worked himself to death in the pursuit of success. Passion for riches burning brighter than the sun in the peak of summer; Erhardt sold his mind and body for a £45,000 salary.

My faculty was full of med students, and I dated a few girls who wanted to be high power lawyers making 100k a year. Aside from material wealth the students wanted the prestige associated with their dream profession. The status of a prestigious job and their dream salary is their drive.

I once challenged the hopeful lawyer whom I dated. I asked her why she wanted to go into law. She said “the money and the power.” I asked her what she would do with the money and the power and she said she would live in a 16th floor apartment overlooking the ocean. She’d be able to see both the sun set and the sun rise. She’d see the clouds roll in on quiet days and fireworks from celebrations. She wanted to eat out every night and never have to cook. To try the trendiest cocktails and wear the newest dresses. Hopefully one day she would find herself a rich man to call her husband. She described how they would meet in a quiet lounge, how he would swoop her off her feet and treat her right.

I smirked mischievously and asked her how shes going to find her dream man if she's holed up in a dingy office for 80 hours a week until the stress mars her beauty, until she's played the game of office politics so long she doesn't know who she truly is anymore. She furrowed her brows and said not to talk bad about her dream. Her dream of status and a salary.

One of my best guy friends was a med school hopeful. He studied hours every day and quite frequently missed out on nights out with the guys. He failed to get into med school because his volunteer work was sub par and he only got a 91% average. He'd given up all the fun nights and all the beautiful girls that come with a university education for the hopes of status and a salary. He had to settle for second best and go to a different med school. He wanted to be an anesthesiologist because they call the shots in the O.R. plus they have the most status and the highest salary.

Loading...

Whenever I pried I never got a straight answer as to why these people were willing to give up the wealth of their youth for the riches of the future. The girl never wanted to be a lawyer because she respected the law. The guy never wanted to be a doctor because he loved humanity and wanted to help all he could. They just wanted status and a salary.

I don't know the intricacies of the medical field, law firms, or investment banking firms, but I do know that you start at the bottom, have to take shit and supplicate your way to the top. Like every aspect there is a game to be played, people to manipulate and people to please. These people will hit 30 years old and will be making their dream salary, but will not have the internal value to enjoy the fruits of their labor. I do acknowledge there are some who are born to play this game, they "get it" when it comes to that life path, they are the ones who succeed, but out of 100 guys there is only one winner. The rest will have spent some of the best years of their lives working to please their superiors, while guys with a concrete sense of self worth are making love to beautiful women the world round.

> "Its a sad state of affairs when we can't spare a moment to make our lives worth living. With the constant pressures of success and the crippling fear of failure keeping us numb the greatest achievement that we'll ever know is the realization that we have the time."

I'll leave you with a quote by Krauser, who said it best and I ask you: Is it worth it?

> For as long as you focus on external value you'll remain Provider Chump. For as long as you are climbing the greasy pole of social elevation you'll have a chip on your shoulder. When you have internal value, Personal Charismatic Value, you need nothing more than the shirt on your back. YOU are the value. To the people in your life that is real value.

You Don’t Have To Be Right

August 24, 2013 | by RedPillSchool | Link | Original Link

In the world of feminism, if there’s one thing I’ve learned it’s that you don’t have to be right to declare a set of beliefs. You see, in this new era of post-modern discourse, the only important thing that you need in order to stake a belief is feelings — emotions.

I see it every day- in colleges, on television, and in the news: Science and objective reality come second to subjective experience and the self. Want to see a news report about rape? It’s not authentic unless there’s a rape victim doing the speaking.

I’m the head moderator of the reddit forum: TheRedPill, and though we’re young, I’ve already watched over or participated in countless thousands of debates on just about any subject: rape, marriage, relationships, religion, politics, science, even philosophy.

Without fail, whenever a debate happens, there is a clash of these differing debate styles. It begins with two people making their claims and providing their respective supporting evidence… but it ends when the victim arrives with the unquestionable wisdom that only their experience can bring.

“You see, the reason pickup artistry is rape….” the rape victim will lead with their conclusion, “…is because I have been raped, and I know how easy it is to be raped.”

This bit of reasoning wouldn’t hold up to any scrutiny 50 years ago, but as our culture has grown more and more hyper-sensitive to victimhood, it has now been elevated to default status in women’s studies courses world-wide. Your feelings on and relationship to a subject are now just as relevant as any fact, in fact more so.

Since TheRedPill resides on a primarily liberal site, we’ve become no strangers to trolls and haters: a self-proclaimed forum of “blue pillers” who adamantly disagree with anything the masculine bloggers write, and certainly everything that men discuss between themselves. The tell-tale mark of these so-called “blue pillers” is their adherence to post-modern discourse.

What strikes me about this is that their entire mantra is that the people who read and visit these blogs, forums, and books are inherently manipulative, mistaken, abusive, and most importantly: wrong.

How these men have decided to live their lives, what goals they’ve made for themselves, and what personal beliefs they maintain are all presumed wrong.

Loading...

And sure enough, we've seen every type of shaming tactic they can throw at us. "Man-children, peter-pans, boys, insecure children, sociopaths, assholes, rapists…" We've heard them all.

At the core of their belief system, these men that are going their own way are wrong. They have to be wrong– in their thought processes, in their conclusions, in their observations, and even in their experiences. Wrong, wrong, wrong, wrong! And boy do the fembots and white knights ever spend a lot of time trying to convince everybody of just that.

They must be forgetting something: the very lesson that our fem-centric society taught us! We don't have to be right.

It doesn't matter how much men are shamed. In fact, that makes men stronger in their beliefs.

It doesn't matter how much men are taxed. In fact, that makes men stronger in their actions (or inactions).

It doesn't matter how much men are told they're wrong. Because they don't have to be right.

I don't speak for everybody, and I know that the "manosphere" is loosely knit and widely varied. This aside, there is still a common theme– a sort of brotherhood network of idea and philosophy sharing. If these ideas, blogs, forums and people are the fabric of the manosphere, then the thread tying us all together is our discontent.

In the words of Rollo Tomassi:

> "You cannot negotiate Desire."

Truer words have never been spoken. I can't reason a woman into loving me any more than she can convince me to be happy with the status quo.

Every day I wake up to another group of people and another group of posts all trying to prove the same thing: Men going their own way or embracing game are wrong. But that doesn't matter. All that matters is that we are discontent and taking actions to rectify these problems. I mean, we are talking about emotions here, feminism, we don't have to be right.

In related news, the mods of TheRedPill just recently launched our new site: puerarchy.com to address this so-called movement of men who aren't manning-up. Check it out.

Why The Past Is Best Left In The Past

August 25, 2013 | by Charles Wickelus | Link | Original Link

The Twilight Zone is one of my favorite shows. It was created by Rod Serling. It is cerebral, perceptive & well-written. Unlike the hot garbage of today's TV shows, it was and is the intellectual counterweight to vapidity in TV media.

One of my favorite episodes – second to the whimsical episode "The Hunt" – is the episode "Walking Distance." You can watch the episode online here. Well-written, excellent acting and a beautiful score really bring this tale together. It is about a 36 year-old executive named Martin Sloan. Burnt out from the rat-race of the corporate world, he seeks to return to the idyllic world of his childhood.

One day, while driving in the country, disgruntled & frustrated, his car breaks down and while stopping to have it fixed, he wanders to the local town and finds out it is very much like his hometown. In fact, he discovers he has time-traveled to his past in his hometown.

Martin wanders around in a state of child-like wonder, revisiting his past with eyes wide-open. The people of his past regard him with suspicion. He cannot connect with his former self as a child and his parents refuse to believe his story that he is their child from the future. He comes across as insane.

The climax is when Martin confronts his former self on a carousel ride. He pursues his former self so badly that he falls off the ride, permanently disabling his leg. Martin immediately notices he has limp now, too. His father confronts him, telling him it is inappropriate to bother his former self. It is his summer, his life. You had your chance to enjoy your childhood, now let him. He suggests that nostalgia isn't what he needs – he needs to focus on his future & search for happiness in the present.

The episode ends with a beautiful soliloquy by Rod Serling:

> Martin Sloan, age thirty-six, vice-president in charge of media. Successful in most things but not in the one effort that all men try at some time in their lives—trying to go home again. And also like all men perhaps there'll be an occasion, maybe a summer night sometime, when he'll look up from what he's doing and listen to the distant music of a calliope, and hear the voices and the laughter of the > people and places of his past. And perhaps across his mind there'll flit a little errant wish, that a man might not have to become old, never outgrow the parks and the merry-go-rounds of his youth. And he'll smile then too because he'll know it is just an errant wish, some wisp of memory not too important really, some laughing ghosts that cross a man's mind, that are a part of the Twilight Zone.

When re-watching the episode, the episode has a kind-of dreamlike, off-kilter feel to it, like Kanye's song "I Wonder." It is extremely personal & might be one of the most honest episodes Serling wrote. Two themes present themselves: The soul-crushing pressure of the modern workplace and the nostalgia for youth lost.

The modern workplace is even more fraught with pressure than the 1950's. With females now subjecting the workplace to their issues and bullshit it is even more a minefield for the average man. Longer hours, less pay and more bullshit sliding down from corporate heads. More senseless government intervention that results in people having to do mindless, soul-crushing work to slake the thirst of some bureaucratic drone.

Loading...

For men, the pressures of the sexual marketplace, student loans and politically correct society do nothing to alleviate the pressure of modern society. Problems of self-delusion, obsession with video games and drug abuse make sense on some level. Not healthy, but are ways of coping with the untoward demands of society. Coupled with poor socialization of boys that leads them to be simps, men are lonelier than ever.

Which feeds into nostalgia. Like Martin, some men think that if they could just return to their youth or the past historically. The problem with that is the past is just that – the past. It belongs to someone else. Martin's dogged insistence on getting attention in the past speaks to his loneliness & disillusionment with the present. His father recognizes this and advises him to search out for happiness in his life – it is out there if you so wish to pursue it.

Nostalgia, here, is a form of not dealing with your problems in life head-on. We all get it from time to time, but the healthiest thing to do is cherish your memories while actively seeking to better your reality. Martin, here, has to learn a very tough lesson, as he crippled himself before he came to terms with this lesson.

[image]

In a way, it is selfish and narcissistic. Unable to comprehend, at first, that this particular summer he is idolizing isn't his reality anymore, it takes actively hurting someone – who is himself in the past – before he realized his error.

Disillusionment with reality is nothing new. However, what defines you is how you deal with it. Do you take it head-on and actively make your life better? Or do you sink into depression, medicating yourself with drugs & pornography? Like in American Beauty, the character of Lester was partially upset at himself because he was such a huge pussy for most of his life. He wasn't a man, but a person who got life dictated to him, by his job, by his wife and even his daughter.

While I can only speculate as to Martin's home life, it is clear he feels put upon by his professional life. However, he learns that is up to him to make his life better and not pine away for a past that is long gone.

Which is the point of the episode. You may have treasured memories in your past, but you have to treat them as such – history. I have serious blue-pill friends in my life, but I have distanced myself from them because I am bettering myself and their naivete and immaturity doesn't rub me the right way.

It is sad as you never want to see friends leave, but sometimes it is necessary. That is a part of life which Martin exemplifies. Learning that he has to make changes in his life so he can enjoy life, he leaves a better man. His wistful smile at the shows that he realizes his nostalgia is just an errant wish, a laughing ghost that reminds him he has had good memories in his life. The smile also shows he understand that his past is in the past. It doesn't do him any good to pine away for that – healthy men actively seek to better their lives in the present.

Sponsor ROK For One Month

August 25, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

ROK has established itself to an extent that it's now prudent to think of its long-term longevity. Since it has launched, I have funded ROK from my own pocket, but the site's growth and puny income has started to make me blink when paying monthly expenses, which consists of hosting and modest compensation to writers. In other words, ROK needs money.

Today I'm introducing Sponsorships. It's a way for one individual or company to sponsor the site for an entire month. It includes several sponsor message placements. Click here to learn more. Rich men are welcome to be a patron saint and take up a sponsorship even if they don't have a product to sell.

For those readers who want to contribute a small amount, I will be unveiling a Tip Jar page in the next week or two.

The Enjoyment Of Pleasures

August 26, 2013 | by Quintus Curtius | Link | Original Link

The student of philosophy often finds himself navigating perilous waters. Some of the great writers in the field, ancient and modern, were depressing or abnormal men, who consoled themselves in their solitude by spinning spider-webs of metaphysics or raising elaborate edifices of rhetoric. Others conduct forays into opaque logic-chopping, and still others take refuge in sanctimonious moralizing. In all this confusion, it is refreshing finally to find a philosopher who is wise enough to try to be happy.

Aristippus of Cyrene (c. 435-356 B.C.) was a pupil of Socrates who found it expedient to leave Athens after the execution of his teacher. He apparently incurred the wrath of his fellow students Plato and Xenophon for not participating in Socrates's bedside vigil before his death. Well-built, handsome, and socially adept, he became popular in the city of Cyrene (located on the coast of North Africa) and eventually founded his own influential school of philosophy there.

His philosophy was frankly sensualist and material. All that we do, he claimed, is structured around seeking pleasure and avoiding pain; thus, pleasure is the ultimate good, and the goal of philosophy should be to find ways of experiencing pleasure within healthy boundaries. The wise man should put a greater emphasis on physical and material pleasures than intellectual or moral ones, since tomorrow is uncertain, and we can only be assured of the present. He who has mastered the art of enjoying pleasures without endangering his health or safety can best be called wise, not the self-denying ascetic crouching in a cave. Enjoyment of pleasures, though, should never extend so far that one becomes enslaved by their pursuit: "I possess", he famously said, "but I am not possessed".

Although he eventually became wealthy and moved among the aristocratic classes, as he had known poverty previously, and was famous for having borne both conditions with dignity and grace. He was the first of Socrates's pupils to charge fees for giving instruction to others, and made no apology for doing so. He cared little for the opinions of others, frequently laughed at authority and laws, and openly cohabited with a beautiful and well-known courtesan named Lais.

The true wise man was not the narrow-minded bookworm, but that man who had known a variety of sensual pleasures and was able to assert his mastery over them. Diogenes Laertius, in his Lives of the Philosophers, tells many anecdotes about his wit and wisdom, of which the following are my favorites ("he" below refers to Aristippus):

When he was spat on by King Dionysius I of Syracuse (in whose court he worked), someone asked him how he could endure such abuse. He replied, "If fishermen let themselves be drenched with seawater in pursuit of fish, should not I also endure a wetting to spread wisdom?"

Diogenes (a rival) was once washing dirt from his vegetables, saw Aristippus walking by, and scoffed at him, saying, "If you had learned how to make these part of your diet, you would not have paid court to kings." To which he replied, "And if you knew how to associate with men, you would not be washing vegetables."

When he was once asked what he gained from philosophy, he said, "The ability to feel at ease in any society."

When he was once asked what advantage philosophers have, he replied, "Should all laws be repealed, we will go on living as we do now."

When King Dionysius once asked him why philosophers go to rich men's homes, while rich men do not visit philosophers, he replied that "the one know what they need, while the other do not."

Loading...

When he was asked how the educated differ from the uneducated, he replied, "Exactly as horses that have been trained differ from untrained horses."

When he once visited the house of a courtesan with one of his students, the pupil became embarrassed. Aristippus said, "It is not going in that is dangerous, but being unable to go out."

When someone remarked that philosophers were always seen at rich men's homes, he said, "So, too, doctors attend to those who are sick, but no one for that reason would prefer being sick to being a doctor."

He once said that he did not take money from his friends for his own use, but to teach them upon what objects their money should be spent.

Being asked what was the difference between the wise man and the unwise man, he said, "Dress them both in the plainest, simplest clothing, and send them among strangers. Watch them, and you will know."

To one man who boasted that he could drink a great deal without getting drunk, Aristippus replied, "And so can a mule."

To those who criticized him for keeping house with the courtesan Lais, he replied, "I have Lais, not she me; and it is not abstinence from pleasures that is best, but mastery over them without ever being ruined."

When a courtesan once told him that she was bearing his child, he replied, "You are no more sure of this than if, after running through a thicket of thorn bushes, you were to say that you knew which branch had pricked you."

Someone once criticized him for taking money from King Dionysius at the same time that Plato had published an excellent book. “Well”, he said, “I want money, and Plato wants books.”

In our final judgment, there is much good to be found in Aristippus’s philosophy. His doctrines had the shortcomings of any belief system that made no appeal to man’s need for the supernatural. Are we really certain that people exclusively structure their lives around the pursuit of pleasure and avoidance of pain? And does not such a sensual view of the world invite all sorts of abuses by immature or undeveloped minds? Can such a philosophy provide consolation to us in our grief, tribulations, and struggles?

Man needs myths, gods, and rituals to inspire him; and Aristippus was able only to offer a purely moral code. In this respect, his vision suffered from the same defects as Stoicism and Epicureanism. Nevertheless, his influence was considerable. His school continued on after him, and was gradually incorporated into the surging tide of Epicureanism which was to arrive after his death.

In response to his critics, Aristippus would argue that he never advocated for unrestrained hedonism, but only for the balanced enjoyment of select pleasures. The goal of life, he believed, was to juggle enjoyment while avoiding ruin. Like any good promoter, some of his statements seem to have been deliberately intended to rile up his opponents.

Despite obvious faults, his teaching was an honest attempt to bring philosophy down from the rarefied Platonic clouds and back to the hurly-burly of real life. And if practicing what one preaches is the final measure of a man, Aristippus must be counted among the most sincere philosophers of antiquity. He was beloved by many, scolded by few, and hated by none.

According to one historian, he believed the most inspiring sight in the world was the spectacle of a virtuous man pursuing his goals in the midst of wicked people. Who among us can find fault with this verdict?

Why Americans Hate The Oldest Profession

August 26, 2013 | by Athlone McGinnis | Link | Original Link

Few nations have had a more complex relationship with prostitution than the USA. Desire isn't the issue. Prostitution enjoys plenty of demand in the United States, just as it does almost everywhere else. America's puritan past, however, has helped to prevent prostitution from attaining much legal standing in the States, and a culture of intense shaming has also come to surround the act.

Recent events in Nassau County, NY have highlighted these realities:

> The district attorney in upscale Nassau County, New York, has unleashed civil strife by posting the names and pictures of 104 men arrested in a prostitution sting over the last six weeks.
> 'Operation Flush the Johns' on Long Island nabbed young men and old men, lawyers, doctors, engineers, teachers, college professors and students.
> All of them set up dates to meet with prostitutes at local a hotel using the classified ads site backpage.com.
> District Attorney Kathleen Rice said police started a sting operation in April after receiving numerous complaints about prostitution at hotels across the county.

The ringleader is this woman, Kathleen Rice, a 48 year old district attorney with no significant other and no children. I know — shocker.

This story reveals important realities that all men should be aware of when it comes to this topic. Firstly, it must be understood (and is made clear by this story) that America has no sympathy for “the John”. America’s puritan roots are still very powerful and they have now grown to merge with new feminist ideas portraying prostitution as a tool of oppression and/or the patriarchy. That is not a good mix.

Yes, the woman leading this public shaming charge is of precisely the breed we would expect: she’s intensely career focused, bullish, childless and on the wrong side of 40. She’s basically a real-life version of the cat-lady caricature that many of us refer to.

Her efforts, however, are only possible because she lives in a culture where prostitution is put in a particularly negative light.

Think about what is being done here: dozens of men who have merely been charged with a crime (and are supposed to be innocent until proven guilty) have been paraded out in public by the government in a bid to further shame them. The state is essentially putting on a show just to make an example of them.

Many criminals have their pictures released and put on the evening news or wherever, but how many have the state go out of their way to make a show and spectacle out of their predicament? Think of how many gang members and white collar criminals are caught having stolen, laundered, embezzled millions, or ended lives. How many men are arrested for these crimes as well as robbery, assault, or abuse?

Loading…

The answer is plenty, many of them are caught in stings. But how many of them do you see paraded around in spectacles like this with catchy names like “Operation Flush The John”?

The answer is next to nil. So, why is it that these kinds of operations are receiving so much of the state’s money and attention in a land where violent crime is rampant and formerly unpardonable sins like abortion and gay marriage are finding increasingly wide acceptance?

1. Puritanism: America is a land founded by uptight religious zealots and largely shaped by their minds, their culture and their will. There are not a lot of western nations in which prostitution remains explicitly illegal. America remains one of the more prudish western societies in many ways because of its much closer ties to religious fundamentalism.

Puritans had a very hard time coming to terms with their sexuality and/or finding much joy in it, and those who inhabit the society they built still harbor some of those traits.

2. The Feminine Imperative: Consciously or subconsciously, many women recognize the damage that legalized prostitution can do to the feminine imperative. Women are already concerned about "Where All The Good Men Have Gone" and the growing propensity for dudes to opt out of marriage in their 30's/40's when many women are hoping to opt in. It is likely that, were prostitution legal, a substantial number of those bachelors would avail themselves of said services and perhaps further close themselves off to the idea of a serious relationship. Dragging men out of bachelorhood could, in the aggregate, become more challenging with safe, regulated and legalized prostitution in the picture.

The man today who is not particularly relationship oriented but could be swayed by a persistent woman would be even harder to catch. Powerful men of the "Mr. Big" variety (the kind that most women spend their days dreaming of settling with) would be in a particularly strong position, one that would not be too appealing to a) the women they may already be dating/married to (stepping out for a quick paid fling would become less of a risk) and b) the women that hope to lock them down (these men will have even fewer reasons to find spaces in their usually full schedules for a relationship with the more efficient paid option available).

In short, prostitution would severely undercut the leverage that American women have over men in their relationships. Women are intelligent—they know this, and act accordingly. Their disproportionate political weight ensures that the state will give them what they want.

Any change in prostitution's status in the USA would require a restriction of the feminine imperative and/or a softening of American Puritanism. Until that day comes (and it is a long way off), expect the Kathleen Rice's of the world and their shaming to rule the day.

The End Result Of Social Equality Is Tyranny

August 27, 2013 | by Sam Seau | Link | Original Link

Kurt Vonnegut Jr., a famous author and avowed socialist, also happened to pen a very clever critique of social equality. In the short sci-fi story Harrison Bergeron, Vonnegut portrays a world where technology is used to make sure everyone is the same. For example, the beautiful must wear masks, the fast must wear ball bearings, and the intelligent must wear loud speakers that blare relentless noise into their ears every so often in order to disrupt any complex thoughts.

> George and Hazel were watching television. There were tears on Hazel's cheeks, but she'd forgotten for the moment what they were about.
> On the television screen were ballerinas.
> A buzzer sounded in George's head. His thoughts fled in panic, like bandits from a burglar alarm.
> "That was a real pretty dance, that dance they just did," said Hazel.
> "Huh" said George.
> "That dance-it was nice," said Hazel.
> "Yup," said George. He tried to think a little about the ballerinas. They weren't really very good-no better than anybody else would have been, anyway. They were burdened with sashweights and bags of birdshot, and their faces were masked, so that no one, seeing a free and graceful gesture or a pretty face, would feel like something the cat drug in. George was toying with the vague notion that maybe dancers shouldn't be handicapped. But he didn't get very far with it before another noise in his ear radio scattered his thoughts.

The story continues with imaginings of what a world where everyone is equalized would look like. The reader is unable to sympathize with the characters however, because the characters themselves are unable to feel sadness. However, the reader isn't aware of this fact before he is presented with the genius of Harrison Bergeron who escaped from jail but made his way to national television.

> Clanking, clownish, and huge, Harrison stood – in the center of the studio. The knob of the uprooted studio door was still in his hand. Ballerinas, technicians, musicians, and announcers cowered on their knees before him, expecting to die.
> "I am the Emperor!" cried Harrison. "Do you hear? I am the Emperor! Everybody must do what I say at once!" He stamped his foot and the studio shook.
>
> Loading…
> "Even as I stand here" he bellowed, "crippled, hobbled, sickened – I am a greater ruler than any man who ever lived! Now watch me become what I can become!"
> Harrison tore the straps of his handicap harness like wet tissue paper, tore straps > guaranteed to support five thousand pounds.

> Harrison's scrap-iron handicaps crashed to the floor.
> Harrison thrust his thumbs under the bar of the padlock that secured his head harness. The bar snapped like celery. Harrison smashed his headphones and spectacles against the wall.
> He flung away his rubber-ball nose, revealed a man that would have awed Thor, the god of thunder.
> "I shall now select my Empress!" he said, looking down on the cowering people. "Let the first woman who dares rise to her feet claim her mate and her throne!"
> A moment passed, and then a ballerina arose, swaying like a willow.
> Harrison plucked the mental handicap from her ear, snapped off her physical handicaps with marvelous delicacy. Last of all he removed her mask.
> She was blindingly beautiful.

I won't spoil the ending of the story here, but instead make a remark on the nature of equality. There is an old Christian quote that goes, "For what shall it profit a man, if he shall gain the whole world, and lose his own soul?" Likewise, I would ask to those who believe in equality, "For what shall it profit society, if it should eliminate injustice, and lose everything great?"

> George came back in with the beer, paused while a handicap signal shook him up. And then he sat down again. "You been crying" he said to Hazel.
> "Yup," she said.
> "What about?" he said.
> "I forget," she said. "Something real sad on television."
> "What was it?" he said.
> "It's all kind of mixed up in my mind," said Hazel.
>
> "Forget sad things," said George.
> "I always do," said Hazel.

3 Supplements That Will Make You Smarter

August 27, 2013 | by Frost | Link | Original Link

Most of us are taking supplements that improve our physical performance: Protein, Creatine, Fish Oil, Apple Cider Vinegar, and Zinc. All that good stuff.

But our cognitive function is a much more important factor in our happiness and success in life. Bicep peaks and deltoid seperation are nice, but the ultimate determinant of what you earn, what you accomplish, and what you leave behind in this life, is based upon your ability to think.

If you're interested in a deep dive into the world of supplements and habits that have the potential to expand your cognitive abilities, there are a variety of resources linked in this post. What follows is a quick and dirty introduction to three safe, effective, and easy-to-procure smart drugs — Nootropics:

1. Caffeine + Theanine

Theanine is a chemical found in green tea that produces a calm, relaxed, and focused state. It's fine to take on it's own, but it really shines in combination with a high dosage of caffeine. Caffeine is an excellent Nootropic (hence why everyone consumes it before and during their workday) but it causes an unpleasant 'jitteryness' in high doses. Theanine keeps you calm and level.

Theanine is cheap and you can order it on Amazon. (As a bonus, Theanine is also the pill that cures approach anxiety.) I get my caffeine fix in tall, strong coffees, but if you're not into yellow teeth and going for a piss every half hour, you can find cheap caffeine pills as well.

2. Modafinil

As I wrote in my comprehensive post on Modafinil:

Loading...

> "In my experience, one 200 mg dose gives me twelve straight hours of > phenomenal state, focus and mental clarity. Think of how you feel when you've had a great night's sleep, you've been eating clean and training hard, juicing regularly, and you're invested in your work. Modafinil is a pill that unlocks that productive potential for a full day."

Modafinil is the real deal. It is not quite the Limitless drug, but it's about 10% of it, which is still pretty impressive.

It is quite easy to obtain from your doctor, provided you are suffering from narcolepsy or shift-work sleep disorder. You can also order generic meds online if you pinky swear that you have a prescription. I have heard on good authority that Meds For Bitcoins is a reliable source, although I am not affiliated with them.

3. Melatonin

I have experimented with a large number of Nootropics, but I have found none that are superior to the effects of a good night's sleep.

Getting sleep can be hard today though. Blue light tricks our brains into thinking it's dawn, especially if you haven't installed Flux. Dates and last minute resistance can run late. And of course, you're now pumping your body up with stimulants like caffeine and Modafinil.

Melatonin is a chemical that your body produces when it's time to sleep. Supplementing with Melatonin before bed will make it easier for you to fall asleep, and increase the quality of sleep that you do have. Read Gwern's breakdown of this useful little pill for all the information you could ever want and a few more pages after that. Melatonin is cheap via Amazon or in your local drug store. Pop a milligram half an hour before bed, sleep like a baby, and wake up ready to conquer the world.

The world is full of safe and effective methods of making yourself smarter. Ironically enough you would be stupid not to make use of them.

How To Convince A Girl To Get An Abortion

August 28, 2013 | by bacon | Link | Original Link

[image]
Let's face it: sexually active people have accidents. Shit happens, that's life. But we know that men have no reproductive rights in opting out of a being a parent. With only two birth control options available to men (a condom and a vasectomy) the words you use to get your girl off the fence about having an abortion must be well thought out. If you are not ready to be a father, the following arguments may help you convince a girl to get an abortion. The first two methods I describe below have worked for me in separate instances for the two abortions I have paid for. I know other guys who simply did not say the right things or trusted her to "make the right decision." Well, now they are stuck paying child support for children they barely see.

The first method is most applicable for a girl who is a long term booty call or girlfriend; basically, a girl who believes there is an emotional element to your sexual relationship. For these situations I recommend the "Hail Mary," a term referring to the end of an American football game when a team attempts a difficult play in a last ditch effort to win. The concept of a "Hail Mary" has been popularized by radio personality Tom Leykis who created this strategy based on his own personal experience with convincing past girlfriends to get abortions.

How The "Hail Mary" Works

You need to bring up the subject of abortion with every ounce of verbal finesse and situation-appropriate sensitivity. You should sound as sincere as possible and tell her that you want her to be the mother of your children one day, but that now is not the right time to start a family. Explain you want to wait until you are further along in your career/life goals and you can afford to give your future family all the comforts of life you cannot deliver today. Finally, explain if she has the abortion now, you will be able to plan your lives together so that everything is perfect. Then, after she agrees and has the abortion, dump her. It's called a "hail mary" in part because of its difficulty to execute, so if you stay with her post-abortion and she becomes pregnant again you're really fucked.

The second method is best used on girls where minimal emotions were involved in the sexual relationship: infrequent booty calls, ONS girls, or as a secondary method if the "hail mary" does not work on your girlfriend. I call it the asshole method.

How The Asshole Method Works

You need to channel your inner cold, unforgiving, unapologetic asshole nature, as nothing less will suffice. You must not ask, but rather tell her to get an abortion because if she refuses this child will be a bastard. Explain to her in no uncertain terms that you will not be a father to this child. I would avoid personal shots of telling her she is unfit to be a mother because this could backfire on you, but make it clear that if she keeps the baby you will be opting out of fatherhood. Explain that while she may end up collecting the minimum in child support that the state can take from you, in no way will you participate in raising this kid or being a father to it. To instill the seriousness of your message, add that you will refuse any efforts in the future to include you in the child's life.

Once you have laid out your position, get your car keys and tell her you will drive her to the abortion clinic, pay for it, and have her take care of it today so you both can move on with your lives. Explain that since it is early in the pregnancy she only needs to take a pill (different from the morning after pill) to trigger the abortion. The most important part in executing the asshole method is that you keep your emotions in check the whole time. If you budge on that, she could doubt your sincerity and be swayed to keep the kid.

The third method has not been tested by me but it is worth mentioning as a creative way of convincing a girl to get an abortion. I call this method the wildcard method.

How The Wildcard Method Works

Think about what causes normal couples wanting to have children to get an abortion. If an ultrasound finds that the child has a developmental problem like down syndrome, many couples choose to abort. You can use this knowledge to your advantage because you can tell the girl that a rare genetic disease is common in your family. You should tell her you would love to have children but it would be unfair to risk the possibility of this disease (ideally use one which causes an early death and/or horrible lifestyle conditions while alive) being passed on to future generations. To add color to your story, bring up a nonexistent sibling and tell her that you are still recovering from their painful passing a few years ago.

To help convince her that this is a family disease, take pictures. This might require you to spend an afternoon volunteering at a hospital or center for developmentally disabled people. Take a picture of someone who could pass as a relative (similar skin tone is probably all you need). This is just an example, but do whatever you think is necessary to sell the seriousness of this genetic disease to her. Explain that having a kid with your DNA would be like playing Russian roulette with someone's life. If she is still on the fence have her watch the film Tiptoes with Matthew McConaughey and tell her what your siblings, uncles, cousins have lived through makes dwarfism seem like a walk in the park. While this method could require some acting on your part, if you sell it well enough she will be offering to pay for the abortion.

Obviously some demographics (young, college girls with career on the mind) require little effort to convince, but not all women are as easily swayed. Getting inside a woman's head to convince her to get an abortion might require you to be very persuasive and creative in your approach. My hope is that if this advice helps just one man to convince his future baby's mama to spare him from becoming a parent against his will, it was worth the writeup.

Sunday In The Park

August 28, 2013 | by Dr. Johnson | Link | Original Link

Although it was written decades ago, Bel Kaufman's Sunday in the Park remains just as relevant today, if not more so, to what it means to be a man. Her story centers on a family enjoying a Sunday afternoon at the park and is told predominantly from the wife's perspective. Relaxing on a bench, the wife watched happily as her son Larry played in the sand box before her. Sitting next to her, while reading the 'Times Magazine section," was her husband Morton.

Morton. A man as nerdy as his name sounded. Who was, "So citypale, cooped up all week inside the gray factorylike university."

As Larry played on, she noticed another boy digging in the sand too. This boy was fatter, more aggressive than Larry. And his father, a grizzly looking man, sat on the opposite side and "seemed to be taking up the whole bench as he held the Sunday comics close to his face."

Suddenly the fat boy threw sand at Larry, making him upset. After hesitating a moment, the wife intervened;

'Don't do that, little boy,' she said sharply, leaning forward on the bench. 'You mustn't throw sand!' The man on the bench moved his mouth as if to spit again, but instead let her speak. He did not look at her, but at the boy only. 'You go right ahead, Joe,' he said loudly. 'Throw all you want. This here is a public sandbox.'

She felt a sudden weakness in her knees as she glanced at Morton.

Morton was listening too. But he hid under his magazine. Seeming to hope the matter would solve it self.

It didn't.

He put his Times down carefully on his lap and turned his fine, lean face toward the man, smiling the shy, apologetic smile he might have offered a student in pointing out an error in his thinking. When he spoke to the man, it was with his usual reasonableness. 'You're quite right,' he said pleasantly, 'but just because this is a public place….'

The other man cut him off, and an argument ensued until the large man said "Aw, shut up!" They both rose. Morton reluctantly. The wife nervously imagined the coming violence, about what she should do, how she should react.

Until…

Morton adjusted his glasses. He was very pale. 'This is ridiculous,' he said unevenly. 'I must ask you….'

'Oh, yeah?' said the man. He stood with his legs spread apart, rocking a little, looking at Morton with utter scorn. 'You and who else?'

For a moment the two men looked at each other nakedly.

Then Morton backed down.

'Come on, let's get out of here.' He walked awkwardly, almost limping with self-consciousness to pick up his son Larry and left with his wife by his side.

At first she was relieved. There was no violence. No one was hurt. But as they left the park, she began to feel something else, something…

Loading…

Inescapable. She sensed that it was more than just an unpleasant incident, more than defeat of reason by force. She felt dimly it had something to do with her and Morton, something acutely personal, familiar, and important.

While walking to their car, Morton rambled on and tried to rationalize his defeat. But the more he did, the more distant she became.

Getting pulled further away from the sandbox, Larry's cries grew worse. But once he started dragging his feet, Morton and his wife finally had enough.

'If you can't discipline this child, I will,' Morton snapped, making a move toward the boy.

But her voice stopped him. She was shocked to hear it, thin and cold and penetrating with contempt. 'Indeed?' she heard herself say. 'You and who else?'

At first glance Bel Kaufman's story seems simple: There's a stronger male, Morton backs down, he's a wimp, needs bigger balls, women hate beta males, etc…

We know that already. But there's another point to her story that's hidden below the surface. Because Kaufman's story isn't just about lacking courage, it's about what causes that cowardice; namely, apathy.

As a man, your first reaction to the story might be that she's saying being a big brute pays off more than being a weakling. The big guy might have shown some dominating, alpha characteristics, but to think that way is to miss Kaufman's point entirely.

The wife didn't care that Morton was a nerd; that's probably why she married him. Perhaps she was one too. But it was Morton's lack of anger, his lack of pride in himself that bothered her. That he never developed the animal-like rage proving that he was the family's protector in the most critical of moments.

…more than defeat of reason by force. She felt dimly it had something to do with her and Morton, something acutely personal, familiar, and important.

Morton's cowardice proved to her what she knew deep down all along, that he didn't love his family enough the way she did.

It is critical to realize that Kaufman never gave the wife a name in the story but did for the husband. By doing this she was trying to show that the wife had given her up identity to the family, and expected Morton do the same by being a man and fulfilling his end of the bargain.

That courage isn't so much about standing up for yourself as it is about standing up for others. But he didn't and that was the source of her resentment. So repeating the "You and who else” remark was a way of saying, “How are you going to raise your son to be a man if you’re not even one yourself?”

The great thing about Bel Kaufman is that she came from a time where women encouraged men to be what they are and not what they should be.

Breaking Beta: The Walter White Transformation

Have you heard of Breaking Bad, the hit TV show? I'm sure you have. I had heard of it for years, but not being one to be swayed by popular culture, I chalked it up to social hype and skipped ever watching it, until Dagonet from The Quest For 50 urged me to watch it. One night before prepping to hit the town, he stated "Just watch the pilot; trust me, you're going to like it". That was two weeks ago, and in that short time span, I watched all previous seasons and snagged the latest season episodes off the web cough cough, and am now caught up with the rest of the world.

When we meet Walter White, in the pilot episode, it's clear that he is a beaten down, pussy whipped, middle aged man, living the 'American Dream', of a family, a modest suburbian house and a stable and dependable job, albeit with shitty pay. He is chastised from his wife for a $12 credit card purchase, beholden to his high school principal (although she is banging hot), aka, his BOSS, and dealing with the joys of realizing that his life sucks donkey cock and that everything he COULD have been, has not happened and now he simply exists. Oh, did I mention, he is diagnosed with lung cancer? Life is grand in Walt's World.

Without spoiling the show, for those of you who have not watched it, is that Walt begins a transformation from a Beat Down Beta Bitch Boy into that of a Dominating, Do-As-He-Pleases Alpha Male. Now the irony is, while his tactics are extreme, is that we see his wife Skyler White, begin to get turned on by his behavior and in the first season, there is plenty of him bending her over the kitchen sink, pulling her panties down and fucking her hard. She likes it. She's surprised, and almost unsure of how to take it, but she's wetter than the Pacific Ocean.

As Walt transforms into a man who does what he wants, when he wants, we start to see his confidence grow, his physical stature change and his outlook on life change. Here is a man who may be dead in a few months, due to the cancer, who decides to really LIVE. No longer will he be beaten down by societies demands of XYZ.

In the beginning, Walt starts to cook meth simply to save money to provide for his family when he dies; however, as he progresses down the path and his cancer enters remission, we see that the path of Alphadom is simply irresistible. Once you have tasted the power of living life on YOUR terms, then it is very hard to abandon the progress you've made, lose the feeling of freedom and resort to being beaten down and miserable. There simply is no turning back.

I present a question for my readers: Are you beaten down by life, your wife, your children, your job, by society, by extended family? What would it take for you to change your life completely, start to live on YOUR terms and start really living life? Cancer? Loss of a job?

Walter White is a fictional TV character, but his story is one that resonates with men across the world, because Walter is their darkest fantasy. They long to quit their bullshit low paying job, embark on a business venture with plenty of risk, but incredible rewards and finally put in place the nagging bitchy wife who wears the pants in the family.

While I do not endorse the lifestyle of Walter White of dealing drugs and murdering people; I DO endorse any man who wakes up one day, decides to live life on HIS terms and bitch-slaps the world into submission.

Do not wait until tomorrow, do not wait until next year, do not wait until the 'perfect timing', because there is no perfect timing, but instead, decide TODAY, that you are going to leave the Beta Bitch Boy curse behind and start down the path of Alphadom.

It's YOUR life; start living like it is.

A Study In Scarlet

August 29, 2013 | by Roosh Valizadeh | Link | Original Link

I don't know how I made it to 34 years of age without reading a Sherlock Holmes book. I started with the first one, A Study In Scarlet. I was not disappointed.

Holmes is a freelance detective who has an insatiable hunger for knowledge across multiple fields of science. This gives him amazingly intuitive powers, such as being able to guess someone's profession from looking at them. He can also mentally recreate crime scenes. His mind is a synergy of unrelated disciplines that gives him unparalleled power in solving crime.

This book is about one particular case of murder that the local detectives hire Holmes to help solve.

> I consider that a man's brain originally is like a little empty attic, and you have to stock it with such furniture as you choose. A fool takes in all the lumber of every sort that he comes across, so that the knowledge which might be useful to him gets crowded out, or at best is jumbled up with a lot of other things so that he has a difficulty in laying his hands upon it. Now the skillful workman is very careful indeed as to what he takes into his brain-attic. He will have nothing but the tools which may help him in doing his work, but of these he has a large assortment, and all in the most perfect order. It is a mistake to think that that little room has elastic walls and can distend to any extent. Depend upon it there comes a time when for every addition of knowledge you forget something that you knew before. It is of the highest importance, therefore, not to have useless facts elbowing out the useful ones.

> "You don't seem to give much thought to the matter in hand," I said at last, interrupting Holmes' musical disquisition.

> "No data yet," he answered. "It is a capital mistake to theorize before you have all the evidence. It biases the judgment.
> […]
> "It is a mistake to confound strangeness with mystery. The most commonplace crime is often the most mysterious because it presents no new or special > features from which deductions may be drawn. This murder would have been infinitely more difficult to unravel had the body of the victim been simply found lying in the roadway without any of those outré and sensational accompaniments which have rendered it remarkable. These strange details, far from making the case more difficult, have really had the effect of making it less so."

> "There is no satisfaction in vengeance unless the offender has time to realize who it is that strikes him, and why retribution has come upon him. I had my plans arranged by which I should have the opportunity of making the man who had wronged me understand that his old sin had found him out."
> "What you do in this world is a matter of no consequence," returned my companion, bitterly. "The question is, what can you make people believe that you have done."

The second half of the book, which describes the motive for the crime, was quite a page turner. When I finished it, I went straight to Amazon to purchase the entire Sherlock Holmes collection, and have since gotten to work on them. Recommended.

How To Get Laid On Amtrak Trains

August 30, 2013 | by BroadsMan | Link | Original Link

Wendell Willkie was a strikingly handsome man – charming successful, and confident – and a "womanizer". In 1940, he ran against the popular Franklin Roosevelt as FDR tried for a third term. While the press generally let both candidates keep their private lives private, a Trotskyite female writer took a backdoor approach to scandal against the Republican candidate and published a widely read short story about a handsome businessman meeting and "seducing" a young woman on a train. "The Man in the Brooks Brothers Shirt" was generally taken to be Willkie.

Trains remain good places to meet, game, and bang women – if it worked for Wendell (and for me), it can work for you.
